vicissitudes, like the seasons of year; but their successions, and posterities, and genealogies, like the descents of nature, And as fast as we are weary of one, a new invention is found out; which we must embrace, cost what it will: though the price of it hinders our giving of alms, yea though it bring us to the begging of alms; yet have it we will. These be our inventions: we spend all upon them, and we know no end of them. Yet were this vanity confined to secular matters, it were more tolerable: but even in the worship of God we have our inventions too. We have itching ears; and after our own lusts heap to ourselves teachers. We fill the chappells of our ears with new Teachers, that they may fill our heads with new inventions. We are still devising tricks, opinions, and fashions, which our fathers never knew of. God charged Saul to destroy all Amalek: but he would invent a better way, which God perhaps could not think of: In frugality, he will spare some: in policy, the fat and best: and in piety, forsooth for sacrifice. Such an error was once in Peter; Be it far from thee, Lord: This shall not be unto thee: As if he had found out a better way, as he thought, than Christ could devise. These new inventions have such a taking quality, that the authors once infected with them, become pestiducts to others, and means of a vast contagion. There is enough in the first view of them to make them hated.

1. They are Errors: and what beauty can we find in Error, that we should be in love with it? Error is nothing but a wandering out of the way. They wandered in the wilderness, in a solitary way. When a traveler is bound for Jerusalem, where his Inheritance lies; is it a pleasure unto him to wander in the wilderness? It is a curse to wander in the wilderness, where there is no way. Wandering is for rogues and drunkards: The former are so taken by the Statute; for vagabonds: they are never out of their way, because they acknowledge no certain home, whither any way should bring them. For the other; They grape in the dark, and stagger like a drunken man: though they were in the way, yet it is very hard for them to go upright. We are all prone to err: some out of ignorance: Ye err, not knowing the Scriptures. Others out of malice: It is a people that do err in this heart. All out of weakness: All we like sheep have gone astray: we have turned everyone to his own way. As if the Bellweather or leading sheep takes a vagary, all the flock will follow him: So when Adam went out of the way, we all turned aside, and have wandered ever since. Nor could we ever have recovered the way again, unless the Son of God had become the Son of man, and so reduced us: For, He came to seek and to save that which was lost. Neither yet, without Him, can we hold right one moment: we cannot keep the way, except He keep us in the way. Saint Augustine seems to be very angry with his friends, that they would offer to vindicate him from all error. I myself, saith he, am able to judge both you and myself: for both I have erred, and you err in saying I have not erred, It shall never please me, to be esteemed what I am not. Such men do not love Augustine, but some other man under the name of Augustine: Si non quod sum, sed quod non sum, diligunt. For such a brag, he condemns that great author of the Roman eloquence; who gave out of himself, that he never spake that word which he wished recalled: Tearing it a speech that better became a fool than a Philosopher: And to say truth, he had great cause to recall even that word, by which he so meant to clear all the rest from any need of recalling. S^t. Augustine concludes; That of Tully does not please me; Non necesse est verbum revocare: But rather, that of Horace does grieve me; Nescit vox missa revert. To err than is very easy: In te stas, & non stas: Per te vadis, & vel erras vel cadis. An Infant that will offer to go alone, shall fall: and a blind man without his guide, will miss the way.

Why therefore should error tempt us? That which is rottenness in fruits, barrenness in the earth, darkness in the air, sickness and deformity in the body is error in the mind. Was ever any man in love with corruption in his meat, raggedness in his clothes, Leprosy in his skin, or with famine, or any uncomfornableness that is? Why then should a reasonable soul doat upon error? A man affected with error, is an heddy beast: one that will be miserable in despite of pity. The divine Word, human reason, and the direction of nature, he abhors. Admonish him, he jeeres you: show him the way, he scorns you: offer to lead him, he spurns at you. He is the only man in his own conceit, that having a shoppe without tools, can build a city without materials, cure this sick without medicines, and be a great States-man without any brains. He is his own Academie, his own Magazine; and is in all things, Sibi compendium, aliis ludibrium. One only Companion he admits, him he trusts, with him cohabites; and that is Custom. He takes his own ways, whether his fancy leads him; and thinks himself only in the right: till at last he falls into a deep bog, and there is an end of him.

Alas, that a man should buy error so dear, when he may have truth so good cheap! We only think those things costly, for which we pay money: so we complain of dear commodities, dear purchases, and dear bargains: but we never think that dear, for which we pay ourselves. That error and vanity, which stands us in no less price then our own souls, we esteem penyworth good enough: we never grudge, never stick, or hunch at this: For which if we were to pay our dwelling house, or all the coin in our purse, we would take time to think upon it; and consider well ere we bought it. Which makes it plain, that Nihil cuique se vilius: the vilest, basest, and cheapest thing we have, we hold ourselves. O that we could learn, both by the estimation of our monies, how highly to prize our souls: and by the dear valuation of our souls, how to hate errors and vanities! But as in Luther's time it was a Paradox: Iustitia causa injustitiae: a conceited righteousness was the chief cause of all unrighteousness. First, because it makes men proud; and pride is an ugly sin. Secondly, because it does not perceive it self to stand in so much need of Christ; without whom there is nothing but sin. So we may say, Prudentia causa stultitia; an opinionated wisdom is (in a manner) the sole cause of all folly: For it so transports a man with the imagination of his own knowledge, that he runs into error with confidence. And whiles he forbears to take God along with him, he is most certain to leave the truth behind him. Thus error at first creeps in at the back door, till truth be dispossessed of her old dwelling: and then he revels, domineres, and keeps open house. This deformity, that it is error, is enough to make it loathed.

2. Nefariorum: it is the Error of the wicked: this aggravates it, and makes it yet more detestable. For there may be an error of infirmity, without any notorious wickedness of life: and there may be wickedness in life, without any palpable error in Judgment: They are both bad, asunder: put them together, and they are so much the worse. There were Heretics, called the Nicolaitans; wherewith God charged the Church of Pergamos: Thou hast them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolitans, which I hate: Sprung from Nicolas, one of the seven: and their posterity, the Gnostiques, from Carpocrates: as Eusebius testifies. These held, saith Epiphanius, that only faith was necessary: and so a man did believe and embrace their positions, live how he list, he could not choose but be saved. There be some of their mind still: that think, so they forget not their Creed, they cannot miscarry. Which is as much, as if a man carrying his sword in his hand, might not be drunk at the Tavern, or stumble into a ditch. The Encratites, sprung from Latianus, fell into the other extreme. Non est curandum quid quisque credat: id tantum curandum est quid quisque faciat. So the Creed might be well enough cancelled, because a good course of life is only regarded with God: and in every sect, he that lives well, shall be saved. Which is as if a traveler should throw away his weapon, and yet never be in danger of thieves: or reject the light, and yet fear no darkness.

Nefariarum: Jerome reads it, Insapientium: which Lorinus labors modestly to reconcile: by telling us, that in the Scriptures, the fool is evertaken for the wicked man. But he should also have shown us converso; that the wicked man as always taken for the fool. But false Teachers, though they be wicked enough, yet are cunning fools. The devil is that wicked one; yet we do not use to call him fool. He is the great Patron of Seducers; and indeed he makes fools of them: but withal, he makes them wise enough, to make fools of us. It is not his foolie, but his wickedness and cunning that does us the mischief. And if his Instruments were not more Abitophels, than Nabal's, more cheats than so's, our danger were the less. But as the bristle could not draw in the gross and pitchy thread, unless way were first made for it by the naule; so these Doctrina daemoniorum, so called as they are the Inspirers and authors; and Doctrinae hominum, so termed as they are the Instruments; being so black, pitchy, and sooty as hell it self; would find no entrance into our beliefs, if they were not brought in by that cunning way of sophistication and plausiblenes. Certain Impostors, having the Statue of the king curiously carved, and composed of gold and precious gems; for their profit, melt it, and cast the same gold and Jewels into the Image of a dog: and then give out, hanc imaginem suam canis, esse Imaginem Regis. that this is the very Image of the king: because here is the same gold, the very same precious stones. So Heretics take the Scriptures, which is the word of the great king: they coin new glosses and expositions upon it; giving such strange and uncouth senses, that they force it to speak what it never meant: yet still persuade their hearers, that is it the very gold they look for; the right Scripture, word for word, weight for weight. But as we say of the former Image so changed, that it is neither the kings, nor a dogs, but rather their own that devised it: So we may say of the Scripture thus abused, that it is neither God's word, not it own self; but theirs that have corrupted it. Sed male dum recitas, incipit essetuus; says the Poet to a base repeater of his verses.

What hast thou to do to declare my Statutes, or that thou shouldest take my covenant in thy mouth? Seeing thou not only hatest it in they heart, but also pervertest it with they lips? It were good and fit that such men, before they be suffered to meddle with the Scripture, should put in sureties, that the senses they give of it shall be orthodox, and consenting with the Church. For the trusting of every man upon his single bond, to interpret any place of Scripture, is the occasion of much error: So grow they bold to utter their own fancies, and look to be believed upon their bare word: which is Dominari fidei, to be Lord's over the faith of their hearers. If Satan came to us in broad terms, charging us to renounce Christ, we should utterly defy him: the truth (he knows) we will embrace. Therefore he creeps in like a Serpent, and Superseminat errores, sows tares: that these growing together with the seeds of truth, may in time choke them. The things that were ordained for a means, whereby the Gentiles might come to know God, by Satan's illusion became occasions of their more offending him. By the visible things of the Creation, they might have understood the invisible things of the Godhead: so they might. But they fell to worship the Sun, Moon, and creatures, omitting to know their maker: so they did. Where should we know Christ, but out of the Scripture? Search the Scriptures: they testify of me. Yet as it often happens, that in the very high way, we cannot see for the dust: so upon the face of this sacred spring, the devil collects such clouds of errors; that many men do lose Christ, in the very place they are appointed to find him. Or as in dark nights, pyrates use to kindle fires, and make great lights upon the rocks and maritime coasts: whither when the seamen steer in hope of harbor, they meet with wrack and ruin: So heretics flourish with Scriptures, or at least with some flashes of it, like false lights: to which when distressed souls repair for succor, these pestilent seducers feed them with nothing but pernicious error. Fowlers by setting up a dead tree, besmeared with Lime, and dead birds upon it, as if they were all living; allure the live-birds to them, as to their friends and acquaintance, and so bring them to destruction. The application is easy; the experiment too common: Dead errors are the snares of living souls.

This is the cunning of these wicked impostors: something they will have good; to draw down the evil: the greater part shall be evil, to poison the good. Miscent recta per versis: ut ostendendo bona auditors ad se pertrabant: & exhibendo mala, latenti peste corrumpant. If Rome had not some truth, she would never be believed: if she were not full of errors, her followers could not be deceived. As the Apostle here from God, so we from the Apostle, by the commandment of God, warn you of these things; that ye fall not into the error of the wicked. It may be that you slight our speaking: but they of whom we warn you, would give much to have us hold our peace. If the truth had not some champions, error would soon over-run the field. Philip of Macedon besieging Athens, sent Legates to the city, conditioning with them; that if they would deliver into his hands ten of their Orators, such as he should choose, whom he pretended to be the disturbers of their common wealth, he would raise his siege, and be at peace with them. But Demosthenes smelt out his plot; and with the consent of the Athenians, returned him this apoloical answer. The Wolves came to treat of a league with the shepherds; and told them thus: All the feud and discord betwixt you and us, ariseth from a certain generation of dogs which you maintain amongst you: Deliver us up those dogs, and we will be good friends with you, neither will we any ways wrong you. The dogs were delivered up, the peace was concluded, the shepherds secure: but Oh the woeful massacre that was presently made amongst the poor lambes: they were all devoured, the shepherds undone; and all by parting with their dogs. If the Popish faction could once get the Ministers of the Gospel to hold their peace, or procure them to be muzzled by authority, or to be delivered over to their Wolvish cruelty; woe were to your souls. Error would then play Rex, Darkness triumph, Hell make play-day, Truth would languish, and all goodness fall flat to the Earth. As little as you now regard us, you would then miss us, and wish for us, and say, Blessed is he that cometh to us in the Name of the Lord.

3. That ye be not led away.] This touches our cobby-hold: for there may be error in men, and yet this not to extend to wickedness: there may be a wicked error in others, and yet that not extend to us; farther than to be an occasion of our tears and prayers for their recovery. But if we be led away with it, now the danger is come home to us: it nearly concerns ourselves. There is an error in judgment, and an error in practice: That in judgment persisted in, and violently defended, grows into heresy: That in practice continued and resolved upon, grows into wickedness: Either of them is a wicked error. A man may stumble and not fall: or fall, and rise again: It proves to a man's good sometimes, that he hath erred into evil. But it is better to err ten times in via pedum, than once in via morum.

The main scope of the point armeth us against vacillation and inconstancy. There be some that will Turn away their ears from the truth, unto fables: very toys will lead away fools. So greedy is our nature of change, that it will listen to any whisper of innovation: To the Papist, when he promiseth change: and what change doth he promise? You shall have the old religion again. wherein (for your comfort) you shall never understand a word, what either God speaks to you, or you must speak to God: and for variety, you shall have half a Communion for a whole one: is not this a fair exchange? To the Sectary they will listen, when he promiseth change: and what is his change? O you shall have a fine new Church-government for your old one: a Presbytery is better for you than an Hierarchy; Elders than Bishops. There be brains that are the forges of such alterations: and there be ears that drink in, and fingers that itch for such fatal projects. In the Inventors, pride and malice breeds them: because they cannot rise themselves, they would ruin all: and make it their practice to bring men to the bough though they have never a tree in their garden for the purpose, as Timon had. One calls them fit-timber out of which Politicians are to be hewn: knee-timber, which is good to make ships of, that are ordained to be tossed on the seas; but not for houses that should stand firm on the Land: These be the Leaders. In the embracers, it is at first weakness, then willfulness, that yields to this leading away. Without patience and perseverance, we could never hold out our journey. For as our nature is tender, and would not endure the cross but for patience: so it is flitting, and would soon be weary of any good course, but for perseverance. The Romans were highly commended by S. Paul: That their faith was spoken of throughout the whole world: And yet when Paul was convented at Rome, They all forsook him: all shrunk away. Though men be as confident as was Peter; Et si omnes non ego: yet they may fail as Peter did. The motives of perversion or leading away, be commonly two: Aliquod novum, or Aliquod mirum.

1. The former is the way of Schismatics, who are therefore called Novelists. The lower parts of Germany are grievously pestered with them: as I have heard of above thirty several sects of religion in one Town: So that, come, will you be of our Church? is as familiar among them as good morrow. It is reported, I know not how truly, that diverse among us, transported by the novel doctrines of their half Lunaticke teachers, are taking up for a new plantation beyond the seas: but it were happy for the old plantation, if she were well rid of them. Such men are led away with quid novi? A new fashion does not more take your proud lady, nor a new play your gallant, nor a new Tavern your drinker, nor a new trick your cheater, nor a new drugge your empiricke, than a new opinion does your schismaticke. Which having once handsomely formed, and outwardly beautified, he dares now advance in the Pulpit; and there is such crowding to it, as if it were the only Jewel in request. What went ye out into the wilderness to see? A reed shaken with the wind? Yea, O ye reeds shaken with the wind, what went ye out into the wilderness to see? A vanity lighter than yourselves? Yet as the golden Calf took the Israelites, because it was made of their ear-rings: so a factious conceit transporteth these hearers, because it is made fit for their ears.

2. If it be Res mira, it is more catching; for then Res nova is included in it. It could not be strange, if it were not new. Not new in it self, but new to us: for familiarity takes away strangeness, as time takes away the newness of anything. By this trick the Romists lead away their Proselytes: they tell you of wonders: here is nothing in your Church, but what is common and obvious: come to us, and we will show you glorious objects: Temples adorned like Theaters, Priests like Actors, Images richer in their ornaments than Queens: utensils, and properties, and appendances; no Millaners shop can compare with us: We have a great Master that commands kings, that can pardon sins, that can give fair indulgences: To all which the amazed heater answers, It is very strange. Wonder in natural things, is but the daughter of ignorance: and if ignorance be in love with these vain shows of wonder, who can wonder at it? As in the Poet, Myrrha, was in love with her own father: so give ignorance leave to be affected with her own daughter. Mira cannut: they do almost nothing but work miracles: Natural effects, with them, are miracles: casual accidents, miracles: magical illusions, miracles. They can make a miraculous drawing of a tooth, a miraculous cutting of a corn. So Iustus Baronius affirms, that when he was converted to them, he was miraculously cured of the Colique, by stooping to kiss the Popes foot. Pope John 22. did pile up miracles so fast, that he said in the Canonization of Aquinas, Tot miracula confecit, quot determinavit quaestiones. Which of their Saints is not reported to have done many miracles? It is a great favor of them that they have not put S. John the Baptist quite out of the Catalogue of Saints; because the Scripture testifies of him, that he wrought no miracles. Indeed to me this appears the greatest miracle, that they can find men to believe their miracles.

But Beloved, shall they lead us away thus? Shall they catch us with such a poor trick, as the ostentation of miracles? Their relying upon miracles, implies an induction of new doctrines: That which is old, and received, needs no ratification by miracles. So that we have just cause to suspect their doctrine of Novelty, because they so labor to uphold it by miracles. And shall that which is new, the invention of man; lead us from that which is old, the institution of God? Wonders we have at home; we need not go to Rome for them. Our Fairs, and Marts, and popular streets abound with wonders. If there may be found any Heteroclytes; any stigmaticall monstrosities; or but so much as uncommon forms, and uncouth productions of nature; they are exposed to view for money. Men that are grown up toward the stature of Giants, or stunted to Dwarfes, Hermaphrodites, or the like; are held very strange things. Yet the plain Christian Tell-troth did know a stranger thing than all these. Being demanded what it was, he answered, A Sinner. That a man should provoke God, so gracious and mighty: that he should believe Satan the father of lies and cruelty: forget his own death, so imminent and inevitable: obey the command of his flesh, a drudge so ignoble: admire the world so fickle and dangerous: despise Heaven, so blessed and glorious; and all for vanity, such a wretched emptiness: this he good man, thought the strangest thing in the world: And so indeed it is, in one sense; in regard of reason: though not so in the other sense, in respect of custom.

This indeed might seem strange, if we that are bred children of the truth, should be led away with the error of the wicked. This would be a grief to our Father: The holy Spirit leads us into all truth: and shall a lying spirit lead us away into falsehood? If we be led by the Holy Ghost, we are the Sons of God: If we be otherwise misled, what are we but bastards? Grieve not that Holy Spirit of God, by whom ye are sealed to the day of redemption: By no means let us grieve our Father. This would be a grief to our mother: the Church mourns when she loseth her children. She loseth them, or rather they lose her and their own blessing, when they are led away by the wicked: Let us not grieve our Mother. This would be a grief to our brethren: to see one that sprung from the same womb, and was nourished with the milk of the same breasts, to turn recreant, and revolt to the common enemy: Our brother is lost, is a woeful complaint: Let us not grieve our brethren. But the worst grief will be to our own souls: for in being led away from our Father Mother, Brothers, we have lost ourselves. We have chosen our professed foes for fast friends, and made our true friends to become our foes. And if this leading way were by force and compulsion, against our wills, it were more tolerable? as Israel was led away captive by their enemies: But willfully to follow seducers, against our own conscience, is most damnable. Take here two remedies for the avoiding of this mischief.

1. Let us truly weigh the folly of inconstancy. Bee not carried about with strange doctrines: for it is a good thing that the heart be established with grace. To be loose then, in the main joints of religion, must be very bad. The tottering wall is soon blown down: but being down, who shall set it up again? The righteous soul is like a body of a square figure: turn it on which part you will, lay it how you list, it will still be constant, and like it self. An unstable Christian is the worlds worst mooveable: a little resembling the silkworme, but not of such profit: one day you shall find him a fly, another time a maggot; seldom twice in the same shape. Take gold and throw it into the water; yet it loseth neither the value nor color: cast it into the fire; and it comes forth purer: but dirt is hardened with the fire; and dissolved with water. The sons of levity are such, as that they are joined withal would have them to be: hard or soft, cold or hot, tall or low, great or small; of any temper. Their souls are like common strumpets, that take in all suggestions. For shame let us once be steady, before we are laid in the steady earth, wherein there is no motion. We say the Fowler cannot easily kill the flying Bird: but whether we stand or go, lie or sit; in what posture or place soever we are; death can both hit, and wound, and kill us. And in the grave, the most pragmatial busy-body shall be quiet. There is no shifting of ground, no changing of sides there. They that troubled all their neighbors, shall be there as tame and calm as their fellow-clods. The body shall be confined to one place, the soul to another, without removing: till they be removed to the Barre, and brought before the Tribunal of Christ.

2. If we would not be led away, let us stick close to our God. We are sheep apt to wander: we shall not, if we keep to our sheepeheard. We are reeds, moveable with every wind: yet bind the reed to a pillar, and it stands firm. It is ill sticking to anything but God: all other props will fail us. Riches cannot keep us, but that we may be led away from them: not keep themselves, but that they may be led away from us. Nay, do they not rather help to lead away our confidence from God? The Forresters knowing that the Elephant useth to sleep leaning against some tree, are wont to cut the likeliest tree with a saw so deep, that the unsuspecting beast thinking to rest upon it, falls down with it, and so is surprised by them. They that put their trust in man, shall soon find him hewn down by death; and then there lies their hope in the dust with him. God appears to the Jews in types, signs and figures: but at last he departed from that people, because they too much trusted in them. In the fullness of time he appeared to his Church in himself in his Son; and from that Church He will never depart, because we cannot too much trust in him. I will hold myself fast by the hand of my God: as to that purpose the royal Prophet. Let us wed ourselves to him, wedge ourselves to him: so shall we not be led away. Antaeus, when Hercules threw him to the ground, still rose up the stronger; because he got new strength by touching of his mother: So if we hold ourselves fast to the Lord, and depend upon him by our faith and prayers; all the forces of Satan shall not lift us from the truth, because we shall perpetually get new strength and vigor by touching our Father.

If we flinch never so little from God, presently error catcheth us: as chickens that will stray from the wings of the hen, are in danger of the kite. He that would describe a circle in paper, if he hath brought that circle within one inch of finishing, and but remove his Compass a little, he cannot make it up a perfect circle, except he begin again, and find out the same or a new center. Though we have so made God our Center, as to fixe our hearts upon him; yet the least remove of our Compass, a little wandering from him, may endanger us to error. Nothing can fill a man's heart but God: so that if God be in the mind, though nothing else be there, it is full: If God be not there, although it be full of other things, it is still empty. For the world like that transformed king, does but feed upon thistles; things that will prick, but never satisfy. So nothing can keep a man from wandering, but the manutenency of God: if he let go his hand from us, we will presently go from his hand: and going from his hand, which is truth, we are presently surprised by the hand of error. The Devil does but watch this opportunity: if we stir forth of doors without God, he instantly sets his bandogges upon us; Schism and Heresy. So the Novelists, leaving him, by leaving that order and discipline whereby he governs his Church; he hath suffered to be led into factions and errors, till they crumble away into private conventicles; and at last become nothing, either in existence or appearance. That Church which will needs be the form to all Churches, because she hath left his written will, he hath left to her self and her own traditions: and now she is swollen into tumours and ulcers, and blisters. When men once neglect God's leading, their next step begins at this leading away. How often hath the fantastical desire of seeing Mass, been plagued with falling into idolatry? As foolish young men have been so taken with an enterterlude, that they must needs, (forsooth) become Players. But as Vlisses bound himself to the Mast, that the Sirens might not tempt him: so let us unite ourselves to the Lord, our Faith to his Word, our Obedience to his Will, and our Confidence to his Power and Promise: and then as no strength can pluck us out of the hand, so no persuasion can lead us away from the side of JESUS CHRIST.

4. Cavete ne exidatis, beware least ye fall from your own steadfastness.] There be two things much conducive to the keeping of us upright: Elevation when we are down, circumspection when we are up. For the former; Shall they fall and not rise? For the other; Let him that thinketh he standeth; take heed least he fall. It is good to go on; provided that we be in a good way; or else it is better to return. If Agas be going from Abraham's house toward Egypt, the Angel calls her to return, and not to persevere: but if Lots wife be going from Sodom toward Zoar, the Angel willeth her to persevere, and not to return. St. Peters Cavete, here; is but an exposition of his Masters Memores estate, elsewhere: Both fortify us against recidivation. As there be Goads, to prick us on to goodness: so there be Nailes, to fasten us into goodness. As our mothers had not only wombs to bring us forth, but also breasts to bring us up: so the Church, as she daily strives to convert and make new Proselytes, so thinks it an honor to show old and constant Professors. The Poet did put no less virtue into Tueri, than into Quaerere. Nor will the Lawyer pass a conveyance with a mere Habendum; but he will add a Tenendum too. The Physician ends not the cure of his Patient, with the cure of his disease: but after all, minds the preventing of a relapse. Our first study is Vt accedatis, to win your entrance: next, Ne excidatis, to hearten your continuance. We are glad of a Well begun good Convert: but most joyful to hear that Enge at the last; Well done good servant; that's the Crown of all.

Our blessed Savior did not always content himself with Venite adme, Come unto me: but sometimes changed his note into Manete in me, Abide in me. To one that would enter into the Church, and be baptized, Saint Philip had his condition, Si credideris, If thou believest: To the other, that were entered, and thereby might be secure, Saint Paul had his caution; Si permanseris, If thou continuest: otherwise even thou shalt be cut off. The first care is to lay the foundation sure, Ne corruat; least it fall, like the house built on the sands: the next, to perfect the roof, Ne perpluat; that it rain not through, and rotte the principals. It is not enough to call them backward, which are loath to come on; but to spurr them forward, that are ready to lagge behind. There is an Ingreddimini, proclaimed to them that are without: and there is a Progreddimini, inculcated to them that are within. Of all the Stories in the Old Testament, Christ sets a Memento upon the head of Lots wives turning back: as if he earnestly desired those that have forgotten, to remember it; and those that do remember, never to forget it. With salt from her Pillar, let us sprinkle ourselves; that we never go back, or fall from our own steadfastness. There were two memorable monuments of God's Judgment in that Story; The Lake of Sodom; and Lots wives Pillar: the one the plague of resolute sin, the other of faint virtue. The Sodomites are an example of Impenitency; Lots wife of Instability: they of obstinate perverseness: she of relapsing righteousness: they of never being good, she of turning from good to evil. To them that willfully continue in the state of sin, there is a monument of Reclamation; the Lake of Sodom: For them that languish in the state of grace, there is another monument of caution; Lots wives Pilla*. But our Cavete here, points directly to the latter; that we fall not from our own steadfastness. This the Apostle dissuades us from by his counsel; as his Master shown the danger of it by an example. Let us borrow a little more light of the Lord's example, that we may the better embrace the servants counsel. Two particulars let us examine; why she was turned into a Pillar? Why into a Pillar of salt?

First, why into a Pillar? First, shall we say, for the similitude it bears unto an human body? That were something: both were erected to stand upright. Secondly, or that it was a usual monument of the dead? Absalom in his life, built himself such a pillar against the time of his death: and great Monarchs had their Piles and Pyramids. But that was not the intent of this Pillar: it was never meant for Lots wives honor. Thirdly, or because when they intended in elder times to disgrace men to the world, they engraved their faults on Pillars? Fourthly, or because when she should move, she stood still; therefore she was turned to a Pillar; always to stand still, and never to remove. This is indeed somewhat near the matter: but not all. Fifthly, a Pillar is a durable thing, and God meant her a spectacle to posterity. They that lived in those times, (and it lasted long, even to Josephus his days) might be instructed by their eyes: we have a Memento for our ears: yea, this Pillar is set up for our sakes. And this is one good which the Lord draws out of evil; that He suffers not evil examples to vanish as shadows, but to remain as Pillars, to warn them that come after. When we come at this Pillar, we are put in mind to change our course, and take another way: so shall we not be led into error, nor fall from our own steadfastness. This way took she that perished: that way went he that was saved: Let us remember Lots wife, but follow Lot: remember her, but follow him; by no means looking back.

Next, why of salt? Saint Augustine gives the reason of it; Condire nos, for our seasoning: Vt sal statuae sit nobis condimentum vitae. For our benefit, God erected this monument: He does not only embalm the memory of the just, for our imitation: but powders and makes brine of the evil, for our admonition. So that if we take the Pillar, and engrave Christ's Memento upon it; there is both a Statue, and a Statute. God could have sunk her into the earth, or blown her up into air, that no visible relict of her should remain: But he makes her a Pillar; not only for gazing; but of salt, for our seasoning. If we find any itch of relapsing to the world, any corrupt humor of returning to our former lusts, let us draw it out with the salt of this Pillar. This is an happy art of extracting salt out of others, as Triacle out of Vipers: and to make them profitable to us, that were unprofitable to themselves. Though Lots wife were evil, yet her salt is good. If we have seen others miscarry before us, by being led away with errors; and can remember Saint Peters Cavete; we shall draw honey out of hemlocke, the strength of standing from their weakness in falling. Why are not Traitors buried, so soon as they are executed? Why are their heads and limbs advanced upon poles, but in terrorem omnium? God could root out the remembrance of the wicked, together with their lives from the earth: he does not; but rather sets up their Quarters in stories; Vt poena Impii sit eruditio Iusti; that their punishment may be our advertisement. He does not pour out their blood, and cast it away, but saves it for a Bath; Vt lavet Iustus pedes in sanguine peccatoris; that the Righteous may wash his feet in the blood of the Wicked. Cavete then, and we are safe: this is a handful of salt to keep us, and to make us keep. Put them both together; Et hac columna nos fulciat, & hic sal nos condat: Let this Pillar prop our weakness, and this salt season our sacrifice, that we may be kept in our own steadfastness. For some useful application.

1. Let us shun the society of idolatrous Seducers, and hate the very air wherein they breathe. So deeply doth God detest Idolatry, that He forbids the Prophet to eat the bread, or drink the water of a people infected with it. That inhibition might be personal, but the grounds of it are common. No pestilence should be more avoided than the conversation of the mis-religious, or openly scandalous. We shall hardly win them to goodness: their familiarity will easily infeoffe us of their wickedness. We may do good turns to the superstitious, but it is dangerous to receive any from them. Kindness is more safely done to a Papist, than taken from him. That which is done to him, obligeth him: that which is taken from him, obligeth us. His obligation to us may be an occasion of his good: our obligation to him may occasion our hurt: the surest way is to keep a-loofe from all pestilent Seducers.

2. The greater show of sanctity that error puts on, the more suspicious let us be of the intended mischief. Jeroboam threatens, the Prophet stands undaunted: Jeroboam fawnes and promises, the Prophet is not moved. But then comes a gray-headed. Seer, and pleads a counter-message from God; the Prophet yields and transgresseth. It may be he thinks; An aged man, a Prophet, an old Prophet, will not (sure) belie God to a Prophet: No man will forge a lie but for an advantage: what can he get by this but the entertainment of an unprofitable guest? Though God would not suffer me to feast with Jeroboam, yet He may allow me to eat with a Prophet. Why are not God's Revelations as free to others, as to me? A counter-mand from an Angel of God releaseth me from my strict charge. My fidelity is approved in refusing the bread of Bethel: God may in pity of my faintness, afford me sustenance elsewhere. Thus if we once come to dispute with God's express commands, how easily do we fall from our own steadfastness? Who would have looked for a Liar under hoary hairs, and an holy mantle? Who ever saw more external strictness, than in those Emissaries of Rome that come to turn us from our God? Who would not trust that gravity, that austerity which they seem to carry over themselves? It is the conclusion of simple souls, These men must needs be Saints. There is no Tentation so dangerous, as that which comes shrowded under a veil of holiness, and pretends authority from God himself. Nothing is so apt to deceive us, as the fairest semblances, as the sweetest words. Satan as a Fiend may fright us, but he would appear an Angel of light when he educeth us. Our safest way to be kept from error, is not to believe the speech for the person, but the person for the speech.

3. Let us consider, that these Seducers help to overthrow us, and cast us down; but what help is there in them to raise us up? There they leave us; in a forlorn condition, as the Priests left Judas after his treason. What is that to us? See thou to that. Or as the old Prophet of Bethel left the Prophet of Judah: He could take the pains to fetch the man of God into sin, but he will not bear him company one foot at his departure. He had been the occasion of his fault, but he was loath to be enwrapped in his judgment. All the kindness he will do for him, is to interre him in his own sepulcher, and to weep over him. It is a cruel courtesy to kill a man, and then help him to his grave; to betray him with our lips, and then to bedew him with our tears: The Prophet had needed no such friend if he had not met with such enemy. So the Romists teach their followers to direct their prayers to Saints: but for themselves, when they come to die, then Christ, and none but Christ. When they have brought their Proselytes whither they would, then let them shift for themselves. The mischievous guides of wickedness leave a man, when they have led him to his bane: as familiar Devils forsake their Witches, when they have brought them once into fetters.

Beware lest you fall from your own steadfastness.] After all these premised particulars, for the better method in handling the summary Doctrine, I will set down certain Theses, conclusions, or grounds; which either are radically in the Text, or naturally without force may be derived from it. First, men may fall from their own steadfastness, or else this Cavete had been in vain: for no man is charged to beware of that which cannot happen. Secondly, there is a proneness in the nature of man to fall: the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak: therefore there is great need of this Caution, Ne excidatis. Thirdly, If any fall away, it is their own fault; they are not compelled, nor thrown down by God, but they fall of themselves: it is by their own weakness, or their own willfulness: Another thing implied in the Cavete: for if the Almighty power should do it, all the Cavete's in the world could not withstand it. Fourthly, if God suffer some to fall, that have stood, yet this is no impeachment to his Justice: because he leaves none without means of standing, or hope of rising. In the Text, they have knowledge granted; therefore they may stand: there be Seducers forewarned of; therefore they may fall: and the fall is not pronounced desperate; therefore they may rise again. Fifthly, Men may fall far; from their own steadfastness, that is, from that measure of stability which for the present they have, yet not totally, so as to have no firmness at all; to lose even the very foundation and principles of truth, or to suffer an utter eradication of grace: Or if so much, so far, so desperately they fall; yet this lapse may not be final: the grace of God is not debarred them, nor the gate of mercy shut against them, nor is the sentence of irrevocable damnation passed upon them. Sixthly, It is dangerous to fall at any time; but then worst, when Christians have stood sometime in the truth; as these to whom our Apostle writes: To them a Cavete ne excidatis, is especially needful: for the nearer heaven, the greater fall to the earth. Seventhly, Lastly the summary use, the principal scope, the main antidote to prevent all this, is a constant Perseverance unto the end.

1. Men may fall from their own steadfastness. Though it be true; Abundance cautela non nocet: yet there is no need of warning, where is no possibility of danger. Now this falling can be incident to none but Christians: for they that never were up, cannot be said to fall: Qui iacet in terram, non habet unde cadat. Nay not only to Christians at large, in the latitude of all that are baptized: for in that number, we shall find abundance of heretics, no fewer hypocrites, and innumerable ungodly persons: some not informed in their Judgments, the rest not reformed in their lives: these cannot be said to fall, for they never stood. But we must restrain it to converts, such as are called into Christ, have embraced the Gospel, graced their faith with good works, and conformed their demeanor to piety. Yet that these may fall from their own steadfastness, there is possibility: that they do fall so, it is great pity. Oh that this point were not to be proved by too dear experience. How many have fallen, even with all the helps of standing about them? Judas was continually in the presence of Christ: he heard his Sermons, he saw his miracles, he tasted his bounty, did eat at his table, even that Sacramental bread: yet he fell. Who would think that the devil durst enter into Christ's own College? Or that any of his College should entertain the devil? So in Noah's octonary family, one was a son of Belial: he saw the Judgment of the flood upon all the world: by a miraculous mercy himself escaped: he was at his fathers Sacrifice: yet he fell. In the little family of Lot, one fell off: she was by being Lots wife, incorporated into the house, and made partaker of the blessings of faithful Abraham: she was brought out of the Idolatrous world, kept safe in Egypt, preserved from the sin of Sodom, from the fire of Sodom, delivered from the captivity of the five kings, from the perishing of the five cities: how gracious were all these mercies? what abundant means, and strong helps had she to stand? Yet she fell. She was brought out of Sodom, warned of the ensuing danger; had Angels to go before her, her husband to go with her daughters, to attend and follow her: she was gotten to the entrance of Zoar: Yet that place she made choice of to perish in, which God had picked out to save her. Thus she sinned, in respect of her self, desperately: in respect of the Angels, contemptuously: in respect of her husband and daughters, scandalously: in respect of God and his mercies, unthankfully: and fell away in the wickedness of a willful defection. There were but twelve in Christ's family, and one of them fell away: but eight in Noah's family, and one of them fell away: but four in Lots family, and one of them fell away. Ham was preserved in the Ark yet he fell. Lots wife was reprieved by the Angels, yet she fell: who would not fear, if one may perish in the company of Angels? Yea, Judas was under the Tuition of Christ himself; yet he fell. There is then a possibility of falling.

For use and application, here, it is but having recourse to our Apostles Caution: we may fall, therefore let us look to our standing. We may be led away: the devil will venture to try: therefore let us not budge, not give him one foot of ground: but if he beckons one way, be we sure to take the contrary: There have been some that stood in as little fear of falling, as now they are in hope of rising: Pride and wantonness was the cause of their fall: faith and humility must keep us upright. When we remember what we have been, we have just cause Erubescere, to be a shamed: so when we consider what we may be we have no less cause contremiscere, to be afraid. We know our beginnings, we do not foreknow our endings. We may be certain that thus we are: but that thus we shall be, is above our assurance. We see how much of our way we have past: we see not how much is left, or whether we shall be able to hold out to the end. As we have cause to pray; O God, when we are old, and gray-headed, forsake us not: so to gird up our loins, and redouble our strength, that we may persevere. For it is nothing to begin, unless we continue: nor to continue, unless we do it unto the end.

2. There is a proneness in the nature of man to fall. Not that when we stand, we are held up by force: for God offers no violence to the will of man, but sweetly disposeth it to desire the own good. Yet the Second Adam hath not so far cast out the first, but that the new engrafted siens doth relish of the old stock; and still there is a tang of original corruption left in us: as a vessel, after much rinsing and cleansing, will smell of the first seasoning. I am carnal, sold under sin. Sold? This is not such a sale, as wherein there is a seller a buyer, a thing sold, and the price: So in Adams selling, Satan was the buyer, Innocence and heaven sold, and the price was an apple. So Ahab sold himself to Satan for a slave, to work wickedness, by his wives instigation, and setting him on to the bargain. Paul was not sold thus: but there be two kinds of slaves: one that selleth himself into captivity, and willingly obeyeth a tyrant: another that is sold into servitude against his will, as Joseph was sold by his brethren: and so was S^t. Paul sold. Selling is sometimes taken for a simple tradition, without any price. Ye have have sold yourselves for naught, and ye shall be redeemed without money. But this selling and buying must be understood in a different sense. In the Sale, the price is Nought; but it is naught in respect of God, for he had no honor by it: no gain redounded to him: And yet while they sold themselves, they sold not their own, but God's: and in reason, the owner of the thing sold should have the price. So in the purchase or Redemption, the price is nothing: that is, nothing to them: it cost them nothing: they paid not one penny for their own deliverance. But in respect of God, the price was not nothing: for the redemption of their soul is precious: It cost him much; even as much as it could cost him; the precious blood of his dear Son.

Sinners out of Christ are sold two ways. First, they are sold in the common market of man, when Adam sold himself and all his posterity. Next they have made a new bargain with Satan, and sold themselves over to him again for the pleasures of the flesh. Thus did Ahab, and Judas, and Demas willfully sell themselves, though long ago they repented the match. But Paul does not speak there of himself, as in the person of a natural man: for every man considered in nature, is sold under sin: And there be some that have abandoned and prostituted themselves to sin: so that as Jude calls them Arbores his mortuas, Trees twice dead: so we may call these animas bis venditas, souls twice sold. The buyer hath fine and recovery upon them. But S^t. Paul speaks in the person of a regenerate, spiritual, supernatural and sanctified man: meaning that no man upon earth, in what measure so veler holy, can so emancipate himself from that captivity wherein Adam hath inthrauled him, but that he is still enwrapped in sin, and sold under sin. There be two kinds of servitude: Some are slaves because they are so borne, being the children of slaves and bond-parents: Others have sold themselves, and willfully become bondmen. Like to the first are the regenerate, for they are borne servile, being conceived in sin. The unregenerate are like to the other, for they have sold themselves into bondage. Yet may the very regenerate be said to be sold two ways. First, In regard of original corruption; for which they may thank their first parents; if at least it be worth their thanks. Secondly, Because the embers, the spawn, the leaven of that original sin remains in them, and makes them subject to many infirmities: so that they cannot do what they would, but they too often do what they would not.

The conclusion then is plain, that there is still a proclivitie left in our nature to be led away into error. The seed of all sin is within us, therefore even of apostasy. A good scholar, that will ply his book in his Masters presence, yet may fly out when his back is turned. The bird that hath long contented herself with her cage, feeding and singing there; yet if she spies the door open, will whip out, and fly abroad. Our nature is Like a deceitful bow: which when it is bent to the full, except it be followed hard, till it be sure and fast; starts back again, and is as far off as ever. It is called the flesh: and such flesh is it as will Sine sale putrescere: if it be not corned, it will of it self bring forth corruption.

For use of this conclusion: we find here just cause to deplore our miserable estate by nature, and to consider how deeply our first parents have engaged us: so that (not to let go the former metaphor) we are all even sold under sin. We exclaim against any man that hath sold a city, or a country, or an army, to the enemy: but Adam sold the world. He sold his children, and children's children; Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: he sold all the Patriarchs, and all the Prophets, and all the Princes of the earth: he sold all the Apostles, Peter and Paul, and both their Regiments, the glorious hemispheres of the world, Jews and Gentiles: he sold all, even the dearest friends that God had among the sons of men: even the Disciple whom the Lord loved, and the mother of the Lord herself, whom all generations call blessed. He sold his wife, yea he sold himself: and if Christ had not provided for himself by a miraculous generation, Adam had sold him too. If Christ had been conceived in original sin, he must have died for himself: nay he could not have died for himself, but must have needed another Savior. Such an unthrift had we to our Father: and we take after him, for in this respect we are all prodigal children.

But now what was the price of us? He sold all; what had he for it? When the Patrimony is at sale, the children look for portions. Alas, he had nothing for us, and nothing could he leave us; but Sin, Shame, and Sorrow: that is; the portion of all the sons of men. We complain now that land will not sell, that the price of it is fallen: that twenty years purchase is come down to sixteen. Yet sure, as cheap as it is now, it was cheaper at first; both land, and Landlord. What was Paradise sold for? What was the whole earth fold for? what was mankind fold for? what had Eve for her part? It could be but a little fruit: so little, that the Scripture will not tell us what kind of fruit it was: yet she had something. What had Adam for his part? Yea, for the whole? Nothing besides a morsel of fruit; except it were any content to him in pleasing his wives humor: as Jerome thinks, he so dearly loved his wife, that he did eat, lest otherwise she should have been discontented. Yet if he had that satisfaction he had something. But now after both these, what had we for our part? He sold our Inheritance as well as his own: it is fit, we should have somewhat for our right. Now what fell to our share? What had we for earth, and heaven too? For Innocence and happiness too? Alas, nothing could accrue to us by this sale, but sin and woe. Adam sinned, and we suffer. Before we had any possession of felicity, or could claim any interest in it, we had (in him) forfeited it. We had a punishment, before we had a being: God was displeased with me, before I was I. I was built up not fifty years ago, in my mothers womb: and I was cast down almost six thousand years ago, in Adams loins. We all here are borne in the last age of the world; yet died in the first. This is that portion left us by our parents; original sin, and a corrupt inclination of our nature to transgress, to be led away into error: and the most holy souls upon earth cannot be quite rid of it. O wretched men that we are, who shall deliver us from the body of this death? We are prone to fall.

3. If any fall away from their own steadfastness, it is their own fault. A Deo est quod statur, à nobis quod ruitur. If God did cast us down, our Cavete would do no good, there were no remedy, we must fall. But seeing there are but three that can do it; the Devil, his engines, or ourselves; the Cavete is requisitely put upon us: and if we do hit it right, it will save us. But if we will fall for want of circumspection, it is in vain for us to blame any but our selves. Saul would have put his transgression upon the people, but it would not do: God would not take that for an excuse. Adam would have discharged his sin upon his wife: but God finds Adam guilty, and so judgeth him. Thy way and thy doings have procured these things unto thee: They be our own, and we must answer to them, and answer for them. We may have leaders into temptation: but it is our fault if we follow them. Nay, to come closer home, do not we tempt ourselves? Satan is not the sole cause of evil. The fowler sets his glass, spreads his net, whistles like the bird: yet cannot all this make the fowl come into his net whether she will or no. If we had not pliable ears, and flexible affections, the Sirens might sing in vain. But there is something within us, that befriends temptation: some combustible matter, which that fire soon takes, and will soon take that fire. If we were pure Crystal glasses, that would endure no poison, it were some security: but naturally Satan is not more ready to offer, than we to receive his infection. So that the Apostles Cavete is of use at every turn: As God hath set Timete upon the very porch of our house, and made it The beginning of all our wisdom. Vis in timore securus esse? Securitatem time. The only way to be secure in fear, is to fear security. So saint Paul helps them out with their Si permanseritis, by this advise; Be not high minded, but fear.

So then there is somewhat intra nos, quod contra nos: we may challenge others for misleading us; but Every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust: which is not any one appetite, but the fountain of all corrupt affections. And this remains in the most regenerate: There is a law in our members, warring against the law of our mind. How holy so ever we are: yet Secundum repugnantia principia, repugnantia habemus studia. Our own feet carry us to sin, and we love the journey. Our own affections seduce us, and we run into errors by our own wills. We are not only sold in Adam; there begun the mischief▪ but we have confirmed the sale; by further selling over ourselves unto vanity. By him we are sold to original sin: to actual and habitual sins, by ourselves. We, we have been our own undoers. You have sold yourselves; and your own immortal happiness. Immortality was sold in that first contract between man and sin. We talk of twenty years purchase: but what number of years was the price of immortality: It is our eternity: God hath another manner of Eternity in him, even an whole eternal day: an eternal forenoon, and an eternal afternoon too: for as he never shall have end, so he never had beginning. We have an eternal afternoon, in our immortality: for we shall no more see an end, than God hath seen a beginning. Millions of years, multiplied by millions, make not up a minute to this Eternity. And yet this we sold; we, to witness that the fault is in ourselves. And what did we sell it for? When that tormented worldling in Hell valued one drop of water at so high a rate; what would he have given for a river? How poor a clod of the Earth is a Manor? How poor an inch, a Shire? How poor a spanne, a Kingdom? How poor a pace, the whole Earth? And yet we have sold our bodies, and souls, and consciences, and Heaven, and Eternity, for a few grains of this dust.

Whom then can we blame for our falling? we have sold ourselves, and all our ability of goodness. Do you ask for what? Our first father sold us cheap: but we sell ourselves cheaper. Our selves, all ourselves: our bodies to lust and intemperance, our souls to pride and malice, our consciences to hypocrisy and unfaithfulness, and all this for nothing. For sin is but a privation, and privations are nothing, What fruit had ye then in those things, whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of those things is death. That we got by it, is but barrenness, shame, and death. Barrenness is a privation of fruit; shame a privation of innocence, and death a privation of life: For these privations we sell ourselves, and these privations are nothing, positively nothing. But hath not the covetous man gold and riches for his soul? would he sell his conscience for nothing, though he esteem it nothing worth? He may have gold, and want comfort: riches, without the use of them: as the miser's curse is, Penuria in Penaria; hunger in plenty: and what is hunger more than nothing, unless it be worse than nothing? The adulterer satisfies his filthy lust: he hath his pleasure; therefore he sells himself for something. To night indeed sin may look like a purchase, like a treasure: but ask him tomorrow how he likes his bargain: then his awaked conscience will confess, that he hath sold himself for nothing: for weakness in his limbs, for darkness in his understanding, for emptiness in his purse, for absence of grace in his soul. Now weakness, darkness, emptiness and absence, are privations, and privations are nothing. All the name of substance that sin takes, is that it is a heavy and intolerable burden. My iniquities are a burden too heavy for me. All the treasure that is in it, is that Treasure of wrath, against the day of wrath. All the positive reality, that it is a vexation to the conscience. Now vexation doth but deprive us of peace, a burden of ease, and wrath of comfort: And this is a fearful privation, of the grace of God here, and of the face of God hereafter: a privation so much worse than nothing, as that they upon whom it falls, would fain be nothing, and cannot.

The conclusion is clear then, that this falling away is our own fault; and so much our fault, that we sell ourselves to that purpose. Rather than want sins, we are apt to tempt ourselves. He that frequently feels not some secret invasions upon his honesty, as when he is poor, to steal; when he is rich, to be idle; when he is full, to wantonnize; when he is in authority, to be proud; is nearer an Angel than a Man. Nay, how often do we save Satan the labor, and become our own tempters? Concupiscence is in some a flash, in others a flame • in the former it is soon gone, in the other it burns long: but what man is quite without this fire? This same flesh and blood is a giddy guide: as when the Serpents tail would needs lead the body, there followed mad courses, and desperate precipices. Passions, like Acta•us dogs, when they are once blooded, will devour their own Master. Our affections will be doing, set them on what work you will. Like horses, whether you put them to your perfumed coaches, or to the noisome soil-carts, they will draw. Hence it comes, that lust in the desire and thought, (contemplative uncleanness) is often more punished than lust in the act: because to the latter we are tempted partly by others, to the former, we wholly tempt ourselves: And he that willfully but wounds a man, is more punishable than he that kills him against his will. The Drunkard hunts after the wine: temptation needs not stand like a Tavern-bush in his way, for he invites himself. The Adulterer waits for the •y-light: the Harlot needs not to attract him with her wanton looks or language: Ipsa se allicit. The Movere to f••i• within us: Satan's Promovere is but a working upon us. In a manner, we are Devils to our own hearts: we push ourselves down, and are the main occasion of our own falling. What a mockery is it to pray, Lead us not into temptation; when as we in the mean while seek temptation? Age quod postulas. Then shall we find, that though Tentat diabolus, sustentat Dominus: for Satan's temptation we shall have, God's sustentation: yea Lord, Deliver us from evil, for thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, forever and ever. Amen.

4. If God suffer some to fall that have stood, yet this is no impeachment to his Justice: because he leaves none without means of standing, or hope of rising. In the Text it is granted, that there is knowledge in general, and fore-knowledge of these things in particular, in them: therefore they may stand: there be Seducers forewarned of, and a leading away by them is not denied to be impossible: and a Cavete is given them for that purpose: therefore they may fall: yet being down; their fall is not pronounced desperate; therefore they may rise again. This Conclusion hath two branches: the former vindicates God from Injustice, if we do fall: the other saves us from despair though we are fallen.

1. That Peccatum should be causa peccati: for sin is no Eunuch: it can and will beget children, and that in the own likeness: Or that Peccatum should be Poena peccati, as the brood of the Viper kill their Damme, or as Senacharib was slain by the issue of his own loins: who can complain of either? Whether God doth deliver us over to punishments for sins; that when the measure of our sin is full, He shall empty the measure of his Judgments upon us: Or to sins for punishments; making future iniquities the scourges of former; there is no Injustice in it. If he shall leave any particular soul that hath left him: or withdraw his Spirit from a whole Church, that hath withdrawn her self from his Truth: this is not done out of any tyrannical willfulness, but out of a punishing Justice: not for for his pleasure, but our deserts. He is not bound to stick unto them that forsake Him. If He opens his bosom when we come to Him, and holds us there so long as we will tarry with Him; it is his Mercy: But when we will fly from his arms, if He lets us go, is it not his Justice? They mis-judge the liberty of our infinite Creator, that imagine Him any ways bound to his Creature. We are obliged to Him, not He to us: we not to offend Him, not He to defend us.

If they will go unto captivity, let them go: yea, if they will needs go, He will send them, and give them up into the hands of their enemies, and deliver them over to punishment for sin, or to sin for punishment. If He takes the sin which He finds within us, and makes it his executioner upon us; so that future sins become the plague of former; still He is just. It is no easy smart we feel, when God lasheth us with punishment for our errors: but to punish one error with another; Peccatum grande, Peccato grandiore; O this is a sore revenge. David had his choice of three Roddes; War, Famine, Pestilence: either of them could scourge him thoroughly, and fetch blood of his soul: but if all three had been inflicted on him together, they had not been so heavy, as when God gave him over into his own hands, and suffered the sin in his own bosom to become his master. Lust now hath the regiment of David, and that sends him to Adultery, Adultery prompts him to Murder, Murder must be secreted by Hypocrisy, and that produceth Impenitency and a senselessness in sin. After he had fallen one story, into Uncleanness, he stays not there, but falls another story, into Homicide: and from that to another, Dissimulation: till at last he falls to the very bottom, Security and benumbedness of soul; and lower he could not fall. Being there, he had cause to lift up his voice, with De profundis clamavi. Now all these were his own sins: God had no hand in the doing of them. The Adultery was his; he polluted the marriage bed: the Murder was his; he flew Uriah with the sword: Though Uriah fell by the sword of the children of Ammon, yet says Nathan, Thou hast slain him. The Blasphemy was his: it came out of the mouth of the uncircumcised, even of the Lord's enemies; yet because he gave the occasion, it was his Blasphemy. The obduratenesse and persisting a whole year without remorse, was his sin: all his: I acknowledge my transgressions. God had no hand in the doing of them, but God will have a hand in the disposing of them. With an idle wantonness he began: God took his Adultery, and made it his Bailiff to attach David for his idleness: and then He took his Murder, and made it his Bailiff to attach David for his Adultery: and then He took the Gentiles Blasphemy, and made it his Bailiff to attach David for his Murder: and then He took his long deadness of heart and made it his Bailiff to attach David for that Blasphemy: So here was a generation of sins, a race of iniquities; one begetting another, and the last worse than the former.

Beware therefore: for if you be once led away, who knows where you shall stop? Error begets error: and if we once languish or bate of our own steadfastness, still we fall lower: and the less hold we have of God, the more hold Satan hath of us. Let us fall into the hands of God, says that straitened King, for his mercies are great: and not into the hand of man. Between God and man there may be some kind of comparison: But would any sinner say, Let me fall into the hands of the Devil, and not of man? Rather into more sins, than some punishments? It was a most fearful imprecation upon God's enemies: Add iniquity unto their iniquity: that was woeful: But, Let them not come into thy righteousness, into which they can never come, unless they first come into repentance; this is the fatal doom. Among all the phials of wrath, there is none more tetricall and deadly; when men shall be suffered to add sin unto sin, that Finis unius mali sit gradus alterius; and never offer to repent of their past sins, till they are past repentance. This is that reprobate sense, to mistake miseries for mercies, sins for comforts. So many think to assuage the anguish of one sin, by doing another: which is a remedy far worse than the disease.

Prodigality is a gallant sin: but the Prodigal cannot but see that his patrimony wastes: how then shall he maintain his riot? Why, it is but coupling another sin with it; oppression of his Tenants, extortion of sines, and taking of forfeitures; and all shall be well. All well? So the Devil thinks it, but so he shall not find it. If the horror of whoredom and prodigious uncleanness have caused in others a dejection of spirit; how should they remedy this? How? Strait, there is a factor of hell present, that cries; Come, you are melancholy, let us to the Tavern: he can cure all your sadness with a charm of wine. How could the common Strumpet ever sleep, without this incantation of strong drink? Her affrighted conscience would be a worse fury within her, than the severest Marshall could be about her; but that the incessant noise of sin will not let it be heard. The covetous mucke-worm could never digest his legal pillage; but that the hope of the next advantage adjourns the anguish of the former. These sinners take all such carnal satisfactions for medicines: but God sends them for plagues: O madness, to call great plagues peace! To smother sin from the eye of the world, or to shadow it from the eye of our own conscience, by interposing more sins, is a physic prescribed by the devil. Repentance is appointed by God, the only physic for sin; a remorse for the evil we have done: not the adding of more evil to it. As the drunkard is sick in the morning, till he hath qualified the old heat with a new. To cure sin with sin, is but to heal an ulcer by deading the flesh: which indeed doth not make us whole, but insensible of pain. Repentance be our physic: this if we take, we may be cured: this if we continue, we shall be saved.

2. As this clears God, so the other branch of the conclusion comforts us. If we have fallen, let us not conclude upon ourselves that we shall never rise again: for God doth not say so: Not in this Text, not in this Epistle, not in the whole Bible. Far be it from us, to impose upon ourselves a necessity of perishing. There may be a falling off on our part: and there may be a withdrawing of grace on God's part: yet he hath still reserved to himself the power of restitution, in both parts. There be many terms of union between God and us, none of separation, that disioynes us from God, that I ever read of: Of eternal separation none, I am sure, in the Scriptures. Your iniquities have separated between you and your God: this is the nearest to it. And yet that was particularly spoken to the revolting Jews, not indefinitely to all sinners: And it was a commination, that if they persisted in sin, so it would be; rather than a conclusion that so it was: Or it was a Caution, that it might not be so; rather than a commination, that it should be so: Or: it was a complaint, that they had done enough on their part to make it so; rather than a decree on God's part, that it should be so indeed. Or take it in the most strict and literal sense, yet it was not a determination without a condition. Though they were now divided, they might be united: though their sins had put them as-under, yet their repentance might bring them together again.

He is called our Father, and full of pity: what will not a father do, and suffer, to reclaim his son, before he leave him to his own desperate ways? It must be a prodigious offense, that can separate a son from the love of his father. He is compared to a mother: Can a mother forget her child? was God's question to Zion. He stays not her answer, nor assures himself of any good answer from her; but adds to it: Yea, a mother may forget her child, yet I will not forget thee. Can God do it? Did God ever do it? Did he ever cast off without possibility of re-accepting? When? Where? Whom? We neither can show the time, nor the place, nor the persons; to whom God gave such a peremptory repulse, saying, you shall never repent, but you shall perish. That of the Prophet is most comfortable: I will betroth thee unto me forever. The husband and wife are una caro, one flesh: Christ and our soul, by this marriage, unas spiritus, one spirit. The words of the Contract are, Sponsabo te mihi in aeternum. There can be no divorce imagined, where there is no marriage: and if there be a marriage with God, there can be no divorce, neither: for Sponsat in aeternum, Therefore as often as our hearts, upon the doleful consideration of our sins, be afraid of a divorce from our God; let us cheare them up with the comfort of a marriage with our God. So Ambrose sweetly and saftely: Audisti repudium? Crede conjugium. Did God ever take in a favourite, and afterwards utterly reject him? The Crow went out of the Ark, and came no more: the Dove went, and came again, and came with an olive branch. God may absent himself, on purpose that he might be sought: but he comes again, and that with an olive branch of peace. The Jews did indeed put away their wives; not only for the wives fault, but for the husbands frowardness: But we have too good experience of our God's love and patience, ever to charge him with that: we must deny him first, for he cannot deny himself.

To follow this comfortable metaphor of our marriage to God, and to take away all mistrust of a separation: Let us consider for what causes the Jews might put away their wives, and by that precedent examine whether God (our Husband) hath so threatened to put away us. And because in the place where divorce is permitted, those essential circumstances are not set down, which were required in those bills of divorce, and without which they were void: give me leave to borrow so much exemplification from a great light in our Church, as he hath collected for the clearing of this point.

1. This bill of divorce might not be written in private; not in the Husbands bed-chamber; but by a Scribe, a public Notary, or some such authorized officer. Where, ô disconsolate soul, canst thou find such a bill sent thee from the hand of God? There is no looking for it in his Bed-chamber, in his unrevealed decrees, for they are kept private in heaven: but in his public Record▪ his Scriptures. Now these are books of Covenant, of Contract▪ not of Separation or divorce. In what place hath God said to thy sad soul, get thee gone, I will none of thee? If any clause in that sacred Instrument seems to trouble thee, do not follow the mis-interpretation of thine own brain, but consult the Dispensers of those holy Mysteries: from them thou shalt find comfort.

2. The wife, how guilty soever in her own conscience, might not take herself to be put away, except the husband had expressly given her a bill of divorce. Hath thy Husband, thy God done so to thee? Hath he anywhere set down the peremptory sentence of thy condemnation?As I live, saith the Lord, I would not the death of a sinner, nor the falling away of any soul. If of none, why of thine? He would have all men to be saved: If all, does he except thee?

3. Those bills of divorce were to be testified by witness, and these beyond exception. If thou imagine a bill of reprobation against thee, what witnesses be there to it? Here thou mayst bring in against thyself, the melancholy of a distempered brain, the uncomfortable sadness of a sullen heart, the dejection of a jealous spirit, the distrust of mercy, and diffidence in the promises of the Gospel: But are these witnesses to be heard against God? Yea, against thyself? They have not sanam mentem; their testimony is nothing worth. O but my conscience is a thousand witnesses. It is, that thou hast committed a thousand sins: it is, that thou hast received a thousand blessings. But that there is an eternal decree of reprobation against thee, thy conscience (mis-informed) can be no witness: for thou wast not called to the making of those decrees. God calls heaven and earth to witness, that he hath offered thee thy choice of life or death: but that he hath thrust death upon thee, in heaven or earth there is no witness.

4. Those bills of divorce were to be authentically sealed: but canst thou show any such bill of everlasting separation from God, with his seal to it? He hath given us two fair and broad seals of his mercy, in both the Sacraments: Seals in white, and Seals in red wax: Of white, in the participation of the candor and innocence of his Son, in our Baptism: Of red, in the participation of his Body and Blood, in the holy Supper. But for any seal of reprobation, or of irrevocable divorce from God, thou canst show none: there is none. If thou pretend such a one, because thou hast fallen into sin; know that it is but a counterfeit deed, an instrument of Satan's forging: there is neither God's hand nor seal to it. O but I am plagued more than other men? What of that? Is this a seal of God's anger? It was not to be a seal of God's favor.Whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth. For spiritual defects; there may be a scruple in thy Conscience, a perplexity in thy resolution, a darkness in thy understanding; yet who dares call all this, a seal of God's utter dereliction? For temporal sufferings, not a sudden death, not a shameful death, not a stupid death, not a raging death; must be to thyself by the way, or to those that see thine end, an evidence or seal of reprobation, or of final falling from God. That God, who hath unsearchable ways to his unsearchable ends, both bless us from all these in ourselves; and from making any of these, when they fall upon others, seals and tokens of his everlasting wrath.

5. The names of the parties must be set down, and of both the parties parents, and that to the third generation. Is there any such thing in our feigned bill? We may conceive three descents on our husbands side, in the blessed Trinity: First God the Father, then God the Son begotten of the Father; and then God the holy Ghost proceeding from the Son and the Father. The holy Spirit we know to be the God of our consolation: the Son, to be the God of our Redemption: the Father to be the God of our Creation: but can we find a God of Separation, a God of rejection among all these? We may conceive three descents on our own side: first as we are the children of dust, of nothing: next, as we are the children of Adam, reducible to nothing: last, as we are the Children of God in Christ, in whom we are all things. God hath married us in all these estates. First in the house of dust, where he made us good: then in the house of ruin, where he found us lost: and last in the house of peace and grace, where he redeemeth us in Christ. He did not put us from him in our creation, nor utterly reject us in our prevarication: and now in the house of our restitution, in the Church, in the Body of his Son, will he divorce us there? Who can suspect it?

6. Lastly, if the Bill were interlin'd, or blotted, or dropt upon, it was void. Pretend any place of Scripture that may seem to condemn thee; and know that that place is interlin'd; interlin'd by the Spirit of God, with conditions, limitations, provisions and exceptions, If thou repent, if thou return: that interlining cancels the Bill. Look well, and thou shalt find it blotted and dropt upon: the venom of the Setpent is dropt upon it: the worm-wood of thy desperation is dropt upon it: the gall of thy melancholy is dropt upon it: and this voids the bill. And if thy moody and clouded eyes cannot discern these drops; do thou drop upon it thyself. Droppe upon it the tears of true contrition and repentance: that shall void the bill. Droppe upon it the blood of thy Savior; that shall destroy the bill. Through that blood look upon the bill, and thou shalt see that it was nailed to the Cross, when he was nailed; and torn, when his body was torn: and that hath quite cancelled the bill. Now Vbi libellus? Where is the bill of your divorcement? There is none such: never imagine it, for God hath not made it. There is a Book of his Covenant with us in Jesus Christ: to that let us adhere faithfully, and we shall never fall away from his mercy.

5. Men called into the truth, may yet fall far from their own steadfastness: that is, from that measure of stability which for the present they have: Yet not totally, so as to have no firmness at all, to lose even the very foundation and principles of truth, or to suffer an utter eradication of grace: Or if they fall so fearfully, yet this lapse may not be final: the grace of God is not debarred them, nor the gate of mercy shut against them, nor is the sentence of irrevocable damnation passed upon them. Falling must needs include a mutation of state and place: he is not fallen, that is not removed from off the place, or down from the station which he had, and wherein he stood. A man may slip, or stumble, or stoop low: but if he fall, his footing was lost, his hold-fast gone. He is not Vbi erat nor Vti erat: neither Statu, nor Gradu, the same that he was before. There is a consummation, when holiness is crowned with reward in the end: and there is a continuation, which holds out to the end: and there may be an interruption; either by the seducing of others, or falling away of ourselves, in the Text: which yet is not quite secluded from mercy, nor deprived of hope: For after one, moe, many falls, there may be as many recoveries by grace. Multi dantur ad gratiam recessus: He that falleth today, may rise again tomorrow, hold out to the end, receive the reward of righteousness, and be crowned with immortal glory. In this great question, which at this present so exerciseth the studies of the Christian world; whether a man may fall from grace; or if he do fall, whether totally and not finally, or finally and totally, or neither; it were a dangerous boldness for me to determine. Non est nostrae parvitas dicere: humble Doves, must not presume to see so far as Eagles. That which I purpose to deliver concerning this argument, shall be short, profitable, and comfortable: and all this by way of application and use, in three words: Cavete, Sperate, Confidite; of Caution, Hope, Confidence.

1. Cavete, Beware: that is our Apostles rule here; so he teacheth me: it is my rule; so I desire to teach you: and let it be your rule, so to guide your own hearts. There be four degrees that incline and dispose us to falling; as it were four stairs ere we come to the bottom: Haesitatio, Remissio, Retrospectio, and Alienatio cordis: this Cavete is to be set on the forehead of them all. First, Haesitatio, a wavering; when we begin to doubt, and to question that truth, which we have so long embraced: This is the first step of falling from our own steadfastness. Unbeleefe is the bane of constancy and perseverance: of constancy in the purpose of our mind, of perseverance, in the tenor of our life. When we once come to dally with God's Word, and to regard it by halves, we are in the way to despise it, or not to regard it at all. Let him that standeth, take heed lest he fall: If the Devil can but once get us to stand still, he conceives hope of our falling. His salvation, is like the theefes; stand and deliver: no sooner stand at a stay in goodness, but presently deliver your innocence. Secondly, Remissio, a fainting; when we grow weary of the walk of righteousness. Fainting is the next step to forsaking: they that keep not their old pace, have a mind to tire. Cavete, beware of both these; Ne sistas, that thou stand not to demure: Ne deficias, that thou languish not in the way. Thirdly, Retrospectio, a looking back: so Lots wife lost herself. Her charge was, Look not back, lest thou die: she would look back, to die for it. Be not weary of well doing: It is ill to buy the ease of our body, with the hazard of our soul: but worse to look back; for that is as much as to say, we have left our heart behind. The first thing that a recreant soldier forsakes, is his courage: and the last thing that forsakes him, is his heels. He that hath but his eye set a running from the spiritual wars, means that his soul and body shall follow after. Fourthly, Alienatio cordis, an estranging of the heart; that is the lower stair: when we come to be glutted with godliness, to loath Manna, and to be weary of our obedienne. So Lots wife was weary of shifting so often; and removing from Vr to Haran, from Haran to Canaan, from Canaan to Egypt, from thence to Canaan again, then to Sodom, and now to Zoar: she takes the conceit of more troubles ensuing still: and therefore even resolves to prefer Sodom and her pleasures, before Zoar and the desolate mountains.

Cavete, beware of these dangerous precipices. First, let us think that it is the Devils suggestion; you need not make so much haste: you shall come thither time enough: Heaven will not run away. Secondly, that we forfeit all the fruit of our former well continued course, by a relapse: we have done all in vain. Nay, we have not only lost our own labor; but have caused Christ to loose his labor too; so that all his sorrows and sufferings are in vain, to us. Thirdly, let us think on the folly, Of beginning in the Spirit, and ending in the flesh: of laying a precious foundation of our house, and then finishing it with a covering of thatch. If the righteous man turn, all his righteousness shall be forgotten. Would it not grieve us, by the error of one hour, to make void the perseverance of many years? Fourthly, Let us think on the disgrace, the scandal, the infamy of this recidivation: the disgrace to ourselves, whiles we live: the scandal to others, when we are dead: and the infamy of our names to be enrolled in the Catalogue of The revolvers from the faith. Fifthly, Let us think on the difficulty to be reclaimed: when the residence of onewicked spirit is filled up with seven worse. Sixthly, Let us think on God's exemplary judgments upon the relapsed: how Lots wife in the act of her looking back was turned into a pillar of salt. We desire to repent ere we die, she was taken away in the very article of her sin. We desire to die with respite, and from sudden death we pray God to deliver us: hers was sudden: she looked backward, and never looked forward more: it was her last look. We would die the common death of mankind, and be visited after the visitation of other men. Hers was a strange kind of death. Being dead, our wish is to be buried: she remained above ground, the spectacle of God's wrath to posterity. A reed she was, a pillar she is: she was melting water, she is congealed to salt. Seventhly, Consider, that not to continue, shall speed as ill as not to begin. Non ingredienti, and Non progredientes; not to enter the way, and not to keep the way, find but little difference at last. Not to come out of the state of sin, is to perish: and to relapse when we are come out, is to perish too. One and the same end is to the sinner without repentance, and to the righteous without perseverance. Eighthly, Yea lastly, revolting believers shall justify unbelieving sinners: their frosen iniquity shall condemn our melting piety. If they be obdurate in vice, shall not we be constant in virtue? Cavete therefore: you may fall, beware you do not: you may fall very far, God keep you from it.

2. Sperate: when we consider sin in the horrid fowlness of it, we have great cause of dejection: And to him that will not fall down on his knees in repentance, for falling from his own steadfastness, I dare promise no comfort: no hope of comfort: no more than I can promise fruits to that piece of ground, upon which no moisture falls. We have erred, and so are guilty of weakness: we have erred after knowledge, and so are guilty of wickedness: we have erred after the receipt of many mercies, and so are guilty of unthankfulness: we have erred against many stops and gracious withstandings of our sin, and so are guilty of willfulness. If all this cannot humble us, and break our hearts with remorse, no Sperate: Look not for that at my hands. I dare not, I cannot open the door, when God hath shut it: no more than I can or dare shut the door, when God hath opened it. He that hath the key of David, openeth and no man shutteth, shutteth and no man openeth. He hath opened the door of mercy to repentance, and who dare shut it with a Discedite? Against impenitency he hath barred it, and who can open it with a Sperate? But when on the other side, we consider the infinite mercy of our gracious God; how far our evil comes short of his goodness; how readily he answers to the voice of repentance, how willing he is to lift up those that be down, and that call upon him for help; how able he is to re-advance the dejected: then we proclaim to all them that would stand, and yet do fall; to them that are fallen, and would rise; that are led away, and would return; Sperate, be of good cheer. God is faithful, and will not suffer you to be tempted above that you are able. I have loved you with an everlasting love. Whom he lov's, to the end he lov's. Though he fall, he shall not utterly he cast down: for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand. I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. Every sentence breaths into our fainting hearts a Sperate; sure comfort.

Though you may think in your sorrow, that you have quite left God: yet God in his purpose, hath not quite left you. But it is you say, a common complaint: The Lord hath forsaken us. Thou hast cast off and abhorred. David expostulates; Why hast thou forsaken me? Yet the Son of David came to this; My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me: Yet consider: did God forsake either of them? He might be angry with David his servant, for his grievous sins: more angry with Christ his Son, for the sins of all the world: And in their present sense, that anger might work in them an apprehension of his forsaking them: But he did not forsake them, nor will he forsake thee: thou mayest think so, but God will not do so. Who should occasion such a forsaking? It must be either God, or thyself: Cedo tertium: no devising of a third. Satan is an enemy, and God will not hear him: thou knowest him a liar, do not then believe him. God will not do it, he never forsakes first. If it be done, it must be thy fault: and if thou acknowledge that it is done for thy fault, it is not done: for that acknowledgement implies a free confession: that confession proceeds from a true repentance: repentance procures a pardon: and what is pardoned, is as if it never was committed.

3. Confidite: Let us trust in the Lord's strength, by which alone we may be kept from falling; and in the Lord's mercy, by which alone we may be raised up when we are fallen. So feeble are we without the supportation of grace, that there oftentimes appears very little difference between the righteous and unrighteous. Both are subject to, and the former more exercised with temptations. When a bad motion is suggested, the wicked receive it, and delight in it: and by your favor, so did David as well as Saul: and so do we all too often. The wicked give consent of will to it: so do the other, if grace but a little hide it self. They practice it: so sometimes do the righteous, if the Spirit restrain them not. The ungracious lie in sin: and so do the other, till God raise them. Where then is the difference? Surely, somewhat in the persons: the ungodly are carried into sin without resistance: the other are over-borne with violence, but not without resistance, Malum quod nolo, facio. But the main difference is in the mercy of God: if we escape temptation, it is his mercy: if we stand in temptation, it is his mercy: if our wills consent not, it is his mercy; if we consent and the act be hindered, it is his mercy: if we fall and rise again by repentance, all is his mercy. All our trust stands in his mercy, Not that thereby we should be encouraged to fall; for that were presumption: but being fallen, that thereby we should hope to rise again; and so be kept from desperation. We are nothing in ourselves; we have no way but to trust in JESUS CHRIST.

6. It is dangerous to fall at any time; but then worst, when we have stood some time in the truth. To have steadfastness, and not to hold it; after long standing, then to fall, is deadly. The nearer to heaven, the sorer bruise in falling down to the earth. For the winter brooks, if they dry: for the summer fruits, if they rotte: for the morning clouds, if they scatter: for the shallow-rooted corn, if that wither: for flitting and unstable professors, if they languish: the grief is the less, because there was little better hope of them.

But for men that have embraced the Truth, a long time defended it, suffered many injuries for the defense of it; digested the bitterness of many sorrows, when that shown them their sins; and sucked the sweetness of many comforts, when that assured them of forgiveness: that these men, after all this, should fall from their own steadfastness: Proh dolor! How can it be thought on without tears? Pharaoh could seem religious when the fit took him: every great plague did put him into a fever, and then he was godly on the sudden. O pray for me now. But when the fit was over, Pharaoh was Pharaoh again; as profane as ever. Nine times he began to relent, and nine times again he hardened his heart. But he was never good, egg nor bird: his beginning was naught, his proceeding worse, and who could look for any better at his latter end? Saul kept himself well for two years, Judas for three years, and (as it is storied) Nero for five years: yet all fell into damnable wickedness: scarce three worse in the world.

But most lamentable is the memory of Lots wife: How long did she stand steadfast? By computation of time, from Abraham's going out of Vr, to the destruction of Sodom, it was thirty years; so long did she abide in the family of the faithful, full thirty years. She escaped the superstitions of Egypt, she was not defiled with the sins of Sodom: neither the famine of Canaan, nor the fullness of the cities of the plain, made her fall away: She endured much with Abraham and Lot, in their exile, in their travel, in all their afflictions. Yet she that escaped all these perils on the sea of this world, shipwrackes in the very Haven; at the entry of Zoar: where she should have saved her life, she willfully lost it. How should we tremble at these precedents? what a sensible impression should we take of our own weakness? Let the wicked be like goats; the elder they grow, the worse and more fulsome meat they are: and in their old age, not edible, not indurable. But that men should appear sheep all their days, and in their latter end turn to goats, from pillars in the Church, for their steadfastness; to reeds in the wilderness, for their •evity; is sad news to Heaven and Earth, to Angels and Men: and only welcome tidings to the fiends in Hell. Beware therefore, let us not verifie Nebuchadnezzar's dream, to be golden proselites, brazen professors, iron polititians, and then to end our old age in clay. Let not our souls turn to clay, before our bodies be turned into clay. But rather in this, let us be like Fame, which vires acquirit eundo; Or let our goodness be a river; which is small at the spring or beginning, but enlargeth it self, gathers in fresh watets, fills the channel, and at last empties it self into the Ocean of mercy.

7. Lastly, the summary use, the principal scope, the main antidote to prevent all this, is Perseverance to the end. When God had created the Light, it is added, He saw that it was good. When he had created and disposed the Heaven, the Earth, the Waters, He saw that it was good. When he had distinguished the lights of Heaven, He saw that it was good. When he had blessed the earth to bring forth Plants, Grass, Herbs, and made the Beasts and Cattle to feed upon it: He saw that it was good. When he had replenished the Air with Fowls, the Water with Fishes; He saw that it was good. He gave them all his approbation, and commended them everyone in the beginning; Vidit quod bonum: each in particular, all in general, very good. But when he came to man, and had made him for whom he made all the rest, he paused upon the matter, and never graced him with the least commendation in the beginning. What might be the reason? Saint Ambrose gives it, Prius probandus, quàm laudandus: he was first to be tried, and respectively to be commended. In Christianis non laudantur initia, sed finis. I will keep thy statutes always, even unto the end. We belong to Christ, if we hold fast the confidence, and rejoicing of hope firm unto the end. We are partakers of Christ, if we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end. Bee thou faithful unto the death, and I will give thee a crown of life. To him that keepeth my words unto the end, will I give the morning star. This is the way to be safe while we live, and to be saved when we die. We have many considerations and motives to spurr us on to perseverance.

1. Without this, all our service is a maimed sacrifice. If a sacrifice be offered to God, he likes it not, unless it come entire; cum cauda, with it's latter end. No defective oblation pleaseth: the lame and sick will be refused by the very Governor. It must have horn and hoof: and not want so much as a tail: for the tail-piece (by name) is disposed of in the sacred Rituals. To show that no holy course is accepted, if it be not closed up with a good end. The holy oil which was poured on Aaron's head, ran down to the skirts of his vestiment: In extremis deficere, if God do not find the unction of his grace in the conclusion of our life; if that be dried up in the skirts; we might as well have neither had garment nor oil at all. Perseverance is the sister of patience, the daughter of constancy, the mother of peace, the mistress of concord: Nutrix ad virtutem, mediatrix ad premium. Muria virtutum, saith Gregory: the pickle and preserver of virtues, without which they will putrefy. The Salt of the Covenant, without which the flesh of our sacrifice will take wind and corrupt.

2. Vnstedfastnes is an argument of unsoundnes: they that are not constant, never were sincere. A friend loveth at all times; forever: and he was never a true friend, that ceaseth to be so. He that truly loves Christ, never leaves him. Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations: I, that's the trial: they love him indeed, that love him in his distress. It was a just complaint of that rebellious generation, that their spirit was not steadfast with God; their heart was not right with him. Though it be an argument a Posteriore, yet it holds: if we see men give over their loyalty to God at last, their hearts were never upright with him at the first. God takes up no room in the corporation of man, for his bedchamber, but the heart: He lies at the sign of the Heart. Therefore the voice of constancy is, Paratum cor, my heart is ready: If thou wilt make me a king, paratum cor: if I must continue a shepherd, still paratum cor. So Paul was ready for honor, ready for disgrace; for poverty or riches, for joy or sorrows, for life or death; for all ready. Such a Christian is well shod: he will hold out to the latter end.

3. It is a rule in the civil law: That is as good as nothing, which holdeth not. Nihil dicitur factum, quamdiu aliquid superest ad agendum. A Will unfinished, is no Will: a deed, unless it be signed, sealed, and delivered, is no deed. In the paying of money upon bond, the want of a shilling forfeits a hundred pounds. Nisi totum soluitur, nihil solvitur: nec absolutus est debitor qui multa reddit, sed qui omnia. They that wrought in the vineyard, must labor to the evening, before they have the reward: will any master think his servants days work done, when he goes to bed at noon? Is that house finished, which wants a roof? Concedunt prima postremis: the former part of our life yieldeth unto the latter, and the latter carries it quite away from the former. The sinner that repents, hath his wickedness blotted out: in his present righteousness he shall live: The righteous that relapseth shall not have his righteousness mentioned: in his present sin he shall die. Secundum quod sumus, non quod fuimus, we shall be judged. Mary Magdalene was a sinner at first, at last a Saint: so a Saint she shall be found in Judgment, not a sinner. Herod heard John; good was his beginning: he did many things well; better was his proceeding: but when he concluded with the murder of John, this marred all. His beginning is forgotten, his proceeding not thought on, but his conclusion was his confusion; that sent him to hell. Judas shall not be judged as a Preacher, but as a traitor: not according to his Apostleship, wherein he lived: but according to his treachery, wherein he died. Our first love will do us no good, if we forsake it: nor our beginning in the Spirit, if we end in the flesh. As Gregory the great was said to be the first of the bad Bishops of Rome, and the last of the good ones: The first of the bad, because he brought in Innovations: and the last of the good, because there never came any so good after him. So our standing at a pause in religion, and weighing (with Demas) the truth of the Gospel in one balance, for which we are so troubled; with the peace of the world in the other balance, by which we may be so enriched, may be called the first of our bad actions, and the last of our good ones. The first of our bad; for he that shall but dare to bring Christ in competition with the world once, hath ingratly sinned: The last of our good: for to try the spirits, and by examination of the truth to confirm our own faith, may be a good work: but Christ so scorns to be put into the scales with the world, that he justly gives that man over to the world, which durst offer to rank it with Christ.

4. The end of everything is all in all. Terminus ad quem dat appellationem: The end for which a thing is ordained, denominates it. Ante obitum nemo beatus: die well, then blessed. Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord: they that die blessed, are sure to live blessed forever. Blasphemers and secure transgressors were so hedged in with prosperity, that David stood at a maze, wondering what the Lord meant to do with them: at last he was let into the Sanctuary, and suffered to behold, and then he understood their end; which was indeed sudden destruction. But mark the righteous, and the end of that man is peace. The children of this world seeing the righteous so encompassed with troubles; their eyes still wet, their whole life excercised with sufferings, give them for lost men, quite out of God's books: but mark their end: Now they are numbered among the children of God, and their lot is among the Saints: Loe now the wicked are of another mind. We say, All is well that ends well: so the main end of our whole life, should be to make a good end of our life. We may also say; That is ill which ends ill: he that dies a bad man, was never indeed a good one. In show there might be little difference: but the end distinguisheth all, as St. Bernard speaks of Paul and Judas. Judas been coepit, sed male finivit: quamvis Paulus been finivit, male coepit. The bulrush, in the fable, derided the vine, that it must endure such digging, and weeding, such pampination or pruning, and binding, and be vexed with such a deal of trouble, only to yield man a little good liquor: whereas the other without any molestation might enjoy it own happiness. Summer comes, the Sun scorches, yet still the vine flourishes shaded with leaves, and loden with fruits: but the moisture of the bulrush being spent, it hangs down the head, and droopes, and withers; and being trodden upon with beasts, confeeth that the end is all: in vain is it in the beginning to flourish, and in the end to perish.

5. Christ persevered for us: and shall not we persevere for Him? In Him? To Him? He was a Friend indeed; for He loved to the last. To the end, shall I say? Nay more; of his love there is no end. There was no beginning of his love, nor can there be an ending. He is not only the Founder, but the Finisher of our salvation. To signify this, He appeared to Saint John, vestitus podêre, in a long garment down to his lower end. He never rested, till He could triumph in his Consummutum est: till all was done, that was to be done, for the accomplishment of our Redemption. Much He endured, and that much long, even to the last gasp. How strangely was that heavenly Vine pruned upon earth? His honor was pruned cultro Ignominiae: his peace, cultro Inimicitiae: his estate, cultro Paupertatis: his friends, cultro Persecutionis: and yet He held out, till his life was pruned cultro Mortis. Nor was this a common death: but Tristius ipsa Morte genus mortis. My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death. Not his scourges, nor his Thorns, nor his nails, made Christ open his mouth; but the sorrow of his soul. Why then did He not give over? All that He was to endure that night and the day following, was presented to his mind, when He said, My soul is heavy even unto death. Why then did He not draw back? Why did He not follow Peters counsel; Hoc tibi non fiat, this shall not be unto thee? No, the love of our souls triumphed over the love of his own life: on He will go, and persevere He will, till his last drop of blood be spent on the Cross for us. Yea, what King ever went so willingly to be crowned, as He to be crucified? Who so gladly from execution, as He to it? What man was ever so desirous to save his life, as Christ was to lose it? Witness that speech; I have a Baptism to be baptized with, and how am I pained till it be accomplished? His mind was in pain, till his body and soul came to it. And to him that dissuaded Him from it, He used no other terms than to the Devil himself; Avoid Satan. So willingly went He to it, so unwillingly would He be kept from it. He went on foot when He was to preach and do good: but He rode for haste, when He was to suffer evil. His willingness was so great, that his blood would not stay the Executioners leisure, but did burst out into a Sweat, a strange Sweat, in his bitter Agony in the Garden.

All this He foresaw before He suffered: and whiles He did foresee, He suffered. This made his soul so heavy: it might arise from three Causes: Ex objectorum gravitate; never sorrow like his sorrow, for never sufferings like his sufferings. Ex patientis susceptibilitate: He was able (through that hypostatical union) to suffer all that God's Justice could inflict; all the punishments due to all the sins of all men. Ex doloris simplicitate; no relief, no ease, no comfort: He found never a Reuben to say, Let us not kill him, for he is our brother. There was no such clear apprehension of sin as in Him: He saw it in all the fowlenesse. No such perfect detestation of sin as in Him: He hated it with all extremeness: yet He must suffer for it: The Lord laid on Him the iniquities of us all. He foreknew all this: why did He not prevent it? Why did it not dishearten Him? He was safe enough; who could touch Him? He was at supper among his friends; why did He go into the Garden among his enemies, where the Traitor waited for Him? His Apprehenders fell backward with a word of his mouth: why then did He not leave them? When He had smarted with the scourges, why would He endure the Thorns? Losing so much blood with the Thorns, why would He yield to the nails? O Lord, how little sorrow makes us draw back, and slinke away from Thee? Yet no torments could procure Thee to forsake us? Thus did Christ persevere unto the death, that He might save us: and shall not we persevere all our life in our service to Him? He is Alpha and Omega: not only Alpha, for his happy beginning: but Omega, for his thrice happy ending. He never left us, till He had made it sure that God would never leave us. Now the highest act of Religion, is for the Christian to conform himself unto Christ. He never fell from us: we are basely unthankful, if ever we fall from Him.

6. God Himself is eternal, who expects our service. Now what hath levity and inconstancy to do with eternity? When doth God give overfeeding, and protecting, and blessing of us; that we should give over serving of Him? In youth? No, Thou hast upholden me ever since I was borne. In old age? No, I am feeble and gray-headed; but thou art my comforter. In my joy? No, For thou makest my cup to overflow. In my sorrow? No, For in the multitude of the sorrows in my heart, thy comforts refresh my soul. At any other time? No, For thou wilt never leave me, nor forsake me. Is there any time then for us us to forget Him in? In our jollity? No, I will remember thee in my mirth. In our sorrows? No, In trouble we will visit thee, and pray when thy chastening is upon us. In youth? No, then we must remember our Creator. In our old age? No, let Asa's example forewarn us of that. The Lord takes charge of us so long as we have any being: therefore so long as we have any being, let us look to the charge of the Lord. If God blesseth thee, O Christian, in aeterno suo: He looks that thou shouldest serve Him in aeterno tuo. His love lasts longer than our service: yet let our service last as long as our life: this is all we can do, and our gracious Maker asks no more.

7. The reward of our service is eternal; why should not our service be so? Why should not God require a long lasting obedience, for an everlasting recompense? Why not, holiness unto the end, for a blessing in the end, which shall be without end? Gaudium in fine, sed gaudium sine fine. Indeed it is base, merely to serve for the reward. That is causa impulsiva, not causa constituens or efficiens: for the good man would be good, were there no Heaven. The Heathens called virtue, Bonum Theatrale: as if a man would not be virtuous, if he had no spectators, to take notice of him. But it is false: for virtue will be as clear in solitudine, as in Theatro; though not so conspicuous: only it may grow more strong by the observation and applause of others, as an heat that is doubled by the reflection. Of two Horses, the one will go well without the spurr, the other will go better with the spurr: Shall we say of this latter, Tush the life of this Horse lies but in the spurr? No, for the spurr is no matter of impediment, but an ordinary instrument. So the reward, which is glory, and honor and eternal life, are but the spurs to righteousness and good works; which would often lagge and languish without them: and these are ever ready to attend upon goodness. So though we would run well without a reward, yet the consideration of this reward may make us amend our pace. The Lord and Giver of life did not refuse the proposed reward. Who for the joy that was set before him, endured the Cross. Though he were the fountain of joy, and had it infinitely in himself; yet the better to bear out his sorrowess in the way, he propounded to himself the joy in the end. I know that verus amor non sumit vires de spe; it loveth without hope of benefit: yet to quicken our love, which is so apt to faint, let us remember the reward. The foreheads of the righteous are marked with Tau: which (as Omega in the Greek) is the the last letter in the Hebrew Alphabet; and the sign of Consummatum est, among them. Now these Titles are inseparable to the reward. It is not only a life, but a Life everlasting: not only an Inheritance, but an Inheritance incorruptible: Not only a Kingdom, but a Kingdom that cannot be shaken: Not only a Crown, but a Crown of Immortality. These be the attributes that belong to the reward; and must not the like belong to the service? Aeternitatis Imago Perseverantia. All that we can do, is to serve God whiles we live: and all that we can wish, is to reign with God when we die. O then let us fixe our eyes on the prize, and gather up our feet to the race, and still tendere in anteriora: forgetting the things behind, and pressing toward the mark, for the price of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

8. As Perseverance is the Queen of all virtues, Quia ea sola coronatur. so it is also, Quia Satanas ei soli insidiatur: the devil is ever fighting against the latter end. As the king of Syria charged his captains, to fight neither with small nor great, save only with the king of Israel: So the Prince of darkness commands his commanders, the leaders of his troupes, and those that stand at the head of his companies, his master-temptations; not to fight against any virtue, small or great, but only against Perseverance in goodness: Quam solam novit coronari, upon whose head he knows the Crown must fall. He bestirs himself; not only because he knows his own time to be short, but because he perceives our time to be short. Therefore he redoubles his forces, as if he still meant to make the last conflict the sorest: resolving to set all at that stake, and either now to win, or to sit down with loss and despair. The most fiery dart in his quiver, he reserveth to our death bed: if we can quench that, the enemy is hopeless. Good cause have we then to make much of Perseverance, which the devil would so fain get from us. Eternal life is not given to all, for then we would all presume: nor to none, for then we would all despair: but vincenti dabitur, it is given to him that overcometh. Fight therefore to the last minute: the eye of thy Savior is upon thee; if thou faint, to cheare thee; if thou fight, to second thee; if thou conquer, to crown thee. So that no combat, no conquest: no conquest, no triumph. Continuance is the crown of all other graces, and heaven shall be the crown of continuance.

9. The wicked are constant in their sins: why are not we so in holiness? They labor hard for that which shall confound them, and shall we think any pains too much for that which shall save us? They will not be persuaded to break off their sins by repentance: and shall we be tempted to break off our repentance by sin? If they will know no period of their rebellion, till they sink down into hell: for shame let us know no date of our obedience, till we come up into heaven. Wickedness, like the sea, hath bounds: God by his blessed providence, hath limited the raging waves of them both: but goodness knows no limitation. They cannot be so evil as they would, we have liberty to be so good as we can. The children of grace, and the children of disobedience, have their several races: they set out together: heaven is the gaole of the former, hell of the other: indeed the wicked may sooner and more easily get to their Journeys end; for facilis descensus: it is but tumbling down the hill: yet though we cannot be in heaven so soon as they are in hell, we may be as sure of the joys of the one, as they are of the pains of the other, if we hold on our journey. Though our salvation be with more difficulty wrought up, than their perdition; yet grace, time, and diligence may work it up in due season. You find none of them hankering in the ways of sin: the drunkard will hold out till he have lost his eyes: the incontinent, till he hath wasted his loins: the contentious, till he hath beggared his purse. Quis pudor, quod infaelix populus Dei non tantam habent perseverantiam in bono, quantam mali in malo? If ever they turn from sin, it is God's especial grace that gives them repentance: but when we fall from our steadfastness, it is through the defect of our own perseverance. The Lord make the former good, and the other better unto the end!

10. Lastly, it is Perseverance alone that carrieth away the crown. Finis, non pugna, coronat. Patience and perseverance are fellow-laborers in God's harvest: they work together, they sweat together: they suffer together: and if either of them be compelled to bear the heavier lode, it is Patience: yet though Patience endure the burden, Perseverance goes away with the blessing. The Lord blessed the latter end of Job: yet he was blessed very well in the beginning: For he had seven thousand sheep, three thousand camels, five hundred yoke of oxen, five hundred she asses: and for the heirs of all this substance, seven sons and three daughters. But his extraordinary blessing came at the last, when all his temptations were past: in the latter end of his book, and the latter end of his patience: God blessed the latter end of Job. The main matter is not In quo medio, sed in quibus extremis. Men are either cursed or blessed, not as they suffer in the middle, but as they speed in the end. Job might have some blessings in the beginning, sure he had many troubles in the midst, but his end made amends for all: God blessed the latter end of Job. Christianity is compared to a race: now in a race, all that run, win not: only one receiveth the price. He gets the garland, that first gets the gaole. But in this spiritual race it is otherwise: Not he that cometh first, but everyone that holds out to the last, is crowned. Non qui primus venerit, sed qui cunque pervenerit. I deny not, but we must also make hast and not only strive to out-run them that run with us, but even to out-run ourselves. Let this days pace mend yesterdayes, and to morrows exceed them both. Old age, in secular races, is the more unwieldy disposition: but in this, the more vigorous, as being near the end of the course, and almost having the prize in hand.

The Schoolmen make of this Perseverance, not any one particular virtue, but Conditionem annexam cuilibet virtuti, a condition implied in every virtue. I is Dei donum, quo coetera servantur dona: God's rare and especial gift; the maintainer and preserver of all his other gifts. Without this, faith would languish into diffidence, hope give over her expectation, patience sink under her burden, and charity be weary of well-doing. Perseverance to virtue, is like the lungs to the heart; which keeps it in breath, and encourageth it to the end of the race. He that endureth unto the end, shall be saved: and he that doth not, shall lose all that he hath done. Comming but a foot short, may make a man miss the prize, and lose the wager he ran for. As in travel to a city, he loseth all his pains in the way, that gets not to his journeys end. True it is, that every good and perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights. The virtues that adorn a Christian soul, do everyone of them claim kindred of almighty God: Et Deus est in vtroque parente: they descend from him in the one, and the other line. Yet Perseverance is vnica filia, his only daughter and heir, which carries away all the Patrimony. Cùm enim omnes virtutes currant in stadio, sola Perseverantia accipit bravium. Patience, repentance, temperance, all run well: only Perseverance to the end gets the Cup; the cup of God's blessing: as God blessed the latter end of Job. Our blessed Savior once provided a Table on earth, for the people, who had continued with him three days: not because they heard him, and a little followed him; but Quia perseverarunt, because they continued with him. And he hath promised a Table in heaven; Ye shall eat and drink at my table in my kingdom: but to whom? Not to those that only heard him with some attention, and followed him with some admiration: but to them only Qui permanserunt, that continued with him. Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations. To teach us, that both these Tables, the blessings of earth, and the blessings of heaven too, are provided only for them, which persevere in their righteousness unto the end.

All those graces which the holy Ghost hath wrought in us, must be cherished and continued to the latter end; for of those the Lord only blesseth the latter end. Patience is an excellent grace, but without Perseverance it would often be to seek: as when an unwonted blow comes, the Fencer is put from his ward. Repentance is a happy and necessary grace, yet without Perseverance it would be dashed out of countenance, and be jeered for a sullen melancholy: Lacrymâ nihil citius arescit: nothing dryes up faster than a tear: it seldom continues moist a whole day. Obedience it self would lose the reward by coming short, but for Perseverance: for no virtue can expect those eternal blessings, but that which holds out to the latter end. Nothing but Eternity can look to be rewarded with eternity. Per nostrum aeternum consequimur Dei aeternum. If we look for a happynesse that shall continue as long as God's being, we must continue in a holiness which shall last as long as our being; I mean our mortal being on earth. So that no grace can lay claim to that blessedness, which is in the eternity of God; but Perseverance to the end, which is the eternity of man. We would be happy upon earth, but especially we desire to be blessed in heaven: we cannot rise from the one to the other, but Per scansum: Jacob's ladder is our way. Let us begin at the foot, which is grace here below: and so get up to the top, which is glory there above. But still remembering the state and condition of that Ladder: there were Angels descending, and Angels ascending: but none sitting, none standing still. If we desire to have our faith blessed with vision, our hope changed into fruition, our repentance comforted with pardon, our charity crowned with glory, and all our service rewarded with eternal life; let us keep these graces in breath and motion, ever in the ascendent, climbing higher and higher, till they come to the top of Immortality. And as when rivers toward their end, approach near unto the sea, then the tide comes and meets them: So when the course of our piety draweth near to the end of our life, God comes and meets us; comforts us with a taste of heaven before our death, and gives us, after death, the everlasting possession of it through Jesus Christ.

We see (by this time) the manifold dangers, and manifest ruins, which follow upon the falling away from our own steadfastness: But Quid ista proderit praenosse, si non contingat evadere? Take therefore some short rules, to keep you constant in the way.

1. Begin with resolution: forecast the worst, and prepare for it. Et aequissimum spera, & ad iniquissimum te para. Son professors are but like those that go to sea upon pleasure: they purpose to sails no further, than they see the way clear before them: if the sea begin to work, or they to be sick, back again with all hast to the shore. But the right Christian is bound for heaven, as the merchant is for his Port: storms and tempests cannot affright them: on they go, through fair or fowl, till they arrive at the desire of their own hearts. Resolve to continue, or never begin.

2. Fortifie thy heart with sincerity: be that within, which thou wouldst appear without. Nihil fictum, diuturnum. A false gloss disgraceth the stuff. Caduca sunt, quaecunque fucata sunt. Counterfeit pearls will not hold their luster. If our heart be not right, we cannot be steadfast: theseed among stones will not prosper: hollow-hearted, and shallow-rooted, soon gone.

Whereas the firm plant Sole ardent nutritur & virescit, non arescit. As Jehu to Iehonadab, Is thine heart right? Then come up into my chariot: Come up; no descending, but all ascending and rising then. Some have a form of godliness, but deny the power thereof: all because they are not sound at the heart, A man is what he is, when he is tried: the times of peace show no difference: every man then thinks himself good, but knows not whether he be so or not. Persecution is the touchstone: then many of the forward slinke away; and they that made the least show of religion, stick closest to it. The outward profession of some is a blaze; the inward holiness of others a spark: persecution is the bellows, which blows the spark into a flame, the blaze into nothing; to the wonder of all men.

3. Keep a good conscience in all things, and thy faith from shipwreck. Conscience is the Bark, and Faith the commodity imbarqued: if the Bark miscarry, what shall become of the commodity? Sins against conscience make fowl breaches in this ship: Repentance indeed is the Calker, to stop the leaks: but it is better to prevent the making of a breach, than put it to the remedy of stopping. We deal with our conscience, as with our apparel: when we have got on a new suite, fresh and fair, we are very chary of abusing it: we take heed where we sit, what we touch, or against what we lean: but when it once grows a little old, soiled and sullied, we have no such regard of it: we little pass what we do with it, nor mind where we cast it, So the uxorious husband at the first Idolizeth his wife: no noise must disturb her, the cold wind must not blow upon her, the Sun must be shaded from her beauty, her feet must scarce touch the Earth; nothing must offend her: she commands all: her will is a law. The sinner that is suddenly turned zealous professor, is no less tender over his conscience: not a word must pass his lips, nor a thought be admitted into his heart, without her strict examination and approbation. But full soon doth that dotard grow sick of his wife, and this zealot grow weary of his conscience: their loves will languish, and if they do not fall into the other extreme, of abusing their wives; yet they could both be content to become widdowers. The new suite is brushed, and carefully looked to: the wife at first is tenderly regarded: and the conscience for a while is kept most pure. But ere long, the suite will grow old, the wife stale, and the conscience troublesome; and there is no more respect had of them: so little duration there is in extreemes.

4. Encourage thy heart to perseverance, by considering how short a time is set down for thy laboriousnesse. So we to God Remember how short my time is: So God returns it to us; yea O man, remember this thyself, and be not weary of thy pains. Punctum est quod vivimus: and what can be long in that, which is so short of it self? Be faithful unto death; no longer is required: it is a note of stint, as well as of extent, there. Not that our fidelity to Christ shall then cease, but then it shall be out of the danger of ceasing. Do but hold out to that day, and then thou art sure forever. It is but for a spurt, for a brunt, that we serve and suffer: and who would not for a short brunt or spurt endure any hardnesse, to live at hearts ease forever after? We would serve a hard and unkind master upon such terms: much more a Lord so kind and liberal, that came to serve for us, ere he required this service of us. It is not long, but light, which is exacted of us, in respect of that which is expected by us, and promised to us. Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

2 PET. 3.18.

But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ: To him be glory both now and forever. Amen.

THose things that God intended not for multiplication, were made perfect in their first being. Perfect in nature, there needed no completion: Perfect in number, there needed no addition: Perfect in order: there needed no mutation: Perfect in measure, there needed no augmentation: Perfect in degree, there needed no melioration. The stars do not propagate: one star does not beget another: therefore God in the Creation made as many stars, as he purposed there should be. The Angels do not multiply: one Angel cannot beget another: therefore at first they were made in an abundant number. Nor needs there any accession of goodness or happiness to their being, for they are perfectly good, absolutely happy, according to their condition. But for the things of this world, their blessing was a Crescite: and therefore their number was but small at the beginning, because they were made capable of a propagation. So mankind began with two, in the Creation: and the world was replenished by eight, in that restitution after the deluge. From those first two, how many millions have been and shall be derived? The Earth is full, Heaven shall be full, and it is to be feared that Hell will be full too; and all of persons sprung from their loins. Bee fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth. This had been an infinite blessing, if Adam had stood in his innocence, and begot such as himself was Statu primo: but alas, he begot such as himself was Statu lapsio. The bitterness whereof he tasted in his first borne son Cain▪ who was a fratricide and a reprobate. It is worth our observation: the first man that died, went to Heaven: the first man that was borne went to Hell. Death is a punishment; yet though it seized on Abel, he was saved. Primogeniture was an honor; especially to be (though not the first man, yet) the first borne of mankind: Cain had this honor, and yet perished. Adam and Eve begat children in their own likeness; but they could not beget them in the likeness of God. They were created in his image, but in his image they could propagate none. By nature we increase our kind, but it must be by grace, if any of our kind be blessed.

Thus we still multiply, nor shall there be a cessation of this increase, till God puts a stop into the wheels of time, and sets a period to all things. But this is not the full extent of that Crescite: There is a vegetative life in the body, whereby it grows in stature: and there is a quickening Spirit in the soul, whereby it grows in goodness. The tree bears a seed, by which it may bring forth other trees of the kind; and yet withal, the same tree may grow in it self, both in respect of bulk, talnesse, and fruits. There is a Crescere in the one, and a Multiplicare in the other. If the body may grow in his capacity, why not the soul, in her capacity? The body may grow in quantity, till it become greater and taller: Why may not the soul grow in grace till it become holier; and grow in knowledge, till it become wiser, than it was before? The Stars are at their highest, the Angels are at their happiest: they cannot grow more bright or glorious. But men may grow from sinners to Saints, by repentance; and from Saints (as it were) to Angels, by holiness. We come not immediately from our mothers wombs so perfect men, nor immediately from the sacred Font so perfect Christians, but that we may admit a time of growing. We have the parts, but not the degrees of perfection. He that was perfection it self, yet would yield to the course of nature, and order and regulate his life by the direction of that. Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and Men. In him dwelt the fullness of the Godhead bodily: He was the wisdom of God, and the only beloved of God: yet would he increase in all these, in wisdom, and stature, and favor with God and man. So must we Grow till we come to a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ.

But grow in grace, and in the knowledge, &c.] We read of two Trumpets which Moses was commanded to make of silver. So we have here two Trumpets: one sounding from Heaven to Earth, Cressite in gratia, grow in grace: the other resounding from the Earth to Heaven, Christo sit gloria, to Jesus be glory. The former soundeth forth a point of Theology; the latter, a point of Doxology. The sound from Heaven, is a point of Theology or Divinity, summoning us to an increase of Grace. The sound from Earth, is a point of Doxology, or thanksgiving: returning to God praise and glory. When God gave the Law, it was delivered with the sound of Trumpets: when he requires the Law, it shall be with the sound of Trumpets: in tuba novissima. In both the Angels are the Ministers: in both, the instruments are Trumpets. So after a metaphorical sense in the Gospel, both in respect of what comes from Christ, and what is returned to Christ; here is a Trumpet, and a Trumpet: The one for proclamation, the other for acclamation: the proclamation of Grace, the acclamation of Glory: Grace proffered by him, Glory ascribed to him. I will take the cup of salvation, and praise the Name of the Lord. So here is Sumam calicem, in the one: and Laudabo nomen, in the other.

In the sound of the former Trumpet, two things are remarkable. 1. The ground of the lesson; the grace and knowledge of Jesus Christ. 2. The descant upon it, and elongation of the note; Grow in this grace and knowledge. In the sound of the other Trumpet, there are three notes. 1. Quid what; Glory. 2. Cui, to whom: to Christ Jesus. 3. Quamdiu, how long: now and forever. There is a time when this Trumpet from Heaven shall cease: The Angelical Trumpet shall put an end to the Evangelical Trumpet. There can be no time of profering or receiving grace, when time it self shall be no more. No growing, then, for the harvest is come. No increasing then; for all they that are not full, shall be sent away empty. But the latter Trumpet shall sound always: glory to God, is the song of the Church militant, unto the end: and the song of the Church triumphant, after the end, without end. All the Saints and Angels shall sound this Trumpet, and sing this ditty forever: Blessing, honor and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth on the Throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever.

The Text begins as the World began, with a Crescite: and ends as the Bible ends, with an Amen. There is Fiat in either of them: that we may grow in grace; there needs God's Fiat to that: that we may set forth his glory; there is required our Fiat to this. This Amen is an echo, the answer to both these Trumpets, and hath relation to both the Corollaries. Christ wisheth grace to us, and we say Amen to this: we wish glory to Christ, and add again Amen to that. That his grace may be increased in us; Amen to that: That his glory may be advanced by us; Amen to that too. In regard of God's favor, and man's thankfulness; to them both, Amen. Thus the root of the tree is the Grace of God, and the top of the tree is the Glory of God. Grace in the foundation, Glory in the roof of the building. Blessing in the beginning, and blessing in the end: It begins with God's blessing of us, it ends with our blessing of God; who is blessed forever. Amen.

In the sound that comes from heaven, which is an hortatory persuasion, there be two principal things to be observed. Fundamentum, and Incrementum: Grace, and Growth. Radix arboris, and Accretio arboris. No growing without a root, and no live root from which there is no growing. Christ is the Roote, Grace the sap, and knowledge the fruits: for so we shall find it to be, Cognitio practica; which consists merely in the production of good works. Christ is the Roote that supporteth us, Grace is the sap which he communicates to us, and knowledge or obedience is the fruit he expects from us. Grace hath the first room in the Text, and so it shall have in my discourse. Wherein two circumstances sum up all. 1. What it is. 2. Of what value it is.

1. What it is. The poets took Grace pro venustate: with them, beauty in the face, was a grace: comelynes in their carriage, a grace: handsomenes in wearing their garments, a grace: pleasantnes in their discourse, a grade: bravery in their actions, a grace: but by their leaves, it was but a Poetical grace. We have those that take Grace in a worse sense; even for that which is most ungracious; Sin: He that wantonly can court his mistress, is said to do it with a grace. He that justifies an untrueth, and bears it out with a smooth impudence, is said to come off with a grace. When a gallant mannageth a fowl quarrel, his abettors will not stick to say, that he carries it with a grace. Yea of the very desperate blasphemer, his parasites will not be ashamed to report, that he swears with a grace. But if this be a grace, certainly it is a diabolical grace; it came from hell. The poets grace owes much to nature and education: the sinners grace is indebted to the devil and corruption: The former may pass, the latter is intolerable. God forbid that we should grow in such grace.

Divine Grace is another thing: as it springs from a higher generation, so it is of a nobler disposition. As there be diverse acceptions of it in the Scripture, so infinite distinctions of it in the School. There is Gratia increata, the free love and favor of God, which is called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : so to Mary, Invenisti gratiam cum Deo: Thou hast found favor with God. And Gratia creata or Infusa; which are the gifts of the first Grace, called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : so every good gift, natural, moral, or spiritual, is Grace. Some would have 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 to signify only saving Grace: and Charismata, such common graces as may be in the wicked. All grace is God's gift; nor will he give it to those that will not receive it. Non est dare nisi Dei: non est accipere nisi hominis. The grace of God is without our will, but it is not within us without our will. The Papists speak in the dialect of that harlot to Solomon: Nec mihi, nec illi, sed dividatur: Neither all to God, nor all to man, but let it be divided betwixt grace and free will. This is false and injurious to God: for all goodness is from grace. It is either Gratia praeveniens, that converteth: or Gratia subsequens, that confirmeth. So St. Augustine: Gratia praevenit, ut velimus: Gratia subsequitur, ne frustra velimus. The cause of God's grace to us, is merely in himself: the internal motive is his own free love: the external impulsive is the merit of Christ, The effects of it are either Eternal, in our election: or temporal, in our vocation, and sanctification. The gifts of grace are either common to all, or peculiar to the elect. There is gratia Privativa, that keeps us from evil: and Positiva, that plants us with good.

As for that of Gratia operans, and cooperans; it must be qualified; as that Acta fit activa voluntas, the will being first moved by grace, is not idle: or else it will cross that infallible position, It is God that worketh in us both the will and the deed. And for that old one, of Gratia gratis data, and Gratia gratum faciens; just exception might be taken against it: for when they speak of one kind of grace that is freely given, what do they but insinuate that there are other graces which are not freely given? But this is a distinction which hath so many gray hairs upon it, that I am loath to discredit it. Some, on the other side, are so young and abortive, that they would not be mentioned.

In a word, Grace is either taken actively, for that love and favor of God whereby we are accepted in Jesus Christ: or passively, for the several gifts wrought in us by the holy Spirit, and that improvement of our talents, whereby we bring forth acceptable fruits. The first grace is the cause, the other graces are the effects: the first is without us, the rest within us: the first is the original grace in God, the other are graces created and infused into us. In the former consists our Justification, our sanctification in the latter. Our Rooting is in the first, our growth in the other. When our faith waxeth stronger, our charity hotter, our patience meeker, our obedience more conscionable, our conscience more sincere; this is to grow in grace. And the more we grow in goodness, which is the latter grace, our Sanctification: the more assured we grow of the former, even the favor of God in Christ, which is our Justification. Still the more holy, the more happy. It is true that our Justification admits no latitude: we can be no more than just and righteous: but that grace is without us; no growing in that. But our Sanctification admits of degrees and measure, and is within us; so that we may grow in that. We cannot be more just today than we were yesterday, in respect of God: we may be more holy, in regard of ourselves. And if we be not more beloved than we were; yet we shall feel ourselves more beloved and blessed than we were. We are all equal, every believer of us, in gratia remittente; but not in gratia inhaerente: all equal in the grace that justifies us, not in the grace that sanctifies us: in this latter let us be growing. In the Old Testament we do not read of grace, but as it is taken for God's favor, or man's favor: never for an inherent habit. The law given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.

Grow in grace;] that is in the improvement of the holy seed with in us, and brining forth the works of grace: then shall the first grace, which is the favor of God, enlarge his beams of mercy upon us. Thus our Apostle began his Epistle; Grace and peace be multiplied unto you: that was his appreciation: So he concludes here in the end; Grow in grace▪ this is his exhortation. Peter only joined peace with grace, in his salutation: Paul used also to put in mercy: Grace, mercy, and peace from God our Father, and Jesus Christ our Lord. We might look upon them; Qualia, Quota, Quomodo; What they are, how many, and how ranked. Tria sunt omnia: all good things are referred to these three heads: a Trinity of blessings, as it were from the Trinity of Persons. Mercy from God the Father, Grace from God the Son, and Peace from God the holy Ghost. Yet as Grace never comes alone; mercy and peace come with it: so it never comes hindmost; it hath always the first place. But you will say, Mercy is the cause of grace; why then is it placed after the effect? S^t. Paul went a notiore ad ignotum: for we had never known mercy but by Grace: as he that would go to sea, must take a river by the hand. Mercy in the remission of sins, Grace in the sanctification of life, Peace in the eternal blessedness of heaven. But still Grace hath the priority of place: and indeed, under God, it is all in all: we have no good, we do no good, but we must thank Grace for it. Therefore in our common ejaculations, upon all occasions, when we hear others wish for diverse temporal things; we sum up all in this one vote; God send us his grace, we ask no more. And surely we need not: for all blessings wait upon Grace, as maids of honor upon the Queen: Grace, or nothing: Grace, and everything. This makes us equal to the Angels; and without this we are miserable and forlorn wretches, worse than beasts: Praestat non nasci quàm sine gratia mori: which is my transition to the next point.

2. Of what value it is. But alas, who can value it? What Gold can buy this Pearl? What Indies can purchase it, where it is not; or redeem it, when it is lost? What would not the reprobate Angels give, what would they not suffer, for one dram of grace? Though in their malice they hate it, yet for their case they would fain have it. We cannot better tell how to value it, than by way of comparison. Put it into the balance with temporal things, and that will help us a little to know the worth of it.

1. Grace comes from the best Fountain; the Mercy of God in Christ. You will say, all temporal things come from the same Fountain of goodness: Every good gift is from above. But though the Spring be the same, Solomon distinguisheth them in the stream or current: Length of days is in her right hand, and in her left hand riches and honor. Temporal things are Dona sinistra, the gifts of God's left hand: Grace is Donum dextrae; the gift of his right hand: this He gives to his chosen, as Joseph laid his right hand upon the head of Ephraim. Temporal things do not make the Possessor happy; Grace does: yea, they make his account greater; Grace makes it less.

2. Grace serves for the good of the noblest part of man, his soul: other things do but nourish or delight his mortal body. This moving coffin of the soul is but earth, and will crumble to earth: from that womb it proceeded, and to the same tomb it shall be gathered: dust to dust. But sancta anima cælum est, the gracious soul is a Heaven; Habens pro Sole intellectum, pro firmamento Fidem, pro influentia charitatem, pro motu spem, pro Movenente Spiritum sanctum, pro astris exercitus virtutum: having for a Sun understanding, for a firmament faith, for influence charity, for motion hope; the holy Ghost for our Mover, and an army of virtues instead of stars. Such is the honor of Grace.

3. Nothing but Grace can satisfy the soul. The proud Self-lover will have all his apparel sit in print; and though he be in pain, yet will he not complain that his shoe wrings him. The Worldling hath all things commodious about him; yet there is a little fury within that wrings him; a froward conscience that troubles him. Could he swallow the earth that swallows all; it might choke him, not satisfy him. But give him Grace, and then he goes away springing like Joseph, and singing like David; The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places, and I have a goodly heritage.

4. Temporal things have no Charter of continuance: Vel viventem deserunt, vel à moriente deseruntur: they are sometimes gone from a man before he dyes, but they will never tarry with him longer than he lives. Yea, worse; for Viventem si non abcundo relinquunt, manendo vexant. They will either work his discontent in leaving him, or his vexation in staying with him. Like a bad wife, that either will be gadding abroad, or scolding at home. Did you never see a Porter troubled with his burden, though all that he carried were his own? The abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep. Quo major sonus, minor somnus: the more noise, the less sleep. While they do tarry, nihil quietis, no tranquility: of their tarrying nihil certitudinis, there is no certainty. At my first answer no man stood with me, but all forsook me. As Saint Paul at his first answer, so we speed at our last answer; no temporal things will stand with us, but all forsake us. If we look on this hand for riches, they are gone: if on the other hand for pleasures, they are gone: if behind us, for friends; or before us, for honors; or under us for our lands and possessions; all gone. Only Luke is with me: only Grace is left us; nothing but Grace carries with us. Grace stands out for eternity, and nothing else.

For Bona naturae, some beasts exceed us: for Bona fortunae, many wicked men go beyond us: but we have Bona Gratiae; this makes us blessed, when the former are not, and the latter had better not be. What Solomon was among the Prophets, and John among the Apostles, such is Grace among the virtues; even the especially Beloved of God. Solomon had his dream, and John had his vision: wisdom rested in the bosom of Solomon, and John leaned on the bosom of Wisdom: Grace is now comforted with the Presence of God, and Grace shall be hereafter blessed with the Vision of God. Christ now dwells with her: even in the bosom of Grace: and she shall dwell with him, even in the bosom of glory. This is the beauty of the soul, the strength of the spirit, the peace of the mind, and comfort of the conscience. It makes the body a cabinet of immortal Treasure, clearth the eyes, fortifieth the hands, directs the feet, composeth the gesture: And when this body must fall to the grave, Grace covers it with comfortable dust, unto the hope of a better resurrection, and leaves it in a quiet sleep. At our dissolution, Grace is both our physic and our Physician: a cordial that never fails: it doth qualify the sorrows, mitigate the bitterness and pangs of death: it stamps the Devil underfoot: it throws all sins into the bottom of the sea; or buries them under Christ's Cross, without possibility of ever rising again to witness against us. It takes the soul out of her wearisome tabernacle, and delivers it as a precious charge into the hands of an Angel, and still keeps it inseparable company. The Angels bear it up unto Christ, and Christ presents it spotless to God the Father, where it remains blessed forever and ever.

Grow in Grace] There be divers means of acceleration, in plants and vegetables; wherein art is used to help nature: And for the procerity and stature of man's body, much is attributed to nourishment, something to the air, and not a little to education. But what is there that can make us grow in Grace? Surely nothing but Grace: the plantation, and the accretion is by the same hand. Qui dat esse, dabit & crescere. When God had made all living creatures, He breathed on them a Crescite: the former act gave them a being, the latter a blessing. One fiat was enough for both: to make the world when it was not, and to make it more numerous than it was; not in generibus singulorum, but in singulis generum: not in new kinds, but in new individuals. Yet the former is called a Creation, the other a Benediction. There was a Bene in both: in the making, for there all things were very good: in the blessing, for there they were so much the better by increasing their kind. Howsoever God foresaw the decay that would follow upon sin, and the death that would follow upon the decay: yet He gave this blessing of multiplication, before that either sin, decay or death were entered into the world. So that as then out of the same mouth came both the fiant, and the crescant: so here from the same hand proceeds both the Grace, and the Growth. Both the Esse, and the Melius esse, know no other but one and the same Author.

The Growth of any plant is improved principally by three helps: the secularity of the ground wherein it grows: the kindly heat of the Sun, cheering it up with his influence: and the contribution of the clouds towards it, with their dews and showers descending upon it. The ground wherein we are planted, is the Church; and she, like a kind and indulgent mother, accommodates us withal her helps: Her Doctrine to direct us, that we may do well: her Discipline to correct us, when we do amiss: her Sacraments, which are Cordials to our heart, like springs, veins, and channels of Grace to the root: her prayers to Heaven, for a blessing upon that she gives, and for a blessing which she cannot give. In commune erat, in commune operatur. The rain that continually falls upon us, to make us shoot up in goodness, is a frequent distillation of the Word preached. If those holy dews do not soak into our hearts, we shall be Dwarfes in Grace. For this purpose Christ sends Apostles, and Pastors, and Teachers: those be the clouds, and from those clouds come rain and showers: the effect should be, that we may grow up to the stature of Christ: there is our growth by it. The Sun that ripens us, and is the principal cause of this accretion, is Christ Himself; that Sol Iustitiae; all our Growth is merely beholding to his beams and saving Influence. He blesseth the ground that bears us: He filleth, and emptieth the clouds upon us. Thus there is Gratia acta, wrought in us: and Gratia aucta, increased in us. As Grace is not given Nolenti, to him that would none of it: so nor is it increased Negligenti, to him that does not labor to improve it. We are not only living, but reasonable and holy plants: and must both labor for our own sustenance, and mature and further our own accrescence. The Grace that is in us, is perfect: for the least Grace is Grace, as a spark of fire is fire, if men see but a little, so little that they think themselves blind; yet they do see: but they may be brought to see better. We know, there is a double perfection; of parts and degrees: The Grace that is infused to us at the first, is perfect in regard of the parts: as a child is so far a perfect man, because it hath all the parts of a man: but it is not perfect in regard of degrees; for we may grow up in Grace, as a child does in stature. In our conversion, when we first receive this saving Grace, we are but Infants in Christ: yet Infants may be tall men in time. Desire we to know whether we be grow•• in grace, or not? As by the growing of one plant, we may give a guess at all the rest: so here let us make a trial.

1. For faith and charity. Is our faith stronger? As our salvation is now nearer than when we first believed so is our faith in that salvation stronger than when we first were converted? Is our charity grown from an Issope on the wall, to a Cedar in Libanus? From the love of a few, and those our friends, and those very sparingly, and this with limitation and provision, that our love cost us little: is it grown to the sincere love, of many, of all, even to our damage, even to our death?

2. Consider we our Humility; how do we thrive in that? At the first we thought some worse than ourselves: do we not now think all better? Indeed of all Graces in us, Humility grows cross to the rest. Other virtues aspire upwards, humility looks downwards. We say of the rest, the higher they grow, the better: but Humility is the best at the lowest. Faith, Hope, and Devotion have an holy ambition: they disdain to look lower than Heaven: nothing can content them but an immortal Crown. But Humility pleaseth herself in a low dejection: you shall find her (with Job) in the dust, in that school of mortality, disputing and conferring with worms and rottenness. Yet even there she grows; and that in the favor of God and his Angels. The deeper she roots, the higher she sprouts: The lower her Humiliavit se, on earth: the higher her Exaltavit Deus, in Heaven.

3. Our Repentance hath such another kind of growing too. She grows from a spring to a brook, from a brook to a river, from a river to a great sea. This is a Grace that does not only grow herself; but waters all other Graces, and makes them grow faster in us. It is our own contribution of moisture, besides that of the clouds, that they young plants, which we have almost eradicated and withered by our sins, may be caused to grow again by our tears. As the morning dew is a pawn of the evening fatness: so our penitent tears put a fruitfulness into all our Graces. When for that sin, which cost us at first but a sigh, we now fetch many deep groans: and for that which cost us but groans and prayers, we now spend floods of tears; and if it were possible, we would weep tears of blood. This is to grow in that Grace, which moistens all our plants, all our virtues: and destroys all the weeds, all the sins in our garden; happy Repentance.

4. Patience hath her growth, in our better hability to bear crosses. It may be at first, that we scarce durst wade through a foord of troubles: now we can swim in a sea of sorrows. Then a slight wrong molested us, now we can bear a lode of injuries. Then we were provoked with words, now we can endure wounds, without minding revenge. Then we were angry with our persecutors, now we pray for them. Then we would have retaliated, and could not: now we can, and will not. Then we thought all suffering a punishment, now we judge it a preferment. As Queen Anne Bullen, the mother of the blessed Queen Elisabeth, when she was to be beheaded in the Tower, thus remembered her thanks to the King. From a private gentlewoman he made me a Marquise, from a Marquise a Queen; and now he hath left no higher degree of earthly honor for me, he hath made me a Martyr. This is indeed to let patience have her perfect work, and to come up to her full growth; when for Christ's sake, and his Gospel's, persecution shall be held an honor, and misery a dignity; Ipsamque erudem coronam. Here is the patience of the Saints.

5. Contentation must have her growth too: It was the fault of the Israelites, never to be content: when they had water, they murmur for bread: when they had bread, they complain for flesh: As if they had boorded with God, and he were to provide them diet, and they (good men) honestly paid for what they took. But Jacob their Father, of whom they were called Israel, was of another mind: If God will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on: he asks no more. So Paul; having food and raiment, let us be therewith content. Are we more moderate in our desires now, than we were at first? Worldlings, quaseniore, eo cupidiores: but if in our age we are less desirous of the world, it is an argument that we are more satisfied with the Lord. One special means of the melioration of a tree, is a baring of the root, and throwing away the earth from about it. If these earthly things, riches, honors, pleasures be taken from us, and the world hath left us naked and destitute of his vain succors, we adhere faster to God. We do not covet them, we are content either with or without them: satisfying our hearts with this, that Christ is all in all unto us.

6. Summarily, we may know our own growth in grace, by our bringing forth the fruits of grace. All trees are not frugiferous, Christians are. That which brings forth no fruit, how shall we know it is a tree, and no logge? There is little difference between a dead stock, and a barren tree: one brings forth as much fruit as the other. I know that boughs, buds, and blossoms, are indications of a trees growth but there is no proof of a Christians growth without fruits. Bring forth fruits meet for repentance, saith St. John: he stays at nothing till he comes to fruits. For that was the tree planted, for that watered, for that manured, and succoured from earth and heaven: not to make materials, nor to give shadows; not for the green boughs, or gay blossoms; but for the fruits. The tree is for the fruit, and but for the fruit there had been no tree. Fruit is the thing for which it was first set, and still is suffered to grow: and when there is no longer any hope of that, Cut it down, why cumbers it the ground? Then comes the axe to the root: down it goes, into the fire it must: if it will not serve for fruit, it must for fuel.

There is no evident knowledge of our growth, either by our leaves or blossoms. Our leaves that so ruffle with the winds, are but our hearing of Sermons: and of this we are very prodigal; and for this we look to be esteemed good Christians: as if all godliness consisted in the hearing of a Sermon. Is all turned to hearing? where be the other senses? Is the whole body an ear? What is become of the other members? The Papists stand much upon their Auricular Confession: but do not too many among us stand too much upon Auricular Profession? There is an auricular confession, the religion of Papists: and an auricular profession, the main religion of our pure hypocrites. All the Jewels of their goodness hang at their ears: and but for their ear-mark, no man would take them to be Christians. The thorny ground is near a curse: but the fruitless fig-tree had a curse. Hearing the word of grace, is no sufficient proof of our growing in the works of grace. You hear us, and you praise us; and then think you have done enough: You hear our Sermons, we hear of your commendations: Teleramus illas, & tremimus inter illas: we suffer it, but with trembling hearts. All this is but leaves, and we ask for fruits: and not fructus oris, but fructus operis. Faire words do no more prove your growing, than the large leaves of Jonah's gourd was an argument of the lasting: Quickly they both fade: one day green, the next dry. It is no good sign in a tree, when all the sap goes up into the leaves, and is spent that way: nor in a Christian, when all his grace shoots up into words: a verbal goodness; no reality at all.

Leaves come of the kernel, as well as fruits: so doth chaff of the seed, as well as good grain: yet do we not plant for leaves, nor do we sow for chaff: we make small account of either. Quid paleae ad triticum? What is the chaff to the wheat? Quid foliis ad fructum? What are the leaves to the fruit? Rather give us fruit on a shrub, than a tree that can reach the Clouds, with nothing but leaves. There may be some fruit, without much growth: but growth is nothing worth without fruit. Saul was higher by the head, than all the rest of Israel: many in Israel were better than Saul at the heart. The procerity and cedarly tallness of trees, with a glorious flourish of leaves, is goodly to the eye: but the kindly fruits of the lower plant is more acceptable to the taste. The eminence of some notoriously zealous professors, may make them much admired: but the good fruits of mercy in men silent and less notable, makes them more beloved. The former may grow in applause, but the latter grow in grace: and this growth O Lord, give me!

We have heard the two fundamental grounds: first, what grace is, with the value of it: next what it is to grow in grace, with 〈◇〉 happiness belonging to it. For application to ourselves; two main uses 〈...〉 to your charge: Quaerere, and Crescere. First, a labor to obtain gra•• 〈...〉 , an endeavor to grow in grace. The acquisition, and the accretio• 〈◇〉 •nis germinatio praesupponit plantationem: that cannot grow, which is not. It must have a being, before it have an increase. God gives the seed, first: then Paul must plant, and Apollos must water, before there comes an increase. First give it essentiam, a being, then look for Incrementum, a growing. The grace of God in me was not in vain: saith Paul. See first that you have grace; and then that the grace you have be not in vain. In vain it cannot be, if it be in the Lord. His grace shall not be in vain, in you: nor shall your labor be in vain, in him. For the obtaining of grace, diverse duties are requireable.

1. Concursus ad orbem gratia. Seeing it is so precious, that life without it is but death, or worse: Let us creep into the Sunshine, and live within the sphere and compass of Grace. Ye are not under the Law, but under grace. There is no small benefit, to live within the precincts of grace. I do not say, that all who are Sub gratia, are therefore necessarily In gratia. Plants and stones lie under the same beams of the Sun, and are wet with the same moisture of the Clouds: The Plants spring and grow, yet there is no alteration of the stones. But to live within the verge of the Court, gives some hope that the king may one day cast a favorable eye upon us. We cannot come into the room where they make perfumes, but we must carry away some of the sweetness on our clothes. Nor can we walk in a garden of Roses and Violets, without participation of their pleasant odors. Which if either our superstitious Recusants, that refuse the Church in state and pride: or our wanton Recusants, that refuse it for delicacy and pleasure: or our worldly Recusants, that refuse it for the love of their Mammon; rightly understood: they and the Temple would be better acquainted. Thomas was not with the Apostles, when Jesus first appeared to them: and to his absence some have imputed his incredulity. It is ill to take, but worse to make occasions of our absence. God hath appointed a day in a week, the Church an hour in the day, and the State a place for both. To neglect that day, that hour, and that place, is no less than to disobey the commandment of the State, of the 〈1 page duplicate〉 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Church, and of our God himself. If Peter be out of the ship, he may sink: If Shimei be out of Jerusalem, he may die for it. Out of the Temple, when we should be there, we may perish; if God not as merciful to us, as Christ was to Peter; and more merciful, than Solomon was to Shimei; what business soever we pretend.

What be the common occasions that detain us? Playing or sleeping, or drinking, or evening of accounts, or visiting of friends. Think on it: when you play, and are at your sport, what if God should come to you in earnest? What if death should make a gamester among you? He throws at all: and would he not swoope all the stakes, to your terror and most unrepairable loss? Had it not been better for you, that he had found you praying, than playing? When you sleep, why may not that stern Serjeant take you napping? Why may not a palsy, or an apoplexy, or a lethargy, put you into your last sleep? You would not rise to serve God at the Church; why should God arise to preserve you at home? Drinking, that is the common hindrance: O how many hundreds about this city, doth the Tavern and Tap-house rob the Church of? With such an Host, gain is godliness; and with such guests; the health of their souls is drowned in healths to their mistresses. One hour spent in praying, is tedious to them: ten hours in drinking seem nothing, so merrily the time passeth with such tos-pots. Think seriously, with the cup in thy hand: why may not that draught be thy last! Some Merchants and Tradesmen make bold with that holy time to set even their accounts: but how if God at that very time should call them to an account? It is to be feared, that no cheerful account could be then rendered. Others have their friends to visit: but how if God should then visit them, and smite them with some mortal sickness? It would be small comfort to their souls, that the Church was then forsaken of their bodies. These judgments may fall upon men, in their wanton or willful absence from the congregation: they have no supersede as against them. Let us therefore keep the orbe of Grace, and the God of all Grace will keep us.

2. Apparatus ad vocem gratiae. Faith comes by hearing, and by hearing comes all other grace too. The holy Ghost is the Fountain, Preaching the pipe, our Eare the channel, and our Heart the cistern for this water of life. Receive not the grace of God in vain. In vain it is to us, when either it is tendered, and not accepted; or accepted and not improved. Stir up the gift of God which is in thee. The sparks will not be kindled in our souls without hearing, and they will die in their own ashes without stirring. Hearing is the light that kindles them, Prayer the tongues to stir them up, and meditation the bellows to make them burn. The Word of the Gospel is compared to a feast; and the hearers are the guests: but there is some difference in the carriage of the business. First, to a feast we are bidden, and we come: one invitation is enough: To the Word we are invited often; but instead of ourselves; we send our excuses: we have no need of it, no stomach to it. Secondly, in a feast we are glad to have the best morsels carved to us, and let the courser dishes pass by: But in hearing of the Word, when the best counsel is offered us, we are so mannerly as to commend it to our neighbors: That reprehension toucheth such a one, not me. Thirdly, at a feast we desire to be Primi the first: but in God's house we are well content to be Postremi, the last. Fourthly, a Sermon is still thought too long; when will he make an end? At a feast, we look for a second or third course, and seldom call to take away. Fifthly, we make reasonable election of nourishment for our bodies: but we are bad choosers of the diet for our souls. That pleaseth us which is sweet to the sense, not that which is wholesome to the conscience. By nature we have no more skill in our own diet, than in our own Physic. We shrink in our profession, and sink in our dignity, in respect of very mean creatures; that are their own physicians, their own caters and carvers. They write that the Harte being pursued, and wounded, knows an herb, which being eaten, throws of the arrow: a strange kind of vomit! The dog is subject to sickness, but he knows the grass that recovers him. It may be true, that the drugs are as near to us as to other creatures: it may be that obvious and common simples, easy to be had, would cure us. But we have not that innate instinct, to apply those natural medicines to our present dangers, which these inferior creatures have: we are not our own apothecaries, not our own physicians, as they are. Thus ignorant are we for our bodies, and naturally worse choosers for our souls. If we knew the value of the word of Grace, nothing could keep us from the hearing of it. As Diogenes being repelled of Antisthenes lifting up his staff to drive him away, replied: Do, beat me: yet thou shalt never drive me from thee, so long as I can learn any good by thee. As meat does not enter the body, but by the mouth: so grace does not pass into the soul, but through the ear.

3. Affectus ad fontem gratia. The Spirit of God is the fountain of grace, let us please him, as we desire to be made gracious by him. Grieve not the holy Spirit of God, by whom you are sealed unto the day of redemption. He is the high God; let us not grieve him for his dignities sake: he seals us up in grace; let us not grieve him for his benefits sake. Because of his Greatness, and because of his Goodness: Greatness in himself, Goodness to us: for either of these, or for both of these, we should be so respectful to him, as not to grieve him. The Apostle might have said; Yield him all cause of joy and contentment: it had been but reason, so. But not to give him any cause of grievance; what could he say less. Grieve him not for his own sake; if not for his own, yet for his Seals sake, for his Graces sake. Si rem grandem mandâsset, say the Servants of Naaman to their Master: If the Prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldest thou not have done it. So si rem grandem dixisset, If the Apostle had imposed some great piece of service upon us, yet we should not have thought much of it. But he only chargeth us not to grieve him; which is no positive or actual service, of pains or peril: only a prohibition of disservice; as little as can be required. Hath he made his own sacred bed in the chamber of thy heart? O then trouble him not. Let not the noise of vain words disquiet him, nor the stench of carnal lusts offend him, nor the sluttish heaps of worldly desires make him weary of his abode: Melliter in tenero praesta requiescere lecto. If thou find that glorious king in thy poor cottage, bow thyself with Abraham to the ground, and say; My Lord, if I have found favor in thy sight, pass not away, I pray thee, from thy servant. There be two sorts of persons whom we would not willingly offend: the Great, and the Good. Not the Great in regard of their power: they may do us a displeasure: which is the motive of fear. Not the Good, in regard of their bounty: we may be the better for them; which is the motive of hope. If he be great, though he give us nothing; yet there is no wisdom to displease him. If he be good, and ready to do us good, though his power be not mighty; yet in honesty we should not anger him. But if he be great and good, able and willing to pleasure us; then far be it from us to grieve him: which is the motive of love; and of such love as we always carry about us; love to ourselves. For all these respects, let us grieve the Spirit of grace no ways: for his Greatness, ne noceat: for his goodness, vt benefaciat: and for our own sakes, Quos signavit. If we desire Grace in our Cistern, let us dearly love the fountain.

4. Respectus ad honorem Gratiae. It honors us, we have good cause to honor it. As Theodosius the Emperor preferred the title of Membrum Ecclesiae, to that of Caput Imperij: professing that he had rather be a Saint and no king, than a King and no Saint. Them that honor me, I will honor: and shall not we honorare honorantem? S^t. Paul chargeth us to adorn the doctrine of our Savior in all things: a good life adorns grace; scandalous sins cast disgrace upon it. We begin to storm at this challenge; what, dishonor grace? In our brave and lofty style, we scorn the imputation: what, We to discredit the Gospel? We that profess it, and love it, and live in it, and are ready to die for it; We to dishonor it. I would it were not true: yet the Apostle begs but an easy request of them that were, and (possible) thought themselves very famous Christians; Grieve not the holy Spirit: Not for an Honorare, nor a Laetificare nor a Glorificare; you will not advance, nor credit, nor defend the Gospel of grace; yet at least do but thus much for it, as not to disgrace it. Let not the Name of God, and his doctrine be blasphemed. God's Name? say we in our ruffe and heat: what do we but glorify it, and make it famous and renowned everywhere. Ye say well; but hear you? In the mean time I would this Name might not be evil spoken of by your means. Dishonor Grace? Why it is our life, our soul: the very life of our life, and the salvation of our soul: we will never do it. But is there not such a thing, as turning the grace of God into wantonness? What do you call this? Is it not a dishonoring of Grace?

When we shall abuse either the promises of Grace, which are the covenants: or the Pledges of Grace, which are the Sacraments; by deriving an encouragement to evil from that merciful indulgence: is not this a turning of grace into wantonness? And is not that a discredit done to the honor of grace? If from the Sermon which forbiddeth such a sin, we shall immediately run into the sin forbidden by the Sermon; do we not disparage the house of grace, the time of grace, the word of grace, the very God of grace? Is it not a discredit to them all? When the Pagan beheld Christians receiving the blessed Sacrament, and observed with what reverence and devotion they demeaned themselves in that holy business; he was inquisitive what that action meant. It was answered him by one of them; That God having first emptied their hearts of all their sins, as pride, envy, covetousness, contention, luxury, and the rest; did now enter into them himself, with a purpose to dwell there. He was silent for the present: but followed and watched them whom he saw to be communicants in that action, for two days together: And perceiving some of them to fall into quarrels, uncleanness, rapacity and drunkenness so soon, he declared his censure of them with this exclamation: I confess that your religion may be good, your devotion good, your profession good; but (sure) your hospitality is stark naught, Apud quos ne Deus quidem biduo commorari permittitur. Are you so unhospitable; that you will not let your God dwell with you for two days together? This is the shame of Christians, this, the disparagement of grace; when it is forced, against the nature of it to encourage lewdness: I may take this bribe, put up this Interest, admit this uncleanness, drink this quantity: why? O! God is gracious: nay, therefore do it not, because thy God is gracious. Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? God forbid. Will any sober man wound himself, to try the skill and love of his Surgeon? God forbid it; and the thankfulness for his mercies, the remorse of our own hearts, the tenderness of our own consciences, and the love of our own souls, forever forbid it. Our God is a consuming fire. Even our God, the God of grace, is a consuming fire. If we will dare to presume; he will not spare to consume. keep back thy servant from presumptuous sins; let not them have dominion over me. In many things we sin all: but let not the presumption of pardon induce us. Though God's grace be an inexhaustible treasure; yet we may spend so much of our own stock, till we become mere bankrupts. Let grace be the desire of our hearts, grace the prayer of our lips, grace the direction of our lives, grace the protection of our bodies, and grace the salvation of our souls.

Thus we have found out the way to get it; now we must seek out the means to improve it; Grow in grace. This is done first by prescribing the Furtherances, and next by removing the hindrances: both which I might make distinct passages: But I will knit them together, and set down certain Rules which may direct us how to grow.

1. I begin at Prayer; and where better? Qui fecit vivere, docuit & orare, Hannah prayed to have a child, Monica prayed to save a child. Let us pray that we may have Grace, and pray that we may save Grace, and that Grace may save us. Prayer is requisite, that we may be new borne in Grace: and that being so borne, we may grow in Grace, Prayer must not be left out. They are all gone aside: Why? They call not upon the Lord. Prayer is a Key, to open the Gate of Heaven, and let Grace out: and Prayer is a Locke, to fasten our hearts, and keep Grace in. Prayer is a Messenger to fetch that holy seed out of the Garner above: and Prayer is the former and latter rain, to make it grow beneath. Prayer woos it to come, and Prayer wins it to tarry. Prayer is the Invitation of that noble Guest to our house, and Prayer provides for the entertainment of it. Prayer procures it a being in us, and Prayer supplies it with a blessing. Fundatur precibus, precibus firmatur: therefore Pray continually, if thou wouldst grow continually. Yea, there is a growth in Prayer, as there is in the Grace we pray for. Our Prayers may grow in zeal, in confidence, in penitence, in humility. Some Censers may be fuller of Incense than others: and the higher our Invocations rise up in fervency, the more do Graces come down in plenty. Therefore as they put some water into the pump, that thereby they may fetch up more: so let us pray, that we may pray better. When the mill is set a going, an easy wind keeps it so, and a stronger increaseth the motion: If the Spirit blow upon us, this sets us a praying: but a more powerful gale of Grace and Inspiration, adds vigor to our Devotion. In vain do we expect that alms of Grace, for which we do not so much as beg.

2. A jealous suspicion of our own strength. We say, He that teacheth him self, hath a fool to his master: so he that relieth upon himself, hath a reed for his upholder: either he will fall quickly, or is already down. Confidence in God doth only support us: we cannot put too much trust in Him, nor too little in ourselves. It was Peters over-venturousnesse, that tripp'd up his own heels: Though all men should be offended because of thee, yet will I never be offended. Bravely promised: but Peter sware, I know not the man: cowardly answered. I know not the man? He knew well enough what his Master was, but he knew not what himself was. Multos impedit à firmitate, praesumptio firmitatis. Many had stood, if they had not made themselves sure of standing. Therefore is Peters fall recorded; Vt ruina majorum, sit cautela minorum. Every error of theirs, is a catechism to us: their lapses are our cautions. Those Judgments happened to them for ensamples: Ex cinere Iudaorum, lixivium Christianorum: the ashes of the Jews will serve to make a Lie for Christians; to wash and scour us from impiety. That which is upon Record to their disgrace, can neither give courage nor comfort to us in the imitation of it. Scriptae sunt etiam ruinae priorum, ad cautelam posteriorum. If thou stand upon thine own bottom, Remember Lots wife: remember her that fell before thee. If thou beest confident of thine own standing, remember Peter: he fell that was most confident. There are two sorts of Memento's set upon all stories: If the example be good, Memento & fac, Go and do thou likewise: If bad, Memento & fuge, Do not thou likewise. Think upon Lots progress, and coming safe to Zoar; Memento & fac: Think upon his wives retardation and retrospection; Memento & fuge. We are like to sick men; who when they have had a good day or two, think themselves presently well again: so they make bold to put off their kerchiefes, to put on thinner garments, and to venture into the fresh air: whereupon follow unrecoverable relapses. Let us only be confident in Jesus Christ.

3. An holy fear of falling must still possess us. I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me. In the former part of that Verse, there is an everlasting promise of God not to depart from us: yet still fear is placed in us of purpose, that we may not depart from Him. It generally granted, that no man truly engrafted into Christ, can either totally or finally fall away from Grace: And that Peter did not so fall, because Christ prayed for him, that his faith would not fail. To say, it might deficere re, non tempore, is absurd: for can a thing perish, and yet remain in time? What time can be given to that which is not? Nor is it enough to say, that faith lost may be restored again: For then Christ prayed not at all for that faith which Peter had, but for that faith which he should have. Yet there can be no fall without great danger. Sin is a fall: we have taken up the term ourselves, in calling Adams sin, Adams Fall. A fall indeed; for it fowls us as a fall, it bruiseth us as a fall, it bringeth down as a fall: down from the state of Paradise, down to the dust of death, down to the bar of Judgment, down to the pit of hell. Yet all falls do not harm us alike: there is in sin, the fall, the relapse, the wallow, and the not rising again: this latter, the not repenting, damneth.

There may be Lapsus, a grievous sin: and Relapsus, those Recidiva peccati, worse: and a lying still, Volutabrum peccati, the wallow; worse than that: But if it once comes to impenitency, that they fall, and not rise; this not only makes it most culpable, but leaves it most inexcusable. To prevent this, let us fear always. Fear is but a cowardly passion, yet it is set to watch the chief Citadel; the very heart: As in a Town of Garrison, the most white liver'd Soldier may serve to ring the Alarm-bell: yea, he is fittest for the purpose: for the fear of his own danger will make him vigilant to give warning to the rest. God doth give us fear for a ballast, to carry us stedily in all weathers: but yet He doth ballast us with such sand as hath Gold in it; with that fear which is his fear. For The fear of the Lord is his Treasure. The Father says, The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom: the Son repeats it: he that collects both, calls it The root of wisdom: and that it might embrace all, Wisdom it self. Therefore A wise man will fear in everything: he is never without it, never without the exercise of it; not only in heavy and calamitous times, but even in good and cheerful days too. Noah being moved with fear, prepared the Ark; to the saving of his house: though he had assurance of his deliverance, yet he provides the means of it with an holy fear. Though we can pretend to no other degree of wisdom, yet let us be abundantly rich in this; that we are possessed with a fear of sinning. Let us fear all stops, all impediments, all obstacles that may cross or retard our growing in Grace: so shall our fear be turned into joy, and that joy be crowned with glory.

4. Next to the Timete, let us place a Cavete: as we fear a dwarfing or growing downward, so let us beware of a stunting or not growing at all. That fear was a necessary caution, and this caution is no less necessary a fear. If we fear God, we will beware of displeasing Him; shun the least act, the least word, the least thought of disloyalty towards Him. Qui operatur ut accedamus, idem operatur ne discedamus. It is good and safe therefore to fear Him. The Devil could never have prevailed upon Eve, to withdraw her from God, but by working this fear out of her: Be not afraid; Ye shall not surely die. To one kind of fear, faith is opposed: Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith? With another kind of fear, faith is accompanied: Thou standest by faith; Bee not high minded, but fear. In the former, the more fear, the less faith: in the latter, the stronger faith, the more jealous fear. Fides facit formidinem, formido facit sollicitudinem, sollicitudo parit perseverantiam. This fear if it be fresh in us, will make us stick close to God, without stirring (as we say) an inch from Him. Let us not more frequently brush our clothes, than our fear; that it may always be kept fresh in our souls.

