For the other, as he will punish all sin in some kind, so he will punish so much sin in the own kind. For it is just with him to recompense tribulation to them the trouble you, 2. Thes. 1.6. With the froward he will show himself froward. Psal. 18.26. Who so sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed. But sometimes it is not so, but always it should be so, and certainly the magistrate that omits it, shall find his case like Ahab's; Thy life shall go for his life. Mat. 26.52. They that take the sword, shall perish with the sword: they that Take it, before it be given them by lawful authority. His punishment is qualified to his sin, that is made Gladio peccati, who did Gladio perimere. He that stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, shall cry himself and not be heard. Qui non tribuit petenti, petet a non tribuente. Judgment without mercy shall be to him that shows no mercy. Frustra quaerit eum se, quod noluit habere intrase. In vain he seeks mercy out of himself, that had now within himself, Esa. 33.1. Woe to thee that spoilest, for thou shalt be spoiled. It is just that they who ruin others, should be ruined themselves, Gal. 5.15. If ye but and devour one another, take heed ye be not consumed one of another. If the greater serpent devours the less, there is a dragon to devour him. The fire of the Sodomites lusted flamed up to heaven, therefore heavens fire of wrath flamed down upon them, Levite. 10.2. Nadab and Abihu offered strange fire, and therefore they suffered strange fire. Hos. 4.12. They have gone a whoring from their God, therefore their Daughters shall commit whoredom, and their spouses adultery. Spiritual fornication shall be punished with corporal pollution. If we consider that shop of pride, Esa. 3. we shall find every ornament made an abhorment, ver. 24. In stead of sweet smell, there shall be a stink: for the girdle, a rent: for well set hair, baldness. Observe how the particular plagues are proportioned to the nature of the particular sins, Prov. 23.29. They loved the redness of wine, they shall feel the redness of eyes. Gen. 20.18. Do they detain Abraham's Wife? none of their wives shall be pregnant. This Job acknowledged to be just: If mine heart have been deceived by a woman, then let my Wife grind unto another, Wis. 11.15. Beasts they worshiped, and by beasts they shall be devoured. That they might know wherewithal a man sinneth, by the same he shall also be punished, Exod. 19.24. Let not the people break thorough unto the Lord, lest the Lord break forth upon them. Jonah crossed to the sea, therefore he was lost in the sea. He would needs to the water, he shall have water enough, Judge. 8.16. Their flesh was torn with briers and thorns, that were briars and thorns to tear others. Rev. 16.6. They have shed the blood of thy Saints, and thou hast given them blood 〈◇〉 drink. as Tomyris gave Cyrus: to give one blood, is to put him to death, Ezek. 1•. I will cause thee to be slain, as men are slain in the burning rage of wrath and jelousie, ver. 39. Thou didst lay open thy nakedness in sin, I will therefore lay open thy nakedness in shame. To allow the sins of others, is to be come guilty of 〈◇〉 same sins: as CHRIST condemned the living Jews for killing of Zacharias, wh• their ancestors slew many ages before: because they approved their courses, and therefore justly inherited their fathers sins and judgments, Mat. 23.

I might be endless in the prosecution of this doctrine. They shall bury in P•phet, till there be no more place. In Tophet they had committed that monstrous th• nation, burning their children in the fire to Moloch: in Tophet they shall find destruction. The Jews report that in Tophet there was a deep pit or ditch, called Os Inferni, never filled: in the pit that Chaldeans threw their slain bodies, Mat. 1•.25. The Lord commanded him to be sold, wife and children and all that he had. Perhaps he sinned in his wife and children, therefore was punished in his wife and children. He might turn his wife into an Idol, and set her in the place of God: he might be indulgent to the vices of his children: therefore, Let his children be fatherless, and his wife a widow. How usual is it for men to obey the will of their wives before the will of God! How just is it with the Lord to suffer the wife so luxuriously allowed, to dote on adulterous mixtures: and for another's sake to break her faith with her husband who for her sake had broke his faith with God! Why doth such a man find fault? he doth by his servile affordments what he can to make his wife a harlot, and then complains that she is so. Immoderate diet, inordinate will, immodest apparel, himself proudly vouchsafes her: what are these but mid-wives to bring forth that shame, he is loath to hear of? what more usual than to buy places in reversions, expectant on the lives of three, four, six, to be served and expired, before theirs bear date? Therefore what more just, than to cut them short, and extend the decaying terms of the other? Let his days be few, and another take his office. They have admitted invasions upon their own honesty, secretly to wish that the days of others might be few, that they might take their office. Therefore shall their own days be few, and another take their office. The Proverb fits them; he that waits for dead men's shoes, shall go bare-foot. The Rivers that Pharaoh bloodied with the slain infants, are turned into blood: that he might read the color of his sin in the sanguine waters. Thus murderous men, so prodigal in slucing out blood, have been affronted and affrighted with bloody visions. They think their eyes see nothing but blood, their ears hear nothing but the sound of blood, all their meat tastes of blood, their drink hath a bloody color: the very ways they travel are sanguine, they dream of nothing but blood, till their heads, like Nero's, be soaked in blood: Thou hast thirsted for blood, of blood take thy fill. This sufferance could not even David scape: his house was haunted with the sword. He sinned in a proud numbering of his people, therefore was punished in shortening the number of his people.

Herodias daughter, that like a dancing whirligig footed away the head of John the Baptist, was her self cut shorter by the head with ye. Caesar had undone three and twenty countries, he died of three and twenty wounds. Cresus that loved gold insatiately, had of gold his throat full. Aurum sitisti, aurum bibe. Many penurious fathers are so scraping for their children, that they ravish the poor children of God: but the hand of the LORD shall be against their young Lions. They join house to house, and field to field: but their children shall be vagabonds, and beg; seeking their bread out of their desolate places. How many a covetous moale is now digging a house in the earth for his posterity, and never dreams of this sequel? That God should make those children beggars, for whose sake the fathers have made so many beggars! This is a quittance which the Sire will not believe, but as sure as God is just the son shall feel. Now if he had but leave to come out of hell for an hour, and see this, how should he curse his folly? sure if possible, it would double the pain of his infernal torture. Bee moderate then ye that so insatiately devour, as if you had an infinite capacity: you overlode your stomachs, it is fit they should be disburdened in shameful spewing. How quickly doth a worldly minded man grow a defrauder, from a defrauder to an Usurer, from an Usurer to an oppressor, from an oppressor to an extortioner: if his eyes do but tell his heart of a bootie, his heart will charge his hand, and he must have it, Mic. 2.2. They do but aspicere, concupiscere, and arripere: see it, like it, and take it. Observe their due payment. Psal. 109.11. Let the extortioner take all he hath: they got all by extortion, they shall lose all by extortion. They spoiled their neighbors, strangers shall spoil them. How often hath the poor widow and orphan cried, wept, groaned to them for mercie, and found none! They have taught God how to deal with themselves: Let there be none to extend mercy to them. They have advanced houses for a memorial, and dedicated lands to their own names: Psal. 49.11. All to get them a name, and even in this they shall be crossed. Psal. 109.13. In the next generation their name shall be quite put out.

Our neighbors of Rome presume that they have the keys of heaven and hell some they bring down from heaven to hell, as they did that blessed Queen, Elizbeth: others they lift up from hell to heaven, canonizing bloody Traitours: they censure as they will, not as God will. But their punishment is fitted by CHRIST, Mat. 7.2. With what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged. When they shall find that they have mistaken the keys, and learn what it is to condemn, by being condemned. Because they have put away sacred marriage, therefore they are given upon unclean cloistures, stinking brothels, and preternaturall stews.

Not to be favorable to ourselves at home; what is the reason that this land 〈◇〉 so defiled with blood; and that (not feeling the sword of an enemy) a man complains I am wounded in the house of my friends? Nor is this alone in those un•••lie trials of man-hood in the fields; but even in the streets, in the houses: no place is safe, but a mistaken word is requited with a stab or some mortal blow. And when this comes to be censured, it is found chance-medley, at worst man-slaughter and that perhaps Se defendendo. Whereupon these homicides are so fleshed with blood, that they make no more to kill a man, than a fly. Oh they may mend, and become good Christians, good subjects: but that sin is rarely repented off. If he had been cut off for the first murder, the second man had been alive. Why do we presume to cozen God by the warrant of Law, to purloine the maintenance of the Minister, and to put ourselves in God's place! What is this, but to point God the way to plague us, and to send upon us a famine of preaching, who have brought a famine upon the preachers? Is it not just with God to take away the Lamp from that nation, which hath taken away the holy oil that should maintain it? And Lord, that I might herein be a false Prophet! I fear that England shall want the Gospel, when the Barbarians receive it: because England had the Gospel, and would not give a penny to keep it. We hope this nation shall live to see the fall of Rome and Antichrist, so we may, if our sins, and among the rest unthankful sacrilege, do not first give Rome a triumph over us. Consider how immediately upon this charge of rendering the Teacher his portion, the Holy Ghost infers; not deceived, God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man sows, the same shall he also reap. You may deceive yourselves, you shall never mock God: you shall drink as you have brewed. Thus when we see surfeits do we not point at gluttony precedent? when a body is drowned with a dropsy, do we not say, there hath gone an in•tion of drink before? When that Neapolitane evil hath wasted the marrow, and rotted the flesh; we know this fire was f•tched from the hearth of whoredom. The matter of sin is written with capital letters in the punishment. God is just, he hath ways enough to punish us, we have no way to escape him. If he doth not punish the adulterer with rottenness in his bones, yet he can add fire to fire; to the flame of lust, the flame of hell. If the Usurer escape bonds here: yet he that bound others above, may be bound himself below. The litigious may get the better, until God comes to enter his action against him. There is no evasion but seasonable repentance: let us punish ourselves, that God be not put to do it. Let us correct drunkenness by abstinence, pride by humility, covetousness by charity, cruelty by mercy, uncleanness by chastity, anger by patience, usury by restitution. This is to take a congruous and proportionate vengeance on ourselves, that God may spare us in the day of reckoning.

7 Damnation is principally taken for the censure or sentence condemning: as the sentence follows the trial, and the execution the sentence: here it intends the extration of the Judgment. But if damnation be meant for the execution, how doth it preceede the sentence? Seeing it seems very unjust to execute a man before his ju•gement; after that old scandal of the Stanneries Law; that hanged a man in the forenoone, and sate in judgment on him in the afternoon. The day of judgment is the second appearing of Christ: now for evil men to receive their damnation before hand, were to antedate the sentence, and to execute persons unjudged. It is easi•y answered; Every unbeliever must pass through two Judgment days: a particu•ar, when his guilty soul leaves his unfortunate body: a general, when both body and soul having been co-instruments of sin, shall be made copartners in punishment. Hence the soul, as it hath been the principal in offending, being that part of man wherein God hath placed natural reason and knowledge of his will, shall be the first in suffering. Leaving the body a dead and insensible piece of earth, while her self grows under the burden of unsupportable torments alone, till the body comes •o suffer with it.

If it be objected; what need any second Judgment, seeing the world stands wholly either of believers or unbelievers? And the believer. Shall not come into •ondemnation, but is already passed from death unto life. And the unbeliever is already condemned, Why then any further

Judgment? Yes, for though the believer shall not come into the judgment of condemnation, yet he must also pass the judgment of absolution: and as he is made just by Christ, so must he before all the world be pronounced. Vt justitia, qua justificatur coram Deo, ipsa justificetur coram mundo. The first justifies the person, the second justifies God's righteousness. So the unbeliever is condemned already in effect three ways. 2. Propositor Dei; God did foresee and fore• appoint his damnation, as it is the punishment of sin, and execution of his Justice. 2. Verbo Dei, by the word of God, which sets down his damnation, finding him in the number of those to whom it is due, and out of Christ by whom alone he might escape it. 3. Testimonio conscientiae, by the verdict of his own conscience; which doth so judge him here, as God will judge him hereafter: therefore it is called Vicedeus, a deputy God. But if their be a precedent damnation upon the reprobates, why is it here said, Their damnation hastens? That cannot be called closely propinquant, nearly future, which is actually present, yea which hath been before. If they were damned in the purpose of God for their sin, and are damned in the word of God judging sin, how are they said to be hereafter damned, or, Their damnation lingers not? I answer; for their former damnation in the decree of God, they know it not: for their present damnation in the word of God, they mind it not: and for the damnation of their own conscience, they feel it not. Therefore the execution of this shall fall upon them, and then they shall know it, mind it, feel it.

Thus death shall execute his office to kill their bodies, and hell his office to receive their souls, and the Devil his office to inflict torments; when God hath pronounced on them the particular sentence of his Justice. This damnation then is that fearful punishment of sin imposed on reprobates: made up of an extremity, universality, and eternity of torments. So extreme that they refuse addition, so universal that no part hath exemption, so everlasting that they never admit conclusion. Their extremity is undefin'd, their universality unconfined, their eternity without hope of end.

But how doth this stand with the Justice of God, for finite transgression to give infinite destruction? Sins are the actions of time, done in a temporality, limited in a certain space. Now if the punishment be proportionate to the sin, how can the one be temporal, the other eternal: sin transient, plague permanent? I answer, this equity and equality is observable in our civil punishments: the thief dispatcheth a robbery in half an hour; he lies many days in irons for this, and at last answers it with his neck. Adultery is soon perpetrated, a long and infamous shame depends upon it. Treason may be a villainy of no length; yet the delinquent finds mercy if he but lie in prison for it all his life, and lose his possessions forever. Hic non quaerenda temporis aequalitas, sed expendenda sceleris gravitas. A man quickly gives himself a wound, but the Surgeon cannot so quickly heal him. David was not long in killing Uriah with the sword, yet did the sword never depart from his house. A man commits murder but once, and it was soon done; yet he is condemned to the perpetual galleys. There was one sick 38 years, John. 5.14. and Christ says, this was because of his sin. Consider some reasons why their punishment is not less than damnation eternal.

1 Because their sins are infinite in number. David propounds a Quoties, who can find a Toties for it? Psal. 19.12. Who can tell how oft he offendeth? No man, The hairs of a man's head may be told: the stars appear in multitudes, yet some have undertaken to reckon them: but no Arithmetic can number our sin. Before we can recount a thousand, we shall commit ten thousand more; and fo•there multiply by Addition, than divide by Subtraction: there is no possibility of moderation. Like Hydra's head, while we are cutting off twenty by repentance, we find a hundred more grown up. It is just then that infinite sorrows should follow infinite sins.

2. Because they are committed against an infinite Majesty. He that clippeth the Kings coin, or, defaceth the Kings arms; or, counterfeits the broad. Seal of England, or the privy. Seal, is adjudged to die as a Traitor: because this fact offenses disgrace against the person of the King: much more doth he deserve the second death, that violates the Law of the King of Kings: seeing that breach doth not only tend to the defacing of his own Image in us; but reflects upon the person of God himself, who in every sin is contemned and dishonored. If one man sin against another, the Judge shall judge him: but if a man sin against the Lord, who shall 〈◇〉 for him? compare Protafis with Apodosis, sequel with sequel, the former with the latter, by the rules of opposition. What doth the former affirm? no more but a civil meditation for a temporal satisfaction. What doth the latter deny? a religious or divine intercession for eternal satisfaction. Sins receive their nature from their objects in a formal consideration: to be plain with all capacities, sins take their nature from their aim. When the will from within shall give the King o•Arams charge; Fight neither against small nor great, saving only against the King of Israel: this must needs be immediate treason. According to worth, Injur•• patientis auget culpam facientis, Salvian. That sin is fowlest, that strikes at the fairest. Therefore the sin directed against an infinite Majesty, deserves infinite penalty. Ask a Recusant what that servant merits, which like an Onesimus, is a fugitive from his master. What will he say, but the whipping post, or, house of correction? But what deserves he that changeth his God, his religion? yet there and be no whipping post for such a renegade, no correction-house for him; whatsoever he condignely suffers, is held persecution. Ask the sacrilegious what shall be done, to him that steals; hang him, he cries. But what shall be done to him that robs his God? here he can see no felonie: he shall feel it. Ask a man abused in his name whether he will send his reviler: he presently curseth him, as if he meant him to hell, but howsoever he will send him to the consistorie. But whether shall he go, that dishonors the name of God? Doth that bear no action? no, cursing and swearing infers no defamation. Yes, he is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , damned of his own self. If they could satisfy an infinite Justice simul & semel, at once together; their plague, though it admits of no latitude or weight, being in universal extremity; yet if should have an end. But what to the uncapable subject is defective in place, must be made up in durance. He shall not come forth, till he hath paid the uttermost for thing. He might pay this at once if he had it: but because non habet unde, he hath i• not; he must be paying it successive sine fine, and answer it with his own imprisonment forever.

3 Because they frustrate a price of redemption that is infinite. Did the Son of God accept their nature, shed his precious blood, and pay that infinite de•• 〈◇〉 God's Justice for all believers; and will they make void to themselves that would of unspeakable goodness? He is worthy of eternal damnation, that despiseth the redemption of him that is eternal. It is just with Christ to forsake them forever that forsake him forever. There remains no more sacrifice for them: therefore ‹◊› Christ die again, they must lie in hell, that is forever. They that fall from everlasting grace, justly meet with everlasting wrath: from salvation eternal, to destruction eternal. Every drop of Christ's blood doth save the believing soul forever: if that inestimable treasure be trode underfoot, the soul is justly lost forever. Who pities that man's death; who having the medicine by him which can help him, dies and will not take it? Serjeants are out to arrest thee, the Law hath condemned thee; we may say of thee as of a sentenced malefactor, mortuus in lege; thou art dead in Law: speed then to Christ, if thou be taken before thou get to thy Surety, thou wilt be laid up forever.

4 Because they are unthankful for blessings and graces infinite. God give them life while they can live: if they be ingrate, he will give them death while they can die. His mercy strove the utmost to make them blessed, his Justice shall strive the utmost to make them cursed. If any deliverance, preferment, or content come to an unthankful person; let him know that it is but his impropriation; God will make him pay for it. Contribution of blessings requires retribution of thanks, or will bring distribution of plagues. We have many Adeodates, but return few Deodates. God gives freely and continually, so let us praise him: voice & cord, with the voice and the heart: not the voice alone, for then the heart is tied; not the heart alone, for then wear tongue-tied. Continually; for if thou canst find one hour wherein he doth not give thee something; take that hour to return him nothing. Yet is there thanks enough owing for the former: but there is no new hour which is not witness of new benefits. Thy mercies are new every morning. CHRIST hath bought us both in body and soul; we must glorify him in both, or he will destroy us in both. He will be glorified either in our voluntary obedience, or necessary vengeance. Thus how easy is it for a reprobate to bring upon himself damnation. The more God lodes him with benefits, the more he lodes himself with accounts. Bee thankful, this is the way to ease thy reckoning: fly to CHRIST, this is the way to get it quite taken off. As Alcibiades told the steward, when he complained of his trouble about making his accounts; that his care were better bestowed, Quod non reddat, quàm quod reddat, how to make no account at all, than how to make his accounts even. If our faith have gotten CHRIST to account for us, we shall make no reckoning at all. Every benefit forgotten in present gratitude, must be remembered in future servitude. Thus he that receives infinite favors, and remains unthankful, deserves infinite pains.

5 Because they have omitted infinite duties: the hours that are not spent in obedience against sin, are spent in sin against obedience. Wicked men think they commit but a single sin, when indeed they always double it. For in faciendo quod non debent, non faciunt quod debent: While they do what they should not, they leave undone what they should, and so bind two sins together. The Sabbath-ranger that is gone about the business of the pot, thinks he only offends in his excess, forgets his not serving God at the Church. It is one sin to be absent from the house of God, though, he did not admit the other, to be present in the house of sin. Doth the oppressor barely transgress in wringing the poor? yea, at that very time he should have relieved the poor. Think not thy hours wast papers, to fill them up with nothing but blanks: as if God would take this for a good reckoning, When the book of thy conscience comes to be opened, all those blanks are filled up with Indictments: and thou shalt find it a nequam, which thou thoughtst a nequicquam. No greatness of blood can privilege idleness, no more than much money can justify Usury. When God calls thee to account, Quare te non praeuisti solertem? Why wast thou not industrious? It will be no good answer; Quia tu me fecisti diuitem; because thou hast made me rich. Now that these omissions deserve eternal destruction, it is manifest, because we are bound to the duties. Therefore in the form of CHRIST'S judicial proceeding, the wicked are condemned for sins of omission, perpertrations not being spoken of, as if there were no question of their guiltiness: to show that their is damnation enough wrapped up in those very omissions. Neither shall they be only punished with the privation of all joys and peace, and no further for then they were mere indifferences. But with the position of torments, to declare that good works were imposed; not voluntary, but necessary. Now if these be as innumerable as our waking minutes; how infinite must be the unrepentants destruction for them!

6 Because sin is infinite in their desires, and the desire of sinning God judgeth sin it self. As the desire of grace is grace, and the desire of repentance is one degree of repentance: so the concupiscence of iniquity is the iniquity. He that lusts after a woman, hath already committed adultery with her in his heart. Optans, oper...: desiderator, scortator. Now what is more insatiate than the desires of the wicked? They enlarge themselves beyond all bounds, and are scarce limited with the world. How unsatisfied is the adulterers desire! he goes from woman to woman, as the sick man from fountain to fountain, and none can quench his thirst. For woman is not the bounds of lust, but womankind. Loves number is no number, but one: he that errs from that, is incessant in concupiscence; and if it were possible, would embrace all the beauties he sees, in his luxuriant arms. Vice hath no mean, measure nor cessation; till it hath no being. One wife is the desire of love, but lust would have infinite. And though it be straitened to enjoy but one at once: yet it hath an infinite desire to many; neither doth all the variety of the earth change it: whensoever his pleasure is served, he is the same man he was before, and begins again to desire a fresh. For lust is still a beginning, and would more common be than any one, could it, as other sins, be done alone. But age ceaseth it, therefore not infinite: then Desire faileth? yet many in age though they cannot desire, yet desire to desire. Now an infinite fire of lust, must have an infinite fire of hell. What limits hath the ambitious desire? what degrees of honor, though Phaeton like to for in the chariot of the Sun, would content him? Let him reduce all the kingdoms of the world to one monarchy, and possess as much as ever the devil promised Christ: yet Aestuat infaelix angusto limite mundi, he wants elbow-room. He calls for more worlds, or, is angry that God made this no bigger: yea erects his statute, and would be worshipped as the Lord himself. He thought the whole earth too little for him, and why should God think the whole hell too much for him? The Angel that would have all the glory in heaven, is justly damned to all the pains i• hell. If thou be infinite in thy sinning, why may not God be infinite in thy punishing.

What confines have ever hedged in covetousness; whoever heard it say. Sa... Domine, O Lord I have enough; A handful of corn cast into the bushel makes it the fuller: put water into the sea, it hath by so much the more. But he that love• silver, shall not be satisfied with silver. One desire may be satisfied, but another comes. Crescit amor nummi quantum ipsa pecunia crescit. Natural desires are finite: as the thirst is satisfied with drink, the hungry appetite with meat.

But unnatural desires are infinite: as it is with the body in burning feavers; Quo plus sint pota, Pl• sitiuntur aquae: the more they drink, the more they thirst. Now as these proceed not from natural causes, but from diseases: so exorbitant affections arise not De s••• mente, sed de morbo animae: not from the temper but from the distemper of the soul. Grace can never fill the purse, nor wealth fill the heart. Here is an infinite sin, why should it not have an infinite punishment? Hence covetousness is compared to hell it self, for the near affinity between them: both alike promise at once to be satisfied. Hell and destruction are never full, so the eyes of man are never satisfied. As the covetous enlarge their mouths to swallow the earth, so Hell hath enlarged her self, and opened her mouth to swallow them, Esa. 5.14. Let not our oppressors now fla••• themselves, that hell is full, and there is no room for them: for the Lord hath made it Large, of immense capacity. It is Lacus magnus, Revel. 19. a great la•• able to receive all that are cast into it. If it were not so spacious, and there seemed to want room for oppressors: yet God would take out thieves and harlots, and drunkards, I had almost said liars, and swearers, to put in oppressors; they must have room. Hell from beneath is moved for them to meet them at their coming. Hell it self will come to meet them in state, as glad to give them entertainment. Now if the usurer can keep himself out of the number of oppressors, he may hap to scape. But are not their desires unlimited; that join field to field, till there be no place; They would leave no room for others, but engross all the earth to themselves: therefore though there should want room for others, they shall have all hell to themselves If sin have an infinite desire to offend God, God will have an infinite hand to punish it.

7 Gregory adds another reason of this infinite punishment. He that dies without repentance, is pr•supposed by Justice, that if he could have lived forever, he would have sinned forever. And it is just; if thou wilt rebelliously sin so long as thou livest; God should punish so long as he liveth. If thou wilt peccare in aeterno tuo, God will punire in aeterno suo. Nothing is more proportionable, than that those who will sin against God so long as they have a being, without repentance; should perish from God so long as he hath a being, without mercy. It is the Lord's just Judgment, ut nunquam mortuus careat supplicio, qui nunquam vivus carere voluit peccato; ut nullus detur iniquo terminus ultionis, qui quamdiu valuit, habere noluit terminum criminis. They would have lived forever, that they might have sinned forever. Their injustice would put no date to their sins, God's justice shall put no date to their sufferings. On earth he that will still run in debt while he lives at liberty, shall at last be cast into prison to lie while he lives in misery. Shall man have this law against his brother, and not God against his creature? yes, there will come a day when all reckonings shall be cast over, when justice must be satisfied to the full; atleast so full as the delinquent can satisfy it, not with ready money, the merits of Christ: then with eternal durance, he must lie by it forever. Till he hath paid the uttermost farthing; and which is lamentable, he hath not one farthing towards it. The reprobate cannot do many things he would: the needy drunkard cannot be an usurer: the base pilferer cannot be a rich commonwealths oppressor; no thanks, they would but they cannot. The power, not the will, is wanting in them to any wickedness. Now it is just, velle malum et non posse, pati malum et non velle. He that doeth what he will, must suffer what God will.

8 The sinner is often admonished, often threatened: dealt with all mildly, and taken up roundly: now tempted with a crown, than terrified with a scourge: allured with the promises of heaven, affrighted with the menaces of hell: encouraged to Grace by the Gospel, thundered against for sin by the Law: offered either a cursed. Devil to torment him, or, a blessed Christ to save him. Neither is life and death set before him only once, but all his days. All day long hath God stretched forth his hands unto him. This choice is put to him so long as he lives on earth: therefore if he make election of sin, it must stick by him so long as he lives in hell. What could God do more in mercy, what can he do less in justice? The sinner is shown an easy way to salvation; Believe in Christ the remission of sins, and endeavor in thyself amendment of life, and thou shalt be saved. The Publican said but only. God be merciful to me a sinner: Quid hic sudoris, quid laboris? what great labor or pains was this? Chryst. The malefactor on the Cross declared three things; reprehension of his fellows sins, confession of his own sins, supplication for mercy; and he was taken up into that glorious paradise. He that will not take so little pain to get so much ease, is worthy of little ease and much pain. If men make God lose all the labor of his mercy, to save them, he will not lose all the labor of his Justice to punish them.

9 Though it be true that every sin is finite as considered in respect of the act: as •it is a transient action it is finite. But it is infinite in respect of the inherence in the subject. For the foul of man is immortal, and so the sin which sticketh on it, is made immortal with it. For the guilt can no ways be taken from it, but by imputing it to Christ. And besides the guilt contracted by the fact, there is a blot that doth stain the soul: as the scarlet or crimson die doth the silk or wool: which can no ways be undyed or gotten out but by the blood of the Lamb. All the Saints had stains, blemishes, and polluted colours; but They washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. 1 Cor. 6.11. Such were ye, but you are washed, &c. Now those turpitudes and aspersiones so died in grain by sin in the soul, if they be not purged by him, remain forever inseparable: and can no more but taken from it, than the spots from the Leopard, or the scarlet can fade till the cloth be worn out. So long therefore as this stain abides, the wrath of God abides: and as that tincture can never be gotten off, so the fire of hell can never be bu•• out. There is no more extinguishing the one, than relinquishing the other; both remain forever.

10 There is an habit of evil in the wicked. Some think that sin in it self is nothing, because it hath no formal being or subsistence: but punishment is a thing of being and position. Now shall that which is nothing be punished with something; Shall a creature be punished for nothing; This were, as David complained of his persecutors, a course of injustice; They hated me without a cause. But that which is held nothing in a positive existence, will be found something in a priuative sufferance. To clear this point, we must examine what sin in it self is. In its own proper nature it is, saith S^t John an Anomie, or want of conformity to the Law of God: or an Ataxie, and absence of goodness and integrity in the thing that subsisteth. In Adam before his fall were three, not indistinguishable, yet inseparable things. 1 His substance. 2 The faculties and powers of his body and soul. 3 And the Image of God consisting in straightness, conformity, and rectitude of all these to his will. What then was his sin; not the want of the two former, he had his substance and faculties still: but of the latter, the conformity of God's will. In a musical Instrument there is not only the substance of it, and the sound, but also the harmony in the sound. That which is contrary to harmony, is none of the two former: but only the last, that is the disorder or discord in music, which is the absence or want of harmony, we may call it Disharmonie. Neither is this a mere absence of goodness, but also a presence or habit of evil. As it is received into man's nature, it is only a privation of good: but as being received it continues, it is a habit of evil. But it may be said, that a mere and single privation can perform no act: as darkness, which is the absence of light, can stir nothing: silence cannot move or produce an effect. But concupiscence draws away the heart from God's service, and entiseth it to evil: now this is an action, and no action can proceed of a mere privation. To answer this we must distinguish of original sin: as it is of its own nature, so it is no inclination or action, no moving power, but only a want. But as it is mixed with the subject wherein it is, it inclines, moves, compells to evil.

The like reason holds in actuals. In murder are two things. 1 The moving of the body, and exercise of the weapons: this considered as an action is properly no sin: because every action comes from God, the first cause of all things and action. 2 The killing of a man, defacing the Image of God: this is the disorder and aberration of the action, whereby it is disposed to a wrong use or end; and thus it is $\langle \diamond \rangle$.

For the sum then, the nature of sin lies not in the action, but in the manner of doing the action. So that it holds, sin is nothing formally subsisting, (for then God should be the author of it, as being creator and ordainer of everything and action) but a want of that which ought to be and subsist, partly in the nature of man, and partly in the actions of nature. In peccato nihil positivum; as the School in thi• truly. But now to the question; If there be no positive thing in sin, why should there be a positive thing in punishment; If it be only the want of goodness; why is it not revenged only with the want of blessedness? So here should $\langle \diamond \rangle$ no place for damnation or the torments of hell. Certainly if it were no mo••, this was punishment enough to be deprived of the glory of God, Rom. 3.23. $\langle \diamond \rangle$ have sinned, and come short of the glory of God. But there is more, for upon the absence of goodness there necessarily follows the presence of evil. And the sinner doth not only omit what he should do, but also commit what he should not do. And as there can be no difference inter non bonum & malum: so at the same instant when a man loseth his goodness, he contracts badness. There is in sin four things: the fault whereby God is offended: the guilt whereby the sinner is bound to punishment: the Punishment it self, which is damnation: and the Blot or stain which defiles the person. Culpa, reatus, pana, macula. Now it is not the second and third, but the first and last which make man a sinner. Hereupon it follows, that after a man hath committed a sin, and the offense is done and gone Quoad actum twenty years; yet he does not therefore cease to be a sinner. Now why is he called a sinner in the time present, that did the sin in a time so far past? It is the Macula, or stain, as it were the fruit of the fault, that so denominates him. And this is an indisposition of the heart to all good, and an inclination to all evil. He that hath forefeited his goodness, is like the dropsy-patient; the more he sins, the more he is apt to sin, and the more desirous of sin. As he that turns his face from the sun, remains so till he turn again unto it. Once turning from GOD, we continue naughty, till we return to him by repentance. David was not only a sinner in the very act of his adultery: but when the act was done and past, he remained still an adulterer: because a proneness to sin had got place and strength in his heart, till he rid himself of all by unfeigned repentance. There being therefore in the reprobate an inconformitie to goodness, an unchangeable disposition to evil, and an uncleanseable pollution by evil; there must remain an interminable damnation for evil.

11 God's temporal plagues are images of his eternal judgments: but the temporall often last all the days of their life on earth, why not the other all the days of their death in hell? There be some sins that may be called Peccata peccantia, sinning sins: for they leave a perpetual venom and malignity behind them: and continue a pestilent act without any less termination than the world: as oppression, Sacrilege, &c. There be also public sins, that leave a bad example behind them: and such men do sin as long as they cause sin. Such was Jereboam's making Israel to sin: let himself be dead, yet so long as any worshipped his Calves, *Jeroboam*inned. This urged the Rich man to desire one from the dead, to warn his brethren: because he felt his own torment increase, so long as their sin increased, which they had derived from his cursed precedent. There be sins not so manifest, and exposed to the common eyes or sense; not hurting others in their posterity, nor corrupting them by lewd pattern: but do Intra orbem suum furere; as private lusts: yet these turn the soul into a Black-moore: and for mortal endeavors to wash them out, we may call it the labor in vain. The sins that damnifie our brethren, without restitution, are perpetual: and so is the wrath of God upon them. It shall remain in the midst of his house. This argues not only a dominer and reigning nature, which sticks not into corners, but takes possession in the middle and most honorable room: mediâ dominatur in aulâ. Like Princes that have chosen the middle places of kingdoms for their seats. According to the old similitude: the way to keep a stiff head hide from rising at the sides round about, is to set your feet on the midst. He that stands in the center, may the readilier see the whole circumference that environ him. But it further intimates the stubborn and indomitable quality of vengeance; 〈◇〉 doth remain; if once admitted, it will not suddenly remove; nor yet remaining till ever be quiet. Athanasius pronounced of Julian's hot persecution; Nubecula 〈◇〉, & cito transibit: it is a cloud, and will soon be blown over. The ground of that roicall persuasion and confidence, was the knowledge of God's temporary castitions and trials of his Church. But to the unbeliever, The wrath of God abideth on him. Which words like Ianus, have a double aspect. One backwards, as 〈◇〉 it were a wrath of great antiquity: it comes not now, it was before upon him, Aug. Another aspect forwards, as some expound it; noting the countenance of wrath it shall not depart from him. Upon him, as another noteth on the word upon; the intimation of advantage from an upper place: as though vengeance did stand continually preying upon him: as in the Poet, the ravenous bird upon Prometheus; or, that other upon Titius, in hell.

If any impenitent sinner complain; Why is my heaviness continual, my plague desperate, and cannot be healed: There is matter within himself to make him answer. Wherefore doth a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins? There is the inquisition of the proper cause. Let us search and try ourselves, and term gain to the Lord: there's the application of the proper remedy. No wonder if the curse continue with them, that continue in obstinatenesse: impenitence can have no hope of mercy, Rev. 16.9.11. Though they suffer that extreme burning for sin, yet they repent of their sin, They blaspheme God for their sores, yet repent not of their misdeeds. It is an argument of their vain ignorance, to wonder that the term of their heavy visitation is not yet expired: while their sins are unrepented, their lives unamended. Correct the passion of thy heart, and direct it to contrition for sin, or, expect no cessation of penalty. As when the sinner is dead, all the while any moisture remains, the worms will not forsake his carcase. So while he lives in his sin, the curse will wait close upon the cause: still a sinner, and still a sufferer. Israel could not stand before their enemies, till they had put away the execrable thing. Nor will the plague forsake oppressors and sacrilegious usurpers, till their treasures of wickedness be returned back to the right owners. Let the example of little Zacchaeus, the greatest example that ever was, for effectual and substantial restitution; teach them to break off their injustice with righteousness, which giveth every m•• his own: and their iniquity, with mercy to the poor. Lest they find this sin heavyer than a millstone, when the shallow rivers of temporary punishments, shall 〈◇〉 into the ocean sea of eternal torments. Where is no restitution, there is no remission: where is no remission of the guilt of sin, no decrease of the power of sin: and where the power of sin is not lessened, there the plague of sin will be augmented. Nec desinet illi paenae sensus, cui non desivit culpa assens.

12 Lastly, this equity and equality of damnation to sin, is illustrated and prov•• by the contrary. As Mark. 10.30. every good deed shall have a hundred-fold of comforts: so every bad deed a hundred fold of torments. God's mercy is forever to them that please him: so his wrath is forever upon them that offend him. The faithful find eternal mercy, therefore the unfaithful shall find eternal misery. He that endureth to the end, shall be saved: By what rule or proportion? Because God in his goodness doth presuppose, if that man had continued forever living, he would have continued forever well doing. Josiah feared God all the days of his life: therefore God hath Crowned his everlasting life in heavent. Be thou faithful unto 〈◇〉 death, and I will give thee the Crown of life. Fidelitie for a short service, hath a ••dem of never ending glory. Thus as God in his good mercy doth reward pers••rance in good with immortal life: so in his just judgment he doth punish imp••tence with eternal death. Thus is guilty man punished, and the just God cleared, i• this damnation of the wicked: though it be a total, final, (call it what you will) 〈◇〉 extreme, universal, eternal punishment. But to cease preaching of it, and 〈◇〉 praying against it: Spare us good Lord, spare the people whom thou hast redeemed. For 〈◇〉 death of thy eternal Son, let us not be the sons of eternal death. Be not 〈◇〉 with us; or, if we do provoke thee, let not thy anger be forever. Let not 〈◇〉 wrath burn like fire: but whensoever our sins have kindled it, LORD quenchi•• the blood of CHRIST. Let us not undergo the malignity of one sin, ev•• 〈◇〉 least, the shortest: for it deserves great and eternal torment. Our greatest g••nesse merits not the least glory: but our least wickedness deserves great pain. A 〈◇〉 leak will sink the vessel unstop'd, a great one will not do it, if well called. 〈◇〉 weakest instrument can pierce the flesh, and take away the life, unarm'd: 〈...〉 our of proof will beat off strong assaults, There is no wickedness so weak, •t it can destroy us without Christ: none so strong as to destroy us with Christ. As ••chel cried to Jacob, Give me children or else I die: so give us our Father, or else we perish. Lord, behold us not out of Christ, though robbed with all our righteousness: but behold us in Christ, though with all our sinfulness. Preserve us in him, always with him, that we may give all glory to him; together with thyself, O most holy Spirit.

8 Sleepeth not, lingereth not, slumbereth not.] Though it be not yet present, it is open: if not extant, yet instant. If it be not visible, yet it doth not linger: it doth not slumber: if it seem to slumber, it doth not sleep. To sleep more than to slumber, to slumber more than to wink, to wink more than to look on a thing though with disregard, not minding it. Neither sleep, nor slumber, nor connivence, nor neglect of anything, can be incident to God. Because he doth not execute present judgment, and visible destruction upon sinners, therefore blasphemy sumptuously inferreth; Nunquid curat Dominus? Ea cura quietos sollicitat? Will God trouble himself about such petty matters? So they imagined of their imaginary Jupiter; Non vacat exquis rebus adesse Iovem. What a narrow and finite apprehension this is of God! He that causeth and produceth every action, shall he not be present at every action? What can we do without him, that cannot move in him? He that takes notice of sparrows, and numbers the seeds which the very rough-man thrusts in the ground: can any action of man escape his knowledge, or slip from his contemplation? He may seem to wink at things, but never shuts his eyes. He doth not always manifest Scientiam reprehensivam, a reprehensive knowledge: but he always retains Scientiam apprehensivam, an apprehensive knowledge. Quia arguit, ergo non novit? Though David smote not Shimei cursing, yet he heard Shimei cursing. As Judges often determine to hear, but do not hear to determine: though God do not see to like, yet he likes to see. It is only the forbearance of correction, that makes sinners presume of his connivence. These things thou hast seen, and I held my peace; therefore thou thoughtest that I was altogether such a one as thyself. Impune ferens peccatum, Deum cogitat pacatum. God holds his hands, and he holds peace, but he does not hold his eyes: and he sees, whatsoever he says. All things are opened and open to his eyes: not because he will observe them, but because he cannot look side them. But. The time of your ignorance God winked at? He is said to connive, because he doth not correct. It is the promise of his mercy to pass over the sins of converts, as a father winks at the error of his little child. So we pray, Advert eyes, Turn away thine eyes from our sins, Psal. 51.9. Absconde faciem; Hide thy face my sins, and blot out all mine iniquities. That is, Omitte, remitte, demitte indignum. Still the Lord sees; I have done this evil in thy sight. He doth observe all in knowledge, he doth not reserve all to vengeance. He is said not to make it, because he doth not punish it. But if the Lord do wink at the aberrations of his servants, must he therefore slumber? Doth everyone shut his eyes, presently fall into a slumber? Or, if he seem to slumber, can he sleep? Sleep is to refresh the weary, can it self be weary? Behold, he that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep. He is so far from sleeping, that he doth not put his eyes together. This might be the opinion of her Jupiter: whom Homer relates making an earnest suit to Somnus, operare oculos Iovis. This is for a Baal; Cry aloud, for peradventure he sleepeth. A necessary slumber for a temporary god.

Sleep (such is the nature of it, that it) cannot occur to the nature of God: •o is an Eternity of rest, without any vicissitude or change. There is no mutati•• himself, nor mutuati•• or borrowing from another. Phabus ab externo radios 〈◇〉 mutuatur: much less God. Rom. 11.25. Who hath first given to him, and it shall •compensed? Who hath laid out anything for him, and it shall be paid him a•e? In sleep the exterior senses are bound up, and there follows a quiescence •n motion. As of the contrary; Vigilia est solutio & remissio sensuum, ut libere agant secundum suam naturam. Wakefulness is the remission and unbinding of the senses, that they may freely officiate the requirements of nature. But the Lord mo• all; and created things derive their first motion from him. Aristotle says, 〈◇〉 is a retirement of the heat to the inward parts: and a conflux of that natural ••lation which ariseth from out sustenance; Compresso primo sensorio, that is 〈◇〉 but God lives not by nourishment, therefore hath no need of sleep. Cale•• fines it to be a remission of the soul, according to nature, ab extremis ad prin••• binding up the mind, and discharging the sensitive instruments of their office 〈◇〉 heat which is taken up in those organs, being recalled to the heart and lungs. Oth•• thus summarily▪ Sleep is the rest of the animal virtues, together with 〈◇〉 tention of the natural faculties, stirred by a profitable humor in the brain: 〈◇〉 in the soul suspends her functions in the outward parts, to relieve the inward 〈◇〉 principal, for the health of the whole. But God is not capable of any weary 〈◇〉 therefore not liable to any sleep. Nothing needs sleep, but what is nourish• wearied? No spirit is subject to such a nutrition, therefore not desirable of 〈◇〉 a cessation. The sword of God may be said to sleep in the scabbard, while he 〈◇〉 bears to draw it, but he that wears it, sleepeth not.

9 This wakefull and prepared vengeance is threatened against the ungodly 〈◇〉 fitly. For nothing is more proper to the nature of sin, than to sleep in security. E• 5.14. Awake thou that sleepest; that is, Repent thou that sinnest. The godly 〈◇〉 their nappes, the wicked their sound sleeps. Continuance in sin may be compa• to Sleep in many resemblances.

1 For the cause of sleep: the natural heat drawing in his virtue, stirs 〈◇〉 vapor or exhalation, which ariseth from the meat, or from labor, sorrow, ••rinesse: this ascending, the coldness of the brain beats back again, and so co•• sleep. Thus the heat of concupiscence in the sinner first reigns within, and st•• to fortify it self in a complacency of evil: and when the conscience sends any ••tions or considerations to the intellect, like vapors to the brain, they are re••berated back again by the extreme cold and grossness, which possesseth the ra•nal part; and thus follows the sleep of sin. When the conscience cannot pr•• with the concupiscence, it is rocked asleep in sin, and all the organical forces 〈◇〉 called in to wait upon lust.

2 As Aristotle delivers the formal cause of sleep, to be an Antiperista••, 〈◇〉 being made by a reciprocal motion: the stomach sending up fumes to the head and the head sending them back to the heart: so by reason of this conflict 〈◇〉 obstruct all the organs of sense, locking up the exterior parts as they pass in 〈◇〉 journey. As a river that ebbs and flows, is driven by her own floods. The heat drives these vapors from the heart, the coldness from the brain, and 〈ϕ〉 must needs rest some where: hinc faciunt gravedinem oppilando, & inde Somnus 〈ϕ〉 spiritual sleep, the coldness of the brain is ignorance, the heat of the heart is 〈ϕ〉 cupiscence, the exhalations are lusts. while these with a sensitive pleasure are ba•• up and down, the whole man becomes fast a sleep: and sin reigns like an 〈ϕ〉 bed Lord in all faculties of body and mind, neither feeling nor suspecting the 〈ϕ〉

3 As there is a difference in corporal sleep, so in the spiritual slumber, 〈ϕ〉 dicitur 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, Suspirare: for the lungs do not fail their office in 〈ϕ〉 Now some bodies are so well composed, that they send forth a soft and gentle 〈ϕ〉 and respire an easy spirit. Others that labor of some error in the Arteriatrach•, 〈ϕ〉 lung-pipe, Strumosi, draw their breath with such difficulty and distance, as if 〈ϕ〉 were in danger of suffocation. That the wind being held in, breaks forth 〈ϕ〉 troublous noise: per multos anfractus ducitur: it comes out by many circuits and •dings, involued in the muscles: and the breath being gathered into those str•• with a forcible eluctation opens the artery, breaking out with an allision and 〈ϕ〉 › mure, as the pent air at an evaporation. Thus spiritually: some take a quiet 〈ϕ〉 an unmolested security in wickedness, without the least starting or jogging of 〈ϕ〉 •onscience. The Lord hath poured out upon them the spirit of deep sleep. The breath •ey draw is Tenuis aura, such as sometimes in summer riseth from the earth with 〈ϕ〉 insensible effumigation. Ducunt mollem anhelitum, they sin without trouble about 〈ϕ〉 as a great part of England now sleeps in Saclledge, and their hearts are never •sturbed for it. Other men sleep indeed, but unquietly; full of startings, stop•ngs, and reluctations: as if they were affrighted with some sudden noise, and •eir own conscious thoughts did like Faeries, nippe and pinch them, interrupting •eir desired repose. There is more hope of these than the former: for they that •e often disquieted, will at last be wakened. When a man begins to stir in his bed, •e conceive some likelihood that he will before long arise.

But they that can sleep when it thunders; like the Catadupans, inhabitants of •e cataracts, who hear not the roarings of Nile, ingenti cum sonitu se praecipitantis:•ummes and trumpets, and that loud rupture of the air with Ordinance, being •e soft music to their ears to play them asleep: what hope of their waking? •eclaration of sins, denuntiation of judgments, description of torments, no more •rre them, than a tale moves a man in a dream. Here is a supine stupidity, 〈ϕ〉 capable of excitation, as the sea-rocks are of motion, or the sea-billows of come•ession. As Mori mortem is to die an everlasting death, so this Dormire somnum (as •e Psalmist speaks) is to sleep an everlasting sleep. The Hebrews call sleep by •ree distinct and gradual terms. Therumah, which signifies a light sleep, Capitis •tatio, quasi prima rudimenta somni. Schemah is a more profound sleep. Tharde•h exceeds all, as it were a dead sleep. The Lord caused a deep sleep to fall upon ••am: that he neither had his sight offended, nor his sense oppressed, when his side •as opened, Gen. 15.12. Thardemah irruit: a deep sleep fell upon Abraham. So the •reekes distinguish them; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, which is a certain necessity of sleep: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, •hich is Torpor, a heaviness of sleep: and 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, an inexpugnable appetite of •eping. The Latins, if we consult Physicians, distinguish them into Somnum, •orem, & veternum: a natural sleep, a preternatural sleep, and a continual slum•r. The faithful cannot avoid some nappes their nature is so weak; some sins •ey admit: vulgar sinners have long and drousy slumbers: only the desperately ••cked are cast into a dead sleep; an exstaticall stupefying lethargy of sinfulness, •rd even to be a little roused. The first is a natural, the second a preternatural, •e last a contranatural sleep. A natural sleep is short, for six or eight hours, owed by Physicians, to the body; but allowed not by Divines, to the soul. The •eter natural is a drowsy slothfulness, an inordinate desire of sinning. Yet a lit• slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep. The last contranatural, is omnem •dum exundans, beyond all measure, a lethargical kind of death, which will never ••ke until it hath no more power to sleep. The natural sleep of the body is for <ϕ> reparation of natures forces, so much as may only be sufficient to absolve conco•on: but the last, as in sweating sickness, sleeps to death.

4 As by sleep Cerebrum fumis obnubilatur, nervi hebetantur, venae obstruuntur, •ist. The brain is clouded, the nerves dulled, the veins obstructed. So by cu•mary sinning, the understanding is darkened, the spirits blunted, the affections stu•ied, the receptacles of grace filled with the obstructions of lust. And there is not •lie an Indisposition to goodness, but a mad and unrestrained precipice to all man•r of mischief.

5 As nothing is more pleasing to man's nature than sleep; Quia perpetuus mo• naturae inferiori regugnat. It is most acceptable, illabens animantibus amicâ dull•ne. Somne quies rerum, placidissime Somne deorum, Ovid. Sleep is feigned to love •thea, because it is a common benefit to all living creatures. Quae a rerum veri•d fabulas, Graeca levitas & Poetica vanitas transtulit, Aret. So there is no•ng more pleasing to corrupt nature than pravitie: it is a delight to the wicked to <ϕ> evil: and sleep is not more welcome to the body, than that is to the lust of <ϕ> soul.

6 As sleep is justly called Frater mortis, the brother of death: so is sin S••• paenae, the sister of pain. There is little difference between him that sleeps and the dead, save only in time: both are void of sense, both like trunkes Vterque caecus, surdus, elinguis: both blind, deaf, dumb. Vterque sedat cras, finite labores; either of them appeaseth our cares, finisheth our labors: only death is the longer and more perfect privation. Stulte, quid est somnus gelide •is• mortis imago? Ovid. Consanguincus lethi sopor. Medium inter vivere & mori, An••. A certain middle thing betwixt life and death. Dulcis & alma quies, placidaeque simillima morti, Aeneid. Death is a long sleep, sleep a short death. So fin is the elder brother of death: if man had not sinned, he should not have died. Sin was been first, but The elder shall serve the younger: for death shall swallow the whole inheritance. Here, the sleep of rebellion precedes the sleep of damnation. They sleep but their destruction sleepeth not. The Apostle said of Lazarus; LORD, if <ϕ> sleepeth he shall do well: but if you sleep, you shall do ill. As it is with the improvident heir involved in Usurers bonds; while he sleepeth, his interest runs o•• Destruction takes the wicked napping, as Banah and Rechab slew Ishbosheth: or, as Somnus is said to slay Palinurus; soporatum in mare praecipitavit, Aeneid. 5. He is easily subdued, whom his own slothfulness hath left unarmed. As death corporal proceeds of a cold vapor possessing the brain, and oppressing the animal senses and spirits. So from the cold dregs of sin, freeing up the heart in wickedness, comes the sleep of destruction: as Gideon slew the secure and careless host. When Diogenes Synopensiis slept much in his sickness, and was dissuaded by his Physician, he was answered, Ne mireris, frater fratrem antevertit: one brother doth but prevent another. Sampson could not be bound, till he was first got a sleep. Temporal death is ••t the only punishment of his sinful security: but while the worms are sporting among the reprobates bones, the devils will make themselves merry with his torments.

7 Lastly, as sleep turns a man in non hominem, so doth sin in non bonum hominem. In sleep he neither hears like a man, nor speaks like a man, nor walks like a man. So in this spiritual lethargy, he neither thinks like a Christian, nor understand like a Christian, nor effects like a Christian; nor acts like a Christian, nor appears like a Christian. There be three seasons, wherein a wise man differs not from a fool: in his infancy, in sleep, and in silence. For in the two former all are fools; and in the latter we are all wise. In sleep the wisdom of the wise is not exercised, and the folly of the fool is not discovered. In the 115. Psalm. ver. 5. There are f•• impediments orderly specified, wherein the sinner differs not from the sleeper. The sinner hath. 1. Impeditum os ab actu confitendi; They have mouths, but they spe••e not. He cannot confess his sins, nor profess his faith, nor pour out his prayers. <◇> sin, as in sleep he hath a mouth, but not to speak. 2. Oculos impeditos ab actu vid••di: They have eyes, but they see not. They have closed their eyes, lest they should see. They differ something in this from an Idol: the Idol hath Oculum fictum, a counterfeit eye: these Oculum clausum, a shut eye. See, that cannot; these can and will not. Who is so blind as he that will not see? The object is exhibited, their sight is self-darkened. They have eyes, but not to see. 3. Aures impeditas ab offici••diendi. They have ears, but they hear not. The blind hath eyes, but not to see: the creeples feet, but not to go: the spiritual sleeper hath ears, but not to hear. The ear is a benefit of nature, but an ear to hear is the benefit of grace. 4. No• impeditos ab officio odorandi. They have noses, but they smell not. Futura non prase••unt. They give themselves to sleep, and never suspect the danger that may prevent their waking. Let them come into that blessed Garden of God, where i••merable flowers give delectable sents; they neither smell the odors, nor relli•• the fruits. They receive not the things of the spirit. 1 Cor. 2.14. the Naturian is not capable. They have noses, but not to smell. 5. Manus impeditas ab actu benef••endi. They have hands, but they handle not. As that organum organorum, the instrument of instruments, the busy and active hand, is bound in sleep. So sin ha••enervated the practice of goodness; and obsessed the sinner, not only with a dedig•ation of good works, but also with an indignation against good workers, and an •unsatisfied delight in misdeeds. God reacheth out mercy to him, as the charitable doth an alms to the maimed; alas, he is fast asleep, and puts not forth a hand •o receive it. They have hands, but not to work. 6. Pedes impeditos ab actu am•ulandi. They have feet, and walk not. Worse than that creeple, Act. 3. he thought •e could not go, would be carried to the Temple: but these have feet and will •ot go to the Temple; they have no desire to be brought into that vigilant and waking place. There the Preachers voice would be like a Trumpet, and they can•ot endure noise. They have feet, but not to walk.

Nothing is more dangerous than this drowsiness and security in sin: when men think they can pass as they please; thorough the womb to grace, •horow grace to wantonness, thorough wantonness to glory. With Gallio, •hey think Religion only a question of names and words, and therefore will not meddle with it Or, if they resolve to hear it, with Felix they can neither get convenient time, nor a convenient heart for it. They are not like the Bee that filleth her belly and thighs with honey from the flowers: but like the butterfly, which only dies and paints her wings in their colors, and so leaves them. They wimble like Dolphins, playing upon the waves of carnal delights; and are always erriest, when destruction is nearest. Wake therefore, and learn to die before thou die; that when thou must die, thou mayest have no more to do but to die. While the foolish virgins slept, they lost their entrance into that joyful bride-chamber for ever. Watch and pray: they that would keep themselves waking, do it best by talking. Hold thyself in a continual conference and discourse with God, so halt thou not fall asleep in sin. If thou dost fall into aslumber, yet let thy heart ache. But the reprobate doth sleep soundly, Somno sepultus. Therefore let us not sleep as others do, but let us watch and be sober, 1 Thes. 5.6. As Christ couples watching and prayer: so the Apostle couples watching and sobriety. Sobriety is either corporall, the moderation of appetites: or mental, the moderation of affections. Now as drunkenness enforceth sleep, so sobriety keepeth awake. But as Physicians rid their hands of incurable patients, and send them to the mineral or medicinal bathes, or leave them Deo & naturae, to God and nature. So I remit these to their maker to be wakened; either by the Evangelical trumpet here, or by the archangelical trumpet hereafter.

10 Observe that sin will not let Justice sleep, but sends it up continual challenges and defiance: provoking him to draw that sword, which he had rather should rust and rust in the scabbard, than be sheathed in the bowels, or shine with the galls of his own creatures. But in piety will not let him alone, nor give him over, till his righteousness breaks forth into vengeance. As the prayers of the Saints with kind of prevailing importunacie, offer holy and humble violence to his mercy: that he descends with the flag of truce, in the milk white ornaments of peace; pardoning sins, and healing sorrows. If importunate solicitations could move an unjust judge to equity, will they not much more move a merciful God to pity? Give him rest till he establish Jerusalem, Esa. 62.7. As the kingdom of heaven requires and rejoices this holy violence: so the king of heaven is content to have his hands as restrained from executing wrath, and his sword locked up by the prayers and tears of penitents. Let me alone, saith the Lord to Moses, that I may smite them: as if the groans of his heart did hold God's hand. So do the sins of the wicked hasten judgement, and cry to vengeance, Come away, why tarriest thou so long? Thus the blood of Abel murdered, cried for the blood of the murderer. Wickedness is not concealing, but aspiring: not base, shame-fac'd and fearful to advance it self; but rolling like Jordan above the banks. Their wickedness is come upon before me. It is not hid in the secrecy of private chambers, not kept close in the closet of their own breasts; but an ascending, aspiring, climbing wickedness: so impudent that it durst press into God's presence. Before me: it wakens makes my justice, and will not me sleep no longer. Gen. 18.20. Because the cry of Sodom and Gommorrah is great, and because their sin is very grievous.

Peccatum cum voce, sin with a voice is sin in action: Peccatum cum clamore, sin with a cry is sin in presumption, Greg. Their wickedness passed the bounds of all moderation: the fame of it was not only spread upon earth, and blown into the ears of men: but it pierceth the air, passeth the stars, climbs like the Sun in the morning, comes up amongst the Angels of God, and exposeth her filthiness ⟨◇⟩ the throne of his Majesty. This iniquity here is not less than a theomachie, a desperate war against heaven, a tower of sin like Babel, reaching to the clouds. A sin which the Scripture calls lifting up the hand, and lifting up the heel, against the Lord. Manum in contendendo, calcem in contemnendo: lifting up the hand in opposition, the heel in contempt.

There are two Ladders whereby men climb up into heaven, and become acquainted with God. The Ladder of Petition, and the Ladder of presumption. The Sa... ascend by the one to their consolation, the wicked by the other to their confusi.. Both press into the Presence-chamber, both have the like access, both have not the like success. The one thrusts in like a conspirator to practice treachery: the other ⟨◇⟩ a petitioner to implore mercy. Wickedness is saucy and peremptory, and will be notable though hit be notorious. It scorns to keep low water, or live in an •b: ⟨◇⟩ like pride, is only to that end proud, that some notice may be taken of it. Commonly it is gone from the memory of the offender, ere it come with so fierce an i.....tion before the punisher. And that wind of rebellion which causeth justice to wa.., rocks unrighteousness a sleep. But shall our sins come up before God, and ⟨◇⟩ first come before ourselves; who dwell in the region where they were borne, a.. were present when they were done? This is the greatest fault of our ignorance, to be ignorant of our faults. Must heaven know what is done on earth, before earth ⟨◇⟩ self be acquainted with it? As Tully said, he could hear at Antium what news ⟨◇⟩ at Rome, better than at Rome it self. Shall we turn our wickedness so far o.. ⟨◇⟩ our own remembrance, that we never think of it till we feel it in vengeance. These be willful mistakings, tricks to make ourselves blind. Alceus took a mo.. upon ones face for a grace, it was none by his leave. The more quietly and securely sinners sleep in the good opinion of themselves, the more certainly their dami..on sleepeth not.

I know that some sins are not so solicitous and urging upon the Justice of God as being the infirmities of his children, which he passeth by with connivence. Y.. he doth not strike at every provocation of the wicked. There is a time when Go• is said to take especial notice of sin. Because thy rage against me, and thy tu.... ⟨◇⟩ come up into mine ears, &c. But is there any sin when the eye of his knowledge is bl..ded? No, but this devotes to us the order of the actions of his knowledge. He ⟨◇⟩ sin in the Book of eternity, before sinners hearts do conceive it: he sees it in the.. breasts, before their hands do commit it. He sees the conception, birth, and comm...meant of it: but then he sees it to purpose, when being in the mature ripenes be ..ceth it. Ier. 2.24. They that seek her will not weary themselves; in her month thy shall find her. When the measure is full, God will find them out; as the wild ⟨◇⟩ in her month, great with foale. Thus he sees it with fiery eyes, bent to vengeance. There are some aspiring sins, pressing unto God's throne, like presumptuous m...taines darted at his own Majesty. They arise with a vocal ascension; the ⟨◇⟩ that mount them up so high, being the cry of their malignity in the ears of God As oppression, I am. 5.4. From this Job in his apology presented to his Judge, ...sed himself. If my land cry against me, Hab. 2.11. The stone shall cry out of the ⟨◇⟩ and the beam out of the timber shall answer it, Ier. 6.7. Violence and spoil is be... in her, before me continually is grief and wounds. So the Prophet tells Israel, ⟨◇⟩

God being displeased with Judah, and delivering them into their hands; they $\langle \diamond \rangle$ slain them in a rage that reacheth up even to heaven. This is an outrageous impudence, that is ambitious of enhauncing sin, despising the censures of men, and judgments of God. Though they have been plagued, they change not the color of one hair of their heads, one work of their lives: nor add a cubite to their statures, one inch to their Christian growths. This, this is the way to fall upon that irrevocable sentence, which God hath purposed, and he will not repent, nor turn back from it. As the wicked cannot sleep till they have offended: so they will not let God sleep till he be avenged.

11. Long ago. There is a preordination of plagues for reprobates, and the very moment of the execution appointed, Jude ver. 4. They were of old ordained to this condemnation. As if they were booked, enrolled, and billed to this confusion, and their particular names set down in a book. God keepeth a book of Registry and Records, in which he engrosseth the persons behaviors, and eternal state of all men. Besides the book of providence, wherein are all our members written: and the Book of Life, which contains the names of the faithful: there is also the book of Judgment, out of which the wicked shall be judged. To think these material books, were a gross conception: they are the counsel, providence, pleasure, knowledge and justice of God; which comprehend all things as if they were written in a book. Therefore, howsoever, in respect of men things be contingent and casual: yet in regard of God there is no chance, nor event by it; for he hath all things written before him with their causes. God's providence, and fortune, are direct contraries. Hereupon, the very actions of wicked men come not to pass without God's purpose. He not only foreseeeth, but wisely ordereth them, and even that which is done against the will of God, is not done without the will of God. He doth not command it, he doth suffer it. Albeit he esteem not evil to be good, yet he accounteth it good that evil should be.

This serves to qualify our impatientce, when we see some reject the means of salvation, despise the word, vilipend the Ministers of it, rob God of his Churches atrimonie, malign the professors of the truth, and give over themselves to a resolute contradiction of godliness: knowing that some are of old and long ago ordai'ed to this condemnation; and that Their judgment, (a destruction which is properly their own) is long agee prepared. And for ourselves, though we be confident in •ESUS CHRIST, through the testimony of the HOLY GHOST;^d Yet be •ot high minded, but fear. Our fidelity must take heed of security.

This point is not barren, but useful to us in a double application; the one of •aution, the other of consolation:

1 Seeing God doth not sleep in his Justice, let not us sleep in our injustice. When Alexander had a great battle to fight, he was found fast a sleep in his Tent. We have listes to enter with the Justice of God, ô let not the slumber of our souls, •nd the Judgment of our sins, come so near together. Jonah was gone down into •he sides of the ship, and he lay fast a sleep. The air is troubled, and sends out a tem•est, the waves roar, the winds blow, the sea is disturbed, the ship almost broken, the Mariners afraid, happy man that can pray fastest, the burden of the vessel unladen: •nd all this for the Prophets cause, yet the Prophet alone is ignorant of the matter, •e is fast a sleep. It could not be but he much forgot himself: though he had re•used to preach at Nineveh, yet here was an auditory and an occasion that required Sermon: and the conversion of one sinner is a blessed work: because he covers multitude of sins, which either the converter, or the converted hath committed. The •try uncircumcised Master wakens him; What meanest thou O sleeper? call upon thy •od. An infidel leads him that knew God, to his prayers. The Prophet is be•ome an auditor, and the auditor a Prophet: the sheep leads the Shepherd, the •atient heals the Physician, the Gentiles are devout in their superstition, the Israe••e cold in his religion. Truth is truth wheresoever we find it; Call upon thy God, •as good counsel from a heathen.

It is desperate for men over shoes, to run over shoulders; and having transgressed the bounds of obedience, to neglect any desire of revocation. Cyprian, who was at last a Martyr, wrote of himself, that being a persecutor, he was so far i• that he had no hope of getting out: therefore freely welcomed all vice, as resolving upon the worst that could befall him. Sleep departeth from the eyes of distressed and anguished spirits, Job 7.4. I am full of tossings too and froo, unto the dawning of the day. He that is troubled in his conscience for his iniquities, will resolve with De••• not to suffer his eyes to sleep, nor his eye-lids to be closed down with slumber: as he, till he found a resting place for God: so this, till he find rest for his own soul.

Yet how hath this sleep possessed even God's children! David being full ◊ into idleness; from idleness he passeth to concupiscence, concupiscence beg••• adultery, adultery hatcheth murder. And when all these ingredients put together, would have troubled the strongest and most retentive stomach; he takes a sleep with them of almost a year long. Thus are sinners like a man surcharged wi•• gluttonous meal, who is apt, his belly being full, to lay his bones at rest. Ch••• came to his Disciples and found them asleep, Mat. 26.40. He had often incul•• this admonition to them; Watch: yet now in the greatest extremity they are ◊ asleep. I know that sleep is necessary to human nature; all living creatures ◊ earth have their sleeps. Though the Poet Salse sed false of the nightingale; T••tare simul nocte dreque potes; that she sings night and day; if at least he mean, with••• intermission: as Pliny also too confidently avers, Lib. 10. cap. 75. The credi•• ◊ Aelian is engaged for as much, that she is expers somni, without all sleep: but by ◊ leave, it was an error. Sleep is that natural help, Quod corpora duris fessa •••sterijs mulcet, reparatque labori. Therefore the Pythagoreans used to play a lesson on the harp and sing to it, when they were going to bed: Quo citius & bl••• obdormirent. The Apostles therefore having supped late, drank wine, wea••, with travel, now being midnight sleeps principal season, not walking but fire•• still: all which were valde ◊ in non-Latin alphabet ›, suadentia somnum, as virgil speaks: provo•• and attractive of sleep. Why then doth CHRIST reprove them, for not w••ing with him one hour? Butis there not a time to wake, and a time to sleep? W•• in that very hour when the Lord of life was betrayed into the hands of death; ◊ King ready to die for his people, the creator as it were unmade to new male is creatures, the innocent suffering for the nocent, could they not even then forb•• sleeping? Not one hour, ecce brevitatem, it was short: watch, ecce facilitatem, it ◊ easy; not be exposed to scorn, not cast into prison, not beaten with scourges; ◊ dura verba, nec duriora verbera perpeti: but only spectare & expectare, to look ◊ wait, while their Master was finishing that great work of their own redem^{•••}. Not watch with me, Mee your Savior; one hour, I say not a whole night. He 14.37. He found them all sleeping, but directs his reprehension to Saint Peter: because he before fluctuans aestu had confidently promised this, yea far more th^{••} this, to lay down his life for Christ; Simon sleepest thou? There is a time to ⟨◇⟩ without reproof: Samuel slept, David slept, Psal. 4.

Christ himself slept, Mat. 8. Peter had often slept before without reprehensi^{••} yea, and afterwards too with consolation; Angels guarding and delivering ⟨◇⟩ Acts 12.7. But now to sleep; Couldst thou not watch with me one hour? ⟨◇⟩ not a thousand, nor a hundred, nor a score, but one: not month or week, or ⟨◇⟩ or whole night, but Hour: and this not to fight for me, but to watch with me: ⟨◇⟩ mon dormis? Simon, signifies obedience; Christ calls him not Peter, nor Ceph ⟨◇⟩ Simon: arguing his forgetfulness, not only of his Masters love, but of his ⟨◇⟩ name. But if it be such a sin to sleep, What is it to betray? Judas tradis? ⟨◇⟩ worse than, Simon dormis? It is better to sleep with Peter, than to betray ⟨◇⟩ Judas. Tolerabilior est somnolentus Simon, quàm turbulentus Sinon. He that sleep^{••} well thinks no harm; but there be some that Study mischief in their beds. Vt^{•••}lent homines surgunt de nocte Latrones. We may better suffer Desidiosum Mo^{••••}, quàm insidiosum Iesuitam; than the Popes wakefull Judas, Discipulum decipulum, ⟨◇⟩ •nare and gin to entrap poor souls, and send them to Rome, like Virgins taken up for the Turk, to suffer his Antichristian ravishments.

To conclude, seeing that sleep comes from cold and moist humors domi[•]ant in the brain: and wakefulness from hot and dry reigning in the head: let us •ast away the cold and crude humors of sin, and stir up the holy and almost extin[•]uished fire of zeal. That as CHRIST at his first coming found the shep[•]eards by night watching over their flocks: so at his second coming whether by •ay or night, he may find us all watching over our souls.

2 As this is terror to the ungodly, so comfort to the righteous. As Justice is •ver waking, so mercy is never a sleep. He that keeps Israel, never lets his providence fall into a slumber. Yea, even in the lethargy of our disobedience, when we remit of our uprightness, the hand of this ever watching God preserves us. Da[•]id was a sleep a long while together, but the Lord that chose David slept not for •is good. Upon this confidence he betaketh himself to rest. I laid me down and •lept, for the Lord sustained me. I will lay me down in peace, and sleep, for thou Lord ••lie makest me dwell in safety. As he sets his Angels to guard us in the natural sleep of our bodies: so his preventing grace doth keep us in the spiritual slumber of our consciences. But let not this make us presume upon his mercy too much: nor so •respasse upon God's unsleeping protection, as to take our ease in our corruption. Thou sayest, others have long slumbered, and yet been graciously awakened; as David, Paul, Zacchaeus; Why not I? I dispute not: God will measure out his gra[•]es at his own pleasure: and though they run over to some, they are plentiful enough to all. The same Lord is rich unto all that call upon him. My grace is sufficient for thee, was Paul's answer: and it may suffice all sutors.

God hath given us no small space, not a few mercies: if we will sleep with Pe[•]er, we put it to the hazard whether we shall ever rise with Peter. We cannot expect miraculous revocations; a Whale to reduce us as Jonah, or, the Sun to stand still for us as to Joshua, or, the sea to divide it self as to Israel, or, a voice heard from heaven as to Paul. Shall we say, The army of God is shortened, because we see not these wonders? Will we not be wakened without miracles? Must the course of nature be altered, the pillars of earth moved, the channels of the sea discovered; must we see signs in the Sun and Moon, and have some rise from the dead to warn us, or we will not be wakened. The Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom: but we preach CHRIST crucified. Woe unto us if the open face of the Gospel cannot rouse us without a sign; and the simplicity of CHRIST persuade us without further wisdom. They that sleep, sleep in the night. But the night is past, let us therefore give over slumbering. The less sleep we give sin in our souls, the sweeter sleep we shall find to our bodies. Thus shall we be sure, that while the wicked are overtaken with this unsleeping damnation, we shall be guarded and guided with a vigilant preservation. For CHRIST died for us, that whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him, 1 Thes. 5.10. To whom be praise forever.

VERSE 4. For if God spared not the Angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment.

The Apostle having dogmatically confuted, and prophetically condemned, the depravers of true doctrine: proceeds to an exemplary demonstration of the judgments of God upon sinners. For God cannot be sibi dissimilis, 〈ϕ〉 like to himself: nor doth tolerate that in one, which he doth punish in another: he hates iniquity wheresoever he finds it, and preserves one immutable tenor of his Justice. Whensoever sin goes before, punishment shall certainly follow after, no less seasonable repentance come between. Of this he makes A

- Relation, to Vers. 8.
- Illation, Vers. 9.

The Relation considers two generals; God's Justice in punishing offenders, Mercy in sparing his servants. This holds in three Histories. 1. Of the Angels, they that fell, are confounded; there's his Justice: they that stood are conserved, there's his mercy. 2. Of the old world; when the impenitent were swept away with a flood; there's his Justice: and righteous Noah with seven more for his sake, were saved in the Ark; there's his Mercy. 3. Of Sodom and her sister-cities when fire from heaven burnt up the reprobates; there's his Justice: and righteous Lot was delivered; there's his mercy.

Now upon all these premises comes the Illation, Ver. 9. The Lord knows he will deliver the godly out of temptation, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of Judgment 〈ϕ〉 be punished. If our faith be as much, his mercy is not less: if their rebellion be less, his Justice is as much. The first Judgment takes hold on altitude, the second on latitude, the third on plenitude. For height and excellency the Angels were glorious in heaven, yet some are cast into hell. For breadth and numerous amplitude, no less than a whole world were drowned. For fullness and opulency, the Sodomines lived in a second Paradise, yet were they burned. There is no wickedness so high none so broad, none so rich; but God's Justice can overthrow it. Let men be as high as Angels, as many as will make a world, as rich as the Sodomites; yet if they be unrepentant sinners, they shall perish.

We begin aloft first, and behold the Angels revolting from heaven, and for their fault turned out of heaven. Wherein we have considerable Their

- Excellencie; by nature Angels.
- Apostasy, they Sinned.
- Penaltie, were not spared.

In the former I will touch upon four points:

1 Their creation, which though it be not precisely specified by Moses, is most certainly included, Col. 1.16. By him were all things created that are in earth or in heaven. who were created in heaven but the Angels? Whether thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers. Which though some understand of Empires, orders, and governments: others, the Palaces of God's Majesty, and seats of immortality. But the opinion approved of the most, and the most approved opinion; conceives all there spoken of Angels. Creat Angelos spiritus, Psal. 104.4. He maketh his Angels spirits. Some Philosophers conceited that Angels had their beginning of the souls of men. Ex bonorum animabus nasci bonos daemones, ex malorum cacodaemones. That good souls became Angels, and bad souls devils. And some would father this opinion upon Plato but inconsiderately. Plato, indeed thought and taught a metempsychosis, a transmigration of souls into new bodies; more Pythagorico. Such was that Homeric fiction of Vlisses his companions turned into Hogs and Bears. But he said never, that of souls were made Angels.

But why was this omitted by Moses in his history of the creation. 1. Some think it was to avoid idolatry in the Israelites; Quibus si innolesceret Angelus; who if they had known Angels, would have fallen to their adoration. Chrys. Theodor. But they could not be ignorant of the Angels, which had so often appeared to their Fathers, and done them so many ministerial kindnesses. 2. Others thus; Moses treated of things that had their beginning with the material world, but Angels were created before the visible world. Basil. Damasc. But this is a false supposition; for before the world there was nothing created. 3. Others thus, their creation is comprehended under the names of Heaven and Light; Quia omnibus praesunt coelestibus; because they are set over all heavenly things. Aug. Bed. But this were to leave the literal sense, and to divert it unto Allegory, which may not be admitted in so plain a history. The best opinion is, that their creation is omitted for two reasons. 1. Because Moses applieth himself to the simple capacity of the people, and describeth the creating of visible and sensible things; leaving spiritual as above their understanding. Ieron. Ep. 139. ad Cyprian. 2. Lest men should think that God needed the help of Angels, in the production or disposition of the other creatures. As if the fabric of the world had been too great a business for himself alone to undertake: and therefore should be required the ministration of those Angelical powers.

That they were created is undeniably plain, now the next Quaere is, when. 1. Some think they were made long before the world. Origen. Tract. 35. in Matth. Damascene. lib. 2 cap. 3. de fide. But the Scripture testifies that the evil Angels apostated so soon as ever they were created. John. 8.44. Non mansit in veritate; He abode not in the truth. And our Text infers, that so soon as they sinned, they were cast into hell. But before heaven was made there was no hell. Nulla talis distinctio loci, priusquam constitutio mundi. Before the constitution of the world, there could be no distinction of place: for there was nothing but God. 2. Some from the first verse of Genesis would prove, that the Angels were created together with the world; the Heaven comprehending Angels, as the continent doth the content, the house doth the inhabitant. And whereas it is said, Darkness was on the face of the deep; Origen thinks this deep to be that place whither the devil and his Angels were cast. But the HOLY GHOST showing the eternity of Wisdom, saith: Prov. 8.23. I was from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was. When there was no depths, before the mountains were settled, before the hills was I brought forth. The Angels therefore were not before the earth and hills: for then this should be no good argument to prove the antiquity and eternity of Wisdom, which is the Son of God. 3. It is most probable, that they were created upon the fourth day, when the stars and other ornaments of heaven were made. Job, 38.7. When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy. They are said to rejoice and praise God together with the stars; therefore then it seems they took their being and beginning: for questionless immediately upon their creation they praised God. Besides, the heavens were that day perfected, the matter of them being only before prepared. It is fit that the house should be formed, before the inhabitane be produced. And this may satisfy any honest inquisitor, unless he rather desires to wrangle than to learn. But these be the Lord's own secrets, whereof we may be ignorant without danger. Howsoever, we have proved that the Angel is Condita substantia, a created substance: which confutes that Pythagorean dotage of philosophers with this Duo principia, two beginnings; one of good and another of evil. Together with that Manichean heresy among some Christians, of which rank were the Archoniticke and Caiane heretics, of whom we read •Epiphanius; that the Angels were from everlasting, & Deo coeterni, coeternal with God; whereas it is plain that they are creatures of his making.

2 Their nature; an incorporeal substance, subtle and powerful, created after the Image of God, resembling him as they are spiritual and immortal, but especially as they are holy and just, and full of divine created perfections. They are substances, though invisible, that have being, life, sense, understanding; and not me•e qualities. Pure qualities can neither sin nor be capable of punishment: but my Te• proves both these concurring in the reprobate Angels. But how can an incorpore•l substance be capable of punishment? yet who would ask that question, that find• a soul within himself troubled with passion; even when no offense or distemperance riseth from that gross and corporal part: yet is his soul vexed with the sense of sin, with sorrow, care, and perturbation of conscience. Though the Angels be spiritual, they are capable of punishment, for the torments of hell are spiritual. This confutes the Sadducees of our times, who think Angels to be nothing but motions, and melancholy passions: or, those that take evil spirits to be only evil qualities and dispositions inherent with us: or the Libertines, that think good or evil Angels to be nothing else but good or bad fortunes and successes. But quibus non cavent in peccat, hos sentient in supplicio. Whom they would not beware off in their sins, they shall feel in their torments. As they that live like Angels on earth, shall be made like Angels in heaven: so they that will not believe any devils, yet live like devils, must have their portion with Devils. And Stultus in culpa, will be made sapiens in poena.

3 Their office: Angel is not a name of nature, but of office. Greg. Ex eo quod est, Spiritus: ex eo quod agit, Angelus, Aug. They stand round about the Lord as attendants, and execute his imposed hests like ready servants. A quo dominatio, ab eo denominatio: this name is given them for some supereminent quality. He rode upon a Cherub, and did fly. They are said to have wings for their speed of obedience. Therefore Gregory says, that their titles are according to their messages. They that are sent on business of less moment, are called Angels: they that of greater importance, Archangels. The Angel sent to contract that sacred match between the King of heaven, and the Virgin Mary, was called Gabriel. Luk. 1. Gabriel signifies the power of God: a fit Ambassador for such a message; because the conception of Christ, and by it the redemption of the world; is called the Strength of God's $\langle \diamond \rangle$, Luk. 1.51. Gabriel was sent. 1. I do not think with Jerome, because Virgins are as Angels: as Isidor. Caelibatus, quasi coeli beatus. Indeed CHRIST says, that in heaven they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as Angels of God. But so all the faithful are Virgins to CHRIST, and shall be made as Angels by CHRIST. 2. Nor yet so much to show that he was a high Angel, because of his high and glorious message. 3 But indeed, as Aquinas in this truly, That our human nature might be repaired, after the same manner it was ruined. As a serpent was sent to Eve by the Devil, to work our woe: so an Angel was sent to Mary by God, to bring news of our bliss. Ad Evam Angelus malus accessit, ut per eam separaretur Deo: Ad Mariam Angelus bonus venit, ut in ea Deus uniretur $\langle \diamond \rangle$, Fulgent. By Eve man was separated from God, in Mary God was united to man. An evil Angel was the worker of the separation: a good Angel was the messenger of the conjunction. So great is their office, that CHRIST himself accepted the name, Mal. 3.1. Angelus faderi, the Angel of the Covenant, Popish writers do say that CHRIST was ever called an Angel in the Old Testament. For that, Gen. 48. 16. they would thence prove prayer to Angels. The Angel that redeemed me from evil, bless the lads: but no Angel redeemed us, but JESUS CHRIST. They say, if at any time the Son of God appeared, it was most likely to be in mount Sinai, at the giving of the Law; that being the most noble apparition of all. Yet saith Stephen, Act. 7.53. Ye received the Law by the disposition of Angels, and have not kept it. Angels then appeared, not CHRIST. But the Angels there were ministering spirits, giving their attendance, and executing their office. It is no good argument; because the Law was given by Angels, therefore not by CHRIST. S^t Paul clears Gal. 3.19. The Lord was ordained by Angels in the hands of a Mediator. The ministry was of Angels, the authority of Christ. They further object; if Christ had appeared at any time before his birth, it was most likely then when word was brought to Mary of the incarnation of God's Son: both for the dignity of the person to whom, and of the Ministry what. But the messenger was Gabriel, not Christ. Answ. 1. Mary was not yet so great a person, as to be preferred before all the Patriarchs, Christ's Progenitors. Her dignity came not by her own worthiness, but by God's special grace: \langle in non-Latin alphabet \rangle , Freely beloved. 2. There was greater reason that the same Angel Gabriel, the first revealer of the prophecy to Daniel concerning the Messiah; should also be the messenger of the accomplishment of it. 3. 〈◇〉 was not fit that the Son of God himself should be the messenger of his own coming into the world, Princes send their officers before, to give tidings of their coming: and should not that great Prince send his Angels before, that it might appear he was Lord of the Angels?

This is their office, wherein they are patterns to us. Bless the Lord ye Angels his, that excel in strength, that do his commandments, hearkening unto the voice of his word. For this we pray, that the will of God may be done by us on earth, as it is done by the Angels in heaven, Mat. 6.10, Our obedience cannot be like in perfection, must be like in proportion: for quality here, for equality hereafter. We must Paere sicut Angeli, if we desire Fulgere sicut Angeli. In life we are men, in hope angels: now quamdiu non habemus perfectionem Angeli; non habeamus praesumptionem diaboli, Aug. While we want the perfection of Angels, God bless us from the resurrection of Devils, Luk. 12.9. Let us confess Christ before men, that he may confess us before the Angels.

4 Their glory: when the Scripture attributes the highest praise to inferior creatures, the comparison is drawn from the glory of Angels. Jacob commending the countenance of his reconciled brother says, I have seen thy face, as the face of an Angel, Psal. 78.25. Man did eat Angels food; which was Manna: a most excellent meat, that if the Angels needed sustenance, they could wish no better, 1 Cor. 10.1. If I spake with the tongues of Angels; Si quae sint Angelorum linguae: if the angels had tongues, they must needs be admirable, Act. 6.15. They look steadfastly on Stephen, and saw his face as it had been the face of an Angel. David admiring mans creative glory, with incontained passion breaks forth; Thou hast made him tle lower than the Angels, Psal. 8.5. Man in his greatest glory is inferior to Another. Famous men in the Church are called Angels. So John. Bap. Mat. 11.10. I send my Angel before thy face. Esa, 33.7. The Angels of peace. Rev, 2.1. To the Angel of the Church. Judge, 2.1. The Preacher of repentance was called the Angel of the Lord, Hag. 1.13. The Prophet is called the Lord's Angel, Mal. 2.7. He is the Angel of the Lord of Hosts, Ezek. 28.14. The King of Tyrus is called an Anointed Cherub. The widow of Tekoah put the term upon David, 2. Sam. 14.17. My word is as an Angel of God, to discern good and bad. This was their happy estate, unto which Nihil defuit, nisi quod non immutabilis fuit; there was nothing wanting, but the unchangeableness of it. But optimi corruptio pessima: they were the best of all creatures, they are the worst of all creatures: being not content to remain Angels, they became devils.

The Angels that sinned. I come to their Apostasy; wherein consider four circumstances: the Persons, the Cause, the Manner, and the measure of their fall.

1 The Persons that fell; some of the Angels, not all, They that sinned. For they that sinned not, stand forever conserved by the mercy of God. Servat irruptos aeterna charitas. This is Saint Paul's distinction, 1 Tim. 5.21. I charge thee before God, and the Lord Jesus, and the elect Angels. Some are elected, and because electi presupposeth refusal, the rest are rejected. Upon this falling, they are not properly anymore Angels, but devils and spirits of darkness. Satan in Hebrew; 〈◇〉 enemy, or detractor. Solomon acknowledging his peace saith; Non est mihi woe

1 King. 5.4. I have not an adversary. The Princes of the Philistines put the 〈ϕ〉 upon David; Ne sit nobis Lessatan. 1 Sam. 29.4. Lest he be an adversary to us. S David to the sons of Zerviah; Cur estis mihi Lessatan? 2 Sam. 19.22. Why 〈ϕ〉 you adversaries unto me? So Christ to Peter. Matth. 16.23. Get thee benihd me S The Greeks have, Diabolus, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , insidiose capere. His whole exercise is to •ceive man, and to reduce him to his own ruin. Thus he is called The Fathe• lies, the Prince of darkness, &c. all corruptive, destructive names. Beelzebub, D••nus muscarum; the god of flies, or the master-fly. Flies though beaten off, will 〈ϕ〉 turn again; so doth Satan after many repulses. The red Dragon; died into 〈ϕ〉 sanguine hew with the blood of souls. The Tempter; Immundi spiritus, •ncle•• spirits, Matth. 10. Which discovers their folly that proverbially; Damon 〈ϕ〉 adeo niger, ut eum fingunt pictores: the devil is not so black as painters make 〈ϕ〉 . But by their leaves let us not trust him; but endeavor by a good life, and a holy 〈ϕ〉 to keep ourselves out of his clutches.

Proclus, and Psellus a Greek writer, makes many kinds of devils. Some 〈ϕ〉 spirits, Lelurion, conversant about the orbe of the Moon: some acriall, in that p•• of the air next us: others watery, earthy, subterrane, metalline spirits, which obsesse the covetous and metal men. And the Scripture in some sort alludes to 〈ϕ〉 which calls them Powers of the air, and wanderers through the earth, Revel. 12.11. Woe to the inhabitants of the earth, for the devil is come down among them: Do••• as if before he had been hovering in the air. They delight in filthy places, des•• and Sepulchers, and hogs. They drove one into the wilderness, Luk. 8.29. A••there amongst the tombs, Matth. 8.28. From whom being cast they entered 〈ϕ〉 swine, and drove them into the sea; as if they delighted in the waters, sporting 〈ϕ〉 the Leviathan in the Ocean. They make some deaf, other dumb, other furious, 〈ϕ〉 miserable whom they possess. They insinuate themselves into men by fly temptations, and therefore are called familiars. The best and blest Angels seem also 〈ϕ〉 have their distinctions, Col. 1.16. Thrones, dominions, principalities, powers. I do 〈ϕ〉 speak of those nine orders, as the bold Dyonisius, and the overventurous Pap••••. But they are so called, because God by them governs the Nations, moves the heavens, restrains devils, works miracles, conveys Prophecies, protects his serv•• and executes judgments upon his enemies. Yet so as these names may be give• 〈ϕ〉 all Angels, by occasion of diverse employments; or to some for a time and 〈ϕ〉 forever.

2 The cause, which was indeed wholly in themselves. For either God or 〈ϕ〉 must be the cause of their sin, or themselves; but neither man, nor God, there•• themselves. Not man, for had not the Angels fallen first, they could not have b••• the cause of his fall. That nature continuing good it self, would never have 〈ϕ〉 cured evil to others. But now their whole endeavor is spent upon hindering 〈ϕ〉 Ascent to that glory, from whence they are justly dejected. Man either was 〈ϕ〉 then made, when the Angels revolted: or if he were, how could he living o• 〈ϕ〉 ruin the spirits in heaven? The devil cannot challenge man, but man may 〈ϕ〉 the devil, for this perdition. He first tempered the cup for himself, and then •••ted man to drink: but he had better never have pledged him.

Not God, for then that were injustice, to condemn them for that which 〈◇〉 life caused. It were unrighteous to make them fall, and then punish them for falling. But he did foresee it and would not prevent it: and in not hindering it he seemed to cause it. Indeed, this holds in the creature: who is bound, foreseeing an evil, 〈◇〉 do his best in preventing it; and otherwise is made accessory to it. But God is 〈◇〉 absolute Lord of all, and not bound to any of his creatures, further than he beeneth himself. In CHRIST he hath bound himself to believers, and all his Prophesies are Yea and Amen; and he will keep his word. But shall any creature charge him for not doing that he never promised to do? But God did not confirm them in their created grace, therefore caused their fall. Answ. GOD did not propose their confirmation. Dedit potestatem velle, non voluntatem stare: he gave them power of willing, not will of standing. He is not tied to confer more grace upon his creature, than himself pleaseth. It was enough that he created them righteous, without addition of their confirming. Nec tenetur agere quicquid potest, nec actionem reddere quicquid facit. He is not bound to do whatsoever he can, nor to give account of whatsoever he doth.

In a word, the Angels had in themselves the proper cause and beginning of their own fall: which was a free and flexible will. They might will good, and persevere in good: and that will being mutable, they might also will evil, and so fall from God. The same kind of will was in innocent Adam. But good trees cannot bring forth bad fruit: therefore the Angels being good, could not sin of themselves, Answ. Those words must be construed Sensu composito, non disjuncto. Indeed a good tree remaining good, cannot produce evil fruit: but being changeable, it may. But God foresaw it, therefore the Angels could not escape it. Answ. Yet is not his prescience any cause of their fall, but only an antecedent. Because we sin, therefore was foreknown to God: not because it was foreknown to God, therefore we sinned. God saw Judas his treason in the glass of his Prescience before Judas had member composed, or the world was formed: yet was not this the cause why Judas betrayed CHRIST. Praescivit, non Praedestinavit, Aug. Vidit non coegit, scivit non coexit, praedixit non praescripsit, Lip. He foresaw it, he did neither compel it, nor command it, nor allow it. Prescience is to God, as memory is to us: memory presents 〈◇〉 us things past, prescience to God things to come. Our memory is not the cause why things past were done: nor is God's foreknowledge the cause why things to come shall be done. We remember some things we do, we do not all the things we remember. So God foresees all he does, he does not all he foresees. We remember 〈◇〉 orchard such a time planted, that now yields good fruits, by nature, not by violence, so God foresaw it. We remember a murder done, by will, not compulsion; 〈◇〉 God foresaw it. Neither our memory, nor God's prescience caused these: but they come to pass, natural by nature, voluntary by will, contingent by hap, necessary by necessity. But did God only foresee it? No, he also decreed it: why then how could they avoid it? Answ. He decreed to leave them to themselves, that they might fall if they will, and then to give them no grace of rising. But then as God hit me, as throw me: it is all one to thrust an old man down, as to take away 〈◇〉 staff that should keep him up. Nay, but the old man throws away his own staff and God doth not reach it him: they did forsake their own grace, and fall by their own folly. But here let us fall from disputation to admiration. Oh the depth the wisdom of God how; unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out.

3 The Manner, this was by sin, saith our Apostle. But what was this sin? ought it be nowhere precisely expressed in the Scripture: yet from two places it may be collected, that it was a rebellion against God arising from pride. Gen. 3.5. 〈◇〉 shall be as God's. He tempted man to this sin; an ambitious pride of bettering 〈◇〉 estate. Now it is probable, that he sought to overthrow him by the same way 〈◇〉 fell himself. Job 4.18. He charged his Angels with folly. The sin whereof Eli·as would accuse Job, was a justifying or lifting up himself before God. From this hypothesis or supposition he reasons: that if God so plagued pride in those Angelical natures, how will he dissemble it in man, who dwelleth in a house of clay, whose foundation is in the dust! Some say; God subjected the world to man, not to Angels. Psal. 8.6. What is man, that thou hast put all things under his feet! This the reprobate Angels could not endure, therefore rebelled and fell. Yet still the manner and matter of their revolt appears to be pride. An insinuating sin: it crept into Paradise, and robbed us of our birthright; we may curse it to this day. It crept into heaven, and robbed Angels of their glory, they may curse it forever. It is an impudent and stupid sin, more insensible than Solomon's drunkard. We have 〈◇〉 only thrust thorns, and needles, and goads, but even swords and spears into her heart to make her bleed; and yet she is proud to be spoken against.

I speak not of pride in the husk, but in the heart. Her Taylor, Fashion, is now held an honest man; I am sure a powerful one. How ridiculous soever a game appears, fashion can persuade men to it. O that our preaching were in fashion too; then we should hope to persuade you. We tell pride, that as the freshest rivers 〈◇〉 into the salt sea; so all the honors of the world shall end in baseness, all the pleasures of the world in bitterness, all the treasures of the world in emptiness, all the garments of the world in nakedness, all the delicacies of the world in rottenness. If Christ bids us cut off, and cast away the offending eye, hand, foot; all which are needful members tied with joints and nerves to the body: we may well spare these unnecessary dependants, no parts of our flesh, but flags of our shame, Luk. 18.12. The Pharisee prays not for supply of defects, nor acknowledgeth a defect of supplies: but tells his own fullness, and that great difference which his mistaken eyes saw between himself and the Publican; swelling with his own wind till he burst. They plow with the Oxen of their own imaginary righteousness; and contemplate the Farm which their own works have purchased; and Marry themselves to merit as to Wife: therefore in the pride of their peremptory stomachs they scorn the Lambes supper. Therefore Christ refuseth them in his call, but seeks sinners: not sinners in perverseness, but sinners in sense and conscience, in plea, action, confession, and condemnation of themselves. It is a needy and acknowledged emptiness, that lies at his gate, who is rich in mercy, like Lazarus with all his sores open, and begging the very crumbs of commiseration.

Humility is the hardest of all virtues: all vices are against it, yea all virtues 〈◇〉 against it: men are proud of their wisdom, proud of their beneficence. Yea, humility itself is against humility, and by a strange prodigious birth brings forth pride: as Diogenes, and that worse

Cisterian, is proud of his very patches. How common is it for men to disclaim vain glory vaine gloriously! making a remonstrance of that within them, whereof they study a renouncement from them. But the ⟨◇⟩ things are always most humble: the boughs of trees, the more laden with fruits the nearer they hang to the ground. The best gold goes down in the balance, ⟨◇⟩ lighter stays above. Good corn lies in the bottom of the heap, the chaff keeps aloft. The good Angel lifts him up that would worship him; See thou ⟨◇⟩ it not, for I am thy fellow servant. The bad Angel affects it, All these ⟨...⟩ give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me. Time boni Angeli adorari ⟨◇⟩ natura, quam vident in Christo sublimatam. Good Angels are fearful to be worshipped of that nature, which they see exalted in Christ: evil Angels desire to be worshipped of that nature, which they know is made after the Image of God. Satan is a King over all the children of pride. Pride turned Angels into devils, •militie shall turn men into Angels. Of all sins let us bless ourselves, yea the Lord keep us from pride; that humbling ourselves, we may be exalted by Its ⟨◇⟩ CHRIST.

4 The measure; they left their condition totally and wholly: they quite sooke God, his Image, heaven it self, and the office therein assigned them. I 44. He abode not in the truth: by this Truth is meant the Image of God; which ⟨◇⟩ says, consists in righteousness, and the holiness of truth: It is called Truth. 1. Because it never deceived any man, as unrighteousness doth; which promiseth pleasure, profit, content, and performs nothing but grief and shame. 2. There is no Hypocrisy in it, it makes no show of other than it is. This original condition the Angels voluntarily left, forsaking their place, as Saint Jude speaketh. God in the beginning appointed most excellent places for his several creatures; wherein they were to perform their required homage and service. Heaven was the proper place assigned to the Angels: to man in his innocence, Paradise: after his fall, the families of the Patriarchs: before and in Christ's time, the Temple; now the congregations of the faithful. These were our appointed places to set forth the praises of our Maker. This place the Angels left, forsaking the presence of God, and their own office wherein they should have been forever employed.

But do not the devils keep in the air? Some do by God's permission; but not as in their proper place and first habitation: for that was in the comfortable presence of God in heaven. But wheresoever they are, they carry a hell about them: if they be not in hell, yet hell is in them. As the militant Saints have in them the dwelling of heaven, though the kingdom of heaven do not yet contain them. And the blessed Angels protecting us on earth, are still in a heaven; by reason of the gracious and glorious presence of the infinite God that is with them. So the devils are never remote from their hell. John. 8.44. He was a murderer from the beginning: whereupon Maniche grounds; Diaboli malitia non habuit initium: the wickedness of the devil had no beginning: hence came that conceit of two beginnings. Ans. 1. He was not so from the beginning, as Christ who had no beginning. The latter confutes it; It is not said, In the beginning; but From the beginning. ⟨◇⟩ Neither was he made so in his own beginning of being: as some sottishly draw that literal Leviathan into an allegory. Psal. 104.26. There is that Leviathan whom thou hast made to play therein: as if God had made him a devil. 3. Nor yet so from the beginning; that in eodem instanti caepit esse a Deo, & malus esse a se; in the same instant, he took of God a being, and of himself an evil being. As it is said of our Sule, Cum infunditur, inficitur; the infusion and infection meet together. For he as first made good, and therefore must by intervention of space become bad. ⟨◇⟩ but Because there was a little time between his creation and Apostasy; He a•de not in the truth, Esa 14.12. How art thou fallen from heaven O Lucifer, Son of the •ormng! He was a son of the morning, not a son of the day; he stood not so long. ⟨◇⟩ Especially, Homicida ab initio, non suo, sed generis humani. He was a murderer •om the beginning, not of himself, but of mankind. And Saint Augustine's reason is •od; Non posset occidi, nisi factus fuisset homo: man could not be murdered before ⟨◇⟩ was made: the devil could not be a murderer before he had something to kill: •less we say, he was Homicida in se, his own murderer. But from the beginning ⟨◇⟩ murdered us; and we should never have recovered that wound, unless it had •ene by a second murder, the killing of Jesus Christ.

But if the Angels in their innocence and excellency fell wholly and utterly •om God: then much more may weak man rend himself from God by sin, yea •d also from Christ. Answ. The grace of Creation came far short of the grace Redemption. There was a power to stand or to fall; but that power was in it •fe. Here is a power to stand, none to fall; but this power is not of ourselves. ••e power stands in the promise of God, and gracious covenant in CHRIST. ⟨◇⟩ will make an everlasting covenant with them, and they shall not depart from me. We ⟨◇⟩ stand as never to fall. God doth not trust our salvation in our own hands: but We are dead, and our life is hid with Christ in God. If our portion were in our own ••d, we would quickly spend it, as that Prodigal did his patrimony. We are the ••lish children of Adam, and would part with our salvation for an Apple: and ⟨◇⟩ nature the brothers of profane Esau, that sold his Birth-right for a mess •pottage. But it is there laid up, where we can never spend it, nor the devil ••d it. There is a difference between the state of nature, and that which is above nature: betwixt a Created, and a Regenerated will: not that the latter is not also created; but because the former is in the will by creation, so is not the latter. 1. The created will had a freedom to will that is good; so hath this. 2. The created will had a power to will perseverance in goodness, so hath this. 3. The created will ⟨◇⟩ not the will it self, nor the act of perseverance; the regenerate will ha•• both these.

Here the doctrine of the Romish School errs, which teacheth; that in conversion the will hath a freedom to receive grace, or not to receive it: so man's po•er of faith and salvation should be in his own hand. But the unconverted will refuseth grace, yea rebelleth against it: and No man can come unto Christ, unless the Father draw him. It is not the will it self, but the conversion of the will, that mak•s it willing to goodness. The will of regenerate man is not as the will of crea•• Angels, able to stand or fall: but God hath conformed it, and confirmed it; ⟨◇⟩ will the own standing forever. True saving grace is never lost: without Christ ⟨◇⟩ could never get it, but when Christ hath given it him, he shall never lose it. Some School-men say, that God doth Creaturis dignitatem causalitatis communicare; ⟨◇⟩ Agustine seems to favor it: but man could as well make himself, as make h••self good. And if he were naturally worthy to have grace, where had he t•• grace to be naturally worthy? Sure, this makes him little beholding to God, th• gives him but the grace whereof he is worthy. As we say, God could do no m•• in mercy: so this says. God could do no less in Justice. But they for the l•• object, Revel.

3.11. Hold fast that which thou hast, that no man take thy Crown. N••Si alius potest accipere, tu potes perdere. If another may take it, then thou mayest lo•• it; and so fall from grace. Indeed common graces a man may have and lose: b•• not that grace which makes him accepted with God: he can as soon lose the being of Nature, as the being of this grace. The Romists, as they establish a free will ⟨◇⟩ get grace, so they confess a power to lose it: on both sides they run into gross errors. As August. contr. Tul. Vt statueret liberum arbitrium, negavit praescienti•• futurorum: itaque dum vult facere liberos, facit sacrilegos. But our seed is immor••• whereof we are made holy; therefore our holiness is immortal. Three things ⟨◇⟩ never be lost; the love of God in Christ, the Grace of the Spirit, and our Inhe•itance in heaven. We are in Christ; and unless Christ could be severed from Go• we cannot be severed from Christ. Indeed for Pagans, that are not in Christo, sed ⟨◇⟩ caligine; not in Christ, but in darkness. And for Jews, that are Non in Christo sed in lege; not in Christ, but in the Law. And for Libertines, that are non in Christ•, sed in carne; not in Christ, but in the flesh; these all may perish: but they that ⟨◇⟩ united to Christ, never. There is a Cordial union of friend to friend; a Ca•• union, of man to wife: a Vitall union, of soul to body: these may be parcel• but a Spirttuall union never. As Christ is in God, and God in Christ; so are ⟨◇⟩ in him. Prove it, John. 17.22. That they may be one, as we are one: I in them, and th•• in me. But, Revel. 2.4. Thou hast left thy first love. Not fallen from love, but f•• such a degree of love. Besides, there is a counterfeit charity, but true can never ⟨◇⟩ lost. To conclude, we stand not of ourselves, but by the Grace of Christ, ⟨◇⟩ mercy of God. We may look on our right hand for comfort, on our left ⟨◇⟩ supportance; and find refuge to fail us, no man caring for our soul. But if we ⟨◇⟩ unto the Lord; Thou art our refuge; thy mercies fail us not. The sea hath no ••cie, the fire hath no mercy, the earth hath no mercy, beasts have no mercy, ⟨◇⟩ hath no mercy, the world hath no mercy, the Devil least of all hath mercy; ⟨◇⟩ The Lord hath mercy. David by experience gives it, the children of God ⟨◇⟩ it; and let no man at the peril of his own soul deny it.

Thus we have considered the Apostasy and fall of these Angels; a point so••• what intricate and thorny; and would have been much more confused, had I f••lowed all the perplexfull, barren, and unnecessary questions of the School; w•• have in them more subtlety than doctrine, more doctrine than use: full of Sch•lasticall yea Sophisticall doubts. One charged a Painter to draw him Equum volt •antem, a trotting or pransing horse: and he (mistaking the word) drew him Equum volutantem, a wallowing or a tumbling horse, with his heels upward. Being brought •ome, and the bespoker blaming his error; I would have had him pransing, and you have made him tumbling: if that be all, quoth the Painter, it is but turning the Picture the wrong side uppermost, and you have your desire. Thus in their quod•ibeticall discourses they can but turn the lineaments, and the matter is as they would have it. I speak not this to disgrace all their learning; but their fruitless, •eedlesse disputes and arguments; who finds themselves a tongue, where the Scrip•ure allows them none. It speaks of the Angels sins generally, without particula•ising what it was: hereupon say the Papists; it is an insufficient Judge to decide all doubts and controversies. But because it doth not answer punctually the curiosity •f their idle brains, can it not therefore decide all profitable questions, and satisfy •ll just doubts? Yes, it determines all things that concern our consciences, and everlasting salvation. In unnecessary things it is silent, as if it forbade us to enquire. For use to ourselves.

1. Seeing the fault for which God confounded the Angels, was the leaving of their being and first estate: this should humble us to bewail the same sin in our selves; for we have also left our beginning. The Image of God was imprinted on us, so well as on them: they defaced it in themselves. When the devil telleth a lie, he telleth it of his own. A se habet, nullo alio suggerente: no man suggested it to him. To this they also tempted us, so that we lost our beginning: a thing that few of us truly lament; our Original corruption. Sometimes men sorrow for their actuals, but seldom for their originals: as if that should not trouble them, which they brought into the world along with them; or as if that were their parents fault, none of their own. But the royal Prophet confessed; I was conceived and borne in sin. antillus puer, tantus peccator, August. When a little child, I was a great sinner. I dispute not problems; whether this comes to us by imitation, which was the Peagian heresy; for certainly it comes to us by propagation. The good man may generate, cannot regenerate, the children of his flesh. August. Nor is it material to be decided, whether the soul be infected by the contagion of the body, as good motion is by a fusty vessel: for the soul is infected so soon as ever it is infused. Or whether in the very moment of infusion God did forsake it. Only let our care be, as in a common fire; not to question or examine how it came, till first we have cut it out. A Passenger brought to a pit, by the cries of one fallen into it, fell wondering how he came there: to whom the poor man replies; forbear marvelling how I fell in, and do thy best to help me out. Miserable Parents, have brought forth a miserable child into this miserable world; Nec citius tulerunt natum, quam ammatum, Bern. We are sure we have it, O that half so sure we were all delivered from it! How should this humble us, to look unto the rock whence we were hewn, and the pit whence we were digged. Te maculatum non nega, sed lava. Deny not thy pollution, but cleanse it. All our tears are few enough to wash out our Original stains: what are left for our actual and continual aspersions? Men rail on for one, challenge the stars, blame bad company, curse the devil, for their sins: will they miss the proper cause, their original apostasy, and corrupt beginning. diabolus te non faceret perversum, nisi tua te origo fecisset pervertibilem. Satan could not make men profane rebellers, unless their unclean nature had first made them sinners. From this impure beginning, comes all iniquity: for naturally the seeds of all vices are within us: and if corruption precede, eruption will easily follow. And God will smite him that sins, though (as Saul said) it be my son Jonathan. Indeed he smote his own son JESUS for our sake, not for Angels. Christ's side was lanced, to let out our impostume. It is his grace alone that reduceth us to our beginning; yea to a far better beginning, such an one, as shall never have ending.

2. Seeing the Angels sinned; Let him that thinks he standeth take heed lest he fall. No height of man can match the Angels; if justice spared not sin in them, how will it forbear us? no strength of man can match the Angels: if they were not able to resist the judgment, what can we do? Heaven is a great way further from hell, than is Earth: if sin could tumble down Angels, how much more easily the sons of men, from so low and conterminant a place? Adam was excellent in Paradise, yet short of the Angels in heaven; their beauty and glory, was far greater: but if God punished sin in the Angels, how will he dissemble it in men? The Jews thought it a high privilege to say, we are the sons of Abraham; yet Abraham was but a man. We go further, and say, We are the sons of God: but how? by creation only: so were the lost Angels: we must have a better title than so, or else sin will confound us with the Angels. God forbore not sin in those his selected and eldest sons on earth, the Israelites; not in his celestial children, the Angels: yea he is so far from sparing it in any, that to save some he spared not his own Son. What then is our Title? In Christ: indeed there it is only good; a blessedness which was not granted to the lost Angels. But then let us walk worthy of this Christ, that we may confirm an argument of comfort to our own souls.

But cast them down into hell, and delivered, &c.] I come to their penalty; the first branch whereof is their Dejection; He cast them down into hell. Herein is Locus a quo implied, the place from which they were cast, Heaven: and Locus ad qu expressed, the place into which they were cast, Hell; there is Poena damni in the form•r, Poena sensus in the latter. The one privative, a loss of all blessedness: the other positive, an infliction of all cursedness.

Cast them down.] This implies some place from whence they were cast, and that is heaven: the place of their creation, the seat of blessedness, the palace of glory, the eternal mansion of joy. Lift up your hearts a while, to contemplate that place from whence they fell, and whither we desire to rise.

First take it generally; there is a heaven wheresoever God's gracious presence shineth. Yea as the Father said; I had rather be out of heaven with Christ, than a heaven without Christ. So we had better be on earth with God's favor, than in heaven without it. For as the Sun makes a day, so the countenance of God makes a heaven, wheresoever it shineth. Absence of light causeth darkness; if God turn away his face, nothing remains but wretchedness. In thy presence is the fullness 〈ϕ〉 joy. If the fullness of joy be in his presence, then the fullness of sorrow is in his absence. Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled. For the light of God's countenance David often praises; nothing was so terrible as the hiding of his face from him: especially if it be true what the French Nightingale sung; That hell is everywhere, where God is not. If the Kings favorite be forever decourted, and banished the royal presence; this more afflicts him than those that never saw it. Ignoti null• amor, an unknown good is uncared for: many men little affect heaven, because they never apprehended the sweetness of it. But that which is retained with great sensible joy, cannot be lost without great sensible grief. Had these wicked Angels ne•• known the delectableness of God's presence; their own expulsion out of heave• had been less plague unto them. Now they may name all their thoughts, though•• children of their minds; Idiabods; Forthe glory is departed from them. It w•• Absalom's extremist discontent to be kept from the Court; therefore in passion •e sollici•es Joab; Let me see the Kings face.

This is their eternal misery, never to see God's pleased countenance. Darknes•e is the more intolerable to them, because they were created children of light: Their dismal plaints, extorted by flames, more irksome, because they once bore a part in the music of heaven, the melody of Angels. As Elisha said to that great Lord; Thou shalt see it with thine eyes, but thou shalt not eat thereof. There is good cheer, and they for whom it was provided, must never taste it. Luk. 14.24. None of th•• that were bidden, shall taste of my supper. Thus miserable are they that live out of the orbe of mercy, drawing their unhappy breath without repentance; upon whom fury and indignation waits, the length and breadth whereof cannot be measured; with a diligent train of unsufferable plagues, that will never cease to punish, so long as there is a will of God to bid them. It is a question whether the rich man's own positive and sensible torments more afflicted him, or the sight of his once despised Lazarus in the bosom of rest. Psal. 112.10, The wicked shall see it, and be grieved; he shall gnash with his teeth, and melt away. What so vexeth him? The horn of the righteous exalted with honor. Luk. 13.28. There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when you shall see the Saints in the kingdom of God, and yourselves thrust out: when you shall See it.

We may also consider this point at home; and think how it afflicted our first Parents to see that Paradise, out of which they were cast and kept with a flaming sword. Every earth was not fit for Adam, but a Garden, a Paradise. Excellent pleasures have been found in Gardens planted by men: yet is the least leaf, twig, or pile of grass past all men's making. When he that creates the matter, undertakes the form, this must needs be transcendently perfect. No tree, herb, flower, was here wanting; that might be for ornament or use, for sight, sent, or taste. The bounty of God extended it self further than to necessity; even to delight and recreation. Yet for all this, if God's gracious presence had not shone there, no abundance could have made him blessed. Yet behold, God offered him all fruits there, and restrained but one; Satan offered him but one, and forbore all the rest: and man chose rather to be at Satan's finding, than at God's. Then did the Justice of God turn him out of his gates with a curse: why should he feed a rebel at his own boord? That God from whose face he fled with fear in the Garden, now makes him fly with shame out of the Garden. The Angels that should have kept him, now keep Paradise against him. It was easy to have kept happiness, easier to lose it, but most hard to recover it. That very cause which drove man out of Paradise, hath also withdrawn Paradise from the world. Now as when man was toiling in the cursed and weedy earth, what a vexation must arise in his conscience, by the sight of his discharged Paradise! So terrible is it to the devils toiling in the air, to contemplate that heaven from which they are banished forever.

Secondly more specially, and in a stricter acception; heaven is the local receptacle of infinite and interminate joy. In thy presence is the fullness of joy, and at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore. For quality they are Pleasures: for quantity, Fullness: for Dignity, at God's right hand: for Eternity, For evermore. There shall be no fear to have the eyes dimmed with tears, or the soul surprised by death, or the heart dejected with sorrow, or the ears disturbed with cries, or the senses distracted with pain. There are possessions without impeachments, kingdoms without cares, length of years with strength of delights, greatness of state without conscience of corruption, love of all without jealousy of any. There men shall be good and not persecuted, happy and not envied, rich and not robbed, kings and not flattered. The Inhabitants are at the same instant ravished with seeing, satisfied with enjoying, and secured for retaining. There is the glory of God whose rightness they behold: safety from foes, whose ruin they rejoice at. (The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance, he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked.) The company of Saints, whose comforts they partipate: the receipt of a kingdom, and with it the full possession of the Fee-simple of life, the tenure hereof is inviolable. Joy so tempered, that it shall satisfy and not glut: persons so blim'd, that what makes them everlastingly happy, shall never make them weary. here is a river, and the Spring, the Throne of God; the water Crystal, the banks with the trees of life. There is a City, the gates of it Pearl, the streets of it Gold, the Walls of it precious stones, the Temple in it God, the light of it the ambe, the vessels to it Kings of the earth. The cheare of joy, the exercise sinng, the City praise, the subject God, the Choir Angels.

Such is heaven, which alas man's parvities is as far from comprehending, as his arms be from compassing. Heaven shall receive us, we cannot conceive heaven. Quid mors est rogatas? si scirem, mortuus essem. Do you ask what death is, fact one: if I could show you, I were first dead. Do you ask what heaven is, when I meet you there I will tell you. Could this ear hear it, or this tongue utter it, or this heart conceive it; it must needs follow, that they were translated already thither. Howsoever what hath been spoken may remonstrate this; how great an infelicity the privation of heaven is. One spake truly; that the tears of hell are not sufficient to bewail the loss of heaven. This fully appears by that judicatory sentence, Mat. 25.41. When the wicked shall haply reply; though we may not ascend with thee unto glory, yet let us have thy presence on earth: let us be anywhere so thou, O Christ, be with us. No, Depart from me; from peace, from joy, from comfort, from my presence, from my salvation, from my glory, forever. O wretchedness, that disdains all comparison; if there were no hell, this were enough to wring out everlasting tears.

Seeing both these Angels and also men, were cast out of their original and proper residence by sin; and God hath made ours recoverable by Christ, which is not gr•ted to them; let us studiously seek an entrance into that eternal rest, we transgress daily, yet the Lord shutteth not heaven against us: we find more mercy than our forefather. His strength was worthy of severity, our weakness finds pity. We lost a Paradise that cannot be found, but we may find a Paradise that cannot be lost. Here is no fiery sword to keep us out; we care not to seek where that Paradise is which we lost; but this we both care to seek and hope to find. As man is the Image of God, so was that Paradise the Image of heaven: both the Images are defaced, both the first patterns are eternal. The first Adam was in the first Paradise, and stayed not: the second Adam is in the second Paradise, and there abides. Th• day shalt thou be with me in Paradise; was his promise to the penitent Malefactor. Paul was there and heard, and saw what he could not utter. By how much the third heaven exceeds the richest earth; by so much doth that Paradise which Christ ha• found, exceed that which we have lost. Now if we desire to have our salvation perfected above, we must begin it below. The gate of heaven is opened on earth. The place where God manifested his favor, Jacob called Bethel, heaven gate. This the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven. As a man calls that the Court, where he was first brought to the presence of the King. Now this is done by a holy expectance, hearty affection, patient forbearance, prepared assurance, constant perseverance, and ravished exultance.

By a holy expectation, and a life expressive of such hope. He that looks to wear a Crown, habituates himself to royal affections. Our conversation is to heaven, whence we look, &c. They that hope to carry earth up to heaven, strive first <◇> bring heaven down to earth.

By a hearty affection: if we cannot get in, yet let us get so near as we can; a• keep about the gates of the City: where the faithful are congregated, there heaven it self is opened. Cain thought it not the least part of his curse, to be cast <◇> from the face of God; from Adams family, where the face of God was seen in his holy worship.

By a patient forbearance and withdrawing our affections from terrene things. This World is but viaticum; and no man seeks for his inheritance in his Inn.

By a prepared assurance armed for all encounters. No Prisoner fears the Gaoler, look he never so stern; who knows that his commission, is but to bring him to the Court safe. To the Saints, Mors non poena, sed remedium, death is not a penalty, but a remedy. Nec tam mors naturae, quàm malitiae, quàm miseriae. It is <◇> so much a death of nature, as of corruption and calamity.

By a constant perseverance, resolving upon the worst disasters not to turn back. Knowing, that if the Gospel takes away riches, it will require them: if it take away life, it will restore it better. Patience shall never be a loser by it.

Lastly, by a ravished exultance and joy, that ariseth from the meditation of heaven. Which so transports us, that for the time we think ourselves there: and conceive of former sorrows, as men awaked from a busy dream. What shall be •he possession of that place, whereof the contemplation is so sweet! Dulce est in lit•ore stantem Dicere naufragium. It is a pleasure to sit on the quiet and secure shore, •nd discourse of escaped wrackes. This is our true Paradise; the lower remains Quoad locum, non quoad Paradisum; as it is a place, not as it is a Paradise. On earth we lost it, in heaven we shall find it. There faith shall be turned into beatifical visi•on; expectation lost in possession. There we shall know the truth of things we argue here below. How sweet now would the knowledge of some secrets be unto •s; yet are many not worth the knowing: there those deep and glorious mysteries •hall be made plain, and we shall discourse them one to another. Discourse them I •ay; for now the souls in heaven have the language of intelligence; and when their •odyes are joined they shall have the language of utterance. And because Dura•io est affectus entium; the perfection of all shall be a blest everlastingness. I will give you the kingdom of heaven, saith CHRIST; this disgraceth all earthly kingdoms. I will give you an incorruptible Crown, this disgraceth all corruptible crowns. I will give you eternal joy, this disgraceth all momentary pleasures. Eter•all life is the gift of God through Jesus Christ.

Down into hell.] This is Locus ad quem, the next part of their punishment; a •ensible pain; the position of intolerable and interminable plagues. In handling whereof consider three circumstances. Quod sit, quid sit, ubi sit. That it is, what it is, where it is.

First, that there is a Hell, is plain: for they could not be cast into a place that had no being. Yea, it is manifest that it had a being before sin; and God made it before he had present and actual use of it. It was constituted ere the Angels fell, that it might receive them when they fell. Hell was made before sin was hatched, as Heaven was formed and fitted before the Inhabitant was produced. For we must observe that God created Angels and men after his own Image; Ration sapientes, vita innocents, dominio potentes; wise, innocent, powerful. But withal he gave •hem naturam flexibilem, a mutable condition; which had power of standing, and possibility of falling. Power to stand was of God the creator: possibility to fall was of themselves the creatures. Immutabiliter esse bonum Dei solius est proprium, Aug. To be unchangeably good is only proper to God. Augustine in his confessions gives the reason. Because God created man ex nihilo, of nothing: he left in him possibility to return in nihilum, unto nothing. Si Deus dedisset illis naturam im•utabilem, deos potius quàm creaturas condidisset, Basil. If God had given them an immutable nature, he had created them gods, not creatures. Now out of the whole •oste of Angels he kept some from falling: and when all mankind was fallen, he •edeemed some by his own Son. And as he shows mercy upon some in their sal•ation, so it is fit he should show justice upon others in their just damnation. Now because there must be distinct places for the exercise of both these, which are in God equally infinite: by an irrevocable decree from the foundation of the world, a glorious habitation was ordained for the one, and a terrible dungeon for the other. These shall go into everlasting punishment, and the righteous into life eternal. So cer•aine are both these places, that they were of old prepared. Matth. 25.34. Inherite •he kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of this world, Ver. 41. Depart •e cursed into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his Angels. Esa. 30.33. To•het is ordained of old: non paranda, nec parari certa, sed parata. Of old, for the Lord that beholds all things, past, present, future, Vno actu, uno ictu, at once; simul & se••el: as he foresaw the different estates of men and Angels, so he provided for them different places. That there is a hell.

First, the Scripture plentifully testifies, Mark. 9.43, &c. I know that many have wrangled against it: Danaus reckons up 19 several sorts of heretics that deny of it. But say what they will, the wicked would give much to be sure that the Scripture was not true. Credere nolunt, & non credere nequeunt: they will not believe; and yet they cannot choose but believe; their case is fearful.

The Heathen affirmed a hell and place of torment for bad men: they retained so much light, as to know of that future darkness. Some of them have been terrified with their own inventions, and distracted with horror of the torments described by their own pens. As Pygmalion doted on his own picture, so were they a••zed with their own comments. How much more, if they had known these intolerable horrors, as they are, not as they were described. Par nulla fig•• Gehennae.

Besides, many wicked men are punished, and many as wicked escape. Now Iustum est, ut qui pariter peccarint, easdem paenas luerent. It is fit that partners in •inne should not be severed in torment. God doth not punish all here, that he may allow some space of repentance: nor doth he forbear all here, lest the world should deny his providence. Parcit ut puniat, punit ut parcat. He spares that he may punish, and he punisheth that he may spare. He afflicteth some in the suburbs of hell, that they might never come into the city it self. But Quos malos fert incruciatos, refert ••ciandos. The evil he now suffers uncorrected, he refers to be condemned. Sin knows the doom, it must smart, either here or hereafter.

Further, in all things natural and supernatural, there is an opposition and contrariety. There is good, there is evil: light and darkness: sorrow and joy. Now as there be two ways, so there must be two ends. Heaven, whither the good Angels shall carry the Saints; Hell, whither the black and grisly spirits shall hurry the reprobates.

Again, all men naturally do honor the good, and punish the evil. The Barbarians themselves have laws of castigation, and executions to cut off irregul• persons. Shall the Lord in his Justice come short of creatures, of barbarous creatures? The Law of Nations requires that malefactors, if they scape with life, •e banished forever. And shall not God banish rebels on earth, from his glorious presence in heaven, into that fearful Island of hell? If this were not, Stabit cum Nerone Paulus, Nero was as good a man as Paul. Esau should still have his birthright i• bliss, and Cain be a Saint as well as Abel. As believers say, If in this life •lie we have hope in CHRIST, we are of all men most miserable. So might the wicked say, If in this life only we have sense of sorrow, we are of all men mo•t happy.

Lastly, every Prince is allowed this concurrence to his State: that as he hath a pleasant palace for himself and his servants, so he hath a Gaole and prison for rebels and traitors. That heaven is glorious where the high King keeps his magnificent Court; the outer side of whose pavements we delight to behold, and admire for beauty. So is that hell a dismal dungeon where he puts his enemies, the outsid• whereof men are not suffered to see, lest they should die with horror of the sight. They that have seen the flames, and heard the roarings of Aetna, now Monte G••lo, the flashings of Vesuvius, the thunderings and burning flakes evaporating from marine rocks; have not yet seen the very glimmerings of hell. A painted fire is a better shadow of these, than these are of hell torments.

I am sure I speak to no Atheists; I could say; doest thou think there is no hell? Quis daemonum hoc asseret? What devil will so affirm? they know it, and feel it. Why art thou come to torment us before our time? Shall not men tremble <◇> deny, what the devils confess? Chryst. What, eat, drink, and play, Epicu•e; Post mortem nulla voluptas? no pleasure after death? None indeed to reprobates; there is nothing but hell for them, and they shall find small pleasure in that. C•••, sed fuge: credendo fugies. Believe it, and avoid it: by believing thou shalt avoid it. We are sure God hath made it; let us be but half so sure that we shall escape it. A good king having ordained positive Laws by which he would govern; caused In••uments of execution to be made; gibbets, wheels, racks, and such torturous •gines. And being made, he commanded them to be brought forth, and exposed <◇> open view: and upon everyone was written, Ne noceat, ne noceat: that it may do <◇> harm: observe it, that you may never feel it. So God admonisheth us of hell, •e noceat: he doth as it were show it us, that it may never hurt us. Ostendisti populo •avia, Thou hast shown thy people grievous things: but shown them, not inflicted ••em. Minatur verbis, ne utatur verberibus. By threatening us, he would save the la••ur of plaguing us.

But shall God menace this, and we not be moved? Is the hand-writing on the ••ll, and Belshazzar still merry? God loves him that Trembles at his word. Do <◇> not tremble at it? how should we then escape it? We read of a bird of Paradise, <◇> called for her excellent beauty: that being taken in the fowlers net, she doth groan ••d weep night and day, and so languish away. We were once such Birds of Pa••dise, but by sin taken in Satan's nets; captived in wickedness, and condemnable ⟨◇⟩ this hell of wretchedness: O how should we groan and weep till we get out of •is Prison where we are, into the liberty where we would be! Plangite plangenda: ⟨◇⟩ must have sorrow; either hereby attrition legal, and contrition evangelical, or •reafter by destruction infernal. Estote tam proni ad lamenta, quàm fuistis ad pecca• Isidor. Let us be as ready for repentance, as ever we have been for disobedience. ⟨◇⟩ is too common for men to put far away from them the evil day. Procul volunt •e, quod juxta est. They injuriously oppress others, and luxuriously riot themselves; •hy? My Master deferres his coming. Quasi tarde venturus sit, qui nunquam ⟨◇⟩ nusquam ab est. As if it would be long before he be present, that is, in no place at ⟨◇⟩ time absent. Whereas the shadow doth not more diligently wait upon the bo••, than doth confusion upon sin. Therefore so live today, as if thou wert not to •e tomorrow. Seeing for the wicked is prepared a hell, let us seek for heaven. •orrupt nature prepared us all for the former, let holy grace prepare us for the o•er. It is said of heaven, Imparatis clauditur janua, paratis patet: it is open to the pre••red, shut to the unprepared. The contrary is true of hell: to the prepared it is •ut, to the unprepared it is open. God shown the Prophets many fearful visions, ⟨◇⟩ their terror, and astonishment; but withal he encouraged them, that the judge•ents should light upon others, and he would deliver their souls. Ezekiel's quaking •d trembling was but for a sign: Israel's should be in sense and anguish of heart. If •e tremble at these torments while the wicked laugh and are joviall; we shall put ⟨◇⟩ our fear to them, laugh and be merry when they tremble. As Daniel said ⟨◇⟩ that Monarch; Let not the dream trouble thee; the dream shall be to them that hate ••e, and the interpretation to thine enemies. Let our hearts repent and believe, and ⟨◇⟩ not this terror trouble us: the terror be to the devils that hate God, and to the probates his enemies. His enemies will I cloth with shame, but upon himself shall his ••own flourish. For tormenting cares, we shall have flourishing Crowns, in the ••mmunion of Saints and Angels.

The next question is, what is Hell? It is that place where the Justice of God •nfineth reprobates to their eternal punishments. The plagues thereof are inter••ll, external, eternal. Internal, that consists in a plenary desertion of God; so ••t they are continual sinners, and continual sufferers. Two contrarities being re••nciled in them; extreme presumption, and extreme desperation. Presumption, ⟨◇⟩ with bitter malice and cursed heart they shall perpetually blaspheme, and sin a••inst the Holy Ghost, Revel. 16.11. Desperation, without all hope of mercy, or ••itting one thought of peace. The one being a sin against God's Justice, the •her against his mercy. External, that consists. 1. In a deprivation of all come•rt; that they do feel, being not more bitter, than the thought of that they can••t feel, Chrys. A privative cause hath a positive effect. Tully banished from Ita•• though it were into Greece, wept bitterly when he remembered Rome. Exiled Demosthenes, though he found much kindness amongst his enemies, yet wo•ld weep when he looked towards Athens. The captive Jews hung up their harp•, when they remembered Zion. Another laments that Roma relinquenda est: but wh•• he considers, Scithia est quo mittitur; bursts out into tears it is the most unhappy part of unhappiness, to remember former welfare. Dura satis miseris mem••• prisca bonorum. 2. In a sensible passion of universal anguish: as a brand in a gr••• fire, no part free from burning. Eternal, not determinable with time, for th••Time shall be no more: everlastingness shall make absolute their sorrows: ⟨◇⟩ arm may be weary of smiting, not God's: it is fabled of Jupiter, that if he shou•• spend his artillery as fast as men sin, Exiguo tempore inermis erit, his quiver woe••• soon be empty: Vulcan could not make his thunderbolts fast enough. But the d••ned are punished in hell, so long as there is a God in heaven.

The Scripture speaks sometimes of hell figuratively; Gehinnon, Tophet. Which was a valley by the Fullers field near to Acelandama, on the South-side of Si•• Call'd Gehinnon, because it was in the tenure of a man named Hinmom, Aret. Th•• the Jews, after the example of the Ammonites, sacrificed their children to Mol•• in the fire. An Idol which they worshipped for Mercury, Montan. Others ⟨◇⟩ for Saturn, whom the Poets fain a devourer of his own children. It was of br•• or coper, with hands stretched out to receive the Infants that were to be sacrifice• His Priests were called Chemmarim, because they were reesed or smoked with t•• Incense offered to the Idol. It was defaced and defiled by good King Josiah, 2 King 23.10. and made a draught or common sewre for the filth of Jerusalem. The Ca•deans cast the slain Jews into that place, Ier. 7.32. Therefore it was called Os Inf•ni, the mouth of hell, that could not be filled. For further description of hell, the Scripture useth three principal terms; the Worm, outer darkness, and unquench•• fire, Mark. 9.44.

First the Worm: this we must not understand a corporal Worm, which were terrible enough; for a man to live always dying, and die always living, with ⟨◇⟩ adder sucking and stinging his vital parts. Eccl. 7.17. The vengeance of the ungodly fire and worms. But we must know that after the worlds dissolution, there shall remain no mixed body, but only man's: no generation nor corruption in the revi•• bodies. Therefore the worm cannot be corporal, but spiritual: the stinging o• a vexed conscience. As from the corruption of dead bodies breed the worm• that devour them: so from the corruption of sin riseth this worm of conscience. Some understand it to be the memory of past sins; which shall so long gnaw their souls and bodies; like a vulture pr•ying on their hearts, as the remembrance of committed iniquities continues, which will be forever. Ob. But if the memory be so p••fected, then the recognition of former joys shall be some ease. An old soldier after his exhausted strength, glories in the battles he hath won. Ans. Nay this ⟨◇⟩ rather be matter of sorrow: to remember the evils they have done, bitter: the goo• they once had, more bitter: the good they might have had, most bitter.

Object. The torments of hell are far beyond any pains of this world: ⟨◇⟩ a man here, lying under some lethargical and stupefying pressure, cannot confide•• those intelligible conclusions, as he might being abstracted from his pain. A••• The soul is here joined to a corruptible body, straightened by the Organ: so th•• while the body is afflicted, the consideration of the soul is hindered. But there ⟨◇⟩ soul cannot be inclined by an incorruptible body: but while the flesh suffers according to the capableness thereof, the soul is prostrated to all the pains she can ••dure. Object. But the damned are the subjects of time, and time causeth forg••lness. Answ. Time is the cause of forgetting, but only by accident:

because motion which is the measure of time, is the cause of transmutation. But after this $\langle \diamond \rangle$ there shall be no more motion of the heavens: and even the soul that is now separated, is not changed from her disposition by the motion of heaven. Luk. 16.2 Son, remember: this is a gnawing worm: which if it hath made some acknowledge (Infernum in mundo, qualiter sentient in inferno?) a hell on earth, what shall it be to their sense in hell itself? Oculos quos culpa claudit, paena aperiet, Greg. The eyes which sin hath shut damnation shall open.

Therefore it is good counsel now; Praevideate mala futura, ne recordemini bona operata. Foresee with fear the evil that shall be hereafter, lest you remember with grief the good that hath been heretofore. O that our foresight were but half so sharp as our sense? let us now consider seriously the pains that shall be, that we never be put to remember grievously the joys that have been.

Secondly, Outer darkness, Matth. 22.13. Cast him into outer darkness. But it $\langle \diamond \rangle$ objected, that the sight of their misery shall aggravate the sense of their misery; but nothing can be seen without the light, therefore not outer darkness. Again, the damned shall have a visionary power after the resumption of their bodies; which were superfluous if they should see nothing with it. They shall see, and without sight they cannot see; how then, outer darkness? Answ. Though that fire do not shine to any comfort; tamen ut magis torqueat, ad aliquid lucet; yet for their extreme vexation, it shall give some light. So much, as to show their fellows their torments, and them the torments of their fellows, Greg. Basil in Psal. 29.7. The voice of the Lord divideth the flames of fire. God's power shall separate the clarity of fire from the adustive virtue. Vt claritas sit pax in gaudium, & ustivum damnatis in tormentum. That the clearness may delight the righteous, and the sharpness afflict the wicked. So Theodor in Psal. 96. The shining property shall be extracted to comfort the Saints: the burning property remain to punish reprobates. But then vision itself is some delight: as Aristot. in his Metaphys. Sensus oculorum maximus iligibilis: the sight of the eyes is pleasant; and to the same purpose Solomon. Yet by accident it becomes afflictive; as when men are forced to see what they would not see. In hell there shall be nothing diaphanous, perspicuous, clear; but a shady, foggy vision; like a distracted dream. Erit quod videant, non erit quod videre cupiant They shall see that, which to avoid they would wish themselves to have no eyes.

Let us therefore decline the works of darkness, as we desire to escape the place of darkness. Interior darkness must be doomed to inferior darkness. What is more just, than that they who refused the light when they might have it, should be denied the light when they desire it? many now nuzzle themselves in ignorance, as if they meant to make their own beds in hell. Voluntary blindness shall be confined to necessary blindness: and they that might now see if they would open their eyes, shall there open their eyes and not see. Let us be children of the light, not of the night: and as we wish to see that glory without us which may make $\langle \diamond \rangle$ happy: so let us strive to see that grace within us which may make us holy. Now the Father of lights defend us from that Prince and place of darkness.

Lastly, fire, unquenchable fire. It hath been much controverted, whether in hell be true substantial fire, or only fire allegorical. Calvin is only for the allegory; and $\langle \diamond \rangle$ some others, that give this reason. There is mention of Wood and of Worm, as well as of fire: now these are allegorical, why not therefore the fire? But in Scripture things spoken together are not always taken in the same nature and manner. Christ is called the Rock of our salvation: the rock is allegorical, is our salvation therefore allegorical? Ye shall eat and drink at my table in my kingdom. Eating and drinking is allegorical, is therefore the kingdom allegorical too? It is then 〈◇〉 be concluded that there is true and substantial fire in hell. The Lord will come with fire, to render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire. Si in igne damnabit reprobos, quare non in igne cruciabit damnatos? If he will judge them in fire, why not condemn them to fire.

Grant it substantial fire, then it is questioned whether it be material, corporal, or spiritual. It is not material, that is fire nourished with fuel. •na, and other places of the earth burn continually without fuel: much more that infernal fire. He that makes the damned live without food, is able to maintain this fire without wood. Not spiritual; indeed Gregory calls it an Incorporeal fire; but it passeth the nature of fire to be spiritual: and he that makes it spiritual only, goes about to make it no fire at all.

It is therefore a corporal fire: but being so granted, there arise some exception, Object. If it be corporal, how can it diversely torment diverse reprobates? There is but one fire in hell, but it doth not cruciate all after one manner and measure: as everyone hath been more wicked, he shall be more wretched. Answ. But we must know that this fire is the instrument of the Divine Justice: now no instrument works only by its own virtue, and after its own measure; but is regulated by the virtue of the principal Mover. The fire in a furnace is increased or qualified according to the will of the kindler: so is this disposed by the power of God; the breath of the Lord like a river of brimstone doth kindle it. We know that one and the same fire do otherwise burn iron, than wood or straw. Secundum durtiem vel durationem •riae: according to the nature of the incensed matter is the rage of the fire. All 〈◇〉 on earth are under one Sun, yet do not all equally feel the burning of that Sun: one is hotter than another, a Moore than a Britain. So in that one fire there is 〈◇〉 one manner of burning: Quod hic diversitas corporum, illic agit diversitas peccatorum, Greg. dial. lib. 4. That which is here wrought by the diversity of bodies is there by the diversity of sins. There may be a several degree of pain to everyone, and yet one common fire to all.

Object. But if it be corporal fire, it must be maintained with fuel, or else will go out: but there is no fuel in hell. Yes, the bodies and souls of the damned shall be Loco carbonum & lignorum, instead of fuel. And because these materials are everlasting, therefore it follows that hell fire can never go out, for it is against the nature of fire to cease, so long as it hath combustible matter to feed it. Object. But if it be corporeal, then is it of the same species with our fire, now man knows the nature of this, but not of that. Answ. Fire is found in two places and manners: vel in materia propria, vel in materia aliena. Either in the proper matter, as it is in the own orb or sphere. Or in another matter, whether earthly as appears in a coal, or airy as appears in the flame. But howsoever or wheresoever it is found, it is always in respect of the nature in specie, fire. In the bodies which are the matter of the fire there may be difference; as lignum igneum & ferrum ignitum, burning wood and burning iron differ. Still is it fire, though diverse from ours in certain proprieties which are unknown to us, and may we never know them.

Gregory upon Job, 20.26. Ignis non succensus, a fire not blown shall consume ⟨◇⟩ objects, that if it be corporal fire, it needs fomentation. Nec valet esse nisi succensus, nec subsistere nisi refotus. Indeed our elementary fire must be kindled and nourished, because it is brought artificially and by violence upon the combustible subject. ⟨◇⟩ hell fire needs not, because it either subsists in the proper matter, or in an alien subject, not by violence, but by nature a principio intrinseco. Flatus Domini sicut totius sulfuris succendet eum: the wrath of God makes it unquenchable; so that it neither needs feeding, nor wants raging. But our fire is corruptible, that eternal, how ⟨◇⟩ of the same nature? So are the reprobate bodies now corruptible, then made incorruptible: therefore the same nature of fire shall become everlasting, to torment ⟨◇⟩ same bodies become everlasting. Object. But the nature of our fire is to shine ⟨◇⟩ give light, which hell-fire doth not. The light of the wicked shall be put out, and the spark of his fire shall not shine. Answ. The fire doth not shine in the proper manner of existing: non lucet in propria sphaera, saith the Philosopher; it shines not in the own orb. Besides, gross and foggy smokes, and thick darkness may keep ⟨◇⟩ from giving luster; yet still it remains fire. The conclusion then is for corporal fire in hell. 1 Because there is not only the punishment of loss, which answers ⟨◇⟩ the aversion from the Creator: but also the punishment of sense, which answers ⟨◇⟩ conversion to the creature. Now what plague so terrible to the sense as fire? 2. ⟨◇⟩ Wherewithall a man sinneth, by the same shall he be punished: but by sensible things they sinned, therefore by sensible things punished.

But lastly, if it be corporal fire, then it torments only the body: for how can ⟨◇⟩ corporal fire work upon a spiritual substance? Bernard thus; there is a double punishment, the Worm, and Fire. Altero roditur conscientia, altero concremantur corpora. The one gnaws the conscience, the other burns the carcase. The one exterius comburens, the other interius corrodens. And Meditat. cap. 4. In carne cruciantur per ignem, in spiritu per conscientiae vermem. So Isidor. de sum. Bon. lib. 1. cap. 31. The pain of the damned is double: Mentem urit tristitia, corpus flamma. So Bed. ⟨◇⟩ Marc. 9. lib. 3. Ignis erit paena extrinsecus saeviens, vermis dolor interius accusans. These seem to restrain that fire from working on the soul. But it is plain, Mat. 25.1. The fire is prepared for the devil and his angels. But the devil hath nobody, yet he burns in fire. Luk. 16.24. The rich man cried out, and shall cry forever, I am tormented in this flame. Yet was his body in the grave, and his soul only in hell; either is that altogether a Parable: for then Tacuisse nomen, & solum posuisse exemplum. Christ would only have propounded the example, and concealed the name. He that denieth spirits to be tormented in fire, let him take heed lest his own spirit feel it. But how this corporeal fire shall torment devils and damned spirits, who knows? I do not doubt but that rich man was in the burning of pains, and the poor man in the refreshing of joys: but how to apprehend that flame of hell, that bosom of Abraham, that tongue of the rich, and finger of the poor; la sitis tormenti, illa stilla refrigerij; that thirst of torment, that drop of comfort, shall hardly be found of them that seek humbly, never of them that seek curiously. Melius est dubitare de occultis, quam litigare de incertis. It is more safe to doubt of what is secret, than to dispute of that is uncertain. It is miserable by seeking what GOD hath secreted, to lose what GOD hath granted. Seeing then this is substantial and corporeal fire; wherein differs it from our elementary fire? In five respects.

1. In regard of heat. The fire in a lantschip which is Ignis pictus, or their purgatory fire, which is Ignis fictus: is a better representation of elemental fire, than elementall is of eternal fire. That furnace whose heat was septupled, and the flames lick'd up them for whom it was not meant; was raging, but not a glowing spark to hell.

2. In regard of light: our fire comforts in shining, that is oppressed with horrible darkness. Cremationem habet, lumen non habet, Greg. Vim comburendi retinet, illuminandi amisit, Basil. It retains the property of burning, it hath lost the property of shining. Therefore it is called Hades sine sole domus: Jude calls it the black darkness. The darkness of Egypt was strange and fearful, so thick that it was palpable: yet a mere holy day to hell. The Poets described it by Cimerian darkness; an Italian territory betwixt Baiae and Cumae, where the Cimerij inhabit: environed with hills, and over-shadowed with supercilious and hanging promontories, that the Sun never comes at it.

3. Elementall fire burns the body only, eternal also the soul. The passion of the body, is but the body of passion; the soul of pain is the pain of the soul: that if a consumable body be not able to endure burning flames for a day; how will an unwastable soul endure them forever.

4. Elementall fire as it burns, so it consumes: hell fire rageth more and waxes less. The reprobate shall have the punishment vri, to be burned; not the happiness exuri, to be wasted. Poenae gehennales puniunt, non finiunt corpora, Pro. Iron will hold burning long, yet consumeth: in hell there is neither cessation of fire burning nor of matter burned. It is a fire of consummation, not of consumption: Ignis absolvens non disolvens. If it were terminable, it might be tolerable: being endless, it must be easeless.

5. Our elemental fire may be quenched, that never goes out. This is maintained with wood, and put out with water: that as it hath nothing to maintain it, so nothing to extinguish it. There shall be weeping of eyes, no mitigation of flames: if there be any tears, they shall rather be like oil to feed and nourish it, than like water to put it out.

These are three principal expressions of hell; but is there nothing of pain besides these? It seems they suffer nothing else but fire, because CHRIST doomes them only unto fire, Matth. 25.41. Indeed fire is the principal, but there are other accessories and concomitances. Basil. In the last purgation of the world there shall be a separation made in the elements.

Whatsoever is pure, refined, sublim'd, and perfect, shall remain above for the solace of the blessed. Whatsoever is feculent, sordid, and ignoble, shall be cast down to the punishment of the damned. That as every creature becomes matter of the Saints joy; so every creature be made matter of the reprobates sorrow. God shall make the creature his weapon for the revenge of his enemies: and the world shall fight with him against the unwise. As they have departed from that one God, one good, by sin in many material things which are variae & vanae: so that one Justice shall by many material things confound them. But Job 24.19. Ad calorem nivium transibit ab aquis nivium; as the vulgar Latin reads. Now the variety and vicissitude of passions yields some refreshing. As when a man passeth from extreme cold to extreme heat, there is a mediate intermission: but there is no refreshing admitted in hell. Answ. The damned may pass from extremity of cold to extremity of heat, without any re••shing: because the passure shall not be by any transmutation of the body from the former natural disposition, nor by reduction to any equality of temper: but •••ble pains working upon the sensible parts; secundum esse spiritual, non secundum esse material, in organum, Aquin. The sum is this; the torments of hell are comprise• under fire, because that is most violent, vehement, and sharply afflictive. Wa•• doth only kill: fire doth vex also, and torment: yea which is worse, this fire doth never kill. It shall be so extreme, that the damned shall prize a cup of cold wa•• above ten thousand worlds. The use.

As we desire to escape the fire of hell, let us avoid the fire of sin. Praeparant ignita peccata in ignita supplicia. There be certain fiery sins, which shall find fiery punishments; as Nadab both offered and suffered strange fire. There is Ignis nec ardeus 〈◇〉 lucens: Ignis & ardens & lucens: ignis lucens non ardens: ignis ardens non lucens. The•• fire is properly neither burning nor shining, but only stinks and makes a smothe• sin, a spiritual fire. There is fire both burning and shining; that we call elemen•• fire. There is fire burning and not burning, as the Sun. There is fire burning and not shining, and that's the fire of hell. Thus Paul calls lust a burning: It is better 〈◇〉 marry than to burn. Who then would burn in lust, that fears to burn in hell?

〈◇〉 read of a man, that when he was tempted to lust, would lay his hand on bur•••• coals, concluding; If I cannot endure this for a while, how should I endure 〈◇〉 fire forever? Rage and malice are burning sins. Iratus non vides legem, sed lex •det iratum. The angry man beholds not the Law, but the Law beholds the a•••• man. Therefore is anger called Excandescencia. They that nourish that fire within them, are nourished for a worse fire without them. Blasphemy is a burning 〈◇〉 The tongue is a fire, that fireth the whole course of nature, and is fired of hell. Let th•• whose mouths flame with oaths, fear these flaming torments. The rich 〈◇〉 tongue was tormented in fire, because it was used to spit fire against heaven. Drunkenness is a burning sin: too much wine is the oil of hells own Lamp. They inflame the reckoning, till they inflame their brains, inflame their bloods, infl•• their bodies: buy as much sickness, as will make up a burning fever; and 〈◇〉 much sin as will serve to inflame their own hell. In the German p••verb, Fire is of all the genders. Hic ignis, that's fire: Haec ignis, that's a• whore: Hoc ignis, that's wine. the first Chapter of John Verse 5. Mundus pos••est in maligno, that is in igne malo: all the world is on fire with sin, to make work •or the fire of hell. Deut. 32.22. A fire is kindled in mine anger, and it shall burn •nto the lowest hell. Psal. 2.12. If his wrath be kindled but a little, Blessed are all they ••at trust in him. Cant. 8.6. The Coals thereof are coals of fire, which have a most •chement flame. Wildfire may be tamed, streams of fire have been quenched: ••ely that fire can never be extinguished in the subject it hath possessed. One thing ••ely now can put it out; the water and blood that came out of CHRIST'S own •de. Only that water can quench the fire of lust in us, and that blood quench the •re of hell against us.

Down into hell.] Let me a little further enlarge this discourse of hell: wherein you do not find a due method, know that the nature of the place denies it. Who •n speak methodically and orderly of that; Quod nec modum nec methodum novit;•at knows no method, no order. Ibi ordo nullus, horror sempiternus. If any expect 〈◇〉 absolute description; I excuse myself; Non mihi si •ntum linguae. But as Pi•agoras ghest at the stature and pitch of Hercules, by the length of his foot; and we say in the proverb, Ex ungue leonem: so by shadow and resemblance, we may a little conceive what it is in sufferance. This is a cup of the deadliest wine that ever was tasted: those deep graves in the Psalm, from whence there is no rising again. The gates of that infernal prison being kept from egress, as the gates of Paradise were rewarded from entrance: not by Cherubims with a flaming sword, but by the angels of Satan, with all the instruments of death, and the seal of God's eternal decree set upon them. This is that outer darkness, to comprehend and wrap up the damned. Outer, because in extremity, without the limits of any mercy to be extended: where no light of Sun, Moon, or Star, much less the face of GOD shall ever shine. Where the eyes shall distill like fountains, and the teeth clatter like armed men, and the mind muse on nothing but sad desperation. Many and fearful agonies have wrung and wrested the spirit of man, since the spirit of life was first breathed into him: yet if all were put together, to answer the measure of hell torments amongst them; the hand of Tophet hath an unmeasurable portion left behind to distribute to her children, and enlesse patrimony of howling and gnashing teeth. Balance them together, and the least pain of hell is greater than the greatest of this world, Aquin. Horrible torments have been inflicted on mortal delinquents; they are all but ticklings to those torturings. Rev. 8.13. There is a threefold woe: Woe for the bitterness; Woe for the multitude; Woe for the everlastingness of those pains. It had been better for that man never to have been borne. A we, ten thousand times more than can be imagined by any heart as deep as the Sea. These are those waters of gall, viols of unmerciful plagues; pestilence and blood, and huge hailestones, fire and brimstone. Not such as fell upon Sodom, the witnesses whereof, for many succeeding ages, were heaps of ashes, and clouds of pitch. fire and brimstone from a bottomless mind, which burneth in the lake of wrath, and shall never be quenched.

Of all these torments there are two dire and dismal effects. Mat. 8.12. Weeping and gnashing of teeth. Fletus de ardore, stridor dentium de frigore. Raban, Fletus ignem qui non extingitur, stridor ob vermem qui non moritur. Fletus ex dolore, stridor ex furore, Bern. They are cast into darkness, for the inordinatenesse of their concupiscible: weep, for the inordinatenesse of their Irascible? gnash their teeth, for the inordinatenesse of their irrational part, Corrh. This manifesteth two extremities in hell; incomparable cold, and intolerable heat, Greg. in Mat. 8.

Weeping: here are some questions moved, whether this be a corporal weeping. Some affirm it; because the sorrow which is in pain shall answer the pleasure that is in sin. As she hath lived deliciously, give her so much torment and sorrow. But probates in their sinning had both an inward pleasure, and an outward delighting: before they must have in punishment both an inward grief and an outward weeping. usu. But then damnation being eternal, this effusion would also be eternal: and so the tears would make an inundation larger than the ocean, able in time to put out the fire of hell. Therefore we must distinguish; In corporal weeping there are two things: a resolution of tears, and a commotion or perturbation of the heart and eyes. This weeping is not the resolution of tears, because then the motion of the first mover ceasing, there is no generation, nor corruption, nor alteration of the body. But there must be a generation of that moisture which distills itself into tears, if that weeping were corporal. Yet there shall remain a weeping, which ariseth from the perturbation of the soul, and anguish of the body. There $\langle \diamond \rangle$ be here a howling like dragons, when as yet no tears fall. It is observable $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the expense of tears outwardly mitigates the sorrow within, and easeth the he•• the burden of indigestible grief emptying and venting it self at the eyes: but $\langle \diamond \rangle$ eternal tears could never qualify eternal pains.

It is further objected; weeping is the effect of sorrowing, and sorrow of repenting: therefore it seems if the damned weep in hell, that they repent in hell. W•• 5.3, And they repenting, and groaning for anguish of spirit, So Aristot. They $\langle \diamond \rangle$ be grieved for that wherein they were delighted. Ans. To repent may be understood two ways: either ration peccati, or peccato adjuncti: in respect of sin, and the punishment annexed to sin. To repent of sin for it self, is to hate it for $\langle \diamond \rangle$ other cause but because it is sin and displeasing to God: thus they do not sorrow. To repent of it for the punishment bound to it, is a sorrow by accident; that ariseth not from their evil doing, but from their evil suffering. The will of the dam•••• never bettered by their torment. To wish they had not sinned, without further ••lation, were a good will: but a good will and they are everlasting strangers. The will of the Devil is still invertible: nor doth he grieve for his pride, but for the punishment of his pride. Agains, there shall be a greater perv ersnesse of the damned in hell, than is of sinners on earth: but diverse sinners here, through blind•• of mind, and hardness of heart, do not repent of their sins: though the $\langle \diamond \rangle$ savage beasts through grief and pain are restrained from their sensual pleasure. On earth there may be repenting without weeping, in hell there shall be weeping, without repenting.

But is their no recovery of original good in hell? If the damned are sorry for their sins, this argues repentance. If they were re-admitted to life, they would $\langle \diamond \rangle$ their life in obedience; this argues a will to goodness. That rich man had $\langle \diamond \rangle$ care of his living brethren; this argues charity. No, there is no repentance, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ rectified will, no charity. Haply some remanents of natural light, none of $\langle \diamond \rangle$ natural grace.

There is no repentance, Revel. 16.9. They are scorched with heat, and blaspheme God's name: but repent not to give him glory. Ver. 11. They curse him for their pains and sores, but repent not of their deeds. True repentance ariseth fr•• faith and hope: but there can be no faith of releasement, where is certain knowledge of eternal punishment: knowledge and sense exclude faith. There can b•• hope of termination, where be chains of desperation. There shall be a desp•• sorrow for pain, no penitent sorrow for sin. None are now saved but by the blood of the Lamb: but when the world is ended, that fountain is dried up. The worm of conscience shall gnaw them with this remorse, bringing to their $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the cause of their present calamities. How often they have been invited $\langle \diamond \rangle$ heaven, how easily they might have escaped hell. They shall weep for the loss of the one and gain of the other, not for the cause of either, which were repentance.

There is no will to good, or at least no good will. As the will of the bless•• wholly set upon good: so the will of the damned is wholly set upon evil. Neither can the Saints in heaven will that which is evil, nor the reprobates in hell will $\langle \diamond \rangle$ which is good. This we perceive in the devils, who have been so long damned, •eaven to this day their unchangeable will is totally bent to wickedness. But 〈◊〉 est omnio involuntarium, Dionys. Evil is altogether against the will: if therefore they will anything, it is good either in existence, or in appearance. Ans. There is a double will in them: Natural, which is not of themselves, but of the founder of nature: Deliberative, that is of themselves; which being wholly averted from the supreme end of goodness, cannot be but evil. So that if naturally they could will good, yet the form of that will being so corrupted, it must necessarily be bad. Indeed evil as it is properly evil, moves not the will: but as it is an estimative good. Such is their malice, that they never will anything but evil, though they esteem it good. So that if they were now repealed again to this world; they would neither repent their sins, nor amend their lives, nor glorify God, nor seek JESUS. Let us now labor to rectify our wills, and order them to the seeking of good: lest we there lose both the good it self, and the very will unto it. For In Inferno erit stimulus paenitudinis, nulla tamen correctio voluntatis: ita culpabitur iniquitas sua, ut nullatenus possit diligere vel desiderari Iustitia, Aug. They shall curse their own wickedness, yet neither love nor desire righteousness.

There is no charity; not so much as any love to God, the infinite good; much less to man. None to God. But Omnibus diligibile est pulchrum & bonum: goodness and beauty is every ones love: therefore much more God, the cause and fountain of it. Nay, they shall hate God, Ps. 139.21. Do not I hate them that hate thee? Indeed if God could be seen of them in his goodness, mercy, bounty, they could not hate him: but they no further apprehend him but by the sense of their own torments, the effects of his Justice, and so hate him, Revel. 16.9.11.21. They suffer, and they blaspheme: there is in them a furious malice against him: being cursed of him, they recurse him. They curse him for making them, curse him for condemning them, curse him because being adjudged to death, they can never find death. They curse his punishments, because they are so unsufferable: curse his mercies, because they may never taste them: curse the blood of CHRIST shed on the Cross; because it hath satisfied for thousands, and done their unbelieving souls no good: curse the Angels and Saints in heaven, because they see them in joy, and themselves •n torment. Cursings shall be their sins, blasphemies their prayers, Lacrimae their •otes, lamentation all their harmony. These shall be their evening songs, their morning songs, their mourning songs forever.

No charity to man, for they rather wish all damned with themselves, than any •o be freed from their own prison. As in the blessed there is perfect charity, so in •he damned perfect envy. Now nothing is more repugnant to charity than malice and hatred. But it is objected, that inordinate affections are not taken away from •he damned: therefore they would not have them condemned in hell, whom they •nordinately affected upon earth. Ans. The love that is grounded upon virtue, is constant and durable: such charity we shall bear with us to heaven, and be made •erfect in it. But the affection grounded upon lust and sinful passion, a disease that •uns in the blood, doth quickly vanish: like fire in wet straw, that only makes a mother, and goes out in stench. Therefore the adulterer, though he so dotes on his Mistress, that he is content to venture his soul for her embraces: yet having lost •hat soul, he doth as heartily wish her in the same bed of torment: that as they •ave been delighted together, so they might be afflicted together. Object. But as •y the multitude of participants the joys of heaven are enlarged, so are the sor•owes of hell increased: how then will they desire more company, when thereby •hey inhaunce their own penalty? Ans. Yet such is their unchangeable malice, ••at it contents them not to suffer their own singular torments; but had rather en•ure more grievous misery, to have a more numerous society. And for the rich •ans prayer for his brethren, Luk. 16. It proceeded not from a charitable soul, but ••om fear and horror of more torments to be multiplied on himself. Non fratres ••exit, fed seipsum respexit: he desired not their salvation, but his own less dam••tion. He knew that being the elder brother, his vicious example might draw on their greater disobedience: and as their sins increased, so he felt his own tortures enlarged. Therefore no grace in hell but everlasting sin, no devotion, but extreme damnation.

The wicked in hell still remain sinners. So Christ saith; All that came before me are thieves and robbers: Are; in propriety of speech he should have said; Fu•runt, they were thieves: no, Sunt, they are still, they remain so. Luk. 13.27. Depart from me all ye workers of iniquity: Operarij, & ab actu praeterito, & habitu presenti, Chrys. Workers, in reference both to the act past, and present habit. For he doth not say, yea that have wrought, but workers: quia iniqui nec post mortem des•nunt esse iniqui. They that die sinners, remain sinners even dead: although they cannot sin, yet they retain the desire of sinning: and he that is a liar in purpose, ceaseth not to be a liar in practice. Mors separate animam à carne, non peccatum (φ) anima. Death separates the soul from the flesh, it separates not sin from the soul.

Seeing the effect of those horrors is weeping, which shall never be comforted; let us prevent them, by weeping where we may be comforted. The time of living, is the time of repenting. If a man dies without repentance, repentance is dead to him forever. If we compare, Mat. 5.4. with Luke 6.25. we shall find, that the decree of God hath disposed, Flentes ad risum, ridentes ad fletum; weepers to laughing, and laughers to weeping.

Gnashing of teeth;] This is the effect of an inexpressible sorrow. A just and s• punishment, that they who once gnashed their teeth at others in contempt, should gnash their teeth at themselves in torment. The Psalmist complains; They gnashed their teeth at me; and the Jewsgnashed on Stephen with their teeth. Therefore they shall gnaw their tongues for pain: their tongues gnawed their neighbors, now they shall gnaw their own tongues. They shown their teeth in derision, they shall gnash their teeth in damnation. No part of the damned shall be free from anguish, the memory afflicted with pleasures past, the apprehension with terrors present, the understanding with torments to come and continue, the eye with darkness, the ear with hideous screechings, the smell with killing stench, the taste with gall of bitterness, the very teeth with such an anguish, that the extremist tooth-ach here is but a pleasure to it. Such is the extremity, universality, and eternity of those pains: if they be so universal in all parts, O that they were not so extreme! if so extreme; O that not so universal! if both so universal and extreme! O tha• not so everlasting; each torment easeless, endless, remediless! There be Ignit• lacrymae, and frigidi anhelitus. Therefore called Avernus; absque vera temperatur• where the freezing cold shall not mitigate the scorching heat, nor the scorching he• qualify the freezing cold. Avernus is a lake in Italy, that Caesar purged; evaporating such a mortal steam, that it killed the birds which flew over it. Therefore called Avernus quasi avibus adversus. Profundus sine fundo; full of incomparable heat, intolerable stench, innumerable griefs. Hugo, Vermis cum tenebris, flagellum, fœtus, & ignis; Daemonis aspectus, scelerum confusio, luctus. From all these must needs arise the gnashing of teeth. Two things would seem to mitigate the terror of hell, Patience and Hope: this gnashing of teeth excludes them both.

For patience; many grievous extremities have the Saints of God digested o' earth by patience: that universal antidote against future evils, and qualification of present severities. It hath blunted the edge of tyranny, and made the sufferers smile in the midst of those pangs, the very sight whereof hath astonished the beholders. Whatsoever the damned suffer, let them have but patience: nay, there shall be ⟨◇⟩ patience in hell: this gnashing of teeth, is the effect of a most impatient fury. M^o commonly say, in necessitated sufferings; what remedy but patience? Patience therefore is a confessed enemy, but all remedy is denied to the reprobates the^r; even that poorest succor which the anguished heart can imagine, Patience. O the universal privation in that dismal place! where Omne aderit quod cruciet, omⁿis ⟨◇⟩ quod relevet. Everything is present that may vex them, everything absent th^{at} may comfort them. Where they must suffer everlastingly, and cannot suffer patiently.

For Hope, there is none. The proper object of hope is Arduum bonum, saith o' School: a difficult good. A good of difficulty not of impossibility: where no possibility can be no hope. There nulla spes boni, nulla desperatio mali, Hugo. o' hope of good, no despair of evil. Men say in extreme passions; If it were o' for hope, the heart would burst: there is no hope, yet the heart must hold: the misery is, that it cannot burst; but lies (like a tormented Malefactor) upon the heel, ever dying, yet without all hope to die. Dissolutionem cupit, & dissolutionem non capit damnatus. There is no hope in hell, no hope with us on earth, for them o' are in hell. We cannot hope for the devils; they are condemned to hell, and o' st hope: nor can we hope for the dead, because there is no purgatory. Indeed o'ncerning the dead, there may be hope of their happy condition, but none of their o'rmutation. This is a double torment; neither deliverance, nor hope of delive^{rance}. Sad and heavy despair absolves their infelicity: comfort they neither feel, o' r have hope to feel.

Seeing only hope is confined to this life, let us make much of it, that it may en^{rich} us. Hope makes not ashamed, because it is never disappointed: for if it could illude, it would be ashamed. Spes vitæ immortalis est vita vitæ mortalis, Aug. o' the hope of life immortal, is the life of our life mortal. The Poets fain, that all o' e gods and goddesses, that is, virtues and graces, did once dwell upon the earth. ⟨◇⟩ finding all things so corrupt, and men so bad company, they all went up to o'aven with Justice; Terras Astræa reliquit. All but only Hope, and she stayed be^{hind} still. But now if we hope well, we must do well. He tempts God, does not o'pe in God, that hoping doth nothing for himself, Aug. Though there be hope of the o' ren fig tree, yet still the dresser labors in the manuring of it. It is in vain for a o' n to hope his children shall do well, when he teacheth them ill. The means o'ust be used, where hope is nourished. Hope is only for the present: the Saints in o'aven have no hope, for they are in full possession of joy: the damned in hell have ⟨◇⟩ hope, for they are in full possession of torment. Only the living have hope, and the living GOD is their hope: which himself bless and answer in JESUS o'HRIST.

The last question is, ubi sit, what is the place of hell, my text says. It is Down •rd. S• doth the Scrip•ure frequently. Let them be cast into the Deepe pits, that •y rise not up again. Bring them Down into the pit of destruction. They are in the •epth of hell. The way of life is above to the wise, that he may depart from hell •eath. So the terms declare it, and the word describes it. Sheol, which is taken ⟨◇⟩ a pi•, grave, or hell; all Downwards. Mercer. in Gen. 37. says that Sheol sig•es all places under the earth. It must be below, because it is everywhere opposed heav•n which is highest of all. Abyssus, which is a great deep, a vast gulf under •e earth, a bottomless pit: the devils entreated Christ not to send them to that •ee. Luk. 8.31. Into the Abyss. The Apostles that preached to the Jews, used •e word Gehenna, I am. 3.6. It is set on fire of Gehenna Hell. They that preached the Gentiles, used Hades: which they took to be a place under the earth ordei•d for punishment. The word here used is Tartarus: Hesiod affirms it to be so •re under the earth, as heaven is above it. So the Rabbin's •eld; Sheol is absolute below, the very center, Esa. 14.9. Hell from Beneath is moved, Deut. 32.22. I •ll burn ad Infernum inferiorem to the lowest hell. Nic. de Lyr. affirms is Circa •trum terrae. Tertull. in Apologet. Hell is a subterrane treasure of hidden fire. The •ets so took it; Facilis descensus averni; Sed revocare gradum &c. Quicquid perit •sum fertur. All things perishing, sink downwards.

But against this it is objected, that Dives in hell saw Abraham and Lazarus•ich he could not do; if hell was so deep and remote a bottom wherein he lay •er whelmed. And albeit hell is below and downward in respect of heaven, yet happily it is not so in regard of earth, Rev. 12.12. Woe to the inhabitants of the earth, for the Devil is come Down amongst you: yet he was then cast no lo• than the superface of the earth. There be diverse arguments on both sides. First ⟨◇⟩ they that live, know not the state of the dead: so the dead know not the state of the living on earth, much less of the Saints in heaven, Greg. So August. As the rich man had a care of his brethren living, yet he knew not what they did: so h•• men a care of their dead friends, yet know not how they speed. Against this is opposed, that if they in hell had not the sight of heaven, their own sufferings woe•l• less afflict them: for their most grievous torment shall arise from the vision of wh•• joys they have lost. Wisd. 5.2. When they shall see it, they shall be troubled with •rible fear, and be amazed at the Saints salvation. So Bern. The faithful shall h•• a sight of hell, and the unfaithful a sight of heaven. Vt illi magis laetentur, vide•• quid evaserint: & hi gravius crucientur, videntes quid amiserint. That the one ⟨◇⟩ be rejoiced, by seeing what horrors they have escaped: and the other may be a•licted, by seeing what comforts they have forfeited. The wicked shall see it, ⟨◇⟩ grieved: he shall gnash with his teeth, and melt away. Barre the sight of their e• and you ease the grief of their hearts. Luk. 13.28. That weeping and gnashing ⟨◇⟩ teeth proceeds from sight; when you shall see Abraham &c. in the kingdom of God. ⟨◇⟩ is the exile from the presence of the Lamb, from the society of Saints and Angels from the felicity and joys they see; that most bitterly scourgeth them. The ⟨◇⟩ knowing of earthly affairs never troubles them: but heaven they must in part ⟨◇⟩ and know, else they cannot be tormented with the loss. But on the other side ⟨◇⟩ said, that the sight of heaven is never afforded to Saints in the flesh but as an in•mable favor. It was Paul's greatest grace, and that which had like to have enda•ger'd him unto pride, to be wrapped up into the third heaven, and behold the life which the blessed live with God. But what extraordinary grace was this, if it be ⟨◇⟩ granted to the reprobates? Answ. Saint Paul saw it experiendo, by tasting it: ⟨◇⟩ hoped again to see it Participando, by possessing it: such a sight is not permitted ⟨◇⟩ the children of perdition. They only see it to the grief of their hearts, that they cannot enjoy it.

The School gives this conclusive sum; that the damned shall behold ⟨◇⟩ glory of heaven before the day of Judgment, but not after. Neither shall they know it as it is in it self; but only by a kind of luscous and glimmering sight perceive it to be an invaluable glory. And this shall vex them, both that they can no better ⟨◇⟩ it, and shall never taste it. Afterwards they shall be deprived of that vision, and ⟨◇⟩ up in everlasting night, neither shall the withdrawing of this vision diminish ⟨◇⟩ tortures: because the remembrance of that once seen, shall forever stick by them. Hence they shall continually grieve, finding themselves unworthy, Gloriam tuam videre, quam Sancti permittuntur habere: even to see those pleasures, which the good are vouchsafed to inherit and inhabit forever. But how could that rich man, ⟨◇⟩ can the damned spirits be said to see the glory of heaven, when as they want the luminary organs of the body, the disposition of sight; besides the thick interposed darkness? Answ. This is no reason, for even spirits see, and have the eyes of diligence and apprehension, able to distinguish between light and darkness. They apprehend this glory either universally or particularly. An universal apprehension they have, whereby they perceive the Saints to be in great glory; in particular what this glory is they know not. At a great feast, the beggar at the door sees ⟨◇⟩ part the joy and cheer of the guests; but not so well as the guests themselves ⟨◇⟩ are banqueting. And as this must needs grieve the beggar, to see it and not ⟨◇⟩ taste it: so shall the damned vex, Tam propter invidiam alienae felicitatis, ⟨◇⟩ propter carentiam illius quiescit; for envy both at others plenty, and their ⟨◇⟩ want.

Thus if we grant that the damned shall see the glory of heaven, then it will ⟨◇⟩ bably follow that hell is in the air; only separated with an unpassable gulf. If ⟨◇⟩ we not see it, then is it likely to be in the bowels of the earth. Howsoever, it is below, Downwards, in the inferior parts of God's workmanship. But precisely to ⟨◇⟩ where; whether in the air, water, on the face of the earth, or, in the center of the worlds center; Tegitur, non legitur: periculose disquiritur, tuto ignoratur: we may safely be ignorant of it, we cannot but dangerously dispute it. Only, as just spirits dissolved from their bodies, presently ascend to the Emphyreal heaven: so the souls of the lost tarry below, confined to the inferior Elements, there to be punished. If any ask further about the local place of hell, I answer with Socrates, never was there myself, nor spoke with any that came from thence. When we demanded what the gods did and loved, Euclides answered; whatsoever they do or love, I am sure they hate all curious examiners. Many doubt Vbt ⟨◇⟩ where it is: none can describe Quid sit, what it is: but all agree Quod sit, at it is.

Seeing hell is a descent, and a bottom downwards, let us keep ourselves so near as we can from it while we live, that it may never devour us when we die. ⟨◇⟩ doth naturally sink downward, and separate from God who is above. A sinner never descendeth till he come to the lowest that may be: his affections are down•ards, and sure his hope and inheritance is not above. But as we bury dead flesh un•r the ground, so it is not unlikely of dead souls. And as the heaviest bodies •awe to the center of the earth, so do the saddest and heaviest spirits which the •ercie of God hath forsaken, Luk. 13.11. We read of a woman bowed down with a ••rit of infirmity 18 years, and could in no wise lift up her self. A woeful estate ••ed by the Evangelist: Egritudinis manifestas, behold: aegrotantis fragilitas, a woman: •seriae acerbitas, it was a spirit of infirmity: morbi diuturnitas, eighteen years: cor•is curvitas, bowed together: elevandi impossibilitas, could not lift up her self. Such the estate of wicked sinners; that if their bodies were like their souls, incederunt •drupedes, they would grovell like beasts. And indeed Bestialior quàm ipsa bestia •homo, ration vicens, & non ration vivens. They cast themselves down, and ••e but JESUS CHRIST can help them up, Luk. 10.30. A certain man went •ne from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves. From Jerusalem down Jericho: hell is down a hill. Jericho signifies the Moon, Ieron. He that walks •er the Moon of this inconstant world, must needs fall among thieves. Sin brings man easily down to Jericho: Sed revocare gradum, superásque evadere ad auras, Hic •or, hoc opus est. The rule of Philosophy is, that levia surgunt, light things a•nd upwards: yet is nothing lighter than vain thoughts, and they sink down•rds: sin is hells high way. If ye be risen with CHRIST, seek those things •t are above.

First, understand the things, then undertake the search. Though we cannot •roughly see them, yet let us thoroughly seek them. This is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, to be wise: but ••udacious curiosity to measure every foot in hell, and dispose every cabinet and amber in heaven; this is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, to be wise beyond sobriety. Fidendo, non dendo apprehendimus. 2 Cor. 5.7. We walk by faith, not by sight. Let us lift up our •arts with our hands unto God in the heavens. The Lord in all our holy services ••ites the heart: in his Temple, at his Table, My Son give me thy heart, Psal•1. Unto thee ô Lord, do I lift up my heart, Revel. 12. There was a woman clothed •th the Sun, and the Moon under her feet, and upon her head a Crown of twelve •res. The head of the Church is wrapped in the stars, and the world is under 〈◇〉 feet. She forgets the land wherein she was borne, and the home-stall wherein 〈◇〉 was bred, and seeks Jerusalem above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of •od. If riches increase. Nolite cor apponere, set not your heart on them: they are ••vy things, and will sink you downwards. Animus velut ponder, amore fertur, •unque fertur, Aug. If our love be to things downward, our souls canno•e to God upward. We never minister the blessed Sacrament, but we tell you of ••rsum corda, lift up your hearts: you then answer us, we lift them up: but it is to be feared, that many hearts are so heavy that they cannot be lift up. The Philosopher being asked which was the heaviest part of the earth, answered; that which bears 〈◇〉 ignorant person. How little a piece of flesh so ever a wicked heart be, a talent of le•• is light unto it.

The merry wanton that dissolutely lives, being asked how he scapes sickness, lives so long and so joviall; answers I have a light heart. But when this man co•• to feel the weight of his sins, let him tell me then whether he be light hearted Naba could be drunk in his health; but when he is sick, his heart lies and 〈◇〉 him like a stone: nothing in the world can lift it up. The heart cannot raise it self, it is the Lord that draws it up. John 12.32. When I am lifted up from the earth, I will draw all men unto me. The Apothecary hath no drugs so cordial, the sy•phant no jest so joviall, the Vintner no Wine so sprightly, the Musician no stro•e• lusty; that it can lift up a sinful heart. Down, down it sinks without the ani•tion of God's holy Spirit.

But if CHRIST be our delight, our hearts are with him. Dominus ascend• 〈◇〉 coelum, ascendat cum illo cor nostrum, Aug. His body doth not descend down to 〈◇〉, we must ascend up to it. Indeed if in so large a quantity it be presently real in the Sacrament, as it was on the Cross, in full dimensions; what need any man lift 〈◇〉 his heart, to that he holds in his hand? No, he is above, contained in the heavens, 〈◇〉 the time of restitution: and if he be our joy, thither we also aspire: Vbi amor, 〈◇〉 culus: ubi dolor, ibi digitus: ubi cor, ibi thesaurus. The finger points to the grief, 〈◇〉 eye follows the pleasure, and the heart follows the treasure. God hath given 〈◇〉 both a face to look, and a faith to climb upwards. Si sit sursumos, quare den•• cor? Ascendamus interim cord, ut sequamur corpore. Let us send up our hearts before, that our souls may follow after. How preposterous and mis-matched is 〈◇〉 erected countenance, and a groveling spirit.

Things nearest heaven take least care for earth: the fowls of the air nei••• plow, nor sow, nor carry into the barn. But men most love what they must le•• and think seldom or never, of the place where they should be forever. Some 〈◇〉 too precise for public prayers, without a Sermon: as if God were only to se•• them, and they not bound to serve God. Are there not many that will bef•• more upon a license to eat flesh in Lent, than upon their souls all the year? 〈◇〉 are their thoughts upward? the poorest piece of garment they wear; their has, their cuffes, their shoes, their shooties; cost them more than their fowls: and 〈◇〉 not their thoughts downwards? They will rather lose their inheritance in he••, than let Christ have his inheritance on earth: and what, are their desires upwards 〈◇〉 Down, downwards they sink, like the trash that God blesseth not: their 〈◇〉 buried in their coffers, as dead bodies are nailed up in their coffins. And when t•• have dejected themselves so low as they can, then must this bottomless bottom ••ceive them, and overwhelm them with everlasting pressures. A material 〈◇〉 stone hung about their necks, cannot sooner or surer carry them into the depth 〈◇〉 the sea. For us, let our hearts be upward, that our souls may never sink do•• ward. Saint Bernard mentions four degrees of ascending. Primus ad cor, sec••• in cord, tertius de cord, quartus supra cor. The first ascent is of knowledge, 〈◇〉 second of faith, the third of love, the last of glory. Let us know God, this 〈◇〉 first step to blessedness: knowing, let us believe on him, that's the next: belee••• let us love him, that's the third: and loving, we shall live with him, that's the 〈◇〉 and perfection of eternal joy.

And delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto Judgment. 〈◇〉 are two things; the measure of their present confusion, and the time of their 〈◇〉 damnation. As a malefactor is first cast into a dungeon, at the Assiles brought 〈◇〉 to Judgment and then led to execution. Now they are overwhelmed with 〈◇〉 ••sertion of favor, then shall be confounded with imposition of plenary tort••e. 〈◇〉 be chained in a black and confused vault, seems an unsufferable plague to the 〈◇〉 quent: yet had he rather abide there still, than come forth to the light when he is sure to be punished with death. Therefore they cry to the mountains and rocks, to fall on them, and cover them: the reprobates rather desire the loades of rocks, and pressure of mountains, for concealment, than be summoned unto judgment. Their punishment is just; they broke God's bonds before, now they shall have chains to hold them. Ruperunt vincula gratiae, damnantur in vincula poena. Lucifers Ero similis Altissimo, hath made him Inferiorem infimo. The highest seat in heaven could not content him, the lowest bed in hell must contain him. Not pleased with the glorious light above, he is cast into the hideous darkness below.

Tradidit in catenas caliginis. Where we must suppose God sitting as a just Judge on his throne, and having summoned the revolting Angels before him, doth here sentence them to present sufferings. Not but they shall also pass under another trial, at that day of universal retribution. When Christ shall sit on his Tribunal judging quick and dead. But as a Justicer finding a transgressor, makes his Mittimus, and sends him to the Gaole, there to lie in chains till the Sessions. So we have ere three answerable circumstances. The Mittimus, He delivered them. The Gaole, to chains of darkness. The Sessions. To be reserved unto Judgment.

He delivered them:] but into whose hands? Indeed he delivers guilty mortals to the hands of guilty Angels. Matth. 18.34. He delivered him to the tormentors: that he might be their slave in suffering, whose subject he had been in sinning, Luk. 2.20. This night they shall fetch away thy soul: they to whom I have given commission to do it; devils. They shall require it, that did defile it. This was part of saint Paul's excommunication. Tradere Satanae, to deliver unto Satan: who is the hangman. So he writes of Hymenaeus and Alexander. Whom I have delivered unto Satan that they may learn not to blaspheme. To Satan, that executioner of condemned souls. But Cui Satanam? to whom doth the Lord deliver Satan himself? Some answer, that themselves are the Instruments to torture themselves. Invicem torquent & torquentur. After a sort, every transgressor is his own tormenter: and wickedness is a vexation to it self. Ambitio angit ambientes: ambition racks the aspiring, envie eats the marrow of his bones that envieth: the covetousness which would be most rich, keeps the affected with it most poor: ebriety begets the headache, lust afflicts the body that nourisheth it: and we say of the Prodigal, he is no man's foe but his own; therefore we grant that he is his own foe. It is a foolish powder, that thinks to blow up the house, and to scape it self from burning. If it were but &, that Se sibi tradidit, he delivered him over to himself: such is the power of God's justice, that without the least trouble to himself, he can make an offender his own flicter. How many impious wretches; after obstinate presumptions against God, have wrought desperate executions upon themselves.

How should this teach us to hate sin: we think ourselves certainly our own friends: No, by sin we become our own enemies. That which makes us at enmity with God, will make us at feud with ourselves. Though the Lord's hand would not touch us, nor were any malicious devil to rack us, nor any other creature to scourge us; Propriis lacerabimur armis, we should thus punish ourselves. If God speak the word, the hand shall rebel and strike the head, the nails tear the sinne, the teeth gnaw the flesh, the feet precipitate the shoulders, the stomach faish the members. These that are made to take one another's part, and to assist the whole in a peaceable communion, shall become mutinous like the Midianites, and •eath their swords in their fellows bowels. It is a plague woeful enough, when God •all deliver a man over to himself. Let me not fall into the hand of man was David's sire: No, as I am man, not into mine own hand. There is not less mercy in all Ne's enemies, then in desperate Nero's own heart to himself. But every man will •e good to himself? Yes, Quamdiu suus; so long as he is his own man: but •hen he becomes God's Instrument, Timeat se, let him fear himself. When the •rophet had told Hazael the tyrannous massacres he should do to Israel; he replies.

Am I a dog that I should do this? No, he was not yet a dog; but afterwards God forsook him, then he became a dog, and did it. Libera me a malo homine; that, is as Augustine glosseth it; a meipso. Deliver me from the evil man; O Lord: and because I am an evil man, and there is no worse, deliver me from myself. Such a deliverie should have been to us all, but for another deliverance that came between: a Liberavit, not a Tradidit. Luk. 1.74. He hath delivered us out of the h••• of all our enemies. Tradidit daemones, Liberavit homines. He delivered his own S• to death, that he might deliver us from death.

Into chains of darkness.] Into darkness, there's their Miserie. Into ch•••s, there's their Slaverie. Darkness signifies the wrath of God, and is opposed to th•• favor of his, which is called Lux vultus sui; the light of his countenance, Psal. 4.6. There is true light where the Father of lights shineth: and his absence causeth dark•nesse. That City hath no need of the Sun or Moon to shine in it: for the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light of it. Such a glorious light, that the very Sun is obscurity to it. Created lights, which now so comfort us, and whi•• some worship for Deities, shall then resign their honors. Mat. 24.29. The Sun ⟨⟩ be darkened, and the Moon shall not give her light. Shall not then the Sun shine at ⟨⟩ day? Yes, it is not darkened Diminutione luminis, sed comparatione majoris lu•i•• not by loss of the own light, but by the comparison of a greater light: as a ⟨⟩ is of small benefit, when the Sun appeareth. Otherwise, the Light of the M• shall be as the light of the Sun, and the light of the Sun shall be seven-fold, as the light ⟨⟩ seven days. But then these lights shall be overshadowed; as the Moon that rejoyc•• travellers in the night, gives place when the Sun riseth; and men do not mi•• Lord when the King appeareth. Therefore it is called Lumen inaccessibile, a lig• which no man (in his mortality and sin) can approach unto. In heaven there is all light and no darkness, in hell all darkness and no light. As the joy of the Saints ⟨⟩ Angels in heaven, so the wretchedness of the lost in hell, is so great that is cannot enlarged.

This is an unspeakable terror, to be coped up in everlasting night. If D••• calls the grave a tetricall place because of this darkness, where the Organ of seeing is not yet exercised. Job 10.23. A land of darkness and the shadow of death, where ⟨⟩ light is as darkness: How intolerable is the darkness of hell! But how agreeth ⟨⟩ with other Scriptures, that allow the devils vagari per orbem, & versari per ⟨⟩, to wander about the world, and to be conversant in the air? 1 King. 22.22. I••.7. Luk. 8.31. Eph. 2.2. Rom. 16.20. Shortly, therefore not yet trodden down. H• then are they shut up under darkness? Answ. It was the devils censure to be ⟨⟩ into hell; yet so that before the day of Judgment, the wisdom of God hath ••posed a permissive egress into the world; and that for some of them: that ⟨⟩ great number of them are in hell, there tormenting the damned souls, so the 〈ϕ〉 wander in the world to tempt sinners. This is manifest, Revel. 9.3. Where the bottomlesse pit being opened, there came out of the smoke innumerable locusts upon the 〈ϕ〉 and the purpose of their coming is expressed, that they might hurt those that 〈ϕ〉 not the seal of God in their foreheads. So Revel. 20.2. Satan is bound for a thousand years, at the expiration whereof it follows that he be loosed. Until the Judgment day God doth lengthen his chains.

Let us love the light, that darkness may never swallow us. All sins 〈ϕ〉 therefore called the works of darkness; not only because the evil doer hates the 〈ϕ〉 but also because Satan the Prince of darkness is the founder, and shall be the 〈ϕ〉 founder of them. They that sleep, sleep in the night: and they that be drinke, 〈ϕ〉 drunk in the night. This was wont to be the custom, sin durst not show her 〈ϕ〉 face by day. But now men are grown so impudent, that they make opera 〈ϕ〉 rum, the works of darkness, become opera lucis, the works of light; coating them in the sun-shine. So Absalom had a Tent spread upon the top of the 〈ϕ〉 and went in unto his fathers concubines, in the sight of all Israel, Num. 25.6. Zebek brought a whore to his tent in the sight of all Israel, even when they were weeping before the Tabernacle. Vice was once like the Owl, only a night-bird: now proud of her borrowed feathers, she dares out-face virtue at noon day. These be the strange Epiphanies of the time: as one observed on Matth. 2.2. We have seen his starre, and are come to worship him: there were two blessed Epiphanies; a manifestation of CHRIST'S star to them, and a manifestation of their piety to him. In stead of these, Pride struts in pomp, homicide stands on terms of Justification, drunkenness reels up and down the streets. The works of the flesh are manifest. These be monstrous Epiphanies; yet still the works of darkness, and precipitate onto the place of darkness, to the enlargement of Satan's kingdom. The Pope scatters his Emissaries abroad, to augment Idolaters, and augment his Supremacie: the Turk amplifies his territories; and other Princes expatiate their dominions: all these kingdoms are extended, but the kingdom of darkness surmounteth them all. For, though never was more light in men's brains, never more universal darkness in their hearts.

The stream of wickedness is so violent, that many (who had some inceptions of goodness) are even content to run with it, rather than swim against it, or especially improve it. Usury and Sacrilege scorn to be reprehended, and he is taxed of indiscretion that meddles with them: whereupon some let all alone, resolving to sit down and hold their peace. A Friar that had been for his boldness decourted, afterward admitted to preach to the King of Spain, told this Fable. The Lion was faulted by the Lioness, that his breath stank. Being mad angry with this imputation, he traverseth the forest, to be more certainly informed. The first subject beast he met withal was an Ass, and breathing upon him, he demanded the relish of his breath: the Ass plainly told him that it was very unsavory. Thou art too bitter, quoth the Lion, and tore him in pieces. Next he met with the hound, and put the same question to him: who answered, It is very sweet. Thou art a flatterer, quoth the Lion; and tore him in pieces. Last he lighted on the Fox, and examining him concerning his breath: the subtle villain replied; Indeed I cannot tell whether it be sweet or sour, for I have caught such a cold that I cannot smell. If we would commend the times for devout and holy, you might justly condemn us for owning flatterers. If we should say, they are stark naught, full of impiety and darkness: then we are held too cynicall and censorious. What then? shall we answer we have caught a cold, and cannot smell or tell? No, we are bound to love our own souls, better than you can love your own sins. In a word, let us receive the light of grace, that the light of glory may receive us.

Into chains.] These cannot be understood literally, for material chains: but metaphorically, and so they are two; the Powerfulness of divine Justice, and the guiltiness of their own conscience. The devils are bound, like mad men or banogs, in the chains of eternal damnation. Wheresoever they are permitted to wander, their own guilty consciences are those chains which bind them over unto judgement. Such are the horrors of that place, that the damned are bound to inferable torments: they must endure what they cannot endure, without being able to remove a foot. These chains shall so hamper them, that not one part of body, faculty of soul, shall have the power of activity to gratify their owner withal. The mind is bound to contemplate nothing but endless infelicity, the memory bound to recount nothing but fearful sins, the fantasie bound to present nothing but horrid visions, the eyes bound to see nothing but offensive objects, the ears bound to hear nothing but howlings and roarings, the nostrils to smell nothing but the stench of brimstone, the hands to catch hold of nothing but flames, and the feet to walke no further than these chains will give them leave. Delivered them into chains of darkness: the collections, and inferences here observable are diverse.

1 Conclusion, that there is certainly a God, for how else should Satan be bound? See is that Strong man, and therefore there must be a stronger than he to bind him. If there be a destroying power, without question there is a preserving power, superior to it, and correcting it. For if the devils were not curbed, they would confound us all in a moment. It is not more natural for fire to burn; nor for heaviness to find downward, than for Satan to destroy. He is a King over all the children of pride, Upon earth none can match him: but there is one in heaven that chains him. there be a roaring Lion that would devour us, certainly there is a blessed power that preserve us.

Let this teach us to get so close as we can to God, that Satan may not reach to us. The chickens be safe under the wings of their mother, and we under the providence of our Father. So long as we hold the tenor of obedience, we are the Lord's subjects: and if we serve him, he will preserve us. But when a man is fallen to the law of an out-Law or rebel, the Law dispenseth with them that kill him, because the Prince hath excluded him from the benefit of his protection. All the fear of Satan ariseth from the want of the due fear of God. The more a man fears God, the less he fear everything else. Fear God, Honor the King: he that fears God, doth but honor the King, he need not fear him. It would affright a weak Christian, to consider the presence and number, malice and power, of wicked spirits. But when with the Prophets servant, he sees those good Angels on his side, as present, as diligent, more able to help than the other to hurt, he takes heart again. He knows that God (most good) bounds the temptation of the one, and directs the protection of the other. Though there be many legions of devils, and every o•• stronger than many legions of men, and more malicious than strong; yet Chri•• little flock lives and prospers. I am the Lord, I change not: therefore ye so••• of Jacob are not consumed. The devil would do it, and doth attempt it; but God• unchangeable mercy prevents it. That we here meet, pray, worship, is against the devils will; only our gracious GOD maintains it. That every moment 〈◇〉 perish not in the jaws of that Lion, let our hearts acknowledge, and our tongue••• praise the Lord our maker.

2 Conclusion; that Satan can do nothing but by God's permission: he is bo•• in a teddar, and cannot go one inch beyond his chain. Christ tells Peter, th•• Satan had desired to winnow them: Desired, he must beg an ill turn before he c•• do it. Whatsoever he doth, is limitata potestate, and by dispensation from God He could not seduce a Prophet, nor take one poor sheep from Job, nor enter a h•g without license. It is an Ethnical error of our times, in strange accidents to give the honor of God to Sorcerers and conjurers. If a tempest arise beyond commo• experience, presently as if the God of heaven were fallen fast asleep, and mind nothing; the judgment is given, there is some conjuring: there must needs be a pest•lent convention and stipulation betwixt men and devils. As if God were not 〈◇〉 to raise as great a storm, as the Devil. Look upon the witches of Egypt: 〈◇〉 rum potestas defecit in muscis, Aug. Their cunning failed in the most contempt•• creatures; and they are forced to cry, This is the finger of God. Though the circuit of Satan be very large, even to compassing of the whole earth; yet he hath his days assigned to stand before the Lord for the renewing of his commission, and there is a chain tied to his power that he cannot move beyond his allowance. Yet hath he•• little liberty to tempt; for the probation of some, for the reprobation of others, i• all for the glory of God. He is the basest of all creatures, a slave, a scullion: n•• how is that person shamed, that is given up to a base slave to be corrected!

So little he fears to tempt us, that he ventured upon Christ himself, Ma• 4. As we read Rev. 12.7. There was a great battle in heaven, so here was a mo••machie or single combat on earth. It was a dainty sight to behold little Da•• grappling with great Goliath, and great Goliath groveling under little David. A La•• matched with the Wolf, and the wolf overmatched by the Lamb. First, the Devil tempts him to diffidence. Art thou hungry? Turn these stones into bread: not into quail, feasants, dainties; but into Bread, without which man could 〈◇〉 live. Then to presumption, ver. 6. If thou be the Sun of God, cast thyself down. That he might get credit to his ministry, he would have him show the people some strange device. Lastly, to apostasy, ver. 8. which was the sin that turned himself out of heaven: wherein first he propounds Promissum, All these will I give •he: and indents Pactum, If falling down thou wilt worship me. He is like an old bitten •urre, that being fleshed to the game, will not be stay'd off: hells bandog, fed with •he livers of God's cast-awaies. He tries all courses, like Balaam, or some superstitious •amester on the losing hand; shifts places; still in hope to win. He took him up •nto a mountain: Cyprian says, he went on foot with him: for Christ would not •se him pro vehiculo, quem novit praecipitatore. This opinion is not against the Text, •or the Text against it. For 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 doth not imply portage: no more than, Matt. 17.1. Christ took them: it were gross to think that he carried them on his •acke. But that he carried him is the most received opinion, because it is said that he set him on the pinnacle. This was no disparagement to Christ: no more than to suffer apprehension, ligation, crucifixion of his enemies.

He reserves the old malice to all Christ's members: why should any serve him? there is no goodness in him. He is the greatest sinner of all: for Quicquid efficit ille, ipsum magis est tale. Wicked Pharisees may make their Proselytes twofold more the children of hell than themselves: but the malice of the Devil cannot be matched. He never gives man anything, but as Michal was given to David, to ensnare him. St Peter calls him Contra litigator, an adversary at Law: he wrangles with God against us. Augustine brings him in thus pleading. They were thine by creation, they are mine by prevarication: they were thine per gratiam, they are mine per culpam: they were thine by redemption, they are mine by defection. They left tua Sacramenta, thy Sacraments: and accepted mea Blandimenta, my allurements. He pleads any things against us, but we have one argument to confute him; our Faith, 1. Pet. 5.9. Whom resist steadfast in the faith. And all our defects are supplied by an Advocate in heaven, Jesus Christ the righteous. I know that God casteth his sometimes into the sieve for trial, but the Lord Jesus strengthens them.

Satan is called a Lyon, and that fitly; for he hath all the properties of a Lyon: so bold as a Lyon, as strong as a Lyon, as furious as a Lyon, as terrible as the roaring of a Lyon. Yea worse: the Lyon wants subtlety and suspicion, herein the Devil beyond the Lyon. The Lyon will spare the prostrate, the Devil spares none. The Lyon is full and forbears, the Devil is full and devours. He seeks all: let not he simple say, he will take no notice of me: nor the subtle, he cannot overreach me: not the noble say, he will not presume to meddle with me: nor the rich, he dares not contest with me: for he seeks to devour all. He is our common adversary, therefore let us cease all quarrels amongst ourselves, and fight with him.

Seeing the Devil is bound with chains, and cannot range further than his bonds show him, let us not come within his reach. The bandog is tied up that he may not hurt the passenger: but how if the passenger will come within his compass? Give no place to the Devil: for the Devil hath no place unless we give it him. Rest the Devil, and he will flee from you. He cannot come in, except we open him the door: now who would open the door to let in his enemy? yet many do: by wearing, they open the door to let him in at their mouth: by lustful looks, they open the door to let him in at the eye. Pride admits him into his wardrobes, covetousnesse into our purses, adultery into our beds, Schism into our Studies, drunkennesse into our stomachs, Idolatry into our devotions, hypocrisy into our hearts. As if his chain were not long enough, wicked men put themselves in his way. Think when thou art about to commit a voluntary sin; now I am running within the Devils chain. I durst not so venture within the chain of a Lyon, are other savage beast, which can but tear my flesh. Hath God tied him up from me, and shall I run unto him? shall I trust his mercy, that is nothing else but malicious cruelty. O but the hand of God holds his Chain: but say the hand of God let go his chain, for thy presumption? what remains then but ruin? As we hate the Devil, let us hate those works that lengthen his chain. Do we pray to be delivered from the gates of hell, and yet frequent the gates of hell? we read of a bear that being too unwildly to hunt for his prey, stands still and anticeth the rest unto him with his glorious spots and colors, and so devoureth them. But Satan ‹◊› quick and nimble enough to pursue men, they need not willfully run into the own ruin. O that I had wings like a dove, then would I flee away and be at rest. Let us fly from him so fast as we can, and so far as he may never overtake us. Which is done by turning to God with faithful repentance, and devout obedience: so shall his chains be shortened: our souls delivered, our Creator glorified, and ourselves everlastingly saved, through the merits of Jesus Christ. Amen.

3. Observe, that Satan is punished everlastingly, without all hope of recovery: bound with chains, and as St. Jude calls them, Everlasting chains. There was ‹◊› deliverance ever ordained for the Devils: for Christ took not the nature of Angels: he took not their nature, therefore was not their Savior. Now there are diverse reasons, why Christ should seek lost Adam, rather than the lost Angels.

1. The Angel sinned without instigation; Non ab alio tentatus, nec ab alio servatus. As there was none to tempt him, so there is none to save him, John. 8.44. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own. A se peccatum rapuit, nullo alio suggerente: he took sin of himself, no other suggested it to him. He fell alone, nothing cast him down: he must rise alone, there is nothing to help him up. The wind blows out the Torch, we light it again: but if the wind blow out it self and cease moving, who shall raise it? If Satan hurt man, Christ heals him: but ‹◊› Satan hurt himself, let him heal himself.

2. The Devil was the party seducing, (man only seduced) and still endeavors what he can to destroy all: therefore none stands up to preserve him. Because ‹◊› hand is against all, therefore all hands are against him. Being thrown out from the presence of God, in spite he wounded his Image, that he might do him all the mischief he could: therefore he perisheth without redemption.

3. The Angels were more excellent and glorious natures by creation, and nearer to God than men: more subtle, more powerful: their dwelling in the highest heaven. Whereas one half of man was but refined dust, and his mansion the earth more remote from the glorious presence of God. Angelus ergo quanto sublimior gloria, tanto major in ruina, Aug. The higher the Angel was in glory, the deeper in misery. Homo autem quanto fragilior per naturam, tanto facilius ad veniam. ‹◊› man, the more frail he was by constitution, the more easy he is to redemption. Therefore God took pity on man, who was but dust: and pitied not the devils, because they had once been Angels.

4. The whole human nature fell with Adam. 1 Cor. 15.22. In Adam all die. All mankind was lost, and unless the human nature had been repaired, man had been wholly frustrated of his end. But all the Angels did not fall with Lucifer, but only some: and so none were partakers of his punishment, but such as had been partakers of his sin. Innumerable multitudes of Angels stood in heaven, as well as a great company sunk to hell. Dan. 7.10. Thousand thousands stand before him, ‹◊› thousand times ten thousand minister unto him. Some of that nature stood by conservation, without redemption: for redemption presupposeth loss. But if our nature ‹◊› not been redeemed, not one man could have been saved.

5. Man was distinguished into sexes; male and female: because they were ⟨◇⟩ generate their like: as Adam begat a son in his own likeness. But Angels ⟨◇⟩ no sexes; as CHRIST confuted the Sadducees. Matth. 22.30. In heaven they ••there marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the Angels of God. They ca•• beget a generation of spirits. Every devil sinned in himself, and is punished ⟨◇⟩ himself only. But Adam having sinned, and being to multiply his kind, ⟨◇⟩ needs convey his sin to his seed. Therefore was the Lord Jesus made of his fee••hat the guiltynesse which Adam to all his seed had propagated, by one of his seed •ight be expiated.

6. Satan immediately upon his fall was cast into hell. John. 8.44. He abode not in •e truth. But so was not Adam; for howsoever he was cast out of Paradise, yet •ot out of the world, but had space and grace given him to repent. And albeit that •enace, In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die, Gen. 2.17. Yet God spa•d him 900 years: indeed presently he became mortal, and fell into a consumpti•; as the original speech is, dying thou shalt die. And for the second death, the •ed of the woman excused him; he died not that death at all. Indeed August•ne mentions the Tatian heresy, which held that Adam was damned. But Wis. 10.1. •he preserved the first formed father of the world that was created alone, and brought him •t of his fall. Which is agreeable to the Scripture, Luk 3.38. Which saith that •dam was the son of God: therefore he was not the child of death and hell. God ••lieved him with a promised Messiah, a news that never came to the apostate •ngels.

7. If the whole human nature had perished, to what purpose had been this •orld? The world was made for man, not for Angels: either heaven or hell was •dained for them, this middle walk for man. Now why should either the Sun •ine, or the earth fructify for man, if he were not redeemed? Spirits have no use ⟨◇⟩ these things, man hath the benefit: and man should not have the benefit of any •eature, but for God's favor in CHRIST. For he did forfeit his patent, and •ne but a Savior could renew it. But for the El•cts sake, the rain should not fall, •r the earth stand. Therefore if man had perished, all this world had been in •ine created. Man is the sum and abridgement of all creatures, and contains ⟨◇⟩ him more generality than the Angels. Stones have being, but not life: plants •ve being and life; but not sense: beasts have being, life, sense; but not under•nding: Angels have being, life, sense, and understanding. Now man partici•tes with all these; a being with stones, a life with plants, a sense with beasts, an •derstanding with Angels. He is the compendious Index of God's great book in •lio. Mark. 16.15. Preach the Gospel to every creature: no creature hath part in •e Gospel; but only man is called every creature, as having in him the chief per•ctions of every creature. Some hold, that man bears the Image and superscrip•on of God more fully than the Angels: and hath something more; an organical •ody united to his spirit, which the Angels have not. He is the common end why is world was made: therefore, Esa. 9.6. To us a child is borne, and to us a son is •ven. To Vs, not to Angels. Luk. 2.14. To us is borne a Savior; To Vs, not to •e lost Angels. There is enmity put between the Seed of the woman, and the seed of •e Serpent, Gen. 3.15. Therefore the seed which saves man, shall be at enmity with •e devil.

8. Lastly, the principal reason of all is the free mercy, and gracious decree of •od. Who made both men and Angels good in creation, and finding both men •d Angels, lost in transgression, vouchsafed to men not to Angels a Redemption. What did we deserve at his hands, that he should pity us dust and ashes, passing by those celestial spirits? Psalm. 8.4. Quis homo, what is man that thou art mindful of 〈◇〉? For the wonder had been less to say, Quis Angelus, what is the Angel that thou art mindful of him? That we should find him a Savior, whom they find a most revenger: that we should be loosed from the chains of our sins, and they deſcended into chains of plagues: that the same CHRIST should with his own blood free us, that shall with his word sentence them: that the same Almighty hand should lift us up to heaven, that casteth them down to hell! Oh the riches of that mercie, which even to taste will keep a man from ever being poor! Of all mixed creatures men are the best, for they have reason: of all men, Christians are the best, for they have religion: of all Christians, holy believers are the best, for they have salvation. In the sorest troubles, men have some hope, Christians have good hope, believers have sure hope. Let us bless God for making us men, but most of all, for making us Christian men: for in that he gives us his Son, he gives us himself. He gave the water to fishes, the earth to beasts, the air to fowls, the heaven to Angels; but he gave himself to man, Having no greater to swear by, he sware by himself: so, having no greater to give, he gave himself. Whom have I in heaven but thee? saith that royal Prophet. The Romists in 88. cried out, whether maliciously or blasphemously; God shows himself a Lutheran, and the God of Lutherans: but indeed he shows himself a Christian, and the God of Christians. By how much we find more mercy than all creatures, let us be more thankful than all creatures. It is an harmonious sweetness, to have God's bounty, and our gratitude meeting in that middle way, the hand of Jesus Christ. Without whom neither could we receive his goodness, nor would he accept our goodness.

4 Observe that the punishments of hell are eternal: these chains can never be broken: were they of cords, of wreathed trees, of iron, they might be broken asunder, but the chains of vengeance never. Bind him hand and foot, and cast 〈◇〉 *into utter darkness.*¹ Now if a man were bound hand and foot, and thrown 〈◇〉 a Well five thousand fadome deep, what hope could he have of coming forth? But how doth this stand with God's justice, to punish temporal offenses with eternal scourges? It was the rule of his own law, that Poenā non debet excedere culpā, Deut. 25.3. Ans. There is a double quantity considered in punishment: the one according to the intention of pain; the other according to the duration of time. 〈◇〉 respect of the former, the quantity of punishment, must be answerable to the quantity of sin, Rev. 18.7. How much sin, so much sorrow: the more pestiferous iniquity, the more torturing fire. For the other, we must not think that the continuance of punishment is limited with the continuance of the fact. Among men, amusements are but a short pleasure, yet often pursued with a long penance. But the duration of torment respects the disposition of the delinquent. Poenae singulorum inaequalitate in intensione, poenae omnium aequales duratione, Aquin. The pains of all are equal in continuance, unequal in grievance.

But a good Judge will make his penalties, medicines and corrections, rather than destructions. Ans. So doth the Lord in all corrigible offenders: but those he cannot mend by chastising, his Justice must satisfy it self by confounding, 〈◇〉 God delights not in the death of a sinner. Ezek. 18, What profit is there in my blood when I go down to the pit? Psal. The Lord hath no use, of their eternal damnation. Ans. Yes, as mercy hath had her place and day; so must justice have hers. Whom mercy saves, she saves forever: though their works were short, and ^u nothing to God, yea, the very effects of his own grace. Therefore, whom justice condemns, she condemns forever: not respecting so much the persons that have sinned, as the person against whom they have sinned, Greg. Almighty God as he is good, 〈◇〉 not delighted with their torments: but as he is just, he is not satisfied without the torments. Factus est malo dignus aeterno, qui hoc in se peremit bonum, quod esse 〈◇〉 aeternum, Aug. He is justly plagued with an evil, that is eternal, who hath commuted in himself a good that might have been eternal.

