Project Note – V2

This Work is Licensed Under 4.0 International (CC BY-NC-SA 4.0)

The initial content of this document was downloaded from the Early English Books Online (EEBO-TCP) website. The books were transcribed in a character for character manner and since there was no standard spelling during that time, it can be a bit cumbersome to read, with variations such as "unlesse", "vnlesse", and "vnles" appearing regularly.

With that in mind, this project is intended to clean up those books as much as possible and make them more accessible to the interested reader. A list of variant spellings and their corrections was utilized to clean up the text, but this is only as comprehensive as the list itself. Because of the nature of the original transcription, some words have missing characters or places where the original language (e.g., Greek) was not transcribed. The original text also contained linked footnotes and these have not been incorporated. Included in these works are some, but very limited text taken from other public domain sources.

Although this is admittedly no substitute for a properly proofread and scholarly edition, we believe that the result is a body of work which is far more accessible, particularly for searching and reading, than its predecessor (though our thankfulness for EEBO-TCP cannot be expressed.) The documents have been cleaned and presented to the best of our present ability, in what we hope is a pleasing and useful format for the vast majority of Christian brothers and sisters who desire to access and read these spiritually nourishing works.

For the sake of this collection, it has attempted to take a traditional theological as well as historical approach to Puritan research, meaning that, while there were some Arminian Puritans, those have been omitted if observed, and also, while there were other Non-Conformists that were Catholic, Quaker, Brownist, Pilgrims, etc., this collection has tried to observe only works from theologically reformed Puritans; Baptist, Presbyterian, and Congregational Non-Conformists; as well as CoE or Anglican clergy that were sympathetic or assistive to the Puritan cause. Furthermore, this collection only contains works from the period between 1500-1700, not just because that is the standard historical period of Puritanism, but because this is also the limit of the works found on EEBO-TCP. This is not an exhaustive collection of Puritan/Non-Conformist works, but a collection of those pertinent works which were located on EEBO-TCP which enables the searching thereof by their conversion from facsimile to text. The reason the alphabetical flow of the authors in these titles are not perfectly in order, is because many names were added well into the compiling of these texts, and we had to choose between prolonging publication to start over, or continue and publish with the names somewhat out of order.

Finally, please forgive our eagerness in the midst of imperfection in offering such an errant publication. Given the sheer number of texts, time constraints, and other duties; this is the best we can offer for now; yet, knowing the spiritual treasures within these pages, we pray that this effort, though feeble, will still result in the edification of His Church, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, to the glorification of our Gracious God. All of the text and titles included in these works are in the public domain, and can be used in any way; for profit or otherwise, by anybody or entity. Only this specific derivative and creative work is bound by the creative common license listed above. -- Soli Deo Gloria

EX IGNE RESVRGIT VIRTVS

LONDON, Printed by RICHARD BADGER for IACOB BLOOME, MDCXXXIII.

TO THE TRULY NOBLE, AND WORTHILY HONOVRED, S^{IR} HENRY MARTEN KNIGHT; IVDGE OF HIS MAIESTIES HIGH Court of the Admiraltie, and Dean of the Arches Court of Canterbury.

Noble SIR,

THE Merchant that hath once put to SEA, and made a prosperous Voyage, is hardly withheld from a second Adventure. It hath been my forwardness, not without the Instinct of our Heavenly Pilot, the most Blessed Spirit of God, to make one Adventure before: For he that publisheth his Meditations, may be well called an Adventurer. God knows what return hath been made to his own glory: If but little, (and I can hope no less, though I have ever prayed for more) yet that hath been to me no little comfort. I am now put forth again, upon the same Voyage, in hope of better success. For my Commission I sue to You: who have no small power, both in the deciding of Civil differences, and in the disposing of Navall affairs, and matters of such commerce: being known well worthy of that Authority in both these Ecclesiastical and Civil Courts of Iudicature: That You would be pleased to bless my Spiritual Trafficke with Your auspicious Approbation. I dare not commend my own Merchandize: yet, if I had not conceived somewhat better of it, than of my former, I durst not have been so ambitious, as to present it unto You; of whose clear understanding, deep judgment, and sincere integrity, all good men among us have so full and confessed an experience. Yet besides Your own candid disposition, and many real encouragements to me Your poor servant; this may a little qualify my boldness, and vindicate me from an over-daring presumption: That my aim is Your Patronage, not Your Instruction; Not to inform Your wisdom, which were to hold a taper to the Sun: but to gain Your acceptance and fair allowance: That under Your Honor'd Name, it may find the more free entertainment, wheresoever it arrives: which (I am humbly persuaded) Your Goodness will not deny. That Noble Favor of Yours, shining upon these my weak endeavors, will encourage me to publish some maturer thoughts, which otherwise have resolved never to see the light. The sole Glory of our most Gracious God, the Edification and comfort of his Church, with the true felicity of of Your self and Yours, shall be always prayed for, by

Your ever honor'd Virtues humble and thankful servant, THOMAS ADAMS.

AN EXPOSITION UPON THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERALL OF THE HOLY APOSTLE, Saint PETER. CHAP. I.

VER. I.

Simon Peter, a Servant, and an Apostle of JESUS CHRIST, to them that have obtained like precious Faith with us, through the righteousness of God, and our Savior JESUS CHRIST.

THE Books of the New Testament have been distinguished into three kinds: Historical, Doctrinal, and Prophetical. 1. Historical; such as contain the Birth, Life, Death, and Resurrection of our Blessed SAVIOR, with his Divine Sermons, and Miraculous Actions; written by the four Evangelists: Seconded by the memorable and famous Story of the Acts of his Apostles. 2. Doctrinal; such as concern our instruction in the knowledge of Christ, and teach us the way of salvation. These are the holy Epistles of Saint Paul, S. James, S. Peter, S. John, and S. Jude. 3. Prophetical; such as foretell the estate and condition of the Church militant to the end of the World: of which kind is the Revelation of S. John the Divine Yet doth not this distinction debar the History from altogether meddling with Prophecy, nor the Prophetical part from touching upon History, nor the Doctrinal part from the use of both the former. So the Evangelists, that wrote the story of Christ, do nevertheless abound with heavenly Doctrines, containing in them the life-giving Sermons of that Supreme Bishop of our souls: Neither are they without plentiful predictions; as of the destruction of Jerusalem, and the end of the world. So the holy Apostles, in their Epistles, together with their doctrines, by which they build up the Church, do also prophesy of future things: as S. Paul doth of the Calling of the Jews, and of the coming of Antichrist; and the last Chapter of this present Epistle, hath been aptly called, Saint Peters Prophecy.

Concerning which, there have arisen two ancient doubts, like clouds to obscure the light of the Truth. Some have questioned the authority of this Epistle: others, the Author. 1. For those that have contradicted the Authority of it, excluding it out of the number of the Canonical Books, Eusebius, Nicephorus, Jerome, and Gregory, make mention of them. They tell us of some such quarrellers, they tell us not their names: Such there were, but who they were, they do not say. Therefore, let their opinion be buried in the dust with them: for, this Book lives while they are dead. 2. For the Author, some have denied it to be S. Peters: and to this error, the supposed diversity of the style hath induced them. As if the same Author might not diversify his style upon due occasion, according to the difference of the matter, or argument upon which, or difference of the person to whom he writes. The Epistle to the Hebrews is of a more accurate style, than S. Paul's other Epistles: Yet by an universal consent it is agreed upon to be S. Paul's. Certainly, the Author of this must be some grand Impostor, if he were not one of those three Apostles, that were present at Christ's transfiguration upon the Mount: where he solemnly professeth himself to have been. The three witnesses of Christ's Clarification there, were Peter, and James, and John: No man affirms James or John to be the Author of this Epistle, therefore it must be Peter. And if he were not the Author of it, with what impudence should another Secretary call himself Simon Peter, a servant and an Apostle of Jesus Christ? To allege, that Paul, writing to the Galatians, doth plainly testify, that he withstood Peter to the face, and that he was to be blamed: therefore it is not likely, that Peter would write so fair an Encomium of Paul, & ita admirandum praedicare. Such Critics are far from the sanctified spirit of an Apostle: for they, without respect to their private affections, or particular praises, sought only the truth of the Gospel, and the glory of their Master JESUS CHRIST.

The Majesty of the HOLY GHOST appears in every line of it; therefore the Authority is indubitate. The Name prefixed warrants it to be S. Peters, therefore we cannot deny the Author. It remains only, that we directly come to the matter: In which proceeding, the Spirit of Illumination direct me to write, and the Spirit of Sanctification direct you to read; that all of us, believing and living according to the holy Doctrine delivered, the Name of God may be glorified, and our dear souls everlastingly saved, through our Lord Jesus Christ, Amen.

Simon Peter, a servant, and an Apostle of JESUS CHRIST, &c.

WHerein we find a double description: 1. Of the Author, who sends; Simon, &c. 2. Of the Persons to whom this Salutation is sent; To them that have obtained, &c. First, the Author describes himself by his

- Name, Simon Peter.
- Condition, a Servant.
- Office, an Apostle.
- Master, JESUS CHRIST.

In nomine humilitas, in conditione sanctitas, in officio dignitas, in domino majestas. His Name shows him humble, his Condition holy, his Office gracious, by his Master who is glorious.

Simon was his proper name given him an his Circumcision. It is observable, that this Simon was commonly a happy name in the Scriptures. There was Simon Zealots, a zealous man: Simon a Tanner, this Simon's Host, a charitable man: Simon of Cyrene, that helped Christ to bear his Cross, a compassionate man: and Simon Peter, a sanctified man. Not that grace is tied to names; for there was a Simon Magus, a Sorcerer, a Witch, little other than a devil: but the favor of God makes any name as happy. No man hath now the mystery of his fortune written in his name. Names are not Prophetical, Much less magical. The Civil use of names is for distinction; Nomen quasi Notamen: the religious use hath by good antiquity been observed at our Baptism.

So oft as thou hearest thy own name, call to mind the Covenant between God and thyself in holy Baptism; when God promised on his part to be thy God; thou on thy part to forsake his enemies, and to dedicate thyself to his service. It is a wretched forgetfulness not to remember thy own name. What can he remember that forgets himself? It is pity the Sacramental water was ever spilled on such a face; as forgets himself to be a Christian.

Whatsoever thy name be, let thy heart be Simon's. It is said, to signify Hearing, or Obeying: so do thou confess, profess, love thy Master and Maker. Confess him Ore, with thy mouth: profess him Opere, with thy life: love him Corde, with thy heart. So, thou shalt have Simon's omen, though not Simon's nomen. Albeit thou be nor called Peter, thou shalt be saved with Peter. Thus shall Christ bless thy name with a good report upon earth: The memory of the just is blessed; with better reward in heaven, by Writing it in the Book of Life.

Peter, was his sir-name, given him by Christ himself, who was in this sense his God-father. When JESUS beheld him, he said, Thou art Simon, the son of Iona, thou shalt be called Cephas, which is by interpretation a Stone, or Peter. S. Matthew seems to insinuate that Christ gave him that name in allusion to that Rock of his confession. Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock I will build my Church: But then, Peter seems to be that Rock on which the Church is built? Not so; Peter in making this confession, Tu es Christus; Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God; either spake, Prae caeteris, as Ambrose, or Pro caeteris, as Augustine; before the rest, or for the rest: He was Prolocutor, or mouth of the rest. Therefore what was promised to Peter, pertained to the whole College of the Apostles. To this exposition runs the stream of the Fathers. If thou confess with Peter, & tibi dicetur, Tu es Petrus: Petra, est quisque Christi discipulus: If thou be Christ's disciple, thou art Peter, thou art a Rock Petrus à Petra, non Petra à Petro: quomodo non à Christiano Christus, sed à Christo Christianus vocatur. Peter is derived from the Rock, not the Rock from Peter: as Christ fetcheth not his name from a Christian, but a Christian from Christ. But, we are built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief Corner-stone; our foundation is in heaven. Aristotle said, that a man is Arbor transversa, a tree growing with the root upward: So the Church is, Domus transversa, a house turned upside down: for the foundation is above. Other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is, JESUS CHRIST. Peter in this kind is not the Rock of the Church: time was, he seemed rather to be a wave, than a Rock, when Christ said to him; Get thee behind me Satan, thou art an offense unto me. Let Peter have his desire, and his Master shall not die; so Peter himself and the whole world had been lost. This defeats the Pope of his infallibility of judgment.

Thus Peter is a name of addition, imposed by our Savior on Simon. Diverse of the Papists have derived the authority of changing the Popes names from hence: Because the two chief Apostles had their names changed; Saul into Paul, Simon into Peter. But Lorinus the Jesuit denies this to be the ground of their mutation. Indeed there is a double difference, in Autoritate & Effectis, for Authority, the Apostles changed not their own names, but GOD; for effects, their natures were changed with their names: a Privilege that few Popes had the happiness to demonstrate. Though Sylvius elected Pope, could disclaim his wanton and idle books, and seem to promise future gravity: Aeneam rejicite, recipite Pium; forget Aeneas, and receive me a Pious father, yet the new names have not altered the old conditions: they have proved the same men still. The first alterer of Popes names is held to be Sergius 2. whose proper name was Os porci, a Swines countenance: the name would have served, had he separated his swinish properties. Divers other followed, but they lost not their former vices. One of their own brings a testimony against them; that of all Christians Italians are the worst, of all Italians the Romans, of all Romans the Priests, of all Priests the Cardinals, and commonly the most lewd Cardinal is chosen Pope, yea, some have objected, and they stick not to grant; Hominem non Christianum posse esse Romanum Pontificem; a man that is not a member of Christ, may yet be head of his Church.

Though change of names import an excellency of grace, yet not a singularity, James and John were Sons of thunder: were none so but they? Barnabas, Son; of consolation; none so but he? Peter a Rock; no rock but Peter? Israel called so because he was strong with God; yet so was Abraham, and MOSES, whereas some observe that our Apostle puts in two words into the Epigraph of this Epistle, which he left out in the former; Simon and Servant. And that our SAVIOUR did usually chide him by the name of Simon, but commend him by the name of Peter, whence they observe, it was Simon that erred, not Peter, his Person, not his Office. So Mark 14.37. Simon, sleepest thou? And in his confirmation, Simon thou Son of Jonah, lovest thou me more than these? repeating that word Simon thrice. But they forget that Matth. 16. Get thee behind me Satan; not Simon, but Satan. Indeed Peters name was not changed, but only he had one added: he was still Simon, but withal Peter. Abraham was not afterward called Abram, but Abraham: But Peter still was called Simon. So here he stiles himself; Simon Peter. The Jesuits say, he was always after called Peter, I cannot call them the fathers of lies, that were to do the Devil wrong; but the sons of lying. I am sure, he is many times after called Simon.

But will they now disjoyne these two names in one man? I wonder, when Simon sinned, whether Peter was guiltless! If Os porci had been damned, what would have become of Sergius secundus? Thus the poor Shepherd said to the great Bishop of Coleine; admiring his Pomp as a Prince, when his calling was but a Bishop: some replied, that he wore not such robes as he was Bishop, but as he was Prince. I but, quoth the Shepherd; Cùm damnatus fuerit Dux, quid fiet de Episcopo? If the Duke should go to hell for pride, what would become of the humble Bishop? Their names cannot secure their persons, not though they were Pii nominis. And yet as their lives have commonly been ungodly, so the name of Piety hath been least usurped among them: for there have been but five Pii. Res mira inter tot Pontifices solummodo quinque fuisse Pios. Here observe three circumstances.

1 The Apostles did prefixe their names to their Epistles. Indeed neither did Moses set his name before his book, nor the Evangelists, Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, before their Gospels: Because they Praesentibus scribentes, writing to those that were present, had no cause to put to their names. But the Apostles writing to those that were far off, could not well avoid it in their Epistles, but why then did Paul suppress his name writing to the Hebrews? Quia non erant amico in Paulum animo: that Apostle was not in their books, they had no good affection toward him: so that finding his name in the frontispiece they might haply have rejected the Epistle, and not vouchsafed to read it. The Apostles could not always instruct men by Sermons, as did the Prophets; nor by commentaries, as the Evangelists, nor by Dialogue, as Job: but writing to remote persons and places, they were compelled to signify their mind by letters: and the form of an Epistle requires a prescription of his name that sent it. They prefixed their names therefore that it might be known, by what authority such letters were written, and with what certainty of credit they are to be received. For as no prophecy, so no Epistle of the Scripture is of any private motion, Penna calamus, Scriba Apostolus, Dictator Spiritus Sanctus: The pen a quill, the Writer an Apostle, but the Inditor the Holy Ghost. This binds us to believe and obey these sacred writings. Qui scripta non credit, scripta sentiet: He that will not believe what is written, shall feel what is written. Lege historiam, ne fias historia: Read the history, lest thyself be made an history, and an ensample to the reading of after-times.

2 The Apostles did prefixe, not suffixe their names, according to our custom in our familiar letters. Let no man herein tax them with a proud prelation: for where God's Spirit is the dictator, we must look for no complements. And though in themselves they were the most humble men upon earth, yet being to write Apostolico jure, in the name of JESUS CHRIST, and to signify themselves such as he had chosen to lay the foundation of the Evangelical Church; it was fit and necessary, they should premention their names and Office. Paul endured all reproach to his own person patiently, yet did still magnify his Office. Ne contemptus Apostoli redundet in Evangelium: lest the contempt of the Apostle should prejudice the Majesty of the Gospel.

3 They prefixed their names, though upon them stuck some blemishes; to show that albeit themselves were guilty of manifold infirmities, yet the Gospel they delivered was pure from all imperfection. The blots of the Writers were no blots to the things written. Paul was a great sinner, Peter a greater: Apostasy in Peter, was greater than persecution in Paul; the one a sin after knowledge, the other before; the one was done of ignorance, the other against conscience: yet Peter still speaks his name. Humane pens are dipt in the oil of ostentation, not Scriptural pens: they spit in their own faces. Moses wrote his own incredulity, David his own bloodiness, Jonah his own repining at that mercy without which he had been most miserable. As if they acknowledged themselves not only humano more errasse, to have erred after the manner of men; but even impio more peccasse, to have sinned after the manner of evil men. This they did; that none of GOD'S glory might cleave to their earthen fingers. Let this teach both you and us.

You of the Laity, not to patronize your sins upon the example of others: as if you would fortify your profaneness from the infirmities of your Teachers. Lapsus Sanctorum ut non cadamus, non ut cadamus prabentur exempla. The falls of the Saints are recorded, not as warrants to encourage our wantonness; but as cautions to prevent and retard our precipices.

1. Wicked men love that in the Saints, which the Saints never loved in themselves, vices: and shall a man make their foil his jewel, their shame his glory? 2. Peccatum dicis, poenitentiam non dicis. Thou speakest of their sins, but not of their repentance. When Theodosius excused a foul fact, because David had done the like; Saint Ambrose makes this answer; Qui secutus es errantem, sequere poenitentem: Thou that hast followed David in his exorbitance, follow him also in his repentance. Hath thy mouth denied with Peter, let thine eyes weep with Peter. 3.

They look on the evil of good men, whereas they should rather look on the good even of evil men. Noah's virtues are not Chams admiration, but his drunkenness is his sport. Like flies, that skip over all the sound parts of the body, and light upon sores and ulcers. The Cloud that waited on the Campe of Israel, was light towards themselves, dark toward their enemies; it saved them, drowned the Egyptians. Let every Christian follow the light part; that shall guide him, the other will deceive him. 4. By disregard of the Ministers person, they evacuate the force of this Doctrine. Therefore GOD usually plagueth the contempt of his Preachers, by the invaliditie of his own ordinance upon their souls. When ye come to an house, salute it: and if the house be worthy, let your peace come upon it: but if it be not worthy let your peace return to you. Let us rather take the best, than make the worst, of good men's lives.

Vs of the Ministry, to preserve zeal and humility. Take heed to thyself, and unto the doctrine. Attend tibi & doctrinae: tibi, quomodo vivas; doctrinae, qualiter doceas: To thyself how thou livest, to thy doctrine how thou teachest. But still after our best endeavors, to ourselves weakness and shame, to GOD the blessing and glory, Cathedram habet in coelis qui corda docet: he hath a pulpit in heaven, that teacheth the soul, that toucheth the conscience. It is he only that mellowes the heart, and softens it with fitness for the impression of any Sermon. Thus for his name; now for His condition, a Servant. Hugo observes that he doth omit this Title in his former Epistles, which he inserts here: but I do not like his reason. Because, saith he, there he spake of persecutions and troubles, quae non oportet serviliter ferri, cum sint dignitates, which ought not to be born with slavish cowardice, being rather honors than miseries. Indeed Christ's Cross must be borne Heroico animo, with a courageous mind: but still this sufferance rather insinuates, than exempts Service; for they properly belong to all those that faithfully serve God. All that will live godly in CHRIST JESUS, shall suffer persecution. They are laid on them, as it were by a fatal kind of destiny, because they are the LORD'S Servants. For outwardly, Sunt prosperi peccatores, miseri Sancti: there are generally in the world poor Saints, and prosperous sinners. Neither is a filial service (Patientiae impedimentum, sed ornamentum, sed adjumentum;) a thing that does hinder patience, but beautify it and help it. This reason then wants the weight to be received.

Yet I confess there may be something in it, and a cause may be rendered, why the Apostle here useth that formerly omitted Title. True it is, that when GOD dictates voluntas facientis, ratio facti; the will of the Writer is a sufficient reason of the scription. But in sacris literis nil casu fit; in the holy Scriptures nothing is done by chance: every word, syllable, point, hath the efficacy: no blot ever fell from the pen of the Holy Ghost. There be reasons, though our shallow understandings cannot reach them.

1 Perhaps this may be a reason: our blessed Apostle wrote this Instante obitu, knowing his dissolution to be at hand: as he confesseth, Verse 14. Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, as our LORD JESUS CHRIST hath shown me. Therefore he comforts his own soul in this title, as old Hilarion did after him; These seventy years and upwards thou hast served the Lord, therefore now go forth my soul with joy, &c. Thou hast served the LORD in life, in death he will crown thee. LORD, now lettest thou Thy Servant depart in peace, according to thy word.

2 Perhaps in regard of others he useth it: for he writes of the coming of CHRIST to Judgment; which time shall be a blessed day to those, whose consciences can witness with them that they have served GOD. When rebels shall be cast to the prison of rebels; then Euge bone & fidelis Serve; Come thou good and faithful Servant, enter thou into the joy of thy LORD. Then all hearts shall confess; It was not in vain, nor without profit, that we have Served the Lord: for they shall be mine, saith the LORD of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels; and I will spare them as a man spareth his own son that serveth him. Then shall ye return and discern between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not. Servit Christianus, Servat Christus; man serveth GOD, GOD saveth man, when the wicked shall acknowledge the godly, with groaning and anguish of spirit; we accounted his life madness, and his end without honor: now he is numbered among the children of God, and his lot is among the Saints. Thus as on earth, Serviens ad Legem, saepe fit Index; the Sergeant at law is often made a Judge: so that ye that have followed me in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit on his throne, ye shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

3 Perhaps because the time of his Service was almost now ended; and therefore he might more boldly style himself the Servant of Christ. For, let not him that puts on his armor boast, but he that puts it off. He may now look sweetly both ways, with comfort to his life past, with joy to his reward to come. Pulchrum est ante obitum consummari vitam: It is good for a man to accomplish his life before he ends it. Beatus juvenis qui bene vivit, sed magis beatus senex qui bene vixit: The Young man is happy that lives well, but the Old man is blessed that hath lived well. Praise the Mariner that brings the vessel safe into the Haven: Blessed Soul, that hath past the apprenticeship of service, and is now gone to be made free in glory. There are two special observations involved in this Title Servant, Christ's excellency, and the Apostles humility.

1. This extolls the dignity of Christ, that so famous an Apostle creeps to him on the knees of lowliness; Lord, I am thy Servant. The world esteemed him without form or comeliness; and when they see him without beauty, that they should desire him. The Psalmist speaks in his person; I am a worm, no man: a reproach of men, and despised of the people. To the Jews a stumbling block, to the Greeks foolishness. But Peter stiles himself Servum Crucifixi, the servant of him that was crucified. Indeed the service of Christ is the honor of the Christian. Our Savior admitted and accepted this just honor: Ye call me Master, and Lord; and ye say well, for so I am. Many in the World arrogate great dignity to themselves, because so famous men are their servants. Ahasuerus might vaunt of his Vice-roys, the Turk of his Bassau's: But let all Scepters be laid down at the foot of the Lamb, all sheaves bow to the sheaf of Joseph; all crowns be subjected to him, that is crowned with unspeakable glory forever.

2. This is a clear remonstrance of Saint Peters humility; a famous Apostle; some have given him more, the primacy of the Apostles: yet what's his own Title, a Servant of JESUS CHRIST. The godly are no further ambitious, than to belong to CHRIST. There is great suit to be retained in the service of Princes: but the best is to serve the Prince of Princes. What need he wait upon a channel, that may dwell by a whole River? Or serve him that serves, when he may serve him that reigns? A poor estimation of ourselves, gives us the richest estimation with God. When thou wast little in thine own sight, wast thou not made the Head of the tribes of Israel? When thou wast little I then made thee great. Abraham says, non sum dignus: I am not worthy, &c. God dignifies him to be the Father of them that believe; Act. 1.23. When the lot was to be cast for an Apostle to supply Judas room, two were appointed; Joseph and Matthias. Joseph trinominis, of three appellations: Joseph, the son of rest; Barsabas, and Iustus, sir-named so for his equity. Yea more, he was Frater Domini the LORD'S brother. Matth. 13.55. Are not his brethren James and Ioses, &c. that is, Christ's near kinsman. Mathias but twice named in the Scriptures; both times in that one Chapter, Acts 1. yet the lot fell upon Matthias. Matthias signifies a little one: so the Gospel appointed for the day of his feast and memory, commends little ones, Mat. 11.25. Thou hast hid these things from the wise, and hast revealed them to babes, to little ones. Notwithstanding the great titles and privileges of the other, GOD sent the lot upon the little one, it fell upon Matthias. He that seems little in his own eyes, is the greatest in GOD'S account. It hath been the humble and blessed acknowledgment of the Saints, that they are servants. Though we be new borne to our fathers Inheritance, yet now we are in our Nonage. The heir, as long as he is a Child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be LORD of all. Men make difference of their friends, children, and servants; GOD none. His friends must serve. Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you, children must serve, even the Son must serve him. Every Christian soldiers Scutchion must be Patience, and his motto, I serve: yea, not only Saints, but Angels are glad of this title. Are they not all ministering Spirits, sent forth to minister for them, who shall be heirs of salvation? when Saint John would have worshipped before the feet of the Angel, he replied, See thou do it not, for I am thy fellow servant. And let me go yet higher; the natural Son of GOD, and that by an eternal generation, put on him a serviceable nature; He took on him the form of a Servant. He was so formed, so habited to service, that he endured all sorrow, and fulfilled all righteousness. Art thou better than Apostles, better than Angels, better than the Son of GOD himself, Oh proud dust, that thou despisest the title of a Servant!

I cannot so briefly pass over that, wherein we must dwell all our lives, the service of GOD; let me consider in it three things; the liberty, the dignity the reward. The liberty must be weighed both in the will of the Agent, and in the freedom of the Action.

It is a voluntary Service; constrained obedience is not worth GOD-a-mercy. The wickedest reprobates, yea the very devils must needs serve GOD; but can expect no wages, but hell. We know there is a necessity, that shall draw him against his will, whom command cannot lead with his will. A te fiet, or de te fiet; but still Fiet. Either GOD'S will shall be done by thee, or be done on thee; but howsoever it shall be done in thee. Therefore the noble disposition is led, not forced: they are slaves, whom the fear of plagues only terrifies from rebellion. But this Servant willingly puts his neck into Christ's yoke: he denies his own lusts, his own gains, his own pleasures, his own self. Behold we have forsaken all, and followed thee. A good Servant hath these properties: a quick eye, a listening care, a ready foot, a working hand, an honest heart.

A quick eye; attending the least beck of his commander. As the eyes of servants look to the hands of their masters; so our eyes wait upon the LORD our GOD. Paul speaks of 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 eye service. Col. 3.22. Servants obey your Masters, not with eye-service, as men-pleasers. This is a fault with men: but let us serve our GOD no longer, no further than he sees us: it is enough, his eye is never off our hands, our hearts, Whither shall I go from thy spirit? or whither shall I fly from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold thou art there: if I dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me: if I say, the darkness shall cover me, even the night shall be light about me. Heaven hath the presence of his glory, earth of his providence, the sea of his wonders, the darkness of his light, hell of his power; nowhere to avoid his sight. Heaven, earth, sea, hell; all places named but Purgatory; perhaps God is not there. If he fills all places, and not Purgatory; rather than doubt his Omnipresence, I will believe there is no Purgatory.

A listening ear; such a one as Eli taught Samuel to find, when God calleth; speak LORD, for thy servant heareth.

A ready foot: Fidelis obedientia nescit moras; an obedient servant makes no delays. God's spirit often useth the phrase of rising early: Abimelech rose early to tell his dream: Abraham rose early to sacrifice his Son: Elkanah and Hannah rose early to worship God: Job rose early to sanctify his children. We say with the sluggard; Modo Domine, modo; by and by, LORD: Sed istud modo non habebit modum: this same dilation hath no measure. Gratia ab officio, quod mora tardat, abest; the service shall find no thanks, that found no readiness. A good work, the longer it sticks in our fingers the less acceptable.

A working hand: the life of service is work, the work of a Christian is obedience. The Centurion describing his good Servant, said no more but thus, Mat. 8. I bid him do this, and he doth it. He that worketh not, is not God's laborer, but his own loiterer. We are all either Masters of servants, or servants of Masters; or servants to the State and commonwealth, or commanders of such servants: some may be all of these, all are some of these. We know what we require of our servants, what our Masters required of us. It were an easy thing to be a servant, if service consisted only in kissing our hands, in making curtesies, in taking wages and wearing liveries. Many wear Christ's livery, all live upon God's trencher: but most have gowty fingers, they will do no work in God's service. There is an habitual service; so the slave while he eats or sleeps, is in service still. But the actual service pleaseth God; which consists in holiness and righteousness before him. Many thus call themselves, but God doth not call them so. It is an everlasting rule, ye are his Servants to whom ye obey. There is much service in the world, but it is to a wrong Master; but such can God point out, and put out; and order it, like Jehu; when he inflicteth vengeance on the world; not one Servant of the Lord be among them. If any think to pass in the crowd, and press among God's servants, without their cognizance, the wedding garment, a question shall be asked them, whereat they shall stand speechless; How came you in hither?

An honest heart; and to make up this is requirable the accession of two things, Sanctitie and Resolution.

For Sanctitie; GOD that hath given thee a whole heart will not be served with a piece of it. Some make show Servire, when indeed they study Saevire; as Herod, let me come to worship the child, when he meant to worry the child. They are like the Philistines Temple; there is the Ark, but Dagon too. Or like the Temples of Egypt, fair without, but within full of Crocodyles. The eye is in the Pulpit, the heart in the Warehouse. Rotten kernels under fair shells: full of Herod's and Naaman's exceptives; In this forbear us. What show soever be made, oportet aliquid intus esse, there must be some hidden good within. The oake that is rotten at the heart, will never be good for building. Say to the hypocrite, as Simon Peter did to Simon Magus; Thou hast no part nor lot in this comfort: for thy heart is not right in the sight of God.

For Resolution; there must be no reasoning, no disputing; let no man dare tospeak to the Almighty, or desire to reason with God. It is too far, if with Jeremiah, any man put him to his Wherefore; wherefore doth the way of the wicked prosper? Abraham told not his wife, when he went to offer Isaac. Paul conferred not with flesh and blood, when he went to preach among the Heathen. The Jesuits commend blind obedience: and call the Novices that examine their impositions Quae ristas. They exact a condition of their inferiors, as Nahash did of the Gileadites, that they may thrust out their right eyes: otherwise allow them no covenant of peace: yea they put out both the eyes of their people. To God this blind obedience is good taken in that sense, without asking a reason. When man commands, enquire Quid, not Quis; what is bidden, not who bids. When God commands, consider, Quis, not Quid; who charges, not what is imposed. Believe what God saith, though in our thought impossible: do what he commands, though in our judgment unreasonable. Galerius maximus seeking to pervert that blessed Cyprian to idolatry, wished him before sense of punishment to bethink himself; Cave ne perias; take heed, you do not cast away yourself. His answer was short, but resolute; In re tam iusta nulla consultatio. the case is so clear that it refuses deliberation. Say, goods, liberty, life it self is hazarded, yet God can reward all. The Apostles were cited by Christ to Jerusalem, and commanded not to depart thence, but to wait for the promise of the Father, to receive the Holy Ghost: They never allege; Is not this that Jerusalem which was a provocation to anger from the first building? the slaughter-house of the Prophets? the common sink or sewer of all sins: yet wet with the blood of our Master Christ? why Jerusalem? Is not any other place fitter? no, they dispute not, but go thither with joy, what danger or unlikely hoods soever might affront them, they put on the resolution of Hester; Si pereo, pereo; if I perish, I perish. But there can nothing be lost, that we piously trust God withal.

For the liberty of this Service, know that God's servant is the greatest Freeman. He that is called in the Lord, being a Servant, is the LORD'S free-man. Bonus etiamsi serviat, liber est: malus etsi regnet, servus est: The good man is free, though he serves: the evil is bond, though he reigns. Nor is the vicious person the slave of one man: but Quod gravius est, tot dominorum quot vitiorum: which is more grievous; he hath so many masters, as he hath vices. Vis ut serviat caro tua animae tuae? Deo serviat anima tua: Debes Regi, ut possit regere; Wouldest thou have thy flesh servethy soul, let thy soul serve God; thou owest to thy King the right of government. Serve therefore willingly, and be free continually.

For the dignity of this Office, the Saints have ever had a holy pride in being GOD'S servants; there cannot be greater honor than to serve such a Master as commands heaven, earth and hell: Non reputes magnum quod Deo servias, sed maximum, quod ipse dignatur te in servum assumere: Do not think thou doest honor GOD in serving him; but think how GOD honors thee, in vouchsafing thee to be his servant. David could not study to give himself a greater style, than O LORD, truly I am thy servant; I am thy servant, and the son of thy hand-maid: and this he spake, not in the phrase of a human complement, but in the humble confession of a Christian. Yea, so doth our Apostle commend this excellency, that (if we note it) he sets the title of Servant, before that of an Apostle: first Servant, then Apostle. Great was his office in being an Apostle, greater his blessing in being a servant of Jesus Christ: The one is an outward calling, the other an inward grace: Damnatur Apostolorum unus, servorum nullus; There was an Apostle condemned, never any servant of God: Judas preached to others, not to his own heart; he healed their bodies, not his own soul; wrought miracles upon others, not upon himself; cast out devils, yet himself was cast out as a devil. All which justifies that of Samuel, To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of Rams. Prophets have been excluded; many say, Lord, Lord, we have prophesied in thy name; to whom it is answered, I never knew you; depart from me ye that work iniquity. But never were Servants excluded; for the other, their book and clergy cannot save them; It will be demanded of them at that day; Non quid legerint, sed quid egerint, non modo quid dixerint, sed quomodo vixerint. Bern. Not what books they have read, but what life they have led; not what they have taught others to do, but what they have done themselves. God by this title commends Job, the greatest man of the East: Hast thou considered my servant Job? Paul calls James the Lord's Brother, Galath. 1.19. other of the Apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother. James calls himself the servant of Christ, I am 1.1. James a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ; quite leaving out the remembrance of that other style If it were such a noble privilege to be a servant to Caesar, and free of the Roman State; that the Captain confessed, with a great sum of money he obtained that freedom: what an honor is it to serve the King of kings? The good Emperor Theodosius held it more noble, to be membrum Ecclesiae, than caput Imperii; to be a member of the Church, than head of the Empire. It is better to be God's servant, than Lord of all the world. This is the Dignity; now for

The Reward, it is immense and glorious. Bread, correction, and work are for a servant. For bread, God gives us our daily bread; we are all at his keeping. For correction, Heb. 12. he chastiseth us, because he loveth us. For work, Matth. 21. he sends us to work in his vineyard: we have from him Protection and Provision. For protection, Rom. 8.31. If God be with us, who can be against us? For provision, Luke 15.17. Even the hired servants of my Fathers, have bread enough, and to spare. But what is all this to that future glory, which was from everlastingness prepared for those servants! I know, they do not ever speed best in this world: out of a related story let me draw this conclusion in earnest. A servant convicted of some misdemeanor before a magistrate, besought some favor for his masters sake. Why, whom do you serve, said the magistrate? I serve God, said the delinquent: with that his mittimus was quickly made; away with him, he scoffs at authority: not long after a great Lord sends for enlargement of this his servant: the magistrate upon the receipt of the letters, sends in all haste for the prisoner; of whom he frettingly demands, why he told him not that he served such a Lord: The servant answered, because I thought you cared more for the Lord of heaven: you say, this is but a fable: you count him a fool that makes it a moral. O utinam tantummodo fictum, non factum diceretur: would God it were but a tale, and that our courses did not justify it well though our reward be short on earth, let us look for it with comfort in heaven. Ambrose said on his death-bed, we are happy in this, we serve a good Master. Where I am, saith Christ, there shall my servant be: and if any man serve me, him will my Father honor. If we have done good and faithful service to him, we shall hear him say to us; Well done good and faithful servants, enter into the joy of your Lord: and this joy be to us all. An Apostle: here he specifies his office. Where observe two things:

First, he joins together Service and Apostleship; and that for two reasons: 1. To distinguish and exemplify his calling: for every man that is a servant of God, is not an Apostle of Jesus Christ. No man taketh this honor to himself, but he that is called of God. There must be a Calling; or else Sin will answer when it is questioned, as Satan did when he was conjured, Act. 19.15. Jesus I know, and Paul I know, but who are ye? Christ himself did not preach publicly, till he was declared by God to be Doctor mundi, the great Prophet of the world: and had his confirmation from heaven, with Hunc audit. Neither is it enough to say, we are all Priests, Revel. 1.6. so we might say we are all kings, and turn rebels. There must proceed a mission and commission; or else whosoever runs abroad, had better have stayed at home. 2. To show that Apostleship was a matter of service; as an honor, so a burden. None are called into God's harvest, but laborers: Christ never bade us pray for loiterers and lookers on. As earthly Kings have some servants in ordinary, other extraordinary: all Christians are God's sworn servants extraordinary; so vowed in holy Baptism, to serve him all the days of our life. By professing the true faith we wear Christ's livery, and by exercise of charity, the cognizance of that livery. By this shall men know that ye are my Disciples, if you have love one to another. Princes and Preachers are God's servants in ordinary: the Magistrate is (as it were) a finger of God's hand, the Minister a Steward in his house. Though in a large sense all are the Lord's Ministers: and it is usually said to those three States, Tu supplex ora, tu protege, tuque labora: The Prince must govern all, the Priest pray for all, the people work for all. Yet strictly this office, as it hath especially the name of Ministry, so it hath the nature, for it consists in Service.

Secondly, it was the custom of the Apostles to magnify their office. So Paul to the Romans. Inasmuch as I am the Apostle of the Gentiles, I magnify mine office. And this they did the rather to weaken the credit of false intruders. Am I not an Apostle? am I not free? have I not seen Jesus Christ? Our Savior himself accepted this honor. Ye call me Master and Lord, and ye say well: for so I am. Is the term [Minister] contemptible to any? That Christ who must save you, or you shall never be saved, calls himself a Minister, Matth. 20.28. The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. If therefore men must Honorare bonum Dominum, etiam in malo servo, are bound to glorify the good master even in the evil servant: and not only to know them, but to esteem them very highly in love for their works sake: Then much more let the Elders that rule well be (yes they are, but also be) counted worthy of double honor.

Of Jesus Christ: here he declares his master, where three collections arise:

1. They were Apostles of Christ, for none ever called themselves Apostles of God the Father: because Christ himself only was Apostolus Patris, the Fathers Apostle. He had other pastors under him, but he was that Great Shepherd and Bishop of our souls. He sent others, but Him hath the Father sent.

2. Christ only hath authority to make Apostles: he chose them to the work, that could enable them to the work. Therefore none ought to take this charge upon them, unless they be either mediately or immediately called of God.

Some have no calling either of God or men, but run on their own errand.

I have not sent these prophets, yet they ran: I have not spoken to them, yet they prophesied. Let them that set them on work, pay them their wages. He that entereth not in by the door into the sheepfold, but climeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber. Either like the Sodomites they cannot find the door: or like the Jesuits they will not find the door. These later have run so far as the Indies, but who sent them? Impiger extremus currit mercator ad Indos: these merchants went not to fetch sheep to Christ's fold, but to sheere their wool and flay their skins. They were not Apostles, but Alchemists, they went to fetch gold. I have heard much talk of their miracles; if I had all faith, even to remove mountains; I could not believe them. But whatsoever their miracles were, I am sure their moralls were naught. The poor Indian refused (after all their commendations of celestial glory) to go to heaven, if the Spaniards should be there.

Some are called of GOD without man, by an immediate vocation. So were the twelve Apostles by CHRIST in his state mortal, Paul in his state immortal. Acts 9.

Some are sent of men without God: so Iason and Menelaus sought the Priesthood by unlawful means of Antiochus: so Jeroboam made his priests. Alliance, Favor, Simony have brought men of bad learning and worse living into the ministry. Which made one to say, that horses were more miserable than asses; in that horses went post to get asses preferment.

Others are sent of God by man; so Joshua was ordained of God by Moses, Timothy and Titus by Paul, the Bishops in Crete by Titus. For how shall they preach, except they be sent? They that in these days go without this warrant, climb in at the window: and that we know is no fair possession of the house. Qui ingreditur per fenestras, ejicietur e soribus: he that enters in at the windows, shall be cast out at the doors. God seals his approbation of the Churches calling, and answers it in the conversion of many souls. So that an industrious Pastor may say to his people; If I be not an Apostle to others, yet doubtless I am to you: the Seal of my ministry are ye in the Lord.

3 They came not in their own name, but in Christ's; an Apostle of Jesus Christ. We are Ambassadors for Christ, and GOD doth beseech you by us. We are sutors, not for ourselves, but for him: desiring to espouse you to one Husband, and to present you pure and chaste virgins to Christ. We preach not ourselves, but Christ, neither our own glory, nor our own gain. Not our own glory: God is glorified in our infirmities. Woe unto us if we arrogate that, whereof God is so jealous that he will not give it to another. Not our own gain, we would then take any profession rather than this. There is no calling wherein a man may not live better, and grow rich sooner. A cluster of Law is worth a whole vintage of any other profession. Indeed in Rome, and throughout the Papal Jurisdiction, where respect of gains, not of pains, guides men's dispositions; where little learning, and less honesty will serve to bear up, and to bear out much worship, more wealth: there great riches is in Clericall hands: It is their main policy, by blowing up other states to enlarge their own. Like the floods that made war against the woods; let us subdue them all, and make us more countries. But for conscience; not a Pope preached these nine hundred years; yet I hope they have not been poor. They have not Peters net to catch the souls, but Peters hook to take all the fishes that have silver in their mouths. It is said of Leo 10. that whereas others were only Popes but whiles they lived, he was Pope many years after he was dead Sacra sub extremâ si forte requiritis horâ, Cur Leo non potuit sumere; vendiderat. John 22. left behind him two hundred and fifty tun of gold: so that one wrote of him, Erat pontifex maximus, si non virtute, pecuniâ tamen maximus: Whatsoever he was in piety, he was the chief Priest in money. They inveigh against us for providing for our own lawful wives and children: yet admire themselves for providing for their harlots, and bastards, and minions. They come into the Church, tanquam ad auream messem; as it were to a golden harvest. The Friars were so long willful beggars, that they had beggared all the Christian world. The Jesuits hate all other Orders but the Capuchin: because the Capuchin asks nothing, the Jesuit would have all. Their artillery hath been thus wittily described; the Capuchin Friars shooting from the purse, the Franciscans a little wide off it, the Jesuits hitting it in the midst. I know who said, If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great matter if we shall reap your carnal things? yet let us win your souls, though we, never have your purses: the gain of one soul is greater than the Indies: For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming? yes, ye are our glory and joy.

To them that have obtained like precious faith with us, through the righteousness of God, and our Savior Jesus Christ. Here he comes to the persons to whom this Epistle is written: wherein consider six circumstances:

The

- Generalitie of the persons,
- Qualification of this generality,
- Excellencie of this qualification,
- Equalitie of this excellency,
- Means of this equality,

- Ground of this means,
- To them, all them.
- That have faith.
- Precious faith.
- Like with us.
- Have obtained it.
- Through the righteousness of God, and our Savior Jesus Christ.

To them, all them; here is the Generalitie of the persons, for the word is indefinite. This is called a General Epistle; not in a metaphorical sense, as Paul calls the Corinthians; ye are our Epistle written in our hearts, known and read of all men: or as one calls Christ, an Epistle sent us from God the Father. Or as August. in Psal. 90. conc. 2. calls the Scripture, God's Letter or Epistle sent us hither, de illa civitate unde peregrinamur: from that City to which we travel. But in a proper and usual meaning; a letter of a friend sent to his friends. It is called a general Epistle; not only: 1. Because the doctrine contained in it, is orthodoxall and catholic. 2. Nor because the use of it is general; even to us, as well as to those to whom it was written. But, 3 because it was not directed to any one man; as those of Paul to Timothy, Titus, Philemon: of John to the elect Lady, and Gaius; no, nor to one particular Church, as those of Paul to the Romans, Corinthians, &c. But to all the Saints, and worshippers of Jesus Christ, howsoever distressed, wheresoever dispersed, or whensoever despised; to all them that with humble faith, and sincere repentance seeke our Mediator.

For with God is no respect of persons; Behold that Lamb, which takes away the sins of the world. Men and brethren, children of the stock of Abraham, and whosoever among you feareth God, to you is the Word of this salvation sent. There is no difference of country, of condition, of estate. All which are exemplified by our Savior Christ, Matth. 8. upon the Jew and the Gentile; the Leper and the Centurion. For Country, the Leper was a Jew, the Centurion a Gentile. For Condition, the Leper a man of peace, the Centurion a man of war. For estate, the Leper poor, the Centurion rich. I know the greater danger is to the rich, and the sweeter promises are made to the poor: yet let not the poor presume, nor the rich despair. The one may be pauper in arca, pauperior in gratia; poor in money, poorer in grace: the other may be Dives in seculo, yet ditior in Domino; rich for this world, yet richer for the world to come. There is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, male nor female: for ye are all one in Jesus Christ. To them all, let no man deny his soul this comfort.

That have Faith. Here is the Qualification. The definition and excellency of this Grace I refer a little further. Here that we may a little conceive the nature of it, we find it often called a Hand; and that for two reasons: 1. As the hand fastens hold upon the object, to which the heart directs it: so faith apprehends Christ with his blessed merits, whereby we are only saved. 2. As the hand is fittest for operation, and doth execute that business which no other member of the body can. So faith worketh godliness, and produceth those effects which no other grace in the soul can. For this purpose it hath an Instrument, Galath. 5.6. Faith worketh by love. The hand can receive a gift of it self, but it cannot cut a piece of wood without an Instrument: but by the help of that it can divide or fashion it to pleasure. So Faith can receive Christ into the heart, that most excellent gift of God the Father: but for the duties of the Law, Faith of it self cannot produce them. Join love to it, and then it can: for Faith working by love performs all duties to God and man. Now of this Hand there be five fingers, which for methods sake we may order according to the letters.

There is Fruitfulness, it is not barren: for faith without works is dead: Nudifidians are Nullifidians. We will never take her for a true Lady, that hath not her Gentleman-usher before, and her servants following after. If you see not Repentance going before Faith, nor works attending on her, know it is not she. Opera pinguescunt fidem; good deeds do batten Faith. Fides appellata est ab eo quod fit. Faith hath the appellation from doing. Two syllables sound when we pronounce Fides. Prima est à facto, secunda à Deo. The one is derived from Fact, the other from GOD. Interrogo te utrum credas, dices Credo. Fac quod dicis, & fides est: Doest thou believe? Yes, I believe. Do what thou sayest, and that is faith. We may call Faith a Vine, Virtues the Branches, Works the Grapes, Devotion the Wine. False faith is like a sandie earth; rain it never so much, no fruit ariseth.

There is Appropriation of CHRIST: by faith he is made ours, by love we are made his. It was a piece of the Philosophers meditation, that Totum in se habet homo, qui se habet: the believer adds, Se habet qui Christum habet; Christum habet qui fidem habet, & in Christum credit. That man hath all in himself that hath himself, he hath himself that hath Christ, and he hath Christ that hath true faith. This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith: yea, more, it overcomes Christ himself. The world is overcome by faith, because it cannot withstand it: Christ is overcome by faith, because he will not withstand it. Christ in a duel overcame the Devil, Matth 4. a Canaanitish woman so overcame Christ himself. He yielded, O woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt. This is able to smooth his countenance though it be frowning; to tie his hands though they be striking. The Lion of this world raged long, and still rageth, seeking whom he may devour. The Lion of the Tribe of Judah conquered him: now Faith conquers the Conqueror. Quanta fidei vis, quae vincit Leonem, omnes & omnia vincentem? How great is the power of faith, that overcomes him who overcame all? Thus is God pleased to let Faith have an holy victory over himself: he loves this sanctified violence, and bids Faith wrestle courageously with him, like Jacob; permitting his Almighty self vinci, vinciri; to be conquered and maniled from executing deserved vengeance. So Job: Albeit thou kill me, yet I will trust in thee; and because (saith God) thou dost trust in me, I will not kill thee. It were honor enough for faith to subdue kingdoms, but to achieve the kingdom of heaven! enough to stop the mouths of Lions, but to vanquish that roaring Lion, and to resist him! enough to quench the violence of elementary fires, but to deliver from the eternal fire of hell! enough to escape the edge of men's swords, but to escape the sword of GOD'S Justice. O the matchless virtue of Faith!

There is Imitation of Christ: Faith hath two eyes; one looks to Christ's merits that we may be saved; the other to his righteousness that we may be sanctified. In Imitation there be two things, Action and Affection. Action, for it is not enough to commend and admire the pattern, but we must follow it. Affection, for it is not enough to forgive because we cannot revenge. This is no sufficient imitation of Christ's love; for he can, if he please, bruise sinners to pieces, and break them with a rod of iron. But we must forgive with a mind to forgive, and give alms with the mind of charity. Faith doth not think that heaven will fall into the lap, but endeavors to work out salvation, not without fear and trembling: and seeks to follow Christ to blessedness, the same way that he went thither.

There is trust in Christ; for there can be no faith in him without trust and dependence on him. This point thoroughly examined, would call in question many men's faith. The covetous worldling dares trust Christ to raise his body, and to save his soul, and to give him the Kingdom of glory hereafter: but he dares not trust him for his daily bread here. The fowls are fed, and the flowers are clothed by him; and will ye vex your souls with solicitous cares? If ye do, may not Christ say truly, that ye are of little faith? Shall we trust God with our jewels, and not with the box? As if thou durst not commit thy children to his protection; thou scrapest up wealth with the hazard of heaven and eternal peace: yet if thou be questioned concerning thy salvation, thou answerest, thy trust is in Christ. This is a false and deceiving faith; take heed, lest whiles he doth grant thee that wherein thou dost not trust him, worldly riches; he take away that wherein thou dost trust him, everlasting joy.

There is honoring of Christ: no man ever believed on him, but he desired to honor him. It is fit he should look for glory from us, so well as we look for glory from him. We honor the King under whom we enjoy our own with peace: we honor the Physician that preserves the health of our bodies: we honor the Soldier that defends us from our enemies: O how much more should we honor him that saves our souls! we are bought with a price, therefore let us glorify him both in our bodies and spirits, for they are his. These be the five fingers of Faith, let us lay hold on Christ in life, he may lay hold on us in death, and bear us up in his holy hand to everlasting glory.

Precious Faith; Here is the excellency of this qualification. As Athens was called Greece of Greece, so Faith may be called the Grace of Grace. It is Precious in regard of the Object, the Subject, the Act, the Effect, the Use.

In respect of the Object; which in a larger acception is the whole Scripture, whereof every parcel must be believed, without diminution or addition. Strictly this is Christ, who is not only the Word of God, but God himself in the Word. I am the way, the truth, and the life. Non est quâ ease nisi per me: non est quâ ease nisi ad me. LORD, how shall we go? Thou art our way: whither shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. There is no way but by him, no light but from him, no life but in him. CHRIST is a mutual hand; to the Father one, another to us. An hand to the Father, by which he reacheth us: an hand to us by which we reach the Father. The Fathers mouth whereby he speaks to us, our mouth whereby we speak to him: our eye to see by, foot to go by; our pillar of fire by night, and cloud by day, guiding us thorough the desert of this world. It is a precious faith that lays hold on this precious object. If thou confess with thy mouth the LORD JESUS, and shalt believe in thy heart, that God raised him up from the dead: (not only dead, for so the Jews believe him; but risen again, for that is the faith of Christians: if thou have this faith) I tell thee from Paul, and Paul from GOD, to the comfort of thy soul; thou art presently justified, and shalt be everlastingly saved. For the Scripture saith, (it is not the promise of man, but the assurance of GOD) whosoever believeth on him, shall not be ashamed. God forbid I should rejoice in anything, save in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. There is nothing wherein men usually rejoice, but the faithful find it in Christ. Doth any man glory in knowledge? I desire to know nothing among you, but Jesus Christ, and him crucified. This is the blessed knowledge; for it is eternal life. Doth any man glory in honors? It is Christ that hath made us Kings. Doth another glory in Riches? Christ is a treasure never failing; and of his fullness have all we received. In liberty? CHRIST hath Delivered us out of the hands of all our enemies. In Princes favors? The King of Kings accepts us in him; He made us accepted in the beloved. All good things are to be found in him; therefore he is a Precious object, and this a Precious faith.

In respect of the Subject; the seat of faith is in the heart; with the heart man believeth unto righteousness. It is not placed in the mind and understanding only, but in the will and affections. Faith as Notitia, a knowledge, resides in the mind; as Fiducia, an assured persuasion, in the will. It is not a prattle of the tongue: Herod's tongue belies his soul. Dicitis quod creditis, non facitis quod dicitis. Men say what they believe, do not always do what they say, nor is it a floating opinion of the brain, a contemplative speculation of mysteries: but a certain persuasion of the heart. There is a forged faith, and a forced faith: forged in heretics; who will believe no God, but one of their own making. They believe all that they do believe, Sua side, non ecclesiasticâ, non catholicâ; with a faith of their own, not with the faith of the elect, of the Church. No oracle, no article of holy faith, but they will conceive it, and receive it, their own way, or not at all. Hoc non fidei, sed perfidiae: this is rather an art of treachery, then of faith. Forced in devils; they acknowledge from their own horror, and against their wills, that there is a GOD. It was the relation of a reverend Divine concerning an Atheist in England. A young man was a Papist; but soon fell in dislike of their superstition. He became a Protestant, but that did not please him long: England could not content him, he reels to Amsterdam: There he fell from one Sect to another, till he lighted upon the Familists: the first principle they taught him was this; There is no God. As indeed they had need fear up their conscience, and damme up all natural light, that turn Familists. Hereon he fell to a loose life, committed a robbery, was convicted, condemned and brought to die. At the execution he desired some stay, uttering these words; Say what you will, surely there is a GOD; loving to his friends, terrible to his enemies. Even the lewdest reprobates, that spit in the face of heaven, and wade as deep as Jesuits in blood, yet they shall have a forced faith. Though perhaps they say for the time, as Nero: Verebor esse cùm faciam, Deum? When Seneca reprov'd him for his vices, and bad him live, ut facta superi comprobarent; that GOD might approve his actions: He answered, Stulte, verebor esse cùm haec faciam, deos? Thou silly man, shall I fear there is a God, when I go about my villainies? But they shall one day believe and feel: there may be Atheists on earth, there are none in hell: no sooner come thither, but they know to their endless sorrow, that there is a GOD. Bellarmino saith, that the faith of reprobates and devils, est recta & vera fides ex parte objecti; is a right and true faith in regard of the object. And Augustine. comparing Peters confession, Matth. 16.16. Thou art Christ the Son of the living God: with the devils acknowledgement Mark 1.24. I know who thou art, even the holy one of God: saith, that though Peter for this was commended, and Satan expelled: albeit the same confession was beneficial to the one, and not to the other: In utrisque tamen non falsa, sed vera; non neganda, sed agnoscenda; non detestanda, sed approbanda. Yet the faith in both was not false but true; not to be denied, but acknowledged; not to be detested, but approved. Let this faith be granted true, so far as it goes; yet as it hath many other differences, so this one especially. The faith of reprobates and devils is compelled ex evidentia signorum, by the demonstration of the signs; faith of the elect ex evidentia Spiritus, by the evidence of the Spirit. Theirs against their wills, ours from the ground of our hearts; for that is the seat and subject of all approved faith.

In respect of the Act, it believes on Christ. There be three degrees or faculties of faith, as the School speaks out of Augustine. First, to believe there is a GOD; and this is a faith incident to devils. Next, to believe GOD; to credit the history of the Gospel, and to assent that what GOD saith is true. This is called an Historical faith, and may be in reprobates. Last, to believe on GOD, which doth ex duobus prioribus emergere; or as Chemnitz says, presupponit est includit: ariseth from both the former, and doth presuppose and comprehend both the former. The faith of a reprobate is a true faith specifically; a spark of fire is true fire, though it be not able to warm: a drop of water is true water, though it be not able to carry a vessel: a little sprigge may be a true Cedar, though it be not yet fit for timber. That fig tree which our LORD cursed, though it bare no fruit, was a true fig tree. As the Israelites required to go three days journey in the wilderness, before they did offer sacrifice: so faith hath three degrees before it come to that perfection, as may justify the soul. Saving faith in a man hath this precious act, to rely on GOD'S mercy in Christ for his salvation. He disclaims not his part in Christ, as the devils; Quid nobis tecum? Mark 1. What have we to do with thee, thou Jesus of Nazareth? nor loseth it; as reprobates, John 3.18. He that believeth not, is condemned already. But he challengeth his portion in the blood of Christ.. I am my Beloveds, and my Beloved is mine. His body is in heaven, there I shall find it mine: his divinity on earth, there I do find it mine: his Gospel in my ear, to beget him mine: his Sacrament in my eye, to confirm him mine: his Spirit in my heart, to assure him mine. Angels are mine, to sight for me: Prince mine, to rule for me: Church mine, to pray for me: Preacher mine, to feed me. Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are ours, and we are Christ's, and Christ is God's.

This faith doth not only with reprobates, believe the Major of the Gospel, that Christ is salvation; but the Minor with Mary; that he is my Savior. The devils believe much; but Reconciliationem suam non credunt: they cannot believe their own reconciliation. Therefore saith James; horrentes credunt, they believe and tremble. Timor infidelitatis filius, saith Basil; Fear is the child of unbelief. Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith? why are the Apostles called, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, timorous, but because they were 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, of little faith? But being justified by faith we have peace with God through Jesus Christ. In whom we have bold nesse and access with confidence, by the faith of him. A Traitor condemned to death, knows the King, and his prerogative royal, that he is able to pardon: his disposition, that it is mild and merciful: yea, he knows that the King hath forgiven many such offenders. But now for himself, he hath no friends to the King, no word from the King to warrant his pardon: no hope, if he should entreat favor, that himself was a fit subject for this exercise of mercy. Still he trembleth; Sentit se miserum, etsi noverit Regem misericordem: he feels himself miserable, though he know the King to be merciful. So the reprobate knows God's omnipotency; Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean: he knows his infinite mercy, that it reacheth unto the heavens, and his faithfulness unto the clouds: he knows GOD hath forgiven many, David for adultery, Solomon for idolatry, Peter for Apostasy, Paul for blasphemy. But for his own part, he hath no friend to God, no mediator betwixt God and him, no Christ to speak for mercy: he hath no word whereby he can apply this mercy: no hope, that mercy would come upon his submission and seeking. He wants that justifying faith, to do this precious act of application. A man is deeply in debt, non solvendo, in no case to pay: he hears and believes, that his Creditor is an honest man, that he hath dealt mercifully with others; remitted a third, half, the whole debt. But he hath neither promise from his creditor, nor persuasion in himself, that he will deal so kindly with him: for all this, he fears arrest and imprisonment, without baile, main prize, or any hope of deliverance. The wicked is deeply run into God's debt by his sins: (yea every man is taught to pray, Forgive us our debts) for which he is subject to convention, conviction, condemnation. He knows how this Creditor dealt with a servant. Matth. 18.27. because Non habuit unde; he had not to pay, the Lord was moved with compassion, and forgave him the debt. But this reprobate, through want of applying faith, hath no promise, no security, no hope that he shall be freed: but he fears the prison, where if he be once clapt up under the hands of that cruel Iailour, the devil; he cannot depart thence till he hath paid the uttermost farthing. It is then a Precious faith, that hath this powerful are to believe a man's own reconciliation.

In respect of the Effect, because it hath precious consequents. Amongst many, consider five sweet fruits.

1 Peace with God, which is produced by that faith which justifies us. Receive peace, and be blessed: Crede & accepisti, believe and thou hast received it. Upon our apprehension of Christ by faith, follows his satisfaction for us; upon this satisfaction we have remission: upon remission, reconciliation: upon reconciliation, peace. There is no quarrel against us in heaven; nothing but peace and joy, because we have truly believed.

2 Peace with our own conscience. When that stern Sergeant shall take thee by the throat, and arrest thee upon God's debt, pay that thou owest: let thy faith plead, I have paid it. How? Produce thy acquittance, that bloody acquittance, sealed in the wounds of thy Savior, and given to thy faith. This shall turn the frowns of thy conscience into smiles: and that hand which was ready to hale thee to prison, shall now embrace thee with joy, encourage thee with kindness, and fight for thee with conquest.

3 Victory, faith knows no other language but victory. I have kept the faith, now is laid up for me a Crown. Itsubdueth kingdoms, even regnum Antichristi, the kingdom of the devil, there's victory: wrought righteousness, though the world and sin withstood it, there's victory: raised strength out of weakness, there's victory over nature: turned to slight the armies of the aliens, there's victor ie over malice and hostility: raised the dead, there's victory over the grave: with patience and greatness of spirit, it endured mockings, scourgings, &c. miseries worse than death, there's glorious victory. It overcomes the world, 1 John 5.4. it overcomes the Prince of this world; whom resist steadfast in the faith. It quencheth all the fiery darts of the wicked, Eph. 6.16. They are darts in respect of their sharpness, and fiery for their violence: one sin kindling another, drunkenness adultery, adultery murder. The whole world lieth wickedness; Positus in maligno, that is in igne malo: set on fire of the devil. Yet faith quencheth all: Though they were as fiery as the Gun-powder treason, yet this shall bear them off, beat them off, and infatuate their malice. It is a Shield, this faith: this shield covers all, head and heart; understanding and will: ut non turbetur intellectus, ut non formidet affectus; that neither the mind be confounded, nor the affection amazed. Yea, faith overcomes the King of heaven himself; appealing a Deo irascente propter peccatum, ad Deum placatum propter Christum; from GOD justly offended for sin, to GOD sweetly pleased for Christ. It is able to remove mountains; the great hills of distrust, the great heaps of iniquities; therefore Precious.

4 Good report: all those Saints through faith obtained a good Report. They say, Non patitur ludum Fama, Fides, Oculus: A man's credit, Faith, and his Eye, endure no just. Yet let thy faith be sound; and though injury wound thy eye, ignominy thy fame, yet thy faith shall make all whole. That man's righteousness, thorough all clouds, shall break forth as the Sun, and his integrity shine like the noon-day. All unjust aspersions are but as rubbish; they may seem to fully him for a while, that he may shine bright forever. Frustrà condemnatur in terris, qui commendatur in coelis: How little is that man hurt, whom malice condemns on earth, and God commends in heaven! Let the world accuse us, so long as our God doth acquit us. I suffer these things, and am not ashamed: for I know whom I have believed. For not he that commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth. Let God justify, and let all the friends on earth or in hell accuse.

5 It blesseth to us all other blessings: He that putteth his trust in the Lord, shall be made fat. Without this faith, we are accountant for everything we receive, to a bit of bread. There is no right to the creatures but by Christ, no right to Christ but by faith. Without this Quantum honoris, tantum horroris: as much horror, as honor: no less wretchedness than wealthinesse? But faith makes thy dignity comfortable, thy wealth helpful, thy wife, children, friends delightful: Quia frueris in Domino, quibus uteris in seculo: because what thou usest in the world, thou enjoyest in the Lord. Yea, it blesseth even crosses and curses: Sine veste, non sine fide, &c. Thou wantest a garment for thy body, faith gives thy soul a rich one, the righteousness of Christ: thou lackest a house to dwell in, thou dwellest by faith even in the Lord Jesus, and he dwells in thee. If thou want bread, it reacheth thee the bread of life: if friends, it assures thee the favor of God, and the inseparable company of the holy Ghost: if health, it performs to thee everlasting life. Let me say with Seneca in another sense; Malo mihi successum deesse, quàm fidem; I had rather want fortune, than want faith. Whatsoever worldly thing be lacking, faith can supply it: but if faith be lacking, who can supply that? Faith keeps us forever from that mourning note, fuius felices: we shall never say, we have been happy.

In respect of the use; faith clears our ways as we go; cheers our hearts as we work; perfumes the places where we rest; and refines our actions from that dross and feculencie, which would else make them odious in God's sight. For whatsoever is not of faith, is sin. Faith, like John the Baptist, pointeth to the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world. Without this, God is no hearing God, no helping God, no saving God, no loving God at all. The Spirit shall convince the world of sin, saith Christ; because they believe not in me. Infidelitati retinentur omnia peccata, fidei remittuntur. All sins are retained to unbelief, remitted to faith. Faith is the nest of good works, saith our Church: let our birds be never so fair, our actions never so glorious, they will be lost, except they be brought forth in faith, This is the nest, where the Sparrow and Swallow may lay their young, to keep them safe; even Faith, which is close by thine Altars, O Lord of hosts. Heretics and hypocrites may produce many goodly acts, and honorable deeds: but wanting this nest of faith, they have nowhere to lay their young. Therefore as the Lawyers speak, moritur actio cum persona; their works are damnable with their persons. A Recusant in coming to Church against his conscience; rather to satisfy the Law, than to sanctify his soul; is guilty before God, because that work was not done in faith.

Now that a short corollary, or recollection of all these scattered branches to their root; Faith is precious. Conceive it some precious jewel, thy cheeks are comely with rouse of jewels, thy neck with chains of gold. Gregory Nissen makes one of those chains to be sound and religious faith, which is made of the pure gold of divine knowledge. And to this pure and golden chain he applies, Proverb. 1.9. They shall be an ornament of grace unto thy head, and chains about thy neck. This is the richest collar that can adorn any soul. Omnibus semper ornatibus ornamento est; quia sine hac nihil tam ornatum quod ornare possit: It is an ornament to all trimmings, for nothing is so garnishing and gracing, that it can become us without this. It is a jewel given us out of God's own treasury: aeterna aeternus tribuit, &c. Though faith be not it self eternal, yet it shall make all those blessedly eternal that have it. It is brought by the best messenger, God's Spirit: not the worthiest man on earth, not an Angel from heaven, is dignified to bring this treasure: but only the Holy Ghost. It is laid up in the best coffer, in the sanctified heart: no treasure-house is good enough for this jewel; no cabinet but the heart. Lastly, it gives us the place it came from: it came from heaven, and it brings heaven with it. It is Christ's wedding ring; to whom soever he gives it, he gives himself with it. It is beyond all estimation precious; it brought us more lands and revenues than the whole Indies. This is Mary's choice, that better part that shall never be taken from us.

Like precious faith with us. I come to the Equality, or rather Parity of this Excellencie; Like with us. The faith of the poorest believer is as precious, as the richest. Peter is above them in office: in the effect and fruit of his office, they are like him. But Peter was thrice confirmed, and that by the mouth of Christ himself, to make him strong: how then could they have faith like him? The parallel is not drawn à quantitate, sed à qualitate fidei: nec dicitur, tantum fidei, sed talem fidem: The comparison is not of the quantity, but of the quality of faith: nor doth he say, they had obtained the same measure and degree of faith, which he had himself; but the same kind of faith: not so much, but such faith. The act of faith is to apply Christ to the soul: and this the weakest faith can do so well as the strongest, if it be true. A child can hold a staff as well, though not so strongly as a man. The prisoner thorough a hole sees the Sun, though not so perfectly as they in the open air. They that saw the brazen Serpent, though a great way off, yet were healed. The poor man's, I believe, saved him; though he was fain to add, Lord, help my unbelief. So that we may say of Faith, as the Poet of Death; that dominos servis, & scepra lignonibus aequat; it makes lords and slaves, Apostles and common persons all alike acceptable to God, if they have it.

I confess, that this excludes not the degrees of faith: there is a little faith: and there is a Great faith; O woman, great is thy faith. God deals in spiritual proceedings, as in natural; ad extrema per medium; to extremes by the mean. Non nascimur senes; we are not borne old men: but first an Infant, then a man, then old. We are conceived of immortal seed, borne of the Spirit, so go on to perfection. There is first a seed, then a plant, then a tree. We get not at one jump into Heaven, nor at one stroke kill the enemy. A little faith doth not a little good at sometimes: as in the beginning of conversion, or in the storm of an afflicted conscience. Peter was strong, John. 6.68. When he resolutely protested his in fallible adherence to Christ; Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of Eternal Life. Peter was weak, when he sate by the fire in the High Priests hall, and denied his Master: and when he dissuaded Christ from suffering for us; Bee it far from the Lord. But where God gives great means, he looks for great measure: according to his portion of grace, he expects our proportion of goodness. It is enough for them that see only a glimmering of the Gospel, to be but dwarfes in bele fe: We have the Sun-shine, and therefore must have growth; and be higher by the head, as Saul; if not than all the children of Israel, yet than all the sons of Rome: whose faith is so hood winked with enforced ignorance, that they cannot see further than their popish Doctors will give them leave. Thus there may be degrees of faith; Adauge nobis fidem; Lord increase our faith. Him that is weak in the faith, receive you. Endeavour that your faith be increased. Grow from faith to faith; yea, from one measure of faith to another. Yet the least faith, (shield it from weakness of truth, though it have truth of weakness) is as precious to the believers soul; as Peters or Paul's faith was to themselves: for it lays hold upon Christ, and brings eternal salvation. In this similitude of faith, we find three Observations:

1. The Universality of God's mercy without difference of persons; that admits all sorts of men without any acception or exception of sex, state, nation or condition; into the same covenant of mercy, and precious object of faith, that the glorious Apostles had. Here the unspeakable goodness of God is commended to our meditation: whereas he might in justice have left us in our superstitions and infidelity: of his infinite goodness he hath called us to the same profession of the Gospel; and to a faith ejusdem pretii & praemii, with his own choice servants: In every Nation he that feareth God, and worketh righteousness is accepted of him. Other lords cannot reward all their followers, as being poor and unable: or will not, as being base and illiberall. But our Lord is immense in Majesty, and propense in mercy: good in greatness, and great in goodness, of great goodness. Poor Bartimaeus begging, rich Zacchaeus climbing, old Simeon in the Temple, young John in the womb: covetous Matthew at the receipt of custom, the loving Centurion building a Synagogue, the people watching under the Cross, the thief hanging on the Cross; This day thou shalt be with me in Paradise. For, whosoever believeth on him shall not perish; etiamsi crucifixerunt; no not although they were of the number of his Crucifiers.

2. The Apostles humility and charity: he acknowledgeth the poorest Saints to have like precious faith with himself. Many Miriams are proud of the Spirit, despising their poor brethren: Saint Peter matcheth them with himself. They are as dear in the Masters blood, therefore as dear in the Servants love. Gal. 6.2. Bear ye one another's burdens. In other buildings, one stone lies upon another, all upon the foundation: so let us support the weight one of another; and the foundation CHRIST, support us all! The pebble must not envy the marble, nor the marble despise the pebble: the pin in the Temple serves for use, so well as the pinnacle. The members should have the same care one for another: Christian shoulders should bear the weakness of others. The rich and the poor are piled together in God's house: the burden of the poor is beggary, the burden of the rich his superfluous estate. Now if the poor lie upon the rich, and the rich be contented to sustain the poor: here the rich hath his burden lessened by giving, and the poor hath his burden eased by receiving. If a brother be fallen, do not you trample him down, but help him up; relieve and restore such a one in the spirit of meekness. When thou hearest thy brother to have lapsed into some grievous fault, pity him, pray for him, recollect him, saying, He fell yesterday, I may fall today. As August. when he saw a poor miserable man, took occasion to admonish himself and the company; Aut sumus, aut fuimus, vel possumus esse quod hic est: we have been, are, or may be, as wretched as he.

3 This comforts our fainting hearts: there are many gusts and storms, and floods that attempt the overthrow of our faith: be our house founded on the rock, it shall never be demolished. Sense of sin may be often great, and more felt than grace; yet not to be more than grace. A man feels the ach of his finger more sensibly, than the health of his whole body: yet he knows that the ach of a finger is nothing so much as the health of the whole body. The Sun under the clouds, is still a Sun: the fire in embers still fire: the sap is shut up in the root, and confined thither by the cold of winter; that it cannot show it self in production of leaves and fruits, as in the spring; yet is there still life in the tree. So in the distressed heart, during the storm of affliction, there is still aliquid intus, some hidden grace; some spark of fire in the smoking flax, which the Lord Jesus will not quench. Though thou be wounded with God's own arrows, that seem to drink up thy blood: although thy own sins be presented to the eye of thy soul; though the Serpent (to increase thy terror) put forth his dismal countenance: yet canst thou believe? Take comfort, there is more health in the seed of the woman, than there can be venom in the head of the serpent.

That have obtained the like precious faith: here is the means of this Equality, they have obtained it. Not by our own merits; there was no congruity of nature to receive this precious treasure. Non nascimur, sed renascimur Christiani; we are not borne, but new-borne Christians. It is indeed natural to everyone, like Simon Magus, to think himself some great man; either the man, or somebody. Luther was wont to say, that every man by nature hath a Pope bred in his belly, too great an opinion of his own worth: we are Narcissus-like, enamored of our own shadows. Injustitiae fere fola causa justitia est: righteousness is almost the only cause of unrighteousness: righteousness in opinion, of unrighteousness indeed: we think ourselves so just, that we make little reckoning of Christ, for want of whom we remain unjust still. But the highest Mountebank in his proffers, is the lowest Dwarf in his merits. Not by our own purchase: many have so obtained Lordships and Mannors; as the Captain bought his Burgess-ship, with a great sum of money. Wert thou so glorious as an Angel, thy meat so good as Manna, thy garments richer than Aaron's Ephod, and thy breath sweeter than the perfume of the Tabernacle; yet all this could not get thee faith, nor give thee title to the kingdom of heaven. Thy money perish with thee, that thinkest the gifts of God may be bought with money.

But we obtain it by God's mercy: for it is given us for Christ's sake to believe. Faith is the fair gift of God; Ipsium velle credere Deus operatur in homine. Not only the grace of faith, but the very will of believing is God's work in us. If any ask, saith August. Cur illi ita suadeatur, ut persuadeatur; illi autem non ita: why this man is converted to believe, that man not convinced to believe. I answer with Saint Paul, Rom. 11.33. Oh the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! Cui ista responsio displicet, quaerat doctiores; sed caveat ne inveniatur praesumptiores. If any man dislike this answer, let him seek better: but beware lest he find worse. By the grace of God I am that I am. Aug. Omne bonum nostrum vel ipse, vel ab ipso. All the good we have, is either God himself, or what comes from him. Bona mea, dona tua: ipsum minus est munus. All my goods, O Lord are thy gifts. Quisquis tibi enumerat merita sua, quid tibi enumerat nisi munera tua? He that shall reckon to thee his merits, doth no more but reckon thy mercies.

Have obtained; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Sortiti sunt; so the Original imports; they have obtained it by lot. So it is said of Zacharias. Luke 1.9. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ; Sortitus est munus faciendi suffimenti; his lot was to burn incense, &c. So, Col. 1.12. that we read, He made us fit to be partakers of the Inheritance; ad verbum, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ; unto the part of the lot of the Saints in light. Not that we draw these blessings by a lotterie, or imaginary fortune; but by the ordination of God; for though the lot be cast into the lap, yet the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord. It is therefore called our lot, because the Lord hath destinated it to be our portion. Though the land of Israel were divided by lot, yet the Lord had decreed in himself, and told Joshua, what lot and portion every tribe should have. There is a threefold lot belongs to the faithful. 1 The lot of the Saints is the sufferings of the Saints. The rod of the wicked shall not rest upon the lot of the righteous. It is their lot to have the rod, not the rod of the wicked: or if it salute them, it shall not dwell with them. All that will live godly in Christ, shall suffer persecution: it is their inevitable lot to be chastised on earth, it is their lot to be saved in heaven. 2 The lot of the Saints is not only that light and happiness they have in this world. Psal. 16.6. The lot is fallen to me in pleasant places, yea, I have a goodly heritage. When David sate at the sheepfold, the kingdom of Israel was given him by lot from God. But more specially Faith, Grace and Sanctification; which gives them just right and title to the Inheritance of glory. Thus heaven is their lot now, a lot drawn out of the bloody side of Christ; though not in possession, yet in succession. They have the earnest of it: let them grow up to stature and perfection, and take it. The Inheritance is the eldest sons lot, even whiles he is a child. 3 Lastly, they have the lot of faith, that they may have the lot of salvation. Hell is the lot of the wicked: Behold at evening tide trouble, and before the morning he is not: this is the portion of them that spoil us, and the lot of them that rob us. Therefore it is said of Judas, Acts 1. that he went in locum suum, to his own place. Upon the wicked God shall rain snares, fire, and brimstone, and a horrible tempest; this shall be the portion of their cup. But the lot of the righteous is faith, and the end of their faith the salvation of their souls. God gives them heaven, not for any foreseen worthiness in the receivers: for no worthiness of our own can make us our fathers heirs. But for his own mercy and favor in Christ, preparing heaven for us, and us for heaven. So that upon his decree it is allotted to us; and unless heaven could lose God, we cannot lose heaven.

Here then consider how the lotterie of Canaan may shadow out to us, that blessed land of promise whereof the other was a type. The allusion may be led on through three principal passages; the Preparation, the Qualification, the Possession.

For the Preparation: Canaan was not a new made Country, out of barren and uninhabitable deserts; but was already furnished to their hands: Nature had enriched it with commodities, and Industry beautified it with buildings and maturities; which were not done by the Israelites. They came to goodly Cities which they built not: to houses full of all good things which they filled not: to Welles digged which they digged not: and to Vineyards which they planted not. So heaven was prepared of old; Mat. 25. Inherite the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. That glorious City whose wall was of Jasper, and the fabric pure gold, the foundations of precious stones. Rev. 21. Was neither formed nor furnished by the Saints; but the builder and maker was God. So Paul, 2 Cor. 5.1. it is the building of God, an house not made with hands. GOD made it for his chosen; and as the Canaanites were cast out, that the Israelites might enter; so the LORD hath thrown the devils out of heaven, that elect men might dwell there.

2. For the qualification: as none had right to Canaan but the children of Abraham according to flesh, so none have right to heaven but the children of Abraham according to faith. This qualification stands in our Captain, and in our Combat. For the Captain they had Joshua, we have JESUS: though there were a Canaan, there would have been no lot, without a Joshua: though there be a heaven, there would have been no room for us in it without a Jesus. The lot of every Tribe was known to Joshua, the portion of every Saint is purchased by JESUS. Joshua had the City which he asked for himself: JESUS obtains whatsoever he asketh for us. Psal. 2.8. Postula a me; Ask of me, and I shall give thee; though thy demand be more than Herod's offer, half my kingdom; though it be the Heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession. For the Combat; Canaan was given to Israel by promise, yet they could not enter without a combat: they fought many sore battles, before they were settled in a victorious rest. So must the kingdom of heaven suffer violence, before it afford residence: and we must be content to war with greater Giants than the Sons of Anak, even with Principalities and Powers, before we triumph. Let us bear the Country in our minds, and we shall find courage in our hearts. Caleb dares fight with the Anakims, if Joshua give him Hebron: and complaining Ephraim enlarge his territories, if Joshua promise them the wood-country. Josh. 17.18. If Dan complain of too little room, let him fight it out for more; let him conquer Leshem, and possess it. Christians must not pine and repine, that others exceed them in graces; but buckle on the arms of faith; and with a reverent courage strive for more. Nor is it a good argument that we share the lot of faith, if we strive only for ourselves;

Christians thus truly qualified seek also the salvation of others. The Reubenites, Gadites, and half the Tribe of Manasseh had their lot allowed already; yet were they not suffered so to rest; but to pass before their brethren armed, all the mighty men of valor, and to help them. Nor is it enough for Peter and Paul to comfort themselves in the security of their own salvation; but they must labor the conversion and confirmation of their brethren. Thus are they qualified, to whom the lot of faith, and of eternal life by faith, is ordained. Heaven is not for everyone, but for the Saints: would any man have a lot in Canaan, let him be sure he be a true Israelite. It is not the bare hope and probability of a little, that can give the soul the satisfaction of comfort. For a man to stand to the courtesy of his Minister, for all the knowledge which he requires in heavenly blessings: had been for an Israelite to take it upon trust of the Spies, who were sent to view and report the goodness of the land; and never to enter it himself.

3. For the possession it self, no mortal eye hath seen it, nor ear hath heard it; blessed souls whose lot it shall be to enjoy it. But I leave this point to your meditation; for our Apostle speaks here of the preparing lot, not of the possessing lot. Let us get the lotterie of grace, and we shall be assured the lot of glory. But alas how slowly do we go about this holy business! Joshua was fain to chide the seven tribes; Josh. 18:2. for neglect of their Inheritance. How long are you slack to go to possess the land, which the God of your fathers hath given you? we may be all thus justly reprov'd; how long defer we to make sure our election, and to get the earnest of everlasting life?

Thus we have considered this precious Jewel of faith, and how we have obtained it: by no worthiness of our own, but by lot: that is, the free gift and disposition of God; who gives it, or denies it, according to his own good pleasure. If he have given thee this lot of believing, the thanks be to him: if thou draw a blank and doest not obtain it, yet he hath done thee no wrong: who shall command that independent proprietary to give away his own? That have obtained it: here is matter of correction, of direction. First, this corrects the errors of two sorts:

1. Such as have not obtained faith; who think that they may believe when they list: respecting only Dei facultatem & facilitatem, the sufficiency and indulgency of GOD: not regarding the obduration of their own hearts, and their indisposition to receive it. Recipitur quicquid ad modum recipientis: whatsoever is received, is received according to the measure and capabilities of the thing which receives. Stones and sand will not be leavened, but meal. There is matter in the rock to build a house of; not form and proportion till it be hewed out. Those five foolish Virgins, Mat. 25. thought they might get oil at their pleasure: but because their lamps were out, themselves could not be let in. Many think wheresoever they lost their faith, they shall find it on their death-bed. But Nemo sibi promittat, quod non promisit Evangelium: let no man promise himself that, which the Gospel doth not promise him. If they cannot find it in the Church, they will hardly find it in the chamber: if the ordinary means to beget faith have not wrought it, how shall it be taken when it is not offered? But saith Augustine, Fides in potestate est; faith is in a man's power: but that Father never meant that an infidel can believe when he list, but when God gives him that list, man's will is not compelled. As he adds, Cùm vult quisque credit: when a man's will is to believe, he does believe: but whence hath he that will? the finger of GOD moves his will. Fides est voluntaria certitudo absentium, saith another: faith is a voluntary persuasion of absent things? But it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of GOD that showeth mercy. God must give the will, act, effect and all. The Fathers never averred, that an unbeliever can make himself a believer by his own power: but when God hath given him the power of faith, he can then believe. Without me you can do nothing, saith Christ: not parum, very little: but nihil, nothing at all. The members must be set in the body, before they can execute any offices for the body: neither are they members, because they are working; but are therefore working, because they are members. The tree brings forth the fruit, the fruit doth not bring forth the tree. Papists in their Congruities, and Libertines in their Potentials, run too much upon a very base figure, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, the cart before the horse; merit before mercy. Do not think, To believe, so easy a matter: the death of Christ darkened the Sun, shook the earth, clave the rocks, opened the graves, and raised the dead; yet did not put faith into the Jews hearts. It was a great miracle, Deum nasci, for God to be borne of woman: a great miracle, Virginem parere, for a Virgin to bear a child, and still to remain a Virgin: but the greatest miracle of all is Fidem haec credere, for a man's faith to believe these things. Bernard makes this to be the most wonderful mixture and composition of the three. First, Deus & Homo, God and man, a strange union; that hominem esse incipit, qui Deum esse non desinit; He should begin to be man, who is God without beginning, without ending: Divinity and Humanity in one individual Person; this is very mystical. Next, Mater & Virgo, a Mother and a Virgin: Quod Virgo esset quae peperit, & Mater esset quae Virgo remansit: That she should be a Virgin still, which was now a Mother; that she should be a Mother, which remained a pure Virgin; this was singularly admirable: maternitie and virginity at once in the same individual person. Lastly Cor hominis & fides, man's heart and faith; a natural understanding, and supernatural objects mixed together. Fire and water would sooner be reconciled then these two, without the supernatural combining work of God's spirit. This is the most wonderful mixture and mystery. This Faith is no easy thing to obtain. Potes a te deficere, sed teipsum reficere non potes: ill reficit; qui te fecit. Augustine. Thou mayest fall off, from thyself; not recover thyself: He only that made thee, can restore thee. Faith is God's gift; no man can obtain it, if he detain it.

2 Such as have obtained it, ne Superbiant, that they be not proud of it. What hast thou that thou didst not receive? now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory as if thou hadst not received it? Let not the most famous disdain the meanest nor the meanest repine at the mightiest. Insultation and malice are enemies to grace and faith. Be not high minded, but fear. Pride was the first sin that ever was in the world, and it shall be the last. As other infirmities decrease in us, so pride doth increase. Mille virtutibus affluente, propter arrogantiam amisit faelicitatem, saith Chrysost. on that Pharisee. Luke 18.11. Though he abounded with many virtues, yet he lost all by his self-conceitedness. God I thank thee (for he was not a petitioner, but a proclaimer) I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this Publican. Yet he was all these; an Extortioner, for in relying on his own merits, he did rob GOD of his glory, and extort that from him which he will not give to another. Unjust, in condemning the publican without due proof; so being himself a guilty person worthy to be condemned, he usurps the office of a Judge, and censures another. An Adulterer, in being wedded to vain glory, and enamored of popular applause: leaving the humble and chaste love he owes to God he runs a whoring after his own proud inventions. Saint James calls them Adulterers that embrace the friendship of the world. Thus he did verbis proferre virtutem, & factis destruere veritatem: like a bad mill that keeps a great clacking, and grinds little. Howsoever all sins may be said to be in the devil secundum reatum, in respect of guiltiness: yet only pride is in him secundum affectum, in respect of his desire: saith Thomas. His darling sin, his character is Pride. Hens use to cackle so soon as they have laid their eggs, & by this means they are instantly taken from them. The proud man may do some good works, but by his clacking and boasting he looseth them. The pharisaical Papists have haply laid some eggs, but they so cackle them that they quite mar their market. Insolens faelix, infaelix. Poor men advanced, and growing proud, are like clouds drawn up on high by the Sun; and when they are there, they darken the Sun that drew them up. God may say to them, as Sara spake to Abraham concerning Hagar; I have given thee my handmaid, and now I am despised in thine eyes. But it is certain; they have least faith that think they have all faith. Men that make themselves so sure of heaven, that they will scarce change places with the departed Saints; may perhaps wish themselves one day in the poor Publicans case and place; Lord be merciful to me a sinner.

Thus much for the reproof of those two errors; one in the defect, the other in the excess: neither whereof have indeed obtained faith: Now for direction to those that have obtained it: this twofold.

1 Learn to acknowledge the author Hast thou obtained that precious Jewel denied to thousands, be the more thankful. As Thales Milesius asked no other reward of his readers, but ubi mea legeris, me agnosce; Where thou readest me, acknowledge me So God requires of his creatures, that where they find the benefits, they thankfully acknowledge the Benefactor. God hath kept nothing to himself but his glory, and this he will not give to another: as Pharaoh gave all to Joseph, only excepting the throne: yet in this glory we are too forward to be sharers. When the Babylonians heard the music, cornet, flute, harp, &c. they fell down, and worshipped the Idol. So men when they hear the music of their own praises, Idolize themselves, and worship a golden calf. The wife is bound to be chastely reserved to her own husband; and not with a tempting dress to invite adulterers. Vain glory tricks us up, not for God our husband, but for strange lovers; he will acknowledge no such wife. Joab sent messengers to David, that he should bring in his forces, and take Rabbah; his reason was, lest I take the City and it be called after my name: not Joab thy servant, but David the King must have this honor. So God cannot endure that his creature should divide the glory with himself; give him all willingly, or he will have all in despite of thee. Ascendat gratia tua, ut descendat gratia sua: let thy thankful acknowledgement go up, that his great bounty may come down.

2 Learn to preserve what thou hast gotten. That which you have already, hold fast till I come. This was Saint Paul's happiness, that having finished his course, yet he had still kept the faith. The loss of faith is a dangerous shipwreck: if it be possible, save your vessels, save your goods, save your wares, save your bodies; but though you lose all, save your faiths, save your souls.

Imagine thyself a vessel; the sea this world, thy freight Faith: there is a man of war against thee; the bark is Diffidence, the soldiers Atheism, Heresy, Schism, Prophanesse: the charged Cannons and ordinance are Pride, Lust, Hypocrisy, to which drunkenness is the master gunner, and gives fire. The Arch-pyrate is the devil, who so violently assaults us, and boards us with his temptations, that often we are fain to blow up our deckes, lose some of our necessary appurtenances; glad like the young man in the Gospel, Relicto syndone fugere, to save ourselves, though we leave our case behind us. There be also Rocks of persecutions, and Gulfes of errors; horrible gulfs in the Sea of Rome, dangerous swallows about Amsterdam. When opinion goes before us, it is a great question whether truth will follow us. Look to thy faith. Perit navis, si pereat fides; shipwreck thy faith, and drown thy soul. Cast Judas out of the ship, and take JESUS in: Turbatur navis in qua Judas, servatur navis in qua Jesus. That ship is troubled that harbours a Traitor: the ship is safe that hath in it the Savior: now he hath CHRIST, that hath faith. If therefore by faith thou be freed from the bondage of Satan; take heed lest by laying down this refuge thou be again captived. Let not the world like a crafty thief steal away thy faith: look to your faith ye covetous, forsake not the word to embrace the world. Be not like Plaices, which have a black side so well as a white: when their turns are once served by the white, they instantly, show you the black. Though the faith of Christ be in their mouths, the love of the world is in their hearts. Let no extremity of sorrows or sufferings enervate thy faith: When a lewd malefactor being condemned to die with just Phocion, raild at the Judge, the law, his enemies, and looked on death with terror and amazedness: he thus cheered him with encouragement: doest thou grudge to die with Phocion? O thou faint-hearted professor, dost thou grudge to die with Christ, or for Christ? keep thy shield of faith, and thou shalt victoriously march with the Saints on earth; and triumphantly sing with the Angels in heaven. Faith obtained, faith retained, shall without fail advance thy soul to eternal glory.

Through the righteousness of God, and our Savior Christ. Here is the ground of this means, the Justice of our redeemer. Some read these words distinctim, by disjoining them; Dei, & Salvatoris; Of God, and Of our Savior. This reading may stand where Righteousness is referred to God, as to the cause efficient: and to Christ, as to the cause meritorious. Augustine admonisheth us of the Trinity here and teacheth us to collect it from such places. Sub Dei nomine Pater, sub Salvatoris Filius, sub Pacis & Gratiaevocis Spiritus sanctus exprimitur: By the name of God he understands the Father, by Savior the Son, by Grace and Peace the Holy Ghost. But with Saint Ambrose, they are better read Conjunctim: and this is plain from the Greek context, where all are contained under one article. Aquin thus: Of GOD, that is of CHRIST, Secundum Divinitatem effective: Of our SAVIOR, that is of CHRIST, secundum Humanitatem meritorie. But I leave that as too curious and take the words to be construed only copulatively: answerably to that of Paul; Looking for the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Savior Jesus Christ. Here can be no distinction of Persons thought on: for it is the Great God that appears in judgment, but no Person of the Deity properly appears in judgment at the last day, but JESUS CHRIST. For the Father judgeth no man: but hath committed all judgment unto the Son: therefore CHRIST is there called the Great God. For the Mediator betwixt God and man, is perfect God and perfect man; and yet not two, but one CHRIST. One not by confusion of substance, but by unity of Person, as Athanasius.

Here is then full testimony that CHRIST is God, against the Arians. But when I read that Fevardentius reports; how many of the Polonians have derogated from this eternal Deity of Christ, and that from the writings of Calvin, and other Reformed Catholics; I must sigh with Polycarpus! O bone Deus, in quae me tempora reservasti, ut ista audiam! Good God, what times do I live in, to read and hear such impious and impudent slanders! Let any indifferent man judge, whether they or we derogate more from our Savior Christ: we in resting our whole salvation upon him, or they in joining other Savior's with him. They say, that if God will bear half the charges in cooperation, we may merit our own glory, fulfill the Law, have works to spare for our neighbors: whereof Rome hath such store, that she can spare England some out of her super fluity, if we will pay for them. But that we think, as when one boasted how fair a she-slave he had bought for a pound, another answered that she was too dear of a groat: so if we should bestow our monies on such supererogatory stuff, every penny-worth would be worse than other. We teach that our best actions are full of sin, our satisfactions debts, that no merit can do us good, but the merits of Jesus Christ. Whether of us more wrongs our Savior? No, let them take their own egg out of our nest, we never laid it, we will never hatch it. He is over all, God blessed forever: Amen. He is the God of salvation, and he shall be found a God in judgment. Qui negârunt in carne mortali, confitebuntur in igne immortali. They that have denied it in their mortal flesh, shall acknowledge it in immortal fire. I cannot say logically, Quid sit, what he is; but Quis sit, who he is: there is no Logic sufficient to express Christ. De lumine, non sine lumine: No man can speak of the Light, but by the light. The best apprehension of him is negative: he cannot lie, he cannot die, he cannot deny himself. He is God of the Father, as a branch from the root, as fragrance from the Pomander, as words from the soul, as light from the Sun. Man of the Virgin, by over-shadowing of the Holy Ghost, who withal hath cast a shadow over this mystery. Man, not by taking man's person into his own nature, but by taking man's nature into his own Person. But in all this, Mallem ignorantiam humiliter confiteri, quàm scientiam impudenter profiteri; I will rather humbly acknowledge my ignorance, than proudly profess my knowledge. Therefore, as the Philosopher sitting on the bank of a River, and observing it to ebb and flow seven times a day; because he could not by Philosophy find out the hidden cause, he threw himself headlong into it, with these words; Quoniam ego non capio te, tu capies me: Because I cannot conceive thee, do thou receive me. So I offer myself in all humility to Christ, God and man, my blessed Savior; Quoniam ego non capio te, capias me. O Lord I cannot comprehend thee, do thou therefore comprehend me, forever!

Through the righteousness, &c. Upon this ground let me build five instructions, or conclusions which are naturally deduced from it.

1 All grace to our souls, all good to our bodies; all peace that may concern this life or that to come, is derived to us through the righteousness of Christ. Whatsoever good descends from God to us, is granted through Christ; whatsoever good ascends from us to God, is accepted through Christ. We are elected in Christ, redeemed by Christ, engrafted to Christ, saved for Christ. God gives to all Dona, gifts; but they are only true comforts to those that enjoy them through Christ. David out of the great love he bore to Jonathan, which was passing the love of women, was also loving to Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan; he set him at his own table, and restored him all the land of Saul his father. Mephibosheth was lame and decrepit, yet David loved him for Jonathan's sake. Infinite is the love of God to his own Son, therefore he is called the Son of his love, Coloss. 1.13. In whom he is well pleased. We are lame and deformed, warped, wicked, wretched; there is nothing in us that he should desire us: yet he restores us all the lands our Father Adam lost, yea, and ten thousand times more than ever he was owner of; and will one day set us at his own table, yea, in his very Throne, Revel. 3.21. and make us partakers of his glory: so did David to Mephibosheth for Jonathan his Fathers sake, so doth GOD to us for JESUS his Sons sake. Consider man in a four-fold estate; Confectionis, as he was made; Infectionis, as he was marred; Refectionis, as he was repaired; Perfectionis, as he shall be accomplished: and see how all mercy still came to us through CHRIST. First, GOD made man happy, because holy; without misery, because without iniquity. This I have found, that God made man righteous, and in that righteousness he had the Image of God, Ephes. 4.24. If a glorious Heaven above him, a fruitful Earth under him, command of the creatures below him, the guard of Angels about him, the peace of conscience within him: if all this could make him happy, he was not scanted. He was created thus through Christ: By him were all things created that are in heaven or earth, visible or invisible, &c. Secondly, man stood not thus long; he fell from his holiness, so from his happiness; he lost the favor of the Creator, the service of the creature; a curse fell upon him for his sins. Loe now, he lies weltering in his own gore, who shall heal him? God redeemes him through Christ; So he loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son; he sent him to do it. Behold him hanging, bleeding, dying upon the cursed Cross to save us. Thirdly, a Redeemer is come, what is man the better for it, if he hath not power to believe on him? Faith he can have none, if it be not given him through Christ. It is given to you in the behalf of Christ to believe. Again, Lord help; for Christ his sake grant us a third mercy; make us believers, or we are never the better; we had as good have no Savior, as not have him our Savior: and ours he cannot be, unless himself make us his. Lastly, for the state of perfection and immortal blessedness, it is through CHRIST. There is laid up for me, saith Paul, a Crown of righteousness; and not for me only, but for all those that love his appearing. Who shall give this to us! The righteous Judge; and that is Jesus Christ. Thus all good comes to us through Christ.

Again, all our good is accepted only through the righteousness of Christ. Our very persons are accepted in the Beloved: Ephes. 1.6. if our persons, then our good actions. If we pray, he chargeth us to do it, Nomine meo, In my name; then we are sure to speed; God will give it you. August. in Psalm. 85. Orat pro nobis, or at in nobis, oratur à nobis. He prayeth for us, as our Advocate: he prayeth in us, by his holy Spirit: is prayed to of us, as our Everlasting Father. Oramus ad illum, per illum, in illo: We pray unto him, we pray by him, we pray in him. I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life. Venitur per me, provenitur ad me, permanetur in me. I am the Way, you come by me: I am the Truth, you come unto me: I am the Life, you shall dwell forever in me. He is the Beginning of Salvation, therefore the Way: the midst of Salvation, therefore the Truth: the end of Salvation, therefore the Life; saith Ferus. Via incipientium, veritas proficientium, vita perfectorum. The way of them that begin, the truth of them that grow forward, and the life of them that are perfect. In matter of disputation with Atheists or Heretics, concerning God's Wisdom, Majesty, Power, &c. exercise all thy wit and industry, to convince the Adversary. But when thou comest into another school, to wrestle with the Devil, with the Law, with Sin and Death, in the matter of thy Justification; then fix thy eye upon no God, but the person of the God-head incarnate; Behold the Lamb of God, that takes away the sin of the world. God's seat is said to be compassed about with a Rain-bow, Revel. 4.3. The Rain-bow was a sign of his covenant made with man; here doth signify his perpetual mercy to us in Christ. If he should mark what is done amiss, who is able to stand? If he enter into judgment with us, no flesh living shall be justified. But here is our comfort; there is a Rain-bow about the Throne; he can look no way upon his Church, but thorough the Rain-bow; through Jesus Christ. Hence it is, not to us a terrible Throne; but a Throne of grace, so full of mercy, that we may boldly come unto it. Though, verse. 5. out of the Throne proceed lightnings, and thunderings, and terrible voices; though there be seven lamps of fire burning before it: yet all is well so long as there is a Rain-bow about it. Thus all good things come to us in Christ: that we may humbly acknowledge, and heartily sing with Paul; Of him, and through him, and to him are all things: to whom be glory forever. Amen.

2 The faith of a Christian is well grounded, upon the righteousness of Christ For other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. That house of faith only shall stand, that is built on this Rock. Neither, the Rain that falls in whole showers of prosperity; nor the voluminous Flouds, that roar out persecutions; nor the adverse winds, that blow with the loudest violence of opposition; shall overthrow that house, because it is founded on a rock. Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock (which thou hast acknowledged to be the Son of the living God) I will build my Church: and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. Though Stephen Gardiuer apostated did read that Text with the Popes spectacles, in the days of Queen Mary; and made the Pope supreme founder of Faith. Yet formerly in the days of King Edward the sixth, he preached it otherwise, that the Rock was only Christ. Non agnovit Petrum esse Petram, sed Petri Dominum. Domus Dei credendo fundatur, saith Augustine. The foundation of God's house in man's heart, is Faith. First, place the foundation, then rear up the building; the Instruments of which edifice are the Word and Sacraments. Here is no place for Traditions of men, or Constitutions of Popes: the ground of faith is the righteousness of Christ, not our own merits: if in thy garden any grace or good works spring over the wall, and saucily challenge to it self a prerogative of merit; deal with it as the Gardener doth with superfluous branches, prune it off: or as Torquatus with his over-venturous son; cut it down with the sword of the Spirit for daring beyond the commission. The Justice of Christ is the sole compass of faith: our adversaries oppose this both with pens and tongues, violently in the Schools, invectively in the Pulpits: but come they to their death-beds, to argue it between God and their own souls; then Grace and grace alone; mercy and only mercy; Jesus and none but Jesus. This their great Bel-weather is driven to confess: By reason of the uncertainty of our own righteousness, and the danger of vain-glory, the safest course is Fiduciam totam in sola Dei misericordia & benignitate reponere; to put our whole trust and confidence in the only goodness and mercy of God. But perhaps Bellarmino spake this as a Jesuit; and afterwards being made Papable, he was willing to retract and unsay it.

God threatens, Gen. 6.5. to destroy the World with a Flood, because the imaginations of man's heart were evil continually. And Gen. 8.21. God promiseth no more to curse the ground for man's Take; because the imaginations of man's heart are evil from his youth. The same reason that is alleged why God will not spare the world; is also alleged why he will spare the world. It serves to prove, that not man's merit, but God's mercy is the cause why confusion is withholden. I am the Lord, I change not: therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed. Let them trust in their own works, our souls believe on this ground, the righteousness of JESUS CHRIST. This is the Faith, and thus grounded, that our Church commends, that God requires: in this we live, in this, and for this, (if need be) let us die, that we may live forever. Let the memory of her be blessed, even that our Deborah, whereof all true hearted English are glad to hear: She was truly the Defender of this true, ancient, Catholic, and Apostolic Faith: she reared up the Preaching of this faith, she maintained this faith, she lived in this faith, in this faith she died: applying to her own soul the mercies of God through the righteousness of Jesus Christ.

Let this teach every soul humbly to cast himself down at the feet of Christ, and to be beholding to him only for his salvation. Our best works are but blanks, and when they come before him, shall blush for shame. Let us then go out of ourselves, and know that we are only saved by the righteousness of our Lord Jesus.

3 We collect hence, that it is not Faith which properly saves us, but the righteousness of Christ whereon it is grounded. For by grace are ye saved through faith: by grace effectually, through faith instrumentally. The hand is said to nourish the body, not of it own nature and virtue, but because it is an instrument to reach meat to it. It was the blood of the Paschal Lamb, for which the destroying Angel passed over the Israelites houses; faith only sprinkles the posts. We are not justified for the only act and quality of believing: it is the Justice of Jesus that justifies us, which faith apprehends. Faith brings the Creeple to the Beautiful gate of the Temple, Act 3. to the Word are promises of the Gospel; and there it is able to receive (though with a sick hand, yet with an hand) the alms of grace, Christ's merits and mercies. It was the brazen Serpent that healed, not the eye that looked on it; yet without a looking eye, there was no help to the wounded party by the promised virtue.

4 Observe, that Faith had need of a good foundation, for it is an heavy and weighty building. All other virtues lie upon faith, as their Basis. Hope upon faith, for no man hopes for that which he not believes: Patientia filia Spei, Spes Fidei. As Patience is the daughter of Hope, so Hope is the daughter of Faith. Repentance lies upon Faith; for how should contrition for sin be admitted, if remission of sin were not believed. Charity upon Faith; why should we part with our goods for God's cause, if we believe not that God would with everlasting charity embrace us? Faith bears a great weight: yet the righteousness of Christ bears that and all. Quanta vis fidei, quae tale sustentat pondus; quanta vis Christi quae talem sustentat fidem! How great is faith that is able to bear up such a burden: how much greater is Christ, that is able to bear up faith?

Our sins are of infinite number and pressure: Doth any man extenuate them with a self-flattering mitigation; think that he hath but a few, and few shall not bring him to judgment? No, they are infinite in number, heinous in nature, swelling in measure: the sands of the sea, hairs of our heads, stars of heaven, are sooner reckoned. No soul of it self is able to stand under them: the wicked shall one day find them so heavy, that they will think rocks and mountains far lighter; crying to the rocks, fall upon us; and to the mountains, cover us. Now Faith takes all this burden upon her shoulders, she brings it to Christ, and he takes it upon his shoulders: being confident of his fidelity, that it shall answer the invitation and promise of his mercy; Come to me all that are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.

Our miseries are many and mighty, dejecting us under the Load; we know not how to bear them. We bring this burden also, and lay it upon Faith, and Faith lays it upon Christ. Some are afflicted in reputation, ⁱ as Susanna; others in children, as Eli: some by enemies, as David; others by friends, as Joseph: some in body, as Lazarus; others in goods, as Job; others in liberty, as John. In all extremities let us send a messenger to Christ for ease; faithful Prayer. If Faith can but carry the burden to him, he will carry it for us, and from us forever.

Our cares are many and mighty; too great a load for ourselves to bear. Fear of what may come, expectation of what will come, desire of what will not come: no redress of all these in ourselves: what flesh and blood can support this burden? None; therefore Faith takes Christ's word, and lays all these doubts or sorrows upon his righteousness. Vt qui invenit sollicitudinem in seculo, inveniat requiem in Domino. That whosoever hath found trouble in the world, may find rest in the Lord.

Our sicknesses, our pains, our departures are heavy; Sustulit Christus. Christ hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows. We have all erred like sheep, and the LORD hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all. When death, that proud Champion; comes in his fearefullest shape to affront and affright us, faith hath recourse to the righteousness of CHRIST; and beseecheth him to help us with this burden; to ease the pangs, and sweeten the bitterness of death, and he doth it.

5 Lastly we infer, that our salvation stands sure in the Lord, because it hath this ground, the Righteousness of Christ. God doth not trust us with our own life, but hides it in his Son JESUS. Ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. Otherwise, if it were in our own hands, we should easily be tempted to sell it; as Adam did for an apple, and Esau for a mess of pottage. But Ponitur in tuto, quia reponitur in Christo: it cannot but be safe, which the LORD keeps. Happy soul, whose treasure is thus laid up; where no rust or moth can corrupt it, no thief break through to steal it. An English merchant that trades in Turkey, does not build or plant in Turkey, but transports all for England. The Burgesses of heaven may admit some slight traffic in this world, but they lay up all for their own country. Quae nam est haec stultitia illuc reponere, unde iturus es: & illuc non praemittere, quo iturus es! what folly is this for a man, to hoard up his treasure there, where he is sure he must not continue: and not to convey it thither, where is continuance forever? If earth should vanish and nature dissolve; yea if heaven pass away with a noise, and the elements melt with heat; ruat orcus, & ortus; I will look to the righteousness of my Savior Christ, and stand upright. Let all our enemies do their worst, the devil tempt, the world afflict, sin menace, death affright; yet faith shall vanquish all through the righteousness of Jesus Christ. He is righteous that hath promised: it is a righteous thing with God, to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you: and to you who are troubled, rest; when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty Angels. Let no man dare to call the righteousness of Christ into question: woe unto him that shall make God a liar. Shall he say, whosoever believes, shall be saved, and shall we doubt? Shall we annihilate his Cross, evacuate his blood, run into the fire from whence we are ransomed, and die past hope? GOD forbid it, and the faith of our own souls forbid it; there is assurance of salvation through the righteousness of Christ.

Ver. 2. Grace and peace be multiplied unto you, through the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord.

The Person saluting, and the persons saluted are considered, the salutation it self follows; Grace and peace, &c. This form of salutation is usual with the Apostles, and useful for us. Whereby they express the true exercise of their office, to bring Grace and Peace in their mouths. In the salutation consider:

The

- Matter, Grace and Peace.
- Measure, Be multiplied to you.
- Manner, through the knowledge of God, &c.

Grace and peace; this is the matter. It hath been an ordinary custom in the Jewish, Pagan, and Christian world, to begin their letters with salutations: and in these to wish their friends, that they thought the best good. Some wished prosperity, others health and Iovisance, others sum'd up all in a contented mind. Some wrote, Cura ut been valcas: others Cura ut benê vivas. One wisheth soundness to their bodies, another integrity to their lives. All those were far short of that true blessedness, which the Apostles saw to be in CHRIST JESUS: therefore Grace and Peace be to you; this Satius, and Saris: this was so good, there could be no better: this was so much, there need be no more. This is a short, but effectual prayer frequently used in the Scriptures, and not seldom in our Liturgy. Such are Dominus vobiscum; the LORD be with you, &c. Those over-devout and factious Pharisees, that love long prayers, and short good deeds, call these short ejaculations, shreddings. But one well answers them, that these shreddings and lists are of more value, than their northerne broad-cloth that shrinks in the wetting.

We are here taught the Christian use of salutings, blessings, and gratulations: such godly complements are not to be neglected. It is the brand of the Churches enemies. They that go by say not, The blessing of the Lord be upon you, nor we bless you in the name of the LORD: therefore they are cursed; Let them all be confounded that hate Zion. Good men have ever used them: Boaz to the reapers, The Lord be with you: and they answered him, The Lord bless thee. A glorious Angel •hus saluted Gideon. The Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of valor. An Archangel to a poor virgin; Hail thou that art highly favored, the Lord is with thee; Blessed art thou among women. St Paul spends a whole Chap. in salutations; Romans •he last. What people had not their own forms of saluting: the Idumeans Dominus vobiscum: the Ethiopians Pax vobis: the Hebrews Ave, the Romans Salve. Superiors must perform this duty to inferiors. Inferiors in reverence to superiors, all in love one to another. There is a Generation of men that teach, it is unlawful to salute men with good day, God be with you, or leave be to you. They will salute none with a good wish unless they know his business. As if every man's business required so little hast, as to tarry the leisure of their acquaintance. If all men should pledge them in their own cup, they might pass their whole life without a God speed. They say, we cannot tell whether he goes, or about what: it may be he's going to the Tavern to be drunk. It's but a peradventure that he is going to be drunk, but without all peradventure thou art not sober; that darest so rashly judge thy brother. It is a rule in law and love; every man is to be reputed honest till he be disproved. Charity thinks no evil. In Freesland there was a false Prophet, one George David, who called himself God's nephew; and said, heaven was empty, and that he was sent to choose some to fill it. We have some Separatists such mad Prophets, that will elect and damn whom they please. But as themselves say, the Pope hath no authority to make Saints: so we say, they have no authority to make devils. As many of the Popes Saints are reprobates in hell: so many of their reprobates are Saints in heaven.

But they object, that Christ for Greeting taxed the Pharisees; They love greetings in the markets. I answer; he taxed their ambition, not their gratulation, he blamed not their affection, but their affectation. It was the direct charge; When ye come into an house, salute it. But Saint John forbiddeth the Elect Lady, to give some men the good speed. For he that biddeth them God speed, is partaker of their deeds. The answer is easy, the Apostle spake, of some notorious apostates, and dangerous heretics: now to salute such might induce some familiar conference, which he would not have the good Lady admit. So Cyprian, let there be no commerce with them; but simus ab illis tam separati, quàm illi sunt ab Ecclesia profugi Receive them not to thy private house, that will not communicate with thee in God's house. She might be weak and simple, they strong and subtle. For there are some that creep into houses, and lead captive silly women, laden with sins, and led away with diverse lusts: and then the best way is to shut them out of doors. But is every man an heretic, that we should so blanch him? But they plead further; we know not every passenger to be a brother. The greater their pride, that think themselves too good to brother with them that are baptized into Jesus Christ. Charity would presume all those, that are washed in the same Sacramental water with ourselves, to be our brothers. Indeed to declare them truly they think no man their brother, that holds with Ceremony, decency, and discipline. But Saint Paul tells them, that the true bond of unity, is not one ceremony, nor one policy, nor one discipline: but One God, one Faith, one Baptism, &c. There is difference between another discipline, and another doctrine. But lastly they allege, that in these short passages, men talk of God, but think not of him, and so take his name in vain. Nay but is not this rather to take God's name in vain, to avouch so uncouth an error? why shouldst thou think, that men think not of God. For who knoweth the things of man, save the spirit of man which is in him? yield that there is sometimes less intention in these short blessings, then in settled devotions; what then, shall we forbid men to pray, because their minds are often wandering; or children to say grace, because they do not perfectly understand? Certainly it is good to inure the mouth to gracious speeches. Thus Elisha dismissed Naaman, Go in peace: though he did not approve his fact, yet he bids him farewell; Go in peace. If thou doest wish this good to an evil man; thou art never the worse, though he be never the better. First say, Peace be to this house: if the son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon it: if not, it shall turn to you again. So David prayed and mourned for his enemies; and though he could not be heard for them, he was heard for himself: my prayer returned into mine own bosom. If the saluted be going about some bad enterprise, yet our blessing hath more likely hood to reclaim the error of our brother, then to proclaim any error of our own. If God be with him, his bad purpose will be diverted from the execution: our prayers shall not further, but hinder his intended wickedness.

We are further taught here to use good forms in saluting; Grace and peace, gracious not grievous, holy not hollow, blessings not curses: not an execration instead of a benediction. There be idle, profane, and unrellishing complements: either through Curiositie or Curialitie, Christian salutations are thought gross. Instead of God be with you, I kiss your hand, I am your slave, &c. these are the elegancies of our times. Indeed there is one salutation left us, and frequent with us; good in it self, if it had the luck to light into good men's mouths; it is God save you. But as it hath been Satyrically observed, these days are not altogether uncharitable: for whereas God chargeth men to love others as themselves, many love others better than themselves. You shall have a ruffian salute another with God save you Sir: but after some strange attestations, swear away himself with God damn me Sir. So he wishes his friend saved, himself damned. How wretched is it, and unbecoming the tongue of a Christian, when a curse comes instead of a blessing? When a Master shall curse his servants; as if GOD'S curse could not come to his house, but through his own lips. But when it comes to this, that parents curse their children, O fearful! The child kneeles for a blessing, the father gives it a curse. If we wish the plague and such noisome diseases to them that live with us, how should we scape it ourselves.

Let us always therefore wish well to our friends; Grace, peace, and salvation: yea to our very enemies; Bless them that curse you. For if Grace comes, Quamvis antea mali Inimici, jam nec erunt mali nec inimici: though before they were evil enemies, now they shall be neither evil nor enemies. You see now the sweetness of the Apostles benediction: Origen thinks no whit inferior to the blessings pronounced by the Patriarchs: as the blessing of Noah upon Sem and Japheth: Melchisedeks upon Abraham: Isaac's upon Jacob: because they blessed by the same Spirit. For Saint Peter might say with Saint Paul, I think also that I have the Spirit of God. Only it was not usual in the Old Testament to use this blessing of Grace: for the Law was given by Moses, but Grace and Truth came by JESUS CHRIST.

Grace and Peace: this is the voice of the Ministers of the Gospel: so CHRIST directed them. Luke 10. Peace be to you. The Prophets began with vae, woe. Esa. 1. woe to a sinful nation. Hos. 4. The Lord hath a controversy with the land. Amos 1. For three transgressions, and for four, &c. But the Gospel begins, Fear. not, for I bring you tidings of great joy that shall be to all people. We have not received the Spirit of bondage to fear again, but the Spirit of adoption whereby we cry Abba Father. They come not with bitter violence, like those two hot Disciples, whom nothing could content but fire from heaven. But is there not a time to reprove, as well as to comfort? yes, there is a season when that still voice that came to Elijah, the voice that thou hearest behind thee; those low whisperings can do no good. And then God is content, we should derive from his Throne thunderings, and lightnings, and louder sounds. Revel. 4.5. When Israel in Moses absence had turned-beasts, and calved an idolatrous image: Moses did not dance after their pipe, and laugh at their superstitious merriment: but with great zeal reproved their folly, and with indignation confounded their Idol. Behold, the whole earth sitteth still, and is at rest: the people sit down to eat and drink, and rise up to play. If this be the worlds state, we should be false prophets to cry nothing but peace. If your lives proclaim wars against God, we must denounce God's wars against you. We would fain at every Sermon say nothing, but Peace to this Audience, but our God says, There is no peace to the wicked. We would sing with the Angels, Peace on earth, and good will towards men: But how shall we sing the Lord's songs in a strange land? we have preached honor, and peace, and salvation, and an incorruptible crown of glory; and were not regarded. What remains then, but to preach fire from heaven, mists, and clouds, and darkness, and torments for days and nights, and eternal generations of years? We have sung, With thee O Lord is mercy, that thou mayest be feared: now we change our note, with thee is vengeance, that thou mayest be feared. If the spirit of gentleness can do no good, a rod must come. If the songs of Zion cannot mollify, the thunders of Sinai must terrify. A man is desperately sick, another tells him of great riches, of Lordships and manners, and fair purchases; alas this is an unseasonable speech: he answers, first Redde me sanum, then Fac divitem: first restore me to health, then talk to me of wealth: me's souls are sick of sin, and at deaths door; never tell them of heaven and an immortal kingdom, till they be first recovered from the jaws of hell, and delivered out of the snare of the devil: first humble them by the Law, then revive them with the Gospel Videamus Lacrymas, let us see your humiliation, your repentance; let us hear your groans, we will then give your comforts: we dare not apply the oil of consolation, til we have scowred your festered wounds with the sharp wine of reprehension. When we behold your cheeks blubbered with tears, your hands beating your breasts, your cries resounding at heaven-gates for mercy: then is the time to say Grace, and Peace unto you.

Grace. To omit the diverse acceptions of Grace, by it is generally meant, the receiving of the sinner into the Covenant of mercy, into God's favor by Christ. It is our second Birth: our first was ex libidine Carnis, of the lust of the flesh: our second ex aqua & sanguine, of water and blood by the holy Ghost. Thus are we changed into other men: as in the Resurrection we shall be the same and not the same; Caro eadem & non, the same in substance, not in quality. So in our first resurrection by Grace, a man is Idem & non Idem, the same and not the same: the same for constitution, not the same for disposition. For before our hearts were proud, now they are made humble: before covetous, now charitable: before set on worldly delights, now on the righteousness of Christ, and the invaluable riches of a good conscience.

Christian virtues are not natural: a man is not more borne with grace in his soul, then with apparel on his back. There is none righteous, no not one. If there were, what need was there of a new creation? The Philosophers said that Nature had Igniculos & semina virtutum, the sparks and seeds of virtue in it. But Saint Paul says, Novi quod in carne non est bonum: I know that in me (that is, in my flesh) dwelleth no good thing: but if there be any good in me, by the grace of God I am that I am. The Rhemists quarrel with Saint Paul, for calling concupiscence a sin, which he proves to be a breach of the last Commandment. Rom. 7.7. For I had not known Concupiscence, except the Law had said, Thou shalt not covet. They have in their Catechisms put out one of the former Precepts, and to make up again the Decalogue, and number of Ten, they have cut the last Precept into twain. There to serve their turns, they make of the last Commandment, two; here to serve their turns, they make of it, none. They are great patrons of Nature in their doctrines, and enemies of Grace: yet Nature is not so much beholding to them neither. For they take children from mothers, obedience of subjects from Kings; care of preservation from a man's self; hurry them into damageable, yea, damnable precipices; and dissolve all natural combinations. Their Jupiter Capitolinus must drink nothing but human blood. Yet they are all for Nature, as if they cared not for Grace.

There is Gratia gratis agens, a grace that works freely, but not effectually; which may be had, and lost; and this is short of the Apostles wish. There is Gratia gratum faciens, a grace that makes him acceptable to God that hath it; this the Apostle wisheth, and it can never be lost. It is the living fire of the Spirit, that can never be quenched. Mittam Paracletum in aeternum: I will send you a Comforter, that shall abide with you forever. But how did the Grace of this Spirit abide in David and Peter, in the midst of those fearful lapses; which might be called in respect of Manners, plain apostacies? Spiritus concussus, non excussus: gratia mota, non amota: The grace was shaken in them, not shaken out of them: it was moved, not removed. There was Gratiae remissio, non amissio: A weakening, not annihilation of grace. This is that Grace, which makes our bodies the Temples of the Holy Ghost; whereas sin renders them the Devils kitchens.

Grace; what need the Apostle wish this to them that already had it: for all they that have received the Gospel, have also received grace? To this we answer diversely: 1. By Grace in these Apostolical benedictions, Ambrose only understands the remission of sins: Tollet Donum animae, a certain gift of the soul which makes men acceptable to God: but no gift of the soul can make it acceptable to God, but only his favor in Christ. The Poets took Grace pro venustate, for a delectable beauty, sightlinesse, or trimnesse of behavior. But Divinity teacheth us, that it is the favor of God towards us in his Son JESUS; By whom we have access into this Grace wherein we stand; that is, the favor of God. It is his Grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the Beloved. And we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his Grace. In a word, Grace is Bifrons, like John the Baptist, it looks two ways, and is taken so especially. First, for God's favor whereby we are made just: then for the Gifts of the Spirit, whereby we are made holy: that's the mother, these the daughters: that 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, these 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉. Now then here is Grace taken in the effects: as Paul, Ephes. 6.24. Grace be with all them that love the Lord Jesus. Now all they that love the Lord Jesus, have the mother grace, that's the favor of God: therefore the Apostle wisheth the multiplication and confirmation of the daughters, the blessed effects of this favor. If any man object, What needs man more than the grace of God? I answer, the grace of God that justifies hath neither majus nor minus, admits no latitude, as being absolute and perfect in it self: for a man cannot be more than justified. But the grace of God that sanctifies, needs continual increasing: the Talents entrusted by the Lord to his servants, Matth. 25.15. are Graces given: the husbanding, trafficking, and thriving with those Talents, is the improvement of those graces. I hope there is no man hath so much grace in his opinion, that he will scorn or refuse another's appreciation; The Grace of Jesus Christ be with thee.

This is one answer; that Grace may be very well wished to them that already have it. But that distinction which Saint Paul himself implies, Rom. 6. betwixt being in grace, and being under grace; doth yet more contentfully satisfy. For as Augustine said; It is one thing to walk in the Law, another thing to walk under the Law: so it is one thing to be sub gratia, and another to be in gratia. To live under grace is opposed to the state of the Law: Ye are not under the Law, but under Grace. To live in Grace is opposed to the state of Sin. Vers. 2. How shall we that by grace are dead to sin, live any longer therein? There are four differences:

Some are

- In Grace, but not under grace.
- Under Grace, but not in Grace.
- Neither in Grace, nor under Grace.
- Both in Grace, and under Grace.

1 Many Prophets and holy men of the first times lived in Grace, but not under Grace. They desired to see the day of Christ, and to hear such things as we have heard, and were not suffered, yet were they saved by faith in the redemption to come, and led their lives in the grace of Christ.

2 Many in our times live under Grace, but they live not in Grace: hearing the Gospel, and receiving the Grace of God in vain. They have normam gratiae in their heads, and formam gratiae in their dissembling professions, but not veritatem gratiae, the truth of grace in their hearts. They are in the light, but the light is not in them. They have accepted the show, but denied the power of godliness: they say, they are Grac's, but grace is none of theirs.

3 The unbleeving Gentiles were neither in grace, nor under grace. Not in it, for they walked after their own lusts. Not under it, for they were without Christ, and strangers from the covenant of promise. The Sun was not risen to them, they could not see it.

4 They that now believe are both under grace, and in it. Under it, as released à damnatione peccati, from the damning power of sin; for no damnation to them that are in Christ. In it, as delivered à dominione peccati, from the reigning power of sin; that they no more obey it in the lusts thereof. The God of all mercy be blessed, that hath given us this grace; and may our thankful hearts ever acknowledge it. For we are no more strangers and forrenners, but Fellow-citizens with the Saints, and of the household of God. Christ now speaks to us by the mouth of his Ministers, Come servant, Intra in Domini gratiam; Enter into thy Masters Grace: one day he will speak by his own mouth, Intra in Domini gloriam, Enter into thy Masters Glory.

Peace, is also diversely accepted: here I take it specially for the tranquility of conscience; that which follows righteousness. For the Kingdom of Heaven consists in righteousness, in peace, and joy of the Holy Ghost. Being justified by faith, we have peace with God. In the latitude it may comprehend all those things that conduce to our well-being. It is a sweet nature; Pacem te poscimus omnes: who loves not peace? If any man hate peace; his neighbour-hood, his company, his breath, his very sight is offensive to men. My soul hath too long dwelt with him, that hateth peace. If some particulars be divided, and lose their peace, the General mourns. For the divisions of Reuben there were great thoughts of heart. Let it be the Epitaph of Antichrist, Discords common Incendiary, as of Pope Sixtus. Non potuit saevum vis ulla extinguere Sixtum: Audito tandem nomine Pacis, obit. No war, no contention could kill Sixtus: but when he heard the name of Peace, he swooned and died. But let it be a Simeons song; Nunc dimittis in Pace. Lord, let thy servant depart in peace. There is Peace external, Peace internal, Peace eternal. An outward peace of the world. If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men. An inward peace of the mind, consisting in the tranquility of well ordered affections, and in the conscience of a man's own innocence; men's sancta, pax sancita. An everlasting peace of God; when the Holy Ghost dwelleth with us, and in us. This comes not alone, but hath before it Iugum meum, Matth. 11. Take up my yoke, and you shall find peace. And Crucem meam, take up my Cross, and you shall have peace. And Luke 2.29. Servum meum, he must be my Servant: and Verbum meum, follow my Word: and then he shall have Pacem meam, my Peace. And so I come from considering this sweet pair of Graces asunder, to join them again together, as I found them: whence derive we three observations:

1 It is not enough to wish grace to the souls of our friends, but also peace; that is, health to their bodies, and other temporal blessings? Nothing but Grace? Yes doubtless. Paul begins his second Epistle to the Corinthians with Grace and Peace: and ends it with a Farewell; Valete Fratres. Which demonstration of love extends as far as all manner of prosperity; for heaven or earth, for soul or body. Our Savior's Prayer was not only for Grace, Thy kingdom come; but also for daily bread. Saint John to his well-beloved Gains, wished above all things that he might prosper, and be in health, as his soul prospered. He that wisheth not well to his brothers body, never wished well to his soul. The good man's desire is for both; Vt sit men's sana in corpore sano: That there may dwell a sound soul in a sound body. And this not in a formal complement, but an inward heartiness. For there are some that speak peace to their neighbors, but mischief is in their hearts. And Judas had an Hail Master, so well as Gabriel an Hail Mary. We pray for you, only do you wish well to yourselves: cross not another's prayers for your own good.

2 The Apostle puts Grace before Peace: so Nature told us in the mouth of her great Secretary, Aristotle; that Justice, is the elder sister to Peace. Agreement in evil is not love, but conspiracy: such men have only Metum & noxam conscientiae pro foedere: The terror and guilt of conscience for their combination. The Scripture tells us, that Righteousness and Peace have kissed each other. Aug. Fiat justitia, & habebis pacem: Live righteously, and thou shalt have peace. Depart from evil, do good, seek Peace, and pursue it: nay thou shalt not need to follow it, for it shall follow thee: Peace will come of it self to seek Righteousness. On the contrary, where is no love of goodness, there can be no goodness of love. We ask our Watchman, as Jehoram did Jehu; Is it Peace? He must answer, Alas what peace, when there is no grace? There is many a Dives dreaming of nothing but ease and peace in his life; Soul take thy rest, eat, drink, and be merry. There is many a Balaam desiring nothing but peace in his death: but he must live in grace, that would die in peace. It is a vulgarisme; such a man died like a Lamb, though perhaps he lived like a Wolf. As though Consumptions might not spend men's choleric humors, Apoplexies stop the passages, which otherwise would not be fuller of pains than reluctations; as though palseyes might not take away speech, Lethargies dull, and Dropsies drown the vital spirits. There be many causes in Nature to make men die quietly, not sanctifiedly. Sisera after a draught of milk was no more sensible of Iaels hammer, than Holofernes after a tun of wine was of Iudiths sword. But true Peace will not sup, where Grace hath not broken her fast. Our peace below is a continual war against Satan: shall be above, an eternal victory over Satan. Be diligent, that you may be found of God in peace, without spot and blameless. You see the way to be found of God in peace; it is to be furnished with Grace, to be without spot and blameless.

3 The Apostle wisheth to us the best things, Grace and Peace. There be two Fiends that torment us, Sin and a bad Conscience. Now Grace delivers from Sin, and Peace doth quiet the Conscience. By these two mentioned, may all graces and blessings be Synecdochically understood: howsoever, where these are truly, the rest cannot be wanting Jehoshaphat gave all his children portions, and legacies, silver and gold: but he gave the kingdom to Jehoram: God gives the best to the best. Spiritual things from God in Christ are most to be desired of us, and they love us best that wish us these things. It is not pleasure our Apostle wished them; pleasures are like Iairus minstrels, music in a house of mourning: there is more need of Lachrymae and lamentations for our sins. Not security; for a wicked man's secure and untroubled mind is mare mortuum, like the dead sea; smooth and even at the top, but deep and deadly in the bottom. Not honor and advancement; this builds up many like Babels Tower, that their end might be confusion. Not riches; they are often like Absalom's hair, an ornament to hang himself: or an unruly Iade, that knocks out his masters brains, when he hath once cast him out of the saddle. No nor an outward pomp, and glorious pride of state and ceremonies: thus Rome hath lost the blood of her heart to paint her garments. These outward things may swarm together like those Idolaters to the house of Baal, 2 King. 10. But if you ask, as Jehu did there, Is there not a servant of the Lord amongst them? Is there not one grace among all that rabble and throng? No, never a grace: then must all the rest perish, as the worshippers of Baal fell by the sword of Jehu. None of these things our Apostle wisheth; but that which truly makes happy, and brings with it enough of other comforts, Grace and Peace. This makes men equal to Angels, and the want thereof casts down to devils. That which causeth a man to stand before Princes, is noble birth, honorable valor, abundant wealth, oraculous wisdom, eminent place and offices. But that which makes a man stand boldly before the Judgment seat of God, is only Grace and Peace, the free and eternal favor of the Deity in the merits of Jesus Christ. To conclude this; as we say we have grace, let us lead gracious lives: as we would have peace, let us decline unrighteousness which dissolves it. And then God shall fulfill in your hearts Saint Peters wish; the Grace of our Lord shall be with you; and the Peace of God which passeth all understanding, shall preserve your hearts and minds in Jesus Christ.

Be multiplied unto you. I come from the matter to the measure of his wish; the increase and multiplication of these blessings. For the goods of this world the best point of Arithmetic is Division: Beatius dare quàm accipere, said our Lord Jesus. It is a better thing to give than to receive. But for heavenly and unperishing graces the best point is multiplication. As he that for worldly riches doth not divide whiles he lives, shall find an empty Quotient when he is dead. So he that for heavenly gifts doth not multiply in life, shall find his Summa totalis in death; poverty, vanity, vacuity. Here observe two inferences.

1 That there is no plenary perfection in this life, for we must still be in multiplying our graces. Bern. Quomodo profitis, si jam tibi sufficis? Who cares to thrive, that thinks he hath sufficient? The highest Saint on earth, is but like the Ark of the Covenant; a Cubite and a half high: perfectly imperfect when he begins, unperfectly perfect when he ends. When we have done all that is commanded us, we are not only confined to be, but also charged to call ourselves, unprofitable servants. There was a sect of Puritans, that thought themselves so full of grace, that they refused one Petition in the Lord's Prayer; Dimitte nobis debita nostra, Forgive us our trespasses. And *Philip Neri*us conceited himself so full of God, that he used to say, Recede à me Domine; Depart further from me Lord, for I am holy enough: perhaps he thought, if God should pour in more wine of Grace, it would burst the vessel; and that he was full before. He spake not with Peters intention, Discede, quia sum peccator; Depart from me, for I am a sinful man: but out of a plethory of pride; Discede, quia sum sufficienter justus; Depart, for I am sufficiently righteous. Nor as Elias, It is enough, take away my life from me, for I am no better than my Fathers: but, It is enough, take away thy hand from me, for I am better than all my fathers: cease thy bounty, stay thy hand from giving, I need no more. As Cain with his Major iniquitas, confessed his sin greater than GOD could forgive: so this man with his Minor iniquitas, esteemed his sin less than GOD need to consider. But as there is that maketh himself poor, yet hath much riches; so there is that maketh himself rich, yet is very poor. There is not a poorer wretch than Laodicea, that bragged, she had need of nothing. They that think to overcome God with a thousand of their good works, God will come against them with ten thousand of their sins; a huge army: and one thousand sins will bea down ten thousand good works. Cant. 1.11. We will make thee borders of gold, with studs of silver. The worlds fashion is to gild silver with gold, and to put the best side outward: but the manner of the Saints is to overlay gold with silver, and to be like the Kings daughter, most Glorious within. Moses had a glorious countenance, but he covered it with a veil: these have base and deformed minds, yet boast a shining perfection.

2 That we seek to multiply our grace and peace. Qui sat habet, nihil habet. He hath nothing, that thinks he hath enough. If Christ have healed thee of the palsy, he chargeth thee not to stand still, but Take up thy bed, and walk. We must like the Israelites, every day gather Manna till the Sabbath comes; be multiplying graces until our eternal Sabbath in heaven. In my Fathers house are many mansions; thither must a Christian arrive, before he can sue out his Quietus est. Every thing now is either Vinculum or Vehiculum; a Chaine or a Chariot, an hindrance or a furtherance. O happy soul that can make vincula vehicula, his thwarters that cross him, become his Porters to carry him, to the place of his rest. And can climb up by the ragged rocks of afflictions, to the victorious garrison of heaven. Crescite & multiplicamini; as God said to the man and to the woman when he put them into the world; increase and multiply: so he blesseth his graces, when his holy Spirit sows them in our hearts. Qui requiescit tempore laboris, laborabit tempore quietis. He that rests in the time of labor, shall labor in the time of rest. Let them both grow together, saith God, of the corn and tares, until the harvest. Matth. 13. Now if the tares grow so fast for the fire, let the good corn grow faster for the barn. The vessels whereinto Christ miraculated wine, were filled up to the brim. The vessels of God's grace, which by a greater miracle are made to hold a celestial nature, must be full up to the brim. It is said of Steven, that he was full of the Holy Ghost: full? so was Christ only. The School answers, there is three degrees of fullness; Apta, AEqua, Cumulata. An apt or fit and meet fullness; as when a house is well furnished, we say it is full. An equal or measurable fullness, when it is even with the content of the receiver; so a vessel is full to the brim. A cumulate or heaped fullness, when it overflows the continent: such a fullness in Christ; in whom dwelleth all the fullness of the God-head bodily. This filled his humanity with fullness of grace, the oil of gladness prae suciis; above all his fellows, and for all his members: and of his fullness have we all received, grace for grace. Ours then is Plenitudo sufficientiae, his Superabundantiae; ours sufficient, his superabundant. Now this same Apt plenitude we may have in this life, but that Equall plenitude is only to be expected in heaven.

Seeing this multiplying to fullness is required, let us not content ourselves with a vacuity, or with little more than will cover the bottom. There are some utterly empty, and void of the Spirit. Quantum est in rebus inane! What an emptiness of grace is in many men's hearts! There are some that turn this grace into wantonness: as if God were bound to fill the vessel so fast as they empty it; or to multiply their peace when they spend it in riot. You shall see everywhere a fullness of iniquity: a measure so heaped, and pressed, and thrust together, and yet running over: that Non habet ulterius quod eorum moribus addat Posteritas; No after generations can exceed them. Where is a vacuity of grace, must needs be a plenitude of sin. Inopem me copia fecit, too much fullness keeps them empty. They have hands full, eyes full, mouths full, houses full, hearts full. Hands full of blood, and bribes. Isaiah 1. Eyes full of adultery and covetice: mouths full of cursing and bitterness: houses full of spoils: hearts full of impletie: they multiply sins like the sands; but diminish Graces. Two sorts he•e reprovab•e.

1 Temporizers, that never multiply, but stand at a stay; neither ebb nor flow, but just standing water between Religion and profaneness. Neither hot nor cold, but luke-warm: heat and cold have their uses, but between both is good for nothing, but to trouble the stomach. They go about many things, but bring about nothing. Omnia pro tempore, nihil pro veritate, Optat. They are all for the Time, nothing for the Truth. Like a Toppe, that goes always round, but never goes forward unless it be whipt. Like a Mill-horse that runs about in a circle all day, at night you take him out where you put him in. Or like a door, that rides all day on the hinges, and keeps out, or lets in visitants; but it self is never the nearer home at night. Ephraim is a cake not turned: their cake is dough, it will never serve for bread at GOD'S board. One propounded to Athenaeus this riddle: How a man and no man, with a stone and no stone, should kill a bird and no bird, sitting on a tree and no tree? He resolved it; that the man was an Eunuch, the stone a Pumise, the bird a Bat, the tree a Fennell. The Temporizer expounds that riddle in himself; for he is a Christian and no Christian, like that man and no man: his courage is no courage like the Pumise, which is a stone and no stone: his profession is no profession, like that Bat, which is a bird and no bird: (wherefore let him cast away either his wings or his teeth, and so become either a bird or a beast) his conscience no conscience; like the Fennell, a tree and no tree. His whole religion is like adulterated Wine, some of the Bastards; when the guest asks the drawer what Wine it is, he presently replies; Sir, what would you have it to be? his religion is the same you would have it. The Mustard hath the least seed, but grows up to the greatest tree: this man you would take to be the greatest tree, but his fruit is so small you can scarce see it. These time-servers love to prey upon novelties, as Atalanta on the golden apples, and lose the prize. Among the unclean fowls forbidden; Levite. 11. one is the Sea-maw, which we call the Gull. Unclean, saith one; Quia sicut ales volat, & sicut aquatile nat at: Because it flies like a fowl, and swims like a fish. Not unlike the Syriphian Frogge, Mthi terra lacusque. We have such fowls and unclean Gulls; that fly in England with the wings of hypocrisy, and swim in the sea of Rome with the sins of Idolatry. These be straglers, far from hitting the mark of salvation. When Diogenes saw a bungling archer about to shoot, he ran as fast as he could to the mark: the lookers on demanded the reason, he answered. I stand here to make sure work that he may not hit me: for this fellow never means to come near the mark. It will be hard for him that observes the time, to preserve the truth.

2 Revolters, that do not multiply, but subtract; growing worse and worse; so far from acquiring graces they had not, that they lose them they had. Like Nebuchadnezzar's dreamed Image, the head might be of gold, but the feet was of clay and dirt; they have a muddy ending. In the Roman Indictions, the first year they paid gold as to the Crown: the second year, silver for the soldiers pay: the third year brass, for armor. So some have been in persecution golden Saints, in peace silver professors, at last brazen or leaden worldlings. I have read of certain trees, that on the Monday have been growing in the Forest, and before Sunday following, under sails on the sea. Neere to Calipolis there are by report, certain trees, that shoot up apace, and grow in a short time to such height, as a man may from their tops see the City Ilium; and then they presently wither. These men spring fast at first, and seem tall Cedars in profession: but when once they come to the sight of the City of God, then they waste away: not like the good tree, Psalms. 1. that brings forth his fruit in due season: but rather when the season comes wherein fruit is to be gathered, they elude the Masters expectation. Rome, that was once so famous for the Faith, yet apostated; How is that faithful City become an harlot! It is a fearful saying; It is impossible for them who have been made partakers of the Holy Ghost, &c. if they fall away, to be renewed again by repentance. I suppose he means a moral impossibility; so great a difficulty, that setting aside the almighty power of the Spirit, they cannot be recovered.

Let us then be like the Sun and the Moon; without retrogradations. There was an ordinance for the Israelites concerning their entry into God's house: He that entereth into worship by the way of the North-gate, shall go out by the way of the South-gate: he that entereth in by the way of the South-gate, shall go out by the way of the North-gate: no man shall go out the same way he came in. So the Wise-men were charged, to depart into their own Country, another way. Teaching us a straight course, to go continually forward. It is but a Poetical fiction, how Orpheus went to fetch his wife Euridice from hell; which was granted him on this condition, that he should not look back upon her, till he had brought her to heaven. But, Flexit amans oculos, & protinus illa relapsa est; he looked back, and lost her. It is a Scriptural truth, that Lots wife for looking back to her desired Sodom, was turned into a pillar of salt. Therefore, Remember that woman, saith CHRIST: that pillar of salt, ut te condat; that it may season thee, saith Augustine. It is observable, Ephes. 6. That Paul describing the whole Armor of God, and numbering all the pieces; makes no mention of a back curet for the Christian soldier. There's a helmet for the head, a corselet for the breast, a shield for the fore-parts; but no guard, no regard of the back. It is a panoply, a complete Armor, yet no defense for the back. Teaching us that we must never show our back in God's wars: we must rather die than fly; continuing faithful to the end, not leaving the banner of Christ, till we have gotten the full victory. When Bias fell into the hands of his enemies, his soldiers flying, and crying: What shall we do? He answered with noble resolution; Tell ye the living, that I die fighting: and I will tell the dead that ye did escape flying. When William the Conqueror landed his Army in Sussex: he presently caused his ships to be sunk, that there might remain no hopes of running back again; they must stand to it. Let us all learn to multiply our graces: he that spends of the stock and never increaseth, shall come to beggary. Be not enticed with every vanity, to forsake your first love. Intemporall lendings, you think it scarce enough to have the surplusage of ten in the hundred: in spiritual things you think it enough and enough again to hold your own. You lend one money, if he comes and tenders the principal without interest, you grudge at it: yet God lends you grace, and you come at last, with Domine ecce tuum; Lord, behold thine own: You know the reward; Cast that unprofitable servant into outer darkness. No, but let him that is righteous, be righteous still: and let him that is holy, be more holy. Let us go from strength to strength, till we all appear before God in Zion.

Through the knowledge of God, and of JESUS our Lord. I have done with the matter, and the measure; nor come to the manner. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . Which intends not simplicem cognitionem, sed super agnitionem, sive posteram cognitionem Dei: It is not a mere and simple knowledge, but an acknowledgement; a reflective and doubling knowledge. By 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 they understand such a knowledge of God, as was in the Philosophers, Poets, and Naturalists; Vi naturae congenita; acquired by the light of nature. That which may be known of God, &c. But this 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 is such a knowledge, as comes by God's word, which makes us wise to salvation. The word is accepted and read three ways. Ordinarily for knowledge: sometimes for acknowledgement. 1 Cor. 16.18. Acknowledge them that are such. Sometimes for knowing again: there is knowledge Mental, Sacramental, Experimentall. The first is by the light of Nature; the second is by the power of Grace, the third by the practice of life, and continual proving the favor of God: of this knowledge more largely hereafter: here only observe two things.

1 The means of multiplying grace and peace in our hearts is knowledge of God. This is eternal life to know God, and whom he hath send, Jesus CHRIST. They that know thy name; will put their trust in thee. The cause of sin and ruin is want of knowledge; Hos. 4.1. swearing, and lying, and killing, and stealing abound, because there is no knowledge of God in the land. Therefore Christ shall come in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God. The want of the Sun is the cause of darkness, the privation of knowledge the position of all ungodliness. Though it be true, that Peccata scientium peccatis ignorantium praeponuntur; The knowing offender shall be scourged with sharpest rods: yet multi ut liberius peccarent, libenter ignorant; many affect an ignorance not necessary, that they may sin with the more security. Nondum scient? aliquando sentient. Will they not know? they shall feel.

2 There is something in grace and knowledge still wanting, that must be multiplied and increased: for we know but in part. Therefore a man should be often perusing and looking over his own evidence; as we review our assurances of worldly possessions; that he may be sure of the whole and every part of it: for it is dangerous to have any flaw or defect in our conveyance of salvation: which albeit it be ever sound on God's part, is not so on ours. The falls of a regenerate man much darken his knowledge: therefore when we have sinned, it is not enough to renew our repentance, but we must rub over and polish our knowledge. Men may know much in their understandings by thinking of it; but we must double this knowledge in our affections and hearts, by feeling it. For there is no knowledge so comfortable, as the experimental certainty of God's favor. Mans heart is like a vessel, the means of conveying knowledge to it is like a pipe: the Spirit of God like the wheel that pours the water into the pipe, the Minister is the servant that opens the cock. Now the reason why our knowledge is so small; is either because the cock always runs not, or not in that measure, or rather because our vessels be stopped, or it runs out by leakage, or it runs over, by reason of the former fullness; and repletion with the lusts of this world: man's heart is so full of crackes and flawes, that it cannot hold the water of life.

And of Jesus our Lord. There is no knowing of God with comfort, but through Jesus Christ. No man knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him. Otherwise we may know him Fortem ultorem, a just and omnipotent avenger: in Christ only misericordem Patrem, the Father of mercies, and God of all comfort. No man can see me, and live; saith God to Moses, Exod. 33.20. Woe to that man, who removing Christ will attempt to comprehend God in his Majesty. Without Him he that increaseth knowledge, increaseth his own sorrow, his own torment. In him are hid all the treasures of wisdom, and knowledge. By the Son is the Father known: If ye had known me, ye had known my Father also. Other religions begin at the highest, the Christian at the lowest; God manifested in the flesh. He that will climb to heaven, must ascend by this ladder: begin therefore as Christ began; in the womb of the Virgin, at the manger, then get up to the Cross, and lastly mount up to the Crown. Wouldest thou know God? run first to the cradle, embrace the Infant; behold him sucking, growing, roaring, crying, dying: and thou shalt thus arise from knowing God in Christ by faith, to know him in himself by glory.

It is observable, that our Apostle often gildeth his Epistle with the name of JESUS, and CHRIST. Twice in the first verse, once again in the second, four times after in the Chapter. He runs upon this note, as David did upon mercy, Psal. 136. Little difference; for no mercy but through JESUS, and JESUS is all mercy. It is the sweetest music; Melos in aure, Iubilus in cord: Angelical melody in the ear, Evangelical harmony in the heart. Saint Paul in his Epistles mentions the name of JESUS four hundred and sixty times, and upwards. Neither is this repetition only of love, but of necessity: for it is impossible that grace and mercy should be to us, but by JESUS CHRIST. Si scribas, non placet nisi legam ibi Iesum, &c. If thou writest, I like not thy letters, unless I find them beautified with JESUS: if thou conferrest, thy discourse is without relish, if it be without JESUS. Mallem non esse, quàm sine Jesus esse: I had rather not be at all, than be without JESUS. A reverend Father was so ravished with the sweetness, and transported with the zeal of this name, that he professed; I had rather be out of heaven with CHRIST, than in heaven without Christ. But our heart is far too narrow to comprehend this infinitely sweet Savior, therefore I will end with that end of a divine sonnet; O CHRIST, I would fain receive thee; but

Now I want space, now grace: to ease all smart, Since my heart holds not thee, hold thou my heart.

Now as all grace and peace is from our LORD JESUS CHRIST; so let us ascribe all honor and glory to our Lord Jesus CHRIST; forever and ever Amen.

Ver. 3. According as his divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain to life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue.

The Connection shall be forborne a little, and give way to the distribution. The whole Verse may be distinguished into two generals; the Fountain; wherein observe the - Hope of the Petitioner; According as he hath.

- Ability of the Giver; Divine power.
- Liberty of the Action; Hath given.
- Necessity of the Receivers; Unto us.
- Universality of the Gift; All things that pertain to life and godliness.

Cistern; wherein observe the

- Water of life; wherein consider
 - Who; God.
 - What; Hath called.
 - Whom; Vs.

- Whether; To glory and virtue.
- Pipe or Bucket to draw and derive all to us; Through the knowledge of him.

The whole being thus let fall into parts, let us proceed orderly to take up the first, and view it. This is the hope of the Petitioner; which with a remarkable dependence knits this Verse with the former; and begetteth this doctrine from the Coherence. The experience of former mercy, works a persuasion of future mercy. The Apostle desired the multiplying of their grace and peace; and he grounds it on this hope, because the LORD hath already given them much. He hath begun, therefore he trusts that he will finish. There is no stronger argument of God's infallible readiness to grant our requests, than the experience of his former concessions. So David reasons. The Lord that delivered me from the Lion and the Bear, will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine. This is argumentum a priori, the voice of a strong faith, that persuades the conscience God will be gracious to him, because he hath been gracious. The Prophet thus often comforted his soul: Thou Oh God, hast enlarged me, when I was in distress, therefore have mercy upon me, and hear my prayer. So Psalms 86.13. Thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell: therefore Verse 16. O turn unto me, and have mercy upon me. Let the Iustitaries deduce arguments from their own present merits, my soul from God's former mercies. Thou, O Lord, madest me good, restoredst me when I was evil, therefore have mercy upon me miserable sinner, and give me thy salvation. Thus Paul grounded his assurance; because the LORD had stood with him, and delivered him out of the Lions mouth; therefore the Lord shall deliver me still from every evil work, and preserve me unto his heavenly kingdom. Hence was his Novi, I know whom I have believed. The Prophets distressed soul cried; Will the Lord cast off forever? is his mercy clean gone forever? hath God forgotten to be gracious? No, he recollects himself, Ver. 10. with the memory of precedent favors; I will remember the years of the right hand of the most High; I will remember the works of the Lord, and his wonders of old. Man useth to reason thus; I have been good to such a one, therefore he need not exact upon me, and over-burden my kindness. God thus; I have been liberal, therefore I will be liberal; multa dedit, sed plura daturus. To him shall be given; because the good he hath, is but an earnest of God's greater bounty. He takes up man's soul as a poor beggar at his door, strips off her tattered rags, gives her a suit out of her own wardrobe, adorns her with rich Jewels, and then as if all this were too little, loves her still better and better; lastly marries her to his own son, and so interests her to the inheritance of glory. You see the foundation of the Apostles prayer, the experience of God's sweet nature; who multiplies his graces. Let not this point part with us, till it hath taught us two things: to pray faithfully, and to live thankfully.

1 Let us pray in confidence that God will hear us, because he hath heard us. Come we boldly to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy. God's facility in his wonted grants, gives us strong consolation. A noble Princesse asked a Courtier, when he would leave begging: he answered, when she left giving. God never ceaseth to give, let us never cease to beg. Who can go with more courage to the King, than the man experienced of his goodness? But if we be so confident, how comes it to pass, that we sometimes fail of our suits, and return denied. I answer, the defect is in ourselves; God is the same in bounty, but we are not the same in duty. We ask either Mala, or Male; either bad things to a good purpose, or good things to a bad purpose.

Evil things, either evil in themselves, or to the petitioners: in themselves one calls Prayer Petitio decentium, a Request of convenient things. What a good father will not give, let a good son not ask; not a serpent instead of a fish, nor a stone for bread. We must not beg a serpent, lest it should hurt ourselves, nor a stone, lest we should hurt others. Non petitur in nomine Salvatoris, quod petitur contra rationem salutis. August. That is not requested in the name of our Savior, that is requested against the rule of salvation. The Disciples asked many things, and had them: but when they asked fire from heaven, they had it not. If it be not fit for God to give, it is not fit for us to ask. The Lord hears ever Quod finem, though not ever Quoad formam: audit ad sanitatem, if not ad voluntatem. If our will be not according to our weal, God denieth the form of our requests, and gives us the end: he withholdeth the worse, and affordeth the better. Paul besought the Lord thrice that the thorn in the flesh might depart from him. God did not hear him in that particular, but heard him in the general; my grace is sufficient for thee: my strength is made perfect in weakness. He was not quite delivered from the temptation in himself, but he was fortified with the sufficiency of God. The man sick of the burning fever cries to his Physician for drink; he pities him, but does not satisfy him: he gives him proper physic, but not drink. So God, saith Augustine, Non tribuit quod volumus, ut tribuat quod malimus: he does not give us what we would have, but what we should have. Perhaps he crosseth us in our affection, but blesseth us in our salvation. The younger brother shall not have all his portion, lest he run to riot: nor the gallant ever enjoy health, lest he be too proud. Saepe Deus facit opus quod non est suum, ut faciat opus quod est suum. Thus a man is afflicted, that he may be humbled and many sores are on the flesh, that fewer sins may be in the soul.

Or when we ask good things, but to an evil purpose. So the envious begs honor, that he may revenge himself on his enemies. Young men ask health, that they may be strong for licentiousness. Others require great places and offices, and to have somewhat to do about the fire, that they may warm their own fingers. As if a man should be ambitious of the Pretorship in the City; that so with mulcts ameracements, warrants, and bribes, he may maintain his family, and never go to his coffers for money. Some desire learning, that they may be factious: others riches, not to serve God, preserve the state, nor relieve the poor; but to grow fatt with idleness, and domineer over their neighbors. Ye fight and war, yet you have not, because you ask not. Ask not! alas we beg continually, yet cannot speed: the error is not in the want of asking. Where is it then? ye ask and receive not, because you ask amiss. Ver. 3. you fail in your manner of requesting, therefore God doth not satisfy your desires. You ask and miss, because you ask amiss. No, we pray as earnestly, and with as devout affection as others, yet speed not. Look a little further into the Apostles words, and your own hearts: ye ask, that you may consume it upon your lusts. Heres the reason, you beg good things to be wanton with them; silver and gold to give unto Baal: corn and wine to riot. Perhaps you may faintly pray against that sin, which you would be loath to lose. This is to pray in jest; as Augustine speaks of his unconverted estate; that he desired God to cool the fire of his concupiscence; but orabat extingui, malebat expleri: his tongue besought an extinction, his heart desired a satisfaction; he had rather have it pleased, then expelled. He prayed indeed, but as if he were afraid lest God should hear him.

2 Seeing that God gives more where he hath given much, let us be thankful: for how should God bless us with that we have not, if we do not bless him for that we have. Let me be a little bold to enlarge this point of praising God: there is a six-fold manner of praising him; mental, monumental, chordall, cordial, vocal and actual.

There is a mental praise, when we bear in our minds the favors of God; I will remember the works of the Lord. It was the wretchedness of Israel to forget his wonders. They soon forgot his works. What can he remember, that forgets the mercies of God!

Monumentall, when we erect trophies, pillars, and monuments, to continue the memory of God's deliverances. This shall be written for the generation to come, and the people which shall be created, shall praise the Lord. Thus Abraham and Jacob reared diverse pillars, which were dumb catechisms to the posterities unborne: answering the charge of God, and the practice of Israel; Our fathers have told us, we will not hide them from our children, showing to the generations to come, the praises of the Lord.

Cordall, I call that praise which is framed to God upon Instruments. Psalm last. Praise him with the sound of the Trumpet, praise him with the Psalterie and Harp, praise him with stringed Instruments and Organs. For this cause, musical Instruments are retained in our Churches; that they may elevate our drooping affections, to bless GOD: Let all our music, like David's harp, resound his praises.

Cordial praise, is that which enlivens all the rest, and comes out of a pure heart: not hypocritically for fashion, but sincerely for devotion. This is that form of thankfulness God requires: if a man looks into a pure fountain, he shall see there a reflection of his own image: in the pure heart God beholds an image of himself. If Caesar requires his own image in his coin, shall not God expect his Image in thy soul! He loves little, that can tell how much he loves. Let all thy powers of body and soul do their best to bless God; but let thy heart exceed all; and what they want in expression, let that make up in affection. Bless the Lord all that is within me; all that is within me, and all that is without me; but especially that within me, bless the Lord O my soul.

Vocall, let our lips praise him, and let not our tongues lie still. Sing to the Lord a new song; show forth his loving kindness in the morning, and his faithfulness every night. God's glory will make a good man speak, even when terror it self hath commanded silence. Luke 11.14. Our Savior cast out a dumb devil and when the devil was cast out, the dumb spake, and the people wondered. Many are possessed with this dumb devil: their mouths open not to sound forth God's praises: to hear one of them speak in CHRIST'S cause, would make all the people wonder. I know that Satan's children are talkative enough: there are gaping devils; like Demetrius, that think to carry it away, with Great is Diana of the Ephesians. For this cause I think, they were first called Rorers whom Christ may well conjure, as he did that devil. Mark 1.25. Hold thy peace, and come out. But Gregory answers; He that sins horribly, and confesseth not heartily; though he roars much, yet holds his peace. To hear blasphemers wound and tear the sweet and sacred name of CHRIST would make a dumb man speak. Herodotus writes of Croesus his son, being borne dumb, yet seeing his father endangered in a battle; on a sudden cried out, O spare him, he's the King. So when God's glory is in question; what • dumbness, what a dumbness is it, not to say, O spare him, he's the Lord. The tongue that yields not this defense, is tied by Satan, not loosed by God.

Actual, is when our lives praise God. Let your conversation be honest, that they beholding your good works, may glorify God in the day of visitation. So the master had taught the disciple, as the disciple taught us. Matth. 5.16. we, like blind Isaac, cannot see your hearts therefore we say, Let me feel thee my son. If your lives be rugged, like the hands of Esau; we will not trust your voices for the voice of Jacob. Have you righteousness? seal it, and deliver it as your act and deed. Aug. Noli gloriari quia linguâ benedicis, si vitâ maledicis. Never say you praise God with your words, when you dispraise him with your works. Honor the Lord with thy substance, this is substantial honor. GOD gave Samuel to Anna, Anna gave Samuel back again to God. Return part of thy riches to him, that gave all to thee. David loved Mephibosheth for Jonathan's sake: is Jonathan gone? yet we have many Mephibosheths. The Lord disposeth his part of thy substance to his ministers to his poor members: he increaseth thy part, for shame do not thou diminish his.

His Divine power: we come to the next circumstance; the Ability of the giver. Here is Power, yea Divine power; not only Great, but Good. For mercy and Majesty must meet together in the donation of all things that pertain to life and godliness.

It is Power: God is Almighty. Whatsoever the LORD pleased, that did he in heaven, and in earth, and in the seas, and in all deep place. But is there nothing that God cannot do? yes, he cannot lie, he cannot die, he cannot deny himself. He is for potent, not for impotent works. Aug. Dicitur omnipotence faciendo quod vult, non patiendo quod non vult. His Almightyness consists in doing what he will, not in suffering what he will not. The doing of some things were an argument of weakness, not of power. For herein is a remonstrance of our might; not that we have ableness to sin, but to withstand sin. Therefore, Augustine wisheth; Vt potestas non detur nisi contra vitium; that no man had any strength, but against wickedness. Let every man desire such power; Vt potens sit in seipso, & miro modo adversus seipsum, pro seipso: that he may be strong in himself, and (after a strange manner) against himself, for his own good. For a dominion over ones self is greater than the grand Seigniorie of Turkey. To be strong to sin is no credit for man; as it is no discredit for GOD that he cannot sin. Vae fortibus ad potandum. Esa. 5. woe to them that are strong to drink. Dost thou pride thyself in this strength? thou shalt howl for that glory. This power is the greatest infirmity. There are that oppress a man and his heritage, because it is in the power of their hand. This Potestas in malum, strength to sin, is to be strong to go to hell. Commonly to beasts of the greatest power, is given the lest immanitie, and to those of the greatest immanitie the least power. The ox hath strength but tamenesse: the be wildness, but weakness. Either they have power to hurt, and not will: or will to hurt, and not power. This is happy for us, but it would be more happy in respect of our sins, if God should take away from us, aut facultatem, aut voluntatem, either our will or our ability to do mischief. They say, Lions do not prey on yielding things: that thou canst do harm, and wilt not, is the praise of thy Innocence: that thou wouldest do harm, and canst not, is the praise of God's providence. Saul would kill David, and could not: David could kill Saul and would not. The two disciples would command fire from heaven, but could not: CHRIST could command fire from heaven, but would not. Posse & nolle noble.

It is Divine power, as for the mightiness, so for the mercifulness: his goodness doth sweetly temper his greatness. Not only a power; but a good, gracious, divine power. He abideth faithful, He cannot deny himself. If we desire worldly wealth, he may deny us, for that is not himself. If we desire preferment, he may deny us, for that is not himself. If we desire revenge, he may deny us, for that is not himself. But if we desire Grace, goodness, sanctity, mercy, he will not deny us, for that is himself; and he cannot deny himself. No good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly. Against this divine power there is no resistance: he is able to do whatsoever he will, yea he is able to do more than he will. Our God is in heaven, he hath done whatsoever he pleased. He can do more than ever he was or will be pleased to do. His divine power could have made many worlds, his divine will hath decreed but one. The passengers in mockerie bad CHRIST come down from the Cross: he was able to descend, and let the work of redemption alone, but he would not lose them to save himself, but rather lose himself to save them. The Father was able to have given him more than twelve legions of Angels for his rescue. Matth. 26.53. But he would not, but rather delivered up his son to his enemies, to save his friends. So John the Baptist to the bragging Jews, that pretended the father-hood of Abraham; God is able of these stones to raise up children to Abraham. His power is without limits, as his will is without injustice. His power teacheth us to fear him; his Divine and gracious power to love him: both together make for our humility and comfort.

The knowledge of GOD'S Power will humble the proudest heart: was he able to make thee of nothing; to bring thee back to worse than nothing; how darest thou displease him? It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living GOD: yet there is no way to avoid it, but by falling into it; strive not to run from him by wickedness, but to run to him by repentance. Humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God: it is a mighty hand, humble yourselves under it, lest you be humbled by it. His power is so mighty, that it bootes not a man to strive with him, for he was never yet over-masterd. The wrath of a King is like messengers of death, and man quakes at his anger that can but kill the body: yet how little do we fear him that can destroy both body and soul in hell? Do we provoke the Lord to anger? are we stronger than he? saith the Apostle, do we challenge him that can confound us? we are like to get little by such bargains. Let him take away his rod from me, and let not his fear terrify me; Then would I speak. As if Job should say, there is no meddling with him so long as his sword is by him. First Lord take away thy weapons, and then let us talk together. It might be said of Jove, Si quoties peccent homines, sua fulmina mittat Jupiter, exiguo tempore inermis erit: if for every sin of men he should send down a thunderbolt, either Vulcans one-eyed Cyclops would be soon weary, or his flock of thunder soon empty. Mars ultor gal'am quoque perdidit, & res non potuit servare suas; Mars his sword might be wrung out of his hand, and himself disarm'd. But who hath resisted the Lord? who hath entered the lists with this divine power, and not measured his length on the ground? It is time for the poor child to quake, when he sees his angry father come with the rod. There is no struggling with it; the best way is to yield ourselves, and be silent; I was dumb, and opened not my mouth, because thou didst it. God tells revolted Israel, that in quietness they should be saved; not by fight, nor by flight. Aaron was sorry for his two perished sons; but when Moses told him that God would be glorified before all the people; Aaron held his peace. Peter was accused by the Apostles, for going in to the Gentiles: but when he made his defense, and rehearsed the matter from the beginning, Acts 11.4. proving that he was directed to that course by a vision, Verse 18. They held their peace, and glorified GOD.

The knowledge of this Divine and giving power may comfort the most dejected heart: it gives us many consolations. 1. Concerning the salvation of others and ourselves: how desperate so ever we judge their estates, by reason of their continual habit of sinning, yet this divine power is able to convert them. No man can seem to be further lost than the Jews, who are cut off from CHRIST through infidelity, Upon whom the wrath of God is come to the uttermost, and a malice of 16 hundred years burning is not wasted in them: yet saith Paul, even they may be grafted into the Olive again, if they abide not still in unbelief: and his reason is; Because God is able to graff them in again. But alas, I have been frozen many years in the dregs of worldly lusts, and I do not find my heart yet thawed: I know this is a fearful case for a man to lie so long under the tyranny of the devil: yet despair not, apply the means of thy deliverance, strive to extricate and unwind thy soul from this maze of destruction, break thy heart with compunction for thy iniquities: this divine power is able to implant thee to the true vine, and make thee a member of Jesus CHRIST. Thou shalt feel the working of his mighty power; which he wrought in CHRIST, when he raised him up from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in heaven. What was the power which he wrought in CHRIST? When malice had spent it self upon him on the Cross, and insulting death began to triumph over him in the grave; even then this mighty power raised him up. We are as dead in sin naturally, as any man in the grave corporally; can neither move hand nor foot: there was a power that raised him, there is a power that can revive us. All our care must be to find in ourselves the Power of his resurrection. 2. This comforts us in the midst of all afflictions; we are weak in ourselves, unable to stand under the lightest cross: but there is a Divine power that strengthens us. Though it doth not nullify our sorrows, yet it doth fortify our patience, we are strengthened with all might through his glorious power, unto all patience and long suffering with joy fullness. 3. This comforts us in prayer: there is no speeding prayer but that is made in faith, and it is no easy matter to pray in faith: now the foundation of our faith is this Divine power of CHRIST. Let us speak confidently with the Leper Matth. 8. LORD, if thou wilt thou canst make me clean. After the wisdom of heaven had abridged all our necessities into six petitions; he binds up our faith with a reason, and bids us wait confidently, for the blessings craved heartily; For (or because) thine is the kingdom, the Power, and (to thee be) the glory forever. 4. This comforts us against all oppositions, even those Principalities that wrestle against us; the assurance of this divine power. Non timeat Inimicum fortem, qui amicum habet fortiolem. Let not him fear a strong enemy against him, that hath a stronger friend with him. If God be on our side who can be against us? Let their force and malice strive which shall be greater, we shall overcome them all by the blood of the Lamb.

Ye are of God, and have overcome them: whom? all the adversaries of your faith and manners. How? Because greater is he that is in you, that is Jesus, Christ by his divine power: than he that is in the world, that is, the malignant spirit of temptation. Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death; a place full of horror and amazedness; yet will I not fear: why so? because thou O Lord art with me; thy rod and thy staff do comfort me. Lastly, let this hearten us to cheerful liberality; because whatsoever we lack or lose, there is a divine power able to requite, it. Thus Paul encourageth the Corinthians bounty; because God is able to make all grace abound toward them, that they having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work.

Hath given. I come from the Faculty of the Agent, to the Liberty of the Action: he Gives. He doth not set, nor let, nor sell, nor lend, but Give. The covetous Land-lord sets his tenements, the griping Usurer lets his money, the wasting Prodigal sells his estate, the charitable Neighbor lends his goods; but the most liberal God Gives. Thus doth God, Satan, and man, dispose their things. Deus donat, Diabolus vendit, Homo retribuit, God gives, Satan sels, and man restores. God and Satan have two several warehouses: we come to the Devils warehouse, look on his wares, like them well, they have a fair gloss. The gloss of drunkenness is good fellowship: the gloss of adultery is good affection: the gloss of covetousness is good husbandry: the gloss of murder is good courage: the gloss of sedition is good reformation: the gloss of treason is good religion. To make good this gloss, his shop hath two false lights; man's law, and man's example. First, human laws; so we shall never be able to prove sin to be sin, unless we have an act of Parliament for it. Next, human examples; and by that reason we shall never prove sin to be sin, till all great men become good men, and that will not be this two days. Well, men thus liking the warts, they come to the price; that's everlasting torment: dear, very dear! The Devil is no such frank chapman, to sell his commodities for nothing. No, did he not offer Christ kingdoms upon free gift? Matth. 4.9. No, they had a price set on them; Si cadens adoraverit me; it must be a crouch of his knee, he must worship the Devil for it. He makes show of Robin-Hoods peniworths, and may forbear his debtors until death; but then lays an heavy execution on them, and condemns them to an everlasting prison. Munera magna quidem praebet, sed praebet in hamo; he puts forth large baits, but there be damnable hooks hid in them. A worldling is beset with exigence, he complains his wants, Satan promiseth ready help: Judas shall have money in his purse, Gehazi new suits to his back, Nero a crown on his head: but thus he possesseth their wretched hearts, from whence he is hardly ever untenanted.

In God's warehouse we find wisdom at the door, crying for customers, Isaiah 55. Come ye to the waters, come buy wine and milk without money; yea, verse. 2. Bread and fatness. Let us see the wares. First is Water: water? alas a poor and plentiful commodity: cheap enough; every chanell affords it. No, for first literally; water was of great use in Palestine, a dry Country. Poor Hagar with her little Boy, were almost lost with thirst: how did her heart leap, when God opened her eyes, that she saw a Well of water? Isaac's heard-men strove with the heard-men of Cerar, about waters; therefore he called the name of the Well Esek, that is Contention. Israel mumured for water, and were plagued for it. Water hath a manifold use; it serves for drink, for medicine, for washing, for purging, for boiling, for quenching, for fructifying. Water was held by some the beginning of all other things; Aqua, quasi A Qua omnia. It was esteemed a principal preserver of life, therefore called living, Gen. 26.19. Isaac's servants found a Well of Living water: it is translated, Springing; but the original gives it, Living water. But it must be here understood in a spiritual sense; so the Water that GOD gives is Grace. With joy shall ye draw Water out of the Wells of Salvation. I will pour Water upon him that is thirsty, (which he expounds of Grace) I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed. Whosoever is a-thirst, let him take the Water of life freely. Next is Wine; Is this so good? Vinum lac libidinis, Wine is the nourishment of lust; the Manichees called it, Fel Principis tenebrarum, the gall of the Prince of darkness. No, Wine is good, hath manifold benefits: it helps the stomach, nourisheth the body, whets the wit, cherisheth the heart, and cheers the whole man. CHRIST'S first miracle in Galilee mentioned, was turning water into Wine: and the last thing he used in the Sacrament was Wine. It is said to cheer God and man, Thirdly, Bread; this is called the Strength of man's life. It was a great curse God threatened to Israel; I will break their staff of bread. Lastly, Milk; the Tartarians were said to live with milk: Canaan is praised to flow with milk; therefore Desire the sincere milk of the Word. Bread necessary for life, oil for ornament, water for use, milk for nourishment, wine for delight. These are good wares; the water of Regeneration, the wine of Compunction, the bread of Life, the oil of Gladness, the milk of the Gospel: Who would desire better purchase? We like them well, what's the price? Nothing: a very easy reckoning. The Lord Gives, and that better things for nothing, than Satan will sell us for our souls. Those thriftie men, that try all shoppes for the cheapest penniworths, why refuse they those rich blessings which GOD gives for nothing, and pay such a hard price for vanity and vexation? Men might pay nothing for the best of things; they do pay the best of things for nothing. In vain doth foolish man exchange good for evil, when he may exchange evil for good.

You perceive how God Gives, Satan sells; now see how man restores: for that bounteous hand which bestows much on us, requires some restitution of us. Man should not sell, as Satan: he cannot give, as God: but he ought to restore, that is his part: this he may do, this he must do. To whom? to God for his own sake, to man for God's sake. To God, what is that? Thanks. Quid retribuam Domino? What shall I render to the Lord for all his benefits? I will magnify, and bless his Name. That is not Magnum facere, sed magnum significare: Not to make his Name great, but to declare it great. Sing forth the honor of his Name: make his praise glorious. How can man make his praise glorious? by singing forth the honor of his Name. This is a plain restitution, yet goes under the name of a contribution. So willing is God to accept man's duty, that he takes it as his bounty. The Giver is more blessed than the Receiver: in all other things we are the receivers, and he is the Giver: only in thankfulness we are the Givers, and he is the receiver. Respiration and Expiration are in their vicissitudes alike: we can draw in air no longer than we send it out. If we return no grace, we receive no grace.

To man: and this in matters either of Equity, or Charity. Of Equity: If I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, I restore him four fold. This necessity Nehemiah imposed on Israel: first by entreaty; I pray you let us leave off this Usury. Next by command, Restore to them their lands and vineyards, and the monies of your exactions: then by an oath, he took an Oath of them to perform this. Lastly, by a Sacramental curse to the refusers, shaking the lap of his garment; So God shake out every man from his house, that performeth not this promise: even thus shall he be shaken out and emptied: and all the Congregation said, Amen. The very Barbarians abhor the neglect of restitution: A great Lady being a widow, called to her an English Merchant, trafficking in those parts, with whom she knew her husband had some commerce, and asked him if there were nothing owing to him from her deceased Lord: he after her much importunity acknowledged what, and shown the particulars. She tendered him satisfaction, yea (and after his many modest refusals, as being greatly benefited by the dead Barbarian) she forced him to take of her hand the uttermost penny: saying thus; I would not have my husbands soul go to seek your soul in hell, to pay his debts. Here was a fire in a dark vault, great zeal in blind ignorance: they saw by the candle-light of Nature. What Saint Augustine delivers for doctrinal Truth, Non remittitur peccatum nisi restituatur oblatum: Where is no restitution of things unjustly gotten, there sins shall never be forgiven. Of Charity; for even this is but a restitution: Give me, saith GOD, of that I have given thee: De meo quaero, non de tuo; I ask not for thine, but for mine own: Give and restore; Petimusque damusque vicissim; If we do not give alms according to our power, GOD will sue us of an action of Detinie. Quare non dedisti? meo jure, tua dispensatione, Matth. 25. Why did you not give things that were mine by right, yours only by use and dispensation; whereof you were not proprietaries and Lord's, but accountant Stewards? Cyprian. Improbi dant multa propter cruciantem Diabolum, nos reddemus nihil propter salvantem Dominum? Reprobates will part with many things for a tormenting devil, and shall we restore nothing for our saving God? most men think when they give, that God and man is beholding to them: not so; Non tribuunt de proprio, sed retribuunt de alieno: They do not give of their own, but restore some of that GOD hath given them. For restoring they shall have recompense, for detaining vengeance.

I am fallen upon a point of Giving; therefore, me thinks, I should not be niggardly in it. God give me a tongue to declare it, and give us all hearts to practice it. Two things it readily teacheth us:

1 How to judge of all we have; as the LORD'S gifts, not our own merits. Bona mea, Dona tua, Domine. It is a wretched thing, Vti datis, tanquam innatis: To use those things that are added to us, as if they had been bred in us. What hast thou, that thou hast not received? If thou didst receive it, why doest thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it? GOD, saith Bernard, is the Author of merit; Qui & voluntatem applicat operi, & opus explicat voluntati: For he both applieth the will to the work, and disposeth the work to the will. Thou doest good works; so much as is good in them is not thine, but GOD'S. Man for these things, Magis Deo debitor est, quàm Deus homini; is rather a debtor to GOD, than GOD to man. Thou canst not so much as give GOD Gratias, Thanks; unless GOD first give thee Gratiam, the grace of thankfulness. Thou canst not be patient under his hand, except his hand give thee patience. Why do we boast then? Seeing that Quae non fecimus ipsi, vix ea nostra voco: We cannot call those deeds ours, which we have not done ourselves. I labored more abundantly than they all: yet not I, but the Grace of GOD which was with me. Still if we do good, we are beholding to GOD for it, not GOD to us.

2 To follow GOD'S example, in being evermore giving good things. Beneficence is munus regale, a royal office. It is a poor degree of comfort wherein many bless themselves, to do no ill: for Bonum in effectu, non in defectu: non virtus in non officiendo, sed in proficiendo: Goodness consists in the effect, not in the defect: nor is virtue glorious in being innocent from harm, but in being beneficial for good. I wonder what hope the oppressor hath to be saved; seeing he doth not imitate GOD in giving, but the Devil in extorting? There are that give something to the poor, that they may take away more: Haec venatio, non donatio: This is not a charitable giving, but a subtle hunting. It is foenerare beneficium, to put a good turn to usury. But give; this is GOD'S precept, and must be thy precedent. Yea, though thou have little, give of that little. GOD esteems the little gift of a poor righteous man, above the great alms of a wicked rich man. And that for two reasons; Quia de justo, quia de parvo. First, because it is of that, is justly gotten: so Zacchaeus; Halfe my goods I give to the poor; and restore to them I have wronged fourfold. Observe his words; Do ex meis, reddo ex alienis: I restore other men's goods, but I give mine own. Secondly, because he gives of a little; as the poor Widow did her two Mites, even all her substance. When the Monks complained of want, and that their revenues fell too short for their maintenance; the Abbot replied, that two companions came once together, to sojourn in their Monastery; they were entertained: their names were Date, and Dabitur; Give, and It shall be given you. Whilst these two lived amongst you, you all thrived: now you have thrust out Date, Give; and Dabitur, (it shall be given) will not stay behind.

Unto us. I come from the bounty of the Giver, to the need of the receivers:

To us, that were

- Worth nothing.
- Worthy of nothing.

To us, that had nothing; miserable beggars. And indeed what should be the object of mercy, but misery? Present thyself, O poor soul! Miserum ante misericordem; a miserable creature before a merciful Creator. Say not with Laodicea, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , but 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ; not, I have need of nothing; but, I have nothing. God doth not only forgive us, because non solvendo, we have nothing to pay: but he gives us, because non habendo, we have nothing to live on. There are three sorts of poor and miserable men: some sing and are miserable, some cry and are miserable; some curse and are miserable. As the Italian says; Thus go a begging; the Germans singing, the Frenchmen weeping, the Spaniards cursing. Some are poor in the world, yet sing care away. When Augustus heard that a Gentleman in Rome, concealing his broken estate, died so far in debt; he sent to buy the pillow whereon he slept. Hi non sunt solliciti ut solvant, sed ut debeant. They do not take care how to come out of debt, but how to come into debt. Thus poor are many; yet they sing in Tavernes, and dance in Theaters; though wretched beggars in heavenly graces. As it is in this world for temporal things, so for the world to come in spiritual things; Cantant paupers, lugent divites: poor men sing, and rich men cry. Who is so melancholy as the rich worldling? And who sings so merry a note, as he that cannot change a groat? So they that have store of grace, mourn for want of it: and they that indeed want it, chant their abundance. Others are poor and cry: so did Esau, because he could not recover the Blessing, though he sought it carefully with tears. These mad dogs bite the stone, without regard to him that threw it. Sorrow like a needle, runs thorough their hearts, but hath no thread of faith in it, to sow them to JESUS CHRIST. Miseriores, non meliores: they are worse in the state of this world, yet not better in the state of Grace. If GOD touch a Pharaoh, he will roar: you shall have him howl to his ending, not to his mending. The cloud of a corrupt heart, when it is squeezed and crushed with adversity, will haply pour down some drops: but to shed repentant tears in the midst of prosperity; this is like rain in Sun-shine. He that mourns for the cause of his punishment, shall mourn but a while: he that mourns only for the punishment, and not for the cause, shall mourn forever. Lastly, others curse and are miserable, as Job's wife counseled him; Curse GOD, and die. This is a desperate poverty, when men defy him that should make them rich. They answer GOD, as Daniel did Belshazzar; Keep thy reward to thyself, and give thy gifts to another. They have a long festered ulcer; the Physician offers to cure it: but they madly thrust their nails into it; no, it shall not be healed. Such was our estate by nature: some were poor and insensible, others sensible, but disconsolate; others sensible and desperate. We were all poor beggars, and had nothing, therefore had need of a Giver.

To us, that deserved nothing: it is no wonder that GOD loved the Angels, for they obey him: that he loved the irrational and insensible creatures, for they do not contradict him: but that he should be good to us, Neque capientibus, nec cupientibus; neither receiving, nor conceiving, nor desiring Grace: that had not only a rebellion of will, but a will of rebellion; this was the wonder. This was not Dilectio quoniam, a love to us, because we first loved him: but Dilectio etiamsi, a love to us, though we hated him. He loved us, because he loved us: in our creation when we could not, in our redemption, when we would not love him.

All things that pertain to life and godliness. I come from the necessity of the receivers, to the Vniversalitie of the Gift. All things that, &c. This is that extent and latitude of his donation; who gives 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ,to all life and breath, and all things. No silver in Benjamins sack, till Joseph put it in: no good in man till God infuse it. Worldlings ascribe things to the goodness of their skill, or greatness of their pains. Is not this great Babylon, which I have built by the might of my power? They sacrifice to their nets. But indeed every good and perfect gift comes from above, even from the Father of lights. It is in vain that you rise up early, and go to bed late: for so he giveth his beloved sleep. All that pertain.

To life. Where we may either by life understand our natural life, together with all things that may preserve it. He put a soul to our flesh, gave birth to the child, nourishment after birth; bread when we were hungry, drink when we were thirsty, &c. To the wise-man his wisdom, to the strong man his might, to the wealthy man his riches: wisdom, Bonum mentis, the good of the mind: strength Bonum corporis, the good of the body: riches Bona fortunae, the goods of fortune. He gives all, let us give him praise for all. He giveth all things richly to enjoy. This is a large field to survey, let your meditations supply the defect of my speech. Who cannot say, Thou art he that took me out of the womb; thou didst make me hope when I was upon my mothers breasts. And because vita is not only Vivere, sed valere; not to live, but to live in health; therefore Job calls God, the Preserver of men. Bless him in all, for all, that gives all; he gives us all things that pertains to life, and reserves only this Quit-rent. But by life, here I rather understand our spiritual life; whereby we live to him, and in him, and whereby he lives in us.

To godliness; whatsoever conduceth to grace and glory. By his grace we come to godliness, and by godliness to life. He provides not only temporally for us, that we may live here; but eternally, that we may live forever. The things hereto belonging are the graces and gifts of the Spirit: some think that these principal graces are but seven: because said, Revel. 4.5. There were seven lamps of fire burning before the Throne, which are the seven Spirits of God: prefigured by the Stone with seven eyes: by the seven Lamps of one Candle-stick, Zach. 4.2. by the seven Horns of one Lamp, Revel. 5.6. which are the seven Spirits of God. Some have numbered and deduced them from Isaiah 11.2. The Spirit of wisdom, of understanding, of counsel, of might, of knowledge, and of the fear of the Lord. But to make up the number, they put in The Spirit of Piety; for it is not there expressed; there are but six according to our account: we may say of them, as of the seven Stars; Quas septem dicunt, sex tamen esse solent: Men say they are seven, but they are wont to be but six. But it is certain, this seven-fold number is put for an infinite number; all graces that belongs to life and godliness. No good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly. This is an immense fountain; the Lord fill all the buckets of our hearts at this Spring: and give us capable souls, as he hath a liberal hand.

But now is there such a receipt, and must there not be an Account? Yes, To whom much is given, of him shall be much required. If there be Acceptio, there must follow Redditio: and that both in Quali, and in Quanto; in Portion, the same; or in proportion, something answerable to it. If the thing given be 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, much; the thing required is not 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, little: and this shall be exacted in obedience, or extorted in vengeance. After a long time the Lord of the servants comes, and reckoneth with them, though it be long, yet at last to a reckoning. Whether the talent be hid in idleness, or wasted in riot; it shall be spoken. Give account of thy stewardship, for thou must be no longer steward. GOD is not like Pharaoh and his Taske-masters; that allow no straw, yet exact the full tale of bricks. He is unjustly taxed, to reap where he hath not sown, and to gather where he hath not strewed, Matth. 25.24. No, but if he hath planted a Vineyard, and dressed it with careful cost, he looks for Grapes. If GOD fill Joshua's heart with his Spirit, he will fill his hands with business. If Saint Paul hath abundant Grace, he must have abundant labors. Every gift is obligatory; and whatsoever benefits us, ipso facto binds us. Now what shali we answer for the interest, that have misspent the principal? Have we received all, and shall we account for nothing? yes, the books shall be opened, and there are set down all the particulars of our receipts and expenses. There is Item received Strength, and laid out oppression. Item received riches, and laid out Covetousness. Item received Health, and laid out riot and drunkenness. Item received garments, laid out Pride. Item received Speech, laid out swearing and lying. Item received Sight, laid out lusting. Or perhaps your layings out are more. Item so many score pounds laid out in malice and suites at Law: so many hundreds in lusts and vanities: so many thousands in building great houses. Item to the poor in our will to be paid at our death. 40, shillings: to the Preacher for a funeral oration to commend us, half a Sovereign. Will this Bill go currant, when God comes to cast it up? no, if these accounts be not mended in this life, we shall never have our Quietus est in the life to come. Let us then be good in our office, and make our reckonings even: that it may be said to everyone of us. Well done good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy LORD. Thus he that gives us all things that belong to temporal life and godliness on earth, will also give us all things that belong to eternal life and glory in heaven.

Through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue. We have considered the Fountain, let us come now to the Conduit: the means or meritorious cause, through which all these precious gifts are bestowed on us. This everflowing, and overflowing Conduit is CHRIST; in whom dwells all fullness. Now for us, Quantum vas fidei capax afferimus, tantum gratiae inundantis haurimus. The more capacious a vessel of faith we bring, the greater measure of grace we shall receive. In this Conduit observe two generals: the water of life, which is our effectual calling to glory and virtue: and the Pipe or Bucket to draw and derive it to us, the knowledge of Christ. In the former consider four circumstances; the Mover, the motion, the moved and the term: who, what, whom and whither.

1 Who hath called us, CHRIST: He only can call home sinners. Luk 19.10. Mat. 9.13. I came to call sinners to repentance; I, not Man, nor Angels. God only can make filios Abrahami, ex lapidibus Iordani: can of stones raise up children to Abraham. He that could turn stones into bread, can turn a stony heart into that mercy to give bread. He that could fetch water from a rock, can draw tears from our flinty hearts. Man may imprint a conceit, God only can work a consent. The Preacher may unfold the mysteries of the Gospel, and effect a knowledge in the brain: but Cathedram habet in coelis qui corda docet; he hath a pulpit in heaven, that preacheth to the conscience. To resign ourselves to the truth, here is the finger of God. You will say, it is easy to think; no, we cannot think a good thought of ourselves. Thought is free; no, the thought is God's bond-servant. It is easy to believe: no, for faith is the fair gift of God. Yet, it is easy to will: no, it is He that worketh in us, both to will and to do, at his good pleasure. Phil. 2.13. Mans will is a fugitive Onesimus, God must call home that runagate, subdue that rebel. Yet when we have begun, it is easy to continue: no, perficit, qui efficit: He that begun a good work in us, will perform it. Phil. 1.6. JESUS is the Founder and the Finisher of our faith, Hebr. 12.2. But we can suffer for him at our pleasure: no, datur pati: it is given to us to suffer for his sake, Phil. 1.29. Without me ye can do nothing; not parum, but nihil. But in him, and through him all things: I can do all things through him that strengthens me, Phil. 4.13. In ourselves we are weak Captives, in him more than Conquerors. But if ye consent and obey, you shall eat the good things of the land. Esa. 1.19. Yet is it neither of the willer, nor of the runner, but of God that shows mercy. Rom. 9. With my whole heart have I sought thee: Did he bend his own heart to it? No, but prays, O let me not wander from thy Commandments. I will run the way of thy precepts, but when? when thou shalt enlarge my heart. My Son, keep thy heart: yet it is the Peace of God that keeps the heart in CHRIST JESUS. God's imperative infers no potenciales, but an optative: Da quod jubes; Lord, give what thou biddest, and bid what thou wilt. Lex imperat, fides impetrat; the Law chargeth obedience, but faith obtains forgiveness. Turn us, good Lord; so shall we be turned. None comes to the Son, unless the Father draw him: and if the Father hath once given us into his hands, no devils in hell shall ever be able to pluck us out.

2 What is the Action; Hath Called. There was a time when Christ came personally to call; He went out early in the morning to hire laborers into his Vineyard. He went out; liceat dicere, exiit à se, ut intret in te; imo ut te convertat in se. Pontan. He went out of himself, that he might come into thee, that he might convert thee into himself. He went out from his Majesty that is invisible, to his mercy that is manifested in his works. Now he calleth at divers times, in divers places, and after divers manners.

At divers times; all hours of the day he is calling. Mat. 20. At the first hour, the third, the sixth, the ninth, the eleventh. In all ages of the World; before the Law he called Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham: under the Law, Moses, David, Isaiah, &c. Under the Gospel, Apostles, Martyrs, &c. and now us, upon whom the ends of the world are come: this is Hora novissima, 1 John 2.18. The eleventh hour at the least. He called some at the first hour; Samuel, John the Baptist, sanctifying them from the womb. Others in the third hour, their youth: as young Daniel and Saint John the Evangelist. Discipulum minimum Jesus amavit plurimum, Ieron. That little Disciple CHRIST greatly loved. Other, in the sixth hour; as Peter and Andrew: others in the eleventh, as Gamaleel, Joseph of Arimathea. Some not only at the last hour, but the last minute, as that one malefactor upon the Cross. One so, that no man should despair: but one so, that no man should presume. Thus All the day long he stretcheth forth his hand to call us: woe unto us, if none of these hours can reclaim us; for then the night follows, wherein is no more calling to grace, but to judgment.

In divers places; some from their ships, other from their shops. Peter and Andrew fishing on the sea, Matthew fishing on the land. It is a great matter to convert a mariner forth of his ship: but a greater wonder to convert a Publican forth of his shop. Some from the market, Matth. 20.3. some from the hedges, Luke 14.23. Paul in his fury. Acts 9.1. breathing out threatenings and slaughter: Henry 8. in his discontent: the Pope denies his just divorce, hereon he justly denies the Pope. Let none despair; he can call Gallants at the Court, Ruffians at the Tavern, covetous merchants at their warehouses; yea he can call usurers at their banks. But indeed these last he seldom does call; those baptized Jews seldom repent. You have seen drunkards, thieves, and adulterers weep at a Sermon; you never saw an usurer shed a tear.

After divers manners. First, by the preaching of the word; and herein he useth two bells to ring us to Church: the Treble of mercy, and the Tenor of judgment. Out of the Throne proceed lightnings, and thunderings, and voices. Lightnings that illuminate the dark air of the world: thunderings, the menaces against corruption and vices; lastly, the sweet voices of comfort that preacheth liberty to captives, and proclaims the acceptable year of the Lord. One said, our hearts are all of sin, but our ears are all of mercy: he that will please us with a song, must set it to the tune of the Gospel: we can hear nothing but Pax vobis: and see nothing but Ecce Agnus: as if the Law were of no further use, like an old Almanac out of date. But we know that Moses and Christ met upon the mount, Matth. 17. not the Law alone, nor the Gospel alone; but Moses and Christ, the Law and the Gospel are conjoined. Next he calls by his Iudgments: thus he heats our iron hearts in the furnace of afflictions: that nocumenta might be documenta; men's sufferings their instructions. Quod leviter nocet, salubriter docet, that which makes the body smart, makes the soul wise. Doth God afflict us? he calls us to repentance; for Tribulation works patience. Whilest we are thus exercised either De malis illatis; vel de bonis dilatis: with sorrows inflicted, or with hopes delayed; God calls us home to himself. He often conveys holiness through the wounds of afflictions: the persecuted Church, Cant. 2.14. flies like a Dove to the clefts of the Rock; nestles her self in the wounds of Jesus Christ. Trouble is a messenger, that speaks thus to us; make your peace with God. Thou complainest that thou art afflicted on every side, groanest under thy burden, after many changed sides criest out of unremedied pain: alas, thou repentest not: trouble came on this message, to teach thee repentance: give the messenger his errand, and he will be gone. Lastly, by mercies, thus we have him frequently calling; he sows mercy upon us with a liberal hand now the patience and long suffering of God lead us to repentance. Romans 2.4. God spares the sinner, but let not the sinner spare his sin. We have hard hearts, if the blood of the Lamb cannot soften them: stony bowels, if so many mercies cannot melt us. What was Pharaohs greatest plague? not the murraine on his beasts, nor the hail on his fruits, nor the blood in his waters, nor the blaines on his flesh, nor the first borne slain in his families; but Durum cor, a hard heart. They write of a northerne fountain, that turns all things it receives into stones: and a choleric stomach converts all meats into choler: so a hard heart turns even God's softest mercies into hardness.

Thus God calls; for Christ his sake let us go. It is the voice of my Beloved; Let us run to him. In the last and great day of the feast, Jesus stood and Cryed, &c. stood up, ut conspiratur, that he might be seen: cried ut audiretur; that he might be heard. He is audible in his word, visible in his Sacraments, in both he calls. I stand at the door and knock. Revel. 3.20. Ostium est & ad ostium pulsat: he that is our door of entrance, knocks at our door for entrance. It is fit we should knock at his door, not he at ours. But if he does knock, let not him stand without, till his head be filled with dew, and his locks with the drops of the night. He is In via veriteas, in veritat via, in utraque vita: He is the way in the truth, and the truth in the way, and in both the life. He calls, yet complains, Ye will not come unto me that you might have life. Go we then to him; Reficieris si accesseris, Deficieris si recesseris. Aug. Come to him and live, depart from him and perish. Let not Christ call in vain, nor his Ministers say; We have labored in vanity, and spent our strength for naught. Faith and repentance are two short lessons, yet Israel was forty years before they could learn them. If God call upon us, and men will not answer: they shall call upon him when he will not answer. God shall say to the reprobates. Be it to you according to your deserts. To sin is to depart from God; therefore Depart from me: you loved cursing, therefore depart ye cursed: the fire of anger, of malice, of lust hath burned in your hearts, therefore depart into fire: you would have sinned everlastingly, therefore depart into everlasting fire: you have harkened to the devils temptations, you must feel the devils torments; into fire prepared for the devil and his Angels. Abuse not his calling, lest he swear in his wrath that thou shalt never enter into his rest. He send for us friendly, freely, frequently: let us make no excuses, lest he vow that none of those bidden guests shall taste of his supper. Many cry, O Lord why hast thou forsaken me? to whom he replies, ô man why hast thou forsaken me! they say to the Almighty, depart from us, we will none of thy ways: therefore God shall say to them, depart from me ye that work iniquity. They that forget God calling on them in health, shall be rejected calling on him in sickness. The groaning reprobate shall say, Veni Domine ad solatium, come Lord to comfort: but God to him, veni improbe ad iudicium, come sinner to judgment. Then as Aeneas for his lost wife Creusa, Nec quicquam ingeminans iterúmque iterúmque vocabis; thou doubling thy cries, shalt call for him that will not hear. But to the faithful and obedient shall be a sweet voice Come for you desired to come; ye blessed, you loved blessing, and it shall be unto you, you have served, you shall reign; Inherit the kingdom prepared for you.

Whom hath he called? Vs, us miserable sinners; that were deaf, and could not hear him: lame, and could not meet him: blind, and could not see him: dead, and could not answer him. Vs, far enough off, without God, without hope in the world. It was not sufficient, that he paid himself our debt in the blood of his own Son; and made a glorious Treasury of his inestimable merits; but he must also call us to the participation: otherwise Christ might have been rich enough in merits, and God in mercies; and yet we still beggars.

To what? To glory and virtue: some read By glory and virtue, other To glory and virtue, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , &c. The sense is good and receivable either way; a word or two of them both.

If we take it, By glory and virtue, the sum is this, CHRIST'S calling is so effectual, when he joins with the word of his grace, the grace of his word, that it shall work without control: it shall take virtual and glorious effects. God had a purpose to call the Gentiles, there were bars against it. Go not into the way of the Gentiles: it is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to dogs. Yet when those children put from them the Gospel, and judged themselves unworthy of everlasting life, it came to the Gentiles: God did effect it by glory and virtue. God promised, Romans 11.26. that all Israel shall be saved: there were obstacles enough against it: the blood of Christ on their heads, they revile and curse him in their synagogues, they are wanderers on the face of the earth; yet they shall be brought to the fold, by glory and virtue. So it was with us, God had purposed the Gospel to England, sealed up many souls there to eternal redemption. Were there no impediments? Yes, Queen Mary made a stop, put out the light, smote the Shepherds, scattered the sheep, burnt the professors, leagu'd with the Spaniard, yielded all to the Pope: all is now bung'd up in ignorance, the devil is jocund, men's perdition as cock-sure as he would wish it, saving only he must stay the time of their coming to hell. Yet shall there be no elusion of God's will; even then the Patronesse of superstition died; Queen Elizabeth of blessed memory was advanced into the throne, all the clouds of error were dispersed. God now lifts his Church out of her swoon, dilates his kingdom, to save our souls, our fathers before us, our children after us; which the mercy of God continue to us and ours, so long as the Sun and Moon endure: all this by glory and virtue.

To glory and virtue, according to the common reading. How hath God already called us to glory and virtue? In two respects: quoad inchoationem in present being, quoad perfectionem in hope. First, for our present estate we must understand by Glory, the honor of being Christians: by virtue, the good life that becometh Christians: to both these we are called:

To glory; is there any glory in this world belonging to a Saint? any account of a man so mortified to temporal things are we not the refuse, and off-scouring of all things? well, we have still a great glory by our calling, albeit carnal eyes cannot see it; or will not take notice of it. For if there were ignominy in thralldom, then is there glory in freedom. Stand fast in the liberty, wherein JESUS CHRIST hath made you free. We are not borne free, but new borne free. It is great glory for us (naturally) slaves, to be made by CHRIST free-men: but greater glory to be made Kings, Revel. 1. So we that believe are truly noble, for brethren and sisters to CHRIST, and so of the blood royal of God. To as many as receive him, he gives right and privilege to be the Sons of God. O happy Christians! Let others boast their Generation, we our Regeneration. This is the best ornament of blood, the noblest part of the Scutchion, the fairest flower in the Gentleman's Ga•land. The youngest brother bears the arms of the eldest; so we of our elder brother CHRIST. Not my blood, but my Christianity makes me noble, said that noble martyr. Now this greatness is got by our littleness, the greatest glory comes by humility. Si gloriam cupis, gloriam despice: sic omnibus eris gloriosior, Chrys. If thou desirest glory, despise it: so thou shalt be most glorious. The world hath the godly in derision, and a proverb of reproach: count their life to be madness, and their end without honor: as the filth of the world, and the off-scouring of all things. But Nemo miser alieno sensu, sed suo: no man is miserable because another so thinks him, but because he so feels himself. But the Lord hath called us to glory: and made us sons to a King, John 3.2. brothers to a King, Heb. 2.11. heirs to a King, Rom. 8.17. yea even to the king of glory. He were a poor for, that would be ashamed of the alliance which the King should challenge of him: yea poor is even that king that is ashamed of the Son of God, offering his brotherhood. Despicit mundus, respicit Dominus: men are ashamed of thy kindred, the Lord Jesus hath called thee to glory.

To virtue, as well as to glory. For God hath not called us to uncleanness, but to holiness. All things are yours; not to abuse with riot, but to use with moderation, and to enjoy with comfort, 1 Cor. 3.22. Because (by faith) ye are, and by obedience you are known to be Christ's, and Christ is God's. The grace of God that brings salvation to us, teacheth us to live godly, righteously, and soberly: that is the virtue whereunto we are called; to despise the world, and please the Lord, Magnae virtutis est cum faelicitate Luctari: magnae faelicitatis est a faelicitate non vinci, Aug. Our virtue is to fight with vanity; and our great happiness not to be overcome of happiness. Qui deficit sibi, ut adhaereat virtuti, amittit quod suum est, accipit quod aeternum est, Aug. He that denies himself and sticks to virtue; loseth his own which he could not keep, and getteth that happiness which he cannot lose. Now CHRIST that calls us to virtue, gives it. Some body hath touched me, for I perceive that virtue is gone out of me. There is no virtue but it comes from him: the woman touched him, but it was not her finger, but her faith, that drew out that virtue. Nor was this virtue in his garments; for living they thronged him, dead they parted them, yet were never the better. So many now may tangere panem Domini, touch the bread of the LORD: yet not contingere panem Dominum, not touch that bread which is the Lord; because their faiths and their fingers go not together. Thou art called to this virtue, come and take it: throng upon CHRIST for it, let nothing keep thy faith back, The whole multitude sought to touch him: for there went virtue out of him, and healed them all. If the glory of virtue do not first enter into thee, thou shalt never enter into the virtue and triumph of glory.

Thus hath GOD already called us to glory and virtue, in respect of an inchoative fruition: hereafter we shall come to a perfect and plenary possession. The virtue there, is a pure white garment without spot: and the glory a golden crown of eternity. God's children have three suits of apparel; black, red, and white. Here we are either in black mourning, or in red persecuted; there we shall be only in white glorified. A great multitude stood before the Lamb, in white robes, and palms in their hands. White, is Symbolum innocentiae, laetitiae, beatitudinis; is the symbol of Innocency, of Joyfulness, of blessedness: of Innocency, because it is neither spotted nor died: of Joyfulness, because opposed to black, which is the garb of sorrow: of Blessedness, because the state there is not subject to any change. It matters not what rags we were below, so we may be clothed with that white above: we now mourn in black; but those tears shall work a miracle through CHRIST, and change all our garments into white. Have virtue, if thou wouldest have glory: be we here conformed to CHRIST'S Image, and then he shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like his glorious body, by that mighty working whereby he subdues all things to himself. For the Glory, it is unspeakable: eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor have entered into the heart of man, the things which GOD hath prepared for them that love him, 1 Cor. 2.9. August. Oculus non vidit, quia non est color: nec auris audivit, quia non est sonus: nec illa, intravit in cor hominis, quia cor hominis intrabit in illam. The eye hath not seen it, because it is not color: nor the ear heard it, because it is not sound: nor hath it entered into the heart of man, because the heart of man must enter into it. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord: for it is too great to enter into thee. If we durst pray with Moses, Exod. 33.18. LORD, show us thy glory: he would answer, there is no man shall see me, and live. Therefore Lord one day give it us: yes he will, for he hath called us to it. Ibi vacabimus & videbimus, videbimus & amabimus, amabimus & laudabimus, esse quod erit sine fine. There we shall rest and see, see and love, love and bless, that glory which is and shall be forever. Quis alius noster finis, quam pervenire ad gloriam cujus nullus est finis? what else should we propose for our end, than that glory which shall have no end?

Thus I have brought your meditations up into heaven, and now you say, Bonum est esse hîc; it is good being here, it is good leaving you there. Satis, enough and enough again; Nunc dimittis in pace, it is high time to bless you with a dismissal, or dismiss you with a blessing: we have opened the Fountain, but you know the Cock is behind, that must derive the water of life to your hearts; Through the knowledge of Jesus Christ. I know this point is too ample for the small remnant of the fugitive time, and therefore a while I suspend it. And now you may say, the Sermon is done: and yet would to God you could say so truly, that it was done. But as a learned Divine observed out of Veri-dicus Christianus, the Christian Tell-troth. When a great Lady asked her servants, whether the Sermon were done or not; they answered, it was done: she pleasantly replied; Dicta, non facta concio; it was spoken, it was not done. CHRIST hath called you to glory and virtue, to godliness here and salvation hereafter: if now your hearts come home to him in obedience, then the Sermon is done indeed. But if you cleave to the world; and care more to bring wealth to your purses, then CHRIST to your consciences; the Sermon is spoken, it is not done. It is spoken and done by the Preacher. God grant I may say, It is answered and done by the hearers. O how beautiful were it to behold! your growth and stature in grace confessing, and recompensing, the spiritual food which you have received.

Verse 4. Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises, that by these you might be partakers of the Divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust.

I Should come immediately to these words, but that in the former building there was a piece of timber left out now to be inserted. It was the knowledge of our Caller. Now this point of knowledge (to avoid multiplicity of discourse upon the same argument) may fitly be considered in the word of connection, that knits the verses together; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, whereby. But first I will let the words fall into parts by distribution. In the whole verse we may observe:

 - Spouses of a Husband.
- Deliverance wherein consider the
 - Discoverie of danger, The corruption that is the world through lust.
 - Recoverie from that danger, Ye have escaped it.

Whereby. We begin first with the Instrument, and so are fitly met with the point which before escaped us. For this (whereby) stands like a Ianus, looking both to the matter past, and to come: the matter past was the knowledge of Christ, which was to this place reserved, that we might have good occasion to perpend the virtue of it. Whereby. The sum of the point is this; The true knowledge of CHRIST is the means, whereby are conveyed to us all the promises of mercy. One was of opinion, that a Philosopher excels an ordinary man, so much as an ordinary man excels a beast: but every true Christian excels a philosopher as much as a philosopher does a dunce. They scarce knew God in his creatures, we know God in his CHRIST. Ignoti nulla cupido; as we say, uncouth, unkiss'd: we must look before we like, discern before we can desire. Mine eyes have seenethy salvation, says old Simeon; therefore Nunc dimittis, now lest thy servant depart in peace, My corporal eyes have seen thy man-hood, my spiritual eyes have seen thy God-head; which is thy salvation: salutare suum, as giving it: and salutare meum, my salvation, as receiving it. Neither is this Salutare Singulare; but whosoever hath seen and known this salvation, by his eye of faith, will earnestly desire it: as Stephen saw the Lord Jesus at the right hand of God, therefore longed to come to him, video, venio.