Then take heed of standing still: flatter not thyself, that because thou hast run thus long, thou mayest now make a stop; nor because thou hast gotten thus far, thou mayest now sit down and blow. One of these two must be chosen; Aut semper proficere, aut prorfus deficere. No growing, some decaying: while we are not making onwards, we are going back a-main. In rowing up a river, that runs with a strong current, if we rest our oars, we fall down the stream. Between mending and pairing there is no medium: while we neglect to gain, we do but spend on the stock. So one sin opens the door to another: and while sins come in at the fore-dore, graces will out at the postern. What communion hath light with darkness? They will not keep company together. The Ark would not stay with the Philistines, nor will the grace of God tarry with sinners. Virtues drop from such a tree, like leaves and fruits in a great wind. The idle servant might have had as many talents as the rest, if he had been a good husband: but he buried that he had, stood at a stay, did neither good nor harm with it: therefore his Lord would trust him with no more, lest he should hide them too. Reuben's non-proficiency is remembered in Jacob's Will, when he bequeaths Legacies. Thou shalt not be excellent. So we try our cask; first with water: and if they hold that, then we trust them with wine. Habenti dabitur: there is a seed in our heart, which if it lives, and is fostered, we sprowte, grow, and prosper: but if it die, farewell all spiritual life. For if one virtue be offended, she lureth away all her fellows, as many of Ishbosheth's friends shrunk away with Abner.

5. We must be wary not only to shun sin in the action, but in the very occasion. Saepe occasio peccati, voluntatem facit peccandi. How many that meant not to sin, are won by the very opportunity? In the way wherein I walked, have they privily laid a snare for me. Man in his innocence was not free from this. Paradise was made for man, yet there behold the serpent. Who can wonder if our corruption find him in our closets, at our boords, in our beds, in our garments, in our lawful recreations, when our holy parents found him in Paradise? And thither he no sooner came, than he fell to work: he can no more be idle, than he can be harmless. And mark his cunning: there were many trees in the garden, he meddles with none of them: only you find him at the forbidden. This he suggested to Eve, that she might look upon the fruit though she did not taste it: Non est interdictum, ne videam, sed ne comedam. By looking, she came to liking of it: by liking, to longing for it: and so tasted it in her heart, ere it came to her hand. Thus hausit virus peritura, & perituros paritura? She lost us all.

He that would have the trees in his garden grow, must do what he can to keep them from all noxious things. If occasion be not sin, yet it is a friend to sin: Et iudicium est commissae, & causa committendae. There be sparks in a flint, which being let alone are quiet, and appear not: but beat it with a steel, then you shall see them come out, and be able to kindle a great fire. The sparks of sin are raked up in the embers of our affections: let them not be stirred with occasion, they are quiet: but when opportunity blows them, there is the danger. It was a fearful curse upon trees and plants; What the Palmer-worm hath left, the Locust hath eaten, &c. It is applicable to our purpose. Conceive by the Palmer-worm, the suggestions of sin: which are infinite, as that is called Multipeda, of many feet: this eats off a part of our tree. The Palmer-worm gives way to the Locust; which is a pendulous liking of the motion: suggestion delivers us over to approbation. The Locust resigns to the Canker, to idleness; which devours another part of our tree: approbation of evil delivers us over to sloth. The canker yields place to the Caterpillar, to lewd company; which consumes the residue of our tree: sloth delivers us over to wicked society. But as they that live in a pure air, shut their gates against those that come from infected ••ies. Or as the Bees in winter keep their hives, and will not expose themselves to the bleak air, sharp winds, cold rains, and bitter frosts: so if we desire to grow in grace, we must shun all these dangerous infections. How worthy, is he to miscarry, that will put to sea in a storm? If a man have a professed enemy he does not only watch to avoid him, but all his faction and adherents: we must suspect all the occasions of sin, if we desire that our growth in grace may not be hindered.

6. Go on in humility and learn to Walk humbly with thy God. If we take any pride in our growing, we are near a fall. Paul could not deny but that he had done much, and gone far: I was not a whit behind the very chiefest Apostles: yea more; I labored more abundantly than they all: From Jerusalem, round about to Illyricum, I have fully preached the Gospel: from Syria to Sclavenia: yet I forgot the things that are behind: As if all that is past were nothing, he looks to that is to come. They that run well in a race, do not oftsoons look back, to mark how far they have run, and how many they have out-run: But they still keep their eyes forwards, upon the ground before them, and upon those that have got ground of them. Though our tree did spread the branches, and flourish with leaves, and stand loden with fruits: yet pride is an unluckie wind, able to blast all. Two marks are usually given of our growing; Obedience and Humility. Obedience; Know you not that you are his servants, to whom you obey? Know you not this? The works of obedience are an infallible testimony: if thy conscience can testify these fruits, then know that both the witness, and the thing witnessed, are graces. Humility: For judgment am I come into this world, that they that see not, might see; and they which see, might be made blind. How shall we understand this? Scripture can best interpret Scripture. God resists the proud: they that see, shall be made blind: He gives grace to the humble; they that see not, shall see.

Men look up to the hills, but they love to dwell in the valleys: God may behold a far off the proud height of the lofty, but he plants his grace in the low vale of an humble heart. The woman bowed down with a spirit of infirmity, may be an emblem of humility: the humble shall be lifted up. Pride in the soul, is like the spleen in the body: when that swelleth, all the other parts languish. It is poison at the root of the tree, which corrupts the sap: and if the sap be corrupted, what will become of the tree? It is so dangerous a poison, that of another poison there was confected a counter-poison, to preserve Saint Paul from it. God would rather suffer him to fall into some infirmity, than to be proud of his singular privileges. Least I should be exalted above measure, through abundance of Revelations: there was the poison of pride insinuating it self: I had a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me: there was the counter-poison or antidote which did at once make him both sick and whole. We are never more in danger of pride, than when we have made the greatest progress in the practice of godliness. It groweth fastest upon us, when other evils decay: and out of their decay sucketh matter wherewith to feed and foster it self. Principium atatis nostrae occupat, finem obsidet: It is always busy, but then most eager, when we are most holy. If thou beest ringed about with friends and comforts, beware of high-mindedness then. The Tares may out-grow the Wheat, according to that proverb; an ill weed grows apace: but let the humble wheat be ripe and ready by harvest, and that shall be had into the barn, whiles the rest are cast into the fire.

7. Think no sin so contemptible, that thou shouldst make light of the admitting of it. In small matters the decay of grace first discovereth it self: as the decay of a tree first appeareth in the washie boughs or twiggies, and by little and little goes on further into the bigger arms, and at length pierceth into the main body. He that is not faithful in a little, will be unfaithful in much. He that corrupts his conscience for a little, will at last mak bold with it in a greater matter. That which is a mote in comparison of another sin, is a great beam considered in it self. There is no sin that is not in it self mortal: the testing of death is in everyone: and who dares play with the sting of a living Serpent? But the worst mischief of small sins is, that they make way for greater. To omit that, Quaeque minus laedunt singula multa nocent: To fall by one Goliath, or by the whole army of the Philistines: to be killed with many small shot, or with great Ordnance, what is the difference? But as huntsmen make use of their little beagles: first they ply the Deere with them, till he be heated and blown; and then they set on their great Buck-hounds, that will pull him down, and pluck out his throat: so the Devil employeth our little sins. Little sin is that little boy put in at the window, that opens the door for the great thief. A long thread of iniquity may be let in with a small needle. We have seen by experience, what hurt a little worm will do at the root of a tree.

8. Think on the comfort that comes by this growing in grace Every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth, that it may bring forth more fruits. So are we dressed, that all comes not at once: But as the blade follows the seed, and the ear the blade, and the corn the ear; so grace first shows it self in good desires, then proceeds to good speeches, and without fail grows up to good works. Faith calls to love, and love to obedience, and obedience to constancy; and one grace fore-runs another. Whom God predestinates, them he calleth: and whom he calls, he justifieth: and whom he justifies, he glorifieth: there is no defect on his part. Let us grow up into him in all things, which is the Head, even Christ. Let there be none in ours. As the rich grow easily richer, so the good grow quickly better. See here is water, says that noble Eunuch, What doth hinder me to be baptized? Nothing, if thou believest, answers Philip. If we desire to grow in grace, what hinders us to be loved? what hinders us to be blessed? what hinders us to be saved? Christ calls them to receive his Word and Grace, that hunger for it: now that very hunger is Grace: for Incipit infundi, ut incipiat posci. When the seed is in the ground, the holy Spirit waters it, that it may spring up to a blade, he waters it in the blade, till it put forth an ear: he waters it in the ear, till it be ripe for the harvest. His charge to us, is to give them that need; his own practice, is to give them that have. Temporal things are given egentibus, spiritual habentibus. Not that for the good preparation of nature, God ads the gift of grace. That habenti should be meant of nature, and dabitur of grace, is false logic, and fit for the school of Rome, which would have something in nature, to merit something of grace. But how stands this with the Justice of God, to enrich the wealthy, and suffer the poor to starve? Yes, for He gives but his own, and so hath free election of the object of his bounty: Is it not lawful for him to do what He will with his own? But how stands it with, the Truth of God? He hath filled the hungry with good things, and the rich he hath sent empty away. Yes, for that very hunger is grace; and if they had not first tasted the sweetness of it, they would not have had such an appetite to it. Besides the rich think that they have a sufficiency of grace: the hungry confess their own emptiness, therefore it is fit that they should be filled.

Indeed we are all either full or empty, rising or falling, getting or spending winning or losing, growing or fading, till we come to Heaven or Hell. Paul turns an Apostle, Judas an apostate: the Gentiles become believers, the Jews Infidels: Zacchaeus turns from the world, and Demas turns to the world. One grace opens the door for another: for God is not weary of blessing, where he hath once begun: yea, one gift is a kind of obligation upon him, to give more. Therefore are his mercies called infinite, because they are above number: and everlasting, because they have no end. First he moves Solomon to pray for wisdom, & then bestows it on him. If Cornelius be a praying, Peter is sent to instruct him. If the son be coming homwards, you see the father running to embrace him. First, you have the Eunuch with a good mind reading; then by Philip's help understanding, then by the grace of the Spirit believing, and lastly taken into the Covenant by Baptism. Believest thou for this? saith our Savior to Nathanael: thou shalt see greater things. So repentest thou for this example? thou shalt see more. Lovest thou Christ for this benefit? thou shalt receive more. If thou be meek, like Moses, God will make thee wise, like Solomon: if wise, he will make thee righteous, as Abraham: if righteous, then patient, as Job: if so, then penitent as Peter, and thankful as David. Every instruction shall make thee careful, every benefit grateful; and thou wilt never be well, but when thou art doing good. Thus as a traveler passeth from town to town, till he come to his home: so a Christian from grace to grace, till he comes to Heaven.

9. Lastly, let us be ever meditating on that royal reward, which is promised to Perseverance. So Moses had respect to the recompense of the reward. Be faithful unto death, and I will give thee the crown of life. I will give, who am able to do it: I will give, who am faithful to perform it: I will give, it is his free bounty, we cannot earn it. We owe unto him all the good we do; he oweth us not so much as thanks for it. Doth the Master thank that servant, because he did what he was commanded? Yet his free goodness will not suffer us to go unrewarded. What will he give? A Crown: who would not strive hard for a Crown? The kings of this world have Crowns, which cannot keep their heads from aking, nor their hearts from vexation: They may die, they do die, for all their Crowns, and return to their dust. But this is a Crown of life; that giveth life, and keepeth life, to them that wear it. But this very life will decay, and spend it self into the grave: yes, but that is an eternal and everlasting life; a Crown of Immortality. Who would not seek by all means to grow in grace, that he might win a Crown of Glory?

And in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.] There is nothing more pleasant to man's nature, nor more winning upon it than knowledge. For the hope of this gain, a super-addition of knowledge, Eve sold her husband, Adam sold himself, and all his posterity, even all the world. Let me have leave by the way of induction, to set down two preparatives to the subsequent matter. The argument is knowledge; concerning which I desire to observe. First, the pleasure which rational men take in it. Secondly, The strange properties of it.

For the former; Knowledge is so fair a virgin, that every clear eye is in love with her: it is a pearl, despised of none but swine. They that care not for one dram of goodness, would yet have a full weight of knowledge. Though they never mind to do good, yet there is no good which they would not know. Among all the trees of the garden, none so pleaseth them as the tree of knowledge. Conceive, by way of Apologue, that a mere natural man is by God's permission, let into his own Treasury or Storehouse, where all his graces lie reserved: he is allowed to take his choice, of some, or of all, or of what likes him best. He poiseth these precious Jewels in his hand, and judgeth of them only by the weight: that which is most portable, and easyest to carry away, he resolves to make choice of. He first makes assay of Charity: and perceives that this Grace would much abridge him of his old liberty; binding him to love his enemies, to pray for his Injurers, to do good for evil, and to supply the wants of the needful out of his own store: therefore he lets it alone, as being too heavy for him. Then he tries Temperance; and considers that this grace would restrain his appetite, cut the throat of his sensual pleasure; that it would keep him from feasts, and revells, and the fruition of merry company: this is also too heavy for him. He lays hand upon Humility, to see if this were any lighter: but observes that this Grace doth delight to dwell in the dust: she is not for the honor of courts, nor for the favor of Princes, nor for secular glory: but teacheth him to make his bed on God's cold earth, to dwell in obscurity, and never to think himself lowly enough: He likes not this; it is too melancholy, too heavy for him. He comes now to Patience; but that, of all, least pleaseth him: for then he must suffer wrongs with silence, revenge his adversaries with prayers, digest losses with thankfullnes, and be content with all impositions: By no means can he endure this: it is by far too heavy for him.

He removes to Obedience, and makes experiment of that: but this confines his extravagant inclinations too severely: There is a law ordained, and he must be tied to the observation of it: Oh, the ten Commandments are ten strict rules: his disposition is quite contrary to those Canons. As it was Satyrically spoken of old; that the law, Thou shall not kill, troubles the Physician: and that other, Thou shall not steal, angers the Lawyer: so we may truly say, that the law not to offend, offends the corrupt nature of us all. It is so much the more harsh to us, as it goes against the grain of our affections. Besides, it is a glass, which presents to us our own deformities; which though we will not forgo, we cannot endure to see. He thinks this virtue no better than manicles to his hands, and shackles to his feet, far too heavy for him. Then Simplicitie presents herself to him; a virgin fair without art, rich without a dowry: not more modest than amiable. He cannot but like her complexion, but her condition is the rub he sticks at. He considers that he is to live in this cunning world, where words and deeds are cut out of several pieces; where not to dissemble, is to invite a coozenage. Therefore in this he deals plainly, by telling that plain dealing is not for his turn. She would keep from him much gain, and expose him to much loss; she is too heavy for him. Lastly, having balanced and refused all the rest, he lights upon Repentance: She sits at the very door of his egress; and seeing him to under-value her elder sisters, she sollicitates him to make choice of her. This Grace if he could affect, it would also make him in love with all the rest. He would woo them all, if he were once won with repentance. But alas, he does not like her countenance: she is always weeping, and what should he do with so sad a consort, with so melancholy a mistress? He loves fair weather, and would not have every day rain. A merry heart is health and life: why should his jollity be sl•bberd with tears? She would ever and anon be calling him to mourning and lamentation; and of all lessons, he hath no mind to madrigalls. Songs, not sighs, are for him. If the Lord says, Turn; he turns. Unto sin: so he makes a Metathesis, whiles he keeps the word, and turns the meaning: But God will make a fearful Metathesis upon him; turning both the words and the meaning; Vertentur & confundentur; he shall be confounded and turned back: All these are too heavy for him.

After he was departed from the royal Presence of those heavenly Graces, peculiar to the elect, and the pledges of salvation; he passeth through the common hall, where sate abundance of virtues, but of a lower degree, and less honor than the former: gifts, which God communicates to men of all sortes, even to reprobates. He also weighes these in his hand, and many of them seemed too heavy for him. Amongst these he happens upon knowledge; and finding her so portable, and easy to be borne away, without trouble; he makes his election of her, and settles his heart upon her: This is his love. Indeed we use to speak so proverbially; that knowledge is no burden. Could a man know never so much, it would be no trouble to him. To plot, devise, project, study, and invent; may be wearisome to the Fantasy: Excogitation is a trouble. To call to mind stories of old, actions and accidents forepassed, with all their circumstances; may be wearisome to the Memory: Recollection is a trouble. To arbitrate, resolve, and decide doubts and difficulties, questions and controversies, problemes and disputable Tenants; may be wearisome to the Judgment: Determination is a trouble. But to know, is no trouble: could we comprehend a world of learning, all the learning in the world, we should find no trouble in that. There may be trouble in the means of getting knowledge, none in the possession of it. If it could be infused into us; either the same way that Adam's was, by creation; or that Solomon's was by Inspiration; we should never think it a trouble: no man groans under this weight, no man complains of this burden. To apply it.

Knowledge we all strive to get, but who labors for virtue? Knowledge is light, and if we rightly weigh it, virtue is not heavy. My yoke is easy, and my burden light, saith our blessed Savior. You never heard Abraham complain of his faith, nor David of his obedience, nor Job of his patience; no more than Solomon did of his wisdom. The end is always more noble than the means: the end of knowledge is to do well: the means to do well, is to know how. If we only seek to know, and there stop: we shall come so far as to see heaven, but never enjoy it: as Dives saw Abraham's bosom, but could not come at it. Knowledge is laudable, while he is in celibate: but never happy till he be married. Virtue is ordained a wife for knowledge: where these two join, there will proceed from them a noble progeny, a generation of good works. He that spends his time only in the accumulation of knowledge, and contemplation of virtue, without the fruition and exercise of it; is like a curious limner, that having betrothed himself to a fair and chaste maiden, busieth himself only in drawing her picture, and is exquisitely punctual in every dimension and lineament: no colors are held good enough, no posture expressive enough, no art sufficient to set forth her beauty: with this picture and dead counterfeit he is so taken, that he forgets the living principal, and the fruition of her to whom he is contracted: So the other can paint you virtue to the life, but he hath no mind to marry her, nor to beget a posterity of good works by her. Thus knowledge loseth his consort: together with her beauty, which is fairen than the skies; with her society, which is as pleasant as the Angels; with her dowry, which is no less rich and ample than the kingdom of heaven. Thou pretendest that thou hast knowledge, and hast possessed it a long time: thou hast known Christ, as Timothy knew the Scriptures, from a child: But still thy knowledge is a Bachelor: it is high time to marry him: God hath appointed a wife for him, Grace: marry thy knowledge to Grace: no creature shall forbid, or hinder those happy nuptials: there is no precontract with sin, but may be disanulled, and made void by repentance. Grace is willing: let the same forwardness and alacrity be in thy knowledge. At this wedding, heaven and earth, Saints and Angels will rejoice. Frst then let us know, without which there can be no truth of goodness: and then let us do good, without which there can be no hope of blessedness. These things if ye know, happy are ye if you do them. This couple are married on earth, but both they and their issue shall be crowned in Heaven.

For the latter; knowledge hath two properties, not common or obvious; but both remarkable.

1. It is not desireable to them that never tasted it. As rich and precious as it is, yet of this wealth millions are not covetous. What do the ruder sort care for knowledge? If the waterman can discern the wind and tide, keep his boat right, take in and land his fare; what cares he for more knowledge? If the Carreman can drive on his luggage, and rule his horse; if one beast can guide another, though it be without all fear of doing mischief; what cares he for more knowledge? If the husbandman be capable of his tillage, and can distinguish the seasons; or if the artificer be cunning in his trade and manufactures: or if they usurer be perfect in the art of his bonds; and can see to tell his moneys; what care all these for more knowledge? They are of Festus his mind, that much learning will make a man mad. As for the mystery of Godliness, and knowledge of salvation, they are so modest and mannerly that thy leave that dish for their betters: not knowing, that in refusing knowledge, they refuse heaven and all blessedness. But alas, how should they like the food, which they never tasted? Taste and see that the Lord is good: Taste first, then ye (that despise knowledge) will be of another mind. One morsel of this divine food, would put such an alteration into your appetites, that you will still cry for more: Lord, evermore give us this bread. Then should you see them run by troupes into the school of knowledge, that heretofore passed by those gates with scorn. Lord, dost thou wash my feet? What was the reason of this question? we read of no scruple made by the rest: and, to the vexation of Rome, in this great honor Peter was not the first. Why then does he only except against it? His Lord shows both him and us the reason: What I do, thou knowest not now: Nondum sciebat. For want of this knowledge, he gives his master a peremptory denial, Thou shalt never wash my feet: Never? tarry but a little, and you shall hear him recant, and change his note, upon Christ's Si non te lavero; Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head. Carnal men will not allow one corner of their soul for divine knowledge: yet me thinks when they hear Christ say, If you will not know me, I will not know you; Depart from me, nescio vos; they should be of Peters mind, and not proffer their feet to the washing, one corner only; but even their whole soul to the entertainment of saving knowledge. As the rurall man dwelling in an obscure valley, would never be persuaded to ascend the adjoining hill, what company so ever offered to lead the way: at last being overcome, he went up; and then was so taken with the goodly prospect, that he could not be kept down. So if worldly men would be persuaded once to climb up the hill of knowledge, and there to contemplate the glory of Heaven, and the blessedness of immortality; they would so scorn this base region of sin and darkness, that (with Paul) they would long for a dissolution. Let this prevail with you to accept of a taste of knowledge, and then blame us, if you do not like it.

2. Another strange property it hath; that they who have it, exceedingly feel the want of it: whereas they are insensible of any such defect that want it. For these latter; a man without knowledge is scarce a man: he lacks his eyes, the chāber of his understanding is empty. And as vacuū is not in natura, so gratia is not in vacuo: no grace with emptiness. He is a very beast; howsoever he scorns the comparison, yet the wisdom of heaven puts it upon him: Understand ye brutish among the people. Therefore he desires not knowledge, no more than a beast calls for a book. He is asleep: and do men while they are asleep, cal for a light, or complain of the suns absence? nay, he is dead; and dead men feel not the want of meat or clothes. Ask thousands that pass by, what they lack: and scarce one of 1000. will tell you that he lacks knowledge. Vbi non habetur, nec desideratur. For the other, they never have enough, There is an unnatural appetite in the body, the effect of disease; that the more men drink, the drier they are. There is an unnatural affection in the mind, a mere spiritual distēper, that the richer men are the more covetous. In the soul there is an infinite desire of knowledge; but it is natural: we would be wiser than our equals, wiser than our teachers, wiser than all others, and yet (after all this) wiser than ourselves: no Philosopher did see so far into the secrets of nature, no Astronomer was so well acquainted with the motion & influence of the stars, no Poet ever sung such transporting raptures, no Physician had such skil in the composure of medicins, no Linguist was so well seen in the languages, no Canonist in the laws, no Politician in states, no Divine in the scriptures, as we would be in them all. What speak I of these? Solomon had not a clearer knowledge by inspiration, nor Adam by his creation, than we would wish to have, whether by acquisition or infusion. Nay, what do I speak of men, our Progenitors? we would be as wise as the Angels: as the widow of Tekoah colloqued with David; my Lord the King is an Angel of God to discern good and evil. Nay, we will scarce stick there, so long as the tempter hath an eritis sicut dii for us: the wisdom of men, of saints, of angels would not content us: we must be as gods: wherein? In knowing good and evil. There can be no higher, no greater measure of knowledge: otherwise our insatiate souls would aspire to it.

O the mellifluous sweetness of knowledge! How doth it inchaunt the sons of men? He that left all the Graces behind him, yet would take knowledge along with him. It is so indeed; many men neglect Grace, that would fain have knowledge. But to see the unluckinesse of it! They refuse what they might have with ease; and choose what after much difficulty they cannot obtain. They would be wise, and cannot: they might be holy, and will not. A man may love knowledge very much, and yet want it: but if so heartily he love goodness, he shall be sure of it. Indeed he that is grossly ignorant, does not affect knowledge: nor does he that is notoriously impious, affect goodness. But here is the difference: many a one desires knowledge, that proves none of the wisest: but a man is made good by the very desire of goodness. Quanto amplius Iustitiam dilexeris, tanto justior eris. Yet as we cannot see the light but by the light; so if it were not for knowledge, we would not be so desirous of knowledge. It was Solomon's option; Give thy servant an understanding heart: his request in a dream, but his wish in most serious deliberation. The night follows the temper of the day: and as our hearts are waking, so they use to be disposed in our sleep. If the thoughts of Solomon had not been intent upon wisdom by day, he had not made it his suite in the night: Now without any competition, he fastens on that Grace which he longed for: Give me an understanding heart. If Solomon had not been wise before, he had not known the worth of wisdom, nor preferred it in his desires. It is the love and admiration of knowledge, forestalling our hearts, that makes us so thirsty of this Spring; which thousands pass by, and never drink of. The dunghill Cokes of this world know not the price of this Pearl, the worth of this Jewel: They that have it, know that all other excellencies are but trash and rubbish to it. That famous Queen of the South comes a great journey to that more famous King of the East; the Queen of Sheba, to the King of Israel. What was her errand? To learn Wisdom. She had what she came for: and in a short time, so well had this studious Lady profited by the Lectures of that exquisite Master; that she envies none; she magnifies none, but them that live within the air of Solomon's wisdom: Happy are they that stand continually before thee. O then how great a blessing is it to live within the Orbe of the Gospel; and to hear a wiser, a nobler, a greater than Solomon? She was a woman, most of you here be of a stronger sex: she came from far, you have Christ at home: she left her kingdom, you are in your own country: she only heard of wisdom by report, you have continual experience of it: she brought rich gifts, you will scarce give thanks: she desired to purchase it, you will hardly accept of it: she came to a mere man, you to Him that is God and Man: So far as Christ is greater than Solomon, shall her holy care judge our neglect with just condemnation. For Application.

It cannot be denied, but we live under the Sun-shine of knowledge: the saving beams, and comfortable influence of that heavenly blessing replenisheth our Orbe: It is perpetual day with us, and there is no night, unless it be in our own breasts. If our tree of knowledge does not grow for all this, what will become of us? Yes, we flatter ourselves with a Crescimur; but then God replies, Vbi fructus? Where be our works? The Egyptians in their palpable darkness could do nothing but sit still: it were a shame for the Israelites, in the light of Goshen, to do so. They could see to follow their business, the other could see no business to follow. We have work to do, and day-light to do it in: Let us beware least night come upon us before it be done. Common knowledge will not serve for the dispatch of this work: they must have a clear light, and a clear sight too, that can see to work up their salvation. Masons or Carpenters can see to work by a candle: the contexture of their labors is easily discernible. But to cut a Signet, or make a Watch, or do such curious manufactures, there needs a clear light: they cannot work but by day. For the dispatch of our secular affairs, an easy portion of Knowledge will serve the turn: a rational man, especially helped with experience, will go roundly through with them. But our Salvation is spun up of a finer thread; and will ask a greater measure of Illumination to perfect it. There may come a time of darkness, or we may be removed to a place of darkness, or (for our neglect of the light) we may be oppressed with the power of darkness. Now the Sun shines, the Gospel flourishes; the word of Grace is preached, the Seals of grace are administered, all the treasures of heaven, and comforts of mercy are offered to us: Now let Salvation be our work on earth, and then Salvation shall be our reward in heaven.

In the knowledge of our Lord.] The second sound of this heavenly Trumpet summons us to an increase in knowledge: for there must be no dead or barren trees in God's garden: all fruitful, all growing. But here 3. questions may be moved.

1. Why Grace is set before Knowledge, when as in order, Knowledge is before grace: Illumination properly precedes sanctification: we must be wise, ere we can be holy: Among all the Virtues, Wisdom hath the first place. Why then first Grow in grace, and then in knowledge? We answer. 1. That they are infused together: In the act of our conversion, all graces (in their measure) are wrought in us. There is not a Prius and Posterius in their donation: as Princes give preferments, raising up their favorites by degrees. We have not patience put into us today, and temperance tomorrow, and repentance next week, and charity at another time: but they are given all at once: Our eyes are opened, our hearts softened, our affections rectified, all our faculties changed and sanctified at once. Indeed this renovation is not perfect at the first; that is left to our growing: but it hath at first a perfect being. The seeds of all graces are then sown in our hearts: not one left out. As Joseph's advancement was entire, and his honors came all together: For Pharaoh did set him Super horrea totius Aegipti, made him warden of his granaries: Super domum Regis, made him Lord Controller of his house: Super milites, made him Lord Martial and Lieutenant over his armies in the time of war: Super totum populum, Lord President over all his subjects. So our graces come at once, quod essentiam; by degrees, quoad incrementum. Holy knowledge therefore could have no priority of Grace. 2. Grace is the general favor of God, Knowledge but a particular grace: Grace the main river, Knowledge but a creeke: Grace the tree, Knowledge but the fruit: Grace the Mistress, Knowledge but the waiting woman, the attendant: Grace the mother, the honor of knowledge is to be the daughter: Grace hath many children, knowledge can be but one of them. Now it is fit, that the tree should be set before the fruit; the Lady before her servant, the mother before the daughter, Grace before Knowledge. Thirdly, Grace can save us without Knowledge, but what will become of Knowledge without Grace? Little Infants, the children of the faithful, die washed in the holy Laver, the blood of Christ, and are eternally saved: yet what Knowledge had they? They know not what others do unto them, what God hath done for them: they know not that they are baptized, they know not that they are borne: yet they are saved by Grace, without Knowledge. But who was ever saved by Knowledge, without Grace. It is orderly then, that Grace should be preferred before Knowledge; which gives life unto it, and without which it would perish. For Knowledge without Grace, will but sink men lower into hell: but Grace, without the help of Knowledge, will advance us to heaven, and crown us with glory.

2. The object of this Knowledge is Jesus Christ: why is the Second Person only mentioned? Why not the other two, the Father and the holy Spirit? Is it enough to know Christ without the rest? No; but we had never known the rest to our comfort, without Christ. If you object that, This is eternal life, to know God, and Jesus Christ: first the Father, and then the Son, by no means leaving out the holy Ghost: for Know you not that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? Knowledge is wrought in us by the Spirit, and shall not we know the Spirit that works it? Yes, God forbid otherwise: But in knowing Christ, we know them both. First the Father: If you know me, you know the Father also. He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father also. The Son is the express Image of his Fathers Person: therefore they that know the one, cannot but know the other. And for the holy Spirit; No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the holy Ghost. It is then the gracious work of the holy Spirit, to teach us to know Christ. Thus in knowing Christ to be our Savior, we know the first Person to be our Father, and the third Person to be our Comforter. Christ is all in all: we cannot know the Sun, but withal we must know his light that illuminates us, and his heat that cherisheth us. It was Paul's determination, not to know anything, but what concerned Jesus Christ. That is enough; we need no more Knowledge to the completion of our happiness. Therefore it might well be decreed by the learned of the Christian world, that none should take their degrees in the School of learning, unless they could first read and understand the Title of Christ crucified.

3. Why are these two coupled together; Grace and knowledge? Grace had wont to have other companions: Grace and truth came by Jesus: Grace and Truth; there was a fit match. Rom. 5. Grace and righteousness by one Jesus another convenient pair. 1. Pet. 5. God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble: Grace and Humility; these two well consorted. Eph. 2. By grace ye are saved through faith: Grace and Faith; there also it is nobly accompanied. Psal. 84. The Lord will give Grace and Glory; O there is a blessed couple. We have access by faith, into grace, rejoicing in hope of glory: There, is Grace in honor and State: she sits on her Throne, waited upon by Faith on her right hand, by Hope on her left: neither is she without her crown, The hope of Glory. Indeed it is not yet placed on her head, for the day of her coronation is not come: but Faith sees it, and Hope expects it, and Grace shall have it. This is a society fit for Grace: Truth, Righteousness, Humility, Faith, Hope, Glory: there she is among her noble Ladies, attended by virgins of Honor. Kings daughters were among thy honorable women: upon thy right hand did stand the Queen in Gold of Ophir. All the other virtues are of the blood royal, yet but servants to Grace: She is the Queen that stands upon the right hand of God himself, in a vesture of gold, wrought about with diverse colors. She hath change of suites: sometimes she wears raiment of needle work. but still the virgins that be her fellows, or followers, are with her. But who gave Knowledge this privilege? How came she by this honor? That faith, charity, patience, obedience, and those Princely virtues should be left out, while she is put in? Those are all near the Person of the Queen, continually in the Presence: Knowledge, if it be a courtier, is of a lower rank, and more remote.

It may be answered, that 1. Grace, in one word, comprehends all the other: and where the Genus is named, what needs any mention of the Species. Faith is grace, and Charity is grace: repentance, patience, humility, and all the rest are graces: their particular honors are involved in the general. So that when we are called upon to grow in grace, we are not stinted to this or that grace, to one or more graces: but we are charged with all: grow in grace, in every grace: So the honor done to the mother, redounds to the whole family. Knowledge is not preferred to any grace, but every saving grace is preferred to Knowledge. 2. Grace and Knowledge are joined together, because the one helps to maintain the other. Knowledge is like a star, the darkest part of the orbe, till it be enlightened by the sun; a mere dark lantorne, till grace put a light into it. It may see much into nature before, and be cunning in this world: but it is grace that gives it eyes to see into Heaven: Thus grace maintains knowledge. Again, the more we know Christ, the better we love him: the farther we look into the joys above, the more we are ravished with them: the more comfort we find in the fruits of grace, the more growth we wish to the tree of grace, in our own hearts: Thus knowledge maintains grace. We know the way to Heaven, because Grace hath informed our Knowledge: we go the faster to Heaven, because Knowledge hath inflamed our Grace. Fill the lamp with oil, and put no fire to it, and it will not keep us from darkness. Lucerne non ex oleo accenditur, sed per oleum nutritur. Let the head be never so full of Knowledge, till the fire of grace comes to it, it gives us no light: put to that holy spark, and then we see clearly. On the other side, Grace is not kindled by Knowledge, but by Knowledge it is cherished. Grace directs Knowledge how to contemplate, and Knowledge stirs up grace to practice. Grace will not suffer Knowledge to want Illumination: nor will Knowledge suffer Grace to want operation. Thus do they mutually help one another, and both help us to salvation in Jesus Christ.

These questions being cleared, let us come to the Distribution. Grow in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Here is the Tree, the Life, and the Growth: The tree is Knowledge, the life of the tree is Jesus Christ, and the growth of it is not limited, Grow in this knowledge. The thing commended to us is no common chaffer, but Knowledge: no common knowledge, but the knowledge of Christ: no common or sparing measure of knowing Christ, but a growth in his Knowledge. To begin with the Tree it self; some fruit let me gather from that: one thing would be noted both for instruction, and caution; what the kinds of Knowledge be, and how it may be distinguished. Not let this be censured for a Topicall discourse, as if I meant to common-place upon Knowledge in general, or at large: For you shall perceivethat I reduce all to this head, and only aim at this end, to show how unworthy all knowledge is to be compared with the knowledge of Christ. Together with the unprofitableness of human science, without Divine; How vain it is, how fruitless it shall be, how sinful it will be, and how pernicious it may be, to the soul of man.

The kinds of Knowledge may three ways be distinguished. First, secundum originem, in their spring and beginning. Secondly, secundum ordinem, in their order and proceeding. Thirdly, secundum efficaciam, in their virtue and operation.

1. In origin; every Knowledge is from God, that only Giver of all good and perfect gifts: but every Knowledge is not alike: one may be more noble than another. All good in their kind, not all equally good in the same measure. Every perfect is good, but every good is not perfect: let us not think that all our gifts are of one size. Some of that Noble man's goods are called Pounds, and some Talents: now a Talent is more than a Pound. Caesar's Penny more than the Widdowes two Mites: yet good money all, in their several values. The Law is good, yet it could bring nothing to perfection. Nature, in it own self, is good, yet not perfect. Neither nature, nor the Law are taken away, for they are both good: but Grace is added to both, to perfect both. Wealth is called this Worlds good: and those temporal things we give to our children, as bread, meat, nourishment, are called by Christ good Gifts: yet we cannot deny, but the gifts of Heaven are better. So one Knowledge may be more excellent than another; yet both good, and both from the same Author. There is a Knowledge common to all, and another peculiar to some. Knowledge in Trades, whereby men become skillful artificers, knowledge in arts, whereby they become famous Scholars; are both good: but not comparable to the knowledge of Grace and holiness, whereby they become good Christians. For common Knowledge;

1. Such is that we call wit and cunning. The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light. Wiser in their generation, not wiser for regeneration. The wisdom of this world is Folly; yea, Death, and enmity to God. Owls see better in the night than men; yet men have a better sight than Owls. Cattes may have clearer eyes; but it is to kill Mice, not to read letters. The wisdom of Worldlings is but cunning: they study men more than books; which makes them good in their own alley: but turn them to new grounds, and they have lost their aim. They are far short of wisdom; not only in point of honesty, but in point of ability: For cunning is but a sinister knowledge: it may be earthly, sensual; devilish, not descending from above. There is a wisdom that descendeth not from above: how then is all knowledge from God? The faculty of knowing is from God: the defect or depravation of it is from man. Shall God be blamed for giving us eyes, because we turn them after vanity? Or ears, because we open them to scurrilitie? Or feet, because we make them swift to shed blood? No more is he to be blamed for giving us understanding, though we employ it to mischief. Grace and knowledge are coupled together in my Text, they are not so in every man.

2. Such is that we call Policy: Achitophel had wit enough to give shrewd counsel to a traitor, he had not grace enough to save himself from the gal-house. How great a Politician was that Counselor of David? How oraculous in his good, how devilish in his bad advices? Two projects he had to secure the treason: there was a damnable deal of cunning in them both. First, For fear that Absalom should relent, and David remit, and so that breach be pieced; he counsels him to second his unnatural conspiracy, with as unnatural incest: not only to violate his Fathers Throne, but his Fathers bed: and not to do this villainy in secret, the argument of fear or modesty; but so that all Israel might be witnesses of the sons sin, and the fathers shame. If they two be reconciled, thinks Achitophel, what shall become of us? But this act is so desperate and unpardonable, that he must needs go on in rebellion. Secondly, That this treason may end in victory, he hath another plot ready. Protraction may be an advantage to David: therefore I will pursue him to night, and come upon him while he is weary. How pernicious was this advice? For besides the weariness and unreadynes of David's army, the spirits of that holy King were daunted: so that the field had been won, ere any blow was stricken. Celeritie had gotten the conquest: there had scarce been any resistance of a sudden assault. Here was wit enough: Achitophel wanted not the knowledge to discern of times, and seasons. He that observes every wind, shall never sow: but he that observes no wind at all, shall never reap. If you ask from whence this knowledge comes, from Heaven, or from hell? I answer, from both, in a diverse manner. The faculty is from Heaven, the pravitie from hell. That he had a deep wisdom, he was beholding to God: that he diverted it to sinful purposes, he might thank the devil.

Let our observation be here, how dangerous a presumption it is to be wise without God: this is the way to come short home. How cunningly do political naturians contrive their plottes; as if there was no power to cross their projects, or revenge their wickedness. They conspire on earth, God laughs in heaven. So far indeed he gives way to their sins, as their sins may prove plague to themselves. So he disposeth of wicked men and spirits; Vt dum nolunt implere patefactam, adimplent arcanam Dei voluntatem. Whiles they think most to please their own fancies, they overthrow their own souls. This way saith the wisdom of almighty God: Tut, we know a better way, of ourselves. There was a King of Aragon, Alfonsus; who because he was a King, and a Philosopher, imperious over his subjects, and expert in they motion of the heavenly bodies, grew to such an height of insolency, that he blasphemously boasted; That if he had been of council with God in the making of the heavens, the heavens should have been disposed in a better order than th are. This man would not only be as wise as God, but wiser than God. There was one among the heathen, that went for wise; who said; That to become rich, he would pray and sacrifice to Hercules: but to be wise, he would do neither: not a bend of his knee, not a whiffe of smoke, would he afford: For for wisdom, he could help himself to it well enough, and be beholden to never a god of them all. Rich, if they would make him well and good; he might perhaps thank them for it: But of his own head, he could be wise enough. Nunquid sapientior Daniele? yes, he will be Sapientior Deo. The Apostle says, that every good gift Comes down from the Father of lights. We have some Astrologers, (called judicial, but indeed without any sound judgment at all) that have found out another derivation for these gifts: De luminibus, and so would have us look no further. Such a conjunction or aspect of the luminary bodies, such a constellation or horoscope, such a position of planets, produce you these good effects. This is according to their Astrology, not according to our Theology. Not De luminibus, from the host of Heaven: but De Patre luminum, from the God of Heaven, from the Lord of hosts. Those wizards are, of all men, the arrantest fools: they leave God, to go for knowledge to the Devil.

Oh the miserable end of wicked Politicians; what became of Achitophel for all his deep knowledge? He had great wit for the public, none for his private self: he, could govern a State, not rule his own passions. What a strange mixture of wisdom and folly do we find in that man? He will needs hang himself; that was an act of folly: yet first he will set his house in order; there was an act of wisdom. Who would think it possible, but for the truth of this example; that a man should be at once so wise as to put his house in order, and yet so mad as to break his own neck with a halter? That he should remember to order his house, that forgot to order himself? Yet there are such subtle worldlings, who are careful to provide their children portions and provide no portion of comfort for their own souls. They have wit and knowledge, but it lies wholly without therein their riches. They mind the disposing of what they have in their coffers, and forget what they have in their hearts: as Achitophel took care for his family, that took none for his own body and soul. Mark the end of these cunning rookes: and if they do not make away themselves with their own hands, yet they make way for the fiends of Hell to do it. He that with the deepest reach contrives his own sinful pleasure, does but study to provide his own halter. For use.

1. It concerns all Christian states, to exclude such men from their counselltables. That holy king of Israel would admit no Statesman, so far as he could discern, but such as were after his own heart; and he himself was a man after God's heart. Be he never so political, be his wisdom more than any man's: yet if his heart be not right, he will not be faithful. I know that where the breast-plate is naught, yet some use may be made of the head-piece: use, I say, not trust. If men come to council, and leave the God of wisdom behind them: there is rather a curse to be feared, than any expectation of a blessing. Into their counsel let not my soul come: nor ever let their counsel come into my soul. Look for no good of those designs, whereof God was not at the making. If he be locked out of the counsel chamber, error fills all the room. Where a political head sows, and a false heart waters, God will give no good increase. One spark of religion is worth a whole flame of secular wisdom.

2. It concerns all private men. Carnal knowledge is a Peripateticke, and loves to be walking: wickedness sets it the boundaries: it shall walk but within such a compass. A compass indeed; for Impii in circuitu. Mischiefe it may study, but no goodness. There is an earthy knowledge, which lies in bed, and deviseth tricks of lucre, projects of oppression. The ungodly are not without their counsel; but blessed is he that hath not walked in their counsel. What is the event of this counsel, whether taken of their fellows, or of their pillows? In the day, they inquire, Who will show us any good? In the night, They meditate mischief on their beds. They consult shame to their house: shame, is this all? No, ruin too: for the stones shall cry out of the wall, against them. Is not this a goodly knowledge, that brings with it shame and ruin? Such men have the wit to undo others, and do themselves no good. One might be wise in Macedon, and a very fool at Athens: as Paul before his conversion was eminent among the Pharisees, but an Idiot among the Apostles. The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God: and a man famous for knowledge in the opinion of the Earth, may be a mere sottie in the judgment of Heaven. He that seemeth to be wise, let him become a fool, that he may be wise. As we must be humble, that we may be exalted; and dead, that we may live; so fools, that we may be wise. Let us know that we know nothing, till we know the Gospel: and know that we know enough, when we once rightly know Jesus Christ.

3. There is a kind of knowledge above all these; whether that natural knowledge, granted to all men; or that artificial Knowledge, granted to mechanickes: or that political Knowledge granted to Statists: there is also a higher, even a Propheticall Knowledge, and this may be granted to reprobates. Such a Knowledge had Balaam in his ecstasies: scarce ever any of the holiest Prophets had so clear a Revelation of the Messias to come. The very beast he rode on, had both her eyes and her mouth miraculously opened; so that she could both see an Angel, and expostulate with her Master. There was such an old Prophet in Bethel; of whom, considering all, a man knows not well what to think. He abode within the air of Jereboam's Idol, within the noise of his sacrifices, and permitted his sons to be present at those Idolatrous services. If he were a Prophet of God, what did he in Bethel? Why did he wink at the sins of Jeroboam? What needed a Prophet to come from Judah, to reprove that sin which was acted under his nose? Why did he lie, and betray his fellow Prophet to destruction? Did these abominations become a Prophet of God? If he were not a Prophet of God, how had he true visions? How had he direct messages from God? How did he confirm the Word of that Prophet whom he seduced? Why did he desire, that his own bones might be honored with his sepulcher? We may conclude then, that he was a Prophet of God; but a corrupt, resty, vicious one. When the other was slain by the Lion, he had so much truth as to give a right commentary upon God's intention in that act: so much hospitality, as to send away his guest, better provided for the ease of his journey than he came: Though this were but a poor amends; when he had betrayed the life, and wronged the soul, to cast away some courtesies upon the body. He had so much faith and courage, as to fetch his carcass from the Lyon: so much piety and compassion, as to weep over him: so much love, as to wish himself joined in death to that body, which he had hastened to death. There was some goodness in him: he was not absolutely wicked. But all this cannot excuse his sinfulness: he was a Seer, yet did not see his own way.

Such another was Caiaphas: This spake he not of himself; but being high Priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that Nation. He spake not himself, but God spake through him, as through a trunke; Cajaphas in the mean time never the wiser for it. That old riddle is applicable to him; Of a man and no man, (which was an Eunuch) who with a stone and no stone, (which is the Pumice) killed a bird and no bird, (which is the Bat) upon a tree and no tree, (which is the Fennell:) So Caiaphas was a Prophet, and no Prophet: a Prophet in that particular prediction, otherwise and at other times a Priest only, not a Prophet. He spake, and he spake not: he spake not of himself, and of his own excogitation; but God spake by him, in a sudden inspiration. It was not Sermo natus in pectore: it passed out of his mouth, but never came in his heart: the words were his, and not his. That Jesus should die for that Nation, and not for that Nation: for the Jews principally, but not for the Jews only. Thus it pleaseth the wisdom of God, to express himself even by the tongues of faulty instruments. Yea Satan himself sometimes receives notice from God of his future actions: which otherwise that evil Spirit could neither foretell nor foresee. Such, in all likelihood, was his information concerning the end of Saul: To morrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me. How could Satan tell this? Is the Devil become a Prophet? No. But as he was once a good Angel, so he can still act what he was. Well may lewd men be good Preachers, when Satan himself can play the Prophet. What Prophet could speak better words, than this soul spirit in Samuel's mantle? Wherefore doest thou ask of me, seeing the Lord is departed from thee, and is become thine enemy? Samuel himself while he was alive, could not have spoken more gravely, more severely, more divinely, than this hellish counterfeit. Good words are no rule, to distinguish a Prophet from a Devil. This kind of Knowledge is both rare and common: rare, in that it is seldom given to any: common, in that it is indifferently given to the good and bad. Prophecy doth not always presuppose sanctification. Many have had visions from God, that shall never enjoy the vision of God. One beam of holiness is worth a noon-day of Illumination. Give me grace, what shift soever I make for knowledge.

We perceive now that there is a Knowledge common to all conditions of men: there must then be a Knowledge special and peculiar to some, or what distinction have we? No beam of this is denied to the Saints; they may have it as well as the wicked: but there is a Knowledge denied to the wicked; they cannot have it as well as the Saints. To know not only the History, but the Mystery of the Gospel: to know God in Christ, Christ in faith, and faith in good works: to know his sufferings our satisfaction, his merits our righteousness; and that we have our part in his Redemption: to know that God is reconciled to us, the Law satisfied, our sins pardoned, our souls acquitted, and that we are in the favor of the Almighty: to know and feel the sweet peace of conscience, the inexpressible comforts of the holy Ghost: to know that mercy shall keep us on Earth, and that eternal joys are prepared for us in Heaven: to know the riches of the glory of God's inheritance in the Saints: To know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge: This is indeed a Knowledge worth our ambition, worth our seeking. But it is too high for the reach of carnal brains: as David speaketh in another sense, Such Knowledge is too wonderful for them: it is too high, they cannot attain unto it: The refulgent Glory of it would strike them blind. The natural Man receiveth not the things of GOD'S Spirit. In the other Knowledges, the Righteous have part with sinners: but in this the sinners have no part with the Righteous. Let me be weak in policy, so I may be wise to salvation. For application.

1. It reprooves them that know much, and will do a little: that have full brains, and empty hearts: a library of Divinity in their heads, and not so much as the least Catechism in their Consciences. Nor does this only touch the cobby-hold of Preachers, but it concerns the capital Tenure of all Christians. Thou which teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? It is no impossible thing: the candle that lights others to see by, sees nothing it self. Yield that the candle hath no sense; yet may not an ill favored Painter draw a fair picture? Though himself have none of the most pleasing countenances, yet he may counterfeit an amiable face. The praises of virtue may be extolled and magnified in the mouth, where virtue it self cannot get into the heart: Laudatur, non admittitur. The Carpenter may square other men's timber by the rule, his own at a venture. The servant may draw wine for all the family, and yet drink water himself. There is no necessity that everyone should be good, which teaches it. When an orator, with great store of wisdom, had bitterly declaimed against folly, and somewhat abused his auditors: it was afterwards replied upon him by one of them; Sir, your discourse of folly, may well be divided into three parts: One part you have declaimed against in all men, one part you have bestowed upon us, and the other part you have kept to yourself. But when a man shall commend wisdom to all his hearers, and keep no part of it to himself, for his own exercise, is it not madness? This is as if he were set to tell heads, and to number the company, and should forget to reckon himself. When an inheritance is to be divided among many children, will any coheire set out the portions of the rest, and forget his own? We say for temporal things, when a man spends all, or gives away all: It was but his kind heart: But in the distribution of spiritual things, to leave ourselves none, argues not a kind, but a stupid heart. Heavenly knowledge is not lost by communicating: we may both give all, and keep all. Lord enable me to give so much as may make others rich in grace, and yet to keep so much as may make myself rich in glory.

2. For us all; Let us keep our knowledge from ranging: It will hunt counter, if it pursues any other game but salvation. Ye worship ye know not what. That is a wild and rambling devotion, which knows not what it worships; whether God or an Idol: as Saul, instead of Samuel, worshipped the Devil; Stooping with his face to the ground, and bowing himself. Knowledge is apt to fly out, unless it be kept in coram by goodness. It is a people that do err in their hearts, for they have not known my ways. Soone must they err, that wander from the ways of God. Many herbs that are wholesome and useful in the garden, grow wild in the desert or common field. So there is the wild Rose, and the wild Sage, and the wild Thyme, wild Succory, and wild Tansey. These may have some virtue in the Forest, where they spring naturally; but much more in the garden where they are set carefully. Wise men are called Sages; but our wisdom will grow wild Sage, if it be not kept within the garden of grace. Our Roses will wither, our time change color, our succors be to seek; all will turn wild in the wilderness of sin. Our knowledge it self may so become wild, and so lose all the virtue. Fire is good and necessary, while it is kept upon the harth within the chimney: it serves to warm our hands, to dress our meat, indeed for innumerable uses: but let it break out into the house, and the rage is most violent, the mischief unrepairable. If our knowledge have got a gadding humor, a trick of playing truant; if it will steal out of school, to chatte with Satan, and to enquire how the market of the world goes; how flesh and blood may be satisfied, in their appetite, in their addiction, in their curiosity, in their sensuality; it soon becomes wild, and flies out into rebellion. But keep it In orbe pietatis, within the lists of godliness, and then it is a window to the Ark, an eye to the soul, a guide to the affections, a Iehoida to Iehoash, to do right.

There are two daughters of the understanding; Scientia, Conscientia: they must be sisters, both for their names and natures. Con (we know) is ever in composition: so that Conscientia is but Scientia cum alis: a couple of them there must be at lest. Science travells abroad, Conscience keeps home: it is internal and domestical. Knowledge is the Intelligencer, and brings in news; whereof conscience determines. It may be sometimes a-sleep, but is never absent. Nec fugere, nec fugare poteris. It is bred and borne within us, it will live and die with us. When Adam by his sin had brought ruin upon himself, and deaded the powers of his soul to goodness; this faculty had the most life remaining in it, and was left like Job's messengers to bring him news of the great loss; I alone am escaped to tell thee. This little spark was left fresh, to show what great lights were extinguished. The office of knowledge is to inform conscience: the office of conscience is to reform knowledge, Knowledge is the eye of the soul, and conscience the glass: (for it is but reflection of the soul upon it self) now our eyes cannot see themselves but by the reflection of a glass: nor doth knowledge rightly know it self but by the representation of conscience. In knowing of other things consists the exercise of Science: in knowledge of ourselves, the exercise of Conscience. Cùm alia scit animus, Scientiae dicitur: quum scipsum, Conscientia. All the arts, and trades, and policies, and mysteries we know, are but cyphers: Conscience is the figure; put this to them, and they will amount to something. From hence come so many errors in our life, when one sister leaves the other; when Science will not take conscience with it, walking abroad; nor look in the glass of conscience, coming home, I know that Conscience is as Zeno said of a wife: Aut perpetuale refugium, aut perenne tormentum: sometime she will be chiding, but it is because we have been rambling. What the Scripture speaks of Dinah, and the Poets feigned of Diana, experience finds true of knowledge. Whiles Dina would be straggling from her fathers house, she was ravished by Shechem. Whiles Diana or Proserpine would be roving from her mothers house, she was wrapped away by Pluto. So when Science leaves Conscience her mistresses house, she will be defiled with sin. Goodness is the seasoning of knowledge: if human wisdom be not powdred with Divine grace, it will stink: that only can keep it, and make it keep. It is not unlike that petitioners son in the Gospel, in a manner lunatic; it will fall into the fire, and into the water too: the Disciples could not cure him, so nothing in nature will help this: Only as Jesus spake there, Bring him hither to me: so if he will be pleased to speak here of our knowledge, Bring her hither to me; she shall be healed, her sister conscience comforted, and their mother the soul saved.

2. In ordine; some knowledge is more honorable than other; Desiderabilius auro, more to be desired than gold. Gold hath the precedency of all metals; more noble than silver; but God's word is more noble than gold. The Apostles counsel is universally to be embraced, Covet the best gifts. Solomon took knowledge and wisdom for the best; and without any leisure of deliberation, fastens upon that: Give me a wise and understanding heart. That soil could not have borne such fruit alone: if God had not sown this seed, the desire of knowledge in his heart, Solomon would not so much as have dreamed of it. Yet this choice being made, God likes the suite so well, as if he were beholding to his creature for wishing good to it self. So doth he esteem a good election, that he recompenseth it with advantage. If riches had been his request, he had never known wisdom, nor (it may be) riches, neither: Now he asks the best, and speeds of all. Riches and honor come into the match. Because he asked what he should, he shall receive both what he asked, and what he asked not. Of that which was promised him sleeping, he found the performance waking: even such an Illumination in all the rooms of his heart, as if God had given him a new soul. We say of temporal things, The best is best cheap: but of spirituals, the best is most precious: how dear so ever they cost us, they should be most dear unto us. Christ doth not dispraise Martha's hospitality, in preferring Mary's piety. Though she had chosen the better part, Yet this doth not deny the other to be good. Many things are necessary to salvation, but the knowledge of the Gospel is the chief. ^s It is necessary antonomatice, prae caeteris; Simpliciter & propter se, necessitate finis: others in ordine ad finem, & propter ejus consequutionem. As sustenance is necessary to maintain life; yet physic and excercise are necessary too in their times and places. Bonum is not excluded by Melius: water out of the tankard shall not lose the reward, but meat out of the cupboard shall find a greater. Let the dead bury their dead, follow thou me. It is a good work, Mortuos sepelire: but Evangelium nunciare, better. St. Paul more extolls Evangelizandi, quàm baptizandi functionem: Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the Gospel. The ministry of the word, is more noble than the ministry of the board. It is not reason that we should leave the word of God to serve tables: therefore the Apostles chose Deacons to that purpose, and gave themselves to prayer and preaching of the word.

There be some things not worth the knowing, because they are not worth the having. ^m Set your affection on things above, not on things on earth. Not on earth, for that is the place from whence Christ is risen; He is not here. It is but a folly to seek him where we are sure he is not. Not on the mountains, where the beasts seek their food: not among the clouds, whither the fowls of the air seem to aspire: not among the stars, that Summum Astrologia, the highest of naturians. But in a higher place, above all these, in heaven. Heaven is a great circle; where there? In the highest place of heaven; at the right hand of God. As nature would have us no mouses, so grace would have us eagles, to mount up where the body is. There be upon earth, some things higher in estimation than others; which the world takes for Superna, things above. To be above others in wealth and abundance; the richer, the higher; this is one Supra:

To be above others in honor; the nobler, the higher; is another Supra: To exceed the common sort in pleasure, and the variety of carnal joys, is a great Supra with them. But alas, all these are inferiora; and (without repentance) will sink down to inferna: Those have but base minds that admire them, and but lean souls that are satisfied with them. There is a Supra far above all these; a glory and immortality to be known: we are ad altiora geniti, and should have a holy ambition of them. To know the love of Christ, here is wisdom indeed: to know the way of salvation, is the Supra of all knowledge. When we are studying that let us think we are about a high point of wisdom; and that to perform it well, is the wisest action of all our life.

This knowledge does not only bring grounds for Judgment, but rules for practice; and gives reasons why we do things, or leave them undone, It argues thus; I am now about a work, what will God think of it? May I offer it to him? Will he allow it? Will he help me forward with it? Will he in the end reward me for it? This is indeed a happy knowledge; as if it had been wrapped up with Paul into Paradise: or if it be not taken up into heaven, yet heaven is let down into it. As the legend speaks historically (which is only true Symbolically) of S. Christopher; that before he was converted to the faith, he would serve none but the strongest: so this knowledge aims at none but the highest. He had for his first master a man of great strength and puissance, but a king subdued him: him he forsook for that king, but finding him to be overcome by a neighbor, he betook himself to that other Pagan conqueror: This conqueror was also tyrannized over by the devil, to whom he was a mere slave, doing all his base commands: This he could not endure, but entered into service with the devil. For a while he admired the power of his new master, and what a dominion he exercised over the sons of men; but in a short space he found out his weakness also: so feeble and fearful was he of a piece of wood, he durst not pass by the Cross; but when that stood in his way, he must back again. Now that weary servant longed to know what this Cross meant, and how he might find out a more potent Lord. It was told him that Christ was the Lord of that Ensign; and that the Cross was his Banner. Thither then he flies, and there he found out a most mighty, an almighty Master. So let our knowledge climb; from strength to strength, from height to height, till it appear before God in Zion. Let it mount higher than riches in their Treasury, higher than Princes in their Throne, higher than stars in the Firmament, and fetch all her light and comfort from God in Jesus Christ.

There is a double use to be made of this point. First, despise not the least. Secondly, but seek the best knowledge.

1. There is no good knowledge, but it comes from the Grace of God, and tends to the glory of God. As Solomon despised not to know the hyssop on the wall, no more than the Cedar in Lebanon, so though thy knowledge be like the Sun, yet contemn not the least star. There are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit: all light comes from the same Father of lights. He that made the Elephant, made the Ant; as well the Fly, as the Eagle: the poorest worm that creeps on the earth, as the most glorious Angel in heaven. He that gives us the Kingdom of heaven, and those eternal joys; gives also every piece of bread we eat, and commands us to acknowledge it. In one and the same prayer, which is the exemplar and precedent of all prayers, he teacheth us to sue for both Regnum tuum, and Panem nostrum. If it were but a little spark got into the flax, Christ would not quench it. Despise not the mean knowledge of thy brethren, though thy own soul have a clearer understanding. There may be Divine wisdom in the heart of a man, though it want utterance. Full many have proved holy Martyrs, that never were profound scholars: As that simple woman answered the persecuting Prelate in Quene Mary's days, when he questioned her about the subtleties of learning: My Lord, I cannot dispute for the truth, but I can die for the truth. Thou hast a more reaching brain, another may have as honest a heart. Honor the least Grace of God, wheresoever thou find it. Say the gifts in some Christians be small: yet reverence the Giver for these: and then thy happiness shall be like Nathaniel's; Thou shalt see greater things than these. Who hath despised the day of small things? The day of small things may beget a day of great and glorious things. They that would not acknowledge God in the greater judgments, were driven to do it in the less. This is the finger of God. God is called the Father of lights: Luminum, in the plural, because of the degrees and diversities of his gifts: otherwise Pater luminis would have served. But we must respect the number, as well as the nature of his gifts; and the several degrees of this gift, knowledge; which is light indeed, and fit to come from the Father of lights. There is one light of the Sun, another of the Moon, and another of the Stars; and among the Starres, one differeth from another in glory, Though one be not so bright as another, yet they are good all. Now God made the dimmest star as well as the Sun in all his splendor. The humble Day-eye would fain grow, though it cannot shoot up so high as the Marigold. Let us learn to know and glorify God even in his least works; as Caesars image is not only seen in his come of gold, but even upon the poor penny. Bless him in all, for all.

2. Choose the best: refuse not knowledge in lower things, but aim at the highest. The serpent is the emblem of wisdom: Pharaohs enchanter wrought wonders, when they turned their rods into serpents; but Moses his serpent devoured all theirs: all sciences are swallowed up in the knowledge of God. There is no true knowledge, which knows not Quo or dine, quo studio; quo fine, all things are to be done. For order, Id prius, quod maturius movet ad salutem. For desire, Id ardentius, quod vehementius ad charitatem. For the end; to the edification of others, not ostentation of ourselves. That noble queene of the South came far to learn knowledge: in Solomon she found the mine, and stored her soul with that invaluable treasure. She gave him sixscore talents of gold; that was a royal gift of a queene to a king: Solomon gave her whatsoever she asked; and that was a more royal gift of a king to a queene. Hers was temporary riches, his eternal: Hers might comfort the body, his could save the soul: hers arose out of the Earth, his came down from Heaven: her gift could not make Solomon happy, his gift made the queene of Sheba blessed: She came rich, she went away wise: she came a queene, she went away a Saint. There was not more freedom in her gift, than in her receipt: her own will was the measure of both. She gave what she would, and she received whatsoever she would ask: and surely she would ask the best. She was not such a truant in the school of wisdom, nor had so little profited by Solomon, but that she learned to crave the best. She returns therefore more richly laden than she came: she gave to Solomon, as a thankful client of wisdom, Solomon returns to her as a munificent Patron, according to the liberality of a king. Seeing there is one knowledge higher and better than another, let us choose the best, the highest.

Give a natural man his choice of any dignity or honor in this world, and where will he fixe? Would he content himself with a mean office, and hold it a credit to be chosen Churchwarden or Constable? Offices which not a few are proud of. Or would his ambition be no more, than to fly Justice-height, and be in commission of the peace? Or would he be pleased with the Majorality of a city, or with some eminent place of judicature on the Bench? Or would the Nobility of a Peere, or to be a General of the army, or a Statesman at the Counsel-table satisfy him? Or were it enough for him to marry with a Princesse, the daughter of a king, which David took for so great an advancement? Or would he be content with Joseph's place, to ride in the second chariot of Egypt, and to be Lord lievetenant over the kingdom? No, but so long as there was a Pharaoh to say, Tantum in solio te major ero, only in the thrones I will be above thee, he is not pleased. Aut Caesar, aut nihil: the king he must be, or nothing. His aspiring thoughts would never rest, till his head were encompassed with a crown. O where is our holy ambition of such a spiritual honor? why knowledge is a crown: The prudent are crowned with knowledge. Not every knowledge; the Gardiners to plant: the Carpenters to frame: the Lawyers to plead: the Sophisters to dispute; these cannot be called crowns. Men may have skill in these, and the like, and yet never deserve the glory of a crown, much less the crown of glory. It is not the Philosophers knowledge, but the Christians, that is truly a crown. To know God in Christ, this crowns us. To the crown we would be as near as possible we can: if we may not be kings, yet at lest the kings Favorites. When it was phansied that Christ should be a great King upon earth, there was suing straight to be near his Throne. Not so much as goodwife Zebedees two sons, that smelt of the fisher-boat, but means was made for them to be next the King. Earls are comites Regis, and have their Coronets: so are the Saints, having a fellowship with Christ. Yea they are Reges; Christ hath made us kings to his Father. Not that they may do what they list: Spiritual kings may not be lawless; for they are facti à Christo, and Reges Deo. One crown they have, Corona sapientia: another they shall have, Corona gloriae. Why then do we stick upon these lower objects, as if the knowledge how to be rich or potent, were such a worthy matter. They be but Lutulentae coronae, dirty crowns, that are made of such stuff: Higher must our knowledge mount, or no crown is to be had.

There is a saucy knowledge; when the Astrologer will offer to pick God's Counsel out of the Stars, and derive his honor upon constellations. That speculation is high enough, too high, but withal too presumptuous: the Astrologer shall never make himself a crown of Stars. There is a wanton knowledge, a fictitious poesie, transported not only from modesty, but from morality: which multiplies the one Deity into the plurality of gods: prefers Pernassus to Mount Olivet: faignes and commends an Elysium, for the Heavenly kingdom: placeth Metamorphosis instead of miracles: to whom a neat pleasing fable is more delightful than the true and saving Gospel: and in whose mouth the figments of a petulant brain, are more frequent than the Word of the eternal God. Their souls are taken with a smooth poeme: they use to call it a Rapture, and stick not to add the attribute of Divine. But when a Poet courts his Mistress in a lascivious time, is this a divine Rapture? To defame the reputation of men, of States, of Saints, in railing Satyres; is this a divine Rapture? I censure not the art of Poesie: it is excellent; a Knowledge that may both prodesse, & delectare: I do not flowt Poets, that they are the best Writers, next to them that write in prose. But it is the looseness of luxuriant wits, and spurious fancies, full of the venom of the Serpent, that makes it odious. A higher and nobler Knowledge belongs to Christians: in Psalms Hymns and Spiritual songs, to sing the praises of God Sursum corda, yea and Sursum cerebrae too: thither upwards all. As our bodily eyes see not the air that is next them, nor the fire, nor the spheres, nor stop upon anything till they come to the stars: So let the eyes of our souls, wisdom and knowledge, see nothing of this world, though it be never so near us; but pass through all, and only fixe themselves upon the peace, and joy, and glory in heaven. So will the Lord bless our knowledge, and crown our heads with a Crown of honor here; and then crown that Crown with the Head of all, which is Jesus Christ, hereafter.

3. In Efficacia; some knowledge is more effectual than other. There is a Theoricall, and a Practical knowledge: the former whereof may be without the latter, but the latter cannot be without the former. Men may have knowledge, and yet not do well: but no man can do well, unless he have knowledge. So divers Interpreters by knowledge here understand obedience; the fruits, and effects, and consequents of knowledge, which are good works. As if the Apostle had said, Grow in grace, and in the works of grace. It is no news to have knowledge taken for obedience, or obedience for knowledge. He judged the cause of the poor and needy, was not this to know me, saith the Lord? If they be two, yet they are such two, as would never be parted, never found asunder: like Mary and Martha, both sisters, and both busy about Christ. Mary listens to his Word, that she may know what to do: Martha looks to her hospitable office, that she may do what she knows. Martha prepares to feast him, Mary prepares to be feasted by him. And those lazy admirers of the Contemplative life, have yet ascribed a greater reward to the Active: as to relieve the poor and comfort them, is better than to say only, God help them. Every Cherub had the form of a man's hand under his wing. There is not only the wing of Knowledge to fly aloft; but the hand of practice, to do good below. The one doth not cross, but assist the other: as the hands fetch their direction from the eyes, and the eyes look to the operation of the hands. As Simeon and Levi were brothers in evil: so Mary and Martha were sisters in good. The union of these two is much commended both in the Scriptures, and by the Fathers.

For the Scriptures: Hos. 6. I desired the Knowledge of God more than burnt offerings. If this were only a speculative knowledge, certainly then there was more worth in burnt offerings: for what is God the better for our wisdom? He is honored by our sacrifice. But obedience hath there gotten the Name of Knowledge, and then it is fully expounded. To obey is better than sacrifice. So Deut. 4. Keep the Commandments of God, and do them, for this is your wisdom and understanding before God and men. Not a sign of wisdom, nor an effect of wisdom, nor the companion of wisdom; but Ipsa sapientia, wisdom it self. There also hath obedience got the Name of Wisdom. So I am. 3. Who is a wise man among you, and endued with knowledge? Let him show his works out of a good conversation with meekness. There if they be not sub eodem nomine, yet they are in eodem homine: if distinguishable in their nature, yet inseparable in their subject. For that man's good Conversation is wisdom, his good works wisdom, his meekness wisdom, and the discreet showing or manifestation of all, wisdom, 1 John. 2. He that saith, I know God, and keepeth not his Commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him. There is no term so odious with us as a liar: yet David was very round and homely with us, when he says, All men are liars: without question, all sinners are liars. Some had their Surnames from Greatness; as Alexander the great, Pompey the great, Constantine the great, Charles the great: Others from Piety, as Metellus Pius, Antonius Pius, Aeneas Pius: The conscionable and obedient Christian takes one Name from Wisdom: He is Vir Sapiens as well as Vir Bonus.

For the Fathers; Nazian. He is the wise man qui pauca de virtute loquitur; sed propter virtutem multa facit. Sapientia illa clara est, non quae verbis volat, sed quae virtutibus constat. Bernar. Sol non omnes, quibus lucet, etiam calefacit: so wisdom gives men light, to know what they should do: but does not inflame their affections, to do what they know. It is one thing to know wealth, another thing to possess it: Nec divitem facit cognitio, sed possessio. Let me add, Nec divitem facit possessio, sed fruitio: usus, non habitus. Isidor. It makes to the accumulation, and aggravation of a man's sins, Scire quod sequi debeat, & sequi nolle quod sciat. Hugo. Frustra divina cognitionis abundantia crescit, nisi divinae dilectionis flammam augetur. Augustine. As God hath given the office and Ministry of Baptism to many, but the power of remitting sins in Baptism he keeps to himself: So knowledge is a common gift; one man may teach another: but holiness is a peculiar grace, which he gives by none but himself: There may be a substance without an odour: but there can be no odour without a substance: So there may be knowledge without good works, but good works without knowledge never. A distinction of them we may conceive in our brains, God forbid there should be a division of them in our hearts. This consideration affords us a threefold use.

1. It is our Apostles charge, Add to your virtue knowledge: my exhortation here must be, Add to your knowledge virtue. If your wisdom be not operative, it had better not be at all: For we must give account of our knowledge, and that account must be according to the fruits of our knowledge. As Gregory speaks of the Feast of Resurrection; we keep Easter but ill, nisi quod de more celebratur, etiam quoad mores exprimat: unless we express the matter of the feast, in the manner and form of our life. So we shall give but a sorry account of our knowledge, without a Catalogue of good works: an Inventory, not of our own counterfeiting, but upon record in heaven. The Spirit moved upon the face of the waters, in the Creation: He did not lie, nor sit, nor stand upon them, but he moved: he instantly fell to work. An Angel troubled the waters; not only looked on them, but moved them. We are no sooner put into the spring of spiritual knowledge, but at once we both perceive our own fowlenesse, and in that holy Laver begin to wash our souls. As Naaman did not stand to view Jordan, but dipped himself seven times in it, to get off his leprosy. They looked, or had an eye to him, and were lightened. Light and heat are inseparable: the nights are hotter in Plenilunio, because then there is more light. If the Lord doth enlighten us with knowledge, he doth also warm us with charity: and charity will be doing good works.

2. The purpose and end of our knowledge must be directed to goodness. Many learn much, that they may be Docti, not Boni; and reputed in Sapientum, non in Sanctorum numero. So some Lawyers study to be cunning in the Laws; not with an intent to help their poor oppressed Clients, but by intricate quirkes, windings, and distortions, to squeeze their purses. They would be rich by their knowledge, not honest: as their Heirs would be made noble by their riches, not hospitable: and the third generation leaves neither honor, nor honesty, nor riches behind them, to their posterity. The Priests and Scribes could plainly have informed Herod concerning Christ; and clearly have expounded the Prophet Micah; that he was to be a spiritual King, and not to take upon him any earthly Principality: so that Herod needed not to fear the loss of his kingdom by him. Thus might they have kept that Tyrant from blood, and prevented the murder of so many Innocents. But such was their pride, that they would not. They had the keys, but they scorned to open the door. So you have Herod turning over the Bible, searching the Scriptures, examining the Prophets; but to what purpose? He says, Vt Christum adoraret: but he lied, for it was Vt Christum devoraret. Know, to be better, as well as to be wiser. There is no comfort in any knowledge, the scope whereof is not Divine goodness.

3. Let no knowledge satisfy us, but that which refers us, prefers us to Christ. There be common gifts, wherein natural men take their full acquiescence: yet we know, the dispensation of them extends to very Reprobates. Balaam had the gift of Prophecy, yet he loved the wages of iniquity. Saul had another heart given him: a kingly heart, not an holy heart. Ahithophel's counsel was oraculous, yet his end desperate. Judas happily could preach like an Angel: yet in practice, a very Devil. Baptism is a gracious gift of God, yet many after the water of Baptism, go to the fire of Hell. Prophecy, an eminent gift: yet Saul inter Prophetas. Faith, necessary: yet The Devils believe and tremble. Do we not see in the world, a great Statesman, yet a mere Atheist? A deep Divine, yet too covetous? An expert Lawyer, yet a corrupt Judge? An experienced Physician, yet a mere Naturian? A rare Scholar, yet a great Drinker? Chrysostom hath a fearful saying; He that knows good, and lives in evil, is no better than a Devil in the shape of a man, or no better than a man in the nature of a Devil. These may have good parts, but they are not good men. The Devils know and believe, believe and tremble: but they can do no good. Let us turn to God with repentance, which the Devils cannot do: and be engrafted to Christ by faith, which the Devils cannot be: and possess the Spirit of sanctification which the Devils cannot have. So shall we both in grace and knowledge, resemble the blessed Angels, and be Partakers of their glory in the Heavens. As no place can content the Fire, but the uppermost: still it riseth up toward the own Region: so let no knowledge satisfy us, but the knowledge of Christ. The other Elements, Earth, Water, and Air, are pleased with lower rooms. There is an Earthy Knowledge; which lives like a moule in the mould, in the warm bowels of wealth; and cries, Let them take higher happiness, that have a mind to it. Earth will to earth; an earthly desire, to an earthly Center; so they live: till earth be turned into earth; so they die: yet, till earth be turned out of earth, their earthy souls into hellish torments. This is a base and brutish life. There is a knowledge one story higher; a watery knowledge, that seeks only after pleasure, and the sensual delights of the flesh. Give it lusty wines, beautiful Strumpets, music, and banquets, sport and merriments; this is all it cares to know. Where is the best liquor? Where lies the handsomest Whore? Where meets the jovial Companion? This is a fluid knowledge, that turns the blood into water, the very soul into water, and so runs it into the dead sea. There is a knowledge yet a story higher than this; an airy knowledge, that seeks for nothing but glory. Advance it into the Princes favor, make it an admiration to the vulgar, blow it up with increase of honor: such empty, airy, windy stuff will fill this vain bladder. These Elements of our sloth sit quietly in lower rooms:

but divine knowledge, like the noble fire, mounts aloft, & finds no rest but in the region of Immortality.

In the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ] All this while we have been getting up Jacob's Ladder, and climbing by certain stairs and degrees to the Knowledge of Christ. Now our meditations are come to the top; let us view the beauty of Zion, and with our intellectual eyes behold the Face of Him whom our soul loveth. Thou art fairer than the children of men. First, generally.

1. The Sun and the Sea are the 2 great receptacles; the Sun of light the Sea of waters. For the former; God made the light before the Sun: but when he had made the Sun, he reduced all the dispersed light into this one luminary: not locking it up in that body, as Aeolus the winds in a cave: but so disposing it for the better cōmunication to the world. Christ is the Sun of righteousness: in him is treasured up all wisdom and knowledge: not under lock and key, for the door stands continually open to all humble Clients. It is but Ask and have: it cannot come upon easier terms. In Him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge: not for his own use only: as the Sun hath not light for itself; but for our more convenient participation. He is made to us wisdom: 1 Cor. 1.30. to us. In himself he is the wisdom of God, not created, but creating all things. But what were this to us, if we might not partake of his wisdom? If He did hoard up his Knowledge, as a Miser doth his corn, or a Philargyrist his coin, we might still be poor and beggarly for want of Knowledge. But as it pleased the Father that in Him should dwell all fullness: so of his fullness have we all received. And as we receive, so we must return: as our knowledge comes from his Grace, so it must return to his Glory. Without Christ we could not attain to knowledge, and without knowledge we cannot attain to Christ. It came from Him, and it must never rest till it come back unto Him. Grow in this knowledge.

For the other; the Sea is that great cistern, to receive the confluence of all waters. First, From that large and vast pond, water is derived into all parts of the earth by veins and springs: those springs run into rivers, and those rivers empty themselves again into the sea. So all good Knowledge flows from the fullness of Christ, and is conveyed to us in certain pipes and chanells, the ministry of the word and Sacraments. This living water should return to the first fountain, all our knowledge must have recourse unto Christ. Secondly, Rivers run by diverse countries, and everywhere do them good as they go: and according to those several coasts, they have several names: but still they pass along, and keep their current: They make many grounds fruitful, but tarry with none of them: to the main they make a-main, and there they lose their names. Knowledge is a fair stream, and runs by many arts and mysteries; and does good at all times, in all places, to all persons. According to the several objects it hath several names: as knowledge in medicines makes physicians, in the Statutes makes lawyers, in the arts makes scholars: But it sticks in none of these: still doth all good knowledge go forward, reaching at the Summum bonum, till it be quite swallowed up in the comforts of Jesus Christ. Thirdly, when rivers come near the sea, the sea sends forth the tide to meet them, as it were a harbinger to entertain them. So when our knowledge is heavenly affected, and inflamed with the love of Christ, as the Queen of Sheba was with the wisdom of Solomon; then Christ spreads out his arms to meet us, as the Father met his returning son. He prevents us with his favor, and graceth us with an extraordinary honor. Only this difference there is: the rivers are sweet, the sea is brackish: but our waters are brackish, and this sea is sweet. Other streams lose their fresh and pleasant taste, when they come into the sea: ours never gets any pleasant or wholesome taste, till they come thither. All our knowledge is brinish and unsavory by nature, and only obtaineth sweetness by flowing into this Ocean of goodness. O Lord, all our fresh springs are in thee. We have waters of our own, but they are bitter: Like the waters of Marah, whereof the Israelites could not drink; bitter waters. In the fountains of our hearts are the waters of manifold corruptions; so harsh that they will not down with our thirsty consciences: or unwholesome, like the waters of Jericho; they make the ground barren. Either all our fruits are wild, or our trees fruitless. Yet Christ can sweeten the one, and season the other, and cure all; by giving us the knowledge of his mercy, and the assurance of our own salvation.

2. Thus generally: Now this Knowledge is so sweet, that if we have once tasted it, we will exceedingly thirst after it. The eye is not satisfied with seeing nor the ear with hearing, nor the heart with knowing: we are never content, till we see face to face, and know as we are known. As nothing could quiet Absalom, but seeing the face of the King: so we long to know how we may know Christ. And but reason; for there be many that meet him, and yet do not know him, some that seek him, and yet are ignorant of him when they see him. Jesus stood by Mary, she saw him, and yet she knew him not. The two Disciples were walking and talking with him; yet their eyes were holden that they should not know him. Joseph had done much for his brethren, yet they knew him not. Christ at his Resurrection was so changed, that they knew him not: Quis iste, who is this that cometh Edom? They might have some reasons why it should not be He. First, Christ was put to death, put into the grave, and a great stone upon him, but three days since: this man (we see) is alive and alives like. Secondly, Christ's apparel was shared among the soldiers, and he was left naked: this man hath on glorious apparel. Thirdly, Christ was wrapped in linen, and so laid in the earth: so that if he appear, it must be in white: this man comes quite in another color all in red. So many disputes we still make about his presence: Not only about his real presence in the Sacrament, whereof there be large volumes of controversies: But also about his spiritual presence in our hearts, wherein there is a world of doubts. If some unusual crosses disturb our peace, or trouble our affections, presently there breaks out a voice, mixed with murmuring and despair, God hath forsaken us. No talk of his presence of his absence we complain: our cowardly spirits give him gone quite: yet non longe abest, he is not far from everyone of us. The Angel went before Peter, though he saw him not: and Christ is within us, even whiles we feel him not. The Lord is in this place, and I knew it not. Jacob saw him, both asleep, and awake: some are awake, and do not perceive him: others sleep, and do not dream of him. He goeth by me, and I see him not. He is nearer us many times than we think him: even close by us, though we be not aware of it. And indeed when is he more near us, than in our afflictions? Ero tecum in tribulationibus: is his promise. If at other times he remove, yet then he will not fail us. Then commonly we seek him, and he is soon found. Nunquam ab eis abest, a quibus quaeritur. He is found of them that seek him not: but of them that seek him, never but found. Thou Lord, hast not forsaken them that seek thee. Thus Christ may meet us, as he did Saul in the way to Damascus: or accompany us, as he did the two Disciples to Emmaus: or stand by us, as he did by Mary in the garden: and yet we not know him. Yea, he may be before us, within us, and yet we not know him. To know him therefore is our desire, and how to know him is our demand. Two ways is he known here: Per charitatem, Perfidem.

1. By love: I cannot say which is first; love or knowledge: whether we first love him and so come to know him: or first know him, and so come to love him. But this I dare say, we do not know him, unless we love him: as in reason, we cannot love him, unless we know him. And this I dare say, that the more we know him, the better we love him: and the more we love him, the better we know him. I deny not, but there may be a knowledge without love. Did you never know any so cunning in the story of the Gospel, that they could tell you the manner of Christ's life and death, from point to point: and yet have no more love of Christ in them, than there is fire in a fish-pond? The seat of knowledge is the head: of love, the heart. The Sun may shine clear in a frosty day: yet for all his light, it may be bitter cold, and the face of the deep frozen. Our eyes may see, when our bones shake. The beams of knowledge may fill our heads, and yet winter lie cold at our hearts; till they be even dead with uncharitableness. If Christ were beloved so far, and so well as he is known, it would be a merry world in Christendom. The Devil would have little to do: we should go to Heaven in troupes. But it is not so happy: the knowledge of Christ, and the love of Christ, have both one Father, but they have not both one Mother: they come not both from the same venter. God is the Father of them both: from him all good gifts are derived: he gives both love and knowledge. But the difference is on the mothers side: the mother of love is Grace: the mother of knowledge, Nature. God so created the soul, that it should have an understanding capable of knowledge: which is still bettered by study and experience. So though it proceeds à Deo patre, yet per naturam matrem. The Devil did not lose his knowledge, when he lost his innocence: nor did man by his fall lose his understanding: those faculties were depraved and corrupted, not abolished. So that by nature, especially improved with art, there is in the reason of man, a capacity of much knowledge. Thus they may know Christ, in knowing the History of Christ; what he did, what he suffered, of whom, and for whom, without loving him. But the love of Christ, is the daughter of grace, and so royal both by Fathers and Mothers side. Many a wise Statesman is beholding to a far less wise (but much more loved) favourite, to help him to the speech of the king. Love is Christ's favourite, always in his gracious presence: knowledge is not so; but must be fain to wait at the door, and thank love for having admission. Love then is that friend at Court, which helps us to the sight of the Prince: by love we come to know the Lord Jesus.

Desire we therefore to know Christ? This is the way: Let us love him. Everyone that loveth, knoweth God, saith saint John. We cannot put it into convertible terms; Everyone that knoweth, loveth God; yea more: God dwelleth in him that loveth; and he that loveth, dwelleth in God. Now God cannot dwell in us, but we must know our inhabitant: we cannot dwell in God, but we must know our Land-lord. Mary's best knowledge of Christ, was her love: she did not know him when she saw him, but still she loved him. Many sins are forgiven her, for she loved much. Not because she knew much, but because she loved much. Love does not wait upon knowledge for a reason of loving, but knowledge waits upon love for a means of knowing. Love stands not upon a quare, why should I love him? what good shall I have by him? Such a mercenary baseness cannot enter into the noble breast of charity. Let knowledge examine that, and knowledge shall find, that if the whole Heaven were turned to a book, and all the Angels deputed writers, they could not set down all the good Christ hath done us. But charity loves, because it is beloved: it is his Dilexit me, that sets me on fire: our love is inflamed by his: His love to us is infinite: it is not only a Majorem nemo habet, but a Majorem nemo concepit. Saint Paul chargeth us to Know this love: yet withal, in the very same place, he tells us that it passeth knowledge. Though we cannot know it, secundum ejus mensuram, according to the immensity of the thing: yet we may, secundum modulum nostrum, according to our capacity. We cannot tell whether we love him first, and then know him: or know him first, and then love him. Certainly, regenerate love, and regenerate knowledge, were infused both at once: we can assign no Prius or Posterius to them. But what doubt so ever there is of the priority, the meliority is clear: for the greatest of these is charity. Love is greater than faith, therefore certainly greater than knowledge. Let us then know Christ, that we may love him: and never think to find him in our heads, unless we first find him in our hearts.

2. By Faith: Qui credit, intelligit; as some render the words of the Prophet. This is the wedding-ring, wherewith we are married to Christ: now the husband cannot be unknown to his Spouse. Blessed is she that believed: and that by good consequence: For cognitio per fidem, inchoatio cognitionis per visum. Faith below, is a beam of that beatifical vision above. Credere est faelicitas viae, sicut videre est faelicitas patriae. The former begins our happiness, the other consummates it. We live by faith, not by sight. Faith could not give us this life without Christ, nor will Christ give it us without faith. He liveth in us, we live in him: both by faith. He can neither live in us, nor we in him, but we must needs know him. Faith is a taste of the joys of Heaven, sight the fruition: we may know the sweetness and delicacy of the feast, by a little taste. From the seed comes the tree, from the tree the fruits, and of the fruits pleasant food. Faith is the seed, that springs up into holiness the tree, which yields the fruits of good works, which please the palate of the King of kings. Meliora sunt vbera tua vino: there is great difference betwixt the milk which children suck from their mothers breasts, and wine. When we drink wine, we know the color of it; whether it be white or red, or brown; we can distinguish it: But the Infant cannot tell what color the milk is of which it sucks. All human knowledge is like wine, whereof we judge by experience: as if the Philosopher tell us, that the least star exceeds the Earth in quantity, or that nihil vacuum in natura; without plain reason or demonstration we will not believe it: and when we have demonstration, our belief ceaseth; for then we know it. But when the Christian tells us of a Trinity in unity, and unity in Trinity; that Christ is God and Man, yet but one Person; shall we suspend our persuasion till he prove it by natural reason? we shall then live and die infidels, than which we had better have lived and died beasts. Secular propositions are left to the taste of our reason: divine mysteries are to be digested by faith. Of the other we may dispute like men, this we must receive like babes. That is for the exercise of wit, this for the trial of faith. There is use of arguments, here is nothing but a promise. In that we are scholars, in this Christians.

Faith is a representative glass, which shows me Christ; and what he did on Earth, and what he does now in Heaven. What he did and suffered on Earth: Faith goes along with him all his journey, from the cradle to the cross. It sees him doing good, and suffering evil. It sees him in such an agony under the weight of sin, that the burden makes him even sweat blood. Never was garden so watered before: Adam might moisten the ground with the sweat of his brows, but now it is wetted with a sweat of blood. His passion began with blood and sweat, and with water and blood it ended. It sees him betrayed with a kiss: collaterally he had upbraided Simon, for not entertaining him with a kiss: from Judas he hath it: that traitor kissed him to death. It sees him scourged, and that by his command; who with one breath pronounced him innocent; and yet condemned him to the lash. It sees him spitte upon, and scorned: the glory of all was spitte upon, the honor of all scorned, and the life of all crucified. He was whipped like a beggar, crucified like a malefactor: in all his sufferings, besides pain, there was infamy. He cured the blind man with spittle, with spittle his own eyes were blinded. It sees him not only defiled with excrements, but buffeted with blows. That face which the Prophets and Fathers so wished to see, is thus abused. It sees him crowned with thorns: a crown for mockery, thorns for sharp infamy. The first Adams sin brought forth thorns on the Earth, and now it is the second Adams turn to wear them. It sees him nailed to the cross, forsaken of God and Men. For Men; there was not a Reuben, to say, Let us spare him, for he is our brother. For God he might say of his Fathers absence, as Mary did when she missed him in the Sepulcher, Abstulerunt Dominum, they have taken away the Lord, and I know not where they have laid him. For God; he gave leave to all his enemies, as to the winds, vires effundite vestras. All this faith sees; nor does it leave him in the grave, where we use to relinquish our friends: but watcheth his rising far better than the soldiers did his sleeping. Yea, it follows him up into Heaven, and sees him set at the right hand of his Father in glory; there continually interceding for us. Nor is this only by way of imagination: for all that read his story, may have such an apprehension. But my faith sees all this done for mine own soul: thus he died for my sins, thus he rose again for my justification.

To the unbeliever all this truth is but a dream. If thou hast not faith; Non tibi natus est Christus, non tibi crucifixus, non tibi surrexit, nec pro te intercedit. Faith is the sight, and the light, and the eye of our souls; whereby we can read our own names in the Book of Life. It makes us not only acquainted with God, but familiar: so like him, that it transforms us into his Image, into holiness. As a drop of water infused into a cup of wine, looseth its own nature, and is changed into wine both in color and taste. The metal cast into the fire, puts off the own form, and becomes fire. The air enlightened by the Sun, becomes light; and seems rather Ipsum lu men, quam illuminatum: So faith transforms us into the likeness of God. Of all the Virgins presented to Ahasuerus, none was so pleasing as Esther. Let the maiden that pleaseth the king, be Queen instead of Vashti. When that decree was published, what strife, what emulation (may we think) was among the Persian Damosels; that either were, or thought themselves fair? Everyone hopes to be a queen: but so incomparable was the beauty of that Iewesse, that she is not only taken into the Persian court, as one of the selected Virgines; but hath the most honorable place in the Seraglio allotted to her. The other virgins pass their probation unregarded: when Esther's turn came, though she brought the same face and demeanour that nature had cast upon her, no eye sees her without admiration. The king is so delighted with her beauty, that contemning all the other vulgar forms, his choices is fully fixed upon her. Our Heavenly King is pleased with all our graces: hot zeal, and cool patience pleaseth him: cheerful thankfulness, and weeping repentance pleaseth him: Charity in the height, and humility in the dust pleaseth him. But none of them are welcome to him without faith, as nothing can please him without Christ. There is none that dares venture into his presence, without faith: She is that Esther to which God holds out his golden Scepter. Adorn thy soul with this grace; So shall the King greatly desire thy beauty. Christ loved all his Disciples well; only John leaned on his bosom: Faith resteth in the bosom of Christ, and Christ resteth in the bosom of faith: it were strange therefore if she should not know. Hereby we know that we know him, if we keep his commandments.. Keep them; who is able? Though we cannot keep them all, yet there is one we can: This is his commandment, that we should believe on his Son Jesus Christ: This is light added to light, an assurance upon an assurance: we know him, and we know that we know him, if our faith be steadfast in him.

By this time we know the way how to know Christ, by Charity and Faith: But now here follows another quaere: How shall we know whether we have this Faith and Charity or not? A little would be said to satisfy us in this point.

1. Faith hath a ready way of knowledge. Shew me thy faith by thy works. There can be no stronger or more evident argument than demonstration. The tree is known by the fruits; is an infallible rule. Whiles we are in health, the natural heat within us turns all our nourishment into good blood, and makes us active and able for the prosecution of our affairs: So if we be in the faith, or have the faith in us; all accidents shall be turned by it in materiam virtutis. Cooperantur in bonum, yea and cooperantur in bonitatem: as all things shall work together to our good, so to our goodness. Wealth shall be the instrument of our mercy, poverty the cause of our humiliation: Health shall minister cheerfulness to our labors, and sickness exercise our patience. Man is borne to work and labor: Si ad hoc natus, quanto magis renatus? Thou sayest, thou believest: Fac quod dicis, & hoc est fides: as saint Augustine gives the etymologie of faith. The root of a tree is a ragged and jagged thing; no shape, no comeliness, no proportion in it: and therefore keeps in the Earth, as if it would not be seen: Yet all the beauty that is in the tree; the straightness of the bulk and body, the spreading fairness of the branches, the glory of the leaves and flowers, the commodity of the fruits; proceed from the root: by that it subsisteth. So faith seems to be but a sorry grace, a virtue of no regard: Devotion is acceptable, for it honors God: Charity is noble, for it does good to men: Holiness is the Image of Heaven, therefore beauteous: Thankfulness is the tune of Angels, therefore melodious: But ad quid fides? What is faith good for? Yes, it is good for every good purpose: the foundation and root of all those graces: All the prayers made by devotion, all the good works done by charity, all the actual expressions of holiness, all the praises sounded forth by thankfulness, come from the root of faith: that is the life of them all. As Faith without works is dead: so indeed works without faith are dead. To have no good works, is the argument of a dead faith: as to have no breath, is the sign of a dead body: but this argument is à consequente. But to have no faith, is an argument of dead works; an argument à Praecedente, or absentia causae: as that body must needs be dead, which hath no soul. Faith doth animate works, as the body lives by the soul: Doubtless, faith hath saved some, without works: but I never read that works hath saved any, without faith.

Bernard compares Christian religion to a vine; whereof faith is the root, virtues the branches, good works the grapes, and devotion the wine. Thy faith then is known by thy works. Thou art good, and doest good, O Lord; saith the Psalmist. If we be good, we will do good certainly: Faith can no more be idle, than it can be incredulous. By faith we know our God, and by works we know our faith. Noli intelligere ut credas, sed creed ut intelligas. That man is most welcome to God, Qui non plus attulit argumenti, sed fidei. By way of apologue, conceive a strife between four faculties, which of them should bring a man nearest to God: Majesty, Strength, Knowledge and Faith. Knowledge pretends that she is the eye of the Soul, and to find out the way is her proper office: she forbids all other to undertake it, or to arrogate that honor, for it is her right. Strength justles knowledge out of the way, and comes in like a Sampson, or an Alexander, with a viam vel inveniam, vel faciam: as if she were the champion, or guard of the soul, to bring her into the presence. Majesty challengeth this privilege from them both; as if that royal dignity belonged to her only: kings are gods on Earth, and nearest in place to the God of Heaven. Fortitude pleads that she is the eldest daughter of God, the Image of his Power: No less doth knowledge, that she is the Image of his Wisdom. And the same doth Majesty say, that she is the Image of his Glory. Everyone claims superiority: but they all despise poor Faith, and do not so much as say, We have a little sister, what shall we do for her, in the day when she shall be spoken for? But let us tarry, and hear what the King himself says; The Lord will show whom he hath chosen. They all wait at the door of the Presence, as the courtiers did upon the call of Ahasuerus. None but Esther is admitted: Faith hath the honor of the first call: she enters, and brings in the rest: all please in faith. Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called. Knowledge is not in this favor, for not many wise are called: nor Strength, for not many mighty are called: nor Majesty, for not many Noble are called. Before, they had faith in no regard: alas, what can she do? Nay, what can she not do? She can strengthen the weak, illuminate the blind, animate the dead, comfort the sorrowful, crown the patient, justify sinners, save souls, and give them an inheritance among the Angels. Quid non? Attingit in accessa, deprehendit ignota; comprehendit immania, apprehendit novissima, and is a bed for Infiniteness to lie on. There is a kind of omnipotency in faith: What is there that God can do, and faith cannot do? Strength is weak, compared with faith: what strength of man can remove mountains? Faith can, and that with a word. Celsitude of honor is a mere dwarfe to faith: that can but command mortals, Faith is attended by Angels. Wisdom is but folly to faith: that knows there is a God of comfort, this enjoys all the comforts of God.

2. Charity hath means to be known too. Although the fervor of love cannot be expressed; for Tepide amat, qui potest exprimere quantum amat: yet love will find ways to declare it self. Love is strong as death. What is stronger than death? It devours all: and when it hath eaten up all, it will eat up it self; for death it self shall die: yet Christ's love to us was stronger. The effect of death is to separate the soul from the body: and such was the extremity of Christ's love. He spared not Himself, that his Father might spare us: his Love evermore shown it self in doing good. He did empty Himself, but it was to fill us: He did go out of Himself, but it was to dwell in us: He died Himself once, but it was that we might live forever. If such a spring of love be in us, the waters of beneficence will be flowing from us. It can do Christ no good, but He hath his Minimos to whom it may. Christ tuos; tua, te, gratis accepimus à te: Ergo meos, mea, me, merito nunc exigit à me. Dying men often send tokens of remembrance to their friends: the best tokens of love that we can leave behind us, is mercy to the poor. If a man professes love to me, and will do me no good; I will request no more of his love, than that he do me no harm. Vnus amor, but duplex objectum. The love wherewith we love God for Himself, and man, his Image, for his sake, is but one: as there be two eyes, yet but one visuall faculty. But the trial of our love to God, is doing good to man. The Lord hath taught us to make clothes; not only to clothe ourselves, but to clothe Him in his poor and naked members. He hath taught us to build houses; not only to house ourselves, but to house Him in erecting Churches to his glory: Taught us to make ships; not only to transport ourselves, but to transport Him, in his holy Gospel, to Unbeleivers: Taught us to make bread, and to dress meat; not only to feed ourselves, but to feed Him in his necessitous servants. There is no Dives among us, but thinks scorn to be charged with the want of love: what not love God? But ask his conscience the next question; What good hast thou done for his sake? Nay, he can remember none of that: no goodness hath come from him all his life long. Perhaps once, at an extraordinary collection, the Church-Wardens skewed a groat from him: but he was sorry for it two days after, and pinched his family and his own belly the whole week following. Such men do not honor Christ, and therefore do not love Him: they do not love Him, and therefore to their comfort they shall never know Him.

Not to suffer this high, sweet, and excellent Point of Knowing Christ to pass without some useful Application. Five particular Duties it will require of us.

1. Let us desire this knowledge: they are in a fair way of finding, that set themselves to seek. When God intends to open the fountain of Grace, and to give us the water of life, he first prepares us with a holy thirst. If a man be so created, saith Saint Augustine, ut per id quod in eo praecellit, attingat illud quod concta praecellit; that by his heart, the best thing he ha's, he may find Christ, the best thing that is: then with neglect of these lower sciences, Ipse quaeratur, ubi nobis segura sunt omnia: ipse cernatur, ubi nobis certa sunt omnia: ipse diligatur, ubi nobis recta sunt omnia. There is a promise of obtaining, like a spark from Heaven, to kindle in our cold hearts this flame of desire. Seek and you shall find. Facilius est coelum & terram transire, quàm ut sic quaerens non inveniatur, sic petens non accipiat, & sic pulsanti non aperiatur. There be some things which we may desire, and yet want: but if we want desire, there is no hope of any good. Desire to the soul, is like the wind to the ship, that keeps it in motion. If desire fails, if the wind be down, presently the sails flag, our souls are becalmed. If thou wouldst fill thy purse with gold out of a bounteous Treasury, thou doest not only open the mouth to receive it, but extend the plates and folds of it: Extendis sinum, & extendendo facis capaciore. Sic Deus differendo extendit desiderium, & desiderando extendit animam, & extendendo facit capaciore Sui. There is a desire of worldly things, which is not Sitis, sed morbus: nec ex inopia oritur, sed ex aestuatione: Give it never so much wealth, Non finis erit cupiditatis, sed gradus. But the regulated and sanctified desire of the soul; as it comes from a better cause, and aims at an higher end; so it is of a nobler temper. It fain would know Christ, that it might love Him: and love Him, that it might enjoy Him, and by that fruition be satisfied with Him. Thou hast given him his hearts desire, and hast not withholden the request of his lips. The hearts desire first, then the request of the lips: the affection of the one, the expression of the other: both are satisfied. Petite & dabitur, Speak and speed: that satisfies the lips: Ave & habe, wish and have; that satisfies the heart. Open thy Mouth, yea, enlarge thine heart never so wide, and Christ will fill it. This satisfies David, and makes him sing there, Selah; which is their Diapason. When the desire cometh, it is a tree of life: the Tree of life was in the midst of the Garden; the very Center of Paradise: so doth it joy the heart. Seek Christ then in thy desires, and seek Him whiles He may be found. I am non videtur Dominus, & prope est: in Iudicio videbitur, & prope non erit: After a strange manner in that last appearance; Et videri potest, & inveniri non potest. We make much of an early flower, the first that springs in our garden: so let us cherish this desire, the first flower of grace.

2. When we know Christ, let us acknowledge him. So Junius renders 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 In agnitione. If it be not the principal, it must needs be an infallible consequent of true Knowledge: Cognitio agnitionem parit, agnitio cognitionem perficit. If thou confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thy heart that God raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. We had need to look to it, when as our salvation lies upon it. There be four sorts of men: Some believe and confess not, some confess and believe not, some do neither, and the best do both. First, Some neither believe nor confess Christ: neither tongue nor heart shall be given to him that made both. Atheists in this are short of the very devils, for they believe and confess too: The proselytes of the Pharisees proved twofold more the children of hell than their masters. But that men should be twofold more the children of hell than devils, is most prodigious. Yet doubtless, if the devils had had a Redeemer, they would have believed and confessed also. Secondly, Some believe and confess not: such are timorous Christians: So Peter had it within him, but out of him it could not be gotten, that Christ was his Lord. As Saint John speaks of Love, so we may say of faith; Perfect faith casteth out fear. Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith? It fares with confession, in this case, as with a vapor: which heat would fain expel, and cold resists the expulsion of it. So faith in the heart, like a kindly heat, labors to send forth the acknowledgment of Christ, and fear stands at the door of the lips to keep it in. Thirdly, Some confess and believe not: such are hypocrites. The heart of the former cannot get the tongue forwards, but in these the tongue runs without the heart. The other have more goodness than they show: these show more goodness than they have. Their shop is continually open, but their ware is naught. The former like Joseph of Arimathea, Nicodemus, and many more, were Christ's Disciples, but durst not openly confess him for fear of the Jews, These openly confess him, but are none of his Disciples. Fourthly, True Christians both believe and confess: their heart is the spring, which being wound up by the hand of grace, sets all the wheels of their affections a going; and those cause the clock to strike, the tongue to speak, and sound forth the praises of Christ. If we know him then, let us acknowledge him: and that both in regard of the honor if we do; and of the danger if we do not. He that denieth me before men, shall be denied before the Angels of God: there is the danger. But whosoever confesseth me before men, him will I confess before the Angels of God: there is the honor. Many a one knows Christ, but does not rightly acknowledge him; sicut servus Dominum, sicut factura factorem: Such a man Christ knows, but he will not acknowledge, quasi factor facturam, quasi Dominus servum. But how small a thing it is for us to acknowledge him before Atheists, tyrants, persecutors; in regard of his acknowledgment and owning of us before the glorious God and his holy Angels?

3. If we know Christ, let us live like him, and be conformed to his Image. That is the effect of God's knowing us, let the same be the effect of our knowing him. I know mine, and I am known of mine. Cognosco meos; that is our security Cognoscor a meis; that fetheth in our duty. If the Princes of the world had known him, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. Our sins are a continual crucifying of Christ: and if we did truly know him, we would abhor thus to recrucifie him. If we wear the livery of that most holy Lord, and lead an unholy life, what is this but to shame our Master? Some have a form of godliness, but deny the power thereof. Such men may be reputed Saints on earth, but they have no part among the Saints in heaven. They have a rule to discern of life or death in a sick man: If they look upon his eyes, and find them so clear as to return the image of their own eyes, they conclude that he shall scape: but if there be no reflection, they make it a sign of death. Our understanding and knowledge are the eyes of our souls: upon which when God looks, and finds the representation of his own Image, which is holiness and righteousness, there is life: but if that be wanting, we are dead. Quid prodest Deum noscere, & sine Deo vivere? The Romish Schoolmen spoil many a fair piece of truth by cutting it out into distinctions: but profane and licentious livers have one distinction worse then all the rest: For they so distinguish, that they extinguish the law of their Maker. It is commanded from above, that as everyone professeth, so he should practice: as he seeth, so he should judge, as he readeth, so he should understand: That according as he knoweth, so he should instruct: as he hath, so he should give: as he thinketh, so he should speak: as he believeth, so he should acknowledge: as he loveth, so he should embrace: and in a word, do to all men, as he would have all men to deal with him. This plain just, and most sacred law is thus eluded by sinners: they affirm that all these things are done ad cundē finem, though not ad cundē modum, or ad idem praescriptum: For there be some that profess, and some that practice: some that teach, and some that learn: some that believe, and some that confess: some that love, and some that give: So they pretend that all these duties are performed severally, which are required jointly, and in composition: done of diverse men, that should be done of every man. But cursed are they that put those things asunder, which God hath joined together. Shall the magistrate, if he rules well; or the Minister, if he preach well; or the householder, if he looks to his family, think that he hath done all his duty? Nay, shall we think it one man's work to believe, and another's to do? One man's office to profess, and another's to practice? Is one only charged with patience, and another with temperance, and a third with charity? Am I only bidden to teach, and you to hear, and none of us all to do? What would become of religion, if way were given to such a distinction? No, but every man is charged with every good work: all holy duties are required of all men: and God will have no respect to him, that hath not respect to all his commandments. How long will ye halt between two opinions? Yea, how long will ye halt between two practices? If we know Christ, we will imitate him: for that infinite goodness cannot but draw all wise hearts after him. Christ did not only teach, but do: our tongues run, but our hands are lame: we can talk well, but doing well is an art we are yet to learn. But alas, been loqui, & male vivere, nihil aliud est quam se sua voce damdare. The physician that keeps an ill diet, loseth his credit: if he undertake to cure others of the dropsy, and be hydropicall himself, testimonium imperitiae suae in corpore suo portat. For it cannot be but supposed, that he would, if he could, soonest of all heal himself. Lord we have prophesied in thy Name: very well, I grant it: you taught others, that sin would bring to destruction and vengeance: out of your own mouth take your sentence. Christ was without sin: to live like him, this shall be your knowledge.

4. Let us rejoyce in this honor, that we know him. Let him that rejoiceth, rejoyce in this, that he knoweth me, saith the Lord. This is a knowledge, which whosoever seeketh, is wise; whosoever getteth, is rich; whosoever keepeth, is strong; and whosoever enjoyeth, is forever blessed. Jesus rejoiced in Spirit, and said, Father I thank thee, that thou hast revealed these things unto babes. That his Fathers bounty had given us this knowledge, Christ himself rejoiced for us; and shall not we rejoyce for ourselves? Saint Paul was a profound scholar, and had abundance of human learning in him: yet in comparison of the knowledge of Christ, he is very homely with it all. Detrimentum & sterquilinum, are the best terms he gives it: so was he enamored and transported with the love of Christ. It was a true and just reprehension, wherewith the high-Priest snibbed the Council, as they were set to condemn Christ; and a great deal better than he meant it: Ye know nothing at all. He spake right, for if we know not the Lord Jesus, we know nothing at all: our knowledge is nothing, or nothing worth. This brings knowledge out of the hall, into the parlor; stripes it of the old rags, and puts upon it a robe of honor and immortality. We may say of secular knowledge, as Antigonus did of his garment; O nobilem, magis quam faelicem pannum! But of divine knowledge, O faelicem, magis quam nobilem vestem! The world dis-respects it: to the Jews it appears madness, foolishness to the Gentiles. The politician takes it to be a comely ornament, the gallant useth it for a complement, the worldling admits it for table-talk; as if all discourse of piety were but a pretty recreation after business. But to them that are called; it is the power of God, and the wisdom of God. This knowledge of Christ is our life and comfort: which the Lord engraff in them that want it, and increase in them that have it: till from the contemplation of him in grace below, we be taken up to see him in his glory above.

Grow in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.] Nature rejoiceth in a mediocrity, and is afflicted with extremes: As the sight is pleased with a green color, which is color medius inter album & nigrum. Too much light is no less offensive to our eyes, than mere darkness. Excessive diet is no less pernicious than famine; and more die of repletion, than of emptiness. Idleness fills the body with foul diseases, as over-laboriousnesse wasteth the spirits: Both are extremes; moderate exercise is the mean between them. In the passions of the mind there be dangerous extremes. Very fear and cowardliness kills some, and some perish in a bold over-venturousnesse. There be some that weep out their souls at their eyes; whose heart is eaten up with sorrows: as our weekly bills tell us of those that die of grief. Worldly sorrow causeth death. Others have died of joy: and scarce given leave to the beholders to weep for them, whom they have seen die laughing. Dionysius the Tyrant fell from a high fortune; even from the royal Throne to a wretched condition; from a king to a beggar. Yet the sorrow of losing his crown did not kill him: But he died of joy, and that so poor a joy, as to be applauded and commended of the people at a Theater, that he was a good

Poet: of this extreme he died. Joy is our best antidote against death: yet even that can kill: the best cordial hath been deadly poison. Thus nature is content with a mediocretie. So a competence of earthly things is the best estate in this world: if we could know when we are well. Give me neither riches nor poverty. Poverty may precipitate us to base and desperate shifts: and riches may puff us up with pride and vain-glory. Give us this day our daily bread: We are never so happily fed, as when we wait upon God for our daily bread: and are therewith content, as Sea-men with their allowance. In our actions there is a golden mean; and we may either neglect, or overdoe them. To besiege our patience, the Devil hath a stupidity, as well as impatience. Against our devotion, he raiseth diffidence on the one side, and over-boldness on the other. In Justices way, there lies rigor and partiality: For Charity, a prodigal and a pinching hand. Thus for the satisfaction of nature, for the felicity of estate, for order and rule to the actions of our body, and passions of our mind, without question, mediocrity is the best.

But for the grace of God, for the knowledge of Christ, no mean must content us, here. In these we must still be growing, like fruitful trees: and never think ourselves high enough, till we are in Heaven. The state of that soul is doubtful, that can satisfy it self with a small measure of holiness. Virtus in medio: but then we must understand what that Medium is. It is not in the midst betwixt two degrees, but betwixt two kinds. As liberality is in medio, between gripulousnesse and profuseness: which both are several kinds and contraries. So humility is in medio, betwixt pride and a base dejection: And faith is in medio, betwixt presumption and despair. Here virtue is between two extremes: but we cannot properly assign it a place between two degrees; because both are the degrees of virtue. As between a weak faith, and a full assurance; both which are degrees of goodness: Or between the love of the Saints, the love of ourselves, and the love of God; all which are degrees of charity. In other things a mediocritie will serve well enough, best of all: but not in righteousness, not in grace: No competency to be talked of here: as much measure of this, as possibly we can, and all little enough. He is an Esau, that says in respect of spiritual things, I have enough my brother. Not a child in God's family leaves off growing in grace, till he be grown up into glory. Let us grow therefore in the knowledge of our Savior, as we would die in the assurance of salvation.

It is true that the same God gives the increase, that gives the knowledge: yet we must labor both for the knowledge, and for the increase.

1. For the knowledge: He that would come to the rich Mine, must dig and throw away the base and barren earth that hides it. There must be a deposition of all worldly desires, before we can be fitted for the disquisition of Heavenly knowledge. Everyone that fights, does not overcome: but no man can overcome, unless he fights. All that hear the word of Divine wisdom, do not presently understand it: but none can understand it, unless they hear it. Faith comes by hearing; and what wisdom doth excel it? Doubt joined with sober and modest questions, is the ready way to knowledge. Not every wrangling interrogatory; as the lawyers question was, What shall I do to inherit eternal Life? He asked, not to gain himself any knowledge, but with a vain hope that Christ would bewray some ignorance: Therefore, Vocat Magistrum, ut irrideret Magisterium. So Ahab questioned Micaiah. Shall we go up to Ramoth Gilead to battle, or forbear? Not for satisfaction of himself, but of Jehoshaphat. There are not a few that trouble a Divine at the table with many questions; Non ut sciant, sed tantum ut quaerant. Qui aliud in ore, aliud in cord habent: Linum & lanam texunt.

But there be holy and wholesome questions: the mind that never doubts, shall learn nothing: the mind that always doubts, shall never profit by learning. Without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness! The mystery of godliness should be without controversy; yet what a world of controversies hath risen about it. Indeed the arguing points of controversy, pro & contra, is like the whetting of a knife: which we move too and again, backward and forward; this gets it an edge, and makes it sharp: so the other makes the Truth appear bright and manifest: Nihil tam certum, quàm quod ex dubio certum. Our doubts only stir us up to seek the truth: our resolutions settle us in the truth we have found. There were no pleasure in resolutions, if we had not been formerly troubled with doubts: There were nothing but disquietness and discomfort in doubts, if it was not for the hope of resolution. It is not safe to suffer doubts to dwell long in the heart: there may be good use of them as passengers, they are dangerous as Inmates. The treasure of much instruction had been locked up, and enriched none but the owner, if the door had not been opened by the key of question. Christ sate amongst the Doctors, both hearing them, and asking them questions. He, who as God, gave them all the wisdom they had, as man hearkens to the wisdom he had given them. He, who sate in their hearts, as the Author of all knowledge, sits in their Schools, as an humble Disciple. When he had heard, he asks: and after that, he answers. Those very questions were instructions: thereby he meant to teach, more than to learn. First he hears, then he asks: much more doth it concern us to be hearers, ere we be teachers. He gathers that hears: he spends that teaches: If we spend ere we gather, we shall soon prove bankrupts. The queene of Sheba came to Solomon, to prove him with hard questions. She that was such a faithful lover of knowledge, could not want great Scholars at home: them she had apposed with her enigmaticall quaere's, but still she was unsatisfied. Now she betakes herself to Solomon, that Oracle of God: to him she empties her heart of doubts, and fills it with resolutions. She had her desire, and that was no small pittance. When we come to a rich treasure, we will carry away what we can. This potent queene, as she came far for knowledge, so surely she would not depart without her full lode. She knew that she could not every day meet with a Solomon: and therefore makes the best use of her time, and so divine a Teacher. Let it be so with us; doubting, that we may ask; and asking, that we may learn; and learning, that we may practice. It is a good thing to doubt, better to be resolved. There is much wisdom in moving a question well, though there be more in assoiling it. We have no patent of life; therefore let us not neglect the opportunity of furnishing our souls with the knowledge of Christ. To what end do we frequent God's house, and give his Word the hearing, if we keep our hearts still in ignorance or uncertainty? O let not this blessed light shine in vain upon our souls.

2. The growth is in the next place requirable. Desire the milk of the Gospel, that you may grow thereby. Children grow by their milk; and when they are weaned from their dugges, they grow by stronger meat. Whether by milk, or meat, still we must be growing. That small mustard seed groweth to a great tree. The wisest that are, were not so at first: they were not borne wise. When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child. Saint Paul himself was once a child: why should we despair of getting knowledge, when we see those now to be wise men, whom we once remember to have been little Children. It is a happy thing to begin well: the entrance is ever the hardest. The first liquor seasons the vessel for a long time after. It is good for a man to bear God's yoke even from his infancy. It is but a political trick of the Devil to discourage early holiness: he that goes out betimes in the morning, is more like to dispatch his journey, than he that lingers till the day be spent. Christ even in his childhood frequented the Temple: while children of that age were playing in the streets, he was found in God's house: not to gaze on the glorious building, or golden candlestickes, but to hear the Doctors. In all his examples he meant our instruction: this pious act of his minority, intended to lead our first years into a timely devotion. Having begun well, let us continue: Timothy from a child knew the holy Scriptures: yet Saint Paul chargeth him to give attendance to reading. We must not look to be perfect at once: non nascimur senes. We may be hopeful sprigges at our planting, we cannot be tall trees without growing. But the Spring shows what we may hope for in Summer: and if the proof of the latter do not answer the hope of the former, there is a fault somewhere. Our most blessed Savior submitted himself to this condition of nature: he would grow by degrees. If his perfection had at first shown it self without warning to the world, it might have been entertained with more wonder, than belief: now he gives them a taste, and prepares their faith with a fore-expectation. If the Sun in the morning should rise in his full strength and glory, he would dazzle our eyes: But having the day-star to go before him, and the lively colors of the dawning day to publish his approach; the eye is comforted, not hurt by his appearance. Before he was called to the public function of a teacher, he contents himself to be a diligent hearer: He asks questions, that could have taught the greatest Rabbins divine mysteries. Yet so did his wisdom conceal it self, that withal it would be known to be there. O that our young students would fixe their eyes upon Christ in his nonage; and behold him in the lowly sphere of the auditors; not in the eminent Pulpits of the Doctors. He that could have taught the Angels, listens to the voice of mortals. We have those that will needs run as soon as they can go; and dare venture upon some mystical probleme, before they have learnt their Catechism. The wiser Athenians were of another mind; for the more they knew, the less opinion they had of their own knowledge: Insomuch that they fell from that honorable name of Philosophi, given them in the beginning, down to Idiotae: contenting themselves with the title of mere Idiots.

And indeed the more knowledge we have, the more we feel the want of it: and where there is a conceit of sufficiency, we may have a shrewd mistrust of emptiness. There is a base and ignoble knowledge, whose object is only wealth and honor. Not that but I would have Christians, together with the simplicity of the Dove, to get so much of the wisdom of the Serpent, as to keep themselves from being coozened. But ista non oportet discere, sed didicisse. No matter for increasing this knowledge: it will grow fast enough. There is a more base and brutish knowledge, which is cunning only in the satisfying our sensual desires. But as one said of rimers; he is a fool that cannot make a ballad, and he is a more fool that does make a ballad. So is he no wise man that knows not how to feed his own carnal appetite; but he is more unwise and wicked too, that does feed it. This is a knowledge that would be unlearned: These sciences grow in us too fast: and if these weeds be not rooted up, they will hinder the growth of that knowledge which can only save us. But in the knowledge of Christ let us still be growing: Let every judgment we see, make us wiser in the fear of God: and every mercy we feel, wiser in the love of God: and let us depart from every Sermon, wiser in the Grace of God than we came. This is to grow in the knowledge of Christ: and as he By his knowledge doth justify many, so we by our knowledge shall get assurance, that we are justified by him? To make some profitable use of all this to ourselves.

1. It teacheth us to content our hearts with no common measure of saving knowledge, but to labor for a fullness. And indeed it were a shame for us, that have so long and often brought our vessels to the living Fountain of GOD'S Word, if they should not be full. Let us, Colossians 1.9. Bee filled with the knowledge of his Will, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding. Do we live in the Sun-shine, and yet remain in darkness? If we were not glutted with this holy food, how could we find any relish in worldly fruits? But He that is full, despiseth an honey-comb. And what are we full of? An opinion of knowledge, like bladders with wind, or some vessels with barme. There is a great deal of windy, barmy, frothy curiosities that fill us: but in respect of any noble, precious, and sovereign liquor, we are empty caskes. And we have all the properties of empty vessels.

Vessells are made to keep good and useful moisture: For want of which repletion, they suck in Air, which will soon corrupt and putrefy. Our hearts are caskes for the water of Life; If that precious liquor do not fill them, vanity will: and what is vanity, but emptiness.

Empty vessels are deceitful: men come thinking to draw some good out of them, and there is no good in them. Fontes sine aqua. Such houses we have in England, which in just derision we call Mocke-beggars. The poor come to their gates for relief, and there is neither food nor charity at home. Emptynes is the furniture of all the rooms. Nay, do we not find full pockets, and empty hearts? Rich churles as dry as kexes; out of whom no prayers or tears of widows and orphans can wring one droppell of comfort?

Empty vessels will never sink to the bottom: cast them upon the waters, and they swim on the top; such is the lightnes of their bodies. The word of Grace, the Gospel, is compared to a River, and that of the water of life: our common hearts are like empty vessels thrown into this comfortable stream: but not one drop of water gets into them. They lie swimming on the face of the waters, and so let in some swimming notions into their brains: but down to the bottom they dive not, whereby they might be filled with saving knowledge.

Empty vessels make always the loudest sound: the less virtue, the greater report. Deepe rivers pass away in silence: profound knowledge says little: But what a murmur and bubbling, yea sometimes what a roaring do they make in the shallowes? The full vessel gives you a soft answer, but sound liquor. Samson slew a Lyon, but he made no words of it: the greatest talkers are the least doers. As when a Rabbi, little learned, and less modest, usurped all the discourse at table; one much admiring him, asked his friend in private, whether he did not take such a man for great scholar: to whom he plainly answered, For ought I know he may be learned, but I never heard learning make such a noise, Religion is much heard of in our words, but it is little seen in our works. We have busy tongues, but lazy hands: and this argues but vain hearts: we may be still empty vessels. When a modest man gave thanks to God with a submisse and low voice, and impudent critical gallant found fault with him that he said grace no louder: but he gave him a bitter reply: Make me but a fool, and I shall speak as loud as you; but that will mar the grace quite. By their unseasonable noise, men are known for empty vessels.

Empty vessels will dry apace, and so fall to pieces. Whiles there wants moisture within, to resist the heat without, they will rive and crack and cleave asunder, and be unracable to hold any water. This mischief befalls us through the emptynes of our hearts, that we cannot contain the heavenly moisture poured into us. When they were able to hold grace, we would not receive it: now we receive grace, but cannot hold it. We are false at the bottom: a Sermon runs out as fast as it came in. We have two doors, as we have two ears: the one is a fore door, whereat the word enters; and the other is a back-door, at which it departs. Let us beseech the Spirit of grace to make up the breaches of our hearts, that they may be able to hold the water of life.

Empty vessels, by their long vacuity, become so dry and sere, that they are good for nothing but the fire: when they can serve for no other use, their end is to be burned. This would be a woeful end for us, if the Divine Justice should make such an end with us: yet such is the reward of emptynes. The word preached hath a filling faculty: it filled all the house where they were sitting: all sound from heaven is replenishing: and they were all filled with the holy Ghost. We have many sounds from heaven, but where is our fullness. We have empty brains, we understand nothing; empty memories, we retain nothing: and empty hearts, for we practice nothing. But if we be not filled with desire, and filled with delight, and filled with the love of grace and knowledge, we shall never be filled with the reward of glory. There is nothing so hinders us from mature knowledge, as the opinion of a competency; the conceit that we have enough to serve our own turns. But blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness; for the hungry shall be filled with good things. Let us humbly confess our own emptynes, that Christ may mercifully fill us. Lord, we are ignorant, do thou fill us with knowledge: we are empty, do thou fill us with grace: our heads are empty, fill them with illumination: our hearts are empty, fill them with sanctification: fill us here with the knowledge, and hereafter with the glory of Jesus Christ.

2. There must be no stop of this increase. Growing implies a continued act: if we once yield to an intermission, presently there follows a cessation, and a recidivation upon that. First fall off the fruits, then the leaves, after them the branches, and last of all comes down the tree it self. Many trees do not take every year: but all God's plants fructify every day. The righteous shall flourish like a Palme tree, he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon. The palm tree is always in the flourish: estate virescit, nec arescit hyeme. What tree is comparable to the Cedar, for straitness and stature. They that be planted in the house of the Lord, shall flourish. Natural trees are planted abroad, spiritual ones within doors. The other are either in the wide and wild forest, or enclosed in our gardens and orchards: These grow in the house; but it is in God's house, in domicilio Sanctorum, And they flourish in his Court: many are ambitious of honor in the Kings court; these flourish in the court of the king of kings. They shall bring forth fruit in old age.

Material trees wither with age, and cease to bear: these are still growing, still flourishing, still fructifying: as Abraham and Sara had that promised Son in their old age. Yea, toward their end, they most abound with good works: they drop from them in abundance; like ripe and mellow fruit from a bounteous tree, Read Hos. 14.5.6.7. Two Angels sate in Christ's Sepulcher, one at the head, and the other at the feet. The head ever stands for the beginning, the feet for the end: As the beginning of a river is called the Head, and the end of a song the Foot. An Angel there should be both at our head and feet: Let us be careful, not only to have our beginnings glorious, like an Angel at the head: but our endings also gracious, our conclusion comfortable, an Angel also at the feet. Not a Virgo formosa superne, with a Desinat in turpiter atrum: let not that end with a black Angel, which began with a white. The ravens brought Elias bread and flesh in the morning, and bread and flesh in the evening. Let us not only take our breakfast on this heavenly food, but our supper too: as we desire to go to bed in peace, and rise again with comfort. In the morning let us feed on it, all day make it our repast, and in the evening of our days let it fill our souls. What though this sacred knowledge be brought us by a raven; by a Minister unclean in himself, and fowl with carnal aspersions; a bird of prey, given to rapine: yet the food is clean and holy; no Elias will refuse it.

Let Christ be the Alpha of our youth, and the Omega of our old age: who hath both protected our tables, and perfumed our coffins; that we may live with confidence, and die with comfort: He is, and was, and is to come; and ours in all these respects. He was our God, in a free and gracious election of us: Is our Redeemer, in dying for us, in sanctifying us to himself: Is to come our Savior, in crowning us with an immortal diadem of glory. The state of grace is the perfection of this life; to grow still from grace to grace, and to profit in it: as to go on forwards is the perfection of a traveler, till he comes nearer and nearer to his journey's end. Behold, I do works today, and tomorrow, and the third day I shall be perfected. As God blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning, so Job doubtless in his latter end did more bless God than in his beginning. Commonly God reserves his best comforts to our latter end; to try us whether we will hold out to our latter end, or not. We are apt to expect a reward for our patience, repentance, and obedience, before it be done: we think it long ere the blessing fall. But let us know, that as there is no reward due; so (if there were) it is not due yet: we are in our non-age, not come to be capable of the Inheritance. I have fought a good fight, and finished my course; now is laid up for me the crown of righteousness; That was the right time: in the end of his victorious combat, to expect a glorious Crown. So we must prolong our patience, and eke out our repentance, and renew the vigor and spirits of our obedience; awaiting the Lord's goodness unto the latter end: and then there is no doubt of the blessing. The end of that man is peace. As the Israelites dealt with the Moabites, smiting them in their country: still they went forward in that execution: so let us go forwards, smiting our sins with the sword of repentance. As there is nothing but our sinning, that keeps off God's blessing: so there is nothing but a serious repentance, that can break off our sinning. Let us fear, lest any of us should seem to come short. Our obedience and righteousness must be of some length; such as will reach out, as far as the reward: which falls not upon the beginning of any grace or virtue, but still upon the latter end. What shall become of them then, that leave off growing, before they come to the end of perfection, the perfection of their end? As many of *Christ's Disciples went back, and walked no more with him. Lots wife did but look back, and she perished: how worthy are they to perish, that go back from Christ? For them there is a woeful Discedite in store: Depart ye cursed: since you would needs go, get you gone. They would needs depart, when Christ would have them tarry with him: now they would fain tarry with him, but he commands them to depart. But blessed are they that go with him, and grow in him, for they shall be called to him; Come ye blessed of my Father.*

3. If we know Christ, let us make use of him, to his glory, and our own benefit. He takes it for an honor, when our humble confidence will enrich it self out of his treasure. Knowledge breeds society, and society binds faster than beneficence. There be that have a giving hand, but a denying face: and their sullen look discredits their bounty. Like one that flings his alms at the beggars head, or throws his charity in the dirte. Such a man hath recompense enough, if his benefits be pardoned, though they be not praised. But Christ both is, and loves a cheerful giver. If we truly know him, and his love to us, we will (in a due regard) be familiar with him: And familiarity makes a friends bosom our closset, to lay up both our joys and sorrows; for the better enlargement of the one, and mitigation of the other. If in our sufferings there may be help had, there we find remedy: if not, yet we find ease. Do we know him to be The Counselor; why then do we not go to him for counsel? If he be be a Comforter, to comfort all them that mourn in Zion, why go we not to him for comfort?

We know him to be the best Counselor; why then do we undertake any matter of importance without consulting his oracle? Hence it is that so many dote on a false religion, because for their choice they have not inquired at Christ. Christianity is become the footstool to policy: some have made a bargain with the world for an unive sall monarchy; and religion is but the labell to that Indenture. Those respects have filled Popery with more clients, than either devotion or conscience. If a man attempt some great design, without the advise of his known friend, shall he not hear him justly expostulate: You neglect me: have you ever found me unfaithful? Did we ever find Christ, either not wise enough to direct us, or not ready enough to help us, that his counsel prevents not our resolution? He tells us all his counsel, that may concern us, shall we make dainty to let him know ours? His is a bottomless depth of wisdom, ours a shallow puddle. His counsel prevails for good, ours like Ahithophel's, is often turned into folly. He knows our thoughts, without our revealing them: shall we stick to tell him what he knows? He looks to have it from our own lips; not for his satisfaction, but for the trial of our loves. He is patient to hear us open our cause, and takes no fee but our prayers. He counsels us without flattery, and rules us without ambiguity. He is ready to advise us in all our doubts, and to resolve us in all our deliberations. We choose a Counselor that is gracious with the Judge: how dear is that counselor who is the Judge? This is to make some use of our knowledge, of Christ.

We know him to be a sweet Comforter: therefore as the patient discloseth his grief to the physician in hope of cure; so let us confess our sins and sorrows to Christ, in assurance of comfort. Men may reveal our shameful secrets, and so make the scars worse than the wounds: Christ will not fail to cover them from others, that are humbly discovered to him. How many Psalms did David begin in fear, which he ended in joy? You shall see terrible anguish sitting in the door, irremediable sorrow looking in at the window, despair bordering in the margin, and offering to creep into the Text: yet after a sharp conflict, nothing appears but joy and comfort. So that you would think them two several Psalms; one of perplexity, and another of relief. Or if but one Psalm, yet composed by two men, of contrary dispositions: Yet is it but one Psalm, and made by one man. What, did there a messenger of good news come in, as he was writing his Odes? As Elisha sent to the king of Israel, while he was rending his clothes? No, but as his soul grew still more inward with God, it became lighter and lighter; rising from under the burden with comfort. Shall we still hold our hand on the pain, and pine away with an obstinate sullenness; that may be cured even by saying, we are sick? Suppressed tears are a double smart: though otherwise they may be unprofitably spent, yet they give air to the grief, and discharge us of some load. But when they are spent in the bosom of Christ, as Mary's were on his feet, we shall be sure of comfort. Much is forgiven us, yea even all the sins that we weep for. Our sighs and tears are vapors and moisture, which Christ draws up to return them back upon us in showers of mercy. I said, I will confess my sins; he had not yet done it: God gave him a pardon; even as soon as he had a will to ask it. Lord all my desire is before thee, and my groaning is not hid from thee: Even that was a powerful oratory. Mercy often prevents repentance, but repentance never fails of mercy. Therefore he required our humble acknowledgment; not because he hath need of our confession, but because we have need of his pardon. And why should he in Justice grant it, to them that will not vouchsafe to crave it? Wicked men afflicted, are like frantic men wounded; who finding ingredients prepared to dress them, tear them all in pieces; But if we know the sovereign cordials, that Christ hath in store for us; we will seek to none but him and his holy Spirit for comfort.

We know the sweetness and excellency of Christ; therefore we cannot but love Him: and if we love Him, how grievous will it be to lose Him? To lose her souls love, might well nettle the spouse. This caused Mary's tears to stream forth; Sustulerunt Dominum; her Lord was gone; how should she be quiet? This, had it been true, was cause enough of tears. She wept to see Him suffer death; there she knew that He was taken away. But though his soul were gone, his body was left her; that dead Object of her love and pity. For his Death she had wept her fill; yet his body remained, a cold Corpse: one would think cold comfort for her. But this was all she had now left of Him; and Sustulerunt? Have they taken away that too? This set her a weeping. Sublatus demonumeto, grieved her more, then occisus in ligno. There she had something left her, now nothing at all, taken away quite and clean, this was not all, but I know not where they have laid Him: she had wept a-main for his Death, this taking away renewed her tears: but Nescio ubi, was the extreme astonishment. To lose Christ, and so to lose him, as not to know where to find him, is most fearful to them that know him. Though he be taken from us, it is some comfort if we can tell where to fetch him again: but to lose him at home, to miss him in our hearts, without knowledge where to find Him abroad, may well put both the Mary's to their tears. They, she knew not who: had taken Him away, she knew not how: and carried Him, she knew not whither: and laid Him, she knew not where: there to do with Him, she knew not what: and to find Him again, she knew not when: no need to ask her why she weeps.

They that have such a loss, and have not withal lost themselves in insensibleness, cannot be without great cause of mourning. Sapiens miser, magis miser: they that know not Christ, think it no such great matter to lose Him. What cares a stupid Worldling for the removal of our Candlestick? What is it to him, if the superstition and blindness of Popery did over-shadow the Land, and turn day into night? It is nothing to him, if he can see to get money. Light or darkness, Scripture or tradition, the King or the Pope, Christ or Antichrist, are all one to him. To hear a Sermon, or see a Mass; he likes them both alike. But to them that know Christ, the loss of Him is terrible: and doth not that Nation lose Him, that loseth his Gospel? As Mary would not be comforted with the sight and speech of Angels, not with the sight and speech of Jesus Himself, till He made her know that He was Jesus. So there is nothing in men or Angels, nothing in earth or heaven that can quiet the troubled heart, till Christ be found. Till He that is taken away, be restored to us, though it should come from Heaven, from the Angels themselves, our souls would refuse all manner of comfort. Such was her sorrow for a supposed loss of Him; what should be ours then, that lose Him, not dead but living; not once, but often: not in supposal, but in very deed: and that by sin, the worst way of losing Him: and that not by others taking Him away, but by our own willful defaults? Shall not we be moved, nor grieved, nor break any of our sleeps or sports for the matter? Do we reckon Him as good lost, as found? When Christ, and the holy Ghost, and the favor of God, and all is gone, by our obstinacy; we can soon be comforted again for all this. There needs none to say unto us, Why weep you? But rather, Why weep you not? If we know the sweetness, the joy, the Heaven that is in his Presence, and find Him departed from us; let our tears run down in abundance: let us allow ourselves no rest, till Christ be found; till He be reconciled to us by faith and repentance, and have reconciled us to God by mercy and forgiveness.

4. Let us encourage our growing unto the end, by the recompense we shall find in the end. For though God be good unto us all the way, yet he will be best at last. As he did bless Job temporally, so he will bless all his Saints eternally; him on Earth, all the rest in Heaven; that their latter end shall be happier than their beginning. And if our virtue, like to his patience, do not hold out to the end, if we be not best at last, we cannot look for such a reward. How was Job thus blessed? First, in the duplication of his children: If you object, that both at first and last he had an equal number of them: seven sons and three daughters; ten in all: yet know in fair probability, that the former ten were in Heaven, increasing the number of the Saints triumphant; and the latter ten on Earth, to increase the number of the Saints militant. Ten he had with God, and ten God had with him: so that they were doubled. Secondly, in the duplication of his substance: for if we compare the first chapter of that book with the last, we shall find that God doubled his wealth: and that to a good man is a blessing. Thirdly, the blessings he had in the beginning, he had in common with other Princes of the East: they made him but unum ex multis, one of God's Children at large: being blessings given to the good and bad. But this long chastisement, and a patience full as long as that, made him God's special darling: for God scourgeth the son which he tenders and coddles, above the rest of his Children. Fourthly, his fame and renown is much enlarged by it: which is a blessing to Persons no less religious than honorable. He was in the beginning Notus Deo: he knew what he would do, and how he would hold out: Now he is become Notus nobis; Ye have heard of the patience of Job. Heard of him? we cannot choose. The Devil in his beginning was fain Perambulare, to compass the Earth, before he could find him: now he cannot tempt any of God's children in their afflictions to impatience, but presently he hears of him. One Jupiter set out by Homer the Poet, was worth ten Jupiter's set out by Phydias the carver, says Philostratus: Because the former flew abroad throughout all the world, whereas the other never stirred from his pedistall at Athens. So at first the honor of Job was confined to Vz, a little corner of Arabia: now it is spread as far, as the Sun can extend his beams, or the Moon her influence. His book began with Erat vir, there was such a man: but before it ends, it shows that Erat sanctus, there was such a saint: there was such a favourite of Heaven, such a mirror of the Earth, such a wonder of the world. Fifthly, he was a good man before: they that knew him, might well acknowledge it, for God himself does confess it, and the Devil could not deny it; But yet he was not tried: put him to the test, and see what he will prove then. Many a man goes for good and honest; so others think him, so he thinks himself; and he finds not in his own heart any cause to the contrary, but so he should continue; but let him be had to the trial, furnish him with spiritual weapons, put him into the lists, charge him with a combatant: let temptation, tribulation, and misery be champions against him; see how he will behave himself against these Antagonists: If now he comes off with victory, record his name in the Chronicle of the Saints, and enroll him for one of Christ's conquerors, So did Job fight, and so did he overcome: proving himself to be Miles Domini, one of God's worthies. He was a rich and good man before; but this advanced him to his honor of knighthood: He was made a knight of Christ's own order; a knight of the cross: and in the last day, when that great General comes to his glorious triumph over his enemies, Job shall not be without his honorable equipage: but adorned with the rich collar of his sufferings, and covered with his afflictions like the robes of the Martyrs, and crowned with his patience, which is supercrowned with everlasting blessedness.

In all these respects God blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning: which he would never have done, if his beginning had been as perfect as his latter end. What an encouragement is this to us? Who would not be still growing in knowledge and goodness, that is sure of so happy a recompense? What though we be not like Job, rewarded with honor, children, friends, prosperity, power and riches, and such temporary moveables, in the end of our days? Yet we shall be filled with peace, joy, glory, and eternal life at the end of our days. If we be not made lords of the Earth, yet we shall be kings in Heaven. Besides, even for the present, Quamvis arca exinanita sit auro, cor tamen est plenum fide. We may come to be poorer in earthly things toward our end, than we were in the beginning: yet we may grow in grace and knowledge more than many others, that grow in place and preferment above us. But what we want in the riches of the flesh, we have in the riches of the Spirit: we have it in the one, or the other balance. The peace of conscience, and the comforts of the holy Ghost, are our happiness here: and the Kingdom of Heaven shall be our inheritance hereafter.

5. Lastly, for caution; every virtue hath a professed enemy: Darkness is not more contrary to light, nor sickness to health, nor death to life, than vice to goodness. Humility hath a professed enemy, which is pride: Charity, a professed enemy, which is malice: Hope a professed enemy, which is despair: Mercy hath a professed enemy, which is cruelty: Faith a professed enemy, which is infidelity: Liberality a professed enemy, which is covetousness: So obstinacy is a professed enemy to obedience: apostasy, to perseverance: Atheism, to religion: hard-heartedness, to compassion. If these be not always in the field, they are always in feud: a continual war is proclaimed by them, one against another; no reconciliation, no peace, no truce is to be admitted. They are sworn enemies, and will never give over the combat, till one side lie in the dust. So the professed enemy of knowledge is ignorance. Darkness is raised up by the prince of darkness out of Hell, to oppose the light which comes down from the Father of lights out of Heaven. When Christ displays his banners, the Devil will muster up his forces. He hath an army of rebels, to wage war with Michael and his Angels. But besides these public and open foes, that profess hostility; every virtue hath a secret enemy, that does her the most mischief. It is damnable policy, per amici fallere nomen. Absalom so upbraided Hushai with a pleasant scoff of his professed friendship to David, Is this thy kindness to thy friend? So hope besides her professed enemy, despair; hath a secret one, Presumption: this seems to be but an improvement of her self: at worst but an excess, an extreme, an over-weening hope. So liberality besides her professed enemy, gripulousness; hath a secret one, prodigality: this seems to be nothing else but an advancement of her worth, and all for her honor; to scatter abroad her riches with a blind and open hand. Religion besides her professed enemy, Atheism, hath a secret one, a superstitious mis-devotion. In the glorious temples of Idolatry, this may seem to exalt her into Heaven: whereas indeed it corrupts her upon Earth, and precipitates her to Hell. So knowledge, besides her common enemy ignorance, hath secret ones: which howsoever they may seem her friends, betray her to ruin: these are sloth and pride. As profuseness cuts the throat of liberality, and presumption breaks the neck of hope, and superstition is a plague to infect religion, so these are the bane of knowledge. Sloth in the disuse, and pride in the abuse: The former starves her to death for want of food, the other tickles her to death with self-conceit. These be not Satan's ban-dogs, but lurchers: not violent robbers, but privy thieves: indeed his cheaters, which cuffen our souls, and filch away our knowledge of Jesus Christ: or rather hinder the growth of this knowledge, which is my present argument. Let it not seem tedious to you, for me to remove these two blocks out of the way of our spiritual knowledge.

1. Slothfulness and neglect is the former: When we cease to use our knowledge, we lose it. God did not give us this ground, that we should let it lie fallow: if we do, it will bring forth nothing but weeds and nettles; which will both stink to God, and sting our own consciences. Christ by his knowledge doth justify many, and we by our knowledge must satisfy many. Paul's growth in the knowledge of Christ, was seen in confuting the Jews which denied Christ. What is a man the better for his land, if he let it lie untilled? Bad husbandry will find but a thin crop: no tillage, no harvest. The talent that lies useless by us, shall be taken from us. The Schoolmen and Casuists run out the metal of their knowledge, into tinkling bells and cymballs; and languish into a thousand needless and endles questions: thinking to magnify it, and themselves by it, by spending and venting it in unprofitable, cold, and bloodless subtleties. But what is the notionall sweetness of honey, to the experimental taste of it? If we be not the better for our knowledge, we were better never to have had knowledge. Otherwise, it is but a fair estate in the hands of a fool; or like the pencill of an exquisite painter, in the hand of a cobbler. It is storied of an ancient and reverend Rabby, who that he might by some demonstration, win the people to make use of their knowledge, and to reduce it to practice; put himself into the habit of a Mountebank, or travelling Aqua-vitae-man: and in the market made proclamation of a sovereign cordial, or water of life that he had to sell: Divers call him in, and desire him to show it: whereupon he opens the Bible, and directs them to several places of comfort in it: Intimating that as they had the knowledge of the Scriptures, so if they would make use of it, they it, they should both live holy, and die happy; for that indeed was the water of life. It is not God's meaning that any grace should lie dead in us, much less knowledge. It is never out of exercise, though the labors if it be different, according to the seasons. In childhood we are subjected to the labor of discipline; in age to the labor of doctrine: in the time betwixt these to the labor of practice. Quae quis nescit, in pueritia discat: quae didicit, in juventute ad usum ducat: quod ad usum ducit, in senio doceat: so that knowledge hath no time to be idle.

No sooner had God given the king of Israel wisdom, but all Israel shall be witness to the wisdom of their king. The decision of that controversy between the two harlots, shall make him talked of. Our all-wise maker will find occasions to draw forth his graces to use. Dan and Beersheba were too narrow bounds for the fame of Solomon: it flies over all lands and seas, and transports the whole world with an admiration of his more than human knowledge. Kings send their Ambassadors, and a great Queen comes in person, to hear the wisdom of Solomon: there is still more work for him. Aer detentus corrumpitur: viae non tritae silvesant. Musically Instruments, without handling, will waspe and become nothing worth. A sprightly horse will lose his mettle, by standing unbreath'd in a stable. Rust will take the swords that hang by the walls. The Cynicke, rather than want work, would still be removing his Tubbe. It was a law of Solon, that if the father had taught his son no trade in his youth, whereby he might get his living; that son should yield no relief to his father in his age. In that day wherein we do no good how can we without shame pray for our daily bread? All virtues have their several employments, and so hath knowledge. God hath no use of the dark lanterns of secret and reserved perfections. We ourselves do not light up candles, to put them under bushels. The great lights, whether of heaven or earth, are not intended to obscurity: but as to give light to others, so to be seen themselves. How did Pomponius in Plutarch, pull his son Numa out of private obscurity, and put him upon public actions fit for his abilities? We are not a little beholding to Cresipian, for stirring up St. Jerome in the eastern countries: and to Hilary, for rousing up S^t. Augustine in the western countries; to withstand the spreading infection of Pelagius. There is a Honestum in every virtue, which is proper to the possessors: but Withall there should be an Vtile, which is common and beneficial to their neighbors.

There is a shamefast modesty, which slackens the bridle: and there is a preposterous zeal, too hot on the spur. Some will hardly come forth, when they be called: as others will run, before they are bidden. I cannot tell which is worse in the time of need: for the learned to hide themselves with Vlisses, or for the unlearned to thrust themselves forward with Thirsites: certainly neither is excusable. As the latter overshoots by boldness, so the former falls short by bashfulness: both are to blame. Socrates took no less care to persuade Charmides, Plato's uncle, to undertake the public business of State, than to dissuade Glaucos, Plato's brother, from it. The former of these was a man of much worth, but too little boldness: the latter was a man of very much boldness, but too little worth. The fault of the latter was more odious, but the fault of the former was more noxious: Glaucos was sick of impudence, Charmides faint with diffidence. There was more reason to blame the former, but more need to blame the latter. Glaucos by too much undervaluing of others, and arrogating to his own wisdom, made himself contemptible: But Charmides by too much admiring the worth of others, and despising his own, made himself unprofitable. The former by his audaciousness, fell into the contempt which he might have avoided: the other by his timorousness, lost the honor which he might have gained. As the one needed the spur, so the other the spur: He bold one for his own sake, to escape a private loss: the other for the common wealths sake, to perform a public good.

The rust and disuse of knowledge, in men fitted and called to the service of God, is a sin almost unpardonable. Silence is the daughter of shamefastness: both which, as they are excuses for mediocrity, so they are prejudices to excellency. They are always the wisdom of fools; and sometimes the folly of the wise. The labors of the learned are Thesaurus Ecclesiae: not by way of indulgence, to profit the dead: but by way of instruction, to comfort the living. The holy Ghost came down upon the Apostles, in the form of Tongues. Why like Tongues? In regard of themselves it was enough to receive the Spirit of wisdom: the receiving Him in the shape of Tongues, respects us. They have not only a supernatural knowledge given them, for the illumination of themselves: but also Tongues, for the communication of this knowledge to us. This conveys it from man to man: Reason is impressed in the soul, expressed by the tongue: therefore the Latins call Oratio, quasi oris ratio. The soul is the fountain of knowledge, and the tongue a channel from that fountain. As Holophernes stopped the fountains of Bethulia, so Preachers that use not their tongues, stop the current of the holy Ghost. Indeed there be some that preach, as Nabal did feast; once in a year, and that must be a sheep-shearing too; when they receive the benefits of their flock, the rents of their Rectories. Some are tongue-tied from their birth, as was Croesus his son: they cannot vent their knowledge, it may be they have no knowledge to vent. Some are tongue-tied by riches, as Demosthenes was by the Milesians: they say to their tongues, as that Epicure did to his soul: You have enough; e'en take your ease: these men have a fee to be silent. Others are tongue-tied by Greatness: rather than to speak against the stream of the times, they must forbear to speak against the sins of the times. These do know that matters go amiss; yet for quietness sake, they even sit still and let them alone. Alas, if they should touch upon their Lord's delirium, what hope have they of their Lord's preferment? The limbs after long sitting, are scarce able to walk: sluggish rest will make our gifts rust. Idleness engenders unability: they will not preach at the first, they shall find that they cannot preach at the last. It was the Soldiers lie, His Disciples came by night and stole Him away. But it is too true here; by night, when we put ourselves into the darkness of works, into the works of darkness, this privy Thief comes, and steals away from us the knowledge of Christ, while we sleep in supine carelessness. Therefore let us use it, and do good with it, and then it shall do good unto us.