But if God's justice must be satisfied upon those sinners, for whom Christ satisfied not; why is not this rather in reducing them to nothing? Seeing the unprofitable deserve to be deprived of all benefits; now one especial benefit is Being; therefore ipsum esse amittant, let them not be. Ans. It is true, the creature that disobey the Creator, deserves to lose his Being: but because it was given him to this purpose that he should serve him, therefore it shall never be taken away. For God will 〈◇〉 his homage and service out of that Being; whether of grace and salvation to 〈◇〉 praise of his mercy, or of punishment and confusion to the praise of his Justice.

But one would think, that the mercy of God should terminate their sorrow. Wisd. 11.23. Thou hast mercy upon all, and Thou lovest all the things that are. 〈◇〉 . 11.32. God hath concluded all under unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all. Sed usit & daemones: he hath also concluded the devils under sin. Neither will his goodness suffer that, which he made for blessedness, to perish forever in torment. These be the plausible conceits that over-merciful Origen, hath brought for the recovery of lost spirits And whereas Christ's doom is; Depart ye cursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devils: he would have these words rather Minaciter quam iraciter dicta, spoken by way of threatening, than by way of truth. But the Scripture delivers it plane ac plene. Rev. 20.10. The devil shall be tormented in the lake of fire day and night, forever. Besides, his opinion doth both Extendere & extenuare misericordiam: as it straineth, so it restraineth mercy. It extends it to the future deliverance of the damned, so it extenuates it in regard of the blessed. For if the lost be ever to be taken out of hell; then will it follow that the Saints also are one day to be cut out of heaven. And so what the bad should gain, the good should lose: yea, the very mercy of God cannot get more glory by the one, than it shall lose by the other.

But though the devils be everlastingly chained, is there no mercy for reprobate men? shall they never get loose? Gen. 6.3. My spirit shall not always strive with man: therefore his indignation shall cease. Doth he not often threaten, and not do to Nineveh? Ans. God doth sometimes menace and not strike, because our repentance steps between: but when everlasting burning hath wasted all the moisture repenting, will he do so then? Here indeed we may speed as well as Nineveh: versa est quae mala erat, aedificata est bona quae non erat, Aug. We shall stand if our vines fall: but we shall fall, if our sins stand. But at that day the date of repentance will be out. But such is the charity of the Saints in this life, that they pray 〈◇〉 their enemies: now this charity shall be more perfect in heaven, therefore they will intercede for them in hell: and God hath promised that their prayers shall be heard. Ans. Here they pray for them that they may be converted: for if they know at such were (in God's decree) reprobates, they would pray for them no more than they do for devils. Their present suite is ^x that they may be recovered out of the care of the devil. Now they may be recovered, not hereafter: there may be present conversion, no future permutation. For that objected out of the Psal. 77. Will the Lord withdraw off forever; will he be favorable no more? There is meant only the temporary affliction of the Church. Still as the joys of heaven, so the pains of hell, are eternal. Death is to men, as the fall was to Angels: as lost Angels after their apostasy, so lost men after their death, can never be recovered. Hell is made ^y Deeper; so deeper, that there is no hope of crawling out. Ex inferno nulla redemptio. Therefore $\langle \diamond \rangle$ called Infernus, ab inferendo, of casting in: for the wicked are so cast in, that they $\langle \diamond \rangle$ never get forth. From earthly Gaules and dungeons there may be some trick escape: but hell is so deep, that nor earth nor heaven can help out one poor wretch. That rich man, Luk. 16. solicited for his brethren: why did he not beg his wretched deliverance, who was able to have taught them by his own experience? O saw Ingentem hiatum, a vast interposed Gulf: he must let that alone forever.

One deep calleth another: the depth of hell calls for our answerable humiliation. $\langle \diamond \rangle$ that will not be humbled for his sins here, must be tumbled into that depth wretchedly. Psal. 130. De profundis clamavi Domine; out of the depths have I cried unto thee O Lord. God will hear the voice that comes de profundis. The deeper we have been in the Law, the higher we are in the Gospel: the deeper in hell, the higher in heaven. The deeper a bucket dives into the well, the more water it brings the lower a man is humbled with sorrow for sin, the higher he shall be exalted with the grace of salvation. Never came prayer, sigh or groan de profundis paenitentiae from the depth of repentance; but it was heard in Excelsis misericordiae, in the height of mercies. Of David's prophetic imprecation against his enemies, (Psal. 15. Let them go down quick into hell) we may make a good appreciation for our wretches. Let us go down quick into hell by meditation, that we be never sent back thither by condemnation. Let us descend every day while we live, that we never come there when we are dead.

5 Observe, that God punisheth sin wheresoever he finds it, though it be $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the very Angels. For all the men and Angels in the world are not so dear to him, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ his own honor: and what dishonors him but sin? For this cause 1 He made a Law against it, Gal. 3.19. The Law was added because of transgression. Non sinitur mandatum, nisi abhorruisset peccatum. He could not have written the Law with his own finger, if he had not so abhorred sin, 2 Gracious are the promises $\langle \diamond \rangle$ hath made to obedience: grievous the plagues he hath to threaten disobedience, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ His own hands have smitten it, the whole world is a bleeding witness thereof: $\langle \diamond \rangle$ man may say, Quorum pars magna fui: the whole creature groaneth in expectation $\langle \diamond \rangle$ his pacification. He hath drowned the world in a flood of waters, and he $\langle \diamond \rangle$ burn it in a flood of fire, because of sin. The sentence shall stand unchangeable, so long as heaven and earth endureth; Tribulation and anguish upon every soul $\langle \diamond \rangle$ man that doeth evil: Be he Jew or Gentile, learned or simple, Poor or Peere; yea man or Angel. 4 So doth he hate sin, that he spared not his own Sun, when he appeared in the similitude of sinful flesh. If the Justice of God could ever ⟨◇⟩ swallowed sin, or dismiss'd it with impunity, he would have forborne it i• ⟨◇⟩ own bowels. Yea, such a Son as never knew the least thought of disobedien•• the Son of his love, the Son of his joy, the Son of his light, the Son of ⟨◇⟩ delight: a Son fully as good and as great as his Father. Yea because he stoo•• ⟨◇⟩ the place, and bore the person of sinful man, he plagued him as the most deadly e••my that ever he had. Vt Peccatum occideret, Filium crucifixit. That he might ⟨◇⟩ sin, he slew his Son.

How should this make us all hate sin! He doth hate, not love God; that lo•• what God hates. Let us be content to meet our afflictions, as Peter and A•• met their Crosses, as their dearest friends; embracing them in our arms, and ••ting them with the kisses of peace. Or as the Martyrs welcomed their deaths, ••ing to the stakes as if they had run for a garland. But for sins, were they as d•• to us as the sight of our eyes, the children of our bodies, the spouses of our boso•• because they are traitors to our Father and Maker; let us deal with them as A••ham did with Hagar and Ishmael, put them out of our house forever.

6 Observe, that great offenders meet with great punishments: and accor••• to the condition of their place, is the nature and proportion of their fault. The ⟨◇⟩ glorious the Angels excellency, the more damnable their apostasy. If the light b•come darkness, how great is that darkness! The more notable the Person, the ⟨◇⟩ notorious the corruption. The freshest summers day doth soonest taint the ⟨◇⟩ some carcass: and fester'd lilies smell far worse than weeds. If virtue turn ⟨◇⟩ vice, the shame is treble. For many Jews to deny Christ, was not so m•• for one Peter: the adulteries of many Israelites less infamous than one Davi••. ⟨◇⟩ all the Cities of the world had done filthily, it were short of this wonder. The ••gin daughter of Zion is become an Harlot. If Judas become a traitor, how great i•• treason! If Achitophel prove a villain, how mischievous is his villainy! If Al•• rebel, how unnatural is his rebellion! The least mote that flies in the Sun, ••twene our eyes and the light, seems a greater substance than it is. Deepe are ⟨◇⟩ blows made by a mighty axe. Sin in a Magistrate is not only sin, but sub••tion. Q•• in vulgaribus nugae, in magnatibus blasphemy.

There is no dispensation for sin, no protection from Judgment. N•• rich man's opulency, not Belshazzars monarchy, not Adams perfection, ⟨◇⟩ Angels glory; could abscondere culpam, vel abscindere poenam, countenance sin, ••ward punishment. No place, no robes, no riches, no excellency, can give it ••ledge. Cloath an ape in tissue, and the beauty of the robe adds but more sco•• the beast. The richer colors, or bolder countenance is set on wickedness, ⟨◇⟩ more ugly it appears. Therefore as they that govern well in high places, shall ⟨◇⟩ with a higher degree of glory in heaven: because they being instrusted with th••sures of God, enrich his Church. So they that are in good offices evil men, ⟨◇⟩ ••schiefe of both their actions and examples, shall be cast deeper into hell. Potentes ••enter punientur. Wisd. 6.5. A sharp judgment shall be to them that are in high places.•ercy may soon pardon the meanest, but mighty men shall be mightily tormented. ••a. 30.33. Tophet is ordained of old, even for the King it is prepared. Kings are not •empted from judgments; Pessimus in Imperio, maximus in Inferno. What made ••e damned churl move for his brethren, but that every step they followed of his ••ding, he felt increasing the pile of his torments. 1 Sam. 12.25. If ye do wickedly $\langle \diamond \rangle$ shall perish and your King. For the Lord freeth none according to place, but according to grace; not for outward condition, but for his own free favor.

Nor yet let the poor and ignoble clap their wings, as if they were the only men that God loves. Not many rich, not many wise, not many noble, are called. Non mul•ed non nulli: not many, but some; and not many after the flesh; but many wise, rich, noble, after the spirit. The gate of heaven is narrow, and but few enter of any condition: yet certainly the noble sooner than the rabble: more wise men are admitted than fools: for morality is the first step to christianity. And at the last dreadful day, it is the Bond-man so well as the Great man, that calls upon the rocks to cover $\langle \diamond \rangle$. But do any of the Rulers believe on him? John. 7.48. Yes, Christ had his Church men in Caesar's family. Acts 17.11. They were the Noble men, and Honorable woe at Berea, which received the word: it was the people that persecuted it. Acts. $\langle \diamond \rangle$. 14. There was one Lydia a seller of purple converted: God saved a purple seller, not then a Purple wearer? The poor that is Blasphemus in Deum, & tu multo in divitem, murmuring against God, and seditious against the rich; is in more anger of judgment, than another that hath not more opulency than charity. Wealth doth not damn the rich, but when the getting or keeping of it doth damnify the more. Rich Abraham is in heaven, not because he was rich, but because he was good. Poor Lazarus is there, Non propter meritum paupertatis, sed pietatis, Augustin for his poverty, but for his piety, howsoever, let them that must be patterns, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ good patterns: the life that cannot be but exemplary, should not be but holy.

7 Lastly, infer, that if God spared not the Angels, so near to his own Per•; (a thing which the very children of God tremble to think) how much less will he spare dust and ashes? He put no trust in his Angels, how much less on them that dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust? What is the manliest prowess on earth, when the loins be girded up with strength, and decked in the greatest array, to encounter with the fortitude of God? The Lion hath roared, who will not dare? The Lord hath thundered from heaven, in casting down Angels to hell; will not flesh and blood quake for fear? The Scripture as well acquainted with $\langle \diamond \rangle$ pride of man's nature, hangs talents of lead at the heels to keep it down. The $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Psalms, which is a circular Psalms, ending as it began; O Lord our Governor, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ excellent is thy Name in all the world! that whithersoever we turn our eyes, we may see ourselves beset with his glory round about. How doth the Prophet dis•ntenance man, by his disdainful interrogation; What is man? Then still as the •lmes go in order, they grow in strength to deject the haughtiness of man. A Lord, let not man prevail: let the Nations know themselves to be but men. We are men, and the sons of men, not the generation of Angels; to show our descent. men in our knowledge, gross and dull brained; not quick, free, subtle, and celestial spirits: the conscience of our own infirmity doth convince us. Men of the earth, not of the air, fire, Stars, Sun, Heavens; much less of the substance of angels; but earth is the matter whereof we are framed. The disgrace is yet deeper, Psal. 22.6. Vermis sum, non vir. The prophet either in his own name, regarding his personal contempt: or in the name of Christ, whose figure he was: or in $\langle \diamond \rangle$ representation of all mankind: as if it were a robbery and presumption to take men him the name of man, he says, I am a worm, and no man. Thus Abraham conversing with GOD, fits himself to the coarsest branne; I am but dust and ashes.•ny of the children of Abraham, that have succeeded him in the faith; or any of the children of Adam, that succeed him in the flesh; think otherwise, their ⟨◇⟩ catastrophe shall confute them.

Man is an excellent creature, if we compare him with the fairest flower of ⟨◇⟩ Garland, the tallest Cedar of the Forest, the stateliest Beast in the wilderness. N• the Sun, and Stars are not so excellent, for they want sense, and man hath ⟨◇⟩ son: not one of them was formed after the Image of God, there are no spark• Divinity in them. But if we look up to the Angels, there is a large and ample •ference: we have bodies, and they are full of gross corruptions; so many ⟨◇⟩ that who is Physician good enough to number them, I say not, to cure them? T•• is in the soul uncleanness, in the understanding blindness, in the will perverse•• in the affections wantonness, in the whole man sinfulness. The Angelical ⟨◇⟩ is subject to none of these infirmities. If thou wert a sinful angel, thou shou• be punished; therefore if a sinful man, what hope to be spared? It was the ⟨◇⟩ note to King Philip of Macedon every morning; Remember thou art a man: for •membring this, we remember all unworthiness.

If any soul be humbled with this meditation, (and indeed who are fit for so •cious seed but the tilled ground? comfort is well bestowed on a broken he••:) ⟨◇⟩ this cheare them. God that spared not offending Angels, neither hath spa•• ⟨◇⟩ fending men: but he punished one man for many men, he spared not the man C• Jesus. All believing men have answered his justice in that one man: hence ⟨◇⟩ faith is bold to say, Lord thou art just, and hast not spared me: but thou art ⟨◇⟩ full, and hast not spared him for me. Thou hast punished our sins through his ⟨◇⟩

To be reserved unto judgment.] This is their binding over to the Assizes: ⟨◇⟩ sum whereof is: That the fullness and extremity of their torments is not yet ⟨◇⟩ but there abideth a more fearful and final condemnation for them. They are ⟨◇⟩ entered into divers degrees of penalty, but the plenary wrath of God is not p•• on them till the last judgment. They are already damned, and they know it, ⟨◇⟩ 2.19. The devils believe and tremble. It is so certain, that Justice admits no •tion of it, nor do themselves study any evasion from it: and yet there is st••••servation of greater plagues. But they have no bodies, and therefore are not ••ble of receiving more by addition. Ans. Their punishment ariseth from the ⟨◇⟩ of God, which then shall in a greater measure empty it self upon them. The ⟨◇⟩ of man while he strikes, can make his blow heavier or lighter as himself ple••

They are now suffered to tempt men, which is a pleasure to their malice, th••ing themselves by this means somewhat revenged on God: as he that defaceth ⟨◇⟩ picture of his enemy, when he cannot come at his person, easeth his spleen a ⟨◇⟩ So the dog gnaws the stone, that cannot reach the thrower. In a word, ⟨◇⟩ are suffered to wander abroad, then they shall be confined to their prison. ⟨◇⟩ prisoner that is allowed to walk abroad though with his keeper, is not so ⟨◇⟩ as the dungeon'd. Now they contain their hell, then their hell also shall ⟨◇⟩ them. Now they seem to rejoice at our sinning, then they shall have eno•• gr eve at their own suffering. Now the bottomeless pit hath been opened for $\langle \diamond \rangle$ egresses of those Locusts: then it shall be locked up forever with the eternal $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Justice. But he is judged already, John. 16.11. The Prince of this world is judged. $\langle \diamond \rangle$ still he is reserved to another Judgment. There is a double Judgment, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Discussion, another of Retribution. For the discussive Judgment, these $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Angels come not under it, their rebellion is so apparent. What need a Jewry $\langle \diamond \rangle$ on the malefactor, that confesseth his fault? For that of Retribution, they $\langle \diamond \rangle$ receive it in the view of the whole world; that the justice of God may $\langle \diamond \rangle$ be acknowledged, when he shall render to everyone according to his $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Cor. 6.3. Know ye not that you shall judge the Angels? Good men shall have the honour to judge bad Angels. For this they challenged Christ, that he meant them before the time. They confess that there is a time designed for the multitude and perfection of their torments.

He is reserved; but till the Judgment come, let us watch him, for he watcheth us. There is no corporal enemy, but a man naturally fears: the spiritual foe appears more terrible, because we are less sensible of him; we talk of Travelers, that have eene the world over; none ever saw so much as he. He hath seen earth, seen the sea, seen hell, seen heaven. He compasseth; as the hunter that makes a snare though he would rail a mound about the deer to preserve them; when indeed he lays a toile to destroy them. Great conquerors have been chronicled for victories, and extension of their kingdoms; Satan is beyond them all. Saul hath slain six thousands, and David his ten thousands; but Satan his millions. He that fights with an enemy, whom nothing but his blood can pacify, will give him no advantage. $\langle \diamond \rangle$ we know that we have an adversary at the next door, that pries into all our courses, and upon the least error will sue us on an action of trespass, we will be circumspect $\langle \diamond \rangle$ disable him of advantage. Satan no sooner spies our wanderings, but he presently comes with a complaint to God, bills against us in the star-chamber of heaven; where the matter would go hard with us, but for the great Lord Chancellor of peace, our Advocate Jesus Christ. As God keeps all our tears in a bottle, and registreth the very groans of our holy passion in a book: so Satan keeps a Record $\langle \diamond \rangle$ our sins, and solicits Justice against us. Were God like man, subject to passions, or incensible by the suggestions of the common barretor, woe were us. But he will hear one Son of Truth before ten thousand fathers of lying. No matter what the plaintiff libelleth, when the Judge acquitteth. We have forfeited our estates by treason, and the busy Devil begs us: but there is one that steps in, and reads a former grant, and that both by promise and purchase. Lord rescue my life from destructions, my darling from the Lions. Lord Jesus challenge thine own; let not Satan enter upon by force or fraud, what thou hast bought with thine own blood.

Thus in general, the particulars here considerable are two, (for I purpose no common place of the day of Judgment.) First the necessity of it, in that they are reserved to it. Then the Severity of it, in that it is a Judgment. These be inherent $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the words; there be some short adherent circumstances which I shall salute as I esse; they may be within the circumference, these are in the heart and Center.

The necessity. As the Creation was that Principium, which did produce things 〈◇〉 their being: so Judgment is that conclusion, which shall perduce things to their •ding. There is a double operation of God, one that wrought the production of •ings, the institution of nature, and distinction of places; from this God rested the •venth day. Another of providential government, whereby he conserves and •poseth things; from this he resteth not. Hitherto my Father worketh, and I work. According to both these there is a double Judgment: one at the departure out of •is life, which answers to God's disposition: that they which kept not the appoin•d rule of their maker, might undergo the Justice of their avenger. The other at •t day, when God to all things determines an end, as immediately of himself he •ve them a Beginning. But it is objected, Nah. 1.9. Judgment shall not rise up a •nd time: there is one Judgment at the end of life, if there be another at the end 〈◇〉 the world, then there is Judgment a second time. I might answer, that the Pro•et speaks there of a temporal destruction, which shall make an utter end, that there •ll be no need of a second blow; Affliction shall not rise up the second time. But •take it in their reading; Every man must be considered, as he is an individual per•, and with relation as he is part of mankind. So there is a double Judgment pro•rtioned; one at his death respecting the singularity of his person: the other at last •pecting his partnership of the world: and thus as he is a member of the universe, 〈◇〉 Judgment must be in the universal.

But Judgment is the determination of doubtful things, and everyone before •t day shall be put past doubting of his future estate. Yet there must be a general •gment, that the equity of every ones sentence may be approved, and the Justice of God glorified. Object. But it is against the proper form of Judgment, to let execution go before sentence: now every soul as she departs, receives her reward, and is presently possessed of joy, or punished with sorrow, If therefore there be a future Judgment, here is execution before sentence. Answ. The first is but the effect of the latter: by that they presently feel, they know what they shall eternally feel. Besides, but one part of man only passeth that censure, the soul alone is blessed or cursed: therefore a general Judgment must pass upon the re-united body: which as it hath served the soul in holiness or sin; so must accompany the soul in bl••• or pain. Object. The body is but an Instrument of the soul: so the Philosophers, Physicum corpus organicum statuunt; because the soul doth use it as an organ. Therefore it is for the soul alone to suffer: corpus ab anima separatum non dolet: the body feels no pain when the soul is departed from it. Answ. Let it be but an Instrument, yet was it a living Instrument: as therefore the soul being the Mistress i• sinning, shall be no less in suffering: yet the body must have his due share in being punished, as it had the full part in being delighted.

But, He that believeth not is already judged: what need then anymore Judgment? Answ. He is judged Per divinam praescientiam per propriam conscientiam, non per ultim• sententiam: judged by God's prescience, judged by his own conscience, not by the last sentence. There is a five fold Judgment. 1 The judgment of Disposition; so a• unbelievers are now judged. 2 The judgment of Comparison. The men of Ni••• shall rise in judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it. Evil men shall th• judge them that be worse; Non secundum censuram dictaminis, sed secundum mensur• criminis, So I•rusalem is said to Iustifie Sodom, yet were the Sodomites then in 〈◇〉 .

3 The judgment of Approbation; so the Saints shall judge the Angels, judge the nations, Wisd. 3.8. judge the tribes of Israel, Mat. 19.28. judge the whole world, 1. Cor. 26.4. The judgment of Difinition; so John. 5.22, The Father hath committed all judgment unto the Son. 5 The judgment of Remuneration, which shall reward every man according to his practice.

That there shall be a judgment, is universally granted: I speak the Law to them that know the Law. Though there be a particular judgment precedent, this hinders not the general subsequent. Here the wicked condemn themselves, there God shall condemn them. Qualis conscientia, talis sententia. As is their conscience, such shall be their sentence. If our own heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart. Besides the common reasons that be given, 1 That the godly here suffer for well doing, therefore shall be crowned for well suffering. It is fit that they whom the world hath unjustly condemned, shall by the Lord be justly acquitted. Vt apparet patientis innocentia, quàm persequentis injustitia. If there be Judas to censure Mary and not a Jesus to justify Mary; Truth shall be utterly lost. 2 That many notorious sinners are punished here; which is but the little Image and earnest of the general Sessions hereafter. God strikes some, ne ipsi pereant, to save themselves: and so again, ne reliquos perimant, lest they should destroy others. Graceless sinners emboldening themselves to riot by the remoteness of judgment, are often cut off before hand. Some men's sins are open before hand, going before the judgment. They have not the patience to tarry so long for their own damnation. As when the desperate Pirat, ransacking and rifling a bottom, was told by the master, that though no law could touch him for the present, he should answer it at the day of judgment: replied, nay, if I may stay so long ere I come to it, I will take thee and thy Vessel too. A conceit wherewith too many land-thieves, oppressors, flatter themselves in their hearts, though they dare not utter it with their lips. These God judge before hand, as he did Herod immediately upon his elevation: the people called a god, but the worms soon confuted their ridiculous deity. That as when Moses had powdered the calf, he might upbraid Israel, behold your God: so when the Angel had worm'd that Idol, he might say, Behold your king. Beside these, and other beaten arguments, I fasten upon two instances.

1 Many perverse sinners are forborne here: they transgress in health, Psa. 73. They trouble others, tremble not themselves: all feel their plagues, no plagues do they feel. They sink others eyes into their heads with leanness, while their own eyes stand out with fatness. What, shall they never be called to an account for this? Shall a man covet and take, take and keep, keep and devour, devour and never reward it up again? Shall an Extortioner make every hour advantageous, laugh at the groans of the oppressed, dance to their lacrymae, and yet scape? Every sin is sometimes suspended, saving only the usurers: others sin by day only, or by night only, and the most violent plague of wickedness hath some intermission: but he sins day and night continually: and is there no day nor night of answer? Shall a man steal the bread of sacrilege, drink the wine of sacrilege, sleep in sacrilege, clothe his family with sacrilege, leave to his children an inheritance in sacrilege, and no reckoning? what though no Judge, no Court, no Parliament question or medicine this disease; shall not the Judge of all condeme it.

Many sins have been punished, that are now forborne; because The Lord hath appointed a day to judge the World in righteousness. The wickedness of the old world as abundant in the new world; yet is not the world drowned with water, because God hath ordained for it a deluge of fire. The sins of Sodom are practiced every where; yet do the committers scape fire and brimstone on earth, because they are reserved to fire and brimstone in hell. Do not many persecute the Church as violently as Pharaoh, with Charriots and Armies, who yet scape drowning? There is a reservation of a deeper and bottomeless sea for them. Diverse murmur at God who are not stung with fiery serpents as the Israelites: because they are reserved to a fiery repent in hell. Many take bribes like Gehesi, without a leprosy; because of that eternal leprosy which waits for them. How many a deceitful Trader says and swears, with a little inversion of Ananias his lie: I sold it for so much.) It cost me so much, yet not stricken with death temporal, because he is reserved to death eternal. Are not any monopolists amongst us, as bad as these Philippians, that got a patent of the very devil? It is plain that they did monopolize the Damsel, and the Damsel did monopoliz'd the devil. Satan was wont to be a spirit latent; now he durst be spirit Patent: it is time that this Patent-devil were cast out.

But there is a reservation of all to judgment: Mercy now stretcheth out her wings like a hen; then Justice shall stretch out her wings like an eagle. God's hands come now so fraught with mercies, that judgment hath no room to be grasped in them. But shall wicked men live, sin, die, and there an end? No, the Lord hath ordained the contrary. Heb. 3.18. He swears that unbelievers shall not enter into his rest. An oath among men is the end of all strife; and shall not faith be given to God when he swears? The less evil they feel, the more let them fear. If mercy allows a toleration, Justice hath a reservation; there will come a day of reckoning.

2 To omit the demonstration of the prognostic symptoms, forerunning his judgment. That same trumpet of war in every corner, the divulcation of the Gospel; not only by the Antichristian Seminaries, who at once have named it and shamed it: the revelation of Antichrist, whereof all Christendom is a bleeding witness: the incorrigibility of sin, that it is even dangerous to be good; and Gods reproofs do not weaken, yea scarce weaken sinners. The general decay of nature assure us this Judicial conclusion of the world. That which David said should not be, now is: the world is waxed old like a garment: so old that most men are turned patchers, spending their times and studies to patch it. The lawyer talks of a tenure called a perpetuity, that's his patch. The Usurper thinks to amplify his dominions by fire and sword, that's his patch. One says the world is naught, yet he aspires to be a great man in it, that's his patch. The covetous says, it is but ransome and short, yet he hoordes as if it were everlasting, that's his patch. Another would dip it in new colors, make us believe it is an honest world; this is like painting, of an old, wither'd, and worm eaten face. Some as old as this garment is, would still bestow lac and gardes upon it, as if they meant to make it a fools coat these are the proud and haughty, who only seem to effect new clothes, and new fashions; yet love the world that is so old a garment, and quite out of fashion.

If we see a man whose eyes grow dim, his ears deaf, his face furrowed, his hairs white, his legs doubling under him; we say, his living date is almost expired. Such a dotage doth the world labor of, yet men covet as if there were a thousand generations to provide for. As a man that is dying, hath many fantasies: so the declining world is troubled with many delirements and errors. In a surfeited body the corruption labors downwards, to the feet, and makes an issue there: so the putrefaction and turpitude of all times is sunk down to this latter age; and one extremity answers another. Faith is rare, though there be many Christians: and charity so cold, as if a continual February of in-devotion had frozen it. There was lately a great frost, and we called it a hard time: the rivers were crusted, the ••ming earth obstructed, and the conveyances of water locked up: yet it is tha••d and dissolved by the imperious and friendly Sun. But there is still a spiritual fro••, a hardness of man's hearts, that extinguisheth the heat of zeal, the warmth of charity, the spark of faith. ⁹ Out of whose womb came the Ice? And the hoary f•• of heaven, who hath gendred it? out of whose womb comes this sinful Ice, but the devils? It is not a frost of heaven, but the hoary frost of hell. The fruits of pie•y are withered, the springs of grace dried up, and the waters of charity that should make glad our city of God, are congealed to covetousness. Who can loose these ⟨◇⟩ of Orion? The Son of grace shineth, yet this frost melts not: it is reserved unto judgment, to be melted with the fire of hell.

Thus truly is the world grown an old man. 1. It stoops like an old man, as ⟨◇⟩ the head were too heavy for the shoulders; sinks downward with ponderous cares. 2. It is full of raw humors like an old man; the stomach is so opppre•• with crude and unwholesome vanities, that it is mortally feverish. 3 It is cold like a• old man; that the blood cannot be warmed, no heat of zeal can be got into it. 4. ••testy like an old man, weary of his own desires, angry at the doing of that he commands to be done: desires, obtains, and then despises; nothing can please him. 5. Piddling with the fingers like an old man; scratching all together into heaps it defiance of any future dissipation. 6. It hath lost all the senses like an old man: ⟨◇⟩ ears so deaf that he cannot hear the Gospel, his eyes so blind that he cannot ⟨◇⟩ the evil of his sins, his tongue so faltering that he cannot utter his prayers, ⟨◇⟩ feet so lame that he halts with his best friend: even ready to close up his lights, the Sun and Moon, be put out: the great spiritual Court is breaking up, all offices discharged; and he that takes their accounts, ready to appear in the clouds, the Judge of all, Jesus Christ. We see the necessity of this general Judgment: ⟨◇⟩ is necessary for the Justice of God, necessary for the good of man, necessary for the glory of him that is both God and man.

The Severity of it follows; it is such a Judgment, as shall leave nothing unexamined, uncensured. He that was Salvator verus will be Iudex severus. Iudex •••olis, Deus universi. There are many gods, many kings, many priests, innumerable men. Now he that is God shall judge all those gods: he that is King, shall judge all these kings: he that is Priest, shall judge all those priests: he that is man, shall judge all men. The Apostle Jude calls it the great day; Great, for there shall be. 1. A great congregation, never did so many meet together before, never shall after. All shall be summo•ed, and all must appear; though they were resolved into dust many thousand years before; and this citation shall be made by the sound of a Trumpet. 2. A great e••mination; when not only visible and actual works shall be revealed; but even ⟨◇⟩ most secret thoughts, reserved intentions, and scarce borne conceptions. Nothing is so hid, Vt Iudicis vel lateat scientiam, vel effugiat sententiam; that it can be kep• from his sapience, or escape his sentence. 3. A great Iudication, giving sentence ⟨◇⟩ absolution unto the faithful; and sentence of condemnation upon the wicked. And •is shall be done suddenly: no Subpoena's to fetch in witnesses, they are all ready: no •peal, for there's no higher court: no tedious pleading, for then all sinners are •rucke dumb: no demure, for the Judge is perfect in the Law, it was of his own •aking: no writ of error, for he must needs Judge wisely and truly, that is wise•ome and truth it self: no reprieve, for their is no hope of pardon: no Psalm of •ercie; that day is past, this is the time of Justice. 4. A great retribution, every •an shall receive his reward according to his work: to the godly there is the free •ward of life and glory, to the ungodly deserved death and torment. This king •th treasure enough for all; not one of the faithful shall want mercy, not one re•obate shall scape without penalty. Great was the lamentation of the drowning •gyptians, and no less the rejoicing of Israel safe on the shore: but O the unspeak•le joy with the sheep of CHRIST'S right hand, and the unventable sorrow 〈◇〉 the goats on his left? When both the songs of good men and Angels, and the •ies of bad men and devils, shall echo to the glory of one most holy God.

A great resignation, when CHRIST shall deliver up the kingdom to God •e Father; and cease to reign, not as God, for so he is equal with the Father, but 〈◇〉 mediator. For then all his redeemed ones are embraced with the everlasting •mes of blessedness: and for the rest he shall never make intercession, for they had •ver part in his redemption. Up go the Saints and Angels in their eternal Choir, own sink the reprobates and devils to their eternal fire, where the one shall live •ging, and the other live burning, so long as there is a God in heaven.

Thus Power had her day in creation, Providence hath her day in Preservation, •ercie had her day in redemption, and Justice must have her day in retribution. That ••at Son of righteousness appeareth in four signs of his Zodiac. In his •onception he came through Virgo, he was borne of a Virgin. In his Birth, through •emini; two natures being united in one Person. In his Resurrection he was found 〈◇〉 Leo, triumphing like a victorious Lion over all his enemies. When he comes to udgement, he shall appear in Libra the Balance; justly waighing out to every man •portion of reward, according to the proportion of his work. This is his second •omming; the first was of Grace, this is of Justice. The first was to propiciate, not 〈◇〉 judge. John. 3.17. God sent not his Son to condemn the world but to save it. The •cond shall be to judge, not to propiciate. John. 5.22. The Father judgeth no man, •t hath committed all judgment unto the Son. In the first he came a Physician to •ale, in the next an Avenger to punish that would not be healed. Then a Lamb to •ffer, now a lion to triumph and conquer. His first coming was soft, as the dew •on the mown grass: his second shall be terrible, in lightning and fire.

Seeing there must be a Judgment, and we must all be judged, let us prepare our •ules for a good answer. CHRIST bad his Disciples, when they were brought •efore men's Judgment seats, to study no answer: but let everyone study an an•were before he comes to this Judgment seat. Yet alas, what answer can be made? If God contend with us, we cannot answer him one of a thousand. Quae verba •alent contra verbum? CHRIST'S word must stand. Job 31.14. What shall I do •hen God riseth up? and when he visiteth, what shall I answer him? If great men ho•ur themselves more than God, Quid facient, what shall they do? If covetous •en love money more than Christ, what shall they do? If men have robbed the •ord of his Patrimony, what shall they do? Here is a Quid facient for all. Men •ve now their colors, reasons, pretences, and qualifications; but then what shall they answer? The wicked shall plead to Christ; we are the work of thy hands; but he will reply, you have lost my Image and superscription. But Lord, remember thy Passion; Yes, but this is no time of compassion. The sentence is terrible. Matth. 25.41. Depart ye cursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his Angels. When they shall cry; Lord, though we may not ascend with thee unto glory, yet let us abide still on the earth, statu quo prius; nay go, Depart. If we must go, let it not yet be far, not out of thy sight and gracious presence; nay depart from me. If we must go, and go from thee, yet let us have a blessing with us: nay, depart ye cursed. If we must go, and from thee, and with a curse, yet somewhat qualify thy anger, and let our curse be but easy: nay, depart ye cursed into Fire. If we must depart from thee, cursed, and into fire; yet let not that fire burn long suffer it to be soon extinguished; nay, but go into Everlasting fire. If there be a remedy, but we must go from thee the God of glory, and with a Curse, the character of infelicity: and into fire, torment in extremity: and that everlasting, without hope of recovery: yet let us have some pleasant and loving company; nay, the very devil and his Angels. A heavy doom, which if we desire to evade, let us stand before the day of trial make sure the Judge: if we can get him our friend, we shall speed well in the Judgment.

VER. 5. And spared not the old world, but saved Noah the eighth person, a Preacher of righteousness; bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly.

This is the Apostles second exemplary argument against the indemnity of his first instance was, how it sped in heaven; now he expresseth the mischief it did upon earth: after the expulsion of Angels, the submersion of terrestrial creatures. The first Judgment took hold on altitude, this prevails against multitude: for sublimity, they were Angels: for universalitie, this is a whole world There God used his own immediate power, in the dejection of those revolting spirits: here is the same offended power working by a mediate instrument. The Angels were above the elements, therefore no element was exercised in their punishment: here is element against element, water against earth: that man, who was composed of elements, and by elements preserved, might also by elements be destroyed. When man forsakes his own end, which is to glorify his Maker: the creatures also forsake their (less principal) end, which is to serve man their master The Elements rebel against man, when man rebels against God: becoming a traitor to his Creator, they owe him no more service: but instead of serving him, they serve God against him.

Deepe calleth unto deep at the noise of the water-spouts: Psal. 42.7. the deluge of sins called for a deluge of waters: deep iniquity, for deep calamity. The world was grown so fowl, that God saw it was high time to wash it: yea so was the cleanness died in grain, that when the polluters were washed away, the pollutants stuck on still: as the plague cleaves to the house, even when the infector of it is dead. And as a sordid cloth lies long a soaking before it be cleansed: so deeply had impiety tied itself into the earth, that God saw it meet to steep it long under the waters; even an hundred and fifty days, Gen. 7.

God's blessing did not more multiply, than Satan's curse: there came a Crescens & multiplicamini from them both. God spake it to his creatures, men: Satan to his creatures, men's sins. Mankind began but with one: yet he that saw the first man lived to see the earth peopled with a world of men. Men grew not half so fast as sins; As they were increased, so they sinned against me, Hos 4.7. One man could not multiply a thousand sins, never man had so many children. So that still the number of transgressions exceeded the number of persons: when the earth was scarce sprinkled with men, the whole world was filled with sins. So that the top of the conspiracy bore up to heaven, and carried ill news to the Maker of all. Whereat offended, he sent down a watery messenger of destruction: which as it came from heaven, so swelled up back again to heaven; with tidings, that God's justice was now glorified on them, whose mercy would not be glorified by them. The corruption of the world is not less now, yea more: it is past all purging by water, therefore hath God reserved it to fire. Only as the Ark did save Noah in the day of water, so Christ will preserve us in the day of fire.

And spared not the old world, &c.] Here is a double act; of Justice, of Mercy; that of Justice on a whole world, the other of Mercy upon eight persons. It is of poena, Poena paucorum, terror omnium; God doth strike few, to save many: here he strikes many and saves few. His judgments are sometimes particular, that his mercy may be general: here his judgments are general, and his Mercy particular. So the whole may be distinguished into the

- Vengeance; Spared not the old world.
- Deliverance, Saved Noah the eight person,

In the vengeance or execution of wrath consider, the - Matter passive, Sinful world.

- Instrument executive, The Flood.

The subject suffering is described, by the

- Universality, the whole World.
- Antiquity, the Old World.
- Impiety, the Ungodly World.

For the penal instrument let us meditate;

- 1. Whence it proceeded.
- 2. How far it prevailed.
- 3. How long it continued.

In the deliverance are two special things, the

- Manner implied, by the Ark.

- Number expressed, Eight Persons.

Thus are our meditations fetched a great way backward, that our souls may 〈◇〉 set somewhat further forward: let us consider the old world, that we may be the better for it in the new. History is delightful to all, and gives us means 〈◇〉 travel former times: that we may in some sort know what is done before us, though we cannot see what shall be done after us. In all this plentiful discourse, our good apprehension must be my best persuasion; your capacity, my oratory. cure we ourselves first in the Ark, and then launch into this Ocean of water: the spirit of God direct us in our voyage, and bring our souls to the haven of eternal peace.

To begin with the vengeance, God was angry with the whole world because sin: neither was this a slight or easy wrath; but a fire long a kindling. It repents me that I made man: here is a displeasure indeed, when the Lord shall repent 〈◇〉 own work. The wrath of God came upon them to the uttermost. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, that is, as one consumes either totally or finally. The wrath of God is either in reprobation or execution. In resolution, it is either suppressed in his bosom, or expressed in his threatening. In execution, it is either temporal in body, or spiritual soule: as Peter said; Behold two swords, or rather one sword with two edges. This 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 The wrath: God hath armies of afflictions, but if the wicked scape them all, 〈◇〉 same Great wrath will surprise them. Neither must we think here God subject to passions: what be affections in us, are perfections in him. But lippientibus etiam singularis lucerna numerosa est: to the pur-blind one candle seems many. As God is said to have an arm, because the arm is the instrument of our power: 〈◇〉 eye, because he discerns all things: a foot because he is present everywhere, &c. And that he will preserve unharmed, is called the Apple of his eye. His essential substance is called his Soul. Am. 6.8. Benephesho, by his life, or soul, that's by himself. And Psal. 11.5. Wicked men his soul hateth. Thus he is said to be angry, and to repent. But as man repents by retracting his purpose, so God by changing his sentence. When GOD is said to alter his will, that he becomes offended with the man, with whom he was formerly pleased. Ille potius quam ipse mutatur: the man is changed not the Lord. He repents not as man does, for he cannot debase and err as man does. He is not angry, but all his actions proceed from a perfect love of virtue, and hate of vice. We cannot properly Grieve the Spirit, nor Censure Christ: but our sins do all that is possible to it; and so much as in us 〈◇〉, we bring melancholy into heaven, that Court of joy. If the King lose a subject 〈◇〉 is so much the weaker: take a drop from the Ocean it hath the less: but what the loss of thee or thy harlot to God; he is never the poorer nor are they more. But when he repents of all the generation of men, this shows sin to be exceedingly heinous. In a word, man's is a passive repentance; God's is an operative repentance. Let this teach us.

1. To glorify God, lest he repent that he made us. I am fearfully and wonderfully made; (all God's works are admirable, man wonderfully wonderful) Marvelous are thy works, and that my soul knoweth right well. What infers he of 〈◇〉 this? Therefore I will praise thee. If we will not praise him that made us, will 〈◇〉 not repent that he made us? Oh that we knew what the Saints do in heaven, 〈◇〉 how the sweetness of that doth swallow up all earthly pleasures: they sing hallelujah and glory to the Lord: why? Because he hath created all things. When we behold 〈◇〉 › exquisite piece of work; we presently enquire after him that made it, purposely ‹› commend his skill: and there is no greater disgrace to an artist, than having perfected a famous work, to find it neglected, no man minding it, or so much as casti• an eye upon it. All the works of God are considerable, and man is bound to th• contemplation. Psal. 8.3 When I consider the heavens, &c. I say, What is man? ‹› admires the heavens, but his admiration reflects upon man; Quis homo? There ‹› no workman, but would have his instruments used, and used to that purpose i• which they were made. The Cutler hath made thee a knife; to cut thy own me•, not thy neighbors throat. If thou like the envious man will keep• thy ‹› › in thy hand, and swallow thy meat whole: or like the fool, cut another's me• and thy own fingers: this is to abuse that instrument, and pervert the end ‹› which it was framed. Man is set like a little world in the midst of the great ‹› glorify God; this is the scope and end of his Creation. If he shall apply hims•• to proud desires, base designs, covetous courses; here God's meaning is mis-•derstood, his work mis-applied. He is created for the service of God, if he ca•not be wrought and brought to that, he shall be beaten in pieces. As the Po•• turns and works a piece of clay; frames it for such a vessel; it will not do; ‹› tries to make another fashion of it, yet it fadgeth not: till at last, after many ‹› trials, he dasheth it against the walls. God's spirit will not always strive with ‹› world, more than it did with that: but if we still strive against him, let us see wh• the end shall have the worst of it. Ariosto going through the streets, and he••• ‹› Potter basely sing his odes; took a cudgell and broke his pots; answering ‹› complaint: Thou hast mar'd my verses, and I have mar'd thy vessels. If ‹› abuse God's creatures, he will spoil our pleasures.

2 Let us repent of our sinning, lest God repent of our making. O that for ‹› of a little sorrow, we should hazard the loss of such a joy, as the delight of our C•ator. When we sin, we give him cause to grieve at our doing, but while we c•tinue impenitent, we give him cause to grieve at our being. Shall our Maker rep•we are, and we not repent that we are so evil? Did he not make us of •hing? and is he not able to reduce us to nothing, to worse than nothing; yet do we provoke him, and put him to it by our rebellions? Repentance is a •ee of continual use, because sin is a thing of continual practice. It is better •ng to the house of mourning, than of mirth; saith Solomon; more expedient for ‹› souls health: through his own experience, he taught us this expedience. In •e we patch our clothes, in repentance we rend them in pieces. It unmakes a •n that which sin made him; whereas impenitence keeps him forever the same. •ey that lived unconverted sinners on earth, remain the same in hell. All that •e before me are thieves and robbers: in congruity of speech he should have said, •e thieves; yes, not only were, but Are so still. Saul is still a homicide, you can• say so of David, that he is still an adulterer; because he repented, and by that ‹› tenewed.

Our repentance is said Pacare Deum, to appease God: now appeasing presuppo• anger, and God's anger is twofold; Iudicis & Patris. As he is a Judge, offen• with his enemies, and this wrath is only appeased by Christ. As he is a Father, ‹› so our repentance may please him in Christ: not Ration subjecti, in respect of selves; but Ration Principij, God's Spirit. Thus our repentance through Christ ‹› pacify his paternal wrath. This is an excellent remedy, but not so easy: the •g of Nineveh and his people put on sackcloth, and fasted: yet but, Who can tell•ether the Lord will turn to mercy: we are not sure of it, it may be so, but Who •tell. Though the Jews rent their hearts, yet it is but Quis novit, Who knoweth•ether God will return? Though they gnaw their tongues for pains, yet they •nt not of their deeds: so hard a task is repentance.

Neither is repentance without amendment, anymore than continual pumping •hout mending the leak. The bird fighting with the serpent, ever anon flew to •erbe, which was her medicine, and cured her of the poison: but at last, the herb •ng wasted, the bird died. Repentance is that herb, which while opportunity •s, will help the poison of sin: but that once gone, and it will not be ever pre• to presumptuous sinners, what remanies but perishing. The medicine is made ⟨◇⟩ the wound, not the wound for the medicine. The argument of our liberty is •entance: the bonds of servitude are broken with a broken heart Auditúrne vox •uris, Is the mourning voice of that Dove, the Holy Ghost, heard in thy bosom? •mosthenes would not plead for his client, till he cried to him; and then answered ⟨◇⟩ sorrow, now I feel thy cause: let our penitent contrition cry unto Christ, and •n he will plead for us.

God spared not the old world. Thus in general, now more specially to the parts. •ld hath diverse significations: it is taken. 1 For this whole visible engine, the •icke of all things contained under heaven and earth. 2 For the vicious and •enable condition of it, contracted by sin, and inherent in all things. 3 For the •lest and most excellent part of it, man and thus sometimes only for the Saints; •d was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself. Commonly for the wicked, ⟨◇⟩ whole world lies in wickedness. So the world is opposed generally, vel numero •atorum, vel numero electorum. The first circumstance we light upon, is the uni•ality of this destruction, which seizeth on a whole world. Wherein the answer •hree questions may satisfy us.

Why the creatures were punished with man's ruin, that were not guilty of •s sin. This was just with God. 1 Because they were all made for man's use, ⟨◇⟩ therefore man suffers in their loss. Terra propter hominem producta, terra propter •inem maledicta. As a foul traitor being executed, hath his house fired, his very •d harrowed with brambles, and sown with stones. 2 Seeing they were made ⟨◇⟩ man's use, he being taken away, they were of no further use. The general being •ne, the army perisheth: the head being cut off, the members die. 3 Such was ⟨◇⟩ greatness of sin, that it brought destruction, not only upon the sinner, but on all that belonged to him. 4 Because brutish men had abused the creatures by t••• filthy riot and excess; therefore God saw it just to punish the Instrument wit••• principal: so that there is not a Creature, which is not Subject to some vanity. ⟨◇⟩ that requites his Princes favors with treason, not only suffers in his own pers•• but everything about him feels the smart. His followers are suspected, his ⟨◇⟩ •rits disgraced, his children disinherited, his friends discomforted, his house ⟨◇⟩ all things droope with him, his gardens are over-run with weeds, his orchy•• lie uncouth, man and beast is made sensible of his judgment. Adam, that was ⟨◇⟩ holding to God for his very self, apostating into treason; his house grew out of ••shion to him, his pleasures were turned to thorns, the arms of his nob•• were defaced: and he that was made a Master of living bodies, breaking his alliance with God, became despised of his own servants: some of them shaking of yoke of our government, when we shook off our makers. Especially the greatest, the smallest of them: the greatest, as Lions, Tigers, Panthers, are hardly but the least, as bees and gnats, not at all. In a general destruction when the enemies triumphs, not only men, women and children lose their lives: but the houses fired, the trees cut down, the walls rased, the horses slain in fight, the cattle in the stalls: as Saul had his charge for Amalek; Spare neither man nor beast. there not rots of cattle, and murraines of beasts, so well as mortalities of man. In a spoiling war or plague, who remains to fill the empty cribbe or manger. Do they not suffer with their Masters? Do not the very beasts of the rich fate better for the prosperity of their owners: whereas the poor man's cattle partake the poor man's want?

I do not think that all manner of creatures perished in the waters; for be them preserved in the Ark the fish escaped, Gen. 7.22. The Rabbins conceive that the fish also perished, growing hot in the flood, as in a caldron; but Moses confines this destruction to things on the dry land. The fishes were spared. Man not so abused them, as the other kinds: and herein our sinfulness exceeds theirs; not only the delicacies of the land, but neither can the rarities of the sea satisfy riot. They were then more separate from man's sin, therefore from his punishment. But in the fiery deluge, to show that even thither our excess hath reached, the fishes shall not escape. 2 They lived in that element wherewith God purposed overthrow the world: so that the same thing that was ordained in ruin among them, was to them in tutelam, rather for preservation. 3 They were not makers of the earth, now the earth was cursed, not the sea: because Adam did unlawfully eat the fruit of the earth, not of the sea. 4 Such was the good pleasure of God that among other creatures he would then spare the fishes: then I say, for at times he hath both threatened and destroyed them also; he slew their fish.

Further from the number of those preserved in the Ark, divines have probably exempted. 1 those Amphibia, creatures that live as well in the water, as on Land; as otters, sea-wolves, water-serpents, and water-fowls. 2 Such as come by corruption, and do not breed by generation; as worms of dung, moths of spoiled herbs &c. 3 Such as are of a mixed kind, engendered by male & female of diverse kinds; as the Mule cometh of the Horse and Ass: these needed not come in the Ark, Sed parents eorum ibi fuisse sufficit; it was enough that the breeders of them were there. Some of the Rabbins have conceived, that the seeds of herbs and plants were kept in the Ark; but they might by God's providence grow in the waters; as did the Olive which the dove found at the sinking of the Ark. Yea some of them more ridiculously, amongst the living things preserved, thrust in the spirits of the air to the Ark. But neither are they male and female nor subject to the submersion of waters; and it were better for man to have such kind destroyed than conserved. For the Phenix, amongst many ambiguities yield to their persuasion, who think there is none; and that by the disagreement of her most justifying reporters. For her country, some make her of Ar...others of India. For her life, some five hundred years, others six hundred sixty. •r her death some say she sings and dyes; other, that motu alarm, with the mo•n of her wings she sets her nest afire. Pliny, and Pompon. Mela write, that of her •es comes a worm, and of the worm another Phenix: which takes the bones of •e old Phenix with her nest, and carries it to Heliopolis, the City of the Sun in •gypt; there laying it on the altar, and solemnizing the Funeral. But who would •t smile at the non-sense of this fixion? For if the Phenix be burnt to ashes, where ⟨◇⟩ her bones left for this transportation? But on, say they; and what creature is •thout sex, among Beasts, Fishes, or Foules? God's (Increase and multiply) had ⟨◇⟩ a vain and superfluous charge to her. If there were but one before, then cer•nly that perished in the Flood; for none were preserved in the Ark but by paires •d couples. So that if formerly but one, now consequently there is none. The •ing of S. Ambrose is objected: Phoenix cum mortua sit, reviviscit: solos non cre•us homines resuscitari. We answer, he doth not deliver his opinion, that the •enix being dead reviveth: but Ex concessis, by that which the heathen affirmed, ⟨◇⟩ of their own grounds, he proves the Resurrection which they denied. Let not •s first question pass without a double meditation.

It instructs our understanding what the horror of sin is, whose contagion hath in•ted all the creatures that belong to us. Cursed be the earth for thy sake: the earth •u treadest on, the earth meriting no curse, the earth made before thee, made for •e, and thou made of it; cursed be this earth for thy sake. Quid meruistis oves, what •e the poor creatures done? We are not content with their rule, without their •ne: though they be ad usum & esum nostrum; yet we tyrannize over them, and ⟨◇⟩ scarce satisfied with their spoil. O that the guilty should thus dare to domi•re over the innocent; and hold himself more absolute lord over his beast, than ⟨◇⟩ thinks God over himself! He that shows no mercy to his beast, (which yet •not his creature, but bought with his money) teacheth God how to deal with ⟨◇⟩, who is his creature, and bought with his Sons blood. The Prophets, when ⟨◇⟩ Lord hath been angry, and the plague heavy, and no excuse for the people's •quity; not knowing what to say for themselves, ashamed in their own name to •ve pardon: have put him in mind of the brute creatures. How do the beasts groan, ⟨◇⟩. Not that God is more respective of beasts, than of men; Hath God care of Ox• But when men become bruiteer than beasts, God will pity beasts sooner than •n. The penitent Ninevites imposed a fast upon their very flocks and herds with •mselves. Hath God care of beasts, or have beasts care of God? Are they not •hout religion, yea, without reason? O pardon repentance, a greater absurdity •n this! It was a glass to reflect their own estate: the bellowing of half fami•d cattle, puts them in mind how themselves ought to be starved. Such an use •s of the Levitical Sacrifices: to see them slain, their blood exhausted, their flesh •nt to ashes; might well strike them at heart with the survey of their own de•rits. It teacheth the young Lion obedience; when he sees the dog whom he loves ⟨◇⟩ plays withal, cudgell'd before him. When the Princes garment is beaten, he •ne conceives himself blame-worthy by that representation. The moan and •ery of the dumb thing schools us, as stripes on our garments, to tell us we have •ts in that bargain. That which wants reason is punished: that we who have rea• might be humbled. Bestialior quàm ipsa bestia est homo ration vicens, & non rati• vivens. We are little better than beasts, if we find no other use of beasts, than serve our own riot: they may teach us as well as serve us: the looking-glass an insensible thing, yet it reflects to a man his own form. This is the first lesson.

It also informs us to moderate our affections, and not to surfeit on this world which we have made so corrupt by our sins. What creature is there, on which our vanity hath not stuck some blemish? what do we use, whereon we read not even the characters of our own obliquities? Our apparel is but the cover of our shame: by our bravest accoutrements, we may take measure of our delinquencies. Adam was more glorious without raiment, than all his posterity can be: neither can the glory we seek in our clothing, conceal or countervail the iniquity that came by our sinning. For our meat, is not our life maintained by the death of other creatures? Our preservation, by their destruction: sin brought necessity; without that no creature should have lost his life to become our food. This was not from the Creation, creatures were not made to this end. Innocent would have preserved all to a higher and more excellent use. We should have meat far sweeter; and such as should have cost no creature the life. Let my heart thus meditate; this creature dieth not for itself, but for me; not for its own food but mine: if I had my desert, I should rather die than it. Do we not read, our vomiting and sordid lusts in the infected air? Our blasphemies in the blemished Moon, Glimmering Stars, and blushing Sun? Our oppressions in the harrowed and woe-filled earth? Our impieties in the groaning of all creatures? If a rich man should heap all his wealth together, and then set his house on fire; hath he cause of joy? see this? There is an ataxie and disorder in all the world wrought by our sins: trees must fall under the wounding axe, the bowels of the earth be rent, to build a dwelling; and shall not this move us? Can we glory in our shame? with that insulting Monarch, This is my Babel. We had a better mansion, once, without the violence of this; Paradise. Thus as he that rifled the poor scholar, robbed ten men once: he having borrowed of one his horse, of another his spurs, &c. when Esops jay was stripped of her brave plumes, there were twenty birds undone, which had lent her their feathers. So when death deprives man of his life, he finds many creatures to have spent their bloods and beings towards his maintenance. Our comfort be it, that our Patent is renewed in Christ; the second Adam regretting the former had lost. And he that was content to become a creature, and to proffer his blood to us; thinks now no creature too dear for us. For his sake they our servants, let us become his servants: to us the use, to him the thanks and glory forever.

[Quest.] In the next place we are to examine, whether no other creatures escaped the deluge, besides the fore-expected. The waters prevailed, until all the high hills that were under the whole heaven were covered. Yes, saith Cajetan, those under the airy heaven; nay, saith Moses, under the whole heaven. Some have wrangled about the mountains: as Athos in Macidonea, so high, that it casteth the shadow to Myriophyton town in Lemnos, eighty six miles off. Atlas is said to have a top higher than the clouds: and Tabor, to rise up thirty furlongs: Caucasus to be lightened with the Sun above, when daylight is shut in below. But Moses affirms expressly, that these high mountains were surmounted, and covered by the waters. Cajetan excepts the mountain of Paradise from this inundation: but where doth he find $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Paradise was situate on a mountain? Out of Eden went a River to water the G••den; but Rivers do not use to run upon hills. His vain fear was, lest then E•• should have been drowned in the flood, whom he supposeth to be in Paradise. $\langle \diamond \rangle$ indeed Enoch was taken up into heaven, a higher Paradise; where no flood $\langle \diamond \rangle$ reach him.

Bellarmino thinks that all the mountains were not over flowen, but only $\langle \diamond \rangle$ where the wicked dwelt. And Josephus reports a hill in Armenia, where all $\langle \diamond \rangle$ fled thither for succor, were saved from the deluge. But what speak we of f••tasticall dreams, against evident scriptures? Thus the Hebrews fable, that Og $\langle \diamond \rangle$ King of Bashan, who lived till Moses his time, was one of those Giants before $\langle \diamond \rangle$ flood. When I read in Pliny of a Giants body found in Crete, forty six Cub•• length; I believe it, as I do the Ballad of Gargantua. The waters being fif•• Cubites above the greatest mountains, those Giants must needs be of incre•• height, that escaped.

But then say they, the flood seemed to ascend unto the middle region of $\langle \diamond \rangle$ a•re: for it was so many cubits higher than the mountains, and some mountain tops •scend to the middle region, yea above the clouds. As Olympus, which Zinagoras by •athematicall instruments found to be ten stadia high: insomuch that the ashes re•aining of the sacrifices, are neither dispersed by the wind, nor dissolved by the •ine. So the waters should seem to rise higher, than the place where the rain is $\langle \diamond \rangle$ gendred. Answ. The report of Olympus is found to be untrue, by the testimony •f Philadelphius, who went up the hill on purpose to make experiment. Besides, no •ill is above four miles in height: and the middle region is at least 50 miles from ••e earth. Again, diverse inhabited those places, who are said to live half as long •gain as other men. This shown it to be a wholesome scite for air, which could •ot be the middle region, full of clouds and foggy mists.

The Conclusion then goes strong for the universality: a whole world perished, ••ve only what the Ark preserved. The day of vengeance is come, the guests are ••stred their wodden castle, the door of the Ark shut, and the windows of heaven •pened. Now those deriders, seeing the violence of the waters; some rising up, ••her coming down, both joining their forces to drown the earth: come wa••ng middle-deep; and bitterly crying out for safety in that vessel floating, which ••ey had flowted in making. But now they are justly rejected, and find no room in •ods mercy, whose word could find no room in their hearts. Others hope to ••x-run the destruction; and being clambred up to the tops of the highest mountains, ••ey look down upon the waters with some transient flattery of hope. Still the •aters rise, and their hills appear to them like floating Islands: they give many a ••oke when the heavens will clear up; and those bottles of rain be exhausted. O •ow would one hours Sun-shine have cheered their hearts! And yet suppose it •old cease spouting down, where was the provision which should keep life and ••ule together; till the channels of the sea, veins and hollow ventricles of the earth, •old suck up that inundation? The beasts & fowls hovering in those mountains, •ere rather ready to prey upon their carcasses, than become their food: hunger will •ache those devourers of men, which before yielded to be devoured by men. There •ere Wolves howling, Dogs barking, Lions roaring, Owls screeching, Cranes •attering, Serpents hissing; men, women, children crying; all in one forlorn place.

Still their death comes nearer, and overtakes the refuges of their confidence. •hen from the drowning hills they clime up to the highest trees, and there with ••lenesse and horror behold their threatening death which they would strive to avoid, ••d know they cannot. From the tops of all they descry afar off the Ark floating <◇> the waves: and now look on that with envy, which they formerly beheld with •orne: cursing their impenitent hearts, which God must needs kill ere he could •aken.

But in vain they flee, whom God pursues: there is no mountain so high but <◇> hand can reach it: no depth so low, but his eye sees it, and power rules it. There <◇> no way to scape him, but by coming to him. Fugimus à manu vindictae, cùm •urrimus ad manum misericordiae. At last their destruction surpriseth them, poor •iserable creatures, half dead with fear and hunger, and now wholly dead with •ater. Loe here the full conquest of Justice, and the whole world overwhelmed •ith an universal ruin. God hath fetched back again all that life, which he had ••ven to his unworthy creatures: and the world was reduced to that form wherein it ••od in the third day of the Creation; Waters being over the face of the whole earth.

Let this •ontemplation be useful to us: the season of repentance is before ••e beginning of vengeance: but if Judgment be gone out, men cry too late. While ••e Gospel moves us, the doors of the Ark are open: if we now neglect it, we ••y seek it with tears, and not find it. Mercy to impenitence, would be injury <◇> Justice. Let every soul take this very time to redeem the time: for he is so fu••ive, that he will not tarry the pleading of his own cause.

Lastly, we are to examine, [Quest. 3] how in all this the righteousness of God may be justified. What, all the world? might it not have been satisfied with a family, a• the monstrous children of Lamech? Or with a City, as Sodom? Or with a Co••trey, as Canaan? Or with a fourth part of the world, as Europe? but all? Because a man's garden, that hath been fruitful, is ove••n with cankers; will he therefo•• destroy it? Doth not God threaten only the Barren Tree, such a one as cumbers <◇> ground: not the whole vineyard. The husbandman feels not all his green and ••ripe corn, because some weeds are grown up in it: yea Christ himself forbid•• with a Sinite crescere. Nor because a man's servants have abused his house, and le•• sluttishly noisome, will he therefore strait pull it down: but rather see it cle•• and air'd, the rubbish swept out, and the uncleanness washed away. The Lord <◇> no more here; he punisheth the defilers with due destruction, washeth and scour•• this great house of the world, but then lets it stand: he makes it clean, he doth <◇> make it nothing. But to clear this point, two subordinate questions must <◇> scanned.

1 Whether all that were temporally destroyed, also everlastingly perished. <◇> so, then Abraham could object, Far be it from thee to destroy the righteous <◇> the wicked: shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? Shall Infants and innoce•• share in the same confusion with obstinates? 1 Some say, that all were tempor•• punished, that they might be eternally saved: as S^t Jerome of the Sodomites, <...> received in this life their full punishments. But if

Rreprobates might scape thus, 〈◇〉 would not be so full. 2 Some extenuate their sin, as Cajetan; that they were 〈◇〉 wholly void of faith, but believed not Noah in this particular. But it is not safe 〈◇〉 man to extenuate, what the Lord does aggravate: that the whole earth was 〈◇〉 with violence, and all flesh had corrupted his way. They were not only full of incredulity, but foul with all manner of impiety. 3 Others say, that they were condemned to hell, yet redeemed thence by Christ's descension: who went and preached the spirits in prison, which were disobedient in the days of Noah. Thus the Pontifians have conceited, that Plato at Christ's Preaching in hell, believed; and was 〈◇〉 many others, delivered: as the soul of Falconilla, by the prayers of S^t Tecl^e, 〈◇〉 Traians at the intercession of Gregory. But these imaginations cross God's denominations, who hath interposed a great gulf: their worm never dieth, and 〈◇〉 hell there is no redemption. 4 Others, that they were not cast into hell, but many of them into Purgatory, and from thence delivered by Christ's descending. But answer both these errors, so falsely grounded on the Apostles words. 〈◇〉 quickened in spirit, he went &c. Christ's soul could not be said to be quickened, for 〈◇〉 soul never died: therefore by his soul he did not preach either in hell or Purgatory. Christ hath two spirits; one as man, another as God: so the holy Ghost 〈◇〉 called the spirit of Christ. But the spirit here is properly neither of these, but 〈◇〉 Divine power: by which he preached in Noah, in all the Prophets before him, 〈◇〉 the Apostles after him. But if it be not meant of Purgatory, what is then this Prison? Augustine says, this prison was the Body: and the men were called spirits from the better part; men's cujusque, is est quisque: but we seldom find living 〈◇〉 called Spirits. Montanus says, this Prison was the Ark; but then there had been in the prison too few spirits, for in the Ark were but eight. Some will have 〈◇〉 prison to be Ignorance, according to that Prophecy of Christ; that he was 〈◇〉 preach Liberties to the Captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are 〈◇〉 But to those Christ could not be said to preach in spirit, but in Person. Some 〈◇〉 have this prison, the Grave: but then souls should lie in graves by that consequence. Others, to be hell: and that is indeed a prison, without light, without liberty, 〈◇〉 out comfort. Let us keep ourselves free men, and beware of multiplying our delinquencies that we be never cast into this prison. But certainly there is no Preaching in 〈◇〉 because there is no repenting in hell. Shall thy loving kindness be declared in hell 〈◇〉 To conclude, the Scripture never called the receptacle of believing souls a prison to think therefore, that first they were condemned, and afterward redeemed, is a point of contradiction. The same Christ that came in his flesh, and preached the Gospel to the world; came to them in the days of Noah by his Spirit, and in Noah preached repentance to those unbelievers: who because they repented not, but continued in disobedience, are now damned spirits in hell. This I take to be the true sense and orthodox exposition.

Charity may seem to except from everlasting ruin, Innocents and Ignorants. Innocents, as Infants, that were not capable of faith and repentance. Ignorants such 〈◇〉 did not here of the forewarned vengeance. The one could not believe for want 〈◇〉 discretion: the other, not be called unbelievers if they had no premonition: on these our charity hopes there was mercy. In the first judgment, when the Angels shall: in the last judgment, when Christ shall come; only the elect shall be saved, and only the Reprobate condemned. In this middle and intervenient judgment, c soli electi conservantur, nec soli reprobi suffocantur: some were preserved, that were not elected, as Cham, cursed of his father: so we think, some were drowned, which $\langle \diamond \rangle$ were saved. Our probable reasons ten.

1 It is not likely that the whole posterity of Methushalem and Enoch, and of other holy Patriarchs, were condemned: for the Lord hath promised to be good to $\langle \diamond \rangle$ children for their Fathers sakes.

Howsoever they believed not Noah at the first, but thought him a fantastical fellow: yet when they saw the event answering his prediction, and death climbing up to their latest refuges; their souls might be humbled to repentance. Many having learned not godliness in on dais misery, which many years prosperity could not teach them.

• The Apostle resembles Baptism to the Ark but as all dying without Baptism, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ not damned, so neither all that were without the Ark, eternally perished. They might be drowned in the deluge on earth, yet escape the abyss of hell.

4 If God had meant to destroy their souls with the confusion of their bodies, he would not so have lingered the execution. It was Forty days a coming, whereas God could have dispatched it in four hours: that by degrees their hearts might be filled with sorrows, as the earth was soaked with waters.

But if they repented, why is it not recorded in Scripture? So neither is Adams repentance, nor Solomon's: it expressly says they sinned, not expressly they repented: though of their repentance there is no question to be made. But it is concluded to deter us from the like rebellion, lest it become so doubtful of our conversion. But if they did repent, why then were they not saved from the deluge? Because they repented not in time, at Noah's preaching. Repentance is never too late to save the soul, but it may be too late to deliver the body.

Let us repent betimes, before the Judgment come: for if it be once come, we may save our souls, but our bodies must perish. They that were even a kin to Noah, because they repented not at the preaching of Noah, could not be saved with Noah: but losing this opportunity, they too late wish themselves in the Ark: all mercy shall never be denied to true repentance, yet speed well their souls, they must lose their lives. When the Lord strikes a City with his Pestilence, many sinners begin then to relent, and bleed in contrition for their offenses: this shall happily deliver them from hell and the wrath of God: yet this exempts them not from death $\langle \diamond \rangle$ that plague. Men commonly fear God's temporal blows, more than his eternal: yet of both they neglect the antidote and prevention. This will make him like, if not home. A wise man will not be drunk, if only for the head-ache: nor a good man sin, if only to avoid the heart-ache. If we have not repented so early, but $\langle \diamond \rangle$ he will punish us: yet let us not repent so late, but that he may save us.

2 How was this just, to punish the Infants and Innocents for the sins of their parents? Doth not God say, The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father? with not he not make this to the enraged

Prophet, an argument of sparing Nineveh; 〈◇〉 many thousand little ones, That cannot discern between their right hand and ••r left? That cannot speak, cannot help themselves; that stick to their mothers breasts, as apples to the tree; if you pluck them away, they perish. Is this 〈◇〉 babes welcome into the world, the milk to feed them; when they cry, to quiet the• with death? Is this the nursing of their tender and ungrown limbs, to wrap the• up in waves of swaddling clouts, and to rock them asleep with pitilless destruction? Whose ears can endure the lamentable and confused cry of so many infants, 〈◇〉 not cry for company? The Midwives of Egypt had more mercy; Ph•••• daughter was moved to take up weeping Moses. It is the property of a cruel Na••on, Not to show favor to the little ones. When the Prophet foretold Hazael of 〈◇〉 cruelty, in dashing infants against the stones; he asked, if he thought him a D•• so brutish he held such a villain: men have more years and sins, but what 〈◇〉 infants done? The Scripture hath many circumlocutions of their ignorance 〈◇〉 simplicity. God gave a special charge concerning them, in the bloodiest vic••y of war, unless for some nations which he had accursed. Christ took them 〈◇〉 his arms, blessed them, and placed one in the midst; proposing them as pa•• for the imitation of riper years. Whose eyes can behold the shrinking of their 〈◇〉 members at every pull of grief, their limbs sprawling on the ground, their 〈◇〉 scorched with heat, as a scroll of parchment, or sinking on the waters, without per•

Thus justly concerning little ones, doth God expostulate with men, but 〈◇〉 may not thus expostulate with God: for to him alone they are not innocent. Ma• rule is to punish him only that offends; and not to put the children to death for 〈◇〉 fathers. Yet so far as afflictions go untouching life, children oft suffer for th• parents; being deprived of liberty, goods, honors; as in cases of treason. T• Lord threatens to visit the sins of the fathers upon the children, even unto 〈◇〉 fourth generation. So long, that (by the course of nature) their parents may li•• see their wickedness plagued in their posterity: yet if the son repent, the s• God hath promised that he shall scape. And howsoever this judgment be not ••ways verified, yet it is enough to terrify us all. But it never misseth, where the parents sins are become the children's by imitation. They are then called their Fathers sins; because they were by their age the Founders, by their example 〈◇〉 Teachers, and in their own persons the beginners of those sins. As it is come••lie said; We may know what house such come of, by some tricks of their Ancestors.

Jew and Gentile have excepted against the Divine Justice for this. Bio• took on against the gods, that the parents demerits were devolved and translated upo• the progeny: which he scornfully matched, as if a Physician for the fathers 〈◇〉 ease should minister physic to the son. The Jews had such an ungracious proverb; The fathers have eaten a sour grape, and the children's teeth are set on 〈◇〉 But the Lord answers them, Plead with your mother: for the husband may ••fully put away his prostituted wife, and her adulterous brood, because they are 〈◇〉 of his children? All souls are mine, the soul of the father, and the soul of the son mine. If it were as Horace sung to his friend; Delicta majorem immeritus l••: 〈◇〉 who can say, My heart is clean? Is it possible to be borne Morians, and to have ⟨◇⟩ of their tawny and swarthy complexions? Again, is it not just with God to p• our fond indulgence, in the very object of our idolatry? We hope these you• plants shall succor us with their fruits, when we are grown saplesse: but doth a• the staff we so nourish to bear us, become often a cudgell to beat us? Devil•sed the wicked both ways; in their Descent, Let his children be vagabonds, and ⟨◇⟩ their bread in desolate places. In their Ascent, Let the iniquity of his father be ⟨◇⟩ remembrance, and let not the sin of his mother be blotted out. We have seen ⟨◇⟩ blood of the Church exhausted by sacrilegious parents, required at the hands ⟨◇⟩ their posterity with ruin: God so cursing their generations, that we might read ⟨◇⟩ nature and quality of the sin, in the visible characters of the punishments. T• whole world was so foul, that the very fruit of their bodies (without contrac• of actual sins) seemed odious to God: and in his Justice he punished those innoce• babes with a death temporal, whom he might yet deliver from the wrath ⟨◇⟩

But some haply were not so heinous transgressors, but would have belee•d had they been informed; Why should they suffer? They had all sin enough ⟨◇⟩ drown them in one deep, if some found the mercy to save them from the other •epe. God doth not punish many for the sins of some; but all men are sinners. •lthough one be not principal in respect of the fact presently inquired; as David•as in numbering the people: yet none fall but for their own offending. He may be •ccessary in consenting, or concealing: if he be neither principal nor accessory in •at, yet he may be culpable in a thousand others; secret, perhaps to men, but •own to God. The Serpent hath a sting, though he doth not always put it forth: •d man hath malice, though he show it not.

Who then can say, I have paid the things that I never took? Jonah is the of•der, the whole ship is in danger: but he that had not sinned with the Prophet, •d sinned in somewhat else. They had all offended at sundry times, what wrong •t if they were all whipped at once? Here is all the difference; their faults had se•rall places, their punishment shall have but one. All Israel smarts with David, ⟨◇⟩ for David's, but their own disobedience. The Lord need not beat his brains, ⟨◇⟩ break his sleep, to invent an accusation against us. We have no thought, word, •orke, but yields him cause and matter enough. It cannot be denied, but the sins ⟨◇⟩ sever in our conceits, according to the distance of time or place; some of old, •me late; some in one quarter of the world, some in another: these the knowledge ⟨◇⟩ God unites, and views all at once. In France one hath followed incontinence; •ay not that Country-disease overtake him in England for it? A young man is a •uptuous rioter, shall not his old-age rue it? Will any time or place exempt him •m diseases incident to that sin? Thou art the same person still, unless repen•ce have made thee new.

It is true that some are more noxious than others; as Bias said to a savage crew a dangerous storm, when they cried to their gods; Silete, ne vos hâc dii navigare •tiant; Do not speak so loud, lest the gods should hear you. Intimating them wicked, that is, was the hazard of a worse vengeance to have them taken notice ⟨◇⟩ But the best of all have sins enough; and Optimus ill est qui minimis urgetur;•eeves are brought out of divers quarters, have trespassed at sundry times, come•ed several offenses: yet are all imprisoned in one Gaole, punished in one day, •nged upon one and the same tree. A company of men makes a body, and the •ole body is punished for the fault of one member: The tongue talks treason, the •ole man is plagued for it. In felony (which is Contractatio rei alienae invito domi• animo furandi, as the Law defines it) the hand only takes, and bears away: but ⟨◇⟩ feet are clapt in iron, the belly pinched with famine, the bones lie hard, and the •ke is in danger. The eye may before, and a vein pricked in the arm to cure it. •e hoof of the beast is tender and weak; the top of the horn anointed for re•dy. Besides, God hath several intentions in one Judgment. The principal he •gues, the same punishment shall teach a second obedience, try the patience of a ••d, prevent some grievous sin in a fourth, humble another, call home another to •ce and repentance. In all, he judgeth some, bettereth others, honoreth himself, ⟨◇⟩ gets glory to his blessed Name. But to conclude the generality of this ruin.

Universal sin brings universal punishment: Quot in culpa, tot in pana. If all ⟨◇⟩ be corrupted, all flesh must be destroyed. Find me one just man in the City, •h God, and I will spare it. How great had been this mercy, if there had not been •enerall apostasy? Sodom had been spared for ten, Jerusalem for one; and yet he •ght rather have looked for ten in Jerusalem, than for one in Sodom. By swearing, ⟨◇⟩ they break out, till blood toucheth blood: their sins were rounded into a ring, •room for piety to get in amongst them. Therefore the whole land shall mourn, ⟨◇⟩ everyone therein languish: universally wicked, universally punished. If the •d should make such a judicial scrutiny, and strict inquisition for sinners, as le did for true worshippers, who could plead not guilty? Lactantius reports a prophecy of Sibylla; The Fishers hook shall take the Roman Empire. If they mean b• the Empire, all the souls in the Empire; I could wish that Saint Peters ⟨...⟩ caught and brought more to heaven than it hath. But if by Empire they ⟨◇⟩ the imperial dignity, titles, privileges, honors, and royal august•ity; I could ⟨◇⟩ for their own sakes (that now usurp that office) they had caught less tha• ⟨◇⟩ have. For when the Majesty of a Prince came in, the piety of a Priest went ⟨◇⟩. But will you hear the Hook that hath caught them and all; the hook of covetousness, baited with riches. Doubtless there are some elect, otherwise the w•• could not stand: but major pars vincit meliorem, the greater part drowns the be•• part. Is the fear of God amongst men? Who would ask such a question? But if ⟨◇⟩ fear God; we will serve him: if we love him, we will obey him: Now the quest• grows bitterer & bitterer; from wormwood to gall. The devout man is even ••ted out of his holiness, and zeal counted an irregularity. Hypocrisy is the woe••• apparel, malice his diet, pride his wife, greediness his dog: and thus he so••• himself in a willful rebellion. We have all run into a Praemunire against our ⟨◇⟩ Sovereign, and deserve confiscation of all we have, of all we are.

But I am willing to leave this spittle of incurable sinners: for who can en••• to look long upon ulcers? Therefore to touch at Methodum medendi: the way ⟨◇⟩ cure universal wickedness, is by universal repentance. We may perceive ⟨◇⟩ willing God is to save us: for all this while, Dum non cessavimus a scelere, Deus osavit a verbere; We forbore not sinning, yet he forbore plaguing. None can be ⟨◇⟩ bad as God is good. Sin reigning in men is a tyrant, Satan's possessing them, woe•• Christ threw them out both. Man may be will to forgive a mite, the Lord a ⟨◇⟩ on: three hundred pence, and ten thousand talents, are all one to his mercy. Satan hopes well of our sins, but let Christ hope better of our repentance. Tent•• ⟨◇⟩ sustentat iste. Let us all disappoint Satan, and answer the gracious mercy of our Redeemer. He made us in the world, he made us not for the world, but choose us before the world, and came himself into the world, to call us out of the world, that ⟨◇⟩ might not perish with the world, but live after the world, in a blessed and glorious world, his own immortal kingdom in heaven. This for the universality, the ⟨◇⟩ the antiquity of it.

The old World.] Old? It rather seemed to be the young world, and this ⟨◇⟩ old: according to David's prophecy; They shall wax old as doth a garment. A ⟨◇⟩ of twenty is young: he of eighty, old. The world of a thousand years standing ⟨◇⟩ young in respect of the same world grown up to five thousand years. The more time upon the back, the more aged a thing is. That then seemed to be the wo•• infancy, this the veterity: that the non-age, this the dotage. The world then bro•• forth Giants; now in comparison, dwarfes: and it is the youth of a woman, ⟨◇⟩ makes her bear the goodlier children. In age The womb faileth, and brings ⟨◇⟩ of a less statute.

Old is like Ianus, and looks two ways: to the time longe praeteritum, and ⟨◇⟩ futurum; long since passed, and long hence to come. SO Olim among the La•• extends both to past and future times. That which hath been, is called Old; as ⟨◇⟩ old: that which shall be hereafter, is said in older days, Psa. 102. It is used ⟨◇⟩ ways verse 25. Of old thou hast laid the foundation of the earth; where old si••fies a thing done long ago, verse 26. They shall wax old like a garment; ⟨◇⟩ old is a quality hereafter to be fulfilled. If we take the World in respect of the •ter and structure of it; that was the young world, this is the old. If for the ⟨◇⟩ who are daily borne into it, that was the old world, this is the young. This is ⟨◇⟩ clear, as that the child is younger than the father. From those that were in the Ac• is the whole world of men descended: therefore it is so called the Old world. Wh•• gives us three observations.

1 That Antiquity, if found in impiety, is no privilege of impunity. Inde•• arguments of commendation are often derived from ancientness; and men ⟨◇⟩ love the things, wherewith time hath made them long acquainted. It come•endeth Rivers, as in Deborahs song; That ancient River, the River Kishon. It come•endeth Customs; Remove not the ancient landmark, which thy fathers have set. It •ommendeth Friends; Thy own friend and thy fathers friend, forsake not; Forsake ⟨◇⟩ an old friend, for the new is not comparable to him. It commendeth Wine; No man •ving drunk old wine desireth new: for he saith, the old is better. It commendeth an •heritance; The Lord forbid that I should give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee. ⟨◇⟩ commendeth Wisdom; Rehoboam forsook the counsel of the old men, and that •ned to his ruin. Concilia Senum, hastae juvenum. It commendeth Truth, Id ve• quod prius. Seek out the wisdom of the ancient: and Enquire for the old way. ⟨◇⟩ commendeth service in the Field; as Clitus to Alexander; despisest thou the •ouldiers of thy father Philip? Hast thou forgotten, that unless this old Atharius•nd called back the young men refusing to fight, we had yet stuck at Halicarnassus.

Yet if Age be blended with naughtiness, the older the worse. An old Ri• without water quencheth not our thirst. An old Custom without warrant of •odnesse, is as authentical for practice, as an old tottered garment is for handsome•sse, or an old cough for wholesomenesse. An old friend, that hath lost his ho•sty, is worse than an old picture that hath lost the color. Old wine no man come•ends; when it is turned to vinegar; let them take it that like it. An old house is no 〈◇〉 harbor, when it is ready to fall on the inhabitants head. An old man that hath •st his experience, is like a boulder: much good flower hath groan thorough it, but •ere is nothing left in it but branne. Days should speak, and multitude of years •uld teach wisdom, saith Elihu. But geat men are not always wise, neither do the aged •derstand judgment. Gravity should speak first, but if it speak worst, better hold •e peace. Better is a poor and wise child, than an old and foolish King. Who will no •ore be admonished. If an old man speak lies with the same confidence, that known •ths; and so vehemently praise former customs, that are ridiculous; and teach •e younger as scornfully, as he would do a dog to fetch; here age hath lost the •edite. The hoary head is only then A crown of glory, when it is found in the •ay of Righteousness.

Custom is a second nature, an Old habit is not easily forgotten. Natura non •itur repentinas mutationes, say Physicians: nature endures no sudden alterations. •herefore for a man Consenescere cum vitiis, to grow old with his errors, is to be •ad to all virtues. And he will find it as hard to become good, as to reenter the •ombe, and be new borne. And Old Dog bites sore, an Old ulcer is hardly cured, •d an old vice within a degree of impossible to be amended. Age therefore hath no •viledge; look back upon Shiloh saith God. Shilohs antiquity could not coun•ance Shilohs iniquity. Indeed with us, gray hairs require reverence, though •xed with some infirmities; Thou shalt honor the face of the old man, and fear thy •d. And they are wretched days, when Puer tumultuabitur in senem; the child •ll behave himself proudly against the ancient. Yet no wonder, if the children de•e the parents; when the parents despise God. That world might say to the Lord, Esau to Isaac; I am thy first borne. Aetate primus, impietate summus. Like a tree •rew crooked from the first planting, no art could straiten it, therefore the axe •st hew it down. But whether we the younger children, or that world the eldest, 〈◇〉 and Lamech the first borne; all have sinned, and all must have perished, but for 〈◇〉 sufferings of the first begotten of God.

2 In this glass we may behold the state of the world before us. Even the for• times abounded with sins: they had their aberrations and delirements as well •e. It is the fashion of people to admire former days. Laudamus veteres, What •e cause that the former days were better than these? But Solomon taxeth that en•y of folly. Because we feel not our forefathers evils, therefore we think they 〈◇〉 no evils at all The deluge of Popery in this land is still commended by divers •me-affected, Rome-infected spirits. Why? O then men lived neighborly together, without quarrels and suits of contention. Did they so, and is the Gospel the cause why men do not so now? Is it not the Gospel of peace, teaching us to love others as ourselves? Shall men be litigious furies, and lay the fault on God• mercies? Hath the Lord opened our eyes for no other purpose, but to see to sc•• and wound one another? But then were men merry and joviall, and not tro•bled with melancholy cares? If they rejoiced in Dolio, non in Domino, in their riches and not in their graces; it was a mirth for the Devil. If it were in the Lord, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the Gospel sad us? The Statutes of the Lord rejoice the heart. Is any mirth like the meditation of our peace made by Christ? Cannot we answer the join^{••} world (as the grave Musician being called into company, that sang wanton ca^{•••}, and expostulated why he did not bear his part) I am as merry as they that s^{•••} $\langle \diamond \rangle$ is God that puts more gladness in our hearts, than all their abundance can fill $\langle \diamond \rangle$ withal. Shall men bait of their mirth, because God is near them in his favor? Or a man be afraid to walk abroad, because it is fair weather?

Pleasure is not gone, when sin is gone: it is not Isaac which is sacrificed, th[•] is, our Laughter and mirth; but the Ram, that is, the brutishness of it. Yea, [•]there let us count it our chiefest delight, that we have lost our former delight. Because our forefathers sate uncontrollably at the Pot; and had Priests without $\langle \diamond \rangle$ virtue, than to take up differences at the Ale-house; were those the better ti^{••} But then, say they, was more plenty of all things, to demonstrate that God loved $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Corn was cheap, and men were charitable, they kept good houses: and well s^{••} the Religion that made us fare so well. Deo gratias, qui nos satias, &c. As if God had no better blessings in store for us, than Acorns. This was the argument of t[•] apostate Jews, We had plenty of victuals, and were well, when we burnt in^{••••} the Queen of heaven: But since we ceased that sacrifice, we have wanted all things. Part of their reasons strength they fetch from Antiquity, Thus did our Fathers: $\langle \diamond \rangle$ from their own prosperity, Thus sped we. But how easily doth the Prophet $\langle \diamond \rangle$ and dissolve this ridiculous Sophistry! Therefore, for this cause, is your Land a ^{••}lation, and a curse without an inhabitant. Did this bring you a blessing? No, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ a curse and ruin. Our Fathers bestowed their Cakes on the Queen of Hea^{••}, but did not the King of Heaven plague them for it? Say he fed their bodies w^{••} Quails, did he not put leanness into their souls? Shall we call Nabal's Sheep^{••}ring a blessing? All their superstitious peace was no better than the very Revels of Bacchus, and an holy-day to the Devil. Shall we seek Christ no further than amo^{••} the Loaves? JESUS was in the ship, yet Panem non habemus, We h^{•••} bread: JESUS was at the Marriage, yet Vinum non habemus, We want wine. W[•] may want bread and wine, and yet have Christ's company. If food fail, it $\langle \diamond \rangle$ because Manna is to come. If Wine be absent, yet Grace and Salvation is pre[•] If God take away Flesh, and give Manna: deny Sun and Moon, and give H[•]self, he does us no wrong. As the Israelites repined for a King, when the L[•] was their King: so our Ancestors refused Christ for their Head, and chose $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Pope. But God answered, Dedi in furore, I gave them an Head in mine $\langle \diamond \rangle$ He fulfilled on them what was written; this Head took away their fields and v[•]yards, and gave them to his servants, Monks and Friars: he took away the $\langle \diamond \rangle$ of their sheep and seed, and put their goodliest young men to his work; and made t[•] all his Servants: that they were forced to cry out, because of their King which they $\langle \diamond \rangle$ chosen. Such have they found their Romish Heads; that like ill Physicians, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ purged away the good humors, and left the bad behind them.

Loe now the praise of Antiquity, when it hath swarved from the rule of Piety[•] Where is now the validity of that Pontifician argument, concerning the ancien^{••} of their Church? This plea might the Jews still make; We are the sons of [•]ham: but Christ told them of another Father. As much say the Turks, We $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the sons of Abraham by Sara, so called Saracens: but they were none of ⟨◇⟩ sons. It hath been un-answerably proved, that the fundamental Heads of ⟨◇⟩ present Romish faith, had their several births; some two hundred, some four hundred, some eight hundred, some a thousand, some a thousand and four hundred years after Christ. But say they were old; yet wanting the warrant of sacred ruth, they are no better an argument of purity, than the old world was of innocence. Consuetudo longa sine veritate, vetustas erroris est: Truth is not to be rejected, or mere novelty: for old truths may come newly to light, and God is not tied to his times for the gift of illumination. Yet is this the foundation, whereon they rear eight Babel, their Bable; whose top must reach up to the firmament, and command of Earth only, but Heaven it self: and thus they mean Celebrare nomen suum, ne dissipentur: The world was good when God framed it, must it therefore be good when he drowned it? Isaac was strong when he married Rebecca, must he therefore taine the same corporal strength when he blessed Jacob? The Cathedral Church of Saint Paul two hundred years ago, might haply be in good case, may it not therefore now want reparation? The Church of Rome was pure when Paul plan'd it; must it now be so when Antichrist hath corrupted it? Shew us the same integrity that Rome then had, and we are of the same faith that Rome then was. Otherwise, not how old a thing is, but how good it is, should be the enquiry of Christians. The Old man is corrupted and lost; he must become New that will be saved.

3 If that was an Old world, how old is it now? Have not the accession of so many hundred years made it somewhat weaker? Yes, Rerum atque hominum nunc sunt crementa: The world is sick at the heart; not only in some superfluities, as warts and swellings, but in the integral and essential parts. The Air like a prodigious other, produceth strange and abortive births. She was lately delivered of a burning child, a portentfull Comet: which divers have took the altitude of, but God only knows what it meant. The Springs, instead of nourishing the young Plants, ove sepulchers to bury them. Nature is so preposterous, as if her brains were n'd, and she knew not what she did. But the God of Nature knows, and tells us ⟨◇⟩ these tokens, that the world is old. As a tree, it was green in the Spring, yellow Summer, white in the Autumn, is now stark and cold in the Winter of his age. ⟨◇⟩ man which is the little world, so the world which is a great man, had his Infancy, Youth, Middle-age, Old-age. From Adam to Noah was the worlds Infancie: from Noah to Abraham, the Childhood: from Abraham to David, the Youth: from David to the Captivitie, the Middle-age: from that to Christ, the Old-age: from ⟨◇⟩, to the end of all things, the Dotage.

God hath made man's life shorter, that his sins might be fewer. From nine hundred, it is fallen to seventy; and how few see half those! Methushalem lived ⟨◇⟩ one day to God; he saw not a thousand years, which with God is as one day: ⟨◇⟩ we scarce live one hour in respect of his day. Of nine hundred and sixty, our htie is but as the twelfth part. If a man live to the tenth part of Methushalems age, is a child again, when the light is sent to his windows, and the glasses there mbred cannot receive it: when the hollow receptacles of sounds are shut up: ⟨◇⟩ the faltring discourse is interrupted with harsh parentheses, coughes: We are ow old in as short time, as they were scarce past children: We are but of yesterday. and as our lives are abridged from a fadome to a span, so are our bodies contracted. en the age was long, the proportion was great: that a man could grapple with a ge beast on some terms of equality:

as Sampson coped with a Lion, David with •are, and came off with victory. These were bred in the worlds prime and youth•esse; we now in the withered and decrepit age. We are scarce the shadows of •forefathers, whether in length or strength of life, whether in stature or force •ature. We are not sooner grown up to be men, but straight we are none; death •es so quick a riddance of us, as it will do of all things. The worlds stomach •g old, is weak of retention; and the crudities of sin are so hard of digestion, 〈◇〉 the vessel must soon be broken.

Magistrates are the arms of the world, Counsellors the brains, Lawyers the tongues, the Rich the stomachs, the poor the backs, Merchants the feet, Officers the hands, and Divines the hearts. Now there is a general corruption in all these, (Let it not be understood de singulis g••rum, sed de generibus singulorum; not all of every kind, but every kind of all) this epidemical distemper witnesseth it is Old, and near the dissolution.

Now the greater the corruption, the vaster the destruction. Some think the the Igneum diluvium, fiery deluge shall descend no higher than did the watery; It may be the earth shall be burned; that is the worst guest at the table, the common sewer of all other creatures: but shall Calum transire, the heavens pass away? It may be Coelum aëreum, the airy heaven; but shall Sydereum, stellatum, the starry heaven, whe•• God hath printed such figures of his glory? yes, Coelum, elementum, Terra, when Ig•• ubique ferox ruptis regnabit habenis. The former deluge is called the worlds wi••, the next the worlds summer. The one was frigido elemento, with a cold and 〈◇〉 element: the other shall be calido, with an element hot and dry. But what then 〈◇〉 become of the Saints? they shall be delivered out of all; walking like those that servants in the midst of that great furnace, the burning world, and not be scorc••, because there is one among them, to deliver them, The Son of God, their R•d•mer. But shall all quite perish? no, there is rather a mutation, than an aboli•• of their substance. Thou shalt change them, and they shall be changed: changed, 〈◇〉 abolished. Transit mundus & concupiscentia egus; the concupiscence shall pass, nor the essence: Figura non natura. In the altering of an old garment, we destroy it not, 〈◇〉 trimme it, refresh it, and make it seem new. They pass, they do not perish: 〈◇〉 dross is purged, the metal stays. The corrupt quality shall be renewed, 〈◇〉 all things restored to that original beauty wherein they were created. The 〈◇〉 all things is at hand: an end of us, an end of our days, an end of our ways, an 〈◇〉 of our thoughts. Qui ab universalitate te excipit, te decipit. If a man could say 〈◇〉 Job's messenger, Ego solus aufugi, I alone am escaped, it were somewhat; or might find an Ark with Noah. But there is no Ark to defend from that heat, but 〈◇〉 the bosom of Jesus Christ. I have seen an end of all perfection: if perfection 〈◇〉 earth have an end, imperfection cannot long continue. una dies dabit exitum, e••. There shall be an end of our eating, an end of our building, an end of our cove•• scraping, an end of our works, and end of ourselves, but no end of our souls: an• if we be found in the faith, no end of our blessedness, for then begins a w• without end. Of these three observations, I desire to make three application.

1 Let us turn good with all the speed we can, for how far off soever the ge••rall end may be, our particular, end is near. I know that long life was God's ••mise to his servants: but when long life ceaseth to be prosperous, it ceaseth to 〈◇〉 his promise. He shortens our life. 1

That we be not afflicted with evils; the right• are prevented of the evil to come. 2 That we be not infected with evils, cor•• by the times, as Joseph was caught with the Egyptian oath. 3 Their me• lives though they die: Discessus voluto viva per ora virûm. If the good name• preserved, a man is alive though he be dead. 4 If God take away temporal, 〈◇〉 gives eternal life for it, there is no hurt done us. He that promised ten piec• silver, and gives ten pieces of gold, breaks no promise. When Herod pro• half his kingdom, if he had given it all, he had broke no promise. God's pro•• shall stand, when the mines of India shall fail. All men's lives are short, why 〈◇〉 I think mine long? Our end is near, our days be fulfilled, for our end is come.

O then let not the end of our days, and the strength of our sins, come 〈◇〉 together. It is said of S^t Chrysostom, that Nihil finivit praeter peccatum, he ma•• 〈◇〉 end of nothing but of sin. Let it not be said of us, Omnia finivimus praeter pecca•• that we have put an end to all things except our sins. A man hath be• build, he would fain end: begun to travel, he would fain come to 〈◇〉 joureneys end: Commenced a suite, he desires an end. Before all, let us 〈◇〉 to end our sins: if we end them by repentance, though the end of our lives 〈◇〉 〈◇〉 end of our other businesses, we shall never find cause of sorrow. It is a saying Schools, Ex malis praemissis sequitur non bona conclusio: From evil seeds come •ll plants. The body is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory. If we would reap a •rious body, let us sow a gracious body. Let us not be of their number, Quorum 〈◇〉 est interitus: Whose end is a destruction without end. Let repentance make an 〈◇〉 of our sins, before death make an end of our days; and then our end is not •perly an end, but a better beginning. Seeing the world must be changed, let us 〈◇〉 have corrupted it, first change ourselves. If fire must purge the elements, let us that celestial fire of the Spirit to purge us. That when all the dross and fecu••ie of the world shall be on a light fire, we may be found pure, and presented •re at the appearing of JESUS CHRIST.

2 As this teacheth all this old world, so it specially directs it self to all that be •n the world. I know that age is subject to infirmities, and hath endangered 〈◇〉 Saints to a relapse. If all must once err, error falls less unhappily in youth, 〈◇〉 image. Covetousness, pettishnesse, sluggishness, pride, are incident to old •res. This David knew, when he prayed so earnestly; Cast me not off in the time •ld-age, forsake me not when I am gray-headed. Some strive to keep themselves •n any need of that prayer; either by artificial tinctures, dying their hairs into •er colors. So though they cannot make white black, yet they can make it ap•re black. They study Colorare capillos mendacio, as a Father speaks. Or by •d and wanton lusts they prevent the baldness of age, and leave themselves not so •ch as one hair of an honest man.

Apostasy in old-age is fearful: He that climbs almost to the top of a Tower, 〈◇〉 slipping back, hath the greater fall. The patient almost recovered, is more •dly sick by a relapse. There were Stars struck from Heaven by the Dragons 〈◇〉 ; they had better never have pearched so high. The place where the Israelites 〈◇〉 into that great folly with the daughters of Moab, was in the Plain, within the •spect of the holy Land: they saw their Inheritance, and yet fell short of it. So •tched is it for old men to fall, near to their very entry of heaven. As old Eli•is Indulgence; old Judah in his Incest; old David with Bethshabe; old Asa•ting in the Physicians more than in God; and old Solomon built the High-places. •e have walked like Cherubs in the midst of the stones of fire, yet been cast as •hane out of God's mountain. Thus the Seaman passeth all the Maine, and suffers •cke in the Haven. The corn often promiseth a plenteous Harvest in the blade, shrinkes in the ear. You have trees loaden with blossoms, yet in the season of •ectation, no fruit. A Comedy that holds well many Scenes, and goes lamely •in the last Act, finds no applause. Remember Lots wife: think on that pillar •alt, that it may season thee.

Old-age is best in three respects: 1. Because it hath past the follies and disor• of youth, which Job calls bitter things to the memory. 2. Because the in•veniences of it, albeit numerous, are but corporal: commonly bettered with good estate of the mind. 3. Because it is nearest to dissolution; within a short ⟨◇⟩ of blessedness. Yet of all, it is then most miserable, when it desires to spin out •ger thread. When it is far from Elias mind, Let me die, Non sum meltor pa•• meis; I am no better than my Fathers. There is nothing more pitiable, than •ld man that for his pleasure-sake would be young again. We can scarce say of ⟨◇⟩ an one, that he hath been a man in his days. Art thou young? look for•d, propound goodness to thy life. Art thou old? look backward, be sorrow••or sins past. Art thou middle-aged? look both forward and backward: •nt the past, amend the present, be armed for the future.

Let the life of man be distinguished into three ages, the last is fully in proof, good or never. First, all is in hope: a woman hath an Embrion in her womb, •it be borne living? she hopes so. It hath life, will it have proportion? she •s so. It hath proportion, will it have the exercise of reason and understanding? she hopes so. In process of growing, reason appears, will he have grace and f• she hopes so. He professeth, is his profession sound at the heart? she hopes so. H•• hath all these, will he live long? she hopes so: all is in hope. Now middle ⟨◇⟩ half in proof, and half in hope: in proof, how good it is; in hope, how much better it may be. Old-age is all in proof, it is then seen what good a man ⟨◇⟩ what interest in heaven, what contempt of the world is in him. Let us bew••tergiversation in our old-age. Ye did run well, who did hinder you? Let our •pha and Omega be good, our first and last alike gracious: that we may comes with ⟨◇⟩ to him, who is Alpha, and Omega, first and last, the beginning and end of all co•• JESUS CHRIST.

3 Let the terror of this parallel destruction humble us all. Lord, what a •rible day will it be, when Christ shall appear in the clouds, all the world rise ⟨◇⟩ their graves, and the whole heaven and earth burning with flames! If ever ⟨◇⟩ could sample it with a day, it was the intended Gunpowder-treason day. Gu•••der invented by a Monk, taught by the Devil, that great master of Fire-woe. It hath been said, that Africa brings forth every year a new Monster: it ⟨◇⟩ brought forth such a one as this, to which nihil nisi nomina desunt. Herod slew ⟨◇⟩ the children of Bethlehem, yet there was some mercy in that, for the men esc•Haman's plot was damnable enough, even the ruin of Israel; yet they had a mou• day of preparation. But this was worse, with suddenness it would have prev• Doomesday, and sent up bodies before the Resurrection. It was cross to all ⟨◇⟩ kinds of death: that at other times sends the soul upwards, the body downw•• this would have sent the soul downward, and the body upward. Let the m• of it live to their shame and our thankfulness. Shame, said I? Alas, they mak• their glory! O but the Papists condemn it, and call the plotters Vnfortunate •tlemen. Vnfortunate, because the fortune did not succeed as they would have i•. ⟨◇⟩ is the success they blame, not the villainy. But the Papal Chair never app• it: and who can say the Papal Chair ever disliked it? The actors are see•e, ⟨◇⟩ ever the Poet lies hid: and the Pope hath not to this day Iudicially condem•• Powder-treason. It should have been a dead day, let it be a Red day in or K•lendar. Their rage was without measure, so let our thankfulness be without end.

That was a little Image or figure of the general fiery Deluge to come. If the •rour of the former be able to shake us with the remembrance? thinking how ⟨◇⟩ it had been, by a sudden blast to have our souls sent upward with our bodies; ⟨◇⟩ perhaps both to come down again with the weight of unrepented sins: ⟨◇⟩ then was no thought or time to retract. How should the meditation of this ⟨◇⟩ make us tremble; which as it shall be more sudden for the time, so more univer• for the ruin. Shall we still slumber in our old security? The Apostles said of •zarus, Lord, if he sleep he shall do well: but Lord, if we sleep we shall do ⟨◇⟩ › ill. Worldly men are like Nichodemus; they would fain come to Christ, but ⟨◇⟩ are loath to go till it be Night; that is, till death sends them. But, Poenitent•• ⟨◇⟩ moriene petitur, timeo ne ipsa moriatur: The repentance that is wrung out by death ⟨◇⟩ may fear it will be dead sooner than he that lies sick. Now, now let us break of ⟨◇⟩ sins, by the contrition of our souls: for now repentance is a Supersedeas to disc• all the bonds of sin. And lay hold upon JESUS, who as he saved Noah in the ⟨◇⟩ Water, is able to preserve us in the day of Fire. Sampson found honey out of ⟨◇⟩ Lion which himself had killed. Our sins have killed the Lion of Judah, O let ⟨◇⟩ faithful prayers suck honey out of him: there is no honey so sweet as his mercy.

Thus having considered the universalitie, that it was a whole world; the A••ty, that it was the Old world: I come in the next place to the Impiety, that it was ⟨◇⟩ Ungodly world.

The world of the ungodly.] The sins of that world were very grievous, ⟨◇⟩ too heavy for the supportation of the earth: nec medium in malo, nec remed•••lo. These sins began to multiply with the multiplication of men: the seeds of ⟨◇⟩ •ischiefe were sown before the birth of Noah's sons: at their birth, like ill weeds, •ey sprung abundantly: at last they were so rank and ripe, that God could forbear •em no longer. But it seemeth that the great defection was about the seventh age: •en Lamech, of Cain's race, fell to bigamy; then was Enoch translated, that his soul •ight be no longer grieved with the wickedness of the times. Then the righteous •horring the filthynesse of Cain's posterity, separated themselves, and began to call ⟨◇⟩ God. At length the very righteous seed declined, by falling to folly with the •ghters of the wicked.

Some Hebrews think that this pregnancie of sin began with the encrea• of women; whose number gave more occasion of lust, Genicis 6.1. But this •gues no special multiplying of that sex more than the other: but when both were •creased together, both were corrupted together. If any ask how the world could 〈◇〉 so soon peopled; I reply, how was it after the flood? Ninus King of Assyria, who reigned some 230 years after the deluge, is reported to have in his army 700 thousand footmen, and 200 thousand horsemen. The earth was corrupt with their hy sins: and they are said to be all flesh: not only their bodies for that is come on to all, but even their souls were carnal. For flesh is taken vel secundum naturam, vel secundum culpam. Man is called flesh, when he is subdued to carnal sense. All the imaginations of his heart continually evil. Wickedness is enlarged by these reflects. 1. Ration universalitatis, for generality; all flesh was corrupt: so Adams did spread over all. 2. Ration durabilitatis, for continuance; they were exercised in it a thousand years. Continuall habit had made it so alimmentall, so elementall to them, that they could not live without it. 3. Ration inseparabilitatis, for cohesion: as covetice cleaves to a man, even while he sleeps, or wakes, or walks, 〈◇〉 works, or lives: waxing younger, when all other sins decay with age. 4. Ration Superfluitatis, for abundance: not only addicted to some special vices; but to 〈◇〉 wickedness which their profane hearts could conceive. If their fancies could not imagine it, their hands were ready to do it. 5. Ration Securitatis, for supine carelesnesse: let Noah preach what he will, and build as he will, let it rain how it will, they are the same men still. 6. Ration impudentiae, for shamelesnesse: they are grown to such presumption, that they durst sin God in the face: They deere their sin as Sodom, they hide it not. Therefore their corruption is said to be before the LORD. Thus in general, now for the particulars.

The first act of degeneration was unlawful marriages: The sons of God 〈◇〉 the daughters of men, &c. Some think these sons of God were Angels, and that they fell for their intemperance with women. But. 1. God destroyed the world, not for the Angels sin, but man's. My spirit shall not always strive (he says 〈◇〉 with Angels, but) with man. 2. The devil was a murderer from the beginning: 〈◇〉 if the Angels had fallen for the love of women, then they had not sinned until thousand years after the creation. 3. In heaven they neither Marry, nor are in marriage, but are as the Angels of God: therefore Angels are not subject to carnal lusts. Some have thought these were devils who companying with women, begat Giants. But this is ridiculous, for the devils have not generative faculties: and if they could have, yet they are none of the sons of God. We read 〈◇〉 a whole legion, six thousand devils in one man; this could not be, if they were corporal. If elemental was their nature, then were they subject to mutability, to mortality: as Plutarch writes of the death of Pan, a famous devil among 〈◇〉 Pagans. And how should man's soul be immortal, if these more subtle spirits were mortal? Others think that they were Incubi, who assuming airy bodies, the act of generation are called Succubi: and so they imagine that Merlin was begotten of a spirit. Indeed spirits may assume Male and Female shapes; but are not real bodies. They appear so to the eye, not to the feeling: visible, not palpable. Andle me, and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones. But it is objected, that Abraham washed the Angels feet, and discerned them not. For answer, this is the difference between the apparitions of good and bad Angels. Unto the good God gave the use of true bodies during that ministry: so that they did eat and drink. The other are not so allowed, therefore are called Phantasmata, Visions, fancies.

Others think that these Sons of God were men tall, and of a great stature: as things excellent in their kind are ascribed to God. Great cities, the Cities of God. Tall Cedars, The trees of God. But indeed, they were called the Sons of God, because they were of the righteous seed: and the other, the daughters of men, because they descended of lewd parents. Even the wicked are the sons of God according to nature, according to their works they are not.

Now see the issue of this unhappy conjunction; Giants: which as they were men of a monstrous stature, so of a fierce and tyrannous nature. Thus they were called Nephalim, mighty oppressors: Enim, terrible: because of their pride, Ha•••kim; as it were, in chains of Gold: for their strength, Gibborim: for their naughtiness, Zanzummim. Such were Goliath, Ishbibenob, and Og. Here they are called Nephilim, of falling: both because of their terror, they made men fall to the ground: and for their error, falling themselves from virtue and goodness. These were not from the commixtion of spirits with women, but procreated of men: which is no more against nature, than for dwarfes to come from well constituted parents: who are as admirable for their smalnesse, as the other for their tallnesse. Not were all thus, but only those borne by this unlawful conjunction. For as the root, so was the branch: the marriage impious, and the issue ungracious.

That which was the first occasion of sin, was the occasion of the increased sin. A Woman seduced Adam, women betray these sons of God. The beauty of the Apple betrayed the woman, the beauty of these women betrayed the holy seed. Eve saw, and lusted, so did they: this was also a forbidden fruit. They looked, liked, lusted, tasted, sinned, died. Sins first creep in at the eyes: except we have made a covenant with them, there is no safety for our souls. This marriage did not beget men so fast as wickedness.

Consider here how dangerous it is for the believer to unite himself to an ungracious spouse. I know that marriage is honorabile: Bonum nuptiarum semper est ••num. The wife before man sinned, was for his society: after he had sinned, for a remedy. Man in himself was only but begun, in woman he was perfected and made up: till then a great part of himself he had in vain and useless. And they that have placed in Virginitate culmen, the chief glory in virginity; could never fi•in Connubio crimen, any fault in matrimony. Man and wife are Primum Par, & 〈 ∅〉 damentum parium; the original match of all others. All other relative paires are couples, as father, and son, Master and servant, King and subject; come from this. When God made Adam, he made only one. When he made Eve, he made not only her, but in her all the world to come. While man was alone, and had both sexes in himself, what could he do to fill the earth? Therefore in his body he bred a She-man: Adam being the mother of Eve, as Eve is the mother of us all. Therefore she is called Mater viventium, because she is a means to continue a kind of immortality among the mortal sons of men; and in some measure to shadow ou• that immortality which is in heaven. Families, Cities, countries, the whole habitable world, the militant, yea triumphant Church, no small part of the kingdom of heaven, ariseth from marriage. Mater matris Ecclesiae. Laudo connubium ∅〉 generat virgins. Saint Jerome himself praiseth marriage, because it begets virgins. The wife being no virgin, is the mother of Virgins that be no wives. No marriage, no Saints: no generation, no regeneration: no increasing below, no multiplying above: if the earth be not replenished with men, how should heaven be so furnished with Saints?

But as the blessings that come by good marriage, are innumerable: so be the curses by ill matches, many and mischievous. For marriage is a new foundation, whereon men build the future state of their mortality. A man cannot choose himself, he may choose his wife: and in her choice it lies much to mend or mar himself; and which is more, even his posterity. Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers. From hence follow an Iliade of evils, and the whole infelicities of life; when matches are made of such as match not; when plants are set together of an unhappy conjunction, malevolent effects must needs issue from them. But it is objected; that the Unbelieving husband is sanctified by the believing wife, and the wife by the husband: and what knowest thou, O wife, whether thou mayest save thy husband? and, O man, whether thou shalt save thy wife? This may be; and was not in those times a sufficient cause of divorce. But are not the good perverted by the bad, sooner than the bad converted by the good? Often have you heard how much a superstitious wife, by her certain lectures, hath wrought upon her Christian husband: when did you hear a believing husband prevail with his misbelieving wife? marry not thy son to a Canaanites daughter, for she will turn away his heart from following the Lord: he is not so likely to turn her.

This hath been full in examples: the Israelites were won by these forbidden matches, to serve other gods. When Ahab sold himself to wickedness, it was Jezebel his wife, that stirred him up. Thus was Samson the strongest, and Solomon the wisest, beguiled. His wives turned away his heart after other gods. This was Iehoram's ruin; his wife, the daughter of Ahab, undid him. When water and earth are tempered together, they make but mire and dirt. What crueller tyrant was ever begotten than Mahomet, who was yet the Son of a Christian Lady? As the sons of Jacob said of Dinah, We cannot give our sister to one that is uncircumcised: so let parents say, we may not give our daughter to a person unchristened. Albeit irreligion be not a cause of divorce, yet it is of restraint. We may not marry with all those, with whom we must live being married. If Adultery may separate a marriage consummated, may not Idolatry hinder a marriage not begun? Let no man separate whom God joins, so let no man join whom God separates. We would not have our children marry without our will and consents: and shall they marry without the will, liking, and consent of our Father in heaven?

This was Rebecca's care. If Jacob take a wife of the daughters of Heth, what good shall my life do me? Manoahs for Samson, Is there not a wife among thine own people but thou must go to the Philistines? Is there no friend but an enemy? no tree, but the forbidden? no helper, but a tempter? no wife but the Canaanite? can none please us, but such as displease God? He that is married to such a wife, careth more to please her, than God. Of all the guests bidden to the great feast, he that was married, (like to such a wife) desired not to be excused; but impudently protests, that he cannot come. If from Ish, and Isha, you cast out Iod and He, there remains to that couple nothing but fire; say the Rabbins. So wretched is it to couple without God. When the eye makes the match for beauty, or the ear by hearsay, taking a wife upon trust or the hand for money; marrying (though not by picture, yet) for pictures. The stocles being consulted, whether it were better for a man to marry his daughter to an honest poor man, or to a rich of small virtue and goodness; answered; I had rather have a man that wants money, than money that wants a man. How base is that love, which hath no other weight than riches! How do parents breed an A•gue in the bones of their children, that shall shake them to their very graves! When the tie of their loves is either portion or proportion only, without regard of either •eligion or conscience. One said truly; He that weds for state or face, buys a horse to lose a race. There is Caesars stamp, and God's stamp: most men marry for Caesars stamp, and these are worse than the old world; for they married for Adams stamp. God's stamp is grace, Caesars money, Adams beauty.

The motive of the old world to this unfortunate conjunction, was Beauty; They saw that the daughters of men were fair. This is the common attractive; men place their loves upon Adams Image in the face, rather than upon God's Image in the soul. Yet what is that same goodly frame of flesh and blood, but only a natural color which the Creator hath laid upon dust and ashes? but the effect of well digested sustenance, not much above that we behold in pictures. A thin weak ve•• drawn over a corruptible body: a transient delight of the eye: a glory that fades with life, yea, often before life: a piece of fine glass, that sickness or old-age will soon break; yet is this the snare that hath caught many souls: to enjoy this, David lost his peace for a while, Sampson lost his eyes forever. Thus the Midianites intrapped Israel with their dancing whirlgigs: and the wisest King was wrought to folly. I do not lay the fault on Beauty, God's admirable workmanship upon clay: for who blames a clear and crystall river, because some melancholy distracted man drowns himself in it? And when this outward ornament is joined with inward luster, it graceth all actions. Gratior est pulchro veniens e corpore virtus. But it is the minds beauty, that keeps the other sweet and delectable: a fixed and constant goodness, which as it disdains all the tinctures of painted hypocrisy, so is far beyond •he ruin of time, sickness, or any other mutability. Like Heaven, which is fa••e outwardly to our mortal eyes, but shall appear fairer within to our immortal •oules. Without this, all affection is ill placed, and will soon perish. He that loves for no other end, but to please his senses, hath a sensual love, little better tha• brutish.

It is the soul that requires love; and for that only cause which makes it lovely, Virtue. The outward worth of Beauty is nothing, it is the Soul within that makes it precious. When grace and holiness have beautified the principal, then admit the other circumstances and additions, as Beauty, Birth, or Wealth. For these indifferents, by goodness are made good, as fire turns all the objects into it self. The love built upon Beauty without this, is not long-lived: but running mad with extravagant desires, rests still unsatisfied. Hence it comes, that Quos conjunxit Ecclesia, disjunxit camera: yea worse, Conjungit Dominus, disjungit Diabolus: God and the Church puts them together; the Devil and lust puts them asunder. He that loveth silver, shall not be satisfied with silver: So nor, he that loveth women, for one is no• lusts limits. H• that affecteth many, shall be satisfied with none. Vnus, unam, u•: One God ha•h ordained one woman for one man. One is Loves number, he which trespasseth upon plurality, and loseth that content, may be all his life seeking it, b• shall never find it. To the reproof and reproach of them be it, that walk the streets. •ea, frequent the Church, for no other purpose but to feed their eye with such spectacles. When a Gallant had the name of a brave soldier; one observed how 〈◇〉 in his walking, he would turn about to gaze upon women: concluding, that the man could not have a valiant and constant mind, whose head every weak woman could turn and wryth about with her very look. Let this breed in our hearts ⟨◇⟩ abhorring of carnal lusts; a sin the very Devil does not commit: Pride he knows, malice he knows, flattery, hypocrisy, murder, treason he knows: but inco•nence of fl•sh he wonders at. Let no beauty that sticks upon mortal cheek, so ⟨◇⟩ prevail over our affections; as to prostrate those bodies to the service of Harlots, that are the dear bought members of Jesus Christ.

The next Apostasy of the old world, was by Sensuality: They did eat, they drank, they married, &c. But were these sins, or matter of reprehension? Nature hath made them necessary, discretion voluntary, and only some circumstances arbitrary. Did God drown them for this? No, but their sensuality and security in these brought destruction. Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years, eat, drink, and be merry. This was not his fault, that he thought he had enough, but that he meant to lie down and wallow in it. Lawfull actions depraved by bad circumstances, become damnable sins. Is this a time to receive money, and garments, ⟨◇⟩ vineyards, saith the Prophet to his servant? All which at another time, and in another manner, had been approved. Things beneficial in their use, are dangerous in their abuse or mis-carriage. Without a wooden conveyance we cannot cross the Seas: yet if that vessel sink, all the passengers are lost. That worldly things are good, is easily perceived by our care to get them: that their abuse is deadly, many souls feel, that cannot return to complain. It is easier for a Camel to enter a needles-eye, than a rich man to enter heavens gate. It is not certain, it is not easy, it is not likely, and (it may so fall out, that) it is not possible for a rich man to be saved. Riches commonly cool all heavenly heats, force away the Divine meditations of spiritual causes, as too melancholy fits: and bring a man to such a fools paradise, as one among Penelopes suitours, that went so oft with his friend, till he was caught himself.

It is likely, that more go to hell for abusing lawful things, than for using things simply unlawful. Cross sins appear in their own ugly forms, terrible as deformities and devils: but who suspects his eating, his drinking, his common discourse? Who fears that his building should be laid in the foundation of sin? Or that his marrying a wife should unsaulder his conjunction with Christ? But there is nothing better for a man, than that he should eat and drink, and let his soul enjoy good in his labor. And doth not Saint Paul call the forbidding of meats and marriage, The doctrine of devils? We grant it; neither would we have any man make the way to heaven harder, and more rugged than God himself hath made it. This is the liberty (and indeed of whom else, but) of Christians.

Pleasures have their allowance, with two limits. The one of Quality, they must be good and lawful: for God that hath given leave to be merry, hath not given leave to be mad. There is a good mirth, if men could hit on it; called, To be merry and wise. It is no praise to be sparing of a vicious delight, for the very t•ste is deadly. Admit the Serpents head, his body will ask no leave. The other of Quantiti•; for measure God hath hedged in man's appetite, like that fo•ming element: if he break over those dammes, the inundation is perilous. As delights ave their warrants, so also their terms: and it is no hard matter to fault in this indulg•nce. Is the work of our salvation effected, our common duties performed? We may then eat, drink, and be merry. Non nascimur in Ludum, we are not borne for play; but for labor, as the sparks fly upward. Our recreations should be like our physic, not our diet: the latter we take when we are well to keep us so: the other when we are sick to make us well.

Some things are to be avoided, not because they are ill, but near to ill: Et mala sunt vicina bonis, error sub illo, &c. Saepe prohibetur licitum, propter proximitatem illiciti: it is good to leave something that we may take, for fear of taking that we should leave. There should be difference betwixt a beast, that devoureth all within his teddar: and a man, to whom God hath given reason to rule his app•tite. It is Sins policy, to steal in by the Law; when men range in the borders and extremities of their freedom. And even from that takes an argument for us to allow it, which was made on purpose to condemn it. The Jews might give forty stripes: yet Saint Paul confesseth he received but nine and thirty: their reason of forbearing the full number, was lest their fingers should itch to give another. What folly is it, when a man hath field-room enough, to ride on the brink of a River? The note that comes too near in the margent, will skippe into the Text at the next Impression. It is a dangerous Quaere, how near a man may go to hell, and yet scape the Devil. Will any wise man try how near he may come to the infected house, and yet scape the Plague? Or holding by the rotten rails of a Turret, presumptuously vault over, in a proud glory of his venturousnesse? Israel had room enough in the Plaines of Moab: but venturing too far, they were snared with Midian. Let no man cast with himself, how old •ee may be before he needs return, lest he reckon without his host. If I forget Jerusalem in my mirth, &c. It is easy to forget heaven in our mirth. If God allow an handful, men are apt to fadome an armful. Pleasures are like the Popish Relikes; the Interest is more than the Principal.

Through all creatures let us look to their maker: through all delights to their giver, Phil. 4 4. Rejoice in the Lord always: then mutata materia delectationis •m•nae, non mutatur causa delectandi: in the midst of all the changes and chances of worldly contents, there will be an immutability of joy in God. There are two sorts reprehensible.

First, they that avoid all lawful delights for fear of sin. As if it were not possible for a Christian to separate the gold from the dross, but he must needs cast away the oar! Will any simple Jew condemn the clear streams of Jordan, because they run into the dead sea? We see some proud of their fantastical clothes, dressed up like children's puppets, or Antics in a Pageant: must we therefore go naked? Some are drunk with wine, may not therefore a sober man drink it? Is there no physic, but Opium? must we either be sensually wicked, or senselessly stupid? why did God place man in Paradise but to solace himself? why hath he given us such variety of creatures, but for use? Doth the Lord invite us to this feast, and we depart (like sullen guests) from so rich a table hungry? This pretence of mortified strictness doth injury; & nostrae libertati, & creatoris liberalitati; both to our liberty, and our Makers liberality. Every good gift comes from above; there is nothing but good from heaven: he that rejects the gifts, wrongs the giver. God cannot abide such a discontented answer; Dan. 5.17. Keep thy rewards to thyself, and g••e thy gifts to another. Many great Kings have been blessed Saints: they could not have been Kings without a number of earthly pleasures: they could not have been Saints with earthly affections. If God therefore have mingled us a pleasant cup, let us cheerfully drink it, and give thanks to Jesus Christ. Charity is not strait-laced, but yields much latitude to the lawful use of indifferent things. These are fit for those that are fit for them.

Next, they are to be blamed, that with neglect of better things, settle and fixe themselves upon these. It is the heart that makes all evil, when that lying speech of Satan is borrowed, All these are mine. Christ teacheth us, first to seek the kingdom of heaven, then shall the rest be cast upon us. When the bargain is made for salvation, the rest come in like lumber. When you have fed heartily on the body of your Savior, and gotten assurance to drink the wine of heaven, then eat, drink, and be merry. First marry thy sons soul to CHRIST, then his body to a virtuous wife. The Factor employed in foreign parts, first dispatcheth his Masters business, then his own. How preposterous is it, to omit that only thing in this world, for which we came into the world; to serve our maker!

The last sin of the old world, was Security. The Lord's forbearance did so little stir them, that they were scarce waked with his vengeance. The savaged creatures, Lions, Tigers, Bears, by God's instinct came to seek succor in the A• men did not seek it. Even brutishness is more sensible than corrupted reason. The Sybarites, that no disturbance might come near their beds of violets; banished all• cockes and clockes: the former must not break their sleeps, nor the other vex them with report of the fugitive time. Epimenides the Cretian slept fourscore year• in a Cave; some say but forty, and that was enough in conscience; beyond a miracle, and doubtless beyond the truth. But the old world slept a hundred and twenty years, and all Noah's hammering about the Ark wakened them not. O that the conscience of man, in the midst of so many sins povoking God, so many temptations assaulting his own soul, so many enemies against him, so many dangers about him, should still be secure! She is observed by her own eye, when none else mark her: chased by her own foot, when none else follow her: hath a thousand witnesses within her, when there is no outward stir against her: and yet the wicked sleep.

Satan, like Iael to Sisera, or Judith to Holofernes, watcheth till a man be a sleep and then kills him. Preachers cry, but sinners will not waken: and as in places of Iudicature they often determine to hear causes, but do not hear to determine causes: so men commonly remember to hear, but do not hear to remember. Pliny writes of some Bears so sleepy, that they are hardly roused with blows and wounds. Many discourse of religion, as men talk in their dreams: they speak wonders of goodness: yet are no such manner of men; neither the one working, or the other waking. Formal hypocrites are like the Cock, and meriting Papists like the Dormouse. Gallus bibit & non mingit, Glis mingit & non bibit. The Cock drinks and never pisseth, the Dormouse pisseth, and never drinks. The former drink much preaching but there is no good deeds come from them: the other vent some alms, and evacuate their superfluties, but they will not drink a drop of the water of life.

Let us take the Apostles caution; Bee sober and watch: Bee sober, for Ebriety is a drink-offering to the Devil. And watch, for a Security is Porcpose before a Tempest: Keep your souls waking, then shall your bodies sleep in quiet. As there may be a corporal watching when the mind sleeps, so there may be a spiritual watching when the body sleeps. Temptations, like Delilah, tells us a fair tale, but their end is to bring us asleep, and pluck out our eyes. But if in all our earthly business we still carry an heavenly mind, the Judgment of God shall not, as it did the old world, ever take us napping. The house doth every day get some dust, therefore let it every day be swept: the soul contracts some sins, the be some to sweep it is made of examination and repentance. At night ere we shut our eyes, let us open our hearts, and cleanse our consciences: before we shut the door let us cast out the dust. He never breaks his sleep for debt, that pays as he takes up. Let us watch in righteousness, this is the way to sleep in peace. When the stomach is obstructed, the body takes but ill rest, and the slumbers are broken off with distracted dreams. If the conscience be oppressed; in vain the soul looks for quiet. If hardness of heart, like Opium, shall consoporate it, that sleep is mortal. The shepherds were, Luk. 2.8. Watching over their flocks by night. As Christ found the shepherds watching over their flocks at his first coming; so may he find us all watching over our souls at his second coming, in the glory of his kingdom.

I conclude; in this glass let us see the present state of this world. Certainly we may vie sins with them, and stand upon comparisons, without bating them one ace for heinousness. If the world were then fowl, it is now fowlenesse it self. Some things are so clear, that they refuse trial: and some so filthy, that they abhor purgation. Nor do I confine this corruption to some parts of it: as there be national sins, peculiar to age, to country, to constitution: Mores sequuntur humores. But all the world is sick and rotten: paganism possessing a great moitie of the whole, and heresy perverting the half of that is left. We may say of it, as Tully to Anthony; Miser si sentis, miserior sin non sentis: it is wretched if it feel it, more wretched if it feel it not. Ideo pereunt, quia nesciunt se perire: ideoque magis pereunt, quia nesciunt se nescire. Men perish because they are ignorant of their perishing: yea they more perish, because they are ignorant of their not knowing.

Let us hear Saint Paul delivering the state of our old world, and see how our experience accords with his prophecy, 2 Tim. 3.2. Men shall be lovers of their own selves. Have we not seen this self-love stalking in the garb of impudence, vomiting disgraces against all men, and arrogating to it self? fly-blowing good things to deter others, that himself might devour them? Covetous; O they swarm like the frogs in Egypt: that as a shrewd censurer said, stand where you will, and of every 10 men that pass by, nine and three quarters are covetous. When the uplander wondered to see a white Crow, the Fen-man answered, In our country we wonder to see any black ones. It is no marvel to see one covetuous, it is marvel to see one not covetous. Boasters; a great rabble. Some boast their portion, others their proportion: rather than want matter of ostentation, they will boast their vices: as if one should •rathroud of his scabbes, or make a scarfe of his halter. Proud; an universal disease: •e pich display it in their wearing, the poor in their swearing. I will not tell you, that this Idol goes in strange and fantastical dress: that is indeed an inseparable sign, yet but one, you shall have her sit as pertly under a broad Felt pulled down to the eyes, as upon a Bever: and find her as soon in a little Geneva-set, as in a great Spanish Ruffe.

Blasphemers: men have sworn themselves hoarce with oaths. There is a Word that is clothed about with death; and that Word is too frequent in the jaws of men, till the fearful Name of God be made as vile as common air. Disobedient to parents: This is so arrogated to the young, and so tolerated by the old, that for this cause God shortens their days, and sets parents a weeping for the loss of their children's bodies, that regarded not the loss of their souls. Vnthankfull: this vice hath usurped a propriety of that, which is only borrowed: customary fruition hath made men scarce think themselves beholden to God. Otherwise, why do not rich men abound in praises, as God hath made them abound in riches? Perhaps they do not think their riches came in God's name, and therefore cannot with a good conscience thank him for them. Vnholy, or profane: God hath made all us, and all ours: he reserves but the Tenth of our goods, and the Seventh of our time, but Totum hominis, our whole selves. We are his Peculiar: now shall we make that virgin common, prostituted to every base Gypsee, pride, lust, avarice; which the Lord hath redeemed and required holy and peculiar to himself?

Without natural affection: when men willfully transgress against Grace, God suffers them to sin even against nature. They that have lost the love of their Father, shall lose the love of their children. It is just, that for being false to their best Friend in heaven, they should neglect their friends on earth, and be neglected of both. Truce breakers: There is a faith that knits us in a covenant with God, and a faithfulness that ties us in a covenant with man. We are Foedi-fragi in both: have broke the vow made in our Baptism, and are so full of levity, that there is more credit given to the print of our seals, than to the faith of our souls. If any Nation break truce with us, who wonders when we have broken truce with God? False accusers: This was wont to be the Devils office only; but now as if men grudged Satan the honor of calumnation, they monopolize it into their own hands. The Make-bate runs from house to house, and carries the burning coals of contention, till he sets them all a-flame, and then warms his own fingers at the fire. Incontinent: The Devil hopes that this vice in the next age will be held a virtue; for it is gotten already out of the dis-reputation of a sin. Drunken-houses and Brothels v•• for number, and it is thought the Stews will get it. Vrbs est jam tota Lupanar. Fi••• The violences of former times were courtesies to ours. Then it was a friendly imposition, you shall stay and eat with me: now it is a friendly enforcement, you shall stay and drink with me: and if there be any failing in the quantity, they are as Fier• as Tigers. Despisers of those that are good. It is the honest man's commendation, to contemn a vile person, but to honor them that fear the Lord. And David's delig• was in the Saints, and such as excel in virtue: To honor virtue in rags, and to loath vice though in a Robe of State. But now let in the Ies••Ibis Homere for as: They like him worse, that goes about to make them better. Tr•ters: Who because they cannot warp a Princes Justice to their own humors, will strike at that sacred blood. If the former world had any actours to do it, this world hath more, even Patrons to defend it. Headie. That whereas God hath made man's reason to go foremost, his hand after it: these do first, and think afterwards; and then beat their wits to make good, what their wills hath made necessary. High-minded: That are like chimneys; they overlook all the house, yet are the foulest part of it. They think that neither God nor man knows their worth, not rewards them to their merits. Lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God. After the long Catalogue of particulars, as if the Apostle were weary of the enumeration; it gives you this, the sum of all profaneness. God did form them, pleasures deforme them: God would save them, pleasures would destroy them: they are m•••• men to love pleasures more than God.

Thus I have shown you some representation of these evil times; the works of the old world, the works of the old man. They are old in your practice, old in our remembrance; O that so old, that they were dead in your performance. Novus uus, novus animus: let me tell you of a new lesson; indeed more truly old than the other. For goodness was before sin, truth ancients than falsehood. But new to your flesh, new to your apprehension, new to your approbation, new to your practice. Whatsoever things are true, that do not savor of hypocrisy: honest, not of vanity: just, not of iniquity: pure, not of obliquity: lovely, not deformity: of a good report, not of infamy: if virtue hath given them worth and weight: and praise, an ornament of grace and beauty: receive, hear, learn, think, do these things, and the God ‹ϕ› peace shall be with you.

Such is the fearful estate of the world by reason of sin! O that we might see ‹ϕ› end of these things, before we see an end of all things! Help Lord, for the godly •ile among the children of men. When ungodliness so reigns, that piety is almost quite lost, it is high time to cry, Help Lord: and indeed, Quid jam nisi vota superat? O may the virtue of that blood, which is able to buy off all our sins; mortify sin in us, and purge sin from us: that our remaining days may be spent in a due reparation for our great Audit, at the second appearing of JESUS CHRIST. Amen.

Bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly.] The eyes of all things •oke up unto thee, O Lord: not only expecting their conservation by thy providence, but also attending thy direction for their obedience. The winds from their •ves, the rain from their bottles, the waters from their channels all answer the Lord, as the Israelites did Joshua: All that thou commandest us, we will do: and •hither soever thou sendest us, we will go. We are ready to be charged, what shall we do? He saith, clouds pour down, seas break loose, smite the world, drown ‹ϕ›. Lo, how they concur in their ready execution, and unite their forces to an •niversall flood. The points I insist upon, are three: How this deluge was caused, •ow far it prevailed, how long it continued; with some useful observations derived from them.

First, how it was caused: It was a work of Almighty power, which also used •he concurrence of some natural means. All the fountains of the great deep were •oken up, and the windows of heaven were opened. The Hebrews have called fountains Gnaiim, which signifieth an eye: eyes being like fountains to destill tears. This eruption of the great Deepe, was not the Tartarean waters about the center of •he earth: they could not surge so high. But either the Sea, which some think to •e higher than the earth, and restrained only by God's providence from overflowing it. Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further: and here shall thy proud waves be stay'd. In nature it is acknowledged, that the place of waters is above the earth: therefore Aristotle calls it a strange thing, Vt levius sit graviore inferius. Indeed the waters were created higher, but depressed by God's command. At first thou didst Cover the earth with the deep, as with a garment, and the waters stood above the mountains. But at thy rebuke they fled, at the voice of thy thunder they hasted away. They go up by the mountains, and down by the valleys, unto the place which thou •ast founded for them. Thou hast set a bound which they shall not pass over, nor •ne again to cover the earth. The sand is this bound by a perpetual decree: though •hey toss, and roar, they shall not prevail. And it is fondly imagined, that the •ea is now higher than the earth. *They that go down to the sea in ships, Down, therefore not higher. Thou hast founded the earth upon the seas, and established it up the floods. Super maria, upon the seas, therefore not under them: and so founded, not so only forced. He stretcheth out the earth above the waters; therefore not the water above the earth. All the rivers run into the sea: but the natural course of the waters is downward. But how then find we springs in the tops of mountains? not by miracles, but natural: God so disposing them to exercise their natural motions. Not that they come of some vaporous sweat or distillation of the earth; for then they could not so vehemently boil up. Nor by the transcendent height of the sea; as a spring rising in a hill, and conveyed in pipes, will force the ascent to the same height it bears at the fountain. But the sea doth so violently rush into those receptacles of the earth, which she finds hollow, that it forceth springs even upon mountains. Most interpreters by this Deepe, understand the deep heads and springs of waters within the earth, which were opened and enlarged to this inundation: those Exod. 20.4. Waters under the earth, the rivers and deep gulf gushing forth.*

The windows of Heaven.] This signifies not an eruption of any waters in the Crystal heavens, as they call that above the starry sky. Some have conceived waters to be above the firmament to mitigate the heat of the stars. But. 1. the waters are an heavy substance, and should be kept there against nature. 2. If these waters had come from thence, there must have been a dissolution of the starry heaven. 3. The watery heaven should then be a vacant place. 4. The celestial bodies have no need to be refrigerated: for they are of no fiery and elemental nature, they admit no qualities: the Sun it self not being hot formaliter, sed effective. But it is objected; Ye waters that be above the heavens: By heaven is understood there the lower region of the air. So it is said, The Lord thundered in the heavens, hailestones and coals of fire: but thunder, lightning, and hail, come not properly from heaven, but from the air. There be three heavens; Aerum; so we called the fowls of heaven, that is, of the air; Sydereum, so the Firmament is called Heaven; Empyreum, the fiery heaven; so called, not for the heat, but for the glory. If the air be so comfortable, that is but lightened with the Sun, what is the heaven, where the Sun it self is? If that be so refulgent, how glorious is the heaven where God himself dwells!

This opening of the windows, is the breaking of the clouds, wherein the waters are contained. He bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds, and the cloud is not under them. Here he unbound those vessels, and made vents for the rain like windows. Seneca writing of the general deluge, which he thinks not past but to come, gives these reasons. 1. The swelling and overflowing of the seas. 2. The earth itself putrifying and resolving into waters. 3. The conjunction of celestial bodies: as the world shall be drowned, saith he, when such stars concur in Cancer: so $\langle \diamond \rangle$ shall be burned when the same company meet in Capricorne. But indeed, these seem to be true causes. 1. The issuing forth of waters from the earth. 2. The violent eruption of the seas. 3. The continual rain from the clouds. 4. Which were increased by the liquefaction and distilling of the air into water.

But the Principal Agent here was the Lord. I will cause it to rain upon the earth. It was his special work, by the ministry of Angels, after no ordinary manner. There was no fatal necessity in it: for seeing God created the world in such wisdom and order, that one part should concur to the preservation, not to the destruction of another: it is vainly imputed to the constellation of the stars. For they can have no general operation over all the earth, but only in that place where their influence worketh.

The Instruction we collect is this; that all God's creatures are at his beck: 〈◇〉 the greatest Lions on earth, Whales in the sea, devils in hell. What is greater than the heaven? Yet this ever-wheeling body shall suspend his swift diurnall motion, 〈◇〉 his command, to do service to his servants; Sun stand thou still in Gibeon, and that Moon in the valley of Aialon. The Sun cometh forth as a Bridegroom out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race. Yet to confirmed the faith of Hezekiah, he shall fly back as a coward, ten degrees at once in the dial of Ahaz. What is more huge, firm, and unfit to be dealt withal, than the earth? yet he makes it tremble, and open the jaws to devour his enemies; if he touch the bu••, they smoke for it. The Whale wallows up and down the sea like a mountain, yet was he tamed to become the Prophets chariot, and bring him to land. The fa•shed Lions forbear Daniel, they dare not touch the dish which God had reserved for himself. And for Jonah, how he should lie in the bowels of that Leviathan•ree days, not concocted and stifled, is no wonder to them that contemplate the power of God. The belly of the fish could not be hotter to the Prophet, than the •ty Furnace was to the three Servants; neither is it more, to bring a living man after three days from a fish, than to raise a dead man after four days from the grave.

The Angels are of a powerful nature: yet the good are made ministering spirits for the heirs of salvation: the bad God ties in chains and muzzles their malicious forces. Those that had prepared themselves to slay the third part of men, were found up in the great River Euphrates, till he loose them. He needs not the Postes of Persia, which Haman used; nor the Dromedaries of Egypt, to signify his will; but 〈◇〉 Word runneth very swiftly. The day is his, and the night is his; the open place and the secret; the very wings of the wind shall carry his Precepts. Jon. 1. The sea and a charge for the Prophet, as the Prophet had a charge for Nineveh. God said to the one, Arise and go, and he went not: he speaks to the other, Arise and go, and 〈◇〉 went; fulfilling the Makers command with all diligence. Thus all creatures have eyes and legs, when God bids them go; spirit and life is put into them, activity to use them, wisdom to direct them, when they should punish. The Mariners were trying a chain of delays, with a number of shifts, desirous to save or reprieve the guilty: but in vain they labor to evade the Council of God. While the men were in advise, the winds and seas are in action: the men are backward, the other go forward with their service: the men lose time, the other admit no dilation.

It is the Lord of Hosts to whom all these obey: Fire and hail, snow and vapour, stormy wind and tempest, fulfilling his Word. There is no Neptune, Admiral of the Seas, nor Aeolus Master of the winds, nor Mars General of the wars, nor Iu•iter King of thunders; but only the Lord. Who divided and diverted Jordan? His retrogresse was no ordinary thing: we might well say, What ailest thee, O Ior•an, that thou wast driven back? Many being crossed by the creatures, fall to blaspheming them: but let us reprove them, as the Prophet did Sennacherib; Whom wast thou blasphemed? and against whom hast thou exalted thyself? even against the Holy One of Israel. Whom are you angry withal? Do the rain and waters displeas you? Alas, they are servants, if their Master bid smite, they must not forbear. They may say truly, What Rabshakeh usurped; Are we come without the Lord? he said, Go and chastise them. Thus was it in this Deluge; the Lord brought the Flood. The waters saw thee, O God, the waters saw thee, they heard thy voice, and came streaming out of their cells. We are placed on the earth, as in the midst betwixt swallowing pits; the waters of the sea below us, and the waters of the firmament above us, if the one were not kept down, and the other held up, by the power of God, they would drown us every moment. But if it be easy for Him, to alter the course of Nature for the destruction of his enemies: he can with more ease reverse the course of Nature for the preservation of his friends.

The next circumstance is, How far it prevailed. This was even to the overwhelming of the whole earth; that not the tallest Cedars, nor loftiest buildings, nor highest mountains could appear: even fifteen cubits upwards. Some mountains are said to be of an exceeding height; therefore cavillers find impossibility in these natural causes, for the waters to transcend them fifteen cubits. So neither the rapings of the sea, nor the sluices of the earth, nor the Cataracts of heaven, with the help of all those Signs which they call Aquatick; as Cancer, Pisces, Pleiades, Orion; and among the Planets, Venus and Luna, could do it. We need not here answer, what the superior and inferior waters did meet together: as the Mists, which are waters above; and the Springs, which are waters below; meet often on the tops of mountains. But what need arguments from natural causes, when every believer of the Scriptures perceives here the supernatural finger of God? So he commanded, so the creatures obeyed, and so the wicked were destroyed. From hence we may collect four meditations.

1 That no power of man is able to withstand the will of God: it must be accomplished, though an whole world perish. It shall stand firmer than the Firmament; Whatsoever the Lord pleased, that did he in heaven, in earth, in the seas, and all deep places. What can a Fly do against a bulwark? or man against God? unless he could see and corrupt the heavens, with all that therein is; the earth and sea, with all that therein is there is no rescuing of that which the Lord will smite. This the damned prove in themselves by woeful experience: always willing what is and shall be ever absent: and always nilling what is and shall be ever present. In aeternum non obtinebit quod vult, & in aeternum sustinebit quod non vult. The men rowed hard, to deliver the Prophet; but the sea was tempestuous against them. Man roweth, and God bloweth; there be arms for the one, winds for the other; which is likeliest to prevail? How much, against how little! The Ocean with his fury, against one wooden Vessel: great waves against small strokes. Such are all devices and endeavors against the Lord. Oenus torrens, in the proverb: Oenus weaves a rope, and an Ass stands by and bites it off.

How impossible will it be for the wicked to stand in the day of Judgment? If all the sinners on the earth, with all the devils in hell, oppose the Judge; it is less than for one unarmed man to set upon a legion of well appointed soldiers. There is no fortification against, no evasion from the Lord. Fugitive Jonah gotten to Ipphus, and thence to sea, might think all safe: but loe, presently a pursuivant is dispatched from heaven to attach him: Vengeance is ship'd in a Whirlwind, and sails aloft in the air to overtake him. If a still spirit cannot charm sinners, God hath a turbulē spirit, which is Severior Magister, to enforce them. There be spirits that are created for vengeance, which in their fury lay on sore strokes, to appease the wrath of him that made them. If they deny appearance in his Court of Justice, there be Pursuivants enow to fetch them in: his Writ of Attachment must be served. There is no dealing with God, but by Prayers and Peace-offerings. How vain were their shifts in this deluge: could they have laid mountain on mountain, and upon the top of all erected a Tower higher than Babel was ever meant: yet He that sitteth in the heavens would laugh, the Lord would have them in derision: and smiling at their folly make an end of their ruin.

2 That strange sins meet with strange punishments. The monstrous and Giantly sins of those monstrous Giants we have heard: they were wonderful, yet the plague is of no less wonder. A continued rain of forty days, a prevailing Deluge of fifteen cubits; this was without example before it, nor shall any much be after it, but the Deluge of fire at the last. Sodom was guilty of a strange and unnatural sin, therefore destroyed with a strange and untrannaturall plague; hell out of heaven. Nadab offers strange fire, and suffers strange fire. Cain committed a strange murder, in killing his brother, the fourth part of the world; and strange was his punishment, to be a runagate in his own Land; till he finds that he kills himself more than his brother. O how bitter is the end of sin, yea, without ⟨◇⟩ bitter! Jonah admitted a wonderful neglect, the chastisement comes little short of wonder. Pursued by a Tempest, discovered by a lot, condemned by himself, thrown over-board by his friends, wrapped in weeds, in the bottom of a deep, devoured by a Whall; without light, without food, without company, without comfort: drowned, and not drowned, devoured, but not digested; alive, and yet as dead: so terrified in conscience as if a reprobate, his soul in a swoon, his like a last cast, the gasps and pangs of death upon him, the very throbs of desperation oppugning him, that his hope of eternal life was in his sense exiled: here was a punishment to the admiration of all the world.

The monstrous sin of this Land, Drunkenness, (and we may so call it, for it turns men into monsters) is answered by as strange a punishment. What living man ever saw such a Summer? All eyes behold, all tongues confess, that it hath ⟨◇⟩ strange weather for the season. But their hearts consider not, how strange the sin is that procured it, Act. 11.28. There was an universal dearth, and it came to pass in the days of Claudius Caesar. The worlds Emperor bred the worlds estate. The vices of Princes infect the people, that Qualis Rex, talis grex. This Claudius was an insatiate drinker: his own mother called him a monster, a work of nature begun, not finished. No marvel if dearth comes in the days of Claudius: if God deny fruits to a drunken generation. We may justly fear a famine, and expect (not as CHRIST said, The harvest is great, and the laborers are few; but) that the harvest should be small, and the laborers many. If the Lord thus forbear to smite us, it is not propter paenitentiae nostrae meritum, but misericaediae suae beneplacitum. Howsoever, let us abhor the sin, whereupon follow so many mischiefs. As murder and outrage; Violentia in vinolentia. Poverty; the children come to weep for bread, because their prodigal fathers have drunk it. Scandals; the honors of the noble are traduced, while the drunkard sits like a Caesar, taxing all the world. Blasphemies; for such are the graces that come by the inspiration of the pot. Impudent demeanors; for sumptuous potations inflame presumptuous actions. Uncleaness; Ebrietas castitatis naufragium: Bacchus is but a Pandar to Venus. Discovery of secrets: Noah being drunken revealed those secrets that lay hid 600 years. Wicked fellowships: for such a trick or quality of insatiate drinking, the devil himself was once called Robin Good-fellow. There was a street in Rome called Vicus sobrius, the sober street; because there was never a drinking house in it: find such a street in London, and Chronicle it. I have no thought of invective against the creature: drink wine ad mensam, sed ad mensuram. Only let me tell you of better wine out of God's own Celler, Cant. 2.5. There be inebriated, Psal. 36.8. O faelix & paucis nota voluptas! CHRIST hath begun to us, let us pledge him, Psal. 116.13. a health indeed: A saving health unto all Nations.

3 God's favor and anger changeth the use of the creatures. The rain from above, and the fountains below, are things we cannot lack: yet did his wrath make these the instruments of the worlds desolation. He can turn principal helps to principal plagues. The wind is a fan to purge the air, as the lungs lie by the heart to do it good: it is the only means of sailing; yet how often hath it brought the vessel to ruin? Children, the dearest jewels of love, the living pictures of their parents; are often made their heaviest scourges. The wife, one half of man's self, the best of temporal blessings, becomes not seldom the fearefullest Cross. The Quails, so dainty flesh, were Israel's rats-bane: and the children of the Prophets died by a bitter herb in the pot ordained for their sustenance. Fire, so unspareable an element, consumeth a whole City in God's anger. The earth that firmly supports us, hath swallowed the wicked; the bread that nourisheth, choked them. All which should make us fearful of offending, lest our comforts become our corrosives; the delight of our eyes, our eye-sores: our tables a snare, and that which should have been for our wealth, an occasion of falling. God's displeasure upon our sin, is able to turn nature upside down, that like Sennacherib, we become the spoil of own bowels.

There is no confidence to be put in worldly things: for if the earth it self be destroyed, what shall become of the temporalities it beareth? The foundation being ruined, the building cannot stand. What became of all that gold and silver, which in hoards and heaps the covetous had gathered? what became of their houses so stately and sumptuous? What, of the curious guardens, delightful arbors, the spacious bounds of oppression extorted from the poor? who was the richest man, when all found one swallowing grave? The trees grow different in the forest; some greater, some straiter, some broader, some taller, some younger, some older, some fruitfuller, some doated. But when they are hewn down by the axe, and cast into the fire who can distinguish them by their ashes: and say, this was an Oke, that a Cedar, the other a poplar? So in death and dust, who can say, this was the skull of a King, that of a Lawyer, this of a Client; that of a polititian, this of a fool; that of an officer, this of a beggar? Dives es, sed multum debts. Such a one is rich, but he owes much: tarry till he hath paid all his debts, what is he then? As a man that hath his house of Cedar, but owes for his fine and rent. Worldly riches are like the rivers in Job. In winter there is water enough in them, when there is no need of it. In summer, when we expect it, and should use it to quench our thirst, they are dry.

The Devil, like the Pope, forgeth a donation. All is delivered unto me, all is mine. But question him like a thief at the bar; how is it thine? Delivered to me: but by whom? Nay, by whom he cannot tell, the time he remembers not, the place he hath forgotten: as much to say, as they are none of his. Riches make themselves wings, and fly away as an Eagle toward heaven. All riches have wings, and flie away: the evil gotten, like Noah's Raven, come back no more: the good and well gotten, like Noah's Dove, return with an olive branch of peace. They are called Riches of this world; would you have them go out of the world, and follow you past the grave? The dog will go with you so long as you go with his master; but if you leave him, he will leave you. They are seldom profitable, often perticious, always dangerous. All those be good arguments, which are from the proper cause to the proper effect: yet they may fail by the intervention of a miracle. It is proper unto fire to burn, yet that vehement fire did not burn the three servants of God. It is proper to the sea to drown those that be cast into it, yet it did not drown the Prophet in the very depth of it. It is proper to the Sun to move, yet it stood still at the prayer of Joshua. Proper for it to go from East to West, yet for Hezekiah's confirmation, it went from West to East. This was proper to them, and that they did not produce such effects, it was by miracle. So it is proper to worldly riches to ensnare souls; if they do not, it is by miracle. Adoratores seculi, adultores diaboli: they that worship the world, will flatter the devil.

Let this teach us to contemn the world, which we are sure shall be destroyed. Indeed, we may desire temporal things, according to our condition and requisite measure: but still with the Saints estimation of them, that Threw them down at the Apostles feet. Calcandumque docent, dum ponunt gressibus aurum. Saint Peter forsook all, yet the Pope in his right engrosseth all. The Rabbins say, that Moses being a child, had Pharaoh's Crown given him to play withal, and he cast it down to the ground, and kicked it about. As it were a sign of his future vilipending temporal things, that he should Esteem the reproach of Christ, greater riches then the treasures in Egypt. CHRIST'S counsel is, Sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor: sell it, or if no man will buy it, give it: or if no man will take it, leave it: it is not worth thy keeping, especially not worth thy carking: do thou part from it, rather than it should part thee from Christ. He that impoverisheth his soul, to enrich his body; is more mad than he that kills his horse to loose his money, at a race. But alas; How were the things of Esau searched for; the things of this world sought after! by oppression, fraud, Usury; as if this were the only end of getting, to have. But when all the poor members of Christ are clothed and filled, then put they money to the bank. Howsoever the covetous for one scruple of gold, will make no scruple of conscience: yet let us love temporal things, as poor people beg; for God's sake. Thus in the destruction of the world by fire, as it was once by water; when the wicked shall loose all, we shall loose nothing: because we reserve what we had, the favor of God, the kingdom of heaven, and the glorious riches laid up for us in Jesus Christ.

The last circumstance is, how long this flood continued. The exact time hath much pusled Interpreters: I will not perplex you with it. Only the plain Text saith thus; It rained forty days, the waters prevailed a 150 days, then they began to abate, but so slowly, that it was the Tenth month before the very tops of the mountains did appear. In all, the continuance seemeth to be upon a full year. Divines observe, that it began then the Spring, the Second month, which answereth to our May. 1. The world is then supposed to have taken the beginning: the plants then sprouting, beasts engendering, the ground aptest for tilling. Now that this was the time of the overflowing appears because from the creation to the flood, are reckoned just 1656 even years. 2. The first month being Nisan, which answereth to part of our March, part of April; and this being the second; proves clearly that it fell out in the spring. Howsoever this reckoning was discontinued in Egypt, (for the Egyptians began their year from the month Ptho, which answers to our September) yet Moses here makes no new institution, but reneweth the old account. 3. That this flood might not be imputed to any natural causes, but only to God's power: the waters increasing in summer, which is a time for drought: and decreasing in Winter, when naturally they do swell and rise. 4. That it might be more grief to the wicked, to perish in the midst of their pleasure, and abundance: eating and drinking, making marriages, and merriments: they were taken away in the height of their jollity. At this time the flood ceased; for in the eleventh month after the flood, the Dove brought an Olive leaf, the sign of the spring. And at the coming forth of the Ark they presently began to multiply: now the aptest season for ingendring is the spring, especially for fowls. Besides, if it had not then been a growing time, herbs and plants putting forth; where had been food for their sustentation.

Thus long it continued; at last in the midst of wrath God remembers mercy: and as he corrected with his Rod of affliction, so he upholdeth with his st•ffe of consolation. As in the Ark he kept some seed alive to replenish the earth, when the rest perished: so he ceased the deluge, and at last delivered them out. God remembered Noah, and every living thing: he remembered the very beast. O Lord, thou preservest man and beast. Xenocrates an heathen Philosopher is commended for his pitiful heart, who succoured in his bosom a poor sparrow, that being pursued by a hawk came flying to him; and afterward let her go saying, Se supplicem non prodidisse; that he had not betrayed his poor supplyant.

Thus God sustained Noah and the rest for his sake, in a dark place, a whole year; being even then his light and comfort. Unto the upright there ariseth light in darkness: a light shined to Peter, when he lay bound at mid-night. Indeed what darkness can there be, where the Father of lights shineth? now he delivers them again to their long desired air, and causeth his Sun to send forth comfortable beams upon them. It was time for a renovation to succeed this destruction: to have continued this inundation long, had been to punish Noah who was righteous. After forty days therefore the heavens clear up, after 150 days the waters sink down. How soon is God weary of punishing, that is never weary of blessing! The Ark though it were Noah's fort against the waters, yet was it also his prison: he was safe in it, but pent up. Now therefore the LORD that gave him life by it, thinks it time to give him liberty out of it. The Justice of God is satisfied, the wicked punished, the waters diminished, the creatures delivered, the world again revived. After so long a storm there comes a calm: that he, who for his judgments ought to be feared, might also for his mercy be magnified. This world is as strait a prison in regard of heaven, as the Ark was in respect of the world: and our preservation is as wonderful, if we could see it. Desire we therefore (in fear and faith) that day; that as they went out of the Ark into the world, so we may go out of the world into that blessed Kingdom of JESUS CHRIST.

And saved Noah the eight person, a preacher of righteousness. What a wonder of mercy was this? one poor family called out of a whole world: eight grains of corn fanned from a whole barn full of chaff: eight lilies growing amongst a whole forest of thorns. For these few, was the earth still preserved under the waters, and all kinds of creatures upon the waters: which otherwise, had all perished. Still the world stands for the Elects sake, for whom it was made and preserved: else the last fire should consume that, which the former water could not purify.

Here, first, let us consider the Person saved, Noah; and Him both by his condition, that he was a Preacher: and by his conversation, which was in Righteousness: for in that Center both his doctrine and practice met; both verbally and actually he preached. He was ordained into this Ministry by the Lord: and as his whole life was an actual Sermon, that taught obedience by precedent: so he continually incited the people to repentance, and forewarned them of the threatened vengeance. The observations are manifold.

1 That Noah had his calling immediately from God; whereas we are mediately ordained by the imposition of hands; which is a most reverend symbol in the Church. Forno man taketh this honor to himself uncalled. Christ is said to be a Priest after the order of Melchizedek: but we have Priests without any order at all; refusing to be ordered; What warrant have they, that they are sent? I know, there be different sorts and places: as Bishop Jewel, or the Jewel of Bishops observes; All have Idem Ministerium, though Diversam Potestatem. A Bishop and an Archbishop differ not in Potestate Ordinis, sed in Potestate Regiminis. Nor doth a Bishop differ from a Minister; Quoad potentiam Sacerdotii, sed quoad potentiam Iurisdictionis. Indeed the Apostles, as they were immediately sent by Christ, so it was their prerogative royal, ministerially to give the Holy Ghost by imposition of hands; which Power died with them. Yet still Ministerium est indelebilis character: and the Bishop may suspend from execution of his Office, but not put him out of the Ministry, who God hath put in. CHRIST breathed on them, and said; Receive ye the Holy Ghost. The furniture and provision for the Ministers, is the HOLY GHOST. We hear in every place vocem Serpentis, the hissing of the old Serpent: let the world hear from us Gemitum Turturis, the groaning of that Turtle, the Spirit of GOD.

2 That the Lord honored Noah in conferring this office upon him. When he made him a Preacher, he gave him this dignity, that he should be saved himself, and all those whom his Ministry converted: that he might say, Here am I, and the children that God hath given me. I will but transiently touch at the honor due to Preachers.

Certainly, a Ministers life is full of honor here and hereafter too: so it is full of danger here and hereafter too. Vnicuique in sua art credendum & cedendum: We believe Physicians, when they give us prescripts: we believe Lawyers, when they give us counsel: we believe even Carpenters, in their Rules: we believe not Divines, though they bring nothing of their own Invention: but may say of their Sermon, as Jacob did of his Venison, The Lord hath brought it to our hand: So down and eat, that your souls may bless us, yea, bless God for us. Yet is every brain full of distraction about us, every mouth full of detraction against us, every hand full of retraction from us.

Men are so sick of Preaching, that not the best and most honest Divine c•scape malignant tongues: and rather than the ungodly will be saved, their very exceptions against the Preachers, shall be their color for going on in the ways of hell. Men suck their milk, like Mules; and then kick them with their he•s. Cominaeus says, he that would be a Kings Favorite, must not have an hard name; that so he may easily be remembered when preferments are a dealing. It seem•s that Preachers have hard names, for few remember them, in the point of honor or benefit. The world regards them, as poor folks do their children: they would be loath to have anymore, because they are troubled to maintain them they have. In Jereboam's time, the lowest of the people were made Priests, and now Priests are made the lowest of the people. A Lay-man, like a Mathematical line, runs on ad infinitum: only the Preacher is bound to his Competencie; thus much, and no more. Never let him be rich, lest he be too bold, and tell us home of our faults. If he stoop not at the Pulpit-door, to take measure of the people's feet, let him fast when he comes down; they will soon shorten his commons. Therefore, the Gentry to the Court, and the Country to the Cart, and the University is universally despised. We ask not Secular honors, and eminent places: the Minister, like the Fig-tree, will notlose his sweetness to be preferred over the trees. Only, find we honor in your consciences: we are ambitious of no preferment, but to be instruments of your salvation. For what else is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of Jesus Christ at his coming? Yes, ye are our joy and glory.

3 That Noah faithfully executed this Calling, and continued Preaching an hundred years. In all which space, he declared to men the future Judgments of God, reprov'd their iniquities, persuaded them to repentance, and upon their amendment of life, prophetically assured them of mercy and forgiveness. And this he performed, not only by verbal, but by actual preaching: the very building of the Ark daily preached to the world. So that both in his doctrinal instructions, and exemplary life, he was a Preacher of Righteousness. Such is a Ministers office; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, and 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉: as they deliver their Sermons, with what brevity they can, and with what fidelity they ought: so to order their conversation, that their society may delight the good, and their very absence convince the lewd. CHRIST gave Peter a three-fold charge of Feeding: and those three kinds are distinguished into Precept, Pattern, and Beneficence. We do Pascere verbo, we should Pascere Exemplo, we are not able Pascere Subsidio. We are fain to eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel, only we desire to live with you: we spend our own means, only let us Preach to you.

What Solon told Croesus, Of one of the happiest men living; Pauper & justus, in tuguriolo, &c. sic mortuus: Is true of the Preacher; no notice taken of him. They are truly called Ministers or Servants; not only CHRIST'S servants, but even yours for CHRIST'S sake. One of their titles is *Diacoo*s, a Minister of speedy labor: as a Page runs by his Lord, or as Elijah girded up himself and ran by Ahab; like Ahimaaz, so fast that you cannot see him for the dust. He is indeed a Minister, for he doth not work for himself, but for another. But as he is a Servant, so he hath some special place in the house among the servants of God. A faithful and wise Steward, whom his LORD maketh Ruler over his household, to give them their portion of meat in due season. He is a servant, but none of the inferior; a Steward. He hath a petty dominion over the rest of the family, his Lord hath made him a Ruler. This is for his Dignity: Now for his Duty. First, he must give meat to all the servants; young and old, rich and poor, weak and strong. Secondly, In due season, that is, when their appetites call for it: yea, he must not evermore stay till they desire it. Thirdly, Pro•rtis manibus, he must do it with his own hands: he is but a Deputy, and therefore must not always do it by a Deputy. Yet the Lord doth, and the people must, allow him some vacation. He is an ill fisher, that never mends his net, a bad mower, that never whets his sithe. Yet such is the madness of the multitude, that they think his body to be of iron, and his spirit of Angelical nature; that he can preach as easily and often as they would have him. And are in an hot anger, with Saul, who because David would not come at him, lying sick; Bring him, saith he, to me in the bed, that I may slay him. Such is their pity to the Minister; Bring him, though he ye sick on his bed; spare him not, though his heat and heart be spent. Yea, would $\langle \diamond \rangle$ please God that our lives were made such a sacrifice, so they might be instruments of his glory, and your salvation

4 That he had not such happy success of his Preaching, as his own, soul desired, and he might in reason have expected. A man may be lawfully called by God and his Church, and yet not turn many souls. Let him never so plainly denounce the Judgment of God against sinners, tell them that the Ark was made to preserve believers, when all out of it should be drowned: though he wrought that with his hand, which he taught with his tongue; yet still they believed not. Appears it not strange, that in an hundred and twenty years he should not convert one: not only of the wicked race, but not one of the righteous seed? O, it is the Lord only that speaks to the conscience! He is that flexanimous Preacher, whose Pulpit is in heaven. Christ is the Physician, we are the Apothecaries: and as we do not put into the compound one dram more than his prescript and allowance: so we cannot cure one soul, but He must do it. He is the Author of eternal salvation to all that obey him. We have no power of ourselves, to move an heart: Non omnis qui dicta auda, & audita credit, continuo illa faciendo obtemperat: God makes a Minister to have more sorrow in bringing forth a Christian unto the world to come; than a woman hath in her travel of bringing forth a child into this world. My little children, of whom I travail in birth again, till Christ be formed in you. Who can express the throbs and throws he endures? they are only known to the anguish of his own sensible heart. Yet after all pains, he is glad at last that the child of grace is borne: this so sweetens all, that he forgets his sorrow. Thus like Jacob, he catcheth a maye, but a Blessing withal. But alas! It is brought unto the birth, and there is no strength to bring forth.

If they came to Noah while he was building the Ark, and demanded of him, as the Jews did of the Prophet; Wilt thou not tell us what these things mean? Loe, the voice of his tongue interpreted the work of his hand, and the work of his hand expounded the voice of his tongue; yet they repented not. When God is pleased to convert, he can do it by the weakest means. For illumination of the mind, he often lights a great lamp of the Sanctuary by a little wax-candle; as he did Paul by Ananias. And for moving affections, he often by a puff of wind, stirs up the waves of the Ocean-sea. In the meanest book, a deep judgment shall find somewhat it hath not formerly seen; though it see not all it hath formerly found. Deus non est parvus in parvo: God is not straitened according to the smallness of the organ. And when he with-holds his contemned grace, Paul himself cannot move a soul. I know that nothing is more uncomfortable to a good Minister, than this, yet hath it been the lot of many holy Prophets. This is fearful; when Preachers sent for men's salvation, shall become means of their deeper confusion. There is nothing so humbles and abaseth them as this: but whether in them that are saved, or (o) them that perish, we are still unto God a sweet savor of Christ.

It is the measure, not the success, that God looks to: our reward shall be according to our works, not according to the fruit of our works. Which is our comfort; though we cannot convert men, yet we have labored their conversion: and our labor (how ever fruitless among men) shall never be in vain with the Lord. Saint Paul doth not say, Plus profui omnibus, sed plus laboravi omnibus: Not, I did more good than the rest; but, I took more pains than the rest; I labored more abundantly than they all. If we should have no reward but according to the number of the souls we have turned, woe were us! For men's hearts are so yoked with their own willfulness, that they will believe no Preacher in the world further th^o their own fancies. But this must not discourage us; it is enough that we would ha^o cured Babel, though she would not be cured: and if our Gospel be hid, it is hid to th^o that are lost. If the Lord should examine us, what soul we have converted, where should we point him? Charge them that be rich, &c. It was God's charge to P^ol, and Paul's to Timothy, and Timothies to the people. Command implies obedience, but we may command and go without. We have the keys, and they do not ru^o upon our hands; but the power is lost in the peopl^o hearts. Men have pick-lock^o of their own forging; Presumption and Security: with these they can open heavengates, albeit double-locked by our censures. The Father could have brought o^o the best Robe himself, or sent his Son into the Wardrobe: but he commands h^oservants, Proferte stolam; Bring forth the Robe, and put it on him. Wherein he did grace the means, and bring that into credit: the Lord will have his sons beholding to his servants for their glory. It is a bold truth; you shall never wear that long garment of honor, unless it be brought and put on by the Minister. He that can save you without us, will not save you but by us. If our words have lost the power in men, they have lost their right of heaven. But though we cannot save you, yet our desire to do it, shall save us. We give God what we have, he desires no more: this is enough to honor him, and crown us.

This should teach all, with faith and fear to submit themselves to the power of God's word; lest every Sermon become one day a bill of inditement against hem. There is no dallying with it; if it cannot save, it kills; like fire, what it may not soften, it will harden. This is enough to make the wicked tremble: who have gone away from so many feasts with hungry souls; heard so much, and practiced so little. As every good turn aggravates the unthankful man's plague: so very good instruction enhanceth the reprobates torment. O now let us redeem the time, hear to learn, learn to do, and do to live forever.

5 Lastly, observe that so long as Noah preached, the world was warned. God needed not to have given them any warning of his Judgments, they gave him no warning of their sins, no respite. Yet, that he might approve his mercy even to hose, upon whom he meant to glorify his Justice; he gives them long warning, that hey might have space enough of repenting. O how loath is he to strike, that threa^oens so long before he executes! He that takes pleasure in revenge, suddenly surpris^oeth his adversary, and apprehends the speediest advantage: but the Lord is pleased they should be often warned, to show how willing he is to be prevented. God is so ancient, that if sinners were not desperate, they should never smart. He doth first •ummon a parley, proclaim peace, hang out his white colors of pity; before the •ed streamers of blood be seen. He useth the commination of hell, as well as the promise of heaven: and both equally commend his goodness. The sharpness of •he one, and sweetness of the other, working together like Oile and Wine; make men wise to salvation. Nineveh had not stood, if the Prophet had forborne to say, It shall not stand. The message of their overthrow, overthrew the message: the prophecy fell, and the City fell not, because her fall was prophesied. The denuntiation of death wrought life: the sentence of destruction made a nullity in the sentence. They •eard that their houses should fall; and they forsook not their houses but them•elves: and both themselves and their houses stood.

Thus let us take the warnings of death, and turn them into inspirations of •ife. When it is threatened, we shall die in our sins: let this make us live to righ•eousnesse. If the summons of vengeance shall waken us to repentance, we shall no •ooner change our minds, but God will change his sentence. If a mature and reverent consideration of those fearful judgments, plagues, death, dearth, hell, terrors of conscience, can truly humble us: we shall hear an Angel sing, Grace, mercy, •nd peace, favor and eternal blessedness in heaven to us. God deals not with us, •s one did with Diogenes; who first broke his head, and then bad him take heed: •ut he beats his drumme, before he draws his sword. He does not as the Canon, first kill, and then make the report. But admonisheth usto repent, or else he will come against us.

There is not a soul among us, but hath been often warned: happy they, that can find this assurance in their souls that they have repented. Let not God continu•lly loose his labor: would we have him do nothing but premonish us? we are •ound to take hold of every caution, to make use of all motions and monitions: he 〈◇〉 not bound to follow us up and down with unregarded solicitings. Semel monitus•hold be Semper munitus. As Solomon to Shimei, did not I forbid thee to go o•er Kidron on pain of death? so God hath warned us to keep home, confined us to •erusalem, the City of obedience: if we pass the brook Kedron, the limits he hath set us, to seek our straggling servants, riches or pleasures, as did Shimei: he may justly punish us, and answer all our expostulations; Did I not give you warning? This seemed to be the rich man's care in hell, for his brethren on earth; that one might be sent from the dead to give them warning. We have warnings every way; LORD, let some of thy admonitions bring us to repentance; let thy commandment work us to amendment: that hearing what thou teachest, fearing what thou threatnest, and believing what thou promisest; we may find thy eternal mercies.

And saved Noah.] God's Judgments are never so universal, but some he spareth. Though Israel be reduced to a Tenth, yet God will not loose his Tythe. Though they be as the scattering grapes after the vintage, yet destruction shall lea•• here and there a berry. Though he have few names in Sardi, yet he hath some. In every loss that Job had, one still escaped to bring him news. Noah finds grace, whe• the world found perdition. Nec enim convenit mortuum mundo, perire cum m••do: he that was dead to the world, shall not die with the world: as he consented not to their sin, so he partooke not of their punishment. No streams of water shall drown him, whom the deluge of sin hath not overwhelmed. Now because the Lord hath set him forth as a precedent to aftertimes: that he who will scape as Noah did, must be such a one as Noah was: let us contemplate his Righteousness in these four passages. The warrant of his practice, His faith in this warrant, The perfection of this faith, The issue, event or success of all.

1 The warrant or ground of his obedience, was the word of God. He $\langle \phi \rangle$ warned of God of things not seen as yet. This revelation came not by a Prophet, we find none at that time, but Noah's self: but either by the ministry of an Angel, or immediately from the Lord himself. God said unto Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me. Thus doth he single out the righteous, and acquaint them with his own counsels. Shall I hide from Abraham the thing that I do? The Sodomites lie sucking in the air of security, but Abraham knew the nearness of their calamity. Surely the Lord will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret to his servants the Prophets. Neither is this the prerogative of the Prophets only; but The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him, and he will show them his covenant. We dote on nothing more than secrets; all are sick of an Athenian humor: yet is there no secret which carnal desires affect, worth the knowing. Would we participate that Secret, which no affordment of nature, no mystery of art, no Secretary of state, to wit of Man, no cunning of Devil, can find? Let us fear God: this is the key to open those supernall and supernatural secrets, which shall fill the heart with inexpressible, unexhaustible joy. Christ calls us more than servants; for the servants knoweth not what his Lord doth; even friends, because he hath made known to us the things of his Father. God makes all his friends of his Counsel, and communicates all things conducing to their blessedness, as one friend imparts his mind to another.

His secret is with the righteous: the just man shall be ignorant of nothing that concerns his salvation. But in our times there are no such revelations; therefore the state of the Church before Christ, seems to be better than this? No; for albeit GOD do not now reveal particular and personal events: yet the assurance of salvation, the comfort of remission, the very feeling of reconciliation; these he declares to us, which are infinitely sweeter. Why should I enquire, Lord what shall he do? it is enough for me to know what shall become of myself. Besides, we are requited in the complete Scriptures, we have the substance of their shadows the performance of their promises. How should this encourage us all to become God's faithful servants: for we serve not such a Lord as is strange and austere to us; one that will not give us a good look, or a fair word. Yea, he is so far from denying us these favors, that he calls us to his holy counsel, makes known to us his secrets, and communicates himself to us by his blessed Spirit.

This is a sweet comfort, if we apply it: especially considering the different estate of the wicked; whose seeing, cannot perceive; and hearing cannot understand: Zebul mistook armies of men for shadows of mountains. The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit. Nature is not here the School-master, but Grace: nor Athens the School, but Jerusalem. They are hid to the wise of the world, and revealed to babes. It is revealed to us, that God is our Father, the Church our mother, Christ our brother, the Holy Ghost our Comforter, Angels our attendants, all other creatures our subjects, the whole world our Inn, and heaven our everlasting home.

That the joys of the wicked do scarce ever begin; and when they do, their end borders on their beginning: one hour sees them both merry, and miserable. But our pleasures are eternal, millions of years being not $\langle \diamond \rangle$ minute to everlastingness, and this house of the world a mere cottage to heaven. These things as God reveals, so we must seek. When the Shunamite would needs come to the Prophet, her husband questioned her; Wherefore today? it is neither new Moon nor Sabbath. It seems that at least on those days they consulted the prophets. O let not us neglect God's clearer revealings in the Gospel nor be strangers to the business of our own salvation.

2 His faith is this warrant: the things that God revealed, and he believed, were these three. First, the great and just wrath of God against the sinful world. This he sincerely preached, and this they scornfully derided. But as the frantic Hughes, when the Physician weeps, and knows his end is near: so the wicked condemn the righteous, yet to them is known their miserable state. 2. That GOD would save him and his family, and this he believed, not only in the principal object of faith, his salvation by the Messias: but even in the inferior and particular; his personal deliverance from this inundation. 3. The means of his preservation; by an Ark which himself must make: that every stroke might put him in mind of his gracious promise; and still as that was built, his faith might be confirmed, ••mb. Ibi Deus plus est auxilii, ubi plus est periculi.

This faith wrought in him a fear; Being moved with fear, he prepared the Ark. yet carnal reason might object; What cause is there either to believe or fear? $\langle \diamond \rangle$ The Judgment was far off, 120 years to come: and who would fear so remote a thing? 2. The world was full of wise and mighty men: they all heard of his, not one of them feared. Shall Noah being one single man, against all those strong examples, expose himself to derision by a needless fear? 3. The judgment was of such a nature, as it had no precedent: for would any man in common reason think, that God would drown all the world with water? That by water, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ element so easily avoidable: and of such a quantity and measure as to overwhelm the whole world.

But loe here the invincible power of faith! it is fixed on God's word, and though heaven thunder, and earth shake, and hell roar; it will not be removed: right of all contradictions Noah believes, that he shall be saved; why he above $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the rest? even this he believed with fear. With thee, O Lord, is mercy, that thou mayest be feared. Even the mercy of a father, makes a reverent son. He might say with David; Lord, thou hast spoken good concerning me and my house, for a great while to come. What am I, and what is my house, that thou hast done thus for me? That the Lord hath led us out of spiritual Egypt, first by a child, then by woman, saved us in the deluge of superstition; gives us just cause to say; What are $\langle \diamond \rangle$ what are our people, that he should be so favorable to us?

It was strange enough, that God would take so weak an element as water, to drown those mighty Giants. Strange enough, that he would save Noah by an ark: why not take him up into heaven, as Enoch: or build him a house on the top $\langle \diamond \rangle$ some promontory? By an Ark? alas, what safety is here? may not the tempests cast it on the hard rocks, or dash it upon the Giants castles, and break it in pieces? No, Noah must lie and swim on the waters, and yet the Ark must save him from the waters. Thus shall he be safe in the sight of dying sinners: when they are expecting death on the tops of the mountains, they beheld him secure to their greater vexation. As the pains of hell are aggravated upon the damned, by seeing their once despised brethren in the joys of heaven. When the rich that have 〈◇〉 away from the poor in coaches, shall see the poor carried from them by Angel. All this God delivered, Noah believed and feared.

Let this teach us to believe God's judgments, and fear them. My flesh troubleth for fear of thee, and I am afraid of thy judgments. God foretold of a flood and Noah looked for it a 120 years after. There is no man living, but within less than 120 years he is sure to die, and to be in danger of a flood of wrath: for Quies egredimur, tales praesentamur and Dilatio proves often Dilatatio supplicii: the deferring of punishment, is the enlarging of punishment. Yet who trembles at it? who sends this holy fear to his heart, that his heart may send forth prayers for mercy? If men cry, fire, fire; we stir, run, tremble: but let the fire of God's wrath, and the fire of hell, be cried; we move not, care not, fear not: as if this were a thing quite unconcerning us. And as the fantastical musician was so transported with 〈◇〉 own raptures; that when the people cried to him, that his house was on fire: he returned them no other answer, but that either they should hold their peace, or cry in tune. So when Preachers forewarn men of these judgments, they think that we are quite out of tune.

There is no Judgment comes, but Naturians will find out other causes for it, than God. Ill weather is from the clouds, famines from ill weather, plagues from famines, or ill airs, or by apparent infection from other places: as if they concluded, as that scoffer subscribed on Adrians College; Deus hic nihil fecit; God here nothing to do. But cannot nature have her place, unless she have God's place. He overthrows not natural means, why should natural means overthrow him? Shall we give the Soldiers honor to his sword? Certainly, if men believe God, they could not think, nor speak, nor look upon his works, but with reverence.

And as our fear of God is, so is our faith: little fear, little faith: no fear at all. no faith at all. Judgment may be threatened; but the stubborn soldier Marius will not hear the laws for the clattering of armor. The great things of the Lord are drowned in some clamor; Satan that cunning silver-smith, raising an uproar more agreeable to men's humors; Great is Diana. The shriekings of Moloch, and the pitiful lamentation of burning infants, were not heard, because they deafed themselves with the instruments of music. After the massacre of many Christian virtues, steps in conscience, in the phrase of Job's messenger; I am alone escaped to thee. We like not the message, and imprison the bringer: and if the subsidiary grace of God come to succor and relieve this crying and dying conscience; men flout to stupefy their own hearts. Thus the children are come to the birth, and there is strength to bring forth. Strength enough, but it is to strangle the birth, not to bring it forth. The midwives of Egypt feared God, and preserved the children alive but the still-borne motions of God's Spirit may often testify to our faces, that we are bloody mid-wives. The frowns of men we fear, as ducks use to duple at every stone thrown into the water: we fear an Ague, an enemy, a danger; yet 〈◇〉 the Lord, who commands all these. Let us fear God more, and we shall fear all other things less: if could turn all our fear into the fear of God, we sho• then turn all our works unto the praise of God: and he will honor them, ⟨◇⟩ honor him.

3 The integrity of his faith; for this he is said to be Righteous; A just ⟨◇⟩ and perfect in his generations. Not in respect of God's Justice, For all h•ve ⟨◇⟩ and come short of the glory of God: And, If he mark iniquity, who shall stand? N• in respect of that perfection which is appropriated to the Saints in heaven: ⟨◇⟩ no mortal man hath attained. Nor yet so perfect, that he was without sin: F•there is not a just man upon the earth, that doth good, and sinneth not. Nor for superero•ting, and going beyond his duty: in not only obeying the Legal Rules, but also ⟨◇⟩ observing the Evangelical Councils; as say the Rhemists. But either Compara•e, compared with others: therefore it is added, In his generations. Or, Inchoative, •hich rather consists in the desire of perfection, than in the perfection of his desires. •r, Reputative, so esteemed; because he was without scandal to the world: But •pecially Imputative, by way of imputation: He found grace in the eyes of the •rd: and this is the perfection of faith, which clothes the person with the Righ••snesse of Christ.

There is a legal perfection, such as was in Adam, is in Christ: none are thus •rfect. Though I were perfect, yet would I despise myself; saith Job. Though know nothing by myself, yet am I not thereby justified, saith Paul. They durst not •st themselves upon God's Judgment. There is also an Evangelical perfection, •d this is twofold. It consists partly in the apprehension of Christ's righteous•sse, which is our Justification: partly in the holiness of life, which is our Sancti•cation. The former is absolutely perfect, for our Justification admits no latitude: •e latter is not so, for Sanctification is perfected by degrees: and is here but parti•l, as in a child are all the parts of a man, though it want growth, stature, and ma•ritie. The difference is not in the truth of being, but in the measure, degree, and •antity. There is Perfectio Conformitatis, to be perfect in all points; so are none •re below. And Perfectio Synceritatis; to be perfect in all good endeavor, and in •ne good measure. Ultra posse viri non vult res ulla requiri: Man is indeed bound ⟨◇⟩ keep all the Law, (and all those for whom Christ did not fulfill it, shall have it ••filled on themselves in the penalty) and that for good reason. A man in a rich •ate borrows a sum of money; he is then able to repay it: but afterwards by ⟨◇⟩ riotous living he grows unable; now shall his present and willfully contracted •verty excuse his non payment? Adam was of sufficient strength to keep the Law: •he would forfeit that grace and natural sufficiency, shall his self-incurred weak•sse excuse his disobedience?

Perfection, now, consists not in a justifiable goodness of our own: and that •e can attain, is not in lection, sed in dilection; not in great learning, but good •ing. Paul was perfect Expectatione muneris, imperfect Fatigatione certaminis. It is •d of Chrysostom; Nihil finivit praeter peccatum; He perfected nothing but the mor•cation of sin. The Inner man may be perfect, not the whole: but then here is ⟨◇⟩ comfort; Quod sit, accipitur: quod non sit, ignoscitur: What we have, is accep•: what we have not, is pardoned. Pulchrum est Index sui & obliqui: That which •rfect, both justifies it self, and shames all imperfection. He that will be per••t, must have understanding, quid agendum, what to do: Will, quomodo agendum, •w to do it: Memory, quando agendum, when to do it. Thus is a Christian per•ct: First, in purpose of heart, as Abraham is said to offer up his son Isaac, because ⟨◇⟩ had a mind and resolution to do it. Secondly, in Inchoation; Solomon began •uild the house of the Lord; The original is, He built; The beginning is called the ••formance. Thirdly, in comparison, weighed with the condition of others: as ••v. 11 3. where Integrity is opposed to Perverseness: Walk before me, and be per•, saith the Lord. The way to be perfect, is to walk before God. It was Heze••s comfort; I have walked before thee in truth. Look that the inside be not rot• this is the way to have a perfect heart.

Now because Noah's faith was the thing, that wrapped up his soul in the favor God; the ground of all his perfection and righteousness, the virtue whereby he •d, when all the world was drowned: how precious should this Jewel be to us, •hout which we can neither live in this valley of tears, nor escape in the day of •nes! There is no life but in the Son, and he that hath the Son hath life, and he •t hath faith, hath the Son. Iustus ex fide vivet: Faith like Eve, Mater omnium •entium, is the Mother of all that live. God himself is content to divide his praises with Faith: whereas the can do nothing but by him, she shall do any thin• with him. She can work wonders: Subduing kingdoms, strangling Lions, •ching violent fires, with handfuls conquering huge armies, dividing seas, turning ⟨◇⟩ streams, yea, commanding mountains to remove, overcoming the world; ⟨◇⟩ call you these but wonders? Such wonders can faith do. Yea, God is plea••• do nothing for us without her, that doth all things of himself. True faith is ⟨◇⟩ less than miraculous in the sphere of her activity, and with the warrant of G• truth. It is no Praemunire, nor offense to God's Crown and Dignity, to say, It is ⟨◇⟩ own arm to the saving of men. There is a kind of omnipotency in Faith; w•• it shall say to the Sun and Moon, Stand still, and be obeyed. But as Christ co•• do no miracle in Capernaum, because they had no faith: so where men want faith ⟨◇⟩ must be a miracle, yea, beyond a miracle, if they be saved. I know it is easy to ⟨◇⟩ I believe: there is a titular faith, but it shall never save any, until saying Be fi•• gives a man his dinner: or Be warmed, makes him hot. But he that can believe, wi••Noah, in a storm of indignation, in a deluge of destruction, when the arrows ⟨◇⟩ vengeance fly about, and the Lord raineth coals of fire like hail-stones; in ••ming trials, and strongest temptations: then to believe, shall bring a glory•• Crown in the day of Jesus Christ.

4 The event or success of all; which was Noah's building of the Ark. G• that decreed to save him, ordained also the means of his preservation. Now ⟨◇⟩ end of building it was double; one for the further conviction of the world, ⟨◇⟩ other for the saving of him and his family. For the world, the Lord did not ⟨◇⟩ give them time, but a faithful and righteous Teacher. It is happy for him that ••cheth others, to be himself righteous. It is absurd in him that flammers, to tree•• others to speak plain. Great learning and good living, are a fair couple, a ⟨◇⟩ match, it is pity to part them. Let the mountains of learning so preach, that the little hills and valleys may receive benefit.

Noah's hand taught them, no less than his tongue: his business in building th• Ark, was a real Sermon to the world. For this cause God set him a building ••score years before the Flood: why so, when he might have done it in three ⟨◇⟩ four years? But because the Lord would give them space to repent, every stro•• on the Ark for all that long time, being a loud Sermon of repentance to the• Thus do the Saints judge the world, not only by their faith, but by their fact: 〈◇〉 examples of holy men, are bills of indictment against the wicked. Thus the N•vites are said to Judge the unrepentant Jews; and the Queen of Sheba those un•leaving children of Abraham. Noah being told of a miraculous thing, and bele•ving it: being commanded an unreasonable thing, and obeying it: condemns 〈◇〉 them, that will not believe God's ordinary promises, nor obey his known prece••Malos mores mundi si pietas nostra non superabit convertendo, superabit convinc•• Many despise those that sincerely profess Christ: but their sincere profession 〈◇〉 be the despisers condemnation.

Haply those monstrous sons of Lamech came to Noah, and asked him 〈◇〉 he intended by that strange work; whether he meant to sails upon the dry 〈◇〉 To whom he relates God's purpose, and his own: they go laughing away at 〈◇〉 idleness, and tell one another in sport, that too much holiness hath made him 〈◇〉 that instead of a Palace, he was building a prison; and because other men deligh•• in Castles of stone, he (to be cross to the world) would have an house of woe•• Yet cannot all this flout Noah out of his faith: still he preaches, and builds, and •nishes. And when all they, like ghastly wretches, lay sprawling on the merc•le•• waves, he lies safe at the anchor of hope and peace. The faith of the righteous c••not be so much derided, as their success is magnified. How securely doth he 〈◇〉 out of this universal uproar, of heavens earth, waters, elements! He hears 〈◇〉 pouring down of the rain above his head: the shrieking of men, women, and c••dren, roaring and bellowing of beasts on every side: the rage of the waves 〈◇〉 him: he saw the miserable shifts of the distressed unbelievers. And now in the •idst of all sits quietly in his dry cabbin, not feeling evil. He knew that the •reat master of the world, whose judgments now overflowed the earth, would •eere him in these deep waters: and that the same hand which shut him up, would •reserve him.

Let me here again commend to you the blessedness of faith: what a sweet •ecuritie and heavenly peace doth it work in the soul, in the midst of all the inundations of evils! This is the Adamant which nothing will break: the palm that •okes not under the weightiest burden: the oil that ever over swims the g••est quantity of water can be poured on it: the sheate anchor that holds when all ••er •acklings break. The day of fire shall be more terrible and universal, t•• was •he day of water: this defaced earth that shall melt the heavens. Yet still••aith •inds an Ark, not of cumbustible wood, but of indissolvable strength: it is the ope•ed side of Jesus Christ. There, when the earth is burning under her, heaven a•ove her, the elements about her, reprobates screeking beside her, death and hell •rembling below her: she shall find assurance and peace, and at last be metamorpho•ed into ths blessed vision, and eternal fruition of such joys, to which his mercy •ring us, that they then maybe known unto us. Amen.

And saved Noah the eight person.]I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence •ommeth my help. De montibus, non à montibus: from the mountains, not of the •ountaines, but of the Lord which hath made heaven and earth. While the Justice of God was decreeing confusion to the world, his mercy was contriving a safety for his servant. And as his majesty was glorious in so weak an element for the •uine: so was his mercy, in so weak an instrument for the preservation. Here was omnipotency in both: he speaks to the creatures; clouds make rain, and let that raine make a flood, and let that flood drown the world. He speaks to Noah, make thee an Ark, and I will make that Ark save thee: do thou as I bid thee, and I will do as I promised thee.

Generally two things occur to our consideration: the Building of the Ark, and the Preservation by it: the vessel it self, and the Fraught. For the former, my purpose is not to declare the matter, measure, proportion, or fashion of the Ark: but to borrow so much of the story as is pertinent and instructive to us. This summarily consists in two things; Noah's trial, and God's Disposall. For his trial, God in building the Ark did exercise three virtues in him; his Patience, his Confidence, and his obedience: let us consider them.

For his patience: why did God set him about it an hundred and twenty years, when a small time might have finished it? This was for the trial of his patience. Thus he led the Israelites in the deserts of Arabia forty years: whereas a man may travell from Ramesis in Egypt to any part of Canaan in forty days. This God did to prove them, that he might know what was in their heart. He promised Abraham a Son in whom he should be blessed: this he performed not of thirty years after. He gave David the kingdom, and anointed him by Samuel: yet was he not possessed of it in many years; and so much that he said, Mine eyes fail for thy word. Joseph hath a promise that the Sun and Moon should do him reverence; but first he must lie bound in the dungeon. This God doth to try us, for in these exigence we show ourselves and our dispositions. Thus did he leave Hezekiah in the business of Babylon, to know his heart. When he had made such a probation of Abraham, in the sacrifice of his Son, he concluded, Nunc ego scio, now I know that thou fearest God. Did not God know before? Yes, he knows the very thoughts of men: it is not for his instruction, but ours. The Lord knows all, but thus he would have us to know our own hearts. The heart of man is deceitful above all things. The worldling knows his own house, his own horse, his own garment, he knows not his own heart. Non novi animam meam, saith Job: though I were perfect, yet I know not mine own soul. Ab occultis munda me Domine. Clense thou me from my secret faults. Ne scitis, Ye know not of what spirit you are; saith CHRIST even to his Apostles.

We know not what patience we have, what courage, what zeal, till we be permitted. A man is that he is, when he is tempted. Some presume more than they can; so did Peter, Though I should die with thee, I will not deny thee: alas, he knew not his own weakness. Others doubt of that they can, as Naaman; God be merciful to me when I come into the house of Rimmon: here I can serve God constantly, but when I wait on my master to the Idolatrous Temple, what shall I do then? Lord be merciful to me in this. Go in peace, saith the Prophet: God will strengthen thee. Every Cock-boat can swim in a river, every sculler sails in a calm: every man of a patient temper or cheerly disposition, can hold up his head in ordinary gusts. But when a black storm rises, a tenth wave flows, deep calls unto deep, nature yields, spirit faints, heart fails; here is the trial, how dost thou now? Accedit tentatio, quasi interrogatio. When our hopes are adjourned, our expectation delayed, and instead of pleasing contents, we find bitter sorrows; this will discover our hearts. If their faith prevail above sense, and hope against all natural reason and fear; our grace shall shine like orient Pearls, in true and perfect beauty. After all the prorogations of promised ease, still to stand erect and triumph: here is the assurance of faith, that hath the word for compass, CHRIST at the helme, and the voyage is salvation.

For his confidence; many obstacles might seem to stop him in the course of his proceeding, and to keep him from attempting this strange edifice. 1. The great quantity of the Ark, amounting to many thousand cubits: a work of great labor, and no small charges. If this had been imposed on the sluggard; what shall I spend all my days in building? As Florus, an idle fellow, would evenmore say, Ego nolo Caesar esse, I would not be Caesar, always marching in armor: to whom Caesar replied, Et ego nolo Foruless, I would not be Florus, always drinking in a Tavern. Or on the covetous; he would have answered, It is too chargeable: shall I exhaust my estate to set up a fantastical house? he will not do it, to have a house in heaven. 2. The length of his labor, it was to have lasted six score years: now it is tedious to man's nature, to be always doing, and never to have done. 3. The Building of it was a matter of mockerie to the world: for it signified to the rebellious destruction, to himself preservation.

Now that either the world could possibly be drowned, or that he should separably be saved; this they laughed at.

Lastly, it was a thing most harsh to natural reason. 1. It had no precedent; and to credit new and strange things, requires a new and strange faith. 2. It seemed no likely, that God's mercy should be so wholly swallowed up of his Justice. 3. To live in the Ark, as in a close prison, without light, without fresh air, and comfort of liberty; among beasts of all sorts, and that he knew not how long! Reason might say, it is better to die with men, than to live with beasts: better to die a free man, than to live a prisoner: better to die with company, than to live alone. Though if God had purposed to save him, he could have devised means more direct, & easy, more safe than this: therefore his deliverance was to be doubted of. Thus indeed, he might make himself a derision and ridiculous story of the world, all this while: and if the wicked should alter their practice, God would alter his purpose, and so there would be no flood. If there were, yet the Ark might dash against the mountains, and so he perish with the rest: and then he might with the same success have saved all this labor: therefore the best course is to let all alone, and to take my venture with the world.

All these had been strong persuasions in a natural man: but Faith dissolves these impediments, as the Sun doth dews: with resolute courage it breaks thorough all difficulties, and flies over these carnal objections with celestial wings. As Abraham begat Isaac, so faith begets Hope: and as Isaac begat Jacob, so Hope begets obedience: he believes, hopes, and builds. It is grounded on the knowledge of God's nature; Scientia is the root of faith. Presumption arises from the ignorance of God's nature; that he is just: desperation from the ignorance of his nature; that he is merciful. Some are of the error, that God will not be so cruel as to damn his creature, but he will not be so kind to the wicked, as to be unjust to himself.

Let this teach us to fortify our faith: doctrines that are plausible to our natural affections, we can formally obey: but that which is above our reason, beyond our apprehension, or against our disposition; we call that into question. The Scripture saith, that Christ is in the Sacrament really exhibited to the soul of a Christian: carnal senses deny this, reason asks with the Capernaïtes, Will he give us his flesh to eat? faith believeth this, and the soul findeth it with unspeakable comfort. God saith, that a poor good man is in better case than a rich sinner: reason and ocular experience deny it, but faith believes it, and feels it. For never did the poorest child of God wish to change his estate with the wealthiest worldling upon earth. God saith, our bodies shall rise again, how strange dissolutions, or how many alterations soever they suffer: this is a wonder to nature, an amazement to reason; but the faith of a Christian rests upon it, and the soul of a Christian shall have comfort in it.

3 For his Obedience: though Noah understood by direct revelation that he should be saved, yet he used the means, he made an Ark. He might have said, GOD hath bound himself by covenant to preserve me: his word is his word, and he will stand to it: let me labor or lie still, his will cannot be altered: though I be false, he will be true: though I omit what belongs to me, he will not forget what belongs to him, let me therefore spare the pains of so much labor, cost, derision. No, Noah is of another mind: the promise of safety, and the means of safety, be to him inseparable: he dares not but believe that God will do it, he dares not but use the means whereby he will do it. The Pontificians think to flout us with our assurance of salvation: if we be sure of it, what need we then so trouble ourselves about it? I answer, though we be sure of it, not only in the certainty of faith, but, if it could be, by immediate revelation from God: yet still let us work out our salvation with fear and trembling. If God should say to a man by his very name, Thou shalt be saved: it is no more than here was said to Noah for his temporal deliverance. Yet Noah concludes, If I make not the Ark, I am to look for no preservation, this was Noah's Divinity. And for those that think they know a shorter cut to heaven, let them take heed they be not cut short of heaven. If we be elected, no matter how we live; desperate presumption! Noah would not trust his mortal life upon those terms, and shall secure men thus venture their souls? No, God hath decreed the means unto the end, and hath promised the end unto the means: and those things which God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.

Rebecca had God's Oracle for Jacob's life; yet she sent him away out of Esau's reach. It was impossible for Herod to hurt the child Jesus, yet he must fly into Egypt. The Lord hath promised his children supply of all good things; yet they must use the means of impetration; by Prayer. Call upon me in the day of trouble. Voco te, ut invocas me. He feeds the young Ravens when they call upon him. He feeds the young Ravens, but first they call upon him, Deus non dat nisi petenti, ne det non cupienti. God withholds from them that ask not, lest he should give to them that desire not. David was confident, that by God's power he should spring over a wall; yet not without putting his own strength and agility to it. Pro quibus orandum, pro tis laborandum. Those things we pray for, 〈◇〉 must work for. The Carter in Isidore, when his cart was overthrown, would needs have his god Hercules come down from heaven, to help him up with it. But whilst he forbore to •et his own shoulder to it, his cart lay still. Abraham was as rich as any of our Aldermen, David as valiant as any of our Gentlemen, Solomon as wise as any of our deepest Naturians, Susanna as fair as any of our painted pieces. Yet none of the• thought that their riches, valor, policy, beauty, or excellent parts could save them: but they stirred the sparks of grace, and be stirred themselves in pious works. And this is our means, if our meaning be to be saved.

Thus for Noah's trial, now for God's disposal. And herein we must consider two things; His Direction, and Selection: he was both the Pilot of the Vessel, and the chuser of those should be in the Vessel.

For his Direction; the Vessel was great and huge; resembling a Ship, yet so unlike it, that it is called an Ark; capacious of all kinds of living creatures, with sufficient provision for them. This must float above the water, be laden with an heavy burden, without stern to guide her, without anchor to stay her, without mast to poise her, without Master to govern her. Noah was an husband-man, a Preacher, but (without question) he had no skill to be a Sailer; the Art of Navigation being not then found out. Therefore this unwieldy Vessel must in all reason, be cast upo• hills and rocks, by the violence of tempests, and so split in pieces. No, but when heaven and earth seem to conspire against it, it shall preserve him. How so? beca•• God himself was the Master and steeres-man of it, his providence was with it. It was indeed too vast a bulk to be governed by human skill: therefore, when by •o man's art it could be set a float, it was lifted up by the waters, and left to be guided; Non humana prudentia, sed Divina providentia.

As the Lord ordained it, so he directed and disposed it: the Lord shut him in. He himself shut the door of the Ark upon Noah, and made it fast after him, that no waters might get in unto him. God was his Porter to shut him in, Keeper to preser•• him, and great Master of the Vessel during that whole voyage. Such is his presence and providence over his children in all distresses. He forgets nothing that he hath made, but his special eye is over his Elect. As the master of a family hath an eye over meanest servant, yea, over his very cattle; but his care night and day is for •is children. They are beset with no danger of water or fire, but there is one among them, In the form of the Son of God, to deliver them. When Israel was in so ha•• a strait, as either to be drowned in the Sea, or slain by the sword; how miraculously did God provide an evasion? When Noah was to enter the Ark, and to have the door shut after him, here was an hard exigent. It was so large that Camels and Elephants might enter into it; therefore shut it himself he could not, or at least not sufficiently close it up against the waters. Nor would any of the world do it for him, they did not owe him so much love and service, but rather laughed at his vain endeavors. Himself could not, others would not, the Lord with his own hand that it for him. Being thus closed up, he was in danger to be thrown upon the rocks, having no anchor, no stern, no Pilot: loe, God was all these unto him.

In the deepest destitution of all earthly comforts, so powerful is his hand, so loving his eye, to those that serve him! Elisha had an host of men sent against him; How should one man escape from an whole army? His man cried, the Master believed, the Lord protected. When men refuse to help Noah, the Angels are ready. When the whole world expected him to perish with themselves, then the Lord is his Pilot, and the last thing their eyes must see, is Noah safe. The Lord is 〈ϕ〉 light, and my salvation, whom shall I fear? David found God to be his Vice-Ad••rall, and to carry the light before him, in the darkest storms and most violent wa•• of his trouble. There is no calamity so potent as is our Deliverer. Therefore as the Legend moralizeth of S^t. Christopher, that he would serve none but the greatest that was, and still as he found one more powerful, he would change his master: till at last from man to man, and from man to the Devil, he came from the Devil to Christ, who was the strongest of all. So if anything in the world, yea, the whole world were more potent than God, there was some color for demurring upon our choice. But seeing that He only doth what he pleaseth, in heaven, earth, sea, all places: and what he will do, all the rest must do: and that his Majesty is not more infinite than his Mercy: that he is not so ready to strike the obstinate, as to spare the prostrate: Lord, let us love thee above all things that be, that thou mayest deliver us from all things that be hurtful.

In that the Lord was here Master and Pilot of the Ark, we may observe the Antiquity and dignity of Mariners and Saylers. For antiquity, it is as old as Noah, older than the second World The dignity is great; for God himself was the first Author and first practiser of it. First Author, for Noah made not this Ark of his own head, but the Lord instructed him. First Practiser; for he performed all those offices unto Noah, else it had not saved him. This is one of those few callings, which may say, God himself was the first deviser and exerciser of it: all Callings cannot say so. Why then do Sea-farers forget that Master whom they succeed? There is now no vocation so abased and abused as it is, lighting into the hands of the most lewd and licentious persons. No generation of men more notoriously dissolute! How little do they remember that God made the first Ship, that he was the first Master, the first Mariner, the first Pilot of it; that their dispositions are so utterly unlike to his! The strange things of the Sea they behold; but those monsters are rather their play-fellows, than occasions of their fear and anxiety. Although their very sleeps be but so many reprievals of their dangers; and when they awake, they know not whether they shall ever sleep again, save in death; yet they are not mortified. There is nothing but extreme danger, or extreme hunger, can soften them. That tottering Vessel is more safe at Sea, than many of them are on Land: for that hath an Helme to guide her, but these have cast off not only Religion, that makes them good men, but even reason that makes them men: and saving only on the Sea, they live without all Compass. As their Ship on the water, so they on the Land; Reele to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man.

One would think, that the terrors of the Ocean, the wonders of God in the deep, should melt their very soul, and humble them. Where the winds domineer, and the waves roar, volvuntur ut aequora montes: where they lie, Digitis à morte remoti Quatuor aut septem: Where no mercy is to be hoped. Qui nescit orare, discat navigare: He that hath not learned to pray, let him learn to fail. Yes, haply they will pray and cry too, while the tempest beats, cast up their eyes, and send their prayers to the offended heavens: but is not their piety blown over with their misery? Yes, the GOD of their Supplications, is on Land become the object of their blasphemies: and they seldom think of him, but when they borrow his Name to swear by. The LORD is our preserver by Sea and Land, there be dangers enow in every place: therefore by Sea and Land, in every place, let us humbly serve, and confidently trust in him.

Thus for God's direction and providence over this Vessel, we come to his election of the company for it. The whole world being his, and he absolute Lord of all, made choice according to his Divine and inscrutable pleasure. In the most general Judgments, those that fear God, find deliverance. When Sodom must be destroyed, Lot and his family are singled out: the Angels can do nothing till he be safe. When Jerusalem must bleed, the Mourners are sealed to redemption. When the destroying Angel rides circuit in Egypt, the doors sprinkled with the blood of the Lamb are past over. The deluge of wrath will one day come, what shall we do then? Sprinkle our hearts beforehand with the sacred blood of the Lamb; then thousands shall fall on our left hand, and ten thousands beside us, and the Lord shall provide one way or other an Ark of safety and deliverance for us.

The number preserved, consisted both of reasonable and unreasonable creatures: of unreasonable, for man's sake; of reasonable, for God's own sake. First, let us look upon his election in the accessory, the irrational living creatures.

The Lord that would have feed kept alive on the earth, to ••e into his preservation beasts both clean and unclean. Some were even at th•t time Unclean; for Moses wrote not this by anticipation, as respecting the time wherein he wrote, the Law having then distinguished them; but respecting the time when the Flood c•me. Certainly this difference was known to the Patriarchs by Divine revelation, and continued to their posterity by tradition: as was the use of Sacrifice, offering of Tithes, and observation of the Sabbath, before the Law. Now they were not V•clean by their own nature and creation, for God made all good; nor in respect of man's use only, some being more fit for food: but by God's institution, some bei•g more fit for sacrifice, therefore called Cleane. Of the Cleane God chose Seven; of the Unclean but Two: he would have the former to multiply, and replenish the e•••• by a speedy increase; that man might have sustenance, and himself sacrifice. The other, he knew, would annoy them with their multitude: and albeit he would h••• the kind of hurtful beasts preserved, even for the punishment of sinful ma•, for then oisome beast is one of his four great plagues: yet would he have their number abridged, that they might not grow too fast upon him. These would h••• him, the other enrich him: therefore the merciful God provides most of them, whereof we have most use.