There is no pleasure so sweet as knowledge, no knowledge so sweet as that of religion, no knowledge of religion so sweet as that of CHRIST: for this is eternal life to know God, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent. There is no entering into heaven without doing the will of God: there is no doing it without knowing it. If first ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them, Ignorance is not then the mother of devotion, but the grandmother of irreligion. Let us never think that God will accept our verdict at the bar, when we give it up with an Ignoramus. Let us therefore use the means to get knowledge. 1. Read the Scriptures, that's God's will, there's knowledge, John 5.39. 2. frequent the Temple, that's his house, there's knowledge. I thought to know this, but it was too hard for me; Until I went into the Sanctuary of God, then I understood it. 3. Resort to the Communion, that's God's maundie, there's knowledge: this shows the Lord's death till he come. 4. Consult his Ministers, for the Priests lips preserve knowledge: there hear God's oracle: yet after all this, glory not in thy knowledge.

Quamvis Sceva satis per te tibi consulis, & scis,

Disce docendus adhuc.

Horat.

He that is proud of his knowledge, is a prodigy; for he hath the gout in the wrong end: others have it in their feet, he hath it in his pate. They that saw most of God, saw but his hinder parts: and in glory, when we shall see him face to face, it shall not be a Comprehensive, but apprehensive knowledge. It is not possible for men or Angels to know so much of God, as he knows of himself. Only the blessed Trinity fully knows it self in the unity of Deity. We have now scientiam aptam a fit knowledge: then Scientiam adaequatam, a knowledge proportionate to our perfection.

But every man pleads his knowledge; let him then show it in the effects. Scientia conscientiam dirigit, Conscientia scientiam perficit, knowledge directs conscience, conscience perfects knowledge. Abused knowledge will enhaunse judgment and punishment: for this, were the sins of the Jews, caeteris paribus, greater than the sins of the Gentiles: because in Jury God was known, and his Name great in Israel; it was not so with other nations, neither had the Heathen the knowledge of his laws. The sins of us Christians, other circumstances being matches, are greater than the sins of the Jews, because our knowledge is more. They had but an Aspersio; line to line, here a little and there a little: we have an Effusion, Acts 2.17. I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh. Now after you have known God, how turn you again to those beggarly elements? will you swear, that know you should not swear? will you defraud, that know you should deal justly? Ye have not so learned CHRIST. If Barbaria wring her hands for knowing so little, beware least Christendom rend her heart, for knowing so much to so little purpose. Knowledge doth elevate or lift up the soul: but if it be abused, it shall give her the greater fall. Because the precipice is from on high, like stars that the red Dragons tail swoop'd from heaven; it shall fall like an Angel of light into utter darkness, validiora exempla, quàm verba: deeds prove more than words: never tell me your science, show to me the fruits of your good conscience. Albeit your words be never so loud, if your works be lewd: though you were sons of thunder; yet a crack in the Instrument will spoil the sound; as Jupiter's adultery did even among children discredit his thunder. Our knowledge without holiness is like Uriah's letters that contained his own death, 2 Sam. 11. To such they are letters of blood, commendations to Satan. As that servant in the Comedy; Egommet tabellas detuli, ut vincirer? Have I brought letters to bind myself? so these two, discoyned, commend a man to hell; Go bind him hand and foot, and throw him into utter darkness. Sin even in ignorance is a tallent of lead; but sin in knowledge is a millstone to sink a man to the lowest. Bona noscere, et mala facere; to know good, and do ill, makes a man's own mittimus to hell. Among arts the mathematickes are most commended, because they stand upon infallible demonstration, you think yourselves good artists in Christianity, and profess good knowledge in religion; let me see your mathematickes, some demonstration. Shew me thy faith by thy works; there's a demonstration. Let your light so shine on earth, to the glory of your Father in heaven; there's a demonstration. Feed the hungry, relieve the poor, there's another demonstration. Give me this mathematicall part of divinity, that consists in demonstration. Non in fictis, sed in factis: non in lection sed in dilection, Aug. This parcticall part is the object of man's eye: we cannot see the knowledge in your brains, but by the works of your hands. You must do, if you would be sure you know: and you must know if you would be sure of comfort.

Great and precious promises. From the Instrument we pass to the materials conveyed; Promises. This is the conveyance of the Gospel, therefore it is called a covenant; Faedes promissionis; the covenant of promise. The law gave monaces; the Gospel gives promises. It was the condition of the law, Do this and live: it is the Promise of the Gospel; Believe and thou shalt be saved. Indeed they had promises under the law, but not by the law: for whatsoever was promised in the Old Testament, belongs properly to the new. Lex imperat, fides impetrat: the law came by Moses, and by the Law death: Grace comes by JESUS, and by grace life, Cajetan says truly of the Law, that it does claudere sibi subditos sub peccato; praecipiendo, non adjuvando; That it shuts up all those are under it, under sin; by commanding, but not by helping. But the Gospel brings mercy; Promittit, immittit; offert, affert; to our houses, to our hearts. Irenaeus, to some of his time that asked, Quid novi attulit Christus; What new thing Christ: brought with him into the world; answered, illum cuncta renovasse; That he had made all things new, Old things are passed away: behold, all things are become new. He fulfilled the old Prophecies by his new works: ceased the old Sacrifices by his new Sacrifice: abolished the old Sacraments, those bloody ones of Circumcision and Occision, by his new Sacraments: gave us a new Commandment, a New Testament: puts in the room of old menaces, new Promises. And these new things are Virtute majora, utilitate meliora, actu faciliora, numero pauciora; For virtue greater, for profit better, for use easier, for number fewer. Our faith is more lightsome to believe in Christum missum; theirs, more obscure, in Christum promissum, Kilius. But is the Law against the promises of God? God forbid. For if there had been a Law given, &c. whereto then serveth the Law? yes, it hath a civil and a religious use: Civil, to restrain us from, and chastise us for sins: and for this cause it is honored even of the Politicians of the world, who though they will not themselves believe the Gospel, yet would have other men observe the Law, for their own peace and tranquilities sake Religious, for it is our School-master to bring us to Christ, Galath. 3.24. Now the office of a School-master is double, Dirigere, & corrigere: so the Law doth direct to good works, and corrects for evil works. Aret. It reveals sin, that as in a glass we see our misery, and the penalty due to transgression. It is a corrosive laid to an old sore, not to heal the sore, that's not the act of a corrosive; but to eat out the dead flesh, to make it alive and sensible, that so our wounds may be healed by the Gospel. Therefore is not the Law contrary to the Promise; Subordinata inter se non pugnant; Things that are subordinate one to another, have a mutual office of serving, not of contrarying one the other. Ideo datur praeceptum, ut praecipientis quaeratur auxilium, Leo. Therefore is the Law given, that we finding our own disability to keep it, might have recourse to the Law-giver; to the sufficiency of Christ. For the Law so humbles a man with the grief of sin, and terror of Judgment, that it sends him packing to Christ, If any man sin, and the Law tells us, we have all sinned; we have an Advocate with the Father, and this the Gospel shows us, even Christ the Propitiation for our sins. It makes a man sing with David, Sweet, O Lord, is thy mercy. The Law may Exprimere peccatum, but it cannot Supprimere peccatum; express sin, not suppress sin. For that were to invade the office of the Promise: the office of the Law is to kill, the office of the Promise to give life. Thus we have in the Gospel Promissum vitae, the Promise of life: the Lord give us faith to apprehend vitam Promissi, the life of the Promise through JESUS CHRIST.

Great and precious. Here is the latitude of these materials, in their quantity and quality. They are for quantity Great, exceeding great: for quality, Good, exceeding good, precious. Great, for they promise a thing no less than greatness it self; the love of GOD, an immense kingdom, the world invisible; in comparison of whose greatness this world it self is a Mole-hill: Precious, for if this temporal life be held so precious, which we know time must determine; how precious is that life which is equal with eternity? If that life be so estimable, which is obnoxious to sin, and waited on with misery; in so much that all riches and jewels are rubbish in comparison of it. Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath, will he give for his life; a truth from the father of lies: how precious is that life, where a man shall see nothing but what he loves, and love nothing but what he sees! The best way to exemplify the Great Price of these Promises, is to instance in some particulars. Hereof the Word of Grace is abundant: but a man that would commend a Spring-water, needs not drink up the whole fountain, one or two draughts is sufficient. Take a taste from Math. 11.28. Come unto me all ye that labor, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest: a great and precious promise; if we consider the Mover, the moved, and the motive. The Mover is Christ, Come unto me; not to the Mother, but to the Son; Non ad Dominam, sed ad Dominum, Not to our Lady, but to our Lord. Send not others, but come yourselves: come to no other but to me. The moved, all that labor and are heavy laden; that labor in your actions, are heavy laden in your passions, Ferus. That do not carry sins like corke and feathers, lightly on your shoulders, but groan under the unsupportable weight, and send forth prayers mixed with tears for ease. Come, not on your feet, but your faith; not on your legs, but your lives. The motive, I will ease you, or give you rest. What; labor and grievous labor; a burden and an heavy burden; and yet I will ease you? a great and precious promise! The Physician cannot say to his patient, I will cure thee: but thus far, I will spare no invention of wit, no intention of will, no contention of power to help thee: only the great Physician of heaven can promise absolutely, I will ease thee. Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he will sustain thee. Take another: Rom. 8.28. All things work together for good, to them that love God. All things, not only God's good things, but even our evil things. Afflictions that are most bitter, shall make us better: the sharpest Rue shall be an herb of grace. Yea, even our sins; for such is the goodness of God, that quod in poenam dedit, in salutem vertit; what at first he inflicted for a penalty, he turns to a mercy. Peccatum tristitiam peperit, tristitia peccatum conteret, Aug. Sin first wrought sorrow, now godly sorrow shall kill sin: the daughter shall destroy the mother: They shall work, not like idle indifferents that do neither good nor harm; but the first movers and makers hand sets them a working. Together; not singly and apart, lest their divided forces should drop and faint in their operation; but vis unita fortior; they shall 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, co-operate work together, for the surer expedition of their intended business. Not in nocuum, to their hurt, as all things concur to the wicked; for as the sea receives many fresh rivers, and sweet springs into it self, yet remains salt and bitter still; so the ungodly are not made the better by God's good blessings. Nor in neutrum, neither to their good nor harm; but to the glory of God, and the dear salvation of their souls. Here is a great and precious promise!

Now seeing these promises are such, let us affie them, and apply them: they deserve our faith and application.

For Affiance, if God so promise, let us trust him, He is faithful that hath promised: Woe to him that shall call God's faithfulness into question. Yet there is a generation of men that object; what nothing but promises? Promissis dives quilibet esse potest: Everyone can be rich in promising, though he be poor and beggarly in performing. Who can live by promises? These must, with Thomas, feel, or they will not believe: they are led by sight and sense, not by faith: unless they have an ocular view, they care for no oraculous testimony, no miraculous power: here is nothing in hand, but nudum pactum, a bare and naked Promise. Thus stands the case with them; man hath a precious Jewel to sell, it is his Soul: God and the world come both to buy it. The world first steps in, and thrusts his bags into his hand, here is present possession. God comes and out-bids the world, for he offers Grace, and Peace, and Glory: but withal he craves day for the greater part of it, and gives nothing in hand but his Promise, his word, and some small earnest of the bargain. The worldling cries, a bird in hand is best, hugs his money that he hath: God he thinks not so good a customer, he dares not trust him, perhaps he fears he will break. Yet this same man will rather accept a reversion of some great Office or Estate, though expectant on the tedious transition of seven years, or on the expiration of another's life, than in present a Sum of far lessevalue. What folly is this, rather to take the idle vanities of this world in hand, than faithfully to wait upon God's promise for the glory of heaven! O but we can satiate ourselves with the profits and pleasures of this life, and yet take God's word for the Kingdom of Heaven too. But I say, if a man, if a Minister, if a Prophet, if an Angel should tell you so, believe him not: for the Judge of heaven and earth hath said otherwise. Ye cannot serve God and Mammon. Difficile est servare utrumque, impossibile est servire utriusque. It will be very hard for a man to keep both, it is impossible to serve both. The two Poles shall sooner meet, than the love of God, and the love of money. The very possession of the world is not half so sure as God's promise.

For applying; seeing these promises are so precious, store thy heart with them: that which way soever the blow comes, Impavidum non improvisum feriat; it may assault thee without fear, not without foresight. Art thou molested with troubles? remember the promise; In the world thou shalt have tribulation: but be of good cheare, I have overcome the world. And Call upon me in the day of trouble, I will hear thee, and thou shalt glorify me. All days are troublesome; Man is of few days, and full of trouble. Job 14.1. but some are worse than other. That aged Patriarch-told the King of Egypt; few and evil have the days of thy servant been: he had many evil days, but some worse; when he lost Rachel his wife, Joseph his son. The Thames hath always in it water enough to drown a man, but sometimes it is more tempestuous and raging than at others. As all times have their incident trouble, so there is one main day of trouble: Jerusalem is threatened her Day of visitation. What shall we do when this day of trouble comes? remember the promise; Call upon me, saith God; I will hear and deliver thee. Do thy friends leave thee? mayest thou complain with David, my neighbors hide themselves, and my acquaintance stood afar off? Consider the Lord's promise; Heb. 13.5. I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. What was spoken to Joshua in particular, the Apostle interests every Christian in general; the infallible promise of God's inseparable presence. Art thou tempted? remember the promise; God will not suffer thee to be tempted above thy strength. If God remove not Paul's temptation, he will give him an equivalent help; my grace is sufficient for thee. Tentari sinet, superari non sinet. Doth the Law threaten thee with death for thy sins? remember the promise; there is no damnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, Rom. 8.1. Answer with Luther, Dominalex; Lady law thou comest not in season, I have nothing to do with thee: thou art a bitter lady, but I have a sweet Lord. There is death in thy looks, but there is salvation in the face of Jesus Christ: who is fairer than all the sons of men. The Law is all red, nothing but blood, death, and fire in her looks: Christ is white and red, of the purest complexion; My beloved is white and ruddy, the chi fest often thousand. White in his own innocence, ruddie with the sufferings for our sins. Such is thy mercy, oh blessed Savior! let the Law do her worst, be thou a true S. Christopher, and bear Christ in thy heart. In the Law is the menace of death, in Christ is the promise of life: we may say concerning any sinner, what Martha said of her Brother; Lord if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. Doest thou suffer affliction? remember the promise; if we suffer with Christ, we shall also be glorified with him, Rom. 8.17. The Saints are called from bleeding under the hand of persecution, to the marriage supper of the Lamb. Well may we endure a bitter breakfast, even to blood and death, considering that this supper of glory shall close up our stomachs. GOD makes his Church three meals, a breakfast, a dinner, and a supper. The breakfast was in the morning of the world, that's the Law, somewhat sharp; though they had assurance of Christ to come. The dinner is in the worlds high-noon, that's the Gospel: here is good cheare the fat calf killed, the Messiah slain; yet like the Passover, not eaten without sour herbs; we are fain to mingle our drink with tears. The supper at night shall be sweet, it is eternal glory: fitly called a Supper, because then begins rest forever. After breakfast a man goes to his labor, so after dinner, but after supper to bed. The servants of GOD under the Law, the sons of GOD under the Gospel, must both labor, and work out their salvation with fear and trembling: but at the Supper of glory works cease. Blessed are the dead that die in the LORD, for they rest from their labors. Lastly, doth the inevitable hand of death strike thee, must thou die? remember the promise; I am the resurrection and the life: whosoever believeth in me shall not die forever, John. 11.26. Let me ask thy conscience, as Christ there did; Believest thou this? If thy heart can answer; yea Lord, I believe, &c. Send forth thy soul with joy, thou hast a promise that Jesus Christ will receive it. Commit your soul into the hands of a faithful Creator in well doing. Here be great and precious promises; though thy memory cannot retain all that the Gospel proposeth, yet be sure to hold fast some: be not without some oil in thy lamp when the Bridegroom comes. Rich men that love themselves well, will have antidotes for sickness; their Cabinets stored with hot and precious waters against swoonings and sudden qualms. And lightly the poorest Cottager, though he cannot go to the price of the better extractions, yet will at least have some Aqua-vitae in the house. Now if thy heart hold not such store of these most precious promises as the richer Saints; yet be sure to have at all times Saint Paul's Aqua-vitae ready, 1 Tim. 1.15. This is a true saying, and worthy of all acceptation; that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners. But do thy best to fill the Cabinet of thy heart, thou shalt have need enough of all. Remember who hath promised: All God's promises are yea and Amen in Jesus Christ, may they be Yea and Amen in our believing hearts.

Are given to us. Here is the fourth circumstance of the Conveighance; the Form of it, which is a deed of gift, Are given us. All worldly things are but lent us: our houses of stone wherein our bodies dwell, our houses of clay wherein our souls dwell, are but lent. Honors, treasures, pleasures, money, maintenance, but lent. We may say of them all, as he said of his axe-head when it fell into the water: Alas they are but borrowed. Only spiritual graces are given: of those things there is only a true donation, whereof there is a true possession. Worldly things are but a Tabernacle, a moveable; heaven is a mansion: whatsoever becomes of the former, if thou canst keep the other, say Perdidi periturum, servavi aeternum; I have lost that I could not keep, I have kept that I cannot loose. Happy Christians, though they have the least share of things lent, they have the greatest portion of things given. Nos nihil in terris, illi nihil in coelis: we have little on earth, they have less in heaven. GOD shall say to the wicked, I have lent thee an Office, give account of it, for thou must be no longer Steward. But to the faithful, My peace I give to you, not as the world giveth: how gives the world? Dat aliqua, ut surripiat omnia: it gives a little, that it may take away all: but the Joy that I give you, no man shall take from you, John. 16.22. Whatsoever is freer than gift; it makes a new proprietary of the same things: such gifts are God's 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, without repentance. He may repent that he made man, Gen. 6. that he made Saul King; but he never repents that he made a man repentant, or that he hath given him grace in Jesus Christ. But saith of him, as Isaac said of Jacob; I have blessed him, and he shall be blessed, Gen. 27.33. Here the Lord's bounty requires of us some duty; this threefold.

1. Call upon the Giver, as the beggar frequents the gates of bounty; and that in faith, Ask in faith, without wavering; for Desinat orare, qui non sperat exorare: let him spare to speak, that distrusts to speed. Faith is to GOD as Bethshebà was to Solomon; so in favor, that the King will deny her nothing. And when thou movest this bounteous Giver, beg the best things, such as are well worth giving. When we put to sea, we pray for a good gale; when we have sown, for a good spring; when we reap for fair weather: we may have all these, and yet be cursed: let us entreat for grace, this will bless all. God does us no wrong in taking away our temporal things, for they are but lent us: Retrahit sua, non abstrahit nostra: he takes back his own, he does not take away ours. It is an argument of love in the Father; when he takes away the child's knife, and gives to him a book. We cry for riches, it is a knife to cut our fingers: GOD gives us a Bible the riches of verity, not of vanity. Magnum magna decent: great works become a great nature: let us not be afraid to ask him a kingdom; for how unworthy so ever we are of things so far beyond us, yet he gives things worthy himself. When Alexander gave a whole City to one of his Favorites, he modestly replied; It was too great a fortune for a man of so mean condition. But the Monarch answered; Non quaero quid oporteat te accipere, sed quid deceat me tribuere. I examine not what is fit for thee to receive, but what is fit for me to give.

2 Be thankful to this Giver; not only for spiritual, but even for temporal things. It is not enough to take the whole loaves, but let us even gather up the fragments. Lay up in the Ark of thy memory, not only the Pot of Manna, the Bread of life; but even Aaron's Rod, the very scourge of correction, wherewith thou hast been bettered. Blessed be the Lord, not only Giving, but also Taking away; saith Job. God that sees, there is no walking upon roses to heaven, puts his children into the way of discipline: and by the fire of correction, eats out the rust of corruption, Psal. 50.15. God sends trouble, then bids us call upon him; promiseth our deliverance: and lastly, the all he requires of us is to Glorify him. God giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not. Never upbraids? How then doth he condemn Israel by the Ox and the Ass? Isaiah 1.3. How tell David of his favors to him, in deliverance from Saul, and advancement to a Kingdom? I answer, God never upbraids, but when our ingratitude enforceth him. The widow of Zarephath to Elias; 1 King. 17.18. Art thou come to call my sin to remembrance? But it is our unthankfulness, that calls our sins to remembrance. How is the faithful City become an Harlot? God enquires not the means, but wonders at the matter. Unthankfulness is such a fault, that men think it a vice, Angels a sacrilege, Devils a monster, God himself a wonder. Gratitude pleaseth him: of the Samaritan that gave him thanks, Christ took notice. Of the ten cleansed none were found to give glory to God, but the stranger. The Leper praiseth God, Christ praiseth the Leper: Mary Magdalene gave Christ an unction of thankfulness, he gave her an unction of a good name; a thing better than ointment; for A good name is better than precious ointment. That wheresoever this Gospel should be preached, her work should not be forgotten: Mat. 26.13. the whole world should ring of her. God gives all gratis, I mean in the adverb, not in the noun; for they are not all thankful persons that receive it. Some are not made better by God's gifts, yea, many are made worse.

Give Saul a Kingdom, and he will tyrannize: give Nabal good cheare, and he will be drunk: give Judas an Apostleship, and he will sell his Master for money.

But if God gives all to us, let us give something to him. What shall I give him? Quid retributam Domino? non mea sed me; Not only my goods, but myself. Say as that Widow might, I am poor and have nothing to give, but my two mites; my body and soul; take them, and take all. When thou comest to offer thy sacrifice of thanks; do as Abraham was bidden; Occide unicum, charissimum peccatum: Slay (not thy dearest son, but) thy dearest sin. If we give our soul to GOD; as Abraham did Isaac, he will restore our soul to us with joy, as he did Isaac to Abraham: and that, as he did there to him, so here to us, not without the promises of life. There are that think everything too much that God receives: as Leonides a steward told Alexander, that he bestowed too much frankincense on his gods. When Mary gave JESUS that ointment, Judas cries, Ad quid perditio haec? Why is this waste? he thought it lost. But he that hath given himself to God, will not stick at the rest. It is the Apostles argument of God's liberality to us; He that spared not his only Son, but gave him for us, will not deny other things with him. So if thou have given him thyself, thou wilt never grudge him thy purse, or thy praise. It is a good desire of the soul, with that Father; Quicquid mihi vult dare Dominus, auferat totum & se mihi det; Whatsoever the Lord would give me, let him deny all and give me himself. So God requires of us, not thousands of Rams, nor ten thousand rivers of oil; not the son of the body for the sin of the soul: but man, give me thyself. This instar omnium, super omnia, instead of all, above all. As Seneca writes of Aeschines a poor scholar, to his master Socrates: Dono tibi unum quod habeo, meipsum; I offer thee that one thing I only have, myself. Others have given much to thee, but they have kept more to themselves: but no man gives more, than he that keeps nothing back. Socrates kindly accepted and answered; I will take care, ut te meliorem tibi reddam quam acceperii: that I may restore thee to thyself better than I received thee. So GOD deals with us, his return is better than our gift: we give to him ourselves sinful and wretched, he restores us to ourselves gracious and blessed.

3. Be not proud, arrogate not that to thyself which is God's gift. The Apostles restored a Creeple that was lame from his mothers womb: but least any of God's glory should cleave to their earthen fingers, they disclaim their own power and holiness, and give it to him that owes it, and will not give it to another; the name of JESUS CHRIST hath made this man strong. The blessed Virgin that was so full of grace, in se not a se; humbly acknowledged the fountain: even God her Savior. The Papists trust in our Lady, but our Lady did trust in our LORD. And albeit she was sanctified to be the mother of her Maker; though so good a woman that, Non primam similem visa est, nec habere sequentem; though all generations call her blessed; yet saith she, Respexit humilitatem: The Lord regarded the lowliness of his handmaid. They may tell us, that she doth, Iure matris imperare, but indeed she did Fide filiae impetrare: not command by the right of a mother, but obtain by the faith of a daughter. O praise the Lord! make known his deeds among the people: make known his works, but to his glory: for some make known his deeds, but to their own glory. Vain-glory easily creeps in even through the crack of our acknowledgement of God's goodness towards us. One says, such a Nobleman drank to me, shook me by the hand, discoursed with me: but hereby he insinuates to the hearers some worthiness in himself, for which he was so graced. So some in declaring GOD'S works and favors to them, have a conceit of merit in themselves, deserving such respect. To meet with which pride, may seem CHRIST'S charge to the Leper. Mark 1.44. See thou tell it to no man. Which enjoined silence was not to smother God's glory, but to keep him from vain-glory.

Thus we have considered the Conveyance, in the - Intent, Whereby.

- Content, Promises.
- Extent, Great and Precious.
- Patent, Are given us.

Now if all this be not a sufficient assurance, then give me leave to speak according to your capacity in the City; and to add-that it is signed, sealed, delivered, and bound with an oath, for your further confirmation. You are well acquainted with these words, with such deeds: I wish therefore, that as you know them in earthly things to your profit, so you may know them in heavenly things to your comfort.

They are signed, God hath put his hand to them in the Gospel. If a Noble man should send the gracious letters of preferment, and put his hand to them, thou wouldest credit it. If thy father taking a long journey, should first pen his own will, wherein he did make thee his heir, and bequeath to thee all his substance; and set his hand to it; thou wouldest joyfully and confidently embrace it. This Patent is the Testament and will of Jesus Christ. Father, I will that they whom thou hast given me, may be with me where I am. This he hath signed with his own hand: for the Evangelists were but the pens, it was the hand of Christ himself.

2. But it is not enough to have a writing signed, doth the law require sealing? These promises are sealed to us: there are two broad Seals, the two Sacraments. Baptism, whosoever believeth and is baptized, shall be saved: there is one broad-seal. The Lord's supper; whosoever eateth the flesh of Christ, and drinketh his blood, shall not perish; there is another broad-seal. For the Sacraments are not only Signa, sed Signacula; not bare signs, but Seals, so Paul called Circumcisiona seal of the righteousness of faith. There is also a privy seal, Miracles; wrought in the first rising of the Sun, but now in the glorious day of grace and knowledge, ceasing. Now we ask not for the privy seal of miracles; but the broad-seals of the Sacraments: herewith we are content, for by these instruments we receive Christ. Verbum audimus, motum sentimus, modum nescimus, praesentiam credimus, Durand. We hear the word, we feel the virtue, we know not the manner, but we believe the presence of JESUS CHRIST. The Romists abuse both these Seals: God's broad-seal in corrupting the Sacraments, God's privy seal in their false and lying miracles.

Is not this yet enough, to be signed with his holy hand, and sealed with his Royal arms, except still it be delivered? These are delivered to us: Ye have received the spirit of adoption. That you may be sure of this conveyance, it is put into your hands, into your hearts.

If yet the Subscription of GOD'S hand, and affixion of his sale, and delivery into your possession, be not sufficient; Addit & Iuramentum. GOD willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath. That by two unchangeable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation. In which two verses, that stand like two Turrets, there are eight fortifications; which all the powers of hell shall never be able to overthrow. He doth not say, but show; there's demonstration; not sparingly, but Abundantly; Extention: To, not servants, but sons and Heirs; if so, never to be disinherited; there's Adoption: Of Promise; not of man's birth or merit, but of God's promise, who never yet brake his word: there's ratification. The Immutability of his counsel; ego Jehovah non mutor: friends are inconstant, riches are inconstant, the world is inconstant, but I the Lord change not, Mal. 3.6. there's Determination. He interposed himself by an oath; wonderful mercy, that the Creator should swear to his creature! there's confirmation. These be two immutable things; therefore without alteration, In which it was impossible for God to lie: well may he deny sinners, but he cannot deny himself: there's impossibility of retraction. Now for the Corollary, or use of all these invincible arguments, it is our strong consolation: so strong a fortress, that if we do not betray it ourselves, all the engines of hell shall never endanger it. How much are we beholding to God that he will swear, but how little beholding is God to us, if we will not believe him when he swears.

We see the stability of these gracious Promises: which (to shut up the discourse with application) should not pass us without some profitable use. From the stability of GOD'S promises to us, let us learn to be constant in the performance of our promises to God, and to man.

1 To God: we have all made a promise to him in our baptism; let not us forget that, lest God forget us. Did we then promise, and do we now stagger? The true Christian is fixed on the poles of constancy, not carried on the wheels of change. Let us continue in the Faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the Gospel. So grounded, that if an Angel from heaven should preach another Gospel, let him be accursed, Gal. 1.8. The inconstant professor is scarce a Christian, but like A grippa almost a Christian. His Religion lies in wait for the Parliament; neither ebbs nor flows, but is just standing water, betwixt both. As a noun, he is only adjective; as a verb, he knows no tense but the present. One part thinks him theirs, the adverse theirs, he is with both, with neither; not an hour with himself. He might get to heaven, but for his halting; but he knows not what he should hold, he knows not what he doth hold. He is sure to die, but not what religion to die in. He cannot tell whether is best to say his Pater noster in latin or in English and so leaves it unsaid. He that hath promised, and not performed, is in worse case then he that never promised. The fedifragous Christian speeds worse than the barbarous Infidel.

2 To man; promises are due debts. There might happily have been no sin in not promising, there is a sin after promise in not performing. There is more alliance, than affiance in the world: Frater quasi fere alter, keep thy word with him as with thyself. But how should he keep touch with man, that breaks with God, with his own soul! If this point seem obscure, there are too many in this City whose lives may comment upon it. Curant ut debeant, non ut solvant.

They take care to owe, they think they ought not to pay. These are worse than the Prodigal; he lived on his own portion; these like the unjust steward live on another man's portion. They bear the name and wear the livery, but have not the souls of Christians. A debtor that can pay and will not, makes himself incapable of pardon. Such men think to set all on CHRIST'S score; and to say Dimitte nobis debita nostra, forgive us our debts, is sufficient: though they leave out the other part of the petition, As we forgive others. But God does not forgive spiritual debts where men have no care to pay temporal debts. Why but there is more virtue in the seed of the woman, than can be venom in the head of the Serpent; and repentance makes all reckonings even. But be not deceived, God is not mocked. If they mock him, he will mock them: he that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh, the Lord shall have them in derision: neither can there be repentance without restitution. A thief takes away thy purse, asks thy pardon, says he is sorry for it, but keeps it still: thou sayest he does but mock thee. If God could be coozened with tricks, how many political worldlings would go to heaven, whose portion is in the infernal depth.

Well, let us learn to put away lying, and to speak every man truth to his neighbor, for we are members one of another. There is vetitum, a thing forbidden, Lie not: Iussum, a thing commanded, speaking truth: argumentum, a reason for both, because we are members one of another. Let us be plain in promising, honest in performing. There are some that have double tongues, and speak their promises in a doubtful sense. Ambagious, equivocating terms; epicene and bastard phrases, as the devil gave his oracles; which must be true every way, certain no way. They beguile men's plainness, but in plain truth they beguile their own souls. For they that will over-reach others with the sin of deceitfulness, shall be over-reached themselves with the deceitfulness of sin. They sing the song of Curio, vincat utilitas; let gain prevail: they had rather be sinners than beggars. Thus according to Daniel's prophecy, Prosternetur veritas, truth shall be cast down: covetousness hath got the advantage of ground, and Truth is fallen in the street. Thus these two wrestle on earth, and truth falls: but one day when they shall wrestle in heaven, Cupiditatem prosternet veritas, truth shall prevail. Wine is strong, Princes are strong, Women are strong, but truth is stronger than all, 1 Esdr. 4.35.

But now where is this truth? I will tell you an apologue: four friends parting inquired where they should find one another again: the water, the fire, the wind, and truth. Fire said, you shall be sure to find me in a flint stone: Water said, you shall be sure to find me in the root of a bulrush: Wind said, you shall be sure to find me amongst the leaves: but poor Truth could not appoint no certain place of meeting: for Terras Astraera reliquit, no place for truth, what say you to Westminster Hall? indeed there is room enough, but small room for truth. What say you to the exchange? there be fair walks, but they may exchange away truth. Where is she then, in your shops? that were strange to find truth in shops. Is she then in the Courts? we behold there always Sedem veritatis, the seat of truth; but not always veritatem sedentis, truth in him that supplies that place. Perhaps she lurks in the Colleges of the Jesuits: Oh no, when the truth offered to come thither, equivocation repeld her. She could never abide their main Principles; Iura, perjura, secretum prodere noli: swear and forswear, rather than tell truth. What is she in Scrinio pectoris Papalis, in the Popes breast, that we should run to Rome for her?

no Antichrist cannot be a friend to truth. Is she not ferried over to Amsterdam? no, truth will never follow those that run away from the Church. You would wonder to find her in a Courtier, in a Politician; whose element and position is, Qui nescit dissimulare, nescit vivere: he that knows not how to dissemble, knows not how to live. Or in a country man's budget, shut up with snaphance: no, you shall have as much deceit under russet, as under velvet, though a little more bunglerly. No thanks to them, they would cozen as frequently, if they could do it as cleanly, you would smile to find her in Pueris & Fatuis; in children and fools: yet they say, children and foolestell truth. But if it be child-hood or folly to tell truth, I am sure we have but a few children, a few fools. Or in a drunkard; yet they say, In vino veritas, drink utters the truth. But take the Ale-bench without a malicious lie, or at least an officious lie; a very lie, or a merry lie, and make a Pew of it. Where then shall we find Truth? I hope in the Church, in the Pulpits: Oh God forbid else! yet often truth keeps only in the pulpit, and does not go down stairs with the man; but stays there till his coming up again. I hope in this scrutiny of truth you will not say, that I have favored ourselves: no, beloved, GOD give us hearts, to know that we are all untrue, deceitful upon the weights; and minds, to seek truth as precious treasure. Omnis homo mendax, God is true, every man a liar. There is no certain place to find truth, but in the word of God; there let us seek her, there we shall find her. Now the God of Truth give us the truth of God, in the knowledge of Jesus Christ.

That by these you might be partakers of the Divine nature. We are come to the second general part of the Verse; which we called the Inheritance, consisting in the participation of the Divine nature. And we may well call it so; for none can deceive us of it before we have it, nor deprive us of it, after we have it. It cannot be prevented; Fear not little flock, it is my Fathers will to give you a kingdom. Ab initio decretum, diu secretum, plenitudine temporis perceptum: determined from the beginning, concealed a while, possessed in due time: whatsoever our Lawyers distinguish between a free-hold in law, and a free-hold in deed; this is both. It is a free-hold in law, whereto even they have right, that have not yet possession. It is a free-hold in deed: on earth we have a purchase of the Inheritance, in heaven an Inheritance of the purchase.

That partakers, &c. Before I show you the vine, let me cut up two brambles: one whereof the Manichees, the other the Familists, planted (by force) on this ground: there went but a pair of sheeres between them: that of the Manichees was a dream, Nos ex traduce Dei ortos, that we came by traduction from the nature of God himself: and when this temporary life had run the course; we should return to the same ancient estate, and become a divine nature. They presupposed a commixion of God's nature with ours; as if they were mell'd together like wine and water. This is a blasphemous heresy, to think there is Transfusio divinae essentiae in hominem, infinitae in circumscriptam: a transfusion of the divine being into man, as if Infiniteness could be in a circumscriptable essence. A creature cannot be made of the essence of God, for it hath no parts, it is not divisible. The other is of some fanatical spirits, who think we do so pass into God's nature, that our nature is quite swallowed up of his. So they take that place, 1 Cor. 15.28. that at the last God shall be all in all. But certainly this delirement never came into the holy Apostles minds; that our natural being should be lost in the essence of God: they meant not that we should lose our nature, but the corruption of our nature; and that by a sanctified renovation we should be made partakers of the Divine immortality and blessedness. Thus we are made one with God, secundum modulum nostrum, according to the capableness of our nature. The Familists say, we are deified: so as GOD became man, man becomes God: Their own words are, men are deified, and God hominified. These are new words, such as the ancient Fathers never taught nor thought. But those men thought it no treason to coin new words: and indeed it was necessary that they who would coin a new religion, should also coin new terms, new paradoxes. There were some held, that man's soul was part of God's own essence, Virgil, Divinae particula aerae. Indeed it is a breath of God, a work of God, not a part of God.

Things may divers ways participate others nature. Omnes species sub eodem genere participant essentiam generis: as Angel, devil, man, and beast partake the nature of a living creature. Omnia individua sub eadem specie participant essentiam speciei: as Peter and Paul of a reasonable nature: Wolf and Lamb of a Brute: Cedars and Briers of a vegetative. But to come nearer home, and to detain you no longer in the suburbes or entrance.

God's nature may be participated two ways; Secundum qualitatem, secundum Aequalitatem. For equality, this Trium personarum solum, as Aquin. It is only proper to the three persons of the blessed Trinity, and not communicable to any other. Our Savior CHRIST partakes both the Divine nature, and the Humane. The Divine per essentiae Identitatem, by the Identitie of his essence. The Humane, assumendo hominem in Deum; by taking man's nature into God. Non desinit esse quod erat, sed incipit esse quod non erat. He did not cease to be what he was, but he began to be what he was not. And this assumption of man's nature to the divine, did not make it God: it did rarely beautify it, not properly defy it. For as he was man he had not the essence of the deity in him, but he was in it. Yet did he so glorify it, that all the Angels of GOD worship it. When he bringeth in the first begotten into the world, he saith; let all the Angels of God worship him. Our neighbors of Rome tell us, that CHRIST was often worshipped as man: they urge these places, Matth. 2 11. Matth. 8.2. Matth. 9.18. Matth. 20.20. But here we doubt two things: first whether this was religious worship or civil. Next, if it were religious, whether their eye of faith saw not him God, so well as their eye of flesh saw him man. Indeed the flesh of CHRIST is to be adored for the union of the deity, because they be inseparable: but the Arians worshipped CHRIST as a creature only, not as GOD and man. Confitemur adorabilem in corpore, non secundum corpus. We adore him in his flesh, not according to his flesh: as the honor redounds to the King himself, that is done to the Crown on his head. But I durst here conclude against the Papists; that if it be unlawful to worship Christ as he is only man, then much more unlawful to worship his Image.

Thus we see how CHRIST who is God, partakes of our nature: now consider how we by Christ who is man, partake of the divine nature. Here the wicked begin to clap their wings, and boldly to infer, that they partake God's nature, because GOD partakes their nature. But if this were enough to save men, because Christ took our flesh, call Cain and Judas out of hell, yea let hell it self be as imaginary as is Purgatory. A father hath ten sons, nine of them are sick: do they all certainly recover because the tenth is sound? yet they come all from the loins of one father. All the house of Cis are not kings, because Saul is one. It is not enough that Christ comes near thee in the flesh, unless thou come near him in the spirit. Though there be sap in the vine, congruent and potential to bring forth fruit in the branches: yet doth not this vine communicate his sap to Oaks and briars, albeit these partake of the general nature of wood. Yea after that the very branches of the vine are broken off and dead, the vine ministers to them no more sap, though they retain the vines species and nature. So that it is not our participation of Christ's human nature, that makes us happy; but of his divine: that partaking is by flesh, but this is by faith. It is probable that some were lost, who were even kin to Christ in the flesh: yet it must needs be granted, that to partake of the same blood, is a degree nearer, than to partake of the same nature. Matthew and Luke set down Christ's Genealogy; the one, his line royal, the other, his line natural. But Christ himself sets down another Genealogy, a new one a spiritual one: my mother and my brethren are they which hear the word of God, and do it. He affirms these to be as near to him in the faith, as his own mother in the flesh. And she was more blessed Percipiendo fidem, quàm concipiendo carnem; in being the daughter, than in being the mother of Christ. The Jews thought it a great privilege to be Abraham's sons: yet one that called himself son of Abraham, fries in hell. The damned churl could say; Father Abraham have mercy on me: the flesh was not made after the Image of God, but the spirit: therefore God is not called Pater corporum, the father of bodies; but Pater spirituum, the father of the spirits of all flesh, John 3.6. That which is borne of the flesh is flesh: but that which is borne of the spirit is spirit. Esau was not blessed because he was of Isacks flesh, but Jacob was blessed because he was of Isacks spirit Paul is said to travail of the Galatians, Till Christ was formed in them. Thus men may partake of one nature in Christ and yet be cursed: but if of his divine nature, they are blessed.

This participation then must be only qualitative: by nature we understand not substance, but quality: by grace in this world, and by glory in the world to come. This communication of the Divine nature to us, is by reparation of the divine image in us. This is cleared by the analogy of other respondent places, Hebr. 12.10. That we might be partakers of his holiness: so that to partake of the divine nature, is to be holy as God is holy, Eph. 4.24. Put on the new man which after God is created in righteousness and the holiness of truth. To be created after God, is to partake of God's nature; and this consists in justice and holiness, Rom. 8.29. God did predestinate us to to be conformed to the Image of his Son: the conformity to God's image, is the participating God's nature. This was not wholly unseen to Plato, who said it was man's chiefest good, Deo fieri penitùs conformem, to be made like to God. The sweetness of this benefit, and the multiplicity of comforts arising from it, I defer a little further: and here proceed to exemplify the relations, which may in some measure shadow out to us this partaking of the Divine nature. For it is in no-wise to be understood really, but by renovation. I propounded in the distribution seven respects, to exemplify the benefit of this participation.

1 As servants of a Master; not merely as creatures, so all men partake; We are also his offspring. With outward things he maintains all; the whole world almost these six thousand years at his own proper cost and charges. He feeds the Ravens, and the young Lions seek their meat at him. How few of the birds of the air lie dead at thy feet for want of provision! But alas as the Canaanite: old CHRIST; these like the Dogs eat only the crumbs; the faithful have the fat morsels; All our Fathers servants have bread enough. They are but servants, yet they have bread enough. Thus we partake with God in being his servants, wherein indeed consists true liberty. For he that is called in the Lord, being a servant, is the Lord's freeman. Thou Israel art my Servant the seed of Abraham my friend, Vers. 9. Thou art my friend I have chosen thee. And this is a sure participation where can be no rejection. But how do GOD'S servants partake of these divine things? In five respects; in Liverie, Liberty, Dignity, Cognisance, Recompence. For their Liverie, it is the profession of the Gospel; that same New man, Col. 3.10. restored to the Creators Image. For their liberty, Gal. 5.1. Stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free. For their dignity, John. 12.26. If any man serve me, him will my Father honor. It is more credit to be a Porter of God's gate, than to command in the presence chamber of a King, Psal. 84.10. I had rather be a door keeper in the house of my GOD, &c. For their cognizance, it is both visible and invisible, visible in their Charity, John 13.35. By this shall all men know that ye are my Disciples. Invisible, as being sealed in their foreheads with the mark of the living God, Revel. 7.3. For their recompence: the world says, It is in vain to serve God: but they shall be mine saith the Lord, in that day when I make up my Jewels: of so high a value as his special treasure, Ver. 17. God does not, as great men commonly do with their servants; give them countenance, and let them shift for themselves. He gives not only protection, but provision: not only countenance, but maintenance. Well done good and faithful servant, enter into the joy of thy Lord.

This is the sweet: but not common to all. For all shall not have Servorum omina the rewards of servants; that have Servorum nomina, the name of servants. God hath many servants, but little service in the world. We do so trust and thrust his work one upon another, that still it is not done: they say, many hands make light work but is usually seen, that many hands make slight work. God's holy name is blasphemed, the hearer says, let the Magistrate look to it: the Magistrate says, let the Minister reprove it: the Minister says, let the hearer reform it: the company says, let the offender himself answer it: the offender says, Curet nemo, let no man mind it. The sea breaks in, all the borders contend whose right it is to mend the damme: but whilst they all strive much, and do nothing, the sea breaks further in upon them, and drowns the whole country. A Gentle-man having but one servant, thought him over-burdened with work, and therefore took another to help him: now he had two, and one of them so trusted to the others observance that they were often both missing, and the work was not done. Then he chose another, he had three; and was then worse served than before. Therefore he told his friend; when I had one servant, I had a servant: when I had two, I had but half a one: now I have three, I have never a one. GOD hath so many titular servants, that when his business comes to be done, not one of them can be found.

2 As subjects of a Prince, and thus we partake with the King of heaven in many benefits. We have Defensionem legis, the tuition of his Law; through a blessed Advocate. If any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous. We are fain to sue in forma pauperis, therefore the great Judge of heaven hath appointed us a Counselor to plead our cause; Jesus Christ, we have Tutelam Imperii, the safe-guard of the Empire; not only the protection of the King, from which the wicked as out-laws are secluded: but also the keeping of Angels, to whom He hath given a charge over us, to keep us in all his ways. So nearly we participate of his Divine things, that we have his own guard royal to attend us. I know, that Christ is king over all the world. The Lord reigneth, let the people tremble. This kingdom is material and formal. The material are his subjects, and these are both elect and reprobate: for all are under his kingdom, sed diverso affectu, diverso effectu; with a different desire with a different event. The will of the King fit de malis, fit à bonis; is done by the obedient, upon the rebellious. The form of his government is Herile in illos, Paternum in istos; to the wicked, the rule of a Lord over his slaves; to the faithful, the rule of a father over his sons. Accordingly he hath a double Scepter; there is Virga Consolationis, the Rod of consolation, Psal. 23.4. Thy rod doth comfort me. And Virga confusionis, the rod of confusion, Psal. 2.9. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron. Christ's kingdom is eternal; he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end. And this not only Formaliter, in respect of the king: but also Materialiter, in respect of the subjects: for they shall stand continually before him, as the Queen of the South blessed Solomon. In the Persian army were ten thousand soldiers called Athanatoi, immortal: not indeed because they died not, but because that number was supplied, and continually made up. As a Divine handling a point of usury concerning a hundred sheep lent to a neighbor, with a certain rate or rent to be paid yearly for them, and the stock still at the years end to be made good; wittily called these Immortal sheep, for they never died to the owner, though to the borrower they all miscarried. But Christ says not as Laban did to Jacob; if any sheep die, thou shalt make them up de tuo, of thine own: thou shalt bear the loss of it, of thy hand I will require it. But rather like David, saves his sheep from the Bear and Lion, the world and the devil. As himself when he died, suffered not a bone of his own to be broken, and another put in place: so his subjects shall have no change: those thou hast given me, I have kept, and none of them is lost. Here shall be no Interregnum, not Multi Principes; nor is it enough to say, Vivat Rex; but oh king, live forever Thine is the kingdom, power and glory forever and ever. A King he is, yet he were but a poor king, if he had no subjects: but they shall reign with him a thousand years, Revel. 20.6. that is, forever. For if every day in heaven be as a thousand years, what is a thousand years of such days but Eternity?

He is our King, to make us blessed by his kingdom. Augustus, that day he had done no good to his subjects, in relieving their wants, said to his friends at night; Hodie non regnavi; I have not been a King today. It was proverbied of Aurelianus, that he was a good Physician, but he gave too bitter medicines. Julian used to stamp a Bull on his coin, whereupon the Antiochians inferred, that he purposed to goare the world to death. The breasts of some Kings have been stuffed with a thunder-cloud, their vapors always venting to the worlds terror. But we may say of our supreme King Christ, as (in due measure) of his Servant our royal Sovereign: if at least we may compare the peace of a Prince with the Prince of peace: as he is the fairest blossom that ever budded out of the white and red Rosary: so he hath brought together red and white; Christ hath reconciled Justice and mercy; anger red as blood, and compassion white as snow. He hath turned; our scarlet sins into white wool: and this by making himself ruddy in passion that was ever so white in innocence. My Beloved is white and ruddy, the chiefest often thousand. Thus we partake the blessings of his Divine Nature in being his subjects: let the heathen serve their tyrants, the Turks their Mahomet, the Romists their Pope, worldlings their lusts: Thou O Jesus Christ be our King forever.

3 As sons of a Father, thus we partake many things of the Divine Nature. 1. Children have from their fathers on earth Generation, we from our Father in heaven Regeneration; We receive the adoption of sons. We are not natural sons; so is Christ only: but naturalized, as I may say, made his own by adoption and grace. I will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters. 2. We have nutrition, and that both natural and supernatural. Isaiah 1. I have nourished and brought up children. He gives bread to nourish, not stones to choke: Beneficia, non veneficia; Fishes not Serpents, Matth. 7. Thirdly, we have Education: earthly parents bring up their children to their own customs: Rachel, though she would go with her husband Jacob; yet would not leave her Fathers gods behind her Our fathers worshiped in this mountain; therefore so may we. That which comes by tradition, is held inheritance. Videtur licitum, quicquid est consuetum: That which is patronised by usualnesse, slips into the opinion of lawfulness. Thus many children are made Papists by the mothers side: and she is so her self, for no other reason but because her Grandame was so. Thus materna sectantes, paterna perdunt: whiles they follow the counsel of their mother on earth, they lose the blessing of their Father in heaven. But God brings up all his children after his own law: they are in a strange land, yet live after the laws of their own Country, their conversation is in heaven.

God deals with us, as Bernard observes, Isaac did with his son Jacob, Gen. 27. First, verse. 21. Tangit manu approbationis; Come near that I may feel thee my son. Then verse. 26. Osculatur instinctu inspirationis; Come near that I may kiss thee my son. Cant. 1. Let him kiss me with the kisses of his lips; that is, with his Spirit; for the Holy Ghost is Osculum Patris, the kiss of God the Father. Then verse. 27. Benedicit, he blesseth him; gives him a progress of grace, and that irrevocable; he shall be blessed. Lastly, he gives consolation, and full confidence, that we boldly cry, Abba, Father. This duplication, Father, Father, is pathological and mystical. Pathetical; and so it insinuates our Certainty; we are sure that God is our Father: And our Fervency, that we be importunate, not taking a denial at our Fathers hands. So Martyr. Mystical, as Aug. Paul in using an Hebrew word and a Greek, signifies that there is no difference between Jew and Grecian; for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him. Every Christian in the world may go boldly unto the Throne of Grace. It is for a Saul to say, Pray for me: but he that is God's son, dares go himself without sending others: let no terrors keep us from our Father. Ibo ad patrem, I will arise and go to my Father. To such a commer Christ will communicate good things; Daughter, be of good comfort, Matth. 9.22. Daughter, a word of great familiarity: Be of good comfort, a word of great security. I ascend unto my Father, and your Father. To his Father? what's this to us? Yea, also to your Father. Aug. He doth not say, I ascend ad Patrem nostrum, to our Father; but to My Father, and Your Father: Aliter meum, aliter vestrum: meum naturâ, vestrum gratiâ. He is in one respect my Father, in another yours; mine by nature, yours by grace.

Infinite good things we partake, if we be sons; but all lies in the assurance of this filialtie. When God gives a man sanctity, he seems to say; Thou art my Son, this day I have begotten thee: when man apostates; Thou art not my son, this day have I lost thee. What say you to the covetous worldling? Is he the son of God, that is not charitable to the sons of God? King Richard the holy warrior, having taken a Bishop in the field in Coat-armor, was requested by the Pope to release him; Dimitte mihi filium: Send me my son. The King sends not the Bishop, but his Coat-armor to the Pope, with this question; An haec esset filii sui tunica; Is this thy sons Coat? alluding to that of Jacob's sons, when they had sold their brother Joseph, and dipped his garment in Goats-blood; This we have found, know now whether it be thy sons coat. The Pope being ashamed, returned his answer; Nec hanc esse filii sui tunicam; That this was not the Coat of any son of his. God's sons are known by their coat, that is, Charity. Satan lays hold on the covetous oppressor, and makes him his captive: if God should now say, Dimitte mihi filium; deliver me my son: he would straight show God the oppressors coat; his Injustice and Extortion, Haecine filii tui tunica; is this thy sons Coat? No, God's children wear no such kind of garments, let him either strip off such robes, or perish with them. Let others be ambitious of great and glorious parentages; only, Lord, make us thy sons and daughters in Jesus Christ.

4 As Fellowes, in due measure, with God himself, 1 John. 1.3. Truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. We may have a society with man, this is requisite, for we are all of one mould: but to God, what all fellows? Yes, we have a fellowship with God; such is his mercy, not our merits. The proud Gallant scorns the poor Mechanicke; what, are you my fellow? Yet, Mors sceptrum ligonibus aequat, Death takes away difference between King and beggar, tumbles both the knight and the pawn into one bag. Well, let the world despise us, it is enough the Lord doth not disdain our fellowship. The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the Fellowship of the holy Ghost, be with you all. Diverse sorts of fellowships.

Consortes, such as partake a mutual lot, as fellow-merchants in their adventures. We have thus a fellowship with God. If we rejoyce, he joys in us, with us, makes us indeed rejoyce in him. For Christ rejoyceth in the Christian, whensoever the Christian rejoyceth in Christ. That repenting son was not more glad that he had found his father, than the father was glad he had found his son, Luke 15. If we suffer, he suffers with us. Saul, thou persecutest me, saith Christ. Patitur in nobis, qui passus est pro nobis: He that did once suffer for us, doth still suffer in us. The Usurer oppressing thee, takes away the goods of Christ; and shall be called to a strict account. There is Consortium, the word by most translations here used.

Contubernales, Chamber-fellows, such as lodge together, Come my beloved, let us lodge in the Villages. Where the chamber is a sanctified heart, the bed a pure faith, the pillow is the peace of conscience, the curtains like Solomon's, Azure, Purple, and Scarlet. Azure or sky-color, noting our heavenly conversation; Purple, our zeal to God's glory: Scarlet, our charity; so Love is praised to have a thread of Scarlet in her lips. Thus now God is thy chamber-fellow, and inhabites thy holy conscience: and hereafter thou shalt dwell together with him in everlasting rest.

Conviatores, fellows in a journey, and thus we have CHRIST'S company. Whilest they walked and talked, Jesus himself drew near, and went with them. They that will walk to Christ, shall have Christ walk with them. He is the Truth, the Way, and the Life: they that faithfully seek viam vitae, the way of life, shall find vitam viae, the life of the way. The Papists have great Pilgrimages to Shrines, Christ doth not travel with them: he hath no fellowship with them, that gives his honor to blocks and stones. Let my soul on the holy feet of faith and obedience, travel toward Jerusalem; then Christ will say, Vade mecum, thou shalt have my company. The good Christian cannot in any Country travel alone, he is sure of the fellowship of his Savior.

Collocutores, such as confer together; so we partake with GOD in a sweet and familiar discourse, Come now and let us reason together, saith the Lord. Tell me your griefs, saith CHRIST. Are you pained at the heart with true compunction for your sins? I will heal the broken-hearted. Are you smitten with vexations? I will bind up your wounds. Thus it is our part, Agnoscere, to acknowledge: his mercy, Ignoscere, to forgive. We speak to him by our prayers, he speaks to us by his comforts. We pour our grievances into his bosom, he pours his graces into our bosom. Many cannot hear Christ speaking comfort to them; no marvel, for they speak not for comfort to him. Strangeness doth lose acquaintance. We never came humble petitioners for grace to the Mercy-seat, but we sped: if the Lord hath at someone time been extraordinarily bountiful to us, shall we dis-wont ourselves from his presence, be proud of our own stock, as if we needed him not? This is the way to lose him, and all comfort with him. God loves to have us talk with him: if we forget to pray for good, why should not he forget to do us good?

Convivae, such as feast together; thus we partake with God, If any man open unto me, I will come in and sup with him, and he shall sup with me. Here is a mutual supper; the Confession of sins, that's our cheare: the Remission of sins, that's Christ's cheare. We give him meat and drink, he gives us meat and drink. Our dishes are all Sallets, Lilies, and fruits. My beloved is gone down into his Garden, to the beds of spices, to feed in the Gardens, and to gather Lilies, Cant. 6.2. the fruits of our righteousness. Our drink is penitent tears, though they be sharp to us, they are sweet to him. The tears of penitent sinners is the wine of Angels, says a Father: yea, wine for the Lord himself: not a tear falls, but he catcheth it in his own bottle: if we feast Christ, give him this drink. Let thy heart be a vine-grape, sorrow the wine-press, crush out this liquor, the Lord loves it. His meat to us is his own Flesh, his drink, his Blood: the bread of heaven, and the wine of blessedness. Who so eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, John. 6.54. The Temple is his banquetting-house, or wine-cellar; He brought me to the banquetting-house, Cant. 2.4. There he broacheth to us the sweet wines of his Gospel and Sacraments. Here is another fellowship, and so are we fellow-commoners with Jesus Christ. Indeed all the good cheare is his: alas, what have we of our own to make such a guest welcome! He may safely discommend our provision: let us not say, as some do to their guests; welcome, but here is no good cheare for you, when secretly in their hearts they think there can be no better. Christ loves not so proud a mind when the tongue says, Nihil est, it is nothing: and the heart thinks, Nimum est, it is too much. But plainly acknowledge thy poverty: if thou have any grace to feast him with, thank him for bringing it, and say in this truly, that he is come to his own cost. Yet thus he is pleased to feed on his own provision, and to call it thine. He feeds on ours, Cant. 5.1. I have eaten honey, and drunk milk: we feed on his; Eat O friends, drink abundantly O beloved: drink liberally of it, for it is a Cup of saving health to all nations.

Convoti, sworn brothers: men, not brothers by nature of blood, are made so by vow of love. Here is another fellowship, Christ hath vowed himself thy brother. Both he that sanctifieth, and they who are sanctified, are all of one: for which cause he is not ashamed to call them Brethren. Thou hast vowed thyself to Christ in Baptism, keep thy vow, make good thy fellowship, ne sis foedifragas, lest thou be a vow-breaker. Thy sin is no less than perjury, if thou become his enemy, to whom thou art a sworn brother.

Thus we partake of the Divine Nature (with all reverence be it spoken) as Fellowes. But not to deny the King his Supremacy; Socii sumus in gaudio, not in solio: in loco regni, non in modo regnandi; We are fellows with Christ in his joy, reserving the Throne to himself. Yet he is pleased to promise us a confession with him in his Throne: To him that overcometh, I will grant to sit with me in my Throne, Revel. 3.21. We have a partnership with him in the place of his Kingdom, not in equality of reigning. The King sets a subject at his own table: yet must this subject still acknowledge his Sovereign. Though we be co-heirs, let Christ be the elder brother. Though we be made sicut Angeli, like to the Angels; yet not sicut Dominus Angelorum, not like to the Lord of Angels.

The wicked know not, care nor for this fellowship: they do not like so divine company: they cannot be merry if God be by. Alas! none know the sweetness of this partnership, but the partners. It is a new name, which no man knoweth but he that hath it. But he that hath it is truly merry, and keeps Hilary term all his life. In thy presence is the fullness of joy, and at thy right-hand are pleasures for evermore, Psalms. 16.11. GOD'S company doth not only make us glad, but makes us good. Seneca said, that one special means to stay us from vice, was to think some grave men were in our company. Semper eos tecum, quos verearis, habe. But we have not only men and Angels, but even GOD looking on us, and associating us. Peter swore like a Ruffian, and forswore like a Renegade, till CHRIST looked on him, and then he wept. There be divers fellowships in the world.

There is a generation of men, that lavish their estates; as we say, fling the house out at the windows; that call themselves Good-fellows. But they cannot be Boni sodales, that are mali homines; Good-fellows and evil men are incompatible. They are like Simeon and Levi, sworn brothers, but fratres in malum, brethren in evil. Perhaps they have more society than honest men, but not so good society. Briars and thorns twine more together than good plants. God is not in this fellowship; you shall meet him at the Church, not at the Ale-house. But Satan puts in for a part: sometimes one drunkard plays the devil with another; in stabbing, or over-loading with drink: but if there be not always a personate devil, there is always a personal devil; Satan himself stands by. In this fellowship, Riot is the host, Drunkenness the guest, Swearing keeps the reckoning▪ Lust holds the door, and Beggary pays the shot.

There is another fellowship, a mystical one, a mischievous one; the Society of Jesuits: yet they write themselves, Ex Societate Jesus; Of the fellowship of Jesus. What, no meaner? Would not Peter, nor Paul, nor Francis serve? No, none worthy of these men's company but Jesus. I persuade myself, he will give them little thanks for their familiarity. But do they not rather derive their names à contrario? Jesuits, not because fellows, but enemies to JESUS. As the Romans took names from their Conquests: Scipio Africanus, because he conquered Africa. Call him not Israel, but Jezreel: call them not Jesuits, but Jebusites But Peter is the deputy of Jesus, and they are factours of Peter: indeed they uphold the chair of their imaginary Peter, and blow up other states with Salt-peter. But sure Jesus was never a fellow-digger in their vaults, nor an Enginier in their fire-works.

Well, thus CHRIST to the faithful vouchsafes his fellowship: he is the Rose of Sharon, and the Lily of the valleys: not a Garden-flower enclosed, but he grows in the field; his company is easily had, if our faith invites him. If thou wilt be concors, of one heart; thou shalt be consors, of one fellowship with him. Let thy will and obedience agree with his Commandments; and then his sweet presence shall accompany thy conscience forever. Complaine not though other men blanch thee, so long as thou hast the fellowship of Jesus Christ.

5 As members of a Head, and thus we nearly partake of the Divine Nature. Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular. Christ is the head, the Church is the body, the faithful are the members. What doth the head impart to the body? 1. Sense: he gives us eyes, we see not the mysteries of salvation without him; Lord enlighten mine eyes. Ears; we may hear Evangelium vitae, the Gospel of life; but not vitam Evangelii, the life of the Gospel without him. Lord, open mine ears. Taste; for we may have the Cup of blessing held to our mouth, and yet cannot taste the sweets of grace without him: Lord, make me to relish thy heavenly gift. Feeling; man's brain is said to have no feeling in it self, yet to give feeling to all parts. But Christ hath a feeling of our infirmities, and gives us a feeling of our own. Mortui non est sentire; We are naturally dead, and cannot feel our misery: it is Christ our head, that gives the life of sense, and the sense of life. 2. Intellectum; the head is the seat of understanding; we can have no comfortable knowledge of God but by Christ; Lord show us the Father, and it sufficeth us: Do thou show us, we can see nothing but by thy light. This is the true light, that lighteth every man that cometh into the world, John. 1.9. Hence it is, that no member can be ignorant, because he is joined to the Head. Though they cannot scire universa, know so much as the Head: yet they shall scire necessaria, know so much as shall make them blessed. 3. Motum; Christ our Head gives us motion. When I am lifted up from the earth, I will draw all men to me. If the Head be gone before, the members must needs follow after. We have Movere, from God by nature, Act. 17.28. but movere in bonum, to move to that which is good, from God to Christ. 4. Lastly, Vitam, life it self; for we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones. There is a quarrel between Philosophers and Physicians, about the principal seat of life; whether it be in the heart or in the head. But in Divinity the case is clear, for all our life is from our Head. I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, Gal. 2.20. Vbi amat, ibi animat; Our breath is in our bodies, the life of our souls is in heaven. Ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God, Col. 3.3. Corpore ambulantes in terris, cord habitantes in coelis, Anselm. Our bodies move on earth, our hearts dwell in heaven.

Let us be sure we are members of Christ, then sure that we are partakers of the Divine Nature. Who is sure of that? Not the Adulterer; for he takes the members of Christ, and makes them the members of an Harlot; he hath lost the ligaments of purity. Not the Oppressor; he hath lost the ligaments of charity: for he that is not a good member of the Common-wealth, is not a true member of Christ. And if the Usurer can prove himself a good member of his Country, I will yield he may be a member of the Church. Not the Drunkard; he hath lost the ligaments of sobriety: our heavenly Head hath no staggering members. It will be very hard for a man to reel into heaven. Not the Contentious; for he hath lost the ligaments of concord, and broken the Unity of the Spirit, which is in the bond of peace. That Religion that is derived from Christ, preserves unity with Christians. He that will not keep the peace of God, shall not be kept by the God of peace. Not the furious Striker; who if he receives verbae, words; returns verbera, wounds: he is no member of Christ, for one member doth not strike another. Not the Repiner; for the eye says not to the hand, I have no need of thee, 1 Cor. 12.21. The foot will not invade the office of the ear, nor the arms of the lips. The Magistrate will not administer the Sacraments, nor the Minister bench it. Not the Swearer; for he is no member that strikes the head. If we be members, the passion of others will work compassion in us.

6 As branches of a Vine, and so we partake of the Divine Nature. I am the true vine, saith Christ: a true Vine indeed: For, 1. He was set on a blessed ground, the womb of the Virgin, whom all generations shall call blessed, Luke 1.42. In this Fruit all nations are blessed. 2. He was cut and pruned, wounded for our transgressions; till there ran out the life with blood, that was to us the blood of life. 3. He was dunged, soiled with the filthy excrements of the Jews: his mouth prays for them, their mouths spit on him. 4. He was digged, his side opened with a spear, his hands and feet with nails; Foderunt manus; Psal. 22.17. They digged my hands and my feet. 5. As the vine is fastened to some wood or wall: so was Christ fixed to his Cross, till death and hell had done their worst. Yet there is still life in him, and he spreads this life to his branches, far and wide. Sending out his boughs unto the sea; and his branches unto the river. We are all naturally dry sticks, fit for nothing but the fire: but being engrafted into him, there is the living sap of grace derived to us. As the branch cannot bear fruit of it self, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me, John. 15.4. This saith Saint August. Corda instruit humilium, or a obstruit superbiorum: comforts the poor Publican, confounds the proud Pharisee. Qui viret in foliis, venit a radicibus humor.

Thus also we are partakers: there is a threefold divine union. 1. Essentiall, so God the Father is one with the Son and the Holy Ghost. 2. Personal, so God's son is united to human nature. 3. Mystical, so the faithful are united to Christ. He that is joined to the Lord is one spirit. This is infinite comfort: we cannot want Grace and felicity, unless Jesus Christ should want it. Whatsoever the Divine nature hath communicable to man, we participate by being branches of this vine. Perhaps he doth cut us till we weep and bleed; he purgeth us, but to do good purpose, that we might bring forth more grapes: for we are most fruitful under the Cross. Such is the piety of our heavenly father to us; that even his anger proceeds from mercy: he scourgeth the flesh, that the spirit maybe saved in the day of Jesus Christ, 1 Cor. 5.5. yea Lord, cut us even till we weep and bleed, so we may partake thy joy and glory in heaven.

7 As spouses of one husband, Christ: this is a near partaking. A man shall be joined to his wife, and they two shall be one flesh. The husband and the wife are one flesh, the believer and Christ are one spirit. This is an ineffable mystery, my heart feels it, no tongue can express it. Here all language is lost, and admiration seals up every lip: we may drowsily hear it, and coldly be affected with it; but let me say, principalities and, powers, nature and reason, men and Angels stand amazed at it. But what do we thus partake of the Divine nature, by this marriage to Christ. 1 We have Oscula, his kisses; and this is arrha fidei & amoris, the earnest of love and faithfulness 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 a kiss, of 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 to love: whom God kisseth, he loveth: as the Father well-comed his returning son, he fell on his neck and kissed him, Luke 15.20. No token of affection more lively, more lovely than a kiss. 2. Amplexum, his embracings. His left hand is under my head, and his right hand doth embrace me, Cant. 15.20. God is said to have a right hand and a left, Pro. 3.16. with Riches and Honors, which are the gifts of his left hand, he lifts up my dejected head: with eternal life, which is the gift of his right hand, he embraceth my sides forever. Who so puts his trust in the Lord, mercy embraceth him on every side. 3. Concubitum, we sleep with him; our Bed is green. Make ready his bed, if thou wouldest have his company, sweep the chamber of thy heart from all the dusts of evil thoughts, and annoyance of lusts: give him fine linen, Innocence of spirit: a pillow of Charity, a covering of obedience to keep him warm; and let the down bed of thy faith be prepared; then he will lodge with thee. 4. He gives his spouse a Iointure or portion. As in the solemnising of a marriage on earth, the husband says to his wife; with all my worldly goods, I thee endow: so Christ endowes us with his riches of glory. My beloved is mine and I am his. Blessed exchange! he is ours, we are his: yea all ours are made his, all his is made ours. We brought him a portion of wickedness, of wretchedness; the fee-simple of sin, death and hell: he bore all those torments, and so took them that he took them away. He brings us another manner of Iointure or endowment; justification, sanctification, freedom, grace and peace on earth, glory and joy in heaven. Here's a blessed wedding: in our marriages we have these requirable things; the Bride-groome, the Bride, the Father to give the bride, the Priest to tie the knot, the witnesses, and the wedding ring. Here the bride-groome is Christ, the bride the Church, the giver God the Father, (who gives this poor beggar woman, man's soul to be married to this rich man, this Prince? God himself.) The Priest that makes the knot is the Holy Ghost, he is the sealer of this union: the witnesses are Angels, the wedding ring is our faith. Dost thou plead, thy soul is married to CHRIST? show me thy wedding ring, look well to thy faith.

The best way to reconcile two disagreeing families or enemy kingdoms, is to make a marriage between them: for the uniting of bloods ends all quarrels. We were all adversaries to GOD, and he was ready to fight against us with eternal death, how should peace be made but by a marriage! So Hamor persuaded the Shechemites: let us take their daughters to us for wives, and give them our daughters; so shall we have peace. Loe, the king of heaven gives his only son to mortal man's daughter, that is his soul; and though she were a miserable beggar, jointures her in his own kingdom. Be not then married to the world, its a misshapen stigmatic: not to lust, its a black and Leprous witch: not to the devil, he is a foul and ugly monster: run not a whoring after riches, pleasures, and wantonesses, remember thy chaste love to thy one and own husband. I have espoused you to one husband, that I might present you a pure virgin to CHRIST. Abhor bigamy, lest he divorce thee: have one husband; the bed brooks no rivalls. Raise thy affections above a common pitch, and let thy soul bear her self as the spouse of the great King. It is a wonderful joy that a man hath with the wife of his youth: uxori non redditur aequivolens: but it is a greater joy in being spouses to Christ; the faithful soul knows only the sweetness of his embraces. But the greatest of all is to be married to him in heaven; Blessed are they that are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb. Only that marriage is the merry age, where shall be joy, great joy, eternal joy. Our music shall be the Choir of heaven, and our banquet everlasting glory.

I have been over prolix in this point of partaking the Divine nature: but it is tedious only to those that have no right in this participation. Let me excuse myself; my tongue followed my heart, and I could not but speak what was try comfort to feel. It hath given sweet content to my own spirit, God grant it may give no less consolation to others. This participation is not a transfusion of the divine essence or nature into us; but a communication of the manifold blessings wrought out by Christ. Of nothing, we have being, of being worse than nothing, we are restored to God's Image; formed with reason above the creature, and reformed with Grace above reason: now immortal in our souls, hereafter to be immortal in our bodies. What honor, what glory is this, that a man of dust, a worm creeping out of the mud; audeat erectos ad sydera tollere vultus; should look up unto heaven, and call the omnipotent God his Father! How gracious is this promise, how glorious this participation! Let not the blind judgments of the world trouble us: we believe and know, know and feel, feel and joy that we are partakers of the divine nature. We might here infer with Athanasius, that Christ is the same substance and nature with the Father; because they that are partakers of the Son, are also partakers of the divine nature. He says further, that the beginning of this partaking, is by the consignation of the holy spirit in our baptism. Ambrose refells the Arians, from this scripture, who condemn the voice of substance and nature in divine things: as if Christ could be the son of God, and not the substance of God. But if the name of substance or nature trouble them, let this text satisfy them. He adds, who can deny the Holy Ghost to be equal with the Father or the Son, when as it is his work whereby we get a participation of the divine nature. Cyril says, that the faithful communicant in receiving the Sacrament, is made partaker of the divine nature. Leo from hence takes occasion to exhort us to piety and holy life: remember whose thou art, the member of Christ, and temple of the blessed Spirit: Noli tantum habitatorem pravis actibus de te effugare; do not drive away so sweet an inhabitant by thy sins, and again subject thyself to the devils servitude. To the same purpose speaks Cyrillus Alex. lib. 4. in Levite. And Origen in Levite. Homil. 4. All of them striving to show us, that we by faith partake of Christ's flesh, by his flesh of his soul, by both of his spirit, by all of his Deity.

Thus you have seen the conveyance, and the Inheritance. In the one was verbum Promissionis, a word of promise: in the other verbum promotionis, a word of preferment. Now all these privileges we partake as we are true Christians. Plato said, he was beholding to nature for three things: first, that she had made him Hominem non Brutum; a man, not a beast: next, that she had made him virum, non faeminam; a man, not a woman: for mulier quasi mollior, or mollis aer: but vires in viris, vera sedes virum, sexus solet esse virorum. Lastly, that she had made him Graecum, non Barbarum; a Greek not a Barbarian. Well, in all these preferments he acknowledged himself but beholding to nature: and for all these we so well as he, are beholding to the God of nature. But there is a fourth thing, for which as he to Greece, so we must be thankful to Grace: that we are not only men and not beasts, Greeks, that is knowing, and not ignorants; or Philosophers, and not fools: but yet infinitely more, that we are Christians, and not Infidels. By this only we partake of the Divine nature; only glory in this. Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, nor the mighty man in his strength, nor the wealthy man in his riches: but let him that glorieth, glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, saith the Lord. Nothing is more worthy thy pride, than that which will make thee most humble if thou hast it; that thou art a Christian. When an Ambassador told Henry the fourth, that magnificent King of France, concerning the King of Spain's ample dominions: first saith he, he is King of Spain: is he so, saith Henry? and I am King of France. But saith the other, he is King of Portugal; and I am King of France; saith Henry. He is King of Naples; and I am King of France. He is King of Sicily, and I am King of France. He is King of Nova Hispanla; and I am King of France. He is King of the West-Indies; and still, I am King France; He thought the kingdoms of France equivalent to all these. To what purpose is all this? yes, if thou apply it rightly. Another hath great learning and wit; well I am a Christian. Such a one hath great honors; I am a Christian. Another hath abundance of riches; I am a Christian. That man hath large dominions; well I have more in heaven, I am a Christian. He is of the blood royal, partakes the nature of kings; yet I partake of the nature divine, am of the blood royal of JESUS CHRIST, I am a Christian. Let them glory in their great and honorable relations, it shall content our souls that we partake of thy Divine nature, Oh JESUS CHRIST!

Having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust. This is the third main point, our deliverance. It hath the last place in the words, not so in effect with us: we must first escape this corruption, before we can come to that divine participation. As you have seen what you are, Partakers of the nature of God: so now see what you were, soiled with the corruption of lusts, Such were ye, but you are washed, &c. In this deliverance we considered two general parts; a discovery, and a recovery: a discovery of great danger, a recovery from that danger. The danger discovered was the corruption of lust: the deliverance is specified, an Escaping. In the danger or wretched estate wherein they naturally stood, consider. 1. The Infection, corruption of lust. 2. The Dispersion, through the world. For the Infection, conceive in it two things. 1. Tumorem, the Corruption. 2. Humorem, the lust. The one that is bred, the other whereby it is fed. In all we shall find, that the greatness of the danger commends the greatness of our deliverance.

Corruption; this is the Tumour; morbus epidemicus, an universal disease. All flesh hath corrupted their ways. This monster is not coagulated all at once: but Gradatim spargere vires; Prorsus & ex multis unum coalescere morbum. Stone after stone, Babel is built: stick after stick, the burning pile is made up: from the confluence of many diseases, ariseth death.

First, it gets into the thoughts; that the Imaginations of the heart are evil. This we think little danger; but when it hath got the Citadel, it commands all the sconces, and forts, and guards. The Heart is a Castle, the outward senses are the gates, when it hath got into the castle. The watchmen were to blame, that let the enemy in. Turpius ejicitur, quàm non admittitur hospes. These be Partus mentis, Primogeniti Aegypti: if thou canst not hinder the conception of sin, but it must be borne: yet like the midwives of Egypt, dispatch it betimes, lest it dispatch thee. For lust when it hath conceived, bringeth forth sin: and sin when it is finished, bringeth forth death. Spare not the little Babylonians, lest they one day grow great enough to vanquish Israel. Kill the young wolves, and secure thy flock: destroy the brood of the viper; let it never come to this, I would I had prevented it. Sin is easily committed in act, if admitted in thought. Labor first to purge thy heart from this corruption: let not thy vain thoughts lodge within thee, Jeremiah 4.14. Job, though he were well persuaded of his children, in respect of their outward demeanour, yet he doubted their hearts, Job 1.5. It may be my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts. Keep thy heart with all diligence: the hands and feet must be well guarded and regarded, but especially look to thy heart. Let thy thoughts examine thy thoughts: thy conscience must not only extend to deeds and words, but even to secret thoughts. They that are accustomed to evil thoughts, can seldom bring forth good words, never good deeds. As the corn is, so will the flower be: if the meal be bad, the fault is not in the millstones that ground it, but in the miller that put in such base corn. All thy senses and members are but the millstones, the heart is the miller: if thy words and works be ill meal, thank the miller thy heart for such corrupt thoughts. As the wood is, so will the fire be: if it be wet and stinking wood, look for an unsavory and unwholesome fire: if the wood be sweet and dry, it will perfume the room with a sweet and pleasant air. Such fuel as you lay on your thoughts, such fire shall you have in your actions. There is a knowledge projected, which only looks upon outward things: and even beasts do in some measure participate this with men. There is a knowledge reflected, that inwardly beholds a man's self. Many men know many things, but they know not themselves. Mans knowledge should not be a gadding harlot, whose feet cannot keep within doors: but a good housewife to stay at home. When Dinah would be rambling abroad, to see fashions, and to observe the Ladies of the land; she was deflowered by Shechem: if our affections be noctivagant, night-walkers, they will easily come home quick with child.

Next, this corruption gets into the senses. It passeth through the eye, Ier. 9.21. Death is come up into our windows, and is entered into our palaces, to cut off the children from without, and the young men in the streets. Mors per fenestras; it hath terrible effects: it invades the Palaces, the secret chambers of the heart: abscindit pueros, it cuts off the little masculine virtues of the soul: yea even the young men the graces that begin to get strength in us. Al this death coms in at the window, that is the eye. Cur aliquid vidi, cur noxia lumina feci? Mine eye hath betrayed my soul. Epiphanius gives an apt moral reason, why in the old law when a dead corps passed by any house, they were commanded to shut their doors and windows. When opus mortuum, a work of death, abhorred sin, is proposed; shut both the doors, your mouths; and the windows, your eyes. It is said that Iudiths pantofles ravished Holofernes eyes, Iud. 16.9. Her sandales took him: what good men tread under their feere, that wicked men are seduced by. Therefore says Solomon, Look not on the color of the wine, when it moveth it self aright: be not tempted with the color or dancing of it in the cup. Nimum ne creed colori. That sense is accessory to the sin; that opens the door, and lets the thief come in. Iniquity is the thief, the eye is the gate: therefore says Job; Pepigi foedus cum oculis. I have made a covenant with mine eyes. Adultery is such an ugly monster, that it could never enter the city of the heart, unless it did first corrupt the watch. Advert oculos; Lord turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity. The ear is another passage; through that door Satan often sends in his errand. Vae mihi quia audivi; woe is me because I have heard, that which made me either angry or guilty. Keep him our, and be safe: stop thine ears to his charms, so shall he not touch thy heart. But he cries to the porter, let me but come in, I will desire no more: do but give him the hearing, it is sufficient to take thy soul.

It stays not wholly in the senses, but gets also into the tongue; and this must needs babble the corruption. Democritus called speech the Image of life: and another used to say; Loquere ut te videam; speak, that I may know what thou art. Totum spiritum suum profert stultus; the fool uttereth all his mind. As wise men carry their mouths in their hearts: so fools carry their hearts in their mouths. Fools first speak, and then deliberate, they bluster out their follies. A wicked man bears his words in his mouth, as a dog doth an arrow in his ribs; never rests till it be drawn out. He is pregnant of slander or blasphemy; and either he must be delivered, or he will burst. Ex ore tuo, saith God; O evil servant, out of thy own mouth I will judge thee; God doth judge, and man may guess. Diogenes said, you will choose men to service before you hear them speak; yet will not buy an earthen pot before you try it by the sound. A bell may have a crack, and you cannot see it; but take the clapper, and strike it, you shall soon perceive it is flawed. The damsel told Peter, sure thou art of Galilee, for thy speech bewrayeth thee. Many lap the water. Curvatis genibus; none but a right Gileadite can without lispng pronounce Shibboleth.

Lastly, you shall find it in the hands too, and there it exceeds it self: in the heart it is but corruption, in the hands it is eruption. Ex ungue leonem; you may know a covetous Wolf by his paws. A troubled fountain sends forth unpure streams: an evil heart hath a most evil hand. If the hand grope for a bribe, as Felix did of Paul; there is a most unjust heart. If the hand scramble for wealth, there is a covetous heart. If the hand be still striking and stabbing, there is a bloody heart. The actions of the hands are so many characters, whereby we may spell the meaning of the heart. Manus loquuntur, the hands speak a man. What a man does, I am sure he thinks, not evermore what he says. Saul's tongue could say, Prastiti mandatum, 1 Sam. 15. Blessed be thou of the Lord, I have performed the commandment of the Lord. But Samuel heard the language of his hands; What means then the bleating of the Sheep, and lowing of the Oxen in mine errs? Verse 14. Corruptio, quae reponitur cordibus, exponitur manibus. The corruption that is secreted in the heart, is declared by the hand. The deaf man would think the air quiet, but he that hears it thunder, knows it is troubled. Many look fair and sky-coloured in their profession; but Fulminant operibus, they thunder in their works. They imagine mischief, and practice it, because it is in the power of their hand. They have breath as sweet as Sirens, but their deeds leave a stink behind them.

Now swell all these corruptions into one impostumated head; and here is not only the corruption of the world, but a world of corruption. As the Prophet calls Jerusalem and Samaria, not only sinners but sins: Or as Lucan speaks of a wonuded body; Totum est pro vulnere corpus; the whole body was as one wound. A land over-flown with sea is said to be all sea. So a heart over run with sin, is all sin. That is land still, and this is a heart still: but by reason of this deluge we say, that is all sea, this is all sin. And this corruption is so pleasing to the wicked, that they think it health it self. Men take such delight in this bestiality, that as Pliny reports, Grillus being transformed to a hog, would not endure to be turned to a man again. When God offers the drunkard to make him sober, no he thanks him, he is better as he is. Doth he undertake to let out the usurers corruption by charity? no, he had rather bean usurer still.

Diverse uses are to be made of this proposition; which are generally twofold; concerning others, concerning ourselves. Concerning others, that we fly the persons in whom this corruption rages; as being willing to avoid the plague, we do balk the house wherein the infection dwells, miserable folly! we hate the plague which may kill our bodies, we love the plague which may spill our souls. The condition of sin is better than the condition of sickness. For if a man lie sick in the streets, others are dainty and shun him, walking a loofe. But let a rich man be an adulterer, a swearer, an usurer; we close with him: yet only of these we have a charge, De non tangendo, not to accompany them. Which of these corruptions, in your own souls, do you think the worst? To see this corruption, the Lord give us eyes, to let out this corruption, prick our hearts, and from this corruption, save our souls.

Concerning ourselves; Leviùs ignorare morbum, quàm remedium: better not know our disease, than no means to cure it. For this purpose, something must be done upon us, something by us. The thing to be done to us, which may properly get out this natural corruption, is Salting. For salt doth not only preserve from corruption, but also eat out corruption. It hath diverse effects, fit to shadow out the work of the spirit on us for this purpose. First it preserves from corruption and rottenness: the Egyptians used to wrap their dead bodies in salt. All are corrupted, subject to rottenness, and need salting: the Ministers of the Gospel are the salt of the earth. It is not enough to have Sales, quirkes of wit, but Salem, soundness of doctrine. They that preach not only Nove, after a new method; but Nova, new things; swell your brains, but leave your hearts empty, they do not salt you. That is good salt, which keeps your souls from stinking before God. Secondly it is searching, and goes to the quick: there must be acrimony in salt, else it is not good. Do we cut, and fret, and trouble you: remember we are salt; Quo acriùs, eo meliùs. Indeed a man may over powder, and there is discretion in salting. There are some that have had too much salt, till they are ready to throw the Church out at the windows: the name of a Bishop frights them, a surplisse makes them run: they fear a cross worse than the devil does. These are over-powdred, but with ill salt; they are corrupted must be new salted. There is no medicine profitable, but it is sharp: our acrimony is good, though there by we endanger the loss of your loves. This should not make you fret at us, but at your own sins. I rejoyce, not that ye were made sory but that you sorrowed to repentance. Si haec audientes doleatis, if you hear these things sorowing, give me thanks for it, saith Chrysostom. Shew yourselves gratos non gravatos. The Preachers reproof is like salt, it may bite: but better sharp corrosives, than festering wounds. I am most loved, where I am most salted, Bernard. At last you will say with David: Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, that God of all grace; that hath sent thee to meet me this day; with thy admonition. Blessed be thy advice, the doctrine thou hast preached: and Blessed be thou which hast kept me this day from shedding blood: even a benediction upon thy person, that hast been the Instrument of preventing my sin, by thy salting. There is nothing more against the grain of our affections at first: but when by this means we shall find ourselves preserved to heaven, where no corruption shall enter, for this salting we shall thank the Lord. Lastly, falt gives a taste or relish to another thing. Nunquid insulsum sine sale edi potest? Job 6.6. Can that which is unsavory be eaten without salt?

Corruption shall not inherit incorruption, 1 Cor. 15.10. Without this salt there is no taste in us. Vnsavoury meat is called foolish meat. Ut sapiant fatuae fabrorum prandia betae, Martial. Lib. 13. Ep. 13. One manner of God's entering into covenant, was called Foedera salis, Numb. 18.19. the covenant of salt, for the perpetuity of it. So were the sacrificers seasoned in the old Law, Levite. 2.13. so must every soul be relished in thr Gospel; Mark 9.49. Everyone shall be salted with fire. In that was Foedera salis, in this Sal foederis: there was the covenant of salt, here is the salt of the covenant. Love them best, that salt you most: had you rather stink than be salted, and so presented a service to God. The Sermon may delight us, but not better us, that hath no salt in it. Nulla est in tanto corpore mica salis. Catull If thou yet find no good by thy Pastor, yet love him Spe futuri, in hope of the good he may do thee.

Thus to get out this corruption we see what is to be done on us: now what is to be done by us? Two things; a vision of it, and a Provision against it.

First, we must endeavor to see it: Physicians say, if the disease be once known, the cure is half done. If we could see corruption in the true form, we would loath it. But as the conjured devil appears not to the necromancer in hideous and frightful shapes, but in some familiar representation: so vice shows it self in forms most delectable to flesh and blood. If half so much were known to man, as God knows, we would hang down our heads for shame. Mans heart is beyond all Geomerrie; Deceitfull above all things, and desperately wicked; who can know it? No man can measure it, but he only that spannes the heavens; Lthe Lord search the heart. It is a little piece of flesh, it will scarce give a kite her breakfast, yet fills the whole world with corruption. Therefore learn to see this corruption: sin in it self is not to be seen; therefore behold it in concretis: the Tyrant like a Lion, the Fraudulent like a Fox, the lustful a Goat, the drunkard a Hog, the oppressor a Wolf, the traitor a devil.

If we would see anything, it is requisite that the object be rightly placed; not behind us, not besides us. Not behind us, there we cannot see it. We hang other men's faults at the pummell of the saddle, put our own in the cloakebagge behind us. Like Barbaras that trimme all men but themselves. Not besides us; if thou wouldest plainly behold an object on this side of the room, thou must go on the other side. Wouldest thou see the corruption of pride? thou canst never do it so long as thou art proud, thou standest on the same side. Go on the contrary side, that is to Humility, then thou shalt: chold Pride in her gaudy and ridiculous colors. Wouldest thou see the corruption of adultery? thou canst not so long as thou art an adulterer; the harlot is on the same side with thee: go over the way to chastity, and there see the harlot in her proper and foul deformity. Desirest thou to contemplate the sordid corruption of drunkenness: thou canst never do it so long as thou art drunken; thou and thy cups are both of one side: go and stand in opposito, to sobriety; then thou shalt see a blear eye, a reeling foot, a stammering tongue; thou wilt abhor it. Wouldest thou grow into dislike of usury? never so long as thou art an usurer; go on the other side, to Charity; then see a covetous heart, an oppressing hand, an unquiet conscience. It is impossible to discern the tetricall and horrid countenance of sin, so long as thou sidest with it: set thyself against it by repentance, and thy dislike will be greater, than ever was thy love.

Next when thou hast discovered it, strive to expel it: this is not done by nature: for nature, according to the temperature of bodies, increaseth this corruption. The Italians have a proverb: If little men were patient, if great men were valiant, and red men were loyal; all the world would be equal. The same causes in nature that concur to such a constitution, concur to such a corruption. Therefore they say; from a white Spaniard, a black German, and a red Italian, Libera nos domine, good Lord deliver us. And we in England confess much trust or danger in men, according to their complexions. To a red man read thy read: with a brown man break thy bread: from a pale man still remove: from a black man keep thy love. But this is only according to nature: for grace can alter nature, and purge out this original corruption. When an Astrologer told a Cardinal, to what misfortunes he was borne: he answered, but I am new borne: and the good of my second birth hath crossed the bad of my first. Humours cannot be durable, because their prime matter is capable of so many forms and changes: but Graces having their root in the Deity, must needs be eternal, as is their author. Strive then to cast out nature by grace, corruption by CHRIST. Do not keep it in, but cast it out: a wicked man may restrain evil, as do the godly: but here is the difference; that man keeps in corruption, this kills corruption; only to refrain evil is to be evil still. Haman was angry for want of Mordecai's reverence, yet he smothered the fire of his wrath, which nothing but the last drop of every Jew's blood could extinguish. The good man doth not only check it, but choke it. If he cannot Ejicere, yet so he will Dejicere peccatum, modo non noceat, modo non placeat. If he cannot nullify it, he will mortify it; that this corruption shall never hurt him, shall never please him. And when he hath gotten this upper hand of it, he never loseth it: for if it be forborne, it will return. Corruption is like a candle new put out, it is soon lighted again: if Satan but blow upon it, the own heat enflames it. Let us therefore always be tilling the paradise of our souls with good works, that God may delight to walk there. 8. Will Christ himself become Ianitor cordis, he will be as ready to be the door-keeper of our house, to keep out our enemies; as David was willing to be the door-keeper of God's house, to let in his friends. It is only the Lord, who with the sweet breath and perfume of his holy Spirit, doth cleanse the air of our hearts from this corruption. We see our duty, to cast it out: now let me add two circumstances; when, and whence.

First, when we must cast it forth, and that; 1. Whilest corruption is young. Kill the enemy while he is young; ut virtus ejus elidatur in semine; that he may leave no posterity to hurt thee, Hieron. Sin long customed, is hardly conquered; Acta confirmant voluntatem, tam in malo quàm in bono; Frequent actions constitute an habit, whether in good or ill. He that hath done well once, shall more easily do it the next time. He that hath done evil once, shall more hardly resist it at the next assault. There are mala innata, and mala inseminata; evils that naturally grow in us, and evils that we sow in ourselves. Whatsoever grows of it own accord, let us strive to kill; but sow none. Contere caput serpentis, suppress the beginnings of evil. Sin is like a Nettle, the older it is, the hardyer killed. Well hath our Church ordered that preparative every Morning-prayer; To day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts. 2. Whilest wear young: for Corruption grows the older the stronger, and man the older the weaker. Iuvenis, admittis socium; Senex, habebis dominum; Whom thou being young entertainest for thy play-fellow, when thou art old thou shalt find thy Master. Our Savior began the work of our salvation whilst he was very young. The very first day, that great Prince was Courted in a Stable: he shed some blood in his Circumcision when he was but eight days old. And is it too early for us being young, to work up our own salvation? Shall Satan have the Rose-buds, and God only the stalk? Satan the veins full of blood, bones full of marrow, God a carcase? We vowed in our Baptism, all the days of our life to his service; for shame let us not, Ananias-like, keep back part of the price. If ye offer the blind for sacrifice, is it not evil? if the lame and sick, is it not evil? The governor of your bodies will none of it, will the Governor of your souls accept it? Serve God in old-age? a sweet piece of service! If God come in youth, and find no fruit, beware the fig-trees curse; Never fruit grow on thee hereafter. The sealing of a bond without a time set, makes the debt presently due. God doth not bid the drunkard abstain when he can drink no more: nor the Usurer leave oppressing when his bags be full. To leave sin, when sin leaves us, will never pass for true repentance.

Next, whence we must cast it forth; out of the heart. For as in generation, so in regeneration, Cor primum vivit, Life begins at the heart. Now to cast it quite out from thence, that no dregs remain, this is not possible on earth; but the strength and principality of it. As when many birds are caught in a net, if a Pelican or some great fowl can break the net, and get out; all the little birds follow. So cast out the grand-corruption, that is most predominant; as Lust in the Adulterer, Covetousness in the Worldling, Pride in the haughty; then all the inferior will follow. As if the master be dead, all the servants will attend the funeral. If it cannot wholly be now buried, it shall be one day: GOD suffers sin in his chosen till the last, that then they may have a full triumph. When the five Kings were hid in a cave at Makkedah, Joshua charged the soldiers to pursue their enemies and consume them: for the Kings he brought them out at evening, and then made his men of war set their feet on the necks of them. So at evening you shall set your triumphant feet on the necks of these tyrants, having first captivated them, and slain your enemies with the sword of mortification. Yea, GOD shall shortly tread Satan himself under your seete, and give you a full victory in CHRIST.

Lust; we perceive the tumour that is bred, now look upon the humor whereby it is fed: Lust, Concupiscence in it self, as it is a faculty of the soul, and gift of God, is not sin; but may be the hand of virtue, or the instrument whereby she works. Keep her at home, and set her on work, to light the candle, and sweep the house; let her be under the correction of grace, and she may prove a chaste Virgin, fit to meet the Bride-groome at his coming. Lust is in it self, as they write of the Planet Mercury in the Horoscope of man's nativity; if it be joined with a good Planet, it makes it better; if with a bad one, it makes it worse. There is a Lusting of the Spirit; for the Spirit lusteth against the flesh. But it is most commonly taken in the worse sense, and so two ways; Strictly, and largely, or in the full scope.

Strictly, it is taken for the sin of uncleanness; which albeit God hath in so many places threatened to confound; yet that filthiness hath the Bauds; Whores are not without their patrons. Such are first Libertines, and they will have Scripture for it. Hosea was commanded by GOD to take a wife of Whoredomes, Hos. 1.2. Som answer, this was Fictum non factum, a figure, not a fact; not an history, but a mystery. That God would cast off his old wife, the Church of the Jews for their Whoredomes, and choose a new one, even a wife of Fornications, the Church of the Gentiles: that he might sanctify it, and present it to himself a glorious Church. So the not believing wife is sanctified by the husband, 1 Cor. 7.14. But grant it an history, yet was not the Prophet to be blamed, that Ex impudica meretrice castam fecerit uxorem; of an impious strumpet he made a chaste wife; but rather they that of chaste wives make impudent strumpets; which is the condition of those times. Howsoever, to the Prophet this act was commanded, to all us, the like is forbidden.

The other defenders of incontinency are the Papists; and that not only with arguments, but with authority. Their common plea is, that in hot countries they are necessary evils: but by their leave Israel was a hotter climate than Italy; yet There shall be no whore of the daughters of Israel. But they cite Augustine, Aufer meretrices & turbarveris omnia libidinibus: take away whores, and ware your wives; that were the way to make stews of your own houses. This might Augustine say, but Saint Augustine never said it. Such a gallant he might be in his unruly youth: but after that same Tolle and lege, when he lighted upon that Text, Rom. 13.13. no more chambering and wantonness now, but he put on the LORD JESUS, and disclaimed the lusts of the flesh. He confesses; Indeed I did once beg of God the gift of continency; but to tell truth, I desired that he should not hear me; malebam expleri, quàm extingui: I had rather it might then be satisfied, than mortified. But we justly abandon that remedy, that is worse than the disease. As an Emperor said of the means prescribed him to cure his Leprosy, which was the blood of Infants; Mallem semper aegrotare, quàm tali remedio convalescere; I had rather be sick still, than be recovered by such a medicine. Thus they that put away honest wives, and go to harlots; deal as wisely, as he that cuts off his own legs, to go upon crutches. Causa patrocinio non bona pejor erit.

This Lust is a sin hardly subdued: old Lot, whom all the fire that consumed Sodom could not touch, yet uritur igne suo; he was enflamed with his own heat. Ambrose saith of Sampson; Strangulavit Leonem, non suffocavit libidinem: He could choke a Lion, not his lust. Another of Hercules; Lenam non potuit, potuit superare Leaenam; Quem sera non valuit vincere, vicit Hera; He found the Lioness weaker than the Bawd, and no beast so savage as his Whore. Lust is an hellish fire, whose fuel is fullness of bread and idleness, evil words the sparks, infamy the smoke, pollution the ashes, the end hell. For this sin GOD rained fire and brimstone upon Sodom; Gehennam misit e coelo, He sent down Hell out of Heaven, Salvian. The delight is short, a minute determines it; the torment is everlasting, no worlds of ages shall end it. Plutarch writes of Lysimachus, who being besieged, himself and all his people ready to perish by thirst, gave up the keys of his City to the enemy for one cup of cold water; when he had tasted this cold comfort, he cried out, O that far so short a pleasure, of a King, I should be made a slave! So Brevis est voluptas fornicationis, perpetua est poena fornicatoris, Hieron. The pleasure of adultery is short, the punishment of the adulterer is everlasting. Consider this lust in the body, as a pot boiling on the fire: it may be two ways cooled.

First, by taking away the fuel: uncleanness is the daughter of surfeit. Saturitati, tanquam matri, omnes ascribuntur libidines; That Harlot breeds bastards, and lays them at the Rioters door; the soul stands charged to answer what the body does. When the mouth is made a tunnel, the throat a wine-pipe, and the belly a barrel, wantonness bien venù, Rom. 13.13. After gluttony and drunkenness, follows chambering and wantonness. Gregory observes, that Coquorum princeps, the chief of the Cooks, which was Nebucaradan, first overthrew the walls of Jerusalem, and first put fire to the Temple. By the chief of the Cooks, he understands Gluttony; by the walls, our senses; by the Temple, our heart: Riot gives the first overthrow to all these.

Secondly, the pot is cooled by pouring cold water into it: only abundance of sorrowful tears can put out this unruly fire. The Amalekites had spoiled Ziklag, and taken their wives and their children prisoners: which when David and his people found, they wept till they could weep no more. David asked counsel of the LORD, and upon his direction followed them, and smote them from the twilight till the evening of the next morrow. So there escaped none, save four hundred young men that fled upon Camels. Conceive Lusts to be these Amalekites, they spoil our Ziklag, sack our City, captivate our wives and children, our Senses and affections: now let us cast cold water into this pot, weep till we can weep no more; lament we day and night. Then let us pursue these brutish Amalekites, so shall we overcome our untamed lusts, and smite them from the twilight of our youth, to the evening of our old-age. Some young men may escape, some vain words and unclean thoughts may remain in us: but for the old Amalekites, gross and foul faults, we shall conquer them. So recover we our wives and daughters, our affections so dear to us: and they that were the prisoners and drudges to Lust, shall now do good service to GOD. The Land is full of adulterers, and because of oaths it mourneth. Shall the Land mourn for the Inhabitants, and not the Inhabitants mourn for their sins? We have preventions, lawful marriages. The Garamantes of Libya have all their women common; wicked Infidels! No marriage, no chastity; we have marriage, but not chastity. Intolerabilius peccatum, ubi tale remedium. The more unsufferable their impiety, that have such a remedy. Though we cannot quench this fire, we will weep upon it; we will mourn for these lusts. Let the offenders use this remedy, and by God's assistance they shall get the victory. Thou breakest the heads of the Dragons in the waters. The heads of the Dragon are broken in the waters, great lusts are drowned in a flood of tears. Moses in zealous indignation did drown Israel's sin: he drowns the Idol, lest the Idol should drown the people: as the Philosopher did with his wealth; mergam te, ne mergar à te; so beat your lustful affections to dust, drown them in your tears, and let your souls drink those tears, as the Prophet says, My tear have been my drink day and night. These shall so blot Satan's accusation and bill of complaint against us; that the Court of heaven will not read it. There was an hand-writing against us, but it was engraven in brass; no Aqua-fortis of our tears could eat out that: only Christ's blood did expunge it, Col. 2.14. The Devil still puts up new declarations and quarrels against us, but they are written (as it were) in paper; if we weep on them, we shall easily blot them out. Antipater wrote to Alexander a long Epistle, containing accusations of his mother Olympias; to whom Alexander shortly replied; Alas, doth not Antipater know, that Vna matris lacryma multas delebit literas? That one tear of a mother will wash out many letters of an accuser? So one tear of the child of God, shall obliterate all the indictments of the Devil. Thus penitently, Peccata dolere, est peccata delere: for God esteems sin in deed repented, as if it had never been indeed committed. Weep therefore here, that thou mayest not weep hereafter. One remorsefull tear shed on earth, is better than whole buckets in hell. Weep here, and weep never; weep there, and weep forever. They that sow in tears, shall reap in joy.

All this while we have considered Lusts in the narrowest bounds; as a particular effect of that grand beldame Concupiscence. But Lust is of a greater latitude, and is not only to be taken for the desire of fleshly company, but for the whole general corruption of our nature, prone to all sin. There is in the world the Lust of the flesh, the Lust of the eyes, and the pride of life: therefore it is called Concupiscentia mundi; the lust of the world. Saint John divides the world into three parts, and gives lust two of them there: all in the next verse; The world passeth away, and the lusts thereof. Whatsoever is in the unregenerate will of man, that is Lust. The works of the Flesh are manifest; that is, of Lust, it is all one. When they are conjoined, as Lusts of the Flesh; then flesh is as the mother, and lusts the daughters: when they are found in several places, know they are but diverse names of one and the same thing. Paul in reckoning them up, mentions many, and concludes more; with And such like. He says first they are so manifest that he need not, and last so manifold that he cannot reckon them all up. Now if Saint Paul numbering the sins of his times, was fain to break off his catalogue with an & caetera; how shall we in these days deliver up a true inventory of them? Alas, we have now those sins, to which they then wanted names. Theirs were Serpents, ours are dragons: the first were evil, but the last are worst of all. The consummation of times and sins are met together upon us. The world, like that Image, had a head of gold, there was some purity: his shoulders of silver, there the metal declines: his arms of brass, baser still: his legs of iron, yet more rusty; but now come to his feet, they are all of clay; nothing but earth, earth. And as commonly in a diseased body, all the humors fall down into the legs or feet, and make an issue there. So the corruption of all ages hath slid down into the present, as into the feet, and there Lust hath made an issue, to the annoyance of all the world.

This Lust is a friendly Judas within us, a familiar devil: She is indeed the mother of all wickedness; yield the father-hood to the Devil, Lust will challenge the mother-hood to her self, When Lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth Sin: and Sin when it is finished, bringeth forth Death. Saint James seems to speak of a womb; Lust conceives: of a Birth, it bringeth forth: of a Growth, it is finished: of a Death, it lastly kills, brings forth death. The Psalmist describes the bringing her to bed, Psalm. 7.14. First, she conceives mischief, and grows quick with child. Then, she Travels with iniquity; there's her labor. Lastly, she brings it forth, there's her delivery. The Prophet gives her a quicker dispatch; She conceiveth mischief and bringeth forth iniquity. She doth but conceive, and presently bringeth forth. Let me take leave to follow this significant allegory. We have found out the mother of sin, Lust; but can she be with child without an husband, or one instead of an husband! sin must have a father, so well as a mother: though it be an illegitimate bastard, it must have a father. You all know the Father of sin, that's the devil. We have now a father and a mother: the father begets, and the mother conceives: she is big with child: but how shall she do for a midwife? she cannot be delivered of her burden without a midwife. There is one ready at her call, that's consent. We have now a father, a mother, a midwife: suppose the child is begotten, conceived and borne; how shall we do now for a nurse? it will otherwise die for want of keeping. Lust is some great Lady, and scorns to nurse her own children. There is a nurse provided too, and that is, Custom. Here are all things too fit and ready for the production of this monster. The devil is the father, Lust the mother, consent the midwife, and custom the nurse: if consent bring it forth, custom will bring it up. When sin was first brought forth into the world in that first human person that ever sinned, Eve, this was the proceeding. Concupiscence the mother kept company with the devil the father, and he suggested to her his seed, that was temptation. Presenting a fair fruit to her eye, and dissuading from confidence in the truth of God's charge: upon this seed she begins to conceive, Gen. 3.6. She saw it pleasant to the sight, and desirable to make one wise. After this conception in the thoughts, she knew not how to be delivered but by consent: she did take and eat. Now the child is borne, lest it should perish for want of keeping, Lust puts it forth to nurse. Dame Custom takes it to keeping, and promiseth to bring it up. And she hath been so good as her word; so nurse it, and nourished it, that it is now past a tender stripling: Paul calls it an old man, Eph. 4.22. Put off the old man; above 5000 years old, and yet it is not only alive, but lively and lusty to this day.

First, for the father of sin, whom all confess to be the devil, When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own: for he is a liar, and the father of it. CHRIST calls him the father of lies, not of liars, for all men are liars. Now as Omne mendacium est peccatum, every lie is a sin; so some have observed that Omne peccatum est mendacium, every sin is a lie: because it is done against the truth. If so, then he that is the father of all lies, is the father of all sins. And by a lie he engendered all sins. GOD had said, In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die: Eve first, receiving Satan's seed, reporting this, corrupts it; and says only, ye shall not touch it, Lest ye die. Satan says peremptorily, ye shall not die. So God's plain affirmation, ye shall die; was first turned to a dubitation, lest ye die: at last, to an impudent negation, ye shall not die. Deus affirmat, mulier dubitat, diabolus negat, Bern. God affirms it, the woman doubts it, the devil denies it. Thus he is the father of sin. In the devil there be some good things: Substantia, immortalitas, fides, aliquando veritas. Substance, for he is good as a creature, not as a devil God made him an Angel, he made himself a devil. Deus non odit peccatum causâ diaboli, sed diabolium causâ peccati. God does not hate sin for the devils sake, but he hates the devil for sins sake. Immortality; for he is a spirit and cannot die. Faith, the Devills believe and tremble. Truth; for they confessed Jesus to be the son of the living God. But these two last are enforced, not voluntary. His whole purpose is to beget sin, and by sin to beget death. God made not death, Wisdom 1. how then came it into the world? It entered by sin: how entered sin? by the malice of the devil. This Satan works in a double spite.

In a spite to man; because he is God's Image: he cannot hurt God, therefore have at his Image. Besides; man is to be advanced to that heaven, from which he is hurled down forever. If therefore he possibly can, he will pluck him to hell where himself must be forever. Thus Satan gave life to sin, that gave death to all the world. In a spite to Christ; for Christ and Satan were never friends. The Lion of Judah, and the Lion of this world, were never at peace. The devil doth what he can to bruise CHRIST'S heel, in hurting his members; and CHRIST hath thoroughly burst his head. In CHRIST'S birth Satan set hard to kill him by Herod, in the wilderness he tempted him, he never rested till he had brought him to the Cross: he had him then where he would. But as the devil came to destroy CHRIST, so CHRIST came to destroy the devil, ^t For this purpose was the Son of God manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil. But as Christ resisted him when his living body was on the pinnacle of the temple: so he overcame him when his dead temple hung on the pinnacle of the Cross. Scaliger writes, that the Cameleon when he spies a Serpent shading under a tree, gets up and lets down a little thread, not unlike a spiders, breathed out of his mouth: at the end whereof their hangs a little drop as clear as christall, which falling on the serpents head kills him. So Christ mounted on the tree of his Cross, sends down from his side a thread of blood, that fell on the old serpents head, and forever slew him. Now if thou wouldest prevent this generation, infatuate the father of sin, disable the devil. Allow him no bed of fornication in any member of thy body, or corner of thy soul. Would he beget adultery in thee? afford him not the bed of an unclean thought. Would he beget revenge? afford him not the bed of anger. Would he beget usury? allow him not the bed of covetousness. Tolle concubitus, debar this copulation, prevent this conception and thou shalt never have that bastard laid at thy doors.

We have had much ado with the father of sin, we shall yet be more troubled with the mother. I could not be blamed for accusing him, that accuseth all the world: neither must I be partial to the Beldam, lust. An old decrepit woman, growing on a pace to six thousand years, and yet she is not past children. This lustful mother is ready to conceive, as that devilish father is forward to beget. Pugnabit primo fortassis, & (Improbe) dicet: Pugnando vinci se tamen illa volet: she wrestles with a desire to be overcome. I will consider how this is done in some particulars;

An offense is done you, the devil comes, and joining with concupiscence, suggests the adulterous seed of anger: lust, the mother conceives malice, she travells with the pleasure of revenge, she grows big with conspiracy, and at the last, she brings forth murder.

There is beauty in a woman, God's admirable workmanship, rich colors upon a piece of clay. By some wanton look, lascivious speech, or light behavior, the devil suggests the seeds of unchastitie. Lust conceives desire, she travells with expectance of opportunity, grows big with immodestie, at last, brings forth adultery.

In another, the devil suggests the seed of Pride; Lust conceives it by thinking on honor, she travells in the imagination of high places: how great things she might do, how bravely quit her enemies, if preferred to some dignity: he grows big with an office, and at last brings forth scorn and tyranny: now still she runs upon Pompey's motto. Semper ego cupio praecellere, & esse supremus.

Satan suggests the seed of discontent: Lust conceives a child, like Ice, it begets the mother again. Wine begets lust, and lust begets a desire of wine. Bacchus and Venus are near neighbors; only voluptuousness hath a house between them.

This is the mother, and thus prone to the forbidden bed: what shall we do? because we know the dishonesty of the father, let us be sure to keep in the mother; restrain Lust, and so sue a divorce betwixt the devil and concupiscence. The only way is to put enmity between the seed of the serpent, and the seed of the woman: that though the devil be never so busy in suggesting, yet concupiscence may be kept from conceiving. There are two good herbs to make this woman barren, Agnus Castus and Lettuce; Prayer and fasting. If this kind of devil have adulterated with Lust, he goes not out but by prayer and fasting. It is fasting spittle that must kill this serpent. If this take not effect, present to thy mind a spiritual crucifixe, memoriam crucifixi, the remembrance of him that died on the Cross for thee. Think thou doest see Jesus coming toward thee; his head crowned with thorns, his hands, his feet, his side, his heart bloody; his eyes full of tears. Behold him: <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> adultery sits not in those eyes: those feet were not made to please Herod with a measure: those arms were wonted to no wanton embraces; but to embrace the cross with patience, our souls with comfort. For thee, Lust, for thee have I died; thou only didst murder me: do not make these wounds bleed a-fresh: open not my side again, to let forth new streams of blood: pull me not from my throne in heaven to the grave again. Wouldest thou keep lust from the adulterous company of Satan? set in the view of thy conscience, JESUS CHRIST crucified.

The next is the midwife, Consent: well might the child be conceived by suggestion, but without consent it could never be borne. The devil suggests into Absalom's heart pride, his lust conceives a crown, Consent of will is his midwife, and delivers him of treason. The devil suggests into Demas, gain; his lust conceives heaps of money, ease, the pleasure of the world: Consent of will is his midwife, and delivers him of apostasy. Satan comes to a young beginner, one newly set up for himself, and suggests the sweetness of being rich: lust conceives all ways of gain and propounds being one day an Alderman: Consent of will plays the midwife, and brings forth fraud and lying. If thou wouldest prevent the birth of sin, deny lust her midwife, Consent. My son, if sinners entice thee, Consent thou not. Could artisans and women master great difficulties & tu non poteris? saith Augustine to himself. It is no easy achievement: It was as great a miracle that Joseph in the arms of his mistress should not burn with lust; as it was for those three Saints to walk in the fiery furnace without scorching, Luther. If lust will yield, and sin must be bred, yet be sure to lock up the midwife; that it may be an abortive brood, stiffied in the womb, still-borne. He was a great Prince, that on the difficulty of his Queens deliverie; when the midwife put him to the choice, whether the mother or the son should be saved, seeing one of them must on necessity be lost: the king answered, save the fruit, though the tree fall; preserve the son, albeit you lose the mother. But in this case do the contrary; save the mother and let the child perish: kill sin, and preserve nature alive. Thou art tempted, consent not; allow no midwife, and the child shall never be borne. We have all lust about us; a verybody of death: the father is ready, the mother is willing; keep away the midwife; that though sin be done upon us, we may have this comfort, we consented not.

The last is the Nurse, Custom: this feeds, sustains, and brings up the bastard. Though it be borne, it could not batten, thrive, and grow to stature, but by sucking on the breasts of Custom. The curse that the Cretans used against thir enemies, was not fire on their houses, nor a sword at their hearts: but that which in time would bring on greater woes; ut mala consuetudine delectentur; that they might be delighted with an ill custom. If I have done this, if there be iniquity in my hands, &c. Then let the enemy persecute my soul, and take it: yea let, him tread down my life upon the earth, and lay mine honor in the dust. Hugo Cardin. on those words of the Psalm comments thus. Let him persecute my soul, by suggestion: take it by consent; tread down my life by action; and lay mine honor in the dust by custom. This is not only a grave to bury the soul in, but a stone rolled to the mouth of it, to keep it down. Sin but now borne, Iniquitas est; matura, natura fit: when it is ripe, it becomes a nature. Desinit esse remedio locus, ubi quae fuerunt vitia, mores sunt. The disease is incurable, when vices are made manners. Incipit esse licitum, quod solet esse publicum. Custom is not only another nurture, but another nature. Lawyers say, Quod est consuetum, praesumitur esse iustum. That which is done by many, is at length thought lawful in any. Take an Apologue: four things meeting, boasted their comparative strength; the Oke, a Stone, Wine, and Custom. The oke stood stoutly to it, but a blast of wind came and made it bow; the axe felled it quite down. Great is the strength of stones, yet continual drops wear them; Gutta cavat lapidem: a hammer breaks them to pieces. Wine overthrows Giants and strong men, Senators and wise men; & quid non pocula possunt? yet sleep overcomes wine. But Custom invicta manet, remains unconquered. Many would not endure JESUS CHRIST, because he came to break their customs. The Masters of the Pythonesse, Acts 16.21. objected this against Paul and Silas; that they did teach customs not lawful for them to receive. For this cause was the up-roar in Ephesus; the cobby-hold of Diana was touched: and the town clarke had no means to appease the tumult, and deliver the Apostles; but by saying, These men are no blasphemers of your goddess; they come not to break your customs. Tell a Papist, that his two meals fast makes the third a glutton, he defies you for a breaker of his customs. Tell a country man that it is unlawful to keep his town-wake on the Sunday; he hates you as a Puritan, that comes to break his Custom. It is Custom that hath undone our Church: when the Pastor comes to demand his tithes; he is answered, as the man of Romney-marsh did his Minister from Scripture; Custom to whom Custom. But the Minister well replied; The Churches of God have no such custom. This is the nurse Custom: and so you have all four; the father, the mother, the midwife, the nurse. And here is the generation of that monster, sin: borne from the womb of that concupiscence, which my Text calls Lust.

Now God hath given us means to conquer all these. The father is Satan, Whom resist steadfast in the faith. Faith in the Lamb shall put this roaring Lion to flight. They overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, Revel. 12.11. For the mother, overcome her by mortification, Mortify your members which are on the earth: not only lay her a sleep, but lay her dead. The midwife is Consent; disable her, by resolution not to obey her in the lust of the flesh, Let not sin reign in your mortal body. He says not, let not sin tyrannize: but let it not reign. Be not sin's voluntaries: if you be only pressed against your wills; it is not you that offend, but sin that dwelleth in you. The devil will suggest, and concupiscence will admit, but take away the midwife, consent not. There will be Sensus, let there not be Consensus. When the fair Lucrece was ravished by Tarquin, Augustine observes; Duo fuerunt, & unus adulterium admisit: there were two persons, and but one adulterer: a conjunction of bodies, but a distraction of minds. A regenerate man's case is like that of Lucrece; sin is rather done on him, than of him. But lastly, let us all confess, that the father hath begot, and the mother conceived, and the midwife brought forth sin in us: we have gone too far in this birth: yet in the fear of the Lord let us not put it to nurse; not accustom ourselves to it: but break off sin by repentance; otherwise, Lust when it is finished, brings forth death.

That is in the world: we have seen the infection, let us now look upon the Dispersion; Through the world. The world is taken two ways; for the frame and constitution of the world: and for the men and Inhabitants of the world. Now this corruption extends it self to both: the content hath corrupted the continent: men's sins have infected the world, as the plague in persons infect the very walls of the house. The latter acception is here strictly meant: yet let us see this corruption in both.

First, for the men of the world; for this is rather corruptio morum quam elementorum: a depravation of manners, rather than of elements. The Prince of this world shall be cast out. Not the Prince of the great world, for that is God; but of the little world, evil man: the wicked are his vassals, because they are sins vessels. The devil is called the Prince of the power of the air, the spirit that worketh in the children of disobedience. Christ was in the world, and the world knew him not. What world knew not CHRIST? The heavens knew him, for the sun was eclipsed at his death, and that in Plenilunio: the earth knew him, for it shook and quaked with fear: the stones knew him, for they rent and cleave in sunder The world that knew him nor, was man; not substantia, but Incola mundi. Vnumquidque illud est quod amat: everything is that which it loves: so the wicked are the world, because they affect the world. But if the world be ever taken in the worse sense, how then is it said; Sic dilexit mundum; So God loved the world? when Donatus opposed that, 1 John 5.19. Positus est in maligno; the whole world lieth in wickedness: Augustine answers him with, 1 John 2.2. Christ is the propitiation, not for our sins only, but for the sins of the whole world. And God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself. Here Qui been distinguit, been docet: a distinction shall make all clear. Where world is taken in an evil sense, it is meant of evil men, where in good sense, of good men. Where in a general sense of all men. The godly are called the world, but medulla mundi, the marrow of the world: when this marrow decays, the world will perish. Help Lord, for the godly man ceaseth: and the faithful fail among the children of men. If the godly be diminished, now help Lord. Chrysostom says, many things are spoken De agro, that shall not be fulfilled but in horreo. Distingue tempora, & concurrent scripta. But the wicked are properly called the world: for though they be reasonable men, and have souls from heaven; yet they are corrupted by and corrupting the earth There is a river in Spain full of fishes; but those fishes are corrupt and unwholesome, by reason the river runs three or four leagues under the ground: so the wicked though they had some sparks of natural goodness, yet by running through the earth, they become loathsome, Many walk, that are enemies to the Cross of Christ: if many in Paul's time, more now. For Satan who was then bound, is now loosed again out of prison: and hath great wrath, because he knows he hath but a short time. So tetricall and horrible is this, that a man would think the whole world were turned devil. Therefore pray we with David; From men of the world, good Lord deliver us.

Secondly, the world in the very frame and substance of it is thus corrupted; all in vanity. A man that would taste the saltness of marine waters, needs not drink up all the sea: it is enough for me to give you a taste of this world. In the creation of every days work, God saw that it was good: but in the sixth day, having done all; Erant valde bona: viewing all in the harmony, They were very good. The things of the world were made good for man, but he made them evil to himself: so that now the whole creature groaneth under this corruption, Ro. 8. So it labors, as if it desired release, and rest: so it is corrupted that it must perish. Communis mundo superest rogas. The heavens shall pass away with a great noise, &c. Non minùs certum, quia dilatum: the differring doth not discredit the certainty. If the world it self be so perishable, what think you of all the pomp and vanities of it? Corrupta sunt, & corrumpentia: they are corrupt themselves, and corrupting others. Love not the world: what is this world? The Apostle expounds it to be lust of the flesh, lust of the eyes, and pride of life. Beatus qui explicatur, miser qui implicatur. Blessed is the man that is delivered out of them, wretched is he that is wrapped in them.

There's only one way left, not to admit

The worlds corruption; to be none of it.

Now shall I wrap up both these worlds into one bundle, and teach you how to loath it? This you will do by considering the villainy, misery, Inconstancy, Insufficiencie of it.

The villainy; The world shall hate you, saith Christ. Then Christ hath not told us truly, or the world will use us hardly. As Tertullian observes on Nerva's epistle to Pliny: he would not have Christians sought for, quasi Innocentes, as if he confessed them innocent: yet being found he would have them punished, quasi reos, as if he professed them guilty. Good men commonly find as much favor of the world, as vitellius shown Julius the Senator: when the Emperor Commodus commanded he should be slain with the sword; vitellius in favor did beat him to death with cudgells. Plead what they can for their own innocence, the Wolf will answer the Lamb; Indeed thy cause is better than mine, but my teeth are better than thine, I will devour thee. There are not wanting, that like Fimbria of Rome, who meeting a Citizen that he hated, in the street, gave him a deadly thrust into the body with his sword: and the next day entered an action against him, that he had received but part of his blade into his body, and not all, as he meant it. Sic nocet innocuo nocuus: what can the Lamb expect else of the butcher? Indeed sometimes the world useth a man, as Jerome notes, the Praetor handled a soldier, to make him renounce CHRIST. First he imprisons him in his own house, allows him a chamber well furnished, soft lodging, dainty cheare, wine, music, all delights. When this course would not take, (yet Lord, how many are thus tempted to leave their Savior!) then he casts him into a dark dungeon, loades him with irons, starves him with the hungry allowance of husks and puddle-water. When nothing would do, he burns him. If the devil cannot win men to hell as he seems an Angel of light, he will strive to accomplish it as he is a spirit of terror; if not transformed to another shape, then deformed in his own shape.

The Miserie: so soon as CHRIST was baptized, and the Spirit descended on him, presently Satan had a-bout with him. No sooner do we give our names to CHRIST, and receive the holy spirit, but instantly the devil rages and roars against our poor souls with might and malice. If we begin to please God, we displease the world: if God be our friend, that will be our enemy, when we were come into Macedonia, our flesh had no rest, but we were troubled on every side: without were fightings, within were fears. When we once put our endeavors to godliness, expect no quiet. Nunquam bella bonis, nunquam dissidia cessant: Et quocum certet, men's pia semper habet, Prosp. Say we then with David; Oh God my heart is ready. Paratum ad sublimia, paratum ad humilia: paratum ad prospera, paratum ad adversa, paratum ad universa. Ready for good things, ready for evil things, ready for high things, ready for low things, ready for all things, Bernard. 1 Sam. 6. The king of Bethshemesh might low after their calves at home, yet they kept one path, and turned neither to the right hand nor to left. So although we mourn for parting from our temporary delights; yet let us keep the way of truth, that will bring us to the end of our faiths, the salvation of our souls. Scrape not then on the dunghill of this earth for pearls, where nothing will thrive but toad-stools. In me you have peace, in the world you shall have tribulation: leave me to affect our own misery.

The Inconstancy: at most we can get but the figure or fashion of this world, and Figura transit, the fashion of it perisheth, Ier. 17.11. The Partrich may sit on eggs, and hatch them: but then (because they are none of her own) the true mother calls them, and they flieaway. The worldling is this brood-goose, hatcheth chickens, gathers riches: but when God calls them, they run away from him, and leave him a fool. Thou fool, this night shall they fetch away thy soul from thee, then whose shall these things be? Swallows will not build in houses ready to fall: yet we more unwise, build our nests in this perishing world. Sea-passengers have written, that about the Teneriffe there be certain Islands, called the flitting Islands: they are often seen, but when men come near them, they flitte away. The world it self is such, a flitting Island: today thou thinkest it Tuum, thine; tomorrow it shall not find thee Suum, his: thou art quickly gone from that, or that from thee. Solvat amicitias mors ingrattissima vestras. O blessed place, where peace hath no change!

The Insufficiencie; it can never content us. They that have most, crave most: the richest usurers are the poorest beggars. He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver. As the poor man cries, Quid faciam, quia non habeo, what shall I do because I have nothing? so the covetous cries as fast, Quid faciam, quia habeo, what shall I do because I have so much? What shall I do because I have no room to bestow my fruits? But whats this? have we any hope to cast out worldlynesse? No: indeed your judgments here can make no resistance, but your affections cannot be brought to it. Most men desire Esau's blessing, the fatness of the earth: they care, not for Jacob's, yet he went away with the Covenant. Cain's outlawed stock were yet excellent in worldly things; Iabal in cattle, Iubal in music, Tubal in brass and iron; they were the fathers of those professions. What worldly thing is there, but some reprobates have had it? For beauty, Absalom was very fair; and the daughters of men by beauty ensnared the sons of God, Gen. 6.2. For strength, Goliath was very potent; for swiftness, Hazael was a swift runner; for wealth, Nabal was very rich; for honor, Saul was a King: In man one dram of grace, from God one drop of mercy, had been better than all these. There appeared a woman clothed with the Sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve Stars. The Sun is Christ, the twelve Stars the twelve Apostles, the Moon is the world, and that is under the Churches feet. We that have the earnest of the Spirit, and the first-fruits of salvation, while we are awake, know and acknowledge this to be the best of all. Yet if a little rest of quiet, or ease of health, or luggage of wealth be missing, we mutter as if God had done nothing for us, and are often ready to leave, the music of Zion, and to run back to the world. Strabo hath a tale of a Musician, that had got together many delighted hearers, whom with sweet charms he held by the ears; they praised his music, he was well pleased with their company. On a sudden the market-bell rung, away they ran all, and stayed not so much as to give him thanks: only one somewhat deaf stayed behind. The Musician heartily thanked him that he would tarry with him, when all the rest went away at the ringing of the market-bell: why, but hath the market-bell rung indeed, says he? Yes, quoth the Musician; away trudges he too. You can apply it. Preach we never so well against worldliness, when the charms and chimes of the world ring, it is hard to keep your minds from running. O how difficult is it to conquer this world? yet faith can do it, This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith. Every true Christian is greater than William the Conqueror, greater than Alexander the Great, greater than Pompey the Great, greater than the great Turk. For they conquered in many years but a few parts of the world; but the Believer in one hour with one act only, subdues the whole world, with all things in the world. Terra fremat, regna alta crepent, ruat ortus & orcus; Si modo firma fides, nulla ruina nocet; Art thou a Christian? hast thou vanquished the world, that vanquisheth all the wicked? Bless God for this conquest: the King of Spain's over-running the Indies was nothing to it. Merchants would give much to know a short cut to those remote places of traffic, without passing straits, or fetching bouts: the shortest cut to the riches of the whole world is by their contempt. Here is a short description of the worlds vanity, by reason of this corruption: but what can he expect that speaks against the world? When Christ himself came to dissuade men from the world, he had ill luck in that point. He might preach; Make to yourselves friends of the Mammon of unrighteousness: and verse. 13. You cannot serve GOD and Mammon. But when the Pharisees that were covetous, heard all these things, they derided him, verse. 14. he had but a flout for his labor. But let those that have hope of heaven, cease to love this world: and know that if Christ make us to deny this world, he will give us a better; we shall be no losers by him, he vouchsafes us the kingdom of heaven. For if in this life only we had hope in Christ, we of all men were most miserable. Take this corrupted world that like it; let that glorious world be ours.

Having escaped the corruption. We have considered the Infection, and the Dispersion, and therein the Discovery: now one word of the Recovery, we have Escaped it. I call this a Deliverance; for we have Escaped; not by our own power, but by his grace that hath delivered us. Our soul is Escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers; the snare is broken and we are Escaped. The snare of the fowlers were the lime-twigs of this world: our soul was caught in them by the feathers, our affections: now indeed we are Escaped, but the Lord delivered us. We that were once taken captives of Satan at his will, are now freed. There is a four-fold manner of freeing captives: 1. By manumission, a voluntary making free of a bond-servant: so we are escaped from the service of Satan into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. If the Son shall make you free, you shall be free indeed. 2. By Commutation, we were prisoners by sin to Death. God therefore made a change with Death: Take thou my Son prisoner, give me my servants free. Death and Hell were forced to exchange: So they killed Christ, and we escaped. 3. By price; when a ransom is paid: now Christ gave himself a ransom for all: no silver or gold could serve; but the Precious blood of that immaculate Lamb. We are bought with blood, and this is the blood of God. So Tertullian, Sanguis Christi non redemisset ecclesiam, nisi fuisset sanguis Dei; No blood could have saved us, but the blood of him that was God. Here was mercy, great mercy: Christ to have mercy upon us, had no mercy upon himself: the price is paid, and we are escaped. 4. By violence; thou hast plucked my feet out of the snare, when they were too hard for me: with a strong hand and out-stretched arm, God hath delivered us out of this Egypt. As David delivered his sheep from the Lion, so the LORD hath delivered us, 2 Tim. 4.17. Ejecit daemonia; CHRIST did cast out devils: like Alexander, he stood not to untie the knot, but he cut it. By all these ways we are escaped, may our thankful hearts give praise to our Deliverer Jesus Christ.

But did GOD all this for us, and shall we do nothing for him, for ourselves? Alas, we shall then soon again be entangled with the Corruption of this world. Here we learn the due and true use of Faith and Repentance; Faith to lay hold on the blood of CHRIST, to cleanse our souls from this Corruption of lust and Repentance by true remorsefull tears to purge ourselves continually. Nulla dies sine maculis, nulla dies sine lacrymis; No day is without sins, let no day pass without sorrows. These showers shall kill the weeds of lusts, and spring up the herbs of graces. When he over-waters earth, there follows temporal plenty: when earth waters heaven, there follows spiritual plenty. Let me now give you the picture of Repentance; which I desire not to be set up in your houses, but to be laid up in your hearts.

She is a Virgin fair and lovely, but sorrow seems to do violence to her beauty; yet indeed increaseth it. You shall ever see her sitting in the dust, her knees bowing, her hands wringing, her eyes weeping, her lips praying, her heart beating, her lungs panting. She comes not before GOD with a full belly, and meat between her teeth, but her soul is humbled with fasting. She is not gorgeously attired, Sack-cloth is her garment. Not that she thinks these outward forms will content GOD, but only are moeroris Insignia, the remonstrances of pure sorrow within. And indeed at that time no worldly joy will down; only pardon and mercy in JESUS CHRIST. She hangs the Word of GOD as a Jewel at her ear, and tyes the yoke of CHRIST as a chain about her neck. Her breast is sore with the strokes of her own penitent hands, which are always lifted up toward heaven, or beating her own bosom. Sorrow turns her lumina into flumina, frontem in fontem; her eyes into fountains of tears. The ground is her bed; she eats the bread of affliction, and drinks the water of anguish. Her knees are hardened with continual praying, her voice hoarse with calling to heaven: and when she cannot speak, she delivers her mind in groans. There is not a tear falls from her, but an Angel holds a bottle to catch it. The windows of all her Senses be shut against vanity: she bids Charity stand the Porter at her gates, and she gives the poor bread, even while her self is fasting. She would wash CHRIST'S feet with more tears than Mary Magdalene and if her estate could reach it, give him a costlier unction. She thinks every man's sins less than her own; every man's good deeds more. Her compunctions are unspeakable, known only to God and her self, and to no creature else. She wisheth not only men, but beasts, trees, and stones to mourn with her. She thinks that no Sun should shine, because she takes no pleasure in it: that the Lilies should be clothed in black, because she is so appaeled: that ths Infant should draw no breast, nor the beast take food, like the Ninevites; because she hath no appetite. She hath vowed to give GOD no rest, till he have compassion upon her, and seal to her feeling the forgiveness of all her sins. Now Mercy comes down like a white and glorious Angel, and lights on her bosom. The message which Mercy brings from the King of Heaven is this; I have heard thy prayers and seen thy tears. The HOLY GHOST comes with an hand-kerchiefe of comfort to dry her eyes. Lastly, she is lifted up to heaven, where Angels and Cherubims sing her tunes of eternal joy: and GOD bids Immortality set her in a Throne of glory.

And besides this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue, knowledge, &c.

The former part of the Chapter is spent in comforting: Now he comes to exhorting. A father does not only promise his son, I will make thee mine heir: but withal imposeth on him some duties, by performance whereof, he may assure himself of Inheritance. If we should speak nothing to men Instructively, or reprehensively, but all comfortably; it were the next way to send them comfortably to ruin. Sat Deus; at nobis quaedam facienda reliquit; It is not fit that Heaven should take all the pains to bring Earth to it; Earth must do somewhat to bring it self to heaven. God's bountifulness is beyond our thankfulness: yet thankfulness is not enough, there is matter of labor and Diligence in it. He that lies in a dark pit, will yet offer his hand to him that will help him up. Jeremiah did put the cords under his own arms, that Ebed-melech let down to draw him out of the dungeon. If the Lord of a Manour have given thee a tree, thou wilt be at the charges to cut it down and carry it home. He that works first in thy conversion, hath in wisdom made thee a second. Thou seest God's bounty; Now look to thine own duty.

This is taught us by the - Quality, Diligence.

- Quantitie, All diligence.

Give diligence: Here first for the Quality. There is no matter wherein we hope for good in the event, accomplished without Diligence in the act. He that expects a royalty in Heaven, must admit a service on earth. The good man is weary of doing nothing, for nothing is so laborious as Idleness. Bernard calls it a dull numbness of the soul, which neglects to begin, or is weary to prosecute any good work. Deny Sloth not only continuance, but countenance. Quanto magis occupatum Diabolus invenit, tanto minus occupat. Satan's employment is prevented, when he finds thee well employed before he comes. Thomas Becket, no good man, in no good cause, when he was admonished to be less stirring in State-matters; answered, that he sate at the stern, and therefore ought not to sleep. This is a Christians case, Is the world tempting, the Devil attempting, my flesh betraying, and shall I sleep? Do I steer the helme of my own vessel, wherein my soul is the passenger, and my hope of blessedness the fraught; and would you have me to sleep? Jacob complains, that the sleep departed from his eyes: so careful was he to make his reckoning even with his master. I am sure we have a greater charge, greater Master, greater account, and yet we sleep. Lepidus lies in Harvest under the cool shade, Vtinam hoc esset laborare; I would this were to take pains: so some stretch themselves upon their Ivory-beds; and invite their curious morsels with rich wines: and O that this were the way to heaven! Augustus hearing that a Roman far in debt, slept quietly during his life: sent after his death to buy his pillow. It is a strange pillow whereon some slumber, that owe so much to GOD and man. When the Oyster gapes, the Crab throws into her a little stone, which hinders her from shutting again, and so he devours her. Satan watcheth our idle gaping, throws in his bait; lust or drunkenness, and so preys upon us. It is observable, that albeit the Romans were so idle, as to make Idleness a god; yet they allowed not Illi ignavo numini Templum intra urbem; That idle Idol had not a Temple within the City, but without the walls. It grieves me to think that our Suburbs abound with so many worshippers of this lazy Devil: yet I still pray that none may be within the walls. Let us deal with Idleness and wantonness, as Philip of Macedon did with two such persons; cause alterum fugere, alterum fugare; the one to drive the other out of our coasts. The old world snorted when the great shower came: Sodom slept, but her damnation slept not. It was Gogs presumption, I will go to the land of unwalled Villages, I will go to them that are at rest. So Satan presumes to set on the sluggish as an undefenced city, Otia pulvinar Satanae; the Devil shoots in a slug, and hits none so soon as the sluggish. The unjust Steward out of office, fore-casts, I cannot dig, and to beg I am ashamed. We have those can dig, yet are not ashamed to beg. Many one says not Fodere nescio, but Fodere nolo. It is mercy to give them three thing; correction, work, and meat. A generous spirit is of Maximinus disposition; Quo major sum, eo magis laboro; & quo magis laboro, eo major sum. Our gallants would not endure that father, that should charge his eldest son to work in the vineyard. Jacob got the blessing, but it was under the name of Esau, which signifies working, Ambr. We must have the hands of Esau, if we look for the blessing of Jacob. There are three marks and helps of Diligence; Vigilance, Carefulness, Love.

Vigilancie: a serious project, which we can hardly drive to our desired Issue, takes sleep from our eyes. The best plot is to be saved, to appease God's anger, to get remission of our sins: yet we are supini and sopiti, fast asleep, though this be undone. Christ said unto Peter, Simon, sleepest thou? Is Judas waking, the Pharisees walking, the soldiers banding, the devils urging, the Son of man betraying, the great work of redemption accomplishing; and Sleepest thou? So is Satan provoking, thy flesh ready to yield the fort, sin at the door, and Judgment not far off, and sleepest thou O Christian? When Abraham received the wofullest charge, that was ever given to father, concerning his only son; herose early to do it. On the week-days every man riseth early to his trade; on the Lord's day, when the business of their souls is specially in hand, men usually sleep their fills.

Carefulness, Eccles. 5.1. Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of GOD. Thou hast a foot, walkest with that foot, even to the Temple; but look to it. Res est solliciti plena timoris amor: If thou lovest GOD, thou wilt be fearful to offend him, careful to please him. Gideon smote the host of Zebah, and Zalmunna, and returned from the battle before the Sun was up. Satan finds us careless, smites us in the night of ignorance, and carries us away captives before we perceive it. The World says to a man, as the Priests and Elders did to the Soldiers; here is store of money, We will secure you: Money is able to make thousands secure. But, Magna securitas, maxima tempestas. The Spies of Dan returning, told them that the people of Laish dwelt secure, quiet and careless: so they took them, so they smote them, and burnt the City with fire, Judge. 18.7. No man perfectly knows his own heart: you think all well, this may be not assurance, but secureness. Invadunt urbem somno vinóque sepultam; When they shall say, Peace and safety, then cometh on them sudden destruction. Every man thinks ill of his sins, but perhaps he thinks too well of his good works: the servants of God mistrust their own righteousness.

Love: this Diligence must fetch the life from affection, and be moved with the love of virtue. They are most, whom fear correcteth from evil, they are best, whom love directeth to good, August. We refuse the dainty morsels of a churl's table, because we have them not with love. GOD regardeth not the mammoakes of our sacrifices, the scraps of our perfunctory obedience, when the awe and law of man brings us thither; not the love of GOD. Constraint makes a thing easy in its own nature, to become toilsome; love makes a difficult thing easy. He that is banished his native Country, thinks every step tedious: let his own will call him forth, his travel is pleasant; else men would not cross the seas to see fashions. There was a man so well affected to his own City, that in fifty years he never went a league out of it; as if like a fish he must needs die, if taken out of his own element. Not long after his luck was to commit an offense; whereof being convicted, and liable to severe punishment; the favoring Judge, intending to mitigate it, because this was his first error; confined him on the pain of death to the limits of that City. Now what was to his opinion formerly a delight, becomes a bondage and vexation; nothing in the City pleaseth him, all his desire is to gad abroad. How many miles can we ride and run in a day to see one beast pursue another! The unevenness of the way, the uncertainty of the weather troubles us not, because we have a love to the sport. If the charge of a Superior commands us to measure over so many miles, we soon complain of weariness. The Sabbath finds many in the fields, walking to the neighbor Villages, for wanton delights. If they were commanded to travel so far to Church, and to serve God, they would say with Jeroboam, it was too long a journey. All negligence in good things is from the want of love.

Well, God requires our diligence; Vult & non vult piger, Bed. He would have honor, but no labor: Delectant praemia cum promittuntur, deterrent certamina cum praemittuntur; The promises delight them, the combats affright them. O foolish man! thousand thousands stand about thee, and dost thou presume to sleep? Bern. Mallem mihi esse male quàm molliter, Sen. I had rather be sick than slothful: by that, the mind is stirred up, by this, effeminated. I use, saith that Philosopher, short sleep; it is enough for me to have forborne watching. Aliquando me dormire scio, aliquando suspicor; Sometimes I know I sleep, sometimes I suspect it.

But enough of Diligence, unless we were taught also rightly to dispose it. For there be many that weary themselves for very vanity. Even Israel would go back to Egypt for the Garlick and Onions: Things, saith Gregory, that provoke tears in them that eat them. Manna makes the heart merry; but they must have Garlick; as if they were weary of joy, and desired again tears and sorrow. The Statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart. But Contemnunt habere unde spiritualiter gaudeant, & desideranter appetunt unde carnaliter gemant. Men confess this world troublesome, yet love their own vexation, above the Peace of GOD, which passeth all understanding. Our minds are so scattered among these visible things, that we forget how the state stands within us. Like him that looks to the outside of his house, loames, washes, paints it, while the rotten timber drops down within. While men hunt after the world's venison with Esau, they are in danger to lose their Fathers blessing.

I have given three helps of Diligence; let me yet add a fourth, Study; so some here translate < in non-Latin alphabet > , what good work can be done without study? Indeed the main is confessed: Study to show thyself approved unto God. But we think inferior offices need no such studious diligence: what easier thing is there than to keep the peace? yet the Apostle says, Study to be quiet. Mans nature is so apt to revenge, that it is no easy matter to be peaceable, Says the Philosopher, Te studeto, study thyself. What is easilier known than a man's self? No, says Job, Non novi animam meam, I know not mine own soul. Mans self is a good book to study: I am fearfully and wonderfully made. Read this book in Folio, in thy prosperity: read it in Quarto, abridged by calamity: read it in Octavo, made less by penury: read it in Decimo-sexto, made contemptible by ignominy: read it in Nihilo, made nothing of this world by death. The Lawyer will not answer a declaration without study; or he builds more on his fortune and favor, than on his wit and fidelity. The Poet can tell the Gallant that buys Love-sonnets; I study for your pleasure. The Advocate studies his pleading, or talks idle. When a vain-glorious Orator asked his friend, How liked you my speech? and preventing the answer which he expected applausive; believe me says he, I did it on the sudden, without study: so I believe says the other, for it did not savor of the Study. For us, what dare we do without study? Perhaps you think not so; but that we come with the same preparation to speak, that you come to hear. So we might all be accused be accursed, for doing God's business negligently. You think, because it is easy for you to come to Church when the Bell hath tolled an hour, it is as easy for us on a nights warning to preach. If there be anything in the world that bewrays this Cities ignorance, this is it: I will tell you a paradox: I call it so because few will believe it, but it is true. It is more difficult to hear well, than to speak well. To hear, say you? I can hear the gravest Bishop in the Land, and never study for the matter: But I say, if thou wilt be so good a hearer as he is a Preacher, thou must study for it more than he. Good reason: he goes along with the meditations conceived in his own breast; thou must go along with his speech; he follows himself, thou must follow him. It is easier for a Hare to run her own course, than for an Hound step by step to hunt her out. Our SAVIOUR says, Take heed how you hear: there is a certain art or cunning in well hearing. In a certain Country, every man was to plead his own cause: he was allowed an Advocate to put his mind in good terms, but himself delivers it. One had his turn thus fitted, paid the Lawyer, took the copy, liked it admirably, studied it by heart. But after often reviewing it, he fell into dislike of it, and returned it back with his Non placet. The Lawyer asked him the reason why he now disliked that, which at first he so applauded: why says he, now I have read it often over, and find the weaknesses; at once reading it seemed very good. And, quoth he, shall the Judges hear it above once? Let this touch upon the infirmity of common hearers.

Beloved, you cannot hear well without studying how to hear; do not think we can preach well without it. Indeed there be enthusiastical Preachers, that run away with a Sermon, as horses with an empty cart: you are not worth your ears, if they cannot distinguish. But to conclude, if no great work can be done without study, then surely not the salvation of body and soul without it. It is well, if with any study we may have it. When an Astrologer told Agrippina, that Nero her son should be Emperor; but first he must untie a knot by art, that was tied by nature: he meant, that he must artificially dissemble himself honest, though he were naturally a villain. She answered, he shall untie any knot to have an Empire. It is enough for us that we may have the Kingdom of Heaven, though we untie a knot by the art of Grace, that was bound by the corruption of Nature. We are borne unclean, have made ourselves guilty; given to lust, avarice, pride; there's Nature's knot: let us untie this by grace; Such were ye, but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified; and the Kingdom of Heaven shall be ours. To this let us give all study: some Astronomers have beaten their brains with much study, to find out the space betwixt Earth and Heaven: and have given it up for above three hundred thousand miles. How great was their study? how uncertain their account? how vain the fruit? know it is a great way, not a journey over to France, or to India; study how to get thither. For this we study to preach, for this study you to hear, let us all study to practice; and when we have given all Diligence, still LORD be merciful to us.

Give diligence; not a pragmatistical business in others affairs; but rectify thy diligence, confining it principally to thyself. Dresse thine own garden, lest it be over-run with weeds, Sen. I know not with whom I had rather have thee be, than with thyself. Vbicunque sum, mecum sum: rebus enim humanis me non trado, sed commodo; I lend myself to other men's occasions, I give myself to mine own. We may say to Worldlings, as CHRIST to Martha, you are troubled about many things; but one thing is needful, mind that. They think when they have gotten store of riches, they shall then sleep in quiet; no then is least quiet of all. The rich man resolves when he hath filled his barns; then Soul rest; no, then Soul come to Judgment, to everlasting unrest; Luke 12. It is in vain, men rise up early, and go to bed late, and eat the bread of sorrows: for upon better conditions God giveth his beloved sleep. Pyrrhus boasted to his friend Cineas, that he would invade Italy, and hoped to achieve it: Cineas asked him, Sir, what will you do then? Then we will attempt Sicily, and so at last get Carthage and all Africa. And what then Sir? Then saith Pyrrus, we will rest and be merry. Alas, saith Cineas, may we not do so now, and save all this trouble? Then Otium, I will take mine ease? No, then minus otii, least ease of all: for besides hazard of blood in getting, there will be continual trouble in keeping. Non minor ill labor, quàm quaerere, parta tueri. Eutropius in the Poet, to one that asked how he might be revenged on his enemy; gave this counsel; Facito divitem, make him rich; so lay on him Sarcinam curarum, a burden of cares. The rich Land-lord envied his poor tenant, because he heard him sing every day at his labor, that had scarce bread for his family; while himself wanting nothings was full of discontent. One advised him to convey cunningly into his Cottage a bag of money; he did so. The tenant finding this mass, so great in his imagination, left off his singing, and fell to carking and vexing how to increase it. Crescentem sequitur cura pecuntam; The Land-lord fetcheth back his money, the tenant is as merry as ever he was. God is our Land-lord, while we his poor tenants have but little, we are content with a little: but if riches increase, cares increase with them; and till our Land-lord take back his burden, we have no ease. We may say of worldly wealth, what Solomon of worldly knowledge; he that adds it, adds sorrow with it. Diogenes laid himself to sleep in his cell, and his purse by him; a thief spies it, and watches till he was asleep. About mid-night when he thought himself, he ventures to steal it. To whom the subtle Cynicke; Tolle infaelix, ut facias utrosque dormire; Take it wretch, so we shall both sleep. Thou couldst not sleep till thou hadst it, nor I till I lost it. The very Camel is glad to be eased of his burden: When Aesop with the rest of his fellow-slaves were put to carry burdens to a City; one chose to bear this merchandize, another that, everyone had his choice, and Aesop chose to carry the victuals. Everyone laughed at this, that he being the weakest, had elected the heaviest burden. Away they went together; and after some miles they went to breakfast, his burden was the lighter by that. Then to dinner, it was lighter still: then to supper, now it was easy: the next day they had eaten up all his burden, and he went empty to the City, whither they being loaden could not reach. Let the covetous choose gold for his burden, the proud rich garments, the ambitious mountains of honor, every worldly his several luggage; let my choice be that of Saint Paul, If I have food and raiment, therewith to be content; I shall go the lighter to heaven.

All diligence: here's the quantity, all: and that for two reasons:

1 The working up of salvation is no easy labor; thereto is requirable All diligence. Talis diligentia respicit tantam rem, tanta res requirit talem diligentiam. Such a diligence respects so great an object, and such an object requires so great a diligence. Refuse no labor for such a reward, Ieron. The best things are the hardliest come by. Qui cupit optatam, &c. he must be frozen with cold, and sweltred with heat, that accomplishes so great a work. This equity must needs be granted, that if we cannot attain to worldly trash without labor, then much less to heaven without all diligence. The kingdom of heaven suffers violence: but rest alone, try if you can extort this by force. Spare no invention of wit, no intention of will, no contention of strength about it. If you will needs use violence, oppression, extortion, here violate, here oppress, here extort: wrestle for this though with Jacob you lame your limbs; get it though you lose your lives. When Dionysius saw what heaps of wealth his son had hoarded up in his closet; he asked him what he meant to let it lie there, and not to make friends with it to get him the kingdom after his decease? O fili non est in te animus regni capax, Son thou hast not a spirit capable of a kingdom. So knowing a rich man's piles of bags and whole countries of revennues; and finding no works of piety, none of charity; we may justly tell him; Non est in te animus regni coelorum capax: he hath not a soul capable of thy kingdom of heaven. In heaven there is gold tried in the fire. Will we adventure our estates, our lives; to find out new lands where may be gold: and spend no diligence for that where we are sure is gold, and such as cannot perish? In all other things the difficulty of obtaining whets thy mind, and spurs the actions forward: only for heaven which we confess best of all, we use labor least of all. It is a hard task, therefore give all diligence.

2 God requires Totum hominis, the whole duty of man; that is God's due. What nothing left for this world? yes, moderate providence; the saving of souls hinders not provision for bodies; but furthers and blesseth it. First seek the kingdom of heaven, then these things shall be added to you, Matth. 6. other things shall come into the bargain Paul calls them Adjectanea, CHRIST Adjectiva; there is no substance in them. Sequere tu Christum, caetera sequentur te. Follow thou Christ, the rest shall follow thee. The world says; Insequeris? fugio: fugis? insequor. Dost thou follow me? I will fly thee: dost thou fly me? I will follow thee. Besides there is a mass of corruption in us, all diligence is little enough to expel that. A tyrant boasted that he had turned a great stream in two days: yet quoth the Philosopher, but you have been turning another stream this twoscore years, and yet have not done it; your own evil disposition.

A Christian is like a common wealth; Grace is the Queen, religious thoughts the subjects, lusts the rebels: these war against the Queen fight against the soul. If they grow to a head, they will make a mutine in our hearts: our best policy is to keep them bare and low: though we cannot take away velle, their will; yet let us prevent them of Posse nocere, power to hurt us. To this let us give all diligence, and the Lord give a blessing to that diligence.

Besides this, add, &c. Thus much for the addiction, now to the addition. Wherein we find a concession, an accession, that he requires; Add. You have done something, yet there is a Praeterea, a Besides. Profectionem agnosco, Perfectionem requiro: I yield a beginning, I ask a proceeding. Sit not down with your Satis. knowledge you have, and faith you have; yet there's an Adhaec, Besides these. Leaving the principles, let us go on to perfection. Nihil praesumitur actum, dum superest aliquid ad agendum. We cannot say, that work is finished, whereof any part remains to be done. None were fit to fight the battles of God, but they that lapped water out of their hands; (like the dogs of Nile for fear of the Crocodyles) still going forward, Judge. 7.5. As God himself is said to drink, De torrente in via; of the brook in the way, Psal. 110.7. this man lifts up his head, and goes on. Christ hath sprinkled all the way between heaven and earth with his blood, and hath made it aliving way: like good hounds, let us trace him by the foot, and runafter him in the smell of his garments; not resting till we rest with our Master. Thou hast done many good works, assurest thyself of some growth; yet forget that is behind, and reach forth unto the things before, Phil. 9.13. Non sufficit Christum sequi, sed cōsequi: there is still a besides. They go from strength to strength, till everyone appear before God in Zion. When thy soul hath tasted some crumbs that fall from thy masters table, some drop of blood that ran from thy Lord's side; yet still think of a Praeterea, somewhat besides. Beda observes on Num. 33.29. They went from Mithcah, and pitched in Hashmonah: that Mithcah signifies sweetness, and Hashmonah swiftness. Mithcah and Hashmonah, sweetness and swiftness must be joined together. They that in Mithcah have tasted of the Lord sweetness, will remove to Hashmonah, come toward him with swiftness.

When the young man asked CHRIST, what he should do to be saved, he pointed him to the law, keep the commandments. But he replied; All these have I kept from my youth up: what lack I yet? Verse 20. yes, there is a Praeterea, a besides he never dreamt of; If thou wilt be perfect, sell all thou hast and give to the poor. This last besides almost put him beside himself. In natural things we still covet a Praeter. If we have wit, we covet more wit: we will seek to be more wise than we can be, though we be found less wise than we should be. But in worldly things our desires have an everlasting Praeterea. Hath Ahab a kingdom? yet Naboth's vineyard is another Praeterea. Hath he bought the Manor, he must have the poor man's cottage besides. The rich man had exceeding many flocks and herds, the poor nothing but one only Lamb; well this one Lamb is his Praeterea, he must have it. Hath another put out the hundred to usury? yet there's a besides, when the ten pounds come in for interest, out with that too. The widow had filled all her vessels with oil, yet she calls for another vessel, theres a Praeter still. The rich man, Luke 12. had his barns full before; but now he must enlarge them according to his desires; there's another Praeterea: besides, all this he must have more. O the insatiate desire of this world! but for heavenly things, a small scantling serves us. I believe that CHRIST died for me, I am sorry for my sins, I hope to be saved; heres enough, no Praeterea now, no besides is thought on. Nothing satisfies us for this world, we are quickly gluttet with Jesus Christ.

Besides this. GOD that hath done enough for us; leaves us somewhat-to do for ourselves. He hath given us all things that pertain to life and godliness, Verse 3. enriched us with great and precious promises, made us partakers of the Divine nature, Ver. 4. there's Opus meum; God's work. But besides this add to your faith virtue: there's Opustuum, thy work. The blood of Christ cleanseth us from all sin; yet he that hath this hope, purgeth himself, 1 John 3.3. there's thy Praeterea. Behold, I stand at the door and knock: if any man will open to me, I will come in, &c. Revel. 3.20. God knocks, thou must open, that he may enter: do thou open, that's thy part: God will enter, that's his part. David calls God his Helper: now as Saint Augustine observes; adjuvari non dicitur, qui nihil sponte conatur: he is not said to be helped, that never concurred with his endeavor. Beza in loc. Non Trunci aut stipites sumus, we are not blocks and stones: and withal he infers upon, 1 Cor. 3.9. we are laborers together with God: that we do Gratiae primae 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : and he that denies it, denies the efficacy of the first grace.

This we affirm without fear of falling into the Popish doctrine of free-will too. Three things concur in a sinners conversion; the word of God persuading, the spirit of God prevailing, and the will of man consenting. Thou art created without thyself, not sanctified without thyself. The father begot the child without the child's will: then it had none, for it was not: but he cannot bring this child to any art against his will. I will not dispute God's power; he can, but he will not save us against our wills. Some Romists strongly build their paper-house of freewill on such places: but a man may smile to read how bitterly they oppose us in the frontispice, and how consentingly they jumpe with us in the conclusion. Castifica te ipsum, says Fevardentius, there is free will: yet he concludes, Castificas te non de te, sed de illo qui habitat in te; there's no free will. Make strait steps to your feet, and turn you to me, saith the Lord: therefore can they turn themselves? Here they cry out louder than oyster women in the streets, victory, victory: but they sing their own 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , put the crown on their own heads. But what's the conquest? they have gotten what we never denied. They prove here freedom of our will to add to our own endeavors: right, so say we to too: but they forget that God had made us first partakers of the divine nature: now if the sun make us free, we shall be free indeed. Acta fit activa voluntas. Did Saint Peter write this to wicked men, or to Saints? If they would prove that unregenerate men can will their own conversion by nature of themselves, it were worth their prize and praise: otherwise they have taken great pains for a thing not denied them. As I have heard of that wise man, who challenged his neighbor for impounding that very horse, which himself at the same time was riding on.

Indeed God chargeth us with a Praeterea; yet saith CHRIST, without me ye can do nothing. Bonum debet esse ex integra causa; and that is only God's grace. But we are not allowed to be idle, Psal. 132.11. God hath sworn in truth unto David; of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne: there is God's covenant. If thy children will keep my testimony: there is our condition. Lex data ut gratia quaeretur: Evangelium datum ut lex impleretur. The law is given that we might have recourse to the. Gospel: the Gospel is given that we might be enabled to perform the Law. God is the principal Agent, but thou hast thy Besides. Implore his aide, put to thy own endeavors. Qui instat praecepto, praecurrit auxilio. Confidence of salvation, doth not contradict wariness of conversation. He that is most sure of heaven, is yet afraid to do that may deserve hell. Add the oil of thy diligence to the kindled Lamp of God's grace, thy oil doth not enlighten the Lamp, but feeds it. Frustra oramus, pro quibus non laboramus, Augu. In vain we pray for that blessing, which our endeavors never seek. The Philosopher wanting shoes, and the King giving him leather; yet he thought it not enough unless the King would also put them to making. God is so beholding to some, that he must do all for them, if he will have them. But when he hath called thee to the truth, that might have suffered thee to die in ignorance and infidelity, thou hast thy Besides. Bee not so much thy own enemy, as to frustrate GOD'S mercy by thy sluggishness. Lose not, through want of some labor to amend thy life, the hope of eternal blessedness.

Add: we are fallen upon a point of Arithmetic; a special good point if it be confined to good things. Of the four main parts; Addition, Subtraction, Multiplication, and Division; the world embraceth three, and casts out a fourth, for worldly things: so GOD commands three of them, and casts out a fourth, for heavenly things. The world bars division, and God forbids subtraction. Give me leave to follow this metaphor so far, as it may give light to my present intention. Let us first see the worlds arithmetic, then God's.

Addition, especial of sin to sin is a frequent point. Herod had done many foul mischeefes; yet he had his addition; He added yet this above all, that he had shut up John in prison: yea afterwards he slew him in the prison, Mark 6.17. To Incest he added tyranny; to tyranny murder. That other Herod had such an addition: He kissed James; and because he saw it pleased the Jews, he proceeded further, to take Peter also. Many such additions; to swearing they add Lying, to lying killing, to killing stealing, to that adultery; until blood toucheth blood. Their reward shall be proportioned: because their (added) sins for length reach up to heaven; therefore GOD shall double unto them double according to their works.

Multiplication goes beyond addition, Esa. 56.12. To morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant, Eccl. 7.17. Be not over much wicked. In youth men sow those cursed seeds in the ground of their hearts, in age they reap a multiplied crop. Let usury be a demonstration of this point: the usurer says to his monies, as God said once to his creatures; Encrease and multiply. A monstrous and unnatural brood: other cattle and plants have their appointed seasons to engender and bring forth: money brings forth today, and begins a new travel tomorrow. Yea, the young brood brought forth today, begins it self to bear tomorrow. Other creatures the sooner they begin to bear the sooner they leave off: usurious monies begin betimes, and multiply without end. It is an unhappy point of arithmetic multiplication by usury, and shall be punished, as God threatened Eve; I will multiply sorrows. But vae accumulanti non sua; woe to him that multiplies that which is not his, Hab. 2.6. For three transgressions of Israel and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof. Upon him that will multiply his sins, God will multiply his plagues.

Subtraction is another point of the worlds practice. They covet houses and fields, and take them away by violence. Jezebel was cunning in this point against innocent Naboth; she took away his living and life too. How could so many flantit in their caroches, but that they live by subtraction? the tenth and right of the Church maintains it. O the pity of God and man! that maintenance should be taken from the poor Minister who wants bread, and be given to feed the unsatiate guts of pride and luxury. If a robber takes a purse, he dies for it: but let others subtract from the poor their commons, from laborers their wages, from the Church her endowments; and this Arithmetic passes. This made Socrates laugh, to see little thieves riding in carts to the galhouse; and great thieves in coaches to condemn them. Minuta puniuntur, magna in triumphis feruntur. A poor sea-captain being brought before Alexander for pyracie; thus confessed his fault. Indeed I am a pyrate because I robbed some few fisher-men in a cockeboate: but if I had scowred the seas as thou hast done, and spoiled all the world, with a Navy, with an army; I had been no pyrate, I had been an Emperor. The malefactor could say, I die for a few trifles of petty theeverie: but if I had robbed the poor by giving their bread to dogs; or the Church by Simony and detaining her tenths; or the commonwealth by ingrossings, inhauncings; I might have been a Justice of peace or an Alderman. Thus as in a throng, a dwarfe comes to be lifted up above the shoulders of the tallest, and made a laughing stock, that kept least a do: so in the crowd of this world, the least sins are exposed to the sharpest censures. Well, if any man will practice subtraction against the poor, God will use it against him, and take his name out of the book of life. Si in ignem mittitur qui rem non dedit propriam, ubi mittendus qui invasit alienam? Augu. If he be damned that gives not his own, what shall become of him that takes away another man's? If judgment without mercy shall be to him that shows no mercy; where shall subtraction and rapine appear? Psal. 109.11. Let the extortioner catch all that he hath, and let the strangers spoil his labor. There is one subtraction; his estate, Vetse 13. let his posterity be cut off, and in the generation following let his name be blotted out. There's another subtraction; his memory, Verse 12. let there be none to extend mercy unto him, neither any to favor his fatherless children. There's another subtraction; a denial of all pity to him and his, Verse 7. Let his prayer become sin: there's another subtraction; no audience from heaven, Verse 8. Let another take his office, there's a subtraction of his place. Let his days be few, there's a subtraction of his life, Psal. 69.28. Let him be blotted out of the book of the living, and not be written with the righteous; there's the last, the subtraction of his soul. This is a fearful arithmetic: if the wicked add sins, God will add plagues. Add iniquity unto their iniquity, and let them not come into thy righteousness, Rev. 22.18. God shall add unto them the plagues written in the book. If they subtract from others their rights, God shall subtract from them his mercies.

Now let us come to GOD'S Arithmetic, and this principally consists in addition. Whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain. To give every man his own is but equity, but the addition of charity makes blessed. I was hungry, and ye gave me meat, &c. Mat. 25. Come ye blessed, &c. To remission add restitution, to restitution charity, to charity, piety. How oft says Peter, shall I forgive my brother? till seven times? yea saith Christ, and more: to seven times, add seventy times. We must all give an account; blessed are they that can bring in this bill of reckonings; Addition of good to good. Let us not be weary in well doing, Gal. 6.9. there is our bill of reckoning. Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man: there is our total sum. Now as Addition teacheth us to add grace to grace: so there is a multiplication required, to increase the effects of those graces, in a multiplicity of good works. Non aucta scientia cessat: knowledge not improved will be impaired. Hast thou faith, but no stronger than many years ago? Is not thy zeal more fervent, thy charity more compassionate, thy humility brought lower? Lord, thou deliveredst me five talents: behold! I have gained besides them, five talents more. To him that hath shall be given: but from him that hath not, shall be taken away that he seemed to have. If here be no usury, we shall lose the principal. God is a father that loves to have his children thrive: he gives them a stock, and looks they should not be unthrifths: if they do well, they shall have the whole inheritance. As in generation, so in regeneration, we must be growing up to a full stature in Christ, Eph. 4.13. As a traveler passeth from town to town till he come to his Inn: so the Christian from virtue to virtue, till he comes to heaven. God hath sown some good seeds in our hearts, let us manure the ground with repentance, and mature the fruits by obedience, that they may grow up kindly, to his honor and glory.

Now because I am moved to move your charity at this time; let me be bold to teach you another point of GOD'S Arithmetic; it is Division. Give a portion to seven, and also to eight. Geometricall division is Justice; to give everyone his own. There is an arithmetical division, Charity; to give somewhat to all that want: not all to one, this is no division: but some to all, this is to divide well. Da omni petenti, non omnia petenti, Aug. He that will not divide while he lives, shall find an empty quotient when he is dead. The bread of the poor is like the way of the rich; he that hords it from him is a man of blood. We find means of Division, but they are not good. Upon the least quarrel we divide all among the Lawyers: the Common-pleas and the Chancery drinks up the poor's portion. Among Ruffians a word and a blow; among civil men a word and a writ. I hear the proud neighbor speak of his equal; go to, I have a hundred pound to spend with him; I hear him not speak of the poor beggar, I have a hundred pence to give him. Even the Lawyers themselves count you mad: I have heard that a Lawyer dying bequeathed all his goods to Bedlam: saying, among mad-men I got it, and let mad-men spend it, Luk 12.13. There were two covetous brethren strove for the Inheritance, they strove not who should be most charitable. There are that divide a part to Tailors for strange disguises, a part to panders for their female damnations, a part to corrupt officers that sell truth for bribes; and if they have any left divide it among their children; but I find no portion left for the children of GOD.

What men charitably divide, they shall only find: of all, what I gave, that I have. This division is not loss but gain: it is sent before to be kept safe in the best coffer. The bread cast upon the waters, shall be found again after many days. The truly rich man is not discerned by his plate, nor bags, nor wardrobe; but bounty: not by multiplication but by division. Other men possess riches as sick men fevers which indeed rather possess them. Good alms are like Ambassadors, sent liegers abroad to secure the rest at home. We have many of Saint James's Almoners, James 2.16. God bless you; but they bless you without a cross: would I were able to help you; able! herein they wish well to themselves only. As the Tenant said to his Land-lord; would I could give you this farm? what then said the Land-lord? you should never have it, quoth the Tenant. They wish themselves Facultatem non voluntatem; money not mercy. The poor may say to them as the beggar said to the Bishop: if such wishes were worth a halfepeny they would not be so liberal. Well, divide it thyself, or it shall be done for thee. Accumulationem dissipatio sequitur: the father could not be more cunning at the rake, than the son will be at the pitchforke. The moneys that were formerly chested like cag'd birds, will wing it merrily when he sets them a flying. ^c He begetteth a son, and there is nothing in his hand: if at least they be not gone before he comes at them, Luk. 12.20. Thou fool, then whose shall these things be? yea, whose shalt thou thyself be? and that is the harder question. ^f When he dieth he shall carry nothing away: but death comes and there's a Division indeed. Read James 5.2. The moth shall divide his cloth, the rust his gold: this is not all; the world shall divide his goods, infamy his name, the earth his body, terror his conscience, and hell his uncharitable soul. Wilt thou not divide, O worldling? thou shalt be divided. Your twenty in the hundred will not believe this, but a hundred to twenty he shall feel this. But let us divide our goods by charity, and Christ will gather up our souls in mercy.

It follows; Add to your faith, &c. The motives are done, come we to the materials. Here be eight in number, all excellent in nature. Under this number of eight (though I put no divinity in numbers) the Scripture hath often commended to us the graces of God. So Colos. 3.12. The induments we must put on, are eight: first is the linings, bowels of mercies; next kindness, &c. Paul does not there begin with faith, but he ends with Charity, as our Apostle here. So Phil. 4.8. he commends to us gracious qualities by the number of eight. Whatsoever things are true, &c. To both these gradations he propounds the same eminent corollary. Col. 3.15. The peace of God, and the God of peace, be with you. Ezek. 40.41. There were eight tables whereon they slew their sacrifices: upon these eight tables we must slay our sins, that we may make our souls acceptable sacrifices to God. Ezek. 40.31. The ascent to the Temple had eight steps: by these eight degrees we must clime up to heaven, or not come thither. There were but eight souls saved in Noah's ark: without these eight graces no soul shall be saved: Our SAVIOUR CHRIST prescribed eight steps for our ascending to blessedness, Mat. 5. his Apostle hath delivered the same number. Eight beatitudes, beatus numerus. It were no impossible thing to find our SAVIOURS text in his Apostles gloss. Christ begins with Poorenesse in spirit, Peter with Faith: this sees it self poor, and therefore apprehends Christ's riches. 2. Christ commends mourning, and Peter, Knowledge: now he that knows his sins will mourn for them. 3 Christ praiseth Meekness, Peter Temperance: it is no hard thing to find meekness in temperance; which is a virtue neither to distemper a man's self, nor to disturb others. 4. Christ blesseth the desire of Righteousness, Peter of Virtue; which is a rule to live righteously: Christ magnifieth Mercy, Peter Charity: and who are charitable but the merciful? 6. Christ persuades to Pureness in heart, Peter to Godliness, and godliness makes the heart pure. As it is true charity esse misericordem, to be merciful: so it is true piety esse mundicordem, to be pure in heart. 7. Christ exhorts to Peace-making, Peter to Brotherly kindness; and who can distinguish between Peace-makers, and those that are Brotherly-kind? As Abraham said to Lot, let us not strive, for we are Brethren. Lastly, Christ encourageth to suffer Persecution for righteousness sake, and Peter Patience: now Tribulation worketh patience.

Conceive all this a glorious house, the building up of a Christian. Let Faith stand for the foundation: Virtue for the walls: Knowledge the windows, that let in the light of God's truth to illuminate it. Let Temperance be the mortar, that keeps off the violence of wind and weather; for temperance diverts corruption. Be Patience the pins and stays that hold together the frame; for patience will not be moved. Let godliness be the perfect form or module of it, that the structure may mock the rage and resistance of hell. Set Brotherly kindness for the lodging chambers, built to entertain friends. Charity is the roof, as Saint Augustine: says of God's house in man's heart; Diligendo persicitur. Thus as God brought Moses to the mount, to the top of Pisgah: and shown him the land of Canaan, Deutronomy 34.1. So I have brought your meditations to the top of the mount, and shown you the fruitful valley standing thick with the graces of God. Now to the first material.

Add to your faith virtue. Faith is the first, and I have drunk deeply to you in this cup before: yet I would have you sick of an holy ebriety, and still to thirst for this drink, Cant. 5.1. Bibite & inebriamini, drink abundantly of this cup. To your faith, I cannot omit four things naturally arising out of the words. 1. The necessity. 2. The singularity. 3. The propriety. 4. The society of Faith.

First, the necessity of Faith: our Apostle to build his house of Christianity, lays this the foundation. That would be a poor house that hath no foundation: the hope of too many, is a castle in the air, that wants the foundation of faith. Philosophy lays her ground in reason, Devinitie in faith: the first voice of a Christian is, I believe, Ille apud Deum plus habet loci, qui plus attulit, non argumenti, sed fidei. He hath most respect with GOD, not that is wisest in reason, but strongest in faith. Now the necessity of faith appears in three respects; Ration Dei, Diaboli, tui.

In respect of God; For without faith it is impossible to please God. Every man's desire should be to please God, without faith it is impossible to do it. How shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? It was faith that made Abraham titled God's friend. He that thrusts into God's presence without faith shall be examined; Quomodo intrasti; friend, how camest thou in hither? Believe and welcome; As thou believest, so be it done unto thee.

In respect of the devil: he is a roaring Lion, we have no means to resist him but by being steadfast in the faith, 1 Pet. 5.9. He is too strong for thee if thou meetest him with thy virtue, or with thy good works; for he will object sins enough to outwaigh them, Solon cannot meet him with his justice, nor Solomon with his wisdom; every poor sinner can overcome him with his faith. This quencheth all the fiery darts of the wicked. Temperance is a good buckler, that he shall not wound thy body: honesty a good buckler, that he shall not wound thy name: patience, that he shall not disturb thy mind; but if thou want faith, he will for all these wound thy soul. This is an invincible shield against an implacable enemy.

In respect of thyself: thou art ignorant, there is no understanding of GOD but by saith, Esa. 1. The vulgar reads; Nisi credideritis non intelligetis; unless ye believe, ye shall not understand. Quomodo capitur Trinitas, how the Trinity may be comprehended in understanding, thou askest well: quomodo creditor Trinitas, how the Trinity may be believed in faith, thou askest not well. Ideo been creditor, quia cito non capitur, Augu. It is therefore to be believed, because it cannot be understood. Thou art originally co•rupt, naturally hateful to God: nothing canst thou do to please him, till thyself be first made pleasing to him. The doer is not acceptable for the deed, but the deed is acceptable for the doer. Hadst thou all the succeeding graces, and not this foundation of faith; whereby thy person is made accepted in the Beloved; when thou art judged, thou couldst not be saved. Nature may do works to glorify ourselves, faith doth works to glorify God. We are not justified by the works of the Law, but by Grace, say we. But are not the works of the Law, the works of grace? yes, every good work of the Law is a work of grace; as every sin is a breach of the Law. Grace and the Law are not thus opposed, but grace and nature. In the root of a tree appears no beauty, no show of leaves or fruits: yet Quicquid in arbore pulchritudinis est ex illa procedit: what beauty so ever is visible in the tree proceeds from the root. So in the humility of faith we find small luster, no pleasure discernible to the eye of man: yet whatsoever luster or grace fullness shines in our works, is derived from that root. Thus Faith is the Queen that shall speed: let Ahasuerus be never so angry, to his Esther he will hold out his golden scepter. To this faith God allows entrance; Let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith. As Adoniah to Bethshabe, I know the king will deny thee nothing. The Eunuch to Philip, Acts 8.38. See here is water, what hinders me to be baptized. Believest thou? yes; then nothing hinders. Upon the knowledge of my faith, I ask, what hinders me to be loved, what hinders me to be blessed, what hinders me to be saved? now as Philip to the Eunuch, so CHRIST answers us; Nothing, Fiat tibi secundum fidem tuam: be it unto thee according to thy faith. Look we a little further into the necessity of Faith: it is taken two ways in the Scriptures; either Objectively or Actively. Objectively or materially, Pro veritate fidei, for the truth of faith. Actively or Formally, Pro vita fidei, for the act of fai•h, which is the life of faith. For the object to be believed, and the act of believing.

The object or doctrine of faith is that, which GOD by his Prophets and Apostles hath delivered; or what is naturally and by good consequence deduced from this, or reduced to this. For inference and connection of Scripture is Scripture, as the root of a tree is the tree though it be hid in the ground. But to deliver rules of faith, no writing hath power but the Scripture: therefore none may speak authoritatively of the doctrines of faith since the Apostles: men's assertions have no power to oblige the conscience. What the Scripture forbids, fly it: what it affirms, believe it: what it reproves, mend it: what it commands, do it. And as many as walk after this rule, Peace be on them and mercy, and upon the Israel of God. There are some things Libere credenda; some conceive them this way, others that way: Vnusquisque abundat sensu suo. Some things are Pie credenda; as that of Mary lived and died a virgin, albeit it be not there expressed: for who durst touch that vessel which God had sanctified to bear his own son? Others are necessario credenda, all things revealed in holy writ, be they plain and easy, or dark and mystical. All I say, in praeparatione mentis, in the readiness and intention of the mind, when we shall come to understand them: as the mystery of the Trinity, CHRIST'S incarnation without sin, &c. Though we cannot conceive, we must believe. Now there is a difference of things objected Fidei salvificae, to our saving faith. Primaria credendi, such are the Articles of faith: Secunda credendi, whatsoever thereof is necessarily inferred. The want of this faith excludes from heaven; yet the having of it without further degree doth not bring all thither. Athanasius doth not say, whosoever doth believe this shall be saved: but whosoever doth not believe this shall be damned.

Therefore there is no binding men's faith to that the Scripture avers not. The Papists do bind to things. 1. Citra fundamentum, besides the foundation; as Traditions, untemperd mortar daubed on the walls of truth to hide it. 2. Circa fundamentum, to things about the foundation, such as endanger it: as denial of Scripture to Lay-men. This is a wretched sin, to obtrude for matter of faith, that it is not lawful to read the Scriptures which are the rule of faith. 3. Contra fundamentum, to things against the foundation; as the sacrifice of the mass, distinction of mortal and venial sins, Justification by works, &c. What is against that which is necessarily to be believed to salvation, is against the foundation. But it is necessary to trust in CHRIST'S blood and merits only because there is no other name given under heaven whereby we may be saved. Therefore to trust in others, to let Angels or men share part of our faiths, is against the foundation. Indeed they boast, that they only hold the foundation: but I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing. If you join your own merits with Christ's merits, he shall profit you nothing. Thus for the matter of faith.

As we see the necessity of faith, in respect of the doctrine to be believed; so see the necessity of it, in respect of the act of believing. The Schoolmen in defining this faith, are defective. First, they forget the name of CHRIST, who is the special object of faith: that light which makes the eyes of faith to see. Secondly, they leave out Fiduciam, Confidence or affiance; an immediate effect or act of faith. For we have boldness to enter into the Holiest. Thirdly, they make it a speculation, not a practice; but Fides in agendo est, Faith is operative and busy, in applying Christ, in lifting up the soul to Christ, in abhorring that many offend Christ, in doing that may please Christ. Quo itur? whither go we? to God. Quà itur? how go we? by Christ. Quo pede? on what foot? on our faith; for faith is still walking. There be three acts of faith concerning Christ, Prehending, Apprehending, Comprehending of Christ. Prehending of him is by knowledge; we know him a Savior: this is the first step, but not far enough, to heaven: the wicked know, the devils have this faith. Apprehending of him, by appropriation of his merits: we know him our Savior; my Lord, and my God. Comprehending of him is a full possession in the heart. The other often doubts; such a faith had Peter, when he cried out sinking, Lord save me. While he believed, he trode the sea safely: when he doubted he began to sink. When we comprehend with all Saints, and know the love of Christ that passeth knowledge; this is the fullness of faith, Tit. 1.1. According to the saith of God's elect: there is a faith of the Elect, therefore the reprobates may have a faith by themselves. Their belief is in the Elect, but the belief of the Elect is not in them. They may have fidem veram, a true faith; but not fidem salvificam, a saving faith. This is of necessity to heaven; and as it depends upon Christ, so it is given by the Spirit of Christ. Our Apostle says before, Sortiti sunt fidem, they obtained it by lot. Jacob prophesied the division of Canaan, yet was it done by lot. Faith is not gotten by wit or diligence, but by God's lot, that is, God's gift. If this lot be thine, thou hast drawn well, and shalt never look blank. The abridgement of all godliness, or sanctity in the root of sanctity, that's, this Faith. Now seeing (necessarily) we cannot be saved without it, in all our hearts good Lord plant it.

Secondly, we are to consider the Singularity: the Apostle says not Faiths, but Faith. He writes to many, but he speaks of no pluralitie of faiths, One Lord, one Faith. One ration objecti, which is Christ; not one ration subjecti; for every believer hath his own faith But his meaning is that all true believers have one and the same faith: vestra fides, your faith. There is but one faith in the Church, as but one Church in the faith. Vna fides specie, non una numero; One faith in nature, not one in number. We may say of faiths, as of faces: Facies non omnibus una; Non diversa tamen; One light, many rays: one fountain, many streams: one tree, many branches.

The Church is a Pomgranate, that hath many kernels: an ear of Wheat, that hath many grains. Every man hath his own faith, yet all have but one faith. Paul speaks of some that have erred from the faith; and of others reprobate concerning the faith; that have prevaricated from that faith which the Church in unity professeth: Wherefore rebuke them sharply, that they may be sound in the faith. Mans body, as Physicians say, is subject to two thousand diseases: the eye to two hundred: but faith, which is the souls eye, is subject to more. There be so many errors concerning the Faith, that they are not to be numbered. Almost so many Sects as Cities, so many Creeds as heads. Christ says, when he shall come to Judgment, that he shall scaree find faith on the earth: but if he come now, he shall find too many faiths. Majorem inveniet quàm velit esse fidem; I pray God the pluralitie of faiths among many, hath not brought a nullity of faith in the most. So our Savior's prophecy will still be true; Inveniat inter tot fides nullam fidem: among so many false faiths he shall scarce find any true faith. Not so much need to pray now with the Apostles, Adauge no bis fidem, Lord increase our faith; but Diminue nobis fides, Lord decrease our faiths. Lessen the number of our false faiths, increase the measure of our true faith. We know how some believe this year, we know not how they will believe next year. Incerta fides, certa infidelitas; Where belief is uncertain, unbelief is certain. The vanity of some men, the curiosity of many men, the inconstancy of all men, make many faiths. As the Levite served his ravished Concubine, Judge. 19.29. he divided her into twelve pieces, and sent her into all the coasts of Israel▪ so poor Faith hath been cut into twelve thousand pieces, and scattered all over the world.

The Papists exclaim so far as the world is Christened, that the variety of faiths sprung from us. Ex uno Luthero multae fides; Out of one Luther came many faiths: as out of the belly of the Trojan horse, an army of soldiers. They call us Novangelicos, new-Gospellers; and Quinti Evangelii professores; Protestants of a fifth Gospel. All their malice is to black and grime the face of our Church: which still, maugre all their spite, looks fair in the eye of her Husband Jesus Christ. All their aspersions and calumnies are but rubbish to scour us, and make us God's brighter vessels. A fifth Gospel, say ye? No, remember your own book, which the monks of Paris wrote, and called it Evangelium Aeternum, the Everlasting Gospel: there was a fifth Gospel. But the want of our union with the Pope, or unity with ourselves, doth not disprove the truth of our faith. Sicut Dei una Jerusalem, sic Diaboli una Babylon, August. As Jerusalem is at one, so Babylon is at one; the children of hell are at peace. Satan divides not his kingdom; one crow will not pecke out another crows eyes. Omnis unitas non est veritas, omnis dissensio non est falsitas. As every union is not truth, so every dissention is not falsehood. Melius est dissidium pietatis, quàm pax iniquitatis; Better are the troubles and differences of righteousness, than the peace of wickedness. Non est veritas unitatis, ubi non est unitas veritatis; There is no truth of unity, without unity of truth. Agreement in evil is not unity, but conspiracy. Indeed our neighbors of Rome are subtle, their quarrels are not in the streets, all their jars keep within doors. The Inquisition keeps Papists in the unity of heresy; Yet some of them secretly know their own errors, their own distractions. Ludovicus Vives writes of a great one among them, persuaded to go to one of their conventicles; who answered, Come, Eamus ad communes errores, quia sic vultis: Let us go to the common errors, seeing you will have it so. Where was their union in the time of their Anti-popes; when there were three at once? which was the Head? Was it a body without a head? or a body with three heads? The one were defective, the other monstrous. What was the unity of their faith, when their heads were condemned heretics? some of them sacrificers to devils? Yea, even now they agree not in the Faith. The Dominicans abridge man's free-will, the Jesuits contradict this: this quarrel fills the world with books. The truth is, there are more differences of faith in the Romish religion, than in all the world besides. A reverend Divine of ours hath collected from Bellarmino's own pen, many hundred differences among them; yet these men boast their unity of Faith. But as no unity is so strong as that Fidei, of faith: so no dissention so violent as that fideûm, of different faiths. Faith is a whet-stone that gives edge to the instruments of war.

The Papists on the left hand: Their Divines conclude that none of us can be saved; one heaven cannot hold the Pope and Calvin. Some of ours say so of them: if Rome be Babylon, then all that have the mark of the Beast, must burn in hell. So plainly, Revel. 19.20. They instance in many particulars, wherein the Roman Church doth rase the foundation. Therefore they say, Babylon will be served, as she wished to Jerusalem, Psal. 137. She cried of that City, Rase it, Rase it, even to the foundation: her reward shall be proportionate; her little ones shall be dashed against the stones. But this may be too far on both sides; a Fever of zeal.

Schismatics on the right hand; for faith suffers, as Christ suffered, in the midst of her enemies. Fides laceratur utrinque; These invent a new Faith, a new Church. As the heathen made a piece of wood a god, and then adored it: so these set up a new creed of their own forging, and then worship it. If it be appealed, they cry louder than the Ephesians for their Diana, with such a noise; Great is Diana of the Ephesians. If they live among us, we ought to compel them to unity. A woman not contracted, must not be forced to marry, because she is free; but if she be willingly contracted, and afterward dislike, she may be justly forced by the Law. These are contracted to the Church, therefore may be justly compelled; Compel them to come in, that my house may be full. But can Faith be constrained? Nil minùs est fidei quàm fidem cogere, Tertul. It is against the nature of Faith to be compelled; Probitate coactâ, Gloria nulla venit. How then? Quid jam nisi vota supersunt? There is no help left but our prayers: let us desire that as at first, Vniversa terra erat unius linguae, the whole world was of one language; so that it were now, unius fidei, all of one faith. Let us beseech Dominum fidei, to send us Dominam fidem: pray our Lord of Faith, to send us our Lady Faith. That everyone may have faith in his own heart; and all our faith may be one in Jesus Christ.

The third point is the Proprietie; Your faith. The faith of all is one, as it reflects on our Savior Christ: yet every soul that will go to heaven, must have a particular faith in it self. All of us believe one thing, yet the act of thy faith cannot save my soul; it must be my own faith. No man can be saved by a common faith in any religion. Vna fides cum reliquis Sanctis, tamen propria fides cujus{que} Sancti. For the substance, it hath a community with the rest of the Saints: for the availableness, it hath a propriety to every believer. One bird cannot fly to heaven with another birds wings. Now it is called Your faith two ways, Ex aequitate juris, ex proprietate usus. By the right and interest you have in it, and by your proper use of it.

1 Your faith, because you have a right and interest to this faith. As Saint Jude calls it the Common salvation, so it may be called the Common faith. If no Christian be excepted from the right of salvation by Christ, then none is excepted from the right of faith in Christ. The faith that God delivered to the Saints, is Your faith: take your handful out of this sheaf, your portion is in this common stock. It is Aeque pretiosa fides, saith our Apostle, verse, 1. Like precious faith: not appropriated to Peter or Paul only, the rest secluded; but common to all the Saints. Qui se excipit, se decipit: qui alium excipit, Christo injuriam facit. He that excepts himself, deceives himself: he that excepts others, doth wrong to Christ. There is a woe to such; Woe to you Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men. They have a bridge over the gulf, whereby themselves are escaped; and then take it way lest it should help others. But When thou art recovered, strengthen thy brethren. Shew others the mercy thou hast tasted: teach them to escape damnation by that way thou hast escaped it. So David, Psal. 66.16. Come and hear all ye that fear God, and I will declare what he hath done for my soul. Woe to them that engross faith, that enclose God's Commons, that make that several and peculiar, which the Lord hath laid open, and made common. Thus the Pharisee despised the poor Publican; yet went home less justified. The Pharisees reproached them; Have any of The Rulers believed on him? But this people who knoweth not the Law, are cursed: but themselves were more cursed. Shut not the door of heaven against thy brother, lest God shut it against thine own soul, 1 Cor. 12.29. Divers gifts are appropriated to divers men; but faith is general to all the elect. There is a part of the body for seeing, a part for hearing, a part for smelling, a part for tasting, a part for walking, a part for speaking; but all are Feeling. The eye feels, the ear feels, the tongue feels, &c. Faith is like that sense of feeling, common to all. All are not seeing parts, nor all hearing parts, nor all smelling parts; but all are feeling parts. Are all Apostles? are all Prophets? are all Teachers? are all workers of miracles? Others may have particular graces, faith is a common grace to all. It is a devilish malice to grudge another man faith. When one wished that none might go to heaven, but himself, his wife, and his daughter, another replied, it were far better that none might go to hell, but thyself, thy wife, and thy daughter.

2 Your faith, because everyone must have a proper and peculiar use of faith. Thou canst not see CHRIST with another's eyes, nor walk to heaven on another's feet. Get true faith of thine own, though little, let it be true. If it cannot be so great as the best, let it be so precious as the best; a little piece of gold is so good gold as a great piece, excepting the quantity. Keep thy faith, though thou bear about in thy body the marks of the Lord Jesus. Where-soever thou art maimed, let thy faith be sound. If a man receive a wound, he is glad it is not to death, if he have sickness, that it is not mortal. So keep faith, and keep life: lose not thy faith, and thou shalt never lose Christ.

The fourth and last point is the Society. To your faith; To, implies some accession. Faith is a great Queen; it is base to let her go without a Court and a train The Queen shall be brought to the King in raiment of needle-work: The Virgins that be her companions shall follow her. The virgins are Virtue, Temperance, &c. Nuda fides, nulla fides: Let us not be Solifidians, as the Papists call us, lest we be Nullifidians, as they are. Faith is of Rebecca's humor; Give me children, or else I die. Languescit fides fine bonis operibus, malis operibus moritur. The want of good works makes Faith sick, evil works kill her out-right. Good deeds are such things, that no man is saved for them, nor without them. Thou hast need of thy faith, or thou canst not be saved; Christ hath need of thy works, or he will not save thee. Not that he needs them for himself, Psal. 16.2. My goodness, O Lord, extendeth not to thee: but for his children, ver. 3. But to the Saints that are in the earth. So that in this respect, Matth. 20.3. Loose the Ass and the Colt, for the Lord hath need of them: unbinde your covetous desires, be free in the works of mercy; for the Lord hath need of them. You ask, why should I part with my goods, seeing my faith serves my turn, and is sufficient to save my soul? Yes, but the Lord hath need of them. Use for himself, because need for his; and what you lay out to these little ones, he takes it to himself, he will pay you again. Thus Faith, like that Queen of the South, comes not alone to Solomon; she brings her train after her. Faith is this Queen; let Repentance be her Usher to go before her; and good works the Court that follow her: so let her come to the King of Mercy, the Presence-chamber of Jesus Christ.

To your faith virtue.] We have laid the foundation, and are now come to the walls of this spiritual house. It were a foolish cost of a foundation without walls; then said in dirision, This man began to build. Virtue, this is a special material. It is fit, ordiri à definitione, to begin with the definition: but we must first see what is the virtue here meant, before we can define it. Jeremiah says that Virtue in the Scripture is sometimes taken for the great power of God; as the Prophet speaks, Virtutes Domini nunciabit in Insulis: And Psal. 46. he is called Dominus virtutum. The Philosopher called Virtue, Bene vivendi formam & normam; the rule or method of living well. Psscator understands Virtue here Iustitiam erga proximum, righteousness towards others, where-after they that live are called good men. In a word, Virtue is taken in a double signification. 1. In the Latitude; so for all graces and good endowments; as Philip. 4.8. Whatsoever things are true. &c. if time be any virtue, any praise. Thus understood here, it is but the Genus to all these succeeding graces; Knowledge, Temperance, &c. all are Virtues. 2. In a restrained sense, it intends some special habit, directing a man to lead a good life, Tit. 2.12. soberly, ration tui, righteously, ration proximi, godly, ration Domini. First therefore we will consider Virtue in the copious acception; and so we may deduce this general doctrine.

Faith without virtue can neither make a man good in himself, nor just before the Lord. Faith, non otiosa, sed officiosa; it must have virtue with it. God requires grapes of the Vine, (implanted to Christ by Faith) in fidei nostrae testimonium: not for his own diet, but in testimony of our faith. If faith have engrafted us into the Vine, we must be bearing branches. And though we shall not be rewarded Propter opera, for our works; yet secundum opera, according to our works: Virtue must wait at the heels of Faith. There is a great sea of difference between the Papists and us, about good works; which, God knows, are scant and cold among us all. We both agree that they are to be done; both our doctrines persuade to well-doing; but when they talk of merit in them, here we part company: they travelling to heaven by their works, we by our faith; which of us speed best, rests in the conclusion to prove. They cavil that we hold not good works necessary; we hold them as necessary as they, but in another kind of necessity. They in a necessity of priority, we in a necessity of posterioritie. They in Demonstratione a causa, we in Demonstratione a signo. They Ut merita, we ut debita. They to bind God to us, we as already bound to God. They to make him our debtor, we in acknowledgement of a debt due to him: even our alms is not a gift, but a debt. Therefore it is said, that no man hath a right in his own, but only the use and disposition. As the wealth of the seven plentiful years, supplied the want of the seven barren: so the wealth of the rich is given to supply the necessity of the poor. Tua superflua, aliorum necessaria. Our alms brings not God accountant to us, but helps us in our account to God. The Papists hold them necessary, Tanquam a servis merce nariis; they look for wages for them: we Tanquam a filiis ingenuis, as of children disposed according to the nature of our father.

But if we be only justified by faith, why are we rewarded according to works? works are of two sorts; Intrinseca or Infusa; such as God works in us: these are here virtues, Theological or moral; as Patience, &c. Extrinseca or Acquisita; these we draw out of the former, or rather God out of us. The former are as the principal, these the interest. Now God doth not so much call us to account for that he gives us, but for the employment and increase of it that should be made to his use. Therefore he that buried his talent, was condemned, though he had it. The other were rewarded, not because they had their talents, but because they had employed them, and gained by them. One came with Domine, ecce tuum; yet he was answered with, Cast that unprofitable servant into utter darkness. But the other, Lord behold, thy five talents have gotten five moe? then; Euge bone, well done good and faithful servant; Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord. God calls him faithful; because he used his Faith to the producing of good works. So Matth. 25. not according to the internal habit of virtues or vices; but according to the works proceeding from them, is the reward bestowed. Christ says not, you have believed, but you have done; come ye blessed.

Two things fall necessarily here to be observed; The Invaliditie of merit in our virtuous works; The necessity and commodity of these virtuous works in themselves. Here is faith preceeding and works proceeding. Antecedit fides justificandum, Opera sequuntur justificatum.

1 The insufficiency of our virtues and their effects, which are good works; to merit or to justify our souls before God. It is a silly illation of the Romists; that because we must add to our faith virtue, &c. therefore faith cannot alone justify We do not commend a solitary faith, you see her required company. The eye alone of all parts of the body doth see; but the eye that is alone, or separated from the body, doth not see. We pronounce that to be no justifying faith which is without virtue and works. But that faith qualified with works, doth notwithstanding justify without works; this we maintain against men and Angels. We separate not faith and works in Iustificato, sed in justificando: not in the person justified, but in the act of justifying. In fire though light and heat cannot be divided the one from the other; yet the one may be considered without the other. But how shall Saint Paul and Saint James be reconciled; the one saying, we are justified by faith; the other, by works? Is the spirit of unity and truth divided? No; the one speaks of a Justice of justification, the other of a Justice of testification. The one acquits before God, the other approves before man. The one is without us, lent: the other within us, inherent: the one we receive, the other we return. Paul like a Doctor in the Schools reading, James as a Pastor in the Pulpit preaching. The one establishing a real faith, the other confuting a verbal faith. Piscator doth thus clear it: he says that Saint Paul and Saint James did handle two diverse questions. Paul; Quod fides justificat: James; Qualis fides justificat. The one, that faith doth justify: the other, what kind of faith doth justify. The one properly teaching Justification, the other sanctification.

Virtue as a servant follows Faith her Mistress, but when she comes to answer the Justice of God, virtue runs behind the door, with a Lord be merciful to me a sinner: and so leaves the burden on faiths shoulder, which only answers it in the blood of JESUS CHRIST. Faith is like Rachel, and virtue her maid Bilhah: though Bilhah supply the defects of Rachel, yet still let her remember that Rachel is her Mistress. CHRIST is our husband, and we his spouse: now it is fit the Bridegroom should be alone with the bride in the secret chamber; all the servants and attendants being shut forth: but when the door is opened, and the Bridegroom cometh into the waiting-room, then let all the servants and hand-maids attend: then enter virtue, temperance, &c. Extra causam justificationis opera satis laudari non possunt: ad causam hujus admitti non debent. Out of the point of Iustificati-works cannot be sufficiently commended: into the cause of Justification, they must not be admitted. David had a great army of soldiers at his back, yet he slew Goliath alone; had none to help him. Faith alone conquers Satan, but it hath an host of seconds with it. Faith like John that beloved Disciple, leans on CHRIST'S breast; good works with Peter follow CHRIST. The story of Judith proceeding with Holofernes may be here entertained for a fit similitude. Bethulia is in danger of Holofernes, the terror of the East; as we of the Justice of God. Iudiths undertakes for the safety of the Bethulians, faith for the safety of Christians. All Bethulia being too weak to encounter him, as all our obedience is too little to answer God. Judith goes accompanied with her hand-maid, faith with virtue. The hand-maid waits on Iudeth all the way: yet in the act of deliverance Judith is alone, and her hand-maid attends without the door. Virtue is ever waiting upon faith; but in the mighty act of deliverance she dares not come in, but lets faith alone with the whole business. It is she that goes to the throne of grace with confidence, and obtains mercy through the mediation of her sweet Savior Christ.

2 The necessity of virtuous actions. The law though it have no power to condemn us, hath power to command us. Lex datur ut gratiae quaeretur, Evangelium ut lex impleretur. The law sends us to Christ to be saved, and Christ sends us back again to the law to learn obedience. The former is plain; The Law is our School-Master to bring us to Christ, that we might be justified by faith. The other is as manifest: If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments, Tit. 2.11. The grace of God that bringeth salvation to all men, hath appeared. There is the grace of God, and salvation with it: whither doth it send us? To the denial of ungodliness and worldly lusts, that we should live soberly, &c. He that believes will keep the commandments. Now the keeping of the Law is twofold; legal, evangelical. Legal; so Adam might have kept it, so Christ did. Evangelical, Christ's righteousness imputed to us: he kept it for us, and we strive to keep it in him. That is true faith, which worketh by love. A man is a perfect Christian inwardly through faith before God, who hath no need of our works; outwardly before men by his works; for our faith profits them nothing. We call a painted man aequivoce, a man: some painters are so skillful in casting their colors, and can paint a fire so lively, that at the first blush you would think it to be a fire indeed. But try it by the effects, hold your hand to it, to feel some warmth, it is but a cold board or block. Many can thus lively paint their faith with the colors of profession: that God is their God; and though few be saved, they are sure to be of the number; excellent fire! But let the poor come near to be warmed with works of mercy; or others look for the light of virtue; there's neither light nor heat in it; a mere painted fire. A Pigmaleons block; faced only like faith. But the Gospel that gives salvation, chargeth us with the laws obedience. Esther being brought up in her young years under Mordecai; though she was afterwards married to king Ahasuerus, and an Imperial crown of gold set on her head; yet was still obedient to Mordecai, as before. She did the commandment of Mordecai, like as when she was brought up with him. When he charged her to speak to the king, albeit with hazard of life; she obeyed; if I perish, I perish. We were under the rudiments of the Law, as she under Mordecai: now we are freed by the Gospel, married to the great king JESUS CHRIST; crowned with his grace, enriched with the royal apparel of his righteousness: yet still we must be obedient to the Law, as Queen Esther to Mordecai. Epaminondas gave his soldiers leave to feast and sleep, while himself walked and watched about the army. Christ will not deal so with us; but rather as Abimelech said to his soldiers; what you see me do, do ye so likewise. Though in Justification, Fiat ubi secundum fidem tuam; be it unto thee according to thy faith: yet in salvation; Reddetur unicuique secundum opera sua; every man shall be rewarded according to his works. Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God. They must lead virtuous lives on earth, that ever expect in heaven to see the Lord JESUS.

All this while we have considered virtue in the larger acception; comprehensive of all the rest. Strictly Saint Augustine defines it to be nothing else, but Diligere diligendum; to love that is to be loved. Thus it hath a sweet reference to all the graces following. Id diligere, Scientia est, &c. To love this is knowledge; not to be seduced from it by allurements, is Temperance: not to be removed from it by calamity, is Patience: to do this for God's cause, is Godliness: to communicate it to others, is brotherly kindness: to dilate it to all men, is Charity. Ambrose knowledge seeks virtue, Temperance finds it, Patience suffers for it, Godliness possesseth it, Charity communicates it. These are so linked together with a golden chain of harmony; like the Tabernacles curtains of blew silk; that pull one, pull all. Hath any man virtue? he must have knowledge: In nesciente non est virtutis habitus: the ignorant are not capable of the habit of virtue. If there be knowledge, temperance will follow: for folly is the mother of Surfet, and digges the own grave with the teeth: but abstinence is the daughter of wisdom. If Temperance, then surely there will be Patience: Temperantia injuriam non facit, Tolerantia patitur. Temperance doth no wrong, Patience suffers it. He that abhors to hurt others, will much less hurt himself. If Patience, there must needs be Piety; for the Thanke-worthy patience is that, which for conscience toward God, endureth wrongful grief. If we be content to suffer evil for God, surely we will do for God. If Godliness go before, fraternall kindness will follow after. For no man can love the invisible God, and hate his visible brother, If kindness to our brother in CHRIST; then Charity to all. A heathen will be kind to his friends, a Christian must be charitable to his enemies. This is a golden chain: the wicked have a chain, their pride compasseth them about as a Chaine: Funas peccatorum, the cords or chain of their sins; one end whereof reaches to hell. But this chain is tied to heaven by the one end thereof; fasten the other end to thy conscience, it shall draw thee up thither.

The Papists say, Images are the books of Idiots, but the Prophet calls them Teachers of lies: and all know that they are occasions of sin. Let me give you a Picture without the offense;

behold an Image without sin. It is of Virtue: you shall not sooner see the medalls but you will strait know the face. Conceive her a virgin Intemeratae pudicitiae, of an unspotted chastity; fair, yet never courted with a lascivious language. She hath a face white as is heaven mixed with some lovely red; White with her own innocence, ruddy with blushing at others naughtiness. Of her Savior's complexion; My beloved is white and ruddy. She hath a brow clear as Crystal, wherein God hath written Sapientia, Wisdom. This is her courage; she may be affronted, she cannot be affrighted. She hath eyes that never sent out a wanton look: those casements were never opened to let in vanity. She is not poring with them on the earth; but Nititur erectos ad sydera tollere vultus; directs them to heaven where they shall one day see her desire, even the glory of GOD, Thou hast ravished my heart, my spouse, with one of thine eyes. The LORD loves those eyes. She hath lips like a thread of scarlet, and her speech is comely, Cant. 4.3. She hath the tongue of Angels; when she speaks, she ministers grace to the hearers. She discourseth the language of Canaan most perfectly: and never opens but the first air she breaths, echo's with the praise of her maker. Her ears are like the Sanctum Sanctorum of the Temple; none but the high Priest must enter there. They are stopd to the songs of any Siren, open to the mournings of any poor. What gracious words she receives in at those doors, she sends them like Jewels to be laid up in the Cabinet of her heart. She hath two hands; one of equity, another of of charity, none for injury. She gives everyone his due for Justices sake, some more than their due for mercies sake. She gives, forgives, does that to others which she expects at the hands of CHRIST. She hath bowels of mercy; the members of Christ are as dear to her, as her most inward and vital parts. She feeds them, as considering what it were to have empty bowels her self. Her knees were never stiffened with pride: she can easily bow them to give her Superior homage: but throws them down at the foot-stool of her maker: yet still her heart is lower, and she never riseth without a pardon. Her feet are still travelling the ways of piety, and running the race of salvation. She knows this life is a journey, and no time to stand still, therefore she is shod for the purpose, with the Preparation of the Gospel of peace: she never rests, till she is gotten within the thresholds of heaven. She hath a white silken garment, the snow of Lebanon is black to it: not woven out of the bowels of worms, but out of the side of her Savior. She is clothed all over with his righteousness, which makes her beautiful in the sight of her maker. She is girt with the Girdle of Truth: and sins not, not because she cannot, but because she will not. For virtus non est non posse peccare, sed nolle; Augu. She hath a Crown promised, blessedness: her Redeemer, even the King of heaven, did bequeath it her in his will, and she shall wear it in eternal glory, And let every soul, that knows and loves her on earth, or hopes to enjoy her reward in heaven, call her Blessed.

To your virtue, knowledge. Virtue without knowledge were like a beautiful damsel blind: or a fair house that hath not a window in it, virtue is like a pearl in the shell; there must be knowledge to break the shell, or we cannot come at the pearl. Ignorance is dangerous: Non repugnant, qui impugnari se nesciunt. Thus the devil carries many to hell, as falconers carry their hooded hawks, without baiting. Quis non senserit illum miserabilem, qui se nunquam sensit miserum? There is no wretchedness so pitiable, as that which is not known to the sufferer. Qui Dominum nesciunt, a Domino nesciuntur: If men will not know God, God will not know them. Scire Dei, est approbare; nescire, reprobare. Therefore he sends away the wicked with a Nescio vos, I know you not: but Novit qui sui sunt; the Lord knows them that are his, Hos. 8.4. They have made Princes, and I knew it not: that is, I did not approve of it: wilt thou not know? thou shalt not be acknowledged.

The work of regeneration begins at illumination. The first thing that sunk in our first parents, was knowledge: now where the wound began, there must begin the medicine. Thou seest in a tree buds, leaves, flowers, and fruits and bark and pith: yet all these are but the juice diversely digested and sent forth. So here in a Christian, Faith, Virtue, Temperance, Patience, Charity, Godliness: yet all these are out the knowledge of Christ diversely concorded: knowledge is lux virtutis.

The Papists indeed magnify Ignorance: good reason, for Ignorance magnifies them. Our way to heaven is knowledge, perhaps they have a way by themselves. Like Owls, they keep a whooting in the dark, but are blind in the broad day; never ask them poor souls, as Philip the Eunuch; understandest thou what thou readest? but doest thou read at all? No, we may not be suffered to read. It will be very hard for a man to stumble over the threshold of heaven, or to go blindfold to salvation.