2. Pride and Vain-glory is the other hindrance. We need not be told again, that knowledge is one of the fairest flowers in our garland: let us not then blast it with the unwholesome wind of Vaineghory. Saint Gregory gives us this memorable caution concerning our knowledge; Ne dum ignorantiae tenebras illuminat, lumen humilitatis tollat. When Pride comes upon the stage, Exit Sapientia. The one doth not more enlighten the head, than the other doth darken the heart. He goes on: By this we may discern of our spiritual knowledge: if it works more upon the heart, than upon the head, it is right. The first operation of proud knowledge, is to make the head light: the first work of this divine knowledge, is to make the heart heavy. Not that it deprives us of joy, but prepares us for joy. It does not make us proud, but humble; nor set our fancies a running, but our eyes a weeping. The first irradiation of this light, like some flash of lightning, breaks the stone in the heart. The Schoolmen, when they suite the Beatitudes with the gifts of the Spirit, join sorrow with science; weeping for sin with knowledge: and they give this reason for it: That sorrow for sin can issue from no other fountain but the knowledge of God; nor doth this couple ever part. They are not therefore mis-matched: for there is no clearer way of seeing God upon earth, than through tears. He that increaseth knowledge, increaseth sorrow. He that increaseth the knowledge of Christ, shall ever increase the sorrow for his sins. So Augustine applies it: and E converso: He that increaseth his sorrow for sin, shall prove a great Clerke in the School of Christ. The gall and bitterness of sin being throughly felt, restoreth a Christian to his perfect understanding; as the gall of the fish did Tobit, to sight. Multum crucis, multum lucis, we are best instructed, when we are most afflicted. Before the sons of Jacob shall know Joseph for their brother, they shall feel his displeasure. When God hath exercised his children with roughness, then He will be perfectly known to them. Christ's Cross begins our learning: that real Alphabet of true Christianity is spell'd out by suffering, not by reading. Thus the knowledge of Christ breeds humility, not vain-glory: not arrogance, but repentance. They that are puffed up with their knowledge, never sought it for Christ's, but their own honor. Hence it comes, that Ibi peccant, ubi peccata emendare debuerunt. But above all; God saith, Let not the wise men glory in his wisdom: yet many do so, and bless themselves in so doing. Tully could say, Deforme est de scipso praedicare. Yet this man, so qualified, that nothing but the eloquence of a Tully could sufficiently praise Tullies eloquence; is taxed even by those friends, that would have concealed his small blemishes: That the speech which flowed from him as sweet as honey, was made to taste as bitter as gall, by the enterlacing of his own praises. Cato the elder had a fair commendation given him by consent, to be Optimus Orator, optimus Senator, optimus Imperator: a prime Orator, a better Senator, and a most excellent Commander: yet he was so given to boast himself, that his best friends were ashamed of him.

There be three Corrosives, which well applied, may eat out this Ulcer and Impostume of Vaineghory, and purge the air of our knowledge from the killing infection of Pride.

1. The uncertainty of our knowledge in secular and political businesses. The most wise God hath hidden from us the event of things: Caliginosa nocte premit Deus. Future contingents may fall out otherwise than we imagine. The Surgeon that deals with an outward wound, can tell whither he can cure it, and guess in what time: but the Physician that undertakes the cure of a Fever, can neither set the time of his Patients recovery, nor assure him that he shall be recovered at all. The Artisan with his convenient shoppe and tools, can make up his days work if he be not hindered. But the Merchant Venturer can promise himsefe no such matter:

he must have one wind to bring him out of the Haven, another to carry him about to the lands end, and perhaps another to drive him unto the place of traffic: so that he can promise nothing; neither for the time of his return, nor the venting of his commodity: but as the wind, and the weather, and the Mariners, and the seas, and the time of trade will give him leave. All political successes are conjectural, not demonstrative: they stand in need of the concurrence of many causes, which are casual; and of many men's minds, which are mutable; and of many opportunities, which are accidental: so that we cannot build upon them. In stratagems of war, much hope is grounded on the negligence of our enemies: we may think them asleep, who be as waking as ourselves. Antigonus made full account to set upon Eumenes unawares: but he found Eumenes as vigilant as himself; and so was fain to retire with a flea in his ear, as wise as he came. So for war; and the like we find in the passages of peace. Solomon, that wonder of wisdom, might think by joining in affinity with his neighbor Princes, and marrying their daughters, to strengthen his own kingdom; yea more, to win those Heathen to the Kingdom of God. Why should not they be brought to worship the God of Israel, that were so allied to the King of Israel? He was deceived in both; for this turned to the ruin of his kingdom, and well near of himself. For the secret Underminers of his State and succession, where were they entertained, but among his Allies? Hadad with Pharaoh, probably Solomon's own father in Law: Jeroboam too was harboured in Egypt. And for his wives, They turned away his heart after other gods: he could do no good upon them, they wrought him to much evil. So Constantine, that religious Christian, and famous Politician, thought that by building a City in the confines of Europe and Asia, which might be Aemulae Romae, a match for Rome; and by placing one of his sons to keep his Court there, he should impregably fortify the Empire. But the building of new Rome, was the decay of old Rome: and the division of the Empire, was the destruction of the Empire. So Phocas thought by dignifying the Prelate of Rome, with that extravagant Title of Universal Bishop: and Pipinus by endowing the Church of Rome with large Revenues and Principalities; thought they had done wondrous well. But the lifting up of the man of Rome, was the lifting up of the man of Sin; and the increase of his estate, was the diminution of his piety. So cross oftentimes are the events to our purposes: the way of man is not in himself. There is no policy so provident, no providence so circumspect, but it is subject to errors: therefore not to be trusted on, much less to be gloried in. That which is so full of uncertentie, can be no cause of glory.

2. The imperfection of our knowledge many ways may well abate our pride. In Divinity it may get most: because toward the furnishing of ourselves with the knowledge we have most helps. Yet the most acute and judicious Divines have acknowledged their ignorance, and deplored their errors, in diverse points. We know but in part: If he that learned his Divinity among the Angels, yea to whom the holy Ghost was an immediate Tutor did know but in part; it is well for us, if we know but a part of that part. That which an Egyptian Priest said to a Grecian, Ye Grecians are always children; will be found true; not only of the Grecians, but even of the Egyptians, yea and of Christians too; that for understanding we are children, all of us. I deny not, but among the Romans, Nosica was called Corculum, for his pregnancie of wit. Among the Grecians, Democritus Abderita was called, not 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 but

〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 wisdom it self. Among the Britain's, Gildas was called Gildas Sapiens, Gildas the Sage. Among the Jews, Ibn Ezra was called Hechachan: they said of him, that if knowledge had put out her candle, at his brain she might light it again: and that his head was the Throne of wisdom. Before him, among the Israelites, Achitophel was the man; his counsel called an oracle: yet because another's advise was once preferred to his, he falls into a desperate discontent. So proud was he of wisdom, that it went to his heart to hear of any wiser than himself. This caused him to mis-interpret a poor disgrace, and to over-rate it. What if he were not the wisest man of all Israel; must he needs therefore go hang himself? What if his counsel were despised? A wise man knows how to live happy, in spite of an unjust contempt. What if another man's counsel was held better? Was it not madness in him, to revenge another man's reputation upon himself? Worldly wisdom is no protection from shame and ruin. We talk of wisdom, but where is it? Why should Nile overflow only in the summer, when waters are at the lowest? Who could ever satisfy others or himself, by delivering a cause of that? Why should the Load stone draw iron, or incline to the Polestarre? Who hath knowledge to give a reason of that? We all pretend to it, but where is it? The depth saith, It is not in me, &c. This wisdom is not in the depth, but the depth is in this wisdom. O the depth of the wisdom and knowledge of God! Our best knowledge is repentance: The fear of the Lord is wisdom, and to depart from evil is understanding. All our other knowledge is imperfect, and who will brag of his imperfections? Indeed stories report, that Agessilaus bragged of his stumpe foot, and Sertorius of his one eye; and played upon their own defects wheresoever they came. But I believe, this was Sardinius risus: a trick to prevent the jeering of others, rather than any delight they took in it themselves: for naturally men do not boast of their deformities. This defect in our knowledge may well nippe our glory.

3. It is not our own, nor of ourselves; and why should we glory in that which is another's? The ape is proud of his masters Iacket, the dog of his gorgeous collar: the asse jettes it in the lions skin: and the crow braved it furtivis coloribus, in her stolen feathers. We scorn to be sampled with such irrational creatures, we take all these for ridiculous fopperies: yet we cannot reflect upon ourselves, nor consider our own priding it in another's riches. What hast thou, which thou hast not received? A man can receive nothing, except it be given him from Heaven: especially not wisdom. The Spirit of wisdom, and the Tongue to express it; all Desuper, from on high. Every good and perfect gift is from above: they grow not in us, we spin them not out of ourselves, but they come from above. Therefore Quid gloriaris? If it be given, why forget we the giver? Let him be had in memory; he is well worthy to be thought on: yea let him have all the glory, for it is his. He that paid our ransom for us, when we were not worth a groate: He that cast his own garment upon us, when we lay naked; and healed us, when we lay wallowing in our own blood: He that redeemed us from all our enemies: will he take it well at our hands to glory in these his bounties, as if we were beholding to none but ourselves! Yet foolish man will be wise, naked man will be brave, filthy man will be pure. Though for all the cost and charges that God is at upon us, we remain poor beggars; yet in the midst of this beggary we can find in our hearts to glory: not in the cross of Christ, which he endured for us; but in the gifts of Christ, for which we are beholding to him.

These three corrosives well laid on, may eat out the cancer of pride and vainglory, which so cleaves to our knowledge: to which I might add a fourth for conclusion: That this is a secret thief which steals away our knowledge. It is like the Albugo, or white spot in the eye, which dimmeth our understanding; and makes fools of Cato's and Plato's, and Tullies, and Ahithophel's; leaving them at last never an eye to see withal: That we cannot know our own defects, nor the sum of our debts, nor the depth of our misery: That we cannot know God's infinite riches, nor the worth of his pardon, nor the height of his mercy; what may we thank but pride? These be those dead flies that corrupt the ointment. As famished bodies that have nothing to feed on, will fall to their own flesh: so vainglorious men, for want of parasites, will be their own trumpeters; thought they displease God and man. For God, he will find means to means to manifest thy knowledge when it may make for his own glory. Thy knowledge is a colt, a wild asses colt: vain man would be wise, though he be borne like a wild asses colt. Tie up this colt till God calls for him. If thou find that the Lord hath need of him, then lose him and let him go. And for men; whiles thou art silent, they will speak thy praise: but if thou speak thine own proise they will be silent. There was a Temple in Diospolis, a city of Egypt, wherein were pictured a little boy, an old man, an eagle, a fish, and a crocodile. For the devise of this Hieroglyphic; there was a boy painted, to signify generation: an old man, to signify corruption: an eagle, which for the quicknes and clearnes of sight, was meant to symbolize God, who seeth all things: a fish, to insinuate hatred, for fishes were abomination to the priests of Egypt: and lastly a crocodile, which they present as the emblem of insolency. The whole sense being laid together, imports this: O ye that are young, and coming on: O ye that are old, and going out of the world; to you, and to all be it known, that God doth hate pride and insolency. The Saints, when they would magnify God's mercies to them, used first to declare their own former conditions. With my staff came I over this Jordan, and now I am become two bands, saith Jacob. I walked alone with my staff, like a poor private soldier; now I am become the General of two Regiments. He chose David from the sheepfolds, and set him to feed Jacob his people. I was a mean shepherd, that tended my Fathers flocks in the desert: Thou hast made me a King, and that over thine own people, and set me in the Throne of Majesty. To this purpose Amos; I was an heardman, Thou hast made me a Prophet; Instead of feeding beasts upon earth, I am honored to know and teach the secrets of heaven. Yet in the height of these Dignities, they all kept lowly minds: no pride crept into the honor of the one, or knowledge of the other. So doth the Lord hate pride, that they two could not endure to dwell together in one wide Heaven, how should they endure to dwell together in one narrow breast? One heart can never contain them, if one Heaven could not hold them. CHRIST will know none but the humble, and none but the humble souls truly know CHRIST.

Thus long and late I am come to a Period of this Argument, concerning the growth of the knowledge of Christ. All they will pardon the prolixity, that have had any relish of the sweetness. It could be tedious to none, but those that either do not, or will not know him to their comforts. I beg not their favorable construction, but I pray for their happy illumination. Carnal minds are so far from learning how to know Christ, that they do not know how to learn him. They think they can as well learn him at home, as at Church; by following their Profession, as by going to a Sermon. And this learning of theirs discovers it self in their actions. For they have learned to swear by him, they have learned to tear his holy Name in pieces with lewd blasphemies; they have learned to crucify him again by their malicious sins. Of this learning they have store in their hearts; and this learning they derive to their children; who can swear as soon as they can speak: they learned that of their parents: it was one of the first lessons that ever they taught them; if not by precept, yet by practice and example. But non itae didicistis Christum: the Devil taught them that kind of learning; it came not down from Heaven, but up from hell. Some sin comes to us by kind, it cost us nothing: other by custom, and that is not very chargeable, neither. But they both did cost our Savior Christ dear, even his own precious blood: And if they be not unlearned again, and quite broken off from us by Repentance, they will cost us dear too, even our own precious souls. But there is another manner of learning, another way of knowing Christ: which consists in putting off the corruption we have by nature, and putting on the holiness of Grace. This is a good learning, and happy thus it is to know Christ. Without this, it is with us in our sins, as it was with Peter in his e•asie; We know not what we speak. But with that Direction, we may use the words of Christ; We speak that we do know. Without it we are foolish, and know not the way of the Lord: with it wise, even to Salvation. Suffer but two Meditations more, and I have done.

1. Knowledge hath a difference from the other virtues, though it be a virtue it self. Some virtues are only conversant about good; and some only abstain or restrain from evil; Knowledge hath respect to both good and evil. Some virtues are only and properly fixed upon good; albeit collaterally, or by way of consequence, they keep us from evil. So the Object of Charity is goodness; the Orbe wherein it moves, is goodness. It loves God above all, who is the chiefest good: next the Saints, who in their degrees and measure are good. With the heart it loves good, with the hand it does good. Paul indeed gives it some negative attributes, and that rightly: It vaunteth not it self, seeketh not her own. But these are not the walk of charity: they may be assaults and ambushes to trouble her in her walk, which she spurns out of her way as she goes: but her way is good, and her walk is good, and her end is good. So the object of faith is good; the promise of God, which is sure and good: the merits of Christ, which are precious and good: the Inheritance of Heaven, which is firm and good, It is true that she is often put to it; to remove doubts, to clear difficulties, and to dispel sorrows: but her eye is not fastened upon them. Her object is the Sun of righteousness: these are but clouds betwixt her and the Sun. It is not the purpose and scope of her journey to meddle with these, but these will meddle with her. They are not her way, but enemies in her way. So are all sins, and the father and mother of sins, the devil and the world. She does not only brain those Babylonish little ones against the stones, and kill the young whelps and cures of that cursed litter; but even confounds the Sire and the Damme. The Sire, Faith resists the devil: The Damme, Faith overcomes the world. Still her object is good, yea God. No less may be said for hope; it looks only for good: no man hopes for evil. The beginning of it is good, for it is rooted in comfort: the progress good, for it goes on in cheerfulness: and the end is good, for it is only blessedness. Evil is the object of fear, good of hope. It may have some conflicts by the way: fear, and despair, and presumption are three shrewd adversaries: but hope evercomes the evil, and pursues the good, and saves the soul. No less might be said of meekness, which is only pitched upon a quiet good, and Mercifullnes, which minds only a beneficent good: and of pureness of heart, which consists in an innocent good.

Again, some virtues are principally excercised with evil, and all their strength is employed in the victory of that. Est virtus abstinentia. What is Sobriety, but an abstinence from drunkenness? What is chastity, but an abstinence from uncleanness, whether in thought or act? What is temperance, but an abstinence from excess? So St. Augustine defines it; Munus temperanti est in coercendis & sedandis cupiditatibus. Wherein consists the honor of patience, but in the quiet and unmoved suffering of evils? Nunquam est patientiae virtus in prosperis. Where there is no evil, patience hath nothing to do. And what is repentance, but a sorrowing for evil? Wherein doth it properly consist, but in grief for sin? These latter virtues are not properly positive; Nil ponunt in esse but privative: their excercise is not seen but in the conquest of evil. Uncleannes is evil; to avoid that is chastity: Drunkenness is evil; to shun that is sobriety: Excess in diet, apparel, pleasure, is evil: to preclude that is temperance. Contempt and injury are evils; to bear them meekly is patience: All sins are evil, to wash them off with tears is repentance. These virtues, like the stars, shine brightest in the night. To abstain, not only from evil, but from some good, is a virtue: Est virtus placitis abstinuisse bonis.

Knowledge is of a middle nature between both these; and yet participates with them both. It is not wholly excercised with good nor wholly taken up with evil; but it knows both good and evil. Before man fell from his Innocence, he knew nothing but good: but as his ambition was to know evil with it, so to know evil was his punishment. In this he thought to have become like God, and he became indeed, like the Devil. It hath cost the elect part of mankind many a sigh, many a groan, and many a tear; this knowledge of evil: for the refused part, it costs them their eternal souls. But here comes in the blessed remedy, brought by Jesus Christ to his chosen, that they cannot but know both good and evil; yet the good they know, shall do them good: but the evil they know, shall not bring evil upon them. For they know the evil, to avoid it; and the good, to embrace it, and so come to be saved by it.

2. There can be no full satisfaction, or consolation of the mind in any knowledge, but the Knowledge of JESUS CHRIST. The Ancient Poets had a strange Fable of their Sphinx, which they feigned to be a Monster of divers forms: with the face of a Virgin, the wings of a Bird, and the tallons of a Griphin. This thing did set upon all travellers that passed by, and propounded to them certain Riddles, which he received of the Muses. These, if the miserable captives could not resolve and interpret, he would presently tear them in pieces. The Country being a long time thus plagued with him, proffered their Kingdom of Thebes to that man that could expound his Riddles; for if one of them were answered, the Monster had no more power, but forfeited his life. Oedipus, a man of lame feet, but of an ingenious head, accepted the condition, undertook the challenger, and got the Kingdom. He resolved the Riddle, slew the Monster, and laid his body upon an Ass for triumph.

To make some profitable use of this fiction, conceive here, first, by Sphinx, man's natural knowledge: this is a Monster of diverse shapes, being so metamorphosed and transformed by sin. It hath the talons of a griphin; catching and tenacious hooks, that will take hold of anything. It hath the wings of a bird: for knowledge flies from man to man by discourse, a bird cuts the air from place to place: The communication of science, is as the kindling of one light at another. It hath the face of a virgin, so beautiful and amiable that every man is in love with it. Sphinx had his riddles from the Muses: and the sententious axioms of a sublime knowledge are wrought out with much study and contemplation. That Monster devoured those that could not unfold his riddles: so human knowledge hath made a prey of fools. It was more policy than power, whereby diverse men got a Principality among the heathens: They that could get a dominion over men's minds by their wits, might soon prevail to acquire a sovereignty over their bodies. A twofold condition was propounded with Sphinx his aenigma's: to him that could not expound them, death: to him that could, a Kingdom. Secondly, the Oedipus that undertakes to clear these Riddles, invented by the wit of man, is the Christian.

Man hath his knowledge from Nature, the Christian his from Grace: the one is from earth, the other from Heaven. Religion is the Science of Souls, whereof God is the Teacher. Oedipus had lame feet, but an intelligent head: The Christian is slow in the pursuit of worldly things, but for spiritual things he hath a clear understanding. What can the Naturian ask him, which he cannot answer? What is the most glorious thing of the world? Humility. What is the richest? Charity. What is the wisest? Seasonable Silence. What is the subtlest? Simplicity. What is the strongest? Patience. What is the freest? The Service of God. What is the best Builder? Faith: for that lays the Foundation in Heaven. What is that which can reduce things to nothing? Repentance; for that can take away sin; as if it had never been. As Oedipus overcame Sphinx, put him to death, and laid his carcass upon the back of an Ass: So the knowledge of Christ vanquisheth all natural Wisdom, resolving all her subtle questions with Divine answers: then puts her to death, nails her to the Cross of Christ, mortifies her by Repentance, lays her carcass upon an Ass, shows her the folly of her former condition, exposeth her to her own contempt: So she willingly yields her self captive to the conquering knowledge of Christ.

But all this while what was Sphinx his Riddle to Oedipus? What is that Creature, which immediately, after his birth, goes upon four legs, next upon two, then upon three, and last of all upon four legs again? He answered, Man: which in his very infancy crawles upon all four, not long after stands upright upon two feet; growing old, he leans upon a upon a staff, and with it supports himself, so that he may seem to have three feet: at last in his decrepit years, his strength so fails him, that he falls groveling again upon all four, and lies bed-rid. There might be another riddle propounded to us, and that a more mystical one. What is that Creature, which was condemned ere it was borne? Which must be twice borne, ere it can live? Which gets life by dying? Which lives by the life of another, not by it own? Which cures all his own diseases, with his own tears? Which is of mean and poor parentage, yet Heir to a Crown? Which hath the body on earth, and the head in heaven? Which can see an object that is invisible? Which though he be dust and ashes, is partaker of an Nature that cannot die, even God of Himself? As the former was a Man, so this is a Christian. First, condemned ere He was borne; because He was conceived in sin: Nor only so; but He sinned in Adam, and for that was justly condemned in the beginning of the world, though he die not till toward the end of the world. Secondly, borne twice ere he can live: for Except a man be borne again, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. If he be not regenerate, he does not live in grace, without which there is nothing but death: for otherwise he is dead in sins and trespasses. Thirdly, he gets life by dying: By mortification and dying unto sin, he gets vivification and living unto grace: yea, and by the death of his body, he gets the life of glory. Fourthly, he lives by another's life, not by his own. Now live not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life I live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God. Fifthly, he cures all his diseases, by his own tears; sins are our sicknesses; and the medicine that heals us of them, is the tears of repentance. Sixthly, he is of poor parentage, yet Heir to a Crown. We are the children of sinful Progenitors by nature, yet by Adoption in grace the Inheritors of a Kingdom. Being Ioint-heirs with Christ, It is his Fathers will to give us the Kingdom. Seventhly, he is a member of that body on earth, whose Head is in heaven: So we are members of the Church militant below, yet Christ is our Head triumphant above. Eighthly, he can see an object that is invisible: so it is expressly testified of Moses. Ninthly, he is made partaker of a Nature that cannot die, though he be dust and ashes. We are mortal in the condition of our bodies, yet Partakers of the divine Nature by union with Christ. This is indeed a riddle to flesh and blood, a paradox to mere human capacity: the best candle in the Philosophers study could not give light enough to resolve it. Only the Christian knows it, and feels it, and really veriefies it. Such blessedness comes by the knowledge of Jesus Christ.

Of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.] Thus far I have spoken generally, now particularly. The Object of our knowledge is the Son of God; who is here set forth by four attributes. First; Lord. Secondly, Savior. Thirdly, Jesus. Fourthly, Christ. The first a Name of Dominion and Greatness: the next, of Compassion and Goodness: the third, the Name of his Nature, Jesus: the last, the Name of his Office, Christ. For the two latter, because I have elsewhere treated of them, and they may seem to be comprised under the two former: (For what is Jesus, but a Savior? And what is Christ, but Anointed? Now He was anointed to be a Priest, a Prophet, and a King; to all which, Lord, is applicable. Aaron was no less, though a Priest. My Lord Elias, says Elisha to him; yet Elias was but a Prophet. That it is ascribed to the King, no question; Our Lord the King. Every Lord is not a King; but every King is a Lord.) Therefore I reduce the four into two; Lord and Savior: and in both these relations we must know Him, or not look to be saved by Him. Not Lord only, without Savior; there is no comfort in that: Not Savior only without Lord; there is no manners in that. In the severing of them, we shall either forget his dignity, or our own duty. There is a Pronoun that waits upon each of these Titles; an emphatical one, and by no means to be omitted; Our. It is this Noster that does all the good, both in respect of God's honor, and our own happiness. We acknowledge Him Our Lord; this tends to God's glory: We believe Him to be Our Savior; this tends to our own felicity. A Lord ungodly sinners confess Him: A Savior, the very Devils cannot deny Him. Yea, they go farther; The Lord, and The Savior; they both acknowledge Him: The Lord, the Lord of Lord's; an absolute and independent Lord; that hath a dominion over the Princes of the earth, and principalities of hell: Kings and Emperors are his subjects: at his frown they all tremble: Others do not more fear them, than they do fear Him. With his breath He can dissolve them to dust: and with one word, Discedite, cast them down to torment. By Him they hold their Crowns, and must put them off when He calls for them. Crowns and heads too, are at his command. The Lord said unto my Lord. The Lord; so far a Reprobate may go in his confession. So much honor he will give unto Christ, as to call Him The Lord. But not, My Lord: this he sticks at: for then his obedience and voluntary subjection must come in. The Lord let Him be, but not My Lord at any hand. Many shall cry at the last day, Lord, Lord; but there is no Noster put to it. The Lord He must needs be, but their Lord they cannot say He hath been. So The Savior goes easily down with them: For there is no other Name under Heaven whereby we must be saved, than Jesus. This the Devils know to their vexation; that He hath, and doth, and will save millions, though they be none of that number themselves. Salvator, they must acknowledge: but Noster, they despair of. Indeed profane transgressors would fain, with the substantive Noun, join the possessive Pronoun; and with Salvator, couple Noster: Their Savior they call Him, and theirs they would have Him. But they separate Dominus from Salvator, and so have right to neither. Both these Titles belong to the same Person: Dominus and Salvator is but one Christ. Those that God hath joined together, let no man put asunder. Before I come to speak of these Titles in special, let me consider two observable things in them. First, the position or order. Secondly, the composition or juncture of them.

1. For order of placing them; Lord is set before Savior; and with good reason. Let us not think him a Titular Lord, that hath some under him, and others above him: But one that commands in chief; Lord Paramount certainly. Now such a Lord is a Prince; and a Prince gives laws, and those laws must be kept. Here let us pause a while, and consider have we kept the laws of this Lord? We are his vassells; have we done what he commanded us? No such matter: nay, we have done the contrary: not only passing by observantiam legis, but running into contemptum regis; yea into crimen laesae majestatis. We have left undone those things which we ought to have done, and we have done those things which we ought not to have done. But what? Be the laws of this Lord irrita Iura? Are they not obligatory? yes, as there be rewards promised to the observation, so there be punishments threatened to the transgression of them. Do this and live: Do it not, and perish. These laws we have not kept; not a man of us: What then should keep us from perishing? If the law-giver were flexible, and might be won to remitte offenses, either by man's entreaty, or his own partiality, there were some hope of escaping that dismal sentence, But this Lord is just, even Justice it self; and in justice can bate nothing of the penalty, but will see it executed to the full rigor. In what case are we now? Die we must, who should save us from it? Yes, yet there is comfort; for this Lord is also a Savior. And well is it for us, that he is a Savior: How desperate were our estate otherwise? But Lord first, that we may know ovr sins, and what we have deserved by them: This is no slight punishment, not a censure to be bought out with money, nor an imprisonment to be worn out in time: But death, and this not a short one, where a man is not six minutes a dying: but an everlasting one, where a sinner lives a dying forever: A death not of the body only by some painful violence, but of body and soul too by fiery torments. This is our doom for the breach of the law of our Lord: it is time now to seek about for a Savior; and blessed be God, we have one whom we look for.

Therefore is Lord placed first, that we might see in what need we stand of a Savior: And it is a right method, that humiliation should go before comfort, and sorrow prepare us for joy.

Among all Christ's converts, none loved him dearer than Mary, the more bitter her penance, the sweeter her forgiveness: and the greater her pardon, the stronger her affection. Thus the law of our Lord, prepares us for the Gospel of our Savior. The law is a glass that shows us our sin, and the Gospel is a glass that shows us our remedy. There we find Christ a Lord, here we find him a Savior: There pronouncing death against us, here suffering death for us: there presenting himself in his glorious Majesty, here in his gracious mercy. There as a Lion condemning the world for sin, here The Lamb of God taking away the sins of the world. Hear this ye that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver you: There a terrible Lord. This is a true saying, that Jesus came into the world to save sinners: there a merciful Savior.

Thus this Title, Lord, calls upon us for repentance; as we call upon this Savior for forgiveness. Me thinks I see Sorrow sitting in the soul, destitute of all comforts; like a sick man, given over by his physicians: They have ministered diverse medicines to him, and made many experiments upon him; and finding all to fail of wished effect, they even leave him to nature, to live or die at her pleasure. Such is the case of an humble and broken-hearted soul; that hath received the sentence of death in herself, and is condemned by the verdict of her own conscience: She looks to her riches, and finds that those bribes will not be taken: to her friends, and perceives them to be in as much danger as herself: to her old companions, carnal delights, the common refuge of melancholy sinners; and sees them running from her affrighted, like rattes from a house on fire. Pleasure, like Orpah, kisses indeed, but parts: only grief like Ruth, weeps for her, and tarries with her. No joy will down, till there be hope of a pardon. During all this humiliation, and mourning, and running down of tears, Christ shows himself a severe Lord, exacting his debts to the full. But when she is throughly mortified, then he changeth his form and presents himself a Savior to her: bids her look upon his Cross, and there find all her debts discharged, and her self acquitted forever. Woe to them that come to the sight of their sins without this Savior: for that is as if a man should waken out of a melancholy dream in the dark: there is no spark of comfort. But I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man can take from you. In the coming of Jesus there is joy, unspeakable joy; which neither the world can give, nor can the world take away.

2. For the union or conjunction of them; both are combined in one Person. In Lord, Greatness: in Savior, Goodness: both make but one Christ. Will to save, quia Salvator: Power to save, quia Dominus; both are centred in one Jesus: There may be a Lord, which is no Savior: but there can be no Savior, which is not Lord. Power without will, is an unkind ableness: will without power, is an unable kindness. Both together in one man, is for the honor of him that hath them, and for the good of such as need them. If Christ had not been Lord, he could not: if not a Savior, he would not have satisfied for our sins. If not Lord, and such a Lord as was Dominus dominantium, even the infinite God; he could not have paid a ransom that must be of infinite value, or else not, pass currant for our redemption. If not a merciful Savior, he would never have submitted himself to such a condition, as to take on him our nature; and in that nature to suffer such torments as mere man could not have endured. It was a wonder that he made us: more, that he made himself for us: but most of all, that he unmade himself, that he died to save us. He not only made man for himself, but he made himself man for man. The maker was Lord, the creature man: two natures are united in one Person: so the Son of God is Lord and Savior. In the one nature, we contemplate his Dominion: in assuming the other, his Compassion: in both we find our Salvation.

As Lord, he could not die for us; as man he might: As man, he could not satisfy for us; as God he might: He must be both, or no Savior. In his death, his Lordship concealed it self: Many of his servants, the Martyrs, seemed to have more cheerfulness in their death, than their Lord had in his. They were known to be men, therefore had the strength of God: Christ was God, therefore left like a man. They did more than men, because they were filled with the power and Spirit of God: Christ declared himself to be God, in doing the works of omnipotent God: therefore he was also declared to be man, in the weaknesses of men. Those fluenta gratiae were always at high tide in him: yet he seemed both partly to his own sense, and to the senses of the beholders, a forlorn creature. This caused him to cry, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? Natural affection in him cried, My God: sensible, Why hast thou forsaken me? Not that these two, Lord and Savior, could then part: God and man could not be sundered. In the extremity of all his sorrows, his manhood did not lose the union, but the vision of his Godhead. His soul, by the union of the Deity, had a glorious state: though by the union with his body, it was full of anguish. As there is no contrariety between the hate of one thing, and love of another: between the ignorance of one thing, and knowledge of another: so nor between the sorrow of Christ's soul for our sin, and the joy of that soul in the vision of God. Our sins upon Christ, were not in their proper element; therefore He felt them in their weight and heaviness: for Suo loco nullum elementum ponderat. But as the shadow of the earth obscures the Moon, so did the worlds sin darken Christ's soul.

When He was to act the Savior's part, He did not lay by the Lord quite: for the Manhood could never have borne those unspeakable torments, but for the supportation of the Deity. But the Lord did hide Himself from the Manhood, during the sad time of that expiation: so that it might say with Mary, They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they laid Him, nor what is become of Him. They were then, and are still, united in one Person: distinguish them we may, divided they can never be. Neither must we fixe our minds upon Lord only, without Savior; which is the way to desperation: Nor upon Savior only, without Lord; which is the way to presumption. Dejected sinners think upon Lord only, and leave out Savior: Profane sinners think upon Savior only, and forget their Lord. The one without the other, is but half a Jesus: and we must rely upon a whole one, that is both Lord and Savior. I am he that for mine own sake will blot out thy transgressions. Cum propter neminem, cum propter nihil, as thou art a just Lord; yet propter teipsum dimittis peccata, as thou art a merciful Savior. This Lord as He is God, satisfied Himself in that capacity as He is man, for the sins of all Believers. Therefore Lord, Noli ita attendere peccatum meum, ut propterea obliviscaris nomen tuum. Do not so remember thyself to be a Lord over me, as to forget to be a Savior unto me: Nor let me so remember thee to be a Savior unto me, as to forget that thou art Lord over me. But as thou art both these in one infinite Person; so be thou both to my soul, in thy mighty power, and merciful salvation. I come to the Particulars.

1. He is Lord, not only as God, Quatenus Christus. All power is given unto Him in heaven and earth. Kings may talk of their large Territories, but what command have they in heaven? Christ is Lord of heaven too. In heaven and earth He is Lord, but hath He no power on the sea? Is that privileged or exempted from his dominion? No, he doeth what he pleaseth in heaven, earth, in the seas and all deep places. Princes are potent, but yet they cannot do all they would: this Lord can. Heaven, earth, and sea are his; but is Hell or the grave excluded? No, he hath the keys of hell and of death: even thither his Lordship reaches. To Him must all knees bow, and all tongues confess that he is the Lord. All must confess it, either from the depth of their heart, or from the heart of the deep. Saints and Angels do, in excelsis: devils and reprobates do, in profundis: and shall mortal sinners in the middle way deny it? No, acknowledged he will be, either on earth with comfort, or in hell with torments: Here cheerfully, or there upon the rack: Either they shall joyfully sing out, or painfully roar out this confession. He is the lamb of God, the Savior of the world, yet take heed of angering him: for if his wrath be kindled, yea but a little, how soon do men perish? But blessed are they that trust in him. If he be angered, there is no escaping his hands as he is a Lord; but by running into his arms as he is a Savior. Our God is a consuming fire: as he is a wall of fire about them that serve him, so a consuming fire against those that provoke him. When he is angry, all our days are gone. With one word, let there be a world: nay with one thought of this Lord cast toward it, (for his speaking in the creation was but a thinking) he made all of nothing: and can he not reduce all to nothing, if he will? Is not the recalling of that word, the withdrawing of that thought, in the sequestering of his providence, enough to annihilate them? Shall ants, and bees, or lions contest with their maker? Shall any one rational ant, (the wisest philosopher is no more) or any roaring lyon, (the most ambitious and devouring Prince is no more) or any hive of bees, (the most political Counsells and Parliaments are no more, in respect of him) presume to stand without him? What are armies on the land, if this Lord be not their General? What are navies on the sea; if he be not their Pilot?

When this Lord is angry, he shall but need Sibilare muscam, to hiss or whisper for the fly, for the waspe or hornet. Nay he shall not need to whisper for them abroad, or to call in foreign enemies: for we have locusts enow at home; swarms of conkers and caterpillars to devour us. Nay, we will devour one another, when he sets us together by the aares. As this Lord is impartial, so are his Iudgments: there is no respect of persons with him, whether in his favor or his anger. He will wound the hairy scalpe of him that goeth on in his wickedness. Be it bald or hairy, it is no defense against the blows of the Almighty. No head-piece, but the helmet of salvation, can ward his blows. He can break the covered, as well as the naked head; wound the armed, as easily as the bare breast. The mitred, and the Turband, and the crowned head, that lifts up it self against Christ, lies as open to his Iudgments, as his that must not put on his hatte, as his that hath no a hatte to put on. We know by woeful and bleeding experience, that he can call up damps and vapors from below, and pour down putrid defluxions from above, and bid them meet and condense into a plague: And that such a plague, as shall not only be uncurable, but unquestionable: both inexorable, and indisputable: It shall not only not admit a remedy when it is come, but not give a reason how it did come. The cause could not be found out by the most learned physicians, the effect was felt by the laboring patients. O happy they that found him their Savior; that though their bodies were cut off by burning fevers from the earth, yet their souls might escape the the burning flames of hell.

Lord therefore let us acknowledge him; for it will go wrong with us, when we shall be driven to complain, Other Lord's have had dominion over us. Tyrans are cruel Lord's, and woe to the people under such an authority: For there it is crime enough to be innocent, where the Tyran is pleased to interpret innocence for a crime. Sins are worse Lord's within us, than those tyrants without us: Our goods, possessions, and lives are under the command of those oppressors; but sin is an usurper over our souls. Satan is a bloody Lord: he is so far from mercy in killing, that he would not give a man leave to pray for mercy ere he must die. These be cursed dominions: from such Lord's this Lord of heaven and earth evermore deliver us.

2. Savior; this comes well after Lord: there is small comfort in that Title, till Savior be put to it. There is no Savior but He: no Name but Jesus carries any salvation in it. The Prophets foretold it, the Evangelists demonstrate it, the Apostles preached it, the better part of the world received it, and all they believe it, that shall be saved. He came to save, and what did he refuse to do or suffer, that he might save? Omnibus omnia factus, was more true of the Master, than of the servant: Pauper pauperibus, divitibus dives. Lazarus so poor that he begged crumbs; Christ then in his poverty, sent him to heaven by his Angels. Zacchaeus rich, and gave the poor a large contribution: Christ was richer than he, and gave him salvation. Esuriens sitientibus sitiens. The Disciples were hungry in the field, their Lord in the wilderness. The Samaritan woman thirsts, and Christ thirsts too: they both meet at Jacob's well. The Apostles feast, and he feasts with them: Mary weeps for the loss of her brother, and Jesus weeps too. He is the door to them that would enter, the way to them that would walk, a light to them that would come out of darkness; bread to the hungry soul, and wine to the thirsty. All his actions shown him to be a Savior, his passion proved it. When he first shone forth into the world, like the Sun at his first rising, he drew all eyes after him: His miraculous cures drew patients, his Divine oracles drew auditors: both together drew the admiring multitude after him by troupes. They followed him as a Savior, through deserts and mountains, over land and seas. All his actions were so many characters, out of which the simplest capacity might spell a Savior. But at his death, he wrote a letter of love to us in his own blood: the Cross being the paper, the spear his pen, his blood the ink, and the contents, Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners. He came into the world to save sinners, yea and he went out of the world to save sinners. His coming in was but the purpose, his going out, and so going out was the performance. He meant it when he came in, but he dispatched it as he went out. All his life was a furtherance, but his death did the deed: that saved us. His resurrection crowned the deed; He was raised again for our justification. His ascension crowned that; for then he led captivity captive: His glory and Session in Heaven crowns all: and so crowns him, that all crowns are cast down before him. Thus his death was the crown of his enterprise, his resurrection the crown of his death, his Ascension the crown of his resurrection, his sitting at the right hand of his Father, the crown of his ascension; and all these make up a crown for us: Through all these Iournals we may read him a Jesus, and that.

3. Our Savior; which is the next point. Our, both Lord and Savior, and both together. It was not so Stylo veteri: in the law it was Dominus Deus, the Lord our God: but Christ hath changed it, and made it Stylo novo, Dominus Salvator, The Lord our Savior. Salvator stands instead of Deus; to show that in Christ Deus is become Salvator. It mends the term, and it mends the matter much; that a just God is become a merciful Savior. We are bound to Christ, for making such an alteration in God Style, to our unspeakable comfort. Yet were all this nothing (something indeed in it self, but nothing) to us, without this Noster. This is that pronoun, which like a pipe derives the water of life out of that infinite fountain, into our particular cisterns; that appropriates both Lord and Savior to us. That hand of faith, which with a holy violence seizeth upon Christ, as he lies in the bosom of his Father, and challengeth him for Our own: He is My Savior. Without this Noster, Dominus and Salvator, and all were lost <1 page duplicate > <1 page duplicate> to us; and we no better than if they had never been. There in no true and full comfort but in heaven, no comfort in heaven without God, no comfort in God without a Savior, no comfort in a Savior without Noster: if he be not our Savior, comfort is far from us. This gives us a propriety and interest in them all; and not only in them, but in all theirs. For if this Lord and Savior be ours, he is our Brother: if so, then are we the sons of his Father: and if that, his Fathers estate cannot be kept from us: Everyone must have a child's part: and this part we shall have, yea and more than a part: Son all that I have is thine. If he be ours, all that he hath is ours; and what can we wish more, than all that God hath, all that ever he is worth? The most vast desire will be satisfied with this. If he be a Lord, and a Savior too, then what the Savior hath got, the Lord will keep. No man can pluck my sheep out of my hands. David redeemed a sheep out of the paw of the Lion; yet that sheep might be lost again: there was a time, when David might be absent, when David must be a-sleep. But Christ is never absent from us; (I am with you always, to the worlds end) never a sleep; (the keeper of Israel never slumbers). That roaring Lion may go about, and seek: but he can never find either time or place, when Christ is absent from his: Vt nec superare Christum, sic nec separare a Christo, unquam potest. Which may well raise up our dejected spirits from the deepest consternation, to a holy cheerfulness and peaceful alacrity; that nothing can separate us from the love of God in Jesus Christ our Lord. As he is Jesus, to save what was lost: so he is Lord also, to keep what is saved.

4. This makes to our everlasting comfort: for as Lord and Savior are united in one Person, so in no action they are divided. So that the Lord does nothing to his Church without the Savior, nor the Savior without the Lord. We are not put upon the law whereof the Lord is Judge, without liberty to appeal unto the Chancery, where the Savior sits Judge. We may fall into bitter afflictions, and into the sorrow of all sorrows, the perturbation of conscience; and think that this is the Lord's doing only, as if the Savior had no hand in it: but these two never part. Diverse men may do diverse things, but one Person can do no action without himself. Christ is Lord of all that thou hast or art; and the Proprietary may do what he will with his own: Give, or let, or set, or sell. So thy disconsolate heart may suspect, that he hath sold thee to sin, to sadness, to sickness, to error; which be the Midianite merchants that buy up our Joseph's, our souls. But this Savior will never so devest his dominion, or deface his Lordship, as not to reserve a power and will in himself to redeem thee, if thou wouldst be redeemed. Our Lord may lend us out, and that even to Satan for a while: who will put us to drudgery enough, and press us to his own wars, to fight against our friends and allies: as he hires soldiers out of England unto the Romish party, to fight against their own country, and (which is worse) sometime against their own conscience. Thus Paul was lent out to the Scribes and Pharisees, to serve them in their persecutions: wherein he pursued those members of Christ to the death, for whom afterwards he willingly lost his life: So our Lord may lend us out. He may let us out for a time, to those that will use us as farmers do their grounds; plough us, and harrow us, and get the heart out of us, by their injuries and oppressions; and reserve himself but a little rent, a little glory in our patience. Thus he did let out Job, to all the losses and crosses, to all the sores and sorrows, that the devil could bring upon him: So our Lord may let us out. He may mortgage us to a long sickness, that will drink up our blood, and wast our marrow; or to a shorter but sharper extremity. Either to a three years famine, or to a three months invasive hostility, or to a three days pestilence: thus he mortgaged David and Hezekiah, two Kings and Saints: So he may mortgage us out. Our Lord may lease us out for certain years, almost all the time we have in this world; and reserve himself only a last year, a last day, a last hour; suffer us to continue in unrepented sins, till we come to our death-beds, and then reclaim us. Thus He did lease out that Thief till he came to the very Cross: and then Satan's time in him was expired, and Christ's reversion came in: So our Lord may lease us out. But howsoever He may seem to make over his present estate, He will not sell reversions: Though we have long been sinners, He will not sell his future Title to us. Whensoever we shall grow due to Him, by a new and true repentance, He will challenge his own, and re-assume us into his favor, and re-enter us into his revenue. Our Lord will not part with us, our Savior will not lose us, nor shall we lose Him forever.

This He hath done for us, but now is there nothing to be done for Him? Doth He require no duty at our hands? Yes, if He be our Lord, we have cause to fear Him: if our Savior, we are bound to love Him. Yea, we must do both, and in both respects; Love Him as our Lord, and fear Him as our Savior. So Peter professed to love Him, and by that very Name; Lord thou knowest that I love thee. He is to be feared, even as a Savior; With thee there is forgiveness that thou mayest be feared. Though thy friend be never so kind and loving, and apt to remit offenses; yet thou hast no ingenuous nature in thee, if thou doest not fear to displease Him. There is a love that casteth out fear, and there is a fear that casteth out love. Hearty love banisheth all base fear, and servile fear will be without hearty love. These dueties I might more liberally commend to your practice, but I come to that which I take to be more apposite. These two Titles more especially exact two other offices from us; Service and Faith. If He be our Lord, we are bound to serve Him: if our Savior, to believe in Him. Whom will a man serve sooner than a gracious Lord and Master? Whom will he trust sooner, than a mighty Friend and Savior? As He is our Lord then, He looks for our obedience: as our Savior, He deserves our confidence. He is both our Savior, Clementia, merciful to save us: and our Lord, Disciplina, just to rule us.

1. Obedience must be given to this Lord; which He respects more than Sacrifice: Quia in victimis caro aliena,, per obedientiam voluntas propria mactatur. Bethany is said to signify the house of obedience: there dwelt Mary, and Martha, and Lazarus; the brother and his two sisters. By Lazarus we may understand humble devotion, by Martha charitable works, and by Mary penitent tears: but all these must dwell in Bethany, in obedience, or else Christ will not come unto them, nor shall they come unto Christ. Humility, diligence, and repentance must keep in Bethany, and not look to be accepted without obedience. There Christ loves them all: out of that place it is to be doubted that they shall not find such a gracious respect from Him. Right obedience doth not regard Quale sit quod praecipitur; but contents it self with this; Quia praecipitur. David was dumb, because the Lord did it: so let there be no dispute, because the Lord bad it. No grumbling at hard precepts, when we know the Commander. He that would rather have the command suited to the pleasure of his obedience, than conform his obedience to the pleasure of the Commander, shows himself more a Lord than a servant. So Solon being asked whether he had given the Athenians the best laws; answered, yea, the best of them that they would admit. When we look that the Lord should observe our humors in his Injunctions, rather than we yield to his Will in our pliability, do we call this obedience? No, but My heart is ready, says David: he is the better servant, Qui paratum se exhibet ante mandatum, quàm qui obedire satagit post mandatum. The same Father sets down this for a rule: In difficult precepts, the obedience is more acceptable, than the neglect is damnable: but in light commands, the omission is more damnable, than the performance could be acceptable. We have a saying; He is unfit to be a Master, that hath not first learned to serve. Some think they know the art of obedience without any direction, and will undertake to teach, rather than to learn: Nec se egere putant magistro, nec idonei sunt magisterio. But Christ Himself was factus obediens, before He was advanced to the honor of exaltation. Though He were a Son, He became a Servant.

Our service is required; for if there be none to serve Him, where is his Lordship? But He hath many: even Kings and Princes have thought it there greatest honor, to be this Lord's servants: and valued this Title above their Crowns. Christianus tertius, Rex Christianissimus, King of Denmark, did always use to confess his sins to one of Christ's Ministers on his bended knees: and without regard to matter of State or Sovereignty, desired absolution in all humility: at which the preciser spirits of that reformed Church stormed: What, no difference betwixt a King and a Subject? Will he bring in Popery again by his own example? He unmoved replies, that he ought this honor to God, and he would duly pay it: that he must forget himself to be a King, when he comes before the King of Kings: that he presented himself, not as a princely Commander, but as a miserable sinner: and was absolved, not of man, but of God. The fear of Popery must not supplant piety: we plie our prayers, though we do it without beads: Instead of a superstitious bead, we let fall a tear. We relieve the poor with our goods, though we abhor the opinion of merits. We come into the temple with reverence and devotion, though not with a ridiculous gesture and superstition. We have our public, and personal fasts; wherein we abstain from all sustenance: not as they, who refrain from flesh, and feed on junkers; wherewith their own flesh is more pamper'd: what is this, but (as it were) to cozen God almighty? We preserve Chastity, though we honor Matrimony. They are likely to be more honest men, that have wives; than they that without wedlock have their choice of Strumpets. Blessed be God, we are freed from the papal tyranny, but not from the exercise of virtue. They that live among us otherwise, Exuerunt quidem Antichristi lora, sed induerunt Satanae compedes: have shaken off the Popes cords and put on the Devils fetters. Our Savior then hath not privileged us from obedience to our Lord: nay, by this we know Him to be our Savior. if as to our Lord, we give Him all our service.

2. Our Savior requires faith; He was therefore sent, that we should believe in Him. As Alexander used to say of his two friends, Craterus and Hephestion; that Hephestion loved Alexander, and Craterus loved the King: yet they were both but one man: So obedience gives respect to our Lord, and faith gives respect to our Savior; yet both look to one and the same Christ. This is the tenure we hold Him by, Faith: and without this tenure, He is no Savior of ours. His tenure of us is manifold, ours of Him but single. We are his divers ways; by Creation, his Workmanship, because He made us: by Redemption, his Purchase, because He bought us: by Vocation, his Family, because He hath admitted us: by Sanctification, his Inheritance, because He possesseth us: by Glorification, we shall be of his Court, because He will crown us: every way his. He is but one way ours, only by Faith. This being then our Tenure, and (as Saint Paul calls it) our Evidence; it behooves us to look well unto it. What doth our blessed Savior require of us, for all his infinite favor to us? For all his blood, and pangs, and torment, to redeem us? For all his merits to enrich us? For all his graces, to adorn and honor us? For all his glory, wherewith He purposeth to crown us? What do He ask at our hands? No more but to believe on Him: It is a very easy request: we can do little, if we cannot put our trust in Him, whom we have found so good unto us. It is a duty, Quod nuda paupertas, despecta mediocritas, indocta simplicitas facile implere potest. Here is no wearying of the bones with labor, nor breaking of the brains with study, nor distraction of the mind with difficulty, nor emptying the purse of money: no more but only believe. Thou needest not spend thy days in travel by land or sea; as men do to the West Indies for Gold, and to the East for Spices. Quod à te, & pro te reposcitur, intra te est: with the heart a man believes. God hath laid up the means of thy salvation within thine own bosom: Vt unde peccatum egreditur, inde & peccati medicina peteretur.

There be some that seek it without them, in their good works: these think, they can keep the Laws of the Lord, and never be beholding to this Savior. They would go the old and natural way to work, Quid faciam? What shall I do to inherit eternal life? They would walk, and work, before they be alive. They suppose, they shall not be welcome, except they come with their cost. They would accept of a pardon, if they might pay for it. But Christ scorns a mercenary beneficence: his gifts are free: He bids thee come and buy without money; or else He says, Thou and thy money perish. Did Christ indent with Zacchaeus for restitution and alms? Or Paul bid the Jailor first repent, and do good works, and then believe? I deny not that good works are necessary; as being Fructus fidei, Effectus gratiae, & praecursores gloriae; the followers of grace, and the forerunners of glory. But when the strict Justice of the Lord shall put them in the balance, they will be found too light: put in faith to them, and that makes them up full weight: for faiths sake they are accepted, not for themselves. It is reported that in times of blind Popery, they used to paint Doomesday on Church-walls, and God sitting in Judgment, and Saint Michael by Him, with a pair of scales in his hand, to weigh the souls as they came up. The soul, and her good deeds were put in one balance: her sins and evil deeds in the other; but the soul proved far too light. Then was our Lady painted with a great pair of beads, casting them into the light balance, to make up the weight. That was a blasphemous fiction: but indeed, if our good works be put in one scale, and our evil deeds in the other; this latter will much overpoise the former: but here put in faith, and this makes it up: Not by it own worth or weight, but because it brings with it Christ, and all his righteousness: and puts in, not the mothers beads, but the Sons merits. This is that faith which makes Him our Savior; and this that Jesus which makes us all acceptable to God the Father, through the Sanctification of the holy Ghost our Comforter.

To whom be glory both now and forever.] Christ is the Center: Grace from Him, Glory to Him. Blessings come from Him, like so many lines from the Center to the Circumference: Praises return to Him, like so many lines from the Circumference to the Center. The former part of the Verse was a Benediction from heaven to the earth: this latter, a benediction from earth to heaven. That was a gracious descent, this a glorious ascent: Grace comes down, Glory goes up. That was a contribution of benefits, this a retribution of thanks. In that appeared Christ's bounty, in this man's duty. Crescite in gratia; that is God's good will to us; Tibi sit Gloria; that is our good will to God. He hath given us all the happiness we have, and we will give Him all the honor we can. They are unworthy of any favor, that do not thank their Benefactor. So our Apostle begins, and ends: he begins with Grace from Him: he concludes with Glory to Him. As He is Alpha, the Fountain from which our Grace springs: so Omega, the sea to which all Glory runs. Primus, in the course of our blessedness: and Novissimus, in the recourse of our thankfulness. We could never have been, much less have been happy, but by Him: He can be never the more glorious for us: yet He takes our gratitude in good part when we give it, because He sees we would give more if we had it.

To him be glory: so S^t. Peter shuts up his Epistle: to him, and him only. Who can but wonder at the superstitious impiety, and audacious presumption of the Romanists, in joining another with him? So Bellarmino shuts up his controversiall disputes; and Tolet his commentary upon the Epistle to the Romans, with Laus Deo omnipotenti, & gloriosissimae ejus Matri. So Pererius concludes, Laus Deo, & Dei Genetrici, Mariae semper virgini: If we should argue with them in cold blood. First, Did any of the Apostles thus conclude their Epistles! Doubtless, they all honored the virgin Mary; yet they durst not give her the Divine glory. Our Apostles doctrine is, If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God. To join the Mother with the Son, in our prayers and praises, is not to speak like the oracles of God. The Apostles did not speak so, and yet they spake the oracles of God. They spake by the Spirit: but by what spirit do they speak, and according to what oracle of God, that divide his glory with another? Secondly, Though she were the most excellent and most blessed creature on earth; yet she is but a creature: and no creature must share the glory of the creator. My glory, saith God, I will not give to another: and if to no other, then not to his own mother. And if he will not give it, nor allow it; how dare we give it; without his allowance? When Christ was borne, the Angels sung, Gloria in altissimis; to his Father above, not to his Mother below. Our blessed Savior, as foreseeing this superstition, and on purpose to prevent this inconvenience, thrice spake home against it. How is it that you sought me? roundly telling her, that she hath forgot herself in prescribing him. To the woman that said, Blessed is the womb that bare thee, he answered, Yea rather blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it. As if he would anticipate her conceit of that external privilege. She is still a blessed creature, but not a Goddess in being Mother of the Creator. He that doth my Fathers will, is my brother, and mother: There he ranketh her with other believers: His brother in the faith is as dear to him as his mother in the flesh. Thirdly, Did the virgin Marie indict the matter they wrote? Did she inspire their minds, or direct their pens? Why then, to her the glory? We never read that Christ did make her a partner in the Deity: or proffer her, as Ahasuerus did Hester, or Herod his daughter in law, the half of his kingdom. The whole kingdom of glory is hers, and the whole glory of the kingdom: for that is Tantum singulis, quantum omnibus: But Christ hath another glory, proper to himself, and not communicable to any creature: no Saint, nor Angel must be partner with him in this. Let this show them, how they incur the wrath of the Son, by the rivalitie of the mother: and therefore leave deifying the mother, and cleave only to the Son;

To him be glory.] In the words, which are generally a retribution of praise, there be fixe particulars; Quid, Cui, Vnde, Quomodo, Quando, and Quousque.

1. Quid, what must be given; Glory: not a slight acknowledgement, but a frank and full payment: the best thing that man can give, and God can receive, Glory.
2. Cui, to whom this glory is due; To him, that is Christ: Not to the holiest or highest creature, but to the Lord and Savior: and good reason. First in regard of his bounty: he gives grace, and all good things; therefore deserves thanks and glory. Next, in regard of his former humility: he that stooped so low for us, should be highly advanced by us: so he deserves glory.
3. Vnde, from whom must it come? This, though it be not expressed, is implied: they that receive his grace, should return him glory. We have the one, therefore must not deny the other.
4. Quomodo, how must we give it? First, by thankfulness in our hearts; there he sees it: next by chanting it in our mouths, that men may hear it: and lastly by expressing it in our lives, that all may behold it.
5. Quando, when must it be rendered to him? Now, instantly, upon every occasion offered. No action of his must pass us, without stirring up our hearts to give him the glory.
6. Quousque, how long must this endure? For ever: This Incense must always burn; to the end of the world, and world without end. In diem aternitatis. For ever.

First, what is this glory? Some resolve it thus: Gloria est frequens de aliquo fama cum laude: Other say it is Claro cum laudae laetitia. It is due only to virtue; and when it is cast away upon unworthynesse, it is but like sun-shine upon a dunghill. It is another life to man: Secundam vitam dat gloria. The honor of good men overlives them, as bad men over live their honor. Praise is unseemly in the mouth of fools; and as ill doth it become the back of fools. There be some that overvalue commendable acts; Qui de magnis majora loquuntur: a fault of excess. Others under-rate them, and speak of mountains as of hillockes: a fault of disparagement. It is a good rule, Parce laudare, vituperare parcus. There may be a commendation as much guilty of malice, as another is of flattery. We say of the vulgar or popular mouth, that it is a door without either lock or key: soon opened, but not so easily shut. Quicumque vult, intrat in stabulum, & solvit asinum. Their tongue is a continual pump, to fetch up the depth of their heart. I deny not, but all virtue is to be praised, and yet it is dangerous for a man to overhear his own praise. He that could have been well contented without it, may yet be transported with it. Facile est laude carere, dum negatur: difficile non delectari, cum offertur. If goodness deserves praise wheresoever it is, in any creature; then much more in Christ, who had it above measure, who is goodness it self. If we so honor a beam, how much more the Sun? If we so esteem of water in the cistern, in what account do we hold the fountain? There may be error, or danger, in praising of men: there can be neither in giving glory to God.

1. A man may be proud of praises; like the sails of a ship, when they are puffed up with the winds. Many had been better men, if they had never heard of their own goodness. Therefore the fig tree would not be advanced above the trees, lest it should lose the sweetness. But Christ can never be proud of his glory: all our praises come more short of his merits, than earth can be from heaven in distance. To give him due honor, quomodo sufficit loquens lingua, cum non sufficiat obstupescens conscientia?

2. Men may be praised without just cause: the report of worthy acts breeds an admiration in common breasts, and admiration breaks forth into praises. Many a gallant Commander hath been famous for brave achievements, by the report of his friends at home, that did service little enough abroad. We have known some reputed very rich, that (every creditor being paid) have not been worth a groat. The pure hypocrite is praised for an honest man: but they that once thoroughly try him, will never again trust him. But in Christ there is cause enough to be praised: He is fairer than all the sons of men, than all the sons of God. He is never the better for our honor; we are the better for his. Securitas laudis in laude Dei est: Vbi laudator securus est? Vbi non timet, ne de laudato crubescat. Our praises may show bad men good, or make good men bad. They that are wicked sinners, may pass for honest Saints, through our commendation: And through our commendation, they that have good parts in them, may be puffed up with pride. We may magnify men that are desertlesse; or extol others till they become desertlesse: And so by the one occasion their shame, and by the other our own sin. There is no fear of either, in giving glory to Christ.

3. We may praise men in flattery: so the applauding of the hospitable householder, is the parasites grace before dinner. Some have their common places of adulation; which they study over instead of their prayers. Some observe the inclination and humor of their Patron, and flatter him in that most, wherein he thinks himself best. The arch-flatterer of a man is his own self: him they follow as close, as the shadow does the body. This is the way to catch rich fools, not much unlike that odd devise of catching dotterells: Others will flatter a man in that, wherein he is most conscious of his own defect: As to persuade a prodigal to the opinion of his thriftynesse: which is as if they should tell a creeple, that he goes very strait. They entitle him to that he knows he hath not, spretâ conscientiâ. Yet there be others that praise men to their ruin: so unseasonably do they honor them, that they irritate contradiction, and procure scorn: for such is the nature of envy, to fret and storm at another's glory. He that praiseth his friend aloud, it shall be to him no beeter than a curse; says the Proverb. Thus you see, that in the praises of men there may be flattery, or malice: which is laudanti peccatum, laudato praejudicium. None of these are incident to Christ: he cannot be flattered: No praises are hyperbole's, where infinite goodness is the subject. For all the glory we give him, he cannot think the better of himself, he may think the better of us. Nor can our praises do him any prejudice, for he fears no rivalls. Alij laudant, & falsi sunt: alij laudantur, & ficti sunt: alij credant, & vani sunt. None of these weaknesses can occur to God: therefore let us praise him, and spare not. Our mouth may run over with the praises of men, of Christ's it can never be full enough.

4. Man may be praised for that which is not his: as if we should honor the groom for a lord, because he rides upon his Lord's horse. Nothing is commendable in any man, but that which is given him, and so given that it cannot be taken away. Our noble blood which we had from our progenitors, may be attained in ourselves. Our riches are called the goods of Fortune; and it is a strange fortune, if they tarry with us. Beauty is a spoil for sickness, strength for old age, life it self for death. Thou hast fair lands; yet the earth thou treadest upon, shall tread upon thee. Him that escapeth the sword of Hazael, shall Jehu slay; and him that escapeth the sword of Jehu, shall Elisha slay: but him that escapeth them all, shall death slay. Quid stultius quàm in homine aliena laudare? we have nothing which we can call our own, but our sins: and who will commend us for that, wherein we justly condemn ourselves? But we need not fear to praise Christ; for he hath nothing but that which is properly his own. Who hath given him ought? For of him, and through him, are all things: to him be glory. That very glory we give him, was his own before: he hath it, we do but acknowledge it. The heart that wisheth it, is his: the lips that speak it, are his: the soul and body that express it, are his: Ye are not your own: but glorify God in your body and spirit, for they are God's. We do but bring him Clusters of his own Vine. Indeed, time was when he received something from us, which never was his own; but most certain, he was little beholden to us for it. He took our griefs, and bore our sorrows: He took them, but we know they were not worth the taking. He accepted our burden, but the bearing of it cost him his life. Thus he did both take the sins, and take away the sins of the world. When we transfer them upon his Cross, he owns them still: and to acquit us, interposeth himself to that infinite Justice: As if he said unto his Father, These sins are not theirs now, but mine. Thus he hath something of ours, which was not his own, for he had no sin of his own: if he had had, what should he have done with ours? But there is no good thing, which is not his own: and we give him but his own, when we give him glory. Glory therefore be to him: to Him, as our Lord, the Highest: to Him, as our Savior, the sweetest. Glory is only fit for Him, and he only is fit for glory. If we place this Divine glory anywhere else, we place it amiss: in Peere or Prince, we are wrong: in Saint or Angel, we are not right: It does not like the ubi, and will not tarry. Glory and honor know him for their own Center; and will never be quiet, till they come to the Throne of Christ.

This makes to their just condemnation, that despise Christ; that instead of Glory, return him contempt. Them that honor me, I will honor: and they that despise me, shall be lightly esteemed. But be there any such despise-Christ's? Too many; not only the whole world of Pagans, but even some that bear the Name of Christians. Wherein stands this contempt, that we may avoid it?

1. In not regarding the knowledge of Christ, nor believing his Word. If I tell you, yet ye will not believe me. Is it not so still? Our hearers seem attentive all the Sermon, till the Preacher lights on a point that trenches upon their commodity: then I have observed them to hang down their heads in discontent, to pull their hattes in their eyes, to turn over the leaves of their unminded Bibles, or to talk with their pew-fellows: As if the Preachers tongue on a sudden was become a Medusa's head, to turn them all into stones. Then they whisper, or perhaps, jeere: is not this to despise Christ? He that despiseth you, despiseth me: and he that despiseth me, despiseth him that sent me. Is there any glory to him, without honor to his Word? Does any man amongst you, think the Company honors him, when they will not believe him? Out upon that same golden devil, that Diana of the Ephesians; for it destroys many souls! So we cannot preach against sacrilege, this Cities Copy-hold; but as if the Book of God had no such Text in it, you scorn the Preacher. You have robbed me in tithes and offerings, saith God by his Prophet Malachi. A Text then it hath in evidence, and guilty men are in their own Conscience: but here is the resolution of it; Though Christ tell you so, yet you will not believe him. And there is a sly schismaticke, a corrupt collapsed lawyer, to counsel you, like that unjust steward to his lords debtors; for an hundred to write down fifty. But you will find in that dreadful day, when you stand naked and trembling before the great Tribunal; that this was to cozen Christ of his propriety, not to give him glory. This is one contempt.

2. Another is, to forget his benefits. The thought of his blessings is out of our mind, as soon as the taste is out of our mouth. The first thing that the devil stole from Eve was her memory. Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: this freedom she forgot. But of the tree of Knowledge thou shalt not eat: this prohibition she would not remember. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits. Can we move, and forget him in whom we move? The lepers were no sooner cleansed, but gone: only one of the ten returned with his mite of glory: the rest turned their backs, and away, without bidding Christ farewell. Such men, when they are hungry, may think themselves beholden to God for victuals: but once full, they forget to give him thanks. This is contempt, for glory.

3. In perceiving Christ dishonored, without once being moved. As the chief Priests answered Judas; What is that to us? So we hear Blasphemers tear Christ, and more than betray, even shed his innocent blood, digging into his side with oaths; yet we say, What is that to us? We might as well say, what is Christ to us? What is heaven to us? Or what is salvation to us? Indeed, to us the one cannot be, without the other. We shall never have part of his glory in heaven, if we do not take his glories part upon earth. Curse ye Meroz, because they helped not the Lord in the day of battle. They did not maintain his honor here below, they are cursed and excluded from his honor there above. So Gallio; If it be a question of words, and names, and of your law, look ye to it: for I will be no Judge of such matters. If the business concern words, that concerns Christ, what does it concern us? We will not meddle with it. It is good sleeping in a whole skin: yet he that hath an ulcer, thinks it better sleeping in a broken. Do not I hate them, O Lord, that hate thee? Shall I hear my Savior abused, and hold my peace? No Lord, if we do not now stand for thee, we shall never be able at the last day to stand before thee. This is another contempt.

4. Not to be affected with the injuries of his Church. O Lord, let them that hate thee, flee before thee: let thine enemies be scattered. Why, be there any professed enemies to God? Yes, The kings of the earth set themselves against the Lord. If they be enemies to his Church, they are so to him. Quod vobis mihi; holds with Christ, whether in good or evil done to his members. He that willfully wounds my finger, is my foe. If the miseries of our brethren do not move us, we have not all one Head, nor be members of the same Body. Why is this come to pass, that there should be today one Tribe lacking in Israel? We have been cut off by whole Tribes, and the blood of Christ's members hath run about the streets, and fallen like dew upon the fields: if our hearts were not set a bleeding for it, Christ takes it as a contempt done to Himself.

5. In vilipending his servants. Is it not a contempt done to Princes, the misusing of their Ambassadors? Who are we? Your murmurings are not against us, but against the Lord. In which expostulation, Moses both condemns them of injustice; for it was not he, but the Lord that afflicted them: and of presumption, in murmuring against Him that was able to confound them. In the one, he would have them see their wrong; in the other, their danger. As the act came not from Him, but from God: so he puts it off to God; from himself: Why murmur ye against the Lord? The opposition which is made to the Instruments of God, redounds ever to his Person. He holds Himself smitten through the sides of his Ministers. So hath God incorporated these respects, that our subtlety cannot divide them. O how hath this Nation lost her glory, in denying of honor to the Ministers of Christ? It stinks even to them, that are the stench of the Christian world: of whom God might say with holy Job, that He scorned to set them with the Dogs of his flock. Down goes the Gospel, that the Law may rise: the pride of that numerous generation is built upon the ruins of the Church. First, those sacrilegious sinners make us poor, and then wonder that we are not rich. I hope they have so much Latin, as to understand that Necessitas cogit ad turpia: Learning would have maintenance, or else it is in danger to be mischievous. Where wit and poverty meet, they seldom make up an honest man. This was the ground of that scandalous Bill, put up against Ministers: by consequence they force us to a scandalous life, and then for a scandalous life they censure us. They throw us into the Lions den, and have not so much mercy, like Darius to Daniel, as to say, God help us. This is to turn Christ's Glory into contempt. There is no City that more prides it self in bounty to Ministers, than this: you hold yourselves the best Benefactors: but no man of understanding will believe you: especially that observes how you have robbed the Churches nest, and stolen away her birds by sacrilege, and then stuck down a feather of your Benevolence.

6. Not to fly unto God in our distress: this He takes for a great indignity. Indeed, what can be worse, than to forsake God for Baal, God for Belial, Christ for the world? They forsake the living Fountain, for broken cisterns. Carnal men will make any shift, rather than trouble God: in their sorrows they never look so high as Christ: some lower respects take up their thoughts. They complain that the wind hath spoiled their fruits, the rain hath drowned their fields, a Surfet hath made them sick, the Oppressor hath undone them. This is all they regard; to blame fortune, or curse their enemies, or perhaps to tax themselves of oversight: as if there could be any evil in the city, and God had not done it. The Israelites want bread in the wilderness, and repine, Would to God we had died by the hand of the Lord in Egypt. And if they must die by famine, whose hand was this? Was it not God, that restrained his Creatures from them? We can see God in his immediate Judgments, but not in those whose second causes are sensible: yet he holds himself equally interested in all. It is but one hand, though divers instruments, wherewith we are smitten. The water may not lose the name, though it come by channels and pipes from the spring. It is the want of Faith, that invisible means, keeps us from seeing Him that is invisible. Job does not cry out on the Sabaeans, Chaldeans, on the wind or fire, that they had undone him: he looks higher, and sees another hand above theirs: The Lord hath taken away: blessed be the Name of the Lord. Affliction is a Messenger sent on purpose, to remember us of our Maker: then to forget Him, is a manifest contempt. Now every contempt in examined according to the degree of the Person against whom it is done. To Parents, unnatural: to Princes, rebellious: to God, most heinous: this is the highest degree of contempt that can be. In all these respects we sin: the world is full of the contempt of God and his Christ: where then is his Glory? If we will not be so kind to Him; as to honor his Name with Glory: yet let us not be so unkind to Him, as to soil it with ignominy. The Lord hath contempt too, in store for such: He that sits in heaven, will laugh them to scorn; and mock at their calamity. Were they no less than Princes, that despise Him; He will pour contempt upon Princes, 1 Sam. 2.30. He first offers honor: to inflict shame, He is driven to it. It is, Come ye Blessed of my Father: but Go ye Cursed, not by my Father, but by your own sins. O, let us give Him all Glory upon earth, that He may give us his Glory in Heaven.

Next, Cui, to Him. Christ is the best good to us, therefore He requires the best good from us. God could give no better thing to us than Christ, nor can we return a better gift to Christ than Glory. It is the reflection of his own beauty; the glass wherein He sees his own face. Though from us it be dim, dull, and imperfect, like the small pieces of a broken looking-glass: yet it is all the representation of his divine Excellencie, which our love and thankfulness can find out: the highest honor, that either Christ can receive, or man can give, is Glory. This is no slight or common acknowledgement: not a Glory Inter, among the sons of men; but Super, above all, men and Angels. God hath given him a Name above all names: so He exalted him; good reason, so should we. He expects it; let not us frustrate his expectation. Not that he hungers for it: his beams are not the less bright, because we do not commend their shining. No interposition of our neglect, can put that glorious Sun into an eclypse. Our praising of him is but holding of a candle to the Sun, in respect of any addition of light. Bonum laudare, non laudato, sed laudantibus prodest. Not He, but we are the better by it. It were a silly Conceit to imagine of God, that he is Auidior gloriae: for what good can it do him? But this is all we have to give him, and we must give him this or nothing. What can we render him for all his benefits, but praises to his Name? David could find nothing else: if he could, he would not have grudged it. Christ hath deserved this glory at our hands in many dear respects.

1. He gives us all our temporal blessings: what good thing have we, which came not from him? Children, those dear pieces of ourselves, those living and surviving relicts of our bodies and names when we are dead: they are the heritage of the Lord, and the fruit of the womb is his reward. Honor: that advancing of our heads above the vulgar, is his gift: I gave thee thy Masters house and crown. Thou sittest in a high place; who lifted thee up thither? Who promoted thee to this honor? Promotion comes not from the east, nor from the west, but from the Lord. Riches are also his gift: Nature reaches out her hand, and gives us corn, and wine, and oil, and milk; but Christ doth fill the hand of nature, and then doth open the hand of nature, that she may rain down her showers upon us. Industrie reaches out her hand to us, and gives us the fruit of our labors; an estate raised by our endeavors, to ourselves and our posterity after us: but Christ's hand doth guide the hand of industry, as a master directs a child to write. He governs our hand when it sows, and when it waters, and still all the increase is from him. Friends reach out their hands to prefer us; but the hand of Christ supports their hands, that support us. God gave Joseph favor in the eyes of his keeper: and Jacob prayed for his sons, that they might find favor in the eyes of Joseph. As we cannot see God here, but in a glass: so we cannot receive from him but by reflection, and by instruments. Even casual things come from him: and that which we call Fortune here, hath another name above. Friends use to give one another tokens of love, for the renewing of their memories in absence; as a ring with a poesy in it; When this you see, remember me: All the blessings of Christ are so many tokens of his love to us: we cannot open our eyes, but we must see those tokens: nay we cannot shut our eyes, but even the sleep and rest that follows, is a token of his favor: So he giveth his beloved sleep. Have we so many tokens, that we forget them all? Or rather, Christ in them all? When the charitable man gave his poor God-son a Lamb for a Cade, he was thankful to him, and would duly ask him blessing: but when his stock began to increase, and he had gotten a numerous flock of sheep, he grew so rich and proud, that he scorned to ask his God-father blessing anymore. He that could remember his Benefactor in one favor, in many slighted him. As we wish there was one Statute more, to enforce the keeping of all the rest: so would to God, Christ would confer upon us one grace more, which might move us to give him glory for all the other. If we can so pass over these common tokens of his favor, yet there is a Ring by which we must needs remember him; a wedding ring, and that with a poesie in it; Do this in remembrance of me. Let us never see this ring, without remembering the charge that goes with it: It is the seal-ring of our marriage: for shame let us not forget our husband.

2. He gives us all grace, therefore he merits all glory. Grace in the former part of the verse, that is his donation? Glory in the latter part, that is our retribution. What can Christ give us here better than grace? And what can we render him better than glory? The former doth require the latter, but the latter cannot requite the former. All our praises, could we sing them in the voice of Angels, could not make amends for his least bounty to us. Yea this very ascription of glory, is but the effect of grace: we could not so much as praise him for our blessings unless he did bless us with thankful hearts. Let your light shine: yet the candle cannot shine, except it be lighted. Our hearts must first take fire at his grace, before our works can shine to his glory. The one is inseparable from the other: if Christ have not glory by us, the grace of Christ is not in us. In the same measure are we gracious, that we desire to make him glorious. If we do but honor him as the world doth we have no more grace than the world hath. But then have we the grace of Saints, when we desire and endeavor to magnify him as do the Saints. It is his goodness to sanctify us, and it is our office to glorify him. As the sap in the root maintains the tree, and the tree brings forth and sustains the fruit, and the fruit acknowledges the sap in the root. It is the honor of his grace to us, that gives us the grace to honor him.

3. He gives us glory, therefore it is fit that we should give glory to him. I do not mean only the honor of this world, which is also his gift. As Herod had not only the glory of a kingdom, but also of great wisdom. A king they knew him before, now they take him for a Philosopher, or some excellent Orator. Sitting on his Throne, they only saw vultum regis: but when he had ended his speech, they thought they heard vocem Dei. Neither had Pharaoh so advanced Joseph, nor Ahasuerus so honored Mordecai, if they had not been destined to this by the purpose of God. Whosoever be the instrument, it is Christ that giveth the advancement. But this is a glory which he communicates even to reprobates: there is a higher glory reserved for the Saints. It is some glory to be a man: his very dominion over the creatures is called anhonor, More glory to be a king: and yet more still, to be a Christian, and such a Christian as is a Saint. A man hath command over the irrational creatures: the whole nature of them is tamed by him. A king hath command over men, all those rational creatures that be his subjects. A Saint hath command over his own lusts and passions; a higher soveraigntie than all the rest. Men may have the service of the creatures, kings the service of men, Saints have the attendance of Angels. Angels mandavit; Such honor have all his Saints. All this glory doth Christ give us in this world: good reason therefore that we should return glory to him. One good turn asks another: glory requires glory: we cannot in equity do less.

But Christ hath another manner of glory in store for us: It is his pleasure to give us a Kingdom. And the glory which thou gavest me, I have given them. We have a great glory here, but it is ab intus: The kings daughter is all glorious within. There above, it shall be also external and visible: for they shall shine as the stars. Our very bodies shall be made glorious: they are sown in corruption, but raised in glory: fashioned like Christ's own glorious body. He that will give all this glory to us, may well look for glory from us. Alas, what is the glory we give him, in comparison of that he gives us? The glory he gives us is real: that we give him, is but vottall: He gives us as great glory as we can wish: we can but wish him the glory which he hath. He gives us as much glory as we are capable of: we cannot be so bountiful to him, for he is infinite. Our wish cannot make him glorious, his will makes us so. His is operative, ours but optative. Ours is Cum affectu, in desire: his cum effectu, in performance. The glory we give him, is ex merito; he hath deserved it: we cannot deserve the glory he gives us, but it is only ex beneplacito, of his own free favor. He needs not give it unto us, we are bound to return it unto him. His is voluntary, ours necessary: we can challenge no glory from him, he may challenge all glory from us. If he gives us none, we cannot blame him of unkindness: if we give him not all, we are guilty of unthankfulness. There is obligation enough in his bounty to us, to bind us to give all glory to him. It becometh well the just to be thankful: it becomes receivers to praise their benefactors. Our humility and dependence upon God shows it self in this grateful acknowledgement, that to Christ we are beholden for all things. It is good to sing praises unto the Lord: it is pleasant, and praise is comely. It is pleasant to God, and it is good to us: both for procurement of the good we want, and for the continuance of the good we have.

We almost defy the Artist, that hath made some curious and admirable piece: and if any man hath delivered his country from great dangers, his name is honored in our Chronicles. Christ hath made the world, that magnificent structure: and made man (as it were) the Worlds lord and master; and does he not deserve glory? Can we consider the heavens, and not say, O Lord, how excellent is thy Name in all the earth? Christ hath delivered us from all our enemies, sin, death, hell, the devil; and made us more than Conquerors over them, that were no less than tyrants over us; and does he not deserve glory? Paul could not speak of this mercy without the subjunction of glory. When we consider how little good, and how much evil we deserve at his hands: When we consider how little evil, and how much good we receive at his hands; can we do less than give him glory? Christ's benefits are good seed, but they fall upon barren ground, if they do not prosper to his glory. I gave them corn, wine, and oil, multiplied their silver and gold: but they prepared it for Baal: There was God and Israel; God the Founder, and Israel the confounder: as she gives his glory to Baal, so will he give away her plenty to famine. Such is our case: Christ rains down Manna; we gather it, and eat it, and scarce ever think from whence we had it. We can easily remember to wish for what we want, but we forget to give thanks for what we have. But one of those ten lepers cleansed, returned with thanks: it is ten to one, if any give glory to God. Lucke, or wit, or friend; one thing or other still lies in our way, and takes up Christ's glory ere it can come at him. Job was so poor, that he had not a Lamb left to offer in sacrifice: yet even then was he rich, because God had taken them all away in one entire oblation, one holocaust or burnt sacrifice: For the fire that burnt up his sheep, is said to come from Heaven, and it is called the fire of God. Yet after all was gone, and Job had nothing left to offer him, he offered up himself, he did glorify God; Blessed be his Name. It is not so with us; we are not so poor: Nondum ad sterquilinum redacti sumus, we are not brought to the dunghill: Nondum versa est in cineres Troia, our state does not lie in dust and ashes: we have wherewithal to glorify Christ. Only there be three letters wanting in our Alphabet, which spell the best part of us, COR: these hath the world torn out, or obliterated: If we could put them into their place again, all would be right: the glory of Christ should shine forth most brightly, and in all things should he be honored. For of him are all things, and for all things to him be glory.

4. Christ is most lovely, and therefore deserves glory. Omne pulchrum gloriosum. He is fairer than the sons of men: Not as carnal hearts esteem of beauty, by their sense and fancy: So the covetous may think him lovely, because he is rich and bountiful: they wish not the riches of his grace, but to be graced with his riches; as if he were Mammon, the god of gold. If he did proffer riches, when he proffers righteousness, they would bring good stomachs, hunger and thirst enough. So the Epicure may think him lovely, because he always keeps pleasant cheare in his house: Sectator Epularum, non de been vivente, sed de been pascente, laudabilem profert sententiam. If the wine he speaks of were the juice of the grape, he could not want customers. It is the brutish error of men, to think the incomprehensible God like that thing, which best pleaseth their sensual appetite. So it is thought, that if the irrational creatures could draw a picture of the Divine Nature, they would make their own shape the copy. The Lacedemonians, because they were of a warlike disposition, and given to martial affairs, presented all the statues of their gods armed, like Commanders and Soldiers. The Egyptians did worse; for they painted the Angels black, and the devils white: but it was in favor of their own complexion, because themselves were black. So wealthy worldlings may praise Christ for his riches, and secular kings admire him for his Soveraigntie, and voluptuous men magnify him for his pleasures. But those be gross and muddy conceptions: a good man would not be so commended. Sit tibi tam triste, laudari a turpibus, quàm si lauderis ob turpia. I dare not altogether consent with the Philosopher in that: for men may be good, and yet praised of the evil. Bonum est laudari, sed praestantius esse laudabilem. But the children of faith see Christ's beauty with other eyes: they behold him as the Lord and Giver of life, as the Fountain of all

Grace, as the Perfection of all Happiness, as a merciful King that smiles upon humble suters, as a Lamb that shed his own blood to redeem us, as a glorious Sun of favor and pity, that dries up all the tears of Repentance, as the God of Peace and Comfort, that protects us on earth, and will forever crown us in heaven. This is another motive to inflame our hearts, with a desire to exalt his glory, and to praise his Name, because he is lovely.

5. Lastly, his low humiliation deserves glory. It is the Promise of Christ; Everyone that humbleth himself, shall be exalted: and shall not He himself speed so? This was a sufficient cause of his exaltation: Humilitas gloriae meritum, gloria humilitatis premium. As, by CHRIST, GOD brought light out of darkness at the first: so he will bring glory out of humility at the last. Let us look down a little to his descent, that his rise may appear the more glorious. First, The Person was God; and there is first mention of that high Majesty, to give the more luster to this low humility. For a man of mean condition to be humble, is no such hard matter, no great praise, if he be: a great fault, if he be not. But for a king thus to stoop, to rise from the royal Throne, and fall upon his knees; this was great humility. Secondly, the freedom of the action; he was not forced to it, but humiliavit se. Simon of Cyrene was compelled to bear his cross, his neck was humbled under it by constraint: Christ willingly submitted himself to it. The willingness makes it acceptable, to have done it by compulsion, had been miserable. Thirdly, the depth of his humiliation, usque ad naturam hominis: in his very assuming of humanity, there was great humility. But more, usque ad formam servi: as Abigail to David, so Christ to his Apostles, even to the washing of the feet of his servants. Yea, usque ad mortem, which is more. This would stagger the best of us: we love humility in a whole skin. Indeed there was no reason in the world, that obedience should be put to death; for death is the wages of disobedience: obedience, in justice, is rewarded with life. Add to all this, that it was mors crucis, to which he humbled himself. It was the fowlest death of all other; the death of Malefactors, and of the worst sort of Malefactors. So it was not only usque formam servi, but usque mortem malefici. Nor did he only suffer without pity, but not without scorn: his pain was their sport. This were worse than death to a generous and noble spirit: for if it be so miserable to live with infamy, what is it with infamy to die? This was low enough; yet his body must be laid in the grave; one story lower. Yea, he descended into hell, and lower he could not go. All this for us; Descendit ad inferos, quo nos oportuit, ne nos descendamus unquam. We have him now at the lowest; and have kept him all this while in the Press; it is now high time that he should come forth in Print.

For his Humiliavit, let him have his Exaltavit: for mortem crucis, gloriam Patris. See how God doth advance him, from death to life, from shame to glory, from a death of shame to a life of glory. He was not raised up like Lazarus, to die again: but being raised up, He dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him; nay, he hath full dominion over death: Neither did he rise only to the upper face of the earth, but from the earth: from De profundis, to in excelsis: above the clouds, above the stars, above the heavens, and the heavens of heavens. As he descended into hell, that we might never come thither: so ascendit in coelum, ut praeparet locum nobis, ubi nos nihil juris.

This glory hath God given him, but have we no glory to give him for all this? We, for whom he suffered all those torments, can we be empty of his praises? The Angels sang, Glory to God on high; when the God of all glory lay low enough. He was then in the Cratch; afterwards on the Cross, but now is advanced to the Crown. Shall they more honor him in his Humility, than we do now in his Majesty? They in infimis, than we in altissimis? He remembered us in our low estate: and shall not we remember him in his glory? He hath it there, though we should never give it him here. Yet this most royal Prince looks down from his Throne to his footstool; to see which of his Servants give him most honor, and what requital they make of his favor. Christ seemed to lose his glory, by hanging on the Cross; therefore let us make him a Coronet of our praises. We took some from him, shall we not wish some to him again for it? That was his Ignominia in infimis, and shall we not give him gloria in altissimis in lieu of it? Yes, as it was said of Babylon, How much she hath glorified her self, give her so much torment and sorrow: so look how much torment Christ felt, if it were possible, let us give him so much glory. As there was no sorrow like to his sorrow, so let there be no glory like to his glory. It is he which gives us beauty for ashes, and joy for heaviness; that lifts us up from the dunghill, and sets us among Princes; that changeth all our tears into comforts; and at last advanceth us from a vale of miseries, to the Mount Royal of eternal Blessedness: Thus he exalts us, and shall not we exalt him? As he was humbled to the lowest, so let our praises lift him up to the highest. Let us sing his praise on earth, so as our songs may pierce the clouds, and enter into the heavens, and become a pleasant incense to the Lord of hosts. That so the glory which we give him below, may make for our souls to his glory above.

Aquibus, from whom must this Glory come? But here ariseth a doubt, what Verbe is to be put here; for there is never a Verbe in the original: whether Est, or Esto: whether an Indicative, that so it is: or an Optative, that so it may be. The former is by way of gratulation, the other by way of exoptation. Christ now hath Glory, saith the one: let Christ have Glory, saith the other. That is Vox confitentium; they acknowledge that all Glory is his: this Vox petentium; they desire that it may still be given unto Him: either is Vox laudantium; they praise Christ, and show that He is most worthy to be praised. Ipsi sit Gloria, which is per modum voti, doth well befit the Church militant: Est Gloria, which is per concessum facti, is more fit for the Church triumphant. It is either a praise, or a wish; Gratulatory, or Apprecatory: and consists in demonstranda, that this Glory is his; or in exoptando, that it may be, and daily more and more be given Him. Either is well; but both are best, for both are most true.

1. This Glory then must have an Vnde; As there is Terminus in quo, on whom this Glory reflects, and in whom it resides: so there must be Terminus à quo, from whence it comes: without an emissive term, there can be no receptive term. Who then should give this Glory to Christ? For the Angels to do it, is no new thing. From the beginning, it was their occupation so to do. The morning stars sang together: and what is their song, but Holy, holy, holy, the whole earth is full of his Glory? Nor do they sing this only to God in his his own Nature, but even to GOD incarnate. So when the Angel had done his Sermon, the whole Queere begun their Anthem. They gave Him Glory, when He was in great humility: the Cratch was the last word of the Sermon, and yet Glory the first word of the Song. To show that all that external baseness, which seemed to tend to his disgrace, was but the Auspicium of his Glory. All that appeared beneath, Ignominia in imis, is pronounced Gloria in excelsis, and so celebrated by the holy Angels. No sooner was the Speech ended, but as if the word Cratch had been their rest, immediately the Hymn began. It was an Anthem that did properly belong to the Sermon, and it was a Sermon that did properly require such an Anthem. And all this to a Babe in the manger; In infimis puero, in altissimis Deo: for He was both. Such Hymns and Anthems they still continue in heaven: good cause have they to praise the Lord; but why this honor to Christ? Why do they so rejoice at his Birth? Quid illis concio, vel cantio? He took not on Him the nature of Angels: Why do they make such a do about it, when it concerns them not at all? I bring you tidings of joy; To you is borne a Savior: he does not say, To us. Yet they do it; not only upon command; Let all the Angels of God worship Him; let the whole Hoast of heaven do Him honor: but cheerfully and willingly, in relation to us. They rejoice at our conversion; hoc angelicum est. The Devils manner is to grieve at the good of others. If Christ come to save us, they cry out that He torments them: hoc est Diabolicum. They, in whose own particular this concerns not, rejoice: they for us, and not we (by good inference) for ourselves? The Queere of heaven began the song, but to set us in: we are to bear a part, and the chief part, because the best part of it is ours. They took it up, we are to keep it up, and never to let it go down, or die on our hands: but to sing it after the Angels below, that we may sing it with the Angels above.

2. Thus we have found out the Parties, to whom this duty belongs: we are they that must give Glory to Christ. As for us men and for our salvation, He exposed Himself to ignominy: so from us men, for our salvation, He expects Glory. The Vnde is from the earth, and men the Aquibus from whom this Glory is looked for. I deny but that God made all things for his Glory: and Glory He will have in all things that He hath made. The Heavens declare the Glory of God: and Praise the Lord, O ye Heavens, &c. How should these praise Him? The Heavens and Stars, the Earth and Seas, Fire and Vapours, Trees and Mountains, have no tongues. Dragons and Lions, Whales and Fishes, Ravens and Fowls, are called upon to praise God: yet they cannot speak. The former cannot speak, because they have no tongues: the latter have tongues, but they cannot speak. Why are all these Creatures said to praise God, and bidden to praise Him? They cannot do it but by the apprehension and expression of man: it is he that carries the tongue for them all. Therefore after the catalogue and list of the Creatures, mustered up to God's praises, man is instantly mentioned; and that in all the kinds and conditions of men; Kings, Judges, old, young. So in the Song of those three holy servants of God, after that copious enumeration of the Creatures, summoned to this retribution of Glory, Man is plentifully brought in: O ye children of men, O ye Priests, &c. As if all the rest could do nothing without man: and he were not only their Interpreter and vocal Orator, to tell their meaning; but (as it were) their Priest, to offer up their sacrifice of thankfulness to God: and their Lord and Master, to whom they owe and do service: by which service of theirs to him, they put him in mind of the service he owes to his Maker. If the Heavens declare the Glory of God, how do they it, but to the eyes of man, and by the tongue of man, for whom they were made? For what end hath man those two privileges above his fellow-Creatures; Reason and Speech, but that as by the one he may conceive of the great works of God, which the rest cannot: so by the other he may express what he conceives, to the honor of his Creator, which the other do not? He that hath ears, let him hear: and so he that hath a tongue, let him speak. With his own precious blood He hath redeemed us, we have cause to do it: He hath furnished us with Reason and Language, we have means to do it: and if we do it not, the worst will be our own. For Christ will have it done: if we will not, others shall: yea, we ourselves shall, whether we will or no: If not with Jacob, under a shower of blessings; yet with Achan, under a shower of stones. If not with Mary, in a flood of penitent tears; yet with Julian, in a desperate stream of blood. It is woeful, when Balaam's beast must come to speak to her master: when the very Sun that shines upon us, and the earth that bears us, shall condemn our silence: and all the Creatures shall be called to give in their testimony, that we have not given Christ the Glory.

This is no new exprobration of our unthankfulness, by summoning heaven and earth, rocks and mountains. When the Trumpet sounds for the publication of God's Glory, even they are called in for Auditors. They would express, if they could; what we can express, if we would; even the Glory we owe to our Maker. They shall all be Witnesses of God's just quarrel against us, for our prodigious ingratitude. The senseless Creatures shall have a voice to cry out against sin; whether it be the oppression of man, or suppression of the Glory of God. The Pharisees murmur; what was the cause of their quarrel? The people would give Glory to Christ: this they grudge at; this they could not endure. But Christ chokes their clamorous cavils; that if the people should hold their peace, The very stones would speak. And indeed at his delivery into the hand of his enemies; when all his Disciples fled away for fear, and his dearest friends durst not acknowledge Him; the very stones did then confess Him: and that in a language not only extraordinary, but contrary to their solid constitutions. His Glory then shall not be hid: for if men hold their peace, the very stones shall speak it. Ex ore Infantum He will have it: yea, Ex ore Lapidum: As God is able to raise Testes veritatis, ex lapidibus fluminis, children to Abraham, of the stones of Jordan. In the body there be several members, and they have all their offices: the eye sees for all, the ear hears for all, the hand works for all, the foot walks for all: So man is the Tongue of the the world, whose office is to speak for all. The Sun doth his office in giving light, the Stars do theirs in giving influence, the sea his in sending abroad springs, the earth hers in yielding fruits: if man do not discharge his office, in glorifying God for all these benefits; all shall speak against him, because he did not speak for all.

3. The Saints have ever been most careful of this duty. Elisha to heal the waters of Jericho, calls for a new cruse, and falt in it, and says, Thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters. The cruse shall be theirs, the act his, the power the Lord's. Far was it from the Prophet, to challenge ought to himself. In dividing the waters of Jordan, he does not say, where is the power of Elisha? but, where is the Lord God of Elijah? In curing the waters of Jericho, he says not, Thus saith Elisha, but thus saith the Lord. He professes that he can do no more of himself, than that salt, than that cruse: only God works by him. Jericho shall know to whom they owe the blessing, that to him they may return the thanks. Thus careful was S^t. Peter, when he had cured the creple, that none of Christ's glory might cleave to his fingers. There be those that would still be filching God's honor: like Herod, that was smitten with worms for his labor. He had a worm of pride within him, which engendered the worms that devoured him. There is nothing that the devil can worse abide, than that Glory should be given to Christ: he would fain have it himself. How large a proffer does he make for a little worship. The Angels sing, Glory to God on high: but it is the devils study, to mar the Angels melody, and to bring in his black Sanctus; to pull down Glory from on high, quite out of heaven; and to confine it to himself in his own hell. But if he cannot have it himself, yet let man take it: Any where he is content to see it bestowed, rather than upon Christ. His first incantation was the false promise of a higher glory: that same Eritis sicut Dii, is not yet gotten out of the ambitious hearts of men. The Popish gloss is not reformed yet: that Dominus Deus noster Papa will not be left out. It is a common Text in Kings Courts, I have said ye are gods: but if the next verse be read by the Preacher, ye shall die like men; yet the glass must first be out, and the Sermon done before he comes at it. There will be havoc made of peace, religion, and piety, and all to achieve glory. That which the Apostles rent their clothes to put from them, we would rend our very skins to pluck to us. Let God's glory shift for it self, our honor must be preserved. Nay we are not content with our own allowance, but we must invade God's propriety: Out of our own commons, we break into his Several: no glory must serve our turns, but His: As if no honor could satisfy the ambitious subject, but the kingdom: It is nothing to be great at Court, he must have the Crown. But of all breaches of the eight Commandment, there is none like theft: all of thefts, none like Sacrilege: of all sacrileges none like robbing God of his glory. As his glory is a treasure, which he will not give to another: so the very attempt to rob him of that, is a sin to which he hath seldom granted a pardon.

4. Men are commanded to give this glory: but how can they give it? Giving presupposeth having: we have no glory, how then should we give it? We may as well find fire in the bottom of the sea, or a well of water in the body of the Sun, as glory in man. Besides, if honor be in honorante; than as the less is blessed of the greater, so here the giver of glory should be more excellent than the receiver. But properly, neither can we give it, nor can God receive it: For both he is so infinitely full of glory, that no more can be added unto him: and we are quite empty, and have not one drop to give him. Yet both we are said to give, and he to receive: We to give what he hath first given us: and he to receive, what before he had in himself. It is his grace planted in our hearts, that brings forth the fruit of glory to his Name: and if we have the former, we cannot but give the latter. Suum Simile; it is natural to grace, to beget the like: for beneplacitum Dei, to beget beneplacitum Deo. If we think to spin this glory out of our own bowels; and thereof to make a garment of honor for Christ, we are grossly deceived: for he will not accept it, he scorns to wear it. So heretics will undertake to blason Christ's arms; but the Device must be their own. These are false Heralds; let them keeper their honor to themselves. But if out of those innumerable graces, which his holy Spirit hath set in our hearts, we shall ransack our garden for flowers, and thereof make a garland of thankfulness; this he will accept, and account it a honor to wear. Those coronation flowers of humble gratitude, and hearty love, he will stick in his own Crown. If we could make a happy marriage between a perfect Red (suppose the Prince of the land of Roses) and a perfect white, (suppose the Lady of the nation of Lilies) between the zeal of a religious profession, and the innocence of a spotless life; they would beget the best color: the Lord would be well pleased with us, if we could present him such a glory. But to talk of any glory of our own, or to offer that; were as if the darkness should proffer light to the day, or the dry pit to lend water to the spring. The Lord found us polluted in our blood; there was all our beauty. We come up, and are cut down like a flower; there was all our glory: And were not this rich stuff, to offer unto Christ? Once we did so, and he was contented with it: Our sin was all the favor, and our death all the honor, and our condemnation all the glory we gave him. We lodged him in a stable at his birth, and housed him with contempt all his life, and for a farewell nailed him to the cross at his death: and there we left him. From under all these clouds of abuse, our Sun rose glorious, to his own orbe in heaven: Have we no better thing to present him with now? Will no glory yet come from us?

From some, too many, it will not. We have our irreligious Politicians, that think on their own glory, not his. All happy successes they ascribe to their own heads, not to the Head of the Church. Perhaps if anything fall out cross, Christ may be blamed for it. These men do that in earnest, which we have seen boys do in sport; stand on their heads, and shake their heels against heaven. We have our impious blasphemers, that pierce his side with oaths, and swear all his wounds open again. The Jews did but crucify him below, on the earth; when he came to suffer: these crucify him above, in heaven, where he sits on his throne. From such men Christ hath injury and infamy enough, but not one spark of glory. From us yet let him speed better: some glory, yea all glory we must give him on earth, or he will give us none in heaven. If we lock up his glory, he will lock us out of his glory. He asks for our glory, and we beg his; Petímusque damúsque vicissim: Let us give, and we shall receive: as below, Grace for grace: so above Glory for glory. You have glorified me by your good works, in the day of thralldom: Come now ye blessed, and I will glorify you by my mercies in my eternal kingdom.

But wherein can we glorify him? Not in giving him what he hath not, but in making known what he hath. To publish his glory, is all that we can do for him: orto magnify his works. To magnify him, is not Magnum facere, sed Magnum dicere. His glory by our praises, is not made Major, but Notior. Nothing is added to the latitude or extent of it; but to the appearance and manifestation of it. We magnify him, not by increasing the luster of his glory, but by plucking off the veil of darkness from the faces of sinners. As it is a kind of honor to the Sun, when by opening the eyes of the blind, or bringing prisoners out of an obscure dungeon, we enable them to take knowledge of his light. Nor hath the Sun so much cause to thank us for this, as they that by this help come to behold the Sun. Yet he that is ever infinite, is pleased to enlarge himself by the number of our prayers: and takes our frequent petitions as it were an augmentation of his Greatness: as Princes are made famous by the multitude of clients. Still for all this, we are beholden to him, not he to us. That he will suffer us to take his glorious Name in our mouths, is a great honor: That he will take his Name any ways dignified by our mouths, is a greater honor. O what an honor hath God given to men, that they may either speak to him, or speak of him? We are worms, yea, worse by nature: why are we suffered to crawl on his earth? We are serpents, in respect of the venomous corruption of our sins: why are we suffered to hiss?

David professeth himself a dead dog, to his king Saul: and so doth Mephibosheth to his king David. Yet David speaks to Saul, and Mephibosheth speaks to David. We have no measure to try any comparison with God: proportion is no measure for infinitensse. Yet let it suffice to our comfort, that God doth not esteem us so little to himself, as a dead dog is to a King.

Whatsoever we are indeed, yet his mercy doth make more account of us. The man that hath but a torn cottage to hide his head in; he that hath no cottage, no harbor, but is fain to rest his weary limbs on the cold earth; he that hath no more of this world but a grave: he that hath his grave but lent him, till a better man must be buried in the same grave: he that hath no grave but a dunghill: he that hath no more earth but that which he carries, but that which he is: he that hath not that earth which he is, but even in that is another's slave: yet hath as much proportion to God, as if all David's worthies, all the monarchs of the world, and all those imaginary gyants, were kneaded and incorporated into one; and as though that one were the survivor of all the sons of men, to whom God had given the earth. Therefore how little soever we be, though we are as if we were not: yet he that calls things that are not, as though they were; gives us leave both to call upon him, and to call upon others to honor him; and puts the promulgation of his glory into our unworthy lips. If we were but mere dust and ashes, we might speak unto the Lord: For the Lord's hand made us of this dust, and the Lord's hand shall recollect these ashes. The Lord's hand was the wheel, upon which these vessels of clay were framed: and the Lord's hand is the vrne, in which these ashes shall be preserved. We are the dust and ashes of the Temple of the holy Ghost; and what marble is so precious? Yea, we are more than dust and ashes: we are our best part: every man is his soul: and being so, the very breath of God, he may breath back the praises of God. Yea, for this cause he hath his breath given him: and when he fails in that duty, he deserves to have his breath taken from him. It is man's greatest honor, that he may set forth the glory of his Maker as it was a high credit to him, Cujus dignatur ab ore Caesar in orbe loqui. In this respect every man is a Preacher, every creature a Text, every occasion a doctrine, every blessing a reason, every thanksgiving an use, men and Angels the auditors, and the whole Sermon is God's Glory.

Quomodo: To him, but How? Since we must all give glory to him; all glory, by all means, and at all times; it is requisite that we know How.

1. Justly; for we may not think that we are at any cost with God, or do bestow ought upon him out of our own bounty: we owe it to him, & Justice requires that we pay our debts. If it be Benevolentia, yet it is Debita: well taken, when it is freely given: but if not given, strictly to be accounted for. There is nothing for which Christ will reward us, but that whereby his glory is the greater for us. These are they which came out of great tribulation: in tribulation they confessed Christ: in the midst of that firy trial they honored his Name: therefore they stand with joy before his Throne. Such is the mercy of our good God, that he gives us a reward for doing that, which without any thanks we are bound to do. As a Father gives his obedient son the Inheritance; because he is his son, not for his obedience. But the omission of this duty shall be called to a woeful reckoning. He that denieth me before men, shall be denied before the Angels of God. His refusal of us, for us neglect of him, is both just and grievous. Because they knew God, and did not glorify him as God, what shall become of them? To be cast out from his presence, and debarred of those infinite joys that accompany it, is the extremity of sorrow. But there is more in it than so: Depart from me ye cursed: there is torment upon torment: Cast that unprofitable servant into utter darkness, where is weeping and gnashing of teeth; because he did not glorify God with his talent. It is not then left arbitrary, but imposed as necessary: No indifferent matter, whether we render him glory, or not: but if we do not, we shall die for it. He is a self-willed fool, that will not open his mouth, to save his life: but more sottish he, that will not open it to save his soul. This is not therefore matter of courtesy, but of duty: nor a free largesse, but a just debt. Render unto God the things that are God's: Not Date, but Reddite; what is God's; and glory is his without all question. They are mistaken that think their gratitude a gravity: as if God were beholden to us for rendering him his own. Indeed it is often called a gift, though it be a debt: a gift in respect of our liberal mind, a debt in its own nature. In our common speech we say, What is more due than debt? And again, What is more free than gift? The one doth not destroy the other. Indeed what we frankly pay as a debt, God will graciously accept as a gift. Not that he useth us as we do desperate debtors; glad to take this or nothing: for our Creditor can pay himself at his pleasure. If we do not render him glory with all our hearts, he will fetch it out of our carcasses. Have it of us he will; either in the liberty of this earth, or in the prison of hell: Either our pleasure, or our pain must pay him. Yet such is his goodness, to accept kindly, what we pay heartily: and to take that as a courtesy, which is indeed our duty. His wrath is revealed from heaven, against those that with-hold the truth in unrighteousness? If we with-hold the truth of his glory, it is great injustice.

2. Freely: that is but a sour praise, which is pressed or wringed out, like Verjuyce from a Crabbe. I will get me honor upon Pharaoh; but no thanks to Pharaoh: he shall get little by it, unless we call plagues and death a commodity. Forced praise may be for the honor laudatorum, but it is nothing to the comfort laudantium. The very devils were driven to acknowledge Christ: their scholars, the Sorcerers of Egypt were compelled to say, This is the finger of God: yet they are all of them in hell. This is to give Christ the glory, because we cannot do the contrary; to praise him against our wills. There is a confession upon the rack: but commonly execution follows it: and such malefactors have no more favor, than to be had from the rack to the Gibbet: God hath vim coactivam. Hophni with his flesh-hook could say, Da vel auferam. So to part with it, as one delivers his purse, or as a Porter bears his load, groaning under it, is little to our comfort. Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily: so voluntarily, as if God had neither racks nor skrewes to force it out of you. God loves a cheerful giver: if he looks for this in our charity to the poor, much more in our piety to his honor. We call upon you for this tribute, and you put us off till To morrow. Favors that come with grudging, are viscata beneficia: they stick to the fingers like birdlime, and will not come off. We are all put into that holy office: Christ hath made us Priests to himself, and sent us into the world to preach his glory. If we do it, there is no merit to be talked of, for anecessity is laid upon us: but if we do it not, there is a woe to be thought of, for a curse will befall us.

Do it then, but do it cheerfully, even with love and good will: let it be the offering of a free heart. The willingness of the mind, is ever the fat of the sacrifice: and without that, all is lean and dry. Sustali quod sanctum est e dome mea: I had an holy portion due to God among my goods, I have severed it from the rest, I have brought and laid it upon his Altar. I have taken my best goods the love and fidelity of mine heart, and consecrated them to God in cheerful praises? God had touched the harts of them that honored the King: so all those that give glory to Christ, have God's stamp upon their hearts. But for those men of Belial, that despise him, and bring him no presents of praises; there is the print of the Devils claws upon them. Praised he ought to be, and that freely: not feinedly, Quemadmodum ad hypocritis; not by custom, sicut à secularibus: not according to our own imagination, sicut ad haeticis: not by bodily representations, sicut à superstitiosis: not by compulsion, sicut à mancipiis: but with all sincerity and cheerfulness, as it becometh Christians. We need not grudge it, for we are no losers by it. It does not diminish our flocks, nor dis-furnish our houses, nor disquantitie our sums, nor disparage our Credites, nor impair our healths: nay, it is the only way to conserve all unto us. We are not the poorer, but the richer by this gift. Though we do not condition for the praising of Christ, as Judas did for the selling of Christ, Quid dabis? yet we are sure of a reward, good servant, the glory of thy Lord hath entered into thee; thou hast loved it in thy heart, and published it with thy lips: now Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord. As it was before in the charge, Freely you have received, freely give: so it is now for the reward, Freely you have given, freely receive: As my glory was advanced by you, so be you advanced into my glory.

3. Fervently: there is no thanks to a cold commendation: it is well if it may have a pardon. Laus in ore invido, parùm differt à vituperio. The praise that sticks in our teeth, and is loath to come forth; that pincheth God of his right, as Pharaoh higgled with him about the release of Israel: some he shall have, not all: the glory of such a deliverance, another came another ways; is fraus, rather than laus, a secret coozenage, rather than an act of Justice. When we write to great persons, we rather make their Titles excessive, than defective: they take it for a dishonor, if we speak them short: they would not lose one inch of their height. Hyperbole's do well; but Aposiopeses are intolerable. The new Lady snuffes to be called Mistress. Set up the string of honor as high as you may, as high as the Instrument will bear, till it even crackes again; and that sounds well, the music pleaseth us. And shall we bate God of his Celstitude? Is any praise too high for him? His glory is above the earth and heaven. Above the earth it may well be; for the earth is but the Cellar or Vault of the world. Indeed here be Excelsa, and Excelsi, high places, and high persons, both: the highest places are mountains, and the highest persons kings. I will ascend above the height of the clouds, I will be like the most High; said one of them. Babylon was the high place, and the King of Babylon the high Person: yet he was so modest as to challenge no more, but Similis Altissimo, not Altissimus. But as high as they are, There be higher than they. The Glory of Christ is higher than theirs, for it is above the earth: yea, above heaven too.

Altissimus was the ancient style of God: Melchizedek so termed him first. Therefore let us give him the highest Glory: Laudate Deum in excelsis: so the Angels sung, Glory to God on high. All glory is high; yet there is one glory higher than another: and One star differeth from another in glory. Glory, like Fame; Ingreditur solo, & caput nubila condit. If any be higher, let us give Christ that; Praise Him in the heights, as high as we can go. Glory it self is an altitude; higher than wealth, higher than pleasure: the highest pitch that man can fly; an Eagle for the King. Good reason that we should wish him that is highest the highest thing we have. Praise him upon the high sounding Cymbals; that our voices, and applauses, and thanks may be heard up to the very heavens, and so be in altissimis indeed. To shorten the glory of God, is not laus, but sacrilegium. To call him only, Great, happy, wise, good, is but a positive: not enough, if there be a greater, better, wiser, happier, in the comparative. Parva laus, tantum miseris anteferri. No, give it him in the superlative, in the highest; Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens. With our highest wishes, and highest affections, and highest expressions, and highest endeavors, let us set forth the praise and glory of the most high God, Jesus Christ.

4. Intently, and with an earnest desire to glorify him. Though we cannot go so high as we would, yet let us go as high as we can. I know it is impossible to shoot home to the mark, and to give Christ condign praises: he is worthy of all praise, but no praise can be worthy of Him. As his humility was so deep, that we cannot sound it: so his sublimity is so high, that we cannot reach it. Yet let us draw to our utmost strength, and loose the arrows of our praises, so that they may come as near heaven, as the arm of flesh can send them: and even that shall be accepted. He does not look for such Glory from us, as He is worthy to receive, but as we are able to give. Our praises of Him are not sins, yet they are not without some touch of sin: praises and infirmities come from us together, but Christ parts them; forgiving the infirmities, and receiving the praises. They are full of weaknesses, yet doth He not except against them for their imperfections. He takes them well in worth, though there be no worth in them: and vouchsafes them a reward, which had been sufficiently honored with a pardon. Christ says of Mary's anointing Him, Quod potuit fecit: yet this was somewhat, for the Ointment cost a round sum: and of the Widows charity, Quod habuit dedit; and that (God wot) was but two Mites: yet well taken though. Actionis infirmitas shall not hinder, if Voluntatis integritas be ready. There may be weakness in the act of rendering Glory; but if there be goodness in the desire, the Mercy of Christ will look graciously upon it. God's good will towards us, will accept of our good will toward Him. He is attentive to their prayers, that desire to fear his Name: and even for David, whom God commended for a man after his own Heart; his honest true heart was the fairest flower in his garden. Every action is measured according to the proportion of the Agent: Desire in them that cannot speak, speech in them that cannot do, doing good in them that lack strength to suffer evil, finds favor at the hands of Christ. As in extreme sickness; when the tongue cannot utter words, yet the heart venting groans, receives compassion. Though the Totum hominis be but Votum mentis; that will is taken for the deed. Great acts from weak persons, are entertained with wonder. The Leper was not praised, Quia in lege doctus: the Centurion was wondered at, Quia legis ignarus: yet they both had faith. In modico sermon sapientiae plus laudatur rusticus, quàm in magno Philosophus. The witty speech of a child is admired: the same falling from the mouth of a man would not be regarded. None returned with thanks but the Samaritan: if Christ have his Tythe out of a strange field, when his own Parish paies Him none, He may well take notice of it. Faithful observance is most accepted, where it is least expected. If they offer Gold to the Tabernacle, whom we deemed scarce worth Goats hair: If Mary that was so great a sinner, spend more tears upon Christ's feet, than Simon that thought himself so righteous a Saint; shall she not be more rewarded? But as there may be a desire without ability, so commonly there is an ability without a desire. Some few would do much for Christ's Glory, and cannot: thousands of us can do much for his Glory, and will not. These latter rejoice for what they can do, and are in danger of hell: the former mourn for what they cannot do, and are accepted in heaven. God will give Glory to that very willingness, which desires to glorify his Son Jesus.

5. Principally; before all others, and above all others. Principaliter, is not only a numerall, but an ordinall term: signifying both First in number, and Chief in order. For Precedencie, let Christ be the First: and for Supremacy, let him be the chiefest. Both; for we know that in civil equipage, some go before who are not the chief, nay, furthest off from the Chief: as the fore rank are farthest from the Person of the Prince, though they go before the Prince. And Saint Paul in placing those three Divine graces, sets the greatest last; Vltima charitas, sed maxima charitas. So the son is set after the brother, yet is dearer than brother: wife after child, yet dearer than child; and friend after all, who is the dearest of all. But let Christ be both Primus in Ordine, and Primus in Dignitate. Begin thy works with his glory, and so let him be the first of all: reduce all thy works to his glory, and so let him be the chief of all. There be many others to whom we owe honor: but Christ's glory must be set before all, and kept above all. Men have their glory, and with his allowance: Honor to whom honor belongeth. There be distinctions of men upon earth; some higher than others: why have we else such diversity of Titles? Worship, Lordship, Honor, Grace, Excellencie, Majesty, are stiles of honor; everyone transcending another. There are degrees of glory in the celestial bodies, among the stars. Parents we are commanded to honor: and spiritual parents, good Pastors are worthy of double honor: above all men, honor the King. The politic Atheist would have all glory given to the King, and let God stand for a bare Name. The sottish Anabaptist would have all glory given to God, and the king to stand for a cypher. These think that God hath not his due honor, unless the king lay down his Scepter, that God and Caesar, Christ and the Christian Magistrate, are the whole heaven asunder: and will not come near one another. But Christ says, Give Caesar that which is Caesars, and to God that which is God's. He joins them both arm in arm, in one verse; and fears not the loss of his own honor, by the honor of the Prince. This is one difference between the Court-parasite, and the Anabaptistical hypocrite: The former is hot for Quae Caesaris, and quite skips over Quae Dei: the other stands upon Quae Dei, and would annihilate Quae Caesaris. But both have their due places; for God is the God of order, not of confusion. O ye sons of men, Christ doth not grudge you your honors, why should you deny him his? You may enjoy your Lordships, and Worships, and all your several Titles, without his envy: yea more, he commands men to give you all your due respects: not out of courtesy, for love; nor out of slavery, for fear; nor out of flattery, for gain; but out of duty, for conscience. He upholds your names, you may do well to uphold his. The factious Sectary, that would bring all things to a parity, thinks that God's glory is not entire, unless Caesars Image be quite blotted out. The profane polititian, that would flatter the king into a God, thinks that Caesar hath never enough, till God hath nothing left. As if both could not be preserved in their several rights: as if we must needs so look upon the one, as to lose the sight of the other; and so give ear to the one, as if we never cared for hearing of the other. But Caesar may have his honor, without God's prejudice: and God may have his glory without any impeachment to Caesar. Yea, Caesar holds all his honor in Capite: and as he is the head of his subjects, so Christ is the head of Caesar. By me Kings reign: It is Christ's Prerogative royal, to be the King of kings. Glory and honor, both are in his hand, and at his disposing.

To speak to us all; God is a careful Preserver of our honors: he hath made a strong fence about our good names; hedged them in with a precept, a precept delivered in thunder, and to be required with rigor; the breach whereof is punishable with quenchlesse fire: He hath bestowed a whole Commandment upon them. He gave but ten in all, and one of the ten he hath set to guard our honors. We are not only forbidden to speak evil of the Ruler, but even of our neighbor. So provident hath the Lord been to preserve our honor. To the conviction of them that stand upon piety to God, and forget civilitie to men: that think it enough to do some homage to Christ on the Sabbath, though they dishonor their brethren all the week. By reason of a sinful custom crept into the world, it is usual for one duty of godliness to devour all her fellows. We cannot raise the price of one virtue, but we must cry down all the rest. Not extol Preaching, but Prayer must grow out of request: not bring up alms, and the works of mercy, but presently the works of devotion must be laid down. No way but by the sale of Christ's ointment, to provide for the poor. No way to honor God, but by the despising of men. If we be so pious, as to give Christ the glory: then so impious as to befoul the good names of his servants with ignominy. I am not as other men, extortioners, adulterers, unjust. Too many of the pure brotherhood are of the Pharisees opinion right. No extortioner, no adulterer, as if there was no other way to hell, but by these enormities: as if God could be displeased with nothing, but adultery and extortion. But as the Pharisee left out of his Catalogue, Pride: he says, No extortioner, no unjust man; he says not, No proud man: So the precise arrogant dissembler brags, that he is no adulterer, no blasphemer; but he says not, I am no slanderer. No tongue so bitter as theirs, when they light upon a name that is not in their own Register: none makes so deep an incision into the credit of their neighbors. They complain of the profane ones, (as they call them) that they make drunken catches of them in the Tavernes: I excuse it not: but by their leaves, they make worse libels of good men in their private conventicles. If it be a fault in the other, to censure men in their drink: is it no fault in these, to speak worse of men at their meat? Why should Ceres have a greater privilege than Bacchus? Why should our names be the fiddles, to draw down their morsels? Why do they blame the Papists for slighting the second commandment, when they make no reckoning of the ninth? As they take it ill for others to scandalize them under the name of hypocrites, so let them take heed of scandalizing others with the name of dissolutes. God is tender of all our reputations, why are not we so one of another's? This honor he affords us in our several stations: we have it, and much good do us with it. His glory doth not so swallow up ours, but that we are honored in him, by him, and for him. But then our honor goes beyond the bounds, when it encroacheth upon his glory. It is the presumption, and the ruin of it, to invade Christ's propriety. All our glory is but a beam of his: and shall a poor and small ray brave it out, as if it were the body of the Sun? The glory of making all good, the glory of repairing what we had made evil, the glory of disposing all to good, the glory of giving all good, the glory of doing all good; this glory he will not give to another. And he that presumes to take it, when as God denies to give it; shall find it too hot, or too heavy for him: he shall never carry it to his grave. All the glory we have, is the resultance of his: all our honor consists in being his instruments: We have the glory that belongs to the instruments, let him have the glory that belongs to the Agent. This is one strong motive to preserve his honor, because he preserves ours. We deserve to live with shame, and die with infamy, if both in life and death we do not give Christ the glory.

6. Entirely; and that two ways. First, Ex parte Christi, that he have it all to himself. Secondly, Ex parte nostrâ, that we give it to him with all the powers we have. Totum illi, & ex toto nostri: he must have all the glory which can be rendered by all our ability.

1. It must be entirely his: To him, and none but him. Not to another above him, not to another beneath him, not to another for him, not to another with him, not to another besides him; but only to himself. Gloria is not enough, nor gloria Deo, without Soli. To the only wise God be honor. Not unto us; as if the Saints were afraid to touch any part of it. So we are taught to acknowledge in our Prayer, and to pray for that acknowledgement; Thine is the glory. Thine, and no Creatures else. Some Creatures may have some glory, but none of Christ's glory: that same Gloria in Altissimis is only his. The Angels sung it to Him; and if we sing it to any but Him, we sing a false note. This was their music to Him, when he lay in the Cratch: much more now he wears his Crown: To Christ, and none but Christ the glory. No sharers; he will have all, or none. Let petty lords content themselves with a mediocritie of honor: they that have right to none, will take any. Satan was never so audacious, as when he would persuade his Maker to a geniculation, to an adoration of his Creature, of his professed enemy. Never did Christ say, Avoid Satan, till then. It is a just indignation, that is conceived at the motion of a rivalry with God. Certainly, Idolatry is a most dear sin to the devil, or else he would not be so importunate to compass it. How are the Papists sure, that they do not make a rivall with Christ, when they set an Image before their eyes at the time of their worship? Why may not the Saint represented in that picture, yea, why may not the picture it self go halves with Christ in the glory? How is it to him entirely, if either a Saint in heaven, or an Image on earth, be his partner? And how are they so certain of the constancy of their minds, that no thought of theirs shall ever stick upon the picture? There is flesh in the holiest of them, as well as spirit: and when the Spirit would give all the glory to Christ, will not the flesh steal away some, to bestow upon the image?

The philosophical opinion of our souls, that they are made of harmony, is little better than a poetical fiction: But the poetical fiction, that the Thebans sprang of the seed of the Serpent, and so became warring brethren, is more than a Philosophical opinion. For since the Serpent beguiled our first parents, The flesh fighteth against the spirit, and the spirit fighteth against the flesh: Et cum hac controversia nati sumus. These twins make a perpetual war within us, and that war makes many wounds, and those wounds will never perfectly be cured, till we are advanced to Heaven. Christ may now cover them with his own garment of righteousness, as that king bound up the wounds of his soldiers with his own robe: but they are never thoroughly healed, till we come to that Heavenly Jerusalem, which signifies the vision of peace, the beatifical vision of God. And so long as this flesh, this corruption of our nature sticks to us, we are in danger of making some rivall with Christ. Though our grace, the better part, the Israel within us, would give all glory to him; yet within us there is a Philistine faction too, corrupt nature, that will set up their Dagon. Though they cannot agree together, yet they must dwell together. And Paul does forbid the dominion of the worse, not the cohabitation of both. David thought it a great woe, To dwell in Mesech: but it is a far greater woe, for Mesech to dwell in us. Yet there it will dwell, till death turns them both out of doors: and sendeth our sin down to Hell, to the Devil that begot it; and our soul up into Heaven, to our Redeemer that bought it. Good cause have we therefore to take heed, least that our sin betray our grace, and like a sly thief filch away some of that honor we intended to Christ.

Entirely Christ is to have his Glory, and entirely He cannot have it if with a Partner; and there is no way to set Him up a Partner, but by Idolatry. When S. John had told us, that Christ is the true God, he immediately chargeth to keep ourselves from Idols. Me thinks this should stagger all those Romists, that have any respect to their conscience, least in their invocations they should make Saints and Angels, yea, even dead pictures, Corrivals with Christ. It is a vain help, to be told that they should not do so: It were a far better course to remove the picture, and so to prevent all danger. As Apelles when he had drawn a picture, would stand close behind the curtains, to listen how the passengers did censure it; and according as they found just faults, to amend them. I would to God our superstitious neighbors, the Papists, hearing our just censures of their Idols, Images, and pictures, would even make a clear riddance of them. It is not safe enough to charge those clients, that they never ascribe any honor to such dead representations, but for better security to cast them forever out of their devotions.

For ourselves, we are not free from idolatry: It is miserable to see, how Satan draws the world insensibly into this sin, which they profess to detest. Those that would rather hazard the furnace, than worship gold in a Statue; yet do adore it in the stamp, and find no fault with themselves. They that would not endure to worship the virgin Mary's image, though it were in gold: yet having Caesars image in gold, they fondly worship it. Facilius est Idola à Templis, quàm à cordibus separare. And what difference is there upon the matter, whether we worship the workmanship of the carver, or of the coiner? Whether the Painters pencill, or the Minters stamp, most take our hearts? The Papist worships it as it is hangd up in his chamber, the Worldling worships it as it is laid up in his coffer: both are evil, which is worse? If our hearts be drawn to an over-high respect of any creature, we are idolaters: and idolatry (we know) sets up a rivall with Christ: and if rivalls be admitted, how does he sit alone in the throne? how is the glory entirely his?

All the titles of God's Power have been attributed to potent men by their subjects, saving only his glory. As his Greatness, his Grace, his Highness, his Excellency, his Majesty, his Omnipotency, but never his Glory. To some we say, your Honor: to some, your Grace: to a Superior, your Highness: to a Prince, your excellency: to the King, your Majesty: and the parasiticall Jesuits flatter the Pope with his Omnipotency: but never hath it been said to any of them, your Glory: This no Prince hath taken, no sycophant hath given: As if God on purpose had preserved that style to himself, and not suffered any creature to usurp it: My Glory I will not give to another.

Let the application of this be brought home to our own hearts. Christ hath appropriated divine glory to himself, yet still we are catching at it: we silly and sinful worms will be proffering to pilfer it, they that Seek their own glory, will never seek Christ's. Whereas all should be referred to the honor of Christ, they will refer even his honor to themselves. There is no practice stirring, but such a man must be at the one end of it: and some line of it, how crooked soever, must be drawn to his Center. But Christ will take glory from no hands but the humble: like some mighty Prince, that looks for lowliness in his attendants, and will not be served but upon their knees. Our prayers are a part of Christ's glory, and our posture to present them in is kneeling. Haman was proud to his fellow-peeres, yet humble to Ahasuerus: but it must be an humble Mordecai, from whom Christ will accept glory. He accepted water from a Samaritan, and kisses from a Mary Magdalene: humble sinners do him more honor than proud Saints. There can be no greater folly, than the arrogation of glory to ourselves: what is it that we can glory in?

1. In our wealth, Dives sum? Saint Augustine answers him, Sarcinam tuam commemoras. Will any Ass praise his burden? Tace laudes tuas, & considera miseraciones. The safest time to praise a rich man, is when he is dead: Quando nec laudantem movet adulatio, nec laudatum tentat elatio. Dionysius fell from a tyrant over men, to be a tutor over boys, and so to get his living. Perses son and heir was fain to learn an occupation, the black smiths trade, to relieve his necessity. Henry the fourth, that victorious Emperor, after he had fought two and fifty pitched battles, became a petitioner for a prebend, to maintain him in his old age. Geliner, that potent king of the Vandales, was so low brought that he entreated his friend, to send him a harp a spung and a loaf of bread: a harp to consort with his misery, a sponge to dry up his tears, and a loaf to satisfy his hunger. Yet this is the wind that blows up the worlds bladder: wealth is the foundation of secular glory. Evagrius makes it the high praise of the Emperor Mauritius, that in the height of all his majesty, he retained his ancient piety. And Thucydides reports it for a strange thing in the men of Chius, that for all their prosperity they were sober. Scarce one of a thousand, Cui praesens faelicitas si arrisit, non irrisit. Be not these goodly things to glory in? Let the rich man tremble to hear of his own praises; Qui de praeterito meminit se habere quod doleat, & de futuro videt sibi superesse quod timeat. Honor God with thy substance: If thou takest this honor to thyself, thou playest the thief with thine own goods.

2. In our strength? Alas, it is vanity: Morbi ludibrium: a sorry fever will fillip down an Alexander. I know that much wrong is built on the presumption of power: Id in summa fortuna aequius, quod validius. Let them have might, and they have right enough. Sua retinere privatae domus: de alienis certare, regia laus est. They devour a man and his heritage. Quia in potestate manus. Would you have me be contented with mine own, says the oppressor? That is for peasants and base spirits: but to get that by force, which belongs to others, that is gentleman-like. You would have me use my servant well: O demens, ita servus homo est? Is my man a man? Is my tenant my neighbor? Is my neighbor my brother? Doth the Senate deny my master the Consul-ship? Hic ensis dabit, says Caesars soldier. Will not Nabaoth sell Ahab his vineyard for money? Iesabell will help him to it for nothing. A counterfeit hand, with Ahab's seal, shall do it. These men will have the law in their own hands: Nec leges metuunt, sed cedit viribus aequum: Maestaque victrici jura sub ense jacent: their right hand shall right them. They eat up God's people as bread: but it is not so soon digested, as eaten: in the end it will choke them. This nettles God, and makes him an enemy. For the oppression of the poor, I will rise, saith the Lord. And woe to thee that spoilest, for thou shalt be spoiled. Where will the mighty appear, when the Almighty comes to Judgment? They call to the rocks and mountains for shelter: and yet these were no babes, but great, rich, mighty men, no less than Captains and Kings. God takes pleasure to cast down the mighty: not out of envy to their greatness: alas, the greatest potentates be to him no more than the bigger size of worms. But this is the ground of his just quarrel: they rob him of his glory, and therefore shall taste of his fury. Men may be strong: as when Germanicus had besieged a town, one Pulio in his army, by throwing a stone at a battlement, and overturning it, with all the men upon it, so amazed them with his strength, that they gave up the town. It is reported of Marius, one of the 30. Tyrans, that he could turn over a laden waine with one of his fingers. Pliny writes of one Aristomenes, who in a battle, slew 300. Lacedemonians in one day. It was a song made of Aurelian the Emperor, Mille mille vivat, qui mille mille occidit. These were all famous men in their generations; yet their strength was but the strength of flesh, vincible at their best. The strongest man upon earth is but the push of a pike, or the clappe of a pistoll. Or if they escape these violences, an ague can make them as weak as water, age will shrink their nerves, and dry up their bloods, and consume their spirits: death is stronger than they all. Abimelech was killed by the hand of a woman: so was Pyrrhus. Totilas, that had vanquished Rome, which had vanquished the world, slain by Narses, a Semi-vir, an eunuch. It is recorded of Solomon, that having a great German brought prisoner to him, of very envy to the German nation, he caused him to be bound hand and foot, and then set his dwarfe upon him, like a child with a knife to hacke a tree in sunder; who with many courses and careers, at last dispatched him. Such is the mockery of puissance, when God will give it over into the hand of weakness. Take heed ye potentates, least whiles you boast of what you can do if you will, you provoke God to do what he can; to lay you, and your principality in the dust. Woe worth that mightynesse, which shall offer to rob Christ of his glory.

3. Of our wisdom? Alas, that is a foolish glory: there is no wisdom in it. Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom. As by way of concession, every greater includes the less: he that can lift a talent, can easily lift a pound: So by way of denial, every greater excludes the less: if nobles may not be let into thy counsel, much less groomes. Wisdom it self is debarred any corrivality with Christ, in matter of glory: what place then is there for strength, or riches? Wealth is not comparable to strength: wealth tolles in enemies; but strength can both repel them from entering, and expel them if they be entered. Riches will make the thief more venturous, but seldom do they make the true man more hardy. Therefore doth the Prophet exclude the better at first, that the worse might with less ado be removed. If the more excellent cannot be allowed this liberty, the inferior may not by any reason challenge it. Wealth comes not more short of strength, than strength does of wisdom. The poor wise man by his wisdom delivered the city; that was the wise Solomon's observation. Then said I, wisdom is better than strength: that was his conclusion upon it. Sertorius commanded to be brought forth two horses; the one fat and lusty, the other a spittle, a poor lean Iade; both of them to be broken. He picked out two of his soldiers, the one strong and hearty, the other weak and sickly: to his lean horse he puts the strong soldier, the weak soldier to the pampered horse. The strong man went roughly to work, and thought to do the feat with dead strength; but he both tired himself, and became a mockery to the beholders: the weaker fellow by his sleight and cunning, did the deed, and went away with the applause. Strength therefore cannot boast, where wisdom is denied: and where strength cannot prevail, riches hath no hope. The best wisdom is to give all glory to Christ. Pharaoh ascribed great wisdom to Joseph, but Joseph quickly takes it off from himself, and sends it away to the right owner; Absque me, Deus respondebit prospera Pharaoni. So Daniel to Nebuchadnezzar; There is a God in Heaven that revealeth secrets. He blesseth God for the knowledge he had, and so does not deny it; but he returns the praise to him that gave it. It is written of Saint Bernard, that having done many wonders in France, he did thus put off all glory from himself: I have learned in the Scripture, that signs are done Vel per fictos, vel per perfectos: Ego nec fictionis, nec perfectionis mihi conscius sum: Let them have a good opinion of me, but give all the praise to God. in that holy man, Vincebat sublimitatem nominis, humilitas cordis: Nec poterat universus mundus tantum eum erigere, quantum se ipse dejicere solus. Hypocrites labor to seem saints, not to be so; but the Holy labor to be, more than to seem Saints. The Kite may fly aloft, but her eye and mind is to the Earth: She seems to be a gallant Bird at her pitch, till she falls down upon a carrion. O how the dissembling Zealot makes a show to honor Christ with his lofty profession, as if he were altogether a man of Heaven: tarry but a little, throw the bait of glory in his way, and he will stoop to a carrion, and be taken with the pride of his own commendation. They say, there stands a Globe of the World at one end of a famous Library, and at the other end a Skeleton: We need not search long for a good lesson in this Library: for though a man were learned in all that he sees in the Map of this World, yet he must die, and so himself become a Map of mortality. Nothing a man hath wherein he can glory, but Christ will indict him for it, and that of a Sacrilegious felonie.

To conclude with some Use. All the Prophets and Fathers of the Primitive Church, used to cry out against those particular sins, wherewith their times were pestered: If I were to touch the sore of the daughter of this people; (we have many sores, from the crown of the head, to the sole of the foot) that which doth most rankle and apostemate, it should be this robbing of Christ of his Glory, by the proud affectation of our own. And if I should further insist upon it, my Argument and Text here would bear it well enough. It is an epidemical infection: Every Man will proclaim his own goodness. In a concourse of several companies in this or any other city, still they only that are called, appear and answer. If Stationers be called, none answer but Stationers: at the call of Mercers, Embroyderers do not stand up: nor if Goldsmiths be named, do Habberdashers present themselves. But to the Proclamation of, O all ye that are good and honest men, approach, we stand up every man of us, none disappears. We are all so proud, that we would be accounted such, though we are not so conscionable as to be such. But if we cloth ourselves with Christ's Glory, he will uncloth us of his favor, and then what will become of our honor? Suppose the King should set a Subject in his chair of State, give him royal attendants, and sumptuous cheare, but withal hang him a naked Sword over his head in a twine thread, with the point downwards: would that honor make him merry? Would he desire to be thus seated? Suppose that GOD should give thee this liberty, and suffer thee to ruffle it in the royal Robes of his Glory; Crown thy head with Rose buds, and wash thy paths with butter: or say unto thee, wrap thyself up in Purple and Scarlet, and fare deliciously every day: Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it with pleasures: Only, Faciem meam nunquam videbis, you shall never come at me, never see my Face; Would we think we had a good offer? Would we accept the condition? No, Lord, lift up the light of thy countenance upon us. Rather let my abode be a Prison, a Dungeon, a kind of Hell; but let the light of thy Countenance, O sweet Savior, shine in at some little cranny; and that shall make it a Palace, a Court, a very Heaven. Let our bread be the bread of affliction, and let our tears be our drink: but let the Light of thy Countenance shine upon us, and then our bread shall be transubstantiated into Manna, the food of Angels; and our Water be turned into Wine, our Tears congealed into Pearls, to enrich our Consciences with so many Heavenly joys. For all this felicity, he asks no more but his Glory. When Thales Milesius had imparted to another Philosopher some admirable discourse of Heaven, he freed his Scholar from all reward but this; That whensoever he divulged this secret; Tibi non ascripseris, sed me ejus repertorem praedicaveris. The invention it self he was willing to communicate unto others, but the honor of the invention he would keep to himself; Vbi mea legit, me agnosce. We have received all our Wisdom, Strength, Honor, and Wealth from Christ: he requires no more, but that we acknowledge the Author; Vbi meis uteris, me agnosce: Take thou the comfort of them, but give me the Glory. To do this, Summa ratio docet, & Christianos decet. Lord, the whole World is a great Book of thy mercy; every benefit is a lesson, and wheresoever we read it, we will give thee the Glory.

2. It must be entirely his, ex parte nostra. We owe both body and soul to His Glory for our Creation, and might have paid it: God did not set us up without a sufficient stock to do it. But we must needs be trading with the Serpent, for the commodity of forbidden Knowledge, and so take in sin for an Apprentice: and he cussened us of all, and so quite undid us. So that the Statute of Bankrupt was sued out against us, for our Creditor would not be compounded withal: and if we had been sold to our skins, we were not able to satisfy him. Non habuimus unde, no payment could be made. At last there was a rich and merciful Prince in Heaven, that took pity on us: He bought out our bondage, paid our debts with His own Blood, and once again did set us up with the wealthy stock of his own Righteousness. Thus are we re-enabled to pay him the debt of Glory: if we do not, we are worthy to perish: If we break once again, let us never look to be soaldred up. Our bodies and souls are his by a double right; therefore, in both let us glorify Him: In our souls, Bless the Lord O my Soul: With our bodies; giving up them a living sacrifice. With both entirely; the whole soul; I will praise the Lord with my whole heart: with the whole body, even all our members, not one left out, All that is within us. Quoad intra, and quoad extra too. With our hearts, with our lips, and with our hands. The lips without the heart, proves us Hypocrites: the heart without the lips proves us cowards: the heart and lips without the hand, proves us niggards. The heart is the leader, but what glory will there be without followers? Secrecie destroys the nature of glory, for it is quiddam conspicuum: Celata gloria non est gloria. Therefore the mouth is made to interpret the meaning of the heart: the lips are the Trumpet, but it is the heart that gives it breath, and makes it sound forth God's glory. The hands must come in with their part, or the song is marred: neither a thinking glory, nor a speaking glory, will please God without a working glory. The praise of God is thus bred, and borne, and brought up: Conceived in the heart, borne in the lips, and brought up with the hand. Paratum cor; there it is conceived. Parata lingua; there it is borne: Parata manus; there it is nursed and brought up. As good desires breed it, so good works feed it. If the young and tender grace of thankfulness, do not fall into the hands of uberous and fruitful obedience, it will languish and pine away, even to death: and we may say of it, that it was starved at nurse. It is too common for good resolutions, borne in our hearts, to die in our hands: And not seldom, the glory of Christ speeds so with us; we have our well wishes to it, but no works to nourish it: it dies in our hands. So that it is not enough to pray for honest hearts; Create in me a clean heart: nor for gracious lips, Open thou my lips: but also for working hands; Prosper thou the work of our hands. For we may say of too many, full of grace are their lips; but you see none of it in their lives. Let us consider them all apart, and mark whether, like courtiers in their several offices, they glorify God in their proper places.

1. The heart must begin this holy song. Bless the Lord from the ground of the heart: Make melody in your hearts to the Lord. Otherwise we shall but set forth his praises, as ignorant Papists say their Latin prayers; their hearts not knowing what their tongue utters. Sing ye praises with understanding. The heart bears the inner part, and if that be left out, it disgraceth the music. There may be parata cithara, and parata lingua, and parata manus, and paratum canticum: but if there be not Paratum Cor, no harmony. The heart is a little man within: therefore Peter calls it, the man of the heart. There is the hidden heart of a man, and the hidden man of the heart. The former is so hidden, that it cannot be seen: the other will be seen, though it be hidden. The heart lies close in the body, there is no window into it. It may profess holiness, and be believed, because it cannot be discerned: but the man that is the Master of his own heart, will make demonstration of his integrity, by good actions. The heart of man is deceitful, but the man of the heart scorns to dissemble. It is not Cor hominis, but homo cordis, that does the deed, in giving Christ his glory. Indeed, grace is the heart of the heart: and a heart without grace is no better than a man without a heart. Nature hath given us an heart, but grace gives a heart to that heart, which makes it a heart indeed. It is Cor cordis, and animae anima. Therefore Sursum cordae; that is ever the cliffe, or first note in the song of praise. My soul doth magnify the Lord: the soul ever leads. The tongue is not enough, that organ would sound but harshly, unless the affection of the soul do give it breath, and the understanding of the soul keep it in tune. They honor God with their lips, but their heart is far from him: but-no heart, no harmony. The lips, hands, and feet may be in motion: but if the heart be not amongst them, to regulate their motion, there will be nothing but discord and confusion. Let a deaf stranger, who never saw that sportive exercise before, pass by men as they are a dancing; and because, he hears none of their music, he will think them mad. When Christ hears us talking of him, or spending our discourse upon his creatures, without a heart desirous of his glory, he knows us for mere hypocrites. The Virgins that press to the wedding, and leave the bride behind them, shall never be welcome to the Bridegroom: Vbi sponsa mea? will be his first question. If the bride of Christ, our heart or soul be absent in his solemn services, there is no entertainment for us. Devotion that hath not deeper root than the lips, is like that unprosperous corn sown in the high ways. Diverse great warriors, dying in foreign countries, have yet sent their hearts home to be buried: Let us send our hearts up into heaven, whatsoever becomes of our bodies.

2. The tongue follows with her part; the only vocal Instrument in the consort of man. The heart is primum mobile, and that sets this wheel a going. I believed, and therefore I spake: if the heart believes, presently the tongue confesses. My heart is inditing of a good matter, my tongue is the pen of a ready writer. To sing the praises of the heavenly king, is a good matter indeed: the ditty is honorable: no sooner can the heart prick the notes, than the tongue is ready to sing them. It can sing at first sight, yea it can sing by heart. The heart is the most noble part, but not the most able part of man: it hath an affective, not an effective power. Yet as a king, whose bodily constitution is but weak, can move great armies by his authority: so the heart hath command over the strongest members of the body. And as a king cannot subsist, but by his subjects: so nor can the heart do anything, but by those instruments. The heart then hath need of the tongue for an Interpreter: loose that colt, and let it go for the Lord hath need of it: but let it not go without a bridle. God will not hear the tongue, but by the heart: as man cannot hear the heart, but by the tongue. The praises of Christ conceived in the heart, without the utterance of the tongue, are still-borne; they never live to speak. Why is our tongue called our Glory, but for the setting forth of God's glory? It doth not service enough by calling upon God in our private prayers: Open thou my lips and my mouth shall show forth thy praise: He hath not opened our lips, that our mouth might show Him his praise, but that it might show forth his praise. Solitude is not much better than a grave: Lord, in the grave no man shall praise thee: and in a wall, in an Hermitage, in a separation from all society, no man shall hear us praise thee. What holy use is there of our tongues, but to confess our sins, to inform our brethren, and in all to praise our Maker? But there is a dumb Devil that possesseth the world, and stops the mouths of men from those useful and necessary services. It is no small honor, whereof that malicious Spirit shall rob his Maker, if he can close up the mouth of his only rational and vocal Creature: and turn the best of his workmanship into a dumb Idol, that hath a mouth and speaks not.

Praise is not more necessary than complaint; praise of God, than complaint of ourselves: yea, in complaining of ourselves, we do no less than give praise to God. There needed no other evidence against Achan, when God had accused him: yet as the sin was hatched in his heart, so Joshua will have it out of his mouth: Give Glory to God. As his honor is blemished by our sin, so the humble confession of our sin makes to his Glory. The only amends we can make to God, when we have not had the grace to avoid sin, is to confess the sin we have not avoided. I am merciful, saith the Lord: Only acknowledge thine iniquity: as if He asked no more. This is the sponge that wipes out all the blurs of our lives. If we confess, He is faithful to forgive. There is no way to purge the sick soul, but upwards; by casting up the vicious humors wherewith it is clogged. Therefore the Devil strives to hold the lips close, that the soul may not disburden it self by confession. We have a tongue for God, when we praise his Name; a tongue for ourselves, when we pray and confess our sins: a tongue for our brethren, when we inform them in the truth. To fail in these duties, is to yield to the dumb Devil. Where do we not find that accursed Spirit? He is in the conversation of men, when the tongue belies the heart, flatters the guilty, and forbears reproofes even in the foulest crimes. When the partial Judge determines not for truth and innocence, that dumb Devil is on the bench. When the Preacher shall humor the times, and adulterate the message of God, that dumb Devil is in the Pulpit. When the irreligious Iuror dares lend an oath to fear, to hope, to gain, he is at the Barre. When the consciencelesse Chapman shall for his penny, sell his truth and his soul, he is in the market. Where is the Glory of Christ all this while? In that we are dumb: but take us to anything else, and we have wind at will, and tongue enough. Christ opened his mouth for us, Father forgive them: yea, He opened his side for us, his very blood did speak, Father forgive them: and shall we be dumb in his praise? It is an easy labor to speak: for ourselves we can talk fast enough: and are we tongue-tied when it comes to the point of Christ's Glory? No, My lips shall rejoice when I sing of thee, my tongue shall talk of thy righteousness all the day long.

3. The hand must not be left out; in our words men hear his Glory, but in our good works they see it. Then doth our Light shine indeed, when Men see our good works, and thereby glorify our heavenly Father. This is a full evidence: all the Sermons of Christ did not move the people so much, as his miraculous works. Healing diseases, ejecting devils, over-ruling elements, raising the dead; these works convinced them, and they went away glorifying God: We never saw it on this fashion. And when He forbids us the doing of such works to be seen of men; Non prohibet videri, ut Deus laudetur; sed videri, ut nos laudemur; as Saint Augustine expounds it. And as our lips must not be labra muta, so nor our works opera mutila; lame and defective. Shall I accept this of your hand, saith the Lord. The best testimony that can be given to Christ, is our holy conversation. Inutilis & mortuus aequiparantur injure: Our hands are counted dead in Law, because they give nothing. If we do not glorify Christ in our actions, men will never believe our words. Such men are like dissolute Choristers, that sing Gloria Patri in the Queere, but chant Carmina Bacchi in the Tavern. Let us do something to his Glory, yea, Do all things to his Glory. Defend we the honor of Christ, not only with our speeches; (though they may not be left out, like parentheses) but with our goods, with our bloods, when just occasion calls for them. Thus did the Matyrs give Him Glory, by dying for the witness of his Gospel. Potius quàm Christus perderet gloriam, Christianus perdidit vitam. This makes his praise beautiful; white and red, and in both most lovely: White, In innocentia viventium; and Red, in sanguine morientium. If a blow be coming, the arm naturally lifts up it self to receive it, and to defend the head, whereof it is a member. What injury soever is meant to our Head, the Lord Jesus, if we be Christians, we strive to intercept it; and had rather be wounded to death, than the least finger of his honor should be scratched.