But why Seven? three male, three female, and the odd one for sacrifice? Not that we conclude with their Canon, that the double number is not good, because the V•clean came in by two: and that Impar numerus est mundus, because the odd was f•r sacrifice. For this is false. First, because both clean and unclean came in by paires and couples: how many, or how few soever, every male had his female. Secondly, they are not said to be unclean for their Number, but for their kind. Thirdly, then Noah and his sons had been unclean, because they and their wives were into the Ark by couples. But Seven; that God, who created seven days in the week, and chose one of them for himself, did here preserve of Seven clean beasts one for himself, for sacrifice. He gives us six for one in worldly things, in spiritual things let us give him all. Here are two things observable.

1 God is pleased that some noxious creatures should be reserved, for the correction and exercise of man. He hath use even of those fierce and cruel beasts, and glory by them. They being created for man, must live by him, though to his castigation and punishment. The Manichees object against God's goodness, that he made many things pernicious, as some evil weeds and venomous serpents: and many things superfluous, whereof we have no use; how then were all Good? It is answered: First, God made nothing superfluous, though we know not the use thereof: as in an Artificers shop, we being ignorant of the tools and instruments, condemn them not, though by our meddling they cut our fingers. Secondly, we have no cause to complain; for whether they be profitable, they do us good: or superfluous, they do us no hurt, if we let them alone. Thirdly, the harm of any creature ariseth from ourselves; if man had not offended God, nothing should have offended him. Fourthly, they are not altogether fruitless, for even those things that are not fit for food, have their use for medicine. Venime it self well qualified, hath been physical to our recovery. Fifthly, even by those that are hurtful, we are either corrected to humble us: or exercised, to try us; or terrified to work in $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the fear of God. Therefore use the creatures commodious, beware the pernicious, forbear those thou thinkest superfluous. In all things where our knowledge $\bullet\bullet\bullet$, let our admiration begin: though we cannot understand the creature, let us glorify the Creator.

2 Though man's sovereignty be abridged, yet he exerciseth still a Lord's \bullet ip over the creatures. Subjecisti pedibus ejus. For first, there is a natural instinct $\langle \diamond \rangle$ obedience in them, especially those that are for man's use, as ox and horse. Though his authority extend not to the absolute command over those wild and savage creatures, Lions and Tigers: yet the more necessary and serviceable ones stoop to $\langle \diamond \rangle$ yoke. Secondly, Man sometime by his strength subdueth the fiercest beast, as Sampson the Lion, and David the Bear. And when strength faileth, his wit and policy often prevaieth. Every kind of beasts, Birds, Serpents, sea-inhabitants, hath \bullet eene tamed of man kind. All other have been tamed of man, himself is tamed of \bullet one but God. 3. Though this dominion be lost by Adam, it is restored by Christ. Thou shalt be at peace with the beasts of the field. But lastly and especially, \bullet his is done by the miraculous power of God: for besides the strange reports of \bullet lutarch and Herodotus, concerning their Hesiod and Arion, Evalus and the Virgin, \bullet orne upon Dolphins backs, and brought safe to shore: And Jerome relates, or some \bullet ne under his name; how a Christian being pursued by his heathen Master, fled in \bullet o a Cave where was hid a Lioness and her whelps, which never harmed him: \bullet ut when the Pagan came in with his other servant, she devoured them both: we \bullet now that Daniel was preserved in the Lions den, Jonah in the belly of a fish, and the Viper had no power to hurt Paul. So here, the cruellest beasts come tame unto Noah: they offer and submit themselves to their preserver renewing that obedience \bullet o the repairer of the world, which before sin they yielded to the first storer of \bullet he world. He that shut them into the Ark when they were entered, did also shut \bullet heir mouths while they were entering. The fierce Lions fawn upon Noah and Da \bullet iel: what heart cannot the Maker of them mollify: Let us fear him that commands \bullet ll, and no created power shall be ever able to harm us. Fear not, the very hairs \bullet f your head be all numbered. Illi solliciti erant de animabus, Christ secures them de Capillis. \bullet ORD, we will fear no danger, so long as thou undertakest to be our Keeper. Now \bullet o him that keepeth us from evil, and evil from us; that keepeth heaven for us, and \bullet s for himself; be praise forever.

In the next place, let us meditate further of God's election, and the freight of souls preserved in the Ark: Eight persons. It was a family of four men, and four women: not men alone, nor women alone, but both, and consisting of as many women as men. The beginning of the first world, was by one man and one woman: of the second world, by four men, and four women; but always equal. This is the fundamental term of all man kind, hence began the world: man was made of dust, the woman of his ribbe, the world of this woman. Woman takes her being from man, man takes his well being from woman: therefore Eve was at the first created a Wife: no sooner a woman, but presently a Wife: and the first vocation of man was Maritari, to be an husband. Mulier propter virum; therefore the Hebrews have a proverb; Cui non est uxor, is non est vir. And for woman, as at first she took her essence, so she takes the perfection of her essence from man.

But to reduce the manifold observations here offering themselves, unto some head; we must consider two things; the Quality of the persons, and the Quantitie of the number. For quality of the persons, they were all Male and Female, Husband and Wife: and God so disposed it for three causes; Society, Proprietie, Paritie.

1 For society, it had been uncomfortable for man to have lived there alone: •ae soli. It is not good that man should be alone, I will give him a help meet for him. Marriage is called a Yoke; too heavy for one alone to bear: therefore each had a mutuall help; a wife. In the participation of good, compassion of evil, in health the best delight, in sickness the best comfort: the sole companion to whom we may communicate our joys, and into whose bosom we unlode our sorrows: thus are our griefs lessened, our joys enlarged, our hearts solaced. A friend and company never meet amiss; but above both is a wife with her husband. Duo in carne una, one <◇> body and soul, as the stock and the graff are but one tree. God when he made man, made but one: when woman out of him, he made two of one: when marriage, he made one of two. Two parties and but one love, two souls compacted into one body: both one in affection while they live, both one in their posterity when they die. Where is conjugal faith, an indissoluble covenant, an unalterable affection; here is a blessed match, not to be matched by all the treasures of Nature. The fair take no pleasure in the beauty of their own face; but by the reflection of that which others derive from it. Our eyes are not set to behold our own countenances, nor can our lips take delight in their own kisses, nor our arms in their own embraces: but in the society of a wife, by exchange, they have their use and perfection. She is man's similitude; so like him, as bone to bone, flesh to flesh, Is to Ish: where face answereth face, as did the Cherubims, both looking to the mercy-seat: and heart answereth heart, as a glass that returns upon a man his own Image. Ipse coram se, himself before himself, another that is himself, his adopted self: that loves what he loves, wills what he wills; that, as she wills his love, so loves his will: there is no society on earth that affords the like comfort.

2 The propriety; Noah and his Wife, every man had his own wife. Not one woman for many men, nor many women for one man: as wicked Lameth had before. This is the LORD'S combination, Take thy wife: not Vxor & non uxor, to take and leave, contract and divorce, put on and off like a garment: but one woman for one man, no more, no fewer, no other. In the creation, God made them Male and Female: not both males, or both females; then had they been unfit for generation: not male and females, nor female and males, much less adulterer and harlot; but two in one flesh; two, not three or four. Every wife should be to her husband, as Eve was to Adam, the whole world of women. For this cause God gave her to man, as the center wherein his desires might rest. Lust is a runagate, as if it had Cain's curse, to be a Vagabond upon earth: it runs like a mathematicall line, ad in••••tum: still covets and still remains unsatisfied. Nor is it confined within the bounds of Wife, but of woman-kind: that which should be for physic to cure it, increaseth the disease. The delight is transient, the guilt everlasting: before the sense c•• sit down, and say, it is pleased: the conscience riseth up, and says, it is afflicted. Marriage is therefore ordained to qualify desire; as fire is appeased with fuel; a medicine of the same doth mitigate: nor doth it forbid, but rectify man's affection. But lust, because it cannot be stinted on earth, the Justice of God co•fineth to hell.

3 The equality or parity: that men may learn to forbear despising of that weaker sex, behold here as many women saved as men. Not one man more, not one woman less: of the eight, women make up the just half, yea, whereas one of the four men was an Hypocrite, and after cursed, the Scripture speaks no such matter of any woman among them. Howsoever Poets in their Satyres, songsters i• their drunken rythmes, and too many men in their unrellishing jests; spend their wits in invectives against that sex: yet the Lord loveth them equally with men; and JESUS CHRIST shed his blood, and by his blood, (I am persuaded) saveth as many women as men. As she is the Wife of thy covenant, so she is the child of God's covenant: the daughter of Sara, so well as thou art a Son of Abraham. S^t Peter says, they are coheirs of the same grace: and S^t Paul, they are coheirs of the same glory.

If the body of either sex be made of the better material, it is the woman's: Adam's was made of dead dust, Eves of living flesh. She came out of m•• side, and God hath made her cleave to his side. By such a derivation, he fitted such 〈◇〉 adhaesion; that she might not be a moveable, to be departed from. From taking a bone from man, who had a bone too much, he closed it up with fl•sh, to mo••••e his nature. And this bone he added to the woman, to strengthen her that was to• soft. Thus he made a sweet temper between them, like harmony in music, 〈◇〉 for concord. This bone was taken out of the midst of man, a ribbe, a bone of his side. Not a superior part, as the head; the wife is not made to govern: not of 〈◇〉 inferior part, the foot; she is not a servant to be trode upon: not of an anteri•• part, as the breast; she is not to be preferred before the man: not of a posterior p••, the back; she is not to be set behind in contempt: but of the Side, a middle and i•different part; ordained to be his companion and equal; they that walk side 〈◇〉 side, are fellows. She was fetched from under his arm, that he should defend •er: not far from his heart, that he should love her. A vine by the sides of his ••se. Not in fastigio, vel pavimento: not on the roof, nor on the flour: the one 〈◇〉 too high, she is no ruler: the other too low, she is no slave: but in the sides, an e•uall place between both.

Neither must this embolden the wife to usurp: she was taken from the left side •hewing that she stands in need of both Protection and Direction from her husband. •y God's ordinance, man hath the preeminence. Subdita eris sub potestate viri, 〈◇〉 Thy very desire shall be subject to him. The husband is the Head: therefore if a woe•an murder her husband, she is judged by the civil Law a Parricide; by the Sta•utes of the land, a Traitor. The man had power to allow or disannul his wives •owes. The edict of Ahasuerus differs not from the law of nature. That every man •old bear rule in his own house. Vbi tu Cajus, ego Cajo, was some equality among the Gentiles: but Ego cajo, ubicunque cajo; I am Mistress, and will rule all; is poste•ous among Christians. Cardinal Wolsey's style; Ego & Rex meus, I and my King,•as intolerable in the Politickes: so the wives; Ego & maritus meus, I and my husband, 〈◇〉 insufferable in the Oeconomickes. The blessed Virgin had a more humble carri•ge towards her husband Joseph: as Saint Augustine notes from the order of the •ordes. Thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing. Not Ego & pater tuus I •nd thy father; but thy Father and I. The wife must give place to her Joseph on earth •hat will have place with Mary in heaven.

Eight persons.] Thus much for the Quality of the persons, now for the quan•itie of the number; Eight. Wherein we must consider, first why so many as •ight, then why so few as eight. Why so many; for the speedyer increase of mankind. Why so few, because this was the whole number of the righteous and •eelevers.

Eight.] This was one cause why God reserved so many, that they might fru•tifie to the multiplication of mankind. But why were not Noah and his wife suffi•ient for that end? No, they were old, for Noah was six hundred years old when •he flood came: and though he lived three hundred years after, yet we read not of a•y more children he had. But the first world was begun and peopled by two •nd no more: why then were so many to begin the second world? I answer. 〈◇〉 . God did so at the first, to show that All mankind came of one blood, and that there •as no original difference betwixt man and man. Neither is this unobserved in the •econd beginning: for though the world was multiplied by three men, yet were •hey all brethren, and the sons of one man. In effect, as at first by Adam and Eve, so •y Noah and his Wife, came all men in the world. 2. To begin the second world •here were requisite more lines than one: because now the blessed seed was promi•ed, and his line and kindred must be kept distinct from all other till his Incarnation. 〈◇〉 . There was more cause why the world should be more speedily replenished, than •t first. For the earth had some beauty and glory left it after the former curse; so •hat (though far short of Paradise, yet) it was still to Adam a delightful and plea•ant habitation. But this second curse in the flood washed off all the remaining beau•ie, and made it a rude and unpolish'd desert. Nor was only the surface of it thus •aimed, but the virtue almost quite perished, as land by long sugging under the waters, hath the heart of it eaten out. Therefore it is said, that the earth was di•ided among the three sons of Noah: they lived not all together, but overspred •e earth: for it required many hands and much labor to the recovery of it. 4. Otherwise the beasts, which were then many, would have overgrown the world, 〈◇〉 it had not been speedily replenished by their Lord's.

For this cause were four paires admitted into the Ark: not that Noah and his wife did there company together. Ambrose notes that they were not noted together ‹ϕ› the going in, but in their coming out. Non commiscetur sexus in ingressu, sed commiscetur in egressu. But indeed, that was a time of sorrow and abstinence: as the Hebrews note, that Joseph in Egypt had not his children in the years of famine, but before.

Here then we see the end of Marriage, which is Proles, Issue, to people the earth, which is the means to people heaven. Therefore is it called *Matrimo; because the married propose to themselves the titles of Father and Mother. Man is but a part of time, and therefore should not die till he hath left the world some in his room. Cui non sunt Liberi, is reputatur quasi mortuus; in the Hebrew proverb. Mans best art can only make dead things; there is no work of his head or hand, whereinto he can put a life: saving only in this; when he begets a son in his own Image, he is then said to make a living creature. Herein he doth not only supply a place in God's Church militant while he lives: but he also provides a soldier ‹ϕ› the same field against he dies. Our bodies have no eternity on this earth, but only in respect of those fruits they produce. The Thracians used to rejoice at the death, and to weep at the birth, of their children: But God teacheth us to rejoice when a child is borne. Leah bare one son, and called his name Reuben: a second, ‹ϕ› called him Simeon: a third, and called him Levi: but when above expectation ‹ϕ› bare the fourth, she purposely calls his name Judah, and expressly protesteth, I ‹ϕ› praise the Lord.

It is the most perfect work of all living things, to bring forth their like; to leave a seed behind, to preserve their Species, to continue their name and posterity upon earth, and to shadow out in some sort immortality it self, by perpetuating ‹ϕ› from the father to the son, and sons son, for many generations to come. We can scarce say that man is dead, that hath left his living image behind him. A Reverend Divine compares those two trees in the hundred and twenty eighth Psalm, the Vine and Olive, to the two trees in Paradise; the Vine is the Wife, the Olive plants the Children. The one as the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil, for both these be in marriage: the other as the Tree of Life, for a man liveth in his children. *Quid dulcius in humanis quàm gignere sibi similem, quid beatius in terris quàm s videre natorum? A wreath of children about the board, like a round of Stars above the North-pole, or a Garland of Courtiers about the Throne. They are the walking-pictures, and speaking images of their parents: the wealth of the poor man, the honor of the rich. It is said of the Ostrich, Induratur in pullos tanquam non suos: She is hardened against her young ones, as though they were not hers: Parents unnatural to their children, want the mercy of Sea-monsters; who draw their breasts, ‹ϕ› give suck to their young ones. Grant it true, that children be certain cares, uncertain comforts: and that the poor man calls them his Bills of expenses: yet the trouble of Infants are sweet injuries to the mother; Injuries, but sweet. Deo & Parenti non redditur aequalens. They are Vincula, the bonds and pledges, to ratify and confirm love betwixt man and woman. Alcibiades asked Socrates, How ‹ϕ› could endure the scolding of his wife Xantippe: Socrates asked him, how he could endure the cackling of his Hennes: Because, saith Alcibiades mine

Hennes bring me forth chickens: but faith Socrates, my wife brings me forth children: this $\langle \diamond \rangle$ amends for all.

Eight Persons. We have heard the reason why so many as Eight were preserved: now consider, why so few. Even all Noah's Family, for Noah's sake. The righteous man procureth blessings, not only to himself, but on all that belong to $\langle \diamond \rangle$. In the destruction of Sodom, Ten had saved ten thousand. Potiph was $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Heathen, yet his house shall be blessed, because Joseph is there. The Angels pro...Lot, whomsoever he brought our, should escape for his sake. Among two $\langle \diamond \rangle$ threescore and sixteen souls there was but one Paul; yet loe, God hath give $\langle \diamond \rangle$ all that sails with thee. Zacchaeus alone believed, yet this brought Salvation to $\langle \diamond \rangle$ whole House.

I make no doubt, but Noah's Family were more orderly and religious, th... $\langle \diamond \rangle$ common inhabitants of the world. For he that was a Preacher to the whole $\langle \diamond \rangle$ would not omit this duty to his own house: and they that come into the Perfumers shop, shall (though against their wills) bear away some of the sent on their clothes. He that was careful to provide an Ark for the preserving of their bodies, would not neglect the provision of grace for the saving of their souls. Indeed carnal parents, to show that they begat not their children's souls, but their bodies; provide usually for their bodies, not for their souls. But as he that provides not for their temporall estate, is worse than any infidel: so he that provides not for their eternal state, is little better than a Devil. When a great portion is readied for them, diverse parents think they have done enough, and so they may turn them off. Indeed the world may take them thus, but the Lord will not take them thus, at their hands. Joseph and Mary brought CHRIST to the Temple, when he was but a little one. Augustine professeth of his mother Monica, that with greater pangs of care she labored of him in her spirit, than in her body. Carne, ut in hanc lucem temporallem nascerer: Corde, ut in lucem aeternam renascerer. She travailed of him in her flesh, to bring him unto this light temporal: in her soul, to bring him unto the light eternall. Such mothers as Monica, will make such sons as Augustine. The Africans did present their children, in their early years, before Serpents: if with their sight they scar'd away the serpents, they held them legitimate: if not, bastards. Too many parents trust their children with such impious society, that like Serpents sucke out their souls, without scarring their skines. Zeuxes having artfully painted $\langle \diamond \rangle$ boy carrying grapes in a hand-basket, and set it abroad; the birds came and pecked at them, as if they had been true grapes. Whereat he being angry with himself, and his art, said; If I had drawn the boy, which was the principal of my work, so well as the grapes, which were but a by-accident; the birds durst not have been so bold with them. Were parents as careful to form their children's manners, as to fill their purses; those ravenous harpyes, the fowl spirits of the air could not so violently seise on them. I say to every father, as Paul to Timothy; Serva depositum;ooke to thy child, the pledge of God's goodness; thy comfortablest Image in life and best monument after death. I commend guarding their persons, and regarding their estates: but howsoever those things succeed, let me so love my children's bodies on earth, that I may one day meet their souls in heaven.

Eight.] Among all these there was not one servant. What, none of Noah's ser•ants? Some think he had none; and that the simplicity of those times required •o attendance, but every man waited on himself.. This they collect from God's •harge to Noah;Enter thou and all thy house into the Ark: and because not a ser•ant entered, therefore conclude, that he had none in his house. But here is the won•er, that Noah's own servants would not believe his preaching. They will rather •in and die with the world, than repent and be saved with their Master. Perhaps •hey did Noah service, and he might think well of them, because he could not dis•erne the heart: but they served not God, and were therefore lost. It is the good man's will, that all which serve him, should truly serve the Lord.The faithful •hall dwell with me, and the upright shall serve me. He that worketh deceit, shall not •well in my house. It is an ill mixture in a family, when God shall have the Parlor, •nd Satan the Hall: when Saints pray in the Chamber, and ruffians swear •n the Celler: when Noah is calling upon GOD, and his family doing sacrifice •o Bacchus. I confess, that governors are but men; they have but two eyes, and can•ot see into all places. But when their care is that God be honored, their houses •ell ordered, and all Christian offices solemnly performed; though the success •nswere not their endeavors, in bringing their servants to heaven; yet their own •oules shall be saved in the day of Jesus Christ.

Eight.] What then became of those that built this vessel? Certainly, as Noah was no sailer to guide it, so no carpenter to build it. The Smith, the Carpenter, and •any cunning workmen, were hired to frame it: nor Smith, nor Carpenter, nor any •there workman was saved by it. It must be exceeding labor to bring in sufficient provision, for the innumerable kinds of creatures there reserved; and not a few were employed in this service; not one of them tasted this provision. More hands went to this work than Noah's: many wrought on the Ark, that found no safety by the Ark. Outward works cannot deliver us, without our faith: men may help to s•ee others; and perish themselves. And as diverse hearers are like the Pinacles on t•• Belfry; when men begin to ring, they begin to quake; but continue ringing, they stand as still as stones, their fear is past. So some Preachers may be like the be•••, that ring others to Church, and come themselves no nearer than the steeple. O• like high Spires and Pinacles, that point upward, and poise downward. God will shut up believing Noah's in that Ark, which others have built: who are like foo••• porters, that have the keys, and open the gates to let in others, and never mind going in themselves. It is happy so to build up Zion, that we may dwell in Zion: so to set others forward to heaven, that we be not behind ourselves. As Theodosius said, he had rather be a true member of the Church, than Head of the Empire: it is better to be one of the Eight saved in the Ark, than one of the hundreds commended for their admirable skill in building it.

Eight.] Among these few there was one hypocrite; Ham: yet was he preserved with the rest for Noah's sake. Such is the mercy of God, that not one good man shall perish with the bad; yet one bad man shall be spared with the good. The righteous shall never be swept away for company, yet the unrighteous are often forborne for company. The ship may be in danger because Judas is there: but Judas shall scape because Jesus is there. O that of a perishing world but Eight should be selected, and that one of those Eight should prove a wicked man! That Ham after all this should so profanely offend! That neither the wrath of God in destroying the world should humble him: nor the mercy of God in his deliverance should better him!

There is nothing to be said, but the Lord chooseth whom he will; and when the unrighteous perish, yet Thou remainest holy, O thou worship of Israel.

Eight.] Of the whole world, no more saved? a miserable spectacle! See what sin can do; bring many millions to Eight persons in a short time. Though Israel were as the Stars in Solomon's days, yet brought to a Tenth. David would number them, but the Lord soon decreased them. Let us never glory in our multitudes, for if our sins provoke him, God can easily make us few enough. Though our streets were sown with men, and our children grew up like young plants, or grapes in unnumbered clusters: yet the Lord can melt them as snow in the sun, mow down the flowers, empty the Land of fathers, and leave no widows to make lamentation for them. So that a man shall be more precious than the gold of Ophir. But if we fole in our numbers, yet we hope for supply from our neighbors? No, let not our adherence with man, endanger our conjunction with God. He can reduce many thousands to few, as he did to Gideon; that the glory might be his. He that could narrow up a whole world to Eight, can bring a kingdom to two, to one, to none. ⟨◇⟩ thousands run on the course of disobedience, they shall quickly enough ⟨◇⟩ diminished.

Eight.] Lastly, hear is figured out to us the paucity of souls that shall be saved. Many are called, few chosen. The gate of bliss is narrow, and few enter into it. My ⟨◇⟩ is a little flock: little in respect of the number drowned in the deluge of ⟨◇⟩. Questionlesse, as small as it is, everyone hopes well of himself: and if Noah ⟨◇⟩ foretold this definite number to that world, all would have presumed, I am ⟨◇⟩ of the Eight. When black and ravenous ruin spreads her dismal wings to sweep away the wicked; few tremble: for they conceit themselves to be none of the forlorn crew. Yet what is the common religion of the world? To say the Creed is all their faith; to pay what they must needs, all their equity: to say Be filled, all their charity: to take their own, all their mercy: to give fair words, all their bounty: ⟨◇⟩ carry a formal profession, all their piety: to cry God mercy, all their perti...: and to come to Church, all their conscience: but will all this bring them ⟨...⟩ number of Eight? None belong to the Ark, but the members of CHRIST: none are his members, but they be in the body of his Church: none are of his body, but they live by his Spirit: none have that life, but they walk after the Spirit: none so walk, but their consciences be cleansed: none are thus pure, but they have repented: none have repented, unless they forsake their sins: and none forsake their sins, but they must needs have amended lives.

Haply each thinks, I am in as good case as others, I shall speed as well as my neighbors: so might the old world tell their fellows; and they all sped alike indeed, in one common destruction. But it is not good to venture all our estate in one uncertain bottom, to hazard our eternal being upon the exemplary practice of the multitude. Noah believed alone, when all the world contested against him; and Noah was saved alone, when all the world perished without him. Who would not rather affie God's word with one singular Noah, than be incredulous with the whole world, and perish? Magna plenitudo hominum, sed magna solitudo bonorum. Sinners so swarm, that there is scarce elbow-room for the righteous. But if the righteous shall scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and sinner appear? The righteous are scarce, and even their salvation is scarce; and shall not sinners tremble? Strive to enter in at the strait gate. There is a Difficultie, it is strait: but a Possibilitie, it is a gate; and a gate was made for entrance. O then let us get assurance to our consciences, that we are some of those few. Do we groan and bleed for our errors? do we strive to rectify our lives? do we solutely detest our sins? do we implore grace by our prayers? do we consecrate to God our hearts? do we rest upon CHRIST by our faiths? do we follow after holiness with our endeavors, and love the Lord with all our souls? We shall then feel, what no tongue of man can express; the sweet testimony of the Holy Ghost to our consciences: that we are wrap'd up in the bundle of life, sealed to the day of redemption: and how few soever escape destruction, we are of the number that shall find salvation; through the mercies and merits of JESUS CHRIST.

The Mystery of Noah's Ark.

THIS miraculous preservation hath also a mystical sense; and serves for the Instruction and consolation of the militant Church unto the worlds end. There is in a Text, as in a Tree; the bud, blossom, fruit: a literal, a spiritual, and a moral sense. Awake O North-wind, and come thou South, blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out: let my beloved come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits. In a literal sense, Solomon's Queen desires a pleasant garden to delight her husband. In a spiritual sense, the Church intreats the Holy Ghost, that wind which blows where he pleaseth, to blow upon, and enlarge her graces, that CHRIST, her husband, may take pleasure in her. In a moral sense, she would have all her children bring forth store of fruits, good works that they might be blessed of their father. O daughter, forget thine own people, and thy fathers house. Literally, it is spoken to Pharaohs daughter, to forget Egypt wherein she was bred and borne, and to adhere to her husband Solomon. Mystically, it speaks to the Church, to forget this world, wherein she was borne an Egyptian, black with sins: and cleave faithfully to her beloved CHRIST, who had now with his own blood washed her fair, and greatly desired her beauty. So that under the title of Pharaohs daughter, hear what the Spirit speaketh to the Church. Thou hast ravished my heart with one of thine eyes, with one chain of thy neck. Literally, corporal beauty is commended; chains, jewels, ornaments allowed: spiritually, graces, the beauties of the soul; and good works, the beauty of graces, are required. Only here is the difference between other Trees and the Tree of life. They first bud, then blossom, then send forth fruit: but the tree of life hath all these at once. Yea further, as in a tree there is the bark and the pith: so in a Text are Quaedam adjacentia, some things that lie on the upper face: and Quaedam in haerentiae, some things in the bowels of it. Thus Noah's Ark literally served for the temporal deliverance of their bodies: spiritually it taught them the eternal deliverance of their souls: mystically it presignifies to $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the deliverance of both our bodies and souls from the vengeance due to our sins. As a Musician therefore, first tries the sound of his Instrument, before he plays the lesson: so now having delivered the literal sound, I come to the mystical sense.

Herein let us observe first what it taught them, next what it must teach us. It instructed them in two things.

First, it was a pledge of God's love to their souls: for he that was so careful to save their bodies from the flood of water, gave them certain hope that he would save their souls from the fire of hell. The preservation of that which was mortal and inferior, was a strong argument that the other should be safe, which was immortal and far more precious. When a house is on fire, he that redeemeth the Cabinet, will not lose the Jewel in it. Let it be granted, that God doth sometimes reprove the wicked from temporal plagues, and binds them over to the General Session: yet is David's inference good; By this I know thou favourest me, because mine enemy doth not triumph over me: from mercy to his body, he argues grace to his soul. We cannot conclude by inversion, that whom God doth not free from temporal judgments, he will not free from eternal: none are to be judged for outward misery. Let her alone, for her soul is troubled, and the Lord hath hid it from me. The cause of their troubles is hid from us. If your soul were in my souls stead, I could heap up words against you, and shake my head at you: I could, but I would not. Quod nos in malum, Deus saepe destinavit in bonum. But from a less benefit to a greater, is a good collection of faith. When the faithful of Israel saw the LORD'S arm in delivering them from Egypt, they believed that he would bring them into Canaan. He that hath freed us from superstition, certainly means us to salvation.

Secondly, it was a confirmation of their faith and obedience. Without obedience in building the vessel, without faith in believing the promise, they saw no hope of preservation. This taught them for afterwards, what precept soever was imposed, to obey it: what promise soever was made, to trust upon it. And what could be strange to their confidence, that had of miraculous mercy so late an experience? Some profess they believe the pardon of their sins; yet fear the want of bread, or sink under some light burden of sorrow. Is any load so heavy, as the pressure of sin? O the weight of one sin is too much for the supportation of one man. Now hath CHRIST borne the talent, and can he not bare the dram? Shall we trust him with our wounds, and not with our medicines? Hath he given us the bread of life, and can he not give us the bread of earth? Shall we say with the sting Jews; He gave us streams from the rock, but can he give flesh to his people? Consider, will Christ deny flesh to our bodies, that hath given his own flesh to our souls? Hath he performed such Sovereign pieces of gold, and will he stick at farthing tokens? He that spared not his own Son for us, what good thing will he deny us? Do we trust in the Lord for the remission of our sins, the resurrection of our bodies, and the everlasting salvation of our souls: and distrust him in a fever, in a scandal, in a fit of want? Certainly if he have vouchsafed us that great mercy to make us his own; he hath given the whole army of afflictions more inviolable charge concerning us, than David gave his host concerning Absalom; See ye do the young man, my Son Absalom, no harm: look you never hurt them whom I have adopted.

Thus for them, now for ourselves. This Ark hath also a symbolical sense, a spiritual use. It was a Type and figure of Christ's Church: out of which there is no hope of salvation, as out of the Ark was inevitable destruction. Examine we the resemblances.

1 All that were preserved, were within the Ark: all that shall be saved, must be of the Church. In that great deluge, when Omnia Pontus erat, deerant quo{que} littora ponto, there was no other possibility of escaping: in the huge pond and vast sea of this world, there is no hope of redemption but by Jesus Christ. Either we must *•*he incorporate into Christ, or reprobate with the world. The Lord adds to the Church daily such as shall be saved: to the Church militant, all souls that shall be crowned in the Church triumphant. As for them that were out of the Ark, no gold could buy their preservation: no holes could hide them, no hills help them, no houses hold them, nothing in the world, not the world it self could save them. So for them that be out of Christ, no riches can bestead them, no honors secure them, no policy can deliver them, no refuges can shelter them, no friends, no favor can do them good; but they must perish in the flood of GOD'S eternal vengeance. What succor had they by the mountains, or by taking hold on the highest Cedars, whom the Ark received not? Such help shall men find in those worldly things wherein they have trusted, when God shall find them out of his Church. What relief in their honors, upon whose foreheads the sun of promotion wantonly plays: As if that arm should never ache, that wears a silken sleeve: nay as if the highest hills were not most subject to the lightning-flashes. For the covetous, that like a spider eviscerates herself, spends her own bowels in making a web to catch a fly; how foolish is his confidence in that, which he knows will never fail him but when he hath most need! Alas, he cannot buy Christ with it; and therefore must expect Simon Magus doom; Thou and thy money perish together. There is no other name given to men under heaven, to be saved by, but the name of Jesus. Nothing in nature, nothing in art, nothing in the world, no other creature, no other Name. In vain they think to sails in their cockboates, or swim with their windy bladders: every heresy is a little bark by it self, and while it is not troubled, it goes on with proud sails like a Merchants ship: but vexed you shall find it a man of war. Every factious and discontented humor is like a bladder, which the peevish refractory puts under his arm, and he will not be beholden to the Ark for passage, he can swim to shore. Let such sullen spirits hear and fear: as a man will not admit that person to his house, who loves not his family: so they that forsake the Church, must be forsaken of Christ.

2 As God was the Pilot of the Ark, so CHRIST is the Governor of the Church. The superstitious Romanists have their several Saints for several services; for the Teeth, Apollonia; for Soldiers, Saint Maurice; for Sea-men, Saint Nicholas. As those gross Idolaters in Heathen times, marshalled their gods into several ranks; allotting Heaven for Jupiter, Hell for Pluto, and the Sea for Neptune. But the Lord is all in all to us: our Pilot on the Sea, our Captain on the Land. We tender not our petitions to the no gods of the Gentiles, or ot the moe gods of the Papists: we do not trouble the blessed Virgin for everything, as if her Son Jesus were still a Babe, and not able to help us: but we go to Christ for all. That same Ship in the Prophet, Every man calling upon his god; is a map or module of Rome: one calling on Saint Francis, another on Saint Anthony, &c. But if we love learning, the Lord is our Gregory, the God of Wisdom: if Soldiers, he is our Mars and Maurice, the Lord of Hosts: if Mariners, he is our Neptune and Nicholas; that commands the winds and seas, and they obey him. As Caesar said to the trembling Mariner; Confide nauta, Caesarem vehis: Be not afraid, thou carriest Caesar. So, O Church be comforted; He that is in thee, for thee, with thee, that guides thee, that will save thee, is the Invincible King JESUS CHRIST.

3 The matter of the Ark was not every kind of wood, but the Pine: nor is everyone admitted into the Church, but such as the Lord hath chosen: Which are not borne of blood, nor will of the flesh, but of the will of God. Ex quolibet ligno non fit Mercurius: the Lord often leaves the lofty Cedar, that over-looks the rest with an imperious top: and the sturdy Oke, him that will not stoop to his Word: the melancholy Ewe, the hollow-hearted Elderne, the intractable Thorn, the hypocritical Ivy, that by embracing the tree, sucks out the heart of it. He chooseth the Vi• for his Orchard, the Pine for his Ark: he first hewes us out of the wilderness of Sin, takes away the ruggednesse of our nature, and having planed us by grace, puts us into his Church, where we fit with the rest in unanimous obedience.

4 The Ark consisted of many pieces of wood joined together: Non ex † ligno constat navis: Nor doth the Church consist of one man, or one sort of men; but of every nation, and kindred, language and people. Many souls compacted † one body, many Christians into one communion of Saints. And all these make b• one Ark, one Church. One World shows that there is but one God: one God that there is but one Church: one Church, that there is but one Truth. Therefore is it called Columna Veritatis, and Columba unitatis: The sweetest music consists of many well-tuned voices: if there be any jarring and contentious spirit, he is out of tune, none of the Christian consort. Let us live as we sing, and our hearts go with our voices; this is the Conccent of the Church. God doth seldom divide his graces among divided spirits: if we will not beat one with ourselves, he will not be † one with us. A shievel'd thread is hardly got thorough the needles-eye. The Spirit is one, and said to speak by the mouth of all the Prophets; not Per ora, sed Per •s; as † all the Prophets had but one Mouth; to show the singular harmony of their concord. That Spirit which came in a Dove will not come but upon a Dove. When we delight in discord, our assemblings are dissemblings, our convocations provocations, every man vultuous, wedded to a wife that fools him, Self-will: here is as little argument of a Christian congregation, as the confusion of Babel was like the harmony of the Temple. An unsquared stone, a warping board, a jarring spirit, must not be put into the building of Christ.

5 The Ark was pitched within and without, the better to keep out the water. So must every Christian be joined into the Body, with Profession and Sinceritie: sound-habited without, sound-hearted within. Nor profession, nor sincerity, are sufficient asunder; both do well together. Jericho was pleasant of situation, but the Springs were naught: many men's profession is fair, but the fountain, the heart is infected. Laish was a barren turfe, but the heart of the ground was good, had it been tilled: so some have a little religion hid in their consciences, but for want of husbanding their graces, it perisheth. But God cannot abide a wanton Christian: A wanton Jew, Turk, Pagan, is bad enough; but none so intolerable as a wanton Christian, As in many things we sin all; so in some things we may obey all: b• one line makes no Geometry, nor doth one act put Christianity. Neither the timber rotten at the heart, how fair soever to the eye, nor the timber crooked and ill-favored to the eye, how sound soever at the heart; shall be put into Christ's Ark. To be good, and not to appear: to appear good, and not to be; is not the way to glorify God, or for him to glorify us.

6 In the Ark were diverse rooms, so in the Church are diverse places and gifts, as in heaven there be diverse mansions. Many distinct offices in a ship; the Pilot, Captain, Boat-swaine, Mariners; concur all in one care for the preservation of the vessel. In the Church be Apostles, Prophets, Pastors, Teachers; ye• all tend to the Edification of the body of Christ. There is nothing more endangers confusion, than for one to intrude into another's room: displacing the members from their proper faculties and functions. When the rude hind will be a counselor of State, the ignorant sectary be made a Bishop, and Jack Cade a Justice of peace. It is no easy wisdom, rightly to distinguish our own office: all parts have their several functions; and Tractent fabrilis fabri. The foot must not usurp the office of the hand, nor the hand intrude upon the office of the head. Aliud plectrum, aliud Sceptrum. So look to others vineyards, that thou be sure to keep thine own. If we be Christ's faithful soldiers, let us keep our station, and fight it out with victorious courage. What room in the ship soever is assigned us, let us make that good. In God's Arithmetic there be no cyphers, we must be something on earth, or we shall be nothing in heaven.

7 In the Ark were beasts clean and unclean: in the Church are sinners blended among the righteous: The Lord did sow good seed in his field, whence then hath it ears? The devil hath no ground of his own, but he soweth in God's field, and upon God's seed: so the corruption of the good, is the generation of the bad. These ears are not of God's sowing; it is none of his fault. All that he made, was exceeding good. The Church militant is an heaven, but on earth; therefore not without the fire-brands of hell. Let no man leave God's floor, because there is some chaff, nor break his net because there is some baggage: nor run out of his field, because there is some cockle: nor depart from his house, because there be some vessels of dishonor. God would have spared a City for ten good ones, and shall we refuse a Church for ten bad ones? Fugio paleam, ne hoc sim: non aream, ne nihil sim. I avoid the chaff, lest I become chaff: I keep the floor, lest I become nothing. This their accusation of the Church is vain; if men cannot prove it, they shame themselves: if they do prove it, they deny Christ: for his clear answer was a Sinite crescere, Let both grow together till the harvest. Either because the bad may turn good: God can make a Luther of a Monk; a St. Augustine of a Maniche. Or because the good are exercised and tried by the bad. If Arius had not held a Trinity of substances with a Trinity of persons: and Sabellius, an Unity of persons with an Unity of essence; the mysteries of the Trinity had not been so clearly explained by those great lights of the Church. If Rome had not so violently obtruded her merits, the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ only, might have been less digested in men's hearts. We may say here, as Aug. doth of Carthage & Rome. Magis nocuit Romanis Carthagotam cito eversa, quam prius nocuerat tam diu adversa. If some enemies had not contested against the Church, it might have gone worse with the Church. But let them, bear the rack of their own fancies, whose schismatical torn opinions are stitched together with a skain of sisters thread, and rounded with the bobbin-lace and selvedge of reformation. Criticall quarrels argue hypocritical hearts: and if they prevent it not by humility and unity, the Ark holds none so unclean as themselves.

8 The Ark was tossed of the waves, and all the storms of the world spent their furies upon it, yet could it not be overwhelmed. When the winds, waters, weathers, had done their worst, still Noah's preservation was sure. The more the water rose against it, the more the Ark rose above it: and the higher it was raised by the flood, the safer it was from the danger of hills and rocks. In the midst of water it was saved from water, and the danger it self was made a defense against the danger. Thus sure of salvation is everyone in Christ, nothing can cross it. The deluge of calamities may assault us, but they shall exalt us. The more they seek to press us down, the more they shall lift us up: the nearer they would sink us to hell, the higher they shall advance us to heaven. Through all the gusts of temptations, and floods of afflictions, we shall be borne safe in Christ's Ark. Nothing shall pluck them out of my hand. Satan cannot, he is cast out: tyrants cannot, for if we suffer, we conquer: sin cannot, for grace abounds above sin: sickness cannot, God is strongest when we are weakest. Death cannot, that serpent hath lost the sting. Indeed Non minus vita sine luctibus, quàm mare sine fluctibus. All our voyage is a tempestuous navigation: the shore from which we launch, is our nativity: the Port whither we are bound, supernall felicity: the sea we must pass, full of raging calamity: the ship wherein we sails, full of sweet security. There will be cross winds, but let us rest in the Ark, the Church; and trust in the Pilot, Christ: and our danger is not half so sure as our deliverance: we may fail of grievous afflictions upon earth, we shall not fail of glorious salvation in heaven.

9 Noah's body being entered into the Ark, seemed there a dead man: that vessel being a grave or tomb unto him, wherein he was buried. Yet was that by God's appointment, the means to save him, which in all reason seemed to bury him. And if Noah will be safe, he must go into this sepulcher, and be buried in the Ark, as the Ark in the water. So must there be in us a mortification of lusts, and burial of our corruptions: and there is no way to everlasting life but this. The soul cannot live, while the sin doth live: one of the two must die, the corruption or the person. Thus is death the way to life; and mortification of lust, to the resurrection of bliss. He that thus dieth not, never lives: and he that is not thus buried, never riseth again with comfort.

In how wretched an estate then are many, that scarce know what mortification means; unless it be to mortify grace, and to bury all holiness. The old man reigns, and the new man serves: corruption lives, and grace is dead. To mortify goodness by our sins, this is common: but to mortify our sins by goodness, this is rare. What a preposterous change is this? Christ should live in us, and we crucifie him again: sin should be crucified in us, and that liveth. But this is a true saying; He that will live when he is dead, must die while he is alive. Proceed we then after this spiritual death, to the burial of our sins. It was the manner of the Jews, to bury their dead with odors: bury we sin with the Incense of our prayers against it, that it may never return upon us. Only two things let us avoid in the burial of our sins, which we observe in the burial of our friends. 1. When we bury our friends, we do it with mourning, to testify our loves, that we are loath to part with them. Our sins must not be so buried; no sorrow at their departure: no man weeps to lose an enemy, nor grieves to be rid of a Tyrant. Shall we sorrow, to lose the proper cause of our sorrow? It was good news for Israel, that Sisera was dead in the Tenths of Iael; and Deborah sings; So perish all thine enemies, O Lord. Sepelitur cum gaudio, quae non retinentur sine periculo. Let them be buried with joy, that cannot be kept without danger. 2. When we interre the bodies of our friends, it is done in hope that they shall rise again: by no means, so bury we our sins; let there be no desire of their resurrection: wrong not the Sepulchers of the dead, let them sleep forever. Otherwise, like Judas, and Demas, and such hypocrites; they bury them not in their forgotten graves, but in their own hearts. And so Cum surgent corpora, resurgent & peccata; their sins shall rise with their bodies, and go with them to judgment.

Lastly, the Apostle compares it to Baptism: that which was Noah's Ark to them, the same is Baptism to us: the Ark saved them, Baptism saveth us. The like figure whereunto, &c. The particular Instance, or point of reference is Baptism; the General is the Church. For Baptism no otherwise saveth us, than as it is a seal of our admission into the Church, and incorporating into Christ. Therefore it is a Synecdochicall speech, the part for the whole, the door for the house, Baptism for the Church.

Baptism is the door of entrance into this Ark; therefore the sacred Fo•t ⟨◇⟩ commonly placed near the Temple door. As in Solomon's Temple were three rooms, the Porch, the Body, and the Holy of holies; and they must pass thorough the one into the other. So in Christianity, we cannot enter the Holiest of all, b•t by the Church; nor into the Church, but by the Porch of Baptism. There mu•• first be shipping, then sailing, last of all arriving: we must be shipped with Christ by Baptism, sails with him the Pinnasse of the Church, or else not arrive at the co•• of eternal blessedness.

The end of Baptism is double; Principal and less principal. The principal is to assure us of two things. First, the remission of our sins; Be baptized ⟨◇⟩ the name of Jesus, for the remission of sins. And next, that we are within God's covenant, partakers of his grace here, and of his glory hereafter. The less principal consists in three things. 1. To note a distinction between Christians and Infidels: a cognizance or liverie to tell the world, whose servants we are; the Colours of that General under whom we fight. 2. To be the bond of Christian society. Keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace: Why? Because there is One faith, One Baptism. We are all baptized into one Christ; the remembrance of our Baptism is enough to stay contention. 3. It is a profession of homage to that God, even those three persons, in whose Name we are baptized. And it is a holy memorial of Christ's baptising in the sea of his Fathers wrath for us.

Except a man be borne of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into heaven. As •he Spirit is an inward necessary cause, so Baptismal water is an outward necessary •eanes, of our regeneration. It incorporates us to Christ; Vt susceptus à Christo, & Christum suscipiens, non idem sit post lavacrum, qui fuit ante baptismum: sed corpus •geniti, fit caro crucifixi: so that the body of the baptized, is become the flesh of him •hat was crucified. The day of the Infants baptising, is the day of his marriage; wherein he is made the Spouse of CHRIST by the union of the Spirit. As Christ was made our flesh Nascendo, by being borne: so we are made his flesh Renascendo, by •eing new borne. The Spirit being in the new birth instead of a Father, and water •n stead of a Mother.

As there is a long Antiquity of Sacraments, so a special necessity. For Antiquity; in Paradise was a Tree of knowledge, and a Tree of life: both Sacramental •rees. For necessity; as a man consists of two parts, one visible, the other invisible: so respondent be the means to draw him to heaven, the Word and Sacra•ents: and a Father calls the Sacrament, Verbum Visible, a visible word. We fell •rom God to Satan by visible things; God brings us back from Satan to himself •y visible things. Wherein we may see the infirmity of our natures; the Lord is •aine to stay us up by many helps: the word for our ears, the Sacraments for our •yes. If we see a house held up by props, pins, columnes and supporters; we say, •t is certainly old, sere, and weak of it self.

I do not enforce an absolute necessity of this, as if God could not save us with•ut it. Of it own virtue it hath no such power to salvation; water of it self be•ng readier to drown, than to save; especially the Infant being dipped into it. No •an concludes the Innocents out of the Ark to be damned and cast into hell; so •or the Infants of Christians that die unbaptised. It pleaseth the Lord to admit Infants to baptism, though they be not able to answer for themselves. And as it was •n his Justice to impute my sin to my child, to make it guilty: so it pleaseth his mercy to take my faith for my child, to make it holy.

Open thy mouth for the dumb, in the cause of all such as are appointed to destructi••. Still the Lord requires our speech for those speechless little ones; whom the •loudy Papists appoint to destruction. They cannot answer for themselves; but •he Lord Jesus, when he was on earth, spake for them; and he hath sent us to plead •heir cause. They have those great Dukes and Peers of heaven for their Patrons, The Angels: and shall we be silent.

Parents love to hear well of their children's states in this life, much more •hold they enquire of their state to come. The greater their joy in them, the grea•er their sorrow for them; especially when they fall sick in the field, and die at •ome; as the Shunamites son: but more especially if like David's son, they •ie without the Sacrament. Then their ignorance and distrust puts them into a hope•es grief: as if they were of the stock of Ishmael, and not the seed of Israel. And •ven those that will not keep their hours with God and the Church, in respect of •tate and outward complement; yet take on with God and man if their children •miss baptism. I would they did think of that woman's speech to Elias; Art •hou come to call my sin to remembrance, and to slay my son? that God in slaying their •ons, brings to remembrance their sins. But that good Lord, who punisheth our •eglect, shows mercy to those little ones. They often vanish from us in a night, be•ore we have scarce looked on their faces: but the God of compassion, who pities •hem in Ashur and Nineveh, will he forget the seed of Christians? We miss them •n our arms, behold they are in the arms of God. They are plucked from the mothers bosom, but unto Abraham's bosom: translated from a cradle below, to a Throne of immortality above. How oft doth a friend among men, take a babe from the poor feeble mother, and bring it up as his own; as Pharaoh's daughter did Moses! And shall not God take a child from the womb, or waine it from the breast, to have it nursed in heaven, lest it should find ill bringing up here?

Let this comfort parents against that unmerciful doctrine of Rome; teaching that if children die on earth without baptism, they must die hereafter without mercy. That infants who cannot speak or do ill, whose flesh is but new quickened in the womb, or bones scarce gristled out of the womb; should pass from the darkness of the womb, to outer darkness forever; this is the voice of the Deagon goared with blood. The Lamb of God speaks better things, and gives his blood to these little lambes. David grieved for the child sick, but desired not respite of life for circumcision: and though the child died on the seventh day, (which had been terrible, if the want of a day had lost it forever) yet he then ceased mourning.

The children of Israel forbore circumcision forty years, during all their journey in the wilderness: will they pronounce damnatory sentence on all them? If not, why then on ours? Hath the state of the Gospel less mercy and pity than the Law? Goes it harder with the infants under Christ, than under Moses? They had a set day for circumcision, the eight: we have none defined: hath not the Lord in this left it freer? Those infant Martyrs, to whose memory they observe a feast as to Saints; desired nor Baptism, nor their friends for them; much less that baptism of blood; but their hearts rather bled for it: yet are they glorious in heaven. John Baptist seems not to have been baptized himself, by his answer to Christ, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me? God's love is no fancy that the want of baptism may break off. It were heavy for the poor child to be lost for the Parents or Ministers negligence.

To say that Baptism even the most ritually and formally administered, saveth of it self, is to defy it, and to make a god of the water, with the Gentiles. But the Lord saveth, and when he pleaseth, without that This day is salvation come to this house; he is also the son of Abraham, saith Christ of Zacchaeus. This day, and yet that was not the day of his baptism: he was made the son of Abraham, yet was not washed in Jordan. The Eunuch by faith, Cornelius by devotion, Lydea by obedience, received grace before baptism. Mary Magdalene, that scowred on to sin as if seven devils drove her, with tide, wind, and sails; found mercy before baptism; Thy faith hath saved thee, go in peace: Thy faith, not thy baptism.

True sanctification may be without the visible sign, as the visible sign may be without true sanctification. One of their side saith, Necessity is twofold. 1. Absolute, as meat is for life. 2. Or convenient, as a horse is for a journey: Baptism is necessary this last way. Yea, a great peal of their own voices doth repeal that merciless sentence; which like Herod, hath sent out a decree against young infants: who because they enjoy but a little of this life, must lose all the next: Indeed He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved: but it is added withal; He that believeth not, whether baptized or no, shall be damned.

To conclude let us make a double use of this; the one for obedience, the other for faith. The former is a direction for our obedience, that we use the appointed means, Baptism. The other for our faith, that we build not our salvation upon Baptism, but upon God's election and grace.

1 For Obedience; Baptism cannot be willfully neglected without great sin. Let us neither with the Papists make it absolutely necessary: nor with the Ma•chees, wholly unnecessary: nor inconvenient with the Anabaptists, because they are children and cannot profess. But seeing children have sin they ought to be washed; and seeing they belong to God they ought to be sealed. Seeing the Lord hath commanded it, let us perform it. Seeing he hath promised the washing away of sin, by pouring on of water: let us pour on water for the washing away of sin. Otherwise. we despise not the Minister of the Sign, but the God of both S••e and Minister: and for those that refuse the Sign, it is a sign they refuse the grace: and deserve the reproof of Ahaz, Is it a small thing to grieve men, but you will grieve God also? This was the condemnation of the Pharisees and Lawyers: They rejected the counsel of God against themselves, in this very point of not being baptized of John. It is not only the bare element, but the power of GOD with it, his wisdom to establish it, his constancy to maintain it, his holiness to sanctify it, and his mercy to bless it.

When Time, Place, Minister, all things concur, let not us be wanting. They are young flowers, soon nipped by death's cold hand. Perhaps some human additions we dislike, yet know that this overthrows not the ordinance of God. The foundation is sure what stubble soever be built upon it: fire shall purge that, God's institution shall save thee. If thou mayest have it pure and uncompounded, so take it: if otherwise, do not refuse it: let no ceremony of man prejudice the ordinance of God.

And as we honor the Sacrament, so let us honor the word: for that must go with the element, to make a Sacrament. The word hath saved some without baptism; what men hath baptism saved without the word? The promise of the Gospel is the writing, baptism the seal. The certainty of the writing is from the Seal, but the validity of the Seal is from the writing. Indeed, neither writing nor Seal can save, without the Holy Ghost to apply them. In Baptism, as in Bethesda, if the Spirit move on the face of the waters, then there is healing. The serpent prevaleth against us in Sicco, in the dry ground: but in Aqua, in the water, he loseth all his venom: satan's malicious power is lost in the Sacramental waters.

2 For faith, depend we upon the election of GOD, which shall stand with means, if he afford it; without means, if he deny it. Among men, first the conditions are agreed upon, then the seal is annexed: so God first receiveth into covenant, and then sealeth. Men first possess their sheep, then mark them: first we muster up soldiers, then levy out some, and give them press-money. The father being a good Land-lord, after the grant of a Tenement to a poor man, dies without sealing it. Yet the right dies not, seeing an honest son cometh in place, who will be a confirmation to his father's promise, a seal to his grant. God the father hath granted a covenant of grace to the believer and his seed, promised them an estate of life in his Son Jesus: though haply the young seed be prevented of this outward seal, Baptism; yet the good Son Christ will perform to them his Father's promise, and seal them up to eternal life. The claim of the proprietary is good •beit no actual mark be set upon his goods. The mark of God is invisible; He •nowes them that are his, and my sheep shall never perish, nor shall any man pluck them •ut of my hand. Not a sheep not the least lamb of a day old, yea, not that which •s scarce eaned and brought into the world. The Dragon stood before the woman, •hich was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as soon as it was borne: he watch•d upon the very birth, yet the child was caught up to God, and to his Throne. If the sin of the first Adam could bring an everlasting taint upon them, why cannot the blood of the second Adam wipe it out forever? The infant cannot reason, yet hath it •he seed of reason: it hath a soul, though it know not so much; why then may it •ot have faith? Children must come to Christ: what children? little ones, that •ave but little reason; yet Theirs is the kingdom of heaven. If so, then are they clean, •or No unclean thing shall enter that holy City: now what cleanseth but faith? This •aith then they have after a miraculous inspiration, by that blessed Wind that blow•th, it self pleaseth where, and gets in no man knows how. Draco's laws altogether •ncluded in death: death for this, death for that, nothing but the fatal noise of •eath. But Christ is no Dragon, he is rather a Lamb that takes away the sins of the •orld, a world of sins: much more will he heal these little lambes of his flock. The blood of Abel crieth for vengeance, but Christ crieth with a stronger and more •racious voice; my blood for all blood, my body for all sin, even of mine enemies: •f he were an Herod in his butcherly doom, Rachel might weep and make lamentation for her little ones, and refuse comfort, because they are not. If the grave and hell, those Ministers of vengeance, were to devour those unbaptised little ones; then every mother and father, sister and friend, might howl and mourn, answering one another with doleful plaints and remediles moanings, and have no comfort, because they are not: yea which is worse, because they are, that is, they are in endless sorrow. B•• blessed be God, that hath sealed us a better covenant: praised be he, that hath given us better assurance and comfort, through the Son of his love JESUS CHRIST.

VERSE 6. And turning the Cities of Sodom and Gomorrhah into ashes, and condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly.

THis is the third instance of God's severity and mercy; severity to the obstinate, mercy to the penitent. First, he confounded the Apostate Angels, and preserved the obedient. Secondly, he drowned the secure world, and saved the faithful Noah. Here he burned the ungodly Cities, and delivered the ju•t Lot. He begun with honor and sublimitie, casting down Angels; to show that no Celsitude can privilege rebellion against his will. He went on with multitude and universalitie, drowning a whole world, to show that no numbers, legions, or armies of sinners can prevail against his Justice. He concludes with opulency and worldly estate, in this overthrow of Sodom, to show that no riches and prosperity ca• avail in the day of wrath.

Sodom was a second Eden, the garden of the world yet he that for transgression did throw Adam out of Paradise, did also for the same reason overthrow Sodom with all her pleasures. There only eight were saved out of the whole world, and here are but half eight delivered from this ruin. And as one of those eight was after cursed by his father, and became a precedent for all rebellious children: so one of these four was punished by the Father of all, and for her tergiversation or retrospection rather, was turned into a pillar of salt, and became a monument of Apostasy to all succeeding ages: this was Lots Wife.

Only this latter exceeded the former destruction in some things. 1. For generality, it was more universal and impartial: eight there escaped, here but fou••. 2. In regard of the Instrument, that was by water, this by fire; an element of greater fury and torment. 3. For the suddainesse, the water drowned them by degrees, so that by the continued ascending it might soften them to repentance. The fire consumed all those quickly, without giving them leisure to think of their 〈◇〉 save with a desperate consideration. 4. The water choked their corporal lives, and killed only that was mortal; there is hope that some of their souls escaped. 〈◇〉 here the elementary fire sent them to eternal fire; and their destruction was followed with damnation.

Two Principalls in the verse.

The

- Punishment, Turning the Cities, &c.
- Monument, made them an ensample.

The punishment is described by three terms, which are

- Burning.
- Overthrowing.
- Condemning.

Some would have them all signify one thing, as if they were diverse characters of the same destruction; but this doth not sufficiently honor the pen of the HOLY GHOST. We may better resolve it thus; referring the burning to the vastation of their cities, the overthrowing to the spilling of their lives, and the condemning to the perdition of their souls. Their cities were burned, their bodies subverted, their souls condemned. Wherein the Lord, like some angry warrior, not only contents himself to ransack the houses of their goods, but fires their Cities: nor is so pacified, but puts all to the sword; as Saul had a charge for Amalek; Utterly destroy all they have, slay man and woman, infant and beast. Yea, he goes further than any mortal conqueror; for they can punish but temporally and corporally; but the Lord eternally; They suffer the vengeance of eternal fire.

The Monument hath two things

In it

- What; an ensample
- To whom, To those, &c.

So that if we avoid their sins, we shall escape their plagues. Here are various observations deducible.

First, the number of the Cities; but two are mentioned in the Text, but certainly more were involved in the ruin. All the plain; likely that more cities on that plain than two. It was a great circuit of ground, as appeareth by the dead sea there, which Josephus, who was brought up in the country, gives to be threescore and eleven miles in length, and nineteen miles broad. The number of them is most likely to be four, so many rehearsed by Moses; Sodom, Gomorrhah, Admah, and Zeboi. But it is objected, That the fire fell down upon the five Cities: therefore some think that Zoar also perished, though for a time it was preserved by the intercession of Lot. But this supposition is false, for it was known by the name of Zoar in Isaiah's time; His fugitives shall flee unto Zoar. Before it was called Bela, now $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Lot changed the name, so God changed the condition; little in quantity, great in the favor of mercy. And for that of the Five cities, the word is Pentapolis, that $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the place where those five Cities stood. Two more cities perished, but Sodom and Gomorrhah are only mentioned, because they were the capital cities, and metropolies both in the sin and punishment. Where observe,

The force of example prevaieth strongly to produce the likeness of manners. •acile transitur ad majores, ad plures. The authority of greatness doth often cor•pt the integrity of goodness. The bad conditions of popular persons are like Ia's speckled rods, which make the sheep, the beasts of the people, bring forth the •e parti-coloured actions. The ill custom of an eminent place is drawn up like •me pestilent exhalation, and corrupteth the air round about. The proverb speaks 〈◇〉 bad customs, bad opinions, and bad servants; that they are better to hang then 〈◇〉 hold. If Jeroboam worship calves, how easily will most Israelites become such •asts! We may say of an exemplary sin, as Joab of Rabba, it will be called after •e founders own name. A stone thrown into the water, makes of it self but one •cle, but that one begs a hundred. Though few men will confess their sins, yet •ny men's sins will confess their Masters. To beget a precedent of vice, is like the •ting a man's own house on fire: it burns many of his neighbors, and he shall •swere for all the ruins. A sick head makes a disordered body, a blind eye endan•s all the members. A rulers unrighteousness, like the late blasing star; it hath •ong tail, draws a train of mischiefs after it, and is ominous to the whole land. •hereas piety in a P•ince, like Aaron's ointment, runs down to the skirts of his gar•nts, blesseth all his subjects.

An exemplary offender, is like a malicious man sick of the plague, that runs into the throng to disperse his infection. Vrbis ad exemplum, &c. Sodomes filthiness is not confined at home, but runs like Nile, over all the Plain; not a village but glories in the imitation. When a public person is tempted to sin, he should answer as Nehemiah, when he was tempted to flee: Should such a man 〈◇〉 I fly? Should such a man as I thus grossly offend? To sin before the face of God, is to dishonor him; but withal to sin before the face of men, is doubly to dishon•• him. Many an Israelite committed fornication, and yet upon repentance got pardon but Zimri, that would willfully do it in the face of God and man, was sure to peri•• This aggravated David's error, that it made the enemies of God to blaspheme.

Such a bitter root shall answer for it self, and for all the corrupt branches: 〈◇〉 sin that is done abroad, ceaseth to be single: it is many sins in one. Let us therefore give good example: when Christ told that noble petitioner, Thy son liveth; 〈◇〉 the first hearing he believed: but when he came home, and weighed the matter; 〈◇〉 only himself, but by his means, the whole household believed. And for those th•• take advantage to sin by precedent; Tutum est peccare auctoribus illis; let this be their terror. Other Cities followed Sodomes lust, and they were all consumed wi•• Sodomes fire. It is a common plea, our fathers did thus before us, and the whole world doth thus about us. But what comfort is it, to fulfill the measure of o•• forefathers, or to perish with our neighbors. The high Priests servants can make Peter deny his Master. Quanto calescebat igne Sacerdotali, tanto frigescibat amore Divino. Let Corah kindle a fire of conspiracy, two hundred fifty Captains will bri•• wood to increase it. A lewd man draws vengeance on others, by the punishme•• of his sin, or by the inf•ction of it.

Secondly the matter: they were Cities, not Hamlets or Villages, but pop•l•• and walled Cities. Famous Cities, not less than kingdoms: The kingdom of Sodom, &c. Fruitful Cities, as the Garden of God: Cities lent to men, but better beseeming the Majesty of God: so glorious that they tempted a Saint. Lot seeing the goodly plains of Jordan, the commodious springs, delightful rivers, richness of the soil, situation of the towns: without enquiring further, is in love with Sodom. Observe,

1. That the strongest Cities are not shot-proof against the arrows of God but even things ordained for refuge, are by his justice made destructive. There is nothing peaceable, where God is an enemy. The wind is a meteor whereby in some sort we live, a fan in the Lord's hand to purge the air: yet how often doth it make it carry infection on the wings, and ruin buildings with violence: Children are comfortable fruits; yet was David scourged, and Sennacherib butchered, by their own bowels. Sampson is betrayed by the wife of his bosom: and the Israelites of quail provided for their sustenance. In vain we build, unless the Lord lay the first stone: or plant, unless he say, let it grow. Blessed is the City whose God barreth up with his power, and openeth again with his mercy. There is nothing that can defend where his justice will strike; and there is nothing that can offend, his goodness will preserve.

2 Sin can bring down the most magnifique Cities, and lay them even to the ground. Can Sodom's pomp of state, confluence of pleasures, abundant riches, pride of inhabitants, secure her life? It was God's challenge to Ninive: Art thou better than No? Let it be a challenge to London, Art thou richer than Sodom? It is written of Tyrus, that her Merchants were Princes, and her traffickers the Honorable men of the earth; yet God makes disport at her overthrow; Babylon that glorious City, &c. Babylon, a little world in it self; Jerusalem, the pride of the whole earth; both found wickedness to undo their composition. Rome, styled the Eternal City, shall feel the immortality of her soul, supremacy over Kings; denied under feet. Greatness of sin will shake the foundation of the greatest Cities, though their heads stood among the clouds, and lay their honor in the dust.

3 None of these wicked Cities escaped: Strabo thinks that some fled but Gen. 19.25. Men, women, children, houses, plants, monuments, all that grew on the earth, were destroyed. And who will wonder that their ungodliness brought destruction upon the harmless creatures; that considers, how we nocent wretches caused innocents to be crucified for us? not only were the plants and herbs smitten for the time, but cursed into everlasting barrenness. There now runs the salt and dead sea, whose bitterness is such, that no fish can live in it. Aristotle. Other that have viewed the Country affirm, that no grass groweth there, and that it still smoketh: that the fruit appeareth fair; but within, it is nothing but embers and rottenness. Insomuch, that the Proverb makes a Sodom apple, the emblem of an Hypocrite. So universal was their corruption, that some think they brought up their children to their own beastly conditions, Gen. 19.4. Young and old, a concourse of all the City. With fury, envy, and lust provoked, they dare attempt that in troupes, which to act single had been too detestable: to imagine, unnatural. Continuance in evil makes wicked men worse; but company in evil, worst of all.

Therefore God destroyed them all; the community of their sin preceded the universalitie of their ruin. Here is the difference betwixt God's people, and Idolaters; the latter are destroyed utterly; but of his Church the Lord always leaves a number; some seeds to increase his harvest. Except the Lord had left us a seed, we should have been as Sodom, and like unto Gomorrhah. In this we shall not be like Sodom; which is our special comfort: though this whole land groan under sins, and all the foundations be out of course: yet there are some that fear God in sincerity of heart, and CHRIST hath his number of Elect among us. And so long as that number remains, we shall not be made as Sodom, the matter of fire, and brimstone; a stink to our neighbors about us, and a scorn to all succeeding generations. But disclaim we our own merits, and honor the true cause of all our happiness; the mercy of God, whose compassions fail not.

5 Great is the danger of living in opulent and delightful places. That Sodom abounded with all variety of pleasures, it is plain: being watered with the river Jordan, as Paradise with Euphrates, and Egypt with Nile: Yea, Egypt was watered with more difficulty; as appears. Jordan was the noblest of all rivers, rising out of two fountains; Ior, and Dan: from both the heads, united in the valley, it was called Jordan. It was famous for four occasions. 1. For the passing of the Israelites over it, the waters being miraculously divided: and a monument set up in the midst of it. 2. For the parting of the stream again by Elisha, after that Elias was by the same river taken up in a fiery Chariot. 3. For the healing of Naaman the Syrian of his Leprosy: he thought as well of Abanah and Pharphar; but the Lord was with Jordan. 4. For the baptising of our blessed Savior above all other waters he seemed to honor Jordan.

This noble river serving so ignoble a country, made it fruitful; that Lots heart was fixed on it. Outward appearances are deceitfull guides, and it is no hard thing for the affection to cozen the Judgment. He is worthy to be deceived, that values things as they seem. He pays dear for his rashness: war spoileth Sodom, and Lot is taken prisoner with all his substance. Now that Abraham, whom he forsook, must rescue him: and that wealth which made him leave his Uncle, is become a prey to merciless heathens. The place which his eye covetously chose, betrays his life and goods: how easy is it for men, while they look at gain, to lose themselves.

Such was the richnesse of Sodom, full of magnificent building, gardens, vineyards, pastures; a concurrence of all earthly commodities; therefore the more likely to run into all licentiousness. The people of Laish, because they wanted nothing, would have business with no man. Where is no want, is much wantonness: and to be rich intemporalls, hastens poverty in spirituals. What should humble them, that do not find themselves to stand in need of God? Cyrus would not suffer his Persians to change a barren soil for a fruitful: because dainty habitations make dainty inhabitants. If we consider Sibaris, and Campania, the storehouse of Rome, Sicily; the Stove of luxury, Capua: where can we look, that the rankenesse of the soil hath not betrayed it self in the rankenesse of sin? Men have natural inclinations according to the Genius of their country: and it is rare to find God's piety, where is God's plenty. In a scantness, the things themselves do sti• and restrain our appetites: but where is abundance, and the measure is left to our own discretion, our discretion is too often deceived. The valley of them that be f•, and overcome with wine. They that live in fat valleys, are soon overcome with wi•e. To apply it.

Islands are the richest soils, therefore Ilanders are held the most riotous people. We lie at the dugs of a most fruitful mother, repose ourselves in her indulgent bosom: we live in as dangerous a place for prosperity as Sodom: and as the fattest earth is most slippery for footing, we had need of special grace at every turn, and urgent cause to pray for that grace, that in the midst of all abundance we may not want temperance. Agurs prayer is no Paradox; Give me neither poverty, (ϕ) riches: both extremes are dangerous, but the greater peril is in the excess, than defect. Let us pray with Saint Paul, that we may know how to want: but especially that we may know how to be full and abound in all things. The Prayers of our Church have it, let our understandings mark it, and our hearts implore it, And time of our wealth good Lord deliver us. When God himself tells us, how hard it is to be made happy, by being made wealthy; and we see by experience, how common a precipice it is to destruction; we find cause to redouble that petition, In all time of our wealth good Lord deliver us.

The pride of apparel, excess of cheare, and superabundance of ebriety, agre civitatis indicia, are the effects of an opulent kingdom. Have we not seen that make artificial conveyances of sin to posterity, that labor to purchase vice a perpetuity, that have leisure to study arguments for the Justification of evil? Thrice happy he that can be chaste in Sodom, that can be temperate in England. Thus high are we grown in prosperity and iniquity; Summisque negatum est stare diu. Let us all look back upon Sodom: me thinks we should rather wish to learn at the charges and by the stripes of others, than that the Doctrine of destruction should come to our own doors. We see great Cities, mighty kingdoms, and the fairest flowers of all histories, trampled underfoot: they should learn us to beware. Peace we have, and the God of peace continue it, to his glory and our good: the bees may hive themselves in our helmets, and our horses of war have little use, save to draw our Co•ches up and down the streets. It is the eye-sore of our enemies, and let envy look her self blind. Yet let not all this secure us, lest we be forced unto that forlorn cry; O that our fear had looked forward to the prevention, before our sorro• constraines us to look backward upon this desolation. Let repentance cure our sins, and procure mercy to our souls, and bring us to that city above; where i• plenty of riches, plenty of honors, plenty of pleasures, plenty of knowledge, love, joy; plenty of all blessings, without all abuse of plenty.

5 We are sent to the Author of this dire overthrow, the Lord: He turned, the Cities, &c. The Lord rained fire and brimstone from the Lord out of heaven. It is not enough to say, the Lord rained from himself: nor doth it only signify a miraculous rain, beside the course of nature: but well have the Fathers urged this place to prove the Eternity of CHRIST; to whom the Father hath committed (ϕ) Judgment: the LORD CHRIST did rain, from JEHOVAH the LORD his Father.

Those wonderful events, which the ignorant ascribe to fortune, the Atheist to nature, the superstitious to their Idols, the polititian to his plots, the proud to his o• power, too many to second causes: in all these the servants of God look higher, resolving all such effects to their first principle; Digitus Dei. The fame of Alexander, the renown of Caesar, have been much applauded for their victorious triumphs: Vlysses for policy, Hector for valor. The best of them have their matches in the Book of God. Joshua fought as magnanimously, as successfully; yet (when he had conquered five Kings and kingdoms) the glory is the Lord's, God fought for Israel. The Ethiopian army was a thousand thousand; Asa vanquished them: yet said, The Lord smote the Ethiopians. Chusai was political, and taught the Traitor a trick to overthrow himself: yet is it said, The Lord destroyed the counsel of Achitophel. Solomon was magnified for his wisdom; yet in that admirable proof, the derision betwixt the two harlots; it is called the Wisdom of God. It will suffer no glory to cleave unto earthen vessels: let the principal and first mover have it; The Lord did it.

The Lord is known by executing Judgment; upon Sodom and all the world. If Pharaoh will not know him at Mose's mouth, he shall feel him to his cost in the bottom of the Sea. If Herod will not know to honor him, he shall be loathed of his flatterers: they ran to him as a deity, they shall run from him as carrion. If Sodom will not know God by Lots preaching, they shall know him by the fire about their ears. God is known by his Judgments: his almightiness is known by the creation, his mercy by our redemption, his wisdom and goodness by the worlds conservation: so his Justice is known by the wicked's destruction.

That this is the Lord's doing appears, in that he spares others that have been as guilty: for his mercy everywhere matcheth his Justice. He confounded Sodom yet he hath converted many as wicked as they: his free grace hath brought those to heaven, who have deserved as deep a place in hell. Manasseh broke his covenant with God, yet his repentance found mercy. As therefore we should fear to sin, lest we perish as Sodom: so turn we to God in hope of savor, for he hath spared some as sinful as Sodom. Hear the word ye Princes of Sodom, and people of Gomorrah. They are compared to Sodom, yet mercy is offered, if it be penitently and faithfully accepted.

6 Lastly, yet more to justify this Judgment of God, that is, to make it appear just; as sinful as Sodom was yet the Lord destroyed it not without premonition. First, he sent among them a bloody war; which, whom it left not dead on the earth, it took alive into bondage. Here was one warning: yet in how few years hath Sodom forgot that she was spoiled and led captive? Had she been warmed by the sword, she had escaped the fire. Yet did not that ill success either make Lot leave Sodom, or Sodom leave sin: he still loves his commodity, and she her impiety. Wicked men grow worse after afflictions, as water grows more cold after a heat.

This was not all, but according to the stintless vicissitude of their sins, God follows them with a succession of plagues. Yet after all these warnings, they become worse; so bad, that there were not ten good men to be found in five cities. This heap must needs be fit for the fire, that was all chaff. Besides, God is said to Come down from heaven about this examination. Which is a figurative speech; for he that filleth all things, neither goeth nor cometh: and he that knoweth all things, needs not inquire. But to show that he does not proceed in the extremity of Justice, without such a precedent scrutiny as may leave them without excuse.

Lot continually preached to them, by his persuasion to holiness, by his regular and exemplary life: here was still further warning. He had fire in his tongue, but they had a sea of water in their hearts to quench it. His conversation was as great a vexation to them, as theirs was to him. He reprov'd them the very night before their ruin: but such as be bent upon villainy, are more exasperated by dissuasions: like violent streams that, when they are resisted by flood-gates, swell over the banks. Not being able to reclaim the multitude, he singles out some: and when the rest of the night was short and dangerous; he being sought for by the Sodomites, and newly pulled in by the Angels: yet he ventures abroad to seek his Sons in awe. They were but betrothed to his daughters, yet such was his charity, that he hazards his own safety to preserve theirs: faith would never be saved alone, but win all she can. He did admonish them like a Prophet, and advise them like a father; but both in vain. He seemed to them as one that mocked, and they did more than seem to mock him again. Why should tomorrow differ from other days? Who ever saw it rain fire? No Almanac ever spake of such weather. Or how should brimstone be engendered, or exhaled into the air? The clouds are bottles of waters, not of flames. Or if such a shower should fall, why must it not burn all the earth, as well as the valley? Why not as universal as was the deluge? Or grant it do come, yet it cannot be so sudden, but we shall have time to call for mercy: it will be as long a dispatching us, as the flood was a drowning them. Thus carnal men count preaching foolishness, devotion idleness, and Prophets mad men. Certainly these men's unbelief was as worthy of the fire, as the others uncleanness: he that believeth not, is already condemned.

Lastly, in the attempt of that horrid impiety, the Angels smote them with blindness: now this being so miraculous and immediate a work, might have warned them enough, that the business they undertook was damnable. They smote not the Medium, which was the air: nor the object, which was the door: but their sight with such a blindness, that they could not discern one thing from another. As the Aramites, that they could not descry the Prophet, nor the way, nor the City. Both their outward and inward discerning faculty was dazzled. Yet doth not this sensible warning better them: they go groping up and down the streets, cursing those men whom they could not find: and yet they bethink not themselves, that vengeance must needs be near them. All this while Lot and the Angels be in light, and see them stumbling, and foresee them burning. God first stroke them with blindness, whom he will after consume with fire: it is his use to besot them he means to destroy. This darkness was a forerunner of eternal darkness, as the next mornings flame was an entrance to their ever-burning fire in hell.

Let this teach us to admire God's patience, that will not destroy a Sodom without some warning and forbearance. If we worms and dust should be so used of men, as God is used of us, we should quickly show our corrupted stomachs. We have vengeance in our will, but not in our power: God hath vengeance in his power, but forbears it in his will. We are commanded while we breath, to pray the Lord's prayer; Forgive us our trespasses: which teacheth us that there is mercy in God without weariness. Sodom cracked the earth with the weight of her sins, and made the air stink with her loathsomenes; yet the Lord was long-patient. And will that God be furious and hasty against that soul that groones, weeps, bleeds for her offenses? If it were not for this, how could we scape being sacrificed to destruction, to expiate his Justice?

God chargeth Israel, that they had seen his glory, yet Provoked him ten times. How often would I have gathered you! his mercies exceed all numeration. We have been a Provocation to him ever since we were made, as Jerusalem was ever since it was built. But though the LORD be pleased at sometimes, and to some sinners, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ enlarge his patience; let not us be bold to enlarge our disobedience. He punished the Angels in heaven for one fault, Achan for one sacrilege, Miriam for one slander, Moses for one unbelief, Ananias for one lie: he may be as quick against our offenses. How often soever he knocks, our safest course is to rise at the first call. Many are prevented by his Justice, their spirits departing from them, as Jacob from Laban, or Israel from the Egyptians, without taking leave, carrying away their Jewels and dearest treasures. Let us fear the price of angering so dreadful a Majesty, and abusing so rich a patience: he now looks for our fruit, or we must look for his fire.

Next, be we taught here to take the hint of God's warning; and not to let his that is the breath of the Father and the Son, spend his breath upon us in vain. He deals with sinners, as David with Saul: who took away his spear, and his waterpot, and sometimes a piece of his cloak; as it were snatches and remembrances, to let us understand that we are in his hands, and if we take not warning, he will further punish us. We call, and he hears: we ask, and he grants: we knock, and he opens: cannot all this prevail with us to deal so with him? Which of us can say, he hath not been warned? It is God's charge to his Prophets; Tell my people; Diximus, we have told them: We have shown his people their transgressions, and the house of Jacob their sins. Hath death given us no warning, did we never find stitch and convulsion? did the head never ache? the stomach never refuse nourishment? All these are warnings of death, as death is a citation to Judgment.

There is scarce anything in the world, but it may serve for a monitor to us: as the messengers of Job came one after another, to inform him of his unhappiness; everyone saying, Ego solus aufugi, I alone am escaped: to what purpose? To tell thee; Some of the Jews are delivered from that raging destruction: to what end? To declare their abominations among the heathen, that they may know the Lord. But many are like the Sodomites, hardened by the warnings of God. Instead of embracing the counsel, they rage at the counsellor. But when men are grown to that pass, that they are not better by afflictions, yea worse with admonitions, God finds it high time to strike. Now they have done sinning, God begins to plague. Wickedness hath but a time, the punishment of wickedness is beyond all time. Even the good Angels shall be the executioners of this judgment; and having first delivered Lot in Sodom, then from Sodom, they let drive at Sodom. There cannot be a more noble art, than to do Justice upon obstinate malefactors. God doth not often punish for impurity, but impenitency.

Thus far we have walked in generals, such useful observations as the story affords us: now to the particulars wherein consider principally two things; the measure, and the manner. The measure was a total ruin, the manner, by fire. First for the measure.

Overthrew them.] It was a plenary and universal destruction. Their outward happiness was so great, that like rotten fruit they could no longer cleave to the tree. It is said of the wicked, They come in no misfortune like other men. No misfortune? now therefore all at once. It is not good to be too happy for this world: there is danger in being without dangers. The very heathen were loath to surfeit on pleasures, and took it an introduction to further mischiefs. When Philip heard that his Army had got the conquest, that his Son Alexander was borne, and that his Chariots won the prize at Olympus, all in one day; he called on fortune to spice his joys with a little bitterness, lest he should forget himself. The Egyptian King blest himself from Policrates, because he was over-fortunate: when he would try an experiment in despite of fortune, throwing a rich jewel into the sea, and finding it at his house in the bowels of a fish. It was a heathen curse, to wish all good luck to their very enemies. It is not good for a man to engross prosperity, lest like $\langle \diamond \rangle$ wasted candle, Extremum occupet fumus, faetor, & caligo. Belshazzar had no sooner drunk his voluptuous health in the Cup of the Temple, but a new Cup was reached unto him, the Cup of vengeance, and he must drink off that too.

Here was a sudden alteration: this hour a land flowing withal delights and riches; whithersoever they look, beholding nothing but pleasures; and a few minutes have determined all this. Now nothing is visible but ruin, not a house, not a tree, not a plant, not a pile of grass standing: smoke and sulphur, and stench and barrenness possessing all the Plain. When Amalek was destroyed, the trees stood: when Jericho was burnt, the gold was preserved: though the foundations of roy cannot be seen, yet grass grows in the streets. But here, silver and gold, plants and trees, grass and beasts, houses and monuments, all consumed. This is such $\langle \diamond \rangle$ overthrow, as the like never went before it, nor shall ever any match come after it; not that one universal combustion of heaven and earth. Therefore the Scripture, when it speaks of an utter Overthrow, points at Sodom. She might have endured many plagues, yet still stood upon her foundations: but this is such a ruin as admits of no reparation. Such a one, as Sodom did only bear it, and may it please God that none but Sodom may ever feel it.

Condemned them.] The spoiling of their houses was much: yet had only their cities been demolished, they might have built others, or lived in caves, or fled into foreign countries. The spoil of their goods was more: yet grass that is trodden down, may grow again: the world hath more wealth. The maiming of their limbs had been greater: yet life is sweet, and their coaches, and couches, and cresses, artificial legs; and hospitalls, charity is not quite dead. The killing of their bodies, and consuming their lives, yet nearer: the merchant will lose his provision, lose his wards, lose his vessel, to save his life. Yet if life be lost, is there not a day of reviving? Let death crumble the body to dust, shall not the resurrection restore it whole? Or if they must perish, yet let it not be by fire, the extremest of all torments. But what if fire turn the body to ashes, may not the soul ascend the heavens, and live in peace? O but what ransom shall a man give for his soul? Dennavit, he condemned them; this the most insupportable burden.

To turn such goodly buildings into ashes, will not this satisfy his Justice? To slay the beasts, wither the plants: not this? To sluice out the bloods and lives of so many thousands; mothers having no leisure to cry for their infants, because it is their own turns to suffer: not all this? No, the soul must answer for the souls offenses; He condemned them. The traveler yields to the thief; take my purse, my horse, my garments; only spare my life. And man beseecheth God; take goods, and pleasures, and honors, and liberty, and life; only spare my soul; let not that be a prey to Satan. Miserable wretches! if they knew the worth of their souls, they would bespeak destruction, as the King of Sodom did Abraham; Da nobis animas •stras; Give us our souls, take all the rest. Let us save our houses, if we can, and save our goods, and save our lives: but howsoever, let us save our souls, though we lose houses and goods and lives.

All was sharp enough, but as our Savior said to the man sick eight and thirty years (a long and hopeless torment) Sin no more lest a worse thing happen 〈◇〉 thee: there is a worse behind: all extremities are light and slight to Condemnation. Innumerable are the curses of God against sinners: but the last is the worst, comprehending and transcending all the rest; Damnavit; a Condemning sentence. The Sodomites felt a dismal Judgment; fire and brimstone scalding their bloods to death: but what a slight spark do they Judge it to that they now feel in the furnace of hell. This is the Lord's final sword, when all his rods be worn out, and the wicked 〈◇〉 the better. A smart blow comes, and the sinner is sensible, cries out for ease, and hath it granted: now he thinks this punishment hath pacified God's wrath, and 〈◇〉 hath paid his own debt. Another Judgment comes, and he bears it with impatient sorrow, humbles himself, like Ahab: that once removed he hopes now God hath done with him. A third succeeds, now he grumbles under the load, thi•• that God doth him wrong; that he takes more than he should, and plagues him beyond his desert. But all this doth not better him: at last the Lord comes with•• Damnavit; Condemneth him: and then if all his riches, all his pleasures, the obl••on of his son for his sin, the racking of his joints, tearing of his flesh, the b•••• of his body for the ransom of his soul, could serve, he would make a joyful ••der of them all: but then they will not be accepted. If anything but d•••tion could excuse the reprobates, their condition were not so fearful: 〈◇〉 this Descendere ad infernum, condemning to hell, is the perfection of all ••chednesse.

Let us prevent God's Justice, by doing to ourselves what he threatens to do 〈◇〉 to sinners. Let us overthrow our sins, that he may not overthrow our houses: ••demne ourselves, that he may not condemn our souls: turn our iniquities to 〈◇〉 that his fire may spare our Cities. As Nineveh by taking to heart the message of ••eir overthrow, did overthrow the message. Their walls and buildings stood, by ••ting their transgressions fall. They turned to deprecation and repentance, and ••od turned to commiseration and forbearance. The subversion was threatened, the ••nversion effected. Thus let us save God a labor, that when he comes to correct 〈◇〉 he may find it done to his hand. Let us be self-afflictors, as we have been self-••pters: and set repentance to do what God threateneth. Have we sinned in intem••rance, let us punish ourselves with abstinence: then God will not inflict on us fa••ne. If in uncleanness, chastise we the flesh by contrition, and cleanse it with reso••ion against all unchastitie: so may we escape the diseases both of body and con••ence. Let us break off our covetice by mercy to the poor: so instead of being ••poverished on earth, we shall find riches in heaven. If in anger, let us return to ••tience: so when the Lord comes in anger against us, we shall move him to be pati••t toward us. If in pride, come we down to humility: when he looks to find us ••the chair of presumption, let him see us in the humble dust: then instead of calling us down to hell, he will lift us up to heaven. Thus with the fire of grace from Gods Altar, let us consume our natural, unnatural corruptions; that the fire of vengeance may never touch our houses, nor bodies, nor souls. Lord, overthrow our sins, and let ourselves stand: teach us to condemn our errors, that thou mayest never Condemne us. That so serving thee with pureness of heart, we may be brought to the brightness of thy glory, through the greatness of thy mercie.

Turning the Cities into ashes.] I come to the manner of their destruction, which was by fire: wherein consider four circumstances. The strangeness, the sharpnesse, the suddenness, the destructivenesse.

1 The strangeness; it was a miraculous rain; brimstone mingled with the fire, as a fit matter to disperse it: and, it is very likely, salt too: It shall burn with brimstone and salt. Yea, and that water was poured down also, from which was gathered the dead sea remaining to this day. This Rain came from Heaven, the upper region of the air, the place for fiery meteors. And haply the nature of the oil being full of pitch, slime, and other combustible matter, did much increase the burning. The vale of Siddim was full of slime pits, and the Kings of Sodom and Gomorrhah fell there. This was strange indeed, that fire and brimstone, the materials of hell, should come down from heaven: or that floods of water should grapple with streams of fire: and that all, as water does set lime a burning, should help rather to enflame. Upon the wicked shall the Lord rain fire and brimstone, and stormy tempest. That brimstone, a mineral of the earth, should be found in the air, drawn up by an extraordinary exhalation, to be sent down after an unexampled confusion! But this was the Lord's doing, and it is marvelous to our thoughts.

2 The sharpness. It is said of fire, that it is the best friend, the worst enemy: no element is more noble when it is our friend, none more terrible when our foe. God himself is a consuming fire: and he maketh his Angels a flame of fire. As the fire lies hid in the hard flint, so God is in everything: it is quick and shining, like the Trinity. Fire consumeth wood, and purgeth gold: so doth the Lord's grace consume our creature, and refine his own creature. We desire not to be too far off from the fire, lest we be too cold: nor too near, lest it burn us. If we be too far off from God by our Apostasy, we soon perish with cold death. If we dare come too near him by our presumption, we are swallowed up with his infinite and inaccessible glory.

There was Ignis sacer in the Temple: that holy fire went out in the captivity: but some of the Jews say, it was hid in a pit. The Holy Ghost came down upon the Apostles in the shape of fire. The fire concurs to the generation of things with the other elements, yet is it self childless, it hath no fruit of his own. So doth the Spirit work with the other Persons in our Redemption, yet hath no person Proceeding from him.

Thus excellent is fire while at peace with us: it heats, purges, enlightens, consumes: so doth grace heat our hearts, enlighten our minds, purge our affections, consume our corruptions. But when it is at war with us, the rage is terrible things most beneficial in their use, are most pestilent in their enmity. The fire grave to swallow Corah, water to drown the old world, a sword to fall upon ‹ϕ› a plague to slay Israel, a scourge for the back of fools; but nothing so sharp ‹ϕ› fire? The heathen have worshipped it for a god: for which choice being repu•• they demanded anything that could overcome fire, and they would adore that. ‹ϕ› Image was made by a cunning Artist, the substance whereof was clay, full of ‹ϕ› which were so done up with some liquid matter that they were not seen. The ••vincible God of fire was put under this Image; which quickly hardened the ‹ϕ› and was put out by the melting liquor. But here was a stupid ignorance, to slip o•• ‹ϕ› one Idolatry to another: and instead of a natural element, to give over them••• to an artificial Idole. Fire hath over-mastered stronger Images than ever ‹ϕ› made of clay, and left their ruins shameful reproaches to all their superstitio•• Idolaters.

There is no element in the extremest fury more afflictive to the sense, ‹ϕ› fire. Water doth only drown, and soon choke the breath by stopping the ••sages of respiration: so Pharaohs destruction was in this respect far short of Sodom. The air doth only stifle the spirits, and by infecting the blood, do•• ‹ϕ› more than a pleurisie or plague, dispatching if not with like speed, yet with less ••ture: thus the Israelites in the plains of Midian, sped not so ill as the Sodomites i• the plain of Jordan. The swallowing earth that opens her jaws with a quaking m•tion, devours men alive, but it soon with a falling closure makes them dead: ‹ϕ› Corah and his confederates suffered easier than Sodom and her inhabitants. But ‹ϕ› killeth not only with the rest, but tormenteth above them all: scorching the limbs puckering the skin, enflaming the blood, enraging the sense, torturing the whole• man. The sword is a sharp executioner, armed with hostility, it hath unprison•• millions of souls. The teeth of wild beasts roaring for their prey, are merciless, as the enemies of Daniel felt. The nearest of all plagues that comes to the torme•• of fire, is famine: and the very anguish of famine ends in a kind of fire: when for want of vivid moisture the radical heat is inflamed, and burns up the vital spirits. Gunpowder, the most damnable mineral that ever hell begat, or Rome made use o• (for those worshippers of the Successor of Saint Peter found much employment fo• salt-peter) yet can do nothing without fire: it is but a speeding messenger that f•• sendeth.

All manner of deaths murders have in them some more mercy, or at least le•• cruelty, than his fiery massacres. It is reserved in human Justice for the most horrible offenders; murderers, witches, deniers of CHRIST, Atheists; of which last number we have too many, but that the cunning Devil dares not be so bold ‹ϕ› to profess it. But there is another fire for them, which shall quickly burn out Atheism; for they shall feel eternally that there is a God; and their flame must be so much the hotter, because they would not believe in their offered Savior. Thi• is the incomparable torture of fire so powerful, that no other element shall have the honor of purging heaven and earth, but fire: none able to burn this universal machine but fire. None other ordained to be the special matter of the reprobato••s torment in hell, but fire: whether in figure to shadow, or in realitie to perform, the extremest tortures, fire must do it. That hath the most searching property, and can only refine what is substantially good, and consume what is quali••ively evil.

Beside all these expressions comparatively, the sharpness of this punishment by fire, is aggravated by three gradations.

1 By the quality; it was not only fire, but a deluge of fire. The Lord rained fire: not sprinkled by drops, like a gentle shower, but Rained, as it were whole sheets of fire, the flashes of lightning are nothing to it; but flakes and streams of fire; The highest gave his thunder, hailestones and flames of fire. Not a little kindled, as fire in a house, that gathers force by degrees, and from small sparks riseth to a violent combustion; but the very beginning was a rain of fire. They had rained on the earth great cataracts of sins, and heaven rained on them great cataclismes of flames.

2 By their indisposednesse to bear it; men quite destitute of the grace of God, and forfeited to all discomfort. Flesh and blood, in either valor or desperateness, have endured many strange torments in this world; lancings, searings, rackings, all to protract a miserable life. Divers martyrs have leap'd into their beds of flames, as beds of downes. But the sense of the torment hath been qualified by God's assistance and their patience. But he that could cool the burning furnace by the will of his mercy, did inflame this fire by the breath of his fury. There was fire for doing well, here is fire for doing ill. There was the fire of man against the love of God, hear the fire of God against the lust of man. There was grace to allay it, here was sin to enrage it. The punishment was the more sensible, as the patients were more insensual.

3 By the addition and mixture of it: not fire alone, but fire mingled with Brimstone; a matter fit not to allay it, but increase it. Extendit, non extenuat flammam sulphur. The perplexing properties of Brimstone are three: to burn darkly, sharply, loathsomely. Darkely to grieve the sight, sharply to afflict the sense, loathsomely to offend the smell. The Scripture, to describe the extreme tortures of fire, adds often Brimstone. Fire and much wood, and the breath of the Lord like a river of brimstone to kindle it. Where is both a Prosopopoeia in the Breath, and a Topographia in the Brimstone: both figures to express the furious indignation of the Author, and fierce severity of the Act. For the Allegory of Breath, to denote the rage of Saul against the lambs of Christ, he is said to Breath out slaughter. To signify the Lord's wrath against sinners, he is said to breath out fire. For Brimstone, it makes fire more terrible; darkening the splendor of it to the sight, sharpening the fervor of it to the sense, and augmenting the stench of it to the smell.

This discovers to us the nature of sin, how stinking and loathsome it is to God, that burning Brimstone is not more offensive to us. Fatidius Deo peccatum, quàm omni sterquilinum. No perfumes are more pleasant to the sinner, no dunghills more noisome to the Lord. Absalom thought his pride sweet, Zimri his adultery, Nabal his wealth sweet: the usurers gold, the lascivious man's harlot, the defrauders gain; all fragrant smells to them; because they breath no other air but such pestilent corruptions. And the very sent of goodness would set them hard, as fen-men are sick with a subtle air, or the soil-man swooned when he passed through Buckersbury. But if their hearts were unstop'd, and cleared from the cold and congeald attarres of sin, they would be sensible of the stench; and there is no work of darkness but they would smell Brimstone in it. Our blessed Savior feedeth among the lilies, lodgeth in the beds of spices, the sweet graces of his Church: let not us like Dorcas, love the dunghills: or like Scarabees, pass over all beauties, to light upon sores and ulcers. O that we could but discern sin as it is in it self: how should we then hate our lusts, our lies, our oaths, our covetous desires and practices; smelling the stink of Brimstone in them all! Indeed we are all unsavoury of ourselves, odious to that God, who hath pure eyes and pure nostrils: only our hope and comfort is, to be sweetened with the perfume of Jesus Christ.

3 The Suddenesse; the fire was not long a dispatching them: but as it fell before their expectation, so it destroyed them before their recollection. When the sun did rise, then began the rain to fall; now this was just at Lots entering into Zoar: at break of day he went out of Sodom, at sun-rising he came into Zoar: between which spaces a man may go four miles, say the Hebrews. Now Abraham rose up early in the morning, yet he saw not the falling of the fire, but the rising up of the smoke only. This must needs be done suddenly: in all likelihood, less than half an hour determined all the glory of Sodom. The Prophet says, In a moment: Sodom was destroyed in a moment. Why then should not men believe the same power of the last fire to consume the world, and our changing even in a moment? In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet. That fire gave the Sodomites no time of remembrance, nor shall the last fire give the world any time of repentance. Vita brevis, & ipsa brevis incerta: that may come suddenly, which we know will come certainly. We have no more Patent of forbearance than had Sodom: it is said of the wicked, In momento ad infernum, In a moment they go down to hell. Death doth not always creep upon a man by degrees, like Ezekiel's waters; from the ankles to the knees, from the knees to the loins, and so to the heart: but swallows some ere they can swallow their spittle. The Judge standeth before the door. Would the thief break into the house, if he knew the Judge stood at the door? We may say of our sinning and dying, as Physicians of their critical days; the first is Index, the second Index. Our sins shows we shall die, our death judgeth us for our sin. But betwixt both these there is Medicamentum, a gracious help, the intervention of our seasonable amendment, and applying the satisfaction of Jesus Christ.

4 The destructiveness; Turned them to ashes. It is a fearful degree in punishment, in cineres redigi, to be reduced to ashes. God went far with Israel, when they were Titio ereptus, a brand snatched out of the burning. He proceeded further, when he set the whole Forest of his people on fire; yet still a remnant was preserved, some did escape, even thorough the fire. The Prophet by the Dry bones, shadows out a desperate estate. A man is sick, there is danger: panting for life, great fear: dead, no hope: buried, despair: the flesh consumed, nothing but bones left, here is the utmost extent, saving only his wholly mouldring to ashes. There is hope of a tree if it be cut down, that it will yet sprout again: but cut down, cast into the fire, and converted to ashes, no hope.

Yet is this the end of all flesh: the innumerable army of Xerxes, all become ashes. Herod that was honored as a god by men, was proved to be a man by worms; turned to ashes. The Roman Palace, the Spanish Escorial, all the glorious Cities and buildings of the earth, shall meet in this catastrophe; be turned to ashes. Solomon from his royalty, Achitophel from his policy, Caesar from his monarchy, Plato from his Philosophy, even Moses from his humility; all good men from their sanctity, all bad men from their impiety, must descend to make ashes. Death is that impartial metamorphoser, that turneth all secular glory into ashes. Where are they that credits this Temple wherein we pray, that built those houses wherein we dwell, that founded the City wherein we live, that begun those societies whereof we are? ye know, all turned to ashes. Not turned to birds and beasts, as the Poets fain'd, much less to stars; neither to plants nor planets; least of all to celestial Angels, but to dust and ashes.

There is difference of estates while we live; Cinerum sub pulvere nulla. Ye $\langle\phi\rangle$ gods; there he considered their pomp and dignity: but ye shall die like men, there \bullet e minds their end, that with the change of his note, they might also change co \bullet nance. He tells them their honor, but withal their lot. In power, wealth, tra \bullet e, titles, friends, they differ from others: in death they differ not from others. They are cold when winter comes, witherd with age, weak with sickness, and melt away with death, as the meanest: all to ashes, All flesh is grass, and the glory of m \bullet as the flower: the glory, that is the best of it, but a flower. No great difference, the flower shows fairer, the grass stands longer, one sithe cuts down both. Beasts f \bullet and lean fed in several pasture, killed in one slaughter. The Prince in his lofty palace, the beggar in his humble cottage, have double difference; local and ceremoni $\bullet\bullet$ height and lowness: yet meet at the grave, and be mingled in ashes. We walk i \bullet this world, as a man in a field of snow: all the way appears smooth, yet cannot \bullet e be sure of any step. All are like actors on a stage, some have one part and some ano $\bullet\bullet$ er, death is still busy amongst us: here drops one of the Players, we bury him \bullet th sorrow, and to our scene again: then falls another, yea all, one after another, $\langle\phi\rangle$ death be left alone upon the stage. Death is that damp, which puts out all the $\bullet\bullet$ me lights of vanity. Yet man is easier to believe that all the world shall die, \bullet n to suspect himself. Though we be older than those we follow to the grave, yet \bullet l we hope for a longer reprieve. If anything could have hired death to spare, \bullet r forefathers would have kept our possessions from us. But ashes must to ashes: \bullet st was our composition, and to dust must be our dissolution: only we look for a \bullet ter resurrection.

From all this observe the fit proportion of the punishment to the sin. They $\bullet\bullet$ ich burned with the fire of lust, are consumed with the fire of vengeance. They $\bullet\bullet$ ned against the rule of nature, and they perish against the course of nature. They \bullet d conjured up hell to earth; and God sent hell out of heaven. For their unnatu \bullet l lust, unnatural fire: there is a loathsome stench in their wickedness, and there \bullet s the stink of brimstone in their confusion. Such is the Justice of God, not only $\langle\phi\rangle$ strike for offending: but also the wisdom of God to strike according to the man $\bullet\bullet$ r of offending. The Lord is known by executing Judgment: making Their sword $\bullet\bullet$ er into their own heart. The Gibbet which Haman built for Mordecai, shall hang $\bullet\bullet$ msel \bullet e. Pharaoh made away the Hebrew males, and was requited with the death $\langle\phi\rangle$ his first borne. Herod slew the infants of Bethlehem, and was punished by the $\bullet\bullet$ rder of his own children. Hildebrand suborned a villain with a great stone on $\bullet\bullet$ e Churches roof, to brain Fredericke the Emperor doing his devotions after his \bullet onted manner: and the same Traitor tumbled down, and was quashed in pieces \bullet th the same stone. Thus was Alexander the sixth poisoned with the same liquor $\bullet\bullet$ ich he had ordained to make away some of his Cardinals. Three of those fie $\bullet\bullet$ conspirators were maimed and disfigured, by the fiering of powder at Holbecke $\langle\phi\rangle$ Worcester shire; who had meant by powder to blow up a whole State. Let all $\bullet\bullet$ ese examples terrify the wicked: God will meet with them in their own kinds, and fill them a cup with their own tempering. As their tongues have walked against heaven, so they shall be confined to hell: Propter solutas linguas, they shall have Catenatos pedes. For drunkenness, want of a drop of water: for covetousness, everlasting poverty of comfort.

Two things are yet further to be looked into. 1. how the Justice of God may be justified in this universal confusion of the Sodomites. 2. what was the utmost extent, or what followed the ruin.

For the former; it is the Atheists exception against the Justice of God, that he founded the innocent with the guilty. The men indeed were given over to licentiousness, but no such thing is testified of the women: and if the women were also sinners, yet the infants were not capable nor culpable of such faults. For answer, first let us hold this undeniable Tenent; The judgments of God are often secret, always just will show mercy to whom he will, and he does us undeserved favor. He will execute judgement on whom he will, and he does us no wrong. That he saves any, the cause is in himself: that he condemns many, the cause is in them.

God is absolute Lord over all his creatures: and as it was his only pleasure to give life, so also to take it away. Neither are we more to demand a reason of the latter, than we are able to conceive a reason of the former. Whether he gives, or withholds, still blessed be the Name of the Lord.

Children are parts of their Parents, and therefore may be justly infolded in their fathers punishments. They are guilty of original sin, a filthiness that they have by propagation from their parents: for their souls were infected, so soon as their bodies were infused. Before the Justice of God there are none innocent. They that have sinned from their parents, may justly be enrolled with their parents. Though they be not guilty of their fathers actuals, yet they have by nature so much corruption, as may deserve sharp correction. How frequently hath God chastised the children for the fathers offenses. David's child begotten in adultery must die Who did sin, this man, or his parents, that he was borne blind? This the Apostle could easily see, howsoever they undescreetly asked: Quia antequam nasceretur, procare non potuit ut cacus nasceretur. But the Son shall not bear the iniquity of the Father; a good son shall not answer for a bad father. But the child is a sinner, parvulus unius diei: and when it hath the fathers sin with the own it is punished the own sin, not for the fathers.

Thus do many children suffer for their parents being conceived in offense, and deriving their diseases from their birth: there is Morbus haereditarius, as Physicians speak. Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Both the trees and fruit were corrupt, the spring and channels unclean, therefore involved in one general ruin. So fully did the Justice of God triumph over them, that he left none remaining; but even the very seed and offspring of the Sodomites perished. Unless the Lord had left us a remnant, we had been as Sodom? they had no remnant left. The very little ones infected with their parents sins, were wrapped up in their parents flames.

Nor only fell those Sodomites for the present but forever; suffering the vengeance of eternal fire. A Judgment so fearful and singular, that it is able to strike a horror into our hearts with the very thought. This God did. 1. To show his perfect detestation of that wicked people; so apostate from all goodness, that their very seed was accursed. Because the fathers blaspheme against heaven, the children go to hell. 2. To increase their sorrow and torment in seeing the destruction of their children: for if nature were not quite extinct, and they had but as much affection as beasts to their young; it must needs wound their hearts to see the lamentable ruin of their children. Who can hear the confused cry of so many Infants, and not cry for company? to see their tender and ungrown limbs wrapped up in streams of fire, as swath-bands: the shrinking of their soft nerves at every pull of grief their flesh scorched like a scrole of parchment; sprawling on the ground, and rock'd a sleep with dire destruction; would melt a heart of Adamant.

God himself, at other times, had a special regard to Infants: excepting only some places that were execrable in his sight, as Jericho, Edom, and Babylon, and here Sodom. Now the sight of such a Judgment among the little ones, that knew not the right hand from the left, that cleaved to their mothers breasts, as apples to the tree; to be snatched away with death, and death in the frightfullest visage, bringing and tormenting death: this did aggravate their plague, and it had been much easier for them to have suffered alone. There is nothing more natural to us, than to love our children; those living monuments of ourselves, that piece out mortality with succession, continue our names and Images upon the earth. These if we affect with our loves, let us not infect with our lives: let us hate our sins, lest they also perish with ourselves. Why should we destroy those, whom we have in a manner made? we brought them into the world with pain, up in the world with care: let us not send them out of the world with sorrow. Repentance and amendment of life help us to prevent such an unhappiness; that we may neither smart for the wickedness of our forefathers, nor make our children everlastingly smart for us. Let us obey our Father in heaven, that he may bless our children upon earth.

For the other consideration; the extremity of their punishment was not temporal death, but everlasting torment: Eternal fire. Their present fire does not buy out the future. Run they into the fields, it rains fire: into the houses, it flames with fire: into holes and caves, all places burn with brimstone. Miserable men, whether they fly or stay, struggle or lie still, fire possesseth them. Scarcely sulphur, and burning stench, universally racking them. Yet is not all this enough to purge out their corruption, but a worse torment succeeds, and the judgment of earth doth but deliver them over to the condemnation of hell: which continually burns their souls, and shall never turn them to ashes; a fire neither tolerable nor erminable. The breath of the Lord, like a river of brimstone doth inflame it, and the breath of ten thousand reprobates shall never be able to blow it out. When a drop of water shall be allowed, to cool the tongue that boils with unsufferable flames. Where heat doth follow smoke, and fire heat, and stench fire, and torment stench, and burning shall be added to burning. Thus are they cast into utter darkness, where neither light of Sun nor Moon, much less the light of heaven, and God's glorious face shall ever appear. Where their eyes must distill like fountains, and their teeth clatter like armed men.

These are those fearful vials of wrath, when God gives blood to drink unto them that boil with heat. Who can express their horrors, nay what horrors cannot they express? Sorrows are met on their souls as at a feast: fear, despair, and anguish leap upon their hearts as a Stag, and the furies of hell divide their spirits among them. Torment calls to desperation, horror to pain, come and help us to torture these wretches. Lust sends one plague, and pride another, and covetousness a third; till they run thorough a thousand deaths, and yet cannot die. All their lights are put out at once, they have no souls fit to be comforted. Thus they lie, as if they bore the weight of the whole earth: and so let them lie, saith the LORD, forever.

Hear him that spake by experience. Being in hell in torments, he lifts up his eyes, &c. He looked upward, for he was low enough: he lift up his eyes, that could not lift up himself. Retrusus in locum imum, qui affectavit locum primum. He would not look down to Lazarus in his misery, he must now look up to Lazarus in his felicity. Oculos quos voluptas clausit, acerbitas aperit. Where remembering his pleasures past, considering his joys lost, sensible of pains present, and fearful of greater tortures to come: he sees Ad cumulum suae paenae. Lazarum in sinu Abrahae: Lazarus in Abraham's bosom. (Every believer is a child of Abraham, and whither should the child go but to the bosom of his Father?) Now he begs with more floods of scalding tears, than ever Esau sought the blessing, to have some comfort from Lazarus; send Lazarus, &c. His envious pride doth not yet forsake him. Non potuit ad Lazarum duci, sed Lazarum ad se deduci. He would have Lazarus come from the rest of heaven, to the terrors of hell. And what craves he? not an Ocean, not a river, not a pond or some small fountain, not a bucket or spoonfull; but a drop. And what if all the rivers in the South had been granted him, his tongue would still have withered, and he never have cried in the language of hell; It is enough. Or had his tongue been eased, the rest of his parts would still have fried. Water might be by him, but Vinctae sunt manus, he hath no hand to reach it. O bitter day! when not the least finger (I say not, of God, but) of the meanest Saint in heaven, shall bring the least drop (I say not, of the waters of life, but) of the waters of the brook to give him comfort. He fared as delicately as the Sodomites, in the fullness of all rare viands: he went not in sack-cloth, or common garments, nor with a diseased body as Lazarus: but in purple and fine linen, not on the best day of the seven, or when he went to the Court, where it is somewhat tolerable; but every day. But now, like the Sodomites, he is snatched from his libertine surfeit to famine, from a table of viands to a Table of vengeance, from boules of the lustiest wines to drink sulphur, from beds of downes to beds of flames, from bravery to misery, O here is the emblem of wretchedness! He would have one sent to his brethren, let this calamity give warning to us all. Flame torments him, not a moderate fire. In a flame there is Ardor and Splendor: but in hell there is burning without sight, as in the Empyreall heaven there is light without burning.

Thus had the Sodomites their portion on earth, and from the want of all miseries, were driven to the misery of all wants. God does not damn men because they be rich, for himself is infinitely rich; and Abraham that rejected the rich man, was on earth richer than he. Nor because they are Great, for himself is the greatest of all. But because they abuse these to the dishonor of his glorious Name. And to conclude; their torments are eternal. As our short affliction causeth to us an excellent and eternal Glory. so their short pleasure causeth to them an exceeding and eternal pain. Their sorrows are infinite, ration finis: they lie pressed under an unsupportable load, and still call for more weight to dispatch them, but cannot have it. What the Psalmist sings of God's mercy, is true also of his Justice, that it endure•• forever. Horrendum incidere in manus mortis viventis, & vitae morientis. Fi•• semper incipit, & defectus deficere nescit. If after so many millions of years as there be drops in the sea, there might be deliverance, they had some hope. Men may comfort themselves in temporal sufferings, Dabit Deus his quoque finem: but there is no limitation in hell: when the Lord shall give over his being, they shall have ease and not before; which is Never. An infinite Majesty is offended, therefore an infinite penalty imposed. In hell they shall ever remain sinners, therefore in hell they shall ever remain sufferers. Sin is like oil, and torment like fire: so long as the oil lasteth, the fire burneth, and that is forever. This is a long confusion, and therefore not to be passed over with a short meditation. Let us think again and again of it, and so fear it, that we may never feel it. It is a desperate madness, for the pleasure that one hour determines, to incur those pains that are capable neither of ease nor end. Thus I have insisted on the Sodōites punishment, that we being terrified with it, might learn by their example to prevent it. Which is the next point considerable, the Monument.

Made them an ensample to those that after should live ungodly.] This example of God's Judgment is one of the most conspicuous and remarkable in all the sacred History, and set out for a special precedent by the pen of the Holy Ghost; with a note of recordation, like a hand in the margent that directs to some observable thing in the Text; with a Mark this, as a thing of great consequence. Where collect four observations.

1 The right use of all God's mighty wonders, is when we take them for wonders: trembling at the sight of the works, and fearing the omnipotence of him that wrought them. When Israel saw that mighty work upon the Egyptians, They feared the Lord. They are drowned in a sea of water, and the other do not drown it in a sea of forgetfulness. The sea was troublous, and the mariners feared: the sea was quiet, and yet they feared: this may seem strange; but the first was the fear of nature, the second of Grace: then they feared the creature, now the Creator. When Ananias and his wife fell suddenly dead, fear came upon all the Church. The Judgment was upon some, the fear came upon all. When the earth opened her jaws to swallow Corah, the people opened their mouth to cry; Let us flee. These things came unto them for ensamples, and are written to admonish us. These things they might have suffered, and their calamities have died with themselves, never been known to posterity: but they are written for us. God made a record of them, and if there be any faith in us, they be as present to us, as if they were done before our eyes. If they hear not Moses and the Prophets, nor will they believe one from the dead. Where faith makes a doubt, there sense will never be satisfied.

But if we trust not our ears; in all this ample theater of God's Judgments, did we never see any fetched away from a prosperous estate by strange accidents? were not they precedents for us? Cannot all make us afraid of overlaying God's patience. Did the blasphemer never hear how Rabshakeh sped? Did they that blush not to be called the roaring crew, (therein sentencing themselves) never read what became of the Sons of Belial? Did the secure worldlings never hear of the general deluge? Nor murmurers of those fiery Serpents? Nor unclean persons with their catamorphoses, of the condemnation of the Sodomites? Shall not all this make us to break forth into those acclamations, this was the Lord's doing, and it is marvelous in our eyes.

Indeed these may work with the wicked to admiration, not to repentance. The very Jews beholding the wonders of Christ, could say, we never saw it on this fashion; and, The like was never done in Israel. Herod desired to see Christ for a miracle, as Felix to talk with Paul for a bribe. But God doth not work miracles for miracles, but for us. The gracious Lord hath so done his marvelous works, that they ought to be had in remembrance. I will live, to what end? to declare the works of the Lord: hitting the right end and use. The works of his Providence are miranda: of his Justice, miranda & metuenda: of his mercy, miranda, & diligenda. The thunder should waken our secure hearts, the rain soften our stony bowels, the lightning mind us of the coming of Christ to Judgment.

These things hath God left as memorials to the world, to be read and preached. We have the books, let us not be strangers to their contents. Our forefathers could once have said; We see not our signs, there is not one Prophet among us, nor any that divineth: or if any did divine, they divined lies. Though this sacred Book was not hid in a corner, as when Josiah began to reign: nor cut with a penknife. and thrown into the fire, as in the days of Iehoiakin. Yet the comfortable use was interdicted, the known language concealed, and men bound with a curse not to read it. It now lies open in our Churches, in our windows; God grant we shut not to our own hearts. Preaching applies it, and this help we have also: may we never know the want of it: yea we shall not, unless we voluntarily put it from us, as a matter not worthy the keeping, and (with the Jews) judge ourselves unworthy of the kingdom of heaven. Diverse fearful calamities are threatened to the Jews, such as shall turn their feasts into mourning &c. But if their eyes do not yet dazzle, nor their ears tingle; behind is a woe, that is beyond all woes; the famine of the word of God. Famine of bread is a sore plague, when a woeful mother for herself and son, is dressing their last provision. The extremity harder, when mothers by turns eat up their own children. But this is nothing to a dearth of holy knowledge. It is better not to be, than not to know: better unborne, than untaught.

2 God without all exception to the honor of his Justice, might enrol all the wicked at once in universal confusion: but so it pleaseth his goodness to single out some, and propose them as bleeding witnesses to the world: that their vengeance might bring many to repentance. Perit unus, ne pereat universus. Such an execution of his Justice doth more magnify his mercy; when he punisheth some, that he may spare many. As when many soldiers have faulted in a mutiny, the General executes martial law upon some, to strike a terror into the whole army. So doth the Lord; Nobis fit misericordia, illis non fit in jura. We have deserved, what they have suffered, they have suffered, that we might be delivered. If we make not use of this mercy, we deserve the greater penalty.

3 There is no sin which man can now commit, but God hath declared his wrath against it, in his punishments for it: we can do nothing without a precedent. as any sacrilegious? there be precedents to forewarn him; Gehesi, Judas, and they •hat kept a market in the Temple. But these men fear nec lepram Gehesi, nec suspendium Iudae, nec ejectionem e Templo per Christum. Will the Jesuit be a traitor? there 〈◇〉 precedent. Absalom rebels, what was the end? His huge army defeated by a few, •he wood devouring that day more than the sword: twenty thousand lost. A sense•esse oake performs the part of a good subject, and apprehends the traitor: his beast •eft him to the gal-house, who was turned beast in renouncing his allegiance. The •arth refused to receive him, heaven was shut against him, none of his troupes left to •uard him; who had so unnaturally wronged the maker of all in his anointed vice•erent. The King gave charge for his reprievall, but the King of heaven had other•ise determined of him. And he that had ambitiously provided a stately monu•ent for his corps, a Pyramis or Pillar in the Kings dale; was tumbled with infa•ie into a ditch, like carrion under a heap of stones.

Can any be covetous without precedent? did he never read of Nabal's base pe•riousnesse, and accursed end? Hath not the adulterer, Zimri for his example? •an he think of his sudden end, and not tremble to embrace his harlot? And for the factious, that are subject to their own lusts, but will be subject to no laws; observe they not the conspiracy of Corah against Moses; whom the earth buried alive, and stayed for neither executioner to dispatch them, nor sexton to make a grave for them? Can a man exact upon his brother by a biting interest, without a Jewish example? Or throw his unable debtor into prison without a precedent? The Vs•• is a legal thief, the unmerciful creditor a legal murderer: they do nothing but by Law, and by Law they may go to the Devil together. The fraudulent trafficker cannot abuse his simple customer, but there is precedent for him, in Ananias; Did you sell the land for so much? cost your commodity so much? Yes, what followed? the lie he told before men, he was suddenly sent to answer before the God of truth. Do tyrants now persecute the Church, without example? So Julian sent his subjects to heaven in earnest himself went to hell merrily and in jest. Homicides have the example of Joab, whose gray hairs went not to the grave in peace. There is no profane libertine but had the example of Esau before him: who lost the blessing of heaven, for the pleasures of earth. They cannot tell a lie but by precedent: not swear an oath, not break a Sabbath, nor worship an Image, but by example. All these sins, and what other we can Imagine, have been committed in former ages, and plagued by former judgments. Non tulit nos sine exemplo, ut inveniatur sine defecto, vel tollat sine patrocinio. These iniquities if we admit, they retain not in so mean a quality, as before. Fratricide is now worse than in Cain, because it h•••Cain's ensample. Apostasy now worse than in Lots Wife, because her example hath forewarned us. Adulterate painting worse now than in Jezebel, because we understand her fearful end. Vncleanesse now worse than in Sodom, because the Lord hath made them ensamples to those that after should live ungodly.

4 God's Judgments are so many real Sermons against the sins of men. He doth not only preach vocally by the ministry of his servants, but also actually by the execution of his Judgments. Once hath God spoken, twice have I heard it: once in his word written, a second time in his work done; his actions being so many declarations of his will. So Elihu in Job. These things will God work twice or thri•• with a man, to bring his soul back from the pit. Once he spake it, another time performed it, a third time redoubled it. There is no people can plead ignorance, or excuse themselves by wanting means of Instruction: for the whole earth is filled with the Judgments of God. When the fire devours a man's estate, or the sea wracks the Merchants hopes, or sudden death takes away our neighbors life, God preacheth visibly to us. Though we pronounce nothing by a peremptory rashness, for fear of CHRIST'S objurgation: Do you think they were greater sinners? For the cause is not revealed to us, as the Prophet spake of the troubled Shunamite; 〈ϕ〉 soul is vexed, and the Lord hath hid it from me. Yet let us take them to heart; we cannot discern them, they all concern us.

Let us be the better for all this, lest we become the worse. It had been easier for us never to have heard of Sodom's ruin, than not to mend our lives by the example. God's hand would have been lighter upon impenitent souls, if such precedents of his Justice had never been set before them. Lege Historiam, ne fias Hisoria. Let us raise ourselves out of their fall, and make their subversion the matter and means of our conversion. Exempla observemus, ne exempla simus. Let us be warned by examples, lest we be made examples. If we will not learn by others, others 〈ϕ〉 learn by us. There is no learning so cheap, as that which comes at another's cost. If their poison by good allaying, be made our physic: if the sword of vengeance that devoured them, amend us with the very sight and shaking of it: we shall escape God's fury, and become the blessed examples of his mercy.

Now there are three impediments which frustrate the good use of this doctrine, Contempt, neglect, and mis-interpretation.

1 Contempt, which is a proud and presumptuous humor in men; whom the most palpable judgments, and evident executions, shall never deter from their damnable projects. The Judgments of God are high above his fight: tell him how others have perished, he answers; Tut, I shall never be moved. But this is the greatest Judgment of all; Non intelligere delicta, ne sequatur panitentia: not to understand their errors, lest they should be brought to repentance.

2 Neglect and a forgetful slighting of such terrible things. It is to them but a pang, or a transient stitch, a nine days wonder, or news that is quickly out of date. Pharaoh was no sooner quitted of the plague but presently his heart was hardened. While God thundered, he trembled: but then as if the Lord had spent all his power and shot, he is the same man he was. Like Ephraim's goodness, a morning dew. While the weather is cloudy, they are melancholy: but when the Sun of prosperity rises, and the storm of affliction clears up, their moisture is dried. Such a dew you shall have stand upon the stones of the Church against rain, but the stones are ever the softer for it. Ahab hearing the denunciation of wrath, was humbled: the hand of judgment did but crush his heart like a piece of clay, till the moisture was pressed out, leaving it then but more hardened earth. All Israel was affrighted at the careful end of Corah; yet even the very morrow after they fell upon Moses and Arion, murmuring; Ye have killed the people of God. Such small impression doth the misery of others leave in us; as if we had, a protection from all arrest, a super-ideas against all suites. And what plagues soever we see inflicted on others, we think they have deserved them, never reflecting upon our own merits and mutable conditions. We come short of the circumspection that is in birds and beasts: for they can void the places where they see their fellows have miscarried, and are sensible by what token to remove.

3 Mis-interpretation, by soothing ourselves in our own courses, and turning the stream of God's Judgments another way. Some sport with these examples: and being set forth as Crocodiles in terrorem, they make them their play-fellows, and the subjects for the exercise of their wits. As to respect the conversion of Noah's wife, no better than one of Ovid's Metamorphoses; Niobe into a Stone: as if there was no difference betwixt God's actions, and Poets fictions. So they ascribe Noah's flood to some extraordinary aspect of the Moon, or concourse of watery planets: and think not that God opened the windows of heaven, and fountains of earth. The drowning of Pharaoh's Hosts, to the inconsiderate venturing over upon high Tide. It shall be imputed to anything rather than the true cause; God's answer: these ensamples working no more upon them, than mere casualties. But woe to those that shall not so understand them, as God meant them.

Here I have just cause to declare against three sorts of mistakers: with whose errors I will deal, as the venerable Judges do with seditious Attorneys, call them the Bench, pitch them over the Barre, put out their names from the Roll and let them go.

1 The Impeachers of God's providence, among whom there are six errors, 1. Of the Stoics, who call providence by the name of fate or destiny: which runs through a rank of causes, so bringing in an absolute and inevitable necessity, that pinions the arms of God and man. Theodoret beats the nose of this error flat to the devils face. 2. Of such as tie God's providence only to celestial things, exempting sublunary and corrupt matters. Jerome says, this error was crept into the hearts of the Jews; as he collects from Ezek. 9.9. The Lord hath forsaken the earth, and hath us not. Therefore the LORD answers, mine eye shall not spare them; to show that his power is also upon the earth. 3. Nicenus, with others, held that God's providence extends it self to corruptible things only in a general manner: ad rerum generem vel species, non ad singularia, non ad individua. But our Savior comprehends under it not only the hairs of men, but even the feathers of birds. 4. Aquin. speaks of the error of Rabbi Moses the Jew; that among corruptible things, man only apprehendeth to the divine providence. This Jeremiah confutes. Deus universae carnis; I the God of all flesh; both of men and beasts. 5. Of the Platonists, that distinguish three kinds of providence First, of the supreme God, that stretcheth primarily to spiritual things, in a second degree to all the world. The second, of separated substances, that move the heavens Circulariter; Intelligences. The last, of certain Damones, powers, which they place in the middle betwixt God and man. Such are those that worship Devils for a Ne noceant. 6. Of Atheists, that deny all providence, and admit only fortune. Lactantius hath confuted it by many arguments; but David's conviction is the best disgrace to it, who sets a Cocks-comb on the head of it; The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. In his heart he hath said it, but in his heart he never believed it. Look upon all creatures; they make one glorious army, marshalled into their several ranks, and marching to the will of their great general. Why do stones, plants, and insensible things, tend to the end for which they were created, when as yet they have no knowledge of it, but that they are directed by God? Young ones are no sooner borne, but they turn their mouths the breast of their mothers: yet man, against nature, reason, religion, doth not turn his mouth of confession, to acknowledge that God who made him. We see birds to come of eggs, and living things engendered of dead seed: why should we as well believe the resurrection of our bodies, and the last account of all our actions?

2 As mis-construing perverters of God's Judgments. That the Jews after a curse of fifteen hundred years, and a vagabond dispersion like Cain, should not bethink themselves of their murder of the Lamb of God, is the stupefying spirit of error. One of them is driven to confess that as this plague so far exceeds all their former, captivity so the sin that caused it must exceed all their former sins. As much may justly be said of our Italianated fugitives; who seeing the terrible Judgments of God upon them, will not yet know the Lord. The powder plot is passed over with An unfortunate attempt; and the Instruments no further blamed than for their rash and ill luck: as if they confessed that it wanted nothing but success to make it lawful: worse than the sorcerers of Egypt; they could cry out; This is the finger of God.

They call for a Judge of controversies betwixt us, yet will not see that God himself is the Judge: declaring his sentence and derision by helping the side which he favoereth. All his judgments upon the conspirators, cannot learn them how much he detesteth such practices. Still they will not gather the unwarrantableness of their designs, though they have been forced in indignation to blunder out, that the Judge of all the world is become a Lutheran. Still they are mad to be made the wretched engines of his ambition, that sells the souls of men to buy himself reputation. Cannot the Catholickness of their doctrine, and the infallibility of their director, make their plots successful, and still are they blind? Such palpable demonstrations of God's wrath so directly against their proceedings; might at least make them suspect that something is amiss, and examine where the fault resteth. To have their Infallibilitie so deceived, might cause them to recollect themselves, if they were not drunk with the wine of Sodom. Though they smart with the vials of fury, yet they will not leave their sorcery, according to the prophecy of them. They will rather knew their tongues for pain, than acknowledge God's judgments for sin. If we were such damnable heretics as they would make us, how comes it to pass that the Lord so takes our part? That they so often tempting us by flattery, and attempting us by fury, have not yet prevailed against us? Th•••••there the Popes Bulls nor curses have wrought the intended effects? Certainly if the LORD did not favor our cause; he would never so protect our S•••e. Yet all these ensamples work not upon their consciences, nor will they confess their pernicious courses. Though many hundred of their treacherous Emissari•• have miscarried, yet still more follow on, as if no Precedent had bid them take heed. But Antichrist deals with them, as Amnon did with Tamar: first ravisheth them, and then turns them out of doors. But because they would not take example by whom they should, they shall be made examples to whom they would not: even ⟨◇⟩ reproach to all posterity, and a stink to the succeeding generations.

3 All profane persons that misapply these ensamples: what plagues soever come to others, they conceit of themselves no such desert: Quod perit, pereat: and no further mind it. Instead of a serious application, to make a jest upon others misery, •his is common. We should Weep with them that weep: woe to such as laugh at •heir brothers tears. Whereas, Ille hodie, ego cras, was Saint Bernard's use: and we •re, have been, or may be, as miserable as they; was Saint Augustine's. The seaman that sees another ship split on a rock, will avoid it. Passengers fear to travel •hat way, where they hear of continual robberies. Yet cannot these judicial pre•edents humble them; as if they had their salvation by Patent. Yea, they are but •emporally sensible of their own plagues: nor doth the thought outlast the smart. As that Father speaks of the afflicted Pagans; Perdiderunt utilitatem calamitatis: •iseri fiunt, & pessimi permanent: worse in body, and no better in soul. Either they •hinke they need no affliction, or so sure that they are above affliction. As if God,••ke some skill-less Surgeon, when he comes to let blood, could not find a vein; ••t were not wise enough to choose that vein which is fittest to bleed.

They are lethargically secure, no ruin but their own can stir them. But •hat which could not Instruere, must Destruere: if they be not deterred by others •hey must be destroyed themselves. Thunder proceeds from a vapor lifted up from •he earth, and compassed with a cold cloud: in the agitation or struggling it takes ••re, and then breaks out where the cloud is thinnest: and being out, sometimes it ••rikes the clothes, not the body: sometimes the body, not the clothes. So doth •reaching; it is the vapor or breath of the Spirit, surrounded with the cold and •atrish humors of our sins: it struggles with them, and in the strife catcheth fire; •nd so vents it self to the terror of the world. Somtimes by menaces and examples, ⟨◇⟩ strikes our garments, not ourselves: sometimes it goes farther, and strikes also our •wne hearts. Oh then let us fear God's Judgments upon others, that we may ne•er feel them ourselves.

To conclude with application, albeit indeed the whole discourse is but a doctrine •f Application: for wherefore is an example propounded, but to be applied? •ypocrites are sick, and will not be known to stand in need of physic; they can ••ve no remedy. Profane ones are sick, and will accept of no physic; they will •ave no remedy. It is hard to say, which case is worst: now God have mercy on •hem both! Can we think, God will not deal with us, as he hath dealt with others •efore us? Jezebel suborned false witnesses, and had her neck burst for it: is there no •udgement for such offenders? Achan for Sacrilege is stoned, our Church rob•ers hope to scape. Miriam was proud, and became leprous: our plaisterd popin•yes fear not. Israelites distrusting in the Lord, die by a plague: how many want ••ith, and yet look not to want mercy? Esau seems to say unto all profane wretches; •ache warning by me: Ahab to all superstitious Idolaters, Saul to all malicious persecu••rs, Absalom to all unnatural sons, Gehesi to all false servants, Nabal to all cove••us churls, Shimei to all blasphemous railers Take warning by us. And the Sodo•ites here are made to speak in the language of sorrow, to all secure wantons, Take •arning by us.

Such measure is to be expected from God's hands, if such wickedness be found ⟨◇⟩ ours. If men like it well, to have their buildings on fire about their ears, to see ••eir infants dashed against the stones, or scorched with flames, to feel a bloody ••emy triumphing in their streets, to have their names a derision, their Cities a deso••tion, their carcasses exposed to fowls, and perhaps their souls to furies and tor•ents: they may then run on their impious courses without any repentance or derecation. It is God's mercy, that we were not made the first fruits of his wrath, and examples to all the world: but how great is our unthankfulness, if having thus escaped, we are not bettered? Or if we scape all this, yet the Lord will strike when he sees his time, perhaps when we are in worse case to bear it. He can make our deathbeds smart for this; he may reserve all horror and amazement to that desperate hour, and then lay on us the burden of all our sins. There is one thing, if we hear it, and heart it, enough to fright us all: Tolerabilius erit Sodomae: It shall be easier for them of Sodom in the day of Judgment, than for thee: and yet the Sodomites are now in hell. If we receive not the blessed Gospel with faith and fear, Sodom and Gomorrah never sinned as we sin; and Sodom and Gomorrah were never plagued as we shall be.

But as it is a happy alarm that brings in the straggling soldier to his Colours: and a good chance for the wandering sheep, by seeing the wolf prey on a goat, to be gathered home to the fold. So let the destruction of Sodom, be the instruction of England; let their curse become our blessing. It is a good compassion of nature, that shall bring us to the compunction of grace. So instead of fire and brimstone from heaven, or in hell; the Angels shall lift us up from the vale of mortality, and the brightness of glory receive us in the Paradise of joy; through the mercy of GOD that hath promised it, and the merits of CHRIST that hath purchased it for us.

To those that after should live ungodly. What Saint Paul says; Lex non est posita justo, The law is not made for the righteous man: so nor here is the Example set for the holy. But the law is for the lawless, and the example of the ungodly is for the ungodly. Ex malis moribus oriuntur bonae leges. He that freely obeys the truth, finds no adversary of the law: it serves to chastise the bad and backward, not to restrain the good and forward. The horse that reineth well, needs no bit: nor he that runneth freely, a spur. Against the righteous there is no law. There is $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Condemning law, for they are in Christ: there is no Compelling law, for the Spirit is in them; and they do as willingly obey God, as if there was no law. Were there no hell, and God would not punish transgression with eternal death; yet would they avoid all sin because it displeaseth CHRIST Yea further, if CHRIST would not give them eternal life, yet would they love him, and desire the advancement of his kingdom. So these examples are not for the righteous, but for the ungodly.

1 Let us consider what this ungodliness is in the proper nature of it: for it seems to consist both in the privative or negative, excluding somewhat, and coming short of what is required: and in the Positive, committing somewhat that is prohibited. Ungodliness is a sin, which many defy in their mouths, and embrace in their hearts: so much greater than the seven Popish deadly sins, as it is indeed the ground of them all. More dangerous; because being rooted in the heart, it is not so visible to the eye, nor discernible to his reason that owes it. More heinous, because it is more spiritual, immediately directed against God himself; being a breach of the first commandment of the first Table, robbing him of his due honor. $\langle \diamond \rangle$ consists, either in the true worship of a false god, or in a false worship of the $\langle \diamond \rangle$ God, or in the true worship of the true God with a false heart. Whereas Godliness is a true service of the true God, in a true religion, with a true heart.

First, it gives him not his honor: secondly, it gives it to another: thirdly, 〈◇〉 do give him due honor, yet not after a due manner. The fool says in his 〈◇〉, There is no God: not but that his conscience is convinced of the contrary: but on the least temptation his heart is willing to acknowledge none. Said, or believed: examine him according to his Creed, and never fool believed in his heart, there is 〈◇〉 God. If he must confess his being, yet he renounceth all subjection. They say 〈◇〉 the Almighty, Depart from us &c. This is too outrageous to be the speech of th• tongue, it is the rebellion of the heart; not vocal, but actual. They will not 〈◇〉 him reign over them. They scorn to beg a blessing of him, They call not upon 〈◇〉 Lord. They that will crouch and attend the Court for a Lordship on earth, wi• not so much as be petitioners for the Kingdom of heaven. They say the Lord 〈◇〉 do neither good, nor evil: they sleep, and dream that the Lord sleeps too. O• they not only deny this tribute to their Creator, but give it to some creature; 〈◇〉 David took the land from honest Mephibosheth, and gave it to Ziba a varlet. Or •se they resolve to honor him, with that he hath declared to offend him: as Paul•n persecuting, and the Jews in executing CHRIST; thought they did God •ervice. Lastly, even in their best works, that may carry some show of devotion, •hey have a false heart: halting betwixt God and Baal; a mixed service. So Demas,•hough he forsook Paul, yet turned not to his Idols again.

But he that will admit the service of God no way but his own, shall find the mer•ie of God no way at all. There may be a denial of God in real fact, even when •here is a confession of God in verbal faith. A disease which this age labors of: in •reat ones it is a Noli me tangere; Physicians and Divines call it incurable. Yea our •ulgars are not exempted, and the Pulpit can prove nothing so appositely and direct•y by Scripture, but if it displease the people, it shall never come in their Creed. Let •eligion and the Gospel go whistle, if they speak not as this people would have •hem. When God's word and this ungodliness meets, you shall hear a rattling and •ssing, as in the encounter of fire and water. Paul casts fire at Ephesus, Demetrius•oars: in comes the Town-clarke with the magnificence of Diana: alas, that was 〈◇〉 painted fire, no noise nor tumult at it. If we stroke your spleen, and tell you that •ou are predestinated to go to heaven in a Coach, or that a wherry shall gently waft •ou to Canaan; this is a painted fire that never troubles you. But when we speak •f denying your covetous lusts, abjuring your sacrilege, bleeding for malicious lies •nd slanders; here is presently an hissing, a mutinous mad rebellion.

The word in us labors to destroy ungodliness in you, and ungodliness in you •bours to destroy the word in us. But consider what the Prophet told Amasiah; Qua non acquievisti consilio meo; Because thou hast not obeyed my counsel, I know that •od hath determined to destroy thee. The Sons of Eli would not hearken, because •he Lord meant to slay them: their hearts must be hardened, that they may be destroyed. Alas, the scholar is but the pattern of his master, and our knowledge but a beam •f God's knowledge: while ungodly men refuse us, (Truth hath said it) they reject God himself. They got Zechariah to be made away by the Kings command: he said •o more at his death, but videat Dominus, The Lord look upon it; what followed? While ungodly men are whetting a knife to cut our throats, God is whetting a word to cut their throats. One singular proof of ungodliness, is a contesting against the preachers of Jesus Christ.

2 This example is set down for the ungodly; but it is rare to find any that will confess themselves ungodly: now men that have no sense of being ill, will never care for any medicines to make them well. And though the fruits of it were ever more visible and notorious, yet the root lies buried in the ground, and boasts of a concealment. We have some to whom the very Church is a shadow of death, and they have earnest business, which they love above God and their own souls. Examine your fields, streets, waters, in the times of devotion; is not this ungodliness? And for them that make as though they would be saved, do they not sue for their inheritance in heaven, Formâ pauperis; refusing to give the least scrap of their superfluitie for eternal life? Yea, do not they even pull down that kingdom, which they seem to crave? Is not this ungodliness? If they hear, is it not with contempt, spleen, censure, and (if they durst) with controlment? How few, when the Sermon is done, think either the worse of themselves for the present, or become the better afterward? How many brutish men find we, that continually mistake the soul for the body? Soul, eat, drink, &c. his meaning was, body eat. He thought his soul was delighted with sensualls, whereas it is the lay-part, the very fast of man, that is thus pleased.

Lust is with the affections, as Jezebel with her chamberlaines; she paints and pleases: grace comes like Jehu, who is on my side? O that she were hurled down. If wealth increase, there is a dish added to the table, a set to the ruffe, a tie to the shoes: not a dram to devotion, not a mite to the Church, not a scrap to the poor, not a grace to the soul. Not to speak of the professed enemy to all goodness, the engines of hell, and deputies of the Devil, whose souls are nothing else but moving anatomies: such as are yet to choose their faith, and think religion an humor or fancy following the complection. Like a condemned wretch, that Explet ventrem, damnatus effundere sanguinem; jests away his soul. (Pardon all holy impatience: ruly patients make sharp phisicians.) Men that think all we preach to be but fables: yet on their death-beds, if their lethargiz'd conscience be suffered to wake $\langle \diamond \rangle$ it go to hell; they would give all the world to be sure what we say were not true: are not these ungodly?

To omit those hypocrites, that are shufled among professors, as Saul was among the Prophets: for there is no cure of an unknown grief. To omit those swearers and adulterers, who are out of the reach of civil Justice, but God puts them in his own kalendar: Judging the one, and;not holding guiltless the other. And those Toes of the land that rot with Idleness; lasy beggars: as it hath been observed; Great men make thieves, and then hang them up: make them, by suffering sloth to slide into villainy. And all those capital oppressors, that like Felix, when they can get no money, will bind Paul, if it be but to curry favor with the Jews. They grew rich by the undoings of men, yet under the shadow of power and authority, They wrap it up. Wrappe it up, as mud in Crystal, or a fowl thing in a fair clout. Which was detested by a very Tiberius, chiding his polling officer; Tonderi volo pecus, non deglubi. This is rank impiety: but to come closer home, and happy is the bosom which is not conscious of these evils.

Have we anymore than a mere form of godliness, reserving the pride and choice allowance to our own lusts? As our treacherous Romists, that give their liege their complements, but to a foreign Prince their hearts. Do not men spend ten hours about Mammon, before one minute about devotion? do they not think of their last account, as the last thing to be thought of? Is not covetousness chief commander of the Fort, and nothing done without her permission? Where did the bad servant bury his tallent, but in the Earth? earthy affections, covetousness buries all. This is that which eats out the heart of grace, by eating grace out of the heart. Is not this ungodliness got into the midst of that execrable rabble? The Devil may seem to take example by covetous worldlings, to chide his spirits, and upbraid their sloth: mortal men in so few years can heap up so many thousands, and g•• abundance into their hands: and you that should in quickness outstart them, lie sleeping like drones by the hearth of hell, and seek not to people our kingdom.

And who can wonder that those men disregard their Ministers, that have cast away all respect of their own souls? Or what marvel that S^t Anthony's vision, which is said to be two years before the Arian heresy arose; should now be palpable Beasts about the Altar, kicking it with their heels, dashing it with their horns, and trampling on it with their fowl hooves; till like Job, it be made poor to a proverb. Covetousness makes ungodliness flourish. Yet is not this all: for where is the subjection of heart to the will of God? Who suffers that supreme law to rule his actio•• and affections? who trembles at that thing which may offend his maker? Men little think of their conscience, when they are going about to please their concupiscence: they study their ends, not their End. And how hardly will they prefer God• glory before their own souls, that will not prefer it to a piece of artificial clay? Is not this ungodliness? Innumerable be the fruits of an ungodly heart, whereof the fewer we see in ourselves, the more they be, and the more to be lamented. If we be not evil, why do we pray, Deliver us from evil? Wretched are they that stat•• themselves, and blessed are they that can prove themselves, to be out of the rank of the ungodly. The omniscient eye can find ungodliness enough in the best. To us the•• is this Ensample applicable: let it make us confess that we are as they were, and repent that we may never be as they are. Lord, take away our ungodliness, and th•• shall find none.

3 Lastly, consider the state of ungodliness. To be ungodly implies two things; •ickednesse and wretchedness. He is mortal, yet covetous: poor, yet proud: •olish, yet head-strong. He takes great pains to build an house on another man's •ound: he seeks for sweet water in the midst of the salt sea. He studies more to be •vanced, than to be worthy of that advancement. He hath lost himself, and de•erately cares not what he does, to find his will. Nor his goods, nor his honors, ••r his friends go with him, but his sins: so he departs to torments boundless, ••dlesse.

The Scripture says of him, that he is in sin: it is one thing to have sin in <◇> , another thing for us to be in sin. Sin is in us all; Saint Paul conf•sseth it of him••lfe; sin dwelleth in me. But all are not in sin, drowned, captivated, dungeon'd. •e say, such a man is in drink: drink may be in him, and yet he sober: but for him <◇> be in drink, argues him drunken. The ungodly doth hunt after sin: the eye and ••e ear being a couple of beagles to put up the game, and the whole man turned in•• a beast to follow the course. Only here is the difference: there the heart or hare ••at is chased dies, and the hound lives: here the sin survives, and the hunter perishes. He is slaved to sin; whatsoever lust dictates, he subscribes to: there is no base officer in his family of wickedness, but let him come with the most unnatural suite, ⟨◇⟩ writes Fiat. He is holden with the cords of his sins: God help the man thus manacled: this is a case, wherein a King may be pitied by a galley-slave. Here is no flying, no changing his master: sua mutare potest, non se: he may change his place, estate, repose; lodging, repast; he cannot change himself. Whosoever he goes, ⟨◇⟩ takes himself along with him.

He hath latam & expansam conscientiam, a broad conscience; which is like a open door, it can take in a whole load of corn: he can swallow a camell. All ravenous fishes have large and wide mouths: the devil will never mince this man's meat, he is able to swallow it whole. (Whereas the good conscience is like the little door to the Sanctum sanctorum, that lets in none but the high Priest, JESUS CHRIST.) He confirms his heart in evil by voluntary custom; till he can with more ease digest the hardest offense, than the stomach of an Ostrich can digest iron ore is pleased with the success, vexed with the prevention of any sinful purpose. If a plot be crossed, and his hand cannot act that wickedness by day which his head hath devised by night; he is taken with a fit of melancholy, sick of the sullens; as was Ahab and Haman. He thinks it a death that he cannot be suffered to die, it is a loss to him, that the gates of hell are shut against him.

If he be punished, he can grieve at the smart, not at the cause: in sickness he can ⟨◇⟩. My head, my head, or my belly, my belly: but my sin, or my soul, is none ⟨◇⟩ his complaint. To wail some small effects, and never to think of the cause; is ⟨◇⟩ be curious in healing the cliffs of skin at the root of our nails, never minding ⟨◇⟩ corruption that is in our heads or hearts. His whole business is sin, he hath nothing else to do in the world. He may taste of the waters of life by chance, as a gudgeon laps at Nile; but his voyage is bound for mischief. And like a fire-drake on a line, he runs on while his matter lasts, then goes out with stink and crack.

Though I cannot say to all men, be not sinners: yet let me say, be not ungodly enough you admit sin, do not intend sin: do not seek it, though it finds you. Old men know what is in their hearts, and distinguish betwixt rebellions and inimities? Pirates forage on the seas, rob Merchants, refuge themselves at Dunkirk or Argiers. They complain to the Spaniard or Turk for redress: No, say they, they are none of ours, we give them no such allowance, we own them not. Well, if yet secretly they receive them to land, help them with fresh water, meat, clothing, provision; and thus under hand relieve them; sure these do allow them. Men profess piety, yet admit, of lusts in themselves, injuries to others: whose acts these? none of ours, alas! against our wills, we cannot but sin, yet we consent not to it. Nay, but if concupiscence be in the mean time fostered, purveyed for by the eye, batted by riot, armed with approbation, justified by dissembling; this is not weakness, but rank ungodliness. It is a habit; every act doth not make a habit, diverse have fallen into incontinence, soon repented, and avoided the sin; this cannot be called ungodliness. Transient escapes do not denominate an ungodly man, because the sins committed are now loathed. But avarice, injustice, malice, &c. These are ungodliness: because here is a continuance of will, and a will of continuance. Now as the Orator said, when he had declaimed against drunkenness, it was but to keep men sober: so this discourse of ungodliness is intended to t••• men's hearts to piety. But this may be planted by Paul, and watered by Apellos, 〈◇〉 increase can be but by the Spirit of Jesus Christ.

This was their ungodliness. God often spareth the wicked for the righteous sake: such as are either allied in blood, as Cham was in the Ark: or by cohabitation and proximitie, as Paul had all the souls in the ship given him. Sapiens est stulti redemptio: as a Physician is an antidote against sickness, and a valiant man a muniment against enemies. When Augustus had conquered Anthony, and taken Alexandria, and the Citizens expected nothing but present massacre: the Emperor proclaim• a general pardon, for Arius sake, a philosopher of that City, and his familiar friend. Thus doth God forbear men for men, one for another, but all for JESUS. B•• where all apostates, all perish. Noah could deliver but eight out of a world, and Abraham beginning at fifty, went no lower than ten, lest he should have been 〈◇〉 bold with God. He doth stay at ten, not as though God for a less number will not spare a city: for as sometimes for more than fifty he will not suspend his Judgments; as Samaria and Israel found, when seven thousand good men were among them: so for fewer than ten he will sometimes show mercy, as he promised to spa•• Jerusalem for one. Find but one man that seeketh the truth, and I will spare it. B•• here all were ungodly, only one family shunned their filthy conversation, and s• escaped their fiery conflagration.

The sins of Sodom.

TO take a short catalogue of their ungodliness, principally their sins were fix: four whereof be mentioned, Ezek. 16. Verse 49. a fifth by Saint Jude. Ver. 7. following strange flesh: the last, Gen. 19. Verse 9. contempt of all holy admonition.

1 Pride will ever be foremost: it seeks the highest place in preferment, it sh••• have the uppermost place in torment. Not unto us O Lord, not unto us, but to 〈◇〉 own Name give the praise: this pride contradicts; To us, to us, and to none but 〈◇〉. We may say of Humility, as of that good woman; Many daughters have d••• virtuously, but thou excellest them all: but of pride, other sins do vilely enough, but that surmounts them all. God resisteth the proud, for the proud resist God: 〈◇〉 piece of rotten dust, so soon as it is made, recoileth against the maker, oppos••• that Majesty which the Angels adore, the Thrones worship, the Devills fear, a•• the heavens obey. But he gets nothing by it, for if GOD resist him who 〈◇〉 d•fend him? If against the proud, he sent his Law with such thunder, how will hi•self come?

The world is apt to admire pride, her words are held oracles, her works ••acles, her garments true ornaments. This so flesheth and flusheth her, that she thi••• no more of God, except it be with Saul, Honor me before this people. As •••chadnezzar built much for his own honor, nothing for the honor of God. Th•••fore the Lord will grace humility, and give her the glory. When the ambiti••promoter of himself shall be fetched down, God will say to her, Friend sit up higher. Pride is like smoke; Est quod videas, non est quod teneas. But humility is a substantial grace, so that pride it self is proud of her mantell: as Absalom so rank with pride, yet put on a show of humbleness, in complement. And this is the glory of humility, that proud men are glad of her liverie. But pride must learn better manners or if she scape the Sodomites fire on earth, she must feel the Sodomites fire in hell.

2 Fullness of bread.] But is this a sin? Is not bread the staff of life, and the fullness of it a blessing? Yes, but that good mother brought forth two bad daughters; Pride in habit, and excess in diet. It is not the fullness of bread, but our fullness of belly, that is the sin. Charge therich that they be not high minded; no sooner rich, but presently high minded. The fat valleys of such as are overcome with wine: they that dwell in fat valleys, will fume with wines. Let their table be made a snare: the most riotous table is the most dangerous snare. I will leave in the midst of thee an humble and poor people, and they shall trust in the Name of the Lord! They that have nothing to trust unto in the world, will sooner be brought to trust only in the LORD. Haman's abundance made him proud, and his pride advanced him fifty cubits higher than the earth, to a stately gibbet. If our gold become our fetters, we had better have lived beggars. The Israelites fared daintily on their Quails, fed with meat of Princes, and bread of Angels: but their sauce was two sharp, when that they put into their mouths, GOD fetched back at their nostrils.

It is better to want necessaries and iniquities, than to have with the fullness of bread, the fullness of pride and riot. Lest I be full and deny thee. If full, deny thee, presently follows. It was the Lord's caveat to Israel; Take heed, lest When thou hast eaten and art filled, thou forget the Lord. All they that be fat on earth, shall eat and worship: thus it should be. They wax fat, and spurn with their heels: They were filled, their heart was exalted, therefore have they forgotten me: thus it is. We all desire plenty; but as when one wished the son to be like the Father, Cato replied, is this a blessing or a curse? would our plenty do us good, or harm? The wicked have their desire, Yea, more than their hearts can wish: what's the issue? They set their mouths against heaven. CHRIST did not teach us to beg variety of dishes, nor abundance of wines, but Bread; and that but for the day, Daily bread It is emptiness that values God's providence, not fullness. When the LORD deals with us, as Fredericke Duke of Saxony with his servants: who in hawking had rode over much corn, and carelessly spoiled it: gave charge that their messes of meat should not be abridged, but not one bit of bread should be allowed to their supper.

Plenitude breeds many diseases, I am not Physician good enough to number them: not only pride, that worm of riches; which naturally begets another worm that never dieth, the worm of conscience. But surfeit and drunkenness, the sins of this City. Call your wines by what names you will; French, or Greek, or Spanish; it is Vinum Londinensium, the Londoners wine. Where there is such immoderate feasting, the world must needs believe that it is not maintained without sin and deceit: and for such meat you had need of strong wine to help digestion. Here it is, and here it is immeasurably taken, abused, urged; as if our brothers fall were not the Devills victory. Some have thought that martyrdom and Christ's passion was called by the name of a Cup, from the loathsome filling and violencing the appetite with drink. The youngest daughter of this fullness, is wantonness. They rose up like fed horses, neighing with lust. But of that anon: this is the dependence of Pride and Riot: one would think that they had no acquaintance, but they are very near. He that exalts himself above his creation by pride, falls below his creation by drunkenness. It is the voice of pride, all is mine:

then riot answers, I may do what I list with mine own. Both are contraries to sobriety, one of the mind, the other of the body. They are often coupled and united: The proud man and he that transgresseth by wine. Pride turned Nebuchadnezzar into a beast, so doth drunkenness: their union in sin shall find no separation in punishment.

3 Idleness;] this is another effect of fullness: they that flow with abundance, never mind any diligence. As it was in the days of Lot; they did eat and drink, they bought and sold, they planted and built. These were all Otia, rather than Negocia, as they used them: even that labor was Idleness. To Marry, is honest and honorable; yet was the old world taxed for this. Not because only, as some answer they married not with any conjugal love, but with a voluptuous lust: for this is a remedy, not an iniquity that God so severely punisheth. They minded their loves, they minded not God's Laws, here was the sin. So in the days of Lot, as if Lot was only in the day light, all the rest in night and darkness, They ate and drank, this is nature's necessity: and is not reprehended in quantum naturae subsidium, sed in quantum nequitiae fomentum: not the conveniency, but the superfluity is faulted. They bought and sold, this was a lawful negotiation: therefore not the mutual commercement, but the unjust defraudment, is taxed. They built and planted; both in themselves allowable. CHRIST blames not their felling of trees, nor building of houses, but the baseness of their desires; who sought eternity upon earth, and had no heart to the God of heaven. In eating and drinking was their Saturitie: in building and planting, their security: in buying and selling, their covetousness. They were all superfluous to that one necessary thing, and therefore Idleness. They feared not the Lord, but lay down in their own sensuality; this was their invincible stupidity. Thus rotten were they in their lees of sin, that unless they had animi pro sale, they had been all stinking carcasses.

Here we see, it is not enough to forbear evil, but it is damnable not to do well. CHRIST pretermits the enumeration of their horrible delinquishments, and speaks of their acts lawful in appearance; censuring them. If they were condemned for feeding, what is the wages of surfeiting? If they for necessary trading, what shall be for fraudulent deceiving? If they for building their own houses, what shall become of them that pull down God's house? If such a judgment fell upon marriage, what is the curse of adultery? Matth. 25. CHRIST mentions not the sins of commission, as if they were damnable enough by concession; but the omitted duties: Ye did not feed me, &c. Not that the other shall pass unpunished, but to show that there is damnation enough wrap'd up in these to destroy the world.

Thus easily doth fullness degenerate into idleness: and where is no need of gains, there no vouchsafing of pains. To many a man will God say; I made thee an husbandman, who made thee a Gentleman? I will make man a helper meet for him: this intends that neither should be idle. The man is compared to the Sun, the wife to the Moon; that borrows light of him, yet hath some of her own. Mulier fulget radiis mariti. But when the Sun shall shine only by the Moon light, that is preposterous. He is a Sodomite that will eat none but another's bread, and wear no coat of his own weaving. The slothful will not plow because of winter: therefore shall he beg in summer, and no man shall give him. He shall beg, that's bad: and no man shall give him, that's worse. But yet a man may be busy enough, and be labor on himself with a vengeance: when he shall labor in that he hath no thanks for, and be idle in that should do him good: thus a man may go to hell for his pains. Sodom thus labored in sin, and now labors in torment. Let us so work on our Eve, that we may rest on our Sabbath; work up our salvation on earth, and reap our salvation in heaven.

4 Contempt of the poor.] This is an execrable sin, a thing that hastens before the time. If he be condemned that says no more, but God help thee: how sore is his Judgment that says in heart, I despise thee? That omission is culpable, that goes no further than Be warmed: but that damnable, that says, be starved. It were far enough to pass by them, like the Levite, without succor: but horrible, not to pass by them without disdain. Cast thy bread on the waters, that is, on the watery eyes, which do weep for want: but if we cast not our morsels, let us forbear to cast our scorns. How basely soever we esteem them, they are the members of Christ, and such as he honors, and sets near him: taking notice of every benefit, and recording every wrong, that is done them. It will be no light or slight offense; to condemn the brother of the Son of God.

Some think that the Sodomites would admit no strangers to come among them, as they speak now of China; and that this made them so furious against the Angels. There be four terms among men. 1. Mine is thine, and thine is thy own. 2. Mine is mine, and thine is thine. 3. Mine is thine, and thine is mine. 4. Thine is mine, and mine is my own. The first is of Saints, the second of Moralists, the third of Populars, and the last is the voice of Devils: of this rank were the Sodomites. For this special cause they hated Lot, for his hospitality. When they came in troupes to break into his house, he pleads the laws of hospitality: For this cause came they under my roof. And when he sees their headstrong purpose of villainy, he chooseth rather to be an ill father to his own children, than an ill host to strangers. Therefore is heaven called Abraham's bosom, because of his hospitality: and thither the Saints go; it is fit that hospitable men should go to their Father.

Let us make the poor our friends by our alms, not our enemies by our scorns. We had better have the ears of God full of their prayers, than heaps of money in our own coffers with their curses. Worldly men think themselves wise in getting wealth, and the Scriptures folly: therefore throughout the Scriptures God calls them fools for their labor. Thou fool. There is a tale of an Abbot that gave his fool a painted staff, willing him to bestow it on the veriest fool he could meet. This Abbot fell mortally sick, the fool was a visitant among the rest: and hearing him say, I must leave all and be gone, asked him whether he would go. The Abbot answers, into another country: but I hope, replies the fool, you will carry all your gold and Jewels and treasure with you: No, I must leave all. But sure you have sent great store of preparation, as rich hangings, coverings, beds, plate and furniture before you: No, I must leave all behind. All? I hope at least you have sent enough to furnish your own room, provision enough for yourself; No, not the least pillow. Hold, saith he, take your Staff again; you are the veriest fool that ever I met. It is easily applied: they that of so much under their custody on earth will make no provision for themselves in heaven, by giving to the poor; are well wadded of the extremest folly. Let us relieve them by our good deeds, that they may believe us by their good prayers; so shall we find mercy in the day of JESUS CHRIST.

5 Following strange flesh.] This was not only fornication or adultery; a man's wife is his own flesh, and she that is not so, is a stranger. But even an offense against nature, for the Sodomites were not content with the common way of sinning, but were mad with a prodigious and preposterous lust. Bring forth the men that we may know them. Shall we say, herein the very Sodomites spoke modestly, though their intention were villanous? I do not think they meant any mannerly concealment, but it is the dialect of the Scripture; which by an honest name sets down a most dishonest thing. It hides the sin of Sodom, as the painter hid the scar in Agamemnon's face. Certainly their impudence was monstrous, declaring their sinne; Bring them forth. Wherein they would make Lot, a father; not only a witness to the constupration and ravishment of the Angels, but even the very bawd Pandar; Do thou bring them out.

Questionlesse, those heavenly guests were of an excellent form, and most sweet savour, surpassing the sons of men: and the sight of this enflamed their more than earthly lust. Such a natural desire hath wicked man, to mar what God made, to corrupt his most admirable workmanship: and where he hath imprinted the most fair characters of his glory, there they have most ambition to fasten: like cankers, that had rather be about one rose, than a thousand weeds. Beauty, meant for a mirror wherein to admire God, they turn into a snare to confound themselves. And so suck poison from the flower, that would yield them honey. Happy man, whom the temptation of beauty, cannot make to forget his duty!

This was the extremity of Sodomes sins, for whose sake it shall be called Sodomy to the worlds end. Whether the first excogitation of it begun, or the received practice was infamous, among them; it is still the sin of Sodom. So abominable, that fire from heaven was the reward of it. As against nature was the transgression, so against nature is the destruction. It is natural for fire to ascend upward, but here contrary to the course of nature it is forced to come downward. Christ himself is said to rain that deluge from Jehovah his Father: why he? why not, as in other punishments, The Lord, without any further distinction? Quia Naturam quam assumpturus erat, corruperant. Because they had corrupted that nature, which the Son of God was to take. Videns Dominus hoc peccatum in carne, paene defijt incarnari. The Lord seeing this sin in the flesh, had almost forborne to take flesh; or at least so long deferred it before he came. Some have written, that all the sinners in that kind, died the very same night that Christ was incarnate. This sin was infamous among the Gentiles; They burned in lust one toward another, and man with man wrought filthiness. For this horrid uncleanness in masculine venery, Socrates is branded among the Philosophers, and Nero among the Roman Emperors. As by lawful marriage, Two are made one, so by this turpitude, one is divided into two. But let this sin slide into hell with the Sodomites, and never more be remembered on the face of the earth. I now expel it out of my discourse, the Lord banish it out of all our hearts forever. Yea, not only that, but all manner of uncleanness; lest we be given over, like the Gentiles, to our own lusts, by a just retaliation. Who, as they had dishonored God, were suffered to dishonor themselves. And as they had turned Beasts into gods, so they turned themselves into beasts.

But this following of strange flesh hath a greater latitude and further extent, and fetcheth in all carnal pollutions. A sin that is a Burning, wheresoever it hath a being. The Apostle in one chapter hath six invincible arguments to dissuade ⟨◇⟩ from it.

1*The body is for the Lord, and the Lord for the body.* If the body be for the Lord, it is not for uncleanness. If the Lord be for the body to glorify it, then he is for the body to rule and sanctify it. The husband is one with the wife, and the wife with the husband, while both are chaste: but if the bed be defiled, that concorporation dissolves.

2*He that raised up the Lord, shall raise us up by his power.* If we desire our body to be raised with incorruption when we are dead, let us keep it without pollution while we live. Let us sow a gracious body, that we may reap a glorious body. How deformed and ugly will the fairest creatures look, when their bodies shall be raised with the marks of uncleanness upon them? Optimi corruptio pessima: if pro•itution, maugre all the art of plaistering, can turn beauty into deformity, and make despicable on earth, how loathsome will it appear in the day of vengeance?

3*Shall I take the members of Christ, and make them the members of an harlot? God forbid.* Suppose a king sitting in his Chair of Estate, his temples crowned with a golden Diadem, his body adorned with royal robes and jewels: how ill favouredly would a torn shoe, or a leprous toe appear? It is our glory, to be parts of hi• that is the King of glory: let us not dishonor him by defiling ourselves. He is mad that forsakes a Saint to admit a Devil into his arms; that for the odious connection with a harlot, leaves the delicious embraces of Jesus Christ.

4*Every sin that a man doth, is without the body: but he that commits fornicati• sins against his own body,* Other sins are extra corpus, this is contra corpus. In these of all members the hand is principal, and blasphemy the tongue: but this above the rest, secundum plus & minus, leaves a sordid iniquation upon the whole body. If •hen not for the love of God, whose the body is by creation: nor for desire of per•ect beauty at the resurrection: nor for hatred of the highest sacrilege, robbing Christ of his members by a carnal impropriation; yet for love of thyself, and re•pect to thine own body, flee fornication.

5*Know you not that your body is the temple of the holy Ghost?* It is a great profane•esse to abuse the material Temple, made with men's hands: much worse to violate •he Spiritual Temple, made by the hand of God. s I have heard of some depopulators, •hat of the Choir of Saints have made a kennel for their dogs; that was nefarious •nough. Yet so far as God loves this corporeal Temple better than that, this •dulterous profanation exceeds the former. To turn the Holy Ghost out of his •hamber, and to make it the Devils stie and stews; most fearful! O think in •ticulo tentationis, it is the Temple of God I now profane, defile, abuse: what fire •nnot this meditation quench?

6*Ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God in your body and spirit, for they •re God's.* By this token keep thy body intemperate, saith Christ; I shed my blood ⟨◇⟩ redeem it. What I have been at such cost to cleanse; do not thou carelessly •efile. No gold or jewels could ransom our bodies, but the blood of Christ: let ⟨◇⟩ value them according to the price, and we shall not do amiss. Do not for a moments delight, make frustrate an eternal purchase. Most enormities of life proceed from an error in the understanding; We may do what we list with our own. We may speak what we list; why? our tongues are our own. We may spend what we list why? our riches are our own. Shall I take My bread and My meat, with churlish Nabal? He is deceived, for even of life it self man is not Dominus, sed custos, saith Law and Case-divinity. The Lord is the possessor of heaven and earth, man but the Farmer. Our bodies are our own, therefore do with them what we please? It is false, they are none of ours: but in a true propriety, The Lord's. We have but a right of favor from the true Proprietary, and that liable to an account. He lends them us for our use, but his own service. Therefore answer all temptation to lust; This body is not mine own, but His that made it, and bought it: I are not alienate it from the owner, and remove the marks he hath set unto it. My body is Thine, Lord keep it, and save it forever.

6 The last sin of Sodom was contempt of heavenly admonition. Lot charged them from God, and they like a rusty or ill-wrought piece, recoiled in his face; Who made thee a Judge? we will deal worse with thee, than with them. They had all stony hearts, and Lot could do small good in preaching to a heap of stones. O that his sin of Sodom did not cleave too fast unto this land and time. They had but one Lot for four Cities, we have for one City four hundred Lots. What nation under heaven hath so many learned Teachers? Our Church looks like the Firmament in the glory, when a clear night shows it bespangled with stars of all lustres and diversity of lights. And if in some places they appear thinner, and shine less; as the stars are thin to them that live under the Southerne Pole, and there be little sparkles in the Galaxie, scarce discernible: it is only for want of competency, there is no provision to feed them. But to this City the Bees come in swarms, Crura thymo pleno, to empty their best honey in this glorious Hive. This honey you suck, and at last send them down again poor miserable drones. The number of Preachers about the City, exceeds some whole Country in Christendom. For ought I know, in the benefits of nature, and commodities of life, it may be equal to others: in this it excels the rest. If Rome have the gayer Roods, and Spain the richer Images; yet certainly we have the happier Pulpits.

Thus great is our blessing, but how small is our estimation of it! Formally men come to Church, to hear a man talk, but it is no matter to them what he says. We may preach ourselves hoarse and dead, and yet do no good: the reason is, men's hearts are hardened in contempt. When Christ preached, The eyes of all were fastened on him; our eyes are turned another way. The time will come, when they will not suffer wholesome doctrine: the event hath sealed this Prophecy. To carpe at the phrase, method, voice, or gesture; this is nothing: such exceptions be like a flourish before a fight. The worlds quarrel is against the substance of Preaching: if we threaten, we are cruel: if we promise, we flatter: if mild, we dream: if bold, we rail: if we prove by arguments, it is called sophistry: our affability is held lightness: our austerity, madness: nothing can please them, that resolve they will not be pleased. For our personal disgraces, we armed ourselves for them when we took the Profession. We knew that we should be stared on as prodigies, hissed as ridiculous, shunned as infectious: endure all the reproaches, that the Devils scavengers can rake out of the kennells of hell, to throw on our faces. The worst language that hath been dip'd in the fire, or tip'd at the forge of hell, is as good as God morrow, if they meet a Minister.

But here it is, though the contempt light upon us, it is meant at the Gospel; and CHRIST is wounded thorough our sides. To speak truth, here is the very head and heart of the controversy: the Word will not let men alone in their s•••s, therefore they must be revenged on somebody: from hence proceed the sacrilege robbing, and the aspersions wronging the Ministers of Jesus Christ. Palato 〈◇〉 s•no paena est panis, qui sano est suavis. They hate him that rebukes in the gate. Ama•••••tem, oderunt redargentem. Alas! what can work upon a hard heart? Take a ba•• new come out of the fire, and the Smith can work it though it be iron: let him strike on his anvil never so long, there is no impression made, but rather a rebo•• of the stroke.

The words of the wise are like goads, but men have Leviathans skins: They este•• iron as straw, and brass as rotten bavins. They are nails, but driven upon marble or iron, and so turn again. This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men love darkness better. They excuse themselves from the sins of Sodom, Pride &c. but there is a sin within them, which makes them as far off from salvation. While you that see the light which Sodom never had, despise it more than Sodom ever did; It shall be more easy for Sodom in the day of Judgment than for you. Le• 〈◇〉 men flatter themselves from being obnoxious to those execrable enormities: while they do not humbly and obediently honor the Gospel, their estate is worse: and Sodom shall be saved sooner than these men.

Let Rome tremble, that hath too truly deserved this name. Spiritual Sodom. Roma amor est: qualis? praeposterus. Vnde? Roma mares. It were no sla•der, to tax Italy of Sodom. By their allowance? God forbid. Yet Ieroni••• Mutius set out books of purpose, to defend this filthiness; and (it seems) they were allowed by the Bulls of Pope Julius the third. Casa the Archbishop of Benventum joined himself as a copes-mate to second him. They bestowed praises o• that sin, whereof Sodom it self would have been ashamed. But this must be no imputation to their doctrine, for that teacheth otherwise. And for ourselves, though in this we touch not upon Sodom's filthiness, let us beware lest by other sins we bring ourselves to Sodom's wretchedness. Let us hearken to the Gospel and love it, love it and believe it, believe it and obey it, obey it and so hono•• it, honor it and so be everlastingly saved by it. Amen.

VERSE 7. And delivered just Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked.

THE time is come at once, when Sodom must be burned, and Lot delivered. Zoar is preserved for Lot, as Lot was for Abraham. If Sodom had not been wholly wicked, he had not changed his dwelling: he could have procured •ercie to it, as well as to Zoar. Now at once the Sun rises upon Zoar, and fire falls •own upon Sodom. Abraham stands on the hill, and beholds the Cities smoa•ing. Lot is secure in his new habitation, and neither feels nor fears the Judgment. 〈◇〉 is fair weather with the Saints, when it is fowlest with the wicked. When •arms of hornets sting and wound the Egyptians, not a fly must touch an Israelite. •hat such a winged army came not from nature or fortune, it is plain; but from 〈◇〉 offended God: because the very flies shall make a difference betwixt Egypt and ••shen. He that gave them a being, sets them a stint: they can no more sting an Israe•e, than spare an Egyptian. The wings of those small creatures are directed by a •rovidence, and confess their limits.

The fire can go no further than the plain, not a spark shall reach to Zoar. But •hen Sodom hath never a Lot left in it, what should hinder the destruction? If God •eete with a very good field, he pluckes up the weeds, and lets the corn grow: if •ith an indifferent, he lets the corn and the weeds grow together: if with a very ••d one, he gathers the few ears of corn, and sets fire on all the rest. When he tur•ed Sodom into ashes, he delivered just Lot.

There are two principals in the verse; a Freedom, and a Thraldome: for So•ome was a Gaole to Lot wherein he was tormented, Zoar a refuge wherein he was •uited. There is a prisoner and a Preserver: Lot is the prisoner, God the pre•rver.

In the Freedom consider four circumstances.

The

- Matter, What; A Deliverance.
- Manner, How; Eripuit, a violent deliverance.
- Time, When; the fire being ready to fall.
- Place, Where; by sparing Zoar for his sake.

For the Thraldome, the Prisoner is described by His

- Grace, he was a just man.
- Place, among the wicked.
- Case; he was vexed with them.

First, for his Freedom; here was a Deliverance, and God was the author of it. ••deed, who else can deliver? Deliver me O God, for vain is the help of man. Ma•y are the troubles of the righteous, and the Lord delivereth him out of all. Man can•t deliver out of one, God out of all. The deliverer shall come out of Zion: An•ls or men may be Instruments, CHRIST is The Deliverer. Deliver Israel, (◊) God, out of all his troubles. It was Rabshacehs blasphemy; What God can deliver •t of my hand. What God? he found it to his cost. Can he deliver on the hills, ••d not in the valleys, O ye foolish Aramites! Thou hast delivered my soul from •ath, &c. To me the mercy, to thee the glory: thou hadst no partner in the design, •one shall share with thee in the honor.

Till Lot be delivered, not a spark must kindle: the impartial sword must not touch Rahab, nor the destroying Angel offer a blow to the sprinkled doors. Those Ministers of Justice have an Inkehorne as well as a Sword: an Inkehorne to mark the chosen first, then Go and smite. Great deliverances giveth He unto his King; a quantity of both kinds; multitude and magnitude: be they never so many, never s• mighty, against us; the LORD will deliver us. Saint Paul confesseth a Delivera•• past, present, future: He hath, He doth, and he will deliver me. God doth not only deliver his out of the fire, but he puts out the fire too. The snare is broken, and we are delivered. He doth not stand to untie it, but breaks it a pieces. O•e deep ca••• another: the depth of our misery for the depth of his mercy. Our lowness is God's height: the lower we are humbled, the higher is he exalted: the more grievous o•• exigent, the more glorious his advancement. We are more sure of our deliverance, than the Devil can be sure of our persecution.

Seeing the faithful shall be delivered, and God only doth it, let our confidence know no other refuge. All concur in him that make a perfect Deliverer, Power, skill, and will. There may be power and will, where is no skill to use it. If the ho•• were privy to his own strength, he would not suffer a boy to ride him. The Lord hath Wisdom with power: the School says that he knows Non entia; which they ground upon the Apostles words; He calleth those things which be not, as though• they were. These are of two sorts; Either such as are not now in act, but have been in time past, or shall be in time to come. Or such as neither are now in being, <◇> ever were, nor ever shall be. Now seeing foolish man often fears what never was, i•, nor shall be: it is best to fear God, that is, that was, and that shall be: who only knows, the things we fear shall never happen to us.

There may be power and skill, yet no will to use it. The Levite wanted neither ability nor knowledge, to unbind the Samaritan: he wanted will, a heart of pity. Diverse have money in their purses, and wit in their pates, when they see poor wretches: it is the want of compassion, that takes no compassion of their wax. I• this commiseration were not in God, he was less kind to his children, than man and beast to their young.

There may be will and skill, yet a defect of power: no such want can be in the Almighty. Philosophy says, that is most active which is most elevated à m•v•, separated from earthly parts. The Physician distills his simples into waters, thereof he makes extractions and quintessences, which are operatively strong: still the more elevated à materia, the stronger and more active. Water is stronger than earth, air than water, fire more active than air or water, as appeared in Eliahs sacrifice: Angels stronger than men, God stronger than all: above earth, above water, above air, fire, men, Angels, over all Actus purus; no weakness can be in him. It is a principle, variante materia forma manet eadem: according to the alteration of the air and climate, our bloods, humors, complexions may change; but the soul is the same still. Cut off a leg or an arm, you cut off no part of the soul. Many p••fessors may be lop'd off by martyrdom, yet Religion stands; to show that it is maintained by a Form and Soul that cannot vary. God is unchangeable, all c••• hopes of deliverance deceive us: men vary, times vary, weapons vary, policies o• war vary, advantages and successes vary: therefore it is best trusting to an obje•• that cannot vary; which is only God himself. Ashur shall not save us, nor <◇> we ride upon horses, nor say to the works of our hands, ye are our gods: for in thee the fatherless findeth mercy.

Animalia multa agunt & patiuntur per Phantasiam: so it is fancy in me• <◇> makes them fear where no fear is; dreading the danger, not trusting the Deli•••. The sheep at first sight of the Wolf, apprehends him for a terrible object, ••rally fears and flies him: the Lion feels no terror, but passeth by him with honorable scorn. A Malking frights a child, a man contemns it. Elsha's sermons quakes at the Syrian army, no fear invades the Prophet. He saw, and caused him to see a greater Deliverer above. In the street we see men walk in there equal stature and dimensions, they on a high turret appear little to us. Stand on a promontory, they with you are great, they beneath you seem small: the situation of the eye makes or mars all, So it is with men in the time of trouble; if their eyes be fixed on earth, their enemies appear great, and God that is so high seems little. Let our eyes be in heaven, and from thence look down upon our enemies, God will then appear mighty, our foes weak and contemptible, This was Iehoshaphat's confidence; there is no strength in us to stand against this multitude; but our eyes be toward thee. The returning Spies brought such bastard news; We saw Giants, the sons of Anak, compared with whom we appeared like grasshoppers. alas, their eyes were fixed upon earth. Caleb had his eye in heaven, fixed on God's power and promise, he apprehends no terror at all. Joshua had a Lions eye, that passed by all these high Giants, and their higher walls, with an overlooking disdain. They are read for us, fear them not, for the Lord is with us.

Samaria had a strong enemy without, a sore famine within: a Nobleman, the Kings own favourite, looking on the present miseries, took them to be greater than God could cure; Though he should open the windows of heaven, and rain victuals. But the Prophet had his eyes in heaven, and knew that the LORD would do this without windows. The flattering Courtier extolled the King, made him the mightiest: his eyes were upon promotion. The Prophet saw no such matter; Ye all die like men. Even when they ride in chariots, millions attending, guards defending, they are but Grasshoppers and Crickets to the Lord of hosts: Domini terrae, not but Terra Domini. As Moses Serpent devoured the Enchanters, so God's power swallows up all men's. We are all weak, in this mighty Deliverer be our confidence. When little children first learn to go, feeling their own feebleness, they trust out a hand to the wall to stay them. Our strength is but like children's; Our hope standeth in the Name of the Lord.

2 The manner, how: Eripuit. It was not a Tradidit, as Judas delivered Jesus to the Jews, the Jews to Pilate, and Pilate to death. Not only a Liberavit, as Peter was delivered, his bands falling off, and the prison doors ready for his Exit. But eripuit, snatched him away, delivered him by a holy kind of violence. Make hast, for I can do nothing till thou come thither. Cannot? Is anything impossible to God? So it is said of CHRIST; He could do there no great works. It is not because he cannot, but because he will not; he had decreed the contrary. Here observe three things.

1 Lot would not have hastened out of Sodom, had not the Angels pulled him forth by the hand. Thus impossible is it for us, to free ourselves from the bondage of sin, unless the Lord draw us. Through many gradual motions we are delivered from the wickedness of this world, as Lot was from Sodom. The Angels attained their end with one motion, one conversion to God; in the very instant of their creation blessed. But man may be compared to a Watch; he hath many gimmols pertaining to him, to move him; like a coach, he runs on many wheels. His head understanding is one principal wheel, his heart or will another, and that next the spring: his affections are the minutes, his memory the little recollective wheel that winds up the rest: his life is the hand of the dial, which shows how the day goes with him: his conscience is the striking clock: only the Primum mobile, the string that sets all a working, and keeps every wheel in due motion, is the grace of Christ. The string that unites the whole watch to the springs government, is faith. ••r est in peccatore, anima in cord, men's in anima, fides in mente, Christus in fide. There is a heart in the sinner, a soul in his heart, a mind in his soul, faith in his mind, Christ in his faith. The act of his intellect gives him one motion, his sensitive appetite another, and that contrary for Caro concupiscit adversus spiritum: his own will another motion, the eternal object another: so was Eve coozened with the forbidden fruit. God that hath the heart in his hand, and turns it as brooks of waters, gives it another motion. Some of these be regular, some retrograde, some forward, other oblique: O what a do there is to keep this watch in tune! it is no hard matter to tune the Virginals or Organs, though every string and pipe be out of frame. But man is a creature so proud, so subtle, so wedded to his own opinion, and rolling upon so many wheels: that to put all his strings and pipes in tune, to make all his motions consent in goodness; hic labor, this is a work for the finger of God only, a child can sooner conceive it self, than a man can convert himself: or we may say, This man made himself, as well as that he made himself good.

We wonder that after all the warnings by Angels, those Ministers of Christ; sinners will not leave their Sodom. The Citizen will not forbear his sacrilege nor be afraid to cozen God to his face. The malicious will not cease practicing mischief, seducing to perverseness, and overbearing goodness with a blustering authority. The covetous will still love their gain above their salvation. But this is no wonder; God hath not yet taken them by the hand; Non eripuit Dominus, till then the political fool, the proud mad man, and he that makes his pew the Scorners chair, deriding Christ in his Gospel and Ministers; cannot be humbled. Eripiat Deus, the Lord snatch them out of their filthy Sodom.

2 How loath even a Lot is to leave Sodom! For all his vexation by their filthiness, their violence against the Angels; the prediction of their instant ruin, and his peremptory charge of departure: yet He prolonged the time. Therefore the Angels, that thirsted at once after vengeance on Sodom, and Lots safety: that knew God would not strike Sodom till Lot was gone out, and that Lot could not be safe within those walls; are fain to break off his tardy neglect with a gracious violence. They caught him by the hand, with his wife and daughters, and brought them forth, and set them without the City. We are so naturally affected to Sodom, and so delightfully linger in it; that without great mercy we should be condemned with the world. Therefore is it added; The Lord be merciful unto him. I was upright, saith David, and kept myself from mine iniquity, mine iniquity; it is likely that he had some special sin of his own, whereunto he was most inclined. O how gracious a victory is this; I have kept me from mine iniquity!

Many being reprov'd, answer; Alas, you must bear with me in this, it is my fault: as if every man were allowed his own fault. There is a private Sodom within us, we are loath to part with that. Men say of their sins, as Jacob said of his sons; Go all but Benjamin. Other vices we will not so much stick for, but O thou Ishmael might live. There is still some worm in the root of the tree, that will spoile the fruit. We extenuate it; It is not a little one? But a little hair in the pen makes a great blot in the paper. It is said of the Lord, that he Weighes the mountains i scales, and the dusts of the earth in a balance. We should not only weigh the mountains, our heinous rebellions, in scales; but even in the dust, our smallest escapes in the balance. Nor let our wits strive to make that good, which our wills have made necessary; grieving to leave what we love. But when God will Take (ϕ) the delight of our eyes, the pleasant Sodom of our affections, the sin that we most joy in; then say we resolutely; Pereat ne perdat, perish it, lest I perish by it. Let us not higgie and dodge with God, as Pharaoh did to retain the service of the Hebrews: nor linger upon a dismission of that he calls for. But without any demure, Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel: save him a labor of fetching, prevent him with a free-will offering. Covetice, malice, uncleanness is our Sodom: how then hath God called us forth to the Zoar of kindness, charity, chastity! This world is a Sodom, and by death the Lord calls us out; yet how many delays doth mortal life make ere it be willing to go! O my dove that art in the clifts of the rock. Where we find a birds nest: O my Dove, that's the Bird: in the clifts of the rock, there's the nest. The soul may be compared to the Dove, the body to the nest or Rock; wherein are many clifts, vents, and fissures to let out life. This soul like Noah's Dove, goes out by suspiration, returns in by respiration, at last by expiration •eparts for all together. O that I had wings like a Dove, than would I fly away and be (ϕ) rest. If our souls had David's wings, we would not desire to stay in Sodom, •t Mount up to Zion; they being borne up, as Lot was brought out by Angels.

3 Lots guests were his best friends: he had entertained Angels, and they now •eliver him: he would have preserved them, and they did preserve him. Where •old the Angels lodge, but with Lot? The houses of holy men are full of those •eavenly spirits, though they be not seen: their protection is comfortable, though •ot visible. In our tents they pitch their tents; and when devils would mischief •s, they turned them out of doors. It is the honor of God's Saints, to be atten•ed by Angels while they live, and to be exalted by Angels when they die. Lazarus was carried by Angels into Abraham's bosom. As in a family, the greater chil•ren carry the less: so God hath charged his elder sons, the Angels to bear up our •ules.

Thus was Lot requited for his kindness. Lodge strangers, for thereby some have •ertained Angels. Never did man yet lose by his charity: the unthankful world •ay fail in due estimation, but God will regard it, and reward it. While Cornelius is doling out his alms on earth, the Lord sends down to him an Angel from he•en. In charitable succor Extendere manum is ostendere humanum. But if in this •e be not so good as Lot, to give; let us not be so bad as Sodom, to take away. Now he that turned Sodom to ashes, and delivered Lot; turn our sins to ashes, and •eliver us.

3 The time: when the fire was even a kindling, and that sulphureous deluge prepared in the clouds: for the Interim was small betwixt Lots deliverance, and Sodom's •engeance. He was Titio ereptus, a brand plucked out of the burning; the prophet •luding to Lot, and naming this very overthrow. As when a heap of seditious •ookes are burning, and one good book ready to miscarry with the rest, is snatched •y some stander by out of the fire and saved. So near it came to him, yet did not •ouch him: that his heart might be sensible, both of a holy fear of the Judgment, •nd a thankful joy for his escaping. Indeed the Angels say to him, Escape for thy •fe, lest thou be consumed: not that God meant to hurt him, but to terrify him.

It is God's delight, in the extremity of evil to be a Deliverer. When armies have besieged his servants, and they have no power to defend themselves; then he musters up his Angels. Pharaoh pursues the departed Israelites: he had men of war, chariots and horses; they were weak unarmed people. Therefore the Egyptians have themselves the victory before hand, and the Israelites gave themselves for dead and are already talking of their graves. The sea was before them, their enemies behind them: the wheels rattling, the waves roaring: as the Britain's once complained to the Romans; Barbari ad mare nos repellunt, mare ad Barbaros: hinc vel jugum mur, vel obmergimur: the sword, or the deep; they knew not which had less mercie. Yea, even they that had seen the wonders past, and the Pillar present; do show more fear, Egypt, than believe God. Their unbelief matured the danger; how could the Lord forbear them? Surely, his patience was no less miracle than his deliverance. Yet even then he delivered them: and for assurance of it, he removes the cloud that was erst before them, and sets it betwixt Egypt and Israel. As if he should say, They shall first overcome me, before they shall touch thee. Now when they saw the Pillar remove behind them, and the sea remove before them: who can tell, whether wonder should not exceed fear? That the deep should become their protection, and the sea be made a Gallery or through-fare; no mortal eye before it ever beheld such a path. Yet thus did the LORD Deliver them.

Take another instance; Consider Joseph in Puteo, cast into a ditch: he looked for brothers, and behold butchers: he came to inquire of their health, and may not return the news of his own misery. Hardly are they restrained from cutting his throat: but stripping him naked, at least they will cast him into a deep hole, as it were alive into his grave. Thus with less mercy than is found in the savagest robbers, they purpose to torment him with a lingering death: and not only to kill him, but do what they can to kill their father in him. He like a poor suppliant, bowing his bare knees to them, he dreamed he should bow to him; with passionate prayers and tears, implored mercy. Beseeching them by the dear name of brother-hood by their profession of one God, for their fathers sake, for their own souls sake, not to take away his life. But what can the nearness of fraternity prevail, when humanity is lost? who could think of so innocent a youth, naked and desolate, in a dry and deep pit, crying for pity, and not cry for company? But cast down is, and they sit down to eat his provision unmoved: never thinking by their own hunger, what it was for their poor brother to be famished to death. Here was extremity; who shall now deliver Joseph? The Lord steps in with a ransom in a strange hand. Ishmael persecuted Isaac, yet the seed of Ishmael shall redeem the of Isaac. Money shall buy him to the Midianites, and from the Midianites to the Egyptians. Little did they think, that that Joseph whom they left a poor slave to the Midianites, they should find the same a great Lord among the Egyptians. Can doth ever raise up some secret favorers of his children, among his most malicious enemies. Reuben saves him from the sword, Judah from the pit. How happily bestowed was this little mercy? If Joseph had died for hunger in the pit; Jacob, and all had died for hunger in Canaan. How near was his soul unto death, how present and marvelous was God's Deliverance?

Take one instance more. Moses is borne in the time of Pharaoh's bloody decree; that all the male children of the Hebrews should be cast into the river and drowned. His mother during all her pregnancie, could not but fear a son. She hath him, sees him, and now thinks of his birth and death at once. To consider, that the executioners hand must succeed the Midwives, makes her second throws more grievous than her first. In other mothers, the very sight of a new-borne son, wor•• a forgetfulness of the former anguish in travel. But their remedy is her sor••• that which mitigates their pains, aggravates hers. Still she fearfully looks w••• some fierce Egyptian should come in, to snatch the infant from her bosom, and c••• it into the river. Therefore when she could no longer conceal in her womb, ⟨◇⟩ hides in her house: afraid, lest every cry of the child should guide the executio•• to his cradle. But now his age and hiding being a quarter old, the fearful pare•• adventure the childe's life to save their own. In a reeden Ark she puts him ⟨◇⟩ the bulrushes by the rivers brink. Trusting him to the mercy of the waves, w••• beasts, and ravenous fowls, and (which was more merciless than all) an Egyptian passenger. Thus exposed, she sets her daughter to watch her son: the mo••• cannot forbear to love, whom she is forbidden to keep. But how shall the p•••• babe escape; feeble, forlorn, alone sprawling upon the waves? what, but ine•••ble d•ath? Yes, there is a God that looks upon him, and in this pinch will di•••ver him. No flood, no beast, no instrument of Pharaohs cruelty shall touch hi•. No friend, not his own mother dares own him; now steps in his Deliverer, ⟨◇⟩ challengeth his tuition; he is mine. He was not safer in the midst of the te••s ⟨◇⟩ Israel, a Prince guarded with so many thousands, than now. The tyrants da•••ter must come forth to bathe, the ark offers it self to her eye, the cry of the in••• to her ear, compassion leapes to her heart; his tears and beauty, were a preva••• oratory. But is this all? And hath the Lord done? No, Moses must have ⟨◇⟩ Nurse; and the girl is ready to fetch his own mother; and who so fit to be a N••• as a mother? She could not keep him before without danger, now she receives ⟨◇⟩ by authority. She would have given all she was worth to save him, and ⟨◇⟩ she hath wages to nurse him. She doth but change the name of Mother into N•••• and she hath her son without fear, not without great reward. Here was a d•••verance, and that in season: O how should it fix our confidence in so gracious a ⟨◇⟩ server! The wicked say, God hath forsaken him, persecute him, and take him, for •here is none to deliver him. None, thus they conclude, but we find the contrary. As Apelles, striving to paint a drop of foam falling from a horses mouth, after long •tudy how to express it, even despairing lets his pencill fall, and that fall did it. Quod ars non potuit, casus fecit. When we see no means how to be delivered, no hope of extrication, or attaining our wished peace, even ready to despair; the Lord knows how to save us.

4 The place was Zoar; wherein consider three circumstances: his journey to Zoar, his safety in Zoar, and Zoars safety by him. For howsoever Zoar preserved Lot, yet more properly Lot preserved Zoar.

1 For his journey: believing the judgment; he desires a place of refuge: God •ppoints him one, he makes choice of another. Go to the mountain, saith the Lord: let me fly to Zoar saith Lot. Some say, this was done in a mystery: the mountain is not safe, but Zoar in the valley: a low and humble life hath more security, than high places. The proud like Capernaum, lift up themselves to heaven, •ut God shall depress them to hell. He refused the mountain, because of the craggy rocks, such as are now to be seen in the hills of Engedi. But more properly he preferreth Zoar for the vicinity; it was nearer to him, and he might with more speed and less danger reach it than the mountain. And such was his charitable heart, that although he could not redeem the rest, yet he would entreat for that. Therefore he useth an argument of the smallness: as being less populous, it might be less impious.

Well, Zoar is granted him, but with this double caution: Tarry not in the plain, look not behind thee. For the former; the very skirts and suburbs of Sodom, yea, the very smell of Sodom must not cleave to Lot, nor he to it. If we be departed from Babylon, let not a rag or a relict of superstition abide with us. What matters it, whether a man be slain with a great bullet, or with a small shot? The devil says like Pharaoh. Go out of Egypt but not far; be within call. But Moses separates Israel from Corah; Depart from the tents of these wicked men, and touch nothing of theirs: we cannot be too far off from such company. It is sorry comfort, to escape in Sodom, and perish in the plain. To the terror and conviction of them, that though they openly profess not love to Rome, yet still have an itch of popery upon them. A man cannot be too earnest of heaven: that kingdom is gotten with violence, not with indifference. He that loves little, shall have little: and he may love so little, as to have never a whit. Many fear to be too hot, but are not sensible of their own coldness. We say commonly; too much heat annoy, but too much cold de•troyes. Religion of all tempers, in these days does not complain of heat. O •hat as the advanced Sun heats the air, so our hearts were enflamed with zeal and •ove by that blessed Son of righteousness and salvation!

For the other, look not behind thee: not because it was dangerous to look into the infected air. But 1. To note the indignity of the place, not worthy to be looked on by an honest eye. 2. To avoid curiosity, that Lot might not pry too narrowly into God's judgments. 3. For fear the horror of the sight should have astonished him, or wrung out his commiseration. 4. For the better speed that there might be no stay in his passage; as the Apostles were forbidden the interruption of a Salute. 5. That his love might be quite lost to Sodom; no more to think of the wealth and pleasure he found in such an ungracious City. 6. Lastly, to make trial of his faith and obedience, as God proved Adam in the prohibited fruit. Small precepts from God are strong bonds: obedience is as well tied and tried, and disobedience as well punished, in a little as in much. Ananias nimm'd a little, he thought the Holy Ghost had no need of it, or could not miss it. But God credits us first with less things, •s men prove vessels with water, before they trust them with wine.

The same charge was given to his wife, which she obeyed not: in her flight she must needs turn an eye upon Sodom. Perhaps she believed not that it should be burned, or pitied and lamented in her heart that such a populous City should be burned, or curiously desired to see it burning, or so loved the pleasures of her co•trey, that she could not choose but give it a look, and as it were bid it farewell. B• for this she was turned into a monument of disobedience; a Pillar of salt. The Hebrews say, because she refused to bring salt to the guests the day before: this is their dream. But that opinion had need of salt, to keep it from stinking. Some $\langle \diamond \rangle$ it an allegory; They that divert their affections from spiritual to sensual things, become senseless pillars. Nor is it said to be of salt only in respect of the duration, as an everlasting covenant is called a Covenant of salt: for salt hath a preserving property, to keep things from putrefying, decaying, and corrupting. But she was turned into a material salty pillar: Josephus saith it remained in his time: others, that it is Duraturum usque ad tempus resurrectionis, to last unto the day of Judgment. N• that her soul was thus metamorphosed, but her body. And though she suffer•• thus temporally on her flesh, yet her spirit might find mercy and peace forever.

But the use of this monument is Praestare fidelibus condimentum, to season the faithful. Remember Lots wife. Now what did it avail her to scape turning into a•• in Sodom, who is turned into a pillar of salt in the plain? One would think i• small fault to look back, yet even this cannot the Lord endure. In re parvae pecc••, peccatum non parvum. To sin in a small thing, is no small sin. Being so far out o• that cursed city, she might now think her self safe, and no danger in looking behind. But if we provoke the Lord, he can as well meet with us out of Sodom. Th•• is no place safe to sin, none dangerous to obedience: faith and observance of God• will shall secure us even in Sodom.

2 Thus for his journey to Zoar, now for his safety in it. Being come thither, he might well wonder at the stay of his wife, for in his flight he durst not look back to call her. Returning to seek her, he finds this alteration with wonder and sorrow. Sodom is turned to a heap of sulphur, and she to a heap of salt. This change he little expected; the loss of his wife touched him nearer than the loss of all Sodom. Yet he finds salt instead of flesh, a pillar instead of a wife. He that saved a whole City, could not save his own spouse. Here was a sharp misery clap'd on the heels of a sweet mercy. When God delivers us from destruction, he doth not secure us from all affliction. Though we be not condemned with the world, yet we may be chastened in the world.

Lot saved himself, yet he lost his Allies, lost his flocks and herds, lost his gold and riches, lost his habitation, and now for conclusion lost his wife, all b••• crosses. Without some sauce of sorrow, all worldly delights are but like de••• meat to a man that hath lost his taste. Let us give God leave to scourge us, so long as he doth save us. Our deliverance from the fire of hell is cause enough to make ⟨◇⟩ thankful, though the trifles we delight in be taken from us. Shall Lot say, I ⟨◇⟩ rich, I am now undone; and so be dejected with sullen grief? No, but I was i• danger of fire and brimstone, I am now escaped, I will therefore lift up my he• with thankful joy. If God do not answer us in everything, shall we take pleasure in nothing? Shall we slight all his favors, because in one thing he crosseth ⟨◇⟩ whereas his least mercy is beyond our best merit. Lord take away what thou pleasest, for thy glory and my good; so long as thou savest me from the fire of hell, a• thy everlasting wrath.

Zoar shall be honored with Lots preservation, a little one, the least of all th•• opulent cities. As Bethlehem, though little among the thousands of Judah, hono•• with the birth of God's Son. This little city was safe, when great Sodom ⟨◇⟩ too hot for him. The city which God keeps, is strong be it never so small: ⟨◇⟩ he forsake it, the thickest walls and hugest turrets are weaker than paper. The Lo•• promiseth to be a wall of fire round about his elect: no scalado, no undermining ⟨◇⟩ blow it up: it shall both protect them, and consume their enemies. The good ⟨◇⟩ sleeps more securely in his tent, than the sinner in his barricado'd fortification.

As the springs and rivers of the Plain, could not quench Sodom's raging fire: one drop of Lot's faith and holiness in Zoar keeps it from kindling. How poor and slender soever our cottage be, let us set our prayers as a guard without, and our faith as a lock within: the seven-fold walls of Babylon were not so strong. This is more truly, than was said of those Giants; to have a City walled up to heaven. Let prayer be the key to open the morning, and prayer the bar to shut up the evening. Let us in every place trust upon God's providence, and every place shall be safer to us than was Paradise. Be our faith upright with Lot, and in the last day when the whole world shall burn with flames as Sodom once did, we shall find a Zoar, the bosom of Jesus Christ.

3 Lastly, Lot was not only delivered in Zoar, but Zoar was delivered for Lot. I will not overthrow this City for which thou hast spoken. As Lot in the danger of fire so Paul in the danger of water; in the rage of both the elements, God doth not only give his their deliverance, but he also gives others for their sakes into the grant. 〈◇〉 wicked man hath the feet of a Wolf, whatsoever he treads on never prospers after. But a whole family, a whole kingdom, shall fare the better for one Joseph: his very presence procures a common blessing, wheresoever he goes. Zoar might have been as bad as Sodom, but here was the difference, it had a Lot within, Sodom had none.

But for God's dear children intermingled with the world, it could not stand. The wicked persecute them, for whose sake they are forbore: they owe their lives to those few Lots whom they contemn. Potiphar was angry with that Joseph, who made him prosper. The most contemptible man in the people's opinion, is he that procures their peace and toleration. Ahab's sin brought the famine, Elias prayer brought rain, yet Ahab tells Elijah, thou troublest Israel. Cease ye malicious sinners to vex the religious: you are beholding to them for your very breath: if they were taken away, you should be tormented before your time. As Christ himself was the Day-star to enlighten: not the Dog-star, to burn: and Paul no pestilent fellow to sow sedition, but an instrument of blessedness and salvation: so the elect are good, not malignant stars. Yet still they speed at the world's hands as did their master before them: Christ healed their diseases, fed their bodies and souls, every day did them good; yet they crucified him: and in killing him they did offer to make the only Ship that might save them. As the Sun-beams shining on the earth are not only heat that solid body, but by reflection also warm the region of the air conterminant to it. So the mercy of God lighting on a Christian's heart, not only heats that with inward comfort, but makes it reflect back consolation to others.

The faithful pray for the pardon of men's sins, for grace and favor to their rulers, and no good comes without their procurement; yet the world cannot abide them. Let the rich Aldermen thank these, that they have leisure to tell their gold. What the worldling builds houses and takes rents: that the City can feast with the members of the Church, and miss of Belshazzar's sudden sauce; (for I am persuaded, they get enough from the Temples, to maintain their Halls) even in this they are reborn, because there be Lots among them. What doth a poor man find before them, but reproach and disdain? he that is not rich, with these men is neither wise nor good: only by their wealth they value themselves, and only by their wealth, ⟨◇⟩ Camels by their burdens, be they valued.

London bless thy lots, and GOD for them. Thine honor had long since •n laid in the dust, thine oppressions become a hissing to all nations, and nothing •d been left of thee but a stinking memory, but for these. The subject of thy de•sion, hath been the means of thy preservation: and those eyes have often been lif•d up to heaven for thee in prayer, upon whom thou wouldst never cast an eye of •arity. When thou wast sick, they humbled their soul with fasting, and mourned, as ⟨◇⟩ weepeth for his mother: thus do they for thee. But in their adversity thou rejoy•, and tearest them without ceasing: thus doest thou for them. While the lascivious embraceth his harlot, the luxurious his riot, the covetous his money, the malicious his revenge; the fire of Judgment would flash in their faces, and the fire of torment swallow up their souls; but for God's elected, their despised Lots. Hi• mercy increase the number of them, and our love to them, and our endeavor to be like them, that as we are spared for them, we may be crowned with them in the day of Christ.

Delivered just Lot.] I come to consider his thrall•dom, and the prisoner described first, by his grace; a Just man. Wherein three points must be examined. 1. What this Justice is. 2. In what respects a man may be called Just. 3. The exceptions against his Justice.

First, what is Justice. There is an increated Justice, which cannot be in man, for he is finite, and this is infinite. Righteous art thou O Lord: and, God is righteous i• all his ways. A man is one thing, and his righteousness is another: but God and hi• righteousness is all one: therefore it is as impossible for man to be thus righteous, as it is for him to be God: this is proper to the Deity. Created Justice is either •gall or Evangelical.

Legal righteousness is of three sorts. 1. Perfect, which consists in an absol•• completion of the Law: this is lost beyond all recovery. But is it not restored by Grace? No, for our sanctification is but in part: as a child is a perfect man, in all the parts of a man, but not in the quantity of every part. But Rome saith, the Virgin was righteous, for she sinned not: her life was free from sin actual, her conception from sin original. This is false, for if she were no sinner she needed no Savior: and she died; now if she had not sinned, in Justice she should not have died. 2. Civil, which consists in an outward deportment conformable to the Law: when a man professeth religion, to answer the first Table; and refrains from public and visible sins, to answer the second. But in this the Pharisees went beyond us, yet they came short of heaven. Too many content themselves with this rotten and hear less righteousness: but if they have no better, they shall get into heaven, when the Pharisees come out of hell. 3. Internal, when a man by repentance after sin, and by endeavor after repentance, doth inwardly serve God. That this righteousness, legally considered, should justify us, is with Rome to abuse God's Justice, and to encroach upon his mercy. This may justify our faith, it cannot justify us. Our works deserve nothing; it is only in Christ that they are accepted, and only for Christ th• they are rewarded.

Evangelical righteousness is that which is revealed in the Gospel: and should never have been revealed, if that of the Law could have saved us. But it could not; not through the own defect, but our default. This is to be had in Christ only: which, as he is mediator, consisted in the purity of his nature, which is separate from sin: and in the perfection of his obedience, which is satisfactory for sin. From so pure a nature proceeded so perfect an obedience: no original sin touching his conception, no actual staining his life. There is none perfectly righteous. He: not one that is, not one that was, not one that is to come: but only he that and that was, and that is to come. This in him was active and passive: for us he offered, what we should have suffered, and suffered not: for us he did, what we should have done, and performed not.

Thus we have found out the righteousness that makes a man just: now let us see how Lot became just, or we are justified by it. This is done by imputation. that knew no sin, was made sin for us; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him: what can be plainer? CHRIST was a sinner only by the imputation of our sins, we are just only by the imputation of his righteousness. Christ is the end of the Law for righteousness unto everyone that believeth. Not finis dissolvens, an abrogator of the ceremonial, but a fulfiller of the Law moral. A fulfiller, for whom? for all them that believe. So Christ by doing, and we by believing, fulfill the law; therefore are righteous. But can one man be wise by another's wisdom? Rich, or strong, or valiant, by the wealth, power, or courage of another? We have no right in another's wisdom or valor, but we have a right and propriety in Christ's justice. One man's wisdom cannot be another's, because they are two distinct persons: but Christ and the believer make but one mystical body: so his righteousness is as truly his members, as the wisdom in the head belongs to the whole body. But it is an Abomination to the Lord, to justify the wicked. Why then will he do it himself? No, but he first makes a man just, and then so accounts him. He is indeed said to Justifie the ungodly; that is, the man who was ungodly before, but is not so after: Distingue tempora, convenient omnia. Thus was Christ made a sinner by the reputation of our sins, and we made just by the imputation of his righteousness. And as he that knew no sin in himself, undertaking for us, offered death: so we that had no justice of our own, apprehending his righteousness, shall enjoy everlasting life.

But how is this justice imputed to us? By our faith. To as many as received him, he gave power to be the sons of God, to those that believe on his name. There is a receiving: what is that? It is expressly said, Believing. Man finding himself naked, this hand reacheth that glorious Robe, which is held out to him. This doth not constitute Effective, working an habitual justice in us: nor materialiter, as though faith itself were our justification: but Objective, as it apprehendeth Christ: and Organice, as it instrumentally applieth his righteousness. Neither is it an opinion, which is an uncertainty in the judgment: nor a suspicion, which is an uncertainty in the will: nor a Science, for that is only by the demonstration of reason: neither love, or hope. Love can extend the passions of the heart to the thing loved, yet cannot apprehend Christ: he must be apprehended before he be loved. The office of hope to wait: it waits for salvation, but properly it apprehends it not. It is first believed, then expected. It is good both to trust, and to wait for the salvation of the Lord. so trust that it will assuredly come, this is the action of faith: to wait until it do come, this is the action of hope.