Concupiscence though ever sinful, yet could not bring forth sin without the consent of reason: and this would never consent so long as the eyes were open. For sin is a thing so ugly and deformed, and so like the father the devil; that it is unreasonable for a man's soul to yield to it. Hence Paul calls sin a work of darkness: for Satan doth hide it from us in the Birth, and would hide it from us in the Growth, only on our death-bed and anguish of soul, he shows it us in the Fruit. In this sense, that may rightly be understood, Nemo sciens peccat; that no man sins knowingly, at the very instant of the committing. Though he have the habit of knowledge in the general, yet hath he lost it in the particular. As we say of the Coward; There is fear in his heart, even while he feareth not; in regard of the habit. And the slave hath an habitual service upon him, even when he sleeps: he serves though he takes his ease. There may be the habit of knowledge in the mind, yet not the use of it in some special act. The devil to utter his damned commodities, dealeth as some trades-men about their bad wares; puts out the true lights, and sets up false lights in their stead. In the time of Superstition he put out verbum Praedicatum, the word preached; that man did scarce know sin in general. In these days of profaneness, he puts out verbum applicatum, the word applied, that few consider what sin is in practice. So that now, he that coming from the mount as Moses; and hearing the worlds confused noise; would think it the noise of war; conquering or conquered: but being among them, he finds it the noise of joy and dancing, revelling and roaring. Not because men do not know these sins in general: but they will not know them in these particular facts. Lust like a thick smoke dimmes the eye of knowledge.

Now the means to prevent this wickedness, is to keep open the eye of knowledge. This is done both by the doctrine of Truth in general: and the application thereof in special. The general knowledge of truth is more easy; for which of us is ignorant what sin is knowledge while she walks in generals, is in her own Jurisdiction: sense and affection hath nothing to do with her; but she may freely give her sentence. Loe then she dares calls usury, usury; and not a moderate improvement of money: Pride, pride; and not handsomenesse: Covetousness by the own name, and nor thirstinesse. But when she descends to particulars, wherein all actions do consist and disputeth whether this or that special act be sin or not; here sense and affection put in for a part, challenges an interest, and overweighs. And as it is in an ill pick'd (or as we say) pack'd Jury; whereof there is one wise man, another honest man, five knaves and five fools: the greater part over-rules the better part, these ten over-bear those two. The five senses, and as many Affections, are the knaves and the fools; Science is the wise man, Conscience the honest: now neither Science the wise, nor Conscience the honest, can be heard, nor give in their verdict; but all goes with the mad senses and frantic affections.

Here we see the use of Preachers, who may speak freely, and help us to retain the truth in particular. Admonition is called by the Greeks κατανοησις (in non-Latin alphabet); as it were a restoring or putting of the mind in order. When the understanding is (as it were) besides itself, and out of joint; transported with some sudden passion, or prevented by an evil custom, this repairs it. So Paul delivers the use of it, Eph. 4.12. κατανοησις (in non-Latin alphabet); the putting again in joint of luxate members. This continual public Preaching is necessary; as a Taper set on the table to give light to all in the house. If this light wast itself, what hurt does it to thee? yea if it go out in the own stench, yet it lightens thee so long as it lasts. But thou sayest; Consilium mihi non det, qui sibi non dat: let not me take counsel of him, that gives none to himself. Yet he might build an Ark for Noah, that was himself drowned in the flood: he may light thee to heaven, though himself go darkling to another place. Woe to him if he do not preach: if he do preach, take thy portion. Quod bene dicit, tuum est; quod male vivit, suum est. But if he preach not, thou mayst perish. Where if you had good eyes and thankful hearts, you would see and acknowledge how God hath blessed you more than the Romanists. The devil was feigned to send a letter of commendations to the Popish Clergy. Amongst many other things he thanks them for their ignorance; but especially for their silence. For settling our estate we require a learned Lawyer; for our sick body a learned Physician: and for the soul that is most precious, shall we not desire a learned Divine? In law thou canst but hazard thy estate; in Physic thou ventur'st but a mortal life: but here thou mayest lose thy soul. The body dies, the Physician is paid: let the state be lost, thy Lawyer hath his Fees before. But if the Minister save thy soul, yet he is not regarded, not rewarded: if he lose it by willful negligence, he hath lost himself. Thus requisite are Preachers to give the light of Knowledge. But yet if in this night of sin we will do any profitable work, we must either ourselves have a particular light of our own in our hands; or if we cannot, we must get another to hold the candle to us, that we may see the deformity of sin; lest Knowledge being blinded, and Lust leading the way, we both fall into the pit of destruction. John the Baptist was Christ's Harbinger, and went before him, that is the glory of heaven. Knowledge is like John, that shining Lamp, without that, we cannot find the way to the glory of heaven, nor be brought to CHRIST. Thus in general; now let us further observe five conclusions.

1 That by Knowledge is here meant an insight into heavenly things. Indeed Augustine distinguisheth between Knowledge and Wisdom; Ad Sapientiam pertinet aeternarum rerum cognitio intellectualis: ad scientiam temporalium rerum cognitio naturalis: Wisdom, saith he, is an intellectual apprehension of eternal things: Knowledge a natural apprehension of temporal things. But there is no true Knowledge, but that which can make the knowers blessed. Christian wisdom seems the worlds folly, Greg. What is more foolish than mentem verbis ostendere, to declare a man's meaning in his words? to bless them that curse us? Mala libentiùs ferre quàm sacere, to suffer rather, than to do evil? not to resist our oppressors? Yet this is Christ's commended wisdom; and he that is Sapientia Patris, the wisdom of the Father, shall one day crown it: Yet there may be a holy knowledge in these lower things. O would to God thou wert wise, and wouldest understand and know the last things! Vt Saperes quae Dei sunt, intelligeres quae mundi sunt, praevideres quae inferni sunt, Bern. That thou wert wise in the things of God, wouldest understand the vanities of this world, and fore-see the torments of hell. Profecto Inferna horreres, superna appeteres, quae ad manum sunt contemneres. Thou wouldest abhor the plagues of hell, desire the joys of heaven, despise the temptations of earth. The great affection we bear to the world, shows that we know it not.

2 The Apostles earnest exhortation to Knowledge, intimates that naturally we want it. Aristotle compares our wits at the beginning to a fair table, whereon is nothing written, but it is apt to receive all forms and figures. But he is deceived, for it is a dark vault, wherein is no light of Grace, and no more of the light of Nature than the little spark or snuff affords. The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God. By nature he is subject to two enemies of knowledge, Ignorance, and Error. By Ignorance we know not things necessary, by Error we know them falsely. Ignorance is a privation, Error a positive obliquitie. All ignorance cannot be helped, all errors cannot be escaped. From ignorance comes vice, from error Heresy. Many striving to expel ignorance, fall into error: as an Empiricke to cure one disease, causeth a worse; so quenching thirst with a draught of poison. Some are tantae fatuitatis, so deeply possessed with folly, that they scarce differ from beasts. Hence we see that Knowledge is not easily had; Veritas in profundo latet. In the West-Indies, they that by digging, follow the veins of gold, run under high mountains and stony rocks, many miles: yet the interest of Oare sufficiently defrayeth the expenses of labor. But knowledge is attained not without greater difficulty: for the soul in the body, as a prisoner in a dungeon, takes in nothing but thorough the grate; sees only thorough windows and cloudy spectacles. The wisdom of the world is foolishness with God. Therefore the first way to Knowledge is, Scire quod nescias, to know thine own ignorance. Qui se diligit stultum, non proficiet ad sapientiam: nec fiet quisque qualis esse cupit, nisi oderit qualis est, August. He that doates on his own folly hath no hope of wisdom; nor can a man become what he would be, unless he hates being what he is. They can never come to true wisdom, whom the opinion of their own false wisdom deceiveth. Let no man deceive himself, 1 Cor. 3.18. If any man among you seemeth to be wise, let him become a fool that he may be wise. Confess thy Ignorance, this is the way to get knowledge.

3 That Knowledge is not the cause of sin, but Ignorance: for Virtue is begotten and nourished by Knowledge. Scientia praecedit virtutis cultum, Chrysost. Knowledge must go before virtue: for man desires not that he knows not: Et malum nisi cognitum non timetur; Vnknowne evil is not feared. Indeed there may be a disjunction of these two in respect of their moral parts. So there may be Virtus sine scientia, and Scientia sine virtute. The Heathen had virtue without knowledge, and we have knowledge without virtue. But as theirs was not true virtue, absent sapientiâ, without knowledge; so, nor is ours true knowledge, absent virtute, without virtue.

There may be a servant that knows his masters will, and doth it not. And this shall ggravate his wretchedness; Scire quod sequi debeat, & nolle sequi quod sciat; To know that he should follow, and not to follow what he doth know. The Sun does not heat all men to whom it shines; nor doth knowledge, when it hath taught men, Quid sit faciendum, What is to be done; Continuo accendit ad faciendum, presently inflame or enable them to the doing of it. Aliud est divitias scire, aliud possidere: nec facit divitem cognitio, sed possessio; It is one thing to know where riches are, another thing to be master of them. It is not the knowledge, but the possession of them, that makes rich. But to say that knowledge is a spurr to wickedness; is all one as if a father training up his son to be an archer; another should tell him that by aiming most fairly, he should miss most foully. No certainly; there is no Virtue can batten or thrive, but that which sucks on the breasts of Knowledge.

4 Seeing we must join with our Faith Knowledge, it is manifest that an ignorant faith is no faith. The Papists stand hard for their implicit faith; it is enough they say. Their proof is Matth. 8.26. Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith! As if there were no difference betwixt Exiguam & Implicitam fidem; between a little faith, and an implicit faith: between a little man and a great Elephant: the little one is a man, and the great one is a beast: Between a little Star, and a great cloud: that is true light, this is very darkness: that turns to water, this remains fire still. A little faith with knowledge is true and saving: a great presumption with ignorance is damning. A small tree is better than a great shadow: that may bear fruit, this is nothing. A juggler could never show more tricks, than they with this involved faith: they are very like; for these also cast a mist before men's eyes, and juggle away their souls, when the Devil comes with his fiery darts, their shield of faith is so wrap'd up that they cannot find it. It is like ware in a Pedlers-pack, mislaid; he hath it, but he knows not where it is. It is truly called Fides carbonaria, the Colliers faith: the Devil catechiseth him; how doest thou believe? I believe as the Church believes. How believes the Church? as I believe: this man was saved, say they; but for all that, I do not think that the Devil and the Collier so soon parted. Sure if he had no better weapons, Satan would have another boat with him, and such a one as would cost him his soul. Believe as the Church believes, we ask you no more: this and the sign of the Cross is sufficient: O the multitude of souls they thus beguile! But add to your faith Knowledge: Fides nescia is fides nulla: They that know thy name, will trust in thee. They that know not what they should believe, cannot believe to their own comfort.

5 Lastly, this Knowledge must be added to Virtue also. The Romists love all blind graces: they commend Caecam fidem, caecam obedientiam; A blind faith, a blind obedience, a blind devotion, whose mother is ignorance. But the Apostle bids us add Knowledge to these: and Virtue it self, luster it with what gloss of obedience and devotion they can, I say not, Pede claudicat uno, goes halting toward heaven: but Oculis orbat utrisque; is like a sicled Dove, it would mount to heaven, and hovers upward; but strikes at a tree, and falls; if it want knowledge to direct it. But why should I say, Virtue without Knowledge is blind, when indeed it is not at all. A man may do Bonum, good, and not know it: but not Bene well; true virtue is not without knowledge. But as some do ill, and yet think it good: so others do good, and yet think it ill. For the former, Whosoever killeth you, will think that he doth God service. For the latter, Joseph's mistress meant him a shrewd turn in betraying him to prison, which was Joseph's step to promotion. Or as the thief wounded a passenger, and intended to kill him, yet with his stroke cut and let out an ulcer, whereof he was ready to die: neither of these can be called virtue. For good and well must in all actions meet: wicked is not much worse than indiscreet. Knowledge without Virtue, makes a man's Mittimus to hell. If ye were blind, you should have no sin: but now you say, we see, therefore your sin remaineth. Like the woman, Luke 15.8. that hath a Candle in her hand: but as the Romish vulgar did read it, instead of Domum everrit, Domum evertit: so these, instead of sweeping the house, pull it quite down. So much light abused on earth, so much darkness inflicted in hell. Virtue without Knowledge, is either like Laodicea, proud, and knows not whereof; or mad, and knows not what to do. I conclude, John. 9.6. Christ made a medicine for the blind man's eyes, of his own spittle, and the earth's clay. The first, signifying the knowledge of Christ by his Word, that comes out of his mouth: the other, the knowledge of ourselves, who being made of earth, do naturally favor of nothing but clay. Now of both these materials Christ made one lump, tempering them together: so both these knowledges must be so mell'd together, that they be not severed. To have the Clay, knowledge of ourselves; without the Spittle, knowledge of Christ; were to cast us down to desperation. To have the Spittle, knowledge of Christ; without the Clay, knowledge of ourselves, and our own unworthiness, would puff us up with presumption. Both do well together, that we may know our own selves in ourselves wretched; yet in the grace and comforts of God, everlastingly blessed.

Will you now take a short character of the knowing man? He desires to know all things, but first himself; lest having acquaintance in every place, he should die a stranger to his own heart. And in himself, nor so much his strength as his weakness. To know our own virtues makes us proud; our own vices humbleth us. Both his eyes are never at once from home: one keeps house, while the other goes abroad for intelligence. He is blind in no man's cause, but best sighted in his own. He confines himself to the circle of his own affairs, and thrusts not his finger into needless fires. His hearts desire is to know God; and he knows there is no better way to know him, than through Jesus Christ. Herein consists his happiness, for so he makes sure-work for his soul. It is the best, and therefore first regarded; and he never rests til his faith be built on assurance, that God hath pardoned his sins, and given him a place in heaven. The world he so far seeks to know, that he may abhor it. He sees the falseness of it, and therefore learns to trust himself ever, others so far as not to be damaged by their disappointment. He knows this to be a short and miserable life, and therefore studies the way to a blessed and eternal one. That this world shall perish, therefore is loath to perish with it. That money may make a man richer, not better; and therefore chooseth rather to sleep with a good conscience, than a full purse. He had rather the world should account him a fool, than God: therefore desires no more wealth than an honest man may bear away. He knows this world's delight consists of crotchets and short songs, whose burden is sorrow: only heaven hath the best music, where glorious Angels and Saints sing forever to the Lord of Hosts. He knows his own ignorance, endeavors to science; and for what he cannot apprehend, he begs wisdom of God; not of everything, but only of so much as may make him blessed. He knows how to make his passions, like good servants, to stand in a diligent attendance, ready at the command of Reason, of Religion. If any of them forgetting their duty, be miscarried to rebel; he first conceals the mutiny, then suppresseth it. He will not see every wrong done him, knowing he hath done more to his Maker. After continual acquaintance with the Scriptures, and humble familiarity with the Holy Ghost; he knows the way to heaven perfectly, and runs apace till he gets into the arms of his Savior.

Verse 6.

And to Knowledge, Temperance.

This grace of Temperance may be here diversely understood:

1 For such a discretion as may season all these graces: so taken it is, Sal omnium virtutum, the salt of every virtue. Devotion without discretion, is like an hasty servant that runs away without his errand. Profession of Faith without Temperance, is turned into hypocrisy, or such a preposterous zeal; that is, like fire not on the hearth to warm, but in the top of the chimney, to set the house on a flame: Virtue without it is folly: Virtus cum indiscrete tenetur, amittitur: cum discrete intermittitur, plus tenetur; A man may so indiscreetly hold Virtue, as to lose it: another may so discreetly forbear meddling, that he doth more firmly hold it. Patience without discretion wrongs a good cause: a man must bear his own injuries patiently, but not GOD'S nor the Churches. Moses egit causam populi ad Deum precibus & lacrymis, causam Dei adversus populum gladio & vindictis; Moses pleaded the people's cause to GOD with prayers and tears; but GOD'S cause against the people with sword and vengeance. Godliness without Temperance, is Devotion out of the wits. Gregory observes on the vision of the four Cherubims, Ezek. 1.10. That the first proportion of those creatures faces, was vultus hominis, the countenance of a man, which saith he did Rationem denotare; signify discretion or this temperance. See them allegorized: the Just man by mortification of the flesh becomes a Calf ready to be sacrificed: by fortitude in his spiritual war, fi Leo vincens, he is a conquering Lion: by contemplation of the celestial glory, Aquila triumphans, he is a triumphant Eagle: Per rationem Temperantiae homo exemplaris; By reason of his Temperance, he is an exemplary Man. Brotherly kindness without Temperance, is brotherly dotage. So kindness runs into cruelty: thou feedest thy friends sensual appetite, flatterest him in his lusts, concealest his faults, followest his humors; all in kindness: this is to spill his soul in kindness. Charity lastly, without Temperance, is Prodigality: it gives Expansâ manu, sed caeco oculo, with an open hand, and shut eye; and so a man may for his charity go to the Devil, when instead of God's friends, he rewards his enemies. Thus hath Temperance relation to all these graces.

2 For such a Discretion as may moderate Knowledge; and qualify that heat to which it is addicted. Knowledge puffeth up. Some men so bluster on their knowledge, that they hold all the world dunces besides themselves. There is somewhat of poison in it, without the Corrective of Temperance. Hence comes singularity of opinions; Some conceit themselves so wise, that all the sober and peaceable spirits of the Land are mere fools to them. Poor souls! Who does not pity their blind madness? One cries, Secreta mea mihi; My mysteries be to myself: another replies, Stultitia tua tibi; thy foolishness be to thyself: the former is the Schismatic, the other the Libertine. An indifferent man might decide; Nec uni, nec alteri, sed dividatur: let not all the folly be to one, nor all to other, but let them both part it betwixt them. One is so wise that he cares for no Preacher at all; another wills that such a factious one shall teach him, and nobody else. Whether is the madder of the two; he that will altogether fast, or he that will feed on nothing but bones? Modus rei tribuit decorem, ordo modum, discretio ordinem. The grace of an action is the Manner, the grace of the Manner is Order, the grace of the Order is Discretion. Temperance is not so much a virtue it self; as Quaedam moderatrix & auriga virtutum; as a Marshall or Moderatour of virtues. It is not enough to do a good work; Nisi illud suo loco, modo, tempore feceris; unless the due place, fit manner, and convenient time, be observed. If not in the right place, it is as a man lights a taper, and puts it beside the candle-stick. If not after the right manner, it is as one that is gone a good part of his travel; but must come back again, because he hath mistaken his way. If not in due time, it is like him that would never water his garden, but when it rained. If not to the right person, it is like a man that forgetfully salutes his friend ever by the wrong name. If nor to the right end, it is like Julian, that never was bountiful, or did a man a good turn, but to damn his soul.

3 It is taken for such a moderation of the mind, whereby we so demean ourselves, as neither to surfeit on fullness, nor to despair on want. Not that the most temperate man can so master his passions, but that at sometimes he may over-joy his content, or over-grieve his trouble. When the most equal weights are first put into the evenest balances, there is a little swaying on both sides, and appearance of some inequality: yet after a little motion they settle themselves in a just poise. This Temperance is a steady and habitual firmness, that hath no critical sins. The frantic, though he be sober eleven moons, if he rage one, cannot avoid the imputation of madness. When there is no disturbance, to be quiet, is not worth God-a-mercy. The husband told his wife, that he had one ill quality; he was given to be angry without cause: she wittily replied, that she would keep him from that fault, for she would give him cause enough. It is the folly of some that they will be offended without cause, to whom the world promises that they shall have causes enow. In the world ye shall have tribulation; when this cause of disquiet comes, then to be resolved and peaceful, this is Temperance. The balances that are most ill matched in their unsteady motions, yet come to an equality, but stay not at it. The perverse worldling may restrain his passion; yea, may be so well composed, that ordinary things shall not stir him; but when a new and unlooked for cross comes, then he is out of Temper, hath lost Temperance. Like a Fencer, that stands upon his usual wards and postures, and plays well in his school: but abroad he meets with a new trick, a blow that quite puts him from the rules of his art, and so is beaten with shame. Indeed the best man's Temperance may fail in one particular act, but this doth not take away the habit from him.

This Temperance must guide our conversation. God's Sacrifice and Service must be Reasonable. Cum fervor discretionem erigit, & discretio fervorem dirigit, Bern. Let Zeal inflame Temperance, and Temperance qualify Zeal. Nimia remissio nutritiva criminum, nimia districtio parricida virtutum. Too much remissness nourisheth vices, too much strictness killeth virtues. Without this moderation, Fear passeth into Despair, Griefe into Bitterness, Love into Flattery, Hope into Presumption, Joy into Dissolutenes, Anger into Fury: The want of Temperance instead of cherishing, destroys: like the Idolater so rap'd with the fair Image of the Goddess, that coming to kiss it, he bit it. It altogether over-does. Be not righteous over-much, neither make thyself over-wise. Qui plus posse putat sua quam natura ministrat: Posse suum superans, se minus esse potest. But enough of this kind of Temperance; men are not so hot that we need to cool them; but rather so cold that we had need to heat them. Few among us are so over-zealous to out-run Christ, it is well if yet we will follow Christ. We need not so much add temper to your zeal, as zeal to your temper; and wish you so much of both, as may bring you to salvation.

4 Lastly, Temperance is taken for a moderate use of outward things; and comprehends in it Abstinence, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : when we eat no more, drink no more, go no braver, than natural equity and moral decency requires. Now if the first degree to Virtue be vitium fugere, to avoid the contrary; behold the beauty of this fair grace, by viewing the blackness of the opposite sin, Intemperance. Generally it extends it self to all immoderations; but especially it is appropriated to four. There is Intemperance: 1. In Lust, so it is called Incontinence. 2. In apparel, so it is called Pride. 3. In meats, so it is called Gluttony. 4. In drinks, so it is called Drunkenness. All which are but the effects of Intemperance.

First, Incontinence: to this Intemperance all are naturally prone, but in a different sort. Some quite expel and mortify this desire by grace: for he that is One spirit with Christ, will scorn to be one flesh with an Harlot. The virginity of the body may be lost, and yet the soul preserve her maiden-head. These are they which were not defiled with women, for they are virgins. This is not intended against marriage, there is no defilement in that. Marriage is honorable among all men, and the bed undefiled, Hebr. 13.4. Our Adversaries call it a Sacrament; what, and a defilement too? Do they use to make Sacraments of pollutions? They might be married, yet not defiled with women; neither with carnal nor spiritual harlotrie, nor with adultery nor idolatry; and so remain spiritual virgins. Others there are that keep in this corruption by civil modesty; they will not express it, yet have it. Many heathens could thus suppress their corruption, not mortify it. Their Intemperance is to them like a mad-brained wife to a sober man; he locks her up, and goes abroad without trouble; but when he comes home he is wearied with her scolding. Others there are that care not to let their Intemperance burst out, but they want opportunity: now the thief cannot rob till he come at a bootie. So the sin is in them, even while they forbear the act, and they are intemperate persons. There is a sort that shame not the eruption of this sin, without respect (I say not of conscience, but) of credit: Quorum luxuriae meretrix non sufficit omnis; That in the lust offed horses neigh after women. The means to avoid this Intemperance, is:

1 By subduing the body to the soul; I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection. The body is that part, which is against the LORD. The body will beg, but let a shameless beggar have a shameless denial. When the body does what the good soul dictates, there is a breathing Saint: when the soul consents to the bodies appetite, there is a blind man led by his dog. Because the Serpents head had led the way so long, now the repining tail would needs lead; but then the whole ran into mischief. When lust undertakes to guide a man, and reason is fain to follow, there is a precipice to destruction.

2 By debarring the flesh all lust-provoking meats and drinks. It is wretched to have this noisome fire, wicked to feed it with fuel. Sodom found that Fullness of bread was the mother of unnatural filthiness. High diet is adulteries nurse: Raro vidi continentem, quem non vidi abstinentem, August. You shall seldom see a man continent, that is not abstinent. The heat is taken at a Tavern, that is, laid at a brothel-house. Abstain then, for it is fasting-spittle that must kill this tetter. He that will ever be running for fuel, never meant to put out the fire.

3 By avoiding beautiful temptations. Flee fornication: Resist other sins, flee this. Stand not to try thy strength, but run away. Parthus tutus ab host suga est. Joseph stood not to bandie terms, and dispute with his mistress, but fled from her. If thou wilt endure conference with an Harlot, she will conquer. Like Vlisses, stop thine ears, her charms shall not take thee. Many have run out of their wits for women, 1 Esdr. 4.26. Satan having conquered the woman, never came at the man, but left the woman to do that; he thought she would be devil enough to tempt man. Solomon with all his wisdom, Sampson with all his strength, were thus master'd. One overcame a Lion, yet a Lioness overcame him. The other could find out the Harlot from the true mother; yet a Harlot found out him, and made him forget his Maker. The people began to commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab. The daughters of Moab, light by nature, for they were begot in Incest. Lots daughter lay with her own father while he was drunk, and called her son Moab; which signifies, The son of her father. Impudent strumpet, not to be ashamed of so foul and horrible a fact! Thus they were light, and that by nature; they had it by kind, it cost them nothing. Even the sons of GOD were tempted to folly by the daughters of men, Gen. 6. A woman fair is man's snare: think them thy she-devils, sent and taught to seduce and spill thy soul. Meretrix quo pulchrior, eo perniciosior, Aug. A Harlot the more beautiful, the more baneful. Rara concordia formae & pudicitiae; It is rare to see a woman chaste that's poor and fair. Stat quaevis quavis meretrix mercabilis art. Bring gold enough, a little cunning shall serve for whoredom; the Devil makes his high-ways easy. Perhaps all do not sell their bodies, that sell their souls; some sin, but set no price on it. I am persuaded that no one Inducement so soon turns women to Popery, as their Indulgence to this sin. Venialia dicunt, sed vaenalia sunt; If God would afford pardons on the Popes rates, this sin would be infinite. But non sic respondetur Domino: His Justice will not be so answered.

4 By meditating on the punishment. If in the act of thy lust thou couldst see into the dark doors of hell, and behold the adulterers and their harlots embracing flames, quenchlesse flames; howling, and shrieking, and cursing their glasses, their tires, their Bawds, their Panders; bound to eternity of insufferable horrors: this would cool thy heat. For lustful kisses, kissing of fire; for soft beds, beds of despair; for wanton songs, gnawing their tongues; for heating delicates, everlasting famishment; for silken curtens, to wish a Rock for their pillow, and a Mountain for their coverlet: this, O this would slacken thine intemperance. What men think most pleasing, is most plaguing; to have their lusts granted: So I gave them up unto their own hearts lust. They desired it, they had it; this was the greatest plague. Think thou seest beyond thy beauty old-age, beyond old-age sickness, beyond sickness death, beyond death Judgment, beyond Judgment hell, beyond that no limits of time or torments, but all easeless, endless. Thou criest, God be merciful to me; but be also merciful to thyself: weep for thy sins, and beseech God to mortify thy lusts by the death of Christ.

2 The second kind of Intemperance is in Apparel, Pride, Pride? why there is no such sin, all is but fashion. Indeed Pride hath lost it self in the name of Fashion. This was wont to be called the woman's sin: The daughters of Zion were hautie, &c. there is Pride and her wardrobe. But now it is a question whether the women keep their Charter still: the men have endeavored to be as proud as they; not that the other are excusable: innumerable are their boxes, and powders, and paintings; how they daub their mud-walls with Apothecaries mortar! It is a sign that they love a vizzard better than a face. God shall smite thee, thou painted wall: painting is for walls, not for faces. If Natures defects and furrows cannot be filled up with these colors, yet art shall supply all with rich attires. As that Painter should have drawn Venus very beautiful: but when his cunning failed in her face, he drew her in exceeding rich apparel: Pulchram non potuit, divitem pinxit; Because he could not make her fair, he made her rich. They die their hairs too; but this seems to be no new fashion. For Cyprian writes of it in his time: Foeminae crines suos inficiunt malo praesagio: capillos enim sibi flammineos auspicari non metuunt. They got a flame-coloured hair, an ill presage; it is not safe coming so near to that color. They spend more time betwixt the comb and the glass, than betwixt their family and the Church. They metamorphose their heads, as if they were ashamed of the head of God's making, proud of the Tire-woman's. Sometimes one tire is half the husbands rent-day. This is the monstrousnesse of our pride; and what shall we do in the end thereof? Jezebel was the daughter of a King, the wife of a King, the mother of a King, yet her painted face and proud heart threw her out at the window, and she was trampled under horses feet. But Jehu would bury her; no, the dogs had done it to his hand. O the greatness of our lands Intemperance this way! we have learned all things of our neighbors but this, to be proud good-cheap. Hospitalitie and noble attendance is changed into a vessel that runs on four wheels: It is a fashion to build great houses, as the Estriches lay eggs; and then to leave them. When the poor come thither for relief, there's none but Daws to chatter to them; the Lord or the Knight is at London; their Mercers and taylors share the poor's due. Great men gather up their wealth and their credit nearer about them, than in former times. Then it consisted in good house keeping and many servants: now in two or three trunkes of apparel and a boy to brush them. Many follow Absalom's fashion, to carry a forest of hair on their heads: as if that were their grace, which God hath forbidden as ungracious. CHRIST says, the body is more worth than raiment: but some strive to make their rayments more worth than their bodies: like birds of paradise; their feathers are better than their carcasses. To pull down, if it were possible, the height of this pride, consider.

1 Thy beginning; remember the rock from whence thou wert hewn. From following the ewes great with young, he brought him to feed Jacob his people: David was not ashamed of his beginning. Say thou art borne noble; yet art thou not made de meliore luto, of any finer clay or metal than the meanest. We have all one common mother: and the proudest dust once dead, shall putrefy and stink for all his perfumes so soon as the poorest. Though all have not vestem communem, yet all have Cutem communem.

2 Thy progress: what can thy brave rags better thee? a golden bridle makes not the better horse. If thy coat be made of wool, the sheep wore it before thee: if of silk, the silly worm may pull down thy pride. The bowels of worms hath clothed thee, and thou shalt feed the bowels of worms. Because thou flourishest with the flags of vanity; thou thinkest it is thyself, like the fly on the coach wheel, that makes so glorious a dust: so let Heliogabalus boast of his silken halters.

3 Whatsoever the outside be, look to the linings. Men's cujusque is est quisque. The body is more worth than the raiment; therefore the soul is more worth than the body; for the body is but the raiment of the soul. Why despisest thou thy poor brother? I have more lands: haply, and more sins. I have braver apparel: a neat outside, and a sluttish inside. I am fairer; perhaps in face, and fouler in heart. Thou art rich in the poor commodities of this world: and poor in the rich commodities of the other: peacocke look down to thy feet.

4 There is only one garment worth having and saving. Put you on the Lord Jesus Christ: this is Stola prima, the best robe. The Papists buy the beggarly righteousness of sorry Saints, and neglect this. We have worn our own innocence to rags, let us put on Christ's. Though our garment of inherent righteousness be very thin; yet if it be lined with Christ's imputed righteousness, it shall keep us warm: if embroidered with his, it shall make us acceptable to God. If we love a silken garment woven out of the bowels of a worm: how much more should we love the garment woven out of the bowels of Jesus Christ! Thus hath God allowed to some a great measure of honor, a great measure of riches, a great measure of prosperity; but to none one dram of pride.

The third kind of Intemperance is in meats; in making those things Detrimenta corporis, injuries to the body; which God ordained to be Nutrimenta corporis, conservatives of the body. Good meat which is the creature of God, is offered to the art of the Cook, who makes work for the mouth, which makes work for the stomach, which makes work for surfeit, which makes work for death, which makes work for the devil. A sin so genuine and natural to this nation; that pride is not more proper to Spain, nor lust to France, nor drunkenness to Germany, than gluttony is to England. For methods sake, let me deswade you from it, by considering the manner, the measure, the matter, the Effects, the End of it.

1 For the manner, this is merely circumstantial, and may thus be expressed. Too soon: too late, too daintily: too fast, too much, Is gluttony Too soon Woe unto thee Oh Land, When thy Princes eat in the morning: but blessed art thou Oh Land, When thy Princes eat in due season, for strength and not for drunkenness. Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning to follow riot. Their mattins is their lunkets, and their morning sacrifice is offered to their belly. Too late, such are midnight revells: Nullum tempus occurrit ventri: Intemperance makes no difference of times. Too daintily; above the estate: and herein the poor may fault as soon as the rich; Tam late, if not Tam laute. Indeed men have Talem dentem, Qualem mentem. Everyone hath an Eves sweet-tooth in his head, that longs for forbidden things. Too fast, that is with voracitie; we call it Caninum appetitum. Greedy dogs that can never have enough. Too much: Qui minus tradit corpori quàm debet corpori, civem necat: Qui plus tradit corpori quàm debet corpori, hostem nutrit. He that allows his body less than he owes it, kills his friend: he that allows his body more than he owes it, frankes his enemy. Give it Quantum sufficiat naturae, not Quantum place atgulae. The wise man will distinguish between his body and the lust of his body: his allowance therefore shall be such as may preserve nature, not please intemperance.

2. For the measure; it is an insatiate desire of delicacies. So the rich man said; Soul eat, for thou hast, &c. not only body eat, but soul eat, and satiate thyself. The belly is no troublesome creditor; it is contented with a little: si das quod debes, non quod potes, Sen. If thou givest it what it should have, not what thou canst give. It is not the constitution of nature, but the concupiscence of lust, that longs for abundance. This invented sawces; Non tam condimenta, quàm blandimenta. Here is a study to be sick, when men are cunning in gluttony. Vt saturitas transeat in esuriem, natura mutatur in artem. This made Philoxenus wish his neck so long as a Cranes; to prolong the sweetness of his meats. This is not Necessitatem supplere, sed aviditatem explere. Such are to be reckoned in the number of living creatures, not of men, Seneca. They make their belly their god: for that they like best, and love most, is their god. The heathen had a god of drunkenness, but I never read that they had any of gluttony. To make the belly a deity; how base is this Idolatry! yet Hugo thus describes their luxurious worship. The belly is their god, the kitchen their Temple, their lungs the organ-pipes, the Altar their table, the cookes are their priests, flesh roasted, boiled, or broiled, their sacrifices, and their Incense, the odour of their sawces. But this sacrifice is to the devil; whose belly is filled with the froth of luxurious gluttons; instead of graces, sawces: instead of praising God, belching blasphemies. They have these virtues our Apostle speaks of, but in a strange way They have knowledge; which dish best pleaseth their appetite. Patience; to sit four hours at one meal. Fortitude; to encounter with an Ox ready prepared. Peace; till they have filled their stomachs. Yea faith, hope, and charity too; their faith warms in their kitchen, their hope lies in their mess, and their love boils in their kettle. This is the measure of gluttony, which indeed cannot be measured. All is to satiate curiosity; to fill more than the belly, even their eye. But as too much rain drowns the fields, which moderate showers would make fruitful: so this plethory of diet instead of conserving nature, confounds it.

3 For the matter, it is great feasting. Jerome wrote to Eustachius in the desert; If I did eat anything boiled, Luxuria fuit; so great was his temperance, All our art is too little to please our palates: we have piles of dishes to make barricadoes against the appetite. Feasts indeed have their just allowance: our Savior himself honored a great feast, with his presence and miracle, John 2. But they must not be unseasonable. as to feast whence need to fast; when God calls to mourning, then to revel, Amos 6. GOD threatens plagues, they fall to dances; therefore Verse 7. the banquet of these joviall fellows shall be removed. Not excessive: Nabal the churie made a feast like a King; you know a churles feast. He feeds his family with the mouldie remnants a month after. Not profane, such was Belshazzars, when the temple was ransack'd to furnish his cupboard of plate. Nehemiah read the Law of God every day of the feast: if men did think of that Law, they would not make God and Belial meet at one board; Joseph and Mary went up to Jerusalem to the great feast with Jesus, but there they left Jesus, Luke 2. Twelve years they could keep him, yet at a feast they lost him. Beda says; the men went in one company; the women in another: the children sometimes with the father, sometimes with the mother: betwixt them both CHRIST was lost: so easily is CHRIST lost at a feast. It is observable, Verse 46. that in the Temple they found him: they lost him at a feast, but they found him again in the Church. The end of such feasts is commonly the beginning of a fray. Upon the Sodomites feasting, heaven rained down fire and brimstone. Upon Job's children feasting the house fell down. Against Belshazzar feasting, the finger on the wall wrote characters of destruction. What Dives hath dined, the devil takes away. If gluttony be the founder, Satan is the confounder. The host provides meat for the belly, the guest a belly for the meat: death destroys them both. Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats: but God shall destroy both it and them. Paul says, Phil. 3.19. that their end is damnation. It is heavy, that their end is damnation; but it is worse, that their damnation is without end. Let us evermore suspect these riotous meetings; among them that Feed themselves without fear. It is written of good Job, that he feared his children at a feast. It may be that my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts. Let us be like the deer, who are ever most fearful at their best feeding. Beware lest Indulgentia gulae, be Suffocatio gratiae; be jealous of a great feast. But I shall hold you too long at a feast, unless my cheare were better: I therefore pass to 4 The effects; which are manifold and manifest. The throats pleasure did shut up Paradise, sold the Birthright, beheaded the Baptists; and it was the chief of the Cooks; Nehuzaradan that first set fire to the Temple, and rased the City. These effects are, 1. Crassitudo, grossness; which takes away agittie to any good work: which makes a man move like a Tunne upon two pottle pots. Caesar said he mistrusted not Anthony and Dolabella for any practices, because they were fat: but Casca and Cassius, lean hollow fellows; who did think too much. The other are the devils cramm'd fowls; like Esops hen, too fat to lay. Indeed what need they travel far, whose felicity is at home? placing Paradise in their throats, and heaven in their guts. 2. Macilencie of grace: for as it puts fatness into their bodies, so leanness into their souls. God fatted the Israelites with quail, but withalsent leanness into their souls. The flesh is blown up, the spirit doth languish. They are worse than 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, for 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉: they put a plurisie into their bloods, and an apoplexy into their souls. 3. Consumption of their estates: for it is regius morbus, a costly disease: it makes way for either a writ or a mittimns. Gula gurges, their patrimony runs through their throat. Man that is the Lord of all creatures, hath the least mouth of all creatures: malum non imitari quod sumus. When Temperance that just steward is put out of his office, all runs to decay and ruin: if satiety go before, beggary will follow after. 4. Sicknesse to their bodies: they wrap up diseases in their full morsels, as pills in pap. Men desire strength of body, and length of days: sed prohibent grandes patinae. Gluttony was always a friend to Aesculapius. But for the throats indulgence, Paracelsus for all his Mercury had died a beggar. Aches and ay-me's are incident to intemperate houses: Gowtes, plurises, dropsies, &c. Quae nisi divitibus nequeunt contingere mensis, Horat. We complain the shortness of our lives, yet take the only course to make them shorter.

5. Lastly, the end is rottenness and death: why dost thou feed that flesh so fat, that must feed the worms? The daintiest of flying, swimming, or running creatures nostris sepe iuntur ventribus; are buried in our bowels. Seneca. Quaeris car tam subito morimur? ex mortibus vivimus. Dost thou ask why we die so soon? we live upon deaths. The best diet shall leave thee Putidum & putridum cadaver. The finest food shall make no better dust. When moderation it self cannot avoid dying, how thinkest thou to prop up thy tabernacle wiht surfeit? lay hold on Temperance: the Physician says, nothing is better for the body than temperance: the Lawyer says, nothing is better for the estate than temperance: the Philosopher says, nothing is better for the wits than temperance: the Divine says, nothing is better for the soul than temperance. It is good for the body, good for the brain good for the estate, good for the soul: readily therefore admit temperance. For further help against Intemperance, take these four considerations.

First that abstinence is man's rising, as Intemperance was his fall. We that have lapsed from the joys of Paradise by meat, let us recover it again so well as we can by abstinence, Gregory. I speak not here for fasting only; though that have the due use, the due place. It hath a time and place in the midst of sorrow: for Repentance comes not before God with a full belly, and meat between the teeth. The use of it, is to prepare the soul for goodness, not to merit by it. The Papists hold it not Tanquam adminiculum, as a help of piety; but an immediate part of God's worship; to be satisfactory. But I commend in abstinence three rules. 1. That it be not too much, for it is better to abstain every day a little, than some days wholly. They are moderate showers that make the ground fruitful. And easy shaking roots the young plant faster; an hard shaking roots it up. 2. Remember the poor in your abstinence. Wherefore have we fasted, and thou seest it not? complain the hypocrites: God answers, because in your fasts ye exact your debts; you show no mercy to the poor Iejunium quod te affligit, alterum laetificet. Let the abstinence that makes thee look pale, beget blood in another's cheeks: let thy fast be the poor's feast, Am. 6.4. They eat the Lambes out of the flock, and the calves out of the stall: that's sometime bad enough, but Verse 6. they forget the affliction of Joseph; that's worse; this enhaunceth their damnation. Your tables abound with dishes, their bowels sound like shawmes: take away here, and bestow it there. Bate a mess at thy table, and send it to the poor's table. Nehemiah allowed some liberty to the rich, so it were joined with liberality to the poor Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet: but be sure to send portions to them, for whom nothing is prepared. Think it is CHRIST that hungers, while thou riotest. Godfrey of Boloigne would not be Crowned with Gold in that place, where his Master had been Crowned with thorns. Do not thou pamper thyself, when CHRIST starves. CHRIST is hungry, and he must satisfy you: It is CHRIST that begs of you, and he must give you: it is Christ that lies at your gates, and he must let you into the gates of heaven. Advocatus pauperum, qui Iudex divitum. True feasts of charity are not only Convivia, but Sacrificia; withsuch sacrifices God is well pleased. 3. Abstain from all sin; Commendatio Iejunii, emendatio vitae: the praise and crown of abstinence is amendment of life. When you fasted and mourned, did yet at all fast unto me, even to me, saith the Lord? Zech. 7.5.

2 Consider, it is God's blessing that makes fat, and not meat. Man lives not by bread, but by the word of God. Daniel looks as fair with his pulse, as the rest with their liberal portions of the kings meat. If God's blessing be separated from those edible materials, they yield no nourishment. He that could turn stones into bread, can turn bread into stones: and make wine infatuate, not exhilarate. He can rot the grain in the clods, blast it in the ear, wither it in the blade, consume it in the barn: yea when it hath past the flail, the mill, the oven; he can make it gall in the palate, in the stomach poison. He can either give thee meat and no stomach, or stomach and no meat. Be temperate then, and bless God; for every creature issanctified by the word of God, and prayer. Passe not by his blessings with shut eyes, as not glorifying the creator, nor look on them with dotting eyes, as too admiring the creature. Commend moderate meat to thyself, and thyself to the blessing of God.

3 Consider, that if it be so wicked to devour meats gluttonously, what is it to devour men? to swallow up a man and his house, even a man and his heritage? Such devourers were the Pharisees; and under the color of long prayers. These are monstrous Epicures: the poor man's bread is his life; and he that takes it from him is vir sanguinum, a bloody man. The usurer keeps a slender diet, but his stomach holds abundance of mortgages, forfeitures, and is oppressed with such oppressions. He hath swallowed down riches, but he shall vomit them up again: God shall cast them out of his belly, Job 20.15. God shall one day say to such men; Reddite quod devorastis; restore what you have devoured. When the Chirurgicalian opens the Epicures dead body, he finds undigested crudities: when God shall unrip the oppressors dead conscience, there will be found five or six impropriated Churches, there a depopulated town, there thousands of acres of decayed tillage; there the lands of Orphants, and the dowries of widows. Multi in hac vita manducant, quod postea apud Inferos digerunt. They devour that on earth, which they shall digest in hell.

4 Lastly if thou wilt riot, let me show thee a banquet, He brought me to his banqueting house, and his banner over me was love: Eate O friends, &c. John. 6.58. This is that bread which came down from heaven: he that eateth of it, shall never die. This is Panis verus, though not Panis merus. As he is both the Physician, and the medicine in respect of his blood: so he is both the Pastor, and the food in respect of his body. He feeds his Lambes, not on his grounds, but on his wounds. All men eat Panem Domini, the bread of God: the Saints Panem Dominum, the bread that is God himself. They that have ransacked sea and land, for rarities, never found such a dainty. Here satiate, here be intemperate: think your souls can never feast enough on this dish: with this only immoderation GOD will never be angry. Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be satisfied. CHRIST is vita quâ vivimus, and vita quam vivimus: the life whereby we live, for in him we live, move, and have our being, Acts 17.28. And the life which we live; Now live not I, but CHRIST liveth in me, Gal. 2.20. Let Epicures boast their delicacies, this be the food of our souls.

I come to the last kind of Intemperance: and this in drinks, we call it drunkenness. My theme is still Temperance: wherein I confess, that as Physicians coming to their patients, often catch some of their diseases: so you may say, that I fall into the vice I reprove, and that against excess, I speak excessively. But it is a sin, I durst not lightly or slightly pass over: a disease the whole world is sick of, and I would also put in my Ingredient to cure it. All drunkenness is not with wine, They are drunken, but not with wine: they stagger, but not with strong drink. There is a threefold ebriety. 1. Of wine; Eph. 5.18. Be not drunk with wine wherein is excess. 2. Of forgetfulness, Esa. 29.10. God hath poured on them the spirit of deep slumber. 3. Of lust to sin, Esa. 28.7. They have erred through wine: which I take there not so much to be intended against this corporal, as that spiritual drunkenness: for it is said, They were in vision, and stumble in judgment. I am not to deal with that dry drunkenness; but only with the first, and haply the worst.

Man hath a threefold appetite: Natural, which is common with plants: this insensibly covets nourishment. Animall, common with beasts: this sensibly desires needful nourishment. Rationall, proper to man: this reasonably desires fit and proper nourishment. All these appetites desire drink: without which the spirits natural, vital, animal, would consume the firmamentall heat; that would wast up the primogeniall humiditie; and so the spark of life would burn out; as the Lamp is extinct without supply of oil. The veins suck the stomach dry of moisture; hence comes emptiness; upon that sense of that defect; upon that, the desire of repletion; and this is Thirst. Drink is the good creature of God, whether it be wine, &c. It serveth Alimentally for the bodies strength, Drink no longer water but use a little wine for thy stomachs sake, and thine often infirmities. Physically, to refresh body and mind. Give strong drink to him that is ready to perish: and wine unto those that be of heavy hearts. Vinum moderate sumptum, medicamentum: plus justo, venenum, Augu. moderate wine is physical; immoderate, baneful. Iucunditati, non ebrietati creatum est. It is made for pleasure, not for fullness. It is givento make glad the heart of man. Civilly, for show of honest gladness, and maintenance of amity. So our Savior supplied the want of wine at a wedding, John. 2. Nehemiah bids the people at their feast; to eat the fat, and to drink the sweet, Neh. 8.10. It was ill done of Lycurgus to cut down all the vines: and false of Mahomet, to say that in every grape there is a devil. Only in temperance makes the sin, abuseth the creature, offends the Creator: only against this bends my discourse. Herein for method, I desire only to consider two things; the damme and the Littour. Yet first before I show what brood this monstrous mother brings forth, consider how she is bred her self.

Drunkenness is produced from the concurrence of many causes. The main is an inordinate desire of drink: the original of all vices is from ourselves: there is a harlot within, which commits all these whoredoms a broad; concupiscence. Not he that drinks wine, but he that inordinately loves wine, is the drunkard. They count it a pleasure to riot in the day time. Their soul danceth in the cup, and their eye delights in the color of the wine, Prov. 25.31. now Vbi amor, ibi oculus. Their life is the life of frogs; like flies, suctu vivunt; they live by sucking. As it was said of Bonosus, Non ut vivant, sed ut bibant nati: they are not borne to live, but to drink. They drink not for necessity, but luxury; not for society, but for satiety: indeed not for their friends sake, but for the drinks sake. He is not so much a drunkard, qui de improviso cadit, that is overtaken unawares: as he that loves and frequents it, though he carry it away more strongly. Not he qui potu vincitur, sed qui potibus vincitur, that is tied to his cups. Therefore, Esa. 5.22. Vae fortibus ad potandam; woe to them that are strong to drink: a strong body without strong grace, is stronger to sin; Fortior in viribus, fortior in vitiis. Thus the strongest is the weakest; strong to commit sin, weak to resist sin. They drink not once against dryness, nor a second time against sadness, but continually for madness. This love of drink is the Beldam, there are also other concomitances. Evil company; Come, I will fetch wine, and we will fill ourselves with strong drink. They will urge a man with 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : but God dischargeth such men our society. 1 Cor. 5.11. And healths; Accusationis causa est, per adjuratum Caesarem non frequentius bibisse, Ieron. He that will not be drunk for the King, is no friend to the king. Here is a professing from the bottom of his heart, to the bottom of the cup, that such a great man's health shall be pledged, perhaps it must be done on the knees; rank idolatry! wherein men make gods of others, beasts of themselves. For this purpose they have their she-saints, their mistresses, sometimes little better than strumpets. Here's the little difference betwixt a Papist and a drunkard: the one hath his will worship, the other his wine-worship. It was a noble answer of a Prince, when one told him how deep a health he had pledged for him; Do not, saith he, drink my health, but pray for it.

Look now upon the damme, drunkenness. Aquinas disputing whither drunkenness be a sin or not, objects that no vice is opposed to it: as to temerity cowardice, to prodigality avarice; therefore it is no sin, but he answers, that there is a vice opposed to it, though it wants a name, because it is so unusual: as the forbearing of all sustenance. It is questioned also whether a sick man may drink medicinally for his health, and be drunk with it: but we may affirm, that there is no medicinal cup to the body, that is poisonfull to the conscience. It is folly to think, that the cause of many sicknesses, should be physic for one: or that the endangering the soul can be good physic for the body: no good physician will prescribe it, no divine will allow it: say with Constantine; Malle semper aegrotare, quàm tali remedio convallescere. It is better to be still afflicted with our disease, than be recovered by such a medicine. This vice is the plying of the pot: Nocturno torpere mero, torpere diurno. Mantuan the poet, Eccl. 9. rehearseth the drunkards seven draughts.

Funde iterum: potare semel, gustare: Secundus

Calluit os potus: calefacta refrigerat ora

Tertius: arma siti, bellumque indicere Quartus

Aggreditur: quintus pugnat: victoria Sexti est:

Septimus (Oenophili senis haec doctrina) triumphat.

The first draught doth but taste the wine: the second washeth the mouth: the third cooleth it: the fourth threatens war against thirst: the fifth fights with it: the sixth overcomes it: the seventh triumphs over it. All this is taught by Oenophilus, a lover of wine, an old drunkard; this is the drunkards doctrine. Let us hear the Philosopher somewhat more sober and stayed. Aristotle makes seven degrees of it: 1. Necessity, a man must drink. 2. Commodity, man should drink. 3. Pleasure, he may drink. 4. Fullness, he may not drink. 5. Satiety, and that is bad. 6. Ebriety, and that is worse. 7. Madness, and that is worst of all. Here be the deadly draughts, to which drunkenness runs headlong. Fertur equis auriga, nec audit currus habenas. The sea knows his bounds, but not the deluge of drunkenness. We see the Damme, let us look upon the Littour or effects; which are many and hideous.

1 It makes room for the Devil: all sins break in at the loss of the Sconce or Capitol; Reason: thence the enemy commands the whole Town. The eyes are wanton, the tongue blaspheming, the hands stabbing: all mischiefs. Invadunt urbem somno vinoque sepultum. So were the Trojans conquered: and for this cause, I think, ever since, drunkards are called true Trojans. It is a mare mortuum, no fish can live there, no virtue thrive here. It is the root of all evils, the rot of all goodness: The Devil could find no rest in dry places: he loves the low countries, the wet ground; moorish and marish souls. The great Behemoth loveth the Fennes. Of all reasonless creatures, he chose the drunken Hogs, Mark 5.

2 It overturns the estate: The drunkard shall come to poverty, Prov. 23.21. He consumes more in a day, than he earns in a week. He lies open to others plots, and hath no rule of his own spirit, but is a City without walls, Prov. 25.28. He is his own thief, he needs no other oppressors, for he is a caterpillar to himself. He rails on cormorants, yet devours himself. He throws his house out of the windows, it is fit his house should throw him out of the doors.

3 It poisons the tongue; swearing and lying are the ordinary effects of it: The drunkards made songs upon David. It thinks it self a Caesar, and falls a taxing all the world: Quicquid in cord sobrii, in lingua ebrii, Fulgent. O but In vino veritas: it is false, for no man's good name is spared. If he be multa bibens, he is sure Plurima dicens: he often utters that in a moment, whereof he is driven to repent all his life. Arcanum demens detegit ebrietas: A drunken inveigher against King Pyrrhus, being brought to his answer for those criminations, said; We spake all that is objected, and would have spoke more if the wine had not failed us. Such a one will speak of God most, when he thinks of God least: but the mouth inured to blasphemous or scurrilous speeches, is no fit trumpet of God's praises.

4 It intoxicates all reason. Bacchus was called Liber pater; but his sons are not Liberi, Free-men, but slaves; bound to sleep. They are out of the way with strong drink: they are either out of the way, or reeling in the way. Wine and women will make men of understanding to fall away: Apostatare facit sapientes. We keep our doors shut against thieves: yet let in this thief that is worse. O that a man should voluntarily let a thief in at his mouth, to steal away his wits! Young Cyrus refusing to drink wine, gave this reason to his grand-father Astiages; I took it to be poison; for I have seen it spoil men of wit and sense. Alexander that overcame all, was overcome by wine, Aug. If the body chide the foot for stumbling and hurting it, the foot may lay the fault in the head for not guiding it. The people sate down to eat and drink, and rose up to play. We have them that sit down to drink, till they cannot rise to play: they must sleep as they lie. Sine timore, non sine periculo: they are ashe that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or sleepeth on the top of a mast.

5 It enervates the strength: Vinum ab implendo venas, Isidor. Instead of filling them with blood, it drowns them. It brings rotten teeth, stinking breaths, trembling hands, running eyes, gowts and dropsies. All these are the waiters on drunkenness: all strive which shall bring a man soonest and lothsomest to the grave. He is gone in his standing, gone in his understanding, gone in strength to help him self: we commonly say of the drunkard, he is gone. Cum absorbet vinum, absorbetur à vino, August. If his belly be made a tomb of drink, drink will make his body a sepulcher of his soul. Crebro ebrii cito senescunt; It is somewhat, that it alters the complexion: Vino forma perit, vino corrumpitur aetas. But worse, that it dissolves the constitution: for how should his firmamentall lamp burn, that is ever drowning it in deluges of riot!

6 It is the bawd to incontinence, Rom. 13.13. After Drunkenness follows chambering and wantonness. Pro ordine membrorum, ordo vitiorum, Hieron. Ambrose says of Lust; that it is fuelled with junkets, enkindled with wine, inflamed with drunkenness. It is Fomes libidinis: Vina parant animos veneri, Ovid Nunquam ebrium putabo castum, Hieron. I will never believe the drunkard to be chaste. Drunken Lot became incestuous Lot: hence sprang the Moabites and Ammonites, those mortal, almost immortal enemies to the Church. Whom the vices of Sodom could not taint, Lust infected. Vritur ebrius flammis mulierum, quem sobrium sulphurea flamma non attigerat, Origen. The flames that destroyed Sodom, hurt him not; his own fire scorched him. In this sense it may be said; Vinum lac libidinis.

7 It is an Incendiary to quarrels and homicides. Bacchus ad arma vocat. Drunken Alexander killed Clitus, for whom sober Alexander would have killed himself. The Danes and Norweges once purposing for England, fell drunk on shipbord, and so slash'd one another, that there was the end of their voyage. We often hear of such riotous meetings, that In praelio trudit inermes; Some dropping dead in the midst of their sins. Be they never so protesting their kindness; yet Tutius est ebriis abstinuisse locis: They may be kind at first, will be cruel at last. Drunkards kiss when they meet, and kill when they part; Haec faceret non sobrius unquam.

8 Lastly, besides all other plagues, it is a woe to it self. Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath wounds without cause? The merry madness of an hour, is paid with the afflictions of a tedious age. Woe to them, saith the Prophet, Isaiah 5.11. Woe to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim, Isaiah 28.1. Cùm infunditur, grave; cum turbat stomachum, gravius: cum refunditur, gravissimum: When the carouser powers in his wine, it troubles him; and he would give somewhat to avoid it: when it offends the stomach, it troubles him worse: when it comes up again, it troubles him worst of all. One Fornerius writes of a Monk at Prage, who having heard at shrift the confession of drunkards, wondered at it, and for experiment would needs try his brain with this sin; so accordingly stole himself drunk. Now after the vexation of three sick days, to all that confessed that sin, he enjoined no other penance but this; Go and be drunk again. Sure his meaning was like Seneca's; Sceleris in scelere supplicium; It is a torment and affliction to it self. You see the Damme and her littour, learn we now to avoid it, because we are men, because we are citizens, because we are Christians.

Because we are men: while the wine is in thy hand, thou art a man; when it is in thy head, thou art become a beast. The drunkard cries to his fellow; Do me treason: but the drink answers, I will leave thee no reason; scarce so much as a beast, for they will drink no more than they need. Diogenes being urged to drink immoderately, cast the drink on the ground; being reproved for that loss, he answered, If I had drunk it, non solum liquorem, sed meipsum perderem; I had lost both the drink, and myself.

Because we are citizens, and therefore should lead civil lives: drunkenness is an uncivil exorbitance. It was a good Persian law; That no man was compelled but every one did according to his own pleasure. Here was no compulsion, but it was left arbitrary, Vt bibat arbitrio pocula quisque suo. It were somewhat if but so much moderation were observed at our feasts: Vt qui inebriari abhorret, in compulsus discederet incompulsus discederet. We fault in those very Ethnicke observances; and think it a discourtesy not to be intemperate for company.

Because we are Christians, Thou, O man of God, fly these things. The grace of God that brings salvation, teacheth us to live soberly, Tit. 2.12. We are children of the Day, let us cast off that work of darkness, Rom. 13. The Rechabites forbore wine in awe of their earthly Father, Ierem. 35. And shall not we forbear drunkenness in awe of our heavenly Father? Yes, lest that curse fall on us, that our table be made a snare before us: yea lest we be not admitted into the kingdom of God, Gal. 5.21. Let not your hearts be over-charged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and so that day come upon you unawares: drink every draught, as if it were thy last draught. The poor woman would appeal from drunken King Philip to sober King Philip; so will any man from a drunken Christian to a sober Heathen.

Thus in some poor measure I have described this monster of Intemperance. A sin so odious, that it is abhorred of God, despised of Angels, derided of men, pleasing only to devils, Aug. Yet have we small hope to subdue it; for it is insensible: They have beaten me, and I felt it not. Bernard calls it a gross Devil; he that is possessed with it, falls into the fire, and into the water, gnasheth and fometh, Matth. 17.16. Now as all the Disciples could not cast out that Devil; so nor all the Preachers this. It is an habit hardly put off. When a Gentleman heard that his son was given to dicing, he answered, the want of money will make him leave it. After he heard that he was given to whoring; yet saith he, marriage or old-age will allay that fury. But when he heard that he was given to drunkenness, he was hopeless; for he knew that sin would increase with years. A gamester will hold so long as his purse lasts, an adulterer so long as his loins last, but a drunkard so long as his lungs and life last. A Philosopher once chancing into a company of drunkards, where a Musician ruled the lascivious riot; presently charged him to change his harmony into a Dorion. By this means he so wrought them, and brought them to sobriety; that casting away their garlands, they were ashamed of all they had done. But our drunkards have not the patience to hear such music. Saul was vexed with an evil spirit, but David's Harp expelled him. O that we knew that Instrument or lesson, which could work such a reformation! We would double and treble that note, which might effectuate such a cure. But the drunkards noise is louder than the Preachers voice: the sound of the pot drowns all reprehension.

To your Temperance add Patience.

PATience is that virtue, Quae mallet mala non committendo ferre, quàm non ferendo committere, August. Which had rather suffer evil and do none, than do evil and suffer none. It hath these degrees; It does not wrong; it receives it, not with stupidity but sense: it does not vex him that offers to vex it: it returns not wound for wound: it does not hate the offender: it loves him: it does good unto him: it intreats God for him, Chrysost. For Patience consists not only in bearing injuries, but in forgiving the injurers.

But why doth the Apostle next to Temperance annex Patience? Quos delitiae non emolliunt, saepe injuriae frangunt. Temptations of pleasure move not in many, whom the sense of injuries enrageth. Men may refrain from hurting others or themselves; therein is Temperance: but others will hurt them, to bear this with a quiet mind is Patience. A Christian may live without doing wrong, not without receiving wrong. Objectum malitiae est non malus. The Wolf will not worry a Wolf, so long as there is a lamb in the field. This virtue is better understood than practiced: like Cassandra, better known than trusted. Therefore admitting that you understand it, I will apply myself to the affections, that you may embrace it. This let me endeavor by leading you thorough certain gradual considerations.

1 That it is the condition of mankind to suffer. When thou considerest thyself, there is presented to thee a man, a naked man, a poor man, and a miserable man, Bern. Luges hominem, erubescis nudum, contemnis pauperem, doles miserum, lacrymas miserabilem; Thou mournest thy mortality, blushest at thy nakedness, despisest thy poverty, weepest for thy misery. Now, quod ferendum est, feras; what thou must bear, bear patiently.

2 That miseries are not only incident to men, but more proper to Christian men, All that will live godly in Christ, shall suffer persecution. This was Christ's prognostication; In the world you shall have sorrow, John 16. This the Apostles prediction; Through many tribulations you must enter the kingdom of heaven, Act. 14. What Saint was ever crowned before he had combated? Jerome. Search the whole Bible over; Et quem legisti in coelis triumphantem, quem non legisti prius in terris tolerantem? But it is said; The Churches had rest thorough-out all Judea, &c. And there was peace in the days of Solomon; peace in the days of Constantine; peace in the milken times of Queen Elizabeth; and yet still greater peace under the reign of our present Sovereign, that King of peace. Yet though we be freed from public oppressions inflicted by Magistrates, not from private molestations. In the most Halcyon days we find bitterness: Sine miseria vixisse miserrimum est. If there be not an Esau, there will be an Ishmael: if the hand of mischief cannot reach us, yet Penetrabunt spicula linguae; The arrows of slander and contumely will stick in our ribs. All men are necessitated to miseries, that bend their course toward the kingdom of heaven, Aug. Hence it is that S. Paul gives a piece of armor to the feet. Let your feet be shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace. Our feet are naturally tender: if they be bare, clods, flints, thorns will gall them. Our affections, if they be not shod with Patience, will be so pricked with crosses, that we shall be weary of our journey to heaven. It is no unusual stratagem in war, to stick the way full of thorns, and ends of pikes, to wound and dis-rank the adversary. So the Devil besets our way of peace, that we had need of leg-harness, Patience. Though all parts be armed, yet if the feet be naked, Satan will wound us there: as Achilles was wounded in the heel, when all other places of him were invulnerable. Thus was Job armed, I am. 5.11. S. John speaking of great war, and greater victory, concludes; Here is the patience of the Saints. Therefore Paul expressly, Hebr. 10.36. Ye have need of patience, that &c.

3 That all afflictions come by a supreme providence, therefore be patient. Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and not evil? What ever be the Instruments, he looks to the high Agent; Deus abstulit; The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away; Blessed be the Name of the Lord. So David, Remove thy stroke from me; I am consumed by the blow of thine hand. Whatsoever is the weapon, it is thy blow. So he snibbed the sons of Zerviah, concerning the blaspheming of Shimei; it may be the Lord hath said to him, Curse David, 2 Sam. 16.10. Deus jussit. So our Savior told Pilate, Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above.

GOD'S providence is mater necessitatis, the mother of necessity: now Patience makes a virtue of this necessity. Other creatures modestly and silently obey, and shall man vex himself with impatience? Quicquid Superi voluere, peractum est; To wrestle with Fate, is to provoke Fate to wrestle with us; and then who falls? Who is he that saith, and it cometh to pass, when the LORD commandeth it not? Lam. 3.37. Murmure not my son, thy Father did it. We strike at God, and he says to us, as Caesar said to Brutus; Is it thou my son? Well may he strike us, and let us only say, Tu Pater, it is Thou my Father, and be silent. These things hast thou done, and I kept silence, saith the Lord. Wicked men strike the just God, and he holds his peace: the just God strikes wicked men, and they murmur.

4 Think thy crosses meant for thy blessings: punishments are good for none but the Patient, to them only they are signs of favor. David not only concludes thus; By this I know thou favourest me, because mine enemy triumphs not over me: but also thus; Because thou hast afflicted me, therefore I know thou lovest me. If ye be without chastisement, then are ye bastards, and not sons, Hebr. 12.8. This only frees us from bastardy; or rather secures us, for indeed Adoption frees us. Whom God smites not, he loves not, Aug. Let the Christian understand; God his Physician, tribulation his physic: being afflicted under the medicine, thou criest, Non audit medicus ad voluntatem, sed ad sanitatem; The Physician hears thee not according to thy will but thy weal. Thou canst not endure thy malady, and wilt thou not be patient of the remedy? Let it not be true of us, that Nec mala nostra, nec remedia ferre possumus. A man is sick of a Pleurisy, the Physician lets him bleed, he is content with it: the arm shall smart, to ease the heart. The covetous man hath a Pleurisy of riches; God lets him bleed by poverty: let him be patient, it is a course to save his soul. These are not in vindictam, sed in medicinam: Pereat voluptas carnis, ne amittatur eternitas salutis. When we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world. We speak for the flesh, as Abraham did for Ishmael; O that Ishmael might live in thy sight! No, God takes away Ishmael, and gives Isaac: He withdraws the pleasure of the flesh, and gives delight to the soul. God threatens not to punish the wicked: I call it a threatening, for promises come from mercy, but that is a grievous punishment. Why should you be stricken anymore? Let me have none of that mercy! Art thou afflicted, why complainest thou? that which thou sufferest, is not thy damnation, but thy castigation. Refuse not the rod, as thou wouldst embrace the inheritance, Nec attendas quam poenam habeas in flagello, sed quem locum in Testamento. Regard not so much what portion thou hast in the punishment, as what interest thou hast in the Covenant. He that knows he shall reign in heaven, will patiently suffer upon earth.

6 That all crosses are deserved, and come not upon us against equity. Equity, I say, considered in respect of God, not in respect of men: they come from a just Author, though from an unjust instrument. Thy sins have procured it: Thy way and thy doings have procured these things unto thee: Nulla homini noceret adversitas, si nulla dominetur iniquitas; No misery had afflicted us, if no sin had first infected us. Wherefore doth a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins? Lam. 3.39. That man may well suffer patiently, that knows he suffers justly. David felt the spite of his enemies, Psa 38. yet he acknowledgeth his sin the cause; ver. 18. I will declare mine iniquity, I will be sorry for my sin. For what glory is it, if when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye shall take it patiently? But if when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God. But a man is often punished for that he never did? I answer, in that act for which he suffers, he may be innocent; yet in others, guilty. David could clear his innocence in respect of Saul, not in respect of God. For Saul, Lord, if I have done this, if there be iniquity in my hands. But for God; If thou shouldest mark iniquity, Lord who shall stand? Psal. 130.3. Let them be evil, be sure thou suffer either for, or (at least) with a good conscience. For he refuseth to be an Abel, whom the malice of Cain doth not exercise, Greg. Rosa quae redolet, crescit cum spina quae pungit; The sweet Rose grows among sharp thorns: As the Lily among the thorns, so is my love among the daughters.

Therefore overcome evil with good, Rom. 12.21. Be so far from snatching God's weapons out of his hand, that thou rather master unkindness with kindness. This Saint Paul makes to be the work of Patience; See that none render evil for evil, 1 Thess. 5.15. We think it ignominy and cowardice, to put up the lie without a stab, a wrong without a challenge. But Solomon says, (to whose wisdom all wise men will subscribe) that It is the glory of a man to pass by an offense. It is more honor, Injuriam tacendo ferre, quàm respondendo superare, Gregor. Satius & tutius injurias perferre, quàm infer aut refer. The greatest magnanimity is Patience. Yet, O into what infortunate times are we fallen, when every wrong must be answered with blood! How hath the Devil bewitched us to glory in our shame! That the wretchedest and basest cowardice should ruffle it out in the garb of valor! Yet if the gravest Bishop in the Land do preach this, our impatient gallants will not believe it. Indeed how should they credit man, who will not be persuaded by God himself! O yet that our tears could wash off the guilt from men's souls, as easily as we can convince them by arguments! we would then with Jeremiah, wish our heads fountains, and our eyes spouts; to cleanse our Land from the blood thus shed, and the brave opinion of shedding it. Apud Christianos non qui patitur, sed qui facit injuriam, miser est, Hieron. Among Christians he is only the wretched man that does wrong, not he that suffers. It is a great virtue not to hurt him that hath hurt thee; Magna gloria, si cui potuisti nocere, parcas, Hugo. This was in those days truly noble; now nothing but revenge. Job is counted a fool, and David a coward. With them it was valor, Audire noxia, & respondere placita; To bless those that cursed them: we think that Degeneres animos patientia arguit; that patience is an argument of baseness. What is the difference? There was the faith and patience of the Saints: here is the infidelity and impatience of sinners. Let such men know:

1 That God shall condemn them for invading his office; for vengeance is His: and that they call courage, he shall judge outrage. Then it will be but a poor plea, to say such an one wronged me: who gave thee leave to quit thyself? Is not God able to punish? Thou art cruel, and wilt carve too deep: let God alone he is merciful and just.

2 To what purpose are Magistrates, if every man may be his own judge? Thou mayest complain to the deputy, not with thine own hands punish the injury. If a man have matter against another, the Law is open, and there are deputies; let them implead one another. Sic certent causae, ut non certent pectora; Let men's causes fight a while, that their souls may be in peace forever. There is utterly a fault among you, that ye go to law one with another, 1 Cor. 6.7. That is a fault: but some so abuse the Law, that Quae datur in compensationem injuriae, vertitur in injuriam: That which should redress wrong and mischief, is perverted to be the greatest wrong and mischief. Whom their hands dare not strike with blows, their purses shall vex with suits. We may say of such Citizens, as it was of some Popes; they are not Vrbani, but Turbani.

3 Remember that the LORD JESUS shed his blood to make thee friends with GOD, and wilt not thou be friends with thy brother? Cannot the blood of CHRIST, that bought a whole Church, of GOD, buy the forgiveness of one wrong at thy hands? Take heed, lest for not showing mercy, thou find no mercy.

4 GOD is patient towards thee, though he be provoked every day. Ad Patientiam vocat, qui patientia est; He invites us to be patient, that is, Patience it self. Sustine tu, sustinet Deus; Do thou bear with others, God bears with thee. Is there a Too much, which thou canst suffer for so patient a Lord? How wouldest thou endure wounds for him, that canst not endure words for him? A man reviles thee, thou art impatient: how wouldest thou afford thy ashes to CHRIST, and write Patience with thine own blood?

5 The examples of the very Heathen may put such impatient Christians to the blush. When that Tarentine was angry with his faulty servant; Sumpsissem inquit supplicium, nisi tibi iratus essem: I had stricken thee, had I not been angry. He had rather Impunitum dimittere, quàm per iram plus justo punire. Xenophon, to one that railed on him, replied; Didicisti tu maledicere, ego maledicta contemnere; thou hast learned to reproach, and I to contemn thy reproaches. When Metellus inveighed against Tacitus in the Senate, he answered; It is easy to find fault with him that is not willing to reply. Potentia tua, non Patientia mea, accusanda est; The blame lies on your malice, not on my patience. When one told Diogenes, Vituperant te multi; many <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> despise thee; he returns; So wise men must suffer of fools. Lingua illum meliorem esse indicat, quem carpit. The same envious tongue that would speak a man worse, doth indeed confess him better: for the object of entire is goodness. Another being reproved by his friend, because he did not correct his provoking servant answered, Quia alium, quem potius castigarem, inveni: because I have found one I have more reason to correct, that is, myself. Thus for morality they excellently commended this virtue: we have the seal of God put upon it, Be shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace. Nothing but the Gospel of peace can give true patience. Theirs was an opinion to stupefy men's senses: Minùs im patienter, non minùs infaeliciter ferre: but the knowledge of peace in heaven is the soul of patience. Hereby we have a resolution that nothing shall hurt us: for sin is the sting of all troubles; pull out the sting, and deride the malice of the serpent. Sin makes our burden heavy: take away that, all is tolerable. Sin turns the grave into a dark dungeon; which remitted, is a perfumed bed of quiet rest. Sin shows the Devil horrible, God a severe Judge: let the Gospel remove that, God is thy Father, the devil his and thy slave. Therefore the Prophet well annexeth Blessedness to the Remission of sins. Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven. And our Savior says to the man sick of the Palsy; Be of good cheare; for thy sins be forgiven thee, yea more, we are resolved that all things shall work together to our good: All things, then even our sins. Not that sin is good in it self: but as Bernard; Miro quodam modo etiam ipsum peccatum justo in Iustitiam operatur. The miraculous hand of God disposeth our very unrighteousness, to help us to righteousness. And that first in respect of God, manifesting and magnifying his mercy in forgiving it: where sin abounded, grace did much more abound, Rom. 5.20. And in respect of ourselves; working in us a sorrow of repentance, not to be sorrowed; an humility to be honored, a faith to be crowned. Humiliores effimur & cautiores, Bern. Thus God casts us into the fire, not to be consumed as dross, but refined as gold. That at last we may resolve, not only to die in the Lord, but for the LORD JESUS.

6 Consider that all sufferings shall have an end. The rod lies now on the godly, but it is not in the right place, ubi manendum est At last CHRIST shall lay it where it shall abide even on the wicked, there it must rest forever. The rod of the wicked shall not rest upon the lot of the righteous, lest the righteous put forth their hands unto iniquity. So Abraham told Dives of an exchange: before Lazarus had sorrow, thou hadst pleasure: now therefore you have changed turns, and places; he is comforted and thou art tormented, Luk. 16. To the godly ease shall come; Patientia filia Spei. Hope is the Mother of patience. The Wise man rejoiced to find the Star, the woman to find her piece of silver, our Lady rejoiced to find our Lord: Christ always returns with increase of joy. The righteous is delivered out of trouble: and the wicked cometh in his stead, Prov. 11.8. Here is the vicissitude. The wicked shall be a ransom for the righteous, and the transgressor for the upright. Here is the redemption or ransom; misery like a Vulture, must have somebody to prey upon; the world destines the, righteous to it, and for a while they suffer: but God ordains the unrighteous to it, and they must suffer forever. GOD shall speak to sorrow, deliver me my servant, let that man go whom thou now afflictest; and take this reprobate in his stead, torment him forever, Hebr. 10.36. Ye have need of patience; why should we be patient? Because ye have so short a time to suffer, Verse 37. Yet a little while, and he that comes, will come, and will not tarry. Why, what shall he do when he is come? I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice; and your joy shall no man take from you. The Lamb shall lead them to the fountain of living waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes, Revel 7.17. But how are we sure of this? Because it is a righteous thing with God, to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you: and to you who are troubled, rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty Angels. Jacob served seven years patiently for his wife Rachel; and shall not we serve longer for our dear husband Jesus? Love suffers all things, 1 Cor. 13. he loves not the Lord, that will not suffer for him. Omnia passus amor, nec se vult dicere passum. Be patient therefore unto the coming of the Lord: lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth near, Luke 21.28. If these meditations could sink and soke into our hearts, they would be mollified with patience. It is truly said concerning the wicked; Breve est quod delectat, aeternum quod cruciat: their pleasure is short, their pain everlasting. The contrary is as true concerning the faithful: Breve est quod cruciat, aeternum quod delectat: their pain is short, their joy eternal. The hope of the righteous shall be gladness: but the expectation of the wicked shall perish. Upon Shimei's execration, David thus comforted himself; It may be the Lord will look on mine affliction, and will requite good for his cursing this day, 2 Sam. 16.12. David suffered much of Saul, before he wore the promised Crown: no matter what we suffer on earth, so we may be crowned in heaven.

Lastly, consider that CHRIST our LORD suffered all patiently for us: that Lamb was dumb before the fleecers and Butchers. Such Lambes must we be, that have neither horns to dash nor nails to tear, nor teeth to bite, nor flight to escape; but patiently to submit ourselves to the will of our shepherd. Such Lambes were the Martyrs; their persecutors were more weary feriendo, with striking; than they Ferendo, with suffering. But none ever suffered like the Lord Jesus: Iustus pro iujustis, ab iniustis, 1 Pet. 2.21. He is not only our Redeemer, but our example he taught us both in his doing, and in his dying. Ought not Christ first to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory? As he was Unctus oleo laetitiae prae sociis, so oleo tristitiae prae caeteris. As he was anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows so first with the oil of sadness above his fellows. Indeed the Deity suffered not, yet he that is GOD suffered. Deitas in Dolente, though not in Dolore. Now all this is to teach us patience, Hebrews 12 2. Let us look unto Jesus the founder and finisher of our faith; who endured the cross and despised the shame, and is now set down at the right hand of the throne of God: therefore Let us run with patience unto the race that is set before us. By death Christ came to us, by death let us not grudge to go to Christ.

Patience you see, is an excellent virtue; you have heard many commendations of it: if it had no other, this were enough to praise it, that it easeth our griefs. Many cannot away with other graces; because voluptatem prohibent, voluntatem cohibent; they curb the will, and abridge delight, and impose hard things to the flesh. They cannot away with Charity, because it takes out of the purse: nor with Abstinence, because it restrains the appetite: nor with Himilitie, because it abates pride: nor with Chastity, because it debars lust. But me thinks each man should love Patience, because it easeth his pains, and mitigates his sorrows. Natural men care no more for virtue, than that cruel Judge did for equity: yes if they knew a virtue that would ease their burdens, and qualify their griefs, they would love it. Me thinks, even wicked men should use this virtue, and make much of it: though for no other purpose than Pharaoh used Moses; to remove the Judgments. Our proverb hath it; Of sufferance comes ease: let us be patient then, if but for our own benefits.

VERSE 6.

And to patience, Godliness.

BEfore we come to the definition of Godliness, let us conceive some reasons of this connection, and immediate adding of Piety to patience.

1 Because the pillar of patience is godliness; it cannot stand without it, <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> it is firm being upheld by it. For true Patience cannot befall a reprobate; (stupidity may as to Nabal) not by an absolute impossibility, but by the indisposition of his heart to receive it: as a spark of fire falling upon water, ice, or snow, presently goes out: which fasting on wood or such combustible matter, kindles and burns. The food whereupon true patience lives, is faith in the Gospel of peace. Saul was a moral man, yea a zealous man, while he was Saul, and Gamaliels scholar but when he was made a Christian, he was called Paul; he was not a Paul before. So Patience in Ethnikes is not rightly named: as Silvius when he was chosen Pope said; Aeneam rejicite, recipite Pium: forget Aeneas, and accept me your Pius. So to suffer before conversion, was but stupidity in quiet: now mutato homine, mutato nomine, the persons being changed, change also the name; call it Patience.

2 Because Godliness teacheth a man patience: it is the Imitation of God and our God is patient. Now if we feel this mercy from God, let us show it to them that are his. He that will not tolerate man, tolerari a Domino se facit indignum; makes himself unworthy to be borne with of God. Deus habet in manu vindictam, mavult in usu patientiam. God hath in his hand vengeance, in his heart patience. We pray for pardon as we give pardon: we would be loath to have our own lips condemn us.

3 Because patience will do the soul no good with godliness: the glory and comfort of all suffering, is gods cause. Neither is the reward given for suffering, but for suffering well. This is thank-worthy, if for conscience toward God, we endure grief. Tribulations are the marks of CHRIST; but then they must be borne for CHRIST: herein Paul delighted himself; I take pleasure in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses, for Christ's sake. Thus being prouder of his iron fetters, than a bragging Courtier of his golden chain. The departures of the Saints are not Mortes, sed Immortalitates. If Julian so honored his soldiers dying in the wars; celebri potius laude, quàm luctu: how much more shall CHRIST honor his! Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his Saints, Psal. 116.15. such as undergo in Christ's cause Christ's Cross. No death is comfortable, nisi in Domino, vel pro Domino: and that man's life is well bestowed in suffering death, when to Patience is added Godliness. Our life is the Lord's by many dear titles: therefore not too good for him when he requires it. Thou art a depositary, to whose trust is committed a precious Jewel: perhaps thou hast much ado to keep it from the subtleties of tempters, and violence of attempters: yea hast a corrupt desire, unthriftilly to spend it upon profits or pleasures, surfeits and vanities: and thou never art in true quiet, till he that delivered this Jewel, thy life to thee, doth reassume it. But then thou must tarry till he calls for it: for God refuseth the soul that comes to him before he sends for it. When the Indians, to avoid the Spanish slavery, grew to a practice of killing themselves: the Spaniards dissembled a killing of themselves also: threatening upon their meeting in another world to afflict them there more than before. Indeed, if the troubles and anguishes of this world so despair thee, that thou castest away thy own life: those very same in a far heavier measure shall find thee out in the other. Miseriam non effugis, sed adauges. There is no comfort in suffering death, except Godliness bless our patience. Aelian writes that among the Grecians there was a Law, that if a sick man drank wine without the advice of his Physician; though he saved his life by it, he should be put to death for it; because he did that was not permitted him. Bitter then must be their punishment, that take not wine but poison: that precipitate their lives into certain destruction: having no command from God, that he requires it; no promise that he will reward it. Our Savior teacheth us, being persecuted in one City, to fly into another: if we willfully run into unnecessary death; he will say who required this at your hands? who bad you run from England to Rome for poison; and from Rome back again to England with treason? you may have Patience, but here's no Godliness. The good sheep knows the voice of his Shepherd, and stays for his call. Those glorious Martyrs that now have a permanent triumph in heaven, were not so madly prodigal of their bloods, as to throw them away without a warrant. They that possess this Lawrell, washed their garments, not in their own bloods only: so they might have been still red and stained: but in the blood of the Lamb, that changes them into white. Therefore they are before the throne of God, and he that sitted on the throne shall dwell among them. That sinful Mary wasted and bathed herself, not in her own blood but in her tears: saith Chrysostom. And of Saint Peter he asks this question; when he had denied his Master; Nunquid sanguinem fudit? did he shed out his own blood? No, but his tears, and so washed away his sins. We are not sent into this world to suffer, but to do, and when we do suffer, to add to Persecution Patience, to Patience Godliness. The way to triumph in secular arms, was not to be slain in the battle, but to keep their station. In the Roman warlike discipline; Ius legionis facile; Non sequi, non fugere: this was the rule; not to follow desperately, nor to fly basely. So it is in our Christian battle; not to invite danger, not to shrink from it. Indeed God betimes in the world called for this bleeding witness: he sealed his acceptation of Abel's sacrifice, by accepting Abel for a sacrifice; who before all example, first dedicated Martyrdom, Chrysost. And as soon as CHRIST came into the world, after the receiving of the wise men's oblations; he would immediately be glorified with that hecatombe of Innocents. But to offer this without God's asking, shall bring but a poor reward. For while piety is not preserved, the Crown of patience is lost. Wherefore let them that suffer according to the will of God, commit the keeping of their souls to him in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator. Put not Piety from thy Patience, thy wounds shall be healed, and thy soul rewarded.

4 Because patience without Godliness, when it receives injury of man, may do more injury to God. Let us write the wrongs to ourselves in the dust, to forget them; that is Patience: the wrongs we have done to God in marble; to remember them; that is Godliness. To bear meekly with thy persecutors, is commendable patience: to be silent at God's dishonor, is condemnable baseness. It is no less than treason; thy silence makes thee guilty. Thou pleadest thyself to be the son of God: he is a very bad son, that can hear his righteous Father blasphemed with patience. Cursed is that Patience, that hinders a man from Godliness. CHRIST is thy brother, he bought thee with his blood, thou art his coheire: canst thou behold him gored with new wounds, and hold thy peace? Thou believest not; for then thou wouldest speak: as the Psalm hath it: I believed and therefore I spake: no defending of faith, no faith. The Inhabitants of Meroz took not part with God's enemies, yet were they cursed for not taking part with friends, Judge. 5.23. Indifference in God's cause is damnable: not to oppose them, that oppose God, is to be his enemy. How easily are we moved at our own injuries? how patient at God's? Let our own credits or riches be troubled, we rage like Lions let God's honor be questioned, we are as tame as Lambes. If the aspersion of scandal lights upon our names, there is suite upon suite, from Court to Court; all to beggar the raiser of it. Let the Lord's dreadful Name be blasphemed, we are so far from spending a penny, that we will not speak a syllable. Like Jonah, we are more moved for the loss of a gourd, than for all Nineveh. Moses can brook Miriam despising him, and go away silent, because himself only was interested, Numb. 12. But when the people had Idolatrized, he brake the sacred Tables in passion, burned the Calf, scattered the dust on the waters, and in detestation of their wickedness made them drink it. We have patience enough, but piety is thrust out of doors. Such infortunate and apostate times are we fallen into, that to uphold God's honor is held uncivil tartness: such men are saucy, and such sauce is too sharp for proud and vicious stomachs: this dissolves the knot of friendship. Let it; Ideo misit Deus bonam separationem, ut malam rumperet Conjunctionem: better a holy discord, than a profane concord. Care not for that mirth, which must grieve the Holy Ghost: disclaim that peace, which must be at war with Christ. If they refuse thee, thou knowest who will receive thee, John. 9.35. When they had excommunicated him, CHRIST welcomed him. Fear not them that kill the body, &c. It is worse losing the Lord's favor, than thy Land-lords: better part from thy cottage in earth; than thy Inheritance in heaven.

Necessary therefore is the accession of Piety to Patience. It is an abhorred sin to temporize: when a Chaplain must measure his speech by his Lord's humor, the truth of the Lord of hosts is abused. Against oppression he dares not speak, because it is his Lord's fault; not against Pride, because it is his Ladies: not against riot, because it is his young Masters. He must not meddle with the ulcers that stick on his great ones conscience: hell will take that patience. Let them be ashamed of Christ, that care not for his being ashamed of them. For us, let us plead God's cause, for his sake that pleads our cause in heaven.

Godliness is taken by the Philosophers in a threefold relation. For Religion towards God, which they held a devout adoration of their Idols. For religion towards their country: when any died for their country, they were said Pie mori. For religion towards their parents: so Aeneas was called Pius: and for this they gave those additional names of Pii. Our Apostle meant it not in this latitude: it must here import some particular grace, as appears by the rank. Yet let us a little consider it in the larger acception. So it is such a gracious habit, as prefers God's glory before all things, and refers all things to it.

For the former, Godliness aims immediately at the Lord's honor, Matth. 8.21. There was one following Christ, but hearing of his Father's death, he first desire leave to bury him: perhaps he gaped for an executorship, or meant at least to thrust in for an administration. No saith CHRIST; let the dead bury their dead: thou hast a living father, (let the dead go) that can give thee a better inheritance. But to bury ones Father is Godliness: yes, but saith Jerome; Pietatis genus est, impium esse pro Domino: to neglect our very Parents when God requires it, is piety. Himself testifies; he that loves father or mother better than me, is not worthy of me. This falls heavy on some: the voluptuous loves his wife better, I have married a wife, and therefore I cannot come. Vxori plus datur quàm Christo: the uxorious husband obeys his wives precepts, sooner than God's. The covetous parent loves his child better than the Lord: oppressing God's children to enrich his own. So his young ones be warm in the nest, let CHRIST shake with cold. Love the Lord, and love thy children, or friends: but if necessity enforce the loss of one; In suos odium, est pietas in Deum, Hieron: whatsoever thou lovest, lose not the Lord Jesus. Another said, Lord I will follow thee, but let me first go bid them fare-well that are at home, as if any friend were to stand in competition with CHRIST. But we have always somewhat to do when we should follow him: as Elisha said to Elijah; let me first kiss my father and my mother; then will I follow thee, 1 King. 19.20. Uriah was so earnest of fighting the Lord's battle; that he would not go down to his house, nor sleep with his beautiful wife. Such a zeal, as prefers God's service before all other things, that is godliness.

For the other; it refers all to God's honor: in all things that it does, speaks, or suffers, it declares a purpose of heart to glorify the Lord. All things and actions are Ordinabilia ad deum: deus finis, all else ad finem: what should man desire more than to serve that God who preserves him? Whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God. This is the end of our creation, the beginning of our salvation, the perfection of our happiness. Hast thou wisdom? refer it to the glory of thy maker: otherwise like the Moon, when thou art lightest to the world thou art darkest to heaven. Hast thou strength? use it to resist Satan, to conquer (nor another, but) thyself. Vae fortibus ad peccandum; woe be to them that are strong to sin. Hast thou old age? let thy life grow white with thy hairs: lest thou be Satur Dierum, full of days and fuller of sins. Hast thou honor? employ it to honor him that hath honored thee. Hast thou authority? draw not this sword in thy private wrongs, let it not be sheathed in the Injuries of the Gospel. Hast thou riches? spend them upon Godliness; Pro Pietate sumptum facere, lucrum est. Say not with Judas, Why is this wast? but with David; I will not offer to the LORD of the which costs me nothing. To this general Piety there are two enemies, Profaneness and Hypocrisy.

Profaneness: there are two characters of a man truly Pious; understanding and will: the one in his Science, the other in his Conscience: commonly this vice bewitcheth them both. As thou dost see thy own face in thy heart, so others do see thy heart in thy face. If a drunkard dare number his ebrieties: the lascivious, how often he hath been at the house of sin; who can blanch this ungodliness! But indeed wicked men have more boldness to appear ill, than the godly have to appear good, For he that departeth from evil, maketh himself a prey; or as the original imports, is accounted mad. Any man that carries his face toward Zion, is held an hypocrite: he that is ashamed to do ill, shall be ashamed for his good. This is not a grain of ungodliness, but ungodliness in grain. Can you lament your losses on the seas, the wrack of goods in your ships; and not the shipwreck of a good conscience in your shops? The spider never builds, but where are flies: Satan never placeth his nest, but where is store of these ungodly lusts. Let them banish profaneness, that ever expect the comforts of piety.

Hypocrisy; Have not I chosen you twelve and one of you is a devil? I, not another; emphatically, I, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, the very Wisdom of GOD. Chosen, not entertained offering your service, nor admitted as sutors, but Chosen. You, not the refuse people out of the high ways, nor the great Personages of the Land; but you, whom I have elected to propagate my Gospel, how many? Twelve; a little number: Christ's is the least College. Yet one of you is a devil; lay these particulars together, and sum up a hypocrite. The congregation of hypocrites shall be desolate, Job 15.34. The hypocrite is like Hose's dough-bak'd Cake, Hosea. 7.8. Only hott on the visible side. Seeing the fire of GOD'S Altar, the zeal of the Temple cannot heat them, they are reserved to be baked thoroughly in the Oven of hell.

Endevour then to store thy heart with Godliness: for worldly things, say as he did of Eloquence: Si adsit, non sperno: si absit, non desidero: if they be present, I will use them, if they be absent, I do miss them. Sequere tu Pietatem, caetera sequentur te: follow thou Godliness, other things shall follow thee. First seek the kingdom of God and his righteousness, then shall all these things be added to you. While a man hunts after his own shadow, his back is upon the sun, and still his shadow is unovertaken before him: let him turn his face to the sun, and travel toward it; his shadow shall follow him. The profits and delights of this world are but a shadow, while a man hunts after them his back is upon Jesus Christ, that Sun of righteousness; and he can never overtake them: if he could, yet they are but a shadow. Set thy face and thy faith toward Christ, all these shadows shall wait upon thee. A Painter had drawn Jove's picture, Juno's, and another man's that was his friend. That friend cheapned the other two, and last of all, his own. Nay, says the Painter, buy the other two, and take the last into the bargain. Be sure of Godliness; riches, honors, and pleasures; all those counterfeits of true happiness, shall come into the bargain.

Our discourse hath thus far dwelt on godliness in the latitude. In a stricter acception, I find it especially consisting in two things; Adoration and Imitation of GOD.

Adoration of the true God in a right manner, is Godliness. Nature hath written in every heart, that a Superior power is to be worshipped; though it could not declare, Cui debitum; what power that was which might challenge it. Out of this Ignorance sprung that multitude of imaginary gods; which Saint Paul calls Dumbe Idols. Now he that is dumb, is also commonly deaf: they could neither speak nor hear, Psal. 115.5. They have mouths, and speak not: they have ears, and hear not. To avoid this sin, God gave an express Law; Thou shalt have no other God's but me. Which negative precept especially forbids four things. 1. The having no God at all, as the Atheists; The fool says in his heart, There is no God. 2. The having strange gods, and not the true; as had the Gentiles: gods according to the number of their Cities: every twinkling star was held a deity; yea, many so gross and base gods, that there were not worse creatures in the world, except themselves. 3. The having strange gods with the true, as had the Samaritans; They feared the Lord, and served their own gods, 2 Kin. 17.33. they sware by the Lord, and they sware by Malcham, Zeph. 1.5. They choose new gods; then was war in the gates. 4. The having the true God, but not a-right, according to his will and Word, as Heretics. For this is the main difference between Heresy and Idolatry, that serves the true God with a false worship, this serves false gods with a true worship: Both hateful.

Now seeing the principal part of our Piety stands in the due and true worship of God, it is Satan's main stratagem to subduce it. If it were possible, he would have it himself, and draw us A Cultu dei debito, ad cultum suimet indebitum. He is proud still: amisit celsitatem gloriae, non superbiae; He hath lost the height of his happiness, not the height of his pride. He would be a god, though a hellish god: a Prince, though it be a prince of darkness. Good Angels refuse to be worshipped; when John fell at the Angels feet to worship him; he said to him, See thou do it not.

But evil Angels desire it: to this the Devil persuaded Christ; to fall down and worship him; he durst be so bold with the Son of God himself. Devillish impudence! to request him that is worshipped of the Angels of light, to worship an angel of darkness. But Christ soon choked him; Get thee hence, Satan; for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve, Mat. 4.10. But howsoever he cannot bring men to worship himself immediately, yet he effects this often mediately. If Israel will but make a golden Calf, the Devil finds his own worship in that: If a Papist bows to his crucifix, even here finds himself honored. Albeit they say, we give the Image no worship, think it no god: no more did the Israelites think that Calf their deliverer out of Egypt; yet was this a cursed sin. They say, they worship God before the crucifix; but God rejecting that worship, it stays in the crucifix. Such another policy had the devil to wound Israel; when he presented to them the whores of Moab, Numb. 25. Was only Adultery his aim? No, but Idolatry also. They have beguiled you in the matter of Peor, and the matter of Cozbi, ver. 18. The matter of Peor was wrought by the matter of Cozbi; They went to Baal-peor, and separated themselves to that shame. They joined themselves to Baal-peor, and did eat the sacrifices of the dead, Psal. 106.28. Baal was the Moabitish Idol, Peor a mountain: there they worshipped, and feasted, and ate the offerings of the dead. Not of dead men, but of Idols, which are dead things: for God is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, the living God. But could Satan effectuate this Idolatry in such a people? We read, Numb. 24. Balaam itching after Balaks gold, hereon he practices, and shifts ground; as gamesters do their standings for better luck; and would fain curse; but spite of his teeth he blesseth. Now he sees, there is no way to make God forsake his people, unless they were first brought to forsake him. Therefore it is likely that upon Balaam's advice, the daughters of Moab and Midian were brought before the Israelites; light houswives, dancing, frisking, and flaring; their carriage promising tractableness enough, if the other would come on: so were they tempted to wantonness with those professed strumpets, and by that means to offer up to Baal-peor. This was the devils trick to effect that Art, by fraud, w^{ch} he could not Marte, by open war. Let me a little increase your detestation of idolatrous worship, that you may more sincerely worship God.

1 It is a pleasing sin, therefore more pernicious: few that love it, can be brought to acknowledge it. A Turk believes nothing less, than his Alcoran to be Idolatry. A Monk at his Mass is so far from thinking himself an Idolater, that he calls himself a Spiritual man. Though nothing be more reprov'd in God's Word, and punished in his works, than Idolatry; yet there is in corrupt nature a strange proclivitie to it. The Prophet calls Idols, Delectable things: Their delectable, or desirable things shall not profit them. The Idolater is like a woman inflamed with love toward some proper young man: her affection is so set, that forgetting all modesty, she sends for him, and brings him to the bed of love: Neither left she her whoredoms brought from Egypt: for in her youth they lay with her, and they bruised the breasts of her virginity, and poured their whoredom upon her. Such a whore is the Church of Antichrist, Revel. 17. Whose doctrine like the wine of fornications, goes down merrily, to the intoxication and poison of souls. Only the Gospel hath brought this Land a remedy, no other than the blood of Christ to purge it.

2 It is an impudent sin, and goes to the furthest line of condemnation. It sticks not to take God's blessings with the left-hand, and gives them away to his enemies with the right. So the Israelites received of God Manna, food from heaven; and then sacrificed it to Idols. For it is likely that in the Desert they had no better cheare to feast the Devil with, than Manna and water: their beasts being hardly sufficient to maintain their daily sacrifice to the Lord. God gave them Jewels from the Egyptians, as wages for their service; they melt them to make a Calf. Yea, Children, that are the chief Inheritance on earth; Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them: they shall not be ashamed, when they speak with their enemies in the gates: children, the divided pieces of themselves; so dear, that Rachel mourn for them, and would not be comforted, because they were not: even these they sacrifices to Moloch: Yea, they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto devils; and shed innocent blood of their sons and daughters, whom they sacrificed unto the Idols of Canaan: and the Land was polluted with blood. But, what will ye do in the end thereof? Ier. 5.31. What? Therefore was the wrath of the Lord kindled against his people; insomuch that he abhorred his own inheritance, Psal. 106.40. Ephraim is joined to Idols, let him alone, Hos. 4.7. Let him alone? O fearful: when God takes away correction, damnation enters the doors. Sin shall now be the wages of sin, that death and destruction may be the wages of both: Because Ephraim hath made many altars to sin, altars shall be unto him to sin. This is fearful; therefore I conclude this point, as Saint John doth his first Epistle; Babes, keep yourselves from Idols: Yea, Lord keep us all from them by the grace of thy Spirit.

You see the danger of will-worship, let this contain us in the true adoration of God. Worship is twofold; Civil or Religious. Civil, to men, in respect of their degrees in the Church, Common-wealth, or private family. In regard of Age, give reverence to the gray-head: of gifts, so Elisha revered Elijah: of place; in Church: so Ministers are to reverence their Bishops: in Common-wealth, so subjects must give reverence to Magistrates: in private family, so children owe reverence to their parents, servants to their masters. To God only is due religious worship: they write that to the King of Benin the people give such reverence, that we scarce give more to God. They fall flat on the ground before him, covering their faces, and depart without turning their backs. But to all men give Summa, sed Sua: to God only religious worship; who is so jealous of his honor that he will not give it to another. Be ye never so great, stoop to the Lord: honor him that hath honored you: it is no discredit to your worships to worship God. Christ stooped low for our sakes; He made himself of no reputation, but took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men. What the Barbarians dreamed of Paul and Barnabas, Act. 14.11. Dii descenderunt similitudine hominum; The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men. We found true in Christ; God is come down among us in the likeness of man; Yea, indeed, a true man. GOD said once, Gen. 3.22. in derision of our folly; Behold! the man is become as one of us. But we may say truly, GOD is become as one of us. He that was so low, is now and was ever the most High: Let us adore that blessed JESUS. The LORD saith, when he bringeth in the first begotten into the world; Let all the Angels of God worship him. Do the blessed Angels of heaven, and shall not men on earth worship him? I speak not only of a corporal adoration, though that also be due. At the Name of JESUS should every knee bow, of things in heaven, in earth, and under the earth. Neither do I think the bowing of knee, at the Name of JESUS, to be a fruitless but harmless ceremony. As for their exception, that the bowing more at this, than at other Names of GOD, may breed an error of advancing the Son above the Father and Holy Spirit. We answer, that the truth of the Sons equality with the Father and the Spirit, is a mystery so hard for mortal wits to apprehend; that of all errors, that which may give them the most honor, is less to be feared. Bellarmino observes, that most Heretics have denied the Son, none ever denied the Father to be God. But why not bow we as well at the name of Christ? if any name be greater than other, it seems to be Christ: for he is called Domini Christus, Luk. 2.26. The Lord's Christ. Bernard answers; Of all names given to him, still JESUS is the sweetest. Other are names of Majesty, this of Mercy: the Word of God, the Son of God, the Christ of God; all titles of glory; JESUS, of Grace and Redemption. The contemptible name, which Pilate so scoffed at; JESUS of Nazareth, is so preached and praised; that against all Infidels it hath gotten the preeminence above every name. The condemning then of this honor due to JESUS, is rather an argument of spite, than an evidence of the Spirit; as it hath been said truly. To this Name all shall bow: in heaven, Angels and glorified Spirits: on earth, Men: under the earth, those that be now dead: for all shall appear before his Tribunal with bended knees. Perhaps by under the earth, are meant even devils and damned spirits: though they bow not spontaneae genua; yet they shall give an extorted adoration. Glorious Angels, blessed Spirits, and good Men, have a voluntary geniculation: but the wicked on earth, and fiends in hell, shall be forced to it against their wills. So was Judas; I have sinned in betraying the innocent blood. So Julian; Thou hast overcome, O Galilean! So the devils; What have we to do with thee, Jesus thou Son of God? Matth. 8.29. That evil spirit said; Jesus I know, Act. 19.15. for even the devils believe and tremble. Wicked men now trample his blood, but shall one day submissively acknowledge his Dominion; Lord, when saw we thee hungry, &c. Matth. 25. But this extorted Confession shall be to their Confusion; Depart ye cursed. Thus as every knee should bow, so every knee shall bow; if not out of faith, yet out of fear. I have sworn by myself: the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return; that unto me every knee shall bow, Rom 14.11. He is God, and shall be worshipped.

This I thought good to urge, because as if we had been taught to be proud, there is little reverence among us: I am ashamed to speak it; many sit in the Church as at a Theater: their hands are too idle to uncover their heads, their knees too stiff to bow to Christ. Even to the Gospel, which must save them, or they shall never be saved, their regard is little better than contempt. For shame of men, and Angels, where is our reverence? Do you come hither to give God a blessing, or to take it? Will a Petitioner sue to a Peere with a covered head, or an unmoved knee? Ye shall reverence my Sanctuary, I am the Lord. If the Law challenged such reverence, what doth the Gospel? If the blood of goats had such respect, what requires the Lamb of God, the blood of our Lord Jesus? What is this, but to give the sacrifice of fools? Eccl. 5.1. God will dwell with him, that trembleth at his Word, Isaiah 66.2. We tremble like mountains; yea, the mountains quake at God's presence, saith the Psalmist: we are not moved. But as for me, I will come into thy house in the multitude of thy mercies; and in thy fear will I worship toward thy holy Temple O for one dram of this reverence! But indeed it is in vain to bend the knees, with unbended souls: it is a poor worship, to move our hats, not our hearts. But he doth best, that expresseth before men his zeal by his reverence, and commends before GOD his reverence by his zeal. It is fabled, that when Juno on a day had proclaimed a great reward to him that brought her the best present; there came in a Physician, a Poet, a Merchant, a Philosopher, and a Begger. The Physician presented a hidden secret of nature; a prescript able to make an old man young again. The Poet an Encomiasticke Ode of her bird, the Peacock. The Merchant, a rare hollow Jewel to hang at her ear. The Philosopher, a book of strange mysteries. The poor quaking Begger, only a bended knee, saying, I have nothing worth acceptance; Accipe meipsum, Take myself. Some come hither with prescripts of their own; they have receipts enow already, they care for no more. Other like the Poet, come to admire Peacocks, the gawdie Popinjays, and fashionists of the time, blustering in their painted feathers. Other like the Merchant, present Jewels; but they are hollow: come with critical or hypocritical humors: like Carpes, to bite the net, and wound the Fisher; not to be taken. Some like the Philosopher, bring a book with them; which they read without minding the Preacher, saying, they find more learning there, than he can teach them. But blessed are the poor in spirit; that like the Begger, give themselves to God. Juno gave the reward to him, God gives the blessing to these. He hath filled the hungry with good things, but the rich he hath sent empty away. A reverent heart shall carry away the comfort: Godliness in the humble dust of Adoration, shall be lifted up by the hand of mercy.

Imitation of God follows: for what else is godliness, but to be like God? We were all made after his Image; that was lost: now our regeneration is nothing else but the repairing of that Image. Be ye therefore followers of God, as dear children. True children will imitate their parents: if we do not follow God, we are bastards. Follow thy Father, as Ascanius did Aeneas, though non passibus aequis. It is written, Be ye holy, for I am holy, 1 Pet. 1.16. By nature a Noah may beget a Cham; Abraham an Ishmael: but in grace, the most Holy begets no children but Saints. He that saith he abideth in him, ought himself to walk even as he walked. He is no member that walks a contrary way to his head. If Jesus go unto the Mount to pray, and Judas to the Pharisees to betray, he is no Apostle, but an Apostate. This is my way, saith Christ, the light of Truth: if you will go by darkness, because your deeds are evil; we shall never meet, till we meet in judgment. Be you merciful, for your Father in heaven is merciful. God loves mercy; they that love it not, are not Godly. I wonder what hope; oppressors of their poor tenants; Usurers with their forfeitures; contentious men with their Law-vexations; the malicious with their injuries, can have? The Father of mercies hath no children but the merciful. Judgment merciless shall be to him that shows no mercy, 1 am. 2.13. The poor man that hath smarted with their cruelty, may taste the sweets of God's mercy: Wretched they! this cup shall never touch their lips. Have mercy on me, says the poor wretch to his living oppressors; no. Have mercy on me, saith the dying oppressor to God: No, Go ye cursed; you had no mercy on others, there is no mercy for yourselves. If thou seen a man unmerciful, be bold to say he is ungodly.

Thus Piety consists in the imitation of God: Pii nomen non meruit, qui Dei exemplum non coluit. Indeed this name is often usurped, seldom justified. There are some things, wherein it is no Godliness to ambiguate a likeness to God. Contend not to be like him in the Arm of his power, for this Nebuchadnezzar lost his kingdom: nor in the finger of his miracles, for this Simon Magus was cast down, and broke his neck: nor in the face of his Majesty, for this Lucifer was thrown out of heaven: nor in the Brain of his wisdom, for this Adam was driven out of Paradise. But in the bowels of his mercy; according to this we shall be everlastingly rewarded. Never did, or shall, Man or Angel offend, in coveting to be like God in meekness, in goodness, in charity, in mercy. Imitate his Morals, not his Miracles.

To conclude, let me set this mark upon Godliness: Prove yourselves Content and I will assure you Godly. Godliness with contentment is great gain, 1 Tim. 6.6. The Apostle seeing such universal labor for small gain, thought to win men with great gain. But what is that? Godliness? Here's a paradox will hardly be received: he had need of good Logic, for this is a hard position. The whole world thinks gain to be godliness, and doth Paul say Gcdlinesse is gain? Michaiah had not so many opponents, four hundred to one, 1 King. 22. He shall have merchant with his adventures, Land-lord with his fines, Patron with his Simonies, Usurer with his obligations, Lawyer with his cases; all striving to confute this, crying out for gain, as the Ephesians for their Goddess; Great is Diana of the Ephesians. Indeed all men cannot, and many men will not, receive this saying. You will not believe it, though it be told you, Habac. 1.5. This saying may, like the Lord, Psal. 14.2. Look down from heaven, to see if any will regard it: None, no not one. It may go from Court to City, from City to Country, and scarce one of a thousand will yield to it. But as the Bride was decked for her Beloved, Psal. 45. in garments of needle-work, and a vesture of wrought gold, with jewels and ornaments: So God trims up Piety, sweet and beauteous in her-self, with rich endowments of honor, pleasure, peace, and happiness; as it were Letters of Commendations, that all might love her. No worldly gain can satisfy man's heart: Israel murmured as much when they had Manna, as when they had it not: and rich men are as troubled with that they possess, as poor men for that they want. Jacob gave Reuben a blessing, but added, Thou shalt not be excellent, Gen. 49. So God gives the worldling riches, but says, Thou shalt not be satisfied. But when Piety cometh, Content follows it: you found small peace in the world, you shall have great peace in conscience. When Christ brought salvation to Zacchaeus, his mind altered: before he did nothing but scrape, now he was all for giving. This was not the first day that he seemed rich to others, but this was the first day he seemed rich to himself. Riches bring contention, Godliness brings contentation. Gaine hath often hurt the getters, Piety is profitable to all men. Wealth comes, and a man is not pleased: honor comes, and yet he is not pleased: the lusts of the flesh are fulfilled, and yet he is not pleased: but when Godliness comes, his cup is full: The lines aye fallen unto me in pleasant places, I have a goodly heritage. As Philip said, Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth, John. 14.7. So Lord, give us Godliness, and it sufficeth. What the rich man falsely usurped, this certainly affordeth; Soul rest, sat habes, thou hast enough. If the Son make you free, ye shall be free indeed: If Godliness make you rich, ye shall never be poor.

Verse 7.

To Godliness Brotherly Kindnesse.

FOR better method of proceeding in the description of this next Grace, let me guide my discourse and your attention through these five particulars. The Connection, Definition, Distinction, Conclusion, Application.

First, for Connection and Dependance, we must consider the reasons why the Apostle joins immediately to godliness, Brotherly kindness. We have three reasons.

1 Because Brotherly kindness is the daughter of Godliness. He that loves God for his own sake, will love his brother for God's sake. Peter loveth thou me? feed my lambes. What you have done to these little ones, ye have done to me, Mat. 25. Ille been agit quae justa sunt, qui novit prius servare quae pia sunt, Greg. He may best be good to his brother, that hath first learned to be good to his Father. Rivus charitatis ducitur de fonte pietatis. The river of charity springs from the fountain of piety.

2 Because Brotherly kindness is the moderatour of Godliness. Some men's piety runs an impetuous pace; so fast that it forgets to salute their brother by the way. Those two Disciples were so hot for Christ, that they would needs have fire from heaven upon their brethren. As Judas would have hindered Mary's piety by show of Charity: so the Pharisees overthrew Charity with the shows of Piety, They devour widows houses, and for a pretence make long prayer. God loves not such mad zeal, that so fixeth the eyes on heaven, that it despiseth to look on their poor brother on earth. Indeed when such an opposition meets us, that either we must forsake Christ, or our brother; then himself teacheth us to leave all, and so follow him. But when there is no such necessity, God is often contented to depart from his own right, that we may succor our brother. Go learn what that meaneth; I will have mercy and not sacrifice, Matth. 9.13. Merciful works to thy brother, are Pro sacrificiis, Heb. 13.16. and Prae sacrificiis, Hos. 6.6. God will forgive the omission of piety, upon good cause of fraternall charity. He will spare the wife from Church to comfort her sick husband; the mother, to relieve her distressed child. We have those will run so fast to a Sermon, that they will not stay to give a poor orphan a penny. The true Catholic hath a catholic care: and sets not the two Tables at variance; both which look to God's obedience, as the two Cherubims to the Mercy-seat. I know there is a Great Commandment, and another (but) like unto it, Mat. 22.38. But let not sacrifice turn mercy out of doors, as Sara did Hagar: nor the flames of Zeal consume the moisture of Charity, as the fire from heaven drunk up the water at Eliahs sacrifice. Godliness works by brotherly kindness, Gal. 5.6. No man must look so high, that he overlook his brother, Isaiah 58.3. You fast and mourn, and I regard it not, saith the Lord; because ye exact upon the poor: Pietatem hanc ego nolo; Charity is the Kings high-way to heaven: Zeal like Cushi runs apace, but love like Ahimaaz, gets first to the King, because it runs by the way of the plain, 2 Sam. 18.23. Only that Godly man which is kind to his brother, comes with best speed to his Maker.

3 Because Godliness is proved by brotherly kindness; this is our demonstration that we love GOD. With one and the same Charity we love both GOD and our brother: the difference is in the degrees and respects; God for himself, others for him, and in him. There is nothing more easy than to ostent the love of GOD; but the lack of charity, is the conviction of hypocrisy, 1 Cor. 13.1. There be many donations of the Spirit: Though I spake with tongues of men: so many tongues as that divine Poet wrote of Queen Elizabeth:

That Rome, Rhine, Rhone, Greece, Spain, and Italy;

Plead all for right in her nativity.

Yea, of Angels, Si quae sint Angelorum linguae, Ieron. If at least the Angels have any language. Yet if we have not charity, we are as sounding Brasse or a tinkling Cymball. Like Balaam's Ass, that spake to better her master, not her self. Or the Sermon-bell that rings others to Church, while it self still hangs in the steeple, and hears nothing. Though we had the gift of prophecy; so Balaam, Saul, Caiaphas prophesied; yet wanting Charity; the first loved gold more than God: the second, his lusts more than his obedience: the last condemned JESUS CHRIST. Though we had all knowledge, yet wanting Charity; we might like the Pharisees, open the door for others, and not go in ourselves. Without Charity we are nothing; nothing In esse Gratiae, how great soever In esse Naturae, Aquin. Yea, though we gave our bodies to be burned; though we not only speak but suffer; not do, but die. Of all sufferings death is the most terrible, of all deaths, Burning. Now Si tradidero, If I give; not by compulsion, but of mine own accord; as it is said of CHRIST; Tradidit seipsum, Ephes. 5.2. He gave himself. Si tradidero corpus, If I give my Body: not only suffer loss of goods, and that is much; To take joyfully the spoiling of our goods: but calamities in our body; as the father of lies spake truly in this: Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath, will he give for his life, Job 2.4. Si tradidero corpus Meum, if I give My body: not my childes body, as Abraham offered Isaac's, not only flesh of my flesh, but flesh that is my Flesh. Si tradidero morti; If I give my body to Death, not only to pain and passion. Yea, not to a natural death, this law must pass upon all men; but to a violent death. Lastly, to a death so violent, that there is not a greater torment; to be roasted and consumed in the fire; to be burned. Here be many acts of patience, of Piety; yet if we hate our brother, all is lost. Therefore Stephen, when he died for godliness, forgot not brotherly kindness. Lord lay not this sin to their charge. As if the want of this would discredit the cause, or endanger the reward. So did other Martyrs, fetching this example from the Head: Father forgive them, for they know not what they do, Luk. 23.34. Thus necessary is this connection: he that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in darkness still. If there could be a godliness destitute of this, it should never be welcome to Christ.

Secondly, for the definition of this Philadelphia; It is a love to the faithful; to such as profess the same faith with us, and by that faith are adopted heirs to the same God, through the brother-hood of the same CHRIST. It is distinguished from charity by the nearness and dearness. By nearness, I mean not local, but mystical: Charity hath a great latitude, and is like the heaven that covers all: brotherly kindness like the sun that shines upon the one half at one. The firmament sends influence to more than the sun, but the sun comes nearer to that object it blesseth, than the firmament. By dearness, for the bond of nature is not so strong as the bond of Grace. Our creation hath made us friends, and given us amity: our Redemption hath made us brethren, and given us unity, Gal. 3.28. We are all one in Jesus Christ. Therefore though we are formerly bound, to do good to all; yet here by a new bond, especially to them that are of the household of faith. Be good to every man, more good to a Christian, most good to a faithful Christian; for thou art tied to him in the bond of the nearest fraternity.

Consider then here the ground of this Brother-hood, which is the bond of Adoption. Which if it have power to bind God to man, and man to God; then much more to bind man to man. Religion is a binder, Evangelium colligit: the Gospel hath a combining power, to gather into one fold all the sheep of CHRIST, wandering on the mountains of the broad earth. Friendship is a great uniter; it knows no other language but Tuus sum totus; I am wholly thine. It is ready to exclude those possessives, Meum and Tuum, from being any parts of speech, and to drown all propriety. Marriage is a great uniter, stronger than friendship, by God's ordinance: it knows no other method but composition. Among Pagans it brought two into one lawful bed: the bride could challenge on her wedding day of the bridegroom; Vbi tu Gaius, ego Caia; where you are master, I must be mistress. Among Christians it goes further; not only to bring two into one house, but two into one flesh. As God by creation made two of one, so again by marriage he made one of two. But the principal attractive, congregating, and combining power in the world, to draw together heaven and earth, sea and land, East and West, Jews and Gentiles; and to make one of two, of ten, of thousands, of all, is the Gospel; the bond of our Christian covenant; which makes us all one in the LORD JESUS. Thus we are compact under the government of one Lord, tied by the bond of one faith, washed from our sins by one layer, nourished by the milk of one Gospel, feasted at the supper of one and the same Lamb, assumed by one and the same spirit, to the Inheritance of one and the same kingdom, and shall be brought all to one and the same salvation.

In the third place we come to the distinction: there are three sorts of Brethren; by Race, Place, and Grace.

By Race; and: that either by Birth: such as have the same parents; so Jacob and Esau were brethren. Or by blood; so Abraham and Lot were called brethren, Gen. 13.8. So our blessed Savior was said to have brethren and sisters, Mark. 6.3. Mary his mother was a pure virgin, as well as after his birth, as before his conception. Hebridius the heretic abusing that Text, Matth. 1.25. He knew her not, till she had brought forth her first borne son: held that Mary had more children because Christ was called her first borne. But so, Hebr. 1.6. He is called Primogenitus Patris, the first begotten son of the Father: yet, John. 3.16. he is Vnigenitus Patris, the one begotten son of his father. So he is called the first borne of his mother, not that she had: any child after him, but because she had none before him. This word [Until] only doth negatively exclude the time past, no ways affirmatively insinuate the time to come. So Matth. 28.20. I am with you always, even Till the end of the world: he doth not mean to leave us then, but to be with us forever Act. 3.21. The heaven must receive Christ, until the times of restitution of all things: what no longer? yes, and after that restoring also, 2 Sam. 6.23. Michal had no child until the day of her death; and it is certain that she had none afterward. Therefore James and Ioses, Judah and Simon, were Christ's brethren Cognitione, by kindred, Gen. 29.15. Laban said unto Jacob; because thou art my brother, &c. Laban was his Master, his Vnkle, his Father, yet he also calls him brother. This is one kind of fraternity.

By Place, such as are of the same nation, Deut. 17.15. Thou shalt choose a king from among thy brethren, that is of thy own nation; not a stranger, Deut. 23.20. unto a stranger thou mayest lend upon usury, but not unto thy brother, Rom. 9.3. I could wish myself separated from Christ, for my brethren, my kinsemen according to the flesh. So all Englishmen are brethren; all in nation, not all in affection. For some of them were so brotherly kind, that they would have powder'd us: and they have left their spawn behind them; that if their power were answerable to their will, they would, in kindness, cut all our throats.

By Grace; and this is either common or special, that is spiritual; by generation or regeneration. In the former respect all men are brethren: God hath made of one blood all nations of men. We are brothers by the mothers side, they call it the surer side: all our bodies are from the womb of one earth, returneable to the bowels of one earth. Brothers by the fathers side; all our souls are from heaven, inspired by the breath of one Creator. In the latter respect, we are all brethren in Christ. By creation we have a brother-hood with the creatures; so Job calls the worms his sisters, Job 17.14. By renovation we have a brother-hood with the Angels.

You see the kinds of this Fraternitie; let us now come to the fourth point of the method; to draw some conclusions from it. Here consider two things, the necessity and the practice; wherefore we must have it, and wherein it consisteth.

The necessity is great: our Apostle would not have given it a room among these principal graces, if he had not found it, Et in se dignum, & aplerisque dedignatum; worthy in it self, and yet generally neglected. It is worthy in it self: that virtue which is ranked with Godliness, must needs be honorable. Here behold God's great goodness and mercy; who doth not only provide for his own glory, but man's good. A man would think, so long as he is served by godliness, what should he care whether we serve one another with kindness? yes; he esteems no man his servant, that is not his brothers friend: if we be not kind to our brethren, he values not our kindness to him. David would little respect the peace-offers of the Ammonites, who had so villainously entreated his servants, 2 Sam. 10. God abhors the Israelites challenge of his paternitie, when they had beaten his servants that demanded his rent, and slew his son. Our Faith, knowledge, temperance, patience, concern ourselves: our Virtue and Piety, God: only these two last. Brotherly love and Charity, hath he put in for men. See his goodness: of eight he hath given four to thyself, allowed two for thy brother, and hath reserved but two immediately for himself, that owes all. Now albeit this grace be worthy in it self, yet we are apt to neglect it: therefore our Apostle in his two Epistles urgeth it four several times, 1 Pet. 1.22. Chap. 2.17. Love the brother-hood. Chap. 3.8. Love as brethren; and lastly here in my Text. Saint Paul in his writings thrice, Romans. 12.10. Bekindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love, 1 Thes. 4.9. Hebr. 13.1. Let brotherly love continue. Diverse of the fathers in their several Apologies highly commended this virtue. This inculcating doth insinuate both the precious necessity, and the common disestimation of it. All ages have complained the want of it The Poet wrote long since; Fratrum quoque gratia rara est. The Prophet; Take ye heed everyone of his neighbor, and trust ye not in a brother: for every brother will utterly supplant, Ier. 12.6. Even thy brethren, and the house of thy father, have dealt treacherously with thee. Our Savior; The brother shall betray the brother to death, Mark. 13.12. The Apostle; 1 Cor. 6.8. you do wrong, and defraud, and that your brethren, Gal. 2.4. He tells them of false brethren, privily coming, &c. He reckoneth it as none of the least exigence he was driven to, to be in peril of false brethren, 2 Cor. 11.26. now what is so frequently taught, at last let it be learned.

Let us come now to the practice, wherein this Philadelphia consisteth; and this we must consider negatively and positively; in non officiando, in proficiendo. First, what it forbids and debarres, as opposites to it, and murderers of it.

First, contentious litigation, 1 Cor. 6.6. Their is utterly a fault amongst you, that brother goeth to Law with brother. How unnatural is it, for one hand to strike another. Hath CHRIST made thee friends with God, and wilt thou not be friends with thy brother? Non erit tibi concordia cum Christo, si sit discordia cum christiano. So Abraham entreated Lot; let there be no strife between us for we are brethren. So Moses endeavored to pacify the two Hebrews, Act. 6.28. Sirs, why do ye wrong one to another, for ye are brethren? Art thou a Christian, and seekest to undo thy brother? It's one of the Abominations, which God's very Soul hateth, Prov. 6.19. But the more busy such devilish engines and Incendiaries are to separate us, the more constantly let us hold together.

Secondly, an inveterate hatred; which is a most degenerate passion; to hate the son of a man's own mother? As Joseph's brethren hated him, because his father loved him, Gen. 37.4. a fault that cost them dear afterwards. God loves all his children, wilt thou hate him that God loves? My delight is in the Saints, saith that royal Prophet, Psal. 16.3. Let all brother haters know their wretchedness; he that hateth his brother is in darkness. That is miserable enough, to live in darkness, hellish darkness: but this is not all; for he lives in death, 1 John 3.15. whosoever hateth his brother, is a murderer: and a murderer cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven. So that, whosoever hates another, condemneth himself: and is lost in a voluntary blood-guiltiness.

Thirdly, even anger it self is a traitor to this virtue: for as hatred is a long anger, so anger is a short hatred malice is nothing else but inveterate wrath. The causes anger is in danger of Judgment. A choleric disposition is no excuse: for as every man is either a fool or a physician: so every Christian is either a mad-man or a Divine: a mad-man, if he gives his passion the reins, a Divine if he qualifies it. When a railing fellow reviled Pericles all day, and night in the same tune followed him home to his gate: he all this while not returning a word, now commanded one of his servants with a torch to light the brawler home to his house. Thus did an Ethnicke: therefore if a brother offend upon ignorance, neglect it: if upon infirmity, forget it: if upon malice, forbear it: upon what terms so ever, forgive it, as thou wouldest be forgiven of God.

Fourthly, oppression is a horrible breach of this Fraternitie. Let no man over-reach or oppress his brother. Even the Jew that might take usury of a heathen, might not take it of his brother. Thus our usurers common distinction is taken away: for all Christians are brethren, and I think they deal not with Infidels. Unless they help themselves thus, that they may take usury of Christians because themselves are none.

Lastly, a proud dedignation and contempt of their brethren. Thou sittest and speakest against thy brother, thou slanderest thine own mothers son. So the Church complains, Cant. 1.6. My mothers children were angry with me. Wilt thou despise him that is CHRIST'S brother? Is he vile in their eyes whom the Lord Jesus bought so dear? We all grow up together a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of CHRIST, Eph. 4.13. The poorest soul of this brother-hood must concur to make up the perfection of CHRIST. Comfort thyself thou faithful spirit: they blush at thy acquaintance, scorn thy company: but the Lord thinks himself not perfect without thee.

Thus privatively, now positively. This brotherly kindness is shown in reprehending those we love. Non minima pars dilectionis, reprehendere delictum. Thou shalt rebuke thy brother, and not suffer sin upon him; thou shalt not hate him in thine heart. So that not to rebuke him, is to hate him. Non fratri irascitur, qui peccato fratris irascitur, Aug. He is not angry with his brother, that is angry with the sin of his brother. Hate not virum but vitium. The best brotherly love is to the soul: love to his body is but the body of love: the soul of love is the love of his soul.

Why did David so mourn for Absalom, wishing to have died for him; but in love to his soul? Now much of this love stands in a mild reproof: so let us live brothers on earth, that we may forever live together brothers in heaven; and be so kind as to help forward one another's salvation. There are many other offices of this brotherly love, but they are no strangers to you; it is enough to have named them. Such as helping their poor estates: for the love of God is not in him, that hath, and refuseth to give to him that hath not. All are for the brother-hood, but few for their brothers good. Praying for them; this the very first words of the LORD'S prayer teacheth us; Our Father; not my father, but our: we desire others should fare as well as ourselves. Some only pray for themselves and their families; as the Athenians offered sacrifice for none but themselves, and their neighbors of Chios. But we have all one father; and therefore he that speaks must plead the cause of the rest of his brethren. I pray not for these alone, saith Christ, but for all them, &c. John. 17.20. Pray we for others, others for us, as Christ doth pray for us all.

I come to the last point, that is the application; let this Philadelphia dwell ever among us. There be diverse brother-hoods.

The Papists have their fraternities, yea their paternities, their maternities, and their sister-hoods. Jesuits will not be called Fratres, but Patres; holy fathers. But in mean time they neglect their own fathers, they must not know them, nor call them so. They say to him that enters their order; Quid tibi cum patre? what hast thou to do with thy father? thou hast no father but the Pope Quid tibi cum matre? what hast thou to do with thy mother? Thou hast no mother but the Church of Rome. Quid tibi cum fratribus? what to do with thy brethren. Thou hast no brethren but these of the same order; or haply the Friars, &c. Quid tibi cum sororibus? what hast thou to do with thy sisters? these now are only the Nuns. Here's a brother-hood.

The Schismatics have a brother-hood, and they hold themselves the only pure brethren in Christ: but they have ill luck in it, for nobody else holds them so. It seems they dwell by neighbors that have little cause to love them, who are thus fain to commend themselves. They are so brotherly kind, that they turn charity quite out of doors. They will feed at your tables, though they will not brother with you; and they have scripture for it; that Elias refused not the meat brought by an unclean raven. But if all rich men (for those burrs stick to no others) were of my mind, such pure, proud, factious and scornful brethren should go seek their dinners. Albeit they take us for Ravens, I am sure they are no Elijah's. You shall never come to taste their dishes; and they have Scripture for it, Not to communicate, not to drink with them that are not their brethren; (they mean) at home, and at their own cost. He that cannot rail against Church government, is not a guest for their tables. Every morsel they cut, they wish it were a bishopric. Here is a brother-hood, but it is a bad one, a mad one. These are Nigri fratres, that love to foot and grime the face of their mother. They are so linked to the fraternity, that let another man fall into their hands, there is no mercy to be expected. Forfeitures fall to them by providence; and it is the man's unworthiness for which they undo him. Impudent wretches, that dare father their wickedness upon God's allowance! But they that thus despise the brother-hood of Christians, shall be found no brothers to CHRIST.

Libertines and profane persons have a brother-hood too: but commonly it is an ale-house brother-hood, and their kindred comes in by the pot. And this is no wonder, for briars and thorns embrace and twine more together than good plants. Saint Peter says, love brotherly fellowship: but these two, brother-hood and fellowship have ill luck, they are continually seeking one another, but they seldom meet. For most men are either brothers and not companions, or companions and not brothers. Schismatics are all for the brother-hood, and nothing for society: Libertines are all for society, and nothing for brother-hood. Neither of these do well asunder, happily well both together.

I might touch upon diverse other brother-hoods brothers of the Rosy-Cross, Brothers of the Reconciliation, brothers of the Elixar, chiming, cheating, rather couzens than brothers, more foolish than Popish, and more knavish than either. But let them be buried in oblivion, whose very names make a stink.

If all these have their brotherhoods, let not us Christians be behind them. We have all one father, Mat. 23.9. Call no man father, for one is your Father in heaven. All one mother Jerusalem above is the mother of us all. All one elder brother Who is the first borne among many brethren. For our Fathers sake, for our mothers sake, for our brothers sake, for our own sake, let us hold together as brethren I cannot say with Paul, Touching brotherly love, ye need not that I write unto you: for ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another. There is two much need, there was never more Saint John, Revel. 3.7. mentions a whole Church, called Philadelphia, brotherly-love Saint Augustine thought it a fit name for all christendome: for how far so ever believers are dispersed, they are all brethren. All are brethren, but we that live together in one country, are twins. It is therefore a most fit name for England and the Lord make England Philadelphiam; that everyone of us may love another, and Jesus Christ may love us all.

To brotherly kindness, Charity.] We are now gotten to the roof of this spiritual house, Charity. This is the highest round of the ladder: there be eight steps, this is the uppermost; as nearest to heaven. It hath a further extent than Philadelphia; that is only to brethren in the same faith, this is to all, even to our enemies, Matth. 5.44. All men love their friends, but Christians love their enemies, Tertullian. Beatus qui amat te, & amicum in te, & inimicum propter te. Aug. It is greater than faith, and hope, 1 Cor. 13. Faith shall bring in vision, vision shall thrust out faith: Hope shall lead in possession, possession shall cast forth hope. Above all things put on Charity: here are three particulars; the Action, put on: the Affection, the robe of Charity: the preeminence; Above all. We find a preeminence, if we read Super haec omnia, above all: a necessity, if we read Ad haec omnia, To these all. Put it on, as either clothes for covering, or armor for descending. It is a good armor against Satan's temptations to sin, or accusations for sin. Of all men, seldom is any great sin fastened on the charitable: how should he speed ill, that hath so many prayers! It is a good covering, Job professes that he had warmed the poor with the fleece of his sheep, Job 31.20. That charity which keeps the poor receivers body warm, keeps the givers soul warmer. Whether it consists in donando, or in condonando: in bearing and forbearing, in case of wrong: in beneficence and giving, in case of need. Put it on: wisdom and treasures hidden are unprofitable; this must not be hidden as a night-gown, or closset-robe, but worn: Yea, keep it on; it must not be a loose garment, soon on and soon off. Charity, some think, is a vesture that will quickly be worn out; therefore they seldom wear it, unless it be on high days, and then they give a little to a collection. But it should be rather like the Israelites clothes in the desert, lasting forty years. If this grace be wanting, all the former are lost: brotherly love is not, Godliness vanisheth, there is no place for Patience, temperance is worthless, knowledge is obscured, all Virtue pineth away. Oh that now your hearts, like those two disciples going to Emaus, had this doctrine of Charity, burning within you. Here for methods sake consider we the motives to it, and the materials of it. The motives are deduced from the necessity, the dignity, the commodity, the danger of neglecting it. The necessity must be considered in respect of God, of ourselves.

The necessity of it in respect of God, appears by his charging us with it, both in the Law and in the Gospel, Levite. 19.18. John 13.34. But how then does CHRIST calls it a New Commandment. It is answered; vetus ration veritatis, novum ration usus. It is old in regard of the truth, new in regard of the use. Papists think it too new; they will be brotherly kind to their own tribe; love none but those that love them. They affect some new things, dethroning of Princes, &c. but not this. Sectaries think it too old, they will none of charity: they love no old thing, but Adams old sin of disobedience. Poor charity cannot find a bosom to rest in; it is too new for some, and too old for others. Paul bids us put it on; but some think it too costly a garment, and will not become them. The Poet hath a fable, that an old man travelling with his little son, and having but one beast between them; the father did ride and the child went a foot: then the people exclaimed and said he was an unkind father, who being of able limbs would take his ease and put his tender form to trudge by him. Hereon he set up his son, and went a foot himself: then they called him kind dotard, that would let a young boy ride, while his aged father travelled by him. Hearing this, he got up with his son, they did both ride: now the people railed on him for an unmerciful man to his beast; saying, they might ride by turns. Then they lighted both, and would neither ride; now the people began to laugh at them, that both would lead an empty beast, and go on foot themselves. Lastly when he saw that nothing could please them, he went and drowned his beast; and loe, now he was derided most of all. This is Charities luck: the old man tells the young that he ought to be charitable, because he is coming into the world, and hath his fortunes before him. The young man, tells the old, that he ought to be charitable, because he is going out of the world; that he may well spare his clothes that is going to bed. The father and son conclude, that if they should both be givers, this were the way to over-load charity; to make others rich, and themselves beggars. When neither of them gives, but leave charity empty, the world curses them for miserable wretches. Lastly, they consent to drown poor charity in the gulf of covetousness: and make open profession to the world, that they will not be troubled with such a virtue. Because thou canst not content all men, wilt thou refuse to please God?

The necessity of it follows, in respect of thyself. Things of greatest use should be of greatest estimation. Thou wouldest know if thou breathest Christian; the sign of it is thy Charity. This is the pulse of Faith; Saint James his demonstration: Shew me thy faith by thy works. This is the best testification of thy love to God, saith Saint John. True religion must be considered both Quoad extra, and Quoad intra: so it is defined, I am. 1.27. Pure religion and undefiled before God is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their afflictions, and to keep himself unspotted from the world. Here is a description of it; Quid in se, quale in alios. In it self it is Religion, a binding quality; and hath three proofs: by nature, it is Pure: by quality, undefiled: by object, Before God. Now Quoad extra, for the effects; these are two: Innocence in ourselves, Charity towards others; relieving the widow and Orphant. Religion is not only contemplative; but the greater part of it, like the Mathematickes, is in demonstration. There can be no assurance to thy soul, that thou art in GOD'S favor without Charity. Indeed faith is the life of a Christian; but the breath whereby he is known to live, is Charity, Though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and have not charity, it profiteth me not nothing. But may there be a giving away of our goods to the poor, without charity? Yes; observe in those words five degrees: 1. Si impertiam, it is a good man's part to lend, Psal 37.26. He is merciful and lendeth: but here though I give; whereas most men open their hands only to take: give, and give freely without expectation of repayment. 2. My own, not another's: for many will cut large shivers of another's loaf: but my goods, Eccles. 11.1. Cast thy bread on the waters. 3. All my goods; not a little superfluity, not a competent portion, no nor yet a great sum; but all, Mat. 19.21. Behold, we have left all, and followed thee. 4. Not to the rich, but to the poor, such as have need, with a discreet election of objects for bounty, Isaiah 58.7 Break thy bread to the hungry. 5. To feed the poor, not to feast them; not superfluously, but necessarily. Yet a man may do all this out of ostentation, curious ambition, or idle prodigality; and not from the internal habit of charity, which is a gracious love to Christ and his members: and the Hoc aliquid, hoc multum, hoc totum nihil est: This somewhat, this much, this all, is nothing at all with God. Thus necessary is Charity, without which Aut non habentur caetera, aut frustra habentur omnia; A man hath nothing in substance, or all things without comfort. A certain King of Northumberland in that great controversy about Easter; some alleging for Peter, others for John; bethought himself that Peter was the Porter of heaven-gate; therefore resolved to take that side, saying, he would make the Porter his friend, that when he came thither he might be sure to get in. Whatsoever he dreamt of Peter, do thou by Charity make Christ thy friend: he is Ianua vitae, the door of everlasting life; he must let thee in, or there is no entrance for thee. Yea make him thy friend, for he is the Lord of the kingdom. Thus also are the poor madethy friends, ready to receive thee into everlasting habitations.

The Dignity follows. It is munus regale; yea, opus divinum▪ a royal office, a divine practice. Mercy or charity is the sole work communicable to man with God. The Lord is content to acknowledge himself the charitable man's debtor; He hath lent to the Lord, and he will pay him again, Prov. 19.17. But still this payment is not deserved of man, but conferred of God. It must needs be an excellent thing, that brings God to an acknowledgement. There is an Usury in the world much applauded, more defended, most of all practiced; the very shame of Christendom. It was a shame for a Galatian to be a circumcised Christian: it is more shame for a Christian to be a baptized Jew. It is a Jewish sin, send it back to the owners: we traffic many things, it were a blessed ship that could quite transport Usury. I will tell you of a lawful Usury, (not that the world runs mad upon, but rather runs from) a practice that needs no patron to defend it, it will reward and protect it self. Foenerare, non fratri, sed Domino: hae enim usurae regnum, illae gehennam preparant, Chrys. Put forth thy goods for usury to God, not to thy brother: that Usury shall bring thee a kingdom of peace; the other shall procure thee a place in torment. Below perhaps thou contentest thyself with ten in the hundred, above thou shalt have an hundred for one. Now if it be true, that the borrower is a servant to the lender; then by lending to him, in charity to his, after a sort we have a hand upon God himself. And this is the dignity of charity, the great acceptation with God: so Christ honors it, Matth. 25. Come ye blessed &c. excellent grace, that is so gracious with Christ!

The Commodity of it follows; It secureth all, it increaseth all, it blesseth all. It secureth all; like an Ambassador by lying Lieger abroad, it makes all safe at home. It deriveth from the poor this prayer; God bless your store: it deriveth from God this blessing, I will abundantly bless thy provision. It increaseth all: it makes friends; praying friends; as they beg of thee, so they beg of God for thee. For a benefactor is a petty creator: thou givest a penny, it is his patrimony. Their devotions are sent up to heaven for thy blessing: and as the Bishop told Monica weeping for her seduced son; Fieri non potest, ut filius istarum Lacrimarum pereat: It cannot be that the son of those tears should ever perish. So be comforted in thy charity. Fieri non potest ut filius istarum precum pereat; It cannot be, that they for whom are sent up so many prayers, should ever perish; it leaves behind thee an everlasting memory; living thou art honored, dead well reported; He hath given to the poor, his righteousness endureth forever. Thus Charity, says Chrysostom, is Ars quaestuosissima, the most gainful art; it is a field sown, the crop is thine. He that sows bountifully, shall reap bountifully: How bountifully? Christ answers; a measure heaped, and shaken, and pressed together, yet running over. It blesseth all: a main act of piety in the Law was Sacrifice, a main act of piety in the Gospel is Charity. This is an Evangelical Sacrifice, with which God is pleased, Heb. 13.16. Now the poor are the altar whereon we must offer this sacrifice. Charity sanctifies all: Give, and all shall be clean to you: you shall have new bags, which wax not old, new garments, which shall never be worn out, new gold, which cannot be rusted, Luke 12.33. God is loath thou shouldst lose thy wealth, therefore bids thee trust him with it: Non erit remotius, sed certius; It shall not be further from thee, but surer to thee: The Omnipotent shall keep it for thee that art impotent: no thief can break into heaven, to steal it from thee: it is out of the reach of the most merciless oppressor. Thou sayest, I trust in Christ to be saved: now darest thou trust him with that precious jewel, thy soul; and not with thy base worldly trash?

Lastly, the danger of neglecting Charity, is the Curse; Go ye cursed, you did not relieve me, Mat. 25. If thou being rich wilt not give to the poor, he that is the most Rich will give nothing to thee. He that stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, shall cry himself and not be heard, Prov. 21.13. Shouldest thou not have had compassion on thy fellow servant, as I had pity on thee? Matth. 18.33. There is judgment merciless to the unmerciful, I am. 2.13. If any man think the omission of this duty to be too severely judged; Chrysostom answers, that as it is a kind of homicide to take away from the poor; and he that doth it is vir sanguinum, a man of blood. So not to give to the poor is little less: for two ways is a lamp put forth; either by blowing it out, or by not pouring oil into it. He that can save, and will not, kills: so that the very want of charity is murder. This danger will be found great, Matth. 25. they are not arraigned for want of justice, nor for want of wisdom, nor for want of temperance; but for want of Charity. Now when a scholar is to be opposed for his degree, and but one question to be asked him; if he knew it before, he would perfectly study that. We know that one question will then be asked us; it is concerning our Charity; let us study that thoroughly, that we may answer it well before the Judgment-seat of Jesus Christ.

I come from the Motives, to the Materials, wherein this external and practical part of Charity consists. They are these; who, what, to whom, whereof, and how.

Who must give charitably: it seems this charge belongs only to the rich. Charge them that are rich in this world, &c. There is none simply rich, but God. Crassus thought himself not rich, till all Rome was poor to him: yea unless Ex fructibus, he could maintain an army of forty thousand men, out of the very revenues and surplusage of his estate. But as Nemo miser nisi comparatus; So none is properly rich, but in regard of the poor. Some think they are called Divitiae Iniquitatis, quasi Inequalitatis; The riches of Iniquity, that is, of Inequality: some have more, some less: let them that have most, give most; let them that have little, give of that little. A rich Pharisee may give abundantly, but the poor widow must cast in her two mites. A man may be, not Dives in seculo, yet dives in Domino. So he is that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich towards God: Whereas other may be rich in good works, 1 Tim. 6.18. If there be a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, not according to that he hath not, 2 Cor. 8.12. Therefore the laboring-man is not privilege'd from this duty; Let him labor with his hands, that he may give to him that needeth. Though he may plead, that wife and children are bills of expenses; yet Luke 3.11. Let him that hath two coats, impart to him that hath none: Not one out of a whole wardrobe, but one of two. If thou have little, be not afraid to give according to that little, Tob. 4.8. Thy family shall not want, but be kept warm with the blessing.

What must be given, not words, but deeds: a charitable heart hath a helpful hand. The good man's charity should dwell, as it is said of the Dutch-man's wit, at his finger-ends. They for exquisite works, we for merciful works. To good deeds only stands open the gates of Heaven.

To whom extends our charity; this munificent part of it to the poor. We favor and feast those who are recommended to us by their own greatness: Who feasts those that are recommended by CHRIST? When thou makest a feast, call the poor, lame, blind; and thou shalt be blessed, for they cannot recompense thee: but God will, at the resurrection of the just. To do good to them that do good to us, Luke 6.33 Such kindness a man may take up in the streets of Turkey. But how if they be vagrants and lewd persons? yet be charitable to them, for these reasons: 1. It is better one unworthy creature should receive, than ten worthy should miss. The gracelessness of some beggars is too true, but many make this a general excuse to spare their purses. Thy own conscience in this is thy best guide. 2. Thy reward is not lost, though thy gift be fallen like good seed upon bad ground. Thy harvest is not in the man, but in Christ; not on earth, but in heaven. As our Savior said, Luke 10.6. When ye come to an house, say, Peace be to this house. If the Son of Peace be there, your peace shall rest upon it: If not, it shall turn to you again. So if the poor man be good, thy alms shall do him good: if not, thy charity shall turn to thee again. Howsoever the man be evil, yet the Lord is good. The unworthiness of the receiver, takes not away the reward of the giver. When they were sick, I humbled my soul with fasting; and my prayer returned into mine own bosom. I prayed for them, I was heard for myself. If thy charity do them no good, it shall do thee good. 3. Duty binds us to give obedience to evil Princes, in conscience of GOD'S ordinance.

And as an evil subject serves GOD for his Princes sake, so a good subject serves his Prince for GOD'S sake. Thus obedience is given, if not Principi, yet Principatui; If not to the Person, yet to the Office. So because GOD commends and commands charity, we must give though to evil men: Do homini, non moribus: We give to the man, nor to the manners. He is a man, his Maker will requite me: he is a Christian, I know where to fetch my reward.

Whereof must we give, not evil gotten things, but our own. Quod dedistis, dicitis; non quod abstulistis. Quaerit Deus dona, non spolia, Ambros. You talk of what you have given, not what you have taken away: GOD requires gifts, not spoils. As the Jews bought a burying place for strangers with the blood of CHRIST: so many build Hospitals for children with their fathers bones. Thus one laughs that receives, but another weeps that loses: And perhaps his imprecations that is impoverished, will come sooner to God's ears, than his appreciations that is relieved. I would not have one poor man's just curse, for many poor men's good prayers. The cries of the poor against their oppressors, enter into the ears of the Lord of Sabbath. This cry comes from the more sensible soul; not always from the spirit of bitterness, but from the bitterness of spirit. When the oppressor hath built his Alms-house, and hopes by their perfunctory devotions to be admitted to heaven; the curses of the undone wretches knock him down to Hell.

Lastly, how we must give, and this may be considered in five circumstances.

1 Cheerefully; As thou hast gotten, give with a cheerful eye, Eccles. 35.10. A good countenance refresheth the poor man's mind, as well as the alms doth his body. Those liquors of oil or wine that pour out themselves, and drop of their own accord and maturity from their native places, are better than they that are pressed, and squeezed out by violence. Give without pressing; the LORD loves a cheerful giver. This is Duplex eleemosyna; & quia damus, & quia hilariter damus: The good is doubled by cheerfulness.

2 Discreetly, not with confusion. Quod quotidie fit, moderate fiat, Sen. Give so today, that thou mayest give tomorrow. Confine not thy charity to the twelve days. The charitable man keeps Christmas all the year; gives so at once, that he may give still: as we sow the furrow, not by the bushel, but by the handful,

3 With a right intendment; not for thy glory, but for God's glory, Chrys. The Pharisical giver, Dat sibi, non Domino; gives to himself, not to God: he aims at his own praise: what reward can he look for? Let him pay himself.

4 Opportunely: for Quantum morae addis, tantum dono detrahis, Sen. The more delay in giving, the less honor in the gift. It is an uncharitable charity, when men will give nothing to the poor, but what they cannot make use of themselves. The mouldiness gives their bread, the Fly gives their meat, the Moth gives their garments. CHRIST hath not their Superflua, sed reprobata: though it be course, let it be wholesome; know thy best things come from Christ.

5 Lastly, before thou give thy goods to the poor, give thyself to God. No man's works can please God, unless the person of the worker be first acceptable to him. So Cain offered to God Suae non se, his goods not himself. Non tua des, & teipsum detineas: do not afford thy riches, and with-hold thyself. Ananias kept back part of the portion, he had better have given nothing. He could never find in his heart to bestow his estate on the poor, that denies to consecrate himself to CHRIST. Some pretend that they have given themselves to GOD, but they will not part with anything of their estates: but the Devil confutes them, Job 2.4. Thy riches are nothing to thyself: spare one, spare both. By charity, give part of thy wealth to the poor, by faith, give thy whole self to Christ.

Now shall I live to eat the labors of mine own hands, to see this Sermon performed? I will not flatter you with the worlds age, as man doth himself with his: but say, it is old, exceeding old, white hairs are upon it. Why? Charity is cold. Give them, O Lord; what wilt thou give? Give them dry breasts and a miscarrying womb. We have dry breasts, there is no milk of charity in them: and a barren or miscarrying womb, not able to bring forth the comfortable issue of good works. Charity is a new commandment, and most men think it a new fashion. The Jesuits say we have translated Charity out of our Bibles: but this is their old figure of lying; we find it frequently in our Bibles: I would to God neither we nor they had translated it out of our hearts. The Romist have a She-Saint, called Saint Charity: they beg for her, and get fair Ditions and Additions of patrimonies to her Temple, or rather indeed to themselves. Let me beg for Sancta Charitas, no woman but a divine and heavenly grace, and that not more for her selves-sake, than for your own souls. We build great houses, but not for Charity: many build as Vacia did, a corner for himself, desolate places where they may Latere, not Vivere. Great men convey their charity out of the Country, in a Caroch up to the City: and here contrive it into three or four inhospitable rooms. Perhaps they keep solemnly their own birth-days, like Herod: but at Christ's Birth-day they are gotten aside. They honor their own memories, whose lives are not worth a smile: but not his without whom they had better never been borne. Rapit aula, rapit alea: Yea, with some the chimney of Charity is made a moveable, and carried in their pockets. Charity is dead, yet let us mourn for her, though it were us Rachel did for her children, not to be comforted because she is not. And albeit she never return, let us give her a Fare-well; Vale Charitas, Fare-well sweet Charity. Though we never see thee again on earth, we shall one day meet thee in heaven, and find thee in the bosom of Jesus Christ.

VERSE 8.

For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful, in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Our Apostle hath led us from virtue to virtue, as one directs a traveler from rowne to town, till he comes to the desired City, They go on from strength to strength, till everyone of them appeareth before God in Zion. H hath shown us a golden chain, the first link whereof is Faith, and the last is Charity. Now we say that we have them all: have you? then know that If they be in you, and abound, they shall keep you from unfruitfulness in your profession. To prove Sanctimonium cordis, being Testimonium operis: let your outward life witness your inward grace.

Me thinks, I find in this verse three mystical members of a Christian: his Heart, his Hand, and his Head. 1. If these things be in you and abound; there is his Heart. 2. They make you that ye shall not be barren nor unfruitful: there is his Hand. 3. In the knowledge of our Lord JESUS CHRIST: there is his Head. His Head conceives CHRIST, his Heart contains CHRIST, his Hand brings forth CHRIST. 1. His Head, like Mary, conceives the knowledge of devotion; being illuminated by the Holy Ghost. 2. His Heart travels in birth of it, growing in grace, and growing in spirit, till he be delivered. 3. His Hand, that is his life; like a mid-wife, helps him to bring forth that blessed issue. His Head is enlightened, his Heart is enlarged, his Hand is enlivened.

If these things be in you and abound. I will not Martyr the Text, but begin as the Apostle begins, with the Heart. Wherein I conceive four particulars; the seed, the ground, the sowing, and the growing. 1. The seed, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , these things. 2. The ground, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , In you. 3. The sowing, which makes them 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , to Be in you. 4. The growing, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : so in you that they abound and thrive. First, for the seed, and herein observe two things.

First, we make choice of our seed, and allow it good; or else expect no good harvest. He that sows cockle, looks not for wheat: of tares cast into the ground, we think it impossible to find barley. Whatsoever a man sows, that shall he also reap. Who can wonder to see him reap a curse, that hath sown a curse! Thus it often cometh to pass, that the matter of sin is read in the punishment; as the crop is a remonstrance of the seed. Doth Adam sow the seed of ambition, aspiring above a man? he is brought so low as to be beholding to the beasts for apparel; there's the crop. Cain would not offer Abel a resting place on earth, therefore the earth shall allow him none. Rehoboam would make his finger heavier than his fathers loins: therefore his loins shall be made lighter than his fathers finger. Samuel hewing Agag in pieces, shown him the harvest of his own seed: As thy sword hath made woman childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women. If Gehasi will take Naaman's iniquity he shall take Naaman's leprosy, King. 22.38. The dogs licked up Ahab's blood; why? Ahab had so served Nabaoth, Hos. 4.12. You have gone a whoring from your God; therefore, Ver. 13. Your daughters shall commit whoredom, and your spouses adultery. When they shall say, wherefore doth the Lord these things unto us? they shall be answered; as in their own land they did worship deos non suos, strange God's: so they shall worship their own God in terra non sua, in a strange land. Whosoever sows evil seeds, either in Quali or in Quanto shall reap evil fruits.

Therefore the seed must be these things: let us sow holiness of life, that we may reap the life of holiness. It is God's mercy that every sin is not Benoni, the death of the mother; that the seed of lust does not burn up the ground: that earthiness does not like a grave bury the soul: drunkenness like a deluge, drown the spirits; and Epicureanism like an infected air, choke the vital breath. It is a wonder that the very element of God's fight not against him, whose sins fight against the maker of elements. Paul tells us, 1 Cor. 15. that we must all die, and all rise again: and compares us to seed sown in the spring that is reaped in the harvest. If therefore thou wouldest reap a glorious body, sow a gracious body. These things.

Secondly, we must have These, All these; not one or two but all. It is not enough to have faith, and leave out virtue; not knowledge without temperance, nor piety without charity. If thy journey be eight miles, and thou give over at the second or third; thou wilt fall short of heaven. Many will be contented with some, but few will embrace all. Men deal with God, as for their Tythes, so for their lives, Let him that is taught communicate to his Teacher, in all his goods. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ? In all? nay put out (In omnibus) this In all, and we will compound with you, Deut. 5.33. You shall walk in all the ways of the Lord. In all? nay put out this same (All) and we will consent to you. There are few that say; All that thou commandest us, we will do. Vende omnia, Sell all thou hast, and give to the poor; this the world thinks most unreasonable. He that hath not all saving graces in some measure, hath none in any measure. The Romists are so slaved to their superiors, that they will do all they are commanded by them. As a desperate Roman said of Catiline; whatsoever he bids me, I will do. But says another, how if he should bid thee fire the Capitol? he answers, Catiline will not bid it; but if he should, I will do it. So they must do all the Pope chargeth them: but how if he bids them fire the Senate, blow up the Parliament? they secretly reply, he will not command it; but if he should we will do it. They give not this obedience to God: he chargeth them not to touch his anointed ones; against this they have their exceptives. But against the Popes mandamus, there is no question, no exception, and from it lies no appeal. How insatiable man's desires are of this world! give Alexander kingdom after kingdom, he will not rest till he have all. If a covetous man had all the houses; if a City given him, he would rifle for the goods in them: if he had all the Gold and Jewels, he would also require the garments: if he had the City, he would also challenge the suburbs: yea, All could not satisfy him. But how little grace contents us; one or two, as Joash stroke the earth but thrice. 2 King. 13.18. we take insatiably of earth, very moderately of heaven; as if we were afraid to have too much grace, and that it would but trouble us.

In you. We see the quality of the seed, now let us consider the nature of the ground. Mans heart is the ground for God's seed: holy seed requires holy ground. This seed is cast in by the ear: for Nisi prius Deus fuerit in aure, non erit in ore, non in cord: unless God first come in by the ear, he will not be in the mouth, nor in the heart. But if it stay in the ear, and go no further, it will not fructify, Math. 13. The ear is like a pipe, made to convey water, not to contain it. The heart is that home where it should dwell: as Mary laid up CHRIST'S sayings in her heart. But as cord mobili nihil mobilius: so cord nobili nihil nobilius: an inconstant heart is the basest of things, a faithful heart the noblest. Every heart is not fit ground for this seed: therefore (seeing I am fallen upon the metaphor) be pleased to consider how this ground is prepared: and to speak in the phrase of husbandry; it must be fallowed, stirred, and laid up, before it be sowed.

It must be fallowed: the word preached is the plough to break it up. It is broken up by the Law, sowed by the Gospel: break it up by Moses; sow it by JESUS. There is by nature grown over every heart a thick and hard crust: the menace of judgments must break this rough and tough mould. To this purpose, there is an Information by doctrine, and a reformation by discipline. There are some tender hearted; as David was snibb'd with a word, Peter with a look. Some are quickly corrected; soft hearted children that weep at the least chiding.

Others are harder, like nettles; if you touch them gently, they will sting you. Therefore if the golden scepter cannot win them; the iron scepter must break them. But as we plough upon the fallowes, so we must cautelously take heed of plowing where the harrow hath gone before, so faith the Prophet; Break up the fallow ground; the unbroken heart: but spare the already broken spirit. In you, in yourselves: some can plow furrows on others backs: so do persecutors on the Church. The plowers plowed upon my back: they made long their furrows. The slanderers harrow men's good names, Psal. 50.20. They sit and speak against their brethren, and slander their own mothers sons. Usurers harrow the estates of the poor; yea harrow and grind their very faces. Arrant and arrogant hypocrites harrow and furrow their neighbors simplicity: but the Pharisee is no fit husband-man to plow up the Publican. But plow thyself, find some corner of thy heart to break up still. Satan is founderd, and cannot walk upon rugged ground. The fallowed or or broken heart he cannot abide; but God respects it. A broken and contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise.

It must be stirred. Our backwardness requires continual provocations. To be good is a thing hardly gotten, quickly forgotten. The art of bringing men's hearts to God, hath many passages, takes many courses, tries many experiments: as indeed there are many sorts of servants. A Land-lord had summoned his tenants to do him some service: yet being done, and they all present, the steward demands, which of them came for love, and which for money. They that came gratis for love, were feasted in the Parlar, they that came for reward had courser fare in the Hall. One amongst the rest would choose neither of these places, but walks by himself. The steward asked him his motive of coming, whether, for love or money; that his placce might be assigned accordingly. He replied; I come for neither love nor money, but for plain fear, and therefore I choose a place by myself. Thus some approach to God for reward, as Saul loved him for his kingdom. Some for love, as Mary that brought CHRIST a precious unction because she loved. him. Others for fear, Ahab was humbled under fear of the vengeance. Now all our endeavor is to plant in men's hearts the love of God; that they might say with Peter; Lord thou knowest that I love thee. But this is effected, sometimes by promise of reward, that they may be led by profit, Esa. 1.19. If ye be willing and obedient, ye shall eat the good of the Land, Rom. 2.20. There is glory, honor, and peace, to every man that worketh good. Sometimes by threatenings, that they may be won by fear, Rom. 2.9. Tribulation and anguish upon every soul that doth evil, Hebr. 12.29. Our God is a consuming fire. Now though perfect love cast out servile fear; as Saint John speaketh: yet filial fear brings in perfect love, There is mercy with thee O Lord, that thou mayest be feared. It hath been said of base fear; Degeneres animos timor arguit; that it is an argument of a base and cowardly spirit. But of this fear it is true; Regeneres animos timor arguit; that it is the argument of a regenerate and gracious spirit. He never loved God, that fears him not. With some of these the heart must be continually stirred.

It must be laid up, that is the husband-man's next course. Now the heart is laid up by faith: when a man believes, he is then fitted to receive any seed of goodness. As the Eunuch said; I believe, what hinders me to be baptized? So I believe, what hinders me to be loved, what hinders me to be blessed, what hinders me to be saved? Not; be it to thee according to thy faith. Humility, patience, charity, are now sown with fortunate success: faith hath laid up the heart, Cor paratum, says David: speak Lord, for my ear is open; sow Lord, for my heart is ready. Paratum ad prospera; ad adversa, ad diversa, ad universa. If adversity comes, sow any heart with patience: if thou take back the goods which thou once gavest me, sow it with contentedness: if prosperity comes, sow it with thankfulness: if sin, sow it with penitence: against Satan's temptings, sow it with piety: against all malicious courses, sow it with charity. As wax to receive the impression of a seal, so the heart is softened and tempered to receive the Image of GOD. Blessed is the ground, which the Lord hath enclosed for his own garden.

Be in you: this is the sowing; GOD must first prepare the ground, and then sow his seed in it. It is he that unlockes the heart, to entertain these graces. There are six keys whereby things are opened or shut, that GOD hath entrusted into the hands of no other, Angel or Seraphin. The key of rain, Deut. 28.12. The Lord opens the heaven to give rain to the Land in his season. The key of food, Psal. 104.28. Thou openest thy hand, and they are filled with good. The key of the womb, Psal. 113.9. He maketh the barren woman to be a joyful mother of children. The key of the Grave, Revel. 1.18. I have the keys of hell and of death. The key of the mouth, Psal. 51.15. O Lord open thou my lips. The key of the heart, Act. 16.14. The Lord opened the heart of Lydia. In all these he openeth, and no man shutteth: he shutteth, and no man openeth. Now when he hath thus opened and prepared the heart, he sows in it this spiritual seed. Graces like good herbs, will not grow of themselves: vices like weeds, need no sowing. Man is no more borne with virtues in his soul than with apparel on his back. It is not generation, but regeneration that sows this seed. The seed is good, the sower is God, Gal. 5.22. Indeed there be ministerial deputies; so Paul plants, and Apollo waters, but still God gives the increase. This takes away from our best works all possibility of merit. A meritorious work must be Ex proprio, and Ex indebito. First, it must be our own: but every good gift is from the Father of lights, I am. 1. Omne bonum nostrum, vel ipse, vel ab ipso. Secondly, it must be beyond our duty and debt: but alas, having done our best, we are unprofitable servants. Heaven is indeed often called a Reward; not factive, but pactive; of covenant, not of merit: God gives it us, not because we have earned it, but because he hath promised it. Iustitia nec vestra, nec vera: woe to us if we had no more comfort than we deserve, Matth. 20. The last received, as the first, every man a penny. Not because they wrought harder, that came in later: as Paul that came in after the rest, yet abounded in labors above them all. But to show that God respects not Quantum but ex quanto; the love, more than the work. And that the reward is not of merit, but of mercy: for if it were of merit, he should have begun at the first: if it be of mercy, he may begin where he will. Thus he gives all grace to us, that we may give all glory to him.

In you, not about you, not on you, but in you. Not behind you, as Libertines that cast God's laws behind their backs. They run so fast to the Samaria of riot, that they leave Jerusalem behind them. As CHRIST said to Peter, get thee behind me: so these to goodness, keep behind me, I love not to see thy face. Not before you, as worldlings that send religion afore them to threescore, but never overtake it. It keeps before them indeed, but the length of Gracious-street; and they like Solomon's fool never come nearer it than the Stockes. Moses saw Canaan before him, and desired it: these see it, and desire it not; they like the world better. Not about you; as profane persons in holy places; inter sanctos non sancte; live in the midst of virtues without virtue. That proverb is too often justified; nearer to Church, further from God. It seems to be taken from the Jews; who having the greatest light, had the darkest life: the nearer they were to the Sanctuary, the further from sanctity. Such a man may say, Inopem me copia fecit: like foolish Indians, that have store of Gold, and trucke it away for rattles. An empty vessel bung'd up close, though you throw it into the midst of the sea, will receive no water. The Monastery is a place of devotion, the Monk is in the Monastery: yet perhaps the Monastery it self, as soon as devotion, may enter into the monk. A man may be in a holy place, yet if holiness be not in his heart, it is not where it should be. Ishmael was an unbeliever in the house of Faith, the family of Abraham. Not on you, as hypocrites; that have a show of sanctity on them, but no substance of sanctity in them. Outwardly lambes, there is innocence on them: inwardly Wolves, there's no innocence in them. Hypocrites cover their spotted hides with the Lions skin of Judah, Sanctimony; so they beguile their brethren. They are always proudest, that have the least cause. The utmost ambition of John the Baptist, was but to untie Christ's shoe: of that other John, the beloved Disciple, but to lean on his breast: but Judas the traitor will dippe with him in the dish, yea kiss his sacred lips. But there was never holiness without humbleness. Dyers can set on their colors the fairest glosses with Logwood, but they will not hold; when a shower comes, the gloss is gone. The gloss of profession without sincerity will off in a storm; we must be died in grain to hold, and have these graces in us. The parts of ostentation are like loose corn, which the fowls pecke up. As Jerome said of the Scripture, so I may say of godliness: It is not In superficie & verborum foliis, sed in medulla cordis: not read in superficial leaves and letters, but in the marrow and substance of the heart. An Hypocrites profession is in Folio, but his sincerity is so abridged, that it is contained in Decimo-sexto; nothing in the world to speak of.

But In you; what indeed hath a Christian to enjoy, but that which is in him? He may use the world, and that's without him; but he enjoys the Lord, and he's within him, 1 John. 4.16. Hast thou Christ? then he is within thee: Jesus Christ is in you; or you are reprobates. Hast thou the Spirit? He is within thee, 1 Cor. 3.16. Know ye not, that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? Hast thou peace or joy? Rom. 14.17. they are within thee; little without. Have ye the Kingdom of Heaven? Christ says, it is within you. The heaven that is on earth, is within us; though the heaven that is in heaven, be too great to enter into us. Therefore is it said; Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord: for it is too immense to enter into thee. Yet so much as thou art capable of, shall be within thee. Many presume there is much goodness within them, but through their own blindness they are deceived. One writes of a widow, that being thick-sighted sent for a Physician to cure her: he promised her good sight, she him, good money. He comes and applies medicines, binding them over her eyes: and still as he departs, he carries away with him some of her best goods. Thus he continues her pain, till he had robbed her house of all her substance. At last the cure being done, he demands his covenanted pay: but she looking about her house, replied that he had not cured her: For whereas before she could see some goods of her own, now she could see none: before she was thick-sighted, now poor-blind. It is so with us; while we were dim-sighted, we imagined many goods of grace in us: but now being truly enlightened, we confess ourselves poor: and hence fall on our knees to the Father of mercies, to supply us with his saving graces.

And abound:] this is the Growing; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . After the ground is prepared, and the seed injected, by the Spirit of Grace fructifying is expected: they must increase, multiply and abound. Where two things are necessarily implied:

First, these things must be in us, before they can abound, He that hath my Commandments, and keepeth them, saith Christ, we must first have them, before we can keep them. Therefore auditors in hearing Sermons, should bring intention. It is ordinary with many, to commend the Lecture to others ears, but few commend it to their own hearts. It is morally true, what the Christian tell-troth relates: A servant coming from Church, praiseth the Sermon to his master; he asks him, what was the Text: nay quoth the servant, it was begun before I came in: what then was his conclusion? he answered, I came out before it was done. But what said he in the midst? Indeed I was asleep in the midst. Many crowd to get into the Church, but make no room for the Sermon to get into them. Open thy heart so well as thine ear: if this seed be not sown there, it will never abound with fruits to everlasting life. You come not to a banquet to look on, but to eat: hither God calls, but then Eat O my friends, Cant. 5. they are sullen guests that depart away hungry. Ezakiel was bidden to eat the roll, Chap. 3. You may taste of the heavenly gift, Hebr. 6. and feel no sweetness; but eat it down, and it will be pleasant. Worldly things we seek to swallow down: therefore Christ calls the riches of the Pharisees; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , things within them: he hath swallowed down riches. But instead of nourishment they have taken a vomit. The adulterer lays lust next to his heart; the covetous lays usury, the malicious hatred next his heart. Their inward part is very wickedness. But for spiritual things some Out-house serves; as Christ himself could be allowed no room in the Inn; the stable is held sufficient. But do you afford better things better places; let them be in you. Not only in your books: (and yet if these things were in the worldlings books, he would burn his study) nor only in your heads; for some have much science, little conscience. Not in your mouths only, for many have Gravitatem in sermonibus, pravitatem in moribus; an ill course of life, with a good discourse of language. But in your hearts, a holy closet fit for such heavenly Jewels. Be sure first you have them, then next that you have increased them.

Secondly, it is not enough to have them, but to have them in abundance. The heart is but a little piece of ground, yet hath room enough in it for many seeds. God calls for this increase, 2 Cor. 9.8. Rom. 15.13. Ephes. 4.15. Vera virtus tempore non clauditur, semper justior esse contendit, Bern. true virtue is not temporal, but is still ambitious of improving it self. The Spouse of Christ must have many jewels, Cant. 1.10. A jewel at the ear, attention to the Word: a jewel at the foot, Humility: a jewel on the forehead, Modesty: a jewel on the hand, Charity: a jewel on the head, Constancy: a jewel on the heart, Fidelity. He that hath a good number of these jewels, shall be admitted into the number of God's jewels: They shall be mine in that day, when I make up my jewels. Take the whole armor of God, Ephes. 6. one piece will not secure us; we know not which way the blow will come. If we have only Brest-plate, the blow may light on the head: if only the Helmet of salvation, it may light on the breast. Therefore take the shield of faith, that covers and defends all. Mars was called Gradivus: every Christian soldier should be gradivus; go to heaven by degrees.

For our bodies, no care can add to their stature, Matth. 6. But we may add to our spiritual stature, Ephes. 4.13 growing up to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ: for God's family admits no dwarfs. The rich man grows easily richer, the good man easily better. Rivers at the first head may be covered with a bushel, which after a few miles fill large channels. A drop of true grace works it self to Rivers of living water. So is it said of our Savior, Luke 13.32. The third day I shall be perfected: Perfection it self grows to perfection; and shall not we that are imperfect strive toward it? In my Fathers house there are many mansions: not in the wilderness, not in Horeb, not on the Mount, where Peter would build Tabernacles, nor in any part of this life; but in heaven: therefore still labor to grow and abound, till you come thither. If a man cast a stone into the water, circle begets circle; so one true grace will beget many. We reckon of a Physician that hath abundance of medicines; a Lawyer that hath abundance of tricks, an Usurer that hath abundance of monies, a Merchant that hath abundance of wares: we affect abundance in all perishable things: O then let us abundantly love grace, that Christ may abundantly love us.

They make you, that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful. I come from the Christians Heart to his Hand; wherein we perceive the efficacy of Grace: Shall make you. Not persuade, nor entreat, nor move, nor allure, but make you fruitful, by a lively and strenuous operation. If Patience be in you, it will make you overcome injuries. If temperance, it will make you abhor riot. If Faith, it will make you believe above sense. If Charity make you beneficial to the poor. Evil may show the good they have not, but good men cannot hide the good they have. It is like fire within us, it will make us speak Psal. 39.3. So powerful, that it can neither be suppressed nor expressed. This seed shall proferre fructum; one blessing is the father of another; therefore Christian every blessing Joseph, upon Rachel's faith and argument; God will add to me another son.

Here is a kind of certainty in this (〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉) constitution: as sin will make a man fruitful in naughtiness, so piety in holiness. As there is a relation betwixt this life and the next, by an unchangeable ordinance of God. Mischiefe in this world, misery in the world to come: no repentance here, no salvation there: a devil on earth, no Saint in heaven. But holiness in the seed, shall have happiness in the harvest: if the course be gracious, the end shall be glorious. Whatsoever good thing any man doth, the same shall he receive of the Lord. So there is a relation in this life betwixt the disposition and the actions. If the heart be full of lust, the tongue will be a trumpet of impudence, the eyes windows of temptation, the gestures so many remonstrances of ready prostitution: all the wheels being like apt enginers, employed on the wills business. If avarice sit in the heart, like an Epicure to feast on gold; oppression shall be the purveyor to provide it, Brokage the Cater to fetch it in, Usury the Cook to dress it, and destruction the stomach to digest it. What evil seed is within, will appear without. And so if grace have Existentiam, a being: it will have apparentiam, a manifestation. Hath David Hope? he will write for a kingdom in the extremity of persecution. Hath Abraham faith? he will not deny to God, his only son. Hath Job patience? he will brook all crosses with an unmoved quietness. Hath Daniel temperance? he will not be enticed with the Kings dainties. Hath Joseph chastity? he will never come near his mistresses chamber. Hath Paul fortitude? he dares fight with beasts at Ephesus. Hath Stephen a faithful resolution? he will be content to die for CHRIST, and be rained to death with a shower of stones. Needs must that virtue be fruitful that is stirring, and needs must that be stirring that is living, and needs must that be living that is quickened by Jesus Christ.

Neither barren nor unfruitful: here is a double effect; expressed negatively, but implying an affirmative or positive consequent; Pregnancie and fertilitie. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . For if those privatives, barrenness and unfruitfulness be taken away; there will necessarily follow a position of those contrary habits. It may be they both signify one thing, I am sure they intend both one sense. Yet I will take leave to resolve, them into a double metaphor; Pregnancie of the womb, fertilitie to the ground.

Not barren; the barren womb hath ever been held a curse and a reproach. So John's mother insinuates: The Lord hath looked on me, to take away my reproach among men. When Rachel bore Joseph, she said, God hath taken away my reproach, Gen. 30.23. Whether carnal barrenness be a curse or not, I am sure spiritual is no less. Give them, O Lord: what wilt thou give? give them a miscarrying womb and dry breasts. When God gives salvation, he is said to take away barrenness. Sing O barren, thou that didst not bear, Esa. 54.1. Now only GOD can open both the wombs; of Rachel's flesh, and of Lydia's heart, Gen. 30.22. Act. 16.14. If the Lord propagate Abraham's carnal seed, much more his spiritual; who are borne, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. It is often observable in the scripture, that the children of women long barren proved most famous and excellent. Of Sara, Isaac, from whose loins such multitudes were deduced. Of Rachel, Joseph, that wonder of men and Angels. Of Anna Samuel, that great Prophet and Priest of the Lord. Of Elizabeth, John the Baptist; of whom the Lord himself testifies; Among them that are borne of women, there hath not risen a greater. So these Saints that have been begotten of spiritual barrenness, and converted from a sinful life wherein they were habituated; have proved most notable instruments of God's glory. As Mary Magdalene that was dispossessed of seven devils, was so honored as to preach the first Sermon of CHRIST'S resurrection, and to have her memory propagated with the glorious Gospel, Matth. 26.13. Zacchaeus, a Publican, an extorting Publican, a rich extortioner; yet how gracious was he to CHRIST, yea how gracious was CHRIST to him! Luk. 19. Paul borne out of due time, 1 Cor. 15. yet outstripped the rest; and was in labors more abundant than they all, ver. 10. Thus ultimi have been optimi, as the last grapes make the sweetest wine. When GOD opens the barren womb, he brings forth the excellentest children to CHRIST. Many that are first, shall be last, and the last shall be first. The last of all prove not the least of all, yea often the best of all.

Now to take away barrenness from the spiritual womb, there is required this proceeding: by preparation, by conception, by pregnancie and by birth.

First, the womb must be prepared: for barrenness is upon all souls by nature. Therefore let us desire of God, as Rachel begged of Leah: give me, I pray thee, of thy sons mandrakes. Little Reuben had gathered sweet flowers in the field: Rachel hath a mind to them: Epiphanius thinks, to help her barrenness. Pererius observes out of Avicen, that the seed of it doth purge Locum conceptionis. Some have taken those mandrakes for Lilies, and some for Violets: but certainly they were amiable flowers, such as they wont to strew on the bridal beds. Beseech we the Lord to strow the beds of our hearts with such mandrakes, Cant. 7.13. The mandrakes give a smell: those holy seeds of grace will take away our barrenness, and prepare our souls for a holy conception. Yea CHRIST must intercede for us, as Isaac entreated for Rebecca, because she was barren: and the Lord will be entreated of him, Gen. 25.21.

In the second place follows conception, and this is by illumination and sanctified knowledge. Ignorant Papists gloriously boast their famous progeny of good works: but can a woman bring forth before she hath conceived? Such a progeny were a prodigy. Therefore first, Teach me thy way O Lord, and then I will walk in thy truth. And Psal. 119.27. First, make me to understand the way of thy precepts: so shall I talk of thy wondrous works. If they were examined as Philip questioned the Eunuch, Act. 8. Vnderstandest thou what thou readest? their negative answer would declare their soul not to be with child of grace. Thou mayest have a swelling, as the Pharisee, (Luke 18. I am not as other men, &c.) imagine thyself pregnant, provide thee a midwife, that's ostentation, to deliver thee; and Gossips, flatterers, to witness for thee: but all is but a Timpanie: when death, that infallible midwife comes; thou art delivered of nothing but wind, vain-glory. CHRIST calls himself the Way, the Truth, and the Life. He that by understanding conceives not the way cannot in heart bear the truth, shall not in success bring forth everlasting life. You shall have a Pharisaical Benefactor call together his Gossips with a trumpet in the Synagogue, as if he would ring them to Church with a Saints-bell; to behold what? his deliverie: of what? of alms. Alms? very well; let us have some more such travails: nay, all is but some windy exhalation. Perhaps he hath got in some desperate forfeiture, and now he will glase a Church window with it; and that's all. Spectatum admissi risum teneatis?

Thirdly, after conception appears pregnancie, Grace is borne in the heart by faith and is sensibly felt. If therefore thou hast conceived it, thou shalt feel it move in thy soul: as John sprung in the womb of his mother at the salutation of Mary, Luk. 1.41. The pregnant woman hath many qualms; the soul in this plight feels many pangs; and is in Rebecca's case, when the twinne-brothers struggled together within her. If Esau had been there alone, there had been no contention: but when she hath also conceived a Jacob, that is Spirit; Esau the flesh will oppugn it. Nature can agree with it self, but not with grace. The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit lusteth against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other. No soul bears grace without sorrow, and compunction of heart for her sins. A woman when she is in travail hath sorrow. Mans first and second birth begins in crying, John 3.3. Except a man be borne again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. Except a man be once borne, he never can see the light on earth: except he be twice borne, he never can see the light of heaven. There is Dolor in utroque partu, but here's the difference: after the sorrow of the first birth, comes more sorrow: after the sorrow of the second, comes eternal joy, Gal. 4.19. My little children, of whom I travail in birth again, till CHRIST be formed in you. Dolet Pater ministerialis, &c. Thy spiritual father hath pain in begetting, thy spiritual mother in bearing, and dost thou the child borne expect indolencie and immunity from sorrow? yea all plead conception, I ask you for your pangs: when stood your eyes full of tears, your hearts painting with groans, your prayers beating at heaven gates with importunities? Shew your maternos nixus: mothers have timores, ante partum, dolores, in partu, languores post partum; fears before their deliverie, sorrows in their deliverie, languishments after their deliverie. Mary Magdalens soul had no sooner conceived grace but she wept, and washed Christ's feet with her tears.

Lastly, comes the production or bringing forth, which is done by active obedience. Conception is Gratia infusa, Pregnancie is Gratia diffusa, bringing forth is Gratia effusa. Dost thou presume in thy soul the conception and pregnaneie of grace, and yet ledest a profane, covetous, or dissolute life? Thou sai'st no; I have thy word to the contrary: but thy life says yea, I have not thy work to the contrary: whether thou say, No or yea, God and thy own heart knows the contrary. Shall we say with the Prophet; It is brought to the birth, and there is no power to bring forth? No, though it be often so with the body, it is never so with the soul: if the heart have conceived, it will bring forth. The penitent malefactor on the Cross no sooner had his barrenness taken away, but presently he brought forth fruit: he condemneth himself, reproveth the other, justifieth CHRIST, glorifieth God. Store of good children are not naturally borne on the sudden: but shall I bring to the birth, and not cause to bring forth, saith the Lord? Saving grace hath more validity than nature he that gives strength to conceive, denies not strength to bring forth: that soul shall be a joyful mother of many children. Yea God can give Partum sine dolore, birth without pain, Esa. 66.7. Before she travailed, she brought forth: before her pain came, she was delivered of a man child. We read of Cornelius his good works, we read not of his tears, Act. 10. Indeed this is a great wonder, Esa. 66.8. Who hath heard such a thing? who hath seen such things? shall the earth be made to bring forth in one day, or shall a nation be borne at once? for as soon as Zion travelled, she brought forth her children. Nor ear hath heard, nor eye hath seen the like: yet God is the worker of such miracles. That a soul which hath long been barren, shall in one day be set a teeming, and produce gracious fruit to CHRIST.

But where not be our Births! Leah in her old age groweth barren, and ceaseth to bring forth children to her husband CHRIST. Our Savior delighteth himself with his Rachel, the Church triumphant in heaven, now almost complete. Leah the Church militant ceaseth to bear, and will so continue; except she give her sons mandrakes for her husbands company, Gen. 30. for sake her worldly pleasures wherewith she is surfeited. I confess, these are breeding days: and as we say, that the means of begetting hath more increased mankind, than the end: so there be spiritual births enough, but they are bastards: our sons are our sins. As one writes of the Popish Clergy; who refuse a lawful wife, to abuse an unlawful harlot: Deus in ira abstulit filios Diabolus in nequitiâ dedit nepotes. God in his just anger took away their children, the devil in his wickedness hath given them bastards. So also are we barren souls to produce Natos, lawful children, good works: plentiful to produce Nothos, unlawful fruits, wicked sins. Legitimate works are few, illegitimate many. The Romans had their Nothiâ. Legacies and inheritances given to their bastards: so we dedicate and bequeath all our desires, and delights, and means, to our iniquities. Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin: and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death. Lust when it hath conceived, [there is the Conception of sin] bringeth forth sin, [there is the Birth of it.] Sin when it is finished, [there is the Growth of it] bringeth forth death, [there is the End of it.] It hath a father, a mother, a mid-wife, a nurse. The Devil by suggesting, begets sin as the father: Lust, by imagining, conceives sin as the mother: Consent, by agreeing, brings it forth as the mid-wife: Custom, by indulgence, brings it up as the nurse. Here is now no barrenness! The Devil was never more busy to beget sin:

Concupiscence never more pregnant to conceive it: Consent never more ready to act it: Custom never more strong to continue it. Such a brood you have, Psalm: 7.14. There is longing, conception, birth. Such another, Job 15.35. They conceive mischief, bring forth vanity, and their belly prepareth deceit. Here is a quick dispatch; they are no sooner delivered, but their belly prepares deceit; to it again incontinently. These are monstrous births; it is pity that they are not abortive, and never suffered to see the light. Such a mother may curse the fruit of her own womb.

You see we are not barren: but better no light than that which burns us: better no children than bastards. Let us never give life to that, which gives death to us. Leah said of Reuben, This son shall comfort me: We may say of our iniquity, This sin will afflict me. Many souls are pregnant, but they bring not forth a son of grace, but a daughter of the flesh: it is a daughter, not a son. The Jews have often been deluded in expectation of their Messias: among the rest I have heard this story reported for one. A Christian was exceedingly in love with a Jews daughter; who also so over-affected him, that though she might not marry him, yet suffered her self to be begot with child by him. This being perceived, according to their law she must be put to death for it. Her betrothed lover desiring to save her, addrest himself like a shining Angel, and taking the benefit of the Moon, called to them in a shrill voice, to spare her: affirming that she was with child of the Messias. This was easily credited, her fault acquitted, her life spared. Now when the time of her delivery approached, the expectant Jews swarmed thither in multitudes. Delivered she was, but to their mockery and shame, not of a son, but of a daughter. At nine months end, that virgin-Iewesse was brought to bed of a Florentine daughter. After such a manner many timpanous spirits in the world do travail; but when the child is borne, it is not a Son of the Spirit, but a daughter of Concupiscence. Parturiunt montes, excurrit ridiculus mus.

If this be the progeny, barrenness is rather blessedness: God make us all barren of sins, but fruitful of graces, pregnant of salvation: that we may conceive, bear, and bring forth Christ. Indeed he had but one carnal mother, but many spiritual. He that doth my Fathers will, is my mother. Indeed this is a conception which the world never conceived; but it is true from the mouth of Truth it self. Doest thou believe and obey? thou art Christ's mother. When a woman said, Luk. 11.27. Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps which thou hast sucked: he answered; Yea, thou sayest true, she is blessed indeed, and all generations shall call her blessed. But I will tell thee who are rather blessed; They that hear the Word of God and keep it. Mary her self was Beatior percipiendo fidem, quàm concipiendo carnem Christi, Aug. She was more blessed in receiving the faith of Christ, than in conceiving the flesh of Christ. Otherwise he might have been her Son, and not her Savior.

Not unfruitful. Fruitfulness is that inseparable effect, which GOD expects from every tree planted in his Garden. Is Zion his ground? it must be fruitful, Isaiah 5. Is the man of Judah his plant? he must be fruitful? Is the Church his Vineyard? He goes thither to gather fruits. The effect of sanctified knowledge, is fruits, Phil. 1.11. Art thou the Spouse of Christ? thou art fruitful, Rom. 7.4. We are married to Christ, that we should bring forth fruit unto God. Hast thou the Spirit? it appears in the fruits, Gal. 5.22. The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, &c. Hath a man known Christ? it is seen in the fruits, Luke 6.44. For every tree is known by his own fruit. Good works are compared to fruits, for two special resemblances; Odor and Taste.

For Odor, God is pleased with the smell of our graces. See, the smell of my Son is as the smell of a field, which the Lord hath blessed, Cant. 7.13. The Mandrakes give a pleasant smell. Not that our good works smell fragrantly of themselves, but in the merits of Christ, Cant. 1.3. The virgin souls espoused to Christ, get their husbands flowers: his perfumes make them sweet. All thy garments smell of Myrrh, Aloes, and Cassia. Thy Garments: our clothes hide but a rotten carcase, perhaps a rotten conscience: Christ's garments are truly sweet. Thy garments: our best righteousness is loathsome rags, Isaiah 64.6. All thine, thy justice, thy mercy, thy grace, thy satisfaction, thy obedience: All; there is not a hem of thy vesture, but if it be touched with the hand of faith, is healing and saving. They smell of Myrrh, Aloes, and Cassia: they are comfortative, Psal. 94.19. In the midst of my sorrows thy comforts delight my soul. Purgative; Heb. 9.14. they cleanse our consciences. Sanative; 1 Pet. 2.24. By his stripes we are healed. In his merits our Mandrakes give a pleasant smell. Now that this sweet Odor may be in our works, we must be sure to take out the sent of Adam, the ill savor of our native corruption. Our prayers are as Incense, and the lifting up of our hands, as an evening sacrifice: Yet, Non speciosa laus in ore peccatoris; Praise is not seemly in the mouth of a sinner. It is like Samson's honey out of the mouth of a dead beast. if you walk contrary to me, I will not smell the savor of your sweet Odours But if it be sanctified, it is an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice well pleasing to God, Phil. 4.18. If charity toward some, be separated from equity towards others; That sacrifice of alms is mingled with blood; as Pilate served those, whose blood he mingled with the blood of their sacrifices, Luke 13. The form of a work is the life of it: and God may say, as the Poet did to the harsh repeater of his verses; Quem recitas meus est, &c. The good matter is mine, the corrupt manner is thine.

For Taste, some fruits have a sweet smell, but a bitter relish. The actions of the Pharisees smelt well, but when they came to be tasted, they were Rue and Worm-wood. The Gospel calls for relishable fruits; not such as impiety produceth, Rom. 6.21. What fruit had you then in those things, whereof you are not ashamed? But verse. 22. fruits unto holiness, the end whereof is everlasting life. It is not enough to avoid barrenness, but to manifest fruitfulness, 1 Pet. 3.11. To eschew evil, that is the first lesson of Christianity, but not all: to do good, is the perfection, 2 Tim. 2.19. Let everyone that calls on the name of the Lord, depart from iniquity: that is one step, but not high enough: we must also do the will of our Father. The forbearance of sin doth but bring Christ unto our doors; it is fruitfulness in good, that settles him in our hearts.

In the knowledge of our LORD JESUS CHRIST. It is saving knowledge that takes away barrenness, and makes us fruitful in the works of obedience. Who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? We expect this of the earth that hath only nature: and shall not God expect it of us, who have sense to govern nature, reason to govern sense, grace to govern reason, JESUS CHRIST to govern all? The knowledge of our blessed Savior is sweet and public: now after this confessed sweetness, how bitter would that question be, if I should dispute whether this knowledge be truly in us or not? We say, we know him: but Hereby we know that we know him, if we keep his Commandments. And now the question grows bitterer and bitterer; from Wormwood to Gall. Let us appeal from men's lips to their lives: he that obeys him not, knows him not, 1 Cor. 2.8. If the Princes of this world had known, they would not have crucified the LORD of Glory. If we know him, we will not again crucify our blessed Savior; and take upon us their office, whom we so condemn; Judas his to betray him, Pilate's to condemn him, the soldiers to crucify him, Heb. 10.29. If he that despised Moses Law, died without mercy; what punishment is he worthy of, that treads underfoot the Son of God? Profane Christians are worse than the Jews: they threw CHRIST down, but did not tread upon him: these tread under feet that sacred blood. When the Jew wounded him, out came blood: when the Gentile wounded him, out came blood and water: when the Christian shall wound him, out will come blood and fire. Paul calls Christ That Rock: when Moses smote the rock, out came water: if we strike it, out will come bloody water: not to purge us, but to judge us; at that day when we shall see him whom we have pierced. We attain that now by the Spirit of the Gospel, which we could not by the letter of the Law. The Apostle calls that a killing letter; so it was mortua, dead: and mortifera, deadly: for sin was by the Law, and death by sin. But if faith do not give us Christ, we are still under the Law; and if our obedience do not testify our faith, the Law was not more deadly than is the Gospel to us: for it enhaunceth our condemnation, Matth. 21.44. Christ calls himself That Stone: we may be built on it, we may be spilled by it, according to our usage of it.

Circumstances of a sin give aggravation to it; Non quod dissimilis res sit, sed persona; The action is varied according to the person. We expect better things of well-promising professors, than of impudent and prostituted libertines. Shall an Officer that reformes the Tap-house, be himself found in a Brothel-house? Were it not strange that the Witch should tell the Juggler, he hath a bad conscience? Or that the Hypocrite should rail at the Player? Or the Usurer challenge the thief? Or the Lay-Parson with his sacrilegious Impropration, blame the poor Vicar for looking narrowly to his poor remnants? It is all one as if he that hath taken away my house, should find fault with me for putting on my cloak. The dissolute shall speed better than the hypocrite; and lukewarmnesse is more offensive to God's stomach than frost-coldness. The Thistle in the forest shall not fare so ill, as the barren Fig-tree in the vine-yard. Therefore, though Israel hath played the harlot, let not Judah transgress. The offering brought with unhallowed hands, is worse than none at all. Sole & Sale nihil utilius; Nothing more useful than Ligh• and Salt. Yet for the Light, Matth. 6.23. If it be darkness, how great is that darkness! And for Salt, Matth. 5.13. If it have lost the savor, wherewith shall it be salted? Though men be never so profound in knowledge, if they be profane in conversation, their Salt is lost. Salt keeps other things from putrefaction, but if it be putrefied it self, what should season it? A sweet singer delights us all: but Quis medebitur cantatori à serpente percusso? If a Serpent hath stung him, who shall recover his voice? If the eye be out, what shall look to the eye? The Manna kept, and not spent, rotted: good gifts smothered will come to nothing. Sampson lost his strength in Delilah's lap, the strength of grace is lost in idleness. If Jerusalem forget her first love, presently her right-hand forgets her cunning, Matth. 5.13. There are three things observable in the infatuated Salt. 1. The difficulty to be recovered, Wherewith shall it be salted? 2. The unprofitableness; It is good for nothing. 3. The contempt and scorn, It is cast out and trodden underfoot of men. Neither is the unprofitable Minister only this unsavory salt; though

Christ directed that speech to his Apostles. If they be tenebrosae lucernae, dark lanternes; if any fault be in those lights, the whole Parish is full of snuffers: But also even every professor of godliness, that hath denied the power thereof, 2 Tim. 3.5.

Such an one like lost salt, is good for nothing. For, Ad nihilum valet, quod non valet ad finem suum; That is good for nothing, that is, not good for the end and purpose why it was made. If a knife be not good to cut, we say it is good for nothing; yet it may be put to some other use. If a plough be not good to break the ground, we say it is good for nothing; yet it may stop a gappe. If a hound be not good to hunt, we say he is good for nothing; yet he may in the night give warning of a thief. But if a Professor be not good for honesty, he is indeed good for nothing. Corruptio optimi pessima: The dead body of a man is more offensive than the carcass of a beast. Putrified flowers stink worse than weeds. A surfeit of bread (though it be the staff of life) is the most dangerous surfeit. Son of man, what is the Vine? Shall the wood thereof be taken to do any work? or will men take a pin of it to hang any vessel on? The Vine fruitless, is of all trees most useless. Though it be compared to divers noble and worthy things: the Tribe of Judah is called a Vine, Isaiah 5. The good woman a Vine, Psal. 128.3. Vxor tua sicut vitis abundance; Thy wife shall be as a fruitful Vine. The best man a Vine, John 15.1. Ego sum vitis: though it be the Vine that cheereth the heart of God and man, Judge. 9.13. Yet if this Vine be fruitless, it is good for nothing, not so much as to make a pin to hang a hat on. Oaks and Cedars are good for building, Poplars for pales, very bushes for hedging, doted wood for firing: but the fruitless Vine is good for nothing.

It is observable that the refuse of other things have their uses. Sour wine will make vinegar; old rags paper; lees are for Dyers; soil and rubbish is good to fat the ground; pot-sheards and broken tiles to mend high-ways; yea, they offer to sell combing of hairs; Ladies and Gentlewomen know, if they be good for any purpose. But the fruitless Vine, the savourlesse salt, the lightlesse lamp, the graceless Christian, is good for nothing. Let all yield to him, if he be fruitful; let him yield to all, if he be barren. The daughter of Zion would never have been so notorious a harlot, had she not been first so rare a virgin. Julian had been less damned, had he never been a Christian.

Consider the fearfulness of their judgment, John 15.2. and 6. where you find seven degrees of their fall: 1. They bear no fruit, this is their first step to hell. 2. Bearing no fruit, They are cut away from the Vine: Insition is blessed, but Abscission most wretched. Cut it down, why cumbereth it the ground? To be excommucated from JESUS CHRIST, is most accursed. 3. Being cut from the Vine, They are cast out of the Vineyard: The prayers of the Church are not heard for them, nor are they suffered to suck on the breasts of her consolation. 4. Being cast out of the vineyard, they wither: needs must that branch wither, that receives no life of sap from him, that gives the sap of life unto all. 5. Being withered, they are bound into fagots, like the Tares into bundles, Matth. 13.30. Not all knit into one, but many several fagots. An adulterer with his adulteress make one fagot. A drunkard with his pot-companion, another fagot. A Seminary with a traitor, another fagot. The Extortioner and his Broker, another fagot. The Whoremaster and his Pandar, another fagot. All shall not be punished in the same degree, albeit in the same torment. 6. Being thus fagotted and coupled together, They are cast into the fire; the most terrible of all tortures. 7. Lastly, being cast into the fire, they burn and frie in those quenchlesse flames, Mark 9.48. Where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. In comparison whereof, our earthly fire is no more than if it were but painted. They are ever frying, never dying: in universal and eternal anguish. Universal upon every part of body and soul. For the body, Matth. 22.13. They are bound hand and foot, and crowded into a prison of outer darkness: like bricks in a fiery furnace, not able to wrinch; having not so much as a chinke where any cool wind may enter in to refresh them. Their seeing, affrighted with ugly Devils and darkness: their hearing, with hideous outcries: their smelling, with the odious stench of the filthy bodies under torture: their taste, with a raging thirst: (begging one drop of ungranted water, Luke 16.24.) and a ravening hunger, biting their tongues for anguish: their feeling, afflicted with insufferable torments, In a lake of fire burning with brimstone. And now if the pain of the body be but as it were the body of pain; the soul of torment is the torment of the soul. The fantasy distracted with horrid imaginations, like a melancholy man's frightful dreams, Wisd. 17.3. Being horribly astonished with strange apparitions; sad visions appearing to them with heavy countenances. The will is vexed, that it must have the will in nothing. The memory with a fixed recordation of passed things; what it once enjoyed, what it now suffereth, and what it must suffer forever. It can think of nothing to administer comfort: that it was once happy more afflicts it. Now as the reprobates commit two evils, Ierem. 2.13. forsaking the fountain of living waters, and fall to the broken cisterns of their own digging: as there is in sin an aversion from the Creator, and a conversion to the creature: so there is in punishment; for aversion, Paena damni, the punishment of loss, a privation of all blessed comforts; for conversion to the creature, Paena sensus, a punishment of sense, a position of all possible plagues. This is manifest by the rejection, Matth. 25.41. Depart from me; from me your Redeemer, from me that made myself man for your sakes, from me that received such wounds for your remedy, from me that invited you with pardon, but you would none. Therefore depart from Me, from my friendship, from my protection, from my presence, from my Paradise, from my kingdom, from my sight: and from all those that go with me, Quires of glorious Angels, communion of blessed Saints: this is the privation. Into everlasting fire, theres the postion: a fearful place! God grant we may never know more of it than by hearesay. I have been content to urge the danger of unfruitfulness, that you may prevent it: as Nineveh overthrew the message of her overthrow by her repentance: her sins were destroyed and her self stood. So may our provision of those torments in thought, be the prevention of them in sense! Saepe Deus minatur quod faciat, ut non faciat quod minatur. God, in his mercy, threatens before he punish; that he may not punish as he threatens. What David said of his enemies, Let them go down quick into hell; we may in another sense wish to ourselves, our best friends. Descend we every day into hell by meditation, that at the last day we may not descend thither by condemnation. Let us often go to hell while we live, that we may not come thither when we are dead. Recollect we ourselves, and become fruitful trees; that when GOD transplants us from this nursery, he may set us in his own glorious garden. The fruits of the earth spring, bud, grow green, grow ripe, and then wither: but the fruits of the spirit shall never decay. If they have filled GOD'S vineyard on earth, they shall flourish in his Eden of heaven forever.

In the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. The object of our knowledge here is our blessed Savior comfortably described to us in four Attributes. 1. Our. 2. LORD. 3. JESUS. 4. CHRIST. Vt Dominus potest, ut Jesus vult, ut Christus facit, ut noster debet. As he is LORD he can, as he is JESUS will, as he is Christ he doth, as he is Our he should, save us. Lord, ecce potestatem, consider his mightiness. Jesus, ecce suavitatem, consider his sweetness. CHRIST, ecce voluntatem, consider his willingness. Our, ecce bonitatem, consider his goodness that gives us interest in himself, and vouchsafes us to challenge his mercy. Lord, ration Dominionis, in regard of his Dominion, The Lord reigneth let the people tremble: he sitteth between the Cherubims, let the earth be moved. Jesus, ration salutis, in regard of his salvation; He that is our God is the God of our salvation; who came into the world to save sinners. Christ, ration Promissionis, in regard of the promise. God did promise him, and the Jews expected him under the name of Christ, John. 7.26. Do the rulers know indeed that this is the very Christ? ver. 41. This is the Christ. Our, ration appropinquationis, in regard of his appropriating himself unto us, not taking on him the nature of Angels, but the seed of Abraham, Hebr. 2.16. He took our flesh, that we might take of his spirit; and thus gave us an interest in himself. Our Advocate, 1 John. 2. We have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous: Our LORD, Our JESUS, Our CHRIST. Again Jesus in facto, Noster in pacto. Lord in his power, his works declare him to be the Lord; who doth what he will in heaven, in earth, in the sea, and in all deep places, Psal. 135.6. The same works that the father doth, doth the son also. Jesus in being made; he that is the LORD the Creator, was made Jesus a creature, Gal. 4.4. made of a woman, John. 1.14. The word was made flesh. Verbum, quid potentius? Caro, quid impotentius? factum, quid mirabilis? The word, what more powerful? Flesh what more feeble? Made, what more wonderful? Christ, in being sacrificed and crucified for us: broken for our transgressions, 1 Cor. 11.24. Take, eat, this is my body which is broken for you. The Israelites did eat Agnum assum, a Lamb roasted: we Agnum passum, the Lamb of God crucified. He was broken for us: breaking is taken from an alteration of the good estate of the body. So it is said, age breaks a man. Moses was 120. years old when he died, yet was not his natural force broken, Deut. 34.7. It was recorded as a matter of admiration, Psal. 38.8. I am feeble and sore broken: sorrow breaks a man. Our Savior though he was young, and of a most excellent constitution, yet was thus broken. Nec color nec decor in eo; no form or comeliness in him; why because he was Vir dolorum; a man of sorrows, Esa. 53. But what is age, sickness, and sorrow, to the hand of God? The Lord did break him, Job 13.25. Wilt thou break a leaf driven to and fro? As a Lyon, so will he break all my bones, Psal. 51.8. make me to hear of joy and gladness; that the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice. Christ was broken in all parts of his flesh, his head with thorns, his back with scourges, his hands and feet with nails, his side with a spear: only (that the scripture might be fulfilled) not a bone of him was broken. Our in respect of the covenant, Novum faedus, Hebr. 8.10. Ero Deus vester, I will be your God, and you shall be my people. Infinite mercy; the Lord's Christ. is become our Jesus.

The sum of the Instruction is to teach us how to know our Savior; as Lord as Jesus, as Christ, as Our LORD JESUS CHRIST. He is LORD, let us know his Majesty: Jesus, let us know his mercy: Christ, know his Office: Ours, know our own interest in him.

LORD, in this title consider his power: know him Hominem verum, but not Hominem merum, Rom. 9.5. He is of Israel concerning the flesh, but also over all, God blessed forever, Amen. Col. 1.2. Grace from the Lord Jesus; from him as God, as the Fountain of Grace, 2 Pet. 1.1. Grace and Peace Through the Lord Jesus; through him as mediator, as the Conduct-pipe to derive it to us. LORD, this title is given him to distinguish and declare his power: as in weighty Proclamations Kings set down their names with their titles. So Exod. 34.6. The Lord, the Lord God, merciful, gracious, &c. Whatsoever the father did to us, Christ did also, to prove him, LORD. Did the father create us? so doth the son, Col. 1.16. By him were all things made; by him, that is there called the Image of the invisible God, and first borne of every creature. Doth the father uphold the world by his providence? so doth the son, Hebr. 1.3. He upholdeth all things by the word of his power. Doth the father regenerate us? so doth the son, Col. 2.13. Doth the father raise the dead? so doth the son, John. 5.21. As the Father quickeneth them, so the Son quickeneth whom he will. Therefore is the son called Pater aeternitatis, Esa. 9.6. The everlasting Father. Deus tantus in filio, quantus in seipso. God is as Almighty in his Son, as he is in himself. This is a mystery; Praesumptio inquirere, pietas credere, aeterna vita cognoscere. To search too far into it, is presumption: to believe it, is godliness: to know it, is everlasting blessedness.

JESUS, in this contemplate his mercy, Mat. 1.21. He hath not name for no cause: the Angel gives the For: Thou shalt call his name JESUS; For he shall save his people from their sins. JESUS is his name, and salvation is with him. He that truly knows this JESUS, knows him both God and man, one Person, our Savior. The word JESUS hath but three terminations among the Latins; JESUS, IESU, IESUM. Take the three last letters, and they make SUM, I Am, the incommunicable name of God. Therefore as the Apostle did in their Epistles, so let us in our hearts, evermore join JESUS with God the Father. 1. Because he that honoreth not the Son, honoreth not the Father: he that dishonors one Person of the Trinity, dishonors all. 2. Because all good from God to us is by JESUS: for otherwise we may have riches, and honors, and worldly possessions; but not have them as mercies. No man comfortably knoweth God but by Jesus: there is no safe venturing on that infinite Justice, without mercy at the right hand of it.

CHRIST, in this, meditate on his office, and the purpose of his coming, which was to redeem us. For God sent not his Son to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved, John. 12.47. I came not to judge the world, but to save the world. For this end he was appointed and anointed, Luk. 4.18. The Lord hath anointed me to heal the broken hearted, &c. Now let not God's purpose be frustrated: Deus misit quem promisit: do thou entertain him into a pure heart. When Martha told her sister Mary secretly; The Lord is come; she as soon as she heard it, arose quickly, and came unto him. The Messias, the Christ, the Redeemer is come; that blessed high Priest that offered up himself an expiatory sacrifice for us; now arise, let us go and meet him.

Our Lord Jesus Christ, in this observe his performance, and free donation of himself to us. He is not only The Lord, and the Jesus, and The Christ, but Ours. Whatsoever he did or suffered, was for us, Dan. 9.26. The Messiah shall be cut off; but not for himself: not for devils, not for Angels, not for himself: for whom then? for us men and for our salvation; the lost sheep, the sinners, the rebels, Esa. 9.6. To us a son is given, Luk. 2.11. To us a Savior is borne. This Our, is a possessive: in knowing him a Lord, there is fear: in knowing him a Jesus, there is comfort: in knowing him a Christ, there is hope: in knowing him Ours, there is assurance.

Our; God loves these appropriations of mercy, if they be of the breed of Faith. So he taught us to pray, Our Father: not by an epithet; Holy Father, Righteous Father, Omnipotent Father; but by a pronoun, Our Father. Yea he admits every particular hand of faith, to take his own handful out of this sheaf, and to turn Nostrum in Meum, Our into Mine. Though he be the God of all, yet Paul says; My God, Phil. 4.19. My God shall supply all your need. Though he be Lord of all, yet saith Thomas, My Lord, John. 20.28. Though he be the Savior of all his people, yet saith Mary, My Savior, Luk. 1.47. My soul rejoiceth in GOD My Savior. Though he be the Father of the spirits, of all flesh; yet he chargeth a faithful soul, Ier. 3.19. Thou shalt call me, My Father. If God say unto thy soul, I am thy salvation; why mayest not thou say to him, Thou art my God? The Romists challenge us of over-boldness, and peremptory arrogance, to say My God, as if we did engross Christ; but indeed, they engross him, that confine him to Rome. But why? because the frantic Merchant stands on the Key, and cries, All the ships are mine: may not therefore a sober merchant stand there, and say, This ship is mine? Is there no Jesus to be had unless we fetch him from Rome? The Lord commands this voice of faith, Hos. 8.2. Israel shall cry unto me, My God, Psal. 118.28. Thou art my God, and I will praise thee. Non est praesumptio dicentis, ubi est autoritas jubentis. There is no presumption in the speaker, where there is authority of the commander.

But now that we may assure him Ours, let us assure ourselves his. Marce, ut ameris, ama. The best demonstration of our possession of him, is to find his possession of us. My beloved is mine, and I am his: wouldest thou know the certainty of this marriage, and uniting of thy soul to Christ? when there is doubt made concerning a marriage, we search the Register, and take out a certificate or testimony under the Curates hand; and that satisfies the Court. So here go to the Register, thy Heart: there it is recorded, if it be at all, under the hand of the Holy Ghost: for, Rom. 8.16. The Spirit witnesseth with our spirit, that we are the sons of God: exhibit this in the Court of thy conscience, and all the doubts are cleared. Are thy affections knitte to Christ? art thou where thou lovest, rather than where thou livest? is the desire of thy soul with God? this is a blessed fruition! A bundle of myrrh is my well beloved unto me, he shall lie all night betwixt my breasts: let him lodge in thy heart forever. When thou art thus ravished with him, he will be also ravished with thee, Cant. 4.9. Thou hast ravished my heart, my sister: thou hast ravished my heart.