Yes, we all pretend a forwardness to this interposition; and say, we would rather lose our life, than the least part of our glory. This is a good saying, but all this while where is the doing? Let us hear the bells of Aaron strike on both sides; with a holy profession, which is one stroke, that other stroke of a holy conversation. As we have commonly seen upon those bells that hang out for signs; upon the one side is written, Fear God: on the other, Honor the King. Whiles we only say, we fear God, and glorify Christ, all this while the bell doth but toule, it strikes but on one side; But when we come to honor the King, to do good to all men, which is the practice and exercise of holy works, then the bell rings out to God's glory, it sounds forth his praises on every side. It is true that our well doing extends not to God: not immediately, but mediately it does, or at least he so takes it. What you have done to these little ones, you have done to me. If we defend not his Church, how do we glorify him? They mean small honor to the Head, that do not their best to save the Body. We have and enjoy plentiful blessings: blessed be his Name that gives them to us: But let us eat our sweet Passover with sour herbs, and be mindful of the affliction of Joseph. Some tribes of the Lord's Israel do not fare so well: shall we do nothing for them, for Christ in them? If Herod was so taken with Herodias dancing, that he promised her a boone to the one half of his kingdom. Shall not we be moved with Rachel weeping, weeping for her children because they are not; and they are not, because bloody Herod hath taken them away? Can we see the Churches tears, and not do our utmost endeavors to comfort her? Ephorus an Historian, and scholar to Isocrates, had no remarkable thing to write of his country, and yet was willing to insert the name of it in his History: and therefore brings it in with a cold parenthesis: Athens did this famous thing and Sparta did that; and at that time my countrymen, the Cumins did nothing. God forbid that England should be so recorded in the Ecclesiastical History, as to have her name put in with a blank: Such a Church did thus nobly, and such a Church suffered thus pitifully; and at that time my countrymen of England did nothing. I think it would be no more honor for us, so to be put into the Chronicle, than it was for Pilate to have his name mentioned in the Creed. To be more particular; we abound with riches, our brethren are necessitous: we feast upon delicates, they want bread: we are strong and healthy, they feeble and sickly: yet we are so far from relieving them with charitable deeds, that we scarce vouchsafe them our hearty prayers. Think of it thou rich churl, from whose iron hands no persuasion can skrew a poor alms: if thou wilt not be moved with the compassion of thine own bowels, yet vouchsafe to learn charity by fair examples. There be not only walls upon Earth, but a book in Heaven, wherein the names of pious benefactors are written. Wouldest thou not be glad at the last day, to find thine own name there? Such a man did so much, and such a man gave so much, for the glory of Christ and succor of poor Christians: and at that time thou didst nothing, thou gavest nothing. Something thou hast done to the grief of others, nothing to their comfort: So nothing shalt thou receive to thy comfort, enough to thy everlasting sorrow.

To conclude; let us sacrifice all we have, all we are, to the glory of Christ. If our lives be not called for, yet our goods may: if we have no goods to give, yet our hearts and lips we have, the poorest among us may give praises to God. And the more he spares us in our blood and estates, the more our tongues are obliged to thankfulness. When tribute was to be paid to Caesar, and Christ himself was to pay it; rather than fail, the fish shall bring it in his mouth. There is not a fish that swims in our waters so dumb, not a beggar amongst us so poor but he hath gold in his mouth to pay this tribute: to give praise and Glory to Jesus Christ. Gratitude can give eloquence, even where nature hath commanded silence: They are more mute than fishes, that do not pay this tribute of thankfulness. Bee we never so rich, we are still begging for more comforts: Blessings we receive, but what blessings do we restore? God looks to be blessed of us, as well as we look to be blessed of God. One of Philip's soldiers, being courteously and plenteously entertained by his Host, where for a good space he was billeted, did yet at his going away beg some of his Hosts lands: but king Philip branded him with Ingratus hospes; he set that mark on his forehead. If we be still praying for new favors, without praising God for the old, we deserve to be branded with the ignominious title of unthankful Clients. Indeed God would have us pray, he commands us to pray, he teaches us to pray, he holds himself honored by our prayers, he grants the blessings for which we pray: but withal, he would have us pay still as we take up; and clear the old skore, before we run farther in debt. In a word, he looks that we should pay him the rent of thanks, for all his favors to us in Jesus Christ.

Quando, when must this Glory be rendered? Nunc, Now, without any delay. All time is God's: Antiquus dierum: though some be more specially his, as the Sabbath is called Dies Domini. The day is thine, and the night is thine: therefore at all times we are bound to praise him: If we can find a time, which is not God's own propriety, we may take that time wherein to give him no Glory. Every work hath the own season; only God's work requires every season: especially this work of praising his Name. Some actions of God's service may vary according to their occasions: when he frowns upon us, that is a time of mourning; when he smiles, then our hearts are set a dancing. Their is a time to get, and a time to lose; a time to get his favor; and alas, there may be a time to lose it. There is a time to rent our hearts with repentance, and a time to sew them up again with faithful assurance. These acts have their several times: but for the promulgation of God's glory, no time is excluded. There is a time to keep it, but no time to cast it away: a time to speak, but no time to keep silence. What, not in adverse fortunes? when the hand of God hath undone us, by losses on sea or land; when he hurles us down from a rich state to beggary; shall we then praise him? then give him glory? Yes, Job did so; Blessed be his name, not only for giving, but even for taking away. I confess, this is a hard task put upon flesh and blood; to be smitten, and yet to bless; to give thanks for misery. Job's wife could hardly be got to do so, though she dwelt in a family where religion was so truly observed by morning and evening sacrifice, and by a constant devotion: yet her husbands extreme calamity made her so far forget herself, as to say to him, Doest thou still retain thine integrity? Curse God and die. To curse God, was the way to die indeed, even to be stoned to death; and to end all his miseries with a worse beginning. I know there are some so favorable interpreters of her weakness, that they would fain excuse her; and that from the doubtful acception of the word, which signifies to bless, as well as to curse: Bless God and die; pray for thy dissolution, and cessation of this trouble. But why then does Job reply; Loqueris vt stulta calling her fool for her counsel? Yes, for even that was a foolish advice: though a Cupio dissolvi, only to be with Christ, be a good desire: yet wearynesse under the cross is base and degenerate cowardice, far from the valor of a Christian. They allege farther, that if Satan had power to destroy all that Job had, his goods, his servants, his children, why not also his wife? They answer that she was out of his commission: Only upon himself put not forth thy hand: only himself was exempted, and his wife was himself: una caro. Besides, of her body were the other seven sons and three daughters begotten; for we do not read that Job had a second wife. And lastly, when Job offered sacrifice, to expiate the sins of his friends, he offered none for his wife: therefore in all likelihood she was holy. Yet against all this it might be said, that she was una caro with him, not unus spiritus: many a religious husband is knitte to an ungodly wife: And it is the opinion of the Fathers, that the Devil spared her, on purpose to vex him: what tempter could he find more fit, than her that lay in his bosom? Nor did her speech a little trouble him: for during all his trial, not one other so hasty a word dropt from him, as to call anybody fool. Besides, which strikes it home, she expostulates with him about his integrity: as if she took it ill that he took it no worse: his patience made her impatient. O how rare a grace is it in men, to bless God for their crosses, to kiss the hand that strikes them? Behold this evil is of the Lord, says that mad-braind king of Israel, What should I wait for the Lord any longer? We are soon weary of our attendance: we can wait at the gates of the Divine bounty, so long as we feel benefits a coming, like insatiate beggars for more alms: but if we be corrected for our unrulinesse, then why should we wait on the Lord any longer? This evil is of the Lord: this evil, this one evil: None of his mercies or good turns are thought on, but this one evil sticks in our stomachs. In unthankful hearts, one of God's afflictions mars the glory of all his blessings. Now therefore we must praise him: now, even in the time of our adversity: For shall we receive good things of God, and not evil? Nullum tempus occurit Regi: none must prevent Christ of his right, which is his glory.

We have three considerations here: or this Nunc may be considered in three relations: By way of Position, by way of Opposition, and by way of Composition. First, Positively, in the right and true nature of it: what it signifies in it self. Secondly, Oppositively, as it is opposed to that external duration after this world, when time shall be no more. Now, and forever: this short Now, compared with that long For ever. Thirdly, Compositively, as it respects all times, and all occasions: every opportunity is a Nunc, and this Nunc is nothing else but opportunity.

1. All the term we have in this world, is but a Nunc: that which was in the morning, is past: what may be in the evening, is not yet come: the former may be already lost, and the future we are not sure of; we can only make much of our Nunc. The time past is irrecoverable, the future to us is contingent, and the very Nunc is slippery and transient: And yet this is all the term we have: we must enjoy this or nothing. Aut nunc, aut nunquam, is a frequent offer. To call back the the elapsed time, is a foolish imagination: to bid the Sun, when it is full South, to go back to the East; or when it is noon, to make it but the third hour of the day: who would attempt this but a mad man? And as we cannot revocare praeteritum, so nor accelerare futurum: we have planted trees, but we must stay for the fruit until the Season comes. When it is ripened of it self, we may reach out our hand, and gather it before it fall off: but we cannot hasten the ripening of it: we cannot make the Winter-fruit mellow in June. In the curing of a Fever, till there be some concoction of the disease, the Physicians themselves must be Patients. Any disorder of the Patient, any pretermission of the Physician, may exalt the disease, and increase the violences of it: no diligence can hasten the maturity; they must all tarry the season. And why should we look for that in a disease, which is the disorder, the irregularity, and rebellion of the body, which we cannot find in nature it self? It were scarce a disease, if it could be ordered, and made obedient to our times. The great Lady, in matter of childebirth, cannot put off her ninth month to a tenth; nor hasten it to a sixth, without bearing an abortive issue. Men in authority will not be put to change their seasons: we must take them in their Nunc, or fail of our purpose. We cannot look for this indulgence in time: there is an opportunity, which is the Nunc of time: let slip that, and time will not be at our beck. O that such and such sins were to do again; we then would never admit them: this is Vox lugentium in infernis. O that the time of doing such and such things were come: this is Vox insipientium in terris. O that I were made a Judge in the land: What an excellent Judge would Absalom be? But when by offering violence to time, he had skrew'd out a Nunc for his affected Magistracy, he proved an unnatural Traitor. Take therefore thy Nunc, the opportunity that God sends thee: use it, and be thankful.

The Scripture is very liberal, when it calls our life a day: for in the day there be twelve hours, saith our Savior. It is too much to call it an hour, which is but the twelfth part of a day; for in the hour there be sixty minutes: Nay, call it a minute, the sixtieth part of an hour. Minutum is little, yet not little enough: we must come to Punctum, and take that for all the certainty of our allowance: we can be sure of no more than our very Nunc. I will bless the Lord while I live: and no certain tenure of life more than for a Nunc. The wicked are brought into desolation as in a moment: In momento, let that be our Memento: within the compass of a Nunc, we may be gone. That samedies salutis is called but a Nunc: the day of salvation may be longer to the world, no particular man can challenge more than his Nunc. When was the longest Nunc in the world? In the days of Joshua, when the Sun stood still in Gibeon. Why was this extension of time? Why this stoppage in the wheels of nature, as if the plummet had been down? It was for that purpose, for which our Nunc is here given us, that God might have the Glory. Israel was then in pursuit of their enemies; it was the time of execution: they cut them off with the sword, God with hailestones. Had Joshua only respected the slaughter; he knew that God's Ordinance from Heaven could have done that sufficiently: the Sun needed not stand still to direct the shot. God can as well hit as shoot; kill, as hit. But that all Nations might know, that the same hand commands in Earth, in the Clouds, in Heaven; the Sun and Moon shall stand still in Heaven, while volleys of shot play upon them from the Clouds. The whole Earth could not see that Cloude of hail, which because of the heavy burden flew but low: all the Earth might see the Sun and Moon. All the world must needs be witnesses of that, which the eye of the world stood still to see. Who would not inquire the reason why the Sun rested from motion? Or what wonderful business was in hand, that he stayed his course to behold it? All was for the glory of God: he never had got himself so much honor among those Heathen by one days work, as he did by that, when the Sun and Moon suspended their courses, to become spectators. That was a long Nunc indeed; never any like it. A Nunc of twelve hours long, for so it appeared to be; because the Sun which is the measure of Time, stood still about a whole day. We cannot look for such a favor, to have our Nunc stretched out to twelve hours; that the Sun should stand still in Heaven, while we are killing up our enemies, and by the sword of repentance doing execution upon our sins. But Now, while the word is sounding, let us fall a repenting: and at every Nunc, upon every occasion, let us give glory to Christ.

This easily solves that riddle; what is the longest, and the shortest? the oldest, and the youngest thing in the world? Time: It is the longest, for it reacheth from the beginning of the world to the end: the shortest for it is but a Nunc; gone in the turning of a hand, in the twinkling of an eye: it lasts but for a moment. The oldest thing, for it is just as old as the Creation, as the beginning of the world: it is five days older than man. As Time is the register of all things below, so the world is the register of time: it was borne on the first day, the first moment of the first morning; older than the Sun and Stars, Death is grown a very old man, though he hath yet strength enough to kill: sin is older than death, man is older than sin, time is older than man. Yet still is time the youngest thing: it is borne, and dies within the compass of a Nunc. It makes all things aged, yet is it self never above a minute old. That which was heretofore is not: that which shall be hereafter, is not: that which is, was not heretofore, nor shall be hereafter. We stand by a river: the present water that is now passing by, was never there before, nor shall it ever return again. Nunc is all we have; this only is our certain tenure.

2. In respect of opposition to forever: Now let us glorify Christ, as we hope to do it forever. For this we pray; that his will may be done in Earth now as it is in Heaven forever. His Will is his Glory; and must have the nunc temporis here, as it hath the Diem aeternitatis there. Punctum may be something ad lineam, because continued points make a line: Nunc may be something ad diem; though there be many Nunc's in a minute, and many minutes in an hour, and twelve hours in one day: yet still there is a proportion between Now and Day; because Nunc is a part of the whole. Points enough will make up a line; and store of Nunc's will run out to a full days length: But there is no proportion between time and eternity: for eternity is not a duration of time, not an extension of time, nor can time be any part of eternity. Now therefore we must glorify him, or not forever: here below, or not there above. Nay, if we do not glorify him, Nunc, in aeterno nostro: he will not glorify us Tunc, in aeterno suo. Our surest course is to do it now, whilst we may: lest we unhappily wish that we had done it, when we may not. We acknowledge in our prayer, Thine is the Kingdom: that it is a powerful kingdom, for Thine is the Power: that it is a glorious kingdom, for Thine is the glory: that it is an everlasting kingdom, For ever and ever. God, as he is three Persons, hath three Kingdoms. There is Regnum potentiae, the kingdom of power and providence: and this we attribute to the Father. There is Regnum gloriae, the kingdom of peace in Heaven: and this we attribute to the Son, and to his purchase: Come ye blessed, inherit the Kingdom: He gives it. Between them two, there is Regnum gratiae, the kingdom of grace, which we attribute to the Holy Ghost: Because he takes them, whom the King of Power hath preserved, and the King of Glory hath redeemed; and brings them along through the Kingdom of Grace to the Kingdom of Glory. The two former Kingdoms, of Power and of Grace, are in this World; but neither of them is of this World, because they both refer to the Kingdom of Glory. The Kingdom of the Father, which is the Providence of God, doth preserve us. The Kingdom of the Holy Ghost, which is the Grace of God, doth sanctify us. And the Kingdom of the Son, which is the Glory of God, doth crown us. Power and Grace are exercised on Earth, Glory is exhibited in Heaven. Though to the Saints, this World be the way to their Kingdom; yet their Kingdom is not of this World. My Kingdom is not of this World, saith the King of all: if not his, much less ours. In two of these Kingdoms we have our Nunc: For ever, belongs to the Kingdom of Glory. All the Kings in Heaven shall glorify Christ forever there: we that hope for that Kingdom, must do it in our Nunc here. The Gospel is our Nunc; and this (we know) is called a Kingdom, the very Kingdom of Heaven. First, Because it revealeth a Kingdom; discovers a Kingdom before it be utterly unknown to the World. Secondly, Because it prepares us for a Kingdom: for only grace can make us fit for glory. Thirdly, because it promiseth a Kingdom, and makes good that Promise. Fourthly, Because it rules us as a Kingdom, subduing our wills and affections to the obedience of Christ. Our Nunc lies in this Kingdom, during the reign of the Gospel. As Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius, and of Cyrus the Persian: so let our goodness prosper under the reign of both these Kingdoms: of God the Father, over us in his Providence, and of God the Holy Ghost, over us in his Grace; that so God the Son may advance us to his glory. Out of this flower Nunc, we may suck a double sweetness; both encouragement, and instruction.

1. For our Encouragement, it is but a short time that we have to serve: our apprenticeship will soon run out. They that mind their work, and ply their business with delight, never think the time long; as Jacob's service of seven years, for Rachel seemed but a few days. O God, our age is nothing unto thee: and if we be men after David's heart, as he was a man after God's heart, our sixty years spent in his service, is but like a Saint Lucies day; nay, but as a pleasant dream when one awaketh; a very Nunc, the next degree to nothing. A hackney jade, that knows the shortness of his journey, will scour it away. The hope of a reward in the evening, and rest at night, will make a hireling accomplish his day: How base are we, if we go groaning under our Nunc, and cannot carry our burden one stride? Yet a little while, and he will not tarry. A very little while indeed: we cannot imagine a less space in time, than a Nunc: as we cannot find a less place in the mathematickes, than a point: Put them together, and it is but Punctum temporis. Two things show time to be exceeding precious. First, Because they that have lost time, that are swallowed up into the eternity of hell, had rather be owners of one Nunc, of one moment to repent in, than to be Lord's of the whole world. Secondly, Because a very Nunc made use of, a short time employed in the work of salvation, shall gain us an everlasting kingdom. In the doing of evil, Breve est quod delectat, aeternum quod cruciat: But in the doing of good, breve est quod laborat, aeternum quod coronat. The husbandman lies to all the year, for one short harvest: Eleven months labor, for one months profit; and yet that hoped for profit may miscarry too: either by ill weather abroad, or by vermin in the barn. God hath set us but one months task, for a whole years harvest: Nay, the labor lasts but for a Nunc, the fruit forever. And it is such fruit as cannot miscarry; joy and glory laid up for us in heaven. Therefore hath he made our life of labor so short, and our life of rest so long; that we might not grudge to work out our Nunc, for that reward of peace whereof there is no end. I will run the way of thy commandments, saith holy David It were folly to ask him why he makes such hast, when we know he would fain be at home.

2. For our Instruction: so must we glorify Christ Nunc in our militant estate, as we desire to do in aeternum, in our triumphant estate. The draught and abridgment of heaven is in every sanctified heart upon earth: As it is said of the good Prince, that he carries the pattern of his governing the people always about him; and so rules himself, as he would have them ruled by him: So the Christian hath ever the pattern of heaven in his conscience, and so lives here, as the Saints do there. It is true that the glory of heaven is not visible to mortal eyes: Eye hath not seen: yet a man may have the map of a city which he never saw. All Homers Iliades have been drawn into a small volume: we have seen the counterfeit, the image of a king in a little tablet. When a pitched field is to be painted or printed, with in the compass of a sheet of paper, but a few soldiers can be presented entire; not many stations or postures whole and complete: but the greater number appear to us only by their heads or helmets; and the several troupes or companies by their colors. Yet by this portraiture we may guess at the battle, and conceive the module or platform of it in our imaginations. So though heaven be too immense to be measured by an human line, and none but the Angel with his golden reed can mete out the new Jerusalem: Yet the just man hath the compendium of it in his breast: the holiness and peace of his soul is a brief of it: and his sounding forth of God's praises here, is an Echo of the music above. As the joy or triumph for the kings coronation begins at the Court, and from thence spreads into the country: so the hymns of praise harmoniously sung to Christ in heaven, have a reverberation upon earth. S^t. Paul tells us, that the foundation of that high building is laid here below: if no holiness here, no blessedness there. Let us never look for a house above the stars, if we do not feel the groundworke of it in our own hearts. It is a vain fancy, to expect a house without a foundation. The heir apparent of a kingdom, during his minority, may be brought up in a foreign country: yet even there, he may have the figure of his kingdom in his hand, and the copy of it in his heart. Who doth not pretend to the kingdom of heaven? Many a one that wants his pattern. Presumptuous hypocrite, doest thou lay title to a kingdom, whereof thou hast no form? What royal blood runs in thy veins? What grace and holiness is in they heart? Where be those noble actions that become a Prince? There is fullness of joy above: is thy laughing and singing in a taverne the pattern of it? There is honor and glory above: is thy covetous and base drudgery, to scrape together the mucke of worldly riches which should rather be spread abroad to dung the land; is this any pattern of it. There is music and harmony above: be thy wanton sonnets and drunken catches any patterns of it?

There is peace and rest above: is thine idle security and slepy neglect, any pattern of it? There is beauty and claritie above: is they piecing up the defects of nature with art, the laying of vermilion upon dust, or dressing up of mortal limbs in rich and curious attires; any Image of it? There is light above: be thy works of darkness any reflection of it? Will a man draw the Sun with a coal? There is perfect obedience above: is thy rebellion any module of it? There is pure innocence above: be thy rapes and rapines, thy rage and bloodiness, any resemblance of it? The language above, is the praises of Christ: be thy oaths, curses, and blasphemies, of a like sound to it? These sins be rather the Image of hell, than of heaven. Shall we like those Sun-burnt pagans, that painted the Angels black, in favor of their own complexion? Shall we measure the joys of heaven by our own corrupt and sensual pleasures upon earth? Or think that the Saints there stand affected, as we do here? This were to measure things that be unmeasurable, by things that be measurable, by things that be miserable. This were for heaven to take a pattern from us, not we to take a pattern from heaven, and to imagine the Saints (though in a higher degree) to be of like disposition with us; not we striving to be of like disposition with them. Will the covetous ask, what money there is in heaven? The purchaser, what land there is to be sold in heaven? The voluptuous, what dainties there be in heaven? Or the ambitious, what place he may get in the court of heaven? These be base and brutish thoughts. The module of heaven is within a man's heart: it is not meat and drink, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the holy Ghost. There is nothing that I can think of upon earth, that bears any resemblance of heaven; but Peace: there is no war in heaven: and Music; there is an everlastingness of that in heaven. Holynes, obedience, joy, peace, centred in the praise and glory of Christ; this is the pattern and picture of heaven. This if we have in our Nunc of grace, it shall make us blessed in the For ever of glory.

3. In respect of Composition: for Now, like the eye of a well drawn picture, looks upon all times, upon all occasions. There is no action but challengeth a Nunc: no accident but hath the Nunc. Now such a thing is done: now such an event happened. The good tree brings forth fruit Tempore suo, in her season; that is the Nunc of it. My hour is not yet come: Christ himself tarries for his Nunc. Presently after, he changed the water into wine; then his Nunc came. Tempus à temperando; because it distinguisheth things in order. To everything there is a season. It is taken both strictly, and more at large: in the one sense, it is filia unius momenti: in the other, Soror totius vitae. And thus must it be understood here: let us be giving glory to Christ

Now; that is, all our life long. So Dies mortalitatis it opposed to Dies aeternitatis, Now, in this life; that For ever, in the life to come. Now therefore, is in effect, Always: we have no time, which cannot be called Nunc. When we are young, that is our Nunc: when we are old; that is also our Nunc: the age betwixt these, is our Nunc too. David took in all times and seasons to the praise of his Maker. In the morning; I will sing of thy mercy in the morning: yea he prevented the morning; waiting for the Lord, more than they that watch for the morning. In the night: at midnight I will rise to give thanks unto thee. All the day; My tongue shall talk of thy righteousness all the day long. Seven times a day do I praise thee; very frequently. I will bless the Lord at all times, his praise shall continually be in my mouth. Omni tempore, no hour excluded: Semper laus ejus in ore meo, no occasion excepted. I will sing praise unto thy Name forever, This is the end of our redemption, to serve him all the days of our life: If all our days, then our days of sadness too: daily shall he be praised. It is usual, when God crowneth the year with his goodness, and drops fatness upon the pastures, for the little hills to rejoice on every side: therefore is great joy compared to the joy of harvest. But when God restrains these heavenly influences, then the little hills droope on every side: no fatness, no more rejoicing then. There be too many, that never think of God till dinner time; that they are put in mind of it by the Chaplains saying grace: and it is somewhat if they mind him then. These are far from David's per totum diem: From the rising of the Sun to the going down of the same, the Lord's Name is to be praised. But what if they should want a dinner, and know not where to get it? Not so much food, as would keep life and soul together? How would they praise him then? But for a Nunc dare, where would be the Nunc laudare? Such irreligious souls know not how to bless the Lord fasting: No devotion with them, but upon a full stomach. Like to those baser instruments, they can yield no music till you have filled their paunches and even then, the sound that comes from them, is harsh to all holy ears. Divites laudantes you have store: but show me a miserum laudantem. For a Dominus dedit, you have a world of Benedicite's: but one Benedicite for a Dominus abstulit is worth them all.

The Lord looks for Glory, not only in fair weather, but even in storms and tempests: not only in high fortunes, but even out of the dust he ordaineth praises. The worldling cast upon his sick bed, and hopeless of remedy, asks what he should praise God for? O ungrateful wretch, how innumerable be the blessings he hath received of him; and yet does he ask for what he should praise him? That he hath life, and the use of reason, is a blessing. How justly might God have bereaved his body of a soul, his soul of understanding, his understanding of all possibility of comfort? That he hath space to repent, a tongue and time to call upon God for mercy, is a blessing and far more than God owes him. There be natural medicines for his body: that is a blessing: there is spiritual physic for his soul; a rich blessing. Besides all the former blessings, these he hath in present. As Christ once said to the Jews, For which of my good works do you stone me? So now, for which of my good blessings do you despise me? If he should give us no more, yet reason would make us thankful for what we have received. But to see him give, that does not for the present receive: one that will plead Christ's cause without a fee: one that can say with Job, Though he kill me, I will trust in him: or with those three Saints, Though the fire consume us, we will serve him: whatsoever good I want, whatsoever evil I suffer, I will ever give Glory to the Lord: here is the heart and voice of a Saint. Thus every condition, rich or poor: every state, whether of health or sickness: every place, at home or abroad: every time, prosperous or adverse: every temper, of joy or sorrow: every occasion, of peace or war: every access, of friend or foe: every event, of life or death, is our Nunc to celebrate the glory of Christ. This circumstance further affords us three Instructions.

1. Glorify him for the present; that is thy Nunc. Delay is not only Periculum, but Peccatum. As we have opportunity, let us do good to all men, Perhaps that is not a man's will, which is his Testament: he would keep that by his will, which he is fain to give away by his testament. We read of one man that did Cunctando restituere rem: it was but unus homo, very rare: Thousands for that one, do Cunctando perdere rem, and that a Rem so precious, that the whole world is not worth it. He that makes hast to be rich, shall not be innocent: but he that makes hast to be innocent shall be rich: in the favor and blessings of God. When I read that Christianity is compared to a race, how can I but wonder at them that sit still? He that hath a long journey to go, and but a short time allowed him; cannot well stay to take every acquaintance that he meets, by the hand. He that believeth, will not make hast: not hast to mend the pace of God's purposes: but he that believeth, will make hast to set forth God's praised. We are discontented if God defers the grant of our prayers: and will he be pleased when we put off the publication of his praises? Shall we say, we will bless God tomorrow, for what he gives us today, and think that time enough? Things are acceptable, when they be seasonable. Is this all thy succors to the poor beggar, came again tomorrow? Alas, his body may die for want of meat, and thy soul may die for want of mercy, before the morrow. Miserum in miseris mora. Christ condemns the Judge that was long ere he did Justice, though he did it.

If God's favors were only mere futurities, natural men would cry; we will thank him for them when we have them: As they tarry for his blessings, so he should tarry for their praises. But that the mouth of all wickedness might be stopped, they are enriched with his present benefits, to incite their present thankfulness. Vbique decurrit beneficium, vbique recurrat vox laudum: Let the same place that is witness of his mercies, be also witness of our thankfulness. My soul doth magnify the Lord: it is Magnificat, in the present: not Magnificabit, in the future. Minus ex crastino pendet, qui hodierno manum injicit. Be sure to do that good today, which thou art not sure to do tomorrow. They that received the word, were the same day added to the Church: the same day. Zacchaeus made hast to receive Christ: the same hour. Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace: the same moment, that was Simeons Nunc. This same day let us join ourselves with the Church in the praises of Christ: This same hour let us receive him joyfully into our hearts: this same moment, in our very Nunc, let us depart from sin, and fall to repentance. Let us be sudden in our turning to Christ, for he will be sudden in his coming upon us. The day of the Lord cometh as a thief in the night. O how should this menate thunder-strike the secure sinner; that the dreadful Judge shall surprise him suddenly? Let the swearer tremble; for whiles he is rapping out a volley of oaths, God's hand may stop his blasphemous mouth, with those wicked speeches in it: he may die blaspheming: God may smite him suddenly. The intoxicated body may spew out a drunken soul, into the bosom of the Prince of darkness, when he disgorgeth his surfeited stomach: as the Poet describes one bleeding to death; Purpuream vomit ill animam, he sends forth his purple soul: The Lord may smite him suddenly. The vain-glorious boaster, so ambitious of titles, that like Herod, he hath not the modesty to refuse vox Dei, when it is put upon him; may immediately be smitten by an Angel; and feel both his honor and life worm-eaten: The Lord may smite him suddenly. The sacrilegious with-holders of God's dues, and defrauders of their Pastors, to the horror of many in this City, may speed like Ananias and his wife: The Lord may smite them suddenly. The covetous Worldling, while both his hands are raking in Mammon, may fall into the hands of fatal destruction: the Lord may take him away suddenly. All impenitent sinners may share in this one phrase of wretchedness; God may smite them suddenly. He will make his Name glorious: If thou refuse to honor him with a graicous life, he will honor himself upon thee by a fearful death. We have heard of some dying with curses in their mouths, instead of prayers: What was the reason, but that they were more used to cursing, than to praying? Bee careful therefore of thy Nunc: Glorify God while thou hast time: For as it is usual with him, Tarditatem supplicis gravitate pensare: so not rare, Tarditatem paenitendi impaenitentia punire. Our nature is dull to goodness: but wherefore serve the spurs of diligence? Naturam nobis formare non possumus, possumus diligentiam. As Paul being sent into the Church to preach Christ, so we being sent into the world to praise Christ, had need of an Ananias to excite us: Why tarriest thou? Let us never Confer with flesh and blood about the conveniency, when we are called to celebrate God's Glory.

2. Being entered into this holy course, let us follow it. The ecclipticke line of his praise must run quite through the Zodiac of our life: our whole Nunc must be spent in his holy Service: our Nunc in the full latitude of it. So long as we have any blessings on Earth, Let the Earth ring with the praises of the Founder. Shall we think any Nunc sufficient? We have not done it before, we never mind it hereafter: only Nunc, now for a gird we will be hot upon the business. Must all our thankfulness be dispatched in a moment? That which is but for a moment, is indeed of no moment. But blessed is he that doth righteousness at all times. Every day will I bless him, and praise thy Name forever and ever. The day will have an evening: If his praise should last no longer, the night would bring in silence: nay but For ever and ever: the glorious day of eternity hath no night. While I live will I praise the Lord: I will sing praises unto my God, while I have any being: Not only while I live, for this life will have an end: but while I have any being; that can never have an end. To continue in giving Glory to Christ, is no less requisite than to begin: though the beginning be more than half, yet the end is more than all. The God of all perfection looks, that our ultimum vitae, should be his optimum gloriae. The Philosopher being asked in his old age, why he did not give over his practice, and take his ease, answered; when a man is to run a race of forty furlongs, would you have him sit down at the nine and thirtieth, and so lose the prize? We do not keep a good fire all day, and let it go out in the evening when it is coldest: but then rather lay on more fuel, that we may go warm to bed. He that slakes the heat of his zeal in his age, will go cold to bed, and in a worse case to his Grave. Wary travellers ride fare and softly when they come near their journeys end: but if we lagged so in the way of godliness, we shall never come to the expected end of our journey. The eternal God, though he passed over infinite millions of Generations, before he came to a Creation of the world; yet when he began, did never intermit his work, but continued it day today, till he had perfected the whole: and then he rested, deposing it in the hands of a Sabbath. It should not be long before we enter into the Vineyard; (no hour prescribes unto God, yet God prescribes an hour to us, and that the first hour of our day) the sooner the better: but being once entered, we must intermit no labor, never give over workeing till our Sabbath comes, that Eternal rest in Heaven.

In the institution and bringing on of his Church, God proceeded by degrees: First, he began with the law of nature, a rule engrafted in our minds: But the characters of that being almost worn out by the custom of sin, he wrote his Law in Tables; legible to their eyes, and durable to time, uncapable of alteration: But because this law could not save them, he promised a Messias: and yet perceiving that men would not sufficiently rely upon his promise, he gave them types, and ceremonies, and sacrifices, prefiguring their expected Messias. This was not yet enough, therefore when the fullness of time was come, he sent his Son: which was so much the more perfect than all the rest, as the substance is more than the shadow: still the most perfect came at the last. So what degrees of goodness soever we have past through, God looks (after his own example) that our best shall come at last. Cleave unto him, that thou mayest be increased at thy last end. Decrementum vitae, must have incrementum justitiae. Other men set forth the good wine at first, but thou hast kept the best wine till the last. Hypocrites, Ex fervidis tepidi, ex tepidis frigidi fiunt: Their wine turneth into vinegar: for at first, it was mingled with water; and no more wine in it, than would give it a color. But the right Christian vents his best wine at last; the stars of his graces shine brightest in the evening of his life. Samson slew abundance of Philistines in his life time, but more at his death. Daily are the faithful killing up the Philistines, mortifying their sins all their life: but on their death-bed they kill them all; far more dying, than they did living. Let us frame the desires of our hearts, all our speeches and actions, to give Glory to Christ, so long as our Nunc lasts, till our mortal days be ended. And when we have no more Nunc left to do it in here, we shall be blessed to do it in that Aeternum hereafter.

3. That we may the better perform it, durante Nunc, God hath wrapped up His glory in every Creature: Not as fire in flint, which appears not without some violence: but as light in the Sun, which is not only visible it self, but making all other objects visible. So easily may we see his glory in every creature, that we cannot see the Creature but through his glory, as we can see nothing but by the light. He hath so folded up his glory in them, that we must annihilate them before we can destroy his glory: Nay when the Creatures shall be dissolved, yet his glory will remain clear and entire. Heaven and Earth shall pass away, but his glory shall never pass away. As the Artificer wrought his own name so cunningly in the shield of Minerva, that it could not be picked out, unless there were a dissolution of the whole frame. More inviolably is the Name of God wrought in all things, in our bodies, in our souls: and those bodies and souls must be reduced to nothing, before his Name can suffer diminution. Nay, when those bodies are turned to dust, and those souls sent to their own place, His most honorable Name will still stick upon them: Either the Name of Savior in their salvation, or the Name Judge in their just confusion. It is an observation in Philosophy, that if the motion of the Heavens should cease, there would be no generation of things upon earth. The flowers which we see here below, are begotten of those flowers of light, the Stars we see above. The Earth the lower Milstone, that lies still: The Sun that higher Milstone, that runs round, and keeps the other in heat: both must concur to the preparing of bread for us. The Earth is as the wife, the Sun as the Husband; she cold, he of a power to give heat: the wife without the Husband, the Husband without the wife, cannot beget children: by the marriage and uniting of this couple, we have our fruits. The Sun, the Father of them is more noble: but the Earth cannot be left out for procreation. God that made both the Earth, the Sun and Stars, is of more powerful operation than they all: our natural hearts are as the cold and barren Earth: from that Sun of Righteousness comes all the influence of grace: the cause of fructifying is in him; he gives the whole operation of being, or doing good. If we do not return him all the glory, the wife is worthy to lose her Husband, the Earth to want her Sun, the Soul to be deprived of her Savior. As when the king removes, the Court follows: and when the Court is gone, the hangings and stately furniture is taken down: So if through our unthankfulness, God removes from our heart, where he once kept his Court, His Grace will not stay behind; and if they be once departed, down go the hangings and ornaments of peace and prosperity: all the noble virtues leave us: it may be our sins, the black guard will tarry with us. Our Apostle begins this Epistle with a Salutation, wherein he wisheth Grace and Peace unto us: so Paul continually joins them together. As Grace and Peace salute together, so Grace and Peace bid farewell together. Grace and Peace will take no pleasure to stay after Glory: and Glory will not stay when sin is placed in the chair. At the birth of Ichabod, away goes Glory. If sin be once borne, cockered, and dandled, and made the darling; our soul, the woeful mother, may weep, cry, and complain; The glory is departed from Israel. She shall not only cry in this sorrow, but die in this sorrow: the child to which she gave life, shall be her death: her lying in shall prepare for her laying out: from the bed of her delivery, she is delivered over to the bed of the Grave. Such an unhappy issue is sin, and above all sin the robbing Christ of his Honor, that it destroys the own mother. At the nativity of unthankfulness, the soul is left forlorn of comfort and succor; for grace, and peace, and glory forsake her altogether.

But let the Glory of Christ be our delight: let us more rejoice in doing Him honor, than in our own salvation. Let the covetous repair to their riches, like birds to their nests: and the lustful to their brothels, like flesh-flies to the larder: the ambitious to their honors, like butterflies to a poppy: the strong to their holds, as Snails creep into their shells: the learned to their arts, as Bees to their hives: Atheists to their sensual refuges, as Dogs to their kennels: and Politicians to their wits, as Foxes to their holes: the holy soul will know no other Sanctuary but Jesus Christ. I met with an apologue, and it is this. A Stationer hung up in a mart, the pictures or small printed counterfeits of men famous in their kinds: among which, he had also the picture of Christ. Divers men bought according to their several fancies. The Soldier buys his Caesar, the Lawyer his Justinian, the Physician his Galen, the Philosopher his Aristotle, the Poet his Virgil, the Orator his Cicero, and the Divine his Augustine: every man after the addiction of his own heart. The picture of Christ hung by still, of less price than the rest. A poor Chapman, that had no more money than would purchase that, bought it saying; Quando quisque Deum abstulit suum, da mihi, bone vir, meum Christum. I speak not for his Picture painted to the eyes, but for his lively Image to be placed in our hearts. The affianced Virgin hath the picture of her Beloved, drawn a in little tablet, which she wears in her bosom, next to her heart. There let us have the Image of Christ; not limed in our chambers, but fixed in the inner chamber of our hearts. She makes much of every token sent her from her Beloved, and rejoiceth in the sight of them; and memory of him, upon all occasions: every blessing is a token of Christ's love to us: in the fruition of any of them, let us remember Him whom our soul loveth, and set forth his Glory.

Lastly, Quóúsque, how long must this reddition of glory last? For ever. So far is eternity beyond the capacity of man in his militant estate, that we want language to express it, and a name how to call it. Various are the interpretations of this 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . Junius renders it, Ad tempus sempiternum: there is indeed a Sempiternum above, but no Tempus: time is swallowed up in everlastingness. Some say, In secula: and to make it more complete, others add to it, and make it up In secula seculorum. Indeed they had no reason to pinch it of measure, when as it is For ever. Divers phrases do abbreviate it, none can make it too long. Seculum some derive à sequendo; as if it signified only Series temporum. Others more probably, à secando, because it cuts off: as Secula, (which comes from the same root) signifies a Sythe or Sickle, to cut down the grass and grain of the earth. It is generally taken for an age: but of what dimension, there is difference of opinions. But whether we take it for thirty, or for an hundred, or for a thousand years; still it is but a time, and what is time to eternity? Jerome and Montanus read, In diem aeternitatis; which is both strictiùs ad literam vel sonum, and pleniùs ad sensum. Eternity is without time, and day excludes night: there is no night in heaven, but altogether day: no time is there, but altogether eternity. Nor is it only, In diem aeternam; but In diem aeternitatis, for the fuller exposition of it. I know that, For ever, is divers ways taken in the Scripture.

1. For the life of man: Samuel a Priest to the Lord forever: yet this Ministry was but during his life: death determined his Priesthood.
2. For the year of Jubilee: The servant whose ear was bored, Shall serve his master forever: yet at the year of Jubilee he was to return to his own family, and to be free.
3. To the first coming of Christ. My Covenant shall be in your flesh, a Covenant forever. You shall keep the Feast of the Passover by an Ordinance forever. The garments of Aaron are said to be a Statute to him forever. Circumcision, the Passover, Aaron's Priesthood, the Sacrifices and Ceremonies, were all said to be a Law and an Ordinance forever: yet we know that Christ did put an end to them all. For Circumcision, and the Passover, the Sacrifices, and Ordinances; they are all taken away by Christ. They could not last forever; for they were at first moritura, and now they are mortifera.
4. To the second coming of Christ; that is the end of the world. Thou art a Priest forever: And He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever. Yet of that Priesthood, and of that kingdom, there shall be an end; when Christ hath delivered up the Kingdom to God the Father. His sacerdotal Office shall cease, when there be none left to intercede for; all his members being in heaven. Jonah in the deep complained, that the earth with her bars shall cover him forever: yet that could but have reached to the Resurrection: then earth and sea must give up their dead. For ever, in all these places, is taken pro longo temporis intervallo: but this forever, here, is a duration without end. Observe;

1. The difference between the King of heaven, and the Kingdom of heaven: Either of them hath an eternity, but the Kings eternity exceeds. God's Aeternum is the duration of an uncreated being: our aeternum is but the duration of a created being. God was King, when there was no heaven, for He made heaven: and of necessity the Maker must be before the work. Heaven, and the Angels and Saints who dwell in that Court, had a beginning, though they shall have no end: but God hath neither end nor beginning. The heavens contain us, they cannot contain Him: nay, He contains the heavens. Time was but a little breath of his mouth, and all the wheels of time, but the motion of his finger. Eternity is his Nature: He is perfect eternity it self: and the continuance of the world is but a shadow or abridgement of it; far shorter than Himself. He lays his hands upon both ends of everlastingness, comprehending it within his infinite eternity, and eternal infiniteness.

2. The difference betwixt this Now, and forever. Nunc hath both a beginning, and an end: forever, hath a beginning, no end. Nunc is spun out by degrees: forever, is perfect at once. Of nothing we become children, of children men, of men aged, and in age (if not before) we must die: one Nunc brings us into this world, another Nunc carries us out. In the Orbe of this forever, there is no increase and decrease, no infancy and age, no growth and death: all are perfect at once, all shall continue perfect forever. As for death, he may here ramble abroad, and deal about his bloody and fatal blows; and heaven is quite out of his reach. In that upper world, death hath nothing to do; his power, his credit is lost there: above they laugh at his fury. Our Nunc here hath many alterations: it is subject to changes and chances. Stay but a Nunc, and the greatest man of the East is become a Beggar: but another Nunc, and the healthiest man droupes: this minute he was well, and he is ill this minute. He feels a sudden change and alteration to worse, and cannot tell the cause, nor call it by any name. This variable, and therefore miserable condition of man, was not imprinted by God: for as Himself is immortal, so He did put a beam, a coal of immortality into us. This by our obedience we might have blown into a flame, but by our sin we blew it out. We beggared ourselves, by hearkening after false riches: we infatuated ourselves, by listening after false knowledge. So that now we do not only die, but die upon the rack, die by the torment of sickness: And because we fear sickness and death, we are even sick before sickness comes, and die before death comes. For the very jealousy; and pre-apprehension of sickness and death, is an antedating of sickness and death. We make ourselves sick, before we are so; and are ready to die, ere death comes at us. We are not sure we are ill; but by feeling of our pulse, one hand asks the other how we do: and our eye asks our own urine, how it is with us. We die, and cannot enjoy death, because we die in the torment of sickness: we are tormented with sickness, and cannot stay till the torment comes: but make ourselves sick with presages, and even die of suspicion. These mutations and miseries are involved in our Nunc: none such belongs to forever. In heaven there is no sin, therefore no sickness: no sickness, therefore no death: but for those three incidents of our Nunc, three beatitudes in forever: For Sin, Grace: for Sickness, Glory: and for Death, Life and Immortality.

3. The difference between the Saints militant, and those triumphant: between us in our Nunc, and them in their forever. We have the battle to fight: they have fought it, and are Conquerors. We are troubled with temptations, they tread the Tempter under their feet. We have the bitter cup of affliction to drink, they are past it, and filled with comfort. We have our degrees to take in the rough School of the Cross: they are perfect and complete Doctors. We have but the Grace, they have the Glory of Saints. We have an apprenticeship to serve, under our good Master Christ: They are free men of the new Jerusalem. We are heirs of the same Kingdom, but yet in our minority: they are possessed of the Inheritance. We live below in the veil of miseries: They above, in the Mount of blessedness. We have the earnest of Heaven, they are stated in the whole bargain. We are upon the way, they at their journeys end. Our race is to run, they have got the Prize. We are Pilgrimmes in this world, they are at home in their own Countrie. We seek For a Citty which hath a foundation, they have found it. We are in black, our mourning garments: they In white, the habit of rejoicing. And which is worst, we are haunted with sins; those pernicious Heathens cannot be quite expelled out of our Canaan. Too often do they draw us into the offense of our Maker: for which our hearts smite us with remorse, and we go heavily all the day long: They above, are rid of all these solicitations; and think this the happiest of all their deliverances, that they are safely delivered from their sins. We sin against the Lord for trifles, they would not offend Him for a thousand Heavens This is the sorest inconvenience of our Nunc: not so much that it is a vale of miseries, as a vault of sins. The good soul had rather suffer the evil that displeaseth her sense, than do the evil that displeaseth her Maker. Here we have continual work for repentance: O how much of our time is spent in undoing that by sorrow, which we have done up amiss by sin? In our house sin continually makes dust, and repentance must be the Beesome to sweep it. In Heaven there is nothing but purity and perfection. Here we give Christ some Glory, but it is with the intermission of sleep, and interruption of sin: and too often we dishonor Him, which costs us many bitter tears. In that Orbe of Eternity, His praises are perpetually sung, and there is no stay of his Glory.

4. There is yet a Communion betwixt this Now, and For ever: the Saints that are gone before us, are not perfect without us. There is an association of both, them above, and us below; a communion of Saints. For the militant and triumphant Church make but one Parish: Though this world be scarce the Belfry in respect of that upper Choir. When Christ was upon the Earth, he was not out of his Diocese; nor out of his Temple, when he was in our flesh. They sing not the praises of Christ alone; we answer them. As when the Angels began; Glory to God on high; the shepherds followed, glorifying and praising God for all the things that they had heard and seen. The militant Church, in this joins with the Church triumphant: Therefore with Angels, and Archangels, and with all the company of Heaven, we laud and magnify thy glorious Name: Evermore praising thee, and saying, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Hosts: Heaven and Earth are full of thy glory: Glory be to thee, O Lord most High. The goodly fellowship of the Prophets praise thee: The glorious company of the Apostles praise thee: The noble army of Martyrs praise thee: And not only so, but The Holy Church throughout all the World doth acknowledge thee. We have our part, and this himne must not be sung without us. The Epithalamium of that happy marriage of Christ to our nature, was begun by Angels: yet there were men on Earth that did second them: The song was not let fall, but as it came from Heaven to the Earth, so was it sent up again from the Earth to Heaven. The exaltation of our Nature in the Son of God, was entertained with Angelical anthems. His Session at the right hand of his Father, is lauded by the whole quire of Heaven: yea and it is rebounded, resounded by the Saints below. They from the battlements of Glory, we from the Earth, the pavement of this Temple answers them: Blessed be the Name of the Lord, from this time forth and for evermore. This song shall never cease: Nunc and Aeternum, shall both incessantly give him Glory. They cease not day and night, saying, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty: No interruption of that music; but still Glory be to the Father, to the Son, and to the holy Ghost. How for a Nunc only? Once, and no more? At this hour, and so have done? No, but As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be world without end: Gloria in altissimis, is the song of my soul in the house of my pilgrimage: I sing it Per modum voti, yea per modum devoti; my heart is devoted to his praise, and my tongue shall speak of his righteousness. We have no Angels to sing this Gloria in excelsis, and it is music for an Angel: But they are well pleased to take us into the Consort, to make up the fuller Harmony. Yet let us take heed that we do not mar the music: If our breasts be hoarse; and stuffed with the crudities of unrepented sins, our voices will yield but a harsh sound: and God's praises would be sung with a clear breast. As we desire to sing with the Saints in Heaven, let us live like those Saints upon Earth. When we have cleansed our hearts from all unrighteousness, and made them Temples of the Holy Ghost; then do we rise above ourselves, and approach somewhat near to those blessed Spirits. Then are we in state with Saints and Angels, to magnify the glorious Name of Christ. There is joy among those Angels in Heaven, to hear their songs kept alive upon Earth. When the Son of God came down from Heaven to Earth, and when he went up from Earth to Heaven, still He was entertained with songs of praise. Let us praise Him both for the one, and the other, here; till we come to sing it in that glorious Choir above: No more of wish then, but of fruition, and so of gratulation For ever.

5. This is one sympathy of the Church, triumphant and militant: we all agree in this one harmony, of giving Glory to Christ. To Him be Glory in our Nunc: and To Him be Glory in their For ever. Howsoever there may be distance in place; they on high, we below: and difference in Grace; theirs perfect, ours inchoate: and difference in Glory; they have it in Re, we but in Spe; and difference in the effects of Faith: We believe what we shall have, they have what they believed: yet in this there is concord and consent; and without much difference, Christ hath his Glory both here, and there. Though there be a local and ceremonial difference between us, in place and honor: We Soldiers in His warfare, they at peace in His Palace, like Princes in his Court: Yet still there is a Communion of Saints, and we are all members of the same Head. Though we be like the feet of the Body, nearest to the Earth, yet we are parts of the same Body; and all of us have but one Head, Jesus Christ. So inseparably are they in Heaven, united to us on Earth; that the Church upon Earth is called the very Kingdom of Heaven. There was war in Heaven. Is not that the place of peace? Was not the Dragon long since cast out of Heaven? Can he get in thither, to work their disturbance? What, any war in Heaven? No certainly, there is all welfare, no warfare. But this Heaven is the Church militant; and it is honored with the name of Heaven for seven resemblances. First, It shines bright as Heaven. Fulget Ecclesia Doctoribus, ut coelum syderibus. Secondly, In Heaven, one Star differs from another Star in Glory: so here be different measures and degrees of Grace. Thirdly, Heaven is incessant in motion, so the Church continually mooves toward God. Fourthly, Heaven gives influence to all lower things. So all good to the World is conveyed through the Church.

Fifthly, Heaven hath none but pure inhabitants; and all the Churches Children are Heavenly: Their Treasure is in Heaven, Matth. 6.26. Their desires in Heaven. Coloss. 3.2. Their conversation in Heaven. Philip. 3.20. The Lord of Heaven dwells in them. Ephes. 3.17. And wheresoever He is, His very presence makes a Heaven. Sixthly, Heaven covers all sublunary things: So the Church hath the Moon under her feet, she treads upon the World. Revelation. 12.1. She is (as it were) shod with the Moon, and crowned with the Stars. Seventhly, as Satan is cast out of Heaven, so also thrown out of the Church: His place was no more found in Heaven. Revelation. 12.8. But you will say he rangeth in the World, how then hath he no place? He hath none ad nocendum: If he cannot hurt, he hath no place? He may still have power to tempt, not to hurt: Even the Devil himself shall work to our good. The Prince of this World hath nothing in me: Nec quicquam in me nec quicquam meis. Thus the Name of Heaven is communicated to us upon Earth: so certain are we in our Nunc, to be co-stated in their For ever.

Sixthly, This For ever, is the perfection of the Glory of Heaven. It were a Glory scarce worth glorying in, if it did not last For ever. This consummates the joy, that it cannot be lost: It would droupe and languish at the very height, if the head of it were not borne up with this For ever. This is the Crown of the Crown of Life; that the kings there shall wear their Crowns For ever. The very hope of this, is the best inheritance of the greatest Prince upon God's Earth: After a kingdom which he must leave, to enjoy a Kingdom which shall never leave him: To change a crown of gold, for a Crown of Glory: To change the glory of a Crown which must vanish, for the Crown of Glory which can never be taken from him. Alexander gave away all, and left himself nothing but hope: but it was not this hope: He wept when he heard of another World: He had wasted some time in winning this: and now to hear of another, when he had not gotten all this; it melted his great heart into tears. He thought one World indeed too little for him: Vnus Pellaeo Iuveni non sufficit Orbis: This he made account to have wholly his; yet still he wanted a part. But now there was another World, wherein he had no part at all: this made him weep; but he wept as one That had no hope. 1 Thes. 4.13. No earthly greatness can secure us from treachery and violence: Two of the Kings Chamberlaines conspire against Ahasuerus. He that ruled over millions of Men, through a hundredth twenty and seven Provinces, cannot assure himself from the hand of a villain. He that had the power of other Men's lives, is in danger of his own. O blessed they that are possessed of a Crown incorruptible, unfadeable; of a Kingdom in Heaven. No force, no Treason can reach thither: there can be no peril of either violence, or forfeiture. What a-do there is in the World for Annuities, for Leases of life, of three lives, for Free-holds and Perpetuities? So undeterminable is the love of this World which determines every minute. We are very earnest and industrious about the continuance of our Nunc: O that we were half so careful about the assurance of our For ever. Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years, eat, drink, and be merry: He was but a fool. But when we have Peace, Happiness, and Glory, (which are the true goods indeed) laid up for us, not for many years, nor for many ages, but For ever, we may then be merry indeed. The best joys of our souls here, though they be the beams of God's favor, are often clouded. In our fairest day, it often rains before night; and our jollity concludes in tears. If we escape outward crosses, yet we cannot avoid sins, and they do (and nothing but they should) set us a weeping. There is neither Clouds nor Rain in that Eternal day above: They have nothing to weep for, therefore no place for tears. The Lord sometimes smiles upon us, and then we say in our prosperity: We shall never be moved, thou hast made our hill so strong. Psalm. 30.6. But abscondisti faciem; and then we hang down the head, like Bul-rushes in a shower. In Heaven the Face of God is never hidden; The Saints and Angels behold it continually. Matth. 18.10. This In aeternum crown all their crowns, rejoiceth their joys, and even glorifies their glories, by confirming them in blessedness: the assurance that they shall be crowned For ever, blessed For ever, joyous and glorious For ever and ever.

For application of all; we must do what we can, to make the glory of Christ last For ever: Not only In aeterno suo, for that shall be done without us: but In aeterno nostro, which is to be done by us, So let us honor him while we live, that our very memory may occasion his honor when we are dead. This shall be written for the generation to come, and the people yet unborne shall praise the Lord. O happy men that do such good works, for which the future ages shall praise him. Nature is pregnant in this office: The outgoings of the morning and evening praise thee: to teach us, neither to lie down, nor rise up, without remembering of our Maker. Day unto day, and night unto night, doth publish it: their Language is heard everywhere: How much more should we be diligent in the celebration of his praises? One generation shall praise thy works to another. The faith of Abraham, in not sparing his only son, glorifies God even to this day. The patience of Job, proclaims to all the world his honor. The gracious lives of the Saints departed, do still magnify him: in every place we hear of them, and are moved to glorify God for them: As if his Name had been less famous, if these men had not been, or not been so holy. Not that they could add renown to God, but God renounced himself by them. For if his Justice gets honor by a Pharaoh, much more doth his mercy by a Moses. We cannot look upon an Hospital or almshouse, but we are occasioned to glorify God, for giving men the grace to do such good works. Their works follow them; yea, and (in another sense) tarry behind them too: The reward goes with them, that their souls may be saved: but the work it self stays behind, that God may be glorified. For this cause we remember in our thanks to God, the Wickams, and the Suttons, and the benefactors of former ages: blessing him that raised them up, and reflecting all to his honor. Do good therefore, ye rich men, with your goods: and think it not enough to glorify God with your professions whiles you live; but that God through your occasions may be glorified when you are dead. These are better monuments than your alabaster or marble sepulchers; better than all the elegies of poets, and Inscriptions upon your tombs: your lasting good deeds, which be the visible trophies of your goodness: That is your Aeternum in this world and by this you shall give glory to Christ forever. This is that praise of God, which shows that he was the God of your praise. Build refectories for his members, and Temples to his service: you shall die, but Non norant haec monumenta mori. If Israel builds houses to his praise, he will dwell in them, and so is said to inhabit the praises of Israel. In our several stations. Let us endeavor all ways to glorify him, and in heaven he will glorify us forever.

Amen. This is the conclusion of all. Concerning which, some things are observable in the word it self, and some in the sense of the word.

1. It is a word Omnium Linguarum, of all Languages. Originally it is Hebrew; the Greeks took it up, the Latins followed them, all other nations entertain it, and it shall never be laid down.

There be many Hebrew words, which we retain in their proper dialect, without translation of them: as Halleluiah, Immanuel, Hosanna, Maranatha, Racha, Manna, Mammona, Abba, Cherubim, Seraphim: but the most frequent and familiar of them all is Amen. It is kept in the original, and not translated; first to preserve the honor of the Hebrew tongue. As that was the first language of the world, and thought to be still the language of heaven; so it shall have honor in the midst between both these: for all nations shall speake the language of Canaan: In time the consent of all nations shall come in, to testify the truth of the Gospel. And howsoever it be now a stumbling block to the Jews, and an offense to the Gentiles; yet the day will come, when both Jews and Gentiles shall receive it, and to the word of Christ, they shall say Amen. Next, it is a pledge to the Gentiles, that there shall be a re-engrafting of the Jews: Christians call God; Abba, Father, in the tongue of the Jews; implying that the Jews shall become Christians. As we received our first faith from them, so they shall receive their last faith from us. It is not then unlawful to use Greek or Latin words in our Sermons, when as we are allowed to use Hebrew words in our prayers. But as we refuse no meat that conduceth to the nourishment of our bodies, so all words are good that tend to the edification of our souls.

2. It is a word omnium Idiomatum; signifying a Noun, a verb, an adverb. First, It is taken for a Noun; real and substantial truth: These things saith Amen, the faithful witness. All the promises of God are Yea and Amen. So every Evangelist shuts up his Gospel; Amen. So Paul, Peter, and John conclude their Epistles Amen. So the holy Ghost seals us the Scripture: the last word of the Bible is Amen. To show that whatsoever therein is contained, is perfect and absolute truth. Secondly, It is taken for an Adverb: so frequently, it is used by Christ; Amen, Amen, dico vobis; verily, verily I say unto you. It is sometimes used in the Old Testament: The woman shall say, Amen, Amen. In diverse places of the Psalms: by which some would distinguish them into five books, in imitation of Moses his Pentateuch; every book containing thirty Psalms, and the number distinguished by Amens. It is thus taken, an asseveration, some call it Iuramentum. But that Christ, when he said Amen, Amen, did so often swear or take an oath were hard to affirm. Thirdly, It is taken for a verb: wherein we wish something to be. Deut. 27.15. Neh. 5.13. Psal. 89.52. Thus it is a note of confirmation, tam asserendo, quàm optando. It is every way a Seal to the truth of that which is delivered: The promises of God are Amen in Christ; In ipso sunt Ipsum. And to the truth of our receiving and believing it; so we shut up our Creed with Amen.

3. It is a word Omnium locorum; placed in the beginning, in the midst, in the end. In the beginning to express the Truth of that which follows: In the end to witness the Truth of what went before: In the midst, it is Ipsa veritas. Christ commonly used it in the beginning of his speech: so he begun his Sermon to Nicodemus. And Paul so begins his Epistle to the Galatians. So the Spirit begun his letter to the Laodiceans. In the midst it hath a place also. Romans 9.5. Like a Selah in the midst of a Psalm. And in the Lord's prayer, though it be but once mentioned or uttered, and that in the end; yet it is implied in the midst, and belongs to every petition: as well to Fiat voluntas tua, as to Dimitte debita nostra: to Adveniat regnum tuum, as to Da panem nostrum. To them all generally we say, and to everyone particularly we intend Amen. In the end, it is never to be omitted: whether we pray alone, or with the congregation, we must conclude with Amen. Every where then it challengeth a room: Especially S^t. John, repeating the words of our Savior, ever doubles it; Amen, Amen. Some would strangely allude it to the age of John: that as in the Greek elements of the word Amen, the numerical letters amount to ninety nine: so they say, S^t. John lived ninety nine years. As those that collect, because the Beasts name, and Solomon's yearly talents of gold, were both of a number, each of them six hundredth sixtie and six: that therefore Antichrist at that time must be as rich, as ever was Solomon: they do but invent fantastical dreams, and groundless curiosities. Amen is a word of honor, the voice of faith, and faith presupposeth understanding; not to be used upon every trivial circumstance, with unadvised lips: for through a custom or habit of speaking it, they blunder out Amen at a ventures, and not seldom seal a curse to themselves. It cannot be used with too much reverence.

It was a complaint of the Jewish Teachers; we may too justly transfer it upon ourselves: that the Amen of God's Clients in the Church is very defective: there is a fault in it, that would be amended. One Amen they called Pupillum: when a man says Amen to he knows not what: he understands not the prayer. Another they called Subreptitium; when one says Amen before the time comes: he is loath to tarry till the prayers be done. The last they called Sectile: when a man cuts off his devotion, and divides it into two parts. He sleeps out the first part, and his mind is wandering in the last part; only he awakes in the midst, inopportunately says Amen to that. But a perfunctory and careless Amen, to thy private, or the public prayers, will procure thee none of the required blessings: it will bring but sorry comfort to thy conscience. Saint Jerome saith, That in the Primitive Church, the people's Amen, at the end of public prayer, was like thunder; above the shout of an army in a triumph: that it would almost astonish a man to hear, Populum reboantem Amen. With so submisse a voice do we answer the Minister in our suffrages, as if we were afraid that men should hear us: we do but whisper, whereas they did thunder: Out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth speaketh: our praising God with so low a voice, argues a poverty of devotion in our hearts. If we knew what a seal our hearty Amen were to all our petitions, we would sooner rend the clouds, than whisper to our pewes so necessary a Fiat.

Nor must this only conclude our supplications, but even our gratulations: as well our thanks for what we have received, as our suits for what we would receive. God will not accept of an Hosanna, without an Hallelujah: Amen must seal up both. Be this then the conclusion of our prayers, wherewith God concludes his Scriptures. The first word is In principio: the last word Amen. A stately beginning, and a powerful ending. What is more stately than Antiquity? Id verum, quod primum. The Doctrine of Moses and the Prophets concerning the true Worship of God, was first: Idolatry and Baalism came in afterwards. The Doctrine of Christ and his Apostles, touching Justification by faith, was first: the Popish Doctrine of Merits and Satisfactions came in afterwards. What more powerful than the Truth? At last it will prevail: all will be Amen, Truth in the end. So the Scriptures have both Vetera and Vera; which are not joined together in any other writings. In human learning, many things are uncertainly true, and more certainly untrue: only the Word of God is sealed with Amen. Amen is the end of it; and let us all say Amen unto it.

To set some method in my discourse; Amen is but one word; and it was hard to divide a word. It is an unwarrantable boldness to tear any word in pieces; much more to rend this word

Amen, which is the seal to all the rest. Who but a mad man would tear the seal of his Evidence? Yet though a word may not be divided, it may be distinguished, and that without injury. One word may have divers significations: and though it have but Vnicum sonum, may bear Multiplicem sensum. It is like Manna, which relished to all, according to the delight of every several palate. Many virtues lay claim to this Amen. Desire challengeth Amen, and says, It is mine. Faith lays title to Amen, and says, It is only mine. Thankfulness would engross Amen, as properly belonging to her. We will let them all have it, rather than tear it in pieces, that so none might have it. The root of it is in the heart, and it hath four several Branches in the mouth. First, as it comes from a Desire of the heart, it is Vox Petentis, the word of a Petitioner. Secondly, as it comes from a Perswasion of the heart, it is Vox Credentis, the word of a Believer. Thirdly, as it comes from the Joy of the heart, it is Vox Gratulantis, the word of a Thanksgiver. Fourthly, as it comes from the Resolution of the heart, it is Vox Perseverantis, the word of a Continuer. First, a Desire that so may it be. Secondly, a Belief, that so it shall be. Thirdly, a Rejoicing, that it is so. Fourthly, a Resolution, that so it shall continue. Of these in order.

1. Amen signifies an earnest Desire of the heart, to obtain some good. Geminata precatio: when we have expressed with our mouths, what we desire in our minds, we add Amen: So let it be unto me, O Lord. I come quickly. Amen. And least that Amen should not seem earnest enough, it is seconded by an exegeticall instance; Even so, come Lord Jesus. The foregoing prayer is a petition, and Amen is a short repetition of it: a brief and abridgement of all that hath been asked. All the requests of an humble Client, are thus summed up in a word; Amen. It is a Seal put to the end of a conveyance: Prayer is the conveyance of our hearty desires to Heaven: this is not authentical without a seal. As God hath regard to all the terms of the conveyance, and ponders all our requests; so in the bottom of the Instrument He looks for our seal. If Amen be not set to it, it is but a cold conveyance, and will hardly bring us a good assurance. Duplicatum verbum, ardens desiderium. So Isaiah 37.17. Dan. 9.19. Matth. 7.7. The evils be so hurtful, whereof we beg a removal: the Graces so excellent, whereof we pray for a fruition; that we have good cause to be urgent with God, and to put Him in mind of that we have asked, by the conclusion with which our prayers are sealed, Amen. We say Amen, O LORD to our supplications, do thou say Amen to the concessions of them. This is to seal our seal; to set the seal of his merciful grant, to the seal of our humble suit. Amen on earth, is sealed and ratified by the Amen in Heaven.

2. Amen signifies a persuasion of the heart: not only a desire to have it so, but a belief that it shall be so. And though option and expectation be different acts of the Soul; yet they may be at one instant in the Heart, and therefore expressed in one word by the mouth: The Amen of Prayer, which is a Fiat: and the Amen of Faith, which is a Fiet; do not destroy, but rather assist one another. Faith rouseth up Prayer, Prayer cheers up Faith. Credidi & ideo locutus sum; Psalm 116.10. Faith opens the lips of Prayer. I have prayed, that thy Faith might not fail; Luke 22.32. so Prayer keeps Faith in heart. Believe then, that you may pray heartily: Pray, that you may believe firmly. Amen answers to both; as one beam of the Sun yieldeth both light and heat: light to our Faith, heat and fervency to our Prayer. Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my Name, He will give it you: John 16.23. This is the foundation of our Amen. It must rise from a believing heart, and that must needs be an understanding heart. No man will put his seal to a writing, till he understands the contents. Our Prayer, without the Amen of Faith, is an Evidence without a Seal. The Amen of our lips, without the intention of what is prayed for in our hearts, is a Seal without an Evidence. The Suffrage of the whole congregation, crying Amen to the public Prayers, hath ever been, and is the laudable custom of all Churches. But if the common Prayer be not in a common tongue, how shall the people say Amen? When the Priest says Prayers in Latin, it is at his courtesy, whether he will bless or brand the Assembly; and so ignorant Persons may say Amen to their own curse. Say his Charity is better, yet the unlearned Papist is never the wiser. It was a ridiculous observation of the Carnotensian Canons, that forbore to shut up Prayers with Amen in their Churches, because they understood Saint Paul to make it belong only to Idiots: whereas their Assembly consisted of none but noble and learned Persons. But Hugo saith well of them, that they have now just cause, Illud resumere per contrarium; and all to say Amen, because there are none but Idiots and unlearned amongst them. Coeca devotio, rara benedictio. The Romish Priests may conjure, as well as pray, for ought that the Vulgar know. And their Amen to the Orisons, is but like a song of one tune, and the burden of another: or like the ringing of the Saints-bell, after much jangling in the steeple. For though God understands Latin, yet their Latin does not understand God. So we have too many, that huddle up their prayers in a morning, and then think they have served God very well, and are blest for all day. Their minds are busy about one thing, and their tongues talk of another thing: they neither say what they consider, nor consider what they say. So that here is neither hand nor seal, but a mere blank: or a paper scribbled over with nonsense: No man can tell what to make of it. If praying were not an Action of the heart, more than of the lips, you have many Birds that might be taught to say their prayers.

But when The heart hath indited a good matter, and the tongue hath set it down like the pen of a ready writer; Psalm 45.1. Then is the seal opportunely put to them both; Amen. Some preproperous devotions are delivered, as Sermons are taken, in Brachigraphy: They love to be short with GOD, as if it were enough that he knew their meaning. Others are long and tedious, like the prayers of the Pharisees, full of superfluous repetitions, and idle misplacings. Like Anagrams; for as there is a transposition of letters, so here is a misposition of requests: The beginning is where the end should be, and the end where the beginning: so that in the wrong Vbi, there is skewed in Amen.

3. Amen signifies the joy of the heart, and so it is a gratulation for some good received. Thus most properly, and according to the genuine nature of it, it is taken here. To GOD be glory forever; Amen. We do not only desire that so it may be, and believe that so it shall be, but also rejoice that so it is. Saint Chrysostom tells us, that the People in the Primitive times, so soon as ever they heard these words uttered, To whom be Glory forever, they presently thundered out Amen. It is Vox gratulantium; as when the Magistrate hath pronounced, GOD save the King; The whole multitude showteth forth Amen. Whensoever we hear any man blessing the Name of God, it is a key to open our lips, and a motive to affix our Seal to His Praises with Amen. The best way to pledge the Kings health, is by our hearty prayers for him: And it is not the least way of honoring Christ, when others have begun his Holy Praises, to pledge them in our consents, to answer them in our echo's, of Amen. O that men would praise the LORD for His goodness, and for His wonderful works to the Children of Men. Psalm. 107.8. and Psalm. 116.13. Though we cannot make a long Oration of His worthy Prayses, nor a narration of His great and glorious acts; yet when we hear the Preacher declare what He hath done for us, and ascribe all honor to His Name, We cannot but know how to say Amen. It is a word neither hard to learn, nor troublesome to remember, nor difficult to pronounce; Amen. All Plants receive influence from the Sun: only the thankful Heliotropium turns it self to the Sun, and would fain follow it. If the beams of Christ's Graces have thoroughly warmed our hearts, we still look towards Him, we rejoice in His Blessings, and close up all our praises of Him with Amen. All the Tribe of Manasseh went not over Jordan, some stayed behind: Manasseh is said to signify forgetfulness: though we forget many of GOD'S mercies and benefits, yet let some tarry behind in our memories, and not pass away without our thankfulness. We have dull hearts, if we can taste the sweetness, and digest the fatness of his blessings, without returning Him continual thanks, sealed with Amen.

4. It signifies the resolution of the heart; that as the glory of GOD shall continue forever in it self, so we with all our best endeavors will maintain it. And that as His favors towards us are not mutable, so we will be no changelings in setting forth His Prayses. Amen is Truth, and Truth is firm: implying that neither Christ's Honor, nor our thankfulness are fadable things: but of a durable subsistence, and such as will last forever. In witness of which perpetuity, we set to our Seal of Amen. There is no question of His Glory; all the doubt lies in the perseverance of our Grace. The Apostles Were continually in the Temple, praising and blessing GOD. Luke 24.53. If we be not always in the Temple of GOD, made by the hand of Man; yet we are never out of this Temple of Man, made by the Hand of GOD. So long therefore as our Souls are the Priests, and our Bodies the Temples; and these mortal Temples contain those immortal Priests; Let there be offered to Christ the continual sacrifice of thankfulness. Let us draw out Amen to the full length, and evermore sing his Prayses. When the old Man had entertained the gods, and they so liked of his Hospitality, that they bade him ask what he would, and it should be granted him: He only begged that his little Tenement might be turned into a Temple, and himself be accepted as the Priest, to offer sacrifice to them. Much like to David's unum petii, & hoc requiram; even to dwell in the house of GOD forever. Psalm 27.4. They say, happy are the Stones whereof Temples are made: GOD made the whole World a stately Temple, wherein He will be worshipped: And to do that, is the perfection of the world. The inferior Orbes have their several motions; some are turned this way, and others that way: but the Empyreall, the highest Heaven is never moved: the rest of that cannot be disturbed: Immobility and immortality belongs to that. So the lower Spheres of our Soul, our sensitive affections and passions may be whirled up and down: But let our heart continue firm, and stick fast to the honor of Christ: There let our Amen be laid up forever. The Amen of Mercy, the Son of GOD, when He undertook the work of our Redemption, never gave it over till he came to his Consummatum est. The temptations of Satan, the persecutions of the Jews, the afflictions of his body, the passions of his soul; could not call him down from the Cross, till he could triumph in his Consummatum est: then He gave up the Ghost, with Father, into thy hands I commend my Spirit. So when we have continued in His Service to the last, speaking and doing, believing and living to His Glory; then may we with comfortable assurance breath forth our spirits into his bosom; Lord into thy hands I commend my soul. This is our Amen, and Himself say Amen unto it.

To conclude; Hugo Cardinalis hath a pretty observation: That Amen, under the Law, was answered to the curses, but not to the blessings: But Amen, under the Gospel, is answered to the blessings, not to the curses. For the Law, it is plain that there was an Amen enjoined to be said to the curses; and that not in general, one Amen for all. But in particular, every curse must have the several Amen: Which we shall find by perusing these places. Numbers, 5.22. The woman shall double her Amen. Deuteronomy, 27. from Verse 15. to 26. All the People shall say Amen. But in the next Chapter, where the blessings follow; there is no Amen affixed, nor commanded to be affixed to them. Deuteronomy. 28. from Verse 2. to 12. No Amen spoken of there. contrarily in the Gospel, to all the blessings there is an Amen, but none to the curses. If any Man love not the Lord JESUS CHRIST, let him be Anathema Maranatha: 1 Corinthians, 16.22. A fearful curse, but no Amen to that. But Grace be with all them that love the Lord JESUS CHRIST in sincerity: Ephesians, 6.24. There is an Amen to that. Thus doth Christ's Amen seal up mercy to us: Thus let our Amen seal up Glory to him forever.

To shut up all with this Amen. Now the GOD of Peace that brought again from the dead our Lord JESUS that great Sheapheard of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting Covenant: Make you perfect in every good work, to do that which is well pleasing in his sight, Amen. To GOD the Father, that made me after His own blessed Image: To GOD the Son, that redeemed me by His own precious Blood, and called me to be a Minister of his Holy Gospel: To GOD the Holy Ghost, who hath inspired and enabled me to begin and finish this Exposition: To those three glorious Persons, One only infinite and Eternal GOD, be all Praise, all Honor, all Glory, now and forever. Amen.

LONDON, Printed by George Purslow, for John Budge, and are to be sold at his shop, at the great South-door of Paul's, and at Britain's Burse. 1616.

TO THE RIGHT Honorable, WILLIAM Earl of Pembroke, Lord Chamberlain of his Majesty's household, and one of his Majesty's most honorable Privy Council, and Knight of the most noble order of the Garter: The most noble embracer, and encourager of GOODNESS.

Right Honorable,

I Am bold to present to your Honor a short contemplation of those Herbs, (cut in rough pieces) which grow really and plentifully in your own Garden: and give so good nourishment to your virtues, delightful taste to the Church, and odoriferous savor to all; that, like the Vine in Jotham's Parable, they cheare the heart of both God & man. Your Honor, I •now, cannot dislike that in sight, which you so preserve in sense, and (for a happy reward) doth and shall preserve you. You are zealously honor'd of all those that know goodness; and have daily as many prayers, as the earth Saints. Into this number I have (hop•fully presuming) thrust myself; as loath to be hindmost in that acknowledgement, which is so nobly deserved, and so joyfully rendered of all tongues: dedicating to your Honor some public devotions, that can never forget you in my private. I will not think of adding one Herb to your store: I only desire to remember your Honor what hand planted them, what dew waters them, what influence conserves, and enspheres a sweet provident air about them: and when gay weeds, that shoot up like Jonah gourd in a night, shall wither in an hour, (for moriuntur, quomodo oriuntur) Your Herb of Grace shall flourish & be prays'd, both ob eminentiam, and permanentiam; and at last be transported into that heavenly Paradise, whence it receives the originary root and being. Your Honor will excuse me for coupling to a Divine Herbal, a Forest of Thorns; by a true observation in both material and mystical Gardens, though a Poet records it.

Terra salutiferas herbas, eadernque nocentes

Nutrit, et vrticae proxima soepe rosa est.

Your Honor will love the light better, because the dark night follows so near it, That your Sun may never set, your noble Garden never wither; that your honors may be still multiplied with our most Royal and Religious King on earth, and with the King of Kings in heaven; is faithfully prayed for by

Your Honors humbly devoted, THO. ADAMS.

To my worthy friend Tho. Adams on his HERBAL.

THE Herbs which these dead leaves now bring,

Thy living voice did sweetly sing.

That thy transported Hearers thought

A PARADISE before them brought.

As if their inward eyes had seen

Another EDEN fresh and green.

How they will smell, or taste, thus sent,

Will be perceived in the event.

I stay no censures; for my part,

May they grow green still in my heart.

W. B.

R. S. His good-speed to the Herbal.

Truly thou dost the world disclose, which grows,

Promiscuous; here a Thorn, & there a Rose.

So shall black vices ugly face add grace,

Unto the virtue, which shines next in place.

So when a stinging Thorn shall wound, is found,
An Herb to heal the Soul, and make it sound.

To the divine Author of the divine Herbal, his true friend dedicateth this small Encomium of that which his pen despairs to praise.

HAd ADAM lived till this decayed age,
And seen an HERBAL so Divine, and Sage,
He would have said, that no succeeding man Might do for Adam that which Adams can.
For while he tilled his Garden, his dark mind
In all that compass no Herb-Grace could find.
This man hath found it; and herein is blest:
Adam was good, my Adam's still is best.

W. R. D. of Physic.

To the praise of the Herbal.

THE Ground God's Image, & his word the Rain:
His Christ the Sun, never eclipsed again:
The Clouds his Ministerial instruments:
His Mercy the all-working influence.
From these a Garden of sweet Herbs doth grow,
With such a Spring, as shall no Autumn know.

I. STOKES.

GRGreat Persons love a GARDEN for delight;
To please their nostrils, or content their sight.
The poor man's state likes it to feast withal.
Physicians for the virtues medicinal.
For Odor, Ornament, and medicinal worth,
A sweeter HERBAL never yet came forth.

A DIVINE HERBAL OR GARDEN OF GRACES.

HEB. Chap. 6. Vers. 7. 8.

For the earth which drinketh in the rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed, receiveth blessing from God.

But that which beareth thorns and briars, is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing, whose end is to be burned.

I Presume, here is no Atheist to hear and deny; The Gospel is the power of God to salvation. I hope here is no Libertine; if there be, let him hear also: It is the power of God to confusion. It is a double-edged Sword, and gives, vel vitam, vel vindi•tam, either instruction, or destruction. It is Fire, that doth melt wax to repentance, and harden clay to vengeance. It is here a Rain or Dew falling on the ground of man's heart; causing one soil to be fertile in good works, another to abound with weeds of impiety: For it returneth not back to him that sent it, in vain. That it conveys grace to us, and returns our fruitful gratitude to God, is a high and happy mercy. That it offers grace to the wicked and by their corrupt natures occasions greater impiety, is a heavy but holy judgment.

Not to travel far for Division, here lies Earth before us. And as I have seen in some places of this Island, one hedge parts a fruitful meadow, and a barren heath: so of this Earth, Man; the same substance for natures constitution, clay of the same heap in the creating hand of the Potter; for matter, mass, and stuff, none made de meliore luto; though in respect of Eternities Ordination, some vessels of honor, of dishonor others; here be two kinds, a good and a bad soil: the one a Garden, the other a desert: the former an inclosure of sweet herbs, excellent graces: the latter a wild and savage Forest of Briars and thorns, scratching and wounding offenses.

For the better ground we will consider. 1. The operative means, or working cause of the fertility; the rain that cometh often upon it. 2. The thankful returning of expected fruit; it bringeth forth herbs meet for them, by whom it is dressed. 3. The reward of mercy; it receiveth blessing from God.

All is an Allegory. The Earth is Man: the Rain, God's Word: the herbs are Graces: and the Blessing, is a sweet retribution and accumulation of mercy.

The Earth

IS the best ground that lies betwixt heaven and earth, Man: the noblest part of this world: the worthiest creature, that hath earth for the pavement, and heaven for the seeling: the Creators Image; and as some read, his Shadow; which moves as the body doth, whose it is. When the body puts forth an arm, the shadow shows an arm, &c: so man in his actions and courses depends upon the disposition of God, as his all-powerful Maker and Mover. The blessed Deity (which hath in it a Trinity of most equal and eternal Persons) is the first and best of all beings: the holy Angels next: & a Jove tertius Ajax, man next them.

Ardens conceiteth upon Mark 16. in the Apostles commission, Go ye into all the World, and preach the Gospel to every Creature; that by this Every Creature, is meant Man. For to liveliness, senseless, or reason-less things, God never enjoined to preach the Gospel. But man is called Every creature, because he hath a participation of the best in all creatures. Stones have a being, not life: plants have a being and life, not sense: beasts have a being, life, and sense, but not understanding: Angels have both being, life, sense, and understanding. Man participates with all these in their best. He hath a being with stones, life with plants, sense with beasts, understanding with Angels: a sweet abstract or compendium of all creatures perfections.

Let not all this make man proud. Even this word Earth, though here used in a spiritual sense, puts him in mind that this excellent man is a mortal creature. Earth, must be earth: hot earth to cold earth: that earth which hath now a life in it, to that earth which hath no life in it. Therefore I will say from the Prophet. O earth, earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord. Bestow not too much pains in adorning this perishable earth, thy flesh: the earth thou must be careful of, and which God here waters from heaven with his holy dews, is thy heart, thy conscience.

I could willingly step out a little to chide those, that neglecting God's Earth, the Soul; fall to trimming with a curious superstition the Earths earth, clay and loam: a body of corruption painted, til it shine like a Lily (like it in whiteness, not in humility, the candor of beauty; for the Lily grows low; Lilium conuallium, a flower of the valleys and bottoms) a little slime done over with a past-board; rottenness hid under golden leaves; stench lapped up in a bundle of silks: and by reason of poison sucked from sin and hell, worthy of no better attribute then glorious damnation. Is there no sickness? is there no disgrace? is there no old age? is there no death? that you make so much of this earth. Or do you desperately resolve to dote on it living, as if you never hoped to find it again being dead? Fear not, you shall meet with it again; perhaps when you would not. God hath struck as gallant, as you can make or think yourselves, with sudden, sore, and sure judgments. Believe it, his hand is his own. His arm was never yet broken, luxate, or manacled.

Woe worth them that have put Pride and Covetousness fellow-commoners among us: for they out-eat us all, and sta•ue the whole house of our Land. Covetise would be charitable, but there is that other sum to make up. Pride would give, or at least forbear to extort, but there is a ruffe of the new fashion to be bought. Dignity, a caroch, or strange apparel is to be purchased; and who but the poor tenants must pay for it! upon whom they (once so accoutred) afterward look betwixt scorn and anger: and go as if they were shut up in wainscot.

Sed vitate viros cultum formas{que} professos.

Quique suas ponunt in station comas.

Such a one will not give, lest his white hand should touch the poor beggars: who perhaps hath a hand cleaner then his; I mean, from aspersion of blood, rapine, injury, bribery, lust and filthiness. He cannot intend to pray; for he is called to dinner just when his last lock is hung to his mind. O the monstrous curiosity of tricking up this earth of earth! yet from the Courtier to the Carter, from the Lady to the Inkle-beggar, there is this excess and going beyond their calling.

But I have strayed out of my way, to cut off a lap of Pride's garment: I conclude this Earth with this caution. Respice, aspice, prospice. Look back what thou wast: behold what thou art: consider what thou must be. Recole primordia, attend media, prouideto nouissima. Haec pudorem adducunt, illa dolorem ingerunt, ista timorem incutiunt. Call to mind former things, see the present, foresee the last. The first will breed in thee shame, the other grief, these fear. Remember thou wert taken out of the earth: behold thy strength of life subject to diseases; manifold, manifest, sensible ones: foresee that thou must die; this earth must to earth again.

But the Earth here meant is a divine, spiritual, immortal nature; called Earth by a Metaphor, incapable of suffering terrene fragility. This is God's Earth, and that in a high and mystical sense, though proper enough. Indeed Domini terra, the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof, saith the Psalmist. But he hath not such respect to the Earth he made, as to this Earth for whom he made it. This is Terra sigillata, earth that he hath sealed and sanctified for himself, by setting his stamp and impression upon it. Now the good man's heart is compared to Earth for diverse reasons.

1. For humility. Humus, quasi humilis. The Earth is the lowest of all elements, and the center of the world. The godly heart is not so low in situation; but so lowly in its own estimation. God is said to hang the earth upon nothing. Io. 26. He stretcheth out the North over the empty place, and hangeth the Earth upon nothing: that it might wholly depend on himself. So a true Christian heart, in regard of itself, is founded upon nothing; (hath an humble vilipending and disprizing of its own worth) that it may (ex toto, & ex tuto) wholly and safely rely on God. O man of earth, why exaltest thou thyself? this is the way to prevent and frustrate the exaltation of God. Keep thyself lowly as the Earth; reject all opinion of thy own worth, and thou shalt one day over-top the clouds. The Earth is thy mother, that brought thee forth when thou wert not: a stage that carries thee whiles thou art: a tomb that receives thee when thou art not. It gives thee original, harbor, sepulcher. Like a kind mother, she bears her offspring on her back; and her brood is her perpetual burden, till she receive them again into the same womb, from whence she delivered them. She shall be yet more kind to thee, if her baseness can teach thee humility; and keep thee from being more proud of other things, then thou canst (with any reason) be of thy Parentage. Few are proud of their souls; and none but fools can be proud of their bodies: seeing here is all the difference betwixt him that walks, and his floor he walks on: Living Earth treads upon dead earth, and shall at last be as dead as his pavement. Many are the favors that the earth doth us; yet amongst them all there is none greater, then the schooling us to humility; and working in us a true acknowledgement of our own vileness, and so directing us to heaven, to find that above which she cannot give us below.

2. For Patience. The Earth is called Terra, quia teritur: and this is the natural earth. For they distinguish it into 3. sorts. Terra quam terimus: terra quam gerimus: terra quam quaerimus; which is the glorious land of Promise. That earth is cut and wounded with coulters and shares; yet is patient to suffer it, and returns fruits to those that ploughed it. The good heart is thus rent with vexations, and broken with sorrows; yet offers the other cheek to the smiter, endureth all with a magnanimous patience; assured of that victory, which comes by suffering, Vincit qui patitur. Neither is this all: it returns mercy for injury, prayers for persecutions, and blesseth them that cursed it. The Plowers plowed upon my back: they made long their furrows. They rewarded me evil for good, to the spoiling of my soul. Yet when they were sick, my clothing was sackcloth, I humbled my soul with fasting: I was heavy, as one that mourned for his friend or brother; and my prayer returned into mine own bosom. When the heart of our Savior was thus ploughed up with a spear, it ran streams of mercy, real mercy; which his vocal tongue interpreted, Father forgive them: they know not what they do. His blood Heb. 12. had a voice, a merciful voice, and spake better things then the blood of Abel. That cried from the caverns of the earth for revenge; this from the Cross in the sweet tune of compassion and forgiveness. It is a strong argument of a heart rich in grace, to wrap and embrace his injurer in the arms of love; as the earth quietly receives those dead to burial, who living tore up her bowels.

3. For faithful Constancy. The Earth is called Solum; because it stands alone, depending on nothing but the Makers hand. One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh; but the earth abideth forever. She often changeth her burden, without any sensible mutation of her self. Thy faithfulness is to all generations: thou hast established the Earth, and it standeth. The Hebrew is, To generation and generation: inferring that times, and men, and the sons of men, posterity after posterity pass away, but the Earth whereon, and whereout they pass, abideth. The parts thereof have been altered; and violent Earthquakes begot in the own bowels, have tottered it. But God hath laid the foundations of the earth, (the Original is, founded it upon her bases) that it should not be removed forever: the body of it is immovable. Such a constant solidity is in the faithful heart; that should it thunder Bulls from Rome, and bolts from heaven, Impau•dum ferient ruinae.• Indeed God hath sometimes bent an angry brow against his own dear ones; and then no marvel, if they shudder: if the bones of David tremble, and the teeth of Hezekiah chatter. But God will not be long angry with his: and the balances, at first putting in of the evenest weights, may be a little swayed, not without some show of inequality: which yet after a little motion, settle themselves in a just poise. So the first terror hath moved the godly, not removed them: they return to themselves, and rest in a resolved peace. Lord, do what thou wilt: if thou kill me, I will trust in thee. Let us hear it from him, that had it from the Lord. Psal. 112. Surely he shall not be moved forever: the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance. He shall not be afraid of evil tidings: his heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord. His heart is established, &c. Oh sweet description of a constant soul!

They give diverse causes of Earthquakes: Aristotle among the rest, admits the eclipse of the Sun for one; the interposition of the Moons body hindering some places from his heat. I know not how certain this is in Philosophy:•n Divinity it is most true, that only the eclipse of our Sun, JESUS CHRIST, raiseth Earthquakes in our hearts: when that inconstant and ever-changing body of (the Moon) the world steppes betwixt our Sun and us, and keeps us from the kindly vital heat of his favor: then, O then, the earth of our heart quakes; and we feel a terror in our bones and bowels, as if the busy hand of death were searching them. But no eclipse lasts long: especially not this: our Sun will shine on us again: we shall stand sure, even as mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth forever.

4. For Charity. The Earth brings forth food for all creatures that live on it. Green herb for the cattle: oil and wine for man: The valleys stand thick with corn: the Mower filleth his scythe, and the binder up of sheaves his bosom. A good man is so full of charity: he relieves all without improvidence to himself. He gives plentifully that all may have some: not indiscreetly, that some have all. On the Earth stand many glorious Cities, and goodly buildings; fair monuments of her beauty and adoration. The sanctified soul, in an happy correspondency, hath manifold works of charity, manifest deeds of piety; that sweetly become the Faith which he professeth.

5. For Riches. The Earth is but poor without: the surface of it, especially when squalid winter hath bemired it, seems poor and barren: but within, it is full of rich mines, ores of gold, and quarries of precious minerals. For medals and metals, it is abundantly wealthy. The sanctified heart may seem poor to the worlds eye, which only beholds and judgeth the rind and husk, and thinks there is no treasure in the Cabinet, because it is covered with leather. But within he is full of golden mines, and rich ores; the invisible graces of faith, fear, love, hope, patience, holiness: sweeter then the spices of the East Indies, and richer then the gold of the West. Omnis decor filiae Zion ab intus. The Kings Daughter is all glorious within. It is not the superficial skin, but the internal beauty, that moves the King of heaven to be enamored of us; and to say, Thou art all fair my Love: there is no spot in thee.

6. Lastly, for Fertility. The Earth is fruitful: when the air hath given influence, the Clouds showered down seasonable dews, and the Sun bestowed his kindly heat; loe, the thankful earth returns fruits, and that in abundance. The Christian soul, having received such holy operations, inspirations, and sanctifying motions from above, is never found without a grateful fertility. Yea, as the Earth to man, so man to God, returns a blessed usury; ten for one; nay sometimes 30. sometimes 60. sometimes an hundred fold.

But the succeeding doctrine will challenge this demonstration. I have been somewhat copious in the first word; the brevity of the rest shall recompense it. The operative cause, that worketh the good earth to this fruitfulness, is a heavenly Rain that falls oft upon it: and the earth doth drink it up. Wherein is observable, that the rain doth come, that it is welcome. God sends it plenteously, and man entertains it lovingly. It comes oft, and he drinks it up. God's love to man is declared in the coming: in the welcoming, man's love to God. In the former, we will consider, 1. The matter. 2. The manner. The matter that cometh, is Rain. The manner consists in 3▪ respects. 1. There is mercy, It cometh. It is not constrained, deserved, pulled down from heaven; It cometh. 2. Frequency, it cometh often: there is no scanting of this mercy: it flows abundantly, as if the windows of heaven were opened: Often. 3. Direction of it right, upon this earth. It falls not near it, nor besides it, but upon it. To begin with the Rain.

Gods Word is often compared to Rain or Dew. Moses begins his Song with My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distill as the dew; as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass. Therefore in the first verse, he calls to the earth to hear his voice. Man is the Earth, and his Doctrine the Rain. Mica. 2. Prophecy ye not: the original word is Drop ye not, &c. Amos 7. 16. Thou sayest, Prophecy not against Israel, drop not thy word against the house of Isaac. Ezek. 21. Son of man set thy face toward Jerusalem, and drop thy word toward the holy places. The Metaphor is usual: wherein stands the comparison? In 6. concurrences.

1. It is the property of Rain to cool heat▪ Experience tells us, that a sweltering fervor of the air, which almost fries us, is allayed by a moderate shower sent from the clouds. The burning heat of sin in us, and of God's anger for sin against us, is quenched by the Gospel. It cools our intemperate heat of malice, anger, ambition, avarice, lust; which are burning sins.

2. Another effect of Rain, is Thirst quenched. The dry earth parched with heat, opens it self in rifts and crannies, as if it would devour the clouds for moisture. The Christian soul thirsts after righteousness; is dry at heart till he can have the Gospel: a shower of this mercy from heaven quencth his thirst: he is satisfied. Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst:but it shall be in him a well of water, springing up into everlasting life.

3. Rain doth allay the winds. When the air is in an uproar, and the stoutest Cedars crouch to the ground before a violent blast; even Towers and Cities tremble; a shower of rain sent from the clouds mitigates this fury. When the Potentates of the world, Tyrants, little better then Devils, Gog and Magog, Moab and Ammon, Turkey, Rome, Hell, storm against us; God quiets all our fears, secures us from all their terrors by a gracious rain, drops of mercy in the never-failing promises of the Gospel.

4. Rain hath a powerful efficacy to cleanse the air. When infectious fogs, and contagious vapors have filled it full of corruption, the distilling showers wash away the noisome putrifaction. We know, that too often filthy fumes of errors and heresies surge up in a land, that the soul of faith is almost stifled, and the uncleanness of corrupt doctrine gets a predominant place: the Lord then drops his word from heaven: the pure Rain of his holy Gospel cleanseth away this putrifaction, and gives new life to the almost smothered truth. Woe to them then that would deprive men's souls of the Gospel, and with-hold the Truth in unrighteousness. When they lock up the gates of grace (as Christ reproved the Lawyers) and labor to make the heavens brass, they must needs also make the Earth iron. How should the earth of man's heart bring forth fruits, when the rain is withheld from it? No marvel, if their air be poison'd.

5. Rain hath yet another working; to mollify a hard matter. The parched and heat-hardened earth is made soft by the dews of heaven. O how hard and obdurate is the heart of man, till this rain•falls on it. Is the heart covetous? no tears from distressed eyes can melt a penny out of it. Is it malicious? no supplications can beg forbearance of the least wrong. Is it given to drunkenness? you may melt his body into a dropsy; before his heart into sobriety. Is it ambitious? you may as well treat with Lucifer about humiliation. Is it factious? a Choir of Angels cannot sing him into peace. No means on earth can soften the heart; whether you anoint it with the supple balms of entreaties, or thunder against it the bolts of menaces, or beat it with the hammer of mortal blows. Behold! GOD showers this rain of the Gospel from heaven, and it is suddenly softened. One Sermon may prick him at the heart; one drop of a Saviors blood distilled on it by the Spirit, in the preaching of the Word, melts him like wax. The Drunkard is made sober, the Adulterer chaste, Zacchaeus merciful, and raging Paul as tame as a Lamb.

They that have erst served the Devil with an eager appetite, and were hurried by him with a voluntary precipitation; have all their chains eaten off by this Aqua fortis: one drop of this rain hath broken their fetters; and now all the powers of hell cannot prevail against them. There is a Legend, (I had as good say, a tale) of an Hermit, that heard (as he imagined) all the Devils of hell on the other side of the wall, lifting, and blowing, and groaning, as if they were a removing the world. The Hermit desires to see them: admitted, behold, they were all lifting at a feather, and could not stir it. The application may serve; yield the fable idle. Satan and his Armies, Spirits, Lusts, Vanities, Sins, that erst could toss and blow a man up and down like a feather; and did not sooner present a wickedness to his sight, but he was more ready for action, then they for instigation; now they cannot stir him: they may sooner remove the world from the pillars, then him from the grace and mercy of God. The dew of heaven hath watered him, and made him grow; and the power of hell shall not supplant him. The rain of mercy hath softened his heart, and the heat of sin shall never harden it.

6 Lastly, Rain is one principal subordinate cause, that all things fructify. This holy dew is the operative means and working cause, next under the grace of God in our Lord Jesus Christ, that the souls of Christians should bring forth the fruits of faith and obedience. I know, God can save without it: we dispute not of his power, but of his work; of ordinary, not extraordinary operations. God usually worketh this in our hearts by his word. Thus for the matter: the manner is:

- 1. It cometh.
- 2. Often.
- 3. Upon it.

It cometh:

IT is not forced, nor fetched, but comes of his own mere mercy, whose it is. I am. 1. So saith the Apostle: Every good gift, and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights. They that want it, have no merit of congruity to draw it to them: they that have it, have no merit of condignity to keep it with them. It is the mercy and gratuital favor of God, that this Gospel cometh to us. For, if ipsum minus be munus, how highly is this great gift to be praised! What deserve we more then other Nations? They have as pregnant wits, as proportionable bodies, as strong sinews as we: and perhaps would bring forth better fruits. Yet they want it: with us it is. We need not travel from Coast to coast, nor journey to it; it is come to us. Venit ad limina virtus: will you step over your thresholds, and gather Manna? When the Gospel was far off from our Fathers, yet in them Studium audiendi superabat taedium accedendi: the desire of hearing it beguiled the length of the way. But we will scarce put forth our hand to take this bread: and, as in some ignorant country towns, be more eager to catch the rain, that falls from the outside of the Church in their buckets, then this rain of grace preached in it, in their hearts. Oh you wrong us; we are fond of it; we call for preaching: yes, as your forefathers of the blind times would call apace for holy water; yet when the Sexton cast it on thē, they would turn away their faces, and let it fall on their backs. Let God sow as thick as he will, you will come up thin. You will admit frequency of preaching, but you have taken an order with yourselves of rare practicing. You are content this Rain should come, as the next circumstance gives it,

Often.

GOD hath respect to our infirmities, and sends us a plentiful rain. One shower will not make us fruitful; it must come oft upon us. Gutta cauat lapidem, non vi, sed saepe cadendo. The rain dints the hard stone, not by violence, but by oft-falling drops. Line must be added to line: here a little and there a little. God could pour a whole flood on us at once: but man's understanding Is like a vial, narrow at the top:

Not capable of more, then drop by drop,

Says the Poet. If much were poured at once, a great deal would fall besides, and be spilled. Like children, we must be fed by spoonfuls, according to the capacity of our weak natures. It is not an abundant rain falling at once, that makes the plants grow; but kindly and frequent showers. One sermon in a year contents some thoroughly; and God is highly beholding to thē, if they will sit out that waking. You desire your fields, your gardens, your plants to be often watered; your souls will grow well enough with one raining. How happy would man be, if he were as wise for his soul, as he is for his body! Some there are, that would hear often, may be too often; til edification turn to tedification; and get themselves a multitude of Teachers; but they will do nothing. You shall have them run ten miles to a Sermon; but not step to their own doors with a morsel of bread to a poor brother. They wish well to the cause of Christ, but they will do nothing for it worth God-a-mercy. The world is full of good wishes: but heaven only full of good works. Others would have this Rain fall often, so it be such as they desire it. Such a cloud must give it, and it must be begotten in thunder; faction and innovation. Till Euangelium Christi fit euangelium hominis; aut quod peius est, Diaboli. Till the Gospel of Christ be made man's Gospel, or which is worse, the devils, If the rain, as it falls, do not smell of Novelty, it shall fall besides them. They regard not so much heaven whence it comes, as who brings it. I have read of two, that meeting at a Tauem, fell a tossing their religion about as m•rily as their cups: and much drunken discourse was of their profession. One protested himself of Doctor Martins Religion: the other swore, he was of Doctor Luther's Religion: whereas Martin and Luther was one man. No rain shall water them, but such a man's: otherwise be it never so wholesome, they spew it up again. As if their conscience were so nice & delicate as that ground at Coleine, where some of S^t. Vrsula's eleven thousand Virgins were buried; which will cast up again in the night, any that have been interred there in the day: except of that company, though it were a child newly baptized. For our selves, the limits of sobriety being kept, desire we to hear the Gospel often; and let our due succeeding obedience justify the goodness of our thirst.

When Christ spake of the bread of life, the transported Disciples beseech him, Lord, evermore give us this bread. So pray we, Lord evermore shower down upon us this rain.

Upon it.

GOd so directs this dew of his Word, that it shall fall on our hearts, not besides. The Rain of the Gospel, like the rain of the clouds, hath sometimes gone by coasts. Amos 4. I have withholden the rain from you, and I have caused it to rain upon one City, and caused it not to rain upon another City: one piece was rained upon, and the piece whereupon it rained not withered. But I have wetted your fields, moistened your hearts, with the dews of heaven, given you my statutes and ordinances, saith the Lord: I have not dealt so with every people; there be some that have not the knowledge of my laws. The Sun shines on many nations, where this spiritual rain falls not. This is not all; but as at the last day, two in one bed shall be divorced; so even now one seat in the Church may hold two, upon one whereof this saving rain may fall, not on the other. The Spirit blows where he pleaseth: and though the sound of the rain be to all open ears alike, yet the spiritual dew drops only into the open heart. Many come to Jacob's well, but bring no pitchers with them; wherewith to draw the water. A good shower may come on the earth, yet if a man house himself, or be shrouded under a thick bush, or burrowed in the ground, he will be dry still. God sends down his rain; one houseth himself in the darkness of security: he is too drowsy to be told in with the bells: Another sits dallying with the delights of lust under a green bush, a third is burrowed in the ground, mining and entrenching himself in the quest of riches. Alas, how should the dew of grace fall upon these! Thou wouldst not shelter thy ground from the clouds, lest it grow barren: oh then keep not thy soul from the rain of heaven.

You have heard how the rain is come; now hear how it is made welcome. The good ground drinks it, nay drinks it in. Imbibit. The comparison stands thus. The thirsty Land drinks up the rain greedily, which the clouds pour upon it. You would wonder what becomes of it: you may find it in your fruits. When your Vines hang full of clusters, your Gardens stand thick with flowers, your Meadows with grass, your fields with corn; you will say, the earth hath been beholden to the heaven. That hath rained moisture, this hath drunk it in; we see it in our fruits. The Lord saith, I will hear the heavens, and they shall hear the earth, and the earth shall hear the corn, and the wine, and the oil, and they shall hear Jezreel. The fruits of corn, wine, oil, witness that the earth hath heard them, that heaven hath heard the earth, and that the Lord hath heard the heaven. The heavens give influence to the ground, the ground sap to the plants, the plants nourishment to us, the Lord a blessing to all. The Lord watereth the hills from the chambers: the earth is satisfied with the fruit of the works. He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man: Wine to make glad his heart, and oil to make his face shine; and bread to strengthen man's heart, &c. With such thirsty appetite, and no less happy success, doth the good soul swallow the dew of grace. If you perceive not when the faithful take it; you may see they have it: for their fruits testify it. It is a most evident demonstration, that they have been beholding to the Gospel; they have a sanctified life. Drinks it in.

There be very many great Drinkers in the world. The main drunkenness, that gives denomination to all the rest, is that throat-drunkenness: whereof the Prophet, Vae fortibus ad potandum. These are they, that will not drink this mystical wine in the Church, so willingly as be drunk in the tap-house. Wine-worshippers, that are at it on their knees, protesting from the bottoms of their hearts to the bottom of the cups; if the health be not pledged, actum est de amicitia: farewell friendship. I have read of a street in Rome, called vicus sobrius, sober street. Find such a street in any City or populous town in England, and some good man will put it in the Chronicle.

It hath been said, that the Germans are great drinkers; and therefore to Carouse is given to be derived from them; the word being originally to Gar-rouse, which is to drink off all: Gar signifying totum: so the Germans are called by themselves Germanni, quasi toti homines; as if a Germane were All-man; according to another denomination of their Country, Almany. And so we are grown to think him, that can tipple soundly, a tall man, nay all-man from top to toe. But if England plies her liquor so fast as she begins, Germany is like to loose her Charter. I have heard how the Jesuits out-stripp'd the Franciscans. Indeed Saint Francis at the first meeting saw six thousand Friars. Ignatius, because he could not begin his order with so many, made up the number in Devils. The Germans had of us both priority and number for drunkards. Our English beggars first got the fashion: but because their number was short, and it was like that the Nation would be disgraced, it was agreed to make it up in Gallants.

No marvel, if the Lord for this threaten us with the rod of famine, and to scourge us with that most smarting string of his whip. God hath laid himself fair in his bow already, and is ready to draw this arrow up to the head, and send it singing into our bosoms. Ferro saevior fames: it is one of God's sorest judgments. Beasts and Sword kill quickly; and the Plague is not long in dispatching us: but Dearth is a lingering death. Lament. 4. They that be slain with the sword, are better then they that be slain with hunger: for these pine away, stricken through for want of the fruits of the field. We see how our seasons are changed, because we can find no season to repentance. Our Springs have been graves, rather then cradles: our Summers have not shot up, but withered our grass: our Autumns have taken away the flocks of our sheep. And for our latest Harvest, we have had cause to invert the words of our Savior, Luke 10. He saith, the Harvest is great, but the Laborers are few: pray ye therefore the Lord to send forth more Laborers into his harvest. But we might have said: the Laborers are many, and the harvest is small: pray ye therefore the Lord to send a greater harvest for the Laborers. God hath thus, as it were, pulled the Cup from the Drunkards lips; and since he will know no measure, the Lord will stint him. If there will be no voluntary, there shall be an enforced fast. We have other great drinkers besides.

What say you to those that Drink up whole towns, unpeople countries, depopulate villages, inclose fields? that Pharisee-like, swallow up poor men's houses, drink their goods, though mingled with tears of damme and young ones, mother & children? Are not these horrible drinkers? Sure God will one day hold the Cup of vengeance to their lips, and bid them drink their fills.

The Proud-man is a great drinker. It is not his belly, but his back, that is the drunkard. He pincheth the poor, racks out the other fine, enhanceth the rent, spends his own means, and what he can finger besides, upon clothes. If his rent-day make even with his Silkman, Mercer, Taylor, he is well. And his white Madam drinks deeper then he. The walls of the City are kept in reparation with easier cost, then a Ladies face, and the appurtenances to her head.

The Ambitious is a deep-drinker: O he hath a dry thirst upon him. He loves the wine of promotion extremely. Put a whole monopoly into the cup, and he will carouse it off. There is a time when other drunkards give over for asleeping-while: this drinker hath never enough.

Your grim Usurer is a monstrous drinker: you shall seldom see him drunk at his own cost: yet he hath vowed, not to be sober til his Doomsday. His brains, and his gown are lined with fox; he is ever afoxing. It may be some infernal spirit hath put love-powder in his drink; for he dotes upon the devil extremely. Let him take heed; he shall one day drink his own obligations and they will choke him.

The Rob-altar is a huge drinker. He loves, like Belshazzar, to drink only in the goblets of the Temple. Woe unto him, he carouses the wine he never sweet for, and keeps the poor Minister thirsty. The tenth sheaf is his diet: the tenth fleece (O 'tis a golden fleece he thinks) is his drink: but the wool shall choke him. Some drink down whole Churches and steeples; but the bells shall ring in their bellies.

Every covetous worldling is a great drinker: he swallows aurum potabil as his diet-drink. And like an absolute, dissolute drunkard, the more he drinks, the dryer he is; for he hath never enough. It may be said of him, as it was of Bonosus, whom the Emperor Aurelian set to drink with the German Ambassador; not a man, but a rundlet filled with wine.

And my fine precise Artisan, that shuns a Tavern, as the Devil doth a Cross, is often as drunk as the rankest. His language doth not savor of the pot; he swears not, but indeed: but trust him, and indeed he will cozen you to your face. The love of money hath made him drunk. And though the Proverb be, In vino veritas; yet as drunk as he is, you shall never have truth break out of his lips.

And the unconscionable Lawyer, that takes fees on both hands, as if he could not drink but with two cups at once, is not he a great drinker? If what is wanting in the goodness of the cause, be supplied in the greatness of the fees, O these Foecundi calices, quem non fecere disertum?

Let all think these ebrieties must be accounted for. How fearful were it, if a man's latter end should take him drunk! Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and so that day come upon you unawares. In corporal ebriety the soul leaves a drunken body: in spiritual, the body leaves a drunken soul; both desperately fearful.

There is yet a last, and those a blest sort of Drinkers: which drink in this sweet rain of grace and mercy. They do not only taste it: so do the wicked. Verse 4. They have tasted of the heavenly gift: they have tasted of the good word of God, and of the powers of the world to come. 2. Nor drink it only to their throat, as if they did gargarize the word; as carnal Politicians, and formal Professors do. They must attend, they must admit, but no further then their throats:

they will but gargarize the Gospel. It shall never come into their stomachs, never near their hearts. But these drink it in, digest it in their consciences; take liberal draughts of it, and do indeed drink Healths thereof. Common health-maintainers drink their sickness. Therefore says the moderne Poet honestly, Vne salus sanis nullam potare salutem.

But this is a saving health: such as our Savior began to us; when he drank to us in his own blood, a saving Health to all Nations. And we are bound to pledge him in our own faith and thankfulness; as David, I will take the cup of salvation, and bless the name of the Lord. This is a hearty draught of the waters of life; the deeper the sweeter. Blessed he is that drinks soundly of it, and with a thirsty appetite. There is, as Divines say, sancta ebrietas: such as fell on the blessed Apostles on Whitsunday. Acts 2. They were drunk (not with new wine, but) with the holy Ghost. This holy plenitude doth (as it were) inebriate the souls of the Saints. They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house: and thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures. The Spouse sings of her Saviors kindness, He brought me to the banqueting house, and his banner over me, was love. Stay me with flagons, and comfort me with apples, for I am sick of love. In the original it is called, House of wine. Christ hath broached to his Church the sweet wines of the Gospel, and our hearts are cheered with it; our souls made merry with flagons of mercy Come to this wine, bibite & inebriamini: eat O friends, drink, yea drink abundantly, O beloved: drink and be drunk with it. God will be pleased with this (and no other but this) Drunkness.

The vessel of our heart being once thus filled with grace, shall hereafter be replenished with glory.

A DIVINE Herbal, Or, THE PRAISE OF FERTILITY. The SECOND SERMON.

MATH. 25. 29.

Unto everyone that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance.

A DIVINE HERBAL, OR The praise of Fertility.

THE SECOND SERMON.

HEB. Chap. 6. Vers. 7.

For the earth which drinketh in the rain that cometh off upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed, receiveth blessing from God.

THAT difference which the Philosophers put between learning and metals, we may truly find between human writings and God's Scriptures conferred. They that dignity in the one, find Paruum in magno, a little gold in a great deal of ore. They that dignity in this rich field (which the wise Merchant sold all he had to purchase) find Magnum in pa^o no, much treasure in a few words.

We have heard how the good earth is beholding to God for his holy Rain: the next circumstance objects to our meditation this earths thankful fertility. It bringeth forth herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed. Every word transcends the other; and as it excludes some vicious defect, so demonstrates it also some gradual virtue.

1. It brings forth. It is not barren like a dead ground that yields neither herbs nor weeds. This is no idle heart, that doth neither good nor harm; that like a mere spectator of the world, sits by with a silent contemplation for whom was made that Epitaph:

Here lies he, was borne and cried,

Liu'd threescore years, fell sick and died.

Doing neither profit nor prejudice to the Country he lived in. Here is no such stupid neutrality, nor infructuous deadness. It brings forth.

2. They are not weeds it produceth, but herbs. A man had as good do nothing, as do naughty things. It is less evil to sit still, then to run swift by in the pursuit of wickedness. They that forbear Idleness, and fall to lewdness, mend the matter, as the Devil (in the tale) mended his dames leg; when he should have put it in joint, he broke it quite in pieces. It is not enough that this ground brings forth, but that it yields herbs. Of the two, the barren earth is not so evil as the wicked earth: that men pity, this they curse. It brings forth herbs.

3. Neither is it a paucity of herbs this ground affordeth, but an abundance: not one herb, but herbs; a plural and plentiful number. There is neither barrenness nor bareness in this ground; not no fruits, not few fruits, but many herbs.

4. Lastly, they are such herbs, as are meet for the dresser: such as God expects of the garden, who planted it: such as he will accept, not in strict justice for their own worth, but in great mercy for Jesus Christ. Meet for them by whom it is dressed.

We have now opened the mine, let us dig^o for the treasure. Four demonstrations commend this good Ground.

- 1. It is fruitful.
- 2. It is fruitful in good.
- 3. It is fruitful in much good.

- 4. It is fruitful in such good, as the Dresser looks for.

1. Fertility. It brings forth.

Barrenness hath ever been held a curse, a shame, a reproach. So the mother of John the Baptist insinuated, Luke 1. Thus hath the Lord dealt with me in the days wherein he looked on me, to take away my reproach among men. When God will bring the Gospel, and with it salvation to the Gentiles, he is said to take away their barrenness. So was it prophesied, Isaiah, 54. 1. So was it accomplished, Galat. 4. 27. Rejoice thou barren that bearest not, break forth and cry (with joy) thou that travelest not: for the desolate hath many moe children, then she that hath an husband. The primordial praise of this good ground is, that it is not barren. This Fertility in the Christian heart, doth 1. conclude thankfulness. 2. exclude idleness.

1. For the former; GOD hath given him Rain for this purpose, that he should bring forth fruit: if he should take the rain, and not answer the senders hopes, he were unthankful. The good man considers the end why he received any blessing, and examines what God meant in conferring on him such a benefit. Hath God given him wisdom? Solomon hath taught him to Let his fountains be dispersed abroad, and his rivers of waters in the streets. Whether thy knowledge be great in divine things, tanquam luminare maius; or in human, tanquam luminare minus; remember our Saviors lesson Math. 5▪ Put not your light under a bushel, but upon a candlestick; that it may give light to all that are in the 〈ϕ〉. Let your light shine before men, &c. They that are God's lights, must waste themselves to give light to others. Non licet habere priuatā, ne priueur •a. To keep it private is the way to be deprived of it. So the old verse. Scire tuum nihil est, nisi te scire hoc sciat alter. As we must not be wise in our selves, so nor only wise to ourselves. He that conceals his knowledge, cancels it, and shall at last turn fool. Do not inclose that for several, which God hath meant common. The not employing will be the impairing of God's gifts.

This is the fruit, which the good ground must send forth for all the feeds of grace sown in it. Neither doth this instruction bound it self with our spiritual; but extend also to our temporal gifts. Hast thou riches? when God scattered those blessings upon thee, in the seed-time of his bounty, he intended thou shouldst return him a good crop at the harvest. Be thankful then, in doing that with them for which God gave them. Custos es tuarum, non dominus, facultatum. Thou art a deputed Steward, not an independent Lord of thy wealth. God meant them to promouē, and help forward thy journey to heaven; let them not retard thy course, or put thee quite out of the way. Thou art a thankful ground, if thou suffer thy riches to bring forth those fruits, which the hand of God looks to gather from them. 〈ϕ〉 merciful; be charitable; be helpful. Stips pauperum, the saurus diuitum. The rich man's treasure is the poor man's stock. The distressed soul asks but his own. Christ may say to thee in the Beggars person; Pay (not give) me a penny thou owest me. Da mihi ex eo quod tibi dedi: de meo quaero, non de tuo: da & red: Give me of that which I gave thee: I demand some of my own, not of thine: it is more properly a restoring then a gift. Petimus{que} damus{que} vicissim. Thou askest the Lord, and he giveth thee: but on this condition, that thou give him some of it back again. Thou art more truly the beggar: and God but a demander of a just and easy retribution. This is not all.

God did also mean, that thyself should take comfort in these things. It is a part of that Blessedness, which the Psalmist promiseth to him that feareth the Lord. Thou shalt eat the labor of thine hands: happy shalt thou be, and it shall be well with thee. For God gave wine (for this purpose) to make glad the heart of man, and oil to make his face shine, and bread to strengthen his heart. How doth man divert God's goodness, when he turns his blessing into a curse, and puts his good creatures from their intended uses! The Lambes are for thy clothing, and the Goats are the price of thy field, saith the Wiseman. Thou must wear the wool, and drink the milk of thy own flock. Neither be so sparing, as to starve thyself in the midst of thine own plenty. As the covetous wretch, that dares not eat an egg, lest he should loose a chicken. Nor so profuse to thy own lusts, that thou shouldst give all, vel veneri, vel ventri: not that surfeits or wine should sluice out thy estate into thy belly. Not that with unnecessary quarrels of law, thou shouldst afflict and weary thy neighbors. O madness! that to put out both thy brothers eyes, thou shouldst put out one of thine own: nay, both thine own for one of his. Ungrateful men for God's great mercy; that what they get by peace with foreigners, vainly spend it in civil wars: where the Lawyers set them together, as men clappe on unwilling Mastiues! Most commonly they fight at the long weapon, a tedious, wearying, weather-beaten suit. Sometimes they fight close; Poniard and Pistol, killing quarrels: laying trains for one another, till both be blown up. Can the back of charity bear no load? Are the sinews of love grown so feeble? Alas fools! you get both nothing but the blows; the Lawyer goes away with the victory. He fills his purse, and you come home both well beaten.

Well, the good ground knows no such end for God's blessings. He sees with the eye of faith, another intentional and internal meaning for such bounty. He doth not say of his riches, as the Atheists of their tongues. Psal. 12. They are our own. What hath Magistrate on the bench, or Preacher in the pulpit, or friend in private, to do with it? I waste none of theirs: let me do with my own, as I lift. But saith the Apostle. Fool, what hast thou, that thou hast not received? And wherefore hast thou received them? To satiate thy own lusts? or to bring forth fruit me• for them, by whom thou art dressed? There is nothing, that a man can properly and in district terms call his own, but his sins. His impieties, weaknesses, ignoranc•s, vices, lusts; these are his own. All good things are God's gifts, James 1. 17. Bee thankful then, and after the rain of mercy, bring forth the herbs of obedience. You see what this Fertility concludes; Thankfulness. Hear now what it excludes.

2. Idleness. This good ground lies not dead and barren: nor returns all heavens rain with a naked and neutral acceptation: it brings forth. You read, Luke 19. of a Servant, to whom when his Lord had entrusted a Talent, he hid it in the ground, as an Usurer his money, to keep it safe. And at his Lord's return, Domine ecce tuum: he answered his account with, Lord behold thine own. I knew that thou wert seuerus Magister, a hard Master: therefore I thought it my securest course, to make good thine own again. But the Lord replied, Ex ore tuo: Oh evil servant, out of thy own mouth I condemn thee. Thou shouldst then have answered my austerity, with thy laborious care of my advantage. Therefore hear his doom. Cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. He did not evil with his talent: no, it was enough to condemn him, he did nothing. There is abundance of this dead ground in the world, which brings forth nothing. Idle wretches, that sleep out time and admonition: but their damnation sleepeth not. It was never said, Samson hath lost his strength, till he slept in the lap of Delilah. Idleness doth neither get nor save: there is nothing more empty of good fruits, nor more abundantly pregnant with evil. That man doth ill, that doth nothing; and he looseth, while he gains not. Many beholding with cowardly and carnal eyes, what a long and troublesome journey it is to heaven, sit them down and fall fast asleep. O barren grounds! will ye bring forth nothing? Is difficulty made your hindrance, that should be a spurr to your more eager contention? Know you not, that the violent shall get the kingdom of heaven? Some can follow their dogs all day in the field: others hunt Mammon dry-foot in their shoppes year after year, and never complain of weariness. Only an hour or two in the Church puts an ach into our bones; as if nothing wearied us so soon as well-doing. Is it fear of too much labor, that keeps you from God? why doth not the same reason deter you from serving the devil? His laws are true burdens, and his service drudgery. But Christ's yoke is easy, and his burden light.

I may boldly affirm it: your covetous man takes more pains to go to hell, then the godly ordinarily to get to heaven. He riseth early, and resteth late, and eats the course bread of sorrow: and after tedious and odious misery, goes to the Devil for his labor. Shall we refuse easier pains, for a far better recompense? It is but Satan's subtlety, that makes men believe the passage to life so extremely difficult, that it is impossible. Herein the Devil doth like the inhospitable Savages of some countries, that make strange fires, and a show of dismal terrors upon the shores, to keep passengers from landing. The Sluggard, says Solomon, doth but fain Bears and Lions, (as the superstitious doth bugs) in the way; as apologies of idleness, that he may sit still and be at ease. The slothful person is the Devils shop, wherein he worketh engines of destruction. He is most busy in the lazy. But whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might: for there is no work nor knowledge, nor device, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest. If thy soul be watered with the dew of heaven, thou must needs bring forth. What?

2. Herbs. There is Fertility in Goodness.

THE eldest daughter of Idleness is to do nothing: the next borne to do something to no purpose. But the good man is not only doing, but well doing, Math. 24. Blessed is that servant, whom his Lord when he cometh, shall find so doing. This so consists in doing Bonum, and Bene. As the former verse may seem to intimate. He gives them meat, there he doth good: in due season, there he doth it well. The forbearance of wickedness is not enough to acquit the soul, but the performance of righteousness. The rich Glutton is tormented in hell, not because he did hurt, but because he did not help Lazarus. Non quod abstulerit aliena, sed quod non donarit sua, saith S. Chrysost. Not for taking away another man's, but for not giving his own. He would not give the poor the crumbs that fell from his board; and so facere damna lucrum, make a gain of his losses: for they were lost that fell from his libertine table, and yet would have refreshed the hungry and famished soul. But Dives would not give a crumb, to get a crown. He wore fine linen; but it was his own. He was clothed in rich purple; but it was his own. He fared sumptuously every day, but he did eat his own meat: he took none of all this from Lazarus. Yet he went to hell. God condemned him, because he did not give some of this to Lazarus. Thus it is not only the commission of lewdness, that sinks men to hell, but even also the omission of goodness. Dost thou hear, O Earth; unless thou bring forth herbs, thou shalt be condemned. The Fig-tree had no bad fruit on it, yet was it cursed, because it had none at all. The axe that is laid to the root, shall hew down even that tree, which brings not forth good fruit: though it bring forth no evil. Fire shall take the barren, as well as the weedy ground.

Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. Wherein (me thinks) our Savior implieth a three-fold gradation to heaven. First there must be Iustitia, Righteousness; an habitual practice of godliness; an uncorrupt life, which shall only be entertained to God's Hill. But the ground must be made good, before it can produce good herbs: for the person must be accepted before the work. And this work must be good both quoad fontem, and quoad finem: we must derive it from an honest heart, and drive it to a right end. In the next place, this Righteousness must be a man's own. Nisi iustitia vestra. Here, that ground which brings forth herbs receiveth blessing; not that borrows them of another. For so, as stony and barren an heart as Cheapside, may be a far richer garden then some of those, where those herbs (brought thither) naturally grew. The Pope hath a huge garden of these herbs; wherewith he can store as many, as will pay for them. John the Baptist fasted more then he was commanded: and Mary lived more strictly then God required. Now the Church of Rome keeps an Herbal of these superabundant works; and money may have store of them. But heaven and Rome stand a great way asunder. And as God never gave the Pope authority to make such bargains, so he never means to stand to them. It is not only spoken, but commanded to be written of the dying Saints, that their works follow them. Their own works, not the works of others. No righteousness of friend living, or of Saint dead, shall do thee good, but the herbs of thy own Garden shall be accepted of God. Lastly, this Righteousness must excel, nisi abundauerit. If it come short of those that come short of heaven, what hope have you? It must exceed innocence, and come to real goodness.

We have not sufficiently discharged our duties in being painful, unless we be profitable. Some will take no pains, unless the Devil set them on work. They must be their own carvers in their employment, or they will sit idle. But so a man may work and have no thanks for his labor. It is not then simply and only bringing forth, commends a ground, but bringing forth herbs.

The fruit of Peters repentance is not to deny his Master no more; but to stand to him to the death. We think, if we forbear our wonted notorious sins, we are on the sudden excellent Christians. As if God were beholden to us, for not wounding his name with oaths; for not playing out Sabbaths; for not railing on his Gospel; for not oppressing his poor members: when we neither relieve the poor, nor obey the Gospel, nor hallow his Sabbaths, nor honor his name. Perhaps an Usurer when he hath gotten enough will cease that damned trade: now he is sure of heaven in a trice. Alas! how repents Zacchaeus, if he restores not?

Shall I go a step higher? If he give not liberally, and show compassion to the afflicted Saints? Perhaps an old Adulterer when his sap is grown to cinders, breaks off his uncleanness. When the envious looseth his object, he may suspend his malice. But where are the returned fruits of penitence, manifest and visible obedience? Say the weeds are gone, where be the herbs? To root up the weeds, is but the first step to heaven: and some are forty, threescore years taking this step. How long will it be ere their garden be set with good growing herbs? But Curse ye Meroz, said the Angel of the Lord, curse ye bitterly the Inhabitants thereof: because they came not to the help of the Lord, (and that it might fully appear, that this curse came not on them, for taking part with God's enemies and fighting against him; but only for denial of succor, the song doubles it) to the help of the Lord against the mighty. The offended Lord delivered that Servant to the tormentors, that (did not extort from his fellow that he had no right to, nor wrest away an others goods; but) did only say, Pay me that thou owest; and in a harsh manner, or unmerciful measure, required his own due. It is the form of the last doom, I was hungry, and ye gave me no meat: though you took not away mine, yet for not giving your own, Go ye cursed.

But if that ground be near unto cursing, that brings not forth herbs; what shall we say to that, which brings forth weeds? What hell, and how many torments are provided for oppressing Dives, when Dives that but denied his own shall be tortured in endless flames! If he were bound to an everlasting prison, that rigorously prosecuted his own right, challenged his own debt: whither shall they be cast, that unjustly vex their neighbors, quarrel for that which is none of theirs, and lay title to another man's propriety? If he that gives not his coat to the naked, shall lie naked to the vengeance of God; then he that takes away the poor man's coat, shall be clad with burning confusion. If he that gives not, wring his hands; he that takes away shall rend his heart. The old world did but eat and drink, build and plant, marry and be merry; and were swept away with the besom of an universal deluge; which things were in themselves lawful: what shall become of liars swearers, adulterers, idolaters, malicious, monstrous, scandalous sinners; whose works are in themselves simply unlawful. There are 3. sorts of ground mentioned, Mark 4. and the very worst of them receives the seed, yet all damned: whither shall the tempest of God's wrath drive them, that would never give the Gospel a religious ear? O beloved! weigh it.

Our Idle words must come to judgment: what shall be our answer for unlawful deeds: If omission of good works be whipped with rods, commission of impieties shall be scourged with Scorpions. If they that stand in a luke-warm neutrality, shall be spewed up; sure the palpable and notorious offender shall be trodden under foot of a provoked Justice. Indifferency shall not scape: and shall extreme presumption be spared? that like dogs, sup up the dregs they have vomited. I have read of a Popish Saint, Henry the Dane, that in a mad and hare-brained devotion, when worms crawled out of a corrupt ulcer in his knee, did put them in again. There are such frantic wretches, that when the word hath squeezed some poison out of their consciences, and driven forth lusts, like crawling worms; they in a voluntary madness put them in again. As the Tode casts ont per poison, when she goes to the water to drink; when she hath drunk, sups it up again. Adam lost himself, and all his posterity by one transgression; and do we think, can we hope that our infinite shall scape judgment? Or do we extenuate our iniquities with such self-flattering mitigations, that if they be not innumerable, they are pardonable; and that a few shall bring no man to judgment? And what call we this paucity? As the Gloss deals with a piece of Gratians Decretum. The Text says, Meretrix est, quae multorum libidinē patet. She is a whore, who serves many men's turns.

Now the Gloss brings this indefinite number to a certain, and gives Multorum a reasonable latitude; saying, the name of Whore should not be given her, til she hath lain with three and twenty thousand men. So till we have doubled, iterated, and multiplied our lies, oppressions, lusts, unto thousands, and thousands, we do not think that we merit the names of liars, swearers, oppressors, or luxurious persons. Beloved, these things must be reckoned for: and if nescience be beaten with stripes, willful impiety shall be burned with fire. Blessed ground then, that brings forth herbs; and that not in scarcity, but in

3. Plenty. Many herbs.

The good ground is plentiful in fruits. It bears fruit, good fruit, much good fruit. Multiplicity of grace is requisite, though not perfection. What Garden is only planted with one singular kind of herb? The Christian hath need of many graces; because he is to meet with many defects, to answer many temptations, to fight with many enemies. Therefore, 2. Pet. 1. Join with your faith virtue, and with virtue knowledge, and with knowledge temperance, &c. One Jewel will not serve: Christ's Spouse must have diverse to adorn her. One piece of armor will not secure us; we know not which way the blow will come, nor where it will light. Therefore, Put on the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against all the wyles of the devil. The loins, the breast, the head, the feet; all parts must be armed. The fruit of the Spirit (those happy fruits which the Spirit of God worketh in us, and bringeth out of us) is manifold. Galat. 5. Love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, &c. The Apostle chargeth us to be rich in good works. 1. Tim. 6. And for this cause bows his knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, that according to the riches of his glory we might be filled with all the fullness of God. The reason is given by Christ. To whom much is given, of them shall much be required. And it was his commendation of Mary Magdalen, that because she had much forgiven her, therefore she loved much.

Happy then is that ground, which abounds with good herbs; the fruits of faith, patience, content, charity. Not our riches, but our works shall follow us. Goodness shall only give Pulchrum sepulchrum: and as we use to stick dead bodies with herbs; so these herbs our fruitful good works shall adorn and beautify our memorials, when the name of the wicked shall rot. I know England, inveigh the Papists till their galls burst, is full of pious and charitable works. It is a Garden full of good herbs. Not to us, but to God be the praise; who hath moved such instruments to works of his glory. Yet Quoniam fecimus ipsi, vix ea nostra voce: let every man quiet his own conscience, with the good herbs his own garden produceth.

The rich man grows easily richer, so the good man easily better. It is the custom of most men to be pleased with a very little religion. For the world, we are enraged and transported with such a hunger, that the grave is sooner satisfied: but a very little godliness contents us. But if we would not be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, we must, saith the Apostle, abound with these herbs. And then for a proportionate reward, An entrance shall be ministered unto us abundantly, into the everlasting kingdom of our Savior Christ. Blessed is he that brings forth herbs, many herbs, and lastly such as are

4. Meet for them by whom he is dressed.

The word By whom, may as well be translated For whom: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Two instructions are here necessarily offered us.

- 1. By whom this goodness comes.
- 2. For whom it must be intended.

1. By whom it is dressed.

GOD is the Husbandman that dresseth this ground, and causeth in it Fertility. It was the Pelagian error. A Deo habemus quod homines sumus, a nobis ipsis autem quod iusti sumus. We are beholding to God that we are men, to our selves that we are good men. But the contrary is here evident. God doth not only make the ground, but he makes the ground fruitful: he rains upon it, he dresseth it, he blesseth it. Christ said not, Sine me parum potestis facere, sed sine me nihil. Without me ye can do nothing, saith our Savior, and to the best men, even the Apostles: not a little, but nothing. If God had only made thee a man, and thou made thyself a good man, then is thy work greater then God's work. For, Mel us est iustum esse, quam te hominem esse. Our mere being is not so happy, as our better being. No, this Text convinceth that lie. For, according to that distinction of grace. 1. Here is Gratia operans, God begins the work; he makes the ground good. sanctifies the person. 2. Here is Gratia cooperans, God that begins, performs the work; he raineth upon, he dresseth the heart, and so causeth it to produce herbs. 3. Here is Gratia saluans, whereby he crowneth our will and work in the day of our Lord JESUS. It receiveth blessing from God. So Qui viret in foliis, venit a radicibus humor.

The sap of grace which appears green and flourishing in the branches and fruit, comes from the root. Now in all this Deus non necessitat, sed factitat: God induceth the good to good by alacrity, not enforceth against their wills. Quoniam probitate coacta, Gloria nulla venit. For God doth not work upon us, as upon blocks and stones, in all and every respect passive: but converts our wills to will our own conversion. Qui fecit te sine te, non iustificabit te sine te. Fecit nescientem, Iustificat volentem. He that made thee without thyself, will not justify thee without thyself. (without thy merit indeed, not without thine act). He created thee when thou knewest it not, he doth justify thee with the consent of thy own will. Let this consideration lay us all prostrate before the foot-stool of God, kissing the feet of his mercy, who is the Beginner and finisher of our faith. Who hath made the ground good, and increased the number of herbs with his holy dew from heaven; dressed it with his graces, and promised to reward it with his blessings. Thus By whom: now For whom.

Meet for them who dressed it.

AND is it possible, that man should produce herbs meet for the acceptation of God? Hath he not pure eyes, which see uncleanness and imperfection in all our works? Is there any man so happy, as to be justified in his sight? No; but it pleaseth him to look upon our works in the Crystall glass, Christ; and because they are the effects of a true faith in him, to esteem them meet. S. Peter saith, This is thank-worthy, if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully. Do even our sufferings then merit? 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 even this is grace. To you it is given not only to believe in him, but even to suffer for his sake. This was none of yours, but given you. And when you have suffered, yet you must truly with Paul reckon, that the afflictions of this present world are not worthy of that high inestimable weight of glory. There are no works acceptable (Quae praecedunt instificandum, sed quae sequuntur iustificatum) which go before Justification, but these that follow it. All of us, as Luther was wont to say, have naturally a Pope bred in our bellies; a Mountebank-opinion of our own worth. Narcissus-like, we dote upon our own shadows; and think our works acceptable enough to God. If we have prayed, relieved, believed the history of the Gospel, or attentively heard the word, these are works meet for God. The Monk had but one hole in his Cell, and though it was in the top, upward to heaven, yet the Devil made a shift to creep in there. The Serpent thrusts in his head often in some crack of our good works. Luther paradoxically. 〈ϕ〉 •niustitiarum •ere sola causa 〈ϕ〉. Almost the only cause of all unrighteousness, is (a too-well conceited) righteousness. We are easily induced to think our selves everyone, as Simon Magas, some great man. There must be a dejection of this thought, an annihilation of our own worth; that we can do nothing meet for God, or worthy his just acceptance. For Serdet in distincti•e Iudicis, quod fulget in opinione operantis. That is often foul in the sentence of the Judge, which shines in the imagination of him that doth it.

But as Physicians say, no man dyes of an ague, or without it: so seldom any soul dyes of pride, or without pride; not merely of pride, for (though that sickness were enough to kill it, yet) it is ever accompanied with some other disease and vicious wickedness; nor without it, for it is so inherent unto man's nature, that pride, if it doth not provoke yet at least holds the door, whiles any iniquity is doing. Hence flow so many errors, and factions, and singularities.

For as in the body, a raw stomach makes a rheumatic head, & a rheumatic head a raw stomach. So in the soul, an indigested conceit of some good thing in us, makes the head rume of some rheumatic opinion, or mad factious singularity: and this petulant rheum in the brain, keeps the conscience raw still; that the physic of repentance, or good diet of peaceable obedience cannot help it. Let us correct these exorbitant and superfluous conceits, which are like proud flesh upon us; and know, we are able to do nothing of our selves, but God is fain to put even good thoughts in us. And if we do good from him, how good soever it be as from him, yet running through us it gets some pollution.

Neither let us run into the contrary error, as if in a stupid willfulness, what good soever we did, we could not hope that God in Jesus Christ would accept it. There is a threshold of despair below to stumble at, as well as a post of high presumption to break our heads at. There is a base dejection, a sordid humility. Bar•ena the Jesuit told another of his order; that when the devil appeared to him one night, out of his profound humility he rose up to meet him, and prayed him to sit down in his chair; for he was more worthy to sit there than he. This did appear a strange kind of dejectedness. Surely I think, a man should by God's word and warrant, take comfort in his well doing, and be cheered in the testimony which a good conscience, on good cause beareth to him. So David heartened himself against all the malicious slanders of his his enemies; O Lord thou knowest mine innocence. Good works are the necessary and inseparable effects of a true faith. We are by nature all dead in sin, and by sin concluded under death. Our Savior bore for us this death, and by his passion freed us from eternal damnation. It was not enough to scape hell, how shall we get to heaven? Loe, we are clothed with the garment of his righteousness, hung with the Jewels of his merits. So not only hell is escaped by his sufferings, but heaven got by his doings. Why should we then work? what need our gardens stand so full of herbs? Good reason. Shall God do so much for us, and shall we do nothing for him, for our selves? If the Lord of a Forest gives me a Tree, it is fit I should be at the cost to cut it down, and bring it home, if I will have it. I cannot say that I deserved the tree; it was another's gift: but my labors must lead me to enjoy that, which was freely given me. Neither, can the conscience have assurance of eternal life, so frankly bestowed in Christ, without a good conversation. Faith doth justify, and works do testify that we are justified. In a clock, the finger of the dial makes not the clock to go, but the clock it: yet the finger without shows how the clock goes within. Our external obedience is caused by our inward faith; but that doth manifest how truly the clock of our faith goes. As a man's corporal actions of sleeping, eating, digesting, walking, declare his recovery from sickness, and present health. So his life witnesseth by infallible Symptoms, that the disease and death of sin is mortified in him, and that he hath taken certain hold of eternal life. It is meet then that we should do good works: but all our works are made meet and worthy in him that bought us. I will conclude then with that Anthem, made by a sweet singer in our Israel. Pendemus ate, credimus in te, tendimus, ad te, non nisi per te, Optime Christ.

AMEN.

THE GARDEN OR A Contemplation of the Herbs.

THE THIRD SERMON.

HEB. Chap. 6. Vers. 7.

For the earth which drinketh in the rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth Herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed, receiveth blessing from God.

THat the Herbs of our graces may be meet for the dresser; contentful to GOD, who hath planted, watered, husbanded the Garden of our hearts; we will require in them four virtues: Odor, Taste, Ornament, Medicinal Virtue.

1. That they have a good odour. God is delighted with the smell of our graces. My Beloved is gone down into his Garden, to the beds of spices, to feed in the gardens, and to gather Lilies. The virtues of Christ are thus principally pleasant; and all our herbs only smell sweetly in his Garden. Because of the savor of thy good ointment, thy name is as ointment poured forth, therefore do the Virgins love thee. This savor is sweetly acceptable in the nostrils of God. All thy garments smell of Myrrh, Aloes, and Cassia: It is his righteousness, that gives all our herbs a good odour: and in him it pleaseth God to judge our works sweet. When Noah had built an Altar, and sacrificed burnt offerings on it, the Lord smelled a sweet savor and said, I will not again curse the ground anymore for man's sake. Myrrh and Frankincense were two of the oblations, which the Wise-men offered to CHRIST being an Infant.

Tres Reges, regum Regitria dona tulerunt:

Myrrham homini, vncto aurū, thura dedere Deo.

Tutria fac itidem dones pia munera Christo,

Muneribus gratus si cupis esse tuis.

Pro myrrha lacrymas, pro auro cor porridge purum,

Pro thure, ex humili pectore funde preces.

Three kings to the great King three offerings bring,

Incense for God, Myrrh for man, gold for king.

Thy Incense be the hands a white soul rears.

For gold give a pure heart, for myrrh drop tears.

The way to make our herbs smell sweetly, is first to purge our garden of weeds. For if sin be fostered in our hearts, all our works will be abominated. God heareth not the prayers of the wicked. If ye will walk contrary to me, saith the Lord, I will bring your sanctuaries unto desolation, and I will not smell the savor of your sweet odors. But being adopted by grace in Christ, and sanctified to holiness, our good works smell sweetly, Phil. 4. I have received of Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well pleasing to

God. It seems, GOD highly esteems the herb Charity in our gardens. He that serveth the Lord, shall smell as Lebanon: he shall grow as the Vine, and his sent shall be as the wine of Lebanon.

Man is naturally delighted with pleasant saviors, and abhors noisome and stinking smells. But our God hath purer nostrils, and cannot abide the polluted heaps of iniquities. The Idle man is a standing pit; and hath an ill-savor'd smell, an ill-favored sight. The drunkard is like a bog, a fog, a fen of evil vapors: God cannot abide him. Your covetous wretch is like a dunghill; there is nothing but rottenness and infection in him. Omnis malitia eructat fumum. All wickedness belcheth forth an evil savor. Wonder you, if God refuse to dwell with the Usurer, Swearer, Idolater, Adulterer? There is a poison of lust, a leprosy of putrefaction in them: no carryon is so odious to man, as man's impieties are to God. Yea the very oblations of defiled hands stink in his presence. He that sacrificeth a Lamb, is as if he cut off a dogs neck, &c. As if Ass a foetida was the only supply of their gardens. But good herbs give a double savor: one outward to man, another inward to God. The sweet smoke of a holy sacrifice, like a subtle air, riseth up to heaven; and is with God before man sees or smells it. It also cheers the hearts of Christians, to behold Christian works. Reverence to the Word, hallowing the Sabbaths, relieving the poor, deeds of mercy, pity, piety, give a delightful sent: solacing the souls of the Saints, and pleasing him that made them both men and Saints. Therefore Hearken unto me, ye holy children, and bud forth as a Rose growing by the brook of the field. Give ye a sweet savor, as frankincense, and flourish as a Lily, send forth a smell, sing a song of praise, and bless the Lord in all his works.

2. That they taste well. Many a flower hath a sweet smell, but not so wholesome a taste. Your Pharisaical prayers and alms smelt sweetly in the vulgar nostrils: taste them, and they were but rue, or rather worm-wood. When the Pharisee saw the Publican in the lower part of the Temple, standing as it were in the Belfry; he could cry, Foh this Publican: but when they were both tasted, by his palate that could judge, the Publican hath an herb in his bosom, and the Pharisee but a gay, gorgeous, stinking weed. The herbs, that the Passover were eaten with, were sour: yet they were enjoined with sweet bread. Sour they might be, but they were wholesome. Herbs have not only their savor, but their nutriment. He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man: that he may bring food out of the earth. Herbs thē are food, and have an alimentall virtue. So we may both with the herbs of charity feed men's bodies, and with the herbs of piety feed their souls. A good life is a good sallet: and in the second place to precepts, are usefully necessary good examples. The blood of Martyrs is said to have nourished the Church. The patience of the Saints, in the hottest extremity of their afflictions, even when the flames of death hath clipped them in their arms; hath been no less then a kindly nourishment to many men's faith. It is expounded by an universal consent of Divines, that one of those 3. feedings, which Christ imposed on Peter, is Pasce exemplo; let thy life feed them. Blessed Gardens that yield herbs, like Jotham's vine, that cheare the heart of both God and man. The Poets fain'd, that Nectar & Ambrosia were the food of their God's. Jupiter Ambrosia satur est, est Nectare plenus. But the true God's diet, is the virtues of his Saints, wherewith he promiseth to sup, when he comes into their hearts. Faith, love, patience, meekness, honesty; these dishes are his dainties.

If thou wouldest make Christ good cheare in the parlor of thy conscience, bring him the herbs of obedience. Do not say, I would have been as kind and liberal to my Savior as the best, had I lived in those days, when he blessed the world with his bodily presence. But now I may say with Mary Magdalene: They have taken away the Lord, and I know not where to find him. Damn not thyself with excuses. Wheresoever his Church is, there is he; exercise thy piety. Wheresoever his members are, there is he; exercise thy charity. Thou art very niggardly, if thou wilt not afford him a sallet, a dinner of herbs. Yet, saith Solomon, A dinner of green herbs with love, is better then a fat Ox with hatred.

3. That they be fit to adorn. Herbs and flowers have not only their use in pleasing the nostrils, and the palate, but the eye also. They give delight to all those three senses. Good works are the beauty of a house, and a better sight then fresh herbs strewed in the windows. The Chamber, where Christ would eat his Passover, was trimmed: and the Palace of our Princely Solomon is paved With Love of the daughters of Jerusalem.

There is no ornature in the World like good deeds: no hanging of Tapestry, or Arrase, comes near it. A stately building where an Idolater dwells, is but a gaudy coat to a Sodom-apple. When you see an Oppressor raising a great house from the ruins of many less; depopulating a Country to make up one Family; building his Parlours with extortion, and cementing his walls with the mortar of blood: you say, there is a foul Minotaur in a fair Labyrinth. Be a man dead, it is a foolish hope to rear immortality with a few senseless stones. Perhaps the Passenger will be hereby occasioned, to comment upon his bad life; and to discourse to his company the long enumeration of such a man's vices. So a perpetual succession of infamy answers his gay sepulcher: and it had been better for him, to have been utterly inglorious, then inexcusably infamous. The best report, that can be drawn from him, is but this. Here lies a fair Tomb, and a foul carcase in it.

These things do neither honest a man living, nor honor him dead. Good works are the best ornaments, the most lasting monuments. They become the house wherein thy soul dwelleth, whiles it dwells there: and bless thy memory, when those two are parted. A good life is man's best monument: and that Epitaph shall last, as if it were written with a pen of iron, and claw of a Diamond; which is made up of virtuous actions. Good herbs beautify more then dead stones. Wheresoever thou shalt be buried, obscurity shall not swallow thee. Every good heart that knew thee is thy Tomb; and every tongue writes happy Epitaphs on thy memorial. Thus height up your souls with a treasure of good works. Let your herbs smell sweetly, let them taste cheerfully; let them adorn beauteously. So God's palate, his nostrils, his sight shall be well pleased.

4. That they be medicinal; and serve not only as Antidotes to prevent, but as medicaments to cure the souls infirmities. The poor man's physic lies in his Garden: the good soul can fetch an herb from his heart (of God's planting there) that can help him. Pliny writes of a certain herb, which he calls Theligonum; we in English, The grace of God. A happy herb, and worthy to stand in the first place, as chief of the garden. For it is the principal, and (as it were) the Genus of all the rest. We may say of it, as some write of the Carduus benedictus, or Holy-thistle; that it is herba omnimorbia; an herb of such virtue, that it can cure all diseases. This may heal a man, who is otherwise nullis medicabilis herbis. Wretched men, that are without this herb, The grace of God, in their gardens.

Hyssop and Humility.

IS a man tempted to pride? and that is a saucy sin, ever busy among good works, like a Judas among the Apostles: let him look into this Garden for Hyssop, Humility of Spirit. Of which herb it is written.

Est humilis, petrae{que} suis radicibus haeret.

Let him be taught by this herb, to annihilate his own worth, and to cleave to the Rock, whereout he grows, and whereof he is upholden, JESUS CHRIST. Or let him produce the Camomile, which smells the sweeter, the more it is trodden on. Humility is a gracious herb, and allays the wrath of God; whereas pride provokes it. It is recorded of an english king, Edward the first, that being exceeding angry with a servant of his, in the sport of hawking, he threatened him sharply. The gentleman answered, it was well there was a river between them. Hereat the King more incensed, spur'd his horse into the depth of the River, not without extreme danger of his life; the water being deep, and the banks too steep and high for his ascending. Yet at last recovering land, with his sword drawn, he pursues the servant; who rode as fast from him. But finding himself too ill-hors'd, to out-ride the angry King; he rained, lighted, and on his knees exposed his neck to the blow of the kings sword. The King no sooner saw this, but he put up his sword, and would not touch him. A dangerous water could not with-hold him from violence; yet his servants submission did soon pacify him. Whiles man flies stubbornly from God, he that rides upon the wings of the wind, posts after him with the sword of vengeance drawn. But when dust and ashes humbles himself, and stands to his mercy, the wrath of God is soon appeased.