Faith is a taking hand, and love is a giving hand: faith ••es hold on Christ, love gives forth tokens of faith to God and man: hope is the ⟨◇⟩ , that looks out for the good things promised. As faith is the hand of the soul, ⟨◇⟩ love is the hand of faith, and hope is the eye of both. Of faith, love is the hand •hereby it worketh, and hope the eye whereby it waiteth. Thus faith worketh ⟨◇⟩ love, waiteth by hope, but believeth by it self. The point of our Justification••ing thus cleared, let me touch at two useful meditations from it: there is in it ••ter of humiliation, of consolation.

1 It serves to humble us. How fowl was our nature, that all the water in the ••rld could not cleanse it? Not the blood of all the creatures, not the righteousness ⟨◇⟩ men or Angels could cure it. All the men and Angels in the world cannot make ••e sinner righteous: but the Son of God must become man, suffer, die, and rise ••ine, and all to make us just. Vain man, whereof art thou proud? Yet how doth ••tle polluted dust vaunt it self? Clothe a Leper in scarlet, is he not still a Leper? ••pose in Christ we be embraced, and even honored of God himself, shall we ••refore be high-looked over others? No, here is matter of exultation and glad••se, not of insultation and haughtiness: let us be joyful, let us be thankful, let •ot be scornful. The natural Son of God was humbled for our pride, shall we •roud still? Quomodo non humiliatur homo, coram humili Deo? Shall man be ••d, when God himself is humble? He that is not humbled for his sin, is not ye•••ed from his sin. In his humility Christ wrought that great work of our re••ption. Observe with wonder, that God did more for us in his humility, than ⟨◇⟩ he did in his glory. In his Majesty he only made us, but in his humility be ⟨◇⟩ saved us. Look we first down with humility upon our own wretchedness, ⟨◇⟩ then look up with faith unto Christ's righteousness.

2 We are Just before God by no Justice of our own, but by Christ's: and this is so much the better for us, as now we are sure it cannot be lest. God created Adam with a perfect legal righteousness: he received it for himself, and for us: and he lost it for himself, and for us. That being gone, he gives us another, a better: b•• because he saw man so ill a keeper of his own Jewels, he would not trust him with it: but sets it in the P•rson of his Son, charging him to keep it for us. We are dead, and our life is hidden with Christ in God. It is hid past Satan's finding, and locked up past our spending. We as ignorant of the worth, would quickly exhaust it: but CHRIST truly values it, dearly paid for it, heartily loves it, and therefore will safely preserve it: and when we come to his fathers presence, will cloth us with it then. It is now in a safe hand, where we are sure to find it, and have it, wh•• we most need it. We may sin, and so lose the present sensible comfort of a good conscience: but we cannot lose our righteousness. That is in our own ••nure, this is not.

It is impossible for a believer to be poor: take away all he hath, his wealth, heal•• friends, liberty, life: this is no more than he hath in his own hands, which he may easily lose. His true riches are in another's custody, no power can meddle with th•••. His treasure is laid up, where no thief nor corruption can enter: he that is Tresp•• with it, will faithfully keep it. Satan may make Job poor for this world, and take ⟨◇⟩ from him, from which God would one day take him. But Job hath a better stock going in heaven, in the hands of his Redeemer, the devil cannot touch this. Other possessions in death we leave behind, this inheritance by death we begin to possess. C... corpus resolvitur, anima absolvitur. Let Ziba take all, so I may come to the Son of David in peace.

Samson had his strength in himself, and betrayed it: Esau his birth-right, and sold it: the Prodigal his portion, and spent it: Hezekiah his treasure, and expos• it: Solomon his wisdom, and abused it: Mary Magdalene her beauty, and pro...tuted it: Nabal his wealth, and lived beside it: Adam his integrity, and an Apple bought it. O what is in man, that he may not lose! The Master of a Family ⟨◇⟩ all his hired servants their wages into their own hands, suffers them to use and •spose it at their own pleasures, without further injury: but the portions of his children, and their Jewels he keeps himself. LORD, what ever worldly thing thou take from us, keep our righteousness for us: though sin hath left uttered and death send us away naked; do thou cover us with the rich garment of Christ.

2. Thus is a man Just before God, but Lot was also just before men: and th• is a visible Justice, so well as the invisible. We must therefore seek out for a fu...righteousness, an inseparable effect of the former, and that is, Holiness of life. The other is that Justice of Justification, this the Justice of Sanctification. As a si... justified by Christ's righteousness inherent in Christ himself: so he is sanctified by Christ's righteousness diffused from Christ into the sinner. His Justification is p...fect, because that which justifies him, is still in Christ: his sanctification is unpa... because that which sanctifies him, is in himself. The one imputed to him, the ⟨◇⟩ infused and inherent in him. Therefore here we are to examine, in what resp... man may be called Just. Neither are we bound always to the same distinctio• ⟨◇⟩ conceive, a man may be approved Righteous, Praeparative, Separative, Reparative, ⟨◇⟩ ra•iva.

1 There is righteousness of preparation, which is a resolution and full p... of hear to be righteous. I have sworn, and am steadfastly purposed to keep thy ...teous Judgments. Though he do sometimes admit sin, he doth never inten... If the Spirit could totally prevail over the flesh, he would never do ought to d...nour God. My heart is ready, my heart is ready: r•ady to hear thy will, ready ⟨◇⟩ it. Give what thou commandest, command what thou pleasest. Perfect my purpose ⟨◇⟩ thy gracious performance, and then I shall be righteous. By this resolution ⟨◇⟩ bound for Canaan, and thitherward steeres his course: notwithstanding the p...s rocks and pyrates, and contrary gusts and storms, that would put him out of •e way.

2 There is a righteousness of separation, because it is seen to decline the pla... of temptation. So they are called Saints, because Separate from the world. He •n a manner guilty, that frequents the occasion of being made guilty. A wise Se...or, whose Coach-man had driven him over a dangerous passage, which he might •lie have avoided by fetching a little compass about; though he scaped without •me, yet turned him of, as unworthy of future trust. What thanks to us, if pre...itating ourselves in the known snares of sin, we are kept by God's preventing •ace? He that is begotten of God, keepeth himself that the wicked one touch him not. I • not say that God deals with us on such an advantage, as a furious Papist answe...d: when he was asked by one of his own Sect, why in the gunpowder treason •ey would destroy children with bastards, Catholics with Heretics: Inventi •er haereticos, pereant cum haereticis: If they were found among heretics, let them •rish with heretics. Yet often he makes them smart: as the Magistrate inflicting •ere punishment on a dissolute crew, one cried out to him; Parce filio, spare thy ⟨◊⟩ : what, my son among the enemies of peace and goodness? No, Sociaris in ••pa, nec separaberis in poena: as thou hast offended with them, thou shalt smart with •em. We will trust no antidote, to go into the house where the plague is: if ten•on find us, never let us seek temptation.

3 There is a righteousness of reparation; which consists in the reforming of •rors, and conforming of manners, salving past defects by a bettered life; and is in•ed the righteousness of repentance. Righteous, not because there is no sin come•itted, but because there is no sin that is nor repented God esteems a fault indeed •rowed, as if it had never been indeed admi ted. Aliud est peccare, aliud peccatorem ••se: it is one thing to sin, another thing to be a sinner. Everyone that handles a •te is not a Musician: nor every that doth an unrighteous action; is strait an un•ghteous person. The unrighteous shall not enter into the kingdom of Heaven: to be •just damnes, not to have done some actions unjustly: the habit, not the act, casts •to hell.

O blessed effect of repentance, that can make unrighteous manners cease to de•ominate an unrighteous man! I will show you a riddle. A foul mother brought •rth a fair daughter: the mother bred her laughing, yet the daughter is always •eeping. The father that begot the daughter, could never abide the mother, nor •ver came near her bed. She was no sooner borne, but she was the death of her •other; killing her that bred her, and (which is strange) she is blessed for it. She •as begotten in a miracle: no sooner conceived, than borne: no sooner borne, but •e spake: other children are borne crying, she also speaking: the first air she brea•ed, heard her articulately declare her own desires. And ever since she works •iracles: she brings light out of darkness, life out of death: she makes the blind •o see, the deaf to hear, the dumb to speak, and even casts out devils. She looks •ackward, and moves forward: is her self a dark cloud, yet brings a fair Sun•hine. This riddle is expounded in Repentance. Sin is the mother, repentance the •aughter: the mother is foul, black, ugly; the daughter fair and lovely. Sin was •erry and wanton, repentance is always sad and blubbering. God is the father of •epentance, and he could never endure the mother, Sin; but rather perfectly hates •et society. Being borne, she slew her mother: repentance could not have been •orne but by sin, and repentance is the only thing that kills sin. Peccatum tristitiam ••p•rit, tristitia peccatum conterit. Sin breeds sorrow, and sorrow kills sin: and this •arricide makes her blessed. Miraculous is her birth: at her first conception by the •oly Ghost, she looks up and speaks; Open ye gates of heaven, and let mercy come •own upon me; her first breath is, Pardon. Miracles she worketh; turning the dark•esse of error into the light of knowledge, and making the dead heart live unto grace. The blind eyes by her, are made to see the filthiness of sin: the deaf ears now hearken to the word of truth: the dumb lips cry out for compassion and forgiveness; the devils lust is expelled. She still is looking backward to her sins past, and moving forward to holiness and perfection. To conclude, Repentance is her self cloudy, and made up of sadness, yet brings everlasting joy.

Such is God's mercy to Repentance: yet let no man, though he trust to this, ⟨◇⟩ to himself. The promise is to repentance, not of repentance. Nature flatters it self in that one in stance of the malefactor on the cross, who in an instant got repentance. But the calling and saving of that one soul at the last, hath by Satan's po•• been the loss of many thousands.

4 There is a Righteousness of comparison; so was Lot just comparatively among the Sodomites. It is Christ's incommunicable privilege, to be The just: ⟨◇⟩ all other men on earth to pray, Enter not into Judgment with thy servants, for in thy sight shall no man living be justified. And, Forgive us our trespasses, and to pray for th•• daily: perpetual remission argues perpetual aspersion. He that says, he hath no ⟨◇⟩ I am sure he hath no righteousness. But it is said of Zacharias and Elizabet, that they were both, Just before the Lord, walking in all his commandments, blameless. Before God, without hypocrisy: in his commandments, not the traditions of men, without flattery: in All of them, without reservation and partiality. Without repr••, Sine querela, non sine macula: not scandalous and culpable in the eyes of men, and worthy of crimination. So, he that is borne of God, sinneth not, or committeth not s••. Not the sinning sin, not the reigning sin, not peccatum scandalizans: not the sin ••to death, which cannot be repented, therefore must not be pardoned.

Compared with God there is none righteous: Omnes odit, qui malos odit: he hates all men, that hates ill men. Yet some may be so, respectively to others. Th•••• more righteous than Judah, yet Tamar sinful enough. The Publican rather ••stified than the Pharisee, yet not simply and sufficiently justified. The Spouse f•• among women, yet she justly complains of her blackness. Some men have br••• & levia peccata, less and fewer sins, yet they have sins: though fewer in number, and lighter in measure, yet sins in nature. The Moon is glorious to a candle, pa•• to the Sun. The lillie white to the wool, short of the snow. The swarthy compared with the Black-moore, thinks himself fair.

Not that I would have men pitch themselves by the Pole of the dissolute. As because they are not so drunk as Nabal, therefore to think themselves sober: beca•• not so proud as Haman, therefore humble: because not so treacherous as Judas, therefore loyal. Compare not thyself with the worst, to see how far thou art beyond them: but with the best, to see how far thou art short of them. Luscus inter •a• acute videt: and the thick-eared hear well to the stark deaf. Among the numerous Cloistures of illiterate Monks, if one rarely get a smack of learning, he thinks himself a brave fellow, famous among his companions. They compare themsel•• with themselves, and measure themselves by themselves. He that hath but feried over ⟨◇⟩ Amsterdam, conceits himself a great Traveler, among those that never smelt other than their own smoke. How ploud is a vain fool of a strange language! apt ⟨◇⟩ think all the rest Idiots, that understand not his Spanish or Italian! Audax Insc•••: none so bold as the blind.

Thou that thinkest thyself charitable and just, compare thyself with Zacc••• after thy fourfold restitution, hast thou given half thy goods to the poor? Th•• that holdest thyself zealous in a cold generation, consider David: The zeal of •y house hath eaten me up. Thou that art humble, meditate on Paul, yielding to them th•• hated him. That art sober, think of the Rechabites: that chaste, look upon Is••h in his temptation by so great a Lady. The Pigmeys wonder at his stature, whom we esteem a dwarfe. Do not look upon the profane, to admire thy own holiness: but on the Just, to condemn thy own unrighteousness. Rurall people admire and even adore a Lady, that never saw the Queen. When the Indians first saw the Spaniards. they held them fair and goodly creatures. But bleeding under their c•c•ties, and beholding other from more cold and temperate climates, of fairer come••ections and kinder dispositions; they took these last for Angels. We that have ••ized ourselves by those below us, let us now value ourselves by those above us: ••en all our pride will turn into shame, and we shall blush for our idle glory. Lord, 〈◇〉 they that had their faults be more righteous than we; what are we in respect of ••ee that hast none? Give us all grace to be more righteous, and when we ••ve done all we can, pardon our great unrighteousness in Jesus Christ.

5 There is an Operative righteousness, and this may be taken either strictly or ••gely.

Strictly, it is equity: he that deals truly withal, without respect of persons, is •ust man. And he that is not just in his conversing and commersing with men, will ••rdly be found righteous with God. This is not only to render what the Law ••quires, but even what a rectified conscience requires. As for instance; to bury the ••ad, this is not an action of charity only, but of equity. Funerals are called Iusta, ••cause they be as just to the dead, as meat is to the living. So to feed the poor: ••ul calls Alms, Righteousness. With-hold not thy good from the owners thereof. ••hey are the owners of thy superfluities, and it is just to give every man his own. When thou doest thine alms; diverse copies read, Cum facias Iustitiam, when thou doest •y righteousness: so Eusebius reports it. Alms is thy Justice; If not Debitum proprie•tis, yet Charitatis: and he that denieth this, is an unjust man. That ministers do •each, it is Justice, even due debt. I am a debtor to the Grecians, &c. There is a woe to ••em that with-hold the truth in unrighteousness. Yet thus unrighteous is the Church •f Rome, to with-hold the Scriptures, and obtrude Traditions: as men put out the •ear candle, to light themselves to bed with the stinking snuff.

To help forward the truth is but Justice: it is the office, albeit also the honor •f good men to be God's fellow helpers. Curse ye Meroz: Why? because it did ••rt the Lord? No, but because it did not help the Lord in the day of battle. This •uestion will one day be asked, when didst thou help the truth? Every man by •rayer helps the hand of Moses. He that does not help forward the building of CHRIST, is unjust: and they that do help it even in the meanest degree, shall •ave part of the reward. As David would have the prey shared even among them •hat kept the stuff; they helped.

In contracts to fail willingly, is to be unjust. An oath or solemn promise is •o sooner made on earth, than registered in heaven. Indeed In malis non est malum ••scindere fidem: bad promises are better broken than kept. As David in breaking •f his vow concerning Nabal, was not unjust: and if Herod had done so for John Bap. •e had been more righteous. Yea, a just man will keep his oath with a very thief, 〈◇〉 compelled oath about pecuniary matters; but not when a sin or mischief fol••wes. To give every man his due, this is just. A young Merchant being to choose •im a partner, by his mothers advice, at convenient time gave to one a Pomegranate: ••ee receiver cutting it in two, kept the less moitie to himself, and returned the Mer•hant the greater half. He gave the like to another; and he dividing it, gave him •acke the less part, keeping the greater to himself. He thus tried a third; and he dividing it into equal halves, took the one himself, and gave him the other. This was determined by his mother, to be the fittest man to make his partner. So young Cyrus being shown by his School-master, a great man with a little robe, and little man with a great robe; and having both the garments put into his hands to distribute: he disposed the greater to the greater, and the less to the less. His Master replied; this was just in case of decency, but unjust in case of equity: for he was

 ◇ have given every man his own.

But if this be an argument of Justice, Lord, where shall we find a just man? *sal. 12.1. Help Lord, for the righteous man faileth: time to cry, Help LORD. Make cresset light, and search narrowly all about Jerusalem, I had almost said, London. And find one that doth Justice: Ierem. 5.1. scarce a just man in this whole City. is to pay Tythes, to be just? O that just man is a miracle! Ignorant people on all occasions say of their Minister, I wonder he does not preach. They esteem it a matter, before it comes, of no labor: and when it comes of no thanks. Yet, who challengeth his own heart, of known unrighteousness, and confesseth, how unjust have I been in defrauding God and his Church? will the Lord be so liberal to give us the best of things, eternal life; that grudgeth him the worst of things, temporal trash? Or, that the Gospel should save our souls, which it promiseth: when we withhold from it those trifles it requireth? Or, that God will not pinch them of spirituals, that pinch him of temporals? Will a man shut a bird fast into a cage, give her no meat, and yet bid her sing? Yet is this too universal an unrighteousness, and thus unjust are we. But let men read and tremble; If any man (notwithstanding these premonitions) will be unjust, let him be unjust still. The Lord with his infinite mercy swallow up this unrighteousness, that this infinite unrighteousness swallow not up this City.*

Largely; He that doth righteousness, is righteous. The scope of whose life and actions is devoted to goodness; not without infirmity, but without irregularity. The best traveler may stumble in his journey; yet have his eye observant and his foot constant on his way. The interposition of some clouds doth not frustrate the regular motion of the Sun. And trees have more life at the root, than at all times appears in the branches. Notwithstanding some transient distempers, the may be sound and upright. Some gravel will stick on the toes, even when the Bath of justification hath washed our souls. We are not perfectly just, except by anticipation, assuming the name before we possess the thing. We are now the sons of God: quid hoc est? Sumus, & non sumus; we are, and we are not: sumus in spe, sumus in re: we are in hope, we shall be indeed.

There may be a time when this justice is not so operative, which yet shall not condemn us for unjust. The world is ever taxing the least fault in the best man: every man is borne a Cain; envying that good in another, which he wants in himself. They blame some ill in the Saints, not because they are evil, but because in respect of themselves they are too good. One imaginary cloud in a just man, ◇ in their censure darken all the stars of his graces. The smallest spot in his face, shall excuse all the sores and ulcers in their bodies. But it is not so with God: he value men, Quomodo semper vadunt, non quomodo semel cadunt: respecting vitae communiturum, rather than involuntarium currentis casum. Nor is his saving grace so fickle a thing, to be lost by every weakness. He goes into his Garden, to eat the fruits, and gather the flowers: not like these buzzing Dorres, that fly over all these to a dunghill.

But now if we will be righteous, let us do it, and show our justice by our practice. The title of Righteous is often ill bestowed upon men: as the mistaking woman attributed to the blessed Virgins Wombe and dugs, that happiness which belonged to her faith. Or, as silly rurall people salute a mean Gentlewoman in bea• clothes, If it like your Lady-ship. Or, flattering Pamphleters ascribe to your loose• Patrons, noble and meriting titles. Truth calls him Just that is so. God ordained light for the eyes, language for the ears, the air for respiration, but righteousness for all parts. That the mind should think nothing but righteousness, the tongue speak, the hand do, nothing but righteousness. But alas; Aliud defiderium c•dis, aliud desiderium carnis. There be reluctant motions in the heart, yet De•e cordis, in the heart of my heart, I serve the Lord. Bare theory may come <◇> righteousness, only practice apprehends it. To whom is that Enge at the great Day, but to the Doer? Well done good servant, that is the form. Not the b•• and dead habit, but the living and fruitful exercises of Justice, shall have happiness. Rightly, a man knows no more than he practices. It is said of Christ that he <◇> no sin, because he did no sin: in that sense, he knows no good, that doth no good. One said of the Jesuits, that abroad call themselves Apostles; the old Apostles le•earth to earthly men, shown others, and got heaven themselves: we are more be•olding to our new ones, they show us heaven and leave it for us to purchase; and <◇> mean time cozen us of earth and worldly possessions. It is as fearfully true of ••ose that point others the way to heaven by a righteous life, and will not move a ••ote in that path themselves. The Saints are all said to have white garments: the ••be of Justice that is not white, is not right: it must be visible to men, that it may <◇> acceptable to God.

3 I come to the exceptions against Lots Justice: the Scripture notes six great ••lts in this good man: three principal, and three less principal.

1 His contention with Abraham, his Uncle, elder and better. Before they ••ew rich, they dwelt lovingly together; poverty confirmed their society. When ••ither want, nor weary journeys, nor strange Countries could part; wealth di••des. How poor a good was their opulency, in respect of their company and ••ternall love! Many an one is a loser by his gains; and finds that which mul••plies his outward estate, to abate his inward. Who will esteem those things good, ••at make us worse? Abraham is the Uncle and worthier, Lot the Nephew and ••unger: yet is Abraham first in the deprecation of strife. I pray thee, &c. But he ••lds it no disparagement to begin the treaty of peace. He that is the son of Abra••m will seek to win by love, not to force by power.

It had been Lots duty to offer, rather than to choose, to yield than contend; yet Abraham offers the choice to Lot. Take the left hand, or the right. From whence ••th one, the custom grew in parting an Inheritance, Vt major dividat, minor eligat, ••at the elder should divide the younger choose. Lot takes it, but mark the event: ••t was crossed in his election, Abraham blessed in his resignation. Never did man <◇> desire of peace yield of his own right, that God suffered to be a loser by it. Lot <◇> he thought chose the best ground, the goodly plains of Jordan: but while he reflects the goodness of the soil, and not the badness of the people, he smarts for his choice, and is soon carried away captive. Abraham content with the worse, with a large amends. Lift up thine eyes, look East, West, North, and South: and all the good thou seest, I will give unto thee and to thy seed forever. Let us not desire to be our own carvers for this world: it is our surest happiness without ambition or avarice, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ rest at God's finding.

2 His incredulity, in doubting to be saved in the Mountain; as if the promise good direction of God could have failed. He had no charge to dwell in Sodom, he had charge to fly to the Mountain: yet Sodom he affected, the Mountain he refused, and was faulty in both. It is no small sin even to doubt, when we have God's command and warrant to serve us.

3 His fear to tarry in Zoar, which the Lord had given his word to spare for $\langle \diamond \rangle$ sake. But he that was so hasty to choose it, is now again as hasty to leave it. How variable is man, when he fixeth not his submission to God's ordinance? This fugitive inconstancy is by some thus qualified: that the loss of his wife at the entering of Zoar, put him quite out of heart to stay there. And the sight of the same sins in his own City, which so reigned in the greater, gave him cause to suspect it could not $\langle \diamond \rangle$ long forborne.

Here were three of his infirmities; Inconstancy, Incredulity, Ambition; to show, that none is so righteous, but in some things offensive. None were more honest under the law than the Priests, yet were they bound to offer sacrifice for themselves and their own sins. None more holy under the Gospel, than the Apostles, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ were they taught to pray, Forgive us our trespasses. Merit-usurpers are the worst covetants: for how bountiful soever God be to them, they will never acknowledge their master; all is their due. The most terrible Usurers; all God's blessings they make but the interest of their own monies. But the least cloud in a Diamond orders the price; the least infirmity in a Saint keeps him from being perfectly righteous. Yet no man puts away his horse, that hath carried him throughout his journey, for thrice tripping by the way. Nor do three Parentheses disgrace a good Oration. Three drops of poison are dangerous in a little cup of water: let them fall into a running spring, their malignity is soon dispersed to nothing. Wash a spotted robe, and it is clean again. Yet let us strive against all stains: Abraham going to sacrifice, left his two young servitors and the Ass behind him. Lot's fear and dealing were like two timorous and cowardly servants; his covetousness like the Ass: leave $\langle \diamond \rangle$ all these three behind us in our devotion, that we may be welcome to the Lord.

4 He offers up his own daughters to the rage of the Sodomites, that he might deliver his guests: choosing rather to be a bad father, than a bad host. This fact hath found diverse excuses. 1. It was a less sin, Coire secundum naturam, than adverse naturam: and of two evils the less is to be chosen. Answ. This is true in personal evils, not in criminal: in corporal things, not in spiritual. There is no necessity that should compel a man to sin: he ought rather to die. Blessed is he that condemneth not himself in the thing that he alloweth: then he is not blessed that allow the thing in act, which he condemns in Judgment. 2. Lot did not mean to profit off one sin with another, but useth a seeming submission to qualify their rage: he knew his daughters espoused to some great men of the City, and that they durst $\langle \diamond \rangle$ attempt their constupration. Answ. But this had been to tempt God by a fo••• presumption, to make such an unruly rabble this offer, in hope it would not be taken. 3. Though a man in himself must not do a less evil for avoidance of a greater: yet to stop another's precipice into some monstrous mischief, and to mo••• his mind by insinuation to a less; this they hold tolerable. As if men by custom must swear, the oath is better by their head, than by God. He that is shut up i• 〈◇〉 walled fort, let him escape where the wall is lowest. Answ. This is true, where we are perswaders from evil, not actors of evil ourselves. So if Lot had persuade• them to the young maids of the town, and to forbear the men, it had been more sufferable. But no man is to sin himself, with the hazard of his own soul, for the prevention of another's wickedness. 4. His intent was good to preserve his gods. Answ. We must not do evil, that good may come thereof.

Indeed there is a necessity which comes à Posteriore. As when a man hath swo•• to undo his neighbor: if he break his oath, he commits perjury: if he keep hi• oath, he breaks charity. What now? rather in breaking it offend only God, th• in keeping it offend both God and man. But this perplexity is not Ex parte 〈◇〉, it is not necessary to swear falsely, or break charity: but Ex parte hominis, 〈◇〉 cannot revoke what he hath spoken and done. 5. He knew that if his daughters we forced against their wills, they did not sin; and if they sinned not, he sinned not. *A*s. If the maidens should consent, facient cum Sodomitis, te auctor, nequitiam, Lot was 〈◇〉 author of their sin: if they should not consent, Patientur a Sodomitis, te auctor,volentiam, Lot was the author of their ravishment. There might have been uncertai•ty in their consenting, there had been none in his exposing. His purpose was go•d, his offer was faulty. If by his allowance the Sodomites had defiled his daugh•• betrothed to others, it had been his sin. If through violence they had defiled hi• guests, it had been only their sin.

It is for God to prevent sin with judgment, not for man to prevent a great sin in possibility, with a less in present act. Thus it cannot be justified, only a 〈◇〉 qualified. 1. In respect of the times, wherein knowledge was not so clear. 2. By his charity, he did it to conserve intemperate his guests. 3. By his troubled mind, without any recollection or serious advise. The best minds troubled yield inconsiderate motions; as water violently stirred sends up bubbles. Thus Lot meant well, 〈◇〉 God meant better: he preferred the unknowen Angels before his children, and th• Lord preserved them all.

But if this were such an error in Lot, though meant in charity: how horrible 〈◇〉 it in those that do it for iniquity? One would think there were no such mo••• in nature, yea monsters against nature. The Sea-monsters are not so cruel, as 〈◇〉 land-monsters, to their young. A good father will not sell his child's body a sta•• 〈◇〉 man, shall any sell his child's soul a slave to the devil? O that the Sun should shine upon that woman, which will be a Bawd to her own daughter! That the body she brought forth wth pains to this earth, she should sell for gains unto hell. Let her lose the name of mother and be held a murderer: there is no woman ever more deserved to be called the devils Dam. Let all her sex be ashamed of her; and even the sinners that reward her, curse her. Parents admonish your children, dissuade them from sin, pray against their sin, do not teach them to sin. What is said of the child's eye despising the parent, let me say of the parents tongue tempting the child, Let the Ravens of the valley peck it out, and the young Eagles eat it.

5 His drunkenness. Lot fled from Sodom, yet he could not fly from sin: He that could not be tainted in the City, is overtaken in the Cave. It is not the place that amendeth manners. Si desit Spiritus, non adjuvat locus. Some places are more dangerous, none are secure from temptation. It is a Popish fancy, that a cloisturall life can make a man more holy. If drunkenness crept into Lots cave, who can excuse their Cels and Cloistures. Lot sinned in the Mountain, Adam in Paradise, the Angels in Heaven: are Nunneries and Monasteries safer than these?

Some wholly excuse his drunkenness, because he did not purpose to be drunk. But the Apostle faulteth all excess: the excess is a sin, what ever be the purpose before, or effect after. Other say for it, that he drank liberally to allay his sorrows, and mitigate his heaviness. Ans. It ill becomes a just man to make use of such a comfort: the remedy was worse than the disease. I deny not, but wine to a man afflicted with so many griefs, hath the allowable use. Give strong drink to the heavy heart. But he that shall think to enable his body, by disabling his soul, and to cure his sickness with his sin; runs into the fire to avoid the smoke.

Let there be no pretext found for drunkenness; it made a just Lot prostitute his body to beastly uncleanness. Sodom could not deceive him, but Wine did. Vritur aebrius flammis mulierum, quem sobrium sulphurea flamma non attigerat. The fire of wine within him, did more than fire and brimstone without him. Nor in him alone hath it prevailed: Who would think to find Noah, that father of the new world, lying drunken in his Tent? Or that a little Wine should do more than a whole deluge of water? That he who was not perverted by the bad examples of the old world, should now begin a new example of sin to the new world? Lord, what is man, if he be but himself? What living man, had more noble proofs of God's Mercy, and Justice: mercy on himself, justice on others? The Lord once said to him in the midst of innumerable apostates; Thee only have I found righteous. He that was purged when the world was unclean, proves now unclean when the world is purged. The Preacher of the former world, and Prince of the latter, is the first that renews the sins which he had reprov'd, and for which he saw it condemned.

There is no sin hath so strange an effect, it is worse than sin. Other sins procure shame, but seek to hide it, this displays it. Lot is thus made a fool to his daughters, Noah to his son: it is a common quality in this excess to disclose secrets. Adam had no sooner sinned, but he saw and abhorred his own nakedness, seeking concealment even in bushes. Lot and Noah discover their nakedness, and have not so much rule of themselves as to be ashamed. Drunkenness doth not only make vices, but make them manifest. So would God have it, that our shame might be double by it. Both a shame for those imperfections we discover, and of that imperfection which moved us to discover them. One hours drunkenness filthily discovered, what six hundred years sobriety had modestly concealed. He that gives himself to wine, is not his own man. How horrible is that vice, which shall rob a man of himself, and lay a beast in his room? He that resists that one sin, escapes many: as he that kills the pregnant damme, is sure to destroy all the brood.

Drunkenness commands all: the senses command the members, the affections command the senses, the heart commands the affections, the head commands the heart, and wine commands the head. As Themistocles boy said; I rule my mother, my mother rules my father, and my father rules the whole Senate. Wine is aspiring, and will get up to the crown, and then humbles the crown to the feet. If it once take the scone, as Joab said of Rabba, all the rest will follow.

6 His Incest. Rather than Satan will leave Lot untempted out of Sodom, his own daughters shall prove Sodomites. They that should have been his comforters to succor him, became baits to betray him. So little are they moved with that grievous Judgment, the turning of Sodom to ashes, of their mother to a Pillar, both in their eye: that they dare think of lying with their own father. Yea, and one of them afterward, impudently calls that son Moab; My fathers son by me.

Some have excused their fact, that they did it to preserve seed: not out of intemperance, but love of their Name and posterity: not for lust, but procreation. Answer The end was commendable; but the means, by incest with their father, culpable: better for them never to have been mother, than to be so by their father. Yet their intent shall judge many: they affected commotion for fruit, diverse make that their last, and least end: lust of delectation is stronger with them, than desire of propagation. It seems, they sinned directly against their own consciences; because they did first intoxicate their father, to put him from his rectified memory. They thought he would not consent to them, unless he first did forget himself: that while Lot was sober he would not be unchaste. Drunkenness is the key that opens the door to all bestial affections and actions. Wine knows no difference, or of persons or sins. Their fact was more heinous than their fathers: his only drunkenness, theirs to make him so, and then to commit incest with him. Culpandus Lot, non quantum ill Incestus, sed quantum illa ebrietas merebatur.

For his Incest, he knew it not: he perceived not when they lay down, nor when they rose up. It is no incredible thing Nescientem cotre: not that it was done by nocturnal pollution, without the act of generation; as Tostatus out of Thomas. Now those sins condemn us, which we do knowingly: Et facinus facimus, quando mala facta sciamus. The use of his reason was hindered by drink: for if he had remembered himself upon his awaking, he would never have done it the second time. Some say, the progressive faculty may be exercised in sleep, as some walk in their sleep and transport things from place to place. Certainly, the Devil was not absent in such a fowl business, working fancies in his head. But in a word, Non tam illa turpitudine à vino quàm propter ebrietatem stupor inflictus à Domino: his unchastitie was the punishment of his ebriety.

Thus came his uncleanness from his drunkenness, but what is to be said for his drunkenness? Once, and a second time he admitted it Noah was drunk but once: one act cannot make a good heart unrighteous, as a trade of sin cannot stand with regeneration. So dangerous is it to give way to Satan's temptations: where he is once entertained, the next time he is confident. He that hath takes one sore fall, is the worse for it long after. I know it is true in some; Te d'c... lapsus, magis ut vestigia firmes, once to have stumbled, is always to be admonished: but this is above nature, a happiness only beholding to Divine grace.

These are the exceptions against Lots Justice, who (for all these) hath a testimony from the mouth of the Holy Ghost, that he was a Just man. Now whom God calls Just, let no man call unrighteous. Such is the difference, not of sins, but of men. He that sees Lot and Judah pardoned for Incest, while Zimri suffers for fornication; must confess, that God doth not so weigh the faults as the persons. It is a foolish proverb of man's partial indulgence; that one man may better steal a horse, than another look on. But the Lord is Justice, and hates all sin whatsoever, in all persons whatsoever: yet will he pardon their great sin, that are members of his good Son: and severely punish the least fault in them for whom he offered not. He regards not so much, quid, as quis: remission goes not by the measure of the sin, but by the quality of the sinner, yea, rather the mercy of the forgiver. Not the man that hath done no sin, but whom the Lord will not charge with sin is blessed. From all that hath been said, I will draw certain useful conclusions.

1 Even a just Lot is suffered to fall: he that was a gracious Saint on earth, and is now a glorious Saint in heaven; had his aspersions. When God upholdes us, no temptation can move us: if he let go his maintenencie, none is too weak for us. Which of God's dear children have not once done that thing, whereof they have afterward been ashamed? This the LORD suffers for diverse reasons. 1. To humble us if: such excellent men have trode awry, how should we take heed to our ways? Shall such Giants stumble, and we lame creeples be secure? 2. To keep us from despair: the Scripture tells us of their infirmities, that in their pardon we may read God's mercies. Let their falling humble us, and their rising again comfort us. If we had not such patterns, how could we but despair at the sight of our sins? But he will hope well of his wound, that hath so good experience of his Physician. 3. To magnify his own infinite goodness, that can do good turn our evil: he lets us fall, knowing how to make as good use of our sin, as of our obedience.

Lot might be ashamed of his Incestuous seed, and wish to have come from Some alone. Yet was this unnatural bed blessed with increase. Diverse good women have failed of this fruit by the lawful rights of marriage as Sara, Rebecca, Rachel, Elizabet; all hardly conceived. Some with one unlawful copulation have become pregnant: as Tamar by Judah, Bethshabe by David, Lots daughters by their own father. Not that God favors forbidden conjunctions: but in his Justice to bring such secret sin to open shame; in the elect for their conversion, in the reprobate for their further confusion.

Moab is derived from this Incest, one that might call his father, Grandfather; and his mother, Sister. One father begot both the mother and her child, and one man is both the brother and son of the same woman. Yet from this line came one of our Savior's worthy Ancestors: of Moab came Ruth, married to Boaz, the father of Jesse, the father of David, the progenitor of JESUS CHRIST according to the flesh. God's election is not tied to our means: we may beget children, we can neither traduce blessings nor curses to them. Holy parents from a chaste bed have sometimes bred a monstrous and impious generation. And the Lord sometimes raiseth a holy seed from the drunken bed of fornication. Whatsoever we do, God will be chuser; and serve himself, not according to our act, but his own purpose. Weightie ears of corn have sometimes grown out of the compass of the tilled field: and sweet flowers been found out of the enclosed Garden, even in the wild forest. Thus will GOD keep his own liber•ie of election, by his grace, not our works; and let us know, that we are not borne, but made good.

2 Notwithstanding these infirmities, still Lot is a Just man: some particular •cts may be too light in the balance, without extinguishing his title before the Lord. A man is sanctified in four respects. 1. In the not imputation of his sins: and that which is not imputed, is as it were not committed. 2. In inchoation of holiness, begun in this life, perfected hereafter. 3. In acceptance; Num. 23.21. God seeth none iniquity in Jacob, he seeth no transgression in Israel: there is sin in us, but God will not see it. 4. In comparison; so they shine like stars in a dark night. Lots offenses were some blemish to his sanctification in earth, they could not nullefie his Justification in heaven: blemish his virtue they may, not frustrate his grace. For if still as the elect sin, they should lose their grace, and cease to be righteous; God's election were as mutable; as our condition. The frantic in his mad fits doth not exercise reason, yet he hath it: he loseth the use, not the habit, ration Principii. In a swoon the soul doth not exercise her functions: a ma• neither hears, nor sees, nor feels; yet she is still in the body. A suspend• Priest cannot be put from his right in the Church, for Ministerium indelebilis ch•racter: he hath his ministry, though forbidden to exercise it. The out-Law is still a subject, albeit debarred of some privileges. The son angers his father, •e doth not strait disinherite him. Though the vessel reel, yet fear not, Caesar•• vehis, thou carriest Caesar; said that Emperor to the quaking Mariner: we are we• of ourselves, but Christ is in us.

Lot fell six times in many days, the Just man falls seven times in one day; yet he is still Just in his Savior's righteousness. This concludes our comfort: he 〈◇〉 bad Peter forgive his repenting brother seven times, will forgive our repen•• souls seven thousand times: he scorns that any Peter, Saint, or Angel, should outgoe him in showing mercy. In ourselves we are sinners; in CHRIST righteous. When the Philosopher in his own mean clothes could not be admitted 〈◇〉 the Court on a solemn day, he went and borrowed rich and gorgeous apparel, he was then let in with ease and respect. Being in the Presence, he was continually kissing his robe: the King noting it, wondered, and asked the cause: he answers, ••noro honorantem, I honor that which honored me. Nam quod virtus non pot••, vestitus obtinuit. My virtue could procure me no entrance, my garment did. We are too base, ragged, beggarly of ourselves, to be let into that glorious Court of heaven; by faith put we on the Princes embroidered garment, CHRIST'S righteousness; then shall we be admitted. Let us admire and honor that which honors us: Quod virtus nostra non potuit, vestitus ejus obtinet: what all our righteousness could never do, that his robe doth for us.

Now if the righteous shall scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and sinner appear? Righteous, that's happy: but scarcely saved, that's hard: yet shall be saved, that's happy again. Let no believer fear, for he is righteous: let none presume, for he shall scarcely be saved: yet, let none despair, for he shall be saved. For all thy sin, yet thou (being faithful in Christ) art righteous: for all thy righteousness, thou shalt scarcely be saved: for all that difficulty, yet thou shalt be saved. Thus like those on the seas, they mount up to heaven, and down to the deep, and up again: or like the Heave-offering, that was heaved up, and down, and up again: or as CHRIST, the Anti-type of it, was heaved up to the Cross, down to the grave, and up again unto glory. So we are Justified by Christ, this lifts us up to grace: we commit many sins, this humbles us with shame: yet we love righteousness, and endeavor to perfection, this shall advance us to everlasting Glory.

3 Just Lot was delivered, neither for his Justice, nor without it. Not for his own righteousness, but for God's mercy. I will deliver him, because I have a favor unto him. Nor doth the Apostle mean, that Lot was delivered for his own sake: nor the Prophet, that he was delivered for Abraham's sake; when he saith, The Lord remembered Abraham, and sent out Lot. He should have been saved, though he had not been a kin to Abraham. Yet is this repeated to testify God's love to Abraham, and his gracious answer to the prayers of the Sons of Abraham; which shall prevail with him. But indeed, God remembered Abraham, not so much because he prayed, but because himself had promised: the deliverance depended not upon any merit in Uncle or Nephew, but on the divine goodness.

The Pontificians say, there be two things in a good work: the Meritorious part, to get heaven: the satisfactory part, to escape hell. It cannot do the latter, Propter Inutilitatem, for the unprofitableness of it; being no more than we are bound to do. It cannot do the former, Propter Invaliditatem, for the insufficiency of it, being not so much as we are bound to do. If God judge by the Law moral, no work is good: for if by the Law evangelical, joined with the remission of sins, many works are good. Some have affirmed that all our works are evil; as if truth and lying, covetousness and liberality, hatred and charity, were all one. God never taught that doctrine. Indeed our best actions have their blemishes and imperfections. The Egyptian midwives saved the Hebrew children by a lie: yet it is said, God prospered them, and made them houses. He rewarded not their lie, but their piety: he so regarded their mercy, that he regarded their infirmity. Prosperity belongs to their goodness, pardon to their dissipation. The Lord forgave the obliquity, and blessed the honesty of the work. There be three circumstances in every work, which Saint Bernard would have us take unto. An liceat, an expedit, an deceat: the lawfulness, expedience, decency: the main is the licet. But man is so lame, that though he keeps the right way, yet he errs. Without our righteousness we cannot be saved, yet for our righteousness are not saved, but for his that came to save us.

4 The Just Saints are to be followed, but in their Justice and sanctity. So many encourage themselves on their falls: Lot was incestuous and drunken, he is called Just; why for such sins am I held unrighteous? Am I better than he? better? No, would thou wert half so good. 1. He sinned and condemned himself, thou sinnest and defendest thyself. Thou likest that in him, which he disliked in himself. 2. They sinned and repented, thou showest thy sin, but none of repentance. Quos secutus es errantes, sequere paenitentes. Their weakness is in our hands, but their tears are not seen in our eyes. 3. Evil was never to be imitated, but goodness. Lots faith and obedience is not such a sinners' object, but his Incest and drunkenness: as if Jacob's modest look, liberal hand, thoughtful speaking tongue, devout knee, and humble heart, were not worth noting; but only his lameness and halting. He marks none of their graces, but their errors. 4. Their falls serve to raise us up when we are down, not to cast us down when we are up: for our consolation afterward, not for our presumption more. To think of their errors, should humble us with fear, not hearten us with encouragement to evil. It is said of the wicked, They fear, where no fear $\langle \diamond \rangle$ here it may be said, where fear is they fear not. These examples are Paenitentibus in solatium, not praesumentibus in refugium. To say, why should not I find mercy with David, this is the voice of faith: to say, why should not I venture to sin with David, this is the voice of folly. 5. Thy sin is greater by this bold imitation: a lie ventured on by the example of a Saints frailty, is of a more malicious nature in thee, than it was in him. Any transgression thus derived, is the argument $\langle \diamond \rangle$ a more ungracious soul, than that it seeks to imitate. What he hopes shall excuse him, doth more properly condemn him; because he had that warning before him. 6. Thy repentance is doubtfuller.

He that tempted them to sin tempts also thee; that is Satan: but he that gave them repentance, is not bound to give it thee, that is God. Thou makest thy fall certain, thy rising again is uncertain. Such a man hath been dangerously sick, and escaped; his Physician was skillful and diligent, his medicine proper and effectual. Wilt thou make thyself sick, on purpose to try the skill of the one, and nature of the other? 7. For them, there was a cure behind, the sacrifice of the Lamb not then slain: but now if men willfully frustrate the price of that redemption Christ died no more: his next coming shall not be in the humility of a sufferer, but in the glory of his Father; not to redeem, but judge the world. 8. All scripture is for instruction, all is not for imitation. Lucerne pedibus meis; a light by feet, showing me the blocks whereat they stumbled, that I might keep my feet upright. Commissum atque conscriptum est. It is so done and written: for our imitation? No, that were an argument of too much violence, to draw on sin with the cart-ropes of examples: to take some stones from the Temple, that with them we might beat down the rest: and to spoil ourselves by the ruins of Gods Saints.

This is fit to be urged against those that flesh themselves by the sins of God's children. Will any infer, what matter is it what manner of men we are, when Paul a Blasphemer, a persecutor, an oppressor, was received to mercy? When $\langle \diamond \rangle$ coming a Wolf against the Lambes, is made Paul a Shepherd for the Lambes. This is true in him, but he did it ignorantly; thou having his example doest it maliciously. and God will not be merciful to them that offend him of set purpose. He that deliberately resolves to sin, doth what he can to make himself incapable of forgiveness. Indeed it is true, that nemo bonus, nisi qui aliquando malus; there is none good, but he was once bad: Peter by experience of his own frailty, might learn with his keys to open heaven unto others. But though God forgive our sins in his patience, let not us forget them in our penitence. God pardoned in Lot what was bad, and accepted what was good: let us follow his virtues, that we be never condemned for his sins.

5 If we will be delivered let us be just: but doth God deliver none but the righteous? Yes, sometimes also the wicked, and that for diverse reasons. 1. That they might be brought to repentance; for that is the scope and purpose of $\langle \diamond \rangle$ goodness and patience of God. But man is so given to pride, that if he speed well he thinks he deserves well: and so instead of humble thankfulness swells with proud arrogance. 2. For some progenie to come from them: for good He to be borne, his wicked father Ahaz is forborne. Why doth Amon draw out two years breath in Idolatry, but that good Josiah was to be fitted for a king? When I came into the Sanctuary of God, then understood I the ends of these men. The we find, that many sacrilegious, extortioners, idolaters, are delivered, because God hath some good fruit to come from their cursed loins. 3. To fill up the measure of their sins: they have already done so much, that they are suffered to do more: so sin is punished with sin, as drunkenness with thirst. 4. To magnify the Lord's patience, in giving them time and means of penitence: that as they make his labor without success, they might be left without excuse. Thus Cham delivered from that universal deluge, yet after he comes to deride his own father: twice had Noah given him life, yet he abuseth both his father and himself. Even God's Ark may nourish Monsters: on the seats of the Temple sit contemners of their spiritual fathers, as often filthy Toads lie under the consecrated stones. Was this God's favor to preserve him to judgment? He better have perished in the waters, than live unto his fathers curse. It is not imply our deliverance, but our thankfulness for it, and obedience after it, that sufficient argument to our consciences, we are in the favor of God.

6 Never did man serve God for nothing: if Lot be just, he shall now the benefit of it, he is delivered. It is the speech of Atheism and Apostasy: is in vain to serve God, and what profit is it that we have kept his Commandments Most false, from God, Discedet nullus sine munere, munere dignus: he highly seem to owe a man anything. Cyrus in the conquest of Lacedemonia, encouraged Soldiers: that the foot-man should have a horse-man's place; the horse-man chariot; the Lievetenant should be made a Captain; the Captain a Colonel and he that was President over a City, should be made a Vice-roy over a wide Country. Whereas Christ, say they, for his Soldiers, speaks of nothing but taking a cross, and bearing a yoke: of persecution abroad, and affliction at home. Here is not Labor muneratus honor, but honor mutilatus labor: it was better with us before, we had more prosperity with less piety. They are miserably deceived, there is no honor like to his service, the fear of God rewards it self. have labored in vain, & spent my strength for naught; the earth is barren: but work is with the Lord, and my reward with my God; heaven is fruitful, there shall be a blessed harvest of recompense.

Then spake they that feared the Lord, and a book of remembrance was written, &c. They met together to serve God: for this purpose was their coming, and about this business was their communing. What followed? A book of remembrance was written for them: not one good work of theirs, but is there registered: the great Master of the Rols records them, and rewards them; here in a heaven of peace, there in the peace of heaven. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord: When shall say to the wicked, Depart from me; then I will acknowledge them for mine. When I make up my Jewels, setting all the trash and refuse on fire; I will gather up them into mine own treasury, as a man locks up his precious jewels in his Cabinet. And I will spare them, as a man spareth (not every son, but) his son that loveth him.

This was the convinced devils acknowledgement; Doth Job fear God for ought? And Saul's insinuation to the Benjamites, disheartening their adherence David. Will the son of Ishai give you fields and vineyards? Will he make you captains over hundreds and Captains over thousands? Reward is the encouragement of service. This was the ground and color of the angry sons exception. These many years have I served thee, without breaking thy commandment; yet thou ever gavest me so much as a kid, to make merry with my friends. An unjust expropriation of a son to a father, and such a father as had given him the inheritance. Ye knew that your labor is not in vain in the Lord. Labor. Idleness shall do you no good, but labor. Your labor, the pains of another shall not profit you, but our own labor. Is not in vain; not like the Black-mores washing, a labor in vine: but if it miss your end, it reacheth God's: we see not the success, yet it ospers. In the Lord, it may be in vain in the world, and men never requite it; but in the Lord it shall find recompense. Our labors end with our lives, but our wards end not with our labors. This we know: Divinity consists of certain ounds and infallible principles, a sure foundation, a knowledge. The Physician $\langle \diamond \rangle$ his medicine never so proper, knows not whether he shall recover his Patient. ead the Lawyer never so learnedly, he knows not whether he shall regain his lients right. The Soldier may fight valiantly, yet is not sure of the victory. ut Divinity is a knowledge, making us know, that our pious endeavors shall e rewarded.

7 The Lord first makes us just, and then saves us: as he first sanctified Lot, nd then delivered him. So that our Justice is not Justice in proper and district ormes, but mercy. Ab luti estis, you are washed. What, have you washed your lves? No, ye are washed, ye are justified, ye are sanctified in the Name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of God. So Christ is made to us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. Wisdom in the instruction of our ules, righteousness in the forgiveness of our sins, sanctification in the holy ss of our lives, and redemption in the deliverance from all our enemies. We ee none of these in ourselves; that he who rejoiceth, might rejoice in the Lord. rust not your arms of flesh, nor your hearts of ashes, nor your purest spirits hile they are housed in corrupted walls. If you have stood a time, trust not your gges, you may slide: if you have slip'd and recovered, trust not your recovery, ou may fall again. Trust not your strength, it is infirmity: trust not your wisome, it is folly: trust not your holiness, it is blended with iniquity. Prophets ve fallen, Patriarchs have fallen, Apostles have fallen, Stars have fallen, An else have fallen. But trust the mercy of God, which is of infinite perfection: nd the merits of Christ, which are of perfect satisfaction. It is I, even I, that putt th away thine iniquity for my own sake. It is not Abraham nor Moses; nor the Vir nn Mary, nor the Virgin Martyr, not Peter at Rome, nor Paul at Jerusalem, that $\langle \diamond \rangle$ do this cure: hear the Physician; It is I, saith the Lord. Not with the pre ration of our own nature, nor with the cooperation of our own justice, nor ssposi ion and liberty of our own will: hear him once again; It is I, even I, and $\langle \diamond \rangle$ mine own sake, and sons sake, that forgiveth your sins.

To conclude with application. God hath given us a gracious deliverance, which we may parallel with Lot's. We have been saved from the Fire; such a conflagration, as knows no comparison, but Sodom or hell. With a match it should have been done, without all Match, if it had been done. Some differences there are: that fire was in a just severity, this, in an unjust treachery. Sodomes for came down from heaven, this gunpowder fire was fetched up from hell. That was inflicted by the Ministers of God, Angels: this was devised by the Ministers of Satan, Traitors. That was prepared for the nocent, this for the innocent. That was fire and brimstone, this fire and gunpowder; of a more sudden and dispatching violence; not reserving pause for a Lord have mercy on us. We were Titio ereptus, a brand plucked out of the burning. The Lord did not only deliver us from the burning, but he also kept the fire from kindling. He sent Lot of Sodom, to save him; he prevented Sodom in England, to save us: he did not remove us from it, but he removed it from us.

He that sent that fire downward, kept this fire from mounting upward. He delivered Lot by visible Angels, and Angels were not wanting though invisibly, when he delivered us. He remembered Abraham, and sent out Lot: when he freed as from the fire, he remembered the Son of Abraham according to temporal birth and his own Son by eternal generation, Jesus Christ. He did reveal to Abraham this purposed destruction of Sodom: he did not conceal from our gracious Sovereign the notice of this intended destruction of his kingdom. Lot was sent out by break of day, and we delivered by four a clock in the morning: that very morning: there wanted but a little work of the morning, and then sufficient to the day, to the year, to all ages of the world, had the malice of that morning been; more accursed, than ever was read in the kalendar of any time. The incendiary a Faux, a fire-brand indeed, kept his vigils, but the Lord prevented his Jubilee. There was Titio infernalis, a hell-brand ready with his match, to make Communem rogam, a general bone-fire, both of mortal men and immortal Trophies and Charters: to make a whole burnt-offering of us all, and to pass us through the fire to that Moloch of Rome. Temples, sepulchers, monuments of age and honor, should have been tossed into the air, then into the water, after they had been first spoiled by fire. Our river had been turned into a river of blood, and her carriages, instead of commodities, into dead corpses and discerpted limbs; her crystal streams died into rubies. Thus they meant us like Sodom but God delivered us like Lot. The danger was imminent and furious, their rage violent and monstrous, our deliverance strange and glorious; let our commemoration and thanks be solemn and generous, heroical and perpetual forever. Amen.

Vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked.] The next point is his place, which was sinful, flagitious, stigmaticall Sodom. It was worse than a Gaole <◇> his just soul: and report lies, if our common Gaoles be not like to Sodom, the very dens of mischief, the Schools of wickedness. Thus God's ordinance for reformation, is made a means of further transgression: and the place built for discipline, breeds and feeds villainy. A malefactor learns more pestilent untowardness when he comes there, than ever he knew before. O that the Magistrate would look to this; that drunkenness and blasphemy might not usurp the place of mortification and humility!

But why would Lot stay in such a wicked City? Not as a neighbor affected with their customs, but as a Physician to cure their diseases. But he that looked for a Paradise, found a hell: and the cup of his prosperity was spiced with the bitter fruits of a cursed society. It was indeed Terra bona, but Gens mala; as it was once said of Ireland; nothing bad there but the people. Christ would not suffer his weak Disciple to go bury his Father; lest he should be perverted by some carnal friends at the funeral. I am life, tarry and live with me: let the dead one, lest thou die with them. How often doth God part his children from the wicked, by making them smart with the wicked! As Augustine speaks of the religious taken among the rest by the Goths: Iure amaram vitam sentiunt, quia eccantibus amari esse noluerunt. Woe is me that I must remain in Meshech, and dwell $\langle\phi\rangle$ the tents of Kedar.

•o live among the good is a great happiness, a little Image of heaven, a module •nd abridgement of the communion of Saints. Where one doth love another and •ll love God: one is at peace with another, and all at peace with their own con•cience: one doth honor another, and all honor their Maker. When the inha•itants of a Parish shine in the day, like a Firmament of bright Stars in the night; •ot one malevolent aspect among them. Like a Choir of tunable voices, every •ne keeping time and his own part, and in a sweet harmony, all singing the pray•es of the Lord. But O where shall we find such a neighbor-hood? how much •round shall we leave behind us, ere we arrive at this society? The Prophet once •ried, O ye heavens drop down righteousness; as if the earth had quite lost it, being ••ken up above the clouds. We may now cry and complain for want of this •ighbour-hood; O ye heavens drop down kindness and charity into our times, O love that art Alumna coeli, sis medicina soli; come down and help us.

Imagine with the fable, a City consisting of selected men, all peaceable, tra•table, charitable, humble; the Magistrate clemently ruling, the people meekly •beying. The enemy knows it invincible, while thus governed: therefore craf•ily resolves to shuffle in among them a pair of false brothers; a liar, and a thief. •ut because in their own forms they would soon be discovered and abhor•ed; he puts them in two disguises; the liar like a Lawyer, the thief like a Vsuer. Their wealth procures them room and respect, they fall to work. The •yer with his forged weapons, whispers to the Magistrate how the people stomach •im: to the people, how the Magistrate tyrannizeth over them: to private persons, what hard language is given them, what wrong is done them, what right is kept •rom them, and that the law is ordained to render every man his own. First, there •s heart-burning, then brawling, then contesting at law: and now instead of peace •nd humility, there is pride and enmity. The Usurer, he so robs them by a legal •heft, that they become at once sensible of want and injury; covetousness gets in•o the heart, oppression fills the hand. Now far-well charity, every man for him•else, none for God, and God for none. Consider yourselves, and wish this were but a Parable: punish the devils instruments; hang up theevery, cut out the •ongue of lying, and so be shut of them: this were a fair riddance of them both, •s the proverb hath it, without a Session. There was a Mathematician in Con•tantinople, that in anger thus vexed his neighbor. He did set in his Cellar •reat Caldrons of boiling water, with heat multiplying the motions of the va•ours; and then turning them all into narrow pipes, gave them vent under his •ighbours floor: which made such an earthquake, that it shook all his house. •hen with fire-glasses and barrels he so thundered and lightened, that he forced •im to forsake his dwelling. The vapors of secret slanders, the earthquakes of •pen contentions, the thunders of blasphemy, the flashes of burning malice, do •o afflict us: that we cry, Our soul is among Lions; sons of men whose teeth are spears, •rouse and sharp swords.

But still what doth Lot in Sodom, a Saint among sinners? fishes may be fresh $\langle\phi\rangle$ salt waters; live in the sea, and not partake the brinish quality: it is not so with •an. Rather, Aliquid mali propter vicinum malum; some evil for neighbor-hoods ••ke. Pure streams passing by a corrupt foil, contract some of the putrefacti•n: and springs running thorough the veins of the earth, savor of the mineral, •hich they last saluted. Inficitur terrae sordibus unda fluens. Commisti sunt inter Gen••s: ° They were mingled among the heathen. What followed? They learned their works. No wonder: can a man be clean among Lepers? or sleep with dogs, and not swarm with fleas? We certify ourselves of men's behavior, as the Lacedemonians inquired the carriage of their children: Of what sort are their companions: as they, Of what condition are their play-fellows? The mischiefs of Sodom and Babylon should forewarn our departure: as the swallows would not come near Thebes, because the walls had been so often besieged. The smitten Deere is presently forsaken of all his fellows. A great Tree never falls alone, but also spoils the under-wood, w^{ch} otherwise would have thrived well enough. The reason why the Raven returned not unto the Ark, is given by some, because she met with dead carcasses. The worlds carrion keeps many from their faithful adherence to the Church. Any thing taken from the proper place loseth the virtue: a coal of fire kept in the chimney, lives: separate it from the harth, leave it alone in the air, it presently dyes. What Philosophy said of good, experience justifies of evil: Malum est sui diffusivum, evil is diffusive and spreading of it self; indeed more catching than goodness. Ask the Priest if a man carry holy flesh ⟨◇⟩ the skirt of his garment, and touch other things with that skirt, shall they be holy? No, saith the Priest. If one that is unclean by a dead body, touch anything, shall it not be unclean? Yes, it shall be unclean, saith the Priest. Sooner are the good corrupted by the bad, than the bad are bettered by the good. Why are we taught continually to pray, Deliver us from evil: but that it hath a dangerous power to make us evil? Yea, LORD, free us from Sodom, separate us from sin, alienate ⟨◇⟩ from the wicked, Deliver us from evil, for thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, forever, Amen.

Vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked.] The matter of his vexing was their sin; the evil of the place came from the persons, who were fully, foully, filthily, palpably wicked. Not by way of infirmity, or in any mean degree, but wicked, in the extent of sin. Not seldom, or by fits, but always; their conversation was wicked. Not secretly and in corners, but notoriously in the public view; their visible life was wholly wicked. And for specification, if any s•• were predominant above the rest, it was Filthiness, Sodomes filthiness, a bestiality, yea worse. For Pejus est bestialiter vivere, quàm bestiam esse: it is not so bad to be a beast, as to live like a beast; a sin abhorred by nature it self. Therefore to put some method into this further discourse of their wickedness, three circumstances appear in the description. 1. The impudence of it, being notorious and open; Lots eye-sore. 2. The continuance of it, during their whole life: not an act or two, but their conversation. 3. The turpitude of it, being so obscene and nasty a filthy conversation. Thus we have the fore-head, the heel, and the composition of the whole body.

1 The impudence; it was manifest wickedness, their faces did not blush at i•. The show of their countenance doth witness against them, they declare their sin as Sodom, they hide it not. It is true, that nocturnall pollutions shall have public plagues: b•• they that dare sin God in the face, shall bear a heavier weight of his vengeance. The harlot doth bad enough, that wipes her lips, (as if the print of her sin could be seen there) and it was not she: though she commit it, she will conceal it. B••Absalom worse; that spreads his incestuous pallet on the roof, and calls the S•••• a blushing witness to his filthiness. Pride compasseth them about as a chair: they wear their wickedness in pomp, as if they meant it should grace them. They glory in their shame: such as boast their quantities of drink, and varieties of uncleanness; (it is all one) how far into their hearts they have admitted the d••••

Such are called Dogs: not only because they are as fawning as dogs, •••tering their feeders: or as ravenous as dogs, insatiately devouring, canine appeti••: or as malicious as dogs, barking out scandals at their lives that shine with goodness: but as unclean as dogs, and as shameless as dogs; noisome with imp•dence, and impudent with noisomeness; their place is without, The wicked b••steth his hearts desire: he doth not cover it, nor excuse it, but boast it: nor shift it <◇> another, but makes it appear his own hearts desire. Mala admittunt, admissa ••ctant, jactata defendunt. Majoris est culpae manifest quàm occulte peccare: ill ••pliciter reus, quia & agit & docet. The Popish rule is safer, Caute si non caste:•ut these, vitia tam minime abscindunt, ut non abscondant. They prostitute their •oules as the Romans did the bankrupts houses, with, Who gives most? If their ••and hath been the Organ of unrighteousness, their mouth shall be the Trump•t •o proclaim it.

There is more modesty in them that seek concealment: if there be any bush <◇> Paradise, any tempter to be named by Adam; a woman of thy giving, Eve;•hereas it was a woman of his own seeking, concupiscence: Gehazi hath a lying co•er, Saul a pretending color; here is something to be alleged for mitigation. •ut to sin without shame, yea, to out-sin all shame, to publish the tenor of vil•ny in print; this is Sodomes state. Uncleanness was not confined to the Cham•er, nor the every to the night, nor corruption blanched and skin'd over with hy•ocrisie: but borne aloft, justified by protection, and crowned with garlands of •onour and approbation. This sin abandons secrecy, scorns reproof: admoni••on to it were but like goads to them that are mad already, or a pouring of oil •own the chimney.

It is said of ^b Tamar; that Judah took her for an harlot by her dressing. She ••kes upon her the habit of an harlot, because she means to be one: her attire de•lares her purpose. If she had not wished to seem a whore, she would have avoi•ed such a place and veil. The external monuments of immodesty bewray a •arnall heart: they that mean well, will never wish to seem ill. Nature (not too ••r perverted) is not more forward to commit sin, than willing to hide it: and we •ommonly affect to show better than we are. Not few harlots put on the sem•lance of chastity, and bitterly rail on them that appear naught. Moorish pas••ges are dangerous for travellers, but the pits which the eye sees, the foot avoids. •et us never trust those that do not wish to appear good.

To conclude then, Sodom sought no cover, and she was not covered; fire •nd brimstone had free access to her; and her confusion no less than her corrup••on, was palpable to the world. Opennesse of sin saves Justice a labor of inqui••tion: there need no hew and cry after that thief which presents himself. Are ••ere no such public sinners amongst us? None that openly dis-hallow the Sab•aths; none that justify sacrilege; a sin now as manifest as Sodomes: none that •ave so sworn away all grace, that they make it their grace to swear. Mark ••em that cause devisions and tumults among you, mark them with the black coal of infamy: let them be to you, as Lepers among the Jews, or as men full of plague-res among you; whom neither the fear of God nor man can work to peace, quietnesse must be their portion forever; the shame of the Gospel, malicious, railing Christians. Concerning these open sins, let me say to the Magistrate, 〈◇〉 David to Solomon of Shimei; we may not, you must punish.

2 The continuance: as their sins were extant, so constant; Their ways were ways grievous. Their ways, not some few steps; grievous, not meanly offensive; and that without intermission, always. It is not so much sin, as the trade of sin that is damnable. They sin while they eat, sin while they walk, talk, even in sleep they sin: their sportive, transportive mirth is full of obscenesse: their beds, boards, chambers, and (if they dissemble any devotion) the very Churches are witnesses of their impiety: such fluid souls, that no costive medicine can stay the flux of their sins: but the very remanent snuff of original goodness must languish out in a stinking dissoluteness. Time, cummunis medicus, the remedy of these evils, increaseth this. Other creatures grow up to their height, and then decay and die: only it is said of the Crocodile, that she grows to her last day. So doth this man's sin; Plus senio confectus, plus malo infectus: corpore debilior, facinore fortior. It is said of the Moon; Crescit, senescit, evanescit, & reparat sua cœnua Phoebe: she waxeth, and waneth, and vanisheth, and then appears again with repaired horns: but here is no change, except from evil to worse. They so habituate sins, Vt diu assueta, tandem putantur nulla: as the Friars dwindle their orders, from Minim's to Nullan's. Or as some owe debts so long, that they forget them to be debts. They think the Preacher does them over-hasty wrong to call them from their inveterate lusts: as when a creditor demanded his money long due; the debtor jested with his companion: See, I have ought him the money these ten years, and he is as earnest with me as if I had borrowed it but yesterday. Like men that have so often told a lie, that at last themselves think they speak true.

Lot may preach to them, but unless Lot could convert them, there is no reparation of their life. Resolute sinners love dissolute Teachers; such as cannot, or dare not speak the truth. That cannot, for insufficiency: their place hath set them to charge, but they have neither powder, nor shot. That dare not, for flattery: we may say of their Sermons, as it is reported of some harps: Oculos pascunt, 〈◇〉 onerant: it is better to see, than hear them: their fingering may please the eye, their melody is nothing worth. Yet as Saint Keywins harp is kept for a great relique: so flattering teachers are venerable monuments with these.

They sin because they will sin: Quare peccas? quia nescis quid facias? d's: quia cogaris ut facias? absit: sed quia placet ut sic facias. The cause is neither ignorance, nor compulsion, but willfulness. Though we must offend, yet for shame let there be some interruption and breaking off in our sins: let not men run head-long to hell, and never so much as look back. It is for the Devil only to do nothing else but sin: a sinner from the beginning, a sinner to the end. Who gives a penny to that merchant that rejoiceth in his shipwreck? or will confer an estate upon him that resolves to be a beggar? Saint Augustine confesseth a state of himself unconverted, bad enough; when he said, Petieram castitatem, sed nollem obtinere: but these will not so much as Petere, desire to be good.

While they are in Delilah's lap, they think themselves as safe as if they were in Abraham's bosom. As beggars get their living by showing their sores: let a Surgeon offer to heal them, they refuse it, because they live by them. We offer to cure men's maladies, their riot, rapine, uncleanness, lying, blasphemy: No, they thank us, and say, they live by them. This is that Babel which will not be cured. Yea, they are worse than those beggars; for they desire not ulcers, yet when they have them, they make use of them: but these by an unnatural lust conc••• them, and make ulcers in their conscience. Perhaps the issue there hath continued so long, that if they offer to stop it, they die: the Devil hath hamper'd some so fast, that they dare not but sin, for fear they should anger him, for a Ne••c••: and their consciences would so pinch and torture them, that they dare not ad••• conference. As they that have cursed and shrewish wives at home, love to stray abroad: so men molested with a scolding conscience, as the whore, drunkard, homicide; are fain continually to play, drink, riot; to go to bed with their heads full of wine, and no sooner wake, but to it again. So that their conscience and knock at the door a thousand times, and they are never within, or at leisure to be spoke withal. Yet must they at last be met and found, as Ahab was by E••, even by this enemy: stay they never so long, and stray they never so far, they must home at last. Sickness will waken them, conscience must speak wi•• them, as a Master with his truant Scholar after a long absence; and then there are no men under heaven who more need that prayer, LORD have mercy upon them!

The uncleanness: their sin was not only palpable, and durable, but detestable: they were exposed to turpitude, their bodies prostituted to fleshly polluti•••. By [filthy] understand all carnal defilements, the kinds whereof Saint Paul specifies to the Romans under their proper names, because they were familiarly known to them. But to the Galatians, he wraps them up in general terms, because there they were more obscure: As our Apostle doth not name Sodom's filthinesse to the Christian Jews, lest by specifying it he should in a manner teach •t. The degree of Pope Syricius involved marriage among the pollutions of the ••esh: and such was the over-sight of Saint Gregory upon, 1 Cor. 7.2. Concessit mi•imo, ut majus declinetur: a false gloss of a sincere Text, striving to prove by the Apostles words, that matrimony is by permission, not by commandment: and •herefore Sine vitio non esse, quod ignoscitur, & non praecipitur; that cannot be with. •ut sin, which is pardoned, and not imposed. But if it were a sin to marry, God •imselfe should be the Author of sin, for he was the author of marriage. Neither •oth God pardon it as a thing forbidden, but permit it as a thing lawful, though •he Apostle doth not there impose it as a thing necessary. And it is a forced inter•retation, to tax that of iniquity, which God hath ordained for a remedy. For ••e doth not forbid, but rectify our desire; Let every man have his own wife: Su•m, non alienam: Vxorem, non concubinam: vxorem, non uxores: a Wife, not a concubine: his own wife, not another man's: his Wife, not wives. Lamechs incongrui•ie, (Hear O ye wives of Lamech) was like false latin: for wives admit of no plu•alitie, when they be construed with one husband. God had abundance of Spirit, yet unus unam uni, he ordained but one woman for one man.

But let us abhor that doctrine, that shall at once cast out the aspersion of sin •pon marriage, and yet seek to vindicate uncleanness from sin by a toleration of •tewes. It was God's express prohibition; There shall be no whore of the daugh•ers of Israel. Many flatter themselves, that this is but a trick of youth: belike they are content to lose the kingdom of heaven with a trick: an unhappy trick, that costs a man his soul.

It is truly said, that a whore is the high way to the Devil: he that looks on her with lust, begins his voyage: he that stays to talk with her, is half his way: he that enjoys her, is at his journeys end. She is Mendax, out-lying a news-monger: fallax, her kisses be sweet poison: Vorax, her eye is on your face, while her heart is on your cash: Tenax, a deep ditch: what is wrack'd there, is lost forever: Curiosa, dressing her self all day, to provoke appetite at night: Impudica, others sins show like land-schip, a far off; hers like huge statutes: damnosa, damnable both to her self and others. She keeps her self a stranger to repen•ance, till they two meet at an hospital. She lives like Cain, a reprobate vagabond without any constant habitation. Her body is the common sewer, her soul a snuff which only Surgery keeps alive, and at last it goes out in everlasting stench.

For others; it is her misery and mischief not to be damned alone, she brings many to her own fire, and so does the Devil special service. She is a witch that hath wrought upon Saints, as Tamar (though otherwise a good woman) did once upon Judah. He esteems her by her habit, and the very sight of an harlot hath fired him with lust: the Devil knows that a fit object is half a victory. At the first sight he is enflamed, and (which is strange) caught with her love before he saw her face. Not examining whether she was fair or foul, sick or sound, friend or enemy, it was enough that she was a woman. The presence of the Adullamite does not restrain him: so had lust besotted him, that he could endure a witness. She was cunning, and would not trust him without a pawn: a pledge he leaves her, his staff and signet. O that the filthy affection should thus transport a son of Jacob! But in him let us see the easiest fruits of it, fear and shame. Fear he came to pay the hire of his lust, and she was gone: now he fears, lest his own signet should seal his reproach, and to be beaten with his own staff. Shame, purposing, if these evidences were produced, not to own them, and wishing that no other might know them. When the fact appears, and the author cannot lie hid, with that shame, yea horror must he look upon Thamars two sons, the monuments of his filthiness? It must needs cut off his soul to hear them call him Si•• and Grand-sire and Tamar both mother and sister. Shame is the surest and easiest wages of this sin, there is more belongs to it.

He that hath thus fallen, must go to the price of many a tear, it must cast him deep sighs, and the heavy groans of a broken heart. It is not a light and transient sorrow that can do it: the gates of heaven are shut, and every breath of a Miserere will not open them. Their state is dangerous, and there is but one way to help them: to repent what they have done and never more to do wh•• they have repented. If we have admitted such a prostitution of our bodies, let <◇> obtain by faithful penitence such a restitution of our honors. So shall the ga••s of bliss be opened again to us: for God esteems not men as they have been, but as they are.

Vexed.] The last point is Lots case: he did burn in zeal, as Sodom did i• lust: there was fire in them both; his, a holy fire from the Altar of God, theirs, an unnatural fire blown into their veins by the bellows of hell.

Vexed.] this was no ordinary disturbance, nor common displeasure: but oppressed, excruciated, tormented; his senses, his very soul exceedingly afflicted. He was not an idle looker on, as if he minded not what they did: nor in a timorous observation of the Proverb: of little meddling comes great rest: but knowing it to be the cause of God, his heart was perplexed about it. He durst as freely expostulate, as they durst act; and took as full liberty of reproving, as they took licentiousness of offending. He was not vexed with them, but with their deeds: we are to hate none for their creation, but perverting the end of their creation. let us love God's Image, not the filthy defacement of it. Pax cum viris, bellum cum vitis, peace with the person, not with the conditions.

Vexed.] that which is here passive, is in the next verse active; he vexed his righteous soul. He vexed his own soul: who bad him stay there to be vexed? He vexed himself, when he might have quitted himself. Yet because he was vexed, he is delivered. He was but a guest to Sodom, an Host to the Angels: he liked well of their situation, not of their conversation, and found more bitterness in the one, than sweetness in the other. Yet because he avoided their sins, he escaped their judgments. And surely they were both miraculous: for his declining their sins, was no less a wonder than his deliverance from their flames. As the latter was God's gracious prevention, so the former was his prevenient grace: and he was not more bound to bless God for saving his body from the fire, than for saving his soul from their sin.

The nature and quality of this vexation I refer to the next verse. Conclude we with observing and admiring a wonder: a man environed with fire, and not burning; floating on the sea, and not drowning; dealing with dunghills, and not defiled; contemned and honored, made rich by being impoverished. If I should propound a riddle; what is the highest and the lowest: the fairest and the fowlest: the strongest and the weakest: the richest and the poorest: the happiest and unhappiest: the safest and most in danger of anything in the world? I durst not promise with Sampson, new suits of apparel to all that can expound it. It is a true Lot, a good Christian.

He is the lowest of the world, De profundis clamavi? Out of the deeps have I called: so low a hedge that every son of fortune treads him down. Yet the highest, for his conversation is in heaven: let his feet stand upon earth, his head is in heaven.

He is the lowest in appearance to the world; for so disguised with weeping, watching, fasting, that he seems like a bottle dried in the smoke: so laden with reproaches, that he looks black as if he had lain among the pots. "There is no form, no beauty nor comeliness desirable in him. Yet the fairest; black but comely; fairer than all the sons of nature; the delight of Angels, the love of God. Thou art all mine my love and there is no blemish in thee. Thus the face of Stephen appeared like an Angel: the Sun, the Heavens, the Firmament of refulgent Stars are not comparable.

He is the weakest, a Lamb among Wolves, afflicted on this side, oppressed on that: a reed that bows at every gust. Elias under a Juniper-tree, weary of his life: Job on the rack, broken with sores and sorrows. Yet the strongest, being armed with faith, hope, and love, three invincible forces: faith being able to move mountains, to overcome the world: hope an immovable anchor, able to stay the vessel in the greatest storms: love strong as death, undertaking death ⟨◇⟩ the terriblest form, that it may come to Christ. Thus Elias durst face a king, and tell him, Thou troublest Israel. Herodian writes of Plantianus, the Emperor Severus his favourite, that he had such a terror in his countenance, men durst not look in the face. Therefore when he went abroad, he had his Ante-ambulones, gentlemen-ushers before him, to give warning, that men might cast their eyes to the earth at his coming. It is said of St Benedict, that he had such a power of terror in his eye, that casting but a look upon Totilas, that warlike King of the gothes furious and audacious man; he made him tremble. Such a Majesty hath resulted from the face of diverse martyrs, that the tormentors were more afraid of them, than they of their tormentors. They are built upon such a foundation, that all the ordinance of hell can never batter them.

He is the poorest, not only in regard of superfluities, but even of necessities. Moses must not think scorn to keep sheep, nor David to beg bread of Nabal, or Elias to be fed with ravens, nor Lazarus to be glad of crumbs, nor the Apostles for pure hunger to pluck the ears of corn, nor Peter to confess, Silver, and gold have I none, not a penny in his purse; nor CHRIST himself to be so near riven, as to look for figs from a tree in the way, and miss his purpose. Yet still the richest, without meat, not without Christ: sine domo, non sine Domino: what ever he wanteth, he wants not content. And it is no paradox, that a man may be rich with little, and poor with much. Content is the poor man's riches, and desire is the rich man's poverty. Discessit avaritiâ, cessat indigentia: there is no want, where is no wantonness.

He is the unhappiest, for his hands are tied from revenge, his eyes muffled that he must not look upon vanity, his lips sealed that he may not return rebuke for rebuke. He lives in the worldlings paradise, as the Poets feigned of Tantalus; up to the chin in pleasures, and is not suffered to taste them. Touch not, taste not, handle not; what a miserable life is this? Yet, is he the unhappiest; the peace of conscience, being his everlasting Christmas: a joy he hath, which no man ⟨◇⟩ take from him. The African King in Charles the great's Court, offering to be surprised, observed diverse poor men sitting on the ground, and served in mean manner, demanded what they were: it was answered him, that they were the servants of CHRIST. Whereupon he replied, If the King keep his servants so rich, and CHRIST'S servants so poor, I will be no servant of CHRIST'S. They that thus look on the outside of Christians, find small glory to please the eye of sensual reason: it is the Inner man that is fair and rich and blessed, adorned with more Jewels than the eye of the world ever saw, or the treasure of the world ⟨◇⟩ self is worth.

He is in continual danger, his soul being the but for all Satan's darts, his body the anvil for the world's afflictions, he runs thorough many deaths, and is killed ⟨◇⟩ the day long. Thus was Christ himself served; Nec recessit à servo, quod prassit in Domino. When the Jews offered Jesus gall and vinegar; he tasted it but would not drink; he left the rest for his Church, and they must pledge him. Yet still he is safe, under the shadow of God's wings; and when the whole world floats on the waters, Noah shall sit dry in his Cabin. Let Sodom be all on a flame, not a hair of Lots head shall be singed. All the assaults of flesh and blood against them, is but as if glass should encounter Adamant. The great King takes them into his protection, and woe unto all those that attempt their ruin.

This is the Christians estate: now every man would be partaker of the height, not the baseness, of the beauty, not deformity, of the strength, not infirmity, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the riches, not poverty, of the happiness, not infelicities, of the safety, not the danger that waits upon religion. But the comforts of Jesus be not for them that disclaim his sorrows. Joseph had fair possessions in the land of Egypt, but he bequeathed none of these to his children, because they were to have Canaan. So God allows his children but little here, because he means to give them hereafter. Lord, whatsoever requisites be wanting, or troubles abounding, a journey: let our latter end be peace.

VERSE 8. For that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds.

IT is an apparent argument of an ungracious man, that he can with unmovable patience bear the dishonors of God. Hot iron cannot choose but hiss, when cold water is poured upon it; nor a good man but vex at open wickedness. I know there be some will sooner fight in their Mistresses quarrel, than in their Makers: fiery against their own disgraces, cool and remiss in the cause of Christ, as if it were quite unconcerning them. There is no love without zeal $\langle \diamond \rangle$ there can be no heat without fire. Love is strong as death, Jealousy cruel $\langle \dots \rangle$ grave. Take death at the strongest, Christ's love to us was stronger; but $\langle \dots \rangle$ abuse it, that love grows jealous, and that jealousy grows cruel, cruel as $\langle \diamond \rangle$ grave. Our love to him must have the same nature, though it fail of the same measure: that which dishonors him, must vex our souls. Entire love will not suffer it self to be adulterated. No Oile nor frankincense might come into the Iessie offering, because it brings iniquity to remembrance. The ground of Jealousy is extending unto hate upon a just suspicion of a just cause: there is no competition $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Christ to be admitted. Lot loved God, therefore was zealous of his glory, zealous therefore reproved his offenders, reproving he found no amendment, therefore vexed his own soul. Let him be righteous, if he had not dwelt among $\langle \diamond \rangle$, there had been no vexation? let him dwell among them, if he had not been righteous, no trouble: let him be righteous, and dwell among them, if they $\langle \diamond \rangle$ had been wicked, no offense. Be he righteous, and among them, and they wicked, yet if he had not seen and heard their evil deeds, yet he had been free. Yea, generally all these sinister concurrences, if their sins had been few and not frequent, his vexation had been less. But lay all these together; a good man, among the ungodly, seeing their works, and the unlawfulness of them, and the continuance of their lawfulness; he must needs be vexed, and that vexation be of the same extent as was the cause; their ungodliness, from day to day.

The general parts of the Text are two; the Incentives or kindlers, and the fire it self. The incentives are set down by four degrees. 1. Causal or radical, He being righteous. 2. Occasionall, Dwelling among them. 3. Objectuall, their unlawful deeds. 4. Organical or instrumental, In seeing and hearing. For the fire it self consider. 1. The property, it is fervent against unrighteousness. 2. The sincerity, it works inwardly, moves the soul. 3. The rarity, but one among thousands thus vexed. 4. The constancy, from day today. It is not cool, not counterfeit, not common, not mutable.

1 He being righteous.] As in natural things, Simile non agit contra simile, fire fights not against fire, but against water. So in moral things, Innocens non agit contra innocentem, one good man doth not persecute another. If either the Sodomites had been righteous with Lot, or Lot unrighteous with them, here had been no contention. Wolf and Wolf can agree, Lamb and Lamb fall not out; but who can reconcile the Wolf to the Lamb? That good man who was eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame, yet brake the teeth of the ungodly. Faith is the ground of zeal: faith is from Christ, love from faith, zeal from love: nor can faith be discerned without love, nor love without zeal. Intellectus est prior potentia quam voluntas: Faith is first, as the foundation before the building, the evidence before the possession. That which made Lot righteous in Christ, made him zealous for Christ. When the weather is hot, every man opens his mouth: when it is cold, he shuts it, till his teeth chatter again. Where is righteousness, there is heat, where is heat, men will quest and open: I believed, therefore I spake. But where is no heat, there is an imperfect sound, a chattering of the teeth as if men were afraid to speak.

Righteousness, which is the life of the soul, is discerned as the life of the body; by motion, heat, and feeling. If the dishonors of God do not run like goads and poniards to our heart, we are all dead flesh: if his glory do not lift us up with joy, there is no heat in us. Antigonus his son being grievously sick, and none perceiving the cause; when his mother in law entered the chamber, his eyes began to quicken, his blood to rise, and pulse to beat extraordinarily: whereby the Physicians understood the cause to be the unnatural love of his mother. As in that vicious love, so in true holy affection to God, the very mention of his name will make our pulse beat, our hearts incontinent of joy or sorrow; our love cannot be suppressed. Good blood will never bely it self; well-borne children are touched to the quick with the injuries of their Parents: not thus to be moved, is to confess ourselves bastards. This point will fall heavy on some, when it comes to be concluded: that where is no zeal, there can be no righteousness.

2 Dwelling among them.] One reason why God suffers evil men, is to try the good: Virtue is more glorious being set off with vice. Beauty were less admirable, if there were no deformity. Some Canaanites are reserved to make trial of Israel's constancy. There must be Sects, that the approved may be known. They are the best Lilies that thrive amongst thorns. To be temperate in Islands, sober among Germans, chaste in Sodom; this is the praise. Divers have stood with filthy shoes on holy ground; but to stand on filthy ground with holy shoes, here is proof. It is peculiar to heaven, to have never a bad neighbor: only that immortal kingdom hath the privilege of never being tempted. This world is for trial, that to come, for reward. The solitary man knows not himself: he thinks himself good, because he hath no means to be bad. Let him refrain sin yet it is Laus parva, quia laus parvi. He that overcomes the solicitation to evil, holds his virtue in assurance. If I can be patient among my offensive neighbors, chaste among the lascivious, sober among Epicures, modest among impudent railers, just among defrauders, faithful to the Church among the common and exemplary spoilors of it; this argument is of force. The Soldier can keep his station till he be assaulted. When temptation oppresseth, and lust rebelleth, as when a a man's horse curvets, then let him sit fast. When blustering storms of persecutio• shall make a man gird the garment of his religion closer about him; this approves him. True zeal, like fire in a frost, is the hotter for opposition.

Among them that hate righteousness, and him for it: that say of good living as Festus did of great learning;It makes a man mad. They cannot know anothe• to be sober, that are mad themselves. As old men answer the young; you thi•e us fools but we know you are not wise. So answer we these, you think us m•d that are so hot against sins; but we know you mad that are so cold for your souls. Achish and his Courtiers thought David mad, yet he was the wisest man amo•• them. It is not a Nicodemus that the world takes notice of, but a Peter; Th•••s with him in Galilee; they will put him to it.

Among them that thought Lot to be the only man that molested them. A•• can charge Elias with this, and Tertullus Paul. The mutinies and up-roars of the world were fathered upon the Christians in the Primitive times: as the Popi•• traitors decreed to blow up a State, and then to lay it upon the Puritans in these latter days. There can be no cross or judgment in Sodom, but Lot is the m•• that brings it. Yet in all sense he that does but defend himself, is not the autho• of strife. Though the true man strike some blows, yet the thief is he that begins the fray.

Among them that thought Lot a proud and imperious fellow; as Elijah ce•sured David,I know the pride of thy heart. There is no goodness in man, b•• such will ascribe it to vain glory. This opinion of others is derived from a co•sciousnesse of themselves; that would not do one good deed, but to be highly applauded for it. Therefore would not the rich man perhaps help Lazarus, because he feared that as Lazarus died, so his good turn should die with him. No• the Levite succor the wounded man, because it was not in popular view. The Pharisees did all to be seen: now that distressed man was out of the way, nobody to look on.

Among them that thought him a fool for his labor. Tell us of our facts, as if they were faults? Do not all thus? You only against it? Alas, it is but o•e Doctors opinion. That which the world calls policy, eats up true wisdom their discretion and moderate staidnesse devours all true honesty. O say they,Be not righteous over much. But of that extremity there is in these times no fea•e, it is now short shooting that loseth the game. You have scarce one that exceed• for ten thousand that fault in the defect: and it is better to have our broth bo•• over, than be raw: rather go in furs than naked. Liberality fears and •y•s covetousness, rather than prodigality: truth is more suspicious of false-hood, than of vain-glory: zeal is more cautelous of coldness, than of heat: is mo•e afraid lest the fire should go out, than endanger the chimney.

Among them that thought him exorbitant, because he walked not after the•• rule. Often do we hear remiss professors strive to choke all forward holiness, by commending the golden mean. A cunning discouragement, the devils sophistry! Whereas the mean of virtue is betwixt two kinds, not betwixt two degrees. It is a mean grace that loves a mean degree of grace. Yet is this the sta•e with which the world beats all that be better than themselves.

What, will yo• be singular? walk alone? But were not the Apostles singular in their walking?
^m A spectacle to the world: did not Christ call for this singularity? ⁿ What singular thing do ye?
 You that are God's peculiar people, will ye do no peculiar thing? Ye that are separate from the world, will you keep the worlds rode? Shall L•t leave his righteousness, for such an imputation of singularity? Must the name of a Puritan dishearten us from the service of God? Saint Paul said in his Apology; ^o By that which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my Fathers: and by tha• which profane ones call puritanisme, which is indeed zealous devotion;
 so let my heart desire to serve JESUS CHRIST.

Among them that hated the truth, and loved the prophecy of wine, and •trong drink. Such a man may live in quiet: if Lot had spoke peace to Sodom, and •ot the truth, they had brooked him well enough. It is truth that breeds hatred among bad neighbors. Nevertheless I tell you the truth; though it breed sorrow •r anger, or malice in your hearts, yet veritatem dico. I know that in these days to •peake the truth, is to be censured of indiscretion: the world thinks us children or •ooles to hazard ourselves by speaking the truth. Yet we will not square our po•itions to their dispositions, nor forbear to tell what they are loath to hear. In•eed, you will hear the truth, if there be no Nihilominus, nevertheless; if it con•erne you not. But saith Christ, Expedit vobis, better lose your favors than your •oules: and Expedit nobis, to discharge our consciences from a burden of blood. They that flatter you, are your deadliest enemies; that either in furthering sin, or •n smothering sin, spill your dearest lives.

Among these bad men dwelt this good Lot, and still he was righteous. Neither their exemplary life, nor popular exposition, nor powerful terrors, could •urne his feet out of the paths of goodness. It is likely, they endeavored to win him to them, either by rewards or menaces.
 But as when Capellus tempted Fabri•ius, the first day with an Elephant, so huge and monstrous a beast as before he •ad not seen: the next day with money and promises of honor: he answered, I •ear not thy force, and I am too wise for thy fraud: so Lot could be corrupted with neither. But now, if he could be holy among wicked, a Saint among sin•ers; how is it that we are evil among the good, sinners among Saints? He •old be hot when all the rest were cold, and shall we be cold when many are •ot? He was righteous in the midst of irreligion, we in the midst of true religion are unrighteous. We have no interdictions of piety; may be some snuffers to qualify our zeal, and make it burn brighter; no extinguishers to put it out. It is •ot forbidden us to serve God with all our heat, with all our heart. If there be •ome lasie professors, divert we our eyes from them to the gracious examples of •ighteousnesse. Complaine we of trouble? There is no age that always suffered good men to live in quiet. As Saint Augustine said of persecution; Inventus est ignis, qui unum ditet, alterum damnificet, utrumque probet. Were we frighted with •he Spanish Inquisition, wearied with the Turkish imposition, somewhat might be pleaded for our remissness. But he is a bad swimmer that cannot move on with •he current. The Gospel calls us, grace invites us, good examples help us, what •s now left to excuse us, if we be not righteous?

Their unlawful deeds.] Sin is the object or matter of a Saints vexation. It •s the attribute which God gives himself, Ego Deus zelotes, I am a lealous God. Now when we ascribe any human affections to God, we must separate them from •ll imperfections whatsoever. A man may be jealous not out of love, or without just cause, God cannot be so. The ground of his Jealousy is love, the cause of his jealousy, our unfaithfulness to him. We cannot be jealous of God, because his love is infinite, and we need fear no partners. Paul wished this happiness to all his hearers. God's love hath room enough, beyond all measure and comprehension, nor is it diminished by being communicated. How many millions soever the Lord loves, he loves thee and me never the less. But man's love to God is so pent and narrow, and the bed of affection so little; that if we admit a partner, he hath cause to be jealous: another's gain is his loss. There is an obligation of love between the husband and the wife: when he conceives likelihood of any breach, he grows jealous. Love is the ground, and suspicion the cause. If no love, no suspicion; if no suspicion, no jealousy. This is man's torment and rack; nor can the strongest bars enclosing her, ease his pangs. Knowledge is the only cure of Jealousy: there is more misery in doubting her false, than in proving her so. The remedy of known evils is patience; but for doubted evils there is no physic. This spark once kindled will never die, nor can time, that dull and tardy Physician help it; nor can the strictest observance satisfy it. This is the Jealous man's misery: he may prove his wife false, he can never prove her true. The anguish of this affliction is more or less according to his affection.

Thus hath the soul of man plighted her faith to God, and by virtue of this contract, is called his Spouse. If she forsake his holy bed, and run after other love, he grows jealous: not by way of suspicion or doubt, because he knows the heart and most secret motions: but because his honor shall not be given to another. Thus he is Jealous over Jerusalem; and if she prostitute her betrothed love, he disclaims her for his wife: and when he quite gives her over, and ceaseth to be an husband, then he will no more be jealous, as a man divorceth himself from a wanton wife, Cant. 8.6. As the primary nature of God is to be loving, so it is the nature of that love on just cause to be jealous, and the nature of that jealousy to be cruel, cruel as the grave; if before the grave swallow us, repentance do not help us. God is so jealous in the decalogue, that he will not set any creature in the same table of the law with himself. There shall stand neither father nor mother, King nor Caesar, Saint nor Angel, in the same table with God. If we take our lusts into a resolute competition with him, his jealousy will burn like fire against us.

Now that which grieveth God, should also vex us: this hath tried the zeal of the Saints. So was Moses vexed: the idolatry of man made him break the tables of God. So Elias; he durst confront a King, and reprove an idolatrous kingdom. Samuel hews Agag in pieces, Hezekiah rends his clothes at blasphemy, Mattathias sacrifices the sacrificer on his own superstitious altar. It grieved Paul's heart at Athens, to see the town so given to idolatry. Phineas was heard at once of her father in laws death, of her husbands with many others; yet did not all this so afflict her as that the Ark was taken by infidels. It is of this alone she speaks dying: The glory is departed from Israel, for the Ark of God taken. We are no Lots, if not vexed with the worlds unlawful deeds. All Israel saw the boldness of Zimri, in bringing a whore so palpably to his Tent: but their hearts were so full of grief, and their eyes of tears, for their bleeding brethren, that they had no room for indignation. Phineas looked on too, but with other affections. Zimri seemed to him as one that defied the Lord, and flowted the people's sorrow: that while they were wringing their hands, and beating their breasts, he would be dallying with his mistress. His heart boils with a desire of holy revenge: his hand was used to a Censor, but now it shall manage a Iavelin: and with one stroke he joins those two bodies in their death, which were joined in their sin: and in the heat and height of their lust, makes a new way for their souls to their own place. As they were more beasts than any that ever he sacrificed, so their slaughter was the best sacrifice that ever he offered. He doth not stand casting of doubts, who am I to do this? I am a Priest, my office is all for peace and mercy: it is for me to sacrifice for the people, not to sacrifice any of the people: my place is to appease God's anger against them, not to revenge God's anger upon them: to desire the conversion, not to work the confusion of a sinner. Is not one a Prince in Israel, the other a Princesse of Midian, and c• the death of two such persons be so put up? Or if it be safe and fit, why doth my Uncle Moses rather shed his own tears, than their blood? I will even be sorry with the rest, and let them revenge whom it concerneth. No, this holy fire of zeal hath quite consumed all the dross of such deliberation: he holds this execution to be both his duty and his glory. How doth God love this heat in all the carriages of his servants? and if it ever do transport them too far, yet he will rather pardon erring fervency, than luke-warm indifferency. And to show that ⟨◇⟩ pleased him, he presently frees Israel from the plague, and entailes the Priesthood to himself and his posterity for it.

But this holy disposition is not to be found in many. Will you know wh• ⟨◇⟩ ? We think ourselves wronged, and know not how to be revenged; this vex• us. If God do not answer us with rain or fair weather, as we would have it; ⟨◇⟩ vexeth us. The better estate of our neighbor, as if another's preferment were ⟨◇⟩ ruin: the crossing of our unnatural desires, if we cannot have our own wills: ⟨◇⟩ interdiction of our lusts by a superior Law: these things vex us. Volunt homi• ita praeceptum esse ut vivunt, non ita vivere ut praeceptum est. Men would have the ⟨◇⟩ according to their lives, not their lives according to the Law. If the Vs• interest comes not in the same pace that his covetous heart prompts it; this •eth him. To be told that sacrilege is a sin, that our contentions be carnal, ⟨◇⟩ while we maintain strife with our brethren, we have no peace with God; ⟨◇⟩ vexeth us. Private inconveniences take up our vexation, not God's loss. But •ou will be angry without sin, be angry at sin; not with your brother, but with ⟨◇⟩ and your own faults. When you see God's name dishonored, his service pro•ed, his good Spirit resisted, and the Church or family that is named in heaven ⟨◇⟩ earth, wounded; let this vex you. Be vexed at them that are vexed at God •self on every slight occasion: that if their mouths be not filled with laugh• and their bellies with delicates, are ready to break forth into terms of un•iffulness, What profit is there in serving of God? But let the zeal of Lot be a •le to kindle this dead age; so may this Text be as profitable, as it is conveni• for these times. If those Angels were sent again to survey the earth, what o•r news or observation of their travel would they return, but that all the •h setteth still, and are at rest: all are either cold or but luke-warm. Not only •se frozen in paganism out of the Churches pale: but even the most within the •opickes of Christianity have just so much and so little heat, as to think they •e enough and need no more. This end of the world being like the period of •vids life, so old, so cold, that no clothes were enough to keep heat in him. •r spiritual state and condition is like our countries site and position, between ‹◇› torrid and frigid zones, neither hot nor cold. If Lots example may but warn ‹◇› and warm us, to be enflamed with the love of GOD, and hatred of sin; ere my labor ends, your comfort shall begin, and the fruit of both continue ‹◇› ever.

In seeing and hearing.] The eye and ear are those special doors, that let in the heart its comfort or torment. We are not sensible either of the mischiefs ‹◇› pleasures, which we neither hear nor see. Sodom might have continued sinful without Lots disturbance, if their sin had not been exposed to his sight and sense. His soul had been quiet enough within him, if suspicion had not begot mistrust, or experience a manifest proof of God's dishonor. His eyes and ears were unwilling witnesses of their impiety, which he neither would see, nor yet could look off. No man delights to look upon ulcers, unless animo medendi: or to hear the barking of dogs, howling of Wolves, and schriechings of owles; such is the noise of oaths and blasphemies; but Invito cord, with necessity and detestation. There are many things which a good ear would not hear; as his servant cursing him: nor a good eye look upon: Modo non videam, says Hagar of her child; let me not see the death of my son. As the blind Bishop *an*ered Julian, taxing Christ of impotency, that he could not open the eyes of his servant; I am glad that I want eyes to see thee the monster of men. Such was Lots ‹◇› happiness, that he must see and hear their wickedness. From this instrument means of his vexation we may observe diverse things.

The sight of sin makes a man either sad or guilty: if we see it, and be not sorrowfull, we are sinful. If Lot had not now been vexed at them, God had been vexed at him: on such a cause not to be angry, had angered heaven. Eli heard ‹◇› his sons impiety doubtless with grief enough, but not with anger enough: therefore he is punished with hearing of their destruction, that was too remote in hearing of their transgression. It is unhappy to make another's sin become our own, by a fond indulgence: he that sees evil without dislike, do not ‹◇› see it without fault. They are not true hearted that stand by without drawing ‹◇› weapons, against the notorious oppugner of holiness. ^k Meroz is cursed ‹◇› Angel, because they came not forth to help the Lord in the day of battle. They ‹◇› the armies, and heard the drummes of those proud adversaries, gave the loan, took part with neither: they fought not against God, yet because they ‹◇› fight for God, they are cursed.

Such are dough-baked Christians, too clammy for the stomach of ‹◇› whom he hath borne long, yet but wamblingly. Shall we hear blasphemy, ‹◇› uncleanness, and hold our peace? will the LORD digest us in such a ‹◇› while the fields and tap-houses beguile the Temples; curses are offered up ‹...› of prayers, vain expenses for alms; and we see this, are not our souls grieved while men pray as if they were asleep, and hear Sermons as dead men do funerals; it would make a man sick to see God thus worshipped. But alas, ‹◇› do men rage at those that find fault with others, or endeavor to be good themselves? Let a sparkle of fervent devotion break out in a family, all the neighbours are up in clamours; as when the bells ring disorderly, every man is ‹◇› with his bucket to quench the fire. Disgraced they must be for Puritans, but ‹◇› by Laodiceans. Indifferency strives to dash zeal out of countenance. But 〈...〉 hear and see evil, and dare not reprove it, cannot amend it, yet let us grieve for 〈◇〉 that we be not guilty of it.

The most offensive sins are such as be objected to sight and hearing. The• a sin that does only furere in orbe suo, is mad within doors, without admit•••ny witness but the inevitable ones, God and their own conscience. But sins th• 〈◇〉 secret to man, we leave to him to whom all things are open: they be only 〈◇〉 evils that vex the righteous. When all Israel rings of the lewdness of 〈◇〉 sons, it is high time for their father to be grieved. Spiritual and internal sins 〈◇〉 be majoris culpae, corporal and outward be majoris infamiae. Take an insta• while God was angry, all Israel grieved, the heads hanged, the people plag••d▪ a Prince dares brave GOD and them all in that sin, which he saw so g••ously punished before his eyes. Here was fornication, a nodious crime; and 〈◇〉 of an Israelite, whose name imports holiness: and that of a virtuous Pr•e• whose actions are so many rules to others: and that with a Midianite woma•, 〈◇〉 whom it had been unlawful for him to marry; this in the face of *Moses••*verning, of all Israel mourning; even while they were yet bleeding and weeping 〈◇〉 the same offense; how monstrous was this impudence? But because he 〈◇〉 Prince, he thought he might sin by privilege; who dares control me? 〈◇〉 nobleness sets him above the reach of Justice: it is easy for the greatness of ••thoritie, to bear out the smaleness of piety. Commonly the sinners of the m••ty are mighty sins; therefore their destruction is made answerable to their pres••ption; and their vengeance so much the greater as was their conceit of imp•.

In this example we read the sins of the world; blasphemy is audible, d••kennesse visible, oppression sensible: we hear them, see them, feel them: th•• 〈◇〉 no gall of zeal in our souls if we be not vexed. How can we not be ashamed 〈◇〉 them, that are not ashamed of themselves? A wicked man thinks he may live 〈◇〉 of danger of the Law, if either he have a great man to his friend, or have 〈◇〉 great man to his enemy. Pride would be out of request at home, if notice 〈◇〉 not taken of it abode. While sin hides it self in corners, there is some hope: 〈◇〉 there be shame, there is possibility of grace. But when it dares once look upo• the Sun, send chalenges to authority, defy heaven and earth; the ulcer is desperate, the member fitter to be cut off than lanced.

He did not see and not see, hear and not hear. Connivence at rank imp•••e is bad in all men, intolerable in some: such are the Ministers of either Gospel 〈◇〉 Justice. For Preachers, if they wink, the Wolf may prey on the Lamb cold Preachers make bold sinners. But we have cause to tremble when we consi•er, that God will in some sort reckon with us for the religion of our people. Let •ere be fire in our lips to consume the dross of vices that are fallen into the sink •f our times. When the whole City is secure, it is our parts to mourn for •eir abominations. The evils, the devils of these days will not out but by •equent preaching, and fervent praying. Shall we be mutes in the midst 〈◇〉 so many raging consonants? not as loud for God, as they for Baal, for An••christ? We see wickedness, we hear it: O let us pray it down, let us peach it •wne, out-face it, out-live it. Let us be within and without Preachers: the •eights of the Sanctuary by the law, were to be double to those of common use. ••lior sanctus idiota, quàm doctus nebulo. How gracious be their feet, not only their •s that bring the Gospel! Because their feet must walk in the way which they •escribe. It is good life that must accompany doctrine, as lightning doth thun••r. Fire in the preaching does well, but water in the Preacher to quench it by •ample does ill. Infirmities are in all, but rank and resolute sins become not •ose that find fault with the like in others. In all respects, and by all means, let 〈◇〉 make it appear, that God's glory is our only scope; therefore we dare not •t rebuke sin, as men preferring the winning of souls before the winning of •e world.

Connivence is yet worse in Magistrates: we can but reprove it, they must •orrect it; and open wickedness is too stubborn to be chidden out of count••nce; it is well, if sharp whipping can reform it. No scarlet robe so well be•mes a magistrate, as one made of zeal. Bee wise ye Judges, yea also, be just ye •dges: some are so wise that they dare not be just; nor punish less offenders, for •e lest great offenders should punish them. I know there is a wisdom requi••d to distinguish of offenses; and true Christianity takes no delight in blood. If Magistrates were only to kill, the devil might have been put in sole Commissi•er. It is a breach of Justice not to proportion the punishment to the crime: for •eft, rapine, adultery, sacrilege, to say no more with Eli, but why do ye so? •his is true connivence; to shave the head that deserves cutting off. A weak •argation doth but stir the proud and tough humors, and anger them, not drive •em out. To whip one for murder, or to burn treason in the hand, or to lay pecuniary mulct upon Incest; is in effect to patronize evil, not to punish it. Bare proofs do but encourage wickedness, and make it think it self as easy as is •e censure. Like vehement showers to a ripe field, which only lay the corn •t is ready and worthy of a sickle.

Moses did put the Idolaters to the sword: it was his mercy that made him •s cruel: all Israel might have cursed him if some had not smarted by him. Do •t our Magistrates hear and see idolatry, blasphemy, sacrilege, profanation • Sabbaths? are there not laws for castigation? why then be these impieties •ffered in the face of heaven? Doth not want of execution make all laws like •eat bells without clappers? The Magistrates sword should not be like a child's •gger rivetted in the sheath: a sword, saith Paul, not borne in vain. When they •nish malefactors, they are said to Consecrate their hands to God. The judges •untenance should be Like a Northern wind, to dispel the fogs of sin. The •ngs of the earth are charged to render double to the bloody strumpet of Rome: •hy then do her Locusts increase and multiply? God grant our too much pit• never undo ourselves. There are two special causes of this connivence in sub•dinate magistrates; cowardice and covetousness.

Cowardice and timorousness is a quality too base for eminence. Should •h a man as I flee? Saith Nehemiah. It is the want of courage that betrays the •th; while men are more careful of their own quiet, than of God's glory. So•ons Throne had carved Lions; not Foxes, Apes, nor Wolves: no toyish, petu•, deceitful or ravenous things; but majestic Lions: no dastard fear is admitted to that seat. Magistrates have iron Gantlets, and need not fear children blows. Moses seeing the sin commands them to punish one another, and they do it: None replies; he is but one, we are many: we may more easily destroy him, than he can destroy our God. Aaron durst not resist us in making it, and sh••• he withstand our keeping it? Not so, God hath set such gracious characters of majesty in the brow of authority, that guiltiness dares not look it in the face. They stoop to the basest and bloodiest revenge he should impose. Sin is so conscious of it self, that when it is brought forth to trial, paleness and fear ⟨◇⟩ betray the guilt, and it will rather seek a hole, than a hold or fort. If the horse in a teame be shy, the Carter fenceth his eyes on both sides, that he may lead the way fore-right without starting. Let the Magistrate rectify his loo, and only bend them directly upon Justice: a squint eye, cast upon persons, ill ⟨◇⟩ comes him. Let him look no side-way, neither to the left hand for fear, ⟨◇⟩ to the right hand for favor.

Covetousness is a vice, which makes a man of place transgress for a me of bread. It blinds the eyes of the wise, much more of the foolish: of the rigorous, much more of the covetous. When a malefactor shall give him so ⟨◇⟩ gold for a Say, you saw me not; then as if he had the Jews curse upon him: ring he will not hear, & seeing he will not perceive. A gift is as a precious stone, whosoever it turneth, it prospereth. A prosperous stone, as if he meant the Philosophers stone, so much in quest and request; a charm more powerful than witches night-spell. The building of great houses keeping great houses, or rather leaving great Houses, and matching with great Houses, are too frequent occasions of injustice. When a small office shall swell up a great estate, the world ⟨◇⟩ needs swell bribery in it. The ambition to advance their own house, blows ⟨◇⟩ their zeal to God's house. Job compares Justice to a Cloake or Robe: a Cloake is; but the Cloake that hangs, like our Gallants, on one shoulder is quickly blown off: a Robe it may be, but a loose one, some night-gown, that is soon put off. Many say, they discharge a good conscience, and so they do in some sense, they discharge it quite away. Justice is called a Girdle, to girt all other virtues: but it them take heed lest it sag and bend to the side where the purse hangeth.

4 Sodomes sin was so much the more heinous to God, for offending ⟨◇⟩, and vexing the heart of his servant Lot. Iniquity then exceeds it self when it grows scandalous. Woe unto the world because of offenses: when it is not enough for men to be bad themselves, but to rail at the good. If there be one in a company that abhors impious language, they will blaspheme on purpose to vex him. They had better have sunk into the Ocean, bound to a Mill-stone. They ⟨◇⟩ their tongues like razors, not only to shave a man, but to cut his throat; but ⟨◇⟩ Lord shall cut them out. Thus Popelings hiss like serpents at their mother; ⟨◇⟩ like Shimei, not only by word of mouth, but in their railing and lying Pamphlets. Many a good man may say. I became the song of the drunkards. Ask the dissenting-schools, if no such doctrine of hell be heard there. While we play ⟨◇⟩ David's harp to ease their griefs, they cast their Speares and Iavelins to wound us. What Paul bids Put from them, they delightfully call to them. Serpents ⟨◇⟩ only deaf to our charming, but turn their tails to sting us.

Nor let the great ones, whose authority should punish these abuses, take to scape: there be often pasquils to cast aspersions on their noble names. When as honor is a curious parcel, guilt, laid on with God's own finger, which ⟨◇⟩ lewd tongue may scandalously lick off. For us, our contempt is not enough, ⟨◇⟩ lest it be chanted in rime. It is Joseph's party-color'd coat, composed of all li•c•s of graces and blessings, that procures their hatred. Such is the worlds despe•• policy, to vex them whom God hath blessed. But the Lord takes them into h• special tuition; and if any shall hurt his faithful witnesses, there goes a ⟨◇⟩ their mouths to devour their enemies. Destroy all them that afflict my soul, ⟨◇⟩ David: not that he would have it so, but because he knew it must be so. A man ⟨◇⟩ better anger all the witches in the world, than one of the Saints: for God of• forbears offenses against his own Majesty, when he plagueth offenses against ⟨◇⟩ little ones.

He that would not be vexed with evils, let him turn his eyes and ears an•er way: be not fond to be grieved; no man is bound to seek his own vexati• Therefore Nunc te melioribus offer; let us frequent their company, where in •g and hearing we may reap comfort. But how shall we know them? They •e not such marks, as Du Bartas describes Cain's supposed horse: and he may •eive others, that cannot but deceive himself: yet the wise heart may discern •m. By the innocence of their actions, sobriety of their speeches, disesteeming •e, coldness after pleasures, ardor in God's cause; you may distinguish them; •y sparks rising from a heap of embers, you may know there is fire within. ⟨◇⟩ did the Saints leave such repining tumults; and resort to places of sanctity ⟨◇⟩ benediction. If we fall, here be they that shall raise us: if we stand, that shall con•ne us: if we complain that shall comfort us. Sorrowes divided among many, ⟨◇⟩ borne more easily: many small brooks meeting and concurring in one cha•, will carry great vessels. By their reproofs we shall know ourselves: we ⟨◇⟩ blind in our own imperfections, therefore we borrow the eyes of our friends, •ing them ours; so we mutually direct and correct one another.

There are two helps to goodness; the praises of an enemy, and the repre•sions of a friend. He that shall take from friendship the liberty of a modest ⟨◇⟩ roof, leaves nothing to distinguish it from flattery. To see men in troupes •he Courts of God; to hear the melodious harmony of his praises, the vol• ⟨◇⟩ of invocations sent up to his glorious Name, to behold the charitable contri•ions to the poor, the holy emulations to exceed in good works; all like bees •ouring to bring honey to the hive of the Church where wrongs are pardoned, •d men encouraged, the Gospel honored, and the will of God obeyed: O •e is an object worth our seeing and hearing, which instead of vexing, shall de•t our righteous souls: lifting up our desires to heaven, where all good works ⟨◇⟩ done with perfection: where we shall see and hear what we shall never be •ry of seeing and hearing: see the glory of God, hear the melody of Angels, ⟨◇⟩ joy of all Saints, and be both ravished in the pleasure, and confirmed in the e• take ternitie of them.

To conclude; we that have grieved others, let us now be grieved for it our •es. It was an impotent and childish passion in Honorius, to be more grieved for •ltry hen, than for his Imperial City. Yet if we can more lamen the de•ture of a friend into bliss, than the departure of CHRIST from our own •es: and be more heartily troubled with a convulsion of body, than with dis•esting our conscience: if every trifling inconvenience of our own have pow••o rack us, when the dishonor of God cannot move us; wonder we no more •onorius. We may howl for corn and wine, but in vain: our true tears and sobs •uld be for our sins. We are yet in the day, yet in the way: let us husband •ht this blessed opportunity, the only certain hour of our visitation. O let •ot play out the candle, and go to bed darkling: nor consume our lives in folly ⟨◇⟩ go to the grave in ignorance: like boys that slubber out their books before ⟨◇⟩ have learned their lessons. That sudden conversion of one at the last, was never •nded in God's purpose for our temptation. If every man should run on in sin, •e meet unexpected mercy, because one in sin obtained mercy: then every man •ght as well spur his beast till it speak, because Balaam's beast did once speak.

Could we be sure that God would call us at the last, yet how unsweet were ⟨◇⟩ sacrifice, the bran and dregs of our dotage; the wine and flower being con•ed in folly? whereas the good man is the older the better, as CHRIST kept ⟨◇⟩ good wine till the last. If we repent when we cannot sin, all is necessary: they leave us, we leave not them, nothing is here voluntary. What q•y i• ⟨◇⟩ lay the heaviest burden on the weakest beast: to force old age, too weak to b•ae it self, to carry the load of our repentance? When that strong man is gro•e• stronger by prescription, our tabernacle rotten by corruption, when ⟨◇⟩ hath turned vice into nature, and sin is soaked into substance, our bones being ⟨◇⟩ of the faults of our youth; we would then repent; we would if we could. ⟨◇⟩ as he that never went to school, will hardly when he is put to it, read his N•• verse: so he that never learned the doctrine of repentance in his life, will find it •ry hard, if not impossible, at his death. Wine at first drawing is quick and l•ely; when it runs low, it grows dead. Let us give God our youth, that is l•elyhood, and pleasing to him: not when our life runs on the tilt, the lees and ⟨◇⟩ of old age. Heaven is not unlike Ahasuerus Court, no mourners are suffered thee all joyful guests in their wedding garments: we must either mourn on earth, ⟨◇⟩ mourn in hell. Thus we that have vexed the Spirit of God, and the eyes ⟨◇⟩ ears of others by our sins: let us now please the Spirit of God by our repen•an• and rejoice the eyes and ears of others by our amendment. Wretc•ed ⟨◇⟩ we defer our rep•ntance, wretched if we repent not our deferring. Let us •pent as soon as we can, yea and repent for this, that we have repented no so••. In a word, howsoever in indifferent things, it be held safe to hear and see, ⟨◇⟩ say nothing; yet in gross and scandalous evils let us not be silent; so if we c••mend others, yet with Lot we shall save our own souls in the great day of Ch••.

Vexed his righteous soul.] I come from the kindlers to the fire it self. Ze•• is a fervency of spirit, arising from a mixture of love and anger, say some. It • not a single affection; that were to confine it, rather than define it: there are ⟨◇⟩ affections excercised in it than love. Nor yet is it a mixed affection; that were r•there to compound it, than comprehend it. It is not one affection, nor many, ⟨◇⟩ a fervent hear of all: as varnish is no one color, but that which polisheth all ⟨◇⟩ makes a man to love what he loves, excessively: to desire what he desires, pass•nately: to hate what he hates, deadly: his sorrows be not remiss, but bitter ⟨◇⟩ racking: his joys not transient and overly, but ravishing: when he hopes, his eyes are dim with waiting: when he fears, all his bones feel a trembling a•d shivering. To be cold or luke-warm is not an affection, but a constitution ⟨◇⟩ zeal is no nature, but a temper; a spiritual heat wrought by the Holy Ghost improving all sanctified affections for the glory of God. As the spirits are to the body, and wine to the spirits, and quicknesse to the wine, so is zeal to the $\langle \diamond \rangle$, making it vigorous and strenuous in God's service, like a Giant refreshed $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Faith and zeal are the souls two wings, whereby she is made resembling the Angels: who are armed with wings, and called a flame of fire, for their burning and flying execution of God's hests. It is zeal that help us to do what we pray; $\langle \diamond \rangle$ will of God in earth as it is done in heaven. This zeal is axis & cardo, the $\langle \diamond \rangle$ blood that runs in every vein of the Text: a burning fire in the heart of Lot $\langle \diamond \rangle$ gives him mettle to contest with God's enemies; and because he cannot $\langle \diamond \rangle$ them, he vexeth his own soul. His example teacheth us three observations $\langle \diamond \rangle$ zeal; that it doth prove our righteousness, improve our righteousness, and honor our righteousnesses.

It is the argument of a righteous man, to be far from coolnesse in his makers service. Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might. D• this become us in other things, and mis-become us in the worship of God? S• a man eagerly follow his lusts, and not be violent for the kingdom of heaven $\langle \diamond \rangle$ The slothful hastens his own beggary in temporal things, much less shall he $\langle \diamond \rangle$ rich in the graces of Christ. He hath but a mean skill in the most excellent art is never admired: a man had never better poetise, than only rime; never paint, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ do no more but daube: as good no religion, as coldness in the best religi• Shall we, like those Jewish elders for the Centurion, be instant for a friend, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ cold for our heavenly father? He is worthy of infinite more love than we are able to give: all our brooks and springs of affection ought to run into this main; •ot one small chanell be suffered another way. Let all reflect upon him, and •othing be respected out of him, of whom, for whom, and through whom, are all •hings.

How unbrookable is dullness in any work to a man of spirit? A heavy and •lt-less oration is insufferable to a quick hearer. We single out the forwardest Deere in the herd, choose the liveliest colt in the drove; and think we the back•ardest man fit enough for God? will he that is all Spirit, be pleased with a lea•en and drowsy service? He bids the giver, give cheerfully: the doer, do •uickly. He forbad the Israelites to offer the firstling of an Ass: why so? •oth God hate the Ass? No, but for the quality of the creature; it being the •ieroglyphicke of slowness: to show that God cannot abide tarditie in his busi•esse. It is lazy to go, we are bid to run the way of his Commandments. As •iles to the ship, and wind to the sails, so is fervency to righteousness. A souldi• without courage, a horse without mettle, a creature without vivacitie, such is a •hristian without fervency.

It doth also improve righteousness; like the fire which came down from •eaven upon the sacrifices, causing the sacrifices to ascend thither in acceptance. •ighteousnesses hath no grace, but this fervency makes it more gracious. Repen•nce is one primary grace; yet if a man's sorrow be not fervent, it is like a hot •ummer-shower, that makes the streets stink after it. Faith is a fundamental •race, should overcome the world; it will prove but a coward without fervency. •ope, the waiting-maid of Glory, will soon fall a sleep, if zeal keep not her •yes open. Love without fervency is cold and dull, and as it were enforced; and •on extorquebis amare. Reliefe of the poor is left-handed without this; no re•ard belongs to it. It is only fervent prayer that prevaieth. Israel had never wrestled, or wrestling, not prevailed with God, but by fervency. It was no •erfunctory devotion in Moses, that caused the Lord to answer, Let me alone. No vapors ascend up from the Still, unless there be fire under it: nor prayers •each heaven without the heat of zeal. Fluminall baptism is but a cold proof •f a man's Christendom, except this flaminall baptism of fire and zeal ap•rove it. The worship of God without this, is like meat dressed by an uncleanly •ooke; it will not down with him. Let a table be furnished with the choicest •ands the season affords; if they be boiled or roasted to the halves, or stand on •e board till they be luke-warm; the guests will not be pleased with their cheare.

Fervencie is that mark which God would have us set on all his services, that ⟨◇⟩ they may be discerned to be his own: as the name of a famous Tradesman doth •ll his commodity, so the mark of zeal crowns all our works. If the color •e pale, the motion insensible, and the pulse leave beating, we give a man for dead: •e moving of these argue life. They whose actions want heat and color, that •ive unwillingly, that do Justice constrainedly; appear dead. It is fervency that •aches a difference of actions▪ we have all alike precious faith, the seeds of all gra•es are in every convert: the inequality is in the degrees, the degrees are seen in •e fervency. This makes men differ in grace, as stars do in glory, or as human •en in blood and dignity.

It honors righteousness: many thousands have been righteous, whose •mes are not on record: but of those that have been zealous in their piety, the •cripture takes special notice. Our Apostle having spent one whole verse upon •e commendation of Lots fervency, in vexing himself for their sins, is not so con•nt; but exegetically presseth it further, exemplifies it in particulars; showing •hat a righteous man is better than his neighbor. The righteous are the best of the •orld, the fervent are the best of the righteous. It is true of zeal, as of fire; the •ture of it is to multiply, as one coal kindles a whole heap, and one torch lights many. Elisha calls Elias, The Horse-men and Chariots of Israel: in the plural number, to show that he was Instar multorum, one man worth a thousand: doing Go• more service than a Jesuit doth the Pope, or a make-bate the devil. It is not ••likely that David's zeal made him styled, A man after God's heart.

But do we thus honor our righteousness, that God should honor us? If ⟨◇⟩ the same time come several news; one, some loss of our own estates; the other, of some apostated Christians: which doth now most vex us? We he•e ⟨◇⟩ once God's Name blasphemed, our own name traduced: which most stirs us? We perceive trade decaying in England, the religious Professors of the Gospel• bleeding in France and Germany by the sword of a cruel enemy; which of these goes nearest to our hearts? When some unruly yonkers were sporting in the field on the Sabbath day; a Churl fretted and stormed at it; an honest neighbo•• did also dislike it, that they so little regarded the Sabbath: tut, quoth the other, what tell you me of the Sabbath? It vexeth me, that they have spoiled my come. In carnal things we are very sensible; in spiritual, without feeling. Men ca•y swords, and stand on terms of reputation, on the least cross word they a•• ready to cut one another's throat; confessing their lives to be little worth, not so much as a word. Let God be dishonored a thousand ways, they are as s••p• as the stones they walk on: if they take any part, it is against their Maker. Be the honor of their own house questioned, their weapons fly like lightening: let God's House be pulled down to the ground, all their help is, to carry away the timber and the stones. They heat the furnace seven times hotter in their own cause, than they do in God's cause.

But will the Lord multiply his favors upon such? Husbandmen cast the seed on the fruitfulest ground, which will return them the best harvest: and God his graces on such as will improve them. When Judgment covers the earth who shall then be delivered but the zealous Lots? God will preserve them as men do their plate, while they let the baser stuff burn. For their fervency in goodness was Enoch translated, and Elias advanced in a triumphant chariot to heaven. How ever all Believers have their places in blessedness, yet he rewards all according to their works, observes that congruity in crowning his own graces; that the most zealous in this world, shall be the most glorified in the World to come.

Vexed his soul.] As this was no common fervency, so no counterfeit: he little dissembles whose soul is moved. Zeal, like the King of Israel, hath many shadows, therefore we must distinguish it from all semblances. There be false fires, which while they usurp the honor of it, rather bring an ill name upon it. How common a thing is it to wound all holiness under the name of Puritan; whereof convinced, they think to make amends with, Crie you mercy, I mean the hypocrite: as the ruffian strikes a man first, and then excuses it, that he mistook him. Besides, it cannot be denied, but some have taken on them this order, greater than the Knights of Malta, or of Saint John of Jerusalem; that have disgraced it by an unworthy deportment of themselves. And some, after it hath served their turns, leave it: as the door when it hath been oiled, leaves the creaking. For their sakes, the name of goodness is blasphemed all the day long, an ill report and suspicion raised upon them that serve God in truth: so for the deceivers fault, the true man is beaten. There is in the body the native and radical sin, a principal Instrument of life: and there be often anguish and distempered humors that cause sickness and death.

There be some that vex themselves out of envy: Lot did not so. The Poets fain this affection, ex Styge & Pallante natum esse: they meant inspired into me by Satan, and those envious devils. This is a black Zeal, reckoned among the works of the flesh. These are not pure tapers, shining clear, and giving light: but brinish and ill made candles, that sparkle and spet at others. Lot vexed himself, because he saw men bad; these, because men are good: not that God's Law is broken, but because others keep it better than themselves. It is the cursed zeal of these men, to malign the good zeal of all men.

There be that vex themselves out of choler; robustious men, transported with intemperate passions. We do not read that Lot was cruel and turbulent, vexing others: but he vexed himself. Severitie should never be but by compulsion, and then not without compassion. Christianity abhors cruelty, and rather wisheth with that happy Queen, that it knew not how to write a sentence of condemnation. It is for the malignant Church to satiate her self with gore: nothing but fire and fagot, is the voice of Rome. This is a wolvisch fervency, to feed on no diet, but the warm blood of the Lambes. Poor Sheep are the subject of their tyranny: to the Lyon they are as submisse and fawning as dogs: over the best they rage and domineer, like the Sea in a storm. Whereas the thunder spares the yielding purse, and melts the resisting metal: descends not to the low cottages, but strikes the towering pinnacles. The sons of thunder dare check the highest and greatest; as John did Herod, and Jonah Nineveh. But these, like bustards in a fallow field, cannot raise themselves, sine vi turbinis, without a whirlwind. And then like squibs in a throng, they fly out on all sides. This turbulent fervor bred of two causes: the defect of love and humility, the excess of passion and imperiousness. As Spirits, that being once conjured up, scorn to keep within their own circles. A wild-fire, no harth can hold it; it is mettle in a headstrong horse; and runs like the weights of a clock when the spring is broken.

There be that vex themselves without cause, and strike an Israelite instead of a Sodomite, their friends for their enemies. A contentious zeal; Sheba blows a trumpet, and suddenly they are up in arms. Alas! against whom do you fight, ye sons of debate? Brethren against their own mothers children? You are brethren, wrong not one another in the sight of your Father, in the arms of your Mother. What way is this, but to advance the name of Mahomet in the Temples of JESUS? But to come nearer home; how hath Anti-christ got ground by our dissensions? The unnatural coldness of some, and the preternatural heat of others, hath set us together by the ears about trifles; while the common enemy breaks in: and we have poured those vials of indignation one upon another, which should all be spent upon the seat of the Beast. While the Devil can busy men about ceremonies and circumstances, he hopes they will let him alone about the principal, which is faith and manners. Alas! they are not Tanti, not worth our vexation; we have made him too much sport already. How doth Saint Paul eat down their weapons! Rom. 14.4.10. Let our zeal come in to part, not to partake the fray: all endeavoring and praying, that peace may be within the gates of Zion.

There be that vex themselves out of hypocrisy; they have other ends than God's glory. Ostentation leads them more than conscience: they will offer violence to nature, wring out a show of fervency; but all is on the stage. When such a furious Orlando hath done his part, he is quite another man. These be histrionical professors, that bounce at the gate as if they would break down the house; more violent than a Jesuit in the pulpit. There is nothing more liable to suspicion, than a fantastick affectation of zeal. A horse-courser's jade will bound, curvet, and show more tricks, than a horse of good mettle. Come, see my zeal for the Lord, says Jehu: his word was, for the Lord; but his project was for the kingdom. It is not a little art, to hide Art: let me tell them that love to be marked for the religious, by the white of their eyes, audible sighs, unfashionable garments, (as if this were, not to fashion themselves to the world) by conspicuous places in the Church, and ruffling their leaves for proofs: that the best zeal is to hide zeal. The Preacher in the pulpit, or the painter in the windows, must proclaim their benevolences: this is far from Christ's rule. Comets make a greater blaze than fixed stars: reed, than substantial fuel. A Fever breeds flushes and is more seen in the face, than natural warmth at the heart.

There be that vex themselves out of ignorance, for there is a zeal not according to knowledge. Thus a devout Papist vexeth himself, that his adored Idols should be held as puppets, and that the Popes Supremacy is curbed. The Separatist vexeth himself, that all reformed Churches receive not his Innovation; that his Sect-master should not be set at the stern to guide the whole vessel. Blind they are, and led by the blind; whose errors they first imitate, then inheri•e. Out of this ignorance, Satan hammers them like swords and pistols, to raise tragedies; till they become, like the Turks Janisaries, his best soldiers. Here is a pitieable fervency, like mettle in a blind horse, or a sting in an angry be. If the•• eyes were opened, and their zeal directed, they might be special Instruments of God's glory. The Stoics would pull out the gall and bowels, as if they had to use to serve virtue. Not so, they are bad masters, but good servants. Let anger remain still, but stand in awe of reason: as a soldier, that at the command of ••s Captain takes up, and lays down his weapons. There are three affections $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the soul, like three mineralls in the earth, Salt, Sulphur, and Mercury. Wit is like salt, Sales ingenii: anger like sulphur: affability like Mercury. These w•• tempered and allayed, are necessary and helpful, otherwise noxious. If wit wh• it self to justify mischief; if anger be not qualified by reason; if affability tu•ne to flattery; if all be not directed by knowledge, they run to danger. Wh•• the ship is under sails, with a fair way, and a fore-wind, then look to the s••age, keep the watch, have an eye to the compass and land-marks. The A•gels are said to have eyes to guide their way, as well as wings to maintain their flight. Turn Paul's zeal to the right and he did not so much hurt before, as now he will do good.

Thus true Christian fervency hath diverse counterfeits, which brings ho•• zeal into suspicion with the world. But shall men tax all the Apostles, beca•• of one Judas? or admit no fire into their houses, because some sparks are ••ruly, and will not keep their own harths? The very name of a counterfeit presupposeth an original: he that hears of a false CHRIST, takes it granted $\langle \diamond \rangle$ there is a true. Slip-coin warrants us that there is of that stamp current money. The best drugs have their adulterates: and let not men that have been deceived by base colors, despise those that be died in grain. This we may safely co•clude, that that virtue which even hypocrites put on to grace them, is qu•s•io•less some rare and admirable thing. The true Lot, whose fervency is in the Spirit, not in show: in substance, not in circumstance: for God, not for himself: guided by the word, not by humor: tempered with charity, not driven with turbulency: such a man's praise is of God, though it be not of men: and through all• contempts on earth, it shall find a glorious reward in heaven. But as Saint Pau•aid of his country-men, I bear them record, that they have a zeal of God, but not ••cording to knowledge. So I must invert it of my Country-men, I bear them record, that they have a knowledge of God, but not according to zeal. Now the Lord rectify our zeal by our knowledge, and heat our knowledge by our zeal; that every man of a Philemon may be made a Zealots; of a faithful servant on earth a glorious Saint in heaven.

That righteous man.] This is the singularity of his zeal. One Lot will be righteous amongst and against all Sodom; and express this righteousness in the midst of their vicious customs. It hath been the Lot of fervent holiness to be rare, as to be excellent: adherents may hearten, opposites must not dash zeal out of countenance. It is the common Remora to all forwardness of profession, the small number of such: why should I attempt more than others? Few indeed there be that stand with all their might for religion, and few there be that shall be saved. He is unworthy of heaven, that will not live well without company, not do good but by example, nor move a step before his neighbors. Cowards stand still looking who should go first: and they are mere lades that will not go except the way be led them. He was a brave and bold Israelite, that first did set his foot into the chanel of the sea, leading the rest all along that moist and uncouth walk: he a soldier of courage, that first mounts the breach. Yea, resolute spirits will cast lots for the on-set, and show willingness to desperate services.

The fear of trouble is a poor hindrance to godliness, where faith looks unto the preserver, and reward. The fearful stand in the fore-rank of them that are cast into the lake: they have been most backward to goodness, therefore shall be foremost in vengeance. The timorous snail puts out her horns to feel for danger, and pulls them in again without cause. It is an ill modesty that suffers another to out-go him in the way to bliss: like some travelling lade, that hearing another horse come after him stands still till he overtakes him. True faith neither fears to do well, nor to reprove those that do ill. But there be few so good? Yet Lot was good alone, none to go before him, none to go with him, none to come after him, in all Sodom. No man can say so with us, for we see some zealous of God's glory. And if there be any; true emulation will single out the best patterns. How dearly is one content to buy a choice principal, or some rare copy! He that intends to be a good Artist, propounds to himself the most exquisite master and lesson. God limits us to no ordinary stint of holiness; but bids us aim at perfection: if we can, to go beyond all that have gone before us, yea to come (if possible) close up to Christ. From this point we may well gather three duties.

1 So near as we can to make choice of the good; for man naturally produceth works conformable to the objects before his eyes: as Jacob's sheep brought forth Lambes according to the color of the pilled rods. A good example hath not so much power to make us good, as a bad one hath to make us evil. One man sick of the plague will sooner infect ten sound ones, than ten sound men can cure him. The flocks feeding among the bushes will leave some of their wool behind them: it is hard to live in the forest of impiety, and to reserve integrity. Sin upon earth is in its own soil, grows without planting, or any pains bestowed on it: much more when it is manured with applauses and practice. But virtue is like some precious seed fetched from Paradise, which will hardly grow here without special care and indulgence. It is not safe venturing among the wicked in confidence of our own strength; no more than it is to run among thieves, in hope that they will not rob us. How many breathe in this world, like men sleeping in a boat, carried down the stream even to their Graves-end, without waking to think where they are? Therefore Eorum simus sodales, quibus licet esse similes: if we may be our own disposers, seek we our lot among the righteous. The situation of Jericho may be good, but the waters are naught: he that goes from Jerusalem to Jericho, soon lights among thieves; to leave holy company for base commodity, is a quench-coal to righteousness. Can one be warm alone? Can one single coal keep it self from going out? He that forsakes the orbe of heat and fervor, the congregation of Saints, must needs take cold.

2 If like Lot, we be necessitated to the society of bad people, yet let us be good still; yea therefore the more holy, because in the midst of a perverse generation, shining as lights in a dark place. The colder the climate, the more piercing the air, the more doth a man's natural heat fortify it self within: their palpable wickedness caused Lot inwardly to vex himself. Every visible act of vice should be our encouragement to virtue. The dissolute lavishnesse of many prodigalls makes the wary man still the better husband. And it is the trades-man's policy, by engrossing a commodity in the plenty and neglect of it, to enrich himself when • year of dearth shall come. It made Erasmus more studious, by seeing the Monks such illiterate dunces: as the good knife is made sharp by the dull whetstone. The Christian will be good and devout, like Daniel, though alone: though with the Emperors and the worlds Non licet: though he seem a prodigy among men, digito monstrari, the pointing of all fingers. Esa. 8. Ver. 18. We are fo• signs and for wonders in Israel. Signs and wonders, where? even in Israel. If it were a wonder to see a family serving GOD in Israel, what is it in Sodom? If a miracle in Jerusalem, how much more in Babylon? But as he that stands upon a hill, where the air is clear, and sees the fields round about beaten with tempests, the valleys full of fogs and mists, doth not seek to change his station for being alone, though he be remarkable to every eye. Let our hearts be aloft, fixed on Christ; and albeit we are exposed to the worlds derision, yet we shall bless God for our deliverance from the worlds malediction.

3 Let us follow the examples of the best, not of the Most. Who had not rather be righteous with one singular Lot, than perish with all ungodly Sodom? Neither have we him alone, but even a cloud of witnesses, that have been faithful among the dissolute: a Pillar of fire (in many blessed precedents) that went before directing us the way to Canaan. The Church is full of those holy acts and monuments: the confession of Christ before Pontius Pilate, the profession of the Apostles before the worlds tyrants, the bold testimony of the Martyrs at their stakes. O let the very pictures of their fires warm our hearts, and inflame our constant zeal to do, and (if God will) to die as they did, that we may come to the place where they are. If we find a living Lot among us, fasten we our eyes upon him; let his sprightly example put us forward. He is a dull Iade that will not follow: a brangling hawk in the company of high flyers will mend her pitch, and make her point: the society of the Prophets is able to make even a Saul prophecy. Yea, let us learn to be righteous even by a man of meaner grace: a good mettled horse seeing but a Iade in the company put forward, springs out and is scarce restrained. No free spirit but is ambitious of a transcendency in lawful endeavors. At S•las coming, Paul burnt in the Spirit: a lesser stick may fire a billet, a little candle lights many torches. But these great examples, how should they work in us grea• zeal! Soe the Stoics defined zeal; Imitatio alicujus boni sine invidia. Th••Alexander: was stirred up with the fame of Achilles, Caesar of Alexander• Cicero with the eloquence of Hortensius, Demosthenes of Isocrates. The ze•• of the Corinthians provoked many: let this good man's provoke us, that we may provoke others: helping them that come after us, as we have been holpen by those before us, toward heaven.

From day today.] This is the constancy of his zeal; it was not mu•ab•e. The fixed stars are ever like themselves, whereas meteors and vapors have no continued light: the wicked may have some aguish fits, and lunatic moodes. To run with the stream, or sails with the wind, or like the marigold to open only with the sun-shine, is no praise of piety. Give me that Job, that will be as hone•• a man among his thousands, as under the rod, when the number of his present ••cers exceeds his former riches. To shoot up like the corn on the house top, by the favorable influencie of great persons: for a Saul to prophecy no longer tha• he is among the Prophets:

or for a Joash to be good only while Jehoiada lives: that which depends upon human supportations, is but like Ephraim's, a transitory goodness. Thus you have some rash riders; at their first exeunt they gallop a main, till within some few miles they tire, and are overtaken by the slow pac-horses. The hasty girds of profession are seldom durable, sudden showers have sudden ends. And whereas the Sun and all natural motions are swiftest toward their end, these begin hot in the spirit, and conclude stone-cold in the flesh. Their religion is but a blaze, which quickly goes out in smoke and smother. True fervency, like the vestall fires, or the fire of the Altar, is never extinguished. To be hot today, and cool tomorrow, gives little assurance of Lots fervency.

Would we know the means to maintain a constant righteousness, to be good, yea better from day today? 1 Pray instantly; prayer and zeal, like water and Ice, naturally produce one another. Fervency enliveneth prayer, and prayer increaseth fervency. At heaven-gate he that does not knock mainly, knocks vainly. This God will hear, yea, if it should want a tongue, so it want not a heart. As Christ, though he heard not Zachei verbum, yet he saw Zachei votum: he perceived his desire to invite him, therefore invited himself. Thus he breaths more grace into our soul, that breathed our soul into our body. 2. The ordinary •well to maintain it, is Preaching: Sermons being so many bellows to increase •his holy flame. 3. Reading the word hath a special place: no devout soul ever returned from that exercise, but his soul was more warmed. 4. Meditation perfects the rest. Meditatio docet quid desit, oratio obtinet ne desit. Contemplate that infinite Majesty; the apparition or shadow whereof fired Moses more than the burning bush. Let but the unfolded heavens give way to Stephens eyes, to behold CHRIST in the glory of his Father, how willing is he to ascend by that •tony passage! These be the accustomed meals of the good soul, that will •eepe natural heat from decaying. When thou goest to bed, rake up thy fire, wrap up thy devotion with prayer; so in the morning thou shalt find it ready to cheer thy heart.

Discontinuance of good duties hath lost men much virtue: to bethink the cause betwixt God and ourselves only by snatches, when we have nothing else to do: or to read the Bible by fits, only upon rainy days: here may be a smack•ing to maintain table-talk, but not enough to keep life and soul together. Let not men plead want of leisure, they have somewhat else to do: for there is one •hing necessary, to which as to the Kings business, all the rest must veil and stand by. From our most serious labors we can steal some hours for our pleasure: is •here no time to be spared for God and our soul? O that men should think one Sabbath more tedious than ten Holy-days! Nor let those flatter themselves with •ufficiencie, that present themselves in the Temple twice every Sunday: let God have some of the devotion at home, and by themselves. The kings ordinary ser•ants do not only wait on festival days, but are always ready in the presence to be commanded. True love is most passionate without a witness: he that humbles himself before the Lord alone, betwixt them two disburdens his heart, weeps, prays, begs mercy, hath some proof of his Christianity. Our families, beds, boords, walks, and meetings must witness our devotion so well as our Temples: this is the daily work of Christians.

I know the soul hath it's satiety as well as the body; and fire may be oppressed with too much wood: nor doth God so require men to serve him, as to be unmerciful to themselves. He that hath done his work honestly, may go to play bravely. But this is rare, to find a man offending on the right hand. Nor let the crucifixions of Sodom cool this religious heat: a wise man will not be scoff'd out of his money, nor a just man be flowted out of his faith.

One caution; when we have thus heat ourselves, let us beware of taking cold again. The fire is put out either by the subtraction of fuel, or pouring on of water. Sin is the quench-coal: he that voluntarily admits it, or does not suddenly repent it, endangers the cessation of zeal. When we have done a sin, till we repent truly, we serve God but coldly. He whose very hunger hath tempted him to steal a lamb, says but a cold grace to his supper. How the oppressors and defrauders of this City give thanks to God for their wealth, I refer to your thoughts and their own consciences. Sin is worse than a thief in the candle, or obstruction in the liver. A deadly sin clapp'd on the heels of late devotion, like a sudden cold after a violent heat; dangerous, if not mortal. Let us beseech him that hath begun a good work in us, to finish it: that we be not vexed with sin today, and pleased with it tomorrow: but that our lusts may drop from like leaves in Autumn, and our graces enjoy a perpetual spring, through the peace and life of all goodness, Jesus Christ.

Thus I have run thorough the main scope and other passages of the Text; and yet some further instruction remains, if your good construction will admit it. Three things I take leave to consider; a Question, an Illation, and a conclusion.

Lot was vexed in soul,] inwardly grieved; but was his zeal confined to his own breast? Did he smother it from the Sodomites? How could they then be convinced of their crimes, or know his dislike of their soul courses? Certainly, that holy man did not keep it in, but manifest it to them on all just occasions. Fire in Jeremiah's bones will make him weary of forbearing; and new wine, if we have no vent, will burst the vessels. We may justly suspect that zeal, that is never manifest: let men talk what they will of their honest hearts, whilst they have dumb mouths and lame hands. Faith will open the lips, and he that loves God cannot but speak for him. Nichodemus was but cold when he stole to Christ by night: but when he buried Christ by day, his fervor broke forth like unsuppressed love. It was hardly enough for Obadiah, to hide his religiousness in his bosom, as he did the Prophets in a Cave. Profession is the relative to faith: With the heart we believe, with the mouth we confess. Some confess and believe not, such are hypocrites: some believe and confess not, such are timorous cowards; some neither confess nor believe, such are Atheists; some both believe and confess, these are sound hearted Christians. Fire cannot be smothered, it will either find a vent, or go out: true righteousness never wanted words or deeds to declare it self. David often professed not only to praise God, but in the great Congregation: both ad supplemendum defectum, & excitandum affectum alterius: for them that cannot, and for them that will not. 〈◇〉 Hast thou faith? have it to thyself before God. What then? Be present at mass, communicate with the wicked in their idolatries; because faith may still be firm before God? No, Paul speaks of the faith (not quae ad dogmata pertinet, sed de rebus medijs) that concerns indifferent things: otherwise, he that expresseth not his faith before men, hath denied the faith before God.

Earnest affections will find a tongue: if it be low water, the mill may stand but a strong current will set it a going. If the spring of zeal be wound up in the heart, the wheels will be kept in motion. It is not enough to keep our religion within doors, to tumble over a few Orisons while we are dressing or undressing ourselves, half a sleep, half a wake: nor to observe a short perfunctory form and stint, as mill-horses do their round, or pack-horses their pace: Such coward-soldiers are not for CHRIST's Standard. They must be those dare hazard themselves to many troubles; a fire not quenchable by the worlds buckets, but consuming their own and others corruptions. So Chrysostom conceives the Apostle, as a man made all of fire, walking in the midst of stubble. The sluggard hears of a Lion, and quakes: tell Sampson and David, they will go out to meet him. Let Agabus tell Paul of bonds at Jerusalem; he answers, I am ready only to be bound, but to die at Jerusalem, for JESUS. The horse neighes at the trumpet, the Leviathan laughs at the spear. Tell Luther of enemies in Wormes, he will go, though all the tiles of the houses were devils. To carnal friends he says, I know you not: to disswaders, Get you behind me Satan. Four comely things are commended by Solomon, to which we may add a fifth, stronger than the Lion, swifter than the Gray-hound, nimbler than the Goat at climbing upwards, more victorious than a King; it is a resolved Christian, who armed with faith and zeal, disdains all resistances in his journey to the Kingdom of Heaven.

If the Sodomites be so condemned for vexing a righteous Lot, what deserve they that vex the true Lot, Jesus Christ, the Righteous, with their unlawful deeds? Is it not enough that we have once put him to death, but that we must again renew those wounds, and being healed set them bleeding a fresh? The Jews were but the instruments of his crucifying, we are the principalls: they cried, Crucify Him, in the court of Pilate: our sins cried, Crucify Him, in the Court of Heaven. Ours, I say, not the reprobates: for as his death was not efficient to save reprobrates, so their sin was not sufficient to kill Him. To despise the blood wherewith were sanctified; this comes near him. If we ask him concerning his former wounds, he will answer, Thus was I wounded in the house of my enemies. But if, concerning these new incisions, by blasphemies, oppressions, &c. he will answer, Thus was I wounded in the house of my friends. The least unkindness of a friend pierceth deep: My own familiar friend did me the mischief. Our vexing of him is far worse than the first: his body was then passable and mortal, now it is glorious and immortal: the Jews knew not what they did, we know it and yet grieve him: then he was dead and buried, but he rose again; we bury him in forgetfulness not three days, but all our life, excepting only his mention.

The torments of his passion were unconceivable, in comparable, intolerable: it appears by his protestation, that the least willful sin of a Christian doth more vex him, and strikes more to his heart than all those dolorous pangs. It is that sin still that keeps him on the rack, and (though he be out of the reach of sorrow, yet) does what it can again to kill the Lord of life. What pleasure do we take in grieving him that is the life of us all? Call not thyself the friend of CHRIST, if thou delight in that which tormented him. Think of this, you swearing, whom nothing can persuade to be civil, to be men, I say not, to Christians. You swear away your salvation, curse away your blessing, vex the Lord that bought you. If nothing can assuage your rancor and hell-bred malice, know it had been better for you that there had been no Christ. His first death was for your redemption, but the many deaths you now put him to, is for our greater damnation. If your blind souls could consider this, it would not only lifie your hearts for the sins past, but also terrify you against sins to come or fatter yourselves, that he shall do you good at your death, who have misdeem all your life. When that fearful hour comes, you would all then faint to heaven and that by Christ: alas, as that despairing Pope said, the Cross would do him no good because he had sold it away: so how should Christ do who have railed him away? you have vexed him so long as you lived, lest shall vex all the veins of your hearts when you are dead. The a man to God, the more heartily he detests sin: now if Lot, a man who in with many infirmities, were thus vexed with iniquity; what an it be to the most righteous God, and Him that died for it, JESUS CHRIST.

If Lot were so vexed at others sins, how should we be vexed at our own? For is required a sorrow of compassion, for ourselves a sorrow of compunction. Some we come home to a self-condemnation; we, we have dishonored God, therefore to be vexed at ourselves. What is repentance but contrition, what is contrition a vexation? we that have sinned with Sodom, let us be vexed with Lot. If Lot not repented his own sins, he had never grieved for theirs: if the Sodomites had been thus vexed, they had not perished. We have sinned what shall we do unto O thou preserver of men? What, but repent and amend? Repentance is the proper medicine for sin; as God hath ordained a salve for every sore. A medicine which cureth the eyes and nothing else, we may say was made for the eyes and nothing else. A man loseth his wealth, and is sorry for it: will sorrow recover He with his child, and is sorry for it: will sorrow raise him from the dead? He suffers injury, and is sorry for it: will sorrow right him? Himself is the, and is sorry for it: will sorrow heal him? Nay, will it not rather hurt him? sorrow then was not made for these things. He hath sinned, is he sorry for that? sorrow now will help him, repentant sorrow will take away his sin. Sin is then sickness, for which sorrow is the remedy. Direct this lesson to your hearts, before you go home to your houses, and digest it before your dinners: have troubled hearts, vexed with sorrow for your sins. Many a one comes into Church a dissolute sinner, that goes out an humble Saint; why should I not hope much of you effect? This were a blessed of a Sermon; when the fruit of one hour is no less than eternity of days. A square piece of metal, molten and cast into a round mould, comes out round: a piece of blew put into the scarlet fat, comes forth scarlet. Remember our Savior's sentence of sin; *vel paenitentium, vel perendum:*¹ Except you repent, you shall perish. If the child cry it lives: so if we can heartily cry for our sins, there is life in us. Thus let us be grieved, that we may be comforted.

VERSE 9. The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished.

Profane people conceit GOD to be all of mercy, and cannot to hear of his Justice: or if they be convinced to acknowledge also Just, yet they measure it Secundum parvitatem

suam, by the po••tie of their own Judgment; and think it pity to destroy a man for his sins. Indeed it pleaseth God to be magnified by his mercies above all his works: and ⟨◇⟩ never find him called the Father of Judgments, but often the Father of ma••. Mercy seems to be more properly his than vengeance: for he takes the man•• a mercy out of himself and his goodness: Sed quod judicat & damnat, nos cum ••damodo cogimus: but that he punisheth and condemneth; our sins compel ⟨...⟩ it. But both are infinite in him that is infinite; and as mercy hath her day in give••• time of Repentance, so Justice must have her day in the retribution of vengeance. All sins are debts, all God's debts must be paid: it is a bold word, but a tr•e•• is in vain to hope for pardon without payment. Every sin must be pu••• either in the person of the Savior, or in the person of the sinner. Too many •••kon their own sins, as the false Steward did his Masters debts: of a hundred, they set down but fifty: as if God would call them to account, because he knew the• faithful. Thus they may hide God from themselves, but they cannot hide the•selves from God. Do they think that God will be so kind to them, as to be ⟨◇⟩ to himself? No, the Lord will be just, let them go on and perish. There c•• ⟨◇⟩ no reconciliation without remission, no remission without satisfaction, no sa••sfaction but in the blood of Christ. Turn over the book of thy conscience, see ⟨◇⟩ thou canst find that reckoning there discharged. We keep books for expenses, do we keep none for offenses? He never breaks his sleep for debt, that p••s as he takes up. But careless arrereages shall find a day of reckoning.

That God is not just without mercy, nor merciful without Justice, this Text proves; which speaks of a Deliverance to the godly, to the unjust of Vengeance. God indeed isslow to anger, yet he will not acquit the wicked. So that a man sh•• say, Verily there is a reward for the righteous, surely there is a God that judgeth the earth. A man, any man, every man shall confess it, none have power to deny it. This is our Apostles conclusion upon the premisses: God could preserve the holy Angels by his mercy, and confound the Apostate Angels in his Justice: in his mercy saveth righteous Noah, when by his Justice he drench'd the unrighteous world: Justly destroyeth four ungodly Cities, and mercifully delivers one just Lot. He that could do such mighty works, in heaven, on earth, in the waters; can as easily still deliver his children, and reserve the unjust to the day of Judgment to be punished.

The verse contains a pair of thwart sentences, directly opposite, in quality of persons, conditions, and events. Here is the Godly and unjust: a delivering, and Reserving: out of temptations, into Judgment. God stands in the fore-front, and hath •woe arms stretched forth: one arm to the East, another to the West: one to de•iver the godly out of trouble, the other to inflict severe punishment upon the wicked. Here is an Enlargement, and an Attachment: a delivering out of prison, and a casting into prison: a releasing from present perturbation, and a binding over to a further Session. The godly are acquitted, absolved, freed; not reprieved, but quite delivered. The unjust are apprehended, bound over, go as 'twere under baile: at the general Assizes they must make their appearance, and being guilty receive their sentence. This the Judge can do, and will do: he wants not power, for he is The Lord: he wants not wisdom, for Novit, He knoweth. His Almighty wisdom, and all wise power, are extended to both these actions, The Lord knoweth. The righteous proceeded thus far, they come upon their trial; for temptation is a trial: but not to arraignment, much less to conviction, least of all to condemnation. But being charged by that common Barritor, the accuser of the brethren; and thus brought before the Judge, not publicly at a Session, but to a private examination, they are found innocent, and delivered. Temptations, like fetters, may hamper and afflict them for a while, but when their cause comes to be heard, and their righteousness appeareth, they are discharged. For the other, their guilt is manifest, therefore the chains of bondage are upon them, which together with the custody of omnipotency shall keep them fast to the day of Judgment, and that shall send them to execution, to be punished.

In the enlargement consider these particulars. 1. What, a deliverance. 2. Who are delivered, the godly. 3. From what, out of temptations. 4. By whom, The Lord doth it. 5. How; we need not examine, it is sufficient, Dominus novit, The Lord knoweth how.

First, the matter is a Deliverance. It is a great comfort in every distress, to hope for a deliverance: to believe it, greater: to be sure of it, greatest of all. Thus certain is every Christian, by the assurance of faith, grounded on the infallible promise of God. It was promised to Abraham, in Isaac shall thy seed be called: yet must Isaac, before he had seed, be killed; and that by his fathers own hand. Here Abraham might reason; I may believe the promise, and not obey the commandment: I may obey the commandment, and not believe the promise: but how can both stand together? But he holds the promise, and obeys God, though all the reason in the earth cannot tell how that promise and that commandment should stand together. Though I know not, and reason know not, yet God knoweth. In human reasoning it is a note of ignorance to stick always to the conclusion: but in spiritual trials this is sound Divinity, to hold fast GOD'S promises. Therefore he both believes the one, and obeys the other: this Deliverance was above his reason, it was not above his faith. He did not argue, but obey: being sure that what GOD commands, is good, and what he promises, is infallible: therefore careless of the means, he trusts to the end. Daniel is not delivered at the beginning of his trouble, he must first be in the Lions den; then he finds it. Those three servants are not rescued at the ovens mouth; in the furnace they are. That is a gracious well tried faith, that can hold out confidence to the last.

Abraham after that terrible command, must go three days journey, a tedious extension of his sorrow: and in all that travel no Angel meets him with news of a deliverance. He sees the chosen mountain, dismisseth his servants; a strange devotion that will abide no witnesses, none comes yet. All the while the Altar is a building, his own heart bleeding; Isaac pleading for his life, none yet. He binds his hands, lays the wood on the Altar, the Sacrifice on the wood; yet no news. Now having kissed him his last, after many mutual tears, he lifts up his hand to give the fatal blow of death: yet he does not think, perhaps God will relent after the first wound. Lo, now the comfort of Abraham, the hope of the Church, lies a killing by the hand of his Father; yet there is no revocation. I would have made the bowels of a Savage yearn at this spectacle; to see the knife of such a Father hanging over the throat of such a son: yet he whom it nearest concerned, is least touched: faith had wrought in him, what cruelty would in others, not to be moved. He proceeds, contemning all fears, and overlooking all impossibilities: deliverance he might expect, but he knew not which way it could come: only that the same hand which raised Isaac from the dead womb of his Mother, can revive him from those ashes. Now having given Isaac, and Isaac given himself, for dead; the knife is falling upon his throat: Now, now comes the Deliverance; by an Angel calling, forbidding, commending him. Often is deliverance promised, and yet the time not mentioned. They shall serve the 〈◇〉 of Babylon seventy years: not a day, not an hour to be bated, Exod. 12.41. At the end of four hundred and thirty years: till then Moses undertook it in vain, D^{••} 5.30. That very night. Neither did Daniel, that knew the determined time of seventy, till upon the expiration, pray for deliverance.

God defers His deliverance. 1. To return us home: when no man 〈◇〉 harbor that unthrifty son, he will back again to his father. 2. To make a seek our deliverance in the right unde: while money can buy physic, or friends procure enlargement, the great Physician and Helper is not thoroughly trusted 〈◇〉 to. 3. To set a better price on his benefits; for suddenly gotten are suddenly forgotten. Abraham's child at seventy years was more welcome, than had he been given at thirty: and the same Isaac had not been so precious to him, if he had not been as miraculously restored, as given: his recovery from death made 〈◇〉 〈◇〉 more acceptable, than if he had never been in danger. God's charges are 〈◇〉 harsh in the beginning, hard in the proceeding, but the conclusion is always comfortable. Spiritual consolations are commonly late and sudden; long before they come, and speedy when they do come, preventing even expectation.

The Lord defers on purpose, that our trial may be perfect, our deliverance welcome, our recompense glorious. Say our temptation be externally afflict^{•••} and we are not delivered from it: our poverty is long, and we shall never be 〈◇〉 our sickness tedious, and we shall never recover; what now? Shall we desp^{•••} and die? No, but whether he doth deliver us or not, We will serve Him; though^{•••} He kill us, we will trust in Him. Though he hold off long, and suspend our 〈◇〉 yet deliverance shall come; if not the same way we would have it, yet a way that is better for us. Shall we be sullen, because our desires be not presently granted? As Jonah would die, because he was displeased: Achitophel, because he was de^{••}sed; Saul, because he was discomfited. No, death it self shall deliver us; that red Sea shall put us over to the Land of promise; and we shall say to the praise of God, we are delivered.

The persons delivered are the Godly. Godliness (according to the propriety of the word) consists in two things; the devout adoration, and sincere imitation of God. They that worship him as he will be worshipped, and follow him in the things wherein he will be followed, are right godly men. He that worships God aright, adheres to the rule, and believes the reward. Superstition first loves, and then believes: true Religion first believes, and then loves.

Reverence and zeal become adoration: for a man to mouth a Pater-noster, while his heart is 〈◇〉 〈◇〉 is coffer; as if he could reconcile those two contrary masters, and at once serve God and mammon; in vain thinks himself godly. When in the Temple God •arce hath our knees or our voices, seldom our minds; never tell me of godliness. •ou are not Atheists, to think that he regards your prayers, as he doth the humming of flies and bees; that they be so formal and heartless. The godly man •owes that God sees him, sees him in every place, takes special notice of him in •e Church. Caesar's eye made his soldiers prodigal of their blood: God's eye •d speech to the soul, Well done good and faithful servant, makes him work out •s heart. Loose thoughts are too bad for common places, intolerable in divine •orship. We may observe how God bates of his own service for us; allows ⟨◇⟩ to go from his Temple to quench a burning house, or to help a beast out of •e pit; and makes homicide the greatest sin upon earth. Now shall he bate of •s own glory for our benefit and shall not we bate of our benefit for his glory? •hey that either for wantonness or covetousness, much worse for drunkenness, •olate the Sabbath, which is the time of God's worship; or neglect the Church, •hich is the place of his worship; have little godliness. We are charged to wor•phim in spirit and truth. The Jews worshipped him bodily, we must also in •rit; they figuratively, we in truth.

Nor is adoration enough without Imitation; it is the sum of all religion, imitate him we adore. He was called a Platonist, that followed Plato's princi•es: and he that follows the example of God, is godly. Outward holiness •ust be joined with inward; a man may be a Saint at Church, and a Devil at •me: true godliness is seen in our own house as well as in God's house; he is •re short of godliness, that is not an honest man. It is shame for Christians to •rne honesty of Pagans; and yet they say, some of us are a form below them. •e may know whose children such are by their complexions and conditions: ⟨◇⟩ that doth righteousness, is righteous. It was not enough by the Levitical law •hose ground was moral to chew the cudde, but to divide the hoof: our feet •ust be clean as well as our mouths While the worship of God sits in our •s, and the dishonor of God is seen in our lives; we might as safe be wholly clean. Some have the mark of the beast in their hand, some in their fore head:•e•her in the fore-head, or in the hand, so it be his mark, it is all one to the De•l. This commended Job, that he feared God; that's one part of piety: that eschewed evil, that's the other. The doctrine of faith is much controverted; •d while Satan can raise troubles about faith, he hopes the world will let him a•ne about manners; and so that Christi nomen periret de terris: but it is a counter• faith without obedient and practiall godinesse.

God's word is first sown in the heart, that seed is rooted in faith, that root •ngs forth a tree of charity, and that tree bears the fruit of good works. Our •sons are justified by our faith, our faith is justified by our charity, our charity ⟨◇⟩ the actions of a godly life. Therefore justify thy faith, that thy faith may ju•fie thee. Faith is an Illumination, and many content themselves with an illusion: we want charity to our brother, there is no faith to our maker. Some lose them •es Vituperando Christum, as Pagans: some Etiam laudando Christum, as pro•e Christians: these so praise his merits, that they never weigh their own mis•meanors. But do good, and have good: little says the Scripture of the Apo•s learning, it speaks much of their acts. It is not the taste of meat that nouris•th, but after concoction the benefit is in the strength. The conscience is not sa•fied with reading good things, the comfort it feels is in the practice. Children •e after their father; thus to show mercy, is to be godly. Forgive your offenders •hy? God doth forgive you: be as ready to pardon men, as you are ready to de• your own pardon of him. He that walks under a wall in a sunny day, shall •heated by the wall, which first was heated by the Sun: if God have forgiven ⟨◇⟩ the warmth of charity is in us to forgive others. Be ye holy: Why? because God is holy: if we find a piece of wax with an impression or mark upon it, we know there hath been a seal, the print whereof is left behind: holiness is the print of God's sacred seal: if not holy, not sealed. God is patient toward sinners; furious avengers of themselves are not godly. He is the God of peace, the sons of malice and contention are far unlike him.

We see who are godly, now these are delivered: they of all men, out of temptations; because they of all men are most subject to temptations. The higher a tree shoots up, the more tempest beaten: if a Christian grows to any stature and tallness in grace, and sprouts up toward heaven, Satan will raise the sorer storms against him. Some are not troubled with temptations, know not what they mean; ask them, they never felt the devil so busy about them. The more miserable creatures they: no Prince makes war against his obedient subjects: should they rebel against Satan's laws, they should hear of him in another kind. $\langle \diamond \rangle$ as God said in his Justice; Ephraim is joined to Idols, let him alone: so Satan in $\langle \diamond \rangle$ malice, they are joined, united, incorporated to sin, let them alone. They meddle not with repentance, and he meddles not with them; all is peace. Let them take it for the fearful sign of a dead heart, when they feel not the Thorn $\langle \diamond \rangle$ t^h flesh, temptation. Fall they to deprecation, cry for pardon of their sins, and seek the kingdom of heaven; then Satan begins to bustle, then temptation upon temptation: Job had not more foes to vex him, than they shall find baits to entice them. Therefore CHRIST on purpose, to the Pardon of sins, annexeth, lead us not $\langle \diamond \rangle$ temptation. Not only because with the pardon of sins past, we should desire $\langle \diamond \rangle$ prevention of sins to come: that neither our consciences be stung with the old nor our concupiscences corrupted further with the new. But because a man's $\langle \diamond \rangle$ be no sooner forgiven, and he rescued from Satan; but that Lion foames $\langle \diamond \rangle$ roars, and bestirs himself to recover his loss. So that grievous temptation $\langle \diamond \rangle$ always accompany the remission of sins. Some suspect themselves to be out $\langle \diamond \rangle$ God's favor, because they are so wearied and worried with temptations: but godliness and temptation be such inseparable attendants on the same person, it is otherwise. For the devils hatred is to them most, whom God loves best: $\langle \diamond \rangle$ where he shows mercy, Satan will exercise malice. So that in the characters of temptations we may spell God's love, which cannot be enjoyed without some disturbance. Yea, howsoever weak consciences have been dismayed at it; $\langle \diamond \rangle$ proof of saving grace in us, is the exercise of the devils malice against us

They that receive from God more graces, are sure of more temptations. $\langle \diamond \rangle$ God testify good of Job, the Devil will have a fling at him. If Peter have $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the keys, Satan will tempt him to be a Satan to his master. If there be home the vessel, the wasps will be busy about it. But as no wise man leaves his $\langle \diamond \rangle$ for some flies, but rather seeks to drive them out, than they should drive him $\langle \diamond \rangle$ so no good man forsakes his holiness for temptations, but rather resists the devil, as knowing then he will fly from him. A full barn is better than an empty one though thieves let this alone, and be pilfering about the other. We do not destroy our roses for the cankers, but rather destroy the cankers from the roses as no policy for the traveler to leave off his weapons, because he knows the thieves in the way. We say, one true man is hard enough for two thieves, one faithful man is able to repel many wicked spirits. Our godliness doth not 〈◇〉 us from temptations, but conquers them. CHRIST was no sooner come 〈◇〉 of the water of Baptism, but he enters into the fire of temptation: if he be 〈◇〉 of the holy Spirit, he shall be set upon by the malignant spirit. If God say, Thou art my son: Satan will say, If thou be the Son of God. That Divine testimony did not allay his malice, but exasperate it: the Serpent most violently afflicts 〈◇〉 whom God hath honored.

Neither the gifts of grace, nor the seals of grace, can free us from affairs we may have force to repel bad suggestions, we have not to prevent them. The more we are engaged to God, by the bonds of our own profession, and the pledges of his favor; so much the more busy is the tempter about us. That Goliath defies none but the Host of the living God: if we be once seen in the field, then he is mad, and seeks to wring away our weapons, and with them to wound our own bosoms. Lord, how should we scape that Dragons assaults, when the Son of thy love could not be free! When even to be gracious draws on his enmity, and the profession of a good conscience, is the Butt for his burning arrows? He that spared not the Head, will not forbear the remoter limbs. If the state of Innocency could have been any defense against evil motions, the first Adam had not been tempted, much less the second.

Nothing should more comfort us than resistance: if we did not stand for the Lord; Satan would not stand against us: if we were not in a way to do good, we should find no rubs. The devil hath no cause to trouble his own, especially while they go about his business. To sin, he would have our paths smooth, and calm, and pleasant, winning us forward: but if we turn our feet toward Zion, then he encounters us, and blocks up our way with temptations. But it is not the presentment of bad motions that can hurt us, but our entertainment of them. Ill counsel is the fault of the giver, not of the refuser: if we be tempted, as Joseph was by a great Lady, and withstand it, we are not the worse, but the better. We cannot forbid lewd eyes to look in at our windows, we may shut our doors against their entrance. If Satan knock, it is in our choice to open: a booty lies in our way, we may choose whether we will stoop and take it up. To suggest evil, is Satan's blame: to resist evil, this is our praise. The more we are tried in the furnace, the purer gold we shall go to the Treasury of Heaven. Lord, make us as strong, as the devil is malicious: say in a sweet spiritual feeling to my conscience, as Thou spakest once vocally and audibly to my Savior; Thou art my Son; and let the devil do his worst.

Temptations we understand to be of two sorts; Probations, or Provocations; trials of suffering, or trials of doing. God tempts, to draw something out of us, and to make it appear; Satan tempts to put something into us which was not before. It is one thing Explorare an sit peccatum, another Provocare ut sit peccatum. The former we may properly call Examinations, Searchings, Afflictions; these are of God. The other, Incitements, enticements, impulsive motions to sin, these are of Satan. Now this promised deliverance stands in analogy and reference to both these.

For Satan's suggestions; What godly man hath not been wrought upon by temptations; not only to like the bait, but even to swallow it with consent of will! Yet hath it not choked their grace, God hath delivered them. Look upon David; 2 Sam. 11. While his people are busy in the war against Ammon abroad, Satan as busily makes war against David at home: they lay siege to Rabbah, he lays siege to their King. The temptation first takes fire at his eyes, his eyes recoil upon his heart, and his heart burns in the desires of his lust. The tempter so prevails, that he makes him become a tempter, bestowing his own bad office upon him. He sees Bathsheba, inquires after her, sends for her, solicits her to uncleanness. There was store of fair Virgins in Israel, yet he must dote upon the marriage-bed: he had many wives of his own, and was not restrained from taking more; yet is not contented saving with the only one of a subjects. He was not overcome by the solicitation of a strumpet, but himself was the prosecutor of this filthiness. There is nothing wanting to amplify his sin, and cause our fear. O whither shall we go, if God stay us not? What man among the millions of God's servants was better furnished with preservatives against such temptations? Where could the Devil have less hope of prevailing? Yet is this strong man overcome; and as it is hard and rare to commit a single sin; he does not only abuse the wife, but betrays the husband, and teacheth his lust to look with bloody eyes on the life of his faithful servant. If wine cannot woe to father a false seed, the sword of an uncircumcised Anatomy shall fall upon him. Thus deep in is David, and falls asleep many months, exchanging the conscience of his sin for the sense of his pleasures. Yet even out of this temptation he is delivered; Nathan shall rouse him, the Spirit shall melt him, his own heart shall smite him; with a wounded soul he shall cry for pardon, d. wickedness and find mercy.

In this glass we see ourselves, how apt to be tempted, to go along with it, yea often to persist in it; yet withal, God's infinite goodness to deliver us from it. For this we pray, Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil: the latter being an exposition of the former: that we be not led into temptation, deliver us from evil; the cause being taken away, the effect ceaseth. The best of God's children may not only be drenched in the waves of sin, but even lie in them for a time; as a man may sink twice to the bottom, yet rise with life in him. But they that belong to the covenant, shall be delivered: Saul is tempted, sinneth and sleepeth in it his last: David is tempted, sinneth, and sleepeth, but not his last. Peter is tempted to conceal, to deny, to forswear his Master; yet one look of Christ delivered him: Judas is tempted to betray him, goes on, and perisheth. The Lord would never have suffered so dear favorites of his, as Lot, David, Peter, to fall so dangerously: if he had not meant to make them universal examples to the world, of not presuming, of not despairing. For how can we presume of not sinning, or despair for sinning, when we find so great Saints thus fallen, thus risen? How many years had those ten brethren forgotten their unnatural treachery! Alas, what long and dead sleeps may the holiest souls take in fearful. Were it not for God's mercy that thus delivers us out of temptations, we should end our spiritual lethargy in a sleep of death. David in those ten months might have some transient glances of remorse; but no compunction is heard of till Nathan's message, and perhaps had been further adjourned, if that Monitor had been longer deferred. God could have sent him sooner, and checked David's first project of sin: so had Bathsheba been chaste, Uriah alive, and himself guilty of murder. But that Almighty wisdom knew how to win more glory by the permission, than by the prevention; by the permission of one sin to prevent others. How many thousands had presumed on their own strength, if such a Champion had not fallen! How many thousands had despaired in the consciences their own mis-deeds and weakness, if such sins had not found remission!

It is happy for all after-times that we have such precedents, so holy sinners, so sinful contents: their falls have taught us by whom to stand. In a word, many Saints $\langle \diamond \rangle$ committed as great sins as reprobates: that the one is pardoned, not the other, the difference is not in the quantity or quality of the sin, but in the mercy of God.

1 We that pray for deliverance from evil, must endeavor against evil. The best Fencer lies close, [Uses of it.] and is more careful to defend than to offend: when we lie open, Satan hath a fair mark. Ranke mirth, a full belly, gaming, and wine, lay a man open. That wine is an inducement to lust, David knew; and therefore gave Uriah such superfluous cups: and it is hard to refuse pledging, where a King begins a Health to a Subject. This might easily lay him open to evil; the drunkard may be anything but good. But temptation is then stronger, when $\langle \diamond \rangle$ proceeds from a mighty instrument: the requests of Princes are commands the very suites imperative. How many Bethshebas and Jane Shores have thus been wrought, to pollute both a royal and matrimonial bed! The countenance of authority is authoritative with many: ask a Romist, whether if the Pope command him to kill his Sovereign, he is to do or refuse it: perhaps he trifles that the Pope will never command it: but put him to it, if; then his answer must be affirmative. If Saul charge a Doeg, he will wreake his spleen on the Priests. Let the master tempt his servant, the father his child, their least word is a law. But $\langle \diamond \rangle$ will be no excuse to say at last, such a great person tempted me, as Adam said of Eve it is quid that we must regard, not quis; the action, not the person: be the mover never so glorious, if his motion be to sin, let it be entertained with defiance. Let us have wary eyes, for it is not the self-appearing devil, but the same a transformed Angel, that doth corrupt us.

2. Consider what preventions the provident God useth against our sinnings. How many stays doth Saul find in his pursuit of David: twice he casts his javelin, and mist him: exposed him to the Philistines, but he slew them: Micahol was given him for a snare, yet she delivers him; Jonathan is constant to him: Saul hath begirt him, loe then he is delivered by the Philistines invasion. This found Balaam in his pestilent itch to curse Israel: one night God puts him off; the second time he answers his importunacie and bids him go in anger: an Angel stands to cross him, his beast turns out of the way: she bruise his foot against the wall, at last falls down under him: many crosses to recall him How is the other Saul (with his letters missive to vex the Church) arrested from heaven. I know there be sudden sins, no sooner thought of than dispatched; which is like fire to powder. But in our resolved intentions of doing a sin, if we would mark it, we meet with strange impediments, as Jonah did in his flight; which should make us grow jealous of such enterprises. Some have been frightened from their uncleanness, by the tolling of a passing-bell: others diverted from a bad journey, by the sudden lameness of their horse. How often hath God prevented murders by strange accidents? Sometimes he shortens our own arms, sometimes strengthens others against us. Sometime reason is heard, when religion silences out: and the dishonesty, inutility, or difficulty of a sin is pronounced. But it is best, when the fear of God hath corrected us, or the word of God averted us, or the Spirit of God recalled us. By innumerable means doth the Lord stop our precipices, hedge up our ways to sin: that when temptation invites us, we may have hands manacled, and feet fettered with detentions; and we cozen the devil against our wills. He would have us come, and we would come, but (thanks be to God) we cannot come. Let us observe it; as when we are doing well, we have many provocations to alienate our minds from it; so when we are intending mischief, God sends many inconveniences, as it were vocal accidents, to hinder us; as if God should say, take heed what you do.

3 Let us meditate how we are blessed of God, and have reason to bless God, for these happy deliverances. As Saint Augustine, Tentator defuit, &c. I had time and place to commit sin, but then the Tempter was away: thy doing, O Lord, it was that he was away. The tempter was present, but then time and place were wanting; thy doing it was that I wanted time and place. Time and place were convenient, and the tempter was there also, provoking me forward, all opportunities forthcoming: but then I had no stomach to it, lust was cool, my will had no will to consent: thy doing it was that I was unwilling, that the edge of my appetite was dull. Sometimes I had will, but then I wanted means: sometimes I had means, but then I wanted will: sometimes I had likewise will and means, but then I also wanted ability: another time; means, will, and ability were concurring; but then came in some other interruption; a messenger with sudden business, the distress of a friend, the invitation of a neighbor. Still, O Lord, that I was not led into temptation, nor captivated by suggestion, it was thy doing. Blessed be God, as for his furtherance in good, so for his hindrance in evil. If we be godly, and find these things true, let us enter into our chambers, fall upon our knees, lift up our hearts, and say in humble thankfulness; Lord, thou hast delivered me, I find thy mercy, to thy name be the glory.

4 Lastly, if we love not evil, let us long for our final and plenary deliverance from it; that immortal court, where sin can no more enter, than sorrow or death: out of this the Tempter is excluded forever. Here the Lord delivers us from the damnation and domination of sin, there from the temptation and assault: here it shall not overcome us, there it shall not come near us. Wretched man! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? Who? He that now frees us from the burning, will then from the smell of the fire. Here even a Saint is but a mixed creature; and the sin which he hath by his generation, fights against the grace which he hath by his own regeneration. This felt St Paul: and Jerome in his very abstinence; Men's ardebat desiderii in frigido corpore: my face was pale, but my heart was flushing; and I had a burning mind in a chill body. Mortal perfection is a vain dream: Aquinas thinks we may fulfill a precept two ways: either perfectly, quando pervenitur ad finem, when we perform the full scope of $\langle \diamond \rangle$: or imperfectly, cum non receditur ab ordine ad finem, when we keep the way conducing to the end. But as when the Captain bids the soldiers fight and conquer, he that fights and conquers, perfectly doth his will: he that fights and doth not get the victory, comes short of doing his will: and in God's battles, he that conquers not, which is the end; recedit ab ordine ad finem, doth certainly fail in the means. Therefore he that sincerely loves GOD, and detests sin, desireth dissolution for no other end, but to be freed from temptation. The good soldier will fight when he is in the field, but he is contented to have the battle over. This is one benefit that death against his own will shall do us; a perfect delivery from all temptations. In Paradise man had a Posse non peccare: in heaven he shall have a Non posse peccare. Satan shall then be bound in eternal chains, never to stir out of that local torment; and the Elect be set at triumphant liberty.

For Probations, which are the other sort of temptations, or trials by troubles; they are derived from three fountains, and may thus be distinguished, not in propriety of terms, but after the common acceptance. As they come from Satan they are usually called temptations: as they come from man, persecutions: as from God, afflictions. All these are in some manner from the Lord: neither man nor devil can afflict us without God, God can afflict us without them. When we pray not to be led into temptation, we pray not against correction, but against evil: for though Christ mak• us invincible, he makes us not invulnerable. All our days are evil, some worse• as the ague hath chief fits, critical days. Some be more grievous sufferings tha• others; as Martyrdom in the extent, (for it may be occultâ cogitatione, though not apertâ passion) and we have cause to bless God that we resist not unto blood. If there were no good in these temptations, they should not come near us: for nothing absolutely evil shall come to a good man. And when they have done the business they came for, they shall leave us: the plaster will not stick on whe• the sore is healed.

Do they come from the ungodly? Whether Tertullus persecute the Church with his tongue, or Elimas with his hand, God hath the command of both. I• deed the wicked are the mediate causes of our troubles: the righteous are as the center, the other the circumference: which way soever they turn, they find themselves environed: yet still the center is fixed and immovable, being founded upon CHRIST. It is good for some men to have adversaries: for often they more fear to sin, least they should despise them, than dislike it for conscience, least God should condemn them. They speak evil of us: if true let us amend it: if fall•e contemn it: whether true, or false, observe it. Thus we shall learn good out of their evil; make them our Tutors, and give them no pupillage. In all things let us watch them, in nothing fear them Which is to them an evident token of perdition, but to us of salvation. The Church is that Tower of David: if there be a thousand weapons to wound us, there are a thousand shields to guard us. When the Angel saluted Gideon, God be with thee; he replied, If God be with us, he•• i• all this evil befallen us? Why do the Midianites vex us? Yes, God may be with us, and the Midianites against us: yea therefore are they against us, because God is with us. It is neither our shame to suffer what CHRIST suffered, nor •ir honor to do as Judas did. Howsoever they be wicked Instruments, yet the 〈◊〉 hand is the Lord's: God gave, saith Job: what and the Devil took away? No, 〈◊〉 Sabaeans took away? No, but the Lord took away. As when the malignity of •isease is spent, health will return: so when all our adversaries have done their •rst, if not before, then God will deliver us. Let Iesabell fret her heart out, and •ear by her gods, Elijah must be safe. Let the red Dragon spout forth floods of •ome, the Church hath wings to fly away, she shall be delivered.

Do they come from God? diligit quem corrigit: storms and afflictions are 〈◊〉 from fury without love, but rather from love without fury. Lord, he whom 〈◊〉 lovest, is sick: Lazarus may be sick and yet CHRIST love him. The intelli•t son knows that his fathers correction is no argument of his fathers ha•d; therefore is silent. I was dumb, because thou didst it. I was not dumb for •t I did, but confessed my sin: but dumb for that thou didst, acknowledging it •st punishment. In a little wrath I hid my face from thee, for a moment. It is but Mo•um, a little, ad momentum, for a moment: and I hid my face, never turned my •rt from thee. Indeed as man is under the Law, they are legal punishments: •t as under grace, paternal corrections. They are a testimony of his good •our toward us, when by them he separates the sin which he hates, from •e person which he loves. And this he always so tempers, that it is nei••er according to our sins, nor exceeding our strengths. Non ultra vires:•ts? No, but not above GOD'S strength in us. No parent corrects another's •ild, and he is no good parent that corrects not his own. By this we come to •ow our friend: three things are not known but in three places: valor, but in •nger: wisdom, but in anger: a friend, but in misery. Afflictions have done ⟨◇⟩ this good, that we are sure we have a friend, a father in heaven, for we have try• him. Faith understands troubles to be Probationis Indicia, not Reprobationis ar•menta. Our life is a web woven by the hand of God, the thread reaching from •r birth unto our death. The woof is trouble, but still runs with it a Weft of •erwoven comforts. But if so then may we not pray for their removal? Yes, •remove thy plague away from me: Thy plague, and mine: thine by affliction, mine ⟨◇⟩ passion: thine because thou didst send it, mine because I endure it: thine because ⟨◇⟩ comes from thy Justice, mine because it answers my injustice: remit what I have •one, and remove what thou hast done. But whosoever laid it on, the Lord will •ke it off. Be our troubles many in number, strange in nature, heavy in measure •et God's mercies are more numerous, his wisdom more wondrous, his power •ore miraculous, he will deliver us out of all. This doctrine well digested, will •reed good blood in our souls, and is useful three ways.

1 To fortify our patience; he needs not fear the trouble, that knows ⟨◇⟩ infallible deliverance. Possess your souls in patience. He doth not say, pos••sse your mouths, for some being provoked will give no bad language; nor •ossesse your hands; many being urged can forbear violence: yet still the desire •f revenge may boil and ranckle in both their hearts. But possess your souls, that ⟨◇⟩ , yourselves, in patience: this binds both mouth and hand to the peace and good •orbearance: all are quiet, if the soul be quiet. Two things become a Christian; •apientia in verbis, patientia in verberibus. Time is the Physicians Cure, reason the •hilosophers Cure, patience is God's Cure. Time helps sorrows, Dies adimit •gritudinem: but still this is tedious, and time runs to dully with them that be in •isery. Reason qualifies it, for it is the courage and magnanimity of a man to •ffer. But this only seeks means to extricate us, reason will not stay for time: •u• faithful patience looks neither to reason nor time, but knows a better reme•y: she commits her cause to God, and resolves upon this resignation, that either •er sorrow shall be less or her fortitude more. Nobile vincendi genus est patien•ia. Faith, Charity, and Patience, are the three rich possessions of a Christian: by Faith we possess Christ, by Charity, we possess our neighbor, by Patience ⟨◇⟩ possess ourselves. He that wants Faith is without the head: he that wants Cha••ty, is without the body; he that wants patience is without himself. Our patience, like our trial, hath but a short exercise: our deliverance is glorious and everlasting.

2 To confirm our hope, he that hath tasted the mercy of God in some no•ble deliverance, hopes in the next trial for the same assistance. Experience brings hope; because it hath made the matter easy: he that hath often done a thing ease•y, mistrusts not to do it again. David had often found his deliverance out of ⟨◇⟩ exigence, therefore says; In the Name of God I will leap over the Wall: his experience had made it so easy to him, that it was but a skip or jumpe in his conce•.

3 Let us not fain afflictions before we have them: we can expect no del••rance out of fantastical griefs. Be not deceived, God is not mocked. T•• beggars by permission, that fain themselves halt and blind: and beg•• by commission, that have patents for fires and wrackes: but their fires are 〈◇〉 feigned and false fires, and all their wrackes the wrack of their own consci•ces. Let them take heed, lest their fictions prove at last true afflictions, thei••sembled lameness prove lameness indeed. As Martial writes of Caelius, who 〈◇〉 avoid the Ave potentiorem, giving his attendance early and late to the great ones 〈◇〉 the time; feigned himself sick of the gowte; so cunningly, that his hyp•cr•• came home to him, and he fell sick of the gowte indeed. Tantum cura potes• 〈◇〉 ars doloris, desiit fingere Caelius podagram. How often have those mischances tales to men without relief, for which they begged relief before they had cause! Go• promiseth deliverance from the temptations he sends, not those we fetch: such as come from our want, not from our wantonness. Many make to themselves c••ses; and while God's hand is not visible, they with their own hands beat themselves. Haman that great favourite hath honor enough, though Mordecai do•• cringe to him: yet this makes him discontent; here was a cross of his own beg•ting. Ahab was King, had lands and demesnes enough of his own, yet beca••e Nabaoth denies him his vineyard, he falls sick of the sullens. For this trouble let him thank himself: what needs a rich man be a thief? Amnon had v••tie of choice objects for his inordinate affection; yet he must be love-sick of T••mar: none but his half-sister can please the eyes of that wanton Prince. Or•••ry pleasures will not content extraordinary persons; such pamper'd and ••vern'd youthes, whose greatness and ease have made unruly appetites. This 〈◇〉 unnatural heat of which he languishes; was not this an affliction of his own 〈◇〉 king. It is not rare to see a great man vex himself at the neglect of a peasant; 〈◇〉 as a true Lion would pass by with an honorable scorn. To see the husband 〈◇〉 a virtuous and comely spouse, doting on a foul and forbidden bed. To see 〈◇〉 man pine away with projecting how he should live when he is old. Innume•••• be our fantastical evils, and we trouble ourselves about nothing. Evils co•• fast enough of themselves, there is store made to our hands, we need not encr••• their number: those ill weeds will grow without our planting.

Our deliverer is The Lord. It is the voice of all creatures in their several la•guages, Salvation is of the Lord. The confession of men more sensibly, This 〈◇〉 the preserver of men. The acknowledgment of Saints more especially, 〈◇〉 help standeth in the Name of the LORD. This word leads us to a cons•deration of his Power; He can deliver us, and none but He. Lord: his Almightyness was the first Name He would be known by to the world, Exod 6.3. Not that Jehovah was not in some manner formerly known: for Gen. 15. and 26.24. But as if he made this difference: Then I gave promises what I would do, now I come to perform the promises: with God Almighty, which signifies my Majesty; I will show myself Jehovah, the God of Abraham, which shall demonstrate my mercy. Subjiciuntur omnes potestates Potestati Infinitae.

The Lord. his Sovereignty is a point that comes not often to be handled, therefore here I take leave to enlarge myself. It may be considered in seven respects.

1 It is undependant: many things are said to govern, but they have some dependance on their superiors. Our life is beholding to the fruits, the fruits to the trees, the trees to the earth, the earth to the rain, the rain to the Sun, the Sun and all to the Lord: Natura Naturanti, machina Creatori. Fruits are from trees, and trees from seeds; both moistned by the air, and matured by the sunne: element is qualified by element, orbe depends on orbe, the Sun it self in Primum mobile: Astra regunt homines, sed Deus astra: we can go no higher. The child looks up to his father, his father lives by the peace of the country, the countrey could have no peace but by the Magistrate, the Magistrate is countenaned and warranted by the King, the King is ruled by God. Still one looks upon another, but the eyes of all things look up unto thee, O Lord.

2 It is absolute; he may dispose of his Subjects at his pleasure. As the potter having the lump in his hand, makes what kind of vessel he listeth; great or small, round or square, for the Parlor, or for the Stable: and when he hath done, he may set it on his cupboard, or on the dunghill: be it to honour or dishonor, he will be honored by it. Man respects deserts or demerits, in making the poor rich, or the rich poor; in ennobling the base, or degrading the noble: God doth all according to his own will without further relation. Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? He can make Tabor little heaven, and turn Paradise into a desert. It is absolute, without control: there is none to call him to account or examination; with Cur ita facis? O Lord, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ was not therefore thy doing because it was good, but therefore is it good because it was thy doing. Whether thy mercy saveth us, we have cause to be thankful: or thy justice confoundeth us, we have no cause to complain: still Thou continuest holy, O thou worship of Israel.

3 His Lordship is universal. First, overall times; other Lord's die; Domini terrae, but terra Domini: he is eternal. Eternity is properly the duration of an increat'd Ens. It is improperly taken, either for things that have both beginning and end, as Colles aeterni, terra aeterna, everlasting mountains; diverse such phrases in Scripture. Or for things that have a beginning but shall have no end: so are angels, and men's souls eternal; so, eternal life, eternal fire. But God calls himselfe, I AM: I am what I have been, I have been what I am, I am and have been what I shall be. This Attribute is incommunicable: all other things had a Non esse preceeding their Esse; and they have a mutation tending to nothing. They shall be as nothing that war against thee: all come to nothing unless they be upheld by the manutenency of God: but Thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end. Thou turnest man to destruction, and again sayest, Return: even from everlasting to everlasting thou art God: the sole Vmpire and Measurer of beginning and ending. Secondly, over all places, heaven, earth, hell. Psal. 135.6. Kings are limited, and cannot do many things they desire: they cannot command the Sun to stand still, nor the wind to blow which way they would: in the lofty air, in the depth of the sea, no King reigns. They fondly flatter the Pope with his long arms, that they reach to purgatory; (but indeed both power and place are alike imaginary,) it is CHRIST alone that hath the keys of all places. Thirdly, over all creatures; binding the influences of Plejades, and loosing the bonds of Orion: commanding the fire against the nature of it, to descend: creating and ruling the stars, over-ruling the Lions, sending the meteors, hedging in the ease, lapping it up like a child in swaddling clouts, dividing, diverting, filling it. In both fire and water, these two raging elements that have no mercy, he shows mercy: delivers us from both in both. He calls the fowls, and they come: the beasts and they hear: the trees, and they spring to obey him. He hath a Raven for Elias, 〈◇〉 gourd for Jonah, a dog for Lazarus. Makes the Leviathan, the hugest living creature, preserve his Prophet. That a terrible Lion should be killed, as was by Sampson; or not kill as they forbore Daniel; or kill and not eat, as that Prophet, 1 Kings 13. Here was the Lord. Over metals, he makes Iron to swim, stones to cleave a sunder. Over the devils, they must obey him though animo resistendi. But they continually rebel against him, and break his will? They do indeed against his complacency, not against his permission: Et quando permittit, non volens sed volens permittit. There is then no time, not the hour of death: no place, not the sorest torment; no creature, not the devil: but the Lord can deliver us from them. Therefore at all times, in all places, and against all creatures, let us trust in him for deliverance.

4 It is necessary; we could not live but by his dominion. Take away government, we are worse than beasts; a bad King is better than no King. If man rule 〈◇〉 he over-rules all: Higher than the highest. Above all, to support: the Pillar and the foundation of the pillars and foundations of the world. Above all to correct, binding Kings in chains: if authority grow warped, to straiten it with his justice. Above all, to direct, he directs natural government to natural good; that the Elements be not at war, but working in a well disposed harmony for our benefit: that one doth not swallow up another, nor the stronger oppress the weaker; it is the Lord's doing. As he made nature with his Fiat, so he sets it a working with his Faciat: let it so be, let it so work. He directs politick government to politick good, that we might live like men in a civil peace. Supernatural government to salvation, that we may live like Christians in a gracious obedience and comfort. This power was necessary for creation; he must be an Almighty Lord that could make us of nothing. It is necessary for preservation, to conserve things in their being and working. Necessary for redemption; it must be an infinite stone, that must pay an infinite debt. If the Lord had not become a servant on earth, those servants could never have been Lord's in heaven. All the parts of a Common-wealth, ought to uphold one another in policy: all the members of the Church to uphold one another in charity: as in a building one stone doth beare up another, but the foundation bears up all. The members uphold the body, the body the members: the Subjects uphold the King, the King upholds the Subjects: but Thou O Lord, upholdest us all.

5 It is immutable; whatsoever the Lord is, he is Simul & Semel. With us one thing doth exclude another, this moment thrusts out that; learning excludes ignorance, riches poverty; the business of this hour gives place to the next. Be God's Essence and perfections are together: Aeternitas Dei; Essentia Dei est. As he is eternal, absque Origin, so invariable absque Mutatione: We are not present to things past or to come: God is to all times and things, past, present, or 〈◇〉 ; ever present. The reason is, he is Immense, and fills all places without moiety, without ascent, or descent. Indeed he is sometime said to descend; but it is because he then doth some new work; men took no notice of his presence before This Lordship hath no succession, yet he produceth works successively: Egoficio, and Ego faciam. But this is not in regard of himself, but in respect of us, that he is said to do one thing after another. He doth not now create the world, not now destroy it, nor now call Abraham out of Vr: nor is Isaac redeemed from sacrifice, and Christ sacrificed, in the same place or at the same time. The type ⟨◇⟩ properly go before the antitype. It is false then to say that men were justified before they were borne: they are elected before all time, but called and justified in time: these things are done successively. With the Lord there is order, though there be no time. If I come to a Pillar with my left side toward it, it is then on my left side: if I come with my right side toward it, then is it on my right side: yet is the pillar it self immovable. Omnis mutabilitas quaedam mors, saith the School if God could change, he could die. Now change is either substantial, or qualitative: but God's substance cannot be changed, and he hath no qualities. Again, it is either amissive, or perfective: no man changes but he is either the better or the worse by it: God is the fountain of life, nothing can be added to him, for he is •nite: nothing derogated from him, for he is the Lord Almighty. In his will, his purpose, in his joy, in his Justice, in his mercy, in all unchangeable. How is then said to repent? Not that he doth repent, but appears to us in the alterati• of his work, as one repenting. There may be change in the work, there is none •he work-man. Ad novum opus consilium non novum, sed aeternum: mutat rem, non •ilium. The unchangeable decree of God disposeth the change of all things, • man that builds a house, hath an Idea in his head whereby he purposes to frame •he decrees how to order this part, to erect that corner, here to build a partition, •re a chimney, to set up a scaffold, and pull it down again: here is a variety ⟨◇⟩ change of the work, the worker is still the same. What God once is, he is • ever: once just, ever just: once merciful, ever merciful.

6 It is incomprehensible, whoever saw God in his strength, and lived? This •rd is in himself Invisible, as indivisible: seen in his mighty works, never to ⟨◇⟩ seen in his Person. But we shall see him face to face? Not the deity it self, as ⟨◇⟩ Anthropomorphites dreamed: not a light only resulting from him, as was the •or of the Armenians. But by face to face, is meant the clear knowledge of • understanding: and we shall know him, not with comprehensive knowledge, • with Scientia adaequata, as he is cognoscible, for he is incomprehensible. So are •se places to be understood, Hebr. 12.15. 1 John. 3.2. Revel. 22.4. The intel•uall vision is not of his Essence, but of some work represented. And that of •uel, Chap. 7.9. was but a dream or vision upon his bed; some divine and su•natural revelation. But did not John the Baptist see the Holy Ghost? No, not the •vine nature, but the Dove. But doth not Job assure himself of Seeing God? •t GOD himself, but his Redeemer, God in the veil of the flesh: JESUS •ll be thoroughly and joyfully looked upon: but the deity shall not be seen here•er with the bodily eyes.

Nothing can apprehend that which is out of the limits; but we are finite, and •d is immense. Every thing that is seen, must be seen in some place; but God ⟨◇⟩ no place. Our body indeed shall be spiritual, not needing meat, nor sleep, ⟨◇⟩ breathing by air: yet it is not capable of comprehending that infinite Spirit. •re we understand him after the measure and capacity of man, in a human re•blance; as if he had feet, eyes, affections: because they that should know him, •e such. But when we read of God's Foot, let us think of his coming, as a •n removes by his feet. When we read of his eyes, consider his knowledge of ⟨◇⟩ things, as a man sees all by that Organ of sense. So when we are said to see his •e, conceive our knowledge of him to be meant. He that made the ear, shall he ⟨◇⟩ hear? he doth not say, Hath he not an ear? but, shall he not hear? The Pure ⟨◇⟩ heart are promised to see God: but as that pureness is in heart, so is that vision ⟨◇⟩ heart. We say, I see a man's wisdom, see his valor, see his meaning; yet ⟨◇⟩ not these visible▪ so nor this Lord but by his effects, what his power worketh. •us far in heaven we shall exceed in knowledge: here we know him only by •gatives, what he is not; that not mortal, not mutable: and by his works; •he Lord is known by his Judgments; and vacate & videte, Be still, and know that ⟨◇⟩ God: you that are absent, come and see: you that are present, stand still and •ntemplate: see and know, know and confess, confess and apply, make use of •at you see and know. What's that? I am God, you are but men: Put them in •de, O Lord, that they are but men; worms, vanity, nothing. But Ego Deus, not •opular, titular, idle, abject God, like the gods of the Gentiles, not able to wipe ⟨◇⟩ dust off their own faces: but a God that makes gods, a God that mars gods; •t hath a dominion above all dominion, above all comprehension. LORD, •e cannot comprehend thee in thy Majesty, do thou comprehend us in thy •rcie.

7 It is Glorious and blessed: he is the chiefest good, and he enjoys himself, therefore is perfectly and infinitely blessed. Our blessedness consists in enjoying him, his, not enjoying us, but himself. The Hebrew speaks of Blessedness in the plural, Beatitudines: as the latines call wealth, Divitiae, Opes: because •a•y things concur, as to make up a rich man, so to make one blessed. There is ⟨◇⟩ them both, Objectiva pars; as gold, silver, lands, houses be the materials of •ches. And Formalis pars, the free and certain possession of these things; for if they may be gone, a man is poor in possibility; when they are gone, he is po••••deed. Mans blessedness is from another, the Lord's is from himself: m•• ⟨◇⟩ grace, God's in nature: man's temporal, God's Eternal: man's voluntary, Go•• necessary, it cannot be otherwise: man's changeable, God's always the same. The greatest and stateliest monarch puts off his glory and robes at sometimes; ⟨◇⟩ when he goes into the Bath, the bed, the grave. He carries no Scepter in the ⟨◇⟩ yet may he then have a Crown on his head: he hath neither scepter nor Cro••e in his bed, yet even then he is known a King by his attending guard: but in ⟨◇⟩ grave he leaves off all. Now God's glory is never left off, there is no interu•••on of his blessedness, not a moment wherein he is less happy.

His blessedness is Internal or external. Internal consists. 1. In the c••templation of his own sufficiency: thus he saw all to be very good which he ⟨◇⟩ and took pleasure in his own wisdom that made them. 2. In the compre•••sion of all happiness; for it is nothing to be blessed, and not to understand it: •ny were faelices, bona si sua norint: God's omniscience is his blessedness. 3. ⟨◇⟩ the delectation taken in this comprehension, when he knows there is nothing ⟨◇⟩ offend him: whereas Kings may be free from danger, not from fear. 4. ⟨◇⟩ contentation taken in this delight; having all things so fully in himself, th•• ⟨◇⟩ needs no addition. Many men think not themselves happy in the much they ha••, because they want something they would have: but there is nothing more ⟨◇⟩ God to desire. He comtemplates his own goodness, and rests in himself ⟨◇⟩ a sweet complacency, as the infinite fountain of all blessedness. External blessedness is that he receives from the creatures, everyone, sensible and insensible, especially, Angels and men. He is blessed in himself, yet he will also be blessed by us. We can add nothing to him, nor may we take his due honor from him. He looks for praises for electing us, creating us, &c. We discourse our blessings as an annual commemoration, rejoice and solace ourselves in them; but still let us reflect all by praises to our Maker. A King will take a present of a beggar, by this occasion he may (not enrich himself, but) reward the poor man. God needs not this outward clothing, yet he is pleased to wear it for our sakes. 1 Cor. 13. Blessed be God, &c.

Thus far I thought good to meditate on the ineffable Majesty of God. It is possible to drink up all the sea, to suck in all the air, much less to comprehend God. When a man considers himself in relation to the reasonless creatures; the beasts do him homage, the earth yields him her fruits and metals, the sea brings him in merchandise, the air provides breath for his nostrils, and the Sun misseth not his hour to enlighten him; he may then think himself something: but when he considers the Lord, he is swallowed up, and thinks himself nothing. Now though a man cannot drink up all the river, yet he may taste it: though he cannot spanne the Sun, yet look upon his beams: though he cannot take in all the air, yet enough to fill us. Let us get enough of this Light fill our hearts, we need no more. When a man thrusts his hand into the fire, it burns him: when he comes but near it, it warms him: let us come with a purpose to partake, not to comprehend the Lord. Origen on Levitic. The two days offering are the two Testaments; these eat and feed upon: what is reserved for the third day, is for the world to come; it will fire us to search that. Not is this point barren, but hath the comfortable use, and that even applicable to our purpose. Doctrine being like the Sun, not only to delight us with the contemplation, but also to warm and quicken our affections.

This Lord being the Supreme, and all other Powers subordinate to him, and dependant on him, let this encourage our faith to trust him with our deliverance. Trouble not yourselves with your enemies, nor yet say Manus nostra excelsa, our own hand shall deliver us: Kings are men of might, yet but men of dust: without this Lord their power cannot save themselves, much less us. Angels are mighty, but cannot come unless this Lord send them; I could ask my Father, & he would give me Legions of Angels; saith Christ: we must ask our Father, or not have one Angel to do us good. He shall look his eyes out, that trusts to any other deliverer than the Lord.

His Dominion being so absolute, let men cease to rebel against it. I will be exalted, not only in my Israel; but in Gentibus, among the nations: if they receive me, volentibus, with their good contents: if they refuse me, Invitis, against their wills. And if there be any ground, whose lines are extended farther than people and nations inhabit, there also will I be exalted, in universa terra. We fear Kings and take their wrathful looks as messengers of death; and we do well to give fear, to whom fear belongs. But here is a Power we cannot resist, a Wisdom we cannot delude, a Justice we cannot corrupt. Locks, and stocks, and treble barred doors, a dark dungeon, and a cruel Gaoler, all cannot keep them in, whom this Lord will deliver. His power shall shake the foundations of the earth, that earth-quake the foundations of the Prison, that trembling (as in the body) dis•oynt and unfasten the doors, and loose all their bands. There is no knot but he can untie it; let us at once fear and trust him.

This being universal over all times; the God of Abraham, and of his seed; Jesus Christ yesterday, and today, and the same forever; the God of our fathers that were, of ourselves that are, of our posterity that shall be, then our enemies shall never find time, wherein he shall not find means to deliver us. Over all places, Coelum & terram impleo, whither shall we go from his presence? Whither? That place was never yet discovered. He is present even to those that shun his presence; that say to him, Depart from us: how much more to us? Dominus nobiscum; yea he is not only with us, but for us; Nobiscum & pro nobis: Immanuel, God in our nature, God in our flesh. The Lord of hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge. Dominus virtutum, there's his power: Refugium nostrum, there's his favor. The Lord of Hosts, strong: the God of Jacob, sweet. The one Virium, the other Voluntatis: the one Roboris, the other Foederis: one of puissance, another of promise. The Lord, the Lord; whatsoever belongs to Power, Majesty, Governance: merciful, what ever belongs to election, dilection, compassion, covenant, sacrament: both together a just aequilibrium between greatness and grace; a fair and sweet harmony. Over all creatures; as heaven is his throne, the earth his foot-stool, and the sea his wash-pot; so all creatures in them are at his beck; none can say, Ego solus aufugi, I have escaped. He can make the very flies and insects, those scorns of nature, executioners of his vengeance. Over us, in a gracious and special manner; which affords us a challenge and defiance against all adversary forces: we fear not armies of men, legions of devils, nor the gates of hell: Dominus Deus noster, The Lord is our God: which are not only voces charitatis, comprehending in a community all Christians; but voces fidei, when we take this great Lord for our proper and peculiar God. That he can deliver us, this we presume: that he will deliver us, this we assume: from that principle or Thesis, we derive this Hypothesis, and appropriate it to ourselves. Therefore we say not only with the Leper; Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean: but we know thou canst, and we believe thou wilt, and we beseech thee to do it.

The necessarinesse of this Lordship gives us experience, experience confidence, and confidence will bring deliverance. How easily would the thunder strik us dead, the sea break in upon us, thieves spoil us, the whelps of Rome worry us, the fiends of hell ruin us; but that our Lord sits in the chair of omnipotency and protects us: Many are the dangers which we see and fear; innumerable those, we neither see nor fear: therefore to take away all attribution to ourselves, even when we know not, the Lord delivers us. How manifold are thy works O Lord▪ How manifold, if we sails in the main Ocean, and put not into some arm or cree• we never find an end. But that Consuetudinis perseverantia amisit admiratio••: we wonder not because they are common. Abundantia contumeliosa in seme•psam: of fullness comes loathing. It is not magnitudo, but novitas; that draws our eyes and observations. But he that considers his own weakness and impotence; how he was made in the womb, and knew it not; taken from the womb and not able to help himself: that God must now give him his daily bread to feed him, his daily breath to quicken him, or he perishes: or that considers the power of his enemies, with the implacable fury of their malice, the blood-hounds of hell: and yet that he is delivered; must confess, A Domino, factum est, This is the Lord's doing. That Sisera should fall by a woman, Pharaohs host sink like stones into the bottom of the sea, an invincible Navy perish by a few rotten ships on fire: O that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men: that our children's children to the last period of any generation in this Island may say, O God we have heard with our ears, our Fathers and Grand-fathers have declared to us, that noble work of thy deliverance.