The Instruction is cleared to our faith, how we ought to know our Savior; as Lord, as Jesus, as Christ, as Ours. Now for our affections, let us make some use of it, and so conclude with application. For use, the true knowledge of Christ according to these four terms, meets with four temptations. 1. Lord, meets with our pride. Si sis sub Domino, quare abuteris ministerio? If thou be under a supreme Lord, why dost thou insult and domineer as if thou wert no servant. 2. Jesus, meets with our despair. Nil desperandum Christo duce, & auspice Jesus. Who can despair that knows he hath this Jesus for a Savior. 3. CHRIST, meets with our disregard and neglect of his hests: if he be the Holy one of GOD, let us reverence him. 4. Our, meets with our covetousness and worldly affections: let us not fly from that which is ours, and fly after that which is none of ours.

LORD. Art thou provoked to pride and presumption? humble thyself, there is a Lord above thee. When the Apostles strove about matter of superiority, Christ rebuked them, Luk. 22.31. And the Lord said to Simon, &c. He is not (there as in other places) called Jesus, but Dominus, The Lord. But why was his speech directed to Simon? because he was most likely to be too confident, having most audacity, and being the chief speaker. The greatest gifts most endanger a man to pride. A father loves all his children well, but is most tender to the sickest child: perhaps Peter was most sick of this disease; I am sure his usurping successors are incurable. Humble thy haughty mind, there is a Lord above thee: and such a Lord, as resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble, 1 Pet. 5.6. Pharaoh cries, Quis est Dominus, who is the Lord? who? even he that drowned Pharaoh in the red sea. The slave durst not boast himself, if he were sure that his Lord heard him. When a great Prelate durst write, Ego & Rex meus; I and my King: the King subscribed in act; Ego & servus meus, I and my slave: and quickly took down the main mast of his ambition. To question the Titles of Kings, hath ever been held treason: why then dare any presumptuous spirit oppose the word of this LORD? No, Dic verbum Domino, Matthew 8.8. Say the word, O Lord, and my servant shall be healed.

Jesus. Art thou tempted to despair? Jesus is a name, in quo nemini desperandum, in which a faithful soul vanquisheth desperation. Despair is a sin that never knew Jesus. The drowning man would never sink, if he knew and felt an infallible stay in his hand. Desperation is like that beast, Dan. 7.7. that had no name given it. There were three specified, a Lion, a Bear, a Leopard: but the fourth hath no denomination. To those four terrible beasts are likened four heinous sins: Presumption to the Lion, Persecution, to the Bear, Oppression, to the Leopard: and to the nameless fourth, desperation. The Lion, presumption hath been conquered, in Mary Magdalene. The Bear, persecution subdued, in Paul. The Leopard, oppression tamed, in Zacchaeus. But desperation without distinguishing the kind; is dreadful and terrible, and exceedingly strong: it had great iron teeth, it devoured and brake in pieces, and it had ten horns. It hath horns enow to push at God with blasphemy, at man with injury, at the own soul with distrust of mercy. Other sins are fearful enough and have the rage of Lions and Bears and Leopards, to make man's soul miserable. But the final ruin never to be recovered while there stands a seat of justice in heaven, is desperation. Well, yet before any man fall into this gulf, let him look up and know JESUS, John. 1.19. Behold that Lamb of God, that takes away the sins of the world. Behold the Lamb of GOD, ye that are Lions to your own souls! hath his death put sense into rocks and stones, and can it not persuade you? Is the blood of Jesus shed for you, and will you in an impatient fury throw your own blood into the air with Julian, or spill it on the ground with Saul, or sacrifice it on a tree with Judas? Shall he open heaven, and will ye shut it! He pull you out of the fire, and you run into it again? He drunk to you in a cup of Passion, and you should pledge him in a cup of salvation; singing with that melodious Prophet, Psal. 116.13. I will take the cup of salvation, and bless the Name of the Lord. Will you then take a cup of death and despair, blaspheme his name, evacuate his merits, tread his blood under your feet, and die past hope? God forbid it; and the prayers of your lips, the tears of your eyes, the groans of your hearts, and the hope of your souls heartily forbid it. No man can despair, that truly knows our good Lord Jesus.

CHRIST. Is not the great benefit of redemption yet thoroughly apprehended of thy soul? art thou tempted to distrust or disregard a work of such infinite price? Behold him, he is The Christ, the expectation of the Jews, the consolation of the Gentiles, the salvation of all. A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel. The creation by God's hand, was magnum opus, a great work; but the Redemption by CHRIST'S death a greater work. In the Creation he made man like himself: in the Redemption he made himself like man. Granat. Illic participes nos fecit bonorum suorum: hîc particeps est factus malorum nostrorum. There he made us partakers of his good, here he makes himself partaker of our evil. There he only Spake the word: here Dixit magna, fecit mira, pertulit dira: passus est dura verba, duriora verbera: he did not only speak words, but suffered wounds: he wrought wonders, he endured thunders; what heaven, earth, and hell, could inflict upon him. There man was made in the Image of God, here God is made in the Image of man. The creation was a work of his finger, Psal. 8.3. When I consider the heavens, the work of thy fingers. Redemption a work of his arm, Psal. 98.1. His holy arm hath gotten him the victory: yea it was a work of his heart; even that bled to death to accomplish it. Now if it be true what the school speaks: Bonum Gratiae unius majus est quàm bonum naturae totius universi, Aquin. If the saving of one soul be greater than the making of the whole world; and the goodness of Grace doth so far transcend the goodness of nature. Then be thankful to God for his Creation, but much more bless him for his CHRIST. Si totum me debeo pro me facto, quid jam addam pro me refecto? Bern. If I owe my whole self for my creation, what have I left to pay for my Redeemer? I will serve thee O Lord, because thou hast given me myself: but much more honor thee because thou hast given me thy Son Christ.

Our. Are we led aside with worldly affections, and a having covetousness? know, nothing is Ours but JESUS CHRIST. I determined not to know anything among you, but Jesus Christ, and him crucified. This was that blessed Apostles resolution. Love him above all: nil contra eum, nil supra eum, nil sicut eum, nil praeter eum, nisi quod propter eum. Affect nothing against him, nothing above him, nothing like him, nothing besides him, but what only for him. Behold, saith Peter, we have left all and followed thee, Matth. 19.27. they lost nothing by it, Uer. 28. When I sit on my throne, ye shall sit on thrones with me. If CHRIST, be ours, all is ours, 1 Cor. 3.22. All things are yours; whether Apostles, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come. All are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's. In this heavenly conveyance, there is. 1. The Tenure, of great Latitude; All things. 2. The Tenants, of great happiness, Ours. 3. The Heir, of great excellency, CHRIST. 4. The Land-lord, of great majesty, God. It is said of the wicked, Ion. 2.8. that they forsake their own mercy. Their own, as proper to them, more certain than the skin to their flesh, if they would have kept it: but as Christ said to the Jews, Noluistis, you would not. Qui relinquit suum, ut arripiat alienum: retinebit nec alienum, nec suum. He that forsakes his own to snatch away another's, shall neither keep another's nor his own. See what you do ye covetous: you leave your own CHRIST, for the world that is not yours; the substance for the shadow: and you shall lose both shadow and substance. Ours: this is the encouragement of faith and obedience: why do we so labor to be his, but because we are sure he is ours? every man loves his own; let us never forsake our own Jesus.

You see now the use of this fourfold knowledge of our Savior. Quosdam sua confidentia fert ad praesumptionem; agnoscant Dominum. Quosdam sua diffidentia fert ad desperationem; agnoscant Iesum. Quosdam sua temeritas fert ad dedignationem; agnoscant Christum. Quosdam sua cupiditas fert ad tergiversationem; agnoscant Nostrum. Some men's pride lifts them up to presumption; let them acknowledge him a Lord. Some men's distrust casts them down to desperation; let them acknowledge him a JESUS. Some men's carelessness lulls them in security; let them acknowledge him a CHRIST. Some men's covetousness drives them to apostasy; let them acknowledge him ours. Consider him Lord, and be not proud: consider him JESUS, and be not desperate: consider him CHRIST, and be not dissolute: consider him ours, and be not runegates. Thou hast made thyself ours, make us all Thine, O dear Savior of the world.

Now for application, to bring all yet nearer home to our consciences? He is LORD, give him obedience. He is JESUS, and requires our Hope. He is CHRIST, and requires our Faith. He is Ours, and requires our Charity.

Lord: this challengeth our obedient service, Hunc audit, Matth. 17.5. Hear him, Act. 3.22. He is that great Prophet of the Lord, whom we are bound to hear in all things. Swear not: who commanded it? The Lord, Matth. 5.34. Bee not angry unjustly: who forbad it? The Lord, Ver 22. Be merciful who imposed it? The Lord, Luk. 6. Who obeys this Lord? now this Lord forgive us. If I be a Lord, where is my fear? He may ask indeed, where is it? and who can answer him with a demonstration? The Lion Roares, but who trembles? Qui non timebunt in verbis, dolebunt in verberibus. He that will nottremble at his words, shall feel his wounds. But if he be our LORD to govern us, he will not be our JESUS to save us.

JESUS: this requires our Hope: for in whom is our hope but in Jesus. When we are exercised with worldly troubles, with great molestation, we labor to extricate ourselves, and faintly say, we hope in Jesus: but concerning heaven, we all hope well enough for that. Yet when death comes with his offer to help us thither, where is our hope? alas amazement hath mated it. We are like little children, that all the day complain, and yet when the medicine is brought them at night, they are not sick. Or like those that run all the week up and down the house, crying out of the pain of their teeth: and at last seeing the Barbar come to pull them out, presently feel no more torment. Or as tender bodies in a pricking pleurisie, call and cannot stay for a Surgeon: and yet when they see him whetting his Lancer to help them, pluck in their arms, and hide them in the bed. The true reason hereof is want of hope: but he that knows his Jesus, is comforted in hope. If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable. For this life and forever, repose we our hope in Him.

CHRIST: this term exacteth our faith: knowest thou Christ? thou wilt trust him. They that know thy Name, will put their trust in thee. Knowledge of Christ, and faith in Christ, are inseparable. I know whom I have believed, 2 Tim. 1.12. My faith is not built upon ignorance, I know him well. Indeed though salvation belong to all men, yet all men do not belong to salvation. None pertain to it, but such as take benefit by it: and none take benefit by it, (no more than they did by the brazen serpent) but they that fixe the eye of their faith upon it. He is Christ, the Lord's anointed, sent for that end, to save us: how great an injustice is this, not to trust to our salvation on him, that was from all eternity appointed for that purpose.

Ours: therefore let us give him our love: the knowledge of a propriety challengeth an earnest affection. The good son loves his own parent, the brother loves the son of his mother: the chaste wife loves her own husband. Christ is our Father, our Brother, our Husband: ours, let us love him. Whom have I in heaven but thee, and on earth, none besides thee? Let me lose all, so I may reserve thee. A Philosopher could thus comfort himself when the Tyrant threatened him: I will take away thy house; yet thou canst not take away my peace. I will break up thy School; yet I shall keep whole my peae. I will confiscate all thy goods: yet there is no premunire against my peace. I will banish thee thy Country: yet I shall carry my peace with me: for the wise man's home is wheresoever he is wise. So let the world take from us our riches, yet we have Christ: let it take from us our friends, yet we have Christ: let it take from us our liberty, yet we have Christ: let it take from us our wives and children, dear comforts; yet we have Christ: let it take from us our life, yet we have Christ; that is, to us both in life and death an advantage. When David said to Mephibosheth; Thou and Ziba divide the Land: he answered; Yea, let him take all, seeing my Lord the King is come home in peace, 2 Sam. 19.30. Thus let the world take all, so we may enjoy Jesus Christ.

The sum and heart of the Text concerns the fruitfulness of our knowledge of Jesus Christ. What Nation ever had the knowledge of him more abundantly propagated? I may say to you, as Christ said to his Apostles: Blessed are your eyes, for they see: Blessed are your ears, for they hear: but I cannot say, Blessed are your feet, for they walk; blessed are your hands, for they work: blessed are your hearts, for they embrace. Our eyes and ears do their office, all the fault is in our hearts: now the Lord open our hearts. We have knowledge, and it costs us nothing: bestow but the gathering of your Manna, and it is yours. Aaron's bells give you music by day; as your City-waits by night: music in the streets, whereof they partake, that pay nothing for it. A man needs not say to his brother, Know the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest. Our knowledge is universal, or at least should be universal, for God hath not scanted the means, Act. 2.17. God hath poured out his Spirit upon all flesh: our sons and our daughters prophecy, our young men see visions, and our old men dream dreams. They see visions, and tell you the visions they see. Your wise-men desire not, like deep streams, to run silent to themselves; but in a sweet murmur sing you the songs of Zion. We have knowledge, and need not travel for it: you wander not from sea to sea, nor run from North to East, to seek the Word of God. To run to Rome for accomplishment of knowledge, is to go into an infected house, to fetch out a rich suit: or to put the finger into a fiery crucible to take out the gold. What travel our young Gallants for? to hear news: Tully said he could better hear the news of Rome at Antium, than at Rome. Paris cannot tell more news of France, nor Madrid of Spain, than your Exchange in London, of both. I am sure that England stands as near to heaven as Italy: and the good tidings of Zion is here safer and sooner, and sounder learned. It is then for knowledge: they that cross the seas to fill their brains with knowledge, travel Northward for heat, and seek the candle that they carry in their hand.

The Cimerians that live in perpetual darkness, though they deny a Sun, are not condemned of impiety, but of ignorance. But Anaxagoras, that saw the Sun, and denied it, is condemned not of ignorance, but of impiety. How great is our condemnation, if we know the light, and yet choose darkness? John. 3.19. Former times were like Leah, blear-eyed, but fruitful: ours like Rachel, fair, but barren. We give so general acclamation to the Gospel, and the salvation by it, that we forget to observe the Law. As upon some solemn Festivall, the bells in all steeples are rung, but then the Clockes are tied up: there is a great untun'd confusion and clangour, but no man knows how the time passeth away. So in this universal allowance of Liberty by the Gospel, (which indeed rejoiceth our hearts, had we the grace of sober usage) the Clockes that tell us how our time passeth, Truth and Conscience, which show the bounded use, and decent form of things, are tied up and cannot be heard. Nay, there is rather a general acclamation to licentiousness, than true liberty, Act. 19.34. All with one voice for two hours together cried out, Great is Diana of the Ephesians. They cry só loud for their Diana's gain, that Paul the Preacher cannot be heard; he must be put to silence. Moses and Joshua heard a noise; It is not the voice of them that shout for mastery, nor of them that cry for being overcome: but I hear the noise of them that sing. You would think it the Praising of God, no it was the blessing of an Idol, Cant. 2.12. The flowers appear on the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the Turtle is heard in our Land. Peace and Prosperity are our Flowers, and we sing like birds; but Non audita est vox Turturis, the voice of the Turtle is not heard among us. All are merry, but who mourns for the abominations of Israel? All this while the Lord is angry, and would destroy us, as he once threatened Israel; had not Moses then, did not JESUS now, stand in the Breach for us.

Alas! where is our fruitfulness? we so confidently hope for our salvation by faith, that there is little honesty or true dealing amongst men. We have either left Faith naked, as Idolatry stripped the Israelites, Exod. 32.25. or cut off half her garments, as Hanun served David's Ambassadors, 2 Sam. 10. left her a rag of perfunctory service at Church, but cut off obedience as superfluous. Or if we have left her any covering, it is such as John the Baptist wore, a coat of Camels hair, some refuse and cheap outside; and a Leatherne-girdle, a string of hypocrisy to hold it together: her food is Locusts, mere speculation; and Wilde-honey, only table-talk. Some only care, Quid faciunt, non quid credunt; What they do, not what they believe; they are Natures Moralists. Others care only, Quid credunt, non quid faciunt; What they believe, not what they do; and these are most frequent. We all plead ourselves, by faith to be Christ's sheep, but where is our wool? In a good sheep we require not only flesh to feed on, but also wool to keep warm. In a Christian we require, not only faith for himself to live on; but also good works, a fleece of charity to warm others. You shall have a Country-man profess conscience, but he dares not wish Job's wish, Job 31.38. If my land cry against me, or the furrows thereof complain: let thistles grow instead of Wheat, and cockle instead of Barley. You shall have a Courtier profess integrity: but if he should say with Job, verse. 26. If I beheld the Sun when it shined, or the Moon walking in brightness: or if my mouth hath kissed my hand; this were to deny the God that is above: sin enough to decourt him. You shall have a Citizen profess charity, but dares he say with Job? verse. 19. If I have seen the poor without covering, and have not clothed him: if I have lift up my hand against the fatherless: Then let mine arm fall from my shoulder, and be broken from the channel-bone. If all should make such wishes, and have them granted, I fear the whole City would be an Hospital. It is no great wonder to see a Fruitful Land turned into barrenness: but it is a miracle of mercy to see Dry ground turned into water-springs: to see our barren lives made fruitful of good works. He only that can turn stones into bread, can turn our stony hearts into that mercy to give bread, Psal 148. Praise the Lord mountains and all hills, fruitful trees and Cedars. I make no question but fruitful trees will praise him; but Cedars and mountains? Yes, if stout Cedars be bowed to obedience, and proud mountains to humility; they shall praise him. Yea, verse. 7. Dragons and all deeps: The very Dragons of our oppressions being turned to mercies, shall praise him. The Dragons and Estriches, the beasts of the field shall honor me, Isaiah 43.20. The deeps, even the deeps of our stratagems being turned to simplicity and innocence, shall honor the Lord. Saul did not more speak against Christ, than Paul speaks for Christ. Thus we that were dry sticks by nature, fit for nothing but the fire, may be made fruitful trees by grace, to keep his commandment without spot unrebukeable, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ. Which he work in us, who is the blessed, and only Potentate, the King of Kings, and Lord of Lord's: who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto: To whom be honor and power everlasting. Amen.

VERSE 9. But he that lacketh these things, is blind, and cannot see far off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins.

YOY have seen their honor and happiness, that beautify their faith with good works: that as by the one GOD justifies them, so by the other they may glorify GOD. Behold now their miserable estate, that boast of a naked and lean faith: He that lacketh these things is blind, &c. But, the Apostle dis-jynes them from fruitful professors, by a word of Exception or separation; But. Whom doth he reject? Cui haec non adsunt, The man that Lackes these things. What if he wants one or two of those graces? They may come in time: but if he lack These, All these. In what state is he? Blind; his eyes be not like the Eagles, but the Moles. Is he stark blind? No, perhaps he may see, quae ante pedes sunt, things fast by him; but not Far off: he wants the Optickes, to see so far as Heaven. How is he proved to be thus thick-sighted? Because he hath forgotten. Why, they that are blind, have commonly the best memories? This is true indeed, concerning secular objects, the natural things of this world: but willful spiritual Cecitie is punished with Oblivion. But there is a good Forgetfulness, Philip. 3.13. I forget those things that are behind: Nay, but this man hath forgotten his own purgation, how he hath been formerly cleansed: as the Swine when she runs to the mud, forgets that she came out of the clear streams. Wherein consisted that purgation? He was washed from sin, the most sordid pollution and feculencie. What, from all sins? No, but from his old sins: for he commits new ones that bring him to the speedier damnation. Now as Saint Augustine calls Psal. 41. Scripturam pauperis, the poor man's Scripture, and 1 Tim. 6. Scripturam divitis, the rich man's Scripture: and Luke 18.11. the proud man's Scripture: and the book of Job, the afflicted man's Scripture: so this Text may be called Scriptura coeci, the blind man's Scripture. Who is described by his

- Penury, He lacketh these things.
- Cecitie; He is blind and cannot see afar off.
- Apostasy; Hath forgotten, &c.

The Sum is: whosoever shall trust his salvation upon a starved faith, and not order his life by the pre-mentioned rules, errs in darkness, and holds not that way which the light of the Gospel hath directed him. He that hath the true knowledge of Christ will be fruitful, verse 8. He that is unfruitful, vainly presumeth the knowledge of Christ, verse 9. So from the connection of both these verses, we find that true knowledge must precede sanctity of life. He that hath not these things is Blind: and he that cannot see well, cannot walk well, 1 John 2.4. Ye obey not, why? because ye know not, 1 John 3.6. Whosoever sinneth, hath not seen him, nor known him. You sin, why? because you know not, 2 Tim. 3.6. Why are they laden with sins, and led away with divers lusts? Because they know not the truth, Ephes. 4.18. Why are they strangers from the life of God? Because their understanding is darkened. The Romanists pretend, that they will help men to heaven by ignorance, and by ignorance they shut them out. They keep the keys, and neither enter in themselves, nor admit others. Every Christian in his Baptism hath taken press-money of Christ, to be his soldier, and to serve him in the field of this world, against his and our enemies: now he will fight poorly without weapons: he must have Gladium verbi, and Clypeum fidei; the Sword of the Spirit, and the Shield of Faith. And he must have these in his own hand: for he shall be smitten in his own person, therefore should resist in his own person: now shall he be content to bear the blows, and let another wear the sword? But, say they, there are many hard things in God's Word, past common reach: true, and many easy enough, within their reach: there is milk for weak stomachs, and strong meat for abler digestions: there are fords for Lambes, and depths for Elephants. In the most champian places, some mysteries are as hillockes, higher than the rest: in the steepest hill there is some footing, whereby we may come to that height, to discover the Land of Canaan.

But, say they, this takes away the glory of the Church, when every man may control his Teacher. Nay, rather let them know the truth, that they may avoid such as teach against the truth. Because some have been seduced; shall all be deprived? Then away with Preaching, for it is the savor of death unto many: away with the Sacraments, for some eat CHRIST'S flesh to choke them: away with CHRIST himself, for he is the fall of many in Israel: and a Stone to crush their bones to perdition. Then let the Lamb cast off his fleece, because the Lion hath worn it: Because some quarrel in the army, therefore let no soldier have a sword. Then put out the candle, lest it burn the house. But, say they, put not knives into the hands of children: but the Scripture admits no such comparison: we rather put good swords into the hands of men. Discharge us of the Lord's service; or it is against the law of arms to take away our weapons. Indeed there is cause to commend the policy of their Clergy, but not the honesty. For how should they have sold their bad wares, unless they had first put out the people's eyes! As thieves first out with the light, that they may rifle the house more safely in the dark. Otherwise the merchandize of Masses could not so easily have been vented abroad, but would have lien rotting upon their hands at home; if men were suffered to bring the light of truth into their pack-houses. But, say they, we have kept it from hogs and dogs; yea, and from sheep and lambes too. Besides, all that have some uncleanness in their lives, are not to be reputed hogs and dogs: this is their mercy, but the mercy of GOD is more. They have a contrary spirit to CHRIST: for he often preached in the known hearing of dogs, the Scribes and Pharisees: and would do so, rather than the children should want their bread.

But, said they, some by searching the Scripture diligently, have erred shamefully. This is as good a reason, as if one training up a child to be an Archer, should give him this principle and rule; that by aiming at the mark most fairly, he should miss most foully. No, John 5.39. Search that you may not err: not, be content to err, rather than search. But now at last being ashamed of this, and convinced by common equity, that the truth is not wholly to be withheld; they have published a part of it, the New-Testament, with their Rhemish Commentary: Not, say they, upon any absolute necessity, but to avoid corruptions by reading other translations. They found the people would no longer be made such fools, as when that universal mist was over the face of the earth: therefore they gratify them with a parcel of it. But as the people's curses before ran thorough their ears into their souls, for ingrossing into their hands the grain of life: so their curses follow them still, for selling them such musty and mildewed corn. Their wickedness is no less now in poisoning them, than it was before in starving them. How blessed are we that freely enjoy that Gospel, which can take away blindness, and give us the saving knowledge of JESUS CHRIST!

But.] Here is the Diversitie; this dis-joins these blind and barren professors from the former, by a manifest opposition. As the future life shall put an everlasting difference between the elect and the reprobate, Matth. 25.46. the one going to eternal pain, the other to eternal peace. Here they are scarce distinguished; but then there shall be agreat gulf fixed between them. So even on earth the Scripture dis-joins them with a But. The adversaries of Stephen gnasted on him with their teeth, Act. 7.55. But he himself was full of the HOLY GHOST: Stephen was under them for outward condition, but far above them for inward consolation. The waves may foam against the rock, and exercise their vain malice, but the Rock is immovable, Psal. 1.6. The LORD knoweth the way of the righteous: But the way of the ungodly shall perish, Psal. 32.10. Many forrowes shall be to the wicked: But he that trusteth in the LORD, mercy shall compass him, Psal. 5.11. Destroy thou the wicked: But let all those that trust in thee, rejoice. There was darkness in Egypt, but light in Goshen. The Tares are suffered to grow up with the Wheat; but in the harvest they shall be severed. Slay utterly old and young; But come not near them that have the mark, Ezek. 9.6. In the tenth of the Proverbs, the first fourteen verses, have their medium distinguished with this But. Indeed most of them are but paires of cross and thwart sentences, manifesting the contrariety of good to evil: 1. This is both in regard of a former ordination, Rom. 9.13. Jacob have I loved; But Esau have I hated. Some are of old ordained to condemnation, others to life. 2. And in regard of a present disposition, for the faithful love the things above, the wicked dote upon terrestrial objects. The Saints would but lodge in Samaria, their faces are toward Jerusalem: the ungodly do but lodge for a night in Jerusalem, their faces, their hearts are toward Samaria. 3. And in regard of their future condition; the wicked are brought to a destructive end in a moment, Psal. 73. But mark the upright man, and behold the just; for the end of that man is peace. This is a secret and unseen distinction; there is little difference in outward show: vessels of dishonor have often the most credit; whereas the vessels of honor, elected to shine as stars in heaven forever, are here sullied and kept under. Yet there is an invisible difference; But between them. Among men where all reputation is measured by the acre; melior qui ditior; we enter rich men into our books, but refuse to trust the poor. But God in his book records Lazarus, and forgets the Rich-man's name.

He that lacketh these things. It is a received maxim, that God and Nature hath wrought nothing in vain: no part or faculty of the body can be well spared. Thou hast two eyes, two ears, two hands, two feet; thou canst spare none of them. Man hath five senses, if he lose any of them, the very want will tell him the worth of the habit. The father that should sell one of his children, to buy bread for the rest, and redeem them from famine; looks over them all, and at last concludes he can part with none. What part of thyself after much study couldst thou lose? yet a man may lack some, and be saved too, Mark 9. with loss of a hand, foot, an eye, he may enter into heaven. But what speak I of our members; we are loath to spare the superfluities of this world: those same Adjectiva, as Christ calls them; Adjectanea, as Paul says. Our very delights have their set vicissitudes, and not one is omitted for fear of beaking the rank. Covetous worldlings will hardly spare the poor some of their fire to warm them, some of their water to drink, some of their ground to lodge on; though it were no more hurt to them, than the lighting of a candle at their torch. We can lack nothing for this world; but for heaven, O the mercy of GOD! Quantum est in rebus inane! We can quietly lack things that conduce to our eternal peace. What is the reason? Superna in fastidio, terreas in desiderio. Ignoti nulla cupido: A man never misseth what he cares not for. If a man Lacke riches, he complains; Who will show us any good? If he Lacke honor, he is glad to hear a friend in the Court say to him, as Elisha to the Shunamite; wouldst thou be spoken for to the King, or to the Captain of the Host? Few would answer with the Shunamite; I live among mine own people; I had rather dwell at home. If he Lackes children, he is ready to say with that Patriarch, Genes. 15.2. What wilt thou give, seeing I go childelesse? If an Ahab have a whole Manour, yet he lacks Naboth's Vineyard; that very nooke disfigures his Lordship. If Haman have Ahasuerus favor, yet he lacks Mordecai's knee and cappe; and is angry that other men thinks him not so good as he thinks himself. Though Joab have renown with David, yet a word of disgrace from Abner troubles his stomach: he can neither swallow it down, nor vomit it up. Because another is not his friend, he resolves to be his own enemy. Let the Engrossers barns and granaries be never so full of corn, yet if he lacks price for it in the market answerable to his desire, he is ready to hang himself; and be epitaph'd on as that Pope; Vixit lupus, moritur canis. He that desires much, wants as much as he that hath nothing. The drunkard is as dry as the sweating traveler. The Apostles said, Silver and gold have we none, Act. 3.6. The Devil says; All these are mine, Luke 4.6. And the Rich-man, I have much goods laid up for many years, Luke 12 19. Now take thy choice; whether hadst thou rather lack with those Saints, or abound with these Devils? Say with Paul, Philip. 4.19. My GOD shall supply all my need: And as Abraham answered Isaac, complaining for a sacrifice; GOD will provide. LORD, thou art my portion: and he is too covetous that JESUS CHRIST cannot satisfy, Psalm. 23.1. The LORD is my Shepherd, I therefore can lack nothing. A man may lack outward things, yet come never the later to heaven; yea, the sooner, the surer: but woe to him that lacks these things. This is the want now least feared, and this shall be the want most lamented, Matth. 6.33. First seek the kingdom of heaven, then other things shall come in due place and time. Sequere tu pietatem, te caetera sequentur pium. Follow thou righteousness, the rest shall follow thee. There was a young man that thought well of himself, Matth. 19.20. All these have I kept: What lack I yet? What? it is answered, verse. 21. If thou wilt be perfect, give all to the poor: it is better lack all the rest, than lack Charity. Terrene opulency is a mere titular thing; as Petrus Blesensis wrote to Innocentius, Bishop of Rome, concerning an Ecclesiastical dignity in England; Draco non habens vnde possit vivere, nisi à vento; A preferment standing upon naked and pure supposals. But grace is solid and real; for the Blessing of God maketh rich, and he addeth no sorrow with it.

Pray then to him that is only able to supply these wants; as Paul, 2 Cor. 12.8. For this I besought the Lord thrice. What then? Si ter pulsanti nemo respondet, abito? If after thrice praying, we feel no full concession: shall we give over? No, pray still, and GOD will answer; My grace is sufficient for thee. What is wanting in our endeavors, GOD shall make up with his sufficient mercies. We have need to sacrifice: Do we lack fuel? the LORD supplies us with penitence and patience, faith and love. Yet we lack fire: he gives us Zeal, an immortal fire from heaven. Yet lack we an altar? he gives us a pure heart. Is there yet wanting a sacrifice? Immola teipsum; offer up thyself. He will fulfill the desire of them that fear him. The Lions do lack, and suffer hunger: but they that fear the LORD, shall not lack any good thing. Then Domine, tolle omnia, & da mihi teipsum: Lord take away the rest, and give me thyself. If we can hold Christ, No good thing shall be withholden from us. Whatsoever we lack, let us not Lacke these things.

Is Blind.] We come from the Penury and want, to the Cecitie or Blindness, wherein his understanding suffers. Blindness is nothing else but a privation of sight; so ignorance is a destitution of knowledge. The School makes three sorts of this spiritual Blindness. 1. Ignorance negative, that is, Purae negationis, or nescientia. The not knowing of impertinent things is tolerable: as we need not know how oft we have breathed, &c. To this knowledge we are not obliged. 2. Ignorance privative, which is Merae & simplicis Privationis; and caentia scientiae debitae inesse. This is considered in necessary things, and concerning ourselves. And is Non tam peccatum, quàm supplicium: miseria potius quàm transgressio; It is not so much our sin, as our punishment for sin: an affliction as much as a transgression. 3. Ignorance corruptive; which is perversae dispositionis; a refractory and desperate averseness from knowledge: the other was morbis mentis, this is morsus serpentis. This is wretched, for a man to be ignorant of his own ignorance: Laodiceas disease, Revel. 3.17. to be blind as not to know her own blindness. Such an eye is not dark, in the concrete; but darkness it self in the abstract. Now if the light be darkness, how great is that darkness! Matth. 6.23. It is both a sin and a punishment, a sin, Matth. 15.14. Esa. 56.10. a punishment, Deut. 28.28. Esa. 59.10. Blind are we all by nature; like the man that sate by the way side begging, Luk. 18.35. sitting by the way, not seeing the way: begging but he knows not of whom. Now there is also a contracted blindness, an affected ignorance: and there are diverse causes, as of the corporal, so of the spiritual cecitie.

By abundance of rheum the eyes are harmed: so factious singularity is a hot scalding rheum to blear the eye of the soul. Qui sapere voluit ultra rationem, insipere solent ultra moderationem. We have many such rheumatic spirits, that will go a new way, or no way. They care not for Noah's Ark, the Church: but climb up to a mountain apart, a private conventicle by themselves. They are blind, and see not the danger of the Flood.

By a violent blow, or such accidental hurt. The eye is tender, and therefore hath two lids to defend it. Non patitur ludum, fama, fides, oculus. The devil blinds this intellectual eye by a sudden blow given to the soul, 2 Cor. 4.4. The God of this world have blinded their eyes that they believe no. How is this? Rom. 1. by filling them with vain imaginations and turpitudes? lusts darken the mind.

By dust thrown into them: the dust of this world makes many blind. They dignity like moles into the earth and there lose the sight of heaven. Gifts blind the wise. Such men may sit on benches, be taken into councils, have their eyes of policy quick as Eagles; and yet be blind. Perhaps they have the proud scorn of the Pharisees; Are we blind also? To whom it is answered; If ye were blind, ye should have no sin: but now ye say, we see; therefore your sin remaineth. These that have so much knowledge to heap up wealth, who dares call them fools for heaven. He that dares justify it, Luk. 12.20. Thou fool; this night shall thy soul be taken from thee. He could see to fill his barns but not to get salvation. The devil labors to keep men blind during the presumption of their lives: and only opens their eyes in the desperation that waits on their deaths: like the Syrians, whose eyes were never opened till they were in the midst of their enemies. Oculos, quos culpa clausit, paena aperit. Sin shuts up men's eyes, but punishment opens them. For he that will be Caecus in peccato, blind when he sins; shall be made Sapiens in supplicio, wise when he suffers.

The sum is this; he that lacks Grace, lacks knowledge: Qui malus est moribus, caecus est oculis. They that wander in by-paths declare themselves ignorant of the right way: so if a man be lewd in his manners, we conclude him blind for the way of salvation, Rom. 3.16. If their works be full of cursedness, murder, and destruction, we infer; The way of peace they have not known. O the infinite number of blind souls? if all that be ungodly, live in darkness, how few of this world have eyes! or if they that have, they see not, Esa. 43.8. Bring forth the blind people, that have eyes. Everyone indeed is ready to tax another's ignorance, not his own. If two blind men rush one upon another in the way either complains of others blindness; neither of his own. O that this blindness were a little removed, that by a self-inspection we might see our own hearts. If the sinner would look into that secret cloisture, how would the spectacle amaze him! He should find a will more warped than a bow: affections more perverse than an unbroken dromodary: a soul bleeding with unstanch'd wounds, a chamber full of fiends; one holding down the reason, another dulling the memory, a third tempting the will, a fourth fearing the conscience. Thus they possess the Citadel, his heart; possessing they vex it, vexing they laugh at it, laughing they destroy it, and after destruction they torment it. How lies the poor ravished soul panting under these adulterers; slaved in the chains of a most miserable bondage; where the bread of life, and blood of CHRIST is kept from her: beholding with Ruth her dear children, her affections, faculties, and addictions to good, butchered before her eyes; expecting the fatal hour, when her self must be hailed to the great tribunal, and receive her eternal doom Let us all therefore now look inward; be not longer blind at home, strangers to our own bosoms. Now he that opened the eyes of Paul, open ours; and rescue our soul from destructions, our darling from the Lions; and ourselves from the hour and power of darkness.

And cannot see a far off. The original is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, Lusciosus, thick-eyed. It signifies Pati affectum 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, and that is derived quasi 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉: claudere oculos non penitus, sed parumper. Some translate it, Connivere oculis, to wink, Prov. 6.13. he winketh with his eyes. Others thus; Oculos aperire non valens; one that cannot open his eyes. But to take it, as we here read it; one that cannot see a far off. Now to the former word, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, this seems to be subjected per quandam correctionem: he is blind, aut si non prorsus caecus, caecutit tamen instar lusciosi. It is a voluntary darkening the eye to heavenly things. Lusciosus is such a one as sees a little at the day dawning, worse after the sun rising, never a whit after the sun setting.

A far off. What are those things a far off, that he cannot see? He sees the Sun, the Moon, the Stars; and these are a far off So do the beasts, and some of them more clearly. What, is it meant of a physical remoteness; that he cannot see In ultima naturae, into the deep secrets of nature; not perceive how to derive benefits a fonte, from the fountain head? If he would have bread, does he not know to deduce it by a natural course? As first to till his ground, then to sow his seed, then to reap and carry it into his barn: and when he hath it there, to bring it under the Flaile, the Fan, the Mill, the Oven, and so to perfect it into bread. If he would have clothe, and not to go to the shop for it; knows he not to sheare his sheep, to spin his wool, to weave, full, and color it, and to fit it to his own wearing? Or, is it meant of terrene objects, distanced off by a local interjection. Why he hath then a perspective glass, to represent a remote thing, as it were at his foot. Or some opticke instruments, to stand on a Tower and read a book lying in the streets. Or some political eyes, that by intelligence he may know in his chamber, the state affairs of foreign kingdoms. Or demoniacke eyes, whereby he can see in a glass things as far as Iudia; by a cunning delusion. So Saul was persuaded that he saw Samuel; who indeed was as far off him as heaven from earth. What, is it then meant for a searching into the secret purposes and fetches of men? But the heart of man is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked; who can know it? The worlds principal study is to keep their meanings a far off, as the Fox preys furthest from home. The Labyrinth had a way out, but man's heart is more intricate, and fuller of windings than Meander. You may travel with a man as far as the Indies, and yet still find the way into his heart a farther Journey. These things are far off, but we must look further: not to the things beneath, but to them above, John. 8.23.

Those remote things which this man cannot see, are such as be separated from human sense; whereof flesh and blood was never an eye witness. For we walk by faith, not by sight, 2 Cor. 5.7. The natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. He may see Carnalia mundi, quia praesto sunt; the sensual things of this world, for they are at hand but not Magnalia Dei, quia procul sunt; not the great mysteries of Godliness, for they are far off. But doth not the Gospel bring heaven near us? and doth not CHRIST say Matth. 12.28. The kingdom of God is come unto you? Yes, it may be near to men, and yet men far from it. Indeed the Saints that were once by nature far off, are made nigh to him by the blood of Christ, Eph. 2.13. But unbelievers, and impenitents are far off still.

Heavenly things are far off from carnal sense: he that will believe no more than he sees, shall be forever blind. The best things are Invisible to human eyes: Invisibilis Deus, Heb. 11.27. Moses saw him who is invisible. Invisibilis Lux, 1 Tim. 6.16. God dwelleth in the Light, which no man hath seen, nor can see. Invisibilis Christus, John 14.19. Yet a little while, and the world seeth me no more. It was a great miracle that dying Stephen should see him at the right hand of his Father: and so wonderful a vision to John, to behold him in that glorious majesty, that he fell dead at his feet, Invisibilis Spiritus, like the wind, the sound whereof we hear but see not whence it cometh, nor whither it goeth. Invisibilis potestas, His Power and God-head are called the Invisible things of God. Invisibile Regnum, John. 3.3. Except a man be borne again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. The best eyes see but in a riddle, 1 Cor. 13.12. We see now through a glass darkly. Here faith supplies all defects; For fides est credere quod non vides, cujus merces erit videre quod credis. It is the office of faith to believe that we do not see, and it shall be the reward of faith to see that we do believe, John 20.29. Blessed are they, that have not seen, and yet have believed.

These are the remote objects: in every pious thing there is somewhat affare off, to human eyes. In devotion or worship of God, the prostration of the body is seen, not the humility of the soul. Eli could see Hanna's lips pay their tributes to God, he did not see the zeal of her heart: but she spake in her heart, and Eli thought she was drunk. In the sacrament, bread and wine are seen of reprobate eyes, but there is an invisible thing far off to them; the body and blood of CHRIST, that nourisheth the soul to everlasting life in the Gospel, how near is the history, how far off the mystery! In the word preached, the world perceives, Sonum, non sensum, the audible sound, not the profitable sense. As an ignorant man sees the painted Images of virtues; he says they are goodly pictures, but he knows not what they mean; the moral is far off from his apprehension. As little children, who look upon the babies in a book, regard not the matter therein contained. Concerning a Christian, the world can see his house well furnished, his grounds well stocked, his barns well filled, his purse well money'd, if these things be: but the joy of his spirit, the peace of his conscience, the grace of his heart; these are things afar off from the world. The peace and prosperity that accompanies the Church, they delight to see and taste; that every man may sit under his own fig tree, and drink the milk of his own flock: but the remission of sins, the effusion of grace, the Communion of Saints, the possession of comforts; those spiritual privileges, more glorious than the States of kingdoms, are invisible and too far off. Let us not look at the things that are seen, but at the things that are not seen: for the things that are seen, are temporal: but the things that are not seen, are eternal.

O that your eyes could look a little beyond the earth: there are two several countries afar off: they lie beyond the Poles; yet undiscovered, farther than the Glass of the Scripture presents to the eyes of faith. The Countries are Heaven and Hell: there are two ways to them, which be near and Visible, Piety and Profanesse. There are two doors to pass, before men arrive to either of them; Death and Judgment. Many think these far off, Amo. 6.3. They put far away the evil day: and say, The vision that he seeth is for many days to come, and he prophecietieth of the times that are far off. Men oppress, riot, lust, blaspheme, as if the Judgment were far off: as that malefactor being asked by whom he would be tried, answered deridingly, By CHRIST and his twelve Apostles: it was replied, that they were in heaven: no hast, quoth he, I am content to tarry till they come. But the End of all things is at hand, 1 Peter 4.7. And let them read and tremble, Revelations 22.12. Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me. Senior esse solet vindicta severior.

If you could see so far off as Hell below: if the smoky gates of that bottomless pit were opened to give you but a glimpse of the damned spirits under torture; those flames, those shrieks, those fears and horrors; that palpable darkness mixed with unquenchable fire: the reprobates ever boiling, never consumed: ever dying, never dead: ever crying never pitied. Where the covetous Churl, that would not give a bitte of bread, begs as fast for a drop of water: yet if rivers should run into his mouth, what were it to quench those rivers of brimstone that inflame it? where there is no intermission of complaints, no breathing from pain; after millions of sorrowful years, no possibility of comfort. If the stroke of a temporal misery be so smart, that often death is wished to ease it; what is the full violl of God's wrath? If the rack of a gout, convulsion, or strappado be so cruel, what is everlasting torment? If this sight so far off might be admitted us, how would we weep and bleed for our sins, how incessantly pray for pardon, how rectify our crooked and cursed steps; that we might never come to such a place, as to see Abraham afar off? Luk. 16.23. O that we knew these things in this our day: but alas, they are hid from most men's eyes. If men's fore-sight were but half so sharp as is their sense, that would be their greatest fear, which is now their chiefest pleasure. Let Dives come out of hell to his former riches, the sensible world shall admire his charity. Let Judas be ransomed out of hell, he will no more betray. Let Esau find that favor, he will never again sell his Birthright. Nabal then would no longer be a churl, nor Achitophel a false counselor, nor Ahab a bloody tyrant, nor Cain fratricide. There is not a piece of a line in the Scripture, which speaks of that lake of fire and brimstone, but by a hundred thousand parts it importeth more than it expresseth. Believe that you cannot see, lest you feel that you would not believe.

If you could see so far off as heaven above, or might be admitted to look into that glorious house! Kings use not to dwell in cottages of clay, but in royal Courts fit for their Majesty: what is then the Court of the King of Kings! This world seems glorious, such a Carbuncle as the sun to luster it, stars far more precious then Chrysolites, a pavement checkerd over with various colors, adorned with innumerable delights: now if God hath provided such an habitation for his enemies; what a one is that he hath ordained for himself, and his friends? Earthly Princes have dwelt in Cedar and Ivorie: but the palace of the highest hath a wall of Jasper, a building of gold, a foundation of precious stones, and gates of pearl. We see now but the pavement of it: O how goodly is it stuck full of lights, more sparkling then diamonds? Did the Centurion say, Non sum dignus, ut tu, &c. Matth. 8.8. I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof: and yet CHRIST was than but in his humbled estate? Do thou say, Non sum dignus ut ego; I am not worthy to enter into thy shining and glorious house. It was said, he that hath been once at Ormus, will never love his own country again. He that hath had a glimpse of heaven, how poorly will he think of this earth, which many lose their own souls to purchase? LORD, lift up our eyes to see thus far: let the scales of earthly affections quite fall off; carry us up to thy glory. Thou that didst lay clay upon the blind man's eyes, and so open them: take away this clay of earthliness from our eyes, whereby they are shut. Cast into us the beams of that celestial glory: and because we cannot yet ascend to that, let that come down upon us. Ravish our eyes with thy own beauty, that like Eagles, we may disdain all objects but the sun. Thou that hast prepared heaven for our souls, prepare also our souls for heaven, Act. 17.27. Thou art not far from everyone of us: thou art near to us, bring us also near to thee O God, show us thyself, and we shall love thee: let us see thee, O blessed JESUS, now with the eyes of grace, and hereafter with the vision of perfect glory.

And hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins. We see the curse that lies upon his understanding; he is blind: now for that lies upon his memory; he hath forgotten. To pull the words a sunder, were to martyr the sense: they must be considered Sensu composito, in composition. As they are, they describe a wicked Apostate: lyet separate them, and all signify good. There is a forgetfulness, this may be good, (as to forget a wrong:) there is a purging, this may be better: there is a purging from sins, this may be best of all: but put them together; he hath forgotten that he was purged from his sins; there is the misery. The earth, water, and man, are all safe while they keep Loca sua, their own proper places, but when the water overwhelmed the earth, there was evil to man: the mixture and confusion spoils all. Good simples are often marred in the compounding, a good sentence lost in the mispointing. So here, purgation, and purgation from sins, and purgation from sins by the blood of CHRIST; all lost by the ingratitude of forgetfulness. This same (he hath forgotten) is the confusion of all the rest. It is said of Achitophel, that seeing his counsel neglected, he saddled his Ass, and rose; he prepared himself for a return; that was well: he gate him home to his house that was better: he put his household in order, that was best of all: but when he hanged himself, and became his own executioner, preventing the mercy of David, the mercy of God; this was the bane of all. If after purging from old sins, this man had preserved the mercy in memory, and answered it in piety, he had been happy. But he gets new corruption, and forgets his former purgation: therefore God forgets his righteousness, and takes him away in his wickedness, Ezek. 18.24. In the sin that he hath sinned, he dies.

Forgotten; the original is ad verbum, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, ut qui oblivionem ceperit: one that did voluntarily attract forgetfulness to himself: the author of his own mischief; courting his own destruction: forgetfulness did not so much take him, as he did take forgetfulness. The Poets wrote of Lethê, a certain Stygian river; that whosoever drank of it, forgot presently all passed things. He willfully ingurgitates this Lethean drink, and calls in oblivion to lodge in his heart. The ungodly as if they were impatient at the delay of their own vengeance, hasten to have their sins go before unto judgment. They scarce stay the devils leisure to tempt them, therefore do it themselves. They tarry not till oblivion and ingratitude be offered to them, but they snatch it like revenous stomachs, that will not endure till their meat be dressed. This forwardness is expressed, Prov. 1.16. Their feet run to evil, Mic. 2.1. They rise early to put it in practice, Esa. 5.18. They draw it on with cords and cartropes. They do not accept it as being offered, but extort it as being prohibited. This saves the devil a labor, when men call iniquity to themselves. The soul of the wicked desireth evil: if it comes not, they will fetch it, fly to it: but they had better have crept like snails. For mischief comes soon enough, there is no need to seek it: it is more easily found, than avoided, I am. 4.7. Resist the devil, and he will fly from you. Give to God obedience, to the Prince allegiance, to our Superior reverence, to the weak assistance; only to the devil and sin resistance, Eph. 4.27. Give not place to the devil: for the devil hath no place but where it is given him. I like not that Jesuits humility, that sitting in a chair, and seeing the devil approach, rose up to give him his seat; because he said, he was more worthy of it than himself. But Give him no place, saith Saint Paul: admit no conference with him. He was a fool that went up and down the earth to find Senectutem, old age: which, if he sate still at home, would be sure to find him. Sin will come fast enough; let us not hunt it, nor snatch it: but rather strive to resist it, to expel it.

The points I am to speak of are four: there is

- The corruption of the heart Sins.
- The danger of that corruption Old sins.
- The deliverie from that danger Purged.
- The unthankfulness for that deliverie Forgotten.

The greatness of his Miserie, (Sin Inveterate) commends the goodness of God's mercy (that had Purged him) and condemns the vileness of his ingratitude (that hath Forgotten it.) There is. 1. a Sickness. 2. a Lightning. 3. before death Old sin was a lingering sickness: Purging, that is his lightning: but Forgetfulness of it, is his death.

First, for the corruption, Sin: this is the most sordid feculencie in the world. Lazarus lay full of sores at the rich man's gate, yet was he not so foul and noisome as the rich man himself within doors. Death takes away the bodies filthiness; and CHRIST shall change our vile body, that it maybe like his own glorious body, but he that dies in his sins, shall find his sins ever living in himself. Blessed is he whose sins die before his body: death can do that man no harm, though it rot his flesh to dust. The traveler that is pursued by a Lion, throws off his cloke, and runs nimble into his house, from the window whereof he beholds the Lion tearing his garment, but rejoiceth that himself is safe. Death can but tear thy coat, and bloody it, as Joseph's was, but they self art safe. There are many things we loath which are not detestable; as our brothers Leprosy, &c. but that which is indeed most odious, is held most delectable. We shun sickness with hate, we follow wickedness with joy. Which consideration caused Nazianzen to say, that Melior est conditio vitii, quàm morbi: Sin is in a better condition than sickness. For at a Lazarous, Leprous, diseased man, we stop our nostrils, and turn away our eyes; yet here is God's Image. But to a Prodigal drunkard, a rich usurer, a proud courtier, we insinuate ourselves: yet only for these we have a charge, De non tangendo; and there is the Image of the devil. A man will not enter the house where he knows the plague is, for fear of infection: yet he will venture on the place where GOD is blasphemed, and never prepend the danger, saying with Abraham, surely the fear of God is not in this place; Saint John would not tarry in the bath where Cerinthus was: there is no pestilence so deadly a sin. What a blessed turn is it then to be purged from sin? Psal. 51.2. Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin. The breaking of his bones, the soreness of his flesh, he complained of; but nothing so troubled him as his sins. Therefore there is no such comfort as the remission of sins: David entitleth the 32. Psalm his Learning; Maschil, or Giving instruction. Why, what great learning is in it? Yes, the remission of sins ver. 1. Blessed is the man whose sin is forgiven: there is no learning more sweet and blessed. For this CHRIST taught us to pray continually; Forgive us our sins. The Lord's prayer in that one petition teacheth, Nos esse quotidianos peccatores, & ut tota vita sit paenitentia; that we are daily sinners, and that our whole life should be nothing else, but a Lent to prepare ourselves against the Sabaoth of our rest, and the Easter of our Resurrection. The Creed teacheth us to believe the Remission of our sins; and that God will blot out all our transgressions. Yea, that they are so remitted, as if they never had been committed. The Lamb of God takes them away. Dimittendo quae facta sunt, & adjuvando ne fiant, & perducendo, ad vitam ubi omnino fieri non possunt: by pardoning sins past, and preventing sins to come, and bringing us to that place where sin can be no more: ô blessed place where is no sin! Coelum est, ubi cessat culpa. Heaven begins, where sin ends. We cannot be so quit of it yet: it is well, saith Luther, if as God told Rebecca; Major serviet minori: the elder shall serve the younger. Our enemies are older, our sins greater than we, yet they shall serve for our good: for they must needs be comprehended within that universal and indefinite number of All things, that shall work together to our best, Ro. 8.28. Thus if we could see the irksome filthiness of our sins, we would think our Purging the greatest happiness. As David of his enemies, so let us comfort ourselves concerning our sins, Psal. 118.12. Though they compass us about like bees, yet in the Name of our Lord Jesus we shall destroy them.

Secondly, consider further the danger of this corruption; Old sins. That we translate, A veteribus peccatis; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ; must be thus supplied; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 a peccatis jam olim commissis; from sins that he hath done of old. This aggravates the danger of corruption; for an old ulcer is hardly cured. Long nurture is another nature. When a certain man had brought his possessed son to the Disciples, and they could not cure him; he comes to Christ himself: and he demands, How long is it ago since this came unto him? The father answers, Of a child; therefore, Sipossis aliquid; If thou canst do anything, pity us, and help us. A disease bred from a child is hardly cured; a sin of long continuance hardly purged, Psal. 129.2. They have afflicted me from my youth up, yet they have not prevailed against me. If sin have infected us from our youth up, it is a great wonder that it prevails not still against us. The Physician coming to his patient, enquires Decubitum, the time when he took his Layre; if he have been long infected, it poseth his skill, John. 9.1. There was a man blind from his birth: but if so long blind, none can cure him but CHRIST, verse. 32. It was never heard since the world stood, that any man save CHRIST, opened the eyes of one borne blind. The same Physician found a patient sick of an infirmity eight and thirty years: he comes to him with a Visne sanari, Wilt thou be made whole? Alas, he despairs it: yet Christ performed it; Rise, take up thy bed, and walk.

Old sins. How far must we look back to find out this antiquity. First, as far as the time of their perpetration; old sins, because done long ago, in the wilderness of youth, Psal. 25.7. Remember not the sins of my youth, Job 13.26. Thou writest bitter things against me, when thou makest me to possess the sins of my youth. Youth hath a hotter aptitude and proclivitie to sin: their blood is sooner stirred to choler, their heat to lust, their strength to intemperance. Nequitiae cursus celerior quàm aetatis: their sins out-run their years: and they are discerned to be the children of Adam, before their faces have discovered their sexes. Therefore it was the Wiseman's counsel; Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth: And S. Paul charged Timothy, to fly youthful lusts. The new earthen pots will retain the savor of their first seasoning, Prov. 22.6. Season their youth with the fear of God, as Obadiah said, I fear the Lord from my youth. As Timothy knew the Scriptures from a child, 2 Tim. 3.15. Quae fuerunt inania juventutis gaudia, haec sunt acerba senectutis gravamina. The vanities of youth, prove the vexations of age, and if there be any grace in us; that is now matter of repentance, which was then matter of jovisance. It is enough to terrify the soul, the respectation into old sins.

Yet let us look a little further back, to find this age of sin: even as far as the original, from whence comes all the copy of imitation. Be they never so new in act, they are old in example, Psal. 106.6. Peccavimus cum patribus nostris; We have sinned with our fathers. God tells them, they had rebelled of old, Act. 7.51. As your fathers did, so do ye. Antiquity is no infallible argument of goodness: though Tertullian says, Perfectiora quae prima; the first things were the best things: And Quo minus ab ortu aberrant, the less they distanced from the Beginning, the purer they were; but he must be understood only of holy customs. For Iniquity can plead antiquity: he that commits a new act of murder, finds it old in the example of Cain: drunkenness may be fetched from Noah; contempt of parents from Ham; women's lightness from the daughters of Lot. There is no sin but hath white hairs upon it; & valde senescit, is exceeding old.

But let us look farther back yet, even to Adam; there is the age of sin. This is that Saint Paul calls the Old man: it is almost as old as the root, but older than all the branches. Therefore our restitution by Christ to Grace, is called the New-man. There is a relation, or rather an opposition, between the Old-man and the New, 1 Cor. 15.22. As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive. The first Adam was made a Living soul, the last Adam was made a Quickening Spirit. Therefore he that makes all things new (Rev. 21.5. Ecce, nova facto omnia) can also make us new. That as we have borne the image of the earthy, so we may bear the Image of the heavenly. Adam was made in God's Image, but he begat a son in his own image, not in God's. The corruption of our nature is the image of the old Adam; the renovation of our minds is the Image of the New. Therefore, Put off the Old-man, and cast it away; as Joseph forsook his coat rather than his faith: or as the young man, that Relicto syndone aufugit, left his linen garment and fled. For, Meliùs perit tunica quàm anima; Better lose generation, than regeneration; better part with thy old corruption, than miss thy new hope of salvation.

Of Old things, some are pleasant, some unprofitable, some pernicious. Pleasant, is an old friend, Proverb. 23.10. Thy old friend and thy Fathers friend forsake not: A good old servant, an old monument of honor, old truth, the old way, unprofitable; an old tree past bearing, an old house past inhabiting, an old ship in danger of sinking, an old garment past mending, an old ill custom past curing. Pernicious; such is Satan, that old Serpent, Revel. 20. Old sin, Nah. 2.11. The old Lion devours terribly, an old dog bites sore, that old Serpent stings deadly, 2 Esdr. 5.53. A woman when she is old, brings not forth so goodly children, as in her youth: she ceaseth teeming. But Concupiscence, the older she grows, the stronger she is to bear the children of unrighteousness. The world is old and weak, man old and sick, sin old and more infecting, the Devil old and more prevailing. The only way to evade their danger, is to become new; to talk with new tongues, Mark 16.17. and walk in new ways, Matth. 2.12. then shall we have new names, Revel. 2.17. put on new garments, and have a portion in the new Jerusalem.

That he was purged from his old sins.] We have considered the corruption and inveteratenesse of sin; now observe what measure of mercy was extended to him in the delivery from it; He was purged. This place seems not so easy at the first blush, as upon better search it will appear difficult. He was purged, yet he is granted an ungodly person: Now how can a reprobate be said to be purged from his sins? For this is a sure ground; Deus remittit omnia peccata, vel nulla: If God remit some sins, he retains none: if no sin be remitted, that man is not purged. If he be purged, how can he forget it? If he have forgotten it, how was he purged?

Some understand it thus; that this purging is meant by the shedding of CHRIST'S blood, whereby the whole world is purged, John 1.29. But that all men are purged by CHRIST'S blood, is neither a true position in it self, nor a true exposition of this place. The blood of Christ only purgeth his Church, Ephes. 5.26. And there are none admitted to stand before the Throne, but such as have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. If any soul be thus washed, he shall never be confounded. If this man were thus purged, how could he forget it? God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself. Yet no man thinks that the whole world shall go to heaven; for then were hell mad to no purpose. So God loved the world, that he gave his Son; yet the whole world lies in wickedness. Thus it is clear; Expiation was offered for the world, and offered to the world; but those that are blessed by it, be separated from the world, John. 15.19. I have chosen you out of the world. Salvation may be said to belong to many, that belong not to salvation. Now the reprobate forgets, that a purgation was made for him, by the shedding of the Messiah's blood, which is a wretched thing, to forget so great a ransom?

Go to the Garden, and there behold thy Savior groaning under the weight of sin, heavy enough to have pressed to death millions of Angels, legions of men, the whole world; sweating drops of blood, as if he were cast into the furnace of God's wrath that melted him. Behold him offering that mouth, which spake as never man or Angel spake, to a traitor to kiss. Quod Judas vendidit, & Iudaeus emit; What the traitor sold, and the murderer bought, thou hast obtained: he is thine, not the Jews that purchased him: now hast thou gotten him, and yet forgotten him? That which tickles thy heart with laughter, made the heart of thy Savior bleed; and hast thou forgotten it? His soul was pressed to death with the sins we never shrink at: his eyes wept tears of blood, ours flow with tears of laughter: he felt those torments we cannot conceive: we cannot understand what he did stand under. Were we so foul, that nothing but his blood could purge us, and do we forget that purging? Do we forget that cry, whereat heaven and earth, men and Angels, stood amazed, My GOD, my GOD, why hast thou forsaken me? The very senseless creatures did not forget it: the heavens were hung with black, the Sun did hide his face like a chief mourner, and durst not behold his Passion. Now, Solus homo non compatitur, pro quo solo Christus patitur? For man alone was all this passion, yet in man alone is least compassion. I know thou condemnest Judas, and that worthily; who sold CHRIST a man, there was murder: CHRIST his Master, there was treason:

CHRIST his Maker, there was sacrilege. Murder is a crying sin, Treason a roaring sin, Sacrilege a thundering sin.

Thou condemnest the Jews for buying him: they bought him not to possess as their own; they should so have made the best purchase in th world, to have bought Him that bought them. But they bought him to sell him again, as Simon Magus would have bought the HOLY GHOST; given money for him, to have got money by him. Buy the Truth, and sell it not. They bought him to bind, abuse, mock, spit on, scourge, crucify him. Thou condemnest these; and shall not these, and the GOD of all condemn thee, if thou use thy SAVIOUR after the same manner? They crucified Iesum humilitatum, Christ in his mortality: thou crucifiest Iesum glorificatum, Christ in his immortality. Thy sin is, and thy judgment shall be greater; because thy knowledge, and his glory is more.

Hath he suffered all this to purge us, and will we not yet let him alone? Shall we not suffer the Son of God to be at rest in his heaven? Shall we blaspheme and swear him quite over, open his wounds with our oaths, give him new potions of gall with our drunkenness, pierce him again with our oppressions, defile him again with our lusts, run him into the heart with our homicides; and still forget all this? Take we heed, for he feels it, and therefore does not forget it: the lewd Christian may come to see him, even whom himself hath pierced. Do we offer violence to that glorified SAVIOUR; and with a presumptuous hand lifted up to the heaven, pull him down from his Throne to his Cross? Is it not enough that he died once for us? Are those pains so light, so slight, and have we so soon forgotten them, that every day we should redouble them? Is this the recompense of those infinite torments? In vain thy tongue cries Hosanna, when thy hand crucifies him. How darest thou receive the Sacrament with that hand, that is so imbrued in his blood whom thou receivest! He that sells that for a little pleasure, which CHRIST bought with so much pain; Stultum reputat Christum mercatorem; Thinkes CHRIST but a foolish buyer, and that he had a hard penny-worth: but indeed Stultum se praebet venditorem; he proves him a foolish seller; and with Esau, will repent his bargain.

Now hath Christ done so much to purge us, and can we forget it? Can such a benefit die in our memories? No, Toto nobis figatur in cord, qui totus pro nobis fixus in cruce, August. Let every redeemed heart, remember his Redeemer. Forget not the Passion of thy Savior, O my soul: but Totus sit fixus in me, qui totus est crucifixus pro me; Let him be wholly fastened in me, that was wholly fastened to the Cross for me.

Some understand by this Purging, true Regeneration: in this Exposition the Romanists are confident and peremptory. But so taken, it is mistaken: for if he were regenerate, he could never forget it. Upon this collection they build, that a man may fall away from grace, and that without distinction, even totally and finally. Here they cry Vicimus, we have conquered; the Calvinians are confuted, confounded: but this trumpet might be blown with a straw. Their Logic is too hasty; they force theit conclusion to ride post. As in their Indulgences and Pardons they move men to presumption: so in this they drive them to desperation; any way serves their turns to deceive. If this their position were true, they must needs be false, John. 13.1. Whom he loves, he loves to the end: and that Rom. 8.38. Nothing can separate us from the love of God in Christ: And Heb. 13.8. then were Jesus Christ not the Same, yesterday; and today, and forever. But the Spirit of Adoption is an everlasting Spirit: and God's mercy, like his Majesty, endures forever: and the gifts of grace are without repentance: God will never retract them, for he is no changeling. I the Lord change not. Man is inconstant, riches are inconstant, honor is inconstant, friends are inconstant, a wife is inconstant, the world is inconstant: only Ego Jehovah non mutor; I the Lord change not. He doth not today love dearly, and tomorrow hate deadly; but whom he blesseth, shall be blessed. CHRIST will not quench the smoking flax, but inflame the least spark of grace. Fides concussa, non excussa: the light may be eclipsed, not extinguished. But they object, Matth. 18.32. I forgave thee all the debt: yet verse. 34. he cast him into prison, till he should pay all that was due unto him: The debt remitted, is again required. I answer, that the scope of that parable is to show, that God will no otherwise forgive us, then we forgive others. For certainly if a man be once acquitted, he can never for that debt be damned. God's covenant depends not on our obedience, but our obedience depends on God's covenant. We are not therefore loved, because we are holy: but we are therefore holy, because we are loved. If this purging had been absolute Regeneration, it could never be forgotten: for all the promises of God are Yea and Amen in Jesus Christ.

Some expound it thus; he was purged, that is, he thought himself purged: he was only clean in his own opinion. So CHRIST calls the Pharisees Just, because they justified themselves, Luke 15.7. This opinionative purging easily revolteth to profaneness: he that never had but the case of a sheep, may very well be a Wolf. They slumber, and suppose themselves good Christians: their faith is but a dream, their hope but a dream, their charity but a dream, their obedience but a dream, their whole religion but a dream; and so their assurance of salvation is but a dream. They have regeneration in conceit, repentance and righteousness in conceit, they serve GOD well in conceit, do the works of piety and charity in conceit, and they shall go to heaven only in conceit. Get better assurance than only to think thyself good: pure and naked supposalls bring no man to eternal life.

Others; as Luther, refer this Purging to Baptism: which exposition may carry a probable and profitable sense. This Saint Paul calls the Laver of Regeneration; but Metanimesis; he means the sign or seal of it. Our purgation by CHRIST'S blood is not only granted to us in the Charter of the Gospel, but also confirmed in the Sacramental Seals. In the Old Testament there was Circumcision, contra peccati reatum: and Occision, or the Passover, contra peccati poenam; as the School speaketh.

Answerable to these we have Baptism and the LORD'S Supper: now it is the general consent of the Fathers, that in the most complete Baptism sin is not so taken away, Quod non sit, sed quod non obsit: non quoad actum, sed quoad reatum; Sin is still within the faithful, but it shall not be destructive to them in whom it is. Indeed if we consider the inward baptism of the Spirit with the outward, there is a true purging. The laver of regeneration cleanseth from the guilt of all sins, quae vel humana traxit nativitas, vel contraxit iniquitas, August. So Lactantius sings of the baptized Infant: Candidus egreditur nitidis exercitus undis: Atque vetus vitium purgat in amne novo. Aquinas says, this Sacrament is a Commemoration, a Demonstration, a Prognostication: a Commemoration of Christ's Death, that is past: a Demonstration of CHRIST'S grace, that is present: a Prognostication of CHRIST'S Glory, that is to come. Thus can the GOD of Power effect his will by weak means: as the aspersion of blood on the doors without, shall save the effusion of blood in the house within. Naaman must wash in Jordan, the blind in Siloam, the lame in Bethesda, we in the sacred Font. As none entered the Sanctuary, but they first washed in the golden laver: so ordinarily none enter the Church, but they are first washed in this holy fountain.

Now to this, outward Baptism is necessary, necessitate conditionata, with a conditional necessity: inward, necessitate absoluta; with an absolute necessity. Baptism purgeth not, Vt pharmacum, aut opus expiatorium, sed ut Sacramentum, foederis obsignatorium; It healeth not as a medicine, by it own inherent virtue; but as a seal of his mercy, by whose grace we are saved. Not necessitate medii, sed mandati; the necessarinesse of it is derived from the Commandment of GOD. A man may have it, and yet be lost: as Magus had Sacramentum virtutis, but not virtutem Sacramenti; the Sacrament of grace, but not the grace of the Sacrament. Another may want it, and yet be saved: as that penitent malefactor was never washed in Jordan, yet received into Paradise. Sacraments then save not, Efficienter, sed efficaciter; not necessarily, but ordinarily. Vnde tanta vis aquae, ut dum corpus lavet, cor abluat? non quod dicitur, sed quod creditor, August. Whence hath the water such virtue, that washing the body, it should purge the soul? Not because it is so said, or, so sprinkled; but because it is so believed. It is not therefore enough to have Sacramentum fidei, but Fidem Sacramenti; Not to have the Sacrament of faith, but the faith of the Sacrament. He that believes, and is baptized, shall be saved. He that is thus baptized, is truly purged: and as upon CHRIST being baptized, the HOLY GHOST descended: so the Spirit, which once moved on the face of the waters, shall work with the water upon his soul. And as there came a voice to CHRIST from heaven; This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased: So doth GOD the Father secretly spake to the baptized Infant; Thou art my beloved child; with whom (though before I was angry) I am now well pleased. Before thou wast a child of wrath, an heir of perdition: but now thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee.

If this wicked man had been so purged, he could never have forgotten it. But he had only Baptismum Fluminis, non Flaminis; The Baptism of water, not of the Spirit. And is not this a miserable and damnatorie sin, to forget a man's Baptism? Not to remember that his name is Christian? It is pity that ever the water of Baptism was spilled upon his face. Wert thou borne in sin, non prius natus quàm damnatus; A stranger to the life of GOD? And loe, then did thy parents bring thee to the sacred Font; and when thou couldest not answer for thyself, was not GOD pleased to take sureties for thee, witnesses of thy future obedience? Did the Church open her bosom to receive thee to her Mother-hood, GOD to his Father-hood, CHRIST to his Brother-hood, Angels to their guard and society, all the Elect to their prayers and charity; and canst thou forget all this? Wilt thou disclaim Christians, despise the Angels, deny thy Brother, defy thy Mother, reject thy Father, and run a course crosse to piety and eternal life? Shall not, at that great day, men forsake thee, devils accuse thee, Angels repudiate thee, the Church be ashamed of thee, thy Father disinherite thee, yea, even thy Brother now become thy Judge, the LORD JESUS condemn thee? What can save thee, if thou forget thou wert a purged Christian?

Beloved, think of the end of your washing; it was that you should no more foul yourselves, Acts 22.16. Bee baptized, and wash away your sin, calling on the Name of the LORD. The Eunuch being baptized, became a Saint: Descendit Ethnicus, resurgit Christianus: He went down into the water a Heathen, he came up a Christian. The cruel Gaolor, baptized, became a zealous professor. Baptism is in poenitentiam, Matth. 3. to amendment of life. Therefore say with the Spouse, Cant. 5.3. I have washed my feet, how shall I defile them? Forget not that Sacramental vow made to God, in the presence of men and Angels. Did it fly up to heaven, and does it not stay there to testify against thee? Thou vowed'st thyself a soldier, not a neuter: to fight for the Lord, not to stand still and look on; much less to fight against him: for Cursed is he that takes not the Lord's part. Thou must fight: thou doest fight; but against whom? not against the world, thy own lust, the power of Satan; but against thy brethren. Upon every slight occasion we must to Law: like Cockes of the game; that fight neither pro patria, nor pro domo: so we contend not pro cure, jure, thure; not for the title of inheritance, not for the right of the poor, nor for the cause of Religion: but Quia alter alteri cedere non vult; but because one will not yield to another. Turbulent Lawyers are the abettors that set them on; the Cock-pit is Westminster-Hall; and when they have pecked out one another's eyes, they pull their feathers. Is this to fight the LORD'S battle? No, it is to be on the Dragons side. Do we war against the world? No, we fight not like Alexander, to subdue it to ourselves, but to subdue ourselves to it. Run thorough the shoppes of this City, and you may know by their weapons; false measures, false balances, false lights, false tongues; what they fight for. O the mercy of GOD! Have we forgot our names? Is there no memory of our Christianity left? We had but some prints and relics of it at first; and may we now say, as of Jerusalem; Etiam periere ruinae? Is there no ruin nor stone left, to tell a man's self; This building was a Christian? It is reported of Orbilius, a Grammmarian, that he forgot not only the letters of his book, but even his own name. We forget both the prints and letters of the Gospel, and withal our own names; that we are Christians. As GOD said to that evil servant; Ex ore tuo te judico; Out of thine own mouth I will judge thee: So he will speak to this Apostate, Ex nomine te damno; By thine own name will I condemn thee: Thou namest thyself Christian, yet shamest the profession. Now the Spirit of God purge us from this forgetfulness, and grant us never to forget our purging. Let us never forget such a benefit, that we may never be forgotten by the Author of it.

He hath forgotten that he was purged. Here is his unthankfulness for this deliverance. What, blind, and forgotten too? How comes this to pass? Blindness should ever have the best memory: what is taken from one sense, is divided among the rest. The ear retains what it is entrusted with, the better; when the eye wants occasion to direct it. The memory is like a cage, the ear is the door of it, the eye the window: good doctrines are put like birds in at the door, and fly out again by setting open the window. Indeed the defect of corporal sight hath often mended the memory; but it is not so for spiritual, Mark. 8.18. Having eyes, see ye not? and do ye not remember? They neither saw, nor remembered. A carnal heart is blind to conceive, ready to forget, 2 Timoth. 3.7. Ever learning, never able to come to the knowledge of the truth: slow to get, apt to forget. As Nescitis, know you not, was a word often used by Saint Paul: so, Do you not remember, was frequent from our SAVIOUR CHRIST, 2 Tim. 1.13. Hold fast the form of sound words; that good thing which was committed to thee, keep. An auditor should not be like the sponge, that holds all water both good and bad: nor like the sieve, that holds no water, neither good nor bad: nor like the boulder, that keeps in the course branne, and throws out the fine flower: but like the scribe, that keeps in the good seed, and casteth out the dust and unprofitable darnel. One said of our Country, that it had fair houses, but bad chimneys, because they have so little smoke of hospitality: so we have excellent ears, but bad memories: quick conceptions, brittle retentions: not a Nation under heaven hears so many good Sermons; not a Nation under heaven sooner forgets them. Many arts are taught among us, of quick reading, of short writing; where by brachigraphical characters they will take a Sermon verbatim. But there is one art, I would some good body would teach it us; it is the art of memory. That as Sermons are taken word for word in our papers; so they might be written sense for sense in our hearts

Now if my power were answerable to my will, I would teach you this art. Posse mihi Is tribuat qui mihi velle dedit. To dispose this discourse of memory into some method, lest it be confounded in that should teach it. The object of memory specified in the Text, is double; the estate of sin wherein we lay polluted, and the estate of cleansing wherein we stood recovered. So that the point is here confined to sins or good works. For our sins, let us first learn how to remember them, and then how we may forget them.

First, for their remembrance; Chrysostom says, nothing more helps us forward in a good course, than the frequent recognition of our sins. David specially entitleth the 38. Psal. a memorandum. A Psalm of David to bring to remembrance. Upon good reason saith Euthymius, because he made it when he called his sins to remembrance. Cum commissa olim a se delicta memoria repeteret, Uer. 4. My iniquities, &c. Paul thus remembers his former sinfulness of life; I was a blasphemer, &c. and so he became more zealous to save sinners than before he had been furious to kill the godly. Quod fecit Saulus, patitur Paulus: of a violent persecutor, he became a valiant sufferer. Our sins are innumerable, who can tell how oft he offendeth. Thou rememberest not the sins of one day, how great a mass have many days made up! too great a bottom for one hours sorrow to ravell out. Have you forgotten the wickedness of your fathers, and your own wickedness that you are not humbled even unto this day? If we forget our sins, God will remember them. The wicked man would put out the eye of knowledge, & stupefie the memory of infinite comprehension: He says in his heart, God hath forgotten. But, These things hast thou done, and I kept silence: therefore thou thoughtest that I was altogether such a one as thyself: but I will reprove thee, and set them in order before thine eyes. The forborne debtor may forget, but the forbearing Creditor remembers: every parcel is set down in his book. Ahab had forgot Naboths blood, but God remembers it. Joab had forgot the murder of Abner and Amasa; but David chargeth Solomon to remember it: Let not his hoary head go down to the grave in peace. But if we remember our sins in the day of repentance, God will forget them in the day of vengeance. He will answer as Cato to him that stroke him in the Bath, and afterwards submitted himself to his mercy; Non memini me percussum; I do not remember that I was smitten. Ananias pleaded against Paul, Act. 9.13. Lord remember how much evil he hath done to thy Saints: but the Lord answers, Oblitus sum, he is my chosen vessel. The times of this ignorance God winked at, but now he commandeth all men everywhere to repent. Repent then, and all shall be forgotten. At what time soever, what sinner soever, shall turn from what sin soever, heartily; I will put all his wickedness out of my remembrance: the Lord will forget it, Heb. 8.12. I will be merciful to them, and their sins I will remember no more. But it is the Holy Ghost, that brings all things to our remembrance. Now this holy spirit of memory, teach us thus to remember our sins: that we may think of them with penitent sorrow, and God forget them to our eternal joy.

There is a way also for us to forget them: as we remember them to repentance, so we must forget them in respect of continuance. Otherwise the memory of them doth not reduce us to life, but forward us to death. This is to fetch poison out of a dunghill formerly cast forth. He that remembers his sins in sorrow, falls like Abraham, forward on his face to God: he that remembers them to practice, falls like the Jews, backward from JESUS CHRIST. If thou be on the mountain, have no love to look back to Sodom. If thou be in the Ark, fly not back to the world, as the Raven did. If thou be set on for Canaan, forget the fleshpots of Egypt. If marching against Midian, forget stooping to the waters of Harod. Judge. 7. Mark. 13.15. If on the house top, forget that is below thee: Luk. 9.62. If thy hand be put to the plow, forget that is behind thee. Themistocles desired rather to learn the art of forgetfulness, than of memory. Philosophy is an art of remembering, Divinity includes in it an art of forgetting. The first lesson that Socrates taught his Scholars, was Reminiscere, Remember: for he thought that knowledge was nothing else but a calling to remembrance of those things the mind knew, ere it knew the body. But the first lesson that Christ teacheth his Scholars, is Obliviscere; Forget, Psal. 45.10. Forget thine own people, Matth. 4.17. Repent, 1 Pet. 3.11. First, eschew evil

They which die cloth, do not immediately change one contrary into another; but first turn white into an azure, then make it a puke, &c. so we can never hold color, or have our integrity died in grain, but by mediate degrees. Nisi dediscimus been, quod dicimus non been, Lirinens. What we did ill get, we must well forget: and happily unlearn what we did unhappily learn. They that work in wax, cannot form a new impression, but by defacing the old: till Satan's image be extinguished, CHRIST'S cannot be imprinted in us. We must forget the wilderness, that we may dwell in Canaan. Faith is that fair Helen, which drinks to us in a cup of Nepenthe, and says; There shall be no more sorrow; for vetera transierunt, the former things are passed away. The hearty draught of the living fountain, shall make a man not to remember the days of his life; because God answereth him in the joy of his heart. The Scripture is full of this language, Esa. 43.18. Remember not the former things, neither consider the things of old. There are some dissolute persons, that laugh at the memorial of their sins: shall they not weep tears of blood for those smiles? Woe be to them that thus laugh, for they shall weep. When they are past committing, they applaud themselves in recounting, in reporting their aspersions of fraud, blood, or lust: they glory in their shame. They remember that on earth laughing, which they must remember in hell howling. This is a cursed commemoration; when an old man shall glory in his former whoredoms, boast his homicides; yea perhaps (if it be possible) make himself worse than ever he was. Some men lie to save their credits; and that is as if one should wipe his mouth on his sleeve to spare his napkin. But this man tells lies to increase his discredit; and to fill up the measure of his torments. As if his damnation could not otherwise be heavy enough, his tongue shall make up the weight which his hands failed to accomplish. Here is a damnable remembrance of sin; not by penitence to cleanse the soul, but by impudence, more to foul it, Psal. 52.1. why boastest thou thyself in mischief.

No, but if thou hast had a fluxe of malice, as that woman a fluxe of blood, 12. years; now being cured, forget that bloodiness. If thou hast been depressed with worldliness, as another woman with a spirit of infirmity, 18. years. Now being rectified, forget that crookednesse. Though blind from thy birth, as the man John. 9. now having thine eyes opened, forget thy former cecitie. Though formerly deaf and dumb, upon CHRIST'S Ephata, forget those orbities. Though thy charity were dried up, like that man's withered hand, Matthew 12.10. yet now upon the restitution of it, forget all dryness and niggardice. Though thou wert a creeple from the womb, yet now being recovered, forget all limping and halting with God. Though buried in the grave four days, yet now being revived, forget all deadness in sin. Though before tormented with seven devils, as Mary Magdalene; yet being dispossessed, forget the devil and all his works. Forget Babylon, but remember Jerusalem, Psal. 137.5. If I forget thee, O Jerusalem; If I do not remember thee; let both my hand and mouth miscarry, and forget their offices. Forget thy old sinful life; So shall the King greatly desire thy beauty. Forget not the mercies of God, lest God forget to do you good: but forget all the injuries of men: write the wrongs in their dust, and cover all offenses done to you with a mantle of charity. The Sum of all is; remember your sins to repent of them, forget to practice them: that God may forget them in judgment, and remember you in mercy and salvation.

This be the method of memory in respect of sin; now for the works of grace; I do not mean such as GOD hath wrought in us, but such as ourselves by his grace have done. There is a rule how they may be remembered, and how they must be forgotten.

Our virtues and good works may be after some manner remembered. Quàm immensa est laetitia de recordatione transactae virtutis! Our conscience is exceedingly comforted by the memory of our zealousnesse to serve God. The kingdom of God consists in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Now, if there be knowledge of righteousness, then certainly there will be peace of conscience; and these cannot be without joy of the Holy Ghost. Job hath a whole Chapter of these holy remembrances. Chapter 31. If I have walked, &c. and he concludes; My heart shall not condemn me for my days. So sick Hezekiah cheered himself. Lord, remember how I have walked before thee with a perfect heart. So Obadiah after a sort justified himself to Elias, 1 King. 18.13. Diddest thou not hear, how I saved the Prophets of the LORD from Jezebel? The purpose of this repetition, is not to boast merits, but to seek mercies. Neither must this line of remembered goodness be there cut off, but extended forth still: like a man that counts his miles past, but yet goes on his journey. He that is holy, let him be holy still, Revelations 22.11. The further men fetch their careere backward to take their run; the further they leap forward when they have run. So a sober recognition of our former obedience, remembering what peace of conscience we had in that service, encourageth our future constancy. There are some who looking to this Record, find their own names blank. What, no good deeds yes, but they have lost their memories: they cannot call to mind where, or when, or how they performed them. Like the drunkard who sought all the Inns in the town for his horse, when indeed he came thither on foot. These men may blame their bad memories, but the fault is in their bad hands and hearts. Some have their good deeds written upon Hospital walls; perhaps lest God should forget them. But we will charitably construe it; that they were recorded there rather by the gratitude of the receivers, then by the popular desire of the contributors. Howsoever, it is somewhat that they have good deeds to remember. But too many have none at all: will you blame their memories? no, God amend their lives.

In another course, our good works are to be forgotten, and not mentioned: let them be remembered to enliven our obedience, and comfort our conscience: but rather than we should arrogate merit by them, oblivion take them. He that in pride remembers his virtues, hath indeed no virtues to remember; because he wants the mother virtue of all, humility. Here is one difference between good and evil men: both remember virtues; Pii aliorum, impii suas: good men remember the virtues of others, evil men their own. They think on others virtues as ensamples to imitate, these on their own as miracles to wonder at. The way to have God remember them, is for ourselves to forget them. Abraham was content to offer up Isaac, but then he forgets it, therefore God remembers it, Gen. 22.16. Because thou hast done this thing: there is the general: what thing? the particular follows, And hast not withheld; not thy servant, but Thy son: and not only thy son, but thy only son; therefore in blessing, I will bless thee. Mary shown to CHRIST great kindness; but when she had done, she thought it not worth remembrance: therefore CHRIST repeats it, and amplifies it from point to point. Simon, thou gavest me neither water to my feet, nor kiss to my mouth, nor oil to my head; but she hath washed me with tears, kissed with her lips, and anointed my very feet.

Who dare boast himself to God! If in a brave theomachy, thy memory produceth a thousand good works, God's memory will bring forth ten thousand of thy sins, to knock thee down. Therefore let us cast down our most flourishing branches, and our most glorious Crowns at the feet of CHRIST. If Sennacherib have conquered kingdoms, you shall hear him crack it, Esa. 37.13. Where is the king of Hamach, &c. If Nebuchadnezzar have built a stately palace, he must brag of it; Is not this great Babylon, I have built for the honor of my majesty? David himself could not be content with the multitude of his people, but he must needs number them, 2 Samuel 24.2. If Hezekiah have rich treasures, he must needs show them, 2 Kin. 20.13. victorious Sampson must glory in his conquests, Judge. 15.16. With the jaw of an asse have I slain a thousand men. But for us, though we give alms, let us sound no trumpets, Matth. 6.2. though we fast twice a week, let us make no words of it. God best likes of those good works, that be covered under the fleece of humble silence. So the Lord that seeth in secret, will reward openly, Matth. 6.4. Humilitas animi, sublimitas Christiani. The Christians glory is his humility. Saint Paul was in nothing behind the very chiefest Apostles; yet he accounts himself nothing, 2 Cor. 12.11. I labored more abundantly than they all, 1 Cor. 15.10. yet he forgets it. I speak with tongues more than you all. I speak wisdom among you that are perfect, 1 Cor. 2.6. I fought with beasts at Ephesus after the manner of men, 1 Cor. 15.32. yea he calls all the former sufferings, things without: he had a thing within that troubled him; The care of all the Churches. He was wrapped up to the third heaven, and perfected his knowledge among the Angels. Yet he esteems, hoc aliquid, hoc magnum, hoc mirum, hoc totum, nihil; He forgets all this in regard of merit, as if it were nothing. Whereas we, if we have done one thing well, or at one time well, think we have done enough. Orpheus going to hell to fetch out his wife Euridice, had her granted him on this condition, that he should not turn back to look upon her till he had brought her forth. But being forward a good way, in an excessive love, Flexit amans oculos, & protinus illa relapsa est: he looked back and so lost both her sight and her self: but perhaps when he considered better of the matter; he was willing to be rid of her. This fiction is not without the moral, if we have any virtue, though it be as dear as a wife unto us, let us not dote on it with a self-loving admiration; lest by too much looking, and too well liking, we lose it▪ let us not be too memorious of our good works; it is enough that God will not forget them. This deed shall be told for a memorial of her. We had better have one written in heaven, than a thousand in earth: whosoever forgets them, the comfort is, they shall be remembered of Christ.

The sum of all is this; unthankfulness is even forgetful. This is the first degree of apostasy. They forgot his works, and remembered not his hand, nor the day when he delivered them from their enemies. Nathan taxed David with this forgetfulness, 2 Sam. 12.8. How much hath God done for thee, yet hast thou forgotten it, and despised his Commandment? So Pharaohs officer forgot Joseph, when he came to his preferment. Joash the King remembered not the kindness of Iehojada, but slew his son. Hath God delivered, purged, blessed us, and can we forget it? Beware lest thou lift up thine heart, and forget the Lord. David would not suffer the blessings of God to lie in tenebris, unseen of men, unremembred of his own heart, but he proclaims them, Psal. 66.16. Come all ye that fear the Lord, and I will tell you what he hath done for my soul. Let others write the kindnesses of their friends, I will relate to you the mercies of my God, Psal. 40.10. and 71.15. Of all faculties of the soul, the memory is most delicate, tender and brittle, and soonest decayeth: and of all objects of memroy, Primum senescit beneficium, a benefit soonest grows old. Yet it is an easy work of memory, to think on him that made us: here is no over-charging it with numerous objects; to remember only one thing, the mercy of thy God. It is no weakening to thy body, no decay to thy store, no emptying to thy purse; O then be thankful! And yet all thy riches, thy fatlings, thy first fruits, thy best oblations are not so acceptable: it is more welcome than the Bullock that hath horn and hoof, Psal. 77.9. Hath God forgotten to be gracious? He hath then left his old wont: No, David had forgotten the richnesse of his mercy; therefore he recollects himself, verse. 10. This is mine infirmity; but I will remember the years of the right hand of the most High. Not the moments, nor the hours, nor days of a few short afflictions; that his left-hand hath dealt to me: but the years of his right hand; those long, large, and boundless mercies wherewith he hath comforted me. When they forgot the Lord, he sold them into the hand of Sisera, and to the Philistines- They that forget the Lord, shall be delivered into the hand of Sisera, Captain of the enemies host, that is, Satan; or to the Philistines, the Lusts of the Flesh; or to Moab, that's the world. Consider this ye that forget God: though you forget your own country, and your fathers house: though you forget the wife of your bosom, and the fruit of your own loins: though you forget to eat your bread, and take your sleep: yet remember your sanctification, forget not that you were purged by the blood of CHRIST. If you have treasures and Iemmes, you desire a Cabinet to put them in: I have shown you a Cabinet for all the Jewels of grace you have gathered, the memory. If you have received any good, there preserve it. Paul tells the Hebrews, Hebr. 12.5. You have forgotten the exhortation: let it never be said of you, that ye have forgotten the exhortation spoken to you.

Forgotten that he was purged. There remains yet one degree more of application and amplification of this point. Consider we the price of our Purgation, and we shall more willingly part from our corruption. If the blood of God's son was spilled and spent to discharge us of sin; how odious should sin appear to us! Oh let no sin be held so dear as to be retained, when God retained not his dearest son for us. When Abraham offered up Isaac, God said; I see thou lovest me: but when God offered up his son for us, (that were, not as God to Abraham, a friendly Creator, but) enemy creatures, we may well say; LORD, we see that thou lovest us. Abraham's offering Isaac was a grievous trial; both for the matter and the manner: that Talis, Talem, Taliter. 1. That the sacrificer should be a father. It is contranaturall and execrable for a son to slay his father; to give death to him, that gave him life. Herodotus writes of some that held it impossible for a son to kill his father. A great law-giver made no Law for it, as a thing never to be done. If any were suspected or accused for it, they would conclude that either he had not done it, or that he was a bastard; they could not be persuaded that any son would commit parricide. But now it is more strange for a father to slay his son: for love more descends than ascends. We have read of young ones that killed their own damme, we never read of a damme that killed her own young ones. But here Isaac is doomed to die, not by the hand of an enemy, not by a stranger, not by an executioner, not by a murderer; but by a father; a mild, gentle, holy, loving father. O utinam tantummodo moriturus, non patris manu moriturus! Abraham might say, Oh that it were only his destiny to die, and not to die by the hand of his father. 2. That the sacrifice should be his son, his Isaac, his joy: not only his son, but his only son. Not one of many; yet Jacob cannot spare one of twelve, he weeps for Joseph, he is grieved to part with Benjamin. Yea, that it must be that son, from whom the Messiah was to come; the hope of salvation to himself, and all the ends of the earth. 3. That he must die after such a manner: a sacrifice to GOD, who delights not in the blood of men: and this himself not standing by, but with his own hand. Since he must die, ô that alienâ manu, non propriâ; that another hand might do it, and the father not see it! Si fleres filium mortuum, quid si jussus occidere? doest thou lament thy son dying, what wouldest thou do if thyself were commanded to kill him? God remembers this faithful service with an oath. By myself have I sworn, that I will bless thee for it. Sure he was loath his tender son to kill: but much more loath to break his fathers will.

But now to what purpose is all this? Yes, Abraham puts us in mind of God the Father, Isaac was a type of CHRIST: either gives up his only son, but with great difference: Abraham's duty was but a shadow of God's bounty. 1. Abraham at God's command was bound to do it, as a creature to his maker; but who could command God? Children are commanded by parents, their parents by magistrates, those magistrates by Princes, those Princes by God, God himself by none. 2. Abraham did this for a loving friend, God did it for hating enemies, Rom. 5.10. When we were enemies, he reconciled us by the death of his Son. 3. Abraham tradidi filium moriturum, Deus filium immortalem morti. Abraham offered a mortal son sure to die, God offered an Immortal son to death indeed. The one must have died though his father should never kill him: the other could never have died, unless the father had delivered him to death. Besides, he that was mortal scaped, he that was immortal died.

Now wherefore did God all this? to purge us from sin. Sic filium crucifixit, ut peccatum occideret: so he killed his son, that he might kill our sin: he was crucified that iniquity might be mortified. Ponder them, and weigh the reasons why our Savior died: Sampson suffered his heir, his strength, to be lost for Delilah: CHRIST suffered himself to be betrayed and murdered for us. Jacob endured fourteen years service for Rachel. CHRIST above thirty years passion for us. Rachel was fair, therefore Jacob loved her: we were foul and polluted, yet CHRIST loved us. Tollere peccatum mundi, intermisit gloriam caeli: he did descend from his own royalty, to deliver us from misery. Diverse Kings have left their regal seats for a monasterie: CHRIST forsook heaven for earth, a crown of joys for a crown of thorns. Exemplum sine exemplo! Many refuse heaven for earths sake, because they know not those supernall joys; CHRIST knew heaven, for it was his own. All this for sin: fie filthy sin, that any soul should hereafter love thee! for this cause turn from iniquity to righteousness: do thou for GOD'S sake not spare thy dearest sin; when GOD for thy sake did not spare his dearest Son. Fall not back to wickedness and pollution; remember thou art purged by Jesus Christ.

VERSE 10. Wherefore, the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure: for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall.

The scope of this verse is persuasive and hortatory: wherein the Apostle labors to reduce Christianity to practice; That as men have a plentiful hope of salvation, so they may show a liberal argument of sanctification. For everyone that hath this hope purgeth himself. 1 John. 3.3. And he that is freed from damnation walks after the spirit, Ro. 8.1. Neither can there be a sound testimony of conscience, that we are in God's favor; if it be not joined with the integrity of life. That which from everlasting stood sure in heaven by God's decree of election, this make sure to yourselves on earth by your conversion from evil, and conversation in goodness. As God hath his Statutum est, so must you have your Probatum est. CHRIST hath bequeathed to all believers a legacy of glory, entitle yourselves to it by your faith and holiness; make your election sure. It was ever sure in GOD'S prescience, now make it sure to your own conscience. Which when you have done, be stablished in your hearts; Ye shall never fall. He that hath a grant from the King under the broad-seal, and hath also interested and strengthened himself in this grant Robore Legis, and hath approved himself Coram facie Iudicis; wants now nothing but possession, which the Sheriff cannot deny him. So the Christian having both these made sure to him, when death shall manumitte him, the Angels shall bring him to the Inheritance, and the gate of glory shall give open way, the Porter not being Peter, but the LORD JESUS himself. A man in your City is to be made free by his fathers copy: you demand proof that he is such a man's son: he proves it by testimony, you cannot deny his freedom. The Father of heaven makes all Christians free by CHRIST'S copy, John. 8.36. If the Son make you free, shall you not be free indeed? Thou comest and demandest thy freedom: where is thy testimony that thou art such a fathers son? here, my faith and some measure of obedience. Christ will answer, Matth. 25.21. Well done thou good and faithful servant: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

Wherefore the rather brethren, &c. The whole Verse may be distributed into:

- An Exhortation; be diligent to make your election sure.
- An Confirmation; If ye do ye shall never fall.

The Exhortation contains in it:

- An Induction; Brethren, be diligent.
- An Instruction; Make your calling certain.

In the former there is a word:

- Of Connection; Wherefore.
- Of Affection; Brethren.
- Of Direction; Give diligence.
- Of Election; Rather, to this than other things.

In the other is considerable:

- The Matter expressed; Make your calling and election sure.
- The Manner implied; How it may be made sure.

The Confirmation offers to be considered by:

- A Qualification; If ye do these things.
- A Ratification; You shall never fall.

The first branch of the first particular of the first general, is the word of connection; Wherefore. This word infers a consequence on the premisses, or is a reason of the precedent speech. The Apostle had formerly discovered the danger of such as forget their own purging. But there are many that forget not that they were purged by the redemption of Christ, but remember it too much: and from this derive encouragement of a licentious life, quitting themselves from all sins by his passion. But Non sic didicistis Christum, Eph. 4.20. You have not so-learned Jesus Christ. Was your first lesson Christ's Cross, and did you so conster it, Rom. 6.1. Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? He that thus spells Christ, hath but small literature of religion. Thou art made whole: sin no more lest a worse thing come unto thee. Here is a Cure, a Dyet, and a Danger. Thou art made whole, there's the cure. Sin no more, there's the diet. Lest a worse thing come unto thee, there's the danger. Let everyone that calls on the name of the Lord Jesus, depart from iniquity, 2 Tim. 2.19. Art thou a Christian? Sit illi dominatio, a qu• denominatio: acknowledge him thy Lord, of whom thou hast thy name and title: do not usurp that name unless thou lead an answerable life. Otherwise though thou carry a while the name of a Christian: thou wilt find at last the reward of an Infidel. If ye call God, Father; pass the time of your sojourning here in fear, 1 Pet. 1.17. Shall we acknowledge a Father, and deny him honor? The end of our conversion, is to amend our conversation: and that word which sounds peace and joy and remission of sins; leaves this lesson behind it; Sin no more. As upon a general pardon granted at a Royal Parliament, the prisons are emptied; yet the prisoners and malefactors have three memorable words spoken to them; Exite, gaudete, Cavete; Go forth, rejoice in your liberty, but beware lest your sins bring you back again. He that draws arguments of presumption and riot from CHRIST'S death and passion; hath not perhaps forgotten his Savior, but remembers him to the improvement of his own damnation.

Brethren. This is a word of relation, betwixt the persons to whom, and the persons from whom, this admonition is sent. This declares in the Apostle two virtues; his Humility, and his holy Policy: both attribute to us some dignity, and require from us some duty.

For his Humility; he prefers not himself to the rest of God's Saints, but calls them all Brethren. How contemptibly would he judge of the Popes arrogated Primacie! What sacrilegious pride would be take it, to be called Pater omnium, the Father of all men; which is incommunicably proper to GOD himself? Indeed GOD bestowed upon Abraham this title; to be called The Father of all them that believe. But this was Paternitas exempli, non causae; A fatherhood of example only. He might be a Father in respect of generation to the Jews; he can be Father in respect of regeneration to none. Himself was the son of Faith, though called the Father of believers. But Isaiah 63.16. Doubtless, O LORD, thou art our Father, though Abraham be ignorant of us. And this our title, to the Father-hood of GOD, and brother-hood of Christians, is through CHRIST: who is both Pater noster, and Frater noster; Our Father, Hebr. 2.13. Here am I, and the children which thou hast given me. Our Brother, Hebr. 2.11. He is not ashamed to call us brethren. See here then, the different Spirit of Saint Peter and the Pope: one calls himself the Brother, the other the Father of the Saints. Indeed the Pastor may call his people, Children; and Paul calls Timothy his son, when he commends himself to him, 1 Tim. 1. Unto Timothy my own son in the faith: when he commends him to others, he calls him Brother, Hebr. 13.23. Our brother Timothy is set at liberty. But, saith our Savior; Call no man father; for one is your Father in heaven. Christ doth not there forbid natural, civil, moral relations. Not natural; Jacob may call Isaac Father. Not civil; the servants of Naaman spake unto him; My Father. Not moral; as Elisha said to ascending Elijah; My Father, my Father, 2 King. 2.12. Things that are subordinate one to another, do not oppose one another: we have one Father in heaven, yet may have many ministerial fathers upon earth: but none in that sense that GOD is our Father. Pater Ecclesiae, the Father of the Church, the Pope cannot be called without wrong to GOD. This title he challengeth in Saint Peters right; but Saint Peter himself thinks it wrong. CHRIST, say they, meant to turn over his right to Peter; as if he were to be his only heir; Upon this rock I will build my Church. But the Church had a foundation from the beginning of the world; I hope Peter was not it. He calls us Brethren, to show that he had but the privilege of a brother, and did no otherwise than all the rest; bear the arms of the elder; he gives them all equal privilege. The Old Testament began in fraternity; Moses and Aaron: so doth the New; Peter and Andrew, James and John, Simon and Jude, Philip and Bartholomew are also taken to be brethren: so among the twelve Apostles, to be four pair of brethren. Ex aequo fundavit Ecclesiam. And as CHRIST took them from an humble condition of estate, so he gave them an humble opinion of themselves. For condition; he took no Gymnosophists from Indy, nor Philosophers from Athens, nor Orators from Rome, nor Rabbi's from Jerusalem; but men of no learning. When he purposed to bring down the proud hearts of men; Non per oratorem quasivit piscatorem, sed per piscatorem lucravit Imperatorem; He did not choose Orators to persuade Fishers; but Fishers to convert Emperors For disposition; though they were dignified to be Apostles, yet they remain still humble Brethren to the poorest. Non principandi superbiam, sed providendi vigilantiam tenent; They had not a lust of Soveraigntie, but a zeal of charity. If therefore Peter had any Primacie, it was non dignitatis, sed ordinis; not of honor, but of order. Howsoever as Matthias for succeeding Judas the Traytour, was never the worse: so the Pope for succeeding Peter the Saint, is never the better.

For his Policy; he desires to win their souls, and therefore insinuates himself into their loves. We begin our letters to men of honor with, Honorable: to kindred, with titles of Affinity: to friends, with terms of Amity: the Apostles with the best band, Brethren; beloved in the best Beloved, Jesus Christ. The phrase of [Brother] begins almost to be worn out: whether through Curiosity, or Curialitie, such Christian salutations are thought too gross. But the Apostles wanted to let in their holy counsel by the sweetness of their affection. Notwithstanding their Apostolical authority, and beauty of graces; yet they took all courses to insinuate and work into their hearers hearts. Even when they came with a rod, yet was it not without the Spirit of meekness. In reprovng of sins, they did it without passion, not without compassion. You may therefore well pardon us, if with points of Humanity, we illustrate points of Divinity: if according to your capacities, from earthly things we reason to heavenly. So did our Savior; If ye being evil parents, can give good gifts to your children; how much more shall your heavenly Father give good things to you? Philosophers were enemies to the Gospel; give us leave to confute them with their own reasons; to cut off Goliath's head with his own sword. All this while we give to secular learning praise, but no more than it deserves. It is a learned ignorance; yet if we can make it, like Balaam's Ass, speak to purpose; you have no wrong. In all our courses we seek, non vestra, sed vos, not yours, but yourselves: we love your souls, let your souls accept of our loves. If you will answer God in obedience, you answer us in the desire of our hearts.

Brethren: this title ascribes to the people some dignity; that by faith in Christ they become Brethren to the very Apostles, and have the fraternity of the heavenly Saints. Alliance to Princes is held a noble happiness: but let us bless him that hath by the cement of his blood, allied us to those glorious and triumphant Saints in heaven. Be thou never so poor, if a true believer; Peter and Paul, yea, JESUS CHRIST himself is thy Brother.

Again, this term is not without some requirable duty. Is the Minister thy Brother? hear him. If God had spoken only by Angels, or by some raised from the dead, or by himself in thunder; this had been terror: but by thy Brother; this is the sweetness of familiar mercy. The Lord doth raise up unto us Prophets of our own brethren, Act. 3.22. But take heed lest God's gentleness be abused by thy contempt: it is the Word of thy Judge and Maker, though in ore fratris, in the mouth of thy brother. I know that worldly greatness doth easily run into this scorn; what, shall such a poor man reprove me? Yes, Ier. 1.10. I have set thee over nations and kingdoms, Act. 9.15. I have chosen him to bear my Name before Gentiles and Kings. Revel. 10.11. Thou shall prophesy before people, and nations, and Kings. If thou be the Shepherd, suffer none to pollute the fountain whereof the sheep should drink. I know that the poorer sort are presumptuous enough, but they want teeth and horns: The sons of Zerviah are too hard for us. If our conscience and the salvation of our souls lay not upon it, it were better for us to hold our peace. I speak not only concerning the pains: if a man knew the burden, it would take away his stomach. Jerome on those words of Paul, 1 Tim. 3.7. He that desires the office of a Bishop, &c. Alas, who doth not desire it? But to be a Bishop, was then the first step to persecution: if it were still so, to be prick'd for death, few would so much affect it. But I speak concerning the opposition of malice, rather than the imposition of labor; herein consists our sorrow and trouble. The shepherd having a lamb stolen out of his flock, vowed to God if he could find the thief, to sacrifice a Ram to him. But when in the pursuit he found a Lion preying on it, he made a new vow; that if God would deliver him from the Lion, he would not only content himself with the loss of his lamb, but also sacrifice a Bull to him. If a sheep be endangered, we vow sacrifice of thankfulness, if we may recover it: but seeking the lost lamb, we meet with a Lion, some great Tyrant, that hath perverted him to feed his own humor, and sensual lust: we are now fain to return without our lamb, and glad to escape the Lion. The sick man loathes the cup wherein the potion was brought him, though it qualified the malignancy of his disease: so many for private quarrels hate the vessel, the Minister, though he brings them the water of life. It is Satan's master-piece, or special trick; to put jarre betwixt the Pastor and the people. Our feet should be beautiful, and we do what we can to gain your affections, to draw you on with sweet allurements to everlasting peace: yet still, as the Prophet speaks, there are some that will contend with the Priests. You give the Physician leave to tell the disease of your bodies: the Lawyer to show you any flaw in your estates: your horse-keeper shall tell you the surfeits of your horse: your huntsman the surrances of your dogs: only we must dissemble, and conceal from you the sickness of your souls. We will not do it; we will pray for you, and honor you, and love you: but your sins we will reprove, and what God hath bidden us, that we will speak. And for you that come hither, to fetch seeds of lust from the Temple, to seek out the Devil in God's house, as if you could not find him in the places of prostitution: you that come hither to detract and tra••ce, and think to enhance your credits of learning and wit by disgracing the Preacher: you come not as Brothers and Saints, but as enemies and worse. If there be any such present, my admonition is well spent: if none at all, it is well and happily 〈◇〉 .

Give diligence. Studete, Satagite, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . Terrene profits, though tanto non digna labor, come not without diligence. Doth a man reap without sowing? The Apostle says, Ephes. 4.28. Give to him that needeth: and Above all things put on charity: yet he says withal; He that labors not, let him not eat. Doth he here put off that charity, which he bids us put on? No, indulget viro, non vitio: he would have us favor the person, not the fault: and relieve Egentes, such as want; but withal Agents, such as work. The Philosophers thought the world was immortal and eternal; for otherwise, say they, God were idle, and should have had nothing to do before the creation. They knew not the divine contemplation of his own Essence in three Persons; they considered not that incomprehensible delight; nor that infinite business of rest, and rest of business, that he had in himself. They were deceived in that, but not in this; that Idleness is not incident to God. How much less should it be in man, his servant; that begs of this God his daily bread? Until we come to the threshold of heaven, there is no rest of travel: but then we shall rest from our labors. The idle person may seem to be God's outlawry: slothfulness is a Remora that sticks to our sides, and hinders the Bark from the voyage of bliss. God built his Temple on a Threshing-floor: there must be labor in that place, though after a different manner. As Christ did not wholly put his Apostles out of their trade: Non mutatur piscatio, sed intentio; He made them still fishers, but of souls.

It is a true maxim in Philosophy, Art and Nature bring forth nothing suddenly: and is it not so in Divinity? Doth any man think, that hath lived all his years profane, to be made at his last hour a Saint? Never tell us, that one malefactor sped so; for then we tell you, that one Ass did speak: yet never was Ass or Ox heard speak since: Gratia semet sumpta, ne sit semper prasumpta; Grace that is presumed, may be missed. You have not wealth from the clods without digging, and would you have blessing from the clouds without working? The labor of our bodies for this world, was but a curse; the labor of our souls for heaven, is a blessing. We may ignorantly give our bread to the slothful: God hath too much knowledge to give salvation upon such terms. If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly appear? He that gives all diligence to enter into heaven, finds great difficulty; but he shall get in: but he that lies sleeping in his sins, must tarry without. The foolish Virgins knock at the door, but were denied entrance, Matt. 25.12. Would you needs sleep? sleep your last. When Jupiter, in the Fable, had invited all living creatures to a banquet, the Tortoise came at the taking up of the table; whereat he storming, the Tortoise excused himself, that his house troubled him: hereupon angry Jove adjudged him forever to keep in his shell. So when God calls, we have an house that hinders us; some lower, domestical, and earthly content; beware lest all our happiness be confined thither.

Give diligence. This exhortation, presupposeth no proper strength of our own to do this; for it is God's work in us. Augustine says, Sometimes I would have done this or that good thing; and I had will, but I wanted power: and again I had power, but then I wanted will: either voluntas or facultas were missing. Will and Power, like the Sun and Clouds, would fain meet: the Clouds strive to come to the Sun, but they are too weak and soluble, and melting: the Sun would embrace the clouds, and call them near to himself; but then his beams are so hot, that they disperse them: these two could never meet till they were brought together by the wind. So our Will to goodness, and our Power of performance, cannot meet, till they be brought together by the Spirit, that holy Wind which blows where it listeth. The wheel runs round, not because it is made round, but because it is moved round. In the Commandment, perceive what thou oughtest to have: in Sin, perceive what thou hast not: in faith and prayer, perceive where it is to be had which thou desirest, August. Psal. 119.32. I will run the way of thy Precepts, when thou hast set my heart at liberty. By nature our feet are tied with the fetters of corruption, we cannot run. Wilt thou run with thy feet, before thou have eyes? Or with thy eyes and feet, without thy heart? Or with thy heart, before God hath freed it? Canst thou run the way, without the way, which is Jesus Christ? We know whither our Diligence must run for help: entreat Christ to entreat his Father: for he is delighted with his prayer, and requires it of him. Postula à me, Psal. 2.8. Desire of me, and I will give thee. It was but hyperbolic in Trajan, it is true in our God: Citius esse desinit, quàm benefacere: He can as soon cease to be, as to be good to his. God's hand was never shut from giving, if man's mouth be not shut from asking. Misery is the best orator for mercy: God loves to be solicited; Call upon me in the day of trouble, I will deliver thee. He that inviteth all to come in mercy, will receive all that do come in justice. Yet cannot our petitionary Diligence deserve this: it is obtained not Prece, sed Pretio; by the precious blood and merits of Christ.

Rather, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, Potius. Let not the goodness of God, which without your desert hath chosen and called you to the profession of CHRIST, forgiving and purging your former sins, make you idle and careless. But rather strive to answer this mercy in your faithful conversation: lest you fall into that pit of destruction, from whence by his death he hath redeemed you. Ambite benefactis Dei; let your obedience consent in a sweet harmony with God's mercies, that you may be capable of his promises; and not cut off like withered and fruitless branches. The rather. He doth seem to encourage this endeavor, A Beneficio, à Periculo, à Praemio: Partly by the Benefit, partly by the Danger, and partly by the Reward. The first whereof incites our gratitude, the next our fear, the last our hope. 1. The rather, because you have received such a benefit, as cleansing from sin by CHRIST'S blood. O what sin should be so dear to us, as God's only Son was to him! 2. The rather; for fear lest a recidivation overthrow all your happiness. As Demas lost himself, by loving this present world, 2 Tim. 4.10. Seven worse spirits may make a re-entry, when upon the expulsion of one there is found a vacui•e. Lots wife had as good have dwelt in Sodom still, as to look back after her deliverance, Ezek. 18.24. If the righteous turn away from his righteousness; in the sin that he hath sinned, he shall die. A man hath been dangerously sick, is now something recovered▪ if by misgovernment he fall into a relapse, he exasperates the disease. The first sickness of the body feeds upon ill humors, the relapse on the vital spirits. For a wound half cured, to come to a new incision, is more painful than ever. It would grieve a traveler, got half-way forward his journey, losing all that, to return, and begin again, Gal. 3.3. Are ye so foolish, that having begun in the Spirit, ye will be made perfect by the flesh? No, rather give all diligence to continue: and call upon God for perseverance; who alone can keep us from the griping paws, and grinding jaws of that roaring Lion. It is said, Zach. 4.9. that the hands of Zer•b•did lay the foundation of the house: and his hand shall also finish it. So it is God that begins the good work in us, and God that accomplisheth it. Indeed he chargeth us to give diligence, Psal. 68.28. Thy God hath commanded thy strength: but he may command and go without, unless himself effectuate it, as it follows; Strengthen, O God, that which thou hast wrought for us. I know that God's elect may for a time lose some good means, and some great measure of grace; many have fallen foully, and fully, none finally. It is only God's mercy that up-holds us; giving us grace prevenient, subsequent, co-operant; grace before grace; grace after grace. It is not of ourselves, that we persevere to the end, and in the end; but but we are kept by the power of God unto salvation. 3. The rather, in respect of the reward: thus shall you be sure that you are written in heaven, never to be blotted out. There is no assurance in this world like it: wert thou sure to enjoy more kingdoms than ever the devil shown Christ; to be more healthful than Moses, to live longer than Methushalem: yet this is the end; Misero dormire sepulchro, to lie hidden in the silent dust. Plot and project what you can; the best plot of all is salvation; and the best assurance, to live with Jesus Christ forever.

To make your calling and election sure.] We have done with the Induction, and are now come to the Instruction: and herein first to the matter expressed; the making sure of our election and calling. Which we will first look upon; Quoad ordinem, then quoad cardinem, if I may so speak: first what is their order, then what is their dependence. For the Order, the Apostle puts Vocation in the former place, which yet in propriety is the latter. For Election is before all time, Vocation in time, 2 Tim. 1.9. His purpose was toward us in Christ Jesus, before the world began. Calling comes afterward, 2 Cor. 6.2. This is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation. But this is a right form and method of speech; Vt subjiciatur quod praeponderat; To set that last, which is worthiest and weightiest. Besides we pass by things nearer, to things more remote; first, we must look to our Calling, and by our calling come to assurance of our Election. For Dependence, we must know that our calling depends upon our Election.

The determinate counsel of God doth not take away second means, but disposeth those passages into order. These two, Election and Vocation, are like Jacob's Ladder, whereupon the Saints ascend like Angels to God: Election is the top, Vocation the foot. Jacob wrestled with the Angel at the foot of the Ladder, we must not be so proud as to wrestle with him at the top. To the height of Election there is no climbing, unless we begin at Calling, which is the lowest round. To say, If I be saved, I am saved; without further care, is the Devils divinity. There is no certainty in that: look to thy Calling, thus it is made sure. Otherwise to presume, is to pull down the Ladder, and think to jumpe into heaven: never had man yet such luck. Frustra creditor, quod nunquam conceditur; If Magus offer to fly up to heaven, there is a Spirit to cast him down head-long. When our Savior was on the pinnacle, Satan thought with a Scriptum est, to break his neck, Matth. 4.6. It is written, He shall give his Angels charge concerning thee, &c. But he left out a material point; In omnibus viis tuis; In all thy ways. That the people might know him to be the Messias, he persuades him to show them an unwarrantable miracle, to cast himself down in a bravery: but that was none of his ways: he might descend by the stairs without such a precipice. This cunning he still practiseth on his members: he sets them upon the high pinnacle of Predestination, and persuades them there to a desperate precipitation; with If I am elected, I am elected, &c. But this is none of GOD'S ways, or prescribed means, whereby we may be acquainted with our own election. Hosea 2.21. I will hear the heavens, and they shall hear the earth, and the earth shall hear the corn, wine, and oil; and they shall hear Jezreel. There is a course and order for fruitfulness. So Election in heaven calls to Vocation on earth; Vocation calls for corn, wine, oil; that is, the fruits of a good life; and these tell our hearts with comfort, that we are elected. God works by Christ, Christ by his word, his Word by his Spirit, the Spirit certifieth our hearts, our hearts stand fast by faith, faith lays hold upon Christ, and now back again, Christ presents us to God.

There are six ascents to heaven, as there were to Solomon's Throne. The first and lowest is Vocation, John 6.44. No man can come to me, except my Father draw him. The second is Repentance; when God hath called the heart from sin, it melts into tears, and is smitten with a holy remorse. The next is Faith, which believes the pardon of repented sins, and the adoption through Christ to peace. The Fourth is the Testimony of the Holy Ghost, Rom. 8.16. The Spirit beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God. Albeit this Spirit works before, and begetteth the former graces; yet now it is especially felt. The next is Peace of conscience; all the clamours of sin, and terrors of the Law, being quieted: Being justified by faith, we have peace with God. The last is Good works, the fruits of a sanctified obedience, and effects of the former graces, which concur to the making up of this Assurance. Thus here is, as in some great Princes Court; first the Gate, that is Vocation: then secondly, we must come to the Fountain; Repentance, to be baptized in our penitent tears. Then thirdly, to the Common-hall; Faith, which gives us entrance to the Throne of Grace. Fourthly, we come to the Kings special Favorite, his bosom counselor, the Holy Ghost. Fifthly, to the Presence Chamber, Peace and Security of soul. Lastly, having passed all these, we come to the Glorious Chair of Estate, the Presentiall Majesty of JESUS CHRIST: thus by degrees we enter the doors of joy.

We know there is a Sun in heaven, yet we cannot see what matter it is made of, but perceive it only by the beams, light, and heat. Election is a Sun, the eyes of Eagles cannot see it; yet we may find it in the heat of Vocation, in the light of Illumination, in the beams of good works. It is a principle in reason; a perfect action is not received at first but imperfectly; an habit is not gotten at the first; salvation is not wrought on a sudden. The path of the just is as shining light, That shineth more and more unto the perfect day. Saint Paul considers the chain of our Salvation, depending on four links, Election, Vocation, Justification, Glorification: the first whereof hath no beginning, the last no ending. Here is the kindness of a Father, that singles out some special children, to whom he bears greatest affection, and intends most good; and in this consists Election. In good time he declares his affection, and makes his love manifest to them; there is Vocation. Then he conformes them to his own Image, gives them place in Court, the honor of children, the earnest of his Spirit, in token of Assurance: there is Justification. Lastly, he bids them enter into their fathers joy, makes them co-heirs with his eldest Son in the possession of bliss; there is Glorification. God hath chosen us before the world, created us with the world, called us from the world, justified us in the world, and he will save us in the world to come. He that chose us when we were not, and called us when we were naught; and hath justified us being sinners, will glorify us being Saints. The Husbandman of heaven chooseth out a plot of ground at his own pleasure; there is Election: he sows this with the immortal seed, by his Word; there's Vocation: he waters it with the dew of Hermon, the graces of his Spirit; there is Sanctification: when it is ripe, he reaps it from the earth, and carries it into the Barn of heaven; there is Salvation.

The head of Nile cannot be found, they say; but many sweet springs issuing from it are well known. The head of our Election is too high and secret to be found; yet we may taste the springs, our Calling, Holiness, Justification and Vp-right life: and he that runs along by the bank of these rivers, shall be brought at last to that fountain head, even the place and Book wherein his own Name stands written. Joseph may be a fit type to us of our spiritual deliverance. Consider him sold into Egypt, not without the determinate counsel of God; who preordained this to good: God did send me before you to preserve life. Here is the difference; the brethren sold Joseph, we sold ourselves. Consider us thus sold unto sin and death; God had a purpose to redeem us; there is election. Joseph was delivered out of prison, and we ransomed out of the house of bondage; there was Redemption. Joseph's cause was made known, and himself acquitted, We could not be found innocent in ourselves, but were acquitted in Christ; wherein consists our justification. Lastly, Joseph was clothed in glorious apparel, and adorned with golden chains, and made to ride in the second Chariot of Egypt, So our last step is to be advanced to high honor, even the glory of the celestial Court, Such honor have all his Saints. The creation of the world is a shadow of the regeneration of a Christian. First, there was an earth without form, void; and a darkness upon the face of the deep. Predestination is this great deep, which cannot be discovered or discerned. There the light was separated from the darkness; here knowledge is separated from ignorance in the soul; there is Calling. Then was the Sun created; so here the bright beams of grace are diffused into our hearts, which fill us with spiritual joy; there is sanctification. Lastly, Adam was created after the Image of God, and placed in Paradise: so the new man is conformed to the Image of CHRIST, and shall be reposed in the Paradise of everlasting glory.

1 But if election stand wholly and only in the will of God; [Objection.] and that purpose be so long since and irrecoverably past; then cannot I alter it. Therefore if I be elected to salvation, howsoever I live, I cannot frustrate it: and if I be appointed to confusion, what care soever I take, I cannot prevent it. A devilish speech, not to be uttered with mouth, nor harboured in heart! God is not the cause of thy condemnation, but thyself, Wis. 1.13. God made not death, neither hath he pleasure in the destruction of the living. Bis interimitur, qui suis armis interimitur. No, the surest way to the Sea, is to take a river by the hand. If a man would know whether the Sun shine or not, he need not climb up to the sky; for he may behold the beams on earth. So wouldest thou know whether thy name be written in heaven, never assay to get the view of God's own book, thou shalt find the beams of that grace in thyself Consecrate thy ears to hearing, thy tongue to praying; thy hand to working, thy heart to desiring, thy body and soul to obeying; this is the course to make it sure. Yet are not these the efficient causes that make it to be decreed, but the means that make it certain to thyself. So Ambrose; Neque merito suo qui salvantur, &c. Not by the merits of them that are saved, nor by their worthiness by whom they are called; but this is done only by the mercy of God in Jesus Christ.

It is a true rule; God that hath predestinated the means, hath not left out the end: Uno proposito utrumque: with one and the same purpose he determined them both. Though man lives not by bread only, yet he that will not eat, shall not live. There was a son that held his desperate opinion, to the great grief of his parents: one day he came to his father to borrow a horse, saying that he must be at Rome by such an hour. The father replied, if you must be there, you shall be there though you stir never a foot. Whereby he convinced him, that if he could not get to Rome without a horse, how should he get to heaven without motion? There is another story of an Italian, so opinionated of Predestination; If I be elected, I shall be saved; if rejected, I shall not be recovered. He received a dangerous wound, and sent to the Surgeon to help him. The Surgeon being made acquainted with his impious assertion, told him; It shall be needless for me to use any means for you: for if your time be not come, you shall escape without medicine: if it be come, medicine cannot restore you. The Patient smarting with grief, and seriously pondering the Surgeons speech; that God sends no help without means; penitently recanted his error, humbly submitted himself to means, and so was cured of body and soul at once.

The Rhemists object; We believe our salvation sure, therefore it is madness in us to pray for it. For were it not madness to beg the creation of the world, which we know to be past already? Yea, it were madness not to pray for salvation: for the creation we know our own election we know not but by our assidual prayers for the assurance of it. If we neglect this duty, we lose all certainty. Ad Deum omnes ire volunt post Deum pauci. All men would come to the glory of God, but few will follow after the grace of God. Beatus vult homo esse, etiam non sic vivendo ut possit esse. Men would come to happiness, even by running that course which directly leads to wretchedness. He must be a Saint, that will enjoy the communion of Saints. If thou wilt be saved with those that are saved, thou must be sanctified with those that are sanctified. Take thy Journey by holiness, if thou wilt come to happiness. Keep the coast of faith, if thou desire to arrive at the Holy Land.

2 But this makes a man slothful in God's service, the certainty of his own election. What need the heir take so much pains, that is borne to the Inheritance; as the hired servant? Nay, but rather this spurs him up to an extraordinary carefulness saith; as the Apostle saith; The rather give diligence. Doth God tell me; I shall never know mine own election without piety of life; then if I neglect piety I make myself incapable of assurance. I am sick, I fain would know of the Physician whether I should live or die: he tells me, that if I refrain such unwholesome diet, and take such a prescribed course, I shall live.

If Eve fly to the forbidden fruit, she is sure to die for it. My father hath determined that I shall be his heir: he will not tell me so much in express terms, yet gives me a sign how I shall know it, by-observing him with obedience. So God elects some men to be his heirs, this purpose he conceals in his own bosom: yet allows them certain signs and remonstrances whereby they may apprehend it; as faith in CHRIST, obedience to the Gospel, &c. If we obey his will, and prove those effects of Election in our consciences; we make that sure to ourselves, which was sure before in his decree through Jesus Christ.

3 But suppose a vicious person assumes, or rather presumes; I am sure of my election? Indeed there cannot a greater honor be done to God, than giving confidence to his promise. But what? demonstration of ungodlness, and evidence of salvation, found together at once? This holds like a sick man's dream. The wicked man's tongue may say this; but there is a bird within sings another note; the Conscience. It is impossible for an ill liver, to retain any sure hope of his Election. The hypocrite is divided, and lives not together: his tongue walks Gracious street, but his heart is a Pest-house. His profession is like White Chapel; but his conscience is as foul as the common Sewer. His talk gives him rich in grace; but mark what gold comes out of his coffer; none but slip-coin; light or counterfeit metal. He is just as sure of heaven, as a galley-slave is of the Empire of Turkey.

4 But now alas, saith the humbled soul; my godliness is so small, that I even despair of assurance. Be comfortest; strive against thy corruptions, and by the spirit of Jesus Christ, thou shalt overcome Paul was sanctified man; yet he complains, Rom. 7.15. What I would, that do I not: but what I hate, that I do. O wretched man that I am who shall deliver me from the body of this death? Albeit he groaned under the weight of his infirmities, and felt the buffets of Satan; yet he knew that nothing could separate him from the love of God in Christ, Rom. 8.39. Thou canst velle bonum, will that which is good; then hear God speak comfort, 2 Cor. 8.12. If there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not. Indeed where there is want of grace, content in that want, love of that content, indulgence to all these; there is neither ornament nor sanctification, nor argument of salvation. But doest thou feel thy wants; hath that feeling bred sorrow? that sorrow desire? that desire prayer? that prayer increased faith? faith shall bring down mercy. In thee there is the sense of infirmity, in the other is the infirmity of sense. The feeling of sin doth not annihilate the assurance of salvation. We feel the ach of a finger more sensibly than the health of the whole body; yet is the health of the whole body far more than the ach of a finger. Sanctification is it self, though joined with some imperfection. He that desired help for his unbelief, was accepted for his faith. Thus Ahijah answered Jereboam's wife concerning her sick son. 1 King. 14.13. He only of Jeroboam shall come to the grave, because in him there is found some good thing toward the Lord. Some good thing, some grace, though it be no great measure, shall be accepted. God regards not so much the Quantitie, as the quality: not how much, but how true. Though our Savior did chide his Apostles for their little faith, yet he never rejected them that had any at all. Indeed if a man be not best at last, he was never truly good: therefore increase the oil in thy lamp, and then be sure to enter into the Bride chamber of Jesus Christ.

5 But if one man may know himself elected, why may not another know himself reprobated? Resp. No, for God hath prescribed rules for the one, not for the other. Diverse Saints knew themselves written in the book of life, no man ever knew himself rased out. But did not Cain know this, when God set a Mark upon him? I do not think on the one side with Josephus, that this mark was a token that God was appeased by Cain's sacrifice, and for gave the punishment of his fratricide▪ that is frivolous. Neither do I think on the other side, that this was a sign to himself of his eternal damnation. But only a mark of God's evident curse for this life; to deter others from such bloody attempts. I know that despair is ever ready to judge it self reprobated: but this is to requite God's mercy to thee, with unmercifulness to thyself. Turn over thy book of his revealed will; if thou canst find thy name there written reprobate, believe it: but believe it not til then He hath shown thee how to assure thyself of heaven; he never told thee that thou art doomed to hell. Though his Justice be equal to his mercy, yet he is pleased to magnify his mercy over all his works. We are commanded to believe, 1 John. 3.23. This is his Commandment, that we should believe on the Name of Jesus Christ. Now to believe, it not only to put affiance in him, but to trust that we are justified by him: if we be justified, we shall be glorified: if we be glorified, certainly we are elected: for Election is the foundation of all the rest. And this faith is not left arbitrary to our choice, but we are commanded to have it. We are bound to believe our Adoption, if our adoption, then our Election: for the elect are predestinate to the adoption of children.

God knows those that are his, yea and he makes them to know it. Satan knows not who are his, nor can themselves otherwise than conjecturally know it. The Judgment of a reprobate belongs not to man, but upon special revelation. So David in the 69. & 109. Psalms, prays not only against their sins, which we may do: but also against their persons, which we may not do. So Paul against Alexander the coppersmith: The Lord reward him according to his works. And Saint John seems to allow the Church such a judgment; there is a sin unto death; I do not say that he shall pray for it. And Paul, 1 Cor. 16.22. If any man love not the Lord Jesus, Anathema Maranatha. And the Primitive Church with one consent prayed against Julian the Apostate. But this is to be done exceeding rarely; for who knows them that sin unto death? And never absolutely; for they may repent, and turn to the love of Jesus Christ. There is no prescribing to God's infinite mercy: it is true indeed, that the Scriptures threaten damnation to continued sin; yet the Gospel promiseth mercy to repentance. God often saves inter pontem & fontem; and turns ravening Wolves into mild and gentle Lambes.

To conclude; in Election we behold God the Father in choosing: in vocation, God the son teaching: in Justification, God the Holy Ghost sealing: in salvation, the whole Deity crowning. God chooseth of his love, CHRIST calleth by his word, the spirit seals by his grace: now the fruit of all this; of God's love choosing, of Christ's word calling, of the spirit's grace sanctifying; is our eternal glory and blessedness in heaven. In Election God bestows on us his love, in Calling he grants the blessing of his word, in Justifying he communicates to us the sweetness of his spirit; in Glorifying he doth wholly give us himself. We see fa•re with our bodies eye, sense: further with the mind's eye, Reason; furthest with the soul's eye, Faith. The Rationall eye doth not so far exceed the sensual, as the spiritual exceeds the rational. Calling illuminates the mind with knowledge; Sanctifying seals up the heart with spiritual comfort: salvation crowns all, even the soul with immortal bliss. This gradation of assurance is sweetly contracted by Saint Paul, Rom. 8.30. Whom he did predestinate, them he hath also called: whom he hath called, them also he justified: and whom he justified, them also he glorified. Wherein the Fathers have found the four causes of our salvation. In predestination the efficient cause, which is God's love. In calling the material cause, which is Christ's death, delivered in his word that doth call us. In Justifying there is the formal cause, a lively faith. In glorifying there is the final cause, that is everlasting life. Paradise had four rivers that watered the earth: these four springs come from the Eden of heaven, and run through the earth: and howsoever neglected by many, they make glad the City of God. So Bernard sweetly. Conceditur in Praedestinatione, promittitur in vocatione est •••tur in Justification, percipitur in Glorificatione. Eternal life is granted to us in Election promised in our Vocation, sealed in our Justification, possessed in our Glorification▪ Conclude then faithfully to thy own soul; I believe, therefore I am justified▪ I am justified, therefore I am sanctified: I am sanctified, therefore I am called: I am called, therefore I am elected: I am elected, therefore I shall be saved. O settled comfort of joy, which ten thousand devils shall never make void! So I leave you to th••, which can never leave you; the certainty of this comfort.

These questions being resolved the Doctrinal points that follow are two: first, that our election may be assured: secondly, how it may be assured.

First, that it may be made sure: there is a Rule, Nemo tenetur ad impossibile: no man is bound to an impossible thing: the Apostle would never set us about th•• work, which could not be done. It were uncharitable tyranny to impose that task, whereof there is no possibility of performance, The ground of this assertion is the stability of God's purpose, Rom. 9.11. That the purpose of God according to election might stand. But how then is it said, Revel. 3.11. Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy Crown. Now saith, Augustine; Si alius possit accipere, tu potes perdere. If another may take it, thou mayest lose it. The answer is easy; the Crown of outward profession may be lost; but the Crown of eternal Election stands immovable, to whomsoever it is decreed. The Soul that is bound up in the bundle of life with the Lord, cannot be lost. To say the elect may fall away, and be damned, is a comfortless doctrine, Luk. 10.20. Rejoice because your names are written in heaven. Saint Paul speaking of Hymenaeus and Philetus, who were fallen from the faith; lest the Church should be discouraged by the apostasy of two such notable pillars, as they were thought; comforteth them thus, 2 Tim. 2.19. Nevertheless (albeit those men fell off from Christ to their own damnation, yet Nevertheless) the foundation of God standeth sure, having the seal, the Lord knoweth them that are his. His Election is a foundation that shall never be removed. But Paul calls the Thessalonians, Elect; yet they fell away, I answer; they are called elect, not from the greater, but the better part. It is called an heap of corn in the barn, though the bigger part of it be chaff. Again, by the Law of charity we grant all those that profess Jesus Christ to be elect. But David prays, Psal. 69.28. that his enemies may be blotted out; blot them out of the book of the living. This was not Precantis votum, sed Prophetis vaticinium: not the desire of a petitioner, but the knowledge of a Prophet: blot them out, that is, I know they were never written there. But John. 6.70. Have I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil? This is to be understood of an election, not to everlasting life, but to the office of Apostleship, which was changeable and temporary, 2 Cor. 13.5. know you not your own selves, that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates? Whence two things necessarily follow: first, if Christ be in $\langle \diamond \rangle$, we are no reprobates: secondly, we may know this; know you not.

The Certainty of Election is a point wherein Rome makes some show of coming near to us; yet there is a great difference. They say, a man may know it by divine revelation, so say we. They say, that men may have a certainty of hope, we stand for a certainty of faith. Theirs of hope is conjectural, ours of faith is infallible. Hope is an affection of the will, faith is a persuasion of the mind. Whatsoever God commandeth in the Gospel, that a man must and may perform: but God commandeth a Christian to believe his own salvation; therefore he may, yea ought to believe it, 1 John. 3.23. Indeed the Law did command that which we could not do; but this is the difference between the Law and the Gospel; the Law did impose duty, but gave no power of performance: the Gospel imperat & impetrat; commands and assists, gives grace whereby it may be obeyed, John. 6.63. The words that I spake to you, they are spirit, and they are life. Again, that which God hath charged us to pray for, he hath charged us to believe: but we are bound to pray for everlasting life, therefore we are bound to believe it, Mark. 11.24. What thing, so ever ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive it, and ye shall have it. In every petition there are two grounds; Mandatum, quod jubet facere; Promissum, quod jubet credere; the Precept that binds us to ask, and the Promise that binds us to believe: otherwise to what purpose do we conclude our prayers with Amen? Again, he that is the member of

Against the undoubted truth of this doctrine our adversaries bring two objections: first say they, where there is no promise, there is no faith; for these two are relatives but there is no particular word to assure any individual person, therefore no faith. We answer, that there is a general promise: indeed God says not, believe thou John or Thomas, and thou shalt be saved: but he says; Whosoever believeth and is baptized, shall be saved; which is as good. The promises are indefinite, and the minister in CHRIST'S stead applies them to every particular man's heart, John. 11.40. If thou believest, thou shalt see the glory of God. Hereupon our faith and obedience echo's to God, Psal. 27.8. when thou said'st, seek ye my face; my heart said unto thee, Thy face O Lord; will I seek, Zach. 13.9. I will say, It is my poople: and they shall say, The Lord is my God Secondly they object; we are taught to pray for the pardon of our sins daily; this were needless if we be sure of our Election. I answer; we pray for the pardon of our sins, not because we have no assurance, but because our assurance is weak. The heart of a Christian is like a vessel with a narrow top: being cast into the sea, it is not filled suddenly, but by drop after drop. God throws us into the sea of his infinite mercy: if we had a capable nature, we should be suddenly filled; but this grace is received according to the measure and capacity of the receiver. Let it then stand firm against the gates of Rome, against the gates of hell; that our Election may be made sure. Non erit praesumptio credentis, ubi est autoritas jubentis. There can be no presumption of the believer, where there is authority of the commander. God never broke his word with any soul.

Now we come to the manner, how this may be assured. There are but two ways for a man to know it; Ascendendo in coelum, descendendo in seipsum: either by going up into heaven, or by going down into himself. In the one there is presumption and danger, in the other is security and peace. Have we recourse to Saint Paul for his direction? and see how he consents with Saint Peter: the spirit of God can best declare himself, Rom. 8.16. The spirit it self beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the Children of God. Here are two testimonies, not God's spirit alone; there may be presumption: not our spirit alone; there may be illusion: both must 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, Contestari, witness together; concur to make up this certificate. There is some question what this testimony of the Spirit is. Some take it to be an Enthusiasme, or extraordinary revelation; but then were it rare, and to few. Some take it for the affection of the mind obediens to God, non ex timore; sed ex amore, not out of fear, but out of love, Origen. But our spirit alone can testify this, what need is there of God's Spirit to it? Some refer it to the Imitation of God which makes us like him. But this testimony ariseth not from any act in ourselves, but from the divine spirit. Others think that this inward testimony proceeds from our good works. Cum spiritus noster per spiritum sanctum bona agit. But the testimony that riseth from the effects, is rather our conclusion, than the Holy Ghosts proposition. Some by this witness of the spirit understand Holy Doctrine, Theodor: and the truth of the catholic faith, Lyranus. But the Apostle speaks not of any outward sign, but of an internal testimony. Therefore saith Chrysostom; Non vox charismatis praestiti, sed praestantis; non gratie donatae, sed donantis. The testimony comes not from the effect, but from the efficient; not of grace given, but of him that gives it.

This is then that inward assurance of the spirit, whereby we know ourselves to be children of God. Perhibet testimonium in corde per occultam Inspirationem. Caiet•• says, it is not a testimony de possibili, that it may be; but de facto, that it is. This may be formed like a practical syllogism: the proposition is made by the Gospel; Whosoever believes in CHRIST is chosen to life everlasting: man meditates upon this blessed promise, and sucks sweetness to his soul from it. Then comes the spirit, illuminates the mind, opens the heart, begets a true faith; so that with freedom man's spirit makes the assumption; I believe in CHRIST, I renounce myself; all my comfort and affiance is in him: flesh and blood cannot say this, it is the operation of the Holy Ghost. Last comes the blessed conclusion, which is the testimony; therefore thou art the child of God. The proposition is grounded on the promise of God, that is Objectum fidei quod creditor, the object of faith, which is believed: the assumption out of the former, is Actus fidei quo creditor, the act of faith whereby we believe? Our assurance therefore is not, as Aquinas and Lyranus•• speak; Non scientiae, sed conjecturae; non rei sed spei: for children call upon their fathers, not with a conjectural persuasion, but with a confident assurance. This certainty is true; for though faith be of things believed not perceived, yet faith it self is a thing perceived not believed. There is a threefold assurance, first of opinion, when a man deceiveth himself by his own imagination. The second of persuasion, as the devils know the Articles of faith without any comfort. Thirdly of Resolution, which is not only in the truth of such an Interest, but of our Interest in such a truth. The first of these is in the will only, without the understanding; the second is in the understanding only, without the will: the last is both in the understanding and will. Now the testimony of our spirit must concur to this: for if our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God, 1 John. 3.21. This is the witness of a heart purified and sanctified in the blood of CHRIST, Prov. 27.19. As in water face answereth to face; or the pure Crystal glass lively represents the Image set before it: so here the witness of our sanctified spirit answers the sanctifying spirit.

This testimony may be perceived by many effects; especially take one: it is the right estimation of our sins. Now this estimation must be in respect of their terms; as they are past, present, or to come. We must find in ourselves, for sins past Dolorem, grief: against sins present, Praelium, combat: concerning sins future, Odium, hate and resistance. First we must be grieved for the sins we have done. Godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of where is Efficax, Effectus, Qualitas, Finis: the thing operating, godly sorrow: the Effect, Repentance: the Quality, ⟨ϕ⟩ to be repented of: the End to salvation. There be two sorrows, and they differ much: for worldly sorrow Deum intuetur iratum, beholds God justly incensed, godly sorrow Deum intuetur pacatum, beholds God sweetly pacified. They also differ causally: the former grieves for the punishment, not for the sin: the other grieves for the sin, not for the punishment: this would be sorrowful for sin, though there were no hell to punish it. Cain groans under the penalty, David grieves for the iniquity. The one trembles as a slave, the other fears as a son. These penitent tears, Cor maculatum lavant, oneratum levant, contritum laetificant; they purge the heart from the foulness of sin, ease it of the burden of sorrow, and give it the cheerfulness of comfort. Therefore no Repentance, no testimony. Secondly, for sins present, there must be in us an holy and valiant combat against them, Gal. 5.17. The Spirit warreth against the flesh, as well as the flesh against the Spirit. This combat can only befall the elect; whose soul is in the state of Rebecca's womb, when the twins struggled within her: Esau will not let Jacob rest, nor Jacob Esau. Two enemies in a Country are too near; two in a City dangerous, two in a house worse, but two in a bosom smartest of all. And yet unless this strife be in a man, he can have no peace with God. Indeed for natural things, war and peace are contraries; yet this spiritual war is the only means to our eternal peace. The Saints in heaven have no such strife, for they are wholly spiritual: the reprobates on earth have no such strife, for they are wholly carnal: only the regenerate believers in the militant Church, maintain this battle, and feel the bitterness of this conflict. The pressure of native corruption is heavy: as in the Ephi·ltes or disease called the Night-mare, a sleeping man thinks he feels some heavy weight lying on his breast, and holding him down; he groans and strives to remove it, but he cannot. So this inborne corruption lies on the heart of a Christian, and he would fain be rid of it, he fights against it, and complains that he is forcibly over-borne by it, to do the evil he neither would nor should: but let him be comforted, Christ shall one day give him a full deliverance. No combat, no testimony. Lastly, concerning sins to come, we must find in ourselves hatred and resistance: We know, that whosoever is borne of God, sinneth not. He is always fixing his eye upon that rule, Philip. 4.8. Whatsoever things are true, and honest, and just, and pure, and lovely, and of good report: if there be any virtue, if there be any praise, he thinks on these things. So that, Sanctimonium est Testimonium, our Sanctimonie is this Testimony: 1 John. 2.5. We know we are in God, by keeping his Word. Hence it is that some books have read, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ; make your election sure Through good works: so Beza says, he found it in two Greek manuscripts. This is a good witness, when a man reasons from the proper effects to the proper cause, 2 Tim. 2.19. The foundation of God standeth sure: it is granted; God is sure of it, but how may I be sure of it? Paul there answers; Let everyone that nameth the Name of Christ, depart from iniquity. Happy soul, that comes with this certificate, under the hand and seal of the holy Spirit, to the gate of heaven. He may justly challenge mercy; Feci quod jussisti, red quod promisisti; I have done what thou hast commanded, perform to me what thou hast promised: I have worn the short white robe of Innocence, give me the long white robe of Glory. There is a private mark, and a public mark; Go thorough the City, and set a mark upon the forehead of them that mourn for the sins of the times: there is the Private mark, Well done, thou good and faithful servant, &c. there is the Public mark.

Thus we see, it may be made sure, now therefore let us go about it, and that with diligence. If you purchase lands, you buy the strength of law to make sure the tenures: if you drive a bargain, you will have earnest for assurance: if you let money to interest, you will not do it without good assurance. The common voice of all the Usurers about the town, is Assurance: the very Stage knows them by no other names, but Security and Assurance. You bind a debtor to you surer, than the Philistines bound Sampson: and if he cannot loose himself, you put out his eyes, set him to grind at the mill, while you eat the flour. All is made so sure, that neither the corrupt man of law, nor the Devil himself, can find a trick to untie it. But now for heaven and salvation, you play at fast and loose: the last thing that ever is assured, is your eternal bliss. Beloved, I would this were a slander, and that you could nobly confute my jealousy with your actual piety. O that upon so good terms I might be brought hither again, to recant it: for you are sure! when did you ever take so much pains, to be sure of the pardon of your sins, as you do weekly to make sure your debts? The want of that assurance hath often broke your sleeps, when did the want of this disquiet you? I will tell you; the purchase of your lands, the leases of your houses, the bonds of your monies, the care of your books; shall all at the day of Judgment, be bills of accusation, and indictments against you. A man apprehended for a robbery, is convicted, condemned; yet by suit of friends reprived, till they can get a pardon for him. In the mean time come some of his acquaintance, and will him to be of good cheare; they sing, dance, and drink with him: he answers, I am condemned, the sentence is past, the execution is ready; how easy it will be to get a pardon, I fear: if I were sure to escape, I could be merry with you; till then, I must say to laughter, thou art mad; and to jovisance, be thou a stranger to me. Thus stands the case with us; the Law hath condemned us for transgression, the devils are ready executioners to hasten Justice; show me my pardon, assure me that the great King of heaven hath forgiven me; I can then rejoice; till then, no comfort can down with me. There is a tale of a covetous man, that had nothing in his mouth, but It is good to be sure. If his servant went to sow his land, he would follow him; why? O it is good to be sure. Though himself had locked the door; yet he must needs rise out of his bed in the cold, to feel it fast: why? O it is good to be sure. Let him have told his money often over, yet he will tell it again: why? O it is good to be sure. It came to pass that he fell very dangerously sick; and his servant perceiving little hope of life in him: asked him, Master have you said your prayers? Yes, I have said them: nay, but say them again master; you know it is good to be sure. No, says the worldling, it is more than needs, for I am sure enough of that. He bids his servant open his chest, and bring him all his gold in it, to look upon. The honest servant, willing to work his master to repentance, having opened it; told him; Master, the Devil is in the chest, he lays his paw upon all the gold, and says it is all his; because it was extracted out of the life-blood of widows, orphans, and poor wretches. Says he so, quoth the Extortioner? Then bring me the gold, the chest, the devil, and all; It is good to be sure. Perhaps from hence came that by-word; that the covetous worldling gets the devil and all.

O the vain assurance of these fugitive things! Vel sequendo labimur, vel assequendo laedimur. No, I will hold me fast by the LORD, for that is sure. They that trust in the LORD, shall be as mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth forever. The Dove makes moan to her fellow-birds, of the tyranny of the Hawk. One counsels her to fly aloft, but the Hawk can mount as high as she. Another adviseth her to keep below, but the Hawk can stoop for his prey. Another, to shroud her self in the woods, there she shall be sure: but alas, that was the Hawkes manour, the place where he kept his court. Another bids her keep the Town, there she was sure from the Hawk: but so she became a prey to man, and had her eyes put out to make the Hawk sport. At last one bids her nest her self in the hole of a Rock, there she should be safe, violence it self could not surprise her. The Dove is man's Soul, she would gladly be secured from Satan: come to me, saith Riches, here thou shalt be sure? No, wealth is the Devils stirrup whereby he gets up, and rides the covetous. Come to me, saith Pleasure, here thou shalt be sure; as if she were not as very whore as Delilah, to betray thee to that Philistine. Honor says, Come to me, here thou art sure; as if the Devil durst not come near the Court-gates; or Greatness were a Supersedeas to sin, or a protection against the arrest of judgments. No, there is no Surenesse in thy lands, none in thy monies, none in thy honors, none in thy pleasures: neither Court, nor City, nor Country; neither Castles nor Forts can save thee; yet there is a Rock for this Dove, O my dove that art in the clifts of the Rock. The clifts of this Rock are the wounds of Jesus Christ; fly thither, O my soul, and be safe! Psal. 55.6. O that I had wings like a Dove, then would I fly away and be at rest. Thy wings are faith and prayer; hie thee to this Rock, there only thou art sure; all the devils in hell shall not pluck thee from the merciful arms of Christ, John. 10.28. They shall never be plucked out of my hand. How are we sure that we are in his hand? if his Spirit be in our heart. It was a good argument of Manoahs wife, Judge. 13.23. If the Lord were pleased to kill us, he would never have accepted of our sacrifice. So conclude thy own conscience; if the Lord were pleased to reject me, he would never have given me his Spirit. If I were a vessel of wrath, such a Comforter should never have come within my doors, Psal. 41.11. By this I know that thou favourest me, because mine enemies doth not triumph against me. If Satan prevail not, sure then I am in favor, and the Lord JESUS hath reserved me to his eternal Kingdom.

Your calling. Calling hath divers acceptions; it is here meant of that spiritual and inward calling, wrought by the Spirit in the ministry of the Gospel. August. Non quacunq̄ue, sed quâ vocatione sit credens; Not every kind of vocation, but only that whereby a man is made a believer, Act. 16.14. Lydia attended to the things that were spoken, and the LORD opened her heart. She attended to the Word; there is the outward calling: GOD opened her heart; there is the inward calling. In the trial of this Vocation, I should consider, Vnde nos vocârît Deus, and ad quae vocârît; from what we are called, and to what. Saint Jude says, we are sanctified by GOD the Father, preserved in JESUS CHRIST, and called. To be brought into the Church, is Vocation external: to be sanctified, is Vocation internal: to be preserved in CHRIST, is Vocation eternal. Here are the three parts of our Incorporation to CHRIST; Vocation by GOD the Father, Sanctification by GOD the Son, Preservation by GOD the HOLY GHOST. Vocation is the fruit of Election, Rom. 1.7. To all that be in Rome, beloved of GOD, called to be Saints. First, beloved of GOD, then called to be Saints. You have heard before, that Calling is the way to assure Election. But now you would be sure of your true Calling: good reason, otherwise your journey to heaven would be like Hannibals on The Alps.

There are many signs, like hands in a cross-way, to tell us the right, Isaiah 30.21. Thou shalt hear a word behind thee, saying, This is the way, walk in it. I could tell you of Love to the Word preached, a sure effect of true Calling. He that is called, loves the lowest stair of the Pulpit, better than the highest stair of the Tribunal. One loves the Tavern, whiles another runs to the Temple; What is the reason? This man is called, rather than the other. I could also tell you of a sincere and devoted affection to Christ; when we desire his company above all things, and love the place where his Honor dwelleth. Vbicunq̄ue fueris Domine Jesus, sive in patibulo, sive in sepulchro, sive in inferno; Wheresoever thou art, O blessed Savior; whether on the Cross, in the grave, or in hell, I care not, so I be with thee, so I find thee my Savior. This love should be to Christ, not so much for his bounties sake, as for his own sake. This holy affection produceth our love to Christians: Diligo (quia) dilectos; I love them, because God loves them, 1 John. 3.14. We know that we are passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren: Eos qui sunt fratres, & quia sunt fratres: We love them that are brethren, and because they are brethren. What is true of this blind affection in the blood; that it ariseth often, not Ex virtute affectae, sed ex voluntate afficientis; Not from any merit in the affected, but from the lust of the affecter: therefore the Poets have called Amantes Amentes, Lovers mad-men. This is here made good of divine love in the Spirit: I affect that man, not because he is good to me, but because God is good to him.

I might add another sign, that Vocation testifieth it self in a plenary obedience, at least in respect of Resolution. This must be Ad totum, per totum, de toto; To the whole Law, during our whole life, with our whole heart. To the whole Law, Psal. 119.6. I have respect unto all thy Commandments. During our whole life, Luke 1.75. In holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life. With the whole heart, as David speaks, With my whole heart have I loved thee. Otherwise GOD will come against us with a But, Rev. 2.14. But I have a few things against thee. With a Nevertheless, Revel. 2.4. Nevertheless I have somewhat against thee. With a Notwithstanding, Revel. 2.20. Notwithstanding I have some things against thee. All these exceptives; But, notwithstanding, nevertheless, are against us. I know, I must offend; I must suffer many sins, I will allow myself no sin.

I could also add another sign, how we may be sure that we are effectually called; that is, our dislike to this world. He that despiseth not earth, was never yet inwardly called to heaven. If the love of this world cannot stand with the comfortable assurance of our heavenly calling, let us divert our desires, and elevate our affections from things on earth, to things above, Coloss. 3.2. But if none be called to heaven, but such as be sanctified and separate from earth, I fear that the greater number takes the broader way: It is your method in the City; you say, there be more of the Company, than be of the Livery: but for heaven, and the profession of the Gospel; there be more of the Livery, than be of the Company; Many are called, but few are chosen.

To conclude, let me now characterize to you the man, in whose heart there is this assurance. He stands like an impregnable Fort, upon whom misery and malice would spend all their shot: much they do, to their own shame, to his glory. Sin like a flattering neighbor, hath often knocked at his door, and would have come in, but found cold welcome: and if it was importunate, was sent away not without repulse and blows. Perhaps it lurks about his out-houses, and spite of him will be his Tenant, but shall never be his Land-lord. He hath some faults, but God will not see them. He meets at every turn with his railing and accusing adversary, Satan: but he stops his throat with a pardon sealed in the blood of Jesus Christ. He is never out of war, never without victory. Those roaring fiends set upon him proudly, and he beats them down triumphantly. The shield he always bears with him, was never pierced, Faith. He hath been often tripped, once or twice foiled, was never vanquished. His hand hath been scratched, his heart is whole. Tyranny bends on him a stern brow, but could never dash him out of countenance. Is he threatened the Surgery of the sword? he sees Isaiah under the Saw, John in Patmos cutting in pieces. Is he threatened drowning? he sees Jonah diving into that inextricable gulf. Burning? he sees those three Servants in their fiery walk, and the Son of GOD amongst them. Is he threatened devouring? he sees Daniel in that sealed den of terrible Lions. Stoning? he sees that Protomartyr of the Gospel sleeping in peace under so many grave-stones. Heading? he sees the Baptists neck bleeding in Herodia's platter. He is sure, that the God which gave them such strength, is not weaker in him: what could they suffer without God? what cannot he suffer with God? If he must endure their pain, he looks for their faith, their patience, their strength, their glory. The terrors of death amaze him not; for first he knows whom he hath trusted, and then whither death shall lead him. He is not more sure to die, than to live again: and out-faceth death with his assured resurrection. Like Enoch, he walks every day with God, and confers familiarly with his Maker. When he goes in humbly to converse with him by meditation and prayer, he puts off his own clothes, and takes a rich suit out of the wardrobe of his Redeemer: then confidently he entereth the presence-chamber, and faithfully challengeth a blessing. He hath clean hands, and a white soul, fit to give lodging to the Holy Ghost: not a room is reserved for the enemy: he that gave all, finds all returned to himself. He is so certain of his eternal election, and present justification, that he can call God Father, his Savior Brother, the Holy Ghost his Comforter; the Devil his slave, earth his foot-stool, heaven his patrimony, and everlasting life his inheritance. Those celestial spirits do not scorn his company, nor refuse to do him service. His heart is so devoted to Christ; that if misery, if death, if torments, stood in his way on the left hand: if parents, children, friends, wife, inheritance, stood in his way on the right hand; he would disdain all obstacles, and break thorough all difficulties, to come unto him whom his soul loveth. He fixeth his spiritual eye upon the eternal things, that are not seen▪ others see that is present, he that is to come. He walks upon earth as a stranger, his heart is at home. He hath laid up a sure treasure in heaven, a portion that shall never be taken away. He vexeth not himself with cares, he knows that he lives not at his own cost. Without omitting good means, he rests on a Providebit Deus, the Lord's providence. Without the warrant of GOD he dares do nothing, with it anything: nor is his faith more valiant, than his bowels are compassionate. He hath tears plenty, bot▪ for his own sins and others sufferings. He is no niggard of those showers on earth, he is sure never to weep hereafter. When he departs this life, his body sleeps in a peaceful grave: and those glorious Angels bear his soul with triumphant songs to the glorified Saints; where it is married to the Bridegroom JESUS CHRIST forever.

For if ye do these things, ye shall never fall. The doctrine of election, as it is to the faithful the sweetest assurance, so to the proud an occasion of presumption. Nihil dulcius quando sobrie assumitur, nihil periculosius quando superbe praesumitur. A man may be so bold of his predestination, that he forget his conversation: so he may dream himself in heaven, and waken from that dream in hell. Presume not therefore, that thou art so surely Electus, chosen; that thou become, Elatus, proud. Pride is no better an argument of an elect soul, than a tumid swelling is of a sound body. A Proclamation is read, wherein a Christian King grants honor and wealth to certain of his subjects; with assurance of donation upon their just demand. One among the multitude leapes at the news, springs away and stays not to here it out: there is a condition following, provided first that they put on arms, and expel the Turk, which infests some part of his dominions. This man comes one of the foremost to demand the promised honors: he is asked for a testimony of his valor and service in such wars. Alas! he never tarried to hear that condition, and therefore lost the retribution. GOD so promiseth eternal life to men; but withal chargeth them to believe in Christ, and to do him faithful service against the devil, that great enemy to this kingdom. But how many are quite lost, for not staying to hear the proclamation of the Gospel out? they run away with opinion of sufficient belief, and never think of obedience. But to prevent such false hopes, there must be Doing; For if ye do these things, &c.

In which words we considered two parts; the Qualification, and the Ratification. If ye do these things, there is the Qualification. Ye shall never fall, there is the Ratification. There is a Condition premised, and a Reward promised. If you for your part, be doing; GOD for his part will keep you from falling. That is your obedience, and this is GOD'S recompense. Your devotion goes before, and his retribution follows after. First, to take the Qualification asunder, here be three circumstances; from the Order, If First ye shall perform; there is the Condition: Ye do, not say or purpose, but Do; there is the Practice: These things, not what you lust, but what the Lord commands, there is the Sincerity. Thus it lies taken in sunder, then being put together again, we shall find this the sum; the necessity of our active obedience.

For the Condition, we must first do and then have, not first have the reward and then do. Indeed we must first have Vnde, grace whereby to do before we do: but not the reward till we have done. Among men he first serves, that deserves: for God, we can merit nothing by doing, yet we shall have nothing without doing. The good man says, Non mereor gloriam, sed vereor vindictam: I deserve not reward for my goodness, but I fear punishment for my sinfulness. Let me look to my obedience, let GOD alone with my recompense. The tenor of the Scripture doth always set the work before the wages, Luke 19.17. Well done good servant: then Enter into thy LORD'S joy, Matth. 20.8. First call the Laborers; and if they have labored, then Give them their hire, Rev. 22.12, I come and my reward is with me; to give every man according to his work. First, we must arm, then fight: first fight, then conquer: first conquer, then triumph. Isaiah 62.11. His reward is with him, and his work before him. His work is before him, but his reward he brings with him. First, seek the Kingdom of heaven: first seek it, then find it. There is none among us, but looks for eternal blessedness: but where is our precedent obedience? GOD is not such a Prodigal, to deal his treasures among them that never sought to please him. Quidam luxuriantur in Christo. Some are too bold with CHRIST, they spend too fast upon his stock: indeed through their own default, his riches mal• them poor. The conceit of his sufficiency causes them to neglect their own deficiency: they will fail in doing, yet CHRIST must not fail in Crowning. They forget their first, yet expect God's last. They are deceived; if they will not first do these things, they shall fall. It was a prayer of the Jews every morning; Puram animam, quam mihi dedisti, da ut tibi restituam: so let it be ours, Lord, as thou gavest me an undefiled soul, so grant I may return thee an undefiled one again. Let us spend this short time in agendo quae ad gratiam, in doing the works of grace; that we may spend that eternal time in habendo quae ad gloriam, in possessing the riches of glory.

For the practice or fruitfulness in good works; If ye do: not think or say, but do. Idleness never had the testimony of God's acceptance: it is a vice that damnes it self. The idle person seems to be God's outlawry; out of the compass of his protection. Art and nature bring forth nothing suddenly: there must be growing degrees in the one, and intervenient labors in the other, Matth. 20.8. The Penie had never been theirs, if they had stood in the market idle till Sun-set. The Philosopher said, that a man should give a lazy beggar a bit and a blow: a bit to relieve his body, a blow to correct his mind. Nothing better pleaseth God, than the sweet composition of a man's hand with his heart. When the one doth Propere quid agendum, the other Exponere quid propositum: When the heart doth direct what the hand should do, and the hand doth do what the heart directs. For the hand is the best commentary of the heart: what a man does, I am sure he thinks; not always, what he speaks. We must serve God, as one said he would marry, Pro amore, for love. Now there are four things comprehended in that word, and they are found by cutting off the first letter. Amore, with love: as life in the body, so devotion in the soul, begins at the heart. More, with the conversation, practical obedience, doing that which is good. Ore, with the mouth, setting forth God's praise. Re, with the estate; when we do not offer sacrifice to the LORD, of that which cost us nothing.

There must be hearty love, lively practice, kindly thanks, costly service. When the good works of our ancient fathers and progenitors in this land are mentioned, presently the malicious cry out; Tush, they were Idolaters. Were they so? then a man may well say, that those Popish Idolaters were better than these Puritan Saints. If their superstition set up Churches, I am sure that these men's zeal pulls them down. Let them show us some Doing of good: verae dicuntur res, quae apparent quales sunt, Aug. Things are said then to be true, when their appearance doth manifest their being. If a man have a righteous hand, I will believe him to have a righteous heart. Physicians judge of the bodies health, not by the color of the face, nor by the quicknesse of the eye, nor by the glibnesse of the tongue; (though these also may give some symptoms) but by the pulse of the arm. It is not the lifting up of the eye, nor the bowing down of the knee, nor a demure and affecta•• manner of speaking, nor the Bible under the arm, nor the hearing of four Sermons a day; that justifies the sincerity of a Christian; but If ye do these things.

For the Sincerity, These things: not what gain prompts, or lust suggests, 〈◇〉 what God commands. What are they? Such things as appertain to knowledge, 〈◇〉 virtue, to godliness. Every worldling is left-handed: he will be doing, but he 〈◇〉 no thanks for his pains. They that lay baits to entrap and enwrap their neighbo•• are still doing, to keep their hand in ure: but this left-handed action is cursed. The rich Saint makes a feast, so doth the rich sinner, but with great difference: the 〈◇〉 of the former are the poor, who can return no recompense: the guests of the other are the rich, who are likely to bid them again; so they toss the ball of courtesy to such, as are able to toss it back to them again. There is a right-handed charity in those, a left-handed respect in these, Luk. 14.12. As we have opportunity, let us do good to all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith. Rich worldlings will do good, not to all men, but to some men: and of those, not to the household of faith, but after a sinister sort to the household of Belial; to flatterers, to pandars, to drunkards, Phil. 4.8. There is a perfect rule of this 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ; whatsoever is true, honest, just, pure, lovely, and of good report. Those things which you have learned and received and heard and seen in me, Do. Martha had a busy hand, but not about these things. Cain had a working heart, Achitophel a working head, Joab a working hand: but Cain's heart, Ahithophel's head, and Joab's hand, are ill met in one man. Thou expectest eandem mercedem, the same reward that the Saints had: therefore thou must perform idem opus, the same work that the Saints did. These things.

Now to reduce all these branches to their root, and as we have taken the words a sunder, so to put them together again; all the particulars unite their forces in this one sum, or general Doctrine. The mercy of God in our salvation requires our actual obedience; we must do these things. All the bells of Aaron ring this peal, *Deut. 4.1. Hearken unto the statutes and Judgments which I teach you, for to do them, Gal. 3.10. Cursed is everyone that continueth not in all things written in the Law, to do them. Not sufficient to know them, but to do them, Rom. 2.13. not the hearers of the Law are just before God, but the doers of the Law shall be justified. There was a woman, Luk. 11.27. that blessed the womb which bare CHRIST: but he replied, Yea, rather blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it. Yea, that thou sayest is true, she is blessed indeed, and all generations shall call her blessed; but there are others also blessed, even as many as hear the truth, and do it. Blessedness is desired of all, but few will go to the price of it, Psal. 106.3. Blessed are they that keep judgment, and do righteousness: that keep within the bounds of the one, and live in the practice of the other: the one being as it were their ore, the other their compass. Be ye followers of God as dear children, Eph. 5.1. Summa religionis est imitari quem colis: the abstract of religion is to imitate him whom thou dost worship. Such a one hath done me insufferable wrong, how can I forgive him? God would. Another is gotten into my debt, and abuseth my patience, how can I forbear him? God would. Be thou a follower of God in grace, that thou mayest ascend to his glory. A man is travelling to this City; at least in his own opinion he thinks so, and tells all he meets that he is going to London; yet still he keeps his back upon it, and bends his course the contrary way. So ridiculous a thing is it, for men to profess that they are going to heaven, when their whole life is directly forwarding themselves to hell. *Omnes ad Deum ire volunt, post Deum pauci: all men would come to God, few will be persuaded to follow after God, Matth. 7.21. Not everyone that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter the kingdom of heaven. For many call CHRIST their LORD, yet serve the devil.

*He that hath my Commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me, John. 14.21. Aug. Qui habet in memoria, & servat inevita: qui habet in sermonibus, & servat in moribus. Qui habet audiendo, & servat obediendo: or qui habet faciundo & servat perseverando. Qui habet lectionem, & servat dilectionem. We must have the Gospel in our hearts, and keep it in our lives • have it in •earing, keep it i• obeying: ⟨◇⟩ understanding must contain i•, ou• actions express i•. Scripture ⟨...⟩ i• opera vertere, & non modo dicere sancta, sed fa•••, Hieron. Let u• endeavor to ⟨◇⟩ the Scriptural words into works, and not only to speak holy things, but to do them. Be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves. We must first be hearers: for David hath branded the wicked man with this mark; *Noluit intelligere ut been ageret: he would not hear nor understand, that he might do well. A man may know the will of God, and not do it: but he cannot do it unless he know it. Then not hearers only, but Doers; and th•• without any plea, or excuse, or fear of danger by holy obedience. The dove will not leave her flight because there are some ravens in the air: so the good Christian will always keep obedience upon the wing, Psal. 34.14. Depart from evil; what and speak good only? No, but Do good. De virtute loqui minimum, virtutibus (ϕ) ; Hic labor, hoc opus est, Persi. To speak of virtue is nothing, the labor is to show the power of in it virtuous actions. Magna dicere Golia sonus est: magna facere Sampsonis opus est, Tertul. To speak bravely, this is but the sound of a swelling Giant: but to do heroically, this is the work of a valiant champion. It is not enough to say, as it is in the Psalm, Credidi, & ideo locutus sum; I believed and therefore I spake: but Credidi, & ideo operatus sum; I believed, and therefore I wrought. No man can work unless he believes: no man can believe unless he works. Christian Religion is more practical, than theoretical: rather an occupation, than a mere profession; dwelling like the Artisans wit, at the fingers ends.

Let this be understood to the confutation, to the confusion of hypocrisy; which turns Religion into a vizard: it hath mouth, and eyes, and nose; all but painted. Hypocrites are not like the heathen Idols, save in one thing, Psal. 115.5. They have mouths, but they speak not: eyes, but they see not, &c. These have mouths, and they speak: eyes, and they see: ears and they hear; noses, and they smell: feet, and they walk: they have hands, but they do not work. Plutarch hath a tale of the Moon, that she entreated her mother to make her a coat fit for her. Her mother answers, my daughter, it is impossible to fit thee with a coat: for thou sometimes waxest, sometimes wanest: art now in the full, by and by changing: today bigger, tomorrow less. The hypocrite is such a man in the moon; sometimes a giant, sometimes a dwarfe: now great, presently small; evermore so changing, that no coat can fit him. Hypocrites are like pictures on canvase they show fairest at farthest. Hear them speaking, and see them not doing, and you would think them Angels: but see them doing, and hear them not speaking, and they are devils. Or at least, as you would Judge of dancers, when you hear not the tune of their music; leaping and turning, in all points like mad-men. Their voice is the voice of Jacob, but their hands are the hands of Esau. Tace linguâ, loquere vitâ: let thy life speak, and thy tongue hold her peace. Hypocrites have the running gowte, but it settles most in their fingers; Chiragrâ laborant. A beggar being reprov'd for his lasy life, answered that he had a secret disease lying in his bones, which for modesties sake he must not declare: they believed him and relieved him. One among the rest being unsatisfied, would needs know of him what that secret sickness was; seeing that he appeared so well outwardly: he told him plainly; it is within, a disease lying in my bones; some call it Idleness. Tell an hypocrite, (whose zeal is so pepper-hot at the tongues end) that his works be cold: Oh he hath a secret disease in his bones; a scurvy dissembling humor, settled in his heart, and creeping through every joint. If you will, you may call it Idleness or Hypocrisy; for I understand them as convertible terms. It must be very strong physic that purgeth this humor. They are only good, when on the Sabbath day they are fowing tap-houses, and scouring the common sewers and sinks of sin. But mendacia fallax Damnat, & in mach• gladiu• dstringit Adulter. Adulterers punish wantons, and presumption judgeth weakness. Is not this to be doing? yes, they do till they undo a man: they do, but not these things: Omnium libidinum servicos puniunt qu• imitantur; Plin. They condemn that in others, which they applaud in themselves. But let us do what we should, that •e may receive what we would, 1 Tim. 1.5. The end of the commandment is charity, not of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and faith unfeigned. Th••may we expect the reward well done good servant: not well professed, but well expressed: not well known, nor well spoken, nor well purposed, but well done. This is the perfect rule, Gal. 6.16. And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God.

Ye shall never fall. I come to the Ratification: these words are diversely read: Non impingetis, non offendetis, non cadetis: this is the best, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : Ye shall not fall. The original ad verbum, ye shall not fall forever, that is, ye shall fall never. Such a phrase you have, John. 13.8. Thou shalt not wash my feet forever, that is, Thou shalt never wash them. This seems to be derived from the, Psal. 15.5. He that doeth these things, shall never fall.

But here the Apostle seems to attribute something to our works; as if the merit, of our doing, should preserve us from falling. No, he speaks not De causa misericordiae, sed de via gratiae; not concerning the cause of mercy, but the way of grace. Our own works do not uphold us, but assure us by a token that we are upholden of God. Sunt testimonia electionis quâ fulcimur: they are the inseparable effects of that grace, by which we are kept from falling. So long as we feel thy pulse beating, we are sure thou livest: yet the beating of thy pulse is not the cause thou livest, but a sign by the effects. Bellarmino observes, that CHRIST says not definitively; you are unprofitable servants, Luk. 7.10. But when ye shall have done all that is commanded you, Say, we are unprofitable servants. Dicite, say so, for good manners sake, and the acknowledgement of humility. Nay, but rather subscribe to verity; say so, and say the truth: for CHRIST might give something in charge, Propter humilitatem, to beget in us humility; but nothing contra veritatem, never anything against the truth. The God of verity never bad us lie: say so then, and say truly, that we are unprofitable servants: for God is a loser even by the best of us; if we consider and compare the cost he hath been at with us, with our fruits. The earth restores us four for one, we scarce return to God one seed of four. Usury brings us back one above our ten by interest, we hardly restore to the Lord one of ten, of his principal. We know no merit but CHRIST'S; therefore we pray, forgive us our trespasses, and give us our daily bread. Qui misericordiam petit, meritum negat: he that beggeth mercies, boasts no merits: if thou ask an alms, never plead thy worthiness. As the Servants to Princes make their gifts better than their wages: so let us that serve God, stand upon his gifts, not upon our wages. We are not upholden by our piety, but beholden to God's pity; we are kept from falling only by the grace of Jesus Christ.

Shall never fall. Falling is twofold, of Infirmities, and of Apostasy; the one is a falling into sin, the other a falling into the state of damnation: there is weakness in the one, there is presumption and obstinatenesse in the other. The former of these falls may befall the faithful, but not the latter: for there is no damnation to them that are in Jesus Christ, Rom. 8.1. Indeed he may fall into diverse sins, but never into that sinning sin: they be slips, not foils: or if foils not falls: or if falls, yet falling forward to repentance, not backward from mercy. The faithful shall not fall into apostasy; from the Lord: the reason is, because God establisheth his goings, Psal. 40.2. The Lord will preserve him, and keep him up. If that were understood of sin, that Solomon speaks; The just man falleth seven times a day; yet it implies his repentance: for he could not properly be said to fall seven times, unless he had rose six times. Toties resurgit paenitendo, quoties cecidit peccando; he doth not more often fall by sinning, than he riseth again by repenting. Thus he may fall into infirmity, but he shall never fall into apostasy.

And this is a sweet comfort, that those which are upheld by God's power, shall never fall away from JESUS CHRIST. Eli was Priest of the Sanctuary, yet he fell: Adam was in Paradise, yet he fell; Lucifer was in heaven, yet he fell: but whosoever is in CHRIST, shall never fall. Indeed he may fall into affliction, but not into destruction. Subjicitur miseriis, non rejicitur cum miseris: he is laid under the rod of calamity, but he shall never be forsaken with the miserable. Death may trip down his body, Satan cannot get down his soul; In abyssum non cadet. His name is written in heaven; and until that name fall, which will not be though heaven fall, himself shall never fall. Though he wrestles with Giants, against Principalities, and Powers, and wicked spirits in high places; yet he shall stand. Though death lay his body in the dust, yet it hath no power to touch his soul; he shall stand. The poor Philosopher dying said; Anxious vixi, dubius morior, nescio quo vado: I have lived uncertain, I die doubtful, I know not whether I go or what shall become of me. The blind reprobate, what he would not credit presuming, he shall see then despairing; the gates of hell wide open, and a bottomless gulf ready to swallow him. The resolved Christian knows, that the mouth of the pit is shut against him, that the gate of glory stands open for him; that he is elected, not to fall, but to rise. No descent doth fear him, but his ascent doth cheare him, I go to him that is above. Now the mercy of God keep us from falling, and give us a blessed rising at the Resurrection of the Just, through the merits of Jesus Christ. Amen.

VERSE 11. For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly, into the everlasting kingdom of our LORD and Savior Jesus Christ.

THE dependence of this verse with the former, we shall in due place be fitly occasioned to consider: first, therefore to the distribution. It may be distinguished into two main parts.

The

- Passage; For so an entrance shall be ministered to us.
- Palace; Into the everlasting kingdom of Christ.

In the passage are observable these four Properties

- Certitudo, the Surenesse; So shall be; without fail.
- Promptitudo, the Readinesse; An entrance; without trouble.
- Aptitudo, the Fitnessse; shall be ministered; without let.
- Latitudo, the Easynesse; Abundantly; without pain.

In the Palace consider two things: The

- Royalty; it is the Lord's own kingdom.
- Eternity; it is an Everlasting kingdom.

In the Surenesse we find two circumstances; the Reason by way of connection, in the word For: and the means by way of relation, in the word So.

For. This is a binding word that knits the discourse together with a natural dependence. As if the Apostle should thus declare himself; There are some blind, and forget the way of truth: what then? Therefore make your election sure: why? for if ye do so, ye shall never fall: how are we sure that we shall not fall? For so you have a full entrance to blessedness. If you study in mind, affect in heart, and strive in hand, to do these things; God will help Per opem suam operam vestram, your endeavor with his grace, you shall enter into his glorious kingdom. Plain and simple averring of the truth is sufficient in holy Scriptures, which bind the conscience authoritative. God's, Sic facite, or Hoc credit; do this, or believe that; is enough without any reason. For as in men's commands, we examine Quid, non quis, what is enjoined, not who imposeth it: so in these we examine Quis, non quid; who it is that chargeth us, not so much what we are charged. The precepts of Superiors are sometimes evil, therefore we obey them only in good: but when the Lord commands, we do not examine, but execute, 1 Sam. 3.18. Dominus est, It is the Lord. Yet as CHRIST led the Jews Tam oculo, quàm oraculo; as well by his Miracles amazing them, as by his Oracles instructing them. So his Apostles persuade us, Et argumentis & ornamentis; and do not come evermore with a Mandamus. As the father to bring on his child a long Journey, wins him by fair promises, lifts him our hard passages, holds him by the hand all the way: so the Lord doth allure us by gracious affordments, persuade us by arguments; and rather than we should be weary of well doing, encourageth us with reasons; For so you shall enter, &c.

So. This is a description of the means, and hath a relation to the former counsel. As if he should say, make your election sure; and by living soberly and righteously endeavor the ascertaining to your own hearts, that God hath decreed you to salvation: for So you shall have a free entrance into the kingdom of CHRIST. That is the only means whereby you may be admitted, and without that you shall be excluded. There be numbers that would enter the kingdom of Christ, but they fail in their Sic, they will not So enter, Luk. 10.37. When Christ had made the Lawyer tell himself, who was the good neighbor; He that shown mercy on him: he presently upon it chargeth him, Go and do thou likewise. Wouldest thou arrive at heaven? set their Precedents, who are now in heaven, before thine eyes; Go and do thou likewise. So Paul left it in charge behind him, Phil. 3.17. Be ye followers of me, and walk so as you have us for an ensample. If you would come to the place where we are, you must follow us in the works which we have done: So you shall have an entrance. Sic, whatsoever is a Non sicut, dissonant from this So, is an hindrance. God sets us, as Moses on Nebo, upon the mount of a sanctified speculation, and shows us Canaan, with the way to it; So you must enter it, or not at all. One minds nothing but his cups, another nothing but his purse, a third only his courtesan; yet all these point to meet at heaven: but they fail in their So; for this is not the way thither, 1 John. 2.16. The lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life; is a broad way, but not to salvation. Of all the manuductions to the City of God there lies no way by three signs; the sign of the Pot, the sign of the Purse, and the sign of the Punke. Therefore we say, the drunkard is a man out of the way, the worldling crosses the way, the adulterer dammes up the way. All these fail in their 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, therefore shall miss in their 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, the desire of their hearts. One presumes himself a David, and thinks to conquer the Goliath Satan with Saul's armor; not So, but in the Name of the Lord of hosts, 1 Sam. 17.45. The Seminary asks the Pope, as Abishai did David, 1 Sam. 26.8. Shall I smite the king? Not So, for who can stretch forth his hand against the Lord's anointed, and be guilt-less? Treason is not the way to heaven. Covetous men like those stronger soldiers, will not give the faint and poor any of their spoil: not So saith David, 1 Sam. 30.23. You shall not do so my brethren, with that which the Lord hath given us. There is another So to salvation; and blessed is the servant, whom his Master findeth So doing, Matth. 24.46. This is the surenesse; if you go by the means, you shall come to the end. So you shall have an entrance; an infallible rule, if you walk So, you shall not miss it.

An entrance shall be given you; I call this the Readinesse of the Passage. The way is not hedged up with thorns, nor barricado'd with bulwarks, nor maz'd like an intricate labyrinth; Patet, there is an Entrance. In the tractation of this doctrine, because it is the heart of the Text, I will consider three things. First, the proposition, that the way to blessedness is open: next, I will clear the way from certain obstacles, that may seem to cross the truth of this assertion: lastly, I will declare wherein this Entrance consists.

The passage to grace and mercy is open, and ready to entertain all entering feet. From the first fall, sin had shut it up, but now CHRIST hath opened it, Revel. 3.7. He that hath the key of David openeth, and no man shutteth. The Pope presumes he hath that key, and lets in whom he pleaseth: Oh miserable man, why doth he not then let in himself? Idolaters, Sorcerers, Adulterers, Heretics, have had that imaginary key; yet could they get no entrance into heaven. Only CHRIST opens that gate, and gives entrance. Thrice was heaven opened to himself: at his Baptism, Matthew. 3.16. at his transfiguration, Matth. 17.5. at his ascension, Act. 1.9. I know that the apertion of heaven doth often mean a manifestation of God's glorious power only: but in these places it signifies visibles caeli scissuram, ut aliquid planetis & astris superiùs perspicatur; a visible fissure of heaven, that something might be seen far transcendent to the stars and planets. Such an apertion was to Saint Stephen, Act. 7.56. Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God. Praevidebat Stephanus, quod Stephano providebat Dominus. The Lord afforded him a vision of that, whereof he was instantly to have the fruition. The like patefaction was to Peter, Act. 10.11. He saw heaven opened. Those visible scissures were figures of this invisible entrance. Into the Sanctum Sanctorum, the type of heaven, went only the high Priest once a year: but CHRIST at his death rent the veil of the Temple, to signify that he had made now a clear passage for all believers, Hebr. 9.8. The Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the Holiest of all, was not yet made manifest, while as the first Tabernacle was standing. Indeed it is true, that from the beginning heaven was not shut to the faithful; for how then did Abraham enter into blessedness? Non clausum fuit Iudaeis, sed non apertum fuit omnibus. As it was not shut to the Jews, so it was not open to the Gentiles. For they were aliens from the common wealth of Israel, and so strangers from the covenants of promise, Eph. 2.13. But now ye which were sometimes far off, are made nigh by the blood of Christ; who hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us. The Gentiles were esteemed as dogs; and the children's bread is not given to dogs, Mark. 7.27. But he that could make ex lapidibus filios, children of stones; can also make ex canibus servos, of those dogs servants. The gate then stands wider open Per Christum missum, than it did Per Christum Promissum; by a Savior borne, than it was by a Savior only promised to be borne. That to the Holiest, was a typical entrane, this is a topicall entrance. Therefore, Our salvation is now nearer: for we do not go to the gate of heaven, but rather the gate of heaven comes to us, Rev. 21.2. I saw the holy City, new Jerusalem coming down from God out of heaven. Because we could not ascend to it, it doth ascend to us. CHRIST calls himself The door, John. 10.7. which place being compared with Revel. 3.20. I stand at the door and knock: we find that Ostium est, & ad ostium pulsat: he is the Door and yet he knocks at the door. He that hath a suit to the King, concludes with himself; I must go to the Court, for the Court will not come to me. Yet Matth. 21.5. Rex tuus venit ad te; Thy king cometh unto thee. Petit tua limina virtus. Thus Christ promised the penitent malefactor; This day thou shalt be with me in Paradise. Sanguis Christi clavis Paradisi. The blood of Christ is the key that openeth Paradise, Eph. 2.18. Through him we have an access by one spirit unto the Father. Thus the doctrine is cleared, Heb. 10.19. We have boldness to enter into the Holiest by the blood of Jesus: By that new and living way which he hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, His Flesh. He is the Way, and the Truth, and the Life: there is no way but by thee, no truth but from thee, no life but in thee, Oh dear Lord Jesus.

In the second place, let us proceed to the removal of such impediments as might hinder this passage. There is no glory of entrance, where is no hindrance. Sin was the first obstacle, Gen. 3.24. So he drave out the man. It shut him out, and kept him out: Angels that were his friends, were set to with-stand his re-entry. This taught him, that as sin cast him out of Paradise, so it would also shut him out of heaven, but for the mercies of God in the merits of a Redeemer. There are many enemies, backed by the malice of sin; but because they are numerous, and must be ranked to some Generalls, I will reduce them to four.

The world is none of the least; and in this there is a double opposition: on the left-hand Indigencie, on the right-hand opulency. They are both removed by Christ; Qui omnia bona terrena contempsit, quae contemnenda docuit: & omnia mala sustinuit, quae sustinenda praecepit; The good things of this world he despised, that he might teach us to despise them: the evil things he bore, that he might teach us to suffer them. 1 John 5.4. Whosoever is borne of God, overcometh the world: We so cast away this hindrance, whether of prosperous or adverse things; Vt nec in illis quaeritur foelicitas, nec in istis timetur infoelicitas; That we neither seek to be blessed in the one, nor fear to be cursed in the other, August. Faith is the principal in this victory: good works are underling soldiers, but Faith is the Captain, which commands all under the great General, JESUS CHRIST. Opera bona vincunt executive, sola fides imperative; Is want an hindrance? No, Matth. 6.20. There is Treasure enough to be had in heaven. Is dearth? No, Prov. 15.15. For a good conscience is a continual feast. Is exile? No; for the home we seek, is a City to come, Hebr. 13.14. Doth prosperity assault us? Indeed this is a sore bar to our entrance; for one man could foil the Devil in his misery, whereas many have been foiled by the Devil in their felicity. Isaiah 38.17. In my peace I had great bitterness. The Churches estate, saith Bernard, was Amara in nece martyrum, amarior in conflictu haereticorum, amarissima in moribus domesticorum; bitter in the loss of her children's blood, more bitter in the oppugnations of her doctrine, most bitter in the vices of her professed friends. Thus the world hinders our entrance, worse by his courtesies, than he can by his crosses. Yet let him do his worst, faith follows Christ, and he is that great Martial that makes way for us thorough the world, John. 16.33. Be of good cheer; Ego vici mundum; I have overcome the world.

The Flesh steps in next to bar up our entrance; this is a Delilah in Samson's bosom, that seeks to cut his throat: It is like the moth in the garment, that breeds in us, and feeds on us. There is no man hath a worse friend than he brings from home. An unfaithful servant is mischievous, an unfaithful friend more mischievous; but Infida uxor, an unfaithful wife, most mischievous. It is ready to prompt us, as Job's wife tempted him, Job 2.9. Curse God and die. This Clitemnestra for the love of her adulterous friend, Satan, will betray her own betrothed Agamemnon. The only course is to be bold with it; and Reprimere ne pereat, suppressere ne perimat; To restrain it, lest it kill it self, and to mortify it, lest it kill us. This obstacle hath also Christ removed; not but that it still offers to withstand us, but that it shall never hurt us. Christ's assistance is stronger than her resistance: in Christ she is mortua, dead, though in her self she be mortifera, deadly. Christ's innocent flesh was crucified, that this sinful flesh might be mortified, Ro. 7.25. Let her do the worst to hinder my entrance, yet I shall enter: and for this I thank GOD through JESUS CHRIST.

The Devil is a master antagonist, a watchful and a wrathful enemy. His weapons are Tentations, whereby he makes men sin: and Accusations, whereby he makes them despair for sin. But this hinderer is mussell'd, John 16.11. The Prince of this world is judged: John 12.31. The Prince of this world is cast out. He is mortuus in lege, condemned himself, therefore unable to condemn us. He is excommunicated, therefore his testimony is nothing worth. Doth he fright thee with thy sins? Answer him that the Lamb of God hath taken them away. Perhaps the politic Serpent quiets thee in the settled opinion of thine own righteousness. Oh Devil! wouldst thou have me turn Iudiciary, and trust to mine own righteousness? I am a sinner, or else what needed I a Savior? Matth. 9.12. They that be whole, need not a Physician, but they that are sick. I have infinite sins, but there is an infinite ransom paid for them. He was made sin for me, who knew no sin, that I might be made the righteousness of God in him. Factus est peccatum propter nos, qui fuit ipsa justitia: ut nos facti simus per eum justi, in quibus fuit ipsa malitia; He that was righteousness, was made sin for us; that we who were unrighteous, might be made righteousness in him. Satan do thy worst, we have an abundant entrance through JESUS CHRIST.

Death is the last enemy, but not the least enemy. Albeit it be hateful and hurtful to the wicked, because it ends their short joys, and begins their everlasting sorrows. Yet to the faithful, that fiend is a friend; Dum egressum properat, ingressum praeparat: while it hastens their going out of this world, it prepares their going into the world to come: Philip. 1.21. To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain. That which meant us the greatest damage, procures us the greatest advantage. The Lord Jesus hath Led captivity captive, and swallowed up death in victory,

1 Cor. 15.54. O death where is thy sting? O grave where is thy victory? Out of that Strong one he brought honey: Out of that eater of all flesh, meat for all spirits. Thorow the jaws of cold death, he hath opened the gates of eternal life. Mors, quae perpetuo cunctos absorbet hiatu; Parcere dum nescit, saepius ipsa favet; While death strives to bar the way against us, it doth make way for us, into this everlasting kingdom.

Thus the hindrances being removed, we come to consider the matter of this Entrance, wherein it consists. and how we are here said to have it. It stands in two things; our Union with Christ and our Communion with the holy Ghost.

First, for our Union with Christ; for if the head be entered, the members cannot be denied. The personal union of the Son of God to our nature, was a great mystery, 1 Tim. 3.16. Without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness; God was manifested in the flesh. Yet let me boldly say, in respect of us, there is another nearer conjunction required to this Entrance, 1 Cor. 6.17. He that is joined to the Lord, is one Spirit. First, that hypostatical union was the conjunction of God's Nature and man's nature in general: but this is an union of the Son of God's Person, and the believers person in special. Secondly, though Christ took our nature upon him, and that with all human infirmities, yet clean void of all sins: in this he takes to him the believers person with all his sins: though we be full of wickedness, he knits us to his holy and glorious self. He is the Head, we are the members: but some tyrant may cut off the members from the head. He is the Husband, we are the wife: but death divorceth man and wife. He is the Vine, we are the branches: but man may slip off a branch from the Vine. He is the Corner-stone, we the building: but a foundation may be bereft of the edifice; and come to the Temple of Jerusalem's case; Non lapis super lapidem; To have not one stone left upon another. But when it is said, we are One Spirit with Christ, here can be no separation: spirit may be parted from body, not spirit from spirit, never from it self: not two, but one spirit, Cant. 8.6. Set me as a seal upon thine heart, and as a seal upon thine arm. The arm is the Instrument of power; and the heart is the fountain of life, the first that lives, and the last that dies. If therefore we be set there as seals, there can be no disjunction: unless we could be plucked from his arms that is Almighty; unless his heart could die, which is life it self. Set me as a seal, &c. That Petition is now a Position; what the Church then desired, it hath now enjoyed: their wish is o•• Article, their Pater-noster, our Creed. Were we not deeply engraven on his heart, when his heart was divided with a spear for us? When in a manner he seemed forsaken of his own Father for a time, rather than his Father should forsake us forever. That Evangelical Prophet testifies it, Isaiah 49.16. Behold, I have graven th•• upon the palms of my hands. Were we not engraven there, when his hands were pierced for us? Foderunt manus, Psal. 22.16. They digged my hands and my feet. And they digged them so deep, that the very prints remained after his Resurrection, John 20. and their fingers were thrust into them for evidence sake. Some have thought that those scars remain still in his glorious body, to be shown at his second appearing; They shall see him whom they have pierced. That is improbable, but this is certain; There remains still an impression upon Christ's hands and his heart; the sealing and wearing of the elect there, as precious Jewels. For the same affections he had on earth, he hath carried up with the same body to heaven. He cannot there Pati, but he doth Conipati; Saul, why persecutest thou me? He that remembered us on the Cross, will not forget us in the Crown: as Pharaohs officer forgot

Joseph when he came to his preferment. For this that penitent malefactor prayed; Lord remember me when thou comest into thy Kingdom. As if he should say, now happily thou thinkest on us, because thou art in the same fashion and passion with us, suffering the same torment, subject to the same death; perhaps thou feelest more grievous things than we. But when this passion is over all, thy sufferings past; when thou art exalted to glory, when thou comest to thy Kingdom, Lord, remember me then. He did so, This day thou shalt be with me in Paradise. He remembers us now triumphing, so well as he did then suffering. The affection of love is noted to be most vehement in women: David spake of a transcendent and incomparable love, when he preferred it above the love of women. 2 Sam. 1.26. Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women: because they are naturally most tender and affectionate. Therefore Christ, that he might wonderfully love us, was made of a woman. Gal. 4.4. God sent his Son made of a woman. But because sin can harden the heart of any woman, therefore he took it of a pure virgin. And because every virgin is originally conceived in sin, to make it more pure and tender; he took it of a woman, of a virgin, and clear from all sin. Now this affection he took with him to heaven, and set it at the right hand of his Father there.

Thus Aditum per vulnera pandit: His side was opened, thorough that breach we have entrance. His heart was pierced, thorough that heart we have entrance: every wound is a passage. Who condemns? It is Christ that justifies. Who shuts? It is the Lord JESUS that opens. Death seems to dissolve this union, but doth not: for look what was Christ's condition in the grave, such is the condition of all his members. In death the soul of Christ was severed from his body, as far as heaven is from earth; for his body was laid in the Sepulcher, and his soul was in the hands of his Father: yet was neither of these separated from the God-head. Chrysostom gives a familiar similitude to explain this: A man holds a sheathed sword in his hand, he draws out the sword from the scabbard, holds the sword in one hand, the scabbard in the other; here the sword and the sheath are parted one from another, but neither of both are parted from the man, for he hath them both in his hands still. So the Deity took Christ's soul from his body when he died, as a sword drawn out of the scabbard, but held them both in his hands, and at his Resurrection put them together again: the soul was separated from the body, neither of these from the Lord. So it is with us; Death, whether natural or violent, may rend the soul from the body, it can take neither from Christ. But why then is not the body quickened in the grave by his virtue, and by the inseparability of this union? As when an arm is taken with a dead palsy, it receiveth little or no heat, sense, motion, or life from the body; yet it still remains a member of the body: because the flesh and bones abide still tied with ligaments to the body. Our bodies in the grave are but taken with a dead palsy, they are still members of Christ, and shall by his virtue be revived: when again the soul shall be wedded to the body, and both body and soul to everlasting glory.

Thus we are sure, if Christ be entered, that our entrance is easy. Es•h. 5.2. We have obtained fervent in the sight of the great King, his golden Scepter is held out unto us, let us enter, Hebr. 4.16. Go we boldly unto the throne of grace: there is no quarrel against us in heaven, all is peace through Christ; let us enter. It is the voice of the King himself, Matth. 25.23. Enter into the joy of your Lord. All excuses of our not entering into this kingdom are taken away. It is storied of a great Conqueror, that when he had vanquished his enemies, after a long siege laid to the Castle wherein they had fortified themselves; and had opened that inaccessible Palace; he sent some of his Garrisons to enter and keep it for him. They, ignorant of his victory, excuse themselves; There be Giants; he answers, I have slain them. There be Dragons about it; I have chained them fast. There is a deep trench, how should we pass over it? I have dammed it up. There are brazen-gates, strongly guarded▪ I have set them wide open. There wants room for so many as thou sendest: No, there is room enough: it is as large as a City; therefore go in, and possess it. So when God sends men to enter this Kingdom, they cowardly excuse themselves, as Israel did; There be Giants, the sons of Anak; there are Principalities and Powers to withstand us: CHRIST answers, I have slain them on my Cross. There is a great red Dragon; I have chained him fast enough, Revel. 20.2. The blessed Angel, with the key of the bottomless pit, and the great chain in his hand; hath bound the Dragon that old Serpent forever. But there is a Fortification of 〈◇〉 Law against us; saith Christ, I have scaled that Fort, performed full obedience •o the Law, and given satisfaction to the Justice of God for you. But there is a deep trench, a sea of glass before the Throne, Revel. 4.6. How shall we get over that to the Kingdom? John. 16.33. Be of good cheare: Ego vici mundum; I have overcome the world. But there is an high wall, and mighty gates, Revel. 21. too high to climb over, and too thick to break thorough. You need not attempt such a course, for the gates are set open, Vers. 25. The gates of it shall not be shut at all. But there wants room 〈◇〉 so many as thou invitest to this Kingdom. No, John. 14.2. In my Fathers house 〈◇〉 many mansions, there is room enough for you all. Thus is this Entrance ready 〈◇〉 us, God grant we may be ready for this Entrance.

Secondly, this Entrance consists in our Communion with the Holy Ghost, 2 Cor. 13 14. The communion of the Holy Ghost is with us. When two Princes would establish peace together, either sends his Ambassador to other, as a pledge or earnest of that truce. So God, to confirm an everlasting league between himself and our souls, sends his Lieger; the Holy Ghost to us; and we send our Lieger, our Savior Christ, and our Fidelitie with him, unto God: 2 Cor. 1.22. He hath sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts. An earnest seals the bargain, as a handful of corn is given to assure the whole field. We have begun to reap, therefore it is truly said, we have made our Entry. This Entrance consists in many felicities communicated to us by the Spirit, but I principally apply myself to that of Saint Paul, Rom. 14.17. The kingdom of God is not in meat and drink, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Paul calls it the Kingdom of God; so doth Peter in this place: Paul saith, it is participated in this life; so Peter, that we have here an Entrance into it. It must be understood of that fruition which we have of the Kingdom of God in this life; for otherwise why should he mention and exclude meats and drinks; Quae in Regno gloriae non erunt necessaria; Which have neither use nor place in heaven? Chrysostom and Haymo construe it thus; That meats and drinks are not in coelum introducentia, of any power to bring us to heaven. But Peter Martyr calls this Alienam interpretationem; for so neither is Righteousness any cause, 〈◇〉 beginning of this Kingdom. Saint Augustine mentions one Vrbicus, who by this Text would prove, that Christians ought to fast on the Saturday, the Jews Sabbath, because the Kingdom of Christ is not in meats and drinks. But then it would follow, that at other times, as on the Lord's day, or when we fast not, we should •pertain to the Kingdom of Christ. But to our purpose, if it consist in Righteousness, Peace, and Spiritual joy; then having these, we have an Entrance into it. If I seem too tedious in this instance, I answer with Saint Peter: Bonum est esse hic: adific... $\langle \phi \rangle$ tria tabernacula, Matth. 17.4. It is good for us to be here; let us build here three Tabernacles; One for Righteousness, another for Peace, and a third for Joy in the Holy Gho... Where can we be better than in the Kingdom of Jesus Christ.

For Righteousness: this is not to be understood of a particular Justice, Tribuere cuique suum; with Gorrhan. But it is the imputed righteousness of CHRIST, and our inherent righteousness proceeding from it. There is Iustitia operata pro nobis, A Righteousness wrought for us; whereby of evil men we are made good: and Iustitia operata in nobis; a Righteousness wrought in us, whereby of good men we are made better, Rom. 6.18. Being made free from sin, we become the servants of righteousness. So far then as we are righteous, so far have we made our entrance. Where our desires are, there ourselves are: but we desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ: therefore we are there with him; Vbi amamus, potius quàm ubi animamus; Whither our conversation is entered, ourselves are entered: but our conversation is in heaven, Phil. 3.20. Therefore we are there; not locally, but spiritually. Israelitico more vixisse, est in Israele esse; To live after the manner of Israel, is to be in Israel, saith a Father. If heaven be in us, then are we in heaven: but Gal. 2.20. We live not in ourselves, but Christ liveth in us; and the life which we now live in the flesh, we live by the faith of the Son of God. He that hath the faith of eternal life, hath eternal life in his faith, John. 5.24. He that believeth, is passed from death unto life. A Christian is like Jacob's Ladder, while his body, that lower part, stands on the ground, the top, his higher and better part, is in heaven: Ephes. 2.6. The Apostle speaks of a thing already done, He hath made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus. If a stranger be but come into your Suburbs, you say commonly, he hath entered the City. Sequitur vita Angelica, ubi praecessit Evangelica; If we now live like the Saints, we shall hereafter live like the Angels.

The next is Peace; Pax filia Iustitiae; Peace is the daughter of Righteousness, Rom. 5.1. Being justified by faith, we have peace with God: Peace and Righteousness, Invicem osculantur, Psal. 85.10. do kiss each other. But how is it said then, John. 16.33. In the world you shall have trouble? How can trouble and peace stand together? It is true indeed that the wicked will molest us, but we must still go forward. Navigation is not to be lost, because there are some sea-rocks: Doves forbear not flying home, because there are some Kites abroad in the air. God did not destroy all the Canaanites, lest the wild beasts should break in upon Israel. A country of India hath a law, that no man shall kill any Ravens; they are let alone to devour the carrions, which else would corrupt the air. We have disturbers enough; some, per pravitatem operis, by mischievous acts, against our lives, our wives, our children, our estates. Some, per falsitatem sermonis, by scandalous speeches; such are calumners, slanderers, flatterers. Others, per perversitatem cordis, by malicious envyings; as unfriendliness, suspicions, jealousies. Malice works mischief at home, and Envy sends it in from abroad. Summa petit livor ut ignis; Our happiness is their eye-sore. Envy hath Os sublime, a lofty look, but non in coelum tueri, not to look up unto heaven. There are Dogmata transalpina, Italian tricks, Revel. 13.1. There was a beast risen out of the Sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his heads the name of Blasphemy. A savage beast, that first deposeth Kings, and then exposeth them to death. A murdering point of religion; he that first invented it, was vir sanguinum, a bloody wretch. But from the Devil it came, and to the Devil let it go. These be our greatest peace-breakers; Facile est movere regnum, sed Dei solius quietare: These may easily breed commotion in a Kingdom, but God alone can pacify it.

I know there are home-bred mischiefs enow: and many an Ahab doth trouble our Israel. The pestilent Usurer, whose words are as soft as his Fox-furre, is a licking dog that bites sore. The Mouse told her young ones in the Fable, that they should not fear the loud crowing Cock, but the still Cat. Loud and lewd wantons disquiet us, but the oppressor doth more hurt sitting silently in his cash-house, than the other with all their noise in the streets. Caesar said, he feared not Anthony, because his heart was in his tongue; but Cassius, because his tongue was in his heart. If all this be, where is our peace? Yes, Patientia filia spei; Patience is the daughter of hope: in their wrongs is seen our patience, in our patience our hope, in our hope, our peace. We have peace in the world, though we have no peace with the world. Our troubles are seen without, our peace is felt within. Travelers write of a certain Island, they call De Fierro, where no fresh water is to be had: yet there is a certain tree in it, which drops so abundantly, that it satisfies all men and cattle of the Country. Our exigence and indigence are great, but there is an inward peace of conscience, that satisfies us all with the precious liquor of content. The Lord lays all that blustering wind, all the thunder and lightning of menaces, all the storms and tempests of persecution, with one sweet and peaceful shower of comfort. Thus though we have not yet Pacem coeli, that Peace of heaven; yet we have coelum Pacis, a heaven of peace, that is, assured remission of sins, and reconciliation to the God of peace. Satan, the World, Sin, all fight against us; that war is our peace. If the happiness of that place, as Augustine speaks, be Peace • eternal life, and eternal life in peace; then have we some present entrance into it, for the Peace of God that passeth all understanding, and surpasseth all commending, doth preserve us.

The last material is Joy in the HOLY GHOST; which ariseth partly from the hope of future reward, and partly from the sense of present comfort. For if there be such sorrow in the contrition of sin, what is the joy in the remission of sin? Rachel wept for her children, because they were not: we might have wept for our souls, because they were in worse case than if they had not been: No womb but a Rebecca's, feels those conflicts, Psalms. 6.6. Every night wash I my bed, saith David, with my tears: We might have so washed our eternal beds. Mary Magdalene wept, as if she poured forth water, not by drops, but by floods; Peter bitterly. This Winter lasted not long, the Spring-Sun shone out with beams of comfort. Now one dram of their present joy, did out-value all the loads of their former sorrow. Like men over-burdened, we feel such ease when the Cross of Christ takes all this weight from our shoulders. When sin is remitted, nothing afflicts, I am. 1.2. My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations. What, joy in trouble? Will the world believe you, Saint James? They answer, take you such joy, we will not meddle with it. Yes, he that prescribed it, proved it; he found affliction turn to his profit; he learned this benefit by good experience. As we say, Quae fuerunt laboriosa juventutis studia, haec sunt jucunda senectutis otia; Humane learning is men's pains in their youth, their recreation in their age. So what was the greatest sorrow to the heart penitent, proves the greatest joy to the heart pardoned. Who would not give the iron fetters of his thralldom, for the weight of gold in freedom? It is a false accusation, that the Word of God brings with it sullenness and discontent: for Psalms. 19.8. The Statutes of the Lord rejoice the heart. It is the tidings of joy, of great joy, of such joy, that the mountains skip like Rammes, and the little hills like young sheep. So far as this holy joy is entered into us, we have entered into the everlasting Kingdom of Jesus Christ.

Shall be ministered unto you.] I come to the third point; the Fitness or preparation: we are not beholding to ourselves for this entrance, it is ministered to us. Vt ne bonum quod, sic nec bonum per quod; as neither the good which we would obtain, so nor the good by which we do obtain, is our own. The means is ministered, therefore it is called the ministry of the Word, the ministration of the Sacraments. The apprehension of this means is ministered, for it is given to us to believe, Phil. 1.29. The object of this apprehension is ministered; Eternal life is the gift of God through Jesus Christ, Rom. 6.23.

Admire the mercy of God, which doth not only prepare a kingdom for us, but also prepare us for that kingdom. In the world there is no mercy to a sinner: it hath commonly been the fault even of men entered into this kingdom, to shut the door after them, and to keep out others, Luke 13.14. The Ruler of the Synagogue could not endure, that the people should be healed on the Sabbath day, Matt. 20.31. When the blind men cried to Christ; O Lord, thou Son of David, have mercy $\langle \diamond \rangle$ us: The multitudes rebuked them, because they should hold their peace. This is a malicious and uncharitable sin, when men are passed over the deep pit by a bridge, to pluck it up, and suffer none to follow them. Thou sayest, such a one is a refractory and dissolute offender; what then? therefore shut the Church door against him? this is thy mercy, but God's mercy is more; to repentance he ministers an entrance. Yes, saith the malevolent repiner; he seems to repent, but he is only humbled in hypocrisy: but what window hast thou into his heart? It is worse in thee to be so critical a censorer, than in him to be so hypocritical a sinner. The Lawyers say, Semel malus, semper malus: once bad, never good. The Cathari did use to excommunicate forever: if a man were once revolted, never to be received: but this was but a Puritan trick. Or if upon undeniable contrition, and humble submission, they admitted such a one to their outward service, yet they held him a reprobate: as the Gibeonites were permitted in the Tabernacle, but with disgrace. The Bruttii in Italy, for their revolting from the Romans to Hanibal, were upon their submission received again into the Roman protection, but might never be trusted for that trick. Paul says, 1 Cor. 6.9. Neither Idolaters, nor Adulterers, nor thieves, nor drunkards, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God. Yet was Solomon an Idolater, Mary Magdalene an adulteress, the malefactor on the Cross a thief, Zacchaeus an extortioner, Noah drunk: yet did all these enter into the kingdom of God. The Apostle adds, Verse 11. Such were ye; you were, but you are not: neither did they enter into heaven, Idolaters, or Adulterers, or Extortioners, but they became new creatures: they were washed, sanctified, justified, in the Name of the LORD JESUS and by the Spirit of GOD. Tu muta sententiam tuam, Deus mutabit suam. Do thou turn from wickedness to piety, GOD will turn from Judgment to mercy.