This Camomile or Hyssop grows very low: Humbleness roots downward, yet no herb hath so high branches. We say, that proud men have high minds: they have not. For their minds only aspire to some earthly honors, which are but low shrubs indeed. The humble man aspires to heaven, and to be great in the eternal Kings favor; and this is the true, but good height of mind. His desires have a high aim, though their dwelling be in the vale of an humble heart. There are engines, that raise water to fall, that it may rise the higher. A lowly heart, by abasing it self in the sight of God and men, doth mount all the other graces of the soul as high as heaven; and the eye of mercy accepts them. Pride is a stinking weed; and though it be gay and garish, is but like the Horse-flower. In the field it is of glorious show: crop it, and you cannot endure the savor. At the best, the proud man is but like the bird of Paradise, or the Ostrich; his feathers are more worth then his body. Let not thy Garden be without this herb Humility. It may be least respected with men; and among other herbs overlooked; but most acceptable to God. Respexit humilitatem ancillae suae, sings the Virgin MARY. He had regard to the lowliness of his hand-maiden. It shall not want a good remembrance, a good recompense. For the last, the least, and the lowest may come to be the first, the greatest, and the highest. This is a necessary herb.

Bulapathum. The herb Patience.

IS a man, through multitude of troubles, almost wrought to impatience; and to repine at the providence of GOD; that disposeth no more ease? Let him fetch an herb out of the Garden to cure this malady; Bulapathum, the herb Patience. The Adamant serves not for all seas; but Patience is good for all estates. God's purpose cannot be eluded with impatience: and man under his hand, is like a bird in a net; the more he struggles, the faster he is. Impatience regards not the highest but secondary causes: and so bites the stone instead of the thrower. If our inferior strike us, we treble revenge. If an equal, we requite it. If a superior, we repine not: or if we mutter, yet not utter our discontent. Think whose hand strikes: it is God's. Whether by a Pleurisy, or a Fever, or a Sword, or what ever other instrument. The blow was his, whatsoever was the weapon. And this wound will not be cured, unless by applying the herb Patience.

The good man hath such a hand over fortune; knowing who guides and disposeth all events; that no miseries, though they be sudden as well as sharp, can vn-heart him. If he must die, he goes breast to breast with virtue. If his life must tarry a further succession of miseries, he makes absent joys present, wants plenitudes; and beguiles calamity, as good company does the way, by Patience. A certain man drew a bow at a venture, and smote the King of Israel between the joints of the harness. The man shot at random, or as the Hebrew hath it, in his simplicity; but God directed the arrow to strike Ahab. So David spake of Shimei. Let him alone, and let him curse; for the Lord hath bidden him. It may be that the Lord will look on mine affliction, and that the Lord will requite good for his cursing this day. Consider we not so much, how unjust man is that giveth the wrong; as how just God is that guideth it. Non venit sine merito, quia Deus est iustus: nec erit sine commodo, quia Deus est bonus. It comes not without our desert, for God is just: nor shall be without our profit, for God is merciful. God hath an herb, which he often puts into his children's sallet; that is Rue: and man's herb wherewith he eats it, must be Lapathum, Patience.

This Rue is affliction; which hath a profitable effect in those that quietly digest it. Of all the herbs in the garden, only Rue is the herb of grace. How much virtue is wrought in the soul by this bitter plant! It is held by some a sickness: it is rather Physic: a sharp and short medicine, that bringeth with it much and long health. This, if they will needs have it a sickness, may be compared to the Ague. The Ague shakes a man worse then another disease, that is mortal. At last it gives $\langle \diamond \rangle$ a kind farewell, and says, I have purged thy cholera, and made thee healthful; by consuming and spending out that humor, which would have endangered thy life. Affliction in the taste is often more bitter, then a judgment that kills outright: but at last it tells the soul, I have purged away thy foulness, wrought out thy Justs, and left there a sound man. So the good Physician procureth to his Patient a gentle Ague, that he may cure him of a more dangerous disease. Vt curet spasnum, procurat febrim. Christ our best Physician deals a little roughly with us, that he may set us straight. And howsoever the Fever of affliction disquiet us a while, we shall sing in the conclusion with the Psalmist. It is good for me that I have been afflicted; that I might learn thy statutes.

Saepe facit Deus opus quod non est suum; vt faciat opus quod est suum. GOD by a work that is none of his, effecteth a work in us that is his. He molests us with some vexations, as he did Job; which is Satan's work immediately, not his; that thereby he might bring us to patience and obedience, which is his work immediately and wholly, not Satan's. So we are chastened of the Lord, that we might not be condemned with the world.

Bees are drowned in honey, but live in vinegar, and good men grow the better affected, the more they are afflicted. The poor man for his ague, goes to his garden, and plucks up thyme. The remedy for this spiritual sever, is true, but sensible patience. Men should feel God's strokes, and so bear them. It is dispraisable, either to be senseless or fenceless. Not to know we are stricken, or not to take the blows on the target of Patience.

Many can lament the effects, but not the cause: and sorrow that God grieves them, not that they grieve God. They are angry with heaven, for being angry with them. They with heaven for justice, that is angry with them for injustice. But Maereamus, quod mereamur paenam. Let not the punishment, but the cause of it, make thy soul sorrowful. Know thou art whipped for thy faults; and apply to the prints the herb Patience.

Hearts-case, and spiritual joy.

DOth sorrow and anguish cast down a man's heart, and may he complain, that his soul is disquieted within him? Let him fetch an herb out of this Garden, called Heartsease; an inward joy which the holy Ghost worketh in him. Though all the days of the afflicted be evil, yet a merry heart is a continual feast. This is Heaven upon earth. Rom. 14. Peace of conscience, and joy of the holy Ghost. His conscience is assured of peace with God, of reconciliation in the blood of JESUS; and that his soul is wrapped up in the bundle of life.

This may be well called Hearts-ease: it is a holy, a happy herb to comfort the spirits. When worldly joys, either (like Rachel's children) are not, or (like Eli's) are rebellious, there is Heartsease in this Garden, that shall cheare him against all sorrows, certainty of God's fau•r. Let the world frown, and all things in it run cross to the grain of our minds; yet with thee, O Lord, is mercy and plentiful redemption. And, if nobody else, yet God will be still good to Israel, even to those that are of a pure heart. Those which we call penal evils, are either past, present, or to come: and they cause in the soul, sorrow, pain, fear. Evils past sorrow, present pain, future fear. Here is Hearts-ease for all these. Miseries past are solaced, because God hath turned them to our good; and we are made the better, by once being worse. Miseries present find mitigation: and the infinite comfort that is with us, within us, sweetens the finite bitterness that is without us. Miseries future are to us contingent: they are uncertain, but our strength is certain; God. Noui in quem credidi: I know whom I have trusted. Here is abundant ease to the heart.

Balsamum, or Faith.

HATH the heart got a green wound, by committing some offense against God? for actual iniquity makes a gash in the soul. The good man runs for Balsamum, and stancheth the blood: Faith in the promises of Jesus Christ. He knows there is Balm at Gilead, and there are Physicians there: and therefore the health of his soul may easily be recovered. He is sure, that if the blood of Christ be applied, it will soon stanch the blood of his conscience, and keep him from bleeding to death: and that the wounds of his Savior will cure the wounds of his soul. And though this virtual healing herb be in God's own Garden, yet he hath a key to open it, prayer: and a hand to take it out, and to lay it on his sores, faith. This is a sovereign herb; and indeed so sovereign, that there is no herb good to us, without it. It may be called Panaceas; which Physicians say is an herb for all manner of diseases: and is indeed the principal herb of grace; for it adorns the soul with all the merits and righteousness of JESUS CHRIST.

Saint John's-wort, or Charity.

DOth the world, through sweetness of gain, that comes a little too fast upon a man, begin to carry away his heart to covetousness? Let him look in this Garden for the herb, called Saint-John's-wort, Charity, and brotherly love. It is called S. John's. herb not improperly: for he spent a whole Epistle in commending to us this grace; and often inculcated; Little children, love one another. And he further teacheth, that this love must be actual. For he that hath this worlds goods, and seeth his brother hath need, and shutteth up his cowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him? He hath no such herb, as Saint-John's-wort in his garden. The good Christian considers, that he hath the goods of this world, to do good in this world. And that his riches are called Bona, Goods; Non quod faciant bonum, sed vnde faciat bonum; not that they make him a good man, but give him means to do good to others.

He learns a Maxim of Christ from the world; which the world teacheth, but followeth not; that is, to make sure as much wealth as he can: as if it were madness, to leave those goods behind him, which he may carry with him. This policy we all confess good; but fail in the consecution. The world thinks, that this assurance is got by purchasing great revenues, or by locking up gold in a coffer. The Christian likes well to save what he can; but he thinks this is not the way to do it. He considers, that the richest hoarder leaves all behind him; and carries nothing but a windingsheet to his grave. But he finds out this policy in the Scriptures; as David was resolved of his doubt in the Sanctuary: that what he charitably gives alive, he shall carry with him dead; and so resolves to give much, that he may keep much. Therefore what he must loose by keeping, he will keep by loosing; and so proves richer under ground, then ere he was above it. The poor man's hand he sees, to be Christ's treasury: there he hoards up; knowing it shall be surely kept, and safely returned him. His Garden shall stand full with Saint-John's-wort; and Charity is his herb, to cure all the sores of covetousness.

Penny-royal, and Content,

DOth poverty fasten her sharp teeth in a man's sides and cannot all his good industry keep want from his family? Let him come to this Garden for a little Penny-royal, Content. This will teach him to think, that God who feeds the Ravens, and clothes the Lilies, will not suffer him to lack food and raiment. The birds of the air neither plow nor sow, yet he never sees them lie dead in his way for want of provision. They sleep, and sing, and fly, and play, and lack not. He gathers hence infallibly, that God will bless his honest endeavours: and whiles he is sure of God's benediction, he thinks his Penny royal, his poor estate rich. No man is so happy as to have all things; and none so miserable as not to have some. He knows he hath some;

and that of the best riches: therefore resolveth to enjoy them, and to want the rest with Content. He that hath this herb in his garden, Penny-royal, contentation of heart; be he never so poor, is very rich.

Agnus castus, and Continnence.

DOth the rebellious flesh, upon a little indulgence, grow wanton; and would concupiscence enkindle the fire of lust? The good soul hath in this Garden, an herb called, Agnus castus, the chaste herb; and good store of Lettuce: which Physicians say, cool this natural intemperate heat. His Agnus castus & Lettuce, are Prayer and Fasting. He knows, that if this kind of devil get possession of the heart, it goes not out but by Prayer and fasting. It is fasting spettle, that must kill that Serpent. Mistress Venus dwells at the sign of the Iuy-bush: and where the belly is made a barrel, stuffed with delicious meats, and heating drinks, the concupiscence will be luxurious of turpitudes. Sine Cerere & Baccho friget Venus. Venerie will freeze, if wine and junkets do not make her a fire. Lust will starve, if flesh-pampering shall not get her a stomach. Where there is thin diet, and clean teeth, there will follow Chastity.

Barly-water, or Cool-anger.

DOth the heat of anger boil in a man's heart; and enrageth him to some violent and precipitate courses? Let him extract from this garden the juice of many cooling herbs; and among the rest a drink of Barly-water; a Tysan of Meekness, to cool this fire. He that hath proceeded to anger, is a man: he that hath not proceeded to sinful, harmful anger, is a Christian, Irasi hominis, i'urtam non facere Christiani. The most loving man will chide his friend sweetly; and he that doth not, hates him in his heart. Sic vigelit tolerantia, vt non dormiat disciplina. But he will not be transported with anger, to the loss of his friends, of himself. He considers, that God is provoked every day, yet is long suffering, & of great goodness. He hears that others speak ill of him: he judgeth not without certain knowledge. Knowing, he suffers not himself abused. It were silliness to believe all; sullenness to believe none. The wrong done to God and a good conscience must move him.

Non patitur ludum fama, fides, oculus.

A man's name, his faith, and his eye must not be jested withal. Yet when he is most angry, he recollects himself, and claps upon his heat a Tysan of meekness.

Parsley, or Frugality.

DEclines a man's estate in this world, as if his hand had scattered too lavishly? There is an herb in this Garden; let him for a while feed on it: Parsley, Parsimony. Hereon he will abridge himself of some superfluities: and remember, that moderate fare is better then a whole College of Physicians. He will wear good clothes, and never better; knowing there is no degree beyond decency. It was for Pompey to wear as rich a scarfe about his leg, as other Princes wore on their heads. But the frugal man can clothe himself all over decently, with half the cost, that one of our gallant Pompeyes caseth his leg. He that would not want long, let him practice to want somewhat, before he extremely needs. I have read of an English Martyr, that being put into a prison at Canterbury, tried (when she had liberty of better fare) to live on a spare diet; as preparing and prearming herself with ability to brook it, when necessity should put her to it. Frugality puts but three fingers into the purse at once: Prodigality scatters it by heaps and handfuls. It is reported, that Caesar's host lived a long time at Dyrrhachium with Coleworts: whereof arose the Proverb, Lapsana viuere, to live sparingly. That stock lasts, that is neither hoarded miserably, nor dealt out indiscreetly. We sow the furrow, not by the sack, but by the handful. The wise man knows, it is better looking through a poor lattice-window, then through an iron grate. And though he will lend what he may, he will not borrow till he must need.

Liver-wort, or Peaceable love.

IS a man sick in his liver, by accession of some distemperature? Doth his charity and love to some neighbors, for their malignancy against him, fail and faint in his heart? For they say, Cogit amare Iecur. I stand not here on the distinction betwixt Amare and Diligere. Then let him step to this Garden, for some Iecuraria; we call it Liver-wort. He asks of his heart for his old love, his wonted amity: if his reason answer, that the persecutions of such and such calumnies have fled her into another country; he is not at quiet, till affection fetch it home again. He thinks, that night he sleeps without Charity in his bosom, his pillow is harder then Jacob's was at Bethel. If carnal respects can draw him to love his friend for his profit, or his kinsman for blood: he will much more love a Christian for his Fathers sake, for his own sake.

There is a story (nothing worth but for the moral) of a great King, that married his daughter to a poor Gentleman, that loved her But his grant had a condition annexed to it, that whensoever the Gentleman's left side looked black, or he lost his wedding ring, he should not only loose his Wife, but his life. One day pursuing his sports, he fell into a quarrel; where (at once) he received a bruise on his left breast, and lost his ring in the scuffling. The tumult over, he perceived the danger, whereinto his own heedlessness had brought him; and in bitterness of soul shed many tears. In his sorrow, he spied a book, which opening, he found therein his ring again; and the first words he read, were a medicine for a bruised side. It directed him three herbs, whereof a plaster applied should not fail to heal him. He did so; was cured; was secured.

The application is this. The great King of heaven marries to man, poor man, his own daughter, Mercy, and everlasting kindness: But threatens him, that his side must not look black; his heart must not be polluted with spiritual adulteries: nor must he loose his wedding ring, love to God and his Saints: lest he forset both God's mercy, and his own salvation. Man in the pursive of worldly affairs, quarrels with his neighbors, and scuffles with contention. So his heart takes a bruise, and looks black with hatred. And Charity his wedding ring is lost, in these willful turbulencies and vexations. What should he do but mourn? Loe, God in his goodness, directs him to a book, the holy Gospel. There the Spirit helps him to his ring again, his former love; and to heal his bruise, prescribes him three herbs.

First Rue, or herb of grace, which is repentance this teacheth him to sorrow for his strife and emulation; and purgeth away the bruised blood.

The second is the $\langle \diamond \rangle$ deluce, Thankfulness: he considers how infinitely God hath loved him; therefore he must needs love God, and in him his. Beatus qui amat te, & amicum in te, & inimicum propter te. He $\langle \diamond \rangle$ it impossible, to love him he hath not seen, and to hate his Image, which he hath seen.

The third, $\langle \diamond \rangle$, which will grow the faster for injuries. Many wrongs hereafter shall not put him out of charity. A good plaster of these herbs will draw his bosom white again. And when it is so, let him use Iecurarta, L••er-wort; a continual application of love to his heart: that he keeping his ring of faith sure from loosing; and his breast from the self-procured blows of contention; he may hold also his wife forever; that beautiful daughter of the King, God's eternal mercy.

Lily, or Pureness of heart.

DOth a man perceive his heart a little beguiled with o•temptation, and desires he to seem better than he is? And how easily is man won, to answer his commendens speculation? Let him fetch the Lily, pureness of heart; which is an herb of grace, growing in the humble valley of a meek spirit; yet is white, and lovely. He knows, God can unmask the vizarded face, and turn the inside outward. If a man be a Herod within, and a John without: a wicked Politician in a ruffe of Precisian-set; God can distinguish him. There are too many of these, that stand up in the fabric like Pyramids: it were better for us, for themselves, if they were but good honest pillars. Plain-dealing, is a good plain song, and makes better music, then a forced squeaking treble, that troubles us all with •ouelties. Shallow honesty is more commendable, then the profound quick-sands of subtlety: and one leaf of the Plane-tree, is better then many handfuls of the pricking Holly. They search out iniquities, they accomplish a diligent search: both the inward thought of everyone of them, and the heart is deep. But when God shall wound them with his arrow, They shall make their tongue fall upon themselves. Such a man's own wit shall snare him; and he shall sing, or rather sigh, Ingenio perii. They are glad of Christ's Cross; not to suffer for it, but to enjoy plenitude of riches by it: And so, like many in great Funerals, rejoice to be mour•ers; that they may get some of the blacks. Put them to no charges, and they'll make you believe, they are strongly, strangely religious. But, 2. Sam. 24. Shall we offer burnt sacrifices to the Lord our GOD of that which cost us nothing? Christ compares this man to a painted sepulcher. Sepulchrum quasi semi-pulchrum, saith one. Extra nitidum, intus foetidum. But let them be the men they seem; and not nettles in the midst of a rose-cake. The good great man, though he be able securely to do much mischief; regards more the sins indignity, then his own indemnity.

Enula camp•a, or Obedience.

PERhaps evil example hath suddenly, and, without provided consideration, led a man into evil. Let him run to this Garden for Enulaeampana. This herb is that Christ enjoined us. Search the Scriptures; adhere to the word of the Lord. This shall give decision of all doubts: and teach thee what path to fly, what way to take. It is given of this herb. Enula campana reddit praecordia sana. It is true of our constant cleaving to the word; that it shall purge the heart of what corruption soever bad precedents have put into it. Of all the herbs in thy Garden loose not this. Forego not the Sword of the Spirit: it is thy best weapon.

Heart-wort, or Affiance in God's promises.

IT may be, sorrow of heart for sins hath cast a man down; and he is swallowed up of too much heaviness. There is an herb to comfort him, called, Heart-wort; affiance in the merciful promises of God: past to him by Word, Oath, Seal, Scriptures, Sacraments,; and therefore infallible. At what time soever what sinner soever repents of what sin soever, God will put all his wickedness out of his remembrance. He will not let that promise fall to the ground, but meets it with peace and joy. Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted. He believes that his wet seed time shall have a glad harvest: for they that sow in tears, shall reap in joy. He persuades himself, that the days of mourning will pass over, as the wind blows over the rain; and then God will wipe away all tears from his eyes, with the hand of mercy. This confidence, in the midst of all sorrows, is his Heart-wort.

Hyacinth, or Following Christ.

SAy that the Christian hath met with some guilded pill of corruption; some poisonous doctrine, yet plausible to flesh and blood. Let him search this Garden for Hyacinth, or Sosequium, Tornesol: an herb, that duly and obediently follows the Sun. Do thou follow the Sun of righteousness: and let his bright beams guide thy course: who hath promised to teach all those, that with an humble heart, and earnest prayer seek it at his hands. Follow the Sun, and he will bring thee where he is, to heaven, at the right hand of his Father. Let no wandering Planet err thee; but adhere to the Sun with a faithful imitation.

Care-way.

IF worldly troubles come too fast upon a man; he hath an herb called Caraway. Not that he bequeaths himself to a supine negligence, as if God would fill his house with provision, while he sits and sings care away. But as he is free from idleness, so also from distrust. He considers the Ravens and Lilies; and knows, that the Lord is the Preserver of men, as well as of Fowls and flowers: that he respects man above those, and his own above other men. Therefore he throws all his cares upon God; as if they were too heavy a lode for himself. Solicitous thoughtfulness can give him no hurt, but this herb Caraway shall easily cure it.

Holy Thistle, or good Resolution.

Yield that he is pressed with injuries; as who will live godly in Christ, and shall not suffer persecution! He is oppressed by force or fraud, might or subtlety; and cannot help himself. He hath a good herb in this Garden, called Carduus Benedictus, Holy thistle: a godly resolution, that through many miseries he must enter heaven. He rests himself on God; and rather wisheth his harmlessness should suffer, then himself not to give passive and patient obedience to lawful authority. Our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thine hand, O King. But if not; be it known to thee, O King, that, we will not serve thy gods, nor worship thy golden Image.

There are many other herbs in this garden: as if he be to deal with crafty adversaries, let him fetch some Sage, honest policy; and such as may stand with an untouched conscience. For Christ gave us this prohibition, to be wise as Serpents; though withal a cohibition, that we be harmless as Doves. If he be tempted to ebriety, he hath in this Garden, Coleworts; moderate abstinence. Matthiolus on the preface of Dioscorides notes such a natural enmity betwixt this herb and drunkenness: that if you plant Colewort near to the roots of the Vine, of it self it flieth from them. But I excuse myself.

Non ego cuncta meis amplecti versibus opto.

I would not leave nothing unsaid. Thus I have walked you through a sacred Garden of many gracious herbs: happy souls thus planted. I will stay you no longer, then to hear your blessing.

It receiveth blessing from God.

The Reward gives a happy conclusion to this good ground. So it pleaseth the Lord to accept our labors, that he will reward them; not after our own merit, for that is not an atom; but after his own mercy, which exceeds heaven and earth. Receive this blessing with a thankful heart; thou hast not earn'd it. It is objected, that here it is said, their works are meet for God, therefore deserve this blessing. And Wisd. 3. God proved them, and found them meet for himself; as if they could stand God's trial. And Paul exhorts us to walk worthy of the vocation, wherewith we are called. I answer, Deus coronat dona sua, non merit a nostra. God rewards his own works, not our worth. It is given, Non meritis operantis, sed miseratione donantis: not for the deserts of the doer, but for the mercy of the giver. Datur operatoribus, non pro operibus. Luke chap. 12. Verse 32. It is my Fathers will to give you a kingdom.

Do we good? from whom is it? doth not God work in us to will and to do? Thou hast done well: be comforted; be not proud. It was God's work, not thine. Omnia merita Dei dona sunt: & ita homo propter ipsa magis Deo debitor est, quam Deus homini. All our good works are God's gifts: and therefore man is more beholding to God for them, then God to man. If in this Garden any good herb spring over the wall, and saucily challenge to it self a prerogative of merit; deal with it, as the Gardener with superfluous branches; prune it off. Or as Torquatus with his over-venturous son; cut it short with the sword of the Spirit, for daring beyond the Commission. Our Adversaries oppose this truth very violently, both in the Schools, and in the Pulpits: but come they to their deathbeds, to argue it between God and their own souls; then grace and grace alone; mercy and only mercy; JESUS and none but JESUS.

And this even their great Bell-weather is forced to acknowledge. Propter incertam utinam propriae iustitiae, & periculum inanis gloriae, tutissimum est fiduciam totam in sola Dei misericordia & benignitate reponere. I will translate his words truly. By reason of the uncertainty of our own righteousness, and the danger of vain glory; the safest course is to put our whole trust and confidence in the only favor and mercy of God. But perhaps Bellarmino spoke this as a mere Jesuit; and now made Papable, he be willing to recant and unsay it.

This blessing then comes not for the Grounds merit, but for the Dressers mercy. It is said, Gen. 6. tht God would destroy the World with a flood, Because the imaginations of man's heart were only evil continually. And Gen. 8. it is said, that GOD will no more curse and destroy the ground for man's sake; because the imaginations of his heart are only evil from his youth. The same reason that is alleged, why God will not spare the world, is also alleged why God will spare the world.

It serves plentifully to demonstrate, that not for man's merit, but for God's mercy, confusion is withholden. I am the Lord, I change not. Therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed.

It receiveth.

Such is the immense goodness of God, that he will add grace to grace, and when he hath shown mercy, he will show more mercy. As if he expected no other argument of future bounty, but his former bounty. Whom he did predestinate, them also he called: and whom he called, them also he justified: and whom he justified, them he also glorified. Man is to be considered in a four-fold estate. Confectionis, Infectionis, Refectionis, Perfectionis. First, God made him happy, without misery, without iniquity. God hath made man upright: but they have sought out many inventions. If a glorious heaven above him, a fruitful earth under him, serviceable creatures about him, could give him solace and felicity, he was not scanted. Here is man's first draught of God's bounty; his original state. 2. Then man fell from holiness, and so from happiness; and lost the favor of the Creator, with the good of the creature: that a general curse fell on the earth for his sake. Loe, now he lies weltering in his gore, who shall heal him, who shall revive him? God promised him a Savior, and kept his word. Look on his own only Son hanging, bleeding, dying on an accursed Cross. 3. A Redeemer is come; what is man the better for it, that hath no power to believe on him? Faith he hath none, but what God must put into him. Again, Lord help: let us receive yet a third mercy: make us believers, or we are never the better. We had as good have no Savior, as not to have him our Savior: and ours he cannot be, unless the Lord make us his. 4. Lastly the Lord gives us Faith: and so we shall receive a happiness by this believed Savior, better then ever our first creation gave us: a kingdom; a kingdom of life; an eternal kingdom of life; that can never be taken from us. Thus we are still receivers, and God is the giver. We receive blessing from God.

Blessing.

THIS word is of a great latitude. What good is there, which will not be brought within this compass? This blessing hath a double extent. There is Beatitudo viae, and Beatitudo Patriae. A blessing of the way, and a blessing of the Country: one of grace, the other of glory. The former is either outward, or inward.

1 Outward, Psal. 132. I will abundantly bless her proutsion: I will satisfy her poor with bread. Deut. 28. Blessed in the field, blessed in the city. The fruits of thy body, of thy ground, of thy cattle shall be blessed. Thy basket, thy store; thy going out, and coming in shall be blessed. Which things do often come to the godly even on earth, and that in abundance. For as all have not riches, that exceedingly love them: so many have them, that do not much care for them. Wealth is like a woman; the more courted, the further off.

2 Inward. The godly on earth is (as it were) in the suburbs of heaven; whose kingdom consists, not in meat and drink, but righteousness, peace of conscience, and joy of the holy Ghost. Could his life be as full of sorrows, as ever Lazarus was full of sores, yet he is blessed. The Sun-shine of mercy is still upon him; and the blessing of GOD makes him rich. Let the air thunder, and the earth quake, and hell roar; yet He that walketh uprightly, walketh surely. Qui vadit plane, vadit sane. I have read it storied of a young Virgin, that at a great Princes hands had the choice of three vessels. One whereof should be freely given her, even that she should choose. The first was a vessel of gold, richly wrought, and set with precious stones; and on it written. Who chooseth me shall have what he deserveth. The second was of silver. superscribed thus. Who chooseth me shall have what nature desireth. The third was of lead; whose motto was this. Who chooseth me, shall have what God hath disposed. The former pleased her eye well, but not her understanding. It offered what she deserved. She knew, that was just nothing: therefore refused it. The second considered, offered what Nature desires. She thought that could be no solid good; for Nature desires such things as please the carnal lust. This she also refused. The third had a course outside, but the sentence pleased her well; offering what God had disposed. So she faithfully put her self upon God's ordinance, and chose that. This Virginis man's soul. The golden vessel is the worlds riches; contentfull to an avarice eye. Too many choose this: but being opened, it was full of dead men's bones, and a fools bable. To testify them fools, which cleave to the world: and at last all their hopes shall be rewarded with a bable. Neither is this all. Though their inward thought be, that their houses shall continue forever; yet they shall be laid in the grave like sheep, and death shall feed on them. The silver-vessel is the lusts of the flesh; those fond and vain delights, which concupiscence seeks. So saith the Motto: It gives what nature desireth: but corrupt nature affects nothing, but what gives complacency to the flesh. This vessel opened was full of wild fire, and an iron whip. God shall scourge the lustful here with the whip of judgments, diseases of body, infamy of name, overthrow of estate, vexation of conscience. And Satan shall hereafter burn them in wild fire, such flames as can never be quenched. The leaden vessel is, as the sense & sentence declares it, the blessing of God. The chuser of it shall have what God hath disposed for him. Blessed soul that makes this election: for opened, it was found full of gold and most precious jewels; everyone more worth then a world, the immortal graces of God's Spirit.

The Virgin chose this, and she was married to the Kings son. Choose this vessel, O my soul; and Jesus Christ the king of heaven shall marry thee. No matter though it seem lead without; glister not with earthly vanities: it is rich within; the wealth thereof cannot be valued, though all the Arithmeticians of the world go about to sum it. There be many that say, who will show us any good? Lord lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us.

This blessing hath yet a further extent, to the blessedness of our Country: when we shall hear it: Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. For, si sic bonus es sequentibus te, qualis futurus es consequentibus! If thou Lord, be so good to those that follow thee, what wilt thou be to those that find thee! If there be such blessing in this world, what shall that be in the life to come! If the first fruits of our inheritance, and the earnest of the spirit be so graciously sweet here: surely when that infinite mass of glory shall be broken up, and communicated to us, we shall be wonderfully ravished. When that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away. This is, beat a vita in fonte, saith Aug. a blessed life indeed. Aeterna sine succession, distributa sine diminutione, communis sine inuidia, sufficiens sine indigentia, iucunda sine tristitia, beata sine omni miseria. Thou wilt show me the path of life: in thy presence is the fullness of joy, at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore.

No tongue can declare this blessing; happy heart that shall feel it: whose glorified eye shall one day behold all: and ten thousand times more than we have spoken. Who shall say, as it is in the Psalm: Sicut 〈ϕ〉, it a & vidimus; as we have heard, so we have seen in the City of our God. As we have heard it preached on earth, we now find it true in heaven: though the City we enjoy far excel the map we saw.

Well this is God's blessing, and he will give it to the good ground. Labor we then to be fruitful Gardens; and to abound with gracious herbs; that God may in this world shower upon us, the dews of his mercy: and after this life transplant us to his heavenly Paradise. Let not the pleasures of sin; the lusts of the wanton flesh, the riches, snares, cares of the world, nor all those transient delights, whose taste is only in the sense, the operation in the conscience; that tickle men for an hour, and wound them forever: nor all those vain desires of carnal complacency, which shall one day be laid upon God's cold earth; intercept us to the privation of this blessing.

Let us not be hunting after sports, as Esau for venison, and loose our blessing: lest we cry, howl, roar, when it is too late to recover it Think, oh think: there is a heaven, a GOD, a JESUS, a kingdom of glory, society of Angels, communion of Saints, joy, peace, happiness, and eternity of all these; which it will be a fearful thing to loose, for the base pleasures and short delights of this world.

O great God of all, and sweet Father of thy chosen, pour upon us thy holy dews of grace: make our souls to stand thick with sanctified herbs; that we may receive thy blessing. That honoring thee in the day of Grace, we may be honored by thee in the day of Glory. Grant this for thy loved Son, and our loving Savior, even, JESUS CHRIST his sake. Amen.

THE FOREST OF THORNS.

THE FOURTH SERMON.

HEB. Chap. 6. Vers. 8.

But that which beareth thorns and briars, is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing, whose end is to be burned.

THIS verse begins with a word of Disjunction; But. The Rain of grace falls upon the good ground: it returneth herbs; it receiveth blessing. But that which beareth thorns and briars, is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing. &c. It is undeniably true, that S. Paul knew no Purgatory: otherwise, he that shunned not to declare to men all the counsel of God, would not in a voluntary silence have omitted this mystery. He delivers two sorts of Grounds, the good and the bad; the one blessed, the other near unto cursing. He knew no mean, either betwixt good and evil men, or betwixt reward and punishment, blessing and cursing. It seems that Christ himself was ignorant of that point, which the Papists know so soundly, and believe so roundly. For he says, In God's Field, whatsoever grows is either corn or cockle: for the one whereof a Barn is provided; for the other, unquenchable Fire. A third sort, between herbs and weeds, had either the Master or the Servant known, they would have acknowledged.

This first word of the Text, But, is a strong engine set to the walls of Purgatory, to over-turn them, and over-burn them with the fire of hell. For they are imaginary pales, that divide hell and Purgatory: take away your conceit, and they are both one: all is hell. For surely hell was raked, when Purgatory was found; and it is nothing else but a larder to the Popes Kitchen. What fancy soever founded it, their wits are foundered, that labor to maintain it. For they cannot tell us, vel quid sit, vel vbi: what it is, nor where it is. They cavil with us for want of unity and consent in judgment. Yet Bellarmino recites eight several opinions amongst them, about the place: And concludes at last, that it must remain among those secrets, Quae suo tempore aperientur nobis; which shall be unfolded to us in their times. Some think the torments of it to consist in fire, others in water: some that the afflictors are Angels, other that they are Devils. So they teach omni modo, that which is nullo modo: and because it is vbique, is therefore nullibi. Howsoever, it being the Popes peculiar; and in his power to command the Angels to fetch out whom he list; me thinks the Popes are strangely unmerciful, that in all this time none of them hath made a general Gaole-delivery. But our Purgatory is the blood of Jesus Christ, which cleanseth us from sin. And they that have no portion in this blood shall be rejected, are nigh unto cursing, and their end is to be burned.

The barren, or rather evil-fruited ground is the ground of my discourse: and according to the common distinction of Evil, here is a double evil in the Text. Vnum quod malus facit, alterum quod malus patitur. An evil which the wicked man doth; and an evil which he suffers: an evil that is sin, and an evil that is punishment for sin. In the former the wicked are agents; in the latter, patients. The one evil is done by them, the other upon them. They offend God's justice, and GOD in his justice offends them. They have loved cursing, and cursing shall be unto them: they desired not blessing, and it is far from them. They produce Thorns, and the end of thorns is to be burned. The first and worst evil (for the other, though evil to them, is good in God's good Justice) is sin. Herein 1. the wicked are compared to bad ground. 2. their iniquities to thorns and briars. 3. and the manner how so ill weeds arise from this ground, is said to be bearing. The earth that beareth thorns, &c. Here first observe,

1 The different word the Apostle useth. For the good earth, he says, it is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 bringing forth herbs. For the evil, it is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, bearing, not bringing forth. As if good works were brought forth like children, not without pain and travel: evil works but cast out like froth or skim; as easily vented, as invented. Therefore the earth is said ebullire, to bubble or boil out such things, as mere excretions. Our proverb says, An ill weed grows apace. Herbs grow not without preparing the ground, planting and watering them by seasonable dews and diligence. Weeds are common: it is hard to set the foot besides them. The basest things are ever most plentiful. Plurima, pessima. I have read of a kind of mouse, that breeds six score young ones in one nest. Whereas the offspring of the Lioness or Elephant is but single. You shall find your furrows full of Cockle and da••ell, though you never sew them. The earth, saith the Philosopher, is now an own mother to weeds, and naturally breeds and feeds them: but a stepmother to good herbs. Man by a proclivity of his own natural inclination, is apt to produce thorns and briars: but ere he can bring forth herbs, Graces, God must take pains with him. No husbandman so labors his ground, as God our hearts. Happy earth, that yields him an expected harvest. But that which beareth Thorns is near to be cursed and burned.

2 Observe, that a wicked man is compared to bad earth, and that fitly in 5. respects.

1 For baseness. The earth is the heaviest of all Elements, and doth naturally sink downwards; as if it had no rest, but in the center; which it self is. A wicked man is base-minded, and sinks with a dull and ponderous declination; not regarding the things above, but these below. He hath commune with men sursum os, but with beasts, deorsum cor. All his affections have a low object, not out of humility, but base dejection. His hope, desire, love, joy, are set on these inferior things: and like a Mole, he digs still downwards, till he come to his Center, his own place, Hell. Telluris inutile pondus.

2 For coldness. Experience teacheth that the earth is cold; & coldness is a natural quality pertinent to it, though accidentally there be bred in it fiery vapors. The wicked man hath a cold heart, frozen up in the dregs of iniquity; though there be an unnatural heat sometimes flaming in him; the fire of lust and malice tormenting his bowels: but this is no kindly heat to warm his conscience. That is derived from the fire of the Temple, that never goes out, and only given by Jesus Christ, that baptizeth with the holy Ghost, and with fire.

3 For foulness. The squalid earth (for we speak not here of any good ground) is called Lutulenta terra; miry and noisome: yet is it neat and clean in comparison of a sin-contaminated soul. The body was taken from the earth; not the Soul: the body shall resolve to the earth; not the soul: yet the polluted soul is more sordid, then either a leprous body, or a muddy earth. In the eye of GOD, there is no beauty so acceptable, no foulness so detestable, as the souls. The Dove carried the praise of beauty from the Peacock, by the Eagles judgment: that though the Peacock living had the fairer plumes, yet dead he hath but a black liver. God's judgment of all men's fairness, is by the liver, the cleanness of the heart in his eyesight.

4 For obscurity and darkness; the earth is called a place of black darkness, the land of forgetfulness. So Job and David term it. The wicked Soul is full of darkness, thickness of sight, caecitie of understanding; not seeing the glorious liberty of the Sons of God. Our Gospel is hid to those that are lost. Whose minds the god of this world hath blinded. There is in them Hebetudo mentis, which is acutae rationis obtusio, carnalis intemperantiae crassis sensibus inducta. They are so utterly ignorant of heaven, that (as it is in the Proverb) ne pictum quidem viderunt: they have not seen it, so much as in the map or picture. As to men shut up in the low caverns of the earth, not so much as the sun, and stars, and the lights of heavens lower parts have appeared. Tolerabilior est poena, viuere non posse, quam nescire. Ignorance is a heavier punishment than death; saith the Philosopher. Darkness is their desire, because their deeds are evil. Perhaps at last, after a long dotage on their dark delight, earth; they come to hear of a better & richer country: and then take only with them the Lantern of Nature to find it. But so erepto lumine can delabrum querunt. Having lost the light, they grope for the Candlestick. A man that comes into his house at midnight, sees nothing amiss: in the day-light he finds many things misplac'd. Nature is but a dark Lantern, when by it we endeavor to ransack the conscience. Only the light of grace can demonstrate all the sluttish and incurious misorders in our souls.

5 The main resemblance between an evil ground and worse man, consists in the ill fruits, that they both produce: briars and thorns; and such (not only unhelpful, but) hurtful vices. This is the principal analogy, which our Apostle intends; the pith and marrow of this reference. But before we come to a particular anatomizing of this Subject, some observable doctrines fall profitably to our instruction. Observe therefore.

1 The word of God will work some way. It falls not upon any ground in vain; but will produce herbs or weeds. It is such Physic, as will either cure or kill. It mollifies one, makes another more hard. Some hearts it pricks, others it terrifies, though converts not, as it made Felix tremble. None ever heard it, but they are either better or worse by it. We preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumbling block, unto the Gentiles foolishness. But unto them which are called, both of Jews and Greeks, the power of GOD, and the wisdom of God. In this Epistle it is called a double-edged sword, &c. It is either a converting or convincing power; sealing receivers to redemption, contemners to rejection. The word which I have preached, shall judge you in the latter day.

If this doctrine were considerably digested in hearers hearts, what a zealous preparation would it work in their souls! It would bring us to these seats with other minds, if we remembered, that we return not back to our own doors the very same we came out; but either somewhat better, or much worse. Sergius Paulus was turned, Elimas obdured at one Sermon. After our Saviors heavenly Sermon. John 6. Some went back, and walked no more with him; that Christ bespake his Apostles, Will ye also go away? Others stuck more close. Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. The Prophet Isaiah speaks fully to this purpose. As the rain cometh down, and returneth not back, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater. So shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth: it shall not return unto me void; but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it.

The word that we have preached, shall either save you, or judge you. It shall be either a copy of your pardon, or a bill of your inditement at the last day. John the Baptist calls the Gospel a Fan, that will distinguish between true and false children, between Wheat and Chaff. It will make known the faithfulness of those, that with honest hearts embrace it; and scatter hypocrites like chaff, by reason of their insolid levity. Simeon so prophesied to Mary the Virgin of her Son, That he should be the fall and the rising, the reparation and ruin of many: and whiles he is set for a sign Which shall be spoken against, by this means the thoughts of many hearts shall be revealed. The word is like fire, that hath a double operation upon the several subjects it works; stubble or gold. It fires the one, and fines the other. Some hearts it enflames with zeal to it: other it sets on fire to quench, impugn, persecute it. It is to conversion, if believed; to confusion if despised. Lo, Christ, himself preaching, some faithfully entertain, others reject; as the Gergesens, that had rather have their hogs saved than their souls.

2. That thorns are produced, the fault is not in the good Rain, but the ill ground. What could I, saith God, have done more to my Vineyard? I have done enough to make it bear good grapes. Wherefore then, or from what cause brings it forth wild grapes? The earth desires the influence of heaven, and showers from the clouds, to make it fruitful. It is granted: the Sun shines, the dew fall. The Garden hereupon brings forth herbs, the desert thorns. If these blessings of heaven were the proper cause of the weeds; why hath not then the good ground such cursed effects? The everlasting lamp of heaven sends forth his saving rays: and the sacred dews of the Gospel fall on the pure and unclean heart. There it is requited with a fertile obedience: here with an impious ingratitude. Let not the mercy of God be blamed for this man's misery. Perditio ex se: God hath done enough to save him. S. Augustine directly to this purpose. Simul pluit Dominus super segetes, & super spinas. Sed segeti pluit ad horreum, spinis ad ignem: & tamen vna est pluvia. GOD at once rains upon the herbs and the thorns. Upon the herbs or good seed, to shoot it up for his barn, for himself; upon the thorns to fit them for the fire: yet is it one and the same rain.

This shall cover the faces of Libertines with everlasting confusion; who are evermore rubbing their own filthiness on God's purity; and charging him as the author of their sins. If the Devils in hell should speak, what could they say more? we have fallen from our happiness, and God caused it. Reprobate thoughts! Men have spilled blood, defiled forbidden beds, struck at Princes with treasons, ruined countries with depopulations, filled the earth with rapes, and shot at heaven with blasphemies; and lay their damnation on their Maker: deriving from his purpose excuses of their wickedness. The inevitable decree of God's counsel is charged: the thought of that hath made them careless: so with good food they poison themselves. Willing fools, rack not your belief with impossibilities. Behold! God is so far from authorizing your sins and falls; that he rains on you the holy dews of his word to mollify your hearts. Justifying himself by this proffered means of your salvation, that he would not the death of a sinner. O but his hidden will is to damn us. Mad men, that forsake that signed will, written in tables, published with trumpets, commanded with blessings, cursings, promises, menaces, to which every soul stands bound! and fall to prying into those unsearchable mysteries, covered with a curtain of holy secrecy, not to be drawn aside till the day comes, wherein we shall know as we are known.

Cease aspiring man to root thy wickedness in heaven; and to draw in God as an accessory to thy profaneness. God would have thee saved, but thou wilt bear thorns and briars, though thou endangerest thyself to cursing. Is this the requital for his mercy? Are all his kindnesses to thee thus taken? That when he hath done so much to bring thee to heaven, thou wilt tax him for casting thee to hell? when he hath so labored to make thee good, thou wilt lay to his charge thy own voluntary badness. No: justify God, and magnify his mercy. Accuse thine own corrupt heart, that turns so good and alimentall food into offensive crudities. Say, Heaven is good, but thy ground is naught. Fatness and juice hath been bestowed on thee, but thou hast yielded pestilent and noisome fruits. Lay not the fault on heaven, but on the native corruption of thy own heart, that hath decocted the goodness of God into venom.

3. This observation shall make way (and give place) to another. That the ground is very unthankful, which answers the kindness of heaven in raining on it, with briars and thorns. Wretched man, that receives so blessed dews from the fountain of mercy, and returns an ungrateful wickedness. Unthankful it is; as failing in both these essential parts of Gratitude; acknowledging, and requiting a benefit: and so guilty both of falsehood and injustice. Say the wicked did confess God's mercies, yet where's their obedience? True thankfulness is called Gratiarum actio, non dictio. Whiles for holy dews they render unholy weeds, this disobedience is the greatest Ingratitude. The silence of our tongues; the not opening our lips, to let our mouth show forth his praise, is a grievous unthankfulness. He is of an evil disposition, that conceals or dissembles a benefit. This is one branch of Ingratitude: but our speech hitherto keeps but low water; let us rise up to view the mountainous billows of that ingratitude here taxed; a real, actual, sensual, senseless unthankfulness: if it be not a degree beyond it, and unthankfulness too poor a word to express it. Mere ingratitude returns nothing for good; but this sin returns evil for good. Silence in acknowledging is too short: we must think of a contumacious and contumelious retribution. God, after his merciful rain looks for some herbs of Grace, when he walks down into his Garden, to see whether the Vine flourished, and the Pomegranates budded. And behold weeds, stinking weeds, stinging weeds; thorns and briars! Here is Ingratitude in full proportion, with all the dimensions of his ugly stigmatic form. This is that wickedness, which brings the ground here to rejection, malediction, combustion. Observe further that

4. Wicked men prove commonly so much the worse, as they might have been better: and divert the means of their conversion to their confusion. The more rain of the Gospel they receive, the more abundantly they thrust forth the thorns of iniquities. The roots of these briars are surely earthed in their hearts, and do boil out at the warm dews of the Word. It fares with them, as with a man of a surfeited stomach: the more good meat he eats, the more he increaseth his corruption. The former crudities undigested, ingested, having the greater force, turn the good nutriment into themselves. There is such an antipathy betwixt the good word of God, and the heart of a reprobate; that the more it wrestles to bring him to heaven, the more he wrestles against it, that he might be damned. Tully mentions a Country, wherein a great drought and heat maketh abundance of mire and dirt; but store of rain causeth dust. It is here experimentally true: the plentiful rain of God's blessed word is answered with the dusty and sandy barrenness of men's evil lives. So the Sun, shining upon unclean dung-hills, is said to cause a greater stench: yet no wise man blames the beams of the Sun, but the filthiness of those putrefied heaps, for such offense. The Sun of righteousness hath sent down the glorious rays of his Gospel among us• the wicked hereupon steam out the more noisome and stenchful fruits. Upon whom shall the accusation light; God's comfortable heat of mercy, or our putrid and rank iniquities? Sometimes the Sun's heat working upon a muddy and baneful object, breeds horrid serpents. No wonder then, if this rain of the Gospel ingender in reprobate minds, weeds, and prickles. The Cicones have a river, that doth harden the bowels, and make the entrails stony: a strange operation in them that drink it. But if the water of life do harden the hearts of Pharaohs, and exasperate the mischiefs of a malicious Elimas, let the imputation of fault light where it is deserved. It was a strange protestatiō, that God had against Israel. I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me. I have brought them up in my house, and taught them my precepts, and yet (as if my instructions and favors had made them worse) they have rebelled against me. Thus when the Sun is hottest, the springs are coldest: and the more fervent the love of God is to us, the more cold is our charity to him, and to others for him. As if the sweet dews of Hermon had made the hill of Zion more barren.

It is written of the Thraeian flint, that it burns with water, and is quenched with oil: a fit Emblem of those wicked souls, that are the worse for God's endeavor to better them. But such contrary effects hath the Gospel in contrary natures. As by the heat of the Sun wax is softened, and yet clay is hardened: so by the preaching of the word, the hearts of such as shall be saved, are mollified; but the hearts of the lost are further obdurate. God in his wis• justice will be even with men: since they will not be the better for his favors, they shall be the worse. Seeing they will not bring forth herbs, they shall cast forth weeds: and he that might not in their salvation, will be glorified in their subversion. For application.

This Rain hath fallen upon us all: how have we entertained it? where be our herbs? It is objected against us, that our forefathers who wanted this rain, brought forth more herbs, than we that have it. That they in the days of ignorance did more then they knew; that we in the light of the Gospel know more then we do. Apollonius among other wonders writes one most wonderful: that there was a people, which could see nothing in the day, but all in the night. What, hath the Sun blinded us? Cannot we see to serve God so well in the light, as they did in the dark?

It was once said, Ignoti nulla cupido: but now it may be inverted; Noti nullus amor: we little esteem the Gospel, because it is frequent amongst us. The long enjoying it hath dulled our estimation. Full children are weary of their bread, and play with it. Like the Indians, that have such store of gold and precious stones, that they truck them away for glasses and rattles. Perhaps the cold legs of custom will bring us to Church: and we are content to hear the Preacher taxing our frauds, usuries, oaths, oppressions. May be for some show of devotion, we will ask counsel at his lips: but say what he will, we will not part with our sins.

The Princes of Israel came to Jeremiah, and entreat him to inquire of the Lord fought them: promising, that whatsoever direction the Lord should send they would obey. The Prophet accordingly presents their supplication to God. God answers You shall not go into Egypt, lest you be destroyed: but abide still in Judah, and you shall be safe. When they heard this Oracle, because it was not their humors, they replied, We will go into Egypt. This was their purpose from the beginning, (though they dissembled a will to know God's mind) which if God's command crosseth, they will cross his command: they will go into Egypt. So people will be content to hear what God saith to them by his Ministers: but if he speak not what pleaseth them, they will follow their own affections. We are such nice and froward pieces, that the more God woos us, we are the further off. As it is with some shallow professors of Music, saith the Poet.

Omnibus hoc vitium cantoribus, inter amicos,

Vt nunquam inducant animum cantare rogati.

When they are most earnestly entreated, they make most dainty to sing or play. So the more the Lord calls for our praises, the more hoarse are our voices, the more harsh our notes; or perhaps we will not sing at all. But if God hath given us music, and we will not dance; as Christ reproved the Jews; we shall mourn in sadness for our obstinate refusal of proffered mirth. You have heard Herodotus tale of the Piper. He came to the water-side, and piped to the fishes: they would not dance. He took his net and caught some of them; and being thrown upon dry land they began to leap and skip up. Nay, quoth the Piper, I offered you music before, and you would none: now you shall dance without a pipe. Men commonly regard the Songs of Zion, as they do music heard late at night in the streets, whiles they are in bed. Perhaps they will step to the windore, and listen to it a while; and presently to bed again. So men step from the couch of their lusts and sins to, Church, hear the Sermon; and then to bed again; lulling themselves in their former security.

There are some, that care for hearing it no more: but sit down with a conceit of their own sufficiency. They know as much as all the Preachers can tell them: let the youth go to be Catechized. So the sluggish and irreligious Master sits at home, whiles he sends his servants to Church. There is an old tale, idle in it self; the use may be good. A certain man that would never go to Church, when he heard the Saintsbell, would say to his wife. Go thou to Church and pray for thee and me. One night he dreamed, that both he and his wife were dead, and that they knocked together at Heaven-gate for entrance. S. Peter (by the Legend) is Porter, and suffered the wife to enter in, but kept the husband out: answering him, Illa intrauit pro se ette: She is gone in both for her self and thee. As thy wife went to Church for thee, so she must go to heaven for thee. The Moral instructs everyone to have a personality of Faith, and a propriety of devotion: that himself serving GOD, himself may be blessed of God.

It now remains, to examine more narrowly the nature of the sins these ungodly hearts produce. They are called Thorns and Briars. Pliny saith that the Thorn is more soft then a Tree, and more hard then an Herb: as if it were some unkindly thing; and but an imperfect excrement of the earth. For the Philosopher saith, It is not the intent of kind, that Trees should be sharp with prickles and thorns: but he would have it caused by the insolidity and unfastness of the tree. By which means the cold humor is drawn out by the pores ere it be concocted: whereupon for scarcity of matter, it is hardened by the sun; and •o shaped and sharpened into a thorn.

But it is unquestionable truth, that God created the thorns and briars on the earth. Some think, because it is said, Gen. 3. in man's punishment, Maledict• esto terra propter te: Cursed be the earth for thy sake. Thorns and Thistles shall it bring forth to thee: that therefore if mankind had not sinned, the ground should have produced no such thing. But the most received opinion, and consonant to truth is; that these Thorns and briars should have been, though man had never fallen: but they should not have been noxious and hurtful to him. Now let us consider what resemblances may be found, betwixt those natural, and these allegorical thorns and briars.

1 Where is abundance of thorns, there is most commonly a barren ground. For they hinder the happy influence of the heavens, the kindly heat of the sun, the dews of the clouds, and all those working causes of fertility. God prearmes Ezekiel, that he should not wonder at the barrenness of Israel, for briars and thorns shall be with thee. Let no man marvel at our unprofitable times; we have too many Briars and thorns among us: which do what they can to hinder the goodness of heaven to us, or our goodness to heaven. That which is sown nigh or among thorns seldom prospers. Our Savior saith, that the Seed sown in some hearers, brought forth no fruit; for the Thorns choked it. The very company of the wicked is harmful, for they are as thorns to stifle any goodness. The companion of fools shall be afflicted, saith Solomon. He dwells among thorns, that shall wound him. To lay no more affliction upon him then Solomon there meant; as appears by the opposite member of the verse: he shall endure a privation of what good soever he had; and a position of their lewdness. A good man with ill company, is like a living man bound to a dead corps: that will sooner suffocate him, then he can revive that. The Soul that lives among thorns shall hardly thrive. Therefore saith the Lord of the vineyard concerning the barren tree. Cut it down, why troubles it the ground?

2 Thorns and briars grow most commonly on heaps, and seldom are found single, or destitute of company of their own kind, And though they be troublesomely harmful to other trees, yet they fold and embrace one another, without hurt. It is so usually seen, that wicked men hold together, and sins grow in united clusters. There is a combination of the ungodly; even so far as to the very participation of their estates. Cast in thy lot with us; we will have all one purse. They are entangled in mutual amity, like beds of Eels; nothing but thunder can break their knots. Is it much, saith Christ, that you purpose diligere diligentes, to love them that love you? Why, briars and thorns do it, even Publicans do the same. Yea, I would to God, their unity did not shame ours. We see here, that one of the Papists chief marks of their church is not infallible; their consent or unity: when briars & thorns have it. The Pharisees, Sadducees, Herodians conspire against Christ: may be, they with the rest. Sins grow in heaps, like thorns in bushes: where are some, are many. The Apostle brings them in by couples & companies. Gluttony & Drunkenness, Chambering and wantonness, strife and envying. Me thinks Gluttony & Drunkenness come in like an Englishman, and a Dutchman. Chambering & Wantonness like an Italian and a Venetian. Strife & Envy like a Spaniard and a Frenchman. These sins being so National, and natural to the countries: to over-drink in Germany; to over-eat in England; to wantonize in Italy and Venice; to quarrel in France, and to be envious in Spain; Envy being ever the bosom-companion of Pride.

3 Thorns and briars, by reason of their thickness and sharpness, are refuges for Serpents, Snakes, Adders, and such other venomous beasts. Where the ungodly have a strong part, oppression, rapine, robbery, murder, and all those fatal and deathstriking serpents are fostered. God, when he told Ezekiel. Ezek. 2. That briars and thorns should be with him; adds in the very next words, And thou shalt dwell among Scorpions. Therefore in Latin, Rubetum is a place of briars and brambles; and Rubeta is a toad, and that land-toad, the most venomous of the kind. It is dangerous sleeping near such places. He that lives among the wicked, hath no need of security, but to have clear and circumspect eyes; lest either the thorns prick him, or the Serpents under the thorns sting him. Woe is me, saith the Psalmist, that I must remain in Meshech, and dwell in the tents of Kedar.

4. Neither do the wicked, only with their thorns and briars, hinder others passage, but even their own. No marvel, if it be so difficult for an ungodly man to get to heaven; for he hedgeth up his own way. Men multiply their transgressions to infinite, and cast up innumerable thorns, yet hope well to be saved. But in vain he purposeth to travel to Ierusaem, that hedgeth up his own passage. Thorns and snares are in the way of the froward: not of God's setting, but of their own planting. For (the next words testify) he that keepeth his soul, shall be far from them. There are hindrances enough to heaven, though the wicked make none themselves. The devil will look, that the way shall not be easy. Neither hath God set salvation upon such terms, that we may play and get it. The kingdom of heaven is got by violence: and they must strive, that will pass the narrow gate. Satan hath so many plots and tricks to deceive them; so many temptations, and corruptions to oppose them; that they have no cause to fence up the way themselves, against themselves, with a hedge of their own thorns. Heaven-gates will not fall down before men, as the iron-gates of the City to Peter, of their own accord. Nay, If the Righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?

5. Sins are fitly compared to thorns and briars, for their wounding, pricking, and such harmful offenses. Therefore they are called tribuli, a tribulando; from their vexing, oppression, and tribulation they give those that touch them. The wicked are such Calthrops to the Country, boring and bloodying her sides. Either pricking the flesh, or tearing of the fleece; as briars and bushes that rob the sheep of their cotes, which come to them for shelter. A great man wicked is like Abimelech, whom Jotham calls a Bramble in his Parable. The Olive would not leave his fatness, nor the Fig-tree his sweetness, nor the Vine his goodness, to be promoted over the trees. But the aspiring Bramble usurps it: and (as if he were some great Cedar) he calls the Trees to trust under his shadow. But when poor men come to this Bramble for refuge, here they loose a lock and there a lock, til they are left naked, Yea, the clothes are not only rent from their backs; but like the sons of Sceua exorcising the evil spirits, they depart not away naked only, but wounded. Their garments satisfy not these briars, scarce their blood and lives.

These Briars and Thorns have such pricking and wounding effects, in regard of three objects, whom they strike. For sins are like Thorns. 1. To men. 2. To Christ. 3. To the own consciences of the committers. First to men. Pliny mentioneth three sorts of Briars.

1. The moorish Briar, that only grows in rank and fen^e places, & is nourished with rotten mud, and such squalid putrefaction. There is a generatiō of men like these briars, given to drunkenness, whose affections are fed only with the moisture of the pot. They cannot live but in fenny and moorish places. Pliny saith, that adders & toads love and eat the fruits of these briars; and it is the food of serpents. The effects of drunkenness (in like sort) is a condiment for the devil. Augustine somewhat near our purpose, when he compares drunken places to the fens; where are bred snakes and serpents, and such vile noxious things, which every year must be burned. It were a good turn, if these morish brambles were stocked up by the roots. If you ask how you should rid them; I will not point you to the Fen-men, who to make quick dispatch of their annoyances, set fire on their fens: but I will give you another precedent. When a king asked how he might be rid of certain noisome fowls, which came abundantly flying into his land; one answered him. Nidos eorum vbi{que} destruendos: that the only means was to destroy their nests in every place. So if you would be shut of these morish briars, the course is to destroy their nests; their haunts, and rendezvous, as they term them; the common quagmires of all filthiness. The ale houses are their nests & cages, where they exhaust and lavish out their goods, and lay plots and devises how to get more. Hence they fall either to robbing, or cheating; open courses of violence, or secret mischiefs: till at last the Jail prepares thē for the gibbet. For lightly they sing thorough a red lattice, before they cry through an irō grate. And when those briars are hampered, & put into prisons; it is said, that those places teach them more villainy then they knew before. That when a lewd fellow comes out of prison, he is furnished with such a pack of mischiefs, that he now sets up school, and teacheth others. It is wonderful, that places ordained for reformation, should be instructions of worse lewdness. I speak not against mercy: but experience & truth witnesseth that the mercy of sometimes is cruelty. And the pity to a notorious malefactor argues us of a hard heart, & of unmercifulness to the common-wealth. The sparing of rapes, robberies, whoredoms, cheatings, frauds, unjust measures, false balances, occasioneth, yea encourageth the like. If thou be a Magistrate, deputed to judge it, and sparest a man that hath shed blood; the next blood he sheds thou art guilty of. Thou consentest to the second robbery of a thief, that hast remitted him the first. A Father brings in a notorious malefactor arraigning at the bar before the Judge. When the mother coms, miserādlulacione, with bitter weeping desiring mercy for her son.

The wife Lachrimabili voice, with mournful speech, imploring mercy for her husband. The little children plorantibus ocellis, with crying eyes, beseeching mercy for their Father. The people wishing he may be spared for the goodliness of his person. Yet saith the Judge, Non misereor modo: I pity, but must not spare. Pereat vnus, potius quam vnitas. Better one perish, then all. Weed up the implacable thorns, for they will keep the ground barren. It hath been said, Bear one injury and provoke more: but here in case of justice, forgive one public injury, I mean a fact of horrid nature as I formerly taxed, and you provoke and encourage many. The Mariners would fain save Jonah; but when there is no remedy, they will rather loose one Jonah, then all themselves.

2. Pliny's next sort of Briars are Tribuli agrestes, Field-briars; which are (saith he) shrewd enemies to tillage, and the fruits of the earth. This Island of ours, within these late days, hath bred a great number of these field-briars: which unnaturally turn their mother into barrenness. Oppressors, Inclosers, Depopulators, Deportators, Depravators; that run the land to ruin for a private benefit: and work out a particular gain from a public and general loss.

Gaine said I? Where is it? Did you ever know Inclosers prosper? I will speak boldly. I never knew great man grow greater by his depopulations: and I hope no man will say, he hath grown better by them. Corn-fields are turned to sheepwalks; once-inhabited towns feed Oxen; and Churches are made Shepherds Cottages: and yet the doers of all this never the richer. They keep less Hospitality; for a few rooms in London serve their turns: they extort sorer rents, and yet they have never the more money. It cannot be denied, but the main end of these courses was profit, and enhancing their estates: and loe, in this very end GOD crosseth-them. Speak what you will of their pride, of turning the alms they should give to the poor into feasts for the rich, of their infrugal courses: I say confidently, hic digitus Dei: here is the very hand of God striking them. Man, though he hath authority, will not look to these Field-briars; but let them waste and forage, and play the Abimelech's; but God will. But if we do not look to it, let me say to you, as Jotham to the Shechemites of that aspiring Bramble, Judge. 9. If fire come not out of Shechem to devour Abimelech; fire will come from Abimelech to devour Shechem. If you undo not the oppressions of the Field-briars, their oppressions will undo us all.

3 There is the Town-briar too, which groweth in our mounds and fences, and about the closing of towns. You in the City have no great plenty of these briars; yet you are troubled (in a metaphorical sense) with Town-briars, and City-brambles: which would not a little vex you, if you were not those yourselves.

1. What say you to the Usurer? Is he not a Thorn amongst you? If you were not Usurers yourselves, you would confess it. But they say, the most horrible usury in the world is here practiced, to 40. in the hundred: nay, to doubling of the principal in one year. A landed Gentleman wants money, he shall have it; but in commodities: which some compacted Broker buys of him, for half the rate they cost him, in ready money. Are these Christians? dare they show their faces in the Temple? But I know, you have been often told of these things. In a word, even the gentles• usury is a most sharp thorn, and pricks the side of the Country till the blood follows. An Usurer with his money, is like a man that hath no work of his own, yet keeps a servant to let out: and takes not only hire of others for his days labor; but chargeth him to steal somewhat besides, and never to return home empty. You understand me: I need not further apply it.

These are vile winding and wounding briars, that fetch away clothes, and skin, and flesh too. Now the mercy of God rid us of these thorns. And let us know it is for our sins, that God suffers Usurers among us. It may be he permits them, as he did the Canaanites for a while in Israel, lest the wild beasts should break in upon them. Lest pride, and haughtiness, and uncleanness should spill men's souls by a full estate of wealth. God suffers Usurers like Horse-leeches to suck and soke them: thereby (possibly) to humble them. Yet in mean time, I may say of them, as Joshua did of those Canaanites; that they are pricks in our sides, and thorns in our eyes.

2 What do you think of Adultery? Is it not a Thorn, yes, a sharp thorn, wounding the purse, envenoming the body, condemning the Soul. The ground that bears it is lust: the sap that feeds it, is fullness of bread and Idleness: the heat that makes it glow, grow, and shoot, is lewd and wanton speech, and effeminate gestures: infamy is the bud; pollution the fruit; and the end Hell-fire. And as Cajetan and Theophilact observes on 1. Thes. 4. that the Apostle having bid men possess their vessel in holiness, he adds; And let no man go beyond or defraud his brother in any matter: that this circumvention may be applied to Adultery, when a man is deceived of his bosom-spouse; who is hired to the subornation of bastards. So that lightly, concupiscence and cozenage go together. As that wickedness, of all others, never goes but by couples. For Adulterers non possunt ire soli ad diabolum. An Adulterer cannot go alone to the Devil.

3 Corrupt and conscience-less Lawyers you will confess to be sharp and wounding brambles, and exceedingly hurtful. A poor Client among them, is as a blind sheep in a thicket of thorns: there is no hope of his fleece, it is well if he carry away his flesh whole on his back. A motion this term, an order next; instantly all cross'd: scarce the twentieth order sometimes stands: execution is suspended, a writ of error puts all out of course. Oh the uncertain events of suits! I hope, says the poor blood-drawn wretch, I shall have an end of my suite next term; nay, nor the next term, nor the next year. Fool! thou art gotten into a suite of durance; almost an immortal suit. And when the upshot comes, perhaps the mispleading of a word shall forfeit all. It is a lamentable uncertainty, and one political addition of fickleness to the goods of this world, that no man might set his heart upon them: that an estate bought, truly paid for, and inherited, shall be gone upon a word; sometimes upon a syllable; upon a very bare letter, omitted or mis-written by the Scrivener. These are scratching briars. If what is wanting in the goodness of the cause, be supplied by the greatness of the fees, their tongs shall excuse their tongs for their contra-conscient pleadings. The Italians have a shrewd proverb against them. The Devil makes his Christmasepyes of Lawyers tongs and Clerks fingers. This proverb I leave with them; and come to their kinsmen.

4 Corrupted Officers, who are also sharp and sharking brambles. Their office is a bush of thorns at their backs, and they all to rent the country, with bribery and extortion. These men seek after authority, and commanding-places, not with any intent of good to the common-wealth, but to fill their own purses, to satisfy their own lusts. As some love to be poring in the fire, not that they care to mend it, but only to warm their own fingers.

5 We have Papists amongst us; look to them, they are rankling thorns, and renting briars. False Gibeonites they are; and howsoever they pretend their old shoes, the antiquity of their Church, we have ever found them thorns; ready to put out our eyes, and (if they could) the eye of the Gospel. They exclaim against us for persecution; and cry themselves (louder then oyster-women in the streets) for patient Catholics, Saints, Martyrs. But match the peace they enjoy under us, with the tyranny they exercised over us; the burning our Fathers at stakes, the butchering our Princes, their conspiracy against our whole Realm, their continual bending their weapons against Sovereigns and subjects throats; and you will say, they are thorns. I have read of a bird, that when men are devout at their sacrifice, takes fire from the Altar, and burns their houses. All their black treasons, and bloody intendments, they derive from the Altar; and plead the warrant of Religion, to set our whole Land in combustion. O that these brambles were stocked up: that Ishmael were cast out of doors, that Sara and her son Isaac might live in quiet.

6 There are furious male contents among us: a contemptible generation of thorns; that (because their hands are pinion'd) prick only with their tongues. They are ever whining, and upon the least cause filling the world with importunate complaints. These are savage & popular humors, that cannot suffer eminency to pass unreproached. But they must vellicate goodness, and gird greatness; that neither the living can walk, nor the dead sleep, in quiet. Affecters of innovation, that are ever finding fault with the present times: anything pleaseth them but what is. Even the best blessings of God scape not their censures: neither do they esteem by judgment, or pronounce by reason: they find fault with things, they know not wherefore, but because they do not like them. Beware these thorns: they are like the wheels of some cunningly wrought fire-works; that fly out on all sides; and offering to singe others, burn themselves. Laudant veteres, &c. as if no times were so miserable as ours. As if the civil wars of France, or the bloody Inquisitiō of Spain, or the Turkish cruelty in Natolia, where he breeds his soldiers; or at home, the time of the Barons war; or yet later, the persecution of a Boner; were none of them so cruel, as these days, when every man sits and sings under his own fig-tree. Sure if they had once tasted the bitterness of war, they would better esteem of their peace. These are pestilent thorns: nothing but fear keeps them from conspiracy. Nay, so they might set the whole land on fire, they would not grudge their own ashes.

7. There are briars too growing near the Church; too near it. They have raised Church-livings to four and five years purchase: and it is to be feared, they will shortly rack up presentative livings, to as high a rate, as they did their impropriations, when they would sell them. For they say, few will give above sixteen years purchase for an impropriate Parsonage; and I have heard some rate the donation of a benefice they must give, at ten years: what with the present money they must have, and with reservation of tithes, and such unconscionable tricks; as if there was no God in heaven, to see or punish it. Perhaps, some will not take so much: but most will take some; enough to impoverish the Church, to enrich their own purses, to damn their souls.

One would think, it was sacrilege enough to rob God of his main tithes: must they also nimme away the shreds? must they needs shrink the whole cloth, (enough to apparel the Church) as the cheating Taylor did, to a dozen of buttons? Having full gorged themselves with the parsonages, must they pick the bones of the Vicarages too? Well saith S. August. Multi in hac vita manducant, quod postea apud inferos digerunt. Many devour that in this life, which they shall digest in hell.

These are the Church-briers; which (let alone) will at last bring as famous a Church, as any Christendom hath, to beggary. Politic men, begin a pace already to with-hold their children from Schools and Universities. Any profession else better likes them; as knowing, they may live well in whatsoever calling, save in the ministry. The time was, that Christ threw the buyers and sellers out of the Temple; but now the buyers and sellers have thrown him out of the Temple. Yea, they will throw the church out of the church if they be not stayed. But some may say to me, as one advised Luther, when he began to preach against the Popes usurpation and tyranny, You had as good hold your peace. This wickedness is so powerful, that you will never prevail against it. Get you to your study, and say, Lord have mercy on us, and procure yourself no ill will. But be it good will, or be it ill will, we come hither to speak the truth in our consciences. And if these Church-thorns will continue their wickedness, be it unto them as they have deserved. If they will needs go to hell, let them go: we cannot help it, let them perish. I had purposed the discovery of more Brambles, but the time forbids it. I would to God, we were well freed from those I have taxed.

THE END Of Thorns. THE FIFTH SERMON.

ESA. 9. 18.

Wickedness burneth as the fire: it shall devour the Briars and Thorns, and shall kindle in the thickets of the Forest, and they shall mount up like the lifting up of smoke.

THE END OF THORNS.

THE FIFTH SERMON.

HEB. Chap. 6. Vers. 8.

But that which beareth thorns and briars, is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing, whose end is to be burned.

OvR sins are thorns to others; some wounding with their direct blows, others with their wipes, all with their examples. Man only hath not felt their blows; our Savior also so found them: when he was fain for our sakes to set his naked breast, his naked heart, his naked soul against them. They say, the Nightingale sleeps with her breast against a thorn, to avoid the Serpent. Christ was content to be wounded, even to sleep to death with thorns, that he might deliver us from that devouring serpent, the great infernal Dragon. His head was not only raked and harrowed with material thorns: Caput Angelicis spiritibus tremebundum coronatur spinis That head which the Angelical spirits adore and tremble at, was crowned with thorns. But these mys•call thorns, our iniquities, with fiercer blows drew blood of his soul. They do in a sort still. Heb. 6. 6. They crucify to themselves the Son of God a fresh, and put him to an open shame. Not in himself, for they cannot: but can them no thanks; they would, if they could: and to themselves they do it. Wretched men, will you not yet let Jesus Christ alone, and be at rest? will you still offer violence to your blessed Savior; and labor to pull him down from his throne to his Cross; from his peaceful glory at the right hand of his Father, to more sufferings? You condemn the merciless Soldiers, that platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his innocent head. Sinful wretch, condemn thyself. Thy sins were those thorns, and far sharper. Thy oppressions, wrongings, and wringings, of his poor brethren, offer him the violence of new wounds: thy oaths, thy frauds, thy pride scratch him like briars. Hear him complaining from heaven, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? These Thorns grow on earth, yet they prick Jesus Christ in heaven. Oh we little know the price of a sin, that thus play the executioners with the Lord of life. Think, think; Christ felt your sins as sharp thorns.

Lastly, you find them thorns yourselves, if Christ did not for you. When God shall enliven and make quick the sense of your numbed consciences, you shall confess your own sins •ruell thorns to your souls, 2. Cor. 12. A thorn in your flesh, that shall buffet you with terror. For a while men are insensible of their iniquities. Christ, Math. 13. 22. calls the riches of this world thorns, which choke the good seed of the Gospel.

The common opinion of the world is, that they are goodly, fine and smooth things; furs to keep them warm, oil to cheare their faces, and wine to their hearts; of a silken softness to their affections. But Christ saith, they are thorns; stinging and choking thorns. And the covetous conscience shall one day perceive in them, Triplicem puncturam, a threefold pricking. Laboris in acquisitione; they are gotten with trouble. Timoris in possessione; they are kept with fear. Doloris in amissione; they are lost with grief.

Men commonly deal with their sins, as hedgers do, when they go to plash thorny bushes: they put on tyning gloves, that the Thorns may not prick them. So these harden their hearts, that their own thorns may give them no compunction. But all vanities are but like the fools laughter, which Solomon compares to the crackling of thorns under a pt: they make a noise, and suddenly go out. But sin never parts with the wicked, without leaving a sting behind it. Luther saith, there are two fiends, that torment men in this world: and they are sin, and a bad conscience. The latter follows the former: or if you will, the former wounds the latter: for sin is the thorn, and the conscience the subject it strikes. This thorn often pricks deep; to the very heart. Acts 2. to the very bones, Psal. 38. There is no rest in my bones because of my sin. Vis nunquam esse tristis? been viue. Nunquam securus est reus animus. Wouldest thou never be sorrowful? live well. A guilty mind cannot be securely quiet. An evil mind is haunted and vexed with the thorns of his own conscience. Sin to the affections, whiles it is doing, is oleum vngens, supple oil. Sin to the conscience when it is done, is tribulus pungens, a pricking thorn. What extreme contraries do often wicked conceits run into? In their time of security they cannot be brought, to think sin to be sin. At last desperately, they think it such a sin, that it cannot be forgiven. At first they are delighted with the sense and smell of their iniquity, as of a sweet rose: but the rose of their delight withers, and there is a thorn under it, that pricks the heart. Hereupon Solomon couples pleasant vanity, and troublesome vexation together. If that tickles the flesh, this shall wound the spirit. You shall hear an Usurer in the madness of presumption expostulating, what? may I not make benefit of my money? Observe him, and in the end you shall hear him in the madness of despair, cry out of his own damnation for it. At first they make question whether it be a sin: at last they know it such a sin, that they make question whether God will forgive it. So men will look to sin either too superficially, or too superstitiously. There was no danger saith the Drunkard, when he is asked how he seeped such a passage: bring him back in the sober morning to see, and he falls down dead in astonishment.

I need not further amplify this point. Christ gives a vae ridentibus; Woe to them that laugh, for they shall weep: and every smile of sin shall be turned to a groan of sorrow. They that exhibit their lives as sacrifices risuiet lubentiae; shall one day feel pricks, and goads, and thorns; scratching and piercing their hearts: when (like the stricken deer, with the arrowhead rankling in his side) they shall not be able to shift or change pains with places. Let this reach to our souls two instructions.

1 That we labor our hearts betimes to a sensibleness of these thorns. A Thorn swallowed into the flesh, if it be not looked to, rankles. Sin without repentance, will fester in the soul; and is so much more perilous, as it is less felt. Oh the number of thorns that lie in many conscience, who complain no more, then if they ailed nothing. The prick of a thorn is not so painful at first, while the blood is hot, as after a cold pause. Every man hath his complaints; & who liveth out of the reach of discontent? You shall hear tradesmen complaining of few or false customers. Laborers, of little work, and less wages. Beggars complain the want of Charity: and rich men the want of money. Merchants of rocks and Pirates: Lawyers of short fees; and Clients of long suits. But no man complains of the thorns in his own bosom. He nourisheth briars there that wound him: and the heart is as dedolent, as if it were past feeling. But where there is no discovery of the disease, the recovery of the health is in vain hoped for.

2 After sense of the smart will follow a desire of remedy. The throbbing conscience would be at ease, and freed from the Thorn that vexeth it. David roars out for the very disquietness of his heart. The aking heart will make a crying tongue, and wet eyes. Loe the mercy of GOD! A remedy is not sooner desired, then offered. The sacred Gospel directs us to a medicine, that shall supple the heart, and draw out these thorns; though they stuck as thick in it, as ever the arrows did in Sebastian. They speak of the herb Dictamnium, called of some Dittany, that it hath a secret virtue to draw out anything fastened in the body. Pliny saith, that this herb drunk, Sagittas pellit. Experience telleth, that it is sovereign to exhale a thorn out of the flesh. Our only Dictamnum is the precious blood of our merciful Savior JESUS CHRIST. A plaster of that is truly virtual, to draw out all thorns from our consciences, Saucia nimis, which is nulla medicabilis herbis, is thus cured. Our sins drew blood of him; that his blood might save us. He was crowned with Thorns, that we might not be killed with thorns. He was wounded for us, that we might not perish for our selves.

Take we heed, that we despise not this medicine. The law was so far from drawing out these thorns, that it would drive them in further, and cause them to rankle in the heart, without any hope of ease. It did but exasperate their stings, and give them a deeper continuance of pricking. The mollifying and healing Gospel extracts their venom, and sucks out their poison. Let us not dare then to vilipend this cordial and sovereign medicine.

You perceive that our sins are Thorns; and what is their only remedy. Know now, that if they be not drawn out in this world, they shall be found thorns hereafter; when the owners shall hear Christ's sentence, Go ye cursed, &c. for the end of them is to be burned. So I come to the punishment: but I will soon have done with that, which shall never have done with those that must undergo it.

There is a threefold gradation in the Penalty, Rejection, malediction, combustion. Is rejected, is nigh unto cursing, and the end thereof is to be burned. And it seems to have relation to a threefold distinction of time. 1. For the present, it is rejected. 2. For instance or appropinquation, it is nigh unto cursing. 3. For future certainty, the end of it is to be burned. As men commonly deal with thorns: first they cut them up with bills and mattocks: then they lay them by to wither: and lastly burn them in the furnace.

1 Rejection. This which we here translate (is rejected) is in the original (〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉) which may signify Reprobios, or reprobatus: so Beza hath it; is reprov'd, or disallowed of God. This ground shall have no ground in heaven, no part in God inheritance. It is reprobate silver, not current with the Lord. No man desires to purchase Land, that will bring forth nothing but weeds: he will not cast away his silver upon it. And shall GOD buy so base ground, that will be no better, at so inestimable a price, as the incorruptible blood of his own Son? It despiseth the Lord's goodness, and the LORD'S goodness shall despise it. It is rejected. If any man saith, this is Durus Sermo, let him consider of whom the Apostle speaketh, verse. 4. against whom he concludes ab impossibili. It is impossible, &c. A hard saying to understand, but more, most heard to undergo. If God be driven to loose all his pains and cost upon an ungrateful heart, he will at last renounce it, and give it over a desperate nature. As he in the Comedy, Abeat, pereat, profundat, perdat. If it will be filthy, let it be filthy still. If nothing will bring it to goodness, it shall be rejected.

2. The second degree of the Punishment is cursing: and this may seem to exceed the former. God's curse is a fearful thing. If you would view (though but in part) the latitude and extension of it, I refer you to the 28. of Deuteronomy. But I purpose not to be curiously punctual, in the demonstration of these particular degrees of the Punishment. That which I will observe, is this.

That God is more propense and inclined to blessing, then to cursing: more prone to show mercy, then to inflict judgment. It is said in the former Verse, the good ground receives blessing of God: receives it presently, receives it at once. But here of the evil ground; it is nigh unto cursing: it is not presently cursed, but nigh unto it. There is some pause and delay: some lucida interualla misericordiae. The whole vial of wrath is not poured on at once. But first there is a despising or rejection; to let the wicked see, how hateful their vices are in God's sight. If this serve not, they are not suddenly cursed; but there is a breathing time, and a merciful space between that and cursing; and between cursing and burning. So slowly doth GOD proceed to judgment, so little haste he makes to the execution of his vengeance. He is speedy to deliver, to save, to give his blessing; but he hath leaden feet when he comes to strike.

The use of this to our selves is, that the patient forbearance of God may lead us to repentance, Romans the second and the fourth. The Prophet Joel bids us Rent our hearts, and fall to weeping and mourning; Because the Lord is merciful and slow to anger. God's longsuffering is as a hand reached out, that points us to repentance. Such is his goodness, that when all his terrors and menace; are set in their places, yet he makes room for Repentance, whensoever it comes. And though they be as ready to strike, as Abraham's hand was to Isaac's sacrifice; yet Repentance, tanquam vox Angeli, shall stay them. O blessed Repentance, how sweet and amiable art thou! yet how few love thee!

The great man, that thinks he may securely be wicked, because he is honourably great; and dares affront the Pulpit, though the greatest Bishop in the land were preaching in it; cares not for repentance. The wealthy Gentleman, that can bung up Hospitality into a Diogenes tub; nestle himself warm in a City-chamber, whiles Owls and Daws parlor themselves in his country-manors: that (as it is storied of that Jew for the use of his money) takes his rent in blood; the heart-blood of his racked Tenants; cares not for Repentance.

The country Nabal, that hoards his grain, and with it locks up his soul in a Garner, that the Sun of God's blessing may not come at it: that starves the poor, his family, himself; cares not for Repentance. The avarice Citizens, whom the glad Devil can never find without a false measure in one hand, and a cozening weight in the other; that have tricks in their sconces to over-reach the devil himself; but that (like a cunning Fencer) he that taught them all their tricks, kept one to himself, to cheat them of their souls; care not for repentance. The muffled Lawyer, that hath no sense left alive but his feeling, and weighs all causes by the poise of gold; that talks against others right and his own conscience; that leads Jury into pe·jury, with his fraudulent circumventions; cares not for repentance.

The sharking Officer, (that like Menelaus, an Armenian Archer in the wars betwixt Constantius and Magnentius) can shoot three arrows at once, at one loose; wherewith he wounds not one, but three at the least: the Prince whom he serves, the person whom he draws blood of, and the body of the Common-wealth; cares not for repentance. I need not speak of the Church-robber, the Usurer, the Drunkard, the Proud, the unclean adulterer: no man can think, that they care for repentance. O but they all purpose to repent. Spare them a while; they are but new set into the Oven; not yet fully baked in their hot vanities: let them foke a little in their pleasures, and at last they will return. They are as an Oven heated by the Baker. Repentance is an ascent of four steps: many get up three of them, but climb not to the fourth and best.

1. Some there are that purpose to amend their lives. But purpose without performance is like a Cloud without rain; not unlike Hercules Club in the Tragedy, of a great bulk, but the stuffing is moss and rubbish. If the tree be fairly blossomed, and naked of fruit, it may speed as the Fig-tree in the Gospel. be curseo: or at least (it is as the evil ground here) nigh unto cursing. Many that purposed to repent, are now in hell, as the five foolish Virgins, that intended to go in with the Bridegroom; but before the time their lights dropped out.

One said, that hell is like to be full of good purposes, but heaven of good works. If a bare Intention would serve, God's Church on earth would be fuller of Saints, and his Court in heaven fuller of souls. Ignorance and Sloth adulterating, bring forth this lank brood, this abortive embrion, Purpose. Such a man is like an ill debtor, who will not pay God his due of devotion till he is old: and then he cannot pay for want of (time & money) space and grace to repent. We make (in these days) our purposes like our Eves, and our performances like the holy-days: servants work hard vpō the Eves, that they may have the more liberty to play upon the Holy days: so we are earnest, and labor hard on our purposes; but are idle and play upon our performances. But Resolution without action, is a golden couch to a leaden Jewel.

2. The second round of this Ladder is Preparation. Some there are that will prepare, & almost set themselves in a readiness for their journey to heaven; yet never set one step forward. Preparation is indeed as necessary, as the door is to the house: but as idle, if there be no house to the door. It may (as John the Baptist did for Christ) prepare the way of the Lord into our hearts: and it may be as vaite, as the Apothecaries Beast, which he promised his Patient would help him of all diseases; but before morning it had eaten up it self. Preparation is a necessary antecedent to all great works, Amos 4. Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel. But a man may prepare meat, and not feed: prepare meat, and not eat. Preparation does well, if reparation follows. A man may climb both these rounds, and yet fall short of the true height of Repentance.

3. The third stair is a Beginning to abstain from some horrid iniquities; and as it were, an entering into a new path; but not going one step in it, without a voluntary revolting. But Beginning is nothing to perfection. Some begin in the spirit, and end in the flesh: that s'lute Christ in the market place; take acquaintance of him in the street, but never bid him home to their houses. It is (vox praetereuntium derisoria) the speech of them that pass by. This man began to build. A house but begun is not fit to dwell in: and shall we think that God's Spirit will dwell in an inchoate habitacle, and not likely to be finished? The Apostle saith, It had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, then after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them.

4 The fourth Round only pleaseth God, and is good for our Souls, Repentance; without which the evil ground is near to cursing; as it were at next door by; and it shall come on him with a speedy visitation nisi interueniente poenitentia. This is the Bulwark to defend us from the shot of God's thunder from heaven: this hedgeth us in from his judgments on earth. Woe to sinful man without this: for he is near to cursing; and his end is to be burned. Blessed Soul that hath it.

Wheresoever it dwells, mercy dwells by it. If England hath it, it shall ease her of her thorns, Ezek. 28. There shall be no more a pricking briar unto the house of Israel, nor any grieving Thorn of all that are round about them.

3 The last and forest degree of the Punishment, is Burning. I will not discourse, whether the fire of that everlastingly-hot furnace be material or spiritual. Surely, it is strangely terrible; and we are blessed, if we neither understand it nor undergo it. The misery of the damned is usually distinguished into the Paine of loss, and the pain of sense. Both implied in this verse, and expressed, Thessalonians the second, Chap. 1. Verse 8, 9. Christ shall take vengeance on such as know not God, and obey not the Gospel of Jesus Christ, there is pain of Sense. They shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, there is pain of loss.

1. This Poenadamni, or privation of blessedness, may seem to be implied in the first degree here mentioned, Rejection. The reprobate are cast away of God. Much like that form of the last sentence, Math. 25. 41. Depart from me, ye cursed: a fearful sentence, a terrible separation. From Me, saith Christ; that made myself man for your sakes, that offered my blood for your redemption, & received these & these wounds for your remedy. From Me, that would have healed, would have helped, would have saved you. From Me, that invited you to mercy, and you would not accept it. From Me, that purchased a kingdom of glory, for such as believed on me; and will wrap their heads with crowns of eternal joy: Depart from Me. This is a fearful Rejection, My friendship, my fellowship, my Paradise, my presence, my heaven, where is fullness of joy, and pleasure for evermore, are none of yours. They might have been; they are lost. Neither shall they only loose Christ, but all the company with Christ: the Choir of glorious Angels, the society of his blessed Mother, the Prophets, Apostles, Martyrs, all the happy and holy Saints, with the whole host of heaven. They shall fret, and vex, and be ready to eat their own galls, to see those triumphing in glory, whom they on earth persecuted, martyred, tortured. They could here exercise their savage tyranny over them; not only denying their own bread, but taking away theirs: they could despise, beat, malign, undo, burn them at stakes: now the estate of both is changed: as Abraham told Dives. They are comforted, and thou art tormented.

2. This is not all. The privation of blessed joys is not enough: there must follow the position of cursed torments. For their Punishment is proportioned to their sin, Ier. 2. They have committed two evils. They have forsaken the Lord, the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns that can hold no water. As they turned from their Maker, so their Maker turns from them: there is Poenadamni. As they fastened their delights on the creatures, so the creatures shall be their tortures: there is Poenasensus. They rejected God, and he rejects them; they adhered to wickedness, and it shall adhere to their bones forever, and bring them to burning.

Their torments which are here expressed by Fire, have two fearful conditions, universality, and eternity.

1. They are universal, vexing every part of the body, and power of the soul. It is terrible in this life, to be pained in every part of the body at one time. To have ache in the teeth, gout in the feet, colic in the reins, &c. and to lie (as it were) upon a rack, for innumerable diseases, like so many executioners, to torture him, is intolerable. But the largest shadow of these torments to their substance, is not so much as a little bone-fire to the combustion of the whole world.

2. They are eternal. If it had but as many ages to burn, as there be trees standing on the earth, there would be some, though a tedious hope of their end. But it is such a Fire, as shall never be quenched. This word Never is fearful. Though they rain floods of tears upon it, they shall be but like oil to increase the flame: for the worm never dyes, the fire never goes out. You see the end of Thorns. Wickedness burneth as the fire: it shall devour the briars and thorns, and shall kindle in the thickest of the Forest, and they shall mount up like the lifting up of smoke.

I resolved against prolixity. The general and summary doctrine is this. That since the wicked ground, which bearth thorns and briars, is near unto cursing, and the end thereof is eternal fire: it follows necessarily, that all they which lay the foundation of ungodliness, must needs build upon condemnation. Let no man deceive you: He that committeth sin is of the Devil. If the course of a man's life be wicked, covetous, unclean, malicious, idolatrous, adulterous, drunken; he lays the ground-work of his own destruction; and precipitates himself to the malediction of God. He that lays the foundation in fire-work, must look to be blown up. Perhaps this meditation, though it be of unquenchable Fire, may yet work coldly in our hearts; and leave no impression behind it; yet you cannot deny this to be true. He that would deny it must deny my Text, must turn Atheist, and reject the holy word of God. Nay, he must think there is no God, no revenge of wickedness, no devil, no hell. And he undertakes a very hard task, that goes about to settle this persuasion in his mind. No, no. Let no man deceive you with vain words: for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience. And in this passage I must value all men alike: of what stuff, or of what fashion soever his coat be: if his life be full of briars and thorns, his end is to be burned. What shall we then do unto thee, O thou preserver of men, that we may escape it? what, but Repent, and believe the Gospel!

Let the commination of hell instruct us to prevent it: as the message of Nineveh's overthrow effected their safety. 1. Let us fly by a true faith into the arms of our Redeemer, that God reject us not. 2. Let us pour forth floods of repentant tears, that we be not nigh unto cursing. 3. And let us bring forth no more briars and thorns, that our end may not be, to be burned. Faith, Repentance, Obedience; this same golden rule of three, will teach us to work up our own salvation. This done, we shall not be rejected, but known to be elected: we shall be so far from cursing. that we shall presently receive the blessing. And our End shall be, not fire, but glory and peace. Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end of that man is PEACE.

TO THE TRULY Judicious, and worthily eminent in his Profession, M^r. WILLIAM RANDOLPH, Doctor of Physic.

Worthy Sir,

IT will seem strange to those, that better know my unworthiness than your merits, that I should administer Physic to a Physician. But my Apology is just; convincing rather them of ignorance, than myself of presumption. It is not a Potion, I send, but a Prescript in paper; which the foolish Patient did eat up, when he read in it written, Take this. Neither do I send it, to direct you, but that you should rectify it. So the poor Painter sent Appelles a Picture, to mend it, not to commend it. That which tastes of Philosophy in it, is but so much of those axioms and rudiments, as I gathered in the University in a short time, and have had much opportunity to lose since. Somewhat is chimed out of experience; wherein I may say, Necessit as was ingenii largitor: as Pliny writes of the Raven; who laboring of thirst, and spying a vessel with some little water in it, but so deep as she could not reach, filled the vessel with stones; till the heavier matter sinking downwards, raised up the lighter to her easy apprehension. My own ill health forced me to look into that poor Cistern of knowledge, which I had: and finding it almost dry, I assayed by some new contemplations, to raise it up to experience; which now, behold, runs over, and (without diminution to it self) is communicatively dispersed to others. Only do you use it, as I desire you should myself: if it be in health, conserve it: if foul purge it. For my own part, I am content, that no happy meditation of mine should be vt Curia Martis Athenis; or like some precious mystery, which a Practitioner will get money by, whiles he lives; but suffer none else to use, when he is dead: for he resolves, it shall die with him. It is more Moral, than Physical; and yet the greater part Theological. wherein I have most satisfied my own conscience, in aiming at that punctual Center, and blessed Scope, whither all endeavours should look; the straitening our warped Affections, and directing the Soul to heaven. And in this passage, (you must pardon me) I fear not to say your memory at least, if not your understanding, may hereby be helped. My Medicines are not very bitter; but nothing at all sweet to a sensual palate: learning from Saluian; that Quae petulantium auribus placent, aegrotantium animis non prosunt. For my soul, I prescribe to others that, which I desire ever to take myself; such saving Recipe's, as God's holy Writ hath directed me. For my Body, though I would not have it lamed by my own neglect, that it might lean upon the staff of Physic; having not so much health to spare, as might allow some unthrifty expense of it on surfeits: yet when it is sick, I desire no other Physician then yourself. Perhaps a great number of men are of my mind, and frequent are the knocks at your Study-door: but I am sure that all those desires are not enflamed with that light of knowledge, which I have of your sufficiency, through much private conference. Rudeness or prolixity do ill in an Epistle, and worse when both together; and may perhaps please a man's self, and none else. I have done, when I have (yet once again) challenged your promised Judicial of urines: which if you make public, you shall have the like addition to my singular thanks. Till a good gale of opportunity waft myself over to your Sudbury, I have sent you this Messenger of that love and service, shall ever be ready to attend you; desiring that, as it hath found the way to you, you would give it your Passe to the World; and (if it grow poor with contempt) your Legacy of approbation.

Wingrave in Buck. May vlt.

Your Worships in all just references of love, THO. ADAMS.

TO THE READER.

THE Title of this Book requires some Apology. There is a book lately conceived in Scotland, and born in England, which both promiseth in the Frontispiece, and demonstrates in the Module, the method and matter here proposed. Whereof I cannot speak, having only cursorily perused some page or two of it, but not of the worthiness. Because that hath the priority of the time, and transcen. dencie in quantity of mine, I have reason to fear, that this will be thought but the spawn of that: or an Epitome: or at best, that it is begot out of imitation. Herein I must seriously propose, and engage my credit to the truth thereof: that this was committed to the Stationers hands, perused and allowed by authority: yea, and with full time to have been printed, and perhaps an impression sold, before that of Master John Abrenethys came out. What dilemma's were in the Book-sellers head, or what reasons for such slackness and reservation, are to me as mystical, as his profession. Neither do I plead thus out of any affected singularity, as if I were too good to imitate so worthy a man: but only to have punctually and plainly delivered the truth hereof: leaving it to thy censure, and us all to the grace of God.

THE SOULS Sickness: A DISCOURSE Divine, Moral, and Physical.

The Induction.

THE Sickness of this World is Epidemical, and hath with the invisible poison of a general pestilence infected it to the heart. For Uice in manners, as Heresy in doctrine, distilleth insensible contagion into the fountain of Life; and dumvnum interficit, centum alios inficit, in killing one, banes many. Whether ex daemonis iniuria, vel ex hominis incuria, from the Devils malice, or man's secureness, Iniquity is grown from a mist to a Mystery, Ignorance to Arrogance, nescience to negligence, simple imprudence to political impudence, and I know not how, too much light hath made men blind. At first they knew not when they sinned, now they would know to justify their sins: they defend that, wherein they offend, and buy Sickness with as great expense of time, wit, money, as the anguished Atheist would health.

Sicknesses in men's Souls are bred like diseases in natural, or corruptions in civil bodies; with so insensible a progress, that they are not discerned, till they be almost desperate: as the frantic endures not bonds, nor the Lethargical noise: or as it was once said of the Romans, that they could neither endure an ill Emperor, nor obey a good one: so we may say of our selves (no less then Liuy of that State) Nec vitia nostra, nec remediaferre possumus: we can better brook our maladies, then our remedies. There is, say Physicians, no perfect Health in this world; and man, when he is at best, enjoys but a neutrality. But the Physicians of the Soul complain further: That we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousness are as filthy rags, &c. and in many things we sin all. We may say with the Prophet, not so much for our punishments, as our sins, The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint. From the sole of the foot, even unto the head, there is no soundness in it; but wounds and bruises and putrifying sores.

The Method.

TO pursue this Argument, I would willingly dispose the tenor of my speech into this method, 1. to describe the disease, 2. to ascribe the signs, 3. to prescribe the remedy. And whereas Physicians begin their medicinal institutions or instructions at the Head, as the most noble part of the body; the principal seat of the wits, the beginning of all the organical senses, and the proper house and habitation of the animal virtue; (though Philosophy attributes that supereminent dignity to the Heart) and I (for metaphors sake) without contention suffer myself to be led after their rule; behold, I apply to the Head first: which if I could cure, it would more easily discern the infirmities of the descending parts. In the Head and other corporal parts there are many diseases, which I will not contend to find out; desiring only to say (not all, but) enough. I will borrow so much Timber out of Galens wood, as shall serve me for a scaffold to build up my Moral discourse.

Head-ach and Brain sickness. Disease. 1.

Head-ach is diverse, say Physicians, according to the causes; proceeding some of cold, some of hot; of dryness, of moisture, of blood, of choler, of phlegm, windiness, drunkenness, of an offending stomach. There is an Head-ach called the Migram, Hemicrania, possessing lightly one side of the Head, and distinguished by a seam that runs along in the skull. There is a disease in the Soul not unlike this, and they that labor of it, are called Brain-sick men. They may have some pretty understanding in part of their heads, but the other part is strangely sick of crochets, singularities, and toyish inventions; wherein because they frolic themselves, they think all the world fools that admire them not. They are ever troubling themselves with unnecessary thoughtfulness of long or short, white or black, round or square; confounding their wits with Geometrical dimensions, & studying of Measure out of measure. A square cap on another man's head, puts their head out of square, and they turn their brains into dry wool, with storming against a garment of linen. New Albutij to moote the reasons, why if a Cap fell down, it brake; if a Sponge, it brake not; why Eagles fly, and not Elephants. There be such students in the Schools of Rome; what shall be done with an Ass, if he get into the Church to the Font uncovered, and drink the water of Baptism: upon the strange hazard of a Clarks negligence, and an Asses thirst entering the Church, which are uncertain, they make themselves Asses in certain. Or if a hungry Mouse filch the Body of our Lord, &c. Brave wits to invent Mouse-traps. These curiosities in human, but much more in divine things, prove men brain-sick.

Cause.

The Cause of the Migram, is the ascending of many vaporous humors, hot or cold, by the veins or arteries. The Cause of this spiritual Migram, or brain-sickness, is the unkindly concurrence of ignorance, arrogance and affectation, like foggy mists and clouds, obscuring & smothering the true light of their sober judgments; and bearing their affections like a violent wind, upon one only point of the Compass, new-fangled Opinion. Like the Giants son, they must have six toes on a foot: they hate, not to be observed, and had rather be notorious, then not notable. Opinion, is a foot too much, which spoils the Verse. New Physic may be better then old, so may new Philosophy; our studies, observation, and experience perfecting theirs: beginning, not at the Gamoth, as they did, but as it were at the Ela: but hardly new Divinity; not that an ancient error should be brought out against a new truth. A new truth? nay, an old newly come to light: for Error cannot wage Antiquity with Truth. His desire is to be cross to regularity; and should he be enjoined a Hatte, a Cap would extremely please him: were he confined to extemporal and enthusiastical labors, he would commend premeditation and study; which now he abhors, because they are put on him. He is unwise in being so bitter against Ceremonies: for therein he is palpably against himself, himself being nothing else but Ceremony. He loves not the beaten path; and because every fool (saith he) enters at the gate, he will climb over the wall, whiles the door of the Church stands open, he contends to creep through the window. The Brain-sick are no less then drunk with Opinion; and that so strangely, that sleep which helps other drunkards, doth them no good. Their ambitious singularity is often so violent, that if it be not restrained, it grows to a kind of frenzy, and so the Migram turns into the Staggers. Herein, because we will not credit their Positions, nor receive their Crochets in our set Music, they reel into the low-Countries.

Signs and Symptoms.

Physicians say of the Migram-affected, that in the violent fit of the passion, they can abide: 1. No noise or loud speech: 2. Not clear light: 3. Not to drink Wine: 4. Nor almost to move at all, &c. Our Brain-sick Novelist is described by such tokens.

1. Loud speech he loves not, except from his own lips. All noise is tedious to him, but his own: and that is most tedious to the company. He loves to hear himself talk out of measure. He wonders, that the senses of all his hearers do not get up into their ears, to watch and catch his mysteries with attention and silence; when as yet himself is more Non-resident from his theme, then a discontinuer is from his charge.

2. The clear light he cannot endure, for his brain is too light already. He presumes, that his head contains more knowledge then ten Bishops; and wonders that the Church was so overseen, as to forget him, when offices were disposing, or places a dealing; and because he can get none, rails at all for Antichristian. He is the only wise man, if he might teach all men to judge him, as he judgeth himself: and no star should shine in our Orbe, without borrowing some of his light. He offers to reform that man, that would inform him; and presumes of so much light, that if himself were set, our world would be left without a Sun.

3. Wine he hates, specially when it is poured into his wounds: (as the Fathers interpret the Samaritans wine to the wounded man, to cleanse and purge him.) Reproof and he are utter enemies; no man is good enough to chide him: wholesome counsel, which is indeed Wine to a weak soul, he accounts Vinegar; nothing so pleaseth him as his own Lees. Opinion hath brewed him ill, and he is like water scared out of the wits.

4. He must not be moved, nor removed from what he holds: his will is like the Persian law, unalterable. You may move him to choler, not to knowledge: his brain is turned, like a Bell rung too deep, and cannot be fetched back again. His own affectation is his pulley, that can move him; no engine else stirs him. A man may like him at first, as one that never heard music doth the Tinkers note on his kettle; but after a while, they are both alike tedious. There is no help for his auditor, by by any excuses to shift him off; if he have not the patience to endure an impertinent discourse, he must venter the censure of his manners, and run away. His discourse is so full of parentheses, as if he were troubled with the rheum, and could not spit. He is ever tying hard knots, and untying them, as if nobody had hired him, and therefore he must find himself work. If he light on the sacred Writ, he conceitedly allegorizes on the plainest subject, and makes the Scripture no more like it self, then Michols Image in the bed upon a pillow of Goats hair, was like David. He carries bread at his back and feeds upon stones. Like a full fed Dog, he leaves the soft meat to lie gnawing upon bones: that we may say of him, this man hath a strong wit, as we say, that dog hath good teeth.

Curation.

The way to cure the Migram is diverse, according to the cause; either by cutting a vein, purging, revulsive or local remedies. But the sanation of this Brainsick malady is very difficult: insomuch, that Solomon saith, There is more hope of a fool, then of one wise in his own conceit. For he imagines the whole world to be sick, and himself only sound. I might prescribe him the opening of a vein which feeds this disease, that is, affectation: the itching blood of singularity let out, would much ease him. Or a good purge of humility to take him down a little, because he stands so high in his own imagination: and full vessels, to prevent their bursting must have timely vent. Or a little opium of sequestering him from business, and confining him that he might take some sleep; for his brains want rest. Or a little Euphorbium of sound admonition and fit reproof dropped into his ear warm. Some Euphrasia or Eye-bright would do well. Unctions, if lenifying, will do no good, nor any of the former, I doubt; except a strong pill of Discipline go with them. The speciaest remedy is Discipline, as the Father said, when he heard his son complain of his head; my head, my head, commanded a servant; Carryhim to his Mother: so for these men so troubled with the Head-ach, deliver them to their mother, let the Church censure them.

Inconstancy, a kind of staggers. Disease. 2.

There is a Disease in the Soul called Inconstancy, not unfitly shadowed to us by a bodily infirmity, possessing the superior part of man, vertigo, a swimming in the head, a giddiness, or the Staggers. The disease in the body is described to be an astonishing and dusking of the eyes and spirits, that the Patient thinks all that he seeth to turn round, and is suddenly compassed with darkness. The parallel to it in the Soul, is Inconstancy, a motion without rule, a various aspect, a diversifying intention. The Inconstant man is like a Pour contrell; if he should change his apparel so fast as his thought, how often in a day would he shift himself? He would be a Proteus too, and vary kinds. The reflection of every news melts him, whereof he is as soon glutted. As he is a Noun, he is only adjective, depending on every novel persuasion: as a Verbe, he knows only the Present Tense. To day he goes to the Key to be shipped for Rome, but before the Tide come, his tide is turned. One party think him theirs, the adverse theirs: he is with both, with neither, not an hour with himself. Because the Birds & Beasts be at controversy, he will be a Bat, and get him both wings and teeth. He would come to heaven, but for his halting: two opinions (like two Water-men) almost pul him a-pieces, when he resolves to put his judgment into a Boat, and go somewhither; presently he steps back, and goes with neither. It is a wonder, if his affections, being but a little luke-warm water, do not make his religion stomach-sick. Indifferency is his ballast, and Opinion his sail: he resolves, not to resolve. He knows not what he should hold; he knows not what he doth hold. He opens his mind to receive motions, as one opens his palm to take a handful of water; he hath very much, if he could hold it. He is sure to die, but not what religion to die in; he demurs like a posed Lawyer, as if delay could remove some impediments. He is drunk when he riseth, and reels in a morning fasting. He knows not whether he should say his Pater noster in Latin, or English; and so leaves it and his prayers unsaid. He makes himself ready for an appointed feast; by the way he hears of a Sermon, he turns thitherward, yet betwixt the Church gate, and Church door, he thinks of business and retires home again. In a controverted point he holds with the last reasoner he either heard or read, the next diverts him; and his opinion dwells with him, perhaps so long as the teacher of it is in his sight. He will rather take dross for gold, then try it in the furnace. He receives many judgments, retains none, embracing so many faiths, that he is little better then an Infidel.

Causes.

They give a double cause of this disease in the body; either the distemperature and evil affectedness of the brain; or an offense given to it from the mouth of the stomach: vapors, gross and tough humors, or windy exhalations, either lodging in the brain, or sent thither from the stomach, turning about the animal spirits: hence the brain staggers with giddiness. This spiritual Inconstancy ariseth from like causes. If it be in religion, it proceeds from cloudy imaginations, fancies, fictions, and forced dreams, which keep the mind from a sober and peaceful considerateness. Multitude of opinions, like foggy vapors, mist the intellectual faculty, and like reverberated blasts whirl about the spirits. He sees some Ceremonial devisions in our Church, and therefore dares not steadfastly embrace that truth, which both parts without contention teach and observe. So leaves the blessing of his mother, because he beholds his brethren quarrelling: whiles he sees the irreconcilable opposition of Rome and us, which he fondly labors to atone, he forsakes both, and will now be a Church alone. Thus his breast is full of secret combats, contradictions, affirmations, negatives, and whiles he refuseth to join with others, he is divided in himself: And yet will rather search excuses for his unstaidness, then ground for his rest. He loathes Manna after two days feeding, and is almost weary of the Sun for perpetual shining. If the Temple pavements be ever worn with his visitant feet, he will run far to a new Teacher: and rather then be bound to his own parish, he will turn Recusant. He will admire a new Preacher, till a quarter of the sand is out; but if the Church doors be not locked up, he cannot stay out the hour: what he promiseth to a Collection today, he forgets, or at least denies the next morning. His best dwelling would be his confined chamber, where his irresolution might trouble nothing, but his pillow. In human matters, the cause of his variableness is not varied, but the object. He is transformable to all qualities, a tempered lump of wax to receive any form, yet no impression sticks long upon him. he holds it the quickness of his wit, to be voluble.

Signs and Symptoms.

The signs of this disease in the body, are a mist and darkness, coming upon every light occasion. If he see a wheel turning round, or a whirl-pool, or any such circular motion, he is affected with giddiness. The Symptoms of the Spiritual Staggers are semblable. He turns with those that turn, and is his neighbors Chameleon. He hates staidness as an earthen dullness. He prosecutes a business without fear or wit; and rejecting the patience to consult, falls upon it with a peremptory heat: but like water once hot, is soonest frozen, and instantly he must shift his time and his place; neither is he so weary of every place, as every place is weary of him. He affects an object with dotage, and as superstitiously courts, as an Idolater his gilded block: but it is a wonder, if his passionate love out-live the age of a wonder, 9. days. He respects in all things novelty above goodness; and the child of his own brains, within a week he is ready to judge a Bastard. He salutes his wits after some invented toy, as a Seruing-man kisseth his hand, when instantly on another plots arising, he kicks the former out of doors. He pulls down this day what he built the other, now disliking the site, now the fashion, and sets men on work to his own undoing. He is in his own house, as his thoughts in his own brain, transient guests: like a Haggard, you know not where to take him. He hunts well for a gird, but is soon at a loss. If he gives any profession a winters entertainment, yet he is whether for a penny the next Spring. He is full of business at Church, a stranger at home, a Sceptic abroad, an observer in the street, everywhere a fool. To conclude, their own unfaithfulness making the Inconstant thus sick, there is an accession of the Lord's plague; he adds dotage as a punishment of willful dotage. The Lord hath mingled a perverse spirit in themidst thereof: and they have caused Egypt to err in every work thereof, as a drunken man staggereth in his vomit.

Cure.

FOR the curing of this bodily infirmity, many remedies are prescribed: odoriferous smells in weakness, the opening of a vein in better strength, cupping glasses applied to the hinder part of the head, with scarification, gargarisms and sternutatory things, together with setting the feet in hot bathes, &c. To cure this Spiritual Staggers, let the Patient be purged with Repentance for his former unsettledness: let him take an ounce of Faith to firm his brains; let his repose be on the Scriptures, and thence fetch decision of all doubts; let a skillful Physician order him, a good Minister. Let him stop his ears to rumors, and fixe his eyes on Heaven, to be kept from distracting objects. Let him keep the continual diet of Prayer, for the Spirit of illumination; and thus he may be recovered.

Madness and Anger. Disease 3.

THE next disease I would describe, is Frenzy or Madness. Now though Physicians do clearly distinguish betwixt these two, Frenzy and Madness; calling Frenzy an inflammation of the brain without a Fever; or an impostumation bred and engendered in the pellicles of the brain, or pia mater: and Mania or Madness, an infection of the former cell of the head, without a Fever: the one abusing the imagination, the other ravishing the memory; I list not to dispute or determine. That which serves my intention, is to confer either of these passions, with a Spiritual disease of like nature, Anger. Ira furor brevis. It is a madness, I am sure, I am not sure how short. I do not ask for men passionless, this is hominem de homine tollere. Give them leave to be men, not mad men. Ira optimo loco donum Dei: & magna est ars, irasciverbis praemeditatis, & tempore opportuno. Anger in the best sense is the gift of God, and it is no small art, to express anger with premeditated terms, and on seasonable occasion. God placed Anger amongst the affections engraffed in nature, gave it a seat, fitted it with instruments, ministered it matter whence it might proceed, provided humors whereby it is nourished. It is to the Soul as a nerve to the body. The Philosopher calls it the Whetstone to fortitude, a spurr intended to set forward Virtue. This is simply rather a propassion, then a passion.

But there is a vicious, impetuous, frantic anger, earnest for private and personal grudges; not like a medicine to clear the eye, but to put it out. This pernicious disease of the Soul hath degrees. 1. It is inhumane; Tigers devour not Tigers, this rageth against kind and kindred. 2. Impious; it rageth often against God; as that Pope upon a field lost against the Frenchmen: Sic esto nunc Gallicus. So, turn French now, &c. 3. Mad; for it often rageth against unreasonable creatures, as Balaam striking his Ass; how much is such a man more irrational and bestial, then the Beast he maligns? 4. It is more then mad, striking at insensible things: as Xerxes wrote a defying letter to Athos a Thracian mountain. Mischievous Athos, lifted up to heaven, make thy quarries passable to my travel, or I will cut thee down, and cast thee into the sea. But his revenge was neither understood, feared, nor felt. So the Africans being infested with a North wind, that covered their corn fields with sand from a mountain, levied an army of men to fight with that wind; but were all buried under the sand. So Darius, because a River had drowned him a white Horse, vowed to cut it into so many Channels, that a woman with child might go over dry-shoo'd. We have some so madly impatient with a storm, wind &c. which might answer them, as Rabshakeh told the Jews: Am I come hither without the Lord? it is he that sent me. This anger is immediately directed against God: the heart speaks Atheism, only in other words. 5. It is unnatural, for it maligneth a man's self. It is full of consternation and amazement, and never useth violence, without torment to it self. It thinks to offer wrong, and indeed suffers it.

Ipsa sibi est hostis vesania, seque furendo-Interimit. As the frantic or drunkard do that, intoxicate, which sober, they would quake to think of; so these ireful, direful men (or rather beasts) dare in their fits play with Serpents, mingle poisons, act massacres, whereat their awaked souls shudder.

The higher the person in whō this frenzy reigns, the greater the fault. The Master-Bee hath no sting, the rest have: the greater power, the less passion. It is a State tyranny, in authority to mind nothing but authority. Posse & nolle, noble. It is noble to may and will not. When a railing wretch followed a Heathen Prince with obloquies all day, and home to his doors at night, he requited him with commanding his servant to light him home to his house with a torch. Damascene makes three degrees of anger; Bilem, Iracundiam, Infensionem: Choler, Wrath, heavy Displeasure. Some have added a fourth.

1. The first hath a beginning and motion, but presently ceaseth; we call this Choler. Like fire in stubble, soon kindled, and soon out. These are like gun-powder, to which you no sooner give fire, but they are in your face. They say, these hot men are the best natured; but I say then, the best are naught. These are stung with a nettle, and allayed with a dock.

2. The second is not so soon conceived, but takes deeper hold in the memory. This fire is neither easily kindled, nor easily put out: like fire in Iron, which hardly taking, long abideth. These men are like green logs, which once set on combustion, continue burning day and night too.

3 The third entertain this fire suddenly, and retain it perpetually, not desisting without revenge. These are like fire, which bewrayeth not it self without the ruin and waste of that matter wherein it hath caught: this worst.

4 The fourth is a moderate Anger, not soon incensed, but quickly appeased: and this is the best, because likest to the disposition of God, who is merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy, ready to forgive.

Causes.

Frenzy is caused by abundant blood, or choler occupying the brains or the films thereof: the more adust this choler is, the more pernicious the madness. The cause of anger, is the giving to Passion the dominion over Reason. Seneca says, Causa iracundiae opinio iniuriae est: the cause of anger is the conceit of injury. Such a man gets up on the wild Iade his choler, and spurs him on, having no bridle of moderation to hold him back. His conversation is so full of choleric fits, as a book of tedious parentheses, that they mar the sense of his life. He is like an egg in roasting, hopeful to be good meat, but it grows too hot on a sudden, and flies in your face not without a great noise. Anger is able to turn Dametas into Hercules furens, teaching him that is strong to fight, him that is not to talk: whilst the lightning of his rage lasts, he thunders out a challenge, but after a little calm meditation, sounds a retreat. He menaceth the throats of his enemies, though they be many, and swears loud he will be their Priest, he means Executioner. But if you compare his threatenings and his after-actions, you would say of them, as that wise man sheering his hogs: Here is a great deal of cry, but a little wool. His enemies are worse feared then hurt, if so they be in personal presence, as he is in sober judgment a little out of the way.

Signs and Symptoms.

The Frensy is easily seen, and needs not to be described by signs. Physicians give many, I will say no more but this. If the madness proceed from blood, they are perpetually laughing; if of choler, they rage so furiously, that bands only can restrain them from doing violence. The Symptoms of this spiritual madness, rash and furious anger, are many, visible and actual.

1. Swelling of mind so high and so full, that there is no room for any good motion to dwell by it. Iratumor mentis, and makes a man like the Spider-poison'd toad. In this raging fit, Reason, Modesty, Peace, Humanity, &c. run from him, as servants from their mad master, or Mice from a Barn on fire. 2. Contumely without any distinguishing respect of friend, foe, alliant, familiar, reviles any, fratrem{que}, patrem{que}. 3. Violence of hands, savage and monstrous behavior: Like the troubled Sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt: fuming and foaming, like a muddy channel: a distorted countenance, sparkling eye, foul language, hasty hands. If the angry man, and the drunkard had a glass presented them, how hardly could they be brought again to love their own faces!

Cure.

To cure this Bedlam passion, (leaving the other to deeper judgments in that profession) both nature and Grace have given rules. Natural reason; that an angry man should not undertake any action or speech, till he had recited the Greek Alphabet; as a pause to cool the heat of choler. That angry men should sing to their passions, as Nurses to their Babes 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 haste not, cry not. Maximum remedium est irae, mora. The best remedy for Anger is delay. What a man doth in anger, he lightly repents in cold blood.

That we should keep our corrupt nature from provoking objects, as a man that hath Gunpowder in his house, keeps it safe from fire. That we should conster all things in the best sense: a good disposition makes a good exposition, where palpableness doth not evince the contrary. That suspicion is a pair of bellows to this mad fire. That Jealousy and self-guiltiness are the angry man's Eues-dropper and Intelligencer. That the Earth suffers us living to plow furrows on her back, and dead, opens her bowels to receive us: a dead earth convincing a living earths impatience. Scripture. That anger resteth in the bosom of fools. That the wrath of man doth not accomplish the righteousness of God. That unadvised anger is culpable of judgment. Let him take some herb of Grace, an ounce of Patience, as much of Consideration how often he gives God just cause to be angry with him; and no less of meditating how God hath a hand in Shimei's railing, that David may not be angry: mixe all these together with faithful confidence, that God will dispose all wrongs to thy good; hereof be made a pill to purge choler. To conclude, let reason ever be our Judge, though passion sometimes be our solicitor.

Parit ira furorem;

Turpia verba furor, verbis ex turpibus exit

Ira, ex hac oritur vulnus de vulnere lethum.

Wrath kindles fury, fury sparks foul words,

Those let out wounds and death with flaming swords.

Envy a consumption. Disease. 4.

Envy fitly succeeds anger, for it is nothing else but inveterate wrath. The other was a frantic fit, and this is a consumption; a languishing disease in the body, the beginning of dissolution, a broaching of the vessel, not to be stopped till all the liquor of life is run out: what the other tabe is in the body, I list not to define, by reason that this spiritual sickness is a consumption of the flesh also, and a pining away of the spirits: now since they both have relation to the body, their comparison would be confusion. Envy is the consumption I singularly deal withal, which though I cannot cure, I will hopefully minister to.

Cause.

The cause of Envy, is others prosperity; or rather an evil eye shot upon it. The angry man hath not himself, the envious must have no neighbor. He battens at the maligned's misery; and if such a man riseth, he falls as if he were Planet-struck. I know not whether he could endure to be in Paradise with a superior. He hates to be happy with any company. Envy sits in a man's eyes, and wheresoever through those windows it spies a blessing, it is sickness and death unto it. Inuidus petat a Jove priuari vno oculo, vt auarus quod priuetur ambobus. The envious man would have happily one of his eyes put out, as the covetous should lose both. A Physician being asked what was the best help to the perspicuity of the eyes, affirmed, Envy: for that like a perspective glass would make good things appear great things.

Fertilior seges est alienis semper in agris;

Uicinum{que} pecus grandius vber habet.

He is even quarrelling with God, that his neighbors field bears better corn, and thinks himself poor, if a near dweller be richer. He will dispraise God's greatest blessings, if they fall besides himself: and grow sullen (so far as he dares) with the Prince, that shall promote a better deserver. There is no law perfect, if he was not at the making it. He undertakes a great work, and when he cannot accomplish it, he will give leave to none other. No man shall have that glory, which he aspired and missed. An Aesop's dog in the manger; because he can eat no hay himself, he will starve the horse. Poison is life to a Serpent, death to a man: and that which is life to a man, his humidity and spettle, they say is death to a Serpent: the rancorous sustenance which a malicious man lives of, is the misery and mischief to a good man; and a good man's prosperous felicity is the malicious man's death. God hath in justice appointed it to be a plague to it self. Among all mischiefs it is furnished with one profitable quality; the owner of it takes most hurt. Carpit{que}, & carpitur vna: supplicium{que} suum est.—vt Aetna seipsum,

Sic se non alios, inuidus igne coquit.

The envious is a man of the worst diet, and like a strange Cook, shows himself; nay, and conceits pleasure in pining: so that his body, at last, hath just cause to sue his soul on an action of dilapidations. He finds fault with all things, that himself hath not done. He wakes, whiles his enemy takes rest. Parum est, si ipse sit foelix, nisi alter fuerit infoelix. His affections are like lightning, which commonly scorch the highest places. He creeps like a Canker to the fairest flowers. By putting in a superfluous syllable, he hath corrupted one of the best words, turning amorem into amarorem, love into bitterness. A Philosopher seeing a malicious man dejected, asked him, whether some evil had happened to himself, or some good to his neighbor.

Signs and Symptoms.

The Signs of this disease are given by the Poet.

—videt intus edentem

Vipereas carnes, vitiorum alimenta suorum.

Pallor in ore sedet, macies in corpore toto;

Nunquam recta acies; liuent rubigine dentes:

Pectora felle virent, lingua est suffusa veneno.

A pale face without blood, and a lean body without any juice in it, squint eyes, black teeth, a heart full of gall, a tongue tipp'd with poison. Amazedness makes the face pale, grief drinks up the blood, looking on men's prosperity makes the eyes squint, and cursing, the teeth black. It were well for him on earth, that he should dwell alone. It is pity he should come into heaven; for to see one star excel another in glory, would put him again out of his wits. I wonder, when he is in hell, whether he would not still desire superiority in anguish, & to sit in the chair, though he receive the more torments. The envious man is so cross to God, that he is sure of punishment: he hath in present one like to the nature of his offense. For his sin, whereas GOD brings good out of evil, he brings evil out of good. For his punishment, whereas even evil things work together to the good of the good, even good things work together to his evil. All the happiness lights on him that is envied; for it goes well with him, with whom the malicious thinks it goes too well.

Cure.

His Cure is hard, even as with a tabe in the body: too much Physic makes him worse. Crosses are fitly called God's physic; whereby if God will cure him, he must minister them to those he hates. Strange! that one man should be healed, by giving physic to another. Two simples may do him good, if he could be won to take them: a scruple of content, and a dram of charity. If these be given him, (well stirred) in a potion of repentant tears, he may be brought to wish himself well, and others no harm, and so be recovered.

Idleness, the Lethargy. Disease 5.

Idleness in the soul is a dangerous disease as the Lethargy in the body. The very name of Lethargy speaks the nature: for it is compounded of 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 forgetfulness, and 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 slothful; and so consequently is defined to be a dull oblivion.

The Idle man is a piece of base heavy earth, molded with muddy and standing water. He lies in bed the former half of the day, devising excuses to prevent the afternoons labor. He cannot endure to do anything by himself, that may be done by Attorney. He forestalls persuasion inducing him to any work, by forecasting the unprofitableness: he holds business man's cruellest enemy, and a monstrous devourer of time. His body is so swollen with lazy humors, that he moves like a tun upon two pottle pots. He is tempted to covetise, for no other reason, but to be able to keep servants; whom he will rather trust, then step out to oversee. Neither summer nor winter scape the blame of his laziness: in the one it is too hot, in the other too cold to work. Summer hath days too long, winter nights too cold; he must needs help the one with a nap at noon, the other with a good fire. He was very fit to be a Monk: spare him an early mass, and he will accept it: yet howsoever, he will rather venture the censure, then forsake a lazy calling.

Cause.

The Cause of the Lethargy is abundant phlegm, overmuch cooling the brain, and thereby provoking sleep; which putrefied in the brain, causeth a fever. The cause of Idleness is indulgence to the flesh, a forgetfulness of the end of our creation, a willful digression from man: for the lazy wretch is a dormouse in an human husk. To man motion is natural, the joints and eyes are made to move; and the mind is never asleep, as if it were set to watch the body: Sleep is the image of death, saith the Poet: and therefore the Church-sleeper is a dead corps, set in his pew like a coffin, as if the Preacher were to make his funeral Sermon. He sings out harvest like the Grasshopper; therefore may at Christmas dance for and without his dinner. He riseth at noon to breakfast, which he falls to unwashed, and removes not out of his chair without a sleep. Whilst he sleeps, the enemy oversows the field of his heart with tares. He is a patient subject for the devil to work on, a cushion for him to sit on, and take his ease: his misery is, that his damnation sleepeth not. His bed is his haven, his heaven, and sound sleep his deity.

The standing water stinks with putrefaction:

And virtue hath no virtue, but in action.

If he be detained up late, he lies down in his clothes, to save two labors: nothing shall make him bustle up in the night, but the house fired about his ears; which escaping, he lies down in the yard, and lets it burn. He should gather moss, for he's no rolling stone. In this he is a good friend to his Country, he desires no innovation: he would scarce shift ground ten leagues, though from a cottage to a Manor. He is so loath to leave the tap-house in winter, that when all leave him, he makes bold with the chimney corner for his Parlour. If ever (in a ••gne) he lights upon a humor to business, it is to game, to cheat, to drink drunk, to steal, &c. and falls from doing naught to do naughtily; so mending the matter, as you have heard in the fable, The devil mended his dames leg; whē he should have put it in joint, he brake it quite apieces.

Signs and Symptoms.

Symptoms of the Lethargy are a great pulse, beating seldom, as if it were full of water; a continual proneness to sleep, that they are scarcely compelled to answer a question. You may know a lethargical Idle man, by a neglected beard, unkemb'd hair, and unwashed face, foul linen, clothes unbrushed, a nasty hand smelling of the sheet, an eye opening when the ear receives your voice, and presently shut again; as if both the organs were stiff with excretions. He hath a blown cheek, a drawling tongue, a leaden foot, a brazen nose: he gapes and gasps so often, that sometimes he keeps his mouth open still, as if he had forgotten to shut it.

Cure.

TO cure the Lethargic, there are required many intentions; not without frictions, scarifications, sharp odors, and blood-letting, &c. To cure the Idle, it should more properly belong to Surgery than Physic; for there is no medicine like a good whip, to let out his lazy blood; and a good diet of daily labor, which some skillful Bedle must see him take; put him into the bath at Bridewell, to take away the numbness of his joints, and scour off his rust, and so he may be recovered.

Fac been, fac tua, fac aliquid, fac vtile semper:

Corrumpunt mores otia praua bonos.

The Dropsy and Covetousness, Causes. Disease. 6.

Physicians say, that the Dropsy is an error in the digestive virtue in the liver, bred of the abundance of salt and waterish phlegm, with the over-feeding of raw and moist meats. It is distinguished into three sorts, Ascites, Tympanites, and Anasarca, or Hyposarca. Ascites is, when between the filme called Peritoneum (which is the Cowl that covers the Entrails) much watery humor is gathered. Tympanites ariseth from windiness and flatuous causes gathered into the foresaid places. Hyposarca is, when the humors are so dispersed through the whole body, that all the flesh appears moist and spongy. Our spiritual Dropsy covetousness, is a disease bred in the soul, through defect of faith and understanding. It properly resides in the inferior powers of the soul, the affections; but ariseth from the errors of the superior intellectual faculty; neither conceiving aright of God's all-sufficient help, nor of the worlds all-deficient weakness.

Signs.

THE corporal Dropsy is easily known by heaviness, swelling, puffing up, immoderate desire of drink, &c. The spiritual likewise (though it leans the carcass) lards the conscience; at least swells and puffs it up: and as if some hellish inflammation had scorched the affection, it thirsts for Aurum potabile without measure. The Covetous man is of Renodaeus his opinion, that argentum plurimum valet ad cordis palpitationem, silver is good against the heart-panting. The Wise man calls it a disease, an-evil disease, and almost incurable. The Covetous hath drunk the blood of oppression, wrong from the veins of the poor: and behold, like an indigestible receipt, it wambles in his stomach; he shall not feel quietness in his belly. This is an epidemial sickness.

Aurum omnes, victa iam pietate, colunt.

Religion gives riches, and riches forgets religion.

Religio dat opes, paupertas Religionem:

Diuitiae veniunt, Religio{que} fugit.

Thus do our affections wheel about with an unconstant motion. Poverty makes us Religious, Religion rich, and riches irreligious. For as, Pauperis est rogare, so it should be Diuitis erogare. Seneca wittily and truly, Habes pecuniam? vel teipsum vel pecuniam habeas vilem necesse est. Hast thou money? either thou must esteem thy money vile, or be vile thyself. The Covetous man is like a two-legged Hog: whiles he lives, he is ever rooting in the earth, and never doth good, till he is dead; like a vermin, of no use till uncased. Himself is a Monster, his life a riddle: his face (and his heart) is prone to the ground; his delight is to vex himself. It is a question whether he takes more care to get damnation, or to keep it; and so is either a Laban or a Nabal, two infamous churls in the old Testament, spelling one another's name backward. He keeps his god under lock and key, and sometimes for the better safety, in his unclean vault. He is very eloquently powerful amongst his poor neighbors; who for awful fear listen to Pluto, as if he were Plato. He prevails very far when he deals with some officers; as a Pharisee with Christ's Steward, Tantum dabo, tantus valor in quatuor syllabis: so powerful are two words. He prevails like a sorcerer, except he light upon a Peter: Thou and thy money be damned together. His heart is like the East Indian ground, where all the mines be so barren, that it bears neither grass, herb, plant, nor tree. The lightness of his purse gives him a heavy heart, which yet filled, doth fill him with more cares. His medicine is his malady: he would quench his avarice with money, and this inflames it, as oil feeds the lamp, and some harish drinks increase thirst. His proctor in the law, and protector against the law, is his money. His Alchemy is excellent, he can project much silver, and waste none in smoke. His Rhetoric is how to keep him out of the Subsidy. His Logic is to prove heaven in his chest. His Mathematics, Omnia suo commodo, non honestate mensurare, to measure the goodness of anything by his own profit. His Arithmetic is in Addition and Multiplication, much in Substraction, nothing in Division. His Physic is to minister gold to his eye, though he starve his body. His Music is Sol, re, me, fa: Sola res me facit; that which makes me, makes me merry. Divinity he hath none: Idolatry enough to his money: Sculptura is his Scriptura, & he hath so many God's as images of coin. He is an ill harvest man, for he is all at the rake, nothing at the pitchfork. The devil is a slave to God, the world to the devil, the covetous man to the world; he is a slave to the devils slave; so that his servant is like to have a good office. He foolishly buries his soul in his chest of silver, when his body must be buried in the mould of corruption. When the Fisher offers to catch him with the Net of the Gospel, he strikes into the mud of Avarice, and will not be taken. The Dropsy of his 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 doth Senectute iuuenescere. Cicero calleth it an absurd thing, Quo minus viae restat, eo plus viatici quaerere. He sels his best grain, and feeds himself on mouldy crusts: he returns from plough, if he remember that his cupboard was left unlocked. If once in a Rain he invites his neighbors to dinner, he whiles the times with frivolous discourses, to hinder feeding; sets away the best dish, affirming it will be better cold: observes how much each guest eateth, and when they are risen and gone, falleth to himself, what for anger and hunger, with a sharp appetite. If he smells of Gentility, you shall have at the nether end of his board a great Pasty uncut up, for it is filled with bare bones; somewhat for show, but most to keep the nether mess from eating. He hath sworn to die in debt to his belly. He deducts from a servants wages the price of a halter, which he cut to save his master, when he had hung himself at the fall of the market. He lends nothing, nor returns borrowed, unless it be sent for; which if he cannot deny, he will delay in hope to have it forgotten. To excuse his base and sordid apparel, he commends the thriftiness of king Henry, how cheap his clothes were. His fist is like the Prentices earthen box, which receives all, but lets out nothing til it be broken. He is in more danger to be sand-blind, then a Goldsmith. Therefore some call him anidum, a non videndo. He must rise in the night with a candle to see his corn, though he stumble in the straw and fire his barn. He hath a lease of his wits, during the continuance of his riches: if any crossestarts away them he is mad instantly. He would flay an Ass for his skin, and like Hermocrates dying, bequeath his own goods to himself. His case is worse then the prodigals: for the Prodigal shall have nothing hereafter, but the Covetous hath nothing in present.

Cure.

FOR his cure much might be prescribed; specially as they give in the corporal Dropsy, purge the humor that feeds it. When the Covetous hath gotten much, and yet thirsts, a vomit of confiscation would do well, and set him to get more. It was a good moral instruction that fell from that shame of Philosophy Epicurus, the course to make a man rirh, is not to increase his weath, but to restraine his covetous desires. The Apostles counsel is to fly it, and all occasions, occupations that may beget or nourish it. Remember, saith a Schoolman, that though homo be de terra, & exterra, yet non ad terram, nec propter terram. Man is on the earth, of the earth, but not for the earth, &c. I have read of one John Patriarch of Alexandria, asparing and strait-handed man, that being earnest at his prayers, there appeared to him a Virgin with a crown or garland of Olive leaves: he desiring to know her name, she called her self Mercy: requiring her intent, she requested him to marry her, promising him much prosperity on that condition. He did so, and found himself still the richer for his merciful deeds. She may offer her self long enough in these days ere she be taken. Mercy may live a maid, for no man will marry her. Valerius Maximus speaks of one Gilianus, a famous Roman, that besides hospitality to strangers, paid the taxes of many poor, rewarded deserts unsued to, bought out the servitude of captives, and sent them home free: how few such like can an English Historiographer write of? I would we had such a Gilianus amongst us, so it were not from Rome. Well then, let the Covetous remember his end, and the end of his riches, how certain, how uncertain they are! And intend his couertice to a better object. Quis alius noster est finis, quam peruenire ad regnum cuius nullus est finis? What else should be our end, save to come to the kingdom that hath no end! His cure is set down by God: I leave the receipt with him. They that will be rich, fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and noisome lusts, which drown men in perdition and destruction. For the love of money is the root of all evil, &c. But thou, O man of God, fly these things, and follow after righteousness, &c. Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, &c. but that they be rich in good works, &c. The place is powerful; let the Covetous read, observe, obey, repent, believe, and be saved.

Usury, and Caninus appetitus, or the dog-like appetite. Disease 7.

NExT to the Dropsy of Covetise, I would place the immoderate hunger of Usury; for as the one drinks, so the other feeds to satisfy; and the former is not more thirsty after his cupping, then the latter is hungry after his devouring. Some have compared Usury to the Gout, (by reason of that diseases incidency to Usurers) which is an unnatural humor flowing to the extreme parts. It is either Arthritis, an articular disease, which we call a jointsickness: or Podagra, a pain invading the joint of the great toe, or the heel, or some inferior parts of the foot: this like a strong charm bindeth a man to his chair. Musculus says, that Divines shall reform Usury, when Physicians have cured the Gout: the sin and the disease are both incurable. And that will one day rack the conscience, as this the sinews. Herein the merely Covetous and the Usurer differ: the Covetous to be rich, would undergo any labor, the Usurer would be rich, yet undergo no labor; therefore like the gout-wrung, desires to sit still. I have thought fitter to compare it with the dog-like appetite; which cannot refrain from devouring meat without measure; which the stomach not able to bear, they fall to vomiting like Dogs: hence again hunger is excited to more meat, and much meat provokes spewing: so that their whole life is nothing else but a vicissitude of devouring and vomiting.

Causes.

IT is caused through cold distemper of the stomach, or through vicious and sharp humors, which gnaw and suck the mouth of it: or through immeasurable dissipation of the whole body, which lightly follows the weakness of the retentive virtue. This animal hunger is raised partly from the coldness of the heart, for there is no charity to warm it; partly from corrupt affections, which like vicious humors gnaw and suck the conscience dry of all vividity, whether of grace or humanity; partly through the weak retention of any good instruction, whether from the Scriptures of God, or writings of sober men.

Signs and Symptoms.

THE corporal disease is easily perceived, by insatiate feeding, which yet ministers almost no virtue to the body, but it is rather made lean, and wasted therewith; the skin is rarefied, the body made fluid and apt to much egestion, &c. An Usurer is known by his very looks often, by his speeches commonly, by his actions ever. He hath a lean cheek, a meagre body, as if he were fed at the devils allowance. His eyes are almost sunk to the backside of his head with admiration of money. His ears are set to tell the clock; his whole carcass a mere Anatomy. Some Usurers have fatter carcasses, and can find in their hearts to lard their flesh, but a common meagerness is upon all their consciences. Foenus pecuniae, funus animae. Some spin Usury into such fine threads of distinction, that they take away all the names whereby it offends: and because R. is a dogged letter, and they conceive a toothless practice, Interest, Usury, and all terms with R. in them shall be put out: and the Usurer shall be called only, one that lives upon his monies. All his reaches are at riches: his wit works like a Mole, to dig himself through the earth into hell. Plutarch writes strangely of Hares, eodem tempore

& parere, & alere, & alios concipere foetus; at one time to bring forth, nourish and to conceive. Your Usurer makes his money truly do all these at once. He drowns the noise of the people's curses, with the music of his money; as the Italians in a great thunder, ring their bells, and shoot off their Cannons, by an artificial noise of their own, to dead the natural of broken clouds. His practice mocks Philosophy, Quodex nihilo nihil fit, and teaches of nothing to get something. He is a rank Whore-master with his mistress Pecunia, and lives upon the lechery of metals. He doth that office for the Devil on earth, that his spirits do in hell, whip and torment poor souls. His blows are without fence; except men (as Strepsiades desired) could pluck the Moon out of the skies, his month and day will come.

Nature hath set a pitch or term in all inferior things, when they shall cease to increase. Old cattle breed no longer; doted trees deny fruit: the tired earth becomes barren: only the Usurers money, the longer it breeds, the lustier; and a hundred pounds put out twenty years since, is a great great Grand-mother of two or three hundred children: pretty striplings, able to beget their mother again in a short time.

Each man to heaven his hands for blessing rears;

Only the Usurer needs not say his prayers.

Blow the Wind East or West, plenty or dearth,

Sickness or health, sit on the face of earth,

He cares not: Time will bring his money in:

Each day augments his treasure and his sin.

Be the day red or black in Calender,

Common, or holy fits the Usurer.

He starves his carcass; and true money's slave,

Goes with full chests, and thin cheeks to his grave.

He hath not his gold so fast, as his gold him. As the covetous takes away the difference betwixt the richest Mine and basest mould, use: so this pawn-groper spoils all with over-using it. It is his ill luck that the beams of wealth shine so full upon him: for riches like the sun fires and inflames objects that are opposed in a diameter, though further removed; but heateth kindly, when it shines upon a man lately, though nearer. He shrinks up his guts with a starving diet, as with knot grass; and puts his stomach into his purse. He sels time to his customers, his food to his coffer, his body to languishment, his soul to the Devil.

Cure.

His Cure is very desperate: his best reprehension is deprehension: and the best purge is to purge him out of the land. Hiera picra Galeni is a sovereign confection to clarify him. Let him be fed, as Physicians prescribe in the cure of the corporal disease, with fat supplings: and let him drink abundantly, till he forget the date of his bonds. Turn him out from the chimney-corner into some wilderness, that he may have a cold and perspirable air. Give him a good vomit of Stibium, till he hath spewed up his extortions. Let his diet-drink be repentance, his daily exercise restoring to every man his gotten interest. Give him a little Opium, to rock his cares a sleep: and when he is cold, make him a good fire of his Bills and Bonds. Give him a Iulep of the Gospel, to beget in him the good blood of faith. If nothing work with him, let him make his will, and hear his sentence, that he shall never dwell with the blessed.

Pride and the Pleurisy, Disease 8.

The Pleurisy is defined to be an inward inflammation of that upper skin, which girdeth the sides and the ribs: and therefore is called dolor lateralis. Pride is a pury affection of the soul, Lege, modo, ration carens: Without law, for it is rebellious: without measure, for it delights in extremes: without reason, for it doth all things with precipitation. The proud man is bitten of the mad dog, the flatterer, and hence runs on a garget.

Causes.

The Pleurisy is caused of an abundance of hot blood flowing unnaturally to the foresaid place: or by the engendering of cold, gross, and viscous humors, gathered into the void place of the breast, or into the lungs. This spiritual disease ariseth from a blown opinion of ones self: which opinion is either from ignorance of his own emptiness; and so like a Tumbrel full of nothing but air, makes a greater sound, then a vessel of precious liquor: or from arrogance of some good, which the owner knows too well. He never looks short of himself, but always beyond the mark, and offers to shoot further then he looks, but ever falls two bows short, humility and discretion.

Signs and Symptoms.

The Symptoms of the Pleurisy are difficult breathing, a continual Fever, a vehement pricking on the affected side. The proud man is known by his gate, which is peripatetical, strutting like a new Church warden. He thinks himself singularly wise, but his opinion is singular, and goes alone. In the company of good wits he fenceth in his ignorance with the hedge of silence, that observation may not climb over to see his follies. He would have his judgment for wearing his apparel pass unmended, not uncommended. He shifts his attire on some solemn day twice at least in twelve hours; but cannot shift himself out of the Mercers books once in twelve months. His greatest envy is the next Gentleman's better clothes: which if he cannot better or equalize, he wears his own neglected. His apparel carries him to Church, without devotion, and he riseth up at the Creed to join with the rest in confession, not of his faith, but his pride: for sitting down hides much of his bravery. He feeds with no cheerful stomach, if he sit not at the upper end of the table, and be called young master, where he is content to rise hungry, so the observant company weary him with drinking to: on this condition he gives his obligation for the shot. He loves his lying glass beyond any true friend; and tells his credulous auditors, how many Gentlewomen have run mad for him: when if a base female servant should court him, I dare wager, he proves no Adonis. If he were to die on the block as Byron, he would give charge for the composition of his locks.

Pride.

PRide is of the feminine gender; (therefore the more intolerable in a masculine nature:) much Ciuet is unsavory: Nō been olet, quae been semper olet. She that breaths perfumes artificially, gives her self to have naturally corrupted lungs. This woman hath neither her own complexion nor proportion: for she is both painted, and pointed together. She sits moderator every morning to a disputatiō betwixt the comb and the glass: and whether concludes best on her beauty, carries her love and praise. Howsoever, of men saith the Poet: Forma viros neglecta decet. Indeed there is no graceful behavior like humility. This fault is well mended, when a man is well minded: that is, when he esteems of others better than himself. Otherwise a proud man is like the rising earth in mountainous places: this swells up monte, as he mente: and the more either earth advanceth it self, perpetually they are the more barren. He lives at a high sails, that the puffy praises of his neighbors may blow him into the enchanted Island, vain-glory. He shines like a Glowworm in a dark village, but is a crude thing when he comes to the Court. If the plethory swells him in the vein of valor, nothing but well-beating can hold him to a man. If ever he goes drunk into the field, and comes off with a victorious parley, he would swell to a son of Anak.

Cure.

The Pleurisy is cured by drawing out some blood frō the vein, that hath relation to the affected part. A Clister is very good, together with some fomentations. It is helped much by cupping, I do not mean, drinking. God prescribes the cure of Pride, by precept and pattern. Precept. Humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God: the reason is given; for God resisteth the proud, and giveth graceto the humble. Pattern. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart; and you shall find rest vntoyour souls. The Master is worth your hearing, the lesson your learning, the recompense your receiving. The cure hereof is hard, for all vices are against humility: nay, all virtues are against humility; as many are proud of their good deeds: nay, humility hath an opposition against humility, as if she were false to her own person. Saepe homo de vanae gloriae contemptu vanus gloriatur: so that often, humility by a prodigious and preposterous birth, brings forth pride. Pride doth make a wise-man a fool; continues him a fool, that is so; the opinion of his own wisdom excluding all opportune possibility of receiving knowledge. Pour precious juice into a vessel full of base liquor, and it runs besides. That instruction is split, which you offer to infuse into a soul so full of self affectation. Many a man had proved wise, if he had not so thought himself. If the air of his pride be enclosed in a baser bubble, attire, it is the more vile: for the generation of his sin is produced from the corruption of himself. God made him a man, he hath made himself a beast; and now the Taylor (scarce a man himself) must make him a man again: a brave man, a better man than ever Nature left him. Thus he is like the Cinnamon tree, the bark is better than the body; or some Vermin, whose case is better than the carcass.

For his cure, open his pleuritic vein with the sacrificing knife of the Law; and tell him, that the cause of his pride is the effect of his sin. That wickedness brought shame to nakedness, and apparel hides it; whereof being proud, he glories in his own halter. Strip him of his gaudy clothes, and put him in a Charnel house, where he may read visible lectures of mortality and rottenness.

Palsy and timorous suspicion. Disease 9.

The former sick were Tumidi, these are Timidi: they were bold to all evil, these are fearful to all good. The palsy is a disease, wherein one half of the body is endamaged in both sense and moving. Of that disease which is called Paralysis, Resolution, or the dead palsy, wherein sometimes sense alone is lost, sometimes motion alone, and sometimes both together perish, I intend not to speak. It is (proportion considered) more dangerous to the body, then I would imagine this disease to be to the soul. I would compare it to that corporal infirmity, which Physicians call Tremorem, and some vulgarly the palsy; wherein there is a continual shaking of the extremer parts: somewhat adverse to the dead palsy: for that takes away motion, and this gives too much, though not so proper and kindly. This spiritual disease is a cowardly fearfulness, and a distrustful suspicion, both of actions and men. He dares not undertake, for fear of he knows not what: he dares not trust, for suspicion of his own reflection, dishonesty.

Cause.

This evil in the body is caused generally through the weakness of the sinews, or of the cold temperature of nature, or accidentally of cold drink taken in Fevers. Old age and fear are not seldom causes of it. This spiritual palsy ariseth either from the weakness of zeal, and want of that kindly heat, to be affected to God's glory, or from consciousness of self-corruption, thereby measuring others. The first is Fearfulness, the second Distrustfulness.

Signs and Symptoms.