The immutability of it gives us further cause to trust in him. Laban may love Jacob well, but his countenance will change upon him: Amnon will hate Thamar more than ever he loved her: Pharaohs Officer forgets Joseph when his tū•e is served: there is no constancy in man, but Ego Jehovah non mutor, I the L•d change not. The World changeth, the Vines cast off her grapes, the tired ea•th grows dull in increase, man's stature is lessened, his length of life less than th•, his honesty little or nothing at all: the sea encroacheth upon the land, Springs lock like Autumns: States change, policies change, governments change, all the materials of nature change: we see it, we need not preach it: it is matter of fight •o• of faith. Every man's mouth is full of this complaint. The world is fickle: wh•soever is delectable, vanisheth like smoke; Nocturnum somnium. That medici•e helps today, which doth not tomorrow: God is always helpful. That •ceit helps one which helps not another; God helps all. The hoarder adores his money; yet is his wealth but like an Inheritance on Salisbury plain; he may rob many Passengers for a time, at last somebody will rob him. Set not your heart o• riches, lest you be driven to say, as Laban to Rachel, Thou hast stolen away my he•. And when they are gone, Plus cruciant amissa, quàm delectant possessa. Contra•lie, God's love increaseth; though not formaliter, in it self, yet effective, to us. Frie•s are mutable, Paul had many adherents, yet at last complains, No man stood ⟨ϕ⟩ me, but all forsook me. Indeed Alexander opposed his words: some withstood h• but none stood with him. Yet then he finds this Lord to stand for him, he deliver• him. Peace changeth into war, discord thrusts out amity; but in God is const•• peace. I create the fruits of the lips, peace, peace, &c. Where we find; 1. Certit•nem, Paraohs dream is doubled for the surenesse; 2. Magnitudinem, no peace ⟨ϕ⟩ our reconciliation wth God, it is past all understanding. 3. Multitudinem all kinds of peace that may stand wth goodness. If sufferings abound for Christ, consolations ⟨ϕ⟩ also: if the exuperance be in either scale, it is in the comforts. Ro. 8. we read of se•• enemies: and v. 38. of seven victories. And if there be any other obstacle, from the height of heaven to the depth and bottom of hell: or further malignity in a•y creature, it shall be removed. Whom God loves he loves to the end: and if he have once given us an earnest of his favor, we shall be sure of the whole bargain.

The incomprehensibleness of this power, so far transcending angustias h••ni cordis, and yet so visible to the eye in the great and wondrous effects; may well further show us where our deliverance lies. Howsoever the noblest demonstration of things be from their causes and principles; yet the nearest to us ward, a•d most apprehensible is from the effects and performances. At Senacheribs army Judah hung down the head, rent her clothes, and hid her face; nothing was left her, but Lord bow down thine ear and hear, open thine eye and consider: yet in this extremity they found the Lord a Deliverer: an Angel slew in one night 185000 of them. Here was an invisible hand, but a mighty one: a power not comprehensible, yet discerned in the work. If any object, We see not our signs, not one finger of this hand appears: we are in distress, and the Lord hath thrust his working arm into his bosom, buried his mercies in forgetfulness: yea he does that which seems contrary to his works of favor; not diversa, sed adversa, which the Prophet calls Opera peregrina, strange and unproper works, almost aliene from his nature, troubling his own people; that the very wicked insult, Where is now their God? yet even then is an invisible hand working for us; and when the Devills conspiracy is come to the birth, it shall be abortive, or strangled in the womb; the God of our salvation will deliver us.

It is blessed, and that which blesseth us, and all things to us: the Sun doth not so necessarily lighten the air, as God doth bless them his favor is pleased to shine upon. CHRIST is his principally Blessed Son. Matth. 26.23. Son of God. Mark. 14.61. Son of the blessed. This blessedness comes down from him to the rest of his children: all blessings come from God, but by the hand of man, even that man of God, and hand of his Father; Christ. That bread should not choke, rather than nourish; it is blessing. That garments, which are cold of themselves, should keep us warm: but especially, that we perish not in our sins, that we are delivered from the power of death, and paws of the Dragon; this is his extraordinary blessing. Blessedness is every man's desire; now he that hath God, hath blessedness: whosoever hath the Sun, hath the light of the Sun; he cannot want water, that hath the fountain. Saint Augustine hath the story of a histrionical Mounte-bank, that to get spectators, and money by them, promised to tell them the next day what they all most desired. The Theater being full of people, and their minds full of expectation; what was the Device? Vili vultis emere, & chare vendere: you would all buy cheap and sell deer. But this holds not; for the good man in a famine will buy corn deer, and sell it to the poor cheap. And on the other side, the unthrift will sell his inheritance cheap, to buy vanities deer: therefore he failed of his promise. But if he had told them, Beati vultis esse, you would all be happy, this had been a full satisfaction. Let us cleave to this blessed God, and he will deliver us from sin and hell, which is blessedness begun; and bring us to salvation and heaven, which is blessedness perfect and consummate.

Let this teach us to bless him, that blesseth us. A man drinks of a river, he adds nothing to it, but takes something from it: when we offer to God our praises, we give him nothing, we receive something from him. Psal. 116.13. It is but thanks we give, but we take the cup of salvation. We send up praises, as a man throws up flowers, that fall down back upon his own head: so the showers of our free-will offerings fall down upon ourselves in showers of mercies.

Let it also invite us to love him, as being most blessed and lovely. Look what foundation there is in any other, why thou shouldst love, fear, serve, honor them all these are a thousand times more in God. Thy Prince hath honor, thy father reverence, thy Master service, thy wife love: all these are due to God in a transcendent measure. He that is thy King, is but God's servant; and spiritually we are all kings, in Christ: and when all the confederate kings of the earth cannot deliver thee this Lord can save thee. Thou lovest thy country, it is well: thy country gave thee not being & life: to displease God is the way to make thine own country spew thee out. If therefore Curtius in a vain-glorious love to his country, threw himself into the gulf, because the oracle said, whom the people loved best, he must be cast in to stop it. How are we bound to love God even above our own lives, that hath preserved us here, and provided a better country for us hereafter! Thou reverencest thy father, thou doest well; nature it self would rebuke the contrary. But if such awe be to the father of thy flesh, what humble reverence is due to the Infuser of thy soul, the father of thy father and of all mankind? Thou servest thy master, well done: that God which always commands, not seldom commends this obedience. But if a Masters reward be such an encouragement, what is it to hear from heaven, Well done good servant? Thy wife hath thy heart, it is fit, you are one flesh: but be not so uxorious to thy wife, as to be injurious to thy husband, Christ. Of all places, remember Solomon, and let not thy wife have God's place. The love of a brother is great, of a friend greater, of a wife above that: but the love of God must be above all. Let the dead bury their dead, follow thou me: forsake thy father living, much more dead, to follow CHRIST. If the wife of thy bosom alienate thy affection from him, she is a Traitor to thee and to him. Now if lust or profit comes in competition with God, examine thy conscience, which preferrest thou? Gold many go to the Devil for, yet Thy Law is better to me, than thousands of gold or silver. How many of all these things do postponere curam, make it their last and least care! many men's shoe-tyes cost them more in a year than God and their souls: so unmindful are we of thee, O Lord!

The Lord knoweth how.] I have held you long in this point of deliverance, and you say it is high time to deliver you from it: one circumstance more, and you have your wish. This last concerns the wisdom of God: it is enough that he promises deliverance, he keeps the Quomodo to himself. It is set down indefinitely: no man, no Apostle, no Angel, can know all the means of God's delivering his: it is enough, Novit ipse, himself knows. This gives a check to all saucy Inquirers, that will not believe help from the Lord, unless he tells them How. It hath ever been the foolish ambition of man, to be most prying into concealed things: desiring to know what he is forbidden, and slighting that he is charged to learn. It was not the thirst of gold, that was the fall of mankind; the earth and all her metals were his: not of honor, he had sovereignty over all the creatures: not of pleasure, he wanted none: Satan had another bait, a forbidden knowledge. How Divine a thing is knowledge, whereof even Innocence it self was ambitious! Adam looked for speculative knowledge, he should have looked for experimental. He thought it had been good to know evil, whereas good was ample enough to have made up his perfect knowledge and blessedness. He that knew all other things, knew not this one thing, that he knew enough. All that God made was good, the Maker being much more good: they good in their kinds, he good in himself. Adam knew the Creator, and his creatures, yet this could not content him: he would know that God never made, evil; evil of sin, evil of death: both which himself made by desiring to know them. Ever since, we know evil too well, and smart with knowing it: how dear hath this lesson cost us, that it is safe to be ignorant, where God hath not bid us know. Yet still are we transported with this saucy appetite of our Grandmother, and run ourselves a ground with the curious affectation of forbidden knowledge. For the things revealed, Lord give us a sober knowledge for the things concealed, give us a contented ignorance. There is more manifested than we can know, enough to make us happy by knowing. Deliverance we look for: how or when the Lord will deliver thee or me, that is in his own bosom, and the breast of his privy Council, Jesus Christ.

The Lord knoweth how.] As there is nothing impossible to his might, so there is nothing concealeable from his understanding. God's wisdom and providence is like the eye of a well-drawn Picture; that looks upon all and everyone, as if everyone were all. Take an eye and draw never so many lines from it, it sees all alike, and at once: the Center is present to every point of the circumference. This is a threefold comfort to us.

1 He knows our temptations before they be upon us: he sees the preparing of the potion, weighes the ingredients to a scruple, qualifies the malignity of the purgatives with sweet consolations. Satan, that bloody Apothecary, minds nothing but the drugs and dregs of poison; but God puts in an Antidote that he knows not of: he means to do hurt, but the Lord knows how to convert it to good. Thus tota miseria Christiani est dolor medicinalis, non sententia poenalis. Now he that looks to our affliction, will look to our extrication. We would never suffer Satan to assault us, but that he knows how to deliver us. It Pharaoh had kept himself at home, God's honor had not been so great at the red Sea: he knows as well how to get himself honor of Satan, as he did of Pharaoh.

He knows them when they be upon us. The Lord looked down upon the affliction of Israel: Pharaoh plagues them, he sees it, and therefore plagues Pharaoh. Thou hast considered my trouble, thou hast known my soul in adversities. Now he that knows the soul in adversity, knows how to deliver it out of adversity. Videat Dominus, says dying Zechariah; The Lord look upon it: yes, he did see it. The wronged child hopes to relieve himself, by making moan to his father. The Eagle, though she flies aloft, hath still an eye to her young ones: if any danger approach, she swiftly stoops to defend them. Thus Christ in heaven hath an eye to his darlings on earth: if any Saul be riding with a bloody Commission against them; down he comes from his Emperiall throne to their rescue. Why dost thou persecute Mee? Me; dost think Saul, that Christians have no Patrons upon earth.

3 He knows how to rid them from us: they are often so perplexfull and intricate, that neither we see, nor the world sees, nor reason apprehends how, yet the Lord knoweth. Egypt afflicts Israel through many degrees: Pharaoh suspects them for purpose of revolting, imposeth on them heavy burdens: still God looks on, and lets him alone. To the name of strangers is added the name of slaves: Israel had gathered some rust in Egypt, and now must be scoured: it is well they bore their burdens, who else had borne the burden of God. When like Palme trees, they flourish with their burdens; Midwives are suborned to destroy their male children; and they whose office is to help the birth, must murder it. Still the Lord knows, and holds his peace. From burdens they proceed to bondage, and from bondage to blood; from vexation of their bodies, to destruction of the fruit of their bodies. If the Midwives refuse, the multitude shall do it: cruelty had but smoked before, now it flames up. It is rare tyranny that finds no villainy for an executioner. Lastly, impossible labors are laid upon them, the Tyrant requires tasks not faisible: they could neither make straw, nor find it, yet they must have it. Do what may be, is tolerable: but do what cannot be, is cruel. Yet thus doth Pharaoh pick a quarrel to punish: and if they do it not, they are beaten. Now God begins to look down, and spite of all he delivers his people. No arms shall keep them longer in Egypt, no armies shall hurt them out of Egypt. Pharaoh or the sea looks for their conquest: to scape is beyond all hope, all thought: yet both shall be disappointed; The Lord knew how to do it. So that they did not cry so loud before, as now they sin: not faith, but sense teacheth them to magnify that God after their deliverance, which they scarce trusted for their deliverance.

The Antichristian enemies of God's Church and truth, after the infatuation of so many treacherous conspiracies, found out at the last a speeding one: such as in so many thousand years, from the fall of the reprobate angels, never came into the head of any devil, to put into the head of any man▪ or if the head could devise it, yet to find a heart to receive it, or a hand to act it, would have been thought impossible. But decreed it was in the Senate of Rome, in the bosom of that man of sin, who turns the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven, into the keys of the Kingdoms of the Earth. Advised by that family of malice, who of all the world, Soli inventi sunt dogmatizare mendacium; as Augustine said of the Priscillianists. Thus far God lets them alone. Executioners must be found, there must be hands as well as heads; Vlisses may contrive, Diomedes must thorough with it. Still the Lord says nothing: their secrecy makes them confident, dejected with a treble bond of counsel-keeping; Religion, Oath, Sacrament: You shall swear by the blessed Trinity, and holy Sacrament, not to reveal it: thus they eat their God upon a bargain of blood. Still the Lord is silent. They build the foundation of their design under the foundation of the Parliament house; Insidiantur in abscondito, and say to the ground, cover us: they trust not the air, but lay up their treason in a▪ subterraneous vault, with great improbity of labor. Who should discover those Penetralia mortis? Those inward chambers of death: Yes, the Lord knows how. Their catholic doomsday is now at hand, and their wants nothing but a hand to act it: they say of our souls, there is no help for them in their God. Then was God's time and hint, and in a Parable, by a Miracle, we are delivered. Their stratagem is defeated, their dungeon and hell of secrecy opened, the deeper hell of their hearts eviscerated, their vault of most barbarous villainy ransacked, to convince them and all the world, that novit Dominus, the Lord knows how to deliver his. Alas, we were like men that dreamt, nay we dreamt not of this: the noise of mill-stones, light of candles, bread and wine, bride and bridegroom, were our song: the plot of ruin came not within the reach of our thoughts. Blessed be that God who only delivered us.

Thus he can deliver with equal means, with small means, with no means. Novit Dominus, he can tell how. Midian comes against Israel; they like the sand by the Sea, covered all the Valley: the Israelites were two and thirty thousand strong. They think we are too few: God says, the people are too many. They say, the Midianites are too many for us: God replies, you are too many for them. Indeed, if Israel had expected the victory from their own fingers, they had been too weak for Midian: but seeing God will give the conquest, and have the glory; they are too strong. Where human strength is opposed, there needs an equality: but now God will fight, and he knows how to do it with a few, with none, as well as with many. His care is not how to get the victory, but how to preserve the glory of it gotten. Therefore he chooseth to save by few, that all the honor may redound to himself. So jealous is he of his glory, that though he give deliverance to Israel, yet the praise of the deliverance he will keep to himself. Therefore he shortens their means, that they may not shorten his mercies. Now if he will not allow lawful means to darken his honor, how intolerable is unlawful means? He that remembers the year eighty eight; (and what true English spirit can forget it, or forbear to report it to his children?) An invincible Navy, an implacable fury, furnished with instruments of murder and torture, confident of our utter desolation: and considers how they were all desolated, and we delivered, when no arm nor finger of flesh was for us: must needs confess, that Novit Dominus, the Lord knows how: he used no help in the delivery, let him have no partner in the glory. There is less danger in stealing anything from him, than his honor. If men steal the Princes tribute, or clip his coin, he may pardon it: but not if they go about to rob him of his Crown. No, but still let him be praised, both in our chambers at home, and abroad in our Churches, for our time, and throughout all the generations of our children's children after us, till Christ appear in the clouds; and then in the Kingdom of Heaven forever and ever, Amen.

And to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished.] We have seen how the godly speed, now let us mark the end of their persecutors. The wicked keep such a noise in the world, that a poor man's tale can no more be heard, than the humming of a Bee in a clap of thunder. So head-strong and uncontrouable is the precipice of sin, that when the righteous would withstand it, they are borne down by it. Virtutibus semper contradicitur. The Church should never find so many stratagems directed ex professo against her, but that she takes a course which the world dislikes. Perversorum derogatio, vitae nostrae approbatio, Greg. In all ages, the rebuke of Christ, hath been the religion of Christians. The reason is, our singularity and descent from their customs: which as it makes them hiss like serpents, because we trouble their nests: so like an Antiparistasis, it should inflame our zea. We have read of Heathens that would shun the popular current. Phocion had not suspected his speech, had not the people applauded it. Antisthenes mistrusted some ill in himself for the vulgar commendation. And shall we be brutishly driven with the drove? Or rather like nails in a wheel, turn as we are turned, without either conscience of sin, or guidance of reason? If we live like them that are reserved to Judgment, how should we think ourselves not reserved with them? This is their time to persecute, ours to suffer: their time will come to suffer, ours to triumph. Let me rather feel their malice, than be wrapped up in their vengeance. Recusat esse de corpore, qui non vult mundi odium sustinere cum capite, August. They are our corrosives, corrasives, used only to pare off our excrements, and eat out our dead flesh by their temptations: but the patient is preserved, when the plaster is thrown into the fire.

Saint Jerome allegorically upon Ezech. 47.19. The possession begins at Thamer, and reacheth along to the waters of strife. Is there peace between Joshua and Gibeon? then there is quarrel enough for the Amorites against Gibeon. The heirs of heaven can expect no better at the hands of the children of this world. A larger book might be written of the Apostles Sufferings, than that of their Acts. And had not the Divine power given them a miraculous success, in the safe conduct of a Gospel, thorough a world of temptations; it might have been entitled in a bloody Rubric; The book of the sufferings of the Apostles. God hath set forth us the Apostles last, as it were appointed to death; Paul might well say: last, with an Emphasis: the former endured but the injuries of their own country, the last, the malice of all the world; vying who should multiply the most disgraces upon them. Concerning this Sect, we know it is everywhere spoken against. They might well affirm it, that were the first authors of it. As Caesar wrote of those battles, Quibus non solum interfuit, sed & praefuit. But let us stand upon our guard, keep to the lists of our warfare, maintain the fight we have sworn in Baptism me. Subtle arguments well answered, breed a clear conclusion: our souls shall shine the brighter one day for this rubbing. Consider we two encouragements. First, Christ endured such contradiction of sinners: he is the commander and beholder of this combat: the Judge and rewarder of this courage: the leader of the company, and conquerer of the enemy. Bee ye of good cheare, I have overcome the world. Next, their rage is but like their Generalls, sharp but short; for a time: for they are reserved to the day of Judgment to be punished.

The parts are four, according to the proceeding of civil Iudicature: the malefactors; their binding over, the Assizes, and the execution.

The

- Malefactors; The unjust.
- Binding over; are reserved.
- Assizes; To the day of Judgment.
- Execution; To be punished.

The unjust.] This term must be considered in a threefold relation. 1. As it is a want of that righteousness which the Law requires. 2. As a want of that righteousness which the Gospel accepts. 3. As it implies a habit of unrighteousness, such as both the Law and Gospel condemns. Of all these a little.

1 For legal Justice, how far short is the best man of it! God requires a perfect fulfilling of the Law, because he gave a perfect ability to do it. If man would lose willfully this sufficiency, what fault is in God? Now the son that inherits his fathers goods, is bound to pay his fathers debts: we have our fathers goods, natural endowments, &c. Therefore bound to answer for his sin: if so we call original sin, not ours but His. But howsoever our parents conveyed unto us original sins, we ourselves are the parents of actuals. All naturals are depraved, all supernaturals are depraved, by the first fall. Mans nature may be inclined to some moral virtues imperfect; as Truth, Justice, temperance, chastity: but not to supernatural, as faith, hope, charity, humility; these are quite out of natures orbe. So for that Justice, which should give absolute obedience to GOD'S will, all men be unjust.

2 For Evangelical Justice, which is had by faith: this is a righteousness of Grace, to supply the defects of nature. We that had no righteousness of our own, must be beholding to one that hath some to spare: such a one, as though he give never so much, hath never the less: an infinite and inexhaustible fountain of goodness. Satan like a Chimicke, had extracted all the juice and spirits of our grace: we have no way to enrich our bankrupt estate, but with the treasures of CHRIST. He was not not only our brother by taking our flesh upon him, but also our surety by taking our debts upon him: not only naturam hominis, but formam servi. Restituli quod nunquam abstui, may he well say; I paid that I never took. What man will give hisson for his sin? Yet God did more: he gave his Son, for (not his own, but) another's sin. Mans sin was the cause of Christ's death: Christ's death the cause of man's life. He gave life to us, by giving his life for us. Had he been mere man, this had done us no good; his Justice had been little enough for himself. But the Son of God suffered, not in Proprietate Natura, yet in Vnitate Personae; Personaliter: and so he merited. The Sword of Justice was awaked to be sheathed in our bowels; the Shepherd interposed himself to take the blow. By sin we are indebted to God more than we are worth; now Christ undertook for us. In his Circumcision, he gave the earnest, set his hand to the Obligation, to pay the whole debt. God is the Creditor, he paid him, and sued out for his Church a Quietus est. Satan was the Gaoler, he paid him; death the executioner, he paid him too; though for their fees they parted his garments among them. As Jacob's life was bound up in the life of Benjamin, without whom his gray hairs would be brought to the earth in grief. So our life is bound up in the life of JESUS, and if he be not with us, we shall die with anguish, and go to the grave in sorrow.

This is a second way to be just: the former we lost by sin, this we find by faith: he that wanteth this is unjust and must perish. Now reprobates cannot have this justice, by reason they lack faith: as he that is blind hath no benefit by the light. Indeed the world thinks this an easy attainment; but is quite mistaken. A child cannot generate, nor a man regenerate himself: the latter is as possible as the former. Mans nature being whole, could not preserve it self: much less being broken, can it repair it self. He that cannot keep himself from death while he lives, will more impossibly restore and revive himself to life being dead. Faith is a rare gift, though there be many Christians: all think they have it; yet even CHRIST himself says, he shall scarce know where to find it. How great a part of the world lies quite out of the orbe of faith! In Rome it is not they contest against it. In Courts it is rare, many live there rather by the favor of the Prince, than by the faith of God. In the City, the credit of faith is so weak, that it cannot be trusted without ready money. In the Country she is likeliest to be had; but the Tenant finds so little faith in the Land-lord, that he thinks it a needless virtue in himself. Among Lawyers there is just so much faith, as there is charity. Most men have so much, and so little, as to think they need no more. The professors of faith are like Gideon's army, two and thirty thousand: but when the faithful are separated, as those soldiers were mustered, there is but three hundred left. Lord, increase our faith, and the number of the faithful: that we who cannot be just in ourselves, may be just in Jesus Christ.

3 There is a third kind of Justice; actual, practical; inseparably proceeding from the former: it is a sanctified conformity to the will of God. This justifies all them to the world, whom faith hath justified to the Lord. When in all our earthly business, we still carry a heavenly mind. When our faith to God, is seen in our faithfulness to men. Be thou faithful unto the death, and I will give thee the crown of life. Continue in evangelical faith, though you die for it: continue in moral faithfulness, til you die in it. There is a faith of the Law, Mat. 23.23. There is a faith of the Gospel, Mat. 25.23. Rom. 1.17. The one is fidelity in our promises, the other is confidence in the promises of God. If he covenant with us, I will be your God: we must restipulate, then will we rest upon thee. Thou shalt be my people; then we must be faithful. Secundum fidem quam credimus, Deus fidelis nobis: secundum fidem quâ credimus, nos fideles Deo. Both these together: for no man can deal faithfully with God legally, unless he believe evangelically that God will deal faithfully with him. Want of legal faith oppugnat Dei majestatem: want of evangelical faith oppugnat Dei veritatem & misericordiam. Be not false-hearted in the first, nor faint-hearted in the latter. In a word, he is a just man that doth good: and there is no sap of life in the tree if no fruit appear in the branches.

The unjust man wants all these three righteousnesses: he is not legally just, for he hath no purity of nature: he is not evangelically just, for he hath no sanctity of grace: he is not practically just, for he hath no morality of life. The first wicked men cannot have, the next they will not have, and (without that) the last they shall not have.

Thus we see negatively who are unjust; but there is more than a bare privation in it; Quiddam positivum: it includes not only a defect and indisposition to do well; but also an actual contrariety to Justice, doing what is palpably evil. So there is a twofold malignity in it; the transgression, and the duration of it. For the former, the wicked are unjust to God, to men, to themselves.

1 To God: righteousness is an obedience to the will of God; and injustice is no other than disobedience. That we may learn to judge ourselves in this, consider the infallible marks of obedience. First, it must be Integra; respective of all the Commandments: he that transgresseth one, hath not obeyed. Saul kept part of God's precept, slew the most, and worst; yet God rejected him as disobedient. Many piece their lives, as beggars do their cloaks, here and there a new patch: an alms at Christmas, this is a patch of charity: communicate twice a year, two patches of faith. Disobedient for all this. Secondly, Simplex, we must obey the law Intuitu legislatoris, without glance at our own profit or credit or safety by it. If one eye look one way, the other another way, the object will never be well seen. The servant would go to Church, to please his master; more fain another way, to please himself: but he that looks any other way in his devotion, than to the Lord's precept; is unjust: he makes God the second, himself the principal. Thirdly, Prompta, ready: Angels have wings to fly about it. Abraham no sooner received that strange command, but he rose early to obey it. A compulsory obedience the devils may give, but are never the nearer being righteous. He shall never be welcome to God, that comes on his feet, and leaves his heart behind him. Fourthly, Assidua, constant: that obedience which hath an end, had never any true beginning. If it falls it was never a fixed Star, but a mere meteor. A man may lose his Horse, his Purse, his Cloake; these be separable: the grace that hangs on by tacks, like a mantle, soon drops off. Divers have a crust of profession congealed by cold, desirous to keep themselves warm by the fire of the Temple; which the summer of wantonness thawes into fluid and spilled water. The Grasshoppers campe in the hedges in a cold day, &c. In cold weather they lie in heaps and swarms: in hot weather they scatter: when prosperity comes, their looseness appears. In God's Book these are found unjust servants. Fifthly, Vera vel Iusta, no trick nor equivocation in it. It seeks not to obey God for man's sake, but man for God's sake: it obeys men, but never against the Lord.

Disobedience is called witch-craft, for it goes from God to the devil, and like a Witch intends mischief and revenge. There be two parts of it; Cum non fit quod praecipitur, cum contra fit quàm praecipitur. Disobedience material, when it breaks the Law: formal, when it scorns the Law-giver. Disobedience did cast Adam out of Paradise, Angels out of Heaven, Jonah out of the Ship, Saul out of his Kingdom, Israel out of Israel. Superiors complain that others do not obey them; but no wonder, when they obey not God. Shall any creature owe that man service, that will perform no service to his Maker? God for this often makes a tumult and rebellion in their own bosoms; that reason, the Queen Regent of the soul, cannot be heard, nor any of her laws be respected, because the mutinous affections make such a combustion, putting the whole man out of order and good disposition. Disobedience will not bow, but it shall be broken: as the thunder melts the stubborn metal, and spares the unresisting purse. Thus is he unjust to God, that detaines his honor: that is fed and gives no thanks: such an one steals his meat. He requires the seventh of our time, the tenth of our increase: we are unjust that deny this. These are thought honest men, yea think themselves no less: they go as merrily with this profanation and sacrilege at their heels, as horses with an empty Coach. Yea, the devil serves them, as Carriers do their horses; lay on them heavy loades, and then hang bells at their ears, to make them music. These are reserved to judgment, for no human law takes hold of them. Where should the poor Minister have the Tenth adjudged to him? And for making that day common to licentiousness, which God hath separated for especial holiness; where is this censured? A good Lord gives his poor servant a farm to live on: for the Rent, he requires every week one days service, and at the years end the tenth of his profits. He that returns not this small part, to that God who gives all, is most unjust, and will be so found at the day of sentence.

2 To man: such are they that measure their right by their power, and therefore will do injury, because they can do it. Unjust. 1. To the common-wealth, as the golden extortioner. (I may so call him, because he gets gold by Usury, as Babel is called the Golden City, because she is an exactresse of gold.) Let all the scribes in the City pass their words for him, yea set their hands to it; yet God will hold him unjust. 2. To the Church; that deny him reverence to their mother, and withhold her maintenance; and which is worse, plead a custom for it: as if it were a custom for children to rob their parents. The Italians have a trick in the art of rapier and dagger; they will teach a scholar with a traverse or two, to get the point of his adversaries weapon, and then to lock him up so suit, that (turning away his face) he runs him thorough: and for-sooth he turns away his face, because he will behold no cruelty. It is Custom in England that locks up our points; and the Law takes away the Churches weapons by a trick of custom: yea men stand still, behold this, justify it: but God's Judgment shall find them unjust. 3. To private persons; such as steal away a man's good name with a felonious slander. Everyone is bound to preserve the reputation of his brother: he that abuseth it, (color his spleen with what pretence he can) shall be condemned for unjust. Such a man is a monster; his throat a sepulcher, his tongue a sword, his mouth a bag of poison. I know in diverse Courts, scandals have their just censures: but how if the Courts themselves admit of scandals? By the Law of quittance, he that accuseth another of crimes which blemish his credit, and cannot prove them; should undergo the punishment due to such an offense. Gallio drove the railing Jews from the Judgment seat: he knew they had more malice than matter: a rare example! Thus Lawyers often hunt a man at his form, and leave the cause at loss. A Captain of Darius hearing a mercenary soldier rail upon Alexander, stroke him with his Iavelin: Ego te ut pugns; I hired thee to fight against him, not to rail against him. Let Advocates plead the cause, not Petere adversarium, inveigh against the adverse party.

The great injustice of the world is oppression; that doth ravish the poor, not of their bodies, but of their estates. The hard hearted Levite did but pass by, without succouring the robbed passenger: it is wicked miserum relinquere, but worse miserum facere. If the Levite be taxed for not helping him, what is their punishment that robbed him? Such are depopulators, ruining people to feed beasts that where before men devoured sheep, now sheep devour men. This hath been an old disease, complained of by our forefathers: there were oppressors in their days, but the successors of them are now worse. Antigonus was a Tyrant bad enough; yet being dead, and a more cruel one succeeding him: a Cynicke fellow falls every day a digging by the high way. The passengers asked him what he digged for: he answers, Antigonum refodio, I would have Antigonus again. Rehoboams government made them ready to say, God be with Solomon. This caused the poor widow, an old Tenantesse, so to pray for the life of her young Land-lord, who had now the third time racked her rent. This he hearing, demanded the reason why she should so bless him, that had so cursed his father; seeing that he (in his modest phrase of oppression) had improved her rent. She answered; when your Grandfather dealt hardly with us, we wished him in his grave, hoping for some goodness in the next. Your father was worse than he; ew longed to be rid of him, our hopes looked on you; now you are the worst of all. And seeing by experience, seldom comes the better, we desire to keep you still: for certainly when you are gone, the next will be the Devil himself. Innumerable other be the demonstrations of Injustice; as the wicked borrows, and pays not again: the sword-man wounds the Image of his Maker: the tradesman abuses the simplicity of his customer: the lascivious corrupts the wife of his neighbor: these be capital unrighteousness, that bring men to Judgment.

3 To a man's self: so is the unthrift, that spends himself into poverty by pride and luxury. His father went to hell with Carrets, and he follows after with Potatoes: out of a laborious silk-worm rises often such a painted butterfly. The drunkard is unjust to himself; hath blood, and he fires it; spirits, and he chokes them; drowns himself on the dry land. So is the envious, that loseth the sweetness of his own, by grudging at his neighbors; that grinds himself to powder with his neighbors millstones: another's fatness shall keep him lean: and not being patient to tarry sicknesses leisure, or (which is more dispatching) his Empirics; soon dies of the sullens. The covetous of the unjust to himself; what he should add to the content of his nature, he adds to the continent of his treasure. It grudgeth his heart, that his heart should have any good. If his body be not kept pinning, his mind is repining. A secret and sore Judgment; that he who is unjust to all others, should be most unjust to himself. When pride, or lust, or mis-affection calls for the purse; it is ready: let the soul call for it; that cost may be spared. While you deny yourselves for a whole year the body and blood of your Savior, are you not unjust to yourselves? While you hear Sermons, the food of your souls, as if you had no stomach to them; you are more unjust to your spiritual life, than he that willfully famisheth himself, is accountable for his own death. Oh hear your consciences in time, and comfort them, lest they be never able to comfort you.

Thus you have heard the nature and specifications of Injustice; now look upon the continuance of it; for so much the word imports. God will not cast all sinners into hell, who then should go to heaven? but the unjust: such as practice unrighteousness without any recovery of repentance. The unrighteous shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven: it is the continuance in sin that excludes from mercy. Two things throw men to perdition, without the intervention of extraordinary favor; malice in sin, and utter apostasy. These be the symptoms of that endangered disease, for which there is no balm in Gilead; we call it the sin of the Holy Ghost. Not that it is against the third Person, as he is the third person, more than against the first or second: but because it is against the function or operation of that person, whose office is to illuminate the mind, and mollify the heart with love: therefore himself is called love. If men sin willfully after that they have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for their sins: because they maliciously have sacrificed their sacrifice, and split the only vessel that should save them. The iniquity of Eli's house shall not be purged with sacrifice forever: never expiated. There is a sin unto death, I do not say he shall pray for it. Every sin is unto death, but this Emphatically; with a prohibition of interceding set upon it; like the flaming sword that kept Paradise; Pray not for it. Schoolmen give this reason, why the sin of malice is unpardonable. The defect may find remission, where the will may pretend fear of excess. A sin of ignorance is often forgiven, as was Paul's; because a man may affect too much knowledge; as Adam did. A sin of infirmity is oft forgiven, because a man may affect too much power and dominion, as did the Angels. A sin of carnal fear is often forgiven, because a man may affect too much zeal; as did two of the Apostles. A sin of partiality is oft forgiven, because a man may affect too much Justice. But not a sin of malice, because a man can never affect too much charity.

No less doth Apostasy and falling off from God; Totus, a toto, in totum. A man may sin beyond all comfort in his own conscience, till he cannot hope for himself; as did Judas. Beyond all interest in the Churches devotion, till their prayers cannot help them: Pray not thou for this people. Beyond all claim to Christ's satisfaction; the blood of the Lamb shall not help them, Mat. 12.31. That which makes this sin past all cure, is, because it strives against the cure: as a mad man wounded, will not suffer his wounds to be bound up, but rather seeks to wound the Surgeon God hath mercy upon sinners, Christ came to call and die for sinners, there be none now in heaven but they were once sinners; which of all the holy Patriarchs, blessed Apostles, can excuse themselves that they never did act unjustly? But Injustice was none of their trade; they did not live in it, not die in it. Zacchaeus was once unjust, but he testified his repentance by charity and restitution. But they that practice unrighteousness to the end, in the end shall find judgment.

Are reserved.] This is the binding over: God puts off many wicked men from the Quarter Sessions, to the great Assizes. There is a Reservation that tendeth to good: as in the danger of wrack, much luggage is thrown over-board, the precious things are reserved. In the general slaughter of Amalek, Saul reserved Agog. Unless the Lord had reserved a remnant, we had been as Sodom. But here is a reservation to punishment: whether they sleep or wake, play or work, stand or walk, their time runs on, their judgment is nearer: and they are more surely kept unto it, than any dungeon with the thickest walls and strongest chains, can hold a Prisoner till his arraignment comes. This reservation affords us a twofold collection or observation.

1 Wickedness hath but a time, but the punishment of wickedness is beyond all time. The most raging sea of malice hath the bounds, the usque the devil himself knows that he hath but a short time. Stay till the Amorites sins be full, then comes their overthrow. The wicked are suffered to have their wills upon the righteous, their fills of unrighteousness; but How are they brought into desolation, & in a moment! The manner is scarce visible, the time scarce divisible: H•, and in a moment. Impudent Pharaoh bloodied with this unresisted tyranny, can belch our defiance in the face of heaven; Who is God? It is too much honor for man to receive a message from heaven; yet God sends to Pharaoh, and is repulsed. Humility says, What is man that God should regard him? Pride says, What is the Lord that I should regard him? Thus he domineers for a while; but ere God have done with him, he will be known to him, and known by him to all the world. He could have swept him away suddenly, as a man most unworthy to live; who with the same breath he receives denies the giver of it. But he was reserved to another purpose, he must rage a while longer, that his determined confusion might be the greater. He sees Israel crossing the sea, and wonders: yet hath neither the grace nor wit to retire. He is angry at the sea, thinks not on the Lord: sees not the plain difference which he puts betwixt his Israel and the Egyptians. He cannot now either consider or fear, it is his time to perish. Faire way he had, and smoothly ran on, till he came to the midst; not so much as one wave to wet the foot of his horse▪ When he is too far to escape, then God begins to strike. They know not why, but they wish themselves but again. Their Chariots grow heavy, when they had done them the service to bring them to their perdition.

Wicked men run not faster into sin, than they would run from judgment. But they shall find, that it was never so easy to post into transgression, but it will be more impossible to post from destruction. Saul's persecution makes David take many a weary step: he kills the Priests, consults with Witches; what not? He hath his day, but in mean time is reserved to the Lord's day: the battle in Gilb••b shall pay for all. The people are slain before his face, his sons fall under the swords of uncircumcised enemies, and the last scene of that tragical field is reserved for Saul himself. GOD is long ere he strikes, but when he doth, it is to purpose. The wicked man is not half so sure of transient pleasures, as he is of permanent plagues. Sin serves him as Abner did Ishbosheth; put him on the challenge of the Kingdom, and there leave him miserable: or as Tamberlaine helped Cosroe to the Kingdom of Persia, and then took it away again. It is like a boys squib; flashes, and cracks, and stinks, and is nothing. It serves him as Iael did Sisera; he asks water, she gives him milk: he wishes shelter, she makes him a bed: he begs but the protection of her Tent, she covers him with a mantle: she gives more than he asks, but withal, more than he expects. When his troublous thoughts were pacified with the change, and he flatters himself, It is better to be here, than in the whirling of Chariots, in the horror of fight or flight; among such wounds, such shrieks, such carcasses. But as when Agag says, the bitterness of death is past, even then he feels the sword: so in these contentful thoughts Sisera dies: the terror of Israel lies bleeding at the foot of a woman. Do we see impudent sinners flourish, awe the greatest, confront yea control Magistracy? It is their time, and they take it: do what mischief they can, answer it as they may. But the Lord

l•ghes at him, for he seeth that his day is coming. There is a day of reckoning and that day is coming, and the Lord sees it. He that may reckon with them at any time, will not reckon till that time.

2 The unjust are already reserved, the decree is past against them. They are bound over to the last Assizes by a threefold recognisance, as it were with infrangible, though insensible chains of Judgment. The bond of their sins, the bond of their conscience, and the bond of omnipotent Justice: and this threefold cable is not easily broken.

The first bond is their sins; He shall be holden with the cords of his sins. His own shackles shall hold him fast enough, he needs no stronger chains than those he makes for himself. It may be asked the sinner, what he means to make his fetters so strong? Saul was ever from the beginning his own enemy; neither did any hands hurt him but his own. At last, his death is suitable to his life; his own hand pays him the reward of all his wickedness: he that had been so long a killing his soul, now makes as short work with his body; Satan needs not bind a reprobate faster than he bind himself. The wicked do not, like temporal malefactors, go under baile; where it is but forfeiting the recognisance, and scape: for every step they take in sin, brings them directly forward to their Judgment.

Therefore is this bondage called a death: sin being the death of life on earth, and the life of death in hell. There may be certain degrees in this spiritual dying, as there are in a corporal dissolution. There is a Syncope or swooning, an Epileps•e or falling sickness, an Apoplexy or cold palsy; which if it be to all, is also final. The former are incident to the faithful, but recoverable by their ordinary repentance: as a man in a swoon is restored by sprinkling cold water, or bowing forward the body. The second are greater crimes, deadly sins; so expelling the Spirit of God, that no sign of his Presence appears. It must be an extraordinary repentance, that recovers these offenders: as a man in the falling sickness, by striving, sweating, beating of himself. No• they that are in a swoon, or foaming under a Epilepsie, are bound fast enough, they cannot run away yet such fits and falls may be recovered. But when it comes to an Apoplexy, a putrefied custom, a rotten obstinacy in sin; the grave does not surer bind a dead body within her mouldy bars, than these bonds of obduratenesse enchain such a soul. There may remain a while some small appearance of breath, a little natural warmth: yet is it impossible, without a miracle, to recover that spiritual life, which is so long, so universally excluded.

There is a proceeding with the mortified conscience, as with the dead •case. First the dead man that is to be buried, is the impenitent sinner; resembling a corps in many respects. 1. In lack of sense; so lethargis'd in sin, that he feels not the prickings and woundings of a sore heart. Lay a mountain upon a dead man, he feels not the weight. CHRIST counsels him to buy restoratives; he perceives no need to buy: the cause of buying is the feeling of want, not the want of feeling. There is no love to God, no charity to men, in them: they have the true love of sense, but not the true sense of love. 2. In lack of appetite; they neither hunger nor thirst after righteousness; as being full of sinful crudities. Life brings appetite, appetite desires meat, and meat affords nourishment: if the soul hungers not, it lives not. Appetite is sharper in famine than in plenty: a double punishment; more stomach, and less meat: but these desire not the body and blood of Christ. There is no corporal affection like thirst; as we see in Hagar, in Sampson, in Christ himself suffering; not Esurio, but Sitio; extreme heat working upon the radical moisture. But dry these souls are to the death, yet feel no thirst after the waters of life. 3. In lack of motion: Indeed; a dead body hath a natural propension downwards: so these unjust men have a passive motion, feruntur in infernum: but they cannot actively move one finger to goodness. A corps is a heavy disanimated lump, pressing downwards; as sin cast Dathan from this world, Lucifer out of heaven. 4. In lack of heat, infected with the poison of that Serpent, which is cold in the fourth degree, mortal. When a man is dead, chafe him, rub him, bow him, put Aqua-vitae into him; then take him by the hand, and bid him walk; yet he cannot stir the least joint; except the soul be restored, all persuasions be in vain. 5. In lack of sweetness; the soul, his salt being gone, what can keep it from putrefaction? Thus is adultery a noisome uncleanness; Slander an unsavory breath, like the steam that comes from a new open grave; their throat being an open sepulcher. Heapes of ill-gotten wealth is a very dunghill; all wickedness like stinking carrion to GOD.

Now the coffin or grave for such a sinner, is three-fold; according to his death. The sepulcher of the body is the earth, the sepulcher of the soul is the body; the sepulcher of both dying in sin, is hell: as there is natural, spiritual and eternal death. The Bearers that carry him, are four. 1. Hope of life; neither age nor sickness can put him out of that hope. 2. Promise of repentance to himself, when he can sin no longer. 3. Presumption of mercy; as if God must needs save him, because he made him. 4. Love of the world, which makes him forget the world to come. These carry him out of life, as the widows son was borne out of the gates of the City. A wanton eye carries a man out, by the gates of his sight: a swearing tongue, by the gate of his mouth: itching after scurrilous speeches, by the gate of his ears.

Thus dead is every obstinate sinner: dead in sin, saith Paul; yea, saith the Lord. It is not the opinion of some Physician, that may be deceived in his principalls, but it is a Dicit Dominus. It is said of Adam fallen, as of a condemned malefactor; Mortuus in lege. Not only in respect of the dissimilitude betwixt God's life, and theirs: which is such an alienation, as is indeed a diametrical opposition. But in the order and course of God's Justice, sentencing death to everyone that sins: and this death must be answered either in the sinner, or in the Savior. So they are as dead to God, as a Traitor to the Prince, or as a Felon is to the Judge.

This is one especial bond, whereby they are reserved and bound over to the day of Judgment; a death in sin. Not, but that CHRIST is able to raise the dead, and to lose these bonds. He raised three sorts of dead in the three years of his Ministry. One in the house; Iairus his daughter: another in the gate; the widows son: a third in the grave, which was Lazarus. Saint Augustine thus resembles them a sinner is dead in the house, when he sins secretly, imagining mischief in his mind. He is carried out of the gate, when he sins openly, not confining it withindoores: but brings it forth, in word or deed, and makes it scandalous to the Church. He stinks in the grave, when he sins habitually, without any remorse. The first may be raised by Doctrine, the next by discipline: as appears by Christ's own practice and direction, John. 2.15. Matth. 18.17. But what shall we do with the incorrigible and customary sinner, who is dead in the grave? Only pray with Mary: Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died: but I know, all things are possible unto thee. Now there was weeping for the damsel dead in the house: more weeping for the man carried out of the gate; the mother wept, the Church laments: but most weeping at Lazarus his grave: Martha wept, and Mary wept, and the Jews wept, and Jesus wept, and groaned in the Spirit. We ought to weep penitently for the beginnings of sin, more for the proceeding and increase, most of all for the completion and accomplishment of death; when the sinner betakes himself to the scorners chair, deriding God and all goodness. Let us say in the Church, as Demosthenes did in Athens; we have more cause to weep for the lives of the bad, than for the deaths of the good. It is over the spiritually dead, that the confused Choir of hell sing Epinicions, and songs of triumph. They are glad to see us sin in the house, admitting an ill motion to our purpose: rejoice at our carrying forth breaking out into notorious offenses: are most merry, when we continue in filthiness, till we stink in the sepulcher. O let us hearken to Christ Surge; sit up and speak; to comfort our mother on earth, to please our father in heaven.

The next bond is their evil conscience; an infallible binder, hell it self is not surer. Such a man is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ,damned of his own self. Unless he could run away from himself, he cannot scape this Judgment. There be three acts of conscience. 1. Before the deed is done, examining whether it be lawful or unlawful. 2. In the deed doing, allowing or resisting. 3. After the deed done, approving or condemning. There be diverse reasons why every man hath a conscience.

1 That man might have an internal School-master to direct him: now the fittest for this office is conscience. If the Irascible or concupiscible part had been our governors, either they would have been often absent, or else led us amiss. What a beast is man under the regiment of lust or sense? and how seldom does anger play the game with reason? But conscience like a pulley, keeps reason in the right wheel; and either cashiers mutinous affections, or executes martial Law upon them. If only outward Rulers were to govern us; they have no eyes to see the mind: there might be mis-rule enough within doors, and they never the wiser. Therefore they would either be contemned for meanenesse, or condemned for partiality. But in the conscience there is both awe enough, and Justice enough; and every man is willing to be ruled by his own mind: if not, this School-master hath a rod to compel him.

2 That he might have a thing within him to put him in remembrance. In the Law a man will do nothing without his counsel learned; but for the passages of his life, he seldom stands upon advise. This Monitor will be ever plucking him by the sleeve, telling him, this action is naught, God is angry at it, unshiftable plagues attend it. David portavit in pectore, tanquam Imaginem pictam, adulterii & homicidii. The word doth but sometimes discover our corruption: it is the Glass Saint James speaks of, wherein we look, and see our Image, but turn our backs, and forget it. But conscience is always at hand; it is the continual reflection of the soul upon it self. Even in the dark it will represent to a man his own form, make his wounds smart, and send him a main to the Physician.

3 That he may have a Judge within him: wherein conscience hath yet a higher office. For, 1. a School-master may be despised. Customary sinners, like boys grown tall and stubborn, contemn the rod. A remembrancer may be dispraised; and said as Hushai of Achitophel; his counsel is good, but not at this time: but a Judge we all tremble at. 2. External Judges may be corrupted, but the conscience will take no bribes. O that as every Judge hath a conscience, so this conscience might evermore give the Judgment. 3. The guilty person may fly from another Judge; but there is no evasion of conscience. Nescis temeraria, nescis quem fugias, ideoque fugis. It is impossible for a man to run away from himself. 4. Great men cannot be brought to Judgment-seats: the poor are like materia prima, under generation, so under reformation: but the rich are like stars above the Moon, too high for the reach of ordinary power. When a company of Lacedemonian Gallants had defiled the bench and seat of Judgment; the Magistrates at first stormed, and vowed punishment. But when they knew who did it, they enacted a Law of exception; Liceat illis, It is lawful for those Gentlemen to do what they will. But be they never so great, this Judge will make them stoop. 5. Preachers dare not reprove all men particularly: such an attempt would bring them into contempt. Conscience fears no man; dares check a Magistrate, control a Prince. It may sometime slumber; no woman is always scolding: but when she wakens she will speak.

4 That man might have his comfort, or his torment, within him. Comfort to the righteous; in all afflictions they have this stay, that they be not overwhelmed with sorrow. Though they be condemned, this approves; affords liberty in prison; in the want of outward food, this sustains: it is the Hidden manna. Torment to sinners; that they may taste of God's Judgments even in this life. In the midst of all their prosperous fortunes, they have inward tortures. A malefactor in prison, though he fare well, yet is tormented with the thought of ensuing judgment. It is the hand-writing on the wall, that prints bloody characters in Belshazzars heart. This is the breakings out of the flames of Tophet, a little module of hell: as a looking glass broken into many small pieces, everyone can show the contracted form. This is another indissoluble chain that binds them over.

The last bond of this reservation is the immutable justice of God. In respect of his decree before the world, and suffering them to heap up sin in the world, that they may be punished in the world to come. But this is to be adored with reverence and with silence. Novit Dominus, he knows how to do it.

For ourselves let us take external prosperity for no good mark of our election: the fattest beasts are kept for the slaughter. Flatter we not ourselves with the sense of impunity: the less sorrow we feel, the more we have cause to fear; for the more may be behind. Let us break off our sins by repentance, that God may break the bonds of our durance. Pray with David; Bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise thy name: Rescue my soul from destructions, my darling from the Lions. That our sins being remitted, and our consciences quieted; we may live in grace, and go to the grave in peace: and when all books be opened, our sins may have no sin found in it, but instead thereof, the righteousness of JESUS CHRIST.

Unto the day of judgment.] This is the Assizes. Lewd persons riot in the Gaole of their durance; yet when the Session comes, they begin to be a little calm; put off their disguises of dissoluteness, and put on some modesty and semblance of humiliation. Then they change their apparel, their garbes, their, looks; all to appear civil. If the meditation of this dreadful day when all hearts shall be searched, all secret corruptions embowelled, a final sentence pronounced, by a Judge that cannot be deceived, upon sinners that would not be converted: if this cannot make us tremble; our hearts disdain comparison for hardness with the nether millstone.

Judgment is diversely understood. For rule and government, Mat. 12.18. Order them aright. For equity, Luk. 11.42. Ier. 22.3. For opinion, Dogma. 1. Cor. 4.3. That is a man's Judgment, which he thinks. For plagues and calamities, Exod. 7.4. For righteousness and holiness. All the ways of God are Judgment and Truth, Prov. 28.5. For authority, John. 5.27. For God's secret council, Rom. 11.33. For our afflictions, 1 Pet. 4.17. 1 Cor. 11.32. Here it is taken for a determination, or giving a sentence by a Judge on the Bench, and in the seat of justice. For this there is a Court, and a Throne. The Court shall be kept in the Clouds; if any ask, why rather on earth, than in heaven? I answer, the malefactor to be judged hath sinned on the earth; and it is the manner of secular Judges there to keep the Assizes, where men committed the trespasses. All the Elements have been abused by sinners, therefore are they judged in the midst of the Elements: that the very place guilty of their fault, might be satisfied with their ruin. Again, to be admitted into heaven, though there to be judged, is an honor whereof sinful nature is not capable: therefore they must remain in the lower parts of the world. No reprobate man or devil shall ever see God: Christ indeed they shall see in the glory of a Judge, not in the glory of God. There is also a Throne: earthly Kings, when they will show themselves to their Subjects in awful Majesty; ascend their Thrones: this is the highest state of a Kingdom. This Throne shall be most terrible to the wicked; A fiery flame, and the wheels burning fire. But to the faithful there is a Rain-bow about it, to qualify the terribleness of it.

To the day of judgment.] This point I have diverse times handled: therefore to avoid a coincidence of discourse, I fasten only upon two meditations, formerly not observed. The sufficiency of the Judge, and the necessity of the judgment.

1 First the sufficiency of the Judge: his infinite perfection cannot be better discerned of us, than by comparison. There be two main conditions that con••re to the making up of a Judge: outward warrant, and inward inablement.

For the former; Judgment is not every man's work, there must be commission and designment for it. There have been indeed some extraordinary actions of Justice, without specification of warrant. Such was the act of Phineas, for which some plead extraordinary instinct from God: and doubtless, he would not have accepted that sacrifice, if himself had not prompted it. So he had the substance of authority, from private revelation, though not the form of authority from public deputation. But I rather think that his judgment was also solemnly warranted. For both, God says to Moses, Hang up the heads: and Moses to the under-rulers, everyone slay his men, that were joined to Baal-peor. So that for this execution every Israelite is made a Magistrate; and then why not Phineas? But it is objected, that he was a Priest, and his place for peace and mercy. I answer even this act of justice was a work of mercy: Samuel thought it not out of his office, to hew Agag in pieces. They might make a carcass which might not touch it. Levi got the Priest-hood by such a sacrifice, shedding the blood of Idolaters. Thus ordinary justice might well bear out Phineas in that act. But it is not for every man to challenge this office: private persons may only pray for the redress of sin: if the man be not warranted, it is a lawful question, Who made thee a judge? Now if a deputed Judge be of great authority, who hath yet a Supreme Magistrate over him, to examine and reform him; how mighty is this Judge? Qua'tus ill judex, qui facit judices; that makes, yea, and unmakes Judges? That judgeth them; and if they do ill, condemns them? By him Kings reign, and Judges rule: by him shall Kings and Judges be called to account. The Jews once questioned Christ; By what authority doest thou these things? And the fools of the world would fain doubt it. But this day shall show, that the Father hath committed all judgment unto the Son.

For the other, which is Enablement; whatsoever sufficiency is in other Judges, comes from the Lord; how infinite then is himself? To make a sufficient Judge, these virtues are required.

1 Knowledge, Deut. 1.13. A man can best judge of that which he knoweth. Ignorantia judicis, calamitas innocentis. It is bad at the Barre, worse on the bench. An Advocate's ignorance can wrong but one man's cause, a Judge's may prejudice the whole Country. In this, Paul thought himself happy; that he stood before a Judge expert in the Laws, Wisdom is better than weapons of war. Without this a Magistrate is but a blind Poliphemus, a great Monster without an eye. A stander by can say, this you cannot do by law: or in derision, you are beside your book. It is a shame for a Justicer, that before he can tell what to do, he must go consult his Clark.

Otherwise he must weave a resolution out of his own brains, as Spiders spin their cobwebs out of themselves. If he hit on the right, it is beholding to his luck: and so he relieves the plaintives hope, not with constant equity, but with an uncertain lottery: and fills up the time, with that which empties the occasion; some Adage, or a stolen jest of stale wit, or a patch of Poetry. But our Judge hath clear eyes to discern the cause: and knows the law, for it was of his own making. There is nothing that can Latere cognitionem, vel effugere potestatem. The Jesuit cannot equivocate with him, though he have tricks beyond the devil.

2 Courage, Magnanimity, or Spirit: typified in Judah, that judiciary Tribe; whose Emblem or Escoucheon, was a Lion Couchant; that lies by the prey without fear of rescue, and turns not his head at the fight of any creature. The principal pillars of a house had need be heart of Oak. Of soft wood, or bending lead, Carpenters will not make them Rules: and are flexible dispositions fit for Rulers? Men do not choose a starting horse to lead the Teame. He had need be of David's valor, that can snatch the prey out of the Lions mouth, rescue the oppressed from him that is too mighty for him. Now all the courage of man is but the gift of God. In thy hand it is to give strength to all. If a beam be so radiant, how glorious is the Sun himself? The Judge of all the world is inflexible: it is falsely said of Cato, that the Sun might sooner alter his course, than he pervert his course of Justice. The stoutest and strongest may yield, either for fear, as Pilate when he heard but a buzz that he was not Caesar's friend. Or for favor, as Eli; that buried the living severity of a Judge, and burning zeal of a Priest, in the frozen and dead indulgence of a father. But whom should this Judge fear, or who can deserve his favor? No audacious swaggerer dares cross him, no great man's letters can prevail with him: nor the frowns of kings, nor the flatteries of Courtiers, can move him.

3 Integrity; there must be no corruption in him. The brain had need be of a strong constitution, that can disperse and dispel the fumes surging from a vicious stomach, liver, or spleen. He whom neither clamour, nor rumour, nor terror; neither furious passion, nor melting compassion, can divert from Justice; is fit to be a Judge. In this Court of Christ, there will be no commuting, give me thy silver for thy sin. No dispensing; Bear with me, and I will bear with thee. No conniving, as Eli; the Judge shall judge it; whereas himself was Judge, and did not judge it: so sentencing himself, while he did not sentence his sons. No slubbering over a cause, without ransacking the bowels of it. But a vindicating of truth out of all the dens and thickets of juggling conveyance. The Scholar searcheth it by disputation, in thesi: the Judge by examination, in hypothesi. Neighbourhood is my friend, alliance is my friend, bounty is my friend; but Justice is my friend above all. Thus Job searched out the cause which he knew not. Man doth search before he finds, God doth find before he searches. Man goes by discourse, by certain rules and principles and general deductions, and from thence concludes: GOD sees at first. Man and truth are two several things; truth and God is all one.

Mortall Judges may be blinded with bribes; and the champions of Justice become Mammons slaves. This acceptatio muneris, pravaricatio veritatis. A gift in the bosom wresteth Judgment: the injection of a dram sways the golden balance of Justice, and so the cause is poised by the weight of the bribe. If the left hand be full of bribes, the right must be full of mischief. But our Judge is not thus to be wrought upon: Shall not the Judge of all the world do right? Did not the Judge in his mortal flesh, scourge such money merchants with zealous severity? Did not his Apostle with fiery indignation ban Simon and his money? It comes to pass that whole kingdoms and Churches perish, because such men and their moneys perish not. O if this Judge would take gold, how few rich men would go to hell? But gold hath lost millions of souls; it never did, never shall, save one. A dram of grace shall be more worth then, than all the treasures of the earth. Sublunary materials have their places; Iron is taken out of the earth, and brass moulten out of the stone: the sun is found in his orbe, fire in his element, &c. But where is grace to be found, and what is the place of Justice? It is not found in the land of the living. Nature says, It is not in me: wealth and honor disclaim it; It is not found in us. Then how shall we do in the day of Judgment? It is found in the treasury of Jesus.

This point willingly and usefully extends it self to Magistrates, of what place soever; collaterally to all persons: teaching them to do equity, and to preserve integrity.

1 Do Justice; to this the Judge stands bound in reason, as the proper act of his function: if he be not at leisure to do this, it is time to unjudge him; as the woman said to Philip, Noli regnare. Judgment is not man's, but the Lord's. Judges are a kind of living instruments; and the nature of Instruments consists in the use and operation: as a knife is only to cut. Ad nihilum valet, quod non valet ad finem suum: if the axe be not good to hew, we say it is good for nothing. What then say you to those Magistrates, that have eyes and see not, ears and hear not? They are Idols: only one defect of those Idols they are not troubled with: we cannot say, They have hands, and handle not: for they handle too much: so much of the money, that they care not to handle the cause. Eyes they have, and see not: feet they have, and walk not: mouths they have, and speak not: hands they have, but they do handle. These are Instruments without operation: for Judicem Iudicare, is as agreeable and natural, as for the eye to see, the ear to hear. If the other be not Idols, sure they are Idolaters: golden calves if they be not, yet they are worshippers of golden calves. Yet in doing Justice, I would not have Judgment triumph over mercy; whereas mercy rejoiceth against Judgment. To banish all favor, is to banish some equity. There may be favors within the cause, not favors without the cause: legal favors, though not personal. Where no wrong is done to Justice, there may be fair use and place for Mercy.

2 Keep integrity; what place soever you make good: it is the spiritual constitution and best health of your souls. The breach of this, the Apostle calls a Ship-wrack; and a Divine, Solutionem continui. The weight of all goodness will leave us, when we leave that: it shall pour contempt upon Princes, and make a great Antiochus called a vile person. As we love our lives, as we love our souls; through all the transitory, temporary, momentary passages of this world; let us preserve the life of our lives, and soul of our souls, our integrity.

2 The necessity of this judgment. That this should be, it stands both with the Justice and Mercy of God. It is a righteous thing with God, to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you, to you that are troubled, rest with us, rest with himself. For this world, they are afflicted most, that serve God best: and men of worst conscience flow with abundance. So that the world thinks none miserable, but the conscionable: the more holy, the less happy. Who have more seconds and friends at a pinch, than the deoboisht sons of Belial, the roaring Monsters of the world, that with Crest and breast oppose all hindrance in the way of their lusts and humors? What plotting, what siding there is to maintain a Ruffian, to countenance some disordered Retainer, to uphold a rotten Ale-house, to procure a Homicides pardon; who sees not? Whereas a good man's trouble is by all cunning aggravations greatned; as if the world meant all hurt against him, that means none. O if in this life only we had hope in Christ, we were of all men the most miserable. There had need be a judgment; and for this cause among the rest, the Saints cry instantly, incessantly; Come Lord Jesus, come quickly.

Be pleased to consider this point also comparatively. Without judgment how could any Nation stand? All things would run to disorder and confusion, but for this. There can be no society among men without indifferency: there is no indifferency, where offense is done without satisfaction: satisfaction may be sought many ways, can no way be enforced, but by judgment. This they resolve into several acts of judiciary proceeding, even from the Summons to the Sentence, from God's own example in the first sinners conviction. If visible powers were not more feared, than the invisible God, the world would be overrun with outrage. Even when God's own Israel had offended, Moses makes them bleed for it, He that was so good, that he would rather perish himself, than Israel should perish; yet pronounceth sentence of death on the Idolaters, rejoices and blesseth the executioners. It is charity as well as justice, to punish offenders: and it is hard to say whether God loves more; a pitiful justice, or a punishing mercy. But might not those sinners have repented and lived? Or if they must be punished, can nothing serve but death? Or if they must die, shall it be by the hands of their brethren? Or if brethren must cut their throats, shall it be done in the heat of their sins? Yes, so God commanded; and even that judgment was mercy: judgment on the bad, mercy to the whole: the corrupt blood is let out, that the body may be preserved. Moses had a soft heart, but zealous and wise: pitiful he was, not fond.

A sinful Common-wealth cannot live, unless it bleed in the common vein. There is not a better sacrifice to God, than the blood of malefactors: this sacrifice so pleased him in the hands of the Levites, that they alone must sacrifice to him still. Next to our prayers, we do no better service to God, than in punishing obstinate sinners; if they deserve it even unto blood. How doth this free the Land from those Judgments, which God otherwise would inflict! His revenge pursues transgressors; but if the revenge of man's justice overtake it, God gives over the chase: to execute this judgment, saves him a labor. If the Land be defiled with blood, in duels, drunken quarrels; there is no way to purge it, but by their blood that polluted it. Often hath the Lord done justice on the whole body, because the head hath not done justice on a member: and the seasonable infliction of a less punishment hath avoided a greater. The Tribe of Levi by shedding the blood of the Idolatrous Israelites, was cleared from the blood of the innocent Shechemites. The best friends to the State are the impartial Ministers of judgment: nor do the prayers of them that sit still and do nothing, so much pacify God's wrath against us, as their just retribution. We gaze and wonder at the iniquity of the Land, yea shed tears for it: but it is the public sword of our authority in correcting it, that must reconcile the Lord. Governors are faulty of those sins they see and punish not. It is no less than a good sight in a State, even a Malefactor at the Gall-house. We could not eat our meat, nor sleep in our beds, nor say our prayers in peace; but for judgment. Such is the necessity of it, that no State can stand without it.

This is a benefit in our Land which we must acknowledge by experience, God grant we may acknowledge with thankfulness. We have Courts and judgment seats for all causes; spiritual and temporal, civil and criminal, pecuniary and capital. We have Judges visiting all the great Cities twice in the year at least: so that the people cannot complain that they travel far for justice, nor except against trial, who stand or fall by the deposition and verdict of their nearest neighbors. The Widow took a right course in soliciting the Judge. When they have matters, saith Moses, they come to me. And when Christ chargeth us to Agree with our adversary, &c. he speaks not against just proceeding in Law: but rather ratifies and rectifies the course of civil Justice. Being smitten he stroke not again; yet he expostulated De facto, John.

18.23. Paul reproofing the High Priests in justice, was yet prepared to suffer: and he appealed unto Caesar. If then it be so necessary for man, that he cannot conserve his profit, credit, quiet, life it self, without judgment: how much more stands it with the honor of God? There be innumerable sins, which neither the eye of man sees, nor the arm of man can reach: these must not scape, God must be glorified in all: now he cannot be glorified, unless all transgression be punished, and all obedience crowned. I conclude.

O that men would therefore prepare themselves for this last and great audit. I beheld a pale horse, and his name that sat on him was Death; and hell followed him. Many tremble at death, but how would they be affrighted if they could see his follower, hell? The Foxes doth not more wait upon the Lions, nor Crowes upon Armies, nor Gaolers on Serjeants, than the devil attends on death for a booty. Death is but as the hook, that jerkes the reprobates like fishes out of the pond of this world: there is afterward a fire and a Frying-pan, or scalding caldron to come. Let us eat and drink, tomorrow we shall die? Never beast made such a senseless argument: Riot, because we shall die? How strange is such a conclusion to such a promise? It is all one with them to be a Farmers hog, or an Aldermans Horse, or a Ladyes puppy; or themselves: that think death the full period, the last and final cessation of the creature. So when Antisthenes cries out in his pangs, Who shall ease me? Diogenes tenders him a knife, to cut his own throat. Our frantic combatants, falsely termed brave spirits; as prodigal of their lives as Cocks and Dogs, pouring them out on every drunken quarrel; little think of this dreadful day to come. It is not the loss of the men we so much pity; good for nothing but to stop breaches, and make up forlorn hopes, in the mouth of Cannons; but it is the loss of their souls. If they did think of this judgment, they would have little list to such desperate combats. For who would not rather welcome a Rapier or Pistol, than a lingering and racking sickness; but for this consequence; that after death comes judgment.

Death is but the beginning of sorrows; when we have done with him, judgment begins with us. Yet too many banish this meditation as too melancholy: and like children or cowards, rather shut their eyes, and choose to feel the blow, than to see and avoid it. How silly is it to fear death, whose pangs be sometimes less than the tooth-ach; more than the day of Judgment, which whom it finds out of CHRIST, shall cast into everlasting fire? So fools fear the thundercracke, and not the thunder-bolt: the report of the ordinance, not the bullet: the Serjeans arrest more than the Gaolers Imprisonment. Let us not seek to avoid death, this we cannot, but prepare ourselves for the trial, this we may. Some a little wiser, and a very little better, upon a cold thought of death, <◇> a short breathed parley of Judgment. And then after a sigh or two, put all upon a LORD have mercy on us; we trust it shall go as well with us as with others; even as GOD will have it. These have some scattered and preposterous flashes of the last Judgment in their consciences; yet take no cou• to get faith and pardon in JESUS CHRIST. Most men think all well, an• they shall answer the matter easily enough; not weighing the horror of their sins. But how fearfully do they find themselves deluded, when their souls •w•, as Jonah did in the tempest; in the gulf of fire and brimstone? Let us ballast our s•p before we put to sea, lest we perish in the main: and judge ourselves, that we be not judged in the day of Jesus Christ.

To be punished.] This is the execution. It were a vain Session, if malefactors were not put to execution. Irrite and forcelesse are those censures, which impunity follows. The mulcts and fines which are not required, do make wickedness more bold and insensible. But after God's Judgment follows an unavoidable execution: the unjust are not only judged, but punished. Among men, good laws droope into contempt, by making difference of offenders: magistrates are afraid to meddle with the outrages of the mighty. Whence it comes, that small thefts are condemned to carts, while the great sacrileges are honored in coaches. If the great beast make a gappe in the mound, the whole heard will not be afraid to follow. It was the Lord's charge to Moses, hang up the heads. God could as well have stroke the rulers, as the people: yet while himself punisheth the vulgar, he bids Moses punish the Princes; which one would think should have been more properly reserved to his own immediate hand. Yet these he leaves to human authority, that he might procure awe to his own ordinances. It is the impartial execution of noble offenders, that wins credit to government: and the want of it cuts the sinews of any state. If their sins have made them base, let there be no favor in their penalty. But in this Judgment, God respects no persons: he knows no valor, no honor, no riches, no royalty, in the matter of sin: but Tribulation and anguish on every soul of man that doth evil. He knows nothing in man, nothing for man, but only the righteousness of one, God and man, his son Jesus. There is a sin among men, for which there may be some mediation; but if a man sin against God, who shall entreat for him? None but Christ. To be punished, From hence I will only derive these two collections.

1 That man's soul is immortal, and his body shall be raised again: otherwise how could there be a punishment after the day of Judgment? Carnal reason can hardly imagine, how a soul should have subsistence after it's separation from the body: it seems incredible, because it is invisible. But Eagles can see more than Owls: nor was mere nature ignorant of this; through all clouds of error she could see this clear truth; that souls die not with their bodies. This is an inbred instinct sucked from the breast of nature, an indelible principle stamped in the soul by God himself, not to be rased out. The waggoner hath a being though his coach be broken: the ship is wrack'd on the sea, yet the mariner may swim to harbor: the addar lives after she hath slipped off her coat: the musician keeps his skill, though his lute be broken: the snail may creep out, and leave his shell behind. Beside faiths clear sight, and supernatural revelation; I saw souls under the Altar: John did see spirits.

Reason it self can find no absurdity in it. 1. I know my soul to be in my body, I cannot see it: my body is but a house of clay: cannot another substance be as capable of this soul, as clay? may not the air, or heaven, or any other place, contain it as well as earth. 2. The soul is not guided by the body, but the body by the soul: that may be choleric, when the body is phlegmatic: that cheerful, when the other is melancholy. Diverse Martyrs have expressed solid joy, when their corporal torments have been extreme: as if they had been spirits without bodies. The body would often eat, when the soul hath a mind to fast: the body would sleep, the soul rouseth it up to pray: often have you seen a cheerly mind in a distemperd body. Now if their dispositions be so manifestly cross; that the one can be well, when the other is ill: one grieved and troubled, when the other is in perfect health: it is plain, that this soul may as well be, and be sensible, out of the body, as in the body.

It were foolish for men to be so careful about their surviving names, if their souls were extinguishable with their bodies. What is that honor to me, whereof I am not sensible? If death were the destruction of the whole nature and substance, a good remembrance were to little purpose: and men had better leave their posterity more wealth, though less credit behind them.

Death it self were but a toy, if no Judgment followed it, or if there was no soul to be judged. It were then only as the breaking of a pitcher, which was full of nothing but fluid air. He were a coward that would fear death, if he thought it to be the end of all fear. Expiration were not terrible, if it left nothing that remains sensible.

If the soul does exhale as sensual brutes, why does it understand more than brutes? The soul of the beast is as salt to keep it sweet: man's hath a nobler and more Divine dowry: it can discourse, reason, forecast, invent, remember: it can read, exercise arts, deduce conclusions; which be characters of an immortal nature. For men will not write on waters, nor ingrave curiously in snow, ye, or such liquefying stuff. Therefore it is a particle of Divine breath, inspired into formed loame by God himself. It doth not arise out of the body, but is infused into it: therefore may as well exist without the body after, as it did without the body before. Dust returns to dust, the spirit to him that gave it: both to their originals, dust to dust, heaven to heaven. First, the soul goes to this Tribunal, then the body to earth: first the soul is judged and punished or rewarded, as the principal in good or evil: afterwards the body, as a mere accessory. The soul of the righteous is first, crowned, as that which more purely and primarily served God: the body did but rather hinder: therefore must come after. Dies mortis corpori, dies nativitatis animae.

The body is but sometimes awake, the soul is never a sleep. The body is infirm and dull; now that which never sleeps in the body, shall certainly never sleep out of the body. And how is that liable to death, that is not capable of sleep? In the dearest and deepest slumbers, that is always discoursing, working, thinking: death's younger brother cannot overcome it, sleep's elder brother shall not annihilate it. No Somniferous Opium, or dormitory potion can charm this into slumber: yea, it doth not seldom exercise the faculties with more freedom in the epilogue of sickness, in the confines yea even article of death: and shows more vigor in the corporal weakness, than it did in the fullness of health: as a prisoner looks and speaks more cheerfully, when the windows be open, than when all are shut up in darkness. Yea, it rejoiceth at death, as at the keepers turning of the key, to open the door, and set it at liberty. It leaves the body, as the inhabitant leaves a rotten and ruinous house; as a carpenter leaves his axe when the edge is blunted: or as a musician lays by his lute, when the strings are broken: or as a guest makes hast out of his Inn in Domum aternitatis sua, to his long home. She never sleeps in sleep, therefore not in death: for death is a long sleep as sleep is a short death. Elias prays that the Childs soul may come to him again; therefore it was not extinct, though out of the body. Lord Jesus receive my spirit, was Saint Stephens farewell: his spirit was not stoned to death. Fear not him that can kill the body only, &c. To kill the body is one thing, to kill the soul another. By Saint Paul's choice, 2 Cor. 5.8. a man may be at once absent from the body, and present with the Lord. As thou livest, and as thy soul liveth, saith Uriah to David, he speaks of two different lives. The rich man was in hell: no man thinks his body there; it was his soul. GOD is called Deus viventium, the GOD of the living: now the bodies of the Saints are dead, therefore their souls be safe.

To conclude then, the soul is not a vapor, but a spirit: not an accident, but a substance; the bodies elder sister, an excellent Queen over it: in it but not mixed; but separable from it: a guest that falls not with the house: but departs from it for a better habitation: and when it is re-edified at the Resurrection, will revisit and reunite it again to it self. Thus it lies not a dying with the flesh: but as when the body sleeps, the soul sleeps not: so when the body dies, the soul dies not. If it have kept house well, it shall be exalted to everlasting peace: if been unjust in life, after death it must be punished.

But is the soul only accountable, is that alone liable to punishment? No, the body that hath accompanied it in the sin, must not be separated in the penalty. Diverse have believed the souls immortality, that have doubted the resurrection of the body: and this error seems to have found place in some of the Corinthians. How say some of you, that there is no resurrection? Some of you, all do not say so: S. Paul doth not wrap up the innocent and orthodox with the rest in the same accusation. Many acknowledged this, some doubted: therefore he spends a long Chapter in this argument: which I forbear to amplify, as not daring to suspect any of us taken with such an hesitation. The soul never dies, and a man is not a man without his body; therefore there must be a resurrection of bodies. Let a green twig be bowed together by the hand of man: when the hand is gone it will come to it self again. Some are so nimble that they can lay their heel on their head; yet is not this the right place: but after such a forcible violence, the whole body comes again to the first proportion. Death may take one piece of man from another; but when he shall be driven to let go his hold, these two parts shall join. The soul is a spirit, and cannot be called a man without the body: no man is said to be a husband that hath no wife: nor is the sap a tree: nor fair written paper called a book, till it be bound up in a cover. The soul in heaven is not a perfect man without the body. Uses.

1 It discovers their pittiabie folly, that upon every galling discontent, lift up heir own hands against their own lives. They think death the remedy of all vils, seek it as a present ease, the only cure of their violent passions and perplexed consciences. But alas, then begins their present misery: for that sends them to this judgment, and for this lamentable end, to be punished. They leap out of the smoke, into the flame: from a momentary disturbance, that may be cured by faith and repentance; into a woe that enwraps them in eternal vengeance. What a fool was that crafty Politician; that could order his house, dispose his goods, and then hang himself! He little thought of this judgment. Thus Saul forsaken of all hopes, scorning deaths blow by the hand of a Philistim, begs it of his Armor-bearer: and what he could not obtain of him, himself supplies. As if he had borne arms against himself, he falls on his own sword. The Armor-bearer follows his Master, and does that to himself which he durst not to his King: both yielding that to their own swords as familiar executioners, which they grudged to their pursuers. Saul had been told the evening before by a familiar, To morrow thou shalt be with me. Now he makes hast to prove the devil no liar: rather than fail, he makes his own mittimus; accepting the greater mischief, to avoid the less. He might have suffered the Philistian violence without blame: to have died by an enemy had been his fate, not his fault. But when he will needs act the Philistines part upon himself; he lives and dyes a murderer. Other prisoners by breaking the Gaole may escape the Assizes: but here to break it and not to stay for a summons, is to hasten the judgment, as it were to purchase a Sessions, for his own damnation. Upon the soul we pass not this sentence, upon the fact we may. There may be repentance, but the deed is heinous: and without repentance the punishment will be grievous.

2 Let it teach us all to provide in our life, a harbor for this storm that comes after death. How unshiftable otherwise shall we be in that hour, how unable to answer at the day of Judgment? What is it for a poor man to take care of his winding sheet? Or the rich for a curious tomb? their names may stink like their carcasses for all this. Or for the superstitious to be buried in a Friars cowle, or with a great sum to purchase a grave under the Altar? Whereas a good man buried in the Church, is Templum, in Templo. Or for the desperate to wish for mountains, instead of monuments? When they shall be turned out of their bodies, as Hagar was out of doors; and rejected from God's presence, like vagabond Cain; saying with the unjust steward, what shall become of us? It is a provided receptacle, that shall comfort them that have it: foxes, and hares, and even vermin fore-acquaint themselves with muses, thickets, and borrows: and when they are hunted, repair thither for safety; and shall man be to seek for his refuge? The comes make their houses in the rocks: we have only one Rock to borough in; our only City of refuge, and Sanctuary of peace Jesus Christ.

2 The other collection is, that there is a Punishment ordained for the wicked: a punishment for the matter; but for the quality and manner, this is sealed of God and concealed from man. Horrible it is, and unconceivable; therefore hath no specification in Scripture, saving only in some shadows and narrow representations; according to human capacity; the figure, rather than the nature of hell. Diverse popish writers have made certain mappes and models of hell, searched all the nookes of that dungeon, surveyed the dark rooms, quartered them into regions and cantons: here placing lust, there riot, there covetousness. Bellarmino says that one glimpse of that burning climate were enough to make a man (not only Christian, but) even turn Monk, and confine himself to the strictest rule of their mortification. But to wish such a sight, and come off like a discoverer; to make report unto men, is superfluous, superstitious: a thing that God hath not thought fit for him to grant, nor necessary for man to know. If we ask what is in heaven, CHRIST answers; You know the way, follow it. So if you ask what is in hell, you know the way; avoid it. Quid mors est, rogitas: si scirem, mortuus essem. No man ever saw hell, that came back to make relation. Let us h•are Moses, the word, the Preacher: if the Lord mean us any good, they shall do us some good. Let us not desire it painted in tables, but considered in our meditations; and that frequently: short and transient thoughts of it, may leave men to the long and permanent pains of it, so think of it that we study to escape it. Take these glimmering shadows of it.

By the want and privation of all comforts: how terrible is it for a man to be famished? it is able to make him gnaw his own flesh. In hell the want shall be greater, and the desire more violent described by gnashing their teeth for anger, and gnawing their tongues for hunger. A son takes it grievously to be banished the sight of his father: Absalom was weary of his life by this delay. What a torment is it then to be shut out forever from the presence of God, without all hope of readmission? David, was but the father of his flesh, God is the father of all spirits: Absalom might have life by him, but did not live in him: yea, he could live not only without him, but against him. But in God we live, and without him can be no life. It was grief enough for Adoniah, though he were pardoned, to be decourted, confined to his country house. With what horror shall the reprobates hear, Depart from me ye cursed? Everlastingly to be expiled from him in whom is all life, must needs be an everlasting death. If in the Lord's presence be the fullness of joy, the fullness of sorrow must be in his absence.

By the necessity, in respect of the decree of God's immutable Justice; which casts them into prison without baile or main-prize: no ransom, no redemption. Bondage is terrible, especially to them that have ranged in liberty. Though Absalom be repealed, yet to have his own house his prison, vexeth him. It could not content Shimei, though he had room enough, to be confined to the river Kidron for gadding. Take a man from his well furnished house, seated in a good air, his grounds watered with commodious springs, with his choice of Gardens, fields or walks; from walking or riding at his pleasure: and lay him up in some loathsome prison, to spend but the short misery of his remaining days: how disconsolate is this restraint? Such, and ten thousand times more, is it to be fetched from this broad world, Sun-shine, light, and delight: and to be bound in the chains of eternal darkness.

By the society: the company adds much to the content or torment of a place. A loving wife, gracious children, kind neighbors, cheerful companions, are the sweet refreshments of this life. Now for a man to be excluded from these, and to be haunted with furies, male-contents, melancholy, or wrangling copesmates; how grievous is the change? No man delights to dwell among Horses and Funerals, or to live in charnell houses; unless Sextons that can make themselves merry with dead corpses. We hate to dwell in Hospitals, Bridewels, or Bedlams: yea, the very society of ruffians and tear-Christ's is odious to us, if the love of God be in us. How intolerable then is the habitation among dogs, unclean birds, reprobate spirits worse than any screech-Owls, Tigers, or Toads.

By the extremity: flesh and blood hath been exercised with many sharp miseries, and though more than flesh and blood (without the comfort of Grace) could ever endure. The Collick, the Gowte are torments: the strappado, or the rack: the slow burnings of material fire, all terrible. Yet are all these but the raste of this punishment; like an itch to those exquisite pains. The rich oppressor will then think his former Gowte a pleasure: and the murderer wish to hang eternally on his gibbet. But hath a man been vexed with a disquiet conscience, the arrows of guiltiness sticking in his sides, groaning under the pressure of unbearable sins? This comes nearest to the say of hell, a taste of those vials, to which the gall of Asps is honey, and the stings of Scorpions a mere tickling. That which made the human nature of the Son of God sweat clods of blood, and heavy his soul to the death; crying as if he were forsaken; think of that punishment.

By the eternity; which makes all the rest absolute. Did the glass hold more sands than ever the Sea washed on the shore, and but one little dust could pass in a Million of years; this were miserable enough: yet would there be an end of that long ruin. But this punishment is a continual fever, a death which hath no death: it hath a beginning, it hath no end. Add eternity to extremity, and then consider hell to be hell indeed. If the Ague of a Yeare, or the Collick of a Moneth, or the rack of a day, or the burning of an hour, be so bitter: how would it break the hearts of the wicked, to think of all these beyond all measure, beyond all time? Yet is all this truth, saving that it comes far short of the truth? This is much, it is not near all.

O that men would meditate on this before they sin: but such thoughts are held too melancholy; and we counted bloody Physicians to speak of hell in our Sermons. They upbraid us, that we torment them before their time. Men are loath to be tormented before their time, and yet fear not to be tormented time without end. Alas, all our scope in discoursing of this fire, is but to snatch your souls out of the fire: we bring you to the brink of the gulf, that seeing it with horror you may never fall into it. All this the very devils, I do not say, believe, but feel and shudder to think of. Shall a temporal King have his judgment seat, his prison, his executioners; and not God, who is so infinitely just? Shall man punish with death corporal, and is not death eternal just with the Lord? Let men ruminare of these things by themselves: and if the description of these flames cannot make them detest sin, how likely are they to become fire-brands of these flames? Without some infallible antidote against this poison, me thinks the souls of unbelievers should go out of their bodies, as devils do out of the possessed; raging, rending, foaming. It is a wonder that any should die in their right senses and wits, that have not learned to die in the faith of Christ. Death it self is painful, therefore no marvel if men wish it short: of an easeful life man desires a protraction, but speed of his inevitable dissolution: not more willing to live when he is well, than to be out of his pain when he must die. Every pang of violent and mortal sickness is a death: to lie one hour under deaths tyranny is tedious: but to be a whole day a dying, is beyond natural patience. What then is that death which knows no end? As this body is as frail as the life that animates it, so that death is as everlasting as the soul that endures it. It were grievous for man to be but so long a dying, as he hath leave to live: yet one minute of the second death is worse than whole ages of the first. Let us never be so mad and desperate, as to shrink at that which must come, and will soon be over: and not to tremble at that which may come and continue forever.

To conclude, here is one thing that answers to all doubts and questions that here might be moved. If it be asked who these unjust are, Dominus novit: he knows who are his, which is a Novit of approbation: who are not his, which is a Novit of reprobation. If, how reserved, what bonds be upon them; Dominus Novit, he hath insensible chains of durance. If when this day of Judgment shall be, what time is designed for it; what month, what year the Judge shall appear in the clouds; Dominus novit; it is not fit for man to know, the LORD, keeps it to himself. If, how they shall be punished, what that fire and brimstone is, how differently it shall work upon sinners, where the local seat of torment should; in air or earth: still Dominus novit, and suo tempore revelabit. One Quaere before I part with the verse.

Whether doth God always forbear notorious sinners to this great day. Indeed he set a brand upon Cain, that he should not be cut off by the hand of man, but reserved to this general Session: and many an oppressor dies aged in his bed, and tarries long for his condemnation. Even this is a heavy punishment, that suffers men to grow old in their sins. It is best for a reprobate, excepting only never to be borne, to have his swaddling clouts a winding sheet, and his cradle become his sepulcher. Then is a terrible woe, when God forbears smiting, and man forbears not sinning. But this impunity, doth not always hold to a mature and white-hair'd death. Some are met withal betimes, in the heat of their fury, breathing out blood and slaughter against the Church; even suddenly confounded, as Paul was converted. Corah rebels; doth his fall stay for his age? No, the earth opens, and swallows him quick. That element was never used to such morsels: many dead carcasses hath it taken into the hungry bowels, never before bodies informed with living souls. Before it hath been only opened with the violent hand of man; now opens it self. It had often been a grave, now it is both a grave, and an executioner. Those five Kings pull sudden vengeance on their own heads, they come forth to their death: Joshua's sword and God's hailestones dispatch them apace.

Sisera flies from the impartial hand of a victors war, gets into a Tent, a friends ten▪ there securely falls a sleep: in the midst of all that tumult, and the jaws of death, he finds time to sleep: as too many hearts do in the midst of their sins and spiritual dangers. And while haply he was dreaming of the clashing of armors, rattling of chariots, cries of the bleeding, and triumphs of the conquering; even then he sleeps his last, and hath the fatal reward of all his cruelty. His head was fastened so close to the earth, as if his body had been listening what was become of his soul. Of his hundred thousands so soon hath he none left, not a page, to prevent his death, to accompany it, or bewail it. He bragged of great wonders that he would do with his iron chariots; and now one nail of iron kills him; and he knows not by whom he perishes. Fearefull are the examples of these sudden doomes; there is nothing more horrible, than to die in the act of sin without the act of repentance. Too many promise themselves the grace and space to repent in their old age: that rich man afforded himself many years; fool, he had not many hours. Nadab and Abihu, while they were offering sacrifice, were made sacrifices. God sends down true and strange fire upon them, that offered false and common fire to him. What sinner can be safe, when these sons of Aaron so suffer? Nature might have pleaded for them, they are young men, scarce warm in their office, the sons of the High Priest, of great eminence, they have not yet experience, may be more careful all their remaining time, it is but their first fault.

Think of this ye that study pretences and patronages for your sins: what hope of plea shall you find either in the greatness of your birth, or greenenesse of your youth, or in the newness of your ill doing, when you do that you know God hath forbidden? O there is no privilege that can bear off a sin with the Lord: no prerogative can challenge pardon; when as you see young men, sons of the Ruler, for their first offense, stroke dead. How did Phineas Iavelin take Zimri napping; as it is reported of one of the Popes, to die in the instant act of his adultery. Let fornicators tremble at this remembrance, when they purpose fulfilling their lusts. The Blasphemer, that wounds himself by wounding Christ, hopes to quit all with a miserere at the last: but did he never hear of Julian, of diverse common swearers, that have died with oaths in their mouths? The drunkard assures himself to be sober long enough before he dies: yet how many hath he heard of, yea some known, that have perished in their cups, and never awaked from their drink, till their souls appeared to judgment? Examples of men quackled, drowned, crushed to death, breaking their necks, are frequent enough. The theevish oppressor promises himself to give over, when age hath filled his purse. Such is the resolution of reprobates, and men ordained to damnation. I have credibly heard of one slain out-right with a piece of timber, which he stole but half an hour before. Of another that had stolen a Sheep, and resting his burden on a stone, was strangled with the struggling of it about his neck.

Thus doth God sometimes execute Martial-law, doing present execution; that fools might not say in their hearts; There is no God. As he forbears others that men might see a necessity of the solemn judgment to come. We pronounce not definitive sentence upon particular men so dying: but certainly they leave behind them to their friends little hope and comfort of their salvation. Nor yet is speed of death ever more a judgment: sudden dying is always deprecable; and when it comes, full of fear, doubt, and suspicion of the worst. But is never a manifest and infallible argument of anger, but when it strikes men in the act of sin. Howsoever, leisure of repentance is a sign of God's special favor: when he gives a man law, it implies that he would not have him wrapped up in destruction. But presume not O sinner, nor flatter thyself that the day of judgment is a great way off. Thou knowest not, when the drunken cup is in thy hand, whether thou shalt live to drink it off. When thou swearest, whether thy mouth shall ever open again to call for pardon. When thou goest to the bed of adultery, whether thou shalt ever rise again from thy unclean pillow. When thou liftest up thy hand to strike thy brother, whether thou shalt ever lift it up for mercy to thy father. When thou beginnest an unjust contention, whether thou shalt ever end it ere thou comest to hell. O think of a powerful arm, which though it draws back long to fetch the harder blow, yet is it always able to strike, and dead the despiser of Goodness ere he can have leave to swallow his spittle.

How often doth God cut men off for a sin they never did, while their assidual iniquities are not summoned, nor meddled withal? Not much otherwise he did Zeba and Zalmunna: they had been cruel to many of Gideon's fathers children; yet had they been spared if his mothers children had not died by them. For Succoth, he slew the Rulers, and spared the people: for Midian, he slew the people and would have spared the rulers. Gideon would, but God would not: he will find occasions to bring wicked men to their Judgment: and they which should have scaped the penalty of their public wrongs, must perish in a private quarrel. So swaggerers, when for theft and homicide they have scaped the Judgment of a Session; often bleed their last drop in streets and Tavernes: God doing on them just execution, by an unjust adversaries weapon. Wherein he shows his manifest wrath by performing that himself, which he charged the Magistrate to do, and he performed not. The slaughter of Gideon's brethren was not the greatest fault of those Kings: yet when the rest should have found an unjust forgiveness, this alone kills them. The sins of a wicked man are many, yet someone shall bring him to shame. Not seldom doth God pay men with one sin for all the rest. Shimei had faults enough, cursing and abusing the Lord's Anointed with dust and stones: David pardons him, Solomon confines him; he might now rest in peace: No, he must run to Gath, to fetch home his servants, with the loss of himself: this paid him for all the rest. Joab had treacherously murdered Abner and Amasa, scapes for both these: at last he sides with Adoniah, and this brings him to his end in blood.

How many bloody murders have been thus punished in a mutinous word? The tongue in rash language hath scourged the iniquity of the hand. One hath done many robberies, scaped many searches; at last when all hath been forgotten he hath been hanged for accessory to a theft he never knew. Suspected felonie hath often paid the price of an unknowen rape: and they that have gone away with unnatural filthiness, yet have clipped off their days with their own coin. Still GOD'S Judgments are just, even when man's may be unjust. Sinner, that which hath befallen any of these, may befall thee; what dispensations soever thou givest thyself. Some of these were mighty, some rich, some young, some thought themselves as wise as thou: none of them ever looked for such ignominious ends more than thou doest. In the fear of GOD, if we deprecate such ends, let us decline such courses.

VERSE 10. But chiefly them that walk after the flesh in the lust of uncleanness, and despise government.

SO monstrous are the outrages of the world, and so incorrigible the boisterous precipice of sin; that Reason (which is of a middle nature betwixt grace and corruption) begins to doubt, whether there be a God and Judge of all the earth. The godly suffer injuries, and are not delivered from their oppressors. The wicked are impune and prosper in the midst of all their flagitious crimes. Where is then the Judge, to punish the one, to deliver the other? He sits in heaven, sees and disposeth all that is done upon earth: beholds the sufferings of his pious children, knows when it is fit time to release them. The wickedness of the unjust cries to him for vengeance, he knows when to answer it. He forbears to strike these, for the ripening of their disobedience: to ease the other, for the exercise of their patience. Some hot spirits would call fire from heaven, sudden destruction on their persecutors: not so saith God: there is a day prefixed; and what is it to you if I will have them tarry till then? They cannot wind themselves out of my hand; I have them bound fast enough: be you quiet and let your expectation depend on this Judgment.

Now from this Thesis he comes to the Hypothesis, accommodates the general doctrine to his own purpose. If God will take vengeance on all the wicked, let not these pernicious seducers, beasts in the shapes of men, think to escape. They follow the Flesh, not Reason, much less the Spirit; but like brutes, are governed by their sensual appetite. They walk after: the flesh is not like some stranger, whom they meet rarely: or some friend, whom they see but now and then: or a neighbor, whom they border upon, and often converse with: or a domestic companion, with whom they eat, drink, play, sleep. But it is their Captain, their Leader, their Commander, whose colors they march under; file, or rank, or troupe, according to his direction: their primum mobile, by whom they move; a if they had no particular motion of their own: so benighted and pusled with blindness, that they know no other way than the flesh guides. It is the weight that sets all their wheels a going; the horses that draw their chariot, the very life of their corruption, and corruption of their life, without which they do nothing. In the lust of uncleanness: if you desire to know what course this flesh prescribes them, it is lust: renouncing all study of honesty, they must give themselves to Lust. But there may be a sanctified lust, I desire to do thy will, O God: or a natural lust; as hunger is an appetite to meat. Therefore this lust hath the specification; lust of uncleanness; a sordid, belluine, irrational, stinking turpitude. After this the reprobate walks; his whole self, all the parts of him: his eyes walk after to look upon it: his ears walk after to hearken to it: his mouth walks after to talk of it: his feet walk after to pursue it: his hands stay not behind to act it: his heart is foremost of all to desire it. Finally, whatsoever may cross their lusts, they set themselves to contemn; Despise government. Not that Almighty word which rules Heaven and Earth, but all the beams of God's Omnipotent royalty, in his deputed magistracy: vilipending all laws, canons, sanctions; dishonoring all Princes, Judges, sovereign powers. Neither Moses nor Aaron, Caesar nor Paul, Minister of the word, nor Minister of the sword, find reverence in their hearts, or obedience in their lives. As if they resolved to disgrace that, wherein GOD hath imprinted the most immediate characters of his own Supreme Majesty.

But chiefly.] There be degrees and differences of sins and sinners; for God here sets a Prasertim, Chiefly, especially, principally, upon some. Whatsoever becomes of others, they shall be sure of a large share in vengeance. There is a notorious mark set upon them, a boring thorough the ear, like perpetual slaves; or a burning in their hands, like once convicted malefactors; a branding with some indelible mark of shame. There is great reason for this Chiefely, in respect of the sinners quality: they walk after the flesh, that is there own carnal desires and sensual delights, in the strength of corruption, yet perhaps without eruption. They balk such facts as may expose them to the censures of men: so keep themselves, that the national laws cannot fetch them in Coram nobis. How doth the covetous man scrape and oppress, yet dares look the Judge in the face: because though he be in the extremity of the Law, yet not beyond it. The Usurer guards his interest with statute-lace, he will not take a penny above that stint or allowance: so he scapes, and is rather made a Grand Juror, than a guilty prisoner. The adulterer walks under the canopie of night, throws the silken robe of greatness over his lust; and then the Judge dares not see it: or locks it up with the doors of secrecy, and then the Judge cannot see it: or buys it off with money, and then the Judge will not see it: or when none of these will serve, he hides his head where the laws hand cannot find him. Now upon him God sets his mark, this Chiefely: thou scapest fairly, yet remember thou art reserved to Judgment. The more remiss man hath been against thee, the more impartially will God proceed with thee. He is content thou shouldest pass all apprehensions till the last, till his own Pursuivant, death comes for thee. A King takes some capital offenders from the common course of Justice, and reserves them to his own censure.

But how is this so fitly applied to the next clause, Despisers of Government? This should rather seem to bring them into present condemnation; that by suffering temporal punishment, they might repent and scape the eternal. Magistrates are often more curious and sensible of their own injuries, than of the Lord's: though this be an abuse of authority, to wear the sword of Justice in their own sheaths; and to draw it not so readily against public offenses, as in their private causes. How then come these to be reserved? Either they are too great for the hand of authority, or too contemptible for the eye of authority. Too great, as the Popish clergy are exempt from the temporal Sword: or a strong faction of mal-contents; a beast that knows the own strength. Or too base for notice; such are the droves of beggars, professed cyphers, nothing-does that swarm about this City, and have their cantons all over the country. Spight of all laws, statutes, and contradictions, they will beg rather than work; and curse that authority to the pit of hell, that shall correct their vicious life. These the connivence of man lets alone, and the patience of GOD also forbears: but their damnation sleepeth not.

Great difference then doth God make of offenders: eye for eye; not the whole body for an eye, not two eyes for one. Theft finds an easier mulct than murder, than murder treason. All sin is culpable enough; but there is a Chiefely belonging to some: as to him that miscalls his brother, Matth. 5.22. Whoremongers God will Judge; they are often reprimanded to his own tribunal. Without shall be dogs, &c. Many other sinners shall be excluded, but chiefly these. 1 Tim. 1.9. If hell were too little, some less offenders should be thrust out; these must have room. There is a Maxim on the head of a devious Christian: howsoever men live or die out of the pale of the Church, a wicked Christian shall be sure of plagues. Woe to him that betrays the Son of man: Jews, Elders, Priests, soldiers, Pilate, all guilty; but chiefly Woe to Judas; he had the greater sin. The Midianites fare not so ill as the wicked Israelites, Judge 8.16. The sword quickly dispatcheth them; these die with lingering and horror, the flesh torn from their backs with thorns and briars; beaten and scratch'd to death. How severe was this revenge, how sad a spectacle to a tender heart! to see their bare bones looking in some places thorough the bloody rags of their skin and flesh; every rent worse than the former, death multiplied by torment?

Such a Chiefly, or high place in hell is reserved for some sinners: the rest are beaten, but they that know God's will and do it not, especially; with many stripes. All corrupt and rotten trees are good for nothing but the fire; but chiefly the vine, if it be dead and fruitless. At that dreadful day how many shall unwish themselves Christians; or wish that the Gospel and they had never been acquainted. If infidels live ungodly, they do but their kind: their punishment shall be, though just yet less. But if men after a religious nurture, and knowledge of the truth, shall shame their education; this God takes more heinously, and revenges more sharply. The more bonds of duty, the more plagues of neglect.

That walk after the flesh, &c.] Here is a double mis-behavior; one in regard of themselves, another in respect of their betters. While they neglect service to their governors, they justly become slaves to themselves. It is fit they should be left to their own desperate guidance, that scorn to be awed by God's ordinance. In the former of these vices, consider two things. 1. What is their leader, The flesh, &c. 2. How they follow this leader; Walk after it. In particular, here is the daughter, the mother, and the grand-mother: the daughter is uncleanness, the mother Lust, the Beldam or Gand-mother the flesh. Uncleanness is from Last, last from the flesh; uncleanness, lust, flesh and all from the Devil. In a tree there is the sap, root, branches, fruit: Satan is the root, flesh the sap, lust the branches, Uncleanness the fruit. All of them bad counselors, intolerable commanders.

Flesh.] By flesh, to decline the various acceptations, we here understand the whole corruption of our unmortified nature. It is not only a privative incapacity of goodness, but a positive inclination to all evil. The godly are not wholly freed from it, but not wholly governed by it. It is in the wicked, as the Turk is at home, ruling all: in the regenerate, as the Turk and Christian, they can never agree. The flesh, like Esau, is the first borne: but Jacob, grace gets the blessing from it. These are mixed in the believer, as fire and water are in compounded bodies; light and darkness in the air at twilight; or water cold and hot in one vessel. We cannot say, that the water is in one part hot, in another cold, but the whole quantity is partly hot and partly cold; that is luke-warm. ^e The flesh lusteth against the spirit, &c. The flesh carries him one way, the spirit another: as the inferior orbs have a violent motion ab extra, and a natural motion contrary of their own. But still light shall overcome darkness, heat over-master the cold; and the dead flesh be weakened and finally annihilated by the quickening grace of Christ.

Many complain of the flesh, as of the Ephialtes in a slumber; they would remove the burden, and cannot: hence they begin to doubt of their salvation. But then Paul could not be sure of his salvation; for he cries out for deliverance From the body of this death. And we need no better proof that a man is not dead, than because he feels his deadness. If we be sensible of the flesh, detest her motions, repent of her over-bearings and prevailements; weep and fight, as a troubled air doth at once both rain and thunder; call upon Christ for victory, with the weapons of resistance in our hands; we shall then sing to his glory that triumph; Blessed be God, that gives the victory through Jesus Christ.

But the flesh in these men here, is a Dominus fac totum; which not only makes laws to a reprobate, but makes him keep them: a Queen regent, a she-devil, a professed strumpet; and under her conduct and Standard marcheth the whole feminine army; Avaritia, invidia, superbia, &c. The devil doates on the flesh, and her resisting is a resigning: for if Satan should not feed her with temptations, she would tempt him for them, and snatch her own bane. Sometime, she is troubled with a wrangling neighbor, Conscience; which if she cannot pacify, she will rear up; as Surgeons do incurable Fistula's. She hears of Christ's passion, and is glad of it; not as her remedy, but her security: she takes his death as a liscence to sin, and his Cross for Letters-patent to do mischief. She hears the Word, as a man writes on the waters; no character, no print of his finger is left behind. She will not understand, but dies without instruction: only hell torments can open her eyes. So the rich man Lift up his eyes in hell: they were never opened before. As Gideon taught the men of Succoth, with briers and thorns: he made them to know, taught them with a vengeance. She is ever ready to run into extremes: like the Jews, in adversity unfaithful, in prosperity unthankful. Or as Laban's Sheep were in the extremes; either all black, or all white: Jacob's were in the mean party color'd. The wicked are always in extremities, of either defect, or excess; of irreligion, or superstition. In a word, as the world is Satan's bawd, so the flesh is his harlot; upon whom he begets all his children, the works of disobedience.

For us that have both our fathers blood and our mothers blood in us: grace from the former, as we have flesh from the other; and one of these will be master: let us as it is fit, give the Sovereignty to our father: let his grace rule us, albeit the flesh entice us. Be thou a faithful Porter in God's house; diligent to keep out his enemies, and to let in his friends. Beware of denying entrance to the least motion of grace: for man's heart is like a spring-lock; pull too the door after you, and the lock will shut of it self: but being shut it cannot be opened without a key. The heart with the least pull locks out grace easily: but cannot open to re-admit it without his help that hath the key of the house of David, that opens and no man shuts, that shuts and no man opens. Know you not that flesh and blood shall not inherit the Kingdom of Heaven? We say in wrongs, flesh and blood cannot endure this: we say in temptations flesh and blood cannot hold out. What flesh do we mean? That which God hath damned? Which he will never admit to the Kingdom of heaven? A fair plea! When that must be our Apology, which is our impiety. No, let grace be our direction, for it is grace that must be our salvation.

Lust.] This is the daughter of the flesh, and mother of uncleanness: the branches that grow from that cursed root, and bringing forth more cursed fruit. The sparks that fly up from that burning furnace, the bubbles of that noisome and baneful fountain. For method of discourse, I shall examine five questions concerning Lust.

1 What lust is. It must be considered as the Original fountain of all sins; and so it is an impotency of heart, whereby it is inordinately carried with the desire of evil. Original sin is called Lust, because it principally shows it self in lusts: as an obstruction of the liver is perceived in the burning and dryness of the palms. Or it is taken for a branch and fruit of the former corruption: flesh is the Tyrant reigning, lusts are his laws, rules, precepts Obeying them is the vassalage, a tenure in villainy. It is either fomitis innati, the in-borne occasion of sin: or Actus interioris; whereof be three degrees. 1. Propassio, the first motion. 2. Delectat••, it likes us. 3. Consensus, we yield to it. The first is impossible be to avoided, the second difficult, the last by grace easy. The appetite desires noxious meat, yet we choose whether we will taste it: it pleases our palate, yet is it in our choice to swallow it down: we swallow it and it makes us sick yet then let us refrain it. Lust then is either Facultas concupiscendi, or Actus ipse: the one like a drowsiness of nature, the other like the passion of slumber: that pravitas nativa, this pravitas activa: that the nourishment of sin, this the accomplishment of sin.

There is a three-fold concupiscence; Natural, Sensitive, Voluntary. 1. Natural, which is in stirpes and plants, whereby they covet and draw unto them their food and nourishment; this is properly called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, desire. 2. Sensitive, such is in brute beasts. 3. Voluntary, this is in man only, (though the other be not excluded,) and is called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉. In this voluntary lust we must consider 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 the faculty it self: and 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, the exercise of that faculty. Further, these must be considered Physice, naturally; such is an appetite to meat: or Metaphysice, supernaturally, such is a regenerate desire: so there is an Holy covetousness, A spiritual lust; An anger without sin. Thus we may covet, desire, affect, and sin not. Or morally, in relation to the commandment; which consists in concupiscendo illicita; in lusting after unlawful things. Such are aliena, not our own; another's house, or wife, or any propriety of his: or licita modo non licito; as exceeding in measure: so sinners covet wine to riot; or money to hoard, not to use: or strength to revenge: or beauty to tempt: or apparel for pride. To lust for a lawful thing may be an unlawful lust; as to desire it supra modum debitum, or citra finem licitum. Therefore S. Augustine calls concupiscence, a motion of the mind to enjoy riches, health, another, yea, himself; or anything else, non propter Deum, not for God.

2 What is the seat of this lust: I know that in my flesh dwelleth no good thing. Where Ambrose by flesh understands the body. His reason why sin hath the habitation in the flesh, rather than in the soul, is because the flesh is derived ex Traduce, by progagation, so is not the soul. For if that were propagated as the flesh, sin should rather habitare in anima quàm in corpore: the soul being the agent offending more than can the body, which is but the instrument. Ans. This proves that the first pollution is of the flesh, not that the soul can be free: for by infusion must follow infection; as good liquor is spoiled by a musty vessel. But sin disperseth it self into the whole nature of man, body and soul. So there is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 A mind of flesh: nor is the natural mind apt to any good. 2 Tim. 3.8. Corrupt minds: therefore the Apostle requires a Renovation of the mind. Nor by the outward man must we understand the body, and by the inner man the soul: but the regenerate part is called the ^t inner man, the unregenerate part the outward. Grace is the inward man, because. 1. Intus potissimum regnat; the power of it is chiefly discerned in the mind. 2. Non patet oculis humanis; so called the Hidden man of the heart. 3. Non externa quaerit: vill lusts are ever wandering abroad; without a man, exercised about vanities: this keeps home, and seeks not riches, but peace of conscience. 4. Per excellentiam; as the mind is more excellent than the body, so the spirit more noble than the flesh Lyranus would have the inner man to be reason, the outer sensuality; that beast of man which always rebels against reason. So Gorrhan: In carne, that is, in homine sensuali: so Tolet, Pererius, and the present Romists. But it is plain by the Apostles demonstration, that the flesh is Totus homo ut natus, and the Spirit; Totus homo ut renatus; there being in the regenerate something that is spiritual, and something that is carnal. The seat of s is in the rational part, the will bringing it forth: the body doth but execute the edict of reason and will: therefore the part rational hath something carnal. Shoolemen like the Philosophers, make two parts of the mind; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, the reasonable part: and 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, void of discourse, the seat of affections and passions. If Paul should make no other difference between flesh and spirit; his Apostolical theology were no greater comfort than their blind philosophy.

3 Whether lust be a sin; we must know that not only the act of lust, but ipsa concupiscibilitas, concupiscence it self is corrupt and forbidden; unda cupi. The difference between us and the Pontificians in this point, lies thus. They say, there is concupiscentia formata, the second motion, which is with consent of will; this is sin, and we say so too. There is concupiscentia informis, without deliberate consent: this they say is no sin, we affirm it. They say, it is not sin, but the cause of sin; as the Sun is said to be hot, because it causeth heat: but we call it truly sin it self. Let us first weigh some of their arguments against it; then ours for it.

Object. That which is natural, cannot be evil: but concupiscence is natural, for it was in man before his fall. Ans. As it is natural, it is not forbidden: if the matter desired be lawful, the manner regular, the end honest; God's glory, ours or others good. So a man may desire that is proper to him, the wife of his bosom or that is appropriate to him, as an office, 1 Tim. 3.1.

Object. Nothing involuntary is sin, but the first lust is against the will, therefore no sin. Answ. The rule of good or evil is not man's will, but God's Law. That which is in us necessary, was in Adam voluntary, and by him in us. Now it cannot be avoided, then it might: his willing transgression transmitted to us a necessity of sinning. Original sin is in Infants, it is not voluntary: yet they die, which could not be in Justice, had they not sinned. So though that of Aristotle may be true; Nemo volens malus, nec invitus faelix: no man is bad with his will, nor happy against his will: yet habit can make that necessary, which was at first voluntary.

Object. The Law commands no impossible thing, nor doth God condemn for that which no good man avoid. Ans. The Law was possible to created nature, that is now impossible to corrupted nature: that we want power to fulfill it, is because we had power and would not keep it. Nemo quantum possumus melius novit, quàm qui ipsum posse donavit.

It is objected from, I am. 1.16. that either concupiscence is not sin, but the cause of sin: or if it be sin, yet is not mortal sin; for sin till it be perfect, brings not forth death. Answ. This is no true conclusion; concupiscence brings forth sin, Ergo it is no sin; but Ergo it is not that sin which it brings forth. A man begets a man, therefore is he not a man? No, but therefore he is not that man which he begets: Yea, he is a man even because he begets a man. And to say, sin perfected brings forth death, therefore sin not perfect brings not forth death; is as if we should thus reason; the father begets a mortal man, therefore the Grandfather doth not. Because actual lust produceth death as the nearest cause, this hinders not original lust as a remote cause to be mortal.

Our Reasons.

Argum. 1. Whatsoever is forbidden by the Law, is sin; but the Law forbids the first motions of lust. If you ask, what commandment forbids it, I answer; Lust with consent is forbidden in the ninth, Lust without consent in the tenth. Without this distinction I see not how we can make ten commandments: the seventh forbids lust in the voluntary desire, as our Savior expounds it. Therefore if the tenth should not restrain the involuntary and first rising lust, it were superfluous, as being all one with the seventh. It is not untrue, that original sin is condemned in the whole Law, but more directly in the first and last commandments: because these two more properly concern the heart of man: the former respects it as concerning God, the other as concerning man. Saint Paul confesseth that his lust tempted him against his will; and by that lust he means the first motion: for the second, which are with consent of will, he knew well enough before to be sins: yea, the very heathen knew this by the light of nature. To covet then is forbidden; if we do covet, we break the Law therefore sin. The other laws condemn pravos affectus quibus delectamur: the last, ipsos appetitus quibus titillamur. To say with Pererius, that the former only prohibit Actus exteriores, and the last consensus interiores; is false by Christ's own exposition: who citing the Law, Thou shalt not kill, affirms it to be broken by rash anger: and that, Thou shalt not commit adultery; by lusting after a woman.

Argument. 2. Rom. 7.20. If I do that I would not, it is no more I, that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. He is unwilling, yet he calls this lust, sin. Pererius answers, it is called sin, because it is Effectus peccati, or Affectus peccati: as the writing is called the hand, because it is written by the hand: or as Frigus is called Pigrum, slothful, because it makes men slothful. Solut. But that which makes a man bad cannot be good it self. Quicquid efficit tale, ipsum magis est tale.

Concupiscence is not only causa peccati, and paena peccati, sed ipsum peccatum; as Saint Augustine hath it. The Jesuit replies, Augustine means not peccatum morale, nor peccatum mortal; but vitium corruptae Naturae: as blindness, deafness, lameness, are called Peccata sive errata Naturae: as being against the integrity and perfectness of our natural constitution: so the rebelling of concupiscence is against the integrity and perfection of the soul; an error in nature. Answ. There are natural faults in the soul; as ignorance, forgetfulness, dullness of understanding; in the body, infirmities, weakness, sickness: which are the effects of sin, not sins themselves. But all these are effects and passions, whereas concupiscence is active and working. In a word, it resists the motions of God's spirit, now all disobedience is sin. In civil matters no man is accessory to a sin without consent of will, but it is otherwise in the court of conscience.

4 What variety of lusts there be. Saint Paul enlargeth lust to all motions, inclinations, passions, and perturbations, of heart, mind, will and affections. Original concupiscence is the seed of all sins in man: look how many sins there be in the world; so many lusts in the heart of man: the number of lusts is no less than the number of sins. Of actual lust, there be two degrees: sudden, or voluntary and deliberate. Sudden is the motion not agreed to voluntary is with consent. The eye is sometime cast upon an object on the sudden, without any intention or consultation of the mind: sometime it is sent on the hearts errand by the minds direction. As the eye may be shut in a twinkling without thought or purpose: and it may be shut with deliberation, to sleep, or prevent harm. The heart is a furnace, that sometime sends forth sudden, sometime leasurely flames. The first is the nature of sin, the next is the nurture of sin: consent doth nurse the child of death, practice brings it up: actual lusting is the oil that feeds the lamp of concupiscence. The mother brings forth the daughter, and the daughter nourisheth the mother: Hagar produceth Ishmael, Ishmael sustains Hagar: blessed is that Abraham, whose house is well rid of them both.

5 How heinous this sin is; even no less than damnable in it self. Lusts are often more punished by the great Judge, than diverse actual sins. The continued lust of uncleanness, is worse than a discontinued art of uncleanness. He that always desires pollution deserves greater punishment, than he that is overtaken with it against his will. One kills a man against his will, another desires to kill him and is hindered: this last is the murderer before God. It is this lust that Paul calls the burning: it is one thing Calefieri, a good man may be hot: but Vrere, to burn, is another thing; when lust finds indulgence, and is scarce restrained with shame. The act of adultery is not more heinous among men, than the unlawful desire and consented lust of the heart is to God. Without practice, the very purpose stands culpable before him. Silly people think the commandment is not broken, if the outward gross sin be abstained: but God fetcheth in malice, anger, envy, within the compass of murder. Some ignorants use the commandments for prayers: poor souls, they little think they are God's thunderbolts, to throw them into hell for their sins. Thus Usury, the desire of gain by the undoing of others: hoarding of corn in dearth, which is to make a private profit of God's public Judgment: bad example, with a delight to corrupt others; which are like those erring lights, that instead of guiding ships to the haven, lead them upon rocks and shelves: all these are degrees of murder. So a wanton eye, an obscene discourse, a vain attire, a light behavior; all these are degrees of adultery: lust is like a secret malignity in the bones, hardly got out: wounds and ulcers are sooner cured because of their appearance. Adultery may be restrained by corporal impotency; still lust is hid within; it must be a potent medicine that fetcheth it out. Uses.

1 It justly humbles us: if the first motion, without consent be sin: if the second with consent be greater sin; Lord, who can say, my heart is clean? Not many can clear themselves so with Samuel, from the act of injustice: fewer with Paul, I have coveted no man's gold, &c. but, I was never tempted to this; no man could ever say this but one, even that man who is the Son of God. If we had no more, this last were enough to hide our faces, and stop our mouths before the Lord. Too few take notice of this natural uncleanness: though it be borne in them, and borne about them; yet they neither see the filth, nor feel the weight. Moors, that never saw men of more temperate climates, think there is no other complexion but their own. He doth much good that goes not after his lusts: sed non perfectum bonum facit, but he is not perfect, that doth not what is written, Thou shalt not lust. Now shall we not be cast down for that, which without repentance will cast us down to hell? Paul did not more truly Bear about him the marks of the second Adam, than we do all the marks of the first Adam. Let us know, that eternal fire is the wages of this lust; consent makes it hotter, practice enflames it. This lust is in us all, and this lust is sufficient to condemn us all.

But then, alas what shall we do? How should we scape? This necessitates our ruin. Therefore as the law compelled him that had Opened a pit, and left it uncovered, to make good his neighbors beast that miscarried in it. So having opened a pit, lest any soul should perish in it, let me cover it again with comfort. The condemning quality of this sin is taken away by Baptism; Reatus tollitur. Acts 2.38. All sins, now children have no sin but original lust. Reatus, qui fuerat generatione contractus, est regeneratione transactus. In Christ it is pardoned, and shall not cast his members to hell. Yet is it by nature so died in grain, that nothing but his blood can purge it. And even in the purged, it still remains, tanquam in homine secum confligente. It shall not reign over us here, not confound us hereafter, yet will dwell in us till our dissolutions. It was the Pelagians slander, that we hold Baptism, non auferre, sed radere peccata; only to shave our sin, because the root of concupiscence remains. But we say, it frees us from the damnation and domination, not from the inhabitation of sin.

2 It teacheth us to withstand the beginnings of sin, to kill that pestilent brood in the cradle, to destroy them in their infancy, as we do a nest of young Wasps. For lust, when it hath conceived, bringeth forth sin: and sin, when it is finished bringeth forth death. Lust tempteth, there's the mother: being moved by the devil, there's the father: it conceiveth, thus the child is begotten between them; concupiscence being the devils strumpet, by whose pregnancy he fills his kingdom of darkness: she is mater mortuorum, the mother of the dead; as grace (like Eve) is mater viventium, the mother of the living. Delight is the midwife. It bringeth forth sin, there the child is borne: it must now have a Nurse to bring it up, that is custom: and the full stature it grows unto, is death. It tempteth by enticing the mind to evil, conceiveth by the consent of will and resolution to do evil, bringeth forth by execution and practice; nurseth it to growth by custom and continuance: lastly, this stripling engendreth another child, Benoni, the sorrow of the mother, and that is death. If we cannot prevent the conception, yet let us destroy it in the birth, make it abortive, by purposing never to act it: if it pass the knees, and draw the air of intention, yet let us stop it ere it come to action; let us not do the determined evil. If it over-sway us to like and act it, yet let it never come to an habit, let us devow a custom. But how much more easy were it to stop it in the first cause, as seasonable physic doth meet with an infection at the first taking, before it run into the veins, and corrupt the blood. The seed of Ishmael had never afflicted the seed of Israel, had Ishmael been killed when he was banished. As the first rising of Elias's cloud, Ahab had time to get home dry: that once ascended, all the speed of his Chariot cannot out-run the shower. Cut off the gangren'd joint, and save the body. The way to minish the increase of ravenous and noxious fishes, is to destroy the spawn with the mother: to be rid of harmful birds, is to spoil their nests. When a fire-ball is thrown into a ship at a sea-fight, they presently cast it out ere it break or fasten. Meet thine enemy at his coming out of his bed, before he arm himself: take lust ere it come to a rebound. At the first motion, stop the mouth of it: let it never make a reply: stand not to argue, lest thou be overcome.

3 Let us avoid them as perilous and mortal enemies. 1. Dangerous for their nature; continual tempters. Conscience doth sometimes sleep from reproving, these never rest from enticing. 2. Dangerous for their number; Si cōtemnas quia minima, timeas quia plurima. Many temptations come in by the Cinque Ports, the senses; mo by Satan's injection, that presents to the affections things absent from the senses. Most (by lust it self; that as no created thing is quicker than thought) tumbles over a thousand desires in an hour: many strings to sins bow, that if some break, the rest may hold: many trains of powder, some likely to take fire. 3. Dangerous for their effect, bringing forth the most monstrous offenses; mille actus vitiosos, & mille piacula. Open but the pit, out swa•e these pestilent Locusts. Who would have thought that David's wanton look should have begot murder? He that hath given way to his lust, must confess such fearful precipices. Murder we detest; yet how many hands hath the lust of revenge embrued in blood; how many necks hath it brought to an ignominious halter? Incontinence hath the name from uncontained lust: many a disease of body, reproach of name, consumption of state, loss of life and soul, are beholding to it. 4. Dangerous for their continuance: an ill seasoning, that is never got out but by breaking of the pitcher: a mark that all carry to their graves, some to their torments. While the soul doth animate a body mortal, it will tempt both body and soul. Cut off the sprig of a tree, it grows still; a bough, an arm, still it grows: lop off the top, yea, saw it in the midst; yet it will grow again: stock it up by the root; then (and not till then) it will grow no more. Next unto God and Christ, we may thank death it self, for the abolition of lust. We have three birth-days: the first of nature; this gives lust the breeding; the second of grace; this sets lust a bleeding; it doth mortify it, not nullify it; moribundum, non mortuum reddit: the last of glory, then are we rid of it forever. Thus all the Saints in heaven are thrice borne; to si•, to grace, to glory. Lust in the first is a King; in the second a slave; in the third nothing. The second nativity crosseth the first, the last perfects the second. To be freed from concupiscence is a main motive of that zealous prayer; Come Lord Jesus, come quickly.

Let us (in the mean time) beware the captivity of our affections. Let not sin reign in our mortal bodies: where it is a sovereign, it will force obedience. It will inesse, let it not praeesse. There is difference between lusts, and actual sins. 1. Interventio temporis: lust is sudden, action requires time, Luk. 12.20. He hath the present lust of covetousness, he must tarry a time to enlarge and fill his barns. 2. Interjectio loci: lust often desires, that cannot be present, therefore adultery must stay for opportunity. 3. Interceptio organorum: Balaam had a des•re to kill his harmless beast, but he had no weapon: the hand is not so quick as the thought. 4. Interpositio impedimentorum: Absalom lusts for his fathers Crown there be many hindrances, he cannot reach it. If to achieve were as easy as to desire, one man's lust were able to ruin all the world. 5. Intercessio argumentorum: the soul hath some discourse between the lust and the act. Video meliora proboque, is in the soul of a Medea, a Sorceresse. 6. Intermissio cogitationum: sometime, the second nail drives out the first. So the LORD sets our lusts together by the ears, as the Egyptians against the Egyptians; that while two poisons wrestle we may live. The falling out of thieves helps the true man to his goods. The lust after beauty is driven out by a desire of revenge, that again by a golden thirst and if grace comes, this drives them out all; as the feathers of an Eagle, that will not endure blending with other feathers, but rather consumes them. All these Inters should be the interruption of sin, and for the compunction of heart: that though concupiscence have conceived, she may not be delivered. Justly should we say to lust; as the Hebrew did to Moses; Who made thee a Prince over us? whence hast thou this authority? Wilt thou kill me, as thou killest the worldling? No, thou shalt not, I have a deliverer, Rom. 7.25.

5 Seeing the flesh will be in man, so long as man is in the flesh; let us strive to fill our hearts with better desires. Lust works in the memory, by remembering vanities, injuries, bad examples: instead of these, let us remember our sins, our ends, our Audit. In the affections; if it work by pride, stop it out by humility: if by malice, with charity: if by uncleanness, with chastity: if by covetousness, with liberality: if by revenge, with mercy as darkness will give place to the Sun. In the mind, if idle thoughts find room, it is because God is not there. Let the word of God dwell in you plenteously: emptiness of that food will cause the repletion of windy lusts. In the body, if it work by drunkenness, rather turn Rechabite, never drink wine. If by surfeit and high feeding, fall to Daniel's pulse, shorten the commons of sin: as it is better to beat down the house, than to be fired in it. If by Idleness, skrew up thy endeavors to a greater task. They be idle, therefore regard vain words: thus a Pharaoh could conclude. Let lust never call, but we have other business. The best remedy is prayer: when concupiscence tempts us to folly, let us make the matter known to our husband, CHRIST. When lust covets transient riches, call home the meditation of those permanent joys; and say Our father which art in heaven. When lust would study how to get honor; then say Hallowed be thy Name. When ambition would have such a preferment; then say, Thy kingdom come. When it would carve thy own portion; then, Thy will be done. When it covets moneys and riches; then, Give us this day our daily bread. When it would revenge thy wrath on others, then say, Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us. Howsoever it tempts us, let us pray, Lead us not into temptation. And that we may never yield unto it, Deliver us from evil. Let not lust reign in us, For thine is the kingdom: we cannot avoid it ourselves, for thine is the power: and for our deliverance, Thine be the glory, forever and ever. Amen.

Of uncleanness.] Of sores and ulcers and such noisome pollutions, sordid and odious to God and good men; such is the subject of my present discourse: that this may well be called a Spittle-Sermon. But as the Physician is seldom sent for, unless men be sick; nor is so much consulted about diet as physic; The whole need him not, but the diseased. So if there were no sin, you should need no Preacher: yet wise men require antidotes and preservatives; and would rather pay the Physician to keep them well, than to make them well; health being not so easily restored, as conserved. Therefore let them that be infected with this leprosy, learn now the means of their recovery: let them that be not infected, observe the means to continue their purity. Whether they be or be not, this discourse, like the Bath, shall do them no harm: an honest heart will not return unbettered. For method, first, I will describe the disease of Uncleanness, then the cause, last, the cure.

The disease lies not like the Meagrim in the head, nor like a Pleurisy in the blood, nor like a Gowte in the joints and extreme places, nor like an ach in the bones: but it is Epidemical, like an ill habit of body, and possesseth in a reprobate not only Totum hominem, but Totum hominis: as Job was not here and there ulcerous, but all his body one coagulated ulcer; There is no whole part about him. First, there is a contemplative uncleanness, when the mind pleaseth it self with vicious thoughts: thus there may be a world of wickedness in a man, though the acts of pollution be refrained. The devil, who is The father of lusts, reigns in the soul by these: yea such a heart that infernal Prince takes up for his bedchamber. Secondly, there is a preparative uncleanness, which is an effeminate of carriage; or affectation of inviting the eyes of lust: all their postures being so many characters, to spell the meaning of their lascivious hearts. It were well, if such an one were forced to cry, as the Leper in Israel, I am unclean. 3. There is a procurative uncleanness; that takes up the devils office, and helps forward the damnation of men. Such was Jonadab to Amnon; whose unkindly flame might else have wasted it self out in time; but that such a wicked counselor blew the coals. This was no worse a man than the Kings brothers son: now this noble Pander will project a course for Ammons satisfaction. The procurer is as unclean, if not worse than the committer: the fire would languish, vanish, perish, if there were no such feweller. 4. There is a sensitive uncleanness; when the ear sucks in obscene stories, the eye delights in immodest mixtures, and the tongue skrewes it into all discourses. This is, as if the door were not wide enough, to set open all the windows, and break down the walls, to let in the air of uncleanness. Actual uncleanness follows, whereof there be many degrees.

1 Fornication; I mean not titular; as Hostesse and Harlot are convertible terms: nor metaphorical; as the children of whoredoms: nor spiritual; as Idolatry is called fornication: but corporal; which is commonly taken for the incontineny of single persons. The natural cure of this uncleanness is marriage thus Shechem bewrays a good disposition even in filthiness, he would not let Dinah fare the worse for his sin. But as he had with dishonest rage abused her, so he strives with honest love to entertain her. Her deflowring shall be no prejudice to her: as the sin was done by him; so he would have the whole shame redound to him; and so he will hide her dishonor with the name of a husband. To this purpose he communes, craves, offers, indeed would buy her; even purchase leave to make her satisfaction. He sues to his father, to hers, to her brethren, to her self; and begs with submission what he might have gotten with violence. The father consents, sollicitates, is ready to buy his sons peace with his own pain. No dowry shall hinder, but Shechem shall recompense Dinah. How far worse are they, that abuse without any purpose of amends? But marriage in this case is some satisfaction, no restitution: a good salve is not so good as no sore. This may make the next act lawful, not justify the former. How ever the scene concludes, the first entrance was naught. Though a late satisfaction be better than none, yet a timely prevention is best of all.

2 Adultery; when one or both are married: this is the breach of many faiths; and so much the more pernicious, as it is a willful shipwreck abroad, when it hath a harbor and safe remedy provided at home.

3 Whoredom; which is a mad and transportive desire to abuse many. Sometimes it is lust, joined with anger; doing it in spite; a desperate revenge, by polluting another's bed to cast away his own soul. So the foolish child, when one snatcheth his apple, throws his bread after him. Sometime it is joined with covetousness; he wastes his body to fill his purse; as a fool burns his band to make tinder. Always is it joined with folly: not so much respecting a fair woman as she is fair, but as she is a woman: foul water will quench that fire as well as fair.

5 Uncleanness with our own kindred, which is incest. To patronize this, some allege precept, practice, and custom. But that Law to the Jews, was partly political, for distinction of families: and partly Typicall, preserving the right of primogeniture, prefiguring the spiritual birth-right in the Messias, which should be endless. The moral law was otherwise: therefore we answer, that albeit God had particular exceptions from his general laws: as the Cherubims over the Ark was an instance against the second commandment: the Israelites robbing the Egyptians, against the Eight: and Phinehas killing Zimri, against the Sixt: yet it is plain that the Lord condemns all incest.

6 With more wives than one, which is Poly-gamie. I know this fact of Jacob is diversely excused. As first, it was prohibited by no Law. Answ. It was not prohibited by a Law written, it was by the Law engraven: God made but one woman for one man; and he was a wicked Lamech that first begun bigamy. 2. But custom excuseth; as at first a side garment was a shame to the Romans, but at last it grew to a fashion. Answ. That was a thing indifferent, the decency whereof time might vary: but there is no custom against the first Institution. 3. In the multiplicity of wives he propounded to himself the multitude of children. Answ. If ever such an Indulgence had been fit for any, then Noah should have been dispensed with, to propogate the world: but God gave him no such indulgence. 4. This was done in a mystery. Answ. Indeed, Aug. Ruper. Greg. all reduce it into several allegories: yet cannot this Iustifie the fact; no more than CHRIST'S second coming like a thief, can warrant a thief sudden breaking into a house. This therefore must be granted, Jacob's infirmity: to marry two wives, was his transgression: but to marry two sisters, no less than Incest. Albeit God disposed this to increase the holy seed, yet the fact is against his ordinance: and our positive Law makes it death, as by the Law Institutive it is deadly. Every man shall cleave to his own wife. Vxori, non meretrici: suae, non alienae: Vxori, non •xoriibus: to his wife, not wives.

7 Uncleanness with a man's spouse; I mean between the betrothment and consummation. The Levites spouse, till he married her, was but his Concubine; and their conjunction was fornication. It is not enough to say, they were married before God: the hand of the Church must be there, or this is culpable uncleanness. Marriage is no amends: otherwise than willfully to break a whole glass, it is afterward to soalder it: yea it is rather to break an arm or leg, to set it again: or to condemn a man first, and then to sue out his pardon. The common opinions, This is but a true covenant ante-dated; the taking possession of a man's own, without due course of Law: the mowing of his corn before harvest: the plucking his own grapes ere they be ripe. But this is trivial: contract is but Ius ad rem, marriage gives Ius in re. Contract binds to marriage, not allows to touch before marriage. Contract is but like Articles agreed upon, marriage puts a seal to the covenant. Such a fruit of their bodies, is but a monument of their sin: and without hearty repentance, a good proceeding seldom follows so bad a beginning.

8 Uncleanness with a man's own wife. This is when the use of the marriage-bed is either intempetive or intemperate: in a season prohibited, or in a measure not moderated, or in a manner not ordained, or to an end not warranted: as when it hath altogether respect to pleasure, not to generation; or to beget an heir for their lands, rather than a Saint for heaven; or their own Image, rather than the Image of God. If uncleanness can creep into marriage, where will it be kept out? How soul is the disease, when the very remedy is often infected? Not but that Conjugium purum, but impuri conjuges: marriage doth not stain, nor so much as die, in the Romish sense: it is honorable and clean, yet the married may be unclean.

9 Uncleanness with a man's self; as the heathendishonored their own bodies 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . There be three turpitudes against nature; with another kind, or with the same kind of the same sex, or with no other person but with themselves. Thus Saint Augustine distinguisheth between Flagitium and Facinus: the latter is in hurting another, the former in committing against a man's self. Other sins are without the body, fornication against the body, this uncleanness in the body. This was the sin of Onan; abusing himself against the order of nature and Institution of God. This was a grievous sin; against God, whose ordinance he disobeyed: against his wife, whom he unjustly defrauded: against himself, whose issue he should not have prevented: against mankind, whose number he should have increased: against his brother, to whom issue should be raised. Some Hebrews think, that he did it to preserve the favor and beauty of Tamar, which bearing of children would have impaired. How ever, sensual was his pleasure and the sin in any man is very grievous.

10 Ravishment: the former is a rape upon a man's self, this upon another. Such was Shechems sin, as some understand it: but some rather think, that Dinah being so light to wander and gaze, was not over-difficult to yield. Commonly, such lust ends in loathing, as Ammons; beating her out of doors, whom he was sick to bring in. And therefore Shechems seemeth to be no rape, because he still loved her: and having wrought her shame in his fathers house, he would not send her home with disgrace to her fathers Tent: but rather seeks to marry her whom he had defiled. His offense did not make her odious; but so constantly he affects her, that he is willing to draw blood of himself, rather than forgo her. Ammons rape was far worse: Tamar is sent for as his Physician, but he makes her his physic. She dressed him meat, but that was not the dish he longed for: he loves the Cook, not the cates. She presents the diet, he throws down that, and falls a board with her. His sickness is now forgotten, the Devil hath made him lusty and strong on the sudden. The innocent Virgin intreats for her self, persuades in vain: shows the sin, Non licet: the shame, Non decet: the danger, deadly: thou shalt be a fool in Israel; I, no wife, yet no virgin. Prevailing not by reason, she seeks to cool his present heat with future; hope of an impossible thing; Ask me of my father. But in vain! he grows mad with resistance, and resolves to be a ravisher. If the Devil were not more strong in such than nature, they would never seek pleasure in violence. This rape defiles Amnon, not Tamar: the wrong was hers, the uncleanness his. She that is ravished, is more a Maid, than she whose own loose thoughts have made her unclean. Two lay together, only one committed Adultery, as Augustine of Lucrece. She was but the Patient; and it was not her fault to suffer, what was not her will to do. Her virginity was not Perdita, but Prodita; not lost, but torn from her by compulsory means: she still reserved it in her soul, though it had forsaken her body. The Inhabitant is not to be blamed, for thieves breaking into the house. She can do no more than bewail what she cannot keep: lamenting the shame of another's sin; living like a widow, who was neither maid, wife, harlot, nor widow; but a ravished woman. Thus you have the specification of some Vncleannesses, (which O that none knew but by a general apprehension and hear say; and not as Adam knew evil, by sense and experience) now to

The causes; which are many. Physicians say, that to know the cause is half the cure. By cause, here I understand not only that fundamental cause, which is inordinate affection, the boiling fountain of lust but: also such occasions, as breed and nurse uncleanness. These are

1. A roving eye, that looks up and down for the objects of lust. The sons of God saw the daughters of men: by that looking came lusting, thence preposterous marriages, thence universal confusion. His masters wife cast her eyes upon Joseph: her eye led her heart, her heart, led her tongue, her tongue led her hand. Such be the harlots three weapons: the first engine is her eye, the very motion whereof discourseth a silent filthiness.
2. Her tongue offers to take hold, where her eye cannot.
3. Her hand offers to catch him, whom her tongue cannot win. Tamar sate in an open place, where she might be seen: Hebr. in the door of eyes. This was Achan's confession; I saw, I coveted, I took. The eye betrays the heart, the heart the hand: sin gets in by the senses, yea by the least piece of a sense; as bad air at a crack in the window. By them it seizeth on the inmost fort, and there it commands them like a tyrant, to whom it was beholding for entrance. This is the order of our crimes: Achan's song shall many chatter to a doleful tune; I saw, I coveted, and took. The thief; I saw the booty, coveted, and took it: the drunkard, I saw the color of the wine: the Idolater, I saw the goodly picture: the adulterer, I saw the beauty, coveted, and took it, and took my death with it.

David rose from off his bed, and from the roof of his Palace he saw a woman. From an after-noon's slumber he riseth to his evenings walk: the eyes which unseasonable sleep had shut up, an enticing object opens. Her Bath was no open place, but lust is quick-sighted: she could espy nobody, but David had espied her. Dinah the daughter of Leah went to see the daughters of the land. The daughter of Leah; her mothers own daughter, right bred; as the harsh note of the Hebrews speaks: because Leah went out to meet Jacob upon such a bargain: as if Dinah had gone on purpose to be abused. But the Mothers daughter, because both had a fault in their eyes: the mothers, a defect of nature, the daughters, a defect of nurture: hers an infirmity, this a curiosity. Her eyes were guilty of this temptation: She would needs see and be seen; and while she looks about vainly, she is looked upon lustfully. Tu otiose spectas, otiose non spectaris:tu spectas curiose, spectaris curiosiùs. I know there may be a clear and honest aspection, as the Quene of Sheba came to see Solomon. See this woman, saith Christ to Simon. But it is better to be blind, than look with lustful eyes. This sin is little regarded: many come to the Church with Christian ears, but Pagan eyes: and Satan comes faster in at the eyes, than God at the ears: that which should save the soul, is lost by the wandering sense. There can be no safety to the Chariot, where these unbridled horses are let loose. Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity: we must see it transiently, not behold it wishly. He can never keep his covenant with God, that makes not a covenant with his eyes. But my inward man is safe, why may not my outward man be free? This is an idle presumption: he is more than a man, whose heart is not led by his eyes; he is less than a good man, whose eyes be not restrained by his heart. So, the ear is the trap-door of the soul; the flies of hell are ever humming about it. It is temptation enough to the thief, that he hears of a booty. If dishonesty come so near as the ear, let wonder stop it out, and save virtue the labor.

2. Bad company; Joseph shunned the society of his Mistress. We know our own hearts, we know not the hearts of others. To be the provocation of sin is unholiness, not to avoid the provocation of sin is unhappiness. God and his Angels will protect thee in thy ways: in thy ways, not in thy wanderings. If we once rove out of the lists of our calling, there is nothing but danger. Had Dinah kept at home, her Virginity had been safe: had Shechem forced her in orbe muliebri, the house; she had sustained loss without sin. It had not then been her evil, but his: her gadding gave the occasion, even this made her not innocent. It is no sufficient warrant to draw us into suspected places, and spiritual dangers; only to see. No wise man will go into the infected Pest-house, only to see the fits of the visited. Who would poison his body, to please his taste? Quales amplectimur, tales credimur: With the lascivious we hardly learn to be chaste. Immodest behavior makes way for lust; this gives life unto wicked hopes. A cold denial invites a second charge: she deserves some blame, that hath only been tried, though she consent not. A fair carriage keeps temptation out at the staves end: lightness of presence lets it in to the grapple, and gives encouragement to lewd desires. Though we fight and conquer, yet it was our fault that we were put to fight. A man is not only to keep his conscience clear, but his name; and to keep this is harder. For our conscience is in our own custody, our credit lies in the hands of other: this stands on likely-hoods, and their construction of our deeds. It is no easy thing to disprove a slander: like an unruly spirit once raised, hard to conjure down. Our reputation is more frail than ourselves, still liable to suspicion: it must be our good behavior, and avoiding bad society, that can keep our name from scandal.

3 Idleness, or no company, and nothing to do: such a heart is the Devils day-bed, whereupon he takes his nooning. The Philosopher called love Otiosum negotium; a disease to be cured by labor. Thou wicked and slothful servant: if slothful, certainly wicked: if slow bellies, presently evil beasts. While Israel is working in Egypt; pursuing or pursued in Canaan, they have no leisure to be wanton. Let them lie still in the plains of Midian, the dancing lasses of Moab will soon seduce them to folly. Who ever saw David so tempted and foiled in the times of his busy war, as when he was idle at ease? In troubles he could rise up in the morning to his early devotions, prevent the morning watch, break his nights rest with the cares of the day: the service of God, and business of state, took him up: thus long was he innocent and holy. But when Satan finds him wallowing in the bed of idleness, he now thinks him fit for a temptation. Gentlemen that live of their lands, and those of a worse condition, that have given over all trades, to live of their moneys; think themselves the only fortunate men: they need not toile, nor weary their limbs with labor: instead of the Pen or the Pike, the Pot and the Pipe is all their exercise. But there are none more unhappy; for lust can be no stranger to an idle bosom: the industrious man hath no leisure to sin. Doth any man complain the contiguity of his labor? he finds fault with his own felicity: the toile of action is recompensed by the benefit: if he were not doing good, he would be doing ill: if we did work less, we should suffer more: while we work not ourselves, Satan works upon us.

The sitting bird is the fowlers mark: the Devil is like some lazy companion, that while he finds us busy gives back and sees it no time to meddle with us. But if like the idle hus-wife, when her gossip comes in, we throw away our work and hold chat with him; nothing can please him better. Gratifie him but thus far, to talk with him; and he thinks us sure. Exercise is wholesome for the body, better for thy soul. The earth stands still, therefore becomes natures common-Sewer; the receptacle of corruption, all dregs: the heavens, that are ever in motion, are always pure. The troublesomest work to a good man, is to have no work: which when he hath supplied by prayer and meditation, and yet finds room for more guests; he studies business; & qui non invenit, facit. They that surrender themselves to sloth, find matter of disease breeding in their bodies and souls. The active spirit is soonest dulled with no labor; as the water that hath been heated, soonest freezeth. The danger of women's corruption is their leisure: idleness breeds fancies, which continuance of domestical business would keep out.

4 Lust after beauty; this is the general snare, and occasion of uncleanness. Joseph was a goodly person, fair, and well-favored: lovely to all, but not looked on alike withal eyes: his fellows praise him, his master trusts him, his mistress dotes on him: all love him, she over-loves him. That is true of the Poet, that virtue never hath a better grace, than when it shineth, from a beauteous face: yet was this danger, it gave him means to sin; which when he refused, it was the occasion of his trouble. But he was fair without, and fairer within; Pulchrior in luce cordis, quàm in facie corporis. Even the Sons of God were caught with beauty. Balaam could not harm Israel with his curses, he doth with his courses and counsels: his curse had hurt none but himself, his counsel cost the blood of twenty four thousand. Send out your fairest women among them: this policy was fetched from the bottom of hell. There is no sin more plausible than wantonness, wantonness is no way sooner provoked than by the sight of beauty: this shall draw them to lust, their lust to folly, their folly to Idolatry; so God shall curse them for thee, unasked. This project of that damned Magician was too prosperous: the daughters of Moab do more in the Tents of Israel, than the Amorites and Amalekites could do in the plains of Moab. The women made them captives, whom the men felt conquerors. Had they sent their subtlest politicians, and strongest soldiers, to persuade or compel them to Idolatry; they had been returned with scorn. But the eloquent and victorious beauty of the women effected this. It had been happy for them, if Balaam had used any charms but these.

I know that a man may lawfully desire beauty in his own spouse, as Jacob loved Rachel: not for provocation of lust, but procreation of children, and more loving society. Some actions do not so well rid off a hand, without some delight; as eating of meats, learning of arts; and such is matrimonial society. As meat pleaseth us better in a clean dish, wine in a Crystal glass: so virtue in a comely person. But if the beauty be let into our thoughts, and the virtue shut out, there is no speedyer way to ruin. As it is God's use to fetch glory to himself out of the worst actions of Satan: so it is Satan's ambition to advantage himself by the fairest works of God. If the Lord suffer him, he will ruin us with the most rare pieces of creation: No one means hath so enriched hell, as beautiful faces. The beautiful harlot increaseth the transgressors among men. Three of David's children were undone by it at once: it was the occasion of Amnons Incest, of Thamars ravishment, of Absalom's bloody pride and murder. Beauty, if not well discipline'd proves a traitor rather than a friend. It is a blessing to be fair; but such a blessing, that if the soul be not as clear as the skin, leads to a curse. It is no rare thing to find the foulest soul dwell fairest. If the inward conditions be bad, O what strange mischief can beauty bring about! How many Solomon's and Samson's hath it befooled and blinded? The weaker sex is the stronger in temptation: it was the dowry that our Grandmother Eve bequeathed to her daughters; that they should be our helpers to sin. Indeed it is not a woman's fault to be fair: the candle does not amiss in burning, the foolish fly offends, that scorseth her wings in the flame. The crystal stream is not to be blamed, because some distracted man drowns himself in it. Yet to be but a temptation, and (though the unwilling) occasion of another's ruin, is an unhappiness, albeit not a sin. The Lord so mortify all inordinate lusts in us, that we may be admitted to that city, into which no unclean thing shall ever enter.

The Cure follows; and this methodus medendi is twofold: the one a preservative, the other sanative. To see the sin in the proper and natural odiousness, is a preventing antidote. For them that be infected, there are other medicines. The horribleness of it is seen in it self, and in th'effects.

For it self, the light of nature discerned and condemned it. It is objected, that Solon, a Law-giver, one of the wisest among the Grecians, used to buy harlots for the young men: and among the Carthaginians it was a custom for the Virgins before their marriage, to prostitute themselves publicly in the Temple of Venus, that they might bring the greater portions to their husbands. Answ. This was not by natural light, but the unnatural darkness of those given over to a reprobate sense, as the punishment of former wickedness. Ob. But the Prophet Hosea was thus commanded; Take thee a wife of whoredoms. Answ. Nothing can be concluded for it out of a typical act: neither did he make a harlot, but take a harlot, to reduce her to chastity. Object. But fornication is reckoned among indifferent things. Answ. Their esteeming it so, did not make it so; their own conscience thought otherwise. Abimelech calls it a great sin; this, that Heathen could see, but not so clearly as Joseph: Dishonor to the husband, wrong to the children, breach of covenant, but above all, disobedience to God, is in it. Against thee have I sinned; was his confession, that had sinned against Bethshebah, Vri'h, and the whole Church; but especially against the Lord. It is most odious among Christians; this folly ought not to be done in Israel: it is bad enough in all places, here intolerable. not to be named among Saints. Let the act be so abhorred, that it may quite lose the name: especially, let no Saint have such a name. It makes the name stink both living and dead. Living, If a brother be a fornicator, with such a one eat not. Dead, his reproach shall not be wiped away. It is more heinous than theft; Men do not despise a thief, if he steal to satisfy his hungry soul but he that committeth adultery destroyeth his own soul. Goods may be restored, honesty never: the breaches may be repaired, the pristine state not recovered.

For the effects: It breeds diseases in the body, that the quality of the sin may be seen in the nature of the plague; as we know a rotten nut by the worm hole in the shell. It makes a more loathsome soul; so odious that till it be cleansed, neither will God dwell with it, nor shall it dwell with God. It blasteth the estate, roots out all the increase, and brings a man to a piece of bread. The Pore•• uncleanness makes the children beggars. It curseth the house, Hos. 4.13, 14. His own sin abroad, is able to make his house a Stews at home. What followed upon David's adultery, but present payment? The deflowring of his daughter Tamar, the murder of his son Amnon, the treason, incest, and ruin of h•• Absalom. How justly is he scourged by the sins of his children, whom his own act taught to offend? Vnlawfull lust still propagates it self by example: when the father of a family brings sin home to his house, it is not easily swept out. It endangers Incest; when the legitimate son may come to marry the bastard ⟨◇⟩ of the same father.

It is not only Poena peccati; that a man being hateful to God for other sins, is made hateful to men for this: Vt quod latuit in cord impuro, pateat in opere ign•minioso: other sins ought him a shame, this shall pay it him. Therefore, he that is good before God, shall be delivered from the strange woman, not the sinner. But also, Causa peccati, it brings no more wickedness. So the Apostle joins them; Fornication, wickedness: if ⟨ in non-Latin alphabet ⟩ be first, ⟨ in non-Latin alphabet ⟩ follows. Give lust room in the eye, she will possess body and soul. The Midian faces first appeared to Israel; they like them, that brought them to like their presence, that to take pleasure in their feasts; from their boords to their beds, from their beds to their Idols: and now God is separated, and they are joined to Baal-peor. Corporal fornication is the way to spiritual: if superstitious love make Idols of flesh, how soon do they give us up to Idols of wood and stone?

It hath not only undone persons and houses, but ruined •hole Cities and Kingdoms. What a breach did this double fornication make in Israel? God doth not smother his wrath, but himself strikes with the plague, and bids Moses strike with the sword. Dinah is ravished, the whole City is destroyed for it. While every man lies sore of his own wound, Simeon and Levi rush in with weapons and kill them. What was the shrieking of women and children in all the streets of that City? While the fathers and husbands take mortal physic for their Princes sickness. For a particular Amnon to answer his lust in blood, is not so ponderous: Many a whore-lover meets with such a catastrophe. But for a whole Tribe to be cut off for uncleanness, as was Benjamin: for a whole kingdom to smart; as Abimelech said to Abraham, Thou hast brought a great sin on me, and on my kingdom; that the whole kingdom of Israel should smart for the kings filthiness; these be dire effects. The name of King became odious to Rome, for the rape of Lucrece: famous Troy was rased for one Helena.

It is commonly mixed and plagued with blindness. So had lust beforspent Judah, that he could not discern the voice of Tamar which he heard every day, nor foresee what shame might follow those pledges: this passion for the time even bereaves a man of himself. Thus impudently blind was Joseph's Mistress: it had been too bad to yield, but for a woman to solicit, yea to importune, yea to violate the modesty of her servant; gross and desperate! As sin ever ends in shame when it is committed, so it makes us past shame in the committing. Thus Amnon thrusts his defiled sister out of doors: where was his reason? Secrecie had some hope, but to expose her, what was it but to anger a royal father, incense a brother, incur the Law, provoke her friends, fill the world with outcries? Though he looked not so high as heaven in doing the sin, yet he might look so low as earth to prevent the shame. No, lust knows the reason, and they that lose their honesty, shall lose their wit. This is just with God, to punish a debauched heart with a besotted understanding. Uncleanness loves a dark mind, as well as a dark house. How foolish were those Israelites; in joining themselves to Baal peor? All Idols are abominable, this was also beastly: the devil appeared in a sordid and nasty form; yet uncleanness works them to it. Cupid is blind, and whither may not he be transported that wanteth his eyes.

Not seldom it goes off in hatred of the object: ordinate conjunction increaseth love, this begets detestation; and that both where it is crossed, and where it is satiated. For the former Potipher's wife is an example; if she cannot have Joseph's body to enjoy, she wills it to ruin: when she fails of his love, she seeks his life. Lust is a pleasant madness when it is yielded, a desperate madness when it is opposed. Love is not more witty than malice: the arguments of his innocence shall challenge him of sin: he left his coat because he would not do that, for which he is condemned because he left it. No hate burns so furiously, as that which ariseth from the quenched coals of love. Vel te ardentem amat, vel te capitaliter odit. For the other, look on Amnon; how did he hate abused Tamar more than ever he loved her? He should indeed have hated himself for this brutish violence, not his innocent sister: but his former love was not more unreasonable and mis-placed, than his later hatred. Fraud drew her into the house, force entertained her within, and hatred drove her out. So did one hour change the extremity of his love into extremity of hate; that he is now sick of her, as before he was sick for her: and she that kept the keys of his heart, is now locked out of his doors.

It is a sin not easily repented of: Whoredom and new wine take away the heart. Saint Paul comforts the Corinthians, that they are Washed from their sins: they will not off without washing, and there can be no washing without water, and a drop or two will not serve to baptize the conscience. But, say some, this sin ordinarily of it self brings to repentance? Indeed, loss of spirits, and terrors of the fact, may breed some kind of remorse: and the expectation did not promise, nor the fruition perform more delight, than the remembrance brings irksomenesse. The face of uncleanness looks lovely, but the farewell is deadly. If we could foresee the end, before we taste the beginning, we would never let it come so far, as to repentance; our former detestation would save our after-sorrow a labor. But lust often ends in discontent, seldom in true repentance. The whores guests are in hell, and that is no way to heaven.

Lastly, it pulls down God's fearful Judgments, though it scape the censure of man. Amnon had so quite forgotten his sin, that he durst go to that house a feasting, where Tamar was mourning: not suspecting him other than a friend whom he had deserved to make an enemy. Now when his heart was merry, he fell down dead. Wicked Absalom meant this murder to his soul, as well as to his body; but God was just in both. He that in two years forbearance would find to leisure to repent must now perish without leisure to cry for mercy. How fearful a Judgment came to that Levites concubine, to be abused to death? She lead wronged the bed of a Levite before by her willing wantonness: yet her father harboured her, her husband forgave her, the world had forgot it, her self never smarted for it. Thus far she goes smoothly away with her sin; and neither father, nor husband, nor neighbor, nor Magistrate, nor her own conscience, upbraid her with it. Now it is forgotten of all hands, God calls her to account for it. Yea, so just and even is that Almighty Judge in his retributions; that the matter of her sin shall be the manner of her punishment: he will plague her with her own delight. Uncleaness was her fault, uncleaness shall be her fate and ruin. Before she had exposed her self with willing pleasure, now she is exposed by force: adultery was her sin, adultery is her death. Men may forget their own filthiness, God remembers it; and will pay them when they least expect it. Sin is a faithful debtor, it never borrows without payment: if it owe us a punishment, it will not break with us. And if it fail of present Judgments, yet this is sure, it destroyeth the soul. Lusts fight against the soul, but uncleaness kills it. These be the terrible effects, which if tremblingly applied, like corrosives will eat out the dead flesh, and become so many proper ingredients to the medicine of our cure. Or like ashes that are made by a fire of wood, which being poured on, will smother the fire in the wood, and put it out.

The other remedies are; first, to abridge the flesh of provocatives; beating down the body, and keeping it in subjection. Take away the fuel, if the fire be too hot. High feeding and lasciviousness are inseparable: that is the Lynbecke which destills all into lust.

To remember a man's beginning and end. The Lord did not make us for pollution; and the thought of death will be a death to lust. Meditate of thy mortality, whensoever thou art tempted to this iniquity.

Fear God, which will make every joint tremble at the very suggestion. Some forbear a sin, because it is dear, some because it is laborious, others, because it is dangerous, few because it is impious. But the death of lust is religion: Moralitie resists but in cold blood; heat nature, and all her in-borne principalls are forgotten. Regard of name and credit may fear the shame, yet love the sin. But he that fears God, and is watch'd by his own conscience, can never find a place dark enough to offend in. The Law looks to our words and deeds, and requires that they be good: Religion also fetcheth in the thoughts, and makes them holy. We cannot without danger trust a moral heart with a fair body: we may safely trust a fair body with a sanctified mind. This was Joseph's argument; the pleasure of sin cannot stand with the fear of God. He might conceit, that this kindness might endear him as strongly to his mistress, as his service had to his master: to be so great a Ladies minion, how many hundreds of our younger brothers would have embraced it. But holy fear had taken up all the room, before carnal love came. He knew that all the honors of Egypt could not buy off the guilt of one sin: that such an advancement would have cast him down from the royal favor of GOD. The good heart chooseth rather to lie in the dust, than to rise by wickedness. This were to get up on the scaffold of death, that a man might look higher.

Abhor Idleness; the standing pool will gather filth of it self, and he full of toads and vermin. Attend the word preached; Wherewithall else should a young man cleanse his way? That Physic is only able to purge it. This shall deliver thee from the strange woman. If wisdom enter not, lust will: they that find not delight in the Spirit, will seek it at the flesh. By the word of GOD abiding in you, ye shall overcome the wicked one. How have all weapons of reasons and moral resolution doubled in this encounter? It is the Sword of the Spirit that gets the victory.

Prayer: if Paul be buffeted, this is his refuge, and it brings remedy; he prayed thrice. Declare thy grievances, this shall bring down heavenly graces. Shall we be like infants, that cry when a pin pricks them, but cannot tell where? Say, God knows our wants; what then? the sullen child says, my father knows that I want bread, I will not ask him though I starve. God hath promised to hear (but only) those that call upon him. He so orders things, that he seldom gives till he be asked: it is a poor pains, but to ask and have. Ask of me, and I will give thee. D••o tibi, but first, Postula a me. The woman that would be rid of her importunate Tempter, is plain with him, I will tell my husband.

Flee, the temptation: at other times, Fight Timothy: now Fly Timothy. When such an enemy pursues, it is high time to fly. Rather will Joseph lose his livery, than blemish his Mistresses honor, his Masters in her, his own in both, God's in all. He cannot be excused, that lives where he may in likely-hood be faulty. To be safe from evil works, is to avoid the occasions.

If we cannot fly, yet let us deny. David sollicites, had Bathsheba denied, that great sin had not been committed. Had she been mindful of her covenant with God, and her matrimonial fidelity; the inordinate desire had been checked, and in time choked. But ambition was the Bawd to lust; and the conceit to be the Kings Mistresses, to command him that commanded Israel; prostitutes her soul before her body: her facility furthers the sin. The first motioner of evil is most faulty: but as in quarrels, the second blow makes the fray, and the Law takes special notice of that: so in sins, the second blow, that is, the consent of will, is by the Law of God most culpable. Lust is a sin of two: if but one party be wise, both escape: he that is sure of either, may be secure of both. Women are the weaker in nature, yet stronger in desires: and though many hold it an impudence to woo, yet they hold not the innocence to deny. The woman at first tempted man, and therefore looks ever since that man should tempt her. She was an agent in his first ruin, in all the rest, she would be a patient. The heat of man's constitution disposeth him to be the first profferer: now his chastity lies in the hands of women. If she have the grace to refuse, what he had the fault to offer, they are both delivered. Lust would be the most common sin of the world, if like other sins it could be done alone. Indeed it is best never to be put to a denial: but by a fair carriage to put temptation out of hope. Wisdom forbears some lawful things, because they may be occasions of things unlawful.

Modestie; which is the only visible virtue, the chastity of the looks: a transparent glass, thorough which we see a clean and uncorrupted heart. This sets the face in a right posture; far from pride, and not nearer to wantonness. The beauties of both mind and body meet in the center of modesty. An affected and coyish demurenesse is incident to them that be bad: but true modesty is seldom found but in innocence. Modestie is the out-work of the Citadel, that keeps the enemy even from the walls. For a great example of this virtue, we cannot look too much upon Joseph. Forraine stories make honorable mention of many famous for chastity. Of Amabaeus, who had a beauteous wife, yet abstained from her, perhaps he loved his Harp better. Of Xenocrates, and of Spurina, a fair young man, who disfigured his face of purpose that he might not be desired of women. Of Hippon a Greekish woman, that drowned her self to save her chastity. None came near Joseph; who neither abstained from his own wife, that were a folly rather than a chastity: neither disfigured nor destroyed God's workmanship; which were to pull down our house, because the eye of a passenger covers it. But in the heat of youthful blood, when his Lady sollicites, promises reward, threatens ruin, conveniency of place, opportunity of time, all the helps of hell concurring; then to resist? O here was fire falling upon wet tinder, that soon went out. The Fathers commend him for those four great virtues in this one act. For Temperance, that he would not be enticed by his Mistress. For Justice, that he would not wrong his Master. For Fortitude, that he overcame many assaults. For Prudence, choosing rather to leave his vesture than his virtue.

Marriage; It is better to marry than to burn. Burning is the disease, for which marriage is the proper medicine. This is that ordinate fuel, whereon such fire should feed. S. Jerome's sophistry on that place is absurd: Conjagium dicitur bonum, quia levius malum: for lust can never be good, being a transgression: and marriage cannot in it self be bad, as it is God's institution. Not that every tickling should draw us to marrying; but a Burning, an aestuant flame: for it is one thing vri, another sentire calorem. Some Pontificians have cast bitter aspersions upon marriage; taxing that for uncleanness, which is ordained an antidote against uncleanness. But that is a blasphemous doctrine, and must needs imply, that God himself was mistaken, and that upon a more serious deliberation of the blessed Trinity. Gen. 2.18. Jehovah Elohim: there was a greater consultation about making the woman, than about making the whole world. But it is objected, that in marrying they break their faith. Answ. They do not break the faith, because they marry: but because they wexe wanton against Christ, and so marry. They are first incontinent, suffer themselves to be abused: and then to cover their offense, and to keep them from public shame, they marry. To accept of marriage only as a cloke to hide their former naughtiness; this is the sin condemned. Howsoever they think; marriage is an ordained remedy: strange lusts will give place to true conjugal love. Let the husband love his wife, the wife love her husband; (and they have reason, for they took each other for that purpose) these unnatural fires will out.

These be the rules of prevention, to escape uncleanness: but if any be defiled, they must take another Receipt; true contrition of heart, the floods that come from a broken rock; washing themselves in the laver of Repentance, that they may be clean. David in a zeal of Justice against the rich oppressor, takes an oath to cut him off: God is more favorable to David, than to take him at his word. David says, The man shall die: Nathan says, Thou art the man, but thou shalt not die. Beside uncleanness, he had shed innocent blood: and the strict Law requires life for life. But O, the wondrous power of Repentance! as if it could dispence with the rigor of Justice: Thou shalt not die. In David we hear the voice of the Law, awarding death unto sin; in Nathan, the voice of the Gospel, awarding life unto the repentance for sin. Whatsoever the sore bet this is the remedy. The soul that hath sinned, shall die; saith the Law. The Gospel comes in with an exception; The soul that hath sinned, And not repented, shall die: never any soul applied this remedy, and died. Blessed is the man, not that hath not sinned; where is he to be found? But; whose sin shall not be imputed, because he hath repented. It is only unfeigned repentance, that can cleanse our souls from these known evils.

Without this, God's hand will as surely overtake us in the punishment, as Satan's hand hath overtaken us in the sin. But for comfort to the wounded soul; There is no sin so foul, but the blood of Christ can scour it off. Uncleanness is a deep stain, sized into the soul by her dwelling in the body: there is no means to get it out, but by the blood of the Lamb. Even the garments of the Saints need washing; and what can make them white? only, the blood of the Lamb. It was the Jewish scoff at Christ, Alios potuit servare, seipsum non potuit: he could save others, not himself. Saint Ambrose replies, Imo ill solus potuit sanare vulnera mea, qui negligit sua: he only can heal my wounds, that neglected his own. His garments were died red, to make all ours white. But neither can this be had without faith, nor faith be assured without repentance. It is a happy thing for a man to improve the days of his peace, for the prevention of future vengeance: to seek only to be safe by being good. Next to this divine providence, our best guard is our Innocence, next to that our repentance. For him that hath fallen, to pray, Lord deliver me; for him that hath not fallen, Lord preserve me, in Jesus Christ. Take here two Characters.

The unclean person stands like one tormented with the stone in the kidneys; there is not a limb or joint about him, but suffers with the distortion of that one part. If some spot or token of his souls infection should break out and appear in his face, no leper would change complections with him. If he had a hundred eyes, he could bestow offices on them all, to purvey for his lust. He loves to be a looking on pictures; and when he cannot reach the substance, he courts the shadow. He sends his eye to the market, and money is his Cater. He loves the company but of three; Baud, Whore, and himself: only the Devil comes in, and makes up the fourth against his will. The pestilence is in his breath, it infects every place he comes in. His body is rotting apace, but his soul is already fallen to pieces. His Mistress is his Idol, and he would never learn any prayers; but for doing his devotions to her. For God; he either thinks or wishes that he could not see in the dark. He is borne to be a woman's slave, not her Lord and husband: he dares not marry, for fear (contrary to other men's minds) of being paid his own debts. If he do bestow himself, he commonly soulders up some cracked piece: and in marriage is more jealous, than before he could be luxurious. He and his strumpet make up a fagot for hell fire; and must burn together in torment, as they have done in turpitude. He so consumes himself to cinders, that there is not one drop of moisture left in him, not though a tear could save his soul. Before he dies, he is become all stench: his soul stinks God, his body stinks to himself, his name stinks to the world. It is just that he who leaves GOD for a harlot while he lives, should lose God, and his harlot, and himself, when he is dead. Reason left him long ago, and he hath ever since lived beast. Commonly he dies of Hercules disease: a fire in his marrow. He may come to be sorry, seldom to repent. At last, he is brought to his couch, or crutch; and there everybody leaves him.

The chaste is a pure man whether in wedlock or virginity. If married, he loves his wife, not because she was rich, or fair; but because she was and is good; because he once loved her, and still loves himself in her. All change abhors; for he married not for recreation, but procreation; not for pleasure, but posterity. It is her soul he sets his love upon; he knows the body to be but physic for lust, a shell for progeny: therefore chose her not for that half whereby she is a woman, but for the better, wherein she is a man. Sensuall affection looks only to the shape; rational hath respect to the soul and mind forgetting the sex, or leaving to the sense. Souls have no sexes; therefore they that love in soul, (in that part which is not sexuall, wherein both husband and wife are men) their love admits no more impurity than inconstancy. If he be single, his mind keeps his mortal fabric sweet: his conscience hath got the better of his concupiscence: he is so far from doing, that he dares not think amiss. His mirth is so clear, that you may look thorough it into virtue, not beyond. He had rather seem not to understand a bad motion, than to hold conference with it. He censures all charitably, and abhors suspicion: he thinks none should do ill, because he means well. He entertains none but honest thoughts: if loose ones look in at the window, he presently shuts the door. He neither with unseasonable sleep rusts his soul, nor with immoderate diet teacheth his body to rebel. He is one of those that benot defiled with women, for they are virgins; and follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. His soul is Christ's betrothed Spouse, and he accounts death but a messenger, to bring her home to her husband. He is so clean, that the Angels love to be about him here, and he shall be received among them hereafter.

Walk after the flesh.] This walking is the Axeltree, whereon the whole frame of the Text moveth. There is no man can walk without lust, but the good man does not walk after lust: if it go with him, it shall not go before him. It is the natural man's way, the Christians trouble in the way. If he be enticed out of virtues p•h, either he doth not give consent, or he doth not give full consent, or he doth grieve for consent. Either he doth not walk, or he walks not far, or he walks against his will, and soon correcteth his steps. The wicked man is taken in his walk, Psal. 68.21. But he that doth purpose before hand not to sin, and in the act doth strive against sin, and after the act is sorry for sin; though he step awey weakly but not wickedly, God in mercy spares him, because this is none of his walk. He that is in the flesh, cannot please God, so long as he keeps that way but as water that hath been frozen with cold, may afterward be heat with fire; so he may come from a carnal to a spiritual course. Things of the flesh are of three sorts: some good, as the knowledge of arts: some indifferent, as honor and riche• some evil, as the works of sin. We walk in the former, and do well, keeping the right end: in the middle, not amiss, keeping the right manner: in the last, we go amiss, and there is no pretence to excuse us. We make the good become evil to ourselves; when we employ our learning to justify error. We make the indifferent very evil, when we prefer temporals to spirituals; as the tongue of the feverish infected with choler, makes sweet things taste bitter. I observe four things in this carnal walking. 1. Their slavery to it. 2. Their constancy in it. 3. The specification of it. 4. Our remedy from it.

1 Their slavery: to walk is their errant diligence: to walk After it, is their servile obedience. The flesh leads, and they follow like dutiful servants. All servants. All service is from sin, this is the service of sin. If man had not sinned, he should not have served: Cham was borne of the same Parents; only his sin brought him to a slavish condition. This was just with God: but for man to make his eldest son Lord of all, and the rest no better than his servants: if such a tyranny of custom, (as if hey were all illegitimate) that in the book of God we can find no such distinction. There is a service of Superioritie: the good Prince thinks himself but the highest servant of the common-wealth. He troubles his thoughts, he breaks his sleeps about the business of state; sets his shoulders under the weight of government: and his Praesse in ruling it, is but a Subesse to the conservation of it. There is a service of equality; By love serve one another: he that doth not, is like a loose tooth in the mandible, better out than in.

There is a service of Inferioritie; which is either. 1. Voluntary, when a free man makes himself a servant; and such a servant may make himself free again. Or. 2. Temporary: he that works for us by the day, is so long our servant; at night he is free. Or. 3. Pactory; undertaking such a work, for such a wages, during such a time; in hoc, ad hoc, and huc usque, he is a servant. Or 4. Captive, such as be taken in the wars: which Saint Augustine will have called Servi a Servando, because they were saved in slaughter. Or 5. Native, such as are borne servants, being the children of Servile parents. Or 6. Venditive, that have sold themselves; concerning whom God set down a Law. So Ahab sold himself to work wickedness. But Paul seems to acknowledge this of himself; I am carnally sold under sin? We answer; there be two ways of selling unto bondage: one compulsory, as the brethren sold Joseph: so the regenerate are sold under sin, but against their wills. The other voluntary, as the wicked sell themselves to Satan for very vanity; instating themselves upon the flesh, that they tell (without asking) who owns them, by the superscription of their livery, so that sin by the commandment becomes exceeding sinful. As a head-strong and unbroken horse, the more he is curbed by the bridle, the more he breaks out. Wine will enflame any man, but he that hath a feverish body, is more fired with it through his infirmity. There is abuying and felling. Esa. 52.3. Ye have sold yourselves for naught, and ye shall be redeemed without money. But this is in a diverse sense: they are sold for naught in respect of God, because he hath no honor by it: and redeemed for naught, in respect of themselves, they paid nothing for their redemption, but not so, in respect Christ, for he bought us dear. But these have willfully sold themselves to the service of sin.

2 Their constancy in it. Walking is a continued act; and acts continued make habits. Two sorts of Philosophers had their names from walking: the Stoics, who derived their doctrine from Plato: and the Peripatetickes, who had Aristotle for their Prince. Besides, their ambulating life, severing themselves from common society, they had a certain peculiar and dogmatical way, whereunto they confined themselves. But all their ways were but fantasies and errant opinions; without any truth of rule, especially without the Rule of Truth. Our blessed God hath given us a blessed way; and as many as walk after that rule, peace be on them and mercy: a perfect rule indeed; which we have good occasion to seek, good direction to find, good encouragement to walk, good reward at the end.

Walking intends a perpetuated motion, not for a pace or space, but holding o...: therefore, is the wicked conversation called a way; for that's a man's way, not which he steps into, but walks and travels. Some have spoken much of the way, but out of the way; while they called every act of sin, a way: for the Scripture only means it of practical and habitual sin. So then, to walk after the flesh, is an addiction to sin, constate of many lusts. This is a true distinction: Every vice is a sin, every sin is not a vice: every wry step is an error, it is not a way, not an heresy in manners. Once being overtaken with wine, makes not a drunkard. Vice cannot consist with virtue, quia ex diametro pugnat: but Peccatum, a vicious act doth not destroy virtue, whether moral or theological. Peters denial did not destroy his faith, nor David's uncleanness his charity. These were their sins, they were not their ways: their usual walking took another course. Actions are done by the powers of the soul and body, but habits have their residence in ipsis potentiis, both of the sensitive and intellectual part: as wantonness or drunkenness in the former; pride, hypocrisy, diffidence in the other. If we compare them before God, vice is more grievous than a sin, because it is habitual malice: if before men, sin is more haiuous than vice; for vices are not punished by Magistrates, but only sins. But they ever beget one another; many evil actions beget an evil habit, and an evil habit every day begets evil actions.

3 The specification of it: the flesh hath many ways for them to walk. Take them by couples: there is a Reeling way, and a Railing way. The former is the drunkards walk, that leads him from the lake of wine to the lake of brimstone: this he that never abstains till he be a thirst, and never drinks but double, for he must be pledge'd. The other is the swearers walk; that in every place sends up defiance to the Lord of Hosts. He infects all company, as thunder sours wine; and often dyes raving and blaspheming, that's the end of his journey. There is a Ruffling way, and a Scuffling way. The former is the proud man's walk: as beggars hang their rags on the hedges, to tell they have been there; so these leave everywhere certain monuments and flagges of their arrogant folly. The devil cannot miss them, for he is sure to find them in his own walk. The other is the litigious man's walk; he passes through all the Iudiciary courts on earth, to the infernal court of hell. The way of peace he knows not: there is no awe in his heart, while there may be any law on his side. And when all his substance is run out in fees to his Advocates, at last (without the especial grace of Repentance, and resitution) himself goes for a round fee to the devil. There is a Burning way and a Turning way: The former is the envious man's walk; anger is but a passionate fit of the irascible part; but malice is an inveterate anger, a fiery habit. Another's well-fare is his most capital offense: yet his envy, like Phalaris Bull, makes that first become a torment to himself, which he prepared for others. He fires himself before he goes to hell, as if he meant to season and harden himself for that unquenchable burning.

The other is the Hypocrites walk, whose religion lies in wait for the inclination of the Prince: standing water, that neither ebbs nor flows, but according to the Moon, the Time. He is very earnest in what he undertakes, and reviles the opposite; yet he can be of any religion for a need, therefore his heart is truly of none. Of all men, the Ielous and the hypocrite are possessed with a strange madness; they are very diligent and curious, yet hope to lose their labors. There is a thorny way, and a myrie way. The former is the deceivers walk: a common Burse, where the fraudulent trader, the pestilent Usurer, the impudent Churchrobber, every day fetch their turns: conferring how to turn the common wealth; into a private wealth and to make all Priests of one order, Mendicants. To speak impartially; this is an habit, men walk in it to their graves. A way it is, but none of God's ways: an end it hath, but none of comforts ends: an answer it hath, but none of truths answers: a reward it hath, but it is the retribution of vengeance. Men think they may do this without trouble of conscience; but God keep them from dying with such a conscience. The other is the adulterers walk, but that it is somewhat too fast for a walk: for if his acts could answer the number of his desires, nature could scarce supply him with desired objects. Could his wishes take effect. Popery might have many Nuns, it should have no maids. The flesh hath many more ways and walks, which Paul himself is fain to conclude with an &c.

4 For our remedy, first, let us beware of walking in sin, Psal. 1.1. It is dangerous to cross their way, mortal to walk in it. Look to the habit of sin, be sure to mortify that: it is not enough sometime to forbear the action: it will be rare, if a bad tree should not yield bad fruit. Cut thy hair, it will grow again: mow the grass, it will spring again: lop a tree, it is a tree still. Not to lust when a man is sick, not to steal while he is a sleep, not to quarrel while he in prison, not to swear while he is at Church; No thanks; the root is still within. If the wicked restrain one evil, the godly will kill ten: if Saul slay his thousand, David will slay his ten thousand. He that strikes at sin, let him be sure to strike home; do not favor it, for if it scape, it will have no mercy on thee; but be so much $\langle \diamond \rangle$ more exasperated, because thou attemptest, and didst not speed it. He that ha• wounded this Lion at the heart, shall never fear the strength of his paws, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ teeth of his jaws, nor hideousnesse of his roaring. Colossi. 3. ver. 5. Mortify your members that are upon earth. First, he calls them Members, because they be either as dear to you, as your members; or because they are brought into action by your members, or because they are the united limbs of concupiscence, as members are parts of the body. Your, for properly our sins are our own, and nothing else. Mortify, apply something that shall make them dead. Let not sin alo• till it die of it self, but kill it while it might yet live: to give it over when $\langle \diamond \rangle$ no longer commit it, is no repentance. It will put you to some pain: men do not ordinarily die without pain: and sin hath a strong heart, it is not easily killed. It is one thing to sleep, another thing to die; with small ado we may get sin asleep; by rocking it in the cradle of indulgence, and lullabying it with voluptuousness; till it stir not in the conscience. But to get it dead, that it may not live in us, this will cost anguish and trouble. Mortify these ways for two reasons. 1. They arise not from any noble part in us, from no divine principle or gracious instinct; nothing that can declare greatness and true spirit in man: they are but the base and degenerate works, and walks of the flesh. 2. They only make us odious to God: it is not mean clothes, nor a deformed body, nor a torn cottage, nor homely fare; but only sin, that makes a man contemptible. Proud of vices? a lazar may better be proud of his ulcers, a beggar of his vermin, or a scavenger of his lay-stals.

Secondly, let us learn another walk, even to walk with God and be perfect. This is no time of sitting; Christians do not lead vitam seden tariam; it will breed obstructions in the heart. Our Savior himself dearly earned that voice, before he heard it; Sit thou at my right hand. Noah time of standing still; Why stand ye here all the day idle? Why do ye stand? you have feet, walk: Here, in the beginning of your journey: in the day, the night is for rest, the day for labor: All the day, one hour were too much: Idle, a man may stand and do some work; but stand ye idle? There is a Medium betwixt sin and glory, and that's Grace: Vta Regia, via lactea: walk this way, or expect not this end. God did enough to bring the way to us, who could never else have brought ourselves to the way: would we have him bring down heaven and glory too? We are in the bondage of sin as the Israelites were in Egypt: Canaan was theirs, heaven is our promised land: if neither of us fall to walking, nor admit a motion and removal; they through the desert, we through amendment of life; neither can arrive at their home. If thou think thyself to good for this journey, God will think thee too bad for his glory.

God is the God of order, not of confusion: and nature is not suffered to run out of one extreme into another, but by a Medium. Suppose it now midnight, and the Sun with the Antipodes: he does not presently mount up to the height of our heaven, and make it noon-day. But first, it is twilight, then the day dawns, then the sun rises, and yet looks with weaker eyes, before he shines out in his full glory. We do not today sweat with summer, and be shaken with the fury of winter tomorrow: but it comes on with soft paces; the day grows shorter, the sun's force weaker; cold dews, and white frosts, precede the extremity of hardness. Indeed CHRIST is able in a moment, of sinners on earth to make men Saints of heaven; as he wrought upon that one dying malefactor: but he seldom doth so suddenly advance men in the degrees of sanctification. That ordinary way, whereby men walk from the state of sin, to the state of glory, is the state of grace. You have seen some make sudden leaps; and of furious sinners become zealous professors, in a trice. Of such we may be charitably jealous; Non ad altum per saltum: holiness shoots not up like Jonah's Gourd, in a night. Few men know the instant of their conversion as the Papists proudly demand the special times of their innovations, and who resisted their errors at the first rising? But as Popery crept in part after part, in every part gentle degrees in every degree with pretence of truth; till it advanced the sinners of painted ceremonies, with a mighty noise of excommunications, lower than the cataracts of Nile: and howsoever it came in, we find it here. So our conversion is by soft and scarce sensible beginnings, albeit not part after part, yet degree after degree: in every part by gentle soakings in of goodness, in every degree by maturity and growing up to ripeness: as we cannot see the growing of a tree, yet know that it doth grow, by the magnitude of bulk, and branches and fruits: so we may perceive our conversion to God, which walking on must confirm.

Walking is a good ordinary pace, between violent running and lazy creeping; a moderate course between Jehu's march and Mephibosheth's. It is better for a man to go soft and sure, than for a gird to run himself out of wind, and afterwards to stand still and breath him. Walk not slowly, for fear of coming short: not faster than we may hold out to the end, nor slower than we may come in good time to our everlasting rest. Any traveler may be called a side a little, to speak with his friend, or to look upon a noveltie, so for a step and minute be out; but still his way lies before him: whereto recalling himself, and going constantly on in the proceedings of grace, he shall be blessed.

They despise government.] It is no wonder, if they that follow the flesh, contemn authority; and would have no other governor than that of their own choosing. He that hath set up this Dagon for his God, would have nothing to do with the Ark, nothing for the Ark to do with him. It is not enough for Egistus to abuse the bed, but also to shed the blood, of King Agamemnon. The Adulterer is fit to make a Traitor. Rome hath sent us too many prodigious proofs of this; that have at once lusted after the beauty of our women, and thirsted at the blood of our Princes. Palpable demonstrations, that the enchantment of adultery hath begotten instruments of conspiracy. And as a Jesuit is but a new word for a Traitor: so Seminary and seditious are but diverse terms of the same man. Who more despise the Magistracy among us, than the sons of riot, that take in the freight of lust at a Tavern, and than with wind and tide fail to the Brothels? being questioned for this, they turn men of war, stand at defiance, and rime away the awe of government with the ballads of scandal. A man would think, that none who profess the Gospel of Christ, should impugn the ordinances of God: or if they did despise the spiritual ones, as men that have no care of their souls; yet not the visible and temporal ones, as men that stand in fear of their lives. If there were none such, I might well have spared my Sermon, yea the Apostle might have spared my Text. But when this Ulcer comes to be searched, many moe will be found guilty, than be now suspected by others, or suspect themselves.

For method; here be two general things considerable. 1. The excellency of the thing despised; Government. 2. The pravitie of such as throw contempt upon it; Despisers. The former will appear, both by the Authority that ordains it, and by the necessity that requires it.

For the authority; this is from God himself: he gave man a fourfold regiment. 1. Imperium in animalia, over the creatures. 2. Imperium in se; over himself: before his fall by a potent freedom of will he governed all his actions; after his fall some relicts of this dominion appear: reason still retains some fragments of her regiment over the sensual part; though here she be but like a Queen in the midst of none but rebels. In the body, some parts are made to govern and direct the rest; as the head: some to obey, as the members. 3. Imperium domesticum, over his household: the Master is a little King in his family, as the King is a great Master in his kingdom. 4. Imperium politicum; whether Monarchiall, of one; or Aristocratical, of many and those the best: or Democratical, which is the popular state. All which are mediately or immediatly of God, Rom. 13.1. Thou couldest have no power at all against me, saith Christ to Pilate, except it were given thee from above.

Against this Divine Institution there be some objections; to clear all which, hold we this distinction. There is the Power it self, the Assumption of it, and the Execution of it. The manner of assuming it may be from the Devil: either by bribery, as it is likely Felix came in: so that he could not sell cheap, who had bought dear. Or by cruelty and intrusion; as Abimelech ascended the throne by the stairs of blood and fratricide. Or by invasion, as the conquerer makes himself King. Or by usurpation, as Athaliah kept the kingdom from the right heir, Joash. So also the manner of using this power may be from the Devil; as to set up superstition for religion, and cruelty instead of equity. Here neither the bad manner of acquiring, nor bad order of tyrannizing, are from God: yet the authority it self is of God. The hand doth violently extort another's good, or smite with the sword: these abuses are from sin, but the hand it self is given of God. The sight is sore, or adulterous, yet the eye is of God. Matrimoniall copulation hath the patronage of God, copulation not matrimonial is of Satan. The truth is plain; By me Kings reign, saith the Lord: let us hear what error objects.

1 Object. Hos. 8.4. They have set up Kings, but not by me: they have made Princes, and I knew it not.
Answ. They chose the King without God's approbation, they set not up the kingdom without his Iustitution. Evil Princes are said to reign not by God; vel modo gubernandi, when they rule the people not by that Law which should rule the King. Vel modo arripiendi, when God calls them not to reign. Vel sibi, non Deo regnant; they reign not for God's honor but their own humor. God made the member he made not the ulcer: Potentiam Deus distribuit, elation... potentiae malitia invenit. When the Israelites chose Jeroboam their King; that treacherous revolting from their lawful Sovereign, and rebellious adherence to an usurper, an Idolater, was none of God's doing, he condemns it: yet the act was his, 1 King. 11.35. So Jerome says of Saul's election; that it was error populi, non voluntate Domini: it is true, the manner was the people's fault, but the matter was God's purpose: he meant to raise up a King, only takes the occasion by their headstrong importunity. So still doth it happen, that bad manners breed good laws. Without question the thing was good; Monarchy, the best form of government: but good things may be ill desired. So while they affected a King, they rejected the Lord. Therefore seeing they choose to have a King, God will choose the King they shall have. As he gratifies them in the monarchall condition, so he punisheth them in the monarchs person.

2 Object. Saint Peter calls it Ordinationem humanam, an ordinance of man; how is it then of God?
Answ. He calls it human vel subjective, because the subject wherein this authority sticks is man: or Objective, because it is exercised in the affairs of man: or 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, because it is for man's good. The fruits of the earth are brought forth by the industry of man, yet they cease not to be the gifts of God. The forms of administration may be of man, the original institution is of God.

3 Object. If every power, then the tyrannical, is of God; as the Mahometan, Pontifician, Diabolical.
Answ. The Principalitie is, not the tyranny. Wealth is always good in it self, and God's gift; yet the unjust acquisition, and miserable usurpation, make it bad to such owners. Riches are not Mala, nisi malis. And were the Pope an orthodox Bishop, we would not deny his authority to be of God: but his challenge of universal dominion, is not Potestas, sed potestatis ulcus: which he hath by his own ambition, Satan's instigation, not God's Institution. And for the Devills power, it is by God's permission, not without his limitation; no other than a hang-man's office, to correct and punish whom the Divine Justice appoints. When he boasted of the kingdoms, they are all mine; this was but his lie, he had not one foot to bestow.

The power of government is then ordained of God, and that in a special manner, by direct Precept. Sickness indeed and war, famine and poverty, are ordained of God but not by commandment. Promotion comes neither from the East, nor, &c. Nor from the suffrages of People, nor lives of Ancestors, nor conquest of swords, but from the Lord. By him are kingdoms disposed, Kings inaugurated, Crowns of gold set on their heads, Scepters and states established, Angels with their wings shadowing their Thrones; that their Majesty may be higher by the head than the rest of the people. That one man should rule millions, restrain, contstrain, correct, command; how could it be but that God himself hath imprinted the characters of a Divinity in him; but that there is a Divine constitution in a human person. It is thou O Lord, that subduest my people under me. Saul is in David's cave, the soldiers would now have him carve his own revenge; they allege God's promise and this advantage concurring: but take it at the worst; Thou mayest do to him, as it shall seem good to thee: now, that might not seem good to him, that seemed evil to God. But their incentive to blood, David makes a preservative from blood; The Lord forbid, I should do this thing to his Anointed. Doubtless he had work enough to defend both himself and his persecutor: himself from the importunity of their instigation, his Master from suffering violence. Say, he could rule his own hands, it is not easily to rule a multitude. What was the Charm to allay the fury of those raging spirits? He is the Lord's Anointed: nothing else, this was enough: that holy oil was an Antidote for his blood. Saul did not lend David so impenetrable an armor, when he was to encounter Goliath: as David lent him in the plea of his unction. Not one of the discontented out-laws durst put forth a hand of violence against him. The Image and impress of that Divine ordinance strikes such an awe into the hearts of men, that it makes even Traitors, cowards: so that instead of smiting, they tremble, like them whose office is to suffer, not to do. Fear God, honor the King: there was never man that feared God, but he also honored the Prince.

For the necessity; without Government we were worse than beasts: It is the bond of the Common-weal; the life-breath which so many thousand creatures draw: who otherwise would prove a burden to themselves, a booty to their enemies. In the host of Heaven there is a Regiment: under God the Supreme, be orders and degrees of stars and planets; without which composition it could not be called an Army. There is a Regiment in the body; they are luxate and palsy members, that move not by the direction of the Head. In the Family is a Regiment; the servant acknowledgeth his Master, the child his Father. Among irrational creatures is a Regiment: the Bees have their King, the Cranes their Leader, and they keep their night-watches in disposed orders. All the Drove follows the principal beast, and the Sheep are not led by every Ram, but by their own delected Guide.

Thus Nature teacheth, that we are all bound to subject ourselves to Government. Man is a sociable creature, but there would be harsh society among them without a Ruler. None could say, This is mine; and Cheape-side would not be safer than Salisbury-plain. The first rule that Nature dictates to man by experience, is to seek a Ruler. We may say of all other creatures, Nascuntur artifices, they are borne their crafts-masters: Nature it self was their Tailour and Tutor, they came in apparel'd and armed; and by their estimative faculty, they are their own Caters and Cooks, Physicians and builders. They can at first entrance choose their own meats, build their own nests and burroughs, and being distempered, skill their own medicines. But man came in without a rag to his back, or a dinner dressed to his belly, or a house to put his head in; no weapons, no ableness to use them: his understanding like white paper, nothing written on it: all which really teach him to seek a protector. Therefore a common-wealth without a Governor, is like a body without a soul: where is no King, they are all kings. It were strange, if every member of the body should move by a several soul: how long could that man hang together? The son hath a great loss in the death of his father, the wife of her husband, the servant of his master: but in the Funerals of Princes the whole land reads not so much the Princes; as their own mortality: Et in una morte plares agnoscimus, Hectora flemus. One saith truly; Dum mors insignes percutit, omnes petit. I know their fame is immortal, their goodness immortal, their souls immortal; but their bodies are mortal: there is so much of man in them, that they must die. They are lent to us for our sakes, but we must restore them again for their own sakes.

He is the Minister of God to thee for good. Either for our natural good, preserving our lives, which bloody-men would soon ruin, who fear not so much hell as the halter: like beasts that are more afraid of the flash of the powder, than of the bullet. Or Civil good, preserving our goods and possessions; else robbery were law, and men like dogs, would try all right by the teeth. Or Moral good, in commanding and commending Virtue, which hath praise of the Power: or in punishing vice, He bears not the sword in vain. Or Spirit•• all good; the Magistrate by coercive power enforcing men to the duties of godliness. These seats would be empty, the Preacher wants his relative, hearers; the Sacraments would be vili-pended, the Service of God resigned to the service of Satan; but for Government. The Sabbath would not be distinguished from common days, the markets be fuller than the Temples; the wicked, like sullen children, would not forsake their play for their meat, but for the rod of correction. Many Saints in heaven might now confess, that they had not known God, but for the King. First, compulsory means brought them to the feast, whereof once tasting, they would never leave it. ^t Compel them to come in &c. It is a good storm that blows the wanton and secure Mariner into the haven. We could not converse together, had not God set authority over us, to repress our mutual violences.

Lewd wretches have not the fear of God, therefore God brings them under the fear of man: that being subjected to Rulers of their own kind, their outrage might be sent from temporal death to eternal. In that notorious apostasy of the Jews, when so many execrable enormities were committed, the Spirit still prefixeth; At that time there was no King in Israel. We read of a poor Levite wanting means; why? there was no King. If God had been their King, his Law had provided for the Levite. If Moses had been their King, his sword would have cut out a portion for the Levite. We are beholding to government for order, for peace, for Religion. For order; where is no King, every man will be his own king. For peace, he that is his own king, will be another's Tyrant. For Religion; every Micah would have a house of gods, beside God's house. We are worthy of nothing but confusion, if we do not bless God for Regular dominion. No wonder, if the Levites go a begging, while there is no King in Israel. The Tythes and Offerings were their due; had these been paid, none of the holy Tribe needed to wander for maintenance. Where both Legal and Regal authority appoints the Levite his right, the wickedness of man will defraud him. But what should become of the Levites, if there were no King? And what of the Church, if there were no Levites? No King, no Church: no civil government, no Ecclesiastical. How should the impotent child live without a nurse? It was God's promise unto his Church, Kings shall be thy Foster-fathers, and Queens thy Nurses. How should not the sheep be a prey to Wolves and Foxes, but for the Shepherd? What life or temper can be kept in the body that is head-less? Therefore, that the riches we have gotten by honest industry, may be assured to our posterity; that we may sit under the shadow of peace, and teach our children to know the Lord; that the lamp of our lives be not snuffed out with violence; that the good man may build up Temples and Hospitalls, without trembling, to think of savage and barbarous sacrilege to pull them down: that our devotions be not molested with uproares, nor men called from their callings by mutinies: that our temporal estate be kept in liberty, our spiritual estate improved with piety, and our eternal estate to be given in us glory; that our lives may be preserved, and our souls saved; for such a King of men, bless we the God of the Kings.

This truth is plain enough, no reasonable man would look for impugners: yet we must be content to hear what the Synod of hell can plead for disobedience.

1 Object. Subjection came in with sin; but Christ hath taken away sin, therefore also subjection. Innocence knew no Superior but God: and the subjection of Eve was her punishment, this could not antecede her sin. Nomen Servi culpa meruit, non natura. Answ. Subjection is twofold; Servile, and civil. The Vassalage of a slave, bound only to seek his Masters proper good, was not before the fall: civil obedience for the common good, was. The former is a curse, such a one as Noah bequeathed to his impudent Son: not in it self considered, but by reason of the fear and sorrow united to it, which Innocency knew not. Civil subordination was before the fall: Encrease and multiply; this did put a plain distinction and inequality betwixt the father and the son. Eve was subject to Adam, before either of them was subject to sin. She might have Imperium apud virum, but he had Imperium in uxorem. Not that the Salicke Law accords with the Divine Law; as if no Queen might govern a kingdom: for the GOD of spirits hath often put great spirits into that sex. The Queen of Sheba was a famous Governesse; and that masculine virtues may shine in a female head, this land cannot forget the memory of so long and sweet experience. Yet this hinders not, but that man is fittest to govern. The Ruler was to bring for his sin-offering, a He-goat: the private offender, a She-goat: to show that the Male suits the Ruler best, and the Female the ruled. Thus Innocency had a superiority.

2. Ob. Every Believer is even now in the Kingdom of Heaven; but in Heaven there is no King but Christ. Answ. In this respect they are also called kings, yet the King that doth not find them subjects, judgeth them traitors. There is a spiritual regiment, standing in grace, peace and joy: here is no distinction of persons; neither father nor son, master nor servant, King nor subject, but Christ is all in all. There is a civil regiment, which cannot consist without distinctions and orders; here must be masters and servants, &c. If all were Commanders and rich, every man must be driven to curry his own horse, and cleanse his own stable. As it is but a Trunke which is all body, no head: so it is a monster, which is all head, and nobody. But they say further; The faithful have God's Spirit their guide, therefore need not human direction. Answ. It is one thing what we do, another thing what we ought to do. Yet could we live without transgression, we could not live well without protection.

3. Ob. The children are free; now if free from tribute, then from subjection. Answ. Christ there spake of himself, who was by birth heir to the Crown, therefore free: yet to avoid offense He paid it. And the freedom that he gives us is from the law, from sin, death and hell: a liberty of conscience, a spiritual enfranchisement; not an exemption and immunity from civil obedience. Licentiousness is not liberty, but slavery: this makes the wicked to affect their own insensible bondage, and to dote on their own libertine delights; as a mad man loves his chains, because they rattle, and (as he thinks) make a brave noise. He that made us free, taught us another rule by His own example: He obeyed his Parents in the flesh with humility, the Emperor with piety, the law with integrity, His heavenly Father, usque ad mortem, to the death. So the Christian is Inimicus nemini, multo minus Imperatori.

4. Ob. Civil government is full of cruelty; and the sword of Justice not only spills the life, but often kills the soul, but cutting off the time and means of repentance. Answ. Nay rather, the malefactor that is not moved at the sentence of death, despairs the possibility of amendment by longer life. Theevish Achan had suffered his sacrilege to lie fretting into his soul, had not the lot discovered him to death. Leasurly sickness and languishment is but the coachway to repentance, legal doom is the post-horse. How easy is it for men to delay the preparation for death, so long as they have hope of life? Sooner do you hear of a malefactors contrition at the gibbet; than of an Usurers in his bed: as a violent fire can thaw that ye, which lies long unmelted by a winters sun. Cataplasmes and fomentations draw not out the pleurisie, letting of blood does it. He sees, by the evidence of the fact; Intelligence of the Iurates, truth of the witnesses, impartiality of the Judge; an Image of that higher Tribunal, whither his sin will send him, when they have done with him. Here the Gaole can hold him but to the Session, the Session is not long ere it come to sentence, the sentence is soon answered with execution, the suffering of death is short; all these passages take up no long time. But then comes another Judgment, where his conscience gives in testimony, all his crimes appear upon record, Satan solicits Justice, God cannot be unjust, the doom is certain, the execution eternal. Therefore with an humbled soul and broken heart, he cries for mercy before he comes to the seat of Justice; beseecheth Christ to procure him a pardon, and God to accept his Sons satisfaction. In this assurance he smiles death in the face, is free in prison, and never felt himself truly to live, till he is come to die. Thus he that could not live innocent, dyes penitent; and seeing his body cannot be saved alive, he endeavors that his soul may be saved in death. As he hath followed Satan our common enemy in sinning, so he now defies him in repenting; and by his unfeigned tears disappoints that murderers hope of his damnation. Moe malefactors than that one have gone from the Gibbet to heaven; and from an ignominious place, after a more scandalous fact, been received up to glory.

5 Ob. But how if the Prince be bad, an enemy to truth and goodness, a ravisher, a persecutor, raising powers for the extirpation of the Gospel? Here, if ever, a subject may renounce all allegiance: for here is power against power, man against God, and the subject of both left to follow either. Answ. In this strait some, for fear of the King, shipwreck their faith, and these are traitors to God. Others by a defensive sword in their hand rebels to the King. There is no question, but God must be obeyed even against the King, when the King commandeth things against God. Hi carcerem, Ille gehennam minatur. What then? shall we resist him with violence? No, God never warrants that practice, no not against a Prince that denies him. There is an Active obedience, and a Passive. I may not execute his impious commands, I must suffer his unjust punishment. Obedire oportet malis Imperaoribus, non mala imperantibus. The vices of men cannot frustrate the Institution of God: be he never so ungracious, honor must be given, if not Principi, yet Principatui. Peruse Matth. 5.44. and Rom. 12.17. this will tie the hands of Christian subjects. Samuel offered not to depose Saul, though the express sentence of God had cast him off, and he was excommunicated by a higher power than ever came from Rome; Saul lived and died a King.

The captive Jews in Babylon, wrote to their brethren in Jerusalem, to pray for the life of Nebuchadnezzar. This was Jeremiah's counsel, and Daniel's practice: all his speeches savoured of most perfect obedience, even to a King that not so well entreated him. Let him be a Darius, and make a decree against God; then he will enter into his house and pray, open his windows and pray, not pass many hours but pray; though every hair on his head were a life, ready to redeem his duty to God with the loss of them all. What resistance did the primitive Christians make to those barbarous outrages? but praying for the Emperors life, when under the Emperors command they were bleeding to death. Neither did they suffer because they were not able to resist: but it was their doctrine, Occidi magis licet, quàm occidere. Vis nobis non deest vel nummorum, vel numerorum; we have means sufficient: they filled all places of that Idolatrous Empire, Islands, Cities, Castles, all but the profane Temples. One night, and a few torches, could have afforded them an ample revenge. Mercy on us, had but the Jesuits such an advantage! Tertullian to these pagan tormentors; Noster est magis Caesar, the Emperor is more ours than yours: as being appointed by our God, and upheld by our prayers and obedience.

Christians never prove losers, but when they unjustly fight for their own preservation. Provide we Scutum, non gladium, the buckler of patience, not a sword as ready to give as ward the blow. He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it: hear is the way, either to die by living, or to live by dying. When the decree was gone out by Ahasuerus, this was their refuge; Preces & lacry ma. Potero stercere, potero gemere. Rogamus, Auguste, non pugnamus. The Apostles could work miracles, yet they resisted not the ordinate powers. This charge Paul imposeth on the Romans, even while tyrannous Nero was their Emperor; a monster, whom diverse held to be Antichrist. Saul is in David's cave; the soldiers think that God sent him thither on no other errand, but to fetch his death. If Saul had seen his own danger, he had given himself for death, and expected to receive what he meant to bestow. But wise and holy David gives way neither to his own passion, nor his soldiers solicitation; but only makes this use of it; the trial of his loyalty, and the means of his peace. It had been as easy to cut Saul's throat, as his garment: but his coat only shall be the worse, not his person. Nor should the cloke have been maimed to seek his own revenge, but for a monument of his Innocence. The very piece of his garment shows, he meant no hurt to his Person; yet this violence strikes David's heart. He feels remorse for touching that, which did once touch the person of his Lord. How unlike are those spirits of Rome, that teach and practice, encourage and reward, yea, canonize the violation of Majesty it self? David regrets for cutting a royal robe, they make no account of shedding the royal blood; sheep to cut the throat of their Shepherd.

Evil Princes are indeed a punishment; Dedi in furiore. How miserable it is to have an intemperate Ruler, appears by the wisest Preacher. woe to thee o Land, when thy Princes eat in the morning: following the pleasures that attend on Majesty, and not the pains wh^{ch} belong to Magistracy. There is a miserable dedesolation threatened to Israel; the staff of bread, and stay of water, the man of war, and the man of peace, the Judge and Prophet, the honorable and ancient, the cunning artificer, the eloquent orator; all shall be taken away. How comes it? I will give children to be their Princes, and babes shall rule over them: there is the Judgment fulfilled. Set thou a wicked man over him: among all other curses which he calls from heaven by the Spirit of Prophecy upon his malicious adversaries, running like oil into all the joints and bonds, of themselves, their wives, and children; this leads the army, as Judas led the soldiers; Set a wicked man to rule over him. They that were weary of Solomon, were wearied with Rehoboam. Secundum merita subditorum, disponit corda praepositorum. Yet must not all this expose them to contempt: Samuel would not pray with Saul, he would grace him before the people, to continue credit to the Magistracy. There is some good attained to under the worst Prince. Even by the power given to the devil, Job probatus est ut justus appareret; Petrus tentatus ne de se praesumeret, Paulus colophizatus ne se extolleret, & Judas damnatus ut se suspenderet. Julian sent his subjects to heaven in earnest, while himself went to hell merrily and in jest. But blessed be our God, we have no cause to complain: we have such a Prince, whom whosoever praiseth not, vel non diligit, vel non intelligit. Only let us bless him, and bless God for him, that we may all be blessed in him.

That religion then cannot be right, that pulls down Princes: seeing neither Moses in the Old Testament, nor Christ in the new, nor Levite nor Prophet, Apostle nor Disciple, either counseled or practiced against Government. Which should decide the point, that hath cost the lives of so many Christians, and still threatens more tragedies to come. They that in this argument found the weakness of their pens, have fallen to their penknives, multiplied the School into a Campe, arguments to armies, teaching all their Proselytes dismal conclusions. Thus they fight against God in his Lieutenant, and the root of all civil order they desire to root out. They complain of us for suppressing them, that will not let us live in quiet by them. What security can Sara with her Isaac have in the house if Hagar and her brat be not beaten out of doors? The peace of our state, nor scarce of any state in Christendom since Charlemaines time, hath not been violated, but the Pope or his Ministers have had a hand in it. To say nothing of their private turbulency, what pestilences they be to the houses that harbor them, where they rule all with the Lady; it is their sawcinesse with the Crown which our state suffers under. They do but turn the Text; Kings over subjects, and they over Kings. They will be Donatists, Anabaptists, Libertines, Pagans, anything, so they be not subjects. How did they more than despise, even despite that Queen of blessed memory? whom strangers came to see, as the Queen of Sheba did Solomon; forraigners revered, subjects loved, all Princes living admired and themselves outwardly flattered. By whose gracious hand God wrought those wonders, that the most potent Kings can hardly reach. Honor filled the circle of her Crown, her brow with Majesty, her heart with piety, her hands with pity, her lap with plenty, her throne with equity. All those virtues centred in her breast, which severally had commended the great Ladies of the former world. Yet how execrable were the treasons at home, the rebellions and invasions abroad which they contrived against her? Now when she is in glorious peace, have they not raked into her grave, and railed on her royal Name? She that lies buried, not in cold earth, but in the warm and living monuments of all religious hearts among us, is still persecuted by their barbarous violences. But as all their malice could not harm her Person while it was mortal on earth; much less can it reach her soul, which is now immortal and blessed in heaven. Lord, they have not despised her, but they have despised thee: revenge thine own cause; confirm the diadem where it is, and let not the man of sin pull down, what thou the God of righteousness hast built up.

Despisers.] The main antagonists of Sovereignty are the Anabaptists and Papists: who, howsoever otherwise they dart fire one at another, yet here like Herod and Pilate, they shake hands, or those seditious Captains in Jerusalem, fight against the Magistrate as their common enemy. Thus Samson's foxes have avers heads, but are coupled together by their tails.