One of the Puritans told Constantine the great, the strictness of their opinions; to whom he answered, Erige tibi scalam, caelumque ascendito solus: set up thyself a ladder and go to heaven alone. The Jews were such absolute malecontents, grudging the Gentiles any mercy. This envious fault is too common, and there is still some of this Puritan blood that runs in many men's veins. That man thinks he loses, what another gains: it is not enough for him to have a place in heaven himself; but he must be Porter, or rather householder, to direct who shall come after him; to let in whom he please, his friends and acquaintance only, Act. 13.45. When the Jews saw that a great audience was at Paul's Sermon, they were filled with envy, and fell to contradiction and blasphemy, Luk 15.28. When the elder brother heard the sumptuous and joyful entertainment of his lost brother; he was angry, and would not go in. So Rome thinks that the Gospel's rising, must needs be her falling. Therefore she cannot endure like a sister to communicate with us, but like a tyrant to excommunicate us. They think it is with them and us, as the Poets imagined it to be with Castor and Pollux; when the one lived, the other died. Or as when the day comes, the night must end: or as two buckets in one well; one dryeth while the other dippeth. Or as the Jews might fear, when Agrippa built Cesarea, and removed all the ornaments of Israel thither; that the flourishing of that City would be the drooping of Jerusalem. Envy is sick, if her neighbor be well.

But let this malicious heart hear God's argument and eviction. Is thine eye evil, because I am good? This was the Prophet Jonah's discontent. chap. 4.1. When the Lord would not destroy them according to his threatening; It displeased Jonah exceedingly. God means to spare Nineveh, Jonah would not have it so. God thought it best, the man is of another mind. Here is an opposition of two, but the match is very unequal. I am certainly persuaded, that no man is like to gain much by such bargains. The Poeter is on the one side, and the pot-sheardon the other. Fire, thunder, lightning, says it shall be so, flax and tow says, it shall not be so. Yet is weakness angry that he may not bear away the bucklers. Therefore he proceeds to argue the matter with God, Ver. 2. But as Tully said of Romulus pretending a Law to kill his brother Remus; It was a fault by the leave of Romulus: so if Jonah pretend reason why God should overthrow penitent sinners, this was a fault by the leave of Jonah. The Disciples were not free from this error, Matth. 19.13. When they brought little children to Christ for his blessing; the Disciples rebuked them. They that have part in the kingdom, grudge it to others. Only Jesus spoke for them: it is his goodness to answer for that is not able to answer for it self. Suffer them and forbid them not: he doubles his charge, both affirmatively, suffer them: and negatively, forbid them not. As in the kings writ there is not only a Capias, but a Nullatenus omittas. Abundance cautela non nocet. Let them come unto me: If I have given them a kingdom, will you not let them come to the King? Let this teach us to yield a joyful consent to God's doings: we must not dislike his will though it be to destroy: but when it is sweetened with mercy, let us vehemently love it. When Joshua told Moses of Eldad and Medads prophesying in the campe, Numb. 11.28. My Lord Moses, forbid them: he answers, Enviest thou for my sake? would God that all the Lord's people were Prophets, and that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them. When Paul was called to be an Apostle, those Pillars envied not, but gave him the right hands of fellowship, Gal. 2.9. They that went to heaven by the bloody way of Martyrdom, prayed for others an easier passage even their persecutors and murderers had their prayers. As Fulgentius notes on Stephen and Paul; whether Stephen went before slain by the stones of Paul thither Paul followed after helped by the prayers of Stephen. Let this comfort us in the mercies of our God; whosoever grudgeth, whatsoever hindereth, the Lord doth minister an entrance unto us.

Abundantly. I come to the latitude or broadness of this passage. Faith and a good conscience finds an easy entrance to blessedness. Abundantly, It is demanded then, how the word of God makes the passage so straight, and so narrow, Luk. 13.24. Strive to enter in at the strait gate; for narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it. The answer is easy, the gate is not narrow in it self, but in respect of the unqualified enterers. It is too low for lofty and aspiring ambition, too narrow for impostumed pride, too strait for gowtie covetousness: but to faith it is broad. As it is Speciosa for the gloriousness, so Spaciosa for the easynesse: it is both a Beautiful gate, and a Bountiful gate. But this bounty is only to the poor, Luk. 1.53. He filleth the hungry with good things, and the rich he hath sent empty away. Rich men scorn to be beggars, their dition admits no such condition. This gate is open, not Potentibus, to mighty usurpers; but Potentibus, to humble petitioners. The Lord is rich in mercy: to all? No, but to all that call upon him faithfully. And apud eum copiosa redemptio with him is plenteous redemption; it is all one, abundant entrance. But, Matth. 11.12. The kingdom of heaven suffers violence: true, but it loves that violence that it suffers: as GOD was well pleased to be overcome of Jacob. This violence doth not take away the facility of entrance, but rather notes the faculty of them that enter.

It is true, that there are many oppositions, yet is there still a sufficient entrance. We may say of it, as Saint Paul speaks of his occasion of preaching the Gospel, 1 Cor. 16.9. Lata porta, sed multi adversarii: a great door and effectual is opened, but there are many adversaries. Saint Paul himself was a little feared with the apprehension of this difficulty; when he prayed thrice against those buffetings of Satan, 2 Cor. 12.9. But he was confirmed in the Lord's answer; My grace is sufficient for thee. Indeed flesh and blood, in the natural corruption of it, cannot enter the kingdom of God, 1 Cor. 15.50. no more than a cable rope can be brought through a needles eye. While it is whole it cannot pass; but untwine it, and lay it thread by thread, and then you may easily draw it all through. If the worldling would untwist his riches by charity, and the sinner untwist his sins by repentance, they may abundantly enter. There is an Abundanter that shuts many out; abundance of worldly riches, and lusts of covetousness: for, Luk. 12.15. Mans life consisteth not in this abundance. And if not his natural life, much less doth his spiritual life, consist in it. There is an Abundanter that lets many in, Tit. 3.6. It is the grace of God which is abundantly shed on us through Jesus Christ.

But our Apostle himself makes it a difficult thing to be saved, 1 Pet. 4.18. If the righteous scarcely be saved, &c. The Apostle doth not intend any difficulty in respect of God's election; but in regard of our affliction; because through a fiery trial, and through many tribulations we must enter into the kingdom of God, Act. 14.22. So scarcely saved, that by reason of their miseries they seem to the world not to be saved at all. Through much tribulation, they must enter, but howsoever they shall enter. This doth not hedge up the way, but enlarge it: Stephen saw great happiness by Christ in his peace, but under the stones he saw heaven it self open, Heb. 12.6. God doth receive, not reject, the son whom he doth scourge. Dignus amore non eris, si dignus castigatione non censeris: if God do not think thee worthy of his rod, he will never think thee worthy of his Crown. Doth any man find the way to blessedness difficult? himself is in fault. Doest thou complain the gate is shut? No, but thou art not habited for entrance. None might come to Ahasuerus court in sackcloth, but they that come so are best welcome to God. It is said of the virtuous wife, Pr. 31.21. that all her household are clothed in Duplicibus, in double garments. All gods servants have double garments; a black mourning garment of penitence, and a white robe of Innocence. Either of these must be vestis Talaris, down to the heels, even to the end of their life.

If men be foul and impure, no marvel though there be strait entrance; for there is no entrance, Revel. 21.27. Is no wise shall any unclean thing enter into it. But otherwise, Invia virtutis nulli est via. Art thou wrap'd in thy sins, and safest the passage is narrow? It is abundant, but not to thee. Unloose thy conscience by repentance, and those everlasting doors shall give thee entrance abundantly to the king of glory. It may seem hard at the first, because there is weeping to part with beloved sins; much ado to keep the eye from Sodom; but endeavor, and thou shalt find it easier, and easier. Capta vides sero Pergama, capta tamen, Revel. 22.25. The gates of it shall not be shut by day: by day, well; but yet they may be shut by night: neither, for there shall be no night there. The Prophet intreats God to Spread the heavens as a Curtain: now he did spread them wide, when Publicans and harlots were converted, and did enter into the kingdom of heaven. I conclude.

This abundant entrance is given to us by CHRIST: our own debts did make it narrow, his payment hath made it wide, Phil. ver. 10. As Paul pleaded to Philemon for Onesimus, so CHRIST to his father for us. I beseech thee; CHRIST mediates, intercedes for us. For my Son, saith Paul; for my children, saith Christ. Whom I have begotten; CHRIST hath begotten us again of water and the Spirit; not only In my bonds: but in my blood. Which in time past was to thee unprofitable, but now profitable to thee and me. So CHRIST; they were, O father, useless and rebellious enemies, but now I have made them useful and profitable for thy glory. Verse 12. *Whom I have sent again: we were all run-aways from God and goodness, CHRIST hath sent us back again. Thou therefore receive him, that is in mine own bowels. Receive them oh Father: shut them not out, but open thy everlasting doors of mercy to entertain them; and that so near, as unto thine own bowels, John. 17.21. As thou art in me, and I in thee, so let them be one in us, Verse 16. Not now as a servant, but above a servant, a brother beloved, specially to me. I have made them a degree above servants, even friends, John. 15.15. I call you not servants, but friends. Yea, a degree above friends; Brothers to me, Hebr. 2.11. He is not ashamed to call us, brethren; Beloved to me, whom I bought with my own blood. Verse 17. If thou count me therefore a partner, receive him as myself. As I of my glory, so let them participate of our glory, John. 17.22. The glory which thou gavest me, I have given them. If thou count me a partner, that think it no robbery to be equal with thyself; receive them as myself; admit them to thy own blessedness. Ver. 18. If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account: so saith CHRIST, Si quid debent, ego solvam; whatsoever they are indebted to thy Justice, I will pay it: put it on mine account, take my reckoning on the Cross for it. Verse 19 I Paul have written it with mine own hand, I will repay it. I JESUS have written it on the paper of the Cross, with the Ink of my blood, the pen being a spears point; I will pay all. And his payment was good, who had Potentiam ad satisfaciendum, and Iustitiam ad satisfaciendum, power to suffer enough, and righteousness to satisfy enough. All this was to give us an abundant entrance: what shall we then do, but as David, Psal. 116.13. I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the Name of the Lord. Hath Christ made us way? let us then enter in, and bless the Name of the Lord.*

Into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Some copies have read Dei & domini, &c. so the vulgar latin. Idacius Clarus against Vimadus the Arian, from hence proves, Idem esse Patris & Filii Imperium, that the Son hath the same kingdom with the Father: and that in nothing he is unequal or inferior to him. Ambrose so reads it, and from it demonstrates against the Arians, Unitatem Substantiae aeterni Filii cum Patre. For every kingdom divided against it self, is brought to dissolution, Matth. 12.25. If the kingdom of the Father, and of the Son, were divided, how could they stand? If any man should distinguish a kingdom of Christ only, and so conceive a difference betwixt God's power and Christ's; Is tamen fatebitur; yet that man shall confess that Christ hath a kingdom, and that an everlasting kingdom. But how can his kingdom be called everlasting, when as it is said, 1 Cor. 15.24. that Christ shall deliver up the kingdom to God the father? and Ver. 28. the son also himself shall be subject to him? we must know that God did commit the government of the world to Christ, and therefore he is called by Divines, Patris vicarius: not that the father could be idle, but Christ was his Counselor. Now this government given to Christ's mediatorship shall end: his mediation and interceding office shall cease. He shall reign no longer as the Son of man in the midst of his enemies; but he shall reign over them being vanquished, as God. Through the subjection of his human nature, the glory of his God-head shall more fully appear, such and the lame it was before eternity, neither shall this diminish, but rather increase the glory of his humanity; when we see it personally united to the son of God forever. Thus we are sure that Christ hath himself, and will give us, an everlasting kingdom: for the love of GOD is from eternity in respect of our predestination, and unto eternity in respect of our glorification.

In this Palace or court I consider two things; the Royalty of it, in that it is a kingdom: and the Perpetuitie of it, in that it is an everlasting kingdom. Which give it two excellencies above all other Principalities. First, in regard of the Majesty which it hath from the king, who is above all kings. Non locus hominem, sed homo locum: the place makes not the man, but the man makes the place. Neither doth the kingdom honor Christ, but Christ honors the kingdom. Next, in respect of the Immutability: the honor of earthly Princes is often laid in the dust; but this is an Eternal kingdom. The Royalty of Christ is absolute, undependant, universal, and everlasting. Luk. 1.33. He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end. The Angel assures the virgin that Christ shall have the Throne of David; And therein he shall reign forever, And of his kingdom is no end. This 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, And, is not redundant, but expository. Here be two terms that signify an interminable thing; For ever, and No end: a double universalitie, of Place, and of Time. Nullus terminus, ad Tempus; it is For ever: Nullus terminus, ad locum, it hath no limits, but extends over all; No end.

Now it is fit that he should be so honored, that was so humbled. Our 〈◇〉 brought him exceeding low, let his own righteousness exalt him exceeding high Mirror Deum in mero; 〈◇〉 ip̄ tentem in cunabulis. He that thundereth in the clouds was lying, perhaps crying, in the clouts. He had a kingdom even while he fell and Pilate could not undo, what he had ignorantly done; not alter his Title; Jesus of Nazareth king of the Jews, John. 19.14. He saith unto the Jews, Behold your King. They spake truth in their mockerie, Mark. 15.18. When they began to salute him, Hail king of the Jews. If his kingdom had depended upon their lips, it had soon perished with himself. For now they gave him Palms, and presently Thorns: Once Ecce Rex noster, behold our King: and again, Non habemus Regem nisi Caesarem, John. 19.15. We have no king but Caesar. Simeon, told his mother, Luk. 2.34. This child is set for the rising and fall of many in Israel, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ; and for a sign that shall be spoken against. He shall be set: he was set for, set against, set at aught, but not set by. He was set, by intention for all, by occasion against many, by apprehension for many, by permission for a sign that should be contradicted. But he that was a Lamb, is now a Lion: Flos campi fit ferrea virga: qui lux radians, ignis consumens: that shining light is also a consuming fire. He that was a servant, is a king: not indeed of this world is his kingdom. John. 18.36. My kingdom is not of this world: in it, not of it.

Here we may well consider these points; the Supremacy of the king, the Security of the subjects, and the eternal felicity of the kingdom.

For the former, by comparing earthly things with heavenly, we may observe the excellency of that Regiment in which we stand: it is a kingdom; and the Dignity of the governor, he is an eternal king. Unto the king eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honor and glory forever. All inferior kingdoms are derived from him, and subordinate to him. Non eripit mortalia, qui regnat caelestia: he doth not take away temporal kingdoms, that gives an eternal kingdom. He who is the blessed and only Potentate, the king of kings, and Lord of Lord's; is content to distribute some honor among certain men. Of whom it is too presumptuous to say, Divisum imperium cum Jove Caesar habet: but Imperium summum sub Jove Caesar habet. The Papists indeed more esteem Monachum quam Monarcham: with them Magus is more than Magnus; the Priest is above the King, But there is no greater calling under heaven, than a King. Rex omnibus major, Deo solo minor. The King is above all, only under the Lord: he hath no Peere in his dominions. The power of a Master over his servants, of a Parent over his children, of a Shepherd over his Lambes, of a Prince over his subjects, of a good man over himself, all these concur in a good King, all are eminent in our great King JESUS CHRIST. John 10.34. I have said, ye are gods. There is Deus naturaliter, a God by nature, the one only God himself. Dii opinative, gods in opinion, such are Idols: Dii participative, gods by participation, such are kings. Deus est immortalis Rex, Rex est mortalis deus: God is an immortal king, the king is a mortal god. In Greek 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 signifies a foundation; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , People: hence comes 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , a King; the foundation of his people. But CHRIST hath made us all kings, Revel. 1.6. Spiritually, not civilly. Rom. 13.1. Let every soul, be subject unto the higher powers. Spiritual kings have a dominion over sin, temporal kings over them. Princes and other men are Pares in esse naturali, impares in esse morali: equal in regard of natural being, unequal in regard of civil and moral being. The common golden coin, the golden Candlestick, the golden Snuffers, the golden Chaines, and the golden Crown; are all made out of one lump of the same Gold; yet is the golden Crown more honored than the rest. The common coin is the People: the golden Candlestick that bears the light, is the Minister: the golden Snuffers, to cleanse those lights if they burn dim and foul, are the subordinate Magistrate. The golden Chaines are the Nobles for ornament, the Senators for government. The last and best is the golden Crown; this the King only wears, and all the rest are subject to it. One piece of gold is under another in value, all are under the Sovereign, the golden Crown. This world is the possession of men, men the possession of kings, kings the possession of God. Psal. 18.51. Great deliverances giveth he to His King: he is the Lord's King. There is a double relation, between the Kings God, and God's King. All men are his by a common right, but kings by a special prerogative; Touch ‹ϕ› Mine anointed.

Thus by comparative and ascending degrees, we come to perceive the greatness of our Sovereign, JESUS CHRIST. He made Kings on earth to have honor above all men, that himself might have the honor above all Kings. O• neighbors of Rome cannot endure the Supremacy of Princes: the Pope is the man. Kings must be his vassals, to hold his stirrup, to bear his canopy; to be exposed, deposed, disposed at his will; if they be not composed to his will. All royalty is confined to that Chair, which the lateran Counsel calls, Regale Pontific• Romanorum genus; the Royal race of Roman Bishops. His Titles are, Christia• reipublicae Monarcha, Pontificae omnipotentiae assertor invictissimus. But these Attributes that he would have, ascribe that to him which he should have, and prove him Antichrist for his labor: whom Paul says we shall know by this mark. 2 Thes. 2.4. that he exalteth himself ‹in non-Latin alphabet›; above all that is called God, or is worshipped; above all Augusteities. To manage outward affairs was ever Ius regale, the Kings right. Solomon the King deposed Abiathar the Priest; would it not be strange now if the Priest should depose the King? Optatus against the Donatists; S•per Imperatorem non est nisi Deus, qui Imperatorem fecit: above the King is none but God, who makes Kings. Strabo writes of a high Priest in Pontus that wore a Crown, whose subjects were called Hieroduli; but he was a Pagan. The Romists will be Pagans, Donatists, Anabaptists; anything, what you will, so they be no subjects. They that ascribe so much to the Fathers, me thinks should give credit to Saint Chrysostom. Were he an Apostle, a Prophet, an Evangelist, a Bishop, a Priest, a Monk? saith he. But say they, among all these he names not the Pope. Why, is the Pope no Priest, no Bishop? well, let us hear him on; Sive quisquis tandem fuerit, whether cardinal, or Pope; what cloth soever his coat be made of; the King is above him. Nicephorus writes of a King that going in his Barge, his Crown fell into the water: a bargeman leapt in after it, and taking it up, he put it on his head as he swam till he recovered the Barge. The King gave him a talent for saving it, but cut off his head for wearing it. Our Seminaries have done more than reach at the Crown to save it, for they have endeavored to steal it: and, if they were suffered, they would sink it, drown it, destroy it. But saith CHRIST, Give unto Caesar the things that are Caesars, and to God the things that are God's: Let Caesar have his kingdom, and let CHRIST have his kingdom. We distinguish between the eternal GOD, and the temporal LORD: but we obey the temporal LORD, for his sake that is the eternal God. And certainly he that refuseth obedience to the temporal King, hath yet made no gracious entrance into the everlasting kingdom of Jesus Christ.

Thus by degrees of comparison, and by arising from things inferior to things higher; if a kingdom of substitution under Christ be so great, what is the eminence of Christ's own Supremacy? Kings are above other men, Christ is above all Kings, above all things. Now in the second place let us consider our own safety and security under him. We have a King to rule us; a King of Majesty, a King of mercy. It is an happiness to have a King: as the people said to David, 2 Sam 18.3. Thou art worth ten thousands of us; and thou art the light of Israel. Any

King is better than no King, Tyranny is better than Anarchy. Judge. 17.6. In those days there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was right in his own eyes.. In the reign of a bad King, no man can do the good he would; but under no King every man doth what evil he list. The Israelites would have a King: their very first was a tyrant; yet were they then in better case than when they had none. Christians are safe, they have a King. It is a greater happiness, that they have a good King: a evil Prince is a plague to the people for their sins; Vt malos puniat malus, that one evil man may punish another. Rom. 13.4. He is a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doth evil. They hurt much by their unjust commands, but more by their bad examples. For the Common-wealth, like a fish, first rots at the head. It was the King of Syria's charge to his Captains; Fight neither against small nor great, but only against the King of Israel. Skanderbeg would aim at none but the General: he said that he never knew body could move without a head. A Prince falls like a great tree, that quasheth down all the under-wood about it. Sometimes the people sins, and the Prince smarts. God charged Moses to Take the heads of the people, and to hang them up before the Lord, Numb. 25.4. The hand steals, the throat drinks, the head pays for it. Such was our King to us: we offended, he was plagued. Isaiah 53.6 We like sheep have gone astray, and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all. It is reported of a certain King, who knowing that either himself must perish, or all his people; disguised himself like a mean soldier, entered the thickest troupes of the enemy, invited danger, and was entertained with death. So Christ our King, having the choice put to him, that either himself must die, or the whole world perish; disguised himself in the humble habit of mortal flesh, for otherwise they would not have killed him. 1 Cor. 2.8. For if they had known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. Sometime the King sins, and the people smarts: Delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi; David commits the sin in numbering the people, and the people are plagued. The head plots mischief, the back or neck pays for it. To a Common-wealth, the King is either the greatest blessing, or the greatest curse: Therefore, Minimum libere decet, cui plurimum licet; a man should not show himself in the confines and extremity of his power: to can do ill, and will not, is noble. But we are under such a King, as can protect us from evil, and will supply us with good. Some doubt of his power: Mark 9.22. Si potueris; If thou canst do anything, help us. Others doubt of his will, Matth. 8.2. Si volueris; If thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. But his power is infinite: Psal. 135.6. Whatsoever the Lord pleased, that did he in heaven, in earth, in the seas, and in all deep places. He can do, what he will do, everywhere. All places there named, but Purgatory; perhaps he can do nothing there, but leaves all that work for the Pope. His mercy is also infinite: it was but hyperbolic of Trajan, it is true of Christ; Citius desinit vivere, quàm benefacere; He can sooner cease to be, than to be good to his. It was nobly said of Augustus; that when he had done no good to his subjects any day; Hodie non regnavi; I have not been a King today: there is no such day passeth by our King, JESUS CHRIST.

Now lastly, let us come more narrowly to examine the Felicitie of this Kingdom: Cujus lex veritas, Rex Trinitas, modus aeternitas The Kingdom of heaven is taken divers ways: sometimes for the life of the Just, under the similitude of the marriage of men, and of the carriage of men. So Matth. 22.2. The kingdom of heaven is like unto a certain King, that made a marriage for his son: The elect are the guests bidden to the wedding; Matth. 25.1. The kingdom of heaven is likened unto ten Virgins: Not that only Virgins shall enter the kingdom of heaven. For as Paul says, Gal. 6.15. In Christ, neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, •ut a new creature. So, neither marriage is anything, nor virginity, but chastity. Chrysostom, who was a great admirer of virginity, could say; Primus gradus castita•is est sincera virginitas; secundus, fidele conjugium. The first degree of chastity is •potlesse virginity; the next, faithful wedlock. Christ was conceived in virginity, •nd borne in marriage; to show that Coelibarus is not only coelo beatus; whether single or married, if faithful, they are admitted to this kingdom. Sometimes the kingdom of heaven is taken for the Church militant, mixed with good and bad, Matth. 13.24. The kingdom of heaven is like unto a field, that had in it both wheat •nd tares, verse. 47. The kingdom of heaven is likened to a net, that gathered of every •inde. In a Kingdom there be divers subjects, some true, and some false: so in the Church, some be loyal, and others hypocrites. Therefore the course of Christ in •is kingdom is such, as good Magistrates should take in Common-wealths; Vt bo•i invitentur praemiis, ut mali dent poenas: to reward the good, and to punish the wicked. In this present state, among men the best are regarded least. Jacob is bound prentice, while profane Esau rides a hunting. But in the future estate, Major serviet minori; The greater shall serve the less. Sometimes it is taken for Christ himself: Matth. 18.23. The kingdom of heaven is likened to a certain King. Regnum est ipse Rex. Tuum est regnum; Thine is the Kingdom, the Power, and the Glory: In respect of that kingly order whereby he governs it; Mat. 20.1. The kingdom of heaven is like unto a man; for Christ Quatenus homo; as man, is also a King. In that state he shall Judge, in which he stood before a Judge: he bought that right and title in his manhood. Now can there be a sweeter government, than under our Savior; that purchased his subjects with his blood? He was humbled, therefore, Philip. 2.9. God hath exalted him, and given him a Name which is above every name. Lastly, it is taken for the glory of Christ in heaven. Dost thou love riches? seek it where it can never be lost. Dost thou love honor? seek it where no baseness is. Dost thou love health? seek it where no sickness is. Dost thou love life? seek it where no death is. Bernard describes the glory of this Kingdom, from that allegory, Revel. 12.1. Corona duodecim Stellarum; The Crown of twelve Stars. Into this little ring let us bring the discourse of that infinite glory.

1 Let the first Star be; Memory without forgetfulness: here we forget what we should remember, and remember what we should forget. We forget benefits, and remember injuries. There we shall have a perfect memory: Gregory sticks not to say; even of our very passed miseries and faults: But how? We shall remember them, not with sorrow to distract us, but with joy of deliverance to confirm us: it shall be our sense, not our offense. When we remember how wretchedly we once lay, under the torment of such a sickness, under the tyranny of such a foe, and which was worst, under the pressure of such a sin; and now find ourselves delivered and safe forever; how unspeakable will be our joy? Olim haec meminiss. se juvabit.

2 The second Star is, Reason without obscurity, understanding without error. 1 Cor. 13.12. Now we see thorough a glass darkly, but then face to face: Now we know in part, but then we shall know even as we are known. The mist which sin brought over this intellectual light, shall be removed. 1 Cor. 2.9. Eye hath not seen, nor care heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. As Saint Augustine says, Fide non capitur, &c. Faith cannot contain it, nor hope comprise it, nor charity comprehend it: it transcendeth the reach of all our thoughts. Acquiri potest, aestimari non potest: it may be obtained, it never can be sufficiently esteemed.

3 The third Star is; a perfect will of Good without perturbation. This is a main difference betwixt Paradise and Heaven. There was Posse non peccare, a power not to sin: here is Non posse peccare, no power at all to sin. The regenerate man on earth hath a will not to offend, shall have there no will nor possibility to offend. Here he hath desiderium quietis, a desire of rest; there quietem desiderii, the rest of desire.

4 The fourth Star is; the Clarity and Impassibilitie of the body. Phil. 1.21. Christ shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able to subdue all things unto himself. This mutatio• is not by any propenseness of nature, but by the operation of Christ. This consi• in four properties; in Claritie, in Subtlety, in Impassibilitie, in Incorruption. For Claritie, Dan. 12.3. They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as the Stars forever. Christ as the Sun, it is enough for us to be as Stars. 1 Cor. 15.41. There is one glory of the Sun, another of the Moon, another glory of the Stars. Christ the Sun, gives glory to the Moon; the Moon, that is, the Church, ha• a great glory: and the same glory is to every particular Star. When Christ w• transfigured, His face did shine as the Sun, and his raiment was white as the light. Such glory shall our bodies have, as is able to lighten the darkest corners of hell. (◊) sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory. For subtlety and agility; Secundum mobilitatem cogitationum nostrarum; It shall be made moveable according to the quickness of our thoughts. As CHRIST'S body being risen, was suddenly out of one place into another. Luke 24.36. As they spake, he stood in the midst of them. Christ says, They shall be like the Angels, who are said to have wings, in respect of their speedy removal. 1 Cor. 15.44. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body: a spiritual body is as quick as a Spirit it self. For impassibilitie; Quamvis spissum & solidum, tamen impenetrabile; Though it retains solidity, yet it remains invulnerable. Every thing now vexeth it; a sword, an ague, a thorn; then no violence can dint or daunt it. Though the body stood in the midst of an army, it could not be hurt. The violent, murderous, and massacring Cannon, which now makes a lane where it spits; cannot then wound our impenetrable breasts. Here our bodies have heaviness and weakness, there lightness and power. It is sown in weakness, it is raised in power: so that it can powerfully move from place to place. It shall be strong as a spirit, and one spirit is able to conquer many men. For Incorruptibleness; the body is so corrupt now, that it is fain to have Animam pro sale, the soul instead of salt to preserve it. Then it shall be clear, and shine pure as the Sun, which at that time shall also exceed it self in glory. This is the glory of the body, which is but the body of glory: besides the soul of glory, which is the glory of the soul.

5 The fifth Star is, the Renovation of all things, Revel. 21.1. I saw a new heaven, and a new earth. Not that there is an abolition of the old, but an alteration of them from being old. Manebunt vetera, non ut vetera; The same things may remain, but not in the same state. Fire shall purge out the corruption, and all things shall be restored to their first majesty; Vbi nec fallit quisquam, nec fallitur; No man can deceive, or be deceived.

6 The sixth Star is, universal charity without envy. Everyone shall be a King, and possess a kingdom, yet shall there be no repining. Non minuitur copia possessorum, nec fit angustior numerositate cohaerendum, Aug. Though it be imparted, it shall not be impaired: the number of heirs shall not impeach the Inheritance. Tanta multis, quanta paucis: tanta singulis, quanta omnibus; That glory shall be to all, that is to some: everyone shall have as much as any one. An earthly kingdom like the Zodiac, admits but one Sun: in this all are Kings, and everyone hath his crown. 2 Tim. 4.8. There is laid up for me a crown; and not for me only, but for all those that love the appearing of Jesus Christ. Nobile perpetua caput amplectente corona. Revel. 4.4. About the Throne were four and twenty seats, and on the seats four and twenty Elders, that had on their heads crowns of gold. By which number is signified the whole Court of the Saints. On earth the ambition of a Crown brooks no rivalry: breach of faith to get kingdoms is held no sin; but this shall never get the kingdom of heaven. A kingdom made Absalom a Parricide in will, Abimelech a Fratricide in deed; that he murdered seventy persons, his brethren, the sons of Ierubbaal, upon one stone. This hath made some traitors to their dear friends, that would have died for them: to their dearest friend that hath died for them: friends to their enemy, Satan, that will torment them: they are worthy of kingdoms that pay so dear for them. Here it is otherwise; different glory, perfect charity. In my Fathers house there are many mansions. Now saith Gregory, If there were no difference in degrees of glory, Christ would have spoke of one mansion, rather than of many. They received every man a penny. But he says, Many mansions, because there are distinct orders of Saints: and One penny, because Vnica cunctorum gloria; there is but one and the same glory of them all. In terra distinctio operum, in coelo discretio dignitatum; On earth there is a difference of works, in heaven there shall be a difference of honors. So much as one doth here excel another in grace, so much he shall there excel him in glory. But howsoever there be not to all the same dignity, there shall be the same felicity. There can be no repining at another's more glorious clearnes, where shall reign in all one most gracious dearnes.

7 The seventh Star is, the common and universal joy, an effect of the former: where all love others in pureness, all rejoyce in their happiness. Besides, the joy in our own salvation, it shall be also unspeakable in the salvation of others. Not only of wife, children, or former friends: for there all shall be equally dear and near unto us. What abundance of joy is this? When Quod in se quisquam non acceperit, hic se accepisse in alio exultet; It shall rejoyce a man to behold that measure in another, which he hath not in himself.

8 The eight Star, is a love of ourselves, Tantummodo propter Deum; Only for God's honor. The glory of God shall so swallow us up, that it cannot be so great for our own salvation, as for his glory in our salvation. It is much on earth, if a man love God for his own sake; but in heaven he shall love himself for God's sake. It shall ravish him with delight, to see God honored in himself, whose Image he shall then bear in perfection.

9 The ninth Star, is the Beatifical vision of God, when there shall be no marks to keep us from the Mount of the Lord, no bounds to separate us from that border of glory. When it shall no more be said, Whosoever toucheth the mount, shall surely die. But the contrary; Whosoever toucheth the mount, shall surely live. The sight was then so terrible, that Moses said,

I exceedingly quake and fear. This sight shall be so comfortable, that everyone shall say, I exceedingly rejoice and love. We shall see the Deity so glorious; even the Lamb advanced in our flesh to be one Person with God. How we love to behold the majesty of Princes, in all the state, magnificence, and pomp of their Courts? But this heavenly vision for one hour is worth a thousand years speculation of their glory. This is the Diamond of the Ring, the precious stone of the gate, the brightest Star of all, to behold the glorious presence of God.

10 The tenth Star is, the Fullness of pleasures. Psal. 16.11. In thy presence is the fullness of joy, and at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore. Festivitas sine tæbe, tranquillitas sine labe, ferenitas sine nube. Corrupt flesh reasons; what is there to do in heaven? The lascivious thinks there is no other heaven, but amongst his fair Paragons: O poor and unblest understanding! what is a mortal piece of painted dust, to those glorious bodies out-shining the Sun in his greatest splendor? These we shall there see, these love, admire, and rejoice in forever. There is not a thought can bring other than pleasure. Electos in futuro tria manent: Externa societas, interna satietas, aeterna jucunditas, Bern. Look we outwardly, there is joy in the society: look we inwardly, there is joy in our own felicity: look we forward, there is joy in the eternity. This is the chain of delights; Certa securitas, secunda tranquillitas, tranquilla jucunditas, jucunda foelicitas, foelix aeternitas; There is a secure safeness, a safe peacefulness, a peaceful pleasantness, a pleasant happiness, an happy everlastingness.

11 The eleventh Star, is the continual praising of God for his glory; Blessing and glory, and thanksgiving and honor, power and might, be to our God forever and ever. This is Perpetuum carmen, an everlasting song. From new Moon to new Moon, and from one Sabbath to another, all shall worship the Lord. We shall incessantly sing to God in the Temple, which is God himself the Temple. I saw no temple in it: for the Lord God Almighty, and the Lamb, are the Temple of it. There shall be no weariness of this merriness. How meanly soever we judge, and rarely practice this duty on earth; there is no joy or delight in heaven shall more content us.

12 The last Star of this Crown, is the last passage of my Text; which is the eternity of all, it is an Everlasting kingdom. The Monarchies of the Chaldeans, Persians, Grecians, Romans, those four tyrannous beasts. Subversa corruerunt, are brought to nothing. Vers. 12. Their dominion was taken away; but verse. 14. His dominion is $\langle \diamond \rangle$ everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away: and his kingdom that, which shall not be destroyed. The Heathen rage, and the Kings oppose; but let them do their worst. T• have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion. The gates of hell (that is hell-power, for their gates had strong fortifications: or hell-policy, for they held their council in the gates) shall not prevail against this kingdom. Ye shall not sow, and others reap, ye shall not plant vineyards, and others drink the wine; this was promised as a blessing to Israel. But this Land of Promise is sure, and abides forever. Why doest thou fear or doubt, because thou seest earthly kingdoms to perish? Ideo tibi coeleste promissum est, ne cum terrenis perires. Therefore is the kingdom of heaven promised to us, that we might not perish with earthly kingdoms. This is the Crown of twelve Stars, wherewith the God of mercy crown all our heads in the everlasting kingdom of JESUS CHRIST.

VERSE 12. Wherefore J will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things, though you know them, to be established in the present truth.

I Acknowledge to your comfort, that you know and perform in some measure these commended duties; and have made a good progress in them. Yet though you be confirmed, I will not so give you over, and leave you to yourselves; for there is danger of relapsing, but will diligently solicit your memories, and incite your affections, to a more zealous observation of them. I do not confirm you, as if you were wavering; but only admonish you, as being established in the truth. The gravity and weight of the business requires it: in a matter of such consequence, admonitions are never superfluous. Abundance cautela non nocet; Therefore let it not seem tedious unto you.

This verse is spent upon the Pastor and the people: and therefore to be applied to the Preacher and the Parish. I will not be negligent to remember you of these things; there is the Ministers duty. You must know them, and be established in the truth; there is your duty. It is easily distinguished into the Pastors Informing, and the Peoples Performing: his Preaching, and their Practising: his Diligence, and their Obedience.

In the former we may note his

- Piety; desirous to bring them to the prementioned kingdom.
- Vigilancie; admitting no neglect of their souls; what discouragements soever affront him.
- Modestie; professing, that he doth rather remember them, than teach them.
- Fidelity; he will do it Always, without weariness of that may tend to their edification and comfort.
- Sinceritie; he doth not incite them to vain and unnecessary things, but These things that build them up to salvation.

In the other part, which is their Proficiencie, we have commended their

- Illumination; They knew these things.
- Confirmation; They are established in the truth.

Wherefore, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, for this cause: this the first praise of his Diligence, the foundation whereon it is grounded; which is derived from the precedent verse. Because the foundation of eternal life is to be laid here, and in this life an entrance must be made to that everlasting kingdom, or there will be no fruition hereafter: Therefore I will •ache all possible pains to prepare your souls for it. Now it is certain, that the foun•ation of Eternity is to be laid in this life: the proposition is proved by Saint Paul, Laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life. The state future follows the former; as the upper building follows the foundation. If we live ill, that is a bad foundation: if we live well, that is a good foundation. Luke 19.9. This day is salvation come to this house. This day, for it must come in the day of Grace, or it will not come in the day of Glory: now, or never. The penitent malefactor might say to Christ; Hodie es mec• in Patibulo; To day thou art with me on the Cross: and Christ says to him, Hodie eris mecum in Paradiso; To day thou shalt be with me in Paradise. If Christ first be with us below, then shall we also be with Christ above. The Kingdom of God must first come into thy heart, before thy heart can come into the Kingdom of God. A wicked life doth (even on earth) make an entrance into that lower kingdom of darkness. Interiour darkness begins exterior darkness, inferior darkness. John 3.18. He that believeth not, is condemned already. Act. 8.23. Thou art now in the gall of bitterness, and bond of iniquity. As God said to Abimelech, Gen. 20.3. Thou art but a dead man. Sin is the very threshold of hell, and the Fewell of that unquenchable fire: her very steps take hold on hell. Mis-livers, and mis-believers; next them stands hell. So faithful goodness hath one foot already in heaven: therefore look to thy life; for he must go out of this world by the mortification of the flesh, that shall come to heaven by the vivification of the Spirit. Such is God's mercy to us; that we who have deserved punishments external on body, internal on conscience, eternal on both; should not only scape these, but have in present a gracious entrance into blessedness. But alas, we see our wretchedness, we do not see our blessedness: we know that a picture but begun, is not of perfect beauty: let us tarry till God hath finished his work. We are now the Sons of God in grace and peace, we shall be the sons of God in glory.

I will not be negligent.] 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . This is the second praise of his diligence: it is well furthered by his Sedulity. Negligence of good duties is in all men damnable, in a Minister execrable: in others robbery, in us Sacrilege. Cursed is he th• doth the Lord's business negligently, saith the Prophet. God was so careful to avoid negligent Ministers under the Law; that the Levites were to bear no office till five and twenty, and to cease again at fifty: not sooner than the first age, Propter imbecilitatem mentis; For the disability of their mind: not longer than the latter term, Propter infirmitatem corporis; For the infirmity of their body. There is not a Calling of a greater labor: Qui temere eligit, non intelligit; He that rashly chooseth it, never understood it. If a man knew the weight of it, it would take away his stomach. It brings a man from a quiet, to a laborious life: I have much ado to look to my own soul, how shall I look to the souls of others? It is indeed lawful to s•e to be in the Ministry; as Paul says, If any man desire the office, he desireth a good work: it is then lawful to desire, therefore lawful to express that desire. But let him think of the Account: To watch for souls, as one that must give account. Some have observed upon CHRIST'S calling of those four Apostles, in the 4. of Matthew; Simon, Andrew, James, and John. That Simon signifies Obedient; Andrew, Couragio•, James, a Supplanter: and John, the Grace of God. And that a Minister of the Gospel should be accordingly qualified: he must be obedient as Simon, courageous as Andrew, and a supplanter of sin as James, and manifest the power of the grace of God as John. There belong to him, Infusion, Diffusion, Effusion, and power of Confusion. Infusion of knowledge, diffusion of grace, effusion of doctrine, confutation of error. Saint Paul was so diligent in this office, that he was called The wing• Husbandman: one writes of him, that Terra citius deficeret; quàm studium praedica•di: the earth might sooner have wanted room for him, than he neglected through the earth preaching. Now, too many make the Ministry, a matter of Policy to raise themselves; and once gotten up, though no Bishop suspend them, they p• themselves to silence: ambition shuts up many lips. They see and say, that a pai•full Teacher seldom comes to preferment. Therefore they will only raise themselves by silence. When Aristodemus bragged how great a fee he had got for speaking Demosthenes answers; say nothing fool, I had more for holding my peace. Th•such an one thinks to speed; and therefore his motto is, Sibi & musis. But a good Minister is not negligent, either in his pen or tongue, his tongue is the pen of a ready writer, and his pen is the tongue of a ready speaker. It is the negligent fashion, Ditescere, pinguescere, segnescere: to grow rich, to grow fat, to grow lazy. When the fish is caught, to cast away the net: to starve the flock, when they have shorn the fleece. But negligence can never befall him that is truly called of CHRIST.

To put you in remembrance:] this is the third praise of his diligence, to fasten it in their memories. We must often be stirred up; Line added to line, and precept upon precept: here a little and there a little. Some would have rare Sermons, and those excellent ones: yet they can receive the doctrine but by drops, not by floods. For whatsoever is received, is received according to the capacity of the receiver. Others would have frequent Sermons though they be meaner. And this course is better, for we need continual remembrancings. It is no hard matter to produce, Eliphanti partum, a years bird; to study up one rare Sermon in three months: such Sermons are for Courts. The Emperor that gave silver to his soldiers, was taxed by others that gave gold: but he answered, I did it of purpose, that all might have some: for it is better all should go away with pieces of silver, than a few only with pieces of gold. Indeed every minister is not a Preacher: all cannot say with Paul, 1 Cor. 1.17. I was not sent to baptize, but to preach. To the building of the Tabernacle there went not only purple, but goats hair; yet are all Remembrancers of us in their places. We have many remembrances, God bless us in the honest use of them. Other countries have larger bounds, goodlier buildings, stronger bulwarks, richer soils, only England hath the best Pulpits. O that I could also add, that England hath the best conversations! could I what street pass through, but some monstrous and manifest sin would give me the lie? We have many that hear the word all their days: yet being questioned concerning their faith on their death beds, they answer as Ahimaaz to David, 2 Sam. 18.29. I saw a great tumult, but I knew not what it was: so they would say; I heard a great noise, but I never knew what it meant. Some know the way twice on the Sunday to Church, yet hardly learn there to know the way to heaven. But to your duty anon, first look we to perform our own. For a Minister to neglect this office of Remembrance, is to make the devil beholding to him: the negligence of the Priest is the injury of the people, Hieron, Detrimentum pecoris, ignominia Pastoris. As the damage of the flock, is the shame of the Shepherd. Now the Lord remember us to remember you, and remember you to remember him; and forgive the forgetfulness of us all.

Always to remember you. This is the fourth praise of his diligence, which shows it to be well followed; wherein we noted his Fidelitie, in the assiduity of his Preaching. Now this duty cannot be performed by any Minister of the Gospel, without a constant abiding among his own. When we learn, that a president should be Resident. Some have their Poole lying in the Country, yet they are still angling about the Court. But they answer it with the Proverb; no fishing to the sea, no service to the King. Indeed the Apostles were Vbiquitaries, but Ministers must be Residentiaries. Now there is a distinction of parishes and charges: therefore let every man Take heed to that flock, over which the holy Ghost hath set him, Act. 20.28. And Paul left Titus in Crete, to ordain elders to every City, Tit. 1.5. Residence is twofold; Personal and Pastoral. It is not so much the Personal, as the Pastoral residence, that is required Iure divino. A Minister may be Pastorally resident, though not Personally; in watching over the people's souls; and feeding them immediately by himself so much as he can, and mediately by as good as himself when he cannot. Another may be Personally resident, yet not Pastorally; when he is amongst them, and doth not diligently preach unto them. There may be a just non-residence, when the Church hath employed a man about public business. Yea, it may be also just; when it is necessary; Pro vita & viatico; for the recovery of health, or needful maintenance, to keep himself from hunger and unrelieved penury: nature it self allows it. Herein every man's own conscience is his best direction. But they that preach altogether by an Attorney, are like to be saved altogether by an Attorney. As they wholly feed the flock Per vicarios, by their deputies: so shall they go to heaven Per vicarios, by their deputies. Some cannot endure to be resident in any place: but he that loves to be a runagate, not seldom proves a runagate: the wandering star is swoop'd down by the dragons tail, not fixed by the hand of CHRIST, Always. The business of a Minister is like the Husband-man's, and that is compared to a ring, because it is endless. Esa. 62.6. I have set watchmen, which shall never hold their peace day nor night: ye that make mention of the Lord, keep not silence: for Jerusalem's sake we have no rest. Paul adjures Timothy to preach opportune, importune: ut obsecret, increpet, 2 Tim. 4.2. i. season, out of season, to reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long suffering. We read Matth. 13.25. that while men slept, the enemy came and sowed tares. Let the Preachers but sleep a little, how quickly will Satan cast in the seed of errors! Let Moses be non-resident forty days, though he went to fetch the Law; yet in this while Israel hath calved an Idol. There is nothing more easy than to decline, if Christ set not watch-men over us, to put us always in remembrance.

Of these things.] 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . This is the last praise of his diligence; whereby he hath fitted, directed, and applied it to matter of the best consequence. Herein we observed his Sincerity; These things, that is, such as may save your souls. He aims at nothing, but that concerns their salvation. The Minister must not labor Pro stolidâ aurâ, nec pro solido auro; neither for praise nor for purse, but for conscience. Oportet esse Piscatorem, non decimarum, sed animarum: he must fish for souls, not for riches. Some fish without nets, some with broken nets, some with whole ones but not clean, some have nets, whole, and clean, but cast them not: others have nets but not clean, and do cast them, but not on the right side; They like well to fish, but only where they are sure with Peter, to draw up a fish with silver in the mouth. These are far short of Saint Peters Integrity: they mind many things, but not These things. There are three things in the Ministry; Work, Reward, and Honor: the good Minister embraceth the first, minds not the other, only refuseth them not if they come. To desire it for the Honors sake, or for the wages sake, is not good. There is Desiderium boni, and Desiderium bonum: a desire of good, and a good desire. The thing may be good, yet is ill to desire it, if it be not fit for us, or we not fit to desire it. Simon Magus had a desire of good, but not a good desire; when he offered coin for the Holy Ghost. His intention damned his petition: which was to give money for it, that he might get money by it. Appetere ut praesis, malum est: appetere ut prosis, bonum est. To desire this office that we may be honored in it, is corrupt: to desire it that we may do good by it, is honest, Bernard. Quoties praesesse desidero, Domino praeire cupio. So often as we seek glory and greatness in the ministry, we both mistake the office, for to be a minister is to serve; and we strive to be better than CHRIST, for he served. Indicitur ministratio, interdicitur dominatio. We are commanded to serve, we are forbidden to domineer.

Indeed there are too many that seek Opes not Opus: not Officium but Beneficium; rather the Church-goods, than the Churches good. But let us aim at God's glory, not our own praise: let none of his honor cleave to our earthen fingers. Though spiritual fishers catch many souls, yet they must not ascribe it to themselves. This were, as the Prophet speaks. Hab. 1.16. To do sacrifice to their net. Let us only mind These things: an honest heart is required in all men, especially in a Minister. When the Apostles were to choose a twelfth into Judah's room, from which he had fallen by treacherous apostasy; they put it to God; Quia novit corda, because he knew the hearts of men. Act. 1.24. Thou Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men, show whether of these thou hast chosen. They spake not of understanding nor memory, nor learning nor eloquence: but insisted only on the heart. Indeed the principal in Minister is an honest heart. A good wit for invention, doth well: a good Judgment for disposition, well: a good memory, a graceful pronounciation, a comely presence, all do well: but the chief of all is a good heart. Diligence and painfulness, and patience are good; but it is the sincerenesse of heart that commends the rest. These things! I could be negligent, and not remember you: or remember you, and not Always? or remember you always, but not of These things: but this is the perfection of his holy diligence; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, to remember you always of These things. Phil. 4.8. Whatsoever is true, or honest, or just, or pure, &c. let us all be diligent about these things. Luk. 2.8. The shepherds were a biding in the field, keeping watch •ver their flock by night. As CHRIST at his first coming found the shepherds tending their flocks: so the spirit of God guide us, that we the Shepherds may be found well leading, and you the Flock well following, at the second coming of Jesus Christ.

Though you know them, and be established in the present truth.]

The Apostle takes it as granted, that they understood these things already, and were constant in the assurance of the truth of them. A happy progress! Oh that we could say so to our auditories: and as Paul, Rom. 7.1. Scientibus legem loquor, I speak to them that know the Law. But Nescitis? know you not? is a word often used by Saint Paul. Rom. 6.3. and in many other places; know you not? Is it possible that you have heard so much, and still remain ignorant? Well, suppose you know; but are ye established in your hearts? If yes; Oh you are worthy to be commended, I will not withhold your just praise and acknowledgement. 1 Cor. 11.2. Now I praise you brethren. Other grounds have received showers, and conceived thorns, whose end is to be burned. Hebr. 6.9. But we are persuaded better things of you, such as accompany salvation. Faine would we be so persuaded of you also: but I fear then, our persuasion were better than our experience. 1 Cor. 15.34. For some have not the knowledge of God; I speak this to our shame. It were to our shame indeed, if we did not know God. As in countries where be the greatest plenty of fruits, they have the shortest lives; they do so surfeit on their abundance. So we have the greatest plenty of spiritual food, but we turn the fullness into loathing and contempt. We have the best Pulpits, but I cannot say we have the best lives. The Indians were the most beggarly and naked people, amongst whom was all the gold: so in the midst of God's mercies, and the riches of grace; we are the most poor, naked, and miserable in our conversations. Which being true, our commendation must be turned into Commination: Our, In this we praise you; into, In this we praise you not, 1 Cor. 11.17. In this that I declare unto you, I praise you not. But if your mind be established in understanding, your heart in affecting, your life in obeying, blessed are you; your Minister shall praise you, the Church your mother will praise you, the Angels praise you, yea you shall be praised of CHRIST himself.

I come to the conclusion: this concession makes way for a further imposition. Though you know these things, and be established, yet you must admit a further confirming. So Paul insinuates to the Romans, Chap. 15. Ver. 14. I myself am persuaded of you, that ye also are full of goodness, filled with all knowledge, able to admonish one another. Well, be it granted, Ver. 15. Nevertheless I have written the more boldly to you, as putting you in mind. Bene etiam currentibus addenda sunt calcaria: no man runs so fast, but he may need some spurring. Quamvis Sceva satis per te tibi consilis, & scis; Disco docendus adhuc. There is still something, that he would teach, and they should learn. So Ambros. Per hunc laudem provocat ad meliora: by praising the goodness they have, he provokes them to a greater degree and measure of it. Lai da'sque virtus Cresci, & immensum gloria calcar habet; saith the Poet. Virtue thrives by commendation, and glory is a spur to do well.

Acer & ad palmae po• ⟨◇⟩ sutus honores,

Si tamen horteris, for••• ibit equas.

The horse that would run well of his own metal, doth yet mend his pace by the riders encouragement. The Apostles commendation is not to quiet them in the conceit of their own sufficiency, but to incite them to a further degree of sanctity. The cessation of remembrancing may easily lapse us to forgetfulness. Thomas got such incredulity by a little absence, that he was hardly brought to believe an evidence. Albeit his speech was Dubitantis, non negantis, the voice of one that doubted, not of one that denied: yet we see when illumination is but a little dusked, how good men fall into blind errors. The Italians have a proverb; It is good to be born wise, or bo• twice. Surely we are first borne, in respect of heavenly wisdom, fools: therefore we had need of a second birth: borne once to come into the world, and then borne again to overcome the world. This is not done without continual warring, ••d not that without continual encouraging. We vowed in our Baptism, not only ⟨◇⟩ › be CHRIST'S soldiers, and to fight manfully; but so to fight perpetually and ⟨◇⟩ continue this war unto our lives end. Aut sors, aut mors. When Agamen•• said; victor timere quid potest? What can a conqueror fear? Cassandra answered, Quod non timet; That he doth fear. If the Minister do not ring continually this alarm bell, you will forget to fight. Though you be established, you must think there will be some offering to shake you. Therefore a Christians resolution should be like king Alfred's:

Si modo victor eras, ad crastina bella pavebas.

Si modo victus eras, ad crastina bella parabas.

If we conquer today, let us fear the skirmish tomorrow: if we be overcome today, let us hope to get the victory tomorrow. When you have fought the main battle, gotten the conquest, and are crowned with that triumphant wreath in heaven; as you bless God for many things; so you will bless him for this, that he gave you a good Remembrancer upon earth; such a Preacher as did always set you forward to your eternal rest. The Lord fail not us and ours of such Remembrancers, till we all meet together in that high and everlasting glory.

VERSE 13. Yea, I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up, by putting you in remembrance.

The Apostle had formerly professed a good resolution; faithfully to sow in their hear us the seed of life. Now lest any man should think his carefulness a meritorious or supererogative work, himself confesseth it to be $\langle \diamond \rangle$ more than just. Iustumasse arbitror, it is but the payment of a due debt. And this not due for a while, but during life; So long as I am in this tabernacle. But it is granted, as they know the truth, and live in the faith; yet they may be asleep; I will therefore stir them up, for living men may sleep. But what, is there a new lesson $\langle \diamond \rangle$ to be given them? No, that I need not, but even rub over the old, by putting them in remembrance. Here he seems to back his diligence by certain arguments; they are four in number, and forcible in nature; derived Ab

- Equitate vocationis; I think it meet.
- Opportunitate Temporis; As long as I keep this tabernacle.
- Securitate Hominis; To stir you up.
- Necessitate Monitionis; By putting you in remembrance.

The consideration of his own office and calling moves him to it: it is a meet and just thing for him to observe it, and the neglect were to do a manifest injury to God, to his Church, and to his own conscience. Secondly, the opportunity of the time moves him; for this life is but a Tabernacle, and will not stand long; and therefore he resolves to apprehend occasion as it is offered, and to thrust in his sickle while the harvest lasts. Thirdly, the Security and dullness of men moves him; who are naturally so averse and stupid, that they had need be stirred up, roused from their loathfull couch, and by all instigations be set forward to religion. Lastly, it is the use of his office, and due exercise of his calling, always to put them in mind of their last reckoning; and he cannot answer the neglect of it to the Justice of God, who hath set him over them for that purpose,

I think it meet.] This is the first argument or motive: the nature of his office binds him to it Aequum est agere, quod Personam & conditionem deceat: but this is imposed upon us, by him that sent us; therefore it is most unjust to withhold it, Esa. 62.6. Ye that are the Lord's remembrancers, be not silent. The precept is negative in sound, affirmative in sense. For this [Not] excluding the privation of speech, answereth after a sort to an Infitans: in logic admitting anything rather than silence. Be not silent, is not only, Speak; but implies a continual speech: for when a man ceaseth to speak, he is silent. 2 Tim. 4.2. Be instant in season, and out of season. Not that Timothy should break through the rules of discretion, to preach at all times in themselves unseasonable. For there is a time to keep silence. Eccl. 3.7. There is a time to speak, and a time to keep silence. But opportune volentibus, importune molentibus: in season, to them that will hear: out of season, to them that will not hear. Bee not silent, hold your peace: hold the truth, hold your faith, hold your profession, hold your zeal, hold your innocence; hold not your peace. Tenuisse silentia clerum; Oh it is the basest Tenure any Minister can hold his living by.

But it may be objected, that it is wisdom to be silent. Many have surfeited by eating, none by forbearing: many have sinned by speaking, no man by holding his peace. God shall judge many a one Ex ore suo, out of his own mouth. And, I am. 3.2. If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man. Now he that says nothing, offends not in word. But we take not silence in a metaphysical consideration; as a mere privation. Non entis nullae sunt operationes: that which hath no being, hath no working: and he that says nothing, says no harm. But we take it in a legal consideration; as a cursed omission; or neglect of that should have been performed. As he that is bound to work, shall give an account of his idleness: so he that is bound to speak, shall answer for his silence. As the darkness in Egypt, was a darkness that might be felt: so silence in a Preacher, is a silence that will be felt: it shall smart to the quick. There are graces Personal, and graces Ministerial. Personal graces are essential to a Christian, accidental to a Minister; as Faith, Hope, Charity, Temperance, and the like. And these serve especially for the good of the receiver, the person in whom they dwell: in a second degree for the good of others. But Graces ministerial; as Preaching, exhorting, comforting, discerning of errors; confuting them, &c. respect him that hath them in the last place and principally tend to others benefit. 1 Corinthians 12.7. The manifestation of the spirit, is given to every man to profit withal. If we hold our peace, we first wrap ourselves in a criminal mischief: because silence directly crosseth our vocation. A silent Preacher implies as harsh a contradiction; as a dark light, a dumb crier. Next in a Penall mischief: and that either of the greatest privation or loss in this life; the tabe and consumption of our graces and gifts. Zach. 11.17. The Idol shepherd that leaveth the flock, shall have his arm clean dried up, and his right eye utterly darkened. Matth. 25.28. Take the talent from him. Or of the most grievous position of pain, and vexation of sense forever; the blood of the lost being required at their hands, so long as there is a seat of Justice in heaven. Therefore saith Paul; vae mihi, si non evangelizavero; Woe unto me if I preach not the Gospel. The Ministers silence doth encourage the people's going to hell, Lam. 2.14. Thy Prophets have seen for thee false burdens, and causes of banishment: but they have not discovered thy iniquity, to turn away thy captivity. It is a maxim in the civil Law; Qui 〈∅〉 improbat, probat: Consentit, qui tacet; he doth allow that doth not disallow; and he that holds his peace, gives his consent. There is a case. The father that hears his daughters vow, wherewith she binds her soul, and holds his peace; consents that it shall stand. A mute indeed is no vowell, but a mute among vowelles cannot avoid the office of a consonant.

Certainly a disable Minister is a grievous plague to the people. When there is no vision, the people perish. Tot homines quotidie occidimus, quos ad mortem ire tantum videmus. We kill daily so many men, as we see going to destruction, and say nothing to. Act. 20.20. Paul protested that he had kept back nothing which was profitable to the Church: and from hence inferreth, Ver. 26. that he was Pure from the blood of all men. Mundus ergo a sanguine eorum non fuisset, si eis Dei consilium nuntiari noluisset, Gregor. He could not therefore have been pure from their blood, if he had not diligently taught them the Gospel. So, Verse 27. himself gives the reason of this Purity; Because I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God. Ezeck. 3.18. The unwarned sinner shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thine hand. So that to be guilty of silence, is to be guilty of murder. Lord, we cannot speak so well as we should; yet always give us grace to speak so well as we can.

So long as I am in this tabernacle.] This is his second argument or motive; the opportunity of the time urgeth him. I cannot rise from the dead to admonish, therefore I will do it in the time of life, which is the due and afforded season. There is no preaching in the grave, therefore Quamdiu sum in hoc tabernaculo. Here observe three things.

First, everything hath the time to be done. John. 4.23. Hora est nunc; The hour cometh and now is, Psal. 1.3. The tree planted by the rivers of water, brings forth his fruit Tempore suo, in his season, Eccl. 7.17. Be not overmuch wicked; why shouldst thou die Tempore non tuo, before thy time, 2 Thes. 2.6. Antichrist shall be revealed, Tempore suo, in his time, John. 2.4. Nondum venit hora mea; my hour is not yet come; I must do my works, Tempore meo, in my own time. Gal. 6.9. In due time we shall reap. If this be neglected, the Angel swears, There shall be no more time, Rev. 10.6. Few men do mark what time is more than your Usurers: they marry Time and Money together, and so breed an everlasting generation of Interests.

Secondly, that therefore every man must do good in his time. Gal. 6.10. While we have time let us do good to all men. Let us hear the great Shepherd and Bishop of our souls. John. 9.4. I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work. Opportunitate nihil facilius, amitti nihil facilius. Occasion is happily taken, easily lost. While a Minister is in his tabernacle, let him preach: he is now a moveable, hereafter he shall be fixed. There shall be no Sermons in heaven, for there all are full of grace: there shall be none in hell, for there all are past grace: therefore 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, So long as I am in this tabernacle I will preach. Psal. 88.10. Shall thy loving kindness be declared in the grave? or thy faithfulness in destruction? Shall thy wonders be known in the dark? and thy righteousness in the land of forgetfulness? But if there be no preaching in hell, how then is it said. 1 Pet. 3.19. that CHRIST went and preached to the spirits in prison? I answer; there is no continuation of the Gospel; howsoever there may be a proclamation of judgment, and a declaration of CHRIST'S power; a publishing of what the reprobates have lost by not believing on him. Augustine objects; if there be any preaching in hell, what needed so much regard to it upon earth? Preaching on earth is to beget repentance: if there could be any in hell, it were but to increase vengeance. Therefore remember thy Quamdiu: preach while thou mayest, lest God stop thy mouth before thou wouldst. Tremble at that fearful Judgment, Revel. 16.10. They gnawed their tongues for pain. Their tongues were once tied up with gains, there they shall be loosened with pains.

Flattery made them (like that shameless Sy•ophant, that licked up the Emperors spittle) to lick the sores and vices of their maintainers, therefore they shall lambere flammās, lick those unquenchable flames.

Thirdly, observe, that the Apostle compares his life to a Tabernacle; a little ••ed or tilth, wherein the immortal soul dwells. The metaphor is taken from •ouldiers, Pilgrims, and Shepherds: who for the better expedition of their affairs, •re said to have Sedes non fixas, moveable seats. We are Soldiers, and must dwell •n tents, till we have got the victory. We are travellers, and must sleep in Pavil•ons, till we come to our City. We are shepherds, and must lodge in the fields, •n the folds, to look to our flocks: till the drought consume us in the day, and the •roast by night; and our sleep depart from our eyes, Gen. 31.40. This teacheth us the ••ailenesse of our life; which is still moveable from one part of the earth to another, ••ll it be removed to heaven, there it shall abide immovable forever. Nihil firmum ••fra firmamentum: There is nothing firm under the firmament: but above there is •mmobile regnum; A kingdom which cannot be moved, Hebr. 12.28. Why art thou •roud, O man, that considerest thyself? Cujus conceptus culpa, nasci miseria, vivere •oena, mori angustia; Whose conception was sin, birth a misery, life a punishment, •nd death a torment. The soul indeed that dwells in this Tabernacle, is an immor••ll guest: Dei inspiratione condita, similitudine insignita, cruore redempta, fide decorata, •iritu adoptata; Created by God's hand, formed to his likeness, redeemed with his •lood, beautified with his grace, and adopted by his Spirit. She requires not soft •odging, and curious food of thee; but thy bodies obedience to her, that she may give •bedience to Christ: that she be not forced to serve, which should rule: Dominam ••cillari, ancillam dominari; For the servant to rule, and the mistress to serve, is a pre•osterous overture.

Men live without considering themselves; Vnde, ubi, quomodo, quo; whence •hey came, where they are, how they do, whither they go: that all these Mathe•aticall lines have earth for their center. Whence came we? from the earth. Where •re we? upon the earth. How live we? unworthy of the earth, or any blessing in it. Whither go we? to the earth: Terram terra tegat; Earth to earth. We are compo•ed of four Elements, and they strive in us for the mastery; but the lower gets the •etter, and there is no rest till Earth have the predominance. Yet wicked men live, •s if there was no earth to devour their bodies, nor gulf lower than earth to swallow their souls. Mans life is a spark, a breath, a smoke: a spark in the heart, a •reath in the mouth, a smoke in the nostrils. A drop of water will quench that •parke, a little hair can choke that breath, a little air take away that smoke. Look •o thy ways, thou livest in a Tabernacle, quickly dissolvable: the Dart may light up•n thee next. When Harrald, King of Denmark, made war upon Harquinus, and •as ready to join battle; a Dart was seen flying into the air, hovering this way •nd that way, as though it sought upon whom to rest. When all stood wondering to •ehold what would become of this strange prodigy, every man fearing himself; •t last the Dart fell upon Harquinus head, and slew him. This Dart of Death is ever •overing; watch, for thy turn will come.

To stir you up.] This is the third motive to his diligence; an argument fet•hed from the security of men; who sleep till they be wakened, and when they •re wakened, sleep again: therefore they need Stirring. Wicked ones are dead, weak ones sleep, even the best have their naps. To the first you may cry as loud •s the Idolatrous Priests did to Baal; but they will not waken. To the second, though we call once and again, they will not stir; but let us give them no rest. He that to such a one knocks not mainly, knocks vainly: at last they will rise. Luke 11.8. Because of our importunity they will rise. To the last an easy stirring serves: his nap is not so long, nor his sleep so deep; but Cor vigilat. Cant. 5.2. I sleep, but my heart waketh. An Ox hath strength enough, but dullness withal; there must be a goad to prick him on. The spirit is ready, but the flesh is heavy: we must be stirred upward, and spurred forward. Every good Sermon hath in it two things; a Bridle, and a Spurre. To meet with two dispositions in men; Inclination to evil, averseness from good. For the former precipice; there is a bridle, for the latter; dullness a spurr: hi pressi, illi repressi; these must be strained, those restrained. Some run so fast as they can from Christ's Ensign, and treacherously confederate with his adversary Satan; these be desperate offenders. Others will not oppose him, so, nor take part with him, but cowardly stand and look on. Like the cursed inhabitants of Meroz, Judge. 5 23. that came not to the help of the Lord against the mighty. If a ma• could borrow of the one a little swiftness, to quicken the others laziness: and of the other a little coolnesse, to allay the formers heat: this might make up a reasonable and indifferent temper.

Upon the whole face of the earth there is an universal slumber: as Sardi though she lived, but she was dead: So men dream they are awake, but indeed they are fast asleep. I do not say, the Usurer, Drunkard, Oppressor, the sacrilegious are asleep; for mortui sunt, they are dead. But I see professors of religion slumber; acquiescere lucro; over-give themselves, though not give over themselves, to the world: Do you think they will ever be brought to heaven without stirring? No, it is well if perpetual punction can drive them to compunction: if often repea•• rules can work any amendment. We call, and cry, and thunder; yet still complain• as Aeneas for his Creûsa: Nec quicquam ingeminans, iterúmque, iterúmque voca•i. Rom. 10.21. All the day long have we stretched forth our hands, and lifted up our voices. Paul told his Thessalonians, that he had no need to write unto them touching some duties, 1 Thess. 4.9. O that we could say so of our people. Eccles. 12.11. The words of the wise are as goads: now the Spirit of God infuse into us that wisdom, that our words may be as goads, to provoke and stir you up to your own salvation.

By putting you in remembrance. This is the last motive, drawn from the necessity of often preaching and writing; otherwise how should they be stirred up? wherein we may consider two things; the necessity of the ministry, and the nature of that duty.

For the former, there must be Remembrancers, that by them salvation may be conveyed to us: by them as Instruments, not of them as Principals. Illi non tribuunt, quae per illos tribuuntur; They do not give that of themselves, which the Lord doth give by them. Luke 15.22. Dixit Ministris, Proferte stolam: He said to his Ministers, Bring forth the best roabe. Though GOD gives you the roabe of salvation, yet by their hands. But you think, you have pick-locks to open heaven doors, though they be not opened by us. John is the voice of the Cryer, CHRIST is the Word that doth cry: he that despiseth vocem clamantis, the voice of the Cryer; despiseth verbum clamans, the Cryer himself. Now this necessity is not Infallibilitatis, sed ordinis; Not of infallibility, but of order: GOD can save us without it, but he doth not. John the Baptist must give water, or CHRIST will give no blood. Rom. 10.14. How shall they believe on him, of whom they have not heard? And 〈ϕ〉 shall they hear without a Preacher? They must needs forget, that have none to p• them in remembrance. A people is never nearer their woe, than when they suspe• their Preachers. Mic. 2.6. When they say to their Prophets; Prophecy not. The City is in hazard, when they have tied up the alarm-bell. News came to a Town once and again, that the enemy was approaching: well he did not approach. He••upon in anger, they enacted a law, that no man on pain of death should bring agai• such rumors, as the news of an enemy. Not long after the enemy came indeed; besieged, assaulted, and sacked the Town. Of whose ruins nothing remain•but this proverbial Epitaph; Here stood a Town, that was destroyed with silence. We have too many such towns; God keep them from such a destruction.

For the other; every true Minister is a Remembrancer. If thou put the brethren •n remembrance of these things, thou shalt be a good Minister of JESUS CHRIST. Of these things put them in remembrance. It is a civil term, proper to civil officers. Jehoshaphat the son of Ahilud was Recorder. There is mention made of Ioah the son •f Asaph the Recorder. The Recorder is a prime Office, well known in this City. This the Apostle here naturalizeth to the Church, and signifies Ministers to be Re•orders. This Remembrancing or Recording, is not a publication at random, but 〈ϕ〉 Commemoration; or a fetching back of some forgotten thing. The proper principle from whence it proceeds, is no other faculty of the soul, but the memorative. The proper object is not occurrence of all sorts, but occurrence past.

You see now a Preachers errand: it is not a new invention, but an ancient Record enrolled in the memory. As Saint Jude speaks. Verse 3. Of the Faith which was once delivered to the Saints. Once, not so much Ration temporis, at one •eason: as Ration perfectionis, in respect of the perfection: so given once, that it •eeds never be given again. We invent no novelties, but remember you of that which was delivered to us. That good thing which was committed unto thee, keep. Quod tibi creditum, non quod à te inventum: quod accepisti, non quod excogitasti: cu•us autor non esse debes, sed custos; That which was entrusted to thee, not invented by •he: which thou hast received, not conceived: whereof thou art not a founder, but a keeper. Yea, CHRIST himself added no new precepts to the Law, but revived and explained the old. Therefore he used to say, It is written; and that writ•en Law he expounded. But it is objected. John 13.34. Novum mandatum; A •ew Commandment give I unto you. This was not Nouum, sed novatum; not new in •t self, but rather renewed: there being the addition of a new Spirit, that helps our infirmities. For, 1 John 2.7. I write no new Commandment unto you, but an old Commandment which you had from the beginning. But the preaching of faith is cal•ed Nova Iustitia, a new Righteousness. I answer, It is not a contrary Righteousness to that the Law required, but a different conveyance of Righteousness. Both •equire a Righteousness; the Law an inherent, the Gospel an imputed Righteousness. The Decalogue, without contradiction, is still that Magna Charta; to which as their common Principle all doctrinal conclusions are reducible. Eccles. 12.13. The conclusion of the whole matter, is, Fear GOD, and keep his Commandments; for therein is the whole duty of man. In Arithmetic, when we once pass •he number of ten, the latter numbers, though multiplied to millions of millions, •re but compounded resumptions and repetitions of the former. When the works of GOD were crowned with their Makers approbation; Behold, it is very good:•ll the inventions of men were but surveyes and discoveries, all actions but imitations; Nil novi sub sole; There is no new thing under the Sun. Eccles. 1.9. The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be. Is there anything whereof it may be said, See, this is new? It hath been already of old time before us. All are but remembrances of his work, but rehearsals of his praise. So after the full and perfect delivery of GOD'S Word; all praises are but like the hundred and fifth, the hundred and sixth, and the hundred and seventh Psalms; Rehearsall Psalms: or as David especially entitleth the eight and thirtieth Psalm, Memorandum; A Psalm of David to bring to remembrance. All prayers, but like the Levites in the ninth of Nehemiah; Rehearsall prayers. All Sermons, but like Stephens in the seventh of the Acts; Rehearsall sermons.

But there are some, that think to disparage all Sermons, and shift off hearing, with this objection; Nil dictum, quod non dictum prius; nothing can be said, but that hath been said. And when any good Instruction is commended, they think by this exception to disgrace it. Grant that all is the same for the matter; yet for the method, I am sure there are many things now spoken, that were never spoken before. Some of later times have averred, that all manner of Usury is lawful: this was never said before. The Devil himself durst not have been so impudent, as to have broached this in those ancient and purer times. Others have published, that Tenths are not due to the Church, Ex jure Divino: now for fourteen hundred years after Christ this was never spoken. The Church would have denied her blessing to such a son, yea, refused him for her son, that should have said it. As Christ said in the case of unjust Divorce, Matth. 19.8. Non fuit sic ab initio; From the beginning it was not so. We see opinions newly broached, that were never heard of before. There are daily productions of new acts, never done before. The blowing up of a State with Gun-powder; whosoever speaks of it, speaks of a thing never spoken of before. Can yourselves think new thoughts, speak new words, execute new acts; and yet cannot we preach new Sermons? Is there a necessity, that all suggestions of God's Spirit, and contemplation of man, must be disgraced for being old? Indeed we desire to tell you of the old Righteousness, but we are fain to win your nice and curious attentions by new forms and methods. Matth. 13.52. The good Scribe bringeth out of his treasure things new and old. What careth a wise man whether the Balm be new or old, so his wound be cured by it? Let it be old or new, a present instruction, or a repetition, it is sufficient if it may profit your souls.

To conclude, all our Sermons are but Remembrances, and ourselves Remembrancers. We can do no more, we can do no less. Act. 4.20. We cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard. We cannot; not that it is absolutely impossible: but first for Outward congruity of reason and law: for Id possumus; quod jure possumus; We can do, what we may do. And then for Inward resolution; the Word being as burning fire shut up in our bones, that makes us weary of forbearing, Ier. 20.9. Or like new wine, which if it have no vent, will burst the vessels, Job 32.18. I cannot, that is, I will not: love as strong as death, necessitates me: Mori possum, tacere non possum; I can die, I cannot hold my peace. Esth. 4.16. Howsoever I will speak; If I perish, I perish. There is great need. Satan's remembrancers are abroad in every corner: mark how they vouch their precedents. Ezra 4.15. The adversaries of Jerusalem slander her to Artaxerxes, that she is a rebellious City, Seditious, and hateful to Princes and Provinces. John 19.7. The Jews coloured their murder with a legal proceeding; We have a law, and by our law he ought to die. These Instruments of the Devil speak, and shall we hold our peace? Do they remember you of carnal things, and shall not we remember you of the LORD JESUS? The silence of a Remembrancer in the Kings Exchequer, may diminish the Kings Revennews: and by the same fault, we may shorten the Lord's comings in. It is true indeed that his glory can find other issues; but to our shame. Esth. 4.14. If thou hold thy peace, God will send deliverance another way; but thou and thy fathers house shall be destroyed. No, pray you for us, that the door of utterance may be opened unto us: yea, Lord, do thou open our lips, and our mouth shall show forth thy praise. Our hearts shall meditate, our lips shall speak: and may the words of our lips, and the meditations of our hearts, be always acceptable in thy sight; O Lord our strength and our Redeemer.

VERSE 14. Knowing that shortly I must put off this my Tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shown me.

THE Apostle proceeds to amplify the reason, why he so plyed them with the remembrance of these things. My life is but short: Why so? because I am old: yet an old man may wear out some years; nay, but I know it is short: How can this be known? Yes, by God's revelation; As our Lord Jesus Christ hath shown me. I must die, I must die shortly, I know I must die shortly: my Savior Christ hath told me so. Therefore pardon me, though I inculcate, and beat so much upon one string; it is a lesson worth your learning, and I have but a small time to teach it you. Knowing that shortly I must &c.

I know;] not perhaps precisely the day, or the place, or the manner. But Death is not a stranger to my thoughts; my account is cast up, I am ready. I know.

That I must put off, or lay down;] willingly, not on compulsion: not pulled down; but laid down. It is a metaphor drawn from a wager; Depono tecum; the faithful man doth wager, and pawn his soul to God.

This my tabernacle;] not my castle, or strong tower, or standing house; but a Tent, a moveable, a Tabernacle.

Shortly;] The time is not so far off that I dream not of it: not, likely to happen in another age, and creeping on by slow degrees. The Sun is not descending, but ready to set: the messenger knocks at the door: the clock runs upon the last minute: the Epilogue is on the stage: the taper at the last glimpse: the oake falling under the latest blow of the axe: Instat tempus; Shortly.

As the Lord Jesus Christ hath shown me.] I dare take his word: he that died for me, hath told me that I now shall die for him. It is a shame for me to be unprepared, when such a Prophet hath certified me; both in prediction, and example; Monstrante viam.

He speaks of an assurance; I know. What doth he know? that I must die; part with this tabernacle. How must he part with it? Put it off. When must he put it off? Shortly. How is he sure of that? The Lord Jesus Christ hath shown me. The whole may be distinguished into three generals: A - Resolution; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , I know.

- Dissolution; I must shortly put off this my tabernacle.
- Revelation; As our Lord Jesus Christ hath shown me.

The Resolution is entire in it self; an infallible certainty of inevitable death: which is manifest to him, both by the common condition of nature, and a more sensible impression of vicinity: a thing that grows fast upon him. I know.

The Dissolution is observable in divers circumstances: It is

- Personal; I, though an Apostle of Christ.
- Necessary; I must, there is no remedy.
- Voluntary; Put off, willingly, without snatching from me.
- Instant; Shortly, the decree cannot be suspended.

The Revelation or Premonition of his death, is referred either, Ad

- Genus mortis, The kind and manner of his death.
- Tempus moriendi, The time prefixed of his dying.

Knowing:] This is his Resolution. The assurance of unavoidable death, is a doctrine well known: everyone can say with Peter; I know. Nil dicitur frequentius, nil creditor facilius; Nothing is more frequently repeated, nothing is more readily believed. Bern. Cogita te mortuum, quem scis necessitate moriturum. Think thyself, as it were, already dead; whom thou knowest necessarily to die. Bed. It is fit that Death should effect death: the spiritual, a corporal: the death of sin, a death of punishment: a voluntary death, brings a necessary death. Therefore, saith Chrysostom, Let us make a virtue of necessity; Offeramus Deo pro munere, quod pro debito tenemur reddere; Let us offer God that for a gift, which we are bound to pay as a debt. This is an hard and woeful necessity, saith Anselm; Perdidit homo beatitudinem ad quam factus est, & invenit mortem ad quam factus non est. Man lost that life to which he was ordained, and found the death to which he was not ordained. All men die in time, some before their time. Eccles. 7.17. The overmuch wicked dies before his time; Tempore non suo; in a season which the constitution of his nature doth not threaten. Thus sometimes die the godly, that they may be no longer vexed of the guilty: often the guilty, that they may no longer vex the godly. This necessity all must undergo, Sed diverso fato with a diverse event. To the wicked, death is the beginning of sorrow: to the Elect, the end of pain. The death of the wicked, saith Bernard, is, Mala in mundi amissione, pejor in carnis separatione, pessima in ignis combustione; Evil in the loss of this world, worse in the separation of life, worst of all in the torture of quenchlesse fire. Death to the godly is, Bona propter requiem, meli•• propter novitatem, optima propter impassibilitatem futuram; Good in the cessation of pains, better in the renovation of all things, best in the immutability of happiness. Therefore the Saint that desires to be dissolved, and to be with Christ, Non patienter moritur; sed patienter vivit, & delectabiliter moritur; That man doth not only die patiently, but he lives patiently, and dies joyfully. He loves Jesus Christ but a little, that doth not rejoice to go unto him.

But in this point, in vain I spend my breath, to tell you that I and you all shall lose our breath: you know it. Tell the Oppressor, Thou shalt die; he answers, I know it. Dost thou know it? and wilt still live like a Christian Jew, extorting from thy brother? How shall Christ, (whom thou supposest thy brother) give thee Spem tuam; thy Hope; when thou takest away from him Rem suam, his Substance? Tell the worldling, Thou shalt die; he says, I know it. Dost thou know that thou must leave the world, and yet dost cleave to the world? Dost thou know, thou must lose the possession of earth, and wilt thou not assure to thy soul the fruition of heaven? The Drunkard says, he knows he must die, he can sing you songs to that purpose. Doth he know it, and yet keep his body so perpetually drunk, that his soul hath no time soberly to bethink it self? Is the gate of heaven so broad and wide, that he can reel into it? Drunkenness is no way to blessedness; as the Poet wittily epitaph'd upon a dead drunkard: who lived in the love of wine, and died in the strength of it:

If by the pot, to heaven he got,

This I dare boldly say;

He was the last which that way past,

And first which found that way.

Tell the Contentious, Thou shalt die; he answers, I know it. And yet wilt thou reserve, Bellum cum proximo, pacem cum Diabolo; War with thy neighbor, peace with the Devil? Shall a turbulent spirit ever enter that City of Peace? Tell the Deceiver, Thou shalt die, with all thy frauds; I know it. Dost thou know it? Why then is thy tongue Satan's anvil, whereon he sits forging his lies? Why dost thou swear away thy salvation before thou hast it? Tell the Adulterer; Thou shalt die; I know it. Why then wilt thou be one flesh with an Harlot, which must both rot under the clods; and not rather one spirit with Christ, who reigneth above the clouds? Do we know, we must die, and yet run such lewd courses? We know that we must die; let us so live in faithful obedience, that we way know we shall live for evermore with ISESUS CHRIST.

Shortly I must lay down this my tabernacle.] This is the Dissolution, wherein I considered four circumstances. First, the Personalitie; I, though a Preacher, though an Apostle, one that have seen the Lord Jesus in the face; I. Next, the necessity, I must, there is no evasion, no prevention: I must lose a tabernacle, no mansion, a thing not worth keeping. Thirdly, the Liberty, voluntariness, and willing heart of the Apostle to do this; which he calls a Deposition, or Laying down of his Tabernacle: it is not a thing violently extorted from me, but laid down with a quiet and temperate mind. Lastly, the Instance and vicinitie of it; It is not long a coming, but approaching so near, that I see it and feel it: the sands are almost out of the glass: but a few moments, and I depart; Shortly.

I must; it is Personal; I. The Apostle out of that general necessity wisely collects a particular, a proper conclusion to himself, I. These singular deductions out of universal propositions, are profitable to men, and acceptable to God. All men are sinners; and I am the chief, saith Paul. All men are mortal, and I must shortly die, saith Peter. No degree of men is privileged from death: not a Patriarch, not a Prophet, not an Apostle, could plead exemption. Zach. 1.5. Your fathers, where are they? and the Prophets, do they live forever? Abraham a great Patriarch, Moses a great Prophet, David a great Prince, Samuel a great Priest, John a great Evangelist, Peter a great Apostle; where are they? their souls live in bliss, their bodies are dead in the grave. God doth often take away his Ministers, and that for three reasons:

1 For their own sins; as Nadab and Abihu. Lev. 10.2. They offered strange fire before the Lord, and there went out fire from the Lord that devoured them. They offered strange fire, and they suffered strange fire. They sent up hellish impiety toward heaven, therefore hell came out of heaven upon them. So Hophni and Phinehas, those uncorrected sons of Eli. 1 Sam. 2.34. In one day they died both of them. They desperately offended, the father too mildly reprehended, they harkened not, because the Lord would slay them, Ver. 25. So Zach. 11.8. Three shepherds have I cut off in one month; my soul loathed them, and their soul also abhorred me. This God doth for the good of the people; Vt illi pereant, ne caeteros perimant: that such might perish themselves, and not destroy others by their bad examples, and unclean course of life.

2 For the sins of the people. As Solomon says; Propter peccata populi erunt multi Principes: so we may say, multi sacerdotes. For the sins of the people there shall be many Princes: so for the sins of the people there shall be many Priests. God smites the Shepherd, when he means to scatter the sheep, he puts out the light, when he purposeth to leave men in the dark. This was Paul's resolution, Phil. 1.24. To abide in the flesh is more needful for you. Propter vos; for myself it is better to be dissolved, and to be with CHRIST: but to remain in the flesh, is better Propter vos, for you. This may be better for my wife, for my children, for my friends, for those that depend upon me: but I mind none of those; but Propter vos, it is better for you.

3 For his own glory, lest what belongs to God, should be ascribed to man. CHRIST cannot endure, that that should be attributed to Paul and Barnabas, which pertains to him, Act. 14.12. As the superstitious Lystrians, that called Barnabas Jupiter, and Paul Mercury; when they brought garlands, and would have done sacrifice to them. Princes use to change their deputies often, as the Turk does his Bashaw's; lest continuance should bring them to be taken for Princes. So God takes away often a good Minister; lest Assueti servo, obliviscerentur Dominum; they being too confident of the servant, should forget the Lord. There are some Sectaries, that think of their Elders, as Simon Magus thought of the Apostles; that they can give the Holy Ghost. They arrogate to the instrument, and derogate from the agent. Let him speak the abortive figments of his own brain, yet their superstitious applause is, Vox Dei; It is the voice of a God, not of a man, Act. 12.22. Let another deduce sound conclusions from the sacred truth, and justify his sober assertions from the undeniable scriptures: yet because the man is not according to their humor, the doctrine shall not have their honor. They must choose for themselves, a Minister of their own faction: whereas neither Prophets nor Apostles were chosen by the people: the sheep used not to choose their own shepherds. Thus these professors out of their wits, hate Rome worse than hell; yet meet it, and congratulate it, in the same rank superstition another way. As they think it enough that Papa sanxit; the Pope hath decreed it: so these think it enough, that Praesbiter dixit, their Elders hath affirmed it. Thus the people, made Bishop, and their Elder a Pope. When men shall thus defy their Minister, no marvel if God nullify the man.

Now, seeing we must die, do you pray for us, that we may do your souls good while we live. Eph. 6.19. Pray, and make supplication for all Saints: And for me, that utterance may be given unto me. Where the Clergy may learn humility, and the people charity: we humility, that we need your prayers: you charity to pray for us. Weak ones pray with us, malicious ones pray against us, covetous ones prey upon us, few pray for us. Examine your consciences; how seldom do we find place and memory in your prayers! Perhaps, Morne and Even you remember yourselves, but when is the Preacher in your thoughts? Sure you have not found sweetness by him, or else you could not forget him. If we forget you, let our right hand forget her cunning. We will pray for you, do you pray for us, and our mediator Jesus Christ pray for us all.

Again, seeing our life is so short, do you apprehend the means while it lasteth. Zacharias may be stroke dumb: sickness may suspend us for a season, but death doth silence us forever. Hear therefore while the voice soundeth; To day if ye will hear my voice harden not your hearts, Hebr. 3.15. Though I trust, God will never fail you successively of a diligent Pastor: and we wish that those who in time come after us, may in worth go before us: that as they succeed us in place, they may exceed us in grace. But because certainly, either death must take us from you, or you from us: as it is our part, dum vires annique sinunt, tolerare labores: while we keep on our tabernacles, to take pains: so let this be your part; while you have ears to hear, hear: while you have hearts to believe, receive: while you have hands to work, obey; that while there is a Savior in heaven you may be blessed.

I must; it is necessary, there is no remedy but I must lay down my Tabernacle. If heaven were to be had upon earth, Saints should not dwell in tabernacles. But it is observable of our Apostle, Saint Peter, at the transfiguration of CHRIST, Matth. 17. even whilst he had not knowledge enough to discern of CHRIST'S kingdom, that it was in heaven: and was mistaken in the place; (It is good for $\langle \diamond \rangle$ to be here;) yet he knew thus much, that eternity was not to be had upon earth; and therefore he spake but of tabernacles; Let us build here three Tabernacles. Let us build; well, men may build: yea let us build here; but what? not mansions, but tabernacles. Even in the midst of that unspeakable glory, that little map of blessedness, that abridgement of joy, and glimpse of heaven; he speaks but of tabernacles: putting a difference between mount Tabor and mount Zion. 2 Cor. 5.1. If our earthly house of this Tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands eternal in the heavens. He calls it not the Man, but the House: not of stone, but of mud-walls, Earthly: not a mansion, but a Tabernacle: not such as God made, but ourselves marred, Our house: not abolished, but Dissolved; then we have, not expectantly many years after our dissolution, but we presently have: not a tabernacle, but a Mansion: aedificatum, non adificandum; not to be built, but Built already: not by man, but by God; a Building of God, made without hands: not transient, but Eternal: not on earth, nor in the air, but in the supremest place; the heaven of Heavens. This leaving the Tabernacle, signifies a migration; not only Vnde, from the earth, but Quo, to the heavens. The loss of mortality precedes, the gain of immortality follows. Job 14.14. If a man die, shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come. The book of Job plentifully abounds with two things; Impressions of mortality, and Instructions of morality. It teacheth us that we must die, it teacheth us how we should live. Both are propounded and compounded in that verse. A man must die and live again, there is mortality: therefore all his appointed time, let him watch, there is for morality. There are four remarkable circumstances in it; A Dissolution, Restitution, Resolution, Revolution. If a man die, there is a Dissolution: he shall live again, there is a Restitution: all my days will I watch, there is a Resolution: till my changing come, there is a Revolution.

Man is by generation dust, by degeneration the ashes of that dust; mere rubbish. The soul in the body, as a prisoner in a dungeon, receives all through a grate. The body is but like Saint Peters Prison, and death as the Angel that frees us. Luk. 12.32. Fear not, little flock; it is my fathers will to give you the kingdom. Fear not; though you be now tossed about in tabernacles, I will gather you to a kingdom. Israel was a flock removed often, from Canaan to Egypt, from Egypt to the wilderness, but was at last folded in Judea. We are now often removed in tabernacles, we shall have an abiding place. John. 16. Nunc vado ad Patrem, saith CHRIST: Now I go to the Father: CHRIST led us we must follow him. He went to his father three ways. 1. Viâ Passionis, the way of his Passion; a sorrowful way. 2. Viâ Resurrectionis, the way of his Resurrection, a joyful way. 3. Viâ Ascensionis, the way of his Ascension, a glorious way. Psal. 47.5. God is gone up with a shout, the Lord with the sound of a trumpet. All this was for our sake. Hebr. 9.24. He entered into heaven, to appear in the presence of God for us. By those three works of CHRIST, we have three special benefits; all expressed by Paul, Eph. 2.5.6. By his passion he hath quickened us, by his resurrection, raised us up: by his ascension, Made ut sit in heavenly places. Now I go to the Father; Now, there is the brevity of this life, it is but a Nunc, Now. I go, there is the mutability of the world, Vadit, it fades like grace. To the Father, there is the glory of future blessedness, to be with God himself forever.

Indeed to the wicked death is more than a dissolution, even a destruction of the Tabernacle. Eccl. 41.1. O death how bitter is the remembrance of thee, to a man of prosperity! It is terrible, not only for the separation of his delights, but for the not separation of his sins. Beholding his sins with amazed eyes, he cries to them, Oh give me one hours liberty; when he shall say to his lusts, covetice, pride, drunkenness; Depart from me: and they shall answer; No, Tu nos egisti, opera tua sumus: thou hast made us, we are thy creatures; we will go with thee to judgment, we will dwell with thee in torment. Ejus est mortem timere, qui ad Christum nolit ire: ejus ad Christum nolle ire, qui non sperat cum Christo regnare. Let him fear death, that desires not to be with Christ: and let him refuse going to Christ, that hopes not for mercy of CHRIST.

But to the faithful, the grave is but a Chamber. Esa. 26.20. Come my people, enter thou into thy Chambers. But a Bed. Esa. 57.2. They shall rest in their beds. A very parlor, where the Lord shuts up our bodies with the key of Peace, and opens them again with the key of Resurrection. Unto this hope the Apostle lifts up our hearts by his own example. It is observable that to the two chief Apostles, Paul and Peter, God did afford this privilege; in this mortal life to have a taste of heavens joys; that they might more feelingly and effectually raise up our affections to that supernall City. Paul was wrap'd up to the third heaven, and so ravished with this joy, that he knew not whether he had his body about him or not. 2 Cor. 12.2. Whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell. And me thinks, when he comes down again out of heaven, he writes so contemptibly of these worldly things; that he calls them very dross and dung. Such respect hath any man of all things under the sun, that hath but tasted the sweetness of Paradise. So Peter, together with James and John, on Mount Tabor, saw a glimpse of heaven. They beheld it, that they might preach it, preaching: lift up our hearts to it: and our hearts being lifted up to it, might be blessed in it. On purpose they were shown this glory, that they might enflame our affections with it. Imagine that it were possible for the most worldly soul here, to be lifted up so high as Paul; be admitted to look into Paradise: to see that glorious society of Saints and Angels, and so much of that Beatifical vision as their nature is capable of: and from thence to look down again upon this earth, hanging like a little clod in the midst of the world: and see so many millions of men busied about nothing, like Ants on a molehill, or flies in a sun beam: how basely would he esteem this world, and contemn that which is now his glory, and for which he is content to venture his soul! Do you now wonder, that we so much commend that blessed rest? when one gazed long on Minervas picture another asks him the reason of such curious speculation: he answered, O, si me's haberes oculos: Oh that thou hadst my eyes! So, ô that you had Saint Peters eyes; you would not admire our admiration.

Put off, or Lay down. It is also voluntary; Depono. The Apostle calls himself a depositary, that hath a jewel committed to him on trust, which he is willing to surrender. A man that hath some precious treasure entrusted to him, is not only anxious to defend it from the violent attempts of others, or from their subtle underminings: but is also troubled in himself, with some invasion upon his own honesty, by a corrupt desire to possess it, and employ it at his own pleasure: and never finds full peace from these reluctations, till the proprietary resume it. So for this sparkling Jewel, our soul, which lightens our night of ignorance, and dark body of earth, lodging in our flesh: we are exercised with a continual trouble to preserve our life from sicknesses, and other offensive violences: and are tempted with covetousness to enlarge our term, to strengthen our tenure and state in it; and to make it so much our own, as to spend it unthriftilly upon lusts and surfeits: and we have no perfect peace till the giver receive it back: donec deposuimus a nobis, & reposuimus in Domino; till we have put it off from ourselves, and laid it up in God.

He doth lay it down being called for, not cast it away without bidding: that were not to lay it down, but to run away from it. God says, Thou shalt not kill: si non alium, multo minus teipsum: if thou mayest not kill another than much less thyself. Sapiens non fugere debet e vita, sed exire, Sen. The wise man doth not run out of his life, but maturely go out. This life is a warfare, where God hath placed some in the foreward, some in the Rere, some in the wings, others in the main battle: every man hath his station, and must not depart from it without his Nunc dimittis, without his Passport. Neither light of nature, nor light of grace, directs a man to put out the light of his own life.

Not nature: Paul calls death an Enemy: Now, no man loves an enemy properly, and for his own sake, quatenus inimicus, so far as he is an enemy. Homicida in se, insepultus abijciatur, saith Seneca. It is pity any hands should bury him, whom his own hands have slain. We may say of a self-murderer, as it was said of Cato; Occidit se, ne dicat, Caesar me servavit: he slew himself, rather than he would say, Caesar hath saved me: so that man kills himself, lest CHRIST should save him. Cleombrotus read Plato's Phaedo unadvisedly; otherwise he would not have destroyed a mortal body to make way for an immortal soul. Scripta Platonis non ita erant animo percipienda tuo. The poet by that natural light condemned such attempts, Qui sibi lethum, Insontes peperere manu, &c. Quam vellent aethere in alto, Nunc & pauperiem & duros perferre Labores! Those that have extricated themselves from misery on earth, by an unnatural violence upon themselves; if they might be restored to life again, they would endure ten thousand times more with patience. God hath tied the soul and body together with such a passionate love, that they cannot part without grief. Man is borne with little insensible pain, but dies with extreme anguish. If the wisdom of God had not interposed that let to timorous nature, there would have been many Lucreces, Cleopatra's, Ahithophel's; so many willful funeralls, that good Laws should have found small opportunity of execution. But as God would have our birth bitter to our mothers, that they might love us the dearer: so he would have our death bitter to ourselves, that we might the more fear to hasten it. Man saith; it is a miserable privation for him, that hath seen the stars, the sun in his glory, and the heavens reconciled with the fruitful earth, both sympathising in our benefit: for that man to be tumbled into a silent grave, neither seeing nor seen, uncapable of comfort! now what nature loathes, thy own sober heart dislikes, and God detests, do not accomplish.

Not Grace, for all such in holy writ have their brands; as Achitophel, Saul, Judas. They slew indeed Malos, sed Male; evil men, but after a worse manner. Our Savior's direction was; When you are persecuted in one City, fly into the next. He says not, dispatch yourselves lest your enemies triumph over you; nor get others to do it that you may escape further torments: but save yourselves by flight, run not out of your own lives. Non recipio animam, quae me nolente egreditur de vita. God will refuse that soul, which leaves the body before himself call for it. It is objected, that Sampson did this, yet he is reckoned in the Legend and kalendar of Saints, Heb. 11. But his fact cannot be excused, but that by divine revelation it was warranted. Nisi quia latenter Spiritus hoc jusserat; unless the Spirit of God did infuse this into him, who purposed to work miracles by him, Aug. He prayed to the Lord, he was heard of the Lord: therefore I doubt not but his motion was divinely inspired. For God after that his strength was departed, assisted him in the act. Therefore as Augustine says of Abraham's offering up of Isaac; That which without God's command had been no less than madness; when GOD commands it, proves obedience.

But Rhasis is commended for this. 2 Maccab. 14.42. He fell upon his sword, choosing rather to die manfully, &c. Even that commendation is warrant enough, to raise the book out of the Scriptural Canon. But he called upon the Lord of life and spirit to restore his bowels again: alas, this shall be common to the very reprobates. Yes, but he died nobly: it had been a better report to have died humbly. He did it saith the Author, manfully: and I do not say, that he did it womanly. It was Magne, but not Bene factum: far more Roman, than Christian.

But those Virgins in the sack of Rome, that to prevent the Ravisher slew themselves, are praised. Saint Augustine refutes those praises; It is an error to think, that whatsoever is done on us, is also done of us. For then were chastity a virtue of the body, not of the mind. The polluted mind makes the body stained, though it did never act: but the body abused by violence cannot make the unconsenting mind guilty. Was Tamar to be condemned, because Amnon did defile her? It is Consent, that maketh the sin: as Augustine said of Tarquin and Lucrece. Duo fuerunt, & unus adulterium commisit: there were two persons in the action, yet but one offender; the other being not an actor, but a sufferer. Why then did Lucrece kill her self? If she were unchaste, why is she honored? if she were chaste, why was she murdered? Si non est illa impudicitia, quâ invita comprimitur; non est haec justitia, quâ casta unitur. If that were no unchastitie, where a woman is ravished: then this is no justice, wherein a chaste woman is punished. But saith the Matron or Virgin, If I be ravished and surviue, the world will say, it was done with my will, what world? that which est positus in maligno, knows nothing else but wickedness. Howsoever, David's testimony is sufficient; Lord, thou knowest mine innocence. But it is opposed, that the fear of death and cruelty may make them consent to these constuprations. How can they tell, what extremity may work upon them? What then? Satius certum homicidium in praesenti, quàm incertum adulterium in futuro? Is it better to commit a present murder, than hazard a future rape? Shall we perpetrate a certain sin, to prevent an uncertain shame? Shall we do that we cannot live to repent, to avoid that we may live to repent? Oh let them, and let themselves alone that they may recover themselves; before they go whence they shall not return, even to the land of darkness and shadow of death, Job 10.20. Saint Augustine decides it; Non sit vobis vita vestra taedio, quamvis fuerit hostibus castitas vestra ludibrio. Do not you make havoc of your souls, because others have abused your bodies. Paul was in a strait betwixt this double choice, of life or death. Phil. 1.23. Though he was desirous to die, yet he was content to live. Quasi sapiens amplectitur mortis lucrum, tamen quasi so vus non refugit vitae obsequium, Ambros. In his wisdom he could choose the gain of death, yet in his obedience he refuseth not the service of life.

But to do this argues a stout and valiant mind, fearless of death. Indeed such may be more admired for stoutness of mind, than commended for soundness of wisdom. But that is not magnanimity, but rather the greatest cowardice. Nature it self teacheth, that there is more valor to endure a miserable life, than to embrace a wretched death. That is far the greater mind, quae vitam arumnosam potest magis ferre, quàm fugere. There is no sorrow, no shame, no misery; that should force a Christian to so desperate a prevention. The servants of God never did this, when their souls were heavy to the death: their bodies in Job's plight, when a prick could have ended all his woes: when the pulling away of the pillow would have eased all their griefs. They never paid the debt of nature, till their creditor called on them for it: which time they would never have stayed, if the service of their own hands might lawfully have released them. But as we cannot live without a Permittis, so we must not die without a Dimittis. Some that enjoy the worlds Paradise, desire to live: others that endure the worlds Purgatory, desire to die. Saint Augustine's rule is good for both. Si habes vitam in desiderio, habet mortem in patientia: habet vitam in patientia, si habes mortem in desiderio. Though thou desire life in thy election, yet embrace death in thy patience and admit life in thy patience, though death be in thy desires. When God calls, be not troubled to put off thy Tabernacle: till God calls, be not troubled to keep on thy Tabernacle.

The causes of this unnatural sin, are many. 1. Impatience of crosses: if they cannot have their will on others, in a cursed heart they will have their will on themselves. And so leap like some fishes, out of the boiling caldron into the broiling flame. As Dido; Sic, sic juvat ire sub umbras. 2. Ambition of a name, and to be famous in the world for Heroicall spirits. Yet alas, they are plagued in that they affected, for their memories stinks above ground. Such a fire was in the blood of Rhasis. 3. Preservation of chastity: so Pelagia at fifteen years old. This is a grievous folly to save the body from deflouring, by deflouring the soul. 4. Infidelity; when they have no faith in God, nor hope of good issue out of troubles. Thus did the younger Cato, to avoid the tyrrannie of Caesar. God holds it a great indignity to him, not to be trusted: therefore justly plagues diffidence with desperateness. 5. Pride; when a man will not submit himself to God's will: but will choose not to be at all; unless he may be as he list himself. 6. Cruelty to others. Nero that was so artificial in cutting throats, at last runs on his own sword, saying: I have lived dishonorably, I will die shamefully. Saul being so bloodied against David and the Priests, became as unmerciful to himself, to wreake his teene on his own bowels. Judas that was so cruel against the innocent blood of his Master became as cruel against the nocent blood of himself. Achitophel thirsting after David's life, became as ill minded against himself. He that is thus savage and merciless to himself, to whom will he be merciful? Let no man think him a friend, that is his own enemy. Trust not such a one: who spares not his own blood, will never spare mine. 7. Desperation; when a man thinks that all the doors of mercy are shut against him; and there is no goodness enough for him in JESUS CHRIST.

But I forget myself, and hold you too long in disputing a question, which many a one hath disputed against himself in a moment of time, without reply: not with tongue, but with hand: not with sharpness of wit, but of sword. I will pronounce nothing determinatly of any particular person: but we shall find it to be the end of usurers, murderers, traitors, and such branded wretches. I know the mercy of God may come, Inter pontem & fontem, inter gladium & jugulum; betwixt the bridge and the brook, betwixt the knife and the throat: and repentance may be suggested to the heart in a moment; in that very instant. But this only may be: there is no promise for it, many threatenings against it, little likelihood of it. It were madness for thee to break thy neck, to try the skill of a Bone-setter. Tarry, till God calls, patiently, and then lay down thy tabernacle cheerfully, and the Lord Jesus will receive thy spirit in mercy.

The use of this point serves to reprove the hasty wishers for death. In the least extremity; let me die. Some of the Saints have not escaped this infirmity. Elias, 1 King. 19.4. He arose, and went for his life to Beersheba; and after that a days journey into the wilderness; all to scape Jezebel: yet when he was there, he requested for himself that he might die. It is enough, now, O Lord, take away my life: for I am not better than my Fathers. In the morning he fled for his life: at evening being a little weary, he prays for death. So Jonah; first cries earnestly for life, Chap. 2. Out of the belly of hell I cried, and thou heardest my voice. Some days after he begs and sues for death, Chap. 4.3. Take, O Lord, I beseech thee, my life from me: for it is better for me to die than to live. Because Jezebel pursues him in the world, therefore Elias must needs out of the world: because the Ninevites did not die, therefore Jonah will not live. If they had then departed, the one had died fainting, & the other had died chafing. They that desire death in passion, desire it only for fashion. For when sickness, Deaths messenger comes, Medici adducuntur, munera promittuntur; Physicians are consulted, rewards promised, prayers conceived, vows offered, that death may be deferred, Aug. You remember the Fable of the old man with the burden of sticks; wherewith being overladen, and weary of his misery, he calls for Death to come to him. Death came, took him at his word, and asked him what he would with him. But he answered, quickly turning both his mind and language; I desire thy help to bear my burden of sticks for me. Young Clitipho in the Comedy, being abridged of his lusts, had nothing in his disconted mouth, but Emori cupio, I would fain die. The wiser father replied; My son, Priùs disce quid sit vivere; First learn what it is to live. Desire life with aged Simeon, till thou hast got the Lord Jesus in thine arms: without whom the first death will be terrible, the second death intolerable. Bern. Tu quomodo exhibis anima misera, quae ducem itineris Dominum Iesum non nosti? Miserable soul, with what courage canst thou set on thy way, which knowest not the guide of the journey, Jesus Christ? If a man should live as long as Methushalem, if his head were as white as snow, yet it is not fit to melt till he have known Christ. Though his skin were as writhled as parchment, yet it is not time to be folded up, till his soul be ripe in the faith. If he knows not Jesus, he is not fit to die. Let us then desire to put off this Tabernacle, when we are sure of that immortal clothing. 2 Cor. 5.4. We do groan in this Tabernacle, not that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life. Then let us wish to leave the earth, when we perfectly know the way to heaven. Desire to live till you are inspired with grace, desire to die when you are assured of glory.

Shortly] I must put it off; this is the last circumstance; the Deposition is instant. How the Apostle was assured of his approaching dissolution, I will not yet examine; but refer it to the due place, which concerns his Revelation. That which I here only observe, is his principal intention; to express his own diligence, and to convey into their hearts a more powerful acceptance of his holy counsels, because his time is short. Velox depositio.

First, to strengthen his own diligence; Quo brevior operandi opportunitas, eo major operandi sedulitas; The less space a man hath allowed for his business, the more he should plie it. Pancioribus diebus, potioribus argumentis; The fewer days the fruitfuller lessons! John. 9.4. I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day. Neere to his end he washed the Disciples feet, preached Sermon upon Sermon, of humility, charity, fervency: revealed many things before secreted: Haec ab initio non dixi vobis; I told you not these things from the beginning. Jacob gave his best blessing in his last Will: Moses made the best Sermon to Israel near his end: David gave the best counsel to Solomon on his death-bed. Peter plies his preaching and writing, when he knows there follows instant silence. Rev. 12.12. The Devil hath great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time. As he is never idle, so then most busy, when he perceives his term of rage expiring. Therefore let not God's Ministers be negligent, for they have but their time, and that is short. May we all spend it to the peace of our consciences, the good of the Church, and the honor of our Maker?

Secondly, to beget zeal and embracing of his doctrine in our hearts. The words of dying-men have been most emphatical, most effectual. We remember what our Fathers or friends spake last, because we hear them not speak again. The last words of good men are best: as the last glimpse of the candle is the most bright: the last glare of the Sun going down most clear: the last speech of a dear friend parting with his friends, and departing out of the world, is usually most compassionate and pathetic. An admonition uttered by such a Teacher, and at such a time, and to such an auditory; challengeth good attention, great devotion. Phil. ver. 9. For loves sake I beseech thee, being such an one as Paul the aged. This was his adjuration of Philemon, to grant his request for Onesimus. He is a Preacher of Christ, hear him: an Apostle, hear him: a dying Apostle, O now or never hear him. We preach today, perhaps not be able tomorrow: this Sermon may be the last Sermon: therefore hear while you may, lest you desire it when you may not. He that will be good at last, must begin at first. Occasion is like Manna, it must be gathered before the Sun is up: or like the pool of Bethesda, we must enter as soon as it is stirred by the Angel. If we preach, must you not hear? If we preach today, ought not you hear today? I mean not only with your ears, hear us with your hearts. Shew us not only our Sermon in your Tablets, let us see it in your hands: work it, and so preach it again over with your fingers. Be not mere earthly merchants, to fill your sails, and fill your ships, and fill your shops, and fill your houses; and cannot fill your souls. They write of some Traffickers on the coast of Lapland, that they often buy their winds of the Devil. Take heed, you that grow so rich in purse, and poor in conscience, lest you buy your wealth of the Devil. The learning of most Preachers in the Land, at one time or other, in one place or other; doth empty it self within your walls. Yet, the wickedness of the greater part, hath brought a scandal on the better part. And it is a Country prayer, God bless us from the Citizens of London: they will hear three Sermons a day, but deceive ten plain men in an hour: they have so much preaching, that they are the worse. Poor souls, they are mistaken in this: men's wickedness comes not by too much preaching, but by too little practicing. The Lord work in us a conscionable obedience, that we may not hear to our condemnation, but comfort. Nostrum est dicere, vestrum agere, D•• perficere, Cyril. It is our part to preach, yours to practice, God's to accomplish.

Even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shown me.] This is the Revelation or Premonition of the Apostles death. Some refer this ad genus mortis, to the kind and manner of his death: Others, ad tempus moriendi, to the time of his dying. Some say, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 signifies modum obitus sui, the manner of his departure; that he shall So die as Christ shown him. Others understand by the word 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, velox; that he was to die shortly, because the Lord had revealed the instance of his departure. I know that I must not abide long upon earth: for Christ's Word, Oraculum veritatis, hath spoke it: and I am sure to find veritatem oraculi, to suffer it.

They that refer it to the Manner, conceive this Revelation to be given him. John. 21.18. When thou wast young, &c. It is added, ver. 19. This he spake, signifying by what death he should glorify

God. So that if this be the ground of the Revelation, certainly it intends rather quomodo than quando, rather the manner, than the time. So August. Extendes manus tuas, hoc est, Cruci; Thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, that is, to the Cross. Tunc Petrus ab altero cingitur, cum cruce astringitur, Tertul. Then was Peter girded by another; when he was fastened to the Cross. That Peter was crucified, is the current and universal consent of History. First, verse. 17. If thou lovest me, feed my sheep: Christ told Peter in what vocation he should live: then in the next verse, after what manner he should die, which questionless must be a violent death, of martyrdom, though the particular kind be not specified. At last he concludes and alludes to both; Follow me. Theophil. Aret. Be thou such a Pastor in feeding my sheep, such a Pastor in suffering for my sheep, as I have given thee example, John. 13.36. Peter asked his Master, whither he went. JESUS answered; Whither I go, thou canst not follow me now: but thou shalt follow me afterwards. JESUS remembering this conference, together with his question; Why cannot I follow thee now? and his Resolution, I will lay down my life for thy sake; tells him, John. 21.18. When thou wast young, thou girdedst thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldst, Rupert. Maldonat. When thou wast a youngling in the faith, and didst gird thyself with thine own strength; it was thy folly to think thou couldst follow me whither I went. Therefore by denying me thrice, thou didst prove my words true; Whither I go, thou canst not follow me now. But when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thine hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldst not. When thou shalt feel the weakness in thyself, and grow strong in the Lord, my other saying will prove true; Thou shalt follow me afterwards They that say this, [Follow me] intends the manner of his death, that he should follow him in being crucified as Christ was; have strange eyes. It is not good to find out more in Scripture; than God meant should be found there.

Some contend that this Revelation here mentioned, is not that John. 21. for they say, it was not given at Jerusalem; à Christo jam resurrecto, by Christ immediately risen again: but at Rome, à Christo jam ascenso, by Christ after his Ascension. So Ambrose and Gregory cite this history from Linus, upon the Acts of Peters Passion. But Origen, Tom. 7. in Johan. referreth it to Paul, and that a great deal more probably than to Peter. The story is this: Peter being at Rome, imprisoned by Nero, and sentenced to death; by the importunity of the people, persuading him to save himself; and by the opportunity of Processus and Martinianus concession, who were governors of the watch; was over-ruled, and fled. Comming to the gates of Rome, there Christ met him. Peter asketh him, Domine quo venis? Cui Christus, venio iterum crucifigi; Lord, whither comest thou? Christ answered, I come again to be crucified. Now Peter knowing that Christ had an impassible and immortal body, Intellexit Dominum crucifigendum in servo; Presently apprehended, that the Lord was to be crucified in the servant. Hereupon he came back, and died on the Cross to honor Christ, that had died on the Cross to save Peter. Our credit answers this Story, as country-men do the report of Travelers; They will rather believe it, than go to see it: Mallemittere, quàm quaerere. Whether Peter were crucified at Rome or not, we are not certain: but that Peter is dead, we are certain: on this let us rest, that we may rest with Peter.

They that refer it to the time of his dying, understand it thus. Calvin. That Peter should die, he knew in general; that he should die a Martyr, he knew in particular. John. 21.19. Signifying by what death he should glorify God. But that he should die Shortly, he could not know, except by some later revelation in special. It is probable, that where Peter wrote this Epistle, even there he received this Revelation. But it is manifest that he wrote this Epistle at Babylon: for he wrote the second, where he wrote the first; Chap. 3 ver. 1. but he wrote the former at Babylon, 1 Pet 5.13. The Church that is at Babylon elected, together with you, saluteth you; and so doth Marcus my son. Therefore it is more likely and consonant to reason, that Peter died at Babylon, than as the Papists say, at Rome. Here they will distinguish, though thereby they destroy. They say directly, that by Babylon is meant Rome; even that Babylon. Rev. 17.5. The mother of harlots and abominations of the earth, is Ipsa Roma, very Rome. So Papias in Euseb. To have some proof that Peter was at Rome, they are content to allow that Rome is Babylon. So that Babylonis fuisse, is all one with Romae praefuisse; for Peter to be at Babylon, and to be Bishop of Rome, there is no difference. The infamy of that damnable name doth not deter them, so they may have some pretence of their Apostolical title. Indeed they do not so much care for Christ, Modo Petrus illis relinquatur, so they may enjoy Peter. Calvin. Let them but retain the name of Peters Chair, Suam Romam in profundis Inferis collocare non recusabunt; They will not refuse to seat their Rome in infernal Babylon. Much good do it them: if they will not stick to call their glorious Church, stigmaticall and accursed Babylon; surely we need not stick much to allow them that Peter was at Rome. But hear we further.

We say, that this local Babylon was not Rome, but that great City in Egypt, now called Cayr or Alcayr; which they say to be thirteen or fourteen Germane miles about. For Babylon is typical Rome, not Rome topicall Babylon. The Apostle did not speak aenigmatically, by a Riddle: he did not date his Epistle from a place so called in an allegorical sense. Letters are dated from Cities or places so usually called. Indeed Rome in the Revelation, is called Mystical Babylon: but this was not the first Rome, Qualis erat sub Christo, As it was in the days of Christ: but the last Rome, Qualis erat sub Antichristo; Such as it should be under Antichrist. But Saint Peter writing at and from Babylon, doth yet handle no point concerning the seat and rule of Antichrist there. Which plainly showeth that Antichrist should reign, not in material; but in mystical Babylon. Thus they have gotten it allowed, that Rome is Babylon: but it still remains to prove, that Peter was at Rome when he was at Babylon.

The Apostle says that Mark was with him, 1 Pet. 5.13. My son Marcus saluteth you. Now Mark is said to be constituted the first Bishop of Alexandria in Egypt; where he was put to death, and buried, Nicephor. But these adversaries affirm, that Peter was at Rome five and twenty years: now if Mark kept his Episcopal seat in Alexandria, how could he be with Saint Peter at Rome? Who can untie this knot? Admit that Peter was at Babylon; and then Mark might easily be with him; for both those Cities were in Egypt.

Divers have opinioned that Peter died at Jerusalem, by warrant of that place, Matth. 23.34. Some of them shall ye crucify: Ye, that is, the Jews. Now if any of the Apostles were crucified there, it must be Peter: for none of the rest was crucified in Jerusalem.

Lastly, it cannot be proved, that Peter was at Rome, at all. For first, Paul fourteen years after his first coming to Jerusalem, found Peter there: as it is undeniably evident, Gal. 2.1. and 9. At which time they celebrated that Apostolical Council, Act. 15. Giving the right-hands of fellowship, that Paul should preach to the Heathen, and Peter to the Circumcision. If any say, that Peter came from Rome to the Council; what time then had he to visit Antioch, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, to all which Churches he preached? 2. When Saint Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans, Saint Peter was not at Rome: otherwise he would not have forgotten so great a Pillar in his liberal salutations. Chap. 16. He mentions many, but no word of Saint Peter. 3. When Paul came to Rome, Peter was not there: he sent Epistles from Rome, and many commendations from the Brethren: as appears, Col. 4.10. Philem. ver. 23. but no remembrance from Peter. If Peter had been at Rome, Paul would not have forgotten to send greeting from him. Yet more plain, 2 Tim. 4.11. Only Luke is with me: then Peter was not there. Ver. 16. At my first answer (ϕ) man stood to me: had Peter been there, he would not have forsaken Paul. 4. It was fitter for Peter to be at Babylon, (for Gal. 2.7. The Gospel of Circumcision was committed unto him) that he might follow the Countries most frequented with his own people.

I conclude this point; if Peter received the oracle of his death so near, at Babylon; he must fly over seas and mountains if he died at Rome. But howsoever, the Romists will have it so: and rather than not domineer over all the world with the Chair of Peter at Rome, they will sink down to hell with cursed Babylon. Albeit S. John Lateran challengeth Peter's head, Poytiers in France his nether jaw with the beard on it; Triers many of his bones, Geneva part of his brain, which was found to be a Pumice stone; yet still Rome must have his body, and boast of his Sepulcher. Let them have it without our envy, so long as we keep the true and only Head, the LORD JESUS CHRIST.

Now to speak to ourselves more usefully: howsoever our Apostle had some special premonstrance of the nearness of his end, yet this is not common. So had Aaron, Num. 20.26. Aaron shall be gathered to his people, and die in Mount Horeb, Deut. 32.50. Moses knew that he should die in Mount Nebo. Luke 2.26. Simeon had a revelation by the Holy Ghost, that he should not see death, before he had seen the Lord's CHRIST. Though old age and consumptions be Prognostica & indicia vitae brevitatis; Certain signs and forewarners of approaching death: yet the condition, manner, and hour of our departure; is always kept secret from us.

Howsoever, it is observable that this Apostle died in a good age; an old man. John. 21.18. When thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands. Long life is given as a blessing to such as preserve obedience. Honor thy father and mother, that thy days may be long in the Land. Prov. 3.16. In the right hand of wisdom, is length of days. But disobedience shortens our time. Psal. 55.23. The wicked men shall not Dimidiare dies suos; live out half their days. Psal. 109.8. Let his days be few. Eccles. 7.17. The sinner shall die, Tempore non suo, before his time. It was threatened to Eli, 1 Sam. 2.32. that there should not be an old man of his house. It is not evermore a curse to be barred of old age. Josiah, whose name is sweet, as music at a banquet of wine, died young, that he might not see the evil to come. A son of wicked Jeroboam was promised this for a favor, because there was found in him some good thing toward the Lord, 1 King. 14.13. It is a mercy, when the Lord takes away his children so young, that they be neither affected with the evil of action, nor afflicted with the evil of passion. A man lives too long, if until Non desideratus, that nobody desires him to live any longer. The world is soon weary of an old man, especially of an old Minister. Can he no longer answer their expectation? turn him out of his place: this is their mercy. The Levite might not serve after fifty: what then, must he lose his maintenance? no, he had the same provision still. A man will not cast away his Dog being old, because he hath done him service.

Let not the young Minister despise the old: when one said to his friend, while he was looking on an old man; You see not Hominem sed umbram, not a man, but the shadow of a man: it was answered, that an old man's shadow was oftentimes better than a young man's whole body. Athanasius was very old: yet upon his shoulder, our Mother the Church leaned, in her sharpest persecutions, to take her rest. Nor yet let the old despise the young. The Spirit of God is not bound to age, nor is wisdom tied to years. It is not with senses, as it is with wines, the older the better. There may be a young man of sixty, and an old man of twenty years. Young David may excel his teachers: Daniel was a young Prophet, Solomon a young King, Samuel a young Priest, John a young Evangelist, Aquilinus Discipulus; Timothy a young Bishop, Timothy was so young, that Paul calls him Son: yet Timothy was acquainted with Christ, before Paul was acquainted with Timothy. 2 Tim. 3 15. He knew the Scriptures from a child, which made him wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus. Yet Paul is called his Father; first, because he did instruct him more perfectly: so they were called the Sons of the Prophets, whom the Prophets taught. And because he did minister to Paul, as to a father. Now though he was Aetate filius, tamen dignitate Episcopus; For age a son, yet for dignity a Bishop. Some say he was chosen to such a place, Ob penuriam temporis; but they manifest penuriam ingenii. No, saith Ambrose; Iuvenis ill nil juvenile habuit; That youth retained no youthful humors. A young man with his undowned chin, whose face hath not yet discovered to the world of what sex he is; may be old in the gifts of the Spirit. It is an old proverb; Cucullus non facit Monachum; A well shooted beard striving for length with the cassocke, makes not a Priest. Ministers must be young before they be old: Ordinate ad ordinem, non saltando, sed ascendendo; proceeding orderly, not by jumpes, but by degrees. First, they are tried with a less charge: For, Qui non been regit naviculam in fluvio, non regit navem in oceano; He that rules not well a small vessel in the river, trust him not with a ship in the sea. A young man may often say, My youthful affections are dead, and I live; when an old man shall have passed many years in the world, and yet is scarce a day old in Christ.

Now seeing I am fallen upon the point of old-age, let me consider two things: the miseries by nature incident, and the comforts by grace accident to it.

The miseries are many, partly mental, partly corporal. Mental are the worst: Sordities, ira, nummorum copia mira: His natura senis tribus est infecta venenis. They will covet, as if they were to begin a new race of four-score years. Quo minus via restat, eo plus viatici quaerunt; The less journey they have to go, the greater provision they make. Plautus quoteth it as a wonder, to see an old man bountiful: Benignitas hujus sicut adolescentuli est.

Multa senem circumveniunt incommoda; vel quid

Quaerit, & inventis miser abstinet, ac timet uti.

Many miseries wait upon old men: first, they greedily seek, and then they miserably forbear, what they have found. Ignorance and Arrogance meet in unsanctified old age. For Ignorance, Hosea 7.9. Gray hairs are here and there upon him, yet he knoweth not. Senescit, being cut into two words, is quasi Se nescit, or nescit se: as if Senescere, were all one with Se nescire. For Arrogance; it takes away wisdom from the young, and all true knowledge, as if they were weifths and strays, proper only to it self, as Lord of the soil; and conjures all learning into the circle of its own night-cap. This is the first and the worst misery of old age; when a man is just come back again to a child. When he is only Laudator temporis acti, se puero; praising the ancient times so vehemently, as if he would sell them, and forgetting the present days to use them.

Corporal miseries are innumerable; Morbúsqe est ipsa Senectus; Even old age it self is a disease. Sometimes it hath been without any great decay of senses. It is said of Moses, Deut. 34.7. When he was an hundred years old, his eyes were not dim, nor his natural force abated. So Joshua said of himself, Josh. 14.11. As yet I am as strong this day, as I was when Moses sent me. Eccles. 46.9. The Lord gave also strength unto Caleb, which remained with him unto his old age. But the strength of old age is not a certain and infallible argument of God's favor: his grace is not to be sought in outward blessings. Most commonly it is a feeble estate: Eccles. 12.5. The very Grasshopper is a burden to it. Even the old man himself is a burden, Vxori, natisque, sibique; to his wife, to his children, to himself. As Barzillai said to David, 2 Sam. 19.35. I am fourscore years old, and can I discern between good and evil? Can thy servant taste what I eat? Can I hear anymore the voice of singers? Old age, we say, is a good guest, and should be made welcome; but that he brings such a troop with him; blindness, aches, coughes, &c. these are troublesome, how should they be welcome? Psal. 90.10. Their strength is labor and sorrow: if their very strength, which is their best, be labor and grief; what is their worst? Hast thou Senses? use them to God's glory: hast thou ears? hear: eyes? read: tongue? pray: hands? work that which is good. Use thy members while thou hast them, because they will fail. Are they defective? be patient, and say with the Prophet, Non sum melior patribus meis; I am not better than my Fathers. Art thou blind, and canst not behold something thou wouldest see? yet for amends, thou escapest something thou wouldest not see. When Julian upbraided a Bishop being blind; Why doth not the Galilean help thee; he answers, I am glad that I am blind, and so cannot see thee the Monster of men. All these infirmities bring us to the grave, but we shall leave them there. Thou sayest, this stitch will bring me to my grave, yet shalt thou then bid it farewell: thou shalt rise without gowte or blindness or any other imperfection. Doest thou feel a declining of thy senses by age? know that death cannot be far off. Death is as near to the young, as to the old: here is all the difference: death stands behind the young man's back, before the old man's face. Senibus mors est in januis, Iuventuti in insidiis, Bern. Iuvenes cito mori possunt, Senes diu vivere non possunt. Young men may soon die, old men cannot long live. They must go speedily; that they may go comfortably, let them make sure to themselves the favor of Christ.

Thus much of the Inconveniences, now of the comforts of old age: which are Scientia Christi, & conscientia been peratae vitae; the true knowledge of CHRIST, and the comfortable remembrance of a good life spent in his service. Let us be sure to live been, well; no matter

Quam diu, how long. Let us not be greedy of old age, but say? Here am I, let him do with me as seemeth him best. God will not judge us how long, but how well, we have lived, Hieron. But betwixt him that hath lived twenty years, and him that hath lived twenty score years, what is the difference? Nisi quod senex magis onustus peccatorum fasce proficiscitur: unless that the old man goes away more laden with the burden of his sins, Sen. One man eateth more, another less; what matters it, when either is full? He drinks more, I less; but neither of us thirsts. Ille pluribus annis vixit, hic paucioribus; quid refert? Si tam illum multi anni beatum fecerunt, quàm hunc? That man hath lived many years, this man fewer; what is the difference? If the few years of the one hath made him as blessed, as the many years of the other? Look rather to the goodness of thy life, than to the length: Longum aevum habuerunt plurimi, pauci faelicem, Sen. Ante senectutem curavi ut bene vivam, in senectute ut bene moriar. While I was young, my care was to live well: now I am old, my care is to die well.

Old age may be good three ways. Naturally, when it is accompanied with sense, and not overtaken with decay of those necessary Organs. Barzillai had an old age, but not a good old age. Morally, when it is led by the line of virtue; when Justice hath balanced it, fortitude quickened it, Temperance dieted it, and Charity quieted it. Constitution and country may make it naturally good: but it is then morally good, when a man likes it so well, that he would not wish it to begin again. Spiritually good; and this is best when a man can look both ways: backward with comfort to his life past, forward with joy to his reward to come. Pulchrum est ante obitum consummari vitam.

Will you know when old age is a blessing? principally, when a man hath sure handfast of CHRIST; as Simeon. He desired not to die sooner, he desired not to live longer: Nunc dimittis, now Lord send away thy servant in peace. It was promised Abraham, Gen. 15.15. that he should go to his Fathers in peace, and be buried in a good old age. Now there is no peace without CHRIST: whoever dies in peace, he dies in CHRIST the Prince of peace. Abraham died many hundred years before Christ was borne; yet John. 8.56. Abraham rejoiced to see my day: he saw it, and was glad: he saw him with the eyes of faith. Gen. 25.8. Then Abraham gave up the ghost, and died in a good old age, an old man and full of years. There is Mortis facilitas, aetatis faelicitas, vitae satietas: He gave up the ghost, willingly surrendered it; it was not rent from him; there is the easiness of death. In a good old age, not tempest-beaten with troubles, and wearied out with vexations; there is the happiness of age. An old man and full of years, like corn ripe and white for the barn of joy; there is the fullness of life. When a man is assured of peace in heaven, he is then, Satur dierum full of days.

Again, when a man is old in knowledge and obedience, his age is blessed. Prov 16.31. The hoary head is a Crown of glory, if it be found in the way of righteousness, If we may say of it, as Boaz of Ruth, Ruth. 3.10. that it is better in the latter end, than at the beginning. The Israelite gathered every day a Homer full of Manna: but on he day before the Sabbath two Homers full. Be gathering in youth every day a little; but in old age twice so much, because thy Sabbath is near. Old men are busy to gather goods for their posterity, but their fittest employment should be to gather grace for themselves. It is thy last time of gathering, therefore plie it. Gen. 18.12. As Sara said, Shall I lust now I am old? So shall I covet now I am old? shall I be drunk now I am old? shall I lie now I am old? Those courses are reprovably in youth, damnable in age. The gray head is a shame, if it be found in the way of wickedness. As our bodies decrease in strength, our souls must increase in grace: mending the unsoundness of our limbs, with the soundness of our lives: recompensing a weak body with a strong faith. No marvel if thy Ages reverend flood ebbs into air, when thou art old, not good! where thy moral corruption is greater than thy mortal corruption: and the conscience is more rotten than the carcase. It is a common saying; He that will be old long, must be old while he is young. Express the sobriety of age in thy youth, that the remembrance of thy youth may sweeten the bitterness of thy age. A young Saint, an old Angel? So then let us spend our life in the thriftiness of grace; that when youth hath ended infancy, age ended youth, and death ended all; we may be young again in heaven. Into which eternal doors old age shall never enter: but everybody shall be made young forever, strong forever, healthful forever, beautiful forever; fashioned like to the glorious body of Christ, and in that glory be preserved forever and ever.

Even as our LORD JESUS CHRIST hath shown me. I am still in the same text, and not out of the same subject; mortality: to teach you a comfortable deposition of your Tabernacle. Oh that you would hear me so well this once, that of the same matter you need not hear me again. Let me encourage your attention thus far, that in this very Theme, as Seneca said in his travels, I shall be Semper novus; always new. Peter had a revelation concerning his death: somewhat was told him of the time of his death, somewhat of the manner, somewhat perhaps of the place. Yet by no collection is it found, that he knew for time the day; nor for manner, the direct quality and kind; nor for place, punctually such a space or plot of ground. He knew much, we are not allowed it: therefore ought we to have the more preparation, by how much we have the less revelation. For methods sake, that I may not lose your attention, nor your attention lose me; that we may draw all to a Sum; Consider somewhat for substance, somewhat for circumstance. For substance, that Abeundum est nobis, we must die: for circumstance, Vbi, Quomodo, quando; How, Where, and When. To all these we resolve an answer like the Grand Jury: to the former we say, it is Billa vera: for the other we give up an Ignoramus. We know that we must depart; this is a true Bill: we know not how, where, or when; this is our Ignoramus.

For the Resolution; men must die; and the Apostle calls death the Dissolution of life. For the marriage of the soul to the body is the bond of life, the dissolution of this bond is death. This divorce must be suffered, one husband must be lost: happy are we if we find another in heaven, Jesus Christ. Morieris, non quia aegrotas, sed qui vivis; saith the Philosopher. Thou shalt die, not because thou art sick, but because thou art alive. Cui nasci contigit, mori restat, Sen. He that comes into this world, must go out of this world. It is no new thing to die, for life it self is nothing else but a journey to death. Quicquid ad summum pervenit, ad exitum properat. Whatsoever hath aspired to the highest, must descend to the lowest. Hebr. 9.27. It is appointed unto men to die once: it is a Statute-law decreed in the high Parliament of heaven. God so threatened Adam, Gen. 2.17. In the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die. But Adam lived above 900. years after? yet was there no delay nor evasion of God's doom; for he presently became mortal, and fell into a consumption, that never left him till it had brought him to the grave. Quisquis queritur hominem mortuum esse, queritur hominem fuisse, Sen.

Whosoever complains that a man is dead, complains that he was a man. Thus for the certain substance; now for the uncertain circumstance.

We know not the manner of our departure, or how we shall die. Vnus intro•tus, innumeri exitus. There is but one way to come into the world, a thousand ways •o go out. What matters it, whether by an enemies sword, or by the fit of an •gue, seeing we must depart. Job compares man's life to a Flower, Isaiah to Grass, •ohn Baptist to a Tree, the Preacher to a Passenger. Is it any matter, whether the flow•r be crop'd, or the grass mown, or the tree hewn down, or where the passenger shall lie next night? We know whither our spirits shall go, we know not in what manner our soul shall be taken from us. This happens alike both to good •nd bad: wicked Ahab and good Josiah are both slain by war: The pestilence takes •way the righteous as well as the sinner: wisemen may die the death of fools. Both •ravell together in this Thorow-fare of life, both lodge in one Inn of the grave: •ut in the morning their ways part: Partes ubi se via findit in ambas.

We know not the place: Rachel dies in the high way, as Jezebel in the streets: •aul and Jonathan are slain in one battle, and their bodies hung up as trophees of a •loudy victory. In the mathematickes, the circle is equally distant in every point of it from the Center. Conceive earth to be this worlds Center, Heaven the Circumference: now from all points of this center, there is an equally distant remoteness or nearness, to the circumference, heaven. Let a man die in England, in Spain, in Turkey, or in the Indies; his body is neither nearer nor further off from heaven. Say the bodies of men are entombed in the entralls of beasts, or mawes of fowls, or their dusts scattered on the waters; yet can no dust be concealed. What hurt was it to the Christians in the sack of Rome, whose bodies lay unburied in the earth, when their souls were received to heaven? Nec vivorum culpa, qui non potuerunt sepelire: nec mortuorum poena, qui non potuerunt sentire, Aug. The living committed no sin, in that they could not bury them: the dead felt no pain, though they were not buried. The Cynicke desired to have no other Tomb over him but heaven; he admired that for the most glorious monument. Another replied, but then the fowls of the air will devour thee: he answered, shall I feel them? No; then Vbicunque moriar, me tegat coelum; wheresoever I die, let earth be the pavement, and heaven the roof of my Tomb. But only for the livings sake, there was no Sepulcher like it. If there was a place, which could hide from God, I would not die there. But Psal. 139. On the earth, in the sea, in the dark, in hell, in heaven; the Lord is everywhere: all places are specified but Purgatory; because none are found there. Be therefore always ready; Incertum est quo loco mors expectat te, itaque tu omni loco expecta mortem. Thou art not sure in what place death looks for thee, therefore in all places do thou look for death. It watcheth us like an Enemy, Insidiando: when it comes, we may say as Ahab to Elijah; Hast thou found me O thou mine enemy? Thou hast found me, and wilt conquer me; but Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through JESUS CHRIST our Lord.

We know not the time. Christ says that the son of man himself knows not the day of judgment. What, doth not CHRIST know it? Without question he knew it as he is God; though as man he might be ignorant of it. For he said, none knows, No not the son of man; but the Son of God knew it. He knew it not, not because he could not, but because he would not. Ne illam molestiùs feramus ignorantiam, quae cum Christo & Angels nobis communis est, Bern. That we might contentedly bear that ignorance, which is common to us with CHRIST and the Angels. But men sick of lingering consumptions do know their time: No, but still they languish in hope, and know not the hour of their dissolution. But HeZekiah was promised the addition of fifteen years; therefore he knew how long he should live. We answer, this was by special revelation, and who else was so ascertained? Yea, rather this was a conditional and limited promise, depending on the order of second causes. For Hezekiah's body was not impassible, nor incorruptible: but God did repair the defects of nature, and extend it to the possibility of fifteen years; upon the implicit condition of repentance. No man knows his appointed time. Ne inquiras prohibitum, ne perdas concessum. Inquire not after that which is concealed, lest thou lose that which is granted. Tutum est nescire quod tegitur: a man may safely be ignorant of that, which he is not bound to know. They are wretched men, that run to Sooth-sayers for such predictions: Periculosa disquisitio, when God hath locked it up, to offer to pick it with a false key. Some depart in youth, others in age: some fruit is plucked violently from the tree, other drops down with mature ripeness; all must fall. The corn is sometimes bit• in the spring, often trod down in the blade, never fails to be cut up in the ear, whe• it is ripe. Mori nil certius, quando, nil incertius. There is nothing more sure that death, nothing more unsure than then time of death. Moses and Aaron were certain to die, and never to enter into Canaan: but they were not certain when they should see Canaan from the mounts, and so die. It is a common fault, to run ill courses in health; and to allow themselves the time of a lingering sickness, to make ready for death: as if God were bound to give them so long warning. But he often disappoints them: and deaths properation, prevents their preparation. Job 21.13. They spend their days in mirth, and in a moment go down to the grave. This was that Cosmopolites presumption, Luk. 12.19. Soul, eat, drink, and be merry: but he reckoned without his host. Corah was suddenly swallowed, Ishbosheth slain a sleep, 2 Sam. 4.7. The house fell upon Job's children at a banquet. Ananias and Sapphira were put out like a candle new lighted, and that in stench. Job 24.24. They are exalted for a little while, and cut off as the tops of the ears of Corn. When the thought of death is furthest, the stroke of death is nearest. Caesar desired a sudden death: as he desired, as he deserved, so he had it, Naturalists that love the avoidance of pain, and have no hope of future blessedness, desire a sudden dissolution. For my part, my prayer shall be with our Church. From battle, and murder, and from sudden death, Good Lord deliver me.

Thus we see, the time is unknown to us, whether in youth or in age: often i• youth the bud is cropped. Homo per nativitatem viret in carne, per inventutem c•descit in flore, per mortem aret in pulvere; Greg. In birth we are green in the bud, i• youth we are white in the flower, in death we wither in the dust. Death like a fishnet catcheth at one draught, not only the grown fishes, but even the little frie. The Poets have a fable, that Death and Cupid lodging together at one Inn, interchanged each others arrows. From that day to this it comes to pass, that sometimes old men dote, and young men die. Sic moritur Iuvenis, Sic moribundus amat. Therefore let me be bold with CHRIST'S words, Luk. 7.14. Young man, I say unto thee, Arise: raise up thy soul to grace, thou knowest not how soon thy body shall fall down to dust. Perhaps thy imagined wisdom makes thee believe, that thou art early ripe: and so like a blossom that prevents the spring, thou wilt dare to look forth upon Februrary sun, but thou mayest soon be nipped with a frost. And if youth be but so weak a taper, quickly put out by death; how careful should parents be, with what oil they supply those young Lamps! Usually they provide fair estates for their children's bodies, nothing for the estate of their souls: to show that they are parents of their bodies, not of their souls. Zeuxes having artificially painted a boy, carrying grapes in a hand-basket: the birds came, as if they had been true grapes, and pecked at them. Hereupon he was wondrous angry with himself and his art; saying, If I had painted the boy, which was the chief part of my picture, so well as I have done the grapes, which were but a by-accident; the birds durst never have been so bold. Were parents as careful for their children's good nurture, as about their appendant trifles; those ravenous kites, evil companions, durst not venture upon them, could not so easily corrupt them.

For Age, then death is looked for: young men know they may die, old men know they must die. The youngest is old enough to die, the oldest too old to live long. Iuvenes mortem à tergo, senes ante faciem. There are three messengers of death; Casualtie, Sickness, Age. Hath not the first messenger spoke with thee? yet the second. Hast thou escaped the second? yet the third will not fail. Am. 5.19. •s if a man did flee from a Lyon, and a Bear met him; or went into the house, and a serpent bit him. While a man runs from the Lyon, the Bear assaults him: if he scape both, yet death (that Serpent) will find him out. Child-hood is our morning, middle-age our high noon, old age our evening, death our sun-set. One old have young men saluted with, good morrow, or welcome into the world: men of middle age with good day: old men with good night, because they are going out of the world. It is miserable for an old man not to be prepared for death: death shakes him by the hand in the palsy, yet no acquaintance? he hath one vote in the grave; and yet no thought of dissolution? he is come to the threescore of his long home; yet still worldly minded? But the good old man thinks this life, like a throng in a narrow passage: the sooner out, the sooner at ease.

Seeing our dissolution is so certain, the time so uncertain; the very mention of it bids us be prepared. Put not off your amendment; ne quod diu differatur, in perpetuum auferatur: lest what you differre for a long time, God take away forever. For it is just, ut moriens obliviscatur sui, qui vivens oblitus est Dei: that he who living forgate God, dying should forget himself. Many serve God, as they do their servants, with Reversions, in ultimis diebus mortis: but he looks to be served with present obedience, in omnibus diebus vitae. Latet ultimus dies, ut observetur omnis dies: •t dum semper ignoratur, semper proximus esse credatur, August. We know not our best day, that we might watch every day: we cannot tell how far it is off, therefore let us believe it to be very near. God allows man a liberal time, a whole day: now a day consists of 12 hours. Are there not twelve hours in the day? saith CHRIST. What enemies are we to ourselves, that of those twelve hours, which God allows us, we allow ourselves not one! Many men post off their conversion; and at twenty send Religion afore them to thirty: then put it off to forty: and yet not pleased to overtake it, they promise it entertainment at threescore. At best death comes, and he allows not one hour. In youth men resolve to afford themselves the time of age, to serve God: in age they shuffle it off to sickness. When sickness comes, care to dispose their goods, loathness to die, hope to escape, martyrs that good thought: and their resolution still keeps before them. If we have out the lease of a Farm for one and twenty years, we make use of the time, and rather profit. But in this precious farm of Time we are so bad husbands, that our lease comes out before we are one penny-worth of grace the richer by it.

They that have lived ill; quando anima in extremis labris, when the soul sits on their lips ready to take her flight, then they send for the Minister, to teach them to die well. But as in such extremity, the Apothecary gives but some opiate physic: so the Minister can give but some opiate Divinity; a cordial that may benumb them, no solid comfort to secure them. Here is no time to ransack for sins, to search the depth of the ulcer: a little balm to supple, but the core is left within. Let men repent while they live, that they may rejoice when they die. You tell me that one malefactor went from the Cross to Paradise: but we must not hide from you, that God opened the mouth of one Ass: yet every asse is not thereby privileged so to speak. Let us be liberal on God's part; He that truly repents one day before he dies, shall surely be saved. With greediness you hear this, but abuse it not: trust it, but trust not yourselves. He that gives pardon to repentance, is not bound to give repentance to sinners. Be sure thou repentest, that one day before thy death: but hereof thou canst not be sure, unless thou repent every day. The Lord hath made a promise to repentance, not of repentance. If thou convertest tomorrow, thou art sure of grace: but thou art not sure of tomorrow's conversion. For three reasons God conceals from us the time of our death. 1. Because in nature, Terribilior morte timor ipse mortis, the fear of death is more terrible than death itself. We know that we must die, to avoid all doubts: we know not when, to qualify our fears. 2. To preserve men from despair. Vt nec impii desperent, quasi $\langle \rangle$ tempus relictum paenitentiae: nec boni, quasi longum tempus patientiae, Basil: That neither the ungodly should despair, as if they had no time allowed for repentance: neither the faithful be cast down, because the time was too long of exercising their patience. 3. That we might be evermore armed with expectation, to encounter death. Because we know not when we shall die, let us learn with Saint Paul, to die daily. The worldling would weep, if he knew that he had but a month to live: yet he leaps and sings, and securely rejoiceth, when perhaps he hath not one day.

Fleres, si scires unum tua tempora mensem:

Rides cum non sit forsitan una dies.

The Sum of all, is the certainty of inevitable death. A mortal father cannot beget an immortal son. If they that brought us into the world, have themselves gone out of the world, we may conclude our own following. He that may say in life, I have a man to my father, and a woman to my mother; shall say in death, To corruption, Thou art my father: to the worm, thou art my mother, and my sister, Job 14.17. There is not one in the cluster of mankind, but eodem modo & modo victus & victus, is liable to the common and equal law of death. Methushalem lived nine hundred threescore and nine years; yet he was the son of Enoch, who was the son of Iared, who was the son of Maleleel, who was the son of Cainan, who was the son of Enos, who was the son of Seth, who was the son of Adam, who was the son of Dust. Ask the woman that hath conceived a child in her womb: will it be a son? she answers, peradventure so. Will it be fair? peradventure so. Will it be witty? peradventure so. Will it be rich? peradventure so. Will it be long lived? peradventure so. Will it be mortal? yes, this is without peradventure, it will die. As the philosopher hearing that his son was dead, answered without astonishment; Scio me genuisse mortalem, I know that I begot a mortal man. Mans body, so well as the ice, expounds that riddle; that Gignit filia matrem, the daughter begets the mother: dust begat the body, and the body begets dust. Our bodies were at first strong Cities, but then by transgression we made them the Fortes of rebels: whereupon our offended Sovereine sent his Serjeant death to arrest us of high treason. And though for his mercies sake in CHRIST he pardon our sins; yet he suffers us no more to have such strong horses; but let us dwell in thatched cottages, paper walls, mortal bodies. Therefore Paul calls the body Our house; not such as God created: he may say of our bodies, as the Poet spake of his verses. Quem recitas meus est, ô Fidentine, libellus sed ma•• dum recitas, incipit esse tuus. Thy body Oh man! while it was holy and immortal, it was my work: but now it is sinful and mortal, it is thy work. An old man is said to give Alexander a little Jewel; which he affirmed to be of this virtue. So long as it was kept bright, if it were put into the balance with the choicest gold or most precious stone, it would out-poise and out-value them all: but if it once fell into the dust, and took rust, it would be lighter and slighter than a feather. What meant the Sage, but to moralize to that great Monarch his own Life: which being kept bright and healthful, commanded the world; but once fallen to the dust, even Groomes would despise it. For Hares dare pluck dead Lions by the beard. Luci•• hath a fable, the moral is good. Menippus meeting Mercury in the Elisian fields, would needs know of him, which among all the ghosts was Philip that great King of Macedon. Mercury answers; He is Philip, that hath the hairelesse scalpe: Minippus replies, why they have all bald heads. Mercur. Then he with the flat nose. Menip. they all have flat noses. Merc. Then he with the hollow eyes. Menip. they all have hollow eyes: all have naked ribs, disjointed members: all are carcasses. Mercur. Then Menippus, in death there is no difference betwixt the King and the beggar. Mors dominos servis, & scepra ligonibus aequat: Dissimiles simili conditi••ligans; Men upon earth, as in the game at Chesse, supply different places: one is a King, another a Queen, another a Bishop, another a Knight, another a Pawn. But when the game is done, and they are shuffled into one bag; all are alike.

What mean worldlings then to be so covetous? Natura excutit redeuntem, sicut intrantem; In our birth we had but swaddling clouts and a cradle: in our death we shall have but a winding-sheet and a coffin. Alcibiades brags of his •ands, Socrates reacheth him a Map; bids him demonstrate where they lie: alas he could not find them, nor scarce discern Athens it self; it was so small a point in respect of the world. Ecce vix totam Hercules implevit urnam; The dusts of mighty Hercules can scarce fill a pitcher. The Philosopher said of Alexander; Yesterday the whole world did not content him; now ten cubits contain him. I will not deal so sparingly with you, ye landed-men. You shall have some land in death, and you can have no more; even so much ground, as will hold your carcasses. Why do you covet? Were you owners of more land, than ever the Devil shown CHRIST; yet call no more yours but the grave. This is Terra mea, and Terra tua; My land, and thy land. Purchase there, where is true possession: or rather get that by faith which JESUS CHRIST hath purchased for you. Lay up your treasure in heaven. Quaenam est haec stultitia, illic reponere unde iturus es, & illuc non praemittere quo iturus es? What folly is it to lay up our treasure there, whence we must depart: and not to send it afore thither, whither we must go, and where we shall live forever?

What means the Epicure so to pamper his body? A fat corps is but a fat supper for the worms. 1 Cor. 6.13. Meat's for the belly, and the belly for meat's: but God shall destroy both it and them. Let us eat to live, not live to eat. When we have devoured the most delicate creatures, the worms shall devour us.

What mean the proud? the soles of their feet must not touch the ground: they fly betwixt heaven and earth on their four wheeled wings. But they must have other Porters; to the grave they must. After all their painting, the earth will spoil their colors. The fairest woman, that says, Touch me not, I am of purer mould; as if Praecordia Titan de meliore luto finxit; must lie blended in the forgotten dust with the poor bondwoman.

What mean we all so foolishly to forget our latter ends? Adam could call all the beasts by their names, but his own name he forgot; Adam, the son of earth. Such fools are we, to forget our own names; that we are the sons of Adam, the sons of dust. Stultum est timere, quod non poteris vitare; It is no wisdom to fear that we cannot avoid: Mortem non effugit, qui etiam distulit, Sen. I shall die neither the first, nor the last: Omnes qui me non antecedent, sequentur; They that go not before me, shall follow me. Hac conditione intravi, ut exirem; Upon this condition I came in, that I should go out. We must fall, and as the tree falls, so it lies: and commonly it falls to that side, which is most loaden with branches and fruits. They that abound most with the fruits of obedience, shall fall to the right hand, life; eastward, to salvation: they that abound with wicked actions and affections, to the left hand, death; westward, to destruction.

What mean the faithful to be so much cast down in the apprehension of death? To them it is, though Poena nascentis, gloria resurgentis; The punishment of the first birth, yet the glory of the second birth. Non obitus, sed abitus: Not a dying, but 〈◇〉 departing. Praemissa est anima, amissa non est. Durius seponitur, melius reponitur. Life is with some sorrow laid off, but with much joy laid up. Though every man that hath his Genesis, must have his Exodus: yet Profectio est quam putas mortem; It is but a journey, which they call a death. 2 Cor. 5.1. Paul calls this life an Earthly House, Heaven a new Building. Death is but the pulling down of an old house, that 〈◇〉 new one may be set up. Or as a Clock that is grown rusty, is taken asunder by the makers hand; disjoined wheel from wheel, and pin from pin: not to be lost, but to be repolished, and put together again, that it may go clearly. So Death doth pull the clock of our life asunder, when it hath struck the last stroke of breath: wheel from wheel, limb from limb, joint from joint, member from member; all to dust and pieces. But then the omnipotent Maker takes it into his own hands, sets it together again at the Resurrection, and it shall go well in glory forever: bearing a part in those celestial Chimes, which the blessed Angels, the Quoristers of Heaven, sing to the King of Kings. For Rom. 6.23. Though the wages of sin be death; yet eternal life is the gift of GOD through JESUS CHRIST our LORD. Amen.

VERSE 15. Moreover, I will endeavor, that you may be able after my decease, to have these things always in remembrance.

Seeing my life is so short, and with it my ministry must cease; therefore I will take advantage of the time, and yet again remember you of these things. This I have done hitherto, viva voce, with my living voice: but my care ends not with my life; I will strive that even after my death you may remember them. So often as you turn over the leaves of my Epistles, you shall (though not hear, yet) see me preaching to you these things. You shall hear me while I live, and read me when I am dead. I die that spake these words, but the words spoken shall not die in your memories. As it is said of Abel; Defunctu loquitur. So it pleaseth GOD that I should preach to his Church even to the worlds end.

This is the Sense: for method of discourse, many things inherently natural to these words, have been pretractated on just occasion, Verses twelve and thirteen. I am loath to fall into a coincidence of argument, and therefore willingly abridge myself of some necessary matter. But to rest content with what is behind, and to give you the gleanings of the former vintage: there are some scattering grapes, which well pressed may afford you a cup of good wine. First, the Apostle moves them to embrace his doctrine, because he is old, and hath but a short time to tarry amongst them. Then he comforts them, that he will strive to leave an impression of his Doctrine behind him in their hearts.

The grave exhortations of old age are to be ponderously received. There is somewhat in the Person, that procures attention to the Doctrine. A reverend Bishop is heard Tanquam Pater Ecclesiae, as a Father of the Church, saith Augustine: his speech may be Brevis, sed gravis; short, but effectual; leaving a deep impression in the hearers. Saint John's short Sermon in his old age, [Little children, love one another.] so warmed his Disciples hearts with the fire of charity: that their head was turned into a Limbecke, and did distill down water at their eyes. The same weight of doctrine doth not feel so weighty in a young man's mouth, as in the gravity of reverend old age. Not that the truth of God depends on the regard of persons: but because men's affections sooner melt at his speech that is stuffed with experience; than at theirs who only aver the theoretical truth. But for us, whether he be a young Timothy, or an old Peter, that tells us the truth in Christ; the Spirit of God work in our hearts a faithful obedience!

Well, I am old, and must leave you: yet I will leave that behind me, which shall remain with you. In the whole Verse we find two generals: The Content, and the Intent: his Practice, and his Purpose: his Labor, and the end of his Labor: the thing he does, and the thing he seeks. I will endeavor; there is his labor, practice, and the thing he does. That you may be able after my decease, always to remember these things; there is his purpose, the end of his labor, and the thing he seeks. For the former.

I will endeavor. I can do no more, I must do no less. Now a Ministers Endevour consists in three especial things: he must endeavor by learning, endeavor by life, endeavor by labor: none of these must be wanting.

The first thing required to this endeavor is Learning. The Bishop of Traiectum in Germany, said that he would not admit Asses to holy Orders. One replied, that he must not now look for Ambroses and Cyprians. He answered, Cyprianos non requiro, sed asinos non admitto; I do not expect Cyprians, but I will not admit Asses. There are some that never knew, nor cared to know, the Schools of the Prophets; yet they send themselves into the Harvest; they pen their own commission. But says the Church; Quid agitis in meis, non mei? What make you in my work, that are none of my servants? They are sons without a father: their own creators, and own creatures too. Matth. 22.12. Friend, how camest thou hither, not having a wedding garment? Quomodo intrasti, non habens vestem Sacerdotalem? How didst thou get into the Priest-hood, without having a ministerial garment? Periculose docent, qui prius non didicerunt; They are dangerous Teachers, that never were learners. Dum discipuli veritatis non erunt, magistri erroris sunt; While they will not be chollers of truth, they become masters of error. For all CHRIST'S Faciam vos; I will make you fishers of men; Yet they went not presently out of the Boat into the Pulpit: He was three years instructing them. CHRIST commanded them to stay at Jerusalem, till the Holy Ghost descended on them, Act. 2. They must not Simul recipere & effundere; not receive in; and pour out at once, Hieron. Heri catechumenus, hodie Episcopus. Like David's messengers, they must tarry till their eards be grown: not Lapwing-breed, to run away with the shell on their head. They must know their winds, ebbings and flowings, creekes and sea-marks, that will be Fishers.

Wherein consists this learning? Not in a theory of divers arts; but in the so•er use and discreet application of Divinity. Cant. 1.11. We will make thee borders of •old, with studdes of silver. Divinity is that border of gold, human learning the •tuddes of silver. A garment to have here and there a fringe, or button, or jewel, •s comely: to be nothing but buttons is ridiculous. Quaero documenta, non ornamenta; Give us lessons, not laces. When Solomon made preparation for the building of the Temple; He had threescore and ten thousand that bare burdens; and fourscore •housand hewers in the mountains: there was hewing and knocking in the mountains. But when the House was a building, there was neither hammer, nor axe, nor any •ole of iron heard in it, 1 King. 6.7. The study of arts must go before, but not •ee too busy in the edification. That which moves the conscience, and saves the •oule, is the Word of GOD; yet attendant to this Queen, are certain maids of ho•our; Arts. I cannot say they are commanded; I dare not say they are for•idden. Indeed a flourishing and meretricious eloquence puffed up with these, ⟨◇⟩ unprofitable. GOD affects not Aulicisms, and Courtly terms. It is like a •reat deal of painting in a Church-window, to keep out the light. What be•efit is in a gilt armor? it is the armor that defends, not the gilt. Or to what •urpose is a golden key, if it will not open the door? If a wooden key will open ⟨◇⟩ it is better for me. Neither would I have the truth stripped of her ornaments, ••d set barely forth; this is a kind of treason. There is a learning, no man can be good Preacher without it. Matth. 13.52. Every Scribe instructed unto the king••me of heaven, bringeth out of his treasure things new and old. The New Testament, and the old: to the broken hearts evangelical comforts, to rebellious spirits legal menaces. New and Old, new before old: because the Gospel was promised, before the Law was printed.

Some think a Minister hath no great need of Learning, because he is to speak to the unlearned. But as, Hebr. 5.11. We have many things to say, and hard to be uttered; seeing you are dull of hearing. For, when for the time ye ought to be Teachers, you had need be taught again the first Principles of the Oracles of God; and had need of milk, and not of strong meat. So, 1 Cor. 2.6. We speak wisdom among them that are perfect. Such is our unhappy exigent: if we preach learnedly, they think us mad: as Festus told Paul, Act. 26.24. Thou art beside thyself, much learning doth make thee mad. We seem mad, but only to those that are mad. As David seemed a fool, Sed Regi Achish, to King Achish, that was a fool. To common simplicity, Divinity seems a kind of heresy; and Ministers a kind of Conjurers. It is with Learning as it is with Language: let it be strange, be sure it will be ridiculous. Hos. 8.12. I have written to them the great things of my Law, but they were counted a strange thing. Art hath no other enemy, to speak of, but Ignorance. Licinius can make a decree against Learning, though he want so much learning as will serve to write his own name, and to subscribe to it. But not to torment him here, that is tormented enough elsewhere; we have too many ignorant censurers of Learning: they cannot understand us, they can with-stand us. No wonder! for who can distinguish right from wrong, that hath not either a Rule in his hand, or some notion of a rule in his head. Iudicare quis sit sapiens, vel maxim videtur esse sapientis, Tull. To judge who is a wise man, is only the office of a wise man. But Mat. 11.19. Wisdom is justified of her children. If it were not for this justification at home, poor Wisdom would speed ill. Either the Temporal Law would non-suit her for want of evidence: or the Ecclesiastical would excommunicate her for want of compurgatours. Such fortune hath Wisdom among barren and unblest understandings; that the common opinion of learning is no more but this: It it a pretty shift for a younger brother to live by. This entertainment gives the world to her and her hand-maids, which hath most need of her and all her hand-maids. But, 1 Cor. 2.14. The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. He knows them not; there is a denial of the Act: nor Can know them, there is an excluding of the Habite. Howsoever you judge, yet this is the truth: a man may as well saw down a tree with his nails, as be a profitable Minister without learning. You will not venture your estate with an unlearned Lawyer, nor your body with an unlearned Physician; and will you venture your soul with an unlearned Pastor.

The next thing required to this Endevour, is an honest and religious life. If this have been bad before thy calling, redeem it now. Aeneas Sylvius having wrote wanton books; when he came to be bishop of Rome, accepted the name of Pius. Aeneam rejicite, recipite Pium; Forget Aeneas, and receive Pius. Though thou alter not thy name, yet alter thy nature. The Minister that spends himself like a Taper to light others, must not himself go out with an ill savor. It is preposterous for a Divine to trouble himself too much with secular things. For there is commonly, Otium in sacris, Idleness in holy matters: where is Negoti• in profanis, Too much business in the worlds employments. Mat. 5.19. He that shall break one of these least Commandments, and (though but by his example) shall teach m• so; shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven: Minimus, that is, Nullus, saith Theophylact. All in a Minister should be Vocalia; his very conversation must preach: a•Noah was called a Preacher of Righteousness, because his life was an actual Sermon. An innocent and unrebukeable Life is a silent testimony of a good Minister. Efficacius est vitae, quàm linguae testimonium, Cyprian. A good work persuades much more, quàm ineffectum verbum, than an unperformed speech, Nazi• This was the cause why the Indians refused the Gospel brought by the Spaniards; because their lives were more savage than those Savages. Heaven it self was despised, for fear of those men's company there that did promise it. Common auditors receive not a doctrine in the abstract, only minding what is taught: but in the concrete, with reference to the person that teacheth it. Therefore, if your credit be cracked, it is as bad as if your brains were craz'd: you may preach of heaven and hell until Doomesday: and truth will be truth in your mouths, not in their hearts.

Tunc etiam fatis aperit Cassandra futuris

Ora Dei jussu non unquam credita.

I do not say that holiness is an essential grace of a Minister: personal offenses suspend not the power of the Holy Ghost. Suspend it not, I say, directly; yet may occasionally: through the infirmity of simple men; who were not then simple men, if they did only adhere to the doctrine. His life is bad, therefore his doctrine is false? O this is an harsh Non sequitur. Yet is it a thousand times better, that our good lives should prevent it, than our great learning be driven after to confute it. Psalm. 50.16. Unto the wicked God saith, What hast thou to do to declare my Statutes? Though it be truth thou preachest, yet thou art not fit to preach it. Christ reprov'd the Devil, even confessing truth, Mark 1.24. I know thee who thou art, the holy one of God. This was truth, yet saith JESUS; Hold thy peace, keep thy breath to cool thy torment. The true Prophet is he; Cujus in ore verbum vitae, cujus in more vita verbi; In whose mouth is the Word of life, in whose behavior is the life of the Word.

Otherwise men seem to propound doctrines impossible to be kept. Act. 1.1. Of all that Jesus did both do and teach. It is said of Christ, that he did first Do, and then Teach. The question to the Minister shall be at last; not how many books he hath read, but what life he hath led: not only how he hath preached, but how he hath lived. They must not be like scribbling school-boys, that write fair with the fore-finger, and blur it with the hind-finger. Indeed rank hypocrites often mask in sheep's clothing: and as Physicians that would minister a draught of bitter potions to children, anoint the brims of the cup with honey, or some well tasted liquor. So these paint the exterior apparance, that men may more easily swallow their drugs and dregs of heresy. But we may soon discern these wolves in lamb-skins; for sheare them, and their wool will grow no more. Yet must not the lamb put off his fleece, because the wolf hath worn it. Lest he divert Dispensationem in dissipationem; his office of gathering the flock together, into a scattering them asunder. Every Shepherd hath a Scrip, a Staff, and a Whistle: so a Minister must have Maintenance to live on, Sanctimony to live by, Doctrine to enliven others. Worldlings that mind the purse, and neither preach fervently, nor live charitably; have lost the Staff and the Whistle, and only keep the Scrip: Neither doth well asunder, all do very well together: yet what ever becomes of the Scrip, keep we a good Staff, and a good Whistle: that we may out-preach sin; out-live sin; and be our reward in the hands of Jesus Christ.

The last thing required to perfect this Endevour, is constant Labor. There is nothing more wretched, than for a man to live without care, when he hath gotten a Cure: Sine cura, cum pervenerit ad curam, Bern. Matth. 9.38. Pray the Lord to send forth Laborers, not loiterers, into his Harvest. But there is no need to follow this point: You in this City will look to it well enough, that your Ministers shall labor: you have here the law in your own hands; if he will not labor, you will keep him fasting. Yet it is to be feared, that as curious as you are to set us on work, and watch us with continual labor; you relish none of our fruits, you will be never the better for it. You send us a hunting, as Isaac sent his son: but when with Jacob we say, Sit and eat of our Venison, that your souls may bless no: You question, how we came by it so soon? We answer; The Lord brought it to our hands. You look upon it, and say, It is good Venison, a good Sermon: but still you go away fasting. Thus we are forced to labor in vain. Isaiah 49.4. We have labored in vain, and spent our strength for naught. That we may hereafter labor to purpose, Lord knit your hearts unto our lips; Prosper thou the works of our hands upon us, O prosper thou our handy work, Psal. 90.17.

Observe further, that all a Minister can do, is but his Endevour: Paul can but plant, and Apollos water; it is God that gives the increase. Nostrum est dare operam, Dei dare operationem. It is our part to endeavor, the Lord's to bless it with success. Preachers are called Savior's, Obad. verse. 21. Savior's shall come upon mount Zion: yet is there but one Savior of us all, JESUS CHRIST. They are called Lights, Vos estis lux mundi: yet there is but one Light, John. 1.8. Christ is that true Light, which lighteneth every man. They are called Reconcilers, yet Christ is the only Reconciler, 2 Cor. 5.19. God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself: and we have but the ministry of this reconciliation. Aliud est docere, aliud flectere; It is one thing to teach, another thing to convert. Well may the Minister move his tongue and his lips like Organ-pipes; but if there be no breath of God's Spirit with them, it is to no purpose. Lift up your hearts to heaven: he hath a Pulpit above the clouds, that preacheth to the conscience. Act. 3.16. It is the Name of JESUS, through faith in that Name, which converts us: let none of his glory cleave to our earthen fingers. You think it enough to commend us: no, bless the Lord, whose power is magnified in our weakness. When we have done all, it is but our endeavor; we would have saved you. And be it to our comfort, our endeavor shall be accepted. 2 Cor. 8.12. If there be a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, not according to that he hath not. Non secundum quod valuimus, sed quod voluimus, shall our reward be. We endeavor to save you; do you endeavor to be saved: and the Spirit of God bless both our endeavors. That though the Minister part with his people on earth, they may all meet together in heaven.

That you may be able.] All is Propter vos, for your sakes: this preaching, this remembering, this writing, all propter vos, for you. 1 Cor. 3, 22. Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, all are yours. You may say to your Ministers, as the Poet of Oxen; Sic vos non vobis, fertis aratra boves; They labor in the plough, not for themselves, but for your souls. 1 Thess. 1.5. Ye know what manner of men we were among you for your sakes: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : inter vos, propter vos. The bellows are burnt, the lead is consumed of the fire: yet the Founder melted in vain, for the wicked are not plucked away. He had burnt a hole in his bellows, gotten the consumption of the Lungs, exhausted his spirits; and all for the people. Phil. 1.24. Nevertheless, though it were better for me to be dissolved; yet to abide in the flesh is more needful for you.

After my decease. Some have read, instead of Dabo operam, ut post obitum meum; Et post obitum meum: I will endeavor even after my decease, that &c. So they give to Saint Peter, and other Saints, a provident care over us still. If they would extend it no further, then that the Saints in heaven pray for us on earth, we would easily grant. Or that their Sermons once preached still do us good, we assent. What then? because we reverence their words, must we therefore worship their bodies, or relics? Yet such is the fond collection of Fevardentius on this place.

He urgeth it from, Rom. 10.15. How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the Gospel! If their feet be beautiful, how beautiful then are their hands and join•s, and tongues and lips! If the shadow of Peter, and the hand-kercher of Paul, could cure the sick: why may not the body of that shadow, and the hand of that hand-kercher, effect as much? why should not these be worshipped? We honor their writings, how much more their relics! This ridiculous stuff needs no other confutation, but derision. There was read in the Nicen Council; by the Monk ••phanus, out of the book of Sophronius, this Legend. A Monk was continually troubled with a devil: at last being very of his guest, he did pray the devil in fair and friendly terms, to let him alone. (And was not this religiously done, to pray <◇> the deville, Satan answered, that if he would promise and swear to satisfy hi• <◇> one thing, he would forsake him. The Monk swore a deep oath; then quoth the devil: Thou shalt never hereafter pray anymore to such an Image of our Lady, holding her child in her arms. But the Monk was too crafty for the devil: for the next day he went and confessed himself to the Abbot, and he dispensed with his oath, upon condition that he should continue praying to that Image. And is not this an excellent proof of praying to Saints, which is borrowed of the devil? But what is this to Relickes? yes, they that speak so much for the Image of Saint Peters head, what will they say for the head it self? Fevardentius adds; The dusts, the rags, the shoe, the nail of a Saint is venerable. This is the drunken doctrine of Rome, that adores the relics, but regards not the lives of Saints. Neither Peter nor Paul shall teach them by their writings, they will be taught by their relics.

To have these things in remembrance.] The Apostles did not only preach to us vocally while they lived: but even now also exemplarily by their former conversation, and still doctrinally by their holy rules. The words of a Preacher die not with him; but live in the hearers hearts: and shall either convert them here, or convince them hereafter. The word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day. Thou hast forgotten such a Sermon; but this Sermon shall not forget thee, Zach. 1.6. The Prophets are dead: but the words that I commanded them to speak, did they not take hold of their fathers? If it take no hold in thee by due obedience, it shall take hold on thee by deserved vengeance. A Prophet comes to Jeroboam, and says, Oh altar, altar, thus saith the Lord; Josiah shall offer the priests of the high places upon thee: and upon thee shall men's bones be burnt. That Prophet died, yet his word came to pass; Josiah did accomplish this. 2 King. 23.17. and was shown the Sepulcher of that man of God, which had proclaimed these things that he did. It is said of Samuel. 1 Sam. 3.19. that the Lord did let none of his words fall to the ground. Stephen foretold the Jews of their future desolation by the contempt of CHRIST: they confute him with hard arguments, stop his mouth with stones: Stephen dies, but Stephens Sermon dies not. We tell the usurer, that the third generation shall rue all: we die, but our words come to pass. We tell the Impropriator, that his robbing God of his due, shall make his posterity like Achan, accursed: we die, but this saying is fulfilled upon them. We tell the proud officer, that his suites are the suites of Gehesi, cut out of bribes; and will engender a leprosy in his issue: we die, but this event follows. Our Sermons shall be thought on: even when we are dead you shall remember them: God grant you may remember them to your comfort.

To conclude, we have Saint Peter still preaching among us. As it is said plainly, Act. 15.21. Moses was preached, by being read in the Synagogues every Sabbath day. While the writing of Peter is read, the voice of Peter is heard. The Apostles are dead, their holy Sanctions live with us. But now what entertainment have they found in our hearts? you shall see that by our lives. If you have digested those excellent rules, Lord what a change they will work in you! you will be as men that dreamed, wondering at your former loves: your fair Herodias of this world will appear a stigmatic Gypsie. All the toile and cost you have been to get riches, will appear as ridiculous, as if a country man should anoint his axletree with Amber-greece; or a traveler should liquor his bootes with Balsamum. You that have run by the Church as a Pest-house, would now continually wait at her doors. Then if you know that finger, which but itched to be accessory to any corrupt dealing, you would cut it off: and bite off that lip which but lisped out any equivocation: and pluck out those eyes, that lusted after adulterous mixtures; Let Religion be held a Fable, and Ministers false Prophets, if you find not in yourselves a wonderful change. But alas, where is this change? where is the fruit of such plentiful Preaching? There is a cursed devil that mars all, called covetousness. It was once said of this Island; Lûc• Britaniad•ves, England is rich in •ight; alluding to the long days, and short nights. It may truly be said of her in respect of the Gospel; that she is rich in the best light: but the darkness of this worldliness hath almost overcast it. This Land hath been four times conquered, say our Chronicles: but by the Chronicles leave I will add a fifth conquest. First, it was possessed by the Britain's, the Romans conquered the Britain's, the Saxons conquered the Romans, the Danes conquered the Saxons, the Normans conquered the Danes: but now covetousness hath conquered all. I know you have ears judicious enough; I hear you extolling the learned, praising Preachers, magnifying Sermons: yet and more, England gives preferment to her Ministers. But beloved, there is one preferment behind, and that most proper to Preachers; a preferment in the hearts of the hearers. Let the rest go, give us this. Though I have no hope to attain to any preferment in this world, yet I shall rest joyfully contented with this; if I may find preferment in your consciences.

That after my decease, you may have these things always in remembrance.] There are two material points in this verse, which I durst not pretermit. The first is; what the proper intention of all Preachers and Sermons is; they are but Remembrances. The other is a method, how we may remember the Apostles preaching after their departure; which is by a diligent and frequent reading of their writings.

That you may be able to remember. There are two offices of the holy Spirit; Docere & suggerere, to Teach and to call to remembrance. Both are expressed. John. 14.26. The Holy Ghost when he comes, shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you. Suppose that the fundamental articles of faith may be taught, within less than the term of a Preachers life: which (curious speculations, and idle digressions, laid a side) I conceive not impossible. In the remainder what shall he do? Either he must preach the same over again, and so be a Remembrancer: or else be silent, and so be no Preacher. It is too true that, who hath not an Athenian ear? We long for novelties, and would have men preach not only Nove, after a new method; but Nova, new doctrines. But Christ's sheep love not only his name, but the Echo of his name: they hearken to his voice, and to every reflection of his voice. Were your sanctification absolute, continual obedience to his Word would no more trouble you, than the everlasting aspect of his countenance doth trouble the Angels. Therefore answerable to the degree of your regeneration, must be the degrees of your attention. Likewise causeth liking. 2 Cor. 3.18. We with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image. If you be changed into that Image, you will desire to behold in the Gospel, as in a glass with open face, that Image into which you are changed.

When we hear an excellent lesson on an Instrument, we call for it again, and again. If God's peace dwell in our hearts, we love the songs of Zion rehearsed; Decies repetita placebunt. All our Sermons are but Rehearsalls of that old Sermon. Gen. 3.15. The seed of the woman shall break the head of the Serpent. All the sum of the New Testament is but the repetition of that one Prophecy. What are the Father writings, but expositions of the Apostles? the Schoolmen, but abridgements of the Fathers? It is an usual adage in the School, that the soul of Augustine was pythagorically transfused into the body of Aquinas. The Jesuit is nothing else but a old School-man bound up in a new cover. As one observed wittily; The School-man is Philosophical in his Theology; the Jesuit. Theological in his Philosophy. As Augustine wrote of his bastard Adeodatius; Ego in illo puero prater delictum (o) habebam; I had no share in that boy, but only sin. So the Jesuits may confess of their books; that there is nothing in them of their own, but that which is had▪ The good stuff is the fathers, only the lace and pinking is their own. As it is said of a Cimmell, that it is but bread upon bread: so we may say of the Jesuit; it is but Aquinas they lick him over, and let him go. As Galaton painted Homer vomiting; reliquos vero poetas ea quae ipse evomisset haurientes; and all the rest of the Poets licking up what he had vomited, Aelian.

All is but Remembrance: thrice in these four verses doth our Apostle press it; Paul, Phil. 3.1. It is not grievous to me to write the same things unto you: but for you it is safe; a most sure course. Unregenerate hearts are termed Stony hearts: if they were brazen, they might be melted: if iron, they might be wrought: but hearts of stone must be broken with continual hammering. The blood of CHRIST must be often dropped upon these adamantine hearts to mollify them. Gutta cavat lapidem, non vi, sed saepe cadendo. Deut. 32.2. My doctrine shall drop as the rain, and my speech distill as the dew. If all the world were Paradise, the sower might sow but once for all. Or if it were like the land of Albanaises, he need to till it but once in three years. Or if it were so fertile, as some soil is said to be under the Northern Pole; he might sow in the morning, and reap in the evening. But sin hath made the ground full of thorns, and much seed falls among these thorns, Matth. 13. Some is trampled under feet with the vulgar tract: other washed away with the common stream of the time: the rest pecked up by the fowls of the air: there is need therefore to sow even often the same seed, and always to put you in remembrance, not of other, but even of these things. We have brittle memories, weak retentions; therefore there is need of frequent and hearty incitations. Esa. 28.10. Precept must be upon precept: line upon line: here a little and there a little. The Scripture often ingeminates the same word, the samething, to give strength to the declaration of it. Esa. 28.7. They have erred, they are out of the way, through wine: the phrase is repeated seven times in one Verse; to villify drunkenness. So Ver. 21. The Lord shall do his work, his strange work: and bring to pass his act, his strange act. So Ver. 23. Give ear, and hear my voice, hearken and hear my speech; that the ear might be thoroughly charmed. Psal. 62.11. God hath spoken once, twice have I heard it. Prov. 4.14. Enter not into the way of the wicked, go not in, avoid it, pass by it, turn from it, and pass away. Prov. 31.2. My son, the son of my womb, the son of my vows. Ier. 22.29. Oh earth, earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord! Our Savior thrice questioned Peters love, and thrice urged his duty. Esa. 6.3. The Lord is thrice called Holy. Vanity is thrice called Vain, to show the vileness of it. In these and such like places, so fraught with repetitions; as it is with Numeration in Arithmetic: the figure in the first place stands for it self; in the second place for ten-times it self; in the third for a hundred times it self. So when the Scripture condemns a sin; as it proceeds in iteration, it riseth in aggravation.

Oh the infallible power of the word! heaven and earth shall pass, it shall never fail. Time may fail, speech may fail, audience may fail: but the matter of that abundant treasure shall never fail. It may be, Samuel knows not God's first call, nor his second, nor his third; yet at last, speak Lord, for thy servant heareth. It may be as Peter, Act. 10.16. in his vision; Arise, kill, and eat; he excuseth himself; Not so Lord, for I have never eaten any unclean thing. But when this was done thrice, he is resolved. So when the Lord's voice comes to us once, Arise and eat; it may be we excuse ourselves; Not so Lord: but when it shall be spoken thrice, often; there is some hope that we will hear at last. It may be according to the sign that God gave Hezekiah, Esa. 37.30. This year ye shall eat such as groweth of it self: the second year, such as springeth of the same: but the third year ye shall sow and reap. So the first time we hear the doctrine of salvation, it is without profit; and it breeds no meditations in us but such as grow of themselves. The next time, such as spring of the former, thoughts of flesh and blood. But yet the third time, it may work us, to a more industrious cogitation of heavenly things. Paul in the 17. of the Acts; three Sabbath days together handled one doctrine.

Good things are not wearisome in their continual use. Our daily bread, though daily received, is daily craved. The light of the Sun would displease none but some lover of darkness, though it never went down in our coasts. The perpetual use of necessary things can never offend us though they never forsake us. Shall then the doctrine of life, the restorative of our fainting spirits, through the often repeating discontent us? No, here the eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor the ear with hearing. Yet many use themselves in the hearing of beaten points, as they do in drinking of wines: the first draught is for necessity, the second for pleasure, the third for sleep. If they hear you once, that's enough: if a second time, that's too much; but if you come with the same a third time, fare you well, they must go sleep. When Paul preached at Antioch, The Gentiles besought him that those words might be preached to them again the next Sabbath. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ; the very same words. Gal. 4.19. My little children, of whom I travel in birth again, until Christ be formed in you. Now the ripening and perfitting of a child in the womb, requireth nine months at the least.

The time then, is not idly spent, that calls to mind fore-recited principles. If you ask us, Quousque eadem? how often shall we hear the same? we would to God there were no need of repetitions. But it is true what Elihu speaks in Job. God speaketh once, yea twice, but man perceiveth it not. Yea, Ver. 29. God doth work it twice and thrice, often times with man. Let us answer, as Augustine did the Donatists; being enforced to some iteration; Let those that know it already pardon me, lest I wrong them that are ignorant. It is better to give him that hath, than to turn him back that hath not. If it were true of Homer, or may be true of any man formed of clay; One Homer never cloyed any man that read him. Then certainly it must be true of truth it self; One JESUS CHRIST in his Gospel never satiated any that read him. To conclude, for your part; Let the word of CHRIST dwell in you plenteously. The word of grace hath been often offered unto you: whither it hath gotten house room in you or no, I cannot tell. Perhaps it is but in the Nature of a Passenger to you; and your bosom the Inn to give it only a bait and away. Perhaps as the Levite, that sate in the streets, and no man received him to house, Judge. 19. it hath sounded in your Churches, but none bade it to dinner in their consciences. Perhaps it hath gotten admission by force, as they let down the sick man by the tiles of the house: the doors of your hearts being pester'd with a throng and crowd of worldly business. But now let it be no stranger, but like a brother dwell with you, never to depart: not in a corner, as if it were pinched for want of room, but Plenteously: not with inmates and chamber-fellows, as lusts and evil affections; but in your hearts, alone. Yea in cord cordis, in the very heart of your heart. Psal. 40.8. The law is within my heart, in the midst of my bowels. Not unconceived or misconceived, unapplied or misapplied, but in all wisdom. And the God of all wisdom bring you by it to the end of your faith, even the dear salvation of your souls!

The other point is the method of our memory, the means how we may remember them: which is indeed, frequently to read them. John. 5.39. Search the Scriptures. Honor and admire the depth and secrecy of God's word; yet fail not in thy diligence to search it. The Scripture is not like a kalendar, to die with them for whom it is written; but serves for us, in what climate soever we breath. What Paul wrote to the Romans, Corinthians, &c. serves also for the meridian of England. What is written, is ever ready to be read; if men would be at leisure to read it. CHRIST repels all Satan's assaults with his own weapon; It is written. Him discamus omnes arma nostra esse sacras Scripturas saith Cajetan. From hence let us learn that all our weapons are the holy Scriptures. It is like the Tower of David built for an armory, whereon there hang a thousand bucklers, all shields of the mighty men. There are shields for defense, and swords for offense. As Laban deceived Jacob in the night, giving him instead of fair Rachel, blear-eyed Leah. So Satan in the darkness of our ignorance cozens us: only the Scriptures day-light can discover Leah from Rachel. Cant. 5.12. His eyes are like the eyes of doves by the rivers of water. The dove sitting by the rivers, discryeth a far off the shadow of the hawk, her mortal enemy: so either escapes by flight, or by hiding her self under the banks, He that sits by the bank of these living waters, can discover the practices of Satan, by them he can sound him, and wound him. This is that Sword of the spi•it: not the wooden daggar of fabulous stories, nor the rusty scabbard of old Tra•itions; these are blunt: but the two-edged sword of the Spirit. Scriptum est, It is writ•en, this is the voice of CHRIST. Traditum est, it is by Tradition, this is the voice of Antichrist.

We appeal to your consciences, we feed not your eye with pictures and babbles, •or your ear with Legends and fables: no holy water from the font: but It is writ•en: This is that sacred water which is cast in the devils face, and stops his mouth. Rom. 15.4. Whatsoever things are written, are written for our instruction. Paul says, •he Scriptures are the people's instruction: the Romists say, they are the people's destruction. Paul says, It makes the man of God absolute; the Romists say, it makes him dissolute. Paul says, They are written to admonish us: they say, they are written so difficult that in a known language they rather seduce us. CHRIST bids us to Search the Scriptures, for there is eternal life: take heed, say they that forbid us, or therein is eternal death. Esa. 8.20. To the Law, to the Testimony: no say they, Ad Traditum, ad decretum, ad Papam; To traditions, to decretalls, to the Pope. Psal. 119.105. Thy word is full of light: no say they, It is full of darkness. Thus they cast a mist before men's eyes, that they cannot see their Juggling. They blind the people, and buffet them: and then ask them, as the Jews asked CHRIST; who smote them? These are they that compare the Scriptures to a nose of wax, formable to what proportion the handler pleaseth. They make the Fathers their children, and the ancient Doctors their puny Scholers; that they shall only speak what they would have them. It is nothing with them to abuse the sacred Writ. Non scripturas ad materiam, sed materiam ad Scripturas excogitant, Tertul. First they make their Sermons, and then look for a Text. Thus that vision, Act. 10.13. Rise Peter and eat; is made warrant enough for the Pope to design the killing of any Prince. Sometimes they cite the beginning without the end, as the devil served CHRIST; sometimes the end without the beginning: sometimes they take the words against the meaning; often they make a meaning against the words. So in sum, they do not keep the old Scripture, but coin a new. Either they suppress the word, or not express the sense: as if they would convey away the gold, and throw us the bag.

But we have the Scripture, let us read it: not the bare words only, but the sense, The Scripture is like Ezekiel's Roule, written within and without: without in the outward sentence, within in the inward reference. It is the golden pot of Manna; the words, that is the golden pot: the sense, that is the Manna. It is not enough to take what offers it self at the first proposed; but to dig deep. God that is rich in the veins of nature, is not poor in the veins of Scripture: excellent in the history, more excellent in the mystery. The Scriptures are not in superficie sed in medulla: non in verborum foliis, sed in radice rationu, Chrysostom. It is not the letters and words, but the sense and heart of the Scriptures, whereupon our faith depends. Revel. 1.3. Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear. We must not only read, nor only hear, nor only meditate, but all. Lectio sine meditatione arida, meditatio sine lectione erronea. Reading without meditation is fruitless, meditation without reading subject to error. Meditate, to profit by reading: and read to rectify meditation. Otherwise it may be said, as of the Delphic oracle; Quoties legitur, negligitur: it is not soon gotten, than forgotten. Col. 3.18. Let the word dwell plenteously in you. The word must dwell in us, therefore the Bible must be in our house. It must dwell plenteously, therefore we must read it daily. The word doth dwell plenteously among us, God grant it may dwell plenteously in us. It is but a shift now, and will be no good answer at the last day; I am no Divine, this is none of my profession, to be busy with the Scriptures. Yet you would be Christ sheep: but this sheep know his voice. You should be thought honest men; but is there anything except God's word can make thee honest, Mic. 2.7. You would not be thought unclean: but Wherewithall shall our way be cleansed, but by the word? you would all be made blessed: but Blessed is he that delighteth in the Law of the Lord, and meditates in it day and night, Psal. 1.2. But ô the profaneness of this age! reading this book is thought a fit of melancholy; deductions out of this book, Paradoxes, and the Language of this book a Shibboleth, which all the world besides pronounceth not. Alcibiades coming into a School, and asking the School-master for one of Homers works, when he answered that he had none: he knitting his fist, smote him on the ear. If God come to visit thy house, and find thee without a Bible, the book of thy fair profession; God shall smite thee thou whited wall, thou shalt feel the weight of his hand. The barbarians shown Paul no little kindness, God forbid we should use him as a Barbarian. Other books, Histories and Poems, we read and remember: but let a Text of Scripture be pressed, and we say not; Jesus we know, and Paul we know. But Quis novus hic nostris successit sedibus hospes? The Fairy Queen we know, the Arcadia we know, the book of Statutes we know, the Chronicles we know; but who are ye? The LORD of his infinite mercy, lay not this neglect to our charge: but bind the Bible to our consciences, and our consciences to the bible. That our faith may embrace the comforts there; and our eyes one day see the joys we have believed, in the blessed kingdom of JESUS CHRIST.

VERSE 16. For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our LORD JESUS CHRIST, but were eye-witnesses of his Majesty.

The Apostle proceeds to another argument, why these things should be fixed in their hearts: because they know that their labor is spent upon a certain thing. What should more animate our constancy, than the infallibility of prosperous success in our calling! If the Divinity we preach, were built upon the fennish and hollow grounds of human fancies. Wherein men show more wantonness than wit, more wit than learning, more learning than conscience. Or if it were like some oracles of the heathen Idols which were aliquo modo vera, nullo modo certa; true some way, certain no way: if the event did not answer the prediction, they would make the prediction answer the event. Or like the spurious, evasive, and bastardly equivocations of our Jesuits: who have a trick to swear and not to swear, to lie and not to lie: and so are Saints and no Saints, holy in appearance, devils in existence. But we preach that which is indubiae fidei, which the faithful do feel on earth, and the unfaithful shall feel in hell. The former find here, the truth of God's mercies, the other shall find there, the truth of his Justice. We bring no fables, but things known to us, and made known by us. That the LORD JESUS did come in the flesh, dwelt with us in the flesh, suffered for us on the Cross, rose again from death. That he came not in weakness, but in power; with signs and great wonders: to the terror of the bad, to the comfort of the good, confirmation of the weak, conviction of the proud, admiration of all. Neither received we this by tradition or hear-say, but were eye-witnesses of it: That which we have seen and heard, we declare unto you. Therefore receive us, believe us; yea, receive the truth, believe the truth, the sound doctrine of Christ.

For method of tractation, consider three principal passages: A

- Disclaiming of all fabulous mixtures with the sacred Truth. We followed not cunningly devised fables.
- Proclaiming of the virtue and Excellencie of Christ. When we made known to you his power and coming.

- Testifying of this, and that from the surest witness: Ab oculato testimonio; We were eye-witnesses of his Majesty.

These be the general and doctrinal roots; there are some sub-distinguished branches, which we refer to their own places.

We have not followed cunningly devised fables.] This is the thing he removes and disclaims: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . Art compositas fabulas, according to Erasmus. Calvin•ayes, it intends Subtile artificium. But because 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 doth not only signify a Fable, but also Orationem, a Rhetorical discourse: the Apostle condemns both poetical fictions, and oratorie eloquence: the Sophistry of Logic, the painting of Rheto•icke, and the meretricious figments of poetry; when they shall stand in competition with Divinity, and presume of their own power to help a soul to Jesus Christ. The embroidered orations of the one, and the gaudy tinctures of the other, are all out Fables. To omit those that regarded rather Sonum than Sensum; the cadence of •anguage, rather than the substance of reason; the very best did but fabulize.

For the Philosophers, Coloss. 2.8. Beware lest any man spoil you through Philoso•hie and vain deceit. First, it taught devilish things, as Magicke, Conjurings, a great •art of Judicial Astrology among the Pagans. This 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , a fable. Secondly, •t taught doctrines; of the Eternity of the world, of the mortality of souls, of a Purgatory–fire out of Plato, of the Stoicall fate; all which diametrically oppose the •ruth: all were fables. Thirdly, it taught principles, which in themselves, and their •wne nature are true; but in Divinity false. Such were these maxims; Ex nihilo •ihil fit; Of nothing can be made nothing: this is true in second causes, but in respect of God's omnipotence in the creation, a fable. For God can constitute something of •othing, and reduce something to nothing, at his pleasure. So it is said; A privatio•e ad habitum non datur regressus; There is no returning from the privation to the ha•ite. This is true Physice, naturally: but if it be referred to the Resurrection, it is Fabula mendax; a lying fable. That a virgin remaining still a virgin, cannot conceive; • true in the ordinary course of nature; but to deny this to be once done by the su•ernaturall work of God, is a Fable. Even the best of them in their most serious •quisition of heavenly things, were but as hounds, swift of foot, but ill of sent. They •unted an object strongly, but took the wrong course; so spent their mouths and •ourses in vain. Like wandering Empiricks, which make great ostentation of Cures •rawne out in pictures and tables: but he that comes to try their skill, hath not a worse disease belonging to him, than the Physician. If Seneca had had grace to his wit, he had been the wonder of men. This praise he deserveth and hath; never any Philosopher wrote more divinely: he hath not lost his commendation, but he lost his •opes. Certainly, as a worthy Divine said; If I had no other Mistress than Nature, would wish no other Master than Seneca. But neither Athens nor Rome could teach his doctrine, but Jerusalem. In the end of his book De Tranq. he allows drunkenness: his was a fable, fit neither for Philosopher to prescribe, nor honest man to practice.

For the Poets, their writings were but Fables. Innumerable such: whole books •f Metamorphoses; it is all one, whole books of Fables. They did but fabulize an •pish imitation of God's truth. Must Abraham sacrifice his son to the GOD of heaven? Agamemnon must sacrifice his daughter to the Prince of darkness. A Ram redeemes Isaac, so a Hind redeemes Iphigenia: this was a cunningly devised fable. Noah's Flood shall be quitted with Deucalions Deluge. For our Noah they have a Ianus, for our Sampson an Hercules; for our Babel-builders, such as lay Pelion upon Ossa, Giants. If Lots wife be turned to a Pillar, their Niobe is metamorphosed to a Stone. Let God historifie his Jonah, Herodotus will say more of his Arion. But saith Saint Augustine, we may justly suspect, that the Greek tale of the one, mean the Hebrew truth of the other. The Devil strives to be God's Ape. If the Lord thunders from heaven, hail-stones and coals of fire: the Red Dragon also maketh fire to come down from heaven in the sight of men, Revel. 13.13. God delivered his truth; Satan had his imitating fables, to seduce and divert men's minds from the substantial truth, to enervate the credit of goodness, and to amaze men's hearts with the counterfeits. Their writings were fabulous; they held it as their Patent with Painters, Quidlibet audendi aequam potestatem; an equal power to fain anything. Some were scurrilous and obscene, most of them impious and profane. They durst make their gods murderers, whore-masters, malicious, contentions, unjust, cruel. And Ovid confesseth; Ignoscite fasso, Sollicitor nullos esse putare deos.

But if all these were fables, and Peter disclaims them in delivering the truth of the Gospel; why then do Preachers make use of them in Divinity? I answer. There is a difference betwixt the venom in a material, and the wholesome virtue. Saint Paul that condemned the one, often used the other: there may be honey in a nettle. As in the Law of a beautiful woman (Deut. 21.11.) that was a captive: he that desired her for his wife, was first to shave her head, and pare her nails. Humane learning is the Grecians Helena, full of admirable beauty: but must not be admitted into the Divinity Schools, till her head be shaved, and her nails pared. But from her take her abominable figments; shave and pare off what is dead, idolatrous, voluptuous, fabulous, those superfluous excretions of sin; of a Moabite make her an Israelite, and then accompany with her: she shall bring forth fair children to the Lord of Hosts. As Hosea took Gomer the daughter of Diblaim, a wife of whoredoms; who yet bare him Iezrael, the Seed of God, Hos. 1.4. They were adversaries to the truth: their ingenie was great, their industry greater, but against the truth, Aug. Therefore cut off Goliath's head with his own sword, Hieron. The Word of God is the Bread of life, human inventions but for gloss and ornament; hanging gold and jewels upon our apparel, as the Israelites did on their garments. Ab illis inginua animi delectatio, ab his sanitas & vita petitur. Those like the Aiptae, may put blood in our face, and mend our color: this is the nourishment that maintains our life. Without this, all that grows in the green fields of Philosophy is but Toxic, baneful: mors in olla, there is death in it; the Word of God is that Salt of Elisha, that sweetens the broth. The wood of the Cross is that wood of life, which rellisheth the Marah of Gentile-learning. Jerome was buffeted by an Angel, for studying Heathen Authors too much: and Saint John had a book of this given him to swallow down. Yet I would not have men to rail down arts, and use them as the King of Ammon did David's messengers; to grub their beards, yea, their very chins. As if the captive woman were to be slain, not shorn: as if Hagar stood Abraham in no staed for procreation, and all learning were but coozenage. Though they happily can reach to the top of preferment, and never climb by the stairs: seem Giants in Divinity, while they profess war to Philosophy; yet I would not have them teach their nurse to suck. It is blasphemous to preach fables, for truth: but it is not honest to condemn all learning for fables. Moses rod was a common rod, yet it wrought great miracles. It is the rod that does the miracle, yet Moses must be learned to handle it.

The Sophistry of Heretics is another disclaimed Fable: for whatsoever contradicts the truth, is a fable. The Devil sped so successfully in disputing with our mother Eve in her estate of innocence, that he doubts not to prevail over her •cent children. I speak not here of the Jews Talmud, a bundle of most fabulous and ridiculous lies, too vile for a Christian ear. Nor of the Turkish Alcoran, a fa••of foolish impossibilities: as the stories of Angel Adriels death, Seraphuels Trumpet, Gabriels Bridge, Horroth and Marroths hanging, the Moons descending into Muhammad's sleeve: the Littour wherein he saw GOD carried by eight Angels: their swinish Purgatory: Fables fit for none but beasts or mad-men. The Papists have innumerable volumes of Fables, Legends which they equal to the sacred History. That Saint Francis carried a thousand out of Purgatory with him to Heaven, when he went thither. That Saint Dunstane held the Devil by the nose with a pair of pincers. That Saint Anthony, when a Toad was served to his table, and a Text cited by his Host; Eat of everything that is set before thee: he presently with the sign of the Cross turned it into a Capon ready roasted. That Frier Andrew should make roasted birds fly away by the same conjuration. I speak not of their monstrous miracles, and shameless wonders; their very Doctrine is fabulous. That CHRIST'S body should be locally circumscribed in heaven, yet wholly present in ten thousand places at once on the earth; this is a Fable against the fundamental truth of his Humanity. That there is a Purgatory, is a Fable, (and that a cunning one) against the truth of CHRIST'S sufficient satisfaction. Their School-men have invented a doctrine of Fables, cunningly devised: and the Friars had crochets enow, but the Jesuits put down all. As the Instruments of battery which the Ancients used in the wars, were more able to ruin and demolish than our new inventions; but were not so maniable, and apt for transportation. So the arguments of the Friars and School-men of the Romish Church, had as much force against the truth, as the subtleties of the Jesuits: but these are apter for conveyance and insinuation, than those cloisturall Monks. For there are some poisons that will not work, except they be ejaculated from the live creature that possesseth them: his personal malignity must concur to it. For this purpose these Vbiquitaries have the advantage. For otherwise as Rhetoric is like the hand open, and Logic like the hand shut. So the Frier is an open Jesuit, and the Jesuit a close Frier. Or, as galloping is but a lofty amble, and ambling a soft gallop: so the Frier flies •ut in larger fields, and the Jesuit like a cunning waggoner, turns in a narrower compass. They are such as will distinguish of any truth, till they extinguish all truth. They say, there is an Idolatry which is bad, and an Idolatry which is good. Hoc in Grammar and Logic demonstrates this thing: yet in Christ's Word, Hoc est corpus •neum, it demonstrates nothing. All their positions are like that swinish breakfast; many dishes made ex Sue mansueto, of a tame Sow. No marvel, when a Pope him•else called all Christianity a Fable, Quantum nobis profuerit ista de Christo fabula!

Astrologers are other fabulists: who gather out of the conjunction of Planets, •nd position of Stars; the ruins of public weales, and misfortunes of private families. If Sol be in opposition to Mercury, then the Lawyers shall have a bad Terme. If Mars meet with Venus, great custom is promised to the Stews. As if they were Bauds to the celestial bodies; Doctors to cast the water of the heavens, and knew of what disease they were fick. In a common Almanac, the Prognostica or out of his deep judgment says, that such a day shall be something differing from indifferent. What weather is that? Be it hot or cold, wet or dry, fair or foul; it is still something differing from indifferent. Astrology at the best is but conjectural, and the worst coozenning and diabolical. Basil calls it occupatissimam vanitatem, a most foolish vanity. Conservam creaturam adversus Creatorem seditiose concitat, Naz. It provokes the creature against the Creator. Themselves laugh at those, who, vel adeunt vel audiunt, either go to them, or hear them. They smile how they fill their ears with Fables, their own purses with moneys. Bion condemned them that professed to now Pisces in Zodiaco, the Fishes in the Zodiac: yet did not see nantes in oceano, the fishes that swim in the sea- The events have fooled them: Manfridus told Ordelaphus Prince, that he should have a long and happy life; yet he was both married and buried the same year. Henry 7. in derision of Stargazers, asked one who had prophesied of his death; What shall betide me this Christmas? the prophet answered, he could not tell. Then what shall become of thyself this Christmas? he still answered, I cannot tell. Then I know more than thou, saith the King: for I know thou shalt presently be sent to prison for a juggling companion. How they have been extremely troubled about this last Comet! whether it threaten Spain or England; or the rising of new Sects: whether it portend War, or Plague, or Famine: whether to Princes, or to people; as if God had made them his Secretaries? Particular conjectures are but Fables: God knows what he hath to do. And if this did premonstrate a rod to scourge us, let us like Nineveh repent, and pacify the LORD'S wrath before the blow comes. Let us beseech him, Talem nobis aevertere pestem: and the Star shall leave behind it, not a curse, but a blessing, to all those that sincerely love and obey the Truth.

For use of this point to ourselves; let us turn our minds from Fables to serve the living God. The world indeed is too much addicted to fables. Mic. 2.11. If a man walking in the spirit of falsehood do lie; he shall even be the prophet of this people. If a man tell you that the keeping of the Sabbath is but a ceremonial office, this is a Fable; yet you embrace it. If another tell you, that all dues belonging to the Church are arbitrary: that no Tithes are requirable, but a Benevolence; this is a cunningly devised fable: yet received with that impudent precipice of judgment, that it is given out bravely, there is not a Minister in England can disprove it. Alas, what arguments should poor Ministers give, when the plain Text of that GOD who shall judge them, is despised! Let GOD and man say what they will; they have extorted our means, and they will keep it. Let it be told you, that you shall never give account of your unjust and usurious gains, though you never make restitution; this is a monstrous Fable, yet readily believed and admitted. For the Stage-fables, how lawful or unlawful they be, I will not here determine: he that goes to see a Play, intends not to see a Truth, but a Fable: a moral presented to his eye, that should convey some profitable document to his heart. But that some should say, they can learn more good at a Play, than at a Sermon; this is a wretched blasphemy, able to rot out the tongue of a Christian. The true purpose of Poems and Fables, is both Delectare & prodesse, to refresh the mind with delight, and to better it with profit.

When one accused the Comical Poet, that he brought a lewd and deboish'd Ruffian on the Stage, and so gave bad example to young men. He answered; True, I brought such a man on, but I hanged him before he went off: and so gave good example to young men. Saint Augustine doth exceedingly condemn the stage of the Heathens; and upon good cause, for it was bloody; the Actors slaying and butchering one another. So as Abner said to Joab, 2 Sam. 2.14. Let the young men arise, and play before us. He called it Playing, when everyone thrust his sword in his fellows side. For them that seek to defend it thus: because Cities are populous, and where are many men, are many lewd men: if their time were not spent so, it would be spent worse. As when the Tyrant objected to the Player his sawcinesse, that he durst personally tax men on the stage; he made him this answer; Be content for while the people laugh at our foolery, they never mind your villainy. But this is no good argument, to excuse sin by sin: to prevent an evil not allowable, by allowing an evil that is preventable. In a word, that w^{ch} makes a man evil, is his own evil mind.

But to conclude, you will say, that we are here forbidden to use Fables in the Pulpit; and taught barely to preach CHRIST'S power and coming in the evidence of this Spirit. Beloved, I would to God your hearts were so sanctified, that your ears need not be delighted: and that we could save your souls without pleasing your senses. But to what purpose do we interpose a Fable? To make you believe that it is literally true? No, but to work an impression of the moral use into your hearts. If we tell you that Aesop's Dog lost the substance, by catching a the shadow; you apprehend our meaning, that men lose God by catching at Mammon. Or, that the fly on the chariot-wheel gave out that she made all that glorious dust; you know we mean, that a vain-glorious man brags more than does. When Jotham told the Shechemites, Judge. 9. of the confederacy of the trees to choose them a King, which the Bramble accepted: they understood him of Abimelech, and their kindness to Ierubbaal. These fables then have their use, by a near and familiar way to derive instruction to the heart. Profanalegimus, Sacrisque interteximus; With the holy things they become holy. When God gave that great deliverance to Israel, from Pharaoh and his Host by dividing the Red-sea; he commanded a Song to be made of it, Exod. 15. knowing that when they had forgot both Law and Prophe•ie, yet they would still keep the Song in memory. So when you forget the better doctrine, you are helped to recall it by the Parable.

Receive not those then, that would cast away all learning as a Fable. Some there •re that purely pretend themselves, to preach nothing but Christ crucified: and •hese men have not stuck to boast, that all the flower of the Land is of their bouling: we are so full of Latin, of Fathers, of Poets, that there is nothing in us but •ran. What, is all theirs? New Palaemons, to cry, Nobiscum natae, nobiscum peritu•ae litera? Must all wisdom die with Job's friends? Hath Philip gotten so much, that •e hath left nothing for Alexander to conquer? Have these mowers carried all into •heir barn, and not left us so much as the gleanings after their full carts? Can the Ammons of the people eat no cakes, but such as are of Thamars baking? It is the mad merchant that cries from the Key, All the ships are mine. They speak of us, as the people did of Saul; Is Saul among the Prophets? Alas, we may then say with Peter; We have fished all night, and caught nothing. But certainly God hath abundance of Spirit, and gives not all to one man. But saying aside pride, prejudice, scorn, malice; •et us all labor to turn men's souls to Christ; and do you with a good conscience hear us: that God's Name may be honored, our office discharged, your understandings enlightened, and all our souls everlastingly saved, in the day of our Lord Jesus.

When we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.] This is the Proclaiming, wherein are considerable two things; The manifestation it else; We made known to you.] And the things manifested; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ; the Power and the Presence of Christ.

We made known to you.] The Apostles did not hide the mysteries of salvation: revealed to them, Rom. 16.25. The revelation of the mystery, which was kept secret since the world began; is now made manifest, and according to the commandment of the everlasting God, is made known to all nations for the obedience of faith. Not that it was utterly unknown before: for it were strange to think, that the Prophets knew not of that Messiah they fore-told: but the light of it was not so clear and manifest. Christ before his coming was known to many, but obscurely: after his coming he was known Pluribus & clarius, to more, and more clearly; after his Ascension, to yet a far greater number, and more manifestly; he shall be known in heaven face to face, Ephes. 3.5. In other ages he was not made known to the sons of men, As he is now, in the same manner and measure, as he is now revealed. They saw thorough a veil, so us the curtain is drawn. Tunc patuit Iudaeo, latuit mundo: jam patet mundo, latet In aeo; Then the Jews knew him, and the world was ignorant of him: now the Jews are ignorant of him, and the whole world acknowledgeth him. The clearness is greater, Ex Christo misso, that it was Ex Christo promisso. The Sun of Righteousness did then cast up some beams; now it is more glorious, as riding in the midst of heaven. Psal. 19.5. Coming as a Bridegroom out of his chamber, and rejoicing like a strong man to run his course. And nothing is hid from the heat thereof: Nothing? Yes, uncharitableness, that lives under the frigid Zone, Ice that cannot be thawed; an hard heart, nothing but hell-fire can melt it. Affected Ignorance willfully hides it self from it. John. 3.19. Light is come into the world, and men love darkness better, because their deeds are evil. Oderunt crucem pendentis, oderunt lucem splendentem. The world hates both the Cross of him that suffereth, and the Light of him that shineth. Their minds being blinded by the God of this world, that the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ should not shine unto them, 2 Cor. 4.4. But, If it be hid, it is hid to them that are lost, verse. 3. Such are the muffled Papists, that love like Owls, only to keep a whooting in the dark. John 7.39. The Holy Ghost was not yet given to the Apostles, because Jesus was not yet glorified. The Apostles had the Spirit before; but Non Taliter, nec tantum; Not after the same manner, nor in the same measure. But he that winked at the former times of ignorance, now commandeth all men everywhere to repent, Act. 17.30. This is the tenor of the new Covenant, Hebr. 8.11. I will write my Laws in their hearts: and they shall not teach one another, saying; Know the Lord: For all shall know me from the least to the greatest. As light, so the participation of God's light is communicative: his will must be known on earth, that it may be done on earth: as it is known and done in heaven. Before, God was well known in Jury, and his Name was great in Israel; but the Heathen had not the knowledge of his Laws; much less of this Gospel, of his Christ. But now his way is known upon earth, and his saving health among all nations, Psal. 67.2.