The Signs of the palsy are manifest; of this not very close and reserved. He conceives what is good to be done, but fancies difficulties and dangers, like to knots in a bul-rush, or rubs in a smooth way. He would bowle well at the mark of Integrity, if he durst venture it. He hath no journey to go, but either there are bugs, or he imagines them. Had he a pardon for his brother (being in danger of death) and a Hare should cross him in the way, he would no further, though his brother hanged for it. He owes God some good will, but he dares not show it: when a poor plaintiff calls him for a witness, he dares not reveal the truth, lest he offend the great adversary. He is a new Nicodemus, and would steal to heaven, if nobody might see him. He makes a good motion bad by his fearfulness and doubting; and he calls his trembling by the name of conscience. He is like that Collier, that passing thorough Smithfield, and seeing some on the one side hanging, he demands the cause; answer was made, for denying the Supremacy to King Henry: on the other side some burning, he asks the cause; answered, for denying the real presence in the Sacrament: some, quoth he, hanged for Papistry, and some burned for Protestancy? then hot on a God's name: chill be never nother. His Religion is primarily his Princes, subordinately his Land-lords. Neither deliberates he more to take a new religion, to rise by it; then he fears to keep his old, lest he fall by it. All his care is for a ne noceat. He is a busy inquirer of all Parliament acts, and quakes as they are read, lest he be found guilty. He is sick, and afraid to die, yet holds the potion in a trembling hand, and quakes to drink his recovery. His thoughts are an ill balance, and will never be equally poised. He is a light vessel, and every great man's puff is ready to overturn him. Whiles CHRIST stands on the battlements of heaven, and beckons him thither by his word, his heart answers, I would fain be there, but that some troubles stand in my way. He would ill with Peter walk to him on the pavement of the Sea, or thrust out his hand with Moses, to take up a crawling Serpent, or hazard the loss of himself, to find his Savior. His mind is ever in suspicion, in suspension, and dares not give a confident determination either way. Resolution, and his heart are utter enemies, and all his Philosophy is to be a Sceptic. Whether is worse, to do an evil action with resolution that it is good; or a good action with dubitation that it is evil, somebody tell me. I am sure neither is well: for an evil deed is evil, whatsoever the agent think; and for the other, Whatsoever is not of Faith, is sin. Negatively, this rule is certain and infallible: It is good to forbear the doing of that, which we are not sure is lawful to be done. Affirmatively; the work being good, labor thy understanding so to think it.

Fear rather than profit hath made him a flatterer; and you may read the statutes and his Land-lords disposition in the characters of his countenance. A Soldier, a Husbandman, and a Merchant should be venturous. He would be God's Husbandman, and sow the seeds of obedience, but for observing the wind & weather of great men's frowns. He would be God's factor, but that he fears to lose by his Talent, and therefore buries it. He would be God's soldier, but that the world and the devil are two such shrewd and sore enemies. He once began to prosecute a deed of charity, and because the event crossed him, he makes it a rule to do no more good by.

As he is fearful of himself, so distrustful of others, carrying his heart in his eyes, his eyes in his hands: as he in the Comedy, Oculatae mihi sunt manus, credunt quod vident: He knows nothing by himself but evil, and according to that rule measures others. He would fain be an Usurer, but that he dares not trust the Law with wax and paper. He swears damnably to the truth of that he affirms; as fearing otherwise not to be believed, because without that othing it, he will credit none himself. The bastardy of swearing lays on him the true fatherhood. He will trust neither man nor God without a pawn: not so much as his Taylor with the stuff to make his clothes: he must be a Broker, or no neighbor. He hath no faith; for he believes nothing, but what he knows; and knowledge nullifies belief. If others laugh, he imagines himself their ridiculous object: if there be any whispering, consciis ipse sibi, &c. it must be of him without question. If he goes to law, he is the advocates sprite, and haunts him worse then his own malus genius. He is his own Cater, his own Receiver, his own Secretary; and takes such pains, as if necessity forced him, because all servants he thinks thieves. He dares not trust his money above ground for fear of men; nor under ground for fear of rust. When he throws his censures at actions, his luck is still to go out: and so whiles he playeth with other men's credits, he cousins himself of his own. His opinion lights upon the worst sense still; as the Fly, that passeth the sound parts to fast̄ on a scab; or a Dorre, that ends his flight in a dunghill. Without a Subpoena these timorous cowerds dare not to London, for fear lest the city air should conspire to poison them: where they are ever crying, Lord, have mercy on us, when as Lord, have mercy on us is the special thing they feared. The ringing of bells tunes their hearts into melancholy; and the very sight of a corps is almost enough to turn them into corpses. On the Thames they dare not come, because they have heard some there drowned: nor near the Parliament-house, because it was once in danger of blowing up. Home this Emblem of diffidence comes, and there lives with distrust of others, and dies in distrust of himself; only now finding death a certain thing to trust to.

Cure.

THE Cure of this bodily shaking is much at one with that of the Palsy; specially if it be caused of cold and gross humors. To help a man of this spiritual trembling, these intentions must be respected. First, to purge his heart by repentance, from those fowl and feculent corruptions, wherewith it is infected: and being clean himself, he will more charitably censure of others. Then teach him to lay the heaviest load on himself, and to spare others. True wisdom from above is without judging, without hypocrisy. The wisest men are the least censurers: they have so much a do to mend all at home, that their neighbors live quietly enough by them. Set him a good affection, and he will have a good construction. Minister to his soul a draught of charity, which will cleanse him of suspicion: for Charity thinks no evil. None? It thinks no evil, unless it perceive it apparently. To credit all were silliness; to credit none, sulliness. Against his timorousness he hath an excellent receipt, set down by God himself. Fear not the fear of the wicked; but sanctify the Lord of hosts himself: let him be your fear, let him be your dread. The way for him to fear nothing as he doth, is to fear one thing as he should. Awful reverence to God doth rather bolden, then terrify a man. They that trust in the Lord, shall be as mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth forever. They may be moved, they cannot be removed, from what is good, from what is their good, their god. This course may cure his paralytic soul; only if it shall please God, to be his Physician.

Immoderate Thirst, and Ambition. Disease. 10

There is a disease in the body called immoderate thirst; which is after much drinking desired and answered, a still sensible dryness. By this I would (I suppose not unfitly) express that spiritual disease, Ambition, a proud souls thirst, when a draught of honor causeth a drought of honor; and like Tullies strange soil, much rain of promotion falling from his heaven the Court, makes him still as dry as dust. He is a most rank Churl, for he drinks often, and yet would have no man pledge him.

Cause.

THE disease is caused in the body, through abundant heat drying up moisture: and this is done by hot, choleric, or salt humors engendered in the stomach, or through Fevers burning or Ecticke.

Signs and Symptoms.

THE Signs of the disease are best discerned by the patients words. The cause of Ambition is a strong opinion of honor; how well he could become a high place, or a high place him. It is a proud covetousness, a glorious and Court-madness. The head of his reason caught a bruise on the right side, his understanding; and ever since he follows affection, as his principal guide. He professeth a new quality, called the art of climbing: wherein he teacheth others by pattern, not so much to aspire, as to break their necks. No stair pleaseth him, if there be a higher; and yet ascended to the top, he complains of lowness. He is not so soon laid in his bed of honor, but he dreams of a higher preferment, and would not sit on a seat, long enough to make it warm. His advancement gives him a fresh provocation; and he now treads on that with a disdainful foot, which ere-while he would have kissed to obtain. He climbs falling towers, and the hope to scale them, swallows all fear of toppling down. He is himself an Intelligencer to greatness, yet not without underofficers of the same rank. You shall see him narrow-eyed with watching, affable and open-breasted like Absalom, full of insinuation so long as he is at the stair-foot: but when authority hath once spoken kindly to him, with Friend, sit up higher, he looks rougher then Hercules; so big, as if the river of his blood would not be banked within his veins. His tongue is flabellum Diaboli, and flagellum iusti: bent to scourge some, flatter others, infect, infest all. Agrippina, Nero's mother, being told by an Astrologer, that her son should be Emperor, but to her sorrow: answered, Let my sorrow be what it will, so my son may get the Empire. He hath high desires, low deserts. As Tully for his Pindinessus, he spends much money about a little preferment; and with greater cost then the captain bought his Burgessship, he purchaseth incorporeal fame; which passeth away, as swift, as time doth follow motion; & whose weight is nothing but in her name, whereas a lower place well managed, leaves behind it a deathless memory. Like a great wind, he blows down all friends that stand in his way to rising. Policy is his post-horse, and he rides all upon the spur, till he come to None-such. His greatest plague is a Rival.

Nec quemquam iam ferre potest Caesarue priorem,

Pompeiusue parem.

Tolluntur in altum, vt lapsu grauiore ruant.

He is a child in his gaudy desires, and great Titles are his rattles, which still his crying, til he see a new toy. He kisses his wits, as a Courtier his hand, when any wished fortune salutes him: and it tickles him, that he hath stolen to promotiō without God's knowledge. Ambitio ambientium crux. Ambition is the rack, whereon he tortureth himself. The court is the sea, wherein he desires to fish: but the net of his wit and hope breaks, and there he drowns himself. An old courtier being asked what he did at Court, answered, I do nothing, but undo myself.

Cure.

FOR the bodily disease, caused of heat and dryness, Physicians prescribe Oxycratum, a drink, made of vinegar and water sodden together: a chief intention in them, is to procure sleep, &c. To cure the immoderate Thirst of Ambition, let him take from God this prescript: He that exalteth himself, shall be brought low: but he that humbleth himself, shall be exalted. That he, who sets himself down in the lower room, hears the masters of the feasts invitation, Friend, sit up higher. That a glorious Angel by ambition became a Devil; and a Lucifer of his sons, the king of Babylon, that said, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God, is brought down to hell, and to the sides of the pit. That the first step to heavens Court, is humility. Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. That he, who walks on plain ground, is in little danger to fall; if he do fall, he riseth with small hurt: but he that climbs high, is in more danger of falling; and if he fall, of killing. That the great blasts of powerful envy overthrow Oaks and Cedars, that oppose their huge bodies; and pass through hollow Willows, or over little shrubs, that grow under the wall. That the higher state is the fairer mark for misfortune to shoot at: That which way soever the ambitious man looks, he finds matter of dejection. Above him, behold a God casting an ambitious Angel out of heaven, an ambitious king from the society of men: but so respecting the lowliness of his handmaiden, that all generation call her blessed. Below him, behold the earth, the womb that he came from, and the tomb that must receive him. About him, behold, others transcending him in his best qualities. Within him, a mortal nature, that must die, though he were clad in gold; and perhaps an evil conscience stinging him, whose wounds are no more eased by promotion, then a broken bone is kept by a tissue-coat from aking. That there is a higher reckoning to be made of a higher place. That like city-houses, that on small foundations carry spacious roofs, his own top-heavy weight is ready to tumble him down. That he mounts up like a seeled Dove, and wanting eyes of discretion, he may easily light in a puddle. That he is but a stone tossed up into the air by fortunes sling, to receive the greater fall. That for want of other malignant engines, he begets on himself destruction. That Tiberius complained of fortune; that having set him up in so high a monarchy, she did not vouchsafe him a ladder to come down again. That the honors of this world have no satisfactory validity in them. The poor laborer would be a farmer: the farmer after two or three dear years aspires to a yeoman: the yeoman's son must be a Gentleman. The Gentleman's ambition flies Justice-height. He is out of square with being a Squire, and shoots at knighthood. Once knighted, his dignity is nothing, except worth a noble title. Then, he thinks himself, whiles a mere Baron, a bare on: the world must count him a Count, or he is not satisfied. He is weary of his Earldom, if there be a Duke in the land. That granted, he thinks it base to be a subject: nothing now contents him but a crown. Crowned, he vilifies his own kingdom for narrow bounds, whiles he hath greater neighbors; he must be Caesar'd to an universal Monarch. Let it be granted, is he yet content? No, then the earth is a molehill, too narrow for his mind, and he is angry for lack of Elbow-room.

Vnus Pellaeo Iuueni non sufficit orbis:

Aestuat infoelix angusto limine mundi.

Last to be king of men is idle, he must Deified: and now Alexander conceits his immortality, and causeth Temples and Altars to be built to his name. And yet, being thus adored, is not pleased, because he cannot command heaven, and control nature. Rome robbed the world, Sylla Rome, and yet again Sylla himself, not content till then, when advancement hath set him up as a Butte, he cannot be without the quiver of fears. Thus the largest draught of honor this world can give him, doth not quench, but inflame his ambitious thirst. Well, let repentant humiliation prick the bladder of his blown hopes, and let out the windy vapors of self-love. And now let him hunger and thirst after righteousness, and on my life he shall be satisfied.

Inflammation of the reins, or lustfulness. Disease 7.

AMong many diseases incident to the reins, as the Diabetes, ulcers, the stone there, and the emission of bloody urine, there is one called inflammation of the reins. To this not unfitly, by comparing the causes, Symptoms, and cure of either, I do liken Lust: the Scripture calls it by a general name, Uncleanness. Covetousness is commonly the disease of old age, Ambition of middle age, Lust of youth: if it extends further, it portends less help.

Causes.

THE Causes of the bodily disease are given to be. First, corrupt humors. Secondly, drinking of many medicines. Thirdly, vehement ridings. Consider these in our comparison, and tell me, if they sound not a similitude. There is corruptio perdita, whence comes eruptio pestifera. Prouocatur libido, vbi deficit; reuocatur, vbi desinit. Medicines are invented, not to qualify, but to calefy; as if they intended to keep alive their concupiscence, though they dead their conscience.

Signs and Symptoms.

THE Signs are many. There is a beating pain about the first joint of the back, a little above the bastard ribs, &c. with others, which modesty bids cover with the cloke of silence. The Lustful man is a monster; as one that useth, Humano capiti ceruicem iungere equinam.

He affects Popery for nothing else, but the patronage of fornication, and frankness of Indulgence. He cites Harding frequently, that common Courteghians in hot countries, are a necessary evil: which he believes against God's express prohibition, in a hotter climate then Italy. Thereshall be no whore of the daughters of Israel: then certainly no whore-master. He thinks it; if a sin, yet peccadillo, a little sin; and that the venereal faults are venial, at least venial. Thus he would be a Bawd to the sin, if not to the sinners. He is careless of his own name, of his own soul: injurious to his own minion, whom he corrupts: to his bastard, whom he brings up like himself. He increaseth mankind, not for love to the end, but to the means. His soul is wrapped in the truss of his senses; and a whore is the Communis terminus, where they all meet. He hath no command over his own affections, though over countries; as our moderne Epigrammatist of Hercules.

Lenam non potuit, potuit superare leaenam;

Quem fera non valuit vincere, vicit hera.

His practice is, as it is said of some Tobacconists, to dry up his purse, that he may dry up his blood, and the radical moisture.

Nil nisi turpe iuuat, curae est sua cui{que} voluptas;

Haec quo{que} ab alterius grata dolore venit.

The delight of his wickedness is the indulgence of the present, for it endures but the doing. He never rests so contentedly, as on a forbidden bed. He is a felonious picklock of Virginities, and his language corrupts more innocent truth, then a bad Lawyers. He is an Almanac from eighteen to eight and twenty; if he scapes the fire so long. He can never call his hairs and his sins equal; for as his sins increase, his hairs fall. He buys admission of the Chambermaid with his first fruits. He lives like a Salamander in the flames of lust, and quencheth his heat with fire; and continues his days under Zona Torrida. He spends his forenoon with Apothecaries; the afternoon of his days with Surgeons: the former beget his misery, the latter should cure it. Every rare female, like a wandering Planet, strikes him: hence he grows amazed. His eyes are the trap-doors to his heart; and his lascivious hopes suck poison from the fairest flower. He drowns himself in a woman's beauty, which is God's good creation, as a melancholy distracted man in a Crystall river. When conscience plucks him by the sleeve, and would now after much importunacy speak with him, he bids her meet him at fifty: he chargeth repentance attend him at master Doctors. When his life's sun is ready to set, he marries, and is then knocked with his own weapon: his own disablement, and his wives youthfulness, like bells ringing all in. Now his common theme is to brag of his young sins; and if you credit his discourse, it shall make him far worse then he was. At last, he is but kept above ground by the art of Chirurgery.

Cure.

For his cure, let him blood with the law of God: Thou shalt not commit adultery. That the righteous God tryeth the heart and the reins: even the place, where his disease lieth. That

Si Renum cupis incolumem seruare salutem,

Sirenum cantus effuge, sanus eris.

That breuis est voluptas fornicationis, perpetua poena fornicatoris: the pleasure of the sin is short, the punishment of the sinner eternal. That

Nuda Uenus picta est, nudi pinguntur amores:

Nam, quos nuda capit, nudos amittat oportet.

That his desired cure, is his deserved poison. Age and sleep are his infallible Physicians. Disease is the mortifier of his sin, and cures it with an issue. That no black shield of the darkest night, no subtle art can hide or defend from God's impulsive sight. That, as a moderne Poet of ours:

Joy graven in sense, like snow in water wastes.

Without conserve of virtue nothing lasts.

That he walks the high-way to the devil; and Winds down the blind stairs to hell. That as it is called a noble sin, it shall have a noble punishment. That he hath taken a voyage to the kingdom of darkness; and is now at his journeys end, when lust leaves him ere he discharge it. Let him observe S. Paul's medicine: Fly fornication: Every sin that a man doth, is without the body: but he that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body. And This is the will of God, even your sanctification, and that ye should abstain from fornication. Let him shun Opportunity as his Baud, and Occasion as his Pandar. Let him often drink that potion, that Augustine at his conversion. Let vs walk honestly as in the day time, not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, &c. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfill the lusts thereof. Physicians prescribe, for the reins inflammation, cooling things, cataplasms, bathes, &c. A special intention to cure this burning concupiscence, is to cool it with the tears of penitence. Weep for thy sins; and if the disease grow still strong upon thee, take the antidote God hath prescribed, Marriage. It is better to marry then to burn. Marriage is honorable in all, and the bedvndefiled: but Whoremongers and Adulterers God will judge. Much exercise doth well to the cure of this Inflammation. When our affections refuse to sit on the nest of Lust, and to keep it warm, the brood of actual follies will not be hatched. How Aegistus (not without company) became an Adulterer,

In promptu causa est, desidiosus erat. For.

Otia si tollas, periere Cupidinis arcus.

Cupid shoots in a slug, and still hits the sluggish. This intemperate fire is well abated by withdrawing the fuel. Delicates to excite Lust, are spurs to post a man to hell. It is fasting spettle, that must kill his tetter. Uncleanness is the bastard begot of Gluttony and Drunkenness. Sine Cerere & Baccho friget Uenus. When the mouth is made a tunnel, and the belly a barrel, there is no contentment without a bed and a bed-fellow.

The rotten Fever, or Hypocrisy, Disease 12.

AMongst almost innumerable kinds of Fevers; there is one called, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, or febris putrida, the rotten Fever: which is a fever of one fit, continuing many days without any great mutation. Therefore it is called of some, continens febris, a stable and constant fever. Hereunto I have likened a rotten disease in the soul, called Hypocrisy; which is nothing else, but vice in Virtues apparel.

Cause.

THis corporal disease is caused, when the humors do putrefy and rot equally within the vessels. It is not engendered in those that be lean and slender, or of a thin and rare state of body, or of a cold temper; but in those that be hot and abound with blood, fleshy, gross and thick-bodied. Me thinks this malady smells very like Hypocrisy; which is a rotten heart, festered and putrefied with habituated sins, there with great delight and indulgence reserved: not incident to those that have a weak, thin, and slender opinion of themselves; that through humility have a lean and spare construction of their own deserts: no; nor to them that be of a cold temper and disposition to religion, not caring either to be good, or to seem so: but to those that have a gross and a blown conceit of themselves, swelling into an incomprehensible ostentation, and implacably hot in the persecution of that, they inwardly affect not.

Signs and Symptoms.

ROr the Signs of this putrid fever, they be not externally discerned; except you feel the pulse, which beats thick, quick, and vehement. The Hypocrite is exceedingly rotten at core, like a Sodom apple, though an ignorant passenger may take him for sound. He looks squintey'd, aiming at two things at once, the satisfying his own lusts, and that the world may not be aware of it. Bonus videri non esse; malus esse non videri cupit. They would seem good, that they might be evil alone: not seem evil, lest they might not then be evil so much. Oves visu, Vulpes actu, actu: having much angel without, more devil within: a villainous Host dwelling at the sign of, Friend.

Tuta frequens{que} via est, per amici fallere nomen.

Tuta frequens{que} licet sit via, crimen habet,

Which one thus wittily englisheth:

A safe and common thing it is, through friendship to deceive.

As safe and common as it is,

'Tis knavery, by your leave.

He is on Sunday like the Rubric, or Sunday-letter, zealously red; but all the week you may write his deeds in black. He fries in words, freezeth in works; speaks in elles, doth good by inches. He is a rotten tunder shining in the night: an ignis fatuus, looking like a fixed star: a painted sepulcher, that conceals much rottenness: a crude Gloe-worm shining in the dark: a stinking dunghill covered over with snow: a fellow of a bad course, and good discourse: a loose hung Mill, that keeps a great clacking, but grinds no grist: a lying hen, that cackles when she hath not laid. He is like some tap-house, that hath upon the painted walls written, Fear God, be sober, watch and pray, &c. when there is nothing but swearing and drunkenness in the house. His tongue is hot as if he had eaten pepper, which works coldly at the heart. He burns in the show of forward profession; but it is a poor fire of zeal, that will not make the pot of Charity seeth. He is in company holy and demure, but alone demurs of the matter; so shuts out the devil at the gate, and lets him in at the postern.

His words are precise, his deeds concise; he prays so long in the Church, that he may with less suspicion prey on the Church: which he doth the more peremptorily, if his power be answerable. If his place will afford it, his grace will without question. He bears an earnest affection to the Temple, as a hungry man to his meat, only to devour it. They say, come, let us take to our selves the houses of God in possession. We pray for their conversion, but if there be no hope, we must use the next words of the Psalm: Oh my God, make them as a wheel: like the stubble before the wind. They can abide no point of Popery, but only this, Church-robbing. Every thing the Papists used but this is superstition. Some are so charitable, that having got the tythe-corn frō the Church, they reserve from the presented Incumbent their petty tithes also: like monstrous thieves, that having stole the whole piece, ask for the remnants. Nay, it is not enough, that they devour our Parsonages, but they also devour our persons, with their contumelious slanders. Advantage can make his religion play at fast and loose; for he only so long grows full of devotion, as he may grow full by devotion. His arguments are weak or strong, according to his cheare; and he discourses best after dinner. Self-conceit swells him, and popular applause bursts him. He never gives the law good words, but when it hath him upon the hip. Like a kind Hen, he rules and feeds his chickens fat, starves himself. He forceth formal preciseness, like a Porter to hold the door, whiles devils dance within. He gives God nothing but show, as if he would pay him his reckoning with chalk; which increaseth the debt. If ever his alms smell of bounty, he gives them in public. He that desires more to be seen of men then of God, commend me to his conscience by this token, he is an Hypocrite. He covers his ravenous extortions, and covetous oppressions, with the show of small beneficences; & so may for his charity go to the devil. Indeed, gentilem agit vitam sub nomine Christiano: He lives Turk under the name of Christian. He is false in his friendship, heartless in his zeal, proud in his humility. He rails against interludes, yet is himself never off the stage, and condemns a mask, when his whole life is nothing else. He sends a beggar from his gate, bountifully feasted with Scripture sentences; and (though he likes them not) so much of the Statutes, as will serve to save his money. But if every house were of his profession, Charities hand would no longer hold up poverties head. What his tongue spoke, his hands recant; and he weeps when he talks of his youth, not that it was wicked, but that it is not. His tongue is his dissimulations lacquay, and runs continually on that errand: he is the Strangers Saint, his neighbors Sycophant, his own Politician: his whole life being nothing else, but a continual scribbling after the set Copy of Hypocrisy.

Cure.

FOR his cure, there is more difficulty then of the rotten fever. In this, two special intentions are used; bloodletting, and drinking of cool water, &c. But alas! what medicine should a man give to him, whom he knows not to be sick? His heart is rotten, his husk, fair and sightly. The core of his disease lies in his conscience; and like an onion, is covered with so many pills, that you would not suspect it: Their best Physic is that, God gives to Israel: Cleanse thy heart from iniquity, Oh Jerusalem, that thou maistbe saved: how long shall thy vain thoughts remain within thee? If this serve not, let them read Christ's bill, his denunciation against them, so often menaced, Woe unto you, hypocrites. I would tell them, that simulata sanctitas, duplex iniquitas; and their life is so much the more abominable, as they have played the better part. But I refer them to the White-Devil.

Flux and Prodigality. Disease 13.

THEre be diverse Fluxes according to Physicians: Lienteria, a smoothness of the bowels, suffering the meat to slide away not perfectly digested: Difenteria, which is an exulceration of the bowels; (whereof also they make four forts:) Tenasmus, which is a continual provocation to seege, that the patient can neither defer, nor eschew, yet vents nothing but slime. The Flux Diarrhea is the general, as being without exulceration or inflammation. To this I compare Prodigality, which is a continual running out.

Cause.

The corporal disease is caused: First, either by debility of the instruments that serve to digestion. Secondly, or through abundance of nourishment, moist and viscous soon corrupted. Thirdly, or through weakness of the retentive faculty. The similitude holds well in the causes of Prodigality. There is first a weakness of his understanding & brain, to digest that which his friends left him. Secondly, abundance of goods hath made him wanton; and the most part being slimy and ill gotten, it wastes like Snow, faster then it was gathered. Thirdly, the debility of his retentive virtue is a special cause. For Prodigality is pictured with the eyes shut, and the hands open; lavishly throwing out, and blindly not looking where.

Signs and Symptoms.

The Symptoms of this disease are manifest. He is an out liar, and never keeps within the pale. He runs after liberality and beyond it. He is diametrically opposite to the Covetous; and the difference is in the transposing of one Adverb. The one, dat non rogatus: the other, non dat rogatus. One hand is his receiver, but like Briareus, he hath an hundred hands to lay out. He would bear Dissipatoris, non dispensatoris officium. His father went to the devil one way, and he will follow him another: and because hath chosen the smoother way, he makes the more haste. Parasites are his Tenterhooks, and they stretch him till he bursts; and then leave him hanging in the rain. You may put his heart in your pocke; if you talk to him bare-headed, with many parentheses of your worship: there is no upstart buys his titles at a dearer rate. He loves a well furnished table; so he may have three Ps. to his guests: Parasites, Panders, and Players: the fourth he cannot abide, Preachers. He will be applauded for a while, though he want (almost) pity, when he wants. Like an hourglass turned up, he never leaves running, till all be out. He never looks to the bottom of his patrimony, til it be quite unraveled; and then (too late) complains that the stock of his wealth ran course at the fag-end. His father had too good an opinion of the world, & he too much disdains it. Herein he speeds, as he thinks, a little better; that those that barked at his Sire like dogs, fawn upon him, and lick his hand like Spaniels. He vies vanities with the Slothful, and it is hard to say, who wins the game; yet give him the bucklers: for Idleness is the coach to bring a man to Needome, Prodigality the post-horse. His father was no man's friend but his own; and he (saith the Proverb) is no man's foe else: of what age soever, he is under the years of discretion; and if Providence do not take him Ward, his heirs shall never be sought after. His vessel hath three leaks, a lascivious eye, a gaming hand, a deified belly; and to content these, he can neither rule his heart, nor his purse. When the shot comes to be paid, to draw in his company is a quarrel. When he feels want, (for till then he never sees it) he complains of Greatness for ingratitude, that he was not thought of when promotions were a dealing. When his last acre lies in his purse, he projects strange things, and builds houses in the air, having sold those on the ground he turns malcontent, and shifts that he never had, Religion. If he have not learned those tricks that undid him, Flattery and Cheating, he must needs press himself to the wars. He never before considered adposse, but advelle, and now he forgets velle, and looks only to posse. Take him at first putting forth into his sea of wealth and profuseness, and his fullness gives him

—Languentis stomachum, quem nulla ciborum,

Blandimenta mouent, quem nulla inuitat orexis:

His stomach so rasping since his last meal, that it grows too cowardly to fight with a chicken: then he calls for sport like sauce to excite appetite; and when all fails, thinks of sleep, lies down to find it, and misseth it. In the connivance of his security, harlots and sycophants rifle his estate, and then send him to rob the hogs of their provender, Ioues nuts, acorns. In short time he is dismounted from his coach, disquantied of his train, distasted of his familiars, distressed of his riches, distracted of his wits; and never proves his own man, till he hath no other. At last, after his hovering flight, he drops to a center, which is a room in the Alms house, that his father built.

Cure.

FOR his Cure; (I will not meddle with his estate, I know not how to cure that; but for his soul) let him first take a pill of Repentance: for howsoever he hath scowr'd his estate, he hath clogged his conscience, and it must be purged. Bind up his unruly hands, so lavish and letting fly. Pull off from his eyes that filme of error, that he may distinguish his reprovng friends from his flattering enemies. Cool his luxurious heat with Solomon's aftercourse, the banket of his pleasures being done: that for all these things God will bring him to judgment. That beggary is the heir apparent of riot, as the younger son in the Gospel (we have too many such younger brothers.) That his answer to those that admonish his frugality, is built upon a false ground: My goods are my own, as the Parasites said of their tongs: whereas he is not a Lord, but a Steward, and must one day reddere rationem dispensationis. The bill of his reckoning will be fearful. Item, for so many oaths. Item, for so many lies. Item, for drunkenness. Item, for lust, &c. Nay, and Item for causing so many Tavern Items, which were worse then Physic bills to his estate. To conclude, if Death find him as Bankrupt of spiritual, as of worldly goods, it will send him to an eternal prison.

The Iaundeis and Profaneness. Disease 14.

ICterus or the Iaundeis, is a spreading of yellow choler or melancholy all over the body. To this I compare Profaneness, which is an epidemial and universal spreading of wickedness throughout all powers of the soul.

Cause.

THE Iaundeys is caused sometimes accidentally, when the blood is corrupted by some outward occasiō without a Fever; or through inflammation and change of the natural temperament of the liver; or through obstruction of the passages which go to the bowels, &c. The causes of Profaneness are an affected ignorance, a dead heart, a sensual disposition, an intoxicate reason, an habituated delight in sin, without sense, without science, without conscience.

Signs and Symptoms.

THE Symptoms of both the Iaundeys and Profaneness need no description: their external appearance discolouring, the one the skin, the other the life, save both Physicians much labor; if it be true, that the knowledge of the disease is half the cure. He hath sold himself to wickedness, for the price of a little vanity, like Ahab; or let a Lease, not to expire without his life. At first sight you would take him for a man; but he will presently make you change that opinion, for Circe's cup hath transformed him. His eyes are the casements, that stand continually open, for the admission of lusts to the unclean rest of his heart. His mouth is the devils trumpet, and sounds nothing but the music of hell. His hand is besmeared with aspersions of blood, lust, rapine, theft; as if all the infernal serpents had disgorged their poisons on it. He loves Satan extremely, and either swims to him in blood, or sails in a vessel of wine. His heaven is a Tavern, whence he never departs, till he hath cast up the reckoning. He is ready to swear, there is no God, though he swears perpetually by him. Religion is his footstool, and Policy his horse, Appetite his huntsman, Pleasure his game, and his dogs are his senses. He endeavours by the continuance of his sports, to make the motion of pleasure circular, and the flame of his delight round, as the Moon at full, and full as bright. The point of his heart is touched with the Load-stone of this world, and he is not quiet but toward the North, the scope of wickedness. He hath bowled his soul at the mark of sensuality, and runs to hell to overtake it. If the devil can maintain him a stock of thoughts, let him alone for execution; though to bastard his own children, and water on his fathers grave. To conclude, he is but a specialty of hell antedated and strives to be damned before his time.

Cure.

His Physic, as in some Iaundeis, must be strong of operation; for the dryness of the ones stomach, of the others conscience, doth enervate the force of medicines. The special intentions of his cure are strong purgations and blood-letting. If the law of God doth not purge out this corruption from his heart, let him bleed by the law of man: manacle his hands, shackle his feet, dispute upon him with arguments of iron and steel: let him smart for his blasphemies, slanders, quarrels, whoredoms: and because he is no allowed Surgeon, restrain him from letting blood. Muscle the Wolf, let him have his chain and his clog, bind him to the good behavior: and if these usual courses will not learn him continence, sobriety, peace, try what a New-gate and a grate will do. If nothing, let us lament his doom. Their end is damnation, whose God is their belly, and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things.

Apoplexy and Security. Disease 15.

The Apoplexy is a disease, wherein the fountain & original of all the sinews being affected, every part of the body loseth both moving & sense; all voluntary functions hindered, as the wheels of a clock when the poise is down. To this I liken Security, which though it be not sudden to the soul, as the other is to the body; yet is almost as deadly. There may be some difference in the strength of opposition, or length of obsession; all similitudes run not like Coaches on four wheels: they agree in this, they both lie fast a sleep; the eyes of the ones body, of the others reason shut, and they are both within two groans of death.

Cause.

The cause of the Apoplexy is a phlegmatic humor, cold, gross, and tough, which abundantly fills the ventricles of the brain. The cause of Security, is a dusking and clouding of the understanding with the black humors, and dark mists of self-ignorance; a want of calling himself to a reckoning, till he be non-suited.

Signs and Symptoms.

The Signs of the corporal are more palpable, then of the spiritual sickness. The parish of his affections is extremely out of order; because Reason his Ordinary doth not visit; nor Memory his Churchwarden present; (or if it at all, Omnia been.) Neither doth Understanding the Judge censure and determine. He keeps the chamber of his heart locked, that meditation enter not, and though it be sluttish with dust and cobwebs, will not suffer repentance to sweep it. He looseth the fruit of all crosses; and is so far from breaking his heart at a little affliction, that a sharp twitch stirs him not. Whereas a melting heart bleeds at the least blow, he feels not the sword drinking up his blood. Most men sleep nigh half their time, he is never awake: though the Sun shines, he lives in sempiternall night. His soul lies at ease, like the rich man's, and is loath to rise. Custom hath rocked him asleep in the cradle of his sins, and he sleeps without starting. His Security is like Popery, a thick curtain ever drawn to keep out the light. The Element he lives in, is mare mortuum. He is a foolish Governor, and with much clemency and indulgence nurseth rebellion; neither dare he chide his affections, though they conspire his death. He is the Antitype to the fabulous Legend of the seven Sleepers. Policy may use him as a block, cannot as an engine. He is not dangerous in a commonwealth; for if you let him alone, he troubles nobody.

Cure.

The Cure of the Apoplexy is almost desperate. If there be any help, it is by opening both the Cephalica veins; and this course speeds the patient one way. Security, if it sleeps not to death, must be rung awake. There are five bells, that must ring this peal.

First, Conscience is the Treble, and this troubles him a little: when this bell strikes, he drowns the noise of it with good fellowship. But it sounds so shrill, that at last it will be heard; especially if God pulls it.

Secondly, Preaching is the Stint or the Certen to all the rest. This is Aaron's Bell, and it must be rung loud to wake him: for lightly he begins his nappe with the Sermon, and when the parish is gone home, he is left in his seat fast asleep: yet this may at last stir him.

Thirdly, another Bell in this ring, is the death of others round about him; whom he accompanies to the Church with a deader heart then the corps; knows he is gone to judgment, yet provides not for his own accounts at that Audit. It may be, this spectacle and a mourning cloak may bring him to weep.

Fourthly, the oppressed Poor is a Counter-tenor, and rings loud knells of moans, groans, and supplications, either to him for his pity, or against him for his injury. If this bell, so heavily tolling, do not waken him, it will waken God against him. Their cry is come up into the ears of the Lord of Hosts.

Fifthly, the Tenour or Bow-bell is the abused creatures; the rust of the gold, the stone out of the wall crying against the Oppressor: the corn, wine, oil, against the Epicure.

Happily this peal may wake him. If not, there is yet another goad, affliction on himself, God cutting short his horns, that he may not gore his neighbors: and letting him blood in his riches, lest being too rank, he should grow into a surfeit: or casting him down on his bed of sickness, and there taking sleep from his body, because his soul hath had too much. If neither the Peale nor the Goad can waken him, God will shoot an Ordinance against him, Death. And if yet he dies sleeping, the Archangels Trump shall not fail to rouse him. Awake then, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light.

Windiness in the stomach, and vain-glory. Disease 16.

*IN*station in the stomach hath some correspondence with vain-glory in the soul: a disease in either part of man full of ventosity, where all the humor riseth up into froth.

Cause.

Windiness is engendered through phlegmatic humors in the stomach; or through meats dissolved into vapors by deficiency of kindly heat. The cause of vain-glory is a vaporous windy opinion of some rare quality in himself: which though it be but an atomus, he would blow (like an Alchemist) to a great mass. But at last, it either settles in a narrow room, or vanisheth into foam.

Signs and Symptoms.

Symptoms of the corporal disease are a swelling of the stomach, empty belchings, much rumbling of wind in the bowels, which offering to descend, is turned back again. You shall easily know a vain-glorious man: his own commendation rumbles within him, till he hath bulked it out; & the air of it is unsavory. In the field, he is touching heaven with a lance; in the street, his eye is still cast over his shoulder. He stands up so pertly, that you may know he is not laden with fruit. If you would drink of his wisdom, knock by a sober question at the barrel, and you shall find by the sound, his wits are empty. In all companies, like chaff he will be uppermost: he is some surfeit in nature's stomach, & cannot be kept down. A goodly Cypress tree, fertile only of leaves. He drinks to none beneath the salt; and it is his Grammar rule without exception, not to confer with an inferior in public. His impudence will over-rule his ignorance to talk of learned principles; which come from him, like a treble part in a base voice, too big for it. Living in some under-stair office, when he would visit the country, he borrows some Gallants cast suit of his servant, and therein (Player-like) acts that part among his besotted neighbors. When he rides his masters great horse out of ken, he vaunts of him as his own, and brags how much he cost him. He feeds upon others courtesy, others meat: and (whether more?) either fats him. At his Inn he calls for chickens at spring, and such things as cannot be had; whereat angry, he sups according to his purse with a red Herring. Far enough from knowledge, he talks of his castle, (which is either in the air, or enchanted) of his lands, which are some pastures in the Fairy-ground, invisible, nowhere. He offers to purchase Lordships, but wants money for earnest. He makes others praises as introductions to his own, which must transcend; and calls for wine, that he may make known his rare vessel of deal at home: not forgetting to you, that a Dutch Merchant sent it him, for some extraordinary desert. He is a wonder everywhere; among fools, for his bravery, among wisemen for his folly. He loves an Herald for a new Coat, and hires him to lie upon his Pedigree. All Nobility, that is ancient, is of his alliance; and the Great man is but of the first head, that doth not call him, Cousin. When his beams are weakest, like the rising and setting Sun, he makes the longest shadows: whereas bright knowledge, like the Sun at highest, makes none at all; though then most resultance of heat, and reflection of light. He takes great pains to make himself derisory; yet (without suspecting it) both his speech and silence cries, Behold me. He discommends earned worth with a shrug, and lisps his enforced approbation. He loves humility in all men, but himself, as if he did wish well to all souls but his own.

There is no matter of consequence, that Policy begets, but he will be Gossip to, and give it a name, and knows the intention of all projects, before they be full hatched. He hath somewhat in him, which would be better for himself, and all men, if he could keep it in. In his hall, you shall see an old rusty sword hung up, which he swears killed Glendower in the hands of his Grandsire. He fathers upon himself some villainies, because they are in fashion; and so vilifies his credit, to advance it. If a new famous Courteghian be mentioned, he deeply knows her: whom indeed he never saw. He will be ignorant of nothing, though it be a shame to know it. His barrel hath a continual spigot, but no tunnel; and like an unthrift, he spends more then he gets. His speech of himself is ever historical, histrionical. He is indeed admirations creature, and a circumstantial Mountebank.

Cure.

FOR the cure of the corporal disease, you must give the Patient such medicines, as divide and purge phlegm; with an extenuating diet. To cure this windy humor of vain-glory, S. Paul hath a sharp medicine: That his glory is in his shame. Prescribe him, that the free giving all glory to God, is the resultance of the best glory to man. The counsel of both Law and Gospel meets in this. Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, nor the strong in his strength, nor the rich in his wealth; but let him that glorieth, glory in the Lord. That he hath nothing, (which is good) that he hath not received; and it is a shame for the Cistern not to acknowledge the Fountain. That the praise of good deserts is lost by want of humility. That there is none arrogant, but the ignorant: and that if he understood himself, his conceited sea is but a puddle, which every judicious observers plummet finds shallow, and muddy. That trafficking for the fraught of men's praises for his good worth, He suffers shipwracke in the haven; and loseth his reward there, where he should receive it.

The Itch, or the Busy-body. Disease 17.

THE Itch is a scurvy disease; a man would not think the soul had any infirmity to sample it. You shall find the humor of a Busie-body, a contentious intermeddler very like it. The Itch is a corrupt humor between the skin and the flesh, running with a serpedinous course, till it hath defiled the whole body. Thus caused.

Cause.

Nature being too strong for the evil humors in the body, packs them away to the utter parts, to preserve the inner. If the humors be more rare and subtle, they are avoided by fumes and sweat: if thicker, they turn to a scabious matter in the skin: some make this the effect of an inflamed liver, &c.

Signs and Symptoms.

IF this Itching curiosity take him in the Cephalica vein, and possess the understanding part, he moots more questions in an hour, than the seven Wise men could resolve in seven years. There is a kind of down or curdle on his wit, which is like a Gentle woman's train, more than needs. He would sing well, but that he is so full of Crochets. His questions are like a plume of feathers, which fools will give anything for, wise-men nothing. He hath a greater desire to know where Hell is, than to scape it: to know what God did before he made the world, than what he will do with him when it is ended. For want of correcting the garden of his inventions, the weeds choke the herbs; and he suffers the skin of his brain to boil into the broth. He is a dangerous Prognosticator, and propounds desperate riddles; which he gathers from the conjunction of Planets, Saturn and Jupiter; from doubtful Oracles out of the hollow vaults and predictions of Merlin. He dreams of a cruel Dragon, whose head must be in England, and tail in Ireland; of a headless cross, of a popish curse. And Our Lord lights in our Ladies lap, and therefore England must have a clappe. But they have broken day with their Creditors, and the Planets have proved honester, than their reports gave them. Thus as Bion said of Astronomers, he sees not the fishes swimming by him in the water, yet sees perfectly those shining in the Zodiac. Thus if the Itch hold him in the theoretical part. If in the practical;

His actions are polypragmatical, his feet peripatetical. Erasmus pictures him to the life. He knows what every Merchant got in his voyage, what plots are at Rome, what stratagem with the Turk &c. He knows strangers troubles, not the tumultuous fightings in his own bosom, &c. His neighbors estate he knows to a penny; and wherein he fails, he supplies by intelligence from their flattered servants: he would serve well for an Informer to the Subsidy-book. He delays every passenger with inquiry of news; and because the country cannot satiate him, he travels every term to London for it: whence returning without his full lode, himself makes it up by the way. He buys letters from the great city with Capons; which he wears out in three days, with perpetual opening them to his companions. If he hears but a word of some State-act, he professeth to know it, & the intention, as if he had been of the Counsel. He hears a lie in private, and hastes to publish it; so one knave guls him, he innumerable fools, with the strange Fish at Yarmouth, or the Serpent in Sussex. He can keep no secret in, without the hazard of his button. He loves no man a moment longer, than either he will tell him, or hears of him news. If the spirit of his tongue be once raised, all the company cannot conjure it down. He teaches his neighbor to work unsent for, and tells him of some dangers without thanks. He comments upon every action, and answers a question ere it be half propounded. Alcibiades having purchased a dog at an unreasonable price, cut off his tail, and let him run about Athens; while every man wondered at his intent, he answered, that his intent was their wonder, for he did it only to be talked of. The same Author reports the like of a gawish Traveler that came to Sparta, who standing in the presence of Lacon a long time upon one leg, that he might be observed & admired, cried at the last: Oh Lacon, thou canst not stand so long upon one leg. True, said Lacon, but every Goose can.

His state, belike, is too little to find him work; hence he busieth himself in other men's common wealths: as if he were Town-taster: he scalds his lips in every neighbors pottage. If this Itch proceed from some inflammation, his bleach is the breaking out of contention. Then he hath humorem in cerebro, in cord tumorem, rumorem in lingua. His brain is full of humor, his heart of tumour, his tongue of rumour. He spits fire at every word, and doth what he can to set the whole world in combustion. He whispers in his neighbors ear how such a man slandered him: and returns to the accused party (with like secrecy) the others invective. He is hated of all, as being indeed a friend to none, but Lawyers and the Devil.

Cure.

FOR his Cure; if his Itch proceed from a Moon-sick head, the chief intention is to settle his brains; lest too much learning make him mad: as Paul was wronged. Give him this Electuary. That secret things belong to the Lord, and revealed to us and our children forever. That the Judgments of God are, soepe secreta, semper iusta: and therefore it is better mirari, quam rimari. That in seeking to know more then he ought, he knows not what he should. That gazing at the stars, he is like to fall into the lowest pit.

If his Itch be in his fingers, and that he grows like a Meddler in everybody's Orchard, let him apply this unction. That he meddle with his own business. That he recall his prodigal eyes, like wandering Dinah's, home; and teach thē another while to look inward. That he be busy in repairing his own heart; for of other meddling comes no rest.

If his disease proceed from a greater inflation or inflammation, thus sharply scarify him: That sowing discord among brethren, is that seventh abomination to the Lord. That as troublesome men seek faction, they shall meet with fraction; and as they have a brotherhood in evil, so they shall be devided in Jacob, and scattered in Israel. That cum pare contendere, anceps est; cum superiore, furiosum: cum inferiore, sordidum. If thy enemy be equal, yet the victory is doubtful. If low, parce illi, it is no credit to conquer him. If great, parce tibi, favor thyself, contend not. Serua pacem domi, pacem Domini. Love peace, and the God of peace shall give thee the peace of God, which passeth all understanding.

Stinking breath and Flattery. Disease 18.

THE Flatterer hath a disease very odious, foetorem or is, a stinking breath. The corporal disease is caused, 1. sometimes through putrefaction of the gums. Secondly, sometimes through hot distemper of the mouth. Thirdly, sometimes through corrupt and rotten humors in the mouth of the stomach. Fourthly, and not seldom through the exulceration of the lungs. The main cause of Flattery is a kind of self-love; for he only commends others, to mend himself. The communis terminus, where all his frauds, dissimulations, false phrases and praises, his admirations, and superlative title meet, is his purse. His tongue serves two Masters his great-ones ear, his own avarice.

Signs and Symptoms.

IF the cause of this Stench be in the mouth, it is discerned: if in the vicious stomach, or ulcerate lungs, it is allayed by eating; and not so forcible after meats as before. So the Flatterers stomach is well laid after dinner; and til he grow hungry again, his adulatory pipes go not so hotly. His means come by observance, and though he wait not at table, he serves for a fool. He is after the nature of a Barber; and first trims the head of his masters humor, and then sprinkles it with Court-water. He scrapes out his diet in curtsies; and cringeth to his glorious object, as a little Curr to a Mastiff: licking his hand, not with a healing, but poisoning tongue. Riches make many friends: truly; they are friends to the riches, not to the rich man. A great proud man, because he is admired of a number of hang-byes, thinks he hath many friends. So the Ass, that carried the goddess, thought all the knees bowed to her, when they revered her burden. They play like flies in his beams, while his wealth warns them. Whilst like some great Oke, he stands high and spreads far in the forest, innumerable beasts shelter themselves under him, feeding like hogs on his acorns: but when the axe of distress begins to fell him, there is not one left to hinder the blow. Like burrs, they stick no longer on his coat, then there is a nappe on it. These Kites would not flock to him, but that he is a fat carcass. Seianus, whom the Romans worship in the morning as a Semi-god, before night they tear apieces. Even now stoops, and presently strokes. You may be sure, he is but a gally-pot, full of honey, that these wasps hover about; and when they have fed themselves at his cost, they give him a sting for his kindness.

The Flatterer is young Gallants School-master, and enters them into book-learning. Your cheating Tradesman can no more be without such a Factor, then an Usurer without a Broker. The Fox (in the Fable) seeing the Crow highly perch'd, with a good morsel in his mouth, flattered him that he sung well, with no scant commendations of his voice: whereof the Crow proud, began to make a noise, and let the meat fall: the foolish bird seeing now himself deceived, soon left singing, and the Fox fell to eating. I need not moral it. The Instrument his tongue is tuned to another's ear; but like a common fiddler, he dares not an honest song. He lifts up his Patron at the tongues end, and sets him in a superlative height; like a Pharos, or the eye of the Country, when he's indeed the eye-sore. He swears to him, that his commending any man is above a Justice of peaces letter; and that the eyes of the Parish wait upon him for his grace. He insinuates his praise, most from others report: wherein (very rankly) he wrongs three at once. He belies the named commender, the person to whom this commendation is sent, and most of all himself, the messenger. Whilst he supplies a man with the oil of flattery, he wounds his heart; like thunder, which breaks the bone, without scratching the skin. He seldom speaks so pompously of his friend, except he be sure of Porters to carry it him. He is the proud man's ear-wig, and having once gotten in, impostumes his head. A continent man will easily find him; as knowing, that it is as evil, laudari à turpibus, as ob turpia. One being asked, which was the worst of beasts, answered; of wild beasts the Tyrant, of tame beasts the Flatterer. Like an ill Painter, because he cannot draw a beautiful picture, he is ever limbing deformities and devils: so the Flatterer, ignorant of goodness, lays fair colors upon foul iniquities. This cunning wrastler stoops low, to give the greater fall, and wisheth to his object, as a whore to her Lover, abundance of all goods, except only sober wits. He studies all the week for preventions, to keep his Patron on the Sunday from Church: a Sermon and he are antipodes. Lest his Observed should take him into the light, and look on him, he keeps him perpetually hoodwink'd with the opinion of his own knowledge; admiring his deeds for sanctimonious, and his words for Oracles. Sometimes Conscience is his riuall-advocate, and pleads against him in his Patrons heart: but because the Judge is partial on his side, and his perjurous tale runs so smooth with the grain of his affections, he gives Conscience the check-mate. In short, he is (at last) one way a Pandar, Cozenages Factor, sins Magician, and a pleasing murderer, that with arrident applauses tickles a man to death.

Cure.

To cure this stinking breath of Adulation, give him a vomit. He that saith to the wicked, Thou art righteous, him shall the people curse; nations shall abhor him. But to them that rebuke him, shall be delight, and a good blessing shall come upon them. As (not serving our Lord Jesus Christ, but his own belly) by good words and fair speeches he hath deceived the harts of the simple; so he hath most deceived himself, and been no less his own fool, then others knave. Tell him, that his beginning is hateful to God, his end to men also. His great friend did no more love him in his dream, then he will hate him waking: as a sick man, after the receipt of a loathsome potion, hates the very cruse, whereout he drank it. And lightly, what he hath got by flattering fools, he spends upon knaves; or worse, and dyes full of nothing but sins and diseases. Let him soundly repent, reform himself, inform others, whom he hath deformed; become a friend to goodness, and so to himself and others. Repentance and Obedience can only make his breath sweet.

Short windedness and weariness of doing well. Disease 19.

The Asthma is caused by abundance of gross & clammy humors, gathered into the gristles, or lappets of the lungs: or through some distillations, wherewith the Trachea arteria, or wind-pipe is replete.

Cause.

The causes of this spiritual Short-windedness, are 1. want of Faith, which is the true life-blood of courage against all difficulties. 2. want of Patience, to hold out in the working up of salvation. 3. a feeble hope, not supposing the recompense to the worth of their labors.

Signs and Symptoms.

The Signs of both the diseases are palpable: the Physician may easily judge of his Patient, the Patient of himself. He prays for a brunt very zealously, but like a hasty shower soon over. You shall have him the first man at Church, on a Sabbath morning, and the first man out. He lays the foundation of an Alms-house, and so leaves it. He shoots up, like Jonah gourd, in a night, and next day withers. He is in religious practices, like the Spring in that windy month, March many forwards. He riseth fair, as a Summer-sun, but is soon clouded: no man rides faster at first putting forth, nor is sooner weary of his journey. A little onwards to heaven, he quandaries, whether to go forward to God, or with Demas to turn back to the world. The light of his devotion is ever anon in the eclipse, and his whole life rings the changes; hot and cold, in and out, off and on, to and fro: he is peremptory in nothing, but in vicissitudes. He is early up and never the near; saluting Christ in the morning, but none of those that stayed with him: therefore losing his reward, because he will not tarry working in the Vineyard till night. He purposeth to go to God, and in the fit of his devotion tells him so, but still breaks promise. One told Socrates, that he would fain travel to Olympus, but he feared his ability to hold out the journey. Socrates answered him, I know you walk every day a little, put that together in a continuing straitness, and you shall come whither you desire. This man rouse (as we all should do) against the stream; & whiles he neglects 2 or 3. strokes, he is carried down further in an hour, then he can recover in a day. He loves, like a horse, short journeys: & walks on so warily, wearily, timorously, that he tells his steps, and his stops; and reckons every impediment to a rub & a thorn.

Cure.

FOR his cure. Pro ration victus, as they prescribe for the Asthma, which is a disease in the body, to avoid perturbations of the mind: so let this Orthopnic, for the help of his mind, avoid needless perturbations of the body. He is troubled, like Martha about many things, but forgets the better part. Give him some juice of Bulapathum, which is the herb patience. For he hath need of patience, that after he hath done the will of God, he might receive the promise. He considers not that heaven is up an hill, like Olympus with the heathen, mount Zion with the Christian, and therefore thinks to get thither per saltum, not per scansum. Assure him, that Salvation must be wrought up, and Election made sure by diligence. That vincenti dabitur; not to him that flies, nor to him that knocks a bout or two, nor to him that faints and yields, but To him that overcomes. That who continues to the end shall be saved. That it was a shame to see Lot incestuous with his daughters in the Mount, that kept him chaste in Sodom: to see Noah mocked of his son for drunkenness, by whose righteousness his son scaped. That he hath many encouragements, Christ calling, the Father blessing, the Spirit working, the Angels comforting, the Word directing, the Crown inviting: all tuning him this one lesson, Bee not weary of well-doing. For in due season we shall reap, if we faint not: and after our weary labor find rest.

The Conclusion.

INnumerable are the bodies infirmities; introitus vnus, innumeri exitus, there being but one means of coming into the world, infinite of going out; and Sickness is Deaths Leger Ambassador. But they are few and scant, if compared to the souls; which being a better piece of timber, hath the more teredines breeding in it: as the fairest flower hath the most Cantharides attending on it. The devil loves the soul as the jewel, the body of the rind or husk, as if it were without the other a dead commodity, and would stink in his hands. He cries as the king of Sodom to Abrahm, Da mihi animus caetera cape tibi. If he can corrupt this, he knows the other will fall to corruption of it self: for the soul works by motion, the body but by action for the souls servant. Now Satan was ever ambitious and will not care for the waiting Maid, if he may get the mistress; or useth the other but for his better conveyance and insinuation to this. And because it bears the narrow portraiture and image of that Creator he emulates, this he seeks the more violently to deface. Let the body enjoy the light and warmth of the Sun, so he can enwrap this in the cold clouds of dark night. A dark night indeed, wherein many souls do live; having the little windows or loope-holes of reason shadowed by the curtains of fleshly lusts. Night is a sad, heavy, and uncomfortable time, to the unresting body (a nurse of anguished thoughts at whose dugges sorrows and dreams lie continually sucking:) thinking every hour an Olympiad, till the Sun ariseth: so is the souls darkness, if security hath not rocked asleep; and custom (which is the apoplexy of bed-rid nature, and wicked life) obstupefied her; an unquiet, turbulent, and peaceless time: with such hurrying tempests within, that the body tumbles upon a soft bed, and after many experienced shiftings finds no ease.

There be three things, say Physicians, that grieve the body. First, the cause of sickness, a contranatural distemper, which lightly men bring on themselves, though the sediments rest in our sin-corrupted nature. Secondly, sickness it self. Thirdly, and the coincidents, that either fellow it, or follow it. In the soul there be three grievances. First, original pravity, a natural 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, proclivity to evil, contradiction to good. Secondly, actual sin, the main sickness: Thirdly, and the concomitant effects, which are punishments corporal and spiritual, temporal and eternal. For all sin makes work; either for Christ, or Satan: for Christ, to expiate by his blood, and the efficacy of that once performed, ever available passion; or for the devil, as God's executioner to plague. Many remedies are given for many diseases: the sum is this; the best Physician is Christ Jesus, the best Physic the Scriptures. Ply the one, fly to the other: let this teach thee, he must cure thee: that express image of his Fathers person, and brightness of his glory, in whom the graces of God shine without measure: oft have you seen in one heaven many stars; behold in this Son, as in one star many heavens: for in him dwelleth all fullness. let us fly by our faithful prayers to this Physician, and entreat him for that medicine, that issued out of his side, water and blood, to cure all our spiritual maladies. Fusus est sanguis medici, vt fiat medicamentum aegroti. And when in mercy he hath cured us, let our diet be a conversation led after the canon of his sacred Truth: that whatsoever become of this frail vessel, our flesh, floating on the waves of this world, the passenger our Soul may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.

ERRATA.

To all that love PEACE and TRUTH.

PEACE, take it with all faults, is better then War: and the ende of a just war, is but Studium Pacis, the intention of a right peace. The Subject then is beyond exception, to all that love Peace. But commonly they, with whom it meddles, refuse to meddle with it. Let such take the course of their unhappy precipice into everlasting unquietness, who willfully reject the cure of their affected malady: denying their consciences a trouble that may save them, for fear of loosing a trouble that •o•h please them. As if a man were less then mad, that will leap into the fire, o avoid the smoke. There is Pax fundamenti, the peace of Doctrine: and Pax Ordinis, the peace of Discipline. The Heretike would pull down the first Pillar, the Schismatic the other: The former would break our peace with Christ; the latter with our selves & the Church: both these are almost desperate. But there is a third, Pax Politica, a civil Peace: and the common disturbers of this are such contentious spirits; that either vnproouoked, out of mischievous intention: or being provoked, out of malicious revenge; set all in uproar, make a mutiny in manners, an ataxie in the course of life. To cure this Babel, if at least she will be cured, is the scope of this Tractate. Peace was Christ's blessed Legacy to his Church; and we are the Ministers whom he hath chosen to see it paid. Executours are often sued for the bequests given by dead Testators: Loe here a Legacy without suing from a living Father. Embrace it, and be regulated by it: so shall your hearts find present comfort, and your souls eternal life in it.

The hearty desirer of your Peace.

TH. ADAMS.

THE CITIE OF PEACE.

PEACE is the Daughter of Righteousness, and the moher of knowledge, the nurse of Arts, and the improouement of all blessings. It is delectable to all that taste it, profitable to thē that practice it; to thē that look vpō it, amiable; to them that enjoy it, a benefit inualuable. The building of Christianity knows no other materials: if we look upon the Church itself, There is one body: if vpō the very soul of it, There is one Spirit: if vpō the endowment of it, There is one Hope: if upon the head of it, There is one Lord: if upon the life of it, There is one Faith: if upon the door of it, There is one Baptism: if upon the Father of it, There is one God, and Father of all.

Peace is a fair Virgin, every ones Love, the praise of all tongues, the object of all eyes, the wish of all hearts; Pacē •te poscimus omnes. She hath a smiling look, which never frowned with the lest scowle of anger: snowy arms, soft as Down, and whiter then the Swannes feathers; always open to pious embracements. Her milken hand carries an Olive branch, the Symbole and Emblem of quietness. She hath the face of a glorious Angel, always looking towards righteousness, as the two Cherubims looked one upon the other, and both unto the Mercy-Seat. Her Court is the invincible Fort of integrity; so guarded by the diuine providence; that Drummes, Trumpets, and thundering Canons, those loud Instruments of war, (I mean Blasphemy, Contention, Violence) may affront her, but never affright her. She hath a bounteous hand, virtual like the Garment of Christ; if a faithful soul can come to touch it, to kiss it; all her vexations are fled, her conscience is at rest. Her bowels are full of pity: she is always composing salves for all the wounds of a broken heart, Sedition and tumult her very soul hates: she tramples injuries and discords under her triumphant feet. She sits in a Throne of Joy, & wears a Crown of Eternity: and to all those that open the door of their heart to bid her welcome, she will open the door of Heaven to bid them welcome, and repose their souls in everlasting Peace. In these continual Dog-days of ours, wherein love waxeth cold, and strife hot, we had need set our Instruments to the tune of Peace. This was the blessed legacy which Christ bequeathed to his Church: the Apostle from his Master sent it as a token to the Corinthians: and I from the Apostle commend it as a Jewel to all Christians; Live in Peace, and the God of Love and Peace shall be with you. Which conclusion of the Epistle contains the blessing of the Apostle: a Valediction, and a Benediction. They are in part Hortatory, in part Consolatory: the virtue to which he persuades them, and the reward which he promiseth them. There is a sweet symphony, and respondent proposition between the Counsel and the Comfort; the Active Peace, and the Factiue Peace: for seeking peace on Earth, we shall find peace in Heaven: for keeping the peace of God, we shall be kept by the God of peace. The one is the regular Compass of our life on Earth, the other is the glorious Crown of our life in Heaven.

That we may not cherish too weak an opinion of this duty, we must know, that this Apostolical counsel is an Evangelical law; and binds us all to the peace. Live in Peace: there are in it all the concurring qualities, that define a good law; as Lycurgus taught: Generalitas, Bonitas, Possibilitas. It must be General, Good, Possible.

General, so that all be tied to the obedience of it. Else it were like Anacharsis law, a cobweb to catch flies: or those tyranous censures, which are made to vex Doves, while they are indulgent to Buzzards.

It must be Good, for none are bound to the obedience of unjust things. If it have an indifferent extent to good or bad, there is easily found some color of evasion.

It must be Possible; for if things be imposed ultra posse, and so men be made liable to the mulct, when they are not culpable of the guilt; they may object that Naturae dictamen. Nemo tenetur ad impossibile: none are to be tied to the obedience of impossible things. Such are Tyrants Laws; not vincula, sed retia: not limits to confine, but netts to ensnare: not Pales, but Toiles.

But the Law of Peace is General, none can plead immunity. Good, none tax it of iniquity. Possible, none can say, it is beyond their ability. But it may be objected. If you require it General, it is not Possible: for we cannot have peace with all men. If it were Possible, yet is it not lawful and good; for we may not have peace with all men. To direct us in this, the Apostle inserts two cautions. If it be possible, as much as lieth in you; live peaceably with all men. For there are some cases in which 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, it is not possible. What communion hath light with darkness! and what concord hath Christ with Belial! We must have no peace with it, if there be no grace in it. Blessed is he that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, &c. Forebear not only to sit in the Chair of pestilence with them, which is Sin reigning: but even to stand and discourse with them, which is Sin delighting: yea even to walk a turn with them, which is Sin entering: teaching us to shun the very acquaintance of their counsels.

But wicked men cannot be avoided; and so long as we are in this world, we must converse with men of the world. To answer this, we must distinguish between offenders, and offenses: we may have no peace with the one, true peace with the other. There are two names, Homo & Peccator: a Man, and a Sinner. Quod Peccator est, corripe: quod Homo, miserere. As he is a Sinner, reform him: as he is a man, the Image of God, pity him. Doth thy Brother sin of ignorance? Dilige errantem, interfice errorem: kill the error, preserve thy brother. Doth he offend of frailty? Bee at peace (cum hominibus, non cum moribus) with the man, not with the manners. Trespasseth he of malice? Hate (vitium, not virum) the disease, not the patient. Howsoever these infirmities are inevitable, still we may have Peace, Cum malis, licet non in malis: with evil men, though not in evil matters.

Indeed let him that hath authority, correct malicious offenses: for that is not like a ravisher to abuse, but like a Chāpion to vindicate the honor of peace. Yet still Cum corrigat malitiam, diligat personam; let him correct the transgression, love the person.

But how shall we answer that of the Psalmist? Be not merciful to them that sin of malicious wickedness. This was not Precantis votum, sed Prophetantis vaticinium: not the request of a Petitioner, but the prediction of a Prophecier. He did not wish it should be so, but saw it would be so.

But if all this be true, we may then admit peace with Rome? We do accept a Civil, not a Religious peace. In a treatise of pacification, both parties must yield somewhat: but nothing is to be yielded that may prejudice the Truth. In a Musicall Instrument the strings that be out of tune, are set up, or set down to the rest: the strings that be in tune, are not stirred. Our Doctrine and Profession are tuned to the blessed Gospel, that infallible Canon of Truth, and therefore must not be changed. Their Faith and Religion iarreth and erreth from that; therefore must be proportioned to ours, if they will endenour a perfect Harmony.

Thus far, & upon these terms we may have peace, if we seek it: we may live in peace, and peace may live in us, if we desire it. Therefore still 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Live in peace. Calvin renders it, Pacem agite, Do peace. Or, as if God should say to men, whom he found quarrelling, or too loud; Peace. The word is emphatical, and imitates a continual habit: we may call it, The Exercise of peace, or the Practice of peace.

Some have a good mind to peace, but they will be at no labor about it: many are content to embrace it, but they are ashamed to seek it: most men love it, few practice it. The use commends the virtue: the beauty and praise of peace consists not in motion, but in action: nor is the benefit of it in a knowing discourse, but in a feeling sense. A Speculative peace, is like an Historical knowledge: such as he that hath been always confined to his study, may have of foreign countries: so we make a conquest of peace, as the byword says, our Fathers won Boloigne; who never came within the report of the Canon. Or if the Grecians kept Philosophy in their leaves, but kept it not in their lives. A ieiune and empty speculation, like some subtle air in the head, only breaks out into crochets: it is experience that brings the sweetness of peace home to the heart. Use breeds perfectness, and disuse looseth the most serviceable things. Gold looseth more of the weight by rusting in corners, then by continual running in commerces, the proper end it was coined for. The best land will yield small increase, if it be not tilled: though some have the most profitable trades, the want of industry hath made them the poorest men. The throne of peace is in the heart, not in the head.

To recover, therefore the swounding life of this virtue, I will compare Peace to a City: if you will, to this City: which should be like Jerusalem, A City of Peace. And so much we will pray for it; that it may preserve peace, and peace may preserve it, to the worlds end.

Let the walls of this City be Unity and Concord. Let her have four Gates; Innocence, and Patience; Benefaction, and Satisfaction. The first gate of peace is Innocence; she must do no wrong. The second is Patience; she must suffer wrong. The third is Beneficence; she must do good instead of wrong. The fourth is Recompence; she must make liberal and just satisfaction for any committed wrong. There is also a Posterne Gate, and that is Humility. A gate indeed, but a small and low one; whosoever enters the City of peace that way, must stoop before he get in. The enemies of this City are many; divided into two bands; Hostilitie and Mutinie The Governor of it, is Magistracy: the Law, Religion: the Palace, the Temple: the life of the Citizens is Love. It is served by the River of Prosperity; the State of it, is Felicitie: the Inheritance, eternal Glory.

The Walls of Peace.

Are Unity and Concord. Omnis Societas est corpus politicum: and it is in a City, as in a Body: there are many members, one body: many Citizens, one City. The Body is one of the most lively figures and examples of peace. We are all one Body: not only one Kingdom; so disparity in Religions make many differences. Nor only one City, Inter dites erunt lites; so disparity of estates will breed quarrels. Nor only one House, so we may have enemies of our own household.

But one Body, here must be all love & peace. Where all are tied by bonds, joints, & ligaments to the head; there also by the same Nerves one to another.

Some members are single; as the tongue is one, to speak one truth: the heart one, to entertain one God. Other are Gemina, Germana; their forces are doubled to supply mutual defects. Some are stronger, as the arms and legs; for the supportation of the weaker. Thus qualified are all the faithful citizens of Peace; preserving an unanimity in affection, a sympathy in affliction, a ready help to the most needful condition. Comforting the minds of those that are perplexed, supplying the wants of those that are distressed, rectifying the weakness of those that are unsettled, informing the ignorance of those that are seduced, and reforming the errors of those that are perverted: all endeavoring the deliverance of the oppressed.

The members provide one for another: the eye sees not only for it self, but for the Body: the hand works not only for itself, but for the Body: the ear hearkens, the tongue talks, the foot walks, all parts exercise their functions for the good of the whole. In the City of peace men must not only seek their own, but the glory of their Maker, and the good of their Society. That God who hath given us honor by our Ancestors, would also have us add honor to our Successors. To prefer a private good before a public; is to famish and starve the whole Body, to fatten a toe, or please a finger. Such Monopolies and Patents, as impoverish the whole, to enrich a part are not tolerable in the City of Peace.

There is no envy and grudging among the members: the eye doth not grieve to see the arm grow strong, nor the foot to be sensible of the Stomach's health. In this City, one should not envy another's thriving; as if all were taken from our selves that is given to our neighbors. The Lord sees that an inequality is best for his glory: distributing (to whomsoever lest, yet) to everyone more than he deserves. Shall the Eye say, Because I am not the Eye, I am not of the Body? No, but as John the Baptist said of Christ▪ He cometh after me, yet is before me: Some come after us in wealth, that may go before us in grace. The poor man is not so many pounds behind the rich for this world, as he may be talents before him for the world to come. They often with their poverty, misery, ignominy, are saved; while others with all their honor and opulency go to hell.

If one member suffer, the rest suffer with it. If there be a thorn in the foot, the eye sheds a tear, the heart aches, the head grieves, the hand is ready to pull it out. If a man tread on our toe, we say, Why do you tread on Me? Quod cuiquam, cuivis: let us sorrow for the afflictions of others, as if we were in the body. He is no son of Peace, that forgets the breaking of his brother Joseph.

The Walls of the City must be whole, no breaches in them, lest this advantage the enemies entrance. There must be no schism in a City, as no division in the Body: one must not be for Paul, another for Apollos, another for Cephas; but all for Christ; & all for Peace. Many evil men may have one will in wickedness. It is said of Pilate Tradidit Iesum voluntati earum; He delivered Jesus to their Will; not wills: many sinners, one will. Shall then the Sons of grace quarrel? The Children of Peace be mutinous? Vnica columba mea, saith Christ: My Dove is but one;

the Dove is a Bird of peace. Many of them can agree lovingly together in one house: everyone hath a little cottage by her self, wherein she sits content without disquieting her neighbors. Thus Dum singulae quaerunt vnionem, omnes conseruant vnitatem. We have them that rush into others Tabernacles, swallowing a man and his heritage: would Doves do thus? Poor Nabaoths portion is many a rich Ahab's eyesore; would Doves do thus? Numbers are still on the wing, to prey upon prostrate fortunes; these be Ravens, not Doves: If the Law cannot make work for their malice, their malice shall make work for the law. This is like Cockes of the Game, to pecke out one another's eyes, to make the Lawyers sport. When two friends are fallen out of loves into blows, and are fighting; a third adversary hath a fair advantage to kill them both. We have an enemy that watcheth his time, and while we wound one another, he wounds us all.

If the members be pulled a sunder, they all rott: the distraction of parts is the dissolution of the whole. If we forsake the peace of our Mother, we put our selves upon record for bastards Discontēt with our own portions and places, overthrowes the City of Peace. When the Woods and the Floods were at variance, the Sand and the Fire were fain• to quiet their insurrections. While men will not rest satisfied with their own determinate stations; but invade the seueralls and proprieties of others; what can be expected but destruction? If there be Contention on this side, and Ambition on that side, there will be confusion on all sides. While Judah was hot against Israel, and Israel hott against Judah, the King of Syria smote them both. God shall supply the part of Syria; and when brother is against brother, he will be against them all. He that doth not what he can to mainetaine the walls doth what he can to betray the City. So I come from the Walls to the Gates.

The first Gate

Is Innocence; and this may be called Bishopsgate; the Ministers of the Gospel being both the Preachers and Precedents of Innocence. If men would abstain from doing wrong▪ the Peace could not be broken. St. Bernard writes of the Dove, that Fell caret, she hath no Gall: Let us be such Doves to purge our harts from all bitterness.

Now the first shelf that wracks Innocence, is Anger. It were rare if the wrath of man should fulfill the righteousness of God: even a cursed anger breaks the Peace. It is an evidence whereby God will judge men guilty: now there is no malefactor going to the bar for his try all, would willingly have that evidence found about him, that should cast him. Iratus non videt legem, sed Lex videt iratum. The wrathful man takes no notice of the Law, but the Law takes notice of the wrathful man. Let us take heed lest we carry our anger with us unto God. That which offends our eyes, we remove either our sight from it, or it from our sight▪ but that which offends our souls, we too often lay next our heart. But, it is the voice of transportive fury, I cannot moderate my anger. Cannot? Wherefore serveth grace, but to mortify such natural, yea rather unnatural passions?

How easily doth this rage often inueter at; making some so angry with men, that they will searse be pleased with God himself! And either he must take thē with their anger, or let them alone. So soon it rankles into malice, & that is full opposite to Innocence.

What shall a man do? In this sudden fit shall he come to the Lord's Table, or forbear it? Si non accesserit, periculum: Si accesserit, damnum. To refuse the Sacrament in anger, is evil: to receive it in anger, that's worse. Is the Body & Blood of Christ no more worth, but that for love of a peevish humor we should neglect it? Shall we starve our consciences, to feed our misbegotten passions? What is then to be done in this straight? The answer is easy: Let us excommunicate our wrath, that we may communicate with the Church: leave our lusts behind us, and we are welcome; as Abraham left his Ass when he went about his Sacrifice. In the Levitical Law no unclean thing might be touched: if it were touched, the Temple by that person must not be approached. Now for the Israelite to absent himself from the assembly of Saints, and service of God, was ponderous: to come so polluted, was dangerous. He knew the remedy; either not to be unclean at all, or soon to get himself cleansed. The first best is to harbor no malice; the next to deliver our selves from it with all possible speed.

In a word, let us turn our anger whē it comes, another way. Let all our hate be the hate of sin; and all our anger bent against our own corruptions. Let our wrath, like the Shepherds dog, sleep till the Wolf comes. Be we at peace with God by repentance, with our neighbor by innocence, with our own heart by a purified and pacified conscience; and the Prince of peace, the Lord Jesus shall embrace us.

The second Gate

Is Patience; which is not unlike to Ludgate: for that is a School of patiēce; the poor souls there learn to suffer. The first entrance of peace is to do no injury, the next is to suffer injury. It is one special commendation of Charity, that it Suffers all things; Pro fratribus, a fratribus, propter fratres. For our brethren we must sustain some loss: he that suffers not an abatement of his own fullness, to supply their emptiness, is no brother. Of our brethren we must put up some wrong, rather than make a slaw in the smooth passage of peace. Because of our brethren, and for the Elects sake, we must endure all things, that they may obtain Salvation. Let us be infirmed, to have them confirmed: brooking a temporal loss, to procure their eternal good.

According to the Apostles counsel, Let us bear the burden one of another, and God shall bear the burden of us all. As in the Arch of a building, one stone bears mutually, though not equally, the weight of the rest. Or as Deere swimming over a great water, do ease themselves in laying their heads, one upon the back of another: the foremost having none to support him, changeth his place, and rests his head upon the hindmost. Bear thou with his curiousnes, he doth bear with thy furiousnes: let me bear with his arrogance, he doth bear with my ignorance. In Architecture, all stones are not fit to be laid in every part of the building: but some below, as the fundamental, and chief cornerstone to sustain the load of the rest: some higher in the wall, other in the top for ornament. In the Church, which is built of Living Stones, Christ is the Head of the corner, the Foundation that supports all. Gracious Saints have the next places, and are so set that they may help to bear up the weaker.

Materialls that be only of a hard nature, will never fadge well in an Edifice. The Italians have a Proverb; Hard without soft, the wall is naught. Stones cobbled up together, without mortar to combine them, make but a tottering wall. But if there be mortar to ciment them, and with the tractable softness of the one to glew and fixe the solid hardness of the other; this may fortify it against the shock of the Ram, or shot of the Canon. The society that consists of nothing but stones, intractable and refractory spirits, one as froward and perverse as another, soon dissolves. But when one is reaking with the fire of rage, and another shall bring the water of patience to cool and quench it; here is a duration of peace. When iron meets iron, there is a harsh and stubborn iarre: let wool meet that rougher metal, and this yielding turns resistance into embracements.

Let not then the voice be an echo of ill words, nor the hand a Racket to bandy back fire-bals. Patience makes even the wicked confess; Thou art more righteous then I. Infoelix victoria qua hominem superamus, vitio succūbi. It is a wretched victory that overcomes our souls, and slaves us to our lusts. Patientia mea à Domino, as the Fathers read it: and indeed who can give this patience, but God? Paul had many lives, yet he sacrificed them all; I die daily. Etsi non mortis experientia, tamen proposito. Though he could loose but one, yet in regard of his patience and purpose, he was ready to loose them all.

Nor is Christian patience thus confined within the bearing of injuries; but it extends also to the remitting of them. Some can suffer for the present, as Haman before Mordecai, Animo vindicandi. Forgiuenance is the demonstration of patience. Not to contest because we cannot conquer, is called Patience perforce: but can we remit? The civil man can forbear, the Christian must forgive. Let us be remiss to note a wrong, remissive to forget it, writing all our injuries in the dust. Yea, let humility sweetly order our forgiveness: for Grauiissima poena est contumeliosa venia: a proud and scornful pardon, is a reproachful wrong; there is in it more bitterness then mercy; more punishment then reconcilement.

Otherwise how can we pray, Forgive us our trespasses, As we forgive them that trespass against us? O but say some, God is merciful: what, shall we therefore be unmerciful? I may forgive, but I cannot forget; is the faint reservation of another. Take we heed, let not us be in jest with God, least he be in earnest with us. Do we not otherwise beg a removal of mercy and pardon from our own souls? Will not God say, Evil servant, Ex ore tuo, out of thy own mouth will I judge thee? Hath Christ with his own blood made thee friends with God, and cannot that blood entreat thee to be friends with thy brother, when thou comest to the holy Altar with thy gift, and rememberest thy offended brother: Leave there thy gift▪ first be reconciled to him, then offer to God. A gift doth pacify wrath, and God is pleased with our Sacrifice upon his Altar: yet Cum omnis culpa munere soluat, sola iniuria incondonata rejicitur: when every fault is solued with a gift, Injury alone is sent away without pardon.

Therefore Qualem vis erga te esse Deum, talem te exhibeas erga proximum: be thou to thy brother on earth, as thou wouldest have thy Father in heaven be to thee. Si laedens, pete veniam: si laesus, da veniam. If an injurer, ask pardon: if a sufferer, give pardon. Be we so far from expecting his submission, that we tender our emission; and meet the trespasser with a pardon before he ask it. Dissensio ab alijs, à te reconciliatio incipiat. Let strife begin from others, be thou first in reconcilement. Christ healed Malchus his ear, that came to arrest him. Which amongst us so loves his benefactors, as Paul loved his malefactors? He would do anything to save them, that would do anything to kill him. Others offenses to us are but small; valued with ours against God who is infinite. If he forgive the pounds, let not us stick at the farthing tokens.

The next Gate

Is Beneficence; Doing good, is the fortification of peace. This may be called Ald-gate; not only because there is the picture of Charity: (at the gate: I do not say, as near going out; but at the gate, to keep goodness in.) But because that is called the Old-gate, and Charity was a virtue of old times, not so much now in fashion. The heathen Moralist said, we must use men thus; Benevelle omnibus, benefacere amicis; wish well to all, and do good only to our friends. But the clear light of nature, which is the Gospel, chargeth us while we have opportunity, to do good to all men; albeit with some preferment of the best, especially to the household of Faith.

All men may be ranked under one of these combinations: Rich and poor, home-borne and strangers, friends & enemies. First for the rich and poor; the Pharisee will stand on good terms with the rich, invite them for a re-invitation as men at Tennis, toss the ball to another, that he may toss it to them again: but who helps the poor? Wealth maketh many friends, but the poor is separated from his neighbors. If he do well, he is not regarded: if ill, he is destroyed. The poor man by his wisdom delivered the city from the force of a puissant enemy; yet whē all was done, no man remembered that poor man. But if he stumble, they will help to overthrow him. How contemptibly doth a rich epicure look upon a poor beggar! yet the rich and the poor meet together, and the Lord is the maker of them all. In all our ground Feasts, the guests that Christ spoke for, are left out.

For Domestickes and strangers; many have so much religion as to provide for their own; yea so much irreligion as to do it with the prejudice of the public good, and hazard of their own souls: but who provides for strangers? Entertaine strangers, for thereby some have entertained Angels unawares: but for all this possible happiness, few will put it to the venture: and were they indeed Angels without angels in their purses to pay for it, they should find cold entertainment.

Friends and enemies; for friends, many will be at peace with them, till they be put to the trial by some expressiue action. And then they will rather hazard the loss of a friend, then the lest loss by a friend. But suppose we answer our friends in some slight courtesy, hoping for a greater: who will do good to his enemies? If thine enemy hunger, feed him▪ so thou shalt heap soales of fire on his head. Do it, not with an intent to make his reckoning more, but thy own reckoning less. Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you. Do unto them deeds of amity, deeds of charity, deeds of piety. Of amity, Love them that hate you: of Charity, Do good to them that hurt you: of Piety, Pray for thē that persecute you. There is the Diligite of the Heart, Love your enemies. The Benedicite of the Tongu, Bless them that curse you. The Benefacite of the Hand, Do good to them that hate you. The Beneuelle of all, Pray for thē that persecute you. Love your enemies, there is Affectus cordis: Do them good, there is Effectus operis: Pray for them, there is Perfectio charitatis. But the wiseman counsels; Do well to him that is lowly, but give not to the ungodly. And Give unto the good, not to the sinner. Though not Qua impius, and quia impiu; yet qua homo; and quia homo, we must relieve him. Cherish himself, not his sin. We must love him, non quoad culpam, sed quoad naturam. They are God's children, licet insani, although they be sick; and our brethren, licet infirmi, although they be weak. Therefore for the conformity of nature, because we are the same workmanship: for our own benefit, for he that doth good to his enemy, even in that doth better to himself: and for the imitation of Him we worship, let us uphold Peace by Charity. His Sun rises, and rain falls, both on the just and unjust. Noli negare, quod Deus nulli negat. Thus looking up with piety to the Lord's perfection, and down with pity upon man's imperfection, let us do good to all.

Through the gate of Beneficence, doth the charitable man enter into the City of Peace. He that is covetous, must needs be mutinous. He that is greedy of gain, troubleth his own house Solomon calls him a trouble-house, and we do find him a trouble-city; as Demetrius did all Ephesus. But Charity makes peace; Diuitem voluit Deus vt pauperem adiuuaret, Pauperem voluit vt diuitem probaret. God makes some rich, to help the poor: and suffers some poor, to try the rich. The loaden would be glad of ease: now charity lighteneth the rich man of his superfluous and unwieldy carriage. When the poor find mercy, they will be tractable: when the rich find quiet, they should be charitable. Would you have your goods kept in Peace? First, lock them up by your prayers, then open them again with your thankful use, and trust them in the hands of Christ by your Charity.

This City hears ill for oppression, and is (I fear too justly) suspected of Injustice: now the most noble confutation of jealousy, is by deeds of charity. This is the East-gate to the City of Peace, and I may (from Saint Paul) call it the principal, and most excellent way. Whosoever can show you the way better, yet certainly none can show you a better way.

The fourth Gate

Is Recompence, or Satisfaction; and this we may liken to Creepie-gate. It is the lamest way to peace, yet a way: it is a halting gate, but a gate. It were far better coming into this City by any of the former gates, yet better at this then none. All come not in by Innocence, nor all by Patience, nor all by Beneficence: but if they have failed in these, they must be admitted by recompence, or not at all. The first best is to do no injury; the next is Satisfaction, to make amends for that we have done. Hortensius said of his mother, Ego nunquam cum ea inivi gratiam, I never was reconciled to her, because we two never fell out. O that the Inhabitants of this city could say so of their neighbors; We never were made friends, because we never were foes. But as our Savior saith, It is necessary that offenses do come: not that it should be so, but that it will be so. There is no necessity that compels a man to sin; except that the heart being evil, will give offense. As it is necessary for him that comes to the fire, to be made hot: but there is no necessity that he come unto the fire.

The malady of offenses, will be contracted, therefore the only Cure is by Satisfaction. That we may know how to do this, the Scripture sets down diverse degrees in the accomplishment of this Satisfaction for injuries. First, he must go to the party wronged. Secondly, He must confess his fault. Thirdly, He must humble himself. Fourthly, He must make restitution.

Fifthly, He must reconcile himself. Sixthly, and this must be done quickly, with all possible speed.

He must go to him, not tarry till he meet him, or till some occasion bring them together; not Obuiamda; But Go to thine adversary, go on purpose: enquire for him, seek him out, rest not till thou find him.

Humanity may work some to this undertaking, and ouertaking of peace: but man is naturally so good a constructor of his own doings, that will he confess his fault? Yes, He shall confess his trespass.

An ingenious nature may be brought to acknowledge his fault: but will Pride, the contention-maker, admit Humility? will he stoop to him he hath abused? From insultation will he descend to submission? He must; Go and humble thyself.

Touch of conscience may procure Humility; but yet will he not spend twice as much at Law, ere he make restitution? Yet even here, a quiet man for his own peace sake may be brought to give somewhat, for a part of amends: but will he satisfy him the whole? The law of nature requires total satisfaction, but will he besides give damages? The law of the Land allows damages; but now will he give any overplus to make an atonement? or be at so much coast as to buy a reconcilment, rather then miss it? He must: Zacchaeus restores fourfold; and by the Law he is bound to add a fifth part.

But if all this be done, will he yet ever be friends with him? will he be truly reconciled? He must: Reconcile thyself to thy brother. Otherwise, when he desires of the Lord to be forgiven, as he forgiveth; God will answer as Joseph did to his brethren; Look me not in the face, unless thy brother be with thee. Shall the father think well of that son, which rejecteth his brother? Do we call the Author of Peace, our God, while we are the children of dissention? Will he ever agree with him, that delights to quarrel with his? But suppose the injurer doth entreat and persuade himself, without pr•uailing, will he use his friends about such a business? Yes, saith Seolomon, he must employ his friends.

Time may work all this, but to do it when the flesh trembles, and the blood boils for revenge, suddenly; who can so prevail over him self? He must do it quickly; Agree with thine adversary quickly. Yes perhaps, when leisure may serve: but will any man neglect business to go about it? Yes, all business set apart, though it were as important as offering sacrifice at God's own Altar; Leave there thy gift, &c. Non experieris Deum tibi propitium, nisi proximus te sentiat sibi placatum. Strife with our brother makes our best services vnacceptable to our Father. The Lord despiseth his own worship, to maintain our charity: and will not be found of us, till we have found our brother, to make our peace with him. Come not to the Temples, hear no Sermons, say not your prayers, forbear all worship and devotions, while a festring and rankling hatred is in your souls.

Yet now all this may be done of an Inferior to a Superior, either for fear or hope of gain by his love: but would you have a Superior yield thus to an Inferior, to deprecate strife? Yes, Abraham disdained not to go unto Lot, the elder to the younger, the uncle to the nephew, the worthier to the meaner, and that in the kindest manner, to compose a controversy begun by their servants. O that this age, which seldom wakes but to do mischief, would yet think, how after all injuries to others, they do this greatest injury to their own souls; that for want of a just compensation, they exclude themselves from the blessing of Peace!

These be the main Gates, there is a little Posterne besides, that is Humility: for of all vices, Pride is a stranger to Peace. The proud man is too guilty, to come in by Innocence: too surly, to come in by Patience: he hath no mind to come in by Benefaction: and he scorns to come in by Satisfaction. All these Portcullises be shut against him: there is no way left but the Postern for him, he must stoop, or never be admitted to peace. Pride is always envious & contumelious, thinking she adds so much to her own reputation, as she detracts from others: she is no fit neighbor for Peace.

Heaven is a high City, yet hath but a low Gate. Celsa patria, via humilis. Tolle super biam, quod habes meum est▪ tolle inuidiam, quod habet tuum est. Take away pride, and that which thou hast is mine: take away envy, and that which I have is thine. Pride and envy are too uncivil for a peaceable city: the one cannot endure a vicine prosperity, nor the other a superior eminency. All men must be poor to please the one, and all must be base to content the other. Peace is humble, pride quite over-looks her. The Philosopher might have seen the stars in the water, he could not see the water in the stars, when he stumbled into the ditch. Men may behold glory in humility, they shall never find peace in ambition. The safest way to keep fire, is to take it up in embers: the best means to preserve peace, is in humbleness. The tall Cedars feel the fury of tempests; which blow over the humble shrubs in the low valleys. There was no rule with Paul at first; raising tumults, speeding Commissions, breathing out slaughters against poor Christians. But when Christ had thundered him from his horse, broken his wild spirit to humility, thē he was fit for peace. God, that often effectuates his own will by contraries, makes trouble the preparation for peace: as a father corrects his unruly children that they may be quiet. Let us examine our own experience: when the Lord hath soundly scourged us, we go from under his fingers as tame as lambs: farewell strife, all our care is to find rest and peace in Jesus Christ.

We have seen the City of Peace, with her walls and gates, and we wish well to her; Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces. But hath she no adversities? Yes, there is an enemy that beleaguers this City; Contention. Whose army is divided into two Bands or Troups; the one called the Civil, the other the Vnciuill: the Civil are Law-quarrels, the vnciuill are Sword-quarrels. The one is the smooth-fac'd company, the other the rugged or ragged Regiment. The city of peace hath gates for these also, when she hath subdued them. Either she turns them out at Moore-gate, as fitter for the society of Moors and Pagans; she banisheth them. Or lays them up in New-gate; a place very convenient, being not so old as peace, built since the birth of strife. These enemies pursue us, vel ferro, vel foro, as that Father saith.

Ferro, when upon every punctilio of honor, as they falsely call it, Reason & Religion must be thrown by, and Fury govern. The Gallant, as if he knew no Law but his own will, or as if the least aspersion upon his honor were more weighty, then if the state of Christian dome, or the glory of God lay upon it; cries Reuenge, offers the stab, threatens the pistoll. How is that precious account forgotten which God requires of man and beast! Men study to be mad with reason, they have an Art of killing, that teaches murder by the book: as cunning as Joab was, that could stab in the fifth rib, a speeding place: so he treacherously slew Abner and Amasa. O that men should venture their lives upon one another's sword, as if they had no souls to be ventured upon the sword of God's vengeance! That he should be held base, who being challenged, doth not write his mind with a pen of steel, in the ink of blood, on the white paper of man's life!

Cannot the tears of our Mother prevail with us, when seeing us quarrel, she says as Iocasta advised her two vnbrotherly sons; Bella geri placuit nullos habitura triumphos. Or as Rebecca said of her twins; Why should I be deprived of you both in one day? But if our Mother cannot still us, our Father will part us: & they whose souls have peace, shall be sent to a prison where is no peace: that seeing they love quarrels, they may have fighting enough with infernal spirits. But perhaps there be some who make no other reckoning, resolving with him in the Orator, Hodie coenabimus apud Inferos: to night we will sup together in hell. As it is reported of two to have fought under the gallows: desperately fore-casting, that if the one were there killed, the other should there be hanged.

By the toleration of this Duel in France, that kingdom lost in ten years six thousand Gentlemen; as themselves report. Wretched men! for Occiser lethaliter peccat, & occisus aeternaliter perit: the homicide sins deadly, and the slain (without vnexpectable mercy) perisheth eternally. How dare they lift up those hands to God for mercy, that have been lifted up against their brother in cruelty? Every base vermin can kill, it is true prowess and honor to give life, and preserve it Simeon and Levi seemed to have just cause; the Whoring of their own Sister: yet their father calls them brethren in evil for it, blesseth his honor from their company, & his soul from their secrecy. Thou sayst of thy contentent, he shall have as good as he brings, yet thyself condemnest that he brings for evil. Ne vtaris inimico praeceptore, let not thy enemy teach thee to due that, which thyself detestest in him. Because we receive injuries without right, shall we return them without law?

Sometimes this ariseth from the wine, Bacchus ad arma vocat: and lightly it makes men aptest to use their arms, when they cannot stand on their legs. But shall this serve for a plea, and get a pardon, it was done in drink? no, this rather deserves a double punishment, as it is a double fault. Commonly it proceeds from unadvised anger; as if anything done in fury, were not done in folly. The choleric man is like one that dwells in a thatched house; who being rich in the morning, by a sudden fire is a beggar before night. It was the decree of Theodosius, by the counsel of S. Ambrose; that execution after a severe sentence should be deferred thirty days: that the heat being qualified, the severity might be moderated.

But they object, This is to stand by like fools, while we suffer others to abuse us: no, that is not folly, which the Lord hath commended for wisdom. The shot of the Cannon hurts not Wooll, and such yielding things; but that which is hard, stubborn, and resisting: the rage of our roaring sons is tamed by patience. Turn to the brawling cur, and he will be more fierce: ride on neglecting him, and he will soon be quiet. This is the furious Band.

Foro; there is another Battalia of adversaries that turn their challenge into a Writ; the field appointed is Westminster Hall, or some other Court of Justice: the weapons, the Law: the postures of the fight are Demurres, Delays, Quirks, Remouals: the Victory, a Verdict: the Doome, a Sentence: and the death it self, an Execution. One says, To bear this, is against my conscience: when indeed he means it is against his concupiscence. If the Plaintiff go no further then the Court of his own affections, the defendant shall never have audience: for he is Amicus Curiae. He that is first in his own cause, seemeth just: but his neighbor cometh, and searcheth him: he is no competent Judge in his own matter. It will bear an action, saith the Lawgiuer, this enflameth passion in the Law-goer.

O that men could see the folly of this litigiousnesse. 1. That he is not in the state of grace, but a mere carnal man. This is Saint Paul's argument to the Corinthians; If there be contentions amongst you, Are ye not carnal? whereas the Fruit of the Spirit is Peace, Long-suffering, Gentlenesse. 2. That he doth not so much find, as make himself enemies: we may say of him as the Angel said to Hagar concerning her son Ishmael; His hand is against every man, and every man's hand against him. 3. That he vexeth himself without need: they that go to Law for trifles, are like nice people that continually lie in the hands of Chirurgians, and Physicians, for pimples & warts: whereas as the Physician and Lawyer are for necessity, not wantonness. Their boxes and papers are the Books & Badges of their profession: they trudge up and down, more busy to cast away their money, then Lawyers are to catch it: their word is Currat Lex, let the law have his course: but by their willes that course should never have an end.

They plead, we have stood before the best, in Courts of highest honor: alas, so doth the spider, even in kings palaces. So did the Devil, when the Sons of God presented themselves before him, Satan was there also. 4. They consider not the root of contentions, as the Apostle describes them: want of Wisdom to compound controversies; Is there not one wise man among you, able to judge between brethren? Want of love, Brother is against brother. Want of Patience; Why do ye not rather suffer wrong? Want of Justice; Ye defraud and do wrong. For want of Justice, foro conscientiae, they prosecute their malice, foro Iustitiae. We may add, want of Mercy, they cannot forgive: but if they forgive not others, their final Quietus est was never yet sealed; and they shall be called to an after-reckoning. As that wicked seruāt sped; notwithstanding the Lord forgave him at his request, because he did not forgive his brother at his entreaty, he was delivered over to the tormentors.

Fifthly, they weigh not how they are deceived. Lawyers first invented Laws to secure our lands and titles: now they make those laws engines to get away our lands and titles. Their frequent Session hath not been evermore to preserve a man's possession. And for those that can tarry the leisure of the Law, they have quirks & delays: which are like the corrosiue plasters of an vnconscinable Leach, that turns a small green wound to an incurable Fistula, by poisoning and exulceration of it for filthy lucre. When a man must die without mercy, it is some ease to die quickly, and be out of his pain. But such, when they purpose to murder a man's estate, have tricks to keep him long a dying: that he may still languish and pine away in hope of recovery.

And what doth the winner get, that at the Tearmes end, he may brag of his gains? Doth he not come home dry-foundered? Doth he not follow the Mill so long, till the toll be more then the griest? It is a token of unwholesome air, where the country is full of thriving Physicians: Sivaleant homines, arstua, Phaebe, iacet. It argues little health in that kingdom, which hath so many thriving Lawyers: who while unquietness feeds us, do quietly feed upon us.

We are willing to give such self-molesters some counsel, if they will take it, and ask them no fees for it. Yea we give it not, but Christ gives it: will they take his advice, that great Counselor of the Father? He counsels his clients to the everlasting possession of their souls by patience. In Olympiacis certaminibus, Diabolo consecratis; In the games of Olympus consecrated to the Devil, he had the glory of the day, that gave most wounds, and came off himself untouched. In stadio Christi non est ea certādi lex, sed contraria: In the race of Christianity, there is a contrary Law of striving: not he that offers most blows, but he that suffers most blows, is crowned. A man is stricken, will he go to law for this? no, rather let him turn the other cheek; this is Christ's counsel. His cloke is taken from him, it is near him a garment; of necessary comliness, a cloke: of singular use, he hath but one cloke: he hath the propriety of it, it is his cloke: must he go to Law for this? no, rather let him take his coat also. Felix ill, si nudus corpore, sit nudus malicia: there is a wedding garment to cloth such.

I am no Anabaptist, nor Libertine, to deny the Magistracy, or lawfulness of authority, and our just appeal thereto. Rather then every man should be his own Judge, I would appease uproars with the Town-clerk of Ephesus; The Law is open, and there are Deputies, let them implead one another. Saint Paul himself took this course, appealing to the Judgment seat of Caesar. Our Saviors practice is a clear Comment and declaration of his Law: he that bade us rather turn out other check to the smiter, then revenge our selves; did himself sweetly reprove him that smote him. If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil: but if well, why smitest thou me? So Paul to Ananias, Sittest thou to judge me after the Law, & commandest me to be smitten contrary to the Law? The Lord himself hath appointed Tribunals: and no law, no love. I know there is a Christianly seeking of Justice, when injurious persons grow worse by forbearance, and ground their insolence upon others patience. As Christians may war in love, so they may iarre in love: when the party cast in the suit, may be bettered, if not in his money, yet in his manners; and Satan only conquered. Vt qui vincitur, simul vincat, & vnus tantummodo vincatur diabolus. Sed reprimā me, I will hold me where I was. I have labored to bring men into peace, I must show them no way out again. The Fathers sometimes in confuting an Heresy much spread; if they did run a little within the brinks of a contrary error, not then questioned, nor so dangerous; were never censured for that to have erred Dogmaticce. So if to convince that Heresy in manners, (It is lawful to go to law for everything;) I should a little lean to and favor that other opinion, (It is lawful to go to law for nothing;) either excuse me, or at least suspend your judgments, till I come on purpose to handle that point. If men would promise not to go to Law till then, I would promise, when they did go to Law, to bear all their charges.

Howsoever, let them not do it animo litigandi, nor for every wrong enter an action, lest God enter his action against them. The Lord hath a controversy with the Inhabitants of the land: a terrible action, which the Jury of heaven and earth will find. Let them therefore leave all, and study God's Law, with that royal Prophet; Thy Testimonies are my delight and my Counsellors: and I will meditate in thy Statutes. Blessed is he that meditates on God's Law day and night: but cursed is he that wastes his time to meditate and study Law-tricks. Let the litigious soul learn a new course of law: let Conscience be his Chancery, Charity his Chancellor, Patience his Counselor, Truth his Attorney, and Peace his Sollicitor. Litem in proximum, diuertat in seipsum. Let him go to Law with his own heart; arraign his passionate will at the Bar of God's Judgment; let the twelve Apostles be a Jury against him, who all condemned Contention. Thus let him judge himself, that he be not judged of Jesus Christ. For he that avengeth his own quarrel, steps into the Princes Chair of Estate, yea into God's own Seat; dethroning both; and so disturbs neauen and earth. Mad men, that thus presume, as if God did not see malice in the heart! Hell and destruction are before the Lord, much more then the hearts of the children of men. Or as if seeing men contend, he had nothing to do with it: but must sit still like an idle looker on, and take part with neither.

Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord. This sounds a Retreat to all quarrels: Paul seeing the Daggers drawn, and the peace in danger to be broken; steps in with the sword of the Spirit, to part the fray. It is a Writ of Reuersment from the high Court of heaven: if we break open the writ, we shall find the Kings pleasure in it; an Arrest of reuengers. He begins with Dearely beloved; a sweet ingredience, to qualify a bitter medicine. As if he should say, It is my love that I write so much against malice: not for your hurt, but for your eternal good: if you will not believe me, believe God himself: To me belongeth vengeance.

The Devil when he gets audience, tells a man how much he is hated of others: the holy Spirit tells him how much he is loved of others. The argument of our charity to them, is God's charity to us. Put on (as the elect of God, holy and beloved) bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, long suffering: seeing you are beloved of God, love his.

This is God's challenge, Vengeance is mine: God's execution, I will repay: God's Subscription, to which his great Name is affixed, Thus saith the Lord. Scriptum est, it is a transcript and faithful copy out of the Original, to show it the Lord's true act and deed: twice written, that it might never be forgotten. Once hath God spoken, twice have I heard it, that Vengeance (so well as Power) belongeth unto God. He pleads the continuance of Succession without interruption; vengeance, Judgment, and Glory are His alone. Therefore to avenge our selves, is both to lose God's protection, and to incur his condemnation. It is faithless and fruitless: faithless, not to believe that God will deal with us according to his Word. With thine eyes thou shalt see the reward of the wicked. It is then infidelity not to commit our case to God, and his Deputy the Prince; but to make them both our deputies and instruments of revenge. What is this but to exalt our selves above all that is called God; and to play the Devil in jest, and the Pope in good earnest? Fruitlesse, for if being wronged, we draw out our wooden dagger of revenge, God will put up his sword, and leave us to our selves. The injured child turns not again, but runs to his father. When the Italians hear how God hath reserved Vengeance to himself, they say blasphemously, He knew it was too sweet a bit for man, therefore kept it for his own tooth. But if man were is own caruer, he would carue too deep. God only is wise and just, wise to know, & just to give the due proportion. Now the Great and Omnipotent Lord chief Justice, bind us all to the peace on earth, and bring us all to the peace of heaven.

Now because every City must have an established Government; Order being the good of every creature, & it is better not to be, then to be out of order: therefore this City of Peace must have a Lord, and a Law: a Ruler to govern it, and a Rule whereby it must be governed. The King is Christ, who is therefore called Princeps Pacis, The Prince of Peace. And he hath a Deputy or Vicegerent under him, whom he hath set to promote the good, and to remove the evil, of Peace. The Law is Truth, that is the Gospel, Regula Pacis, the Rule of Truth.

The Governor of this City

Is supreme Authority: as God is a great King, so the king is (as it were) a little God. I have said, Ye are God's. God is an invisible King, the King is a visible god. Ye must be subject, not only for wrath, but also for Conscience sake. All must obey: the bad for fear, the good for love. To compel the one, there is a Writ out of the Kings Bench: to persuade the other, there is a motion in the Chancery.

Of all Nations we are blessed with peace, under a King of peace: therefore all bound to be children of peace. There are three ways of choosing Kings. 1. An immediate nomination from God. 2. A Succession of blood. 3. An election of the people. The first ceaseth, the last hath been found dangerous, the best remains. They that are suddenly chosen out of the flock, do seldom manifest such royal behavior, nor become their Maieiestie; for it is not their Trade. Jehu remitted much of his noble zeal, when he was settled in his kingdom. It is one thing to say, With a great sum of money, obtained I this kingdom: and for another to say, I was a King borne. We may justly say of our King, Dignissimus Regno, si non natus ad Regnum. When the Poets called some men the Sons and offspring of the gods; they meant that they were men of a more noble and vncommon nature: and that those graces were, Ex Diuino afflatu. It was as familiar with Homer, to make a King fight with a god at his elbowe, as a common Soldier with his sword in his hand. To whom the Lord gives most honor, he gives most assistance. The heart of the King is in his hand, as rivers of waters; the heart of a private man as a little brook: in the former is more need of his omnipotence. Howsoever, the grace of adoption, in the Apostles time, was not given to many mighty or noble; yet the graces of administration are.

Anarchy is the mother of division, the stepmother of peace. While the State of Italy wants a King, all runs into civil broils. It is the happiness of this City, that there is no distraction. Not a King at Judah, and another at Dan: not one in Hebron, another in Gibeon: not the redd Rose here, and the white there. We are not shuffled into a popular government, nor cut into Cantons, by a headles, headstrong Aristocracy: but Henricus Rosas, Regna Jacobus: in Henry was the union of Roses, in James of the kingdoms. Every King is not a Peace-maker; ours, like a second Augustus, hath shut the rusty door of Ianus Temple; so making Peace, as if he were made of peace. That blessed Queen of sweet and sacred memory before him, was Filia Pacis: who, as by her Sexuall graces shed deserved to be the Queen of women, so by her masculine virtues to be the Queen of men. Certainly, it would have troubled any King but Him, to have succeeded such a Queen; yet no man complains the want of peace. This he promised, and Verbum Regis, Rex Regi, this he hath performed to every good souls content. When he was first proclaimed, what heard we but peace? What heard the Nobles? a King that would honor them. What the Senators? a King that would counsel them. What the Schools? a King that would grace thē. What the Divines? a King that would encourage them. What the rich? a King that would defend thē. What the poor? a King that would relieve them.

When a Tyrant comes abroad, all seek to hide themselves: When the wicked rise, men hide themselves. But when a clement Prince progresseth, all flock to him, the streets and ways are filled with people, the air with acclamations. We call our peace, the Kings peace: and say to brawlers, Keep the Kings peace. Peace, Plentie, Trafficke, Learning, Administration of Justice, flourishing of arts, preaching of the Gospel, Rex Jupiter omnibus idem. Like David, he leads the Dance to heaven: and like Augustus, makes a sweet spring wheresoever he goes. Israel had rest forty years, we have had a Jubilee of fifty years, and begun again. The Peace-maker doth both bless, and is blessed: therefore let us bless him, and bless God for him, and hold our selves blessed in him.

Away then with those discontented spirits, that grudge these outward rights, whether tributes of money, or attributes of Supremacy. Soluatursubsidium, ne contingat excidium. For this cause pay we tribute also, &c. It is the mediate due to God, as prayers & praises are his immediate rents. Some have observed, that Christ did no miracle about Honor or money, except that one of giving tribute to Caesar. Much more intolerable are those our Cozens of Samaria, that fly off in a rage; What portion have we in David? For this cause certainly, if David were now a live, he would never admit a Jesuit to his Chaplain. But perish his enemies, and upon his own Head let his Crown flourish. May not the Scepter depart from Jacob, nor a Seed from his loins, till Shiloh come again. May his Posterity have a Crown on earth, when himself hath a crown in heaven. Amen.

The Law of this City

Is the Gospel of Christ: a law indeed, but a law of peace. It made peace betwixt God and man, and it must make peace between man and man. If it cannot reconcile us one to another, it shall reconcile none of us to the Lord. It is a law, not to be observed for State, but for Conscience. Indeed those Catuli Catilinarij, Statising Jesuits, turn all their Religion into Statisme, yea into Atheism. And there be many Church-Recusants, a monstrous, menstruous brood, the Moon-calves of that lunatic religion. Come they do, but more for fear of the Law, then for love of the Gospel. And all the children that even hang on the breasts of peace, cannot be excused: for some through nescience or negligence, scarce cast an eye on the statutes of peace.

I will hear what the Lord will speak: for he will speak peace unto his people. One takes snuff at his poor neighbor; perhaps it is Mordecai's cap that hath put Haman out of his princely wits: and now he resolves to trounce him: proud beggar! He will teach him to know his betters. O but tarry, and hear the Statute of Peace. Rob not the poor because he is poor: for the Lord will plead his cause, and spoil the soul of them that spoil him. Lust makes this a spurr to oppression, Quia pauper, because he is poor: the Law makes this a bridle from it, Quia pauper, because he is poor. Another is erop-sick of Ceremonies; he hath a toy in his head, that the Churches garment should not be embroidered, nor have more lace and fringe then his own coat: there is in him so little of man, that he talks of nothing but the Beast. Rather then his children shall be crossed in Baptism, he will out of the Ark into some fantastical Wherry. Let him tarry, and hear what the Lord speaks, in his Law of peace. In Christ Jesus neither Circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a New creature. That is, neither Ceremony, nor no Ceremony, but the Substantial; a new Creature.

Another flatters himself; I need not stand on strict performance of Tythes, the Gospel requires nothing but Benevolence: experienced men justify it, I have the warrant of good Lawyers for it. O but such a Lawyer is the Barrister of Barathrum, a sworn enemy to the law of peace. The voice of Christ is not in it, hear that. Let him that is taught in the word, communicate unto him that teacheth, in all good things.

This City of Peace hath one immutable Rule, and it is sufficient to direct all actions. And as many as walk according to this Rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God. A man is proud of his victorious mischiefs, flesh'd with his fortunat wickedness; thinks he hath carried himself bravely, in out-bribing his adversary, fooling Judge and Jury by false testimony, and triumphs in his vnblest gain; but is this according to the rule of Peace. Vincat veritas, let Truth ouercom. The loser may sit down with content, but the winner shall ye down in tormēt. A rich man carries himself proudly,; above others in scorn, above himself in folly: he thinks all his Titles beneath him, and even those that worship him, still to vnderualue him: others he looks upon, as if they were made to serve him, yea, and be proud to be commanded by him. Cross him, and he rages, swelles, foames, like the Sea in a storm: but is this after the Rule of Peace? Learn of me who am meek and lowly in heart. Alas, what is the difference in dust? The Beggar dies, so doth the rich man. Before, the rich could not endure the beggar near him, here one verse contains thē both. In life the rich hath the preeminence of ease, and wealth, and honor: in death the poor man goes first to peace.

In driving a trade, it is Mammons prime policy, to take advantage of others necessity, or simplicity. Sold you it for so much? Saith Peter: For so much, answers Ananias. Did it cost so much? says the buyer: yes, saith the seller. Let him tremble at the Judgment, which was a sudden death. This is the Rule of an unjust City, not of the City of Peace. Pereat mundi lucrum, ne fia animae damnum. Perish that gain which comes with the souls loss.

Many think Charity to the poor, to be a work of mere Supererogation; that they are not bound liberally to give part of that to lasie beggars, which they have laboriously gotten by their endeavors. But hear the Rule of Peace; Break thy bread unto the hungry; Sell that thou hast, and give to the poor. But as when Christ dissuaded from Covetise, by the difficulty of entrance that wealth finds to heaven, they amazedly replied, Who then can be saved? Who can walk after this Rule? When we preach this doctrine, the world cries, Durus Sermo, this is a hard saying, a harsh Sermon. Yet is this the law of peace, and thus minded are the citizens of peace. When the poor at your gates ask you Panem quotidianum, their daily bread; they after a sort make you gods; therefore show yourselves at least to be men. Charity is the food of Peace on earth, and the Seed of peace in heaven.

The Palace of Peace

Is the Temple: the peace of man can never be preserved without the worship of God. It is not enough for the city to have laws, but these must be diuulged, made known to the Inhabitants; the observation of them continually urged: for by nature men are apt enough to fly out. Howsoever the Romans built their Templū Pacis without the gates, yet here it is the chief honor and ornament of the City. Here Peace keepsher Court, and sits like a royal Queen in her Chair of Estate. Which is not like Solomon's Throne, guarded with Lions; but with milk-white Doves, and covered over with Olive branches.

But alas! how doth her Palace now fall to ruin for want of reparation? Few there be that repair it, but to impair it thousands are ready. The question was once; What shall we bring to the man of God? Now it is a motion suffered in all Courts, What shall we take away from the man of God? The noble Shunamite built him a chamber, with a bed and a candlestick: We have those that pull down his rooms, disturb his rest, and put out his light. Nehemiah reduced the Tythes to the primitive institution and order: But if any Nehemiah should now undertake it, and restore our portion to our own hands; there are ten thousand Harpies ready to catch it ere it come to our mouths. We may sing, or rather sigh one to another, as little children chaunt in the streets: When shall we eat white Bread? When the Puttock is dead: when there is not a Sacrilegious Lawyer left. If the walls of Jerusalem should begin to rise, there is a Tobiah or Samballat to flout us, that a Fox is able to break them down. Corrupt Advocates are those Foxes, and by their wills the Vine of Peace should bear no Grapes that escape their fingers. Some have written wittily in the praise of folly, some have commended Baldness; other in a quaint Paradox extolled deformity: but in former times it was never heard that any wrote Encomiums of Sacrilege.

That the Kings of the earth should conspire against Christ, it was no wonder: for they knew him not. That the Edomites and Ishmaelites should oppose him, no wonder: for they stood on terms of hostility. That the Jews should confederate against him, no wonder: for they hated him. But that men baptized in his Faith, bearing his Name as their honorable Title, and wearing his Profession, as their chief ornament; should consent to rob him, and justify it by their law! this is such a thing as the very Barbarians would blush at. Suppose the Ministers of this City, the Pencioners of Peace, by some humble complaint request their own, or (at most but) so me small part of their own; is the Spoyler at a non-plus? Cannot he find an Advocate to plead for him, and make his cause (though not be, yet) appear good? What, not one for his fees, that can cry down the Temple, the Gospel, Christ himself? Is there no Bill to be framed? no false plea to be found? Is Satan turned fool? Hath none of his scholars any brains left? Yes, we might think the devil were dead, if there could not be found an Advocate to plead for Sacrilege. The Lord in his Justice for sin, hath broken down her hedges; and now every hand hath a snatch at her Grapes.

In many places, Ahab- like, they have engrossed the whole vineyard: but if the poor, exposed, & unsupported Vine be left, it shall bear the owner but a few grapes. This may hold in Iure Fori, it never shall hold in Iure Poli. God promised that the faith of the Church should remove mountains: such were Domitian, Dioclesian, and those Imperial persecutors. The Church prays, Dorsum eorum incurua, Bow down their backs; and so the Lord did. Valerian was so bowed down, that he became a footstool for the King of Persia, to mount up to his horse O that the Church of Peace had still this miraculous Faith, to remove these mountains; malicious and truth-hating pleaders, the pioners of the Temple, and the maintainers of those that pillage it.

They tell us, the Law is open, and there be deputies; but who be the deputies in this City? Is there any other then a Judge of their own? And is it not then a prouerbiall answer of any man questioned in this Sacrilege; Ask my father if I be a thief? When David decided the matter to Mephibosheth; Thou and Ziba divide the land: he answered, Yea let him take all: For the misery of Law, I never by experience found it, because I never tried it: but when they have leave to divide the Inheritance of Christ with their Ministers (and it were something tolerable if they did but divide it) I say, yea let thē take all, seeing all they will have, rather then we go to recover it by such a Judgment. But certainly God cannot long abide to see that people prosper, who cannot abide to see his Church prosper. They that spoil the Palace of Peace on earth, shall never be entertained into her glorious Court of heaven.

The River that serves this City of Peace

Is Prosperity. It is one principal happiness of a City, to be situated by a Rivers side: that as it hath fortified it self by land, so it may have command of the Sea. Prosperity is the River to this City, that like a loving Meander, winds it self about, throwing his silver Arms upon her sides; ebbing slowly, but flowing merrily, as if he longed to embrace his love. Peace is the mother of Prosperity, but Prosperity is too often the murderer of Peace. For peace breeds wealth, wealth breeds pride, pride breeds contention, and contention kills peace. Thus she is often destroyed by her own issue, as Sennacherib was by his own bowels.

Take this City we live in for an Instance. Peace hath brought God's plenty: the Inhabitants neither plow, nor sow, nor reap; yet are fed like the fowls of heaven. They fare well with less trouble, then if come grew at their doors, and cattle grased in their streets. But as Nylus may rise too high, and water Egypt too much; so the inundation of opulency may do thē hurt. Thus may the influence of heaven, and the plenty of earth, be a Snare unto us; and our abundance, an occasion of our falling. Prosperity is hearty meat, but not digestible by a weak stomach, strong wine, but naught for a weak brain. The prosperity of fools destroyeth them. It is not simply prosperity, but the prosperity of fools that destroyeth them. The swelling River by the surfeit of a Tide, doth not sooner bring in our increase; but our increase doth breed in our minds another swelling, in our bodies another surfeiting: we swell in pride, and surfeit in wantonness. The Israelites never fared so well, as when they lived at God's immediate finding; and at night expected their morrows breakfast frō the clouds. When they did daily ask, and daily receive their daily bread.

There be (as I heard a worthy Divine observe) three main Rivers in the land, whereof this is held the best: and this City is placed in the best Seat of the River, upon the gentle rising of a hill, in the best air, and richest soil. When a Courtier gave it out, That Queen Mary being displeased with the City, threatened to divert both Tearme and Parliament to Oxford: an Alderman asked whether she meant to turn the channell of the Thames thither, or no▪ if not, saith he, by God's grace we shall do well enough. The lines are fallen to us in pleasant places, we have a goodly Heritage. Both the Elements are our friends; the Earth sends us in her fruits, the Sea her merchandise. We are near enough the benefits, and far enough from the dangers of the Ocean. Nothing is wanting to the consummation of our happiness: to keep us in our own Country, in our own City, in our own Houses, but that which keeps men in their wits, Temperance, and Thankfulness.

But do we not requite this River of Prosperity, with vngrateful impiety? and use the Ocean of God's bounty, as we do the Thames? It brings us in all manner of provision; Clothes to cover us, Fuell to warm us, Food to nourish us, Wine to cheare us, Gold to enrich us: and we in recompense, foil it with our rubbish, filth, common sewers, & such excretions. It yields us all manner of good things, and we requite it with all plenty of bad things. It comes flowing in with our commodities, & we send it loaden back with our injuries.

Such toward God is the impious ingratitude of this famous City, which else had no Paralell under the Sun. She may not unfitly be compared to certain Pictures, that represent to diverse beholders, at diverse stations, diverse forms. Looking one way, you see a beautiful Virgin: another way, some deformed monster. Cast an eye upon her Profession, she is a well grac'd creature: turn it upon her conversation, she is a misshapen stigmatic. View her Peace, she is fairer then the daughters of men: viewe her Pride, the children of the Hittites and Amorites are beauteous to her. Think of her good works, then Blessed art thou of the Lord: number her sins, then How is that faithful City become an harlot 〈...〉 To tell of her Charity, and how many hundreds she feeds in a year, you will say with Paul, In this I praise her. To tell of her oppressions, and how many thousands she undoes in a year, you will say with him again, In this I praise her not. Behold her like a Nourse drawing her Breasts, and giving milk to Orphans, you wish her Cup to run over with fullness. Behold her like a Horse leech, sucking the blood of the Church, to feed her own sacrilegious avarice; you will say her Cup is too full. When we think of her prosperity, we wonder at her impiety: when we think of her impiety, we wonder at her prosperity. O that her Citizens would learn to manage their liberal fortunes, and to entertain the River of Peace that makes glad the City of God, with Humility and Sobriety. That when Death shall disfranchise them here, they may be made free above, in that triumphant City, whose glory hath neither measure, nor end.

The Life of the Citizens

Is Love: for without the love of men there can be no peace of God, and there is no love of God in them that desire not peace with men. He that loves not the members, was never a friend to the Head. To say we love Christ, and hate a Christian; is as if a man, while he was saluting or protesting love to his friend, should tread on his toes. I know indeed, that every creature is to be loved, but in ordine ad Deum: Religion doth not forbid, but rectify our affections. Our Parents, spouses, children, allies, countrymen, neighbors, friends; have all their due places in our love: and it were a brutish doctrine to dispossess us of these human relations. Only they must know their orders and stations, and by no means usurp upon God: they must not be mistresses, but handmaidens to the love of Christ.

But let us love them, because they love God: as reflections of our sight, which glance from the Lord upon his Image: if God have their hearts, let them have our hearts. It is poor to love a man for that is about him: he must be loved for that is within him. If we should account of men as we do of bags; prize them best that weigh heaviest, and measure out our love by the Subsidy-book; honoring a man because he is well clothed: I see then no reason, but we should do greater reverence to the Bason and Euer on the stall, then to the Goldsmith in the Shop; and most humbly salute Sattin & Veluet in whole pieces, because their virgin-glory was never yet ravished and abused into fashion.

No, but especially let us love others, because they fear God, and serve Jesus Christ. For as the brain is to the sinews, the liver to the veins, and the heart to the arteries; so is God's love to human societies: as the very soul by which they live, and the form that gives them being. Otherwise our companies are conspiracies; when we fall in one with another, to fall out with God. Let us begin our loves above, deriving this holy fire from the Altar of Heaven; let our faith inkindle it at the heart of Christ, and then like the Cherubims, we shall look graciously one upon another, while all faithfully look up to the Mercy-seat of God.

The general State of this City.

This is the Corollary of all; every particular being cast up, here is the sum; her universal felicity. For the illustration whereof, it will not be unuseful, to borrow an instance: and we need not travel far to seek out such an image or resemblance.

Look we upon our own Nation, the happy Module of this City of peace. It was said, that in Rome a man might see all Countries: and the Romans used to solace themselves; It is good looking on a Map of the World, vbi nihil in orbe videmus alienum, when we find nothing in the world which is not our own. What doth the whole earth produce, which is not yielded to our enjoying? What was once said of Ormus, is true of this City, Turn the world into a Ring, and this is the Diamond of it. Like to Gideon's Fleece, it hath been wet with the dew of heaven, when drought was on the whole earth besides: Or like Nylus, which keeps within the Banks, when other Rivers overflow their continents. Some Nations have peace, but without the Truth: other have the Truth, but without Peace: we have both Truth and Peace. Our neighbors have been exercised with troubles, whirled about with hostile tumults; their ears affrighted with the thunder of those murdering pieces: their eyes agashed with their Temples and Tabernacles flaming about their heads: Infants bleeding upon the stones, and their amazed mothers ravished ere they can be permitted to die. The shrieks of the dying, and slavery of the living, under the merciless hands of a killing or insulting adversary; these have been their distracting objects: none of them come near us. There is no rifling of houses, no flying to refuges, no rotting in Dungeons, no ruining of Monuments, no swelling the channels with blood, no fiering of Cities, no Rapes of Virgines, no dashing of Babes against the stones, nor casting them, as they drop from their mothers wombs, into their mothers flames. But instead of these, the truth of the Gospel is preached, piety professed, the practice of it encouraged; Grace promising, and Peace performing, blessed rewards.

That is verified in us, which is recorded of the days of Solomon; That he had peace on all sides round about him: and Judah & Israel dwelt safely, every man under his Vine, and under his Figgetree, from Dan to Beersheba. Or as Syluius said of Rhodes; Semper in sole sita est. The Sunshine of mercy embraceth us, and hath made us a day of peace, not shorter then sixty years: the favors of God over shadowing us, as the Cherubims did the Mercy-Seat. I know that Rome frets at this, and let the Harlot rage her heart out: she thunders out Curses, but (praised be God) we never more prospered, then when the Pope most cursed us. Yea, O Lord, though they curse, do thou bless: their thunder doth more fear then hurt, thy favor doth more good then they can blast. Conuert or confound them that have evil will at Zion: & still let us inherit thy Peace, that thou mayst inherit our praise.

This is the Reward of Peace, and of all those that in sincerity of heart love her: the God of peace shall be with them. There be six kinds of peace, but the peace of God contains all the rest. The peace of God passeth all understanding: therefore whosoever looseth this peace, hath a loss past all understanding. But Christ foretold us, that in the world we shall have no peace. Indeed no peace Quoad oppositionem seculi, yet much peace quoad dispositionē Domini. The most savage disturbers, Si non reformatur ne pereant, tamen reprimuntur ne perimant: if they be not reformed to save thē themselves, they shall be restrained from harming us. If they will not do us the good they should, yet they shall not do us the evil they would. Vel inimicus tuus non manebit, vel non manebit inimicus. Either our enemies shall not live, or they shall not live our enemies. Either the righteous shall rejoice whē they see the vengeance, and wash their feet in the blood of the wicked. Or the Lord will give them favor in the sight of their enemies, and those that hated them, shall cleave unto them.

From hence ariseth peace with our selves: a conformity of affection to reason, of reason to grace: that the conflicts which a distressed conscience finds with legal terrors, shall be turned to mild embracements. Faith leading the understanding, the understanding guiding the will, the will ruling the operative powers, & Christ Jesus governing all. For indeed he is the Fountain of peace, and we through him being justified by faith, have peace with God. Through the corruption of our nature, and Justice of God's nature, we are enemies: and there is no reconciliation, but through the blood of the everlasting Covenant. He reconciles us to God, as Joab did Absalom to David by the woman of Tekoah: when the whole family rose up, & said, Deliver him that smote his brother, that we may take his life for the life of the slain: and so the father & mother shall have no name nor remainder upon earth. God hath two sorts of sons Angels & men: the Angels that fell, are lost forever: men fell, if they were lost too, where should God have sons? I know that he needs not man: he hath still the elect Angels, and is able to raise sons of stones: he can want nothing while he possesseth himself. Well, yet in mercy Christ reconciles us: David asks, Is not the hand of Joab in all this? so we may admire, Is not the hand of Jesus in all this? Yes, he hath made our peace. The Minister always ends his public devotions with the peace of God, & the blessing of this Peace rest upon us.

Thus we have a real abridgment of this mystical City of Peace; happy every way. Vigilancie is her Officer of Peace; that hath an eye in the darkest angles, and discovers the first conceptions of strife. Discipline is her Clerke of the peace, that keeps the Records, and indicts offenders.

Authority is her Justice of peace: that if any will not be ruled, binds them over to the peace. Equity is her Burse, where men exchange kindness for kindness: on whose stairs Injury and imposture durst never set their foul feet. Truth is her Standard, which with the Trumpet of Fame shall resound her happiness to all nations. Plenty is her Treasurer, Liberalitie her Almoner, Conscience her Chancellor, Wisdom her Counselor, Prayer her Clerk of the Closet, Faith her Crown, Justice her Scepter, Masculine Virtues her Peers, Graces her Attendants, and Nobility her Maid of Honor.

All her Garments are green and orient; all her paths be Milk, her words Oracles, and her works Miracles: making the blind to see, and the lame to go, by a merciful supply to their defects. Her breath is sweeter then the new blown Rose; millions of souls lie sucking their life frō it: and the smell of her garments is like the smell of Lebanon. Her smiles are more reviving then the Vertumnall Sunneshine: and her favors, like seasonable dew, spring up flowers and fruits wheresoever she walks. Holiness is the Canopie of State over her head, and Tranquilitie the Arras where she sets her foot. All her Servants wait in order; and can with contentful knowledge, distinguish and accept their own places. Her Court is an Image of Paradise; all her channels slow with milk, and her Conduits run wine. Envy and murmuring, as privy to their own guilt, fly from her Presence. Her Guard consists not of men, but Angels: and they pitch their Tents about her Palace. Lastly, having preserved and blessed all her children on earth, she goes with them to heaven; is welcomed into the arms of her Father, invested Queen with a Diadem of glory, & possessed of those joys, unto which Time shall never put

An End.

P-TA-5. England's sickness, comparatively conferred with Israel's Divided into two sermons, by Tho: Adams. - Adams, Thomas, fl. 1612-1653.

To The Right Worshipful, Sir John Cleypole Knight, saving health.

Worthy Sir, I have ventrously traffiqued with my poor talent in public, whiles I behold richer graces buried in silence: judging it better, to husband a little to the common good, then to hoard much wealth in a sullen niggardice. I censure none: if all were Writers, who should be Readers? if none, idle Pamphlets would present themselves to the general eye, and be entertained for defect of more sober matter. If the grain be good, it doth better in the market then in the garner. All I can say for myself is; I desire to 〈...〉 whereof if I fail, yet my endeou• 〈...〉 not my conscience without some joyful content. To your Patronage this flies, to whom the Author is greatly bounden, and shall yet be indebted further for your acceptance. Your love to general learning, singular encouragement to Students, (opposed to the common dishartnings, which poverty, contempt, ignorance assaults us with) your actual beneficence to many, especially to Katherine Hall in Cambridge, worthy of death-less memory, lastly, your real kindness to myself, have prompted me to seal this Book, with the signet of your name, and send it to the world. Which in humble submission I commend to your kind acceptance, and yourself, with it, to the blessing of our gracious God.

Your Worships in all duty devoted Tho. Adams.

ENGLAND'S SICKNESS.

THE First Lecture.

Ierem. Chap. 8. Ver. 22.

Is there no balm at Gilead? is there no Physician there? why then is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered?

Sicke is the daughter of Zion; and the complexion of England gives her not to be sound. If she feel her own pulse, and examine the Symptoms of her ilnes, her works of disobedience; she must confess that her health is impaired, or if she feel it not, she is obstupe•ied.

The Coast I am bound for, is Israel: but (like faithful Merchants) if I can traffic or transport thence any good commodity into our own country, I will venter the welcome of it. Israel & England, though they lie in a diverse climat, may be said right Parallels; not so unfit in Cosmographically as fit in Theological comparison. And saving Israel's Apostasy, and punishment for it, we need not think it harsh to be sampled. They could plead much of God's mercy; if we can speak of more, let us thankfully embrace our transcendent happiness.

Two main passages are directed my discourse to sails through; which shall limit my speech, and your attentions for this time. 1. The Patient. 2. The Passion. The Sick, and the disease. The Person laboring of grief, is the daughter of Israel: her Passion or grief is sickness: Why is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered? These two coastes will afford us many subordinate observations, worthy both our travels.

The Patient, whom we must visit, is described, 1. Qua sit, 2. Cuius sit. God speaketh of her, 1. Positively, 2. Possessively. Positively, what she is of her self. The daughter of the people. Possessively, what she is by relation, in regard of her owner, populi mei, God's people.

Daughter. This title is usual according to Hebraism, Daughter of Israel, for Israel. Daughter of Zion, for Slon Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold thy salvation cometh &c. Daughter of Judah, for Iudah The Lord hath trodden the daughter of Judah, as a Wine-press. Daughter of Jerusalem, for Jerusalem, Lament, 2. Of Babylon, for Babylon, Oh daughter of Babylon, who art to be destroyed, &c. So Christ calls himself the Son of man, because he took on him man's nature, Isaiah 2 1. Oh my threshing, and the son of my floor, for the floor it self, or the corn of it. And Augustine observes on the 72. Psalm, that by the children of the poor, is meant the poor themselves. This is an abstractive Phrase, and vox indulgentis; implying propense favor in the speaker, and tenderness in the person spoken of; filia populi. It is a word of relation, simply taken: for daughter depends on the respect of Parent. Here it is Phrasicall, and therefore not to be forced. Yet because (cunctae apices) every letter and accent in holy West is divinely significant; let us not neglectfully pass it over, without some useful observation.

There is somewhat in it, that Filia non Filius dicitur, the name of Daughter, not of Son is here given to Israel. Iaraels offspring, must be a Daughter, that she may be married to the God of Israel's Son. Christ is the beloved: the Church is his Spouse. My beloved is mine, and I am his: he feedeth among the Lilies. Betrothed to him in this life. (I will betroth thee unto me forever: yea I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness &c.) Solemnly married in the next: at what time the Saints shall sing: Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor to him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made her self ready: and verse 9. Blessed are they that are called to the marriage Supper of the Lamb. Thus God the Father, that had a Son by eternal generation, hath now a Daughter also by adoption. Hence the Church is called the Kings daughter, Ps. 45. (The kings daughter is all glorious within, her clothing is of wrought gold.) because she is wedded to the Kings son. God is a Father in many respects.

- 1 In Creation, Deut. 32. Is not he thy father, that hath bought thee? Hath he not made thee, and established thee? He gave us all essentiam & formam, subsistence and form.
- 2 In Education, Esa 1. I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me. We are brought up in this House of this world, and fed from the table of his blessings.
- 3 In compassion, Psal. 103, Like as a Father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him. Yield, that a mother (which is rare and unnatural) can forget the Son of her womb; yet God cannot forget the children of his Election.
- 3 In Correction, Heb. 12, Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. Qui excipitur à numero flagellatorum, excipitur à numero siliorum: He that scapes affliction, may suspect his adoption. We are not exempted from misery, that we may not be excepted from mercy. The rod walks over us, lest we should grow wanton with his blessings.

- 5 In Adoption, and that most principally, Rom. 8. We have received the spirit of Adoption, whereby we cry Abba, Father: God sent his son made of a woman, that we redeemed by him, might receive the adoption of sons.

All these may be reduced to three, God is a Father singularly, generally, specially. 1. singularly, the Father of Christ, by nature, 2, generally, the Father of all men, and all things by creation. 3. specially, the Father of the Elect by adoption. The first privilege belongs only to Christ. The second to many, who have made themselves by Apostasy the children of Belial. The third is blessed, and never to be forfeited.

This is a happy advancement, that the daughter of Zion is made the daughter of God; whom his equal and eternal son hath vouchsafed to marry. It was no small preferment in David's opinion, by wedding Saul's daughter, to be made son in Law to a King: how far higher doth the Churches honor transcend, that by marrying the son of God, is made daughter in Law to the King of Kings? Specially, when this bond is indissoluble by the hand of death; uncancellable by the sentence of man, undivorceable by any defect or default in the Spouse: for he that chose her to himself, will preserve her from all cause, why he may not take pleasure in her beauty. And as Christ now in heaven, dwells with his Church on earth by grace: so she, though partly now on earth, dwells with him in heaven; all her members being Burgesses of that celestial Corporation. Since animus est, vb•amat, non vb•animat. Our conversation is in heaven, whence also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ. Thus Augustine, Et ill adhuc deorsum est, & no iam s•sum. His mercies are still descending to us, our affections ascending to him. The desires of the faithful Spouse are with her Beloved. Such is the insolubility of that mystical union, which no eloquence of man can express, no violence of devils shall suppress. Therefore ascendamus interim cord, vt sequamur corpore: let us send up our affections before, that our persons may follow after. As Christ hath sent thee down his spirit, as a pawn and pledge of this assurance: so do thou send him up thy heart, for a token of thy acceptance: yea of thy hopeful expectation and desire to be with him: Minus anima promisit se Christo, quae non praemisit se Christo: that soul hath nothing less then vowed it self to Christ, that hovers and hankers about the world, and is loath to come at him.

This is ineffable, inestimable happiness. Hence the daughter of Israel (understand me not topically, but typically; not Israel in the flesh, but the Israel of God: children of that Jerusalem, which is above, or (at least from above,) doth apportion all the riches of her Husband. If it be (vox amici, Tuus sum totus) the voice of a friend, I am wholly thine: it is more livingly, more lovingly (vox mariti) the speech of a husband. The Bride (among the heathen) on the first day of her marriage, challenged of the Bridegroom, vbi tu Gaius, ego C••, where you are Master, I must be mistress. Marriage is a strong bond by God's ordinance, and knows no other method but composition. God, that increation made two of one, by marriage made one of two. Hence the Daughter of Israel is made one with the son of God; by an union, which the heart may feel, but no art describe. Those gracious and glorious riches, which the master of all the world, is proprietarie of, are in some sort communicate toys. His righteousness, holiness, obedience, satisfaction, expiation, inheritance is made ours: as our sin, sorrow, sufferings, death and damnation were made his not by transfusion, but by imputation. His sorrow, pain, passion, for us, was so heavy, so grievous, so piercing such a Sic that all the world could not match it with a Sic•t Our joy by him is so gracious, shall be so glorious, that pro qualitate, pro aequalitate nihil in comparationem admittitur: for quality, for quantity it refuseth all comparison. Oh blessed mutation, blessed mutuation • what we had ill, (and what had we but ill?) we changed it away for his good: what he hath good, (and what other nature can come from goodness it self?) we happily enjoy, vel in esse, vel in posse, either in possession or assurance. Our Savior died our death, that we might live his life. He suffered our hell, to bring us to his heaven.

It is somewhat, not unworthy the noting, that Filia dicitur, non filiae, Israel is called by the name of daughter, not of daughters. Zion hath but one daughter. The whole people is vnica, quia vnita: As she is one, she must be at one, not •arring, not repugnant to her self. Confusion belongs to Babel: Let peace dwell in the Palaces of Jerusalem. They are refractory spirits, unworthy to dwell in the Daughter of Zion's house, that are ever in preparation, for separation from her. The Church consists of a Communion of Saints, an united Flock under one shepherd, not a company of stragglings, getting schism, & forgetting their chrisme: the unity of the spirit, that makes men be of one mind in one house, But as the spirits in man cease to quicken any member sundered from the body, and the scattered bones in Ezekiel's vision received no life, till they were incorporate into a body. So the spirit of God, which is anima corporis, the soul of his mystical body, forbears the derivation of grace and comfort, to those that cut off themselves from it.

She is one, vna vnica, that is mother of us all. Though there be threescore Queens, and fourscore Concubines, and virgins without number: yet my dove my undefiled is but one, she is the only one of her mother, the choice one of her that bare her. There is one body, many members, 1. Cor. 12. The eye must not quarrel with the hand, nor the head with the foot, If we be one against another, let us beware, lest God be against all. We have one Lord, whose Livery is Love, John 15. (By this shall all men know that you are my Disciples, if ye have love one to another:) whose doctrine is peace, Ephes. 2. (He preached peace to you that were far off, and to them that were nigh:) Let us then serve him, professing one truth, with one heart. It is wretched, when sects vie number with Cities; and there are so many creeds as heads; Qui conantur vel corrumpere fidem, vel dirumpere charitatem, who strive either to corrupt faith or dissolve charity; none performing his function without faction. It is testified of those pure and primitive times, that the multitude of them that believed were of one heart, and of one soul. One mind in many bodies? Behold how good and pleasant a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity, saith the Psalmist, when inter multa corpora, non multa corda, as August-sweetly; when among diverse men there are not diverse minds: Sic viuentes in vnum, vt vnum bominem faciant, so loving and living together in one, that they all make but (as it were) one man.

There is no knot of love so sure, as that which Religion ties: It is able to draw together East and West, sea and land, and make one of two, of ten, of thousands, of all. This is that, which gathereth the saints together, not to a local, but mystical union; whereby they are compacted under the government of one Lord, tied by the bonds of one faith, washed from their sins in one laver, assigned, assured, assumed by one spirit, to the inheritance of one kingdom: but the unity of brethren agreeing, is not more entire, than their dissention, falling out is violent. Pro. 18. A brother offended is harder to be won, than a strong City: and their contentions are like the bars of a Castle: but their own loss is the enemies gain. It is usually seen, that (amicorum dispen[•]a, hostium compendia) dissention is a Lent to friends, a Christmas to foes. They that so labor to untie unity, that true-lovers knot, which every Christian heart should wear, and never be weary of; find at last by miserable experience, that destruction doth strive to follow, where distraction went before. When in stead of the right hands of fellowship, struck for consent, they like the Atheni[•]ns will sacrifice for none but themselves, and their neighbors of Chios. Needs must the Daughter of Israel be disquieted, when such opposites, like Rebeccas twins, struggle in her womb. If the distraction of voices hindered the building of Babel: needs must the distraction of hearts hinder the building of Jerusalem.

Behold ye working spirits that must be doing, though you have no thanks for your labor; behold the daughter of Zion, -opposed on both sides, as Christ was crucified betwixt two malefactors; straitened as the Host of Israel, once betwixt the Aramites and the Syrians (when Joab & Abishai disposed themselves to mutual help, as need required.) Atheists on one side, Papists on the other. Bend all your forces against them, that make breaches in the walls of Zion; and seek, ensue, procure the Peace of Jerusalem, who is the only Daughter of her Mother, and Spouse of her Savior.

I might here infer to your observation (without any non-residence from the Text) that the Church is called Filia Jerusalem, the daughter of the people, for her beauty, for her purity; I desire you to interpret by Church, not only that Church, then visible in the Jews, but the Catholic Church also, whereof theirs was but a part; many things being figuratively spoken of the particular, which properly belong to the universal. The Church of God (then and ever) may be called the daughter of Zion, for her virgins fairness, matchless by all the daughters of women. The Prophet in those solemn lamentations of Israel's ruin, gives her the title of Virgin, with this of daughter, Chap. 1. The Lord hath trodden the virgins, the daughter of Judah, as in a Winepress, and Chapter 2. What shall I equal to thee, that I may comfort thee, oh Virgin daughter of Zion? The holy promise of God for her restauration is recorded by the same Prophet. to her under this unstained title. Again I will build thee Oh Virgin of Israel; thou shalt again be adorned with thy tabarets and shalt go forth in the dances of them that make merry.

This may insinuate (intemeratam pulchritudinem Ecclesiae) the unpolluted beauty of the Church. So Christ testifieth of his elected Spouse, Cant. 4. Tota pulchra es amica mea, Thou art all fair, my love, and there is no spot in thee. Now beauty consists in a sweet variety of colors and in a concinne disposition of different parts. So the foreign congregations call her, the fairest among women: Whither is thy Beloved gone, oh thou fairest among women, that we may seek him with thee? For her simplicity she is called a Dove, for her fruitfulness a vine: Mount Zion for her steadfastness: for her royalty, she is called a Queen, for her brightness and eminence, an Ivory Tower: for her beauty, the fairest among women. As the Cedar in the forest. the lillie among the flowers of the valleys, Zion among the mountains, Jerusalem among the Cities; as Di[•]a among all the daughtees of the land, so the daughter of Judah among her sisters. None so fair as the Shunamite to content king David, none else can plead that the Son of David takes delight in her beauty. But the kings daughter is all glorious within, Omnis decor ab intus. It consists not in outward face, but in inward grace. How comes she thus fair? Here her speak of her self? I am black O ye daughters of Jerusalem, but comely as the tents of Kedar, as the curtains of Solomon. Black indeed by her own misery, white and fair by her Saviors mercy. Every soul is black by nature: originally soilde, actually spoiled. We have all primitiuam & priuatinum corruptionem, a penury corruption, that deprives us of all habitual goodness. We are borne Moors, and have increased this swarthisness, by the continual tanning of unceased sins. We have no nitre of our own virtual, enough to whiten us. Job had no water of snow, nor David of Hyssop, nor had the pool of Bethesda, though stirred with a thousand Angels, power to cleanse us. Let Nature do her best, we dwelt at the Sign of the Labor-in-vain. Only Christ hath washed $\langle \diamond \rangle$, that we might have part with him. A medicine of Water and blood, let out of the side of Jesus by a murdering spear hath made the daughter of Zion fair. In this sacred fountain hath Christ bathed her crimson sins and vlcerated sores; till she is become whiter then wool, or the driven snow. He made her fair, whom he found foul, that he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish. She must be pulchra, or not sponsa, to him that is higher then the heavens, and holier then the Angels. His Spouse must be no blowse: She is adorned by him, let him be adorned by her.

The useful benefit of this Observation teacheth us, to make way through our own natural wretchedness, to the admiration of our Saviors gracious goodness. He loved us tantillos & tales, paruos & prauos, so small in deserts, so vile in defects; without any precedent congruity, or subsequent cond•gnity, in nobis, quod à nobis, in our selves, that was or is of our selves: For all the beauty of S•ons daughter, is derived from God's son. Thy renown went forth among the Heathen for thy beauty: for it was perfect through my comeliness, which I had put upon thee, saith the Lord God. God said once to Jerusalem, Thy birth and thy Nati•ity is of the land of Canaan, Thy Father was an Amorite, and thy mother as i Iustite. None eye pitied thee, but thou wast cast out in the open field, to the loathing of thy person. But when I passed by thee, and •wor• thee polluted in thine own blo•d, I had compassion on thee: I washed thee with water, clothed thee with broidered wo•k, decked thee also with ornaments, put a Jewel on thy forehead, and a beautiful crown on thy head. We have all an Amorite to our Father, an H•ne to our mother; I mean, are concei•ed and borne in sin; to •ole, and full of corruption, that there could no temptation be shot from us, to wound the breast of Christ with love. Sported we were, and nothing but nakedness was left to cover us: sick, but without care of our own cure: deformed and luxate with the persecution of vanities; quadrupedated with an earthly, stooping, groping, groucling, covetousness: not only spotted and speckled (in concret•) but spots and blemishes, (in abstracto) pollution it self. As Micah calls Jerusalem and Samaria, not pec•antes, but peccata: What is the transgression of Jacob? Is it not Samaria and what are the high places of Judah? are they not Jerusalem? Or as Lucan speaks of the wounded body. Totum est pro vulnere corpus. The whole body is as one wound. Blood touched blood, and sore broke out into sore: all ulcers were coagulated into one by a general rupture; that even our righteousness was as filthy rags. Oh then how ugly were our sins! If old iniquities could provoke, or new ones revoke his favor, we had store to tempt him. If the raw and bleeding wounds of voluntary sins: if the halting foot of neutrality, the blear eye of ignorance, the ear deaf to his word, the tongue dumb in his praise: if the sullen brow of averseness, or the stinking breath of hypocrisy, (if these) could inflame his love, •oe our beauty.

What moved thee then. Oh Savior to love us? besides the incomprehensible delight, and infinite content, which God hath in himself; thousands of Angels stand about him, and ten thousands of those glorious spirits minister unto him, What then is man, Lord, that thou takest knowledge of him? or the son of man, that thou makest account of him? the meditation of Saint Augustine is pertinent to this consideration, and what son of man may not confess it with him? Neque enim equistime, aut egotale bonumsum, quo tu adi•veris: nec minor sit potestas tun carens obsequio men. Neither didst thou lack me, Oh Lord: nor was there that good in me, whereby thou mightest be helped: neither is thy power lessened through the want of my service. If we had been good yet God needed us not: being bad, whence ariseth his love? what a roughness of soul findest thou, Oh Christ, when though• embracest us? what deformity when thou beholdest us? what stench of sin when thou ku•est? when thou discoursest, what rotten speeches drop from us? when thou takest us into thy garden, what contrariety of affection to thy expectation? our embraces have been rougher then thy crosses, our persecutions like vinegar, hidden in the sponge of our sacrifices; our words swords, our oaths as bitter as crucifige, our kisses have been treasonable to thee; as Judas his: our contempts thy thorns: our oppressions a spear to gore thy side, and wound thy bowels.

Such was our kindness to thee, Oh blessed Redeemer when thou offeredst thyself to us, and to the Father for us The best thing in us, yea in the best man of us, had nothing of merit, nothing near it. Our wages is death; thy gift is life, bona naturae, melior gratiae, optima gloriae. Thou gavest us a good life of nature, thou gavest us a better of grace, thou wilt give us the best of glory. Whether it be pro via, or pro vita, for the way or the end, it is thy gratuital goodness, who hast promised of thy mercy, both donaere bonatua & condonare mala nostra, both to give us thy good things, and to forgive us our evil things, We had misery from our parents, and have been parents of our own greater misery, Miseri miserum in hanc lucis miseriam ⟨◇⟩ : Miserable parents have brought forth a miserable offspring into the misery of this world. And for our selves, even when we were young in years, we had an ⟨◇⟩ about us, Tantillus p•er, tantus pec••tor. A little child a great sinner. Sic generant pater ⟨...⟩ regenera••nt p•ter casstis, So wretched our generation left us, so blessed our regeneration hath mad us. So beggarly were we, till Christ enriched us.

If you ask still, what moved Christ? I answer his own free mercy, working on our great misery. A fit object for so infinite a goodness to work on. He was not now to part a sea, or bring water out of a Rock, or rain Bread from heaven, but to conquer Death by death, to break the head of the Leviathan, to ransom captives from the power of hell to satisfy his own justice for sin; and all this by giving his own Son to die for us; by making him man, who was the maker of man. This was dignus vindice nodus, a work worth the greatness and goodness of God.

Decet enim magnum magna facere. For it becometh him that is Almighty, to do mighty works. Thus to make the Daughter of Jerusalem fair, cost the Son of God the effusion of his blood.