1 The Anabaptists did strike at the head of all Government; and with the sword in their own hand, sought to wring the sword out of the Magistrates. They inveighed against authority, and yet took authority upon themselves. As I have heard a man reprov'd for swearing, presently rap out an oath that he would not swear. It was Muncers ordinary doctrine, that he had conference with God about it: that he charged him to kill the Magistrates, to destroy the wicked, and constitute a new world. These cry down all rule; as the heathen against God's Anointed Son; let us break their bands a sunder, and cast away their cords from us. But at last finding themselves fooled by themselves, and that Kings would not be disputed out of their dominions; yea, that themselves could not be kept in order without some Prelation, they began to qualify the matter: as men that can get nothing by Law, will come to composition. Regiment they will allow, if Magistrates will be content with their allowance; which is not only like David's Ambassadors, half their Regal robes cut off; but authority it self grub'd to the skin: not only lopping off the superfluous branches, but hewing the root till it be past all growing. That he hath his institution from God, his constitution from the people: Regnat a Deo, sed per & propter populum. Thus with a paring knife they so shred his Government; till like the coozening Tailor that shrunk a freeze gown to a dozen of buttons; they leave him only a titular Prince, and keep the Principality to themselves. Let all their refutation be but a mere hissing at.

2 The Papists are more moderate in show, little less pestilent in deed Their laity shall be subject to a Magistrate; but to one of their own choosing, and that only till their refusing, so authority is no sure knot but as jugglers, they play at fast and loose. And upon the least exception to the piety, yea obedience of the Prince, (a strange Catechism, or Catachresis rather, that teacheth Kings to obey their subjects) they cast him out from his royalty, discharge and absolve the people from their allegiance. This practice is according to their common distinction, not differing from the former of the Anabaptists; Principatus a Deo, Princeps ab homine: therefore they dare do anything in Principem, against the King; nothing in Principatum, against the kingdom. Execrable sophistry! as if he that opposed the governor, did not oppose Government. Would this answer pass in Rome: the Popedom, as it is the succession of Peter, is of God: but the present Pope is of man? Or this, God forbids me to wrong my neighbor, yet (Jesuit) I may wrong thee? This was fit doctrine for Machiavell himself would not have been ashamed of it. But Daniel, that was a counselor of State to two Monarchies, and a Secretis, to four Kings, ascribes this power of translating or entailing crowns to a family, to none but God: it is He, not the Pope.

By their rule the Pope indeed is King, and all Kings but his vice-royes, to be placed and displaced, according as they please or displease him. And for their Clergy, they shall know no civil obedience at all. But were the sword as well able to plead the causes of Kings in the field, as the pens of Divines are in the School, their Crowns would sit more quietly on their heads. Let every soul be subject to the higher power. Si omnis, & vestra, saith Saint Bernard to an Archbishop: who hath exempted you from this universality? His conclusion is, Si quis tentat excipere, conatur decipere. Why did our Savior submit himself to Caiaphas, to Pilate, pay tribute to Caesar; and Paul appeal to his Judgment seat? Is Christ's Vicar started above his Master? Peters Successor better than Paul himself? What an alteration did Josiah make in the face of the Church, purging the Idolaters, changing the office of the Levites, commanding a passover? Hilkiah was the high Priest, and executed these things under him; but all was done Iuxta praeceptum Iosiae. Was Josiah such a King in Israel, and is not our King in England! What hath the Hilkiah of Rome to do here? So Constantine said to his Bishops. You in the Church are Bishops, I in the Church am King: you for the word and Sacraments, I for authority and presidency: you overseers of the people, I the overseer of overseers. The one to preach the word, the other to bear the sword: as Paul calls the Magistrate, the Lord's Sword-bearer. He holds his prerogative in capite, given him from above. What one word of Christ's commission to his Disciples, favors of encouragement to rebellious attempts? Go into the world, preach, baptize, bind and loose, remit and retain, feed, take the keys, receive the Holy Ghost. Go into the world, not over run it, shaking the pillars of it with conspiracies, the foundations with seditions. Preach peace, not proclaim wars: Build up, the kingdom of heaven, not thunder ruin to the kingdoms of earth. Baptize to repentance, not wash the people in their own bloods with persecution and vengeance. Bind and retain not with shackles, prisons, and wards. Feed the Lambes, not fleece them, nor flay them, making massacres of King and subjects. Take the keys, not Princes Crowns. When he said Ye shall be brought before Governors and Kings he did not mean that Governors and Kings should be brought before you; that Emperors should kiss your feet, wait at your gates, in weathers stormy enough; but not more stormy than the Pontifical brows: that they should take their Crowns, (I say not at your hands, but) at your feet; holding your stirrups while you mount your Palfreyes, and eat bread like dogs under your tables. Christ refused to divide an inheritance, yet these men will undertake to divide kingdoms. But there is a divider over them, that hath written in the book of his Prescience, the final division of their universal Supremacy. And as it is true of their persons; Brevis est hominum vita, brevior Regum, Pontificum brevissima. So let the like breach fall upon their successions, till the seat of Antichrist be rased to the ground.

3 Proud and ambitious self-admirers, think themselves fitter to rule than obey; these despise government. Saul is chosen King, the most and best applaud the choice: yet some sonens of Belial murmur against it. It was not the greatness of his parents, the goodliness of his person, the selection of his Lot, the approbation of Samuel, the sound proof of his courage; that could shield him from contempt, or win the hearts of all. They saw he chose not himself, they saw him unwilling to be chosen, they saw him worthy to be chosen: if the Election had been carried by voices, and those voices by their eyes, Saul had been still the man: yet they despise him. His parentage was not inferior, his state equal, his person above his estate, his mind above his person; yet they despise him. But dogs will bark at the Moon; and what all men commend, you have some Thirsytes take delight to blast, Malcontents will devise slanders, if they can find none like Coistrells, that first fill themselves with wind, and then fly against it. Their blood is of a yellowish color, like those that have been bitten by vipers: their gall flows in them, thicker than oil in a poisoned stomach. But the best is, their own malice sucks up the greatest part of their venom, and therewith they burst themselves. There was never Prince, to whom some Belialists took not some exceptions: it is not possible to please or displease all men; some being as deeply in love with vice, as others are with virtue. It were ill with Princes, if their state depended on the good liking of their subjects. But there be none but base, that are thus censorious: and the Sun will shine never the less glorious, though such sullen eyes scorn to look upon it.

4 Denyers of due homage, are Despisers; as, 1. Fear; not slavish fear. Alied est timere quia peccâsti, aliud timere ne pecces: illîc formido est de supplicio, hîc sollicitudo est de praemio: this fear is reverence. If any man fears not the King, the King hath cause to fear him. 2. Honor; not such as shall make a god of him, like Herod's flatterers, and their successors, the Popes Sycophants: yet enough to advance him above all other men. 3. Fidelitie, such as Ittai bare unto David: that is an ill hand, that when a blow is coming, will not lift up it self to defend the head. Salus capitis, caput salutis. The King is the light of our eyes, the breath of our nostrills, even the life of our lives: any man will hazard a joint to preserve his life. Subjects unfaithful at the heart, may be without suspicion of their Prince, but they be held rebels in the Court of heaven. We are bound to be subject, not only for wrath, but for conscience sake. In all the time of David's prosperity, there was no news of Shimei; he looks like a fair subject. But he that smiled on David in his throne, curseth him in his flight: now his unsound and treacherous heart discovers it self, in a tongue full of venom, a hand full of stones. Prosperous success hides many a false heart, as a drift of snow covers a heap of dung: but when that white cover melts, the filthy rottenness will appear. There is no security in that subjects allegiance, that hath not God in his conscience. The nearer such are to the Governor, the more perilous: and as no favourite of greatness can be without envy, (as in Chesse, the pawn that stands before the king, is most set upon) so the good one, like Joseph, so endears himself to the King of Egypt, that he may be gracious with the King of heaven: and the bad one, like Haman, makes use of his power to mischief; till by plotting against the Church, he lose all comfort by the Church. All this man's glory shows on him, but as if the Sun shone in a puddle. 4. Obedience; to do what he commands, and go whether he sends. The servant that does not what he is bidden, despiseth his Master. The Law is mutus magistratus, the King lex anima: he that disobeyes the one, despiseth the other. 5. Paying of tribute: Render tribute, &c. Render it; it is not a gift, but a payment. A man feeds the stomach, that it may nourish his whole body. Solvatur subsidium, ne contingat excidium. He that faineth himself poor to avoid a Subsidy, is worthy to be made as poor as his Subsidy: because he would not restore him a part, by whom he keeps all. 6. Prayer; Let prayers and supplications be made for all men, especially for Kings. The heavyer burden requires the more strength: Aaron and Hur must hold up the hands of Moses, if they would prosper. We have cause to desire that that river may never want water, which must relieve the whole country. No army but would have their Generalls good success. We call our peace, the Kings peace: our peace is but the effect of his, as his Majesty is a resultance from God's Majesty.

What shall then become of them, that turn their prayers into curses? though their wishes be but whirlwinds, which breathed forth, return upon themselves. This was an unwilling error, that Paul willingly recanted. Curse not the King, no not in thy thought: for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter. With the mouth a wicked rebel dares not curse him, for fear of the lash; but thought is free: such is his thought, but not God's, to whom the conscience is a legible book. The birds of the air shall discover it; either by some miraculous demonstration, as just revealers: or by pecking out his eyes, as just executioners: or that Judgment shall be swift against them, as if it had wings. Shimei curseth his King, is pardoned by succession, by Solomon after his father: he hath now quite forgotten his sin. But at last it comes home, by his going abroad: and the tongue that cursed the Lord's Anointed, now pays the head to boot. The vengeance of Traitors may sleep, it cannot die. Saul had gotten victory of the Ammonites, which made him a complete King: and now the thankful Israelites enquire after the discontented mutiners, that refused allegiance to so worthy a commander. Their sedition deserved death, how ever Saul had sped at Gilead: the very purposes of treason must not escape impune: that God, who hinders the action in his mercy, will punish the intention in his Justice. But that happy conquest whetted them to a more eager desire of this just execution.

Certainly, of all nations in the world, we have cause to despise the despisers of our Government. We that have a King, not more noble than wise, not more wise than good; how can we wish other than punishment to his contemners? We have usum & fructum communis pacis; dwelling safely under our own vines; the benefit of those riches w^{ch} make a well-governed State glorious. What do we want to the consummation of our prosperity, but thankful hearts? For me to measure it, were to show you the Image of a great Mountain in a small ring. Religion, peace, honor, security; those four cardinal blessings to uphold a State, as the four cardinal virtues uphold a man. Now to disgrace authority, is the means to overthrow all felicity. Tribute is given to Tyrants, commendation only to good Princes. The Justice of our Governor hath not spared the greatest offenders; yet his mercy hath made us more indebted to him than his Justice. May his m•rcy never hurt himself, we have to cause to complain. Even to his enemies he hath been pitiful, striving to overcome their malice by his goodness. Yet like those people, that in a daily ceremony, go out of their doors, with their faces into the East, and curse the Sun, which gives them light and preserving influence. So his adversaries, beside their cursed writings, base calumnies and blasphemies of his honor; have sought by trechery to stock up the root whereon themselves grow; sacrificing their Sacraments, Religion, Prayer, and the holiest things they have, to execute Satan's will, and expiate Antichrists fury. They have turned Massing into massacring, Patres in patricidas, ghostly fathers into bloody murderers.

The huge and supereminent Colossus of all, was the Powder-treason; the utmost point of all villainy; beyond which, it is terra incognita: no man can devise what should be between it and hell. The butchery over all France of above sixty thousand Protestants, might be pictured in the Popes Palace by the Painters art: but what colors could have expressed this confusion? As a learned Divine hath amplified it. What stain could shadow the blood of so royal Princes? What red describe the goare of so noble Christians? What black, the darkness of that day? what azure, the terribleness of that fire? What invention imitate the noise of that infernal blow? Lower than many Cannons, and the shriekes of so many innocents, with the misery of infants yet unborne? This was a death never to be painted to the life: nor Pen, nor Pencil, nor Art, nor Heart can comprehend it. What an infamy strikes upon our age, to bear the date of such impieties? To have it recorded to posterity, in such a time was such a treason? The earth shall not hide it from the heavens, nor the heavens abstract it from the earth; it shall be the detestable hatred of all Generations to the end of the world.

Yet still hath the Lord protected our government, by preserving our Governor; even against the malice of our enemies, and (which is worse) the wickedness of ourselves. Therefore let us praise God for our Government, and we praise him for all: let us love and serve our Governor, and we love and serve God who hath given us all. Let us serve him with our fields and Vineyards for his maintenance, with our lives and strengths for his defense, especially with our prayers and supplications for his safety.

2 PET. 2.10.

Presumptuous are they; Self-willed: they are not afraid to speak evil of dignities.

Presumption is a deliberate and willful sinning, against conscience, example, or warning. Deliberate, with premeditation; for every rash act or word is not presumption. Wilfull; not when we are overborne by compulsory means. Against Conscience; not when our persuasion apprehends the thing (that is evil) for good. Against example, when men see others plagued for such offenses. Against warning, as Pharaoh after so many admonitions would not dismiss Israel. This is to presume. Some man sins, and thinks not of it; which is to stumble and fall on plain ground. Some man sins, and knows not of it; as he may have a moule on his back, and yet think his skin clear. Some man sins, and is forced to it; this is, as when he rouse upward, and the stream carries him downward. Another sins, and is persuaded he does well; as children are sent abroad in such frosty mornings, as rather obstruct than purify: so the silly Papist does his devotions before a crucifixe; and too many rob the Church, to relieve the poor. There is a mischief done on set purpose; He that presumptuously slays his neighbor, thou shalt fetch him from mine Altar that he may die. Plucke him from the Altar, his book shall not save him.

Presumption hath been no rare sin among men. The first stone of which demonstration, we lay in the Tower of Babel: where mortal men in the face of heaven, did dare to the combat omnipotency it self. Multitudes and combination give encouragement to presumptuous attempts, and everyone is proud to be forwardest; Come let us build us a Tower, whose top may reach unto heaven. They were but newly come down from the hill to the plain, and now in the plain they purpose to build up an hill. They were as near to heaven in the mountain of Armenia, as their tower could make them in the valley of Shinar: but as if the benefit of nature were too contemptible, their ambition must have an artificial mountain of their own raising. Come let us build: fondly reckoning without God; as if nothing could hinder, what they intended to do; as if both time and earth had been theirs. Build a City, if they had taken God with them, this had been commendable: a City is the seat of order, and so could not displease the God of order. But a Tower reachable to heaven? how sottish was this arrogance, how impious this Presumption? who would think, that little Ants creeping on this greater molehill, should think of climbing to heaven by multiplying of earth?

Corah conspires against meek Moses, he had seen others fearfully plagued for such rebellions; himself had particular warning to decline it; the people were charged to depart from their tents: who would not hope, that those mutiners, seeing their adherents fly off, as from monsters, would now relent? yea, when God proclaims a strange and immediate vengeance, howsoever before they set a face on the matter, one would think their hearts should now have misgiven them, yet as if Moses had never wrought miracle before them, as if no Israelite had perished for rebelling; they stand in their doors, impudently staring, as if they would outface the revenge of God. Here was high Presumption: so doth pride and infidelity obdure and blind the heart; that those who are naturally cowards, become unnatural rebels. So Pharaoh being tired and undone with succession of Judgments, at last lets Israel go: gone they are, and Egypt seemed so glad to be rid of them, that they hired their departure. Yet no sooner were their backs turned to go, than Pharaohs heart was turned to fetch them back again. It vexeth him to see so great a command, so much wealth cast away in one night: and he will redeem it though with more plagues. There is no remedy, this Presumption will not let him be in quiet; he must after them, to fetch his own destruction. Who would not have looked, that the hand of Benjamin should have been first upon Gibeah, and requited the morsels of the abused concubine, with the heads of the ravishers? yet instead of pursuing the sin, they defend the sinners; and will rather perish in resisting, than live in doing Justice. How horrible was this Presumption, to defend a rape unto death, with arms unto blood? As if they were in love with villainy, and out of charity with God, they are champions for Belial.

1 There be some that Presume of safety in sin, not doubting to fare well, while they fear not to do ill. As if this world were to last ever, and the come and tares were never to be parted; because the same ground feeds, and wind blows on them, for a time. But, say they, God is merciful. He is infinitely merciful, but withal infinitely just. He is just even to those humble souls that shall be saved; and he will be merciful, while Presumptuous sinners go to hell. It is to be feared, that many die with a fond Presumption of mercy in their minds, as the Israelites with meat in their mouths. But Christ died for us, we put all on his reckoning. Answ. But they for whom he pays, will not presumptuously lavish on his skore; not caring what they spend, because he is able to pay for all. His blood is a charter of pardon, but withal a Covenant of direction: Crux Christi pendentis, Cathedra magistri docentis: he that refuseth to live as that Covenant prescribes, he may perish as a malefactor, that is hanged with his pardon about his neck. But Repentance makes all even, otherwise God is not so good as his word: At what time soever a sinner repents. This the common people make their neck-verse. Indeed there is that and many other gracious promises made to Repentance: but in the whole Book of God, which is now published complete, and promises no second edition; we find no infallible promise of Repentance. He that hath this Oile in his lamp, shall enter in with the Bridegroom: but he that forgets this oil, and can buy none, must be shut out. Joseph and Mary lost Christ not a full day before they missed him, yet were four days ere they could find him: some lose him forty or fifty years, yet when they are sick, hope to find him in half an hour.

2 There be some that attempt things without warrant, or expect things without promise; this is the common Presumption of the world. And they that know they cannot live without feeding, nor change places without moving; yet will hope to be saved without practical obedience. Nor let us secure ourselves from this assault, for the devil hoped to have fastened it on our Savior himself; persuading him to show a tumbling trick, for the winning of faith and credit. As if he had said, Here thou art in a famous city, on a glorious temple, upon an eminent pinnacle; all men's eyes are fixed on thee; there can be no readier way to spread thy glory, and proclaim thy Deity, than by this precipitation. All the world shall see and say, there is more in thee than a man: and for danger, there can be none; what can hurt the son of God? have not the Angels charge by Divine commission, to guard thee? Christ scorns to gratify him in this; but beats him with his own weapon snatched out of his abusive hands; It is written, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord. True, God hath taken this care, and given this charge; he will have his children kept, but not in their sins: they may trust him, they may not tempt him: he meant to encourage their faith, not to embolden their Presumption. When there be mediate means, to cast ourselves upon an immediate Providence, is not faith, but audacious disobedience.

We have some that be called The Wits: they disdain to hear a Sermon, unless the Preacher can teach them some abstruse learning: as if they were only to be made Philosophers, not Christians. It is a wonder if they ever come to the Lord's Supper, because they see no more dainties, but Bread and Wine. Sure, if they had known of it, they would not have been baptized in the Church, because they had water enough at home. Presumptuous men, are they wiser than God? Faith comes by hearing, and Salvation by Faith: these be the stairs for them to clime Heaven, or all their wit shall never bring them thither. They know a shorter cut, have found out a new way in their wisdom; but God keep us from that wisdom. Some vulgars, not out of an opinion of their own knowledge and sufficiency, but for mere tarditie and averseness from the labors of Religion; make their chamber or the field their Church; because the Preacher can say but this; Repent, and believe; and this they do, therefore hope to be saved as well as the best. Senselesse presumption! as if they hoped to keep, what they willingly cast away: as if the soul which hath been so many years gathering rust, should be found bright when death draws it out of the scabbard: or that land could bear wheat, which was never tilled? Nay, but hear, read, pray, meditate; and that with frequency, with fervency: presume not to be good by any other way than God hath promised to make thee good: lest thy soul going out of thy body, find with wonder and amazement, how it was mistaken in the body. We may challenge God on his promise, we may not strain him beyond it: Presumption is the enemy of faith.

3 There be some that take their salvation without all question, and are so sure of Heaven that they never doubt the contrary; and this is Presumption. Every good grace hath the counterfeit: if in the faithful there be a modest but infallible assurance of their blessedness in Christ; the carnal will be blown up with an impudent arrogance, as if their footing was as sure in Heaven as any man's. Which way went the Spirit of God from me to thee, said a false prophet to a true? and smote him withal. Which way? Even by that injurious blow, by that proud speech it departed, if it had been there before. God I thank thee, that I am not as other men: as if there were no question, but the Pharisee was one of God's special favorites. Will he accept of heaven, without entreaty, trow we? Or change places with any Saint there, without boot?

That we may not be coozened with this imposture, observe some differences betwixt Presumption and Assurance. First, Presumption is natural, this Assurance is supernatural: we were borne with that, we are new borne to this: that was the legacy of Adam, this of Christ. Secondly, Presumption submits not it self to ordinary means; assurance refuseth no means of being made better. Thirdly, Presumption is without all doubting: assurance feels many perplexities: he that doubts not of his estate, his estate is much to be doubted of. Fourthly, Presumption is joined with looseness of life: persuasion, with a tender conscience: that dares sin, because it is sure: this dares not for fear of losing assurance: that makes no more of sinning, but at once get a pardon for the old, and a license for the new: this is like some souveraine waters, which not only mundifies the ulcer, but cools the heat, stays the infection, and by degrees heals it. Perswasion will not sin, because it cost her Savior so dear: Presumption will sin, because grace doth abound. The one turns grace into wantonness, the other turns from wantonness to grace. Humility is the way to heaven; the Publican went away rather justified: Qui d'om non auderet oculos aperire ad coelum, coeli oculos aperuit ad ipsum: While he durst not open his eyes to look up unto heaven, he opened the eyes of heaven to look down upon him. They that are proudly secure of their going to heaven do not so often come thither, as they that are afraid of their going to hell.

Let us come to particulars, that pointing the finger, we may say, this is a Presumptuous man. Nathan's Parable made David sensible of the sin, but he found not the sinner in his own bosom, without a Tu es homo. Presumption hath neither Timorem Domini, nor Pudorem Seculi; it fears nor God nor man: and is here fitly ranked with Despising of Gouvernement. If Samson break the city-gates, what Withes can hold him? Those whom conscience cannot bind, man's law will hardly hamper; God knows how, when, and where to revenge his own cause: but man, whose eyes be limited, must be informed of offenses, before he can find matter for justice: therefore Preachers are not only to teach men obedience to God, to save their souls, but also to Governors, to save their bodies and estates. I will therefore, for a taste, single out some instances of Presumption.

1 Incurrible Beggars, such as make themselves a Non obstante, and in spite of all laws will not be confined to any regular course. Presumptuous wretches, that have set themselves, both without the covenant of God, and the government of man: silly officers are afraid to meddle with them, because they are poor: but they be deceived, for these be not the poor, but the worst robbers of the poor that be; we may rank them with Usurers, Enclosers, Engrossers, and oppressing Landlords: this is the reason that the poor indeed do want it, because these counterfeits snatch it; men that labor hard, often lack bread for their families, whilst these that refuse all work, are full. I speak not against the poor, but for the poor; not to harden your hearts, but to rectify your hands: give and be blessed for it, but not to maintain impiety, and dishonor to your Countrey; give to the poor, not to them that rob the poor, let me dissect this carcase of Presumption.

1 There is no likelihood that many of them were ever Christened; if they were, scarce any of them ever come to know what Christianity means: the Church and they are everlasting strangers, nearer than to the doors, at some dole or funeral, you shall not have them: they name not Christ, but when they beg of you, and know it not for any other purpose; they can marry without a Priest, and divorce themselves without a Canonist: there need no Ecclesiastical censures, they excommunicate themselves from all Churches: no Minister hath the charge of their souls, for they are of no parish; all the articles of their faith be the terms of their canting language; thus they live without Christ in this world, and without him, perish in the world to come.

2 Vagrants they are, and will so remain, it is a death to them to be confined to any set dwelling: ask them where they dwell, alas, they say, they have s•••l dwelling; yet they have the largest dwelling of all, for they dwell every where• to keep one town, is their bondage; their liberty to rome abroad: worse th•n the harlot, she cannot abide long in her own house; they can abide long in no house. Birds fly abroad all day, but so that they may come to their own nests at night: the horse knows his own stable, dogs their own kennel; these beasts only take up the next barn; no men can make a truer description of the kingdom, were they learned, for they have travelled it over and over.

3 Governement they know none, but a rebellious one of their own ordaining; to pay tribute or custom to the grand Rogue more truly than Subsidies are paid to the King: to swear by their Solomon, and then not to break their oath: but to tear God's Name in pieces, is no breach of their Religion not to beg out of their limits, though they starve.

4 All their end of this idle life, is but because they find profit and sweetness in it; therefore they wander, because they would not work. He that before he gives them relief, sets them to labor, shall never after find them at his door. Now considering God's Law, that every man should eat his own bread, and that our indulgence is the nurse of their idleness, who get more by lying still in a corner, than an honest poor man doth by his labor; we make their sin, our sin in maintaining them: alms are good, but they must not be given to the dishonor of Christ; he commends to us the maimed, the lame, the blind, the aged and impotent, the widow and fatherless; to relieve these shall make us blessed. But they that look for a reward for maintaining the dissolute; shall be answered with, Who required this at your hands? Where find they more cherishing than in popish houses? Not to merit of God, as they teach, and we might suppose: but to make them their own against a day of rebellion, when they should use them. But as a finger being cut off from the hand, is of no use; so no possible good can come to the common Body by them. They laugh at others, who take great pains, to leave their Children small portions; whereas these leave theirs all the world to rogue in, and all the people for their fathers.

5 The curse of God is visibly upon them, whereby they are given over to all licentiousness. To theevery, they come to pilfer, not to beg; and only then beg, when they cannot pilfer. To horrible uncleanness; they have not peculiar wives, nor range themselves into families; but in this are very beasts. To be a vagabond, was Cain's plague, and is in its own nature a curse; yet these turn it into a blessing. Let his Children be vagabonds, and beg; let them seek bread out of their desolate places. In this curse they bring up their children. This is such a straggling Presumption, as will not be confined but in hell. They delight to go ragged and naked, not so much in a voluntary penance, as to move compassion. But turn your charity from these, and seek out God's poor, not the devils: impotent poor, not impudent poor: and rather give to those that work, and beg not; than to those that beg, and work not.

2 Popish Emissaries, the Intelligencers of Rome, and the Factors of Antichrist; that know themselves sent on the errand of hell, designed to treacheries, set in the vanguard of conspiracy, like lost men in the forlorn hope; what are these but presumptuous sinners? I deny not other attractives and inducements; but they are all the hand-maids to presumption. Whether it be the opulency of our land, or the beauty of our women, or the malice they bear our nation, or the foolish affectation of martyrdom, and to be registered in the Roman Rubric. It is not unlikely, they are tickled with that advantage, which the Friar told his Novice, their Priests had over their Laity; according to their old grace, Deo gratias, qui nos satias, &c: We keep their counsels, they keep none of ours: we have part of their Lands, they have none of ours: we have charity towards their wives, they toward none of ours: they bring up our children, we bring up none of theirs. It is reported to be the saying of a great Marquess; that he had in his Country three Monasteries, which were three miracles: one of the Dominicans, which had abundance of corn, and no Lands: another of the Franciscans, who were full of money, and received no rents: a third of Saint Thomas, whose Monks had many children, and no wives. But what temptation soever brings them, treason cannot be without presumption. Their Supreme Head sends them like base members on such desperate services; and they must obey him, whatsoever Christ says. If He bid them seal their treason with a Sacrament, they must eat their God upon a bargain of blood. Saint Peter says, Fear God, honor the king; his usurping Successor says, Fear God, kill the king. All their labor must be spent, to make Christ's coat fit to their Body political. Their vows may seem heavenly, but their employment is earthly: in meddling with the business both of Church and State, they mingle together heaven and earth.

What, doth their conscience warrant them, upon opinion of merit? Can this bear them out to be false keys to open the cabinets of Princes, and pry into their counsels? Did ever man hope to deserve thanks of God, by doing that which he knows will offend him? They see laws made against their pernicious attempts, and that justly: for there is no law made against the Papists, but some notorious treason went before, to cause such a law. They that venter their bodies and souls in so rotten a vessel of Pyracie, are they not presumptuous? He that runs on high battlements, gallops down steep hills, rides over narrow bridges, walks on weak ice; and never thinks, what if I fall? But what if I pass over and fall not? Is he not presumptuous? They see before their eyes such designs continually cursed of God, and plagued of men: yet what say they of the powder-traitors? Alas, unfortunate Gentlemen: it seems they blame the ill fortune, not the ill attempt: had it succeeded, it had been commended. Yet they will on, what can discourage senseless presumption? show him the way where any foot hath trode, he dares follow, though he knows none ever returned. What if a thousand have miscarried, yet why may he not escape?

Thus presumptuous are they in their deeds, but how desperate in their writings? They mingle them with heresies, as Hannibal to entrap his enemies, mixed their wine with mandrakes whose operation is betwixt sleep and poison. Or as Avicen was made away, by anointing the book with poison, which he was to read. If they wrote nothing but lies, all would reject them: if nothing but truth, they could not deceive us. All their blasphemies and falsehoods are in the vulgar tongue, like Rabshakehs: but the Gospel of salvation they lock up safe enough from the people. Let the best learned use their writings, as Christ did his potion of gall; Gustavit & respuit. Gentle writings are not so dangerous, for they be but mortui errores; and a living Cur will do more harm than a dead Lion. What trust should be given to those men, that will presume to cast away themselves, to do us a mischief?

3 Duclists or single Combatants; that more fear to have the world call them cowards for refusing, than God to judge them rebels for undertaking: blanch it with what terms of honor they please, the Court of Heaven will censure it presumption. Where did God ever bid a man hazard his life for his name? What seconds so ever he gets, Christ will not be that man's Second. Where is no commandment, no promise; what can justify that act from presumption? This is to cast a man's self out of his Makers protection: he takes charge of us, but when we are in our ways, in his ways. This is none of God's ways, therefore should be none of ours. The Doctrine of Christ doth most strictly forbid it, and why should not Christ be heard of Christians? Thou shalt not revenge thyself; Thou shalt do no murder: did he die for us, and shall we not hear him speak? Men may be overcome if they fight, they shall overcome if they fight not. How many souls had scaped going all gore-blood to their judgment, if Christ might have been heard?

But they say, we fight not so much against an enemy, as our own ignominy; the world will baffle us. Answer: What world is that, whose censure of baffling we fear? That, which God says shall not be saved? That, whereof the devil is prince? That, which reproached and condemned Jesus Christ? That, which always hated and persecuted the good? Are we in amity with that, which is at enmity with God? Do we call Christ our Captain, and march under the colors of this world? Have we not in Baptism forsworn it? Shall we care more to discontent the world, than to wrong our Maker? What then is the ground of it? Mere opinion, and that of men more gallant than wise, that have more heart than brain: Facile rediment qui sanguine famam; that spend their cheap blood to recover that which wise men never lost, Reputation. They have lost some credit in opinion, and send their souls after in earnest: as the child throws away his bread, because one hath snatched away his apple. Wine and choler beget a brawl, death and confusion must nurse it. They little think what ransom Christ paid for that soul, which (without his call) they let forth at a bloody window.

O that something would make the sons of men be wise; to think how poor a recompense, the same of a brave combat, is for everlasting torment. Whether they thus die or kill, they have committed murder: if they kill, they have murdered another: if they die, they have murdered themselves. Surviving, there is the plague of conscience: dying, there is the plague of torments. If they both escape, yet it is homicide, that they meant to kill. Whatsoever be the success, there is presumption in the offense. If men knew, how sweet was Heaven, and how intolerable hell, they would be more obedient upon earth. But what have Divines to do with the matters of Soldiers? Their profession is peace. True, but we speak from him, that is not only the Prince of Peace, but also the Lord of Hosts. He is the God of peace to them that seek peace: but upon them that follow courses of revenge, he will revenge too. They fight one against another, God will fight against them both. Who is the valiant man? He that dares draw his sword against the command of his Maker? He of whom his own passion makes a poor slave? No, but he that can pardon an injury, do good to an enemy, despise the world, obey the Lord: he that can master himself, and loves God's honor, not his own humor.

4 I could single out many others, that will attempt hard matters, because they be great and rare; that love ventures of more hazard than use. You have heard of some that undertake a long journey by sea in a wherry; as the desperate Mariner hoiseth sails in a storm, and says, none of his ancestors were drowned. Some, that rush fearelesly into infected houses, and say the plague never seizeth on valiant blood; it kills none but cowards. Some that languishing of sickness, will drink away their diseases; and so make haste to dispatch both body and soul at once. Some that run headlong into danger, and fear not; saying, It comes with a fear. Some, that without asking leave of God, count upon trade, and gain, and purchasing, and leaving great estates: not measuring their intendments by their powers, but wills. If all fall right, they thank themselves; if otherwise, they do not blame themselves. No man promises himself more, nor distrusts himself less, than the Presumptuous. Some that have distilled away their estates in Lymbeckes, projecting for the Philosophers stone; presuming they shall have that which may do all the world good; and promising their friends beforehand, gold in whole scuttles: but at last his glass breaks, and himself with it. Some that presume to foretell the changes of States, the event of all the great undertakings of Princes, the fortunes of war, what weather we shall have all the year: what merchandise will be deer, what cheap; (and yet for all this knowledge, themselves miserable beggars) so familiarly, as if God had written all these things as plain in the stars, as he did the ten commandments on the two Tables.

Some that can tell the secrets of kings, the mysteries of State, and yet never were of the privy Council. Yea, some will be no strangers to the Records of he v n• as if that great Master of the Rolles had given them his keys, to turn over his books, and copy them out at their pleasures. This is a drunken presumption of our times. They are not few that say in their hearts; we will sin, and repent, and be forgiven: if we do well, God is just to reward us: if ill he is merciful to pardon us. Thus it is a question, whether God be more wronged by their sins, or by their praises, whatsoever they undertake, they presume God will defend them.

But while we want his Word, in vain we look for his aid. In our safest and most honest courses, we need his providence: but to run into confessed dangers, without our keeper, is sottish presumption. What God enjoynes, that he undertakes, that he maintains: why should we expect him a guide in our own errors? These be the worst self-flatterers, self-deceivers; that suggest to their own hearts the false hope of Never too late: as if they could make time stand still, who waits not the leisure of Princes: or command Repentance, which knows no Sovereign but the King of heaven, and goes not at the bidding of an Angel.

How desperately presumptuous are they, that dare defer the procurement of mercy and forgiveness, till the extremest pinch; as it were betwixt the bridge and the brook? How deplorable is the false confidence of the world; when to make their reckoning at the last day, is the last and least thing that they make reckoning of? That which should be the whole business of our life, these hope to dispatch in half an hour. Nothing is so easy with them, nothing so difficult with all others. To reconcile God, and make him their friend in a moment whom they have provoked, and kept their enemy so many years: this is that which nothing but presumption durst ever yet undertake. I have heard of castles built in an instant, by enchantment; I never believed it: such castles of vain hope do these men build in the air of their own empty Imaginations.

1 It is a sin to which we are naturally prone; therefore the more dangerous. The House of Rimmon was Naaman's fear; Lord keep me there. Soone is a man invited to make much of himself, hardly to his own affliction. Despair is a thing grievous to trembling nature: not often doth that Archer of hell head his arrows with such displeasing assaults. Besides this hath often turned to a hearty conversion; like a violent fever, that hath boiled up all the choler and corruption of sin, so that a man becomes the better after it. But to presume, this is sweet to flesh and blood: Ye shall be as God's, foiled Innocence it self. They that undertook to build Babel, did it to get them a Name: not affecting the neighbourhood of heaven, but to be famous on earth: their aim was not commodity, or safety, but glory. Satan hath not a more tried shaft in all his quiver, than to persuade men to bear themselves boldly upon the favor of God. Thou art elected, redeemed, assured; what need'st thou be so strict in thy courses? Be not such an adversary to thy own liberty: thou mayest sin, and be safe. As if the grace that saves us, and the obligation of duty that binds us, were not several parts of the same Covenant? Therefore as the wise man eats moderately of the dish which he best likes; because he knows there is more danger of surfeit in that than in all the rest. So let us be most shy and heedful of that sin, which we know will soonest take us, and take God from us. We are all readier to laugh with the merry Philosopher, than to weep with the mourner. Pleasure never knocks twice at our door without entrance: sorrow shall not in, so long as we can keep it out. We have ten fingers, and but two eyes: our conversation admits ten sins, before our contrition lets fall two tears. Open but the door, presumption (like a bold guest) comes in of it self. Repentance, like a modest virgins, sits weeping in the streets for want of harbor: no bosom hath lodging for such a guest. Only when we feel ourselves sick, we send for her as a Physician, to heal the wounds that pleasure hath made. But rather of the two, let pleasure be shut out of doors, and Repentance be laid between our breasts.

2 God especially opposeth this sin, because this sin especially opposeth him: it calls the Almighty forces against it, because it bends all the forces against the Almighty. Diffidence distrusts him, Carelesnesse forgets him, Vnbeleefe denies him, Ignorance does not know him, Infirmities does not see him, Wantonness passes by him; but Presumption resists him. Herod is blown up into a god: he did but take that Title, he did not make that Title: yet because he did not repel the applause of a god, the worms declare him a miserable man. There be sins that hurt only ourselves, sins that hurt also our neighbors; but this, as if it had the Syrians charge, let's drive at none but the King of all the world. Pride ever looks at the highest: the first man would know as God, the offspring of the new world would dwell as God: presumption regards no limits. What harm could be in laying one brick upon another? In building a city for society? A Tower for safety? God had not indignation at the matter, but the manner: not that such things were undertaken, but proudly undertaken. The Soul that doth ought presumptuously, shall be cut off. This is the kindness that presumption doth a man; it will never leave him till it hath wrought out his final ruin. Though Pharaohs back were sore with stripes, yet he must still presume; he cannot be quiet without his full vengeance: as filching leaves not the pilferer with raw sides, but brings him to a broken neck. Haman can be content with no advancement, till he be lifted up fifty cubits, to his own galhouse. Corah will not disgorge his haughty rebellion, till the earth hath swallowed him up quick. That rich man reckoned up a large bill of particulars; Great barns, much goods, many years: but the sum was short; One night. He that reckons without God, shall be sure to reckon twice.

3 It is a foolish sin: Balaam knew that he could not earn Balaks gold; yet his fingers itcht, and he will go, if it be but to look upon it: so presumptuous is avarice, and presumption so foolish. Corah knew by exemplary proof, that there was no contesting with Moses, yet his proud heart will venture: so presumptuous is pride, and presumption so foolish. Aaron and Miriam knew themselves short of Moses in honor, yet by emulating him they would provoke God: so presumptuous is envy, and presumption so foolish. Those antique builder's purpose a Tower to reach heaven, and what if the height had answered their desire? some hills had been as high as their hopes, which yet are no whit the better. The nearer heaven, the more subject to the violences of heaven; Propiùs ad lovem, propiù ad fulmen. Politic wickedness would keep out of God's fingers; it is blockish impudence that runs upon his pikes. Yet these aspirers dare venture it: so presumptuous is vain-glory, and presumption so foolish. How far will men presume in the world to get them a name; and how ridiculous that name proves when it is gotten? Diana's Temple was one of the wonders of the world: one to get him a name, builds it: another to get him a name, burns it. Thus Achitophel hath a name, Judas hath a name, Beelzebub hath a name; the Powder-traitors have got them a name; but they are famous for infamy. It were some happiness for such names, if they might die, for they will stink while they live. How much better is it to do good works? This shall make our names good, and honorable on earth: to believe and obey? This shall testify our names written in Heaven.

Presumption is a fireworke made up of pride and fool-hardinesse; it mounts into the air with a hissing noise, and the matter being spent, the fools fire dies; it comes down again with a stink. It is a compound of easy credulitie, apt to believe impossibilities; and of headlong temerity, apt to attempt unconcerning hazards; and of blind folly, not foreseeing the miserable events. Rash in undertaking, artless in proceeding, desperate in the ending. It is indeed, like a heavy house built upon slender crutches: like dust, which men throw against the wind; it flies back in their own face, and makes them blind. Wise men presume nothing, but hope the best: but presumption is hope out of her wits. The presumptuous man begins with rashness, and ends with shame: like one that gets up without a bridle, and comes down without a stirrup. It delights to sit on the top of a maste, where falling a-sleep, the down-fall is confusion. As some wild boy, that hath gotten an horse wilder than himself, with much ado backs him, sits him a sweat, and comes down with a mischief. He will sails upon that shelf, where his eyes have seen another ship perish. By arrogating the greatness which he hath not, he loseth the goodness which he had. He will offer to teach them, whose office is to teach him: and when himself is wounded, he will dress his Surgeon. He looks for reverence from his betters: and that when he speaks, three women should hold their peace: and they, for noise, are sufficient to make a market.

His feet carry his heart, and his tongue carries his feet, and both leave out the head in their project. Non curat prodesse, sed gloriatur praesse: praesumit se meliorem, quis ceruit se superiorem. He forgets those today, to whom he was yesterday beholding. In his opinion, Bonum non facit virtus, sed gradus. He comes to counsel uncalled, gives his opinion unasked. If the Prince motion, who shall do such business; the devil could not answer more roundly, I am ready. Facta reficit, reordinat ordinata: judicat judicantes, praejudicat judicaturis; He censures that man ignorant; and calls him (though it be his own name) audacious, that undertakes a business without his direction. If his advice be not consulted, the design is given for lost. He is the worst Jesuits client in the world, for he will never be brought to confession. Yet pardon the silence of his tongue, for his life speaks him. When he offers to shoot, he calls for no bow but Robin Hoods.

This is that sin which would Aequare Angelum Deo, hominem Angelo, would have deified Angels, and angelized men. He makes laws, when he should learn them, and vents philosophy ere he have read his Grammar. He imagines to out-mount eagles with the wings of a bustard; and will not tarry till he be flidge. He will be a challenger at the Olympickes; and there he leaves his carcase, and a base report behind. Xerxes threatens to proclaim war against Greece; one of his presumptuous familiars answers, that they would never tarry the message, but he should find empty walls when he came. Another that they wanted sea-room for his ships, and land-room for his soldiers. Another, that his soldiers there would grow pursy and resty for want of exercise. But Damaxatus bad him not presume; Multitudo quae tibi placet, tibi metuenda est: thy army is too huge to menage: so accordingly he retired with dishonor and loss. How did the very heathen explode this vice in their proverbial speeches? *A*t minus animi, aut plus potentiae. Vel add viribus, vel detrahe verbis. Ne magna loquer.*

Presumption is a mischief made up of many ingredients, to which every vice contributes something, as the gods did to Vulcan toward the making of his Pandora. As many vices challenge part of her, as cities did of Homer. Ignorance says, she is mine: Pride says, she is mine: Temerity says, she is mine: Vain-glory says, she is mine: Cowardice says, she is mine: Impudence says, she is mine: Profuseness says, she is mine. Either presumption is beholding to all these vices, or all these vices are beholding to presumption. And yet, there is one above all, that hath more right to her than all; the devil says, she is mine; and there we leave her. But let us pray.

What clouds so ever we be wrapped in;

Lord, keep thy servants from presumptuous sin.

Self-willed. The natural and unsanctified will of man is hard to tame: worse than the Wild asse, that snuffes up the wind at her pleasure; they that seek her, will not weary themselves, in her month they shall find her. There is one month in the year to take her, but what season can rectify this? Other creatures God hath left to be tamed by man, but man he hath reserved to be tamed by himself. No Prince can tame the will; he may load the body with irons, vex the sense with pains, yea, surcharge the affections with sorrows: yet still a man's will is his own: in his will he is a king, even while his body is below a slave. No bonds of law can hold this Samson: an orator here is more potent than an Emperor. Temptation, like an unhappy bride, may corrupt the will; when power may command, and go without. Valentior fortuna est voluntas: the will can make a man's life happy or wretched, when fortune cannot do it. It is the desire of our will only, that makes us miserable, and so much the more miserable, by having that desire satisfied. The self-willed man needs no greater enemy than he is to himself: Sa ipse viribus ruit. It sets it self a going, and when it is once on the wheels, it runs faster than Satan himself can drive it.

Praefracti, stubborn, obstinate; such as will break before they bow: perverse, cursed-hearted, that will do evil, though they be sure to come by the worst. An inflexible heart, that disdains comparison for hardness with the nether millstone. A delight in evil, because it is evil; an habituating of errors into manners: a turning of infirmity into necessity, by a desperate custom. Hugo speaks of some that are not better by correction, some that are worse with admonition, some that promise amendment, and never mean it; as if they could flatter and delude God himself.

It is distinguished from the former thus; Presumption was never before cast down; therefore bears up it self proudly, and goes on to do evil. But this is a sin that hath been formerly corrected; Praefractum, broken before, yet proceeds in wickedness, Illíc superbia, híc pertinacia. That was wholly presumption: this hath not a little of desperation. When a man hath made such a progress in sin, that he hopes for no pardon, he cares not what mischief he doth. As a desperate malefactor, that fears not to multiply villanous acts, because he knows he shall be hanged whensoever he is taken.

The chief cause of this sin lies in the will of man. As in the actions of God, the true cause is to be sought for in himself; and of the works of Satan, the cause is in Satan: so man's will is the cause of man's willfulness. No man denies, but God hath a suffering, forsaking, disposing hand in it: but it is called a self-will, because it comes immediately from a man's self; regards to please nothing but himself, and fightes against that which opposeth himself. It contradicetes the will of God, with a Fiat voluntas mea: the fountain of all perverse actions is man's unholy will. This is the efficient cause of evils; but what makes the will so perverse?

what is the efficient cause of that? Non est efficiens, est deficiens. The will forsakes the Creator, and adheres to the creature, and so becomes evil. Non quia malum est quo se convertat, sed quia perversa est ipsa conversio. Now when God lets go the will, Satan catcheth it: and then we can hardly be rid of him, who is both willing to stay, and whom we are not unwilling to keep.

But hath not every man a will to be saved? Yes, a confused and inconstant will, in general; there are none, but wish well to themselves: and they that live like the children of hell, would have heaven when they die. But they do not will such a course of life, as may bring them to blessedness; but rather, the swinge of their own lusts: therefore when they would be good, they cannot. Cum vult, non potest; quia quando potuit, noluit: ideo per malum velle, perdidit & bonum posse. This is a will that addicts it self to sin, omnibus unguiculis, holds it with all the powers: that does mischief animo gladiatorio; with such a mind as is Paratus vel perdere, vel perire; which would have God peccata vel nescire, vel vindicare non posse. It would have him either unable, or unwise, or unjust, and indeed no God at all. Rather than he will leave his sensual pleasure, he could wish the Justice, and Wisdom, and Power of God to perish. So much of devil is in this will, that it would ruin the infinite maker.

This sin will appear in the full malignity of it, by the remonstrance of some instances. I will for a taste, cull out seven.

1 The malicious and spiteful. Observe this in Corah, and his confederates against Moses and Aaron: Ye take too much upon you, seeing as the congregation is holy: wherefore do ye lift up yourselves? Every word is a lie. All Israel holy? In so much infidelity, idolatry, mutiny, disobedience, what holiness was there? If this were sanctity, what do you call impiety? They had scarce wiped their mouths, or washed their hands, since their last rebellion: yet these pick-thanks say, all Israel is holy. And for Moses he dejected himself; it was God that lifted him up: he was as far from ambition, as they were from sanctification and humility. He sends for them, they come not, and their message is worse than their absence. Is it not enough that thou hast brought us out of a land that flows with milk and honey, to kill •e in the wilderness, except thou make thyself a Prince over us? Egypt shall be commended, rather than Moses shall want reproach. Injustice, cruelty, trechery, usurpation, are objected to him, that knew none of these by himself. He did not take an asse from them; was this Injustice? He prayed for them, while they rebelled against him; was this cruelty? Oh slaves, he made them free; was this trechery? God himself immediately made him their Prince; was this usurpation? Moses could not be faulted, but they were self-willed. Innocence is no shelter against evil tongues: malice never regards how true any accusation is, but how spiteful. Have we none that follow this pattern? None that with venomous teeth break the bag of poison which they bear in their mouths, till it run out in scandals? If the matter were true, yet such a report is uncharitable: being not true, it is blasphemous. Little do they meditate of that quenchlesse fire, which must burn that tongue that knows no other language. Thou shalt not curse the deaf, nor put a stumbling block before the blind. While a man coozens the ignorant, he stumbles the blind: and he that slanders the absent, curseth the deaf: there is little hope of mercy for either. This can be no other, than a self-willed vice.

2 They that despair of proffered grace, and with both hands put back the goodness of God, are willful sinners. Repentance is set before us, like a Simon of Cyrene, to ease our burdens: Desperation, like an Egyptian, doth aggravate our labors. When we are plunged in the inundation of sin, hope would hold us up by the chin, despair would sink us to the bottom: he that rejects his upholder, and admits his overwhelmer, is he not willful? Hope makes a gracious concession; Repent and be saved. Despair returns a willful answer; No, I cannot repent, I may not be saved. O miserable Judas, quem non poenitentia duxit ad Dominum, sed desperatio traxit ad laquum.

It is wicked enough, to presume upon sin by the example of others: sanctified humility argues against it. Because David fell into adultery and was forgiven, therefore may I commit the same sin on hope of the same success? Pious fear concludes, He was plagued, though he was pardoned: if I sin by his president, I may well be plagued with him, not pardoned with him. The unthrift left his Fathers house, yet at last returned, and was received: but if I willfully forsake God, it is doubtful whether I shall ever return; and if I would, whether I be ever received. Peter denied Christ, and it cost him many bitter tears: but should I deny him, what rivers were able to wash me clean? To presume, is bad: but being fallen, to despair of rising again, is worse. Others have been recovered, why not I? Is not Christ the same? It comforts a diseased man, to know that his Physician hath cured others more dangerously sick of the same disease. How should it comfort us, to remember that God hath forgiven sinners as grievous? Non tanta mundi totius miseria, quanta Dei unius misericordia. His bounty is not shut, but our hand of faith is not open. Therefore men are not cured, Non quia deficit medicus, sed quia fastidit aegrotus; not because God is not merciful nor skillful, but because the patient is willful. As therefore it is a good rule in all our undertakings; Nec temere, nec timide; to be neither too bold, nor too cold: Not too backward, like those timorous Israelites, There be the sons of Anak: nor too forward, like those over-venturous Israelites, that went against their enemies without asking leave. So in all our fallings; not to weigh our errors in the balance of contempt, lest they appear too small, and not worth our sorrow: nor yet in the balance of despair, lest they seem too great, and beyond pardon. But let us sorrow in hope, and hope in sorrow, and we shall find mercy in both.

3 Contemners of the Word. I have written to them the great things of my law, and they were counted a strange thing. They were not strange or hard to be understood, but men were willful, and would not understand them. Preaching, of all professions, hath the least hope to prevail, for it deals with the will of man. The Lawyer hath only to do with reason, convincing by arguments: the Physician only works upon the body, by proper medicines: the Tradesman goes no farther than the eye, the Musician takes the ear: there is no difficulty in prevailing with any of these, because there is in them a natural propension to receive that is good. Sound reason, fit medicine, fair metals, sweet music, every man likes. But Divinity deals with the will; and that such a will, as hath naturally no disposition to goodness, yea an opposition against it; an averseness, a perverseness in evil: yet to work this will to goodness, is her office. Durus hic labor, for men are self-willed; stubborn fishes, which when we seek to catch, they catch us.

The Spider was weaving a curious net to catch the Swallow: she comes, and bears away net and web and weaver too. We may as well command the Eastwinde to blow West, as convert the will from her natural course. In the law of Ielousies, if the woman were guilty, that drank of the bitter waters, she would presently swell: if otherwise, she was well enough. So guilty sinners, after a draught of these bitter waters, reprehensions, will swell against the Priest; innocent souls are cheered and cleared by it. The Divine eloquence of Paul could not scape this affronting: Demetrius and the Craftsmen made a faction against him. Craftsmen indeed, and so most Citizens may be called Craftsmen; too crafty for the poor Minister, if he speak against their great goddess Diana, Sacrilege. What, attempt to convert men from covetousness? Perswade the will to be just, and charitable? Nay, rather perish Religion, fall Churches, be dumb all devotion, be forfeited all the treasures and conduits of grace, to the uttermost work of salvation, and loss of heaven to boot; men will have their wills. Against these refractorie wills hath the Lord set us to fight: we are warriors, but to bear a rich conquest of wills on the point of our spears to heaven. The Falcon soaring in the air, and spying her game below, strikes wing, and comes down with such a force, that the air suffers violence: the nearer she comes, the swifter she flies, and makes her point bravely when she stoops. Preachers are your servants, to hollow the game to you, the humble service of Christ, and subduing your wills to his: fly to it, follow it close; so you shall fly well, stoop well, stop well, live well, and die well, and make a blessed point.

4 Blasphemers; no excuse shall acquit common swearers from being willful sinners. Custom says much for it, and yet that much is nothing. Children have the wit to swear rashly, before they have the discretion to speak distinctly. Oaths in young men are but the effects of hot blood, and arguments of a brave resolution. Old men swear in choler, to maintain their reputation: what they utter above belief, they borrow an oath to make credible. It is the common opinion; he that will not swear, hath not the credit of a man, especially not the spirit of a Gentleman; but I am sure, he that doth, hath not the spirit of a Christian. It is held a cold and dead narration, that is not interlaced with some blasphemous mention of our maker and Savior. If his life, heart, and blood be not taken to grace it; there is no blood, heart, or life in it.

Is not this willful? What gain, what delight, what advancement doth it bring us? Yet these be the common incitements of sin. Covetousness gets money, pride bravery, lust sensual pleasure; swearing brings nothing but horror and distraction. If it could procure credit to our relations, must our honors foundation needs be laid in the dishonor of God? Did the Lord Jesus suffer such variety of pains, to minister unto men variety of oaths, or to satisfy for the variety of sins? How should they have part of that merit, which in every part they have so abused? O that that name, which is reverend to Angels, and terrible to devils, should be tossed about among the sons of men, without fear or reverence! A complaint, which we have cause to fill up with tears, more than words. Have we so learned Christ, to swear by him; only? Will neither the benefits received, nor those we expect, charm our lips from such rebellion? It is a sin, from which of all evils we have most power of abstinence; to which of all evils we have the fewest temptations; therefore what can it be but Wilfulness? Let us think, first, from whence it ariseth; from the first cause of evil, Satan. Secondly, what it bringeth; as many plagues as there be leaves in the Book of God, the evil of temporal punishments. Thirdly, whether it tendeth, unto the last effect of evil, Damnation.

5 Lyars, that speak against their own conscience. Every lie is bad enough, yet some are of infirmity. So Abraham dissembled his wife, to save his life: Isaac was taken with his fathers fear, and lied to Abimelech: David to Abimelech, being hard driven seeks to succor himself with an unwarrantable shift: the midwives of Egypt, Rahab of Jericho, lied. All these were weaknesses, they are not imputations. Aliud tacere quod est, aliud simulare quod non est. Omnis homo, qua homo, mendax: qua verax, non per se, sed per Deum verax. Necessitated, officious, or jocular lies, make not liars. But to lie, with a set purpose and malicious intent, is this self-willed sin. A liar is one practiced in the trade; as was Ziba. So Paul calls the Cretans, liars: and as much hath been said of the Grecians; Graecia mendax. Tacitus and Herodotus are called the great liars. The spawn of Rome hath the Primacie for lying: truth or falsehood is all one to them, so it may make for their turn. The Jesuit seems to be ambitious of the devils prerogative, and fain would be the Father of lies. Among the Indians, he that told a lie thrice, was condemned to perpetual silence; take it on Aelians credit. Happy were it for the Church, if such Ecclesiastical liars were so silenced. Now a simple lie is so evil, that it can be made good by no circumstance; no, not by the glory of God, in the conversion of a world. Whatsoever the School speaks from Saint Augustine, of their Peccata compensativa; as for a man to tell a lie, to prevent a rape or murder: as the two women hid the Spies of Israel, and intelligencers of David; denying them whom they had concealed; to save their bloods: these they call sins that make amends, or recompense themselves. But shall a man speak wickedly for God? Is he ever driven to such a pinch, that he stands in need of our lie? Even this is evil; but to lie with a meretricious forehead, steeled with impudence; this is that self-willed sin, which shall be shut out of heaven among the dogs. The whelps of that Roman litter have thus barked against all the professors of the Gospel, cast frontlesse imputations upon them; traduced the living, belied the dead; against the Truth, against the evident Truth, against the Truth that themselves knew; so grossly, that some of their own blushing pens have confuted their shameless calumniation. Let them have the meed of noted liars, not to be believed speaking true.

6 Perjurers; to lie is wicked, to swear is ungodly; but to swear a lie, most execrable. The Jews oath included seven things; Let bread, water, fire, house, wife, league of Grace, and sepulcher be denied me, if I swear not the truth. Others, with a stone in their hand, throwing it against the wall, and saying, Si sciens fallo, sic me percutiat Jupiter. All Judgments created are too narrow to conceive the guilt of perjury. It dissolves all commerce among men; if there be no truth in us, there is no trust unto us. It makes God an Idol, ignorant of the truth, or else a Patron of falsehood. Yea, it sends up to heaven a desperate challenge of Atheistical defiance, and offers to take God and Truth out of the world. An oath is the end of all disputes; he that violates that, breaks open a gap for ataxie and confusion to invade the world. Wilfull every way; when a man either swears that to be true, which is false; or that to be false, which is true: or that to be true, which he thinks false: or that to be false, which he thinks true.

Words were first ordained for discovery, not for concealment: they that invert the formal intent of words, do willfully cozen. An oath is the remedy of contention, they that cancel that seal of confirmation, are sworn rebels to all goodness. Ye that be so mad of running to Rome, learn this art before you go; inure your stomachs to digest perjury; study equivocations, as young scholars do fallacies; or else, Quid Romae faciam? mentiri nescio. How intolerable is this before a Judgment seat? He that enters into a Statute, conceives the extent of it to be executed on his body, lands, or goods; Therefore sleeps not till he be sure to perform the defeisance and condition. An oath is a kind of Statute entered into, and acknowledged before the high Judge of all the world: the condition is, to say the whole truth, and nothing but the truth: this is to be extended on goods and lands, peace and liberty, body and soul: O how self-willed, how obstinately mad are they, that cast away all these, by casting away the Truth?

Though Phalaris command, & admoto dictet perjuriam Tauro; no terrors should drive us from the horns of the Altar; still let us hold fast the Truth. The witness serves, ne quid Iudex (quia inspector cordis non est) judicando erret. If he be false, he laughs in his sleeve to think how many wise men he hath deluded. I·venal thought Perjurie a disgrace for Romans; Quamvis Cappadoces faciant, equitesque Britanni. The Asians were renowned for perjury, and it seems by the Poet, there were such knights among the Britain's, then. Let those willful damnners of themselves take any base course, rather than this: Hoc satius quàm si dicas sub Iudice, vidi, Quod non vidisti. They are called Post-knights; whether because they stand ready at some noted Post for their hire; or because their names are set upon posts, like villains on record; or especially because they ride post to hell. Every man is one letter in the Alphabet, one element in the State. Judges are as vowels, Witnesses as half vowels or consonants; to speak when others speak to them, to sound something with others, nothing with themselves: Mutes be such as cannot plead for themselves, for whom are appointed Advocates. But false witnesses are Diphthongs, double-tongu'd, that breathe hot or cold, as you bespeak them; these mar the sense, and are to be thrown out of Christ's Cross-row. O that our land had no such monsters, that on an hours warning can lend Jezebel an oath, to rob poor Naboth of his life and Vineyard!

Perjurie! why, all disclaim it: but I would to God none would use it. How do subtle Tradesmen ensnare themselves, when they swear with equivocation, having some secret reference to the unknown mysteries of their profession! Let them know, there is a perjury out of the place of Judgment, and this is it: what shifts soever they devise to juggle with their own conscience. This is an infallible rule, what cunning phrase or ambiguous assertion soever they swear withal; God, who is the witness of the Conscience, so takes it, as he to whom they swear, by common construction understands it. And the Buyer departs nothing so loden with the Injurie, as the Sellers soul is with the weight of perjury. Sacred ever, and inviolable be the Religion of an oath; and do not think men are to be coozened with oaths, as children are with counters. The false swearer hath a large share in all the plagues and curses of that Flying Roule. A share! yea, it is marvel that he doth not engross the whole. So prodigious is this sin, that if it be rewarded according to the merit, it scorns any proportion under a whole volume of punishments. I will bring it forth, saith the Lord. God's Will, cuts off all hope of impunity: his Forth, cuts off all opinion of secrecy.

7 Sacrilege is a willful sin. Against knowledge, men know it is injustice: against conscience, their own heart tells them they do ill: against God, who made them: against their Pastor, who feeds them: against the Gospel, that should save them: every way self-willed. The body of this City hears this often at the public Congregation; but it seems, there is only the body, or rather the belly of the City; and venter non habet aures. What's their answer? alas, we so often hear it, that we never mind it. Desperate willfulness! we expect that God should hear us, yet we will not hear him: that he should bless and prosper our estates, when we purloine his. Our Churches be full, but our purses be empty: great Audiences, and small benevolences, are like many sheep, and a little wool. Men give us the hearing, and that's all they give us. We empty our books, we empty our veins, we empty our brains; yet we must leave our posterity beggars. Is it your praises that we hunt for? it is time that our mouths were stopped with earth, if we should think of any other end than the honor of God. If you give us any glory, you endanger us to vengeance, and so requite us evil for our good. But God forbid, you should profit so little by us, as I am sure we do by you.

But Sacrilege shall find no excuse at the day of Judgment. I shall relate a story, on the credit of a reverend Bishop of this Land, who knew and saw it. There was a Gentleman that had the Tithes of a Parsonage Improprate; by right whereof he demanded tithe-wool of a parishioner, who was very rich, and the owner of many hundred sheep. He sent him a very small quantity, the servants shown it their master, the master his neighbors, who all acknowledged that he did him wrong. He demanded more, the other denied more; and vowed in his choler, that if he were driven to pay more, he would never keep sheep more, and so deprive him of that profit. The Law compelled him: whereupon he put away his sheep. After which, he presently fell into such decay; that when this Gentleman was buried, (which was not long after) he among the rest of the poor people, stood to receive such alms as were given at the Funeral. He was not alone in this exemplary punishment: thousands have fallen to poverty for this very sin of sacrilege. So dearly doth God pay himself of those, that detain his dues; yea, even while they are transmitted into profane hands. Quàm saepe & juste Deus aufert novem, à non solvente decimam? From them that will not pay the tenth, he takes away all the nine. But, O self-willednesse, thou cause of all this sin and ruin; that dost still harden the hearts of men, and putttest equity out of all hope of recovery! When Politicians turn good Christians, Usurers build Churches, and Poets come to Sermons; then we will hope that God shall have his tithes.

1 Will is one thing which differenceth a man from a beast, and makes him capable of misery or blessedness. Life, sense, appetite, Nec miserum per se faci•t, nec beatum; but only the will: therefore if the will be naught, man is in worse case than the beast: as by a good will, he is in far better.

2 Will is a rational motion, Sensui & appetitui praesidens. Reason a Director; so man had it: Reason a Follower; so man hath it: Reason a Companion; so man should have it. It is not always moved ex ratione, nunquam absque ratione: the Will doth many things by reason, and yet against reason, perejus quasi ministerium, contra ejus consilium. Reason is given to the Will, ut illam instruat, non destruct: now if Will refuseth the counsel of reason, what can hinder ruin?

3 Nothing can offend God but the Will, and the Will can offend him without anything else. The good or ill which Infants, men either distracted or sleeping, do, shall not be imputed to them; quia nec compotes sunt suae rationis, nec usum retinent suae voluntatis: but if the Will transgress, there is no excuse. Cum nihil liberum habeat nisi se, merito non judicatur nisi ex se. A dull ingenuity, a frail memory, an unquiet appetite, a heavy sense, a languishing life; none of these make a man guilty, nor their contraries Innocent: because these come not from the Will. But a man wills the knowledge of another's wife; he never attains it, perhaps never attempts it; yet is he an adulterer. A man would steal, if he durst: he is a thief though he have stole nothing.

4 Nothing can please GOD but the Will: Nil offertur ditius bona voluntate. Praises are but stinking smoke, except the Will be good; that can make them sweet perfumes. Alms are neglected rubbish; except the sanctified Will makes them precious Jewels. The will supplies all defects: the tongue cannot pray, the will is heard: the hand is lame and cannot work, the will performs it: Quic quid fieri vult voluntas, hoc factum reputat Deus. Nihil omnino tam facile est bona voluntati, quam ipsa sibi: nothing is more easy than to will good; yet when all fail, this pleaseth GOD. But where the will is evil, it must answer for all. Voluntas à volatu: whither the will driveth, the whole man flieth. Let us then abhor self-willedness; and submit our wills to his will that made them. If men will have their wills, know that God will have his will too: and that will of his, which men would not fulfill in obedience, they must fulfill in vengeance. O how much better is it for us, that his will be obeyed, who wills all men to be saved?

5 Consider the virtues opposed to these vices; and first of the former. Presumption is an extreme, the other contrary is Desperation; betwixt them both the mediate virtue is Hope. Despair is hope stark dead, Presumption is hope stark mad, this enrageth it, the other strangles it. Presumption does more than Hope allows, Desperation does that which Hope forbids; Presumption asks no leave of God; Despair fights against God; Hope would be with God. Presumption is a Braggard; Despair is a Coward; Hope is modestly valiant. Presumption challenges the earth; Desperation sinks to hell; Hope is bound for heaven. Presumption is altogether for merit; Despair is altogether for misery; Hope is altogether for mercy. Presumption would be crowned; Desperation would be damned; Hope would be saved. Presumption looks forward; Despair looks downward; Hope looks upward. Let us not presume, quia Deus est justus: nor despair, quia Deus est benignus: but hope, quia Deus est bonus. Desperation takes the next way to hell; Presumption goes a little about; but both these extremes are reconciled in hell.

Hope is a Virgin of a fair and clear countenance: her proper seat is upon earth, her proper object is in heaven. Of a quick and piercing eye, that can see the glory of God, the mercy of Christ, the society of Saints and Angels, the joys of Paradise, through all the clouds and orbs; as Stephen saw heaven opened, and Jesus in potioribus Dei. Her eye is so fixed on the blessedness above, that nothing in the world can remove it. Faith is her Attorney General; Prayer her Sollicitor; Patience her Physician; Charity her Almoner; Thankfulness her Treasurer; Confidence her Vice-Admiral; the Promise of God her Anchor; Peace her Chair of State, and Eternal Glory her Crown.

6 Against Self-willednesse I oppose Humility and Meekness; a submissive heart, yielding to be disposed by God's wisdom, and to be governed by his will• throwing a man out of himself, and laying him at the feet of his Maker. He that fights against his own will, as against his worst enemy▪ and had rather lose hi• own heart, than his heart should lose God; this is a man of blessed meekness. It is not pusillanimitie, but the greatest courage, for it over-comes a man's self: not that the will ceaseth to be, but to be rigid and refractory. It is better to have passions well-ordered, than to have no passions at all. Blessed are the meek: while they live, they shall be quiet on earth; and when they die, they shall be safe and glorious in Heaven.

The self-willed is a slave to the worst part of himself, that which is beast in him, governs that which is man: Appetite is his lord, Reason his servant, Religion his drudge. His five senses are all the articles of his faith; and he had rather be a famous man upon earth, than a Saint in heaven. He likes nothing, for any goodness, but because he will like it: and he will like it because others do •ot. If an unseasonable shower cross his recreation, he is ready to fall out with heaven, and to quarrel with God himself: as if he were wronged, because God did not take his times, when to rain, and when to shine. He is a querulous cur that barks at every horse; and in the silent night, the very moonshine opens his clamorous throat. All his proceedings are so many precipices, and his attempts peremptory. He hath not the patience to consult with reason, but determines all merely by affection and fancy. There is no part about him, but often smarts for his will. His sides before with stripes, and thank his will for it. His bowels are empty, and complain that his will robs them of sustinance. Yea, not seldom, his will breaks the covenant, and his neck pays the forfeit. He is the Lawyers best client, his own Sycophant, and the devils wax, to take what impression he will give him. To have his will upon his neighbor in a suite of law, he will hazard his salvation. Saul enquires of the Lord, and he answered him not: he seeks to a witch, and she answers him. He must have his will: if God will not answer him, Satan shall. Flectere cum nequeat Superos, Acheronia movebit. Wilfulness hath no hope to prevail with the Lord, therefore sollicites the devil.

Though we be sinful, let us not be willful. Weaknesse finds pity, willfulness deserves penalty. We sin too often against our wills, too often besides our wills, too often with our wills; but let us not be self-willed. Let us subdue our lusts to our will, submit our will to reason, our reason to faith; our faith, our reason, our wills, ourselves, to the will of God. He chargeth us to keep his laws, we have not kept them: having sinned, he calls us to repent, and offers pardon: how gracious is this goodness! O let our humble sorrow, and answerable faith, at least say, Amen.

When God first made man, he set all in a perfect harmony: by one act of rebellion, all was put out of frame. To reduce this shattered family into some order, there was a Council called: Reason, Will, Memory, Imagination, Affection, and Sense. Everyone knew his office: Sense was to perceive for all; Affection to like or dislike for all; Will to desire for all; Imagination to invent for all; Memory to record for all; Reason to judge for all. Sense was to be the Cater; Affection the Taster; Imagination the Steward; Memory the Secretary; Will the Controller;

Reason the Judge, to approve or disallow for all. All the rest were contented with their places, saving only the Will; and she took it in scorn that Reason should be above her. Hereupon they began to contest about it, and the contention grew hot. Reason gave many reasons, why she should be chief: first, because it was so from the beginning, and Innovation in any state is dangerous. Secondly, if all should not be ruled by reason, there would soon be a dissolution and confusion of the family. Sense would be out of taste; Affection would mistake; loving where it should hate, and hating where it should love. Imagination would provide nothing but noxious things; Memory would set down nothing but bad Items; yea, Will her self would employ all the rest to mischief; should not Reason direct. But for all this, Will would not be disputed out of her usurped regiment: so they fell to siding: Sense and Affection presently close with Will; Memory did not yield suddenly; but perceiving what power Will had over her, and that she could remember no more than Will, would have her; she also takes her part.

Reason hath now none left but Imagination, and that stood to it stoutly. Still the quarrel increased: crafty Imagination finds out this trick; that they two should reign by turns, and divide the life between them. Will should rule all the waking part, and Reason all the sleeping part. Will was contented with this motion, but Reason disdains that she should have nothing to do but when man was asleep. Will knew there was no way to win Imagination by force, yet she might be corrupted, being an officer that would take bribes. Temptation prevailed with her too; so that now by a general consent, Will is made Queen-regent, and Reason but her servant.

Yet Reason would not so give over her just title; but having one friend that was not called to counsel; she sollicitates her to plead her cause; this was Conscience. At whose approach they all began to tremble, and by her arguments were moved to dislike their choice. But when Will saw them begin to shrink; with an austere look and frowning brow, she commands them on their allegiance to obey no other Princesse but her self. Conscience taxeth her of pride, and usurpation; because the high Sovereign had appointed Reason for his Lieutenant and Vice-roy, to govern this little Isle of Man. But Will replies; Argue as long as you please, I am Will, and I will have it so. Then she charged Sense to stop the mouth of clamorous Conscience, and Affection to blind the eyes of Reason. Thus while honesty cannot speak, and wisdom cannot see, Will is crowned absolute Queen. Ecce voluntatem; Dominam cognoscite vestram. Sic volo, sic jubeo; stat pro Ratione voluntas. Where Reason is subjected to Sense, and Appetite sways Conscience, and tyrant-Will does, undoes all; that state unhappily must perish.

This is that Self-will, which rules in all men by nature: but the supreme Emperor takes pity on some, and sends down a new Governesse to hem, Grace. She at once, opens the eyes of Reason, and the mouth of Conscience, deposeth Will from her usurpation, disgrades both her favorites, Sense and Affection; does not put them to death, but makes them good and serviceable to Reason; turns vain Imagination into divine Contemplation; changeth the disposition of Will; of wild and haggard, makes it morigerous and mansuete. Yet is Will thus decrowned against her will; often she rebels even against Grace, and sometimes gets the better; and will always make one, though she cannot be alone, and chief in the Regiment. Divisum imperium cum Jove Caesar habet. This war is in the sanctified: in the rest, Will her self, or Self-will is the great Mistress, and rules all, till she bring all to ruin. How can it be otherwise, when the feminine powers are more potent than the masculine? From all our enemies, especially from our own natural wills, good Lord deliver us.

They are not afraid to speak evil of dignities. There is no one absolute king among men, but he that is the king of all gods. Therefore earthly monarchs must walk by a rule; which if they transgress, they shall be as surely accountable to him, as they are accountable to none but him, that ordained them. If they command unlawful things, Contemne potestatem, timendo majorem potestatem. The devil hath power, and power from God; but it is Potestas Permissionis, non Commissionis: therefore to be resisted. The magistrate hath Power; which if he abuse, that is by permission: but the Power it self is by the Commission of God. Therefore it pleaseth the Lord to officiate his Ministers in this employment: with due reverence to instruct the Prince in governing; as by divine authority to conform the subjects to obedience. When Saul was chosen, because the observance of a king was uncouth, Samuel is set to inform them: otherwise, novelty might have been a warrant for ignorance, and ignorance for neglect. There be reciprocal respects between the Prince and his subjects; which not being observed, Government languisheth into confusion; these Samuel teacheth them. He was their Judge, he is still their Prophet: he must instruct, though he may not rule, yea, he will instruct him that shall rule. Conscience binds every Samuel's endeavor, to keep even terms betwixt the king and people: prescribing to the one moderation and equity, to the other humbleness and loyalty. Divinity is a mistress for the highest masters of men; and the Scripture is the best man of counsel for the greatest States-man in the world.

Now because government is then best, when it hath one head, and many hands; the supreme hath need of subordinate powers. It was the Egyptians emblem, whereby they figured government, Oculum cum Sceptro; an Eye and a Scepter. The Prince is but a man; therefore he must see by others eyes, and execute by inferior hands. The burden of authority is too heavy for one man's shoulders, I am not able to bear you myself alone, saith Moses. Therefore his father in law casts him a module for a polity in Israel: which, howsoever at first it passed under God's correction, yet after being seen and allowed by him, and being practiced by Moses; it became of good policy sound Divinity; of private counsel, a general oracle, serving for substance all times and places. Solomon was the wisest king, yet he had his grave Counsel, sage experienced men. Ahasuerus would do nothing in the removal of Vashti, but by the consent of the seven Princes. The house will not stand without these pillars; and where they are sound, we may say of that kingdom, as the Traveler reported that he had seen, in England Pulchrum Regem, in France Pulchrum regnum, in Spain Pulchrum Senatium. There may be a great sacrilege committed in Israel, and yet Joshua not know of it: some errors will escape his best vigilancy. That sin is not half cunning enough, that hath not learned secrecy. It is no blame to authority, that some sins are committed privately. Only the Eye of omniscience is able to find men out in their close wickedness. There is no Family, no society so holy, but it may be blemished with some malefactors. It is enough for the magistrate to punish manifest offenses: we cannot expect, that the sight of the eye, or reach of the hand should be infinite.

There must be therefore Counselors of State, and Captains of war; Peers, Judges, Magistrates, yea and inferior officers: Rulers of thousands, of hundreds, of fifties, and of ten's: as we have Chancellor, chief Justice, Judges of Assise, Justices of peace, Customers, Cunstables. That Instrument is not in tune, where any of these strings be false. Joseph was Pharaohs right-hand, Abrech, Pater Patriae. Though the Prince, like the Sun, yield his light and comfort to the State; yet bad Magistrates under him, aiming at their own private ends; like clouds or malignant stars, may hinder the influence: yea, they are like bad winds, that wither that part of the State. Whereas the errors and distempers of Princes have been qualified by virtuous deputies. Now, because there is no power but from God, therefore not the least of these subordinate and ministerial Governors must be despised, without peril of his displeasure.

In the discharging of this Artillery of hell, against the Glories and Powers which God hath ordained, we may consider four particulars; the Bullet, the Musket, the Powder, and the Mark. The Musket is the malice of the heart: the Powder, the spitefulness of the tongue: the Bullet is Maledicentia, Blasphemy, disgracing of Magistrates: the Mark or But is Dignities. This piece is charged with three deadly bullets; libelling, murmuring, mutining.

1 Libellers think it a point of wit to traduce Magistracy; and what they dare not own for fear of censure, they dare invent without fear of hell. Scandals of great men have seldom any fathers: they kill, and make no report. Like the Pasquin in Rome, the Image or Tyber bridge; that does all. It is a base and penurious argument of wit, to disgrace those in private, whose innocence they may envy, cannot tax. In veteri Comoedia, the persons of men were represented and abused; but they were Barbarians. The faults of great ones are to be reproved by the reverend Fathers of the Church: the Stage and Poet, with jests and Satyres, may not attempt it. It is dangerous to play with that, which angers GOD. I know that some vices are beside their malice, ridiculous; and the sottish humors and passions of men are shamed in being presented. But that is a treacherous hand, that steals away from Statesmen their reputation: while they blemish their sufficiency, they covertly condemn the State that chose them. Thus may the Council, the king, yea, the King of heaven be wounded through the sides of a mean Magistrate. There is nothing that the Law allows, but the discontent censures: what it forbids as dangerous, that he pumps his wit to justify. Where the gate stands open, he is seeking for a style; and what he cannot convince, he will vellicate. Thus like a Grasshopper at Christmas, he looks back upon harvest with a lean pair of cheeks, and curses that, which he never had the grace to apprehend as a blessing.

2 Murmurers, though they disperse not written scandals of the Magistracy, yet mutter out repining exceptions against their actions. Such were in Israel: the people want water, and instead of praying to God, they murmur against Moses. Alas, what hath the righteous done? He made not the wilderness dry, nor the waters bitter. But he was their Conductor! yet, as he led them, so God led him: the Pillar guided Moses; as Moses guided the people: yet they murmur at Moses. How mad is impatient man, when he wants his natural desire, and spiritual grace withal. If men cannot have their wills, to invade the inheritance which the right heir keeps from them; or suppose they be injured, and may not have redress in that manner and measure themselves prescribe; presently maledicunt Principi, they murmur against the Magistrate. And what Prince can hope to be free, when Moses could not escape? Never Prince so merited of a people: he endangered himself to Pharaohs utmost cruelty; he brought them from a bondage worse than death; he interposed himself betwixt God's anger and them: one would think, that no death could have opened their mouths to speak evil of Moses. Yet such is the hard condition of authority; that if men fare well, they applaud themselves: if ill, they repine against their Rulers. Moses wanted water as well as they, yet they ask Moses for water; What shall we drink? The body cannot be distempered, and the head at ease: the King must needs feel the people's misery. If they had seen him furnished with full vessels of sweet water, while they were turned over to the bitter, there had been some color for murmuring: but the Ruler wants water no less than themselves. Murmure not ye, as they did, lest ye be destroyed of the destroyer, as they were: let their vengeance make us tremble. Be silent unto the Lord, lest he answer you again in fury.

3 Mutiners so speak evil of dignities, that they raise up evil against Dignities. Corah stirs up a faction against Moses; Why dost thou make thyself a Prince over us? A man could not think of an honor less worth his emulation, than the Principality of Israel. They were a people that could give nothing, a people that had nothing, a people whom their Leader was fain to feed with bread and water: they paid him no tribute, but ill words: his command was only a burden to him; yet was it an eye-sore to them; Ye take too much upon you. Nothing can be more pleasing to the vulgar, than to hear their Governors taxed, and themselves flattered. This mutiny soon brought in a rout of rebels. He that poisons the people with a mal-opinion of their Prince, is the most dangerous traitor. To rip up the faults of kings, is bold impiety: but to charge them with faults they have not, is shameless blasphemy. So Absalom spoke evil of his own Father.

No music is so sweet to the ears of the giddy multitude, as to hear well of themselves, ill of their Princes. Absalom need not wish himself on the Bench: every man says, O what a courteous Prince is Absalom? What a just Ruler would Absalom be? How happy were we, if we might be judged by Absalom? Thy matters are good! It might be some monopolie, some pestilent Patent of engrossing, some malicious accusation; yet all is good matter with Absalom. There is none to hear! their own eyes saw this to be false: daily were causes heard and judged, offenses heard and punished. If some officer were so corrupt, that an appeal was just; shall the King be blamed? must the Prince answer for every act that his subject does? David had more of such blasphemers; Shimei curseth him to his face. Durst he do thus among his armed troops? yes, it is the mark which our Apostle sets on these reprobate blasphemers; They are not afraid to speak evil of Dignities. Doubtless, that clamorous tongue had secretly traduced the good king long before: therefore is now given up to the rage of frenzy; that the mischief it did owe his heart, might now be paid home. What can they look for, that slander the footsteps of God's Anointed, but the name and doom of Shimei.

The greater the Persons, the more censurable be all their actions. What can a Prince do so acceptable to the god, but lewd men will mis-interpret it? Every tongue is ready to speak partially, according to the interest he hath in the cause or patient. If a Statesman have done a private person some but imagined wrong; how doth he clap, leap, and rejoice at his downfall? It is not possible that Dignities should be free from imputations: their innocence can no more protect them, than their power. This shot flies not at random, like the Syrians arrow at a venture; but is charged and discharged on set purpose to dishonor God, in wounding the honor of his Anointed.

The Engine that carries this mischievous burden, is the Tongue. Leviter v•lat, sed graviter violat. It is but a little member, but the nimblest about a man: able to do both body and soul too a mischief. How many propter sol•tas linguas have catenatos pedes! If you ask what cast such a man into prison? his lavish tongue. Paul tamed his whole body: he that undertakes such a work begins at the heart, then next of all to the tongue. Shall I think that he fears GOD, that tears God? or, Deum timere, and Regem non honorificare? Some dogs bark not for curstnesse, so much as for custom: yet this at best is but a currish quality. To toss the weaknesses of Magistrates in common discourses, though they wish them well as they say: argues a proud heart. The disease sometimes appears not to the patient himself; yet when he talks idly, the Physician knows he is sick. A man blasphemes God or the Prince, scandalizeth the nobles; yet says he means well, and is friends with God and the world: but does not his talking idly declare him to be sick? will the Law understand him otherwise in trial, or the Lord in Judgment?

The tongue is a world of iniquity. Si pars, quid totum? If so little a part be a world of mischief, what is the whole? Shall a man discharge his piece at an unlawful mark, and then say he meant no harm? The tongue is a fire? like fire indeed: propter calorē, it is as hot as fire: propter colorem, it is as red as fire: for agility, it is as nimble as fire: for ambition, it is as aspiring as fire; it hath a spite at what is above it. Like the Italian needle, that being thrust into the body, kills invisibly. Semper meminerimus in quo erratum est. Lord, keep my lips from evil, and my tongue that it speak no g•tle. Keep it, who can? None but the Lord. Oret lingua, ut dometur lingua. He suffers man to tame all the creatures, but man himself he reserves to his own taming.

The Powder that chargeth the tongue, and carries this shot of blasphemy, must needs be malice: a tumour of cursed-heartednesse, the salt-peter of a rancorous hatred, boiled in choler to an extraction of mischief. This is a disease that tormenteth all abundance, and embitters men's contentments. When Ham•• reckoned up all the glory, promotions, riches, banquets, graces of the King, favors of the Queen, respect of the Nobles, that were done him; yet he concludes; All is nothing, so long as Mordecai sits in the kings gate. Mordecat's cap was not the cause, but Haman's malice: nothing can serve, but he must be his enemies hangman: but though he meant it not, he built his own galhouse. It is just, that malice should first hurt a man's self, as fire in his bosom burns him, before it touch others. How dares the malicious come before God in prayer, that judgeth hatred man-slaughter? He presents himself, if not with hands, yet with a heart embrewed in blood. The Jews gnashed at Stephen with their teeth. This is to show the tricks of hell beforehand; gnashing of teeth: they shall have enough of it there.

This is that murderous shot, forged in the furnace of hell, and charged in the bellies of popish Emissaries, to be discharged against the honor of worthy Magistrates, yea glorious Princes. Who cannot but know, that their tongues are full of this virulency, when their books are stuffed with little else? As if they would proclaim to the world, how villanous that Religion makes them; and that they are bound to traduce Kings. Instead of proposing the lives of Saints to imitation, they are still exposing the lives of Princes to suspicion, yea to conspiracy. Do they this without authority? No, but in the name of the Pope, as that Philistine cursed David by his gods. Yea, hath not the Pope in his own name, cursed them? His excommunications, execrations, rejection of Princes; what is this but to speakevil of Dignities? Indeed this hellish zeal hath been so hissed at, that some of them are now somewhat ashamed: therefore like the devil in the Serpent, the Pope makes use of another's tongue: the Jesuit undertakes it for him; that large spoone which the Roman Hierarchy devised to eat with the devil: who though he were found out since the invention of gunpowder, hath not done less mischief. The whole trade, study, and profession of that Order, is maledicere Principibus. But Lord, though they curse, bless thou: thy blessing shall do us good, when their curses hurt none but themselves. Let Dignities comfort themselves against these evil speakings, as David did in the persecution of Shimei; It may be the Lord will requite me good for his cursing this day. It may be, yea it hath been, and we trust it shall be, that God will bless us the more for their cursing. It may hitherto be written as a Motto on the Kings Crown: Videntis & Viventis: he sees and lives; his enemies perish, himself prospers.

The Buts at which all this pestilent ordnance lets fly, the Apostle calls Dignities, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Glorias. They are also called God's, not by nature, but by office; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, for their calling: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, for their order and place: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, for their honor and respect. God hath not only set them as Vicegerents in his own room, but also enabled them with gifts for so great a designment. Though not many noble and great be called to the grace of Sanctification, yet they are to the grace of Administration. When God called Saul to be a King, he gave him another heart: he lifted up his thoughts to the disposition and pitch of a king. The calling of God never leaves a man unchanged: nor does he employ any in his service, whom he does not enable to the work he sets them about. Especially, when he makes Dignities, sets them to supply his own place, and to the representation of himself. It is no wonder, if Princes excel the vulgar in gifts, no less than in honors: their Crowns and hearts are both in one hand: and if that did not add to their spirits, as well as to their states, there were no equality.

Yet when Saul was chosen, and all the people shouted, God save the King, there were some Sons of Belial, that despised him. It is a vain ambition that seeks to be loved of all. When God commands us to have peace with all men, he adds, if it be possible. Favor is more hard to attain than peace: many forbear to trouble us, that yet do not love us. Goodness cannot be without exceptions; therefore is not to be sought abroad, but in ourselves, and the conscience of our well deservings. But what shall we say to those men, that will be scanning of kings, and censuring all their actions, yea charging their innocence with aberrations? How plainly hath God interdicted it? How doth Saint Paul disclaim it? How did Solomon threaten it? Rulers were no Christians in Paul's time; yet how earnestly doth he persuade to obedience? With what reverence did he appeal to Caesar? With what humility and appreciation of happiness, Vivat Rex; with what deprecation of evil, This dream be to thine enemies; did Daniel speak to the king of Babel, a king that served not God.

How are we blessed of God, and have cause to bless God, for our government; unparaleld by any about us, unexampled by any before us. Good Kings are no ordinary blessings; a worthy General is worth half an army: such as Moses and Joshua were; whose faith fought more for the campe, than the campe fought for them.

Governement is not only civil, but ecclesiastical: not only Moses must be obeyed, but Aaron must not be despised. I would to God, these Dignities did never disgrace themselves: that they would not be forward to rob the Church, who are set to patronize it; and make themselves examples of sacrilege. O that our consciences could say this is false, or that demonstration made it not too true! Thus they that are set in Iudicatory places, grow into contempt, by doing things contemptible. Yet may not their Dignity be despised, under pain of a higher censure than theirs, even of God himself. The Lord hath often done good to his Church, even by those Instruments whom for their sins he means to cast into hell-fire. It is hard indeed to find Bonum Iudicem, and malum hominem, a good Judge and a bad man under one skin: if they could be joined, yet when the bad man goes to hell, what shall become of the good Judge? But personal corruption cannot bar Primitive Institution. The sins of Governors are their own, the Governement is God's, and must not be despised.

Yea, there is an inferior Dignity, yet a Dignity: every Minister is, or at least should be, a Governor of his flock. But now the sheep are such perilous beasts, that they will govern the Shepherd; children will teach their fathers to speak, and Rectors must be regulated. Such is the contempt of this Dignity, that it is a high favor if the Preacher may be heard in the Pulpit: out of it, there is not the most illiterate Mechanicke, but thinks himself a wiser and a better man. In all things he is held the meanest of the parish, till it come to any payment or tax, and then they will honor him so far as to rank him with an Alderman. But for his Governement over his charge, this is held but a mockery: when they speak of a Minister, the ordinary question is, Where doth he serve? But, Where doth he govern? this would be a nonsense in the worlds opinion. Indeed we are your Servants for Christ's sake; yea, we will be your footstool, or if you can devise a vassalage lower. But let us tell you the truth; If you honor Christ, you cannot despise us; and if ye do despise us, you do not honor Christ; and if ye honor not him, he will never honor you. And while you calumniate our persons, or abridge our just means, you are so far from honoring us, that you rob us; and while you rob us, you rob Christ of his glory, and your own souls of comfort: and you shall sooner blow up hell with trains of powder, than break the chain of this dependant truth.

Glories they are, why then should they not be glorious? Let their pomp, their apparel, their diet, their dwelling, be all magnificent: let nothing be wanting to their State, upon whom depends the state of all. They come within this compass, that speak evil of these things: maledicunt Regi, qui maledicunt Regalusti. Again, Dignities they are, therefore should be worthy; and that in two respects: worthy of their admittance, worthy in their performance.

1 Worthy of admittance: when they be chosen to govern others, that have not learned to govern themselves, the reпублиke rues it. Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child. I will give children to be their Princes, and babes shall rule over them. Children in understanding, not in respect of innocence. A fool cannot be harmless; they are truly good, who best know why. In the election of Magistrates, let God be consulted; without whom, Samuel himself will take seven wrong before one right. Do not think everyone sufficient, that thinks himself so. Ambition is an argument of unworthiness: the Olives, Vines, and Fig trees refuse this honor; Brambles will catch hold on the sleeve for preferment. Ne sit qui ambit: let him never speed that sues. They that are worthy must be sued to; they are sooner found in retirement, than popularity: as Gideon was in the barn, David at the fold. They know offices to be callings, and will not meddle with them, till they be called to them. Let such be preferred, not as would have places, but such as places would have.

But, O misery of our times! Dignities be made, not by the worth, but by the weight: not who deserve best, but who bid fairest. Money can provide a man a place, no matter how he be provided for the place. If you ask a thief in an office, How camest thou in hither? he must answer with that Roman Burgess; With a great sum of money. Churchmen are condemned for buying of Benefices, and that commonly by those that are the Sellers of them. They make that punishable in us, which they hold allowable in themselves: as if they would compel us to go to heaven, while themselves are content to take the other way. I know it is fearful enough, to have the charge of souls bought and sold, with a Who gives most? But is the fault only in Benefices? do not Lawyers buy offices and civil Dignities? This is not Simony, is it not worse? That wicked president of corruption had two names, Simon and Magus: if the buying of Benefices be Simony, the buying of offices may well be termed Magicke. These places prepare for Iudicature, and so it lies in them to hasten or delay Justice, to guide or misguide the proceedings. He that hath bought his place dear, will hardly afford the client a reasonable penny-worth of Justice. This is not to come in at God's door, but at the devils window. Such be unworthy Dignities.

2 Worthy in their performance, and executing the place. They must be, First, Non timidi, no dastards: they had need be heroical spirits, that must oppose the current, yea, the torrent of vices, and do Justice when a great man says, No. How was Gideon's army disquantied? upon the Proclamation, Let the fearful be gone; two and twenty thousand slunke away. Yet this is not enough; more cowards must be cashier'd. If ours were so served, I fear of so many thousands there would scarce be three hundred left. The Athenian Judges used to sit in Mars-street; to show, that though they wore Apollo's robes, yet they had martial hearts. Constantine was termed that male-child, for his courage and resolution for the truth. A soft and flexible nature is not able to say Injustice nay, when it comes with high looks. Cowards are slaves to those above them, Sycophants to those equal with them, tyrants to those under them. Commonly, courage comes from Blood and breeding: Eagles produce eagles, and dunghill cockes beget cravens. Blessed is the Land, whose Princes are the sons of Nobles. Not but that God can alter this, and raise as worthy men from cottages, as from Palaces. Gideon was a Thrasher, David a Shepherd, yet both mirroures of valor, reckoned among the Worthies. But a timorous Magistrate is a Hare in a Lions seat; the frown or check of a great one is able to fright him from his conscience. So we have seen a Natural tied to a Post with a straw, which he durst not break. These dare meddle with none, that dare meddle with them.

Next; Non tumidi, not proud and disdainfull. Some when they have got an office, look big upon their old acquaintance; as if their Dignity were a Dropsy to puff them up. Now they think, they may swear by authority, and oppress by license; their place will bear them out in it. When we see such an one upon the Bench, we may think truly, he would better become the Barre. These hold Religion a disparagement to Gentry, and fear nothing more, than to have a name that they fear God. Their Place to such is held a Chair of honor, and a Stool of ease, and a Farm of commodity, and a sword of revenge; not a calling of labor, wherein they must do much good, or receive much blame.

Lastly, Nec cupidi; it is too base and sordid for honor to be covetous. What is not cheap with him, to whom money is dear? He will sell the truth, sell his friend, sell his country, with Ahab sell himself, for money. Such if they be officers, study new pullies and winches to derive larger fees: their words be casting nets, no fish scapes them. If Lawyers, they will sell both their speech and silence, their clients causes, and their own consciences. While the golden stream runneth, the mill grindeth: when that spring is dry, they advise them to put it to comprmise, and let their neighbors end it; the fools might have done so before. But let Dignities take care, that the people may grow rich by them, and not they by the people.

The good Magistrate sits on the Judgment-seat, with as great (though not so slavish) fear, as Olanes did on the flayed skin of his father Sylannes, nailed by Cambyses on the Tribunal: or as the Mahometan council, when they think the great Turk stands behind the Arras, or at the dangerous door. When greatness of power, or nearness of friendship brings an unjust suit before him, requesting his favor in it; his heart replies within him; How shall I judge so, and answer the Lord when he comes to judge me?

Thus should Dignities walk worthy; as Paul said to Timothy, See that no man despise thee. As they would not be contemned, they must not deserve contempt; if they do, God can pour contempt upon Princes. The lowest officers are not here excused, for if the inferior fail in their duties, it will trouble the supreme to repair it. The fixed stars be the greatest and highest, and have their light and influence; yet is it the Sun and Moon, the lowest and nearest orbs that govern the world. Be the Bishop never so learned, if the Parishonal Priest be negligent or ignorant, the people are still untaught. What can the eye do, if the hand be unserviceable? It is the ground-wind, not the rack-wind, that drives mills and ships. In the Clock of Justice, the least pin or wheel being irregular, disorders all.

Dignities be Difficulties; and the Rent of labor considered, the good man hath but a hard bargain of his Honor. I wonder not, if the wise man be rather hailed out of his privacy, to such preferment: for he weighs the charge as well as the credit, the danger more than the gain, of high places: knowing the chair of honor to be as tickle as Eli's stool, off which he may easily break his neck. I cannot blame Saul for hiding himself from a kingdom; especially so troublesome an one as Israel then was. Honor is heavy enough when it comes on the best terms; much more when all men's cares are cast upon one, most of all in a distempered

State. To put to sea, is not without danger at any time; but what safety can he expect that launcheth out in a storm? The quietest Throne is full of cares, the unquiet of perils. These drove Saul into a corner, to hide his head from a Crown, that he chose rather to lie obscure among the baggage of his tent, than to sit gloriously in a Chair of State. Dignity in such a condition Ta timere cogitur, quàm timeri. They often drink worm wood in a cup of gold, and lie in a bed of Ivory upon a pillow of thorns; that they may say of their glory, as he did of his Robe; O nobilem magis quàm felicem pannum! If the ambitious knew what cares, fears, and dangers, dwelt within the hoope of a Crown; though it lay at their foot, they would not stoop to take it up. But the Divine arm that sets the Diadem on their heads, doth there maintain it. If they uphold his kingdom, he will uphold theirs. If they will have God to be mindf^l of them in his mercies, they must be mindful of him in their business.

Whereas Angels, which are greater in power and might, bring not railing accusation against them before the Lord.

HEere is an Argument à Majore, against them that inveigh against Authority; in that they take more upon them than the very Angels themselves. First, They are weak; the Angels are powerful. Secondly, They are wicked; the Angels are holy. Thirdly, They are bound with the fetters of Mortality; the Angels cannot die, and are at perfect Liberty. Fourthly, God hath subjected them to Magistrates; the Angels know no Superior but Christ and God himself. Yet these men rail against Rulers, the Angels do not: these dare, the Angels dare not. Plus advert, qui minus valent. The impotent are most audacious.

But this seems marvelous, that the Apostle should acquit the Angels from being contumelious against Magistrates. For why should they be enemies to that sacred order, whereof they know God to be the Author? Why should they use up against that Power, which is joined with themselves in the same Ministry and deputation?

These doubts have made some of opinion, that this is meant of the evil Angels. But that exposition must needs be full of absurdity: for why should he excuse devils from blasphemy, whom he knows to be the fathers of blasphemy? Or make Satan so favorable and modest, as if he durst not meddle with kings? Whereas his malice is deadly against all men, but most impetuous and violent against Princes. Every kingdom on earth is an eye-sore to the kingdom of hell. Government conformes men to civil obedience and peace; both which are hateful to the fountain of sin and fedition. It is his main policy, to bring in anarchy and ataxy. Give him but way to break our ranks he will soon rout and vanquish all our forces. He fears not to curse nor cross any king upon earth, that is not afraid to blaspheme the King of heaven.

It must therefore be understood of the good Angels. But why are they justified from the blasphemy of Princes? Kings are their special charge, they are the invisible guard of Majesty: Protection they afford, never malediction. Answer, Distinguendo tempora, concurrent omnia. Let us distinguish of the time, and all will be easy. In those times, the Magistrates were cruel, bloody, savage wolves, sucking the goare of Christians, haters of the Gospel, enemies of Jesus Christ. Now the holy Angels had the custody of the Church, the tuition of every believing soul. Therefore those tyrants, that so persecuted their charge, must needs be hateful to them. Yet they so qualified their just displeasure, that while they abhorred the Princes, they honored the Principalities: they hated the men, as the instruments of the devil: revered the Dominion, as the ordinance of God. This moderation is in the blessed Angels; yet such fury is in human or rather inhumane beasts.

This I take to be true sense. For the Power and Might of Angels, how far one is more puissant than many men, and how innumerable those armies be; I refer you to some of my former Tracts. Their Power makes for our comfort, being exercised in our protection. In our infancy, devils assault our cradles; as a Familiar was said to remove Mauritius in his swathbands; but Angels beat them off, as Abraham drove the fowls from the sacrifice. In our strength, devils strive to pervert our goings; persuading us to leap from pinacles, to attempt impossibilities or dangers: Angels then keep us in our ways. Devils would devour our substance, children, servants as they did spoil Job: Angels defend us from their rage, as they did defend Jacob. The Pestilence rageth in the streets, Angels keep it from the tabernacles of the righteous. Devils seeke the ruin of kingdoms; it was Satan that tempted David to number his people, by which he lost such a number of his people: Angels fight for their defense, as that Angel did for Israel against the Prince of Persia. Angels were the Ministers of the Law, an Archangel the messenger of the Gospel, he that was Gabriel, which signifies, the strength of God, came to bring news of the God of strength. One Angel slew one hundred eighty five thousand enemies in one night: one Angel cheered millions of souls by the tidings of one day. This is their Might, and this is their Ministry ordained for our good by the God of mercy.

Whereas the Angls, &c.] Angels do reverence to the institution of God; and are so far from accusing bad governors before the Lord, that they honor their Principality in the world. Indeed evil Magistrates have plagues enough waiting upon them; more than pleasures or flatterers. Heliogabalus thought by the policy of his head, to prevent the extraordinary hand of God: he provides himself silken ropes, golden swords, poison in Hyacinths, a turret plated with gold, and broidered with precious stones; thinking by some of these engines to have ended his irksome life: yet he died the death that God had appointed him. But Angels are not enemies to Sovereignty: there is order among themselves; some are higher, some lower; and they obey one another, if not ex praecepto, yet ex consilio.

The world could not consist without order: this sublunary globe depends on the celestial; superior causes guide the subordinate. At the first was one confused heap of materials, but then it could scarce be called a world. God's fiat, which did put an order, visibility, and harmony to things, made it a world. Inequality is the ground of order; one star differs from another star in glory: and this was with God's approbation in the review. If the elements were of equal force, none more operative than another; the world would be like a sea becalmed: fire should have no predominance; nor heat, the parent of generation, above unactive moisture; nor Summer be distinguished from Winter. There must be a disparity among men; all may not be rich, nor all Rulers: but some to command, some to obey; some for the Throne, some for the mill. Unisons make no good music, nor is equality any degree to perfection. The Host of heaven knows and keeps the rules of subjection and superiority: there be Two great lights; the Sun to govern the day, and the Moon the night. But for this Entaxy and orderly disposition, all would fall to ruin.

The Angels bring not railing accusation against them before the Lord.] Of this that our Apostle sets here down generally, Saint Jude gives a particular instance. Michael the Archangel, when contending with the devil, he disputed about the body of Moses, durst not bring against him railing accusation, but said, the Lord rebuke thee. Give me leave a little to insist on this example. The occasion of this strife was about the body of Moses. Why, what did Satan care for the carcass of Moses, when his soul was gone to glory? That old politician had a reach in it. Moses though he were often despised living, was highly revered being dead: and they that said of him while he was in the Mount, As for this Moses, we know not what is become of him: could wish, when he was taken to the mount of heaven, would we had our Moses again. If therefore the devil could have found out Moses his sepulcher, he would have brought a number of Idolaters to the worship of his bones.

From hence arose this disputation betwixt the lost and the blest Angel: Satan examining the cause, why the body of God's so famous servant should be buried in oblivion; offering himself to the search of that holy dust: Michael withstands him, and reproves his sawciness in seeking for that which God's infinite wisdom had concealed.

Moses doubtless, was buried with honor: the same God, that by the hand of his Angels carried up his soul to glory; did also by their hand carry his body to sepulture. Angels bear up innumerable souls to heaven; we never read them (unless probably here) the bearers of human bodies to their graves. Yet thus was Moses honored: those hands that had taken the Law from God himself, those eyes that had seen his Presence, those lips that had so often conferred with him, that face which did so shine with the reflection of his glory; may not now be neglected, when the soul is gone. God took charge of him enclosed within his mothers ribs, kept him from those Egyptian butchers in her arms; preserved him among the bulrushes, maintained him in the world; therefore he will regard the carriage of him out of the world. None of his friends shall be troubled about his funerals, God himself will be at all the cost. Such is his love and care of his own, that it never ceaseth, neither in life nor in death, nor after it. Herein he directs us by his own example, to bring the bodies of our friends to the grave with honor. Birds die; we find not many of their bodies; it is likely that they go into holes, and there end. Nature requires Burial.

If men had been employed in making this grave of Moses, the place might have been known. But he dies in the Mount alone; Angels wrap up his corps, dig his grave, cover it again; and it is likely, perform his obsequies with the solemn hymns of heaven. God purposely conceals this treasure, both from men and devils; that he might both cross their curiosity; and prevent their superstition. Yet that divine hand, which locked up this Jewel, keeping the key himself; afterwards brought it forth glorious. When Christ was transfigured, this Body which was hid in the Valley of Moab, appeared on the hill of Tabor. To give us assurance, that the bodies of Saints, when they are deposed, are reposed; and shall be as surely raised in glory, as they were laid down in corruption. Let all this teach us four things:

1 That Satan is so far from having power over us living, that he cannot touch our bodies being dead; yea, he cannot find them, when God will conceal them. How tame and poor a thing is that roaring lyon, when the Lamb over-awes him? He cannot touch a beast of our herds, nor an hair of our heads, nor a dust of our carcasses, but by permission. He must first beg leave, and the Lord will give him no leave, to do any harm to his chosen.

2 As the Angels did wait at the Sepulcher of their and our Lord, so I doubt not but for his sake, they also watch over our graves. With how joyful arms do they take up our souls, that have care of our insensible ashes? O, let us not defile these our bodies in life, which even in death are thus honored.

3 Satan is the author of superstition. God forbids it, his holy Angels hinder it; who be they that maintain? If the Lord had liked the adoration of his servants relics; he would never have hidden the body of Moses. There could not have been a fitter object for such a devotion, than the body of such a Saint. Judge then, with what impudence the Church of Rome defends her idolatry to shrines and fragments. God is careful to keep his children from it, they are zealous to persuade their children to it. He hides the whole body of a Saint: but if they can get but the finger, or the toe, yea a nail, a hair; a very straw; they call in their blind Customers as to a fair, and happy be those lips that may kiss it. How ridiculous is it, that a shaving of our Tiburne should be so reverend at Tiber; that a piece of the contemptible galhouse should be worshipped at Rome? Justly herein are they become the spectacles of folly to all the world. John the Baptist hath so many heads, that they cannot tell which is the right. God made him but one, Herod left him none, the Papists (as if he were another Hydra) have furnished him with a great many. Christ's cross is so multiplied, that that which one ordinary man might bear; if the pieces were gathered together, would now build a Pinnasse of an hundred tun. Yet they will tell us, that every shiver came by revelation, and hath done miracles: but this to me appears the greatest miracle, that any man should believe them. It is folly to place Religion in those things, which God on purpose hides from us. It is not his property to restrain us from good. If Relics had been allowable, Moses his body should have been public to all Visitants.

4 After all this, the Angel does not revile the devil, nor curse him with execrations: but remits revenge to the owner, puts over his payment to his Maker; The Lord rebuke thee. Now if an Angel will not curse a devil, a professed and malicious enemy of goodness, of whose amendment there is no possibility: how shall we dare to blaspheme those, who (though for the present finfull enough) may be brought to repentance, and find forgiveness?

They bring not railing accusation against them before the Lord.] From this Angelical moderation, we learn three things: First, not to accuse. Secondly, not to rail. Thirdly, to be afraid of such sins.

1 Not to Accuse. This is one of the most significant names of the devil, to be an accuser of the brethren. Love covers a multitude of sins, malice discovers what should be concealed. Cham makes sport with his Fathers nakedness: Shem and Japheth will hide from others, what they will not see themselves. These are the sons of Noah, yea of God: Cham is not worthy of the one, and hath quite lost the other. Not content only to be a witness of his unnatural sight, he proclaims it, and accuseth his own father. Sin doth ill in the eye, but worse in the tongue. Cur aliquid vidi? was the Poets complaint: his tongue had not thus complained of his eyes, if the trust of his eyes had not been betrayed by his tongue. To have Conscia lumina, might be his fate: but to have patula labia, was his fault. Ungracious Cham saw, and laughed: his fathers shame should have been his: he had his being from those parts that were so deformed; which might have begot in him a secret horror. He is a graceless man that makes sport with the cause of his sorrow. This was bad, but to blab it was far worse: as all sin is a deed of darkness, so to be buried in darkness.

Howsoever it is our fashion, to make ourselves merry with the sins of our brethren; yea (which is more unnatural impiety than Chams) to publish the nakedness of our spiritual fathers to their enemies; and it is a rare merriment that breaks up without some jest or tale of a Priest: yet our tongues offend more in this, than did their hands: the report of sin is often as bad as the commission. A Christian sees his brother fall with sorrow and silence. Shem and Japheth hear and grieve, but dare not see: they will not go forwards to behold it, but backward to hide it: and without daring to look back, they will rather adventure to stumble at their fathers body, than to see his shame. Grieve they did to think that they who had so often come to their holy father with reverence, should now in reverence turn their backs upon him; and clothe him in pity, who had so often in love clothed them. But such was their goodness; they did it, and said nothing. As this commends them, so let it teach us. The sins of those we love and honor, we must hear of with indignation, believe with unwillingness, acknowledge with grief, hide with honest excuses, and bury in silence. For commonly they infect others by example, but always prove us to be uncharitable.

But is it lawful for no man to accuse? Enormities may then pass without censure among us, as murders do in some States without apprehension; where no man will stop the homicide, for fear of being counted a hang-man. Yes, there be some deputed for this purpose. Paul mentions the House of Cloë, from whence he had information of the Corinthian disorders. Answerable to which, we have the office of Church-wardens; they are the house of Cloë; bound by oath to present misdemeanors, that sin may have a just censure. I know that this place may be abused, not only by connivence, but spleen. He that with a particular heart-burning, presents his neighbor, though his accusation be just, his affection is unjust: and in doing that he sins, which he had sinned in not doing. The complaint may be true, and the complainer false. The one is punished, the other cannot be commended. When Paul bad them salute with a holy kiss, he implied, there is a kiss that is not holy. Informers of penal statutes make often just complaints; but because their end is not the correction of faults, but fishing for the mulcts, or wreaking their spleenes; they do the office of devils. Yea, there be false Zibaz's, that unjustly accuse honest Mephibosheths, to get away their lands and places. These out-do mischief it self.

But let them accuse to whom it belongs; yet alas, there is an Omnia been, that swallows all vanities. Drunkenness, uncleanness, swearing, profanation of the Sabbath, go abroad all the year: but when the Visitation comes, they are locked up with an Omnia been. This is not that charity which covereth sin, but a miserable indulgence that cherisheth sin. In the Creation there was an Omnis been, all things were exceeding good: in our Redemption was an Omnia been; He hath done all things well; he hath made the blind to see, and the lame to go; Here was an Omnia been indeed; but there never was an Omnia been since. But for private men, falsely or maliciously to accuse their brethren, is to be Satan's deputies. We have a proverb, It is a shame to bely the devil: but they are past shame that bely the Saints. If we will accuse any, let us accuse ourselves. It is for a Pharisee to accuse the Publican, I am not as this man: the Publican doth not accuse the Pharisee, but himself. Satan doth continually accuse us to God; if we humbly accuse ourselves, his Bill shall be thrown out of the Court.

2 Not to rail: this is indeed properly the language of hell. Angels do not rail, devils do: Angels do not curse, devils do. You need no other proof, who be the children of Satan, than railing invectives. You may know what Country-men they are, as the wench said of Peter, For their speech bewrayeth them. The language of heaven is praise and Hallelujahs, no execration was ever heard there. The language of hell is cursing and gnashing of teeth. Alas, that such a language should be heard upon earth! Think of it, ye inhumane scolds, and graceless blasphemers; who are able to turn the calmest Thames to a tempest; who as if you had been bred only among Bears, know no other dialect than roaring, cursing and banning one another: it is the tongue of hell you speak, as men beforehand learn the language of that country, whither they mean to travel. Ishmael was a foe to all men, and no man was Ismaels friend: you have abused all; sworn away the fear of God, the love of man, the guard of Angels: what friends can ye now expect, but they that speak like you; devils? If a man be evil, why do ye curse him? It is Satan's desire to wish a man worse; and it is your own common saying, Do not curse him, he is bad enough. If he be good, why then do ye curse him? Your curse is an arrow shot against a stone, Resiliens percutit dirigentem, it shall wound yourselves. Some having begun to curse, though they meant it at man, yet suddenly divert it to Satan; but let them read and tremble: When the ungodly curseth Satan, he curseth his own soul. The devil delights to hear us curse him: that Fox never fares better, than when he is curs'd. But put away all bitterness, and if you must be bitter to some, be bitter to your own sins. Rent your hearts, whose tongues have rent the glorious Name of your Maker. Remember the penitent Publican; because he had thought sin, he smote his breast: because he had spoke sin, he taught his tongue to confesse: because he had acted sin, he stroke with his hand, the instrument of action.

Now, if it be so wicked to revile equals, what is it to rail at Princes? which is the heart of the Text. Will you see the odiousness of this sin in one example? Shimei cursed David, Come out thou bloody man, and thou man of Belial. It was bad to curse, worse to curse a king, but to curse an afflicted king, worst of all: addere gravato gravamina, and to persecute him whom God had humbled. Every word was a slander: he calls him an usurper, a man of blood, and that of Saul's house; how false! God sent for him out of the fields to be anointed, how was he as Intruder? The man after God's own heart, is branded for a man of Belial. He that regretted for but the cutting off Saul's garment, is reproached as a man of blood. If his hands were stained with blood, it was not of Saul's house. It was his servant, not his master, that bled by him. But malicious men care not for truth, but for spite. Did not David shed the blood of that Amalekite, who did but say, he shed Saul's? How did he bewail the death of so bad a master; wishing that no dew might fall, where that royal blood was poured out? How indulgent was he to the house of Saul? How did he honor Mephibosheth at his own table? How did he revenge the blood of Ishbosheth, though his rivall, upon his murderers? who could less deserve these aspersions than David? Had Shi'e been other than a dog, he had never so rudely barked at a harmless passenger. That head deserved to be tonguelesse, that body to be headless, that thus blasphemed the Lord's Anointed. Cursing is for hell; but let all those learn to bless, that look to be heirs of the Blessing.

3 We must be afraid of these impreties, as being always before the Lord. A good man would not admit them, were he sure that God would never take notice of it: but Before the Lord, who dares rail on his delected Image? There is a fear from entire nature; this was in Christ: every Creature fears the ruin of it self. There is a fear from corrupt nature; which is a slavish dread of the punishment, not of the sin: this is in reprobates. There is a fear of Grace, which works in all, men and Angels, a care to please their Maker. Corrupt fear dreads the penalty, loves the sin. Gracious fear dreads the sin, and scapes the penalty. The fear of the Lord is pure, because it keeps the heart from being defiled. When God said, Who shall seduce Ahab? not one Angel in the whole Host of heaven gave him an ill word, though he were a wicked Prince: not one is willing to undertake this office. Only the Father of lies puts himself forward, I will do it.

The good Angels fear to do evil, yea, the very devils believe and tremble; and shall not man be afraid to sin? Shall a piece of mortal dust be thus insolent? O we want their eyes, to behold the infinite Majesty of that God whom we offend: we know not the sweet pleasures of heaven, and the beatifical vision of the Trinity; as the Angels do: if we did, how would we fear to lose it by our sins? we know not the torments of hell, the eternity and extremity of that fire, as the devils do: if we did, we would fear to incur it by our sins. If the king threatens a malefactor to the dungeon, to the rack, to the wheel; his bones tremble, a terrible palsy runs through all his joints. But let God threaten the insufferable tortures of burning Tophet, the wicked (as if either they were just, or this were false) stand unmoved. Bee not deceived, It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God, who is even a consuming fire. Hear this, ye that dare rail, and not be afraid: that dare blaspheme, and not tremble: that dare rebel, oppress, riot, adulterate, plot revenge, and what not, without fear. The Angels are afraid, yet they are in heaven, and sure of the best: the devils are afraid, yet they are in hell, and know the worst: you are betwixt both, and know not which of both shall be your receptacle. O pass the time of your sojourning here in fear: fear the works of darkness, as you fear the place of darkness: fear the Lord, that he may love you; and love him, that he may delight to do you good.

But these as natural brute beasts made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand not, and shall utterly perish in their own corruption.

When sin grows insolent, it is time for Preachers to be fervent: sinners must not live like beasts, and be flattered like men. If the Princes of Israel pamper their flesh with the food of riot, the Prophet will not stick to call them the fat Bulls of Bashan. The Apostle is not afraid to put the deserved title of Bruits upon these graceless deceivers. Never was that man meal-mouthed, that was full of the Lord's errand. Do we herein displease any? Should we please men, we were not the servants of God: should we please beasts in the shapes of men, we were the servants of Satan. Shall we walk in the spirit of falsehood, and prophecy of Wine and strong drink? This were to be a beast for company. But, as we hope, you have no will to be such hearers: so blessed be God, we have no skill to be such Preachers. Bishop Latimer in his ultimum vale to the Court, protested that if he should say nothing the whole hour together, but the very words of his Text, Beware of covetousness; his Sermon might be thought witless, not needless. We may say the like of the vice in my Text, Intemperance; it were not lost labor, nor misspent time, to say nothing else, till we had all amended that. But as some seed is sown among thorns, which prick the sides of the sower: so much, by the high way, which for want of mould and root, the fowls of the air, boone companions pecke up. The bellows are burnt, but the wicked are not turned. It seems, the Prophet had burnt a hole in his bellows, gotten the consumption of the lungs, spent his spirits, and lost his labors. This is our unhappiness, but more yours. Ministers (as Christ did to the Jews) offer the world wine: and the world (as the Jews did to Christ) return them vinegar. What we give with the right hand, they take with the left: we are borne for the good of many, few are borne for the good of us. But howsoever we speed, God's message must be delivered: we dare not but call sinners by their names; unnatural men, natural beasts.

These damnable seducers are here described further, by their

- Resemblance, As natural brute beasts.
- Ordinance, Made to be taken and destroyed.
- Ignorance, Speak evil of things they understand not.
- Vengeance, Shall perish in their own corruption.

First, for their Resemblance; wherein I consider two things: Quibus, and In quibus: What they are like, Beasts: wherein they are like them, In Sensuality.

1 What they are like; Beasts. The wicked have many homely comparisons in the Scripture. Sometimes to reprobate silver, which will buy no commodity: sometime to doted trees, good for nothing but the fire. To dung and excrements; yea they are not so useful: for these serve to manure the ground, the other to infect it. Often to Beasts; wherein the Divine Justice shames them, flinging filth in the faces of this degenerate creatures. Peju• ita comparari, quàm esse: it is better to be a beast, than a man compared with beasts. The spirit of beasts is made of the air, and into air it resolveth: it knows nothing but the present, makes no reckoning of hereafter, nor shall hereafter be called to a reckoning for it. They have groveling faces, earth is their Vltimum. Mans body is of a nobler fabric, his very constitution naturally erects him to a higher aim. Besides, his soul, a particle of the Divine breath, is able to discourse, argue, conclude, infer; conceives by reason a future life, to which this but prepares, and which it begins.

Let a beast do a mischief; suppose a Lion kills his prey, he retires to his den, and quietly feeds, without fear of answering for this fact. When man hath done a murder, there is a fury within him, louder than cracks of thunder, sharper than stings of Scorpions; a Conscience awaked by the cry of blood: no beast ever knew what Conscience was. Thus man, having more noble endowments, shames his Creation, by living like beasts. You have read many fables and Apologues, wherein beasts are feigned to speak like men: but who would endure that Theater, where men be seen to play the beasts. Such is the power of sin, it can transform men into beasts: so in a mortal sense, are all those Metamorphoses to be understood, wherein the Poets trans-shaped men into beasts. While Idolaters turn beasts into gods, they turn themselves into beasts.

2 They want not their resemblances, and the similitude holds both generally and specially. Generally, in three things:

The whole intendment of the beast is the belly and groine; so wicked men are wholly led by sensuality. Their soul is made a slave to their sense; and while this rebels, she that worst may, must hold the candle. She thinks of praying; but if the flesh will have it so, there must be singing and dancing: she persuades to fasting, but the flesh hales on to rioting. All her morning care must be to provide the body a dinner: nor is she only made the bodies Cater, but even too often his Pandar.

Beasts cannot praevidere futura, nor providere futuris; they have no providence; but the expectation of the day ends with it: they count not of weeks and years; but only rise and roost with the Sun. So these brutish animals make no other provision. If you say, they can lay up victuals for tomorrow; so do divers beasts: the little Ant fills her granaries in harvest, for the Winter-store. In this they are but even with beasts; and for the fore-sight of vengeance to come, they are no better. Yea, some beasts can prognosticate a storm, and run to shelter: these men provide no refuge, but think to bear off the Judgments of God with head and shoulders. Hares have their muses, and Foxes fore-acquaint themselves with boroughs, whither being hunted they run for succor: these have not a hole to hide their heads. Therefore when conscience begins to thunder, and the torrent roars with an inundation of sorrows; they fly to the fiddle, to the Tavern: which is as if when it rains, a man should run into the Thames to keep him dry. They know no more how their time passeth away, than a beast is able to tell the Clock. Therefore commonly their departure is so sudden, that when they look for a pleasant Peale, behold it is their Passing-bell.

Beasts are not ashamed of their deeds: where is no reason, there is no sin: and where is no sin, there can be no shame. These have reason, yet are not ashamed of their abominations; and therein are beasts, or worse. Yea, the very dog, though he cannot blush, will go away as if he were ashamed, when he hath done a shrewd turn, and is taken in the manner. But these have a meretricious fore-head, stupid and steeled with impudence; shame-proof: there is not so much blood of grace in their hearts, as will serve to make half a blush in their cheeks. Their end will be worse than frontlesse Gehazi's: for want of red, his skin was spotted with white: he strove to out-face Elisha, let him try to out-face the leprosy.

Specially, for some particulars; there is a near similitude of their conditions. As they have matched themselves, so take them by couples.

1 The Goat and the Whore-lover; a pair of unclean beasts; fit for no place but the ragged mountains and deserts. They think wantonness nothing else but the mere appetite of nature. But who be they that shall be set on the left hand, with a Go ye cursed? Goats.

2 The Hog & the Covetous, a pair of odious beasts. They are both rooting in the earth, that's their felicity: both rooting up the earth, that's their mischief: both love to wallow in the mire; none so sordid as the avarous: both will break through all fences, if they be not yok'd: both are hoinish, grunting, and insatiate; neither of thē can endure a partner in their comessation: neither of them both do good while they live, some good may be got from thē both when they are dead.

3 The Wolf and the Oppressor, a pair of ravenous beasts. Both love to suck the warm blood of innocent Lambes, both to fill their holes with rapine: both bark at the Moon, any light that may discover their mischiefs: both are greedy to swallow more than they can digest: both howl when their hopes are disappointed: both live by the spoil, the wolf of other beasts, the Oppressor of his own kind: both do so well match together, that it was good for the land, if they were both hanged together.

4 The Palfrey and the Swaggerer, a pair of unbridled beasts. The horse will cast his rider, and being down, give him a farewell with his heels. For men being reprov'd, to kick at the Messengers of God, is a gallant yet but a Iadish quality. When a bridle of prohibition is put into his jaws, fraena ferox spumantia mandit, he frets and fumes, as if he were so great, that God must not cross him. But all he gets by it is, that when a snaffle cannot rule him, a stronger bit shall be put into his mouth. As we have seen a stomachfull horse, that will not be stopped in his carrier with the sharpest bit; but runs on headily till he comes to some wall or ditch, and then stands still and trembles. Death is that terrible ditch which will stay his fury; he is a headstrong beast, whom that gastly foe cannot break.

5 The Fox and the Cheater, a pair of crafty beasts. Both love to do mischief, neither loves to own it: coozenage is both their trades; they live by it, neither indeed can they live without it. The Fox will stand by the river, and let his tail play in the water, till the fishes come flocking about it; and then with a jerke he swoopes them out. His hole is his study, and the fold his stage, where he plays his part. Herod was such a Fox, but Christ could hunt him out. The Jesuits are such foxes; they will not look towards the bootie they aim at: yet all their labor about your conscience is but to get a benison to their own College. There should be no robbing of the living, to give the dead: but these foxes will allow you no rest, till you give something for Requiem: if a rich Papist do not buy some souls out of purgatory, they doom him to hell. This with them is Pia fraus, but by the same reason, the fox is a pious beast. Would many of our shops were not the boroughs of such foxes: there is no subtlety like that, which deceives a man, and hath thanks for the labor.

6 The Bear and the Whore, a pair of cruel beasts. Both lie at stake, both are to be baited, by all dogs of the game: both their flesh is sold for money, by the Bearherd, or by the Bawd: these gain all; the poor beasts have but abused bodies, the one withal a torn conscience, for their pains. A Strumpet in her malice, is worse than a she-bear robbed of her whelps. She is a thief in her pleasure, but a devil in her anger. She sets a price on her body, she sets no price on her soul: that she sels, this she gives away for naught. Vtrumque animat rabidum, omnivorum: both seldom have any issue: both these beasts stand in fear of the whip.

7 The Viper and the Traitor, a pair of pestilent beasts. We may say of either of them, It is not so much Animal, as Malum naturae. The Female in copulation bites off the head of the Male, prae voluptate: and the brood, Indignam chari mortem ulciscencia Patris, Erosa miser aenascuntur matris ab alvo; revenging the death of their Father, gnaw out the belly of their mother. Such a generation of Vipers were the Pharisees; who wounded the Church with their stings, wherein they were bred. Jesuited Emissaries had first their birth and breeding in the indulgent bosom of England; yet most unnaturally, they betray their own mother to misery and ruin. Pectis acerba boum, pecorique aspergere virus. They are infectious plagues to the families that harbor them; the bane of many poor souls, beside their own.

8 The Asp and the Slanderer, a pair of stinging beasts. So the Psalm matcheth them, The poison of Asps is under their lips. The Asp sucks not her cacochemical poison from her food, but hath it bred in her own nature. The Calumniator derives not his railing venom from the object, for that is commonly good; but makes it in his own bosom. Slanderers are also compared to Scorpions: to avoid whom, men use to place their beds in water; yet the politic serpents have a device to reach them. They get up to the top of the house, where one takes hold, the next hangs at the end of him, a third upon a second, a fourth upon the third; and so making a rope of Scorpions, they at last wound the man. Among scandalizers, one begins a whisper, another makes it a report, a third enlargeth it to a dangerous calumny, a fourth divulges it for truth. So the innocent man's credit is maimed, and he cannot find out the villain that did it.

9 The Frog and the Murmurer, a pair of croaking things. Both of them are bred of the mud, they come from no noble matter. Semina limus habet, virides generentia ranas. Some write, that it raineth frogs; we might think so too by the number of our malcontents; men that will find fault with everything; whom God himself scarce knows how to please. His nec sicca placent, nec quae stagnata palude: no fair weather, nor rain; peace nor war, can satisfy them. There is no work of God, but opens their clamorous throats. In rauco querulae semper sunt murmur ranae. When Bacchus was sent to fetch the Worthier of Eripedes or Aesculus out of hell, as he passed in Charons wherry, he heard nothing but the croaking of frogs: whereby the Poets insinuate what a number of querulous and litigious persons be in hell.

I might add many more; as, First, the Spaniell and the Flatterer, a pair of dissembling beasts: both feed their Masters humor, that he may feed their hunger: both bemire a man with fawning on him. But let the great one use his Sycophant, as he does his Spaniell, and try if he will love him the better for beating him. Secondly, the Squirrell and the Busybody, a pair of nimble and pragmatistical beasts: but the Squirrell is the nimbler and wittier: some write of her, that because she cannot swim well, when she would cross a brook, she gets a piece of the bark of a tree, puts it into the water, and her self into it as in a boat; and then holds up her bushy tail instead of a sails, that so the wind may drive her over. Per varios usus artem experientia fecit, Exemplo monstrante via. The pragmatistical hath an oar in every man's boat, an eye in every man's window; is here, and there, and everywhere, but where he should be: is still busy, yet never hath thanks for his labor. Thirdly, the Civet-cat and perfumed Gull, a pair of sweet beasts: only this sent is natural in the one, in the other artificial: and what the one beast disburdens in scorn, the other takes up in pride.

I might couple the Tiger and the Persecutor; the Boar and the Church-robber; or tell you of Tumblers, beasts that have brought up their bodies to show tricks; of Lurchers, that live by pilfering; of Setters, that will bring the bootie to the thieves hand; Pandars of filthiness. There be Moales, blind earthy Muckwormes: Weasels and vermin, and innumerable human beasts, or bestial men. But who would dwell long among beasts? I am weary of this brutish Comparison. Only there is one among men, for whom I can find no sample among beasts; the Drunkard. I know not with what beast to match him; he is such a beast, that no beast will keep him company. The nearest to him is the Swine, let them two be yoked together.

Now if men think scorn thus to be compared, let them forbear to deserve such a comparison. Yea, let me further aggravate their shame: there be men that exceed even beasts in sensuality. Beasts drink not but when they are dry: the drunkard never tarries till he be athirst. What beast, but he, pours in more, when he hath already too much? Beasts have their times of copulation, and they keep their natural seasons: incontinent man knows no limits, but is infinite in his desires. In many things men are so much worse than beasts, as they ought to be better.

How well soever we think of ourselves, the Scripture sends us to divers beasts for our learning. The very Ants are our schoolemasters, to teach us providence. The Dog is loving to his master, and watchful for his safety. The Horse is valiant, startlesse at the drumme, neighs at the trumpet, is forward to the battle; to shame our cowardice. The Lion is a president of temperance; after a full meal he tyes himself to a three days abstinence: he is liberal, and leaves part of his prey for inferior beasts; condemning those churlish men that eat their morsels alone, and put the reversion in their cupboards. He is full of nobleness, he scorns to seise upon the yielding; whereas men prey on prostrate fortunes. So moderate in his revenge, that he will do a man no more injury, than he receives from him; as some write. The Ape is quick of apprehension, apt for imitation: lewd men will not learn to do good either by precept or president. The Elephant is kind; if he meet a man that hath lost his way; he will both guide him, and defend him. The Ox knows his feeder, to teach us thankfulness. Thus if they may not be Indices, to direct us; they shall be after a sort, Indices, to condemn us; as the Dogs condemned that rich man, who were less costive of their kindness than their master.

Sensuality is the vice here condemned; a brutish conversation of men; who only desire to live, that they may eat and drink: which is indeed to live more belluino. He that hoards corn in the time of dearth, shall be cursed, and he deserves it: yet his winnowed store shall at last break forth: but drunken engrossers diminish our plenty, and stow it where it shall never do good. How many thousands, hard driven with poverty, or by the exigent of war, might be relieved with that these spend like beasts? How just a punishment is famine after such a satiety, and pestilence after famine; turning the sanctuary of life into the shambles of death? Licurgus, to cure the people's drunkenness, caused all the vines to be cut down; he might better have made a well in every vineyard, and married in every cup a watery nymph to fiery Bacchus. In cratere meo Thetis est conjuncta Lyaeo: Est dea juncta deo, sed dea major eo. Immoderation makes vina venena; yea worse: for the worst poison helps some, but the drunkards potion hurts all. Some plead that they are able to bear it out: but to be a strong drinker is but to be a strong beast. The excess is a sin, whatsoever the success be. Whatever be the purpose before, or the event after; yet not the strength in bearing it, but the abstinence from taking it is praise-worthy. How foolish is it, for a little tickling of the palate, for a running banquet, to hazard eternal comfort.

Made to be taken and destroyed.] A fearful saying! what, Conditus ut sit perditus? If we understand it only of beasts, the matter's not great; for they can perish but once, and from their destruction ariseth our preservation. If they be noxious, we are preserved from their mischief: if edible, by their nourishment. When they spend their lives in our service, this was but their end; they were made for the purpose. But that man should be made, to be marred, created for destruction; this is terrible, and (if not warily understood) uncomfortable. Some beasts are made to be taken, not destroyed: some to be destroyed, and not taken: some both to be taken and destroyed. 1 We take the Horse and Ass, we destroy them not; but teach them to carry us, or provision for us. We put their backs to the burden, not their throats to the knife. 2 There be ravenous beasts and venomous serpents, hostile to man, malicious dangers of our life: we seek to destroy them, not to take them. We send our bullets and arrows, the messengers of death, into their bowels; we abhor their carcasses. 3 There be beasts ad esum & usum, as sheep and kine; these we take and kill; the pasture fats and fits them for the table; we feed them, to feed on them. Reprobates are ordained for both: when they have done the devil special service, drawn in his yoke, wrought out their own perdition; then that merciless butcher cuts their throats, and makes himself a meal of their souls.

But let us hold this conclusion; as God made no man for sin, so not immediately for hell. Deus hominem condit, homo se perdit. But how then is it said here, made to be taken and destroyed? This is a point that I did not willingly seek, nor unwillingly find: it stands in my way, and I durst not praeterire insalutatum. For method, first I will lay down some infallible grounds. 2 Answer the objections that quarrel them. 3 Give the sum or clear conclusion. 4 Lastly, apply it to ourselves.

1 God is an absolute Lord over his creatures, and hath as just right of their disposition, as he had power of their creation. Is it not lawful for him to do what he will with his own? Man challengeth authority over his goods, and he may set this vessel on his cupboard, that other on the dunghill. We are God's vessels, he made us, he owes us, hath an incomparable right over us; may he not then dispose us? Man in his family, takes in this servant, turns that out of doors; and this, because he will do so: it were then desperate boldness to deny God the same faculty in his own house. In the world, man kills this beasts, lets alone the other; yet is not counted unjust: now a fly is more worth in respect of us, than we can be in respect of God. In an heap of clay, the Potter sits working, and makes of the same lump in his hand, one part a cup for wine, the other a pot for urine. Far greater is the liberty of God's perfection, and the perfection of his liberty.

2 God is always most just, nor can he do other than what is perfectly good. Goodness is not the Rule of his will, but his will is the Rule of goodness. Non ideo vult quia bonum est, sed ideo bonum est quia vult. His judgments are sometimes manifest, often secret, always wonderful, never unjust.

3 The Will of God is the cause of all causes, in which we must make a stand; and neither beyond it, nor without it, seek for any reason. It is so; why? because he would have it so: why would he so have it? there is no cause of the first cause. The sea, be it never so deep, hath a bottom: the heavens, be they never so high, have a top: but of the will of God there are no limits, no confines. God in all his works seeks for no cause out of himself. The rich man chooseth the object of his charity at his own pleasure: this beggar he makes his heir, not that; and without injury. Yet here may be some cause out of himself: the person whom he adopts, may be more pleasing to his eye, or obsequious to his commands. But the Lord's choosing hath no impulsive cause out of himself; he did not elect men, because he foresaw they would be good; but they are made good by his Election. Nor did he reject others, without respect to their sins.

4 The Lord hath purposed to pass by some men, for the manifestation of his Justice in their deserved ruin: it is his will to suffer some to fall into sin, and for their sin to condemn them. That which is against the Will of God, comes not to pass without the Will of God: he willeth that to be, which he willeth not to do: and though he esteem not evil to be good, yet he esteemeth it good that there should be evil.

5 He hath not ordained any to destruction without the respect of sin: for look what condemneth men in the world, for that did God purpose to condemn them before the world. Not that sin is the cause of this decree, but that this decree is not separated from the regard of sin. He doth not simply and absolutely ordain his creature to hell, but he decreeth punishment with relation unto sin. So then this conclusion is firm; Homo non damnatur propter Decretum, sed propter peccatum.

1 If the Will of God be the energetically operative beginning of all things, [Objection.] then also the beginning of sin. Answ. God's Will is the cause of all things being and existent: a thing is not first, and afterwards God wills it; but he decrees it first, and therefore it is. Now sin is not properly an existence, being, or action; but a defect. There is Ens reale, really and positively: and Ens rationale, in reason only; under which are contained not only notions and relations, but also privations. Sin hath not a positive being, yet is it not nothing; but necessarily follows the absence of righteousness. God made not sin, yet he justly condemneth for sin.

2 But if God suffers man to do evil, is he not the Author of that evil? Answ. No, for he is not bound to hinder it. He doth not give Grace, who can challenge him? Is it not his own? He doth not infuse corruption, he doth not with-hold the occasion. The rider gives his fiery horse the reins, we say he puts him on: the hunter lets slip his dog, we say he puts him on the game. A house is ready to fall, leans on some outward supporters; take away these, the house falls of it self. God forbids sin, the wicked are the more eager on it. As in the middle region of the air, the heat grows stronger by the Antiparistasis or revulsion on every part, and from hence proceed the thunder and lightnings; the clouds being condensated, by the heat round encompassed. So the wicked heart, struggling with the good law, becomes more turbulent and fiery in sin.

3 If God have decreed some to destruction, it must follow of necessity, and so man is damned against his will. Answ. No, for God's decree doth not impose a necessity upon the Will of man. Indeed there is an hypothetically necessity, of consequence: if God deny men his grace, they will sin and perish; but this is their own will: Those whom he hath chosen, shall never be damned; yet with their own will they are saved. The elect Angels do necessarily obey God, yet not by constraint, but willingly. It is one thing to throw a sheep into the river, another thing to show her grass on the other side, and allure her to swim to it. Deus non fieri cogit, quod factum damnat. God's decree doth altogether order every event; by inclining the Will gently in things that be good, and forsaking it in things that be evil. If men will offend, he is just to punish: if they will return, he is merciful to forgive. As he saves none but in respect of Christ, so he condemneth none but in regard of sin. That all mankind was lost, we may thank ourselves; blessed be the goodness of God, that any be saved in Jesus Christ.

4 The Scripture speaks of the Salvation of all men; how then are some made to be destroyed? they urge these places, John. 1.29. John. 3.17. 2 Cor. 5.19. 1 John. 2.2. To which we oppose, 1 John. 5.19. John. 17.9. These we reconcile out of S. August. Totus mundus est Ecclesia, and Totus mundus odit Ecclesiam. The world hateth the world, the malignant world hates the reconciled world; the damned world, the saved world. But God will have all men to be saved. Answ. All is taken either Distributive; then it signifies every particular person. 2 Thess. 1.3. All, that is, everyone. Or Collective, and then it signifies Any one, not Everyone. Christ healed every disease, that is, any disease, or every kind of disease. Every man is a liar, saith the Prophet: now if every man be a liar, then is he a liar that speaks it; and if he be a liar that speaks it, then is it not true which he speaks; so, in that sense, to say that every man is a liar, must be a lie it self. Or, God wills All to be saved, that is, of those that are saved; for none are saved but by his willing it. Or Paul in this, and such other places, speaks according to his own affection, and charitable judgment; as he calls them in divers Churches, men elected; which was his charity, not his certainty. But still God hath his Peculiar people; therefore the rest are common: and at the last day many shall be turned back with a Nescio vos. Perditus est qui natus est, nemo liberatur nisi qui renatus est. Hell was not made for nothing; some must perish.

This then be the sum; God did not make any man for the only purpose to destroy him; but these speeches must be understood by way of consequence, and effect. I came not to send peace, but a sword, and fire, upon earth; saith Christ, and to set men at variance. Yet certainly, this was not the end of his coming; neither sword, nor fire was his intent, but peace: these are produced by accident, and through the malice of Satan and men, do necessarily follow it; therefore he saith, I came to send fire. So the Apostle seeing men so desperately wicked, speaks of their making, according to their present being: as when we see a man perishing, we say, he was borne to this fortune; yet his mother did not bear him to such a purpose. This ordinance he setteth down either by revelation, the Spirit of God so informing him; or by probable conclusion, reason so leading him; they that do such things, shall not inherit the kingdom of God. But for us, we must not peremptorily conclude the destruction of any man, though obstinately wicked: because God is so indulgent to the intervention of repentance. In those dreadful thunders of the Law, where every sentence sounds like the sentence of death, every line is an axe laid to the root of the tree, every word able to affright the Reader: even there, Repentance creeps into the Text, and makes room for her self among all those terrors. In the midst of all those astonishing curses, she finds a merciful place. She turns the stream of anger, the torrent of plagues; and like a strong East wind divides the red sea of God's wrath; till his Judgments, like those waters, stand on heaps, while repentance walks through the midst, and escapes. This is that secret reservation, which the divine mercy hath wrapped up in his menaces; an exception to the general Rule of his Justice. This suspended Nineveh's doom, and stretched out her respite of forty days, to the allowance of forty years. A Prophet tells a king, Thou shalt die, and not live; an Hebrew Pleonasm, for surenesse sake; who could conceive a more absolute speech? yet was there a condition involved, and his days were lengthened. God said to Abimelech, Behold, thou art but a dead man, for the woman which thou hast taken. Yet the event was otherwise, to show that there was an exception enclosed, Unless thou restore her undefiled. To apply all to ourselves:

1 We were never admitted into God's Registerie, to turn over his Rols, and to see what Names he hath written for death, and what for life. Therefore because we know the doom of none, let us pray for all. And (to show how mercifully our Maker means to comfort our hearts) we may be sure of our own Election, sure of others Salvation; we can be sure of no man's reprobation. We cannot say, This man is ordained to be destroyed: we may say of him that brings forth good fruits, This man is ordained to be saved. We may be sure of others Salvation by charity, of our own by Faith: of others by their fruits, of our own by the witness of the holy Spirit. It is true indeed, that neither can apostasy or turning unto sin, alter God's decree for evil; as the Papists make God's Election to depend on man's work; as if he should say; Indeed I determined you to Salvation, but had I known you would have proved so wicked, I would never have done it; now I reverse it. Nor can repentance or turning from sin alter his decree for good: I meant you lost men, but now I see you return, I will accept you to mercy. Far be both these thoughts from us. True conversion may change his sentence, it can never change his purpose.

2 Let this humble our proud hearts, and teach us to pass the time of our sojourning here in fear. They were broken off because of unbelief, thou standest by faith: be not high-minded, but fear. Thou speedest well, insult not over him that speeds otherwise. Vterque merüere vindictam, • non merüicti gloriam: both have deserved punishment, if either be spared, it is altogether of mercy, without merit. Charity is the fruit that grows on the tree of Election. Put on, as the Elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies. We are adjured by our Election▪ Selection, Dilection to be merciful: Elect before time, Holy in time, Beloved at all times. God hath chosen the humble: He regarded the law estate of his 〈...〉. Humility was not the cause of this choice, but this choice comes not without humility. I will mistrust that heart, which in a haughty contempt of others, magnifies himself: it is likely, that man hath chosen himself, not that God hath chosen him. When the lots were cast for a kingdom, many an Israelite stood fair, and flattered himself. Why not I? Modest Saul hid himself, yet God gave him the Crown. It ill becomes a man, even that hath merited honor, to be proud of either his honor or merit. But when an undeserving beggar is pick'd out, and graced above his fellows, if he be proud, his honor will sit unhandsomely on him, because his beggarly heart is still in him. Generally, he that presumes most, speeds worst.

Work out your Salvation with fear and trembling: not with pride and insulting, nor with horror and despairing; but with fear and trembling. By humility in good deeds, and fear of evil deeds, a man may work out Salvation: the other will work him out of Salvation. It is the devils most dangerous assault; You are sure of your Election, know your own name to be written in heaven; and by that title are better than Princes: why do you not take it more upon you, and bear up your head higher? No, Satan, Pride cast thee down from heaven, it will never lift me up to heaven. Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven: the proud in spirit have no such interest; yea, theirs is the kingdom of hell, I am not as other men are, saith the Pharisee; and the clock of his tongue went truer than the dial of his heart: not like other men indeed, for he was like none that should be saved. God hath chosen the weak to confound the mighty, not the mighty to domineer over the weak. An Angel was sent to a city of Galilee: this is God's fashion, to seek out the most despised, on whom to bestow his favors and honors: the cottages of Galilee are preferred to the Palaces of Jerusalem. Pride hatcheth the own ruin; there is never any danger in humility. A tall man comes in at an high door, and he stoops: the door is far higher than the man, yet he stoops: you will say, he needs not stoop: but I hope, there is no harm in his stooping. A man may easily bear himself too high upon God's favor, but his humility shall never hurt him. The foundation of God is certain, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his: and upon this foundation thou standest; yet let him that thinks he standeth take heed lest he fall.

3 Let us shun the means that may bring us to condemnation. Let God alone with his counsels, look we to his Oracles. What he wills us to do, let us do it: what he wills us not to know, let us not seek it. There be three courses which may bring a man to the sentence of reprobation. I speak not so much of God's purpose (sic decrevit) before the world began; as of his sentence (sic judicabit) when the world shall end. First, Infidelity; he that will not believe, deprives himself of all possibility to be saved. Nor is it enough to believe that God sent Christ to save the world, but also to save me. Historical faith may overcome Ignorance, but it is Applying faith that can deliver us from vengeance. Everyone that says he believeth, is not sure to be saved: but he that never will believe, is sure to be damned. Secondly, Impenitency: even believers do sin, but repentance is always blest with forgiveness. But they that live in known sins, without relenting hearts, cut themselves off from the hope of mercy. He that plays on purpose to lose, is not likely to win. Be resolved against transgression, as you would be resolved of your Salvation. We are chosen to be holy, they that never come to be holy, were not chosen. Thirdly, Apostasy; if men turn wholly from God, it is an argument that God did never wholly turn to them. There is a double apostasy; first, of Faith: and this is desperate▪ that man was made to be destroyed. There remains no more sacrifice for his ⋄; because he hath sacrificed his sacrifice, abandoned his expiation. Secondly, of Obedience; and of this backsliding who is not guilty?

There be three forsakings condemned by the Canons and Councils. When a Soldier forsakes his Captain, a Wife her Husband, and a Priest his charge. Which made S. Ambrose and Augustine resolve, that they would never commend uxorem viro, nec militem bello. Now we are all these respects to God. Christ is our Captain, we his sworn soldiers, that have in Baptism took his press-money▪ If we forsake his colors, we are perfidious, and worthy of martial Law. He is our husband, we his Spouse, solemnly betrothed before men and Angel•, we have vowed our loves to him, and to him only: if we break this Covenant, and admit adulterous embraces, we have merited a divorce. His Commandments are our charge, he hath made us spiritual Priests to his Father. Now if, instead of this holy sacrifice, the calves of our lips, the incense of our hearts, the Charity of our hands; we shall offer to other gods; either idols of the water, sensual lusts; or idols of the fire, malice and revenge; or idols of the air, vain honors and secular glories; or idols of the earth, worldly riches; how fearful is the end, even to be destroyed? But let us hold our colors, keep our vows, be faithful in our charges; so (surely) we are made to be saved.

4 Let us be charitable in all our censures of all Christians, yea even of living Pagans, for they may be called. Paul was guilty of Stephens innocent blood; the Church had then small hope of his conversion. Yet even he that sent Stephen before, was ordained to follow after. For this Stephen prayed; Lord, lay not this sin to their charge. Ego patior in carne, isti non pereant in mente. This prayer was heard, that S. Augustine is bold to say; If God had not been so entreated by Stephen, the Church had not been so blessed with Paul. Quô praecessit Stephanus trucidatus lapidibus Pauli, tunc secutus est Paulus adjuvatus orationibus Stephani. Paul helped to make a martyr, and he was made a martyr: he that consented to another's blood in zeal against Christ, did after yield his own blood to be shed in zeal for Christ. Of whom then should we despair? we know not a greater sinner than Paul was by nature, we know not a better Saint than Paul was made by Grace. The foulest rags on the dunghill may be made white-paper. A leprous sinner, more spotted than Naaman, may by washing in the Jordan of penitent tears, become like an innocent child. The barren fig-tree may be recovered: the wild Olive, by a new grafting, may bear excellent fruit: the unhappy boy may make a good man: a four morning may prove a fair day. There is no wound so desperate, but it may be healed, if the Physician of heaven will undertake it. Lord, make them good that are not, and them better that are, through the goodness of him that is best of all, and sufficient for all, even Jesus Christ.

5 Let us make sure our own Election, and we are happy. This we cannot do without a gracious life, and the holy fruits of Obedience: other persuasion is but presumption, and all certainty but a stupid security without this. Esau hath killed Venison, and now comes in blowing and sweating for his reward: he makes himself sure of the blessing, as if he had it before he kneeled for it. What cares he now for selling away his Birth-right, which he shall doubly redeem with the blessing? He sold that in hunger, he shall buy this with pleasure: he parted with that for pottage, he shall recover this with Venison. But what does all this blustering confidence come to? where is his recompense? His Fathers answer is no more but Who art thou? He looks for a benediction, and finds nothing but a repulse. Lewd men, when they think they have earned God, and come proudly to challenge favor, receive no answer but Who art thou? The hopes of the wicked fail them when they are at the highest: whereas God's humble Children find those comforts in extremity, which they durst not expect. An Esau may come in full of the hope of the blessing; but Jacob goes away full of the joy of the blessing. When Joseph brought his two sons to his Father for a blessing; and set the elder by his right hand, the younger by his left; he wittingly stretched his right hand to the younger, his left to the elder. The wicked, like Nasases, press to God's right hand; but he, like Jacob, crosseth his hands. So God dislikes a peremptory presumption, so he blesseth an humble persuasion. No man can be perfectly confident: as no righteousness can be perfect without sin, so no assurance can be perfect without doubting. Take the evenest balances, and the most equal weights; yet at the first putting in, there will be some inequality: though presently after they settle themselves in a just poise. Sin is •loud that often hinders the Sun from our eyes, yet is it still a Sun: the vision or feeling of this comfort may be sometime suspended, the Union with Christ is never dissolved. God will make us feel that we have offended him: but after that sense and humiliation, he will show himself pleased with us in Jesus Christ.

They speak evil of the things that they understand not.] Not to understand, is the infirmity of a man: to speak of that he understands not, is the part of a fool: but to speak maliciously evil, is the part of a devil. They will not understand, they will not be silent, they will not speak well. If they will not know, let them hold their peace; nay, they will speak: but then let them give good words, nay they will speak evil. To be ignorant, and to speak evil; these be both bad single, and asunder: but much worse in composition, when they are found together. First, I will consider them apart.

1 Ignorance; what is there that differenceth a man from a beast, but Reason? No wonder then, if these be here called beasts by the Apostle; they were so termed long before by the Prophet. Man that is in honor, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish. He had the honor of a man; but by losing his knowledge he becomes like a perishing beast: when his knowledge degenerates from reason to sense, from man to beast. Knowledge is threefold: First, Natural, which is common to man and beast: this consists in seeing, feeling, and such sensitive apprehensions. By this the beast hath as prudent an election as man: he skills his own diet, his own physic, builds his own house, avoids noxious things, always as well, often better than man. Secondly, Rationall, which is proper to man; a light of understanding, joined with an election of will; by which he is not only able to choose or refuse, but also to discern the civil or uncivil use of things. Thirdly, Spiritual, which hath a higher fountain, even the Spirit of God. Sense is a mere beasts, Reason a mere man's, divine knowledge is the Christians. This man clearly knows the Author of his Creation, the means of his Redemption, distinguisheth temporal from eternal things; and there sets his heart, where time is no more able to remove it, than the things of time are able to fill it.

Supernatural things are far from these men's understanding; and Quia nolunt intelligere quae sunt Gratiae, amittent sapere quae sunt Naturae. A just plague! He that refuseth the wisdom of a Christian, shall lose the prudence of a man. These foolish monsters are not rare: often do we see Asses, whose backs be laden with gold, feed upon thistles. A beast (I dare not call him man) hath thousands in his purse, yet stints himself to a threepenny meal, and starves his family; that instead of their living, they have their dying from him; they are famished. Yet no beast will pine; while his den is full of meat. How horrible is this curse? because he would not know as a Christian, he shall become more so•tish than a man, yea than a beast. The Philosopher being asked, what was the heaviest part of the earth, answered, That which bears an ignorant person. Better unborne than untaught. Come that ye may hear, hear that ye may learn, learn that ye may practice, and pray that ye may do all.

2 Evil speaking.] Good words never hurt the tongue; and this is a proverb even in their mouths, that have not many more good words to say. Evil speaking discovers an evil heart, as the striking of the clapper doth a broken bell. I• multiloquio stultiloquium, a fool can never be concealed, but by holding his peace. But the dog that snarles and barks where he should fawn, is beaten out of doors for a cur. David sent messengers to salute Nabal, and be railed ‹ › them; Who is David? Good words Nabal; there is nothing more cheap. But how should Nabal appear what he was, but by his foul language? He that considers the quality of David's followers, must grant it worthy of a fee, that Nabal's flock lay safe in Carmel; but more, that David's soldiers were Nabal's shepherds. That his she•pe were safe, he might thank his shepherds; but that his shepherds were safe, he might thank David's soldiers. This kindness deserved part of the feast; yea, even to be set at the upper end of the Table, as his principal guest. Not to touch his flocks, was a favor: but to keep them, a merit. Our preservers are a second kind of Creators; and well may we afford our superfluities, where we owe ourselves. Yet Nabal refuseth to give anything but what he was wont; bad words. David asks him bread, and he gives him stones. If he would not part with his riches, yet he might have yielded fair speeches, and been never the poorer. But how should he speak any other language, to whom blasphemy is his mother-tongue? When poor wretches beg of such men, this is all their alms. Yet better fare they that can say, Be warmed, be filled. But if those verbal Almoners shall hardly answer for their uncharitableness; what shall become of them that curse and rate the needy souls; whose charity is cruelty, trampling upon those that God hath humbled? If they be thus punished that heal only with good words, how shall they be tormented that wound with evil?

3 Combined: they are both bad enough asunder, but together most mischievous. Bitter censurers are either proud, or guilty, or fools. Proud; I am not as this Publican: What had the Pharisee to do with the Publican? O, his own Jewel of Sanctitie wanted the due luster, till such a foil did set it off. Guilty; they that accused the woman deprehended in adultery, had not been so hot, had themselves been innocent. But now, their mouths were full of her iniquity, and empty of their own: till Christ wrote them deeper in their consciences, than his finger did those characters in the dust. Fools; as here; Culpant quod nesciunt. The truth of God shall never want enemies, while the father of falsehood wants not blasphemies. Where did Christ's Ministers ever set their feet, but the devil also landed his soldiers to encounter them? Pede pes, & cuspidē cuspidis. Old Father Simeon might truly think; that as all eyes before had not been like his eyes, Waiting for the Consolation of Israel: so nor all arms afterward should be like his arms, ready in the Temple to embrace it. No, Christ was appointed 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, for a mark of Contradictions. This was no news in Stephens time: that noble Protesilaus in the Grecian Fleet, the foremost Champion of the Christian Church, that fought for the Name of Jesus unto blood; told them to their faces; that they had always resisted the holy Ghost. The tongue is a sword still unsheathed; and many will speak, that dare not strike. Take here two observations:

1 The nature of truth, and the nature of man's Intellect, are agreeable, if this latter be not fore-staid with prejudice. But Palato non sano pena est panis, qui sano est suavis. He that is resolved to be ill, refuseth to understand goodness: therefore dislikes it, before he knows it; as one censures a book before he opens it, or reads a sentence. These deceivers had read the rudiments of licentiousness, with the spectacles of self-love: and now to hear of authority and civil government; and above all, that the holy Ghost should sit in the Chair, to cross and unreach their principles; this makes them fret and chafe. Would they but yet allow it a day of hearing: no law condemns a man till he comes to his answer: no, maledicere volunt, nolunt intelligere. These be they that stare upon the Ministers of the Gospel as prodigious, hiss at them as ridiculous, shun them as infectious, account them piacular, pestilential, execrable fellows: but wisdom is justified of her children. The Lord will show, with great advantage of glory, through all this reluctance, how little he needs the help of his friends, or cares for the malice of his enemies. Insapientes in peccato shall be made Intelligentes in supplicio: the eyes that willful malice hath shut, hell-flames shall open: and the tongue that would condemn what it knew not, shall feel what it would not.

2 This is a most unhappy fault, when the tongue over-runs the eyes, speaks and never takes advice of the heart. The Jews thought the Gospel a stumbling block; the Greeks, foolishness: the first, that it did block up their way: the other, that it was too poor for their learning: yet neither of them knew what it was. The golden Indies were offered to divers Princes; they vilipended it, and never saw it: yet the wealth was worth their labor that undertook it. The Gospel is a hidden treasure, the world scorns it: alas, the world never understood it: they that have found it, do justly scorn the world in comparison of it. Some think it will impoverish them: they know not that, beside the kingdom of glory, it even centuples their estate here on earth. Others think it makes men melancholy: they know not that it rejoiceth the heart. This was the rashness of Rome, and the shame of their Tridentine Council; that they condemned the Protestants for heretics, and yet never would hear what they could say for themselves. What is this, but to speak evil of the things they understand not? In the fourth Session it was decreed, that no man should give any other interpretation of the Scriptures, than what was consonant to the doctrine of the Roman Church. Thus instead of measuring their doctrine by the Rule, they measured the Rule by their doctrine: and condemned they knew not what. When we teach, that it is impossible for man to merit of God, or before him to be justified by his works: they cry out that we condemn all good works.

Thus sin doth not want entertainers: he that will be sober, when others bezzle; that will pray, when others play; or reprove a swearer, is branded with the name of Puritan: alas, they speak evil of that they understand not. Shall this indignity cast upon holiness, make it vile in our eyes? No, but as Tertullian reasoned, That must needs be good which Nero persecutes: so, it must needs be excellent, that such malicious fools would disgrace. They have sworn to keep the commandments, and to deny the world; yet are not content with their own disobedience, unless they cast aspersions upon them that obey. God either open their eyes, or stop their mouths, that they may cease to speak evil of the things which they understand not. Let this teach us.

1 To seek understanding above treasures: indeed Doing makes a man blessed: and though he were able to dispute de quolibet Ente, knew all that is knowable; secrets of State, rules of Policy, mysteries of Science; yet he might bless himself, without being blessed of God. But still the foundation of obedience must be laid in knowledge: for if a man take his mark amiss, he may shoot wrong all the actions of his life. Happiness is like a stake set up in the midst of a field, which blinded men grope after, to make the beholders sport in their wanderings. Knowledge must be the Pilot of devotion: superstitious works are but the whelps of ignorant zeal. As Christ said of his murderers, Lord, They know not what they do: so our Apostle here of the Truths adversaries, Lord, They know not what they say. He that knows what he does, and does what he knows, is likeliest to be accepted with God.

Worldlings cry up practice, to cry down knowledge: as cunning Papists will extol Saint James, only to disparage Saint Paul, or as idle Protestants commend Reading, to disgrace Preaching: they talk of a good meaning, when they are the worst doers in a country. This is the devils Sophism: if he can put out our eye of knowledge, the more we do, the better he likes; as knowing all such works to be his own service. Knowledge indeed covers our earth, as waters the sea: but yet are there no dry rocks in the midst of the sea: The greater number are not unlike the horse in the story; which a man seeing in the market, liked, for his proportion, his pace, his color: and having bought him, desired to know what fault he had. The cunning Courser told him none but that he was a Darke gray: he meant that he had bad eyes; his color might be gray, but the horse was blind: so many men have pace enough, if it were in the right way; their feet are swift, but to shed blood: their proportion is answerable, they are able to do well; their riches and means are sufficient: and they color for it, having a form of godliness, a show of devotion: but their eyes be bad, dark and mopish, to understand that should make them truly blessed.

2 Seeing they speak evil of that they know not, let us speak well of that we know. It is a shame, that our zeal should not be as courageous to defend the truth, as their malice is violent to oppose it. He is a coward, that lets a good cause fall, when he sees another resolute in a bad. A reprobate may sometimes lend the truth his voice; but either he higgles with some hollow reservation, or lispeth with some faltring equivocation; or if his lips be of his hearts opinion, it is extortum testimonium; God hath wrung it out of him, by some conflict, arrest, racking, and conviction of his conscience. So the Magicians of Egypt were forced to confess, This is the finger of God: so Julian was compelled to cry, Galilean, thou hast overcome. They that will speak the evil they should not, shall be driven to speak the good they would not. Caiaphas shall approve that Christ in the Chair, whom he condemns on the Bench. Balaam shall bless those for nothing, whom he was hired to curse. Such transient revelations may glide through them; themselves in mean time as wise as trunks. But this is Coacta confessio; the Almighty's advantage: For their god is not as our God, even our enemies themselves being Judges. Nulla est victoria major, quàm quae confessos animo quoque subjugat hosts. If they speak well of goodness, it is against their wills; but naturally they blaspheme it. For old Physic to find fault with the new way of Paracelsus; or the old Astronomy to be displeased at the opinions of Copernicus; there was some color: for the Professors of the former understood the errors of the latter, and could pick just quarrels against them. But for corrupt nature, called the old man, older in everyone of our acquaintance than Religion or Reason; to condemn the Doctrine of Salvation, before it be examined; this is that brutish devilish malice here worthily exposed to contempt.

A free voluntary acknowledgement of the Truth, becomes the mouth of a Christian. Such as Peters was, Thou art the very Christ; the Son of the living God; which was the Revelation of God, not of flesh and blood. He that opened Simon's heart, to pour in that happy learning; untied Simon's mouth, to pour forth that happy language. As no man can see the Sun, but by the light of the Sun; so no man can call Jesus the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost.

They shall utterly perish in their own corruption.] This is the common term of sin: what compasses and aberrations soever it fetcheth, huc tendit, this is the Center of it; Destruction. There be divers circuits, thwartings, and contrarieties in sin: yea, all wickedness is in the extremes. Nothing is more opposite, than gripulous avarice and riotous profuseness, than cunning hypocrisy and notorious profaneness, than pride and nastiness, than presumption and despair, levity and obstinacy: yet are all these reconciled in one place; like men that go about several businesses in the morning, yet meet together at night. One kingdom is too narrow for them on earth, a little corner of a dungeon confines them together in hell. As several malefactors have done several facts, in several places; one hath stolen, another slain, a third ravished; one robs by land, another by sea: yet they are all brought to one prison, and executed on one galhouse; the same destruction devours them all. There is but one, and that a narrow path to heaven; innumerable and those broad ways, rodeways to hell. One of these iniquities might have served the turn, to bring these reprobates to perdition, Vncleanesse would have done it, they needed not have been rebels: presumption would have done it, they needed not uncleanesse: self-will was sufficient, without presumption: their ignorance, without their malice: their brutishness would have spared all the rest; any one was enough to do it. Only the number and measure of torments is according to the multitude and magnitude of offenses.

Some go to hell upon the rack, others on a down-bed: the former suffer much, that they may suffer more; as Bulls are first baited, that afterward they may be killed. As the godly, through *many tribulations enter into the kingdom of heaven; so sometime the wicked through many tribulations enter into the kingdom of hell. What a deal of pains doth the covetous man take for his own damnation? He scarce wears a good garment, or eats a liberal meal, or takes a quiet sleep; but torments himself to get that, for getting whereof he shall be tormented. Some slide thither on a bed of roses; they will pamper their bodies while they have them, suffer their affections to want no indulgence, will not give their conscience leave to speak, but drown it with the noise of jollity. But what benefit is it, to have ones throat cut with diamonds, or to be shot to death with pearls, or smother'd with Cassia? Destruction is too dear a price for any sin. The condemned man will scarce eat the best dinner with a cheerful stomach. Yet this is the impenitent sinners dire catastrophe; *utterly to perish in their own corruption.

All I purpose to observe from it, may be reduced to these three conclusions. First, that sin naturally begets punishment; if they do these things, they shall be destroyed. Secondly, that forbearance is no acquittance; if not presently, yet they shall perish. Thirdly, that wickedness makes the own scourge, they shall perish in their own corruption.

1 No cause doth more necessarily produce the proper effect, than sin doth naturally beget punishment. This David could easily presuppose, when the Land was plagued with a three years famine: never came Judgment from God, but some provocation from man went before: therefore seeing the plague, he inquires for the sin. The hand of Divine Justice never makes man smart without cause. When we suffer, our question should be, what have we done? Teaching our repentance to examine the foundation of all our evils. When famine is upon our land, one complains of hoarding, another of transporting, the Almanac talks of plants and conjunctions; but the Christian complains of sin. He looks higher than the constellations, and sees a just hand scourging rebellious wickedness; overruling all second causes to be his executioners. Natural men are Moles to spiritual objects: but the weakest regenerate eyes can pierce the heavens, and espy God in all earthly occurrences. Famine never cleansed the teeth, that were not before furr'd and fouled with excess. The Pestilence never raged, but blasphemy, uncleanness, and such noisome sins begun the infection. The sword never prevailed, but sin did set an edge upon it. The fire never consumed, but sin blew the coals. God indeed is the Judge of all, but sin is the cause of all.

The wicked, here, are the beasts to be hunted, sin is the game; when that game is up, the Takers are ready, and wait but the word, Nunc capite: those blood-hounds are under collar, if God let them slip, they are instantly on.

Temporal misery is one Taker; in whose terrible army march fear, disquietness, poverty, sickness, and innumerable sorrows. This often takes a man, when it does not destroy him. When it takes an elect vessel in hand, it scowres him like a quarterne ague, shakes every joint, tames his proud heart; but withal consumes up his surfeits and corruption; and restores him a weaker sinner, but a better man. But it takes the wicked, like the stone or the racking gout; and that without both strength of resistance, or provision of patience.

Death is the next Taker, compared to a Horse; a fierce, strong, warlike, and speedy creature; whose neck is clothed with thunder, and he swallows the ground as he goes. Hazael could not outrunne him, Absalom could not outride him; Pharaohs chariot wheels fell off in the chace. Jonathan and Saul, swift as Eagles, strong as Lions, yet were slain by this Taker. He takes any man, at any time, in any place: in bed, he takes men before they can rise; abroad, and gives them not leave to come home: he often takes the drunkard at his cups, the worldling telling his monies: and these he takes with terror; even by the throats, as that unmerciful creditor arrested his fellow, Pay that thou owest. But you say, Death takes also the godly: indeed they rather take him, for Christ hath made him their vassal.

Satan is the last and worst Taker; misery takes from prosperous sin, sickness takes from misery, death takes from sickness, Satan takes from all. Thou fool, this night shall they take thy soul from thee. O who can tell the horror and astonishment of that soul, which no sooner leaves the body, but is apprehended by this Taker. If we could conceive the least pang of that fever, how odious would our most pleasing sins appear to us? For a living man to be cast into a nest of vipers, asps, or scorpions, is terrible enough: yet alas, all their stings be but as gentle ticklings to these dragons. This is that perishing, that utter perishing, which is here the wages of obstinate sin.

2 Forbearance of punishment is no argument of immunity; though not presently, they shall perish. The Judgments of God are sure; if they be late: and as they are facti ad capturam, so destinati ad horam, which they shall not escape. David made a rode upon the Geshurites and Gerzites, destroying them with such an universal slaughter, that he left none to report what he had done. How many hundred years had that brood of Canaanites lived securely in their country, since God had commanded their rooting out? The Israelites had their hands full, and could not meddle with them: the Philistines were th•ir friends and would not meddle with them: and now knowing no grudge betwixt them and their neighbors, they promise themselves a certain peace. Loe even then, least suspecting it, are they cut off by David's sword, and none left alive to tell the news. When the oracle of God was inquired for the reason of that long famine, the answer was, It is for Saul, and his bloody house, because he slew the Gibeonites. Israel was full of sins besides those of Saul's house, Saul's house was full of sins besides those of blood, much blood was shed by that house besides this of the Gibeonites: where the causes be infinite, God doth justly pitch upon some: it is favor not to punish for all. Joshua had sworn a league with Gibeon four hundred years before; Saul breaks this league and oath: Saul dies, and forty years have passed since this injury: yet now the Lord calls them to a reckoning for it. That sin is not yet expiated, and so occasioneth this late vengeance.

How vainly do men hope to go away with their sins, because wrath is delayed? As if the Ancient of days, to whom all times are present, could forget them. No, when we have forgotten our sins, when the world hath forgotten us, he begins the suit for our arrearages. With men, delay wears things out of memory, and cools the heat of anger: violent passions, like violent motions, are weakest at the furthest: but with God, there is nothing gained by protraction. Sinners may make a truce with heaven, and a league with hell; but The Lord laugheth at them, for he seeth that their day is coming; and is not the further off, because they do not look for it. Sacrilege steals, and goes away merry with it: it never troubles men, that they are privy to this injury; the law cannot touch them: so they live, so they die. But doth God forget it? If they can blot it out of his sight, there is then safety in prorogation. But as the slaughter of the Gibeonites was the sin of one generation, yet required in another: so doth God often make the posterity pay for the iniquity of their forefathers. Therefore our Church teacheth us to pray; Lord, remember not our iniquities, nor the iniquities of our forefathers. When these God-robbers are dead, rotten, and mouldred to dust, this shall be exacted of their children. Men owe us moneys, they die and leave it unpayed; we sue their heirs and executors for those debts, and do not think it injustice so to recover them. Take heed, ye parents, at least you that have Grace enough to love your children; you bequeath them legacies of ruin, while you make up their portions with that unrighteous Mammon, which you have gotten from the poor Minister or neighbor. The torments of hell God will inflict only on the peccant person, but with temporal plagues he visits the succession.

The whole Family of Eli was threatened with sickness, short life, and beggary. This took effect apace; yet Abiathar is left, through the reigns of Saul and David he escapeth: hath God forgotten his sentence? No, even Abiathar shall be deposed by Solomon, and sent to Anathoth, and is well that he scapes so. It was fourscore years since that sentence was denounced; yet now it comes to execution. Abiathar is the last of that line; and he shall find that the sin of his fathers house can neither be purged with sacrifice, nor obliterated with time. Delay of the Judgment that shall come, is neither any hindrance to God's Justice, nor comfort to men's miseries. Shimei had reviled David in the conspiracy of Absalom, yet he pays for this in the reign of Solomon. Abishai would have requited him while the wound was green, and might not: Benaiah is commanded to do it, now after long festering. Still the stones which Shimei threw at David, were to rebound upon Shimei, and split his heart. He was an example to these, as these are to us: he railed, so do they: he blasphemed the King, these speakevil of dignities: he perished for it, so do they. And if God so plague the insolencies against his Deputies, how will he revenge blasphemy against himself? Tremble ye cursers and swearers, so execrable is your sin, that God hath vowed not to hold you guiltless. If God pay slowly, yet he will pay sure.

Sometimes he allows iniquity a shorter breathing; and even while the viols call to dancing, or the Trumpets to drinking healths, Belshazzar hath his sentence. No sooner were the bellies of Adonijah's guests full of meat, but their ears were full of clangor, their hearts of horror: the trumpets at once proclaim Solomon's triumph, and their confusion. The feasts of the wicked end in terror; after the meal is done, ever comes the reckoning. No doubt, but many a health was drunk to Adonijah, many a confident applause of their prosperous design, many a scorn of the adverse faction. But now the voider that takes all away, is fearful astonishment, and expectation of just revenge. How suddenly are all their hearts cold, all their faces pale? every man hath but life enough left to run away. God can as easily prevent the mirth of the wicked, as mar it: but he suffers them to please themselves in the vanity of their own courses for the time, that their conclusion may be more grievous. Bravery is but a poor target to bear off judgment.

3 Obstinate sin would make the own rod, were there none prepared. He that enters into a Statute, and performs not the defeisance, we say, his own hand hath undone him. When we look upon the sin first, and then on the punishment; we confess the latter to be but the counterfeit of the former original. This is such a man's own child: why? it is so like him. Pharaoh had groaned under plagues enow; he saw his cattle struck dead with a sudden contagion, he saw his sorcerers (after all their contestation) struck with a scab in their very faces; yet his heart is not struck with repentance. Who would think it possible, for a heart of flesh not to yield at these Judgments? We cannot tell whether to wonder more at the plagues themselves, or their success. The Grace of God resisted, turns to desperateness; and wicked men, like some beasts, grow mad with baiting. They cannot be quiet, till they have wrought out their full destruction. Therefore the fearefullest plagues God reserves for the upshot; all the former do but make way for the last. Golia might have fought in the battle, and escaped; but he must needs challenge his own ruin, by defying the host of God, yea the God of hosts. His own sword shall serve to behead the master. What need David load himself with an unnecessary weapon? one sword can serve both Goliath and him. Goliath had a man bear his target, but David had Goliath to bear his sword. So just is God, to turn wicked men's forces against themselves; and to make his enemies carry about with them their own destructions.

The Amalekite, a pick-thank, thought to curry favor and to insinuate himself to the heir apparent, by bringing the news of Saul's death. His thoughts project thus; to report the fact as done by another, were but to go away with the recompense of a lucky Post: whereas to take the action upon myself, to say, I am the man, must needs endear me to him; David is beholden to me for the Kingdom: my requital cannot but be richly honorable. Thus he laid a plot to destroy himself: his hand was not guilty, his tongue was; and he dies for it. If he did it, his fact was capital: if he did it not, his lie was capital: howsoever, for an unjust practice, he received a just sentence; yea, his own mouth condemned himself. Men think it a dainty cunning to beguile others, the fine policy of a pure and clean wit to do unsuspected mischief: as if this were not to carry brimstone to their own fire, and to make their own bed in hell. As the godly work out their Salvation with fear and trembling, so the wicked work out their own confusion with lust and presuming. Yea, naturally all run on to their own ruin, unless they be supernaturally prevented by the Grace of God.

To conclude; as we tremble at these Judgments, let us abominate the sins. These reprobates are our examples; if we do as bad, we shall speed worse: and they will welcome their imitators into hell, You come after us, but you shall be preferred before us; and bear so much more torments than we have, as you received more warnings than we had. First, they were Proud; and as pride is the highest sin, so it shall have the lowest fall: the proud scorn to be like men, therefore make themselves like the apostate Angels. Cùm non erunt homines, fiant daemones. Are there none such among us? Yes, their very habit discovers them: they that have put off modesty, will put on any garb of apparel. We should not lie in our words, but painted Jezebels lie in their very faces. As pride is the first step downward to hell; so humility is the first stair upward to glory. Secondly, they were rebellious to Magistrates; let us be obedient. Even the highest Prelates of the Church must stoop to Him, whom God hath set above all. The Lord hath committed the souls of Princes to his Pastors, but the bodies of Pastors to his Princes. Thirdly, they were drunken and sensual beasts, let us be civil men at least. But alas, happy Temperance, whither art thou fled? Sobriety is scarce to be found in the world, but in books. Fourthly, they were unclean; and what Nitre shall wash us? were every river of our Land a Jordan, they could not cleanse it from this leprosy. But alas, we can but plow the ground, it is God that must sow the seed: we do but soften the wax, it is he that sets on the seal. We have sinned, what should we do but repent? If we cannot, like the poor woman at her purification, offer a Lamb, Innocence of life; yet let us bring at least a pair of Turtle Doves, two mourning eyes. That we who have grievously erred by multiplied sin, may be received again to mercy by unfeigned sorrow.

They shall receive the reward of unrighteousness, as they that count it a pleasure to riot in the day time.

GOD is a just Master, and will pay all men their wages according to their work. They that do the business he sets them about, shall have a blessed recompense: none of his servants were ever losers by him. The ungodly indeed set themselves on work; yet howsoever, he will pay them their wages; but it is such a reward, as they would thank him to go without: a righteous wages, for an unrighteous service. God shall pay all: Satan may be his executioner, but God is the Judge. The executioner cannot lay on a stroke more than the Judge appoints. Wicked men, properly, do pay when they are paid: when God pays them, he pays himself of them: and this shall be to the uttermost farthing. So the unmerciful servant was bound over, till he should pay all his d^e. At once they both receive their wages, and pay their debts.

Wages is understood to be an equal retribution, a reward proportionable to the work: and is either ex pacto, what is covenanted; Didst thou not agree with me for a penny? or ex merito, what is earned, The laborer is worthy of hire. Equality of recompense defines wages: if it be too much, and above desert, it is munificence: if too little, and short of desert, it is injustice. The Jews might give forty stripes, they would give but nine and thirty, for fear of excess. They were commanded to restore fourfold: some of them, as Zacchaeus, did quintuple it; for fear of the defect. But there is neither defect, nor excess, in a just reward. Man may fault in this, God cannot; he pays just wages; not a dram too light, not a scruple too heavy. Every man shall receive according to his works. With the same measure that ye mete, it shall be measured to you again.

This Wages of unrighteousness must be considered, In Tali, and In Tanto: Such, for the Quality: So much, for the Equalitie. In congruo, for the fitness; In condigno, for the fullness, not an Arithmetical Portion, every man alike: but a Geometricall Proportion, every man his due. So that we have two things: The Manner, and the Measure, of this wages.

The Scripture is copious in these retaliations. Nile was instead of heaven to Egypt; the clouds did not so much favor them, as the river: this did moisten their ground, and quench their thirst: and their confidence was not in heaven, but in Nile. Loe, Nile was turned into blood: that which was their succor shall be their horror. He that measures the sea in his fist, scorns that a poor river should be his rivall. In this element was the whole trust of their provision; and now this cannot be endured for the corruption. When their palates would taste it, their eyes abhor it. Their drought calls for the moisture, their stomachs cannot brook the annoyance. They are thirsty, yet cannot tell whether they should die, or drink; die with heat, or cool that heat with blood. How fit is this wages? they made that one element their god, and by the loss of that one element they become miserable men. The fish was no small part of their sustenance: those die with infection, and infect more by being dead. But was this all the similitude? no, they had polluted that river with the blood of infants, and now it appears to them in his color. As if it should say, Am I bloody? thank your own murderous hands that made me thus. It is your sin that hath turned my clear streams into this sanguine hew. The very waters will no longer keep their counsel. Never any man willfully shed blood, but he had enough of it ere his end. If they look upon the waters, they see nothing but blood: when they drink, they taste nothing but blood. They shedded some few streams, but are requited with whole rivers of blood. As if the Divine Justice had said to them, as Tommyris did (afterward) to Cyrus, Sanguinem sitisti, sanguinem bibe; Sate thyself with blood, thou that so desired'st it. A red River was one plague, but a red sea, the greater. That annoyed, this overwhelmed them: that slew their fishes, this drowned themselves. For a water bloodied with Innocents, to have a river turned into bloody waters, a red sea made redder by the whole host of Egypt; how fit a wages of unrighteousness was this? The corrupted river was both a monument of their former sin, and an image of their future vengeance. God paid them in specie, their own money.

Such another Instance we have in that fat king of Moab, Eglon; whom Eh'd slew. He had made his belly his god, and God sends a message into his belly. I have a message to thee from God. This he thought to have heard with his ears, and he feels it in his guts. A message indeed, but such an one as did neither require nor admit an answer: no reply, but a groan and a gasp; and then everlasting silence. His very soul lay in his entrails, and through that unclean passage she goes out in stench. His sin had pamper'd those parts, and swelled them to an unwieldy grossness: in those parts his destruction enters to let out life. Many delicate morsels, and choice creatures had been buried in that bulky vault: Ehuds dagger is a hard and cold bit to close up his stomach. He can never digest this, now he pays for all his gluttony; this was the wages of unrighteousness.

This Lex talionis hath fallen upon the dear Saints of God. Samsons eyes were the first offenders, and they are first pulled out: they betrayed him to lust, and lust betrays them to darkness. In Azzah he was first captivated by a woman, and thither he is led captive in triumph. He that was grown blind in his understanding by doting wantonness, is now doomed to his own perpetual night. Because he trusted his locks in the lap of a whore, he riseth up shorn and weakened. He that was a terror to armies, becomes a scorn to boys. Eli could not have devised a way so much to plague himself and his sons, as by his partiality to their sins. He receives a variety of Judgments, yet everyone a just wages for his faults. First, his sons had despised God, therefore God lightly esteems them. Secondly, old age is commonly choleric, old Eli was indulgent, therefore not an old man shall be left of his house forever. Because he had been faulty in his old age, therefore all his family shall die in their youth. Thirdly, his sons were enemies to God in their profession, therefore he shall see his enemy in the Lord's habitation. Fourthly, because he so mis-favored his offending children, as not to punish them, therefore they shall be to consume his eyes, and grieve his heart, even to punish him. Fifthly, because he esteemed their life above his Makers glory, therefore they shall die with dishonor. Sixthly, the Authority which he had abused by connivence, shall be translated to another. Seventhly, because his sons were saucie, and of so wanton an appetite, that they durst take meat from off God's own trencher, therefore the remainder of his household shall come to beggary. Lastly, because he forbore to take vengeance on their iniquity, God shall revenge himself on him and them, and that severely. Consider this, ye fond parents, that prefer the vanities of your children, before the will of your heavenly Father: you cannot devise a speedier way to ruin them. Thus to be kind to them, is to be cruel to yourselves, and them: to make their sins your own. God might have pardoned them, had you not pardoned them: now your indulgence makes way for his vengeance. We read not of any fault Eli had but this; yet which of the notorious offenders was plagued more? A man needs no more to make him and his posterity miserable, than sparing the rod. How just is this, when men will not see the faults they should, to feel the punishments they would not?

Absalom was fair, and he knew it well enough: the glass and flattery had made him acquainted with his own comliness. His beauty was the matter of his pride, and his hair was no small piece of his beauty. Once every year he used to cut it; not as weary of the length, but of the weight: his pride could have brooked it longer, his neck could not. Now those locks which had been his glory, become his hangman. He had curiously plated those tresses for his ornament, therefore God makes use of them for his halter. The part which man's unrighteousness abuseth to sin, God's justice employs to revenge. When it hath served our turn to offend God, it shall serve his turn to punish us. This latter service makes amends for the former trespass. The dishevel'd hairs that loosely hung on Absalom's shoulders, shall do him the office to hang him. He came out of his fathers loins, yet turned traitor to him: his hair grew out of his scalpe and turns traitor to his own head. When he was thus mounted to his unexpected galhouse, his beast leaves him: it had done him service enough, to bring him to the tree of Justice, and there resignes that unnatural burden. He reared a pillar, and called it by his own name; either because he had no sons, no living images of himself; and so to supply nature, he thought to survive in dead stones. But it had been great pity there should have been any of his breed: he that robbed his father of a son, slew Ammon, and would have robbed himself of a father, his father of a kingdom, deserved to die without issue. Or to preserve the memorial of himself; that the world, when it saw the stately pillar might be occasioned to remember the goodly person of Absalom: as if the generations to come were wronged in losing the mention of Absalom. The world esteemed him highly; and he had an higher opinion of himself; and he was famous, but for infamy: not that arched pile, but a rude heap of stones, cover his carcase. One death is not enough for him; he is hanged, pierced, mangled. He had lifted up himself against his own royal father, therefore was lifted up to a tree of execution. He had pierced his fathers heart with many sorrows, therefore he is pierced with many darts. He had dismembered and divided Israel, therefore he is mangled and torn in pieces. He that cursed his parents, according to the law, was stoned to death: he had done worse, even attempted to kill his father, therefore was buried under an heap of stones. Behold with terror, the just wages of unrighteousness.

How righteous art thou, O God, in thy retaliations! Non invenit guttam, qui non dedit micam. The rich man would not give Lazarus a crumb, Lazarus shall not bring him a drop. Saul slew the Gibeonites: nothing can expiate the blood of these heathen fathers, but the blood of the persecutors children. Because they knew God, and would not glorify him, therefore their foolish heart was darkened. Because their knowledge would not retain God, they shall not retain their knowledge. Men profane God's Name, and he makes their names to stink. Why should they be mentioned with honor, that do not mention their maker but to his dishonor? So we read of Lots wife, Job's wife, the rich man, but no name: as if God had said, let their names be blotted out. Idolaters will set up a false god for the true, therefore the true God gives them over to the false. We forget duly to bless God on the Sabaoth, therefore go unblessed all the week. If mine heart hath been deceived by a woman, then let my wife grind unto another. Few dare take such an oath, or make such a wish. They have polluted the beds of others, therefore their marriage finds pollution. We rob the Ministers, and therefore commonly we are robbed by the Lawyers. Who so stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also shall cry himself, but shall not be heard. In vain they cry to us for charity, and for mercy we shall cry in vain to God. The measure we mete to others, is with much equity remeasured to ourselves. In every grievance of your sense, read the characters of the cause. When you receive your wages, consider your work: so you have done, so you are undone. When the dropsy invades the drunkard, it is but his wages. When the pestilence rageth in our streets, blasphemy and execration must confess that they have their due wages. Poverty is the wages of dishonesty. Blasphemers live swearing, and die raving; it is but their wages. These things if we preach, we are hated; if we do not, we shall be condemned: it is a woeful strait, when we must either incur the worlds mal-opinion, or the Lord's malediction. But certainly, if men do these unrighteous works, they must expect this righteous wages.

The measure follows; no temporary suffering can be a sufficient wages of sin. Nothing but death can expiate some offenses among men; blood must have blood: but death it self cannot satisfy God. All sin is infinite; not in respect of it self, but of the Majesty which it offends: now an infinite work must have an infinite wages. Through the creatures incapacitie, this cannot be infinite in intension, therefore must be so in duration. The Quantitie of this wages is begun in death, accomplished in torment.

1 In Death. There is but one door to come into the world, a thousand to go forth. Death hath his choice of ways to let out life: and while we are busily watching at one door, he comes in at another. A furious horseman, with a pale and gastly look: Pallida mors; symbolizing that effect which he works both on the living, and on the dead. On the living; I know, that many can talk of death without fear, because they think it out of hearing: they make a league with death; as the frantike marchant alone, would sell this commodity, and buy that, and make matches for hundreds and thousands, when there was nobody by to deal with him. Thus it is reported of an Earl of Kildare, that playing at the boords end, and seeing his warrant of execution brought in; threw his cast, and said; Whatsoever that is, this is for a huddle. Many have feigned to die in jest; but I doubt whether their heart and face were both of one piece. Some call for it, as the poor wearied man in the Fable; but when it comes in good earnest, they have another errand for it, and are not able to look it in the face, with the blood in their cheeks. When it gave Belshazzar that fatal summons, all his Courtiers and Concubines could not cheare his heart, nor all the wine in those holy bowles fetch color into his countenance. How do we see prisoners at the bar even die at the sentence of death, as if they could not live to the execution. Some Stoike would fain set a good face on the matter, and says in a bravado to his neighbors, he fears not death; and all, that the world may witness, he is no coward. So Jezebel painted her face, and affronted Ieh out of the window: but had that artificial visage been off, a pale cheek would have appeared underneath it. Whatsoever is pretended, there is no unrighteous man but is afraid of this wages.

On the dead; it bereaves the body of blood and color, spoils the complexion, whether it be of art or nature, renders a lifeless and wan carcase, lays it rotting in the moulds, exposeth it a feast for worms, alters the fashion, consumes the beauty, turns the whole proportion into deformed rottenness. There lies the body in blended dust, receiving that insensible wages, which the sin of life earned; till the Archangels trumpet, together with the summons of the Judge, gives it a Surge. Even this is a fearful wages, when it is paid in the proper coin, without the allay of Christ's death to qualify it. As death is the contrary to life, so commonly they that live like Laban, die like Nabal which is but the same word inverted. The very mention of death is irksome to them; as Louis the eleventh straitly charged his servants, when they saw him sick, not to dare once so much as name that bitter and unwelcome word, Death. Thus like insensate stories, they sink down to their Center, and rather choose to feel what they fear, than labor to avoid what they must feel. So cowards wink and fight; yea, they wink and suffer, and fight not: a dismal wages!

2 Hell, and that in the worst sense; not the grave of the body, but of the soul. There is Hell ration meriti, a sinful life: and Hell ration poena, the horror of conscience: and Hell ration loci, which is Hell it self, the local prison of the damned, as Heaven is the triumphant Mansion of the blessed. This is the full wages of unrighteousness, into which the desperate madness of ungodly men doth chop blindfold. There be some, that thank philosophy and their own reasons, they fear no such fable, as Hell. Socrates and Plato were great philosophers, yet they believed a hell, and hissed the contrary opinions as bellarine, out of their Schools. Yea, the very Savages and Infidels confess it: the instinct of nature, and a divine impression, extorts from them this acknowledgement; that souls live after their bodies, either in bliss or pain. What are they but Monsters, that seek to obliterate these indelible characters, and so dance hoodwink'd into perdition? O were it allowed to the desperate Ruffians of our days, that swear and curse, as if heaven were deaf to their noise, or as if they would make it deaf by their noise, to have but a sight of hell: how would it charm their mouths, appall their spirits, strike fear and astonishment into their hearts! The Church and they would be better acquainted, which are now perpetual strangers. Superstitious recusants, irreligious profaners of the Sabbath, that never serve God but once a year: their bed or their boat or the Tavern is all their Temple, except we see their faces at Easter: would they do thus if they understood this wages? No, could we foresee death and hell in their proper shapes, we would fore-appoint ourselves, not to avoid the first death which we cannot; but to escape the second, which we may, through repentance and faith, &c.

The devils besought Christ, that he would not cast them into the Deepe. What is this Deepe, but Hell? First, for the utter separation from the face of God, never to see his favorable countenance: then for the impossibilities of passage to the Region of rest and glory. The very devils fear this deep: they feel themselves bound in chains, and reserved to this torment; expecting a further degree of vengeance. They know this to be the wages of unrighteousness: now the wages is not paid till the work be done. Still they are tempting men unto sin, and still they sin in that temptation: the mis-leaders into evil sin more than the actors: therefore the full measure of their damnation remains to the upshot of their wickedness: the day of Judgment shall confine them to the deep forever. This day, this deep, they tremble at: yet sottish men sleight it. Were their understandings sensible of that burning Lake, where soul and body must be crowded into a fiery dungeon, with torments intolerable and interminable, which can neither be endured nor avoided; durst they so boldly rush into sin? who will thrust his hand into a fiery crucible, to fetch out the gold? Can the metal recompense the burning? We durst not continue our licentious and willful sins, if we did truly believe the horror of those infernal and eternal flames.

Believe there is a hell! who does not? yes, very many that say they do: it is hard for men to believe their own unbelief. They that be most dangerously sick, are least sensible of their own sickness. We their Physicians perceive it, and tell them of it, and they hate us for it. But as when the Seminary in Lancashire lost his Glove, riding in his disguise, and one that found it, rode apace after him to restore it: he mistrusting him for a Pursuivant by his speed (but most pursued by a guilty conscience) quits his horse, leapes over a hedge, plungeth into an unseen marle-pit behind it, and was drowned. So men fly us that mean them no harm, and rather hazard themselves into destruction, than suffer the Word of Exhortation. I know that love should win us to goodness, rather than fear: yet fear is often the door that lets in Love, as Love casteth fear out of the door. Even the fear of hell hath made way for the Love of Christ, and the Love of Christ hath taken away the fear of hell. There is a story of one that gave a young Gallant a curious Ring, with a Deaths head in it; upon this condition, that for a certain time, he should spend one hour every day in looking and thinking on it. He took the Ring in wantonness, but performing the condition with diligence, it wrought a wonder on him: and of a desperate Ruffian, he became a conscionable Christian. Imagine this discourse a Ring the wages of unrighteousness a Deaths head; yea more, a map of hell, an Emblem of destruction: spend but one half hour fixedly every day on these meditations, and (I doubt not) by God's Grace thou shalt find such an alteration in thy heart and life; that there shall be gladness in the Church, peace in thy own Conscience, and joy before the Angels in Heaven for thy Conversion.

As they that count it pleasure to riot in the day time.] There is no greater danger in the world, than to live in the danger of the world. This is a care that troubles but few: how to get it, not how to use it, is the common study: Many waking hours are spent on the bed, how to be rich, how to be glorious, not how to be good. God hath written divers books of holy instructions, and they are able to make a man wise to Salvation: these contain Rules how to be holy and happy, not how to be wanton and wealthy. Solomon had his Ethickes, his Politickes, his Oeconomickes; for the government of Behaviour, of Commonwealth, of Family: not one book of secular mysteries, though his wisdom were incomparable even in that kind also. Not a leaf in the sacred volume, but hath matter against a voluptuous life, none for it. To please flesh and blood is the doctrine of the devil; this, man hath learned by nature; he is borne with this knowledge: and the whole contents of the Scripture is by the Law to forbid it, by the Gospel to mortify it. Certainly, if it had been good to live in sensual pleasure, among so many Divine Rules, some direction would have guided us to this. But all that God says about it, is to forbid it, to threaten it, to condemn it, to cast it into hell. Indeed he neither condemns our affections, nor these objects, asunder; but their composition, as they are married together. A man may covet (so as it be) the best gifts: Desire more Grace, seek more, never think you have enough: be still poor that you may be rich, rich that you may be full, full that you may be glorious. You may desire worldly things long enough without finding any content; but covet after righteousness, and you shall be satisfied. Be merry, pleasant, rejoice, but in the Lord: Christianity does not take away our joy, but gives it. It is the Ram that dies, Isaac (our laughter) escapes. Bee ambitious of favor, of honor, of a kingdom: but of God's favor, of the honor of Saints, of the Kingdom of Heaven. But to take pleasure in riot, as if a man's heaven lay in his guts, and Paradise were nothing but the delight of his sense; this is that brutish opinion, the faith of Epicures, which sends many with that rich Churl, from their delicate tables to eternal flames.

To riot is belluine; there is their Sensuality: In the day time, is desperate, for that is a work of the night; there is their Impudence: To count this a pleasure, (many have been over-taken with intemperance, but it was their sorrow and vexation, to these it is a pleasure) there is their Voluptuousness: They think it so, they do but think it so, they shall not so find it; there is their Sottishnesse. Their wickedness appears here like a Conjurament. First, the spirit raised is riot. Secondly, the circle wherein it is raised, is the day time. Thirdly, the sorceresse that raiseth it, is Pleasure. Fourthly, the charm or illusion is conceit; They think or count it a pleasure, &c.

Riot] This is the spirit: the grossest devil of all is the eating devil: surfeiting guts turn men into beasts. We borrow pride from the Lion, covetousness from the Hedgehog, envy from the Dog, wrath from the Bear, gormandise from the Wolf, sloth from the Ass, riot and sensuality from the Hog: such be called Boarish men. God sent them into the world men, and they come forth beasts. Only the beasts are in better case; because they want the reason of Election, and shall receive no sentence of condemnation. Drunkenness is so apt to misdemeanors, that even against the violence of men not drunk, there lies an Action called a Riot.

There is Riot in many things: First, Riot in drink, when men drink in measures, without measure. We may change the verse; Non habet ulterius quod nostri potibus addet Posteritas. Peace hath made many countries sick of a surfeit, but (were the Assizes come) God would find this whole Land guilty of a Riot. Crates threw his money into the sea, resolving to drown it, lest it should drown him: the drunkard casts his money into a deluge of drink, both drowning it, and himself with it. Herein the Miser and the Rioter are opposites; the one so loves money that he will not afford himself good drink, the other so loves good drink that he scorns money. Cornua Bacchus habet, the riotous must be quarrellous; therefore some quarrels are called riots. When the iron is hot, the Smith can fashion it to his pleasure: Wine tempers the heart like wax for the devils impression. Secondly, there is riot in meats, Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we shall die, saith the Epicure: one would think it should rather be, Let us fast and pray, for tomorrow we shall die. The poor man's labor is to get him meat for his stomach; the riotous only care to get a stomach for their meat. Their whole vicissitude of studies is but meat for the belly, and the belly for meat; as Brewers provide barrels for their drink, and drink for their barrels. What wonder is it, if they in hell be most tormented in their tongues, that have most offended in their tastes?

Riot is of a great latitude; to abuse any riches of Nature to wantonness, is riot. So a man may riot in apparel: divers men are in all other things miserable. Yet prodigal in their clothes; and these shall be indited of a Riot. The Daw values himself by his cockscombe, the fool by his garded coat; and these take state upon them according to their garments; and after a little custom, persuade themselves that they are such in deed. The case of an instrument keeps it from soil, the cover of a glass from dust: but gorgeous attire can neither prevent age, for they soon wax old themselves; nor save from soil, for sin bred them, and they breed sin. Pagans over-gild their blocks, that they may be worshipped; and men garnish their bodies for the same purpose. The dress of proud women is but Democritus his brazen shield set up against the Sun, to amaze the eyes that behold it; but bavin to the furnace of lasciviousness: in their best interpretation, they are but bushes which should signify beauty to sell: for why is a sign hung out, but to invite men to buy? As in Italy, the beasts that are to be sold, are decked with blossoms and garlands. But that which is worse; the plaistering of their faces, ensparkling their eyes with spiritualiz'd distillations, touching their lips with aurum potabile, filling up frets with fresh colors, as men keep roses all winter in covered vaults; this is horrible riot. It seems they think God was a bungler, not his crafts-master, and that they are able to correct and mend his workmanship. But do they not lay on their colors so thick, that they size into their souls? Does not a p•acke soul often dwell under a white roof? Mee thinks they should be jealous, lest the devil should come to them in the disguise of a Tailor, Tirewoman, or Complexion-seller.

There is Riot in play, where the greatest winner is it danger to lose the ga•e. The Romans built a Temple to ill Fortune in exquiliis, on a mountain hard by, that it should not plague them at cards and dice. God made no man for play, but all for work: they that play when they should work, shall work when they might have rested. Not seldom doth Riot break forth into wantonness and carnal delights; a sin so trite and customary that it serves the City for an afternoons recreation. Common strumpets are said to have no common Patrons: and if lesser magistrates put them in hold, they have greater persons to fetch them out. Either authority is connivent, and will not see the faults; or corrupt, and loves to feel bribes; or which is worse, doth not punish the sinner, that they may sin with her; which of all bribes is the basest. There is Riot in any excessive delicacy; so the word here used is Deliciis frui, not uti: a sin hard to describe, because it hath so many shapes. In women it reigns most, because they have least to do. They must have delicate houses, rubb'd and glaz'd, as if like Abraham, they were to entertain Angels; whereas too often, it is but for their wanton lovers. The floores are so glistering, as if they would walk upon looking glasses. They have delicate paces, going on the earth as if they went upon snakes, and feared to tread hard lest they should turn again. This is truly to riot by a delicious life; when everything about them is so resplendent and contentful, that they have no mind to go to heaven. This is to fortify themselves, not against mortality, but against the thought of mortality; to quintessence a heaven out of earth, yea to exchange a true heaven for a counterfeit. How many souls have these artificial paradises beguiled? Through a hell upon earth God brings many to heaven, and through a heaven upon earth many bring themselves to hell. In the forenoone Riot is merry, in the afternoon drunk, at night it goes to bed stark mad, but in the morning it riseth sober, in everlasting sorrow; that is the farewell of it.

In the day time;] This is the Circle: whether we read it, Per diem, Ad diem, or In diem: here be three readings, and three senses. Per diem, that is continually, day by day. Day and night is often taken for Indesinenter; now the day includes the night: when we beg Panem quotidianum, our daily bread, we desire provision both for day and night. It was a foolish superstition of them that refused the Paternoster going to bed, because they thought it absurd to say, Give us this day, when as it was night. Come, we will fill ourselves with strong drink, and tomorrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant. It is never night with them while the drink lasts, or their eyes can wake to guide the pot to their mouths. There is great difference betwixt infirmity and vice: the former is but an ague, neither mortal nor perpetual: the other a dropsy, that drinks till it rots, and rots till it dies. There be sins in the righteous, there is nothing but sin in the riotous. If Xantippes scolding so troubled Alcibiades, that heard her but seldom; what an affliction was it to Socrates, her husband, that must bide by it day and night? when a Citizen complained what a pitiful journey he had in a moorish fen-country; a country man replied, God help them that dwell there, as I do. A traveler often drinks that liquor with offense to him, which his host guzzles with pleasure. This made the Friar, that had drenched himself for experience, to impose it as a sore penance on them that had confessed that sin, Go and be drunk again. Custom makes that a pleasure, which is a torment: many do that in a day, for which they weep all their life.

Or Ad Diem; and this is indeed the term of all sinful pleasure; it is but a flash, a puff, and it vanisheth. It is expected with desire, with delight entertained, and departs with discontent. Like some spritely music, that advanceth a man's mind while it sounds, and leaves him more melancholy when it is done. A countryman observing the preparation for a great triumph, among many other questions, about the labor, the cost, the study; demands how long it should last: he was answered, for an hour: but he replied, then the leasse is very dear. Could they drink with Cleopatra, the riches of Egypt at a draught, yet it is but a draught, and quickly down the throat. Turn but the candle, and Quod me alit, me extinguet; that which keeps me in, puts me out.

In diem, so the word properly imports: this is impudent. They that sleep, sleep in the night; and they that be drunken, are drunken in the night. And male agens odit licem. But alas, that is cowardly sin with them, that is ashamed to show the face. They dare the day to witness their ungodliness, and do their villainies, as the Pharisees gave their alms, and said their prayers, to be seen of men. As if they were ambitious to be like God, to whom the day and the night is all one. The Apostle intends it, not as a qualification of their naughtiness, but for a more full expression: In the day time, when others are at their labors, they then roar with riot. The day is made for work, the night for sleep: our lawful work in the day, is God's service; our natural sleep in the night is our own indulgence: he that steals an hour from his sleep, robs but himself: he that trespasseth upon the day, injures God. If you say, rest enables us for work, yet work is the end, and the end is more noble than the means.

Again, all sin is the work of darkness, therefore most proper for the time of darkness: the riot that is bad at any time, is worse in the daytime. In the night it only makes the devil sport; none but fiends are spectators at that interlude: sin is then but like a poor watchman in his night-gown. In the day it ruffles it like a swasher, marches with drumme and fife, and bids defiance to authority. So it offends the good, enrageth the bad, and infects the indifferent: and that which might have escaped with forty stripes for the mere evil, shall have an hundred for the example. Sin at first was a single woman, and kept home; but rambling one day abroad, the devil got her with child, and she was delivered of two bastards, Temptation and Example. Ever since she cannot stir out of doors, but these Impes haunt her: when she would delight her self, either Temptation gets some to sin with her, or Example teaches some to sin after her.

Lastly, day-sins are done with less shame, therefore more impious. Many that care not for honesty, yet stand upon their credit, and would not be detected of that they love to commit. But they are frontlesse Zimri's, that bring whores to their tents in the face of all Israel. Noah was uncovered, but in the midst of his own Tent: sin is bad enough, though no eye see it: and unknown sins are attended with known punishments: secret faults have their secret guilt and shame. But four eyes saw the adultery, ten thousand millions shall see the torment. But that man is past all goodness, that is past shame. Sin bred shame, yet the mother is often curbed by the daughter: she dares not play her pranks so boldly while shame is by. Sin would kill all the agents of goodness in us, but that shame hinders her. Shame holds them in, though sin holds them under. There is some fear to offend, some knowledge of good and evil, some remorse, some conscience, while shame lasts. But if shame once departs, knowledge goes, and fear goes, and remorse goes, and conscience goes; none will tarry behind shame. Alas, for our age, to bear the date of such impiety; that it should be said, In such a year, when yet there was no plague, Shame died. Honesty died long since, and was buried in the Suburbs: Charity lived not long after, and was buried in the City: Plain-dealing died then too, and was buried in the Country: and now Shame is dead also: the Sepulchers of Suburbs, City, and Country, being taken up by Honesty, Charity, Plain-dealing; what room is left for Shame's grave, except the waters? And it is thought, that amongst the Watermen she first caught her death. If any man can find a place to bury her, I will bestow a sory Epitaph upon her:

If any man require my Name

Say blushing tomb that it was Shame.

When I did in a cheek appear,
Men did conclude that Grace was there.

I many kept from doing ill,
Therefore ill doing did me kill.

The Swearer, Liar, Whore, may lead
A bolder life; for Shame is dead.

But when all dead rise from their places,
I Shame shall then fit on their faces.

In the day time.] Perhaps they slept a-nights; and followed the business so close by day, that they dispatched it before night. Or it may be, they would husband their bodies, that they might hold out: for riot is a soaker, and it would drench them to follow it day and night too. Sin is the greatest folly in the world, and yet there must be some art and cunning to maintain it. The house that grows sear, needs supporters. But now have we none worse than these? The day contented them to riot in; day and night too is too little for some. Often do they curse the clock for haste, never blame themselves for lingering in riot. Revell they never so long, their last dance is loath to depart. They are angry, that they cannot with Joshua, make the Sun stand still, or keep the Moon from going down, not till they confound the Amorites, but till their Amorites work their confusion. They wish that the day might be corrupted, and that the night would take bribes. There be some feasts, where the guests think they are slighted, if they be not sent away drunk: and Time is no pleasing Host to these if he will not allow them to surfeit.