This doctrine makes to the conviction of them, that conceal the way of the Lord. Rom. 1.18. The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against them, that withhold the truth in unrighteousness. Here the Romish Priests have cause to tremble; that play at blind-man's-buffe with the people; smite them, and bid them prophecy who did it. Our Savior denounceth a Woe unto them, that shut up the kingdom of heaven against men, Matth. 23.13. The Romists think it their best policy, that the blinded Laity might not see their impostures. They resolve, Woe unto us if the people should know it: but indeed woe unto them, because the people do not know it. Like jugglers, if they did not cast a mist before men's eyes, their tricks would be nothing worth.

This reproves them also, that content themselves with their ignorance, and never labor for knowledge. We dare take you to record, that we are pure from your blood: because we have not shunned to declare unto you the counsel of God, Act. 20.26. But we may say of you, as it is said of the miser, when he is moved to give alms; you cannot hear on that ear. We have told you the wickedness of professed Usury, made known God's will in that point: we have told you the necessity of restitution, reprov'd the excessse of drink, of apparel: we urge that holy duty; If any man ca• on the Name of Christ, let him depart from iniquity: that if you do not amend your lives, Christ will not save your souls: yet these thing you will not know. How often have you been told; Make you friends of your unrighteous Mammon: you will not know it. You will make a friend of it, not make Christ your friend by it. Amicus Christus, amicus Christianus, sed magis amicus mundus; You say, Christ is your friend, and the Christian is your friend, but the world is your best friend. As the evil spirit said, Act. 19.15. Jesus I know, and Paul I know; but who are ye? So your whole life speaks; Money we know, lands we know, security we know, commodity we• know; but for Christ and his poor members; Who are ye? The world is the God they worship. As the popish dolt boasted of his picture of Saint Francis, curiously painted in his Closet; They talk of the Rood at Rome, and our Lady of Loretto, and Catherine of Sienna, and James at Compostella; but I have a picture at home worth ten of them. So the worldling hears us preach of Christ, his precious merits, grievous passion, gracious redemption, glorious reward; but still his Closet-picture he thinks better of than all these. Thus we can but preach it, and y• hear it, only God must give you hearts to know it. Pray and beseech the God of knowledge, to give you the knowledge of God, in the ways of salvation.

The power and coming of our Lord.] This concerns the matter manifested: wherein the Apostle intends the Sum of the Gospel, and the full salvation that is given us by Christ, in whom are all the treasures of blessedness. Of this he makes two distinct parts. First, that Christ came in the flesh, suffered for our sins, and rose again for our Justification. Secondly, the virtue and efficacy of this in our hearts, when we manifest the fruit of it in our well living, and well believing. He• came to suffer for our offenses, to deliver us from Satan, Death, and Hell; to reconcile us to God, to consecrate us holy Temples of himself, and to give us everlasting life. Now when we feel these gracious effects wrought in us, killing lust, quickening goodness, conforming us to obedience, and confirming us in faithfulness; this is to be benefited by the power and coming of our Lord Jesus. Iustus venit •ad peccatores, ut ex peccatoribus faceret justos: humilis venit ad superbos, ut ex superbis faceret humiles, Ambr. He that is righteous came to sinners, that he might make sinners, righteous; he that was humble came to the proud, that of proud he might make them humble. Here observe many things.

First, that the Comming of CHRIST was in Power, Esa. 64.1. Oh that thou wouldest rent the heavens, and come down; that the mounntaines might flow at thy presence. Alas, how could this be when as he came in such baseness! Esa. 53.2. He hath •o form nor comeliness, and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him. Therefore when he came unto his own, his own received him not, John 1.11. His Palace was a stable, his Courtiers beasts, his chair of state a man•ger, his royal robes a few rags. No bells ring, no bonfires proclaim his birth through the popular streets: no great Ladies came to visit his mother. Instead of thundering in the clouds, he lies crying in the cloutes▪ for beating down his enemies, he is glad to flee from their faces into Egypt. Where was then his glorious Power, or how appeared his majesty? Yes, his coming was in great Power: for if all the devils in hell could have hindered it, he had been stayed. Yea for this he came, •o dissolve the works of the devil. If our sins could have letted it: yea, they rather brought him. De caelo traxerunt non merita nostra, sed peccata, Aug. It was not our merits, but our sins, that drew him from heaven. The tyranny of Herod, and that butcherly Inquisition bloodied in the deaths of so many Infant Martyrs, could not cross it. Psal. 2. The Kings of the earth conspire, and take counsel together but nec arts nec martes, neither their power nor policy could withstand it. Neither was the glory of Christ wanting, though it conveyed it self in a less public for me. He had a famous Harbinger to go before him, and to prepare his way; John the Baptist, than whom there rose not a greater, among them that were borne of women. His bonfire was in heaven, a Star directing the wisemen to him. The bells that rung for joy, were armies of Angels; an heavenly host praising God, Luk. 2.13. His Palace heaven, his regal Throne man's conscience, his robes his own merits, richly adorning us: there was majesty in his humility. Thus came the Lord of life to the children of death. Non liberatum fuisset humanum genus, nisi Sermo Dei dignatus esse humanus, Aug. Mankind had not been redeemed, unless the word of God had been hominified. If we say that he hath humanity in him, that receives a man into his house; Quàm humanus ill qui suscipit hominem in seipsum; how full of humanity is he, that receives manhood unto himself! His coming was like a Lamb in meekness, yet he triumphed like a Lion in powerfulness; leading captivity captive, and free•ng all his children from eternal bondage.

Secondly, observe that the Gospel is no weak thing, but comes in Power: for CHRIST. Comming hath yet further Latitude. He came once unto men, he comes still into men: that was in the flesh, this is in the Spirit. The Law indeed did more amaze the conscience, and was delivered with greater terror, that it made Moses himself quake and fear. (Now if there was such thundering at the Law giving, what would have been at the Law breaking?) The Law came with more terror, but the Gospel comes with more Power. For that could not turn his heart that bare it in his hand: but the Gospel is able to change the man. It is the power of God unto salvation, Rom. 1.16. The Law may set before us our wretched estate by sin, but there leaves us desperate: it discovers our disease, prescribes no cure: it doth express sin, but cannot suppress sin. It is the glory and bleeding spectacle of Jesus crucified in the Gospel, that heals the soul. 1 Cor. 1.18. The preaching of the Cross unto us that are saved, is the power of God. If there be no feeling of that Power, there are no sparks of salvation yet kindled. Peters Sermon took little effect, till he came to this point. Act. 2.36. The same Jesus whom ye have crucified, hath God made both Lord and Christ. Cum audiverunt hoc. Ver: 37. When they heard this, they were pricked in their hearts; What shall we do? Paul and Silas might have given the Iailo... good words, fair entreaties, and the most valid argument of all, monies, yet all this could not keep them from the dungeon. But when the Power of God had shaken the foundation of the prison, and Paul began to preach Jesus; then he was baptized, rejoiced, and believed in God with all his house, Act. 16. Let men come with oratory and the enticing words of man's wisdom; those floods do but beat upon surd rocks: but ifin the power of God, this shall turn those rocks into soft and fleshy hearts. Let the naturalist with all his eloquence, dissuade the covetous worldling from his greediness; alas, one ounce of Gold waighes down all his reasons. Offer to stay a furious man from anger with arguments, he hath not the patience to hear them. Could the Poet detain the lascivious from his harlot, though he tell him that she is a quick-sand to swallow him alive? alas, one smile from her is stronger with him than all reason. But now come with the Gospel, and urge them with the heart-blood of JESUS CHRIST, shed to save their souls from hell, and to satisfy for their sins. This is that powerful pleading which makes good men confess their hearts to burn within them: and bad men, even an Agrippa to say; I am almost persuaded to be a Christian, Act. 26.28.

Thirdly, collect we hence, that the word of God hath more power than all men's edicts. Men in their writings are at much cost in adorning their style, and reducing their words to number, weight and measure; interlacing many rhetorical figures to beget attention. But on the contrary, the Scriptures in a plain simplicity, accommodates it self to the capacity of the weakest. Yet under this simplicity is included a strange majesty, and gravity of speech. As great Princes in their Edicts use no figures to their subjects, but plainly and briefly set down their commands: so God absolutely imposeth his will without debating the matter. Yet in persuading, moving affection, and posing the deepest apprehension, they have a Power beyond all writings. Read the first Chapter of Esays Prophecy, and compare it with the best Oration of Tully. Read the History of Joseph, and confer it with any tale of Aeneas. Read the acts of David, and weigh them with the wonders of Tamberlaine. Read the Gospel, which is the History of the life and death of Christ; and you will think the saddest stories of any human pens mere counterfeits to it. Let the Scriptural Psalms and Hymns be balanced with the most accurate and pathetic poems; alas, when these vanish with their air, those shall ravish the ear, and withal take the conscience. Josephus was a man admired for eloquence, yet how he halts in his imitation! concerning Abraham's sacrificing of his son Isaac, he makes a large rhetorical discourse: the Scripture is brief and plain. Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest: He took him, and the wood of the burnt offering, land laid on his son, as Christ bore his own Cross. Behold, saith the child, the fire and wood: but where is a Lamb for a burnt offering. The Father answers, My son, God will provide himself a Lamb. There be two lines able to wring tears from the Reader, whereas Josephus with his ample illustration moves nothing. It is recorded of one Theodectes, who would have brought some of the Bible into a Pagan tragedy, that he was stricken blind, till falling to repentance he was restored.

Lastly, the invincible power of the Gospel is manifested in throwing down those bulwarks raised against it. When the waters of life began first to flow, what strong flood-gates, rampires, and dammes, were set to stop their sourse. All the learning, power, and policy of men, with the help of infernal spirits were bent against it. Demosthenes and Tertullus for eloquence, Solon against Solomon, Plato against Moses, Aristotle against Paul, Alexander and Caesar against CHRIST: but whatsoever contenders opposed the truth, they discovered the invaliditie of their arguments, with the confusion of their own persons. Christ sent a few fishermen to the sea of this world, with the nets of faith; and they enclosed multitudes of fishes, of all sorts and sises; tanto mirabiliores, quanto rariores, even Kings and Philosophers themselves, Aug. He sent not kings and Philosophers to persuade fishermen; but fishermen to convert Philosophers and kings. They that had no authority to countenance them, no friends to side them, no oratory to second them, no riches to maintain them: yet went abroad preaching the disdained Gospel of the crucified Jesus. And even when the kings of the earth did set themselves against the Lord, and against his Christ: yet even then God did give him the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession. Psal. 2.8. Emperors and Monarchs have thrown down their Scepters at the feet of the Lamb, as the Elders cast down their Crowns before the Throne; embracing the faith, and yielding to the Sovereign supremacy of JESUS CHRIST. Then was that Prophecy fulfilled. Esa. 1.6. The Wolf shall dwell with the Lamb, the kid with the Lyon, and a little child shall lead them. Nero and Domitian study strange deaths, to afflict the Saints, and to oppress the Gospel: yet the Church groans and grows, bleeds and battens: every drop of blood that ends one Christian, begets a thousand. Those men who at the first, Timebant in verbis, postea gaudebant in verberibus; trembled at threatening words, afterwards embraced killing swords, for the testimony of Jesus. You had once ten Apostles flying, one denying, yet afterwards all rejoicing, to suffer for him that suffered for them. John. 16.8. When the Spirit is come, he will convince the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment. How shall he convince it? not immediately by himself, but mediately by his Apostles, and Ministers; who otherwise durst never have been so bold. Neither was this a Personal promise, but rell to the Church, unto the end of the world. Now if this had been a cunning fable, some tale of Jupiter or Apollo, it could never have effected such a content of conscience, in forsaking of lands, liberties, wives, lives; in exposing us to calumnies, calamities, torments. Tell a Turk, the worshipper of a Mahomet, concerning riches, honours, and carnal satisfactions that come to him by his Prophet; this pleaseth his flesh and blood. But tell him of persecution, anguish, contempt, and death, which his profession must call him to; he will none of that for any Idols sake. Yet preach CHRIST to the conscience, the value of the price he paid to redeem us: and then yet a thousand dangers stand in our way; prison, hunger, tyrants, torments, deaths, di•else; we run through them all with patience, and overcome them with confidence. In these latter times, when the deluge of Popery overflowed; all piety was drowned, justice and mercy lost, the Woman fled into the wilderness, Antichrist in his highest ruffe, Kings kissing his feet; when it was death to think of restoring the light. Yet against all clamours of Friers, excommunications of Popes, execrations of his Priests oppositions of Princes by sword and fire: the Truth was delivered from the jaws of error, set in a white chair of crystal sincerity, and most powerfully lodged in a bed of peace. Where she reacheth forth to us her milken hand, guiding us to those everlasting doors, whereinto heresy and darkness shall never enter. O may this Sun shine to us, and our children after us, so long as the sun and moon in heaven endureth! Amen.

To apply all to ourselves; The power and coming of CHRIST, •s the kingdom of CHRIST: let us all pray; that this Power may come •n our hearts: LORD, let thy Kingdom come. Now what we pray with •urlippes, we must endeavor with ourlives. Shall we desire the removal of all •indrances to this kingdom, and most of all hinder it ourselves? If we obscure •hat glory, which we appreciate our own tongues and hearts, and the tongues and •earts of all under heaven, shall rise up in witness against us. He that makes such a •eeming prayer, and retains such a sinning desire, doth beg consuming vengeance •n himself. Tremble at this ye wicked; you may as well spit upon CHRIST, •s come to Church and say, Thy kingdom come; and yet actually uphold the kingdom of the devil. Let us take heed of withstanding the coming of this Power: CHRIST preached to the Jews, they would not receive him. Behold; their house is left unto them desolate. Noah preached to the old world: Lot to Sodom: Gildas to the Britain's; they despised it; their land was destroyed, and given to others. John wickleffe was raised up to this office, himself was burnt, and his books: what followed? they slew the next king, set up three usurpers, the nobility was butchered, the land havocked. The contempt of this Power hath brought on infallible desolation.

What this sin may work upon us, only the Lord knows, and knows to prevent. Comets may threaten, and rumors of wars sound in our ears: none of these destroy us, but our own sins. Let us not hurt ourselves, none shall hurt us. I• we be false to God, let us not blame others for being false to us. It was Christ's complaint over that apostate City, O Jerusalem, thou that killest the Prophets, and sto•• them which are sent unto thee! If we retain their sins, there remain for us their plagues. We use to arraign and judge our prophets, whose Ministry is to arraign and judge us, that we may not be judged of the Lord. The Jews killed their Teachers, do not we so when we withhold their life blood from them, and stand <◇> justify it? Is it not all one, to cut a man's throat, and to take away the sustenance whereby he lives, and without which he must needs famish? Certainly, of both it is the greater mercy, or (at least) the less cruelty, to dispatch him quickly. It is their work to mortify and kill our sins, and shall we kill them? that our sins may live? Oh there is a cursed devil that bewitcheth us! God that suffers this, means thereby to suffer this lands destruction. There were not (let not envy here me) so flourishing a Church under heaven, if this sin of Sacrilege were taken from it. But this effect hath followed it; that the profession of the Gospel in many places comes upon the stage, to help to make up the play, and to minister matter of mirth. And the Law doth domineer over the Gospel, as Pilate sate to Judge JESUS. If this land should ever come to the danger of destroying, (which God avert) those deriders of the poor Ministry will run into holes, that have already buried their talents from ever doing good. And then the poor clergies prayers will prevail more for mercies, than all their proud arrogated glories. But alas, how should Christ come in power to help us, whom we have rejected coming in power to convert us! Do•• he come now, and we will not know him; and can we hope he will come then when we call him? Open your hearts, all ye that fear the Lord, and let him in. As it is his own promise; Behold I come quickly: so it is the Churches prayer, Come Lord Jesus, come quickly. Wickedness is powerful, the devil is powerful, covetousness is powerful, lust is powerful: and hath the Gospel of Christ lost the powerfulness? No, if it have not power to convert us, it will have power to confound us. If Christ be not suffered to come unto us, he will not be hindered from coming against us. Oh let us come unto him, that he may come unto us: subject we our hearts and lives to the obedience of his Gospel; that we may be found holy and blameless at the second coming of the Lord Jesus. It shall be powerful then, when the heavens shall pass away with a noise, and the elements shall melt with heat, and the earth with her works shall be burnt up. Let us now honor him when he come in grace, that he may honor us when he comes in glory.

And were eye-witnesses of his Majesty. This is the testification. Our Savior intending that the Apostles should lay the foundation of his Church; upon that Corner-stone whereupon themselves and we all are built; he furnished them with all fit provision for it. He declared his will to their ears, presented his works to their eyes, fixed his truth in their hearts; and sent them not to publish riddles and paradoxes and fabulous reports; but real and actual things which they had seen and heard. So might they from infallible experience give a well grounded testimony. The Sum is this; Christ made himself manifest to them, that they might manifest him to us. He let them see, that they might teach us to believe. The things which I have received of my Father, I have made known unto you. They must needs be scribes well fitted for the kingdom of heaven; when such a Master read unto them the oracles of Truth. He that is the life of the Gospel, taught the Gospel of life. It did not hold, that he must needs be a good scholar, that had Socrates his Master. But he must be a good Disciple, that hath Jesus Christ for his Tutor. •e are not reporters, but witnesses: not ear-witnesses, but eye-witnesses: not only of •is Humility, but of his majesty.

We were witnesses.] But Non eget testimonio hominis, John. 5.34. I receive not testimony from man. He is the Way, the Truth, and the Life: the way to the truth, the truth of the way, the life of both, of all: therefore a sufficient testimony to himself. Yet he saith, John. 5.31. If I bear witness of myself, my witness is not true. And of •he contrary. John. 8.14. Though I bear witness of myself, my witness is true. These •woe places seem at the first view, contradictory. But are easily reconciled: in the •ormer, CHRIST did accommodate himself to the capacity of the hearers, who •cknowledged nothing more in him then Humanity: in the other, he sets forth his Divinity, and discovers another nature in his own Person: that howsoever they •ight vilipend the testimony of the one, yet were convinced by the testimony of ••e other. But this answer seems not to satisfy; for CHRIST as he was man, was •ithout error, and could not give a false testimony how then could he say, My witness is not true? I answer; My witness is not true, that is, it is not effectual, nor •ould be accepted as true by the Jews, though it was most certainly true. Though •be true secundum rem, according to the matter testified: yet not true secundum acceptionem, according to their acception. To the other it is objected, My witness is •ue: that according to the Law no man's witness is accepted for himself. And, Pro.7.2. Let another man praise thee, and not thine own mouth. But CHRIST is the •light of the world: now the light doth not only help us to see other things, but all •o to discern it self. But further, if CHRIST receives not testimony for man, why •oth he admit of John's witnesses? John. 5.33. Ye sent unto John, and he bare witness •nto the truth. John did not intrude himself into this office, but the Jews required •im to it; Ye sent unto John. This appears, John. 1.19. This is the Record of John, •hen the Jews sent unto him to ask him, who art thou? now Christ admitted of John's testimony for their sakes; as he declares himself; That ye might be saved. I receive not man's witness, Propter indignitiam meam, for any need that I have of it: •d recolo propter salutem vestram, I suffer it for your salvation, that you might be induced through a witness of your own choosing to believe on me. I receive not the •itnesse of man, as it is merely man's, and of no further authority than flesh and •loud: but as it is inspired by God, I entertain it.

Our blessed Savior accepted of many witnesses, which I will but touch, •s being not in the center, but not out of the circumference of this argument.

1 God the Father. John. 5.37. The Father himself which sent me hath borne wit•esse of me. The substance of his testimony was delivered in an audible voice; This ⟨ϕ⟩ my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

2 John the Baptist. John. 1.8. He was not that light, but he was sent to bear witness •f that light. The Testimony of John was Inducens, persuading: but the testimony •f the Father compellens, prevailing.

3 The works of Christ. John. 5.36. The works that I do, bear witness of me. This is Testimonium majus Iohanne; a greater witness than John's; against this wit•esse there is an exception: if Christ might be known sufficiently by his works to •e the Messiah: the same testimony might be given to the Apostles, who wrought •s great miracles. It is answered, that Christ when he wrought these works de•lared himself to be the Messiah: the Apostles when they wrought them, declared •hemselves not to be Christ, but the servants of Christ: and that they effected all •nely through his name and virtue. When the disciples of John came to Christ to •e satisfied, whether he were he that should come or no; he refers them to no o•her testimony but his works. Luk. 7.22. Go and tell John: what things you have ••ene and heard: that the blind see, the lame walk, &c. Magnum magna decent: he proves his goodness by his good works. It was this that preferred Corazin and Bethsaida before Tire and Sidon in torments: because mighty works were done among them, and they repented not, Matth. 11.21. Opera virtutis, mighty works. Luk. 24.19. He is called a Prophet mighty, not only in words, but in deeds. Neither were the Jews only convinced, with a Nunquam locutus est homo sicut iste, John. 7.46. Never ⟨ϕ⟩ spake like this man. But also with a Nunquam operatus est homo, sicut iste; never man di•like his man; We never saw it on this fashion, John. 7.31. Will Christ when he comes, ⟨ϕ⟩ more miracles than this man hath done? John 9.32. Since the world began the like was never heard before. What is inferred on it? Ver. 33. If this man were not of God, he could do nothing.

4 The Scriptures, John. 5.39. Secarch the Scriptures, and they are they that testify of me. All or them, like so many Mathematical lines meeting at that one comes. Every page, like a John the Baptist, pointing us to the Lamb of God that takes away the sin of the world. Nil fere continet verbum Domini, nisi verbum Dominum. The word of the Lord contains almost nothing else, but the Lord, that is the word. Act. 10.43. To him give all the Prophets witness. They by predictions and figures, the Apostles by demonstration, and truth. The first, of these Testimonies was pronounced, the second, inspired, the third, exhibited, the last, written.

5 Angels; they witnessed his conception, Luk. 1.31. His nativity, Luk. 2.10. His Majesty. Matth. 4.11. The Angels came and ministered unto him. His Resurrection, Luk. 24.5. His Ascension, Act. 1.10.

6 The creatures; In his nativity a Star, a burning Lamp set in the heavens: Lucifer ante solem; a day-star before the sun. In his life, the winds and the sea answer his commands, Matth. 8.27. What manner of man is this, that even the wi• and the seas obey him! The sun was darkened at his death, the veil of the Temple rent, the earth did quake, the stones clove; and the graves were opened. At his birth the heavens did witness that he was come down to earth: at his Resurrection, the earth did witness that he was ready to go up to heaven. The sea was his path to walk on, the clouds his chariot to ride on.

7 His very enemies: neither Pilate nor Herod could find fault in him, Luk. 23.15. Ye have brought this man to me, I have examined him, but can find no fault i• him; No, nor yet Herod. Pilate's wife justifies him to her husband. Matth. 27.19. H• thou nothing to do with that just man. They that came to ensnare him, depar••mending him. You have, Matth. 22. Pharisees, Sadducees, Lawyers; all apposing him, all convinced, and astonished at his Doctrine. The Centurion at his death acknowledgeth; Truly this is the Son of God. The very devils acknowledge him, Mark. 1.24. I know thee who thou art, even the holy one of God, Act. 19.15. Jesus I know. O powerful Christ, that couldst Ex ore inimicorum, out of the mouth of thy professed enemies derive thy praise? How should thy friends, bought with thy precious blood, glorify thee: when thy very enemies thus honor thee! Deu. 32.15. Their Rock is not as our Rock, even our enemies themselves being Judges. Even the Jews that crucified him, and All bare him witness, and wondered at his gracious words.

8 Lastly, the Apostles were especially designed for this Testimony, John. 15.27. Ye shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning. There are twelve Apostles, a whole Jury of these witnesses: and when one of them apostat• by transgression, and the room was void, they cast lots to supply the place with a new witness, Act. 1.22. One must be ordained to be a witness with us of his Resurrection. There were twelve Patriarchs in the Old Testament, twelve Apostles in the new. Solomon's twelve Officers, 1 King. 4.7. Moses his twelve Pillars, Exod. 24.4. The twelve cakes of Shewbread, Levite. 24.5. The twelve stones in A••• Pectorall. The twelve stones that Joshua took out of Jordan, The twelve Spies, the twelve Tribes, the twelve Stars. Revel. 12. The twelve foundations, twelve g•s, twelve Angels, Revel. 21.14. The wall of the City had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve Apostles. These twelve were to lay the foundation of the Church. Eph. 2.20. We are built upon the foundation of the Prophets and Apostles Jesus Christ, himself, being the chief corner-stone. We are built on them; they and we •ll Jesus Christ. But were there no more than twelve of these especial witnesses? What say you to Paul and Barnabas; were not they Apostles? were not they wit•esses? Yes, they are both called Apostles and Witnesses, Act. 14.4. Part held with the •postles: now at that time in Iconium were no Apostles, but Paul and Barnabas;•efore they were. Vers. 3. God gave Testimony to the Word of his grace by them in •nges and wonders: therefore they were Witnesses, 1 Cor. 9.1. Am I not an Apostle?•ith Paul. Yea, 2 Cor. 11. They are Apostles; Nonne ego plus? I am more. He is •lled the Apostle: when we speak of an Apostle, and distinguish him not by name, •e commonly mean

Saint Paul. But he calls himself Abortive, 1 Cor. 15.8. One come out of due time. One is said to be abortive three ways. First, either Extra tempus debitum, when he comes not in the due and expected time. Secondly, when he is forced from the womb of the mother. Thirdly, when he comes not to full perfection. Paul may be said abortive two ways, not the later: for he labored more abundantly than they all. Ingenuously he confesseth, that he was not a whit behind the very chiefest of the Apostles. There is a three-fold difference betwixt the rest of the Apostles, and S. Paul. 1. The Twelve for twelve years preached only to the twelve Tribes of Israel: Paul went presently after his calling to the Gentiles. 2. The Twelve divided the world amongst them, Paul took the whole world for his Parish. 3. The rest were called (all but Matthias) à Christo mortali, by Christ in his mortality; Paul Christo immortalis, by Christ in his immortality. The rest, by Christ humbled: Paul, by Christ glorified. Though this difference be in their Apostleship, there is no difference in their Testimony: they all witnessed the same LORD JESUS.

This Witnessing was one of the Apostles prime excellencies and privileges above others. The first privilege was their Mission, which was immediately from Christ himselfe, I send you: whereas we are sent from him mediately by others. The second, was their Commission; Preach and Baptize, &c. They were sent to plant the Church, whereas we build upon their foundation. The third, was their Authority, John. 20.22. Christ breathed on them, and said, Receive ye the Holy Ghost. There was number of ceremonies to make up a Levitical Priest; anointings, washings, &c. but to make up an Evangelical Priest, Christ only breathed on them: thus in a great measure they received the Holy Ghost, Act. 2.3. There sate upon them cloven tongues, like as of fire. Such a fire was kindled on that day of Pentecost, that the whole world hath been the warmer for it ever since. Therefore Chrysostom calls the Apostleship, spiritual Consulship, which was the greatest office in the Roman Government. The last privilege is their Testimony, and Election to this testimony. God raised up Christ, and shown him openly; Not to all the people, but to us Witnesses, chosen before God. The Lord sent them forth ad testificandum, to bear witness of Christ.

In witnesses there are three things especially required: 1. That they be Bonae memoriae, of good report and repute: for a bad and vicious life enervates their testimony. but these were holy men: he that sent them to give testimony, did not deny them contumely, John. 17.17. Sanctify them through thy truth. Nihil est puero teste certius, idior. No witness is surer than a child's: when he is come to those years to understand, and not to those years to dissemble. Thus doth God Ex ore lactantium, out of childrens mouths magnify his own praise. The witnesses were not children in understanding, but in simplicity and innocence of heart. They might be reproved, they could never be disproved. 2. That they be Oculati testes, Eye-witnesses: so were these, we shall hear. 3. That they be Concordes, (in non-Latin alphabet), to agree in their Testimony. false witnesses are easily found out, by being examined sundery; unless they have cunningly digested their tale; and then their mischief is more pernicious. But these witnesses, when they were dispersed over the face of the earth, did Vnum sentire, eum dicere, mind one thing, and speak one thing: they delivered the same, wrote the same, wrought the same, witnessed the same truth even with their bloods. There were in all points Idonei testes, sufficient witnesses.

This Apostolical Testimony was not without some opposition: for there were others that came in the name of CHRIST, who had nothing to do with him. Simon Magus bewitched not only the Samaritans, but also the Romans. Claudius set up a brazen Image on Tyber bridge, with this blasphemous Incriptions To Simon the great god. But while he sailed in the air Remigio daemonum, he fell down to the earth, and burst his neck. One Manes, admired of the Persians, took twelve men, whom he called his Apostles, and styled himself the Comforter of Israel. But undertaking to recover the Kings son, who was dangerously sick, and failing in the cure, he had his skin pulled over his ears. A Romish Doctor, called the Oracle of India, gave out that he was more holy than the Apostles, yea, than the Angels: yea, that God made him a proffer of hypostatical union, and assumption into the fellowship of the Deity; but the modest man refused it. That he was the worlds Redeemer, quoad efficaciam, in respect of efficacy; as Christ performed it, quoad sufficientiam, in respect of sufficiency. Horrid and unpardonable blasphemy! So one Postill, a Jesuit, under the name of mother Jane, printed a book called the Victory of women: Maintaining, that as CHRIST redeemed the superior world, Man: so mother Jane saved the inferior world, Woman. Here Saint Paul's Prophecy was fulfilled, 2 Thess. 2.11. For this cause GOD shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness. They would none of Christ, let them welcome Antichrist. John 5.43. I am come in my Fathers Name, and ye receive me not: if another shall come in his own name, him will ye receive. He that will not believe these witnesses, shall everlastingly perish.

For as, Seeing we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us believe, 1 John 5.7. There are three that bear record in heaven: the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one. The Father bare witness to CHRIST, at his Baptism, Matth. 3.17. at his Transfiguration, Matth. 17.5. at a manifest and glorious Revelation, John 12.28. There came a voice from heaven, &c. The HOLY GHOST bare witness to CHRIST, in descending first upon himself, John 1.32. then upon his Apostles, Acts 2.4. making them also to bear witness, John. 15.26. Both he shall testify of me, and make you testify of me. The WORD bare record of himself, John 10.25. When the Jews put him to it; If thou be CHRIST, tell us plainly: He answered, I have told you▪ When John's Disciples asked him; Art thou he that should come? He witnessed, I am he. Matth. 14.62. When the high Priest questioned him; Art thou the CHRIST, the Son of the Blessed? JESUS said; I am, Thus he witness to the blind man whom they had excommunicated, John. 9.37. Who is the Son of God? It is he that talks with thee; I am he. This he testified to Paul, Act. 9.5. I am JESUS whom thou persecutest. And these three are one; Non tantum in testimonio, sed $\langle \rangle$ essentia; Not only in their witness, but in their essence, Ardens. There be three th•• bear witness in earth; the Spirit, and the Water, and the Blood: and these three agree to one. The Spirit of God, or of man inspired with that Spirit, applying to his comfort the water and blood that came out of Christ's side. Water being a sign of o•• Sanctification, Blood of our Justification. These three are one, saith Augustine, I• mysterio, non in natura; Not in nature, but in mystery: they agree in one Testimony. Si qua in aquâ gratia, non ex natura fluminis, sed ex praesentia Flaminis; The virtue that is in the water, is not of the water, but of the Spirit. Thus if in the mouth of t•• three witnesses every word be established; How strong should be our faith, that is confirmed with so many and so great witnesses? The intent of all is that we should believe, John 19.35.

He that saw it, bare record, and his record is true, that ye mig^o believe. Not to give credit to all these witnesses, is (so far as in us lieth) <◇> make GOD lose his purpose. Therefore these shall either witness to us, or <◇> day witness against us.

Eye-witnesses.] One eye-witness is better than many ear-witness. They spake not by tradition, or what curious relaters have buzzed in credulous ears: but oppose their own knowledge against all fabulous reports; Vidimus, we have seen. That which we have heard, and seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the Word of life. That which was from the beginning: Not of •ate days, no new sprung up noveltie. Which we have heard, immediately speaking in the world, as well as mediately speaking in his Word. He spake to our Fathers by the mouth of all his Prophets from the beginning: but in our days, by his own mouth: our ears have heard his Sermons. Which we have seen with our eyes: Behold him working miracles, raising the dead, casting out devils. Which we have looked upon; not having only a glimpse of him, but intently looked upon him: as John pointed to him with the finger, Behold the Lamb of GOD. Our hands have handled his precious body, both before his death, and after his Resurrection. Doubtfull Thomas would not believe, and that Ex professo; till he saw the prints of his nails, and thrust his hand into his side; and then he cries, My LORD, and my GOD. Handled of the Word of life: How can this be? Though this being very GOD of very GOD, is neither visible nor palpable: yet in respect of the personal union of the two Natures in him, we say again; That which we have heard, seen, and handled. The Apostle Saint John doth especially of all the rest press this point; 1 John 5.10. John 20.31. John 21.24. This is that beloved Apostle, Evangelist, Martyr, all. Saint Peter was an Apostle, not an Evangelist. Saint Mark an Evangelist, not an Apostle. Saint Matthew both an Apo•tle, and an Evangelist, not a Prophet. Saint Augustine a Doctor, not a Martyr. Saint Laurence a Martyr, not a Doctor: but Saint John was all these, Dyez. Pontan. In his Epistles an Apostle, in his Revelations a Prophet, in his Gospel an Evange•ist, in his faith a Confessor, in his preaching a Doctor, in his chastity a Virgin, in his readiness to die for CHRIST a Martyr? suffering for him under the Cross, whom he saw suffering for him on the Cross. This is the Disciple, that hath testify •hese things, and we know that his Testimony is true. Saint Paul doth also earnestly •rge it, 1 Cor. 15.5. He was seen of Cephas, then of the Twelve: he was seen of above •ve hundred brethren at once: he was seen of James, seen of all the Apostles; and last of •ll seen of me. And Saint Peter here confirms it; We were eye-witnesses of his Majesty. Now as Aristotle said; If Timothy had not been, we had not had •o much sweet music: but if Phrynus (Timothy his master) had not been, we •ad not had Timothy. So, if these Apostles, John, Peter, and Paul had not been, •e might have wanted such witnesses: but if JESUS their Master had not been, we had wanted such Apostles. They saw with their eyes, we hear with our ears, •ORD grant us all to believe with our hearts, the Majesty of JESUS CHRIST. So it follows.

Of his Majesty.] The Apostles saw not with such eyes as the world. The world saw neither for me nor comeliness, nor anything desireable in him, Isaiah 53.2. The Apostles saw his Majesty. The world saw him as a dejected, rejected man; •h. 19.5. Behold the man: the man loden •with sorrows, and overwhelmed with mi•eries. The Apostles saw him white and ruddie, of the purest complexion, the chiefest •mong ten thousand, Cant. 5.10. Whiter than the Lilies of the valleys, redder than ••e Roses of Sharon. Were our eyes opened, to behold the incomparable virtues of our blessed Savior; as Plato said of Virtue; he would ravish our souls with an unexpressible love. He is a spiritual, Intellectual Sphere, whose circumference is everywhere, his Center nowhere. His Majesty is infinitely puissant, the chiefest of ten thousand. The Jews have a Tradition, that the Messias appeared to them at the Red sea, like a man of war, delivering them from the Egyptians. For this they made a Song, Exo. 15.3. The Lord is a man of war. It is prophesied of him, Isaiah 53.12. (v) he shall divide the spoil with the strong. His Majesty is infinitely great, his mercy is infinitely sweet. Cujus aspectu dispelluntur tenebrae, cujus effectu liberantur animae; His strokes dispel all darkness, his power delivers our souls. Come now, and behold him with the Crown wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his espousals, in the day of the gladness of his heart, Cant. 3.11. There is no peace but from him, no life but by him, no bliss but through him, no comfort but for him, no joy but in him; O blessed eyes that see the Lord Jesus.

How, when, where, and wherein, the Apostles were Eye-witnesses of his Majesty, the ensuing verses challenge to instance. Only learn we now, to make CHRIST the Object of all our eyes. Our carnal eyes cannot now see him: we must wait for that day, when with these our eyes in our very flesh we shall behold him, Job 19.27. Our spiritual, intellectual, faithful eyes may now see him. As the Israelites, when they were stung with those fiery Serpents, looked upon the Breath Serpent, and were healed. So we that are stung with our sins, must look upon the Son of man lifted up to his Cross, that we may not perish, but have life everlasting, John 3.14. No contemplation of him, no benediction from him. As Peter said to the Creeples, Act. 3.4. Look on us: and he gave heed to them, expecting to receive something of them. So we must look steadfastly on Christ, or shall receive no alms of comfort. Behold him in faith, that God may behold thee in him, 2 King. 2.10. When Elias was to be taken up, Elisha begged of him, that a double portion of his Spirit might be upon him: he answered, Thou hast asked a hard thing; nevertheless, if thou see me, when I am taken away from thee, it shall be so unto thee: but if not, it shall not be so. A sinner doth desire of Christ, to be made a Saint, and to have his holy Spirit put upon him: Christ answers, Thou hast asked a hard thing; nevertheless, if thou canst see me with the eye of Faith, thou shalt have thy request, thou shalt be saved.

But before we come to behold his Majesty let us first look upon his misery. Let our meditations follow him, from his agony in the garden, all the way of his Passion, by the tract of his Blood, till we find him dead on the Cross. Behold the scourge fetching blood from his sides, the thorns harrowing his sacred head, his life-blood issuing out by the wounds of the nails. And as if all that were too little, a soldier opening his side with a spear after his death, and broaching out blood and water, Lament. 1.12. Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? Behold and see, if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow. Sorrow is a thing of that nature, it calls for beholding: and humanity cannot choose but yield an ocular pity. Every good eye will turn it self, and look upon them that are in distress. Those two merciless men, Luke 10. that went by the wounded man; though they helped him not, yet before they passed, they looked upon him as he lay. Our Savior being advanced on the Chariot of his Cross, unless we purposely turn away our eyes, we must needs be eye-witnesses of his sorrow. Look upon JESUS, the Founder and Finisher of our faith, Hebr. 12.2. Think of the torments he suffered, of the mercies he proffered, of the sacrifice he offered: and then, as there was never grief like his grief; so there was never love like his love. When the Jews beheld Christ weeping for Lazarus, they said, Behold, how he loved him! John. 11.36. When we see CHRIST bleeding, weeping streams of blood for us, we may well say; Behold, how he loved us!

We cannot now with Zacchaeus, see his face, yet we may behold his mercy. We cannot with the sick woman, touch his hem, yet we may touch him. We cannot hear Verbum Dominum; we may still hear Verbum Domini. We cannot behold him dying on the Cross, yet we may contemplate the efficacy of his Cross, and the price of his sacrifice. His Blood is like the widows oil, King. 4. Enough to pay all our debts, and to spare, for ourselves to live upon be••i. Luke 10.23. Blessed are the eyes which see the things that ye see. Blessed eyes, ⟨◇⟩ with faith and love see the LORD JESUS. John 8.56. Your Father Abraham •joyced to see my day: he say it, and was glad. He saw it in hope, we see it in faith. H• saw it and rejoiced: who can behold, the day of CHRIST, that is, the day of salvation and not rejoice? Indeed we are naturally borne blind, how then shall ⟨◇⟩ •me to see? John. 9.19 Only JESUS must open our eyes, that we may see him••fe. John. 20.29. Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed. Blessed are •ey that have not seen, and yet have believed. Tanto magis beati in credendo, quanto mi•s expediti in videndo; Our faith shall have so much the more commendation, as our •es have been permitted the less vision. It is held by Divines a principal part of •r glory in heaven, to see JESUS CHRIST. They that are in the Courts of •inces, behold gorgeous apparel: at rich men's tables, we see costly delicates: on •e sea men see strange wonders: on the land, glorious Palaces: yet Peribit visus & •sum; the eyes shall be stopped with dust, and the objects burnt with fire. The •ost blessed sight, is to see God in peace: though we lose all the spectacles on earth, •do videamus te, Lord Jesus let us see thee to our eternal comfort. Bless us, O Fa•er of lights, with that everlasting vision, where no clouds nor darkness shall hin••r our speculation. O may we spend that eternity never to be spent, in the joyful •ght and peaceful enjoying, of Thee our Maker, thy Son our Savior, and that ho•• Spirit our Comforter; to whom be glory forever. Amen.

VERSE 17. For he received from God the Father, honor and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory; This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased.

THE Apostle might seem to have delivered a wonder, a paradox, an incredible mystery: he must now stand to it, and declare the wonder, explain the paradox, unfold the mystery. What was it? that they had Seene the •ajesty of Christ. His Majesty? This is that wonder, that paradox, that mystery. •he world had seen his pain, his contempt, his poverty; but his Majesty? It had •ene him come thirsty to the fountain, hungry to another's table, weary to his re•se, desiring entertainment where he found it not: but his Majesty? It had seen •m crowned with thorns, bleeding with scourges, forsaken on the Cross: but his •ajesty? It had seen him in the form of servant, full of ignominy, full of misery; •ut full of Majesty? It never saw that. Well then, this Majesty doth our Apostle de•are: he hath said it, he will prove it. For he received from the Father honor and glo•e. We say, that honor conferred by the King, is died in grain, and will hold co••ur: yet it hath the change, for though the color hold, the garment it self will •ear out. Now when the garment is tottered to rags, farewell color: so when the •ody is consumed to dust, farewell honor. But when the King of heaven gives ho•our, it will hold indeed:

—hunc nec Iovis ira, nec ignis,

Non ferrum poterit, nec edax abolere vetustas.

•s Isaac said Jacob, I have blessed him, and he shall be blessed: so God saith of that •an, I have honored him, and he shall be honored.

He received from God the Father, &c.] You see, the form of the words is Re•ptory; He •ceived. The •arrels are •ive:

- Who, Christ; He received.
- Of whom, God; Of God the Father.
- What, Honor and glory.
- When; When the voice came from the excellent glory.
- How; This is my beloved Son, &c.

There could be no Testimony, Plenius vel planius, manifestius vel magnificent•• more perspicuous, or more glorious. Honor requires reverence: God hath honored his Son, let us honor the Father, and give the devout reverence of humble hearts to the whole Trinity.

He received.] This is the first Circumstance, the person to whom this honor is given. He received, but Receiving implies want; now is there any want in Christ? Coloss. 1.9. It pleased the Father, that in him should all fullness dwell. The oil of gladness did so fill him, that it ran over the brinks of his Humanity, and fills us <◇> members. Of his fullness we have all received, grace for grace, John. 1.16. The Plenitude of Christ was not Plenitudo sufficientiae, a sufficient fullness, enough to serve his turn: but superabundantiae, an over-flowing fullness; a sea of grace, able to fill all <◇> channels. Not Transitionis, a passing or vanishing fullness; as a Cistern may be••l, and emptied again by cockes: but Habitationis, a permanent and inexhaustible fullness: it dwells in him. How then is he said to receive? Could there be addition, where is no defect? Can a thing be more than full? This receipt doth in nothing prejudice the immensenesse of the Deity: for Christ must be considered two ways, as he is God, and as he is man. He that mediates between both, must be both. He•• then the answer is easy; It is God that gives, and it is man that receives. The Father hath not more glory, omnipotent, or perfection, than the Son, as he is God; b•• as this Son of God is made the son of man, he receives grace and glory. God gives to man, and receives nothing of him: man receives of God, and gives nothing to him. Hear him speak as God; All thine are mine, John. 17.10. Hear him as man, Vers. 9. They whom thou hast given me, are thine. As man he receives of the Spirit, Luke 14.18. As God he communicates to the Spirit, John. 16.14. He shall receive of mine. The Son takes of the Father, and the Spirit takes of the Son, verse. 15. Yet so that what is of one Person, is of the whole Deity; excepting only those personal and individual proprieties; as the Father to be the Father, and to beget; the Son 〈◊〉 be the Son, and begotten, not to beget; the Spirit neither to beget, nor to be begotten, but to proceed. So the Son only to be man, not the Father nor the Spirit. As God he had no beginning, as man he received a beginning in time, Galath. 4.4. As man, he was made of his mother; as God, his mother was made by him: so he is both Mariae Factor, & Filius, the Father of Mary, and the Son of Mary. As God, he chargeth us to Continue in verbo suo, in his own Word, John. 8.31. and verse. 51. If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death. As man, he confesseth, John. 7.16. My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me. As he honors the Father, so he receives honor of the Father, John. 13.32. God doth glorify him, and is glorified in him. As God he says, I have of mine own: as man, All things are delivered unto me of the Father. As God, he doth what he will in heaven, and earth, and all places: as man; A power is given to me in heaven and in earth, Mat. 28.18. Thus is this doctrine clean; that CHRIST, who as GOD gives all things, as he is man receives something here, Honor and glory.

Now for whom doth Christ come to be a Receiver? For whose sake did eternity admit an estate to receive in time? Perfection it self to grow in stature? Wisdom it self to increase in knowledge? not for himself, but for us. Contentus •pere, ut posset tribuere; He would take of God, that we might take of him, Gen. 13.2. Abraham was wealthy, exceeding rich in cattle, silver, and gold: yet when he recovered the spoil of Sodom, and it was re-offered him by the King; he took somewhat: but how much? no more than he meant to give away, Gen. 14.23. I will ••• take away anything from thee for myself, lest thou shouldest say, I have made Abra••• rich: but I will accept a portion for the young men that went with me. Christ was so rich, that he need not receive honor and glory: yet was he content to receive it of his Father, that he might give it to us his children.

From God the Father.] This is the second Circumstance, of whom he received it. Here observe the manifest distinction of Persons in the Deity. The Father •ives honor, the Son receives it. The Father speaks from heaven, the Son •ears it. Personae non confundendae, sed suis proprietatibus discernendae, Aug. There must be no confusion of the Persons, but a distinction of their proprieties. We be•eeve, there is a Father, Eo quod habet filium, because he hath a Son: we be•eeve there is a Son, Eo quod habet Patrem, because he hath a Father. We believe here is an Holy Ghost, proceeding from the Father and the Son, coequal and •oevall with the Father and the Son. Because he is a Divine Person, and neither the Father nor the Son. Non confusa in una Persona Trinitas, against Sabellius: non digisa in natura Divinitas, against Arius. The father is not greater than the Son, nor •he Son than the Spirit: Eadem aequalitas, eadem aeternitas. But the father is said to •end the son, and the son to send the Spirit: this seems to imply some superio••tie of the sender to the person sent? The Father sends, and is not sent: the •onne sends, and is sent: the Holy Ghost is sent, and sendeth not: yet is •here no inequality. There are three ways of sending. 1. Per auctoritatem,•y authority, so a superior sends an inferior. 2. Per consilium, by advise •nd Council: so the less may send the greater. As the privy Council may •end the king to take the air, or to lead an army. So an equal may send his •quall; as Act. 15. the Elders sent Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem. 3. Per originem,•s the fountain naturally sends forth the spring. So the Father sends the Son, the Son sends the spirit. The father as the fountain begets, the Son is begotten, the Holy Ghost proceeds. CHRIST is said to be sent in respect of his acception of •nother nature. Gal. 4.4. When the fullness of time was come, God sent his Son made of woman. The man confesseth; My Father is greater than I: yet in regard of his Person, I and my Father are one, John. 10.30. And Saint John adds to them the Holy Ghost, and concludes; These three are one.

The word Trinity, say our Papicologists, is not found in the Scriptures: yet the substance of the word is apparent, Matth. 3. At the Baptism of CHRIST, there was a manifestation of the three Persons. Patris vox auditur, &c. the voice of the Father is heard, the Humanity of the Son is felt, the visible sign of the Holy Ghost is perceived. Who spake of his Son, but the Father, who was baptized and spoken to, but the Son? Neither of these appeared in the form of a Dove, but the Holy Ghost. A Trinity did begin both the world and the word, that is the Scripture. Gen. 1 Creavit Elohim coelum & terram. The verb is singular, Creavit; noting the most simple essence of God. The substantive plural, not El, but Elohim, to show the pluralitie of Persons. It is observed on, Deut. 6.4. Dominus noster Deus unus est Dominus. The Lord our God is one Lord. Why doth Moses thrice mention the name of God, but to show the distinction of three persons? Why doth he apply the word Vnus, One, to all of them, but to show the unity of essence? Why is Noster, Our, put in the second place; not in the first, nor in the last, but in the middle or second place; but to show that the second person should take our nature upon him? Aug. Esa. 6.3. Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts, the whole earth is full of his glory. Ter Sanctus, thrice is God called Holy, to note unto us the three persons. Dominus non domini, deus non dii; once Lord, once God: and the earth is full of His glory, not Their glory; here is the unity of the essence. Gen. 1.26. Let us make man in our Image, Faciamus, let Vs make; there is a Pluralitie of Person. Ad imaginem nostram, to our Image, not Images; there is the unity of the Essence. Matth. 28.19. Baptism in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. The Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; there are three distinct Persons: in Nomine, non in nominibus; in the Name, not names; there is one Essence. The Holy Ghost is called the finger of God, CHRIST the Hand of the Father: now as the finger is in the hand, and the hand in the body: so of one and the same most pure and simple essence is the Father, Son, and Spirit. But as it was reported of Alanus, when he promised his auditory to discourse the next Sunday, more clearly of the Trinity, and to make plain that mystery: while he was studying the point by the Sea-side, he spied a boy very busy with a little spoone, trudging often between the sea and a small hole he had digged in the ground. Alanus asked him, what he meant: the boy answers, I intend to bring all the Sea into this pit. Alanus replies, why doest thou attempt such impossibilities, and misspend thy time? The boy answers; So doest thou Alanus: I shall as soon bring all the sea into this hole, as thou bring all the knowledge of the Trinity into thy head: All is equally possible: we have began together, we shall finish together: saving of the two, my labor hath more hope and possibility of taking effect. I conclude with Bern. Scrutari temeritas, credere pietas, praedicare securitas, noscere aeterna faelicitas. It is rashness to search, godliness to believe, safeness to preach, and eternal blessedness to know the Trinity, yet let us know to praise the Trinity. In the words of our Church; Glory be to the Father, to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, And let all answer; As it was in the beginning, & now, and ever shall be world without end. Amen.

Honor and Glory.] This is the third circumstance, the matter what he received Observe we here three collections.

1 CHRIST would receive honor of his Father. The devil would have given him glory: Matth. 4.8. When upon a high mountain he shown him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them: All these will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me. Where was Promissum and Pactum: his promise, all these will I give thee: his Covenant, bargain, or condition, Si cadens adoraveris •t. If falling down thou wilt worship me. This seems to be a fair match; for one crouch of his knee, to have so many Crowns for his head: for a little prostration, so great promotion. If the devil had proffered this to Alexander, or to Caesar; it had been a bargain. When he made this offer to the Hierarchy of Rome, they presently took him at his word. But our Savior would none of it: he knew that Satan could give no honor to another, that had none himself: that this glory would dishonor him, and his Father also. Therefore he requited him with, Get thee hence Satan. Men would have given him honor: they purposed to have Crowned him King. John. 6.15. but he refused it. I receive not honor from men, John. 5.41. Divine and religious honor he refused not: they worshipped him, this he suffered. He that honors me, honors my Father; this he preached. But human and temporary honor he rejected; and would none of their hasty coronation with carnal hands. John. 18.36. My kingdom is not of this world. Yea more, he sought not to honor himself. John. 8.50. I seek not mine own glory. Verse 54. If I honor myself, my honor is nothing. Teaching us to accept praises from others lips, not to be our own trumpets. But when the Father gives him Honor, this he receives, this is only worth acceptance. 2 Cor. 10.18. For not he that commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth. For this he prays. John. 12.28. Father, glorify thy Name. The Father in honoring the Son, honored himself. As CHRIST said; He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father: He that believes in me, believes in my Father: He that receives me, receives my Father: so he that honoreth me, honoreth my Father. But Honor in conference, non in accipiente; honor is in the Person giving it, not in him that receives it: but Christ that received it, was also God the giver of it. It is he that gives honor and glory, and it is he that takes honor and glory, and to him he honor and glory forever.

2 All honor and glory is CHRIST'S; as being delivered to him by the Father, Luk. 10.22. He is Primogenitus, the first begotten, the only begotten of God; only worthy of the kingdom. Rev. 5.12. Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive power, and honor, and glory. Worthy; when he takes it, he doth not I••dere alienum, or arripere indebitum; arrogate that to himself which is not his own right: but Dignus est, he is Worthy. It is his own propriety; yet he is content to communicate and impart it. The glory which thou gavest me, I have given them, John. 17.22. The same glory Qualiter non Aequaliter: the same glory, not the same degree of glory. Eandem in natura, non in mensura: the same in nature, not so much in measure. Let the privilege of Primogeniture be reserved to himself. 1 Cor. 15.1. There is one glory of the Sun, another glory of the Moon, and another glory of the ••rres. Christ is that Sun which gives glory to us the stars. Of his fullness we have received grace for grace here, glory for glory hereafter. On earth the glory that divided, seems to be diminished: and one think that, so much honor is taken ••m himself, as is added to another. But in heaven the glory of Christ shall not abated to himself, though it be communicated to millions. Nor shall ones glo••• eclipse another's: Tanta singulis, quanta omnibus: such shall be to everyone, as is any one. We see to whom we are behold• for our honor. 2 Sam. 9.7. David••aced Mephibosheth, set him at his own table, teste••ed him all the land of his grand••there Saul; and all for the love that he bare to his father Jonathan. So God honou••h us, sets us at his own table, yea with his Son in his Throne; restoreth to us all the ••heritance which our Grandfather Adam lost, yea more than ever •e possessed; and ⟨◇⟩ this for his Son, and our Father, JESUS CHRIST his sake. King Pha••h, honored the Eleven Patriarchs for Joseph's sake, gave them the fat of the •nd of Egypt, and highly enriched them. So GOD honoreth us with his his grace this life, and with his glory in the life to come, and all for Jesus his sake.

3 All true and blessed honor comes from God, and is to be sought there. Job••es, it is He that girds on the kings girdle. Promotion cometh neither from the East, ••r from the West; from North nor South, but only from the Lord; saith the Psalmist. It is true that worldly honor is often arrogated: and Datur indigno dignitas. •ignitas a do, non Indignus: the honor is of God, not the us worthy person that ••th it. He always gives Principatum, the dominion: not always Principem, the •overnour: for he may come to it by Intrusion, and hold it by usurpation.

The honor of this world is merely titular. Either infeoffed to the blood: ••d what glory is it to the degenerate son, that such a noble Father begot him? •ll greatness had a beginning, and the beginning of that greatness was Desert. Am noble? let me know, this Noblesse is the lest part of mine: my fathers won it •y their virtue: they had the glory, I enjoy but the Titles. This privilege of blood, •ithout respondent virtues, is but an empty conduit pipe: it is a pipe still, but it hath •o water in it. Another by his just merit hath gotten honor: it is derided, because is not derived: yet is that man more truly honorable. For the other wears •ut the shadow of his Predecessors triumphs: this man wears the substance of his •wne. Et que non fecimus ipsi, vix ea nostra voco. It was a witty answer, that a young •entleman gave to Arn•bius, one who disgraced his honor because it was of •he first head: my Genealogy. is a shame to me, but thou art a shame to •y Genealogy. Or, as a Prelates son said to a noble heir, who twitted •s upstart Gentry: Ego sum ortus domus meae, tuos casus tua: I am the East or ri•ng of my house, thou art the West, and falling of thine. It is a shame for a man •o think, that the book of his Pedigree, and his Fathers Seal-ring, are sufficient •mblemes of honor: that he is glorious enough, because he is •attered. Or, it may •ee, there is an honor entailed to riches as in the City, credit grows just as fast as money: and in the country, reputation is measured by the acre. Then honor must •e overtaken, when it cannot be met. And now some honorable progenitor must •e found out, that either was dead many hundred years since, or never was noble ⟨◇⟩ perhaps never was at all. Moses condemned it for a heinous sin to steal children: •ut we have those that think it no sin to steal parents. This is a popular, ticular, ridi•ulous honor. If thou wouldest know such a one, Nudum inspice, loo•e upon him ••ked, saith Seneca. Depona patrim•nd, let him put off his patri•io•ie, let him ⟨◇⟩ •ff the vain acclamations of the multitude, let him put off his popularity, let him ⟨◇⟩ of his opulencie; & all•• fortui••dudaci, and all the other const••ties of ⟨◇⟩ ••une: corpus ipsum exuat, animum intuere: let him put off his very body, look ⟨◇⟩ ••o his soul. Then thou must see, Quia••i•l quat n•f•, ••no ⟨◇⟩ ••gnuo; how noble he is, by observing how good he is w•ither he •well with ••there man's substance, or stand upon his own worth. A good man will not follow honor, but is all if he let it overtake him. Honorem Cato non debuit petere, sed civitas ob virtutem non petenti reddere, Aug. It was not for Cato to beg honor of the City, but the City to give him honor for his virtue.

Quintus Curtius writes of a Gardener, a very poor man rich in all plenty, except plenty of riches. Alexander of Macedon proffered him the kingdom of Syria but he refused it with this answer. Nunquam erit mihi curiae perdere, quod erat mihi curae potere. That shall never trouble me with care to lose, which did never trouble me with care to get. Memorable and worthy, and such a proceeding may cast a blush on the cheeks of Christians: for we are all too greedy for honor.

Well if we would be honored, let us honor CHRIST: for in him, and in him comes, all Honor. The most noble deriving of ourselves, is from Christ: the Nobility is the nobility of Faith, and the best Genealogy the genealogy of good works. Men's earthly glories are like their shadows in the Sun: the shadow is at morning before us, at noon beside us, at night behind us. So their honor is at morning before them, in a goodly luster: at noon in the full beside them, with a violent heat: at evening in the wane behind them, with a neglected pity. Only some differ in their noon or meridian of greatness: for instead of having their honor besides them, they are besides their honor. 1 Sam. 2.30. Them that honor me, I will honor: and they that despise me, shall be lightly esteemed; saith the Lord. He that shall seek the Lord's honor, and neglect his own: shall find his own honor in the Lord's. A man while he hunts after his own shadow, flies from the same and his shadow is still unovertaken before him: but when he turns his face to the sun, and follows that, his shadow will follow him. He that seeks honor, and turns his back upon CHRIST, cannot reach it; it is too swift of foot for him let him turn his face to CHRIST, and follow him; behold, honor ways after his back, and will never fail to attend him. Now seeing we look for all honor and glory from CHRIST, let us ascribe all honor and glory to CHRIST, singing that heavenly Hymn, Revel. 7.12. Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honor, and power, and might be unto our God forever and ever. Amen.

When there came such a voice to him from this excellent glory.] This is the fourth circumstance, the time when; the Apostle beheld, and their Master record, this glory and Majesty. For to this we must restore the last clause of the former verse: They were eye-witnesses of his Majesty: when? at this time, when there come such a voice from the excellent glory. Considering therefore together, their Testimony, with his audible assurance from the supreme glory; we may justly conceive here three things:

- Spectacle, with the time of it; When they saw it.
- Oracle; Such a voice from heaven.
- Miracle; that a voice should be heard on earth, which doth come from excellent glory.

So there is in the words, Quando, Quando, inde When it was; at the $\langle \diamond \rangle$ of his glorious testification. How, by a voice, such a voice. From whence, s $\langle \diamond \rangle$ excellent glory.

When •b•ir come.] The precise denomination of the time and place of $\langle \diamond \rangle$ glorious revelation, but all•e questionable, but without all doubt it we $\langle \dots \rangle$ figuration no the •o•t i• for so the Apostle declares himself in the next verse. $\langle \diamond \rangle$ but his Majesty might appear also at other times, and in other matters, yet $\langle \diamond \rangle$ most conspicuously.

For they speak not •er• of Christ's •ding in triumph to Jerusalem, $\langle \dots \rangle$ $\langle \diamond \rangle$. When the people gave the acclamation of Hosanna, and Blessed is he that $\langle \diamond \rangle$ •th in the Name of the Lord; they then saw his Majesty. Ver. 5. Tell ye the daugh•• of Zion, Behold, thy king cometh. Though meekly, sitting upon an Ass; yet thy •ng. The veil of his humility was so far lifted up, that they might see his Ma••stie. But the Apostle speaks of a sight, not common to the people, but peculiar to •emselves.

They speak not here of his miracles, wherein also appeared his Majesty. When •e quieted the winds and seas, walked on the waters, raised the dead, cast out divelsl •re was Majesty. When, Matth. 21.12. he went into the Temple, cast out all them •at bought and sold in it, and overthrew the tables of the money changers. Jerome•nceives this to be the greatest of all his miracles. His wonders did evidently prove •s majesty. Now these were of two sorts; such as he wrought upon the bodies of •en, which we most admire because they are most visible, and subject to sense. And •her, that he wrought upon the minds of men; Quantum ad immutandas interiores •res, as the School speaks; to the change of the inward power: and these were •e greater miracles; but because they were not so visible, therefore not so remar•ble. Act 4.13. The Jews hearing the words, and seeing the wonders, wrought $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Peter and John and perceiving that they were unlearned men; Admirabantur, they •ought it a miracle: and conclude, that they had been with JESUS. If this mira•e be wrought upon a man, that his conscience be sanctified, sure he hath been with •sus, or Jesus hath been with him. Matth. 9.9. CHRIST finds Matthew at the •ceite of custom; and says but, Follow me, and he arose and followed him. Though •e sate at the custom house, like an Usurer in his broking house, yet upon his call he •llowed him. Fulgur divinae majestatis videntem ad se traxit. Some strange light•ng of Majesty appeared in his looks, and miraculously drew a worldling unto •m, Luk. 4.29. They brought him to the brow of a steep hill, purposing to cast, •m down headlong; But he passing through the mids of them, went his way. Stare in •edio insidiantum, & non apprehendi; to stand in the midst of his enemies, and no •an able to lay hands upon him; here was a great majesty, Chrys. John. 18.6. The •ind rabble came with torches, the cowards with swords, a traitor with a band of men;•d as if multitudes were not sufficient, there must be Officers among them: but •hat was the issue? As soon as he said unto them, I am he, they went backward, and fell to •e ground. With the breath of two short words, sweetly and kindly spoken, Ego •m, I am he; they were repelled. Quid faciet judicaturus, qui hoc fecit judicandus? Quid regnaturus poterit, qui hoc moriturus potuit? Aug. What can he do when he shall •dge, that did thus when he was to be judged? What shall be his power reigning, •hen such was his power even dying? Here was Majesty. But of all, that Matth.•1.12. did far transcend in expressing his Majesty. That one man unarmed, without guard of soldiers, without a Commission from Herod or Caesar: in despite of the Scribes that hated him: of the people that contemned him: should cast forth men, tradesmen, covetous tradesmen! How Demetrius would have stormed to see his occupation of silver shrines endangered, endamaged; and cried out two hours together; Great is Diana of the Ephesians! Yea, that he should cast forth abundance of them; such a multitude of men and cattle, that a pretty army could hardly have performed it. And that with a little Whip, without noise, contradiction, or tumult! Oh here was Majesty. Ignem quiddam & Sydereum radiabat in oculis ejus. ieron. Something more bright than the fire or stars did certainly shine in his eyes. Such a Majesty of Divinity appeared in his looks, that none durst resist him. origen. This was a greater miracle, than turning water into wine: there Inanimata materia, a matter without life doth yield unto him: but in this, Tot milium hominum comantur ingenia; the refractory and perverse hearts of many thousands of obstinate men are convinced. Here they might manifestly see his Majesty: but of this our Apostle discourseth not.

Nor yet of that visible scissure of heaven, Matth. 3. Where was manifest the heavens apertion, the Spirits descension, the Fathers testification; This is my beloved Son. There was a voice, and a voice from heaven, and witnessing the same thing thence: here: even there they were eye-witnesses of his majesty: but neither is that place meant here.

Now is it understood of that testimony, John. 12.28. There was also a voice, and a voice from heaven and from the Father in heaven; and a voice that hence CHRIST, I have both glorified it, and I will glorify it again. The people said, it thundred, others that an Angel spake; CHRIST, says plainly, that the voice came for their sakes. Ver. 30. Here also were they witnesses of his Majesty: but either to that testimony hath our Apostle here a reference.

Nor is it meant of his Resurrection from death, worthy of all admiration. When out of a Sepulcher, a sepulcher not of earth, but of Stone, one entire stone without any seam or fissure in it: another stone rolled to it, that stone sealed thence seal guarded: the Lord arose, bursting the bands of death, and triumphing over the grave: manifesting himself to one, to two, to ten, to more than five hundred brethren at once, and thus dwelling on the earth forty days! Here was a clear demonstration of his powerful majesty.

Lastly, it is not referred to his triumphant Ascension; when he led captivity captive, and went up gloriously to the place whence he came. At this the Apostles were present, beholding while he was taken up, Act. 1.9. He was received out of their sight, therefore till that moment they had the sight of him. They saw the Angels the testified it; Why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus shall come from heaven, in the like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven. They saw him, and they worshipped him, Luk. 24.52. Here was also an apparent manifestation of his majesty. Act. 1.8. Ye shall be witnesses unto me. Himself told them immediately before, that they should be witnesses of this: and here was a sufficient Majesty for their testimony, and they gave a sufficient testimony of that Majesty.

But yet Saint Peter intends another, and that a more especially instance: seen to the people, as were some of the former glories: nor to all the Apostles, as were the rest. But particularly to three, whom the LORD JESUS chose one. Matth. 17.1. Jesus taketh Peter, and

James, and John, and bringeth them up into a high mountain apart: And was transfigured before them. Why this revelation was given to them three only; Non qui legit, sed qui elegit, novit: not he that reads it, but he that chose them knows. So far as we may soberly, and with due reverence search the next verse will fitly call on us to consider.

But why did the Apostle single out that Time and Place, more than any other, to exemplify CHRIST'S Majesty, and the honor conferred on him by the Father. 2. Because Moses and Elias appeared to him there: in all the rest of his miracles he had no company but men on earth, now he had a testimony from two glorious Saints in heaven. His command was known to be great over the creatures below, this was every day conspicuous: but that now it should extend to heaven, but was an ample show of Majesty. 2. But especially because he was caelesti gloria •tus; his face shining as the Sun, and his raiment white as the light. Nil terrenum •spiciebatur, sed caelestis undique refulgebat Majestas. Nothing of earth was seen, but a divine and heavenly Majesty appeared. For this was a little map of heaven, a glimpse or abridgement of that infinite glory. Before his power might appear, 〈◇〉 under the veil of his mortal flesh: now the manhood is become glorious. As the fire makes everything that is cast into it, like it self: so the glory circling him, and inherent upon his body, similem sibi reddidit humanitatem, made his humanity gloririous like it self.

This was then the most magnificent demonstration of his Majesty; where heaven was brought down to earth to illustrate it. He rose from the grave to the earth of the living, there was Majesty, Rom. 1.4. For in this he declared himself to be the Son of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead. He ascended from the earth to heaven, there was Majesty. But here he commanded heaven to come down 〈◇〉 him, this was the greatest declaration of his Majesty. Now he sits in heaven with Majesty, Hebr 8.1. On the right hand of the Throne of the Majesty in the heavens. He •all one day come to judge the world with Majesty. The Lord hath given him this •onour and Majesty; A Name which is above every name. Let us ascribe glory to that Majesty, and blessed be his Majesty forever! Here now it is plain, what the Apo•es saw: the world was eye-witness of his misery, they, of his Majesty. The •orld beheld him in the form of a Servant, they as their Master and Maker. The •orld, as a worm, not a man: they, as the King of glory. The world, as a thing •ot desireable: they, as Fairer than all the children of men, Psal. 45.2. Blessed eyes ad•tted to this vision! It was Saint Augustine's wish to have seen three things: Rome •her glory, Paul in the Pulpit, CHRIST in the flesh. That is now past hope •re on earth, our labor must be to see him hereafter in Heaven. Isaiah 33.17. Thine •es shall see the King in his beauty. LORD give us this vision, this fruition, and we •e then blessed forever.

Such a voice.] This is the second point, the manner how God testified, con•rning the honor of his Son: by a voice, his own voice. The Logicians di•inguish between Sonus, Vox, and Verbum; a Sound, a Voice, and a Word. Sound of insensible things, as Lute, Organ, &c. Voice, of sensible, but irrational, as •easts: a Word, of that which hath both sense and reason, man. Here is a Voice, at a Word with it. A word is first conceived in the heart, and then uttered by the •oice: yet we hear the voice before we know the word. John calls himself, The •ice of a Crier: CHRIST the eternal Word, was before John, and all other voi•s. For, John. 1.1. In the beginning was the Word: and that beginning was before 〈◇〉 beginnings, without beginning; Principium sine principio: yet the world knew not the Word, till it was preached by the voice of men and Angels. The word in it came before the voice, yet to us the voice goes before the word, John 1.15. He that cometh after me, was before me. Tully commends voices, Socrates for sweetness, Cicero for subtlety, Hyperides for sharpness, Aeschines for shrillness, Demosthenes for powerfulness. Gravity in African, smoothness in Laelius; rare voices! In how many we admire a sanctified boldness in Peter, profoundness in Paul, loftiness in Moses, vehemency in him and his brother James, those two sons of Thunder; fervency in Simon the zealous. Among Ecclesiastical Writers, we admire weight in Cicero, a gracious composure of well mattered words in Lactantius, a flowing speech in Cyprian, a familiar stateliness in Chrysostom, a conscionable delight in Bernard, and all these graces in good Saint Augustine. Some construed the Scriptures allegorically, as Origen: some literally, as Jerome: some morally, as Gregory: others pathetically, as Chrysostom: others dogmatically, as Augustine. The new Writers have their several voices: Peter Martyr copiously judicial: Zanchius judiciously copious. Luther wrote with a coal on the walls of his chamber: Res & Verba Philippus, res sine verbis Lutherus, verba sine re Erasmus, Nec res nec verba Callostadius. Calvin was behind none, not the best of them, for a sweet dilucidation of the Scriptures, and urging of solid arguments against the Antichristians. One is happy in expounding the words, another in delivering the matter, a third for cases of conscience, a fourth to determine the School-doubts. But now put all these together: an hundred Peters and Paul's, a thousand Bernard's and Austines, a million of Calvin's and Melancthon's: let not their voices be once named with this voice. They all spake as children, this is the voice of the Ancient of days, John. 7.46. Never spake man, as GOD himself speaketh. Herod, it seemed, had a pleasing voice, when he drew to himself such an acclamation, Act. 22. It is the voice of a god, and not of a man. But the Angel proved to Herod's confusion, that acclamation to be the voices of men, not of God. But this voice that came from heaven concerning this God and man, was the voice of God, not of man. The Angel that talked with Zacharias, spake Debarim tohim, debarim nehumim, Mach. 1.13. Good words, and comfortable words. But this voice is the voice of Power, the voice of comfort, the voice of love, the voice of life. Man hath virtutem in his power to speak: but God reserves to himself vocem virtutis, to speak in power, Psal. 67.33. Lo, he doth send out his voice, and that a mighty voice. Saint Paul had a powerful voice, when he said to the Creeple with a loud voice, stand upright on thy feet: And he leaped and walked, Act. 14.10. In so much that when the people saw it, they cried; The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men. Saint Peter had a power full voice, when he persuaded three thousand souls at one Sermon. But this voice of power gave power to all their voices. Herodotus tells us of an Egyptian, that had in shrill a voice, that from the Promontory of Hister he was heard by Histaeus, Admiral of Darius, being then at Miletum. But this is the voice, that shall one day be heard from one end of the world to the other. Christ here heard the voice of his Father, we shall all hear the voice of Christ, John. 5.28. The hour cometh, in the which they that are in the graves shall hear his voice. This shall be a wonderful voice, terrible to the wicked. When Joseph revealed himself to his brethren; I am Joseph, Gen. 45.3. they could not answer him, for they were terrified at his presence. But when he added, ver. 4. Frater vester, I am Joseph, Your brother, they were then comforted. When Christ shall say to the reprobates, I am Jesus; Jesus whom ye contemned, scorned, persecuted, sacrilegiously robbed; whose servants ye have hated; they shall be comforted. But when he adds to the faithful, Frater vester, I am Jesus, Your Brother; they shall be with heavenly peace rejoiced. Will you consider the power of the Lord's voice? Look Psal. 29. The voice of the Lord divideth the flames of fire. The Nightingale hath a sweet voice, but a lean carcass: vox & praeterea nihil; a voice, and nothing else but a voice: and so have all hypocrites. But the Lord's voice will be against them with a Woe, Heb. 3.15. To day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts. Let us now hear his voice with obedience, lest we one day hear it with a vengeance. Non 〈◇〉 hominem sonat, O Deus certe. It is not an ordinary voice, but Vox hujusmodi, Such a voice. Saul said to his subject, 1 Sam. 24.16. Is this thy voice, my son David? Well may we say; Is this thy voice, O Lord our King? We will then obey it, Psal. 85. I will hear what the Lord will speak, for he will speak peace to his people. The Lord, apply this voice to our hearts, and our hearts to this voice.

From the excellent glory.] This is the last circumstance, the place whence it came. There is a great distance between Mount Tabor and heaven: yet was a voice heard in the hill, which came De magnifica illa gloria, From that excellent glory. There be glories in the world, but they are not Excellent. Israel ascribes glory to Reuben, but he adds an instability to it, Gen. 49.4. Reuben, the excellency of dignity, and the excellency of power; but unstable as waters, thou shalt not excel. Unstable as waters, that is, a fluid glory: Thou shalt not excel, there is a bar in the Arms. Such a the condition of all worldly glory; but the glory that shall be revealed in us, is an exceeding and eternal weight, 2 Cor. 4.17. This Glory is admirable in four excellencies: for the Dignity, for the Clarity, for the verity, and for the Eternity of it.

1 For Dignity, it is a glory: and this hath been the scope of most men's endeavors and reaches. There is not the silliest Artisan, Manuary, or Mechanic, but would be glorious for something. Mutius Scevola burnt his own hand for striking amiss. Curtius in glittering armor, mounted on his horse, cast himself headlong into a gulf, to deliver his country from the plague: Vicit amor patria, •dúmque immensa cupido. If they did thus for a puff, what should we do for this excellent glory! Esa. 23.8. The Citizens of Tyre are said to have been compa••• unto Princes: but in this glory, every Citizen is a crowned King: none but King 〈◇〉 free men of that Incorporation. Where a man shall videre ad voluntatem, habet 〈◇〉 voluptatem, frui ad securitatem; see what he liketh, have what he delighteth, and enjoy it without envy, without end. Non est timor in finibus tuis, quia Dominus posuit fines tuos pacem; There is no fear in the borders of it, for the Lord hath compa••• it with peace forever.

2 For Clarity, it is not a hidden, but as Saint Paul saith, a Revealed glory. ki••now indeed hidden; but when Christ our life shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory, Col. 3.4. Clear, both for Condition, it shall be excellent: for cognition and apprehension, it shall be seen in the full excellency of it. It is Perenne solstitium: nec •ongitudo terminum, nec claritas occasum, nec satietas fastidium habebit, Bern. It is an everlasting Solstice; the length is interminable, the brightness unchangeable, the fullness unweariable. Our very bodies shall be made glorious; The righteous shall shine as the Sun. Qualis erit splendor animarum, quando solis splendorem habebit lux cor•orum? Bern. What shall be the glory of our souls, when the Sun it self shall not equal the glory of our bodies? If the glory of the body be but the body of glory: then the soul of glory is the glory of the soul. Yea, then the Sun shall septuple his own glory, and we shall centuple the glory of the Sun. It is a glory to the Firmament, that it is stuck full of such shining lamps; a thousand times excelling the luster of precious stones. O then think what it will be, to walk in the Courts of heaven, and to behold so many millions of Stars; spiritual and intellectual Stars: a sight able to ravish us! If they that dwell in the Courts of Kings, make such a glorious show with their garments, borrowed from worms, or from the earths excrementall bowels: what a delightful a sight will it be to behold the splendor of God's own •mmortall Courtiers!

3 For verity, it shall be indeed, not in show only, but upon us. The worldling is all glorious without, but the Kings daughter is all glorious within, Psal. 45.14. That is a shadow, this a substance. Civil honor, says the Philosopher, is not in the person honored, but honoring: the worldlings glory depends on the possession of vain matters, and the breath of vain men; therefore hath no true being. But this is a true and substantial glory, because affixed to him whose glory is immutable, 2. Cor. 4.17. Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us an exceeding and eternal weight of glory. The cross is light, the crown weighty. The cross but for a moment, the crown forever. The pleasures of sin are but for a season; therefore nothing, being compared with that infinite weight of eternal wrath. But as the seven years of famine in Egypt, did quite eat up the seven years of plenty: so the reprobates endless pains shall eat up their short pleasures. On the contrary, there is a •ime to weep, and a time to laugh: the good man shall not much remember the days of his sorrow, because God answereth him in the joy of his heart, Eccles. 5.20. not much remember it, not all. Therefore Non quaeras in via, quod tibi servatur in patria, Aug. Let us not seek for that in our journey, which is only to be found in our country. Let the world take these shadows; it is a portion my soul desireth not, only may •he be sped of this substantial glory through Jesus Christ.

4 For the Eternity; if it had an end, it were not excellent. We see commonly, that high glories here waste themselves, and go out in stench; like great candles in windy houses: that can be no excellent glory. If we love this life, which we feel to be miserable, and and know will end: how should we love that life, where is no fear, either to die, or to live in trouble. Nothing but happy eternity, and eternal felici•ie, John. 14.2. In my Fathers house are many mansions: here we have no abiding city, but dwell in Tabernacles, set up today, and pulled down tomorrow. Our best houses on earth, let them be never so glorious: if it were possible; let their walls be of gold, and their windows of Sapphire: yet they are no better than Inns for strangers. But our mansions in heaven abide forever. I go to prepare a place for you, saith Christ: but •t is said, Matth. 25.34. Inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. These were prepared before; now then did Christ go to prepare them? Saint Augustine answers; They were prepared from everlasting, but the men that should •nhabite them were unprepared. Parat quodammodo mansiones, mansionibus parando mansores; He went first to take possession of this Kingdom, and there sets open the •oores of those prepared mansions for us.

Here is then the figure of heaven: it is glory, therefore excellent: yea, substantial glory, more excellent: yea, a Crown of glory, most excellent. It is a Kingdom, and Immobile regnum, a kingdom that cannot be moved. It is an Inheritance, and ann immortal inheritance; all excellent. It is excellent, and a Glory; yea, The excellent glory. What wouldst thou have? Is anything better than life? Is any life better than a life of glory? Is any glory better than a kingdom of glory? Is any kindom surer than the Kingdom of Heaven? Yet this Kingdom, this Life, this Glory, this excellent Glory, is prepared for us. The Lord hath prepared this excellent glory for us; the Lord prepare us for this excellent glory!

This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.] This is the last general Circumstance of the Verse; the matter and substance of the Testimony from the Father. This; the word shows him to be that Messias, long before prophesied, presently after the fall promised, ere the world was purposed, and now manifested. This, singularly; not another, but this is He. My Son, consubstantially, because begotten of mine own substance. Originally mine, by union of nature: though in him other be made mine also, by adoption of grace. Beloved, Eternaliter; not in time accepted, b•• before all beginning begotten. In whom I am well pleased, and never was offended: all other men were the children of wrath, I could not be pleased with them: but in thi•Son I rest. He pleaseth the Father by himself, all other only by him. Here is Proprietas Personae, unitas naturae, Dignitas gratiae, Foelicitas meriti; This is, there is the Propriety of Person: My Son, there is the unity of nature: Beloved son, there is the Dignity of grace: In whom I am well pleased, there is the Felicity of merit. In him well pleased; in all with him, in none without him: in Himself without all, before all, above all. Here is the Testimony; This is my beloved Son, &c. For methods salt we observe in this heavenly voice three notes:

- Distinctionem Personae. This is my Son.
- Dilectionem Distincti. My Beloved Son.
- Sufficientiam Dilecti. In whom I am well pleased.

This is my Son.] Son, this distinguisheth his Person: Father and Son are relatives, one depending necessarily on the other, Luke 1.32. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest. With this Christ opposed the Jews, that questioned him concerning the Son of David. If David called him Lord, he must needs be the Son of God. Now he is the Son of God two ways: First, by Nature, of the Eternal substance of his Father: not after a carnal manner, for he departed with no substance, nor suffered any change, loss, or diminution. Secondly, as he was the Son of Mary: and this other Sonship in regard of God, was not by nature, not by adoption; for then there had been a time when he was not the Son of God: but by Personal union. The man Christ never was a Person of it self, but was at the first Personally united to the Son of God. The Son of Mary was ever the Son of God, but the Son of God was not ever or always the Son of Mary. This was necessary, saith Augustine, that the Mediator between God and man, should be of the Natures, both of God and man. Ne in utro{que} homini similis, longe esset à Deo: vel in utro{que} Deo similis, longe esset ab homine; Lest being in every respect God, he had been too great to suffer for man: or being in every respect man, he had been too weak to satisfy God. Non •ter à Patre, alter à virgins: sed aliter à Patre, aliter à virgins, Eus. Emiss. God of God, God the Son of God the Father. Fulgent. Alter in Persona, non alius in natura; If •e were the same Person, how is he here called Filius, a Son? If he were not the same Nature, how is he called Meus, My Son? Son, thou art therefore another Person. My Son, thou art therefore the same God.

This filiality doth not challenge him of inferiority to God. But Phil. 2.6. he is said to be In the form of God: yet it is added, He thought it no robbery to be equal with God. So it is said, Vers. 7. that he took upon him the Form of a Servant. Si forma ser^u est natura humana, forma Dei est natura divina; If the form of a servant be the nature of man, then the form of God is the very nature of God. This the Jews could easily interpret; He said that God was his Father, making himself equal with God. When he called God his Father, they could presently infer, Illum se fecisse parem Deo; That he made himself equal with God: and that is no other thing, than to be true God in nature and subsistence. Semper apud Patrem, semper cum Patre, semper de Patre, semper in Patre. Filius ex ipso, cum ipso, hoc quod ipse, Lomb. Always with the Father, always of the Father, always in the Father, always the same God that the Father. So also very man of man's flesh, according to man's nature, for man's sake, above man's condition. Psal. 2.7. The Lord hath said unto me, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. This might be said by God to David in type, but only agrees Christ in truth. David indeed was God's son, as he was a man, as he was a King, as he was a Saint. 1. As man; so are all men, Act. 17.28. We also are his offspring. He made us, and not we ourselves, therefore we are his sons, Deu. 32.6. Is not he thy Father that made thee? 2. As King, for all Princes are the Children of the most High, Psal. 82.3. Lastly, as a sanctified man; for he that is new-borne is the son of God, 1 John. 3.9. He cannot sin because he is borne of God. But this title most properly belongs to Christ, and that in respect of his generation temporal and eternal. Some construe it of his temporary birth, because Hodie in the Scripture signifies this present life, Heb. 3.13. While it is called To day. Thou art my Son today have I begotten thee: that is, To day I have brought my begotten Son into the world. So Hebr. 1.6. When he bringeth in the first begotten into the world. Begotten before all beginning, but made flesh in time; proposed to the world in human flesh, at the decreed fullness of time. Others understand it of Christ's eternal generation: My Son; others are my sons improperly, but thou art properly my Son; my natural, singular, substantial Son. A Son, not by creation, as the whole world is: not through adoption, as the whole Church is: but by nature and incommunicable generation, as himself only is. Primogenitus, Vnigenitus, the express character of his Person, and brightness of his glory. But there is then exception against the Word Hodie: why To day my Son, when as forever his Son? Aug. Apud Deum nunquam crastinus, nunquam hesternus dies est, sed semper Hodie; With God it never is Yesterday, nor To morrow, but always To day: all times are present with him. Vbi dies nec hesterni fine inchoatur, nec initio crastini terminatur, semper hodiernus est; Where never was, nor can be night, must needs be eternal day.

My Son.] This Flesh that stands before you, is the natural Son of God: which gives us to understand, the infinite honor that belongs to Jesus Christ. Though our nature was once poor and wretched through our degeneration, yet now it is made noble and blessed through this Personal union. And the Lord Jesus did habitually honor it, even above the nature of Angels, Hebr. 2.16. For Christ in his very birth, was the most excellent and noble man that ever was: and that both by Fathers side and Mothers side. By Father, being the Son of Almighty God: by Mother, descending of the Patriarchs and renowned Kings of Judah. A truly great Prince! wherein consists a kingdom? In authority? Psal. 135.6. He doth whatsoever he will, in heaven, in earth, in the sea, and all deep places. In Power, Mat. 8. The winds and the seas obey him. In multitude of subjects? Angels, Saints, and all Kings are his Subjects; either voluntary, or against their wills, Psal. 82.1. He standeth in the congregation of the mighty, and judgeth among the gods. In abundance? Psal. 16.11. In his presence is the fullness of joy. In continuance? He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his Kingdom there shall be no end. In amplitude and largeness? The heaven is his, and the earth is his, and the fullness of them both. In subduing enemies? Bring those mine enemies, that would not have me reign over them, and slay them before me.

The faithful do not hold Christ in small account, because of his poor estate in this world; but prefer him to Nobles and Kings. They had no such Herald, to blazon their Arms as he: even John the Baptist, not a greater borne of women. Yea here, even God himself with a voice from heaven proclaims it. They have no such memorial of their antiquity, as he, whom S. Luke lines from Adam, S. Matthew derives from David and Abraham. It is impossible for them: for there is no such Instructor of antiquity, or Recorder of Genealogy, as the Holy Ghost. Great Monarchs have long and tedious titles: Christ is short in sound, but Eternal in sense; This is my beloved Son.

This gives comfort to us: for CHRIST being so royal, and taking our flesh, conveys part of his nobleness to us. Men stand much on their blood, and the pedigree of their Ancestors: as if nobleness consisted in that which descends from, man to man. All true and weighty honor is fetched from CHRIST: Not my Birth, but my Christianity, makes me noble; said that noble Martyr, Romanus. To so many as received Christ, he gave power to be the sons of God, John. 1.12. This engrafting to Jesus, is the dignity, true blood Royal of God Himself. Not Generation, but Regeneration is truly noble. Sanctification is the best ornament of blood, the worthiest part of the Honorable Scutchion, the fairest flower in the Goodmans Garland. It is no discredit to men's honors, to honor Him. We love to peruse the Genealogy of Princes, and succession of States: but what are these to us? we are not heirs to those honors. But if CHRIST'S Title be good, our is good in him. Thus we are enriched with the whole world. Cor. 3.22. Whether the world, things present, yea or things to come; All are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's. But because the wicked have this world, that have no right unto it therefore Fear not little flock, it is your fathers will to give you the kingdom, Luke 12.32. Bee we never so poor, even the contempt of this world; rich men scorn our acquaintance; yet he that is the only Son of God, is not ashamed to call us brethren, Heb. 2.11. An earthly Prince may honor much; by enrobing a subject with Princely apparel, investing his head with the Crown Royal, and mounting his person in the Kings own Chariot, Esa. 6.8. But Christ doth honor infinitely more; by adorning us with white garments, Palms in our hands, and Crowns on our heads, and that before the Angels in heaven. Psalms. 149.8. Such honor ha•• all his Saints.

This is my Son;] This is he, which the Prophet, presignified, the types prefigured, the Lord himself promised, the Gospel presented, and is now universally preached; This is he. Elias was a great Prophet, but not He: John the Baptist was more than a Prophet, but not He. John. 1.8. He was not that light, but a witness of it. This is He. He that fulfilled all the prophecies, performed all the promises, ended all the Ceremonies; This is He. Hager and Ishmael were kept in Abraham's house, til Isaac was borne and weaned: so were ceremonies reserved in the Church, till Christ was dead and risen. They were like a mould, whereinto we cast a bell: when the metal is run, and the bell made, we throw away the mould. He that was crucified himself, crucified all these. The Philistines ask for Sampson; who is he that hath given us so many overthrows, triumphed in our ruins? This is he. So, who is that strong God, that could say to the gates of death and hell, Eph, be ye opened? This is he. Who is he that conquered the devil, foiled death in his own Throne, led captivity captive, overcame sin that overcame the whole world; that pacified an infinite wrath, that made way to an infinite glory; who? This is he; this is my beloved Son.

Beloved Son.] God's love to his Son is eternal, infinite, inexpressible. I. 3.35. The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand. John. 17.24. Thou lovest me before the foundation of the world. Col. 1.13. Transtulit nos in reg filii dilectionis suae: his dear Son; the Son of his love. 1. Because he is most worthy of all to be loved: as Judas is called the Son of perdition, because he was $\langle \diamond \rangle$ worthy to be destroyed. 2. Because he was begotten of his Fathers love from everlasting. 3. Because he is infinitely filled with this love. So they are said to be children of the Bride-chamber, that are full of joy in respect of the wedding. 4. Because he makes other sons to be beloved. Filius dilectus, qui facit dilectos. 5. In respect of his human nature; For God poured his love upon him with gifts beyond measure, wherewith that nature is admirably qualified. Beloved: here are two scandals taken away by this word. First, that we may not think Christ to be sent in the flesh ab irato Patre, from God the Father being angry: for he is his Beloved sin. N, that when we are afflicted, we should not think ourselves minus a Deo diligi, to be the less beloved of God, for he loves the Son, whom he scourges.

But how appears this love, when God did so cast him down that he seemed •ven to hate him? Law. 1.1. Vindemiavit me Dominus; The Lord hath afflicted me $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the day of his fierce anger. God afflicts some in mercy, but this was in wrath. In •is wrath God is not a like to all: some he afflicts more mildly; but this was in his •ierce wrath. His sufferings, his Sweat, and Cup, import so much: they could not •ome, but from a wrath whereof never was the like. Two things especially may •eeme to abate the Fathers love to his Son. First, his sweat in the Garden. Luk.2.44. Which was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground. When •o manner of violence was offered him in body, none touching him: in a cold night, •or they were glad of a fire within doors: lying abroad in the air, and upon the •old earth; to be all or a sweat, and that sweat to be blood, and that not a thin ••int one, but Gr•mosus, of great drops; and those so many as went through his ap•arell, and streamed to the ground in abundance: never was the like sweat. But se•ondly, to be in this distress, and then to want comfort! This was his most sorrow•ull complaint; not that his friends on earth, but that his Father from heaven had •orsaken him. So that between the passioned powers of his foul, and whatsoever might refresh him, there was a Traverse drawn: My God, my God, why hast thou for•aken me? Martyrs in their most exquisite pains had some cheerfulness. Augustine•nswers Martyrs non •ripuit, sed nunquid deseruit? God did not deliver them, but •id he forsake them? He freed not their bodies, he left not their souls. But here, Direliquisti me, thou hast forsaken me. How then was he beloved? non solvit unio•em, sed subtraxit visionem. The influence was for the time restrained, the power •f darkness let loose to afflict him, and the vision of comfort not permitted to re•eeve him: yet still the Lord loved him. But this shows how immensely God loved us: when he seemed to forsake his Son for a time, that he might embrace his servants forever. Yea, how much CHRIST loved us; that would be content to offer a sense of this desertion for a while, that we might not be eternally lost. Thou wast forsaken for us, let not us forsake thee, neither do thou forsake us, oh blessed Jesus!

In whom I am well pleased.] This was a voice never heard since the fall of man, still that instant. That God was justly angry with the world, it was manifest: but to have him now pleased with the world, or any man in it, this was rare and sweet. Never was man borne before of woman, that had this grace. Though it were said to Mary, Hail thou art highly honored, or much graced; yet this was for her sons sake. Propter filii meritum, mater in enit gratiam: the honor done to the mother, was for the merit of the Son. The Father took all delight in the Son. Esa. 42.1. Be old mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth. And in him only, he is delighted with us. Cursed is that Religion, that makes him but a chief Savior, and requires other concurring helps: we must have only CHRIST, and wholly CHRIST. Our prayers are heard only through him, our wounds healed only by him, our souls saved only in him. To what end should we join others with him, seeing all are beloved only for him? Let this make all sin abhorred of us, for if we displease the Son, how shall we please the Father? The Father will be pleased with none, but for the Sons sake. Oh then let us always seek to please the Son. Kiss the Son lest he see angry, and so ye perish, Psalm. 2.12. Oh dear Savior, give us hearts to love thee, and faith to trust thee, and grace to please thee, that God may be pleased with us in thee.

This Son of God hath made us also sons: God hath right to us Iure Proprietatis, so hath the Father, Son, and holy Spirit: and Iure Propinquitatis, so hath CHRIST only, for he was a kin to us. CHRIST is both our brother and our Father. Our Father as he is God; our brother as he is man. Hebr. 1.11. He that sanctified, and they who are sanctified, are all of one: for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren. This is the Son, that makes us sons. John. 1.12. To as many as receive him, he gives power to become the sons of God. Christ is Filius Dei, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Trinitatis; nos filii Dei & Trinitatis: he is the Son of God, but not of the Trinity we are the sons of God, and of the whole Trinity: he by nature, we by grace it was the ambition of the heathens, to forget their own parents, and to derive themselves from the parentage of some god; as Alexander from Jupiter, &c. Behold, a Christ hath honor naturally, so we graciously in him, to be called the sons of God. How great is this happiness, to be the Almighty's sons? but perhaps there are diverse younger brothers, landlesse; No, they are all heirs: there is not a child of God's, but shall inherit the kingdom. Quid Pater negabit filiis, qui hoc dignatus $\langle \diamond \rangle$ ut sit Pater? What will the father deny to his children, who hath already thus far honored them, to be their Father. Rom. 8.32. He that spared not his own Son for us, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things? Nonne dabit sua, qui non vit nit se? Will he deny us his goods, that hath given us himself? Qui dabit se in ritum; dabit & suavi premium. He that parted with himself to merit for us, will not withhold his mercies to crown us. As Abraham's servant said of Isaac to Rebecca. Gen. 24.36. He is my masters only son, and to him he gives all that he hath. So if God give us his only Son, he will give us all things with him. Therefore was the Son of God made the Son of man; that the sons of men might be made the sons of God.

All love that comes from God to us, is through his Son, John. 17.23. That the world may know, that thou hast loved them, as thou hast loved me. Christ define it, the Father will not deny it. Christ is God's beloved, and we are Christ beloved. All things are ours, because we are Christ's, and Christ is God's. When we consider, how infinitely God loves Christ, and how infinitely Christ loveth us, we cannot despair. Pater & filius sunt duo in persona, unum in desiderio. The Father and the Son are two in Person, but one in desire. It is not possible, that he should be hated, for whom Christ suffered. Hence it follows, that God will not fail to lift us up to the place where his own beloved is. John. 7.24. Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am. Rom. 8.17. We shall also be glorified together with him. It had been a great favor to be admitted for door-keepers in his house: great satisfactions to have our sins pardoned and that the Lord would be friends with us, considering our rebellion. But to be restored to that Paradise which Adam lost; this had been more: but to be advanced further and higher than ever Adam was; even to the Lord's own throne; this is most of all. If all men's hearts were one heart, it could not comprehend the measure of this love. God hath life, for he is the fole fountain of it: but how shall we come at it? Esa. 33.14. Who shall approach the devouring fire? who amongst us shall dwell with the everlasting burnings? Yes, the blood of the Son hath qualified this fire, and quenched the wrath of the Father: thus that life is made ours. 1 John. 5.11. God hath given us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. In dilecto, cum dilecto, pro dilecto. Excellent favor, not only to give us place and grace with the Angels; but even with his own Son! We are made Lord's of all creatures but the Angels: and our head [JESUS] is also head of the Angels. For his sake they are all ministering spirits, for the good of all those that are the heirs of salvation. If we be thus loved in the beloved, we may be sure of all necessary things. For howsoever God hath distinguished the things of this world i• a propriety: yet we have such interest in them, that the Sun should not shine, not the world stand, but for the elects sake. The wicked are excluded from the Tree of life, and therefore from all things that should maintain life: and through they be •t on earth yet they shall have double torment for their single merriment. For they are never in their own house till they be in hell, Act. 1.25. For us, they shall be as well able to save themselves without God, as to hurt us having God: and the worst they can do, is but to send us to GOD; and our desire is to be with GOD forever.

To conclude, Christ was God's Son, his only beloved Son: we servants, ••••ll servants: yet was this Son borne and slain for these servants. This is the •oint we are bound to consider! how far God suspended his love to his Son, and •ttended his love to his servants: even so far, that this Son of love died for those sons •f wrath. Here me thinks we should even stay and wonder. 1 John. 3.1. Behold, what •anner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us that we should be called the sons of God. •his is a depth that cannot be sounded: cold language may utter it, and regardless •tention hear it; but men and Angels stand amazed at it. That the Creator should ••e for the creature: that this Filius meus, the Son of God; and Servus tuus, the ••rvant of man; should meet in one person. That the same, who is Dominus omni•m, the Lord of all; should be made Sacrificium nostrum, our sacrifice: that the •on of love should die for the sons of wrath! There have been many demonstrati•ns of love in the world, Gen. 42.37. Reuben yielded much to his Father: Slay my two ••ns, if I bring him not to thee: it was in the behalf of Benjamin. Here were two sons •o be lost; Si If their uncle was lost. His own sons were dear to him, as the objects of a descending love; but entrusted to their Grandfather, whose love come only transcends an immediate Fathers; Judah tenders more for Benjamin, Gen. 43. I will be surety for him; of my hand shall thou require him: he engaged himself, but it as a son ventured upon the mercy of his Father, Gen. 44.33. He goes further when Joseph offered to detain Benjamin, for whom Judah had thus interposed himself; he tenders his own person for redemption. I pray thee let me abide instead of the Lad, a bondman to my Lord: and let him go home with his brethren. Yet he would be but a bondman, and that for his brother, and that in respect of his Father; and all to save all from the destruction of famine. Therefore this is a poor pattern to match with the love of God, that did not tradere filium pro patre, vel ex necessitate; deliver up a son for the fathers sake, or compelled by any exigent: sed pro hostibus, ex voluntate; but for his enemies, and that with a voluntary donation. The Poet speaks of a great love betwixt Nisus and Eurialus; me, me, adsum qui feci, in me convertite ferrum: Mea fraus omnis, nihil iste nec ausus, nec potuit.

Two friends are said to come into Vulcans shop, and to beg a boone of him: it as granted. What was it? that he would either beat them on his Anvil, or melt them in his furnace, both into one. But without fiction, here is a far greater love CHRIST: for he would be melted in the furnace of wrath, and beaten on the anvil of death, to be made one with us. And to declare the exceeding love: here were not both to be beaten on the anvil, or melted in the furnace: but without us, he alone would be beaten on the anvil, he alone melted, that we might be spared. Esa. 53.6. The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all. They talk of an Athenian King, that offered his own life to save his people. And no doubt, the zeal of Moses and Paul was great, when they desired Perire pro pereuntibus, to perish themselves for the redemption of others. Jonathan's love was great to David, hazarding his own life for him, 2 Sam. 1.26. Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women. Davids love was great to an evil son, 2 Sam. 18.33. Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son. Alas, all these copies are short of this original: come we yet nearer. Abraham had but one son, the son of his old age, likely to have no more: Filius rei, filius spei; the heir of his estate, the pledge of the promise of his salvation: yet in love to his commander, he suffered him not to be banished, but killed: not behind his back, but before his own face: not by another, but by his own hand. This was much: yet it was but to lose a son for a Father, a mortal sonne for an immortal Father; that could give him more sons, or raise up that son again to life. But here God did give a Son, not for an immortal father, but for mortal enemies. He loved him ten thousand degrees better than Abraham could love Isaac: yet he gave this Son, not by command as Abraham, but willingly: not to the hands of them that sorowed to kill him, but to butchers that delighted to torment him: not for his friends, as Abraham did, but for traitors that would have killed him out of his Throne: not to a death that only parts body and soul, and instantly directs to heaven, as Isaac's should; but to a death cursed and detestable: this not to be done in a secret place, as Abraham's was appointed; but before all his scornful enemies: not to die as an innocent, like Isaac, but to hang as a notorious sinner; his accusation being no less than blasphemy; to have a murderer preferred before him in the people's opinion: to be scorned of the basest, whose fathers he might disdain to set with the dogs of his flock. Yea, and which is yet most; while all this is doing on earth, that even then his Father should arraign him above: that he should take off the burden of vengeance from the head of his adversaries, and lay it all on his Son. The comfort of all comforts is from above: let all forsake me, but let $\langle \diamond \rangle$ my Father leave me: but the Lord afflicted him. The high Priest took him to be an offender in his own Person, but God took him to be an offender in our person. He that deserved no sorrow, felt much; that we who deserved much, might feel none: by his wounds we are healed.

Now take the Person upon whom as one Center all these sorrows met my Te•• says, It is my beloved Son. Son; this is enough: man loves his own son, the walking Image of himself. Mine, that is more, the Son of God: as is the person, so is the passion. Beloved, if possible, yet more: for the love of God far transcends all love of man. If he had been but as Pilate said, Behold the man; it was much, we pity a dumb creatures suffering this, much more a man. Yea, but he was Ins•• homo, says the Judges wife, a righteous man: now we pity malefactors, much more the innocent. Yea besides his integrity, he was Magnus & nobilis, a noble person, a Royal Prince: for whom men might justly complain; Alas, that noble Prince, Ier. 22. All these are short: this Ecce homo, ecce agnus, ecce magnus; behold the man, behold the Lamb, behold the Prince; are true, but not enough. Here Ecce filius ••us, behold my son; as the Centurion acknowledged, Truly this is the son of God; is above all gradation. If he had not been the son of God, it had been impossible for him to sustain it: and yet being thus, he was brought so low that an Angel was dispatched from heaven to comfort him. Here all words forsake us, we bless the Lord, and hold our peace.

Take the sum of this application: we have heard much of God's Son, and of his dearness to the Father. Now join with it another Text, John. 3.16. So God love the world that he gave this only begotten Son. Here meditate, wonder, and weigh the sentence; Who, what, how, to what end. Who loved; God; that made us his friends by creation; whose enemies we made ourselves by prevarication. What did he love? the world, a bad world, a mad world, a blind world, a bloody world; that hated him and all his, John. 15.19. It was no wonder, that he should love the Angels, for they serve him: or the very reasonless creatures, for they obey him: but that he should love the rebellious and hateful world, this is boundless mercy? How d•• he love it? So that he gave his only begotten Son. If like Gideon, he had had threescore and ten Sons, Judge. 8.30. it had been much to part with one of them; be his only son. Jacob rent his clothes, and went mourning in sackcloth many days for losing one son of twelve, Gen. 37.34. Even an harlot pitied the fruit of her womb, and her bowels yearned upon her son. 1 King. 3.26. Oh my LORD. give her the living child, and in no wise slay it: but GOD gave the only Son of his love. To what end? That whosoever believeth in him, should not perish but have life everlasting. Where observe two things: the felicity that is goo•, and the facility to get it. The felicity consists of two things; a deliverance, and an Inheritance. He shall not perish, there's the deliverance. He shall have everlasting life, there's the inheritance. For the facility; it is not to keep the Law, but only to believe. Psal. 8.4. Lord what is man that thou shouldst so regard him! Yea, that to regard him, thou didst not regard thyself? It is reported of a great Soldier, that the very gingling of his spurr was a terror to his enemies. So the very sound of this Te••• makes all the devils in hell roar, all the foes of man's salvation to quake. This is the Christians armory, that Tower of David, whereon there hang a thousand bucklers a shield of mighty men, Cant. 4.4. If thy conscience be assaulted with guiltiness of thy ••ns, remember first, that this CHRIST was the Son of God:

and then that this •onne was given for the world. Dedit filium, non servum suum, non alienum; unige•tum, non de multis unum. God gave not a servant but a Son: not another's but his •wne Son: not one of many, but his only Son. If Satan now object; Yes, but he ••ve him only for the holy and just; answer, nay, So he loved the world; mundum •mundum: mundum therefore mundanum: he gave him not for the righteous, but ••r sinners. I am of that number, therefore I have my part in that favor. Paul•ies Eph. 6.11. Put on the whole armor of God: and Rom. 13.14. Put on the Lord•ESUS CHRIST. In the one place, all those pieces of armor is but the Lord ••us taken asunder: in the other, the whole armor is but the Lord Jesus put toge••er. Psal. 2.12. Kiss the Son lest he be angry. To make peace with the Father, kiss •onne. Cant. 1.2. Let him kiss me, was the Churches prayer: let us kiss him, that •e our endeavor. Indeed, the Son must first kiss us by his mercy, before we can ••sse him by our piety. Lord grant us these mutual kisses, and interchangeable em••aces now: that we may come to the plenary wedding Supper hereafter. When ••e Choir of heaven, even the voices of Angels, shall sing Epithalamiums, nuptuall ••ngs, at the bridal of the spouse to the Lamb.

VERSE 18. And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount.

THis is a clear description of the place, where they had that heavenly vision; the holy mount. Before he professed them eye-witnesses, now also ear-witnesses. This voice came not in secret, it was no whispering voice: not in •error, it was no thundering voice: not in a strange language, it was no unintelligible •oice. It was not like the voice at Babel, confused. At the building of Babel there •ere strange tongues, that one could not understand another: at the building of Zion were also strange tongues, but readily understood, Act. 2. This voice heard, this they •nderstood, this they declared.

The body of this verse reflects upon the transfiguration of CHRIST, where•f we shall find many considerable members. But first let us look upon the outside •f the Text, and the garments it wears. There is.

Quiddam

- Vocale; a Voice; This voice which came, &c.
- Locale; a Place; In the holy mount.

There are two annections to these two circumstances.

To the

- Voice, audience This voice we heard.
- Place, presence: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ; we were with him.

This voice which came from heaven.] First for the vocal part; we have alrea•y considered: what this voice was, and from whence it came. Here is only some •ariation of the latter phrase:

there it was 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , from the excellent glory: here it is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , from heaven. Now as. 2 Cor. 12.2. & 4. When Paul speaking of his rapture and revelation, says in one place that he was caught up to the third heaven: and in another, into Paradise: we may safely infer, that Paradise is heaven, a place of infinite joy. So finding that here called heaven, which was before called glory; we conclude that it is a place of infinite glory. The earth had many cities, only Jerusalem was the holy City: many mountains, but Zion was the mount of joy. Psal. 48.2. The joy of the whole earth is mount Zion. The Courts of Princes have glorious shows, only the Court of God hath the Excellent glory. The Athenian thought all the world, as barbarous in knowledge, so infamous in honor, in respect of Athens: therefore they would go heavily forth, but make 〈◇〉 home. We know that to be true of our country, what they dreamed of Athens: the pride of the world is vanity of vanities, the meanest of heaven is glory of glories.

Good things are known by their contraries, where they cannot be seen in their own perfections. To contemplate this glory, let us look lower than heaven, upon earth; lower than earth, upon hell; and so learn to judge of heaven.

Look upon this world, what is found in it but vanity, which is evil: misery, which is worse: iniquity, which is worst of all. For vanity, there have you some building houses, as the Estriches lay eggs, or as children make ovens, to bake no bread in: there is vanity. Another wastes his time, brains, means, to find our ridiculous projects; only studies tricks: as if his soul could be made happy by a trick there is vanity. Another sweats, non pro solido auro, not for riches, which is also vain: sed pro stolido auro, but for the barren air of empty commendation, which is most vain. The world it self is vanity, and a mistress that makes her Idolaters most vain. Blanditur oculis, seducit osculis: if you look upon her, she will beguile you if you kiss her, she will bewitch you. For miseries, one shakes a pained head, another roars for the torment of his reins, a third complains the racking of his gowtie joints, another is half dead with a Palsy: that it may be said of him more truly than of sea-farers: he is neither amongst the living, nor amongst the dead. Which of this whole multitude can say he is so well, that he feels no distemper: Shew me the man that says, he ailes nothing: and I will answer, that he is in most danger: the proximity to death is the insensibilitie of sickness. Ingressus debilis, progressus lebilis, egressus flebilis. Our entrance is full of weakness, our proceeding full of wickedness, our departure full of wretchedness. If thy body be healthful, doth nothing about thy estate, thy friends, thy neighbors, thy children, trouble thee? lastly for iniquity; this is a moral corruption, worse than that mortal corruption. There fly a crew of oaths, like night-ravens: there stalkes pride, blustering through the streets; the language of whose pace is, Who makes me? drunkenness is reeling to the ground, and uncleanness strives to hold it up, Hypocrites dare lie God in the face, as if he had no window into the heart: or he that hath eyes like a flame of fire, could see men no otherwise from heaven, than the half cured man in the Gospel, that saw them walking like trees. Profane persons swear, as dogs bark: non semper pro feritate, sed pro consuetudine; not ever for curstnesse, but for custom. If these external offenses did not vex thee, yet thou hast enow at home: ever sinning, before, after, yea even while thou repentest; none of these conveniences are in heaven, Revel. 21. No misery, but habitation with God, near whom sorrow can never come. No vanity, for the former things are passed away. No iniquity, for God shall make of things new. Revel. 19.9. Blessed are they that are called to marriage supper of the Lambs. Feasts have more than ordinary diet: marriage-feasts more than common abundance. This exceeds all; new wine, pure Manna, great cheare, and an answerable welcome. Cant. 5.1. Eate Oh friends, drink, yea drink abundantly and be merry. Of beloved.

Look yet lower, and consider the infernal pity, full of horror and amazedness: Where is no remission of sin, no dismissal of pain, no intermission of sense, no permission of comfort, Bernard. Where friend shall cry to friend; Percute, dilacera; infer prunas, & ebullientibus impone lebetibus. That Parisian massacre was but a sense-school to this bloody field: yet think of that dismal cry there; of enemies insulting and butchering, kill, kill; of innocents suffering and dying, save, save. But Matth. 8.12. There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Flet us ob ignem qui non extinguitur, stridor ob vermem qui non moritur, Bern. Weeping, for the fire that shall never be quenched: gnashing of teeth, for the gnawing worm that shall never be satisfied. Fletus oculorum ex dolore, stridor dentium ex furore, Gregor. Weeping of eyes, the effect of a passive agony: gnashing of teeth, the effect of an impatient fury. Illic dentes stridebunt, qui hinc de edacitate gaudebant; If the rod of affliction which scourgeth the dear ones of GOD, be so smart: what are their plagues, in whose righteous confusion GOD insulteth; I will avenge me of mine enemies! Isaiah 1.24. Bernard observes on the 25. of Saint Matthew. That the blessed are first called to the Kingdom, before the cursed be cast into thralldom. Vt sti acrius doleant, videntes quid amiserint: illi foelicus gaudeant, noscentes quid evaseint; That the ungodly may be the more vexed, seeing what joys they have missed: and the faithful the more solaced, seeing what sorrows they have escaped. If our mortal eyes were suffered to view the horrors of that lake, how would we loath sin which only can endanger us thither!

Thus because I cannot tell you what heaven is, I have shown you what it is •ot. For the pleasures of that place, let us not so much stand to examine what •hey be, as whether they belong to us. Enquire not too curiously of them, •s Manoah did for the Angels name, Judges the thirteenth Chapter and the eigh•eenth verse. Lest thou receivest such a snibbe: Why askest thou thus after my •ame, seeing it is secret? It is Secret, or Wonderful: the original signifies both. •o this excellent glory of Heaven is both wonderful and secret. When a servant was carrying a covered mess, another was inquisitive what might be in it: the bea•er answered, To what end then was it covered? The covering of this mystery, as 〈◇〉 denies intelligence, so it forbids inquisition. There is now no window to look •nto it; there is a door for our foot to enter into it: let us take it at a venture, it is •e best match we can make; and the LORD bring us to it through the merits of JESUS CHRIST.

We heard this voice.] The circumstance annexed to this vocal part, is Au•ience; We heard. Formerly there was provision for the eye, now GOD sup•lies the ear also. There we have Seene his Majesty, here we have Heard his Testimony. The object to the eye was Gloria Testati, the glory of the Person ex•ibited: the object to the ear was Vox Testantis, the voice of the Person witnessing. These are the two principal organs of Sense: and the wise love of God by the ex•rcise of them both, brings us to a certain persuasion of these holy mysteries. It a Philosophical question, whether of these senses be better in it self. To answer according to nature, certainly the sight is most excellent: both for celerity, and pericacity; quickness and sharpness. Segnius irritant animos dimissa per aures. But according to grace, for the benefit of the soul, Hearing far excelleth: and that both for amplitude and Altitude. 1. For Amplitude, we see not many things in comparison $\langle \diamond \rangle$ them we hear. Few can say, I have seen all the works that are done under the Sun, Eccles. 1.14. Unless he mean by All works, all kind of works: or by Vision, consideration; as there certainly Solomon doth. But we have heard what Solomon's; a large Inventory of worldly things, the total Sum whereof is Vanity. The actions and events of former times, are brought home to us by Hearing: whose authors and agents went to darkness, before we came to light: we have heard far more than seen. 2. For Altitude, we have heard higher things than we have seen. The eye may reach almost to the Sieling of this lower world, but it cannot pierce the pavement of heaven. The ear hears what is done within those everlasting doors: that God beholds our thoughts, and accepts his Sons Intercession and merits for us. Psal. 8.8. As we have heard, so have we seen in the City of our God: first heard, then afterwards come to see, Psal. 132.6. Loe we heard of it at Ephrata, a strange land: but Vidimus in monte Zion; We only shall see it in mount Zion, in the glorious kingdom above. Let a deaf man see some new and strange object; the husk, color, and visible part is only apprehended by him: let his ear be open to discourse, and relation shall give him the intelligible sense.

The Queen of Sheba's eye was pleased with Solomon's royalty, but her ear was more ravished with his wisdom, *1 King. 10.7. I believed not the report of thy glory, until mine eyes had seen it: there she saw. But verse. 8. the thing she most admired and blessed, was his wisdom, let into her soul by her ear; Happy are they that hear thy wisdom, Matth. 13.16. Blessed are your eyes, for they see: that was proper to the Disciples: Blessed are your ears, for they hear: that blessing is left to us. But blessed are the hearts that understand and embrace, this is the height of blessedness, John. 20.29. Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed. We may believe without seeing, but how shall we believe without hearing? For Faith cometh by hearing, Rom. 10.17. But saith Augustine, Seeing is applied to all the Senses. To Tasting, Psalm. Taste and see how gracious the Lord is. To Touching or Feeling, Psal. 16.10. Thou wilt not suffer thine holy one to see corruption: that is, to feel corruption, John. 8.51. He that keeps my sayings, shall never see death, that is, feel destruction. To suffer is sensibly to feel, yet called, to See, John. 20.27. Tange & vide; Reach hither thy finger, and see my hands. Had Thomas his eyes in his fingers! if not, then Seeing is Touching. To Smelling: Olfac, & vide quàm been oleat; Such and See how sweet the Flower is. Gusta & vide, quàm been sapiat: Taste and See how well the fruit relisheth. Tange & vide, Touch and See how I am wounded. $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Audi & vide, Hear and See how pleasant the music is. The phrase is not unknown to the Scriptures, *Rev. 1.12. I turned to See the voice that spake with me. To see the voice, for the Person that ought it. Or else, video is put for Intelligo: I see mentally, not elementally. The man of wisdom shall see thy Name, that is, understand it.

The eye as a mere Organ of sense, must give place to the ear. Therefore it is wittily observed, that our Savior commanding the abscission of the offending hand, foot, and eye; yet never spake of the ear, Mark 9.43 If thy hand, thy see or thine eye, cause thee to offend, deprive thyself of them: but part not with their ear, for that is an organ to derive unto thy soul salvation. As Christ says there; a man may enter into heaven, lamed in his feet, as Mephibosheth blind in his sight, a Barzillai, maimed in his hand, as the dry-handed man in the Gospel: but if there be not an ear to hear of the way, there will be no foot to enter into heaven. Si des non prius fuerit in aure, non erit in ore, nec in cord; If God be not first in the ear, it is neither sanctifiedly in the mouth, nor comfortably in the heart. The Jews has eyes to see Christ's miracles, but because they had no ears to hear his wisdom, therefore they had no feet to enter into his kingdom. The way into the house is by the door, not by the window; the eye is but the window of the heart, the ear is the door. Now Christ stands knocking at the door, not at the window, Rev. 3.20. And he will not come in at the window, but at the door. He that entereth in by the door, is the shepherd of the sheep, John. 10.2. He comes now in by his oracles, not by his miracles, John. 10.3. To him the porter openeth, and the sheep hear his voice. The way to open, and let him in, is by the ear; to hear his voice. There was a man in the Gospel, Blind and Deafe: blind eyes, is ill; but deaf ears, worse. It is bad $\langle \diamond \rangle$ have the eyes sieled, but worse to have the ears sealed up.

Open your ears therefore to this heavenly voice. Bernard hath this description of a good ear: Quae libenter audit docta, prudenter intelligit audita, obedium agit intellecta; Which willingly hears what is taught, wisely understands what heareth, and obediently practices what it understandeth. O give me such an $\langle \diamond \rangle$ and I will hang on it jewels of gold, ornaments of praises, Psal. 85.8. I will $\langle \diamond \rangle$ what the Lord will say: Quid loquatur Dominus. We have those will hear what tempting harlot can say for Luxury, what a false prophet can say in the behalf Usury, what a Lawyer can say in the behalf of Sacrilege, what a factious Schismaticke can say for Separation, what a Jesuited Seminary can say for Treas•Christ promised his presence to all those that are assembled Nomine suo, in his Name: •hese meet not in the name of Christ, but of Antichrist. Where instead of the •owers of God's Garden, they gather the poisonous weeds of the Forest: and the Devil gets in at the Lord's door. I may say of these Convents, confederating to mischiefs; what Chrysostom said of the virgin possessed by the Devil at a Theater. When God rebuked him, Quomodo ausus es ingredi domum meam? How durst thou •e so bold as to enter into my House? Satan answers, Inveni eam in domo mea; because I found her in my House. In the Congregation of Saints, the Holy Ghost ••ters in, and the Devil is cast out: but in these houses of sedition, and places of •alicious error, the company of sinners and seducers; the Holy Ghost is shut out, •ad the Devil is let in. I know that the common streets are not free from offenses $\langle \diamond \rangle$ honest ears; but it is one thing, Audire non quaerenda; To hear things that are to $\langle \diamond \rangle$ hated: and another thing, Quaerere non audienda, to listen after things that are not $\langle \diamond \rangle$ be heard. Between Odio invenire, and ultra convenire; finding evil against our •ills, and seeking evil with our delights; there is great difference, Psal. 120.5. Woe is •e that I sojourn in Mesech; that I dwell in the tents of Kedar. Bless yourselves from Mesech, but love Mount Zion: there are the songs of peace. Thus after hearing the •ice of God from heaven, you shall come to hear the voice of God in heaven. You •ave heard Hosanna's you shall hear Hallelujahs: here, God praised by his Mini•ers: there, praised by his Angels. There we shall both hear others, and bear a •rt ourselves, in the everlasting praises of God, and our Savior JESUS Christ.

When we were with him on the holy Mount.] We are come to the Local part: •hat this Mount was, and how Holy, we shall hear presently. First, consider the •jacent circumstance; We were with him. The Voice had their Audience, the Mount •eir Presence: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , with him: O blessedness to be with Christ! What meant •ter to be ashamed of this, when the Damsel said, This man was with Jesus? Mat. 6.71. What, deny to be with JESUS? Alas, it was his weakness then: after•ard he was so glad to be with him, that he was content to die for him: he refused •t the sharp and bloody way of martyrdom, to be with JESUS. What meant •icodemus to be with him only by night? as if he feared to be seen in his company 〈 〉 day? Shall a man fear his joy, his comfort, his salvation? Mary Magdalene so •nged to be with him, that non erat ubi erat, she was not where she was, for her whole •art was with him. Mallet non esse, quàm sine Christo esse: I had rather at all not 〈 〉 than to be without Christ. It is impossible to be with him, and to be without •mfort, Act 4.13. When they saw their boldness, and miraculous working, they •arvelled, and took knowledge of them, that they had been with Jesus. If there be •urage of zeal, and peace of conscience in men, we may well conclude, they have •ene with JESUS. When Gehesi went from Elisha, he presently fell into sin: so •e all they that keep not with Christ. With him is comfort and peace, John. 6.68. •rd, whither shall we go from thee? Thou hast the words of eternal life.

When we were with him on the holy Mount.] Our Savior had fore-told the great •ory and power of his second coming: to the comfort of his servants, to the ter•r and conviction of his enemies, Matth. 16.27. The Son of man shall come in the •ry of his Father, with his Angels: And then shall he reward every man according to his •rkes. There is his Justice, and the distribution of his justice. He shall reward every 〈 〉 , there is his Justice: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , according to his works, there is the distribution •his Justice. It is distinguished plainly, Matth. 25.46. To them that have done ill, •erlasting punishment: to them that have done well, life eternal Now lest his Disci•s should doubt of that glory, which he hath ascribed to himself at his second ap•ring; and stagger at the ignominy of his present estate: immediately upon it, he •kes them a promise, that they should see it, or at least a glimpse and abridgment of •hat so enjoying this vision, they might more confidently and authoritatively give •r testimony to it. There be some standing here, which shall not taste of death, till they •he Son of man coming in his kingdom. And this promise is prefixed by the three Evangelists, that record this story, immediately before CHRIST'S Transfiguration on the Mount, Matth. 16.28. Mark 9.1. Luke 9.27. Which words of Chil• have divers expositions. Some take it meant of his glorious Resurrection, as if the sense were thus. There be some standing here, that shall not die, till they see the So•• of man in his glory, and conquest of sin and death. Some, not all, for this 〈 〉 exclude Judas: all the rest of the Apostles, but only Judas, did live to see it. 〈 〉 and some others take it, Pro Ecclesiae dilatatione, meant for the enlargement of 〈 〉 Church. As if this were the sense; There be some standing here, that shall live 〈 〉 see my Kingdom flourish, and spread powerfully over the face of the earth; 〈 〉 the despised Name of JESUS to command the Scepters of Kings and reign ov•r the Dominations of the earth. Some understand by it, the last coming to Iud•meant: as if there were some Apostles yet living, and that should live unto the 〈 〉 day; because he says, Some stand here that shall not die, till they see this glory. 〈 〉 that opinion as frivolous, hath always been exploded, excluded. The last, ⟨ϕ⟩ and most agreeable to the History, and context of the Scripture; is to understand•••De clarificatione Christi, concerning his Transfiguration, which immediately follows. Of this there was Promissio clara, exhibitio manifesta, occultatio jussa; It ⟨ϕ⟩ clearly promised, manifestly performed, and the concealment of it for a time commanded, Matth. 17.9. This Christ promised under the form of an oath; ⟨ϕ⟩ verily I say unto you. There are certain circumstances of this Transfiguration ⟨ϕ⟩ rent in the Text; other adherent to it, which we will borrow from the Evangelists, and so make up the discourse. The points are, The

- Time, when this was done.
- Place, where this was done.
- Manner, how this was done.
- Witnesses, before whom this was done.
- Event, that followed this being done.

The time, to expound our Apostles When, is expressed, Matth. 17.1. and M•• 9.2. After six days. Only Saint Luke, Chap. 9.28. seems to differ from them: for ⟨ϕ⟩ says Eight days after. Now between six days, and eight days, there seems to ⟨ϕ⟩ some difference of the time. Saint Jerome easily reconciles them thus. Matthew ⟨ϕ⟩ Mark, Ponunt dies tantum intermedios; speak only of the intervenient days, ⟨ϕ⟩ went between the promise and the performance. Lucas addidit & primum in qui ⟨ϕ⟩ misit, & ultimum in quo solvit. Luke adds both the first day in which he promise ⟨ϕ⟩ and the last day in which he performed it. Eight days Exclusively; six days Inclusively. Some mystically, by these six days understand the six ages of the world, ⟨ϕ⟩ they call them; which being past, we shall come to that glorious vision of our Lord Jesus in heaven. But why did not Christ presently vouchsafe to his Disciples ⟨ϕ⟩ Sight, but defer the performance of it, till six days after the promise? Chrysostom answers; Visionem distulit, ut eam vehementiús appetent, & gaudentiús acciperent. ⟨ϕ⟩ deferred it to increase their desires before it came, their joys when it came. To ⟨ϕ⟩ flame their desires, for Cito data vilescent, things easily come by, are little set by. ⟨ϕ⟩ increase their joys, for Dulciús obtinetur, quod diu detinetur; That which hath ⟨ϕ⟩ long detained, is at last more sweetly obtained. Moreover, if Christ after the pro••• of this vision, had immediately singled out some to the participation of it, this ⟨ϕ⟩ have bred envy and grudging in the rest, who were apt enough to quarrel about ⟨ϕ⟩ businesses. That extraordinary gracing of some, would have been held a dispar••meant to all the rest. Therefore as Christ concealed their names in the promise, ⟨ϕ⟩ of these, not naming who they were; so for six days he deferred the perform ⟨ϕ⟩ That without emulation of the rest, he might give satisfaction to them he had ⟨ϕ⟩

The Place is delivered in the Text, the Holy Mount. Saint Matthew say• was Mons excelsus, an high Mountain: Saint Peter, Mons Sanctus, an Holy Mountain. By common consent this Mountain was Tabor, thought it be not no•tively expressed in Scripture. A fair Hill in the territory of Galilee, Mira••• tate ex omni parte aequaliter finitus; Of so wonderful a roundness, that you 〈◇〉 think rather Art than Nature had fashioned it: the ascent of it was thirty furlongs, •t was a Sea-mark to Mariners; It was full of herbs, fruits, flowers, fountains. Thus it was high and conspicuous for situation, fertile by condition, and lastly, Ho•y, by this most holy apparition, Hieron. True it is, that all places are of their own •ature equal: Nec alter altero dignior, Nor is one more worthy, or more holy than •nother: but by the accession of some special blessings and privileges. Whither •ever the Lord comes, that is the fountain of holiness, such is the odour and per••me of his gracious presence, that he sanctifies the place. It was his presence which cause Jacob to turn Luz into Bethel, Gen. 28.17. This is none other, but the •ouse of GOD, and this is the gate of Heaven. So GOD himself testified to Moses 〈◇〉 Horeb, Exod. 3.5. The place whereon thou standest, is holy ground. And the Cap••ine of the Lord's host to Joshua, Josh. 5.15. Loose thy shoe from off thy foot, for the •lace whereon thou standest is holy. Thus became this Mount holy: there being God, •ater sanctitatis per vocem auditam; The Father of holiness heard speaking: Christ, •anctus Sanctorum, per carnem ad tempus glorificatum; That Holy of Holies by his •ody for that time glorified: Moses and Elias, those holy Saints: Peter, James, and John, those holy Apostles: needs must this Mount be holy. Nicephorus writeth, •hat Helena built upon that hill a Cathedral Church, and dedicated it to Saint Peter. And in process of time, others also added two Monasteries, endowed with fair •evenewes: in allusion or answer to Peters desire, Let us build here three Tabernacles. But now etiam periere ruinae, there is not left any (so much as) ruin, to tell the pas•enger, here stood such monuments: and that holy Mountain is become an habitati•n for Wolves and Foxes. Jerome upon Hosea, writes liberally of this Mount, and •alls it Tabor, Psal. 89.12. Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy Name. It had cause 〈◇〉 rejoice, when it bore the glorious Person of JESUS CHRIST. He inter•rets it to signify, Lux veniens, Light coming. Not unfitly, that CHRIST, •ho is the light of the world, upon a mountain of light, should give remonstrance •f that glorious light of his Majesty. But why did our Savior choose a moun•ine for this apparition, why not rather a valley? True glory is not to be sought 〈◇〉 Profundo hujus seculi, in the low bottoms of this world: but on high; Set your •fections on things above, where CHRIST sitteth on the right hand of GOD. All •at come to GOD'S glory, must ascend on high, Psalm. 24.3. Who shall ascend into •e hill of the LORD? The Devil took CHRIST into a mountain, when he •ewed him the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them. So our Savior •oke his Apostles up into a mountain, when he shown them the kingdom of heaven, and glory of the world to come. Moses went up to a mountain, to speak with •e Lord: now the Lord goes up to a mountain, to speak with Moses.

The manner is set down, Matth. 17.2. He was transfigured before them, and his •ce did shine at the Sun, and his raiment was white as the light. Some are of opini•n, that this clarity was In aere circumfuso, non in corpore Dominico; In the air about •m, not in the body of Christ: But that that is false, for Himself was transfigured, •t the air about him. Some have said that his very substance was changed from •ortalitie to Immortality for the time. But that is false: for Transfiguration is •operly Transitus de figura ad figuram; from one figure to another: not De natura ⟨ϕ⟩ naturam; not from one nature to another. Some say, this Transition was not Secundum mutationem, sed secundum manifestationem; Not by any change into that which was not before, but by a manifestation of that which was (not revealed) before. These affirm, that CHRIST took from his mother an immortal and impassible body: but this is a most impossible opinion. How then could this ⟨ϕ⟩? If CHRIST reserved mortality, how was he capable of glory? If he took mortality, then was there a change of his substance. Neither, but only a change of his form. And why is this impossible to his miraculous hand? Qui cicatrices ostendit in corpore immortali, quare non splendorem in corpore mortali? He that could show his scars in a body immortal, why not also his glory in a body mortal? Luk. 9.29. The Fashion of his countenance was altered. There is a change, not of his Person, but of his look: nor yet is it said, Vultus, sed species vultus: not his Countenance, but the Fashion of his countenance: not Alia, sed altera, that is, Alterata. This was done by the Clarity that was in his body, ut in subjecto, as in the very subject. This splendor was Aliter in corpore, aliter in veste; After one manner in his body, after another ⟨ϕ⟩ his garment. In his body intrinsically & inhaesive, inherently: in his garment ⟨ϕ⟩ exteriori, & supereffuso candore; By an external whiteness poured upon it. His factus est sicut sol as the Sun. Sol est causa splendoris; The Sun is the cause of Shining; ascribing to Christ the greatest degree of splendor, that our understandings can apprehend. Non ut splendor solis, sed ut sol splendoris; Not as the brightness of the Sun, but as the Sun it self. His garments were white as the Light. Lumen causa candori. The light is the cause of whiteness, and whiteness is received and perceived by the benefit of light. Saint Mark says, they were white as snow; and what can be whiter? Thus our Lord Jesus put off his despicable form, wherein he was contemptible of the world; and the veil of his humble mortality, wherewith his glory was adorned: yet as he retained the same garments, so he put not off the same substance. Only he put Majesty upon his countenance, his habit, his whole body; that ⟨ϕ⟩ might give his Apostles a show of their future glory. So shall the faithful one day shine; as the Stars, Dan. 12.3. as the Sun, Matth. 13.43. For Christ shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like his own glorious body, Phil. 3.21.

The witnesses before whom this was done, were of two sorts: some that Christ took with him, others that met him. The Disciples he took with him were three, Peter, James, and John. Numerus in se perfectus, & in testando integer; A number able to give a sound and sufficient Testimony. Here two questions are moved; first, why Christ chose but three: secondly, why only these three. Why three and no more, why these three and no other? First, why but three? To show unto us, that Paci electi; Few are chosen: God doth not reveal his glorious mysteries to all; ⟨ϕ⟩ some whom his own good pleasure calleth and culleth out, Act. 10.41. God ⟨ϕ⟩ show him openly, not to all the people, but to us witnesses chosen before of God. Beside three can give a sufficient testimony, Deut. 19.15. Matth. 18.16. In the mouth of ⟨ϕ⟩ three witnesses every matter shall be established. Next, why these three, and none of the rest? 1. I do not answer with Feverdientius, because these three were Flos totius ⟨ϕ⟩ Christi, & Principes novi Testamenti; Because they were the flower and prime of a Christ's Apostles, and the Princes of the New Testament. I never read that Christ gave unto them any such prerogative or superexcellencie above the rest. 2. ⟨ϕ⟩ do I fetch an answer from the mystery of their names, with Gorrhan. He that will see the glory of God, must be a Peter, agnoscere per fidem, to acknowledge Christ $\langle \diamond \rangle$ faith: a James, supplantare peccatum, to supplant sin: a John, operari per gratiam, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ work good by the grace of God. For in these three, Credendo verum, extirpando malum, & operando bonum; To believe that is true, to root out that is evil, and to practice that is good; he placeth all perfection. 3. Nor yet do I answer, because these three were more eminent in virtue and graces than the rest. Three sorts $\langle \diamond \rangle$ men are qualified to see God: Such as love him, John. 14.21. If a man love me, I will love him, and Manifestabo ei meipsum; I will manifest myself to him. Such as are Humble, Matth. 11.25. Thou hast hid these things from the prudent, and hast $\langle \diamond \rangle$ them unto babes. Such as are of a pure heart, and clean life, Matth. 5.8. Blessed the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Psal. 50.23. To him that ordereth his corruption aright, will I show the salvation of God. These are all gracious qualities: and with them were the rest of the Apostles as truly sanctified, that were not here admitted. 4. What, was it then because Christ did love these three above the rest? $\langle \diamond \rangle$ his love was great to John; and therefore among all his honorable Titles, he mentioneth that ever in the first place; The Disciple whom Jesus loved. But his love to John was greater Extensive, non Intensive; by way of Extention, not by way of intention. He shown more signs of familiarity to him, than to the rest of the company: but he equally loved and prized them all. 5. Because the wisdom and unquestionable goodness of God chose them out, & secretioribus suis adhibuit, accepted them to the participation of his secrets. Thrice he called out those three, and made them witnesses to three great works. The first was to the raising of Iairus his daughter. Mark. 5.37. He suffered no man to follow him, save Peter, and James, and John. He did put forth the mourners, the musicians, the people, and left behind the rest of the Apostles; only these three he admitted. The next election was to this glorious transfiguration; singularly the same three again. The last was to his Agony in the Garden, Mark. 14.33. He charging his Disciples to stay, took with him Peter and James and John, and began to be sore amazed. He made them three particularly witnesses; in the first work, of his Power: in the second, of his Majesty: in the last, of his Agony. 6. Lastly, if men may give any reason of the Lord's actions, whose wisdom is unsearchable; I do not think that CHRIST chose them, because they were more excellent than the rest, but because they were rather more weak than the rest. It was subvenire infirmitati eorum, to help their infirmities, and to strengthen them in the assurance of their Master and Saviours glory.

The company that came from heaven, were Moses and Elias. Some have thought that these did not appear Vere & Personaliter, truly and personally; but Angels in their likeness: but that is a manifest error; for themselves appeared, not Angels in their multitude. Some are of another opinion, that they did not only appear personally, but that in their very bodies with their souls. Because it is said that Elias was taken up, and no man knew what became of Moses his body: which occasioned that dispute betwixt the Archangel and the devil. But it is most plain that the body of Moses was buried. Deut. 34.6. in a valley in the land of Moab, over against Bethpeor: though no man knoweth of his Sepulcher unto this day. Neither are all of that opinion, that the very body of Elias was taken up into heaven; some be persuaded, there is no human body in heaven, but the body of our Lord JESUS only. John. 13. No man hath ascended up into heaven, but he that came down from heaven. But there it is questioned, why did Moses and Elias appear, rather than David and Abra•am, from whose loins CHRIST JESUS came and who were so famous among the people? Reasons.

To omit, that those three great fasters met together, Moses, Elias, and CHRIST: each of them having fasted forty days, and forty nights.

1 To manifest a difference between the Lord and the servants. Moses and Eli•s were of high esteem with the Jews, CHRIST not regarded, a man of no •epute among them; therefore he would now show that he was the Lord, and they •ut the servants to wait upon him. That he was not Elias, but the God of Elias:•ot Jeremiah, but he that sanctified Jeremiah: not unus ex Prophetis, one of the Prophets, •ut the Lord of the Prophets, that sent them.

2 If it be granted that Moses was dead, and that Elias died not: this declareth •at CHRIST is the Savior of both quick and dead: whether of men living with Elias, or dead as Moses. To manifest that he hath the power both of life and •eath; Adducitur Moses mortuus, & Elias vivus; both living Elias, and dead Moses•re brought; both saved by this Jesus Christ.

3 To come nearer home; Moses was called the Law-giver, and Elias was (af•er a sort) the Law restorer; now the Jews traduced CHRIST for a Law-brea•er. Their common Imputation against him was, that he transgressed the Law, and •as contrary to the Prophets. Therefore he was content to be put to his purgation •nd to Iustifie himself. Matth. 5.17. Think not that I am come to destroy the Law or •e Prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill. And for a further testimony of •is Moses that brought the Law, and Elias that revived the Law, witness that he •as obedient to the Law. Gal. 4.4. God sent forth his Son made of a woman made un•er the Law to redeem them that were under the Law.

4 They meet that brought the Law, with CHRIST that brought the Gospel; to show that Law and Gospel must be joined together. But we are freed by CHRIST from the Law? I answer, there is a double obligation of the Law: the obligation of penalty, and the obligation of duty. We are freed from the obligation of penalty, but not from the obligation of duty. 2 Tim. 2.19. Let everyone that nameth the Name of CHRIST, depart from iniquity. He hath taken from the Law. Damnandi potestutem, all power to condemn us: but not Dominandi autoritatem, all power to rule us. We must still serve God according to his Law, or he will ⟨◇⟩ save us according to his Gospel. Our faith in the Lord JESUS, and our obedience to the Law, must be joined together: as Moses and CHRIST met upon the mountain. John. 1.17. The Law was given by Moses, but grace and truth come by Jesus Christ.

5 To show that this was the true Messias, to whom both Law and Prophets bare witness. Moses in the Law, as it is cited by Saint Peter, Act. 3.22. A Prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you among your brethren, like unto me: him shall ye hear in all things. And Elias instead of all the Prophets, who was Prophetarum clarissimus, the clearest of all the Prophets. Now Suspecta est veritas, quae sola se •••tur, Ambr. That truth is suspected, which barely testifieth of it self. Therefore as CHRIST had three witnesses from the earth; Peter, James, and John. So he ⟨◇⟩ three from heaven; the voice of the Father, Moses and Elias. That now he which fulfilled both the Testaments, might enjoy both the Testimonies.

6 Lastly, CHRIST proposed two such famous men, as Moses and Elias to his Apostles for patterns: that their spirits might be well tempted in them. Moses •i•mitissimus, a man most meek on the earth: Elias a man exceeding zealous. Twice he doubles this testimony of himself. 1 King. 19.10.14. I have been very jealous for the Lord of hosts. He had such a sacred fire of zeal in his heart upon earth, that God advanced him in a chariot of fire into heaven. Therefore are these two brought hither, that the Apostles might learn to mixe Moses his meekness, with Elias his ferventnesse. Yet this rare and excellent composition they forgot, Luk. 9.54, When they could not be entertained in a Samaritan village, say James and John; (and that as it seems, not long after their descending from the mount.) Lord, wilt thou that we command fire from heaven to consume them, as Elias did! There they thought of Elias, but forgot Moses: they had too much of the ones fire, but too little of the others water: zeal enough, but without the mercy of meekness. Again at the apprehension of CHRIST, when Peter denied him, and all the rest fled from him; there they had too much of Moses, but forgot the spirit of Elias: they had meekness enough, but wanted zeal: both together make a good temper.

The event or consequents of this transfiguration, are these. First, the testimony of the Father from heaven; which came out of a bright cloud overshadowing them. ⟨◇⟩ was from a cloud, saith Chrysostom, that they might the more confidently receive ⟨◇⟩ for the voice of God, qui solitus loqui Patribus in nube; who was wont to speak to their fathers in a cloud. This is my beloved Son, &c. They could formerly see his mother poor, his supposed father laboring for his living, CHRIST himself hungry, thirsty, weary, despised. Therefore now they hear a voice from heaven to make amends for all: recompensing his supposed baseness, with Attributes of great glory. God speaking that to him, which he never spake to any; This is my Son. Not to the Angels, Heb. 1.5. Unto which of the Angels said he at any time, That ⟨◇⟩ my Son? Christ was shortly to die, and to suffer hard and unjust usage of his enemies; and all this in humility to bear. Therefore now he shows Potentiam ⟨◇⟩ passionem, gloriam ante injuriam, honorem suum ante horrorem suum: his power before his passion, his glory before his injury, his honor before he come to feel his horror. That when they should afterwards see him taken, bound, scourged, Sco•••, crucified, buried; they might then know and say, that this was effected not ⟨◇⟩ potentiam eorum, sed propter patientiam suam; not by reason of their power over him but by reason of his patience under them: not because they could inflict it, but because he would suffer it. Non miseranda necessitate, sed miserante voluntate: not by a miserable necessity, but by his own gracious mercy.

Another event was Saint Peters counsel. The point whereof Moses and Elias•onferred with CHRIST, was De Excessu ejus, concerning his decease, which •e should accomplish at Jerusalem. Peter hearing this news of his masters death and •hat by the testimony of two such famous Prophets: he thinks it good to provide •etimes for his safety. Such a course he had formerly attempted. Matth. 16.22. •ee it far from thee Lord, this shall not be unto thee. But CHRIST'S rebuke was •en so sharp, Get thee behind me Satan; that Peter durst no more in plain terms, •dvice him again to that favoring of himself. Therefore now he doth it aenigma•ce, covertly, and by involved insinuation. Lord, it is good for us to be here: we are •ow in a safe place; a mountain high, sure, solitary, pleasant: guarded by the come•any of two such potent men; a cloud to compass; us glory to sustain us, delight 〈◇〉 content us. Let us tarry here, where no harm can find us out. Were it not •adnesse to leave a place of such security, and expose thyself to the fury of thine •dversaries? It is good to be here: but alas it was his error: for if this were to have •eene a permanent and durable glory; Peter should not have called for Tabernacles,•ut for mansions. Let us build here three Tabernacles, moveable tilths? No; fun•amentall and constant habitations. Quid dicis Petre? mundus perit, & tu montem •tis, Aug. Doth the whole world perish, and must fire burn it all, and callest •ou only for a mountain? His error was both ways culpable: either to seek in •ia Patriam, or in patria Tabernaculum; his country in the way, or a Tabernacle in •is country. If he knew this to be but the earth, why doth he seek for heaven up•n it? if he took this to be heaven, why doth he call for an earthen Tabernacle? •ne for thee, another for Moses, &c. Why not, one for me, another also for James,•nd John? No, he mentions none for them, for he hoped that CHRIST himself would be their Tabernacle. Triaquaeris, factria, Bed. Thou seekest three, make •hree, one for the Father, another for the Son, another for the Holy Ghost; none •or Moses, none for Elias: do not join the Servants with the Creator. Mystically •here be still three Tabernacles: Exterius, Ecclesia: Interius, Conscientia: Superius, •aelestis Patria. One outward, which is the Church: another inward, which is the •onscience: the last upward, which is the kingdom of heaven. Let us dwell faith•ully in the former, let God dwell spiritually in the other; that we may all dwell to•ether comfortably in the latter; that is forever in the peace of glory.

Lastly, this glorious vision and voice from heaven, amazed the Disciples; that •hey fell on their face, and were sore afraid. CHRIST with the Touch of his hand •ecovered them; And when they had lift up their eyes, they saw no man save Jesus only, Matth. 17.8. Because indeed he was that Person only, to whom both Law and Pro•hets bare witnesses. They have done their office, and then they vanish, that Christ •ay be all in all. There is only one mediator, Christ: it is he only that satisfies •he Law, and sanctifies the conscience: he only, that reconciles us to God. Let Moses and Elias, and all others disappear to the work of our salvation; Da modo •bis Iesum; Only give us Jesus Christ. This testimony they heard, but might not •resently utter, for Christ forbad them. Tell the vision to no man, until the Son 〈◇〉 man be risen again from the dead, Matth. 17.9. The reasons of this interdiction •ay be. 1. Because the Jews were to have no sign, but the sign of the Prophet •nas: they had seen enough to leave their unbelief without excuse. 2. Because •mong the rude, after the publication of such a glory, Crux scandalum pareret, the fol•owing Cross would have bred scandal. If he were invested with such glory, why •old he not keep himself in it. 3. Because till his resurrection had made way for 〈◇〉, the world would never have given credit to this wonder. But perceiving his •ower in raising himself from the dead, they might easily embrace the faith of that •arification. Lastly, according to that, Eccl. 11.28. Neminem laudaveris ante mortem; Judge no man blessed before his death. Then they witnessed it, then they preached it, then they wrote it, we hear it, let us all believe it, that we may one day enjoy it, in the everlasting kingdom of Jesus Christ.

I conclude; Peter and the rest knew Moses and Elias on the mount, whom they never saw before: they being departed many hundred years before the other were borne. Yet Mosen ab Elia, Eliam a Mose, utrumque a Christo potuerunt discernere. They could distinguish one from another; and say, this is Moses, this is Elias, and that is Christ. This is a lively type and shadow of that glory in heaven; where every Saint shall perfectly know all. Not Abraham nor any of the Patriarchs, not David nor any of the Kings, not Elias nor any of the Prophets, not Peter nor any of the Apostles, not Stephen nor any of the Martyrs, not any of our friends, kindred, acquaintance, none of the now unknown believers scattered on the face of the broad earth shall in that place be stranger to us. Our knowledge shall extend to every individual person: all shall know everyone, and everyone shall know all. Now let us love one another, pray for one another, do good one to another; then and there we shall know one another, and all be eternally known and loved of our blessed God.

VERSE 19. We have also a more sure word of Prophecy, whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts.

The Apostle had formerly delivered a certain truth: such as both their ears had heard, and their eyes seen: and by many strong arguments confirmed it. Yet because the Jews to whom he wrote, did much adhere to the Prophets, he refers them thither; to compare the events manifested, with their predictions. As if he did answer a challenge, with Paul to his Corinthians; Since ye seek a proof of Christ; You shall have one more; in it self profitable, and to you plausible, a word of Prophecy. That as Festus said to Paul, Act. 25.12. Hast thou appealed unto Caesar? unto Caesar thou shalt go. So Appellastisne Prophetas? •ad Prophetas ibitis: have you appealed to the Prophets? to the Prophets you shall go. They also shall witness to you the same Christ.

You see, the Apostle comes to a new manner of testifying the former truth. We have a word. A word, what's this? so we had before. Nay, but a word of Prophecy. Why, what strength hath this above the other? Yes, it is more sure. Well say it be more sure, what is this to us? we heard it not. Yes we have it, visible to our •yes. But men may have it, and not regard it: as the Indians that were owners of all he gold, yet were the poorest beggars. Nay, but we take heed to it, attend it. Say we should, is this a thing so commendable? may we not rest satisfied with your word and assertion, that saw these things? Nay, but Bene facitis attendants, Ye die very well in taking heed to it. Well, say we should observe it, what shall we find it to be? Not an obscure and involved matter, as it was before the completion; but a light. What need have we of a light, that live in the broad day of knowledge? Nay, but the world is full of darkness; and in a dark place a light is comfortable. But this may be some dim candle, that can cast us no rays or beams of illumination: No, it is a Shining light: like John the Baptist, a burning and a shining light. A light that shineth in a dark place. How long shall this light continue? Untill the day dawn, till the glorious presence of our Lord Jesus Christ be fully manifested to us and that we see no longer through a window or spectacles of faith; but behold with clear eyes the Sun himself. We shall then say of this light of knowledge here, compared with that; as John the Baptist said of himself compared with Christ; He must increase, but I must decrease, John. 3.30. Or as Paul, 1 Cor. 13.10. When that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away. Then that same Day star of blessedness shall arise, and tell us that the night is quite past, the day is come, the Sun of righteousness appears, and that we shall appear with him in glory. Let us all therefore first walk faithfully in the light of grace, that we may walk joyfully in the light of glory forever.

We have also a more sure word, &c. The whole verse may be distinguished into four general parts:

- A Conference; wherein he compares the Prophetical prediction, with the Evangelical predication; ascribing to it some greater certainty; We have a more sure word of Prophecy.
- A Reference, whereto he refers their scrutation, and commends their attention; Whereunto you do well that ye take heed.
- A Preference, wherein he prefers that excellent light to the common darkness of the world. For the comparison is not between the Prophetical and Evangelical light; but between the light of the Scripture, and the darkness of nature. As unto a light that shineth in a dark place.
- A Difference; wherein he gives that future day light a transcendancy to the former candlelight: that being but like a lamp in a dark night, this like a star that brings in the day. Until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts.

The word of Prophecy.] There are four sorts of Prophets. 1. Some write of things past, as Moses. In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth: penning an Hexameron many years after the world was made. The Samaritan woman hearing Christ relate unto her the things which he had done, concluded; Sir, I perceive that thou art a Prophet, John. 4.19. 2. Some prophecy of things to come. As God foretold by the mouth of his holy Prophets. Those did Dicere facta, these Praedicere facienda: the one was a relation, the other a prediction. 3. Some prophecy of things present: such a Prophet was old Simeon, whose eyes saw that present salvation. Thus John the Baptist was a Prophet, and more than a Prophet. A Prophet, because he did point him out with the finger that was all the Prophets aim: Behold the Lamb of God. More than a Prophet, because he baptized Dominum Prophetarum, the Lord of the Prophets, Ier. 4. Those that expound the Prophets: an Evangelical Preacher is called a Prophet. 1 Cor. Chapter 14. Verse 1. Desire spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophecy. Chap. 13.9. We know in part, and we prophecy in part. He that interprets the Prophets, is called a Prophet, Aquin. But here the Apostle intends principally that sort, which foretold future things. Some of their words were more dark, some more plain. Daniel and John wrote darkly: the reason is given, because they wrote in times of persecution. So that if they had done otherwise, themselves and their books had been burned. The events were the clearest expositions of them. It is the property of a Prophecy, Compleri priusquam intelligi, to be fulfilled before it be understood, Augustine.

A Prophet is called of the Hebrews, Naba, vates: and Roeh, videns, a seer. Of the Grecians, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : such as did foresee and foretell the purposes of God. Of the Latins, Vates, that is Fates: for Vaticinatio, is Faticinatio, Fatum canere, to preindicate an inevitable event. The words they spake, come to them Ex divino afflatu, by a divine instinct. Numb. 24.13. I cannot go beyond the commandment of the Lord: but what he saith, that will I speak. So soon as ever the Lord had appeared to Samuel, presently the people took notice of him for a Prophet. 1 Sam. 3.20. All Israel knew that Samuel was established to be a Prophet of the Lord. They cannot know God's will in future things, but by his relation or revelation. Psal. 139.6. Such knowledge is too wonderful for me: it is high, I cannot attain unto it. A vision of their own heads, a fiction of their own brains, were accursed. He that coines money out of base metal, though he stamp upon it the image of the Prince, is a traitor. So is he, that to his own invention shall put a Dicit Dominus, the Lord spake it. The prediction that comes not by divine instruction, is but a delusion: for none can praenoscere, fore-know; but he that did proponere, forepurpose.

Devills and men may guess by observation, and collection of causes probable to beget such events: only God knows, Esa. 45.11. Ask of me things to come. If men could tell as much, aequiparent Iovi, they would be even with God. How wise were God, if he should write the secrets of his will on the top of his gate, the doors of heaven! yet your Astrologer presumes, Ex stellis, tanquam tot stillis & literis: ex syderibus tanquam tot syllabis: ex constellationibus, tanquam tot verborum conjunctionibus: to know all things by the heavens: as if the stars were so many letters, the planets syllables, and the constellations express sentences. So they make the whole heaven a Syntaxis or discourse of God's purpose. Will any King engross the secrets of his Counsel on the door of his Palace? That late character which was set on the brow of heaven, did certainly mean the world some news. But who could undertake to translate the letters of it, or expound the meaning? To break into God's Counsel chamber, will be dangerous treason: only the hand that wrote it, can interpret it. If men could by their own wisdom prophecy; they were not only Sapientiores filiis lucis. Luk. 16.8. Wiser than the children of light: but as wise as Ipsa lux, even self. The very devills that hover in the air, (uti Adam prope suum Eden, like Adam who being cast out of Eden, dwelt so near it as he could) and by reason of their vicinitie to the stars, can read them better than mortal men, sundered from us so far as earth: yet are they all dunces in respect of Prophecy. They can tell you what may happen, never what will happen. Therefore they delivered their oracles in a doubtful and bastard language: that if the event did not answer the prediction, they might then expound the prediction according to the event. Only God can make Prophets, and put into their mouths the foretelling of future things. Ezek. Son of man, I have made thee a watch man over the house of Israel: therefore hear the word at my mouth, and give them warning from me. It is God that speaks in ore Prophetarum, by the mouth of his holy Prophets, which have been ever since the world began. He speaks by the Prophets for the good of our souls, let us hear his Prophets for the honor of his holy name.

A more sure word of Prophecy.] 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . Why, was not the Apostolical Testimony sure enough? could there be more than ocular and articular witness? The Prophets foretold what they never saw, the Apostles saw what they told. Besides, did not one and the same God speak by them both? Hebr. 1.1. conferred with, Matth. 10.20. plainly demonstrates: that the same God who spake unto the Fathers by the Prophets; spakes also by the Apostles, For it is not yet that speak, but the spirit of your Father which speaketh in you. How then can this be Certior Sermo, a more sure word. Seeing the Prophets be a dark lantern, which himself here confesseth hard to be understood. This point hath troubled many expositors: it was some trouble to me to find it, let it be no trouble to you to read it.

1 Some answer, that here a comparative is put for a positive; More sure, for Sure: or for a superlative: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, for 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉; more sure, for Surest. A place is instanced, Act. 25.10. Paul cleared himself to Festus; To the Jews I have done no wrong, as thou very well knowest. The word is not 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, but 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉; not Well, but Better: the comparative for the positive; as Thou better knowest. This same Enallage graduum is not rare among the Greeks and Latins. The French write Tresnoble for Noble: we Most Honorable, for Honorable: and some, To my Worthyer friend, for Worthy. But this answer satisfies not: for first I do not see but that speech of Paul might very well be translated, as Thou better knowest. For Festus being a Roman Judge did better know, that Paul had not done nothing against the Roman Laws, than could the Jews. But it is objected, that Paul appeals to Festus his knowledge, that to the Jews he had done no wrong. True, and why might not the Judge better discern of the cause than the Plaintiff? Every man is well affected to his own cause, and the Jews were blinded with malice, charging Paul with many things, but proving nothing. Festus therefore seeing their malice, and Paul's innocence; did better know that he had done them no wrong, than themselves. Besides the Context manifestly intends a comparison; it must be admitted Certior sermo, to be a more sure word.

2 Beda, with some other, answer; that this may be a Surer word, not simply and absolutely; but in respect of the Gentiles: who might haply calumniate the vision of the Apostles, but durst not the oracles of the Prophets. As if Peter should say; You may perhaps doubt that particular sight we had in secret, but none will contradict the Prophecies manifested in public. Infidels being so well acquainted with Necromancie, might ascribe this voice to magick. As Psaphon was accepted of the Lybians for a great God, because certain birds had been first taught to sing this lesson, and afterwards being let loose into the air, did sing it; Magnus deus Psaphon. Or as Mahomet got the reputation of a great saving prophet, by a Pigeon trained to come to his ear, and there pick out corn, which his credulous followers believed to be the conference of the Holy Ghost: and by a Bull taught and tamed to carry the Alchoran on his horns. To prevent any such suspicion here, the Prophets are brought in, who did fore-tell all these things long before Christ came himself. Nunquid Magus Christus antequam natus? Could Christ be a Magician before he was borne? Thus there was a Celestial Word, whereby believers are confirmed: and a Prophetical Word whereby unbelievers are convinced. But this answer falls also short of satisfaction: for Saint Peter wrote not to Infidels, but to Believers; such as had already embraced the truth of the Gospel.

3 There is another Solution. Aquin. Lyranus. Hugo, Catharinus, Calv. The Apostle speaks this in respect of the Jews unto whom he wrote. Here the truth of the Gospel is proved by a double testimony: Patris Elogio, Prophetarum vaticinio; by the assertion of God, and by the prediction of the Prophets. Now this were an absurd thing to imagine, that the Prophetical witness should be Surer than the Divine and Paternal. First, because their Word did merely depend upon the authority of the same God. Secondly, because Christ's coming had performed what they promised. Now if either of the two can challenge the greater firmness, it is the latter:

for let a promise be never so sure, yet the performance is surer. Cedant dicta factis; It could not be more sure in their Prophecy that Christ should come, than in the Apostles sight that he was come. Coram quem quaeritis adsum; He came unto his own, he dwelt among us; there could be nothing surer; than he only promised, now he hath paid the debt. Well yet, albeit God's Testimony were most sure with the Apostles, yet the Prophets Word was more sure with the Jews. They knew them to be the lawful Ministers of God, they were brought up in their Schools; of their words there was no suspicion. His avi, atavi confiderunt: & vetustas ipsa aliquid reverentiae secum trahit; Antiquity it self challengeth reverence. God here said, This is my beloved Son: This they had read before in the Prophets, Psalm. 2.7. I will declare the decree: the LORD hath said unto me, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee, Thus was it a Surer Word, not in it own nature, nor to the Apostles, but to the Jews. To this consents Augustine; Certiozem dici, non meliorem, non veriorem; It is not said to be Better, nor Truer, but only Surer. This testimony was as good as that, as true, as useful: but in this respect, that is surer, because it makes more strongly to confirm such hearers. If you will not believe me, have recourse to your Prophets, John. 5.39. Search the Scriptures, they all testify of JESUS CHRIST.

4 Some by this Word of Prophecy would understand only the preaching and writing of the Gospel: and extend it all no further than Evangelical prophecy. But the Context will not bear such an exposition, for the Apostle speaks of fore-written Prophecies, Vers. 20. Prophecy of the Scripture.

5 Some would have this Word of prophecy, to be the very testimony of the Father concerning his Son. But there is no such trajection of phrases in the Scripture. We find Christ to be called the Prophet of God, not God to be the Prophet of Christ.

6 Some read it thus, More sure than the Prophets; in the Genitive case plural: but no Copy so hath it.

7 Bradford resolved it thus, in his answer to this, among other questions put to him by the Papists. That the Apostles in this did humble themselves; as if men not giving credit to their private testimony, would yet with all reverence receive the Prophets. But if they should thus disable themselves, who would believe them? whereas, they were to write Iure Apostolico.

8 Lastly, the answer that seems to me most probable and profitable; and wherein I have few or none before me, doubtless many will follow me; is this. The foundation is ever more surer than the building: that being sound, though the edifice it self should fall, will firmly stand. Now the New Testament was not yet written; I mean the Gospel of the four Evangelists: nor was it collected into a volume till eight and twenty years after. But the Prophets were extant, and their writings miraculously preserved: these the Jews readily had, and might peruse at their pleasure. Therefore the mere and naked report of Christ's glory on the Mountain, was not so sure as the Prophecy inspired by God, and engraven in the tables of their hearts. And this authentical proof was the surest, until the day did fully dawn, and the divine hand had made the Gospel known and visible. Thus were the things related never so true in themselves, the question here is not concerning the Truenesse, but the Surenesse:

and certainly thus far, the Scriptures of the Prophets were surer to the Jews, than the unwritten doctrines of the Apostles, or the naked delivery of their particular visions.

Now whatsoever may be said for exception. That the Prophets had only involved promises, not understood till they were fulfilled. In a promise there are many doubts: men's minds may change, occasions divert, their power be defective: but in a performance there is nothing wanting: now the Gospel was established by the ministry of the Senses. It is true that in the Scripture, there is no difference concerning the truth and certainty of all places and parts of it: but there may be some difference in the material and formal parts: for things may be more plainly, more comfortably set down in one place than in another. Therefore Augustine gives this praise to the Gospel, in allusion to that miracle of turning the water into wine, John. 2. That Christ did turn the Prophetical water, into Evangelical wine. There have been some, that through disability to clear this doubt in my Text, have thrust the whole Epistle out of the Canon; and it was four hundred years almost, before it was received, as Eusebius testifies. This was like Alexander, when he could not undo the Gordian knot, to cut it. That was to make quick, but sacrilegious dispatch. There is no such need; to put out the light, because we are blind and cannot see it.

But to conclude plainly; Christ had not yet gotten so much credit with the Jews, as had their Prophets: for their common opinion was, that all Jesus did was by Magicke. This they expressly objected, when he had cast out a devil, Mat. 12.24. This fellow doth cast out devils, but by Beelzebub the prince of the devils. And when the voice of such a glorious testimony came from heaven; ^h The people that stood by, and heard it, said, that it thundered. They would not believe it to be the voice of the Father. Do you speak of a voice from heaven? Who heard it? Do you tell us of his rising from the dead? who saw him? Therefore the Apostle refers them to the Prophets, those Ancients: whose Word was (as it were) the foundation of the Gospel, Ephes. 2.20. We are built upon the foundation of the Prophets, as well as of the Apostles: the same Jesus Christ, the Center of them both, being the chief corner-stone. Now the foundation is surer than the house: antiquity, the foundation, is more surely received. Thus the Scriptures of the Prophets stop the mouth of the Jews, who referred all the actions of Christ to a bad spirit. We call that most sure, that can give best satisfaction to the scholar: we are late reporters, but the Prophets are ancient. Therefore their Word is certiùs judicio vestro, surer in your judgment, though not in it self, Aug. Christ is an infinite mass of gold, but they were so tired with expectation, that when it came, they were not able to finger the money; therefore he refers them to the Prophets; that comparing both these together, they might be more assured.

To conclude. All this doth serve to manifest that usual government, whereby God will guide his Church: this is not by visions, but by the Word. He hath appointed us to be sons and daughters of Faith, not of Sense. He that will not believe without a miracle, is himself a miracle: yea, and it will be a miracle, if ever he be saved. When that Rich-man in hell requested a Sign for his brethren, he was answered; If they hear not Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead. Thus the Prophets had the more Sure Word, until the Gospel was written. But now it being written, let us ask for no shadows, that have the Substance: demand we no signs, that have Jesus Christ.

Amore sure Word of Prophecy.] this may seem to ascribe some more credit to the Prophets, than to the Gospel? No, they were all written by divers men, in divers ages, at divers places, on divers occasions: yet eadem veritas, eadem autoritas; they all have the same truth, the same authority. Though the Jews acknowledge the Old Testament, abhor the new: though Turks disclaim both, Atheists despise both, sinners neglect both: yet as the Disciples had but one Master, and were all brothers: so the books have but one Father, and they are all sisters. One Lord is original and Subject of them, one Spirit indited them, one blood of the Lamb sealed them, one truth is maintained in them, one Spouse of Christ hath with an impartial respect equally received them, and miraculously preserved them: and rather than any rent or maim should be made in their sacred body, she hath sent her members dismembered, and bereft of their dearest blood, into heaven. These are the Gages of our Savior's love, God's royal Covenants, the oracles of his Sanctuary, the key of his revealed Councils, milk from his sacred breast, the light of our eyes, the joy of our hearts, the pillars of our faith, the anchor of our hope, the evidences and deeds of our eternal blessedness. It is true that one Star differs from another in glory, and the rule of the day is given to the Sun, of the night to the Moon. The Captains of the sons of God may hear an unequal report, 1 Chro. 12.14. The least could resist an hundred; the greatest, a thousand. And no wrong was done in that Anthem, 1 Sam. 18.7. Saul hath slain his thousand, and David his ten thousand. One Plato may be more of value, than a thousand vulgar men: and our Savior prefers the old wine to the new, Luke 5.39. The old is better. But the whole Scripture, as it came by the inspiration of one Author, so it preserves the equality of one honor. Moses is no better than Samuel, Samuel than David, David than Solomon, the father than the son: David a King, than Amos an heard-man, Peter first chosen, than Paul borne our of due time. Some portion of it sometimes, lend more useful application to our souls: but all of it is like Manna, which rellisheth to every faithful conscience, as his heart desireth. Oile is best at the bottom, wine at the midst, milk at the top; but the Fountain-water is all alike. This is the Spring-water of life; clear, cooling, healthful, helpful in every part. One part is not surer than another, but all is so sure, that it is sealed by him that is Yea and Amen: These words are true and faithful. They are Sure in God's promise, Sure in Christ performance, may they be Sure in our believing hearts forever!

We have a more sure Word.] I come to the third Circumstance, the Persons to whom these Prophecies were committed: the Apostle joining himself with the Jews; We have. The Jews might well attend to the word of Prophecy, for they Had it. They had many privileges, but this was the chiefest, Rom. 3.2. What advantage hath the Jew? or what profit is there of Circumcision? Much every way: but chiefly, because unto them were committed the oracles of God They had the Patriarchs, the Sacraments, the Sacrifices, the Promise of the Messias; but Chiefly the oracles, as comprehending all the rest, Act. 7.38. Moses received the lively oracles, to give unto us. He received oracula viva, the lively oracles: to what purpose? To give unto us; we have them. They were not Alienae rei deposita, but their own proper treasure. And indeed they were faithful keepers of them, preserving them from falsity and corruption: and to this day servant, etsi non observant; they keep them in custody, though they keep them not in obedience. Therefore in our Savior's days, when many corruptions both of life and doctrine were objected against them; yet they were not charged to be falsifiers of the Scripture. Therefore well might the Apostle say, We have them: for to them pertain the Covenants, Ro. 9.4. To them it was credited, to them it pertained, they had it, they kept it, and from them we receive it. Lex e Zion: Out of Zion shall go forth the Law, and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem. So Christ himself testified; Salvation is of the Jews. This was Paul's Farewell to them, able to have melted their hearts, who had been keepers of that sacred Word of so many hundred years. It was necessary that the Word of God should first be spoken to you: but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life: Loe we turn to the Gentiles.

Thus they had, but now they have lost; not the Letter, but the Spirit and life of this prophetic Word. Deus misit, Iudaeus amisit; God gave it, and they lost it. And as it is fit, he that condemns the Sun, should not have a Star to light him: so they that refused Solem justitiae, that Sun of righteousness; should not retain Lumen Prophetiae, the light of Prophecy. Esau hath sold his Birth-right to Jacob: the Jews are to us Christians; Imprecatores in cordibus, suffragatores in codicibus: Enemies in their hearts, but friends in their books. They have only the word prophesying, we have the word prophesied: they the Prophetic shadow, we the Evangelical truth, Jesus Christ. This Word is now devolved to us, we have it, Rom. 15.4. Whatsoever things were written afore-time, were written for our learning; that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope. The letter for our eyes, the history for our tongues, the mystery for our heads, the comfort of all for our hearts. God grant we never inherit the sins of the Jews, with the Scriptures of the Jews. Like Gehazi, that could not take Naaman's money, but must also take his Leprosy. Or Nadab, that succeeded Iereboam, both in his Crown, and in his sin. Or as Satan offered Christ, Glory, but Idolatry withal. No, the Lord that hath given us their light, keep us forever from their darkness! We will be content with Esau's Birth-right and his Blessing, we will none of his Profaneness. While these Oracles were with them, they were like jewels in an infected house, or the precious stone in the Toads forehead, we might say of them, as it was proverbied of Galba's wit; Ingenium Galbae male habitat; the Romans loved his policy, but not his company. The Prophets foretold things they could not see, the Jews beheld things they would not see. Our Savior made distinction between the Pharisees doctrines and doings: whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do: but day not after their works. So we say to them still; Give us your doctrines, we will none of your deeds: you rejected that Jesus Christ, whom your prophecies teach us to embrace. When a debosh'd Limner had drawn an exquisite Piece, many desired the picture, but all disdained the Painter. Pulchrum hominem pinxisti Pictor fadus; The Jews had verbum propheticum, the word of prophecy: not fidem propheticam, the faith of prophecy. They were the most miserable men, for whose sake there was so much cost and pains to make them happy. God in his good time turn their hearts: that Sanguis essu simit, which was to them Sanguis Confusionis; The blood of Christ which they shed, may be to their seed Sanguis Perfusionis, the blood of redemption. That they may be saved by him, whom their Fathers condemned; Jesus Christ.

And for us, let us remember Saint Paul's caution, Rom. 11.20. Because of unbelief they were broken off, by faith thou standest: Be not high minded, but fear. We have the same means to be saved, yet we see it is no impossible thing to go to hell. Micah thought himself so sure, when he had got a Levite to his Priest, that God must needs bless him, Judge. 17.13. So we think it enough to have the Bible in our house: yet we may come to complain, as Micah to the Danites; Ye have taken away all that I have. Or as Christ threatened the Jews; The kingdom of heaven shall be taken from you, and given to nations that will bring forth answerable fruits. Or you shall call the fruit of your sin, as Phineas wife called the fruit of her womb; Ichabod, because the glory is departed from you, 1 Sam. 4.22. If the naked habit of the truth in our understanding, or approbation; vel sensu, vel assensu; could save men; who would go to hell? We see it, we know it, we confess it, we profess it, we do it not. Those are wretched and perverse men, and show that the Sacramental water was spilled on their faces; that curse the Scriptures, and bless their sins. That had rather (Execrare legem, quàm emendare vitam; and O disse praecepta, potius quàm vitia;) cast the law behind their backs, then not foster their lusts in their bosoms. I hope there are few so bad; but, O that men were so good, as truly to expound the Prophets by their lives. A Christians good conversation, is the Scriptures best Comment and exposition. We do expound them in our words, do you expound them in your works. Be you a counterpaine to that blessed original: O that their lines, and our lives, did consort and match together. God hath given the Word of life to us, O let him find the life of the Word in us.

But alas! this is our fault: we have the Scripture in our houses, we have it in our Churches, we have it in our hands, we have it not in our hearts. What shall we answer to the Lord for all his means to make us good? Our God is good, our time is good, our health is good, our peace is good, our truth is good, our preaching good, all good; we are not good. We have this Word, we have it to show: so that evil servant had his talent, and he could show his talent. We call it our Evidence of God's favor toward us: and we dare say, By this we know that thou favourest us, Psal. 41.11. It is an evidence that God doth love us, let it not be an evidence whereby he shall judge us. All is made ours, saith Paul: The Prophets ours, the Evangelists ours, the Apostles ours, the Fathers ours, the Promises ours, the Sacraments ours, things present ours, things to come ours: O let us be Christ's, for Christ is God's. They were written for our learning, they are preached for our living: let us believe them with resolution, and obey them to our salvation, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

Whereunto ye do well that ye take heed.] I come to the Second General, which we called the Reference. Seeing this Word of Prophecy is so Sure and authentical, that no exception can be taken to the truth of it; I refer you to it. Try and peruse it: you shall find it speaking the same, that you have heard from us. There is no disparity in their Prediction, and our Predication: in their Sic erit, So it shall be, and our Sic est, So it is. The Apostles argument is strongly persuasive: all men will give affiance to a Sure thing; but the Word of Prophecy is sure: therefore let us adhere to it. What he propounds, is by demonstration: what he assumes, is by concession: what he concludes is by justillation. Attendite certo, Give heed to a thing that is Sure. There is no worldly thing sure, yet Attendimus his, we give heed to such things.

No riches: God so hedged Job in on every side, and made such a sense about him, that the Devil himself knew not where to break in upon him, Job 1.10. Yet the Lord again took down the pale, and Job became poor to a proverb. Yet to wealth we take heed our eyes are still open to watch it, our hands open to catch it: and when we have it, we house it: with as great affection, as the Spouse did her beloved. Cant 3.4. I held him, and would not let him go, until I had brought him into my mothers house, and into the chamber of her that conceived me. Men hold it, and will not let it go, but rather bury it in the earth, Domo matris suae, that house of their mother. The covetous, as if they would revenge Corahs death, seek to swallow up the earth, that swallowed up him. But alas, they take need to a thing most unsure. Antequam cupidus aliquid lucrife cerit, seipsum perdidit, Aug. Before the covetous man can gain anything, he loseth himself. Therefore Paul charged Timothy, to charge us. 1 Tim. 6.17. That we put not our trust in uncertain or unsure riches. If we do, we are sure to be deceived.

Pleasure is not sure; alas nothing is more unsure. Not only in respect of continuation, but even of present fruition. It is a question whether the carnal man doth truly joy, when he smiles: or whether a merry heart he declared by a jesting language. For there is a joy like Romney marsh: in summer of prosperity bad, in winter of affliction mad, never good. Prov. 14. Verse 13. Even in laughter the heart is sorrowful: and the end of that mirth is heaviness: gone, ere you can say, It is here.

Honor is not sure, it comes with a breath, and goes with a breath, and goes with a breath: as a boy that can blow up a bubble unto air, and presently blow it into air. Caesar goes an Emperor to the Senate, is brought a corpse home. Pompey was great, yet he was beg'd. Opiniative honors are like curious peals on the bells, rung with changes: there may be sweet music in the change, but they are presently out of it. The devil taking CHRIST up into a high mountain. Luk. 4.5. Showed him all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time. In a moment? How all the kingdoms of the earth should be shown in a moment, is a question and wonder; though one stood in the body of the Sun. Therefore this must be done by representation; which is indeed more capable of admiration, than of demonstration. But why in a moment? to teach us that all the glory of this world is but for a moment. In a moment of time there is neither Prius nor Posterior: and this is the term of all worldly glory. Dum exaltarentur, dejecisti eos, saith the Psalm. In the midst of their lifting up, thou didst cast them down: not afterward, but even then: in articulo exaltationis Ostenduntur ista res, non possidentur: & dum placeant, transeunt, Sen. These things are only shown, not possessed; and while they please us they pass away from us.

Not friends, alas even they are unsure: our Savior found his Hosanna turned to a Crucify him. Doth any ask him, how he came by his wounds? Zach. 13.6. he answers, Thus was I wounded in the house of my friends, Psal. 41.9. Homo pacis mea; Yea my own familiar friend, in whom I trusted, conspired against me. Thus were Paul and Barabbas served, Act. 14. The same people become ready to kill them, that were a little before ready to kill sacrifice to them. There are still innumerable such Lystrians, that are always in extremes; either they will defy, or defy. Matth. 10.36. A man's enemies shall be they of his own household. Whom today thou lest it Fidum, a Counselor; tomorrow thou shalt find Perfidum, a Traitor. Be not too bold in trusting thy secrets to another: he that now loves thee dearly, may come to have thee deadly.

Not life; alas nothing is more uncertain. Belshazzar is sitting at a feast, on a sudden comes death like a voider to take him away. Hereupon, his face so coloured with the wine, begins to look pale and gastly with fear. His hands, that lifted up the massy goblets in defiance of their owner, tremble like a leaf in a storm. His knees, that never stooped to his Creator, are loosened with a sudden palsy of terror. All, because death hath written him a challenge on the wall, and he dares not answer it. As Noah's Dove went out of the Ark, and came into the Ark, went out again, and came in again; at last went out, and came in no more. So it is with our breath; it goes out, and comes in, comes in and goes out, at last goes out and comes in no more.

There is no Surenese in all these things, yet is our affection too strongly set upon them, Ion. 2.8. They are all lying vanities. If they promise you any certainty, they lie unto you. All is unsure, only the word of God is sure. The heavens are a lasting piece, and the earth abideth forever, Eccl. 1.4. Yet they are all unsure in respect of the Lord's word. We may say of all that wrote his will, as of Samuel; None of their words ever fell to the ground. 1 Sam. 3.19. Riches are inconstant, friends inconstant, pleasures, honors, life, the whole world inconstant: only Ego Jehovah non mutor. Mal. 3.6. I the Lord change not, Psal. 19. The commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes. The testimonies of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple his word is both pure, and sure, and so shall be forever.

Whereunto ye do well that ye take heed.] In this branch there are two things considerable.

The Commendation, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , Ye do well in this attention.

Ye take heed.] It is a special means to settle our faith, by conferring the Prophets with the Evangelists. Take heed to the word of Prophecies. This is a sure and convertible rule: nothing was done by CHRIST, which was not foretold by the Prophets: nothing was foretold by the Prophets, which was done by Christ. It would take up a life to observe all the analogies, and exact cadences of the events to the predictions: and to compare the Prophecy with the History. The Sum whereof is, Vt impleretur, That it might be fulfilled. This is the music of that sweet harmony, the Terme wherein they meet. Matth. 21.4. All this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the Prophet. One said, that Plato was nothing else but Moses translated out of Hebrew into Greek: and Virgil nothing but Homer versed out of Greek into Latin: so the New Testament is but an exposition of the old. Divines make the same difference between the Law and the Gospel, that Philosophers did between Logic and Rhetoric: the Law like the Fist shut, the Gospel like the hand open. Evangelium revelata lex, Lex occultum Evangelium. Invetere novum latet, in novo vetus patet. The Law is a concealed Gospel, the Gospel a revealed Law. The New Testament lies hidden in the old: the Old Testament lies open in the new. They go arm in arm, like inseparable friends; the two daughters of the great king: with their faces, like the Cherubims, one toward another, and both toward the mercy-fear. Though the Jews deny the Scriptures of the Christians, yet the Christians will hold the Scriptures of the Jews to the death.

Now that we may know how to take heed to the Prophets, we will consider this Reference in some particular instances, Prophet. That CHRIST should come in the flesh. Gen. 3.15. completion, Gal. 4.4. God sent his Son made of a woman: and Job. 1.14. The word was made flesh, Prophet. That he should be borne of a Virgin. Esa. 7.14. Compl. Luk. 1.27. A Virgin espoused to a man. That Rod of Aaron, which without the common generation of Plants, Frenduit ac floruit; flourished and fructified. Prophet. That he should be God and man expressed in his name, Immanuel, Esa. 7.14. Compl. Rom. 9.5. That person came in the Flesh, who is over all, God blessed forever. The Prophet describes the time of his coming, Gen. 49.10. Upon the departure of the Scepter from Judah. The Completion answers, Luk. 2.1. Augustus Caesar had set Herod an Alien upon the Throne of David. Prophet points to the place of his birth. Mic. 5.2. Thou Bethlehem in the land of Judah. The Gospel verifies it. Matth. 2.1. JESUS was borne in Bethlehem, and without all evasion, that same Bethlehem of Judah. The Prophets foretold his miracles and wonders. Esa. 35.5. The eyes of the blind shall be opened, the deaf shall be made to hear the lame, man shall leap as an Hart, and the tongue of the dumb shall sing. This was fulfilled, Matth. 11.5. in the presence of John's Disciples, that they might know him the very CHRIST. His Precursor was specified in the Prophet, Esa. 40.3. The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness. It is fulfilled, Matth. 3.3. He must be apprehended; it was Prophecied by Jeremiah; The Lord's anointed was taken in their ⟨⟩. But how? he must be sold: for what? Thirtie pieces of silver: what must those do? Buy a potter-field, Zach. 11.12. By whom must he be taken? by that child of perdition: what was he? His familiar friend, whom he trusted, his steward, his Almoner? it was prophesied, Psal. 41.9. What shall his Disciples do? Run away: so it was prophesied. Zach. 13.7. I will smite the Shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered. What must now be done to him? he must be scourged, spit upon: it was prophesied; I hide not my face from shame and spitting. Those filthy excrements of his enemies, fell not upon his face without a Prophecy. What then? he must be led to death: it was prophesied. Dan. 6.26. The Messiah shall be cut off. What death must he suffer? Crucifying, prefigured by the lifting up of the brazen Serpent. Whither must he be lifted up? to the Cross; hanging on a Tree, saith Moses. How, he must be nailed to it: it was the Prophecy; Federunt manus, Psal. 22.16. They pierced my hands and my feet. With what company? Two malefactors: it was the Prophecy. Esa. 53.12. He was numbered with the transgressors. What becomes of his Garments? the Prophet tells. Psal. 22.18. They part my garments among them, and cast lots at my vesture. They cannot so much as throw the dice for his coat, but it is prophesied. There was not a bone broken of him: it was plainly presignified in his Type, the Pascal Lamb, Exod. 12.46. Not a bone broken? what hinders? Loe there be hangs neglected, at their mercy: yet not all the raging Jews, nor roaring devils, could break one bone of him. What then follows? he must be pierced in the side: the spear could not do this, but directed by a Prophecy. Zach. 12.10. They shall look upon me whom they have pierced. His very words were not unforetold: the resignation of his Spirit into the hands of his Father. Psal. 31.5. His prayer for pardon to them that killed him: that same, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do, Luk. 23.34. It was prophesied by Isaiah, he prayed for the transgressors There is one yet behind. John 19. Verse 28. Sitio, I thirst. Thirst? this is strange, that a dying man should complain of thirst. Could he endure those tortures of body, horrors of soul, the curse of our sins, the unsupportable wrath of God; and yet shrink at thirst? It was surely, not the necessity of nature, but the necessity of his Fathers decree, which drew from him that Sitio, I thirst. He could have borne his draught unsatisfied, he could not bear his Scripture unfulfilled. They offered him drink before, he refused it, now he calls for it, now he receives it. Psal 69.21. In my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink: the very quality and kind of his drink is prophesied. His triduan sepulture was prefigured in Jonah, Matth. 12.40. His glorious resurrection, and conquest over death. Psal. 16.10. Thou wilt not suffer thine holy one to see corruption. So Paul derives it from Hosea. Chap. 13.14. Oh death I will be thy plague: Oh grave: I will be thy destruction. His Ascension was prophesied. Psal. 68.18. Thou hast ascended on high, thou hast led captivity captive. The vocation of the Gentiles was prophesied. Hos. 2.13. I will say to them that were not my people Thou art my people. His coming to Judgment prophesied: his first coming was as a Lamb, without crying, or having his voice heard in the streets. Ver. 2. His second coming as a Lion. Ver. 13. The Lord shall go forth as a mighty man. Thus in reading the Scriptures, let us still have an eye to CHRIST. They are a field, and the precious Jewel hid in it, is Jesus Christ.

Can there be now any Jew, that will move that question. Matth. 11.3. Art thou how we should come? or do we look for another? Or that will keep in the old 〈◇〉 of that tempting devil; Si Filius Dei es. Matth. 4.3. If thou be the Son of God: If. Certainly he hath upon him the brand of that old stife-neckednesse, that will not relent with the yoke of sixteene hundred years conviction. Let them show one Prophecy unfulfilled: one other in whom they can be fulfilled. It was the great question of the world, who is that CHRIST? It is the great question of the Church; who is that Antichrist? In both these are the Jews ignorant. Let them beware their doom: Lu. 19.27. Bring those my enemies that would not have me reign over them and slay them before me. But I would to God there were no vipers of this monstrous generation among us: no compounded gallimafrey of Religions; a Christians face, Jews heart, a worldlings foot, an Atheists hand. That confess a God, and know him not: profess a CHRIST, and believe him not. The worst kind of fools, Psa. 14.1. In this worse than the devils: for they could say, Act. 19.15. Jesus I know. Oh God, that after so many miraculous confirmation, thousands of Martyrdoms, glorious victories of truth, confessions of Angels, of men, of devils, universal contestation of all ages? that there should be any spark of this damned Infidelity left? whom have the Prophets foreshowed? what have they foreshowed, that he hath not fulfilled? who could foretell them but the Spirit of God? who could fulfill them but the Son of God? he hath prophesied, he hath accomplished; one true God in both. No other wisdom could say, this shall be done: no other power could make menifest, this is done. The Law was 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, a word Prophesied: the Gospel 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, a word pronounced. CHRIST is the Alpha of the Prophets, the Omega of the Evangelists; All in all. Therefore If any man love not the LORD JESUS CHRIST, let him be Anathema Maranatha. 1 Cor. 16.22.

For ourselves, let us be confirmed by this Reference, and persuaded in conscience, that the Scripture is the book of God. If Ptolemy was amazed at the seventy Interpreters; because they being placed in sundry rooms, never conferring, nor seeing one another; did yet upon the same Text write the same thing, not only for sense of matter, but even for sound of words; as Augustine reports. How should we be moved with the Divine concordance between the Prophets and the Apostles who wrote in diverse ages and places, yet so agreeing in one, that they seem not diverse penmen, but diverse pens of one writer. The devil raged, the Pharisees stormed, Herod and Pilate vexed, Caiaphas prophesied; all intruded against the Lord's anointed. Yet they all did against their wills; as no more than God determined, so no less was than prophesied. For the determination, read, Act. 4.28. They did what thy counsel determinrd before to be done. For the prediction, read, Act. 13.27. They not knowing the Prophets, fulfilled them in condemning him. Even by this also we know him to be the right promised Jesus Christ.

Ye do well.] I proceed to their commendation; the Apostle praiseth them. Goodness deserveth praise, and let it have the merit: let no man be afraid to bless, where God hath blessed. If Mary be blessed of God, all generations shall call her blessed. 1 Cor. 11.2. Now I praise you brethren. Our Savior praiseth John the Baptist. Matth. 11. Among them that are borne of women, there hath not risen a greater. If Alexander so envied the happiness of Achilles, qui virtutis praeconem Homerum invenerit; that found such a trumpet of his honor, as Homer: what glory was it for John, to be commended by CHRIST, who neither would flatter, nor could falter? Indeed adulation is dangerous; Plus nocet lingua adulatoris, quàm gladius persecutoris, Greg. The word of a flatterer is worse than the sword of a persecutor. A malicious enemy often doth us good, by telling our vices: but a fawning friend doth us hurt, in telling our virtues. This is Simonia linguae, verbal Simony: to commend what we have not, or to extol too much what we have. Col. 4.6. Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt. There must be salt in our language, so well as honey, Plant. The Parasite hath bread in one hand, and a stone in the other: using a man, as the Jews did CHRIST; carry him up to the top of a hill, and then strive to throw him down headlong, Luk. 4.29. But withal, as even beasts will draw better, or ruin faster by being encouraged: so just praises upon due deserts, are spurs to virtue. When God had given such an approval of Job, that he was a perfect and upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil: who but a devil would pick quarrels against him? It is a breach of that Justice, which is due from man to man, Rom. 13.7. Render to all their dues, honor to whom honor belongeth. The whole time is not to be spent in reproof of evil, there is some to commend what is done well. That you do attend to Sermons, in this you do well; I fear not to praise you. But then be sure you are such hearers! Sophocles ever made women good in his plays, Euripides ever made them bad. Sophocles being asked the reason of this disparity, answered I make them such as they should be, Euripides makes them such as they are. When I tell you of attentive auditors, I speak of such as you should be: when I mention negligent and forgetful hearers, I speak of such as you are. First come hither mended, then depart commended.

But what is the virtue here praised in them? Attention to the Scripture. This is Speculum & regula vitae, Luk. 10.25. When the Lawyer asked CHRIST, what he should do to inherit eternal life? he answered, what is written in the Law? how readeest thou? This was Abraham's answer. Luk. 16.29. They have Moses and the Prophets, let them hear them. Esa. 8.20. To the Law, to the Testimony. De rebus fidei suadeamur ex literis fidei, Tertul It is an old proverb: the letters of Princes are to be read thrice: but the Epistles of the King of Kings would be read over seventy times. Nocturna versate manu, versate diurna, Horat. Meditate in this Law day and night, Psal. 1.2. And in this let us apply ourselves more, Ad sensum rei, quàm ad finum vocabuli; to the sense of the matter, that sound of the letter. 2 Cor. 3.6. The letter killeth, the Spirit giveth life. The letter not understood kills, but being understood helps. One sharply reprehended an ignorant Priest: thou hast taken heed, Ne te ulla occidere possit litera, non ulla est litera nota tibi. The nobles of Berea were praised for searching the Scriptures daily, Act. 17.11. I would to God, this just praise would be inherited with the Gospel: we have the same happiness to hear, but not to consider.

Give me a man that takes heed to the word. They that settle themselves to their cups, as if they meant so much love to the wine, that they are content to make themselves sick with it: do not take heed to the word. Eph. 5.18. Bee not drunk with wine. The fury of the Law, I do not say the Lawyer, that sits in his study like a Fox in his borrow, glad to spy a goose that hath feathers on the back; (such a one as will be content to part with a wing, so his adversary may lose a quill:) and will sell truth and conscience for a fee; takes not heed to the word; buy the truth, and sell it not. The miserable trader, that did shut up the fear of God, the same day he first opened his shop: that married his wife and the world at once, to save the charges of a double wedding: that bids a good conscience farewell for thirty years, and chargeth it to meet him again when he is Alderman: that took one and the same oath, to be the Cities-free man, and monies bond-slave: this man takes no heed to the word. 1 Thes. 4.6. Let no man go beyond or defraud his brother, for the Lord is the avenger of all such. The griping usurer, who proclaims with a Noverint universi, that he hath money to let, and a soul to sell, which Interest shall buy: who though the husbandmen cry for rain, or the merchant for fair weather; though the shepherd complains of the rot, the Grasier the drought, and every man that depends upon God's blessing, sustains loss: yet he hath a trick beyond God, and beside heavens leave to be rich: he takes no heed to the fifteenth Psalms, which denies his soul any Roome in heaven. The proud painted woman, whom the devil hath dressed up for temptation that, gives occasion to other of lust, albeit she intends it not: yet is like a man that shoots an arrow at a ventures; a fool comes in at the moment of emission, and it kills him: he did it not by his will, yet the sting of conscience doth not so leave him: he could wish that he had not shot. Etsi tu non perit ••men tu perdis. Though the alluring woman do not perish her self, yet she destroys another Into the Church everyone should come with preparation to die: painting is no sign of preparing for death, but filling up the wrinkles of age. These take no heed to the word, Give no occasion of evil: the oppressor that undoes many hundreds, and helps two or three: like a Tyrant, that hath robbed and killed the Father and mother, and then gives the child a coat: that like Socrates, wills his executors to offer a cock to Esculapius; perhaps lest he should die in the devils debt, and be impleaded in hell: he takes no heed to the word, Rom. 13.8. Owe nothing to any man: do thou restore according to equity, or the Lord will not restore thee according to mercy. We are not heedy, but heady: we do not tarry for the direction of the word.

But as the Architect without his rule will never build a good house: nor the traveler come to the end of his journey, that neither knows nor asks a step of the way. So there is no hope of salvation without submission to the rule of eternal truth. As it is in the fable of the golden chain; men and gods were not able to draw Jupiter down to the earth: but Jupiter was able to draw them up into heaven. As we must submit our reason unto faith, not faith to reason: so we must subject our affections to God's word, not God's word to our affections. The word of God is that Herb of life, able to cure all diseases of the conscience. A Sage observing that many passing by an unseen Cockatrice, fell down dead: only a shepherd with a Garland of herbs and flowers went by unharmed. He called the shepherd to him, and begged his garland: then sent him back to the place from whence he came. But by the way the serpent stroke him dead, infecting his visory spirits with her unprevented poison. The old man hastened to him, and began to rub his eyes with one herb of the garland; that failing, with another: and so continued, till he lighted upon that herb which effected his recovery. Thus he came to know the herb, preserved it, prescribed it, and defended all that had such. Such a saving herb is the word of God: when that old serpent the devil hath killed men, and laid them dead in sins and trespasses; yet if their hearts be rubbed with this flower, it shall receive them, John. 5.25. The dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear it, shall live. Now the Spirit of God fill the gardens of all our consciences with it; that the poison of this world, the venom of Satan may not hurt us: but that obedience and faith may bring us to the Paradise where it grows; even that Eternal Word of GOD himself, who sits at the right hand of his Father in heaven.

As unto a light that shineth in a dark place.] This is the third General; the Praelation. We have heard how the word of Prophecy is said to be the surer; because that was written, visible, legible, the known will and word of God, whereunto they have an universal consent and attestation: whereas the Gospel was not then committed to writing. Now further we must not think here is any comparison made between the Law and the Gospel: but as formerly, between the written Scripture and their particular revelation: so here between the said extant and manifest light, and the darkness of this world. For all men that are not acquainted with the word of CHRIST, wander in darkness. Rom. 1.21. Their foolish heart is darkened. And no otherwise doth he shine unto us, then as we look on the light of his blessed truth. Now to a man shut up in a dark prison, and cooped about with a black night, nothing is more comfortable than a light. So from the caliginous shades of error and ignorance we cannot be extricated, but by this manduction, the Lamp of truth, maintained by the oil of love which is the blood of Jesus Christ.

Me thinks, the parcels of this point may be distinguished into Egypt and Goshen; in the same state they stood. Exod. 10.23. In Egypt they saw not one another, neither rose any from his place for three days: but all the children of Israel had light in their dwellings. The world is great and spacious, in respect of the Church: so was Egypt a large country, Goshen but a corner of it. Yet it was day in Goshen, when it was night in Egypt: so the Church seeth clearly in the broad day, when the world gropes in the dark night; darkness is an orbitie and privative thing, that necessarily follows the absence of light. Man hath seen light, who could ever see darkness? Yet let us take this light in our hands, and by it we shall discern this dark place. First, let us consider this Egyptian darkness, and then come to the light of Goshen. There is a sixefold darkness; all expelled by this blessed light.

1 Caligo naturae, natural darkness; caused by no positive thing, but necessarily following upon the secession or absence of the Sun; and again dispersed by the succession of the next light, Wis. 17.21. Over them was spread an heavy night, Imago tenebrarum quae ipsos erant susceptura, an Image of that darkness which should afterwards receive them. Such was the judgment upon Elymas the Sorcerer, Act. 13.11. Thou shalt not see the Sun: and then necessarily and immediately there fell upon him a mist of darkness. We all know this darkness, God bless us from ever knowing a worse. If that darkness be tedious to our unsleeping eyes, which we know after few hours will have a morning, and to which God hath promised a rising Sun: how intolerable is that darkness which shall never be enlightened, where men shall wish in vain, Phosphere red diem? Therefore said the wiseman, every night is an image of that swallowing darkness. Me thinks then, we should not dare to put out the light, till we had made our peace with the God of mercy: lest his Justice throw us from this short, to an eternal darkness. Consider the horror of Egypt in that thick and sick night? As the Grasshoppers had lately taken from them the sight of earth, so now this gross darkness takes away the sight of heaven. Other darkenesses were but privative, this real and sensible. They thought this a long night: alas how should they choose, when it was the space of six nights in one? Joshua and Hezekiah had the longest days, but Egypt had the longest night. God enlargeth the day to his friends, the night to his enemies. No man could rise to talk with another, but was necessarily confined to his own bed and thoughts. One thinks the fault in his own eyes, which he often rubs in vain. Another, that the firmament hath quite lost the Sun, and that it is set forever. Another, that all things are returning to their first confusion. All think themselves past remedy miserable: and wish, whatsoever had befallen them, they might have had but light enough to see themselves die. Now joyfully do we look up to heaven after a tedious darkness? Eccl. 11.7. Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the Sun. Yet how forgetfully do we omitte praise to him, that hath both placed the light there, and given us eyes to see it! We look on it, yet we do not duly prize it, or if we prize it, we live not worthy of it, by neglecting to bless him that gives it.

2 Caligo miseriae, the darkness of calamity and trouble: for so the Hebrews took it, and by light the deliverance from it, the comfort that doth follow it. Sorrow lasts for a night: that is, misery: the effect is put for the cause, the daughter for the mother: but Joy cometh in the morning, Eccl. 11.8. Though a man rejoice many years, yet let him remember the days of darkness for they shall be many: that is, the days of sorrow. So many days of trouble, so many days of darkness. Psal. 91.5. Thou shalt not be afraid for the terrors by night. This same Pavor nocturnus, is of all fears most terrible. Pray that your flight be not in the night; it was CHRIST'S warning to the Jews. Nothing is more without comfort than darkness, nothing more without joy than calamity. Hence it is that comforts in holy writ be let down. Nomine lucis, under the name of light. Psal. 112.4. Unto the righteous there ariseth light in the darkness; that is, comfort in trouble. Job 18.5. The light of the wicked shall be put out, and the spark of his fire shall not shine: all his joy, comfort, hope shall be extinguished. So miseries are called darkness: David in his afflictions complains, that the darkness had covered him. Hereupon some have derived Lugere, quasi luce egere. The godly are called the Children of light, Luke 16.8. Now can the children of light mourn, while the Sun of comfort is with them? No more, than the children of the Bridechamber, in the presence of the Bridegroom Matth 9.15. He is mad that can be merry in darkness; he is worse than mad that can laugh and sing in wretchedness. Eccl. 3.4. There is a time to laugh, and a time to weep: there is a time of light, and a time of darkness. There is a time to laugh, and that is he time of light: there is a time to weep, and that is the time of darkness, Psal. 137.4. Do you require of us a Song in our heaviness? How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land? The captivity in Babylon, might well mar the mirth of Jerusalem. When God troubles the state of our peace, he would trouble the eyes of our heads: as when the thunder shakes the air, the clouds weep to still it. Shall we compassionate others miseries, and not our own? As August. Confess. 1. cap. 13. Ploravi Didonem mortuam, non me à Domino morientem; What is more wretched than he that pities not himself? that can lament the death of Dido, which came by overloving Aeneas, and not lament his own death, which comes by not loving the Lord? Psal. 23.4. Though I walk thorough the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear none evil. Calamity is this shadow; there is no comfort in it, but only the light and presence of CHRIST.

3 Caligo Ignorantiae, the darkness of Ignorance, the worst kind of cecitie. The seeing man says in the night; Adsunt mihi oculi, sed deest lumen; The blind man says in the day; Adest lumen, sed desunt mihi oculi; The blind Papist among Christians may say, Here is light, but I have no eyes. The believing Christian among Papists must say; I have eyes, but here is no light. The Infidel fails in both; he hath neither an eye for the light, nor light for the eye: neither the Truth visible, nor an understanding capable; this is a wretched darkness. Pagans have Lucem nullam, a darkfull night: Papists have Lucem dubiam, a doubtful light, we call it Twi-light: we have Lucem lucidam, the broad day. Our eyes have seen thy salvation, Luke 2.30. When I considered well that same Popish doctrine, how they extol and obtrude ignorance to their people; yea, justify it to the world, and commend it as the special means to hold them to the line of obedience, and within the lists of God's service. Me thought I did wonder, which of Satan's transformations had brought Rome to this inextricable darkness. First, he came like a Lion, roaring out Persecution, and blood: there he tried the Patience of the Church, Revel. 13.10. Here is the patience of the Saints. Then he came like a Serpent, winding himself in by Heresy: there he exercised the wisdom of the Church, Rev. 13.18. Here is wisdom: let him that hath understanding, &c. Then he came transformed like an Angel of light: for he could work nothing upon us, if he should profess himself Id esse quod est, to be the very same that he is: there he exercised the Faith of the Church: whether renouncing all aberrations, we would adhere to the manifested will of God. Try the spirits; and then this spirit of borrowed light, will prove a spirit of very darkness. But what shape or semblance took he, what kind of devil was he, when he came to persuade men to ignorance? O impudence! he durst then, Se profiteri quod est, profess himself to be what he is, a spirit of darkness. Ask him, what art thou? he answers plainly, I am the Devil, and come to put out thine eyes. Oh who but a bewitched Romist will thus entertain him? Mica 3.6. Therefore night shall be unto you, and it shall be dark, that ye shall not have a vision: the Sun shall go down over the Prophets, and the day shall be dark over them. O fearful! The Sentinel perceives a passenger; Who goes there? A Friend. Give the word. Lux Christi; I am for the light of the Gospel: though he be a false friend, yet the word admits him. But the Sentinel, asking, Who goes there? it is answered, a Friend. Give the word: Tenebrae mundi, I am for darkness and Ignorance. Shall he pass, he is a friend to the Pope? As Demosthenes got more by silence, than other Advocates by pleading: so the Pope hath got more by darkness, than any Bishop of the Christian world by light. Others get only heaven, but he hath got heaven, and earth, and Purgatory, (and perhaps hell) to boot.

Simplicity, sometimes a sin Personal in the Lay-people, is now become a sin Cathedral in the Teachers. But though the people may not read the Scripture, yet they preach Scripture. But alas, how should the people know whether they preach Scripture or not? who can discern a wolf from a sheep, without some light? They tell you the miracles of such a Block, the wonders of a Crucifix, what prayers you must number to Saints. They make Sermons, as they did their Church-windows: so much painting in them, that they quite keep out the light. And in conclusion, they persuade the people to love darkness: for this will bring them to devotion; just as sure as the Devil would bring them to salvation. Consider and pity their estate: exterior darkness hath caused interior darkness. When the heavens are shadowed with thick clouds, the glorious Sun retired to his descent, the Moon afraid to put forth her silver horns, the Stars not able to twinkle in their spheres; not a little candle, not a spark of fire to be gotten: O uncomfortable confusion! Ten thousand times more wretched is the souls estate in this spiritual darkness: what are the companions of it, but error and terror? First, as in the night all things have lost their colors, in respect of our apprehension. Who could know the blew Friars from the gray, or the white from the black, or Nicholas Clarkes from either? So the darkened soul thinks blessing and cursing all one: to worship our Lady as good as to worship our Lord, Eccl. 9.2. To sacrifice, and not to sacrifice: to swear, as to fear an oath. Again, as in the night a man is often amazed and affrighted, his hairs staring, and his thoughts distracted with fear. So there is nothing but dread and perturbation of conscience in this inward darkness. They know not whether they shall be saved or damned, till they come to heaven or hell. O fearful death, when souls depart to know; whether there be a heaven or hell, or no. Suppose they do slumber in this darkness, yet it is not without starting. All the glimpse of their hope consists in some perfunctory prayers to our Lady: this is the main Popish light. Whereof an Hermet tells us in good earnest; that he saw a great light descending from heaven, like unto fire, and lighting upon her Church at Loretta. It was, saith he, twelve foot high, and six foot broad: and this was concluded by the loving Divines at Lovaine, to be our Lady; who came down in her own person to see her Feast solemnized. For this, you must note, happened on the eight of September, the very day of her birth: in those days when beasts spake, and houses did fly: and then the cock crew, and it waxed day. This story for demonstration, is written in the Church of Loretta: let us there leave it. And for them poor souls, led in blindness, let us pray, that the Lord would translate them out of darkness, into the kingdom of his dear Son, Col 1.13.

4 Caligo malitiae, the darkness of iniquity: sins are called opera tenebrarum, the works of darkness, Rom. 13.12. Eph. 5.11 Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness. When that great sin was a committing, the murder of the innocent Lamb Jesus, there was a darkness over all the earth, Luke 23.44. To show that this was a great work of darkness, the hour of darkness, and power of darkness, consented and convented to assist it. The black Night-raven will foster her own bird: the mother darkness makes much of the daughter. There was an hellish dance led by five, the men of darkness, a deed of darkness, hour of darkness, power of darkness, and the Prince of darkness, to make up number and measure. The Sun was darkened, as if shame would not suffer it to behold so black a deed. A heathen observing it, concluded; Either that God suffered, or the world perished. There was no interposition of the Moon betwixt Sun and earth, to make a natural eclipse: but the invention, intervention of a foul and cloudy sin. Men could endure to do it, the Sun could not endure to behold it. Men's eyes have dazzled to behold the Sun; but now the Sun's eyes dazzled to look upon men. The Sun is called Oculus mundi, the eye of the world: that eye winked and was shut; lest beholding their dark and dismal work, it should have drop'd from heaven, set the world on fire, and burnt it up to ashes. The whole Canopie of air was drawn, and all the face of the sky hung with black, to witness their compassion, like mourners at the Funeral of their Maker. This malicious darkness is terrible: the other is a blind and passive, this an active, operative darkness.

Now 2 Cor. 6.14. What communion hath light with darkness? Let a child of light be brought into the ring or circle of these darklings; who are indeed the Epitome and abridgement of that greater world which lies in wickedness: and they conspire to afflict his eyes with unchaste and horrid visions, his ears with fearful oaths, his unwilling appetite with drunken salutations. And if they can, like that Babylonish Harlot, make him taste in calice aureo venenum, poison in a golden cup, wrap him in a mist of darkness; they presently sing, vicimus; and rejoice as in the division of a spoil; that they have drenched sobriety, and blinded the light. He may be a good taper, but they will ever after become his snuffers. But let such an error be thy mirror: see thy weakness in that glass, and trust no more the company of sinners. Let this Antiparastists recover the more zeal: Nec tu cede malis, sed te melioribus offer; Think not that counsel available: Noctem peccatis, & fraudibus objice nubem; The mantle of night shall cover them. For an ill companion is like a Promoter, that in Lent eats flesh at thy table, and yet is the first that accuseth thee to the Magistrate: so he will drink of thy cost, and then whisper thee abroad for a drunkard.

Beware these night-works, 1 Thess. 5.7. They that be drunken, are drunken in the night. Noctivagants are negligent in their habits: an old gown will serve the turn; neither decency, nor hardly modesty is respected. But in the day men desire to go handsome, according to their quality. So let us put off our night-clothes, and put on apparel fit for the day. The drunkard is in his night-gown, as if God could not then see his luxury. The adulterer is in his night-gown, he presumes that the dark shall cover him. The hypocrite is in his night-gown; he looks like day, but he lives like night. The fraudulent trader is in his night-gown, he loves either no light, or a false-light. The profane ruffian is in his night-gown, not dressed like a Spouse for Christ. The Schismatike in his night-gown, he cannot abide that comeliness and order which the day requireth. The thief is in his night-gown, Job 24.16. In the dark they dignity thorough houses, which they had marked for themselves in the daytime. All these Tenebriones are night-attired; and unless timely repentance help them, they will be benighted ere they come to heaven.