This gives us strong consolation. Qui dilexit pollutos, non deseret politos. He that loved us when we were not, when we were naught, will not now loose us, whom he hath bought with his death, interested to his life Having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end. vsque ad finem, nay absque fine, unto the end, in the end, without end. He will not neglect David in the Throne, that did protect him in the fold. He that visited Zacchaeus a sinner will not forsake him a Saint. If he bore affection to us in our rags, his love will not leave us, when highted with his righteousness, and shining with his rewels. If Ruth were lovely in the eyes of Boz, gleaning after the Reapers, what is she, made Mistress of the Harvest? He never meant to loose us, that laid out his blood to purchase us. Satan hath no trick to deceive him of us, us of him. As he had no power, to prevent the first, so none against the second Redemption. Christ was Agnus in passion, but Leo in R•surrection: a lamb suffering death, but a Lion rising from death. If he could save us being a Lamb, he will not suffer us to be lost, being a Lion. Fear not thou daughter of Zion; he that chose thee sick, sinful, rebellious, will preserve thee sound, holy, his friend, his Spouse. There is neither death, nor life, nor principalitie: nor power, nor h•ght, nor depth that shall be able to separate us from his love, or pluck us out of the arms of his mercy. But tremble ye wicked; if ye have not fought in his Campe, you shall never shine in his Court.

To press this point too far, 1. were but to write Iliades after the Homers of our Church, 2. Besides there are many that offer to sit down in this chair before they come at it, and presume of God, that they shall not be forsaken, when they are not yet taken into his favor. Enow would be saved by this privilege, if there were no more matter in it, then the pleading of it. But in vain doth the beggars son boast himself of the blood royal, or the wicked soul of partaking the divine nature, when he cannot demonstrate his adoption, by his sanctification So that as we give comfort to them that except themselves; so terror to them that accept themselves, when God doth not, make sure to thy soul, that thou art once God's; and my life for thine, thou shalt ever be his.

Lastly, from this titular phrase observe, that the daughter of Jerusalem, is our mother Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . The holy Church is our mother, if the most holy God be our Father. She feeds us with sincere milk from her two breasts, the scriptures of both the Testaments; those Oracles which God hath committed to her keeping. God doth beget us of unmortal seed, by the word which liveth and abideth forever; but not without the womb of the Church. Non enim nascimur, •edrenascimur Christian•: we are not Christians by our first, but by our second birth. Neither is she the mother of all, but us all, whom God hath chosen before all time, and called in time to himself, Qui sic sunt in dom• Dei, vt ipsi sint dom•s Dei, who are so in the House of God, that themselves are the house of God. He that overcometh I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the City of my God, which is now Jerusalem, that cometh out of heaven from my God.

So that à quo dominatio, ab •o denominatio, our name is given us, according to her name that cherisheth, and is Mother unto us. Hence every believing soul is a daughter of Jerusalem, and a spouse of Christ. Anima credentis est sponsa redimentis. The soul of him that believes, is the spouse of him that saves. As a multitude is but a heap of unites; so the Church is a congregation of Saints. And as that which belongs to the body, belongs to every member: so the privileges of our mother Jerusalem, are the prerogatives of all her children: not only the daughter of Zion her self, but every daughter of hers, every faithful soul, 'is a pure virgin, and so to be presented to Jesus Christ. As Paul to his particular Church of Corinth: I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy: for I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ. Mans soul is of an excellent nature, and like a beauteous damsel hath many Suitors.

1. First, the Devil, who comes like an old dotard, neatly tricked and licked up: his wrinkled hide smoothed and sleeked with temptations; he comes ever masked, and dares not show his face. Take away his visor, and the soul is worse then a witch that can affect him. And as when he tempts wretched Sorceresses to some real covenant with him, he assumes the form of familiar and unfear'd creatures; left in a horrid and strange shape they should not endure him. So in his spiritual circumventions, for the more facile, fly and suspect•esse insinuation into mortal hearts; He transforms himself into an Angel of light.

The promises of this Sutour are large and fair; he offers the soul, if it will be his spouse, a greater Jointure. Judas shall have money, Esau pleasures, Nabal plenty. Christ himself shall be ioyn•t•u'd in many kingdoms, but ever he indents, that we must love him, and join with him in marriage. Doeg shall have a place in the court so he will malign God's Priests. Pilate shall be Judge, so he will ply his usury hard. The Proctor shall be made an Eccle•asticall Judge. if he will promise more connivance, then conscience, and suffer Master bribery to give the censure. Every Bal•am shall be promoted, that is readier to curse, then bless the people.

These things to the wicked doth Satan form in speculation, though not perform in action. He is an ill wooer that wanteth words. Hear his voice, and see not his face; believe his promises, and consider him not as a liar, as a murderer, and he will go near to carry thy heart from all. But he that hath two infirmities, nay enormities that betray him: a stinking breath, and a halting foot.

1 For his breath, though it smell of sulphur, and the hot steam of sin and hell, yet he hath art to sweeten it. So he can relish covetise with thrift•nes, voluptuousness with good diet, idleness with good quiet, drunkenness, because it is very sour, fulsome, and odious •u•n to nature and reason, shall be seasoned, sweetened with good fellowship. Malice is the argument of a noble Spirit, and murder the maintenance of reputation. Lust is the direction of nature, and swearing a graceful testimony to the truth of our speeches. With such luscious confections he labors to conserve his lungs from stinking If it were not for those mists and shadows, sin would want both fautors and factors.

2 But his lame foot cannot be hidden (as they once foolishly fabled among the vulgar, that his cloven foot could not be changed) for his disobedience is manifest. If he saith, Steal, and God saith, Thou shalt not steal: Swear, when God saith, Swear not, dissemble, when he cries, Woe against hypocrites: be an usurer, when God saith, thou shalt not then dwell in my glory: what pretences soever gloss his Text, his lameness cannot be hidden. All his policy cannot devise a boot to keep him from this halting. This is the first & worst Sutour.

2 The World comes in like a blustering Captain, with more nations on his back, then crowns in his purse, or (at least) virtues in his conscience. This wooer is handsomely breasted, but ill backed: better to meet, then to follow: for he is all vanity before, all vexation behind, by the witness of him that tried and knew him. Sometimes trouble follows him, but surely follows him. The desire of money is the root of all evil, which while sons coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. He is like a Bee or an Epigram, all his sting is in his tail. He is troubled with a thousand diseases, and is attended on with more plagues, then ever was Galens study. He is now grown exceeding old, and hath but a few minutes to live. He is decayed both in stature and nature: especially he is troubled with a stooping, and a stopping, a stooping in his joints, a stopping in his lungs. He neither hath an upright face, nor a light heart.

1 For the former, he is ever poring on the earth, as if he had no other heaven, or were set to dignity there for Paradise. His eye never looks up to heaven, but to observe what weather it will be. This is his curuitie, he is a warped, aged and decrepit Sutour. There is no straitness in him.

2 For the other, he cannot be lightsome, because he never did give good conscience one nights lodging which only, truly, can make the heart merry. He strives to be merry, but his mirth is madness. He cannot dance unless vanity be his mate, and iniquity his Minstrel. All his joy is vel in vitys, vel in diuitiis, either in his wealth, or his wickedness. He cannot be merry, if God be in the company. For the good only keep Christmas all the year in their conscience, though not at their table. He hath three inducements to persuade, and three defects to dissuade the soul from accepting his love. If the former induce any to him, let the latter reduce them from him.

1. His first allurement is a mellifluous language, able to blanch mischief. His words drop Nectar, as if he had been brought up at Court. And by his Logic he can make quidlibet ex quolibet, anything of everything: so by his Rhetoric he can make (stones) hard hearted worldlings dance to his pipe, as it is fabled of Orpheus, Cusus ex ore non tam vera, quam mella fluunt, as I have read of Origem. Every syllable is like a drop of honey from his lips. Magicis verborum viribus, quasi transformat homines. There lies a magic in his tempt•ng speech, able to enchant, and transform men's hearts, making a voluptuous man a hog, an oppressor, a Wolf, the lustful a Goat, the Drunkard a Devil. His arguments are not empty, but carry the weight of golden eloquence, the musical sound of profit and pleasure.

2 Besides his captiuing elocution, he mends the ill fabric of his person with rich accoutrements. He wears all his clothes, as Saint Paul saith, in the fashion. He hath change of suites. He puts on pride, when he goes to the Court: Bribery, when he goes to the Hall: Ebriety, when to a Tavern: Prodigality, when he shuffles in among Gallants: Usury, when he would walk in the Exchange: & Oppression, when he would ride down into the Country. Only, Avarice is the girdle of his loins, he is never without it. It is fashion, to be of any fashion, & to apply himself to thy humor, whom he courts. He hath a suit to speed of his suite, to please thy affection.

3 This is not all, he tenders thee a fair and large jointure. Give him but marriage, and he will give thee maintenance. Iura, periura, Defraude, dissemble, swear, for swear, bribe, flatter, temporize; make use of all men, love only thyself; and riches (with preferment in his company) shall seek thee out. Thou shalt hazard no Straights, climb no Alps, prison not thyself in a study, nor apprentice thy life to the wars: entertain but the world for thy husband, and thou art out of all hunger and cold: wealth shall come trolling in evē whiles thou sleepest. (But happy is he, that can be rich with honesty, or poor with content.) These are the glories, whereof he would enamour thee: thus would he possess thee with his possessions. But he hath three deterrings: hear them.

- 1 He hath sore eyes, blear and raw with cares: for he is ever in expectation, either of remedy to griefs, or supply to wants. What opulency can boast immunity from sorrow, exemption from crosses? And such is the secure worldlings impatience, when once angered with afflictions, that a little misery makes him greatly miserable He makes his yoke the more troublous to him, because he hath not learned to draw quietly in it. Though he hath already more than enough, he keeps his eyes sore, with seeking for addition. In the quest of wealth he denies himself rest. Needs must his eyes be sore that sleepeth not. This is one disease incident to the world.
- 2 He hath swollen legs, diseased with surfeits. For the world comprehends more than covetousness, by the testimony of S. John: The lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, the pride of life is of the world. We renounced in our Baptism with the world, poms and vanities Riot, lust, intemperance, Epicureanism, dissoluteness are members of the world as well as avarice. Tam I say, if not tantum. And therefore our Savior by that terrible sentence against rich men intends not covetousness for a sole and singular obstacle, (yield it a principal) but pride, ambition, lust, vain-glory, luxury, the effects of an opulent state, as well as covetise. There are more burdens to load the Camel when he should pass through the small postern of Grace, (that needless eye) then only avarice affections. What lesson of vice is not the rich man apt to learn? Therefore this makes the world have swollen legs, as the other sore eyes. He is blind, he is lame, both ill qualities in a Sutour.
- 3 He hath a very weak tenur of all he possesseth, he is God's tenant at will, & hath lease of nothing, but durante Domini been placito, during the great Landlord of heaven & earth his favor. At utmost, his hold is but for term of life; & that a warish, short, and transient life, scarce so long as the first line of an indenture. Nay, he, hath right to nothing; for he holds not in Capite, from the Lord of all, Jesus Christ. Therefore every worldling shall be accountant, for each crumb of bread, and drop of water, which they have received. For the right of the creatures lost in the first Adam, cannot be recovered, but by the second. So that he enters on them as an Intruder, and possesseth them as an Usurper his title being so bad, his tenure is certain in nothing, but in being uncertain. Sic transit gloria mundi: So the fashion of this world passeth away. What soul soever marries him, either he leaves his wife, or his wife must leave him, without ever being satisfied.

You see then the fraudulent proffers of your personable wooer, the world. What is there in him, that any daughter of Jerusalem should affect him? Only be you simple as Doves, in not loving him, but wise as Serpents, in living by him. Love not the world, saith Saint John: yet make use of it saith Saint Paul, Vtere mundo, fruero Deo: Use the world, but enjoy God: for the world, waxeth old as a garment, and fadeth away; but Jesus Christ yesterday, and today, and the same forever. The world, like fire, may be a good servant, will be an ill Master. Make it thy slave, it is not good enough to be thy husband. How base is it, for a freewoman to marry her servant.

3 The third is the Flesh. This Sutour comes boldly in, like a home-borne child, and hopes to speed for old acquaintance. He can plead more then familiarity. even inherence, inheritance of what nature hath left us. He is not only collateral, but connatural to us. One house hath held us, one breath served us, one nutriment fed us, ever since one conception bred us. Like Hippocrates twins we should have inseparably lived together, and loved together, if the prerogative Court of grace and mercy had not divorced us. And even in the sanctified, this impudent, wooer cannot be quite shaken off, till death shall at once deliver that to death, us to life. For though with the mind, I delight in the law of God; yet I see another law in my members rebelling against the law of my mind, and bringing me unto captivity to the law of sin. His company is wearisome, his solicitings tedious, to the virgins-daughter of Zion. Oh wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord. So then with the mind we serve the Law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin.

He will perpetually urge his suit; and not after many rejections be said nay. Thy soul cannot be rid of him, so long as thou holdest him in any hope of success. And so long he will hope, as thou givest him a cold and timorous denial. Suitors are drawn on with an easy repulse, & take that as half granted, that is but faintly opposed. In whom this wooer prevails least, he wearies him with importunity, till a peremptory answer hath put him out of heart. The wavering and weakly-resisting spirit cannot sleep in the Chamber of quiet: whiles innumerable lusts (which are the solicitors and spokesmen of the flesh) beat at the door with their early knocks: pressing more impudently for audience, then instruments of villainy to Machianell, or wronged Clients to an Advocate. Remiss answers provoke his fiercer attempts. He is shameless, when he meets not with a bold heart. He thinks that though

Pugnabit primo fortassis, & improbe dicet,

Pugnando vinci se tamen illa volet.

Though at the first the Soul refuse to yield,

She means on further strife to loose the field.

Only resolution can make him give back, give over.

His insinuations are many, 1. by promises. Pollicitis diues. He is neither a beggar, nor a niggard in promising They are the cheapest chaffer, a man can part withal, 2. By tedious and stintless solicitations, as if time could win thee.

Quid magis est durum saxo: quid mollius vnda?

Dura tamen teneris saxa cauantur aquis.

The stone is very hard, the water soft,

Yet doth this hollow that, by dropping oft.

As if the strongest sort were not long able to hold out, 3. By shadow (by real proffers) of friendship, Tut a frequensque via est, per amici fallere nomen, It is a safe and common way: by name of friendship to show false play. It was not mine enemy (saith David) but my familiar friend, that did me the mischief. 4. By tendering to the soul, pleasing and contentful objects, as if

—non vincere possit

Flumina, si contra quàm rapit vnda, na•et.

The floods would easily master him,

If he against the stream should swim.

Therefore he forms his insidious baits to our inclinations, diversifieth his lusts according to the variety of our humors. Hic Procus innumeris moribus aptus crit. This Wooer can vary his Protean forms, observe all strains, reserve and conceal his own, till he be sure, that the pill he gives will work.

This Sutour is dangerous, and prevails much with the soul: a handsome fellow if you pluck off his skin: for this saith Saint Jude, is spotted all over. A virgin well natured, well nurtured, that sets ought by herself, will not fasten her love on a lazar, leper, or ulcerous Moore. Why then. Oh why should the soul, so heavenly generate thus become degenerate, as to wed her affections to the polluted flesh. God, indeed, once married the soul to the body, the Celestial to a terrene nature, but to the lusts of the body, which Paul calls the flesh, he never gave his consent. This clandestine match was made without the consent of Parents, of God our Father, of the church our mother; therefore most sinful, most intolerable. Cashier then this sawey Sutour, who (like some riotous younger brother, with some great heir) promiseth much, both of estate and love; but once married, and made Lord of all, soon consumes all to our final undoing. He breaks open the Cabinet of our heart, and takes out all the Jewels of our graces; and stints not his lavishing, till he hath beggared us. This is the third Sutour.

4 The last and best, and only worthy to speed is Jesus Christ. What is thy beloved more than another beloved, O thou fairest among women: Say foreign Congregations to the Church. To whom she answers: My beloved is white and ruddy (he hath an exact mixture of the best colors, arguments of the purest and healthfullest complexion.) The chiefest among ten thousand; (Infinitely fairer than all the sons of men; who, alone may bear the standard of comely grace, and personal goodliness among all.) His head is as the most fine gold; (the Deity which dwelleth in him, is most pure and glorious,) His locks are curled, and black as a Raven, (his godhead deriving to his human nature such wondrous beauty, as the black curled locks become a fresh and well favored countenance) His eyes are like doves, &c. who will, let him there read and regard his graces: His name is as ointment poured forth, therefore do the Virgins love him.

He hath 1 a rich Wardrobe of righteousness to apparel us, 2. a glorious house, a City of gold to entertain us; whose foundation is Jasper and Sapphire, and such precious stone; the least of them richer then ten Escurials, 3. His Jointure is Glory, Jointure I may call it, for so we are with him joined heirs, though not joined purchasers. If the house of this World be so esteemed, wherein God lets his enemies dwell; what is the mansion he hath provided for himself, and his Spouse, the daughter of Zion• 4. His fruition is sweet and blessed, ob eminentiam, ob permanentiam, for perfection, for perpetuity, a Kingdom, and such a one, as cannot be shaken, which no sin, like a politic Papist shall blow up, no sorrow like a turbulent Atheist shall invade.

This Soutour is only beautiful, only bountiful: let him possess your souls, which with his blood he bought out, and with his power brought out from Captivity, for him am I deputed wooer at this time, (for as though God did beseech you through us we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God,) who would fain •present your souls pure Virgins to Jesus Christ Forebear the prostitution: of them to any ravisher, to any sin: For peccare to sin, in the literal word, is to commit adultery: quasipellicare, id est cum pellice cire. Christ lays just Title to you: give yourselves from yourselves to him: you are not your own, unless you be his.

We have heard the Daughter of Zion described, qua sit: let us now hear cuus sit, the daughter of my people saith the Lord. God was pleased with that Title, the God of Israel His own Scriptures frequently give it him, Ierem. 32. Thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel, &c. The children are usually called after the name of then Father: here the Father is content to be called after the name of his children. The God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, &c. So Darius proclaims in his decree: The God of Daniel, Esa. 44 One shall say, I am the Lord's, and another shall call himself by the name of Jacob, and another shall subscribe with his hand unto the Lord, and surname himself by the name of Israel. Thus saith the King of Israel, &c. And Esa. 45. For Jacob my servants sake, and Israel mine Elect, I have even called thee by thy name: I have surnamed thee, though thou hast not known me. Here might be inferred the inutterable compassion of God to Israel. It is my people, that is thus sick. But I have not scanted this observation before.

That which I would now direct my speech, and your attention to, is the strangeness of this complaint; agrotat Israel. Others to have been sick, not so rare. It had been no wonder in Egypt, Ammon, Edom, Babylon, Israel hath the best means for health, therefore the more inexcusable her sickness. They should have been so mannered, as they were manured; and brought forth grapes according to their dressing: Sidon shall judge Chorazin; Niniuch Jerusalem; In Sidon where was no Prophet, was less wickedness: in Nineveh, where less prophesying, greater repentance. This conviction was demonstrated in many particulars. The praise of the Centurion, is the shame of Israel. The mercy of the Samaritan, the Priests and Levites condemnation. The very dogs licking Lazarus sores, confute the stony bowels of Dives.

The returning of the strange Leper, with a song of thanksgiving in his mouth, was an exprobration to all the nine; when Christ had the tythe of a person, he least expected.

God reproacheth this daughter of Zion, Ezek. 16: that Samaria and Sodo••e were of her Sisterhood, yea, as if their abominations were a very little thing, thou wast corrupted more then they in all thy ways. Nay; thou hast justified thy sisters, in that their abominations came short of thine, by the one half? The people of thy holiness, as the Prophet Isaiah calls them, are become by the same Prophets testimony, a sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity. They that were not called by thy name, are not so rebellious. E• sunt deteriores, quo meliores Deus reddere conatus est. It is grievous, that God's goodness should make men worse; and the more kind God hath been to them, the more unkind they should be to themselves, the more unthankfull to him. Christ for the Jews turned their water into wine: the Jews for Christ, turned their wine into vinegar, & offered it him to drink. They that were the richest of God's own making, became the most bankrout sin religion. They changed Cathedrā magistery, wherein God placed their Doctors, in sodem pestilentiae, into the scorners chair, contemning his benefits: they had a Vineyard at an easy rate, yet paid no fruits of obedience. It is hard to say, whether God was more gracious to them, or they more grievous to him. This boldly, never was more piery required with less piety. God sowed mercy, and reaped a crop of iniquity.

God can brook this in none, but as he forsook his Temple in Zion, when it became a den of thieves, so he will take out his ornaments where with he graced the temple of the soul, when we set up the Dagon of this world in it; and withdraw his riches, as from a divorced Spouse, running after other lovers. Whiles Adam served God, God served him; he provides for him a ⟨◇⟩ a companion, and sustentation. We read of nothing, that God did six days together (and his works were not small nor few) but work for Adam; as if he had been hired to labor for him: Is it not strange that such a child should rebel to such a father? Let none think, his fault was small, in eating an apple, or that his punishment weighed heavier then his trespass. His sin was so much the greater, because against a God (and) so good unto him. The more gloriously the Sun and Summer have apparrelled a tree, the more we admire the blazing; when God hath planted a soul in his own holy ground, watered it with those sacred, purifying dew of his graces, shone on it with the radiant beams of his soul reviving mercies, spent much (& opera & olei) both of care and cost upon it; and hath his expectation required, abused with a mere flourish of seaues; with either (anequam, ornequic quam fructus) none or evil fruits; there goes out a curse, Never fruit grow on thee more. When God hath put his grace into our unworthy vessels, how abusive is it, to empty our selves of that precious liquor, and swell our spirits with the poison of hell? How just is it with him to take away, what he gave, Luke 8. and to put a consumption into our vital parts? Hence (without wonder) our judgment rusts, like a never drawn sword: our knowledge looseth the relish, like the Jews putrefied Manna. Our faith dissolves as a cloud, our zeal trembles, as if held with a palsy; our love freezeth the harder, as water that once was warm. Our repentance turns to ice, & our hope to snow: which the heat of affliction melts to water, not to be gathered up; the image of death is upon all our religion.

Was this strange in Israel; and is it nothing in England: Look upon the inhabitants of the earth, somewhat remote from us, to whose face the Sun of the Gospel hath not yet sent his rays; people blinded with ignorance, blended with lusts. What were our desires or deserts, former matter or latter merit, congruity before conversion, or condignity after, more than they might show; that God should put us into the Horizon of his Grace? whiles they sit in darkness and shade of death? Want they nature, or the strength of flesh? are they not tempered of the same mortar? are not their heads upward toward heaven? have they not reasonable souls, able for comprehension, apt for impression, if God would set his Seal on them, as well as we? Are they not as likely for flesh and blood, provident to forecast, ingenuous to invent, active to execute, if not more than we? Why have we that star of the gospel, to light us to Christ Jesus, standing over our Country, whiles they neither see it, nor seek it: It is clearly, merely God's mercy. Now why are our lives worse, our knowledge is better? Why devour we their venom, refusing our own healthful food; whiles they would feed on our crumbs, and have it not. Woe unto us, if we scant God of our fruits, that hath not scanted us of his blessings.

Bring presents to the King of glory; ye children of his holiness, and worship before him. Endanger not yourselves to the greater misery, by abusing his great mercy. He hath loved us much and long in our election, when we could not love him: in our redemption, when we would not love him. His love was not merited by ours: let our love be deserved, inflamed by his. If God prevent us with love, we can do no less than answer him in the same nature, though not (it is impossible) in the same measure. Publicans will love those, that love Publicans. The Poet could say,

Ut prastem Pyladen, aliquis mihi praestet Oreslen,

Hoc non sit verbis: Marce, vt ameris <◇> .

Give me Orestes, I shall Pylades prove,

Then truly, that thou mayest be loved, love.

But God loved us, even being his enemies, Eitu charitas est substantia, nostra accidentalis. His love is a substance, ours only accidental. His, ignis accendens, ours ignis accensu. His love is that holy fire, that enkindles ours. If we return not our little mite of love for his great treasures, his great love shall turn to great anger; and we shall fare the worse that ever, we fared sowl. God (as he hath advanced us into his favor) so hath he set us as a light on a hill; among the Nations: if darkness be on the hill, what light can be in the valley? A small scar on the face is eminent. If one eye-brow be shaued, how little is taken from the body, how much from the beauty? We are now the worlds envy; oh let us not become their declamation.

Is the daughter of God's people sick? it may then be inferred, that the Church may be sick, though not die and perish; die it cannot. The blood of an eternal king bought it, the power of an eternal spirit, preserves it; the mercy of an eternal God shall crown it. The heathens have imagined to vaunt themselves and daunt us, with the downfall of our Church. Ad certum tempus sunt Christiani, postea perihunt, r•dibunt Idola, & quod fuit antea. These Christians are but for a time, then they shall perish, and our Idols shall be returned to their former adoration. To whom that father replies: Verum in cum expectas, miser Infidelis, vt transeunt Christiani, trās is ipse sine Christianis. But whilst thou O wretched Insulei, expectest the Christians to perish, thou doest perish thy self, and leave them safe behind thee. Whiles they boast in their self flatteries, that we had a time to begin, and shall have a time to continue, themselves vanish and we remain to praise the Lord our God from generation to generation. Indeed, Matth. 15. Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up: But whom he loves, forever he loves. Yet may his Church while it is not freed from militancy be very sick in the visible body of it. Aegrotat Israel, yet in Israel was the true Church of God. It was so sick in Elias time, that Rom. 11. he complaineth, Lord they have killed thy Prophets, and digged down thine altars, and I am left alone, and they seek my life. The Church was sick you see; yet the next verse of God's answer frees it from being dead, I have reserved to myself seven thousand men, that never bowed the knee to the Image of Baal.

What Church since hath been so happy, as to joy in her freedom from this cause of complaint? The Church was from the beginning, shall be to the end without limitation of time, of place. Yet she is a Garden, (Cant 4. A garden enclosed is my sister, my spouse) sometime by diligence kept neat and clean, sometimes by negligence over-run with weeds. She is a Moon, est clear and beautiful, est waning and waxing dark esome. Die then it cannot, be sick it may. Time was, saith Chrysostom, that Ecclesiacalum fuit, spiritu cuncta administrant &c. The Church was a heaven, the holy Spirit governing all things &c. Now the very steps and tokens thereof do but scarcely remain. Mali prosiciunt, boni deficiunt: Wickedness grows strong, goodness faints. The lambes are few, the goats swarm,

Little faith shall be found,

When the last trumpe shall sound.

We have read often the Church compared to a body, Cuius caput Christus, whose head is Jesus Christ. In the 4. 10 the Ephesians, we have it likened to a man, Cuius anima Christus, whose soul is Christ. Till we all come to a perfect man &c. Now the soul increaseth in a man, not augmentatively, but secundum vigorem; transfusing into the body her virtual powers and operations more strongly. Christ is (semper Idem objective, subjective, effective, ever the same in himself, and to us: but this body grows up with the head, this man with the soul, this Church increaseth with the increasing of God. Sickness then to the Church cannot be mortal, yet may the body be distempered: her doctrine may be sound, her members want health. Why is not the health of the daughter &c.

But to descend from the universal to a particular, from the invisible to a visible Church; this may be sick, 1. Either by some inbred distemperature, 2. or by the accession of some outward malady. There may be grievances in either respect, to afflict the daughter of Israel.

1 Inwardly, Corruption may gather on it by degrees, & put it in need of physic. For as the natural body of man, when it is over charged in the veins and parts with rank and rotten humors, which it hath gathered by misdiet, surfeiting, or infest airs; the man grows dangerously sick, til by some fit evacuation he can be discharged of that burden. So the body of a Church being infected with humors, and swollen with tumours of unsound doctrine, of unsounder life, superstitious ceremonies, corrupting the vital pores and powers thereof: troubled with the cold shakings of indevotion, or taken with the numbness of induration, or terrified with windy passions of turbulent spirits. cannot be at ease, till due reformation hath cured it. Now such a Church sometimes is more swelling in bigness, & oftents a more bulky show; but once truly purged of such crude superfluities, it becomes less great and numerous, but withal more sound, apt and fit for spiritual promotions.

Our particular Church of England, now fined from the dross of Rome, had a true substantial being before, but hath gotten a better being, by the repurgation wrought by the Gospel, maintained of our Christian Princes, the true defenders of the faith of Christ. God had doubtless his Church among us before; for it is Catholic and universal: but his floor was full of chaff. The Papists demand where our Church was before Luther's time. We answer, it lay hid under a great bulk of chaff: and Mat. 3. since Christ vouchsafed to come with his fan to purge it of the chaff, it now shows it self with greater eminence, and is clearer both in show and substance. It was before a wedge of pure gold, but coming into the hands of impostors, was by their mixtures & sophistications, for gain and such sinister respects, augmented into a huge body and mass, retaining still an outward fair show and tincture of gold. They demand, where was the gold? demonstrate the place. I answer in that Mass. But for the extracting thereof, and purifying it from dross, God hath given us the true touchstone, his sacred Word, which can only manifest the true Church: and withal reverend Bishops, and worthy Ministers, that have been instruments to refine & purge it from the dross of superstitions, foul ceremonies, and juggling inventions.

The Papists brag themselves the true ancient Church, and tax ours of novelty, of heresy. But we justly tell them, that Ecclesienomen tenent, & contra Ecclesiam dimicant; that they usurp the name of the Church, yet persecute it. For the truth of our Church, we appeal to the Scriptures. Nolo humanis documentis, sed diuinis oraculis sanctam Ecclesiam demonstrari: It is fit the holy Church should be proved rather by divine oracles, then human precepts or traditions. We stand not upon numbers (which yet, we bless God, are not small) but upon truth. You see, as the Church of the Jews, so any particular Church may be sick inwardly. To describe these internal diseases, I will limite them into 4.

- 1 Error, indeed Heresy cannot possess a Church, but it gives a subversion to it. Errare possum, Hereticus esse non Possum, saith that Father, I may err, an heretic I cannot be. Now, Quic quid contra veritatem sapit, heresis est, etiam vetus consuetudo. What is diametrically opposed against the Truth, is heresy, yea though it be an ancient and long received custom. But Logic, which is a reasonable discourse of things, shows a great difference between diuersae and contraria. A Church may be sick of error, and yet live: but heresy (a willful error against the fundamental truth, violently prosecuted and persisted in, kills it. Therefore Haeresis potius mors, quam morbus: Heresy is rather death then sickness. When the truth of doctrine or rather doctrine of truth, hath been turned to the falsehood of Heresy. God hath removed their Candlestick, & turned their light into darkness. Error may make it sick, but so that it may be cured. The Churches of Corinth, Galatia, Pergamos had these sicknesses: the holy Ghost by Paul and John prescribeth their cures. If they had been dead, what needed any direction of Physic? If they had not been sick, to what tended the prescription of their remedy.

To God alone, and to his majestical word, be the impossibility of erring. That Church that man shall in this err palpably, that will challenge an immunity: whosoever thinks, he cannot err, doth in this very persuasion err extremely. I know there is a man on earth, a man of earth, (to say no more) that challengeth this privilege. Let him prove it. Give him a term ad exhibendum, and then for want of witness ho may write, Teste meipso, as Kings do, Witness our self, &c. Nay ask his Cardinals, Friars, Jesuits. This is somewhat to the Proverb, Ask the son• if the Father be a thief. But he cannot err in his definitive sentence of Religion. Then belike he hath one spirit in his consistory, and another at home: and it may in some sort be said of him, as Salust of Cicero. Al•d stan•, aliud sedens de Republica loquitur. He is of one opinion sitting, of another standing. Let God be true, but every man a liar. One of their own said; Omnis homo errare potest in side, etiamsi Papa sit: Any man may err in faith, yea though he were the Pope. If they will have Rome a sanctuary, let them take along with them Petrarcha's catathresicall speech, calling it a Sanctuary of Errors. What particular Church then may not err? now can it err, and be sound? Bee the error small, yet the ache of a finger keeps the body from perfect health. The greater it is the more dangerous. Especially, 1. either when it possesseth a vital part, and affecteth, infecteth the Rulers, of the Church. It is ill for the feet, when the Head is giddy, 2. or when it is infectious and spreading, violently communicated from one to another, 3. or when it carries a color of truth. The most dangerous vice, is that which bears the countenance, and wears the cloak of virtue, 4. or when it is fitted to the humor, and seasoned to the relish of the people. Sedition, affectation, popularity, covetousness, are enough to drive an error to an heresy. So the disease may prove a Gangrene, and then enserecidendum, ne pars sinceratrabatur: no means can save the whole, but cutting off the incurable part: Pereat vnus potius quam vnitas.

- 2 Ignorance is a sore sickness in a Church, whether it be in the superior or subordinate members. Especially when the Priests lips preserve not knowledge. Ill goes is with the body when the $\langle \phi \rangle$ are blind. Devotion without instruction often winds it self into superstition. When learnings head is kept under Avarices girdle, the land grows sick. Experience hath made this conclusion too manifest. Our forefathers felt the terror and tyranny of this affliction; who had golden Challices, and wodden Priests, that had either no Art, or no heart to teach the people. Sing not, thou Roman Syr•n, that Ignorance is the damme of devotion, to breed it: it is rather a damme to stifle, restrain and choke it up. Blindness is plausible to please men, not possible to please God. Grant that ourfaults in the light, are more heinous then theirs who wanted true knowledge. Ex furibus enim leges eos grauius puniunt, qui interdii furantur: For the laws do punish those thieves most severely, that fear not even by day to commit outrages. Yet in all reason, their sins did exceed in number, who knew not when they went awry or what was amisle.

Rome hath (by a strange and incredible kind of doctrine) gone about to prove that the health, which is indeed the sickness, of a Church, Ignorance. Their Cardinal Cusaen faith, that Obedientia irrationalis est consummata obedientia & perfectissima, &c. Ignorant obedience, wanting reason, is the most absolute and perfect obedience. Chrysostom gives the reason, why they so oppose themselves against reason, Haeretici sacerdotes Claudunt ianuas veritatis, &c. Heretical Priests shut up the gates of Truth: For they know that upon the manifestation of the Truth, their Church would be soon forsaken. If the light which maketh all things plain, should shine out, Tunc hi qui prius decipiebant: nequaqua ad populum accodere valebunt, post quam se senserint intellectos: then they who before cozened the people, could preserve their credits no longer, being now smelt out and espied. Hence the people aim at Christ, but either short or gone, and not with a just Ieuell. But Nemo de Christo credat nisi quod Christus de se credi voluit. Let no man believe other thing of Christ then what Christ would have believed of himself. Non minus est Deum fingere, quam negare, saith Hilary. It is no less sin to fain a new God, then to deny the true God. The Priests call the people Swine, and therefore must not have those precious pearls. And so the people (Amant ignorare, malunt nescire, quod iam oderunt,) had rather continue ignorant, as not loving to know those things, which they cannot love, because they know not.

But alas, Ignorance is so far from sanity and sanctity, that it is a spilling and killing sickness. Men are urged to read the Scriptures, that never emptied Treasur-house of knowledge: they answer, Non sum. Monachus, vxorem habeo, & curam domus, I am no Priest, I have a wife, and a domestical charge to look to. This is that Pestilence (no ordinary sickness) that infects to death many souls; to think that knowledge belongs only to Priests. This is a work of the Devils inspiration, not suffering us to behold the treasure, least we grow rich by it. Dices non legi, non est haec excusario, sed crimen: Thou sayest I have not read: this is no excuse but a sin. The Romists stick not, as once the Valentinian heretics (veritatis ignorantiam, cognitionem vocare) by a Paradox, Pseudodoxe, to call the ignorance of the truth, the true knowledge thereof. Like those, Wisd. 14. that living in a war of ignorance, those so great plagues they called peace. But Quia quae sunt Domini nesciunt, a Domino nesciuntur: They that will not know the Lord, shall not be known of the Lord. It is objected, 1. Cor. 8, Knowledge puffeth up. Let Iraeneus expound it. Non quod veram scientiam de Deo culparet, alioquin seipsum primum accusaret, Not that he blamed the true knowledge of God, for then he should first have excused himself.

Beloved, Let the word of God dwell in you plenteously. Do not give it a cold entertainment, as you would do to a stranger, and so take your leave of it; but esteem it as your best familiar, and domestical friend: making it (as our Postill sweetly) your chamber fellow, study-fellow, bedfellow. Let it have the best room, and the best bed, the parlor of our conscience, the resting place in our heart. Neglected things are without the doer, less respected with in, but near the door; Sed quae pretiosae sunt, non vno seruantur ostio: the more worthy things are not trusted to the safety of one door, but kept under many locks and keys. Give terrene things not only regard, preserve them with a more removed care. But this pearl of inestimable value, this Jewel purer then the gold of Ophir; lay it not up in the Porters lodge, the outward ear, but in the Cabinet, and most inward closure of thy heart, Deut. 11. Therefore shall ye lay up these my words in your heart & in your soul Mary thought that place the fittest receptacle for such Oracles. This is that Physic, which can only cure the sickness of Ignoranc•sVbi ignorans in: nit quod ⟨ϕ⟩, contum•x quid timeat, laborans quo praemiaetur, ⟨ϕ⟩ quo nutri•tur, famelicus conuiuium, vulneraetus remidium: where the ignorant may find what to learn the refractory what to fear, the laborer wherewith to be rewarded the weak nourishment, the guest a banker, the wounded a remedy to cure him. Be not ignorant be not sick: Search the Scriptures, read, observe. This is not all. Non prodest Cibus, qui statim sumptus emittitur, the meat nourisheth not, which tarrieth not in the stomach, It must be digested by meditation and prayer. Meditatio docet quid desit, oratio obtinet ne desit. Meditation shows our want; prayer procureth supply. Let it not be said of our perfunctory reading, as it was of the Delphian Oracle, Quoties legitur, toties negligitur, that we disregard what we read; Read to learn, learn to practice, practice to live and live to praise God forever.

- 3 A third sickness, which may inwardly afflict a Church is Dissention: a sore shaking to the joints, an enervating the strength, and a dangerous degree to dissolution. The world being but one, teacheth that there is but one God, that governs it, one God; that there is but one Church, one truth. The Church is not only (Columna veritatis, sed columba vnitatis) the pillar of truth, 1. Tim. 3.15. but also the Dove of Unity. Cant. 6. My Dove, my vndesiled is all•ne. Dissensions like secret and close Iudasses have given advantageous means to our common enemies, both to scorn and scourge the Church. Clemens Alexand••• brings in the Heathen, exprobrating our Religion for untrue, unwarrantable, •Quia omnis Secta Christianismit•tulum sibi vindicat,tameu aliae aliam execratur & condemnat. Because every sect challengeth to it self the city and right of true Christianity, yet one curseth and condemneth another. Within how much the narrower limits this distraction is pent, it so much the more violently bursteth forth and strives to rend the bowels of a Church. Like some angry and furious vapor, or exhalation restrained. that shakes the very earth for vent and passage. Such hath been the distractedness of sometimes, that men have labored to be neuters, and studied more to be indifferently disposed to either side, then to be religious at all. Such a time doth Erasmus mention, Quando ingeniosares fuit esse Christianum, when it was a point of policy, and wit to be a Christian.

I confess indeed, that Unity is no inseparable and undoubted mark of the Church, for there was an unity in those murdering voices, Crucify him, Crucify him, The Kings of the earth have banded themselves together against the Lord. Those favorers and factors of Antichrist, Reu. 17. that make war against the Lamb, are all said to have one mind. Nay Chrysostomo saith, that Expedit ipsis Daemonibus obaudire sibi inuicem in Schismate. It is necessary for the very Devils to hearken one to another, and to have some mutuallity in their very mutiny, an union in their distraction; yet cannot it not be denied, but that dissention in a Church, is a sickness to it. It goes ill with the body when the members agree not. Those that dwell in one house should be of one mind. It endangers the whole building to ruin, when the stones square and ⟨ϕ⟩ one with another. What detriment this hath been to whole Christendom, he hath no mind, that considers not no heart that condoles not, we may say with the Athenians, Auximus Philippum nos ipsi Athenienses. We have strengthened King Philip against us by our own contentions. Christian Nation fighting with Christian, hath laid more to the possession of the Turk, then his own sword. Where is the Greek Church once so famous? ⁱ Graeciam in Graecia quaerimus, saith Aeneas Sylvitu, We seek for Greece in Greece, & scarce find the remaining ruins. Behold we have laid wast our selves, who shall pity us? our own seditions have betrayed the peace of our Jerusalem. He hath no tears of Christian compassion in his eyes, that will not shed them at this loss. If you ask the reason, why the wild Bore hath spoiled the Vineyard: why the Iim and Zym, filthy and unclean Birds roost themselves in those sanctified dominions; Why Mahomet is set up like Dagon, where the Ark once stood, and Paganism hath thrust Christianity out of her seat, it is answered; Israel is not true to Judah, the renting of the ten Tribes, from the two, hath made both the two, and the ten miserable.

It is one of the forest plagues, (oh rather let it fall on the enemies of God and his Church; let his own never feel it) when men shall be fed with their own flesh, and shall be drunk with their own blood, as with sweet wine. frighting and fighting one against another, till an utter extirpation devour and swallow all. The malignity of this sickness hath been terrible to particular Churches. They that have been least endamaged, have little cause to joy in it. Our own home-bred jars, have lately more prejudiced our peace then foreign wars. The Spanish blades have done less hurt to us, then English tongues. Our contentions have labored about trifles, our damage hath been no trifle, but (I know not whether more) to our loss, or our enemies gain. Look but one the effects, and you will confess this a dangerous sicknesses. Rome laughs, Amsterdam insults, whiles the brethren scuffle in the Vineyard, Atheists and persecutors shuffle in to spoil it. God's Sabbath, his worship, his Gospel is neglected. Some will hear none but the refractory, and refusers of conformity: others take advantage of their disobedience, to contemn their Ministry. Witched hearts are hardened. good ones grieved, weak offended. Is this no sickness? is it unworthy our deploring, our imploring redresses.

We are all brethren, both by fathers and mothers side. It is more then enough, that our fallings out have been a grief to both our parents. If we proceed, the brethren shall smart for all. Whither we be victor or vanquished, we may beshrew our selves. Let us think, we behold our Mother calling to us, to stay our quarrels, and to lay down the cause at her feet. Otherwise, as Iocasta told her two sons, Bella geri placuit, nullo; habitura triumphos.

We undertake a war, whose victory shall have a sory triumph. Let every Star in our Orbe know his station and run his course without erring: the inferior subieting themselves to the higher powers; whiles the courses of Superiors be wisely tempered with moderation and clemency. For Et si omnibus verbis ministris commune idemque sit officium, sunt tansen honoris gradus. Though the office of all God's ministers be common, and the same, yet they have different degrees and places.

We have adversaries enow at home, to move our tongs and pens against. (Oh that arguments of steel and iron might supply the weakness of the other.) We have the Edomites with their no god, and the Babylonians with their new god; dissolute Atheists, resolute Papists: the former scoffing us for believing at all; the latter, for believing as we do, as we ought. These oppose (with us though under the pent-house of night) Mass against Service, Sacrament against Sacrament, Prayer against Prayer; confounding the language of England, as the Jews once of Israel. Whiles we are praying in one place, Oh Lord God of Abraham, &c. they are mumbling in another place, Oh Baal hear us. Whiles we pray for fire to consume the sacrifice, they for water to consume the fire: we for the propagation, they for the extirpation of the Gospel; hating us, and our Christian Princes more mortally, then if we were Saracens. For as no bond is so strong, as that of Religion: so no hostility is so cruel and outrageous, as that which difference in Religion occasioneth. Hence they cross, they curse, they persecute, they excommunicate. Nothing but our blood can stay their stomachs.

We know, they hate us: let us the more dearly love one another. The manifestation of enemies should confirm the mutual league and amity of Brethren. Oh pray for the peace of Jerusalem. Pray we that the deceived may find their error, correct their opinions, and submit their judgments and affections to the rule of truth. Yea, that the wandering sheep; yea that those, who are yet goats may become sheep, and brought into one fold, under one Shepherd, whiles they continue cogle, there is small hope. Yet Paul was once a rare, who after proved good wheat, and is now in the Garner of heaven: Recte dicitur glaciale niue calidam esse non posse: nullo enim pacto quamdiu nix est, calida esse potest: It is truly said: that the frozen snow can by no means be made hot: for so long as it is snow, and frozen it admits not to be calfied: Yet if that snow be melted, the liquidity thereof may be made hot. God that is able to turn a stony heart into a heart of flesh, work this change upon them; unite all our heats to himself; •o one another and heal our souls of this sickness.

- 4 To omit many; (for sins as they are innumerab•e for multitude so diverse for quality; and many ••an def•ne sin, but few decline sin.) The last of these in•ard sicknesses is irreligious Profaneness: a grief of all time, a disease of all Church. Other time have been notable for this, our• notorious. Not that I praise the former, which doubtless were conscious of evils enough. They know theirs, we our own. The deeds of the flesh (if ever) are now manifest, not only to God, b•f•re whom all things lie naked, a• a dissected Anatomy: b•t even to the observing e•e of man. Oppression the• < Ϸ self in open field, depopulating, ruining City, Country Church, Drunken re•les in the street; and Gluttony desire, not to beehous'd. Malice not only discovers, but oftenteth hir devilish effects. Bribery opens his hand to receive in in the very Courts. Robbery and murder swagger in the high ways. There is emulation in open school: Superstition in open Temple: Sects in open Pulpit. Brokery stands, like a sign, at the userers door, and invites foolish want to turn in thither, for a (miserable) supply. Whoredom begins to neglect curtains, and grows proud of an impudent prostitution. Pride holds the restraint of concealment a plague; and rather would not be, then be unnoted. Oaths are louder then prayers; men scarce spend two hours of seven days at their supplications, whiles they swear away the whole week. If profaneness be not our sickness. I will almost say, we are sound.

—Niger omnibus aris,

Ignis & in nullis spirat deus integer extis.

If this sickness be not lamentable, rejoice triumph, and say, you have no need to mourn. If a temporal loss salure us, we entertain it with ululations and tears. Let Pirates and rocks spoil us at sea, the oppressing Sabaeans in the field, the fire at home: see we our houses and towns $\langle \diamond \rangle$, our gold and goods (worldlings gods) transporting our wives, children, friends shrieking under the hand of slaughter, we need not call for mourning women, Ier. 9. to wail for us, our own eyes would run down with tears, and our eye lids gush out with waters. Let profaneness lift up his wicked hand against God, to blaspheme his name, despise his truth, disallow his Sabbaths, abuse his patience, deride his treatings, his threatenings, his judgments; this we see and suffer without compassion, without opposition But knowing the judgment of God (that they which commit such things are worthy of death) not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them.

These Sicknesses may afflict a Church inwardly. She may be sick outwardly. 1. by the persecution of man. 2. by the affliction of God.

By persecution of man, I need not call your thoughts back to elder times, & weary you with antiquities, to justify this assertion. This Church of ours so well remembers this sickness in Q. Mary's days, as if she were but newly recovered; whence descended those evils, but à culmine Pontificio, as one calls it, from the top tower of the Pope: yet the Romists stick not to answer this laid to their charge, by averring paradoxically, that their persecution was in love, as Sara to Hagar. In love they tyrannized, slandered, beat, imprisoned, manacled, massacred, burned us; all in love. As Philippides cudgelled his father, & pleaded it was in love. If this were charity, then sure the very mercies of the wicked are cruel: their love is worse then others hatred, Nunquid ouis lupum persequitur aliqnando? non, sed lupus ouē. Quem videris in sanguine persecutionis gaudentē, lupus est, saith Chrysost. doth the sheep ever persecute the wolf? no, but the wolf the sheep? whom thou seest delighting in the blood of persecution, let him plead what he will, he is a very wolf We tell the Papists, as Augustine told the Donatists, notwithstanding their distinguishing by tenses and pretenses, that their persecution exceeded in cruelty the very Jews. For the Jews persecuted (Christicarnem ambulantis in terra: these Christi evangelium sedentis in caelo.) the flesh of Christ walking on earth; the Papists the Gospel of Christ sitting in heaven. But their cruelty is our glory, we have sprung up the thicker; for their cutting us down, Plures efficimur, quoties matimur: Contrary to the rules of Arithmetic, our subtraction hath been our multiplication: The Church of God (morte vinit, vulnere nascitur) receiveth birth by wounding, life by dying, Occidi possumus, vinci non possumus; as the inevitable invincible truth hath manifested. We may be killed, we cannot be conquered, For thy sake we are killed all the day long, as Paul saith from the Psalmist (to show that both the Church of the old Testament, and of the new give experimental testimony of the truth) yet in all these thing we are more then conquerors, through him that loved us If our plant had not been set up by the all-prospering hand of God, the malignancy of these enemies would have soon rooted it up. They have verified in their persecutions against us, what one of their own writes of the Turkish Alcoran. Omnium, quae in Alchorano continentur, vltima resolutio est gladius. The last resolution, propagation, propugnation of all things contained in the Alchorā, (in the Popes decretals) is (not the word, but) the sword. But blessed be our God, that hath limited this rage, and sealed us our Quietus est. Though they will have no peace with us, we have peace with him, that can over-rule them.

But have we no persecutors still? Oh that no Israelite would ever strike his brother. There are two sorts of Persecutors remaining, Esau's and Ismaels; nourished with the same air, borne on the same earth, and carried in the indulgent bosom of the same Church. But nobis ignominia non sit, patià fratibus, quod. passius est Christus; ne{que} illis gloria, facere quod fecit Judas. Let it be no more shame for us, to suffer of our brethren, what our Savior suffered of his; then it is glory for them, to do the works of Judas. Some persecute with the hand, others with the tongue. Exercent hi sapientiam, illi patientiam Ecclesiae. The latter exercise the wisdom, the former the patience of the Church. We are secured from Ahab's, and Herod's, and Nero's; the teeth of the dogs be broken, and the jaws of the wolves pulled out: the Bonnors and butchers of the Church are husht in their graves. Oh that the Serpents also, which hiss and spet their venom at our peace, when all the birds of our air sing acclamations to it, were at quiet. But as then be that was borne after the flesh, persecuted him that was borne after the spirit, even so it is now. Now so, and will be so. We cannot see an end of these things, without the end of all things. Our turn is still to suffer, we return not blow for blow; but instead of sounding a point of war, we cry one to another, patiamur potius, Let us rather suffer. Let the Roman affections, like so many pestilent rivers, run all (in mare rubrum, or rather in mare mortuum,) into the red Sea, into the dead sea, and snatching the sword of vengeance out of his hand that owes it, quit themselves on their (imagined) enemies, with •loud and death. Let him that is styled the Servant of servants, show himself the Tyrant of tyrants. Philosophy teacheth, that external accidents change inward quality •s. but without an absolute mutation ipsius speciei, they change no substances. A Church may indeed at one time be better or worse disposed, then at another; more hot or more cold; more sick or more whole. But as it were a strange fit, that should transform Apuleius into an Alie: so it were a strange variation of accidents in a Church, that should turn patience into cruelty, humili•y into pride, a Tutor into a tormentor. Let their motto be ferio; (the term whereon all their arguments r•lf) let ours be fero. It is far better to suffer, then to offer wrong. Let savage persecution sit under the Ensings of wolves; meekness and patience be our arms and armors.

This outward malady of a Church, Persecution discovers the malignity of it self in many extentions. Especially, 1. in martyring her professors 2. in treason against her Sovereigns, 3. in seducing her Seers.

1 Martyrdom, God hath in all ages of his Church suffered some witnesses of his holy truth to be purified like gold in the fire. Though they are blessed that have so suffered, & the Church hath in conclusion gained by this loss. yet during the turbulent working of these thunder exhalations in our air, we have lamented miseram regionis fciem, the miserable state of our country, whose face hath been scratcht and torn by the bloody nails of these persecuting bears, Needs must the land be sick, where the Governors, like ill Physicians have purged away the good humor, and left the bad behind them. When they have imprisoned stripped, scourged, famished, drowned, burnt the innocent, and rewarded the wretched instruments of such deces. When the poor infant falling out (by the midwifery of fire) from the mothers womb. hath been call back again into the others flames. When the bodies and bones of the dead, which by the law of nature should rest in quiet have been digged out of their Sepulchers, violated, curled, burnt, as if (saith their Proverb) they would kill god-have-mercy on's soul. When women have been dragged out of their ous sick men from their beds: & the woods have abounded with saints, whiles the temples with their persecutors wild desars have been frequented with true worshippers, & the consecrated Churches with Idolaters. When the hoy boo was either not had or must be hid. It is no impeachment of a churches health to have these assaults go•ing her sides? Such a time will give cause to complain with Israel, I •m in distress, my bowels are troubled: mine heart is turned with in me, for I have grievously rebelled. Abroad the sword bereaveth, at home there is death. This is the main blow of persecutiō

2 Treason is a fearful and prodigious evil. Needs must the body of that Realm be in hazard, whose head is broken. They mean Israel no good that strike at the life of David. I confess that this evil is not so properly (in strict terms) a sickness as a danger. Yet as a man that hath ill humors in him, though by good diet & strength of nature they are kept from uniting their forces, and casting him down cannot be said in health, whiles those enemies •emaine within him, watching their time of mischief. So the Church, though it be not s•nsit us of the sever, which (such raw & undigested crudities as) traitors can put her into, til it be upon her, vet can the nor be perfectly well, till purged of such pernicious and malignant adversaries: were not the *Faeux*s of that horrid treason a disease & burden to the stomach of the land, till it had spewed them •ut? did not those pray against her & prey ••other? Would they not as willingly have <◇> , through the fire to than Moloe• of Rome the whole church, as those principal •llars of it, they plotted to blow up•t •y wanted not will but power They would have swelled their vengeance, till it had run over the verges, and comprised in one work (Mille actus vetitos, & milie piacula) innumerable stratagems, the easiest whereof was the intention of murder; till they had made a Catholic end with an heretic church, as they call it: But the God of Jerusalem prevented the children of Edom: who is blessed forever. It appears then Regicides are no less then Regnicides; for the life of a king contains a thousand thousand lives) and traitors make the land sick which they live in. This is the second dangerous blow of persecution.

3 The third is, Seducing a Churches Seers, and perverting the children of the Prophets, which is most commonly done, rather with error then with terror; by beguiling, then affrighting them, I have read, that Julian's cruellest persecution was with rewards. How many have been wasted over the seas with golden hands? Promotion rather then devotion hath cast many on the shores of Rome. There lies an exorcism, an enchanting power in gold, that coniuers many weak spirits into that superstitious circle. Then at last home they come, and prove caltrops to wound the Countries sides, that breed and feed them. Antichrists spel is gold; and they that will worship a piece of red earth, will not stick to adore that glorious Beast. Self-conceit blows them up with a swelling imagination of their own worth & if our church doth not (& numerare & munerare inter dignissimos) give regard & reward, estimation and recōpence according to their proud desires, they will shift Realm and Religion too, for a hoped guerdon. You will say, there is little loss to the body, in dropping off of such rotten members. It is true, that the damage is principally their own: yet what mother doth not grieve at the Apostasy of her children? There is some hope, whiles they are at home; little, when revolted to the enemy. Meantime, let it not be denied, but the seducers are persecutors, and great enemies to the Churches health.

Thus may a Church be outwardly sick by man's Persecution; she may be sick also by God's affliction. This is diverse, accordingly as our sins deserve, and his judgment thinks fit to punish us; 1. By war, 2. by famine, 3. by pestilence; the easiest of them heavy enough, and able to deprive a Church of health. Though the first might seem to be man's weapon, and so fitter to have been inserted among the former persecutions; as Israel termed her enemies, Our persecutors are swifter then the Eagles of the heaven, they pursued us upon the mountains; they laid wait for us in the wilderness: yet because God calls Ashur his rod: and it is He that sends either peace or war; and no adversary sword can be lifted up against us; but by (more thē) his permission; for he hath a punishing hand in it. Let us see how he can make his Church of Israel sick.

- 1 War is that miserable desolation, which finds a land before it like Eden, and leaves it behind like Sodom, and Gomorrah, a desolate and forsaken wilderness. Happy are we that cannot judge the terrors of war, but by report & hear-say. That never saw our towns and Cities burning, whiles the flame gave light to the Soldiers to carry away our goods. That never saw our houses rifled, our temples spoiled, our wives ravished, our children bleeding dead on the pavements, or sprawling on the merciless pikes. We never heard the groans of our own dying and the clamors of our enemies insulting, confusedly sounding in our distracted ears: the wife breathing out her life in the arms of her husband, the children snatched from the breasts of their mothers, as by the terror of their •laughters to aggravate the ensuing torments of their own. We have been strangers to this misery in passion; let us not be so in compassion. Think you have seen these miseries with your neighbors eyes, and felt them through their sides.

Let it somewhat touch us, that we have been threatened: Octog•simus octanus mirabilis annus, Have we forgotten the wonderful year of 88? an enemy of a savage face and truculent spirit; whose arms were bent to harms, to ruin, to blood, to vastation: whose numbers were like locusts, able to lick up a country, as the ox grass: the Ensigns of whose ships were Assurance and Victory: whiles they cast lots upon our nation, and easily swallowed the hope of our destruction: a mortal enemy, an implacable fury, an invincible nauy. Loe in the heat and height of all, our God laughed them to scorn, sunk them, drunk them up with his waves; tottered, sca•tered them on the waters, like chaff on the face of the earth, before the wind and tempest of his indignation. All their intentions, their contentions, their presumption of conquest were disappointed, dissolved, discomfited. These things, though they have not seen, let our children's children to the last generation, that shall inhabit this land, never forget: that we and they may praise God, who hath made fast the bars of our gates, and hath settled peace in our borders.

- 2. Famine is a sore outward sickness; an affliction sent by the immediate hand of God. For it is he that withholdeth the influence of heaven, and the kindly heat of the Sun, and the nourishing sap of the earth. I have given you cleanness of teeth in all your cities, and want of bread in all your places, saith the Lord. As it is his blessing, that our valleys are covered over with corn: so it is his plague, that we have sown much, and bring in little; that the mower filleth not his hand, nor he that bindeth sheaves, his bosom. When he is pleased, he will hear the heavens, and they shall hear the earth, and the earth shall hear the corn and wine and oil, and they shall hear us. England hath felt the smart of this sickness; and she that out of her abundance hath been able to lend others, hath also been glad to borrow of her neighbors. The satte kin• of Bashan, rich gormondizers have not been acquainted indeed with this misery; and therefore have not sorrowed for the affliction of Joseph. But the poor, the poor have grieved, groaned under this burden: whiles cleanness of teeth, and swarthinness of look were perceived in the common face. Whiles these arrows of famine wounded our sides, and our staff of bread, whereon our very life leans, was broken, we could then cry, hic digitus dei: here is the finger of God. In our plenty, saturity, satiety of these earthly blessings, we acknowledge not (manum expansam) his whole hand of bounty opened to us; though then we confessed (digitum extensum) his finger striking us, and bewailed the smart.

Famine is terrible enough of it self; more dire and tetricall in regard of the company she brings along with her. For

Saua farms semper magnorum prima malorum

Est comes.

Raging famine is the prime companion of many fellow-mischiefs. Ex vno grano oritur aceruus: of one grain of this starving misery, ariseth a whole heap of lamentable woes. The attendants of famine are murders, robberies, rapes, killing of children, that the same vessels become the wombs and tombs of little ones; and innumerable stretchings of conscience, to the revoking of former, and provoking of future judgments. No marvel if hunger disregard the mounds and fences of God's laws and man's, when it breaks through stone walls. The Poet, somewhat morally describes Famine.

Qu•esit am que famem lapidoso vidit in antro, &c.

Behold hunger in her stony den, tearing up the grass with her long nails and sharp teeth, her neglected hairs grown rough and tangled, her eyes hollow, her cheeks pale, her skin rugged and swarthy, left only as a thin scarce to hide her lank entrails; nothing clean about her but her teeth, her dry bones starting up, her breasts hangi•g over in the air, her joints swollen big and huge, her sinews shrunk, as unwilling to hold her limbs together. This is that monster, that turns men into Cannibals, unnaturally to devour one another's flesh. I have read, that at Turwyn in France, the famine was so deadly, that man's flesh was sold for food. This sickness is worse then death. Happy are we, that God's mercy hath banished this plague from our land, Oh let not our iniquities revoke it.

- 3 The Pestilence we better know, as one that hath but a little while been kept out of our doors; and watcheth when our iniquities shall again let him in. He skulks about, and will not be rid away, till repentance hath made our coast clear. This is God's Pursuant, that hath rode circuit in our land, and to whomsoever God hath sent him, he never returned with a non est muentus, but always brought (Si non corpus taemen animam sum causa) if not the body, yet the soul with the cause before his judgment seat. This is he that rides on the pale horse, Reu. 6. and catcheth men as with a snare, perhaps when they have most hasted from him. How hath this plague left the very streets of our Cities empty, when they seemed to have been sowed with the seed of man; how astonied the living, frightened the dying; disjoined the mutual society and succor of friend to friend, and that in a time, when comfort would have been most seasonably welcome, trembling hands, pulling dead bodies into the graves with hooks, or rolling them into pits.

Turn back your eyes, that now live in the Appeniue height of peace and health, and think you see the lamentable state of your Country, as few years past discovered it. Imagine you behold the hand-wringing widows, beating their bosoms over their departing husbands: the distracted mothers falling into swoons, whiles they kiss the insensible cold lips of their breathless Infants: poor desolate Orphans, that now mourn the untimely loss of their parents, as being made by years more sensible, of their want, then when deaths pestilential hand took them away: the loud groans and struggling pangs of souls departing: servants crying out for Masters, Wives for Husbands, parents for children, children for mothers; grief in every house, striking up alarums; belles heavily tolling in one place, ringing out in another: Numbers of people, that not many hours before had their several Chambers delicately highted, now confusedly thrust together into one close room, a little noisome hole, not twelve foot square. They have marble bosoms that will not be shaken with these terrors, and have sucked Tigresses in the wilderness that cannot compassionate these calamities. How did they grieve a Church to feel them, when they affect, afflict, and make us Sick to hear them?

I know you have long looked for an end. I never delighted in prolixity of speech. What remains? but the more terrible we conceive these sicknesses of a Church, the more we bless GOD for the present health of ours. Let not our sins call back these plagues: let us not provoke our GOD, least earth, air, heaven renew their strokes upon us. Wars and famines from the earth, plagues from the air, judgments from the Clouds; they are all restrained at our repentance, let loose at at our rebellions. Oh serve we the Lord our God with fear and obedience; that he may delight to do us good, and we to praise his name. That we our selves, and our Children after us, and the generations yet unborn, may see the Peace of Jerusalem all their days. That the golden Belles of Aaron may be freely rung; and the Trophies of Victory over all Antichristian enemies may still be seen amongst us. Even till this Easter & Feast of the Resurrection of our Savior Jesus, overtake take the Resurrection of all his Saints.

Grant this O Father for thy mercies, Oh Christ for thy merits; Oh blessed Spirit for thy holy names sake: To whom, three persons in glorious Trinity, one only true and immortal God in unity be all power, praise, majesty and mercy acknowledged forever, Amen.

ENGLAND'S SICKNESS. THE Second Lecture.

IEREM. CHAP. 8. VER. 22.

Why is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered?

WE have described the Person, the Church of Israel, as she is her own, as she is her owners: what in regard of her self, what in respect of her God. It remains now only to enquire, how she is affected. She is Sick; which is necessarily implied from God's complaint. Why is not the health of my daughter recovered? She was sick, and so sick, that the Prophet complains, Her wound is incurable, for it is come (even to the heart) unto Judah. Incurable, in regard of her own misery, not of her Saviors mercy. She was low brought in the Babylonish Captivity. Except the Lord of hosts had left unto us a very small remnant, we should have been as Sodom, and like unto Gomorrah? It is of the Lord's mercies, that we are not consumed, because his compassions (though our obedience) fail not. But her honor lay in the dust, when her Apostasy had forfeited her happiness: Superstition taking the upper hand of Devotion, and the traditions of man getting the start and ascendancy of God's precepts; When her disease grew too frenzy, and her sickness so excluding from it self all recoverable hope, that she had slain her Physician, and killed him that should have carried her.

Whence it appears, that a particular visible Church might and may fall away from grace, and have the Candlestick removed. The Papists brag of their numerous multitude, and promontorious celsitude. Rome boasts that their Church stands upon an hill. So it doth on six hills too many. She is mounted high enough, if this could iustif•e her. She had better bate of her height, and •ise in her goodness. There may be a local succession, but if not in faith and doctrine, mole ruit sua, her top-heavy weight overthrows her. May it not be said of her, as Jeremiah of Egypt? Go up into Gilead and take balms, Oh virgin the daughter of Egypt: in vain shalt thou use many medicines, for thou shalt not be cured. It is no wonder then, no wrong, if we depart from her, that hath departed from the truth of the Gospel, and faith of Christ.

I will not descend into the view of her apostasy, though just occasion may seem here offered; but turn myself and speech to our selves, who are sound in doctrine, sick in conversation; but (I trust) not without good hope of recovery.

But so soon as the Romish malignancy hears me say, we are sick; they instantly insult, reproaching our doctrine. But do men try the faith by the persons, or the persons by the faith? It is a silly argument (à moribus ad doctrinam) from the life to the doctrine. Yet (though we desire and strive to have our own lives better) we fear not to match them with theirs. Our sickness would be esteemed less, if we would go to Rome for a medicine. (For the Papist may better steal the horse, than the Protestant look on.) But so long as we have approved Physicians at home, what need we walk so far to a Mountebank? It is a false rumour, there is no sound air but the Romish. Is it not rather true, that thence comes all infection? And that they who have forsaken us to seek health there, have gone out of God's blessing into the warm Sun?

Our lives trouble them: this they object, this they exprobrate ad nauseam vsque. But do they not stumble at our staws, and leap over their own blocks? cavil at our motes, and forget (or justify) their own beams? The swelling on the Foxes head shall be a horn, if the Pope will so judge it: a Catiline, Lopus, Garnet, Faulx, an honest man, a Catholic, a Saint, if he will so interpret, so canonize him. If I should but prick this rank vein, how would Rome bleed? Would not (haec prodidisse, be vicisse, as Erasmus said of Augustine's dealing against the Manichees) the very demonstration of these things, be a sufficient conviction? Unnatural and hideous treasons, conspiracies against whole kingdoms, deposing, dethroning, touching with a murderous hand (Christos Dei) the Anointed of God; oaths, uncleannesses, perjuries from whom are they produced, by whom practiced, if not mostly, if not only by Papists? They pry, search, deride, censure the forepart of their Wallet, wherein they put our iniquities: whiles their own sins are ready to break their necks behind them. The greatest evils we have are theirs; fathered by those that will not be mothered of our Church: Haec non ad frument a Christi, sed ad eorum paleam pertinent: These belong not to Christ's wheat, but to the ch•ffe of Antichrist. These are •onsters bred of that viperous dam, that have shook hands with huma•ity, with civility, though they reserve the form of Religion.

Si quid in his possem, facerem sterilem matrem; as one of their own said. It were well, if either the children would forsake their kind or the mother become barren: Yet must these men be Saints, and stand named with red letters, in the Popes Calendar; red indeed, so died with the Martyred blood of God's servants.

But I am not delighted to stand upon comparisons, if their exclamations had not put me to them, that like blown Pharisees, they cry out with ostentation of sanctity, God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are, or as this Publican, What age, people, Church were ever yet so holy, that the Preachers found no cause of reproof, of complaint against it? Chrysostom speaketh of his times: Christians now are become like Pagans or worse: Yet who will say that the Religion of Pagans was better then the Christians. The Priest and Levite had no mercy, the Samaritan had: yet their Religion was the true, and not the Samaritans. If some Papists amongst us (and those very few) live in more formal and moral honesty; et this commendeth not their whole Church. They are now in the time of their persecution as they take it, (though their prosperity and numbers evince the contrary) we are in our peace, and who knows not that, an easy occasion of wantonness.

I deny not, that we have grievous offenders: we mourn and pray for them. Do the Papists rejoice at this? Woe to him that is glad of God's dishonor. Let them brag their perversion of some which were ours, but such and so affected to viciousness. If we had lost more of Atheists, sacrileg•ous Adulterers, l•centious hypocrites we had as little reason to complain, as they to be proud. We are the fewer, they not the better. We desire, endeavor reprove, exhort, instruct all, with purpose of heart to save them in the day of the Lord Ie•u; if they wish not the same. We are content to differ as far from them in our desires, as we do in our doctrines. If there were none sick, we might lay aside our Physic, but there are many, too many, all in some measure, some in all measure, beyond measure, therefore we must proceed.

Sickness is the Subject, and the observations that shall limite my short ensuing speech, are quadruple. 1. The precious benefit of spiritual health, which we shall the better discern, if we compare it with corporal, 2. What sickness is incident to man, 3. That the Sickness of the Soul is most dangerous, 4. Lastly, who are the sick?

1 Health is precious, Cara est cuique salus, Every man's health is dear to him. Exclude from this comparison the gifts of the mind, which are truly of a more pure and changeless condition, and then what earthly benefit will not give place to health? It is one of the positive virtues, grafted in man's nature with the creation. Weigh it in the balance with some rivals.

1 Riches are the desire of many hearts, the special fruit which their hands reach to gather (passing by all the better trees in God's orchard) the object of most endeavours: How vain, how tedious, how odious are they without health? Let them bind gold to their a king head, drink Cleopatra's draught, (precious stones dissolved) to ease their rasping stomach, involve and wrap their conu•lised joints in furs and silks, empty their coffers in the Physicians study; if (nature and her Ordinator) God deny health, how invaluable are their riches, how unavailable their projects! How complain they (after all experimented succors) their unabated anguish! Therefore the son of Sirach truly saith; Better is the poor being sound and strong of constitution, then a rich man that is afflicted in his body. Health and good state of body are above all gold, a strong body above infinite wealth. There is no riches above a sound body, and no joy above the joy of the heart.

The poor man well, only admireth wealth,

The rich man sick, only commendeth health.

Health gives means to be rich, riches give no means to be healthful. Nay, they are rather traitors and adversaries to it: Not scaffolds whereby health is built up, but stairs to descend by to the grave. The Rich man's quotidian delicacies rotted him for death. Where there is a full purse, and an esurient ambitious appetite, there is a close and unsuspected conspiracy against the health. Thus we do not more eagerly pursue opulency in our soundness than in our sickness we contemptibly despise, loathingly dislike it.

2 Is there any ascendancy in Pleasure above health? will not that carry up a brave forehead without being beholding to it? Alas! cold is the entertainment of delight to a warish and sickly carcase. Misera est voluptas, vbi periculi memoria adest: Pleasure is unpleasant to the memory guilty of instant danger. It is Epicurean, profane, and idle physic to sorrow.

The l•ying wine on ears to make them sink,

Who fears the threats of fortune, let him drink.

Why doth not, then that Chaldean Monarch continue his carousings, and wash away the Characters of that fatal hand from his heart, with floods of wine? alas! sorrow will keep a man sober, and restrain him from any drunkenness but it own. To omit, that mortem dabit ipsa voluptas, and the end of mirth is heaviness, what pleasure can fasten her slippery hold on the afflicted heart It is loathed while it objects and prostitutes it self to our sight, courting and wooing our affections: the more greedily we draw on Pleasure, the sooner it looseth the nature, and is turned into the contrary. Miserable Comforter; as Job's friend were justly called) whose requested mitigation turns to aggravation of our misery. When Pleasure opens the shoppe of all her delectable wares, and prays the sick hand to choose what best affects it, shows perfumes, colors, wine, junkets, sports, company, music, she is answered with nothing, but Away with them, away with them; they are no medicines for the headache, one dram of health is worth a talent of pleasure.

How dotingly do men (in their wanton days) take it up? nay how doth it take up them? as the Philosopher truly. Non nos voluptaetem, sed voluptas nos habet; cuius aut inopia torquemur, aut copia strangulamur: miseri, si serimur ab illa, miseriores, si obruimur: We possess not pleasure, but pleasure us; whereof we are either perplexed with the want; or strangled with the abundance, we are wretched if it leave us, more wretched if it overwhelm us. But sickness when it comes, mars the relish of it to the mind, as of meats to the palate, and sends it away without a welcome, not without a check and defiance. Sickness a stronger power (if weakness may be called strength) then pleasure hath gotten possession of a man and laughs at the vain endeavor of vanity to remove it. This is the time to say to Laughter, thou art mad, and to esteem mirth a tedious, odious, irksome guest. They that (non voluptates sibi emunt, sed voluptatibus vendunt) buy not pleasure to themselves, but sell themselves to pleasure, as Esau did his birthright for it, find in sickness the memory of what they do love and must leave, an addition to their present malady. So (foelicitas hath no more left but the first syllable, fell gall, and) pleasure hath no pleasure but this, that it is short during the sweetness, long in the bitterness necessarily following it. Health then is beyond pleasure also, without which, it is either not delightful, or is not at all.

3 Both these have lost the prize, let us see if Honor can win it, Alas! what is it to sit groaning in a Chair of State? or to lie panting on a bed of down? It is little content to have many knees bow to thee, whiles thine bow to sickness, to have many uncovered heads attend thee, and thine own (though covered) find no ease. How wouldest thou be glad to change places with thy meanest servant, on condition thou mightest change bodies with him. How much of thine honor wouldest thou lay out, for a little of his health? He that lives in the height of honor and wealth, repines at nothing more, then to see the hungry laborer feed on a crust, whiles his own nice and queasy stomach (still weary of his last meal) puts him into a study, whether he should eat of his best dish or nothing.

How poor, how weak, how nothing besides, a name is honor, when sickness hath dismantled it? when the Coach is turned to a littour, the feather to a kerchief, public and popular magnificence, to the close limits of a Chamber, whether sickness (like a great commander) hath confined him, the imperious tongue fainting and failing in the wonted tunes, of go, come, do, &c. as the Centurion spake: the curious attire thrown by with neglect: alas, now what is honor? but a mere property, a Pageant, which health like the day sets out, and the night of sickness takes in again? Sickness hides pride from a man, saith Elihu,

What inferior benefit shall we then match with health that it may glory of the priority or equality, in comparison This is precious and desirable, whether to body or soul. To the Rule simply, to the body (but secundum quid in respect) if it may not prejudice the health of the soul. For though corporal health be so good, that all other worldly good things are but troublesome without it; yet it is often seen, that the worse part draws away the better, and a vigorous strong able body, without any difficulty makes a wanton and diseased soul.

1 Bodily health is generally desired; (far more then endeavored) it being an action of that natural propenseness, engrafted in all men, to their own good. Parents are provident to the bodies of their children, even those who set to slight a thought on their souls (showing herein plainly that they brought forth their bodies, not their souls). Large and lavish is our indulgence, at all partes to this frail Tabernacle; yea so profuse, and not withholding, that whiles we seek more health, we loose that we had. Quaerendo perdimus, we seek it in full dishes, and behold there we lose it. For prohibent grandes patinae. Would we know how to preserve health? I am no Physician, nor will I wade further in this argument, then divinity & reason leads me Let us observe moderation, labor in our calling, abstinence.

1 Moderation, as the Philosopher said, that he never corrected himself with repentance for his silence, but often for his speech: so our forbearing of junkets should not grieve us, but our immoderate devouring them, Haec est sana & salubris forma vitae, vt corpori tantum indulgeas, quantum bonae valetudini satis est. This is a wholesome form of living that the body be so far pleased, as the health be not displeased. It is certain, that surfeit kills more then famine. It was one of Hippocrates Aphorismes; Allimoderations are enemies to health. It was one of Plato's monsters of nature that he found in Sicilia; a man eating twice a day. A thing of so little admiration with us, that it is wonderful in him that doth not. Perhaps a breakfast goes before, and a banquet follows after both these. Neither is the variety less then the quantity. We plead; Nature bids us eat and drink. It is granted, Yea, a solemn Festival invites us to more liberal feeding. It is not much denied, if rare, if seasonable for thy appetite if reasonable for the measure. But many content not themselves (only to steal the halter, except there be a horse at end of it, as the shriven thief said in his confession to the Priest) only to feed and drink, to pleasure, but to sle•pe •o surfeit, to ebriety, disabling themselves to any sober exercise. Turpe est stomachum non nosse modum•: It is vile, (and worse then bestial) when the stomach <...> measure.

Seneca's rule is good, Dandum ventri quod debes non quod potes: Allow thy belly what thou shouldst, not what thou mayest. I shame not to convince this error, even from the example of Heathens; that if Religion cannot rule us as Christians, yet nature may correct us as men. Whiles others (saith Socrates, viuunt vt edant, ego edam vt viuam) Live to eat, I will eat to live. It is perhaps easy to find some that abstain, but how few for conscience of God's precept? The sick, the poor, the covetous, the full, all moderate, but to what purpose? The sick man for his healths sake, the poor man for his purse sake: the covetous for miserableness, the full for the loathing of his stomach. But let us that are Christians moderate our selves in conscience of God's commandment; because Gluttony is a Work of darkness; and the night is now past. So shall we at once, provide well for our bodies, and better for our souls.

2 Labor in our callings is no small furtherance of our healths. The bread of him that laboreth (as Solomon says of his sleep) is sweet and relishable, whether he eat little or much. Therefore drink waters out of thine own cistern: live of thine own labors: the bread thou hast earned shall never be gravel in thy throat. He that tilleth his land shall be satisfied with bread, whereas others shall either eat, and not have enough; or have enough and not eat: Hence surfeits light so frequently on the rich, and the gentle blood grows so quickly fowl: because they think themselves bound to no labors, so long as they may live on their lands. It was the Fathers charge to his eldest son, Son go and work today in my Vineyard. The privilege of primogeniture must not exempt him from labor. He sends him to the Vineyard, to dress it before he hath it, he will keep it the better when he hath it: Industry in our vocation is not only a means in nature, but even by the ordinance and blessing of God, to the conservation of health.

3 Abstinence. I mean more than moderation, that which we call Fasting. Ieiunium ieiunantis, a free and voluntary fast, when the body refraineth such refectations as nature taketh pleasure in, and that only for healths sake. As the tree by a gentle shaking knits faster at the root: this moderate weakening begets strength. So that at once, it may be a help to devotion, (for repentance comes not before God with a full belly, and meat between the teeth) and a preservative to health, physic to defend from the need of physic, a voluntary medicine to prevent a necessary trouble. Thus of the Body.

2. The Souls sanity is not less precious, though more neglected. It was made in the image of the most high God. which Image consisted (in lumine mentis, recludine cordis, affectuum moderation, as some.) in the brightness of the mind, rightness of the heart, and just governance of the affections. Or as others: It was (libertas arbitrij, intellectus sapientiae, & potentia obedientiae.) freedom of will, wisdom of understanding, (kingdom or) power of obedience: for here to serve was to reign. Herein consisted the health. The privation of these perfect habits, is not less than the sickness of it. This health thus lost, cannot be recovered, but by him that was sick to the death for us: neither is it hindered!, when he will bestow it. For grace is not refused of the hard heart, because it takes away the hardness of that heart it lights on. Christ modifies it with his water, and mollifies it with his blood, both which issued out of his side at one wound, and followed the murdering spear of a Soldier, to save them which fight under his Standard.

Thus from man's sickness ariseth his better health, and he now stands surer by his first fall. Such is the greatness and goodness of God, such his power and mercy concurring, that it works health out of sickness, good out of evil. There is an infinite Good, but not an infinite evil. For the Good cannot by any means be diverted into evil. but the evil may be converted to good. By the conspiracy of Jews, Gentiles, Judas, Devils, against Christ, is our salvation wrought. From the horridest and most unnatural treasons, God hath advanced his own glory, advantaged his children's security. We labor of three diseases, birth, life, death: all these are cured by those three answerable in Christ. Our unclean birth is sanctified by His so pure from the least spot of sin. Our transgressing life is reformed by the virtue, informed by the example of His. That tyrannizing, wounding Serpent, Death hath the sting pulled out by His death, that we may embrace him in our secured arms. The Conqueror of us all is conquered for us all, by Him that foiled the Giant in his own den, the Grave. Thanks be to God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Oh death where is thy sting. Oh grave where is thy victory? This is our insultation and holy triumph. Provided ever, that He be believed of us, that hath thus relieved us. Believe and fear not. A good conscience is never faild of a good confidence, of a good consequence. Hence ariseth the souls sanity.

What can endanger, in damage this health? no losses to the estate, no crosses to the flesh. The spiritually-sound man, values all the fortunes of the world, less then the freedom and health of the mind. He that wants this armor is wounded by every blow of affliction. Other security is but a shield of wax against a sword of power. They cannot choose but fear, even where no fear is, and testify their inward guilt and sickness, by their pale and trembling looks. Timida nequitia dat testimonium condemnations, & semper praesumit saeua, perturbata conscientia. Fearefull wickedness gives testimony of it own damnation; and the troubled conscience imposeth and presumes to itself terrible things, but the health of faith is health indeed; yea this health is life, a life Angelical, a life Euangelical, whether for obedience or peace: inspired, spirited, sealed, assured by the word of Truth: Which is life to all that find it, and health to all their flesh, No fear shall invade him, no troubles involve him, so that he cannot be extricated. For the fear of the Lord tendeth to life, and he that hath it, shall not be visited with evil, His innocence may speed in the world, as deserts in a lottery, be rewarded with a blank. But he in whom he affies, shall put the marrow of health into his bones, distill the sap of grace inio his spirit.

Low in the world; lowly in himself, in his estimation, who sees not that the clambering goats get upon rocks and promontory places, whiles the humble sheep feed in the bottoms and dejected valleys. Only one day, the Sheep shall be advanced above the Sun and stars, and set in heaven with Christ; when the goats shall be cast down to the depth of depths. Rich Dives was well enough known to the world, yet nameless in the sacred Records. So we brand our sheep, let the Goats go unmarked.) God sets his seal on his chosen: Nouit qu• sui sunt, lets the wicked run without his cognizance.

Thus different is the state of God's servants, and the worlds slaves. They think none sick but we: we know none sick but they. If equal crosses befall us both, our estate is soon descried. We differ as the Camel and the Camomell: the one is stunted, the other thrives by his burden. Afflictions that so scatter them, and loosen the joints of their vain hopes, do more knit and consolidate our healths. As soon as they take themselves it is as easy to prove, as to reprove their diseases. Though I confess in the days of their Joviality; he hath great wisdom, that can make them sensible of their sickness. Were Solon, nay Solomon alive to declare it, they see t not, 'they will not feel it. If the want of health were perceived, how amiable, admirable would the benefit appear? Gratior est saint as redita, quā retenta, vix aliter quā perdendocognoscimus. Returning health is more welcome, then if it had not been lost. We scarce know what health is, but by the want. Let others spend their times, wits treasures, to procure health to their bodies, which I embrace when it is offered, and would not loose by my own errors) give me a sound and clear conscience, and let me not want this health, till I envy theirs.

2. Thus having inquired what health is, leaving a while the consideration thereof as it is in it self; let us descend into it as respectively; casting an oblique eye unto that which is diverse from it, or adverse to it. There is a significant and lightful demonstration or commentary, which one contrary nature gives to another, when they are diametrically opposed. The day would not seem so clear, if the departing Sun should not leave night to follow it. The foil adds grace to the Jewel. It (no less then) glorifies learning, that the malicious tongue of ignorance barks at it. He knows the benefit of heat, that hath felt the sharpness of a freezing cold. If there were no sickness to trouble us, health it self would be thought sickness. The very enmity of these repugnances help the beholders judgment, either to embrace or reject them. Even their opposition is an exposition of their natures, deformity, darkness, sickness, sin, all those privative, corruptive. destructive things, which as they had no creation from God so give no direction to the good; yield (by a sober meditation) an unwilling luster to those virtues, graces, and happy habits; against which they vaunt their contrariety. That if any lewd, vain, ill judging, worse affecting mind, shall still love the desolation of sin, rather then the consolation of spiritual health: it may appear to be, not because this object is not wretched, but because he is blind and bewitched.

There is a twofold Sickness incident to man, 1. in sin, 2. for sin. The former of these is only spiritual: the latter is not only corporal, but sometimes spiritual also: and of all the Vials of God's wrath, holden to the mouth of miserable men by the hand of justice, it is the forest, when sin shall be punished with sin, and the destitution of grace, shall permitte a lapse to impenitency.

1 The Sickness in sin is double, according to the cause, which is a defect either of right believing, or straight living, a debility of confidence, a sterility of good works: lack of faith, wrack of charity. These effects (or rather defects) are produced by two errors in our Souls diet: the one excessive, the other deficient, 1. By Fasting too much from Christ, 2. By feeding too much on the world. In what we should affect, we are abstinent, in what avoid, very indulgent.

1 The first cause is, by forbearing that sacred meat, living and life giving bread, which came down from heaven, to translate thither those that eat it. This is the Son of the most high God, not disdaining to become the food of the affamished sons of men. Out of the strong came sweetness: the mighty is become meat: the Lyon of Judah yields honey, such as never came out of any earthly Hive, He is our invincible Captain, to him we supplicate (as distressed Nerua to Traian.)

Telis Phoebe tuis lachrimas vliscere nostras.

Oh Savior defend and keep us, yet he that is (Victor) a conqueror for us, is also (victus) food to us. But this is (Cibus non dentis sedimentis) meat for our faith, not for our teeth, manducaemus intus non foris, We eat it inwardly, not outwardly. Christ is verily (panis verus, non panis merus) true, not mere natural bread. Thus our Feeder is become our Food, our Physician, our Medicine. He doth all things for us, guide, feed, mediate, mediate: let us meditate on him, and noi disappoint the intention of his mercies by our averseness. No hope but in him, no help but by him. The Law could not satisfy our hunger (not through it own, but our insufficiency) the Gospel gives not only present satisfaction; but even impossibility of future famine. There is no abiding the law, except the Gospel be by: not of that thunder, without his rain of mercy to quench it.

Who gives this food to us, but He that gave himself for us? that shepherd that feeds his Lambes (not on his grounds, but) with his wounds▪ his broken flesh, and sluiced blood, Hence from this great Parliament of Peace, made in that once acted, and forever-virtual sacrifice) derive we pardon for our sins, without impeachment to the justice of so high a Judge, as we had offended. Thus the King of eternal glory, to the worlds eye, destating himself (though indeed not by putting off what he had, but by putting on what he had not) was cast down for us, that we might rise up by him. Learn of me to be humble, wherein he gives us a precept and a pattern: the one requiring our obedience, the other our conformity. The Pelican rather then her young ones shall famish, feeds them with her own blood. Christ for the better incorporating of his to himself, feeds them with his own flesh, but spiritually. So that we eat (not only panem Domini, as the wicked, but panem Dominum) not only the bread of the Lord, but the bread the Lord, in a Sacramental truth.

They that have ransacked the riches of nature, searched earth, sea, air for beasts, fishes, birds, and bought the rarest at an inestimable price, never tasted such a iunket. The fluid transient, passing, perishing, meats of earth, neither preserve us, nor we them from corruption. This banket of His flesh, richer then that Belshazzar made to his thousand Princes, this cup of his blood more precious then Cleopatra's draught, shall give (vitam sine morte) life without death to them that are received, to receive it. We perceive a little the virtue of this meat.

Now then, as the withdrawing of competent meat and drink from the body, lesseneth that radical moisture (which is the oil whereon the Lamp of life feeds) and makes way for drines: whence the kindly heat (which like other fire might be a good servant, must needs be an ill master) getting more then due and wonted strength▪ for want of resistance, tyrannizeth, and not finding whereupon to work, turns upon that substantial vividity, exciccating & consuming it This oversparing abstinence wastes, weakness, sickens the body, dangers it to an Ecticke or some worse disease, of no less hurt, then too great repletion, So when the Soul (either through a mad frenzy of wickedness, or dull melancholy darkness of ignorance or sensual perverseness of affections) forbears, forbids herself to feed on that sacred and vital substance, Jesus Christ the vivid sap of grace and virtue, (which keeps true life and soul together; stilled into the heart by the holy Ghost) begins to dry up, as a morning dew: shrinking at the thirsty beams of the rising Sun, and the fire of sin; gets the predominance. Now where that unruly Element reigns in a mortal body, it hazards the immortal soul to death. There is then no marvel, if the soul descends into the fall of sickness, into the valley of death, when she shall refuse the sustentation, health and very life thereof, her Savior: who is not only (cibus, but ipsa salus) meat, but health it self, as Paul calls him ipsam vitam, qua viuimus, quam viuimus, the very life whereby we live, which we live, We live in Christ, we live by Christ, nay, we live Christ, for our very life is Christ. Now live not I, but Christ liveth in me.

This is He, that once suffered for our sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God. He suffered our sins, the cause most odious: the just for the unjust, the persons most unequal, that he might bring us to God, the end most absolute How well then may we yield (and if there might be any pride or glory in us, it should be in our sufferings) to suffer for him. The Apostles did so rejoicing, O Jesus, Sic adeo dulce est stare pro te, quam dulce erit gaudere de te? Oh Christ, if it be so happy to suffer for thee, what will it be to rejoice in thee? It cost him much, (oh how much!) trouble, sorrow, beating, grinding, before he became bread for us. There may be a scarcity of other bread, there is none of this, to those that rightly seek it. It is dear in regard of the preciousness (they that have it will not part with it) not dear in regard of the price we pay nothing for it, but faith and love. Though thousands pray at once with the Disciples. Lord evermore give us this bread (Joseph's may) Jesus his storehouse can never be emptied, Least the world perish through famine. He only (nec accipiendo proficit; nec dando deficit) grows not rich with receiving, neither grows poor with giving. Rejoice then, Beloved, in done, in Domino. The Lord is the giver, the Lord is the gift. Let not your souls be starved with those inferior things, which are (pauca, parua praua) few in number, small in measure, bad in nature, Whiles there is bread enough in your Fathers house. Why should we sicken our spirits in a voluntary want; and fast from that which is able to feast a world of faithful guests. This is the first degree of our spiritual sickness.

2 The excessive occasion to procure ill health to our souls, is by feeding too heartily too hastily on the world. This is that too much oil, which quencheth our Lamp. For as in a body overcharged with immoderate quantity of meats or drinks, when the moisture swells (like a tide above the verges) and extinguisheth the digestive heat: that their kindly embraces are turned to conflict, and the superfluities want their former dissolution, and egestion, the necessary event is distemperature and sickness. So the affections of the soul overladen with the devoured burden of worldly things, suffer the benign and living fire of grace to be quenched. Hence the fainting spirits of virtue swoon and fall sick, and after some weak resistance (as a coal of fire in a great shower,) yield the victory to the floods of sin, and are drowned. Neither are the affections only (which they call the neither part of the soul, as if this dropsy were only in the feet) thus diseased; but the sickness taketh the head of the soul, the understanding and the heart of it, the conscience: that faith (which is religious reason) is impaired, and the instrument, the tongue, the Organ of God's praise is hindered. As we see it in these corporal effects by drunken men, the feet are too light, and the head too heavy: the legs cannot stand, the tongue cannot speak: so both understanding and affections are stifled in this deluge, inward faith, and outward profession falling sick to the death.

For how can it be otherwise, that the soul (of so high and celestial a creation) should thrive with the gross and homely diet of vanity? Man is, saith the Philosopher, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, God's kinsman. And Paul taking such a sense from the Poet, makes of a conceit of nature a sanctified truth, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, For we are also his offspring. And Peter saith, that (though not really, but in regard of renovation) We are partakers of the divine nature. Why then contemn we not with a holy disdain, the rude, crude and unwholesome morsels of the world; sensual pleasures? If we considered aright the natures; either 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, or 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, of the things nourishing, or things nourished, we would strive (aut non admittere, aut cito emittere) either not to let in, or soon to throw out such unsavory repast. For the nourishment of the body, if it be alienum, it is venenum, if strange and contrary to nature, it is as poison to him that eats it, Quae nutriuntur, familiaribus & naturalibus rebus nutriuntur, contrarijs corrumpuntur: for creatures that live by nourishment, with natural and familiar things are nourished, corrupted with their contraries. Otherwise the food makes work for the Physician and his elder brother death.

Spiritual and celestial delicacies, the diet of grace, and sanctification, nourish and cherish the souls health, and put the good blood of holiness into her veins, give her a fresh and cheerful look, roses and lilies, (the pride of nature in their colors) make not so beautiful a mixture. But the world-affected, and sin infected delights pale her cheeks, drink up her blood, and sap of virtue, dim her intellectual eyes, lame her feet the affections, crase her health, crush her strength, and which is most wonderful, for morte carent animae, even kill her immortality.

Now they are not simply the things of this world, that thus sicken the Soul, but our extravagant desires and corrupt usage. For all these were made for man's delight and comfort in the second place, yield them immediately for the makers glory, and we offend not to serve our necessities in them it is their abuse which brings this sickness. It is with nutritive things to the soul, (in some sort) as with all meats to the body. They are of three kinds, Contraria, naturalia, neutralia, contrary, natural, indifferent. Contraries hurt, natural and kindly help, neutral or indifferent, either hurt or help as they are received, 1. Food merely contrary to the soul is, Sin, this kills, 2. natural and proper to it is grace, this saves, 3. indifferent, or of a middle nature, are the inferior things of this world, house, lands, riches, &c. these either hinder or further our souls health, as they are used or abused. They may be consolations, they may be desolations, ladders of ascent, or stairs of descent, as our regenerate or degenerate minds shall embrace them. Now the reason why earthly things do neither strengthen our spirits, nor lengthen our joys is doubt, 1. They be transitory, 2. They be not satisfactory.

1 They be transient. Meats of a washy and fluid nature, that slip through the stomach, and tarry not for concoction, do no more feed a man's health, then almost if he lived on air. They that have no other sustentation to their souls, but such light, sleight, and empty food, (except they live by miracle) cannot be like David, ore rubicundo, nor like Daniel of a fresh hew, and cheerful complexion, I mean the constitution of their soul, cannot thrive. The Soul fed only with the frail circumstuous, humid, cloudy vanities of this world, is so far from remaining sound, and retaining health, that she pines, languisheth, dwindleth away, as a tree, whose life-feeding sap is dried up: So perishable are all the things of this world. Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not? for riches certainly make themselves wings, they fly away like an Eagle toward heaven. Not like a tame bird that returns, nor like a Hawk, that will show where she is by her bells, but like an Eagle, whose wings thou canst neither clip nor pinion. Aut deserunt, aut deseruntur: either they forsake, or are forsaken. All their certainty is their uncertainty; and they are only stable in this, that they cannot be stable.

Riches are not forever, and doth the Crown endure to every generation? Hence they are called Riches of the world; which is a bar in the Arms of Riches, to demonstrate their slippery hold: for the world it self being transitory, they must needs savor of the soil. Our judgments must of necessity be convinced to confess this, though our affections will not yield it: wherefore tend all those Writings for covenants, if these earthly things were not uncertain? What are those labors and appendances, but bands and ties, to keep close to us mad and starting Riches? We plead, it is for the mortality of men, but we mean the mortality of riches. If then these earthly things will boast of anything, let them boast (as Paul did) their frailties. They are either i•Journeying, not got without labor, or ventured on the Sea, (yea, together with goods) bodies and souls too, to make such ill Merchants full adventurers. In peril of robbers, public and notorious thieves: In peril of false brethren, secret & tame thieves, Lawyers, Usurers, flatterers. Fire in the City Free-booters in the Wilderness, Pirates on the S••; for weariness, painfulness, watchings, &c. who doubts the miserable partnership twixt them and riches.

Could the world be thought thy Servant, (which is indeed thy Master. Oh Worldlings, as Christ's Maxim inferreth. No man can serve two masters: none indeed; for he that hath God for his obeyed Master, hath for his obeying Servant the world;) yet is it but a vagrant and runagate servant. It hath a madding mind, and a gadding foot. And though by the greatness of the stature and proportion, it may promise able service, yet it will be gone when thou hast most need of it. Neither will it slip away empty, but rob thee of thy best Jewels, carry away thy peace, content, joy, happiness, soul with it. Behold the Cosmopolite; Luke 12. planting, transplanting, rebuilding, •udying for room to lay up his fruits; Non in visceribus pauperum, not in the bowels of the poor, but in his enlarged Barns, if ever their capacity could answer his enlarged heart. He builds neither Church nor Hospital (either in cultum Christi, or culturam Christiani, to the service of Christ, or comfort of any Christian) but Barns. He minds only Horreum suum, & Hordeum suum, His barn and his Barley. Behold at last he promiseth his Soul peace, ease, mirth, security: but when his Chickens were scarce hatched, whereon he long •ate & thought to sit long brooding, he hears a fatal voice confiscating his goods, and himself too. Thou fool, this night shall thy soul be required of thee: then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided? No marvel then if the Soul be famished, when she is only fed with such fugitive meat which vanisheth like Tantalus Apples, or Ixions cloud in the Poet: and like Medicines rather than food, or like poisons rather than medicines, wash away the good they find, and leave the bad (made yet worse by their accession) behind them.

2 They be not satisfactory, and therefore confer no true content to the mind: no more then the dreamed bread of the Sluggard, who walks with an empty stomach. Thou shalt eat, but not be satisfied. All things are full of labor, man cannot utter it, the eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor the ear filled with hearing. There is nothing but emptiness, vanity, vacuity in them: Simuloriuntur & moriuntur, they at once are borne, and die, as Plutarch said of the Lightning, as Jonah found in his gourd. Like the Mermaid,

Virgo formosa superne,

Desinit in turpem piscem malesuada voluptas.

Face flattering Pleasure, that so much deludes,

Like that Sea-monster with sad ruth concludes.

The motion of the mind following these wandering Planets of earthly delights, is ever errant, ever vncessant, Ahab is sick of his neighbors field, though he have a whole Kingdom to walk in. And Alexander finding himself Lord of the whole world, is discontent, as if he wanted elbow room. The poor man is not more perplexed because he hath neither barn nor grain, then the covetous wretch, because he hath not barn enough for his grain. What Cosmopolite ever grasped so much wealth in his gripulous fist, as to sing to himself a Sufficit. He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver, nor he that loveth abundance with increase. His cares fill up as fast as his coffers. He hath much in his keeping, yet doth neither enjoy it, nor joy in it.

It breeds a disease in the soul, like that in the body, which they call Caninum appetitum, an immoderate desire of meat; whereafter the body looks thin, wan, sickly, as if it were starved. The cold, feculent, viscous, vicious humors of covetousness, desire an unreasonable quantity of worldly goods; yet leave the soul more weak, warish, sickly, then if she neither had, nor had will to do anything. This is the infallible effect of these coveted vanities, vel sequendo labimur, vel assequendo laedimur, the soul either falls in the seeking, or fails in the finding. She is not the better, nay, she is the worse for her longing after them.

Luxuriant animi rebus plerunq, secundis.

The mind may riot and grow rank for a while with these puffings up, but how soon doth a tabe and consumption take it down, when the joy answers not to the expectation of the heart? The world may set such a man in high estimation, The rich hath many friends, but the poor is separated from his neighbors.

Aspicis vt veniant ad candidatecta Columbae,

Accipiet nullas sor dida turris aues.

But all this while others are more satisfied with the sight, then he with the possession of his own Still his soul is hungry, and he knows not how to appease it.

I persuade not all abjuration of the world, as if it could not be used. but it must be abused. As the Philosopher of old, that threw his money into the sea, purposing to drown that, least that should drown him. Or as the new found and fond Votaries, that profess a voluntary want, as if all coin were diseased, and had for the circumscription, à noli me tangere. So the Empiricke to cure the fever, destroys the patient: so the wise man to burn the mise, set on fire his barn. Is there no remedy, but a man must make his medicine his sickness? I speak of things as they are, not as they should be. He that feeds too hungerly on the world, falls with much ease to neglect Christ. As he that was once following him, no sooner heard of his fathers death, but presently left him; thinking perhaps that he should get more by his fathers Executorship, then by his Saviors Discipleshippe, and therefore would leave to minister in Christ's service, that he might administer on his Fathers goods. Hence fall many souls into this spiritual sickness, when they forsake the solid and substantial nutriment of Jesus Christ, to gape for the fugitive and empty air of worldly riches: which if they do carry to their deaths, yet they must then leave all, exuendo, expnendo, donec nihil vel intus vel foris manserit, by putting off, by spuing up whatsoever their covetousness hath devoured. Nature shall turn thē out naked & empty. Thus the righteous eateth, to the satisfying of his soul, but the belly of the wicked shall want. They are not satisfactory.

In a word, that we may a little perpend the effects, as we have perceived the causes; all spiritual sickness is either in faith or conversation.

1. In Faith. This is a general & dangerous sickness. General, AEgrotat sides iam proxima morti. Faith is so sick, that it is ready to die. These are those last and Apostate times, wherein faith is become so little, that the scarcity gives expectation of the general doom. We swear away our faith at every trifle, and then no marvel (being so prodigal of such oaths,) if our stock of faith be sworn and worn out. Dangerous, we affie the world, which we have vowed to defy; and loosing that confidence we should live by, (for the Just lives by faith) How can it be, but the Soul must become Sick? Whiles the shield of faith is lost, we lie naked to the fiery darts of Satan: and many wounds will let out the life blood. The Sun in the heaven passeth through the 12. Signs of the Zodiac. Christ is our Sun, the 12. Articles of our Creed, the 12. Signs, Faith is our Zodiac; do you wonder why in this day of the Gospel, the Sun beams of grace lived in so few hearts? They have lost their Zodiac. Their faith is form, and the clouds of infidelity have eclipsed those Signs. They believe not beyond the extension of sense, they have a sensual, a senseless faith. It is the forest shipwreck, which the vast sea of this world and the Pirates of sin can put men to, the sinking of their faith; It was Paul's happy triumph that he had kept the faith, though he bore about in his body the market of our Lord Jesus. Needs must the soul be sick, whose faith is not sound.

2 The other degree of our spiritual sickness is, in conversation, Our lives are diseased? the ill beating of those pulses show we are not well The fruits manifest the tree, Vbicaro est regnant, peccatum est praegnans: Sins are rife, where the flesh reigns: plentiful effects will arise from such a working cause. In vain, (and not without the more hazard) do we plead our soundness, when the infallible symptoms of our disobedience evince the contrary. Saul stands upon his observation of God's charge: What then (saith Samuel) meaneth the bleating of the sheep in mine ears, and the lowing of the oxen which I hear? Whence flow those streams of impiety; merciless oppressions, Church-devouring sacrileges, bestial luxuries, cunning circumventions, detracting slanders, heaven-threatening blasphemies, malicious fires of rage & hatred, monstrous treacheries, behaviors compounded of scorn and pride, close Atheism, open profaneness, gilded hypocrisy. Whence if these vicious corruptions, if not from our ulcerous conversations? Shame we not to call sickness health; and to maintain that Atheistical Paradox, Adoxe, Pseudodox, which judgeth evil good, and darkness light? If thy life be so unsound suspect thyself, thou art not well.

2 Now (not unfitly) after the sickness in sin, follows the sickness for sin, which distributes it self into a double passion, corporal and spiritual.

1 All corporal sickness is for sin. The sick man heard it from his heavenly Physician, Go thy ways sin no more lest a worse thing come unto thee. So sung David in the Psalms; Fools, because of their iniquities are afflicted, their soul abhorreth all manner of meat, and they draw near to the gates of death. This Elihu grounds against Job, that sin causeth sickness: So that his life abhorreth bread, and his soul dainty meat. His flesh is consumed away, that it cannot be seen, and his bones that were not seen, stick out. Weakness proceedeth from wickedness: if the Soul had not sinned his body should not have smarted. Indeed this blow is easy, if we respect the cause that drew it on us. For if the Wages of sin be death, Sickness is a gentle payment, Sickness is the malady of the body, Death is the malady of sickness. But such is God's mercy, that he is content to punish sometimes corporaliter, non mortaliter; and to put into our hearts a sense of our sins, by casting us down, not by casting us out. But whether the affliction be quoad introitum, or quoad interitum, a more gentle entrance or more piercing to death, all is produced by our sin.

You will say, that many afflictions, wherewith God scourgeth his children, are the Fatherly corrections of love; yet they are corrections, and their intention is to better us. Now what need the bestowing such pains on us, to make us good, if sin had not made us evil. Still Sin is the cause, whether it be sickness: therefore I will make thee sick in smiting thee, because of thy sins. Or whether more despairful calamity, I will wail and howl, I will make a wailing like the Dragons, mournings as the owls: for her wound is incurable. Still the reason is, verse 5. For the transgression of Jacob is all this, and for the sins of the house of Israel. Oh that our sick bodies, when the hand of Visitation hath cast them down) would convey this lesson to our souls, All is for our wickedness. Our stomachs loath meat, because we have overburdened them with God's abused blessings. We have made the Creatures (ordained for our comforts) an occasion of our falling. And now, loe, we abhor to be cheered by those things, wherewith we have erst oppressed our selves. That delicates poured upon a mouth shut up, are as messes of meat, set upon a grave.

Our sins, that remain unpurged by repentance in our bosoms, are not only diseases themselves to our consciences; but vigorous and rigorous enough, to engender diseases in our carcases. We are framed and composed of four Elements, Fire, Air, Water, Earth; and have the kindly concurrence of those four original and principal qualities, heat and cold, moisture and dryness to our making up. Their harmony and peaceful content preserve our little world in health; but if those brethren of one house fall at variance with themselves, their strife will vndoev. So easy is it for God to take rods from our own bodies, wherewith to whip us. Though those outward Elements fire, water, and the rest, forbear to lay on us the strokes of vengeance: yet we have those (primordial) humors within us, whose redundance, defect, or distemperature are means able enough to take our breath from us. How evident is this, when

Some have been burned in the pestilent flames of their hot diseases; the violence whereof hath set their blood on fire, wasted their bowels, scorched their veins, withered away their vital spirits, and left the whole body (flagrantem rogam) as it were a burning pyle.

Some have been choked up with the fumes and vapors ascending from their own crude and corrupted stomachs, and poisoned their spirits no less then with the contagion of infected airs. How many obstructed lungs suck in far better air then they breath out.

Others have been drowned with a deluge of waters in their own bodies, a flood running betwixt their skin and bowels, glutting and overcharging nature so violently, that the life hath not been able to hold up her head: and the soul (like Noah's Dove) returns unto God the Ark of her strength, as not able to set her foot dry in her former habitation.

And yet others have buried themselves alive in the grave of their own earthly melancholy; which casteth such a thick fog and dark obscurity over the brain, that it not only chokes up the spirits of life, like the damp in a vault that extinguisheth the lights, but even offers offensive violence to the Soul. Melancholy men are (as it were) buried before they be dead; and as not staying for a grave in the ground, make their own heavy, dull, cloudy, cloddy, earthen cogitations their own Sepulchers. From what sink arise all these corrupt steams, but from the sins in our own selves, as proper and fit to ingender these sicknesses, as these sicknesses are to bring dissolution? It is our own work to make death better then a better life, or continual sickness, that our meat gives no more sent nor savor, then an offering doth to an Idol. He that sinneth before his maker, let him fall into the hands of the Physician.

6 Spiritual sickness for sin, is yet far more perilous and mortal: nay, well were it for some thus sick, if it were mortal. If the disease would decease, the soul might revive and live. It varies (as some diseases do in the body according to the constitution of the sick) thereafter as the soul is that hath it: whether regenerate or reprobate. The malignancy is great in both, but with far less danger in the former.

1 In the Elect this spiritual sickness is an afflicted conscience, when God will suffer us to take a deep sense of our sins, and bring us to the life of grace through the valley of death, as it were by hell gates unto heaven. There is no anguish to that in the conscience: a wounded spirit who can bear? They that have been valiant in bearing wrongs, in forbearing delights, have yet had womannish and cowerd spirits, in sustaining the terrors of a tumultuous conscience. If our strength were as an army, and our lands not limited save with East and west, if our meat were mana, and our garments as the Ephod of Aaron; yet the afflicted conscience would refuse to be cheered with all these comforts. When God shall raise up our sins, like dust and smoke in the eyes of our souls, and the arrows of his displeasure drink up our blood, and his terrors, seem to fight against us; when he buffets us from his presence, and either hides his countenance from us, or beholds us with an angry look; loe then! if any sickness be like this sickness, any calamity like the fainting soul. Many offenses touch the body which extende not to the soul; but if the soul be grieved, the sympathizing flesh suffers deeply with it. The blood is dried up, the marrow wasted, the flesh pined as if the powers and pores of the body opened themselves, like so many windows to discover the passions of the distressed Prisoner within.

It was not the sense of outward sufferings,) for mere men have borne the agonies of death undaunted) but the wrestling of God's wrath with his spirit, that drew from Christ that complaint, able to make heaven and earth stand agast: My soul is heavy unto the death.

There is comfort even in death, when the clock of our life runs upon her last minutes: but is there any disease during the torments of a racked conscience? This wearisome guest doth God often lodge with his own children, suffering the eye of faith to be shut, and the eyes of flesh and blood open, that sorrow is their bread, and tears their drink, and the still perplexed mind knows not where to refuse it self. Always reserving and preserving his Children (but never d•ing) grace of his Spirit in their hearts: a substance of bl•ssing $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the oke, though it hath cast the leaves, though the barrenness of the boughs, drines of the bark give it for dead and withered. Faith being in a swoon may draw the breath inwardly, not perceived: but destroy it not, for there is a bl•ssing in it.

Neither is this sickness and trouble of conscience properly good in it self, nor any grace of God, but used by God as an instrument of good to his, as when by the spirit of bondage he brings us to adoption. So the Needle that draws the thread through the cloth, is some means to join it together. This is the godly souls sickness for sin, full of sharp and bitter ingredients, but never destitute of a glorious event and victorious triumph. I may say of it as Physicians speak of agues, (which make a man sick for a while, that he may be the sounder a long time after.) This sickness is physic to procure better health.

2 Spiritual sickness for sin in the reprobate hath other effects. To restrain their number, they principal appear in two diseases, or disasters rather, Impenitency and Despair.

1. Impenitency, the symptom of an obdurate and remorseless heart. Who being past feeling, have given themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness. Saint Paul calls it a reprobate mind: a death rather than a sickness. He that labors hereof, is rather deceased, then diseased. This is a heart so hard and impenetrable, that all the holy dew of instructions cannot soften it; all the blows of God's striking rod put no sense into it. It is invulnerable to any stroke, save that which makes a fatal and final end with it. Thou hast stricken them, but they have not grieved, &c. It is just with God, but fearful on whom soever this iu•gement lights, to plague sin with sin, that peccatum sit paena peccantis. For there is evermore some precedent impiety in those ungracious persons, procuring God to deal thus with them. For this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie. That they all might be damned that believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness. First Pharaoh hardens his own heart &c. God all this while holds his peace, gives him the hearing and looking on. In the end he saith I will harden Pharaohs heart; and then puts iron to iron, adamant to adamant, and there is perfected a relentless repentless obduracy.

This is that retaliation of sin, which God returns into their bosoms that foster it, that since they loved cursing, it shall be unto them. So David in the Psalm. (Though indeed it was not in him Precantis votum, but Prophetantis vaticinium: he did not desire it should be so, but he knew it would be so.) Add iniquitieto their iniquity. Neither doth God this by infusion of wickedness, but by subtraction of his spirit. He is causa deficiens, not efficiens; as the revoking of the sun from us causeth darkness: the privation of grace, the position of all ungodliness. It is in him (not peccatum, sed iudicium) not sin, but judgment. When he leaves us to our selves; it is no wonder if we fall into horrid and prodigious sins. Peccatum est malum in se: effectum prioris mali, & causa subsequenteris: est & supplicium, & causa supplicij. Sin is evil in it self, the effect of former evil, the cause of future▪ It is both punishment it self, and the cause of punishment. In all the store house of God's plagues there is not a greater vengeance. With other punishments the body smarteth, the soul groaneth under this. Hence sins multiply without limits, that the plagues may be without end. Every affliction is sore that offends us; but that is direful which withal offends God. Such do at once act and suffer: it is both an active and a passive sin. The punishment they suffer, is (in them) sin; the sin they do, is (from God) a punishment.

There is nothing more wretched, then a wretched man recking his own wretchedness. Either they do not feel as blocks, or they will not feel as Stoics. You know a seared conscience is not sensible: and usual whipping makes some careless of the rod; except it be a stroke that shall fetch blood of the soul. Indeed we are all of one mould, but some are more cloddy and hard, others more soft and relenting. The best in their sorrows, may be more then Conquerors, not more then men. And let the Stoic brag his tetricall conclusions to the world, that no pain can bring sorrow to a Wise man; &c. Let him (being put into that torturous engine of burning brass, called the Horse) bite in his anguish; smother his groans, sigh inwardly, and cry to the Spectators, non sentio, I feel not. The wicked may laugh out lighter punishments; and like the surde deaf, and dead rocks of the sea, not regard the waves of easier judgments beating on them; letting fall no tears of repentance for so many blows. But when God sees that thou digestest his Physic as diet, and with a strange kind of indulgency, wilt neither grieve that thou hast offended, nor that thou art offended: God will strike home, and sharpen at once both his blow & thy sense. Now thou shalt feel; even thy seared heart shall bleed. In a word, the wicked may be senseless Stoics, they cannot be insensible stones. There is in all men an impossibility of impassibility.

But these remorseless wretches, so spiritually sick (not of the stone in the rains, but) in the heart, at least regard not to offend God, whiles God forbears to offend them. They speak softly, they set their mouth against the heavens. The reason is, They are not in trouble, nor plagued as other men. At first they liberally sin and spare not: God lets them alone. loe, now they sin and care not. Impiety, impunity, impenitency thus swiftly follow one at the heels of another. There are some sick of this disease, but not so far gone; of whose recovery there is a little (& but a little) more hope. These have by the chidings of their accusing conscience, a notion, a relish, a guess of the number and nature of their own sins, which because they suspect to be monstrous, they would by no means admit a sight of. Hence they fly the temple, the society of the good, the voice of exhortation, whence soever it soundeth: lest it should call the Souls eye home, to glance at the own estate, and so leave it amazed. Hence he hath (animum inscium, insciturum) an ill sight, an ill-sighted mind.

So timorous is this Patient, that because he knows his wound deep, he will not suffer the Surgeon to search it, willing rather to kill his soul, then to •isquiet it. Such is the folly of his partial indulgence to his conscience, that whiles he would softer it, he doth fester it. They write of the Elephant, that (as if guilty of his own deformity, and therefore not abiding to view his snout in a clear spring:) he seeks about for troubled and muddy waters to drink in, This sick wretch (without question induced by the like reason) refuseth to look into the glass of the Law, or to come to the clear springs of the Gospel, or any perspective that may represent his evil conscience to his eyes, but seeks to muddy and polluted channels, Taverns, Theaters, societies of sin, to drown the thought of former iniquities with floods of new. (And if he be enforced to any such reflection, he spurns and tramples that admonition, as Apes break the glass that represents their deformity, He runs himself prodigally into so deep arrearages and debts, that he cannot endure to hear of a reckoning. Whiles he despairs of sufficiency to pay the old, he reckons not into what new desperate courses and curses he precipitates himself. And as it was in the Fable with the blind woman and the Physician: the Physician coming often to her house, ever carried away a portion of her best goods; so that at last recovered, by that time her sight was come again, her goods were gone. So this wretch will not see the ransacking of his soul, and spoil of his graces, till his conscience be left empty, and then he sees, and cries too late, as Esau for his blessing.

2 That other spiritual sickness for sin, befalling a reprobate soul, is final and total desperation. This is that fearful consequent, which treads upon the heels of the former sickness. Presumption goes before, Despair follows after. Cain's fratricide, Judas treachery, presumptuous, aspiring, heaven-daring sins, find this desperate catastrophe, to cut themselves off from the mercy of God. This is insanabilis plaga, when the Physician promising help of the disease, the patient shall thrust his nails into it, and cry, Nay, it shall not be healed. As if the goodness of God, and the value of Christ's-all sufficient ransom, were below his iniquity. As if the pardon of his sins would empty God's storehouse of compassion, and leave his stock of mercy poor. This is that agony, whose throbs and throws, wrestles, turbulent, implacable cogitations cannot be quieted. Let rivers of those waters of comfort, which glad the City of God, run with full streams unto it, they are resisted and driven back.

This is that sin, which not only offers injury and indignity to the Lord of heaven and earth, but even breaks that league of kindness, which we owe to our own flesh. To commit sin is the killing of the soul, to refuse hope of mercy, is to cast it down into hell. Therefore Saint Jerome affirms that Judas sinned more in despairing of his masters pardon, then in betraying him. Since nothing can be more derogatory to the goodness of God, which he hath granted by promise and oath (two immutable witnesses) to penitent sinners, then to credit the Father of lies before him Ianuas aeternae felicitatis spes aperit, desperatio claudit: Hope opens the door of heaven, desperation shuts it. As faith is heaven before heaven, so despair is damnation before the time.

Shall the blood and death of Christ put sense into rocks and stones, and shall man tread it under his desperate feet, enervate his cross, annihilate his ransom, and die past hope? did he raise three dead men to life, one newly departed, another on the Bear, a third swelling, in the grave: to manifest that no degree of death is so desperate, that it is past his recovery? And shall these men; as iftwice, dead and pulled up by the routes, deny to the grace and glory of God, a possibility of their reviving? 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , God (and the unfeigned repentance of their own hearts) forbid it.

3 Thus we have heard the malignancy of spiritual sicknesses, whether in sin, or for sin. Now let us take a short consideration, how far spiritual sicknesses, are more dangerous then corporal.

The Soul is; at all parts, more precious then the Body. It is that principal, most divine, and excellent half of man. Dum viuiscat, anima: dum vult, animus, dum scit, men's: dum recolit, memoria, dum iudicat ratio, dum spirat spiritus: dum sentit sensus. It is called for quickening, a soul, for knowing, mind, for remembering, memory, for judging, reason, for breathing, spirit, for feeling, sense, when the soul is sick: all these are sick with it. The soul is compared to heaven, the body to earth. The heaven is glorious with Sun, Moon Stars; so the soul with understanding, memory, reason, faith, hope, &c. The body like the earth, whereof it was made, is squalid with lusts. The earth hath no heat nor nourishment, but from heaven, nor the body comfort, but from the soul. How then? oh how terrible is the souls sickness, or death?

How indulgently should we tender the health thereof? We keep our chicken from the kite, our lamb from the Wolf; our fawn from the hound, our doves from the vermin; and shall we yield our darling to the Lions, our soul to those murdering spirits, which endeavor to devour them? The Soul may be well, when the body is full of griefs: but ill goes it with the body, when the soul is sick. Nay even corporal diseases are ofen a means to procure spiritual soundness. Therefore one calls it (optabile malum, cum mali remedium sit maioris,) a happy evil, which is the remedy of a greater evil. We may say of many healthful bodies, tutius aegrotassent, they might with less danger have been sick. Nusquam peius quam in sano corpore, ager animus habitat. A sick mind dwells not rightly in a sound body. But to find a healthful and sound soul in a weak, sickly body is no wonder. Since the Soul (before smothered with the clouds of health) is now suffered to see that through the breaches of her prison, which former ignorance suspected not.

Corporal sickness is a perpetual Monitor to the conscience, every pang a reproof, and every stitch reads a lesson of mortality; ready ever to check for evil, or to invite to good, which duty weighed, a man hath less reason to be over fearful of sickness, then over glad of health. The Spiritual detriment that may ensue on health, is more dangerous then the bodily pain that pursues sickness. If a man fear not death, what power hath sickness to make him miserable? Tolerabilis est morbipraesentia, si contempseris id quod extre•um minatur. Sickness hath little terror in it, if thou shall contemn that which it threateneth, Death. If it teach thee by the sight of the first death instant, to prevent the fury of the second; behold it makes thee blessed. Such good use may the wise Soul make of the bodies enemy. I have read it said, that singulus morbus, paruula mors, every disease is a little death. Therefore God sends us many little deaths, to instruct our preparation for the great death. The oftener a man dies, the better he may know to die well.

I yield, if in sickness we contract and narrow up the powers of our soul, and direct them (as our finger) to the grief of our bodies only; forgetting either that God strikes us, or that we have first stricken God: either flying to ill means, or affying to good means more then to God; our sickness may be deadly to body and soul too. Asa was sick but of his feet, his feet stood far from his heart, yet because he relied more on his Physicians, then on his Maker, he died. Or if there shall be no less confusion and hurly butly in the faculties of the Soul, then there is distemperature in the partes of the body: when Reason which should be the Queen, and dwell in the highest and choicest room, is deposed from her government, When the Senses, which are the Court-guardes, and the Princesses attendants, that give all admission into the Presence; are corrupted: when the supreme faculties, which are the Peers, are revolted; and the Affections which are the Commons perverted: and all this insurrection and disturbance, dethroning the Queen, corrupting the Guard, drawing from fealty the Peers, and the Commons from allegiance, wrought by those violent passions which are refractory and headstrong Rebels, having once gotten head. Alas, how far is this miserable distemper and perturbation of these spiritual parts, above the distress or distraction of the corporal members? neither is the future peril hereof only more full of prodigious desolation, but even the present sense is also more tetricall, piercing, and amazing with horror.

We shall find the perplexity of this spiritual sickness; (how far?) exceeding the corporal, if we either compare them generally, or particularly, instance in any special disease.

1 Generally, The excellency of health, is measured according to the Life, which holds it: and the dignity of Life is considered by the cause that gives it, 1. The Life of the Plant is basest, because it consists but in the juice which is administered by the earth to the root thereof, and thence derived and spread to the parts, 2. The Life of the brute creature excels, because it is sensitive, and hath power of feeling, 3. The Life of man is better then both, because it is reasonable, conceiving & judging of things by understanding 4. The Life of a spiritual man is better then all the former, and it hath two degrees, 1. The life of inchoate regeneration, and it consists in grace, 2. the perfect life of imputed righteousness, conferred and confirmed by Jesus Christ, 5. The Life of Glory exceeds all, whereof there are also two degrees, 1. the fruition of glory in soul, 2. the full possession in the union of the body to it. These two last sorts of Life transcend the former in two main respects, 1. Because the other may die, must die; these have a patent of eternity sealed them, 2. Because the other have transient causes: These have the Grace and Glory of God.

Now as by all consent, the Life of reasonable man is better then the vegetable of plants, or sensitive of beasts; so the health of man must needs be more precious: and as that virtue excels in goodness, so doth the defect exceed in miserableness. Respect man distinctively, as he is a Body only, and then to be sick, and die are common to him with plants and beasts; and what suffering is there in the one, more then in the other, save that as the Beast is more sensible of pain then the tree; so man is more apprehensive then the beast, the bodies of all return to the earth. But man hath a soul, wherein his reason is placed; which fainting or sickening through sin, or the punishment for sin, there is offered a passion and grief, whereof the other are not capable. Death to the rest is not so terrible, as this sickness. The goodlier the building is, the more lamentable the ruin.

2 Particularly, This will best appear, if we single out some special disease, and confer the perplexity it can offer to the body, with the sickness of the soul. Take for instance, the plague of the Leprosy. It was a fearful and unsupportable sickness, every way miserable, as you may find it described, Levite. 13. &c. ver. 45.46. His clothes shall be rent, and his head bare, and he shall put a covering upon his upper lip, and shall cry, Unclean, unclean. He shall dwell alone, without the Campe shall his habitation be.

The Leprosy infected their very garments and houses, sticking contagion in the very wool and walls. But our Leprosy of sin hath (with a more vast extension) infected the Elements, Air, Earth, beasts, plants, &c. sticking scars on the brow of nature, and making the whole Creature groan under the burden of corruption.

2 The Leprosy was violent in spreading, running eftsoons over all the body, as in Gehazi, and making it all as one ulcer; yet could it not penetrate and enter the soul; the mind might be clean in this general defiling of the carcase. Behold the Leprosy of sin hath not content it sefe to insult, pollute and tyrannize over the body, but it defiles the Soul also, and turns that purer parte of Man into a Lazar. Our righteousness is become filthy rags, our heart is poisoned,our Consciencs defiled.

3 The Leprosy was an accidental disease, casual to some, whiles other escaped it. It was God's Pursuiuant to single out and arrest some for their sins, his mercy spaing the rest. But the Leprosy of sin is (haereáitarius morbus) an hereditary sickness. We derive it from our great Sire Adam, with more infallible conveyance then ever son inherited his fathers lands. It is original to us, borne with us, borne before us. So that (natalis would be fatalis) the birth day would be the death day, if the blood of that immaculate Lamb should not cleanse us.

4 The Leprosy was a dangerous disease, yet curable by natural means: but ours is by so much the worse, as it admits not man as Physician, nor nature it se•fe as Physic, sufficient to cure it. The medicine is supernatural; the Blood and Water of that man, who is God. Faith must lay hold on mercy: Mercy alone can heal us.

5 The Leprosy is a sore disease, so entering and eating, that it is even incorporate to the flesh: yet still (cum carne exuitur) it is put off with the flesh. Death is a Pysician able to cure it. Mors vna inter•t & leprosum & Leporam. Death (the best Empericke) kill• at once the Leaper and his Leprosy. But the Leprosy of sin cleans so fast (not only to the flesh, but) to the Soul, that if spiritual death to sin do not slay it, Corporal death shall neither mende it nor end it. It shall not fly the Soul, when the soul doth fly the body: but as it accompanies the one to the judgment fear of God, so it shall meet the other in hell, if they both cannot be rid of it, through Christ on earth,

6 The Leprosy makes man loathsome to man, that (seorsim habitaturus sit) he must dwell alone. So was the Law, He is unclean, he shall dwell alone; without the Campe shall his habitation be. Yea, though he were a King, he must content himself with an unvisited and removed lodging; yet what is it to be secluded from man's (and not to be destitute of the Lord's) company? God forsakes not the clean heart, though man abhors the leprous flesh. God alone is a thousand companions; God alone is a world of friends. He never knew what it was to be familiar with heaven, that complains the lack of friends whiles God is with him. Were thy Chamber a prison, thy prison a Dungeon; yet what Walls can keep out that infinite Spirit? Even there the good soul finds the Sun of heaven to enlighten his darkness, in comparison of whom all the stars in the sky are the snuff of a dim candle. Every cloud darkens our Sun, nothing can eclipse that. But the Leprosy of sin separates a soul from God's fellowship, from the company of Angels. We lie, if we say we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness. Your sins have separated betwixt me and you saith the Lord of hosts. They unhouse our hearts of God's spirit, and expel him from the temple of our souls, who will no longer stay there, when the Dagon of sin is advanced, adored. It is customable with men to eschew the society of their poor, maimed, afflicted, diseased Brethren, and to show some disdain by their averseness: but to keep company with drunkards, adulterers, swearers, userers, &c. of whom alone we have a charge, de non tangendo, they reckon not, E•te not with them? Turn away from them, saith the Apostle, from those so diseased in Soul, not in body. But now ^d (melior est conditio vitij, quam morbi.) the estate of sin is better than of sickness. But God looks unto (and is with) Lazarus living, and takes him into his bosom dying, though he was full of sores: and lets healthy, wealthy, flourishing Dives go by unnamed, unaccepted.

7. The Leprosy kept men but from the fading city, terrestrial Jerusalem. This Leprosy unpurged by repentance, restrains men from that Jerusalem which is above; a city built upon Jaspers and Sapphires and precious stones; flowing (instead of milk and honey) with bliss and glory. For into ^f it shall enter nothing that defileth, nor whatsoever worketh abomination or lies. Now as the pleasures and treasures of this City are more, so much worse is the cause hindering our entrance. You may judge by this taste, how far spiritual sickness is more bitter than corporal. Every circumstance before hath reflected on this; but nunquam satis dicitur, quod nunquam satis addiscitur, it is never taught enough, that is not enough learned.

4 I should now lastly inquire who are the sick, wherein (as the Philosopher said of men; Non vhi sunt, sed vhi non sunt, faoile demonstratur, I can easily show you where they are not, not where they are.) It is a small matter to find out the sick, the difficulty is to find any sound. I know ^g there are a few names in our Sardis, that have not defiled their garments; but they are so few, that it is hard to find them. Run to and fro through the streets, and seek in the broad places of our Cities, if you can find a man, if there be any that executes judgment, and seeketh the truth. The whole World is very old and sick, given over, as man in his dotage to covetousness.

Huius aedest aet as extremae & ferre a mundi,

Alget amor dandi, praeceps amor ardet habendi.

Needs must the world be sick and old

When lust grows hot, and charity cold.

Wonder you at this? •nder is the daughter of ignorance, ignorance of nature. God hath foretold it, event hath fulfilled it. Saint Paul gives the symptoms of this general sickness. Redeem the time, for the days are evil. Our Savior premonish•th the great decay of faith and love, to insue the Apostasy of the latter times. His Apostles testify no less. Paul to Timothy, Know that in the last days perilous times shall come. Men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, &c. (read and observe.) Peter (with others) to make up a cloud of witnesses, prophecieth the like, if not with addition; that men shall be so debauched, as even to deride and scoff at goodness, as a thing rather derisory, than necessary. The plague of sin rankles, and (helped with fit instruments of dispersion) infects the times.

The Scribe points to the Publican, and thinks that destruction comes on the city for his sake. The ungodly Protestant lays the fault on the profane Gallant, that the days are evil, and says that pride devours all. The proud on the covetous Churl: the well conceited Hypocrite on the dissolute; the dissolute on the Hypocrites. Even the wicked think the godly the cause, but the godly know the wicked the cause. Atheists will live as they list. Loquuntur grandia. They lift up their mouths against heaven, and acknowledge no other deity then their own guts. If good cheer may be their sickness, they care not though gluttony be their grave. Grace is fain to give place to wantonness, Religion to Idolatry, honesty to profaneness. Many live, as the Apostle saith of Hymenaeus and Philetus, as if the resurrection was past, or would never come.

I know, there was never age not complained of, not judged as worst. Laudamus veteros &c. We see what is, not what hath been. Some times have been evil, others worse, ours worst of all. We are so much worse than all, because we have more means to be better. We have Atheists that serve no God, ⟨◇⟩ that serve their money, Idolaters that serve creatures, Apostates that forsake God, worldlings, temporizers, neuters, that serve many, serve all, serve none. Love is banished, temperance gives place to drunkenness, humility stoops to pride, hope yields to sense, and religion it self is used either for a show of good, or for a cloak of evil. Men's words disagree from their deeds, their hearts from their words. If any say this world is not so sick, as we give it, I durst tell them that they are a great part of the sickness; and but for such we had less need to complain.

Satan's violence now doubling his forces, shows it to be the last and worst time. For the Devil then rageth most when he knows he shall rage but for a while. The world is sick, the days are evil. You hear what makes them so. Shortly, either doing or suffering ill: sin originally, misery by consequent. If we would bate of our sins God would decrease our miseries. What plagues the world with the sword, but malice and ambition? What turns the poor from their right, but injustice? What brings famine but covetousness? Proud Courtiers make rich Merchants and both make miserable Commons. We multiply sins against God, God's punishments upon us: the former from our unrighteousness, from his righteousness the latter: both together make the world sick, the days evil. I would hope, it were now vain to bid you loath the world. Is he less then mad, that can love and dote on such a cheek? The beauty of it is black without by the miseries, and more foul within by the sins: if any wretch shall now make it his choice, he is not worthy of envy, if of pity, now as a moderne Poet well.

Ther's only one way left, not to admit,

The Worlds infection, to be none of it.

Seeing we are thus sick, why speed we not to means of Sine merito, non sine commodo.

LONDON, Printed for JOHN GRISMAND 1626.

TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE, AND TRVly Noble Lord, WILLIAM, Earl of PEMBROKE.

BY your Honors favor, I had a place in the sad Court of Whitehall this last Lent: and it was so disposed by our blessed Maker, that I know not whether, my Text was a Comment upon the Occasion, or the Occasion upon my Text: they met together with such unhappy happiness. As this Sermon took Birth in the highest Sphere of our Kingdom, so there learning to presume on the help of your Noble wing, it hath adventured to fly abroad. And whither, justly, should it take the first flight, but to your Honors Protection, from whom it received Breath and Motion? I have been bold also to send a pair of Servants to wait upon it, which were produced by other solemn occasions. I humbly beseech your Lordsh. to give them all your Passe: and then I fear not, but that for your Noble Names sake, (not their own merit) wheresoever they light, they shall find kind entertainment; and do yet some more good to the Church of God. Which success, together with your Honors happiness, is still prayed for, by

Your Lordships humbly devoted and ready to be commanded, THO: ADAMS.

THE SINNERS MOURNING HABITE.

IOB. CHAP. 42. VER. 6.

Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.

THis is in many dear regards a mourning and penitential season, therefore I thought best to accommodate it with a penitential Sermon. I abhor myself, &c.

Affliction is a winged Chariot, that mounts up the soul toward heaven: nor do we ever so rightly understand God's Majesty, as when we are not able to stand under our own misery. It was Naaman's leprosy that brought him to the knowledge of the Prophet, and the Prophet brought him to the saving knowledge of the true God: had he not been a leper, he had still been a sinner. Schola crucis, schola lucis: there is no such School instructing, as the cross afflicting. If Paul had not been buffeted by Satan, he might have gone nigh to buffet God, through danger of being puffed up with his revelations.

The Lord hath many messengers, by whom he solicits man: He sends one health, to make him a strongman: another wealth, to make him a rich man: another sickness, to make him a weak man: another loss's, to make him a poor man: another age, to make him an old man: another death, to make him no man. But among them all, none dispatcheth the business surer or sooner than affliction: if that fail of bringing a man home, nothing can do it. He is still importunate for an answer; yea, he speaks, and strikes. Do we complain of his incessant blows? alas, he doth but his office, he waits for our Repentance; let us give the messenger his errand, and he will be gone. Let him take the proud man in hand, he will humble him: he can make the Drunkard sober; the Lascivious chaste: the Angry patient; the Covetous charitable; fetch the Unthrifft Son back again to his Father, whom a full purse had put into an itch of traveling: the only breaker of those wild Colts. Ier. 5. the waters of that Deluge, which (though they put men in fear of their lives) bear them up in the Ark of Repentance higher toward heaven. It brought the brethren to the acquaintance of Joseph, and makes many a poor sinner familiar with the Lord Jesus.

Job was not ignorant of God before, while he sate in the Sun-shine of peace; but resting his head on the bosom of plenty, he could lie at his ease, and contemplate the goodness of his Maker. But as when the Sun shines forth in his most glorious brightness, we are then least able to look upon him: we may solace our selves in his diffused rays and comfortable light, but we cannot fixe our eyes upon that burning Carbuncle. These outward things do so engross us, take up our consideration, and drown our contemplative faculty in our sense; that so long, we only observe the effects of God's goodness, rather than the goodness of God it self. Necessity teacheth us the worth of a friend; as Absynthium, wormwood rubbed upon the eyes, makes them smart a little, but they see the clearer. Therefore Job confessed, that in his prosperity he had only (as it were) heard of God; but now in his trial he had seen him. I heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee: that is, he had obtained a more clear and perspicuous vision of him; the eye being more apprehensive of the object than the ear. Segniius irritant animos dimissa per aures. When we hear a man described, our Imagination conceives an Idea or form of him but darkly: if we see him, and in tentiuelly look upon him, there is an impression of him in our minds: we know his stature, his gesture, his complection, his proportion. Sic oculos, sic ill manus, sic or a ferebat. Such a more full and perfect apprehension of God did calamity work in this holy man; and from that speculation proceeds this humiliation; Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.

Where we may consider three degrees of mortification; the Sickness, the Death, and the Burial of Sin. I abhor myself, there sin is sick and wounded: I repent, there it is wounded and dead: In dust and ashes, there it is dead and buried. To deny ones self, maims concupiscence, that it cannot thrive: to repent, kills it, that it cannot live: in dust and ashes, buries it, that it cannot rise up again. I throw it into the Grave, I cover it with mould, I rake it up in dust and ashes.

But I will not pull the Text in pieces; only I follow the manuduction of the words: for there is not a superfluous word in the verse, as the Psalmist said of the Army of Israel, There was not one feeble person among them. It begins as high as the glory of Heaven, and ends as low as the basest of Earth. The first word [Therefore] respects an infinite God: the last words [Dust and ashes] declare an humbled man. The meditation of the former is the cause of the latter, and the condition of the latter is the way to the former. To study God, is the way to make an humble man: and an humble man is in the way to come unto God. Such a consideration will cast us down to dust and ashes: such a prostration will lift us up to glory and blessedness. Here then is a Jacob's Ladder, but of four rounds. Divinity is the Highest, I have seene thee, Therefore. Mortality is the lowest, Dust and ashes. Between both these, sit two others, Shame and Sorrow; no man can abhor himself, without Shame; nor Repent, without Sorrow. Let your honorable patience admit Job descending these four stairs; even so low as he went; and may all your souls rise as high as he is.

Wherefore.

This refers us to the motive that humbled him; and that appears by the context, to be a double meditation; one of God's majesty, another of his mercy. 1. Of his majesty; which being so infinite, and beyond the comprehension of man, he considered by way of comparison, or relation to the creatures; the great Behemoth of the Land, the greater Leviathan of the Sea; upon which he hath spent the precedent Chapters. Mathematicians wonder at the Sun, that it being so much bigger then the Earth, it doth not set it on fire, and burn it to ashes: but here is the wonder; that God being so infinitely great, and we so infinitely evil, we are not consumed. Whatsoever the Lord would do, that did he, in heaven, in earth, in the Sea, and in all deep places. If man's power could do according to his will, or God's will would do according to his power, who could stand? I will destroy man from the face of the earth, saith the Lord. The original word is, I will steep him, as a man steepes a piece of earth in water, till it turne to dirt: for man is but clay, and forgets his maker, and his matter. None but God can reduce man to his first principles, and the original grains whereof he was made: and there is no dust so high, but this great God is able to give him steeping.

2. Or this was a meditation of his mercy, then which nothing more humbles a heart of flesh. With thee, O Lord, is forgiveness, that thou mightest be feared. One would think, that punishment should procure fear, and forgiveness love: but nemo magis diligit, quàm qui maxim veretur offender: no man more truly loves God, then he that is most fearful to offend him. Thy mercy reacheth to the heavens, and thy faithfulness to the clouds; that is, above all sublimities. God is glorious in all his works, but most glorious in his works of mercy: and this may be one reason, why Saint Paul calls the Gospel of Christ, a Glorious Gospel. Solomon tells us, It is the glory of a man to pass by an offense: herein is God most Glorious, in that he pasleth by all the offenses of his children. Lord, who can know thee, and not love thee; know thee, and not fear thee? fear thee for thy Justice, and love thee for thy mercy: yea fear thee for thy mercy, and love thee for thy Justice, for thou art infinitely good in both.

Put both these together, and here is matter of humiliation, even to dust and ashes. So Abraham interceding for Sodom; Behold, I have taken upon me to speak unto the Lord, which am but dust and ashes. Quanto magis Sancti Diuinitatis interna conspiciunt, tanto magis se nihil esse cognoscunt. It is a certain conclusion; no proud man knows God. Non sum dignus, I am not worthy, is the voice of the Saints: they know God, and God knows them. Moses was the meekest man upon earth, and therefore God is said to know him by name. I am less then the least of thy mercies, saith Jacob; loe, he was honored to be Father of the 12. Tribes, and Heir of the Blessing. Quis ego sum Domine, says David, who am I, O Lord? He was advanced from that lowly conceit to be King of Israel. I am not worthy to loose the latchet of Christ's shoe, saith John the Baptist. Loe, he was esteemed worthy to lay his hand on Christ's head. I am not worthy that thou shouldest come under my roof, says the Centurion: therefore Christ commended him, I have not found so great faith, no not in Israel. I am the least of the Apostles, saith Paul, not worthy to be called an Apostle: therefore he is honored with the title of The Apostle. Behold the handmaid of the Lord, saith the holy Virgin: therefore she was honored to be the Mother of the Lord, and to have all generations call her Blessed. This Non sum dignus, the humble annihilation of themselves, hath gotten them the honor of Saints. In spiritual graces, let us study to be great, and not to know it: as the fixed Stars are (everyone) bigger then the earth, yet appear to us less then torches. In alto non altum sapere; not to be high-minded in high deserts, is the way to blessed preferment. Humility is not only a virtue it self, but a vessel to contain other virtues: like embers, which keep the fire alive that is hidden under it. It emptieth it self, by a modest estimation of the own worth, that Christ may fill it. It wrestleth with God, like Jacob; and wins by yielding: and the lower it stoops to the ground, the more advantage it gets to obtain the blessing. All our pride, O Lord, is from the want of knowing Thee: O thou infinite Maker, Reueale thyself yet more unto us; so shall we abhor our selves, and repent in dust and ashes.

I abhor myself.

It is a deep degree of mortification, for a man to abhor himself. To abhor others is easy: to deny others, more easy: to despise others, most easy. But it is hard to despise a man's self: to deny himself, harder: hardest of all, to abhor himself. Everyone is apt to think well, speak well, do well to himself. Not only Charity, a spiritual virtue, but also Lust, a carnal vice, begins at home. There is no direct Commandment in the Bible, for a man to love himself; because we are all so naturally prone to it. Indeed, we are bound to love our selves; so much is implied in the Precept; Love thy neighbor as thyself; therefore love Thy self, But Modus praecipendus, vt tibiprosis; so love thyself, as to do thyself good. But for a man, upon good terms, to abhor himself; this is the wonder! He is more then a mere Son of Eve, that does not ouervalue himself. Qui se non admiratur, mirabilis est: he that doth not admire himself, is a man to be admired.

Nor is this disease of proud flesh, peculiar only to those persons, whose imperious commands, surly salutations, insolent controulements, witness to the world how little they abhor themselves. But it haunts even the baser condition, and fomes out at the common jaws. A proud beggar was the Wisemans monster; but pride is the daughter of Riches. It is against reason, indeed, that metals should make difference of men: against religion, that it should make such a difference of Christian men. Yet commonly, Reputation is measured by the acre; and the altitude of Countenance is taken by the Pole of Advancement. And as the servant values himself higher or lower, according as his master is: so the master esteems himself greater or less, according as his master, that is, as his Money or Estate is. His heart is proportionably enlarged with his house: his good, and his blood riseth together: Is not this the great Babylon, which I have built for the honor of my Majesty? But you know, he was turned into a beast that said so. Gold and silver are heavy metals, and sink down in the balance: yet by a preposterous inversion, they lift the heart of man upwards: as the plummet of a clock, which, while it self poiseth downwards, lifts up the striking hammer. As Saul upon his anointing, so many a one upon his advancing, is turned quite into another man. God I thank thee, says the Pharisee, that I am not as other men are, nor as this Publican: not as other men, and for this he thanks God: as if because he thought better of himself, God must needs think better of him too. Now he must no more take it as he hath done; a new port, for a new report. He abhors all men, but admires himself. Yet after these blustering insolencies, and windy ostentations, all this thing is but a man, and that (God knows) a very foolish one.

But the children of grace have learned anothe• lesson, to think well of other men, and to abhor themselves. And indeed, if we consider what Master we have served, & what wages deserved, we have just cause to abhor our selves. What part of us hath not sinned, that it should not merit to be despised? Run all over this little Ile of man, & find me one member of the body, or faculty of the soul, that can say with Job's messenger, Ego solus aufugi; I alone have escaped. What one action can we justify? Produce ex tot millibus, vnum. Where is that Innocence, which desires not to stand only in the sight of Mercy? There is in our worst works wickedness, in our best weakness, error in all. What time, what place, are not witnesses against us? The very Sabbath, the day of Rest, hath not rested from our evils. The very Temple, that holy place, hath been defiled with our obliquities. Our chambers, our beds, our boords, the ground we tread, the air we breath, can tell our follies. There is no occasion, which, if it do not testify what evil we have done, yet can say, what good we should, and have not done.

If all this do not humble us, look we up (with Job here) to the Majesty which we have offend•d. To spoil the Arms of a common Subject, or to counterfeit his Seal, is no such heinous or capital crime. But to deface the Arms of the King, to counterfeit his Broad Seal, or privy Signet, is no less then Treason: because the disgrace redounds upon the person of the King. Every sin dishonors God, & offers to stick ignominy upon that infinite Majesty; therefore deserves an infinite penalty. Against thee, O Lord, against thee have I sinned. I, thy creature; against Thee, my Maker: here is a transcendency, which when a man considers, he is worthy to be abhorred of all men, that does not abhor himself.

Yet when God, and our own selves, stand in competition, which do we most respect? Temptation is on our left hand, in a beautiful resemblance, to seduce us. The will, the glory, the Judgment of God, is on our right hand, to direct us: do we now abhor our selves? Commodity sets off iniquity, & woos us to be rich, though sinners: Christ bids us first seek thee kingdom of Heaven, and tells us that other things shall come without seeking, they shall be added unto us: Do we now abhor our selves? Such a sin is pleasing to my lust and concupiscence, but it is displeasing to God and my Conscience: Do I now abhor myself? That we love God far better than our selves, is soon said; but to prove it, is not so easily done. He must Deny himself, that will be Christ's servant. Many have denied their Masters, many have denied their Friends, many have denied their Kinred, not a few have denied their Brothers, some have denied their own Parents, but to deny themselves, durus hic sermo, this is a hard task. Negare suos, sua, se; to deny their profits, to deny their pleasures, to deny their lusts, to deny their reasons, to deny themselves? no, to do all this they utterly deny.

Yet he that repents truly, abhors himself; Non se vt conditum, sed se vt perditum; not the creature that God made, but the creature that himself made. Repentance loves Animam, non malitiam, carnem, non carnalitatem; the Soul, not the venom of the soul; the flesh, not the fleshliness of it. So far as he hath corrupted himself, so far he abhors himself; and could rather wish non esse, not to be at all, than malum esse, to be displeasing to his Maker.

Thus, if we despise our selves, God will honor us: if we abhor our selves, God will accept us: if we deny our selves, God will acknowledge us: if we hate our selves, God will love us: if we condemn our selves, God will acquit us: if we punish our selves, God will spare us: yea, thus if we seem lost to our selves, we shall be found in the day of Jesus Christ.

I repent.

Repentance hath much acquaintance in the world, and few friends: it is better known than practiced; and yet not more known, than trusted. My scope, now, shall not be the definition of it, but a persuasion to it. It is every man's medicine; an universal Antidote, that makes many a Mithridates venture on poison. They make bold to sin, as if they were sure to repent. But the medicine was made for the wound, not the wound for the medicine. We have read, if not seen, the Battle betwixt those two venomous creatures, the Toad and the Spider: where the greater, being over-matched with the poison of the less, hath recourse to a certain herb, some think the Plantane; with which she expels the infection, and renews the fight: but at last, the herb being wasted, the Toad bursts and dies. We suck in sin, the poison of that old Serpent, and presume to drive it out again with Repentance: but how if this Hearbe of grace be not found in our Gardens? As Traian was marching forth with his army, a poor woman solicited him to do her justice upon the murderers of her only son. I will do thee Justice, woman, says the Emperor, when I return. The woman presently replied; But what if my Lord never return? How far soever we have run out, we hope to make all reckonings even, when Repentance comes: but what if Repentance never comes?