But the night, the night is the guilty time: it would be a long Assizes, only to take the confession and indictment of Candle-light. This would tell of doors ready to let in the adulterer, of thieves watching to break into houses, of Fauxes with their dark lanthornes ready to blow up States; of Unthrifths revelling and drinking, till their monies and their wits be both spent together; of age-decayed dames baking on their colors, and spending many pounds of candles in pinning and trimming their dresses, that will not bestow one minutes light in reading any good book: Murder, treachery, conspiracy, felonie now follow their business very close: many Owls that cannot endure the light, now flutter abroad, and keep a howting and rowting in the dark. Those dare now frequent Tavernes and Brothels, quarrel in the streets, rage and domineer, who would appear contemptible in the day. The Sun, that eye of Heaven, does scarce see so much villainy, as Candle-light. Wittily conceited was that Italian, who wrought the supplication to Candle-light, desiring her to disclose to him the rare secrets which she saw in her Empery. The day would scarce believe what deeds are done by night.

I conclude; both day and night let us banish intemperance out of our coasts: it will beg for some indulgence, but let a shameless beggar have a strong denial. If we will not grant it the day, it will crave but the night: sin hath no right to a moment of time, therefore will take any: but when thou hast once allowed it a part, it will proudly challenge all. He that shall duly consider his sins, will find that he hath time little enough for repentance, none to spare for intemperance. Instead of rioting ourselves, we have cause to mourn for the riot of others. But alas, all mortification is censured by the name of superstition, and he that forbears excess, is held an irregular melancholy person. The most men's sorrows are like the mournings of an heir, who then smiles in his heart, when his eyes let fall forced tears. We may say of this kind of evil, as Christ said of that kind of devil, it will not out with Prayer alone, but with fasting and prayer. It is not only human, but heavenly policy, to weaken our enemy before we fight with him. The lust that is fed with riot, will be too strong for us. Inveterate wounds or ulcers must have corrosives to eat out the dead flesh, ere they can be cured. We are ordained for holiness, not for licentiousness: the jollity of this world is so far from saving us, that it keeps us from being saved. O let not all the showers of Sermons fall like rain in the horse-fair, or high-ways, to breed nothing but mire and puddles; hear not to become worse. But judge every hour worthy thy sorrow, which thou hast mis-spent in vanity: fly the sins against which I have spoken, and I have spoken.

They count it a pleasure to riot.] Pleasure is the Sorceresse that raiseth up the spirit of riot: that special harlot of hell, which the devil hath dressed up to tempt the sons of men. She hath a melodious tongue, to enchant: a face of artificial beauty, to allure: eyes that roll with invitations, to bewitch; arms of wanton provocations, to embrace. She courts all men in the language of Absalom, but her heart is full of treason; and her project is to deceive them of the Kingdom of Heaven. Pro Ration voluntas, is the Usurpers tyranny: and Pro Religion voluptas, is the Epicures Divinity; whose belly is their god. Pleasure guides them in all their actions and courses: demand of a voluptuous man the reason of his doings, he will answer, It is my pleasure. Two questions would here be examined, for direction of our minds about Pleasure.

1 Whether a man may take any pleasure in this world or no? Yes certainly; one special use of wisdom stands in tempering our pleasures; to be delighted is not evil, but to be delighted in evil. As Paul says, Be angry, and sin not, so Be merry and sin not. Why hath God given man such choice of earthly commodities, but for his use? The whole world is a well-furnished table; if we shall willfully fast, we shall be held for sullen guests. Some to avoid the danger of Pleasure, have run from the world, changing popular cities for solitary mountains, and the society of men for beasts. As if the world were not in the desert, or the desert not in the world: as if an Hermitage could hide a man from the devil, or he could not be tempted while he was alone, or an estuant desire could not be in a neglected body. Did not Jerome find Rome in his heart, when nothing but rocks and bushes were in his eye? Do we not naturally more affect those delights which are restrained? Is not solitariness a main help to the speed of a temptation?

There is certainly a nearer and a fairer way than this. The wise man will be an Hermit at home, and seeks rather to turn the world out of himself, than to turn himself out of the world. He can distinguish between the love of pleasure, and the use of pleasure; and while others serve delight, he teacheth delight to serve him. If we see vanity, must we needs dote upon it? Our Savior saw the glory of earthly kingdoms, yet despised it. The Angels see the affairs and proceedings of us mortals, but as strangers. Lot reaped profit from the goodly meadows of Sodom, he meddled not with their sins. Moses was in the Court of Pharaoh; the confluence of all pleasures, yet his heart was suffering with his afflicted country-men. Elisha saw the secrets of the Syrian State, but as an enemy. David is in the Court of Gath, but as his refuge; he was no friend to the Philistines. The world looked upon Abraham, Job, and many other Saints, and they contemned it: and cannot we look upon it, but presently we are bewitched with it? Can we not warm us at the Sun, but we must make an idol of it? Must we needs either hide our faces, or bow our knees? Either renounce all pleasure, or be the slaves of pleasure? what extremes are these, we may be merry, without being mad: let these contentments go and come like strangers: true pleasures be ours, if we be Christ's.

2 How may a Christian take pleasure in the world? By having respect to three things; An liceat, an expedit, an deceat. The pleasure must be lawful, there can be no safety in a sinful delight? That which is absolutely evil, can by no circumstance be made good. Poison may be qualified, and become medicinal: there is use to be made of an enemy: sickness may turn to our better health; and death it self to the faithful is but a door to life: but sin can never be made good. Pleasure therefore first must have the warrant, that it be without sin: then the measure, that it be without excess. If the cup be evil, we may not taste it: though good, yet not carouse it. Reason forbids us both to touch known poison, and to be drunk with wholesome wine. Pleasure is like sauce to our meat; we must not be too saucy. A little honey is sweet, much fulsome. Non nascimur ad ludum. Nor is the lawfulness only observable, but the convenience: a man may wear good clothes unhandsomely. The stuff may be good, yet while the fashion of the garment does not become him, it appears ridiculous. The place, the occasion, the company, the opportunity, all must be fit. The house of mourning is not for mirth; soon did Christ turn the Musicians out of doors. In the time of visitation, while the plague or famine lies sore upon our neighbors, shall we give ourselves to sport and jovisance? Isaiah. 22.12, 13. Let us be sure that our delights exclude not the presence of God. (We love the medicine, not for it own sake, but for the health it brings us. The Angels are sent about God's messages to this earth; yet they are never out of their heaven, never without the vision of blessedness. We may be merry, though God be by; we may please ourselves, so long as we displease not him. He that desires pleasure for it self, and is taken up with the sweetness of it, is already drunk. Whereas he that rests not in it, but looks through it to the Giver, referring all to the highest good, is safe, and as far from sin, as from sorrow. It is not the use, but affectation of pleasure that offends; therefore all the danger or safety is from within. The body may be a Recluse, and the heart a wanderer. I have observed some to look carelessly and strangely on such objects as transport others; and answer questions far from the purpose; it seems they did mind some other thing: it is happy for a man not to mind the world. We eat and recreate, not because we would, but because we must; and when we are best pleased, let us be most suspicious. Let us use pleasure in God, from God, to God: in God, lawfully: from God, thankfully: to God, that is, to his Glory.

These be the two Quaere's, now there be also two Quare's; why should me, why should Christian men riot in pleasures?

1 Why should reasonable men delight in riot? It makes them the worse, the unhealthfuller, the poorer, none the better. It is every way expensive, and cannot quit the cost. First, to the estate, voluptuousness is a waster: that merchant is likelier to grow rich, that turns his gallerie into a warehouse, than he that turns his warehouse into a gallerie. Honestum, Vtile, and Iucundum, keeping house together, Honestum was to govern all, Vtile to provide for all, and Iucundum to dress or prepare all. They had a great household, yet maintained their charge, relieved the poor, and laid up somewhat for their posterity. All things went sweetly on, while Cheerfulness was the Cook, Thriftiness the Cater, and Honesty the Steward. If any of the family were disordered, Honesty reformed them: if any lavish and unthrifty, Frugality recovered them: if any melancholy, Iucundum revived and cheered them. But after a while, this Iucundum getting a little head, begins to exceed in mirth, and falls out with Vtile for short provision: he had invited a number of fiddlers, jesters, players, tumblers, dancers, and must have extraordinary cheare for them. Vtile refused to allow it, Iucundum would have it, and the quarrel grew hot: while Honestum was called to moderate the matter, this rabble came in, took Iucundum's part, snatched the keys out of Vtile's hands, ransack'd the coffers, exhausted the treasure, turned Honesty and Thrift out of doors; sung, danced, and drunk, and threw (as they say) the house out at the windows. Thus the Family broke; for just as Honestum and Vtile went out, Beggary came in. Only these two erected a new house, repaired their estates: to whom not long after, poor Iucundum came a begging; but might not be admitted as one of the Family, only was sent for sometimes to make them merry, and lived on their alms. You see the moral of this Apologue. Cato said; that was a pitiful Commonwealth, where a Trowt was dearer than an Ox: and I may say, that is a lamentable State, where a fiddler and a dancer is better maintained than a Preacher. Not a few families have thus been ruined, I would the rest would take warning. Secondly, It undoes the credit; who will trust an unthrift? As it is true of spiritual, so of worldly things, Habenti dabitur, To him that hath, shall be given. When death, love, and credit would part, they appointed places to find one another. Death says, you shall be sure to find me in great battles or epidemical plagues. Love says, you shall find me among shepherds, where is no talk of dowries. But Credit told them plainly, they that once part with me, shall never find me again. I need not add, how it overthrows the health; to Rot and to Riot, differ but one small letter. Howsoever the voluptuous flatter themselves with having the merrier life, I am sure they have the shorter life. They are but crazy, that have a fen about them, how rotten are they that have a fen within them? He is a right spend-all, that besides all spends himself. The Philosopher that would ask of the frugal Citizen but a penny, beg'd of the Prodigal a talent; and he had his reason for it; because of the one he might beg often, of the other he was like to receive but once, so soon would his estate vanish. The temperate may die, the riotous cannot live: sickness is the daughter of intemperance. Yea, the inordinate life is scarce patient to tarry for sickness; but perisheth by mis-fortune: often in a brutish manner, in their own vomit and ordure, they go sleeping and senseless to hell, having neither Reason, Grace, nor Time to repent, or so much as cry, Lord, have mercy on us. There is no sin which hurts not the sinner; but of all, Riot is the most dispatching: so soon doth it bring men to their end, so often doth it kill them in the act of sin.

2 But more; why should Christians seek pleasure in Intemperance? We have not so learned Christ. S. Paul tells us of them weeping, whose belly is their God. We cannot speak of them without passion and compassion; O that our prayers and tears could recover them! Why should we seek the pleasures of the world, that have a world of pleasures without it? One delights in turning over his white and red dross, another glories in his vain Titles: one takes pleasure in a dainty dish, another in a witty jest: one in a kite, another in a dog: shall these pleasures be our envy, or our scorn? Why do we call ourselves Christians, and rejoice like worldlings? That man solaceth himself in his earthly possessions, because he hath not a foot of Inheritance in heaven: another sports with his hawks and hounds, because he hath no fellowship with Saints and Angels: a third tells over his bags of gold, because he hath no graces to number: another studies delicate dishes, and provides him sweet wines, because he never tasted the cup of salvation: another prides himself in his titular dignity, because he hath no hope of future glory: a last hunts after nothing but mirth, and is then farthest from it, when he thinks himself deepest in it: he cares not how vain his sport is, so it be pleasant; and if he can while away the time, and chase off melancholy, he thinks that day spent happily. If the world be a man's God, Pleasure must needs be his religion.

But shall the Christian be thus cozen'd? Shall not we disdain these frivolous and lawless delights, that have solid and everlasting comforts? Far better were it to spend our time in tears, than thus to be transported with wanton pleasures. To an holy soul, earthly pleasure is like an importunate fiddler, that without invitation impudently thrusts himself into his chamber, draws and plays, and will not be denied. He may give it the hearing, and that's an high favor: but he dares neither reward nor commend it: yea, he thinks it harsh music, and in his heart secretly condemns it; because he hath far better of his own. When he hath tuned his soul with meditation, he feels a sweet consort within, betwixt God and himself; his part being praise and obedience, and God's part toward him the peace of conscience. This world is like a bad fool in a play; the gross spectators laugh at those jests, whereat the wise man is ready to hiss: he entertains that with scorn, which the rest do with applause. We have the true fountain of joy, let us never stoop to these riotous puddles. Our ends are not the same, why should our ways be so? Some have God, not the world: some have the world, not God: some have neither God nor the world; and some have both. First, some have God, not the world, as Lazarus: his heart was full of divine comforts, whiles his body lacked crumbs. Secondly, some have the world, and not God; as Nabal; who possessed a world of wealth, not a dram of comfort. Thirdly, some have neither God nor the world; nothing but misery here, nothing but torment hereafter. Fourthly, some have both, as Abraham, who was rich while he lived on earth, and dying was glorious in heaven. Let us use the world, but enjoy the Lord; be thankful for these blessings, but rest our hearts on Jesus Christ.

They think it a pleasure, they shall not find it so. Conceit is the charm. Wicked joys are like those locusts, upon whose heads were (not crowns, but) as it were crowns (not of gold, but) like gold: their faces were (not but) as it were faces of men; their hairs (not indeed, but) as the hairs of women: their breast-plates, as it were breast-plates of iron: all these, shadowy, and similitudinary: but verse. 10. There were stings in their tails: not as it were, but true stings indeed. These idolatrous parasites offer sacrifices to the world, as the Philistines did to their Dagon; our god hath delivered our enemy into our hands: they did but think it was Dagon that helped them, it was not. Let us resolve things to their first matter, and so consider them; what is a sumptuous building, but a little burnt earth, or hewed timber? what is a beautiful creature, but the same earth we tread upon, better tempered? What is gold, but a vein of the ground better coloured? What, rich apparel, which man takes up in pride, but that the worm hath egested in scorn? Fame is but smoke, metal but dross, and pleasure but a short vanity. Howsoever too many think all this to be but the voice of a melancholy scholar, yet they shall feel and confess it undeniable truth. The devil is like a Iuglar, that puts the world like a piece of money into thy hand, and bids thee hold fast; whereas he by a liegerdumaine hath formerly got it away, and when thou openest thy hand, there is nothing.

We have seen some as happy as the world could make them, yet of all men the most discontented. Large possessions, goodly houses, beautiful spouses, hopeful children, full purses; yet their life hath been neither the longer, nor the sweeter, nor their hearts the lighter, nor their meals the heartier, nor their nights the quieter, nor their cares the fewer; yea, none more full of complaints. Among men generally, the poorer, the merrier. While I see men at once find wealth, and lose their mirth, as if they could not cease to be poor, but withal they cease to be happy; I cannot but conclude, that riches and content are like two buckets, while one comes up full, the other goes down empty. Yea, I account none so miserable, as they that grow rich by sin, or great by flattery. When wealth comes on the best terms, it is but vain: when upon ill conditions it is a curse. What is a silken coat, when there is a stinging conscience within? Or a high Title to advance the name, when there is a hell in the soul? O that men could see, how much better it is to be poor, than evil; and that there is no comparison between want and sin. It was a Christian choice of a reverend man; Let me rather be in hell without sin, than glorious and wicked upon earth. Vain pleasures, if they could be sound, yet are short: if they could be long, yet they are not sound. Their best is but as a good day between two agues, or a sunshine betwixt two tempests. Laughter concludes in tears; a little pleasure for so much repentance is but a hard penny-worth. The voluptuous man's ground bears no flowers, but either they prick the fingers, or offend the nostrils: if they be sweet, they have their thorns; if fair, yet not without annoyance. The worldling speaks of the Christian, Alas, poor beggar: but the Christian finds him rather worth his pity, than his envy; Alas, poor worldling. Moses rather chose to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasure of sin for a season. I wonder at the faith of Moses; but presupposing his faith, I wonder not at his choice. When the devil shall make this proffer, All these will I give thee; return him Peters answer, Thy gold perish with thee. They that sow in tears, shall reap enjoy: but a world of sensual joys, shall never bring man a good harvest. Gaudent falsis bonis, pereunt veris tormentis. Men call for pleasure, as the Philistines did for Samson, to make them sport; and it pulls down the house upon their heads. Youth, Health, and Wealth being met, would have a dance; and Pleasure must be their minstrell: but in the first change, those three wanton damosels were taken up by three unhappy mates; Age, Sickness, and Poverty: Youth was surprised by Age, Health by Sickness, and Wealth by Poverty: at which sight, Pleasure fled away, and Time delivered them over to Sorrow.

1 Let us think upon this world, as it deserves, with contempt. [Use.] How little can it do for us, and that little, with what deceit? What is thy heart the better, what the merrier, for all these pleasures wherewith it hath befriended thee? When did it offer honey, but a sting withal? Milk and slumber, without a nail and an hammer? Pleasure is like a flattering Host, that promiseth good cheare, but the reckoning pays for all. He that compares the welcome, with the farewell, shall find he had better have fasted. Believe them that have bought their experience dear; it is better to avoid sin Ante gustum, quam post fastidium; before we have tasted; than after we have surfeited. Look we up to that heaven which God hath promised, and Christ hath purchased; being but one half upon earth, let the better part converse above: from thence it came, and thither it is ordained to go. Let us get that resolution, that we are only willing to live, because our time is not yet come to die; pitching our desires upon those pleasures, which have neither bounds nor end; which are certain, though future; whiles these are fickle, though present. Mans heart will not be empty of thoughts; if heaven have taken up the rooms, the world is disappointed. We confess the happiness of salvation, and wish it; but we fasten on this world. Laudamus superna, terrenis fruimur: we fill our mouths with heaven, but our hearts and hands with earth. Paradise is a joyful place; yet when death comes, we are loath to go thither. But if a man were travelling a myrie way, on a rainy day, in tempestuous weather, were he not mad that had rather go on still, than yield to be at home? The more hold we take of this world, the more we lose hold of the Lord. Tene certum, dimitte incertum: let us turn from vain pleasure that seeks us, and seek that pleasure which shall forever content, and never cloy us.

2 Instead of taking pleasure in Riot, let us rejoice in Christ. Worldlings offend, that laugh when they should mourn, and Christians offend too; if they droupe when they should be cheerful. God hath done great things for us, wherefore we rejoice; and we sin if we rejoice not. They err in false mirth, and we in causeless heaviness; if while we enjoy the God of salvation, we are sorrowful. Is there any joy without God? And where can God be without joy? When the Lord hath made us happy, he will con us no thanks to make ourselves miserable. Shall we freeze by a warm fire, or starve at a feast? We find God reconciled, Christ our Advocate, the holy Spirit our Comforter, we have peace in our conscience, in heaven an inheritance; we should be both angry and ashamed at ourselves, to ask our hearts that question, Why art thou sad, O my Soul? If we be in Christ, our very bread is a symbol of the bread of life; and our wine, of that cup we shall drink in heaven. What should discomfort us, if Christ be with us? All our joy is not reserved for the next life, some is afforded us on earth: God's greater light doth not extinguish the less. Friends, children, wine, oil, health, liberty, competency, are not given us for discontent. We may not make them God's rivals, but rejoice in them as God's blessings. In themselves they are nothing, in him they are worth our joy. If God had not thought them blessings, he had not bestowed them; and how are they blessings, if we delight not in them? Because we may not take pleasure in everything, shall we therefore take pleasure in nothing? They wrong Christians that forbid them mirth: the Gospel is not such dull metal, but the Tydings of joy to all believers.

Spots they are and blemishes.] In every sin there is not only Reatus, that binds over to punishment: but Contaminatio, a defilement: which makes the sinner not less filthy, than guilty: and even when the guilt is remitted, the filth remains still. A child by his own unrulinesse hath gotten a hurt or maim; upon his prayers and tears he is spared the punishment; his father may forgive him, but it requires time before the Surgeon can heal him: the hurt is not so soon cured, as the fault is pardoned. David cries, I have sinned, and God answers, I have taken away thy sin; yet there still abides a spot for David's tears; which he must weep thoroughly to wash off. Spots and blemishes; the words are but two, put together with a Conjunction; and I will not put them asunder with a division. The argument of my discourse is corruption, putrefaction, sores and diseases; so that it may be called a spiritual Sermon. No man looks upon ulcers with pleased eyes, yet the Surgeon must see them. We love to behold Gold-smiths stalls well adorned, with choice of plate, of Jewels; not dung-hills: yet the cock in scraping the dung-hill, found a Jewel. We like to see beautiful creatures, not horrid beasts and serpents: yet the Painter made a famous piece of Bucephalus, and the Crocodile was so curiously shadowed, that in Egypt it was taken for a god, and worshipped. We delight to view flowers of various forms and colors, not weeds: yet to paint a weed to the life, is held a good art. Whatsoever I want of the art, I shall do my endeavor to resolve this short character into divers conclusions.

1 All men are spotted, originally from their parents: of actual spots themselves are the parents. So foul are all by nature, that they can neither be good, nor see good; nec assequi mandatum, nec consequi remedium. If thou ask how thou camest by it; thou art beholding for it to thy father, he to his father, all to Adam, Adam to Eve, and Eve to the devil. There is no evil which our natural incleanness would not admit, if God restrained not. Every actual sin is a spot to the soul: a lustful look is a spot to the eye: a bribe taken is a spot to the hand: he that unjustly gets or keeps away another's right, is worse than a thief burned in the hand. Church-dues detained is a spot to the estate, that cannot be washed out from the sacrilegious man or his heritage: every oath or lie is a spot on the tongue: every malicious thought is a spot on the breast: every riotous draught is a spot on the throat: every idolatrous cringe is a spot on the knees. You will say these spots are not visible, not seen on the body: no, for hypocrisy is a white skin drawn over them, which from our dull eyes hides their appearance. But to God they are visible, to whom all hearts are more transparent than any diaphanous glass is to us. And at the last day, all these spots shall show themselves, (when all secrets shall be legible) in their odious forms. Now as it is in some mortal infection, the spots appear not in the flesh, but strike inward to the heart, and kill it. If all our internal spots should break out, we could not endure one another. The whole world would be an Hospital, and every man a Lazar. God calls for sacrifice, the Priest presents it, but it must be without blemish: we have no sacrifice to offer but ourselves, and how will he accept a spotted man, that required an unspotted beast? This is one step.

2 The whole world is spotted, that is, another step: in the universal blemishes of nature let us read our own. When I consider the great and good work of God in the Creation, making all things for man, and man for himself, I think of the people's acclamation to the same workman, in a new and greater work of our Redemption; He hath done all things well. He hath done, such is his Power: All things, such is his Wisdom: Well, such is his Goodness. First, we have the work of Christ, Fecit: then the universalitie of the work, Omnia: Lastly, the nature of that universalitie, Bene. When I look upon the present world, I find a great alteration; foulness and corruption in those Creatures, which were from God of so pure a constitution. He made the world so fair, that he loved it; but when man had took it in hand, he began to loathe it. All flesh had corrupted his way: Corrupted, that is the turpitude: All flesh, that is the latitude. The morning saw all things very good, the evening of the same day saw spots and blemishes in all Creatures. To charge God with this degeneration, is the highest blasphemy: coldness may sooner arise from fire, than any evil from the fountain of Goodness. Indeed there is a penal evil; and this he acknowledgeth his own: there is a criminal evil, which we call a radical, causal one; this is ours. This last is an unrighteous action, which pleaseth man, and displeaseth God: the other is a just suffering, that pleaseth God, and displeaseth man. The punishment of sin is not properly an evil, but a good action of Justice; dishonoring the guilty Creature, to honor his holy Maker. As we say of war, It is a destroyer of nature in Individuo, but a preserver of it in Catholico.

Of this foul and spotted evil, Deus non est Autor, sed ulter. How then came these spots? An enemy hath done this, sowing tares upon the Wheat. Which shows first, that good was before evil, for it is Superseminatio, a sowing upon: good had the priority, though evil hath now got the superiority. Next, that evil is an accident, not a nature; but such an accident as hath quite spoiled nature, as rust mars the gold. That as we say of a Prince, though he be Deus in terris, yet he is but Deus terrenus; though a god before men, yet but a man before God. So our whole natural condition, which was Angelical in respect of the beasts, is now but (as it were) bestial in respect of the Angels. I do not intend by this, according to the dotage of some new Philosophers, that every irregularitie on earth puts a star out of order in the firmament: that every adulterous act here, sticks a blot upon the Moon there: that our pride and ambition hath brought the Sun lower than it was: that he either slackes or mends his pace, as we grow dull or forward in God's service. For the stars keep their courses, the Moon hath no more blemishes than she had a thousand years ago: the Sun is neither come nearer, nor gone further off, but keeps the same line wherein God bade it run at the first: the heavens are as clear, and the planets as regular in their wanderings, as ever: the celestial bodies admit of no qualities. If all our sins were set as spots on the Sun, Iamdudum Sol nobis pice us apparüisset; it had been as black as pitch before this time. But this I say, The whole Creature groaneth under the bondage of our corruption: and the world was once so foul with our iniquities, that the Maker scoured it with an Inundation of water; and again, it is so grown so filthy, that he will purify it with a deluge of fire, in the day of Judgment.

3 But if every man be spotted, who shall then enter into heaven, seeing into that City no unclean thing shall come? This is true, yet many that have been unclean persons, are since admitted. They went not in impure; Such ye were, (as could not enter) but ye are cleansed, saith Paul to his Corinthians. They were all naturally unclean, yet many of them are now in heaven; but before they entered, they were washed. I list not to uncover the spots of God's Saints; let them be buried in the dust with their bodies: yet their souls are in Heaven: how got they thither? They washed them, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Washed, therefore they had been foul: Made them white, therefore they were of a stained color before. If God should look for a spotlesnesse here, whom should he look upon? Is any man's heart pure? no, he shall have cause to his death-bed of redoubling that prayer, Create in me a clean heart, O God. And his Confessor may still preach to him that Text, Wash thy heart from iniquity, that thou mayest be saved. And who can say, He hath clean hands? Say his heart were clean, say his hands, yet be his feet clean? They stand next the earth, therefore are aptest to soil. For this purpose Christ washed his Disciples feet, and thus commented on it, and interpreted his own action; He that is washed, needeth not save to wash his feet. Out of the Bath a man comes washed all over, yet some gravel will stick on his feet.

He is not of an earthen constitution, that hath no earthly affection. Christ took our flesh, took it without spot, without spot he kept it; no man else ever received it so, or kept it so. Hate the garment spotted by the flesh; yet the flesh it self is this garment, and it spots it self with it self. Job was a holy man, yet he confesseth after all this washing, that his own clothes would make him abhorred. David holy, yet he desired to be washed with Hyssop. The Church is said to have no Spot: yet every particular limb of that fair and spotless body, every soul in that Church is full of spots. Yea, Christ himself hath spots, not by nature, but by imputation; not his own, but ours; he took all our stains and deformities; He became sin for us: for us he was made full of spots, that we in him might be spotless. The Grace of God may go a great way in our souls, and yet not leave us without spots. Mercies may fall in abundant showers on our hearts, and yet not mollify all our hardness. Those holy fires may consume a great deal of our dross, not all. Corrections are a Bath to purge us from the foul corruptions we gather by walking in this dirty world; yet Israel confesseth, they were not cleansed from the iniquity of Peor to this day. God may heal our wounds, and yet leave scars; purge our blood, and yet leave spots. But there is no spot so foul, which repentance cannot wash off; this shall make a man lift up his face without spot. And Saint Paul prays for his Thessalonians, that they might be presented blameless at the coming of Christ; which he would never have begged, if he knew it never could be granted. Not to have no spot here, but to have no spot imputed hereafter, is the happiness of a Christian.

4 We have all spots, but these are spots: for the Apostle speaks not of their actions here, but their persons: not the blemishes of the men, but that the men themselves are blemishes. This is a high degree of sin, to be wholly turned into sin. The Leopard is full of spots, but the Leopard is not a spot, nor is the spot a Leopard. Many a body is diseased, but the body is one thing, the disease another: but when the whole body is turned into a disease, it in a manner ceaseth to be a body. When the clouds let fall their showers by drops, we call it a Rain: but when all those drops are met in one channell, it is no more a rain now, but a flood. They have committed so many sins, that for the number and continuitie of them, they cease to be sinners, and are very sins. As the Prophet Micah calls it not the idolatry of Jerusalem, but the Jerusalem of idolatry. The case seemed desperate, when there was no soundness, nothing but corruption; and David says, There is no whole part in my flesh; and Job is said to be so full of ulcers, that a pins point could not be thrust between them. If this were other than an emphatical expression of their malady, it was strange that the whole flesh should be one coagulated ulcer. Yet was this bile but upon the flesh, and there was life within: but here the whole soul and body becomes one botch; as Lucan spake of a wounded body, Totum est pro vulnere corpus: no more a body, but a wound: no more sinful Creatures, but Creatures that be sins. If there were not several degrees of sin on earth, there should not be several measures of torment in hell. When travellers ride together in a dirty way, all are dashed, but some more or less than others, according to their more or less circumspection or advantage. Vice is said (in the Fable) to have in her garden a subterraneous vault; out of which she could convey foul water, to soil the curious spectators; which was of different operations in the staining. They that were defiled with the aspersions of wantonness, were sooner dried; they that with pride, covetousness, ambition, quite spoiled their garments: they that with envy, treachery, homicide, sacrilege; could never get out the spots, but were fain to cast their clothes into the fire. Spots may be sized in so deep, as not to be purged but with the fire of hell.

5 To whom do these appear spots and blemishes? First, to God, who hath pure eyes, and can abide no unclean thing. He hates filthiness in his own, though he do not hate his own for filthiness, because he respects them in Christ: but in the reprobate he so abhors the sin, that he hates even the sinner for it. It was for the sin of man, that God repented he made man: thus it offends the first Person. These spots drew from Christ a sweat of blood in the Garden, and the blood of his life on the Cross; so they offend the second Person. They also grieve the holy Ghost; who looking for the fruit of joy and peace, and such sweet perfumes, finds the stench of sordid corruptions.

2 To the Angels; they despise not a diseased body, nor an infected house, if a holy soul dwell there. No plague shall come nigh thy dwelling, for he shall give his Angels charge over thee. They are set not only to keep us and the plague asunder, but still to keep us though we light in a house together. They do not scorn to take Lazarus his soul out of an ulcerous body. It is not sickness, but sin, from which they turn their faces. But now, should Angels stand by sinners in their acts of uncleanness? Must an Angel wait upon a proud popinjay, while she is dressing her self by the glass? While men ply their drunken carouses in tavernes, do they look that their Angels should fly up and down the room? Iniquities be sport for devils, but an eye-sore to the Angels; they that rejoice at a sinners conversion, do rather grieve at his aberration.

3 To good men, whom nothing pleaseth, that displeaseth their Maker. While the world is laughing, David is mourning for them; Mine eyes gush out rivers of waters, because they keep not thy Law. Men turn from Lazars and lepers, and refuse to visit visited houses: yet Tutius morbi, quàm vitii consortium: it is better dwelling with good men in an unwholesome climate, than in the purest air with unclean persons; as Lot, in bona terrâ cum gente mala.

4 To bad men: for howsoever sinners love to be evil themselves, yet they would have others good to them. Nero, that took such pleasure in shedding blood, when his own turn came, complained. He that delights in polluting the marriage-bed of others, would not have his own abused. The thief would not have his own goods stolen; the proud man is said to carry a dagger, to stab him that is prouder. No wicked man doth wish to suffer, what he takes pleasure to do. We read of four lepers that kept company together, but it was upon a desperate adventure; neither could endure others leprosy. He that hath the most corrupt lungs, complains of another's offensive breath. Naaman the Captain of the host of the Syrian king, was a great man with his master, and honorable, and a mighty man in valor, But he was a Leper. A great warrior, an honorable Courtier, yet a Leper: The leprosy was a nasty and loathsome disease, yet this odious and wearisome condition lights upon a great person. Now, what was all his glory, with his leprosy? They that honor'd him, avoided him; and he was abhorred of those that flatter'd him. The basest slave of Syria would not change skins with him, though he might have his honor to boot. So men given to villainies are shunned of those that are little other than villanous. These spots are infectious, more than the plague-tokens; and though they please other dissolute souls here, yet they shall curse them in hell, because their example is the cause of their greater torment.

5 To the creatures; for God made them to serve man, and to wait upon him in the service of God: now when man turns himself out of God's service, all the creatures in serving him are (as it were) turned out of God's service too, and grieve that they are compelled to wait upon a wrong master.

6 They are offensive to the very damned in hell; which seemeth strange, but it is true. That rich man, not out of charity to his brethren, but favor to himself, requested that warning might be given to his brethren; least as his example increased their sins, their sins should advance his torments.

7 But now lastly, do they not offend themselves? No, the sick man may feel, the dead does not. Who knows the spots on his own face, but either by the reflection of a glass, or by the relation of others? The Lazar or Leper cannot choose but abhor himself: how little pleasure did that Syrian Peere take to be stooped unto by others, while he hated to see himself? While his hand could not move to his mouth, without his own detestation? But this is a spiritual disease, festering inwards: when the conscience is unclasped, and these spots break forth; as when the bottomless pit was opened, the locusts flew out; and sin shall write her inscription on the doors; not as in visited houses, Lord have mercy on us; but in the chambers of despair, All mercy is fled from us; it will be fearful.

6 Sin is of a defiling quality; like a be-myred dog, when it fawnes upon us, it fowls us. It may in this one thing be compared to fire, it converts matter into it self. Staine a cloth, or die it into another color, yet still it remains a cloth: the body turns meat into it self, is not turned into the meat: only as fire can convert a burning material into fire, so sin turns a man into sin, that he is no more a man, but a very spot. Corporal leprosy have been healed by natural means; and blemishes that art cannot cure, yet it hath devices to hide. But for these blemishes, there is nothing in nature to cure them, nothing in art to cover them. If honor could do it, Naaman had been no Leper. A noble sinner is but a noble spot. If riches, Nabal had not been branded for a churl: but heaps of wealth laid upon heaps of wickedness, make but a great dunghill. Can perfumes? Civet indeed will make a dog smell as sweet as his master: but a vicious life doth more stink through a garnished body, than a rotten body doth through perfumed garments. Can beauty? No, even when there appears no blemish in the outward skin, yet through a lascivious demeanour the beauty it self becomes a blemish. Nay, can Profession it self hide or heal the spiritual leprosy? Rome dresseth herself in the robes and titles of the chaste spouse of Christ, yet is she not still that scarlet Whore? The Jesuits have been saucy with the name of Jesus, are they not still that mystery of iniquity? Saul did prophesy in the College, was he not still a blot in the world? Many are beautiful as the sons of the morning in their profession, that are still black birds, children of the night in their conversation. As Sigismund the Emperor said of Julian the Cardinal, Legate at the Council of Basil, when he was highly commended to him, Tamen Romanus est, yet he is a Roman. So we may say of an hypocrite, when he is praised for his zealous devotion, Tamen macula est, yet he is a blemish. Men of foul and corrupt manners shall find nothing in nature or art, that shall keep them from being, and being called spots.

7 Open and notorious offenders ought to be denied these holy feasts, to be put from the Sacrament; and instead of communicating with us, to pass under the censure of excommunication from us; till in penitent tears they have cleansed their pollutions. Spots in the life are worse than spots in the face: if such sluttish aspersions appear on the skin, will any man come to the Church before he hath washed his face? These are not members, but spots of the body; we pare off such excrescent blemishes that the body may be perfect. They may be in the decree of God members of Christ, they are not so yet in the judgment of man: we call not a wart on the flesh, a part of the body. Indeed it is true, Servi est invitare, Dei est separare: yet the Minister calls in some, whom the master casts out. Matth. 22.13. We may not put the sign of Christ's body into a drunken hand, nor offer the Symbole of his blood to a bloody and malicious heart; nor the Sacrament of peace and love to them that hate both love and peace. We do not only say, come not hither if ye be such, but we must not suffer you to come hither if we know you to be such. We wash our hands before we take our temporal food, and shall we not cleanse our hearts before we receive our spiritual? The dead body of Christ was wrapped in clean linen, and is not his living body worthy of a clean conscience? The body and blood of the Lord doth make us holy, and is it not our default if the same should make us guilty? Read and compare John. 6.54. with 1 Cor. 11.29. How contrary are these effects of the same thing in divers men? Even as life and death, heaven and hell, salvation and perdition, eternal joy and eternal fire. O that man for a little filthy lust, the pleasure of his sense, or indulgence to his affections, should convert heavenly food to his own bane. He that comes a penitent, departs an innocent: they that come with all their unwashed blemishes, with a thousand woes return; the supper of life is to them a bloody banquet.

Observe what preparation was required for receiving of the Law. For time, three days: if so much time must be spent in preparing to take it, our whole life is short enough to prepare a reckoning for it. That was the word of a command, Paul calls it the ministration of death: this is the word of Promise, the promise of Christ and salvation with him. If that required three days, which was all terror: what time of preparation is due to this that is all comfort? When our souls are at the best, yet our approach to God requires particular addresses, and new preparations: it is well if the whole Lent can prepare our hearts for Easter: and they that do not fit themselves before they come, had better have kept away. For matter, all Israel must be sanctified: what was the cause? Seven weeks they had been out of Egypt, yet all this while Egypt was not gone out of them: the Egyptian vices, together with their flesh-pots, stuck still in their memories, in their appetites. They had passed by many waters, of the Red Sea, of Marah, of that gushed out of the Rock; yet the infection of Egypt was not washed off: therefore they must be sanctified. Doth not this charge lie as close upon us? Now is the time we draw near unto God in a special manner: he often preacheth to us, and we hear him: we often call upon him, and he hears us: but now we come one step nearer, as it were to take him by the hand, and convey him in these holy symbols to our heart. Sin is never safe, but then most dangerous when we bring it into the presence of God. If it comes along with us to the communion table, it shall not only frustrate what we do, but endanger us to a worse estate than we brought thither. At all times we must be holy, but then especially when we present ourselves to the holy eyes of our Maker. Who dares kiss the Kings hand with a foul mouth? We wash before our private meals it home daily; but when we are to eat with some great Person, we scour our hands with bals. We cannot be too holy when we come to feed with our Savior, yea to feed upon him. When he is a guest, we are but the Host: but when we are his guests, he is both the Host and the Feast, even the cheare it self. Now if they must be so sanctified to receive the Law, how holy should we be to receive the grace of the Gospel? Yea, not only their persons, but their very clothes must be cleansed. As they that come out of infected houses, air their garments: their clothes smelt of Egypt, and must be washed. But why their clothes? and why washed? Garments are not capable of sin; if they were, water would not cleanse them. The danger was neither in their skins, nor in their coats, yet they must be washed, that they might learn by the cleanness of their clothes, with what souls to appear before God. Because they were more in danger of being foul, than of being bare, they are washed to begin their age in purity.

At this solemn time men use to put on their best garments; a custom which we approve, rather than reprove: it is fit our reverence to the Presence of God should be seen in our very vestures. Devotion takes no pleasure to dwell slovenly; like Galba's wit, under a deformed roof. Christ doth not condemn external cleanness, when he prefers inward holiness. It is not pulchritudo pellu, but turpitudine cordis, that comes under censure. A crystal glass doth well, but we do not use to put mud into it. But what is a neat suit with foul and ragged linings, a white skin with a filthy soul? Rather than not to have the face fair, too many use lotions and colors to blanch it: Feciam Deus fecit, pictam diabolus infecit. Yet both within and without, we should be cleanly. But especially God looks to the pureness of that part which resembles himself. He made every creature juxta genus suum, after his kind: man in the image of himself. A whited or adorned clay is not his image; the God of Spirits looks to the spirit, that that be holy and humble; both. For some will be holy, and not humble: but all the pureness of their minds, will not bear out the stiffnesse of their knees. If they want reverence, pretend what they will, I shall hardly credit their holiness. Others seem humble, but they forget to be holy: so some guest sit down with the rest, but they have no stomach.

In a word, Accipite loti, accipite laeti; with cleansed hands, and joyful hearts. Let not Christ be forced upon you, but stretch out a thankful hand to receive him. Si non receptor es, deceptor es, thou coozenest thine own soul. Adsit mentaliter, cum haberi non potest sacramentaliter. But when the feast is prepared, and we invited, let us come. Let us avoid spots, that we be not defiled: bewail our spots, that they may be pardoned: and resolve against all spots hereafter, that we may be comforted.

8 We may not abstain from the Sacrament; because there be spots and blemishes in the Society: It is true, these spots should be removed; say they are not, shall we therefore remove ourselves? To them the holy bread is bane, to thee it is Salvation. The unworthy receiver eateth and drinketh damnation to himself; Sibi, non tibi, To himself, not to thee. If we communicate with evil men, and not in evil things, we have no harm. Woe were us, if we should live in the danger of all men's sins: we have enough of our own, we need not borrow of others. Every man shall bear his own burden▪ ours is not so light, that we should call for more weight, and undertake what God never imposed. It was enough for him that was God and man, to bear the iniquity of us all; it is no task for us: alas, we faint under the least of our own. Nor can others sins become ours by toleration or connivence, but by imitation and indulgence. If each man's known blemish be every man's, then is every son of Adam as public a person as his father was. We were all in Adam, stood or fell in him; there must be some difference between the Root and the Branches. My fathers sin is not mine, much less my neighbors. The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father. Unless a spotted soul could blemish the Sacrament, it is to my believing heart the bread of Life. The Church of Thyatira had many blots, yet the Holy Ghost lays on them none other burden but this, That which thou hast already, hold fast til I come. He bids them not leave the Church, but hold fast their own.

But a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? It is true by the infection of it: but it only soureth them that partake it, not those that dislike it. Am I become an adulterer, because an adulterer communicates with me? Am I guilty of excess, because he that was yesterday drunk, today eats with me soberly? Charity would think that no man brings his sin along with him to the Sacrament; but rather, hath formerly exonerated his soul by repentance. Whiles we dislike, resist, reprove, and mourn for it, it cannot be ours. The Corinthians had these love-feasts, and in them gross and sinful disorders; yet Paul doth not say, Abstain from the Sacrament till they be reformed. No, he corrects the abuse, but he commands the act. That you come together for the worse, I praise you not: but that you come together, I praise you. God hath commanded us to hear and receive; where did he ever say, Except you must come among sinners? Their uncleanness can no more defile us, than our holiness can excuse them. We are invited to a feast; if but a napkin or a trencher be misplaced, or a dish ill carved, we fly off from the table in a fume, and never stay to thank our Host. O that men would be but sober, and either less curious, or more charitable.

9 As all sins are spots, so some have a more special resemblance, as carrying in them a natural poison and filthiness. Such particular instances we find in the Scriptures, wherein God discovered the spots in their consciences, by sticking spots on their carcasses. The Egyptians and Magicians contest with Moses, and are struck with a scab on their faces. It is against men's lusts that we fight, and for their lusts they contend against us; spots they would defend, and therefore God lays on them such spots from which they shall not defend themselves. I never knew men oppose God's Messengers, but once before their death they complained of their gettings. Miriam's foul tongue is punished with a foul face. She would have been as glorious as her brother Moses, now every Israelite sees his face glorious, hers leprous. The venom of her tongue would have eaten into the reputation of her Prince, therefore the venom of leprosy eats into her flesh. Both Moses and Miriam had need of veils, the one to shadow his glory, the other to hide her deformity. And indeed, deformity is the fit cure of pride: she scorned Zipporah the Midianite for not being so fair as her self, now the Midianite will not change complexions with her. Pride and envy are two fatal spots, they seldom scape infamy; the divine Justice will cast filth in their faces. Let them that be proud because they are well-favored, think on Miriam: the beauty that is held with affectation, shall perish with contempt: God hath spots for the proudest face.

Of this cup drank Gehazi; seeing he would needs take part of Naaman's money, he shall take part with him in his leprosy. These were heavy talents for Gehazi: he had far better have kept a light purse and a homely coat, with a found body and a clean soul. The talents were never heavy till now: two of Naaman's servants bore them for him before, now Gehazi must bear them himself alone. He desired a load of treasure, and he hath loaded himself with a curse: he would have two suits, and he hath got a third to boot; one more than he looked for, an unchangeable suit; that shall last as long as his skin, that shall clothe him with shame, and be ever loathsomely white, noisomely unclean. The sins of Gehazi were covetousness, fraud, sacrilege; and all passengers shall read these in leprous characters. What be more truly the sins of this City, than these three of Gehazi? Sacrilege, in which it hath justified all the world: covetousness in our hearts, fraud in our hands, who complains not of? These be the spots of our souls; and hath not God answered them all, over and over again, with spots on our carcasses? Have we not been plagued for these injuries, with stinging and stinking leprosy? Have our own persons only bore the punishment? no, but as Gehazi's sin was not only read in his flesh, but in his posterities; so even the children have drunk of the Fathers cup.

Lastly, for application; our land is too full of these spots; it is more populous of blemishes, than of inhabitants. There is a tale of Saint Bridget, that she heard the blessed Virgin saying to her Son, Rome is a fruitful land: to whom he answered, It is so indeed, sed zizaniae tantum, only fruitful of tares. If a man were in Tartary, he might see abundance of men, but all black-Moors: we have store of Christians, but a great number of them be spotted Christians: yea, not a few be rather spots than Christians. Our sins multiply faster than our people: Oh that there were any comparison between their numbers; for one man hath a great number of sins. We had but some families of Papists; now they talk of whole colonies, streets, and lanes, and parishes of the brood of that spotted harlot. Drunkards were as rare as wolves, now they are as common as hogs. Whores were like owls, only night-birds; now they keep open house, pay scot and lot with their honest neighbors. Hugo Cardinalis said of Innocentius when he departed from Lions, that whereas there were four Stews at his coming thither, he had left them but one; marry that reached from one end of the city to the other; Vrbs est jam tota lupanar. With spotted lives we profess that unspotted Lamb.

We know there is a spotted fever that rageth and rangeth among us, in which we may read our spotted courses. How justly doth God retaliate to us our sins; spot for spot, blemish for blemish, for the hidden spots of our souls, these visible spots on our bodies. I do not censure the persons sick of that disease; God forbid: there be greater sinners that scape than some that suffer. A good man may die of that plague, which was bred by others sins. Of a poison'd fountain in the way, the innocent passenger may miscarry, as well as the guilty; the true man as the thief. Yet from a general visitation we may gather a general Instruction. By a fever that discovers it self in spots, God punisheth our undiscover'd sins; thus he cries quittance with us. The spots declare the sickness to be a malignant and pestilential disease: and by these tokens the Physicians see more clearly what to do: you will say, There is comfort in that: but most commonly all they can do, comes to nothing, there is no comfort in that. It is some benefit for a man to know his enemy; but withal to know him too hard for him, is small benefit. It is a poor step toward recovery, when our spots do only tell us that we are worse than we thought ourselves. Indeed it is well, if God's marks upon us, can be our marks to God, and like symptoms of death direct us to the Fountain of Life: if this Judgment can make way for mercy, as a strong wind clears the air for the Sunshine. To say, the house is visited, God's tokens and marks be there, the spots are upon them, keeps off friends; for few men dare visit where God hath visited. But though they dare not come, under pretence of being pestiducts to others, yet the Lord fails not to visit his with compassion, as with affliction. Many a man hath been saved that had God's marks upon him: but he is a weft and stray, in a woeful state, upon whom God hath not set his marks. Paul professeth that he bore about in his body the marks of the Lord Jesus, and this was his joy. David hath it, Shew some good token on me for good; there is then a token for good, a token of goodness: and the heat of a fever working on the body may be but the chafing of the wax, that God may set the seal of Salvation upon it. Howsoever, let us pray for them that have these spots on their bodies, God comfort them: and no less heartily for ourselves that have these spots on our souls, God amend us.

[Uses.] 1 Learn to see thy spots: many have unknown sins, as a man may have a mole on his back, and himself never know it. Lord, cleanse me from my secret faults. But have we not spots whereof we are not ignorant? In diseases, sometimes nature is strong enough to put forth spots, and there she cries to us by these outward declarations, that we are sick; sometime she cannot do it but by the force of cordials. Sometime conscience of her self shows us our sins; sometimes she cannot but by medicines, arguments that convince us out of the holy Word. Some can see, and will not; as Balaam: some would see, and cannot; as the Eunuch: some neither will nor can, as Pharaoh: some both can, and will, as David. We may know the malice of a man by his confession, yet we do not know whether there be not as much malice remaining in him after his confession; we are sure of his hatred, not of his repentance. Many a one knows his fault, yet loves it. It is poor comfort to know much danger, and not to know that that is the worst. A woman is eased by being delivered, and she forgets her pains at the birth of a Son: but could she read his future story; how ill a man, perhaps how ill a son, he would prove; I doubt whether the ease of her body would recompense the grief of her mind. What am I the better to know my calamity, if I know not the way to comfort? Such a knowledge would but increase sorrow, and be a purchase clogged with more encombrances.

Yet is it the first degree toward recovery, to see our spots, though upon the sight we have a touch of despair. There be some virtues that cannot be exercised but in trouble. We must be poor and want, before we can exercise the virtue of thankfulness: we must be miserable and in anguish, before we can exercise the virtue of patience: so we must be sinners and have spots, yea, we must see those spots, and feel those sins, before we can exercise the Grace of Repentance. If we did not cry, we should die, and by our crying we come to live: though we dig deep, yet the gold is worth our labor. What must we do next?

2 Confess these spots. Our corporal blemishes we hide from men's sight, and that with modesty: none but beggars expose their sores, to move compassion. And we do not amiss to hide our infirmities also from public view; seeing every sin doubles it own malignity by being offensive. But if we hide our spots from God, we and our spots shall perish together. The spots that God hateth, are the spots that man hideth. He that carveth a piece of wood, covers the spots; as the Painter hid the scar in Agamemnon's face; and many living pieces are painted for the same purpose. Yea, there be some that study to be spotted, as if they thought themselves then fairest, when they are foulest. Jacob practiced an invention to procure spots on his sheep; and these invent, meditate, project how to procure spots in their souls. And yet when they have them, they are as careful to hide them; if God can find them, so it is; he shall not know it from their mouth. These are idolaters of their own stains, in love with their own foulnesses, and conceal them as Rachel did her fathers gods. But he that hideth his sins shall not prosper. There is a voluntary confession, the language of a tender conscience: and there is a confession upon the rack, when the smart of our sides opens our lips. Jacob sought to bring spots on his lambes, and God did prosper his rods: when affliction can bring us to confess our spots, then God doth prosper his own rods. Until we tell the heavenly Physician our spots, he applies no medicine; unless we call that a medicine, which drives us to tell them. But without discovery of our disease, how should there be a recovery of our health? In the Courts of human Justice the safest plea is, Non feci, Not guilty: but in the Court of Conscience, Peccavi, Guilty: Lord, have mercy on me a sinner.

3 It is madness to confess ourselves foul, and not to wash; therefore let us endeavour our own cleansing: that as our Apostasy hath blurred our pureness, so our renovation may put out our apostasy; and as sin defiled nature, so grace may destroy sin. In our making there was work for God only; in our marring there was work for ourselves only; in our restoring there is work for God and ourselves together. To do this, Sprinkling will not serve: so Agrippa stood within the shower of Christianity, and had some aspersion of it; he was almost persuaded to be a Christian: as the dew stands in drops on the blasted grass. If sprinkling could make a cloth clean, we should never stand to wash it. Nor is Dipping sufficient; so Nicodemus had an immersion in the river of Grace: but Christ tells him, Except he be borne of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God: he must have a better scowring ere he get in: Some look into the Church, but have not the Power to tarry; here's a dip and away. Nor will half-washing do it, or washing by halves; like Ephraim's cake, half-turned, dow-bak'd. Men may be loti, and not mundi; washed, and not clean. Hypocrites cozen many, but none so much as themselves. Indeed dipping or sprinkling shall be effectual, when the Spirit of God applies it. Once dipping in the pool of Bethesda, cured; and the blood of the new Covenant is called the Blood of sprinkling. I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and you shall be clean. It is no more with God, but as the Prophet said to Naaman, Wash and be clean. Non tenetur ad media, in tribuendo remedia. But for us, when we put our souls to washing, let us be sure there is water enough; as John baptized in Aenon, because there was much water. Our Fonts are made large enough to dip the Infant, but Charity dispenseth with Ceremony. Let thine eyes gush out a stream of penitent tears, to bathe▪ and purge thy Conscience from these spots. I wash my bed, and water my couch with my tears, saith David; tears enow to run down from his bed to his couch. Many guests were invited to that great supper, yet there was room: he sends for more, takes them up from the hedges and highwayes, and rests not bidding till the rooms were full. So invite Graces to thy soul; bid Repentance, a heart-easing guest; bid faith, a cheerful guest; humility, charity, patience, zeal, till thy house be filled. Bee not washed without, and foul within: hypocrites are but painted tombs; look on them, they please your eyes: look into them, they offend your nostrils. Some have washed their faces, not their hands; so Judas his face kisseth Christ, but his foul hand betrays him. Some have washed their hands, not their faces; so Pilate washed his hands, yet with his mouth condemned the Innocent. Some have washed their eyes, not their ears; they presume to understand so much of their own Judgments, that they scorn to hear any Preacher. Some have washed their ears, not their eyes; they come to hear, but their eyes are full of uncleanness. Some have washed only one side; like Plaises; you see a white side, turn them over, and they show you the black. Others have washed all but their feet; and those Propter situm & transitum, for place and motion, are foul still. But let us leave no part unwashed on earth, as we desire that no part should be excluded from heaven.

4 To conclude, there is only one Fountain to purge all these spots; the blood of the Lamb. For this purpose was Christ baptized, even to wash us. There was in him neither fore-skin of corruption, to need the knife; nor filthiness, to need the water: he came not to be his own Savior, but ours. We were all uncleanness; he would therefore have that done to his most pure body, which might be of force to cleanse our most impure souls. His Baptism gives virtue to ours: yea, it doth not only wash the souls of men, but it washeth that very water whereby we are washed. By that act the water became clean and holy, and can both cleanse and hallow us. If the handkerchiefes that touched the Apostles had power of cure; how much more that water which the sacred body of Christ touched? His first baptising was with water, his last with blood; both of them wash the world from their sins. If we manifest them to him by an humble confession, he will take them from us to himself by a merciful translation. The spots of every believer belong to the body of his Savior: for this purpose he came to the earth, even to assume them. So that when we deplore our spots, we do but present him with his own: and till we do so, we with-hold his right. He doth challenge the sins of all humble penitents to be his by imputation, and by imputation we challenge in faith his righteousness to be ours. O Christ, take from us that foulness of our own, which would condemn us; and give us that holiness of thine, which is only able to save us. Amen.

Sporting themselves in their deceivings.] These words asunder describe to us a varlet and a fool, and both together make up a devil. To sin in deceiving is the part of a lewd wit: to make sport with sinning, is the part of a foolish heart. It is easy to deceive, to deceive a friend, to deceive under the profession of friendship: to make this a sport, is most wicked. We have an Achitophel in the one, an Hanun in the other, a Belial in both. First, consider them asunder.

Their deceivings.] He that is resolved to make no matter of his Conscience, may easily find matter enough for his coozenage. But is there no deceit justifiable? Be there not piae frauds?

peccata compensativa? as when a virgin is saved from ravishment, a man from murder, by a lie? There is no intentional good can bear out a formal evil. I know it is good to prevent sin; but not to prevent it with sin. The Egyptian mid-wives were taught by the fear of God to disobey that bloody command: to say, they had warrant for so foul a deed, they knew would be no excuse. God had said to their hearts, Thou shalt not kill: this voice was louder than Pharaohs. Thus far I commend their obedience in disobeying: but to help themselves with a lie, I dare not commend their excuse. In not killing, they feared God: in dissembling, they feared Pharaoh. There was weakness in their pretence, goodness in their practice. Yet God blessed them, and rewards with good their very not doing of evil. But here, let not men lay the thanks upon the sin, which is due to the virtue. Let us ascribe things to their right causes: their mercy was recompensed, their lie or deceiving was but pardoned. Mical delivered David through a window: thus fare she did like David's wife. Then answered her father, that he threatened to kill her, if she freed him not; here she began to be Saul's daughter. In keeping him from the guilt of innocent blood, she did well; but not in closing it up with a lie. But as she loved her husband better than her father, so she loved her self better than her husband. She saved her husband by a wile, and now she saves her self by a lie. Thus she loseth half the thanks of her good service, by devising a slander of her husband, to quit her self, and delude her father.

Thus David himself deceived Abimelech: he that overcame the Bear, Lion, Giant, is overcome with fear. Long had he gone upright, yet now begins to halt with the Priest of God, and draws from him by a falsehood that favor, that shall cost him his life. O what would we have given afterwards to redeem this oversight? Thus to Achish he feigned himself mad, and thought it the best use of his reason, to dissemble the loss of the use of his reason. I find such acts of deception in the Saints, I find infirmity in those acts, but malice, and avarice, and dishonest fraud, I find not.

Wicked Deceit is another thing; that beguiles men of what they have, with a vain hope of that they never shall have. When the simple go to the market, the subtle then get money. Deceit is ever bad enough, but then worse when it is disguised with an oath. They that cannot tell how to begin praying, know not when to make an end of swearing. The Jews durst scarce mention the Name of God in a truth, our deceivers stick not to call it into a falsehood. Some think that 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 comes of 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, for truth lies hidden: and deceivers endeavor all possible means to keep it hidden still. Like Potiphars wife, they have only the garment of an honest man, to prove their dishonest cause. Pueri talis, viri Sacramentis: whosoever devised the sentence, Rome takes up the practice. They have Pictures and Pageants to deceive some, formal gravity to deceive others, false oaths to deceive all. There is a generation of Deceivers, Flatterers; whose profession is to catch dotterels: these by maintaining men's works, work out their own maintenance. The devils special agents, that deforme men by commending their deformities. Ravens feed but upon dead carcasses, these upon living souls. Of all wild beasts, the tyrant is the worst: of all tame beasts, the flatterer. The tradesman deceives me of my money, but the flatterer cozens me of my virtue, yea of my salvation. They are summer-birds, they never sing in winter: take off the idol, gold, they kick the asse with their heels, instead of bending their knees. Vermin run not away faster from an house on fire, nor lice from a dead body, than they from poverty. Alexander Severus being certified how one Turinus, under color and pretence of his interest with the Emperor, had abused the people, promising things he never performed; fastened him to a stake in the market place, and smother'd him to death with smoke; the crier proclaiming, Fumo pereat, qui fumum vendidit. They that deceive men of their estates by adulterate wares or false promises, are the brokers of falsehood: but they that obtrude Popish trash instead of God's truth, and deceive men's consciences, are the special agents of Antichrist. The former have lost all worth of trust; but from the other, the wisdom of heaven deliver us.

Sporting themselves.] It is hard when the fool can find no bable to play withal, but sin: casting firebrands, and arrows, and death; and then jeeres it, Am I not in sport? If Samson fire the shockes of the Philistines, and Absalom Joab's barley fields, is this in sport? We read 2 Sam. 2.14. Both the commanders were cruel, both so inured to blood, that they make but a sport of killing. Custom brings sin to be so familiar, that the horror of it is turned into pleasure; and homicide is held but a sport. Cocks indeed, and dogs often fight and tear one another, to make men sport: but that men should bruise one another to make sport for their own kind, is no Christian, if it could be a rational course. Cham derides his fathers nakedness: it should have been his sorrow, he makes it his sport. It is ill for a man to make himself merry with that which angers God. While the Philistines will find nothing to play upon but Samson, Samson finds nothing to revenge himself upon but the Philistines. When the wicked laugh at sins with delight, God laughs at them, but with scorn. Yea such sport on earth, is the only sport for the fiends in hell. While men be hammering sin, the Tempter stands at their elbow: while they are acting sin, he sits in their bosom: all this while he is a working: but when they have done it, and make a sport of it, the devil himself makes holy-day. The common pretence for the foulest abuses, is but sport. The sacred Word of God is profaned: tax the violaters of that Majesty; alas, it was but in jest. Business of State may not be made the business of the Stage: and shall that which God prizeth like Himself, be sacrilegiously turned to a jest? More safely may the Satire play with the fire, or the fly with the candle. O charm your mouths from jesting with that which is given to save your souls. No fugitive abroad does so much harm, as a detracter or jeerer at home. They that write of creatures naturally disposed to the ruin of man, do as well mention the flea as the viper: because though the flea cannot kill, yet it doth what harm it can: so these licentious jesters utter all the venom they have. But non patitur ludum fama, fides, oculus; those three can abide no jest.

If sin were rightly considered, it were more worthy our tears, than our sport: the fool laughs at it, but the Saint weeps for it. David wept buckets of tears for his own sins, but whole rivers for others. The world is like Jonah: for him was the storm raised, yet he only was asleep: godly mourners are like the mariners, crying to God for mercy. Jerusalem made a sport of Christ, Christ wept over Jerusalem. If we weep not for the sins of the land, nobody else will: sinners themselves will not weep: they spend the evening in jollity, go to bed in security, and rise again without any further repentance, than that they call a cup of repentance, small drink to cool their intemperat heat. For their sakes Judgments are upon us, and yet they of all men are least sensible of them. The fire of wrath is kindled, and they do but warm themselves at the flame. Who must come with pailles of water in this combustion, but they that mourn in Zion, and for Zion? Turn to me, saith the Lord, with weeping; where did he ever allow us to come laughing? A horrible incest was committed among the Corinthians, and ye saith Paul, are puffed up, & have not rather mourned. Alas, that men should look merily on that sin, which heaven beholds with sore eyes! Though Christ forbad the daughters of Jerusalem to weep for him, who was holy; yet he commanded them to weep for themselves, who were sinners. He that knew what sin was, and felt it so sharply, is not reported ever to have laughed; often you have him weeping, the chief mourner. When he came to Jerusalem in triumph, yet he wept over it. Neither the solemnity of time, nor joy of the people, nor those loud acclamations, could either drown his voice, but still he lifted it up; nor dry his eyes, but still he wept. If we truly knew our sins, our sport would be turned into tears; yea, and the more we weep, the better we know our sins. As Solomon said, he that increaseth knowledge, increaseth sorrow; so he that increaseth sorrow, increaseth his knowledge. A penny in the bottom of a bason of water seems as big as a shilling: it seemeth so, it is not so. But our sins steeped in tears seem as indeed they are; yea indeed they are greater than they can seem. As wine drowns cares, so doth sport sins; they are little, easy, light, and slight to those that are merry with them: but when instead of sport in our deceivings, we begin to bleed for that sport, then the remembrance of them is grievous unto us, the burden of them is intolerable. Now we that have turned our grace into sin, and our sin into sport, let us turn our sport into sorrow, that God may turn our sorrow into joy.

Thus we have considered them asunder, now both together: where we have two principal observations. 1 All Deceit is sinful. 2 Religious deceit is intolerable.

1 Fraud is no laughing matter, and he that deceives another, doth much more deceive himself: nor could he think it a sport, did he foresee who should have the worst in the end. Shew me that falsehearted Politician, that hath not consulted shame to his own house. Look upon Achitophel, whose counsel was as the oracle of God: see him advising Absalom to abuse his Fathers Concubines. What an hellish depth was in the advice of that Israelitish Machiavell! If Absalom be a traitor, yet he is a son: nature may return to it self: Absalom may relent, David may remit, what then shall become of us? Therefore he finds him out an act uncapable of forgiveness, to secure the conspiracy. Who would think that so lewd a man had ever sat at King David's Council-table? Yet was he wise enough to advise others, not to be good to himself. Policy and grace have one Author, but they do not always go upon one errand, nor to one person. David falls to his prayers, Lord, turn the wisdom of Achitophel into foolishness: and loe, one short ejaculation of innocence shall overturn this deep foundation of policy. God hath furnished his creatures with power to war, even against Himself; but he is wise enough to confound their devices: and while they reap shame by the abuse, he will have honor by the gift. Vainly doth Achitophel hope to strengthen evil with worse, to make treason fortunate by incest. He was one of David's deepest counselors, yet one of David's shallowest fools, that said in his heart, there is no God. Now what was the success? he meant to deceive David, he shall deceive himself. He strove for the highest renown of wisdom, and runs into the grossest extremity of madness. Hushai's counsel is allowed for better; and now Achitophel is beaten at his own weapon, he can live no longer. He goes home a worse asse than that which carried him, and puts the halter about his own neck. In this glass let politic sinners read their own destiny; they are to themselves the most desperate fools. If the supreme Judge could be deceived, fraud had some hope: but seeing he is just, it makes the own mittimus to hell.

Had Judas any better success in his deceiving, that betrayed Christ with a kiss? Ab osculo incipitur bellum, & per pacis indicium pacis rumpitur Sacramentum: From the fairest flower of courtesy, this spider sucks the deadliest poison of trechery, Joab's kiss was a preface to a stab; and Nero kissed his mother even when he meant to bathe his hands in her blood; and Judas hath the same key to his horrid treason. It is bad fallere fallentem, to deceive the deceiver, howsoever some blanch it: for another's sin may hurt us, it is our own sin that condemns us: and because another man would do me a mischief, must I therefore do myself one? Burn myself to keep him from the heat of the fire? But Judas thought to deceive him, qui nec falli novit, nec fallere; that was both God and Man: a man most innocent, and therefore would not deceive: a God omniscient, and therefore would not be deceived. To beguile a harmless man, was doli improbitas, dishonesty: but to offer this to the all-seeing God, was doli impietas, Atheism. But what was the end of this deceit? he re-delivers the hire of his trechery, and saves the hangman a labor, by making away himself. Christ was well acquainted with such deceivers; Master, saith a Pharisee, Scimus quia verax es, we kn• thou art true: when he could have silenced him, Hypocrite, Scio quia mendaces, I know thou art false. Satan is that old Deceiver; and was so successful with the first Adam, that he durst set upon the second. He saw him depend upon his Fathers providence in the matter of nourishment, therefore tries him in a matter of miraculous preservation. Throw thyself down, &c. He that can sustain thee without bread, can preserve thee in this precipice. The roof of the Temple was an hundred and thirty cubits high; this was a pinnacle above the roof. From this Pyramis the cunning Sophister persuades him to make proof of his God-head, by the break-neck of his manhood. The gloss of the deceit was to show a miracle, that he might believe him; the meaning was to break his neck, that he might laugh at him. This is the way to proclaim thy Deity, to get credit in the world; men's eyes shall teach their faith, that there is more in thee than a man: and for danger, there is none; what can hurt the Son of God? Wherefore serves the guard of Angels, charged with thy safety? Thus in one act thou mayest be both safe and famous: trusting thy Fathers providence, and those serviceable spirits, cast thyself down. How strong was this deceit, if it had lighted upon a son of Adam, that was not the Son of God?

2 But deceits are then most abominable, when they shroud themselves under the wing of Religion; for such we shall prove these. There is no such devil, as he that looks like an Angel. Copper would never cozen us, if it had not the tincture of gold. Thus the sons of Jacob dealt with Hamor, Gen. 34.13. Revenge is their meaning, that is bad enough: to hide their cruelty with craft, worse: but to hide their craft with Religion, worst of all. The smiling malice is most deadly: and hatred gloss'd with dissimulation discovers it self in the most prodigious mischief. We will agree with you, if you will be circumcised. Here was God in the mouth, in the heart a devil. Never was any project so bloody, as that is coloured with religion. The better vice shows, the worse it is; and the worse it is, the better it desires to show. A Sacrament is intended, not to the good of the soul, but to the murder of the body: O religious coozenage! Did the sons of Jacob deceive alone? no, they dissemble with Shechem, and Shechem with his people; Shall not their wealth be ours? The one pretended religion, and meant murder: the other pretended profit, and meant pleasure. They prevail with Shechem, and Shechem with the city. The conceit of commodity is a powerful oratory: not any love to the Sacrament, no not to Shechem, but the hope of gain, makes them prodigal of their blood in so painful a condition: they are content to smart, so they may gain. What was the end of this deceit? They receive a Sacrament, and their bane withal; and their first drops of blood are a preparative to the whole stream. Thus they are paid for a purpose of deceiving. Do the other escape? no, their sin lived, after the city was spoiled. It was a horrible impiety, instead of honoring a holy sign, to take advantage by it. How did those deceived Hivites die cursing that Sacrament, which had betrayed them! even their curses were the others sins. I would the children of Rome were like the children of Jacob in anything else but this; but in this only they are like them, and in nothing else. Did they not eat their sacrament upon a bargain of blood? Do not their bloody practices make all reasonable souls abhor their religion? Is not Religion their pretence, and murder their end? Why then is all this killing of kings, ruining of countries, massacring of cities, blowing up of states? For the Catholic cause, they confess; and by the catholic authority, they cannot deny. O who can more than pity them, that forsake Christ the Prince of peace, and either choose no God, or a bloody one?

Take another example. Abner revolts from Ishbosheth in a discontent, and persuades Israel to the change; and fetcheth his motive from the oracle of God. He knew this well enough before, and smother'd it for his own turn; now for his own turn he publisheth it. He knew this decree for David while he opposed him; now he wins the heart of Israel by showing God's charter for him. If Ishbosheth's title to the Crown were bad, why did Abner maintain it? If good, why did he forsake it? Was his conscience better informed? No, but his mind was changed. Saul's son had disgraced him, therefore now he is for David: he is become loyal for David's sake, and become David's for God's sake. No man ever heard Abner godly till then; and he had not been so then for any conscience of goodness, but for opportunity of revenge. Pride hath made many English malcontents the Almsmen of Rome: here their ambitious desires are crossed, therefore they fly hence in a snuff: trechery is their aim, and hither they bring it in the shape of Religion. O that they could see how odious it is, to make Devotion a stalking horse for policy! What was Abner's end? Whom David dismisseth in peace, Joab repaies with death. Of all men, the religious dissembler shall be sure of plagues.

Thus Absalom first deceives the people, and therein his father. The people by insinuations; that considering his godly person and magnificent state, how affable he was to sutors, how humble in his greatness, how diligent in searching their causes, how full of pity to their complaints, how great his love of justice, and care of the common-wealth was; they conclude, the world hath not so complete a Prince as Absalom. Thus like a close traitor, he stole not his fathers goods, but his fathers people's hearts. He deceived his father by a vow, made forty years before, to be paid, in Hebron. He carried peace in his name, war in his heart; and to perfect his trechery, nothing will serve but a cloak of Religion. The devout man hath made a vow a great while ago, and now the toy takes him, he must perform it. The good old king blesseth God for blessing him with so godly a son; who indeed had never more deeply renounced all goodness, than now he talks of Religion. This guilt of piety set on the rough metal of his conspiracy, takes with his father against his father, with the people against their king: so his father sends him away with one blessing, and they entertain him with another. What is the end of this deceit? The just meed of all traitors: his Mule and his treason leave him hanging between heaven and earth. Bring me word, that I may come and worship him; saith Herod to the Sages. Another devout Machiavel, like the devil confessing Christ. How horrible was this villainy, to mask it self under a show of piety! Herod will worship him, that's the pretence: Herod will worrey him, that's the meaning. The cunning hypocrite never intends so ill, as when he speaks fairest. What was the event of this politic deceiving? First, God mocks him, then the Sages mock him. God besots him, that he could not find the way to so horrible a mischief. Why else did he not send some of his bloody Assassins to Bethlehem? Why did he not employ his Courtiers, rather than trust strangers? Why, seeing the matter so nearly concerned him in his opinion, and the journey was so small from Jerusalem, did he not go himself in person? why did he not rather prevent their journey, than hazard their disappointment? All the courtesy he meant that new-borne King, was but to cut his throat; and will he trust forrainers with this inquiry? Such a fool is the craftiest Politician, when God will blind him. These Messengers come no more back to Herod, with their news. He had mocked the wise men, and now God makes the wise men to mock him. He sends to enquire of them, whom he sent to enquire of Christ, and they are gone. How doth he rage, and fret, and curse himself, for trusting strangers in so important a business? How would he revenge their false play, how would he torment them, if he could catch them? Thus he palpably finds himself gull'd by those, whom he meant to deceive.

Thus doth God's Justice often punish illusion with illusion: they that nourish a purpose to deceive, shall be deceived indeed. Think of these examples, ye that make Religion your Messenger, and mischief your errand. It is a disease whereof this generation is sick at the very heart. Hypocrites make use of God for their own purposes: they frequent the Church with the devoutest Saints, but it is that the Saints may take them for devout: they pray with the godly, but to prey upon the godly. You shall not miss him at the lecture in the forenoone, but it is in hope to find some of you at his shop in the after-noon: and then, he that received in so much truth at his ears, hath not one word of truth in his mouth. Alas, too many make that divine business but a color for their own designs. Over-fair shows are a just argument of unsoundness: no natural face hath so fair a white, and clear a red, as that which is painted. While we see men notoriously zealous, we may be charitably suspicious. For wicked hypocrites care not to play with God, that they may mock men. The more soul a project is, the fairer visor it seeks: those monopolies that undo the Commonwealth, have the most colorable pretences to benefit it. But as Christ said, Qui vos recipit, me recipit; so in effect, Qui vos decipit, me decipit: He that receiveth you, receiveth me: and he that deceiveth you, deceiveth me: and he must rise betimes that over-reaches his Maker. Let me shut up all with discovering to you three sorts of Deceivers.

1 The deceivers of souls; such are the Romish Seminaries. They tell you of a Savior called Christ; but they mean the Pope; for his word must stand, when Christ's Word is thrust behind the door. They say, his judgment is infallible: yet Pope John the twelfth made Deacons in a stable, a boy of ten years old a bishop, the Lateran a stews, degraded his Predecessors shavelings, made them confess, Episcopus meus nihil sibi habuit, nihil mihi dedit, prayed to Jupiter and Venus, and drank a health to the devil. Not a few of that race were as bad, yet Papists will believe they cannot err; are they not worthy to be deceived? They say, that the Church cannot subsist without the Pope her Head; yet was that Chair ten years empty. We use to say, Great head, little wit; but certainly, no head, no wit. Whence should their Church have her wit, when she was bereaved of her head? The Irish men are not troubled with venomous beasts, for this they must be beholding to Saint Patricke: yea he is said to have obtained of God, that no Irish man should abide the coming of Antichrist: yet their great masters are ashamed of it, and never allege it to clear the Pope from being Antichrist. They will show Pilgrims that go to Jerusalem, a three corner'd stone; and make them believe it is that very Stone spoken of in the Psalms; The Stone which the builders refused, &c. A monk, among other relicts, boasted that he could show some of the hairs that fell from the Seraphicall Angel, when he imprinted the five wounds of Christ on the body of Saint Francis: yea, gave out, that he had brought from the East some of the sound of the bells that hung in Solomon's Temple. Be not these prety coozenages?

But too gross to deceive us, too bunglerly for these times: therefore (as old tricks of cheating can do no good) they find out new: which is a short cut, an absolute denial of all truth that is not for them. They do not dethrone kings, nor suborn parricides, nor pardon incests and murders, nor worship images, nor disgrace the Scriptures, nor forswear by equivocations, nor prefer the mother to the Son, nor set States in combustion, nor make the eating of flesh on forbidden days damnable, and uncleanness every day venial; not they: though we know they do all this, yet when they deny it, they look we should believe them. A reverend bishop of this land dies an orthodox Catholic, a professed Protestant, as he lived: yet they disperse books, and tell the world, he died in the Romish faith. A common liar should not be believed; men know them so, yet trust them. O ye besotted English, why will you be thus deceived? The devils hand is in it, their hand is in it, your own hand is in it; but above all, God hath a hand in it; who justly gives them up to believe a lie, that would not receive the Truth.

2 The deceivers of the Church, that make it nothing to defraud their Maker. Joseph was twice stripp'd of his garments; first by the violence of envy, then of lust: the first time, of necessity; the next, of choice in conveniency. His brethren took away his coat, to deceive his Father: his Mistress kept his coat, to deceive his Master. First, the policy of Rome took one garment from us, which the Policy of State took again from them. We had still a poor coat left, the remainder that escaped impropriating: now sacrilege keeps away that too, The first we could not save by law, this last we cannot redeem without law: and that is a remedy worse than the disease. That first rent had the color of pleasing God; this other, of punishing us. The world doth charge us with pride and covetousness, and therefore surchargeth us with beggary and emptiness. Joseph may plead, but is not heard; and our case is as bad; we may deny the Justice of the fact, but we scarce dare accuse the offenders. Hanun misused David's Ambassadors, and shaved off one half of their beards, and cut off their garments to the middle; exposing them to the derision of all beholders. The Israelites were forbidden a shaven beard, or a short garment: to despite their law, they are sent away with both. Man hath a double ornament to his body; one of nature, the other of art: the natural ornament is the hair, the artificial is apparel: in both these are David's servants abused. But is not David sensible of it? Doth he not feel himself dishonored in their persons? Will he only hide it, and not revenge it? We are God's Messengers to the world, and the world returns us so to God. Surely, as David could not but feel his own cheeks shaven, his own coat cut, in his Ambassadors: so the Lord cannot but appropriate that injury to himself, which is offered to his Ministers. By the universal Law of nations, Ambassadors are free; that office hath in the name sufficient protection, nor was it ever wronged without a revenge. Do not the notorious contempts cast upon us below, concern our great Master above? Is it possible, he should not feel them, not revenge them? Yes, David revengeth it on Ammon to the full; for cutting his Messengers coats, Joab and his army cut their throats: and certainly, God will not let such indignity pass unpunished.

3 The deceivers of men, in regard of their estates; contrary to God's flat prohibition, Defraud no man. Wherein and how far any man hath thus deceived, his Conscience will tell him: unless by the long habit of coozenage, he hath also learned to cozen his conscience. Fraud is theft, and a thief (we say) no man can endure to be any long time, for his conscience; but how if his conscience it self be turned thief? Howsoever deceivers think to get a patrimony of riches by fraud, as they pretend Jacob got the Birth-right; yet it will not be so lucky to them as Rebekah's pasty, they shall not (with Jacob) get the blessing by it. The crafty Fox hug'd himself to think how he had coozened the Crow of her breakfast: but when he had eaten it, and found himself poisoned with it, he wished the Crow her own again. Wealth got by deceit is like a piece of buttered Sponge, (an Italian trick) it goes down glib, but in the stomach swel•, and will never be gotten out again. It is not stable; aut ipsis acquirentibus est peritura, aut ab haeredibus dissipanda. Turnus had been spared, but for his Belt: when that was found about him, it cost him his life. So when other sins might find mercy, Christ seeing the cognizance of fraud, begins to strike; Pallas, te hoc vulnere Pallas immolat, one torture more for that. It is an observation set upon the house of Desmond in Ireland, that Maurice Thomas the first Earl raised it by injustice, and by injustice Girald the last Earl of that race ruined it. The gains a man gets by deceiving, at last he may put in his eye, and yet see himself miser•ble. Sin is the greatest cheater in the world, for it deceives the deceiver: ye, as Haman built his own galhouse, it makes a snare to entrap others, but is sure to confound the sinner. The seed of this sin, as of all other, is in every man by nature; The heart of man is deceitful: and while he thinks there is no deceit in it, even in that he is most of all deceived.

Find out this Thief, apprehend him, convict him, condemn him, yea execute him; yea, fraudi ne credas, ne mortuae quidem; bury him, lest his very death deceive thee. It is one brand of the wicked, When thou sawest a thief, thou consentedū to him. Many see a thief abroad, and consent not: but the most dangerous thief is at home, within us, there we consent. Elisha had a thief to his servant, but he followed him at an inch, and found out his brokage. Thus pursue thy fraud, meet it at every turning, cross it with resolution, plague it with restitution: wish thy Heart, as that Roman built his house, not close to do things unseen, but open to the view of passengers, to show that honest dealing dwells there. Fraud is both Latro and Latrocinium, a theft to others, a thief to a man's self: as falsus in Latin signifies both the deceived, and the deceiver. It steals away his grace, his peace, his conscience, his blessing in this life, and his hope of glory in the life to come. The day of the Lord shall come as a thief too: and if it take a man with his thefts about him, no heart can think how terribly it will handle him. We have wronged no man, we have corrupted no man, we have defrauded no man. Thrice happy conscience that can speak this in sincerity. That steward hath not deceived God in his trust, and God will not deceive him of his reward, eternal blessedness in JESUS CHRIST.

While they feast with you.] A certain kind of feasts is much spoken of by the Apostles, Paul, Peter, Jude; Love-feasts. This is a Festivall time, yea the greatest of all Christian feasts: every Sabbath is a feast, this as it is a Sabbath of Sabbaths, so a feast of feasts. The day of the Sabbath was changed for the honor of Christ's Resurrection; and this is the day for whose honor the Sabbath was changed. Something therefore I take liberty to speak of this occasion. Feasts may be distinguished into three kinds, Holy, Civil, and Profane. The form must be, the next may be, the last should not be. The first are commanded, the second allowed, the third prohibited. The first is a feast to God, the next for man, the third to the devil.

I begin with holy Feasts. Religion is not tied to time, yet cannot Religion be publicly exercised without a due time allotted for it. It is necessary to consider every great blessing of God, and it is kindly and convenient to consider it in the day it was wrought: then to repeat it with thankfulness, is to do opus dici in die suo. Otherwise the revolution of time would eat out the memory of these precious benefits. The Jews, among many, had three solemn Festivals every year, by God's institution: the Passover, Pentecost, and Feast of Tabernacles. 1 Of Tabernacles, in remembering that Israel dwelt in Tents forty years. Even that walk of theirs must not be forgotten in their rest. So much memory of our weary pilgrimage here, as may stand with the perfection of our joy in heaven, shall be reserved. 2 The Passover, to remember them of their deliverance from the Egyptian bondage: freedom from such a servitude deserves a solemn and set time of gratitude. 3 Pentecost, in remembrance of the law given on Mount Sinai. God wrote it, that it might be legible: wrote it in stone that it might be durable: honored the day with an annual feast, that it might be memorable. Thus the Christian Church, among the rest, celebrates three principal feasts. Christmas, in honor of Christ's Nativity, then was he borne to the earth. Easter, in honor of his Resurrection, then was he borne from the earth. Whitsuntide, in honor of the mission of the holy Ghost, by whom we are new borne to the kingdom of heaven. And we still retain two names of the three, Passover and Pentecost. Such is the accordance of the two Testaments, that those two Jewish feasts, and our two Christian, agree, both in signification, and in time.

1 For signification, their Passover and Pentecost are types of our Easter and Whitsuntide. For the former, God did pass over the doors where the blood of the Paschal lamb was sprinkled. What signifies it? That God will pass over our sins in the day of wrath, if he find our souls sprinkled with the blood of Christ, That Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. That night Moses led Israel out of Egypt, this day Christ brings us out of the house of bondage. When he rose from the grave, this was the full conquest of all our enemies, for the last enemy is death. For their Pentecost, it was a memorial of the law, which is a hidden Gospel. And our Whitsuntide is a memorial of the Gospel, which is a revealed law. The Law was given on Mount Sinai, the Gospel on Mount Sion: the Law written in tables of stone, the Gospel in tables of flesh; I will write my Law in their hearts; so run the terms of the new Covenant. On their Pentecost, the Law was given in fire and smoke, obscurity was mingled with terror. On our Pentecost, the Gospel was given in fire without smoke, befitting the light and clearness of the Truth. Fire, not in flashes, but in Tongues: not to terrify, but to teach. Thus the promulgation of the Law makes way for the Gospel: first we must feel the terrors of Sinai, before we have the comforts of Zion, the gracious consolations of the holy Ghost. If therefore they had a Festivall for the Law, the Ministry of death; good reason we should have one for the Gospel, which is the Power of God to salvation. Christmas is a merry time, then we sing and feast. Easter is a solemn time, then we communicate and feast spiritually. Whitsuntide is a triumphant and flourishing time, not only for height of the season, but for the Churches confirmation by the descension of the holy Ghost: Quod abeuntem Christum non amisimus, & venientem Spiritum possidemus.

2 As they agree for substance, so for the very time of delivery: the ancient Jews kept our feasts, and we still keep theirs. First, their Passover and our Easter is kept at the same time: so fitly, to their coming from the bondage of Egypt, doth answer Christ's coming from under the bondage of death. Even Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us: that spotless Lamb, whereof one bone might not be broken. Next, their Pentecost and our Whitsuntide, on the very same day. Their Pentecost was fifty days after their Passover, and our Whitsuntide is fifty days after our Easter: from which number of days, it hath the name, Pentecost. The very day that God came down in fire and thunder to deliver the Law, the holy Ghost came down upon the Apostles in fiery tongues, for the propagation of the Gospel. Now as our feasts be the same, so be our Sacraments. We do all eat of the same spiritual meat, and drink of the same spiritual drink. The same. 1 In objecto; the same Christ in both: not one God in the Law, another in the Gospel; not a bloody one there, a merciful one here, as Marcion blasphemed. But Jesus Christ the same, yesterday, and today, and forever. Only a darker Christ there, a clearer Christ here, but still the same. 2 Idem non signis, sed significatis: in the Passover the Lamb of God was prefigured, in the Lord's Supper he is exhibited: they saw him, we have him. 3 Identitate nominis; so Circumcision is called Baptism, and Baptism Circumcision; and the Lord's Supper, the Passover. 4 The same in efficacy, their effect is all one: their faith received Christ before he came, in as full virtue as we do now he is come. But if the body of Christ be really in the Supper, why was not the Lamb so transsubstantiated in the Passover? For Paul says, It was the same. They never say, in Baptism the water is turned into blood; why then say they so of the wine in the Eucharist? This is my body, which is broken for you. There is Subjectum, Th••, this Bread: Praedicatum, my Body: Copula, Is: and the exposition, which is broken for you. There is Bread, and there is the Body: the Bread is not the Body, therefore an holy sign of it. We receive a mystical, yet the true body of Christ: not in veritate rei, sed in significante mysterio. Thus be our Sacraments the same: indeed they had also Manna, and water from the Rock; both which signified Christ: they were fed with Sacraments. Their bread was Sacramental, whereof they communicated every day: who complains of receiving often, when the Israelites received daily? Their drink was Sacramental; surely from them the Church of Rome never learned a dry communion. Twice hath the Rock yielded them water of refreshing: the true Rock is Christ, and he yields it always. Out of his side issued that bloody stream, whereby the thirst of all believers is comfortably quenched. They thirsted with repining, let us thirst with faith our spiritual Rock shall abundantly satisfy our souls; yea even sustain us till this water be changed into that new wine which we shall drink with him in his Fathers kingdom.

We have seen the harmony and accordance between both the Testaments, now let us return to the feast of the Day. Some difference may seem to be in the Evangelists, about the time when Christ did eat the Passover. Three of them say, on the first day of the Passover: but we read in Saint John's Gospel, before the feast of the Passover. To reconcile these; first, some say, that Christ did not eat the Passover that year: and their reason is glorious, because himself was the Paschal Lamb then to be offered. But this is frivolous, for it is manifest, he did eat it. Secondly, some say, the Passover is taken for the whole time of seven days, and that he did eat it one of the seven. But this is apparently false; for after the Jews had apprehended him, they would not enter into the Judgment hall, for fear of being defiled, but that they might eat the Passover. Christ had that day (before) eaten it, therefore before the seven. Thirdly, others say, he did eat it one night before the Jews, and that he did so, to thrust a sword into Judas his hand, to accuse him for an innovator, and law-breaker. But they that were fain to take up a false accusation against him, rather than none, would have triumphed in this. Besides, the Disciples would have questioned the reason of such an alteration, and the master of the house would have found some fault. And which is above all, the Fulfiller of the Law, and that so punctually, would not have failed in a chief point, so main a circumstance, and that so immediately before his death: and this supposition still sticks in the stomachs of the Jews.

Briefly then we conclude thus. He did eat it on the due and true day, the fourteenth of the month. But then how failed the Jews? for both cannot stand, seeing Christ and they did eat it on several days? It is answered thus: since the Captivity, when the Passover fell on the Sabbath Eve, they put it off to the Sabbath day: so it was called Sabbatum magnum, an high day, because that feast fell upon it. For this reason they took down the dead bodies from the crosses; for if these two feasts had fallen immediately together on several days, they had had no opportunity to bury their dead. But why did not Judas accuse him of this? God so disposed it, that his heart being fraught with malice did not observe it. Some think it was left arbitrary, that who so would, might eat it on the Even, or put it off to the Sabbath. Thus are the Evangelists reconciled. Before the Passover, saith John; that is, before the people did eat it by their Tradition. At the Passover, say the rest, that is, on the day of Institution, when Moses commanded it. So Christ died in the Feast of Passover, that the Type and the Truth might agree together. They took him at night, arraigned, condemned, afflicted, and crucified him, before the end of the next day: this was strange haste: but what bounds are there to desperate madness? They meant nothing but death to him, but God hath this day turned it into life to us.

Surely, even the Angels in heaven keep these Paschal solemnities with joy: the glory of that victorious Lion, who hath triumphed over death and hell, is even to them matter of rejoicing. It is the Sabbath of the new world, our Passover from everlasting death to life: our true Jubilee, the first day of our week, and the chief in our Kalendar. Herein our Phenix rose from his ashes, our Eagle renewed his feathers, the first begotten of the dead was borne from the womb of the earth. Christ, like the Sun eclipsed by the Moon, got himself out by his Resurrection: and as the Sun by the Moon, he was darkened by them to whom he gave light. His death did justify us, his Resurrection did justify his death. He buried the Law with himself, and both with honor: he raised up the Gospel with himself, and both with glory. His Resurrection was the first stone of the foundation; In Christ all shall be made alive: and the last stone of the roof, for God assures us he shall come to Judgment, by this token, that he raised him up from the dead. The devil danced on his grave for joy; when he had him there once, he thought him sure enough: but he rose again, and trampled on the devils throne with triumph. This is Christianorum propria fides; the Jews believe him dead, not living: we believe that he is risen, and sits at the right hand of God. As Moses led the people to Canaan Per desertum, so Christ led us to heaven Per Sepulchrum. His Resurrection is not only Objectum fidei nostrae, the object of our faith: but Exemplum Spei nostrae, the example of our Hope: We all carry mortality about us, and the strongest man is but like Nebuchadnezzar's Image; though his head be of gold, and his ribs of brass, yet his feet are of clay: a stone thrown at the feet overturns this great Image, and down falls man. But ero mors tua, mors: durst death kill Christ? Christ therefore shall kill death. If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men the most miserable. But Spes vitae immortalis est vita vitae mortalis: the hope of life immortal is the life of our life mortal. Death and the grave swallow all, and then burst: as crammed covetousness disgorgeth it self by a prodigal heir.

The Jews craved a sign, and had it: yet then spake against it, or wondered at it. To us it shall be more than a sign, it shall have wonder, and wonder enough; but we will not lose our fruit or part therein for a world. Him, that this day rose from the clods, we expect from the clouds, to raise our bodies, to perform his promises, to finish our faith, to perfect our glory, and to draw us unto himself. I do not say, Come see the place where they laid him, that is empty: but Come see the place where he is, Here is the Lord. I say not with Mary, Abstulerunt Dominum, They have taken away the Lord, and I know not where they have laid him: he is personally in heaven, he is mystically, sacramentally, yea in a spiritual sense, he is really here. Himself said, Desiderando desideravi, I have earnestly desired to eat this Passover with you. Desiderando desideremus, let us earnestly desire to eat this Sacrament with him. God said once, Accipite & manducate, take and eat of every tree but one; but man then mistook the fruit, he did eat and fell. He now says again, Accipite & manducate, Take and eat, this is my body, which is given for you; let us not mistake, but eat and live forever. And The body of our Lord Jesus Christ which was given for us, preserve our bodies and souls into everlasting Life.

As God spake to the fish, and it cast up Jonah, commanded the earth, and it delivered up Jesus; so he will speak to all creatures, and they shall not detain one dust of our bodies. There shall be a dry ground for this valley of tears, a land of the living for this Golgotha of the dead, a settled Mansion for this moveable Pavilion. Christ had his Easter day by himself, there shall be one general Easter day for us all: when the wicked shall rise to contempt, the faithful to eternity of days. Here shall be no terror to affright us, no sorrow to afflict us, no sickness to distemper us, no death to dissolve us, no sin to endanger, for evermore.

2 The next are civil Feasts: when the soul hath been feasted with God, the body may be feasted with the creatures of God: when the mistress hath dined, the servant may sit down. Every Sabbath is a feast, but this is an exceeding day. When we hear the Word, we have a good spiritual meal: but the Sacrament is an extraordinary Banquet; wherein the best cheare of heaven is set on the Table, and the faithful soul feeds more liberally on Jesus Christ. We do not feast every day; that was the Epicures brand; he fared deliciously every day: so nor every day communicate: there may be satiety even in sacred things, and the soul cloyed as well as the body. These Love-feasts were before the Lord's Supper, where the Communicants brought every man his provision to one place, and they did eat together: giving thanks to God, and bestowing the remainder on the poor. Thus were they intended for the increase of Love: but what foul abuses crept in, Saint Paul notes and condemns; one is hungry, and another is drunken. Riot and intemperance is an ill preparation for so holy a business.

First therefore begin with God; a full body makes an unwieldy soul; but a feasted soul will keep a temperate body. First drink at Christ's wine-cellar, before thou touch thine own. Not that I obtrude the Popish custom upon you, which puts a necessity of fasting before: because forsooth they would receive their God into a clear stomach, next their heart. Cannot Christ come into the heart, if there be meat in the stomach? This is as if a man could not come to the Steeple for the sound of the bells. Or as the merry Cardinal said to his fellows in the Conclave, when they could not agree about the Election of the Pope; Let us untile the house, quia Spiritus Sanctus nequit ad nos per tot tecta ingredi, because the holy Ghost cannot get in to us through so many tiles. A weak stomach helped by refection is as capable of Christ as a fasting superstition. Indeed if men can forbear, it were best to have the first morsel Sacramental: but it is the soul, not the body, that receives Panem Dominum, Christ himself. In this point I praise this City, that they begin their feasts with a Sermon, as Jethro began his with a sacrifice. First serve the Lord, then eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and give the rest to the poor. Some have been as fond on the other side; they will eat nothing that whole day after the Sacrament; as if they wronged that holy food, if they thought it would not keep them a whole day. In former times, some would not wash a whole week after their baptising; as if men should refuse to wash a day or two after their trimming by the Barber. But these be fond singularities: Let us keep the day holy, keep ourselves holy, in the strength of the most Holy; that we may confess the virtue of this blessed Sacrament in the sanctity of our future deportment and conversation.

Feasts have their seasonable allowance: the bounty of God reacheth not only to our life, but to our contentment: nor doth he afford us only the bread of sufficiency, but of pleasure; that we may more than live, even live happy. The blessed Virgin at the marriage in Cana, perceived a defect of wine, and she tells Christ, They had wine enough for a meal, not enough for a feast: and if there was not wine enough, there was enough water: water to quench thirst, if not wine to cheare the spirits. Yet she complains the want of wine, and is troubled with the very lack of superfluity. Christ gives her rough words, but answers her faith with gracious deeds; the feast shall be supplied with wine, if six pots full (of two or three firkins a-piece) can do it. To turn one of these vessels of water into wine had been a sufficient proof of his power, and perhaps enough for the present necessity: yet he makes wine enough to serve above an hundred guests, had they been then but newly sate down. It was a feast; that quantity at another time had been superfluous, which is now but necessary. That hand of infinite munificence regards not only our need, but our honest affluence. We are sullen guests, if we scant ourselves where God hath been liberal; and from the Table of his bounty depart hungry. We are unworthy guests, if we riot upon his abundance, and turn his plenty into wantonness. To fast when he invites us to feed, is our sin: to be fuller than he allows us, is our sin and our shame: to be pleased no ways, neither full nor fasting, is our sin, our shame, and unhappiness. The Philistines in their feast called for Samson to make them sport: take heed that Samson be not your mirth, make not Religion your fiddle. God doth not therefore so liberally give us temporal things, that we being full should abuse spiritual things. David vowed that he would not forget Jerusalem in his mirth: and in their mirth there be some that remember Jerusalem, but it is with a sacrilegious frumpe. Yea, too often, they do not only in their mirth remember Jerusalem, but they make Jerusalem their mirth; and holiness is wounded through the name of Puritan. Call Godliness by what name they will, it is too good to be jested with: and when profane men are thus in jest, God will be in earnest. And here we fitly fall upon 3 Profane feasts: I call them so, where God is not placed at the upper end of the table: where he is forgotten in the beginning, neglected in the midst, at the latter end dishonored. We find such feasts in former times, we find them all concluding in horror. The house fell down upon Job's children, while they were feasting. Their sin is not specified, yet their father feared, sanctified them, and interceded for them, after their meetings. The upshot of their last feast was destruction: I mean, on their bodies, I dare not say so of their souls. The *F*athers think otherwise; and allege for it this observation. At the first Job had 7000 sheep, 3000 camels, 500 yoke of oxen, and 500 she-asses. After his reparation, he had 14000 sheep, 6000 camels, a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she-asses. But in his first estate, and his last too, he had but seven sons and three daughters. The number of his cattle was doubled, the number of his children remained the same. Children are dearer than riches; why then is his wealth doubled, and not his progeny? They say, his beasts according to the condition of beasts, utterly perished; but the souls of his children were saved. So then, as he had twice so much substance, he had twice so many children also; ten whereof were with him on earth, and the other ten with God in Heaven.

Nabal held a feast in his house like the feast of a king. Commonly there is nothing more plentiful than a Churls feast. He was merry, and feared no mischief; as if he had never angered David. That mighty Champion was at the foot of the hill, coming to cut his throat; yet Nabal was feasting without fear or wit, and drinking drunk with his sheep-shearers. Full little do sinners know, how near their jollity is to perdition. Judgment is often at the threshold, while drunkenness and surfeit are at the table. Abigail's wisdom suspended the present ruin, but this feast would not off of Nabal's stomach: the report of his wife puts him into a swoon the next morning, and within ten days after that swoon ends in death: and that heart, which wine had made as light as a feather, dies as heavy as a stone. Belshazzar made a feast for his Lord's, and drunk wine to it. On a sudden, his countenance was changed, and his knees smote one against another. What an alteration was here? a sumptuous and presumptuous banquet ends in trembling and astonishment. He had the most glorious cupboard of plate in the world, for which he might thank the spoils of the Temple: we read of many boules, not of much wine: but in our feasts, a great deal of wine is turned over with a few boules. Nabal cannot abound, but he must be drunk: excess is a true argument of folly. We use to say, When drink is in, wit is out but if wit were not first out, so much drink would not be let in. But I have held you too long at a feast, unless my cheare were better. The Jews by a custom did challenge at their feast of Passover, the release of one malefactor; whereupon they chose Barabbas, and refused Christ. So do you at this feast, turn out Barabbas, lust, riot, malice, injustice, covetousness, uncharitableness, profaneness, and all those sins which make up a malefactor, a Barabbas: and then in another sense than Pilate meant, I shall deliver to you the Lord Jesus, not to be crucified by you, but presented in this holy Sacrament as crucified before you. Thus you shall see his body broken, his blood poured out, not to his pain, but your comfort; not his death, but the remembrance of his death. He took the bitterness of that, that we might have the sweetness of this: he died for us once, that we by Him might live forever.

Deceiving while they feast with you.] Feasting hath ever been held a note of friendship; Convivae, Convoti: we invite none to our tables, but either such as are, or such as we would make our friends. David speaks of a wonder, of a monster: My friend that did eat of my bread, hath lift up his heel against me. Elias would not do violence to the very Raven that was his purveyor. But for a man to feed upon his neighbors meat, and to eat his Host in his heart, it is such a prodigy of unthankfulness, that nature her self is sick of him. Some sly politician, as Absalom, may make a feast for him whom he means to kill: some cunning Usurer may make a feast for those prodigal heirs whom he means to undo: some ambitious aspirer, for them whom he means to undermine: some prurient letcher, for those women whom he means to corrupt: A feast is made for laughter, saith Solomon: yet all feasts are not for laughter, yea some are for slaughter; not for society, but for satiety; not for delight, but deceit; not for love, but for lust. So the luxurious makes a feast, that he may lay his guests on the floor. The end of a feast is not seldom the beginning of a fray: therefore some interpret our English phrase, To pledge, To defend: the drinker supposed to be in danger, and he to whom he drinks, engaging or interposing himself betwixt him and harm. Feasts are not always safe; for if a man have no other enemy, he hath himself: his own riot may do him that mischief which another forbears. These were called Love-feasts: their intent was feasting for love, yet some came for love of feasting. One was hungry, and another was drunken. In these last, was not the fullness of love, but the love of fullness. Thus the first institution did languish into corruption; and they became luxurious, some were drunken: uncharitable, others were hungry; the poor got nothing; and fraudulent, they had thieves among themselves, whose plausible insinuation made way for their pestilent circumvention. The hypocrite would bring his dish; but it was either to tempt a woman to his lust, or to deceive a man of his goods, or to spoil him of his wits. Let me conclude all with three observations.

1 It is odious to feast with men on purpose to make them drunk. It is usually said that we taught the Germans to fight, and they taught us to drink: and we have both proved apt scholars, too forward proficience; if they be tall fighters, we are stout drinkers. But shall men be so desperate, as not to think themselves welcome to a feast, unless they be sent home drunk? Many have lost their lives, because they would not be drunk; noble Uriah was made drunk, ye• could not save his. King David had abused his wife, and his project was to shelter it with the name of her husband. Uriah had protested against feasting at home, against uxorious delights: he could not be won with words, therefore now the Courtiers must try him with wine. A king begins to him, and he must pledge i•. I do not think that he intended any excess, but to obey. But wine is a mocker, it goes plausibly in, but who can imagine how it will work? It steals in like a Lamb, but then rageth like a Lion: he that admits that traitor, shall complain of a surprisall too late. Well, even good Uriah is made drunk; the holiest soul may be overtaken: he is a rare Rechabite that never drank but when he was thirsty. There is hope now that these pots will send him home; so common is it for wine to prepare men to the bed of lust. Uriah was made drunk, that he might desire his own wife; many husbands are so drench'd, that other men may have access to their wives. What was the issue? the aim fails, grace is stronger than wine, the fury of the grape cannot carry Uriah to his own bed. The graceless attempter sometime fails in his project. David meant by procuring the sin of another, to hide his own; he shall not. Often have we heard of those that sought to overthrow others, soonest overtaken themselves. Whose is the chief offense? Uriah's drunkenness is more David's sin, than his own: sober David is worse than drunken Uriah. Woe to him that gives his neighbor drink to discover his shame; yea, he shall discover his own shame. He that gives a man wine to deceive him, is first drunk in soul, before he can procure the others bodily distemper. If we should compare them; the one is as a sinner, the other as the tempter: the one yields weakly, the other intends willfully. Lots daughters gave their father wine to provoke him, but themselves were first drunk with that lust of provocation. The husband is drenched, that his bed may be polluted; the adulterer is more intoxicate with sin, than the other can be with wine. Even the drunken temperance of some abhors that wickedness, which the sober intemperance of others desires. Say other purposes be left out, and nothing is intended but victory; is he the valiant man that can drink most? David's Worthies were honored for their deeds of arms, not for their great draughts. He that makes a man drunk to deceive him, to turn another into a beast, makes himself a devil.

2 To cozen men under the color of amity, is the most execrable villainy. Feasting implies friendship, friendship admits of no deceit. Nulla capitalior pestis quam familiaris inimicus. Nothing is more easy than this deceit, nothing more unpard•nable. Nothing more easy, Facilius ab amico decipi possum, quàm amico diffidere. My friend may sooner mischief me, than I can mistrust my friend. Nothing more ha•efull, because he doth that as a friend, which he could not have done as an enemy. The manner of doing specificates and aggravates moral actions, saith the School; so doth the very instrument. If I strike a man with a sword, it is presumed that I meant to kill him: not so, if I strike him with a reed; because a reed is no probable instrument of death. He that deceives me under the name if a friend, shows that he took that name only to deceive me. There is no fence for the pistoll that is charged with the bullet of friendship. Hilary compares it to a razor in the hand of a counterfeit barber; Praeparata ad ornatum, vertitur ad homicidium. Uriah must be se• in the forefront of the battle; honor is pretended to him, murder is meant. He was a valiant soldier, and before he had the title of David's worthy, he dearly earned it. It was not a great Ladies letter; nor that which got the Captain his Burgeship, that gave him that reputation; but a noble courage in difficult exploits. David sent for him, made him royally welcome, and he was worthy of it; worthy indeed to have leaned his head near the golden Scepter, and to have died in his Princes bosom, not by his Princes prodition. But now that all this seeming favor and honor should tend to his ruin, O how foul a deed was it even of that holy Saint! His renown was as great as had been his dangers, and his valor beyond them both: and even in this last attempt that cost him his life, if his followers had not been more treacherous than his enemies were numerous, he had come off with victory. Now poor Uriah is not so much conquered, as betrayed: nor fell he by his enemies, but by his friends. Yet is $\langle \diamond \rangle$ neither the first, nor the last, that hath thus perished.

David himself had such a plot put upon him by Saul. Bee thou valiant, and fight the Lord's battles, and I will give thee my elder daughter Merab to wife; for he said, my hand shall not be upon him, &c. David was grown so gracious with the people, that the king durst not offer him personal violence; therefore he hires him into the jaws of death, by no less a price than his eldest daughter. What could be spoken more honorably, more graciously? A king could not offer a more noble gift than his own daughter, nor desire a more gracious recompense, than to fight the Lord's battles. What a Saint, what a friend was Saul? yet he did never mean so much mischief to David, so much unfaithfulness to God, as in this offer. A good man is never safe from the false-hearted: for when they make the fairest weather, then is the greatest danger. Whatsoever the color was, Saul meant nothing to David but death. Yet doth this falsehood discover it self, for Merab was not given to David, but to Adriel. Seeing all these dangers could not effect what Saul desired, himself will not effect what he promised. Yet still he will be a friend, and he hath now another daughter for David; though the younger, yet the more affectionate, she was as sick of love, as her father was of hate, toward him. Saul is glad of this, his daughter could never live to do him better service: if she can betray David, David shall have his good will to marry her. Thus doth this false-hearted king sacrifice his own child to his envy; and hopes that her honest and sincere love shall betray her worthy and innocent husband. It is so storied of a late Emperor of Turkey, that he married his own daughter to a Bashaw on the one day, and then after a nights pleasure, sent for his head the next morning. Are there none that care not to cast away a daughter on their friend, for their own ends? Such is the rage of desperate malice, that rather than not ruin those they hate, they will do it through the sides of their own children. Faithful are the wounds of a friend, but the kisses of an enemy are deceitful. No man so much hates his professed foe, as he does his dissembling friend, when that shadowed villainy declares it self. We pray, from the hands of all our enemies, and (of all our enemies) from the hands of our deceitful friends, good Lord deliver us.

3 To boast of all this mischief, when it is done, doubles the lewdness; to glory in their shame. Wicked men glory in that which shall everlastingly cast them from glory: and make that their sport on earth, which in hell shall be their torment. One glories in his strange attire, as if that were matter of pride, which makes him ridiculous. What glory takes the Owl, that she is not fashion'd like other birds? Another glories in his perfumed garments; and thinks everyone that sees him or smells him, must needs be in love with him. Another, to hear himself talk, or to read his own lines; though he bungle up such stuff as tires the most patient ear. Yet the asse takes no pleasure in his own braying. Another to bring out an oath with a grace, as if to offend God, and to poison his own mouth, were an honor to him. Another to tell of his cheats, and how many he hath gull'd; and yet the gull knows not that he hath most of all coozened himself. Another, to tell of his whoredoms, and to keep a scroll of their names, into which catalogue he puts those whom he never saw, and so makes himself a worse devil than he is. Every time he boasts of his adultery, he does again commit it; yea, this report shall have a worse vengeance than the act. Herostratus burnt the Temple of Diana in a bravery, and for a bravery he relates it. You shall hear the gallant swear that such an one is a brave valiant Gentleman; why? he killed such a man. So Cain was a brave valiant Gentleman, because he slew his brother Abel. Another, in giving weak brains a drench, to see them wallow in their beastliness: this is to brag how far they are become the devils children.

Alas, that a man should make sport at sin! Doth the Peacock glory in his foul feet? Do not his proud feathers come down when they are in his eyes? Doth the Buck, after his coupling with the female, lift up his horns, and walk proudly to the Lawnes? no, he so hates himself after the stench of his commixture, that he droopes in some solitary ditch; and till the pool, or some shower of rain hath thoroughly washed him, he forbears his food. Omne vitium, eo ipso quod est vitium, contra naturam est. And are we enamour'd of that which the very beasts hate? Takes the devil a pride or glory, that he is banished out of heaven? Doth he make a sport of his torment, or play with his chain? No, but he rather curseth God, Angels, and men, who live in the kingdom of light, while he is confined to the dungeon of darkness. What coward is there, that will brag or glory that he was beaten? If we could see the baseness of sin, we would have little stomach to make sport with it. Now the Lord open our eyes to see, and sanctify our hearts to detest it. Amen.

Having eyes full of adultery, and that cannot cease from sin, beguiling unstable souls: they have an heart exercised with covetous practices: cursed children:

LONG and late I am got out of that troublesome Labyrinth: and now like a traveler that hath spent some time in a bad country, where the conditions of the people displease him, he embarkes himself, and ho'seth sails for another coast, hoping to speed better: and yet alas, finds his progress from bad to worse. So where am I now landed? Is the climate more temperate, are the Inhabitants more civil, am I contented in my change? No, I have left the Sybarites, and lighted upon the Cannibals; I am come (with Lot) from Egypt unto Sodom: from a knot of loose companions, to a rabble of adulterers. Before I found a land of deceivers, now I am fallen upon a land of adulterers: thus is the matter well mended: The sixth Commandment forbids to kill; the seventh, to commit adultery; the eight, to steal: a man's life is more precious than his wife, his wife than his goods. So the Apostles argument riseth à minore ad majus: before they did but cozen men of their purses, now of their Spouses.

Having eyes full of adultery.] The Theame riseth in full strength to the condemnation of Adultery. For the particulars, we may compare them to a Hunting: these graceless deceivers being granted the Huntsmen, we have three occurrences. First, The hounds be their eyes. Secondly, the beast they hunt after, is the whore; for so is the word originally, the adulteress. Thirdly, the game is pursued, the dogs are at full cry; their eyes be full of adultery. Before I uncouple the hounds, or examine the particulars, let me say something to the matter in general. And that not much, because I have formerly handled this argument. It is a conquering sin, a coozening sin, a commanding sin, and a condemning sin.

1 It is a conquering sin, for it hath overcome the strongest. Some man perhaps says presently, why then hath it not overcome me? nay rather, why should it therefore overcome thee? even their falls should teach thee to stand Bathsheba was no sooner washed from her uncleanness, but she goes into a forbidden bed: she was never so foul, as when she was newly washed: yea, if she had not been washed, she had been clean: the worst foulness of the body is cleanliness to the best of sin. We read not of any fault of Bathsheba's either before or after, but that she was a good woman; yet she was a woman: the importunity of a king, and infirmity of sex, may plead for her. But what can be said for that Prophetike King, and royal Prophet? God hath not left it a blank, but a blemish in king David's Chronicle; that every passenger may shun that rock, and steer his course another way. Otherwise what hope hast thou but to be drowned, when God's own favourite so narrowly escaped? Did not his holy profession teach him to abhor such a sin more than death? Did not his justice punish this sin in others with no less than death? Did not his place require him to protect the chastity of his subjects? Did not the countenance of his Majesty embolden the others dishonesty? A princely tempter is like to prevail. Great persons should make their commands conscionable, their demands reasonable; for they sin by authority, that are solicited by the mighty. Thus deeply might we accuse him, but that he did more deeply accuse himself. Be there any profane eyes that look upon this woeful example with content, as their pattern, or their excuse for adultery? (As some think of Chas, that he meant to take advantage of his fathers nakedness, thereby to excuse himself for his continual drunkennesse.) O those be dissolute eyes, and such as shall one day see David in joy, and themselves in torment. Good eyes behold it with fears and tears, as the woeful spectacle of human frailty. God notes it, and we repeat it, in terrorem, for a terror. What a powerful sin is that, which could overcome a David? If any man could have beaten Samson, how terrible would he have been to the world? One Joseph shunned his tempting mistress, now he is a rare man that hath not his mistress. If thou be that Joseph, I will apply to thee that Text of Solomon, One man have I found among a thousand; but a woman among all those have I not found. Inveni ex tot millibus unum, but not ex tot millibus unam. But if thou hast not been an innocent Joseph, yet now at least become a penitent David.

2 It is a coozening sin; for instead of repentance, it works the adulterer to labor a concealment. His study is not how to abandon the lewdness, but how to hide it from notice. He fears shame, not sin; the Commissary, not God; the Churchwardens more than the Angels; and the Apparitour worse than the devil. He seeks a rag to cover his sin, rather than a plaster to heal it. Bathsheba conceives a child in sin, and withal conceives a trouble how to hide the shame. He that did the fact, must cover it. Marriage is a common recompense, and shelter for fornication: but adultery always breaks out like a desperate plague, that knows no cure. Therefore it makes the offenders such hypocrites, that they rather seek to conceal their wickedness from the eyes of men, than to pull the sting of sin out of their own consciences. As there be some acts wherein the hypocrite appears a Saint? so there be some, wherein the greatest mortal Saint may be an Hypocrite. Compunction and tenderness is turned into circumspection and care of secrecy; not quam caste, sed quam cante. Instead of clearing their sin, they labor to cloke it: and spend those thoughts in concealing it, which they should have bestowed in preventing it before, or in repenting it afterward. As if a Client should be tedious and curious in making his cause good to his neighbor, and never think of a Lawyer to plead it for him. Sinners endeavor to make all fair with the world, and forget their Advocate, Christ. Not unlike the soldier, that was very diligent in scouring his musket, preparing his match, practicing his postures, and fitting his furniture: and when he came into the field, had forgot his powder. Their thoughts are so taken up with the sweetness of fruition, and policy of contriving, that they quite forget the main, which is repentance.

3 It is a commanding sin; no iniquity that stands in the way, must be refused, if adultery be once admitted. All the witnesses must be corrupted, yea and allowed to take their own pleasure the same or any other way; the bawd or pandar must not ask a reward, and have a repulse. Other maids stand in fear of their mistresses, but here the mistress stands in fear of her conscious maid! The servants lips must be locked up with a golden key: if those setters once quest, the game is marred. The husband must be watched, dishonored, impoverished, yea perhaps butchered: for if blood stands in the way of lust, it is not spared. There are no conditions so hard, to which the adulterer must not subscribe. David hath abused Bathsheba, the Hittite (her husband) is sent for from the wars; and after some needless and far-fetched questions, receives a royal present, and so is dismissed home, to cloke another's sin. That train will not take, the good soldier is so used to his field-bed, that he rather chooseth a stony pillow under the canopie of heaven, than the delicate chamber of his wife, whom he thought as honest, as he knew fair. David's wanton heart does not yet melt, by comparing his servants chaste resolution, with his own light incontinence; but he tries another trick. He that cannot be stirred with words, shall be heat with wine: this fire (he presumes) will send him home to his remedy. Here is a new plot, with a new sin; but it does not take. Drunkenness hath made many adulterers, yet shall it not move Uriah to lawful pleasures. What then? there must be another project. Where, O where will this mischief end? Adultery cannot be hidden without murder, murder shall be employed to hide adultery. The fact which wine cannot conceal, the sword shall. What a brood of sins hath the devil hatched out of this one egg of adultery? Uriah shall bear his own mittimus to Joab, and be the messenger of his own death, Joab must be a traitor to his friend, the Host of God must shamefully turn their backs upon their enemies, much blood of Israel must be spilled, many a good soldier cast away, that murder must be seconded with dissimulation; and all this to hide one adultery. Who knows how far he shall fall, that hath once fallen thus far? Let him not flatter himself, This sin and no more: for when Satan hath him at that advantage, he will command him further service. O how happy is it for us never to begin the evil, whereof we know not when we shall make an end! Now the preventing grace of God keep us from the sin, that we be never delivered over to the shame.

4 It is a condemning sin, and carries the own sentence about it. It must needs abandon all love of God, for that and the love of a whore cannot stand together. There be three sorts of love; the first is ever good, the second is ever bad; the last is good naturally, accidentally evil. First, the love of God is ever good nor is it possible to sin in the excess: Modus sine modo; there be no limits or boundaries set to this love. Secondly, the love of any sin, as of whoredom, is always bad. Thirdly, the love of sustenance, recreation, &c. (as they say of Mercury, that joined with a good Planet it is auspicious, noxious with a bad one) is good by nature, bad by intemperance. This love by the love of God is stinted, that it may satisfy necessity, not curiosity. A proud stomach that quickens it self by artificial receipts, it will not endure, but confines it to mediocrity. But unlawful love is allowed no mediocrity: a man must not be an adulterer by measure. The fear of God is clean: that and foul thoughts will no more stand together than the Ark and Dagon: if the Ark be there, Dagon must down: Dagon may stand when the Ark is gone. No idol must be in the Temple of God, but of all idols not Baal-Peor. As malice is damnable, because it is so diametrically repugnant to God who is love: so God is also Purity, and therefore nothing more directly contrary to him than uncleanness. There is no adulterer but will say, yea and (not stick to) swear, that he loves God: yet if he have but a crown in his purse, his harlot shall sooner have half of it, than he will lend God one sixpence: this the poor find too true. Perhaps after the cooling of his heat, loss of spirits, and abatement of courage, he may be a little sorry: but it is like a cold thaw at noon, that is congealed worse at night. Though it takes away present strength, yet it leaves a desire: whereas grace takes away desire, though it leave strength. It is like fire, that purgeth out the filth of uncleanness: like the Sun, that deads these embers by his greater force, like pure water put into a vessel, that thrusts out the stinking air whereof it was full before. Love God therefore, know him that you may love him, read that you may know him, pray that you may do all. Augustine, the famous Doctor, was upon terms of rendering himself a Christian; only this troubled him, that he must leave his fornication. As he sate in a garden, he heard a voice, saying, Tolle, lege, take the Book and read: and at the first opening of it, he was presented with that Text; Let us walk honestly as in the day time, &c. This was enough: it wrought his heart to piety; whosoever the voice was, the conversion was the work of God.

Having eyes full of Adultery.] Their eyes be the Beagles that hunt after this game; where we have five observations:

1 There is no sense which is not at the Hearts command; but the principality of those servants is varied according to the disposition of their mistress. If the Heart be gracious, the care hath the superiority; if vicious, the eye. Faith comes by hearing, to make the soul good: faith is confirmed by hearing, to make the soul better. Lust comes in by Seeing, to corrupt the heart, and make it evil: lust is inflamed by Seeing, to make it worse. Nisi Deus prius fuerit in aure, non erit in cord: unless God come in by the ear, you shall not find him in the heart. So non nisi per oculum meretrix se ingerit in animum; the harlot takes the heart by the eye. The blind is in better case than the deaf: for the former hath but lost the sense that might undo him, the other hath lost the sense that should save him. In the market a man's eyes do him more service than his ears: in the Church, no matter though his eyes be shut, so his ears be open. Mine ears thou hast opened, saith David, not mine eyes, yea he prays rather for their shutting, Turn away mine eyes from vanity. In the Temple, a running or roving eye is a dangerous thief to steal away the soul. The Popish service was only invented to take the eye: the deaf man may be one of their best catholikes: there is nothing to do for his ears, unless he can understand Latin, or have some skill in music to distinguish of the organs. All is a pageant for the eye, as Saint Paul hath fitted it with a word, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, Eye-service; which brings so many fools into their Paradise. This makes it perilous to see their histrionical Idolatries, because the soul is surprised by the eye.

If any object, that Paul was present at the Pagan devotions. But non omnes Paul's sumus, we have not all Paul's constancy: yea rather, Quot sunt Petri? How many are guilty of Peters flexibleness! But Truth is then too cruel, to forbid our bodily presence at superstitious services, for the preservation of our lives and liberties? Nay, rather admire the bounty of this mistress: you aim at the company of men, she tells you of a society with Angels: you think of your rotten tenements, she wisheth you eternal mansions: you would be content with under-offices, she offers you dominion over cities: you plead for Provinces, she for kingdoms: you are indulgent to a life that leads unto death, she counsels you rather to accept of a death that leads unto life. We read not, By Seeing you shall be saved, but by Hearing.

2 The eye is of all senses the quickest of apprehension; a port to land the commodities of hell, before the soul have warning. It goes out for prey, and brings it home in an instant. If that of Plato had been true philosophy, that visus fit extramittendo, by darting out the visive faculties to the object; there had been hope of better safety. But Seeing exerciseth it self intramittendo, by bringing the object home, according to Aristotle, and thus is the baneful impression made. That is a rare eye, like a pure beam of the Sun, that can mingle it self with sordid corruptions, and receive no taintment. It is sensus perspicacissimus, it can see the sky and stars so remote. Efficacissimus, no sense so firmly imprinteth forms in the imagination: what it sees once intently, it sees many days after. Certissimus, vidi, I saw it; an evident testimony. One eye-witness is better than ten ear-witnesses. No sense is so ranging, now it is on the earth, in a moment at the Moon. Therefore the suddenness of the last Judgment is compared to the twinkling of an eye. None hath such variety of objects, and continual business: none is so often put in action, none is so quick of motion; indeed none so serviceable to reason: well guided, none so commodious, and none so pernicious, if corrupted.

The visible instruction is most potent: young king Philip, being but carried in his Cradle to the wars, did greatly animate the soldiers. The visible temptation is most prevalent: so beasts, in the presence of their sensual objects, are scarce restrained. Imagination in absence represents the pleasure a-far off, and not prepared: before the eye, it enrageth the desire, and nothing wants but execution. Therefore the way to root a bad impression out of the heart, is to remove the object from the eye: out of sight, out of mind. We think on absent things with colder affections. Indeed well-grounded love is more constant, and lovers have a secret Cabinet in their memories, whereby they confer: yet unless the intercourse of Messengers, letters, tokens, revive the affections, even their thoughts will grow remiss. How easily then may loose love, which hath no other nerves but blood and sense, be dissolved by a separation? Many a bitten lover says of his harlot, would I had never seen her face: but he says not, I will never more see her face. He vainly wisheth what cannot be, and yet does not conscionably resolve what may be.

3 The eye is the Pandar of a lustful heart; the window that lets in the infection, the first betrayer of the Fort. To say nothing of the Sons of God, allured to the daughters of men, by their eyes: nor of Potiphars wife, that by a cast of her eye drew Joseph into her heart, and would have drawn him into her bed; uritque videndo femina: nor of David, the glance of whose wanton eye wrought so many mischiefs. Ahab's eye was sick of Naboth's vineyard, his heart was drunk with the grapes whereof he never tasted. Adultery sets her chair in the eye: they say, the Masters eye feeds the beast; but here the beasts eye feeds the master. In the eye it self there is no such virtue; yet the masters eye is said to govern the family. They write of some marine Cr•atures, that they engender by their eye. Here it is too true; the eye doth engender lust, lust adultery, and adultery (if nothing else) engenders vengeance. Let her not take thee with her eye-lids: Oculi sunt in amore duces. Upon this ground it seems Zeuleucus imposed that law on the Locrenses, that the adulterers eyes should be pulled out: sin entered at those casements, therefore he would stop up the windows; and when the steed was stolen, shut up the stable door. Pliny writes of a chalky brimstone, that draws to it self distant fire: the wanton eye attracts this adulterous fire to the heart. The eye doth (as it were) specificate the object: the blind man in his lust desires a woman: the libidinous desires this or that woman, making his choice by his eye. All shapes, all colors are alike to darkness: no sense can distinguish betwixt foul and fair, but the eye. Dinah was a maid, and went to see Virgins of her own sex: her eye was chaste, though idle: but Shechems eye was both idle and unchaste. That great Soldier called the Persian maids, Dolores oculorum: therefore the same Alexander refused so much as to see Darius his wife, a lady of incomparable beauty; fearing lest he that had conquered the husband, should be overcome by the wife. What abundance of offices doth the eye bear in this little family of man? First, it is the bodies Watchman, and guides the hand to defend it. Secondly, it is the understandings Informer, whereupon she determines of substances true or false. Thirdly, the stomachs Taster; for if the eye do not like the morsel; that refuseth it. Fourthly, the affections Purveyor, to bring in their desires; Vbi amor, ibi oculus. Fifthly, the hearts Messenger, that runs on her errand almost as quick as thought. Sixthly, the fancies Intelligencer; the painter must see, before he can counterfeit. Lastly, a Scout to the whole Soul, and a Sentinel to the whole body; and corrupted, a traitor to them both.

4 Satan's first project is to take the eye: if that be once his friend, he hopes well of all the rest. Indeed, if the door stand open to the thief, what safety can be in the house? The devil took Christ into an exceeding high mountain, and shown him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them. Why so high, but for prospect? If all this glory were only represented to his imagination, a valley would have served: if only to the sense, no hill were high enough. Circular bodies, though small, cannot be seen at once. This show was made to both: the kingdoms about Judea, to his eye, the glory of them to his imagination. A cunning devil in all:

he meant that this glory should tempt the eye, the eye the fancy, and the fancy should tempt the will. If that sense be viciously employed, remember the devil is there. How many thousand souls have died of the wound in the eye? If sin be not let in at that window, nor the door of the ear, it can find no way into the heart. Mors per fenestras: when a man opens his eye lustfully, he cannot think what a train of sins will crowd in upon him. Had Satan come to David in the most lovely form of Bathsheba her self, and at the first in direct terms told him, he should enjoy her if he would murder her husband: without question, he would have spit scorn on that face, on which he so much doated. Now from the glance of his eye arose all that succession of mischiefs. He sins; and no less sin would serve his turn than adultery; and that is not enough, without the addition of blood. Yea, he is not only a sinner, but a Tempter: he sollicitates Bathsheba to offend God, to break her faith, to dishonor her husband, to dishonest her body, to wound her soul, to put an asp to the breast of her conscience: and all this begun with a look. The man that was so heart-smitten for cutting off a piece of his masters garment, is now lavish of a noble servants blood. Yea, because that worthy commander cannot fall alone, he grudgeth not the blood of his innocent people to accompany him. Could he have expiated that sin with his own blood, it had been but well spent; but to cover it with the blood of his faithful soldiers, was a crime above astonishment. How did the Spirit of God retire at a wanton look! O the deep fetches of sin: Satan were not that old Serpent, if he had lost his windings: his craft is of as long standing, as his malice. That sin at the first presentment would affright a man, which he juggles on by degrees. When the Prophet told Hazael of the horrible mischief he should do to Israel, he replied, Am I a dog, that I should do this? Not yet: but in time the devil will skrew him up to it. He that willingly runs into a known wickedness, knows not where he shall stop. Set a man on the top of some high tower, and bid him leap down, he finds horror in the precipice. Yet you may persuade him to go down by the stairs to the very bottom. If we do not prevent this assault in our eyes, we shall too late complain of the horror and anguish of it in our hearts.

5 Where be the eyes that have not been faulty? If the eyes have sinned, why should not the eyes be punished? Punished they must be, with rottenness in the dust, with horrid and astonishing visions in hell, if some former penalty be not set on them here. The rich man in hell saw Lazarus in Abraham's bosom: that sight was his torment. How must the eyes be corrected for this wantonness? By tasking them unto tears: for ranging eyes, we must get mourning eyes: for eyes lifted up with pride, eyes dejected with shame and sorrow: for eyes full of incontinence, eyes full of repentance. How else shall we dare to lift up those eyes to heaven, which have been the brokers of hell, polluted with the aspersions of lust? O let those eyes, that have been the cisterns of corruption, become the fountains of compunction. Mary Magdalens eyes had offended, her eyes shall pay for it. She had been a notorious strumpet, a woman of a mercenary condition: if her eyes had not invited her to love others, yet they had bewitched others to dote on her. Lo, she would not look on that world, but through a shower of tears, which she had so enamour'd with her wanton looks. These organs have made our bodies stinking lepers, let them be turned into a Jordan or Siloam to cure our leprosy.

We magnify some waters distilled out of herbs and flowers, because they are good to heal sore eyes: but there is no water so virtual to cure the lust of the eyes, as the penitent water, which the Limbecke of sorrow draws from those eyes. Some of the Ancients have thought, that God did endue us with this dew of tears for no other end, but to wash away our sins. Because when we weep for any losses or crosses, we do not lessen our grief, but increase it: but when we weep for our sins, we do not increase them, but take them quite away. No tears can raise my friend up from the grave, they may raise my soul from the death of sin. From the bitter flowers of wormwood, the heat of fire distilleth sweet and wholesome water: the Grace of God's Spirit, from the bitter remembrance of our sins, distilleth tears able to comfort our souls. When we are thirsty, we run to the well: when our houses be on fire, we run to the river: the sight of our eyes hath procured both these mischiefs to our hearts: the tears of our eyes must help them; they are able both to lay our thirst, and cool our lust. This is not an eye full of adultery, but full of grief for adultery: such an eye shall look upon thy harlot with indignation and detestation: that in those tears she shall read at once thy present sorrow, and her former sin. A graceless woman that had long ensnared a young man who was now converted, salutes him in the old familiarity as he goes by: he regards her not: she replies, Ego sum, It is I: he answers, At ego non sum ego, I am not as I was, I was not as I am. Blessed souls that have got the mastery of their own eyes.

Adultery;] this is the game, the beast they hunt: where I observe three gradations:

1 The main attractive of the eye is Beauty: and of this the fancy is informed by the eye: yet being so informed, then the eye is ruled by the fancy; and as that imagines her, so the eye sees her. Beauty is the glory of Nature, a glimpse of the soul, a beam of the Makers brightness: so ravishing the heart, that it is more present with the body it loveth, than in the body where it liveth. Yet as the meat which pleaseth the taste, is but a mixture of well-compounded materials: the music that delights our ear, is but a harmony of proportionable voices or instruments: so the beauty which so takes the eye, is but a just correspondence of the parts and colors of visible bodies. Why should not that spiritual beauty be far dearer to us, which is the image of God; the elements or lineaments whereof be righteousness and holiness? The bodies beauty is but superficial, skin-deep, hiding that within which we cannot look upon without horror. Spiritual beauty is like a diamond, fair to the center. Time will plow furrows on the fairest face, and fill it with wrinkles: but the wrinkles of a beauteous soul are done away with time: the older, the fairer. Many a woman's beauty hath been her ruin: but blessing never forsook a beautiful soul. When thou comest near to a fair face, thou becomest never the fairer for it; nay, thou appearest the fouler by being near it. But a virtuous soul by a kind of exemplary influence, diffuseth into thee some ornaments; and is indeed, as they talk of that imaginary Stone, by the touch of that pure metal, so diffusive of goodness; that thou shalt be the better for it. No miseries can blemish this beauty; Thou art black, but comely; tann'd and sun-burnt with persecutions, yet still amiable in the beauty of holiness. In this, Sarah was a figure of the Church; who was as fair at a hundred years old, as she was at twenty; and then, the fairest woman of the world. It is said of Christ, that he was without form or comeliness, or beauty to be desired; yet even then, he was fairer than the children of men. Cleane through a corporal beauty, a spiritual eye can see the very image of the devil: but a gracious soul in her worst estate is but like a slubber'd Diamond; which after a little polishing shines with a radiant luster. The kings daughter is all glorious within: but who can persuade carnal minds to this? It is the Image of Adam they dote upon, not the Image of God. A fair skin surprizeth a fleshly heart; and he thinks there is no other beauty in the world, but that which toucheth his sensual desires. So the horse that loves a mare, thinks that in the world there is no other beauty.

2 But if a man's eye be delighted with beauty, may he not enjoy it with chastity? Why may he not think his own wife the fairest upon earth? She is so to him, if he so imagine her: opinion cannot err in matter of opinion. He sees her daily with the same eyes he first chose her. But the ranging eye cannot be so limited. Proprietie in other things is a content, here it is a burden: and were not the adulterers fair wife his own, he would give much to enjoy her; but being his own, he cares not for her. Stollen waters are sweet: but will a man leave his own delicious wine, to steal a draught of his poor neighbors water? It is uxor, that he loves, but not sua: and this aggravates his wickedness, that the strumpet is not solitaria, her own woman; but Aliena, under covert Baron: not a straggling Deare of the heard, a beast of the common; but one upon whom be set the marks of propriety. God hath set his mark, and resolves not to know her, if she knows another man. The Church hath set her mark of solemn Marriage, refusing to be the mother of that daughter, that defiles the Marriage-bed. The husband hath his mark of a holy Covenant made before men and Angels; and is allowed a divorce upon such a fedifragous forfeiture. To pick this threefold lock with a false key, to undo a knot thus tied before heaven and earth, will call God and man, heaven and earth, not only to witness it, but to take vengeance of it.

What a laborious, what a dangerous way the lustful finds out to his pleasure! as if no water could please David, but what is brought through an Host of enemies: no content was worth their desiring, but what was fetched from the gates of hell, snatched out of the devils teeth, handed out of that burning furnace of unquenchable flames. Those delights are not esteemed, that are not troublesome: the malice of lust supposeth all ways of obtaining better than the lawful. Simple fornication (say some) offends but four, single adultery five, double adultery six: God, the Church, the two offenders, and the two injured parties. Suppose the two sinners forgive one another on earth, will they not curse one another in hell? Suppose the Church pass it over, either through ignorance or connivence, will not the Judge of all the world plague it? Say he is patient, will the wronged husband, brother, friend put it up? Doth not Absalom pay Amnon the wages of his sisters constupration? Two whole years that sly Courtier smother'd his revenge; but it was not for nothing; it was so much the more exquisite, by being longer protracted. If David will not punish it, Absalom shall; not that he cared for Justice, but for revenge. Absalom did it wickedly, but God righteously; human partiality hath neglected it, inhumane malice shall punish it. God punisheth sin with sin, while Absalom punisheth sin with death. If either David had called Amnon, or Amnon called himself, to account for it, the revenge had not been so desperate. How often hath the adulterer been slain by the abused husband, when he least suspected it; righting himself unjustly, as he had been secretly injured? Abimelech was the son of a Concubine, yet he murders all his fathers legitimate children. If Gideon had lived to see that bloody day, how would be have cursed the knowledge of a luxurious bed? So some write, that Vlysses was slain by his own base son. Paris his adultery was the desolation of all Troy.

I will not tire you with examples. It is an adulteress their eye is full of, they seek a like to themselves. These lusts they conceive by the mediation of the eyes, as Laban's sheep did their young, at the sight of the pilled rods, which Jacob laid in the watering troughs. Placet interdicta voluptas: they slight the fruit of the tree that is easily climbed. What is Ahab's kingdom to him, while Naboth hath a pretty vineyard? The cloyed husband sits carelessly looking on that wife, for which another languisheth. Herein David's plot failed him, when he had sent for Uriah: he imagined that the beauty of Bathsheba must needs attract a husband so long absent; that it was his grief to be detained from so pleasing a bed. Because that face, those eyes and breasts had so enchanted him, and stolen his heart, that they could make him sin; he thought it could not be possible, but Uriah must be allured by them to a safe and warrantable fruition. He was deceived; though Uriah had another end; many a wanton stomach plays with that meat, which to the hungry affecter would be above all dainties. Nabal is churlish to that wife, whom holy David thinks himself happy in, and makes his Queen. O the boundless vagrancie of irregular lust; whither will it go, where will it end? Will one harlot serve the adulterers turn: No, could he renew his strength as fast as his desires, and multiply objects to both, a nation of women would scarce suffice one adulterer. It is a sin that seares up the conscience with the blood, dries up grace with the marrow; and when it can sin no more, yet it cannot repent. Happy soul that never knew it, and next happy that forever after detests it.

3 Lastly, it is a whore they love, and that is but one bow short off the devil. Some have mistrusted, that it is not a reasonable soul, but an infernal spirit that enliveneth such a licentious shape; to do that by a fair strumpet, which he could never do by his foul self. We have heard witches confess, that they have known devils in the proportion of men: and me thinks, men should fear to know harlots, lest they embrace devils in the proportion of women. What hath not a guilty conscience cause to dread. The strumpets soul cost Christ his precious blood: yet half a crown, or little more, or sometimes less, is the set price of it. What need Satan tempt her, when for so small a value he may have her? We hate the Turks for selling Christians as slaves; how odious are they that sell themselves? Soone is their lively color wasted, their blood parboil'd: that were it not for superficialized cheeks, and enticing dresses, the most graceless Lecher would abhor them. But it is the devils special care to keep them gorgeous. A soldier having a sword which he hath well proved in divers combats, and knows he may surely trust it, will be careful to scour and polish it. Woman hath done Satan singular good service: by her he overthrew the first man, by her the wisest man, by her the strongest man, by her many millions of men: no marvel therefore if he be curious in dressing her with ornaments, in dishevelling her hairs, and fitting her with all conducements; that she may still help to people his infernal kingdom. Fowls of the air, though with never so empty crawes, fly not for food into open pit-falls. Quae nimis apparent retia, vitat avis. An adulteress is the devils pit-fall, a trap to catch our souls; let us not run into the gin with open eyes. Now the Spirit of Grace keep us from the strange woman, that we may be no strangers to the Kingdom of Heaven.

Full of adultery.] This is the pursuit of the game, full cry. The eyes do not engross all their uncleanness; they are not only full, and the other parts empty. The Cater fills his basket with provision; but this serves afterward to fill the mouth, to fill the stomach, to fill the belly. The eyes be first full, as the cistern: but the cistern serves all other offices of the house. Nor is this a fullness of satisfaction: for as he that loveth silver, shall never be satisfied with silver; so he that loves women, shall never be satisfied with women. Unnaturall desires are infinite: hunger is soon appeased with meat, and thirst allayed with drink: but in burning fevers, Quo plus sunt potae, plus sitiuntur aquae. They still love amore concupiscentiae, never amore complacentiae. The hunter hath killed today, he is fresh again for the game tomorrow. This guiltiness first takes the eye, but stays not there: the procurer provides for another, not for himself. The lustful heart is the great commander, that assigns all members their several offices. So the ear is full of luxurious discourses, the eye full of provoking pictures: both full, at an obscene interlude, of exemplary and visible carnalities. The bones are full of idleness; they rest on that pillow of vices. The thoughts full of contemplative uncleanness; for it is not hard to be an adulterer by speculation. The mouth is full of filthy jests. They come to do evil by these accessories; yea, the evil is already in those accessories. Some flatter themselves that they are chaste of body; but their eyes, their ears, their thoughts have committed adultery. Therefore if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out: what the substance? No, but viti substantiae. The liver is obstructed, and makes the body sick; what then, shall we pluck out the liver? No, but let the arm bleed, take some course to draw out the corruption. Lust is a fire, if it be inflamed in the heart, there is no part of the body but shall feel the heat.

Full. There is no mediocrity in sin: in extremes can be no mean; and every sin is an extreme, either deficient or excessive; in medio virtus. The heart of man affects fullness; and if it be not full of God, it seeks to be full of something else. The wicked are full of unrighteousness, full of envy; their hands are full of blood, their houses full of spoil, their lips full of deceit, their mouths full of cursing and bitterness, their throats full of slander, their bellies full of new wine; Implentur veteris Bacchi: their loins full of lust, their inward parts full of malice: let me add, their heads full of mischief, their hearts full of rancor, their ears full of petulancy, their eyes full of adultery. These be the fulnesses that shall bring the fullness of torments. Sin will not leave a graceless soul empty: the house is no sooner swept, but it is filled with seven worse spirits. The drunkard cannot give over till he be full of wine, the swearer delights to fill his mouth with a monstrous oath: the covetous never feels himself full, though he enlarge his belly like hell. All like Pharaohs lean kine, though they have devoured the fat, are lean still. Ambition, like the grave, is never full. What a thing is the heart of man, that it should swell as big as the world? Alexander was but a little man, yet an hundred worlds could not have filled him. The babbling tongue is not weary, though full of prattle, and is scarce silenced with sleep. A full wardrobe cannot content pride, it is still longing for new suits. All Haman's honor could not fill him; he would swallow Mordecai's head, and that choke'd him. O the insatiate desire of sin, when will it be full? When the eyes be full of soreness, the hands full of palsies, the houses full of misery, the faces full of infamy, the bones full of aches, the mouth full of cries and roarings, the loins full of diseases, the head full of pangs, the heart full of distractions. Yea, their mouths must first be full of earth, their souls full of torments: this world could not, hell shall render them full enough.

But for us, there is another fullness. Be ye filled with the Spirit, full of good works, full of fruits; our mouths full of blessing, our hands full of charity, our eyes full of modesty, our bowels full of pity, our looks full of humility, our hearts full of honesty, our souls full of God; that we may lie down full of peace, and rise again full of glory.

I conclude; whoredom is an epidemical disease; almost the whole world is turned Stews. That if Christ should now come down, and call none to follow him, but they that have not been defiled with women, his Court would be very thin. Rome hath been notoriously branded for this execrable vice; especially since the Popes have bound them to contain, to whom God gave not the power of continency. Hunger will break stone walls rather than want meat; aut tolle appetitum, aut concede cibum. If their Monks be pamper'd horses, will they not neigh? Nicolas Clemangis says, that the people will not willingly admit a parish-Priest, nisi concubinam habeat, unless he have a whore of his own; for fear of their wives; and yet they are scarce sure of them by that course neither. He that abstains, is counted by the rest, either an Eunuch or a Sodomite: so impossible they think that law to be kept, which they put upon themselves to keep. If they cannot get other men's wives, yet they have Nuns of their own, that will open their feet to them at all seasons: and so instead of adultery, they commit incest; for so themselves call it. What are Nunneries but religious Stews; ut idem sit puellam vetare, & ad scortandum exponere; as if it were but the same thing in other terms; to make a Nun, and to make a whore. As our Chronicles, yea even theirs, report of Cardinal Cremensis; who in a Council holden at London, inveighed bitterly against Concubines in the morning, and himself was taken with a Concubine the same night. And it seems he was taken in the manner, for the Writers add, Res notissima, negari non potuit; otherwise they would have concealed it. For this the Jesuits have railed at other orders, not that themselves are more clean from this intemperance, but more cleanly in their conveyance. For Hassen Muller reports that in Bavaria the Jesuits caused a great tub to be carried to their College; which breaking by the way, a wench dropped out at the end of it, in the midst of the street. They will not allow us an honest wife, but themselves a dishonest harlot.

But enough of their filthiness, let us look to reform our own. Some, (who it may be, speak of their knowledge) tell us of whole Hospitals of Strumpets in this city: by whose allurements, servants rob their masters, sons their own fathers. They are the sink of the world, the common Sewer of all corruptions, not for passage, but for confluence: the standing-pool, the vault that sucks in all odiousness. They have excellent gifts of wit and beauty, which they convert to pestilent uses of turpitude and brothelery. To Church they never come, not in their whole life would they ever hear of God, but for their fearful swearing and blaspheming his holy Name. The souls they bring forth, shall stand up at the latter day, and give evidence against them. To enfranchise them of hell, the devil shall do no more but produce the misbegotten of their loins. Those that be unfruitful, he shall accuse of a thousand murders, by confusion of seeds, and barrening their wombs with drugs. There is no such murderer on the face of the earth, as a whore. She shall not only be arraigned and condemned for spoiling a great number of God's Images; but for defacing and destroying the mould wherein he hath appointed them to be cast. Indeed God never said to Adam and Eve, Encrease and multiply, till they were married; to show that he hath a curse, not a blessing for that increase which is not lawful. But even to destroy that fruit which was unlawfully begotten, before the Lord chief Justice of the world will be found murder. That God, who knows how to raise good out of evil, doth sometimes bless an adulterous copulation with increase: and sometimes to the chaste embraces of honest wedlock he denies it. The honest wife hopes to be a joyful mother; the harlot fears that title, and therefore hides adultery with murder.

The receiver is ever worse than the thief; the Bawd, than the Harlot: she is the devils own spouse, for she helps to damn souls as fast as he. How is the eye of Magistracy gull'd in this city by pretences? The matron of this foul cloisture is either a wise woman that tells fortunes; and under that shadow hath the resort of unfortunate dames. Or her husband is a Physician, and hath spare chambers for such luxurious patients. Or a painter that draws pictures, and under that color shadows villainy: a thousand evasions to wind out of Justice. But the most currant trick of all Bawds is to give themselves out for zealous Catholics: and whereas they dare not come to Church for fear of wonderment, they pretend scrupulousity of conscience: that they (forsooth) refrain for religion, when indeed they refrain from religion. So if ever they be justly punished, they cry out, They suffer for the Church. It is a common thing for them that have lived whores and thieves, to die Papists: the drowning body will rather catch at a weed, than have no hold. They have so dishonored God living, that he so gives them over dying. In pollution, anima fit tota caro, and loseth it self in the sense. Whom God hath joined, let no man separate; yet the Adulterer does what he can to separate them. For Virgins, Laesa pudicitia est, and Deperit illa semel: when God can do all things else, saith one, he cannot restore a deflowered Virgin. Our flesh will corrupt fast enough, though we never admit these corruptive forwardings. We have sins enow of our own, though we bring not upon us the sin of another. By other sins a man goes to hell alone, but in this he rides double. Our Savior speaks of Bundles that shall be cast into the fire. The proud man burns single, the homicide burns single: but the Adulterer and his Harlot shall make one bundle, and burn together. Like Zi... and Cozbi, as they were conjoined in the sin, they shall not be parted in the torment. When two be bound together, and thrown into the Sea, they have less power to help themselves. Marriage hath made one of two, that they might fructify together, like Aaron's Rod. Palms are the emblem of marriage, that do not bear fruit divided. Cursed is that heat which shall make two of one, and dissolve so sacred an union.

That cannot cease from sin.] All sin is a labyrinth, whereinto the entrance is easy, but it is hard to get out. Possession is eleven points of the Law, we say; and that which begun by an unjust title, fortifies it self by custom. Stampe garlike in a new earthen pot, it will never out. I do not wonder at the continuance of sin; to break it off by repentance is the matter admirable. Facilis descensus; sed revocare gradum: down stream the boat goes fast enough; to stop it, is the cunning, before it strike on a shelf. I do not say that the greatest sinner is evermore in the act of wickedness; yet so long as the habit is unmortified in him, he does not cease from sin: the slave asleep discontinues the acting of his masters business, yet he is still in service.

Sin like the Sun runs his continual course; though sometimes clouds by day, and always the interposition of earth by night, hides him from our eyes. Yea and Sin hath his circle and line, as the Sun his orbe and Ecclipticke; if we may compare the real passages below, with those imaginary signs above; and let us compare them.

1 Conceive Sin to begin with Aries, the Ram; in petulancie and youthful wantonness, ready to butte at every Passenger. Remember not the sins of my youth.

2 Thence it proceeds to Taurus, the Bull; to strength and tyranny in evil; a stiffnecked disobedience. The Prophet calls them the Bulls of Bashan, goring with the horns of oppression.

3 It comes to Gemini; the Twins: it can no longer continue single, but must have a partner in transgression. The Adulterer must have his Strumpet, the Drunkard his boone companion: Babel cannot be built alone. Society makes good men cheerful in good things; and assistance makes evil men confident in their lewd attempts. It is rare to see single sins, or single sinners.

4 Then to Cancer, the Crabbe; a crooked, irregular course, anfractuouse, full of subtle windings; circumventing his neighbors, as the Crabbe doth the unmistrusting Oyster. Here sinners get themselves hardened ribs, a shell not to be pierced by any reproofs.

5 Next to Leo, the Lion; a raging and roaring kind of life. Thus they grow on from petulancie to obstinacy, then to conspiracy, from that to hypocrisy, now to cruelty. The Lion fills his den with prey, his hole with rapine. He contemns all admonition, and without respect of Justice, will be his own carver: this is the height of ungodliness.

6 He comes to Virgo, the Virgin; a sign which Astronomers ascribe to the Belly. Now he gives himself to rapes and whoredoms, and looseth the reins to his brutish and boundless appetite: that were his power equal to his desire, he would not leave a Virgin in the world.

7 Then to Libra, the Ballance: and there's a demure in his proceedings. Humane Justice begins to examine him, to curb his impetuous violence: and in this house sometimes he stays longer, than the Sun does in that Sign. For if lewd men should not fear the Magistrate, more than they do God or the devil, there were no living among them. Now Libra delivers him over to

8 Scorpio, the Serpent. When he hath been corrected by moral Justice, he is then taken in hand by Conscience; a tormenter that hath a worse sting than Scorpions. This haunts him like a cursed wife at home, like a que•lous scold abroad: nowhere can he be quiet. No intrea•ies can persuade her, no bribes can corrupt her, no music can charm her, no noise can drown her thunder. He talked his pleasure, while she said nothing: now she roars as fast, and he knows not what to say. This the Prophet calls the Lord's Rod of Scorpions, wherewith he scourgeth wild offenders. This happily sends him to

9 Sagittarius, the Archer: he takes the bow of devotion in his hand, and shoots up his prayers to the throne of Grace. The Fathers have called our Prayers, the Churches Artillery, arrows of zeal; which if we draw up to the head, and send up from the heart; they shall pierce the very heavens, and wound the Lord of hosts with pity; and he will have compassion on us. The Bow is Repentance, the string is Faith, the Arrow is Prayer, the hand that draws and looseth it is Zeal, the mark is God, and the errand it goes for is Mercy. At this sign he would dwell longer, but because he must go on, he lights upon

10 Capricornus, the Goat. Even after his humble devotion, and pious resolution, he falls into sin. The Ram, and Bull, and Lion may be mortified in him; Pride, Obstinacie, Crueltie: yea Gemini and Cancer, double dealing and hypocrisy may be abhorred of him: to Virgo he will offer no more violence; he loathes all constuprations and turpitudes: yet still he smells of the Goat: some tang of the old corruption remains, the beast is not quite worn out of him. But it is fallen down as low as the knees, to which place they assign Capricornus: it is far from the heart, out of the reach of any vital part. But in this house he is but a passenger; the Sun does not make more hast than he from it: and now having sinned, he posts to 11 Aquarius, the water-bearer: he knows no sin, which he endeavors not to wash off with his penitent tears. This fountain he hath always about him: and if the air of bad company hath made him sin with Peter, yet he can go forth and weep with Peter. Mari's tears did not more wash the dust from our Savior's feet, than the sin from her own soul. If Capricornus have made thee offend, let Aquarius be ready with this repentant water; that Christ may answer thee as he did Mary, Thy sins be forgiven thee. So well the devout soul loves to dwell in this watery Sign, that he concludes his journey in the very element of water; with the Fishes;

12 Pisces: this is the foot of the song, as they appropriate Pisces to the feet in their Anatomy. They be clear and cleanly creatures, delighting to swim in the crystal streams: if they strike into the mud, it is but to avoid the net: and when the danger is past, they soon cleanse themselves. True converts, if they cannot be Semper puri, yet are cito purificati. First, as fishes Tunduntur fluctibus, non deficiunt; so the billows of temptation beat upon the godly, yet they fail not. Secondly, as fishes swim thrice, in water, in vinegar, and in wine: so doth the Christian, in the water of Baptism, the vinegar of affliction, and the wine of consolation, the Sacrament, which cheers the heart. Thirdly, Fishes being wounded, have recourse to the Tench, the Physician of fishes, whom if they but touch, they are healed. Souls wounded with sin repair to Christ, the Physician of kings, the king of Physicians; and touching him by faith, they are cured: as the woman with the bloody issue, did but touch the hem of his garment, and was presently as whole as a fish. Thus swimming in the pure streams of grace, removed from the sordid and dreggish corruption of earth, we shall at last be translated higher than that Sydercall Sign in the Zodiac, even to the heaven of heavens, the Kingdom of Christ.

But now, alas, how have I lost my theme? The argument of my discourse is sinners obstinacy, and I have concluded with their Salvation. Pardon me, it was a merciful mistake: I wish it should be so, though I find it otherwise of these in my Text: for they are wretched adulterers, that cannot cease from sin. Well then, it is but bringing you some way back again: if you remember where I turned the sinner out of his rode of condemnation, you find it in Scorpio. Libra, public authority had him sub flagello: but, suppose that favor dismisseth him, and so gets out of the hands of Justice; yet Scorpio will have a boat with him, Conscience will trounce him. This like some ghastly apparition to a soul forlorn, upon the threshold of desperation, with a show of fresh bleeding wounds, and an astonishing countenance, presents it self in inexpressible terror: how will he pass this Sign? Yes, he will stupefie his conscience with a deluge of wine, never allow himself to be sober; and with a vicissitude of sensual delights, lust and drink, as with two hot irons quite sear up his conscience; and is then confident that the dead dog will never bark.

Thus he passeth from that dismal house of correction, a very Bedlam to his soul: but now Sagittarius comes: Justice shoots at him from heaven, that unerring Archer who never miss'd his mark: the arrow of sickness sticks in his ribs. Now his down-bed is troublesome, and after many changed sides he complains of uneased pangs. What now? this will be a tedious sign to him, perhaps the end of his voyage. Physicians are sent for, who receive gold, and give drugs; keeping him sick the longer, that themselves may fare the better. But at last he recovers; after many promises to God, and vows which he never means to keep, he is enlarged from his bed; up he gets.

And now he posts to the next Sign, to try what better cheare Capricornus will make him. He finds him like some Goatish host, close at his cups and ribaldrie; and here he falls in, relapsing to his former sensuality: riot and intemperance renew their old acquaintance with him: whoredom and new wine take away his heart; and thus being intoxicated with sin, he lays himself down to sleep. Thus many passages of execrable wickedness he hath got through; pride, injustice, hypocrisy, oppression, uncleanness, and voluptuousness, without any interruption; saving those short disturbances of sickness and conscience; and now he slumbers in security. But yet his race is not done, he hath two more Signs to pass.

From this sleep, Aquarius or the world calls him up; and whispers in his ear a golden word, Be rich. Now age and covetousness seize on him at once, and he projects to fill his barns with corn, with money his coffers, and thereby his heart with joy. To do this, he refuseth no course, be it never so unjust; neither friend nor father must stand in his way, now he is set upon it to be rich. He will starve his family, perhaps his own body, to be rich. He will be an Aquarius indeed; the devils water-bearer, a water-drinker, so he may be rich. The law reproves him, his neighbors hate him, the poor curse him, God threatens to condemn him; he cares for none of all these, so he may be rich. Well now, rich he is, a rich beggar, or a beggar in the midst of his riches; for upon all his estate there is set a spell, Touch not, taste not, handle not. Noli me tangere, says his wealth to him: Noli me relinquere, says he to his wealth. Bonum est esse hic, in this house he would dwell forever. But he must not; there is a Bell that tolles him into another Sign, the last of his Eccllyiticke, that shall eclipse his glory forever; the grave and hell; the one to devour his body, to other to swallow his soul.

Pisces looks for him, and thither he must come. Thou fool, this night shall they fetch thy soul from thee. Pisces are placed at the feet of man; this is the last foot of his journey, the standing house at the end of his progress, the period or full point of his travels: Et turpiter atrum desinit in piscem. Swimming in the mare mortuum of this world, he hath swallowed the bait of riches, and now is caught with the hook of death: and he that never ceased from sinning, shall never rest from suffering. Though we sin often, and much; too often, too much; yet let us break off our sins by repentance, and cease from sin that we may be saved.

Beguiling unstable souls.] The wicked cannot be quiet, till their vicious desires be accomplished; they have oculos inquietos ad peccandum, as Calvin renders it. Their meat and drink is to do their fathers will, that is, Satan's: restrain them from wickedness, and they complain of famishment: either they call for poison, or no food. Ahab is sick, because he is denied Naboth's vineyard. Whether his spleen or his gall were more affected, it is hard to say; whether more of anger, or of grief, but he keeps his bed, and refuseth his meat, as if he should die no other death. Because he cannot have his will on Naboth, he will take it on himself; as the mad man tears his own hairs, because he cannot come at his enemies. The wicked cannot sleep till they have done mischief. Saul will not give over the chase of David, but hunts him dry-foot through every wilderness. The very desert is held too good a refuge for innocence: the hills and rocks are searched in an angry jealousy: the very wild goats of the mountains were not allowed to be companions for him, that had no other fault but his virtue. Still David's success is Saul's vexation: where shall that man rest, who seeks rest in sin? In this life he cannot, for he walks in circuitu, grinds in the devils mill. Shall he rest hereafter? no, then he shall eat of his own griest, and labor in torment. Only there is some difference in the manner of their working, and of the time; here with pleasure, there with horror: for a while here, there forever. Still these obstinate seducers go on, from strength in sin, to strength of sinning, till everyone appear before their master in Tophet.

Beguiling unstable souls.] This verse yields us a fourfold description: First, of their filthiness, eyes full of adultery. Secondly, of their craftiness, beguiling unstable souls. Thirdly, of their worldliness, exercised with covetous practices. Fourthly, of their wretchedness, they are cursed children. In this branch we have two particulars; The fish, Souls: The net, Fraud; Beguiling unstable Souls.

1 The fishes they take are Souls: the Prince of darkness says, as did the king of Sodom, Da mihi animas, Give me the souls, take thou the rest. There is no taking the body, without a former winning of the soul: nor can they make those bodies tractable to their lust, whose souls be not first prostituted. And if the flesh could be abused without the consent of the mind, they might make themselves merry with the case without the instrument. A virgin ravished against the will of her soul, is more a maid than she that with an untouched body hath desired filthiness. But deceivers compass sea and land to make stru•pets, as the Pharisees did to make Proselytes. In vain does the thief look in at the window, when he sees the master standing on his guard in the house. Joseph's garment may be rent, his body escapes, because his mind was whole.

The soul is their fish, and so they are compared by Him, who gave his Apostles that office, to draw men out of the sea of this world by the ears, that they may be served in to his own Table. The poets tell us that Bacchus began his empire with the transmutation of mariners into fishes; the moral whereof may be, that when mariners come to shore, they drink like fishes. Bacchus, his genitus. Christ, God of his Fathers substance, begotten before the world: and man of his mothers substance, borne in the world; began his spiritual kingdom by converting souls; that as fishes are caught lineis textis, with a net of twisted lines; so men are taken lineis ex Scriptura contextis, by the holy Word; not sea-fish, but land-fish.

But these be none of Christ's fishermen; they do not fish for him, they rather fish from him. The element that preserves fishes, is the pure stream of the water of life: out of this they labor to fetch them that they may perish. They are of Philopenus his mind, in Plutarch; Ex piscibus, qui non sunt pisces, s'vissimi: no fish with them so sweet as the Soul. Yet as they do not catch the body but for their lusts sake, so nor the soul but for the bodies sake, and neither but for gains sake. Indeed there is difference between God's spiritual fishing, and the taking of material fishes: for when fishes be taken, it is death to them; but when men are taken, it is life to them. Fishes are taken to be devoured by the jaws of men, men are taken to be delivered from the jaws of hell. But these deceivers catch souls for their own ends; that they may pickle them up in vices, and make them the food of their insatiate lusts.

2 The Souls which they beguile, be unstable, inconstant, tottering. If they were firm, they could not: if apostated, they need not; but in this wavering plight they are fit subjects to work upon: the weather-cock will be ruled by the wind. To day the unstable soul is for a Mass, next Sunday for a Communion, the next week for neither. Rome thinks him theirs, we think him ours, his own conscience finds him neithers: this makes him waxey to persuasion, servile in imitation. His heart is in such an Aequilibrio, that the next scruple turns the scale. Now comes the tempter with a bait, and this foolish fish is caught. This Laodicean temper is far worse than the extremes: heat and cold have their uses, lukewarmnesse is good for nothing but to trouble the stomach. Spiritual heat hath God's promise of acceptance: stone-cold hath an easier reckoning: that which is betwixt both procures vomiting: the nearer it comes to heat, and is not hot, the more odious the Lord holds it. Why do ye halt betwixt two opinions? The Prophet doth not so much rate them for their superstition, as for their irresolution: not so much for being unsanctified, as for being unsettled. One Israelite serves God, another Baal; yea, perhaps the same Israelite serves both God and Baal. How long will you halt in this indifferency? God is less offended with going upright in a wrong way, than with halting betwixt the wrong and the right way. I yield that in ceremonial or circumstantial differences, indifferency is the safest; both for opinion and practice: but in the oppositions between God and Baal, woe be to him that is a neuter.

Curse ye Meroz, because they took not the Lord's part in the day of battle. Here, even to stand and but look on, is treason: to take part with neither, is to be an enemy to both. God doth not hold them so capital foes that serve him not at all, as those that serve him with a rivall. There are points which the passions of men have set farther asunder, than needs; wherein the persons indeed fight more than the things: it is charity to reconcile these; or at least, better to state the questions. But when the quarrel is betwixt Jerusalem and Babylon, truth and falsehood; woe to the unstable soul. We may sit at home and weep, bless God that we are in the right, pray for them that are in the wrong: but to labor a peace between them, is to bring a curse upon ourselves; to work, not a satisfaction, but a stupefaction upon our conscience. Some things may admit reconciliation, as differences between men and men: some are in their nature irreconcilable, as the differences wherein men differ from God.

Every man is a little world, yea, every man is a little Church; wherein there be two factions, two armies that fight continually: nothing but a lethargy of conscience can cease this war. It is a civil war, yea rather a rebellion than a war; yet cannot it be absolutely quenched. To make these two friends, were a labor not less vain than impossible. Every militant Soul is a Soldier in that general war between Christ and Belial: now as Quae Deus conjunxit, nemo separet: so Quae Deus separavit, nemo conjungat. To set up the Ark and Dagon under one roof, is an impiety that ends in scorn. Ponam inimicitias, saith the Lord: we and the devil should never have fallen out, we agree but too well; but that God hath put an enmity between us. This quarrel presently shown it self, and begun between Cain and Abel, and it is not yet taken up. The truth of the Gospel, and the errant wickedness of idolatry, are so diametrically contrary; that whiles we would reconcile them, or by any colorable modifications bring them together, we fight against our Maker. For he hath infused such an incompatibilitie, and imprinted such an implacabilitie, between Truth and Falsehood, that they can never flow into one another.

In quarrels betwixt brethren, Beati pacifici: in quarrels betwixt Christian Princes, Blessed are the Peace-makers: but in the wars betwixt Christ and Belial, Maledicti pacifici, cursed are they that go about to make peace. Ye cannot serve God and Mammon. The wit of the world, and the pestilent wit of hell to boot, hath long labored to bring these two Lord's together, to dwell in one house, and to feed at one table; that they might do them service both at once. But how vainly? Ye cannot: we will try; you may, but ye cannot do it. Day and night may join and meet; yea they do so twice every four and twenty hours; in Diluculis & Crepusculis: the dawning of the day in the morning, and the shutting in of the day in the evening, make day and night so much one that we cannot tell which to call them. But lux & tenebrae, midnight and noon, never met, were never joined together. What communion hath light with darkness? what do you call that between Grace and sin? hath it a name? Almost a Christian, saith Agrippa: what's that? one neither with Christ, nor without Christ; neither holy, nor unsanctified; sure there is no such creature. But it is plain, He that is not with me, is against me. If a man be almost a Christian, God will almost pardon his sins, but he will not pardon them; he will almost save him, but he will condemn him. For him that is neither man nor woman, we have a name, Hermophradite: but we have no name for him that is neither a believer nor an unbeliever, neither true nor false, neither for God nor for Belial. There is a Christian, and there is an infidel; there is a heeven, and a hell: he that finds a third kind of creature, may fool himself with the belief of a third place; Purgatory.

Vnstable souls.] Here first let me give you a Character, then an application.

1 The unstable man is in an evil case; for while he professeth neither side, he is hated on both sides. He is still asking for news, and scarce thinks it news so soon as he knows it. Quid rari, chari, miri? To whom it was well answered; Vir sapiens rarus, vir bonus charus, vir pius mirus. He may well be compared to the wave, for he is ever wavering. He now says it, in an anger swears it, and within half an hour renounceth it: as if his understanding did write upon his will, as a man writes upon water; it tarries not long enough for an impression. All his resolutions be but flashes, fiery, and momentary. When he begins a business, he goes about it hotly: ere you can say a Paternoster, he is dog-weary. Yet (by way of paradox) we may commend him for a good Common-wealths man, for he sets many on work; Diruit, aedificat, mutat quadrata rotundis: you shall never have him but either building, or pulling down, or altering; as if he meant to make more business than Time it self. Commend him also for this, he is a professed enemy to idleness; for he is never out of action, though what he doth is to no purpose. His heels carry his wit, neither his wit nor his heels know whither. His feet, like the harlots, cannot keep within doors; he loves to be a guest in his own house. Proprietie is a disease to him; he likes everything better than his own. He longs for every rare thing he sees; and his purse gives it him, like a rattle to still him; and before night the child is weary of it. He is a piece of clay tempered with running water, which keeps his wit in a perpetual motion. He is anything, or everything in possibility; but for the present he is nothing.

He is no dangerous enemy; for his hate cannot be more constant than himself; but the worst friend that can be chosen, for he is never the same. He were good to inhabit the fleeting Islands, for he treads upon moving earth: and like some ill broken horse, he hath no pace. In what a wretched case is the unstable man; whose religion is yet to choose? He knows he shall die, yet he will not know what faith he should die in. If he should die in that doubt, there were great doubt of his eternal state. His religion (it may be) lies in wait for the inclination of his Prince; as a Spaniell hunts according to the face of his master. Of all creatures, he is like the Bat, which hath both wings and teeth; if he could cast off one of them, he might show himself either a bird or a beast. The unstable man shall receive nothing of the Lord. Hear this ye neuters, that hold Christ with one hand, with the other Antichrist; and know not whether you should choose or let go; that would fain mingle the colors of Saint George and Saint James in one Scutchion; while you are not settled in religion, in irreligion you are settled. Christ will not save you, because you were not wholly his: Rome cannot save you, though you had been wholly hers. If you must settle, when begin you? if you must begin, why not now? Choose therefore, and choose right, and cleave to it. It is not enough to resolve, but we must rather lose ourselves, than the truth of Jesus Christ.

2 We have chosen, and blessed may we be in our choice. It is happy for us, that God hath put the meat into our mouths; that we are baptized, catechised, and confirmed in the truth. Many thousands would have been more thankful to him; who exceed us in devotion, more than we do them in illumination. Are there no unstable souls among us? They write of a place in the Ile of Paphos, where never fell rain: the Island wants not showers, but none falls there. There is a place within us, our Heart; so roof'd with hardened lusts, that no dew of grace can have access. With what fear and unwillingness do I think of the state of a great multitude; so unstable in their devotions, that it is a high extent of charity, to believe them Christians. The Lawyer professeth Christ, yet a round fee can tempt him to plead against Christ: he doth sell his speech, and he will not give his silence: as he said, Non omnibus dormi; so this, Non omnibus taceo: you must hire him to hold his peace, if you do not to speak. So indifferent and irresolute are such advocates in their religion, as they are in expectation of judgments: they hear both sides, yet know not on which side the cause will go. Indeed too many deal with Christianity, as they do with a suit at law: the matter is plain enough, but they cloud and pussle it with their wranglings. So Papists dispute, not voto discendi, but studio contradicendis.

As Cyprian speaks of one in his days, that challenged his dispute, and used to amaze the people by holding the conclusion. The Preacher would boldly reprove some vices, but then his Parish withdraw their benevolence; are not these unstable souls? The Magistrate would do Justice, but then a Great man's letter conjures his forbearance; is he not unstable? Some go to Mass, yet flatter themselves that their hearts are right to God: a man does not walk in the Sun with a purpose to be tanned; yet he cannot but know that he shall be tanned with walking in the Sun. Et agere & pati, Romanum est, said Scevola: we are naught at Agere, at Doing; but when it comes to Pati, suffering, we are gone. We are glad that Christ suffered all for us; but we will suffer nothing for him. It is the happiness of these cold times, that we are not put to the hot fire; for trial of our faith and love. If the wheel were turned, which the mercy of God forbid, how many would turn from Christ, rather than burn for Christ? But if there be a recompense for a cup of cold water in Christ's name, how shall a cup of warm blood yielded for that name, be rewarded? yet such is the niggardly devotion of men's unstable hearts, that they will scarce afford the poor even a cup of water from their cisterns. The distressed have God's mandatory and commendatory letters for them, yet toward the advancing of a collection, some Great man's letter doth them more good. We all love to be of the taking hand, but will part with nothing: we would receive Christ's bounty, yet grudge our duty; we would be like him in glory, not in grace. If man's law should not prevail more than conscience, what order would be observed? So the Host answered his guests, when they could get no flesh at his house in Lent, yet might have it in other places; alas, saith he, we are bound, and they are but sworn. The tale looks like mirth, but the meaning of it is in good earnest. Two many fear an obligation, more than religion; and are more careful of a Recognisance, than of their conscience.

It were easy to find among us the faults and fates of the twelve Tribes, praised be God that we have also their blessings. The very first puts me in mind of all the rest. Reuben unstable as water, thou shalt not excel. Such a bar in the arms of Great houses is Inconstancy. Reuben was the first borne, yet he lost the principality: and you can say, This hath been the fortune of many an elder brother. Simeon and Levi, brethren in evil: the Papist and Seminary, in mischief against the Gospel, sworn brothers. He that calls to mind the fifth of November, shall find Instruments of cruelty in their habitations, and see them digging down a wall. I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel: yea, O Lord, divide them from Israel. Judah hath the Crown, and the Blessing, and the Crown of Blessing be upon Judah, our gracious Sovereign: let him and his hold the Scepter, till Shiloh come again. Zebulon shall dwell in the haven of the sea: Merchants are for the sea; but let them remember, it is a wavering element, governed by the inconstant Moon; and that all their voyages are but adventures, their ships but reeling vessels; all unstable. If their conscience should be infected with this staggering disease, that were the worst shipwreck.

Issachar is a strong asse, couching down between two burdens. Issachar, the usurer; an asse that feeds upon thistles, while he stoops his back to the burden of riches. Let them be made servants to tribute: they are the fittest subjects for subsidies. Poor men labor for a little; they grow rich with ease: It is but walking out six months; then sit down and tell their monies.

Dans place is to judge his people▪ and far be unstableness from the place of Judgment. Yet alas, there is nothing more unstable: the cause that goes on this side today, is tomorrow judged on the contrary. But we dare not say, the fault is in the Judge, but in the Law: just as the peremptory Sexton said, Howsoever the day goes, I am sure the clock goes true: the Law is difficult, but there is no fault in the Judge. I, but Dan hath officers under him; bad Lawyers, crafty serpents,adders that bite the horses heels in the path of his journey; and that so sore, that no Leech can cure it. The Client comes riding up in haste to his Lawyer; but by that time the suite is ended, he may walk a-foot home at leisure.

Gad, a troop shall overcome him, but he shall overcome at last. He had his name of a Troope, Gen. 30.11. he is overcome by a Troope, and at last shall overcome a troop. We have many troops of them, abundance of the Tribe of Gad: some gad to Rome, others to Amsterdam: it is still (according to my argument) an unstable soul that sets them a gadding.

I find no fault in Asher, unless plenty be one. He yields bread, and fat bread; dainties, and for kings; Royal dainties: his Emblem is a Cup or Boule of delicates. But as Noah was drunk with his own wine; so the cup of prosperity hath intoxicated many a soul. And God hath no worse servants in our land, than they that can live on their lands, and care for nothing else.

Nephtali giveth goodly words: we have too many of this Tribe, hypocrites, that can give nothing but goodly words. They will speak so fair, and deal so foully: that you would not believe they are made all of a piece. But when the wind sings, and whistles in the leaves, look for a storm.

Joseph is a fruitful Branch: and blessed be God, we have also a Tribe of Joseph, fruitful of good works. Though he be the But of contradiction, and the Archers have shot at him, and hated him; yet he is made strong by the hand of the mighty God: and an universality of blessings from heaven, earth, the womb and breasts, and the everlasting hills, shall be on the Crown of his head that was separated from his brethren.

Benjamin shall ravine as a wolf: the last is a wolf, the merciless oppressor, that from morning to evening doth prey upon the poor, and divide the spoil: but at last they shall be divided; their names to infamy, their wealth to the world, their bodies to the dust, and their cruel souls a prey for those more cruel spirits of darkness. Reuben had his divisions, and the rest their waverings and infirmities; only we have Judah and Joseph among us, that faithfully adhere to the truth of Jesus Christ.

They beguile.] the net wherewith they catch these Trouts is Fraud. If we continue the sense from the foregoing words, they charm them with the witchcraft of the eye. That is a silent oratory, and discourseth the meaning of the heart in a dumb motion. The tongue is a speaking eye, and the eye is a silent tongue: and by this dumb language, lovers understand one another's mind, though their lips open not. But I rather take this net to be the tongue; a subtle persuasion to lewdness. A deadly net, like that in Soudas, which in single combats one did cast over another, and being so ensnared slew him. They hunt every man his brother with a net; a bloody net. Not a fantastical, imaginary net, such as Purgatory; which Szegedin calls Amplissimum rete ad capiendas animas, a large net to catch souls; he should have said, A large net to catch fools: a net wherewith the Pope catcheth fish enough to serve his kitchen.

Fraud hath a thousand tricks of cheating; but of all instruments, the chief is the tongue. A handsome tale drunk in at a thirsty ear, is a philtre to the soul. The tongue is either a man's glory, or his shame. When it is the servant of an honest heart, it is an especial organ to glorify the Maker. If otherwise, the devil is more beholding to it, than to all the body besides. It hath a thousand ways to do good, and mille nocendi arts, as many to do hurt. When Satan had stripp'd Job of his riches, children, health; and laid him so full of sores, that no part of his body was free; yet all this while he spared his tongue. The reason might be, because the devil looked that that should do him some service; even such as his wife prompted him too, Blaspheme God and die. Still he expected when all his vexation should break out at his lips. He that offends not in word, be is a perfect man. But where is that man? The Lord sanctify our ears, that they be not seduced by others tongues: and sanctify our tongues, that they offend not the ears of others.

They have an heart exercised with covetous practices.] There is not a more dangerous vice in all the storehouse of hell, than covetousness. To other sins Satan tempts a man often; but covetousness is a fine and recovery upon the purchase; then he is sure of him; as when the Jailor hath locked up his prisoner safe in a dungeon, he may go play. It is an imperious sin; and sits like a Justice of Quorum, in his chair, while Religion must stand cap in hand to it. Heaven is the highest place, earth the lowest: yet covetousness sets the lowest in the highest esteem, and the highest it undervalues to the lowest. He respects heaven but on the By, for recreation; his main game is the world. While Christ was preaching, a covetous younger brother interrupts him with the division of an Inheritance. Make an end of your Sermon, and come and end a difference betwixt me and my brother: you shall do a deed of charity, a neighborly office, and save a great deal that would be idly spent in Law. We have many of his religion; that think we do God better service in composing their quarrels, than in preaching heavenly doctrines. This is to call Christ from dividing the word, to divide the Inheritance. I know there is no Christian but condemns this vice, and yet this vice shall condemn many Christians. The difficulty here, is not so much to win consent of Iudgem^{nt} to the point, as conformity of practice to the Judgment. There may be a conviction of conscience, without any preparation of obedience: and truth will be sooner confessed, than practiced. If every man were his own Judge, there is not a covetous man among us: but the Judge of all the world will find many, that flatter themselves with not guilty. The world hath very ill luck; for many affect it, admire it, adore it, yet will not be known of it. But God hath more injury; for they profess to love, serve, trust in him, yet indeed care not for him. The world hath many servants, but they wear not his livery: God hath many that wear his livery, but they are none of his servants.

They have an heart exercised with covetous practices.] Me thinks here be four words not unlike the four elements. First, the heart, like the earth; it being the Center of man, as the other is of the world. Secondly, covetousness, like water, soaks into it, and makes it hydropicall, yea, turns it into dirt. Thirdly, exercise, like the air; which is Elementum mobile, agitabile, circumfluum, full of exercise. Fourthly, practice, like fire, active and devouring. Or covetousness is the child borne; the house it is bred and brought up in, is the heart: her education is the exercise of cruelty: and her whole course is the practice of iniquity.

But covetousness must formerly be defined, that we may not lose ourselves at the first setting forth. Some say, It is a desire of having more: but we must have more in the definition of it than so: he that hath not enough, may desire more, and yet be free from covetousness. Other say, It is a desire of having more by unjust means: but covetousness is beholding to them for so favorable an expression: this were rather to confine it, than define it. Avaritia est plus velle quàm sat est: Covetousness is a desire of more than Enough. But now what is that Enough? There is no such word in the worldlings Dictionary. It is enough; Israel said so: it is a word only known in Israel. Enough is both necessary for being, and competent for well-being. Having food and raiment, let us therewith be content. In those boundaries doth God hedge up our desires, like wild Bucks in a Park. If we have money enough to bear our charges to our journeys end; to desire more is covetousness.

But who then is not covetous? It is a disease of nature; but here is the difference: some give it physic, and no sustenance: others give it sustenance, and no physic. Some would destroy it, and those it molests, but kills not: the other maintain it; and those it kills, but molests not. These latter are the covetous. The good man feels it as his enemy; the bad loves it as his friend. If you see a man that hath sufficient for his family, yet scraping for more, know him for covetous.

Covetousness is like the father of it, of many names, but never a good one. As the same soul in the several faculties, hath several titles: or as the same river, passing through divers regions, hath divers appellations: so hath Avarice. In the Church, it is Sacrilege: in a Church-man, Simony: in the place of Governement, it is oppression and tyranny: in the place of Judgment, it is corruption and bribery: and when this river swells up to the Bank, it is usury. First, it is called idolatry, Col. 3.5. All idolatry is not covetousness, but all covetousness is idolatry. Secondly, adultery; as a man forsakes a wife peerless for beauty and virtue, to embrace a wanton and common strumpet: so doth the covetous man relinquish piety for gain, God for the world. Thirdly, homicide: for betwixt life and living, there is no such wide difference: cut the poor man's purse, he thinks you cut his throat, and the throats of all his children: such a merciless cut-throat is oppression. The Prophet speaks of Princes that were such butchers: The thief steals to satisfy his hungry soul: but they can plead in themselves no necessity, for they are Princes: in the other no superfluity, for they rob the poor. This is a sin which the poor man cannot commit though he would; the rich man doth, because he can. The high rate and port that divers live at, can be maintained by no dribblets: but in the country by racking tenants, inclosing commons: in the city, by diminishing quantities, corrupting qualities, taking advantages, falsifying balances or measures, by mixtures, blendings, and such sharking sophistications: a small bootie will not serve their turns. Mice may be nibblers, and live; but the Cat that keeps them in awe, is of the eating kind: she devours more at one bit, than the poor mouse would have done at twenty. This sin is the rich man's peculiar.

Lastly, it is theft; There is a Flying roll that shall enter into the house of the thief. Are none thieves but they that scour the plains? Yes, there is a thief that dwells in a house, a house of his own; In domum furis; and that commonly one of the fairest and stateliest, for it is built with blood.

Thieves? rich men scorn the name: a thief is the only man they are afraid of. Yet they that lie in itinerant ambushments, shall in comparison of oppressors be justified as no thieves. Alas, they be poor shallow fools, soon taken and clapp'd up in chains of iron; whereas the other walk like Senators in chains of gold: the great thieves are a terror to the little ones. Without partiality, to take men as we find them, the universal practices of covetousness occasion me to make an humble suit to free men, and rich men, and gentlemen, to lawyers and Judges, and Magistrates; that they would think it no scorn to be no thieves. Let not the motion seem harsh, that you would not disdain the commendation of being no thieves. As portly and stately as they bear their heads, were they but stripp'd of that pomp wherewith injustice hath clothed them, and to beg in the world anew; those poor people whom they now despise, would scarce be bound for their truth and honesty. Thus the covetous man may be called an idolater, an adulterer, a murderer, a robber.

But some will not believe the plague, till they see the tokens. Take therefore some concomitant signs. First, solicitous care for the future; as if God that was here yesterday, and is today, would be gone tomorrow. Quid faciam senex? What shall I do when I am old? So he breaks his sleeps while he lives, to think what shall happen to him hereafter, perhaps when he is dead. This is an extreme folly of avarice, when a man makes himself miserable for the present, for fear of being miserable afterwards: not suffering himself to be free from a burden while he may, because he doubts he shall not be free when he would. Thus the fool leapes into the water, for fear of being drowned in the boat. Secondly, engrossing of too much business: they censure Church-men for Pluralities; but there be temporal pluralists: and many have made themselves so much to do in the world, as if they had nothing to do with the world to come. They only say that they love eternal life; but if you mark their employment, you will confess they prefer the temporal. Thirdly, no business at all; when they give over their profession, to live with less faith, and more security: and make themselves of that desperate number, whereof ten in the hundred go not to heaven. Fourthly, Religion must not stand in their way to riches, without contempt, without violence. Moses broke the Tables of the law in pieces for anger at the golden Calf; these men would have broken them in sitters for the gold that made the Calf. In their conscience there is kept a Court of Faculties; whereby they can give themselves a dispensation for any sin at pleasure. Fifthly, their discourse is of nothing but riches. He that is earthly, talks of the earth. His breath, like a dying man, is of an earthy favor. The mouth of the righteous speaketh wisdom; why? Because the Law of God is in his heart. So the covetous hath earth in his heart, and his very breath smells of it. Take off his tongue from the market, it walks to the Exchange, then to the key or wharfe, and from the custom-house to the warehouse; it never comes near the Church. These be the Signs.

The heart;] that is the throne of covetousness. It is bad enough in the eyes; so Achan took the infection that cost him his life. Worse in the tongue; Let not covetousness be once named among Saints. As if that world, which many prefer before heaven, were not worth talking of. I will not take the name into my lips, saith David. The worldlings worship those idols, which the Saints will not so much as honor with a mention. But the covetous man's mouth is full of earth while he lives, and shall be fuller when he is dead. Yet worse in life; let your conversation be without covetousness. But worst of all is the heart: alas, that any disease should come near the heart; and yet any disease less dangerously, than avarice. Lord, incline my heart to thy Testimonies, and not to covetousness. Our contemplation, our conversation, our communication, yea, our very cogitations, should be clear from covetousness.

Exercised with covetousness.] The worldling will acknowledge covetice to be a sin, but he will not acknowledge himself to be covetous. Whoredom, and blasphemy are notoriously convinced; they wear their Masters known iverie. But avarice, like hypocrisy, will needs be a virtuous vice, a gracious sin. It wears the cognizance of Frugality, the complexion of good husbandry, and would be called by the honestest names that are. There is no Text against intemperance, but they think it makes for them. Because the drunkard spills the wine in wantonness, doth this excuse the miser that grudgeth himself a draught in necessity? A man may sin damnably, though he never come at the Tavern; as at the Tavern a good man may be merry and guiltless. The covetous wretch, that locks up his cupboard, and rageth at his servant for eating a poor crust more than allowance, cries out against riot; the times are prodigal; and rails at him for lavishnes, whose snuffes he is glad to drink of in private. He tells his children how thirsty our predecessors were; how long one gown served his grandfather: and himself is still known by his forefathers coat, which with his blessing he bequeaths to his posterity, that they may be known by it too, for many generations. Thus he praiseth plainesse, not for less sin, but for less cost; because it is cheaper, not because it is better. He persuades his family into meanness; as the tyrant served the idols; he took away their golden robes, which were too cold for winter, and too heavy for Summer; and made them linsey-wolsey coats, that might serve them better for both seasons. He condemns others for wasting time, and never blames himself for selling time; which he doth so punctually, that he will neither prevent his day, nor defer it. Bring him principal and interest before his day, he fears you have law against him: after his day, he hath law against you. Some gratuities in the mean time are morsels to stay his stomach. He grudgeth a coal of his fire, a bucket of his water; and of all things next stealing, he hates borrowing.

Divers sins have the Saints of God been taxed with; never with covetousness. Once Noah was drunk with wine, never drunk with the world. Lot was twice incestuous, never covetous. Peter denied his master thrice; it was not the love of the world, but rather the fear of the world, that brought him to it: for he had denied the world, before he denied his master. Once David was overcome with the flesh, never with the world. Grace may stand with some transient acts of naughtiness, but never with covetousness, those were acts, avarice is a habit: grace is not overthrown by every act, but by the habit of sin. Therefore of all sins, the children of God have cleared themselves from covetousness, when they would approve their integrity before God and men. So Samuel; Whose ox or asse have I taken? He that was the Judge of Israel, would not now judge himself, but be judged by Israel: they shall acquit him, and of all sins, from covetousness. So Jeremiah; I have neither lent on usury, nor on usury borrowed; yet they curse me: as if that practice had deserved a curse. So Paul, I have coveted no man's silver or gold. He was covetous of nothing, but of their souls for Christ. Why did they not purge themselves from adultery, anger, contention, and the like? Because into these sins the infirmity of a Saint may fall: but if once into covetousness, there is nothing of a Saint left, not the very name. A guest may lodge in my house all night, yet leave me master of it still in the morning: but avarice, when it gets admission, turns grace quite out of doors. Exercise facilitates things in their own nature troublesome: the old cart goes quietly under a heavy load; when the new cannot away without creaking. This makes them call their wealth, their substance; while themselves wait on it like base circumstances, and servile accessories. Their Heart is obdurate, like rammed earth, to be the foundation of mischiefs, and bear the weight of all villainies.

With covetous practices.] Ex ungue leonem. He that prescribes medicines, and undertakes cures, professeth himself at least a practitioner in physic. The covetous are not without their practices, yet they deny the name. When Christ preached against covetousness, one man gave the hint or occasion of the Text, the whole multitude heard the Sermon. Good reason, for from the least to the greatest, they were all given to covetousness: some sins are peculiar to some places and conditions; but covetousness is an epidemical disease, infecting all persons. Let me discover to you some of these practices.

1 According to the rule of charity, I begin at home, with the Church. If we should love the world, that teach others to contemn it; this were like the fox, to dispraise the grapes we keep for our own tooth. There is much art to elude the law; as a wager to be lost, that the living may be gotten: a poor Iade bought at an hundred pieces, and a benefice at the tail of him; as one wittily said; The case is clear: the benefice is cheap, the horse was dear. Such a Simonist is not Tutus, quamvis astutus: he applauds his own wit, that he is no bungler in carrying of a business. What follows? He that bought dear, cannot sell cheap; unless he means to live by the loss; and he that so buys, hath no such meaning. I do not deny, but the Patron hath as damned a share in this bargain: for he sels what he should give, and the other is fain to buy his own. Again, to take God's wages, and not to do his work, is a legal sacrilege. We find men of the world, mentioned in holy Writ, and their worldly practices: But thou, O man of God, flee these things: Man of God, stands in opposition to those. Let fishes love salt-waters, birds of the air fly up towards heaven. God and Mammon are two contrary cures; and they be so infinitely distant, that no Court of Faculties can give a dispensation to serve both. Bernard observes of Saint Paul; Omnia quae mundus amat, illi cruci erant. But indeed, all the charity of the world is put upon us, other men rid their hands of it: as if we only were bound to do all things for God-have-mercy. If the least recompense be afforded to our pains, they think it is their courtesy, not our merit. God is much beholden to such men, and without question at the last day he will thank them to their faces; but they had better be without it. In this City, for the Tenth, they have scarce left us the fortieth part; yet if we demand but that, we are censured covetous. But oves pastorem non judicent. Deo, Parenti, & Magistro, non redditur equivalens. God made thee, thy parents begot thee, thy Preacher saves thee; where is the fourth equivalent to these? Yet as if God and the Preacher had nothing to do with us, and nothing had done for us, there is none whom we so boldly defraud. There was an order and custom in Saint Augustine's time, that the poor should beg of none but the Priest: and if he had not wherewithal to relieve them, they might exclaim ag•inst him, for not more effectually moving the people. Then the poor came to us for succor, now all the succor we have, comes from the poor. The rich rob us, only the poor are more willing than able to bestead us. We dare not plead for our own, then sacrilege would not hear us; the Law must not help us, their evil conscience will not help us, the poor cannot help us; now the Lord help us.

There be some that have brought down the price of our function; and for the bettering of their own severals, have inveighed against the Churches commons: in Judas his language, Ad quid perditio haec? Crafty cub, he would have had it himself. O how these Preachers tickle the people's ears, that can fit them with a cheap religion! If I should prophecy of wine and strong drink, I were a Prophet fit for this people, saith Micah. Now it is but turning wine into water; and strong drink into small charges, and then he is an excellent Prophet. Faith, and all faith, and no good works, but to the household of faith, by which they mean themselves. I could also mention Non-residents, and self-silencers; but they are my brethren, and I will not accuse my brethren: my fathers, and I will not lay open the nakedness of my fathers: only pray for them, as Noah did for Japheth; God persuade them to dwell in their own Tents; and purge all avarice from the house of Levi. You see I have not spared ourselves, shall I flatter the rest? God forbid.

2 Church-patrons; who instead of Levites to divide the Word, put in Gibeonites not worthy to divide wood. Their question to him that moves them for a living, is Judas's, Quid dabis? let their end be Judas's; despair and a halter, Quid dabis? God gave him a halter. They that ask the same question, why should they not receive the same answer? Sacrilege is the highest theft; and by their own confession, the thief is worthy of a halter. They are in some kind worse than Judas; he sold the body, they sell souls: his barter bought but a Potters field for burial: theirs doth make the Church Acheldama, a field of blood, for slaughter. Besides all their other damnable traffic, they shall answer for Soul-blood at the day of Judgment.

3 For Magistrates and Judges, they have their practices too. Isaiah calls the unjust ones, The companions of thieves. Why? for taking purses of travellers? no, but for taking bribes in their chambers. The thief hath as much right to the one, as the Judge to the other. They plead gift; and what is freer? so the true man gives his purse to the thief, to save his life; and the Client gives his money to the Judge, to save his living. This sin is able to turn Guild-hall into Shooters hill, and make Westminster-hall more dangerous than Salisbury Plain. They cry, Give; and the thief says but Deliver; and what is the difference betwixt Give and Deliver? Yet Give, sits on the Bench; while poor Deliver stands at the Barre. If places of Iudicature were to be bought for money, (and I would to God they never had been so) we have them among us, that would buy them up by the whole-sale, and make them away again by retaile.

4 Covetous Lawyers have their practices too. See, thy matters are good: so Absalom stole the people's hearts, so these steal their purses. Shall I say with the Apostle, Such were some of you? No, Such are some of you.

He is a dissembling chapman, that says of a good commodity, It is naught: and he is a coozening Lawyer that says of a naughty cause, It is good. Tertullists will plead against Paul, and Abiezrites for Baal; such Lawyers are advocates against Christ, and Christ will be no

Advocate for them. It is a proverb not more old than true: Logic, the Law, and the Switzers may be hired to fight for anybody.

I must omit many practices of covetousness. As that of the covetous gamester; who when he wins, plays the thief with another, and losing is a thief to himself. Or the oppressing Landlord, who while he makes his Tenants beggars, makes himself a fool. Thou fool, when thy soul is snatched away, whose shall these things be? yea worse; for if he be a fool that lays up but his own goods; Vos invenite ei nomen qui tollit aliena: find out a name for him that takes away other men's. Or the severe Creditor, that useth his debtors, as Darius did Daniel; first cast him into the lions den, and then solicit God for his deliverance; Thy God deliver thee. So he casts them into prison, and prays God to help them out. I have heard of prisoners, that on their death-bed, when they had scarce one hour to pray for themselves, have spent half of it in cursing their Creditors; and instead of their own pardon, have desired their vengeance: It was a fearful condition, yet remarkable; the parties thus cursed falling into such insufferable diseases, that they have been desperately ready to blaspheme God and die.

Or the sacrilegious purloiners of Tithes: who fed the rich gluttons of Rome with the fat of bread, and will not allow poor Lazarus of the Gospel the very Crummes. Nor is it the fault only of impropiators, some of which number are cursed for reaping where they never sowed; and do not value a Minister so much as they do their horse; with whom, as with men given over to a reprobate sense, there is nothing more to do: for no voice of God can awake them out of their dream, nothing but the Archangels Trump; at which day they will be found to have impropiated their own souls from Christ. Thieves are broke in upon the remainder. The world is busy about the disquisition of the Tenure of Tithes; and many are cunninger in this, than in the Articles of their Religion. But why does custom over-bear God's Law, man's law, and all? Let this point be argued in the Court of Conscience; and if God determine on their sides, we have done, much good do it them. I pay tithes of all that I have, saith the Pharisee. I should have feared he had lied, but that our Savior justifies him, even to Mint and Cummine. A Pharisee of Jerusalem was in this an honest man to many a Citizen of London; yet the Pharisee went to hell. The least sheaf the covetous man culls out for God, and what he steals from him, he thinks the clearest gain.

1 If the usurer were not desperate, I would say something of his practices too; but the very name is enough to condemn him. He breeds of money to the third generation; and a shilling is not sooner his, than he sets it to beget another. The Bear cannot drink, but he must bite the water, the usurer never cools his thirst, but his draught is a poor man's estate. Saint Augustine fele a heavy burden on his Conscience, for robbing of a Peere-tree in his younger days; he calls it his perishing, his falling from the Firmament. Usurers rob men of whole Orchyards, and never grudge at it. A Gentleman in the Country takes in the Commons, which in the City he takes out in Commodities; and for his racked rents, he is furnished with rattles. The devil had a Serpent to tempt Eve, and the usurer hath a Parasite to tempt the young heir: bring him but once to riot, and then he will want powder, and who should supply him but the usurer? Thus his mind is quite transposed from his original: the usurer furnishes him for the Tavern, the Tavern for the Brothel, the Brothel for the devil. If one entice an Apprentice to rob his master, the Law makes it felonie: if he maintain him being run away, there is a penalty. And is there no law for him that enticeth a Son to rob his Father, yea that shall rob a father of his son, rob God of a soul? Mee thinks, such injured Fathers should put up a Bill in Parliament against such Caterpillars. This is the heir, come, let us kill him, and the inheritance shall be ours. They are like foxes, that use their wits and their teeth together; they never talk, but they take hold. Bees, of all creatures cannot abide sheep; because being once got into their wool, they are so entangled that they cannot get out again. Usurers have the countenance of sheep, they look simple, and go plain; you would take them for sheep, but they are sheep-biters. They make no other use of their wool, that is their wealth, but to snarl and enwrap men; and once in their books, it is hard getting out.

2 For practices of avarice in Trade; preventions, interventions, circumventions, adulterate wares, blended mixtures, a weight for the Hall, and a weight for the stall, a measure to buy with, and a measure to sell with; they transcend all numeration. There be certain mystical principles in every science, which cannot be declared; wherein caveat Emptor. Call them what they will, they may all be reduced to fraud, that's the formal, yea and practical part of them. Gehazi runs after Naaman for a talent of silver and two change of raiment, with a lie. The good Syrian greets the servant in that language wherewith he was dismissed of his master; Is it peace? So sudden a messenger might seem to argue some strange news: but the breathless Gehazi soon satisfies him, if he will as soon satisfy Gehazi. Had he come for this reward in his own name, as a fee for the Prophets servant, as his gain, so his sin had been less: but he must have a greater sum. Light profit will not content a covetous Tradesmen; therefore he stretcheth his conscience; as Gehazi belied his master, robbed Naaman, burdened his own soul. Avarice is ever cunning, as having the mother wit, and the fathers wit to help. Two young men of the sons of the Prophets be come from mount Ephraim. What a sound and formal tale hath he devised? Of the number, the place, the quality, the age of his Masters guests? The value of his demand was so proportioned, that it might not be unlikely of his master, and yet well enrich himself. I ask you but reason, saith the Shop-keeper. But the love of money can never keep good quarter with honesty: there is a mint of fraud in the worldly breast; and it can coin lies as fast as utterance. Covetousness never lodged in the heart alone: if it do not find, it will breed base companions. We are not to do evil, that good may come of it. But there is no evil which they will not do, that goods may come of it.

But now what is the end or project of all these practices? To be rich; an impatient desire to be rich. They that will be rich, fall into temptation, &c. Qui dives fieri vult, & cito vult fieri. All is fish that comes to their net, though it be a snake instead of a Lampreele. He that makes haste to be rich, shall not be innocent: yea sometimes, he shall not be rich: the more haste, the worst speed. Cushi runs apace, but through chabby and rough grounds, uneven disadvantages: Abimaaz out-runs him, because he takes the way of the plain. Plain-dealing doth not seldom get more riches, it ever gets more happiness. The spurred horse soonest tires: many a one is so hasty, that he loseth the game. When the wind is strong, and the sails full, then let the Mariner beware the rocks. How many had been rich, if they had tarried God's leisure? If Saul will not stay for Samuel, his sacrifice shall do him no good. But now when they will be rich, and God shall not know of it: rich, and never trouble him about it: when fraud is employed as a coagent of trade, to ripen and forward it, as Art helps to improve Nature: when the spring of Conscience is skewed up to the highest pin, that it is ready to crack: when Religion is locked up in an out-room, and forbidden on pain of death to look into the shop or warehouse: then is Covetousness in the full practice. The Poets feigned Pluto to be the god of Riches, and of hell; (as if hell and riches had both one master) and to be lame; yet withal, swift and nimble as fire. When Jupiter sent him to a soldier or scholar, he went limping: but when to one of his Bauds or mistresses, he flew like lightning. The moral was; The riches that come in God's name, and are sent to honest men, come slowly: but they that come by unjust dealing, flow in apace. He that resolves to be evil, may soon be rich. All the wealth which the worst man hath, is for the matter the gift of heaven: yet for the manner of getting it, millions go to hell. Health cannot come but from God; yet how many have sought and obtained health of the devil? But more safe and welcome is the gain that comes in the slow waine of honesty, than that which comes hurrying in the swift chariot of iniquity.

Thus I have discovered some practices of avarice; but who can declare them all? not he that hath done them, the covetous: not he that is undone by them, the guiltless; not he that teaches them, Satan himself; but only he that shall judge them, the omniscient God. But to what purpose is all this, if the covetous man will not be found? While the Preacher walks in generals, declares the nature of avarice; every man can be the master of his own patience. But descending to particular application, Thou art the man; then he is held to leave his Text, and to mistake his Auditory. For my own part I profess, that I should be far from Jonah's passion, to vex or fret at it, should God's mercy and your innocence make me this day a liar, and prove all my speeches impertinent; yea, I will pray that it may be so. But when the Pharisees came to Christ with an errand of accusation, there were at first many sinners: when they had charged the woman with adultery, there appeared but one: but when they all went away convicted by their own Consciences, there appeared never an one: but this did plainly show that they were all sinners. O that men would ransack their own Consciences, and make a stricter inquisition into all the suspected passages and practices of their lives. You shall find this sin full of fetches, pretences, excuses: believe it not, spare it not: shrive it to the proof, arraign it, condemn it, punish it. Punish it in the body by fasting and mortification punish it in the soul by repentance and contrition, punish it in the purse by works of charity and restitution. Break open your consciences, more rusty than your coffers. The Law will not allow of the defendants bare negation, without witnesses. Thy own word will not be taken before God; let the poor witness for thee that thou art not covetous. Their prayers shall unlocke the gates of heaven for thy soul, and their testimony avail thee, when no riches shall, in the day of Christ.

An heart exercised with covetous practices.] This is the disease; now let me ask thy soul two questions. First, Visne sentire, wouldst thou perceive the danger of it? Secondly, and then, Visne sanari, wouldst thou be cured of it? If so, first, consider the Effects, then the Remedies. The Effects are many, and mortal.

1 It ineffectuates the instruments of Salvation: covetous thorns ch•ke the seed, it is but cast away. It may breed a swimming, but not a saving knowledge: furnish the head, but not better the heart. Nabal is his Name, and Fool is his Sirname: the wisdom of God is shut out of doors, while this folly keeps the house. We wonder that our Sermons take no better effect; that among so many arrows, none should hit the mark. But God tells us the reason; They sit before thee, and hear thy words, but their heart goes after their covetousness. The damps of the earth do not more quench fire, than the love of the earth stifles grace. Neither trees nor grass grow above, where the golden mines are below. If money be centred in the heart, no fruits of goodness can appear in the life. What, look for grace in the covetous? We may as well look for a harvest in a hedge. They do but serve us, as they did Christ; when we preach against covetousness, they laugh at us.

2 It impossibilitates the entrance into heaven. Where the treasure is, there is the heart: no man hath two hearts, or two treasures; the one is but counterfeit, if any at all. The world indeed sometimes falls into men's mouths; but God doth not spill his heavenly riches: he parts not with them without suit, without thanks. He must strive to enter into heaven that misseth not, and he shall miss of entrance that striveth not. The Covetous is like a Camel, with a great bunch on his back: heaven gate must be made higher and broader, or he will hardly get in.

3 It disposeth a man to all sins, be they never so horrid: he is a fit piece of timber for any place in the building of hell: this mercenary soldier will refuse no office in the devils campe, for booty. Any sin doth prepare and habitually dispose the mind to every sin: but this doth actually transgress the whole Decalogue.

1 Commandment; Thou shalt have no other gods but Me. If the covetous have not another god, why does Paul call him an Idolater? Either he doth offer sacrifice to his gold, or if he does not, yet he refuseth no desperate adventure, it puts him upon, and obedience is better than sacrifice. One of Jupiter's many names was Money: Pagans gave unto their god the name of Money: and the covetous give unto money the worship of God. The Romans had a God which they called Terminus: I fear we have made it a London-god, and a Westminster-god, too. The Israelites made a calf, and then danced about it, one calf about another: with no less joy do the covetous adore gold.

2 Thou shalt not worship an image. But mark how the Prophet joins them; Their land is full of silver and gold; and presently, their land is full of idols. It was gain that made Diana so great, and Demetrius to rore, and make so great a noise for her. They be the coffer-doctrines that Rome is most violent to justify: Masses, which bring in masses of wealth: Praying for the dead, which is a trick to prey upon the living: they are somewhat colder for those Tenants that do not warm their kitchen: yea, I would that covetousness had not robbed God of his worship among us. How many Churches of this land have no better than a ten pound stipendary, that hath less learning than living, whiles one of another coat goes away with the Churches Salary?

3 Thou shalt not take the Name of God in vain: this the covetous thinks a very vain Commandment. What equivocation, oath, lie, blasphemy, perjury, will not he swallow in the sweet broth of Commodity? It is a principle in his Catechism, Gain is Godliness; and he never likes Godliness, but when it brings in gain. Sometimes covetousness strips off all religion, at other times Religion must be the cloak of covetousness. Shall not their substance be ours, saith Shechem? So shall not their custom be ours? Are we brothers at the Church, and shall we not be Cosins at the shop.

4 Remember to keep holy my Sabbath. But the covetous thinks, Religion makes men idle: the Sabbath is one day lost in a week; above seven weeks lost in a year; and Ad quid perditio haec? The people are idle, saith Pharaoh, therefore they cry, let us go sacrifice: as if men would never think of sacrifice, unless they were idle. Sacrilege hath impropriated God's Tenths already; and now covetousness would impropriate his Sevenths too. Christ should have neither Tithe nor Time, if avarice might have her will. Not to speak of some Lawyers chambers, which on a Sabbath afternoon are fuller of Clients, than some Country-Churches are of suppliants. We read that on the Sabbath days Jerusalem was troubled with fish-merchants: and does not London abound with drink-merchants? Suppose that these Temples of Bacchus are better visited among us, yet what are the suburbs and adjacent villages? When will the Sabbath be gone, that we may sell corn? There was some honesty yet in that covetousness; they had the patience to tarry so long. But our borderers cry, When will the Sabbath come, that we may have our houses full of Citizens, and vent our tipping commodities? So they turn Sabbatum Dei, into Sabbatum Bacchi: and make it both a selling day, and a swilling day.