5 Caligo mortis, the darkness of death. Death is a putting out of light, and a committing to darkness. Psal. 88.12. Shall thy wonders be known in the dark? shall thy loving kindness be declared in the grave? Job calls it A land of darkness, without any order, where the light is as darkness, Job 10.22. Remember the days of darkness, Eccl. 11.8. Heaven is the place of light, the bowels of the earth the place of darkness. Mans life is in the mid-way between them: he sees whither his soul may go, whither his body must go. There is an old Apologue: a man going out of his beaten and directed way, to gather unlawful fruits, fell into a deep pit. In his fall, he caught hold on the arm of a tree growing in it. Thus he hung in the midway, betwixt the upper light from which he fell, and the lower darkness to which he was falling. He looks down ward, and sees two worms gnawing at the root of this tree: he looks upward, and spies on a branch a hive of honey: he climbs up to it, and fits feeding on it. But in mean time the worms did bite in sunder the root, and down falls man, and tree, and all into the bottom of the dark pit. Man himself is this wretch, who straying from the way of God's commandments, fell to eat of the forbidden fruit: instantly he fell. The pit over which he hangeth is the grave, the tree whereby he holdeth is this mortal life: the two worms are day and night: the hive of honey is the pleasures and lusts of this world. Hereupon he greedily feeds: until the two consumers, day and night in their vicissitudes, have eaten asunder the root of life. Then down drops earth to earth, Corpus putidum in locum putridum. There it must lodge in the silent grave, neither seeing nor seen, blended in the forgotten dust and undistinguished mould; till it be wakened by the Archangels Trump in the great day of Christ.

6 Caligo Inferni; The last is the darkness of hell, Jude verse. 6. The lost Angels are reserved in everlasting chains under darkness, Matth. 8.12. They shall be cast into outer darkness. Whereby a man may conjecture, that hell is not the air: for in the air shall be light, the splendor of the Sun being septupled: but hell is called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, outer darkness, Matth. 25.30. This is the place where sin began, where it shall end: it came from hell, and to hell it goes. It began from Satan who is the Prince of darkness: it ends in hell, which is the place of darkness. There is a natural propensity of heavy things downwards: sin is heavy, therefore it sinks downward, The way of life is above to the wise, that he may depart from hell below. Oh that is a place of intolerable darkness: here we are allowed a candle, though the Sun be set, and the Moon not risen: there is not a spark of light in hell. Those upon earth that are said to have half a year night; yet not without some trajection of light, and diffusion of the Sun's reflective rays, though he be not risen above their hemisphere. Yet if this be tedious, what is that everlasting darkness, which will continue so long as God is just? This is that common Sewer whither the sink of all darkness runs: darkness external, darkness internal, both run to darkness infernal, and there make up a darkness eternal. But there shall be unquenchable fire; shall not that fire give some light? No, Vlatrix flamma concremandi, non illuminandi, vim habet, Greg. There shall be no vision, but all division: the sense must feel what doth torment it, the fight must not behold what may refresh it. That horror hath in it two things, Mat. 8.12. Weeping, and gnashing of teeth. Fletus de ardore, stridor de frigore, Greg. Weeping proceeds from heat, gnashing of teeth from coldness. This is a strange compound; unquenchable fire, unlightable darkness! But how then shall they know one another in hell? If there be any light, it shall be a glimpse to aggravate torment: as the fight of their partners in sin, to be partakers in punishment. But though their bodies see not, their understandings may discern; their ears shall hear their shriekes, and reprobates may be distinguished by their cries. But let us not be curious, Scire, to know; what we so abhor, Sentire, to feel. It is a dark, desolate, disconsolate, torturing place; where is no hope of light, nor light of hope. Now the blood of our blessed Savior deliver us all from it forever.

Thus you have the description of many darkneses, and haply have thought yourselves in the mist of darkness all this while. Egypt hath been too tedious to you, you ask for Goshen: indeed you have been all this time in the light, that you have looked upon darkness. For darkness could never be seen by it self, but by the light, Eph. 5.13. All things that are reprov'd, are made manifest by the light: for whatsoever doth make manifest, is light. But now, would you see all these black clouds dispersed in a moment? Behold the light that doth it, the true knowledge of Jesus Christ. The Sun doth no sooner show his face, but evanescent tenebrae, the darkness vanisheth. Caesar did no sooner look upon his enemies, but they were gone; vill, vici. Egypt swarmed with Locusts till the West-wind came, that left not one. Sennacheribs army was innumerable, yet the Angel arose and struck them; and behold, they were all dead corpses, Psal. 68.1. Let God arise, and his enemies be scattered: but shall drive them away like smoke. It is the light of the Gospel that dispels all these shadows. Our air is full of this light: our air, I say; if our hearts be full also, we are blessed forever!

For the darkness of Nature, it must indeed have the due course by creation, Gen. 8.22. While the earth remaineth, day and night shall not cease. So the Makers hand hath disposed it; and by the vicissitude of time, and alternation of the wheeling heavens it continues: until all men arrive, either at that eternal day in heaven, or eternal night in hell. As that Spanish Bishop, staggering in the question whether Solomon was saved or lost; caused him to be pictured in his Chapel, the one half in hell, the other in heaven. Or as Proserpina was censured by her father Jupiter, to live half the year in heaven, and the rest in hell. So we spend half our time upon earth, in light, and half in darkness. But if this light be in us, our night shall be turn in day, Psal. 139.12. The night shall be light above us, and shall shine as the day. What darkness can offend, where the Father of lights shineth? Or what 〈◇〉 can keep off that Sun of Righteousness? 2 Sam. 22.29. Thou O LORD 〈◇〉 lighten my darkness. No darkness shall afflict thy body, while there is this 〈◇〉 light in thy soul.

For the darkness of affliction, true it is that the brightest day hath the 〈◇〉 most quiet mind her disturbance. Our best estate hath ague-fits; but he that 〈◇〉 ter luminum beholds us, Psal. 31.7. Thou hast known my soul in adversity. This 〈◇〉 forts us in misery, as the suffering child that knows his father seeth: Make thy 〈◇〉 to shine upon thy servant, and save me for thy mercies sake. We cannot be so broken, but the light of his countenance will make us whole. Peter was in hard bondage by Herod, Act. 12.6. Sleeping between two soldiers, and bound with two chains: yet even then a light shined in the prison. Say that thou liest between usury and oppression, as Peter between two soldiers; bound with two chains of debt and penury: yet if the comfort of this Light shine in thy heart, thy prison shall be an heaven, thy keepers Angels, thy chains thy glory, and thy deliverance salvation.

For the darkness of ignorance, indeed it is tetricall and dangerous. Whether it be intrinsical by an indisposition in the Instrument, natural or accidental: or through want of Medium, which may transmit the object to the sense Knowledge is to these as the Sun to the blind, or a crack of thunder to the deaf. But now there is no darkness so invincible, but the Lord can enlighten it, Matth. 4.16. To them which see in the region and shadow of death, light is sprung up: Thou wantest knowledge, despair not: he hath none that says he hath enough, Psal. 25.14. The Lord will show them his covenant: I am. 1.5. If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God that will give him. For direction, two words are as good as twenty: Ora, labora. Pray for it, and use the means to get it. Love the light, and have the light. It is more true of God's Truth, than it was of that Greekish beauty: no man loved her that never saw her; no man ever saw her, but he love her. Hear attentively, pray intently; and doubt not but God will send thee light enough on earth, to bring thee to the light of heaven.

For the darkness of sin, indeed it is fearful for the wicked: but this shining light shall expel it out of thy heart, John. 1.5. That light which shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not. Isaiah. 8.22. The wicked shall fret themselves, and curse their king, and their god: and when they look upon the earth, behold trouble and darkness. When others curse their darkness, thou shalt bless this light. As the wicked have a prelibation of that darkness they shall go unto hereafter: so have the faithful an earnest of that light which is prepared for them. The light of heaven must first enter into a man's soul, before his soul can enter into the light of heaven.

For the darkness of death, know it is but dust and ashes that suffers it, which is insensible of the privation. It is but like the laying up of thy garment in a trunke: what matters it, so long as thy soul hath the light of blessedness? Lord lighten mine eyes, the eyes of my soul, that they sleep not in death: it is sufficient.

For that infernal and eternal darkness, it shall not come nigh thee. Keep thy face of faith still toward the Sun, and thou shalt leave that darkness behind thee, Rom. 8.1. There is no damnation to them that are in Jesus Christ. He shall deliver us from the error of darkness, and from the terror of darkness; from the valley of the shadow of death; and advance us to that light wherein himself dwelleth: and that Lord send us all the light of heaven.

Until the day dawn, and until the day-star arise in our hearts.] Some refer darkness here, to that shadowy, misty, or at best mystical time, which was under the Law. When they saw their Redemption only in figure, the blood of Christ in the blood of lambs, the performance in the promise. And during that darkness, the Word of Prophecy was of singular use. Thus by faith they beheld Messiam missum, quamvis ⟨◇⟩ nisi promissum; The Messias that was to come, as if he already was come. John. 8.50. Your Father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and saw it. Christ was come when Father wrote this; but because he was yet a stranger to their minds, and had not gotten sufficient credit in their hearts, he commends their attention to the Prophets. For they spake concerning Christ's birth and passion, as himself spake concerning his rising and ascension: These things I have told you, that when the time shall come, you may remember the prediction. When we know the way the King will come; and have his ⟨◇⟩ imprinted in our minds, whereby we may discern him when he is come we shall ⟨◇⟩ more readiness welcome him, with less doubt. Thus Zacharias sung, The day-spring from ⟨◇⟩ high hath visited us. This was that day dawning, and morning-star; ⟨◇⟩ that great Sun of Righteousness had newly risen from the womb of the Virgin, and began to cast abroad his saving beams. For Non citius factus, quàm patefactus; He was not sooner made, than made manifest. The Wise-men saw the Star that waited on the Sun, and worshipped that Sun that made the Star. The Angels proclaimed it to the Shepherds, the Shepherds divulged it to others: and made it known all abroad, Luke 2. Herod hears and fears: he suspected that the day would be his night: therefore would have put out the light in the morning of it: but he could with more ease have plucked a fixed Star from heaven. Christ's may hide the Sun, nothing can hinder the Lord of Glory, when he purposeth to shine in his Majesty.

But they that thus understand it; by Darkness, that time which preceded the clear, knowledge of Christ: and by Day, a free and liberal apprehension of him; come too short. For this were a very cold commendation of the Prophets, to be regarded no longer than until Christ be manifested to us in the flesh. But it is objected, Matth. 11.13. All the Prophets prophesied until John. True, for what 〈ϕ〉 they further prophecy Affuturum qui adest; Him to come that was present? But doth the use of their prophecy last no longer to us? Yes certainly; Mortai 〈ϕ〉 Prophetæ, non Prophetiæ; The benefit of the Prophets died not with the Prophets. There is no end of the use of their saying, till there be an end of the worlds being. This is then the Sense we settle upon; that this full Day here spoken of, is the plenary and perfect light which shall be given us in the kingdom of heaven. For as the former Darkness is to be extended to the whole course of our life: so this Day-dawning, and Day-star arising, is our entrance into the celestial glory. For in the other acception there would follow absurdities; as that the Prophets should be idle and superfluous to those that knew Christ, which are necessary to the worlds end. But how can that glory be called a Day-dawning, or Day-star? Not that that clarity hath any morning in it self, but in regard of us that newly arrive to it. The world is five thousand years old, in the very evening: yet to the child new-borne it is but a morning. Certainly, so long as we are pilgrims here, we see thorough a glass, 〈ϕ〉 there our hearts shall be filled with that glorious light of perfection: and we that were dwarfes below, shall be made tall men in Jesus Christ, Ephes. 4.13. When we all meet in the unity of the knowledge of the Son of God, to a perfect man, and to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ.

They that object against this Exposition, say that the word Donec, Until, is not always taken Terminatim, limiting, bounding, or confining a set time. So that the Word of Prophecy may shine like a light in a dark place, until the promulgation of the glorious Gospel; and yet not then be rejected as useless; but remain 〈ϕ〉, though a dim light in respect, yet a light. So Matth. 28.20. I am with you 〈ϕ〉 the worlds end. What, will he leave us then? No, but as spiritually he is with us here, so locally and personally we shall be with him hereafter, Acts Chapter third, twenty one verse. The heavens must receive Christ, until the restitution of all things. Shall heaven lose him then? No, he sits on the right hand of Eternity forever, Psal. 112.8. The faithful man shall not be afraid, until he see his desire upon his enemies 〈ϕ〉 I hope, he hath less cause to be afraid afterwards. God saith to Jacob, Gen. 28.15. I will not leave thee, until I have done what I have spoken to thee: When this was performed, God did not forsake the seed of Jacob: Matth. 5.18. The Word of God 〈ϕ〉 not pass, until heaven and earth pass: no, not then neither, Psal. 57.1. under the shadow of thy wings will I make my refuge, until these calamities be over-past. Did he 〈ϕ〉

› to leave that refuge after his deliverance? No, Thou art my rest forever, Cant. 3. ‹ϕ› held my Beloved, and would not let him go, until I had brought him into my ‹ϕ› house. Did she let him go then? No, she held him fast in her nuptial bed of ‹ϕ› forever, Cant. 2.7. Waken not my Love till he please. Disquiet not my Savior ‹...› grieve his Spirit, nor dishonor his Name, not by any provocation of ‹...› his peace, Till he please: but he will never be pleased with such a ‹...› The reprobate shall not come out the prison, Matth. 5.26. Till he hath paid ‹...› most farthing; and that will be never. But again, sometimes, until, excludes the time past; doth not infer the time future, Matth. 1.25. Joseph knew not Mary, until she had brought forth her first borne son: it doth not follow that he knew her afterward. So CHRIST is called her First borne: yet this insinuates no probability of consequence, that she had more forms. Quia ‹...› est eam ‹ϕ› ere, quae sanctificata ‹ϕ› Deum parere. Who durst touch that sacred vessel, which God had hallowed to bear his own Son. 2 Sam. 6.13. Michal had no child ‹ϕ› the day of her death: and it ‹...›, she had none afterwards. But now, when (until) is used by way of Precept, it always defines, and determines. Ambala donec vlam persolveris, then thou shalt rest. Pugna dones viteris, fight till thou overcome, then have peace, Rev. 2.25. That you have already, hold fast till I come, Eph. 4.13. The Lord sends Preachers to edify the Church, until we all mere to a perfect mine: then shall that office cease. So here, attend to the light of Prophecy, until the day down, until you come to that full day of glory in heaven. So that the point of doctrine intends the difference, between that measure of knowledge which God's grace also Jesus in our pilgrimage: and that measure which his glory shall endue us with in the kingdom of heaven. For method of tractation, first let us consider the light in general; and then pass through the degrees of it, till we ascend to the perfection.

The light was made three days before the Sun: Junius thinks, that light was the Element of fire. Nazian. and Theodor a light without a subject, afterwards dispersed and fastened to diverse bodies; of Sun, Moon, and Stars. So Mercy, those light some bodies were made the receptacles of the former created lights. But if God created the light, it seems that he was before in darkness. No, he needs not a temporal and created light, that is himself a spiritual uncreated light. But if God made the light, who made darkness? darkness is nothing, it need no creation, being but the absence of light, and nakedness is the want of clothing. But God saw that the light was good, therefore he knew it not before. It follows not: his approval of it being brought forth in action, doth not prejudice his foresight in intention. Matth. 8.10. CHRIST marvailed, and wondered at the Centurions faith, which indeed himself wrought in him. Thus did God begin with the light, to show that he is Pater luminum, I am. 1.17. That father of lights, in whom is omnis Praestantia & compositus ordo. The Persian Magi used to call their god, Oromasten. 1 John. 1.5. God is light, and in him is no darkness at all. None, not actively to deceive, not passively to be deceived, John 1.9. CHRIST is called That true light, which lightneth every man. But as he calls himself, so also his Apostles, Lux mundi, the light of the world: but with a difference. CHRIST is the fountain of lights, Luminare majus, that greater light. The Apostles shine Lumine mutuato, with the borrowed light of the Sun; are Luminare minus, a less light. Lux ‹ in non-Latin alphabet › dicta: ‹ in non-Latin alphabet › the ancient Greeks understood for the first light, or early morning. So the Apostles were Aurora

Solis, being sent to preach the light: as John the Baptist was Praenuntius lucis. Indeed in respect of their successors they were great lights. First, by a transcendency, as Lux reipublicae, &c. We call an eminent man the light of the State; the light of religion; Lux poetarum. So David was called the Light of Israel, 2 Sam. 21.17. Propter vitae sublimitatem cateris universis aspectabiliores: in respect of their life and doctrine they were more famous lights, than any that followed them. Then because like blessed lights, they did not only instruct us by their doctrines, but direct us by their doings. But now in respect of God, they were dim: we say of them as Judas Baptist said of himself. John. 1.8. They were not that light, but sent to bear witness of that light; 1 Cor. 25.41. There as one glory of the Sun, another glory of the Moon, and another glory of the Stars. There is Lux illuminant, non illuminata; a light that doth enlighten, is not enlightened; as the Sun, Vehicutum lucis, that carries about with him the light of the world. The heathens lay of the Sun, that he doth 〈...〉 ...vem. There is Lux illuminata non illuminant; a light that doth not enlighten, but is enlightened, as the Firmament. There is Lux illuminata & illuminansa light that is enlightened, and doth enlighten; as the Moon and Stars. The faithful are such lights, Phil. 2.15. They shine as lights in the world. Absent 〈◇〉, luna lux: in the absence of the Sun, the Moon is a great light. A touch 〈◇〉 light it self, yet being kindled is able to give light to others: so no man can illuminate himself, yet being illuminated by that Sun of Justice, he can give a light of direction to others. Therefore the Church is compared to heaven, Revel. 12. 〈◇〉 get Ecclesia Doctoribus, sicut calum fideribus: the Church shines with Teachers, as the heaven with stars. They are lights, both Ministerio conversionis, & exemplo conversationis; both with the ministry of conversion, and the example of conversation. In the one is verbum vita, the word of life; in the other vita verbi, the life of the word. The light in the window doth not only give light to them that are in the house, but also passengers in the street. The other ships guide their course, 〈◇〉 only by the star in heaven, but also by the light in the Admiral. So there is the light of life in doctrine, the life of light in exemplary conversation. John was a burning and a shining light, John. 5.35. Lights burning and not shining, are like hell fire lights shining and not burning, like Glo-worms. Our God is not only a 〈◇〉 fire but also a shining light; both Formaliter and Effective. Psal. 50.2. Out of Zion the perfection of beauty, God hath shined. Such a light is his sacred truth, able to illuminate all the dark corners of the world. There is a four-fold light.

1 Lux naturalis, the light of nature; this was goodly in Adam, Job 24.13. They are of those that rebel against the light; that is, against the light of nature. 〈◇〉 was of opinion that every soul had this light till it came into the body; and by that mixture it was only muffled and blinded. Hence was that his maxim; that 〈◇〉, to know, he was nothing else but Reminisci, to remember. But this opinion presupposeth a Seminary or Promptuary of souls, from whence they are derived to their bodies; which is false. The Scripture saith, God formeth the spirit of man within him, Zach. 12.1. Infundendo creatur, & creando infunditur: it is created with infusion, and infused with creation. Yet when the spirit and flesh meet, and man is made, this light is defaced; for Anima cum infunditur, inficitur: the soul even when it is infused, is infected.

2. Lux Evangelica, the light of the Gospel. John. 8.12. I am the light of the world: he that followeth me, shall not walk in darkness, but have the light of life. This was the intent of our Savior's coming, To give light to them that sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death, and to guide their feet into the way of peace, Luk. 1.79. It is true, that the Law was a light; lex est lux: but like a lamp, far short of the day which comes by the rising of the glorious Sun, JESUS CHRIST. Thy word is a light to my feet, and a lamp to my paths: but thy CHRIST is a Sun, that hath saving health under his wings; Mal. 4.2. In the night a man is glad of the light of a candle: so was the word of Prophecy a great help during the darkness which oppressed the whole world. But now the day is broken, and the splendor of the Sun shines in our faces. There is in the world, Psal. 91.5. Pavor nocturnus, terror by night, the trouble of a vexed conscience. Sagitta per diem ‹ϕ› the arrow that flieth by day, the temptations of Satan in prosperity and peace. •stie in caligine, the pestilence that walketh in darkness, heresy to pervert the ‹ϕ› Lues in meridie, the destruction that wasteth at noon day, profaneness to ‹ϕ› the affections: none of these shall destroy us, because we have the light of the Gospel to avoid them. This light shall defend us from all dangers; apertis, opertis, open or hidden, external or internal, corporal or spiritual. Esa. 8.20. To the Lux, to the Testimony: if they speak not according to this word, there is no light in there. He that doth not direct us by that rule, we can see there is no morning in him. Some have God, and know him not; as Infants. Some know GOD, and have him not, as baptized reprobates. Some neither have him, not know him; as Pagans. Others have him, and know him, as all faithful Christians.

3 Lux Gratiae, the light of Grace. Thus we are made Partakers of the inheritance of the Saints in light, Col. 1.12. This is wrought in us by the light of the Gospel, the holy Spirit opening the window of our heart, that this day might shine into it. For men may be in the light, and yet the light not be in them: and it is one thing to have the light in a man's head, another to have it in his heart. The light of knowledge may illuminate the brain, and yet leave a man unblest: but they are Saints, in whose hearts the day star is risen. That man knows the good he hath not done: this man doth the good he hath known. They say, he plays best that wins; but I am sure he knows best that does. When the Apostles prayed for that decision, Act. 1.24. That God would be pleased to show whether of the two, Barsabas or Matthias, he had chosen into Judas his Episcopal room; they said. Thou Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men. Not the heads, but the hearts: many have lightened heads, but dark hearts. Rom. 1.21. Their foolish heart was darkened. The Apostle there saith they knew God, there was light in their heads; but darkness was in their hearts. Never had age more light in their understandings than ours; I fear never less light in their hearts. John. 3.19. This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather. The day star is risen, and shineth, and we see his glory; as the glory of the only begotten of the Father, full of Grace and Truth: GOD grant withal, that he be risen in our hearts.

4 Lux Glorae, the light of glory. In thy light shall we see light, saith the Prophet. When they shall need no candle, nor the light of the Sun, for the Lord God giveth them light, they shall reign forever and ever, Revel. 22.5. The light of nature is like a spark, the light of the Gospel, a Lamp, the light of Grace a star, but the light of glory the Sun it self. The higher our ascent, the greater our light. 1 Tim. 6.16. God dwelleth in the light which no man can approach unto. No man, while he carries mortality and sin about him: but when those two corrupt and uncapable qualities shall be put off, then shall we be brought to that light. We are now glad of the Sun and Stars over our heads, to give us light: what light and delight shall that be, when these shall be under our feet! That light must needs as far go beyond their light, as they now go beyond us. But alas! they are only able to discourse of that light, that do enjoy it, to whom that eternal day is risen: not we that live in the humble shade of mortality, and natural dimnesse. I leave it therefore to your meditations: it is a glorious light which we do well, often to consider, considering to admire, admiring to love, loving to desire, desiring to seek, and finding to enjoy forever.

Until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts.] The Kingdom of Grace, is both an entrance to, and a resemblance of the Kingdom of glory. This Evangelical day on earth, is a glimpse of that Angelical day in heaven. And CHRIST is our day star here, in respect of his gracious light: as he will be hereafter, in respect of his glorious light. CHRIST hath been often called a Star, and that without disparagement to him, that is the Sun himself. It was given him both by Prophetical prediction, Numb. 24.17. There shall come a star out of Jacob. And by Evangelical ascription, Revel. 22.16. I am the root and offspring of David, and the bright morning Star. CHRIST hath in the Scripture, diverse names of light given him, according to the different degrees of his emication. Sometimes he casteth forth a scantly light, and then he is called the day-dawning. Sometimes he gives so much light, as only presignifies a bright day at hand; then he is called Lucifer, the morning star. Other times he diffuseth his knowledge, then he is the light, and the day: then he shines out in his glory, and is the Sun himself. This is the Star we sail by, over the sea of this world: other stars are under us in service, though they be above us in situation. Psal. 8.6. The heavens, Moon and Stars, Omnia subieciisti; Thou hast put all things under his feet. If it be true that Astra regunt homines, the Stars govern men: yet it is more true, that Deus astra regit, God governs the stars: this Star commands all. Here the trouble and Philosophical Quaere, concerning the morning Star is decided. Plinnatur. Hist. lib. 2. cap. 8. Some take this Star to be venus, some Isis, some Juno's, some the mother of the God's. We need not trouble our heads about it; our morning star is JESUS CHRIST. That Babylonian Monarch was called, Metus Aurora, Esa. 14.12. Lucifer, Son of the morning. A morning star, but falling star: he rose against this Day-star, and therefore was turned out of his high or be, wherein he had advanced himself above the kings of the earth. So tread down all thine enemies, Oh Lord: but to thy Church give this day-star, Christ forever.

This gracious Day hath dawned unto us, and shineth upon us: but it will not last ever, it must have an evening. Are there not twelve hours in the day, saith CHRIST! If no more, certainly the last hour will come. John. 12.36. While you have light believe in the light, that your may be the children of light. We all say, we are Filii luci, the children of light: but we make not Lucem Duce, the light our guide. So the Jews said, we have Abraham to our Father, yet shown themselves degenerate bastards. 1 John. 1.6. If we say we have fellowship with God, and walk in darkness, 〈ϕ〉 lie. It is as if a clod of squalid earth should boast it self Filiam Ignis, to be the daughter of fire. 1 John. 2.9. He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is still in darkness. But no man will be thought odisse fratrem, to hate his brother. He will scorn his brother, strike his brother, bely his brother, oppress his brother, undo his brother: yet forsooth, he will not hate his brother. Palpable darkness; if he knows not this, in his head: if he knows it then in his heart. Esa. 5.20. Woe to them that put light for darkness, and darkness for light. If such a man persist, he shall go to bed at noon, and drop down to hell like a meteor, when all the stars remain in their glory. For it is just with God to take the light from thine eyes, when thou hast taken thine eyes from the light.

This day is ours, let us be the days. Let us not be noctivagants, straying abroad with Dinah, lest our chaste soul come home de floured. Or, as the Poets say of Proserpine; that while she was gadding abroad with her mother Ceres, Pluto rap'd her to hell. So if men willfully run from the light, they may be violently ravished by the Prince of darkness. A Virgin being tempted by a dissembling lover, followed him: in this pursuit of her vain desires, she scapes many unsuspected dangers, and found expected deliverance. For though her lover led her over deep pits, and deadly snares, purposing to ravish her, and destroy her: yet still an Angel was present to defend her. A glorious show had attracted her eyes, she thought him a person of all delights: and still as she went, she found scattered gold, which she gathering minded not whether she strayed. When he had brought her to his cave, and was even ready to defloure her with violence, and to wound her to death; the Angel steps in, and puts him to flight. He discovers himself to be an Angel of light, and the other an Impostor and Traitor to her. He brings her to the gulfs side, and shows her the bottomless depth of the pit, which she scaped; and the Serpent that was ready to devour her. He bids her examine the gold, loe it was base metal, counterfeit and venomous dross. Tells her what loss of a faithful betrothed lover she hath hazarded. Hereupon the Virgin breaks forth into lamentations and bitter tears: begins to sown with despair, and dares not look up to that light she hath so offended. The Angel lifts her up, revives her spirits, promiseth to bring her too fountain, that shall wash off all her defilements. Being thus washed, he shows her true husband coming towards her with a gracious aspect. He takes her in his arms, wipes her eyes, dryes her tears, and seals on her cheeks millions of kisses. Loe now she begins to recover, on her bended knees she intreats his constant love to her, and promiseth chaste adherence to him forever. This virgin is man's soul her false lover the devil, her betrothed husband CHRIST, the Angel is the Gospel, the night wherein she wanders is ignorance, the gold profit or pleasure, the sea is this world, the pit hell, the bridge whereby she escapes is God's mercy. Satan transformed like a friend woos her, gets her good will to follow him. If she will admit of this or that sin, at every step she shall take up Gold, have her desires satisfied. This golden temptation so strongly takes her, that she runs from vice to vice, from error to error; thinks all is safe, and that she is in the company of one who dearly loves her. At last she is brought to some foul and capital offense, to the very doors of hell, ready to be turned in. But behold then, he that never forsakes his, sendeth an Angelical, Evangelical light, opens her eyes, unhands the devil, and sets her at liberty. The day dawns, and the day-stars arise in her heart: and now observe the course is taken to bring this poor soul to salvation. First, the Gospel shows her, that the lover she so doted upon, was an Adversary, Satan; not the spirit of light, but the Prince of darkness. Oh how ugly does this monster appear in her eye! how doth she hate her self for loving him! Next, it discovers the counterfeit gold, that all the vanity of this world is but slip-coin; so far from making man rich or blessed, that it is the devils poison to make him cursed. Then it brings her to the deep gulf of perdition, which she passed over without fear because without knowledge. Wherein she had been drowned forever, but for the saving bridge of God's mercy; who was good to her, even while she was so bad to him. Lastly, it describes to her the beauty and perfections of that husband she had forsaken, the Son of glory, fairer than all the children of men; white and ruddy, of the purest complection, the chiefest among ten thousand. Hereupon she breaks into amazed complaints; wretch that I am, what shall become of me? there is nothing but death and damnation due unto me. I dare not look up to that heaven I have so offended, nor speak to that Father I have so provoked, nor hope for that husband I have so wronged. Did by redemption cost him the dear blood of his heart, and do I sell myself to Satan for gold, for vanity, for nothing? Oh look not upon me ye daughters of Jerusalem, for I am black, swarthy and polluted. Time was that the King did greatly desire my beauty, Psal. 45.11. But now I lie defiled in my own blood, my shame is upon me, and my confusion hath covered me. I am sick, my heart strings burst, let be groan and die. Now steps in this blessed light of the Gospel, takes the sowing soul by the hand, lifts her up from the dust of despair, and puts into her mouth that song, Psal. 27.13. I had fainted, unless I had believed to see the goodness of the LORD in the Land of the living. This brings her to a fountain, yea brings a fountain out of her: her heart bleeds the tears of compunction, and they run not by drops, but by floods from her eyes. She weeps like David, Until she can weep no more, 1 Sam. 30.4. But lest this shower should melt her to nothing, the Sun of mercy comes to stay it: and now this light directs her in the voice of John; Behold the Lamb of God, which takes away the sins of the world. She lifts up her eyes of faith, and sees him come leaping upon the mountains, and skipping upon the hills, Cant. 2.8. She runneth to him, throws her self in the dust at his feet, bathes them with her tears like Mary; and with an humble heart and suppliant voice beseecheth him; Lord, be merciful to me a sinner. She takes hold of him, as Jacob; I will not let thee go till thou hast blessed me. The Lord takes her in his arms of mercy, puts his left hand under her head, and with his right hand embraceth her, Cant. 2.6. He speaks peace and comfort to her conscience, heals all her wounds with his own blood, promiseth to mediate for her to his Father, and to make her peace in heaven. She kisseth his hand with faith, he kisseth her cheeks with blessings. There is a betrothing of fidelity, and constant love of either to other. She prays, Lord forsake not the soul which thou hast redeemed: he promises, Fui tibi in meritum, ero tibi in premium; I was thy redemption, I will be thy salvation: nothing shall separate thee and me. Oh blessed Light, whereby that darkness is expelled: O blessed soul, by this light delivered: O blessed Savior that sent this light: Oh blessed Father that sent this Savior: O blessed Trinity, that blessest all unto us; mayest thou be blessed of us and in us forever and ever. Amen.

VERSE 20. Knowing this first, that no Prophecy of the Scripture is of any private Interpretation.

VERSE 21. For the Prophecy came not in old time (or, at any time) by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.

The Apostle had formerly commended reading of the Prophets ab utilitate, by the benefit of them: how in reading them he gives warning a difficultate, from the difficulty of understanding them. There are things in them hard to be understood: the history is not without the mystery: and there often lies a deep and hidden sense, under a familiar and easy sentence. Let not men rush into their exposition, like hasty soldiers into a thicket, without seeking direction from the Captain. When we come to read them, we must throw away the sense of flesh and blood, and subject ourselves Magisterio Spiritus. Some copies have read 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , which signifies, Quidam Impetus: then the sense were thus; No Scripture is of any private motion. But the most and best read, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , Interpretation. Now let him that gave the proposition, give also the exposition: the Spirit which inspired the Prophets, can only declare the prophecies. We grant this to men, giving everyone leave to be his own Interpreter, and to expound his own meaning. Deny not this to the Holy Ghost: that which God's Spirit hath indited, must be by the same spirit interpreted.

This impossibility of true and sound interpretation without God's Spirit, occurs not to some Scriptures, but to all. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : to the letter, All Prophecy is not of any private interpretation. An Hebraism, for, No prophecy is of any, &c. Such a phrase there is, Ro. 3.20. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , &c. All flesh shall not be justified: for, No flesh shall be justified. As the Prophets durst not Proferre dictamina sua, broach their own inventions, so we must not Ingerere acumina nostra, crowd in our own constructions. But beseech him that decreed them to tell us the meaning of them. Samson's riddle could not be dissolved, but by Samson's own mouth. The Jews came to the Prophet: Wilt thou not tell us what these things mean? This was the Angels proclamation. Revel. 5.2. Who is worthy to open the book, and to lose the seals thereof? Who? Verse 3. No man in heaven, nor in earth, nor under the earth, was able to open the book, neither to look thereon. None in heaven, not the Angels none in earth, not living men: none under the earth; this could not be meant of devils or damned spirits; for they of all have no worthiness to open this book. Therefore most probably, it is meant of the Saints, who as touching their bodies sleep in the graves; whom he speaks of in respect of that part which comes nearest to our sense. Jacob says, Gen. 37. Verse 35. I will go down into the grave unto my Son. I, yet was it but his body that could go down thither. So that the place is too cold to kindle the fire of Purgatory. Who then? Vers. 5, The root of David hath prevailed to open the book: none but the Lamb can do it. All doth modulum nostrum superare, we can say nothing but what the Lord doth tell us. By his help and instinction only, we preach and expound the Prophets. He did write by all the Prophets and Apostles. By him did the Fathers interpret them to us, by him we do interpret them to you; only the HOLY GHOST himself interpret them to us all.

For methods sake, I desire to lead your attention thorough these three principal passages. The Suggestion, Conscriptio, and Exposition of holy Scriptures. There be certain adjacent Circumstances which shall find their due places.

The

- Inspiration from God, it was not a vision of their own heads; but they spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.

- The Conscriptio; which albeit it were not by the will of man, yet was it done by the hand of man. They were Men, Holy men, holy men of God.
- The Exposition, which is by no private spirit, but by the Holy Spirits illumination of man's mind, and directing the Church. For as the Invention of them came not by the will of man, so neither doth the exposition of them come by the wit of man.

The Prophecy came not by the will of man, but men spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.] This is the first point; their Indictation, Inspiration, Suggestion. Saint Augustine from this place, condemns their damnable heresy, that esteemed the Holy Ghost less and inferior to the Father and Son: Aut quod sceleratius est, ministrum potius quàm Deum; But, saith he, shall we call him a creature, qui carnem Domini creavit, who created the humanity of CHRIST? Qui Filium Dei misit; Who sent the Son of God? Luke 4.18. The Spirit of the Lord hath sent me to heal, &c. Qui plane Deus, Who is plainly called God? Act. 5.4. Thou hast lied to the Holy Ghost: What is he? the Apostle directly explains it, Thou hast lied unto God, 1 Cor. 3.16. You are the Temple of God, and the Holy Spirit (who is that God) dwelleth in you. Here that Spirit speaketh in the Prophets: Matth. 10.20. he speaketh in the Apostles. It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you. Who is he that doth all this? 2 Tim. 3.16. All Scripture is given by inspiration of God: it is God himself. Will you consider with me some reasons, arguments, and demonstrative proofs; whereby our faith may be confirmed, that all Scripture cometh by the inspiration of God.

1 Consider the infallible completion of things long before prophesied, in their due seasons, 1 King. 13.2. Behold, a child shall be borne unto the house of David, Josiah by name, &c. A man was named five hundred years before he was borne. A right famous man may in that space be easily forgotten upon earth: but to tell now who shall live, or what such an one shall do, a thousand years hence: this can be done by none, but only by him who uno intuitu, with one look beholds all things: with whom nothing is past or to come, but all present.

2 Consider that their being hath continued from Moses unto this day. This is miraculous, that in so great hurly-burlies and alterations, they should not be lost! We must yield, that the Devil would fain have extinguished their light forever; and his instruments were not backward to attempt it: the same Almighty hand that made it, preserved it, and will not let it perish.

3 That the scope of it should be to build up no worldly thing, but only the kingdom of heaven, and to direct us to Jesus Christ, Gal. 3.22. The Scripture hath concluded all under sin, to make way for the promise of faith by Christ. It condemns sin in all, and all for sin; that only such might be saved as trust in him that died for their sins.

4 That it should pass with credit thorough the whole world, and find approbation of all languages, nations, and places. And where it meets with oppositions, should make way thorough them, as thunder thorough the clouds.

5 That the Hebrew tongue, wherein the Old Testament was written, doth so excel all tongues, in Antiquity, Sanctitie, Majesty. Gravitas in sensu, modestas in dictis, Ambros. He knew her, or went in to her, or slept with her. Such is the gracious modesty of the sacred Scriptures.

6 The majesty of the style, which yet is not only powerful in words, but effectual in working: renting the heart, Piercing even to the dividing asunder of the soul and spirit, of the joints and marrow, Heb. 4.12. When I read them, me thinks they are not verba, words; sed tonitrua, but thunders, Hieron. Other Authors, sweet like Mer-maids, had enchanted my Intellect; Blandiebatur virgilius, &c. But Dulcius mihi nunc immurmurat Filius Jesse; Now the Son of Jesse is more pleasant than all, Bern. We have heard the writings of Poets ancient and new so commended, as if Wisdom it self had lived and died with them. And it may be, this is the sin of our Samaria, to commit idolatry with such books. The Turkish History, Herodotus lies, Poetical fictions, scurrilous pamphlets, have thrust the Bible out of our windows. As Angelus Politianus preferred Pindarus his Odes, before David's Psalms. But Jerome otherwise to Paulinus; They may talk of Simonides, Pindarus, Flaccus, and the rest: Horum instar omnium David Psalmist a nobis; One David, that sweet singer of Israel, is to us more worth than all those. 1 Cor. 2.2. I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. Mee thinks there is no Text but Crux, Christ's Cross: no Theme but the hole in his side: no Inke but our Savior's Blood, no Conference but his Merits, no Object but his Obedience, no Oratory but love the Lord Jesus, no Music but bless our God for evermore. We should choose music, as he chose his friend: not him that would be plausible to his humor for a day, but him that should be profitable to his mind during life: so not that music which to flesh is sweetest, but that which lasteth longest. This is the song of Hallelujah, Praising the LORD: this music shall continue forever.

7 From the very baseness of falsehood, we learn to admire the luster of truth. Consider Satan's ambition, though he be the father of lies, to imitate the Scriptural truth. He had his Sorcerers in Egypt, to follow Moses in his wonders; albeit non passibus aequis, they came far short of him. To disgrace and weaken the credit of the Scriptures, he had his Poets and Fabulists, whose Mythologies were obtruded for true reports. But there are three main differences between them: First, there dross was mingled with the gold, water with the wine: happily it was truth, but wronged in the reporting, as a good tale is marred in the telling. That the great Army of Sennacherib was destroyed, both Isaiah and Herodotus agree. But Isaiah says, it was by the Angel of God; Herodotus says, it was by an infinite number of Mise, which in the night-time did eat up the leathers of their armors, targets, and bridles, and hereupon they fled. Secondly, that is said to be derived from the Gentiles to the Jews, which indeed came from the Jews to the Gentiles. Plutarch says that some of the Jews Feasts, yea, their Sabbath-day, and the word Sabbos, was derived from the Feasts of Bacchus. But indeed the solemnities of Bachus came from them, being nothing so ancient as Moses. Thirdly, there have been like reports, but under borrowed names, as Augustine observes. In allusion to the true History of Jonah, his swallowing and egestion by the Whale; Herodotus writes of one Arion; who for his money being thrown over shipboard, a Dolphin took him on his back, and being delighted with his music, carried him to Tanarus, from whence he went to Penander at Corinth, informing him of his received injury, and strange deliverance. But we may justly suspect, that the Greek tale of the one, meant the Hebrew truth of the other. Satan knowing that it was prophesied of CHRIST, Isaiah 42.7. that he should open the blind eyes, unstop the ears of the deaf, make the lame leap like Harts, and the tongues of the dumb to sing, Isaiah 35.6. He feigned an Aesculapius, and gave on as strange wonders of him: and for better facilitating his purpose, he called him the Son of God. Now to wound the Devil with his own weapon, even this argument proves the Divine and indubitate verity of the Scripture. For counterfeits do ever presuppose that there is ever some such thing, as they attempt to resemble. Perkin Warbecke in England, that pretended himself to be Edward the fifth; did manifestly declare that there had been one of that name. Coyners of false metal, imply by their art, that there is some of that stamp good and currant. Alchemists that labor to make gold by projection, intend that there is natural gold. Painters, though they have the liberty, Quidlibet audendi; yet account their art to be a resemblance of that which is, or hath been. So the affected imitation of holy stories is a clear remonstrance, that the subject which they take for pattern, is of justifiable truth, and without exception.

8 Lastly, this is an argument of the finger of God, and supernatural power in holy Writ; that the Penners of it renounced all affection, and delivered the true message even against their own reputations. So did this Holy Spirit over-rule their pens, that they depress and disgrace themselves, and remain exposed as wonderments to all succeeding ages; that all glory may be the LORD'S. If they did amiss, their errors are recorded either by themselves or their friends. The faults of Noah and Lot, are not concealed by him, that honored the memory of Noah and Lot. Luke loved Paul and Barnabas, yet writing their Acts, he speaks of an unbecomming strife between them; which grew so sharp and hot, that they parted, Act. 15.39. Moses in his five Books, as he spared not his brother, nor his sister, nor his wife; neither Aaron, Miriam, nor Zipporah; when they came in his way: so he least of all spared himself. That God had almost slain him for neglect of Circumcision; that when the people murmured, he was one: that he was only permitted to see, not to enter into Canaan: all this he writes of himself. Jeremiah records his own impatience, Ier. 15. David is own blood-guiltiness: Jonah his own uncharitableness, frowardness, and repining at God's mercy. He was the writer, that was the offender; yet he reports the fault as if it had been of a stranger. He sets aside affection to his own credit, runs not into a bush with Adam: but writes his fault on his brow, points the finger at the transgressor under his own proper and individual name. He tells such a tale of himself, that if all his enemies had studied to lash him, they could not have matched it. Men are naturally ambitious, desirous either to blaze their own virtues, or to blanch their own errors. Look upon human pens, how they are dipped in the oil of ostentation! They profess to chronicle the truth; but this friend, or that faction shall have a partial favor. They will not detect the evil that is, but insert the good that is not. But that one should in sobriety write a Treatise, to declare his own faults; this is not found in any Heathen. Tully will not have it buried, that Rome was beholding to him in the cause of Catiline. Plutarch, Aristotle, Plato, Socrates, may write much in their own praise: I never read in them one line of their wickedness. Dion will have the world know, that he was a man employed in matters of State. Josephus is abundant in relating his own stratagems. Horace says of his Poems, that he had set up Monumentum are perennius, regale situ pyramidum altius.

Ovid of his Transmutations; Iamque opus exegi, quod nec Iovis ira, nec ignis, &c. And Ille ego sum nulli nugarum laude secundus. Muhammad's writings extol him for an only Prophet; that he received oracles from heaven: that he shall rise from the dead, but eight hundred years after; a prettie time to try a conclusion in; but there is not a syllable of all his damnable vices. Thus men will be men, humorous, ambitious, self-loving. This cannot be refrained, nor restrained; but that directly or indirectly it will break out. But those whom God employs, cast dung on their own faces, publish their own errors to the ends of the world: that every eye may see, and every tongue confess; All men are sinners; God is only good, and wise, and holy; who is blessed forever. Amen.

Holy men of GOD spake.] This is the second General, the Conscriptio of GOD'S Word. GOD would have his Word written: though it be here said, they spake; yet that they spake is called Scripture, a thing written, Rom. 15.4. Whosoever things were written afore-time, were written for our learning. Wherein observe the Authority, Antiquity, Utility of the Scriptures. It is written, there is the Authority. Afore-time, there is the Antiquity. For our learning, there is the Utility. The voice is vanishing; ask for the voice, and find it in aure, in the ear: ask for the Scripture, find it in aere, written for the eye to look upon. Therefore would God have it written in books, that the syllables might be always in our eyes, so well as the sound in our ears. Hereby we may come to exercise ourselves in it day and night, Psal. 1.2. By this means no man shall add to it, or detract from it. Deut. 4.2. Though the Sound of the thundering Apostles went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world, Rom. 10.18. Yet the holy Ghost would have a Treatise written of all that Jesus did and taught, Act. 1.1. And this shall be intitled The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, Matth. 1.1. The Scripture is a Bible, because it is written: and The Bible, because it excels all other books, both for the matter, and the maker. God would not have his Instruments only Nephthali's, to give goodly words, Gen. 49.21. But that his will be committed to Zebulun, the handler of the pen, Judge. 5.14. Oh that my words were written, oh that they were printed in a book! Job 19.23. What would he have written? the words of his passion? No, but the words of his faith; even the truth of God; I know that my Redeemer liveth. Schismatics are all for a Speaking Scripture: Anabaptists all for an infused Scripture: Papists are all for a Painted Scripture: they love Testes fenestras; with them no lease of the Bible is so authentical as the Painters work in the window. But all true Catholics are only for the written Scripture: And the Lord make this our light and delight to the end.

The Persons that are the Manuaries, directed by God, as a School-master guides the hand of a young writer, have here a threefold description. They are Men, men of God, Holy men of God. Men, there is their Condition: Men of God, there is their Dispensation: Holy men of God, there is their Qualification.

Men; Why did not God choose some other nature of greater authority and credit? 1. That no glory might be ascribed to the means, 2 Cor. 4.7. We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be in God, and not of us. When Sampson with the the jaw of an Ass slew so many; the weaker the weapon, the stronger the man. The infirmity of the instrument makes for the glory of the Agent. 2. In commiseration of man's weakness, Exod. 20.19. They said unto Moses; Speak thou with us, and we will hear: but let not God speak with us, lest we die. The voice of the Lord is like thunder, it will shake in pieces the timorous heart of flesh. 3. For the security of our souls: if our Preacher were an Angel, Satan could transform himself into that show. If one from the dead, the Devil can appear in the shape of Samuel. If by miracles, Iannes and Iombres withstood Moses; and Antichrist shall do wonders. If by visions, the Pagans had their apparitions. 4. In fit response to the work of our redemption: a man died for us, therefore is a man fit to preach this to us, Act. 3.22.

Men of God.] This is an ancient attribute; Viri Dei, Sancti Dei, Nuncii Dei, Prophetae Domini, Prophetae Altissimi, 1 King. 17.18. 1 Tim. 6.11. 2 Tim. 3.17. Men of God. Men not only in request living, but even dead: Princes over Princes: these reign but during life, those even after death: But especially they are called Men of God, because their dispensation comes from God, 1 Cor. 2.13. We speak in the words, we which man's wisdom teacheth, but which God teacheth. So the Prophets came, Os Domini locutum est. The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it, 1 Cor. 11.23. Quod accepi à Domino; I received of the Lord what I delivered unto you, Matth. 22.43. David to Spirit called him Lord, Psal. 45.1. My tongue is the pen of a ready writer; Calamus Scriba, that is, the pen of the Holy Ghost, Psal. 85.8. The vulgar reads; Andiam quid in me loquatur Dominus; I will hear what the Lord will speak in me. Hence was it that the Lord did not manifest all things to them, Semper & Simul, together: but as Paul said to the Church, so God to Paul, Act. 20.20. I have kept back nothing; vobis necessarium, that was profitable to you. Elisha know the king of Syriah's stratagems and plots, which he consulted in his bed-chamber, 2 King. 6.12. Yet he did not know at first the purpose of the Army to Dothan; until his servant told him. He could foretell to the Shunamite, that she should have a son; yet the death of that child was hidden from him, 2 King. 4.27. The Lord hath hid it from me, and hath not told me. He did not presently resolve the three Kings concerning the event of the war; but called for a Minstrel, 2 King. 3.15. And when the Minstrel played, the hand of the Lord came upon him.

Holy men, the LORD that sent them, qualified them. But was this a necessary and inseparable annexion to all the Secretaries of GOD, Holiness? was not Prophecy (without this) incident to some reprobates? Indeed some transient revelations might pass through them, themselves mean-time remaining as wise as Trunkes. Balaam is called a Great Prophet; God opened his mouth: yet did he not in this more favor him than his Ass: he made them both to speak his glory, and Balaam's shame. Saul does prophecy; Nunquid Saul inter Prophetas? Yet he was as far from the Grace of God, as he was from the God of Grace, when he had cast him off. Caiaphas could prophecy the expedience, that one should die for the people, John. 11.51. This he spake not of himself: but being High Priest that year, he prophesied that JESUS should die for that Nation. His Office prophesied, rather than himself. Matth. 7.22. They shall say in the latter day, We have prophesied in thy Name; yet be rejected with a Depart from me, I know you not. But it is on all sides consented, that God's public Notaries, the Canonical Writers, were all regenerate and Holy, the children of light and life: once gracious Saints on earth, now glorious Saints in heaven.

Thus are they qualified: one may be a man, yet not a man of God: a man of God, yet not Holy. To be a man is noble, an emphatical word, Act. 1.11. Men of Galilee. Act. 2.14. Men of Judea. Act. 17.22. Men of Athens. Act. 19.35. Men of Ephesus. 1 King. 2.2. Shew thyself a Man. Multi homines, pauci vtri; One may be Adam, not Ish; Homo, not Vir. As David said to Abner, 1 Sam. 26.15. Nunquid tu Vir es? Art thou not a valiant Man? But to be a Man of God, this is more noble; to be entrusted with the secrets of heaven, the mysteries of Salvation. The Ambassador of a King is of no small account; but these are Legati à latere Divino, the Lord's Legates: Whosoever harmed them, Protinus Deum sensit ultorem; Found God himself their avenger, Matth. 10.16. He that despiseth you, despiseth me. Yet there be some that dare, and that in extremity, do it, though they are sure to be condemned for it. But lastly, to be Holy, this is most noble. Prophecy shall cease, Preaching cease, ministration of Sacraments cease, Holiness shall never cease. There are divers gifts, 1 Cor. 12.31. to be an Apostle, to Prophecy, to teach, to work miracles, to speak with tongues; But let us covet earnestly the best gifts; even our Sanctification. The rest are needful for you, this for ourselves: they bring you to heaven, this must bring us to heaven. That blessed Spirit which hath made us Men, and men of God, make us also Holy men; that our Nazarites may be whiter than the snow, and our Priests purer than the Sapphires.

No prophecy of the Scripture is of any private Interpretation.] These Holy men were the Sacraries and Secretaries of GOD, the Registers of his Royal Covenant. Now as they could not speak or write, but by the Spirits inspiration; so neither can we expound what they have written, but by the same Spirits Interpretation, 1 Cor. 12.10. Interpretation is given by the Spirit. He that expounds the Scripture upon the warrant of his own spirit only; doth lay the brands of the fire together without the tongs, and is sure at least to burn his own fingers. Solomon confessed that he studied for his Doctrines, Eccles. 12.10. The Preacher sought to find out acceptable words; yet was he the wisest man. Daniel was a famous Prophet, yet he desired respite to expound. Nebuchadnezzar's dream, Dan. 2.16. Is the Scripture lighter than a dream? or Nunquid tu sapientior Daniele? Art thou wiser than Daniel? It is true that all right and sober exposition is of God. Dan. 2.28. It is God in heaven that revealeth secrets. But the Lord doth not now reveal this to us in visions and dreams: but sets us to ordinary means; conferring with orthodox writers, turning over many books, zealous invocation to the Father of lights, studious observing the context of Scriptures. You think our preaching and expounding the word to be very easy; indeed so it might be, if we should do with our Sermons, as you do with your moneys. They are not Sermons, that come forth like untimely births, from uncircumcised lips, and unwashen hands. I know there are some, that think scorn to bring a premeditated Sermon: that were to tie the Holy Ghost to an inkehorne: No, turn the Cock, and let it run. They say, they bring Sermons of God's own making, because they took no pains in the composing. As if this were to preach in the Evidence of the Spirit, and demonstration of power. But as every sound is not music, so every Sermon is not Preaching. Speaking is from custom, but saying from Art. Psal. 45.1. My heart is inditing a good matter: It was Sermo natus in pectore; a speech first conceived and borne in his heart. John the Baptist went before CHRIST to prepare his ways: so our heart must go before our tongue to prepare our words. We must hew the stones before we bring them to the building, or they will never couch in order. He that cometh wildly to this holy work, shall be driven to beat the air, and to seek up and down for matter, as Saul sought for his fathers Asses. As we study for your good, so do you pray we may study to your good; that we may bring you to the Scripture, and the Scriptures bring you to salvation.

I conclude; the Sum of this whole Chapter hath been a sweet Garden of Grace and mercy. The first Flower, was a Salutation, and that is a wish of mercy. The second, a Promise, and that is a word of mercy. The third, a Consolation, and that is a work of mercy. The fourth, an Exhortation, and that is the way to mercy. The fifth, a witness of our Election, and that is an Assurance of mercy. The sixth, an Induction to heaven upon earth, and that is an high degree of mercy. The seventh, a Testimony from heaven, and that was the voice of mercy. The eight, a Word of performed Prophecy, and that was an argument of mercy. The ninth, an Illumination of the Gospel, and that is a light of mercy. The last, is the glory of heaven, and that is the full day and perfection of mercy. Through these blessed degrees my discourse hath brought you: first we begun with Peace, then dwelt long with Grace, and lastly are come to Glory. This Peace possess your consciences, this Grace beautify your hearts, and this Glory crown all your souls. Now unto him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy: to the only wise God our Savior, be glory and Majesty, dominion and power, now and forever. Amen.

AN EXPOSITION UPON THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERALL OF THE HOLY APOSTLE, Saint PETER. CHAP. II.

VER. I.

But there were false Prophets among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction.

The conclusion of the former Chapter was in a sweet color of truth, the Induction of this begins with a discovery of error. Damnable doctrine bound up in a fair cover; resembling that Romish practice, of poisoning an Emperor in the Sacrament. Here is a true Prophecy of a false prophecy: I tell you truly, that some shall come to teach you falsely. The Church of God cannot escape this danger, so long as there is a sheep-skin to be gotten for a Wolf to mask in: or a Sorcerer, Elymas can put on the name of Bar-jesus, Act. 13.6. These have been, these will be; As it was then, so is it now, Gal 4.29. And so it will continue until time hath housed all God's friends, and imprisoned all his enemies; till it hath melted the world in a furnace, and cast it in a new mould. You have a Sure word, sit fast in your adherence: there will come furious champions to thrust you from your handfast; beware that they do not weaken your faith in Jesus CHRIST.

There were Prophets indeed, but durst there be false prophets? Yes, false prophets. But it may be they were among uncircumcised Pagans, not in Israel: yes 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , among the people, that People, emphatically; chosen for the Lord's own Peculiar. Well, but that danger is past, they are condemned and gone: Nay, be not too secure, Erunt, there will be still false teachers. The devil loves no vacancy; if he can help it with supply, the chair of Antichrist shall never be empty. Indeed these may be admitted amongst the heretics of their own tribe, in that land of darkness where the truth is forgotten: but they will not presume into the light? Yes, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, among you; that know the truth, and to whom the glorious Sun shineth. They will venture to vent the devils commodities even among you. What are those wares? Heresies: alas, that is but their own election or opinion, and can do little hurt. Yes, they are damnable heresies, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, exitiall, of destruction. If they do, I hope we shall easily distinguish them: howsoever, they will bring them in, speed as they can But the Church discerning it, will shut her doors against them: nay, but they will do it Privily, cunningly, steal them in. Oh what pernicious malice are those Impostors? So impudent, that they dare deny the Lord, their Maker; the Lord that bought them, their Savior. What shall be their end? Destruction. How long shall it be deferred? not a jot, it shall be Swift and sudden. How shall it come? it shall be brought. Who shall bring it? Themselves upon themselves. They bring upon themselves swift destruction. This is the Exposition, now for the disposition of these words. Three Generalls; A

- Narration; There were false Prophets, &c.
- Caution; There shall be false Teachers.
- Description, how to know them; They shall privily, &c.

In the narration consider these particulars, The - Connection of the words; Also.

- Corruption of the persons; False Prophets.
- Intrusion of their mischief; Among the people of God.

In the caution we observe three other branches, by which we perceive and Find

- Who they be that assault us, False Teachers.
- Whither they press; Among you, even Christians.
- The unavoidable necessity of them, Erunt, they will be with you, you cannot help it.

In the description, they were declared to us by three mischiefs or evils: One - That issues from them, Seminale malum, noxious to others. They bring in damnable heresies.

- That abides in them, Criminale malum, making themselves guilty; Denying the Lord that bought them.
- That falls upon them, Paenale malum, their own plague; They bring us themselves swift destruction.

In the former mischief or evil, consider two things: Both

- What they bring in; Damnabable heresies.
- How they bring them in; Privily.

The second evil is aggravated by a threefold gradation: That

- They do not only neglect, but Deny him.
- Not a man, not a King, not an Angel; but The Lord.
- Not only their Creator, but Savior; That bought them.

The last evil is described by The - Measure, it is no less than Destruction.

- Manner, it is Swift, sudden, unprevented.
- Author, even Themselves. They bring on themselves.

There were false Prophets also among the people.] I begin with the narration, which hath recurrence to those past times, the state of the Church under the Law. Who being the beloved people of GOD, yet were not exempted from that exercise of their faith, by the seducements of false Prophets. To proceed in order.

There were also. This is the connection; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , Also, implies that there were always true Prophets; such as he formerly had specified: otherwise he could not say here; Also false prophets. Where behold God's careful indulgence to his children, that never leaves them without Tutors. Zach. 1.5. The Prophets do not live forever: there is no everlasting Priest but JESUS CHRIST. Moses and Samuel are dead, Paul and John have laid down their Tabernacles. Yet still the Lord raiseth up Ministers to stand before his Alter, and to keep the holy fire of the Sanctuary from going out. Some have observed that Jonah began his Prophecy with And, or Also. Which intends a conjunction, either of Jonah with other Prophets, or Nineveh with other Cities, or of the business related with other affairs: as if it began a book without a beginning, and continued a course of some precedent dealings. When one Lamp is spent, God will also send another: when one star sets, another rises. The Church shall be no more destitute of Ministers, than the Firmament can be without stars. God will not leave his house without builders, till the edifice be perfectly finished. Eph. 4.13. He placeth Pastors and Teachers, to the edifying of his body, until we all meet unto a perfect man. This comforts us, that if our sins cause not God to remove our candlestick from us, we shall have shining lamps in our Church, until we be all lighted to the kingdom of heaven. The Greeks of Constantinople had store of wealth, but because they would spare none of it to the reparation and defense of the City, they lost all to the Turks, which afterwards no money could recover. The foolish virgins, to spare a shilling, bought no oil: but when their lamps were out, and the Bridegroom came, what would they have given, what would they not have given, for a little oil? I pray God this prove not the unfortunate case of this land: we have store of lamps to light us to heaven, but we are so niggardly of oil to feed them, that they must needs at last go out, and leave us darkling. It is no wonder, if God take from us Altaria, our Altars; who have taken from him Altaragia, his Tythes and offerings. Psal. 74.8. They have burnt up all the Synagogues in the Land: if men do so, no marvel though they complain, as it is in the next verse. We see not our Signs, there is not one Prophet among us. We have done our best, or rather our worst, to make our souls one day complain; there is not a Prophet left among us.

There were false Prophets.] Falsehood is an aberration from the Truth: they are false Prophets that teach false things. Matth. 7.15. Beware of false Prophets. The master there, as the servant here, having first shown the right way, cautioneth us of things hurtful in the way. Beware of heresy, which corrupteth the pure fountains of holy faith. False Prophets may be taken in a threefold sense; literally, mystically, or as they are taken here.

Literally, so are tell-tale Astrologers, who have learned in the devils Academy to cozen the world with false alarms. Aures verbis divitant alienas, ut opibus domus locupletent suas. Alas, how can they tell another's end or infelicity, that are ignorant of their own? Qui sibi nescius, cui praescius? CHRIST bids us beware of false Prophets, what will he judge of those that run to them? A thief hath stolen thy beast, and thou in going to the wizard, runnest after him with thy soul. Thus when one takes away the child's apple, he throws the bread after him. Will not the devil laugh to see two such thieves meet together in his kingdom? Levite. 19.31. Regard not them that have familiar spirits, neither seek after wizards, to be defiled by them. Regard them not, if you do, the LORD will not regard you.

Mystically, the devil is a false Prophet: he calls evil good, and promiseth to bad attempts good events. Either he conceals the end from the way, or the way from the end. Thou mayest travel the way of lust, yet not come to the end of it, damnation. Or thou mayest come to the end of thy hope, salvation; yet never limit thyself to the way of grace. These are all false prophecies, and this is that false Prophet which coozens the world. He sped so unhappily with our first parents: you may eat of the forbidden tree, yet be like God's: it was false, for he knew that so eating would make them like devils. The world is such a false Prophet, like those lying spirits to Ahab. Go up to Ramoth Gilead and prosper, 1 King. 22.12. It promiseth like a Lord, as the Lord of it did to the Lord of all; All these will I give, Matth. 4.4. It was false, for all this glory is but a shadow; umbra transit, and leaves the substance of bitterness behind it. The world says; Your houses shall continue forever: it is a false prophecy; for man abides not in honor, Psal. 49.12. The world says your gold shall make you blessed: it is a false prophecy, it rather makes men cursed.

The flesh is a false prophet. Psal. 14.1 The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God: false, for he shall find a God to judge the earth. Every affected sin is a false prophet to the soul. Falsehood, if it cannot deceive another, will deceive it self: as Chrysostom observes on the Psalm. Mentita est iniquitas sibi, wickedness lied to it self, Luk. 12. Worldliness flattered the rich man with immortality in his barns false, for his passing-bell went that night. Presumption of health whispers that thou art at a league with death: false, for death is at no league with thee. Be not beguiled, as Alexanders flatterers would have gulled him with the title of Jupiter's son: least being wounded, thou cry to thy flesh, as he did to his friends; this is the blood of a man, not such as issueth from the gods. Love of wine prophesies to the drunkard; To morrow shall be as today, and much more abundant, Esa. 56.12. False, for Joel. 1.5. Awake and howl ye drunkards, for the wine is cut off from your mouth. Ambition flatters the haughty. Esa. 14.13. I will exalt my throne above the stars of God, I will arise out of the dust to sit with Princes: false, for thou shalt be brought down to the grave, and to the sides of the pit: thou shalt fall from the throne to the dust. Infidelity persuades, there shall be no reckoning, epicurisme dreams of no future life; false, for the Lord shall take them away as with a whirlwind: so that a man shall say, Verily there is a God that judgeth the earth. Pleasure says like Babylon, I am a Queen, I shall see no mourning: false, for the day of lamentation comes, worse than the wailing of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddo. Pride whispers the beautiful; nature's colors will last; if not, artificial ones shall help: false, for art it self shall make a fool of nature, time make a fool of art, death make a fool of all. But presumption says, God will have mercy upon all: false, for a small number is saved. But CHRIST'S blood paid for all men's sins: false, for some tread that sacred blood under their feet. But if the worst come, says carnal hope, I will be sure to repent: false prophecy, for thousands are in hell that promised themselves this evasion: thou hast no patent of repentance.

Thus Satan is a false Prophet, in making sour to seem sweet, this is deceptio gustus. The world a false Prophet, in making shadows appear substances, this is deceptio visus. The flesh a false Prophet, in calling frail things durable, this is deceptio auditus. In a word, every man is naturally a false Prophet to himself, lying to his own soul. Vis tollere mendacem? tolle teipsum. Wouldest thou punish a liar? punish thyself. Do not kill thy life, but kill thy lust: mortify thy false-hearted affections, ut tu vivas, that thyself mayest live. Moriatur iniquitas, ne moriatur iniquus: let the sin be mortified, that the sinner may be saved. Thou needest no falser a prophet, than thou art to thyself. Psal. 140.1. Deliver me O Lord, from the evil man. Augustine studiously considers who this evil man should be: he knew that he had many enemies, perhaps Satan might be that evil man: at last he lights upon the evil man, and that was himself. Domine, libera a me; Lord deliver me from myself; deliver Augustine from Augustine. Let me ask my soul this question. Gal. 5.7. Who did hinder me, that I should not obey the truth? Who? mihi obsto, I have been false to myself. Qui sibi nequam, cui bonus? Hence there is so little fidelity of man to man, because there is so little faith of man to himself. He that is not true to his own soul, will never be good to me. An oppressor gaping for a young Gentleman's estate lately mortgaged to him, sent him in pretence of love a loose fellow to accompany him, and increase his luxury: he smelt it, and wittily returned his answer; I thank him for his care to set me forward: but tell him, I can spend my estate fast enough myself, I need no help. So what need Satan send false Prophets to them, that are false Prophets to themselves? If we desire to prevent all instruments of error from working upon us, let us be faithful to ourselves, in being faithful to Christ.

The last sort of Prophets false, are these meant here, which are of two sortes. 1. They that came in the name of God, but were never sent from God, Ier. 23.21. I have not sent these Prophets, yet they ran: I have not spoken to them, yet they have prophesied. Therefore is it said, The word of the Lord came to Jeremiah, came to all the true Prophets: it was of the Lord's sending, not of their own fetching. Rom. 11.34. Who hath known the mind of the Lord at any time? surely none but they to whom he taught •t. I received of the Lord, saith Paul: God must infuse, before we effuse: the springs of our hearts must be filled from that ocean, before we can derive drink to the thirsty. Christ must give us this bread, and then we cause the people to sit down, and we break it unto them. Moses would not go to Pharaoh, till he had learned his lesson of God. Esa. 40.6. The voice said, cry: the Prophet replied, What shall I cry? he will not trust his own invention, but take his Text at the mouth of the Lord: what was it, All flesh is grass. They that preach the visions of their own heads, have their woes shadowed out, and yet but shadowed, with wormwood and gall. Jer. 23.15. I will feed them with wormwood, and make them drink the waters of gall. Their cup is so tempered by Ezekiel, the head and foot of their curse being full of unhappiness, their welcome a Woe, their farewell an Anathema. Ezek. 13.3. Woe unto the foolish Prophets, that follow their own spirit. ver. 9, They shall not be written in the writing of the house of Israel.

Secondly, they that come in God's name, and are sent, but deliver a false message when they are come. They are called False, because they be falsifiers of God's holy word; like the cunning lapidary, that sells a Byrall for a Diamond. No messenger of the Lord must go beyond the bounds of his commission, by adding his own devices: nor come to short of it, by keeping back his Masters counsels. It is a fearful protestation in the end of the Bible, summing and sealing up all the curses and woes that went before. Revel. 22.19. If any man shall take away from the words of this book, God shall take away his part out of the book of life. If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues, that are written in this book. It hath terror enough to amaze all those, that dare set their sacrilegious hands to these nice and religious mysteries. He that ventures to broach the dregs for wine, traditions of men for the constitutions of God; unwritten truths, untrue writings, for those sacred sanctions, to father lies on the Father of truth; and teach the bastards of his own brain to call the wisdom of heaven Father: He hath said it, when he said it not; this is the false Prophet. This was Saint Paul's earnest charge to Timothy. I give thee charge in the sight of God who quickeneth all things, and before JESUS CHRIST, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession. 1 Tim. 6. Keep that which is committed to thy trust: doubling his charge with intensive adjuration. Keep it, for enemies watch to purloine it: Quod tibi creditum, non quod a te inventum: a thing entrusted to thee, not invented of thee: a matter not of thy wit, but of thy learning; whereof thou art a Scholar, not a Master. How keep it; as the miser keeps in his corn? No, feed the poor with it, divide it in right order and matter: thou hast received gold, return gold: be sure to impart the same, neither more nor less, but just weight: ut cum dicas nove, non dicas nova; though thou speak in a new method, let it be old substance. Some have too many fingers on their hand, like the Giant of Gath: some too few, like those whom Adonibezek maimed: some offend in excess, some in defect. But keep thou a steady flight: so did a bad Prophet against his will; when his fingers itched for the gold, Numb. 24.13. so did a good Prophet resolutely; What the Lord saith unto me, that will I speak. If men add to that word, he that hath power to add plagues while everlastingness can add years, shall increase them to a thousand fold. If they diminish, he that can diminish blessings so low, that not the least dram shall remain, will retails their doings into their own bosoms.

Among the people:] this is the intrusion of these false prophets, even among the people of God. But durst these black impostors press into so famous a light, and not fear discerning? Yes, examine, 1 King. 18.9. and 1 King. 22.16. they come by the hundreds. Corah had his confederates, who would with violence have snatched the Priests office out of their hands. Nadab and Abihu had their strange fires. Deut. 13.2. Eamus & sequamur deos alienos: was this charge in vain? were there never any such? These unblest tares have ever sprung up in God's field: and no man can doubt of such prophets on earth, that knows there is a devil in hell. It hath been his impudent malice, thus ever to oppose himself against God's omnipotence. God had his true Prophets to instruct the people, Satan had his false prophets to seduce the people. As the Lord had Angelos majestatis suae, Angels of his Majesty: so had Satan Angelos crudelitatis suae, angels of his cruelty. God had his laws written in two Tables, Satan had his counterfeit laws in twelve tables. God had Ponifices suos, Satan had Flamines suos. He had his Temples, Sacrifices, Altars, Oracles, in a bravery so well as God. If God's people sing, Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised: the devil hath his people that can cry loud enough two hours together, Great is Diana of the Ephesians. God had his Levites to keep the fire perpetually alive on his Altar; Satan had his vestall virgins, Sacri ignis sempiternae custodes. Neither had he these false Instruments abroad only in the wild forest of the world; but he brought them into God's own garden. He that durst presume to be proud in heaven, and to play the devil in Paradise; trust him not in his own walk and Regiment. Well we may do our best to bar them out, and beseech him that keeps Israel to shut them out: but in they will come, into our doors, the HOLY GHOST keep them out of our hearts forever. I conclude.

It was thus with them, in it we may see, our own case. Cernimus in prisco jam nostra pericula mundo. They say, it is half a protection to foreknow a danger: behold the Apostles fidelity, and therein God's mercy, we are forewarned. Precedents give light to succeeding times: we see further than the Fathers; because like dwarfes we get up on their shoulders; we see with eyes and our own also. So Diogenes might brag that he had more wit than his mother; because he had his mother-wit and his own too. There is no treasure so much enricheth our mind as learning: no learning so appliable to our life as history, no history so directing as Example, no example so worthy our observing as that is written by God's own finger. It was an old saying, Optimum est alienâ insaniâ frui: to get knowledge by another's expense and experience, is as it were to feed fat on another's man's cost. Israel was God's people so well as we; yea in respect of their faith, our Fathers: therefore if they were tempted by false prophets and sinned, if they sinned and were punished: let not us having the same danger, and erring in the same manner, think to escape the same punishment. 1 Cor. 10.11. All these things happened unto them for ensamples, and are written for our admonition. God hath set up these sins as crocodyles to terrify us, and we entertain them as Sirens to seduce us. Ver. 7. Be not ye idolaters, as were some of them. Paul like a good scribe, brings out of his treasure things both old and new: there is both an historiall narration, and a theological application. Now lege historiam, ne fias historia: read the history of others, lest thou be made a history to others. If the errors of former ages cannot teach us for the time present, our delinquishments wherein we perish shall teach the succeeding ages for the time to come. Cannot the example of Judas teach thee to be no traitor? of Elymas, to be no Sorcerer? of Gehesi, to be no bribe-taker? of Achan, to abhor Sacrilege? of Nabal, to be no Churl? Then the wretched exorbitances coupled with God's fearful judgments, shall teach others hereafter, 2 King. 1.14. The third Captain seeing the two former miscarrying in the business, could learn to humble himself; Let my life be precious in thy sight. They were miserable, that thou mightest be happy: if thou wilt not repent, others shall be made happy by thy being miserable. This a very Jezebel could oppose to Jehu, 2 King. 9.31. Had Zimri peace, which slew his master? As if she had concluded; Seeing thou wilt not take example by Zimri, thou shalt be example to others. The Lord left not Israel without true Prophets: Yet he sent Prophets to them, to bring them again to the Lord, but they would not give care: therefore he suffered false prophets, and to them they hearkened. Behold now their example exposed unto us: God sends us Preachers that declare the right way of salvation, delivering their message from his own Word: for Scriptum, Praescriptum, the Scripture is their Theme. They say, Give obedience to Kings, Let every soul be subject to the higher powers: there be others that say, An heretical King (and he must be so that an heretical Pope so pronounces) can challenge no faithful allegiance: are not these false prophets? The true Prophets say, Of all that thou hast thou shalt give me the tenth; this is a Dixit Dominus, the Lord's reservation. Some say, thou art bound neither to give tenth nor twentieth, but what thou list; is not this a Dixit Sacrilegus? Is not this a false prophet? As the former absolve subjects of their duties to Kings: so these latter absolve men of their duties to the Church. The true Prophets say, Thou shalt not take usury of thy brother: some say, thou mayest, if not above ten in the hundred: are not these false prophets? Observe how Israel sped: In the time of this distress did he trespass yet more against the Lord: this is that King Ahaz. That, emphatically, that infamous, that impious King; branded with a note in the margin, a dash of the Holy Ghosts pen; like a sea-mark to point out a shelf, that no vessel be spilled by such a wickedness. What did he? He sacrificed unto the gods of Damascus, which smote him. Frantick idolatry, to do service to Idols that smote him! Then he turned to the gods of Syria: he would take no warning: they kill him; They were the ruin of him, and of all Israel: when you follow other gods, is it a wonder if God destroy you? Did he not for this cause cast out the nations before you? were not they your precedents? So saith Christ, Remember Lots wife. These things are recorded in holy Writ, not for imitation, but for prevention. When the comical Poet was accused, because he brought a profane fellow upon the stage, and so gave bad example to young men: true, replies he, but I hanged him before he went off, and so gave good warning to young men. Having such a caution, if we fall into the same transgression, we shall be rewarded with a double affliction: Therefore whosoever slayeth Cain, vengeance shall be taken on him sevenfold. Therefore; because Cain's example of murder went before, so Lamech concludes to his wives, If Cain shall be avenged sevenfold, then truly Lamech seventy and seven-fold. Now the Lord give us wary hearts, that being warned of sin, we may be armed against sin. That dangers of others may make us circumspect, the troubles of others strengthen our patience, the sinfulness of others quicken our penitence; that the pride of others may make us humble, and the miseries of others occasion our eternal blessedness.

Even as there shall be false teachers among you.] Do not you think to speed better than God's beloved Church of Israel: for this is that kind of temptation wherewith he is wont to exercise his children. There is no other condition of the Church under Gospel, than was under the Law. When this trial comes, let not the novelty of it molest you: what was common with them, let it not seem strange to you. But the Prophets did promise solid peace, clear light, and the perfection of all good things at the coming of Christ; The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the child shall play at the hole of the Asp: They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain. To him was reserved that honor; That though the Law was given by Moses, Grace and Truth came by Jesus Christ. Therefore there is no disquietness expected in the state of the Christian Church. But there was no promise of such a peace, as should utterly acquit the faithful from combats and conflicts. There is peace from the dominion of sin, damnation of the Law, and terror of conscience. But there is still a Devil, and a serpentine breed; who finding that the Gospel hath given a wound to the peace of hell; are the more busy to give a wound to the peace of the Gospel. Let us quiet our hearts in the remembrance of this, which the Spirit of God hath pronounced; there must be expected on earth no immunity from this intestine evil. The same trial abides the children, which set upon the fathers: Non sum melior patribus meis, I am not better than my Fathers: Erunt, there shall be, an indefinite word comprehending all future times: so that no age hath had a vacation from these turbulent falsehoods. He speaks of them generally, and doth not paint them out in their particular kinds and colors: but Erunt, They will be: and Inter vos, among you, among us, God grant they be not of us. Now because these evil spirits threaten to haunt the house of Christ, and to run like familiars up and down the earth, to do the devils errands, that their purpose may be infatuated, let us unmask their faces. For I called this second general point, the caution or premonition: and I desire to method my discourse into these three circumstances: 1. Who they be that assault us. 2. Whither they press. 3. Their unavoidable necessity: the use of all which is in conclusion, how they may be discerned and eschewed.

False teachers.] What this falsehood is, you have formerly perceived; observe now how it insinuates it self: this is always in the semblance of Truth. For Error is so foul a hag, that if it should come in the own shape, nuda facie, all men would loath it. If Jezebel had not painted her self, she had not gotten so many doting adulterers. Those Wolves come evermore in sheep's-clothing: Sub pelle ovina Lupus rapax. As the fowler by the benefit of his stalking horse murders the fowls: who but for their familiar knowledge of the beast their friend, would mistrust the man their enemy. Mary, saith Christ, shall come in my Name: Nomine meo, non suo; not in their own name, for then their words would not be taken. The sects of former ages came in other names: as the name of Stoics, of Peripatetics: and in the Church, the name of Pharisees, the name of Sadducees: but since Christ all come Nomine meo, in his Name. Sub specie veritatis veritatem vulnerant; They wound the Truth in her own coat: as Jacob put on the garments of Esau his brother, to deceive Isaac his Father: so these in the apparel of their elder brother Christ, seek to beguile the Church their Mother. It is no wonder if there be false Teachers, when there shall be false christs. Strong impudence of men, that they dare call themselves by his Name on earth, that sits on the right hand of Majesty in heaven. Now that this Prophecy of our Savior was true, experience hath justified. Among the Persians, one Manes, with his twelve Apostles, called himself the Comforter of Israel. Bencosben was received of the very Rabbi's for thirty years together, as their Messiah. Stella in Luc. reports that in Setuvall, in the kingdom of Portugal, in our time, arose one that called himself the Messias. Your selves have heard of David George, and of ungracious Hacquet, with his two prophets of mercy and justice, who impiously usurped that incommunicable name of the Messias

But what say you to our Pope-holy catholikes; dare not they obtrude a thing that shall say, Ego sum Christus, I am Christ? Yes, if it could speak; but because it cannot, they will speak for it. Every Easter-day early in the morning the Priest fetcheth his wooden Crucifix out of the Sepulcher; and after walking about the Churchyard in solemn procession, goes to the Church-door, where he knocketh, and saith; Open O ye gates, and be ye set open ye everlasting doors, that the King of glory may come in. The Sexton knows his qu, attends within, and replies; Who is the King of glory? The Priest holding up his Crucifix, answers; This is the King of glory: the Lord strong almighty in battle; this is the Lord of glory. Is not this just according to our Savior's prediction; Some shall say, Loe, here is Christ? Alas, that is not a glorious King, but an inglorious Idol, unable to wipe the dust from it own face. Among them, who can make the well-favouredst god, is the best Catholic. The Baker and the Painter contended who should make the best christ: Hic fuco doctior, ill foco. Paint. I can make a fair god with my colors. Bak. No, thou makest but the shadow; it is I that make the substance. Paint. Thy god is torn with men's teeth. Bak. And thine is gnawed with worms. Paint. My god lasteth many years, whereas one hour swallows an hundred of thine. Bak. Thou canst scarce make one god in a month: I can make a thousand in half an hour. Hereupon the Mass-priest came in as moderatour, fretting; I am sorry sirs, you are no wiser: Who can make god? none but the Sacrificer. But we say of such gods, as Clemens Alexander. Ego didici terram calcare, non adorare; I have learned to tread upon the earth, not to worship it.

Thus doth false teachers come in the counterfeit of truth. Indeed the Jews were apt to embrace any that came Nomine proprio; in their own name, John. 5.43. If one come in his own name, him will ye receive. It is not so now: the world is wiser, therefore the Devil must double his subtlety. And if he would bring men to the kingdom of hell, he must make them believe that he is altogether for the kingdom of heaven. 2 Sam. 16.18. If Hushai had not said, I am for Absalom, and whom Israel chooseth, his will I be: He had not disappointed the counsel of Achitophel, which was then like the oracle of God; nor re-established David in his kingdom. So if these false doctors should not say, we are for Christ; they could not with-stand the true Ministers that deliver the words of God, nor in throne Antichrist in the Seat of Christ. Thus in our time, the Romish heretics cry, The Church, The Church: and the Schismatikes in their invective Pamphlets usually make bold with the Prophets words; For Zion's sake I will not hold my peace. But the one seek to bring upon God's Israel a tyranny; the other an Anarchy; both meet in one Tertio, corruption of doctrine, and destruction of conscience. Pro Ecclesia clamitant, & contra Ecclesiam dimicant, Cyprian. They both cry for the Church, yet fight against the Church. Omnes amici, omnes inimici, Bern. Their pretences are friendly, their intentions malicious. You see how they come, and but for so coming, their powder would not take: if the cup of their poison was not rubbed with honey, it would not down. There be two defects which make a man either an unfit Teacher, or a false Teacher. When either they have not learned their lesson before they come, and so lack ability: or do not deliver it faithfully when they are come, and so lack honesty.

1 They that want aptitude and requisite graces: God touched Esayes tongue with a live-coal from his Altar: gave Ezekiel a roll to eat: shut up that sacred fire in Jeremiah's bones: teacheth the lips to preserve knowledge: to minister a word in due season to him that is weary, Isaiah 50.4. So ordering the words, that they shall be like Apples of gold with pictures of silver, Prov. 25.11. There is no ability to preach without God, Mic. 3.7. They shall cover their lips, for there is no answer of God. We look now for no enthusiasms, nor venture our Sermons upon extemporal rhapsodies; with a Dabatur in hora; no more but turn the cock, and let it run. It may run indeed, but still we complain as they did of the waters of Jericho: The water is naught, and the ground still barren. It may run, and run apace, because like Ahimaaz, it runs by the way of the plain. For this cause are Schools and Universities erected, to be Ecclesiae Plantaria, the nurseries of learning. Being like that Persian tree, which at the same time doth bud, and blossom, and bear fruit. Some are in the bud of hope, others in the flower of knowledge, others ripe for practice. Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, Act. 7.22. Paul was brought up at the feet of a great Doctor, Act. 22.3. Timothy knew the Scriptures of a child, 2 Tim. 3.15.. Augustine was beautified with variety of gifts; Jerome omnium trium linguarum peritus; Excellent at the three most famous Languages. The Apostles themselves went not immediately out of the Ship-boat into the Pulpit: they were first Christ's Scholars, before they became the worlds Teachers, Matth. 11.19. Wisdom is justified of her children. If they come without this qualifying, they are the worlds own changelings, wrongfully laid at Wisdomes doors. They enter in at a Non licetgate; and they that admit them, suffer wise-men's rights to be entailed to fools While barbarous ignorants steal into the Church, the same way that Totilas entered Rome; Porta asinaria. As Pope Adrian inscribed his College; Trajectum plantavit, Lovanium rigavit, Caesar autem incrementum dedit; The Bishop of Trajectum planted, of Lovaine watered; but Caesar gave the increase: no more. Another therefore in scorn subscribed; Hic Deus nihil fecit; here God did nothing. So Simony planted, Ambition watered, and Covetousness gives the increase: but let them take heed lest they find this under-written; Hic Deus nihil fecit; Here the Lord had no hand, here he will give no blessing.

2 They that have gotten knowledge, but want honesty; and these are the most dangerous seducers, 2 Cor. 11.13. Such are false Apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the Apostles of CHRIST. When Ahithophel's head stands upon Simon Magus his shoulders, there is a world of mischief towards. A will bent to do harm, and a wit able to prosecute it; like Cannon-shot makes a lane where it goes. Such a Prophet was Balaam, he could not make Israel cursed by his Prophecy, therefore he tries to effect it by his policy. He sends a troop of Moabitish whores among them: that so they might be tempted to offend GOD, and GOD might cease to defend them. He had confessed before, Numb. 23.23. That there could be no Inchantment nor witchcraft against Israel. No devils, but those she-devils could do it. A whore is that damnable witch that often brings a Saint in danger of a curse. In this rank is that rank rabble of Jesuits: they have fired their brains at Machiavels forge, and cast their hearts in the mould of Antichrist; and now they are fitted to steal away souls from JESUS. These are Satan's Emissaries, the Popes Seminaries, the Lands Incendiaries, the worlds Voluptuaries, the bane of a kingdom that harbours them. The cruellest murderers. He that lets out the blood, the body kills: But he that breaks hearts-peace, the dear soul spills. O that these Foxes were un-earth'd from their theevish boroughs, and our Land preserved from that kind of false Teachers! Their very mercies are cruel; we know their bloody purposes both to souls and bodies. The Lord or his mercy cast them forever far from us; and let all people, that have, or desire to have, in themselves and their Posterity, the heads of good subjects, and the hearts of good Christians, say Amen.

Among you.] This is the second point, the Place whither these false Teachers come; unto you, to the Church. So Mat. 7.15. Beware of false Prophets which come to you. Not to the Turks, or Gentiles, or other heretics only; but to you, that have the Gospel. They seem to come unto you, but indeed they come against you: they promise your good, but they perform your hurt. Here may be demanded, why GOD doth suffer such in the Church? For Paul saith, 1 Cor. 11.19. Oportet heresies esse; There must be heresies among you. Now there is an Oportet of necessity, and of duty: in respect of the latter, Oportet heresies non esse; saith Augustine; There must not be heresies. This is an oportet of consequence: the Apostle concludes it necessarily, upon the presupposition of Satan's malice and man's wickedness. Neither is this prediction any cause of it: a man sees some loose companions set close to drinking: hereupon he says, These men will be drunk: the necessity is not because he said so, but because they will do so. Another sees men quarrelling, and multiplying incensive terms, he says, These men will fight; he doth not cause their combat: they would have done it, though he had never said it. So we perceive the air cloudy, the weather muddy; we say, it must needs rain: it doth; yet never the sooner because we spake it. So Peters Erunt, and Paul's Oportet, do not cause this false teaching, but premonish it.

First, God suffers these for the trial of our faith, 1 Cor. 11.19. There must be heresies, that the approved among you may be made manifest. Deut. 13.3. When a Prophet or Dreamer shall say to us, Come let us go and serve other gods; hearken not to him; for now the Lord proveth you. Many pass for gold, whom this touchstone often proves counterfeit. A man is what he is, when he is tried: *Accedit, te... quasi interrogatio; A temptation is like a question; that examines what is in a man. Joseph's Chastity never shone out so fairly, as when he fled from the arms of his tempting mistress. He that hears the Sirens sing, and with an holy \diamond comes off fairly, God seals him up with a Probatas est. Thus was Balaam lost, when Balak told him; Am not I able indeed to promote thee to honor? Numb. 22.37. But not so Moses who chose rather affliction with the people of God, than the pleasures of sin for a season, Hebr. 11.25. Yet he well enough knew the delights of the Court, being the place where he had his education.*

Secondly, God suffers them, that the true Pastors might more painfully and patiently exercise their knowledge. If Arius and Sabellius had not vexed the Church, the deep mysteries of the Trinity had not been so accurately cleared by the Catholic Doctors. Heresy makes men sharpen their wits, the better to confute it: as Worm-wood is bitter to the taste, but good to clear the eyes. Paul foretelling this danger, gave an earnest charge, Act. 20.28. Take heed to yourselves and to all the flock, over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers. Why? For after my departing grievous Wolves shall enter in among you, verse. 29. For this cause we root up the weeds of Rome in our Sermons as we go, because we fear that their pestilent seeds-men have cast them in. As Absalom said to Tamar; Hath Ammon met with thee? 2 Sam. 23.20. So hath the false Teacher met with thee? beware a ravished soul.

Thirdly, God permits them for men's ingratitude: because Ahab will not believe Micheah; therefore a lying spirit shall deceive his Prophets, to deceive him, Mic. 3.10. They shall build up Zion with blood. Because the true Prophets might not be suffered to build up Zion with good, therefore the false ones shall build it up with blood, Mic. 2.6. They had forbidden the sober Prophets to Prophecy; therefore they shall have drunken prophets, that shall prophecy of wine and strong drink, and walk in the spirit of falsehood, verse. 11. This is a sure, but a sore judgment, 2 Thess. 2.10. Because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved: For this cause God shall send them strong delusion, to believe a lie. Will they not adhere to the God of Truth? they shall be turned over to the father of lies. Tremble at this judgment, lest God deliver you up to erroneous teachers, who have despised his true Ministers.

Lastly, these false teachers intrude themselves; as sometimes a gamester being flesh'd with his luck: and they meet with three encouragements: 1. Auditorum frequentia & applauses; the numbers and applaudings of their auditors, Ierem. 5.31. The prophets prophecy falsely, and my people love to have it so. They tell you lies, and you thank them for it, Psal. 73.9. They set their mouth against the heavens, therefore the people turn in thither. And commonly, Major numerus, pejor populus; the more crowd, the worse men. 2. Favor & honor; the honor and respect that is done them. Baal had 450. prophets, while God had but one apparent: they were fed at the Queens table, while Elias was glad to be served by the Ravens. These are in favor with Ahab, while he says of good Micheah, I hate him, 2 Chron. 18.7. True Prophets are not for evil Princes Courts; they have chaplains in ordinary to forbid them, Amos 7.13. Prophecy not at Bethel, for that is the Kings Court, said Amaziah, the Priest of Bethel. 3. Munera & ampla commoda; Large gifts and riches; Everyone for his gain from his quarter, Isaiah 56.11. Like soldiers in a Campe, or like cheaters in the City, they know their quarters. Rather than fail, they will be such as are spoken of, Mic. 3.5. Mouth prophets, trencher-chaplains, held in by the teeth: and out they will not go, so long as their teeth can hold them in.

False teachers shall be among you.] The last point is their unavoidable necessity; they will press in, and we cannot easily stave them off. Therefore let me reflect this point upon ourselves, by way of use. Seeing we know there shall be such, be it our principal care to prevent them. To fore-know evil, and to prevent it, Sapientia est, is wisdom: not to foreknow it, when God hath foretold it, stultitia est, is foolishness: to foreknow it, & not to prevent it, scordia est, is slothfulness: to foreknow it & cannot prevent it, Desperatio est, is desperateness. Here is no such extremity; for God that doth Praedicere prognostica, fore-tell the signs; doth also Praescribere remedia, prescribe the remedies. The particular notes I refer a little further: only now in sum; it is Jesus Christ that must enlighten our hearts, to decline these false teachers. All wisdom cometh from him, that is called the wisdom of the Father. In him is the fountain of all spiritual knowledge, as all the senses are in the head, Zach. 4.12. There were two Olive branches, which thorough two golden pipes did empty the golden oil out of themselves. The oil that was in the gold, came from the two golden pipes: that which passed thorough the two golden pipes, came from the two Olive-trees: these two Olive branches were the two anointed ones; and they stood before the Lord of the whole earth. What knowledge soever, thorough what Instruments soever, we receive, it proceeds originally from Christ: In whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. As at the creation, the light which lay diffused abroad throughout the rude mass of the world, was afterwards aggregated into the body of the Sun; that from thence it might be communicated to the creatures. So that Wisdom which spake in the Prophets and other holy men of God, may seem to concenter all in Christ. Now the means whereby Christ teacheth us, is the Scripture, Which is able to make us wise unto salvation, 2 Tim. 3.15. Here is the Sun and the beam, the Spring and the stream, Christ and his Gospel. The one the matter and end, the other the manner and means, of all saving revelation. On then, pray earnestly for the Spirit of Christ: but what success, if we do? Yes, we have it already promised, Luke 11.13. Your heavenly Father will give the holy Spirit to them that ask him. Christ's Spirit will more surely teach you to confute Christ's enemies; that learning and gold could teach Tertullus to plead for his own friends.

This shall instruct us to destroy and defy Impostors: and though heresy hath crept in like a Serpent thorough secret holes, and by subtle insinuations, scarce leaving a print behind it: yet if we find not the entrance by some slime or tract; wheresoever we do find it, we shall abhor it. Our knowledge so abounds, that scarce ever had nation more means to avoid false Apostles. That as Paul said, 1 Cor. 9.2. If I be not an Apostle to others, yet doubtless I am to you. So Christ may say to us; If I be not knowledge unto others, yet doubtless I am so unto you, Josh. 15.15 Mention is made of Kiriath-sepher, which signifies a City of books: sure this our Country may be called Kiriath-sepher: for 1 Cor. 2.6. We speak wisdom among them that are perfect. If not perfect in all degrees of knowledge, like the Gospels Champions: yet perfect in all parts of knowledge, like the Gospels children. Our eyes be good, we know: our hands be good, we can: God grant our hearts be good, that we will, defend Christ his cause. But as it is reported of a Roman Senator, a man somewhat over-matched by his wife; after he had discharged Catiline his house, and forbidden her to entertain him, which she obeyed not; he said of her, Opulentia valet, ingenium valet, lingua valet, animositas valet; tantum voluntas aegrotat; Her wit is in health, her purse is in health, her tongue is in health, her courage is in health; only her will is sick. And that is one reason why women are not suffered to make their Will when they die, because they had their will so much while they lived. So God hath charged our souls, his Spouse; not to admit his enemies, spiritual adulterers, false teachers; but to keep them out of his House, the Church. We have hands able to do it, stomachs able to do it, wits able to do it, wealth and means to do it: only our hearts are sick, we want wills to do it. What fools are we, when God hath shut our foe out at the gate, to let him in again at the Posterne? He that entertains a Seminary of heresy into his house, whereas God by his command, and the municipall Laws of the Prince, hath excluded him: will speed at last, as he that betrayed a City to a Tyrant; which when he had conquered, he first hanged up him that helped him to it. They that let in the Romish Enchanters, contrary to their express bond of allegiance, meet with the first bane themselves; the poison working to the very rupture of their heart-strings, and without extraordinary mercy, to the perdition of their souls. God tells them, such shall come; and they rejoice that they are come: now the Spirit of grace open our eyes, and fortify our hearts, that neither principalities nor powers, neither height nor depth, neither false Prophet, nor false Apostle, nor false Angel; may ever separate us from the love of God, nor from the truth of God, that is in Christ Jesus.

And let not this trial discourage us, nor discomfort us. Revel. 20. The devil is let loose for a season. For a season, to try the patience of the Church: and but for a season, to fortify the courage of the Church. Revel. 2.10. The devil shall cast some of you into prison, that ye may be tried, and ye shall have tribulation ten days. Into prison, why not unto death? no thanks to Satan; he would fain kill them. Some of you, why not all? no thanks to Satan; he would destroy all. And for ten days, why not longer? no thanks to Satan, he would enthrall them forever. There are three limitations to his power and malice: for time, but ten days, not ten months: for number, Some, not all: for extremity, into prison, not to death: they shall feel tribulation, not destruction: that they might be tried, not overwhelmed. These false teachers may prevail for a time; but we shall say truly by inversion, what the Aramites spake by supposition, 1 King. 20.23. Upon the hills they are stronger than we, but let us fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they. On the contrary, they are too hard for us in the plains, but we shall be too hard for them on the hills. they prevail against us in this valley of tears, we shall triumph over them in the mountain of blessedness. Let falsitie vomit her poison, we shall find saving health in the truth of Christ.

Who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, &c. We come now to the description of these pernicious liars; concerning whom we find a threefold mischief. One that issues from them, another that abides in them, a third that is inflicted on them. Here first we are to consider their seminary mischief, offensive and noxious to others. They shall privily bring in damnable heresies. Here observe two circumstances, the Matter and the Manner, The matter, what they bring in; damnable heresies, the manner, how they bring them in, Privily. In the matter conceive four things. The Notion of the word, Heresy: the number of them, which is plural, indefinite, multitudinous, many heresies: the necessity of their being, they shall be brought in: lastly, the effect and malignancy of them, they are damnable.

Heresy was at first taken in a good sense: it signifies Election, and was referred both to good and bad Sects. It seems to be taken from the Schools of Philosophy, wherein everyone chose a faction to which he sided. Among the latines, it was called Secta, a secundo: because that part did single out it self, and was ab aliis resecta & separata, cut off and separate from the rest. Tertullian used the word for true Religion, and a confession of the Christian verity. Lib. de Fuga. And Cyprian. Eph. 23. Celerinus confessor, timore nostrae Sectae verecundus, &c. Saint Paul is not afraid to use it, Act. 24.14. After the way which they call Heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers: yet he does not altogether justify it, because Tertullus had put a scandal upon it. Verse 5. a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarens, Act. 26.5. After the most straitest sect of our religion, I lived a Pharisee. In like manner, Magi at the first were but sages: but time adulterated the word, and made it magic. So that Heresy is now taken for that, which doth diametrically oppose the truth, and sets up an opinion against it.

There is difference betwixt Error, Schism, and Heresy. Error is when one holds a wrong opinion alone: schism, when many consent in their opinion: heresy runs further, and contends to root out the truth. Error offends, but separates not: Schism offends and separates: Heresy offends, separates, and rageth; making the party good vi & armis; if not with arguments of reason, yet with arguments of steel and iron. Error is weak, Schism strong, Heresy obstinate. Error goes out, and often comes in again; Schism comes not in, but makes a new Church: Heresy makes not a new Church, but no Church. Error unites the house, Schism pulls down the walls, but Heresy overturns the foundation. Error is as a child, Schism a wild stripling, Heresy an old dotard. Error will hear reason, Schism will wrangle against it, Heresy will defy it. Error is a member blistered, Schism a member festered, Heresy a member cut off. He that returns quickly from error, is not a Schismatic: he that returns from Schism, is not an Heretic. Error is reproved and pitied, Schism is reproved and punished, Heresy is reproved and excommunicated. Schism is in the same faith, Heresy makes another faith. Though they may be thus distinguished, yet without God's preventing grace, one will run into another: error will prove a Schism, and schismatical follies will prove stigmaticall furies. When Augustine said, Errare possum, haereticum esse non possum; I may err, I cannot be an Heretic: it proceeded from the confident persuasion of God's mercy, and the resolution of his own heart, to adhere constantly to the truth. The Heretic exceeds the Schismatic: the one hates only peace, the other hates truth. Psal. 120.6. My soul hath long dwelt with him the hateth peace. But, Psal. 139.21 Do not I hate them, O Lord, that hate thee? He may dwell with them that hate peace: he will not endure them that hate the truth. All faults are not of the same degree; there is a moate and a beam, there is stubble and lead. 1 Tim. 6.3. If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to the words of Christ, If he consent not, that is Schismaticall: if he Teach otherwise, that is Heretical. Matth. 5.19. Whosoever shall break one of the least Commandments, and teach men so, &c. If he break the Law, that is a personal sin: but if he teach so, that is a pestilent sin. To teach, pulchrum est, is a commendable: Docere diversum, to teach that which is incongruent, is dangerous: Docere adversum, to teach that which directly contradicts the truth; haereticum est, is heretical. Si quis aliud senserit, if a man be opinioned against the truth, this is not answerable: Si quis docuerit, if a man teach such a doctrine, this is abominable. Let them Teach, but not Otherwise: for otherwise they had better hold their peace. We may say of doctrines, as Jeremiah said of his Figs, Ier. 24.3. Than the good and true, nothing can be spoken better: than the bad and false, nothing is more perilously worse. None sing more sweetly than the true musicians of Israel. None howl more tetrically than the dogs of Baal, of Babel, of Belial; that often the devil himself cannot roar out a more detestable cry, above ground, whatsoever he doth in hell. As the doctrine of murdering Princes, &c. Satan is then the most dangerous tempter, when he comes as he came to CHRIST, with a Scriptum est, It is written: and Heretics, while with this sound they tickle the people's ears; often for want of true discerning suck the blood of their souls. Lord, give not over our souls a prey to their teeth; but rescue them from destructions, our darlings from the Lions, Psal. 35.17.

Heresies, in the plural, to point at a multitude. The troubles of the Church seldom come single: but either they unite their forces, as the five Amorite kings combined against Gibeon, Josh. 10.5. Or separately and a part, they vex her on every side; as Solomon was assaulted with Hadad the Edomite, Rezon the Syrian, and Jeroboam the Ephrathite; finding that true whereof his Father complained, Men enemies compass me in on every side, 1 King. 11. We read, 1 Sam.

13.17. That out of the campe of the Philistines, came three regiments, all with a purpose to destroy, yet all taking several ways: one company of spoilers to Ophrah, another to Bethern, and the third to Zeboim. This is too true a portraiture of the Churches condition: as Israel then was temporally wasted, so the Church is now spiritually assaulted; and will be so used, until hell hath swallowed up all her enemies. For these Egyptians will not cease pursuing Israel, till they all be drowned in the deep. There is a treble band of them, all bent to murder several ways. The licentious by his scandalous life, the persecutor by his drawn sword, the Heretic by his pestilent doctrine And everyone of these blows his trumpet to sedition, with Shiba the son of Bichri; Every man to his tents, O Israel, 2 Samuel Verse 20. Our case is not unlike theirs: there was three garrisons of enemies, all armed with all manner of weapons for offense: yet against all these, the Israelites had but two swords for defense: yet it pleased God that those two were enow. One is the sword of the Spirit, that is Doctrine; the other the sword of the Church, that is Discipline. That as Peter said, Ecce duo gladii; Behold two swords. But two swords for so many, and against so many? a word of extreme want. Satis est, saith CHRIST; It is enough, those two shall suffice; a word of supreme mercy. Mercy to them, comfort to us; that our God can defend us with small meaens, with no means. The sword of the Spirit shall overcome Satan's fiery darts; though the sword of the Church prevail not against their bloody fauchions. 2 Tim. 3.1. In the last days shall be erilous times; men shall be lovers of themselves, covetous, &c. O what a rabble is there! you may say they are Legion; as the devil called his name. Luk 8.30. Legion, they are so many. Or here comes a company, as Leah said at the birth of Gad; A troop cometh, Gen. 30.11. Be they never so many, we weigh not their numbers, so long as CHRIST is with us. It is his good spirit that can stanch the wounds, and dry up the festerd blood wherewith our Syrophenician woman, the Church hath been so long vexed. Indeed we must spend the Inke of our pens upon these creeping ring-worms: but be God only implored to cure the Lazar of his inveterate sore. They have not so many swords, as he hath shields: there cannot be so much venom in the seed of the Serpent, as there is Antidotes in the seed of the woman; saving health in Jesus Christ.

They shall bring in;] here is the necessity, as the Apostle told us before of these Impostors; Erunt they shall be. Shall, though provision spend all her wit, and prevention all her strength; yet no avoiding it. Saint John tells us, that many spirits are gone abroad into the world, that would be tried before they be trusted. 2 Tim. 3.6. They creep into houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sins, and led away with diverse lusts, Iud. ver. 16. You have the picture of them drawn to the life. Do you think it impossible for the truth to forsake some private breasts, yea even whole regions? This were a Popish conceit; so they give out of their infallible Rome; that she hath clipt the wings of Truth, as old Rome did once the wings of victory, that it might not flee away. This were to imagine the Holy Ghost bound to every Pulpit, as they bind him to their Chair. No, there shall be some perverters: some? yea too many. There be some yellow seeds that abound; we might well spare them, they mar the field. We daily pray for laborers in the Lord's great harvest: but for such as labor for the Lord, not against the Lord. For such as row us in the vessel of the Church toward heaven; not such as hurry us in a man of war to bondage. For then we should complain of multitudes; Ier. 12. Verse 10. Many pastors have destroyed the vineyard. They were pastors, and pastores multi, sed stulti; many pastors, but evil ones: what do they? Diripuerunt vineam meam, they destroy my vineyard. We say not then, the harvest is great, and the laborers are too few: but the harvest is great, and these labourers are too many. Would they all labor for CHRIST; but when will that be? Oh it were special news to be told in Gath, and would sound terribly in the streets of Askelon; it would go cold to the heart of the devil, and shake the gates of hell: that the Church had escaped the ingenious solicitations of these fiends, who not only trouble the waters of her peace, but poison her very springs of life. They shall bring them in, the Lord of his mercy cast them out.

Damnabie heresies.] This is the last circumstance, the malignity of them; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ; they are corruptive, destructive, damnabie heresies: doctrines of Perdition. 1. Because they are reprobated of God; so Judas was called the Son of Perdition, because God for his sin had rejected him. A wicked person is called the Son of Belial, because Belial had bred him up. The Son of strife, because contention had begotten him, and he begotten contention. So here the Heresies of damnation; because damnation did bring forth them, and they bring forth damnation. 2. Because they are exitiall and pestilent to the kingdoms and nations where they are admitted. How great a plague did Arianism bring to the East, Pelagianism to the west, now Papism to all the world. 3. Because they bring destruction to all their followers and defenders: sometimes temporal. Deut. 18.20. That Prophet shall die. Sometimes spiritual; the Lord turning their rivers into blood, that no man can drink of their waters to comfort: the increase of their labors being given to the locust, and all their vines destroyed with hail. Psal. 78.64. Their Priests falling by the sword: slain (if not with the sword of others) with their own malice: and their widows making no lamentation: no widows, or but one at the most, to make lamentation. For who can pity them that hate the truth? the wickedness of their cause drowns all compassion of their case. The last of all is the worst of all; their eternal perishing; for those transformed Ministers shall receive an end according to their works, 2 Cor. 11.15. For how should the Cross of CHRIST be a friend to them, that are enemies to his Cross? Phil. 3. Verse 19. Their end is destructino, that's much: but their destruction is without end that's more. There is nothing but damnation in their ways. Mic. 3. Verse 10. They build up Zion with blood. Hos. 6 9. As troops of robbers wait for a man: so the company of Priests murder in the way by consent. A robber waits for his prey, but being single he may either be avoided or conquered: but here are many robbers. Yet their divided forces may be subdued; Nay, but they join themselves in Troopes. Thieves may do thus, that profess not God; Nay, but even apostated Priests. It is much that they fall to robbery, but I hope, no further: Yes, even to murder. The Priest and Levite are condemned that did not succor the wounded man; what shall become of them that give wounds, yea murderous ones? It may be there is someone such reprobate; Yea, they do it by consent: or were it but one act; nay agendo agunt: they commit it, it is their practice. Let us all then pray with our Church from sedition and privy conspiracy, from all false doctrine and Heresy. Good Lord deliver us! Amen.

We see what kind of Heresies shall be; consider we then (pardon it, if it be a digression) what may be the causes that produce such inevitable effects. The efficient cause is double; Prima & remotior is the just will of God; who hereby proveth his friends, as some of the Canaanites were left to teach the Israelites war, Judge. 3. and punishth his enemies. Secunda & propinquier; the natural rebellion, ambition, and cecitie that is in men. The end is double; that the good might be made good by their trial. 1 Cor. 11.19. that the evil might be left more evil. 2 Thes 2.12. That they all might be damned which would not believe the truth. The form is Ipse error, error it self. The matter, articulus ill in quo peccatur, the very point of their prevarication. The main fountain whence they are all derived, is the devil, that Father of lies, and depraver of all goodness. But seeing he cannot well effect this immediately by himself, how may he facilitate his plot? by corrupting certain Instruments. But what seeds of hell can he plant in their hearts, that should grow up to such pernicious fruits? For the devil can work no man to do evil to another, unless he hath first wrought him to admit evil in himself. No reprobate will serve Satan turn for nothing: but there must be some end propounded to his lust, for the satisfaction whereof he precipitates himself to such a hellish course. What may those infernal fires be, wherewith he sets them on burning, and with which they madly run like a rotten inflamed vessel among the whole Navy? Let us a little examine the motives to this pestilent sedition.

First pride, for that loves at all hands to be foremost. Heresies are set on foot by men that thought well of themselves; and perhaps had some cause so to do, if they could have done it within any good compass. Never mean parts set Schisms abroad against CHRIST: the stronger wit, the stronger Heretic. Excellent gifts bind to excellent modesty; in humilitate Sapientia; wisdom is seen in humbleness. They that blow abroad their own praises, justly incur the suspicion of windiness. Alienum laudet te, non os tuum; thy praise would sound better in thy neighbors mouth. Virtue never was a gadding Dinah, that runs abroad to be seen of the daughters of the land. But rather an Elizabeth, that hid her self six months together: loe, then was she fruitful, and bred child, and that so famous a one as John the Baptist. Stand further from me, I am purer than thou, this is vox superbientis, the voice of a proud sinner: Depart from me Lord, for I am a sinful man; this is vox paenitentis, the voice of a penitent Saint. The wise man never wrote upon his doors, here dwells wisdom: nor did goodness ever dwell at the sign of ostentation. It is for hypocrisy to declare the own worth, otherwise it would never be understood for Sincerity. As the foolish Painter having pictured a Lion, so rudely and without such due shape that no passenger could know it: he was fain to help his apt with underwriting, This is a Lion. So it is for pride, when she cannot make her charity understood, to proclaim it her self, This is charity. Sincere ministers Nec pugnas narrant, nec cicatrices suas, never publish their own sufferings and virtues: it is enough for them if they be found one day among those, In quorum ore non est inventus dolus, In whose mouth was found no guile, Revel. 14.5. That is, according to Saint Augustine's gloss; who confessed meekly that they were sinners, and sought no other glory then Humility. Whereas Pride, saith Cyprian, is ever looking in her glass: Speculum consulitur: Cur? nisi quia timet ne sit ipsa: at least the glass must say she is fair: yet is, this Jezebels paint no better than the plaster of a leprous countenance, Rom. 1.22. Thus professing themselves to be wise, they became fools! A just judgment to light on them, that thought it nothing worth to be counted wise, unless the whole world were fools besides. None more thrust themselves forward into the battle, than these dwarfes and demilances; mere atomi in true being, yet big as Giants in their own opinion. But indeed, if only Artists might censure arts, and the common people were admitted no Judges in the Court of Faculties; never was dumbness more incident to him that is borne deaf, than ignorance is to heresy. 1 Tim. 6.4. He is proud, or a Fool; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : the word signifying, both, as if it would teach us, that every proud man is a fool: and 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , knoweth nothing. Alexander would be drawn in colors by none but Apelles, and graven by none but Lysippus, both excellent in their qualities. God will have none meddle with his Scriptures, but holy and illuminate minds; and they are most humble and circumspect. The most blind are the most proud, and soonest venture on the deepest mysteries. Of the two bad states, to be a Pharisie is worse than to be a Publican: to be proud of good endowments is worse than to have neither pride nor good endowments. To be proud then, according to Saint Paul's method in ranking their attributes, is the first brand of the Sectary: that same radical cause of every sin, especially of Schism. This is the common proceeding: first the devil brings in Pride, then pride brings in singularity, and singularity brings in heresy.

The next cause is envy and malice: if this fury be in the heart, the devil may save a labor of driving. As they talk of a coach that moves without horses, being set forward by some vices and devices within, certain wheels and weights: so malice hurries away it self, and carries not for the Auriga, or driver. All Heretics are malicious, and carried with a rancorous hate to pervert others. As Arhymas took no pleasure in viewing heaven, with all the celestial beauties, unless he may have one to tell it to again: so the Sectary takes no pleasure in his error, unless he can work others to the same faction, Matth. 23.15. The Pharisees would compass sea and land to make one Proselyte: it was but a trick of their Father, the devil compasseth the whole earth to spill a soul. Like men sick of the plague, they have an itching desire to infect others. Hoc fonte derivata clades, that does in patriam epulumque fluere: this is the head from whence springs all mischief. If Ahab must be deceived, there is no fitter means to deceive him by, than Spiritus mendaci, a lying spirit. Generally all the corruptions of Israel are fathered upon the tongues of false prophets: their responsive oracles being not Dictum Domini, sed fictum cordis sui, not God's word, but their own conceit. This God acknowledged, that their sour grape had set the people's teeth an edge: and they might excuse themselves with Eve; The Serpent gave it them, and they gave it the people. But it was an old saying, Execrabilis illi qui ininxit in torrentem, cursed is he that poisons our current. The Jews did so once in England, and would have spilled lives: the emissaries of Rome strive still to be the Jews successors, but with a worse even for they spill souls. Now when the spring by the high way is poisoned, the poor traveler that drinks of it, dies for it. Psal. 104.11. Such a place is to give drink to every beast of the field, and there the wild asses quench their thirst. Now that being envenomed, infecteth all the beasts of the forest, all the birds among the branches, and especially the wild Asses, that there quench their thirst. Quid meruistis eves? Alas what have the poor Lambes deserved, that they must be thus deceived? alas, that they cannot be content to go to hell alone? He that hath once made himself a villain, studies how to make all others fools. Abner calls it Play, though it be with edge-tools: Samson's foxes make a sport to toss firebrands, though they burn corn fields. The skittish kine care not what becomes of the Ark, so they may be frisking. If the Church finds them, and smites them, strait they complained persecution: but indeed it is not the Church, but they that persecute. Hagar bears Sara, not Sara Hagar, though you would think it otherwise when you read the story.

Hagar hath gotten a great belly, and now she domineers over her mistress: Sara doth but just, to strike when she is provoked. Thus the Jesuits come against us with new malice, though with old arguments: they cannot leave their old and own figure, Pseudologia. Therefore concerning their Tenants, let us not so much weigh virus, the malice; as vires, the validity and force. For they dip their pens in the gall of the red dragon, and write bitter things; as if they loved cursing, Psalms. 109. Verse 17. But LORD let blessing be the prayer of our lips, blessing the desire of our hearts, and blessing the end of our hopes, and crowned our heads forever.

Another cause or motive is discontent. He is not fed with such broth as he loves, finds not preferment as he would, and thinks himself worthy of, but nobody else thinks so. Hereupon he inveighs most lewdly and lowly, against them that scorned, and happily had good cause to scorn, to set his Fathers or his fathers fathers with the dogs of their flock. Now the Trumpet of Moses is made a trunk to shoot pellets at truths, and Moses his friends. And the characters of slander must be drawn in the oil of the Tabernacle, to the abomination of God and man. Arus driving ambitiously at a Bishopric, was prevented by Alexander his competitor, the worthier man, though not esteemed his match for heat of zeal. Upon the missing his suite, he pursued his spite, by broaching an Heresy: that after the repulse he might seem somebody, and draw a world of mal-contents after him, Theod. Eccl. Hist. lib. 1. Cap. 2. How many hath this motive sent oover to Rome!

Another cause is confidence of power and numbers. Seneca reports that the Senators of ancient Rome ordained, that the slaves should go distinguished from the free borne in apparel: as it might be the cap which made a difference between a slave and a Citizen. But at last they perceived that there might be inconvenience in this: for the slaves might chance to fall a numbering their own side, and upon the understanding of their own strength, might break forth into open rebellion, and shake off the yoke of servitude. So let every man do as he list, and every assembly assume what fashion it list; it will be at last considered who have the most of their side. And where is Major numerus, will follow Pejor populus: they will be followers of the campe, partly for company, and partly for bootie. So they will come to perform indeed, what Hushai dissembled in word, 2 Sam. 16.18. When the people choose, his will I be, and with him will I abide. Thus the ring leaders begin, not only to vaunt of their virtues, but to crack of their forces; and that by the hundreds and the thousands. But yet numbers should not, shall not prevail against the right. It was God's charge, Follow not a multitude to do evil. You have often a multitude of the simple led by one that is subtle: but one good man will not be led by a bad multitude. Error steals in at a little hole, through wantonness and neglect of order. Therefore to prevent it, Saint Paul did heartily charge us to observe order, 1 Cor. 14.40. Let all things be done decently, and in order. For God is not the author of confusion, but of peace. Coloss. 2.5. I rejoyce in beholding your order, and the steadfastness of your faith. Such is the excellency of order, that the Apostle ranketh it with Faith. Cant. 6.10. The Church is compared to an Army; because of the goodly array and equipage wherein she marcheth. Without this so many assemblies, so many rents in Christ's garment: so many congregations, so many distractions. Quot capita, tot Schismata, Jerome. It is not well to see a Church like Jeremiah's speckled bird, Jer. 12.9. a bird of divers colors.

They shall privily bring them in.] We have done with the matter, let us come to the manner of this Induction. Latenter, under-hand, Privily. Which word notes to us their subtlety, their vigilancy, their hypocrisy.

First, their Subtlety and political craft, whereby they insinuate their unseen poisonous seeds, Ephes. 4.14. Paul calls it the Sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive. As scandalizers scatter their libels, if it be liked, they know the authors: if it be dangerous to penalty, it is none of theirs. Sins agents are brought up in her own house, and taught the rudiments of her own discipline: as your Dequoyes teach young practitioners their trade of cheating. It is the brand of sin, to be deceitful, Hebr. Chap. 3. verse. 13. Take heed lest you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. This art of cozenage she teacheth to all her littor: O it is the subtlest Damme that ever the Devil engendered withal, and most pregnant in generation! He was in the Serpent when he begat iniquity on man; but now he hath made sin more subtle than the Serpent, Eccles. 21.2. We see the craftiest politicians over-reached by sin: they have tricks beyond all men, Sin hath a trick beyond them. Sin like the Fencer, may teach his scholars many postures, and wards, and tricks; but still reserves one for himself. They can cozen other men of their estates, but Sin can cozen them of their souls. Let us therefore pray for that blessed illumination, to find out the deceits and cunning of sin: that albeit it once deceived us of our Birth-right, it may not now deceive us of our Blessing. It stole from us the happiness of Nature, let it never steal from us the happiness of Grace.

Secondly, their vigilant care to spy out the opportunity, how they may privily bring Heresy in. She that will lay her bastard at an honest man's door, must watch the time when the whole family is either far enough without, or is fast asleep within. Never was more watchfulness, than where is most purpose of wickedness. The ungodly *cannot sleep unless he do mischief, Mic. 2.1. They devise iniquity on their beds, and when the morning is light they practice it. They lie waking all night, that they may be working in the morning. Luke 16.8. The children of this world are Sapientiores, Wiser: yea, and Vigilantiores, Watchfuller; than the children of light. You seldom hear of them that watch all night to prayer, and the service of GOD, Job Chap. 24. verse. 16. In the dark they dignity thorough houses, which they had marked for themselves in the day. They spy their opportunity by day, but act their villainy by night. That is the private and secret season of bringing in their damnable traffic: they have found the key, and when all are asleep, they land their merchandize. The biting cur barks not beforehand: nor did he that meant to rob, send a messenger before to tell the passengers, Ware the thief. These repentine, serpentine mischiefs sting before they hiss: and like the Musket, kills dead before it gives the report. The Lion first roars and then preys; the Wolf first preys, and then roars: the Heretike preys, but roars not at all. As the woman that loves credit more than conscience, will sin, so it be in private: so this Incendiary resolves to adulterate the truth, and to prostitute his soul to falsehood; but his hope and help is in the the shadow of darkness; Privily. When all is cock-sure, (the good-man absent) GOD not preventing, (the good-wife suspectless) the Church without mistrust, (the servants asleep) the Ministers retired; then doth this incarnate fiend begin to work upon the children. And in confidence of his two confederate thieves, Place and Occasion; he so bestirs himself; that from poor innocent souls* he often steals the best of blessings, a good conscience. Never did opportunity meet with one that makes more use of it: he will husband it to proof, and like a cunning antagonist, lose not an inch of his advantage. The diligence of such is admirable: the Pharisees would take great pains to damn a Proselyte, Matth. Chap. 23. verse. 15. The children of light are not always the forwardest in their generation. Besides, they have many obstacles, 1 Thess. Chap. 2. verse. 18. We would have come unto you once and again, but Satan hindered us. Our way is like Cushi's, full of rubs: but they like Ahimaaz, take the Plain way. Mischiefe is nimble, and he that intends evil, will break his sleep to do it, Matth. Chap. 13. verse. 25. It is the Servants that sleep, it is the enemy that watcheth to sow tares. I would we had their wings and speed, I wish not their tallons nor their flight. If Hazaels feet did belong to Solomon's head, and both these to David's heart, O there was a man for God, a man of God! The shepherd watcheth to guard his flock, the Wolf watcheth to destroy his flock: the Wolf hath the advantage, for he may sleep out of fear: but whensoever the shepherd sleeps, the flock is in danger. Our comfort is, that though the wolf be waking, though the lambes sleep, though the shepherd sleep, though the Church sleep, yet he that keepeth Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps; and this Keeper watch over us evermore.

Lastly, their hypocrisy, with the covertly carriage of their intended plagues, Rom. 16.18. By good words and fair speeches they deceive the hearts of the simple. Without this there could be no Privily: appearance would condemn them. Vice dares not walk without a borrowed shape: like an old courtesan, guilty of her own witherednesse, she never goes without a mask. Countenances furthest from native beauty, love artificial shadows. Never ill would appear it self, if it could be hid. Hypocrisy is the usher of Heresy, a marshall that makes way for her, and cries Roome, here comes my Lady. Like the wench that led Saint Peter into the high Priests Hall; but not with the same purpose, to declare him. Ignorant people are beguiled with glosses and colors, as boys with babies, and Indians with rattles, and such pretie toys. Satan himself seems fair, when he is dressed up like an Angel of light: and a Wolf cunningly appareled in a sheep-skin, coozens the poor lambes. That damnable Heretike Pelagius, was a man of austere conversation: and false prophets come with a rough garment next their skins, like a Gibeonite in his old shoes. Therefore we must learn to distinguish between Samuel and the Devil, which the Witch of Endor suborned in his likeness: and we may easily do it, by his ascending out of the earth. Hypocrites think, as Brutus said when he was dying; that virtue it self was but a name; that all piety is but a name, and that name they get. Who were they that opposed Paul's Sermon at Antioch? Act. Chap. 13. verse. 50. Devout and honorable women, and the chiefemen. Devout; that they were honorable persons, no wonder: that they were wise after the flesh, no wonder: that they were mighty, no wonder. For, 1 Cor. 1.26. Not many wise after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called. But that Devout, religious, zealous persons should resist the truth; this is strange, yet true. Corah, Dathan, and Abiram, those three resisters of Moses, were the most famous and eminent men in the congregation. Let us therefore pray God, that they may be either inwardly Lambes, as they are not: or appear outwardly wolves, as they are: either to turn their hearts from their wolfish condition, or to pull their sheep-skin over their ears: that no jugglers may privily by their mists and mysteries, pervert the flock of Jesus Christ.

Who privily shall bring in damnable heresies.] I am not yet quite wound out of this Labyrinth of heresies: I could wish myself well rid of them, wish you all well rid of them, wish the Land well rid of them, wish the world well rid of them. But O that I could as soon turn them out of the Church, as I can out of my discourse. Now at most they do but trouble your ears; let them pass undiscovered, and they will trouble your hearts. All I have done, is but to show you the mazes and windings of error; and now I am ready to lead you out, and with due speed to bring you to a clearer coast. That remains is for application; to denominate those birds of this feather, whereof we at this present are in danger. I will discover to you three sorts; one that would disturb your peace, another that would pervert your faith, a last, that would corrupt your manners; all of which would wound your consciences.

They that would privily wrong your peace, are seditious Schismatics: who, when the bread of life is broken to the people, throw in crooked pins to choke them. These are they that vellicate authority, that calumniate our Service-book, because the form is uniform. When we beseech Christ by his Agony and bloody Passion; this they call conjuring: when the Minister to the penitent pronounceth absolution, this they call a Popes pardon. When we pray for all men, this they say is against God's Election. When we pray for all those that travel by land or by water; this they say, is to pray for thieves and pyrates. When, against lightning and thunder; this prayer they would have used only in Summer: otherwise they say, we pray against sparrow-blasting. When we pray that our forefathers sins may not be laid to our charge; this they say is to acknowledge Purgatory. Thus they have made our Service to stink in the nostrils of men: but our comfort is that it smells sweet in the nostrils of God. Our Surplisses and Vestments, they say, are not made of the Camels skin, but of the Dragons tail. Take heed of these, who privily bring in offenses to your peace. And Bonum pacis martyrio praeferimus, Liber. Indeed they are zealous against all errors but their own: but Saint Augustine would not have men such confuters; ut error vincat errorem, & quod pejus est, major minorem; that one error shall be convinced by another, and the less by the greater. Is this holiness, to be always finding faults? Is this zeal, to like nothing but their own inventions? I remember what Augustine said to Julian the Pelagian; Cum animositatem viceris quâ teneris, veritatem poteris tenere quâ vinceris; When thou shalt master that stomach whereof thou art possessed; thou shalt possess that truth wherewith thou art mastered, Rom. 16.17. Now I beseech you brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offenses, contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned, and avoid them: for their conviction, and your own security.

They that would privily bring in corruptions to your faith, as the Papists. Here Antichrist had cause to be angry, and plead that he had not his right, if he were not brought in for the ring-leader: whose profession is to make your souls drunk with the wine of his fornications, Rev. 17 2. Beware of these Romish agents and instruments: all their desire is to intoxicate your hearts, and proudly to tyrannize over your consciences. He is that man of sin, that man of pride, that opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; 2 Thess. 2.4. He rose first above Bishops, then above Councils, then above Kings, then above Scriptures, and now so far as it is possible, above God himself. All that are not dead in sense, know his malice; Killing all those that worship not the image of the Beast, Rev. 13.15. Saint Paul tells us; All things are yours; if all be ours, what unsufferable wrong doth he to us, that takes away from us half a Sacrament, the whole Scripture? For what purpose sends he over his Seminaries, those flies that come humming out of the Larder of Hell? They envy, they inveigh, they write, they rail. But as the Jews did with Stephen; when they could not confute him with arguments, they did it with stones: so what they cannot evince by the Word, they will convince by the sword. They have always powder in the panne; and when they spy their time, they will turn their pens into pen-knives, and their ink into blood. O but now they plead Kings truce: yet as in France, when it was said there should be a consultation at Paris, to hear complaints, to redress wrongs, and set all things even: and that the Protestants should have free access to declare their grievances, and safe-conduct to return: one answered, Promise what they list, for Saint Bartholomew-Eves sake I will not trust them. So how ever they show themselves, looking smoothly, and speaking-fairly: yet for the Fifth of Novembers sake let us never trust them. Only bless we our GOD, that though they do so much mischief as they can, yet they cannot do so much as they would. And if our sins provoke him not, Christ will preserve his flock from being a pity to their teeth forever.

They that infect our manners are evil companions; Satan's agents: who is still scattering his firy darts among the Army of Israel. And when they light upon wood they kindle, when upon flax they flame, when upon gunpowder they blow up all. Infirmities is as the wood; desire to sin, that is the flax; delight a sin, that is the powder. If we be naked, or only clothed with hypocritical our sides, or with the thin coat of reason, these darts will wound us: only the shield of faith rebates the points, and quenches all the fire. Some are afraid of meeting the Devil in a dark night: alas, he will not scare thee from himself: what should he get by that? No, it is worse meeting him like an Angel of light: by an Orator persuading, by a Poet delighting, by a friend flattering, by a wife seducing: thus is the Devil often brought in like concealed ware. Some make question whether there be a Devil or no, because they never saw any: but thou mayest see him in his effects, tempting thee to lewdness. In the time of Superstition, the Devil did often appear in some bodily shape, and he had reason for it; for by that means he drave men forward to desperation, to which in those days they were most inclined. But in these times of profaneness, he will not appear in his likeness, lest he should hold men back from presumption, to which they were running head-long. For he is never a worse devil, than when he comes lap'd up in Samuel's Mantle; privily under the cloak of holiness! so that now all the wisdom is to see the Devil. If a man's eye be too near the object, the beams of his sight will be confounded; there must be a mediocrity of distance. As in the Optickes, if a man would perceive the art of a perspective picture, he must go a distance from it, and then look on it with artificial eyes, or spectacles fitted for the purpose. So if a man would apprehend the prospects of Satan, with all his shadowings and deep deceits; he must not stand too nigh him, but go further off. And then he must look, not with the eyes of nature or reason, so he shall never descry him: but with the eye of faith in the glass of the Scripture; this shall plainly represent him.

Fear Satan then most, when with the fairest pretences of good, he seeks to justify evil. When the woman of Tehoah with a subtle parable procured Absalom's repeal from banishment, 2 Sam. 14.19. David replied, Is not the hand of Job with thee in all this? When thou beholdest Sacrilege coloured under the title of an impropriation. Is not the hand of the Devil in this?

When oppression passeth under the name of reasonable and allowed Interest: Is not the hand of the Devil in this? If you see secret malice strike under the semblance of Justice: Is not the hand of the Devil in this? If covetous worldliness pass for honest thriftiness: Is not the hand of the Devil in this? If flattery creep up to preferment, under the title of humility: Is not the hand of the Devil in this? If plumes, painting, gawdie purples, the ornaments of Popinjays, to the inversion of nature, and destruction of modesty; march all under the colors of comliness, and going according to their state: Is not the hand of the Devil in this? Let us find out this privy inductions of these damnable heresies, and resist him there, 1 Pet. 5.9. Resist him steadfast in the faith: this wrings his sword out of his hand; he and all his adherents shall fall before us, John. 12.31. The Prince of this world shall be cast out: What folly is it for the wicked to fight on his side, that is sure to be vanquished? Fear thy sin, never fear Satan? let him not have Lust that secret factor in thy city, that Intelligencer in thy soul; and he can do thee no harm. Through sin only is their force and fury so terrible to us, Ephes. 6.12. Spiritual wickedness, or wicked spirits: but spiritual wickedness is more to be feared than wicked spirits. But the God of peace shall shortly tread Satan under our feet, Rom. 16.20. Now the Lamb that hath the key of the bottomless pit, and the great chain in his hand, bind that Dragon with everlasting darkness. But for thy Church; send forth thy mercy and truth, and save us; and let thy face shine upon us forever.

Denying the Lord that bought them.] This I called their Criminall evil, a sin that seems to keep the circle of their own selves; and not to extend to the mischief of others, but only by the force of example. In handling whereof, I will first consider the general doctrine; what it is to deny Christ; and wherein these false teachers deny him: and them the application of it; who they be that in these times deny him. In special we find the aggravation of their apostasy in three heinous ascendings. First, They Deny: it were bad enough to slight him, worse to forget him, yet worse to forsake him: but to Deny him, this is fearful. Secondly, The Lord: not a creature, not a man, not a Father, not a friend, not an Angel, not themselves: but the Lord, this is more fearful. Thirdly, That bought: it is much to deny a benefactor, more to deny a Parent, more to deny a Creator: but yet there is a step higher, to advance this blasphemy to the full altitude; to deny a Redeemer; Him that with the precious blood of his heart Bought them; this is most execrable.

Denying of Christ.] is of two sorts: either in Judgment or in practice: denial in faith, or denial in fact. The latter is of infirmity, the other of infidelity. 1 Tim. 1.19. Some have put away faith and a good conscience; and concerning faith have made shipwreck. There is a denial of faith, 2 Tim. 3.5. Some having a form of godliness, deny the power of it, Tit. 1.16. They profess that they know God, but in works they deny him. There is a denial of fact. The former makes a man no Christian: the other makes him non nullum, sed malum; not no Christian, but an evil Christian. The denial of Christ in judgment hath many degrees. 1. Apostasy, a falling off from Christ, and from the known truth into willful errors. Heb. 3.12. Take heed lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, to depart from the living God. 2. A violent opposing that truth which they have rejected, both with tongue and hand: justifying and defending their own mischievous opinions against the Gospel of Christ, Lastly, the sin against the Holy Ghost. First men forsake Christ, then deny him, lastly blaspheme him. This is indeed that which truly rents a man off from Christ, and deprives him of all hope to be saved. The denial in fact is a dangerous pit, yet the mercy of God hath helped some out of it. So was Peter delivered; Servus negavit Dominum, sed Dominus amavit servum; The servant denied his Master, but the Master loved his servant. Paul did not only deny him, but persecute him; yet he obtained mercy, 1 Tim. 1.13. Many of the Jews did not only deny him, but crucify him, Act. 3.14. Ye denied the holy one, and the Just: yet were they pricked in heart at Peters Sermon; gladly received his Word, and were baptized, Act. 2.41.

Every action that gives way to God's dishonor, and heartens others to superstition, is a denial of Christ in some degree of fact, 1 Cor. 10.20. The things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils. He that tasteth the meat offered to Idols, Gustu negavit Christum, hath denied Christ with his tasting. If he doth not so, yet let him but touch those things with pleasure, Tactu negavit Christum, He hath denied Christ with his touching. Though he doth not touch, yet if he stand to look upon the Idolatry, Visu negavit Christum, He hath denied Christ with his eyes. Though he forbear to look, yet if he listen to those charms, Auditu negavit Christum, He hath denied Christ with his ears. Though he omit all these, yet if he smell to the Incense, Odoratu negavit Christum, He hath denied Christ with his smelling. He may be denied voice, veste, vultu, victu; with the voice, when men speak to dishonor him, though inwardly they reverence him: with the garment, when they wear idolatrous fashions of attire to escape notice: with the countenance, when they seem delighted to behold the breaden god carried in a box: with the diet, when only to give content to some popish spirits, they will forbear certain meats on certain days. These be all degrees of denial in them, that rather seek to please men, than to be the constant servants of Christ.

He that dissembles a false faith is thus guilty. Faith may be feigned; ex parte objecti, when it doth not credit all the Word: ex parte subjecti, in respect of the false heart of man: ex parte exterioris actionis, when a man keeps the true faith of Christ, but dares not profess it. Nichodemus had a good mind to Christ, but he durst not be known of it: now in that he did not openly acknowledge him, he did in a sort deny him. It is objected, Rom. 14.22. Hast thou faith? have it to thyself before God. Therefore a man may conceal his faith. But the Apostle speaks not there de fide necessariorum, concerning the faith of those things we must necessarily believe: but de fide adiaphororum, concerning the faith of indifferent things. Shall I change any faith in these? No, do not change it, but hide it. Shall my faith then be quite concealed? No, God sees it. To what purpose have I faith, and not to show it? Yes, show it to God. Thy faith is to be concealed, not cancelled. But then a man may hide his faith in time of persecution, and be present at idolatrous services? No, for the Apostle speaks not of that faith, Quae ad dogmata pertinet, sed de rebus medis; but only of things indifferent, and therein sometimes to hide our faith is not to offend, Chrysost. Our own faith, I say, for a man may sometimes dissimulare fidem propriam, dissemble his own faith: but he must never simulare fidem alienam, counterfeit a strange faith.

Here may be questioned, whether it is lawful to be present at a Mass, so long as we reserve our own faith; and whether this be to deny Christ in any sort. The Apostle clears it, 1 Cor.

10.14. Flee from idolatry. This exhortation he strengthens with two special reasons; the one verse. 20. They that partake of things offered to Idols, have fellowship with the devils. The other, verse. 21. Ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's Table, and of the table of devils. Besides offending of the weak Christian, and confirming the strong Papist. A Protestant cannot possibly communicate with the Papists, without sin: yet they may communicate with us, without sin. Our Service is without all fear of idolatry, even themselves being judges: so that a Papist remaining a Papist, may communicate with us: and it is rather out of pride, than conscience, that they refuse it. Yet it sticks upon the stomach of some toy-headed Professors, that they may lawfully see a Mass, going with their kindred, for sport; and rather than want excuses, that they might more detest it. But Paul cuts off all these reasons, 1 Cor. 10.22. Do we provoke the Lord to anger? are we stronger than he? God shall condemn all colorable shifts, and expose thee to his wrath. To exhort this allowance, nothing is more commonly cited than the example of Naaman, 2 King. 5.18. When my Master goeth into the house of Rimmon to worship there, and he leaneth on my hand, and I bow in the house of Rimmon; the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing. To which Elisha doth seem to give approbation; Go in peace. This place is their opinion doth prove it, when indeed this place makes most strongly against it. First, Naaman speaks of a civil worship to his Master, not a superstitious one to the Idol: the King leaning on his hand; either Majestatis or infirmittatis gratiâ; whether for weakness or for State. Secondly, He professed the resolution of his heart to worship only the God of Israel, that had healed him. Begging earth to make an Altar, erecting an Altar for sacrifice, and sacrificing that he might be thankful. Thirdly, He puts the doubt of his own weakness, that notwithstanding his resolved sincerity; yet being with his Master in that cursed place, he did not know how temptation might work upon him; therefore he says, God be merciful to me in this; Pray for me that I may not fall, pray for me that I may find mercy. Fourthly, Some think that Elisha did not approbare, sed tolerare; not approve, but suffer Naaman's fault; but there is no dispensing with sin. Fifthly, Go in peace, is as much, as God be with you Sir; a valediction: not the words concedentis postulatum, of one that granted a request: sed dimittentis abeuntem, but of one that gave him license to depart. Sixthly, Indeed the Prophets meaning was to comfort the Syrian in God's mercy; whose strength should be glorified in his weakness. Who would either wholly keep him from idolatry, or if he fell upon infirmity, afford him gracious forgiveness. If such a thing happen; but either thou shalt die, or thy Master die; howsoever God will prevent it; Go in peace. Seventhly, Naaman did confess that the bowing in the house of Rimmon was a sin, or else he would not have begged pardon for it. When I go to mass, I reserve my heart unto God: so did Naaman, yet he cried, Lord be merciful to me in this. He desired mercy, as fearing before hand: we have those that will do it, and never beg mercy afterwards; that never say, In this Lord pardon me. Thus they have a fair warrant from this place: for Namaan condemns it, and yet they would by his example find arguments to allow it. If it were not a sin, why doth he crave pardon for it? if it be a sin, why do we seek to justify it? But we go to behold it as a Player: but plays are for stages, not for Churches. Darest thou go to a Temple, to see religion made a mockerie, and the Name of thy God a lest. But we would see it, that we may confute the absurdities of it. But would any sober man go to a drunken meeting, that he might learn to condemn drunkenness? he knew it was bad enough before. But we would go to convert others: goodly! as if the wool should undertake to turn the pitch white by touching it; will not the pitch rather black the wool? Peter durst abroad draw his sword against a whole troop, in defense of his Master: yet after all his protestation of inseperableness from CHRIST, he was infected with the air of the high Priests hall. But yet we would see it, that no longer by report, but by ocular testimony we might hate it. But would any man desire to see murder or incest, that he might more loath it? All reasons are lost that make for sin: therefore resolve against this danger of temptation, lest you be found to deny CHRIST.

This for the general doctrine; now for the application, that we may perceive who they are which in any measure or degree deny JESUS CHRIST.

1 The Jews and Turks. For the Jews, their refusal of him more strongly approves him: neither could he be justified to be that Messias, if they rejected him not. Loe now how the Lord hath requited them: they denied him, and he hath denied them. Their sin is capitally written in their long and desperate ruin. If they would compare their former captivities with their former sins; they should now find that they have committed some sin more heinous than all former sins, because they suffer a plague more grievous than all former plagues. This sin was the denial of CHRIST, and this plague for that denial. For the Turks they have taken the name of Savior from CHRIST, and given it to Mahomet that coozning Arabian. Their malice is not only to deny JESUS, but to murder him; and by all stratagems seconded with bloody violence to wast christendome, and to bring his name to nothing. But arise ô LORD, thou and the Ark of thy strength; convert or confound thine enemies, and Remember those Tyrants that say of thy Jerusalem; Rase it, rase it, even to the foundations thereof.

2 The Greekish Church of the Ruffes and Muscovites have reserved from forgetfulness the name of CHRIST, but in the foundations of their religion have denied him. They are the basest dregs of all Christians, and so to call them 〈◇〉 to allow them the most favor that can be. They will admit none of the Christ an world to their font, but such as solemnly renounce, spit at, and abjure their former God, religion, baptism. They are as ignorant as Turks, as idolatrous as Pagans, as obstinate as Jews, and more superstitious than Papists. If the worst of the Roman, and best of the Russian, were compared, it would be hard to judge which were least evil. They give more honor to Saint Nicholas, if at least he was a Saint, if an honest man, than they do to CHRIST. They usually put a scrole into the hands of their dead, when they bury him; it is this, A Russe of R•ss••; which they call a certificate to Saint Peter. It is their wickedness and infelicitie to have denied Christ.

3 Such other Heretics as have kept the name of Christians, yet have spoiled the just honor of CHRIST. These differ from the other, and are not properly called Religions, but Opinions. Every Heresy though fundamental, makes not a religion: we say not the Religion of the Arians, Nestorians, Sabellians, Macedonians; but the Sect or Heresy. Not to discuss the propriety, no opinion challengeth the name of a Religion in our usual speech. Such were the Valentinian and Manichean heresies, that denied CHRIST'S Humanity. The Arian and Samisetanian, that denied his Divinity. The Nestorian, that distracted him into two persons. Eutychiean, that confounded the two natures. The Sabellian, that mind him with the Hypostasis of the Father. Donatus, that denied his kingdom, that is his Church to be perpetual and catholic. Pelagius, that denied him to be the Redeemer of little ones in baptism. Novatas, that denied his grace and mercy to sinners fallen. There were innumerable such whom the Lord with his fan hath cast out, purging his Floore from such damnable chaff. The same gracious hand purge it still; that all men may come with heart and tongue, to acknowledge one true God, and one blessed Savior, Jesus Christ.

4 The religion, or rather faction of Papism. It is most wonderful to read, how Feuardentius and others of them upon this Text, do challenge us for the principal men that deny CHRIST. But when we come to examine the weight, their very arguments against us do strengthen us, and we find ourselves the more comforted in being so scandalized. Let indifferency be judge! we adore and trust upon CHRIST for our only Savior, and ascribe to him the whole of our redemption: they join other Savior's, other mediators with him; now which of us do most deny CHRIST? do you look for more evidence? you shall have it that both the cold neuters who treat of a reconcilment between us; and the hot separatists that say we have not left them at all because we retain some ceremonies which they use; may be at once satisfied and ashamed. It is not matter of order, but matter of faith that hath divide us; nor ceremony, but substance: not a bush, but a wall of stone, that we can scarce imagine the separation greater which divided Abraham from the rich man in hell. 1 John. 2.2. Who is a liar, but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? he is Antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son. But they deny not the Father, albeit the Son: yea, in this they have denied the Father: where CHRIST is but half a Savior, God is but half a Father. Verse 23. Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father. They worship images, adore relics, invoke Angels; here they deny Jesus. They sacrifice for the sins of quick and dead with a wafer cake, hold a Purgatory for the scouring up of souls, as I CHRIST'S blood was not able to do it; here they deny Jesus. They tread down the deputies of God from their Thrones, and set up an usurping Prelate, whom all ages have acknowledged a vassal to Prince; here they deny Jesus. They take away Scriptures, mangle Sacraments, license Stews, condemn marriage, wrap up the obsequies of our conscience in the strange liverie of an unknowne language; sell pardons for sixepence; open heaven where Christ shuts it, and shut heaven where Christ shuts it, and shut heaven where Christ opens it; here they deny Jesus. They mingle the blood of Martyrs, yea of traitors, with the blood of the Lamb of God which is spotless; which only taketh away the sin of the world, only quencheth the wrath to come, only abateth the edge of his Fathers Justice, even that sword cherubicall which glitters before Paradise: this, this is to deny the Lord that bought them. They are all for Traditions, we for the Scriptures: the goods of our Father are in question, whither shall shall we go but to his will and testament? thither we fly, we do not deny thy word, ô Lord, we do not deny thee: but they that deny the word of Christ, deny Christ himself.

Under this rank of deniers come those whilome professors of Religion, that have now accepted the mark of the beast who are so foolish, that having begun in the Spirit, they will now be made perfect by the flesh, Gal. 3.3. They despise the chaste spouse of their Savior, and are bewitched with the painted beauty of an ill favored strumpet. They that have seen her in her gavest dress with Christian eyes, have loathed her: others have looked on her with the eyes of flesh, and adored her. Diverse have come to Rome with a purpose to be confirmed Papists: by hearsay they magnified her; they came, saw, and scorned her. They looked for religion, and found rank idolatry: the fire of their zeal brought them to the flames of martyrdom. We have some that suffer their zeal there to die, where those good men's zeal began to live; and delight to live, where they would but die. Our mother weeps for them, not for need, but for pity, for piety, for love. Troopes of better informed souls flock daily into her bosom, disdainng their late Antichristianism, and embracing her knees on their own. The mighty one of Israel, that leaves the ninety nine to reduce one lost sheep; fetch them home to his fold, though with shame, though by death. That they may shame the devil, forsake that harlot, love their own mother, bless their own Father, and lastly save their own souls.

5 The Renegade, that being once baptized unto CHRIST, is afterward circumcised, unto Mahomet. It is in vain to charge them with Paul's Testimony. Gal. 5.2. If ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing: for they desire not that CHRIST should profit them. Miserable men, that forsake the blood of their Savior, to accept the tyranny of an Impostor! I have read of a Christian, that to save his life turned Turk; but it could not save him: for they presently in derision hanged him up, with these words; Morieris in fide Turca; However thou livest, thou shalt die a Turk. They are so conscious of their own great Prophets weakness; that if any man deny Christ, they will never trust him in the acknowledgement of Mahomet.

6 The Neuter, that is of either side, of neither side; today a Romist, tomorrow a Protestant, next day no man can tell what, nor himself; this man denies Christ. They think him theirs, we think him ours, his own conscience finds him neithers. O but our differences trouble him: but shall a man deny Christ, because his coat is divided? In religion and faith there is no wavering: he that doth not believe and profess the truth, denies it. There is no medium: we must be either for it, or against it. Judge 5.23. Curse ye the inhabitants of Meroz, because they came not to the help of the Lord against the mighty. They did not fight against him, but because they did not fight for him they are cursed. Let us say, as that Martyr answered, when he was offered both torments and rewards; rewards if he did deny Christ, torments if he would not; with time of deliberation. In re tam justa nulla consultatio: the case is so clear, that I need not study about it. Let us much rather lose ourselves, than our Savior Christ.

7 The Separatist, that speaking of his country, cries he is fled out of Babel, he hath forsaken his mother, therefore denied his Father. And whither runs he? out of the free and clear air of the Gospel, into the stench and irksome mixture of Jews, Arians, Anabaptists. Who but a mad man would forsake the Church of England, which Rome envies, all the world admires; to go to Amsterdam? It is their delight to be thwartingly peevish: and where the gate stands open, to be ever seeking for a style. They will be cross, though they be absurd: and because the Law enjoins abstinence on some certain days; therefore their greatest seals shall be on frydays. Like certain Ilanders near to China, that salute by putting off their shoes, because the men of China do it by their hattes. He that wrongs the wife, is no friend to the husband: in refusing the Church, they have denied Christ.

8 The Persecuter, that invades the liberty of those who love the Lord Jesus, denies Christ, Joab smote Absalom's body but therein David's heart. The rebel says, he means no hurt to the person of the king: but because he doth it to the subjects, he is therefore a traitor: so he that strikes the Christian, strikes Christ. Such shall not escape unpunished, either here or hereafter. Not even Paul himself was transmitted, without feeling what he inflicted. Examine his own testimony, 2 Cor. 11.23, &c. Did he make havoc of the Church? the world made havoc of him for it. Did he hale men and women to prison? himself was often claped up for it. Did he help to stone Stephen? himself was stoned for it. Did he afflict his own countreyemen? his own countreyemen afflicted him for it. Did he lay stripes upon the Saints, the Jews laid stripes upon him for it. Was he weary, painful, diligent to beat down the Gospel? he was in wearynesse, painfulness, frequent watchings and fastings; in hunger and thirst, cold and nakedness, to defend the Gospel, 2 Cor. 11.27. Thus Quod fecit Saulus, patitur Paulus: he endured when he was Paul, what he inflicted as he was Saul. They that persecute Christians, and escape judgment here, shall find everlasting judgment hereafter. Let this point bind us all to the good behavior, that we do good to them who love the Lord Jesus.

This is the superior and more immediate manner of denying CHRIST: there is also an inferior and more remote manner. Which is of such as turn the grace of God into wantonness, and evacuate to their own souls the virtue of his cross: who being redeemed to serve Christ, deny that service: there is a world of these. Tit. 2.11. The grace of God that bringeth salvation to all men, hath appeared: Teaching us to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, godly to this present world. It persuades to holiness by this token, that it brings salvation with it. It is grace, a sweet nature: that brings salvation, ô more sweet, most welcome but it might lie hid in unknownen obscurity, nay it Appears: not to Paul or Peter only, but To all men. Deliverance from danger binds to gratitude: this was David's security to Bethshabe concerning the succession of Solomon: As the Lord liveth, that hath redeemed my soul out of all distress, 1 King. 1.29. But advancing to great preferment bindeth more: this was Joseph's apology to his tempting mistress: My Master hath entrusted all to my hand; there is none greater in his house than I: how then can I do this great wickedness? Gen. 39.9. We were all justly condemned for treason, to hell; the stroke of damnation was near us: at an instant and exigent cometh our pardon; not by the hand of an Angel, God's special courtier, but in the hand of a mediator; not written with ink, but with blood; not vulgar blood, that runs in common veins, but blood royal; no meaner than ran from the side of his own Son. Now our Sovereign Creator commends a suite to us; that we would serve him; by this Token, that he hath redeemed us at such a prize. If we break the covenant, vilipend the mercy, refuse the service, trample under our prophet feet the precious token, deny him that bought us; what remains but a fearful expectation of judgment, and firy indignation to devour us? Hebr. 10.27.29. under this kind I will touch but four offenders.

1 The dissolute and scattering rioter, that draws his patrimony through his throat; he denies CHRIST, will he not believe it? let him read, 1 Tim. 5.8. If any provide not for his own, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an Infidel. Where is no humanity, there can be no piety: he that is not a good moral man, will never be a good Christian. He is worse than an Infidel, because he transgresseth name, which teacheth us all providence even the very beast, much more man. He sinneth against the knowledge he hath received, therefore is the worst offender. The pu•st ivory is turned by the fire into the deepest black. We use to extenuate the •fullness of such a one; He hath no fault, but a little too kind hearted: it is $\langle \diamond \rangle$ one; He hath no fault, but that he hath denied the faith. He is no man's foe but his •wne; yes he is his Posterities foe, and no friend unto Christ.

2 the oppressor: Paul says directly, They have erred from the faith, 2 Tim. 6.10. ••a the very uncharitable. Matth. 25.40. In that ye have denied it to my brethren,••e have denied it to me; saith CHRIST. Little thinks the Engrosser, that he ••nyes CHRIST: what, to take advantage of the Law, is this to deny the Gos•ell? Yes, the poor hath lost their right, thou hast multiplied unjust gain; prefer•d Mammon before the Lord; thou hast denied him that bought thee. But that who••ever refuseth to do mercy to the poor, denies CHRIST; this is a point of •octrine which the world will not receive; let God say what he will. But he that ••d; Whosoever giveth you, giveth me: hath said also, whosoever denieth you, de•yeth me. I send to my friend for a poor courtesy in his easy power, that have ••ne him many great favors; he denies it, it is all one, he denies me ••r his friend. 1 John. 3.17. He that hath the worlds goods, and takes no compassion on him ••at hath none of them; how dwells the Love of God in him? He that being able, gives not <◇> them whom the Lord hath bought, denies him that bought them.

3 The blasphemer denies CHRIST; for doth any man love him, against •hom he inveighes? Matth. 12.30. He that is not with me, is against me Indeed, ••e greatest denial of all is verbal, and the greatest sins against God are words. •bliquities in speech offend more than those of action: therefore the sin never to ••e forgiven, is called Blasphemy against the HOLY GHOST, Matth. 12.31. He •at commits a sin, offends the Law: he that blasphemes, striketh God himself. •here is no greater grace than thankfulness: no greater grace than thankfulness: <◇> greater sin than blasphemy. I would the common swearer would think of •is, that rashly, yea rancorously blasphemeth that sacred side, those wounds, that •oud, whereby our souls are redeemed: he doth in this deny the Lord that •ught him.

4 The desperate, that rejects the offer of salvation by Christ; this is a fearful •enyall. Let all the rivers and streams that make glad the City of God, run un•• it, they are driven back: there is no entrance for the graciousness of God, •ough it be preached a thousand times. When the Lord like a loving Physician •romiseth to cure the sore, the desperate patient thrusteth his nails into it; Nay, it •all not be healed. What can be more derogatory and injurious to Christ, then <◇> change his truth into a lie, and Satan's lies into truth, and to justify the devil •ore than God? When God on the one side shall bind by promise, confirm by ••th, ratify by seal, exhibit by the blood of his only begotten Son; pardon ••d mercy to all accepting Penitents: that though he hath broken, he will bind up; ••ough he hath made a wound, he will heal it; though he hath killed, he will give ••e: yet he is not believed. When Satan on the other side shall suggest, that the ••stice of God will never be satisfied, the haynousnesse of sins cannot be pardoned, ••s if he had lost the name of being the Father of lies) he is credited. God hath •ade a decree in heaven, it belongs to the New Testament, sealed by the death of ••e Testator, witnessed by three in heaven, and as many on earth, never to be altered:

At what time soever a sinner shall repent of his wickedness heartily, I will forgive him. <◇> heaven before heaven, and he that denies it finds hell before hell, and damna••on before his time. The greatest sins are those that are opposed to the three The•logical virtues; Faith, Hope, and Charity: such are Infidelity, Hatred, Desperati•n. The other be monstrous sins, to the denial of God's justice; but desperation <◇> this is the worst, because it denies his mercy; and his mercy is over all his works. •ehold the Lamb of God, accept your remedy, deny not him that bought you.

Denying the Lord that bought them. We have considered the general Doctrine, let us come to a particular examination of the words, and an aggravation of their wickedness. Which discovers it self in three degrees.

The Quality of their Act; They denied. So far from fearing or loving, that they fall to Denying.

The Excellencie of the Object; no mean person, not a servant, not an equal, but their Master; The Lord.

The near relation that was between them, and the right that he had in them, by purchase; That bought them.

They denied.] It had been very much not to have feared him, especially seeing himself so warned us. Luk. 12.5. Fear him that can cast into hell. The wrath of a king is frightful, we fear an ague, wonder at a Comet, tremble at thunder: and fear we not God the commander of all these? Oh he is of infinite majesty! Mathematicians wonder at the Sun, that being bigger than the earth, it does not burn it. But this is the wonder, that God being so infinitely great, and we so infinitely wicked; we are not confounded. Amo. 4.13. He formeth the mountains, createth the wind, makes the morning darkness, and treadeth upon the high places of the earth: can he do this, and not punish sinful man? To fear him is Totum homini, the whole duty of a man: not to fear him, is the way to be left worse than if we never had been. To want this fear is a wretched orbitie, but to deny him, this is worse <◇> had been very much not to have believed on him, considering the oracles that he spake and the miracles that he wrought. They that hated him, were forced to testify bo•• these of him; Never man spake as this man doth: and we never saw it on this fashion: Ye, This ye have seen, and believe not. They saw, they heard, they wondered, they were convinced, yet they not believed. Their own eyes in seeing, their own eats in hearing, their own hearts in wondering, their own convicted reasons, shall witness against their unbelief, John. 16.9. The Holy Ghost shall reprove the world of <◇> because they believe not on me. Accedente fide discedit peccatum, accedit peccatum discedente fide. If faith comes, the guilt of all sin departs: if faith departs, the god of all sin remains. Israel had gross sins, as tempting of God, unthankfulness, adultery with Moab, idolatry with Baal-poor: everyone able to have kept them out of Canaan, to have swept them out of the world: yet Paul imputes all to their want of faith, Hebr. 3. Verse 19. They could not enter in because of unbelief, Rom. 11. Verse 20. Because of unbelief they were broken off. There is destruction enough wrapped up in this, not to believe on him that bought us: but to deny him, is yet worse.

It were very much not to have loved the Lord, who is every way so beautiful, that no soul can behold him, but she must needs affect him! But the wicked never saw him, they look after him with carnal eyes, which are no more able to discern him, than a blear eye can look upon the Sun: their spiritual eyes, and intellectual faith never saw him. They behold him pendentem in patibulo, dormientem in sepulchro, not Sedentem in throno; as a man of sorrows, forsaken of his friends, afflicted by his enemies, exercised with terrors, killed with torments; yet even that he was lovely. But look upon his innocence, that immaculate Lamb; upon his righteousness, Christ the Just one: behold him waited on with Angels, worshiped with prostrate knees, holding out a white hand of mercy, speaking gracious words to penitent sutors, smiling upon his Saints, kissing the souls he bought: Loe, 〈◇〉 his beauty! If any ask the Church; What is thy beloved more than another beloved? Cant. 5.9. She answers that knoweth; My beloved is white and ruddy, the chiefest among ten thousand. His head is as the most fine Gold, &c. Si pars, quid tum? If every member of him be so beautiful, how excellent is the whole composition? He is altogether lovely. Take your choices where you will; This is my beloved, and this is my friend. Ver. 16. This is my choice. Psa. 45.2. Thou art fairer than the children of men: all that are fair, are fair only in thee. Therefore do the virgins love thee, Cant. 1.3. Suppose in a Country there is a young Shepherd, whose face hath but newly discovered to the world of what sex he is: his exquisite proportion and admirable beauty far transcending all the rest. The Virgin Shepherdesse desire his company, are glad to be in his sight, to do him any service, to tend his flock; and all for a kind word or a smile: striving like rivals one with another, who shall be most near him: and if it were possible, would everyone enjoy him. So ten thousand times fairer than all the sons of men is the Shepherd of our souls, Jesus Christ: all the virgins love him, every good soul seeks him, and remembers his love more than wine, striving in a holy emulation who shall be most acceptable to him: they will do him all service and worship, honoring his Name, feeding his flocks, making much of his followers; glad of a smile, but ravished with a kiss of his lips: all would possess him, and loe, all shall possess him that truly believe on him. On earth one husband is for one wife, but our infinite Savior is a husband for all faithful souls. So many as believe on him, he makes the sons of God, John. 1.12. Christ being thus sweet, it were much not to love him! They that love not thee, O Lord, shall be written in the dust. If any man love not the Lord Jesus, Anathema maranatha, 1 Cor. 16.22. But now to deny him, &c.

It was very much not to acknowledge Christ. Tacere laudes Dei, to hold a man's peace when his honor is in question, is to mistake the end of our redemption, 1 Cor. 6.20. Ye are bought with a price; therefore glorify Christ in your body and spirit, which are the Lord's. Now he is poorly glorified, when his Name is concealed. It is said of John the Baptist, John. 1.20. That he confessed and denied not. If he confessed, it might seem a Pleonasm to say, He denied not: but this declares that whosoever doth not openly confess Christ, doth secretly deny Christ, Judge. 5.23. The Merozians opposed not, they denied not, they only stood still, did nothing, said nothing: they were cursed. Think of this ye that hide Christ, as the woman of Bahurim hid the Spies, in the deep well of your hearts, and cover the mouth of it with corn: that would keep in with Christ, and yet not fall off from the world. Rom. 10.10. With the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. Confession is the effect of faith; I believed, and therefore I spake. Si sufficeret fides cordis, non creasset tibi Deus os, Chrysost. If it were enough to believe in the heart, to what purpose did God give thee a mouth? If it be sufficient for thee to know Christ, and not to acknowledge him thy Lord: then it shall be sufficient for Christ to know thee, but not to acknowledge thee for his Servant. Christum deseret, qui se Christianum non asserit; He denies Christ, that doth not profess himself a Christian. Nor is it any help for thee, to say that Silence argues consent: for thou art bound Consentire & confiteri, both to consent and to confess: and indeed here Tacere is negare. Christ loves this free and humble acknowledgement, and commands it. 1 Pet. 3.15. Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and reverence: Thus you sanctify the Lord God in your hearts. Doth the persecutor question thy faith? Fear him not: what then? Sanctify the Lord in thy heart:•ow? by giving an answer, not silence: to whom? not only to the Magistrate, but to every man that asketh, whether friend or foe, home-borne or stranger: of what? the reason of thy hope, the ground of thy expectation of eternal bliss: where and when? not only in time of peace, and assembly of Saints, but Always, be ever ready to do it. Christ no sooner said to her, Mary; but she presently confessed him; Rabboni. It was but one word, to him that is the Word, it was taken for an acknowledgement. And •an it be that we should not acknowledge our Savior? He that will not confess a benefit, hath arrived at the utmost confines of ingratitude: but he that denies his Benefactor, is fallen so low, that he can fall no lower, except it be into hell. It may be we have not feared Christ with due reverence, nor believed with true confidence, nor loved him with sincere affection, nor acknowledged him with free confession; but Lord keep us from denying him: let us never deny the God that bought us.

The Lord.] One that by just right callengeth their service. Not a creature, yet the natural man will not deny his own horse or dog that hath done him service. A man will not deny his own house: wilt thou Agnoscere domum, & rejicere Dominem; Acknowledge thy house, and deny thy Master, thy Maker? Not a servant: Philemus would not deny Onesimus a runaway servant, when Paul had written for him: wilt thou Praeponere servum tuum Domino tuo; Prefer thy servant before thy Lord? not a friend: he is a prodigy that denies his friend. Nabal was branded for a Churl, because he shown not kindness to David his friend: and such a friend as protected him, his whole family, his substance, 1 Sam. 25.15. It goes near when a man's own familiar friend shall do him a mischief; This Absalom objects to Hushai; Is this thy kindness to thy friend? Indeed men are sometimes so drunk with the honors of this world, that they forget their friends. Like as I have heard of a Lawyer, that pleaded a case very strongly on the one side, yet before the trial of it being advanced to the Bench, adjudged it on the other: yet thus answered all imputation; I spake then as an advocate for my client, I speak now as a Judge of the cause. Or as when another challenged his friend; You were wont to visit me every day, now you keep at distance: he plainly answered; I then needed you, now I am afraid you will need me. A good man would not thus use his friend, but is there any friend like the Lord? Not a Father, how unnatural is it for the fruit to deny the tree? and to forget the rock whence he was hewn? Solomon a King did not despise his mother, but set her at his right hand. There is nothing but the love of the Lord Jesus must make a man leave his parents, Luke 14.26. Indeed a man is bound to forsake his father and mother to adhere to his wife, Mat. 19.5. But this is to be understood with a limitation, if the competition be impossible. But for Christ, Harken O daughter, forget thine own people, and thy fathers house, Psal. 45.10. But otherwise how cursed a thing is it to deny parents? Let them that glisten like the Sun, and deny to their poor obscure parents part of their superfluities, remember the doom. Prov. 30.17. The Ravens of the valley shall pick out that eye, and the young Eagles eat it. But what is the father of our flesh, to the Father of our spirits? Not a wife, and yet she is not to be denied but in case of known adultery, Mat. 19.9. Hath God made you one of two, and shall one deny the other? Deny yourself? no man doth this, but he lapseth into fornication; denying a chaste wife, to embrace an unchaste harlot. Not a Sovereign: Rome only hath broached those Lees of rebellion, and unloosed the bonds of allegiance? And no marvel though she hath denied God's deputies on earth, which hath first denied God himself in heaven. If Kings do not serve her, she forbiddeth all subjects to serve them: she excommunicates them as profane. Yet Saul himself, though he had not sanctity of life, had sanctity of calling. Therefore David, honoravit vivum, vindicavit scissum; Both honored him living, and avenged him being dead, Aug.

These be all sinful denials in their several degrees: but now to deny the Lord that is the supreme apostasy. If it be ill to deny the creature, what is it to deny the Creator? If to deny a servant that fears thee, what is it to deny a Master whom thou shouldst fear? If ill to deny a friend that may change, what is it to deny Christ that is the same yester-day, and today, and forever? If to deny a father that begat the body, what is it to deny God that created the soul? If to deny a wife with whom thou art made one flesh, what is it to deny the Lord with whom thou art made one spirit? 1 Cor. 6.17. If to deny a Sovereign be treason, what is it to deny the King of Kings? We are subject to the Prince propter Dominum, for the Lord, to the Lord propter seipsum, for himself. The very word the Apostle here useth is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , and not 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : Lord hath reference to a Bondman, Master to a free-man, Varin. Intimating in the very propriety of syllables, that man is a very bond-man under the despotically power of God.

Here is then the second aggravation of their sin; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . The LORD that hath given them his liverie, allowed them maintenance, to whom they have vowed homage, and who can pour on them vengeance. 1. His livery, they take and wear. Question them, as the mariners did Jonah; What art thou? they will answer with him; I fear the LORD GOD of heaven. Yea, they will profess with David, Psalm. 116.16. O LORD, I am thy servant. But, alas, they put on this cloak that they may be the more securely wicked under it: and if you trust them not, you shall be sure they will not deceive you. But how can they profess him, and deny him too? Yes, they may profess him in words, and deny him in works. They bear Caesar's stamp upon base metal. There was one condemned for coming to the marriage without his wedding-garment: these have the garment, but they come not to the wedding: God shall pluck their coat over their ears. Secondly, his maintenance they take and live on: the bread they eat, the air they breath, the clothes they wear, all are his: they are maintained only at his cost and charges: yet they deny the Lord that feeds them. We are to worship God, ration immensi Domini, impensi beneficii; both for his glorious Sovereignty, and gracious bounty. Si non colis, iniquus es: si negas, ingratus es; If thou do not worship him, thou art unjust; if thou denyest him, thou art unthankful. Me thinks thou shouldst fear, that the bread should choke thee, the air infect thee, the water drown thee: when thou considerest, I have denied the Lord of all these. Think of his ye that forget God and his benefits: he that riseth from the table without giving of thanks, goes his way and owes for his ordinary. And because he will not pay God in his thanks, God will pay himself in his torments. Shall I take my Masters food, and deny my Master? Thirdly, they have vowed homage to him, and faithful adherence: Christ covenanting with his blood to wash away their sins; they to forsake his enemies, and continue his faithful soldiers and servants to the end of their lives. Now what kind of soldier is he that runs away from his Colours, and denies his General? Fourthly, they deny that Lord, who can destroy all those that rebel against him, Luke 19.27. Those mine enemies that denied me to reign over them, bring hither, and slay before me. They have not refused a weak, titular, mortal Lord, but the Lord of heaven and earth; that spake the word and they were made, that can speak again and they shall be mar'd. Psal. 18.7. The earth trembled, and the foundations of the hills were moved, because he was wroth. It was this Lord, Isaiah 30.33. Tophet is ordained of old, the pile thereof is fire and much wood, and the breath of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it. It was this Lord, Matth. 18.34. The Lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentours. It was this Lord. A Lord that is everywhere to see his wrongs, that hath a just hand to requite them, and an almighty power to revenge them: from the wrath of this Lord, the Lord himself deliver us. Lord, who knows thy greatness, and dares deny thee? who knows thy goodness, and will deny thee? who knows thy mercy, and can deny thee? Thou art our God, and we will praise thee: thou art our Lord, and we will serve thee: thou art our Father, and we will honor thee: thou art our Judge, and we will fear thee: thou art our advocate, we will not deny thee: thou art our hope, our joy, our blessedness, our salvation, and we will love thee forever.

That bought them.] This last aggravation is derived from the consideration of the unspeakable good which this Lord hath done them: in that they were delivered by the most excellent benefit that ever came to mankind, which is Redemption by the blood of Christ. For howsoever it was a singular work and favor of God, to give us by creation a blessed being: yet was it no otherwise given us, than with a possibility to keep it or lose it. But Redemption hath instated us to a blessedness never to be lost. Here then is a doubt to be resolved: how they may perish from Christ if they were redeemed; how were they redeemed if they can perish?

First, we must lay this ground of truth: that no soul which Christ hath truly bought can perish eternally. This is the Fathers will, that of all which he hath given me, I should lose nothing. But all they are given to Christ, whom he hath purchased. John. 10.28. I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hands. If I give them eternal life, nothing shall bring them to eternal death: and to pluck them out of his hand that is Almighty, requires an adversary stronger than himself. And our Savior there adds, Vers. 29. My Father which gave them me, is greater than all: and no man is able to pluck them out of my Fathers hand. Hereupon Paul makes a free challenge to all the actors, and pleaders, and powers that ever damnation had. Rom. 8.38. Neither death, nor life, nor Angels, nor Principalities, nor Powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depts, (and if all this be not enough) nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus: none can do it. And whether they be Romish or Arminian, that seek to weaken the grace of God, and permit the redeemed ones of the Lord to perish; let us know them for the brokers of Satan, the Seminaries of despair, and Denyers of Christ.

But against this Doctrine is opposed, Rom. 14.15. Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died. 1 Cor. 8.11. Through thy knowledge shall thy weak brother perish, for whom Christ died. But those places may be understood not \langle in non-Latin alphabet \rangle : not that they can perish through thy default, but that thou dost what thou canst to make them perish. But here it seems most plain, that they may be lost in Denying Christ, whom he bought. To clear this, we say that Reprobates may be said to be redeemed in divers respects.

1 Secundum sufficientiam pretii; In regard of the all-sufficient price paid for them. So Christ is said to be that Lamb which taketh away the sins of the world. Though he meant not to save all, yet he died for all, quod suum erat adimplens, performing his part, Chrysost. For he doth not really take away all sin from the world; and this himself declares by not praying for the world, John. 17.9. I pray not for the world. Otherwise the two main parts or offices of his Priesthood were disjoined; and he should sacrifice for them, for whom he doth not supplicate. Now for his mediation, concludes his own in it, excludes the world out of it, I pray not for the world.

2 They are said redeemed, secundum apparentiam, in respect of outward appearance. So all the Jews were called the elect people of God; yet Paul saith expressly; That with many of them God was not well pleased, and they were destroyed, 1 Cor. 10.5. Now, Electorum si quisquis perit, fallitur Deus; If any of the elect perish, God is deceived; but God cannot be deceived, Aug. They were then of his Court, they were not of his Council; I mean, not of that number which in his eternal Council he decreed to save. Inward sincerity is not without external profession, but external profession may be without inward sincerity. If the form of godliness could save, hell should be filled with none but Pagans and Infidels; not a Christian should come thither. But we know that a man may unhallow that blood wherewith he was hallowed; and so deserve sorer punishment, Heb. 10.29. And a wicked spirit rejected, may make his re-entry with seven other worse than himself, Mat. 12.45. And their fire in hell shall be hottest, that re-admit a devil, which the grace of God had once cast forth. As the wicked here say of the elect, That his life is madness, and his end to be without honor: in regard of their estate so outwardly miserable. So the elect judge of the reprobate; We number him among the children of God, and think his lot to be among the Saints: in regard of visible appearance. At last they find him cast like an unprofitable and hypocritical servant into outer darkness.

3 They are said to be redeemed, Secundum ipsorum opinionem, in respect of their own opinion: they thought themselves to be redeemed, and did apportion Christ. There is a temporary faith, which for a while believes, and in time of temptation falls away, Luke 8.13. neither should it be said, Be thou faithful unto the death, unless there was a faith that might fail before death, Rev. 2.10. S. James says, there is a faith without charity: which indeed Potest esse, non potest prodesse, saith Augustine, may be, but never be good. This faith is like an high ladder; if men have got up many rounds, and then let go their hold, they take the greater fall, Heb. 6.4. Some reprobates may taste the heavenly gift; and yet fall so far away, that no repentance to renew them. They tasted it, but it seems they took it but upon liking, and could not digest it.

Some are so impudently bold of their salvation, and presume themselves so familiar with God, that they dare challenge him to talk ex tempore with him. They may think themselves God's darlings and favorites, that never had their names registered in his book.

4 They seem to be redeemed, Secundum charitatis iudicium, in respect of the judgment of charity: which holds all men partakers of redemption, that are of the profession. We must cast off none, until we are sure that the Lord hath cast them off. Let us not abridge or limit God's mercy: how often have our sins deserved his wrathful doom, which yet our prayers and tears have reversed? How often hath the scroll of divorce been drawn and signed; and yet again with-drawn and cancelled upon our submission? Let us not grudge others that mercy we have found: Why is man cruel, where God relents? If the Creditor be pleased to forgive the debt, do standers by complain? Well then, we hoped that these men were redeemed, they were not: we desired it, we endeavored it: our charity did them no good, it did ourselves good: Our prayer returned into our own bosom.

This truth then remains, that Christ only bought his Church, and salvation for his Church. Act. 20.28. Feed the Church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood. Ephes. 5.25. Christ loved the Church, and gave himself for it. Matth. 1.21. His Name is Jesus, yet he shall save only His own people. For the rest, 1 John. 2.19. They went out from us, but they were not of us. Howsoever; the price was paid for them, and there was a sufficient ransom in the blood of Jesus, if their faithful apprehension had made it theirs. The King hath granted a Pardon for all malefactors at the Parliament; we say, they are all pardoned: yet perhaps some afterwards are condignely punished, because they never sued out this pardon, nor took the benefit of it. First, therefore consider what God hath done for them, then what they have done against him: the height of his mercy adds to the weight of their iniquity.

God in his love redeemed us by the blood of his Son: Now there are four kinds of redemption: First, when a slave, gratuito manumittitur, is freely released to liberty: we could not be so discharged; for besides that God is just, and his debts must be paid; Satan would not so part with us. Secondly, when a man is set free, per mutationem alterius, by commutation or exchanging another into his room: we could exchange no creature to supply our servitude. Thirdly, when a man is rescued, violentâ ablation, by a forcible surprisall; as Abraham redeemed Lot: but herein God was far too strong for us. Fourthly, Dato pretio, by a price paid; and thus were we bought with a price, even the blood of that unspotted Lamb. His payment consisted in Patiendo and Faciendo; in suffering for our delinquishments, and in performing a sufficient obedience to God for us.

Here admire we the infinite love of God! The Egyptians in their Hieroglyphickes, or expressions of morality by pictures; used to paint Love naked, Minerva veiled: to show that wisdom may be concealed, love cannot be smothered. The Cherubims covered their faces, which is the seat of wisdom: but not their breasts, which is the seat of affection. David by his dissembled madness, kept his wisdom unseen from Achish: but spying Bethshabe from the battlements of his Palace, he could not smother his affection. God reserves his wisdom to himself, and the reason of his actions: but his love is visible, breaking forth, and read by every running eye, Cant. 8.7. Many waters cannot quench love. It is an unsuppressible fire; much water cannot quench it; water and blood could not put it out. Now whom did GOD thus love? The World: not the frame of heaven and earth, but the little world, Man: the compendium and abridgement of all creatures. That whatsoever is imprinted with capital letters in that large volume, as in Folio, is sweetly and harmoniously contracted in Decimo sexto, in the brief Text of Man, who includes all. Planets have being, not life; Plants have life, not sense; Beasts have sense, not reason; Angels have being, life, reason, not sense: Man hath all; being with Planets, life with Plants, sense with Beasts, reason with Angels. Therefore he is called the World. This world God loved, affective before all time, effective in time.

But what good could man do to him, to induce this love? None: Our well-doing extendeth not unto him, Psal. 16.2. When we were made, we added nothing to God: if we were dissolved to nothing, we take nothing from God. That which the Lord saw in us, was apostasy and rebellion. Every creature obeys God, in running that course which he disposed to them. But how was this true: when the Sun being appointed to move his incessant race, did yet stand still in Gibeon? When the sea being charged to keep within his bounds, doth yet burst out with inundations? I answer; God bade them do so, dispensing with his former command, and they obeyed him. Well, yet man, rebellious man he loved: What did he give for him? Paradise, large kingdoms, or mines of gold? No, they are but a farthing token to the price of this purchase. He gave his only begotten Son: as he says, What could I do more for my vineyard? so, what could I give more for my vineyard? This Son he gave pro ingratia, for unthankful men, that said not so much as God—a-mercy for him: pro injustis, for unrighteous men, that denied him that was not denied to them. Here was a Sic dilexi, no man could ever find a Sicut for it. Augustine supposeth that some great Prince had a poor desertlesse subject, maimed in mind, without reason or honesty; leprous in body, without any soundness; yea, so full of stench that none could endure him: yea, more than all, so arrant a traitor to the same Prince, that he would vex him, kill him. He hath one only son, a sweet and hopeful Prince, the joy of his heart, the light and delight of his eyes, the singular heir of his kingdom. Yet when nothing will cure this forlorn wretch of his leprosy, but only this young Princes blood, he freely gives that to bathe and cleanse him. This is much, and such as never was found, yet still short of this precedent. For if the life of a Prince was given for a gnat, it is not so much as for God's Son to be given for man. He is worth ten thousands of us, more worth than all: O unspeakable love, gift, price!

Saint Peter tells us what was the price of this purchase, 1 Pet, 1.19. The precious blood of Christ, a Lamb without blemish. Had he emptied the veins of the earth, and spoiled them of their richest oars: had he plucked the spangles from heaven, and impoverished the firmament of her sparkling beauties: had he given the whole inheritance of the world; yet all had been infinitely less. When David said to Mephibosheth; Thou and Ziba divide the Land: he answered; Yea, let him take all, seeing my Lord the King is come again in peace. This was much, yet Mephibosheth's content was for David, a friend, a King: but God parts not with an Inheritance, but with his Son; and this for man, an enemy, a servant. Let death seize on my Son, that my servant may come again in peace. O never was so poor a purchase at so high a price! That he might show love to us, he forbore love to himself. Now see, O renegade, whom thou refuseth: Nescis temeraria, nescis, quem fugias, ideóque fugis; Thou knowest not whom thou denyest, therefore thou denyest. If thou hast bought honor by thy valor, thou callest it Thine: if endeared a friend by thy loyalty, thou callest him Thine: if purchased an house with thy money, thou callest it Thine Christ hath bought thee with his blood, and yet thou denyest to be his. This ransom is paid, and now in a merciful offer he tenders it to thee; wilt thou in a peevish sullenness refuse it? Conceive this dialogue between the Redeemer and the Denyer. Red. Open to me. Den. No, I know not whence thou art. Red. Rise and see. Den. No, I am in my warm bed of pleasures and carnal satisfactions, I will not rise: who art thou? Red. I am JESUS, thy Redeemer: wilt thou still swear and for swear, I know none such? I bought thee, thou art mine: I come to embrace thee, deny me not. Den. Yes, take me, when all other delights forsake me: let me be thine when I am not mine own: till then keep thy cheare to thyself, I have married my pleasure, and I cannot come. O obstinate hearts, whom the King of heaven must buy with his blood, woo with his grace, wait upon with his patience, enrich with proffers of mercy; and yet at last be denied? LORD turn to sad as love thee, we deny not thee, deny not us, O good LORD JESUS. Amen.

This is the latitude and dimension of their wickedness; wherewith I will have done, when I have declared the Penaltie of it. Their punishment is proportioned to their fault: they denied him that bought them, and he that bought them will deny them, 2 Tim. 2.12. If we deny him, he will also deny us. How, where, and when will he deny them? They surfeit on pleasures, and enjoy the wish of their own hearts; how then doth he deny them? Doth not God bless whom he loves and love whom he blesses? Alas, those blessings to such men prove curses: Conceditur opulentia, abscinditur misericordia: wealth is granted, but mercy is withholden. The earth seems their own, the world applauds them; and is not Vox populi, Vox dei; the voice of the people, the voice of God? No, for the whole world lieth in wickedness: but here they are honored, where then shall they be denied? The echo answers, Here: even where Saul would be honored, there was he denied, before the people. They spend their days in peace, their minds are not troubled, they sit not sighing and blubbering for their offenses, sure God is not angry with them; when shall they be denied? Now, even in that they lament not, their case is most lamentable: their pulse hath left beating, this argues God's direliction; that their life breath is painted out, and they have given up the (Holy Ghost.) Will you hear how, where, and when? Take it from CHRIST'S own mouth. Matth. 10.33. Whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven. For the manner, How; I will deny him, not conceal him, nor excuse him, not hold my peace and silence it, but deny him. For the place where; Before my Father, where my word will be taken: for I have the key of heaven, to let in and keep out whom I please. Coram Patre, who hath committed all judgment to me, and set me to sentence every man according to his works. Coram Patre, if it had been only. Coram hominibus, before men, where thou denyest me, they would approve my justice: if Coram daemonibus, before the devils, they would be glad of thy company, and with a hasty rape hurry thee to perdition: if only, Coram Angels, before the Angels, (which is also expressed, Luk. 12.9. He that denieth me before men, shall be denied before the Angels of God.) They would witness how often I have sent them to guard thee, how little thou didst regard me. But what is the detestation of men, the rejection of Angels, the derision of devils, to the loss of my Fathers love? This Coram Patre, shall strike thee with horror Matth. 21. Ver. 37. When the Father sent CHRIST, he said, Sure they will reverence my Son: but they conspired, This is the heir, come, let us kill him. Reject them ô Father, for they rejected me. Away must their faces be turned, from joy, from light, from blessedness; to wander in horrid darkness, to lie bound in the chains of torment; where unquencheable fire, and insatiable death shall not be denied them, that denied everlasting life. For the time when; In heaven: when they knock with hope to be let in at that gate, when they shall see millions of confessors enter in and be made welcome: In heaven I will deny them, that is in the day of judgment. On earth they spake their pleasures, their tongues were their own, they denied me without control: but when I have denied them in heaven, and they have acknowledged me in hell, then shall they gnaw those tongues for pain, and wish that they had been borne dumb, never to have denied him that bought them, Revel. 16.10.

This is a fearful plague, when God will suffer men to fall off from CHRIST, and to reject their Redeemer: alas, they do no less then split and sink that Ship in the midst of the sea, which alone should save them. Whom shall they trust to make them righteous? none can do this but CHRIST, and they have denied him. Rom. 6.33. Who shall condemn? it is CHRIST that justifieth: so who shall justify, when CHRIST condemneth? They have sinned, and God is offended, who shall make an atonement for them? Only CHRIST can do this; If any man sin, he is our Advocate and propitiation: and this Advocate they have denied. Whom shall they call upon for love and favor? there is none to be had but in CHRIST, and him they have denied, Revel. 2.4. I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love. He that hath once broken his faith, will not easily be trusted. Him, that hath once vowed love to a virgin, and after fallen off with breach of covenant, no wise maid will ever admit within distance of liking. They wax wanton against CHRIST, having damnation, because they have cast off their first faith. Whom shall they call upon in the day of trouble? the Lord. This was the voice of Elias in his agony, of Jonah in his fury; Lord, take away my life. Of the Apostles in their fear. Matth 8.25. Lord save us, we perish. Of the malefactor dying on the Cross. Luk 23.42. Lord, remember me in thy kingdom. Of Stephen under the stones, Act. 7.59. Lord, into thy hands, &c. Of Saul cast down from his horse. Act. 9.6. Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? This is the echo of misery, the suppliant for mercy: but alas how shall they call on this Lord, that have denied him, Rom. 10.14. How shall they call on him, in whom they have not believed: Yea, whom they have denied? What wonder is it, if God doth not hear, where he hath not been heard? if he shut against them, that would not open to him? complainest thou, Why hast thou forsaken me O Lord? he replies, why hast thou denied me ô servant? There is grievous punishment for them that fear not God: Pour out thine indignation upon them that fear thee not, saith the Prophet. Grievous, for them that seek him not. Psal. 10. The wicked will not seek after God, therefore are lost in the devices of error. Grievous, for them that call not on him; for he will be a stranger to their acquaintance. Grievous, for them that trust not on him, for they shall be left to themselves. Grievous, for them that love him not, for they shall be written in the dust. But most grievous for them that deny him here, for they shall be denied forever hereafter.

The use that we are to make of it, is by this consideration to fortify our faithfulness and loyalty to CHRIST. Let us not deny him, yea let us deny all things for him. For saith Jerome; if necessity require it, Odium in suum, est pietas in deum; it is godliness to hate our own delights in respect of the Lord. What good thing can be lost by our profession, which Jesus requites not in himself? lose we riches? In him dwells all fullness. Liberty? The Son makes us free indeed. Wife? he is a husband. Children? he is a Father. Life? Ego sum vita, he is the true life.

Therefore is he called All in all: ut qui omnia propter Christum dimiserit, (ϕ) pro omnibus inveniatur, & libere clamet, Pars mea Dominus, Hieronym. That he which hath left all for CHRIST, many find CHRIST instead of all, and sing cheerfully, The Lord is my portion. Why should we deny him? he never denied us. Not to the Pharisees, Matth. 9.12. Why eateth your Master with Publicans and sinners? this was their question. I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance: this was his answer. Not to Pilate. 1 Tim. 6.13. Before Pontius Pilate he witnessed a good confession. Not to the Angels, for he makes them Ministring spirits for our good. Not to GOD the Father himself, John. 17. They are all mine, and thine. When he was betrayed and taken, he denied us not to Judas; Ego sum, I am he. When he was scourged, he denied us not: when he was condemned, and nailed to the Cross, loe, he did not then deny us, Though enemies denied mercy, by-standers denied him pity, Angels must deny him help, God himself seemed to deny him ease and comfort; so he cries, My God, why hast thou denied me? yet even then he did not deny us. But he confessed us to the death, Luk. 23.34. Father, forgive them: and after death, as appears by his charge to Peter, Feed my sheep: and forever, Matth. 10.32. Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess before my Father in heaven. A way then with all excuses of denial: there are two temptations or causes of it; Infirmitie, and Infidelity. Infirmitie rise•h from fear of pain, Infidelity from love of pleasure. Is any pain like the separation from CHRIST? think of that Discredite, Matth. 25. Depart from me (ϕ) cursed. Is any pleasure like the pleasures at the right hand of God forever? Away with that coldness of heart, that like Northern cloth shrinks in the wetting, I mean in the floods of persecution. Away with that thin-danw'd profession, that like mown grass withers in the sun, with the heat of prosperity. Let us deny our own worth, and become nothing in ourselves, that we may be wholly all in CHRIST. The poor man depends not upon the relief of others, till he find nothing at home. Until our hearts be purged of pride and self-love, we never depend on the favor of God. Be everything denied that is not in ordine ad Deum, and hath no relation to Jesus Christ. Let us deny our pleasures, deny our lusts, deny our wills, deny our covetous desires, deny our seducing friends, deny ourselves: but let us never deny the Lord that bought us. To this blessed Lord of our redemption, with the Father of our creation, and the Spirit of our adoption, three Persons and one most holy God, be praise and glory forever, Amen.

They bring upon themselves swift destruction. We have anatomised the fault of these false teachers, in denying their Redeemer. Which haply was not with an open and manifest recusancie, for then orthodox Christians would have refused conversing with them, and the Church excommunicated them. But rather, because such a denial did arise by just consequence out of their dogmatical, stigmaticall assertions. For if we understand Saint Peter by Saint Jude; the very parallel and harmony one of the other: we find these heretics challenged for Turning the grace of God into licentiousnesse, Iud. ver. 4. Whereupon is inferred, that they deny the only Lord God, and Jesus Christ. So that to turn Grace into wantonness, is to deny CHRIST. Neither was this only exemplary in their practice, but also doctrinal in their profession. For he that calls himself Christian, and teacheth that in CHRIST is granted liberty of sinning, denies the Redeemer. Luk. 1.74. We are delivered out of the hands of all our enemies, that we might serve him without fear. That we might serve him without fear, not sin without fear. CHRIST came to unbinde us from Satan, and to vex him at our new goodness, not to make him laugh at our wickedness: that we should sin less; not sin more, and more securely. Rom. 6.1. Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? God forbid. An sit, quia sit? absit. Shall there be presumption in sin because there is abundance of grace? God forbid. This is a true position: Quicquid Christus operatur pro nobis, hoc operatur in nobis. Whatsoever the Lord Jesus worketh for us, that he also worketh in us. If he hath freed us from the damnation of sin, then also from the dominion of sin. If with his blood he hath quenched the fire of hell for us, he hath quenched the fire of lust in us. They are miserable men, qui luxuriantur in Christo, that are wanton in Christ: as if the Law had lost it self in the Gospel: and the Statutes against blasphemy, adultery, idolatry, covetousness, were now repealed, to stand in no more force: but like an Almanac out of date, to be sacrificed to forgetfulness. This is a left-handed taking of Christ: Non consolatur Christi infantia garrulos, non Christi lacrymae cachinnantes, non panni ejus ambulantes in stolis, non praesepe amantes primas cathedras, Bern. Christ's humility doth not comfort the proud: his patience shall do no good to the revengeful: nor his love to the uncharitable. He was a prodigal young heir that encouraged his companions; come let us drink, revel, throw the house out at the windows; the man in the scarlet will pay for all; meaning his father, who was a Judge: but he adjudged the patrimony from him to one of his younger sons more obedient. So say the luxurious; let us swear, oppress, abuse, be wanton, be merry, be mad; the man in the Scarlet hath paid for all; meaning Christ, that he is in his Scarlet and bloody robes shall justify and acquit them. But be not deceived; as good men as we, and as jolly they were, that stood upon the Fatherhood of Abraham. (We may put away our wives, we may swear, we may hate our enemies. We may kill the Prophets, subject God's word to our Traditions, and follow our own ways. Why? Abraham is our Father, John. 8.39.) But by their leave, Christ calls them bastards, and finds out another father for them. Ver. 44. Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. So ye profane wretches, bear yourselves so long as you will upon CHRIST, and flesh your lusts on his merits; if you think to take willful sin in one hand, and Christ in the other, you shall find both your hands full indeed, b•• Christ in neither of them: the one being full of wickedness, the other full of vengeance; you have denied the Lord Jesus.

They bring on themselves swift destruction.] This is the punishment. The•• are plagues enow, that wound the flesh, and fetch blood of the soul, without perishing; but this the utter ruin, Destruction. But yet this may be far off, and happily doth wait the succession of ages, and intervention of many years: and when it cometh, it shall give warning of the approach, like a Porcpose before • storm: nay, it comes on a sudden, it is Swift destruction. But who shall inflict this, that they may fortify themselves against it? Themselves: here need no engines, no enemies, no invasions; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , Superinducunt sibi, Themselves bring it, or, They bring it on themselves. So that their punishment is described, by the Autho••, Measure, and Manner. The Author, Themselves: the measure, no less than Destruction: the manner, Swift and sudden.

They bring on themselves.] Very kind men! what would they do with others, that destroy themselves? Cui bonus, qui sibi nequam? He that is evil to himself, 〈◇〉 whom will he be good? Every man thinks, that he loves himself far better than his enemy: yet while he affecteth sin, he loves his enemy better than himself, Vnusquisque vult esse beatus, etiam sic vivendo ut sit miserrimus. All men would be happy, albeit most men take the course of infelicity. We hate our foes; thou hast no worse foe than thyself: hate thy sinful self. If there were no harlot, no drunken associate, no thief to cry, Cast in thy lot with us; no devil to do his office; wicked men would beget destruction on themselves. Accersunt, so some read; They send for destruction; as a man dispatcheth messenger after messenger, because the expected party delays his coming. So as if damnation were leaden-heeld, they send anger to fetch it to them, after that malice, after that murder, a bloody messenger. So worldlings send covetousness for it, after that lying, after that swearing, after that Usury, after all oppression. Lest vengeance should be too slow, & forget it self, these be the messengers to bring it. Hos. 4.2. By swearing, and lying, and killing, and stealing, and committing adultery, they break out, and blood toucheth blood. Therefore shall the land mourn, and every inhabitant languish. Now whe• the plague comes, and says, Ecce adsum, Here I am: they cry as the devil did to CHRIST, What have we to do with thee: why comest thou to torment us before 〈◇〉 time? Before your time, replies destruction? Why, did you not send for me? was not pride rapping at my door, blasphemy thundering in mine ears, Sacrilege pulling me by the hand? all crying, vengeance come away, thou art sent for? And especially, when sacrilege hastened me, it was high time to come. As Aha•i three Captains and their fifties that were sent to fetch Elijah: one said, come down: another, come down quickly: the last on his knees entreat; loe then God saith g• down with him, 2 King. 11.14. Wickedness says, wrath come down: presumpti•• says, come down quickly: but rebellion begs it without nay: and then G•• saith, Go down with it. Yea, as if sending for it were not speedy enough, and th•y would not in this business trust a messenger; they put off all state, and go themselves to fetch it. They bring it on themselves, Isaiah. 5.18. They draw iniquity 〈◇〉 cords of vanity, and sin as it were with a cartrope. That same threefold cord, 〈◇〉 easily broken, that Saint John speaks of, 1 John. 2.16. The lust of the flesh, the last 〈◇〉 the eyes, and the pride of life; this draws it home. But lest all these cords shall 〈◇〉 hold, hard-heartednesse is the cartrope that shall fetch it with a mischief. W•• then doth a man complain for the punishment of his sins? Lam. 3.39. Punishment reassons with the wicked; why doest thou murmur in thy sufferings? Hast th••been so many years a bringing me, sent so many messengers for me: and now I am here complainest thou? I was long a coming, I will be longer a departing. Ne•o fit repent miserrimus: no man becomes miserable on the sudden; such is God's patience: but being once made miserable, it is long before happiness returns; such •s God Justice. Miserie comes come on horse-back, but goes away on foot: sin quickly brings her, long repentance must drive her gone. From this point of doctrine may be deduced three collections.

1 That the wicked are the causers of their own condemnation. Esa. 50.1. Which of my creditours is it to whom, I have sold you? Behold, for your iniquities ye have •old yourselves. I took no money saith God, no price of any creditors for you; •ee have sold yourselves. Prov. 5.22. His own iniquity shall take the wicked him•else: there need no ginnes nor snares, nor plots to surprise him; his own sins shall do it. Thou mayest say of thy sin, (as of thy son:) it is a child of mine own begetting: concupiscence the mother lays it to thee, and thou must father it. Psal. 64.8. They shall make their own tongue to fall upon themselves. Let there be no plaintiffes to endite, no devils to accuse, their own tongues shall condemn them. Ier. 2.17. Hast thou not procured this unto thyself? Self do, self have. Procuring is a diligent laboring of a business: so they study to bring evil on themselves. Mic. 2.1. They meditate mischief; study to be naught. Let our providence be never so vigilant, our circumspection heedful; sorrow will come: but these men study for it; they beat their brains, and break their sleeps, plot, consult, contrive; and all to bring on themselves swift destruction. It is true, that this is not their immediate proposed end, but it is a necessary consequent. He that seeks dignity for some hidden treasure undermines the foundation of a house; his ends wealth; yet he knows the whole building will fall on his head, and quash him to pieces: if he do perish, let him thank himself.

2 Observe that God is not the cause of man's transgression or damnation. I am. 13. Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God. Seneca hath a saying not unlike of the gods; Hii nec habent, nec dant malum. But it is objected; It is God's will that I should thus sin, and thus fall. Rom. 9.19. Why doth he yet find fault? who hath resisted his will? My will is borne by the stream of his inevitable will, I sin by compulsion; why doth he then complain? O detestable speech, that charges God with our iniquity; than which the grand devil could not roar a worse above ground. Consider their dilemma: evil is done, and God doth suffer it; whether then doth he suffer it against his will, or with it? If against his will, this takes away his omnipotence: if with his will, than he willed it. For answer, the will of God is partly secret, wholly just: it is two ways considered. First as it is Signata, written in tables published by a trumpet, seconded with blessings, curses, Then as Reservata, concealed, written in another book, wrapped up in the counsels of his own breast. What God formerly wills, is not done always, yea is done seldom: what in the future respect he wills, is infallible. Sennacherib is a fool to challenge to himself; What God can deliver out of my hand? Nero to plead; my authority gives me license to do all things. Rome, to challenge to her chair an impetuous, imperious, and masterlesse will; to whom no man must say, as to the Lord, Cur ita facis, why doest thou so? Thus they ground it. Esa. 10.15. Shall the saw magnify him that shaketh 〈◇〉? The saw must not lift up it self against him that moveth it; ergo let no man judge the Pope. But they shall find to their woe, that this is only true of God; who doeth whatsoever he will. If we press further into his secrets, we are bid stand back. Adam was driven out of Paradise for affecting too much knowledge: the Israelites had died the death, had they past their bounds, and climbed up to the Mount. Fifty thousand threescore and ten men of the Bethshemites were slain for looking into the Ark. 1 Sam. 6.19. There are some unsearcheable mysteries, as high as the highest heavens, covered with a curtain of sacred secrecy, not to be drawn till the day come, wherein we shall know as we are known. Now when men have spilled blood, defiled the marriage bed, provoked heaven with rapes, treasons, depopulations, blasphemies; what, have they then done the will of God? Indeed, in respect of his hidden purpose they have done his will, spite of all their malicious 〈◇〉 sworn contradictions. For De his qui faciunt quae non vult, facit ipse quae vult. Upon them that will not do as he would have it, he will do himself as he would 〈◇〉 it. But in respect of themselves the wicked have done what God willed not, for ⟨◇⟩ commanded the contrary; and hath expressed that will in his word.

But yet he wills their destruction, therefore they bring it not on themselves? G• found them revolted to sin, indisposed to believe, and so he leaves them: he ⟨◇⟩ not give them faith, he needs not, he is not bound to it. This is God's hardeni•g Nolle emollire, when he will not soften. His making blind is Nolle illuminare, whe• he will not enlighten. His casting off is Nolle vocare, when he will not call ho•• Neither is this only a mere permission; for their is a degree of some forwarder disposition in God concerning the actions of unrighteousmen, than a bare toleration There is great difference between these speeches; Non vult, and Vult non: between he hath not a will to do it; and, he hath a will not to do it. The former arg•• ⟨◇⟩ careless neglect, this a bent and resolved decree. A poor man asketh alms, so•• are not willing to relieve him, as not waighing his necessity: another hath a will not ⟨◇⟩ do it, a determinate refusal of mercy. This is then the conclusion; Multi ⟨◇⟩ laberentur detenti, nulli ut laberentur impulsu: God lifteth many up, there are ⟨◇⟩ whom he properly casteth down. Ab illo est quod statur, a nobis quod ruitur: b• him we stand, we fall off ourselves. O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself; if the•• be any help, it is in me. Indeed it is my hand of justice that strikes, but thou by thy wickedness didst draw out the sword, and put the arrow into my bended bow: thy pestilent and stinking sins have conflated the plague wherewith I strike thee. Go• would have spared them, they would not be spared; Accelerant sibi; They bring destruction on themselves; and still Thou continuest holy, Oh thou worship of Israel.

3 Observe that themselves bring it; therefore not any fatal necessity out of themselves, but their own malice within them. There be some that say, It is ⟨◇⟩ destiny to do this or that sin, the stars have signed it. Mercury committed the theft, Mars the murder, Venus the adultery. This is a barking at God's Justice indirectly, involvedly, and somewhat afar off, to charge the influences of heaven. As if forsooth, God did not instigate them to sin immediately by himself, yet by other instruments. Thus Adam insinuated an imputation upon God; M•li•• quam tu mihi dedisti; The woman which thou gavest me: as if God had given him ⟨◇⟩ woman to tempt him. Sed haec ruina est maxima, Deum putare causam ruinae: this i• the fearefullest ruin of all, to accuse the Lord for the cause of our ruin. There i• no fatal necessity from above, that drives man to sin. Saint Augustine confi•• them that used to charge the stars with their impiety. A woman was given to ⟨◇⟩, and often played the harlot: which when her husband found, and objected to her she excused her self, and pleaded that it was Venus which caused her to do so. H• upon he took a staff, and cudgell'd her for it: then she complained of his un•••ralnesse, to strike his own flesh: that she was his wife, dear unto him, and he o•g•• not to beat her. He replied, it is not you, wife, that I strike but Venus: declari•• that as it was not she that played the whore, but Venus in her: so it was not she ⟨◇⟩ he did beat, but Venus out of her. A thief hath stolen thy goods, thou takest ⟨◇⟩ in the manner: he cries, let me alone, and charge Mercury with it, he stole•• goods. No wise Judge would indite or arraign Mercury, call a star from ••ven; but cut off an ill member from the earth. Thus neither can the wicked ch•• the stars or any other creatures with their destruction. True it is that God $\langle \diamond \rangle$ their instrumental means often in executions. Judge. 5.20. They fought from he••• the stars in their courses fought against Sisera. In the days of Noah the wind• $\langle \diamond \rangle$ heaven were opened so wide, that they drowned the world. 2 King. 1.10. Fire $\langle \diamond \rangle$ down from heaven, and consumed those that came to apprehend the Prophet. But there could be no destruction about us, if there were no corruption within us, 1 Pet. 3.13. Who, or what shall harm you, if ye follow that which is good? nothing. It is our wickedness that makes the earth barren, the air infectious, the influences of heaven unkindly. If Pharaohs heart had not been hard, all those plagues had fallen besides him. Let us go into ourselves; the head aches, the members are sick, but the stomach is in fault. Neither man nor devil could destroy us, if we did not destroy ourselves. GOD makes a wicked man Heautontimoreumenon, a self-troubler▪ it is a sore pu•ishment, when men are forced to punish themselves. The whip that must scourge the wicked, is of their own making; every cord whereof they have curiously •wisted. The potion of bitterness which they must drink off, hath all the ingredients of their own putting in. Indeed, saith the Psalm; The Lord hath mixed it;•e may compound it, but of their materials: he need not put in a dram more, •or they afford themselves destruction enough. Psal. 109.18. As he clothed him•else with cursing, like as with a garment, so let it come like water into his bowels, and like •yle into his bones. He made cursing his clothing; it is fit he should wear his own garment. Indeed Hell was not made for nothing, and Tophet was prepared for them: •ut they should never feel it, till they had prepared themselves for Tophet. GOD in his Justice would not bring them to destruction, unless they first by their wic•edness did bring destruction to themselves. We see the punishment of denying Christ: O let us never be such enemies to ourselves, that have so good a friend as I•SUS CHRIST.

Destruction.] This is the measure of their punishment. O yet if the Justice of God would but chide them, not beat them: or if it did beat them, yet with rods, •ot with scourges: or if it did scourge them, yet with whips, not with Scorpions: or •f with Scorpions, yet not with burning flames: or if with burning flames, yet not with unquenchable flames: Oh yet it anything might serve but utter and endless •uine; Destruction! This is an indefinite word, of full latitude, that knows neither measure nor cessation; but comprehends all plagues, external on body, internal on •oule, eternal on both: a punishment of extremity, of universalitie; Destruction.

God concealeth the m•nner, but denounceth the measure. Destruction is either •emporall in this world, or eternal in the world to come. If we first consider it •emporally, we shall find it heavy enough: Incerti generis, sed certissimi ponderis. •onas 3.4. Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be destroyed. He lets them know of a de•ruction, but he tells them not how: the quantity is plain, the quality is hidden. •iniveh might have been plagued many ways, and yet stood upon her foundation •ill. With want of rain, as Samaria in the days of Ahab: with want of bread, •at women did eat their own children, as in the days of Jehoram: with pestilence, •s in the days of David: with the siege of enemies, as was Betulia: with the ty•annie and exaction of her own Kings, as once was Rome. But these are all too •ght in GOD'S balance, and nothing will satisfy his Justice, but her final subver•on. So is it denounced against the wicked, Hosea 7.13. Destruction unto them, be•use they have transgressed against me. Prov. 16.18. Pride goeth before destruction. •hus they understand the general, not the special: this holds them in suspense, •d adds to their fear, when they know not what they should study to prevent. •OD hath always enow to do it; Mille nocendi arts; he speaks of four grie•ous plagues, Ezek. 14.21. The sword, the famine, the noisome beast, and the pestilence. ⟨◇⟩ he should particularly threaten the famine, how would they hoard up corn, like •seph; fill their barns, their grainars, penuaries, and store-houses? If the Beasts,•ow would they be provided of engines to kill them? If the Pestilence, how would •y shift ground, and run from their country, as vermin from an house on fire? If •e enemies Sword, what mustering of men, scowring of armor, preparing of muniti••, levying of forces, exercise of arms, would there be? Cities would be victualled, •piers repaired, Holds fortified; art and labor would study the best prevention, at least so far as their wisdom reached. Though indeed the best is flying to God by penitent supplication. Amos 4.12. Thus will I do unto thee, and because I will do th••, Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel. Divers plagues are threatened in that Chapter; from which the prophet proves there is no evasion, but by repentance. Yet are men so averse from goodness, that as a guilty person before the Magistrate, seeks not ⟨◇⟩ amend his fault, but to know his accuser, and to be quit with him. Which of these shall be it, God knows: the least will serve, what havoc will the greatest make.