5 Honor thy Parents. The father says of his child, as Abraham did, O that Ishmael might live: the covetous son, like Esau, O that the days of mourning for my father were come: Haeredis lachrymae, such tears be grown into a proverb. This is one practice among the Romish orders, like that of the Pharisees: they must give all their goods to the College, and go as naked into the Cloisture, as they came into the world. Thus their poor parents that depend on their maintenance, must have empty bellies, that the others Corban may be full: as if the very smell or steam of the sacrifice were enough to give them their dinners. Did we never hear of such unnatural prodigies, that have denied relief to their own Parents?

6 Thou shalt not kill. Yet this is a common effect of covetousness. He that is greedy of gain, takes away the life of the owners. The Lamp is not only put out by pouring on of water, but by not pouring in of oil. Was not the rich man guilty of Lazarus his blood, while he relieved him not? It will grieve those Churls, that have either made beggars, or not comforted them, to be found at the last day murderers. Dishonest gain is accompanied with blood, saith the Prophet. Judas did not so much hate his master, as love the money: yet the love of the money moved him to betray his master. Naboth will not part with his vineyard, he shall therefore part with his life. He is accused, condemned, stoned; here is a ready payment for a rich vineyard: Ahab will drink his blood, that he may come to taste his wine. What makes Rome give toleration of murder, by ordaining refuges for willful blood, but avarice? Murder is condemned by the light of Nature, as the Barbarians concluded upon Paul: yet to the golden shore how many fear not to swim through a stream of blood?

7 Thou shalt not commit adultery. Yet coy Danaë will admit an adulterous Jupiter in a golden shower. The purse hath often prevailed more than the person. Do not too many Gallants plot how to get into the Merchants bed, rather than how to get out of the Merchants book! What doth countenance the Romish Curtesan, but the Popes Corban? Out of those licenced Stews, he makes himself pleasant broth. Some force themselves to a single life, merely to avoid the charges of the married condition. They that had rather fry in their own sensuality, than quench that fire with an allowed remedy, do (as it were) offer up themselves to Moloch, in the burning flames of lust. Thus a covetous father in the marriage of his child, inquires not after virtues, but riches. Abigail signifies her fathers joy, yet she was matched with Nabal, and sorrow together. If her father had meant her joy, either in her self, or in her life; so unworthy a Churl had wooed in vain. But he married her Nummo, non viro. O how many a child is thus cast away upon riches? What is the usual effect of it; but either for the discontented wife to want issue, or unlawfully to seek it?

8 Thou shalt not steal. All coozenage is theft; and ostende mihi avarum, remonstrabo tibi furem. Extortions, Depopulations, Impropriations; Enclosures, engrossings, monopolies, with that whole litter of vipers, are bred in the dunghill of covetousness. Now the covetous man may be counseled by his lawyer, that he hath an action against me, for calling him Thief. But if we should come to trial, there is a witness within him that would cry, a Thief, a Thief, his conscience would attach a Thief in his own bosom. I could tell you of an eulogie made by an orator of a magistrate, wherein he commended him for being no Thief. This, replied another, were a good commendation for a servant; if besides, he be no runagate. But at the great Assizes, he is no lover of riches that shall clear himself from being a thief.

9 Thou shalt not bear false witness. But he that scruples not at false dealing, will never stick at false accusing. The tongue is an ill apprentice to the covetous heart, if it cannot lend the false hand a lie or an oath. I know there be hackney consciences, Knights of the Post; and flatterers that admire persons for advantage, as dogs fawn for a crust. But does not the tradesman, that tells me a tale in my ear, while he cuts a hole in my purse, deceive me with a false testimony? Lest I be poor, and steal, and take the Name of my God in vain. Poor and steal; poverty brings in theevery. Steal, and take the Name of God in vain. Theevery brings on Perjury. The lawyer that pleads his clients cause, against his own conscience, is hired by covetousness to bear a false witness.

10 Thou shalt not covet that which is thy neighbors. But if the covetous man's hands were as able, as his wishes be nimble, like another Adam, he would have the whole world to himself. They talk of the Philosophers stone, your rosy-cross brethren; there is no such thing in Rerum natura, unless it be a covetous man's heart. That is of a chymicall virtue, and would turn all into gold, a perpetual limbecke that labors of projection: till on the sudden the glass breaks and all flies out in fumo. He doth wish the whole earth were mines and Indies; the ocean a sea of gold, as S. John calls it a Sea of glass. If every fish had so much money in it as S. Peters, he would quickly turn fisherman. Heaven it self cannot tempt him, unless it were all gold, and every star a diamond. Pope Benedict. 12. refused to make another Cardinal, unless he could make another world: for as that was not sufficient for his Cardinal, so one is too little for the covetous. Si offa totius mundi injiceretur dentibus, & faucibus eorum universa rerum massa; if the whole world were thrown as a sop into their mouths, it would not content avarice.

Thus is he a transgressor of every law. Go now ye fools, and flatter yourselves, that you are no Atheists, no Idolaters, no Blasphemers, no Sabbath-profaners, no parent contemners, no murderers, adulterers, thieves, nor liars: you have been all these, are all these, or may be all these, or whatsoever else the devil will, if you continue covetous. The opinion of honesty is put on this sin through the world; An honest man, but something hard: but yet in the Judges sentence, the adulterer and thief are as honest men. Read 1 Corinth. 6.10. and Eph. 5.5. There you may learn what to think of his honesty. He is got into the midst of that desperate throng, that shall never see the face of God. We rank him with Addermen and Gentlemen, give him the best offices, the highest room at the Table, and Pew in the Church: God reckons him amongst whores, and blasphemers, and thieves, and dogs, which be indeed his companions. Certainly, if such a man be honest, there are abundance of honest men in hell. We are loath to keep company with swearers, and swashers, and harlots, and drunkards; but we have as great a charge of separation from the covetous. Eate not with him: and Solomon gives the reason, Because he hath an evil eye; that wisheth a man choakd, when he bids much good do it him; when his guests are gone, he talks how much this man did eat, and how fast the other called for drink; and feeds his family with the mouldy remnants a month after. If such muckewormes were as odious to the rest, as they are to me: they should appear in the street like owls, with whom no honest man will converse. Why should I prefer him before a piece of copper, that prefers a piece of gold before my Maker.

It is time to come to the Remedies of this desperate disease; and to stop that violence and precipitation, wherewith we are transported to these rotten inconstancies.

1 Faith overcomes the world. What doth it bring the riches of it into our coffers? no, but it casts the love of it out of our hearts. The world is not overcome by gaining, but by despising it. As covetousness is an Alchemist, that turns gold into God; so faith makes Christ unto our souls All in all. The more hold a man takes of the world, the more he loseth hold of the Lord. Covetous men cleave to the world so long as they can; but when that staff breaks, then to the Lord. Extremitie of distress will send the profanest to God: as the drowning man stretcheth out his hand to that bough, which he contemned whiles he stood safe on shore. So Saul retired himself to inquire of the Lord, but he answered him not. It is an unreasonable inequality, to hope to find God at our command, when we would not be at his: to look that he should regard our voice in trouble, that would not regard his voice in peace. Let your conversation be without covetousness: why? Because he hath said, I will not leave thee, nor forsake thee. We credit the promise of a wealthy and trusty friend: yet man may lie, man may die, man may be unable to help himself. God is too constant to be changed; too potent to be crossed, too wise to be deceived. I will never leave thee: not in a dear year, not in age, not in sickness, not in death: they that believe this, cannot be covetous. The wealth thou keepest, is not thine own, but God's: he must give it thee out of thine own chest: and if thou hast little, cannot he give it thee out of another's chest, as well?

2 Content with our own condition: he that hath wrought his heart to this happy resolution, hath disfurnished Satan of a deadly weapon. The King is forbidden somultiply to himself silver and gold: yet who hath greater uses, or fairer pretences, for this multiplying, than a

King? Solomon says there be four things that cry Nunquam satis; and we may add a fifth, the covetous heart, that shall care with them all four, and yet rise up with a Never enough. Esau was an honest man to thousands of these; for Esau had Enough. Naboth's vineyard lay too near Jezebels court, it had been better for him in the wilderness. The vicinity did not make it more commodious to the owner, than envious to the beholder. It was now the perpetual object of an evil eye: his vines grew too near the smoke of that Tyrants chimneys, too much within the prospect of Ahab's window. The sight of it breeds those desires, that can neither safely be denied, nor honestly satisfied. Eminence is still joined with peril, obscurity with peace. An inheritance needs no worse inconvenience, than the covetous eye of a Great neighbor. There is no such annoyance belongs to a house, as an Ahab's avarice. He had vineyards enough of his own, but all their grapes were sour to Naboth's. His heart covets it, his tongue demands it, the possessor denies it, he grows sick upon it, Naboth must bleed for it, and then he will have it. Ahab was sick of a Plurisie, and Naboth must be let blood to cure him. O the impotent and insatiate desire of avarice! what is there that can make a man rich, but content? Ahab was Lord and King of all the territories of Israel: Naboth is the owner of one poor vineyard: yet Ahab can have no joy of all Israel, if Naboth enjoy his vineyard. Besides Samaria, Ahab was Lord Paramount of Damascus, and all Syria; conqueror of Him that was attended with two and thirty Kings. Naboth was a plain Townesman of Jezreel; the good husband of a little vineyard. Whether is the richer? Naboth wisheth for nothing of Ahab's; Ahab longeth for something of Naboth's, and cannot brook a repulse. Riches and poverty is more in the heart, than in the hand: he is wealthy that is contented, he is poor that wants it. O poor Ahab, that carest not for thine own large possessions, because thou mayest not have another's. O rich Naboth, that carest not for all the dominions of Ahab, so thou mayest enjoy thine own.

3 Look up to the Promised land: if but one glimpse of those heavenly treasures were presented to our eyes; how scornfully would we behold the world, and call it as Hiram did the cities given him by Solomon, in indignation, Cabul, a $\langle \diamond \rangle$ or dirtie land. Thou lovest gold, there is a city whose streets be gold. Who would be raking in the kennels of the earth, that might gather pearls out of those chrystalline streams of joy? Our Head is in heaven, what make our Hearts upon earth! It is fit the Head and the heart should go together. Sicut Ecclesiam praecessit Caput ejus, sic Christianum praecedat cor ejus. We cannot yet get up our bodies, let us send up our hearts. Sequetur totum nostrum, quo praecesserit aliquid nostrum. The way to mortify covetousness, isto lay hold on eternal life. The looser hold we have of the world, the less hold the world shall have of us: and the more we fasten above, we loosen below. Men of the world have their portion in this life; but my teeth shall not water at their dainties.

4 Let us free ourselves from a false opinion of riches: we think they will satisfy us, and they cannot. Non plus satiabitur cor hominis auro, quam corpus aurâ. The heart shall be satisfied with gold, when the body is contented with wind, ye*, does not Aurum rather make Auarum? S. Augustine tells of an oration which he made to the Emperor; wherein he exceedingly pleased him, because he exceedingly praised him; and was so eloquent in his commendation, that all the hearers fell into commendation of that eloquence. But for his reward, it was like ours; for our good words, the people return us only good words again: as when a Poet presented Augustus with Greek verses, he for his reward gave him Greek verses again. Home he came, and by the way in a green meadow he spied a poor beggar, well lined with strong drink, frisking, and singing, and dancing, and taking care for nothing. Whereupon he thus sighed; What is riches, that it should not give so much content as beggary? Miserable is that life, wherein none are happy but the miserable. All our labor for wealth, is but care and travel, for travel and care. He that hunts this game in the worlds forest puts up more beasts than he well knows how to be shut of. This beggar hath not burnt candles all night a month together, he made no oration to the Emperor today, yet he is merry. His purse hath no crowns, his flesh wears rag, yet he is jocund: sure there is no art leading to felicity, but the art of beggary, The meditation of this beggarly content wrought that learned man to provide for the posterity of his soul unperishing riches. Thus though the beggar had more joy than Augustine, yet Saint Augustine had more joy than the beggar. With how different aspects and affects do diverse men look upon the world! The Prophet and his man did not look upon the Syrian treasure with the same eyes. The one with the eye of contempt, the other of admiration: the one refuseth it offered, the other runs after it forbidden. I will destroy the whole land, and seekest thou great things for thyself? Mundus perit, & tu mundana quaeris? Alas, they are but speciosa supplicia, fortunae vomitus. If they like true servants could continue, yet we like frail Masters must vanish.

5 Lastly Charity. The sheep is overladen with wool, if it be never shorn; and no coat is made for the child while it grows there. The worldlings wealth is too heavy a burden for him: let him be clipp'd, and his wool then may do much good. Do good, and distribute. Call your riches what you will, you shall never find them to be goods, till you do good with them. Men are mistaken in riches: God is called Rich; not for his money, but for his mercy: not for having good, but for doing good. The same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him. Wherein rich? not in being Lord of all, so much as in doing good to all. Thus covet to be rich; Rich in Faith, rich in God, rich in good works. It was the worldlings folly, to think that wealth consisted in having goods, not in doing good. So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God; So, that is, as very a fool as he was. Covetice is that iniquity, which hath cast upon riches that reproachful Title; to be called The riches of iniquity. This inconvenience can only be helped by charity; Make you friends of that Mammon. Otherwise, a treasure of riches gathered and hoarded this day, is but atreasure of vengeance gathered and hoarded against the last day. Whereas he that gets to give, doth give to keep. Thou fearest to lose thy money by giving it, and yet fearest not to lose thyself by keeping it. Every man shall leave his riches behind him, and every man shall find them again. They that have done good with them, shall find them safe in heaven, with the advantage of glory: they that hoarded them here, shall find them again too, and with usury; but the super-addition is the plague of conscience, and eternity of torments.

God hath appointed himself the rewarder of alms, even to acup of water: and a punisher of covetousness, even to thewant of a drop of water. Dives would not give Lazarus a crumb of bread, though it might save his life: and Lazarus must not bring Dives a drop of water, though it might save his soul. Discused riches do not more rust in the coffer, than in the conscience, they be not only Corruptae, but corrumpentia. Moisture was not given to the springs, that they should remain in the places where they were bred; but to run along in their watery channels, and to spend themselves upon the dry and barren grounds. Plato had a conceit, that nature at first was delivered of two daughters, Plentie and poverty: that need might be beholding to plenty, for supply to her indigence: and Fullness to poverty, for ease of her abundance. The rich man was made for the poor, and the poor for the rich. Pauperis est rogare, divitis erogare. Rich niggards are like blessed Thistles: when death hath cropp'd them, some water may be distilled out of them, medicinal to the disease of poverty.

Rich men should imitate Job, as he did the eagle; who is so honorable, that he will not eat his prey alone. The conceit that keeps rich men from giving, is a faithless fear that they shall want before they die. Therefore God often takes them away in the midst of their Mammon; and so rids them of what they were afraid, and provides for others whereof they have need. It is easy for avarice to find an excuse to save the purse: the widow of Sarepta could have answered the Prophet, with her own want; as the Macedonians could the Apostle, that they had poor enow of their own, to take up their relief: yet they did not. God loves a careful giver. An alms given with a grudging hand, doth not only lose all reward, but deserveth no pardon. Erogando pecuniam, augebis Iustitiam: thy righteousness shall shine forth as the Sun, when the Sun of righteousness shines forth in his glory. Otherwise, audiant irrogare supplicia, qui nolunt erogare subsidia. Men receive but ten for the surplusage of a hundred below: there shall be a hundred for ten repaid hereafter. What do we give, but that which was first given us, and we cannot keep? He hath dispersed and given to the poor: his righteousness remaineth forever. The good man hath both riches and righteousness: he gives his riches, his righteousness he shall keep forever. Good deeds derived from faith, are rampiers and fortifications against Satan: what shall become of those cities, that have no such walls? they are a tribute we owe unto God, for defending us from our enemies, and planting peace in our consciences: he requires now no burnt offerings nor sacrifices; but the fruits of mercy. Thus our Religion affords us more, and costs us less: yet when the Lord gives us the whole harvest, we scarce allow him the very gleanings. The Idolatrous Gentiles shall condemn us; for they bestowed their wealth in Fanes and Shrines and Images; whereas we to the living Images of the true God will not give our superfluities. Our devotion can away with anything, rather than this same Pharisical alms-giving. Yet the Cart that is overladen and crammed too full of sheaves, hath a tail that will scatter: let those full gorged worldlings take heed, lest hogs come to glean after their carts tail; and their heirs be made Wards to usurers. Let the extortioner catch all that he hath. It may be for his soul, he gives it gone; but his goods (he hopes) shall last: the extortioner says Nay to that; and his children shall not have enough left to keep them in prison. The Miser is the thieves mark; if he would prevent robbing, let him be bountiful. The Catle comes to distress, and no man pities him. Be charitable, that you may save your heirs from undoing. If there be in your bags but one shilling that should have been the poor's, that shilling shall be the consumption of all his fellows.

But after all this, he will build an Hospital. Will he? Now blessing on him: when he hath taken away a man's land and inheritance, he will give him a staff to walk withal. By oppression he hath hedged into himself great pastures, and now he will allow the owner, the running of a nagge. When I pass by an Hospital built by a money-monger, me thinks I see the goodly monument of a bloody devotion. He sets a dossen beggars to pray for him, that God would forgive him the making of a thousand. And not seldom lewd persons are chosen into those places; whose prayers in the chapel cannot so much avail him, as their curses out of it make against him. In the law, God abhorred that offering, which was the price of a dog, or the hire of a harlot. He that thinks to be excused by giving part of his robberies, goes about to corrupt God with presents, and calls him in to take part of the spoil. But why doth Christ then say, make you friends of your unrighteous Mammon? I answer; He calls them not evil, because they were so much gotten by evil means, as were the baits of evil motions; otherwise, first wrongs should be satisfied, before friends be purchased. The Apostles rule is, first to Labor honestly for wealth, and then to give to him that needeth. Quamvis de parvo, tamen de justo, de proprio. It is true, that a pound does the poor more good than a penny; yet a well earned penny shall do the giver more good, than ill gotten thousands.

But there be some that hold it idle, to do but so well, with what they got so ill. He that hath nothing to do with his money; but build Churches, they count him one of God Almighty's fools. Or if the Bench of penny-fathers do not censure his wisdom, yet they will term him a vain-glorious fellow. Tut, Almhouses will make good Stables; and being let out in tenements, yield a round sum by the year. A strong closset, and a good iron hutch, is worth twenty of your Hospitals. These Chuffes will contribute something toward the building of a Iaile, to deter thieves; or of a gallhouse, to execute them: but for a Church or an Almhouse, they see no need of those. Thus do they teach God to deny themselves mercy: for he that demands mercy, and shows none, mines the bridge, over which himself is to pass. We read of a Lad that had five barley leaves in a Basket, which, Jesus took and distributed to the people. Much goods are too heavy for the covetous, as the loaves were for the Boy. Clausa onerabunt, reclusa recreabunt: Let them open the Basket, and divide them among the poor. This is a special medicine, to breathe out the corrupt blood of covetousness.

Cursed children.] Filii maledictionis. Hebrais. which may be taken either actively, or passively. For they carry a curse about them, wheresoever they go: and they bring a curse along with them, whithersoever they come. Covetousnes is the Roote of all evils, not only criminal but penal. There be innumerable woes against it, and sooner or later they shall overtake it. I have smitten my hands at thy dishonest gain; there the covetous man is but threatened. For the iniquity of his covetousness, I was wrath, and smote him; there he is plagued. God doth not only smite his hands at him, but he smites at him with his hands. He is in Laodicea's case; Wretched in getting, poor in not using, blind in keeping, naked in leaving, miserable in accounting.

1 Cursed not seldom in his body; which restless calamity is but a whip of his own making. I might instance Achan's heap of stones, Balaam's sword in his bowels, Judas his halter about his neck; one piece more to his thirty; but look upon Gehazi for all. The Prophet and the Syrian are parted; only Gehazi could not so take his leave: his heart was mailed up in one of Naaman's Portmanques, and he must after to fetch it. He thinks his Master too kind, or too simple, in refusing so just a present: himself will be wiser, thriftier. Desire hastens his pace; he does not go, but run after his bootie. He hath it with advantage, two for one; and now pleaseth himself with the waking dreams, of what Land he might purchase, how well he was provided for, to live at ease. What says his Master to it? The leprosy of Naaman cleave unto thee, and to thy seed forever; the act overtakes the word; he went out from his presence a leper as white as snow. A woeful change hath Gehazi made with Naaman. Naaman came a leper, returned a Disciple: Gehazi came a Disciple, returned a leper. Naaman left behind him his disease and his money, Gehazi takes up both his money and his disease. The rest of his days he shall wear out in pain, and shame, and sorrow. He hath two changes of raiment for his body; but is not the body better than raiment? He wears Naaman's double livery, both of apparel and leprosy. He shall never look upon himself, but think on Naaman, and ô ye covetous, when you see yourselves, think upon Gehazi.

2 Cursed in his goods, which are his gods; first, he shall never have comfort in them: the curse of that unbelieving Prince shall fall upon him? he shall see his own abundance, never taste it. Like the Indians that are slaved to the Spanish mines, he is homo ad metalla damnatus. In the fullness of his sufficiency he shall be in straits. Dives in miseris, miser in divitiis. Other sinners that have forfeited heaven, yet receive some pleasure on earth: but the covetous deprives himself of this world, and God will deprive him of the world to come; so he enjoys neither; is not this a curse? But suppose the fool thinks it none; therefore, secondly, he shall not long keep his wealth. He shall leave it in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool. It is a hell to him to leave his riches at the end of his days; what is it then to lose them in the midst? The Sapies of Africa are buried with all their gold about them; and worldlings would either not die at all, or else be buried so. If he must be a beggar in the midst, what shall he be at the end of his days? A fool; he shall lose both his goods, and his wits. Thus Praedo minoris erit praeda majoris. There shall none of his meat be lest, therefore shall no man look after his goods.

3 Cursed in his Posterity. All his project and drift is to leave his children an Inheritance on earth, though he forfeit his own in heaven: loe, even this also God disappoints. As the father was a rich beggar, the children shall be poor Gentlemen. What got Gehazi's posterity by their fathers covetousness, but an hereditary leprosy. He covets an evil covetousness to his house. Indeed his desire is of good, but the event of that desire turns to evil; and he consults shame to his house, not as he supposed, honor. His children shall seek to please the poor; flatter the needy, and beg even of beggars: see now what his Gentlemen come to. God hath given him riches, saith Solomon, but not power to eat thereof. It may be so, but the more he spares, the more he leaves for his children; no, but a stranger shall eat it. Parents be good to your children; let not my breath seem strange to you, (to speak in Job's phrase) that entreat for the children of your own loins. Do not covet to leave them so much, that you disinherit them of all. There is no surer way to undo them, than by undoing others for them.

4 Cursed in his soul: he is in little better case on earth, than that rich miser was in hell, burning in desire of that drop of water, which never shall be granted him; Content. The Covetous hath no inheritance in the kingdom of God. No inheritance there? and none here, neither? In what country then lies this man's purchase? In a place, which is called, Without; the Territory of Hell. After all his comings in, he shall be sure of that to come into the bargain: this is that makes up his revenues.

Now he that is so well practiced in casting up parcels, Semper in rationibus, so much in his counting-house; let him look over these particulars, and sum up his gains. A curse upon his Body, upon his goods, a curse upon his children, upon his own soul; here is his profit: would not this gain make a man covetous? A man's soul in exchange for the whole world, were but a hard bargain. Thou fool, they shall fetch away thy soul from thee, and then whose shall these be? yea, whose shalt thou be? Lord, give us nothing in this world, that may prevent our happiness in the world to come; let us rather be beggars, than not Saints.

To take yet a fuller view of this curse, let me give you a short Character of the covetous man. He is cursed to be a servant of servants: the Saints drudge is his Saint. He shrines his god in his coffer, and there locks up his heart for a perpetual sacrifice to it. Whereas the true God keepeth his, he will keep his god: and gives to a piece of earth that veneration, which he denies to his Maker. Yet he dares not trust either any other God, or his own: but fears lest thieves should put him to Micah's complaint; Ye have taken away my gods, and what have I more? O poor god, that cannot keep it self from stealing! He fears a thief worse than the devil; yea, he will be beholding to the devil for a spell to save him from the thief. In his unquiet sleep he dreams of Burglary; and is not sure that even now he barred the door. If his conscience ever go about to prejudice his profit, he condemns it for a common Barretor. He would often hang himself when he is cross'd of his hopes, but that he is loath to be at the charges of a halter; which if he finds ready provided, he is ready to do it indeed: and if some charitable hand cut the cord, he cries out that he is undone; when if he had not been undone, he had perished. He laughs at poor men's curses; and before he dies, curseth himself to boot.

The Ancients have compared covetous men to Hogs: of all beasts, the ejected devils chose to enter into them: and still they affect those hoggish carles, that insatiately swill up the draffe of the world. One wittily observes, that if the Jews had not been forbidden by the Law, yet Nature it self would have dissuaded them from eating swine's flesh; lest one hog should eat another. Worldlings are hogs, carrying their snowts downward, not looking up to the tree whence comes their mast, wallowing in mucke, digging up the earth, if they be not ring'd by the law for rooting; insatiable in devouring, hoinish and grunting, and grudging any neighbourhood. The unthrift with his riotous courses, doth but still feed hogs. It is not meet to give the children's bread to dogs; much less to hogs. By their unnatural dealing in the world, you would not think they came naturally into the world; but rather like those that were called Caesar's, quasi caesi ex utero matris. Their sin is so impatient of the delay of vengeance, as if they would pluck the stern of the world out of God's hand, till he had confounded them. Oppression is the price of blood: the Jews would not put it into their Treasury; these dare put it into their Patrimony. There is no religion in them, but the love of money: by fraud and perjury they had confiscated their souls long ago. Any doctrine is welcome to them, but that which beats upon good works. They stick not with the Sages, to fall down and worship Christ, but they cannot abide to present him with their gold. Not to meddle or make with a man, is a high favor, for which (they look) God and the world should be beholding to them. They think all charity to their neighbor consists in bidding him Good morrow. How grossly do they cozen themselves! The Prince requires not only that his Laws be not contradicted, but not violated. Go, ye cursed, because ye did not give: you do not hear them taxed for condemning charity in others, but for not performing it themselves.

All their devotion consists in a few abrupt graces; God be praised, Much good do it you. And if any man speak against unjust dealing, they stand not to maintain their Copy-hold; but, we are all naught, God amend us: and stop the Preachers mouth with, Sir I drink to you: but God's mouth will not be stopped so. Being asked at the day of Judgment, From whence come you? they must answer in the devils language, From compassing the earth; for heaven they have not compass'd. All their good deeds be only good words, but God's Words are deeds: Go, ye cursed. He that spake the word, and made heaven and earth, shall but speak the word, and send them to hell. Nec volunt esse paupers, nec haberi divites. To avoid a subsidie, they complain of poverty: and when they complain of want, they most fear that which they complain to have. Thus do they live in anguish, to die upon the rack, and to finish their course in everlasting unhappiness. Now as you like this cursedness, you may go on in covetousness. It is pity but the world should love him, that will love the world upon these conditions. But for ourselves, let us impartially scourge this Manmon out of our Temples: Christ did not die to purchase this world for us: let us not lose that which he purchased, to purchase that which he contemned. No Lord, thou hast prepared Mansions for us, prepare us for those Mansions; that by being rich in Grace, we may come to be rich in Glory. Amen.

2 PET. 2.15.

They have forsaken the right way, and are gone astray, following the way of Balaam the son of Bosor, who loved the wages of unrighteousness.

A Man hath but two hands, but two feet; so he hath but two kinds of ways for those feet, but two sorts of works for those hands. His deeds be either good or bad, his way is either right or wrong, and his end will be either heaven or hell. The right way is hard to pass, and not easy to find: therefore God gives us his Word for a Guide, and his Grace for an Assistant. But the wrong way is so familiar, that we know it from our childhood; and so easy, that we run it by nature. We need not be taught it, for if we be not taught the other, we will never forsake it. Besides the easiness, that it is without difficulty; the smoothenesse, without rubs; the advantage, down a hill, without pains; It is numerous, and multiplies it self into great variety. Malum Culpa, Sin is the head or beginning of it, and this divides it self into three, The lust of the flesh, lust of the eyes, and pride of life; and those three into three thousand. Now the concluding term where they all meet, is Malum Pna, Punishment. So that if a sinner doth not like one way, he may take another; if he cares not for excess, he may admit gripulousnesse: there is choice enough: any of all those millions of obliquities is able to bring him to hell; that Rndevous and common term where all transgressions have appointed to meet. The devil is called the god of this world, as it were, Lord of the soil, having a commission to take up those wefts and straves, that willfully straggle from the way of truth, and keep not the precincts wherein God hath bounded them.

First, these Sorcerers, like vagabonds, abjure all honest callings, and turn their backs upon the place where they are set to work, refusing the path of God's Commandments, They forsake the right way. Secondly, next, being set a wandering, all the world is their scope: which way soever they travel, they cannot be out of their way: be it treachery, blasphemy, uncleanness, what it will, all is their own. They balk no wrong way, all their care is to miss the right; They are gone astray. Thirdly, then they have their Captain, whose exemplary steps they must follow; Balaam the grand Rogue, the master Rebell, the king of out-laws; this is their Leader; Following Balaam. Fourthly, and lastly, though the great Commander of all be not expressed, yet he is insinuated; Satan: under whose Colours they all march, move and remove as he appoints: and the reward, which this black guard, this tatter'd regiment serve him for, is Wages: and that not bare pay, so much wages for so much work, but above just allowance, it must be the wages of unrighteousness. Thus now they have taken press-money, and put themselves into the Army; let us see how they follow their Captain, and he his Commander; they Balaam, and Balaam the devil.

They have forsaken the right way.] This is their Apostasy. The right way is the signified will of God; and whatsoever repugneth that, is the wrong. The will of God is either Consilium cordis, or verbum oris: the former, Quod vult fieri de nobis; the other, Quod vult fieri à nobis. The first we cannot break, the latter we now cannot keep. This manifest will of God was first dictated to man by Nature, when God engraved his image in the Table of his heart. Adam obscured this image, but (through God's mercy) saved the Tablet. But now because the letters which he had written in our tables of flesh, were almost grown out; like some ancient characters in the barks of trees; he saw it time to write them in Tables of Stone; whose hardness should not be capable of alteration. It was plain, that the squared stone would be more faithful and retentive, than our unsquared heart. There never was so precious a monument, as the law written with God's own hand. They that so doate on the beggarly relics of their imaginary Saints, how would they have adored this? If we did see but the stone that was Jacob's pillow, or one of those upon which Jesus sate, a piece of Jacob's Well; we would look upon it with more than ordinary respect. With what admiration then should we have beheld that Stone, which was hewn and written with the very finger of God? If we have but a manuscript, written by the hand of some famous man, we lay it up among our choicest Jewels: what reverence then should we have given to the hand-writing of the Almighty? The stone is lost, the hand-writing remains: yea, even the hand-writing is nailed to the Cross, so that it hath lost the condemning power, though not the commanding power. The Book is mis-carried, the contents are left as a Royal Law; whereby the whole world should be governed, whereby the whole world shall be judged.

This is the Right way; from which they that perversely wander, destroy their own souls. We read of the wicked, that they cast the Law of God behind them: and we read of Moses, that he did cast the Law of God from him, and broke the Tables. Yet God forgave the latter, and condemns the former. Moses in a holy zeal broke but the material books, they in a rebellious malice break the spiritual contents. The Law then is the Right way; Thy Commandments are right: therefore given us as infallible rules to guide all our actions by. Inquire for the old way, which is the good way, and walk in it. The will of God is Norma rectitudinis; whatsoever swarves from that is Haereticum, erraticum, whether in opinion or practice. Wherewithall shall a young man cleanse his way? or an old man his; Prince or subject, theirs; noble or vulgar, rich or poor, theirs? Even by ruling themselves after thy Word. But alas, who is able to keep this way without some deviations? It is for these sacred Cherubims, to have rectos pedes, straight feet. We have Viam rectam, a right way; but pedes non rectos, In many things we sin all. Thou hast commanded us to keep thy precepts diligently: this is God's Imperative. O that my ways were directed to keep thy statutes: this should be our Optative. But how if we endeavor to go right, and cannot, is there no help? Yes, there is a Way within the way, (like the Ecclipticke line within the Zodiac) an Evangelical way of mercy, to correct the rigor of the legal. I am the Way, saith Christ: this is the right way indeed. We cannot walk in the Law, unless the Gospel help us: and the Gospel will do us no good, unless we strive to walk in the Law. Christ is both our Savior and our King: first, we must believe in that Promise which he hath given to save us: and next, give obedience to that Law whereby he will govern us. This is that entire Rule; and as many as walk according to this Rule, peace be on them and mercy. Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the Word of Eternal Life. Not only the word of authority to command, nor the word of wisdom to direct, nor the word of power to convert, nor the Word of Grace to comfort, but also the Word of Eternal Life to make us perfectly blessed.

They have forsaken the right way] Therefore they once had it; no man can be said to leave that thing which he never knew. To refuse a thing, implies a present offer: but to forsake it, argues a former acceptance. So the Prodigal forsook his fathers house for a strange country, his fathers household for strange company, his fathers favor for a bag of money, his fathers bread for the husks of beans: these if he had not enjoyed, he could not have forsaken. Here is an image of Apostasy, whether of Faith, or of manners; which after a knowledge and approbation of the right way, is a deliberate election of the wrong. Incipere plurimorum, perficere perpaucorum. There be some that go forward in the ways of obedience; that in spite of all crosses and bruises, like good ships maintain their course: that are not disheartened through the ill success of one adventure; Sed redit ad tumidas naufraga puppis aquas. In Gideon's army, all the faint-hearted were commanded to stay at home: no cowards get into the kingdom of heaven. Some are in many minds and moods, now forward, then backward; full of motions and commotions, ebbing and flowing, like Eripus, seven times a day. Some make neither forward nor backward; neither ebb, nor flow, like Mare mortuum; but are betwixt the religious and the irreligious, just standing water. But these go altogether backward, and forsake the right way, as their most offensive eye-sore. So like a man out of the way, the faster they run, the further off.

They have forsaken the right way.] Perseverance is the Crown of all Graces. Aaron's garment had Pomegranates in the skirt: the Pomegranate hath the form of a Crown, above all fruits; and this hung at the end of his vesture; to show that The end crowns all. The righteous man's sleaf shall not wither: it is the note of the Gloss, Lapsus foliorum, mortificatio arborum. Happy repentance is sorry for ill beginnings: but to dislike good beginnings, is an unhappy repentance. To divert ourselves from virtue, as the Jew put away his wife, without cause, is base ingratitude. Virtue seems to give a man this charge, when she first offers her self; Either never choose me, or never lose me. Not to know the right way, is an unblest ignorance; but it is a cursed disobedience, after knowledge to forsake it. To begin in the spirit, and end in the flesh, was in Paul's sense, Folly: but to begin with Grace, and end with wickedness, is malicious impiety. Yet how many have begun and proceeded well, that have shamed the stage with their last act? Solomon's younger years were studious and full of wisdom his age was licentious and full of misgovernment. The philosopher could say, If every man must have a fit of madness, it is less unhappy to fall in youth: but certainly it is best not to be mad at all. Youth is petulant; wherein as to fall is easy, so these falls are relieved with pity. But inordinate errors are both most unseasonable, and most intolerable in old age. Pueritia senum, ludibria juvenum. Solomon was the Beloved of God, the oracle, the miracle of wisdom, in youth: who would not have expected, that the blossoms of so hopeful a spring should have yielded goodly and pleasant fruit in the Autumn? Yet see, in his old age he forsook the right way. There is no time that can have security from sin, while it carries the sin of security about it. If any age were safe from this danger, it is the last. If any man's last days were safe, old David had not fallen. Youth is impetuous, middle age stubborn, old age covetous, all dangerous. It is no presuming upon time, or means, or strength: if God uphold us not, we cannot stand: if he do uphold us, we cannot fall. When we are at our full strength, it is good to be weak in ourselves: when at our weakest, to be strong in him, in whom we can do all things. O blessed conscience in which is found this testimony, we have not forsaken the way of the Lord. All virtues run in the Race, one only receiveth the garland, the Image of most happy eternity, happy continuance. He that continues unto the end, shall be saved.

They have forsaken.] This is more than a mere aberration, of weakness; even a resolute, dissolute, absolute renouncing of the right way; without so much as a Farewell to it, or a vouchsafing so much as once to look back upon it. Not aberratio, but rather Abjuratio pietatis. When the wicked even fall out with God: as Pope Julius, having received an unexpected overthrow by the French at Ravenna, did set his face against heaven; Sic, esto nunc Gallicus; henceforth become French: in the name of all the devils in hell, holy Switzer pray for us. So ungodly men betake themselves to new Saints, or rather new devils; hardness of heart, contempt of God, neglect of salvation. Behold, this evil is of the Lord, what should I wait for the Lord any longer? O the desperate resolution of impatient minds! They will stint God, both for his time, and measure: if he fail their desires in either, they turn their backs upon him, or fly in his face. It is one thing to forsake; another to propose and prepense a forsaking: nor is their fault a simple transgression of the law, but a proud and willful contempt of it.

In how full strength doth this example arise to the conviction of the Romists; who have indeed forsaken the right way; not only in regard of manners, but of Doctrines: they have practically rejected it, and dogmatically taught against it.

For the law, they have made it of none effect through their traditions. First, for the first Commandment, they make an unjust God, which is worse than none at all: while they teach that he quits the debt, but not the payment of the debt. As if the Creditor should tell his debtor; I do forgive thee, but withal I will arrest thee. To pardon the fault, and not the punishment, is but a mockery. Secondly, the second they have razed quite out: because that Commandment stands plainly forbidding Images; therefore, that Images may stand, they forbid the Commandment. Thirdly, by declaring that men are not bound to keep oath with heretics, they take the Name of God in vain, and teach flat perjury. Fourthly, the Lord's Sabbath hath not so much respect among them, as a Saints holiday. Fifthly, they dispense with allegiance to Princes; yea give remission of sins upon condition to become traitors; and so make the grace of God the reward of disloyalty. They absolve children from all obedience to their own parents, by admitting them into their Monasteries. Quid tibi cum Patre? The Pope is thy father; the Church thy mother, Friars thy brethren and Nuns thy sisters. Sixthly, they make him no murderer, that kills a person whom they have excommunicated; and tolerate murder by ordaining refuges for willful blood. Seventhly, they have established Stews by public order, and permitted fornication. So they may have silver, they care not to rake it out of the devils sink. Hence it comes to pass as the Prophet said: It came by the heir of a harlot, and to the heir of a harlot it shall return: what they get by one whore, they wast upon another. Eighthly, Sacrilege is the greatest theft, and of this they make the least conscience. They make sale of all things; heaven, hell, earth, pardons, Purgatory; which is flat robbery, and the greatest coozenage. Ninthly, Their spurious and Juggling equivocations hath made the whole world hiss at them for false witnesses. If the Priest be examined by the Magistrate in any dangerous article, he answers, I know it not, (that is, with this reservation, to tell it thee: grounding it upon a senseless exposition of Christ's words; The Son of man knoweth not the day or hour of the last Judgment; that is, say they, to reveal it to others. Tenthly, the Tenth they have restrained to the consent of will, and make lust or the first motion no sin. One commandment they have taken out; and to make up the number, cut the last into twain: as he that out of ten bags of money stealeth one, divides one of the nine left into two, that his theft may not be perceived. And yet this last they disannul again by their wrong interpretation. So that one while they make two of one; another while of those two they make none. Considering all this, it was no wonder in the first Session of the last Council of Lateran, to see the Pope lay the Scriptures at his feet. We find the true Church with a Crown of twelve stars on her head, while that counterfeit Head of the Church throws the Crown and Twelve stars, the doctrine of the Twelve Apostles at his profane feet.

To the Gospel they have been no less injurious; laying another foundation than Christ; and ascribing his Prerogative to a man of sin. To him they give power to create new articles of faith: albeit these overthrow the old. Whereas God hath subjected all men to the Scripture, they subject the Scripture to themselves; and bind it to an uncertain dependence upon their Church. For the Fathers and most illuminate writers; if there be anything makes against the policy of Rome; away with it; their expurgations shall cast it out at the window. Themselves write of Cardinal Gropper, in praise of his Continencie, that he threw his bed out of his chamber window, because on a time he found a woman making it. If any author have brought to light never so little of their darkness; as if he had made a bed in a wrong chamber, out it shall go at the window.

Who can then blame us for forsaking them, that have forsaken the right way? O but they are still the Church, and we leave the Church in leaving them. This they bellow out, louder than oyster-women in the streets, and think to carry it away with a noise. Take a reverend Divines comparison; Suppose a man hath a fair pool of water in his grounds, which in time becomes corrupted; weeds grow, mud increaseth, and frogs creep into it. To help this, the owner cuts a new chanell; and so drains out the water to this other place, that he leaves the filth and corruption behind. Shall the remaining frogs complain that the water is theirs, because the pit wherein it formerly stood, is theirs? Shall they croake and foam as if they had wrong done them? Or condemn all those fishes for heretics, that refuse their sink for the other pure streams? We have forsaken Rome: what have we left the crystal waters, the pure doctrine that was first in that pool? no, we have only left the weeds, the mud, and the frogs. God hath given us the water clear, which was theirs till they polluted it by their errors. And therefore have we forsaken them, because they succeed in the Church, as the frogs did in the pool. If they forsake the right way, we must forsake them, or Christ will forsake us; which his mercy, and our holy faith forbid.

And are gone astray.] Facillimum errare; Truth is one, errors are infinite. God chargeth us to refuse all ways, but one: Satan bids us refuse that one, and take which way we please All the paths of the wicked be crooked and irregular ways:Impii in circuitu ambulat. They walk not forward to the prize that is set before them, and therefore lose both pains and reward. Herein they truly follow their father, who testifies of himself, that he had compassed the earth. So confused and anfractuouse are their goings, as if they cared not which way they went, so they went not with God. Tortuosae viae malorum, they go wheeling to hell. We are all apt enough to stray, if preventing grace did not rectify us. Philosophers hold, if the inferior spheres were not ruled, and in a manner corrected by the highest, the swiftness of their motion would quickly fire the world. Certainly, if the affections of men were not moderated by the all-guiding Spirit, this little world would soon destroy it self. He that once forsakes the right way, and does not 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, walk uprightly; quickly goes astray, and the first step he takes is toward hell. And he that hath begun that dangerous race, knows not where to stop: like an unbridled horse upon his speed; or a ship with a full wind; even when you strike sails, yet it will go some deal further by the force it had formerly won. He that lays the reins on the neck of his carnal appetite, cannot promise where he will rest. To say, This sin and no more, is as if a man should throw a stone into a pond, with a purpose to make one circle and no more: but that one will beget two, and those two multiply to a hundred.

When a man hath erred from the right way of Charity, into what a number of mischievous courses doth he run? Here he takes up with injury, there he lays out with usury; this man he scandalizeth with malice, with fraud he robs another, a third he kills with oppression: every unrighteous action that the devil puts in his way, he is ready to embrace, be it as foul as deformity it self. Like that free citizen, that so doated on a female slave, that he would needs marry her, though by that match he were sure (by the law) to become a slave with her. Honesty contents it self with one lawful bed, lust is infinite. God's charge was ever against Bigamy: Solomon first takes two wives, then three, then hundreds: and having once gone beyond the stakes of the law, he is ready to lose himself amongst a thousand bedfellows. King Solomon loved many strange women. Here was enough to overthrow the wisest King of the earth: Women, many women, strange women, Idolatrous women. First women; unus unam uni; He that made one woman for one man, saw that one woman was enough for that one man. Let every man have his own wife; Vxorem, non Concubinam: Suam, non alienam: uxorem, non uxores: a wife, not a Concubine: his own, not another man's: his wife, not wives. One; for the charge of our wife is like the charge of our words: Whatsoever is more than yea and nay in the one, or more than Husband and wife in the other, comes of evil, and evil will come of it. Secondly, Many women: two is more than God allows; Bigamy is unlawful: but Polygamie, many women, is only fit for a Mahometane. No marvel if many women did ruin Solomon: Adam had but one, and that a good one, and yet she lost the game. If one woman was enough to undo all men, there is no wonder that many women should undo one man. Thirdly, Strange women: Strange, because not sealed with the holy signet of matrimony; for otherwise they are too familiar. Fourthly, Idolatreus women: others only tempt to lust, these to mis-devotion: if they can join our heart to theirs, they will disjoine it from God.

Hell is down stairs; and if a man have descended a step or two, it is a miracle if he stop before he comes to the bottom. He that hath strayed into these thickets, will be so mazed with intricate circumvolutions, that he shall hardly unwind himself. This bad desire must be gratified with a lewd act, that act seconded with a lie, that lie credited with an oath. To do evil is a sin; to hide it with a lie; doubles the sin; to bind that lie with an oath, trebbles it. So error begets error: as a man of sunk estate, borrows of one to pay another: till finding his credit past soldering up, he runs in everywhere as far as he can, and then breaks. So the sinner, whose conscience lies perdieu refuseth no action that may at once satisfy his desire, and conserve his reputation. At last he hath gone so far wrong, that he thinks himself in the right, and vice is counted virtue. In bodily diseases, where the beginnings are doubtful, and cannot denominate the sickness; yet the proceedings are evident, & quo acrius sentitur morbus, eo certius dignoscitur. In spiritual diseases it is otherwise: for the first entrances are manifest; they trouble the conscience, and the sinner condemns himself: but the more he multiplies transgression, the less is he sensible of any compunction. No man is so mad as to call a fever health, or the gout swift footmanship, or the green sickness beauty, or the Consumption a good state of body. Yet these far-strayed sinners mis-call the right way; while they call lust love, rage fortitude, envy emulation, pride magnanimity, sloth wariness, Covetousnes frugality, and rank dishonesty but mere Policy. Who shall rectify that luxate member, which denies it self to be out of joint? Come cast in thy lot among us, we shall find precious substance, saith the ungodly. If he might appoint the way, this should be the right: if he might determine the end, all should be peace: but he is mistaken in both. Woe to them that call evil good, and good evil, &c. Woe in deed; Woe for refusing the right, woe for approving the wrong, woe for that they have erred, and woe because they will not be converted.

I conclude; It is said of Israel, that they journeyed, and pitched, secundum os Iehovae, at the commandment of the Lord. O blessed obedience, that in all business follows this direction! But alas, Erravimus cum Patribus nostris, we all like sheep have gone astray. Like sheep? yea, like goats and dromedaries. The breasts of Eve gave no other milk to her children, Adam left no other Inheritance to his posterity, than disobedience. Even in the Garden of Eden, this bitter root grew too near the goodliest trees of life and knowledge: whereof our parents tasting, not only infected their own blood, but diffused their corruption into their whole succeeding linage. God forbad but one Tree, granting all the rest: Satan slighting all the rest, persuaded to this one. Yet how did Eve believe a Murderer before her maker, the father of lies above the God of truth? Aaron's rod was laid up in the Ark, as a token of Israel's rebellion. The whole world is an Ark or Court of Rolles, to record the monuments of our disobedience. Moses sets down a catalogue of their rebellions; but alas, ours be beyond all numeration. If the Lord forsook them for forsaking his truth, can we look to scape?

Christ sent two Disciples to bring him the Ass and her colt. Some by the Ass understand the Jews, by the Colt the Gentiles. First, he chose the Ass, he offered himself to the Jews: but they proving resty, he takes up the Colt, the Gentiles. And now having been almost 1600. years a breaking, and backing us, and menaging us to his hand; even when he thought to have found us fit for the saddle, we are grown wilder and more untamed than we were before. We kick, and winch, and fling, and will by no means endure the reins of his blessed government. Thus now God is wearied with us both: his old obstinate Ass, the Jews, tired him with continual beating; his unbridled colt, the Gentiles, vex him with their rambling. The former was a slow beast, and could not be gotten forward: this other runs fast enough but will not keep the way. But if the Colt will not be ruled, the Lord will take his Ass again, as the fitter of the two to do him service. O let us confess our errors, and return to the right way. Return, for you have erred; with weeping, for you have sinned, Lord, thou tellest my wanderings: he tells them one by one, knows their just weight and number; for God is so wise that he can cast a man up to a hair. Your hairs are numbered, do not think that your sins shall pass unnumbered. O let the Lord also number our penitent sorrows: for as he doth book our sins, so he doth bottle up our tears. Our iniquities are not written in so deep characters, but our repentant tears shall be able to blot them out.

Let us therefore come home with sorrow, that have wandered with shame; seeking our Fathers house, by doing one Fathers will. Why should we run on this senseless and endless race of iniquity, till the days of our gracious visitation be out of date, when it will be hard to determine what the end will be? Let us follow the counsel of S. Chrysostom, alluding to the policy of the Sages, who returned into their own country another way. Have we erred by the way of adultery? Let us go back by the way of chastity. Have we erred by the way of covetousness? Let us go back by the way of mercy. If we return the same way we went, we are still under the kingdom of Herod. No less in the sickness of the soul than of the body, there be critical days; whereby God observes in what likelihood we are to recover health. Smite thy breast and say, where am I? Whither go I? We are all stray-sheep; now the great Shepherd of our souls bring us home to himself, and the fold of eternal peace. Amen.

Following the way of Balaam.] Custom is the principal magistrate of man's life, the guide of his actions: and as we have inured ourselves at the first setting out in this world, so commonly we go on, unless we be turned by miracle, and changed by that which is only able to do it, the grace of God. Our thoughts are according to our inclinations, our discourse according to our acquired and infused opinions, our deeds be according to our customs, and our customs generally follow after our Precedents. So they that propound a Balaam for their master, are sure of vice for their mistress, and destruction for their wages. The Apostle here speaks of Sorcerers, and whom should sorcerers imitate but that •rand Magician, Balaam, the Prince of false Prophets, the eldest some of Satan? The general points are two; Quid, and In quo. First, what they do, they follow Balaam. Secondly, wherein they follow him, In his way, with all the passages; and in his end, which is the wages of unrighteousness. In the former I have three circumstances; A Description, an Observation, and a Caution.

1 A description of Balaam, who had taught evil, and done evil and in doing evil, he taught it. He was two ways a Master of wickedness; Preceptory, and Exemplary: Quæ docuit linguâ, facilitavit vitâ. He had his damnable doctrine, whereof 〈◇〉, Rev. 2.14. A doctrine which will never die, so long as there is a Pope living. Let us observe the Parallell; the fitness invites me to the comparison. First, Aam was great with Kings, the Pope will be great over Kings.

Secondly, Balam would do anything for money, and what practice doth the Pope refuse to 〈◇〉
 › is exchequer? Incest shall be dispensed, murder refuged, uncleanness tolerated; all for gain. You may buy heaven, buy out hell, for money. For this▪ Indulgences be his wares, and Purgatory his market-town. He will with Balaam, curse the very Israel of God, for money. Thirdly, Balaam was a hidden hypocrite, a close villain, with a corrupt heart under a clear skin. The Pope is such a glorious Saint in show; no matter what stuff his conscience be made of: all his doings must be justified: his murders are excused like Samsons, his thefts like the Hebrewes, his adulteries like Jacob's. Nothing doth he amiss, though the devil himself would scarce wish him to do worse. Fourthly, Balaam had some true oracles, and by the color of them, he vented his own sorceries. If the Pope should not confess some truths, the world would never admit his many falsehoods. He must have two or three pieces of right gold that would get off his bag of counterfeits. Lastly, Balaam persuades the Moabites to tempt Israel; first, to fornication, and by that to miss-devotion. It is the Papal indulgence to a fleshly life, that wins so many to his superstition. They will worship the Popes God, upon condition he will let them also worship their own: what is a whore, but a pleasing Idol? What is an Idol, but a spiritual whore? If the Pope will allow them the one, they will not stick with him for the other. Idolatry was Balaam's sport; and who can but think that Antichrist laughs in his sleeve, to see superstitious fools down on their knees to beautified puppets? Cornelius Agrippa, a great learned Papist hath left it written, that certain of the Schoolmen, nameing Aquinas and Aureolus, defended, that the very stars in the firmament might be worshipped, but only for doubt of giving occasion to Idolatry. Not that it were Idolatry, but that it might give occasion of Idolatry. Just, as when a thief cuts a passengers throat, he gives occasion of murder. But as Balaam was crafty to do mischief under-hand: so the Pope doth: but plot, and contrive, and command in his Consistory, what must be performed by his officious Emissaries. Treasons and conspiracies against anointed Sovereigns, blowing up of Parliaments, ruin of countries by war and invasions; all fetch their original from his sacred and unerring breast: yet the Romish Balaam is innocent, he hath no hand in it. Let the actors on the stage answer it, the Poet is close behind the curtain.

But now shall not this Balaam answer for all those conspiratours whom he hath suborned? Suppose he did not give everyone of them his particular errand; doth not his general warrant bid them go? while they teach men to earn the Kingdom of heaven, by shedding the blood of an heretical Prince; and promise the forgiveness of many sins for the committing of one; what is this but to hire instruments to their damnable designs? Machiavel's doctrine is quite fooled and shamed by the Jesuits: he taught that no man was fit for a desperate conspiracy, but one whose hands had been formerly dipt in blood. Alas, he knew not of a Friar Clement, or a Rovillac: he knew not, that superstition hath so well advanced mischief, that the first blood which a murderer sheds shall be no worse than a Kings: and that by votive resolution, he shall be as merciless as butchers by occupation.

The Moabites were persuaded that Balaam could not err: and do the Romists think any less of their Papal God? He whom thou curs•st, is cursed, and he whom thou bless•st, is blessed They think if the Pope put a Traitor into the Rubric, he is presently a Saint in heaven: if he curse or excommunicate a Christian, he must needs be enrolled in hell. This being sized into their souls, no wonder if they become• as de d engines, moved only by the Spirit he puts into them. Thus via Domini is no more stood upon; but via Thomae, as the Dominicans speak: and via Scot•, as the Franciscans: and via Loyolae, as the Jesuits; and indeed via Diaboli, for he comes in for his share: while treasons, perjuries, uncleannesses be the doctrines, what man of sense will look for any other but the devil in the Pulpit? At the best, we find not an Apostle to be the master of their sentences, but Peter Lom•ard grows to be the Text, and the hierarchy of Rome the expositors: and what will become of the poor Lambs; when such wolves be the Pastors?

For observation, They follow Balaam. There was never any man so desperately wicked but he had some fellows and followers. Beelzebub fell not alone from heaven; thousands of Angels fell with him in that confederacy. We read of three conspirators, Corah, Dathan, and Abiram, that prevailed with 250 rulers men of renown, and f•mous in the congregation. Those seditious leaders could not •rre without followers. Shall an Absalom rebel without seconds? no, Two hundred men went out with him in their simplicity and knew nothing: even the innocent are won to wait upon a Conspirator: It is no hard matter to beguile harmless intentions: yea, the true-hearted lie most open to credulitie; & while they mean nothing but faithfulness, are brought into rebellion. The name of David's son carries them against Absalom's father: and while they purpose only attendance to the Prince, they become loyal Rebels to their King. But were there none that embraced this Innovation for their own turns? Yes, it grew a strong rebellion. Can Jeroboam be an Idolater alone? no, he no sooner sets up his Calves, but Israel is down on their knees. If he cause such an impious erection, they presently follow him with their superstitious devotion. One man may kindle such a fire, as thousands are not able to quench. One plague-sore may infect a whole nation, and all the venom of sin is not spent in the act. The deed may be past and gone, but the pernicious example remains, and spreads to a woeful contagion. Like Goodwin sands, which not only swallowed up his Patrimony, but still continues a dangerous place, where too many have miscarried. He is a very mean person, that draws not some clients after him: even Theudas and Judas had their four hundreds to accompany them.

It hath ever been the dangerous policy of Satan to assault the best: he knows, the multitude, as we say of Bees, will follow their master. The unstable vulgar are soon carried with the religion of authority. What Hushai said in policy, they speak in simplicity; whom Israel choose for their King his will I be. Hypocrites will be of the Kings faith, as Papists are bound to be of the Popes. Let Corah kindle the fire, two hundred and fifty Captains will bring sticks to it, and all Israel are ready to warm themselves at it. The wethercocke will look which way soever the wind blows. Jeroboam shall be sure of Brutish subjects, while he sets up Calvish deities. Simon had so bewitched the people, that they all took him for the great power of God. A Sorcerer shall not be without clients.

It is an unhappy degree of wickedness, to be the Ring-leader of sin: every accessory is faulty enough, but the first author is abominable. Therefore is Jeroboam so often branded in those sacred leaves; therefore do all ages ring of his fact, with the accent of dishonor and indignation Jeroboam the son of Nebat that made Israel to sin. It was a shame for Israel, that they could be made to sin by a Jeroboam: but oh cursed name of Jeroboam that drew Israel to sin. Jeroboam was a wicked king, and miserably accursed; they of his house that die in the city, the dogs shall eat; they that die in the field, the fowls of the air shall eat. Yet Nadah his son, and Baasha his successor, Zimri and Omri, and Ahab, and Ahaziah, and Jehoram; they all walked in the way of Jeroboam, which made Israel to sin. So easy is it for a man's sin to live, when himself is dead; and to lead that exemplary way to hell, which by the number of his followers, shall continually aggravate his torments. The Imitators of evil deserve punishment, the abettors more; but there is no hell deep enough for the leaders of public wickedness. He that invents a new way of serving the devil, hath purchased for himself a large patrimony of unquenchable fire. Shall not the Pontificians answer for all that blood, which miscarried by their superstition? Suppose themselves think best to die with Christ, and nothing but Christ in their mouths; shall they not answer for teaching others to live and die otherwise; How fearfully do the Seducer and Seduced greete one another in hell! where the one saith, Thou hast been the occasion of my sin; and the other, Thou art the occasion of my more grievous torment. What infinite tortures doth Mahomet endure? When every Turk that perisheth by his Juggling, doth daily add to his unspeakable horrors. The devil himself by tempting and deceiving souls, doth advance his own damnation. Nor was it any charity, but mere fare of greater burden, that made the rich man in hell so respective of his Brethren. Many a man sins only for himself, he shall be plagued for the sins of others.

3 The Caution: Let eminent persons take heed of eminent sins: they do with Samson, pull down those pillars of goodness, that shall not only quash themselves, but be the ruin of thousands. Their facts become examples, those examples laws: and it is natural to men, to follow the law of fact, before the law of faith; a visible pattern, rather than a mere audible doctrine. We were wont to say, evil manners occasion good laws: but here it is true, Corruptio morum is become generatio legum; the leaders example is a law to the followers. Divers customs are no less than ridiculous and pestilent, that have had their birth from a great man's president. From this root hath grown all our strange disguises, transformations of apparel, painted faces, apish brutish gestures. Usury had still lain like neglected ware in the devils shop, if some great Rabbin had not brought it forth. The excuse of such pernicious customs to the followers of them, is as Pilate said to Christ, Thine own nation hath delivered thee unto me: and sin will conclude against those authors, Therefore he that delivered me unto thee, hath the greater sin.

Let this first warn us of the Ministry, that we teach you that way, whereof you shall never repent the travel: which is only Christ, the way, and the Truth, and the life. Let him that heareth, say, Come. He that inwardly heareth the voice of sanctification, let him outwardly call men by the voice of exhortation. It was a Law among the Jews; If a man die without children, his brother shall marry his wife, and raise up seed to his brother. Christ being dead, risen, and gone up into heaven, we are bound to raise up seed to our elder Brother: begetting children to Jesus. No other way dare we teach, lest we perish. For quid proderit non pro suo peccato, qui puniendus est alieno? What comfort is it to scape without own sins, if we must be punished for the sins of others?

For you; go not into the ways of sin, though you follow a Balaam. If we see a Great offender led to execution, we are not so forward as to say, Mortamur cum illo, let us die with him: yet while he goes on in Pride, we follow him in a hurry, Erremus cum illo, let us sin with him. If he travels with vanity, we are for him: if he sails to Rome, we venture ourselves in the same bottom with him; only when he comes to hell, we would then leave him. But if men will be followers in sin, they must not look to be separated in punishment. They that pursue the way which Balaam went, shall arrive at the place where Balaam is. The Lord turn our steps from such a following, that we may have a more comfortable ending.

Following the way of Balaam.] They that propound examples, whether for imitation, or detestation; have respect both to the way, and the end. Let me present you with both these out of the Sacred History. Here suppose, the Scene lies in Moab, Time is the Stage, all that read or hear the story, be (as it were) the Spectators. Balac plays the King, Balaam the Conjurer, Princes the Ambassadors, gold and honor are the properties; yea, you have an Ass playing her part too; these be the Actors: the Israelites are the Mutes; let me stand for the Chorus. The conclusion will be the ruin of the ungodly, the reward of the righteous. Let no man think me profane, in borrowing such a comparison: the Fathers have called the whole world but a Theater. Our Savior borrowed a comparison from pipers and dancers; as I from players: players shall get no more by my comparison, than pipers and dancers did by his. Christ targeth the slothful servant for not putting his talent to usury: yet he that puts his money to usury by the warrant of that Text, is like to be shent at the day of reckoning; and shall wish that he had better understood his masters meaning. The Passages are diverse, and useful to our observation.

1 The occasion. Moab and Midian saw their neighbors fall under the victorious sword of Israel; and expected with fear, when their own turns should come to bleed. Could they have secured themselves, those bordering calamities had not moved them. Natural men are not sensible of others woes, while safety fenceth in their own estates. They that drink wine in bowles, mind not the affliction of Joseph. The burning of a neighbors house would not startle them, but for the danger of their own. But peril is come to the doors of Moab, and they begin to be frightened: to overcome or repel this, Moab is not able alone, therefore requires the confederacy of Midian. Yea, both Moab and Midian find themselves too weak, without the assistance of Balaam. They put more confidence in his tongue than their own swords, and will not fight, but conjure. What needs the levying of forces, mustering of soldiers, emptying their treasures, endangering their persons, when all this trouble may be saved with one Curse? They had only wit enough to fear, but knew not how to take the right course for safety. Otherwise they that saw the unresistable power of Israel, why did they not treat, and entreat, yea, buy the conditions of peace? They might easily think; either the God of Israel is stronger than we, or he is weaker. If weaker, why are we afraid of him? If stronger, why do we not serve him? If he be greater, then down with Baal-peor: if not, then Baal-peor is sufficient without Balaam. But he that can make Israel victorious over others, is able to keep us safe from Israel: let us make him our friend, whom we cannot escape as an enemy. But wicked men are not more jocund in prosperity, than in disasters they are amazed. As the voluptuous man that hath taken such pleasure in his own house; when suddenly he finds it a-fire, knows not which way to turn him, but runs forth at the wrong door.

2 The Invitation; Come, curse me this people. A devilish errand for the elders of Midian to carry. Sehon with his Amorites, Og the giant with his Bashanites, were destroyed; there is no hope of resistance left in man: therefore they will try what the Magician can do. How desperate is that wickedness, when Satan must be implored to undertake, what God refuseth! They are likely to have good counsel, that fee the devil. What can Balaam do without him? What can he do for Balaam? Curse: alas, as if all the world were under the power of an Enchanters tongue: as if that little engine fired at the furnace of hell, had a kind of omnipotency in it. God indeed suffers many strange things to be performed by Magicke: for whatsoever the devil can do, the Magician may do: and he will not stick to do reason for such tributary souls. But doubtless, Satan doth more through our credulity, than by his own efficacy: that beggarly spirit is more beholding to our imagination, than to his own riches. He whom thou cursest, is cursed. If Balaam were a famous Prophet, yet Balac was a very credulous king: he believes that the Sorcerer could do anything beneath the Moon. Commodities far fetched, and dear bought, are diet for Ladies: and so this design proved; for the Ladies of Midian must manage the plot of Balaam.

Superstitious dotards think nature it self under the spell of their charms: but they are deceived. For if either the curses of men, or the malice of devils could take effect, how soon would all be hell! Could either Power or Policy prevail, the Church of Christ should not stand. But there is a strength so far above Balaam; that neither the Prophet nor the Potentate shall avoid that curse on themselves, which they wished to others. From their evil let us learn this good, to bear as fair a respect to the true Prophets of God, as they had confidence in the false. Why should they expect more comfort from God's enemies, than we from his deputed servants? Why do we not more seek their blessings, and stand in fear of their curses? Seeing they have the ratification of God in heaven to their sentences upon earth. If Moab have so bold assurance of a Balaam, how choice should we be of a Moses? Balaam's tongue cannot hurt us, Moses's lips can bless us. It was not the hand of Israel, but the hand of Moses, that got the day. Non manus quae pugnavit, sed manus quae non pugnavit, vicit. Shall we give less credit to God's Instruments, than they do to Satan's? How miserable is the darkness of some souls in this glorious day-light? To the chamber of a fortune-teller, a Juggling mountebanke, or some suspected Conjuror, flock many clients; not only of the vulgar, but even of those that come in Coaches and the gayest caparisons. The door of the devoutest Preacher is empty enough; few visitants trouble him either for direction of their lives, or comfort of their consciences. Alas, for such children of perdition; that they should take the forbidden way of hell, and neglect the gracious invitations of God!

Curse me this people.] Why did they not rather desire Balaam to bless themselves, than to curse Israel? that had been the easier task of the two, and more likely to prevail. Defensive war is surer than invasive: we may better fortify ourselves at home, than offend our enemies abroad. Israel did not trouble them, why would they trouble Israel? who would wake a sleeping Lion, that had no first fettered his claws? Moab might have rested in peace, and Israel in peace: why then should Moab curse Israel? It is a most malicious pride, that cares not to fare well it self, unless it go ill with others: as Moab did not care for safety, unless they might have victory. Yet it is worth a good man's thanks, to have his own blood spared: though the same favor be allowed to others. Is my own prosperity nothing, because my neighbors also prosper about me? Let such a conceit be harboured in the breasts of Pagans, or those Antichristian Christians, that content not themselves to extend their bloody dominion to the Indies, unless they may also ruin their adjacent countries: whose envy is not satisfied with escaping us, if we escape them. They eat their own hearts in anger, that they cannot eat ours in revenge. We pray for the opening of their eyes, and they pray for the pulling out of ours. We desire the turning of their hearts, and they wish the cutting of our throats. There is a great dearth of reason and charity in that man, who would be happy alone. Society is no small part of the very joys of heaven. They desire the blessedness of others, that are of the communion of Saints.

3 The Prohibition. Balaam hath a mind to go, God hath no mind to suffer him. The Elders of Moab have not sooner delivered their message, than the fingers of that leaden Prophet itch for the golden wages; yet he appears not rash and peremptory, but pretends serious advice and deliberation. That night he will give them hospitable entertainment, the next morning shall give them their answer. Lodging and good cheer they shall have, but their host means to make them pay for it in the reckoning. Yea they deserved to be welcome, for they brought the reward of divination. An answer he promiseth them, but such an one as God shall give him. Now the Lord prevents his enquiry, by enquiring first of Balaam, What men are these with thee? Did not God know them? Yes, they that could not move but in him, could be no strangers to him. He knew them well enough, but he would have Balaam know them better. Before his question, Vbi es? God had found Adam, but he would have Adam find himself. When we lay open our wants, and confess our sins, we tell him no news; alas, he knows all better than our own hearts. Yet he chooseth to deal with us from our own mouths; Ex ore tuo. When we harbor foul lusts, he seems to ask us, what thoughts are these? Is it fit for you to give lodging or house-room to such messengers as Moab, of hell? Bee these guests fit for the men of God to entertain?

Balaam hath admitted them, and now waits what God will do for him, what he will suffer him to do for them. He receives a plain oracle of inhibition; Thou shalt not curse the people, for they are blessed. Balak had a confident opinion of Balaam's power. Either he thought him a notable Conjurer, that could do much with the devil; or a true Prophet, that had interest in God.

Balaam shall not be suffered to gratify him either ways. Let him be a Sorcerer, he shall not give Moab the least encouragement in the conceit of this help. Let him be a Prophet, God will not have his name scandaliz'd, no not in the opinion of those Pagans. Why should his name be usurped to curse, where his will hath intended to bless? Thou shalt not go,

Y^t what if Balaam had been granted the liberty of his feet and tongue? Say, he had gone, and cursed: how forcelesse had all his maledictions been? Could not the breath of God have dispersed them all into air, or beat them back on the cursers own head? The causeless curse shall not come; or at least, it shall not come where the curser meant it. He gives just cause to make himself accursed, that without just cause curseth another. How often hath the Balaam of Rome cursed the Church of England? How often hath he roared out the direst execrations against us? How often have those Saul's, with letters of commission from the high Priest of that Synagogue, like Pirates with letters of Mart from the great Turk, breathed out threatenings and slaughter; using the ordinances of their church like the Ordnance of a man of war, spitting fire and thunder against the Bark of Christ? What have they done, but sunk themselves in the skirmish? Let them look back upon their invincible Navy, their inevitable Powder-plot; and confess with blushing cheeks, to the glory of God, that they would have more than cursed Israel, but they could not. How many Bulls of theirs have bellowed out execrations against us, endeavoring to goare us, and let out our very bowels; yet God hath sent those cursed beasts short horns: blessed be his Name, they did us no harm. How many blustering tempests have those enraged Sorcerers raised against our Prince and Country; yet all this wind hath shaken no corn. Were we the worse? Nay, I rather think we had not sped so well, had not these Balaamitish curses been spent upon us. For them; I read of certain Africans, who being troubled with the North-wind, driving heaps of sand upon their fields; mustered an army of soldiers to fight against it: but with so ill success, that themselves were buried und•r those sandy monuments. They that arm themselves against the Church, shall fall by their own weapons. Malice shall do the nature of malice; drink up the marrow and moisture of them that foster it, and bring their curses upon their own souls; as Nadab and Abihu were consumed by as strange a fire as they had in their Censors. As we may say of that blind man, whom Christ cured, and the Jews excommunicated; that he was never fully in, till he was cast out. So if Antichrist had not cursed us, we had not been so thoroughly blessed. Though they curse, O Lord, yet bl•sse thou; and so thou hast done with a merciful advantage.

The Israelites sate still in their tents; they little knew what mischief was brewing against them. The goodly plains of Moab gave such refreshing to their minds and bodies, that they s•curely embraced this dear purchased rest. They neither felt nor saw any opposition; yet even then the most dangerous plot was hammering against them. Our adversaries never mean us more hurt, than when they cry Truce. Villanous policy then multiplies her pledges, when she purposeth to cut our throats. What trust should be given to them, even when they swear, whose religion allows them to break all oaths for advantage? Only that God, who (without making Israel of his counsel) crossed the design of the Moabites: still sees, and (we hope) will prevent all the stratagems of our enemies: or else, like another Parisian vigils, we should feel their swords, before we heard their alarms. But the providence of our Maker restrains many evils, which we never dreamed to be near us. He that keeps Israel, s•mbers not:

he is both a sure and secret friend. Why are not our Sanctuaries turned into shambles, and our beds made to swim with our bloods, long before this; but that the God of Israel had crossed the conspiracy of Balaam? It is no thank to wicked men, that their wickedness doth not prosper. The world would soon be overrun with evils, if men might be so ill •s they would.

4 We have their answer and dimission. The reward was so sweet a taste of a rich banquet, that the teeth of Balaam began to water. Yet he pretends that God must inform him, before he can tell what to say. He waits on the Lord, they wait on him. Yet he falters in the repetition of God's answer; He refuseth to let me go. Had he spoke the down-right truth, it may be they had solicited him no further. But he higgles, and dodges, and conceals half of it, which was little less faulty than the denying of all. From this niggardly relation of God's message Saint Paul most accurately clears himself. To the condemnation of those lipping and curtailed doctrines of Rome; that show no more truth than that which concerns their own profit. Like a subtle Artist, that teacheth his scholars only the rind, concealing the sap; that so at once he may keep them the longer, and himself the better.

Here was Balaam's hypocrisy: to hold in with God, he refuseth to go with Moab: to hold in with Moab, he lays the blame upon God. So did he deny, as one that wished to be sent for again: like the wanton damsel in the Poet, that resists as if she would be overcome: and her very No, is an Invitation. How often do we look on the temptation with one eye, with the other on the penalty? fain we would, but we dare not. So the unhappy child would be fingering the knife, but looks on his father, and fears the lash. And instead of being angry with ourselves and our loose desires, we grumble at the good Law of our Maker: as if he had done us an unkindness, in that he will not suffer us to perish. Yea, rather than abridge our own pleasures, we will hazard the displeasure of God: we will do what he forbids, and yet hope to scape what he threatens. But let us know that while we bluster against his precepts, we do but raise a tempest against our own souls. It will never be right, till we can heartily say, Lord thy will be done, though ours be crossed.

5 The Elders of Moab are returned with Balaam's refusal; and now the impotent king frets and rageth with a furious passion; that so potent a Monarch, the lord of so fair territories, of such Viceroyes and underling Princes, should be denied. Gracelesse Sovereignty scorns a repulse, in the most unreasonable demand. Chafe he may, and vex himself; but still the Sorcerer is tied at home, Israel lies safe in the plain, no revenge is found out for Moab and Midian. O what a Scene was here? a malicious king rejected, a covetous Prophet hamper'd, an innocent people secured, and in all a blessed God honored? Still there is no hope but in the Conjurer; again he sends to Balaam. It may be the former were not worthy to wait on so famous a witch, therefore he sends more noble Ambassadors. No messenger is honorable enough to wait at the door of a mountebanke; every Lacquay is good enough to fetch the Preacher. Like the first Indians, that hung bugles at their ears, while they left their gold on the dunghills.

Balak is not discouraged with one denial: oh that we could be so impo•unate for our good, and double our knocks at the gate of heaven, as he did at the gates of hell! Let a Joseph deny his luxurious mistress, this enrageth her wicked flame. Denials do but whet the desires of vehement suitors. The repercussive blast brings out the fire with more violence. Much time and wit is spent in compassing that, which after a short fruition wearies the obtainer. So do worldly objects enchant us, that the more they fly us, the more impatiently we pursue them. But when it comes to spiritual things, which we cannot want and be blessed, we beg them as gluttons do their daily bread, whereof they are full even to surfeit. Balak was denied, and became more eager: God doth not deny us, but delay us; and we give over at the first repulse, yea even before we have an answer. Spare to speak, and despair to speed. It is true that God gives us more than we desire, but without our desiring, he makes no promise to give. If many had all they desired, it would be very little: if some good ones had no more than they desired, it would not be very much: but if the best had no more than they deserved, it would be nothing at all. There is an Impost set upon the favors of men: Balaam will not gratify the king of Moab without a reward. God gives liberally, and upbraids not. The trees bow down their heads, as if they would ask moisture of the rivers: the thankful flowers open their dumb mouths to the Sun: the Eagles and young Lions seek their prey at God; and he feeds not the young ravens, till in their language, they call upon him. And shall man be silent at the bountiful gate of his maker, when it is no more but Ask and have? If we have not all that we ask, yet we must ask all that we would have. Why do we hold our peace, that have such a command to pray, and such a promise to speed in Jesus Christ?

6 Next cometh to our observation, the Sorcerers lure; the prostration of wealth and honor at his feet. I will promote thee, let nothing hinder thee. O fools, is there nothing to hinder a man in his way to promotion? Doth not the swiftest Eagle stoop a hundred times to her prey, and rise without it? The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong. He that sits in heaven, and disposeth all things in the world, can disappoint the huge host of Midian by a Dream, of the Syrians by a noise. What needs he employ Angels or thunders, or awake the winds and tempests, when he can make a man hinder himself? Or suppose they spake like a kings orators, not so much questioning the possibility of impediments, as persuading an inclination to consent, they show their tempting bait; presuming that if they could once fasten this hook in his nostrils, then nothing should hinder them from drawing him all the world over. Once mentioning promotion, they hoped to have struck it dead. This vanity had transported themselves: and they knew no man living that could hold out against those assaults, wherewith their own hearts had been so easily conquered. Who would be poor, that might be rich on such terms? who would toiled in common drudgeries, that might for one curse be set among Princes? what is a poor word to their pains, that have broke many sleeps, flatt' red many fools, swallowed many sins, spent their time and means, to get one favour, honor, or grace from him that sits on the Throne? And yet after all this, might say of their Courtship, as that Captain did of his Burgesship, With a great sum we have obtained it. Balaam's honor comes at an easier rate; Do but curse Israel, and be a States-man of Moab.

Thus was their persuasion, that all the world would be glad to run a madding after their bait, or adoring their Idol. They that are all flesh and blood, think it impossible to despise wealth and dignity: and because innumerable souls are thus inveigled, they cannot believe that any would escape. The bewitched adulterer jealously locks up his whore, measuring all eyes by his own; as if no man could see her, but he must needs fall in love with her. The hog thinks no garden so pleasant, as the dunghill wherein he wallows. But they are deceived; that which seems a heaven to one mind, to another is little better than a hell. Two men see a Mass together: one is transported with admiration and delight, the other looks on it with indignation and scorn: one thinks it heavenly, the other knows it blasphemy. Let covetous hearts confess, there be those that can spit the world in the face, and say, Thy gold and silver perish with thee: that had rather be masters of themselves, than of the Indies: that tread under feet with disdain the best proffers of this world, in comparison of a good conscience. Fetch them from beneath the burden of their sins, and let them feel the ease of an assured forgiveness; and then tempt them to their former condition with the gain of the whole world, and they will scorn it. What are Riches in themselves but the mere baggage to goodness? The baggage of an Army cannot well be spared, yet doth it hinder the march, yea and not seldom the care of that loseth the victory. So poor is the value of riches, when they come upon the best terms: but if they be gotten like Balaam's, with a curse, a curse shall light on them. That God, who allows men to be rich, doth not allow them all means to be so. They that are gotten up to the top, let them look down again to the stairs by which they ascended: if those were crooked and rotten, their wealth at the height shall be but a burden to break their own necks. There is a golden prize set up for all runners; but they must keep the right roade, of honesty, charity, equity, truth: if with Balaam, they leave this regular path, and will be crossing over through by-ways, with a shorter cut of their own; they may be rich with a vengeance.

7 The Sorcerer returns his answers to this golden and honorable invitation. If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the Word of the Lord. What Saint could speak better? who would not think this man mortified to the world? He talks of a round quantity; no bags, not chests, but a whole house full, and that house no less than a kings: now the more he mentioned, the less corrupt he appeared. He was not yet of the mind of our ignorant votaries, that place holiness in want, and think to merit by having nothing. They would make good the old Rule in a wrong sense; It is better to give than to receive, they give away to some Covent all they have at once, for but a license to beg forever. Crosses they call holy, yet abandon money; as if the very crosses could not sanctify the coin, and keep it from sin. But for all their ridiculous paradox of money hating, a wise man would be loath to trust them with a houseful of gold and silver. But did Balaam in very deed mean as he said. Dissimulation is able to deceive thousands. Good words, Conjurer, no such matter in earnest. Such godliness might come no further than his lips, and there the covetousness of his heart stopped it out. Balak by this refusal may think the worse of his gold, Balaam doth not. A house full may not buy his tongue, a far less sum hath won his heart. A house full Sorcerer! alas, a closset full, a coffer full, yea rather than fail, a pursefull shall do it. Av•rice will play at small game, ere it quite sit out. If Balaam were not covetous why did he say nay with a desire to take it? why did he solicit God for that which was so peremptorily denied him? why did he hope that his Ma•ers mind would change, but that he longed for the reward? why did he delay the messengers, and feed them with hope of success, that had fed him with hop• of recompense, but that his heart was formerly bribed?

Once forbidding is enough for an obedient child. When we petition God for some useful things, all the while he holds us in suspense, and says nothing to us, we may redouble our prayers. But when he resolutely denies us, and signifies plainly that we ask not according to his liking, therefore he will not give us according to our asking; it is time to hold our peace. Thrice did Paul repeat his suit; all this while God gave him no direct answer: but when he heard, My grace is sufficient for thee, he gave over in that particular. We grow saucy with God, when we solicit him for that which he hath said he will not grant us. Let our requests be lawful, and then the more earnest, the better welcome: such holy violence shall make the kingdom of heaven yield to our conquest. But when we beg prohibited favors, we are troublesome. Should love-sick Ammon have prayed for the incestuous fruition of his sister Tamar? Or a luxurient man for the satisfying of his lust? or the malicious for a place of authority, to carve his own revenge? Or shall another beg riches to accommodate his pride, that he may over-top his neighbors? It is wretched presumption to ask that allowance, which God's word hath expressly forbidden. Shall Balaam beg leave to curse? Shall he repeat that postulation? was not one answer sufficient? No honest heart will endure to be forbidden twice. But O the powerful enchantment of money! this can charm the very charmer, and command him that thinks he can command hell. When we are resolved to sin for profit, we do even then turn our backs upon heaven. Nor is it now enough, in cold blood, while we are reading this, to disclaim this unrighteous Mammon: (and yet there be some stony hearts, that let God preach till Doomes-day, life and the world shall part from them both together; that think all this as needless as a shower of rain in harvest:) but when the temptation comes, and the king of Moab or hell offers the golden bait; then to resist, then to contemn his offers, this is the noble trial of Christians.

8 Balaam longs, prays, and obtains: permitted he is to go, but this permission was worse than a denial. This is not the first thing that God hath granted in anger. He gave murmuring Israel dainty meat; Quails: but they had little joy of it, when that they put in at their mouths, came loathsomely out at their nostrills. They had better have had no meat, than such sauce. ^b I gave them a king in my wrath; they had better have been without him. It is one thing to like, another to permit: God suffers a thousand evils in the world, he never took pleasure in any. Moses tolerated those legal divorces, he never approved them. God liked not Balaam's journey, yet in his judgment he gives way to it: as if he had said, well, since thou art so hot upon gold, set on thy journey, be gone. So he bids him go, as Solomon bids the young man rejoice: whereupon would follow a sony reckoning. This Balaam could not deny: for when God crossed him in his journey, he did not say, Thou commandest me; which (had not his conscience known the contrary) had been a ready answer. The Lord rather deny us our requests in love, than grant them in anger.

The worst bestowed favor is Indulgence to our own affections; to be wandering abroad without a license. The pamperd saddle-horse, in the fable, seeing other jades loose, thought scorn to be tied to the rack; and brake out. But being taken by the hinds, he was put into the plough and cart: under which burden groaning, he complained to his fellows, how ill he fared now, how well before: they answered, he was right served that would needs break his teddar. To fare well, and cry good cheare, invites the thief or sharer: but to fare well, and not be content with good cheare, deserves to be punished with famine. He does ill that removes another's land mark, worse that removes his own. If we will needs be g•dding like Balaam, without our pasport, we shall find in the conclusion, we had better have staid at home. Be we content with what God sends us: and let neither pursefulls, nor house-fuls of gold hire us to transgress his laws. If we keep the bounds of obedience, he will both give us the bread of sufficiency on earth, and a whole city of gold in the Kingdom of heaven.

We are got through the better half of Balaam's way; there is but one mile further, of eight short furlongs, and we have overcome it.

1 Such was his forwardness, that no sooner did God answer his importunity with a Go, but he takes the first hint, and longs to be gone. He was busy with God before; but now he hath his vade, not a word more; there is no need to bid him hasten. He gets up betimes in the morning: the night seemed tedious to him, and he taxeth it of l•zy minutes; but the morning is welcome. Covetousness needs neither clock nor bell to waken it: the own desires will not allow it to take rest. Want does not break so many sleeps for provision the next day, as abundance doth for increase. Where shall we find men thus eager after spiritual wealth, which alone can make them happy? We seek for that, as the Israelites did for Canaan; when they made forty years travel of a forty days journey: so softly do we pursue the blessings of our eternal peace, that if we can reach home by that time we come to threescore, we think it time enough. But in the pursuit of profit and pleasure, we drive Jehu's pace, as if we were mad. Under Religion men travel a pack-horse motion; as if they were weary of their burden: but run after vanity, like horses with an empty coach. We would be strong at twenty, rich at thirty, we would be wise at forty, but to be holy we can tarry till fifty. When our own business wakens us, what common day in the week finds us tardy? But on the Sabbath, when God's special service calls us up, we take our ease, and make bold to lie in bed. Nature and our vain misconstruction of God hath taught us, that if any work be left undone, it shall be his.

2 Balaam is up and onwards his way, and now flatters himself with assured success. His corrupt heart prompts him; why should God let me go, but that he means to let me do the thing I go about? God had first charged him neither to curse nor to go: now he hopes, he that had given him license to go, would also give him leave to curse. He that relented in the one, why may he not as well relent in the other? He saw how this curse might bless himself; and therefore chooseth rather to undo so many millions of souls, than to prejudice his own fortune in so gallant a promotion. How devilish is that mind, which would make way to his own particular benefit, with the ruin of so many thousands? That would set a whole city on fire, and it were but for light to tell his money. How should they escape the plague of Balaam, that have more than cursed, even depopulated whole towns, to build up their own smoklesse chimnies? Would God such men had only cursed the people, and not g•ven the people so just cause to curse them. They cannot scape woes, while there is an orphan left to cry, or a widow to weep.

But now confident Sorcerer, is there no stop to be feared in the way? Yes, God's anger was kindled against him because he went. First God said, neither go, nor curse: next he says, Go, but curse not: and now he is angry that he did go at all. Why did God suffer him to do what he prohibited, if he be angry with him for doing that which he suffered? The Lord saw his covetous desires grow hotter, his wicked hopes stronger, and his heart worse with this last allowance: therefore it was high time to cross his wicked intendments. Men know us only by our external motions, God judgeth us according to our inward dispositions. The life of all our works lies in our heart: if the fountain stink, no matter how clear the channell looks. The difference of all actions in God's sight, is fetched from the will. He bade Moses smite the rock; he smote it twice, and is blamed for doing it so often. El'sha bids the king of Israel smite the earth; he doth it thrice, and is blamed for not doing it oftener: all the difference of the fault was in the different heart. Moses numbers the people, and is praised: David numbers them, and is punished. Not that one man may better play the thief, than another look on: as if God were indulgent to any sin: but he finds in some men's inwards that malice, whereof another is lesse guilty. Corn that grows on a house-side, often shoots up higher, and looks fairer, than that of the tilled field: yet this we gather, that we neglect, because we know the root is naught. Though our persons shall be judged Secundum opera, according to our works: yet our works shall be judged Secundum corda, according to our hearts.

3 An Angel is dispatched to resist Balaam: this is one of the noble employments of those glorious spirits, to give a strong and invisible opposition to lewd enterprises. Many a treacherous act have they hindered, without the knowledge of the Traitor. Among the divers conspiracies against Queen Elizabeth some by the adversaries own confession, were prevented by miracle; they knew not how. It pleased their malice to give out, that they were crossed by the devil: but we acknowledged with thanks-giving, it was the hand of God; and say with Daniel; Our God hath sent his Angel, and delivered us from those merciless Lions. How oft hath the murderer prepared his weapon, the thief plotted his robbery, the enemy set his ambush, and been disappointed above their imagination? Sure there was a secret resistance, God sent his Angel to cross the designs of Balaam. It is our honor, that God hath set us on work for this purpose; therefore also are Preachers called Angels. As God hath made his Angels Ministers, so he hath made his Ministers Angels: the whole scope of our labor is to stop sinners in their way of disobedience. To stay the course of evil, whether Ministers do it by the Word, or Magistrates by the Sword, is in both their hands Angelical service. Yea, and to prosper this work, both the Tribunals of the one, and Pulpits of the other, are protected by Angels, or they could not stand.

But now in what case are the wicked, that have God's Angels for their opposites? How deplorable and desperate is their estate? God they have made their enemy, Angels they cannot call their friends, devils labor to damn them, the world cannot save them; whither, oh whither should they run for refuge? Balaam goes away from God, (for he leaves him, that does not ask leave of him) the devil provokes him, a good Angel resists him, what shall become of him? How should those heavenly Spirits bear that man in their arms, like nurses, upon earth living; or bear up his soul to heaven, like winged Porters, when he dies; that refuseth the right way? They shall keep us in our ways. Out of the way it is their charge to oppose us, as to preserve us in the way. Nor is this more a terror to the ungodly, than to the righteous a comfort. For if an Angel would keep even a Balaam from sinning, how much more careful are all those glorious powers to prevent the miscarriages of God's children? From how many falls and bruises have they saved us? In how many inclinations to evil, have they turned us? Either by removing occasions, or by casting in secretly good motions. We sin too often, and should catch many more falls, if those holy Guardians did not uphold us. Satan is ready to divert us, when we endeavor to do well: when to do ill, Angels are as ready to prevent us. We are in Joshua the high Priests case; with Satan on the one hand, on the other an Angel: without this, our danger were greater than our defense; and we could neither stand nor rise.

4 The Angel stops Balaam, not strikes him. Why doth not God confound him, as well as withstand him? Why did he withstand him, yet so as to let him pass? God is pleased to warn the very wicked, before he destroy them: they shall see his dislike, ere they feel his wrath: that so at once, he may be glorified, and the mouth of all wickedness stopped. If all God's warnings were laid to heart, how few should perish? So he spares Balaam, because he had more to do with him: that tongue shall get him honor in Moab, which meant there to dishonor him. God sees it more for his glory, to fetch good out of evil, than to suffer no evil at all. Pharaoh shall be soundly knocked, before he be slain. Why? I will get me honor upon Pharaoh, saith the Lord. He could soon rid the world of bad members, but then he should lose the praise of working good by evil instruments. The bad man's sin is the good man's sorrow: he must grieve for it, he may not repine at it. The wicked do not sin behind God's back: he sees it, and suffers it; and though for a time he hold his peace, he will call them to a strict account for it. It is no good sign for a man to prosper in his ungracious courses: God owes him a payment; and it shall be the greater, when he comes to reckon with him for all his faults together. Do you mark none worldly and wealthy; that are rich in goods, and penurious in good deeds? That man doth not more treasure up gold, than wrath; and while he grudgeth his superfluity to the poor, he grudgeth mercy to his own soul.

5 After all oppositions, the Conjuror is arrived in Moab. He had seen an Angel against him, heard a beast speak under him: and if the former were familiar, yet this last was strange and uncouth: yet he is not afraid to ride on that Ass, whose voice was still in his ears. News goes post to the Court; the long expected guest is come. Now as if he had been some great Monarch, the the king sets out to meet him: he that to fetch him sent Princes, goes himself in person to welcome him. They both look for promotion, either from the other: and he that said, Am not I able to promote thee? Insinuates a confession withal, Thou art able to promote me. Two would be raised, and both with the downfall of a third. Now the bargain is sure on both sides: the very sight of the Physician hath half cured the disease.

But who can wonder enough at this, that a king thus graceth a Prophet? Such respect have even Pagans borne to those that were but reputed Prophets; their purses, their palaces were not held too dear for them. How should this cast a blush upon the cheeks of Christians? Those shown false gods, we teach the true: they brought poison, we bring the food of life: they flatter'd men to destruction, ours is the tidings of salvation: yet they were honored, we are despised: we are defrauded, they are rewarded. So that if Barbary wring her hands for mistaking, Christendom shall rend her heart for abusing the messengers of God. Our names come into few mouths, out of which they return but with reproaches. Among the rest of our sins, O God, be merciful to the contempt of thy servants.

6 The superstitious king hugs Balaam, and his hopes in Balaam: and confident of the success, he feasts his gods, his Princes, his prophet, and spares for no cost. Next morning they all visit the high places of Baal, altars are erected, sacrifices prepared, the number designed: seven altars, seven oxen, seven rams. What a glorious business was here? Why seven? Would not one have served the turn? The true God is but one, and he required but one Altar at once: did he now stand upon numbers? There is nothing more magnificent than false devotion. Idolaters in all ages have made more pompous shows than the true worshippers. Religion seldom hath so fair a flourish as superstition. The harlot affects gaudy dressings, the sober matron does not. Truth had rather go naked, than wear the caparisons of hypocrisy. We paint old rotten houses: sound and substantial buildings honor themselves with their own bare worth. What a world of plausible devices hath the Church of Rome invented to hold up her credit in the world? To say nothing of their proud vaunts of antiquity, universality, succession, name of forefathers, which amaze and besot an ignorant heart. The glorious shows of their processions, the gaudy ornaments of their Altars, the rich robes of their images, the pomp and magnificence of their places, the triumphs of their great Festivals; these transport simple and shallow spectators. Nature is led by sense: children and fools cannot well be of any other religion. Alas, they see not the inside; the doctrine that maintains Idolatry, justifies treason, commends lying, refugeth murder, disgraceth the Word of God, dishonors the Mediatorship of Christ. It is but the face they behold, not the heart; yea, it is the paint, not the face. I have heard of a Traveler, that could get no lodging in his Inn, unless he were bedfellow to a stranger, that seemed a goodly Person. They slept together all night. This passenger waking first in the morning, draws the curtain, and seeing a deformed, stigmaticall, and misshapen creature in the bed, cries out that he had lodged with the devil. Yet when this ugly Heteroclyte had put on an artificial nose, a glassen eye, covered his bald head with borrowed hairs, and clapt a rich suit on his back to hide his other deformities, he appeared a brave proper man again. If you should see the Church of Rome naked, without her disguise, you would loath her: but stay till she put on her dressing; her artificial Head, the Pope; her artificial hands, the Jesuits; her garish apparel of pomp and ceremonies, she will tempt you to love her. If a Pagan should ask a Papist, what God do you worship? and he should truly answer, a god that delights in blood, that rewards treason, that commands dissembling, how horrible would his religion appear? But clothe all these with arguments and neat distinctions, and pompous ostentation; and then how many unblest understandings are bewitched with it? Error had need be gorgeously set out, or else Truth would soon mar her market.

7 Balaam's altars are smoking, the king expecting, the Prophet desiring: but all will not do; God will not give him leave to curse Israel. Again they renew the sacrifice, and change the station; like an unlucky gamester that looks for better success in another place. Yet if Balaam be constant in soliciting, God will be more constant in denying. How shameless was that forehead, which durst importune God after so many denials? Yet still the love of earth overmasters the fear of heaven; and as if the infinite Deity were not everywhere; he chooseth a new place for sacrifice; and dares rather hope a change, than change his hope. In the midst of all this distraction, his tongue blesseth against his heart, and his heart curseth against his tongue.

Balak hearing this unlook'd for news; first expostulates; I took thee to curse mine enemies, and behold thou hast blessed them altogether. Next he intreats, Neither curse them, nor bless them at all. Lastly, he chides, I thought to promote thee, but the Lord hath kept thee back from honor: as if he would make him curse God, for not suffering him to curse Israel. Doth God hinder Balaam's promotion? no, he hinders Balaam's destruction; in that he will not let him be so bad as he would. Many a man goes to hell for getting what he should not; Balaam must thither for desiring to get what he could not. Unjust gains may be honey in the mouth, but they are gravel in the throat, poison in the soul. It is to be feared, that many trades-men have not a little to answer for about this reckoning. Let them search their chests, search their hearts; and if they find any of this adulterate gold among their heaps, away with it, as they love their souls away with it. For else they have locked up a thief in their coffers, which will carry away all, and at the last themselves with it.

8 The king may fret, but the Prophet goes on: and instead of cursing Israel, he curseth Moab. A Scepter shall rise out of Israel, that shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth. As if he did protest, I may curse, but I dare not: I would curse, but I cannot. The king is angry with his sorcerer, the sorcerer is angry with God: Balaam hath his dismissal, yea command to be gone. Yet rather than lose all his hopes, he will now speak worse than curses. He falls in with the council of Moab, and adviseth them a way how to make God curse them himself. If the serpents teeth be sown, armed men will come up worse than they. It is not for lack of desire, that I do not curse Israel: thou dost not more wish their ruin, than I wish thy recompense. Now so long as they keep in with God, there is no enchantment against Jacob, nor divination against Israel. Get them but once into rebellion, and they shall curse themselves. There is no withdrawing God from them, but by withdrawing them from God: procure them to sin, they shall fall alone. They will admit no sin sooner than wantonness; this will be wrought upon them by fair faces: adultery will draw on idolatry, and both fetch down God's anger upon them. Beauty shall tempt them to gaze, their sight shall draw them to lust, their lust to folly, folly to superstition, and so God shall curse them for thee unasked. Here was policy derived from the conclave of hell. Vbi been, nemo melius: ubi male, nemo pejus. Where Balaam spake well, never any Prophet spake more divinely: where ill, never any devil spake more desperately. This project took too well: ill counsel prospers faster than good. Kindly seed falls often out of the way, and roots not; but the tares never light amiss. They look, and lust, and sin, and perish. The Balaam of Rome, the Balak of hell, sit in council against us: but if we do not yield to sin, they shall never hurt us.

Who loved the wages of unrighteousness. Where we have three things propounded to our instruction, First. what this wages is, Riches. Secondly, how they become the wages of unrighteousness. Thirdly, the baseness of the covetous heart, that sets his affection on this wages, that loves such riches.

1 There have been some busy humors and stirring wits in the world, that with bitter declamations have inveighed against riches: like foxes, dispraising the grapes which they could not reach; and because they might not be rich themselves, would needs persuade the rest to be poor with them for company. Eustathius, Pelagius, the illuminate elders of Munster, some ignorant votaries of Rome, have taught and practice these absurdities; fit for none but rebels and bankrouths, or (if you will) idle and unuseful beggars. But the crown of the wise is their wealth, and the Blessing of God maketh rich; and Pium pauperem suscepit si... divitis. The rich and the poor meet together, the Lord is the maker of them all. I should not fear, if the best of those mendicants should preach you a Sermon against riches, that you would presently be out of love with them: I rather fear, you would be greedy of this unrighteous Mammon, whosoever condemns it. Therefore for your satisfaction; you may be rich and happy, if you will be rich and godly. Cupiditatem, non facultatem reprehendimus: it is the bad affection, not the lawful possession of riches, that we blame. Bona est substantia, si non sit peccatum in conscientia. God doth not charge us to renounce riches, but to avoid the dangers incident to them. When they come in God's name, in God's name let them be accepted; otherwise the Saints would none of them. Abraham refused the King of Sodomes liberal offer, lest he should say, I have made Abraham rich. God had promised to be his great reward: the King of heaven shall make him rich, the King of Sodom shall not. Moses refused to be called the son of Pharaohs daughter: not that he thought it unlawful: for when God called him to honor, he behaved himself as a worthy Prince. Daniel refusing the Kings portion for pulse, yet thought it no sin to fare well: therefore being advanced to honor, he kept a table befitting his estate.

But those that are God's sworn Pensioners, will not live at men's finding. What he gives bountifully, they take thankfully. As Achsah, when her father had given her a portion desired also a blessing: so where God gives a portion, there is always a blessing with it. Otherwise, as at a Funeral dinner there are many guests, and great cheare, but no mirth, because he is dead that should make it. So in a full estate there is variety and abundance, but no joy of conscience, because that is wanting which should give it, the love of God in Christ.

All things are not to be blended in a community: the Christian hath a double right to the things of this life. First, a spiritual right: man came naked out of the earth, his mothers womb; yet was he then so rich as to be lord of all. Heaven was his roof, earth his floor, the sea his pond, the Sun and Moon his torches, all creatures his vassals. This though God's earthly son lost to his posterity, yet his heavenly Son recovered for his chosen, in whom all things are ours, and we are his, and He is God's. Secondly, a civil or human right: for it is false to say, there is no tenure but grace, no title but charity. By the rule of Grace, the civil owner may be a spiritual usurper: and the spiritual owner may be a civil beggar. But there is another law, Ius gentium, whereby God divides to every man his own propriety; otherwise that were a superfluous Commandment, Thou shalt not steal; for no man can steal his own. In a word, Paul chargeth Timothy to charge the rich in this world, that they be not high minded, &c. He says not, Charge men that they be not rich, but charge the rich that they be not proud. Your riches shall do you good, when you do good with your riches. But many a man may say of his wealth, as it was epitaph'd on that Pope, He got it like a fox, held it like a lyon, and left it like a dog: as the boat drowns the passenger, yet afterward comes it self safe to the shore. Riches too often do worldlings the kindness to help them unto hell, and that when they are

2 The wages of unrighteousness.] The gain that comes in by unwarrantable means, defineth this wages. God hath set certain bounds and limits, beyond which if men step to get wealth, they may get it with a vengeance. Every man hath his orbe or compass, Justice, Integrity, Innocence: if he can be rich within that allowed sphere, much good do it him. Balaam would have built himself a fortune upon the ruins of Israel, and got wealth by a curse: the curse indeed he got, but the wealth he missed. So it becomes the wages of unrighteousness. Not to mention those two trusty servants of Mammon, Use and Brokage; which have been so anciently, so universally condemned: there be some trades that live altogether by this wages; and so reconcile at once lucrum in arca, and damnum in Conscientia. They have two evasions: First, everything is worth what it may be sold for. But as a rigorous price is the breach of charity, so an excessive price is the violation of Justice. It is no matter how they honest it with fair profit, when God shall judge it foul theft: or how they esteem that lawful gains, which they shall find unrighteous wages. Secondly, Cavent Emptor, at the buyers peril: though the measure be defective, the matter vicious, all insufficient; yet still let the buyer look to it. Volenti non fit injuria, no man can wrong himself, none are bound to buy. But do they not both conceal the faults in their knowledge, and protest the goodness against their knowledge Is not deficiency of worth their chief Prentice, and excess of price their best factor?

Whatsoever comes by force or by fraud, falls under this term; the wages of unrighteousness, and will fall heavy upon the gainers. It is an unhappy profit that ariseth from the another's loss: he that cares not who doth lose, so he may gain; shall be sure that whosoever gains heaven, he shall lose it. The oppressor will hedge in his poor neighbors estate, though it be to his utter undoing; as the bloody thief cuts off the travelers finger, and it be but to have his ring. Let me have thy vineyard, saith Ahab, and I will give thee a better for it, or the price of it in money. One would think here was square dealing; no extorting it by force, but requiring it by a fair composition either the value in money, or in exchange. Yet was there iniquity under this pretencie: for God had forbidden the Israelites to alienate their inheritances: this Ahab knew; and therefore what Naboth might not lawfully do, he might not lawfully require. It was well that he did not wrest it, it was not well that he did desire it: ye now, against all Justice he will have it. Being denied, he falls sick of the sullens, and is ready to break his heart, because God's law might not be broken. In this fit the devil sends him a physician; Jezebel casts cold water on his face, and puts spirits into him of her own extraction. Let thy heart be merry, I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth. Satan knew of old, when mischief was to be done, where to find a helper. A fast is warned, the city assembled, Naboth convented, confronted, accused, sentenced, stoned, and now his vineyard is •scheated to the Crown. The false witnesses have their wages out of Jezebels purse; the Judges have their wages out of Ahab's favor, Ahab and Jezebel have their wages out of Naboth vineyard: but Naboth speeds the best; for he changeth a vineyard on earth for a glorious inheritance in heaven. Here was the difference; Ahab shall lose a kingdom for a vineyard, Naboth shall lose a vineyard for a kingdom. Thus Gehazi runs after Naaman for this unrighteous wages: his Master was careful to win honor to God, and credit to his profession, by denying those Syrian presents: the man will mar all in requiring, in receiving them. He will enrich himself by belying his Master, and disparage that holy function in the eyes of a new convert; and all for a little of this cursed trash. Yea Judas will betray his master, his Savior, himself, for this unrighteous wages. O how execrable is that gain which doth lose the soul? How desperate is that soul which will be lost for gain? Did not Satan first make sots of worldlings, he could never persuade them to venture their eternal blessedness, for these transitory vanities: yet still they love this wages; which is the next point.

3 The baseness of the covetous heart, to love the wages of unrighteousness. There is no man that loves evil for it self, but for some imaginary good he expects from it. Something is proposed, either profit, or pleasure, or some kind of wages, that tempt men to love sin; else they never would embrace it. Achan would not have sacrilegied, nor Gehazi have disgraced the Prophet, but for the wages of gain. The most wicked do not love evil simply for it self, but for some other respects, which is their propounded wages. To discover this folly, let me describe riches to you, by their three properties.

1 By their foundation, or the garden where they grow; this world. All is but earth; they consist in acres of earth, bowels of earth, beasts of the earth; and all are valued, by pieces of earth. They all come from the earth, tend to the earth, and one mouth-full of earth makes an end of them all. The earth is the basest part of the world: yet earth is the end of all this wages; except (which is worse) some of it be taken out in hell. They are like Nebuchadnezzar's Image, a composition of metals; but the foot is clay. God hath laid heaven open to our eyes, and placed our heads next heaven: but gold and silver he hath hid from our eyes, and placed them under our feet. Yet worldlings invert all; and like Tumblers, stand upon their heads, and kick at heaven with their heels. They subject their hearts to that, which God hath subjected to their feet. Covetousness is Idolatry: S. Paul puts them both in a bag: now how sordid is that Idolatry, which shall worship deum lutulentum, a dirty God?

As riches grow in the world, so they go not out of the world. It is but a Pagan folly, to put money in the dead man's hand at his burial, to defray his charges in another world. Of all our hoards and heaps we shall not carry one single penny with us. Among the Indians, belts, bracelets, and rattles were of high esteem; yet we despise them. Their gold and silver is precious in Europe, which was there contemptible. Things are, as they are used or valued: the moneys that pass in diverse countries, are not currant here; nor much of ours there! All our pieces of gold are but currant to the grave; none of them will pass in the future world. Therefore as merchants when they travel, make over their moneys here, to receive them by bills of exchange in another country. Let us do good with our goods while we live, that when we die, by a blessed bill of exchange, we may receive them again in the kingdom of heaven. To part with that we cannot keep, that we may get that we cannot lose, is a good bargain. Wealth can do us no good, unless it help us toward heaven.

2 By their uncertainty. The form of money agrees well with the condition of it: it is stamped round, because it is so apt to run away. Could we be rich so long as we live, yet that were uncertain enough: for life it self is but a dream, a shadow, but a dream of a shadow. Rich men are but like hailestones; they make a noise in the world, as the other rattle on the tiles of a house; down they fall, lie still, and melt away. So that if riches could stay by a man, yet he cannot stay by them. Spite of his teeth, he shall carry away nothing when he dies. Life and goods are both in a bottom, both cast away at once. Yea of the two, life hath the more likelihood of continuance. Let it fly never so fast away, Riches have Eagles wings, and will out-fly it. There be thieves in the high-ways, that will take our moneys, and spare our lives. In our penal laws, there be not so many ways to forfeit our lives, as our goods. Rich Job lived to see himself poor to a proverb. How many in this City reputed rich, yet have broken for thousands. There are innumerable ways to be poor; a fire, a thief, a false servant, suretyship, trusting of bad customers, an unfaithful factor, a Pirate, an unskillful Pilot hath brought rich men to poverty. One gale of wind is able to make merchants rich or beggars. Mans life is like the banks of a river, his temporal estate is the stream: time will molder away the banks, but the stream stays not for that: it glides away continually. Life is the tree, riches are the fruit, or rather the leaves: the leaves will fall, the fruit is plucked, and yet the tree stands. Some write of the Pine-tree; that if the Bark be pulled off, it lasts long: being on, it rots. If the worldlings bark were stripped off, he might perhaps live the longer; there is great hope he would live the better.

Why should we dote upon this world, which hath so many doors to let out wealth? Why love wealth, that when the doors are shut, and all the windoors, can yet creep out at a quarry, at a cranny? Who would stake or wager his mansion house, against a booth! Curious glasses are pleasing vessels; yet because they are brittle, we do not think them precious. Solomon's royalty was not comparable to a Lily, nor the Crown on his head to the Coronation-flower in the garden: yet because they are flowers, whose time is but for a month, necessitated to fading, we respect them thereafter: today they are for the bosom, tomorrow for the besom. There is nothing laudable, that is not durable: nor doth it afford us so much joy in the welcome, as sorrow in the farewell. It is with the rich man at his death, as with a sleeping man when he wakes out of his dream. In life the worldling hath much; all this while he dreams: when he dies and wakes, he is not worth one groate. Alas, that we should set our hearts, and hazard our souls on that, which is so certain to vanish, and so uncertain to stay! It was the speech of a worthy Father; This is all I have got by my riches and honor; Aliquid habui Christum praeferre potui; I had something to which I could prefer my Savior. Happy are we, when we care not to call anything our own, but Jesus Christ.

3 By their mischief; many think themselves undone by losing them; but too many are undone by keeping them. Our Savior calls them Thorns. First, for their sharpness; they prick and pierce the heart through with many sorrows. They expose men to dangers; the fat booty invites the thief: they are but sponges, that suck up much for one squeezing. Children inquire into the age of their parents, executors long to cloze up their eyes; sometimes the pillow is pulled from under their heads a day before their times. Weapons of iron hunt after wedges of gold. Still gold is the most perilous metal; Ferróque nocentius aurum. Secondly, Thorns are the shelter for serpents, and riches the d nne of many sins. They are haunted with temptations and snares, with foolish and hurtful lusts, that drown men in destruction. The foulest fact that ever was done in the world, was done for money; even the betraying of Christ. Thirdly, they hinder the growth of corn, and the pathway of passengers: but not more than riches do choke the seed of the Word, and of all grace; and bar up the way to the kingdom of heaven. But the greatest mischief of all is, they steal away our hearts from God. That joy and content which we should find in our maker, we seek in our drudge. Yea, even the faith of good men is invaded with the fear of want. Indeed the dissolute make it none of their fear; and shall we? Will God be worse to them that follow him, than he is to them that forsake him? yet alas, how doth wealth engross men's confidence?

What is there that the rich man hopes not to do? He can buy honors and offices, he can buy out faults and offenses; yea, foolish Magus thought, the holy Ghost himself might be had for money: and the devil presumed that this bait would even catch the Son of God. Yet what can riches do? Can they put off the gout, assuage grief, thrust out cares, suspend death, prevent hell, or bribe the devil? A sattin sleeve can as well heal a broken arm. Indeed this they can do: they can anger God, hurt men, bar the gates of heaven, open the gates of hell, and forward souls to confusion. They are false friends, that will be sure never to fail men, but when they have need of them. Sickness will beseege thee, death will summon thee, God will pass his doom on thee: in all this, what can riches avail thee? our manifold receipts shall but greaten our accounts; and the moderate estate will have the easier reckoning. Riches are a pit, whereinto we soon slip, but can hardly scramble out. Aesop hath a fable of the two frogs, that in the time of drought, when the plashes were dry, consulted what was best to be done. One advised to go down into a deep Well because it was likely the water would not fail there. The other answered; but if it do fail, how shall we get up again? Small puddles, light gains will not serve some: they must plunge into deep Wells, excessive profits; but they do not consider how they should get out again. So it comes to pass, that either they are famished for want of grace, or drowned in a deluge of riches. If this world be a sea, over which we must swim to the Land of Promise, I do not see what use there is of this abundant luggage, unless it be to sink us in the waters.

To conclude, we are here like inexperienced young travellers in an Inn; the Host bids us cheerfully welcome; we flow and frolic, and spend with mirth while our stock lasts: that once gone, the Hosts changed countenance drives us out of doors with shame and nakedness. We exhaust the virtues and power of our souls, in satisfying our covetous and carnal lusts: but then at last, we must depart away sad and melancholy, bankrupt of all goodness, clothed only with scorn and sinfulness. Our joys are like fire; either durable or transient, according to their subjects. Fire in straw is a blaze, and away; in solid wood, lasting. Joy in heavenly things is everlasting; in the stubble of earth, but a flash. We find keys of iron and of gold; we know not to what locks they will guide us; therefore we choose the golden ones. At last we see by experience, that the richer metal brings us to the poorer purchase; it opens only a cabinet of toys and bracelets: but the iron keys of labor, repentance, and mortification, which we slighted, do open the doors of heaven, and let us into those invaluable treasures. The blood being poisoned, hath recourse to the heart, as the principal fort and refuge: but while it there seeks remedy, it thither brings instant death. Our desires infected with the world, run to the heart; and while they call it to rejoice with them, they bring it to destruction. Drowning men catch hold of anything that comes next to hand, though it be the root of a weed; yea, they will tenere tenentes; lay hold on them that lay hold on others. They that are plunged into the gulf of avarice, for want of better stay, rest upon the rotten sticks of wealth, and so perish. Mans heart is so conscious of the own weakness, that it must have somewhat to trust upon; it cannot move without a prop: now a weak stay is held better than none at all. Politicians say, better a Tyrant than no king: but who would refuse a good king for a tyrant? Who would trust in riches, that might trust in God? Riches are but for this world: God is Lord of this world, and of that also to come. Where the glory of this world ends, the glory of heaven begins. Riches are here today and gone tomorrow; but Christ is the same yesterday, and today, and forever. He is the first, and the last; blessing our beginning, crowning our end, and never forsaking us in the midst. Riches are but lifeless and senseless things; merely passive in gift: they cannot so much as bestow themselves, much less other things. The Lord is a living God, and a giving God; unchangeable in his goodness, most bountiful in his beneficence. Bonum est confidere in Domino: some trust in their horses, and some in their swords: some trust in their lands, and some in their wits: some trust in their friends, and some in their monies: but let us trust in the Lord: the rest may have their uses, only God shall have the confidence of our hearts forever.

Take the sum of all: the mischief of this wages of unrighteousness is not confined to this life: the full payment of it is in hell. Balaam desired one wages, but he found another: gold he coveted, as the reward of sin; this he required, and had not. Judgment he found, the reward of sin indeed, this he had though he required it not. He went not away without wages: what the treasure of Moab denied him, the sword of Israel paid him. Unjust gains never escaped just vengeance. A man may come honestly by his wealth, and yet dishonestly use it; by making his table a snare, or his coin a bawd to sensuality. So God sends meat, but there is another that brings Cooks; a good estate is dressed to an ill purpose. But that which is quaesitum injuste, shall be juste requisitum, He that hath swallowed down riches, shall vomit them up again, God shall cast them out of his belly. He shall cast it out of his bowels, or cast out his bowels with it. God had reserved to himself the treasure of Jericho: the blood of that wicked city shall be spilled to his honor, the riches kept for his use. Who but a miscreant can grudge, that God should serve himself of his own? Achan spies a booty, and filcheth it; Israel knows not of it; they go on in their wars, and are beaten by a little town. Joshua expostulates, O Lord, what shall I say, when Israel turneth their backs upon their enemies? God answers, Israel hath sinned: that people which prevailed for their faith, are beaten for their sin. A fault is committed, but by whom? The crime is spoken of, not the man. What shall discover him? A lot. Achan thought he might have lien as close in all the throng of Israel, as the wedge of gold lay in his tent. This hope of secrecy first moved him to sin, and now arms him with confidence against fear of shame. But when he saw the lot fall on his Tribe, he began to startle: when upon his family, he changes countenance: when upon his household, he quakes with amazement: and is no less than confounded, when himself is designed the man. With what eyes did Achan look on that spoil, which his fellows saw and contemned? The over-prizing of riches will make men transgress for a piece of bread. They that admire the glory of metals or brave clothes, shall not be innocent. But what was the reward of all this? The lot discovers him, the stones kill him, his family and substance perish with him.

Loe, ye that fear not to rob God of his consecrated things, what shall be the wages of your unrighteous sacrilege: you cannot go to the grave in peace.

Gehazi derives from Naaman a rich gift, lays it up, wipes his mouth, and stands before his master, whom he had so foully abused: as if he thought to blind the eyes of a Seer. All his attendance on that wonder-working Prophet had not wrought so much on his heart, as to know that the undeceivable eye of Providence Divine discerned his works, his words, his thoughts. He runs, fetches, disburdens, conceals; but where did he think God was all this while? To convince his hypocrisy, his master asks him, Whence comest thou Gehazi? To let him know, that he knew he had been where he should not. Thy servant went no whither. He had got the booty with a lie, and with a lie he would keep it. Whosoever loves this wages, must not stick with the devil for such a service: if a man will steal, it is necessary he should lie. In those days, to lie unto the Prophets was as much as now to out-face our senses: yea, our eyes see not half so clearly, as did their minds. This Gehazi might have considered afore; that Prophets have spiritual eyes, not confined to bodily objects; that their hearts went abroad, when themselves sate still at home. Went not mine heart with thee? Hear then, and be convinced; Is this a time to receive money and garments, oliveyards and vineyards, sheep and oxen, men-servants and maid-servants; which in thy conceit thou hast already purchased? Hither thou went'st, this thou said'st, thus thou didst, and thus thou sped'st. How pale now did this guilty thief stand before the Tribunal of his master? With what a trembling heart did he expect some heavy judgment? Hear this ye lovers of wealth: all your ways be overlo•ked by invisible witnesses; and when you have gotten riches, and forgotten the unrighteous means, the divine Justice shall call you to a reckoning, perhaps worse than Geheza's. Yet his talents could not buy off his sores, nor his garments hide his shame: his tears might wash off the guilt of his sin: not they and another Jordan shall cleanse his leprosy. That shall remain as an hereditary monument of God's wrath upon fraud, avarice, sacrilege: and he shall more lively proclaim to the world by his face, than others by their lips, the cursed wages of unrighteousness.

Take one Instance more; Ahab promiseth Naboth very reasonable composition for his vineyard. This seemed a fair motion, yet Naboth saw violence under this plausibleness, and refuseth to bargain. He did not so much stick at the land, as at the Law: one earth might be as good as another, and money as good as either. Naboth did not fear loss, but sin: he would gladly be quit of his patrimony, if God would acquit him of iniquity. Yet Ahab falls sick, and takes a strange surfeit of those grapes he never tasted. Like some longing woman, all his appetite stands to those sallets; whereof if he cannot feed, he will fast. Izabel undertakes to cure him; I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth. Ahab wanted neither wit nor wickedness, yet he was a mere novice to Jezebel: there needed no other devil to plot and execute this mischief. What, shall a subject deny his king? I will soon rid the king of such a subject. She subornes false witnesses, and corrupts the Senators: those accuse Naboth of blasphemy, these judge him to die, the people stone him: here was a quick dispatch, an easy payment for a rich vineyard. All this while God sits still, and says nothing. Much good do it thee, O king, with thy vineyard: many fair flowers and sweet grapes may it yield thee: applaud thy Jezebel for her cunning, triumph over the blood of an harmless subject, please thyself with thy wages of unrighteousness: yet let me rather die the death of Naboth, than do the deed of Ahab. Naboth's turn was over, when Ahab's was to come. Naboth and Ahab shall both bleed; the one by the stones of the Iezreelites, the other by the shafts of the Aramites. Ahab dealt cruelly with Naboth, God shall deal severely with Ahab. The dogs shall lick his guilty blood, that to the dogs had given the blood of the innocent. Only the cause and the end makes the difference; Naboth lives holy, and dies happy: Ahab lives in wickedness, and dies in vengeance. Naboth bleeds as a Martyr, Ahab as a murderer. Consider this just retaliation, ye whose covetousness hath made beggars, and then not relieved them: your children shall beg, and none give them. Read Psal. 109.10. Or perhaps God will take order for your wives and children, as he did for Ahab's. Whether they die in the city or in the fields, the dogs or the fowls shall eat them. You shall not need to take thought for your posterity, or study to traduce your ill got riches; God will ease you of that care, by depriving you of heirs. You have made your children not more heirs of your body, than of your curse: the curse shall remain theirs, but God shall dispose of the riches. Ahab's cruelty to Naboth hath made both the mother and the children Dogs meat. God will recompense the slowness, with the sharpness of his revenges. A Syrian draws a bow, wounds Ahab, his blood flows in the chariot, and paies Naboth his arrearages. The chariot is washed in the pool of Samaria, the dogs come to claim their due. Jezebel is thrown out of a window, and brained: for their due, the dogs come again. They lick the blood of Ahab, they eat the flesh of Jezebel: the tongues of those brute creatures make good the tongue of God's Prophet. I hope you will now say, that Naboth's vineyard is thoroughly paid for.

Let me conclude with Balaam. The king dismissed him, and he pretended haste homewards: but he lingered so long, that he left his bones in Midian. His tongue had insensibly slain many thousands of them, their sword shall kill him for it. Nor is it mentioned for his honor, that he fell among the kings: but for special notice, that all his sorcery could not save his life. He suborned whores to their beds, now those whores shall also fall upon their swords. Moses seeing that they had slain the men, and reserved the women, grew angry. These caused Israel to sin, by the counsel of Balaam; therefore kill every woman that hath known man. They that had tempted the lust of Israel with their faces, shall feel the revenge of Israel in their bloods. How happy was she that had not plaid the harlot; her maiden-head was her ransom: whereas she that had lost her virginity, most lose her life. Righteous are all thy judgments, O God.

Now as men seriously love this wages, let them accept of such a service. What shall it do you good, that you have scraped, and heaped, and hoarded, when God shall come to reckon with you for all these! I would not have one widow weep, nor one orphan cry against me, for all the wealth of the Indies. Nor is it enough to clear thee, that thou didst not injuriously get, what thou hast penuriously kept. The thief is not worse than the receiver; nor the hoarder any better than a purloiner. Some get their wealth with a false key, others keep it with a rusty lock; both shall be convinced of uncharitableness. The Fox and Badger (in the fable) come to the Lions court, to present their new-years gifts. The Fox had nothing but from hand to mouth, yet he gave liberally: the Badger had store lying by him, yet pleaded poverty, and gave sparingly. But the Lion censured them both to death; because the one did steal to pay tribute, the other would not pay tribute of what he had stolen. The political worldling deceives, gains, and gives somewhat: the hoarder scratches, multiplies, and keeps all: God shuts them both out of heaven, by the warrant of two Texts. The one, Ephes. 4. Let him that hath stolen, steal no more:but labor in that which is good, to give to him that needeth. The Lord will take no bribes; we must honestly get, what we charitably give. The other, Luk. 12. So is he that lays up treasure for himself: even like that wretched Churl, who purposes to fill his barns, and famish his soul; So, that is, as very a fool as he was. They may think themselves the only wise men, fit for honors and offices: but they are fools on earth, and no fools shall enter into heaven. This is indeed the wages of unrighteousness; now grace keep us from such a service, and mercy deliver us from such wages.

2 PET. 2.16.

But he was rebuked for his iniquity; the dumb Ass speaking with man's voice, forbade the madness of the Prophet.

God in the Old Testament, Christ in the New, Angels, the Prophets, the Apostles, the Fathers, all Preachers, all Christians that have hope of heaven, yea all reasonable men that discern the vanity of the earth, have spoken against Covetousness. Now we shall come a step lower, and hear what an unreasonable beast doth say against it. So we have it condemned ex ore Domini, ex ore Christi, ex ore Angeli, ex ore Prophetarum, ex ore Apostolorum, ex ore Pradicantium, ex ore sapientum; and last and lowest ex ore Asinae: and if all this prevail not, we shall hear it ex ore eorum quae os non habent; from the mouths of them that have no mouths at all; The stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam out of the timber; the silver and gold shall cry; even riches themselves shall cry out against the love of riches. Beasts have mouths, but not to speak: stones shall speak, yet they have no mouths. To prove it a worse than beastly sin, God hath enabled a beast to condemn it. We have these particulars. First, the Scholar, a Prophet. Secondly, the Schoolmaster, or rather School-dame; for it is Asina; an Ass. Thirdly, the lesson, which is reprehensive; she Rebuked, she Forbade. Fourthly, the manner of her teaching; which is not emblematicall, nor enigmaticall, but plain; with man's voice. Fifthly, the fault for which she corrected him, was Iniquity, and Madness.

The Scholar was a Prophet, but what kind of one? first, we find him sacrificing in the Mount of Baal: had he been from the true God, he would rather have said, Pull down these altars, than built up new ones: the very place and number convince him of Idolatry. Seeing his seven bullocks, and seven rams smoking on his seven altars; he goes up higher into the Mount to receive God's answer. This happily he had learned of Moses: so nearly a false Prophet can counterfeit a true one. An answer he hath, and that from God: but will God meet a sorcerer? Will he put prophecies into the lips of a Magician? O man, who shall teach God the choice of his Instruments? He knows how to employ not only Saints and Angels, but even wicked men, beasts, and devils, to his glory. Why should we wonder that Balaam receives visions, when his very Ass hath her eyes and mouth opened; those to see the Angel, this to reason with her master. Those words were but transient, gliding through him, and could not be defiled because they were none of his. His heart did not conceive them, though his tongue uttered them. The trunk through which a man speaks, is not the more eloquent for that speech. The looking glass shows us our faces, yet is it self blind. The bells that ring us to Church, hear not their own noise. The wax that seals up the letter, knows not the contents of it. A book of morality may teach us good behavior, while it self becomes mouldy or ragged. Balaam's tongue shall convince Moab, and do good to Israel, not better himself. Many shall say, we have prophesied in thy Name; and speak it for their honor: to whom Christ replies, Depart from me ye wicked; turning it to their shame. How divine were the Parables that God uttered by Balaam? Stay but a while and you shall find the devil in the same mouth. That which came from God, was sweet and heavenly; that mere villainy, which came from Satan: the good was God's, the evil was his own. Nor was he saved for his excellent Prophecy, but lost by his hellish policy. There was no thanks to him for his good parable, but many plagues for his bad counsel. It is no wonder to hear God speak with a false Prophet: Pharaoh, Abimelech, Nebuchadnezzar had visions; Caiaphas had his inspiration; none of them had his gracious benediction. Yea, God spake unto Satan; and that in a familiar question; Whence comest thou? Men will bestow words, where they will not bestow favor: the argument of God's love is not the sound of his voice, but the matter of his speech. The Lord will speak peace to his people. He may speak to his enemies, he will speak peace to none but his Saints. It is a poor brag of the undeserving subject; The king hath spoken to me: but what did he say? The Judge speaks to the malefactor, when he gives him his sentence. Hath God spoken to thee? so he hath done to reprobates and devils: but what said he? Did he say to thy soul, I am thy salvation? Did he say, I am thy God, thou art my son? Thou canst not hear this voice and perish.

[Use.] Balaam was a bad man, shall we therefore reject his good Prophecy? God forbid. If men be mortally sick, will they refuse to be cured by a sick Physician? A lame steward may give a good alms from the purse of his rich master. Shall we think, the Spirit of God hath so tied himself to the goodness of the Speaker, that he will not open the heart of the hearer, unless he hear a holy Teacher? How doth this absurdity meet with Popery at the back-door! Why does the Novelist rail at the Papist, when they both shake hands in the same opinion? That the goodness of the Priest blesseth the word or Sacraments. What, shall not I be saved by hearing, unless the Preacher be saved whom I hear? Is the grace of God tied to the Ministry of man? Shall the servant share the honor with his master? Christ charged the people to observe their doctrines, that sate in Moses seat: yet were they such as he termed hypocrites, and on whom he heaped woes. Paul rejoiced that Christ was preached, whether in pretence or in truth: Yet they that preached him in pretence, were not likely to be sanctified. What Christ commanded, and Paul commended, these men censure. The picture may be excellent, and lively, representing the Person whereof it is a counterfeit; and yet the Painter be no handsome man. If the Limmer be unlik• his piece, the beauty of that disgraceth him, but it self is lovely. Thou art condemned, and the Prince sends thee a pardon by another that is condemned; wilt thou none of it therefore? The religious eye looks to the comfort of the message, not to the misery of the messenger. A bad man may bring good news, as God sent blessings to Israel by the mouth of accursed Balaam. Samson did not disdain the sweets because he found them uncleanly laid, in the Lions carcass. His diet was strict enough; he might not eat that which savoured of legal impurity: yet he ventures on the honey-comb in the belly of a dead beast. Good should not be refused because the means are accidentally evil: honey is honey though in a dead Lyon. They are more scrupulous and less wise than Samson, that abhor the graces of God. because they find them in ill vessels. One will not take a good receipt from the hand of a Physician, because he is given to unlawful studies. Another will not receive a deserved contribution from the hand of an Usurer. A third will not hear the Sermon, because he hath found some fault with the Preacher. How sullen is this neglect; not to accept the honey, because we hate the Lyon? As if Elias should have scorned his breakfast, because it was brought him by a Raven. God's children have right to their Fathers blessings, wheresoever they find them. Let the doctrine be good, and the heart good; this shall save the hearer, whatsoever becomes of the Preacher.

2 The School-dame is Afina, an Ass. This is not the first time that God hath taught men by beasts; though it may be the first beast that ever he taught to speak unto man. And what if the maker of all will teach one creature by another, the better by the inferior? There is none so contemptible, which is not useful. Howsoever the Ass, among all beasts, hath the most despised name; yet there be some things in him not unworthy of imitation. Some have made him an image of thriftiness, some an emblem of painfullnesse, some a pattern of temperance, others a miracle of patience. And be not Frugality, Industrie, moderation, and long-sufferance, lessons worth our learning? For Innocence, he is not harmful as the horse or ox. For usefulness; some few particular labors are exacted of other beasts; the Ass is good for all. For moderation, he will live upon thistles. For patience; he endures hunger, thirst, and stripes without murmuring. Their milk is precious against consumptions; and famine thought their flesh sweet, when an Asses head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver. Gaius Marius a prisoner in Flavia's house, seeing an Ass run hastily to the fountain, collected as from an augurie, that he had no way to save his life but by taking water. It was with the new jaw-bone of an Ass, that Samson revenged God on a thousand Philistines: nor could all their forces withstand that contemptible engine; till it had left ten hundred bodies as dead as that carcase whose bone it was. With that base instrument Samson gave death to the Philistines, and from the same God gave Samson refreshing. One bone yields him both conquest and life; and was both a weapon of war, and a well of water.

Thus useful hath this poor beast been; now indeed corruption hath made the name ignominious: and to all ridiculous purposes our common talk applies the Ass: As Ingenious as an Ass; as courteous as an Ass, as stupid as an asse, &c. Which the blind Pagan observing; being asked when he was ready to die, if love would grant him now to see only one thing and no more, (that had never seen anything) what it should be; he answered, I desire to see an Ass. Whereat they wondering, he replied; I have heard you a hundred times in a day mention the Ass, and apply it to every man, almost everything you talk on: therefore me thinks, if I must see but one thing, in that one thing I shall see all things.

But now the more despisable this beast is, the more shame is it for man to be set under such a Tutor. As there be some good things in the Ass to be imitated; so she is an emblem of some vices to be shunned. We do not approve the folly, the stupidity, the misery, the slavery of the Ass. Therefore was the Teacher fitted for the scholar: a foolish beast to teach a man that was self-conceited: a stupid beast to teach him that was too precipitated: a miserable beast to teach him that placed happiness in riches: a slavish beast to teach him that was so basely subjected to his own affections.

1 For folly; when we speak of a defective understanding, we say, as wise as an Ass. But no Ass can be so foolish as the covetous. He lays up for tomorrow, and is not sure to live out this night; is not this a fool? He provides for himself, without any faith to depend upon God's finding: surely, the fowls of the air, and flowers of the field, are not such fools. To work himself into a rich fortune, he neglects to work out his own salvation; is not this a fool? He refuseth God's service, which would save him; for Mammons service, that will confound him; is not this a fool? O wealth, how many fools dost thou make in a year? The eagles are about carcasses, bears about honey, bees about oil, wolves about sheep, and fools about riches. Many of them are worse than asses: for the asse doth not use to bite, they pinch to death. The biting of a snake is cured by dittanny, of a mad dog by a crabfish; but an oppressors bite is mortal: he commits dry murder, and the last Jury shall find him a homicide. To end all controversy, God himself calls them fools: and what is it for men to deem them wily foxes, when the Judge hath pronounced them foolish asses?

2 For Stupiditie; the asse is a dull and blockish creature, and in one sense, so are the covetous; fit for nothing but taxes and subsidies, to bear the commonwealths burdens. The strength of the boar is in his tuske, of the elephant in his trunk, of the lyon in his paws, of the asse in his back, of the covetous in his back-burden. Where the treasure is, there will the heart be also: now the heart of an usurer is to be found where his money lies: if that be in danger abroad, he is heavy and heart-less at home. He so lodes himself with thick clay, that he cannot stir a foot toward heaven. He flies with no other wings, walks with no other staff, fights with no other sword, minds no other business, but his riches. Indeed, what hath he to do? He needs not sweat for his bread, others sweat for him. He needs not go to the market, the market will come to him. To visit the poor, he hath little stomach; to spend his time in prayer, less. He is both like the mill, and the mill-horse; turning and toiling within his Compass; grinding the bones of the poor; still there at night, where he begun in the morning. If he be a lay man, his journey is always for a purchase: if of the clergy, he will switch and spurr for a Benefice. Bees make the honey, and drones suck the hive: oxen plow the ground, and asses reap the harvest. It is said in Job; The oxen were plowing, and the asses feeding by them. Laborious oxen, painful preachers spend their time in plowing; and lazy Asses eat up their labors, being always feeding. Great revenues belong to the Contemplative Covent, while the devout and active Preacher is a mendicant. God appointed the Ark to be carried only by Levites, yet was it once carried by oxen, and then it was ready to fall: but when it is carried by ignorant Asses, how should it stand?

3 For misery; the asse is the poorest beast: he carries his master, and meat for his master, but fasts himself. He endures sore labors, and sharp blows a¹ day; at night he is turned forth to seek his supper on the bare commons. The worldling is vexed with many cares; yet after all, hath not the power to give himself one comfortable meal. He abates from his guts, to add unto his coffers: and just like the asse, having borne a burden of gold all day, all night he feeds upon thistles. He thinks himself admired for his wealth; and therein he is an asse too:

for as the Ass that carried the goddess, seeing the people bow in reverence as he passed by, did think that homage was done to him, which was meant to his burden. So the respect that is given, is not to the man, but to his riches. Wealth maketh many friends; they are friends to the wealth, not to the man. Now can there be greater misery, than to starve in the midst of abundance? Alas, he is but the Jailor of his estate, to keep the keys; till at last, death opens the doors, dischargeth the prisoner, and commits the keeper, and that to a strong and woeful dungeon. He is thirsty by the spring, and dares not drink for fear the fountain should fail him; yea, he cannot drink, that is God's curse upon him. He is not unlike an unhappy boy, that hath a great knot or truss of points to play withal; and but one at his clothes, to tie them together. No beast will starve in a fat pasture: if a man pinch his guts, when God hath afforded him affluence, sure the Ass himself is not so very an Ass as he.

4 For slavery; the Ass is not only a slave to man, but even to other beasts: the lion toiles him, the ox goares him, the horse beats him, the fox cheats him; all are too hard for him: he dares deny none of them his service. He is animal subjugale, the word our Apostle here useth; ordained for the yoke. The worldling is not only a slave to his Mammon, but even to all the Brokers and Panders of filthy lucre. He rides his Ass, and Satan rides him: he spurs his Ass, and Satan spurs him: he bridles his Ass, and Satan may post him to hell with a golden bit. There is no sin he will deny, no baseness he can refuse, to be rich. The Ass is servile against his will: the covetous gives his full consent to this slavery. Justly therefore is one Ass set to school another: and if this latter will not be schooled, they shall change names and natures; the Ass shall be the man, and the man shall be the Ass. If there be a fountain, the beasts of the forest will drink, and the wild asses quench their thirst. But if a man will be miserable here, to become everlastingly wretched hereafter, O what an Ass is he? Now the grace of God direct us a better course, that we may find a better recompense: and by despising this world which Balaam sought, we may have treasure in that world which Balaam lost.

The lesson is Reprehensive; she rebuked, she forbad. A Prophet, and come to be reproved? this was preposterous. A Teacher taught, a Rebuker rebuked, is but a harsh hearing. Yet hath it been no strange thing: the praise of the Centurion, was the shame of Israel: the mercy of the Samaritan, the condemnation of the uncharitable Levite: the thankful returning of the strange Leper, an exprobration to all the nine; when God had his Tythe from a person where he least expected it. What meanest thou, O sleeper? Arise, call upon thy God; saith the shipmaster to Jonah. What an astonishment was this? An Infidel leads an Israelite to his prayers: the Preacher is become an Auditor, the sea-man a preacher: the patient heals the physician. Yet truth is truth, wheresoever we find it: call upon thy God, was good counsel, though it came from a Gentile. He says again, Why hast thou done this? They worshipped a false God, he the true; yet was he colder in his devotion to the true, than they were to the false. How pitiful is it, when a babe must c•techise a man, when a Turk shall find a Christian false, and say to him, Why hast thou done this? A child may think, speak, do as a child; but of a man there is more required. If darkness be on the hill, what light is in the valley? Errors of the eminent are eminent errors. If but one eye-brow be shaven, there is little taken from the body, much from the beauty. The tattered beggar can spy • small rent in a silken coat. It is ill to deserve the censure of Inferiors; fearful, of beasts: when Israel shall be taught thankfulness by the Ox; when the Dogs shall be mentioned to the confutation of the rich churl; when the rash Prophet shall be disputed with by his Ass. It was a shame for Sara, and no great praise for Abraham, when an Abimelech shall say, thy husband is to thee the covering of the eyes, &c. Let Prophets take heed how they give a theme to Atheists: they will quarrel at our good actions, much more at our manifest criminations. Our faults be their sport: if Samson stumble, the Philistines houte and triumph. Indeed God useth their declamations as a rod to whip his children with shame, to save their souls by the bargain. But yet still it is preposterous to come behind them in goodness, whom we go before in knowledge. Balaam's book cannot save him. They tell Christ of their prophesying, casting out devils, and doing wonderful works, in his Name▪ Yet are answered with a Nescio vos, depart from me. In vain have they prophesied to others, unless they had also prophesied to themselves, and lived like Prophets. In vain have they cast devils out of others, retaining one in their own bosoms. In vain have they eaten in his presence, when neither the example of his life, nor the doctrine of his lips hath amended them. Indeed all faults are not to be taxed, all be not faults that are taxed. God opened that Asses mouth to reprove a manifest error; we have Asses that open their mouths to censure they know not what. They will blame their Pastor for no other fault, but because he is so; or because he doth not humor their fancies. It were better that such beasts would hold their peace.

She rebuked him.] Among all God's preventions and stoppings of us in our ways of sin, Reprehension hath a wholesome and necessary place. Our iniquities would be like rottenness in our bones, festering in our bowels to the day of judgment, but for this medicine. So Wisdom begins her lore, reproving simple ones, scorers, and fools; giving us names according to our corrupt natures. God, like a most accurate Musician, hath variety of notes and tunes: he hath spoken by a burning bush, by a cloud of water, by a pillar of fire, by visions, by dreams, by miracles, by Angels; and by some nearer to us, men; and by one nearest to himself, above all, Jesus Christ. Sometimes he speaks by sensible judgments: Miriam's foul leprosy was a fair warning: Zacharies dumbness was no dumb teacher to him: Paul's blindness took away his blindness, and made him see more into the way of life, than could all his learning at the feet of Gamaliel. Why may not Balaam be reprov'd by his own beast? The reprehension was not the beasts, but the Lord's. He is a wretched man whom God never chides: the first messenger to him is the first borne of death.

This is our Ministerial business; not only to teach, but to reprove. Otherwise we offer red, not scarlet: the tincture and die of our Preaching is not in grain, nor penetrating into the soul. Our fire gives light and shining, but kindles not in the conscience. It is oil without wine, to the wounded: a crutch to walk withal, when the leg is out of joint, and should be set: holydayes without Eves: a Passover without sour herbs: continual feasting without sweeping the house. As there is a Dicite of joy, Tell the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy king cometh: so there is a Dicite of sorrow too, Tell my people their transgressions, and the house of Jacob their sins. But most of our hearers are like wanton children; that care not to be mended, but to be commended: he that praiseth them, pleaseth them. They are all apt to conceit well of themselves: but this self-love is (in effect) self hatred. If we reprove not our brother, God says, we hate him in our heart: and if we suffer not our brother to reprove us, do we not hate our own hearts? How often hath a horse in his full speed miscarried by a precipice; whereas one check had saved him? Yes, I would be reprehended, saith one; but I would not have an Ass to do it: quis tulerit Gracchum de seditione loquentem? But as when God speaks, we regard quis, without examining the quid we do it, because he commands it. So when man speaks, we regard quid more than quis: What am I the worse, if the admonition of a fool can make me wiser? Our Maker, that sees our proneness to evil, thinks it best to hedge up our sinful ways with prohibitions. The first precept that ever was given to man was a prohibition; Thou shalt not eat of the tree of the knowledge of Good and evil. Among those ten Laws, the ground of all other; there are but two affirmative; the last of the first Table, and the first of the last: the other eight are negative; leading us to good by the forbidding of evil. He that will not omit to judge us for omitting the good commanded; for the doing of forbidden evil, will not fail to punish us; if he have not punished Christ for us.

1 He had a desire to Curse; and the brand of the desperately wicked is to love cursing. He loved to send it abroad, he shall feel it at home: he wore it about him, he shall have it within him. Let it come into his bowels like water, and like oil into his bones. When David's misery deserved compassion, Shimei's foul mouth loded him with malediction. Hreof he complained; They persecute him whom thou hast smitten, and vex him whom thou hast wounded. The picking out of such an opportunity doubled his malicious rancor. Such words would have galled at another time, which now are ready to kill. Let an arrow fly against the wind <◇> will hardly stick upright; with the wind, it pierceth deep. While thy eneie stands, he may ward thy blows; but once fallen on his back, he is at thy mercy: and how base is that spirit, which will prey on prostrate fortunes? Little children have so much valor and justice, as to call him a coward that strikes his adversary when he is down. To insult upon those whom God hath humbled, and to draw blood of that back, which is yet blew from the Makers stripes, is even the murder of a virulent tongue. Nor will it be any rare thing at the day of Judgment, for cursers to be indicted of murder. They would kill, if they durst: they do kill so far as they can. I would be loath to trust his hand, that banns me with his lips. Balaam would soon have been the death of all Israel, if either tongue or sword could have effected his will.

Hear this, ye whose tongues run so fast on the devils errand: you love cursing, you are not heirs of the blessing. Christians are charged to bless their enemies, what are they that curse their friends? If every curse should stick a visible blister on the tongue, as it doth an insensible one on the soul; how many men's tongues would be too big for their mouths? In the discharge of a Gunne, the fire is given at one end, the report is heard at the other. In the charging of the heart with malice, fire is taken at the ears or eyes, and presently the noise of cursing and railing breaks out at the mouth. Therefore have we been cursed and plagued, because our mouths were so full of cursing and bitterness. Why should we not expect that on our bodies, which proceeds so continually forth of our lips? Who can set his neighbors house on fire, and be secure of his own? Yea, cursing mouths be like ill made pieces; which while men discharge at others, they recoile in splinters on their own fates. Curse not the king in thy thought, nor the rich in thy bedchamber: for these arrows will return on thy own soul. Some men's maledictions are shot like fools bolts, without regarding where they light. In this throng not seldom they hurt their friends, their children: as Diogenes warned the bastard, when he saw him throwing stones at random among the people; to take heed he did not hit his own father. The wicked do not shoot directly at God; yet God shoots at them, and sendeth out his arrows as against persecutors. Blessing becomes Christians: Christ's heart was meek, he repined not: his tongue meek, he reviled not: his hand meek, he revenged not: The good man wronged, shoots not again: neither with the arrow of the head, nor head of the arrow; neither with the mouth of the sword, nor sword of the mouth. If this life prepares us for the next; then the mouth of bitterness shall be plagued with bitterness of mouth: but the lips accustomed to bless, shall be blessed with songs of joy forever.

2 He had Linguam venalem, a mercenary tongue. He that had morgaged his soul for gold, would not stick for his tongue into the bargain. There be not many acts of sin, wherein the tongue hath not a part to play: that little engine is seldom ever left out. For uncleanness, the tongue woos: for dissimulation, the tongue walks: for ambition, the tongue flatters: to hide faults, the tongue lies: what business hath sin, wherein the tongue finds no employment? But a vendible tongue, that may be hired for a bribe to contradict the truth, is rooted in a most wicked heart. For the mouth is but the bell, and the tongue the clapper, the heart is the spring that sets all a going. For a man to sell his speech, is bad enough, but worse to sell his silence. He that speaks, does something for his reward; the other is fee'd for nothing. Christ said, He that is not with me, is against me: but many a client says of a famous Advocate; if he be not against me, he is with me. So the just cause may be lost both ways; by speech, or silence. But he that farms out his tongue, shall receive but a sory rent at the last.

3 He did strike his beast, for doing him good. She saw the Angel, and would not go on; for this he bestowed his fury and stripes upon her. If she had gone on, he had perished, yet he strikes her that kept him from being stricken. How often do men wish for those things, which it is mercy to go without? They find fault to be stayed in the ways of death, and fly upon those that oppose their perdition. It is our office and endeavor to save you from destruction, to guide you along through this wilderness unto Canaan, to discover your dangers, to clear your eyes, and deliver your souls: do not you like Balaam, requite us with blows, and use us worse than beasts for our service. An ape seeing himself in a looking glass, whether through wantonness, or dislike of his own visage; doth often break the glass apieces. Preachers are like Crystal glasses, declaring to sinners their spots and deformities; and these like apes, requite them with injuries and abuses. We would fain save you, why should you mischief us? Travelers make much of their guides; so let us have your loving company in the way of obedience, that we may all arrive at the land of Promise.

Balaam's madness will appear in four fits. A foolish fit, a frantic fit, a desperate fit, a raving fit.

1. He knew the danger, yet incurres it; was not this madness? Until the will of God be known, we may dissent from it without sin. Saint Paul by virtue of his Apostolical commission would have preached in Bithynia; but the Spirit hindered him: yet herein he sinned not. Samuel prayed for Saul's good, otherwise than the secret counsel of God had determined; and this without sin: but when the decree was manifested, he ceased that duty. One good thing may differ from another: and the creature may will a good, which God in his secret purpose willeth not: yet the will is good, if it leave not out Fiat voluntas tua, submitting it self to a better: as the child prays for his fathers life, when God hath determined him to die of that sickness: yet without sin. But when Balaam is forbidden to go, and opposed in going, still to persist; this was madness. What Prophet ever spake better, what reprobate ever did worse, than Balaam? It is no less than madness, for Prophets to give light to others, and walk themselves in darkness; to distribute portions of meat to the family, and starve their own souls: to rescue others from the enemy, and suffer themselves to be taken: to forewarn others of that pit, whereinto themselves run headlong. If we hear a Mountebank undertake to cure the distempered heat of the liver, while himself hath a fiery face, will we believe him? It is fabled of a mad man that talking with a lean meager Cook, understood from him what dainty dishes he dressed for his guests; and hearing that they were all fat and fair liking, and thrived with it; he asked him why he did not feed on those meats himself, that he might be fat too: the cooke answered, that for himself, he had no stomach: but the mad man replies; Take heed how you come near Bedlam; if the corrector find you, your punishment will be very sharp; for certainly you are madder than ever I was. If Prophets dress heavenly feasts, made up of God's gracious promises and infinite mercies: yet fast themselves, surely the very Ass may convince them of madness.

Now as there be mad Prophets, so there are mad people too: such as will not live as their Pastor teacheth, but as their Pastor liveth. Saint Paul tells us that faith cometh by hearing; he does not say, it comes by seeing. We live by precepts, not by examples. But these nice patients neglect the diet which their physician prescribeth, and follow the diet which he useth. I deny not but good examples have their profit: and to see others feed heartily, betters our stomach. But it is not their example, but our own meat that doth nourish us: no man is the fatter for another's feeding. The common exprobatation is, Physician, heal thyself. Yet suppose those Prophets warn us of the tide, and lose it themselves; that they are careless of their own sores, so our wounds be healed: that they become infatuate salt, so we be seasoned: that they are cast into darkness, so we be enlightened: we have no cause to complain. Have they built us an Ark, though themselves be drowned? have they shone to us like tapers, though themselves go out in stench? Have they brought us to the Land of Promise, though themselves die short of it? Have they served us in the Temple as vessels of gold and silver, though themselves be carried into Babylon? Have they sown our fields, and miss their own harvest? Have they planted us vineyards, and none for themselves? Bee it unto them as they have deserved: let us take our own portions, and be thankful. Indeed Prophets are in your mouths, as you will be pleased to take them; and everyone speaks, not as he sees, but as he susp•cts. What are we more than you? All are men of the like passions. Do you look for no passion in us, and find so much in yourselves? We bring you heavenly treasure, yet are still earthen vessels. Among the Apostles, one was a devil, and another was a Satan in his kind, none were Angels. We are the men of God, yet men: Prophets, but yet (as Moses said) like our brethren: not in the similitude of sinful flesh, as Christ was: but sinful flesh indeed. We are Stars, yet saith Job, the very stars are not pure in God's sight. We are Angels, by a more honorable style than our natures can bear; yet God hath not found steadfastness in the Angels. Our profession gives us no immunity from sin. But if we know the right, and bend our whole course the wrong, we are then mad indeed: and if you neglect our doctrine, and follow altogether our example, certainly you are as mad as we. This was his foolish fit.

2. He hears the Beast speak under him, yet slights it: this was a frantic fit. Who would not look that his hairs should stand upright, his blood forsake his cheeks, that he should alight from that strange kind of Beast, and stand amazed at the miracle? But such was his madness; as the frantic hath sense to hear a voice, but no use of reason to distinguish it; that as if no new thing had happened, he talks with his Ass, and gives her words again, not more full of anger than void of discretion. Who does not wonder, that this Magician wondered not? Two reasons may be alleged for it; though indeed there was no reason in it.

1. It might be, this was his trade; and that among other postures of his sorcery, he used to receive voices from his familiars in the shape of Beasts. So custom might take away strangeness, if he had been wonted to this before. But suppose the devil and he were so well acquainted at this devise: yet he knew his own Ass: she had long groaned under so unworthy a burden: he knew this voice came not from Satan; for then it should have been an encouragement to persist; whereas this voice sounded a retreat: yet still he puts her on, whose tongue had forbidden him to move further.

2. It might be, his rage and covetousness had so transported him, that he did not observe this unusual and unnatural accident. If a man had as many eyes, as the Poets fain of Argus, the melody of gain would play them all asleep, or make them blind. He that looks through a green glass, sees no other color. The worldling is like a man in a dream; you may talk what you will to him, but his dream goes on. Balaam's mind did so run on the gold of Moab, that he could hear a Beast speak, and never regard it. One man passeth by that with contempt, which another receives with astonishment. In dreadful thunders, when good men be at their prayers, some still ply their sports. They are as mad as Balaam, whom extraordinary Judgments cannot move. God made all his works to be observed: but they that do not wonder at his miracles, are miracles to be wondered at. The Papists fain a world of miracles, and they have men mad enough to believe them. Daily we see God's judgments; if we do not lay them to heart, we are as mad as they.

3 After all this interruption, still he drives on; and runs upon that sword which was brandished against him: this was a desperate fit. The Ass saw the Angel, and gave back, common sense had taught her to avoid that danger, which reason could not work in her Master. The sword was drawn against him, not her; yet she would decline it, he rusheth upon it. Evils were as good not seen, as not avoided: our happiness is in the prevention, not prevision of them. The wise man foreseeth the plague, and hideth himself; but fools run on, and are punished. We pity him that is hurt through want of circumspection: but he that sees the snare, and flies into it, scarce deserves compassion. The revenging Angel stands before us in the ways of disobedience; and though we know we shall as surely die as sin, yet we have neither the wit nor the grace to give back; though it were with the hurt of a foot to save the body, with the pain of the body to save the soul. Sin is a labyrinth, whereinto the entrance is easy, the extrication difficult. The Turk making an expedition into Persia, found the straits of Armenia somewhat troublesome for his passage; therefore they consulted which way to get in. But one among the rest, and he none of the wisest, said; Here is much ado how you should get in, but I hear nobody take care how you should get out. Suddenly doth a wicked Balaam set upon his mischievous design; but no persuasions can make him break off. How often doth the adulterers conscience check him with the law, and dread of plagues; yet still he persists, and resolves desperately, as Esther did religiously, If I perish, I perish. Or as Pompey said in another sense, when he was to bring grain to Rome in a great dearth, and coming to the sea, found it tempestuous and dangerous, in so much that he was dissuaded to embarque; Necesse est ut vadam, non est necesse ut vivam; It is necessary that I go, not that I live. So they make a necessity of their sinning, and put it to the venture for their salvation.

Do we resolve ever to giveover the course of wickedness? Yes, one day. If one day, why not this day, why not now? We are not sure to live out this day. Pyrrhus opened himself to his friend Cineas, that he first intended a war upon Italy: and what then? saith Cineas. Then we will attempt Sicily: and what then? Then we may conquer Carthage and Africa: and what then, Sir? Then we may rest and feast, and sacrifice, and make merry with our friends. Cineas replied; And may we not enjoy this sweetness now, without all this ado? Vain man fancies divers projects; as first how to be rich: and what then? next to gild his gold with honor: and what then? Then to take his pleasure according to his sensual appetite: and what then? At last to repent, and prepare for heaven. O mad man, and why not so now? He that calls thee now, will not call ever. He that calls thee now, will now receive thee: will he receive thee, when he does not call thee? Cast away thy lusts, that they may not cast away thee. If the perverseness of our stomachs break through all oppositions, Balaam himself was not more mad than we.

4 His unmercifulness to the poor beast is a remonstrance of his raving fit. Quid meruit Asina? All the hurt she did him, was to turn him, to serve him, to save him: this he requites with blows. This was her first fault all her time with h•m, if it had been one; therefore she deserved not so cruel a revenge. We little think of it; but God will call us to account for all the unkind usages of his mute creatures. Of this the Angel first takes notice; of this wrong he first expostulates; Wherefore hast thou smitten thy Ass these three times? One blow had been unjust, three was madness. God hath made us lords of them, not tyrants; owners, not tormentors: he hath given us leave to kill them for our use, not to torment them for our pleasure. As they are our drudges by constitution, so they are our fellows by creation. Unless she had turned from me, saith the Angel, surely I had slain thee: that was somewhat; she was a means of saving thy life. Yea, I had slain thee, and saved her alive; that was more. To show that I respect an innocent beast more than a perverse man, her safety should have aggravated the woe of thy ruin. Canst thou tell, ô man, whether thy very beast may not be a means of thy preservation, that thou madly spendest thy fury, where thou findest matter of mercy?

Beasts have been a means of the deliverance of men: not seldom hath a dog prevented thieves, the swiftness of a horse saved the riders purse or throat: many of them have done more than ordinary service, all which pleads for them against our tyranny. Yet so bloody was this magician, that he wisheth for a sword to slay his harmless beast. A wand had been too much; yet he desires a sword. Whose beast would he have killed? was it not his own? and if he had killed his own beast, who should have been the loser by it? How impotent was this Madness! The good man is merciful to his beast. They cannot declare their wants, nor tell their grievances; otherwise than by moaning in their several kinds: to an honest heart their very dumbness is a loud language. David will venture on a bear, rather than lose a lamb: Jacob will endure heat by day, and cold by night, rather than neglect his flocks: Moses will fight with odds, rather than the cattle shall perish with thirst: only a Balaam wants this mercy. It was a sign that he would fain have smitten Israel with a curse, that wished a sword in the sides of his faultless beast. It is ill falling into those hands, which the very beasts find unmerciful. While they live, it is mercy to subdue them: when they must die, it is mercy to dispatch them: in all things mercy becomes the servants of God.

With man's voice:] this was the manner of her disputing. Balaam's madness had turned him into a beast; and why might not one beast teach another? In some things the Ass excelled her master. First, she saw the judgment, he was blind: common sense better instructed her, than reason and religion had enlightened him. Beasts cannot examine the occasion of their employments, their masters should. Secondly, the Ass had a tongue of equity; the Prophet a tongue, hand, and heart of iniquity: we would do ill, she labors to prevent him: he intends Israel's destruction, she means his preservation. Not seldom have we seen a drunken rider on the back of a sober beast: insomuch that one said wittily; the horses stand at the Tavern-door like men, while their masters are playing the beasts within. Thirdly, the Ass was not capable of sin; and did therefore justify her self: the master was so mad upon sin, that he would needs ruin himself.

1 The weaker vessel may hold the better liquor. Surgunt indocti; the unlearned lay hold on heaven, whereas men of knowledge often wallow in the lusts of flesh and blood. We are ordained to judge the Angels; but if we degenerate from our prerogative, Angels, men, infidels, harlots, yea even beasts and stones shall be our Judges. Because when we ask in our daily prayers, that the will of God may be done on earth as it is in heaven; we are so far from matching this proportion, that there is not the poorest creature in the air, earth, or deep, but in their kinds go beyond us. But let us know, though we have the Beasts our servants in the labors of this world, they shall not be our companions in suffering the torments of hell. Howsoever the profane epicure in the pleasures of life would rather be a man than beast: yet coming to his answer, he would rather be a beast than a man. How willingly after death, would Balaam have changed conditions with his beast; vainly wishing that himself had been the Ass, and that Ass the Prophet.

2 As Balaam proceeds in forwardness, so doth the Ass in reprehension. First, he went aside out of God's way, and she went aside out of his way: so her error was a reproof of his. When things go cross with us, let us consider our crossness to the will of our Maker. Secondly, as he went forward with his wicked intendments, so she dashed his foot against the wall, to put him in mind of his malicious projects, and if it were possible, by the bruising of a limb to save the whole body and soul. Thirdly, because he was carried headlong with the hope of wages, she lay down to stay his course. Had there been the least spark of grace in him, this falling down of his beast might have taught him to fall down on his knees, and to deprecate that danger which an ordinary capacity would have suspected. In sin there may be security, there can be no safety. Wickedness makes guilty men fear where is no cause, Balaam had cause enough, but no grace to fear. Fourthly, because in his anger he smote her for stopping his hast, she opened her mouth to reprove his injustice. Thus at every turn she answered him, in every passage she was quit with him. We cannot run so fast, but God can overtake us; nor be so cunning, but he can teach, even a beast to over-reach us.

3 The sensual creatures are set to condemn our sins, and to reflect our evils upon us. Peter hath a Cock to tell him his cowardice, and Balaam an Ass to reprove his avarice. There is no creature dumb, when God bids it speak: if there were no Preachers to declaim, no conscience to accuse, the very creatures themselves would cry: the beds, boards, walls, windows, markets, closets should have tongues to condemn us. We need not wish for Angels from heaven, or the dead from hell, to warn us: for besides Moses and the Prophets, besides Christ and the Apostles, besides the Gospel and a multitude of Preachers; the very stones would speak against us. Whither can we turn our eyes, and not see an object rebuking our iniquities? In their rebellion against us, they are dumb interpreters of our rebellion against our Maker. In their mute unability to declare their grievances, they tax our stubbornness, that have tongues to speak, and yet will not confess our sins. When they pine for want of meat, they show us our demerits, that have brought a curse upon them and ourselves, and that we suffer in their ruins. When they are brutish, they do but their kinds when we commit uncleanness, we are worse than beasts. We can take signals by Ravens and Screechowles, and presently talk of graves and corpses: superstition hath taught fools to understand the language of birds: would devotion could teach us to understand the groaning of all creatures under the bondage of our corruption.

There is vox Divina, that cries against our sins; The Lord gave his voice from heaven, and that a mighty voice. There is vox Angelica; An Angel cried with a loud voice, Woe, Woe, Woe to the inhabitants of the earth. There is vox Humana, the dictation of reason; every man's conscience condemneth sin: vox intra te, quae est contra te: a loud voice to every ones self, though not heard of others. And there is vox muta; so Abel's blood had a tongue to cry against murder: the Walls and Beams have a tongue against oppression: the fields and vineyards have a tongue against drunkenness and excess. Tot ora quot vulnera; Stephen had so many mouths, as he had wounds, calling for justice: and there be tot lingua, quot creaturae, so many tongues as there are creatures. Yea, there is vox inferna, the devils have thundering voices▪ they become (as it were) hoarse with accusing us: day and night they cease not to put up bills and declarations against us. Yet there is vox penitentiaria; how ought we to lift up our voices and weep for our sins, lift up our voices and cry for forgiveness, when so many thousand voices cry against us? All our comfort is, there is vox salvifica, the voice of a Mediator that speaks for us: and it is vox Sanguinus too, a voice of blood; but such a voice as Speakes better things than the blood of Abel. This voice God will hear, when he stops his ears to all the rest. It is a voice that cries for mercy, and may it obtain mercy for us all.

4 There is no beast deserves so much wonder as this of Balaam; and that for three things: First, her common sense was advanced above the reason of her rider; so that for the time, the beast was the man, and the man was the beast: not by any transmigration or permutation of souls, after the fancy of the Pythagoreans: but by Satan's hand over the one, and God's power in the other, the Prophet became brutish, and the beast Prophetic. Secondly, her eye was enlighten'd to be capable of seeing an Angel. Among all the properties of this beast, I do not read any commendation of his sight: but rather find it to be dull and heavy, scarce apprehending a bodily object that is not too apparent. But to see a Spirit, and that Spirit which his rider could not discern, was far above nature. Thirdly, her mouth was opened to speak: now to hear a word come from that tongue, which was only used to bray, was strange and uncouth. Who could but stand amazed at such a sight, at such a voice, at such a discourse, from so silly a creature? That a beast, whose nature is noted for incapacity, should out-reason a man, her master, a professed Prophet, was in the height of miracles?

But what can hinder the will of the Almighty, that doth all things with the same facility? Non laborat in maximis Deus, non fastidit in minimis. There is no impossibility, where he is pleased to give a dispensation. Yea, as all extraordinary things are only done by him, so what ordinary thing can be done without him? Our eye could no more see a beast, than a beast can see an Angel, had he not thus enabled it. He that made all eyes, can easily make them dim or clear at his pleasure. The Syrians had eyes good enough, yet God so held them that they could not see the man that led them. The Ass had a dull eye, yet saw a Spirit: he that shut the one, opened the other. If his power can make stones to speak, how much more creatures of sense? That evil spirit spake in a serpent; why is it more that a good Spirit should speak in the mouth of a beast? The Heathens lie, if they did not receive their Oracles out of stones and trees. I could tell you wonders of that argument, if they were pertinent. We do teach birds to speak those sentences they understand not: if man can do this, how far can his Maker go? He can as easily create a voice without a body, as a body without a voice. We may not distrust, we may wonder: let us compare the Act with the Author, and all is easy.

5 We read but of one beast in the Scripture, upon which God wrought such a miracle. One to witness his power, and but one to show his wisdom: for wonders cease to be wonders, when they are common. The Antichristian Church hath made them superfluously frequent; and for this one, they have many beasts that speak and do strange things; if we will believe them. As that of Saint Anthony of Padua's horse, that kneeled down to worship the holy Hoast: yet we had a man in England that taught his horse neater tricks, & we had not the faith to think it a miracle. They tell us how Saint Francis commanded a Wolf to hurt no more Lambes; and the Wolf came to him, and put his paw into Saint Francis his hand, and thereby made him a promise: marry he said nothing. Not to speak of their Parrat, that being pursued by the Hawk, and flying over Saint Thomas of Canturburi's tomb, cried to him for help; whereupon the Hawk fell down dead, and the Bird escaped. Nor of Saint Francis his preaching to the Birds, and their attentive patience, yea thanks to him for his good Sermon: or the swallows holding their peace at his rebuke. They tell us of Bishop Trian, who having killed his cow and calf to entertain Saint Patricke, found them both feeding in his meadow the next morning; only we do not read of ought they said to him. And of a Woman, that to make her Bees fruitful, did put a consecrated Hoast into the Hive: where the Bees built a chapel with an altar, doors and windoors, a steeple with bells, and sung their canonical hours, and kept watch like monks in their cloisters: and was not here a goodly covent made in a Bee-hive? It is no wonder that beasts speak words, when Bees can say their prayers, and receive the communion. Yea, they profess more, even to give language to Images, blocks and stones. Beasts have tongues, though no speech; sense, though they want reason: Images have neither reason, nor tongues, nor sense. So the Image of the blessed Virgin is reported to bid Saint Bernard good morrow; and to charge Hiacinth, when he fled from the Tartarians, to take her and her Son along with him: to bid the Sexton open the Church-door, and let in Alexius; and thus to encourage Thomas Aquinas, Thou hast written well of me, what reward wilt thou have? Were not these very proper miracles?

They refuse Christ speaking in his Word, and listen to his speaking in a Rood. But as when Agésilus was told of one that did excellently counterfeit the Nightingale, and was entreated to hear him; he replied, why I have heard the Nightingale her self. So what need we listen to these counterfeit voices of Christ, when we have heard the Word of God Himself? He is too prodigal a spend thrift of the stock of his faith, that shall give credit to their forgeries. I had rather be of his mind, who when his friend told him of a strange matter, and added withal that he would not have believed it, had he not seen it; answered, And no more will I. This we find, that since the brightness of the Gospel, God doth rarely work miracles, but Satan is often permitted to do signs and wonders. We are not bid to expect miracles from heaven, we are to suspect the delusions of hell.

There be yet remaining certain metaphorical allusions, and moral observations; wherewith I conclude.

1. This Beast never spake before, never after; only this once, and that was but an expostulation, and a reply. Some dissolute sinners are like this Ass: their eyes are never opened, nor their tongues unloosed, but once: they see not the sword of God's vengeance, nor fall to their devout prayers, till they come to their death-beds. Sero sapiunt Phryges: these fools would buy knowledge, when Wisdom hath shut up her shoppe. Sera in fundo parsimonia; never to spare till we come to the bottom of the purse, is a frugality next to beggary. Men sing and take their pleasure in prosperity, and open not their mouths to heaven, unless in blasphemy: in the day of trouble they cry for help: but if they will not speak to God in their health, can they hope he should speak to them in their sickness?

But God hath said, Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will hear thee. True, but this must be such a voice as he is acquainted withal. Hath he heard it daily in petitions and praises? then he will know it familiarly in distress. Otherwise he will count it a strange voice, and none of his families. Strangers hear not the voice of Christ, nor will Christ hear the voice of strangers. He that never would learn to read, and yet hopes at last push to be prompted with a Psalm of mercy, shall be put away with a non legit. God is fain to deal with wicked men, as we do with skittish Iades in a pasture, which we cannot take up till we get them at a gate; even to bring them to the gates of death before they will be tamed. Pray continually, saith the Apostle; mind that exercise that you may be perfect in it? Other duties have their several seasons: ^b there is a time to weep, and a time to rejoice; a time to love, and a time to hate; a time to speak, and a time to hold our peace: but Semper orate; Pray continually, Let us pray while we can speak; that God like a kind Father, may hear our groans and pity us when we cannot speak.

2. The Ass spake to better her Master, not her self: and so do many, that have heaven in their lips, and the image of hell in their lives; that are excellent at the Muses, but have no acquaintance with the Graces. We may say of their learning, as it was of Galba's wit, Male habitat. They are like some unfortunate swimmers, that save their endangered fellows, and drown themselves. Or Oculists, that make others see clearly, while themselves have sore eyes. Or Physicians that prescribe a good diet, and keep a bad. Or the Israelites in captivity, that made bricks to build the Egyptians houses, and had none of their own. Or the Indians that enrich the Spaniards out of their golden mines, and yet are themselves the most beggarly people of the earth. They use their gifts, as if a man should use monies, only Ad numerandum. Plutarch writes of an old man that found reverence of children in Lacedemon, and contempt in all Greece besides; Omnes Graci norunt quid sit honestum, sed eo soli utuntur Lacedemonii. Seneca commends to us such a Teacher, Quem magis admiramur visum, quàm auditum. He is a monster, that hath a tongue larger than his hand: many good words, and no good deeds. Thus the salt of the earth, after it hath seasoned others, may lose the own savor. They that are lux mundi, may carry the light behind them, guiding others, not their own feet. They minister occasion of their own sentence; Ex ore tuo serva nequam. They make their learning Artificium vaenale, qui alitur vivunt, quàm vivendum esse praecipiant. The good Commander says not to his soldiers, Ite, but Eamus; what you see me do, do likewise; as Gideon.

Yet might the Asses counsel have done Balaam good, though not her self. Let not the hearer become a Judge, and turn his pew into a tribunal. What would such men have said, if they had heard Solomon preach after all his scandalous sins? Say thou with Samuel, Speak Lord, for thy servant heareth; and not, Hear Lord, for thy servant speaketh; and what speaks he, but judgment on the Preacher? It is enough for me to eat my own dinner, not to mark how much he eats that dressed it. Indeed I would have every Prophets life a martyrdom to his doctrine; for though his goodness gives not the esse of salvation, yet it may give the melius esse: this is to preach with a witness. Where the Spirit speaketh twice, by illumination and sanctification, he is more heard than where he speaketh but once: and guests mistrust that cheer, whereof the Host refuseth to taste.

3 Let no man plead simplicity, when a Beast sees an Angel; nor unhability to speak, when an Ass opens her mouth. Who can complain his own rudeness and slowness of speech, when a beast is enabled to convince her master? We excuse our own coldness, when we are occasioned to reprove impiety, by the want of eloquence: yet an Ass could do it. There is no mouth whereinto God cannot put words; yea so doth he glorify the wisdom of his own election, in confounding the prudent of this world by the foolish. Ex ore lactantium he will derive praise to his Name. He hides those things from the wise, which he reveals to babes. He that can exalt the eyes of a beast to see a spirit, can advance the dullest apprehensions, and make them capable of the mysteries of life. He chose his Apostles among none of the great Rabbins, yet whoever saw further into the secrets of heavē? The word of the Lord is able to make wise the simple. Some have capacity without honesty, and they have eyes without hands: some have honesty and small capacity, and they have better hands than eyes: some have both, but miserable are they that have neither. Say not, I hear and profit not, because I understand not; for thou art promised to have Wisdom for the asking. He that will not pray to be wise, may sit still and be a fool.

4 When the Ass had done this miraculous service, she remained an Ass still: her skin was no better after it than the rest of her kind. Many men have done God service, without any blessed recompense. Ashur was his Rod to scourge Israel: that done, they fell under a sharper lash themselves. We use rubbish to scour our vessels; when those vessels are clean, we fling away the rubbish. Achitophel could advise David well; he was the worst counselor to himself that might be. His words were the oracles of God to the State, to his own heart mere paradoxes. So we have heard some very judiciously discourse of good husbandry mean while themselves are the worst husbands in a country. They are like Bridges that help men over the stream, at last themselves rotte and sink in. When this Beast had done speaking Humana voice, she lived an Ass, and died an Ass. So many an unholy Machiavel, that hath been admired for policy, falls under Iehoiakims curse, to be buried with the burial of an Ass: he lived a Fox, but dies an Ass.

5 This Ass spake the truth: no matter who speaks, so he speaks good matter. Saepe etiam est olitor verba opportuna locutus. Sometimes a jewel is found in a dunghill; and wisdom is most applauded, where it is least expected. The Fathers have compared Humane learning to Balaam's Ass: it may sometimes sp••ke to purpose; and bring men to Church, as the Ass carried Christ to the Temple. Not the Lord, but we have need of it. Hath all Gentile knowledge a Noli me tangere set upon it? Is there nothing but Templum Domini with the Jews, but verbum Domini with us? Is there no water to be found in the Iaw-bone of a Philistian Ass? May not the Crown of the King of Ammon be set on the head of the King of Jerusalem? Saint Paul says, Be not spoiled with philosophy: some are spoiled for want of philosophy. Nor does he condemn all eloquence, but a sophisticate and meretricious eloquence. Would not the eloquence of Tully or Seneca have done good service in the cause of Zion? Indeed, that which is against Zion, is venenata facundia. Nor doth he dislike Philosophers simply, but the Philosophers of this world. Hagar may serve Abraham for procreation. The slavery of the Gibeonites is an ease to the free borne Israelites. Not Jews only, but Gentiles had a hand in the building of God's Temple. Even Pagans have their arts from heaven, and therefore may justly be improved to the honor of the Giver. If there be a Tyrian that can work more curiously in gold, silk, or purple, than an Israelite, why should he not be employed about the Sanctuary? Their heathenisme is their own, their skill is their Makers. Many a one works for the Church of God, which yet hath no part in it. Veritas ubicunque est, mea est. We may salute Athens in our way to Jerusalem, as Saint Paul did. The vessel of water, that is human knowledge, may be turned into wine, that is divine knowledge. Indeed Sic transiendum, non hic haerendum: we pass by this knowledge, we dwell not on it. What Aristippus said of other sciences and Philosophy, is more true of all other Arts and Divinity: they that study the other, and neglect this, are like Penelope's, woovers, that made love to the waiting-women. Whatsoever we learn or know, we submit and refer all to the knowledge of Jesus Christ.

6 But one Ass spake; this is no privilege for others; the rest can do no more than bray. One swallow makes no summer: nor do singular examples constitute general rules. Presumption encourageth it self by one of a thousand: and Despair will not take a thousand for one. If a thousand men be assured to pass over a foord safe, and but one to miscarry; Desperation says, I am that one. If a thousand vessels must needs miscarry in a gulf, and but one escape; Presumption says, I shall be that one. We read but of one sinner that was converted at his last hour of life: millions that had less iniquity▪ yet have found less mercy. The dissolute flatters himself, If one, why not I? Other beasts have not attempted to speak, because this one did. Yet brutish men look for heaven dying, that never looked toward it living, because one sinner sped so happily. Christ was then upon the Cross fast by him; art thou sure he will be so near thy death-bed? Lazarus and some few others were raised from their graves; the whole world else must sleep till Doomesday. Enoch and Elias were translated, and did not see death; which of all the sons of Adam had this privilege besides? Paul was rapp'd up to the third heaven before his dissolution: none were so before him, none so after him. It is no trusting upon precedents, where we have manifest rules. The rule is, Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth; least he forget thee in thy age. Seek the Lord while he may be found: this were but slender counsel, if he might be found at any time. We use to mend our ships in the harbor; and not let their leaks alone till we come into the main. We harness ourselves before we go to war; and not have it to provide in the battle. The walls of a city that are not repaired in peace, will hardly be mended in a siege. Let us speak when we should, or not look to be heard when we would.

One Ass spake in her life, one sinner was saved in his death: there was one, why should we despair? there was but one, why should we presume? In the mean time, we can never make that too sure, whereof while we live, we can never be sure enough. Grace to repent, without space, is uncomfortable to our friends. Space to repent, without grace, is unprofitable to ourselves. Grace and space, shall both comfort them, and save us.

2 PET. 2.17.

These are wels without water, clouds that are carried with a tempest, to whom the mist of darkness is reserved forever.

FRom many things doth the word of God draw comparisons, that it might speak according to our capacities. Every creature hath this emergent use, to teach us. The heavens declare the glory of God: how can we look upon them, and forget their maker? The stars not being pure in his sight, may put us in mind of our uncleanness, which reached so far as even to blemish their glory. The Sun gives us beams of obedience, while he keeps his course, knows his rising and going down. The wind breaths upon us a similitude of the Holy Ghost; which comes and goes, and no man knows whence, or whither. The dew drop upon us the memory of that dew of Hermon which fell upon the hill of Zion. The henne gathering her chickens doth (as it were) clock us under the wings of Christ. The Crane chatters to us how poorly we shall speak in death. The lilies and ravens forbid our sollicitousnesse for apparel or food. The Camel at the needles eye, is an Image of the Covetous man at heaven-gates. In the last verse, a Beast taught a Prophet to obey: a wondrous one; some have assigned her a place in the Zodiac, in the Sign of Cancer. Whereat other astronomers storming, they were asked, whether they would have Noah's Raven, or Samsons Foxes, or David's Lion, or Elisha's Bears, or Babels Dragon, placed there, rather than Balaam's wonderful Ass? Now we are come to certain Wells: out of which, if they were full of water, we might draw to quench our thirst: but they are empty, and without comfort: Wells without water &c.

These ungodly deceivers are here described by Their

- Vnprofitableness; Wells without water.
- Vnstableness; Clouds carried with a tempest.
- Vnhappinesse; To whom the mist of darkness, &c.

Their punishment is proportioned to their wickedness. A well, if it be empty of water, will be full of fog: a tempestuous Cloud is but a blustering mist: here is all mist and darkness; therefore the Penaltie is the mist of darkness. They have shadowed the light in this world, therefore no light but an uncomfortable shadow belongs to them in the world to come.

Wells without water.] A fountain to a thirsty traveler is expectatum Spectaculum, a welcome sight; but if it be without water, 'tis Infelix mendacium, a grievous mokerie. Pastors are like to Wells in diverse regards.

1 Fontes immobiles, they are wells for constancy: they keep their residence, men know where to find them. Passengers may abuse the fountains, they cannot remove them. You fetch water at these wells every Sabbath, yea even on common days when your thirst calls for it: we teach you on the Lord's day; there is no day wherein we are not ready to comfort you. Indeed you should give us leave to fill our fountains: if we do perpetually draw, and not suffer the springs to have their time of supplying; we must be empty. You sometimes shut up your conduits on the week-days, or else they would lack water: they are so full on Sundays, that they run over. Therefore we study all the week, and fill our Cisterns, that on the Sabbath you may fill your pitchers. Fishers are allowed time to mend their nets; mowers to whet their scythes: bees to gather sweetness, before we eat their honey. God's Temples be our Hives; there you are sure of our honey; yet you must not deny us the flowers, the holy Scriptures, Fathers, and other good books, together with our own meditations, out of which we suck it: and to do all this, requires time. But still we keep our orbs, and therefore are called Stars: we have our stations, and therein are Wells. It is true, that our waters do good as they run in the channels; but they are best drawn from the well-head; Dulcius ex ipso fonte bibuntur aquae. They that content themselves with reading at home, and neglect the public ministry in the Church, omit the spring, to quench their thirst at the chanell.

2 Fontes sacri, they are Wells of piety; the water of life, the word of salvation is in them. We must distinguish the Waters that be above the heavens, from the waters that are below the heavens: the well above is Fons gloriae, the fountain of glory; a spring that multiplies it self into a river; that pure river of the water of life, clear as Crystal, proceeding out of the Throne of God. The well below is Fons gratiae, the fountain of Grace; and this is Fons saliens in aeternam vitam, a well of water springing up into everlasting life. Either of them is Fons vitae, a well of life; the one inchoate, the other consummate: the one preparatory, the other satisfactory: the former a prelibation, the latter a fruition; that a well of comfort, this a river of pleasure. Indeed Christ is the well of life; without whom our thirst can never be quenched: that fountain opened to the house of David, that well of Jacob; fons irrigans terram, watering the whole face of the ground. A well of infinite depth, without bottom: of everlasting abundance, for it hath eternal springs: of satisfying virtue, for he that drinks of it shall never thirst more. This is that Fountain which supplies all the Wells, which fills all our cisterns: of whose fullness we have all received. It never failed the thirsty passenger, never offended an humble receiver, never was shut up or denied to the faithful seeker. We are His Wells; and the water he puts into us, is the word of the Gospel. With joy shall they draw water out of the wells of salvation. We are earthen vessels, yet do hold an heavenly treasure; Wells of clay, yet full of the water of life. He that refuseth the water for the wells sake, shall perish for that contempt sake.

3 Fontes puri, puti; they are wells of Sanctity, and therefore must be clean. Indeed their uncleanness cannot defile the water; it is of its own nature so pure, that it will work itself from all infection. Yet may the foulness of the glass cause men to dislike the good liquor. For the sin of Eli's sons men abhorred the offering of the Lord. If they had not been sons of Eli, yet being Priests of God, their very calling (one would think) should have infused some holiness into them. Yet may the white Ephod cover black sins: and vices, like those Spies, may be hid in the well, while there is wheat spread over the mouth of it. Who are devils, but they that were once glorious Angels? If the lantern be broken, an easy wind will blow out the light. There be commonly two buckets belonging to a Well: the one bucket draws doctrine, the other example; and this latter is more employed. Dum negligunt quod dicimus, imitantur quod agemus. I have heard of here and there a Pastor, that hath out-lived all the people of his parish: I never heard of any that hath out-lived all the sins of his parish. Yet must not the infirmities of the Wells bring the water into contempt: let none dislike the service of God for the sin of man. This were to make holy things guilty of our profaneness; and to offend God because he hath been offended.

4 Fontes profundi; they are Wells of knowledge; and of sufficient depth; skilled in the Mysteries of salvation. Shallow pits are full of mud and frogs: they may make a noise in the pulpit; but it is a harsh sound, which rather offends the ear, than profits the soul: nothing but frothy stuff comes from them. Wells are deep: the Priests lips preserve knowledge: they can tell how to resolve the doubtful, to hearten the fearful, to convince the willful, to comfort the sorrowful. They are good Physicians, and have medicines for all diseases. They are able to clear difficulties, to reconcile antilogies, to answer objections, to confute errors, to apply their discourse to all occasions. So Saint Augustine professeth of Saint Ambrose, who went from Africa to Milan to hear him; that Dum intravit quàm diserte diceret, simul & intravit quàm vere diceret. He is no babbler; neither Spermologus, qui mera vox est; nor Mataeologus, qui mera nox est. But he hath a key to fit every lock, a gracious faculty to take every ear, to pierce every soul. Moses was a Prophet learned, and that with a Non sicut; none like him in Israel. Indeed I do not like the wells that are so deep, that we can draw no water out of them: men that have excellent talents, but they lie buried; that know much themselves, and impart little to others. A man of meaner gifts by his assiduity of preaching, shall do more good, than he that breeds a Sermon, like Elephanti partum, a years conception, which being borne, only amazeth the hearers, and makes them at their wits end with admiration. We put down the bucket into these wels, hoping to draw water, and bring up nothing but air. Conceal'd learning is but like a candle in a dark lantern, or the fowlers light, to see which way his game lies. The good Pastor is light in a Crystal glass, that shines every way, to the good of men and glory of God.

5 Fontes misericordes; they are wels of pity, full of compassion; bowels that yearn for the danger of men's souls. Jeremiah had such a well in his head, or at least he wished such a well in his heart. Oh that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears. The Prophet before him, is not in this behind him; I will weep bitterly, labor not to comfort me. David contends with them both, who shall weep most; Rivers of waters run down mine eyes, because they keep not thy Law. Among all, our Lord Jesus is the chief mourner; who having no sin of his own, wept and bled for the sins of others. Obstinate offenders are dry pits: nothing can pump the water of repentance out of their eyes. For their wickedness GOD plagues the land; that thousands cry in pain, our bowels, our heads, our hearts: thus they give others cause to mourn, while their own mouths are filled with laughter. All that tempest was for Jonah, yet Jonah alone is fast asleep: that unspeakable agony of Christ was for the sins of his Disciples and chosen; yet even then the Disciples were asleep. The destroying Angels sword lays heaps upon heaps, and multiplieth his deadly wounds, and are we still dry welles, that have no tears to spend for our sins? The fire is kindled, and what shall quench it, if these fountains be without water? If there were not some Ezra's, and Joshua's, Isaiah's, Joel's, and Jeremiah's among us, pouring out their souls before God in cries and lamentations for our iniquities, what should become of us? The Lord hath mark d the houses where these mourning welles be: and if we would not only scape the judgment ourselves, but even turn away wrath from others; let our heads be fountains, and our eyes conduits, sending out floods of tears, not so much for the punishments we feel, as for the cause of those punishments which too many feel not. The crown of Preachers is the tears of their hearers: when we find you with moist eyes, we then hope there is good wrought on your souls.

6 Fontes pacifici; they are wels of peace and amity, such as reconcile feuds, and appease discords; as the water of a well serves to quench flames. In such a combustion, for want of rivers, we run to welles and conduits: yet alas, for the quieting of jars and controversies, you seldom appeal to your Pastors. A fult which St. Paul long ago condemned in his Corinthians; that they were too apt to consult Lawyers. And yet many of them, like Lachesis, wind off more in one turn, than they span in five. Were your welles full to the brim, there be buckets enough belonging to the law, to drench you. There is an holy water able to put out the fire of contention; the Gospel of peace: or of the Covenant: so was the Well of Bersheba called, the Well of an oath. Indeed when this water is offered to a peevish and perverse stomach, it turns into bitterness; and makes him swell yet more against his neighbor, yea against his Teacher. If the suspected wife were guilty, she would swell after a draught of those waters of trial: so dissolute souls swell against their reprehender. Our message is the message of peace, our Doctrine is the Gospel of peace, our office is to make peace; we are all for reconciliation; Reconciling God to you, you to God, one with another, all with everyone, everyone with all. We speak peace, we speak for peace, we wish you peace; peace with your neighbors, peace in your houses, peace in your hearts, peace in your consciences, and above all, that peace which passeth all understanding.

7. Fontes Benefici; they are Wells of charity; that do not only give good counsel with their lips, but good relief with their hands. The Loines of the poor bless them: they are fountains where the beasts of the forest drink, and the wild Asses quench their thirst. Charity becomes all men, but above all, the men of God. Yet alas, in these times, non habemus unde, we want wherewithal. What quantity of spiritual water soever be in us, there is little enough of temporal. Our springs be cut off: Sacrilege hath besieged us; as Holofernes did Betulia, and taken away our springs. While you had Wells that yielded you nothing but foul puddle-waters superstitious ceremonies instead of pure doctrines, all your channels ran into those pools, and swelled them to the brinks. Now you confess in your consciences that you draw from us the water of life, yet you deny us the water of livelihood, whereby we may subsist. We sit like disconsolate Elias, by the Brooke Cherith; and if we have sustenance, it must be by miracle, and for want of your just supply the brook is dried up. If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it any great matter to reap your carnal things? Will you not give the water of your Wells, for the water of Life? The tenth of your increase is God's portion; do you look he should give you the cup of salvation, that deny him the cup of retribution? Do you live in him, and yet fear not to defraud him? The Priest was wont to give alms, now he must be glad to receive it. If all his means can reach above necessity, to buy but one book to his study, one spring to his Well; when that fails, he must sell it to buy another: his cloth is ever too short for two coats, the world will not allow him two springs. If the poor do not find our charity, it is because we are sick of their own disease, Poverty. Quomodo sint benefici qui coguntur esse egeni? Yet howsoever our temporal waters fail, God grant our springs of grace to hold, that you may be saved.

Sine aqua. Thus Pastors should be like Wells, but these false teachers are wells without water. A blind guide, an ignorant Physician, a candlestick without light a penury without provision, a well without water, is a miserable privation. When the thirsty traveler, after much labor and grief, spies a fountain, he rejoiceth but coming to it, and finding it dry, his joy is turned into sorrow, and he is ready to curse it for such a mockery; as our Savior did the fruitless fig-tree, when he was hungry. Suppose, we are thirsty and would drink, foul and would wash, hot and would be cooled, our houses are on fire, and we would have them quenched; if we come to the well with our buckets, and find it empty, we know not whither our grief or indignation be greater. When we are to build a house, we first look to the conveniency of water, and refuse to dwell in a dry land. Yet whether the Pastor that should moisten our souls, be a well without water, a formal fountain with never a spring to feed it, we examine not. We love a Physician with abundance of medicines, a Lawyer with variety of tricks, a Merchant with choice of wares, a rich man full of moneys: we affect abundance in all perishable things. But for the water of life, so little serves us, that we do not mind whether the Well be full or empty. But indeed, while the clouds above are restrained, the Wells below will be soon dried. Unless the Spirit of grace distill down his holy dew into the hearts of his ministers, all will turn to barrenness, and the visible Church appear like a wilderness.

1. Let all this teach us to thirst for the water of these Wells, as the Hart pants for the river when he is embost: Or as David longed, O that one would give me drink of the water of the Well of Bethlehem: or as the woman of Samaria did, for the water not of Jacob's Well, but of Jesus Well, Lord give me this water, that I thirst not. There is no corporal appetite so violent as thirst; when the extremity of heat hath wrought upon the radical moisture. Victorious Samson complains of it; yea even that almighty Samson, Christ himself on the cross cries, Sitio, I thirst. How sensible are we of this want in our bodies: yet our souls are dry, and we neither moisten them, nor pity their thirst. He is a rare man that never drinks till he be thirsty: nay, it is too common a fault, not to stay for any such occasion. Men drink before they are dry, they drink until they become dry: and thirst overtakes drunkenness; as fools run into the river to avoid a shower of rain. But for this living water, a little draught on the Sabbath is enough for all the week. My soul longeth for thee, saith David, as the thirsty land; that opens it self in rifts and crannies, as if it would devour the clouds. Tot linguae, quot fissurae so many chops, so many mouths, as it were crying to heaven for moisture. Blessed are they that thirst after righteousness, for they shall be satisfied.

2. Let us duly prize and esteem the water of these Wells: It is an unhappy way of learning, when we will not know the worth of a benefit, but only by the want of it. Three kings were confederated to make war upon Moab; and they were not sooner come into the parching wildes of Edom, than they are ready to die for thirst. If there were channels, yet no waters: the scorching beams of the Sun had dried them up, and left them rather ditches than rivers. How precious now had a cup of cold water been? There is a season, when so poor a benefit will not be poorly valued. Even with this may a soul be comforted, even for this shall a soul be rewarded. We read of a king, that sold himself and his City for a draught of water. This caused three kings to walk down and visit one poor Prophet. Religion and necessity are (either of them) able to humble the stoutest heart: either zeal or need will make a Prophet honored. O what are the greatest monarchs of the world, if they want but water to their mouths? What can their crowns, and plumes, and rich arms avail them, when they are abridged of that which is but the drink of beasts? Therefore with dry tongues and lips do these three Princes confer of their common misery. So highly is water esteemed, that some Philosophers have thought it a kind of Seminale Principium: Aqua, quasi, A qua omnia.

Now what is elemental water to the water of life? What is a corporal thirst to the souls necessity? The Jews smarted for vilepending it, when they were driven to wander from sea to sea, and from north to east, to seek it; their young men and fairest virgins fainting for thirst. Our forefathers would have been glad of a concealed fountain, some few drops of this water; we have full Wells, yea, rivers and streams, yet let it run at wast. We come to Jacob's well, but bring no pitchers with us: our ears are at Church, our hearts are at home. The waters of the Sanctuary grow and flow, from the ankles to the knees, from the knees to the loins, from the loins up to the neck: but we have not vessels to receive it. Either to this Well you come not, or come and drink not, or drink and digest not: but 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, aut bibendum, aut abeundum. This fountain is the word of comfort; but many can find no sweetness in it, because their palates be made so out of taste by the world. Christ refused the vinegar, because it was vinegar: these men taste the powers of the world to come, and will none of it, though it be the water of life. As Hannibal leading his army through the deserts of Africa, came to a fountain; Exercetque sitim, & spectato fonte recedit. Or as David would not drink the water of Bethlehem, because it was the price of blood: and yet this did cost no blood, but the blood of Jesus Christ.

3. Do not abuse these Wells, nor defile the waters: a troubled fountain cannot look clear. Of all men, the Minister should be suffered to lead a quiet life, undisturbed, free from vexations. Vae illi qui minxerit in fontem: there is a woe due to him that polluteth the fountain, that shall cast aspersions on his Pastor, to disable him in the hearts of his hearers. When Homer had spent many lines in disparaging the body of Thirsytes, he briefly describes his soul thus, that he was an enemy to Vlysses. We need say no more of a bad man; He is an enemy to his Pastor; that is enough to brand him. While thy Preacher is studying to apply the warm blood of Christ to thy heart, thou art studying to vex the best blood in his heart. We take care to save your souls, and many of you take care to molest our souls. While you deny us due maintenance, respect, and peace, you put us to spend that time in temporal provision for our bodies, which we should and would spend in spiritual comfort for your consciences. Supply us with springs, hearten us with encouragements, trouble not our waters, and we shall be to you the wells of salvation.

Clouds that are carried with a tempest.] In this comparison is shadowed out their variableness; where we have three considerations. First, the fitness of the metaphor or similitude. Secondly, the levity of these hypocrites, that are carried with a puff. Thirdly, the event of their dealing, which is to promise a shower, and yield nothing but a Tempest.

For the metaphor, it is frequent in holy Scripture. Drop thy word toward the South. My doctrine shall drop as the rain upon the tender herb, my speech distill as the dew and showers upon the grass. First, Clouds are made to contain water, and Preachers should be fitted and filled with wholesome doctrine. Secondly, Clouds are drawn up by the Sun, and Teachers called to that holy profession by the Sun of righteousness. Thirdly, Clouds are nearer to heaven than common waters, and Ministers are advanced nearer to the secrets of God than other men. Fourthly, Clouds hang in the air after a strange manner, and Preachers live in the world, in a wondrous sort: all the winds of the earth, and furies of hell, band against them, yet still they are supported by their ordainer. Fifthly, Clouds are set to distill rain upon the dry places of earth, and Preachers to satisfy the thirsty soul. To give drink to the thirsty, is in other men Debitum Charitatis in us Debitum justitiae. A necessity is laid upon us, and woe unto us, if we yield not the former and the latter rain; that God's ground may fructify. The rain coming down, returneth not again, but watereth the earth, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater. So the word of God shall never return void, but accomplish the thing whereto it is sent: not a drop from these Clouds shall be lost: but will either work to the confusion of them that resist it, or to the conversion of them that embrace it. The ground where these showers fall, must yield either flowers, or weeds; and so be either blessed, or nigh unto cursing. If they fall upon a proud heart, like some great mountain, off they glide, and leave it barren: if in the valley, an humble heart, they dwell there, and make it fruitful. As that royal Prophet sings; Thy waters stand in the valleys, and they grow thick with corn.

But how can it be conceived, that the clouds above, being heavy with water should not fall to the earth suddenly, seeing every heavy thing descendeth? It cannot be denied, but the clouds are heavy: yea the very winds, which are lighter than clouds, have their weight. Philosophy is here too defective; all the human learning in the world cannot give a sufficient reason for this. Only the word of God decides it: Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters; and let it divide the waters from the waters. This was God's ordinance in the creation; and such is his providence in the disposition of the clouds. He bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds, and the cloud is not rent under them. There he had them hang, till he that called them up, sent them down. There are those bottles of rain, as it were in orbe non suo, thin as the liquor they contain: there they move up and down; and when his finger crusheth them, they drop again to their own place. By virtue of this command, the waters hang in the clouds, and the clouds in the air, and need no supporters. He can as easily hang water in the air, as he can hang the earth upon nothing. Some by that firmamentary division of the waters, have dreamt of a watery heaven above the stars, for the better mitigation of their heat. But the celestial bodies are of no fiery or elemental nature: nor have they such heat in them, as needs to be refrigerated. By the firmament is meant the Air: the waters below it are seas and floods: the waters above it are the Clouds. Which helps us to understand that of the Psalm; Praise the Lord, ye waters that be above the heavens: that is, above the lower region of the air. So, the Lord thundered in the heavens, with hailstones and coals of fire. Now thunder, lightning, and hail, come not properly from heaven, but from the air.

In sum; Priests are Clouds; this is no ignoble Title. How often did the Lord appear to Moses in a Cloud? How long did he walk with Israel in the pillar of a Cloud? I will appear in the cloud before the mercy-seat. The Cloud was a figure of Christ; without whom we should never have seen God appear in the mercy seat. When the glory of the Lord filled the Tabernacle, the Tent was covered with a Cloud. Our glorious Savior sits upon a white cloud: Saint Paul speaks of a Cloud of witnesses. It is a happy Church that is encompassed with a cloud of Preachers. Mans heart is a plot of ground; which before it be fruitful, must suffer a spiritual husbandry. First, It must be plowed, and broken up: it is so cold and stiff a clay, that it needs undergo the coulter. God was fain to shake the earth before he could move the Iailors heart. When the terror of sin and Judgment works upon the natural conscience, then the plow-share reacheth the quick. Secondly, once plowing is not sufficient; for it will quickly harden again of it self; there must be a second stirring. In prosperity it will never tell truth; but rather flatter that it may be flattered. But when the ground is softened, then put in the plough: the heart broken by affliction is fit to be tilled with it the word. Thirdly, cast in the seed with joy and hope of a blessed harvest: sow it with the precious promises of Jesus Christ. Fourthly, then come the clouds and they do their seasonable office, in pouring down kindly showers, both to raise and ripen the fruits of grace. Fifthly, after all this, weeds will grow: therefore we must fall to weeding, and hook out our lusts with the sickle of repentance. Thus the valleys shall stand thick with corn, till we rejoice and sing.

The next point is their levity; Carried with a wind. Some are not stable in the truth, but it is not possible for any man to be constant in errors; for the next fancy will take him off from the former. As wanton children are won to be quiet with change of toys; so the devil is fain to please such men with variety of crotchets. He forgets what he hath been, understands not what he is, and knows not what he will be. But like a banished man, when his back is upon his own covntrey, all the world is his way. He is fled, with Jonah, from the word of God, and now it matters not whither he makes his voyage. From a Brownist to Anabaptism, from an Anabaptist to Arianism, from an Arian to the Family of love: still he is carried with a tempest; and does not more eagerly embrace the air where he is first a Cloud gendred, than he rails on it when he is removed. He is water, and water hath ever been an emblem of Inconstancy. So Jacob called his son Reuben, unstable as water. Whether it be a cloud above, or a billow below, it is carried with the wind. There is a rack-wind, and that drives the clouds: there is a ground-wind, and that tosseth the waves. So Saint James compares the inconstant to awave driven and tossed with the wind.

To exemplify this unstableness. First, Water is continually running from coast to coast, and as it changeth currents, it changeth name and colors. Names according to the countries it saluteth. Colours; for in puddles it is black, against rocks foamy, in the sea green, in sweet rivers clear. Such a cloud as here is meant, is at Rome a Papist, at Munster an Anabaptist, in England a Protestant. Indeed he tarries nowhere; for his heart is but an Inn, and all his thoughts travellers: if they lodge for a night, they are gone in the morning, and leave him without taking leave of him. Secondly, water runs to the lowest parts, seeking out holes and receptacles where to hide it self. So these wavering clouds love corners and private conventicles, and leave the beaten way, though it lead directly to heaven. They scorn with every common understanding to go through the gate, and therefore will climb over the wall. Thirdly, water poured out leaves nothing behind in the vessel: oil and wine will leave their favor, and milk the color: but there is no remaining sign of water that it was there. So their steps be fluide, and no more stable is their memory; ⁱ either buried in oblivion, or famous for infamy. A cloud both alters the shape with the wind, now appearing like a house, then like a camell: and the seat with the wind, now hovering over this climate, then over that. They are wax ready tempered, that soon taketh a new impression. Or chaff, which when the good grain sinks down and is saved, becomes the sport of the wind. Their plague is answerable, They shall be chased as chaff of the mountains before the wind, or the thistle-down before the whirlwind. The tempest hath driven them to and fro upon earth, at last it shall blow them to hell. They are like loose teeth in the mandible, of more trouble than use. They set themselves for so many things, that they are good for nothing. A Pluralist in religion is indeed a neutralist; and seeks the truth by all ways but that where he is sure to find it. The moon spake to her mother to get her a coat made; but no tailor could fit her: for if he made it fit for her in the change, it would be too little in the full: if it were fit for the full, it would be too large for the wane: so we must have for every day a new coat, or none. The inconstant soul is as hard to suit: only, after the change of many places, there is one that will hold, the place of darkness: after the change of many fashions, there is one that will last, a coat of torment. But for us, let us stand fast in the faith, and bold that we have, that we may never lose our Crown.

Carried with a Tempest.] They promise a shower, and bring a storm. This is their mockery: they have four inconveniences of the Clouds.

1 They hinder the Sun from so clearly extending his beams to comfort the earth. An Antichristian Priest is a cloud gotten before the Sun; whose very doctrine tends to darken the light. That Ignorance makes Saints; how much is hell beholding to them for such an opinion? They call that the mother of devotion, which was indeed the daughter of transgression. We use to say for the body; If nature lose some vigor or virtue in one sense, she recompenceth and mends it in another: they that see ill, hear the better: and he that wants his smelling, hath the better taste. But if the soul lose her eyes, she will hardly find the way to heaven: nor can we say, any faculty is improved, any grace advanced in her, for being blind. There is a woe to them that withhold the truth in unrighteousness. Not sanctity, but Iniquity is the child of darkness. Sin was begot in secret, betwixt Satan and Eve: and Vice is the brood of Nyx and Acheron, say the Poets.

2 Clouds are unthankful: for they are drawn up by the Sun, and set in the lower region of the air: there being placed, they not seldom dishonor that Sun which exhaled them, by darkening his refulgent beams. I do not say that false Teachers are called by Christ: they rather prefer themselves without invitation; making the Church a market, and buying their places; and those too often, of eminency: which they fill, like clouds, with a blustering and stormy presence. But in the mean time they obscure that light, which the Sun of righteousness would give to his Church by better instruments. Thus they have Loca Christi, and Arma Antichristi: and most ingratelously dishonor that Name by which they would be called.

3 Clouds do harm when they vent themselves in a Tempest: their moisture is not so profitable, as their violence is hurtful. They that never preach but in thunder, whose words be flashes of lightning; hell and damnation being almost the period of every sentence, are lurida, turbida, horrida nubila, black, pitchy, and pernicious clouds; presenting the face of God tempestuous, and the brow of heaven cloudy: for so we call the frowning, a cloudy forehead. These are Nubigenae, engendered of clouds, as Poets write of the Centaures. They that hang their faith on such men's lips, do but like Ixion, embrace a cloud instead of Juno. Fabius Maximus resolving to prolong the war, waited on Hannibal's progress, and encamped himself on the high grounds. Terentius gave Hannibal battle, and was put to the worst: but then Fabius came down the high grounds, and got the day. Whereupon Hannibal said, he ever thought, that same cloud which hanged on the hills, would at one time or other give a Tempest. So these Clouds never spend themselves, but with a storm to the Church of God.

4 They are unprofitable clouds; Nubes sine aqua, as Jude calls them; empty bottles, which promise the thirsty earth relief, and have never a drop in them. Or if they have any water, they let it fall where it can do no good. As sometimes we have seen dry pastures and chopped grounds, as it were with open mouths calling upon the clouds for rain: anon a cloud gathers, and comes down; but where? It misseth the needy fields, and falls in a dirty lane: balking the place where it is expected, and fouling the way where it might be spared. This the natural clouds do by God's disposing: but I speak of rational, willful, spiteful clouds: Many rich men are such condition'd clouds: they have store of wealth, and some they will part with: but it shall be to such as have no need of it; and that either for fear, or favor, or in hope of honor: which is in the proverb, pouring water into the sea. But to the poor, distressed, and thirsty souls, they will not afford a drop. While they live, they will empty a bag to the Lawyer; which is to fall in a dirty lane. When they die, they make rich men their heirs and executors; not in imitation of God, To him that hath shall be given: but to witness their dear regard of money; which when they can keep no longer, they bequeath to them that will keep it: as if they durst trust anything sooner than their Maker. So do they love the world, that they love all them that love it: and when the hand of death crusheth these Clouds, they fall into a quagmire.

You see by this time what clouds they are, against which our Apostle inveighs. Nubila procellosa, tempestuous clouds; that raise storms and factions, and trouble the peace of the air. Nubila picea, black clouds; that turn day into night by their errors. Nubila coelivaga, wandering clouds; that never keep any station. Nubila fictitia, dissembling clouds; that promise moisture, and have none. Nubila liventia, malicious clouds; that intend nothing but mischief. Nubila fatna, foolish clouds; that make mire, rather than cause fertility.