Destruction.] there is nothing to be bated of total ruin. Ier. 49.9. If Grape-g•therers come, would they not leave some gleaning grapes? If thieves by night, they will ⟨◇⟩ till they have enough. This justice will leave none, but the wicked shall be preyed upon by insatiate judgment, till nothing be left. Mat. 18.25. His Lord commanded him to be sold, &c. That servant ought ten thousand talents; what had he received? But to pay this debt, non habuit unde; he had not wherewithal. Nec aurum, nec arvum, nec amic••; No works, no prayers, nothing. Then the Lord commanded him to be sold, and his wi••, and children, and all that he had, to make payment. He might have been sold Hims••e• but his wife? Or, himself and his wife, but his poor children? Or, if himself, wi••, and children, yet also All that he had? Nothing to be left him, not so much as bread ⟨◇⟩ sustain him, nor apparel to hide his nakedness? No, all must be sold, that all may be paid; here is utter destruction. God's judgment like a canker on a tree, first ears ⟨◇⟩ the leaves; but leaves not there; at last consumes tree and all.

Let this teach us how to think of our sins, and their violent precipitating ⟨◇⟩ to destruction. Unless we value the wealth of our country, the health of our friends, the peace of our consciences, the life of our bodies and souls, at so low a rate: as H••rius lying quietly at Ravenna, prised Rome. When he heard that Rome was taken, he looked pale, fearing it had been his Hen, called Roma: but understanding it •o be no worse than the Cities loss, he laughed at the news. So except we esteem our own lusts and vanities, more than the well-fare of the whole Land, and think the loss of all no more than if a Fly were taken in the web of a Spider: let us confess and redress our sins. Do we marvel in this rebellious age, why the barren turfe yields pale and hungry grass, if the hail spoil the Vine, whirl-winds the Olive; if pestilent breaths corrupt the air: let us look to our sins, and ce•se marvelling. Not that there is destruction, but that there is not destruction, is the wonder. No marvel if miseries come, the marvel is that they stay so long. Let it not be so with us, as Josephus thought of Jerusalem; that if the Romans had not invaded them, the very earth would have swallowed them. Let us fall to our seasonable deprecation, that the LORD destroy us not. Ierem. 3.22. Return ⟨ϕ⟩ backsliding children, and I will heal your backslidings. Behold, we come unto thee, f• thou art the Lord our God. Be our sins less, and our prayers more, that we may find mercy.

We have yet but lightly weighed the unsupportable lode of their punishme••, and confined it to the circle of this present world. Now this wound will be deep enough, especially when an almighty hand shall give it. Ezek. 21.27. I will ov•rtur•ne, overturn, overturn it, and it shall be no more. If the first subversion serve n••, the second shall effect it: if they both leave anything undone, the third shall acco•plish it. Overtur•ne his Diadem, (for there it is spoken of the evil Princes cro•• yet he remains a man: overturn his life, yet there is hope of another: nay, ⟨ϕ⟩ overturn his soul, here is Destruction in her extremest spoil. So verse. 14. I• ⟨ϕ⟩ sword be doubled the third time; if the two first blows should leave any life be•••• them. Joel. 1.4. What the Palmer-worm leaves, let the Locust eat: what the Locust ⟨ϕ⟩ let the Canker-worm eat: what the Canker-worm leaves, let the Caterpillar devore. ⟨ϕ⟩ the sword have left ought, the plague shall consume it: if the glutted plague ⟨ϕ⟩ any scrappes, the famine shall eat them up. So Exod. 10.15. what the hail h•• ⟨ϕ⟩ that the Locusts devoured. Punishment shall grow like a gangrene, and never rest •••ling, till all be festered. Isaiah 1.5. Why should ye be stricken anymore? He smites ⟨ϕ⟩ when there shall be no need of a second blow. Nah, 1.9. He will make an utter end: affliction shall not rise up the second time. Here destruction is like Sodom fire, that left nothing behind it: they were stricken but once, that once was enough. As Abishai said to David concerning Saul in the trench, 1 Sam. 26.8. Let me smite him with the spear even to the earth at once, and I will not smite him the second time. Let this destruction take away their friends, yet they can live of themselves: let it take away their riches, they can begin the world again, and set up their trade afresh, though they were broken. Let it take away their liberty, they can beg thorough a grate: let it take away their life, they are then destroyed. This is part of their potion, one bitter ingredience of their Cup, Psalms. 75.8. In the hand of the LORD there is a cup, and the wine is red: it is full of mixture, and he poureth out of the same: but the dregs thereof all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them. It is a Cup; well, there is a cup that David thirsts for, Psalms. 116. I will take the Cup of salvation. There is Wine in it, better: for wine cheers the heart, and puts alacrity into the spirits. That wine is Red, better still: so it should be, this argues the luster and goodness of it, Prov. 23.31. Look not upon the wine when it is red, and gives the color in the cup: the color adds to the pleasure. But now it is Full of mixture, alas this mixture spoils all: it is compounded, brewed, made unwholesome: this changeth the condition of the cup, of the wine, of the color, of all. It is mixed with the wrath of God, malice of Satan, the anguish of soul, the gall of sin, the tears of despair: it is Red, that is, of a sanguine color, the wine of blood. But yet so long as it is in the cup they need not meddle with it: nay but the Lord will pour it out, he shall hold their mouths to it, and make them drink it: the rankest poison in the world, the gall of Dragons, and venom of Asps, is pleasant and healthful to it. Yet be it but a little of the top, let them but taste it: nay they must drink it off, to the very bottom, the sediments, dregs, lees and all; even the very filth of vengeance. And lest any drops should be left behind, they shall wring them out, and suck them down to their confusion. The Cup is all bitter, and full of sorrow, saith Augustine: the godly do often taste the top, and feel the bitterness, but then it is suddenly snatched from them: but the ungodly shall drink the very grounds, and extremest poison. Prov. 16.5. Though hand join in hand, they shall not be unpunished. Though head be laid to head for council, and hand knit in hand for strength, yet shall there be no prevailing against it. Though Achitophel side with Absalom, Herod conspire with Pilate, Dathan confederate with Corah: though the drunkard join hands with the blasphemer, the blasphemer with the adulterer, the adulterer with the Idolater, the Idolater with the persecutor, the persecutor with the traitor, the traitor with the Jesuit, the Jesuit with the Devil; yet they shall not escape unpunished. Destruction shall stick as faithfully to them, as the skin to their flesh. Our sins deserve destruction, our repentance is no satisfaction; it is only God's mercy in Christ that gives absolution.

Yet is all this but a temporal or corporal subversion, there is more behind, even eternal perishing. This is the sore extent, which reacheth to hell it self. Therefore we find these two, Hell and Destruction, most commonly united, Prov. 27.20. Hell and destruction are never full. Phil. 3.19. Their end is destruction, that is miserable: their destruction without end, that is more miserable. If man only smarted with the dislodging of his soul; alas, she might by Jesus find a better bed: Death being to the faithful but a busy dream; When they awake, they shall behold the face of God in righteousness, and be satisfied with his likeness. Like the red-sea, puts them over to the Land of Promise. There is a lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and false prophet are, and all are tormented day and night, forever and ever. This is the place of residence for these false prophets: this is Destruction in her full pay, weight, and measure.

They bring on themselves swift destruction.] Swift: You see the Authors of their punishment, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, Themselves: the measure, which is beyond all measure, Destruction. Two full aggravations of their unhappiness: Themselves; O yet, Si alienâ manu, non propriâ; that they might complain of others, and acquit themselves! Needs must those sins be sown like hemp-seed with curses, which must make halters for themselves. They might say to an enemy, or to their old companion in errors. Liceat perituris viribus ignis, igne perire tuo; and this might seem Cladem author levare. But themselves bring it; not that they lay violent hands upon their own flesh or spirit, but by consequent. As no man properly and immediately calls the dropsy to him, yet by insatiable drinking of unwholesome liquors he procures it, Rom. 6.21. For the end of these things is death. Destruction is tied to the end of sin, as Sampson tied fire to the foxes tails. Or, as a great weight of lead is bound to a small cord; it seems nothing to pull the cord, but the lead comes withal, and quasheth the puller to pieces. This is the vexation, when they feel extreme torments, they shall curse themselves 〈 〉 the cause. True it is, they shall blaspheme God desperately, Rev. 16.11. Curse the devil maliciously, and execrate other company: expressed by gnashing their teeth, the effect of an impatient fury: but at last they shall be convinced, and have this acknowledgement extorted from them; Proprijs configimur armis, we have destroyed ourselves. Besides, the measure of this self-procured woe, is destruction: all the dregs of the violl, all the plagues in the storehouse of Almighty Justice; so far 〈 〉 man's passive nature is capable; infinite in extension; what falls short in breadth, to be supplied in length; infinite in everlasting passion. Now the last ingredient to ⟨◇⟩ bitter potion remains: to the author and measure, the manner, Swift. When it shall come, it makes no sparing; before it do come, it gives no warning. Nothi•• is more sure to dispatch them, nothing more quick to attach them; it is Swift destruction.

Suddaine destruction seizeth on the wicked. There are judgments that creep on a man by degrees, every pull of pain being a warning of dissolution. These are easier. 1. Because preparation is rendered, and so the mind begins to be fortified against them. The first seen Cockatrice is less noxious. Either we may hide ourselves, Prov. 22.3. The prudent man foreseeth the evil, and hideth himself. Where? Psalm 9.6. The Lord is a Refuge in the time of trouble. Under the wings of mercy, he hideth himself in the Lord, from the Lord. Or, by a well furnished and resolute opposition; Pugnent arma armis: putting it to a courageo's venture for the victory. Or, by a well-tempered patience to sustain; as woo• meets iron, and turns the stern violences to soft embraces. 2. Because the mind is the better inured to bear or encounter those evils, to which it hath been exercised; as with wooden weapons men learn to fight at the sharp. Lam. 3.27. It ⟨◇⟩ good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth. In the Fable, when the new and old Ca• went together, the new made a creaking noise under the lode, and wondered at the silence of the old: which answered; I am accustomed to these burdens, therefore bear them and am quiet. This is the benefit of sustaining crosses in youth, such a one knows how to bear them still. Thus death becomes welcome to us, because we are acquainted with his messengers. For when life which is held a friend, becomes an enemy; then death which is an enemy becomes a friend. It was promised to o•• Israelite, that he should beat ten enemies: now he that conquered the odds, will ⟨◇⟩ cowardly shrink at the equality. 3. Because the sense is weakened by much ••fering: usual beating makes the child less to fear the rod. The faithful are ⟨◇⟩ well acquainted with God's gentle chastisements, that they know it is the same h•• that strikes still: perhaps now in death a little smarter at once, that it may ne•• strike them more. Thus a consumption doth so by degrees spend up the choleric ••mours, exhaust the spirits, and weaken the sense; that the tyranny of death is ⟨◇⟩ in the want of our feeling. Some of the martyrs that were tumbled down from exceeding high rocks, left the bitterness of the pangs of death in the mid-way ⟨◇⟩ their journey; and their souls went up to heaven, before their bodies came down to earth. 4. Lastly, threatened punishment hath lost the nature of suddenness, though•gh not in the passion, yet in the person: it may dispatch with speed, but the pati••before expected it. So when God menaceth, and formerly gives notice, he means not to destroy. Jonah comes to Nineveh, and peremptorily threatens destruction, with the determinate limits of forty days: but God gave a feeling of it in the heart, that there might not be a feeling of it in the flesh. Non est eversa, sed conversa; The sin of the City was overthrown, the City stood. All menaces are not categoricall, some are hypotheticalall: neither doth this argue in God levity, but mercy. Novit Deus aliquando mutare sententiam, nunquam novit mutare consilium. God sometimes altereth his sentence, but he never altereth his purpose. Minatur quod faciat, ne faciat quod minatur; If men's apprehensive hearts repent, there is a retraction of the judgment. If God give not his preventing sorrow, the punishment shall be new enough to the sufferer, how old soever it be in respect of the decreer. Isaiah 10.22. The consumption decreed shall over-flow with righteousness.

But this is Swift perdition: Quo celerius, eo severius; A man thinks lingering evils swift enough, though they come the Tortoise pace, pedetentim, yea, serpentim, sliding on. Though the fabric of his body be as long a plucking down, as the Temple of Jerusalem was a building up; six and thirty years. Yet still they say to sickness, as the devils said to Christ; Why comest thou to torment us before our time? Matth. 8.29. Yea, could it give us as long warning, as Noah gave the old world; a hundred and twenty years; yet Festinas Domine, Lord thou art too hasty: they find fault with the precipitation. Let the siege to thy life be as the Grecians to Troy, of ten years continuance; yet still thou sayest, it comes De improviso, I did not look for it so soon. But we know whose mouth hath spoken it. Psal. 55.23. Men of bloods and deceit; non dimidiabunt dies suos; shall not live out half their days. Not half those which in the course of nature, and opinion of the world, they might have run. Herod was taken away quickly, in the midst of his popular applause; and the Angel of God immediately smote him, Act. 12.23. God shall shoot at them with an arrow, suddenly they shall be wounded, Psalm. 64.7. As a man-sees not the thunderbolt, till it strike him dead, Psal. 73.19. How are they brought to desolation as in a moment, and utterly consumed with terrors? In a moment there is nec prius nec posterius. Vers. 20. As a dream when one awaketh, &c. All their prosperity is but a dream, they laugh in their sleep, but they awake howling, Psal. 37.10. Yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be: thou shalt diligently seek for his place, and it shall not be found. Destruction shall leave nec hominem, nec locum, neither the man, nor his place. Vers. 36. The wicked spreads himself like a green Bay-tree: yet he passed away, and loe he was not: I sought him, but he could not be found. Thou sawest him today aspiring like the Cedars; Digito monstrari, & dicier hic est; Seek for him tomorrow, and thou returnest with a Non inventus. Prov. 14.11. The house of the wicked shall be overthrown. How? Zach. 5.2. What seest thou? a flying roll. What shall it do? Vers. 4. It shall enter into the house of the wicked, and shall remain in the midst of his house, and shall consume it with the timber and stones of it. It is a flying roll, a winged curse, not seen till it be felt. It shall destroy, not with a lingering consumption; to dwell upon his tabernacle, and do it by a long succession of plagues: but in allusion to Sodom; Brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation, Job 18.15. By the Civil Law, every man's house is his castle: no man may be dragged out of his own door Iudicio civili: yet in such as we call Crown-cases, Treasons and Contumacies, great houses have been thundered down over the owners heads. And like the House of Baal, 2 King. 10.27. And of such Idolaters, Dan. 3.29. They may be converted into filthy draughts, dung-hills, and receptacles of excrements. When God saw his own Temple made a den of thieves, he destroyed it: therefore how much less will he spare private houses, when they are made shops of mischief, and monuments of iniquity? Hab. 2.11. The stone shall cry of the wall, and the beam out of the timber shall answer it. The stones at every joint shall weep like marble, and the timber at every pin shall bleed like the Vine: both joining in a mournful Anthem; one beginning, the other answering; Woe unto him that buildeth with blood. Yet if the man himself might escape, more houses might be had for money: nay, saith Bildad, Job 18.18. he shall be chased out of the world. But though his body be accursed like the barren Fig-tree; Never fr•• grow on thee more: yet he might have his estate continued to his posterity. No, Vers. 19. He shall neither have son nor nephew among his people, nor any remaining of his dwellings. His house shall be destroyed; and this in Scripture contains the whole family, Josh. 24.15. I and my house will serve the Lord. The materials and form••• shall be destroyed. But though body, house, and posterity be lost; yet still he may say as Absalom said, and do as Absalom did, 2 Sam. 18.18. He reared up for himself a pillar, saying, I have no son to keep my name in remembrance: and he called the pill• after his own name; Absalom's place. So Psal. 49.11. Their inward thought is, that their houses shall continue forever, and their dwelling places to all generations: therefore they call their lands after their own names. Let me build an house, and rear a monument after mine own name: No, down with it to the ground. Job 18.17. His remembrance shall perish from the earth; and he shall have no name in the street. As Valeri•• speaks of those Romans, who besides their own deaths, Penatium quoque strage p•niuntur. This is a fearful destruction, to be so rooted out as Rovillas, that their very name becomes a stench. But that all this should be done suddenly, uno actu, 〈ϕ〉 ictu; Vengeance it self, men think, can do no more.

He shall be destroyed: might it not be said, much ruined? As an house h•h the windows broken, yet it stands: the covering is stripped off, yet it stands: the walls are beaten down, yet it stands: take away the foundation; then you may say, Hic suit domus; here was an house. Job 8.18. If he destroy him from his place, then 〈ϕ〉 shall deny him, saying, I have not seen thee. May it not be said of man, as of a clock; which growing foul, the maker resumes, takes it in pieces, lays it wheel by wheel, and pin by pin; scowres it, puts it together in frame again, and sets it going? No, alas, the wicked is destroyed, put out of tune forever, and that as swiftly, as if a clock were dashed against the stones. O that it had any other measure but perdition, any other manner but celerity! Job 14.7. There is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not cease. Though the root thereof wax old in the earth, and the stock thereof die in the ground, ye• through the sent of water it will bud, and bring forth boughs like a plant. B•t man dieth, and wasteth away, and where is he? He that should read the Chronicle of some great man's life, find him endowed with singular gifts of nature, beautified with rare qualities of art, befriended with the successes of fortune: whom his Prince had highly honored, the people admired, flatterers adored; where nothing wanted to the concurrence of happiness: and thus pursuing the story, measuring the hopes of future glory by the experience of present prosperity; should now turn over the leaf to read, and find a blank, no more to be read, an abrupt suspension; he would either think the writer had mistook, or that some leaves were torn o• of the book. No, there was an high finger that blotted it out, and broke off the history with an unexpected catastrophe. For Haman the second man in the Court, to forfeit all his glories at the galhouse! As if Destruction had the charge, th• CHRIST gave to Judas; Quod facis, cito fac, John. 13.27. What thou doest, 〈ϕ〉 quickly.

The dejection of Job was sudden, but it was not destruction, Job 1.16. While 〈ϕ〉 was yet speaking, there came also another, &c. As if he might not be allowed rest 〈ϕ〉 consider of the former wretchedness. The fall of Jehoram was destruction, b• 〈ϕ〉 was not sudden, 2 Chron. 21.19. In process of time, after the end of two years, 〈ϕ〉 bowels fell out by reason of his sickness: day by day, for two years together. But 〈ϕ〉 it is both destruction, and swift destruction; as to Nabal; The Lord smote him, and 〈ϕ〉 died, 1 Sam. 25.38. It is sudden, both because it prevents the expectation of na••• and because the blow is like to that which David with his sling gave to Goliath, t•• sunk him down forever. Such, according to our Apostles Prophecy, hath be• the destruction of the Churches enemies. Pharaoh by the sea, Corah by the earth▪ the haters of those three faithful servants by the fire, Simon Magus in the air: all destructions, by all the Elements, and all sudden, with a fearful expedition.

Swift destruction.] There are many swift things, none swifter than the reprobates destruction, when God will hasten it. Birds are swift, the Eagle cuts the air, and is gone. Therefore Solomon compares the suddenest vanisher, Riches to an Eagle, that makes her self wings and flies away, Prov. 23.5. Yet is this destruction swifter. An arrow is swift, 1 King. 22.34. A certain man drew a bow at a venture, smote the King of Israel, and rid him. Destruction is a swift arrow, that same Sagitta per diem volitans, the arrow that flieth by day, Psalm. 91.5. Surer and swifter than the arrow of Cephalus; Consequitur quodcunque petit. Or that Hercules shot into Nessus, Met. 9. When he ran away with his Deianica; he told him that though he could not come to him, he would send after him: Vulnere, non pedibus te consequar▪nd he made it good; Fugientia terga sagittâ Trat•icit. These are not Jonathan's prick-•rrowes, to give warning: but destructive arrows, such as God shot against Sodom,•etherd with fire, consuming in a moment. Such, Psal. 18.14. He sent out arrows •nd scattered them, he shot out lightnings and discomfited them. Thunder and lightning, 〈◇〉 swift and dispatching arrow. Psal. 144.6. Cast forth lightning and scatter them: •hooote out thine arrows and destroy them. Man may shoot and miss, or his arrows be so slow of flight that it may be avoided: but if God shoots, he hits and kills. The Parthian arrow was so admired for swiftness, that Lucan says of Caesar, he was orto Balearis verbere fundae Ocyor, & missâ Parthi post terga sagittâ. And Philoctetes•rrowes are noted Sophocles for fatal deadliness; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, fore-runners of •eath: & habent sub arundine plumbum, headed with heavy vengeance. Yet are all these •oth weaker in fight, and duller in flight, than God's arrows, which as the Psalmist •peakes, come from the hand of a Giant. When he shall draw them up to the head, •hey wound with an incurable blow. Job 20.24. The bow of steel shall strike him •hrough, it shall come glistering through his gall. The Sun is swift, per diem peragens cursum; he rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race. Yet the same days sun •ath seen a man; high mounted with pomp in the morning; yet covered with destruction before the evening. But as Moses told Israel concerning the Egyptians; Whom ye have seen today, ye shall see them again no more forever, Exod. 14.13. Thus swift is God's judgment, and outrunning the Sun, flame is swift: the Poets gi•aine that she is the daughter of Titan and Terra, the Sun and the Earth. The Sun •ing her such an aerial and spiritual swiftness by his generation, that if the mother •y her grossness had not a little bated her agility; she would the first hour of her •irth have run out of the world. Indeed she still flies apace, and like a channel by •ontinuall accessions, grows up to a river; vires acquirit eundo. As a little ball rol•ed in the snow, gathers it self to a great lump. The report that is but a little spark •f fire at London, proves a great flame by that time it comes to York. But alas, •ven fame is slow-footed, and besides the invention of lies, must have intervention of space, before it arrives: and though it out-run the clouds, as Ahimaaz over ran Chushi, because he ran by the way of the plain: yet still Judgment is swifter, and •o dispatching that it l•aves none to carry the report. When Job was afflicted, there was one reserved to bring news to him: what the Sabaeans had done upon the Oxen, the Chaldeans upon the Camels, the fire upon the sheep, all these upon the •ervants; Ego solus aufugi, I am alone escaped to tell thee. But destruction is surer and •orer, when it leaves none to bear tidings. Iud. 4.16. All the host of Sisera fell up• the sword, and there was not a man left. His mother, and her wise Ladies insult; Have •hey not sped? have they not divided the prey? Judge. 5.30. No forsooth, for there •as nobody left to carry news. Lightning is swift, Matth. 24.27. It cometh •t of the East, and shineth even unto the west: a similitude used by CHRIST him•else to describe the suddainesse of his seco•d appearing. The thunder is called the •ords voice, Psal. 29.3. The voice of the Lord, is upon the waters, the God of glory th•n•reth. This breaketh the cedars, makes them skip like calves, Lebanon and Sirion caper like an Unicorn. This is a sudden manner of destroying, as the Lord smote the Philistines with a great thunder, 1 Sam. 7.10. When the Lord rains this storm, he kills quickly: etiam comedentem absorbet. Job 20.23. When he is about to fill his belly, God shall cast the fury of his wrath upon him, and shall rain it upon him while he is eating: there is another swift perdition. The ordinance charged with that salt mineral, makes quick destruction: it bruiseh and quasheth to pieces before it gives the •port, and therein is truly sudden Innumerable lives have fallen by this engine; a thing that can send the errand of death a great way off. I know not to what to compare it, unless to the pestilence that killeth a far off, Ezek. 6.12. Gunpowder ⟨◇⟩ invention of a Monk, of a devil, the daughter of salt and sulphur, the mother of deaths nimblest children; nothing maketh a quicker end.

The fifth of November puts us in mind of this fatal destruction; intended by the malice of men, but prevented by the mercy of God. Those smoky locusts ⟨◇⟩ prepared and furnished a black pit, the very image of hell; and had resolved o• that desperate cry, Incendium extingatur ruinâ: they had devised communem reg•, a common bonfire, an universal combustion, both of mortal men and immortal monuments; Churches, Charters, and Records of antiquity. Bloody Priests that would have offered a whole burnt sacrifice, and made our sons and daughters pa•e through the fire, an oblation to their Moloch of Rome. Think countrymen, and let it never die in your memories, whiles the mercy of God may find a room in your hearts: consider a swift destruction; never was example of so facinorous an e•terprise, the Primum genus of all sin, a crying, a roaring, a thundering sin, as our Sovereign truly termed it: a sin not only of blood, but of fire, fire mingled with brimstone, such as the attempters (without extraordinary mercy) now feel in hell. Ask from East to West, from one Pole to the other; search all records under heaven, if ever there was the like. Their vault was a penury and store house of destruction; against us in the intent, against themselves in the event. Let us say as those four Lepers, 2 King. 7.9. This day is a day of good tidings, and we do not well to hold our peace: if we tarry till the morning light, some mischief will fall upon us. Consider with them. 1. The specialty of the time, This day. 2. The occasion of that specialty, it is a day of good news. 3. The duty of that occasion, not to hold our pe•ce. 4. The necessity of that duty, lest mischief fall upon us. But you will say, the day is past, and let it pass with the day; Sufficit diei malitia ipsius; sufficient to the day is the sorrow thereof. I answer; Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge, Psalm. 19. Verse 2. The day gone reads a lecture to the day present: that day tells news to all days, without which they had not been days to us. In regard of the marvelous attempt, a day of news: in regard of the gracious deliverance, a day of good news. News in the Intention, good news i• the prevention: a privative, a positive good; for a negative is made an affirmative by reduction. Suppose you had seen it done; the King, Prince, Nobles, Senators, Priests; the flowers and ornaments of the land; without distinction of Majesty, dignity, sex or age, degree or merit, reason or religion; tossed up with barrels and billets, piec•s of timber, bars of iron, and great stones; the murdering artillery together with the murdered bodies, into the air, up toward heaven, their flesh accompanying their souls so far as that violence could send them; till their mangled carcasses fell down again to the mother earth, to receive their remaining blo•• crying vengeance against their butchers. Behold here the type of the deflagration ‹◊› Sodom, the model of Tophet, the nearest representation that earth could afford ‹◊› that Ignitum dil•vium, the fiery deluge at the last day: yea the image of that Ge•• na ignis, which God hath prepared for the wicked. When father and son, dam•• and young in a neast together, had been blown away with a blast; a whirlwind ‹◊› destruction: the whole state of a kingdom dissolved, and that in an instant of ti••, before they could have swallowed their spittle, or in remembrance and remorse of their sins have said; Lord have mercy on us. This had been destruction in the winged precepice, and most desperate suddenness. As it was threatened to the house of Ier•boam, to be cut off in a day: but what? even now in a moment, before they had leisure to think of it. But as the three servants of God were cast into a fiery furnace •hat burnt them not: and as Moses saw a bush that flamed and consumed not: so the good will of him that dwelt in the bush defended us, Deut. 33.16. The Lord brought ••s back from death to life, and we were comforted as men awaked out of a fearful dream. Their destruction was swift, but the mercy of God was swifter. There wanted nothing but an actor to bring on that catholic doomsday: yet before the match could be brought to the powder, their artificial fireworkes were discovered; their projection, proditio, deperdition, all disclosed; and seasonably returned on their own heads.

So perish all thine enemies, O Lord.] Now the mercy of God turn destruction,•nto salvation, and then be as swift as he please: the sooner we get home, the sooner •ase: therefore Come Lord Jesus, come quickly, Amen.

VERSE 2. And many shall follow their pernicious ways, by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of.

WE have in these Heretics contemplated their access to the Church, now consider their success in the Church. Many shall follow, &c. It hath ever been the devils aim, that seeing he must of necessity be wretched, not to be wretched alone. Now the company he desires, is not beasts and irrational creatures, (save where he may do their owners a mischief) but his ambition flies man-height, his envy strikes at the image of God, because he hath no other way to extend his malice to the Deity it self; to effectuate this, he works man to betray man; as man makes one fowl catch another, or one beast surprise •nother; the hawk the partridge, the hound the hare; all to make him sport. So Satan sets Ephraim against Manasseh, Manasseh against Ephraim, and both against Judah; himself against all, Esa. 9.21. And because he think the Pagan world sure enough his own, have at the Christian. There of all places God is glorious, there of all places he will be pernicious. The devil hath a desire to all, but especially he doves a religious soul: he would eat up that with more greedynesse, than Rachel did her Ma•drakes.

He is a black Lion rampant in a bloody field: CHRIST is King of the whole world; nay soft quoth the devil, I have the air, Eph. 2.2. He is called the Prince of the power of the air. He hath loaded Heretics with seed from hell, and sets them a sowing in the Church: that at the day of harvest his crop may be greater in the barn of hell, than the Lord CHRIST'S is in heaven. In the former verse we had him sowing; his seminaries at work: in this verse behold with what a prosperous and lucky hand he doth it. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, Many shall follow. Their cursed tares shall spread far and wide, & mirifice multiplicabuntur. It is little content for them to be reprobates alone; but as falling Lucifer drew numerous Angels with him; so all his adherents and agents are firebrands to burn others with themselves. The Pharisees would travel sea and land to work Profelytes to their own inheritance, yea to procure them a double portion to themselves, Matth. 23. Verse 15. The Emissaries of Rome have that charge given th•• to corrupt others. Like men sick of the pestilence, they have an itching ••sire to infect their neighbors. Here therefore behold their success; M•• shall follow their pernicious ways. If we take the verse asunder, it will thus fall 〈◇〉 parts; generally two.

- Attraction; Many shall follow their pernicious ways.
- Detraction; By whom the way of truth shall be scandalised.

In the Attraction or congestion of this tumult, consider

The

- Ringleaders; They, that broach these Heresies.
- Rabble or tatterdemallion that adhere; Many follow.

In the Detraction, derogation, or injury done to the Gospel, by these revo••• from the truth, let us examine.

The

- Patient that suffers, The way of truth.
- Injurie that it suffers; Evil spoken of.

In the patient observe

The

- Singularitie, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, The way, the only way.
- Sincerity, Of Truth, uncorrupted truth.

Thus here are many points, one into two, two into four, four into eight. N•• you will say, as Leah of her son Gad, Gen. 30.11. A troupe cometh, or 〈◇〉 comes a company: yet all these branches have but one root, all these members 〈◇〉 one head: they are but wheels of a clock taken a little in sunder to view, then 〈◇〉 be put together again. When a wealthy favourite of the world, that 〈◇〉 more livings than virtues, sent his servant before to take up lodging for him; the servant charged the host to provide good cheare; for here, says he, wi•• come the Lord of such a Manor, the Land-lord of such a town, the keeper of such a forest, the Master of such an office, the lay-person of such a parish, a I•stice of peace, a Gentleman, an Usurer, and my master: the host blest himself; alas, I have not room for half so many: nay quoth the servant, all these are 〈◇〉 one man. So if you distrust that you have not room in your memories to lodge s• many points, yet be comforted, all these are but one Text.

The first general is the Attraction, and the first particular the Ring leader• whence occur two observations.

First, the necessity of a head to every Schism and faction: never was bre•• made in the vineyard of CHRIST, but some principal beast-led the whole herd. There had been no treason nor insurrection against David, but for Abs•l•• to set it on foot. Gamaliel spake of two such factions. Act. 5.36. The•d••, 〈◇〉 whom a number of men joined themselves: and Judas, that drew much people after him: these Schisms had their heads. If Smith and Rob. had not led the way to Amst••dam, how many silly souls had stayed still with their mother in England! The• blind zeal misled them, and they others: their flight was not so much as their m••guidance. Though the parties in sin have their parts in the punishment, yet to t•• principal authors be the principal plagues. If their reward in heaven be so great, 〈◇〉 save one soul from death; how great shall their torment be in hell that pervert ma•• souls to destruction? *Matth. 5.19. Minimus in coelo, maximus in infer••. He 〈◇〉 be least in the kingdom of heaven, but greatest in the kingdom of hell. He that 〈◇〉 damn a soul besides his own, overdoes the devils expectation; he supererog•• of Satan, and he shall give him a double fee, a double portion of hell fire for 〈◇〉 pains. *Salus capitis, caput salutis: so error capitis, caput erroris, Mark. 6.34. Our S••our pitied the people, because they were as sheep, sine pastore ullo, without any shepherd: but how would he have wept to see the poor Lambes misled a Pastore 〈◇〉 by an exill shepherd! Non vesci omnino, miseranda defectio; sed vesci veneno, execr••da infectio. It is miserable to want food, yet as good nothing at all as only poison. CHRIST is the only head of his Church they that fall off from him, must have •ap•• novum, a new head, and join themselves in corpus novum, to a new body: thus •hall both head and tail be cut off together, Esa. 9.14. This observation Ministers two •sefull lessons to us.

1 That the way to suppress a schism, is to cut off the Head: for it will be •ard for a body to move headless. Zach. 13.7. Smite the shepherd, and the sheep •hall be scattered. These be strong colts, swift dromedaries traverssing their own ways; wild Asses that snuff up the wind at their pleasure, and whiske it about in •he wilderness of their own boundless fancy, and transportive fury. I do not say Percute ferro; like Empirics that can cure no disease without letting blood: no, I •refer with Tertullian, suffusion of it, before effusion of it; shame before smart: •nowing that not only Christianitas, sed etiam haeresis mortibus crescit: and some •ave thought their cause good, only because it was their happiness to be in prison •bout it. But howsoever, Vbi non prosint ubera, non desint verbera: supprime errorem •primendo errantem. If their wickedness hath been formerly illustrated with the •ommentaries of the churches patience; if sternnesse hath given place to mildness, without success; let now mildness be turned into sternnesse. Let the wheel of admiration turn about, and let the Law begin to prick them a little, that have no felt it, •ut laugh'd at it a long time, and made connivence their warrant for contempt. Lay •he medicine close to them, as Christ did to the creeple at Bethesda; visne sanari? wilt thou be mended, or not? Let such willful revolvers take heed; Restat •verti, cui converti non contigit; if they will not be converted, let them fear to •e confounded.

2 Seeing there are such corrupters of our truth, and disturbers of our peace, •et us be sure to hold the Truth in peace: leaving all heads, and cleaving to our only •ne Head JESUS CHRIST. Col. 2.19. Let us hold the head, from which all the bo•y by joints and bands having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with •he increase of God. Cursed is he that seeks to separate us from this head. The Lord •s our God and our Guide; him we follow, but all false ways we utterly abhor, Phil. •9. That which you have learned and received, do; and the God of peace shall be with •ou. If we adhere to the truth peaceably, the God of truth and peace shall be with •s. Even that God of peace, whom such incendiaries would turn out of our •and. Psal. 120.6. My soul hath long dwelt with him that hateth peace. Doth he hate peace? then peace shall hate him. I am for peace, but when I speak, they are •or war. Well then, God shall be even with him, and be for war, when he speaks •or peace. Deus pacis nobiscum; O the sweet habit of peace to appear in! O the gracious form of peace, for our God to present himself to us! Let him always •ppeare to me in that shape, always present himself to me in that form. Not in •urning fire, nor tempestuous wind, nor trembling earth-quakes but in the soft air •nd still breath of peace; the God of peace be with us. The more busy the devil •s to scatter dissensions, the more unitedly let us hold together. As when the enemy assaults a town, and the men are defending it; the children mean time may not •e allowed to keep what coile and misrule they will in the house; but are rather to •ive so much the more orderly. The tyranny of the one must not encourage the li•ertie of the other; nor are these to be excused because the other are increased. The •ommon adversary assaults our substance, if we wrangle one with another about •ircumstance; it argues a confederacy, and brings on us a suspicion of combina•ion; as if we expected advantage by the thriving of the contrary faction; •ather than fidelity to our Mother, and vowed adherence to her husband CHRIST.

The second observation is the great force of example: these ringleaders soon •et abundance of followers. 1 Tim. 4.1. They shall give heed to the spirits of error. Men should be led by precepts, and over-led by precedents. The ear hath put off •er business to the eye, to be dispatched: and (as Caesar drowned Bibulus his consulship) that fetcheth in all the informations to the heart, deriving from others action the warrant of practice. As Jacob's ewes did bring forth Lambes, according to •ee color of the objected rods: so the people produce works according to the ••terns before them. Saint James saith, Estote factores verbi Divini, Be ye doers of 〈ϑ〉 word, not of man's work. It is preposterous for the feet to follow the toyish i•ginations of the fancy, and not the voice of reason. The Papist would foll•• CHRIST in the Gospel; but for this same, First let me bury my father, kiss my ••there, ask my Grandame whether I shall do so or not; my forefathers follow other ways. We all say that we serve the Lord, but as the Psalmist speak Other Lord's rule us, Rom. 8. Verse 14. They that are led by the Spirit of God, 〈ϕ〉 Sons of God. By the Spirit of God, not by the spirit of man: our natural spirit is a giddy guide, yea our sanctified spirit is insufficient: a spirit must govern and this should be God's Spirit. The very heathen had their imaginary gods for guides; as Jupiter or Mercury, them they invocated, them they imitated. There is no such authority given to sin, as by example. Imperio maximus, exemplarior: he that is most eminent, hath most followers. Augustus a learned Prince ruled Rome with scholars, Tiberius with the dissemblers, Constantine with Christians, Julian with Atheists. Indeed the people will sometimes lead themselves, and rulers without their rulers, as without rule. As in the days of Jehoshaphat, though Idolatry were defaced much, yet the high places were not taken away. How was this? The King knew it not, the Prophets condemned it, the Priests were against it; the fault was in the people; they would not cleave to the God of their Fathers. But if Ieroboam set up calves in Dan and Bethel, the people like beasts in herds goes a lowing after them. The force of imitation makes many follow Rome: and because she once sent to this land some light, they will not forsake her though she lie now in darkness. We were beholden to Rome for our former conversion, we will not be beholden to her for her present religion: we will not follow her a step further, when she leaves Jesus Christ. There is a double beneficial use to be made of this doctrine.

First, let this teach men of place to look unto their exemplary lives: lest, as they have made themselves examples of transgression, God make them examples of destruction. Qui errantes destruunt instruunt morientes: they that tempt to sin by their life, shall deter from sin by their death. The life of Julian made many infidels, the death of Julian made many Christians. The pride of the wicked doth pervert many, their falls shall convert many. God will teach men to fear him, even by their ruin that taught them not to fear him. Magistratus indicat viros, saith Aristotle: a private man like an empty vessel may have many flaws unseen: but in full vessels the chinks and fissures are descried by the leakage of the wine, Infirmities in Lay-men seem Nugae, small faults; in Teachers and Governors Blasphemiae, blasphemies. Quanto nobilior, tanto notabilior: the more honorable, the more remarkable. Actual precedence, or silent connivence in them, heartens and beards the inferiors. The high Priests money tempted an Apostle: if the Popes command, commend, or reward treason; the conspirator takes it to be religion. Therefore in men of high place, love should bind more than Law: Minimum laboris decet, cui plurimum licet: he should do least, that may do most mischief. Sunt superiores ceteris, but there is superior supremis, Eccl. 5.8. He that is higher 〈ϕ〉 the highest regardeth it, and there be higher than they. With God there is no respect of persons: the poorest may say to the richest, as the malefactor to his fellow 〈ϕ〉 the Cross; Thou art in the same condemnation. God charged Moses, Numb. 25. Take the heads of the people, and to hang them up. They were Princes some of the and these often think that no Law can hold them, that they may live as they 〈ϕ〉 but God spares not Princes. Yea Potentis potenter punienter: mighty sinners shall 〈ϕ〉 mightily punished. As they that carry not their light reservedly to themselves, 〈ϕ〉 communicate it to others, in turning them to righteousness, shall shine as the stars the brightest part of their orbits, Dan. 12.3. Men from high places are either lifted up to a great measure of glory in heaven, or cast down to a low degree of torment in hell. Against the unjust Officer of God's Kingdom, He will horribly and suddenly appear: an hard judgment shall they have that bear rule. The mighty shall be mightily tormented, and for the potent abideth the sorer trial. Tophet is prepared for the evil King, Esa. 30.33. Wicked subjects shall have room enough, but the wicked Prince shall have the chief place. Luke 16.28. Some reading the rich man so earnestly requesting Abraham to send one from the dead, to bring his brethren to repentance; would think he had some charity in hell. But this was not out of love, but out of fear: he would have his brethren reclaimed, lest him self should be more tormented. Because his example, as being their elder brother, had increased their wickedness on earth; and should withal increase his damnation in hell. A reprobate soul already swallowed into that Lake, finds his torment every day augmented, as the brood and generation of sins is multiplied by the seed of his cursed example. Take heed, the fire of hell will be hot enough for a man's own iniquities; he needs not the iniquities of others, like fuel and bellows, to blow and increase the flame. Lord make them good whom thou hast made great: and reach them to honor thee, as thou hast honored them. Psal. 45.4. They that travel in meekness, righteousness, and truth; let them ride on prosperously with their honor; thorough the Cities and Courts of the earth, to the City that is above, the Court of the great King in heaven, the inheritance of all those that love the LORD JESUS.

Secondly, seeing we are all apt to be followers, let us seek out the best patterns. It is the custom of the wicked to pretermitt all good precedents, and to single out such as they would have, not such as they should have. As the Dorre that passeth by all the sweet flowers of the meadow, humming in scorn, and ends his flight in a dung-hill. Or, as the Egyptians, that behold the Sun, the Moon, the Stars, all the glories of nature, without admiration, yea without common regard: until they spy a Crocodile, an ugly serpent, and then down on their knees to worship it. It is an unhappy thing to converse with the wicked: to be a brother to the Dragons, and a companion to the Ostriches, Job 30.29. To remain in Meshek, and to dwell in the tents of Kedar, Psal. 220.5. He that is a parasite to a great man's lust, is not a servant to the great God's Law. Gal. 1.10. If I should please men, I were not the servant of Christ. Noah abhors the fashions of the old world, Lot of Sodom, Job of Vz: yea, they have opposed themselves: one Reuben was opposite to the rest of his fraternity, one pair of Spies to the rest of their faint-hearted company, one Lot to the rest of the City, one Luther to the rest of his country, one Noah to the whole world. Suppose the example bates of multitude, and is supplied with magnitude; will it be a good answer to the Tribunal; Ego & Rex meus, the Prince and I? True, I did so, but there were better men in the company, I durst not displease? But whether is better, to follow man's humor, or God's honor? At the day when Scepters and sepulchers shall be all one; what protection is there in thy lord against the Lord of Hosts?

Let us then look out better precedents to follow, Phil. 3.17. Be ye followers of me, and look on them which walk so, as ye have us for an ensample. We must not imitate everyone, but such as Paul: nor Paul in everything, but wherein he follows Christ, 1 Cor. 11.1. That great Apostle encouraged our imitation, but gave a limitation: Do not you follow after me, unless you see the tract of Christ before me. Imitemur bonos, sed in bonis: Let us follow good men, but only in what they are good. As Rhetoritians make a double imitation of Orators; one absolutely and always necessary; as Demosthenes among the Grecians, and Tully among the Latins: others but at sometimes, and in some things; as Poets and Historians. So in our Christian imitation, there is one example necessary; Christ, who is called the Way; Via in exemplo, veritas in pr•misso, vita in praemio: others but in some actions, & at some occasions: •their lives being lines so far to be followed, as they swerve not from the original co•y, Christ. We are not bound to be good men's apes; let us follow David, where he •ollowed God's heart, not where he followed his own heart: if he turn toward lust and blood, let us leave him there. Let us follow Peters Confession, not his abnegation: Judas Maccabeus hearty devotion and hearty valor; not in bestowing money to make a sacrifice for the dead, 2 Mac. 12.43. All our following hath the Quatenus; if our precedents go out of the way, let us shake hands and bid them fare-well. Two of us are going toward Jerusalem; but saith one, I must needs call in at Rome, or go a little about by Samaria; nay then I leave you; here our ways part.

Thus let us cull out the best patterns: be our delight to the Saints on the earth, and such as excel in virtue, Psal. 16.3. Now every Saint excels in some virtue: o• excels in knowledge, another excels him in faithfulness, a third excels him in zeal, a fourth excels him in humility, another excels him in that Christian virtue, yea, Christ's virtue; Forgiving of wrongs: and yet a poor man may out-go them all i• an admirable patience, 1 Cor. 12.29. Now as when Paul had propounded many ⟨◇⟩ graces; he concludes; Desire you earnestly the best gifts. Take the best of every ⟨◇⟩ , and so make up an excellent man: learn of him zeal, of him knowledge, of him patience. A proud Dame will propose to her self the fashion of such a woman for h• apparel, of another for her attendance, of another for her diet, of another for her carriage, of another for her place and precedency; of none for humility: Now as ••e that takes the worst of every woman, will make her self an extreme bad woman. So she that gathers obedience from Sara, wisdom from Rebecca, chaste love from Rachel, faith from Mary, hospitality from Martha, humility from Anna, charity from Dorc••; she shall make her self a most excellent woman; Delicias humani generis, the joy of men, the delight of Angels, and the beauteous Spouse of Jesus Christ. All these were the properties of that good wise Solomon speaks of; and in what woman soever you find them, you may say with him; Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou s•mountest them all. These be good patterns to follow, as we pray for our Sovereign, that not only he may be like some former Prince, but have the virtues of them all: the courage of Joshua, the heart of David, the head of Solomon, the zeal of Josiah, the integrity of Hezekiah, &c. So all those eminences which we find in the ancient Saints, we desire to be centred in our own heart. He that would plant a garden, borrows here a choice flower, there an herb, there a plant; till at length his own surpasseth all the rest. But alas; whereis this imitation of goodness to be found among us? we are led by whom we are fed, without respect to him that feeds both them and us. Some spoil many of God's creatures to confer all on their own creature, which is some ••cking cur that they have dressed up in high fortunes. Now, Quid non summa nequiti• poterit in summa fortuna? What cannot extreme malice do in a supreme place? Th••Absalom charged his servants concerning his brother Amnon, 2 Sam. 13.28. Kill him, fear not, have not I commanded you? Yet such Portenta temporis, prodigious Comers are followed in all their delirements and aberrations. Men will lie by pattern, swea•• by pattern, drink by pattern, whore by pattern: What is this but to go to hell by pattern? There is another way to heaven, and divers have gone it before us: who now being mounted above the clouds, and trampling under their victorious feet all the vanities of this world; seem to waft us up with their hands, and call us with their voices to follow them; saying, We have the sweet rest of peace, the rich apparel $\langle \diamond \rangle$ glory, the society of Angels, the blessed vision of God; Follow us, O follow us $\langle \diamond \rangle$ earth, that you may come to us in heaven: that we with you, and you with us, and a•• together with Angels, may sing glory and honor to our God forever.

We have considered the King-leaders; now we come to the matter of thei• mischiefs: which are for Pluralitie, Ways; and for Pestilence, Pernicious or ••nable ways.

Their ways:] there is a Plurality, diversity, number of them. Sin is c•led the Way of the ungodly, Psal. 1. Because of their familiarity with it, who are c•tinually travelling that cursed thorough-fare. Matth. 7.13. The way is broad $\langle \diamond \rangle$ leadeth to destruction: There is room enough for all Satan's journey-men to $\langle \diamond \rangle$ in triumph, without justling for the wall, or without a flourishing Fencer $\langle \diamond \rangle$ scour them a conveyance. The extortioner and the lavish, the common whore and the connivent officer, the thief and the corrupt Lawyer, the griping Citizen and the Usurer; they have all room. Oh it is a dancing, a capring way: they go to hell as merrily as beggars to a Faire; but then the house of correction mars all. Ways: Truth is but one, Errors are infinite: Truth hath but one face, Error is a Proteus. Goodness is an uniform simple, Sin a multiforme compound. Cant. 2.2. As a Lily among thorns, so is my love among the daughters. There is one health, many diseases; one way to do well, infinite to offend. The soul is more subject to aberrations, than the body to surfeits. There are innumerable diseases to the body, when as two hundred are incident to the eye: yet are there more sins to endanger the soul. I am. 3.6. The tongue is a world of wickedness: Si pars, quid totum? The tongue is but a little part of man; if that be a world of sin, what is the whole? even a world of worlds. S. Paul hath twice gone about to number these ways; yet breaks off his catalogue in both places with a silent supplement, Gal. 5.21. Adultery, uncleanness, idolatry, &c. and such like. Here is prety store, yet lest he should never have done, he supplies all with an Et caetera, an Hujusmodi, Such like. 1 Tim. 1.10. Lawlesse disobedience, &c. and if there be any other thing of the same nature. There is an whole Hospital, or Saint Paul's Spittle of incurable wretches: yet as if there were more behind, he concludes with a Si quid tale; whatsoever is like to these. God knows all their ways; they are as clear before him, as if they were written with the brightest Sun-beams upon a wall of glass, Lactant. Will men flatter themselves, that God sees not all their ways? Yes, there is not one hid from his sight: he can read the most crooked lines that ever man wrote, and pick out the meaning of every word, yea, and make the offenders conscience read them with horror. We cannot reckon up God's good deeds to us in order, but he can reckon up our evil deeds against him, in order, not we his. Psal. 40.5. Thou hast made thy wonderful works so many, that none can count them in order to thee. But he ours. Ps. 50.21. I will reprove thee, and set them in order before thine eyes. His ways are far above out of our sight, but he searcheth the ways of the wicked, and knoweth all their paths. Si quid tale, saith Paul: no bill of Ignoto's, all come within the catalogue; if not, there is a Si quid tale to bring it in. Paul in that scroll, Gal. 5. hath neither Blasphemy, nor Perjury, nor Sacrilege: but whatsoever is left out, there is an His similia, Such like, to fetch it in. Because a man is not in extreme rage of madness, is he therefore no fool with God? Because he cannot satiate his lascivious purposes, is he therefore no adulterer with God? Shall none be shut out of the Kingdom, but those who are there precisely mentioned? Yes, Revel. 22, 15. Without shall be dogs, that is, blasphemers, scorers, liars; which are silenced in that roll; saving that they are made belonging to the ulcerous fold by a Si quid tale. Hast thou none of those sins? Habes alia non fortasse minora: thou hast other, perhaps not lighter. Peccare est à disciplina aberrare, August. Discipline is one; now there is so many ways of sin, as deviations from doctrine. Although every particular be not reckoned, yet there is a Writ of Si quis alius, to bring the sinner in compass.

The Devil makes much of this variety of ways; that whom he cannot draw to hell one way, he may do it another. There are some spirits sinful enough, that will not yet be wrought to fetch treason from Rome: they hate Rome above Hell, and will lie with any Whore in Europe before the Whore of Babylon. Well when, Satan hath another way for him; he will fetch him a little sneezing-powder from Amsterdam, fire him with a Puritan zeal; and then though he dares not with the Jesuit discharge pistols, yet he will shoot squibs, and curse those that love his mother. Some trouble their heads about no religion at all, rather than venture the danger of being a party; the Devil hath another way for him; Sir still, ply your business, take your ease; though you be not so hot as the rest, you shall be saved as soon as the best, I warrant you. Others are not so sluggishly minded, well then he hath another way for them; that damned path of luxuriousness: what say you Sampson to a Delilah? Yes, I will venture my life for her. What say you to a knot of boot-companions, a pack of sound cards, that will leave their wits rather than the wits behind them? Excellent well, Drawer give us an ocean. Are you for yet another way? What say you to a trick that will prostrate him you hate under your feet? Yes, I will hazard all my blessing in heaven, to bring a curse upon him in earth; I will undo myself to beggar him. Is not this to the grain of your affection? What say you to be a Monarchs favourite, to ride in triumph thorough the populous streets, and hear the acclamation; This is the man whom the King will honor: Vassals kissing the dust your feet trode upon; but then you must be proud, and forget God; that another way for you. Do not all these satisfy you? Will you be rich, and pursue gold? O there's a way indeed; will I? will I not? Ask me if I will live. He that speaks to us of money and wealth, Nostras avido sovet igne medullas; Cheares bloods with a tickling heat.

The Devil would be undone, but for these various ways. All will not be adulterers, not all Idolaters, nor all usurers. But though it be true that by nature all sins are potentially in us, yet minus servit majori, there is a predominance: and all creatures delight to run with the current of Concupiscence. It is easy for a beggar to be no usurer; alas there are many other ways to be damned. Satan like the Fish baits his hook according to the appetite of the fish. And as Christ took men their own element, making Piscatores animalium, piscatores animarum, (non mutata piscatio sed intentio) changing in his Apostles not the condition, but the intention fishing thus he appeared to Mary in the garden, like a Gardener. So doth Satan to pervert; Fit fera, fit volucris, fit toto corpore serpens; Becomes all things to seduce all men. Some Danat will not be won to play the whore, unless her lover appear in a shower of gold: he hath that way for her. Another will not bow in the house of Rimmon, crouch at a Mass, but for his masters favor; he hath that way for him. A third will not rend the Church with Schism, but to get himself a name: he h... 〈◇〉 way for him too; he shall not be inglorious, though he be infamous. A Jesuit 〈◇〉 not strike at the anointed blood, unless the Pope will canonize him for a Sai...; there's a way for him. One will have this way, another that way; so they go to •e• any way; Satan cares not. One trembles at the main ocean, that ventures to be drowned in a shallow puddle: no matter how, says Satan, so he be drowned.

To conclude, he studies many ways to make you wretched, do you study 〈◇〉 way to make yourselves blessed. The Devil is the father of lies, he would have shown Christ the way down from the pinnacle, but it was a false way, by a precip... if thou standest in a quandary, and he should point thee a way; that is, if thine own lust, his town-clearke, say this way; be thou sure to take the other, for he means 〈◇〉 murder thee. If thou be in the path of obedience, and he say unto thee, as Elisha to 〈◇〉 Syrian army, 2 King. 6.19. This is not the way, but follow me, and I will bring you whi... you desire: answer him with an Abi in malum, Depart thou lying spirit, this is the 〈◇〉 of righteousness which the Holy Ghost prescribeth. Now seeing that of m...y ways, one special way is hard to hit, Lord guide us the right way, open our eyes 〈◇〉 see it, incline our hearts to walk it, and bring our souls to the end of it, through 〈◇〉 that is the way of truth, and the truth of way, and life of both, JESUS CHRIST▪

Their pernicious ways.] We have done with the number, let us come to 〈◇〉 nature of their ways; which are Pernicious or Damnable. The word is diver... read: by some 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, by some 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, in the later copies 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉: for Luxu... Lasciviousnesses, or Destructions. If understood in the former acceptions, we 〈◇〉 this observation.

That the end of heresy is to make men proud and insolent, or riotous and ...cessive; contrary to the doctrine of mortification which the Gospel preacheth. 〈◇〉 that which promiseth that the flesh shall not kill us, chargeth us also to kill the 〈◇〉 The one is promised, Rom. 8.1. the other imposed, Col. 3.5. Ahab was assured by 〈◇〉 Prophet that Benhadad should not slay him, but withal he was commanded to 〈◇〉 Benhadad; that proud enemy of God and his Church: but because he did not, Thy life shall go for his life, and thy people for his people, saith the Lord, 1 King. 20.42. But now the doctrine which encourageth and flesheth the flesh, which admireth and admitteth the world; doth also make much for the Devil. His first policy was to catch the soul through the treason of her guard, the Senses. For Nisi prius deciperetur sensus, non sequeretur assensus; Unless the sense had first submitted, the consent of the soul would never have followed. And still he insinuates to the soul, as the men of Tyre to Herod, by Blastus the Chamberlain, Act. 12.20. The flesh is a perfumed fawning Blastus, that does all with the great one. Here is then the difference between true doctrine and false; the former only intends to make 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, to unbody the body of death: and the scope of the other, is to turn the grace of GOD into licentiousness, and to enlarge the jurisdiction of sin.

The Gospel intends our newness of life, and peracts this through four degrees; in allusion, yea, in conformity to the death and resurrection of Christ. First, his body was wounded and beaten, with thorns and buffets: answerable in us there must be contrition: Trajectum vulnere corpus; When the Publican did but knock his breast, he gave this wound to his flesh. Strike it soundly with remorse of heart, set it a bleeding. 2. Christ's body was pursued with incessant afflictions, so follow thy fin with continual blows, till thou make it so weak that it cannot creep, 1 Cor. 9.27. I beat down my body, and bring it in subjection. Though sin will not say, as the Prophet to his neighbor; Percute me; Smite me, I pray thee: yet God bids us smite it: and if we deny to do it, his wrath will smite us, as the Lion slew that refuser, 1 King. 20.36. Therefore let us deal with it, as the other man did with the Prophet, ver. 37. Smite it soundly, and smite it daily: a little sorrow is not sufficient. Gemitus, quasi geminatus: Let us water our bed every night with our tears, Psal. 6.6. Do not only blow upon it with intermissive blasts, for then like fire it will resurge and flame the more. Sin is like a stinking candle newly put out, it is soon lighted again. It may receive a wound, but like a dog it will easily lick it self whole: a little forbearance multiplies it like Hydra's heads. Therefore, Nullam labem aspergat dies, quam nocturnae lacryma non dilu•ant; Whatsoever aspersion the sin of the day hath brought upon us, let the tears of the night wash away. 3. They crucify Christ: so when sin is thus wounded and weakened, let us have it to the Cross, and nail it fast, Rom. 6.6. Let our old man be crucified with him, that the body of sin may be destroyed, that hence-forth we may not serve sin. It is fit we should crucify that enemy, which crucified our best friend, Christ. Yea, that we should kill that, Quod si non pereat, perdat; Which, if we destroy not, will destroy us. It is written of Ahaz, 2 Chron. 28.23. that he sacrificed to the gods of Damascus which plagued him: Let us never seek to please sin, which seeks to confound •s. He is a fool that loves his sin better than his soul. No, Moriatur iniquitas, ne moriatur iniquus; let the sin die, that the sinner may live. Neither dally this execution: save this malefactor from the galhouse, and he will be the first that shall hang thee: be sure it is dead. 4. Lastly, as CHRIST was taken down •rom the Cross, and laid in his grave: so is it dead? O bury it. The Gospel will •ot bate one degree of this proceeding, even to burial, Rom. 6.4. We are buried •ith him, &c. Mortification may begin at some few principalls, as an arm is •riken dead with a palsy: but Burial covers all: therefore rest not until all be •aid in the grave. Yea, as CHRIST was buried in a grave of Rock, lest the softer •atter of the earth should seem easily possible: in one entire rock, lest the cliffs and •ssures should breed cavil: Yea, to the mouth of the rock was a stone rolled, ••at stone sealed, and that seal watched. So make sure work with thy sinful •esh: bury it in a rock: if thou find none ready, in CHRIST'S grave: there •re no seames for Satan to steal it out, and bring it in judgment against thee. Roll ⟨◇⟩ stone to the mouth of the Sepulcher, that is, detestation of sin: hate it, as Amnon•ated Tamar, more than ever thou lovedst it. Seal the stone, bind it with a vow of •olution; I have sworn, and will perform it, Psa. 119.106. Set a guard about it, watch it: Cum omni custodia; With all diligence keep thy heart from it. There are three watchmen; Fasting, Circumspection, and Prayer: Fasting is a plot to cheat iniquity, for she is no pinger, but loves pampering. By fasting keep the body, by circumspection the soul, by prayer both. This is the doctrine of the Gospel, to kill the lu•ts of blood and flesh: that the soul may live without the tyranny of sin in this world, and without the company of sin in the world to come.

Now the aim and scope of false doctrine, is to hearten this Jezebel that bew•cheth us: that whosoever is led by it, may share the testimony, the infamy, the penalty with Ahab, 1 King. 21.25. He hath sold himself to work wickedness in the sight of God, whom Jezebel his wise provoked. The doctrine of Rome may here justly be i•dicted for Asoticall, the nurse of voluptuousness. O you wrong it; nothing is more corrective, restrictive, austere: Doth it not command fasting? No: what not Rome? No, not Rome: it commands abstaining from some kind of food, but not fasting. A merchant is following his business all day, at night comes home; he must have no flesh: but he hath his cullices, his jellies, his junkets, ten times more provoking than moderate flesh. The poor laborer, if at night he eats a piece of Bacon, O he is an heretic, but the other an excellent Catholic. But does it not forbid marriage, and commend vows of chastity and celibate? Yes, that it may allow Stews, and have large fees out of harlots hires. But there is a curse against them, Mich. 1.7. They gather it of the hire of an harlot, and they shall return to the wages of an harlot. Why do they not boast their Pauline order, founded by Ghastalia, a Countess of Mantus: where mortification was so thoroughly taught, that a certain old woman Iulia, indeed little better than a Bawd; would lay a young man and a maid in one bed together, with a Crucifix between them, to keep them from scratching one another; that thus they might learn to mortify the flesh? Do they not commend 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, Prodigality; when they tempt a young landed man to part with all he hath, to u•do his parents that depend upon him; that he may take their order, and they ••vide his Inheritance? Do they not approve 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, lasciviousness; when they forbid marriage to a chaste wife, and tolerate turpitude with an unchaste curtesan? Whether then we take it for the first or second, the third will fit all, as our translation reads it; Damnable ways. In that Tertio they all meet: whether it be a Luxurious way, or a Lascivious way, it is still a Damnable way.

If it be taken for Riot and voluptuousness, that is a pestilent doctrine which shall teach a man to cast away God's blessings like troublesome rubbish, 1 Tim. 5.8. If any man provide not for his own, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an Infid••. It is Pernicious to both the estates, present, and future. First, for this world, it hastens beggary: it is the rioters phrase, when he calls for supplies to his lusts; It is but begging an year the sooner. Diogenes requested of a prodigal a talent: he as 〈ϕ〉 him what he meant, to desire so much of him, and so little of others: he answered, Quoniam tu habes, illi habebunt; Because thou hast, and they will have: I shall beg o• thee but once, of them often: give me now a talent, I may live to give thee a gro••. Secondly, for the world to come, when the account must be given, the matter will be worse. If the servant that but hid his talent, was cast into utter darkness, for not ••proving it: what answer shall he make that hath riotously wasted it, Luke 16.1. Th•• shall be more fire, because there was less faithfulness.

If it be taken for Wantonness, then that is a Damnable doctrine, that shall teach 〈ϕ〉 man to go to heaven by uncleanness. Such a pestilence is derived from the Pa•• faction, that Fornication is but a venial sin, 1 Cor. 6.15. Paul saith, Shall I take 〈ϕ〉 members of Christ, and make them the members of an harlot? God forbid. That sa•ledge, to make the member of Christ a limb of the Devil by the congression• lust, is with them venial. Paul saith, God forbid it; but

Rome allows it, and in so•• sort commends it. But he that so taught it, shall never so find it, 1 Tim. 5.11. ⟨◇⟩ wax wanton against Christ: What's their reward? It follows; Having da because they have broken their first faith.* Such a damnable opinion was hatched by ⟨◇⟩ Familists, that a man might lie with his neighbors wife dormiente marito, while her husband slept: as if the sleep of the innocent excused or acquitted the guilt of the waking. But let them all pretend what they will, as the woman that presumed so much of her husbands love, that if he should find her in the bed of incontinence, he would not harm her: but it proved far otherwise, to her shame and ruin. So there is another judgment must pass; and let them not think they are so sure of God's favor, that he will not find fault though they be lascivious: for Whoremongers and adulterers the Lord will judge, Hebr. 13.4.

To conclude, observe the horrors of false doctrine, and the inextricable confusion it wrappes the followers in ⟨ in non-Latin alphabet ⟩, Pernicious: ad verbum, Destructions, or Damnations. The wicked never rest till they meet with final ruin. Pharaoh, though by one plague he had lost the fruits of the earth, by another the fruit of his cattle, by a third the light of his eyes, by a fourth the fruit of his loins, even all the first borne of Egypt: yet as if all this could not content him, he would not give over till he met with utter destruction; till he was drowned and damned. Yea, they follow it as if a man should woo and court unhappiness: one would think it were enough to say to Destruction, as Ahab to Elias; Hast thou found me O thou mine enemy? But so to pursue it, as not to give it over till they overtake it, is a desperate madness. Like flies that still hover about the candle, and the burning of a wing serves not their turn; they must sacrifice their lives in the flame. So busy are the wicked about hell fire, playing on this side, and one that; dancing through it as boys through a bonfire; yea as in the sacrifices of children to Moloch, and that with pipes and melody in the valley of Hinnon. Never ceasing till God make an utter destruction, affliction not rising up the second time, Nah. 1.9. It is a fearful protestation of the Prophet against them. Psal. 109.18. As he clothed himself with cursing like a garment, so shall it come into his bowels like water, and like oil into his bones. As he loved it, so he shall have it, and be always girded with it. For us that love Salvation, let us never rest till we are assured of it; not suffering our eyes to sleep, nor our eye lids to take any slumber, till we be possessed of Jesus Christ.

Many shall follow their pernicious ways.] Thus for the Ringleaders, now view the rabble: and therein their multitude and their Aptitude, their number, Many: their forwardness, tractableness, easynesse to be tempted; Shall follow.

1 Their multitude, Many: wickedness walks with numbers, and is never scanted of followers. Matth. 24.5. Many shall come in my Name, and deceive many. Paul says, they shall draw a world after them. Goodness hath a few adherents, because the gate is narrow that leadeth to life; the wicked in a proud disdain blanch heaven gate, as too strait for their greatness. All that the master graciously invited, disdainfully refused. Luk. 14.18. All with one mind make excuse: well, his cheare shall not be lost. Goodness may complain with Paul; At my answering, no man assisted me, but all forsook me: yet still prays for them, that it may not be laid to their charge. Christendom is the least part of the world, they that profess Christ truly the least part of christendome; and of this little part there be many that may be called Heretics, not so much in their lips, as in their lives, not in their doctrines, but in their doings: they color for CHRIST, but confederate underhand with the world. Therefore Many are called, but few are chosen. It is said. Revel. 20.12. that the books shall be opened, and another book which is the book of life. There is but one book of life, wherein the elect are registered: but the books of the reprobates are many, for one book will not hold them. But if I for bear the common customs, I shall be held singular and irregular, a by-word of the people, and as a tabre before them, Job•7.6. And what, must thou prefer fame before conscience? Remember the Philosopher when the people applauded him, Quid mali feci, he asked what evil he had done? So•es ever suspected that, which past with the general most commendation Augustine reckons up 288 several opinions de summo bono. Civit. lib. 19. cap. 1. but amongst all these we never found any so mad, as to place his happiness upon common fame. Indeed so long as great men be good men, and the most the best, we may follow both: but because this is rare, let us not do as the most, but do as we must. It is better to have good company in heaven, than great company in hell. It was a satyricall, an atheistical answer of a Iester, when a great Lord asked him whether he would go to heaven or to hell: he said, To hell; for there I shall be sure to meet your Lordship, and the most part of my acquaintance. But he little loves CHRIST, that will not love him without company: and his zeal is cold to heaven, whom the example of numbers can turn another way. No, let us say as much as Peter said, and do more than Peter did: Though all men should forsake thee, yet I will not leave thee, O Savior. Neither magnitude of Princes, nor multitude of people, shall prevail with me: I am thy sheep, I will follow my shepherd. Lead me on with the bands of love, and hold me with the hand of mercy; knit me to thyself, now with saving grace, and hereafter with everlasting glory.

2 Their Tractableness; Shall follow. There is a pliable disposition in all ⟨◇⟩ naturally to evil, in these a desperate and unstayable precipitation.

They need not be compelled with scourges, nor tormented to it: their own willingness saves the labor of painful coercion. It is only a Job that the devil delights to vex with anguish: he knows, an Absalom will run laughing to hell. Luk. 22.31. Satan hath desired to winnow you. To winnow you, there are some all chaff, he will not meddle with them. Hos. 4.17. Ephraim is joined to Idols, let him alone. Let him alone, says Satan; he is as safe as I would wish him. No general wounds his own soldiers, that march under his colors; but his enemies. Luk. 11.18. If Satan be divided against himself, how shall his kingdom stand? He never makes reprobates feel his hate, till they feel his heat; even his fire in the burning lake.

They need not be drawn with cords, hailed with authority and command. Indeed if Doeg hear a Saul bid him murder the Priests, he will run upon them, and quickly dispatch them. 1 Sam. 22.18. If Nebuchadnezzar charge the people to adore his new erected Idol, they quickly fall down; As soon as the music gave warning, Dan. 3.7. John shall not want a deaths-man, if Herod send for his head. The centurions servants never ran faster on his errands, than these to do mischief. Such headlong followers of false teachers are the Papists, who have learned caecam obedientiam, to be so tractable as to follow their leaders blind-fold. They practice an indiscreet surrendering up of themselves to the command of their superior. Like those unclean beasts, Deut. 14. they swallow and never chew the cudde. It is an inconsiderate, undiscursive aplyment of themselves to another's will, without waighing the goodness or fitness of the action. An Abbot commands one to cast his crying child into the river, and drown it: he doth it, and saith my Author; God did reveal that he accomplished Abraham's work, Cassian. Another was desirous to be instructed in the point of predestination: his Superior turned him to a place in Augustine, and bad him read There: when he came to the end of the page, not of the sense or sentence, he durst not turn over the leaf, because his superior bad him real There. This following they so commend, that if a man were dignified to talk with Angels, if his superior called him, he must come away. When one of them was in discourse with our Lady, a Friar called him, and he very unmannerly quitted h•, Climach. They stick not to affirm, that it is a greater pride to do a good work against a superiors command, than to do a bad one with it: because that is vice •der pretence of virtue. This it is better to s•one against God, than against our spiritual Father: because he can reconcile us to God, but nobody can reconcile 〈...〉 him. Here is a ducible disposition indeed, a generation that will follow upon the 〈◇〉 hint. If Peter should have asked them that question. Act. 4.19. Whether it is be•ter to obey God or man, judge ye: they would have answered; Man, so he be a Superior. Yet saith Eli, 1 Sam. 2.25. If one man sin against another, the Judge shall judge it: but if a man sin against the Lord, who shall plead for him? Yea these men will follow, were they never called. They would be glad to hear it from the mouth of their Joab; Run; and like Cushi, they would bow themselves for it. 2 Sam. 18.21. Yea, like Gehasi, they run though they were never sent.

They need not be led on with flatteries, as Absalom stole the hearts of Israel. When a courtier, to work Sejanus out of favor with Tiberius, had luxuriously flattered and guilded him with his own virtues: and the Emperor found that the intention of all his design was to overthrow Sejanus: he replied, alas you might have spared all this pains and oratory, for I meant before to ruin Sejanus. So to persuade a covetous man to become an Usurer, and to flatter him with the safe and easy gain; it is but labor lost: he meant to do it, though he were never counseled to it.

They need not be hired with rewards: yet this same Dabo tibi goes far; it tempted Balaam to curse, where he should bless: Judas to betray, where he should adore. Saul thought that this only would stay the Benjamites from revolting to David, 1 Sam. 22.7. Will the son of Ishai give you fields and vineyards? will he make you captains over thousands, or captains over hundreds? This engine Satan planted against the walls of eternity, Matth. 4.9. All these will I give thee. As God said to Abraham; All the land that thou seest will I give unto thee, Gen. 13.15. But these men, though they had no reward, yet insant sine munere currunt. Though the tempter says not as Balak to their cussen, false prophet, Numb. 22.37. Am I not able indeed to promote thee to honor? Yea though he confess plainly, I have neither silver nor gold, lands nor vineyards to give you: yet they resolutely proceed in the satisfaction of their own malice; We will eat our own bread, and wear our own garments: only do thou own us, and let us be thy retainers. Though upon our own cost, we will follow: so greedy is the wicked man of his own ruin, that himself will bear the charges of it.

From this point of their Tractableness, ducible and easy disposition to be led onto evil, we may raise five observable deductions.

1 The greediness of the ungodly to sin, that they scarce tarry for temptation. Eph. 4.19. They are past feeling, (sick without sense) and have given themselves (without hire, or pay, or compulsion, but by a deed of gift) (not only to think, but) to work (not a light kind of immodestie, but) uncleanness (not some little, but) all uncleanness (not with indifferent appetite, or some forward disposition, capable of disuasion, but) with insatiable and desperate greediness. The Apostle sets down here two especial marks of their self violence. 1. They have given themselves: not ravished as Tamar, but they have prostituted their own souls, like that impudent strumpet, that sits at the door, and calls in passengers, Prov. 9.14. So Ahab sold himself to work wickedness; he had no hire. I remember David's lamentation over slain Abner, 2 Sam. 3.33. How died Abner? how? His hands were not bound, nor his feet tied with fetters of brass; yet he fell down at the feet of the conqueror: yesterday a man, today a corps. No body compelled these, nobody forced them; but their own will was their own overthrow, their own following their own undoing, and the battle is fought between them and themselves. 2. With greediness: they follow as the iron adamant, by a natural and hidden propensitie: or, as a Lacquay follows his Lord, and hath no course of his own, but which way his master pleaseth. To be sure of not being behind, they will be before: or, as a dog follows his master through foul or fair, thick or thin, whether North or South; which way soever he doubles his point; howling and questing if he be at a loss. O•, more properly according to the phrase here; as Scholers following their Master, novices their Superiors; subjected to their doctrine and discipline, without questioning what they learn, or, why they suffer. Marching like Jehu the son of Nimshi, driving as if they were mad, 2 King. 9.20. Hastning as a bird to the snare, or a fool to the stocks: as if they had fire at their heels, like Samson's foxes; where•• indeed the fire is before their faces: they run not from it, but unto it.

2 Sin is strong when it meets with a weak resister. How easy is it for error to domineer over ignorance! 2 Tim. 3.6. They lead captive simple women, led away with diverse lusts. Silly women are easily led captive by subtle men. The devil is called a strong man, yet the faith of the weakest Christian is able to beat him back Eph. 4.27. Give no place to the devil: for there is no place for him but where it is given him. When Satan had CHRIST on the Pinnacle of the Temple, one would think that a child for strength might have turned him off: No, his commission extended not so far: he met now with a strong defendant, and he is as weak as water. It is man's infirmity that sets off the glory of his strength. Job 41.25. He is a king over all the children of pride. Satan is a tyrant, but over whom? none but the children of pride. He is called the Prince of the world, but indeed only of worldlings, yet let not this so disgrace his strength, that you become secure. Though the devil stands at God's courtesy, let us not be fearless or careless of such an ene••e. Sin is strong, it could fetch Angels out of heaven, arrest God's courtiers before \diamond own face. A whole world could not withstand the fury of it, when it came marching against them with a flood. It was strong enough to lay all the sons and daughters of Adam in the dust. The devil is strong as a Lion, yea stronger than a thousand Lions; that counteth darts as straw, and laughs at their shaking of the spear, \diamond 41.20.

death is strong, a stalking Giant, that like Goliath dares all the world 〈◇〉 match him with an equal combatant. Hell is strong, it can hold Alexanders, Caesars, Tamberlanes, the sons of Anak, sure enough forever breaking forth. But now whence have all these their strength? Aliunde petunt, they fetch it from the life of sin, which only souls them all with their vigor: take away that, and they are as weak as a bulrush. What power hath death but by sin? it is the sting of it: all a serpents power is in his venomous sting. Yea death had never been, had not sin engendered it. I am. 1.15. Sin bringeth forth death. It is beholding to sin for the very being; for it is none of those positive things that God made. The devil had been damned alone, but for sin; and all the world had mocked his malice. Bu•intra te, quod contra te: he fetcheth the poison from within thee, whereby he fighteth against thee. He finds that weapon in our own lusts, wherewith he runs through our souls. Mark the Philistines policy. 1 Sam. 13.19. to leave the Hebrews not a Smith in all Israel; lest they should make them spears or swords. Let this be our stratagem, to disappoint the devil of his weapons: O that he had no Smith amongst us: howsoever let not us be his Smiths, to hammer, work and fashion his temptations in the forges of our own breasts. And for hell, though without sin it have the strength of retention, yet loseth the strength of attraction: it may be powerful to keep those it hath, but not to draw in those it hath not. That great Gulf may hold the prisoners from coming forth, but the gates of hell are too weak to scramble in a believing soul.

But alas, when sin invades a weak natural man, it boasteth the power in present conquest. Mans strength is wounded by an original blow: and as when sickness hath gotten the better of him, and cast him down, still as the patient grows weaker, the disease grows stronger; and the more that tyrant usurps, the less able is the sufferer to resist. At first Sampson was hard enough for all the Princes of the Philistines, at last they set a boy to lead him. Abimelech was a stout Prince, yet had his deaths wound by a woman. Totylas that mighty conqueror, who vanquished Rome, which vanquished the world, was slain by Narses an Eunuch, a Semi-vir. It is recorded of Solyman a late Turk, that having a great German brought prisoner unto him: in spite and derision of the German nation, he caused his dwarfe, a very pigmey to take him in hand after he was bound; to hacke him and hew him, to run at tilt at him with many courses, and at last to kill him. Let little David maze Goliath with his sting, and he will cut off his head. Thus may •he Lion and Leopard be tamed, and a little child lead them, Esa. 11.6. The Scythi•s had a pestilent enemy that infested their country: they levied a troupe, and with 〈◇〉 great conflict took him: when they had him, they were yet troubled to hold him: •hey then so scanted his diet and sleep that six men could master him: at last by de•rees they brought him so low, that they set a dog to lead him. Thus Satan •rst sets on man first with troupes of spirits; and if he be unruly, they starve him by •taining the food of the soul, the word of God: at last when he is brought low, •hey set a dog to lead him, his own lust. This Naaman feared and escaped; Ha•ael scorned, yet admitted: Am I a dog that I should do this? 2 King. 8.13. He •came that dog, or, at least was lead by that dog. Thus prone are we to sin, •nd therefore let us pray him that is the Strongest to fortify us. If we be left to our •elves, sin not sooner calls than we follow: all our help, all our hope is in the preven•ng grace of God.

3 Observe the power of evil men over their associates; whether in perverting •e higher faculties of the soul, reason and understanding and conscience: or, in •orrupting the lower, will and affections. There is some resemblance between a •hysicall and this ethicall or moral corruption. It is wrought:

Either by privation, withering the good qualities in us: like an evil North •ind, they blow upon the buds of our grace, and nippe them. Whether the ill •ompanion be a white-skin'd hypocrite, or, a black-hided Ruffian: the one like •ire water, the other like fowl: but any water, fair or fowl: may quench the fire •f God's Altar in thee? He doth work a tabe and consumption into his fellows •ertues: and wasteth them from an ounce to a dram; from a dram to a scruple, •o a grain, to nothing. He that hath money will beware of thieves: if thou have •ny grace, venture it not among these rifflers. Art thou inclined to pray? he tempts •ee to play. Wouldest thou go to a Sermon? by his persuasion the Theater stands •n the way. Wouldest thou relieve the poor? no says he, this will help to •ear charges at the Tavern. Luk. 10.30. A certain man went down from Jerusalem $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Jericho, and fell among thieves, that robbed him, &c. He that will go from Ierusa•em to Jericho, shall fall among thieves, that will rob him of his good conditions. The devil hath such agents, that practice the art of debauching men. As Amilcar•wore his young son Hanibal in vindictam Romanorum, to the revenge of the Romans: and as Rome now swears her proselytes in vindictam Anglorum, to the re•enge of the Protestants: so the devil swears all his Instruments in vindictam Chri•ianorum to the revenge of Christians. So that a man may say with Christ •n the crowd, Quis me tetigit? Who touched me, for I feel virtue gone out •f me.

Or, by position, infusing his own bad qualities into thee. Lot hath a little tang •rom Sodom, that sticks by him in the Mountain. Jacob sware by the Fear of his father Isaac: but Joseph learned in Egypt to swear by the life of Pharaoh: Pe•er durst draw his sword against a whole troupe in his Masters quarrel: but after all protestations of inseparableness was infected with the air of the high Priests hall: •nd then he fell to cursing; it is likely that was their fashion, to get credit to their •peeches. Herod was loath to give away John Baptists head, but for the company, Matth. 14.9. As a musician tunes his instrument, so he will stretch all thy cords, •ill he hath brought thee to his own key: thou shalt be forced to sing as he will have •he, Psal. 137.3. Let sin be but an embrion in thee, he will so midwife it that he will deliver thee of it by action: yea so nurse it, till he make it the darling of thy af•ection. Is thy soul thus ravished of her chaste love to CHRIST? thou may•st say to her as Absalom to his sister Tamar: Hath Amnon been with thee? hath the •ad associate met with thee? This poison is never more dangerous than when it •omes in a golden cup. All the spite of Joseph's brethren was not such a Cross to •im, as the inordinate affection of his mistress. Tentations on the right hand are •ore perilous, because they are more plausible and glorious. Joseph saw this pleasure would advance him: he knew what it was to be the minion of one of the greatest Ladies in Egypt. Yet he contemns it; How shall I do this great wickedness, and sin against God? He knew that all the floods of honor could not wash of $\langle \diamond \rangle$ guilt of one sin. He shuns her society: O that we were so wise to avoid the occasions of evil company. She impudently catcheth hold of his garment, he $\langle \diamond \rangle$ seconds her tongue. But Joseph will rather lose his cloak than this fa•h, rather be s•led of his livery, than of his chastity: refuse all, rather than blemish her honor, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ masters in her, his own in both; God's in all. Were we all such Joseph's, the ped••• of hell durst not open his pack: his damned wares might lie like dead commodities stinking upon his own hands.

Let this teach us all to fly the societies of the wicked: lest we follow them ho•••, through their transgression to their destruction. But if I consort with them, I do•• to convert them. Alas, there is a great deal more danger of poisoning the physician, than curing the patient. They are such as have taken the devils oath of allegiance; that what he cannot do immediately by himself, he may do mediately by his instruments. To err Humanum, is the part of man: but to seduce Di••• cum, is the part of a devil. It is ill to play the wanton, worse to play the bea••, worst of all to play the devil. There have been such cursed men, that delight in the murder of souls. Paul fought with such Beasts at Ephesus: the men of Nazareth were worse to CHRIST than the devil: he says, mitte te, cast down ⟨◇⟩ self: they would violently throw him down: and that on the Sabbath day, wh•• they took exception against him for curing on the Sabbath day, Luk. 4. The C••rens but besought him to depart: his own countrey men were worse, for they dro•• him out. Cain replied, Am I my brothers keeper? yet he could be his brothers b••cher. These violences indeed are not always in sociable fellows, but subtle a•• supple fomentations. Persecutio facit martyres, haeresis apostatas: plus nocuerunt hor•• togae, quàm illorum galea, Tertul. Persecution hath made Martyrs, schism apostates: the former corrosives are not so noxious as the others balsams. We call sour devils, familiars. Psal. 55.13. It was thou my guide, my companion, my familiar; that didst me the mischief: he that eats our salt betrays us. There is no such speeding engine of destruction, as the friendly seducer; that damnes a man in kindness. As a man sinking into the deep water, catcheth hold of him that is next him: so men diving into the bottom of iniquity, pull down their adherents. The sheep make the ground fruitful wheresoever they lie: so the godly make all places blessed where they dwell. But the wicked, like the weed Gosses, make the land bars where they grow. When such a one provokes thee to sin, though with the smoothest face; it thou say not to him as CHRIST to Peter. Get thee behind me Satan: yet take thy leave of him, as the Angel did of the devil, Increpet te Dominus, The Lord rebuke thee, Iud. ver. 9.

Oh that we could see the mischief that evil company doth us: the sins unpurposed, unthought of come thus to be committed. Let a tempter but hold up his finger, the Sabbath shall be profaned, the word relinquished, and all religion suspended. This man is a Harpy that pecks up all the good seed: a great beast ⟨◇⟩ breaks through the sense of God's Law; makes a vast gappe or breach; and as my Text says, the whole heard follows him. How does Dives in hell now curse ⟨◇⟩ flatterers! If thou knowest whose factor thy ill companion is, thou wouldest ⟨◇⟩ him. He is such a pleasing murderer that he tickles thee to death; and like Solomon's fool, thou diest laughing. A good man accompanying an evil, is like a l•ving body bound to a dead corps: noisome and irksome. When God shall cha•g• thy soul with sin, wilt thou answer; such a one brought me to it; Adam, ⟨◇⟩ woman gave me? Tu errando miser, quamvis ill in provocando miserior: thou shalt ⟨◇⟩ wretched in sinning, though he be more wretched in tempting. He hath helped ⟨◇⟩ to much of thy sin, he shall bear none of thy torment. Be circumspect ra•• with whom thou eatest and drinkest than what thou eatest and drinkest, Sen. Le••them, Nunc te melioribus offer. Leave them? then must we go out of the world, 1 Cor. 5.10. But have no fellowship (nullo modo cum operibus; in quantum potes, nec cum operatoribus) with the unfruitful works; and if thou canst avoid it, neither with the workers of darkness. Si cum malis, non tamen in malis. If we must converse with evil men, yet let it not be in evil matters. Dilige malos homines, non quia malos, sed quia homines. Love evil men, not in that they are evil, but in that they are men. Love quod fiunt, non quod faciunt: love what they are, not what they do, as God made them, not as they make themselves. Affect virum, non vitium, the man not his fault. As in relieving an evil beggar; damus homini, non moribus; we give to the man, not to his manners. But if by admitting their persons, we cannot avoid their vices, let us deny both. How should we hope, feasting with Job's children, the house should not fall down on our heads! When we find ourselves following evil men, I wonder we do not tremble at their ends. Can we walk in the midst of the fire, and feel no scorching? man's nature is like the fire; if there be any infection in the room, it draws it strait to it self. Like jette, it omits all precious objects, and attracts staws and dust. Trust not thyself with these incendiaries: cull out the best and follow them: Oh sweet is the communion of Saints! Worldly mirth is more talked of then felt, spiritual joy is more felt, then talked of. I appeal to any man's conscience, that hath been softened with the unction of grace, and truly tasted the powers of the world to come: suppose thou hast tried both; been mad-merry with thy friends at a luxurious feast, sung Psalms with the Saints in the Church; whether of these have most refreshed thy heart? Alas, temporal mirth is like the widows joy, a blaze and goodnight: spiritual rejoicing leaves an impression in the soul behind it, the unspeakable comforts of the Holy Ghost, never to be raced out.

I conclude with three cautions given by three several Saints from one most holy Spirit. Exod. 23.2. Follow not a multitude to do evil. Foolish birds follow the kite in hope of a part of the expected prey, when she draws her own guts after her, Rom. 12.2. Fashion not yourselves to this world: it is a fashion that must be washed off with fire and brimstone. Prov. 28.14. Blessed is the man that feareth always. Salvianus gives the reason; Nemo magis diligit, quam qui maxim veretur offender. No man so truly loves, as he that fears to offend. I confess, there be many things lawful that the common people do, but I will suspect that which the common people do. The Jews might give offenders forty stripes by the Law, yet they gave Paul but nine and thirty. Perhaps they thought that if they had given the full number, their fingers might have itched to give one more. Qui a nullis abstinet licitis, vicinus est illicitis: he that abstains from nothing that is lawful, neighbors upon that which is unlawful. Nam mala sunt vicina bonis. The note which comes too near in the margent, will skippe into the Text at the next impression. Of all studies, let us never study to range in the borders and extremities of our liberty. As how much of this world we may swallow, and riches not choke us. How near we may come to the skirts and suburbes of hell, and hell not wholly devour us. How much we may drink, and be no drunkards: how far we may wade in usury, and yet scape hell? The devil is crafty and watchful; if he spy our venturous outrodes, and find us extravagant out of our own grounds; he will not lose one inch of his advantage.

4 We must not fall off from the faith and Church of CHRIST, because multitudes travel another way. He that proclaims pleasure and carnal content to all his followers, shall have many Scholars in Courts, Palaces, Colleges, Senates, Fields, Shops, Offices: for all they love darkness whose deeds are evil. There are few whose faith finds a passage through the straight gate. Of six hundred thousand Israelites but two entered into the land of promise. Non facile invenies multis e milibus unum, virtutem pretii qui putat esse sui. The Papists fable to us of Saint Bernard, that the fifteenth day after his death he appeared to a certain Monk: and when the Monk asked whether it were a difficult thing to be saved; he should thus answer him: The same day I died there died also four thousand three hundred; and of all them Ego solus cum quodam Heremite vitam caelestem intravimus, only myself and one Hermit were received into heaven: there was one cast into the fire of purgatory, and all the rest went to hell. For the story, I have not so spacious a faith as to credit it: but I fear of the many thousands which every day depart this life, the greater number take the wrong way. If this be so, strive we to make sure our own salvation: that when many follow these damnable ways, we may be found of that number that followed JESUS CHRIST. When Agelmond King of the Lumbards (be it reported upon Sigeberts credit) passed by a pond into which seven infants were cast, he thrust down his spear, and that Infant which took hold of it he brought up from the pool, brought home to his house, and brought up at his house like the Kings Son; and at last he succeeded him in the kingdom; he was called Lanussio, or Lamussius, from Lama a ditch out of which he was taken. So when the great King of heaven came into the world, and the world knew him not, he found us all drenchd in the whirlpool of sin, and ready to be everlastingly drowned: he thrust down his spear the saving Gospel: and John. 1.12. As many (not many, scarce one of seven) as received him, (took hold on his spear, as it followeth there exegetically) that believed in his Name: To them he gave (not only obtaining for them, nor proclaiming to them, but to them he gave) Power to be the Sons of GOD, to be repossessed of the kingdom, and to divide the Inheritance with the principal heir, himself.

5 Lastly, seeing there is such certain danger in following after common copies; give me leave to avert you from all these pestilent examples, and propose to you one worth your praise and imitation. It is the glory of all precedents the life and excellency of what is good in man; that man of God, and God of man JESUS CHRIST. Here is a pattern: the godly, like the Eagle, disdain all objects but the Sun. Summa religions est imitari quem colis: it is the marrow of religion to imitate him whom thou worshippest. The Italians got up all the excellent Pictures in the world, that out of them all they might make one Master-piece, or most excellent picture. The sweetness of all the best flowers makes most sweet honey. CHRIST in the whole course of his life was a pattern of goodness. In his birth a pattern of humility, in his life a pattern of Innocence, in his death a pattern of patience, in all a pattern of holiness. Si praecipientem sequi non vis, sequere praecedentem, Lactant. If thou wilt not follow him in his word commanding, yet follow him in his work directing. Now saith Paul, Put on Christ. He is put on two ways; by Imputation, and by Imitation: the first justifies, the other sanctifies. He is put on Sacramentally by Baptism. Gal. 3.17. All that are baptized into Christ, have put on Christ. He is put on internally by faith, externally by imitation. Hebr. 12 2. Look unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith: look upon him, and so eye him that you may follow him; and so follow him that you may live like him. That you may say; Sic oculos, sic ill manus, sic ora ferebat. When thine eyes be haughty with ambition, did he carry his eyes so? Like a Lamb before that bloody Wolf Pilate, his look was meek and lowly, though lovely. When thou cursest him that angers thee, did he carry his mouth so? No, Father forgive them. Thou art provoked with words, and returnest blows, did he carry his hands so? No, being stricken, he stroke not again. Heb. 12.3. Consider him that endured such contradictions of sinners. Against covetousness put on the contentedness of CHRIST: against anger put on the meekness of CHRIST: against wrongs put on the patience of CHRIST: against pride put on the humbleness of CHRIST. For as he told Peter. John. 13.8. If I wash thee not, thou shalt have no part with me: so he says to everyone, If I lead thee not, thou shalt never come to my kingdom. The Painter went to one Virgin for an eye, to another for a lip, to a third for a forehead, to a fourth for a chin; to make exquisite the face of his goddess. We need not go to one Saint for this virtue, to another for that: for perfection take CHRIST, and take all. In him dwells the fullness of God-head: there can be no want where all is infinite. Let the Many follow their own fancies, or the fancies of others, let us follow CHRIST. This is the praise of those Virgin-Saints; that they followed the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, Rev. 14.4. The inseparable effect of Justification is obedience: now we follow him in following his, relieving them whether in want or prison, sickness or persecution. And this he will acknowledge at the last day, with a Come ye blessed. Come to me, for you have followed me wheresoever I went. I was hungry, and you followed me with meat: thirsty, and you followed me with drink: a stranger, and you followed me with lodging: naked, cold, and sick, and you followed me with clothes, warmth, and comfort. Whithersoever I went, I had your company; now you shall have my company forever. Matth. 18.28. You followed me in the regeneration; you shall be with me in eternal glorification.

By whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of.] I come to the Detraction, the cursed effect of their perversion; which is not only pernicious to their own souls, but also derogative to the glory of GOD. Herein I considered two generals; the Patient and the Injurie: in the Patient, the Singularity and the Sincerity.

1 The Singularity; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , The way, that excellent way. There is only one way of Truth, and of salvation by it. There are many ways in the world, yet but one way of Truth. Eph. 4.4. There is one Lord, one faith, &c. The Turk hath his way, the Jew his way, the Gentile his way, Heretics their way, Schismatics their way, though there be almost as many ways as feet to walk in those ways, yet the way of truth is but one. Diversitie of ways is sought out; either for peevishness, they cannot abide the common rode: because most men pass through the gate, they will climb over the wall; and if others climb, they will creep through. They are so cross, that if authority should command them to wear clean linen, rather than not rebel they would go woollward. Or, for pride, when men scorn to go the Kings high way, because there they have the company of beggars and base fellows. There are some that disdain the poorer sort, and will rather forbear the common duties of religion. But alas, what brag of estate should there be in the Church? there is no spiritual difference; bond or free, all are one in CHRIST. The Emperor eats of the same bread that his Lacquay doth: the beggars child is baptized in the same font that the Kings. This they disdain, and therefore will have Sacraments by themselves, a Synagogue of their own. Or, else for glory, that their singularity may be pointed at. Diogenes was ducking himself in cold water in a frosty morning: the people beheld and pitied him: alas saith a Philosopher; Depart you to your houses, and leave gazing on him; I warrant you that he will come out quickly, and keep himself warm. There are many ways, as it is said of Poland, if a man chance to lose his religion, he shall find it there, or give it gone forever. But truth hath one way, not a second, not another. What so near one as two, yet a Christian must not go so far from one as two. Luk. 11.23. He that is not with me, is against me: Whatsoever is not with this way, is against it. Now it is near to impossibility, Vt res oppositas men's ferat una duas. To write with two pens together, to hunt two games together, to fight with two swords together, to travel two ways together; is a troublesome folly. Eccl. 2.13. Woe to the sinner that goeth two manner of ways. It is said of Solomon that he went two ways; the way of the Lord, and the way of Ashteroth, 1 King. 11.5, 6.

Let us all seek this one way, and all false ways utterly abhor. Matth. 23.9. You have but one father in heaven, and but one way to please him; which is to walk in this one way of truth. Gal. 6.16. As many as walk after this rule, peace be on them, and mercy: all other rules are warped and out of square. Luk. 10.42. One thing is necessary. Psal. 119.9. Wherewithall shall a young man cleanse his way? by ruling himself after thy word: all other ways defile, do not cleanse. There are innumerable ways to hell: you may go thither by pride, by avarice, by malice, by hypocrisy; any way will serve to meet at the bottom of the hill, that infernal center: but still to heaven there is but one way. There is a way to honor, by flattering insinuations into the bosom of Princes: there is a way to pleasure, by making the flesh mistress, and denying her nothing: there is away to be rich, by usury and oppression: there is a way to get offices and livings; by swallowing a simoniack oath, or putting out the givers eye by bribery. But there is but one way to make a man blessed, and that is The way of truth. Withall it shall make thee great enough, and merry enough, and rich enough; but howsoever, happy enough. Refuse all to take the way: they write of the stone Pyrrhenus, that so long as it is whole it swimmeth; but being broken, every part sinketh. So is man's heart, if divided, it sinks all to confusion; keep it whole to the way of truth, it shall be saved.

2 The Sincerity; the way Of Truth. Which is that way? as Pilate as $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Christ, What was the truth, when the Truth stood before him, John. 18.38. There is veritas legalis, a legal truth; God's Law is the truth. It was a custom among the Heathen, to derive the authority of their Laws from their gods, that they might be received for truth; Trismegist to the Egyptians from Mercury, Erontes to the Carthaginians from Saturn, Solon and Draco to the Athenians from Minerva, Nero Pompilius to the Romans from Aegeria. But we have from the true God, the truth of God. Deut. 4.8. What nation is so great, &c. Now if they magnified their Laws so full of error, how shall we dare to blaspheme God's Law so full of truth? No, let us bless it, and obey it. David in his hundred and nineteenth Psalm beats in every verse upon that one string, The Law, the Statutes, the Ordinances, Commandment, Truth, &c. of God. There is also Veritas Evangelica, the Truth of the Gospel, G•l. 3.1. But if this be the truth, then is the other excluded? No, for the Gospel is not contrary to the Law; neither delighteth in others overthrow, but both espouse friendship in a kiss of peace. But it is said, John. 1.17. The Law was given by Moses, but Grace and Truth came by Jesus Christ. But then the Law was not the Truth; for here seems to be a comparative opposition. No; Truth is not denied to the Law, but only the truth of Justification: the Law is true, but not the true means of salvation to us. Non negatur Legi veritas Ligandi, sed ascribitur Evangelio veritas solvendi; The Law is a condemning truth, the Gospel an absolving truth. For if the Law could have justified us, God might well have spared his own Son: but the Grace of justification, and the Truth of salvation is only by Christ. If ye believed Moses, much more believe me, saith Jesus: if you embraced your thralldom, th• much rather accept your freedom. Only, Vos liberabit veritas, John. 8.32. You shall know the Truth, and the Truth shall make you free. Christ is called the End of the L•; not Finis terminans, sed perficiens, sed complens: Not a terminating, but a fulfilling and accomplishing end. Having then received the truth, so gracious a truth, such promises of everlasting life, from a God so true; they are wretched men that blaspheme it. Thus it is the Truth both for the Infallibility and excellency of it.

It is certain. Isaiah 8.20. It is called the Testimony; because it bears witness unto it self: so it is called The Truth, because it shall accomplish it self. God d• promise Abraham a Seed like the Stars for number: and Solomon says, I am in the midst of a people that cannot be numbered; here is an accomplished Truth, 2 Cor. 1.2•. All the promises of God are Yea, and Amen in Christ. Abraham in affiance of this Truth, ventured to forsake his Country, offered to sacrifice his only son, N• upon this Truth lays out money to build an Ark. Moses upon this Truth forsook the Court, to suffer affliction with the children of God. We must all venture on this Truth, or perish. When the soul is to leave the body, woe to him that hath no• a firm dependence on this Truth.

It is excellent, as being the Letters patent of our salvation. The Law was a •ling truth, this is a saving truth. Incomparably fairer is Veritas Christiana••rum q•• Helena Gracorum; The Truth of the Christians, than that Helen of the Grecians. Let my soul not be deficient in believing, and as sure as Christ is Truth, I shall be saved. O far be it from me to vilipend that Truth, without which I were eternally lost! If we had an Antidote warranted to us by some Naturalist, to preserve our life temporal, how would we esteem it? But for that Truth which preserves our life eternal, how precious is it, and beyond value? Let heaven thunder, earth reel, and hell roar, I will hold fast this Truth, and be blessed forever.

By whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of.] We have considered the Patient that suffers, let us look upon the Injury that is offered to it. By whom: and herein two things. The Instruments or occasioners of this Scandal; those misled proselytes; and the Effect or aspersion cast upon the Gospel by their means, which is maledicentia, Blasphemy.

By whom.] The Seminaries of infection have poisoned them, and they divulge that pestilence, to the dishonor of Christ and the scandal of his Gospel. Nay, as if their teachers could not do mischief enough, these strive to go beyond them in wickedness. According to that, Matth. 23.15. They make them twofold more the children of hell than themselves. And indeed, albeit the other were originally the worse; yet these are instrumentally and operatively worse than they. For if false teachers had not store of followers, their heretical positions would fall to the ground, and themselves slinke away with reproach and shame. Here occur two notes to our observation.

First, that not only the Principals, but even the accessories in Schism are guilty of sin, and liable to punishment. The receiver is worse than the thief: and the abettors of sin do more mischief than the authors. So long as the infected person is shut up, his plague doth not spread: while the evil man doth intra orbem suum furere; only be mad at home, his evil lives and dies with himself: the diffusion or dispersion of it is the bane. Let it wander like a fatherless child up and down, no man taking it in, but all shutting their doors against it; the very air will stifle it, it will be the own death. But when it becometh Filius populi, and everyone challengeth a part in the generation of it, the multitude fostering it; now it stands up in defiance, and (although a bastard) dares challenge the true heir, and wrangle for the inheritance. How ridiculous appears a fantastical fashion, while it is singular in the Inventers wearing and habit? The first apparition of an Hic mulier, was like a monster. But when it had stolen an approbation into women's hearts, and gotten a custom on their backs; now it stood on the terms of justification, called it self a noble accoutrement, and scorned to be dashed out of countenance. It is the many's acceptance of evil, that brings a scandal on the truth. When Theudas had gotten four hundred followers, he thought himself a jolly fellow, Act. 5.36. The Pope did once send Usurers into this Land; they were at first howted at, like Owls in a desert: but necessity forced men to borrow; and when they had store of customers, they stood upon their points for very honest men (in their own opinions) and thus the way of truth was blasphemed. The Pope might be the father and founder of the sin, but these executioners gave occasion of the blasphemy.

Secondly, the authors of this seducement are not discharged, though their scholars have dissipated the evil. The breeder of a sin, is the father of a bastard; and he that kindles a mischievous fire, shall answer for all the harms it doth. Those whom thou hast taught to do ill, increase thy sin so fast, as they increase their own. Matth. 5.19. He that breaketh the Law, and teacheth others to do so, shall be called least in the Kingdom of God. It is easy to be guilty of another's wickedness: for if he doth evil by thy suggestion, thou shalt answer for it. The parent that either commands, connives, or exemplifies sin to his child by pattern, makes himself liable to all the iniquities which that infused habit shall produce, 1 Tim. 5.22. Be not partaker of other men's sins. Therefore a man may be partaker of others sins. This may be done nine ways:

1 Consulendo, by counseling. Thou advisest, he practiseth, both are guilty of the sin that but the one doth. Achitophel counseling Absalom against his Liege, was guilty of treason: so was Caiaphas counseled to put Christ to death. Some advise and instigate others to that mischief, wherein they will not be seen themselves; thinking thus to extricate and deliver their own souls; but as the Prophet says, They shall perish in their own counsels.

2 Mandando, by commanding. Thus David sinned in the murder of Vri; Saul in charging Doeg to kill the Priests; Jezebel in commanding the Nobles of I•reel to stone Naboth. This is a sin that sticks to many tradesmen: they command their servants to lie; and their falsehoods shall lie on their masters soul. Oh stay this running sore; and when thou repentest, think not only on thine own personal sins, but upon others committed at thy bidding.

3 Consentiendo, by consenting. Thus Saul sinned in keeping their garments that stoned Stephen, Act. 22.20. When the blood of thy martyr Stephen was shed, I was consenting to his death, and kept the rayments of them that slew him: It was the confession of Saint Paul himself. It is God's charge, Prov. 1.10. If sinners entice thee, consent thou not. It is the reprobates brand, Rom. 1.32. That they not only do evil things, but consent with them that do them. Sentient eandem poenā, qui consentiunt in eandem culpā, They that consent to the same sin, shall feel the same punishment. Every man's hand is not an able instrument of mischief: but whosoever the instrument be, the consent is as deep both in the sin and penalty. For Quod deest operi, inest voluntati: And God values (both in good actions and evil) the will for the deed. Ioah for consenting to David, in the murder of Uriah, and numbering of the people, bore a part in those sins.

4 Provocando, by provoking. All they sin, that provoke others to sin. Eph. 6.4. Fathers, provoke not your children to wrath. Potiphars wife was a strumpet, because she provoked Joseph to have made her one. Prov. 7.13. She caught him, and kissed him, and with an impudent face said unto him; Come, let us take our fill of love. Thus libidinous women feed their paramours high, to provoke them to lust. Drink is given to provoke shameful drunkenness: offenses, to provoke indignation and blows; that the stricken might be revenged on the striker. But they that thus provoke others to wickedness, provoke God to vengeance, 1 Cor. 10.22. Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? Are we stronger than he?

5 Adulando, by flattering. When we soothe up others in their sins; this is to make them our own. Isaiah 9.16. Beatificant populum istum; They bless the people in their errors; and cause their delinquishments by flattery, Psal. 10.3. The wicked blesseth the covetous, whom the Lord abhorreth. The flatterer thinks to make all his, his patrons favor his, his wealth his: but withal he makes his sin his, his damnation his. He gets all; he gets entertainment, he gets riches, he gets respect, he gets wickedness, he gets hell, he gets the Devil and all. Isaiah 5.20. Woe to them that call evil good, and good evil, &c.

6 Participando, by partaking. Ephes. 5.7. Be not partakers with the children of disobedience. If you partake of their sins, you must partake of their plagues. v. 18.4. Aequum est, ut qui participes fuerunt in peccato, participes fiant in supplicio. It is just that they who have made themselves partners in sinning, should not be separated in suffering. The same law condemns the receiver, that judges the thief. They may say one to another, as that malefactor on the cross to his fellow; Thou art in the same condemnation, Luke 23.40. In the matter of bribery, the taking hand, and the giving hand, shall be equally punished. As they shook hands in the iniquity, so they shall shake hands in the penalty. For this sin Jehu reproved Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. 19.2. Shouldest thou help the ungodly, and love them that hate the Lord? Therefore is wrath upon thee. In this predicament they stand, that prefer bad men to good offices: the faults of that man's insufficiency: lie upon the head of his promoter. Psal. 50.18. Thou hast been partaker with the adulterers. To give entertainment to them we know dissolute, is to communicate with their sins. 2 John. verse. 11. He that biddeth him God-speed, is partaker of his evil deeds. There are cases, wherein to give a good speed to the wicked, is said, Communicare operibus ipsius malignis: Psal. 101.7. He that worketh deceit shall not dwell within my house. If thou bestow on them the offices of thy friendship, thou receivest the blemishes of their fellowship.

7 Conticendo vel connivendo: by silence or connivence. When our tongues ought to reprove, and our hands to correct, the forbearance of those duties draws us into guiltiness of other sins, Eph. 5.11. Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness; but reprove them rather. Cum peccata non reprehendimus aliena, facimus nostra. While we rebuke not their sins who belong to us, we make them our own. Eli concerning the sins of his sons, did not connive, nor altogether hold his peace: but because he touched them so lightly, and reprov'd them so slightly; this brought a temporal destruction upon himself and his family. If this fault befall a Minister, it is grievous, Levite. 5.1. If a man offend in blaspheming, another hearing it, and being witness of it; if he do not utter it, he shall bear his iniquity. Si non indicaverit, portabit: nothing more plain: that sin he hath concealed, it as much as if by himself committed. Ezek. 3.18. When God says to the wicked, Thou shalt surely die, and the watch man gives him not warning; His blood will I require at thy hand. Pardon us then in our reprehensions: if we reprove not, your transgressions become our afflictions: and we have reason to love our own souls better than your sins. Not to reprove, were the way to harden your hearts, to make you think well of evil, and to justify that, God condemneth. Duobus modis te non maculabit malus; si non consentis, & si redarguis. Two ways thou mayest escape the guiltiness of another's evil; if thou consent not to him, and if thou reprove him. Levite. 19.17. Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart, but shalt rebuke him, and not suffer sin upon him. Not to rebuke him, is to hate him in thy heart: the original carries it thus, That thou bear not sin for him.

8 Defendendo, by defending. When others iniquities are not considered of us in their true value, but find an estimation far lighter than the gravity of them requires; this is a sin that God abominates. He that justifieth the wicked (as he that condemneth the just) is an abomination unto the Lord. Justice would punish a malefactor, but the protection of some great one delivers him; and now the law may put up his dagger. Thus a lewd person need not fear to offend, that hath a great man to his friend, or hath not a great man to his enemy. Tegunt eum umbrosa nemora umbraculis suis. The shady trees cover him with their shadows. The robber rifles a passenger, is apprehended and indited: the bootie he gives to some mighty one to procure his pardon and escapes. Thus the poor traveler is robbed doubly; both of his money, and all relief of the Law: and the protector of the lewd person is become the greater thief. This is a common appropriation of others sins: when men's wits are set on work to make that good, which their malice hath made necessary. Covetousness begot Usury, injustice doth practice it, and some are fee'd to defend it. Pride and profaneness makes tithes arbitrary; and is there no man will take pains to justify it? This is to bring the sins of all men that transgress in that nature, to become that man's, whose pen did patronize such sacrilege.

9 In praecedendo, in giving bad example. He that leads men to sin, is guilty of their sin. An unruly beast breaks the hedge, and feeds in a forbidden pasture, the whole herd follows: the owner must answer for all these harms. The reproach of Jeroboam was, that he made Israel to sin: not only imperando, by commanding: but also exemplum dando, by leading them in precedent: and the wickedness of Israel will not be taken off from his soul forever. In a rebellion, the captains intend nothing but some reformation; but the multitude is not so qualified: they break into houses, pillage, spoil, and commit outrages, shall not the exemplary leaders be guilty of all this? If the Master love quaffing, there will scarce be a sober family, he shall answer for that sin in his servants. One peevish teacher broacheth a schism •or pernicious doctrine, presently many catch hold of it: thus the truth hath a wound, and suffers blasphemy. He that gave the occasion shall bear the burden, unless timely and hearty repentance recant it, retract it, and his soul find mercy.

Thus easy is it to be guilty of others sins. Indeed Credimus nulla peccata no•i• nocere, nisi nostra: we believe that no sins shall hurt us but our own: but by all these ways, we make other men's sins our own. Prov. 5.22. His own iniquities shall take the wicked himself. His own? why not another's also? Yes, if he make them his own by any of the former conveyances. We have all sins enough of our own, we need not attract others. We deserve punishment enough for what we have done in our own persons; it were heavy for us to add to our vengeance by participation of others wickedness. In all this let us confess our own guiltiness, and for all this implore GOD'S mercifulness in JESUS CHRIST.

The way of truth shall be evil spoken of.] Lastly, we come to the effect, or aspersion laid upon the Gospel by their means: which is Blasphemy, pessimum ge•• maledicentiae. Be the way of truth taken for CHRIST, who is both the way and the truth; then woe to him that dares blaspheme CHRIST. Or, be it taken for the true means of bringing man to everlasting blessedness; will any man blaspheme the means of his own salvation? Is the sacred word of truth, which the Saints have valued above all gold and Jewels, treasures and pleasures; of so poor an esteem with them, that they should blaspheme it?

Blasphemy] is now the subject of our discourse; and therefore first begin w•• with the definition, next with the distinction of it. Dicitur Blasphemia 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , quia laedit alterius famam; it blemisheth the credit of another. It differs not from 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , vel 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , maledicentia. They that would derive it from 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 a fish so vile that the very dogs will not touch it, come short: for it is more tha• a stoliditie or stupidity; even a cursed malice of the heart desiring to hurt. The contrary virtue is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , a study to speak well of others. It is a vice that offends in Defectu; depressing and disgracing that is good, and in Excessu, extolling and magnifying that is evil. For distinction, it is maledicentia derogans, vel contra veritatem Dei, vel contra Deum veritatis, vel contra amicos et Dei et veritatis. Blasphemy is a speech of derogation, either against the truth of God, or against the God of truth, or against the friends of both God and truth. That blasphemy which is against God's friends and true worshippers, I will lightly pass, because it is not here within the center of the text, though not out of the circumference.

The Son of Rapha defied Israel, and Jonathan slew him, 1. Chro. 20.7. This sin is interdicted, Exod. 22.28. Principi populi tui non maledices. Thou shalt no• revile the gods, nor curse the ruler of thy people. This is the vulgar sin of this world, for the greater sort are apt to blaspheme the better sort. The Apostles could not scape it. 1. Cor. 4.13. Blasphemati precamur: being defamed, we entreat. Such were the aspersions of the infidels against the Christians in Iustines and Tertullian's times; that their feasts were Thyestean bankets, that they had promiscuous mixtures &c. 1. Pet. 3.16. They speak evil of us, as of evil doers, accusing our good conversation in Christ. This blasphemy what Saint hath escaped? Because God wrought miracles by Moses, they called him a conjurer. Because John the Baptist lived an austere life, they said he had a Devil. Because Paul spake of Christ's death and our redemption by him, Festus called him a mad man. They abused holy Cyprian, with the nickname of Caprion, when Christ himself cast out Devils, they blasphemed that he did it by Belzebul. Now all these maledictions offer injury and ignominy to God himself: because his Saints are the organs whereby he will propagate the glory of his Name: they do what they can to obscure his majesty. 1. Sam. 17.10. when that pr... Philistine defied the armies of Israel, David says directly that he had blaspheme•• God himself, ver. 45. I come to thee in the name of the Lord of Hosts, whom thou ﴿ϕ〉 defied. Rabshakeh defied the Jews; yet saith Hezekiah, he hath reprov'd the living God, Esa. 37.4. The weight of this sin is felt in the punishment. If it be against•the magistrate, a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter, Exod. 10.20. If it be against parents; the Ravens of the valley shall pecke •ut that eye, and the young Eagles shall eat it, Pro. 30.17. He that despiseth you, despiseth me, saith Christ to his Apostles. And in that you have done it to these little ones, you have done it to me saith the Lord Jesus.

Blasphemy] immediate against God is, vel non tribuendo sua vel tribuendo non •ua, vel abutendo in malitiam, quae referenda sunt in gloriam. Either by denying God •is own, or by ascribing to him that is not his own, or by abusing that maliciously, which is to be referred to his glory. 1. Such as deny his wisdom, Justice, mercy, providence; as if he had neither care nor power to redeem his people, Esa. 52.5. The rulers make the people to howl, as if God had forgotten them; and thus is my Name blasphemed. 2. Such as make him the author of evil, lode him with affections, charge him with injustice. Ezek. 18.25. ye say, the way of the Lord is not equal: as •f the Lord had dealt unjustly with them. 3. Such as execrate and curse the Lord, and (this is the proper acception of blasphemy, Rev. 16.11. They blasphemed the God of •eaven,) because of their pains. Thus too many make that sacred blood which saves the world, and washeth all our souls white; the subject of a furious oath: and for•ifie the credit of a trifle with those wounds, that cost the Son of God his life. What is this but lacerare Christum, to rend in pieces the Lord Jesus; and to object him to new sufferings, so far as their malice can extend? For they sin no less, Qui blasphemant Christum regnantem in coelis, quàm qui crucifixerunt ambulatam in ter•is: that revile CHRIST reigning in heaven, than they that crucified him living on earth. Oh that we should be more insensible of this injury, than the very •enselesse creatures. Matth. 27.51. The veil of the Temple was rent, the earth did ••ache, and the rocks clove asunder. When the Jews heard blasphemy, it was their custom to rend their garments. So Act. 14.15. When the Apostles heard the super•titious Lystrians intention, they rent their clothes. Loe now when the Son of God was blasphemed upon the Cross, because men's hearts were so hard, the very Tem•le it self rent her veil, her garment, the earth rent her bosom, yea her very •ibbes, the stony rocks. So execrable is the sin of blasphemy: some have observed that the greatest sins against God are words: obliquities in speech offend •ore than those in action. Their blows cannot reach God, but their blasphemies •hall fly upon him. Therefore the sin that is never to be forgiven, is blasphemy a•ainst the Holy Ghost. He that doth a sin, breaks God's Law: he that blasphemes, •trikes the person. Such offenders were to be stoned by the Mosaical Law, Levite.•4. By the civil Law, to have their tongues cut out: as most unworthy to have a •ongue, that abused it to their makers dishonor. In a word, to derogate anything from God, is blasphemy, Matth. 9.3. when CHRIST pronounced remission of sins to the paralyticke; the Jews said, This man blasphemeth. Why, wherein? because he forgiveth sins; and who can forgive sins; but God only, Mark. 2.7. For man to arrogate that which is God's peculiar, they call blasphemy. For otherwise, to heal both body and soul; to cure his sickness, and to forgive his sin, had not been to blaspheme, if they had known CHRIST to be God. Matth. 26.65. The high Priest rent his clothes, saying, He hath spoken blasphemy: ye have heard his blasphemy. Why, what was it? Visuros filium, &c. Ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power. This is God's right, therefore when he challenged 〈ϕ〉, they say, he blasphemed. John. 10.36. Say you to me, Thou blasphemest, because I said I am the Son of God? Now which way the Romists, in giving that honor to the creatures, which is only due to the creator, can quit themselves from blasphemy, videtur ipsi, let themselves look to it.

Blasphemy.] Against Scriptural doctrine, this way of truth. Paul confesseth that in his persecution of the Church he enforced men to this blasphemy. Act. 26.11. I punished them oft in every synagogue, and compelled them to blaspheme. I am. 2.7. Do not they blaspheme that worthy Name, by which ye are called? He meaneth, they reproach the doctrine of Christianity. Revel. 2.9. I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews and are not. This is done two ways according to the difference and quality of the persons blaspheming: and they are either enemies or friends. If they be enemies, they disgrace it by their language: if friends, by their lives and conversations.

Enemies by their tongues, casting foul aspersions on the fair cheek of truth. They accuse the very sun of darkness, and peace it self of contradictions. To omit the Turkish calumnies, and Jewish contumelies; even they that call themselves Christians, have not stuck to vilipend the Truth of CHRIST. The Romists have called it a Shipmans house, a waxen nose: it is little beholden to them; 〈ϕ〉 it hath heard as ill of them, as David did of Shimei, or, the living God of Rossceh, God says, it makes wise to salvation; but they seal it up under an unknown tongue, that the people might be fools still. Harding called it a spiritual dennesse: such a mouth should be made dumb forever. How do they magnify the writings of their own, how vilify the writings of God! Those, they say, will make men good Catholics: these will make them Heretics. O blasphemy in the height; that a Jesuits pen should make Saints, and the HOLY GHOST pen should make sinners! What devil durst roar out such a blasphemy above ground? These are they that speake evil of the truth of God, the God of truth be their Judge.

Friends by their bad lives. Rom. 2.24. The Name of God is blasphemed 〈ϕ〉 the Gentiles, through you. That men should be in profession Christians, and in conversation Pagans, videtur & ridetur daemones; the devils look on it, and laugh at 〈ϕ〉 The profession of faith, and operation of good works, are the integral parts of Christianity: and in the children of God admit of no divorce. 1 Thes. 4.7. God 〈ϕ〉 not called us to uncleanness, but to holiness. But this is to be called one way, and to 〈ϕ〉 another: as Jonah being sent to Nineveh, went to Tharshish. Rom. 8.13. If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: God shall render to every man according to his works. 〈ϕ〉 our baptism we give a defiance to sin and Satan: shall we re-entertain what 〈ϕ〉 have sworn to renounce? In the Lord's Supper we profess to be made one with Christ: now can we partake of the Lord's table, and the table of devils, 1 Cor. 10.21. These are incompatible. Nature it self loves nothing simulated or counterfeit; but would have us know the verity of things from their effects. We know the Night-gale by her sweet notes, and can discern the Eagles from the Vulture by the cry: Leonem rugitus discernit a lupo: Christianum mores ab ethnico: our manners distinguish us from unbelievers. Suppose a Christian and a Pagan were together, and both should swear and forswear; how could a stranger tell, which was the Pagan, which the Christian? Anacharsis approved Operum copiam, verborum persiam: Socrates among Philosophers, and Hippocrates among the Physicians, desired practical orations, and would have their scholars in verbis breves, in operibus prolixas; speak little and do much. And if any did not philosophize in his life, they rejected him as a blasphemer of their profession. This is a weighty point, where the Scripture liberally spends it self: and out of that armory I will produce few weapons, to convince this kind of blasphemy.

Ezek. 36.22. Ye have profaned my holy name among the heathen, whither ye went. They should have converted the heathen to the true God, and they suffered themselves to be perverted by the heathen to false gods. Psalms. 106. They learned their works, served their Idols, and sacrificed their children unto devils. Thus they became twice their slaves; their bodies conquered by their weapons, and their hearts by their vices. Thus the Jews brought them out of love with God, and to mislead his religion, which they might judge to produce such cursed effects. So the speech of the Spaniards to the Indians made them cry; Quis (malum) deus iste; vix mischief what god is this, that hath such blood-hounds and Tigers to his servants.

1 Tim. 6.1. Let the servants that are under the yoke, count their own Masters worthy of all honor; that the Name of God, and his doctrine be not blasphemed. Let Christian servants honor their unchristened Masters; lest their rebellion be laid as an imputation upon God, and as a blasphemy upon religion. And the same Apostle says that even servants may adorn the doctrine of God our Savior in all things, Tit. 2.10. The lowest condition, blessed with an honest conversation, may grace the Gospel. Often it is true, that mundo infimus may be Deo intimus: the lowest in the worlds eye, the highest in God's estimation. While superstition dwelt in this land, how was it adorned! the garments of an Idol cost hundreds; and the appurtenances to some, thousands: men gave their estates, as the Israelites their ear-rings and most precious Jewels, to make a golden calf. Now the Truth is advanced among us, we are so far from adorning it, that we shame it.

1 Pet. 2.12. Have your conversation honest, that they who speak against you evil doers, may by your good works which they shall behold, glorify God in the day of visitation. There be many elected, that are not yet called: they are yet out of the fold, but they belong to the covenant by God's everlasting decree. Now the few whereby God will unwind them out of the Labyrinth of error, may be the अनुduction of your exemplary life, John. 17.20. There be some that shall believe on CHRIST, through our word. Now if we live as they live, how can we hope they will believe as we believe? The pagan concludes, if I saw their works better than mine, I should think their faith better than mine. Suppose the robbed and wounded passenger (Luk. 10.30.) had been an heathen; finding no mercy of the Jew, much of the Samaritan; would he not have embraced the Samaritans religion sooner than the Jews? yet the Jews religion was true, and not the Samaritans. As our Savior said; Salvation is of the Jews, John. 4.22. Thus as at the Barre, truth is often wronged by an ill pleader, so religion is scandal'd by an ill professor. The Jewes called them the sons of Abraham: yet they wanted faith, which was the most glorious grace of Abraham. So many style themselves the children of God, yet have not so much holiness as should make them in any respect like their father.

Matth. 5.6. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father in heaven. Shall that which should lighten others to heaven, be it self darkened? As Naaman said, 2 King. 5.11. I thought that he would come and do something; strike his hand on the sore, &c. So Expectavimus opera, nil manifestum nisi verba: we look for deeds, but behold nothing but words. Sanctum dico, profanum video: to mine ears he is a Saint, to mine eyes a devil. The King sends an Ambassador to magnify his state in a foreign country, and he to contract something to himself, by penurious and dishonorable courses, brings his Sovereignes Majesticke worth into question. When God put the Sun into heaven, he had him shine there: when he placeth a Christian in his lower or be, he imposeth upon him an actual remonstrance of that which he meant him. Every Christian $\langle \diamond \rangle$ a Lamp that should shine to God's glory: all sins damp the light, continu'd wickedness puts it out: and then darkness internal must unto darkness eternal.

Solomon says, A wicked son is a grief to his father, and a shame to his mother. If a man nourish the son of a stranger, and he prove rebellious, the sorrow sits as a sore from his heart, as the offender is from his blood. When his own son degenerates, the shame redounds to himself. If we belong to God's family, let us show what house we come of, not only by our liverie, but by our living. How do the devil and his limbs triumph at the falls of professors? the Saints are reproached, the truth disgraced, and religion it self scandalised: this is to shame our father. The blame shall be laid on the religion, whereas it is because men are not enough religious. Yea, our mother suffers for us, the Church is dishonored: and if any one protestant could be found a traitor, Rome would justify her many thousand treasons by that singular exprobration. His life is bad, therefore his doctrine is false, I confess, is a harsh non sequitur: yet will the world so conclude it: and it is a thousand times better that our good lives should prevent it, than afterwards be driven by our arguments to disprove it. We are but sorry friends to God, that give advantage against him to his enemies. We beseech him to honor us in heaven, and he forbids us to dishonor him upon earth: how should men look to be advanced, by that truth they have disgraced! Preserve we it from malediction of men, and it shall preserve us from the malediction of God: let us vindicate the truth from present blasphemy, and the truth shall deliver us from everlasting misery, through him that is Truth and life, Jesus Christ.

To conclude; the Truth is not the less glorious indeed, but in the worlds estimation. It lies not in the power of men, or malice of devils, to disgrace the truth: for it shall shine glorious, when heaven and earth perish, and all her maligners subjected under her conquering feet, it is of the nature that God himself is; whose glory is not capable of any augmentation, nor passive of any diminution. He is said to be dishonored by our sins; to be magnified and glorified by our good works But let our works be good or evil, still thou continuest holy. O thou worship of Israel, whether the Turks despise Jesus, or the Christians adore him; still he abides, The same yesterday, and today, and forever. Such is the immutability of truth: the praise of it make it not greater, the opposers make it not less. As the splendor of the Sun is not enlarged by them that bless it, nor eclipsed by them that hate it. That thing which may be extended, may also be contracted: if it admit addition, it may suffer diminution: God and his Truth are liable to neither. Indeed the blessed virgin sung, Luk. 1.46. my soul doth magnify the Lord. This word may naturally seem to signify, magnum facere, to make great: but cannot there so be understood. God is so immense, that nothing can be added to him, nor taken from him. The may be multiplied, the earth swollen bigger, the heavens stretched out, hell enlarged: but God is ever the same. There is nothing greater or more than Infinite. In himself he is neither magnified, nor vilefied, but in respect of others. When we blaspheme his name, we do what we can vilem reddere, to lessen his greatness: when we praise his name, we do what we can magnum facere, to augment his greatness. Because the former teacheth others to contemn him, the latter to admire him. So magnificare is only magnum significare: to magnify him, is to express him great let men be won by your good works, to glorify God, 1. Pet. 12. qui malè Domino, ipse minuitur: qui benedicit, augetur. Aug. Thy contempt of the truth may not it worse; but thyself: thy advancing it makes not it greater, but thyself better. Therefore for Mary's giving her soul to magnify God, God doth magnify her self, Luk. 1.49. He that is mighty, hath magnified me. It is not we that make free the Truth, but the truth that makes us free, John 8.32. The truth shall make you free. When we profess it with our lips, and confess it in our lives, the truth is not beholding to us, but we are beholding to it, that our testimony may be accepted. Our grace is the Lord's glory: the more we are amended, the more he is commended. Thus we may cause the truth to appear greater in us, though it cannot be made greater by us.

So contrarily, by the wickedness of their conversation, whose profession promiseth most holiness; the truth appears more inglorious to others, is no whit less glorious in it self. The truth is great and will prevail; and how big soever they look that blaspheme it, yet still wisdom is justified of her children. The Lord will always keep some Defenders on foot, that shall glorify the truth: it shall be strong enough in those weak and single adherences, to lay all the enemies on the ground. What hope was there of this event in Martin Luther, when he disliked only one point of Popery: the base prostitutions of indulgences in Germany? yet will that God (who glorifies his own power in the disability of his Instruments) by one man vindicate the truth from the universal blasphemies of those apostate tyrants. As Beza wrote of him, not without admiration.

Viribus illa suis, fraudibus iste suis.

Quanto illâ major Lutherus, major et isto;

Illam istumque uno qui domuit calamo!

Rome overcame the world by her power, the Pope overcame Rome by his cunning; and Luther overcame them both by his pen. If we now shall wound that truth by our sins, which God hath sent to save our souls, no wonder if we perish by her forsaking us, that have lost ourselves by forsaking her, no, let us keep her, and keep her from unjust aspersions: let us bear her in our hearts: wear her in our lips, and rear her up in our lives that others may see, and our own consciences feel, we are the friends of truth. She hath made that proffer to the Romanists, that Paul did once to the Jews, Act. 13.46. The Truth hath been first spoken to you: but seeing you put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life; loe, I turn unto others. Hither she is come, and by the mercy of God hath long dwelt; let us now leave off to offend her, lest she fly to others that will give her more honor and better entertainment. Woe were it to us, if the kingdom of GOD should be taken from us, and given to a nation that would bring forth the fruits thereof. Matth. 21.42. No, Lord give us hearts to love thy truth, that thy truth may love us: let her dwell with us while we live here, and let us dwell with her in heaven forever.

VERSE 3. For through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you, whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation doth not slumber.

The Apostle in this verse makes a continuation of their sins, and a declaration of their plagues. They extend the thread of their mischief very long, till hell fire burn it off: and then they shall find that they have spun a fair thread. They broach Heresies, corrupt multitudes, sell souls, as Merchants do their wares; cozen men's consciences, color foul natures with fair words, blaspheme the Gospel, deny JESUS CHRIST; oh how constant and long-winded are they in their wickedness! But there is a judgment, an unsleeping judgment; a damnation that wakes while they slumber, and shall at last take them napping. The root of their noxious intentions is covetousness; that make them Merchants, they traffic in the bargain of souls; to buy them, not for CHRIST, but from Christ. Being once cunning merchants, they get smooth tongues, milking language: and like practitioners in that legal theeverie; embrace men in their arms, and laugh in their faces, while they pick their purses.

Their heart, tongue, and hand are employed in this project; all have their distinct offices, and they accomplish their duties. The heart dictates to the tongue, the tongue prepares the way for the hand. Their hearts covet, their tongues flatter, their hands traffic. They covet your goods, they flatter your sins, they sell your souls. The root is covetousness, the branches feigned words, the fruit merchandise of men: and there follows the axe of Judgment to hew them down, and the fire of damnation to burn them.

In this description of false teachers consider generally:

Their

- Prodition; Through covetousness, &c.
- Perdition; Their judgment, &c.

In their prodition or treachery against the Church, observe that the metaphor of merchandizing is used; wherein examine four concurrences.

The

- Traders, False prophets.
- Wares; You.
- Ground of Trafficke, Covetousness.
- Means of utterance, Fained words.

In their perdition or ruin, consider:

The

- Severity of it: Judgment and damnation.
- Vicinitie of it; Lingers not, slumbers not.

First, let me spend a little time upon the general similitude (Merchandizing) here used by the Holy Ghost. The calling of a Merchant is of great antiquity, and necessary use: the state of the world cannot well stand without it. Non omnis fert omnia tellus: our northerne parts have no wine for the Sacrament; Meshek King of Moah was a Lord of sheep, Hiram had store of timber, Ophir was famous for gold, Chittim for Ivorie, Basan for Okes, Lebanon for Cedars: therefore there must be a path from Egypt to Ashur. Merchants are the feet of the world, whereby remote and distant countries meet together. Yet it is a dangerous profession, not only for wrack of life and goods, but also for wrack of conscience: which is not always made in their ships abroad, but too commonly in their shops at home. There be the quicksands of nimble fraud, and the rocks of perjury. Gaine is a busy temptation, and they can neither use measures nor balances, but the devil is at one end to do some office. The quest of wealth is dangerous: Per bella quaerere, flagitium: per maria, periculum: per falsitatem, opprobrium: per agriculturam, vero licitum: to seed it by war is injury, by falsehood ignominy, by sea danger, by husbandry honest and safe. I will not say with Chrysostom; Tu qui Christianus es, fuge forum; ut nec facias, nec patiaris fraudem: Come not near the market, for fear of deceiving, or being deceived.

It is a lawful calling, if it be lawfully used. No man is bound to stay at home: he may visit foreign countries, if either authority or necessity send him forth. A calling is a good warrant, and it cannot want danger to go unsent. But two things are to be weighed; who must go, and whither. Who; not a feeble and ungrounded Christian. Religion hath in it all statures, all strengths; children and men. Let a child or a fool be turned loose into the Apothecaries shop, that gallipot which looks fairest, shall soonest have their fingers, though there be poison in it. He that is unsettled, endangers his own infection, he had need be a resolute Caleb, that goes to view the land of the Canaanites. Whither; not a place of enforced blindness, and compulsion to idolatry: but where holy profession is free. Is there no traie allowed with Heretics? Yes, but not with heresies. We may converse with men not with idolatries: civilly, not in religion: deal with them in the business of commerce, not communicate with them in their superstitious services. How hateful is a Bimmonite, pretending an upright heart in a prostrate body! Trade with their persons, not with their vices: traffic is allowed, not amity; not friendship, but peace.

All company with unbelievers or misbelievers is not condemned. We find a Lot in Sodom, Israel with the Egyptians, Abraham and Isaac with their Abimelechs; roses among thorns, and pearls in mud; and Jesus Christ among Publicans and sinners. So neither we be infected, nor the name of the LORD wronged; to converse with them, that we may convert them, is a holy course. But still we must be among them as strangers: to pass through an infected place is one thing, to dwell in it another. The earth is the LORD'S, and men are his: wheresoever GOD shall find the merchant, let him be sure to find GOD in every place.

Howsoever, it is a profession not without great danger of iniquity, it is a hard thing to keep sin out of trading. A Merchant shall hardly keep himself from doing wrong? and the very name of it doth in the common dialect Male audire, sound unhappily: when to be a deceiver is said in a phrase to play the Merchant. Nor is the suspicion of it without all probable ground; for the world hath had trades-men in a continual jealousy. I do not derive merchants from so wicked a patron as Mercury; Expertos furandi homines, hac imbuit art Mercurius; says the verse. But certainly our Savior would have found another name for buyers and sellers in the Temple, than Thieves; if to buy and sell had been of so clear and innocent a consequence. But our customers (say they) are either acquaintance or strangers. If acquaintance, they come in love, and our affections keeps us from deceiving them. If strangers, we lose our trade in losing our credit, if we deceive them. But alas, what do men talk of acquaintance and love, where coveteousnesse admits of no friend but gain? And for strangers, they are soon forgotten; you think never to meet again, till you meet in heaven, or meet in hell, desire of profit in over-prizing, pride of wit in over-reaching; these are the principles of brokery, that foul the fairest merchandise.

Such a conceit in a Pasquil I have read, where bringing in the states of the world, he appropriates cussenage to the merchant. He placeth together Charles the fifth and the Pope reconciled. To them comes kneeling a Husbandman, saying, I feed you two. To them a Merchant; I cozen you three. To them a Lawyer; I rob you four. To them a Physician, I kill you five. To them a Divine; I absolute you six. But of all sorts of merchants, two especially would be whipt out of the State; Merchants of time and Temple. Such as fell time, which is God's fee-simple: and such as sell Tythes, which is Christ inheritance. For us, let us only be mercants of Christ: the kingdom of heaven belongs to such a Merchant, as will sell all he hath to purchase it. Of all purchases, let us buy Jesus. Vilem se vult aestimari Christus, ut ab omnibus ematur. Be thou never so poor, Christ will sell himself unto thy soul.

1 The Trades-men or Merchants are False Teachers. Christ came into the world to buy souls, and he paid a dear price for them: not silver and gold, and such corruptible things: but the dear blood of his immaculate heart. All his Ministers level their courses at the same end, to buy souls for Christ. The price they pay for them, is their labor, vigilancy, prayers. They break their sleeps, spend their spirits, consume their bodies; suffer infamy, poverty, misery; and yet think all nothing so they may purchase one soul. No Usurer was so gripple and pinching for moneys, as Paul was for souls. He had a bank in every place; in Macedonia, Antioch, Ephesus. 1 Cor. 16.8. I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost. Why? Because a great door and effectual is opened unto me: there is a market of souls. I must to Jerusalem: Why? to purchase souls. After these, he takes God to witness, he did greatly long in the bowels of Jesus Christ. We have a Depositum with God, God a Depositum with us. Our Depositum with him is our own soul. I know he will keep that I have committed to him. There is laid up for me a crown of righteousness. His Depositum with us is the souls entrusted to our charge. If the depository do not return what he may, he is the son of death. Take heed to the flock whereof the HOLY GHOST hath made you overseers, to feed the Church of God which he hath bought with his own blood. The whole verse is a purchase, you shall see the good Ministers part in it. The seller is God, the buyer CHRIST, the thing sold and bought, the Church; the price paid, Blood; the great Steward of this purchase is the Holy Ghost: the overseers, and lookers to it, are Ministers and Pastors. Some are two lasie, not Tendentes sed tondentes: others too busy, contr•tendentes: good Pastors are superintendentes, and good hearers attendants.

God doth not impose on us a purchasing price, that is for Christ: nor a converting power, that is for the holy Ghost: no more than one man can make another; creation is for himself. Paul says not Plus profui omnibus, I have profited more than all: but Plus laboravi omnibus, I have labored more than they all. God judgeth us not by the souls we have converted, but by the pains we have taken. He will not call us to account for his own work, which is to convert souls. A great Patron who is now gone some whether, was wont to say when a Minister petitioned for a living. Can he make the drunkard sober, the covetous man liberal, the malicious charitable, then he shall have it freely; else not. But if God should give us no reward, unless we converted you, woe were to us. We would have cured Babel, but she would not be cured. We can so far testify; we would have saved you, but you will not. Ask your souls; Who hath believed our saying? Still we preach, and still you continue the same. Nature is bountiful though men slight it. Flowers grow though nobody gather them, rivers run, springs fill welles though none drink of them, we do good, though we be neglected. Indeed our preaching something shortens the horns of sin: though we cannot dissuade men from swearing, yet we get them to forbear it at the Church, in holy services.

Thus we desire to buy you for Christ, these seek to sell you from Christ. The Gospel speaks still of Christ's buying; ye are bought with a price. To sell that he bought, is to cross the proceedings of Christ. Venditor hominis occidendus; it was God's law. If any steal an Israelite, and sell or make merchandise of him, that thief shall die: though he sold but his body: what shall become of them that sell his soul and that not to man, but to Satan? God complains by the Prophet verdunt populum meum; as the brethren sold Joseph to the Ishmaelites: little did those merchants know what a treasure they had bought. As Judas sold Christ to the Jews for; o pieces; poorly did he value the peni-worth. Thus they sell men to sin, little esteeming the price that a soul cost. The prodigal selling out his inheritance by parcels; now a part and then a part: a friend told him that he never knew the price of it; his progenitors paid dearly for it. His lands being gone, he sold his goods; being asked what he would do at the last; answered; I will sell myself. When they have sold you, they will sell themselves after you: as Judas having betrayed his master, betrayed himself. They shall pay dearly, for that they sold basely. When he had not to pay, his Lord commanded him to be sold, his wife and children, and all that he had, and payment to be made. His principal Jewels must be sold for satisfaction. Haply the wicked would part with his wife and children without pity, if he might so scape himself: nay, himself also must be sold, that the Justice of God may be satisfied.

2 The wares, you; your estates, your liberties, your lives, your souls. They set up a mark of holy things, and with their impostures fill their purses. As S••• Magus so wrought upon the mad Samaritans, that by selling them to the Devil he stuffed his coffers with the treasures of blood. And mark his scholar so bewitched the noble women, that they sold their husbands to buy their sorrows; as Ire•• writes. Of this branne are the Romish merchants, whom we may see in this Text as pointed out by the Apostles finger. Their main doctrines are points of merchandise: wherein the Devil is beholding to them; for they are content to enrich hi• with souls, to enrich themselves with moneys. They enlarge his dominion in hell, to extend their own possession on earth. What is their auricular confession but a trick of merchandise? A man must confess all his sins, or, have none of them pardoned: well, he hath disgorged all the crudities of his stomach, what then? Then must he make satisfaction according to their prescription. You are content to buy out a pardon: yes, what must I pay for it? you shall give such a sum of money to such a Church; so much land to such a College: such a pension to that Fryerie. Here is a cunning traffic, a market made to purpose: thus they increase their revenues through all Europe. Their distinction between the fact and punishment, is a merchants doctrine: the fact may be remitted, the punishment retained, what then? O here creeps in Purgatory, a milder fire than that of hell, to eat out the penalty hereafter; what profit's this? Yes the Pope is Lord of Purgatory, he keeps the keys, which he will never turn without a round fee. Indulgent he is to them that will pay, either for merits of others, or masses of their own. This painted fire in his parlor, maintains the material fire in his kitchen. Thus are the people sold, for who would not empty his purse to escape that burning? Yea, if he be rich, and have any charity, he will pay the fees for all his friends, and release them out of prison. Still the Priests laugh, how for maintaining a jest, they get money in good earnest.

Their forbidding of marriage to many degrees of men, is a pretty trade of merchandise. When they on purpose forbid them, that they may dispense with them. So still the more prohibitions, the more dispensations; and the more dispensations, the more accumulations of treasure. The truth is; Policy hath quite eaten up their religion; and to make themselves great, they care not for making themselves or any other man, good. Roma dat omnibus omnia dantibus. The foundation of the Popedom was laid in pride, the building set up with rapacitie, and now it is kept in reparation with tyranny. The Pope is Pontifex Maximus; si non doctrinâ, tamen pecuniâ maximus. Paul says, I have coveted no man's silver or gold: but with them, no Penny, no Paternoster: they covet your gold more than yourselves. Paul says, we seek (◊) yours, but you: they seek not you, but yours. They sell men's estates to beggary, their freedom to slavery, their lives to treachery, their souls to danger of perdition.

They sell you.] An evil Pastor may sell his flock three ways; by flattery, by heresy, by silence.

1 By flattery; he that encourageth a man in his errors, sells him for his own gain. Magnus laudator, magnus adulator. These are they that sew pillows, where they should quilt thorns: that proclaim peace instead of war; that skin ulcers with lenitives; and say omniabene, when God sees and says, All is stark naught. There is a faithful zeal required in ministers, but it hath many hindrances. Such are affection; when Parents (not unlike Zaledicus) put out one of their own eyes, that they may not see their children's faults. Corruption, when they are guilty of the same sins. The people argue thus; such a Preacher taxeth many sins bitterly, but you never heard him find fault with usury; therefore certainly it is lawful. Fear of great men; who like mules kick when they should suck. Bashfulness; which is in a woman a great virtue, in a Preacher a great vice. Now this boldness must not be without meekness. If a man be fallen, restore him with the spirit of meekness. The original implies; put him gently into joint again. Some are over-bold; that send much talk out of their mouths, before discretion come unto their heads. Nihil ignorantia verbosius. A fools voice is known by multitude of words. Impudent speakers are like the gaping oysters; when you open them: either they stink, or there is nothing in them. Qui dicit se nescire quod scit, ingratus est: qui scit se scire quod nescit, temerarius est. He that professeth ignorance, and hath knowledge, is culpable of ingratitude: he that professeth knowledge, and is ignorant, is guilty of a proud rashness. There is a difference between a dumb dog, and a barking cur.

Many have too cowardly spirits, a John the Baptist were now a great miracle. To do well, and hear ill, is the fate of greatness: but to do ill, and hear well, is the fault of greatness. Envy follows upon Justice; therefore often doing well is made to hear ill. But flattery waits upon unrighteousness; therefore doing ill is made to hear well. Tell my people their sins: there is no greater contradiction to that charge, then to conceal men from themselves; or in a false glass to show them their own faces. He that forbears to tell the people their sins, doth not forbear to sell their souls. I could say something to them that control the freedom of Ministers. Prophesy no more at Bethel. And indeed greatness carries too strict a hand over some; that they are fain to run at their stirrups, and come in at the least rebuke. They are mussled for barking, and dare not quest; but like silent setters, hear, and see, and keep counsel. This is miserable, when the Preacher must stoop at the Pulpit door, to take measure of the people's feet.

2 By Heresy; broaching schisms and factions, and erroneous opinions: as it were feeding the people with bones, or rather with poisons, instead of wholesome meat. The Apostle speaks of such, not with malice and contempt, but with sorrow and tears: I tell you of them weeping. They so fill their hearers heads with crotchets and scruples, that they run about like franticks, and cry down all plain-ness with their divisions. He that dissolves your union, and breaks your peace, do what he can to sell your souls.

3 By silence. The advocate that ought to plead, betrays the cause by his voluntary silence. The watchman that doth not ring the alarm bell at the approach of danger, betrays the City to the enemy. If the Minister hold his peace, when he sees Satan in the market bargaining for souls; he doth as it were make merchandise of them, and take money for them. I grant that as Demosthenes had a great see for his silence in a cause, so many have gotten preferments by rarity or rather nullity of Sermons. I envy not their purchase, nor desire a partnership in their merchandise. The Lord keep me from selling that by holding my peace, which he bought by dying on the Cross. I will sell any riches to buy a soul, I will never sel a soul to buy riches.

1 They sell you.] Perhaps they bought you first, may they not then sell you? If they bought you dear, would you have them sell you cheap? vendere j... potest, emerat ill prius. One might buy a benefice haply of some unsanctified Patron, (for no hallowed man will sell hallowed things) and will that merchant live by the loss? But to buy is Simony, to sell is Sacrilege. Christians are the Lord's proprieties, sanctified and set a part from the world, for himself. He that sells them, is guilty in some proportion of Judas his merchandise, when he sold CHRIST himself. He went to the chief Priests, and said, what will you give me &c. First, against the custom of the market, he did not tarry in his shop or stall, til customers came to cheapen and buy: but he went to them, like a pedlar that had no standing; he sought chapmen, exposing his wares; quite contrary to the reason of modesty, which observes that proffered ware stinks. Thus do these merchants, keep no markets nor ware-houses in public, but run up and down to get trading for souls. Quaerunt emptores: as their master, that Seekes whom he may devour. Many a cursed Patron and pattern of Atheism, holds a Benefice vacant in his hands, till he hath sounded many chapmen with a Who gives more? And then if Bala... Ass can but dung him silver enough, he will sell him all the souls of the Parish, yea, they are worse than Judas: he came to the Priests with a quantum dabitis, he set no price on his commodity, but left it to the buyer: not, thus much you shall give for him, or not have him; but give what what you think good, make your own match. But these Patrons set a precise rate on their livings. Thus much you, shall give: it is worth a hundred pound a year, and I will have three years purchase for it; and yet say that I use you kindly: for such and such have taken $\langle \diamond \rangle$, seven, nine years purchase for their mere donations. Yea they are craftier merchants than Judas: for it is probable that he had neither ready money, nor good assurance: but these will be sure of their moneys before hand, or, else a good pa...e. And let the best Preacher in the Land come at such a season; Si nihil attuleris, God be with you, Homer.

2 Thus are the poor souls that CHRIST died for, sold into the hands of ignorance or impiety: for neither learned nor honest men will be the buyer of sacred things. But when Judas is the patron, Simon Magus must be the priest. Yea Judas is overdone by these Merchants: he sold CHRIST but once, and thought that once too much: these sell him often, over and over again. As one of them thanked God, that he had turned over three Incumbents in one benefice for his time; but he was a Popish one, as it is said. Now the chapman that buys this, purposeth to sell it again and to make a commodity of the sheep's wool, whatsoever become of themselves. Like the Wolf, who sucks the ewe, while she is a little one, and devours her when he is grown a great one. Nutritus per me, sed tandem saeviet in me. But let this be spoken to the horror of their consciences, that make merchandise of the Churches endowments. Such a patron shall find it hard enough to answer for his own soul: but to have the blood of so many souls required at his hands, it is a question when he comes to hell, whether Judas himself will change torments with him. It is horrible and would make any heart shudder and tremble to think, that poor people bought and sold on earth, should lie blended in torments with their Patrons and Priests; cursing the one for selling, the other for buying their souls.

They sell you.] You are private persons perhaps, and this Text concerns not you. Yes, strongly in another sense. Beloved, we sell not you, but you sell us: the Pastor doth not make merchandise of the flock, but the flock of the Pastor. Our hand is against every man, and every man's hand is against us: our hand is against your sins, and your hand is against our livings. There is no fraud or cussenage that less troubleth your consciences, than that whereby you rob the Church: yea this Sacrilege is held an action of Justice. While you had leaden Priests, you paid golden tithes and were than persuaded, that blasphemy and drunkenness were tolerable sins in respect of sacrilege. But now those that in your own consciences teach you the true way to blessedness, you will be sure to make exemplary subjects of poverty and miserableness. You were then glad to lick up the dust that fell from their feet (no whit beautiful:) we are glad to pick up the crumes that fall from your superfluous tables. It is the pride of this sacrilegious city, that the Minister be always the poorest man in the parish.

I do not think it a curse upon us, (as it was upon Eli's house: to beg a Priests office for necessity sake; that they might eat a piece of bread) for we have learned to want: and it is a small matter to fast a day, that we may feast the whole year, in heaven forever. But it is a curse upon yourselves, of your own begetting: that you may perish in your incorrigible sins; while the poor Minister must not dare to reprove his rich benefactor: if he do, he is sure the next quarter to lose his benevolence. Luther's observation is too true; so soon as the Gospel revived, money grew dead. Ministers shall not be both wealthy and faithful: rich and not true, or true and not rich; both together were a miracle.

It is Satan's policy, that they who maintain the truth; should not have to maintain themselves. I know that some Divines, transported with God knows what, have refused the positive and unquestionable rites of the Church, to feed upon arbitrary contributions wherein they are more foolish than those Friars, that have made themselves voluntary beggars. I know that they would retract it now, and shut the door when the steed is stolen. Repenting too late that they have betrayed the LORD'S Inheritance into the hands of impious tyrants: who laugh at the poor Minister, when he comes to beg a straw of his own sheaf. this fanatical opinion is not quite dead, we have had such transportive furies amongst us; who would persuade all Preachers to live upon benevolences; in confidence of their own merits, and popular approbation: for so they hope the biggest share would fall to themselves. But if we appeal, as Bishop Grostead did from Pope Adrian private, to Pope Adrian public: or as another, from his passion as Clement, to his Holiness as Peter: so from them then out of their wits, to them now come again to themselves: we shall find it concluded, that it is better for Christ to keep his inheritance in his own hands, than to stand at their curtesies: who had rather there were no Gospel nor Preacher in the world, than that their Heir should want a Parsonage.

That the Altar should have maintenance for her servants; none but those w^o would give sin a passport to offend, can deny. Let him that is taught in the w^os communicate unto him that teacheth in all his goods. To go close home to that place or, to bring that place close home to your consciences; would appear harsh to the e times. If any man does not communicate, God is not mocked: you see how it fall^e and I fear it falls heavy on many amongst us. Make him, not them: you hear ^{ny}, one is your Pastor; make Him partaker. Some will give little to their o^e Minister, but somewhat to another of their own humor. He can tickle their he^o with crotchets, bring into suspicion the integrity of Church Government, discre^o their poor Pastor. I will tell you one mark of a Fox though a Puritan, yet a P^ritan-fox: such a one as disgraceth your own minister, that he might get you $\langle \diamond \rangle$ heed him, and feed him. If he were a Paul, he would never suffer the to do Pe^o any wrong. If he were a good Teacher, he would never teach thee to injure thy own Minister. Let him communicate. Pastors have tithes, that they may have a fellow-feeling of the people's loss, and fellow-comfort in their increase. Th^e the Priest so well as the merchant might pray to God in a storm, and praise him iⁿ a calm: both alike depending on God's providence. I know they should do so howsoever, but we are men not Angels: the wisdom of God thought it fit by a portion to encourage us.

I know that nothing is more enviously grudged, than the livings of our Clergy. The Gentry hath gotten near upon three parts of the spiritual maintenance, and left the Church but one quarter: and yet they could eat her with salt for having so much. The Levites under the Law, besides their Tythes, Offerings, First-fruit^s, Sacrifices, Vowes; had 48. walled Cities, with large Sub-urbes for their Catt^l, large glebes to plant and sow in; when as their whole Land was not so big a^s England. Now men think it arbitrary; at their choice whether they will give the Minister anything or not. You shall have a civil libertine give a Commissary more for a license to eat flesh in lent; than to his Pastor for feeding his soul all the year. But thou sayest, I give him so much as the Law allows: but the Law must needs leave something to the liberty of thy conscience, to be answered in a higher Court. Wilt thou perform no more duties to God or man, than human Law can ex^ort from thee? If we should preach to you no more Sabbath days in a year, than the Law doth exact at your hands; you would think we dealt injuriously with you. Who feedeth a flock, and receives none of the milk? You partake Preachers goods, and shall not they partake your goods? You must not only give an ear, but an earering: not only put on their wedding Garment, but also give them garments to put on. You have read how villainously the Ammonites entreated David's messengers cutting off their garments, &c. We are Messengers of the Son of David, but $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Son of David send us not to such Ammonites, as will do us no more good, thaⁿ stripping us of all we have. Nehemiah complained, that in his time, the Levites fo^r want of maintenance, were fain to leave the Temple, and follow the plough. Luther says, this was the cause why the Clergy invented such points of superstition, as were advantageous to them: Prayer for the dead, Indulgences, &c. This was not for the people's souls, but for the Priests bodies: not for Piety, but for the belly. As Ahasuerus said of Haman; will he force the Queen before my face? So may Christ say of these Sacrilegers; Will they force my Church before my face? If the buyers and sellers in the Temple deserved whipping; certainly the buyers and sellers of the Temple deserve hanging.

Who knows whether they therefore scape con•ction here, that they may have the greater damnation hereafter!

Men would have fire kept in the Sanctuary, but allow no fuel: they would have the lamp burn without oil. To take away the provant from the Army, is 〈◇〉 betray it to the enemy. In darkness they did strain it, now they restrain it. •he world thinks we can live like John the Baptist, by miracle; who was in his diet, •abite, carriage, indeed a miracle. Liceat dicere miraculum fuit,quamvis miraculum •cit. Offer to God, saith the Psalmist: instead of this Offerre, this common course is •ferre. He that will be a voluntary minister, must be content to be a necessary beg•r. So the mendicant Friar told the woman of her three sons fortunes: that •he should be a thief, another a homicide, the third a beggar. Which for a second •mes he would teach her how to prevent, or, at least so to qualefie their fates, that •ey might retain their trades without danger. He that shall be a thief, make him a •awyer: so he may steal by Law. He that shall be a homicide, make him a Physician 〈◇〉 he may be rewarded for killing. He that shall be a beggar, make him a Priest, a •yar, so he may beg by authority. God hath made their profession honorable, •e world hath made their condition contemptible. Yet they bring saving truth in •eir mouths, which the Lawyers cannot say. A Divine can say, this is true Divi•ie; a Physician can say, this is proper physic: what Lawyer can say, this is •ue Law, and I will warrant it? yet we reward the latter, and disgrace the former. •our state be questioned, we go to the Lawyer for counsel; thank and fee him. Be•g sick we send for the phycisian, credit, thank, and pay him. We send for the •riest, but neither reward, nor so much as thank him, for we hold it his duty. How •rely hath the minister the tenth of the others fee! yet we falsely say, that we pre•rre our souls, before our estates, or our bodies.

Thus you sell us; and what is the event; with the price which Sacrilege takes •r the Churches of Christ, is purchased a field of blood. A field of blood indeed, 〈◇〉 bury their own souls that thus merchandise, and many thousand innocents that •re the chaffer of their cursed bargains. The end of all these merchants always •ath been, and always shall be fearful. For Magus the father of them; he presu•ing in a public theater at Rome to fly up into heaven, caught such a fall that he •rake his legs, say some. That he who attempted to fly, was not able to walk: •t qui pennas assumpserat, plantas amiserat. Nay, this bold adventure broke his neck,•y others. Felix the Devils darling died vomiting of blood. In a word, none •at ever robbed Churches, and merchandise, holy things, to fill their own purses, •r, fulfill their own humors; but they were overtaken with some horrible judge•ent. As the Eagle that took a piece of flesh from the Altar, but a hot cole with•l that set her nest on fire. And if the rest do so perish, no good Christian will la•ent. If they be made like Oreb and Zeb, that say, Come let us take to ourselves •he houses of God in possession, we shall not mourn: yea rather, our mouth shall be filled •ith laughter, and our tongue with joy. GOD of his infinite mercy forgive Eng•ands ingratitude in this kind: and grant that the burning Lamps in our Tem•les may be supplied with sufficient oil, that the light of Israel go not •ut.

3 Through coveteousnesse.] This is the ground or motive of their traffic. It is •rue of every schism, what was said of Lucilla's faction, with a little inversion. Anger bred it, pride foster'd it, and coveteousnesse confirmed it. Here indeed, pride •halengeth the uppermost seat: it is a high and audacious conceit, which scorns to go in the common path, that begets it. Anger and impatience of contradiction disturb it: and what it cannot maintain by reason, a feminine testynesse shall outwangle. Covetousnesse binds it up with the indissoluble knots; while the sweetness of private gain (not unlike our Monopolists neglects all public good. But as it is the humility of the best judgments, to apply their studies to the confirmation of received truths: and the meekness of blessed understandings, to disaffect singularity: and the charity of Christian teachers, rather to be losers of their own, than extorters of others, or, to press and oppress the unripe grapes unwilling to yield their juice. So false hearted schismatics, to do themselves profit, undo they care not whom. Let their bodies famish, and their souls perish, so their own state may flourish: building up their Jericho in the blood of all their spiritual children.

This sin of covetousnesse is iniquity in all men, blasphemy in a Clergy man. As our doctrines are, Thus saith the Lord: so our lives should be, (if not like God, for who can match the sanctify residing in that pure essence?) yet like men of God. The titles we bear, the office we sustain, the person we present, the nearness of our calling to that absolute Integrity; are remembrancers unto us that we be not covetous. We are men of God, and Oh thou man of God flee these things: the Apostle insists there upon covetousnesse. God is a God of knowledge, and of incomprehensible holiness: therefore the Vrim and Thummim, the light of knowledge of conscience must be upon the breasts of his Aaron's. The Minister is to the people, as the body is to the shadow: if the body stoop to the earth, the shadow will be upright toward heaven. Our master is in heaven, not on earth: our doctrine is from heaven, not from earth: our directing Spirit is of heaven, not of earth: and shall our conversation cross all these, and be of earth, not in heaven?

There is no fault in a Minister like covetousnesse; because there is no sin reigning in the world like worldliness. We may spend our spirits, and preach our hearts out, to dissuade men's affections from this world, if we embrace it ourselves, they will never believe us. When a Preacher, as if he had lost all his former time spent in learning, and were now to recover it by a preposterous imitation of the hungry muck-eaters: gives over himself to that as most precious, which he bids others give over as most superfluous. Men now hearing his Sermons will think his doctrine possible to be taught: but seeing his life, they will think it impossible to be kept. What scholar is not ready to imitate his Masters exercise? There is nothing farther from heaven, nothing more unlike our maker, than worldliness. It is observable that those creatures which are nearest the earth, are most busy in hoarding: those more remote are less careful. What an abundant provision makes the Antelope, which is a creature housed in the earth! The birds of the air that fly next heaven, neither sow nor reap nor carry into the barn. How unnatural is it, that they who by their vocation are next heaven, should yet by their conversation be furthest off. How confidently doth the Apostle draw on their affections, upon their known unguiltiness of this sin? Receive us, we have wronged no man, we have defrauded no man, &c. Receive us in understanding, obedience, charity: Why? though we rebuke sin, yet we have wronged no man in his reputation. Though we preach mysteries, have corrupted no man in his conscience. Though we receive our own dues, we have defrauded no man in his state and condition. False teachers are otherwise minded; subverting whole houses, for filthy lucre's sake. As Physicians given sick men potions, that themselves may live: so all their conceptions are others' consumptions. Their mouths shall be stopped, saith the Apostle; if not with the hand of human authority, yet with the fire of hell. They are such as the Psalmist describes. Their tongues walk against heaven, therefore the people turn in unto them, and they suck they no small advantage. But he that warreth, entangleth not himself with the affairs of this life. Clericus in oppido, piscis in arido: what should a Priest do in the world's market, or a merchant in the Lord's pulpit.

This vice of coveteousnesse is an epidemical disease, the grand Cair of mischief, the metropolis of wickedness, an universal plague that hath infected all conditions of people. Therefore albeit the point here do centrally concern the Church, such as have negotiation in ecclesiastical business; yet circumstantially it fetcheth in all. One moved CHRIST to persuade his brother to a division of the Inheritance with him: and He said unto them. After he had given him his errand, he directed his speech to the whole auditory, which is said to be an innumerable multitude of people, treading one upon another. So Luk. 13.22. One said unto him, He speaketh unto them; applying and amplifying his doctrine to them all. What I say unto you, say unto all. Some sins are peculiar to some vocations, as to the Magistracy or ministry alone: other to some conditions as to the rich or poor alone: but this covetousnesse is incident to all. From the least to the greatest, everyone is given to coveteousnesse. But because most men are like bashful guests, that will fast for want of a carver; that office falls to me here: to cut everyone a morsel of this dish; which may be against his stomach, but let him well digest it, and his soul will bless me for it.

Now according to the rule of discreet and well disposed charity, let me begin home, which is the heart of my Text. In the reproof of this sin among others, God hath used to begin at his own Sanctuary. Let not us, that bid men look upward, cast our own eyes downward. They will think that we abuse them, when we call them from the world, as Elisha did the Syrian Army; This is not the way, nor is this the City: like Foxes dissuading other beasts from that booty, which were meant to make our own. God and Mammon are two contrary Cures, we cannot serve them both. Some have dispensations for cures distant many miles: but no Court of faculties can dispense with this: for they are so remote one from the other, that heaven and hell scarce exceed them. Thou man of God flee this. We find Men of the world, and Nations of this world; they seek after these things: but this (Man of God) opposeth those: Paul says not as at other times, O Timothy; but O man of God: it becomes not the men of God, to be men of the world.

Let me also reflect this point upon the Improprators of Ecclesiastical rites, before I leave the Church. Whether they be Popish, that steal away our portions, to give them to the Romish Emissaries: who suck their bloods, as they suck our souls; and laugh at them, as they laugh at us. They fat the rich epicures of Rome, and grudge Lazarus their very crumbs. Their conscience serves them, that God's Ministers should want maintenance, rather than their horse-heels shall want litter. Or whether they be Puritans, or anything, or rather nothing, (to speak most favourably of them) men without God. How impossible is it that they should not perish with that covetousness, which hath been the perishing of many souls? They will have the Tenth of their neighbors estates, let their salvation go whither it will. They will sooner lose their lives than their livings; as an Impropiator once rebelliously and traitorously spoke, when mention was made of the Kings willingesse in their restitution.

That which the bad servant spake to his good master wickedly; Thou reapest here thou didst not sow: may be charged upon them justly; do they not reap here they never sow? It is we that sow spiritual things, and they that reap our temporall things. They thrust their sickle into our harvest: making that profane, which God hath sanctified to his Ministers. Putting an Egyptian trick upon the world; to take away our straw of means, and exact our number of brick, in preaching and hospitality. We are put to labor in our ministry, to the care of getting bread for our family: while they look on us with scorn, laugh at us with contempt, and domineer over us with pride. Men dissolutely proud, inordinately avarous, unserviceably idle, are entered on the means of honest laborers. What if the Churchmen in those former times were corrupt in opinion: must their maintenance be given to those that are ten thousand times more corrupt in conversation? This were as Cominaus writes of the French King; who having a Gallant in his army that cowardly ran away; he took all his offices from him, and gave them to one that ran ten mile further than he. Mean time, that curse which every eye sees upon the redecessors before them, will continue upon themselves and their posterity after them; so long as the spoilers of JESUS CHRIST be found with them.

For the common defrauders of our poor remaining dues; as they swarm like locusts over all the Land; so their principal borough is this principal City. For men that most plainly and impudently defraud their Pastors, of all places in England commend me to London. Honest, honest pharises, you are too good to be heard; for you pay just tithes! You would be such an example of equity, that some would quickly trounce you, and teach you to be such a president. No ignorant: some would, and dare not, publicly render their legal dues according to bond of their conscience, for fear the City should punish them. They have found out busy Lawyers, to question the tenure of tithes, by what right they are due: and some are cunninger in this point, than in the fundamental point of salvation. But who examines by what right Impropiators hold the Churches maintenance! Let that case be disputed in the Court of Conscience: and if God determine on their side, we have done, much good do it them. Let God say what he will, Thou shalt pay me the Tenth; they have a trick to withhold it: but the Devil hath a trick beyond them. And howsoever they have wit to fool their innocent mother; they shall never beguile their Almighty Father; who hatheyes a flame of fire. The book whereby man's Law judgeth the Church, and the book whereby God's Law judgeth them; have infinite difference. All this obstinate opposing the truth, is for covetousness and ambition. Paul proves Melchisedech the better man, because Abraham paid him tithes. Therefore by Saint Paul's argument. Lawyers are far better men than Ministers; because men are fain to pay them the tithes, due to the Ministers. Simon Magus is now justified: Sacrilege hath a Christian patronage. And men of God look to yourselves, the Ammonites took away half your apparel before, now they have a warrant to turn you naked. Mend them O Lord, or end them: let them be converted, or confounded that hate Zion. Let them be as the grass upon the house tops, which withereth before it groweth up: whereof the mower filleth not his hand, nor he that bind• sheaves his bosom, neither do they which go by say. The blessing of the Lord ‹ϕ› upon you.

For the Patrons of Church-donations, too many of them have so locked up our livings in this hutch of covetousness, that they cannot be unskrewed without golden key. They look to the gifts of the hand, not to the gifts of the he•. One would think that Judas his halter should make them afraid of Judas his question; what will ye give me: what will you give me? Satan gave him a rope. Take heed, lest while you ask the same question, God do not suffer you to receive the same answer. That sin made Judas a thief, and it makes you no better: a• what can a thief look for but a halter? We find other merchants selling pearls, and purple, and scarlets silks and but these sell also the souls of men. Curs• merchants that traffic in the blood of souls. These bring into God's Sanctuary, instead of Levites to devise the word Gibeonites not worthy to divide wood. •t seeing they are content to venture themselves upon God's vengeance, I leave the• to their Judge.

This sin is not here confined: Covetousness in diverse others, thought it do ‹ϕ› make merchandise of men's souls, yet of their estates. Bribery in officers which is a Burning sin. Job. 15.34. It is one of those three, that are called mighty s••• Am. 5.12 They sell a man and his heritage; they are very thieves, Esa. 1.23. Why Thieves? because they Love gifts, and take bribes for the widow and fat•less. They are thieves, not for taking purses in the high way, but bribes in their chambers. Hos. 4.18. Their language is Give: and the thieves is but, D••. Now what is the difference betwixt, Give and Deliver; yet often (Give) walk• chains of gold, while (Deliver) lies in chains of iron. Evil men in the places ‹ϕ› judicature make merchandise of the poor: while they spin one cause through•• three generations. Like Surgeons that keep the wound raw, to draw out of it ‹ϕ› more money. That often the recovery of a man's right by Law, is as dear as if ‹ϕ› had bought it by purchase. Corrupt lawyers are also merchants in this trade of ••tousnesse, and selling of men. ^p Absalom's tongue is in their heads; that says to all •ents; Thy cause is good: so he stole away their hearts, and these steal their esta•s. The buyer says of a good commodity with less sin, It is naught: than these speak of a naughty cause, It is good. Let them meditate the objection of Joash; Will ye plead for Baal? But they do it out of a good mind, to fifth out the truth: yes, as Judas did, (according to the heresy of the Cainites, as Saint Augustine relates it) that betrayed Christ out of a good and honest mind, fore-seeing the infinite good that his death should bring to the world.

All oppressors are free of this company of Merchants; they also sell men. Thou fool: God lays the imputation of folly upon him that hoarded but his own abundance. Whereupon Augustine infers: if he be a fool that lays up his own goods, vos invenite illi nomen qui tollie aliena; find out a name for him that extorts other men's. What name? Eccl. 3.18. It is found; they are beasts. What only Kine? Am. 4.1. No, they are not so kind beasts: but Lions and Wolves, that live e• ripto, beasts of prey. Beasts they are and should be served like beasts; Nebuchadn•zzars destiny to be turned to grass. There is but a company of Merchants, a company of Mercers, &c. but these Merchants are not in themselves a company, because indeed they be of every company. There be personal sins, and conditional sins, and local sins, and national sins: but this covetousness is an universal sin.

We are troubled about many things, but neglect that one thing most necessary. Ociamur in quibus laborandum, laboramus in quibus ociandum. Other creatures are content with a little; Non ita mortals, quos urget habendi, Tantus amor; domibus dom•s, arvis additur arvum, monticulus monti, maribus mare, lungere mundo conantur mundum, sua dicere cuncta volentes. This sin is like a talent of lead tied to a man's heels, that utterly disable him to climb up the ladder of blessedness. Our Savior hath described eight stairs; the covetous cannot get up one step.

First, Blessed are the poor in spirit: the covetous may have a poor spirit, cannot be poor in spirit. To be poor in purse is his fear, to be poor in spirit is none of his desire. Per mare pauperium fugiens, per saxa, per ignes. Through the sea of deep policy, the rocks of stony bowels, through the fire of lust, the fire of hell, he seeks riches. Nothing humbles him to the sense of his sins, but the loss of his goods: and this so despairs him, that he will be at the charges of his own halter. Blessed are they that mourn: alas, the troling in of riches makes his heart too merry for that blessing. If Peter will weep he must go out of the Priest hall. It must be some premunire or confiscation, or such a loss that brings him to repentance. Blessed are the meek. But Avidus lucri, impatiens damni. If he lose his money, he will trouble his own heart, his own house, the whole City, and out-swear a ruffian. If his servant but break a glass, it shall be deduced out of his wages. He had rather be damned, than damnified. Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness. But his appetite stands not that way: let him glut himself on the filthy garbage of ill gotten goods, he cares not for Manna. To lap in the foul puddles of Usury, he refuseth the streams of mercy that make glad the City of God. Blessed are the merciful: but that stands not with his profession. For the penny which comes out of his purse, it is like a drop of blood from his heart. His reward must be accordingly, to have judgment without mercy Blessed are the pure in heart. what purity can you look for in a stable? There is no mischief so tetricall, but if it be covered with gold, they will swallow it. Who shall ascend into the hill of the LORD? who shall stand in his holy place? He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart. Innocens manibus ascendet, but mundus cord stabit. The covetous keeps his hands too guilty to ascend, his heart too foul to stand there. Blessed are the peacemakers: he loves peace so long as it waits upon profit: if otherwise, he hates it; and instead of a making it, will make it nothing: he hath a Lawyer for the purpose. All his dues to pay, he out-wrangles: if a debtor fall into his hands, the devil will as soon pardon a forfeit. The last step is, Blessed are they that are persecuted, for righteousness sake; this he will never endure. If it should come to that choice, that he must leave either Martha or Mary, Righteousness or riches; he loves God well but his money better. What, part with a certainty for an uncertainty? If he can keep both, well and good: if not, what ever betides, he will keep his money. It would sound terrible, to invert our Savior's terms upon him. Cursed his the covetous, for he is not poor in spirit, but proud in spirit; therefore his is the kingdom of hell. Cursed, for he never mourns for his sins, therefore shall not be comforted. Cursed, for not meek, but froward in heart: therefore he shall not inherit the co•• he so desires. Cursed, for he longs not after righteousness, but after riches, therefore shall never be satisfied. Cursed; for being unmerciful, he never shall have mercy. Cursed, for he not makes peace, but breaks peace; therefore shall be called ‹◊› Child of the Devil. for pureness of heart, and patience of hurt for Christ's sake: he is a professed enemy to them both: therefore must inherit the Curse.

4 The means of their utterance; feigned words. Heresy was never found disjoined from hypocrisy. As it is said of the liar and the thief; show me a liar, and I will show you a thief: so show me a Schismatic, and I will show you an Hypocrite. Pacis verba ferunt, et caedibus omnia miscent. Their speeches are so ambiguous and equivocal, that they seem to hold both ours, and our adversaries Tenants. Vt •li•• haereticus, aliter catholicus audiat. With heretics they are heretics, with catholikes they are catholikes. The cup of poison had need be anointed with honey, to allay the bitterness. What they cannot perform by the evidence of truth, they seek to attain by the eloquence of art. Saint Paul affirms his preaching to •ee, not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of po••. They on the contrary, come not with the demonstration of the Spirit, but with the impostures of oratory. Thus are all those Italionated Emissaries qualified, whom the grand Cacus of the western world sends abroad; being first thoroughly instructed in the cunning liegerdumaine of their Divinity. The fittest denomination and fundamental principle, is that Gaine is godliness. For their doctrine emptieth •t self from point to point into the Churches treasure. They most unjustly exchange their lead for gold, which the French lawyers account no better than robbery. Hereupon their Paternoster and Avemarie have been worthily called, the two neapolitan• thieves. They devour widows houses, and for a show make long prayers. They are thieves in that Spiritual kind of sacrilege, that do ‹ in non-Latin alphabet › , with feigned wor•• cozen men's souls. Neither doth this art of dissimulation limit and content it self with the bare narration of untruths, and suggestion of errors in the credulous adherents: but it extends to perjury; and that we call equivocation.

Thus they do not only speak vainly, but swear falsely; which is proper perjury. Morally the end doth determine natures: and that which doth precisely cross the good end, must needs be most directly opposite to the virtuous nature. The scope and purpose of an oath is for confirmation, therefore none so directly crosseth it as false swearing. Whether it testifies, falsely of things past or present, as in an oath assertory. Or, undertake things De jure vel de facto, possible without performance, as in an oath promissory. Which principles of perjury being their do•maticall positions, we have good cause to mistrust them, For by the benefit of this political invention, they can say what they will, swear what they will, agai•• knowledge, against conscience; provided that they reserve in mind the contrary. Think of this you that have an itch of travelling beyond the Alps upon you. Qu• Romae faciam? mentiri nescio. With what security can you converse with them, that pervert the formal intent of words. As if speech had been ordained for conce••meant, and not for discovery of our minds. What fruit or safety is in their society, that poison the remedy of contention; and cancel all seals of confirmation. But they that have broken their faith God, will keep no faith with us. When they had l•st the sincere truth of the Gospel, they determined on this doctrine of the Devil Nulla fides cum haereticis servanda. They can fain words, and coin distinctions, but all is their old trade of merchandise, Rev. 18.

Here the description of hypocrites; they are all words; smooth unctuous, and feigned words. Christians in the skin, devils at the coare. Like the Armenian Dragons, that have cold and squail'd bodies; yet cast fire out of their mouths. Such was that Diogenes Sinopensis; in opinion a Stoic, in conversation a Epicure, a fool in both. That Apostate Julian so wrote of himself; that he had an busy tongue but a lasy hand. Their rhetoricke is prety and their logic witty, but their practicke is naughty. They gape like sea-fishes, so wide as if they would devour the whole Ocean: rip them up, and search their intralls, and you find no water in their bellies. Crueltie that is, aperta malitia is hurtful: but hypocrisy, operta malitia is most pernicious. A Player and an hyppocrite are all one with the Greeks: hypocrites are the devils company of players. As men sometimes play in the shapes of devils, so devils play in the shapes of men. As CHRIST to deceive the devil took man upon him: so diverse to deceive man take the devil upon them. Satan's best trading is by metamorphoses and transformations. He once changed himself from an Angel of light to a devil: so now he would change himself from a devil to an Angel of light. What is true of every evil; Quanto interius, tanto deterius; holds strongest in hypocrisy. Pagans allow us peace, heretics peace, hypocrities no peace. The Churches persecution by Tyrants was bitter, by heretics more bitter, by hypocrites most bitter. There is scarce a house in the world, but it is haunted with this kind of spirits; familiars; visible and carnal devils; familiar hypocrites. Fear, and the pit, and the snare are upon thee, O Inhabitant of the earth. Either the fear of Tyrannie, or, the deep Pit of policy, or the Snare of hypocrisy, continually assault us. But as CHRIST said to his Apostles; He that receiveth you, receiveth me: so he that deceiveth you, deceiveth me. Ananias lied unto Peter, Peter tells him that he had lied to the Holy Ghost. It is well observed that many men's religion is like the adverb Quasi: which denotes a picture not a nature, an appearance rather than an existence; likeness than a true being. As it were. So the locusts are described, Rev. 9.7. As it were horses prepared to the battle, and on their heads as it were the faces of men, &c. They were not horses, but as it were horses: had not Crowns, but as it were Crowns: not faces, but as it were faces of men: not hair, but as it were hair of Women: not teeth, but as it were teeth of Lions: not breast-plates, but as it were breast-plates of iron. Their whole description runs upon Quasi, as it were: they had not tails, but as it were tayles of Scorpions: but in those tails were stings, not as it were stings, but stings indeed: the farewell of hypocrites is deadly. All their balms are Quasi, as it were balms; but their stings are pernicious indeed. They draw near to God with their lips, not with their hearts: so God's blessings may shine upon their outward estates, but it shall never come near their hearts. An hypocrite is like the Sicilian Aetna, flaming at the mouth, when it hath snow at the foot: their mouths talk hotly, but their feet walk coldly. With the Jews they cry thrice over for failing, Templum Domini; without once regarding Dominum Templi. One writes of the Onyx, that about the center it is of •n earthen color; on the circumference, azure, or sky-color. Hypocrites have a heavenly garb in the outside, but an earthly heart in the center. They think themselves so holy, that they cannot choose but be saved: but Sicut ad justos pertinet confessio peccatorum, ita ad superbos defensio meritorum, Royard. Confusion of sins be•omes the just, and defense of merits the proud. Good men give God Fructum •aborum, the fruit of their labors: hypocrites think it enough to give Fru•tum labiorum, the fruit of their lips. Four days in a week he will spend in he•ing, not one hour in a month in doing good. The Latins do not so much call •im Fallens as Falsus; more by the passive, than the active: he but thinks to deceive, he is sure to be deceived. Yet he thinks he should not so flatter himself, as to think that he can be too cunning for the devil.

As Rebels make their proclamations in the name of the King: and Pirates intending to rob Merchants, hang out the flags of other Nations; both to scandal them, and to conceal themselves. So doth hypocrites wear Christian colors, that they maybe the Devils cozeners. I would they were no worse than the nightingale; vox et praeterea nihil; nothing but voice; but they have a sweet voice, and a pestilent hand. Rome broacheth all her poison under the name of Christ: but pull of her borrowed liverie, and she is a Church apostotical, not Apostolical: not militant, malignant: not for God and for Gideon, but for Antichrist and for Babylon. Their Praelati, Pilati: Speculatores, spiculatores. Bern. The hypocrite loades Christ with many sins, therefore Christ loades him with many woes and curses. It is not enough Dicere facienda, but facere dicenda: Saul was not a Saint, because he did once prophecy: nor is everyone a believer that talks of faith. An apparent wickedness of life cannot be excused by pure language among wise men: that deceives the ignorant, and upon such a ground the simple man thought Pontius Pilate a Saint, because his name was put in the creed. Hypocrites refuse our Ministry, our congregations, our society; they scorn to be with us: but herein they do us a kindness, for we are blest in being out of their company.

Hypocrites think that they do all their villainy now unseen: but the Judge beholds, and the day of retribution shall lay them open. The just Lord doth bring his judgments to light every morning: but the unjust knoweth no shame. The unrighteous will not yet be sensible of shame, though the Lord bring his Judgments to light every morning. Still he encourageth his sin with this supposal, My master is gone into a far country. Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily; the heart of men is fully set in them to do evil. Tush, the Lord sees it not, neither doth the highest regard it. Because thou art one of those scape-goats, in whose temporary reprieve the Judge of all flesh doth but represent the necessity of his last assizes: shall not thy skin of hypocrisy be pulled over thine ears, and thy fined words be made an evidence against thy wicked deeds? When an architect proffered Livius Drusus an heathen, to build him an house free from the sight of all men he desired him rather; if he had any skill, to build it so that all men might see whatsoever he did. So clean should be our hands, and so honest our hearts; as if our bodies were transparant, and men might see through us. Howsoever, God sees here, and men shall see hereafter the shame of the wicked. Their folly shall be manifest unto all men. Now they lie, dissemble, swear, forswear, in a desperate madness: as if a malefactor should swagger at the foot of the galhouse, because there are some few rounds of a ladder between his neck and execution. Yet a little, and behold the Judge in the clouds, the only visible person in the Trinity; over a place, though not the same, yet as conspicuous as the valley of Jehoshaphat: the books all open, and the secrets of all hearts manifest. When that Sun of Justice shall appear, hypocrisy (that cold gloworme of the night) shall lose her vainglorious shining. These feigning and fawning counterfeiters, whose tongues are the tongues of mournebankes, their hands the hands of painters, and their lives the lives of players; which neither did what they said, nor said what they did; nor were in any point the same they seemed; they all must now appear in their likeness. The rotten inside shall be turned outwards, and painted sepulchers of stones shall spew out more painted sepulchers of men. Blessed souls then, in whose mouth there is found no deceit: happy Israelites, in whom there is no guile. Such let us all be, that we may be redeemed from the earth, and like pure virgins be received into the bosom of CHRIST. Wh^o as that spurious generation of Loyolists, that cozen all laws and magistrates with their bastardly doctrine of equivocation; shall be rejected from the Lamb beca^{use} guile and feigned words are found in their mouths. Our God is the God of Truth, CHRIST is the word of Truth, the Holy Ghost is the Spirit of truth; let us all be children of truth; casting out dissimulation from our habits, guile from our mouths, hypocrisy from our hearts; that we may live on Mount Zion with the Lamb of God, our glorious Jesus forever.

Whose Judgment now of a long time lingreth not, and their damnation slumber...not. This is their perdition; wherein consider the severity or extremity of it; it is Judgment, and damnation: the vicinitie or propinquitie and nearnesse of it; it lingers not, slumbers not. First for the extremity, set down in two terms; Judgment and damnation. Which howsoever some refer to one and the same thing, their eternal confusion: yet because Judgment properly and in order goes before condemnation; as the malefactor is arraigned and judged before he be executed: so I am willing to distinguish these two; Judgment into their punishment temporal, and Damnation into their punishment eternal.

The sum is this, there are certain plagues ordained for liars, and the teachers of wickedness. Be not deceived with their glorious shows, sumptuous magnificence, mountains of honors, piles of riches, victorious triumphs (as they vaunt) over the truth: for this world will not last ever with them. If you see faithful Ministers discountenanced, impoverished, persecuted: and these Impostors advanced, •upported, honored: yet totter not in your faith: their casting down, and your lif^eing up is near: neither shall they living escape Judgment, nor dead damnation. God •uffers them to riot upon his forbearance, and to grow luxurious on his mercies: but •here is a rod of Judgment made, and a caldron of damnation set a boiling for them. The Lord shall consume them with the breath of his mouth, and destroy them with the brigh^tesse of his coming. First therefore, lest any believers should stumble at their temporal prosperity, whereby they bluster and domineer in the world; they shall see •heir Judgment. And then that they may avoid them, observe the confusion that is •eady to swallow them. Numb. 16.26. Depart from the tents of these wicked men, lest •ee be consumed in all their sins. Be not involved in their sins, lest ye be dissolved with their plagues. This whole discourse I will resolve into certain extractions, observations and inferences.

1 Their judgment.] The menaces of God are not always followed with an •nfallible event: being sometimes on purpose signified, that they may be by peni^tence prevented. Consider this fearful curse for a part of God's counsel, then •olloweth an absolute ratification of it. Esa. 46.10. My counsel shall stand, and I •ill do all my pleasure. Who hath resisted his will? None can or shall do it by their •ower: if they do attempt it, be it at their peril. For hoc ipso quod contra Dei volun^tem fecerunt, de ipsis facta est voluntas Dei, Aug. Even in that they have done against •is will, his will is done upon them. None but the King of Kings hath right to •he style imperial, (I will, or I will not) without all limitation. Because his will •nd power be matches only: and when his decree hath gone before, an answerable •ccesse doth ever attend it. Therefore for the correction of those Merchants, who •old traffic without God, and resolve on voyages without his pasport: the Apo•le chargeth all human language to observe that necessary Parenthesis;If the Lord •ill. William Rufus proudly threatened, from the rocks of Wales to make a bridge •ver into Ireland. But a Prince there understanding that he asked no leave of God; •nswered, that he never feared that bridge whose foundation was not God: the Name of whom the King had omitted, in a presumptuous confidence of his own •rength.

If it be the Lord's determinate decree, this Judgment shall come upon them. But •ecause God often threatens, before he once strikes; allow it not so absolute, but that may admit an intervention of repentance. When God threatens to pull down,•ucke up, and destroy a nation; if that nation shall repent of the evil they have •one, God will repent of the evil he thought to do. But whosoever shall con•ue in this blasphemous course of disobedience, their Judgment shall hasten, and •eir damnation not linger. The consumption decreed shall overflow with righteousness.•o close up the passage or hinder the course of divine Justice, will be more impossi•e than for a man to stop the flowing of the sea with his arms, or to beat back the •htning into the clouds with his breath. The name of God shall be famous in eve•• sinners infamy. The wicked may as soon steal the book of vengeance out of God's hand, as steal themselves from the plagues written in his book: Their judgment shall come. They can no more fly the power of their Judge above them, than they could stand still if there were an earthquake under them. There is no appeal from this tribunal: no writ of error lies against this Judge, though he be both Judge and party; because he can neither be over-borne, nor overseene. It is the LORD of hosts that can muster up plagues out of the dusts of the earth: that Strong man, that will break forth in a Martial manner against his enemies.

2 For whose sake doth God execute judgment and confusion upon these false Teachers; and cut off the Instruments of sedition and error? For his own glory, and the Churches good, that they may no longer cozen men's souls with their Impostures. God hath two sorts of works; some of position, some of privation. His positive works are those of Creation, making heaven and earth; of Supportation, bearing up all things with the word of his power; of Redemption and reconciliation, God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself: of Restitution and reparation, the time of the restitution of all things. Thus he giveth, maintaineth, or bettereth the being of things. Which we now clearly read in the book of nature, more clearly in the book of grace, most clearly shall read in the book of glory. His privative works are of judgment; corruptive, destructive works; acts of desolation; destroying the annoyances of his Saints. Both these he appropriateth to himself, Deut. 32.39. I kill, and I make alive: I wound, and I heal. Now in these desolating actions of his Justice, the only end is not to mar, destroy, and deprive of being: but to further the growth of the Church; as a man roots up the weeds of his garden, that the good herbs may grow the better.Cut it down, why cumbreth it the ground? why does it take up the room where a good plant might prosper, and bring forth acceptable fruit? So that their corruptions are our generations; their desolations our consolations; their impairings our repairings: judgments upon them are creations, recreations to us. As God destroyed the Canaanites, to make room for the Israelites.God is the Judge: he putteth down one, and setteh up another. He breaketh the bow, &c. Cutteth the spear in sunder, he burneth the Chariot in the fire. Those instruments of spoil and murder; the bow that kills a far, the spear at hand, those winged Chariots, with hooks and scythes to mow down all their opposites: these doth the Lord disappoint and desolate. Those menaces against his children, and insolencies against his own Majesty, his Justice doth retail into their own bosoms. That 88 for a year, and 5th of November for a day, put us in mind of such an intended destruction, and such an intervenient desolation; as that day and year shall be forever both famous and infamous for. It is the ruin of enmity, that is the resurrection of peace: unless severity be shown to our adversaries, security cannot dwell in our streets. Our Redemption was a work of this nature: sin by the Devil, and death by sin, not only entered, but triumphed over the world as a tyrant: like Alexander; Pervenimus ad solis ortum et occasum. Now because no man hath lived and not sinned, or having sinned should have lived, or could have escaped the second death, by reason of his universal usurpation of sin: thefore there came a work of destruction between, that disappointed the work of death. For this cause the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the Devil. He rased, spoiled, unharnessed those principalities and powers; confounding our enemies, that we might be saved. So still doth he deal wi•• all the instruments of Satan; their Judgment and Damnation is hastened, that deli••rance may be to all that trust in him.

3 Though the Lord will judge these wicked persons, yet this forbids not Magistrates to execute their justice upon them. They that are called after God's o••• name, seated on his own throne, armed every way with his own authorit••, let them also bring forth Judgment, in imitation of their father. It is a cruel ⟨◇⟩ that is shown to incorrigible offenders: like water poured upon lime, that in stea•of quenching, doth enflame the furious heat of sin. Let favor be shown to •he wicked, yet he will not learn righteousness. I know that the life of man is •recious, yet is the life of the whole Church more precious. And though in •esse important things, Judges may proceed on by fair and not fast degrees: yet in •ch capital causes as endanger the whole, the expedition should be more quick and •eremptory. I will early, or in the morning, destroy all the wicked of the land. It was David's morning work, let none put it off to th'evening of their declination; as the set•ng sun makes the larger shadows. This killing preservation of notorious and insuf•enable offenders, is a discouragement to them that in the most desperate times dare •eepe a good conscience. If Popish Incendiaries may be tolerated to make merchan•ise of men's souls, and never be judged for this; what remains, but that we appeal •o a greater Court, and open our grievances to a higher Judge! no Judge dormant; •hose sentence is no dead letter, but a determinate Oracle without admission of ei•her appeal or reprieve. If they hold their peace, enlargement and deliverance shall arise ⟨◇⟩ us from another place: but they and their fathers house shall be destroyed. God shall bring •very work into judgment; every work, not one shall escape: with every secret •ought: not the work only, but even the thought, and that be it never so deeply •id up in the heart: to cut off all opinion of secrecy; so well as of impunity. Sin•ers shall hear and fear; and woeful experience shall wring from them this ac•nowledgment; that when God enters into judgment, no sinful flesh shall be ju•ified. Judgment, that rough hand-maid of heaven, remains still a virgin: nei•er power can force her, not wealth win her, nor anything in the world corrupt •er. The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance: he shall wash his •eete in the blood of the wicked. So that a man shall say, verily there is a reward for the righteous: verily, he is a God that judgeth in the earth.

4 Their judgment.] Their own: as proper to them as the Inheritance they have ought with their moneys. They forsake their own mercy: the mercy that might have been their own, to embrace vengeance which they have made their own. So as it said of dead Judas; He went into his own place: as the stone naturally inclines to the center, the proper place and home: so the wicked are never at home, and in their proper place, till they be in hell. The rod of the wicked shall not rest upon the lot of the righteous. It is Their rod, made for them; if God scourge his children $\langle \diamond \rangle$ little with it, he doth but borrow it from the immediate and natural use for which it was ordained: Their rod, Their judgment. So it is called Their cup; This is the portion and potion of their cup. If the godly be made to taste a little of the top, it is but a draught lent from their cup: But the dregs thereof the wicked shall wring out, and drink off, Psal. 75.8. Their end is damnation, such an end can come to none but themselves. Theirs, it is as surely their own, as if they already had it. He that believeth not, is condemned already: as we say of a sentenced malefactor, Mortuus in lege; he is dead in Law.

Whence infer, that sin doth naturally draw on punishment: and is like the hunder that breaks the cloud, and makes way, for the lightning of God's vengeance. Wheresoever presumption goes before, destruction follows after. When the evil servant had not to pay, his Lord commanded him to be sold, his wife and children, and all that he had, and payment to be made. The wife may be taken for concupiscence, the children for fruits of it. Or thus, Vxor stulti est stultitia; the wife of the covetous is avarice, the wife of the haughty is Pride, &c. These things are very dear to them, but they must be sold. The children of Israel committed fornication, and fell in one day three and twenty thousand. There is punishment of sin, 1. In the full measure, They fell; nothing bated of utter ruin. 2. In the full number. 23. thousand; a few examples would not serve the turn. 3. In the due time, In one day, no long forbearance. For the measure, it was not sickness, not flying before enemies, not scourging, but death; They fell: either by plague, or some other immediate Judgment: some of them were hanged up against the Sun. For number the Apostle speaks of three and twenty thousand: but (Numb. 25.9.) there is mention of one thousand more. Paul did not exceed the number; nor doth the Scripture tie it self always so precisely. It is most probable, that the Princes with their servants that were hanged up, made up the other thousand. For time, it is in one day; no space of preparation, they presently fell. Thus if adultery walk in our streets, the plague will bear it company. GOD is angry with all sin, but his wrath is most hot against universal sin: thousands fall, a whole army of men. When God rides his circuit, he will strike fearfully; with death, with general death. Universal sin will bring universal destruction: and it is his great mercy, if he do not always punish so generally. Error omnium, paucorum: all offend, some only are punished; because so it pleaseth him. There is no policy against God's judgments: Caesar Borgias is made by Machiavell, a Precedent of Policy to Princes; yet he was caught at his own trick. The escaping for a while, is no argument of exemption: God's temporal plagues are but short excursions before the main battle.

5 Their Judgment: but is it so certain theirs, that no repentance can prevent it, yes, serious repentance may avert the vengeance, if their gracious God gives the repentance. For the Apostle makes a Prophetical prediction of such Heretics, as should invade Christ's flock after his time: and threatens them with the malediction of God, if they attempt such impostures. By which if they receive warning, and lay it to heart, they may avoid the sin, and so escape the denounced Judgment. And this hath ever been the mercy of our God, that he will speak before he strike: and preach the lecture of premonition, before he pronounce the sentence of perdition. And this is a course that shall make men either preveniently thankful, or inexcusably desperate.

It is a question among Philosophers, whether it be better Praescire vel nescire mala futura; to know or not to know future evils: and this dispute is crept into the Schools Erasmus opposing the Astrologians, held all prognostications and predictions unprofitable: for if they foretold joyful news, they decrease our future pleasure: if evil tidings, they increase our present pain: the fear of danger being often more bitter than the danger it self: Pejor bello timor ipse belli. Thus Phavrit reasons; either adverse or prosperous fortunes are foretold. If they say prosperous, and those fail thee; Miser fies frustra expectando, thou art made miserable by thy vain expecting: if adverse, and those thou scapest, yet Miser fies frustra timend, thou art made miserable by thy vain fearing. Howsoever, thus wretched is a man made by a false prediction. Suppose they foretell a truth: let it be calamity; I inde ex animo miser fies, antequam a fato fias: thy own mind shall afflict thee, before fate touch thee. Let felicity be promised and come, yet here are two incommodities. First our mind will be tired with expectation: and our joy be abated before the object reach us. Again, hoping for a prosperous estate to come, we grow idle for the present. Men of an indifferent fortune having, (after the expiration of some years) a great Inheritance assured them; prodigally spend that which is, for that which shall be; yea, they spend that which shall be before it is.

But they run this argument beyond a gallop; let them take truth along with them. Whatsoever Erasmus and Favorinus have written more subtly than soundly, in this argument; it is a conclusion acknowledged by all sober men, that it is better to know a calamity before we feel it, than to feel calamity before we know it. Indeed, any unhappiness that ariseth from prescience, is only incident to a weak mind. Where there is not a well fortified reason, there expectation makes an evil greater, and a good less. But in a resolved mind, it digests an evil before it comes, and makes a future good long before present.

First, they say; evil foretold racks a man with as much torment of fear, as when it is present, it doth with torment of pain. Nay, but it rather pre-arms the well tempered mind, vel vincere vel ferre, & ferendo vincere: either to conquer or to suffer, and in suffering to conquer. He that hath already borne the burden, and overcome the extremest brunt, takes up the cross with joy: he counts it his joy to fall in a trial, and out of trouble extracts peace. When the Prophets servant saw the host of chariots compassing the city, he cried out; Alas, Master, how shall we do? Elisha answered, Fear not, there be more with us: he knew it before. When Satan thinks to scare thee with sorrows, and says as Delilah, The Philistines be upon the Sampson, there is an army against thee; answer, I fear not, my soul knew that before, and I have by prayer made my provision against them. The burden seems right, that hath been borne before.

But then they say, suppose the threatened evil comes not, then in vain thou hast disquieted thyself with a needless fear. Nay, but I have bettered my soul by a mature repentance. Nineveh was menaced, Yet forty days and it shall be destroyed. They quaked, and repented in sackcloth and ashes, turning from their wickedness; Nineveh stood still. Did they lose anything by their sorrow, fasting, humiliation? No, their conversion saved them from subversion: had they not sorrowed, they had been destroyed indeed. No man is the worse for his repentant grief: if the evil do come, it is a labor well spent: if the evil do not come, it is a labor well lost. If the body be not the worse, yet the soul is the better.

But would it not have doubled Saul's sorrow, if he had known that he was to fall into the mountains of Gilboah, and that his enemy should succeed him? Could Cliron the French martial have been so merry at the banquet, had he known his instant arrest for treason? would Julius Caesar have gone to the Senate, knowing his ruin there? These be poor exceptions against the forwarning of future evils: for, as knowing them contingent, they would have sought to prevent: so knowing them certain, they would have sought to repent. But saith Boskier, this made CHRIST himself Agelastum, kept him from laughter; the prescience of his dire future passion: he wept for other causes, but for this especially: he often spake of it, because it ran in his mind: and in the garden, he sweet blood to think of it. Grant this in part to be true: he told it to his Apostles, not for his own fear, but to show how much he loved them, that would suffer this for them: to strengthen their faith in him, and love to him; neither wept he so much for his own sorrows, as for our sins. We were more unkind and cruel to him than the thorns and nails. That which drew blood from his side, drew tears from his eyes: we were so guilty, that he could not be merry. Therefore he foretold his Disciples, that they should be sorrowful, weep and lament. As a learned Physician looks not only to the disease of his patient that afflicts him for the present, but often administers physic to prevent a future malady. Therefore he called together his Disciples, as Jacob did his sons; and told them what evils they should suffer for his names sake.

This then be the sum; Judgments forewarned comes more easily on the prepared heart. Minus Iacula feriunt quae praevidentur, Greg. The wise mariner in a calm makes all his tacklings sure and strong against a storm. The fen-man mends his banks in summer, lest his ground be drowned in winter. Howsoever these predictions may afflict the body, they benefit the soul, Therefore if the physician perceive evident reasons of approaching death in his patient, he is bound not to flatter him with hope of life: Ne dum quaerat quod suum est, perdat quod Christi est: lest seeking his own gain, he lose CHRIST'S purchase. But the conceit will exasperate his disease, and the dejection of mind hinders the recovery of body. Yield it, yet is this no reason of concealment, unless the body were more worth than the soul, a life mortal than a life immortal, the company of sinners on earth, than the communion of Saints in heaven. I have seen some such physicians, (for not seldom the physician and Divine meet in the sick chamber) that when we have been with prayers to the God of life, have neither bowed their knee, nor uncovered their head: as if the name of God were but a mockerie, and they could cure a man without him. But let not my body fall into his hands, that hath no care of his own soul: he that loves not God, will never love me. Alas, how should that potio• work health where the chief ingredient, the grace of God is left out? Or, how should the blessing of God be found, when the God of blessing is not regarded?

Indeed no man is worthy to know the time of his own dissolution: God 〈◇〉 ignota vestigia, secret steps. Thy foot-steps are not known. Though we dare 〈◇〉 pray: Lord, let me know the number of my days, that I may be certified how long I 〈◇〉 to live: yet still we pray, Deliver us from evil; especially from that evil; From sudden death good Lord deliver us. Some naturallists have affirmed that sudden dissolution is the best: and seemed to desire, (if at least they did desire in heart) so to 〈◇〉 Vbi non est spes futuri, nec dolor praeteriti, sola manet cura praesentis. They looked 〈◇〉 backward to their sins past, nor forward further than death: of that they saw a necessity, therefore wished a facility. Now the least sense is of the shortest p••• though it be violent, it is not permanent. There is no protraction of sorrows, nor extension of pains in sudden dispatching: death doth not like a tyrant keep• them long a dying, racking out life to farther days, and cutting off with pi•ing •••nesse; but quickly begins and makes an end. But let it rot in the dust with them, 〈◇〉 that suddenness be suddenly forgotten.

There is a generation of men amongst us, Christians, yea the most ardent and furious Christians, that blame our Liturgy for that prayer; From sudden death Lord deliver us. These men are so sure of heaven, that let God take them where he will and when he will, they are for him. Presumptuous men! do they sin, and would they in that sin be taken away? There is a time when the dearest Saints 〈◇〉 God had rather live than die. What profit is there in my blood, when I go down to the pit? he was sick, but at that time had no heart to die. Elisha, when he 〈◇〉 in Spirit, that the King had sent a messenger to kill him, bade them shut the 〈◇〉 and hold him fast. Sick Hezekiah wept and prayed to live. Jonah cries from the dismal prison not to die yet, but to be forborne to a longer day. These Sai• would not die then: they found some sins yet burdening their consciences, 〈◇〉 scower off which they wished the conveniency of farther time. Let me alone, that I may take comfort a little, before I go whence I shall not return. It was a violent and swift departure which David and Job deprecated: but alas, what do you compare David and Job to these men; mere dwarfes to these gyants? They have cast up their accounts as well as Paul, and are every moment prepared; their reckoning is ever ready in their pockets: they know themselves chosen, the spirit told them so, and then the elect cannot perish. It is true indeed, that not death amongst the re•, death of what kind soever, lingering or sudden, can separate true believers from Christ: yet pardon me, if I be charitably jealous of such presumers of sanctification. Do they never lie to their neighbor, never lust after forbidden flesh, never rankle another's credit with malicious report, never pamper the grome with feeding, never covet penny of another man's, are they never puffed up with a self-opinion? Suppose God strike thy proud heart in this act of sin, when thou hast not so much leas•• or sense as to say, Lord have mercy on me; goes not thy soul then to the Judgment seat without a prepared answer? We leave thy censure and sentence to him that knows thy heart: but though charity hopes a mercy inter pontem et fontem; •ter actum culpae, et ictum paenae: yet be not angry with me for praying; God keep my soul from such a venture.

There proceed from heaven lightnings, from ea•• damp, from the body palsies and apoplexies, from men those murderous engines, pistols and poinards: these make sudden riddance, and allow not the leisure and liberties of repentance.

Think ye secure wretches, that have promised your own souls to repent when you are sick: alas, the least of a thousand things can kill you, and give you ⟨◇⟩ leisure to be sick. Loe now if there be any hope, it is the extraordinary mercy of God in Jesus Christ. For us, vita est in indicium, mors est in iudicium. We have charity, God hath mercy.

To conclude, Deprecamur talem mortem, non damnamus taliter mortuum: we •ondemne not him that so dies, yet we pray against such a death. We say of death, •s David of Absalom; make speed to depart, lest he overtake us suddenly. Lord, ne•er let the sin of our souls, and the end of our lives, come so near together. Give •s grace to break off our sins by repentance, before thou break off our lives by •eath let us have time to repent, grace to our time, thy mercy to both, and the me•its of our Savior CHRIST to all: and then come Lord JESUS, come quickly. Oh it is swift when the prayers of our hearts shall usher the journey of our souls: •hen our faith hath unlocked the gates of heaven, ready for our spirits to enter: when by our comfortable declarements, we have testified our assurance of blessed•esse; left the perfume of a good conscience to sweeten our death-beds; and our •ertues and graces, like fragrant flowers to stick round about our hearse. When af•er a consolating valediction to our mourning friends, we have commended our spi•ts into the hands of JESUS CHRIST. Let the confidence of others be as bold •s it pleaseth; let my soul pray, and let them that love their souls join with me, •nd the God of mercy hear us all; From sudden death good Lord deliver us, Amen.

6 Their judgment, and their damnation.] Observe, the proportion and aptation •f their punishment to their sin. It holds in diverse analogies. 1. They denied the Lord •hat bought them, therefore the same Lord shall judge them. It is fit, ut quem fece•nt suum carnificem, inveniant suum iudicem. They made the profession of Christ color for their bloodiness, and under the counterfeit seal of his name committed •utrages: now therefore the same injured King shall sit upon them and condemn •hem. 2. They acted all their villainy in secret, therefore now it shall be laid open. •. The way of truth hath been blasphemed by them; therefore now it is fit that it be •lorified on them. 4. Before they sold men in covetousness: therefore now they •all be sold themselves in justice. GOD'S debts must be paid: and they that •ade merchandise of others are fit to be made merchandises themselves. 5. Be•re they brought in the Heresy of damnation: therefore now they shall sustain the •enaltie of damnation. 6. Before they did pull on themselves destruction volunta••lie: therefore now must father the child of their own begetting, and suffer destru•ion necessarily. 7. Their sin did hasten punishment, and make it swift: there•ore fit it should no longer tarry; it lingers not. You see with what a pro•er analogy, their sinning meets with their suffering: and makes way for •is note.

God always punisheth De condigno, sometimes De congruo. For the former, ⟨◇⟩ the School truly says, that God rewardeth his elect Supra meritum, above their •eserts: so it teacheth, that he punisheth the reprobate citra condignum, short of their •e-merits. But as he will requite anything in mercy, that will recompense a cup of cold water: so he will deny anything in justice, that will deny a cup of cold water. CHRIST'S tribunal is said to be a white throne; milk white, without any drop of injustice to alter the color, or stain the seat. Moral men have commended Justice: the Grecians placed her between Leo and Libra; courage and indifference. The Egyptians in their hieroglyphicks had the figure of a man without hands, winking with his eyes. And our emblem is as good as the rest; as the best: the picture of a man holding a balance in one hand, and a sword in the other. By the balance intending judgment, and by the sword due execution. The balance puts no difference between gold and lead, but gives them equal or unequal noise: not attributing more to the gold for the excellency of the metal; nor less the lead for the drossy baseness: but with an even hand weighs the poor man's case with the rich. It is said of the throne of David's house, that it was placed in the gate of the City towards the Sun rising. In the gate, that all might have access to it, poor and rich: for all sorts had egress and regress through the gate. Towards the sun rising; to signify that their judgments should be as clear from corruptions, and errors, as the Sun in his glorious brightness. Now he that calls upon magistrates to do justice, shall he not do it himself? Shall not the Judge of all the world do right? yes certainly; as he will crown the faithful with eternal glory above their deserts, so he will load the wicked with eternal torments according to their deserts. So that a man shall say, verily there is a reward for the righteous, verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth.