It is not many years, more incitations, and abundance of means, that can work it: but Repentance is the fair gift of God. One would think it a short Lesson; yet Israel was forty years a learning it; and they not sooner got it, but presently forgot it. Reu. 16. We read of men plagued with heat, and pains, and sores; yet they repented not. Judas could have a broken neck, not a broken heart. There is no such inducement to sin, as the presumption of ready Repentance: as if God had no special riches of his own; but every sinner might command them at his pleasure. The King hath Earth of his own, he lets his subjects walk upon it: he hath a Sea, lets them sails on it: his Land yields fruit, let them eat it: his fountains water, let them drink it. But the moneys in his Exchequer, the garments in his Wardrobe, the Jewels in his Jewel-house, none may meddle with, but they to whom he disposeth them. God's common blessings are not denied: his Sun shines, his rain falls, on the righteous and unrighteous. But the treasures of heaven, the robes of glory, the Jewels of Grace and Repentance; these he keeps in his own hands; and gives, not where he may, but where he will. Mans heart is like a door with a Spring lock: pull the door after you, it locks of it self; but you cannot open it again without a key. Mans heart doth naturally lock our grace; none but he that hath the Key of the house of David, can open the door, and put it in. God hath made a promise To Repentance, not Of Repentance: we may trust to that promise, but there is no trusting to our selves. Nature flatters it self with that singular instance of mercy; one malefactor on the cross repenting at his last hour. But such hath been Satan's policy, to draw evil out of good, that the calling and saving of that one soul, hath been the occasion of the loss of many thousands.

Wheresoever Repentance is, she doth not deliberate, tarries not to ask questions, and examine circumstances; but bestirs her joints, calls her wits & senses together: summons her tongue to praying, her feet to walking, her hands to working, her eyes to weeping, her heart to groaning. There is no need to bid her go, for she runs: she runs to the word for direction, to her own heart for remorse and compunction, to God for grace and pardon: and wheresoever she findeth Christ, she layeth faster hold on him, then the Shunnamite did on the feet of Elisha; As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, I will not let thee go: no Gehesi can beat her off. She resolves that her knees shall grow to the pavement, till mercy hath answered her from heaven. As if she had felt an earth quake in her soul, not unlike that Jailor, when he felt the foundations of his prison shaken; she calls for a light the Gospel of truth, and springs in trembling; and the first voice of her lips is, O what shall I do to be saved? She lowes with mourning, like the Kine that carried the Ark; and never rests till she comes to Bethshemesh, the fields of mercy. The good Star that guides her, is the promise of God: this gives her light through all the dark clouds of her sorrow. Confidence is her life, and soul: she draws no other breath then the persuasion of mercy; that the King of Israel is a merciful King. Faith is the heart-blood of Repentance. The matter, composition, constitution, substance of it, is amendment of life: there be many counterfeits that walk in her habit, as King Ahab had his shadows; but that's her substance. Her countenance is spare and thin; she hath not eyes standing out with fatness. Her diet is abstinence; her garment and livery, Sackcloth and ashes: the Paper in her hand, is a Petition; her dialect is Miserere; and lest her own lusts should be bane within her, she sweats them out with confession and tears.

We know, there is no other fortification against the Judgments of God, but Repentance. His forces be invisible, invincible; not repelled with sword and target: neither portcullis, nor fortress can keep them out: there is nothing in the world that can encounter them but Repentance. They had long since laid our honor in the dust, rotted our carcasses in the pit, sunk our souls into hell, but for Repentance. Which of those Saints, that are now saved in heaven, have not sinned upon earth? What could save them but Repentance? Their infirmities are recorded, not only for the instruction of those that stand, but also for the consolation of them that are fallen. Instruunt Patriarchy, non solùm docentes, sed & errantes. They do not only teach us by their Doctrines, but even by their very errors. Noah was overcome with a little wine, that escaped drowning with the world in that Deluge of water. Lot was scorched with the flame of unnatural lust, that escaped burning in the fire of Sodom, Sampson, the strongest; Solomon, the wisest, fell by a woman. One Balm recovered them all, blessed Repentance. Let our souls, from these premises, and upon the assurance of God's promises, conclude; that if we repent, our sins are not greater, God's mercies cannot be less. Thus was Nineveh overthrown, that she might not be overthrown. Quae peccatis perit, fletibus stetit. Every man must either be a Ninevite, or a Sodomite: a Ninevite sorrowing for sin, or a Sodomite suffering for sin. Doleat peccata reus, vt deleat peccata Deus. If we grieve, God will forgive.

Nor yet must we think, with this one short word (I repent) to answer for the multitude of our offenses; as if we that had sinned in parcels, should be forgiven in gross. It were a rare favor, if we paying but one particular of a whole Book of debts, should be granted a general acquittance for them all. No, let us reckon up our sins to God in confession, that our hearts may find a plenary absolution. Nor is it enough to recount them, but we must recant them. Do we think, that because we do not remember them, that God hath forgotten them? Are not debts of many years standing, to be called for? Mans Justice doth not forbear old offenders: no tract of time can eat out the Characters of blood. Thou writest bitter things against me, when thou makest me to possess the sins of my youth. These things hast thou done, saith God, and I held my peace: therefore thou thoughtest me altogether such a one as thyself: but I will reprove thee, and set them in order before thine eyes. Therefore let us number all the sins we can, and then God will forgive us all the sins that we have.

If we could truly weigh our iniquities, we must needs find a necessity, either of repenting, or of perishing. Shall we make God to frown upon us in heaven, arm all his creatures against us on earth? shall we force his curses upon us and ours? Take his rod, and teach it to scourge us with all temporal plagues; and not repent? Shall we wound our own consciences with sins, that they may wound us with eternal torments; make a hell in our bosoms here, and open the gates of that lower hell to devour us hereafter; and not repent? Do we, by sin, give Satan a right in us, a power over us, an advantage against us; and not labor to cross his mischiefs by repentance? Do we cast Brimstone into that infernal fire, as if it could not be hot enough, or we should fail of tortures except we make our selves our own tormentors; and not rather seek to quench those flames with our penitent tears?

If we could see the farewell of sin, we would abhor it, and our selves for it; Could David have conceived the grief of his broken bones, beforehand; he had escaped those aspersions of lust and blood. Had Achan foreseen the stones about his ears, before he filch'd those accursed things, he would never have fingerd them. But it may be said of us, as it was of our first parents; when they had once sinned and fallen; Tunc aperti sunt oculi eorum, Then their eyes were opened; Then, not before. In this place comes in Repentance; as a rectifier of disorders, a recaller of aberrations, a repairer of all decays and breaches. So it pleaseth God's mercy, that the daughter should be the death of the mother. Peccatum tristitiam peperit, tristitia peccatum conteret. Sin bred sorrow, sorrow shall kill sin: as the oil of Scorpions healeth the sting of Scorpions.

If I should give you the picture of Repentance, I would tell you, that she is a Virgin fair and lovely: and those tears which seem to do violence to her beauty, rather indeed grace it. Her Brest is sore with the strokes of her own penitent hands; which are always, either in Moses his posture in the Mount, lifted up towards heaven; or the Publicans in the Temple, smiting her bosom. Her knees are hardened with constant praying, her voice is hoarce with calling to heaven; and when she cannot speak, she delivers her mind in groans. There is not a tear falls from her, but an Angel holds a bottle to catch it. She thinks every man's sins less then her own, every man's good deeds more. Her compuncions are unspeakable; known only to God, and her self. She could wish, not only men; but even beasts, and trees, and stones, to mourn with her. She thinks, no Sun should shine, because she takes no pleasure in it; that the Lilies should be clothed in black, because she is so appareled. Mercy comes down, like a glorious Cherub, and lights on her bosom, with this message from God; I have heard thy prayers, and seen thy tears: so with a handkerchief of comfort, dries her cheeks, and telles her that she is accepted in Jesus Christ.

In dust and ashes.

I have but one stair more, down from both Text and Pulpit; and it is a very low one; Dust and ashes.

An adorned body is not the vehicle of an humbled soul. Job, before his affliction was not poor. Doubtless, he had his Wardrobe, his change and choice of garments. Yet now, how doth his humbled soul contemn them! as if he threw away his vesture, saying; I have worn thee for pomp, given countenance to a silken case; I quite mistook thy nature, get thee from me, I am weary of thy service, thou hast made me honorable with men, thou canst get me no estimation before the Lord. Repentance gives a farewell, not only to wonted delights, but even to natural refreshings. Job lies not on a bed of Roses and Violets, as did the Sybarites; nor on a couch beautified with the Tapestry of Egypt; but on a bed of Ashes. Sackcloth is his apparel; dust and ashes the lace and embroyderie of it. Thus Niniuhs King, upon that fearful sentence, rose from his throne, laid his robe from him, covered himself with sackcloth, and sate in ashes. O what an alteration can repentance make? From a King of the earth, to a worm of the earth: from a foot-cloth, to sackcloth: from a Throne, to a dunghill: from sitting in State, to lying in ashes! Whom all the reverence of the world attended on, to whom the head was uncovered, the knee bowed, the body prostrated; who had as many salutations, as the firmament stars, God save the King: He throws away Crown, scepter, Majesty, and all, and sits in ashes. How many doth the golden Cup of Honor make drunk, and driven from all sense of mortality! Riches and hearts ease, are such usual intoxications to the souls of men; that it is rare to find any of them so low as Dust and Ashes.

Dust, as the remembrance of his original: Ashes, as the representation of his end: Dust, that was the mother: Ashes, that shall be the daughter of our Bodies.

Dust, the matter of our substance, the house of our souls, the original grains whereof we were made, the top of all our kindred. The glory of the strongest man, the beauty of the fairest woman; all is but dust. Dust; the only compounder of differences, the absolver of all distinctions: who can say, which was the Client, which the Lawyer: which the borrower, which the lender: which the captive, which the Conqueror; when they all lie together in blended dust?

Dust; not Marble, nor Porphyry, Gold nor precious stone, was the matter of our bodies; but earth, and the fractions of the earth, dust. Dust, the sport of the wind, the very slave of the besom. This is the pit from whence we are digged; and this is the pit, to which we shall be resolved. Dust thou art, and to dust thou shalt return again. They that sit in the dust, and feel their own materials about them, may well renounce the ornaments of pride, the gulf of avarice, the foolish lusts of concupiscence. Let the covetous think, what do I scrape for? a little golden dust: the ambitious, what do I aspire for? a little honorable dust: the libidinous, what do I languish for? a little animated dust, blown away with the breath of God's displeasure.

O how goodly this building of man appears, when it is clothed with beauty and honor! A face full of majesty, the throne of comeliness; wherein the whiteness of the Lillie contends with the sanguine of the Rose: an active hand, an erected countenance, an eye sparkling out luster, a smooth complexion, arising from an excellent temperature and composition: whereas other creatures, by reason of their cold and gross humors, are grown over, beasts with hair, fowls with feathers, fishes with scales. O what a workman was this, that could raise such a Fabric out of the earth, and lay such orient colors upon Dust! yet all is but Dust, walking, talking, breathing dust: all this beauty but the effect of a well concocted food, and life it self but a walk from dust to dust. Yea, and this man, or that woman, is never so beautiful, as when they sit weeping for their sins in the dust: as Mary Magdalene was then fairest, when she kneeled in the dust, bathing the feet of Christ with her tears, and wiping them with her hairs: like heaven, fair sight-ward, to us that are without; but more fair to them that are within.

The Dust is come of the same house that we are: and when she sees us proud, and forgetful of our selves, she thinks with her self, Why should not she, that is descended as well as we, bear up her plumes as high as ours. Therefore she so often borrows wings of the wind, to mount aloft into the air, and in the streets and high ways, dasheth herself into our eyes: as if she would say, Are you my kindred, and will not know me? will you take no notice of your own mother? To tax the folly of our ambition, the dust in the street takes pleasure to be ambitious.

The Jews in their mourning, used to rend their garments; as if they would be revenged on them, for increasing their pride, and keeping them from the sight of their nakedness. Then they put on sackcloth, and that sackcloth they sprinkled over with dust, and overstrawed with ashes: to put God in mind, that if he should arm his displeasure against them, he should but contend with dust and ashes; and what glory could that be for him? Shall the dust praise thee, O God; or, art thou glorified in the pit? Nay, rather, how often doth the Lord spare us, because he remembers we are but dust? To show that they had lifted up themselves above their creation, and forgot of what they are made; now by by Repentance returning to their first Image, in all prostrate humility they lay in the dust; confessing, that the wind doth not more easily disperse the dust, then the breath of God was able to bring them to nothing.

Thus, Dust is not only Materia nostra, or Mater, our Mother, or matter whereof we are made; for our foundation is in the dust. But Patria nostra, our Country where we shall dwell; Awake ye that dwell in the dust. We are no better then the dust we shake off from our feet, or brush off from our clothes. O, therefore let us turn to God in dust, before he turn us into dust. Yea, Saint Augustine goes further, and says, that not only the bodies of all men, but even the souls of some men, are no better then dust. They are so set upon earth, and earthly things, that they are transformed into earth and dust: and so become the food of that old Serpent, whose punishment was to eat the dust.

For Ashes, they are the Emblem or representation of greater misery: Dust only shows us, that we have deserved the dissolution of our bodies; Ashes put us in mind that we have merited also the destruction of our Souls. Ashes are the leavings of the fire, the offalls of consumed substances. When God shall give up the largest buildings of Nature to the rage of that Element, it shall reduce them to a narrow room, the remnants shall be but ashes. This was all the Monument of those famous cities, Sodom, Gomorra, and the rest; heaps of ashes. Ecce vix totam Hercules implevit vrnam, says the Poet; that great Giant scarce makes a pitcher of ashes.

For this cause, the Ancients used to repent in Ashes; remonstrating to themselves, that they deserved burning in endless fire, more then those Ashes wherein they wallowed. Yea, if Abraham compared himself to dust and ashes, I may compare my soul to a spark hid in the Ashes: which, when sickness and death shall stir up; like fire, she takes her flight upwards, and leaves the heavy fruitless ashes of my body behind her.

In both, we have a Lesson of our own mortality. The finger of GOD hath written the Epitaph of man; the condition of his body, like Characters printed in the Dust. Mans body, so well as the ice, expounds that Riddle; the gignit filia matrem: the daughter begets the mother; Dust begot a body, and a body begets Dust. Our bodies were at first strong Cities; but then we made them the Forts of Rebels: our offended Liege sent his Serieant Death to arrest us of high Treason. And though for his mercies sake in Christ, he pardoned our sins, yet he suffers us no more to have such strong houses; but lets us dwell in paper Cottages, mud walls, mortal bodies. Methuselah lived nine hundred sixty nine years; yet he was the son of Enoch, who was the son of Iared, who was the son of Malaleel, who was the son of Cainan, who was the son of Enos, who was the son of Seth, who was the son of Adam, who was the son of Dust. Ask the woman that hath conceived a child in her womb; Will it be a Son? Peradventure so: Will it be well formed and featured? Peradventure so: Will it be wise? Peradventure so: Will it be rich? Peradventure so: Will it be long-lived? Peradventure so: Will it be mortal? Yes, this is without peradventure; it will die. Even a Heathen, when he heard that his son was dead, could say without changing countenance, Scio me genuisse mortalem; I know that I begot a mortal man.

An old man is said to give Alexander a little Jewel; and told him, that it had this virtue; so long as he kept it bright, it would out-value the most fine gold or precious stone in the world; but if it once took dust, it would not be worth a feather. What meant the Sage, but to give the Monarch an Emblem of his own body; which being animated with a Soul, commanded the world; but once fallen to dust, it would be worth nothing: for a living dog is better then a dead Lyon.

I conclude, I call you not to casting Dust on your heads, or sitting in Ashes▪ but to that sorrow and compunction of Soul, whereof the other was but an external Symbole or testimony. Let us rend our hearts, and spare our garments; humble our souls, without afflicting our bodies. It is not a corps wrapped in Dust and Ashes, but a contrite heart, which the Lord will not despise. Let us repent our sins, and amend our lives: so God will pardon us by the merits, save us by the mercies, and crown us with the glories of Jesus Christ.

A SERMON PREACHED AT THE TRIENNIALL Visitation of the Right Reverend Father in God, the Lord Bishop of LONDON, in Christ-Church.

BY THOMAS ADAMS.

LONDON, Printed by Aug. Matthews, and John Norton. 1625.

A VISITATION SERMON.

ACTS 15.36.

And some days after, Paul said unto Barnabas, Let us go again and visit our Brethren, in every City where we have preached the Word of the Lord, and see how they do.

There be certain royal Laws, which Christ and his Apostles made for eternal use: to the observation whereof all Christian Nations and persons are unchangeably bound. And there be some ritual things, which were at the first convenient, but variable according to the difference of times and places. Strictly to impose all these circumstances on us, were to make us, not the sons, but the slaves of the Apostles. That is a fond scrupulousity, which would press us in all fashions with a conformity to the Primitive times: as if the Spouse of Christ might not wear a lace or a border, for which she could not plead prescription.

Diuersitas rituum commendat vnitatem fidei, saith our Anselm. Let us keep the substance; for the shadow, God hath left us at liberty. But yet when we look back upon those first patterns, & find a rule of discipline fit for the present times; in vain we should study a new, that are so well accommodated with the old. The business of the Text, and Day, is a Visitation: a practice, which at the first view of the words, can plead Antiquity; and by a review, shall plead the great utility. I know there be diverse kinds of Visitations: but whether they be National, Provincial, Paroeciall, or Capitular; they all have Authoritatem vberimam, being grounded upon a practice Apostolical: and vsum saluberrimum, (to use the words of Saint Augustine) being of a physical nature, to prevent or cure distemperatures in the Church of God.

Generally, the form of the words is a Motion; the matter, a Visitation.

1. The motion was Paul's, the forwardest soldier in all the army of Christ: that winged Husbandman, who plowed up the fallow hearts of the Gentiles that with a holy zeal, greater then the ambition of Alexander, would sooner have wanted ground; then desire to travel in the business of his Master. Terra citius defecisset, quàm studium praedicandi▪ Indeed, he had found an unusual mercy, as himself delivers it. The grace of our Lord was exceeding abundant toward me: using an extraordinary phrase, to express an extraordinary grace: a word never the like used, for a mercy never the like exhibited. There is 'Oil in the widows cruse to sustain; Aaron's was far more, it ran down to the skirts of his clothing. Such a superabundant grace was in Paul. For Sanctification; many Saints are commended for some special virtues; Abraham for Faith, Moses for Meekness, David for Thankfulness, Job for Patience; Paul is praised for them all. For subduing of vices; men most sanctified have had some tangs; as David of anger for Nabal's churlish answer; Hezekiah had a smack of pride; setting aside concupiscence, Paul had no spot. For knowledge; he was wrapped up into heaven, there learned his Divinity among the Angels; his School being Paradise, his University the third Heaven, and God his Tutor. For power; his very clothes wrought miracles. God so trusted Paul, that he committed his whole Church unto him. Thus was he honored: the other Apostles were sent a Christo mortali, Paul a Christo immortalis. And with the like superabundant grace did he answer his charge; that though he were Nouissimus in ordine, he was primus in merito. Yea, he is well called God's Arrow, wounding every soul that heard him, with the love of Christ. This was his motion, one act of his Apostolical care.

2. The matter is a Visitation; to visit is a word of great latitude, and signifies the performance of all Pastoral duties: to instruct the ignorant, to comfort: the weak, to correct the stubborn, to confirm the religious. Strictly, it imports a Superiors scrutiny or examination of things under his charge: as • Steward in a Family ouerlookes the under-servants; praising the forward, provoking the sluggard, & rectifying disorders, which are ready to creep in through the least connivance. This we shall the better apprehend, if we let the Text fall into parts; of which we shall find seven.

1. The Visitors, Paul and Barnabas; for this Office was at first Apostolical, and hath ever since been Episcopal.

2. The visired, Their Brethren; whether the people under the Pastors, or the Pastors set over the people: for as they ought to visit their own particular charges, so the Bishops to visit them: yea, and even those Visitors may be visited, by such Delegates as the Prince appoints, who is the chief Visiter under Christ.
3. The exercise, or frequent use of this office, Let us go again. For the rareness of performing this duty may breed much inconvenience.
4. The moderation, or seasonableness of it; After certain days. There must be some intermission, or else the assiduity may make it a burden, or bring it into contempt.
5. The latitude or extent of it; In every city; not calling all the world to one place; as the Bishop of Rome did in his glory, summoning all Nations to his Consistory. They visit every City, they compel not every city to visit them. Nor do they balk the greatest for fear, nor neglect the meanest in contempt; but every City.
6. The limitation, restraint, or confining of this Exercise; Where we have preached the Word of God. Pagans are out of their walk; they meddle not with unbelievers: but with those grounds wherein they have sown the seeds of the Gospel.
7. Lastly, the intent and scope of all, To see how they do; Quomodo se habeant; whether they fail, or thrive in their spiritual growth. These be the passages; whereof with what brevity I can, and with what fidelity I ought.

The Visitors,

Paul and Barnabas. There is difference, I know, betwixt the Apostles and Bishops. For besides their immediate calling, and extraordinary endowments; the Apostles function was an unlimited circuit, Ite in vniuersum orbem, the Bishops is a fixed or positive residence in one City. All those acts, which proceeded from supernatural privilege, ceased with their cause; as the gift of tongues, of miracles, & the like. Those tools that serve for the foundation, are not the fittest for the roof. The great Master-Builder made choice of such for the first stones, whi•h he• meant not to employ in the walls. But this is the first thing I would here note;

The first foundation of the Church was laid in an Inequalitie; and hath ever since so continued. Paritie in government is the mother of confusion and disorder, & disorder doth ill become the Church of God. Where all the strings or voices be vnisons or of one tenor, there can be no harmony. There be 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, Seers: which signifies the duty of each Pastor over his flock. And there be 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, Overseers, such as must visit and overlook both flock and Seers. In the Old Testament, together with the parity of Priesthood, there was an imparity of government: one Levite above another, Priests above them, the High Priest above them all. Christ himself is said to be a Priest after the Order of Melchisadech: he was of some order then: but we have those that would be Priests without any order at all; that refuse to be ordered.

Take away difference, and what will follow, but an Anabaptistical ataxie or confusion? It was the saying of Bishop Jewel, or the Jewel of Bishops; All Priests have Idem Ministerium, sed diuersam potestatem. A Bishop and an Archbishop differ not in Potestate Ordinis, sed in potestate Regiminis. Nor doth a Bishop differ from a Pastor, quoad virtutem Sacerdotij, sed quod potentiam Iurisdictionis. There is one indelible character of Priesthood to them both. That great Clauiger of heaven, who opens and no man shuts, shuts and no man opens, hath left two Keys for the government of the Church: the one Clauem Scientiae, the preaching of the Gospel, which is the more essential part of our function: for a necessity is laid upon us, and woe unto us if we preach not the Gospel, if we turn not that Key. The other Clauem Potentiae, the Key of Jurisdiction or Discipline; which makes the Church Acie ordinatam, an Army well marshalled. The former imposeth a Duty, and Haec oportet facere: the latter importeth a Decency, and Haec decet fieri. Thus did the great Shepherd of Israel govern his flock; with Two Staues. One the Staff of Bands, sound Doctrine: the other the Staff of Beauty, orderly Discipline. Saint Paul joins them both together; the steadfastness of their faith, and the comeliness of their Order, and makes them the matter of his Joy in the Collossians. Without order, Faith it self would be at a loss. Even the Stars do not fight from heaven, but in their order. Therefore is our Ministry called Orders, to show that we are bound to Order above other Professions. This orderly distinction of Ecclesiastical persons is set down by the Holy Ghost, 1. Cor. 12. placing some as the head, other as the eyes, other as the feet: all members of one Body, with mutual concord, equal amity, but unequal dignity. To be a Bishop then, is not a Numerall, but a Munerall function; a priority in order, a superiority in degree. Who is a faithful and wise servant, whom his Lord hath made ruler over his household; Quem Dominus constituit super familiā? All Ministers of Christ have their due honor, some are worthy of double honor. Far be it from us sinners, to grudge them that honor, whereof God himself hath pronounced them worthy. This first. Again,

Paul and Barnabas. Paul was a man of ardent zeal, Barnabas is interpreted the son of cōsolation. Paul would have Barnabas along with him; that the lenity of the one might somewhat mitigate and qualify the fervor of the other. Thus Moses was with Elias, whē they both met with Christ transfigured on the Mount. Elias was a fiery spirited Prophet, inflamed with holy zeal: Moses a Prophet of a meek and mild spirit: these two together are fit servants to wait upon the Son of God. I do not say, that either Paul wanted compassion, or Barnabas fervency: but this I say, that both these tempers are a happy composition in a Visiter: and make his Brest like the sacred Ark, wherein lay both Aaron's Rod, and the Golden pot of Manna: the Rod of correction, the Manna of consolation: the one a corrosiue, the other a cordial. Spiritual Fathers should be like natural mothers, that have both vbera, and verbera: or like Bees, having much honey, but not without a sting. Only, let the sting be the least in their desire or intention, and the last in execution: like God himself, Qui habet in Potestate vindictam, sed mauult in vsu misericordiam.

There have been some, who did put lime and galle into the milk; yea ministered pro lacte venenum: Bone's and Gardiners, that gave too sharp physic for the disposition of their patients. That (as the Antiochians said of Julian, taking occasion by the Bull which he stamped on his coin) have goared the world to death. That, as if they had Saul's Commission to vex the Church of Christ, have concluded their Visitations in blood. But mercy, no less then holiness, becomes the breastplate of Aaron. I deny not the necessity of Jurisdiction, both corrective & coactiue: the one restraining where is too much forwardness, the other enforcing where is slackness. There is a Rod, and there is a Sword. Veniam ad vos in virga? that's the Rod. Vtinam absindantur qui perturbant vos; that's the Sword. If we observe God's proceeding in the Church, we shall find how he hath fitted men to the times and occasions. In the low and afflicted estate of Israel, they had Moses; a man of meek spirit, and mighty in wonders. Meeke, because he had to do with a teatchy and froward people: mighty in wonders, because he had to do with a Pharaoh. When they were settled in a quiet consistence, they had a grave & holy Samuel. In their corrupted declination, they had a hot-spirited Elijah; who came in a tempest, as he went out in a whirlwind. These times of ours be of a sinful and depraved condition; therefore have need to be visited with spirits more stirring then those of the common mould. Imo, veni Paul cum virga; come Paul with thy Rod. Rather let us smart with correction, then run on to confusion.

The Visited.

Their Brethren. Such was that great Apostles humility, that he calls all believers Brethren: to show that he had but the privilege of a Brother; and did no otherwise then all the rest, bear the arms of the Elder. Yea, why should not an Apostle accept of that title, when the eternal Son of God is not ashamed to call us brethren? The weakest Christian is a Brother to the holiest Saint, therefore not to be contemned. It is most unnatural for a man to despise his brother, the son of his own father. It is a brand set upon that tongue, which must burn with quenchlesse flames; That it spake against his brother, and slandered his own mothers son. Bishops are in the chiefest respect Brethren to the Ministers, in a meaner regard they are Fathers. They are our Fathers, but in that respect whereby they govern us: but in that respect which doth save us, they are our Brethren. Fratres in salute, Patres in ordine ad salutem. Even Princes should not scorn the Brotherhood of their subjects: for howsoever on earth there is a necessity of these ceremonial differences; yet in the grave for our bodies, in heaven for our souls, there is no such distinction. If there be any disparity after this life, it shall be Secundum opera, not secundum officia: proportioned to the works they have done, not to the honors they have borne. Saint Paul calls Timothy, in one place his Son, in another place his Brother.

Bishops are brethren to Ministers in a three-fold relation. 1. By nature, so are all men. 2. By grace, so are all Christians. 3. By office, so are all Pastors. He that Mat. 24.45. was called Rector super familiam, Ruler over the household: the same is also termed, ver. 49. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, a fellow servant with the rest of the meany. All servants under one Lord, though some superior in office to the rest. As in the civil State, within that honorable rank, both Earls and Lord's are called Barons, yet their dignities are not equal: every Earl being a Baron, but not every Baron an Earl. So in the State Ecclesiastical, in respect of the general service of Christ, the dispensation of his Word and Mysteries, Bishops and Priests are all Brethren, and fellow-Presbyters: yet though the Stiles be communicable, the terms are not convertible: for every Bishop is a Priest, but every Priest is not a Bishop. As this therefore no way diminisheth their authority, for Episcopus est sacerdotum Princeps, saith Ignatius: so it commendeth their humility, to call us Brethren. If we offend, Paterna agant, let them correct us as their children: while we do well, Fraterna teneant, let them encourage us as their Brethren. God is not tied to means: for illumination of the mind, he often lights a great Lamp of the Sanctuary at a little wax Taper, as he did Paul by Ananias. And for moving of affections, often with a puff of wind he stirs up the waves of the great Ocean. Deus non est parvus in parvū; not straitened according to the smallness of the Organ. On the one side love and gravity, on the other side obedience and sincerity, on all sides holiness and humility, becomes the Ministers of Jesus Christ.

The Exercise, or due practice of this office.

Let us go again. Let us go, that is, go personally. Let us go again, that is, go frequently.

1. Let us go; not send our Deputy, but go our selves. He that sends, sees by another's eyes, and takes the state of things upon trust. If we go, we see by our own, and our own eyes be our best informers. How is he Episcopus, that never ouerlooks. So Saint Jerome in his Epistle to Nepotian, nitatur esse quod dicitur. He is an ill Shepherd, that does not know Vultum pecoris. Know the state of thy flocks, and the face of thy herds. Desire to see them, quomodo Moses voluit videre Deum, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, face to face. In the Prouerb, Domini oculus pascit equū, & vestigia eius pinguefaciunt agrum. The Masters eye feeds the horse; the presence of the Bishop, like the North wind, dispels infection. It was Paul's continual fear; some prevarication in his absence. I fear I shall not find you such as I would, and that I shall be found to you such as you would not. Saint Peters Shadow wrought miracles, but now the Bishops shadow will work no miracles. This is one special thing to be visited and examined, the residence of Pastors in their Charges. It is an unhappy thing for a man to be a stranger at home. Damasus compares such to wanton women; which no sooner bear children, but presently put them forth to nurse, that with less trouble they may return to their old pleasure. Peraldus, a Popish writer, is so bitter against those that feed their flocks by Deputies, that he says, It is as if a man should marry a wife, and suffer another to get children by her. •Iudque Clictovaei, magis salsum quam falsum; Vicariam quidem salutem, personalem vero perniciem, talibus manere.

I know, there is a Residence Persona^l, and Pastoral: and he that is a stranger to the Pulpit, though he straggle not out of the bounds of his Parish, is the greatest Non-resident. And I grant, that in some cases a dispensation is requisite; Cedat minus maiori; yet it is no hurt to pray, God persuade them all to dwell in their own Tents. But it is not well, for a Preacher to be like a door, when it is once oyled, then to leave creaking. It was a Friers conceit upon Gen. 6. when the Clergy, those sons of God, began to doat upon the daughters of men, to be enamored on temporal preferments; then by such marriages, monsters were begot in the Church, and the Sanctuary of God was filled with Giants, far from the shape of Christians. It is pity, but the Bishop should forbid the Banns; and if any such Marriage be, it is more then time to make it a nullity; by diuorcing them from Idleness, covetousness, and ambition. The faithful Steward is he that gives the household their portion of meat in due season. 1. He must give them all meat, young and old, rich and poor, weak and strong. 2. In due season, that is, when their appetites call for it; nay, he must not always stay till they desire it. 3. Proprijs manibus, he must do it with his own hands: he is but a deputy, and therefore is not evermore allowed a deputy. Let us go our selves.

2. Let us go again. The building of the Church goes slowly forward: though there be many laborers, there be more hinderers: God never had so many friends, as enemies. If the Overseers look not well to the business, too many will make Church-work of it; for such loitering is now fallen into a Proverb. Men are fickle, as were the Galatians, and Churches of Asia: if they be not often visited, they will soon be corrupted. Luther said in Wittenberge, that a few fanatical fellows had pulled down more in a short space, then all they could build up again in twenty years. The devil is always busy; and it is no small labor to earth that Fox. The plant which we would have thrive, must be often watered. The Apostles did visit to confirm, and comfort, because that was a time of persecution. Our mischief is intestine; Pax a paganis, pax ab haereticis, nulla pax a falsis filijs. Let but Moses turn his back, and ascend the mount, to be Israel's Lieger with God, the people presently speak of making a Calf. He went but on their Ambassage to their Maker: yet as if they had seen him take his heels, and run into the wilderness; he is no sooner vanished out of their sight, then out of their mind, and they fall to Idolatry. Our Churches are not like Irish timber: if they be not continually swept, there will be spiders and cobwebs. If the servants sleep, the Masters field is not privileged from Tares. Therefore to prevent dangers, and to heal diseases, frequent visitation is necessary for the Church of Christ.

The Moderation, or seasonableness of it.

After certain days. Ex assiduitate vilitas; that which is too common, becomes cheap, and loseth credit. Due respirations are requisite in the holiest acts. God is so favorable to his creatures, that he requires them not to be overtoyled in the works of his own service. When the Temple was a preparing, the thirty thousand workmen wrought not continuedly, but with intermission. One month they were in Lebanon, and two at home: so their labor was more generous, & less burthensome. Ever, ten thousand did work, while twenty thousand breathed. The mind that is overlaid with business, grows dull and heavy: over lavish expense of spirits leaves it heart-less. The best horse will tire soonest, if the reins lie loose on his neck. Perfection comes by leisure, and no excellent thing is done at once. The Gourd, which came up in a night, withered in a day: but the plants that live long, rise slowly. It is the rising and setting of many Suns, that ripens the business both of nature and art. Who would not rather choose many competent meals, then buy the gluttony of one day, with the fast of a whole week? Therefore the reverend Fathers of the Church observe their due times of Visiting; and particular Pastors have their set days of feeding. He is an ill Fisher, that never mends his net; a bad Mower that never whets his Sythe.

There be some so mad of hearing, that as if their Preacher had ribbs of iron, and a spirit of Angelical nature, they will not suffer him to breath. But are as impatient of such a pause, as Saul was of David's sickness; Bring him to me in the bed, that I may slay him. Such, & no more is their pity to their Minister: Bring him though he lie sick in his bed; spare him not, though his heat and heart be spent. And if we satisfy not their unseasonable, unreasonable desires, they exclaim and break out into bitter invectives against us: not unlike the Chinois, that whip their gods, when they do not answer them. Such misgouern'd feeders should be stinted to their measure, as the Israelites were to an Omer. God will never thank us for killing our selves, to humor our hearers.

The Extent, or latitude of it.

In every City. First, such was their favor and indulgence, they went to every city, not summoned every city to appear before them. Our grave Diocesans do follow the blessed Apostles in this step: they visit us in our several Deanries and Diuisions, without compelling the remote dwellers to travel unto their Consistories.

Again, In every City: such was their impartial Justice, and most equal love to all: the greatest were not exempted from their Jurisdiction, nor the least neglected of their compassion. The holiest Congregations may be blemished with some malefactors. Rome, and Corinth, and Ephesus, though they were all famous cities, had no less need of Apostles for their Visitants, then they had for their Founders. Three traitors kindle a fire, two hundred and fifty Captains bring sticks to it, and all Israel is ready to warm themselves at it. It was happy for Israel when they had but one Achan, and yet that one Achan was enough to make them unhappy. The innocence of so many thousands was not so forcible to excuse his one sin, as his one sin was to taynt all the people. One evil man may kindle that fire, which the whole world cannot quench. Shall Jeroboam be an Idolater alone? No, he can no sooner set up his Calves, but his subjects, like beast, are presently down on their knees.

Where stands that Eutopia, that city, which is in so good case, that it need not be visited? Sin doth multiply so fast, that the poor Preacher cannot out-preach it: yea, it is well if the Bishop himself with all his authority can suppress it. We cannot say always whence these evils come, but we are sure they are. You have peradventure heard or seen a Motion, a Puppet-play; how the little Idols leap, and move, and run strangely up and down. We know it is not of themselves; but there is a fellow, behind, which we see not, it is he that doth the feat. We see in our Parishes strange motions; a drunken companion bearding his Minister, a contentious Incendiary vexing him with actions and slanders: an obstinate Papist carries away his Recusancie, scorns the Preacher, seduceth the people: this is a strange kind of Puppet play: but God knows who it is behind the curtain, that gives them their motion: only we are sure, they cannot thus move themselves. There are many meetings, and much ado, as if sin should be punished: a Jury is impannell'd, a sore charge is given: the drunkard shall be made an example, Good-ale shall be talked with, whoredom shall be whipt, and all shall be well: we look for present reformation. But it commonly proves like the Iugglers feast in Soudas; a Table furnished with all manner of dainties in show, whereof when they came to taste, they found nothing but air. But I pass from the Extent, to

The Limitation, or restraint of it.

Where we have preached the Word of the Lord. Not every city, but every city and place that hath received the word of Instruction. No visiting a Garden, but where some seeds have been planted: that which is all weeds, is left to an higher visitation; God shall judge them that are without. One would think that the word of God were so prevailing, that it should beat down enormities faster then Satan can raise them. But we find by miserable experience, that even in those cities where the Gospel hath abounded, sin hath superabounded; and that this glorious Sun hath not dispelled and overcome all those fogs and mists that have surg'd from hell. But if the Sun cause a stench, it is a sign there is some dunghill nigh: let it reflect upon a bed of Roses, there is all sweetness.

Shall we lay the blame upon the Preachers? that were unjust in our own consciences. What City in the world is so rich in her spiritual provision, as this? Some whole countries within the Christian pale, have not so many learned and painful Pastors, as be within these walls and liberties. It looks light the firmament in a clear night, bespangled with refulgent stars, of different magnitude, but all yielding comfortable light, to guide our feet in the way of peace. The Church in Constantinople, wherein Nazianzen preached, was called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 the Resurrection Church; in respect of the great concourse and assembly of people. Most Churches in this City may well bear that name. Where is the fault then? I could happily tell you of some causes: the great profanation of God's Sabbath, the perfunctory hearing of his sacred word, the cages of unclean birds, Brothels and drinking Schools, the negligence of the secular Magistrate, the exemplary corruption of Rulers, the sinful indulgence of parents and matters in their families, when the mouths of their children and servants be filled with vncorrected oaths and blasphemies. O that we might see an end of these things, before we see an end of all things. The last point is,

The Intent, or end of all

To see how they do. First, to see how the Pastors do, whom they had set over particular Congregations. The Apostles had been careful in their first election; and good reason; Lay hands suddenly upon no man, saith Saint Paul. There is a Story in the Legend, how a Bishop devoted to the service of our Lady, in the agony of death, prayed her to be his Mediator, as he had been her Chaplain. To whom she answered, that for his other sins she had obtained pardon, but his rash imposition of hands, was a case which her Son would reserve to himself. But some that were fit in the choice, may prove unworthy in the progress; therefore must be visited, to see how they do. For if the Physician be sick, what shall become of his patients? Certainly, a Ministers life is full of honor here and hereafter too, so it is full of danger here and hereafter too. O what an honor is it to labor in God's harvest, to be an Ambassador from Christ, to remit and retain sins, to dress and lead the Bride, to sit on thrones, and judge the nations? Again, what a danger is it to answer for souls lost by our silence, to be guilty of blood, by either teaching, or living amiss? For howsoever the doctrine it self be the Light, yet the Preachers life is the Lantern that carries it, and keeps it from blowing out: and it is an easier defect to want Latin or learning, then to want honesty and discretion. God hath given us the Keys; but if they rust upon our hands, whether through foul carriage, or want of use, they will but serve to lock our selves out of doors. Therefore we must submit to a Visitation.

How they do. What must it be examined, what store of souls they have converted? No, it is the measure, not the success, that God looks to. Saint Paul himself doth not say, Plus profui omnibus, I did more good then the rest: but Plus laborani omnibus, I took more pains then the rest. • labored more abundantly than they all. Our reward shall be according to our works, not according to the fruit of our works. And our labor, how ever fruitless among men, shall not be in vain in the Lord. It was the complaint of a great Prophet, I have labored in vain, & spent my strength for naught, yet my reward is with the Lord. Though we cannot save you, yet our desire and endeavor to do it, shall save our selves. We give God what we have, he asks us no more: this is enough to honor him, and reward us.

How they do. What, how they thrive in their temporals, what riches or preferments be given them? no, as this is none of our ambition, so it is none of our luck or portion. Men suck our milk, like Mules, and then kick us with their heels. Cominaeus says, he that would be a Favourite, must not have a hard name, that so he might be easily remembered, when promotions are a dealing. It seems that Preachers have hard names, for none remember them in the point of benefit. The world regards them, as poor folks do their children; they would be loath to have anymore of them, because they are troubled to maintain them they have. In Ier•boams time the lowest of the people were made Priests, & now Priests are made the lowest of the people. A layman, like a Mathematical line, runs on ad infinitum: only the Preacher is bound to his competency, yea, and defrauded of that. But let all preferments go, so long as we can find preferment in your consciences, and be the instruments of your salvation, we are content.

How they do. Not only the Pastors, but even all the Brethren; their errors must also be looked into. S. Paul mentions the house of Cloê, 1 Cor. 1. It hath been declared to me, by them which are of the house of Cloê, that there are contentions and faults among you; from thence he had information of their disorders. Answerable to which, we have Church-wardens, they are the house of Cloê, bound by oath to present misdemeanors, that sins may have their just censure. Let them on the one side, take heed of spleen, that they do nothing maliciously. So their accusation may be just, and their affection unjust: & in doing that they shall sin, which they had sinned in not doing. Ill• d•t poenam, tu amisisti laudem. On the other side: of connivance and partiality; for there is an Omnia been that swallows all vanities. Drunkenness, uncleanness, swearing, profanation of the Sabbath, go abroad all the year; and when the Visitation comes, they are locked up with an Omnia been. This is not that Charity that covereth sin, but a miserable indulgence that cherisheth sin.

In the Creation there was an Omnia been; God reviewed all his works, and they were exceeding good. In our Redemption there was an Omnia been; He hath done all things well, he hath made the Blind to see, and the Lame to go; a just confession & applause. Here was an Omnia been indeed, but there never was an Omnia been since.

Let there be therefore a Visitation with the Rod, lest God come to visit with fire. God hath a fourfold Visitation. 1. A Visitation of Grace and Mercy: Visitavit & redemit, He hath visited and redeemed his people. He came not only to see us, but to save us: not only to live among us, but to die for us. So Paul applies that of the Psalm, What is an that thou art mindful of him, and the Son of man that thou visitest him? The time wherein Jerusalem heard the oracles, and saw the miracles of our blessed Savior, is called The day of her visitation. 2. A visitation of pity and compassion so when God relleued S•ra's barrenness, he is said to visit her. Thus he did visit Job in his sickness, Thy visitation hath preserved my Spirit. This duty he commends to us for true religion indeed. Pure religion and undefiled before God, is to visit the fatherless & widows in their affliction. To these works he promiseth the kingdom of heaven; You have visited me when I was sick, or in prison; Therefore come ye blessed. 3. A visitation of severity and correction; so Job calls his trial a visitation: and we call the Pestilence, God's visitation. This he threatened even to the offenders of the house of David, I will visit their transgression with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes. This visitation is not without mercy; yea; it is an argument of mercy; for when God refuseth to visit, that is the sorest visitation of all. Therefore we pray, Look down from heaven, O Lord behold, and visit thy Vi. 4. Lastly, a visitation of wrath and fury; Shall I not visit for these things, saith the Lord? Shall not my soul be avenged on such a Nation as this? So he visited Egypt, when he slew their first borne; the old world, when he drowned it, Sodom, when he burned it; I will go down and see. Thus shall he one day visit the wicked, with fire and brimstone, and a horrible tempest: this shall be the portion of their cup.

God's visitation cannot be eluded or avoided; there will be no appealing to a higher Court, no revoking by Prohibitions, no hiding from the censure, no corrupting the Judge, no answering the matter by Proxie, no commuting the penalty; no preventing, but either by living innocent, or dying penitent.

Therefore let us all visit our selves, that we may save God the labor. This is a duty to which we are all naturally backward: like Elephants, that choose troubled waters, and refuse to drink in clear springs, for fear of seeing their own deformities. Or vnthrifths, that are run so far in arrearages, they are loath to hear of a reckoning. Or, it may be, we have chiding consciences; and then, like those that are troubled with cursed and scolding wives at home, love to be rambling abroad. But it is better to have our wounds searched while they are green, then to have our limbs cut off for being festered. Descend we then, into the depth and corners of our own hearts; let us begin our visitation there; mortifying all our rebellious lusts, and subduing our affections to the will of our Maker. So only shall we pass clear and vncondemned by the great Bishop of our Souls, Jesus Christ.

I have done; Deo gloria, vobis gratia, mihi venia. Amen.

THE HOLY CHOICE. A SERMON PREACHED in the Chapel by GUILDHALL, at the Solemnity of the Election of the Right Honorable the Lord Major of London.

BY THO: ADAMS.

LONDON, Printed by Aug. Matthews, and John Norton. 1625.

THE HOLY CHOICE.

ACTS. 1.24.

And they prayed; and said, Thou Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men, show whether of these two thou hast chosen.

The business of the day is an Election; an election into one of the most Noble Offices of the Kingdom; the government of this Honorable City, which (let not envy hear it) hath no parallel under the Sun. The business of my Text is an Election too; an election into the highest office in the Church, to be an Apostle and Witness of Jesus Christ. If you please to spare the pattern in four circumstances; as, 1. This office is spiritual, yours temporal. 2. This place was void by Apostasy or decession, yours is supplied by succession. 3. This election is by Lots, yours is by Suffrages. 4. This choice was but one of two, it may be your number exceeds: the rest will suit well enough, and the same God that was in the one, be also present in the other, by the assistance of his holy spirit.

The argument of the Text is a prayer to God for his direction in their choice: yea indeed, that he would choose a man for them: including a strong reason of such a request, because he doth know the hearts of all men.

They begin with prayer; this was the usual manner in the Church of God. So Moses prayed for the choice of his Successor. Let the Lord, the God of the spirits of all flesh set a man over the Congregation. Christ sent not his Apostles to that holy work, without a prayer▪ Sanctify them through thy truth. In the choosing of those seven Deacons, they first prayed, and then laid their hands upon them. Thus were Kings Inaugurated, with Sacrifice and Prayer. It is not fit, he that is chosen for God, should be chosen without God. But for this, Samuel himself may be mistaken, and choose seven wrong, before he hit upon the right. In this; I cannot but commend your religious care; that businesses of so great a consequence be always sanctified with a blessing. Those which in a due proportion, must represent God to the world, ought to be consecrated to that Majesty which they resemble, by public devotions. Every important action requires Prayer, much more that which concerns a whole city. When Samuel came to Bethlehem to annoint David, he calls the whole City to the Sacrifice. Indeed the Family of Jesse was sanctified in a more special manner: this business was most theirs, and all Israel's in them. The fear of God should take full possession of all our hearts, that are this day assembled: but those with whom God hath more to do then with the rest, should be more holy then the rest.

The choice of your Wardens and Masters in your several Companies hath a solemn form; and it is the honor of your greatest Feasts, that the first dish is a Sermon. Charity forbid, that any should think, you admit such a Custom, rather for convenience then devotion▪ as if Preaching were but a necessary complement to a Solemnity, as Wine and Music. I am persuaded better things of you: but if there should be any such perverse spirits, that like the Governor of a people called Aequi, when the Romans came to him, Iussit c's ad quercum dicere, bade them speak to the Oak, for he had other business: but they replied, Et h'c sacrata quercus andiat f'dus a v'bis violatum; let this Oak bear witness, that you have broke the league which you have covenanted. So when we come to preach to your souls, if you should secretly bid us speak to the walls; loe even the very walls will be witnesses against you at the last day. Though Saul be King over Samuel, yet Samuel must teach Saul how to be King. We may instruct; though we may not rule; yea, we must instruct them that shall rule. Therefore as we obey your call in coming to speak, so do you obey God's command in vouchsafing to hear.

Let us apply our selves to him with devotion, and then he will be graciously present at our Election.

This Prayer respects two

- things, Quem, the person whom they entreat.
- things, Quid, the matter for which they entreat

The Person is described by

- His Omnipotence; Lord.
- His Omniscience, That knowest the hearts of men.

Omnipotence; Lord. We acknowledge thy right, thou art fit to be thine own chuser. Lord, there be many on earth called Lord's; but those are Lord's of earth, and those Lord's are earth, & those Lord's must return to earth. This Lord is Almighty; raising out of the dust to the hon•ur of Princes, and laying the honor of Princes in the dust. Lord, of what? nay, not qualified; not Lord of such a County, Barony, Seigniorie; nor Lord by virtue of Office and Deputation: but in abstracto, most absolute: His Lordship is universal: Lord of heaven, the owner of those glorious mansions: Lord of earth, disposer of all Kingdoms and Principalities: Lord of hell, to lock up the old Dragon and his crew in the bottomless pit: Lord of Death, to unlock the graves: he keeps the Key, that shall let all bodies out of their earthy prisons. A potent Lord; whither shall we go to get out of his Dominion? To heaven? there we cannot miss him: To hell? there we cannot be without him: In air, earth, or sea; in light or darkness, we are sure to find him. Whither then, except to Purgatory? That Terra incognita is not mentioned in his Lordship: the Pope may keep the key of that himself. But for the rest, he is too saucy; exalting his universal Lordship, and hedging in the whole Christian world for his Diocese. Stretching his arm to heaven, in rubricking what Saints he lift: to hell, in freeing what prisoners he lift: on earth, in setting up, or pulling down what Kings he list: but that some have cut short his busy fingers.

To the Lord of all they commend the choice of his own servants. Every mortal Lord hath this power in his own Family: how much more that Lord, which makes Lord's? who is so fit to choose, as he that can choose the fit? Who so fit to choose, as he that can make those fit whom he doth choose? It is He alone that can give power and grace to the elected, therefore not to be left out in the election. How can the Apostle preach, or the Magistrate govern, without him; when none of us all can move but in him? It is happy, when we do remit all doubts to his decision, and resign our selves to his disposition. We must not be our own Caruers, but let God's choice be ours. When we know his pleasure, let us show our obedience. And for you, upon whom this Election falls, remember how you are bound to honor that Lord of heaven, that hath ordained such honor for you upon earth: that so in all things we may glorify his blessed Name.

Omniscience: it is God's peculiar, to be the searcher of the heart. The heart of man is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked; who can know it? Who? Eg• Domi•s, I the Lord search the heart. He hath made no window into it, for man or Angel, to look in: only it hath a door, and he keeps the key himself.

But why the Heart? Here was an Apostle to be chosen: now wisdom, learning, eloquence, memory, might seem to be more necessary qualities, then the Heart. No, they are all nothing to an honest Heart. I deny not, but Learning to divide the Word, Elocution to pronounce it, Wisdom to discern the truth, Boldness to deliver it, be all parts requireable in a Preacher. But as if all these were scarce worth mention in respect of the Heart; they say not, Thou that knowest which of them hath the subtiler wit, or abler memory; but which hath the truer heart: not which is the greater Scholar, but which is the better man; Thou that knowest the Heart.

Samuel being sent to annoint a son of Jesse, when Eliab, the eldest came forth, a man of a goodly presence, fit for his person to succeed Saul; he thinks with himself, This choice is soon made, sure this is the head upon which I must spend my holy Oil. The privilege of Nature and of Stature, his primogeniture and proportion gives it him; This is he. But even the holiest Prophet, when he speaks without God, runs into error. Signs and appearances are the guides of our eyes; and these are seldom without a true falsehood, or an uncertain truth. Saul had a goodly person, but a bad heart: he was higher then all, many were better then he. It is not hard for the best Judgment to err in the shape. Philox•menes, a magnanimous and valiant Soldier, being invited to Magyas his house to dinner, came in due season, but found not his Host at home. A servant seeing one so plain in clothes, and somewhat deformed in body, thought him some sorry fellow, and set him to cleave wood. Whereat Magyas (being returned) wondering, he received from him this answer; Expendo poenas deformitatis meae; I pay for my unhandsomeness. All is not valor, that looks big, and goes brave. He that judgeth by the inside, checked Samuel for his misconceit; Look not on his Countenance or Stature, for I have refused him: for the Lord seeth not as man seeth. David's countenance was ingenuous and beautiful, but had it promised so much as Eliab's or Abinadab's, he had not been left in the field, while his Brethren sate at the table. Jesse could find nothing in David worthy the competition of honor with his brethren: God could find something to prefer him before them all. His father thought him fit to keep sheep, thought his Brethren fit to rule men. God thinks him fit to rule, and his Brethren to serve; and by his own immediate choice destines him to the Throne. Here was all the difference; Samuel and Jesse went by the outside, God by the inside: they saw the composition of the body, he the disposition of the mind. Israel desires a King of God, and that King was chosen by the Head: God will choose a King for Israel, and that King is chosen by the Heart. If in our choice for God, or for our selves, we altogether follow the eye, and suffer our thoughts to be guided by outward respects, we shall be deceived.

[1] Why do they not say, Thou that knowest the estates of men, who is rich, and fit to support a high place; and who so poor that the place must support him? I hear some call Wealth, Substance; but certainly at best, it is but a mere circumstance. It is like the Planet Mercury; if it be joined with a good Heart, it is useful; if with a bad and corrupt one, dangerous. But howsoever at the Beam of the Sanctuary, money makes not the man, yet it often adds some metal to the man; makes his Justice the bolder, and in less hazard of being vitiated. But pauperis sapientia plus valet quam diuitis abundantia. If the poor man have Wisdom to deliver the City, he is worthy to govern the City. I yield, that something is due to the State of Authority; Ad populum Phaleras: So Agrippa came to the Tribunal with great pomp and attendance. This is requisite to keep awe in the people, that the Magistracy be not exposed to contempt. B•t Magistratus, non vestitus, indicat virum: Wise government, not rich garment, shows an able man. It was not riches, that they regarded.

[2] Why do they not say, Thou that knowest the Birth or Blood of men? I know, it is a reverend thing to see an ancient Castle or Palace not in decay; or a fair Tree, sound and perfect timber. But as foul Birds build their nests in an old forsaken house, and doated trees are good for nothing but the fire; so the decay of Virtue is the ruin of Nobility. To speak morally, Active worth is better then Passive; this last we have from our Ancestors, the first from our selves. Let me rather see one virtue in a man alive, then all the rest in his pedigree dead. Nature is regular in the brute Creatures; Eagles do not produce cravens; and it was a monstrous fable, that Ni•ippus his Ewe should yeane a Lyon. But in man she fails, and may bring forth the like proportion, not the like disposition. Children do often resemble their Parents in face and features, not in heart and qualities. It is the earthly part that follows the seed; wisdom, valor, virtue, are of another beginning. Honor sits best upon the back of merit: I had rather be good without Honor, then Honorable without goodness. Cottages have yielded this as well as Palaces. Agathocles was the son of a Potter, Bion of an infamous Courtesan. In holy Writ; Gideon was a poor Thrasher, David a Shepherd; yet both mighty men of valor, both chosen to rule, both special Saviors of their Country. Far be it from us to condemn all honor of the first head, when noble deservings have raised it; though before it could show nothing but a White Shield. Indeed, it is not the Birth, but the new Birth, that makes men truly Noble.

[3] Why do they not say, Thou that knowest the wisdom and policy of men? Certainly, this is requisite to a man of place; without which he is a blind P•lyphemus, a strong arm without an eye. But a man may be wise for himself, not for God, not for the public good. An Ante is a wise creature for it self, but a shrewed thing in a Garden. Magistrates, that are great lovers of themselves, are seldom true lovers of their Country. All their actions be motions, that have recourse to one Center, that is, themselves. A cunning head without an honest heart, is but like him that can pack the Cards, yet when he hath done, cannot play the Game, or like a house with many convenient Stairs, Entries, and other passages, but never a fair room; all the inwards be sluttish and offensive. It is not then, Thou that knowest the Wealth, or the Birth, or the Head, but the Heart; as if in an Election, that were the main; it is all if the rest be admitted on the By.

Here then we have three remarkable observations, 1. What kind of Hearts God will not choose, and we may guess at them. 2. What Hearts he will choose, and himself describes them. 3. Why he will choose men especially by the Heart.

First what kind of Hearts he will not choose; and of these (among many) I will mention but three.

1. Cōr diuisum, a distracted Heart; part whereof is dedicated to the Lord, and part to the world. But he that made all, will not be contented with a piece. Aut Caesar, aut nihil. The service of two Masters, in the obedience of their contrary, commands, is incompatible, sensu composito. Indeed Zacchaeus did first serve the world, and not Christ; afterward Christ, and not the world; but never the world and Christ together. Many divisions followed sin. 1. It divided the heart from God; Your sins have separated between you and your God. 2. It divided heart from heart. God by Marriage made one of two, sin doth often by prevarication make two of one. It divided the tongue from the heart. So Cain answered God, when he questioned him about Abel, Am I my Brothers keeper? As if he would say, Go look. 4. It divided tongue from tongue, at the building of Babel; that when one called for Brick, his fellow brings him mortar: and when he spake of coming down, the other falls a removing the ladder. 5. It divided the heart from it self; They spake with a double heart. The original is, A heart and a heart: one for the Church, another for the Change: one for Sundays, another for working days: one for the King, another for the Pope. A man without a heart, is a wonder: but a man with two hearts, is a monster. It is said of Judas, There were many hearts in one man: and we read of the Saints, There was one heart in many men. Dabo illis cor vnum, a special blessing.

Now this division of heart is intolerable in a Magistrate; when he plies his own cause under the pretence of another's; and cares not who lose, so he be a gainer. Saint Jerome calls this Cōr male locatum; for many have hearts, but not in their right places. Cōr habet in ventre gulosus, l'scivus in libidine, cupidus in lucris. Naturally, if the heart be removed from the proper seat, it instantly dyes. The eye unnested from the head, cannot see: the foot sundered from the body, cannot go: so spiritually, let the heart be vncentred from Christ, it is dead. Thus the Coward is said to have his heart at his heel, the timorous hath his heart at his mouth, the envious hath his heart in his eyes, the Prodigal hath his heart in his hand, the fool hath his heart in his tongue, the covetous locks it up in his chest. He that knows the hearts of all men, will not choose a divided or misplaced heart.

2. Cōr lapideum, a hard or stony heart. This is Ingratum ad beneficia, infidum ad cōsilia, inverecundum ad turpia, inhumanum ad bona, temerarium ad omnia. A Rock, which all the Floods of that infinite Sea of God's mercies and Judgments cannot soften. A Stitthy, that is still the harder for beating. It hath all the properties of a stone: it is as cold as a stone, as heavy as a stone, as hard as a stone, as senseless as a stone. No persuasions can heat it, no prohibitions can stay it, no instructions can teach it, no compassions can mollify it. Were it of iron, it might be wrought: were it of lead, it might be molten, and cast into some better form: were it of earth, it might be tempered to another fashion: but being stone, nothing remains but that it be broken. What was Pharaohs greatest plague▪ was it the murraine of Beasts? was it the plague of Boils? was it the destruction of the Fruits? was it the turning of their Rivers into Blood? was it the striking of their First borne with death? No, though all these plagues were grievous, yet one was more grievous then all; Cor durum, his hard heart. He that knows all hearts, knows how ill this would be in a Magistrate: a heart, which no cries of Orphans, no tears of Widows, no mourning of the oppressed, can melt into pity. From such a Heart good Lord deliver us.

3. Cor cupidum, a covetous heart; the desires whereof are never filled. A handful of corn put to the whole heap, increaseth it; yea, add water to the Sea, it hath so much the more: but he that loveth Silver, shall never be satisfied with Silver. One desire may be filled, but another comes. Crescit amor nummi, quantum ipsa pecunia creseit. Natural desires are finite, as thirst is satisfied with drink, and hunger with meat. But unnatural desires be infinite; as it fares with the body in burning Fevers; Quo plus sunt potae, plus sitiuntur aquae: So it is in the covetous heart, Vt cum possideat plurima, plura petat. Grace can never fill the purse, nor wealth the heart.

This vice is in all men iniquity, but in a Magistrate Blasphemy: the root of all evil in every man, the rot of all goodness in a great Man. It leaves them, like those Idols in the Psalm; neither eyes to see, nor ears to hear; but only hands to handle, Such man will transgress for handfulls of barley, and morsels of bread; and a very dram of profit put into the Scole of Justice, turns it to the wrong side. There is not among all the charms of Hell, a more damnable spell to inchant a Magistrate, then the love of Money. This turns Judgment into Wormwood, or at least into vinegar: for if Injustice do not make it bitter as Wormwood, yet shifts and delays will make it sour as vinegar. O how sor did and execrable should bribes be to them, and stink worse in their nostrils then Vespasians tribute of urine! Let them not only bind their own hands, and the hands of their servants, that may take; but even bind the hands of them that would offer. He that useth Integrity, doeth the former: but he that constantly professeth Integrity, doth the latter. It is not enough to avoid the fault, but even the suspicion: It is some discredit to the Judge, when a Client with his bribe comes to be denied: for if his usual carriage had given him no hope of speeding, he would not offer. A Servant, that is a favorite or inward, gives suspicion of corruption, and is commonly thought but a by-way; some post-rne or back-door for a gift to come in, when the broad fore-gates are shut against it. This makes many aspire to Offices and great places, not to do good, but to get goods; as some love to be stirring the fire, if it be but to warm their own fingers. Whatsoever affairs pass through their hands, they crook them all to their own ends; and care not what becomes of the public good, so they may advance their own private: and would set their neighbors house on fire, and it were but to roast their own eggs. Let them banish Covetousness, with as great a hatred as Amnon did Tamar; first thrust it out of their hearts, then shut and lock the door after it: for the covetous heart is none of them that God chooseth.

Next let us see what kind of hearts of God will choose; and they be furnished with these virtues fit for a Magistrate.

1. There is Cor sapiens, a wise heart; and this was Solomon's suite; An understanding heart. He saw, he had power enough, but not wisdom enough; and that Royalty without wisdom, was no better then an eminent dishonor; a very Calf made of golden Eare-rings. There is no Trade of life, but a peculiar wisdom belongs to it; without which all is tedious and unprofitable: how much more to the highest and busiest vocation, the government of men? An ignorant ruler is like a blind Pilot; who shall save the vessel from ruin?

2. Cor patiens; a meek heart: what is it to discern the cause, and not to be patient of the proceedings? The first Governor that God set over his Israel, was Moses; a man of the meekest spirit upon earth. How is he fit to govern others, that hath not learned to govern himself? He that cannot rule a Boat on the river, is not to be trusted with steering a Vessel on the Ocean. Nor yet must this patience degenerate into cowardliness: Moses that was so meek in his own cause, in God's cause was as resolute. So there is also

3. Cor magnanimum, a heart of fortitude and courage. The rulers and squares that regulate others, are not made of lead or soft wood, such as will bend or bow. The principal Columns of a house, had need be heart of Oke. A timorous and flexible Magistrate is not fit for these corrupt times. If either threatenings can terrify him, or favor melt him, or persuasions swerve him from Justice, he shall not want temptations. The Brain that must dispel the fumes, ascending from a corrupt liver, stomach, or spleen, had need be of a strong constitution. The courageous spirit that resolves to do the will of heaven, what malignant powers soever would cross it on earth, is the heart God chooseth.

4. Lastly, there is Cor honestum, an honest heart. Without this, courage will prove but legal Injustice, policy but mere subtlety, and ability but the Devils Anvil to forge mischiefs. Private men have many curbs; but men in authority, if they fear not God, have nothing else to fear. If he be a simple Dastard, he fears all men: if a head-strong commander, he fears no man; like that unjust Judge, that feared neither God nor Man. This is the ground of all fidelity to King and Country, Religion. Such was Constantine's Maxim; He cannot be faithful to me, that is unfaithful to God. As this honorable place of the Kings Lieutenā-ship hath a Sword-bearer, so the Magistrate himself is the Lord's Sword-bearer, saith Saint Paul. And as he may never draw this Sword in his private quarrel, so he must not let it be sheathed when God's cause calls for it. It is lenity and connivance that hath invited contempt to great places. Did Justice carry a severer hand, they durst not traduce their Rulers in Songs and Satyrs, the burden whereof will be their own shame. Magistrates are our civil Fathers: and what deserve they but the curse of Cham, that lay open the nakedness of their Fathers? When Alexander had conquered Darius, and casually found his slain body lying naked, he threw his own coat over him, saying, I will cover the destiny of a King. It is God alone that casteth contempt upon Princes; which that he may not do, let them preserve Cor mundum, a clean heart, not conscious of ill demerits.

Such a one sits on the Judgment-Seat, as one that never forgets that he must appear before the Judgment-Seat of Christ. So he executeth Justice, as never losing the sense of Mercy: so he showeth Mercy, as not offering violence to Justice, He can at once, punish the offense, and pity the offender, He remembers his oath, and fears to violate it: to an enemy he is not cruel, to a friend he will not be partial. And if ever he have but once cut the skirt of Justice, as David the lap of Saul's garment, his Heart smites him for it. He minds no other clock on the Bench, but that of his own Conscience. He will not offend the Just, nor afford a good look to varlets: nor yet doth he so disregard their persons, as to wrong their causes. He will maintain Piety, but not neglect Equity. In Court, he looks not before him on the person, nor about him on the beholders, nor behind him for bribes; nay, he will not touch them in his Cloffer or Chamber, lest the timber and stones in the wall should-witness against him. So he helps the Church, that the Common-wealth be no loser: so he looks to the Common-wealth, that the Church may not be wronged. The lewd fear him, the good praise him, the poor bless him; he hath been a Father to Orphans, a Husband to distressed Widows. Many prayers are laid up for him in Heaven; and when he dies, they with the assistance of Angels, shall bear him up to blessedness.

Lastly, let us see why God will choose men by the heart. I deny not, but wisdom and courage, moderation and patience, are all requisite conurrences: but the Heart is the Primum Mobile, that sets all the wheels a going, and improves them to the right end. When God begins to make a man good, he begins at the heart: as Nature in forming, so God in reforming, begins there. As the eye is the first that begins to die, and the last that begins to live: so the heart is the first that lives, and the last that dies. It is said of the Spider, that in the morning, before she seeks out for her prey, she mends her broken web; and in doing that, she always begins in the midst. Before we pursue the profits and baits of this world, let us first amend our life; and when we undertake this, let us be sure to begin at the heart. The Heart is the Fort or Citadel in this little Ile of man; let us fortify that, or all will be lost. And as naturally, the heart is first in being, so here the Will (which is meant by the Heart) is chief in commanding. The Centurions servants did not more carefully obey him, when he said to one Go, and he goeth, to another Come, and he cometh, to a third, Do this, and he doth it: then all the members observe the Heart; if it say to the eye, See, it seeth: to the ear, Hear, it hearkeneth: to the tongue, Speak, it speaketh: to the foot, Walk, it walketh: to the hand, Work, it worketh. If the Heart lead the way to God, not a member of the body, nor a faculty of the soul, will stay behind. As when the Sun ariseth in the morning, Birds rise from their nests, Beasts from their dens, and Men from their beds. They all say to the Heart, as the Israelites did to Joshua; All that thou commandest us, we will do: and whither soever thou sendest us, we will go: only the Lord be with thee. Therefore the penitent Publican smote his heart, as if he would call up that, to call up all the rest. It cannot command and go without.

No part of man can sin without the heart, the heart can sin without all the rest. The Wolf goes to the flock, purposing to devour a Lamb, and is prevented by the vigilancy of the Shepherd; yet Lupus exit, Lupus regreditur; he went forth a Wolf, and comes home a Wolf. The heart intends a sin, which is never brought into action; yet it sins in that very intention. The hand cannot offend without the heart, the heart can offend without the hand. The heart is like a Mill: if the wind or water be violent, the Mill will go whether the Miller will or not; yet he may choose what kind of grain it shall grind, wheat or darnel. If the affections be strong and passionate, the heart will be working: yet the Christian by grace, may keep out lusts, and supply it with good thoughts.

The Heart is God's peculiar; the thing he especially cares for: My son, give me thy heart: and good reason, for I gave my own Sons heart to death for it. Non minus tuum, quia meum; It is not less thine, for being mine: yea, it cannot be thine comfortably, unless it be mine perfectly. God requires it principally, but not only: give him that, and all the rest will follow. He that gives me fire, needs not be requested for light and heat; for they are inseparable. Non corticis, sed cordis Deus. God doth not regard the rind of the lips, but the root of the heart. It was the Oracles answer, to him that would be instructed which was the best Sacrifice; Da medium Lunae, Solem simul, & canis iram: which three characters make Cor, the Heart. Mans Affection is God's Hall: man's Memory, his Library: man's Intellect, his Privy Chamber; but his Closet, Sacrary, or Chapel, is the Heart. So Saint Augustine glosseth the Pater noster; Qui es in coelis, which art in heaven, that is, in a heavenly Heart.

All outward works an hypocrite may do, only he fails in the Heart: and because he fails there, he is lost everywhere. Let the flesh look never so fair, the good Cater will not buy it, if the liver be spak'd. Who will put that timber into the building of his house, which is rotten at the heart? Man judgeth the heart by the works, God judgeth the works by the heart: All other powers of man may be suspended from doing their offices, but only the Will, that is the Heart. Therefore God will excuse all necessary defects, but only of the Heart. The blind man cannot serve God with his eyes, he is excused: the deaf cannot serve God with his ears, he is excused: the dumb cannot serve God with his tongue, he is excused: the creeple cannot serve God with his feet, he is excused. But no man is excused for not serving God with his Heart. Deus non respicit quantum homo valet, sed quantum velit. Saint Chrysostom seemed to be angry with the Apostle, for saying, Behold, we have left all, and followed thee. What have you left? an angle, a couple of broken netes, and a weather beaten Fish-boat; a fair deal to speak of. But at last he corrects himself, I cry you mercy, Saint Peter▪ you have forsaken all indeed: for he truly leaves all, that leaves Quod vel capit mundus, vel cupit: that takes his Heart from the world, and gives it to Christ.

All other faculties of man apprehend their objects, when they are brought home to them, only the Will, the Heart goes home to the object. Colour must come to the eye, before it can see it: sound to the ear, before it can hear it: the object to be apprehended is brought home to the understanding, and past things are recollected to the memory; before either can do her office. But the heart goes home to the object. Vbi the saurus, ibi cor. Not where the heart is, there will be the treasure: but where the treasure is, there will be the heart.

Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Of all, the pure heart is beholding to God, and shall one day behold God. Therefore Dadid prays, Cor mundum crea in me, Deus: Create in me a clean heart, O God. The Lord rested from the works of his Creation the seventh day; but so dearly he loves clean hearts, that he restes from creating them no day. As Jehu said to •••nadab, Est tibi cor rctum, Is thy heart righ•? Then give me thy hand, come up into my chariot. So this is God's question, Is thy heart upright? Then give me thy hand, ascend my triumphant Chariot, the everlasting glory of heaven.

To conclude; because there is such difference of hearts, and such need of a good one; they put it to Him that knows them all, and knows which is best of all. For howsoever Nature knows no difference; nor is there any Quorum praecordia Titan De meliore luto finxit: yet in regard of grace, the sanctified heart is of purer metal then common ones. A little living stone in God's building, is worth a whole Quarry of the world. One honest heart is better then a thousand other▪ the richest Mine, and the coarsest mould, have not such a disproportion of value. Man often fails in his Election, God cannot err. The choice here was extraordinary, by lots: yours is ordinary by Suffrages; God's hand is in both.

Great is the benefit of good Magistrates: that we may sit under our own Vines, go in and out in peace, eat our bread in safety, and (which is above all) lead our lives in honest liberty: for all this we are beholding, under God to the Magistrate, first the Supreme, then the subordinate. They are Trees, under whose branches the people build and sing, and bring up their young ones in religious nurture. That Silence in heaven about half an hour, when the golden vials were filled with sweet odors, and the prayers of the Saints ascended as pillars of smoke and Incense, is referred by some, to the peace of the Church under Constantine. It is the King of Mexico's Oath, when he takes his Crown; Iustitiam se administraturum, effecturum vt Sol cursum teneat, Nubes pluant, Rivi currant, terra producat fructus; that he will minister Justice, he will make the Sun hold his course, the Clouds to rain, the Rivers to run, and the Earth to fructify. The meaning is, that the upright and diligent administration of Justice, will bring all these blessings of God upon a Country.

If we compare this City with many in foreign parts, how joyfully may we admire our own happiness! Those murders and massacres, rapes and constuprations, and other mischiefs, that be there as common as nights, be rare with us. I will not say that all our people are better then theirs, I dare say, our Government is better then theirs. Merchants make higher use, and are more glad of calm Seas, then common passengers. So should Christians more rejoice in peace, then can the heathen: because they know how to improve it to richer ends, the glory of God, and salvation of their owner souls. Proceed ye grave and honorable Senators, in your former approved courses, to the suppressing of vice and disorders, and to the maintenance of Truth and Peace among us. It is none of the least renowns of this famous City, the Wisdom and Equity of the Governors. To repeat the worthy acts done by the Lord's Maiors of London, were fitter for a Chronicle; they are too large for a Sermon.

But it is high time to bless you with a Dismission, and to dismiss you with a Blessing. That Almighty God, that knows the hearts of all, sanctify your hearts to govern, and ours to obey; that we all seeking to do good one to another, He may do good unto us all. To this blessed and eternal God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, be all glory and praise forever.
Amen.

The BARREN TREE. A Sermon Preached at Paul's Cross October 26. 1623.

BY THO: ADAMS.

LONDON, Printed by AVG: MATHEWES for JOHN GRISMAND, and are to be sold at his Shop in Paul's Alley, at the sign of the Gunne. 1623.

TO THE REVERend and learned, Doctor DONNE, Dean of S^t. Paul's, together with the Prebend-Residentiaries of the same Church, my very good Patrons.

RIGHT WORSIPFULL,

NOT out of any opinion of this Sermons worth, to which I dare not invite your Judicious eyes. Nor, any ambition to merit of my Patrons, whom I read styled, Petty creators. But in humble acknowledgement of your favors, I present this small Rent of Thankfulness; the poor fruit of that tree, which grows on your own ground, and hath not from the world any other sustenance. Vouchsafe, I beseech you, your Patronage to the child, who have made the Father of it,

Your Wors. devoted Homager THO: ADAMS.

To the Reader.

I Neither affect those Rheumaticke Pennes, that are still dropping upon the Press: nor those Phlegmatic spirits, that will scarce be coniu'r'd into the orbe of employment. But if modest forwardness be a fault, I cannot excuse myself.

It pleased God Almighty, to make a fearful Comment on this his own Text, the very same day it was preached by his unworthiest servant. The argument was but audible in the morning, before night it was visible. His holy Pen had long since written it with ink, now his hand of Justice expounded it in the Characters of blood, There, was only a conditional menace, So it shall be: here a terrible remonstrance, So it is. Sure! He did not mean it for a nine days wonder. Their sudden departure out of the World, must not so suddenly depart from the memory of the World. Woe to that soul that shall take so slight a notice of so extraordinary a Judgment. We do not say, They perished: Charity forbid it. But this we say, It is a sign of God's favor, when he gives a man Law. We pass no sentence upon them, yet let us take warning by them. The Remarkableness would not be neglected▪ for the Time, the Place, the Persons, the Number, the Manner. Yet still we conclude not, This was for the transgression of the dead: but this we are sure of, It is meant for the admonition of the living.

Such is our Blessed Saviors conclusion, upon a parallel instance: Except ye repent, YE shall all LIKEWISE perish. There is no place safe. enough for offenders: but when the Lord is once up in arms, happy man that can make his own peace! otherwise, in vain we hope to run from the Plague, while we carry the Sin along with us. Yet will not our willful and bewitched Recusants, from these legible Characters, spell God's plain meaning. No impression can be made in those hearts, that are ordained to perish. For their malicious, causeless, and unchristian censures of us, God forgive them: our requital be only pity and prayers for them. Howsoever they give out, (and I will not here examine) that their piety is more then ours: Impudence it self cannot deny, but our Charity is greater then theirs. Now the holy fear of God keep us in the ways of Faith and Obedience; that the properation of Death may never prevent our preparation to die. And yet still, after our best endeavor; From sudden death good Lord deliver us all. Amen.

THE BARREN TREE.

LUKE. Cap. 13. Vers. 7.

Then said he to the Dresser of his Vineyard; Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this Fig-tree, and find none: cut it down, why cumbreth it the ground?

NEwes is brought to Christ, of a certain Judgment, which was not more Pilate's, then God's, upon some Galileans; who, while they were sacrificing, were sacrificed; their blood being mingled with the blood of the beasts, on the same altar. Lest this should be wholly attributed to Pilate's cruelty, without due respect had of the omnipotent Justice, he samples it with another; of eighteen men miscarrying by the fall of a Tower. No Pilate threw down this, here was no human Executioner: the matter of their death was mortar and stones, these had no purpose to kill them. This therefore, must be an invisible hand, working by an insensible creature: the Instrument may be diverse, the Judge is the same.

Now, Poena paucorum, terror omnium: as an exhalation drawn from the earth, fired and sent back again to the earth, smites only one place, but terrifieth the whole country. So their ruins should be our terrors, let them teach us, that they may not touch us. They are hitherto but like Moses his Rodde turned into a Serpent: not into a Bear or Lyon, lest it should have devoured Pharaoh: but into a Serpent, that he might be more afraid then hurt. It is God's special favor to us, that others be made examples for us, and not we made examples for others. Nothing could teach them, let them teach us.

Of these fearful Instances our Savior makes this use; setting down a peremptory couclusion: Vel poenitendum, vel pereundum: Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. Such vengeance is no way to be avoided, but by repentance. But here the Jews might flatter themselves; If we be greater sinners then they, how comes it to pass that we speed better then they? To this silent objection, Christ makes an Apological answer, verse 6. You are not spared because you are more righteous, but because God to you is more gracious. You deserve such or sorer Judgments; and the reason of this impunity is not to be looked for in your innocence, but in the Lord's patience: not because you are not worse to him, but because he is better to you: who offers you space and grace to amend, if (at least) at last you will bring forth the fruits of Repentance.

There be some terms in the Text; (as that the Vineyard is the Church, every Christian a Fig-tree, God the Owner, every Pastor a Dresser;) wherein your understandings may well prevent my discour•e: these known and familiar things I take as granted of all hands.

It is a Parable, therefore not to be forced every way, nor made to warrant a conclusion which the Author never meant. This were, when it offers us the company a myle, to compel it to go with us twain: or to make Christ's Messenger speak our errand. Such is the trade of Rome; what their own policy hath made necessary, they will teach God to make good: this is to pick darkness out of the Su••e. No, Verificatur in sensu suo. like a good creature, it does only that it was made for. A Parable is not like a Looking-glass, to represent all forms and faces: but a well drawn Picture, to remonstrate that person whereof it is a counterfeit. It is like a knife, with the haft it cutts not, with the back it cuts not, it cuts with the edge. A Candle is made to light us, not to heat us: a Stoue is made to heat us, not to •ight us: if this Parable, like the Sun, may give both light and heat; the more profitable, the more acceptable.

Then said he to the Dresser, &c. That part of it, to which I limit my present Discourse, delivers it self to us in these four passages.

- A Consultation; Then said he to the Dresser of his Vineyard.
- A Complaint. Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this Fig-tree, and find none.
- A Sentence; Cut it down.
- A Reason; Why cumbers it the ground?

The Consultation. Then said he unto, &c.

[1] Dixit, non percussit: he spake, he stroke not: he might have spared words, and begun with wounds. The Tree had rather deserved the Axe and Fire, then a Consultation of recovery. How easily would man have rejected his hopeless brother▪ as when a piece of clay will not work to his mind, the Potter throws it away: or we cast foul rags to the dung-hill, little thinking that they may become white paper. But with God, Verba antecedent verbera; he will be heard before he be felt. Our first Parents, when they had sinned, Vocem andiuerunt, Heard the voice of God: He reasoned with them, before he condemned them. If the fathers word can correct the child, he will let the rod alone. Wicked men use the sudden Arguments of steel and iron; as Joab discoursed with Amasa, in the fifth ribbe, they speak Daggers points. So Zedekiah disputed with the Prophet, a word and a blow▪ yea, a blow without a word: he struck him first, and spoke to him afterwards. God deals otherwise; Behold, I stand at the door, and knock: he knocks at the door, does not presently break it open. He gives us warning of his Judgments, that gave him no warning of our sins. Why doeth he thus? That we might see our miserable estate, and fall to timely deprecation: that so punishing our selves, we might save him a labor.

Dixit, non destinauit: as if the Lord would [2] double and repeat his thoughts, before he decreed it to irrevocable ruin. A divine president of moderation! If he that cannot transgress in his wrath, nor exceed in his Justice, will yet Consulere amicum, advise with his friend: how ought frail man to suspend his furious purposes to mature deliberation? It is too common with us, to attempt dangerous and desperate actions, without further counsel then our own green thoughts. So Anger is made a Solicitor, Passion a Judge, and Rashness an Executioner. The wise man first considers, then speaks or does: the mad man first speaks or does, and then considers. Which drives him on necessity to ply the after-game; with shame and sorrow to recover his former estate, or give it lost forever. O holy deliberation, whither art thou fled? David's Hørpe did cast the evil spirit out, this would keep him from ever coming in. It is a Porter at the Gate of God's spiritual Temple, Man; that would be as sure to keep out his enemies, as David would have been ready to let in his friends. How many desperate precipices of sin would be prevented, were this Rule remembered; Consule Cultorem? For matter of estate, we are counseled by the Lawyer: for health of body, advised by the Physician: we trust the Pilot to steer our course by Sea, the Surveyor to mete out our Land: but for the soul let it be as barren as this Fig-tree, we take no counsel of the Gardener. Do worldlings consult the Preacher, concerning their usurious trade before they undertake it? Do Gallants advise with him, before they meet in Acelanda, the field of blood? O that they would admit an answer from such a friend, before they give an answer to such an enemy.

Dixit Vinitori. Such is the honor God [3] do•h his Ministers, to acquaint them with his own purposes. Surely, the Lord will do nothing, but he first revealeth it to his servants, the Prophets. Nothing, which may conduce to the office of their Ministry, and the good of his Church. To you it is given to know the •ysteries of the kingdom of Heaven. To you, not to the world, they have no such revelation. It is given, it's none of your inheritance you were not borne to it. To know Mysteries, Sapere alta not common things. Of the kingdom (not secular; such mysteries are for the knowledge of Statizing Jesuits; but) of heaven. Shall I hide from Abraham the thing that I mean to do? The matter concerned Sodom, not Abraham: yet was it revealed to Abraham, not to Sodom. But doth God need any man's counsel? Who hath at any time been his Counselor? Will the Potter take advice of his pots? No; when Christ asked Philip where supply of bread might be had for the multitude; This be• said to prove him: for he himself knew what he would do. His questions are not his, but our satisfactions. Thus doth he credit his own Ordinance, teaching the world how to esteem of them whom himself so singularly honors. How poor a place soever they find in men's thoughts, the King of heaven and earth calls them to his counsel. Priest, was a title whereof the Princes of Israel were ambitious: they would not, every man have written his name on his rod, but in hope that this Dignity might fall to his lot. Now, is the Ministry of the Gospel inferior to that of the Law? Was the service of death more glorious than the service of life, and salvation? If the Evangelical Covenant be better, is the Ministration worse? The Sons of the great think scorn of such an employment: what they held an honor, these count a disparagement: In one and the same subject meets their ambition and our scorn. It is ill when the Fig-tree shall despise the Dresser, but it would be far worse if the Dresser should despise the Fig-tree.

[4] To the Dresser. This is the whole Congregation of his Ministers, to whom he hath committed the culture of his Vineyard: all which, by an Enallage numeri, are sum'd up in one Dresser. 1. Quia Cor vnum, because they have all one heart. 2. Quia officium vnum; all their labors meet in that one common term; the •dification of the Body of Christ. 3. It is usual to name one proceteris, for all the rest. Peter says, Though I should die with thee▪ I will not deny thee. Did Peter only promise this? No, but So said likewise the rest of the Disciples. Had not this been a Parable, I never found a place of more probable color for the high Priest of Rome to challenge his universal Supremacy by. But surely, he will never dress Christ's Vineyard, as it ought, unless in a Parable. Nay, would his Instruments forbear to sow it with brambles, to manure it with blood, and to cast Nabaoth out of his own vineyard, it were somewhat. But let them pass! When the Spirit wrote to a whole Church, he inscribes his Epistle under one particular name, Angelo Ecclesiae, to the Angel of the Church.

To the Dresser. Dressing implies labor and [5] heedfulnesse. I might here touch upon the Ministers diligence, that Christ's Vineyard never lie rude and vnpolishd through his default. But this age will look to that well enough: never did the Egyptians call so fast upon the Israelites for making of Bricks, as the people call on us for making of Sermons: & our allowance of materials is much alike. They think it recompense bountiful enough to praise our pains; as if we could live like Chameleons, upon the subtle air of Commendations. So they serve us as Carriers do their Horses; lay heavy burdens upon their backs, and then hang belles at their ears to make them music. But be our reward little or much, God forbid we should slack dressing the Vineyard of Jesus Christ.

[6] To the Dresser. Why to him? Vt intercederet that he might plead for the Tree. So unwilling is God to destroy, that he woul• have us manacle his hands with our prayers: he would be entreated to forbear. Go thy ways down, for the people which thou broughtest out of Egypt, have corrupted themselves. Why this to Moses? That he might pray for them. He that meant to spare them in mercy, meant withal that Moses should be beholden to him for that mercy. And Moses indeed chargeth the Lord, sets upon him with so holy a violence, that as if his prayers could vincere inuincibilem, he hears, Let me alone. O that every Vine-dresser were full of this graciou•ffection to the trees under his charge: yea, who fears God, and in some measure hath it not? The people forgot Moses, Moses remembers the people: they could be merry and happy without him, he would not be happy without them. Me• rob us of our means, lode us with reproaches: all our revenge is to solicit heaven for them by our supplications: they sue us, we sue for them: they impoverish our temporal condition, we pray for their eternal salvation. We could never hope for goo• to our selves, if we should not return them this good for their evil.

Corah had drawn a multitude to rebel against Moses and Aaron, Moses and Aaron pray for their rebels. They were worthy of death, and they had it; yet would these merciful Leaders hau• prevented it: refusing to buy their own peace with the loss of such enemies. Yea, they are so far from caruing their own just revenge, that they would not have the Lord to revenge for them. Let us fill our hearts with this great Example: the people rise up against their Pastors, the Pastors fall on their faces for the people. Certainly, if God had not meant to hear us, he would never invite us to pray. But as it pleaseth Him to make us His mouth to you; so also, your mouth to Him: both to tell you, what He doth say, and to return Him what you should say; to preach against your sins; to pray for your souls. Do you hear us plead for Christ, for Christ hears us plead for you. Indeed, we are men of polluted lips and lives: but as God's power is not straitened through our weakness, so, nor is his mercy lessened through our unworthiness. Therefore as Paul had his, Vae mihi si non praedicauro; Woe unto me, if I Preach not: So Moses, in effect, had his Vae mihi, si non intercessero, woe unto me, if I pray not: God forbid I should cease praying for you. But as all our Preaching can work no good upon you, but through the holy Ghost: so all our Praying can bring no good to you, but through Jesus Christ. We pray for you, forget not you to pray for us. Indeed, weak ones pray with us, malicious ones pray against us, covetous ones prey upon us▪ few pray for us. We entreat for you, do you entreat for us; and that only Mediator betwixt God and man plead for us all.

The Complaint. Behold I come, &c.

This hath in it two passages.

- His Access. Behold, these three years, &c.
- His Success. I find none.

First, the Access.

[1] Behold. Ecce is here a note of complaint. He that can thunder down sin with vengeance, rains on it showers of complaint. Behold the Tree; he might in a moment have put it past beholding, by throwing it into the infernal furnace. Why doth he complain, that can compel? Habet in manu potentiam, in cord patientiam: there is power in his hand, but patience in his heart. To do Justice, we (after a sort) contstrain him: but his delight is to be merciful.

He complains. All complain of lost labors: the Shepherd after all his vigilance, complains of stragglng Lambes: the Gardener after all his diligence, of withering Plants: the Husbandman after all his toil, of lean Fields, and thin Haruests: Merchants after many adventures, of Wrackes and Pyracies: Tradesmen of bad debtors, and scarcity of monies: Lawyers complain of few Clients, and Divines of fewer Conuerts. Thus we complain one of another: but God hath just cause to complain of us all.

Well, if the Lord complain of Sin, let not us make our selves merry with it. Like Sampson, it may make us sport for a while, but will at last pull down the house upon our heads. The voice of the Turtle is (not) heard in our Land. Vox Turturis, vox gem••tis. True penitents be more rare then Turtles. The voice of the Sparrow we hear, chirping lust: of the Night-bird, buzzing ignorance: the voice of the Scriech-owl, croaking blasphemy: of the Popinjay, gaudy pride: the voice of the Kite and Cormorant, covetousness and oppression: these, and other Birds of that wing be common. But, Non audita est vox Turturis: who mourns for the sin of the time, and longs to be freed from the time of sin? It was an unhappy spectacle in Israel, to see at once, Lachrymantem Dominum, and ridentem populum: a weeping Savior, and deriding sinners. We complain of our crosses and losses, we complain of our maladies, of our injuries, enemies, miseries: the Lord open our eyes, and soften our hearts, to see and feel the cause of all, and to complain of our sins.

I come. The Lord had often sent before, now he came himself; even by his personal presence, accepting our nature. The Son of God that made us the Sons of men, became the Son of man, to make us the Sons of God. He came voluntarily: we come into the world, not by our own wills, but by the will of our parents; Christ came by his own will. He came not for his own benefit, but ours. What profit doth the Sun receive by our looking on him? We are the better for his light, not he for our sight. A shower of rain that waters the earth, gets nothing to it self; the earth fares the better for it. He came for our fruits: these cannot enrich him: Lord, our well-doing extendeth not to thee.

Never came such an Inhabitant to our Country, as Jesus. Had God granted men the liberty to beg of him what they would, and have it; they durst not have been so bold as to ask his only Son. When the King gives a free concession to his subject, to make choice of his own suit, without denial; he will not be so impudent as to beg the Prince. Let us entertain him well, we fare the better for him: the profit of our redemption bless•eth all the rest unto us. Far be it from us to welcome him with scandals, with blasphemies, and neglect. He may then reply, as Absalom to Hushai, Is this thy kindness to thy friend? No, you say, we make much of him, hold him in the highest regard, trust him with our whole salvation. But know, Christ fares not the better for thy Faith, but for thy Charity. Faith is a beggarly receiver, Charity is a rich giu•r. Thy Faith is a hand that takes something from him, to enrich thyself: thy Charity is a hand that gives something to him, in his distressed members. Indeed Christ is the subject of all tongues, but he is not the object of all hearts. The School disputes of him, the Pulpit preaches of him, Profession talks of him, Profane men swear by him, few love him, few •erue him. He is come, let him be made welcome, by setting our best cheer, and choicest fruits before him. Whom should we entertain, if not our Savior?

Seeking. But, did not He know before? [3] What need he seek, that hath found? He that understands our thoughts long before they are borne, cannot be nescious of our works when they are done. My answer shall be short: the Lord's Quaerit, is a Requirat: he doth not seek a thing that is hid from him, but requir•es a debt that is due unto him.

Seeking. This is no rare, but a continued [4] act. It is not Veni, I came: He came unto his own, & Nor a Venturus sum; Yet a little while, and I will come. But 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : as Revel. 3.20. Sto pulsans, I stand knocking: so here, Venio querens, I come seeking. He seeks continually: will you hear how long?

[5] These three years. Much time hath been spent about the Interpretation of this time; how it is applicable to the Jewish Synagogue, to whom, it was immediately referred. I find no great difference among Expositors, saving only in their terms. Some by the first year understand the time before the Captivity; by the second, their return to Jury; by the last, the coming of Christ. Some by the first year, conceive the Law given by Moses: By the second, the Prophetical attestations: by the third, the grace of our Lord Jesus. Some resolve it thus; the first year was the time of Circumcision, from Abraham to Moses: the next, the Levitical Law from Moses to Christ: the last is the year of Salvation by the Messias. Others understand the first year to be of the Patriarchs, the middle year of the Judges, the third of the Kings. After all this he was entreated to forbear it a fourth year, till it was instructed by the Apostles: and then being found fruitless, it was cut down by the Romans. But I rather take a definite number to be put for an indefinite: three years is time long enough to wait for the proof of a tree: such a proportionable expectation had the Lord for that Church, if literally you would have it, I take this to be the probablest exposition. These three years were the very three years of his Preaching, healing diseases, casting out Devils, working Miracles before their faces. The other year which he added, was the time while the Apostles offered them the Gospel of salvation. Whereof the refusers were cut down, the accepters were saved.

He hath likewise waited for the Church [6] of Christianity three years; that is, three revolutions of Ages, thrice five hundred years. Or he hath tarried the leisure of the whole world three years: the first year, under nature: the second, under the Law: the third, under Grace: the fourth is now a passing, and who knows how far it is spent?

Or to apply it to our selves, these three [7] years of our visitation, hath been so many scores of years. Conceive the foremost to be in the days of King Edward 6. who purged the gold from the rust and dross of Superstition, Ignorance, and Cussenage, which it had contracted. The Sun began to shine out in his bright luster: the Lord came seeking our fruits; but not finding them answerable to his expectation, nor worthy of the glorious Gospel: he drew another cloud over our Sun: teaching us better to value that heavenly Manna, wherewith we were so suddenly grown wanton. The second year, under Queen Elizabeth, of so blessed memory: that Royal nurse, upon whose Bosom the Church of God leaned to take her rest. She did again vindicate this Vineyard, which had so long lain among Friars and Monks, that it had almost quite forgotten the language of Canaan: She taught it a new to speak the Dialect of the Holy Ghost. When that Gracious Queen was taken from a Crown of gold to a Diadem of glory, then began our third year; wherein our present Sovereign was sent; Dignissimus Regno, si non natus ad Regnum: under whom we know not, whether our Truth or Peace be more. Only let us bless him, and bless God for him, that we may all be blessed in him. Thus far we may say of our Land, as Syluius did of Rhodes, Semper in Sole sita est: the bright reflection of the Gospel compasseth us round about. Now he comes this third year seeking our fruits: which when we consider, we can say no more but Miserere Deus; Lord be merciful to us: for never were such blessings requited with such unthankfulness. We condemn the Jews for abusing Christ's patience: God grant they rise not up at the last day to condemn us.

[8] He comes to a particular man three years. 1. In Youth. I have planted thee in my Vineyard, given thee the influence of my mercies; where is thy fruitfulness? Alas, the young man sends him away, with a Nondum tempus ficorum: it is too early for me to fall to Mortification; would you put me to penance, before I have had the leisure and pleasure to offend? He is ready to send Christ away in the Language of that foul Spirit; Art thou come to torment me before my time? But whose charge is it to Remember thy Creator, Diebus Iuuentutis? Then the conquest is most glorious, because then it is most difficult. You say, It is never too late; but I am sure, It is never too soon, to be gracious and holy. The Devil is a false Sexton, and sets back the clock of Time in prosperity: in the day of trouble, he will make it run fast enough. 2. In middle age; and now the buying of Farms, and trying of Beasts; the pleasures of Matrimony, the cares for posterity. take up all the rooms of the soul. Men rather busy themselves to gather the fruits of earth, then to yield the fruits of heaven. Here is strength of nature, and fullness of stature; but still a defect of grace. Perhaps, Christ hath now some fair promises, of fruits hereafter: Let me first go bury my Father, then. But (a thousand to one) he finds something in Domo, left by his father, that keeps him, a Domino, from following his Master. To prevent this, it is his caution to the entertained servant; Forget thine own people, and thy fathers house: rather forgo and forget thy fathers house, then thy Makers service. 3. In old age now the decay of body should argue a decay of sin. The taste finds no relish in riot, the ears cannot distinguish Music, the eyes are dim to pleasing objects, very Desire fails. now all things promise mortification. He that cannot stir abroad in the world, what should he do but recollect himself, and settle his thoughts on the world to come? Now fruits, or never. Not yet: Morositie, Pride, and Avarice, are the three diseases of old age: men covet most, when they have time to spend least: as cheating Tradesmen then get up most commodities into their hands, when they mean to break. Still he comes seeking fruit, and is returned with a Non inuentus.

[9] If yet it wear but as the Prophets sign to Hezekiah; This year ye shall eat such as groweth of it self: and the second year such springeth of the same: and in the third year ye shall sow and reap, &c. the third year might afford him somewhat. But doth he forbear all trees thus long? No, some are snatch' away in the flower and pride of their life: yea, they be not few, that will not allow themselves to live; but with riot and intemperance hasten their own ends, before they have well begun or learned what life is: like bad Scholars, that slubber out their books before they have learned their lessons. That instead of, Non est fructus, we may say, Non est ficus, the tree it self is gone. And that goodly person, which like a fair ship hath been long a building: and was but yesterday put to sea, is today sunk in the Maine. We do not eat, drink, and sleep, and take such refectations of nature, vt non moriamur, that we might not die; that is impossible: but that we should not die barren, but bear some fruits up with us to him that made the Tree.

Seeking. It is fit we should offer our fruits [10] to God, and not put him to seek for his own. We should be like those ripe-figs, that fall into the mouth of the eater. The best liquors are they that drop from their cells, of their own accord, without pressing. The most acceptable of all oblations, be the Freewill-offerings. Howsoever, let us be sure not to disappoint the Lord when he seeks.

On this Fig-tree. It is fit, that he that [11] plants a Vineyard, should taste of the Wine: good reason, his own tree should yield him some fruit, considering what he hath done for it he may well challenge it.

1 He hath planted us: we spring not up naturally; as the Oak grows from an Acorn, the Peach from a stone: but a gracious hand hath set us. We are not borne of flesh, nor of the will of blood, or of man, but of God.

2. He hath planted us in his Vineyard within the enclosed Garden of the Church. Had he left us to the unregarded wilderness, without any Dresser to look to us, there might have been some excuse of our barrenness. The ground that is left to it self, is (in a manner) blameless, though it be fruitless. But in Vineasua, which he hath fenced in with his providence, blessed with his saving influence, husbanded with his Dressers diligence, forwarded with the beams of mercy, and showers more precious then the dews of Hermon that fell upon the hill of Zion. Where we participate the fatness of the ground, are fed with vnperishing Manna, compassed about with Songs of deliverance, and have seen our desires upon (his and) our enemies. Where Righteousness is our walls, and Peace our bulwarks, and the ways be milk where we set our feet.

3 We are Fig trees: not brambles, no man expects Grapes from thorns. Not Okes or Cedars, to be a dwelling for the Storks: But Fig trees, apt for fruit, for pleasant fruit. If the rest be fruitless, they serve for other purposes: but what shall become of the barren Fig tree?

4. He is our Lord, and Querit suum, he seeks but his own. If our own Kin• give us no milk, our own sheep afford us no wool, our own land return us no increase, we are displeased: whereas these be reasonless creatures; but we have sense above common nature, reason above sense, grace above reason: We are but tennants of these, Christ is Lord of us: our sins bring the curse of barrenness upon them, but there is no fault in God, if we be unfruitful.

5: He comes seeking: not threatening, raging, wounding, not felling down the tree, nor stocking it up by the roots; but seeking. Dignatur expectare fructus, cuilicet eradicare Infructuosos.

Man is a loser by the barrenness of his garden tree: were there not a tree left, God is never the poorer.

Now lay all these together: a Lord that owes us, we are his trees: to come into his Vineyard, where he may be confident; we live on his ground: to look upon a Fig tree, made of an apt disposition to good fruit; such a one as himself hath planted, not casually grown up: a tree not neglected, but whereon he hath bestowed great care and cost; waiting, not destroying: what can we plead for it, if it be fruitless? God is our Lord and Proprietary, England is his Vineyard, everyone of us his Fig-tree, thus planted, watered, blessed by his gracious mercy: He comes to us with patience, that should run to him with penitence: seeking our fruits, that should make tender of them unsought; waiting, that might command: now, fear, obedience, and thankfulness, keep us from sending him back with a Non inuenio, I find none.

[12] Fruit. This is that inseparable effect that God expects from every Tree planted in his Garden. We are married to Christ: to what ende? That we should bring forth fruits unto God. He seeks not for leaves, buds, or blossoms, but fruits. Could leaves content him, we would not leave him unsatisfied: he should have an Arbour large enough to reach to the Worlds ende. Our tongues run apace, not seldom faster then our wits. We are God's debtors, and if he will take our words, so: that's all he is like to have. Might buds please him, or blossoms: we have intentions to good, certain offers and shows of obedience: which we wear like a cloak, or some loose garment, that when Lust calls, we may quickly slip off. But when he seeks for works, all our Consonants be turned into Mutes, we are speachlesse. O would he ask us for anything but fruits: but what should be expected from the Fig tree, but Figs?

Of every soul here he seeks for fruits. Of the Magistrate, that he bring forth the fruits of Justice; determining causes with sincerity of decision, and convenience of expedition: being so far as equity permits, a husband to the widow, and a father to the fatherless. Of the Minister, that he bring forth the fruits of knowledge. Aaron's Rod was his Pastoral staff: in one and the same night it brought forth buds, and blossoms, and fruit. Fruitfulness is the best argument that God hath called us: there is not a plant of his setting, but the very branches thereof shall flourish. I do not say, our pains shall always convert many Souls; that is God's fruit, not ours: He chargeth us to be industrious in Preaching, let Himself alone with the work of saving. Of the private man, he expects the fruit of his calling: to be idle, is to be barren of good; and to be barren of good, is to be pregnant of all evil. Bella gerant alij, Protesilaus edit. but let us that are called to work, work in our calling; otherwise at last, we shall make but a sorry answer to that Question, Vbi fructus? Let us all produce the fruits of Charity: rich men do good turns to themselves; as they play at Tennis, tossing the Ball to him that will toss it to them again: seldom to the poor, for they are not able to bandy it back. Pride cuts, and Ryot shuffles, but betwixt them both, they deal the poor but a bad game. The fruit of Christianity is Mercy; when the rich, like full ears of Corn, humble themselves to the poor earth in Charity. Feed him, that feeds you: give him part of your Temporalls, from whom you expect Eternalls: you clothe Christ with your blacks on earth, he will clothe you with his glorious whites in heaven. Our mercy to others, is the Fruit of God's mercy to us.

[13] Fruit. Nothing is created for it self, but so placed by the most wise providence, that it may confer something to the public good; though it be but as the Widows two Mites to the Treasury. The poorest creature yields some Fruit, wherein it doth imitate the goodness of the Maker. We know not readily, what good Serpents and Vermin may do; yet certainly, they have their fruit; both in sucking up that poison of the earth, which would be contagious to man; in setting off the beauty of the better pieces of creation: (for though the same hand made both the Angels in heaven, and the worms on earth; yet the Angels appear the more glorious being so compared) besides their hidden virtues abstracted from our knowledge. Of stones they make iron, rubbish serves to raise Bulwarks, the small pebble for the sling, worms and flies are baits for Fishes: every thing is enabled with some gift for the vnniuersall benefit, and to produce those fruits is their natural work.

The Sun comes forth of his Chamber like a Bridegroom, fresh and lively; and rejoiceth as a Giant, to run his diurnall course, to lighten us with his refulgent beams, to generate, cheer, and mature things with his parental heat: this is his fruit. In his absence the Moon and Stars adorn the Canopie of Heaven, reflecting their operative influence to quicken the lower world: this is their fruits. The curled clouds, those bottles of rain, thin as the liquor they contain, fly up and down on the wings of the wind, delivering their moist burdens upon the earth, teats whereon the hungry fields and pastures do suck; yet they expect no harvest from us: this is their fruits. The subtle winds come puffing out of their caverns, to make artificial motions, wholesome airs, and nauigable seas; yet neither earth, air, nor sea return them recompense: this is their fruits. The earth, in a thankful imitation of the Heavens, locks not up her treasures within her own Coffers; but without respect of her private benefit, is liberal of her allowance, yielding her fatness and riches to innumerable creatures, that hang on her breasts, and depend upon her as their common mother for maintenance: Of the beasts that feed upon her, Kine give us their milk, Sheep their wool: everyone pays a tribute to man, their vsufructuary Lord: this is their fruits. Fruit-bearing Trees spend not all their sap and moisture upon themselves, or the increase of their own magnitudes: but the principal and purer part of it is concocted into some pleasant Fruits; whereof they nor their young Springs ever come to taste; but they proffer it us, and when it is ripe, they voluntarily let it fall at their Masters feet. Never did the Olive annoint it self with the own Oil, nor the Vine make it self drunk with the own Grapes, nor the Tree in my Text, devour the own Figs: yet they all strive to abound with Fruits.

Let me raise your Meditations from earth to heaven: the holy Angels there are called Ministring Spirits: those royal Armies fight for us against our enemies: like Nurses, they bear us up in their arms, and (though unseen) do glorious Offices for us: this is part of their fruit. The blessed Trinity is always working: Hitherto my Father worketh, and I work. The Father by his providence and protection, the Son by his mercy and mediation, the Holy Ghost by his grace and sanctification: all dividing the streams of their goodness, for the best behoove of the world. The more anything furthers the common good, the more noble is the Nature, and more resembling the Creator.

The Earth is fruitful, the Sea, the Air, the Heavens are fruitful; and shall not man bring forth fruits, for whom all these are fruitful? While all the Armies of Heaven and Earth are busied in fructifying; shall Man, of more singular graces and faculties, be idle, a burden to the world and himself? Both the Church of God for the propagation of piety, and the world it self for the upholding of his estate, requires our Fruits. If Happiness consisted in doing nothing, God that meant Adam so happy, would never have set him about business: but as Paradise was his Store-house, so also his workhouse: his pleasure was his task. There is no state of man that can privilege a folded hand: Our life is, Vita pulueris, non puluinaris. Lands, Means, and Moneyes, men make the protections of Idleness: whereas Adam commanded the whole earth, yet work expected him. In Paradise all things did labor for man, now man must labor for all things. Adam did work because he was happy, we his children must work, that we may be happy. Heaven is for joys, Hell for pains, Earth for labor. God hath three houses; this is his Work-house, that above is his Ware-house. O then let us be fruitful; that others benefit may be ours, our benefit theirs; and the glory of all, the Lord's. If Magistrates yield not the Fruits of Justice, Ministers the fruits of knowledge, private men the fruits of Charity and Obedience; it is as unnatural, as if the Sun should forget to shine, or the earth to fructify. God made all these for man, he made man for himself: of us he looks for Fruit, of us let him find it, from us accept it, in us increase it, and to us reward it, through Him, in whom alone we expect mercy, Jesus Christ.

The success follows. Non inuenio.

We have brought the Lord into his Vineyard, heard him calling for the Dresser, showing him a Tree, telling him of a three years expectation: now, if after all this we inquire for the event; himself certifies us, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, I find none.

None? Peradventure he came before the season; Nondum tempus erat Ficorum. When should a Tree bring forth fruits, but Tempore suo? This is the praise of the good Tree, that it brings forth the fruit in due season. If the Fig-tree could have objected to the Owner, as Elisha to his servant; Hocine tempus; Is this a time to plant Vineyards, or gather fruit? Or as the man replied to his neighbor, that came to borrow loaves at midnight; Is this a time to lend Bread, when myself and family are in bed? The Spring is the season of fructifying, the Autumn of gathering. When the time of the singing of Birds is come, Then the Fig tree puts forth her green Figs. But Cum fermento perfundatur puluis, when the dust is leavened with mire, and the bands of Orion have locked up the influence of Heaven. Who seeks fruit in Winter; he must be content with Winter fruit. There is the Winter of an afflicted Conscience; no marvel then if neither ripe Figs, nor so much as green leaves appear: when all the Sap is retyred to the Roote, as in extreme cold the blood runs to the heart to succor it. When the Babylonians required of their captive Israelites some Hebrew Songs, they could soon answer; How shall we sing the Lord's Song in a strange Land? Is this a time or place to be merry? But did the Lord come out of season? No, he required it not the first day, or month, but waited the full time, expecting fruit in the Autumn or Vintage season. Non ante tempus querit, qui per triennium venit. He came not with a Trienniall Visitation, as Episcopal Fathers use to visit, once in three years; but every year, every month in the year, week of the month, day of the week. Of another Fig-tree it is said, that The time of Figs was not yet, yet he cursed it: Here the time was three years past without fruit, yet he cursed it not. But look to it; If thou wilt not fructify Tempore tuo, thou shalt be cut down tempore non tuo, perish before thy time. There is not a day in the year, wherein he forbears seeking our fruit; yet Venio, non inuenio; I find none.

[2] None? Nunquid quia male quasiuit Dominus? Was there any error in his search? Men often seek Bona, good things, non bene, not in a good manner. Either they fail in their Quando, as Joseph sought Christ after a days journey; whereas he is too precious to be missed one hour: They shall seek thee Tempore inveniendi, when thou mayest be found. Or in the right Vbi: as Mary sought her Son in Cognitione Carnis, among her kindred; who was in Domo Patris, in the Temple. So the Papists seek now him in Pictures, who promised to be found in the Scriptures. Or in their Quomodo, as they that seek aliud pro illo, aliud prae illo, another instead of him, another besides him, another with him, another before him, which they do not seek for him. All these seek and miss, because they seek amiss. The world is commonly mistaken in their search: Quaerunt bona locis non suis, they seek for things out of their proper orbs. Men seek Honor in Pride, whereas Honor is to be found in Humility. They seek reputation in bloody revenge; alas, that is to be found in Patience: It is the glory of a man to pass by an offense. They seek content in Riches, which is as if one should seek for fresh water in the midst of the Sea. But in none of these circumstances did this Seeker fail: not in the Vbi, for he sought in the Vineyard: not in the Quando, for he came in the Vintage; not in the Quomodo, for he sought fruit on that Fig tree, about which he had been at so great charges; yet I find none.

None? Haply not so thick with fruits [3] as the Vines of Engedi: every Land is not a Caanan, to flowe with Milk and Honey. But yet some competent measure, enough to pay the Land-lord rent for the ground it stands on; no, None. If there be none to spare, whereof the owner may make money; yet, Sufficiat ad vsum suum, ad esum suum, that he may eat the labors of his own hands; no, None. If the number be not as the Sand, yet let there be a Remnant. If there cannot be a whole harvest, yet let there be a Tenth. If not a Tenth, yet let there be some gleanings; and that is a woeful scarcity: if the gleanings be not allowed, yet let there be here and there a Fig, a Grape, a Berry, on the outmost branches; that the Planter may have a taste: It is too defective, when Non florebit ficus, the Tree doth not flourish: but Quando non erit Vua in vitibus, non ficus in ficulneis: when there shall not be a Grape on the Vine, nor a Fig on the Tree; this is a miserable sterilitie. Some thing hath some savor, but None is good for nothing. Indeed all Trees are not equally loaden: there is the measure of a hundred, of ixtie, of thirty; an Omer, and an Ephah: but the Sacred dews of Heaven, the graces of the Gospel, bless us from having None. I find none.

[4] None? Peradventure none such as he looks for, no Fruits delicate enough for the Almighty's taste. Indeed, our best fruits are never perfect and kindly ripened; still they relish sour and earthly, and savor of the Stock from which they were taken. They are heavenly Plants, but grow in a foraigne and cold Climate, not well concocted, nor worthy the charges and care bestowed upon us. Set Orenge or Figgetrees in this our cold Country, the fruit will not quit the cost of the planting and maintaining. But the complaint is not here of the imperfection or paucity of fruits, but of the nullity; None. Some reading that Text with idle eyes; that after all our fruits, we are still unprofitable Trees: because they can find no validity of merit in their works, throw the Plough in the hedge, and make holyday. But shall not the Servant do his Masters business; because he cannot earn his Masters Inheritance? Shall the Mason say, I will share with my Sovereign in his Kingdom, or I will not lay a stone in his building? Yet good fruits have their reward; though not by the merit of the doer, yet by the mercy of the acceptor. Sour they be of themselves, but in Christ they have their sweetening; and the meanest fruit, which that great Angel of the Covenant shall present to his Father, with the addition of his own precious Incense, are both received and rewarded. In their own nature they may be corrupt; but being died in the blood of Christ, they are made pleasing to God. Yea, also profitable to the Church, and useful to men, seem they never so poor. Even a troubled Spring doth often quench a distressed Souldi•rs thirst: a small Candle doth good, where the greater Lights be absent: and the meanest fruit of holy Charity, even a cup (though it be not of the juice of the grapes out of the Vineyard, but) of cold water out of the tankard, in the name of Christ, shall have the recompense. But here the complaint is not of the meannes, or fewness, but of the Bareness; None at all.

None? Every Tree is known by the fruits, it [5] is Christ's everlasting rule. Howsoever the tree lives by the sap, and not by the fruits: yet it is known to live by the fruits, and not by the sap; for this is hidden. The just man lives by his faith, not by his works: but he is known to live by his works, not by his invisible faith. Neither doth the fruit make good the tree, but the tree makes good the fruit. Opera bona non faciunt just•m, Iustus facit bona opera. Good works make not a man righteous, but the righteous man doth good works. Our persons are justified before our actions; as of necessity the tree must be good, before it can bear good fruit. But how shall that tree be discerned, that hath no fruit? I find none.

[6] None? Why this to us? Why such a Text in such a time? We abound with fruits: which way can you look, and not have your eye full of our works? They before, in such places, have successively commended our fruits. Bee it so: yet Euripides being questioned why he always made women bad in his Plays, whereas Sophocles ever made them good, in his: answered, Sophocles makes them such as they ought to be, but I make them such as indeed they are. Their former commendation have told us what we should be; but this Emblem, I fear, tells us truly what we are. Not all of us; God forbid: here is but one Fig-tree in a whole Vineyard thus taxed, and far be it from us to tax a whole Vineyard for one barren Fig-tree.

[7] None? Yes, enough of some fruits, but the Prophet calls them Ficos valde malos, so bad that they cannot be eaten. As the fruit of the Vine is commended for Quicknesse, the fruit of the Olive for Fatness, so the fruit of the Fig-tree for Sweetness; in Jotham's Parable. But if it bear not Fructum natiuitatis suae, the fruit of the own kind, but bitter figs; here had better be none at all. What an uncomfortable sight is this to Him, whose heart is set on his Orchard; after the cost of so dear blood to purchase it, after such indulgent care to cherish it, and the charges of so many workmen to dress it; yea, after so much patience to expect it (say the Fig-tree does not bear so soon as it is planted; in our infancy we can do nothing, in our minority we will do little; in God's service: but now it is grown fructifiable) I am non gustare fructus, not to have so much as a taste? Yea, were this all; did barrenness only usurp it: but there is worse then a mere orbitie or absence of goodness; a position of bitter fruits: Quaesiui Vuas, inuēio Labrascas: I find wild Grapes, luxurient fruits. Instead of the hearty effects, which Wine produceth, I am answered with the melancholy preuarications of malice.

Behold the wonder and spectacle of unthankfulness; among all God's Creatures, Man; and among men the barren Christian. Though Israel play the Harlot, yet let not Judah transgress. What may be expected from the wild Forest of Paganism, when the Garden of Eden yields such fruits? The sweet fruit of the Spiritual Fig-tree is mercy: our God is the God of Love, our Savior is the Prince of Love, the Church is knit together in Love: our Roote is Love, our Sap is Love, our Ligaments Love: now if we shall suck the blood one of another, violate the relations of peace, concoct all our moisture into malice; here is worse then, Inuenio fructum nullum, I find none: for Inuenio fructum malum, I find cursed fruits. We are grown unnatural; the hand scratcheth the eye, the mouth biteth the hand: thorns and briars entwine and embrace one another, while (against all nature) Fig-trees denoure one another. Lord, thou didst sow good seed in thy field, whence then hath it Tares? Here is more fruit then God would have; but for that he expects, I find none.

[] When we are filled with his blessings, Christ looks for our praises; when we have eaten and are fat, that we should worship him. What fruit finds he? We sit down to eat and drink, and rise up to play: for praying, playing. When we are scourged, he looks for our humiliation and penance; Sure, in their affliction they will seek me. What fruit finds he? Lord, thou hast smitten them, but they have not sorrowed; an insensible desperatnesse. In this case let us pray; Lord, less of the fruits we have, and more of them we should have. Instead of righteousness, a cry: a cry indeed; a roaring cry of the oppressors, and a mourning cry of the oppressed. Haec non sunt placido suscipienda sinu.

Our Bells ring, our Chimneis smoke, our Fields reioice, our Children dance, our selues sing and play; Iouis omnia plena. But when Righteousness, hath sown, and comes to reap; here is no harvest; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, I find none. And as there was never less wisdom in Greece, then in time of the Seven Wise men: so never less piety among us, then now, when upon good cause most is expected. When the Sun is brightest the Stars be darkest: so the clearer our light, the more gloomy our life with the deeds of darkness. The Cimerians, that live in a perpetual mist, though they deny a Sun, are not condemned of impiety, but of ignorance: but Anaxogoras, that saw the Sun, and yet denied it, is not condemned of ignorance, but of impiety. Former times were like Leah, bleary eyed, but fruitful: the present, like Rachel fair but barren. We give such acclamation to the Gospel, that we quite forget to observe the Law. As upon some solemn Festival, the Bells are rung in all steeples, but then the Clockes are tied up: there is a great untuned confusion and clangor, but no man knows how the time passeth, So in this universal allowance of liberty by the Gospel, which indeed rejoiceth our hearts, had we the grace of sober usage) the Clocks that tell us how the time passes; Truth and Conscience, that show the bounded use, and decent form of things, are tied up, and cannot be heard. Still Fructum non inuenio, I find no fruits. I am sorry to pass the Fig tree in this plight: but as I find it, so I must leave it, till the Lord mend it. So I come to
The Sentence. Cut it down.

[1] A heavy doom! Alas, will nothing else expiate the fault? May not the lopping off some superfluities recover it? Take from the Sinner, the object of his vicious error: deface the Harlots beauty, that bewitcheth the Lasciuious: pull the cup from the mouth of the Drunkard: Nauseate the stomach of the Ryotous: strip the Popinjay of her pyed Feathers: rust the Gold, vanish the riches of the Covetous: take away Macah's gods, perhaps he will make him no more. If this will not do, cut off some of the arms & branches: weaken his strength, sicken his body, lay him groaning and bleeding on the bed of sufferance: griue his heart-strings with the sense and sorrow of his sins: anything rather than Cut it down: alas no fruit can grow on it then, but sad despair. A man's house is foul, or a little decayed; will he pul it down or rather repair it? There is hope of a Tree though the root wax old in the earth, and the stock die in the ground; yet the springs of water may put new life into it: but once cut down, all hope is cut down with it. When a man hath taken delight in a Tree, conveniently planted in his garden; what variety of experiments will he use, before he cuts it down? Alas, thus poor silly men, we reason: we measure things that be immeasurable, by things that be measurable, by things that be miserable. What we in a foolish pity would do, we think God in his merciful wisdom should do. Yet which of us would endure a dead Tree three years together in his Orchard? We would say, If it will not bear fruit, to cheer us; it shall make a fire to warm us. But the Lord hath been fixe and thirty Moons gracious in his forbearance, give him now leave to be just in his vengeance. If so much indulgence cannot recover it, there is little hope of it: Cut it down.

Cut it down. Who must do this? The [2] dresser. An unpleasing office to him, that hath bestowed so much labor upon it, esteemed it so precious, hoped for some reward at his Masters hand for his diligence about it; now to give the fatal blow, to Cut it down? And if it must fall, let it be Manu aliena, non sua, let another's hand do it. Hagar will not behold her dying Son; die he must, she was persuaded; Modo non videam, Let me not see the death of the Child. But he must obey; Arbor non est Cul•oris, sed Patris familias: th• Tree is not the Dressers, but the Lord's; and his own is at his own disposing: Cut it down.

[3] Cut it down. But how? How can the Minister be said to cut down a barren soul? Some may conceive here a reference to Excommunication: Whether the Greater, which deprives a man of all benefit by the Churches public Prayers, and the Society of Christians. Which St. Paul calls, Tradere Satanae, to deliver unto Satan: so himself Excommunicated Hymenaeus and Alexander, delivering them unto Satan: a mi•enable condition, to be subjected to a slave, to a dog, a drudge; but then especially fearful, when God grants unto Satan a Writ or faculty, Pro excommunicato capiendo. The ignominy of ignominy; besides the peril: For as Christ protecteth all the Trees in his Vineyard; so if any be transplanted to the wild desert, they are under the god of this world. Or the Less; which is indeed, no other properly, then an Act of the Churches Discipline, whereby she corrects her unruly children: that smarting with the absence of wonted comforts, they may be humbled by repentance, and so recover their pristine state. This censure may be either too cruel, or to triuiat. The Church of Rome grants Excommunications for things lost: a man hath lost his horse, he may have an Excommunication against him that detaines him: so the Father may hap to Excommunicate his own Son, and for the body of a Iade, hazard the soul of his Child. Yea, which is worse, they publish Excommunications for sins not yet committed: The Lord of a Manor hath set a row of young Elmes, he may have an Excommunication against all those that shall do them any harm. This is to hang a man, before he hath done the fact that deserves it. These ir-rite, forcelesse, bugbear Excommunications, the ridiculous affordments of a mercenary Power, are not unlike those old night spels, which blind people had from mungrel Witches, to set about their Orchards and Houses, antidotes and charms against theeuing; wherein distrusting the providence of God, they made themselves beholding to the Devil for safety, Creditors, that would be paid in their moneys, may procure an Excommunication against their Debtors, if they pay not by such a day. This were an excellent project for you Citizens, a rounder course then arrests and tedious trials at Law. But it is to be doubted, that your Debtors would fear the Popes Parchment less then the Scriveners, and an Excommunication far less then an Outlary. Ther's but four things exempted from the power of their Excommunication, as Nauarrus notes: a Locust, an Infidel, the Devil, and the Pope: so he hath matched them, so let them go together. For the Excommunicate must be a man, a Christian, mortal, and an Inferior: now the Locust is not a man, the Infidel is not a Christian, the Devil is not mortal, and the Pope hath no Superior. But too much of that; this is a Parable, and here is no foundation for such a building.

[4] Cut it down. How? with an Axe of martial iron? This were an exposition fit for Doway, or the Gunpowder-Enginers: that by Cutting it down, understood, Blow it up: turning their Axe to a Petarre. Had God said to them, Cut it down; the axe had been instantly heaved up: yea, they did it, when God said no such thing. Rather then fail of cutting it down, they would have stockd it up, root and all: this is their mercy. But the Spiritual Axe is to cut down, Culpas, non Animas: when we read of cutting down, remember it is meant of men's sins, not of their souls. Preachers indeed do wound, but it is Gladio oris, not ore gladij. with the Sword of the Spirit, not a Rouillac's Knife. If God had meant such a cutting down, Nero had been a fitter instrument then Paul. We read, that their sound went through the World: but that their Sword went through the World, we never read,

Cut it down. How then? Succide, that is, [5] Succidendam minare, threaten that I will cut it down. Cast them out of my sight; Eijce, that is, Eijciendos pronuncia; say that I will reject them. Quod moritur, moriatur: Quod succidendum est, succidatur, That which dieth, let it die. God sometimes sends such farewels and defiances to sinners that will not repent. Ephraim is joined to Idols, let him alone. If they will not be persuaded to return, let them go on to their ruin, let them alone. If any man will be unjust, let him be unjust: He that will be filthy, let him be filthy still; let them perish. Abeat, pereat, profundat, perdat.

Cut it down. This was, Sententia oris, the [6] sentence of the mouth: but it may be this was not Consilium cordis, the purpose of his heart. Saepe Deo minante quod peccans meretur, peccanti non fit quod Deus minatur. Nor can this tax God of levity: for he that speaks with condition of repentance, may change his word without suspicion of lightness. Tu muto sententiam tuam, Deus mutabit suam. Thus was Nineveh cut down: euersa stim malo, vt aedificaretur in bono: the subversion was menaced, the conversion was intended. The Father shuts his rebellions Son out of doors, will not allow him a lodging, not so much as among his servants: yet he does not mean to let him perish with hunger and cold in the streets: but when he hath well smarted for his disobedience, upon his humble submission he is re-entertained. The very mercies of the wicked are cruel, but the very judgments of God are sweet. This Cutting down, is Medicinale, not mortal: Disciplinans, non eradicans: for restitution, not destitution; for remedie not for ruin. Indeed, if all this denuntiation and threatening cannot persuade them to return, then comes their final predition: when they have cut off themselves impenitently, God will cut them off impartially. But if we turn to deprecation and repentance, he will turn to commiseration and forgiveness. The Tree is barren, and the Lord says. Cut it down: the Tree fructifies, and he will say Let it stand. O then let us humble our selves, and with seasonable repentance Cut down our sins, that this terrible Sentence may never Cut down our souls.

The Reason. Why cumbereth it the ground?

[1] God is an vndependant Lord, and needs not give a reason of his doings: for who can call him to account, Cur ita facis? His Judgments are not always manifest, they are always just: nor doth he things because they are good, but they are therefore good because he doth them. Should he make short work on the earth, and dispatch all barren Trees in a moment: yet thou continuest holy, O thou worship of Israel. If he strickes us, we are not wronged; it is our desert, and his Justice. If he spares us, we have not merited; It is his mercy. Huic fit misericordiæ, tibi non fit iniuria: that man receives mercy, thou hast no injury. Yet that he might be justified, and the mouth of all wickedness stopped, he is content to give a reason of this sentence. Think not I deal hardly with this Fg-tree, let us confer together, and hear one another with patience. I will show thee sufficient reason of cutting it down: do thou show me some cause why it should stand. My reason is, It cumbereth the ground. Terram reddit otiosam, inutilm. It is not only barren Formaliter, but Effective. In a word. 1. It does no good. 2. It doth much harm.

First, It does no good, therefore it is unworthy [2] of the nourishment. Terra bona, and Gens mala; are an ill match: an opulent Land, and a pestilent People. Peccator non est dignus pane quo vescitur. The wicked man is not worthy of the bread he eats, of the water he drinks, of the air he breathes, of the ground he goes on. The rich thinks himself worthy of delicate viands, costly garments: dutiful attendance, Quia Dives, because he is rich: yet he may not be worthy of a crumb, a rag, a respect, Quia malus, because he is evil. It will one day grieve such fruitless Nabal's, when they must receive a multiplicity of torments, according to the number of their abused benefits, and they will wish that they had not fared so well upon earth, that they might fare less ill in Hell. They live in the Vineyard, eat the fat, and drink the sweet; turning all this juice, not into fruitful clusters, for the behoove of God's servants; but into their own arms and branches: raising their Houses out of the ruins of God's House. What good do they? Cut them down, Why cumber they the ground? It is fit, that the Riches of the sinner should be laid up for the righteous: dentur digrioribus.

[3] But if God should at once cut down all the barren Trees among us, there never was such a cry in Egypt, as there would be about London. What innumerable swarms of nothing does beleaguer this City? men and women, whose whole employment is, to go from their beds to the Tap-house, then to the Play-house, where they make a match for the Brothel-house, and from thence to bed again. To omit those ambulatory Christians, that wear out the Pavement of this great Temple with their feet, but scarce ever touch stone of it with their knees; that are never further from God, then when they are nearest the Church. To omit that rabble of begging and pilfring vagabonds, that like beasts, know no other end of their creation, but recreation; but to eat, and drink, and sleep. What an army of these might be mustered out of our Suburbs? But that Idleness hath disabled them to any service: they are neither fit for God nor man. Did they yet but like worms and insects, spend up the corruption of the Land, and leave us the less, it were somewhat. But they are worse, even diseases and unwholesome airs, to breed infection among us. Let Authority look to their castigation, or answer for their mischiefs: so far as they deserve, let them not be spared; Cut them down, Why comber they the Ground?

The barren Tree doth no good you see; [4] but that is not all: It doth much hurt, and that in two respects.

1 It occupies the room where a better Tree might grow. The Kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a Nation that will bring forth the Fruits thereof. A fruitful Nation would be content with such a dwelling. Christ foretells this mutation, Paul shows it accomplished. They are broken off, that we (in their places) might be grafted on. Friend, how camest thou in hither, having on a wedding garment? Why dost thou usurp the seat, where a worthy guest might sit? Thus David used to purge his Court; admitting the righteous into the offices of the unrighteous. As in case of calamity ••he godly are delivered out of trouble, and the wicked comes in his room: so in case of felicity, the ungodly shall be turned out of their happiness, and the righteous shall come in their stead.

A Judge is corrupt; he is girded with Justice, but the girdle sags to that side where the purse hangeth; God will cut him down; here is room for a good man, that will do equity: A Magistrate is partial, and draws the Sword of Justice in his own quarrel; which he puts up in the cause of Christ: he must be cut down, here is room for one that will love and adhere to the truth. An office is abused by him that holds it; he bought dear and he cannot sell cheap: it is time he were cut down; this place will maintain a man, that will maintain the place, with uprightness. A Minister is barren, hath no milk in his breasts: Ministerium eius accipiat alter; Let another take his office; here is room for one that will feed the people. A profane Patron will let none into the Lord's Vineyard, but at the Non-licet-Gate; by which good men will never enter: his Clarke shall be Simon, himself will be Magus: vengeance shall cut him down; here is room for one that will freely put faithful Laborers into the Vineyard. There grows an Oppressor, sculking in a corner; the needy cannot find him, or if they do, they find no fruit from him; Cut him down, here is room for one that will pity the poor. The Lord will root out such bastard Plants, and replenish his Garden with fruitful Trees.

2 It draws away nourishment from better [6] Plants, that would bear us fruits. For this Christ denounced a woe to those Jewish Clarkes, that keeping the Keies of heaven would neither enter themselves, nor suffer others. What should become of them, that will neither do good, nor suffer good to be done, but cutting down? A great Oak pines all the vnderwood near it, yea spoils the grass that should feed the cattle. A great Oppressor engrosseth all round about him, till there be no place left for a fertile Tree. Mean while, himself hath only some leaves, to shadow his Sychophants; but no fruit, unless Bramble-berries, and such as the Hogs will scarce eat.

All covet to be great Trees, few to be [7] good. The Briar would grow up to the bigness of the Maple, the Maple would be as tall as the Cedar, the Cedar as strong as the Oak: and these so spread their roots, till they starve the rest by an insensible soaking. When mother earth, the Church, would derive her sap to some young hopeful Plant, these intercept it. There is maintenance due to the Minister, but the barren Impropiator stands in his way, & sucks it all from him: perhaps he leaves him some few drops, to cool his temples, but not enough to preserve life.

[8] But the famished tree cries against him that draws the life from it, & yields no fruit; and God will hear it, Abscind, cut it down. How charitable would Lazarus have been had he been owner of Dives his estate? How would Mordecai have promoted the good of Israel, had he been as great a favorite as Haman was? How freely would the conscionable man give spiritual preferments, were he a Patron? He that fears God, would justly render the Church her dues, did he drive such trades, and dwell in such houses, as you do. But that God, who disposeth all as it pleaseth him, mend all when it pleaseth him, even for his own mercies sake.

Thus from a plain Text I have derived you familiar persuasions: for I came not hither to satisfy the curious head, but the honest heart. Admit but two considerations more, and I have done.

[9] First the Lord hath shown us the way to be fruitful, by his own example. He owes us nothing: if he withhold good things, we cannot challenge him: if he sends us good things, we are bound to thank him. The last year, how general was the complaint all over this Kingdom? The Mower could not fill his scythe, nor the binder up of sheaves his bosom. The beasts perished for want of fodder, yea, children died in the street with hunger: the poor Father not being able with all his weeks labor to buy them (only) bread. The fields were thin, and the barns thinner: little in many places there was to gather, and the unseasonable weather prevented the gathering of that little. The emptiness of their bowels did justly fill our bowels with compassion: Famine is a sore plague. We then cried unto the Lord for fruits, and he heard us: Lo in how plentiful a harvest he hath answered our desires, to his own praise, and our comfort! Yea, he concluded all with songs and triumphs, a joyful harvest-home; the best sheaf of our Wheat, the best grape of the Vintage, the best flower of our garland, the best fruit of that royal Tree, the safe return of our gracious Prince. These be the fruits of his mercy to us, where be the fruits of our thankfulness to him?

Secondly, the barren Fig-tree is of all most [10] miserable, and so much the more, as it is barren in the Vineyard. The Vine fruitless, is of all trees most useless. It is compared to man, Vxor tua sicut vitis: to the best man, I am the true vine: it cheers the heart of God and man. But if barren it is good for nothing, not so much as to make a pin to hang a hat on. Oaks and Cedars are good for building, Poplars for Pales, very bushes for hedging, doted wood for firing: but the fruitless Vine is good for nothing. Salt keeps other things from putrefying, but if it self be putrefyed, what shall season it? A sweet Singer delights us all; but Quis medebitur cantatori a Serpente percusso? If a Serpent hath stung him, who shall recover his voice? If the eye be blind, what shall look to the eye?

Ad nihilum valet, quod non valet ad finem suum. It is good for nothing, that is not good for the end it was made. If a knife be not good to cut, we say it is good for nothing: yet may some other use be invented for it. If a Plough be not good to break the ground, we say it is good for nothing; yet it may stop a gap. If a hound be not good to hunt, we say he is good for nothing, yet may he in the night give warning of a thief. But if a Fig-tree, a Professor be not good for fruit, he is indeed, good for nothing. The refuse of other things have their uses: sour Wine will make Vinegar, old Rags make Paper, Lees are for Dyers, Soil is good to fat the Land, Potsheards and broken tiles to mend high ways, all good for somewhat: yea, they offer to sel the combings of hairs; Ladies and Gentlewomen know whether they be good for any purpose or no. But the fruitless vine, the sauourlesse Salt, the lightlesse Lamp, the Figlesse Fig-tree, the graceless Christian, is good for nothing.

We all have our Stations in the Vineyard, to bring forth fruits, but what be those fruits? It was a smart Invention of him, that having placed the Emperor, and the Pope, reconciled, in their Maiestick Thrones, he brought the States of the world before them. First comes a Counselor of State, with this Motto, I Advise you two: then a Courtier I Flatter you three: then a Husbandman, I Feed you four, then a Merchant, I Coussen you five: then a Lawyer, I Rob you six: then a Soldier, I Fight for you seven: then a Physician, I Kill you eight: Lastly a Priest, I absolve you all nine: This was his Satire. But in the fear of God, as our Sovereign doth govern us in Truth and Peace; So let the Counselor advise, the Judge censure, the Husbandman labor, Merchant traffic, the Lawyer plead, the Soldier bear arms, the Divine preach; all bring forth the fruits of righteousness: that this Kingdom may flourish, and be an exemplary encouragement to our neighbors: that our Children may be blessed after us, our Enemies convinced, Aliens converted, Satan confounded, the Gospel honored, the Lord glorified, and our own souls eternally saved. Which grace, the happy fruit of the Gospel; and glory, the happy fruit of Grace; God the Father grant us all for his mercies sake, God the Son for his merits sake, God the Holy Ghost for his Names sake: to whom three Persons, and one most glorious God he rendered all honor and obedience, now and forever. Amen.

A Sermon Preached at PAUL'S Cross the fifth of August. 1624.

BY THO. ADAMS.

LONDON, Printed by A. Matthews for John Grismand, and are to be sold at his Shop in Paul's Alley at the Sign of the Gunne. 1624.

TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE, SIR HENRY CAREY, Lord HVNSDON, Viscount Rochford.

MY LORD,

Among the many absurdities, which give us just cause to abhor the Religion of the present Roman Church, this seemeth to me none of the least; that they have filled all the Temples under the command of their politic Hierarchy, with Idols: and changed the glory of the Invisible God, into the worship of visible Images. They invoke the Saints by them, yea they dare not serve the Lord without them. As if God had repealed his vncchangeable Law; and instead of condemning all worship by an Image, would now receive no worship without an Image. I have observed this one, among the other famous marks of that Synagogue; that they strive to condemn that which God hath justified, and to justify what he hath condemned. For the former; He hath precisely directed our Justification only by faith in the merits of Christ: this they vehemently dispute against. For the other; He hath (not without mention of his Jealousie) forbidden all worship that hath the least tinge of Idolatry: this they eagerly maintain. What large Volumes have they written against the Second Commandment! as if they were not content to expunge it out of their Catechisms, unless they did also Dogmatice $\langle \diamond \rangle$ it to the whole world. They first set the people upon a plain rebellion, & then make show to fetch them off again with a neat distinction. Thus do they pump their wits to legitimate that by a distinction, which God hath pronounced a Bastard by his definitive sentence: as if the Papal Decrees were that law, whereby the world should be judged at the last day. But who will regard a house of magnificent structure, of honorable & ancient memory, when the plague hath infected it; or thieves possess it? And who, in their right senses, will join themselves to that Temple, which after pretence of long standing, stately building, and of many such perogatives and royalties, is found to be smeared with superstitions, and profaned with innumerable Idols? Why should we delight to dwell there, where God hath refused to dwell with us.

I publish this argument as no new thing to your Lordship: but, wherein your well experienced knowledge is able to inform me. Only I have been bold, through your thrice honored Name, to transmit this small Discourse to the world: emboldened by the long proof I have had of your constant love to the Truth, and the gracious Piety of your most noble Mother, the best encouragement of my poor labors on earth. The best blessings of God be still multiplied upon her, yourself, your religious Lady, and your honorable Family: which is continually implored by.

Your Lordships humble Servant. THO. ADAMS.

THE TEMPLE.

2. COR. 6.16.

What agreement hath the Temple of God with Idols?

IT is not fit, they should be too familiar or near together in this world, whose portions shall be so far asunder in the world to come. The Sheep and Goats are indeed now blended promiscuously, and none can distinguish them here, but he that shall separate them hereafter: the right and left hand of the last Tribunal shall declare them. But they that be alien or opposite to us in Faith and Profession, are manifest, and we have a frequent charge De non commiscendo. Now the nearer this ill matched conjunction, the more intolerable; the same board, ill; the same bed, worse; worst of all, the same Temple. So the Apostle begins his dehortation, Bee not unequally yoked with unbelievers: so he ends it, What agreement hath the Temple of God with Idols! Divers seeds of grain in one ground, diverse kinds of beasts in one yoke, diverse sorts of cloth in one garment, were expressly forbidden under the Law: and shall several Religions be allowed in one Church under the Gospel?

The absurdness of such a mixture is here illustrated by many oppositions; the sound of all which is Interrogative, the sense Negative. Righteousness and Unrighteousness, Light and Darkness, Christ and Belial, the Believer and the Infidel; these can have no society, communion, no concord, no conjunction; and What agreement hath the Temple of God with Idols?

I need not by Art divide these words, for they are divided by nature. Now as Quae Deus coniunxit, nemo separet, Those things that God hath joined together, let no man put asunder: so Quae Deus separavit, nemo coniungat, Those things that God hath put asunder, let no man join together. The scope of the Text, and the matter of my Discourse, is to separate Idols from the Temple of God; the holy Ghost hath divided them to my hands: they cannot agree in his sentence, let them never agree in our practice; cursed is he that goes about to compound this controversy. The Temple is holy, Idols profane, it is not lawful to mixe Sacra profanis. The Temple is for God, Idols for the Devil: God and the Devil admit no reconciliation. Therefore as two hostile nations, after some treaty of peace, neither liking the proposed conditions, break off in a rage, In hoc vterque consentimus, quod consentire nolumus, in this we both consent, that we will not consent at all; so be it here agreed, that no agreement can be made. In composing differences betwixt man and man, betwixt family and family, betwixt kingdom and kingdom, Beati Pacifici, Blessed are the Peace-makers. But in reconciling Christ and Belial, the Temple of God and Idols, Maledicti pacifici, Cursed are the peace-makers. Here Bella geri place at magnos habitura triumphos. God himself in Paradise did first put the quarrel, his Apostle hath here given the Alarm, and he deserves a malediction that sounds a retreat.

But as no battle can be well fought without order, and martial array, so no discourse can be made profitable without some method. The Temple therefore we will suppose to be God's Castle, and Idolatry the Invasion of it. This Castle is but one, Idols are many. The Champions that God hath set to defend his Castle, are especially or principally Princes and Pastors, the Magistracy and the Ministry; the adversary forces that fight against it be the Devils mercenary Soldiers. The Munition on the one side is the Divine Scripture, the sacred Word of God: the Engines, Ordnance, and Instruments of assault on the other side, are Idols. Traditions, and those carnal inventions, wherewith the corrupt heart of man seeks to batter it. This Siege is continual, this feud implacable, the difference irreconcilable. Yet at last the war shall end, with the ruin of those enemies, in the triumph of the righteous, and to the everlasting glory of God?

Now though this war be every way spiritual, it is diverse ways considerable. There is a material, and there is a mystical Temple: there are external, and internal Idols: there be ordinary, and extraordinary Soldiers. Every Christian, as he is a Temple of God, so not without the assault of Idols: there is a civil war, a Rebellion within him, wherewith he is continually exercised. In this militant estate of the Church none are free: only he that gives full allowance to his own corruptions, is not a Temple of God, but a Synagogue of Satan; a sink of uncleanness, rather than a Sanctuary of holiness. Thus from one general arise many particulars; and you will say, Behold a company; as Leah said of her son Gad, a Troupe cometh. Yet all these branches have but one root: they are but like the wheels of a Clock, taken a little in sunder to view, then to be put together again. Let not their number discourage your attention. When a wealthy favourite of the world sent his servant to be speak lodging for him, he told the Host, Here will come to night the Lord of such a Manor, the Land-lord of such a Town, the Keeper of such a Forest, the Master of such an Office, the Lay-parson of such a Parish, a Knight, a Justice of Peace, a Gentleman, an Usurer, and my Master; Alas, answers the Host, I have not lodging for half so many: Bee content, replies the servant, for all these are but one man. So if you distrust your memories for room to entertain so many observations, yet be comforted, for all have but this one Sum, There is no agreement betwixt the Temple of God and Idols.

The Temple.

That which was built by Solomon, was justly called the Wonder of the world: a white and glorious Monument, set on the hill of Zion, inviting passengers to see it, and amazing their eyes when they beheld it. It was of white Marble without, of Cedar and Gold within, all of the best, all beautiful, precious, durable. So magnificent was that holy Structure, that all nations have admired it, all times celebrated it. Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth is Mount Zion. While the favor of heaven was set upon Jerusalem, the joy of the whole earth was mount Zion. It is fit, he that made the world a house for Man, should have a house in this world made for himself: neither could it be too costly, seeing all the materials that went to it were his own. Every rotten Cottage is too good for Satan, no Fabric could be too sumptuous for God. While his people dwelt in Tents, Himself was content to dwell in a Tabernacle: in the flitting condition of Israel, he would have his own house a movable, that they might never remove without him. But when their residence was settled in the promised Land, he would have his Tabernacle turned into a Temple; that they dwelling where he appointed them, He might also dwell among them. The former was for motion, the latter for rest: the one for progress, the other his standing house. All this while God had but one House at once: first the Tabernacle, then that gave place to the Temple, and Solomon's Temple being defaced, was supplied by Zorobabels. Now he hath many houses, even so many as there be nations, as there be congregations, as there be persons professing Christ. We have houses of our own, why should not God have his? A Prince hath more houses then one, why should the King of Heaven be abridged? A King in his own person can dwell but in one house at once; let God have never so many, he can at once fill them all. He hath a house of flesh, so every Believer is his Temple: a house of stone, so this material one is his Temple: a house neither of flesh nor stone, but immaterial, immortal in the heavens. And as Christ says, that in his Fathers House there are many Mansions; so in his Fathers militant Church there are many houses.

It were vain to ask what God should do with a house, when we consider what we do with our own: what, but dwell in it? But how God doth dwell in it, seems to be a question: seeing the Apostle saith, that he dwells not in Temples made with hands: Indeed he dwells not in them, as we dwell in ours. Our house defends us, God defends his house: our house comprehends us, God comprehends his house. We are only within our houses, and they are without us: God is so within his house, that he is also without it, elsewhere, everywhere, yea his house is within him. When we are abroad, we cannot keep our houses; yea when we are in them asleep, they serve to keep us. God can never be absent from his, nor doth the keeper of this Temple ever sleep. Now every material Temple, wherein the Saints are assembled, the truth of the Gospel is preached and professed, the Holy Sacraments duly administered, and the Lord's Name is invocated and worshipped, is the Temple of God.

Why is it called His Temple, but for the testification of his presence? When Cain stood excommunicated for murdering his brother, and might not come to the place appointed for God's service, he is said to be cast out from the presence of the Lord. Some have interpreted the like of Jonah's flying from his presence; that he fled from the place where the Prophets used to stand ready to be sent of God. Nadab and Abihu died before the Lord; that is, before the Altar of the Ark or Altar, in the Tabernacle or Temple, was said to be done coram Domino. And yet too many come to the Temple with so little reverence, as if they thought God were not at home, or did not dwell in his own house. But the Lord is present in his Temple: in vain shall we hope to find him elsewhere, if we do not seek him here I will be in the midst of you, gathered together in my Name: not anywhere, not everywhere, but here. Indeed, no place excludes him, but this place is sure of him: he fills all places with his presence, he fills this with his gracious presence. Here he both hears us, and is heard of us: Audit orantes, docet audientes; he hears our prayers, and teacheth us our lessons. No place sends up faithful prayers in vain, no place hath such a promise of hearing as the Temple. It is the Lord's Court of Audience, his Highness Court of Requests. There humble souls open their grievances, from thence they return laden with graces. Why are many so void of goodness, but because they are negligent of the public devotions? They seek not the Lord where he may be found, therefore deserve to miss him where they pretend to seek him. Why should they think to find God in their Closets, while they care not to seek him in his Temples? When we need the help of our friend, do we tarry till we meet him by chance, or till he come to us, or shall we not rather go home to his house? Peter and John went up into the Temple at the hour of Prayer: they thought it no sufficient to pray in their private chambers, but join themselves with the Congregation, as a Navy Royal to transport their holy Merchandise to heaven. Lift up your hands in the Sanctuary, and bless the Lord. Pure hands are accepted in every place; but especially in the Sanctuary. What follows? The Lord that made heaven and earth, bless thee out of Zion. He says not, the Lord that made heaven, bless thee upon earth: nor, the Lord that made earth, bless thee out of heaven: but the Lord that made heaven and earth, bless thee out of Zion. Blessings come originally from heaven, mediately through Zion. In the Temple let us seek, in the Temple we shall find those precious treasures and comforts of Jesus Christ.

This Temple is not without some enemies. Besides those profane Politicians, that think with one Eustathius, that there is no use of Temples: or those Massilians, who (as Damascene reports) did add to other Heresies Templorum contemptum: or those Pseudo-Apostoli, that laughed at a Temple full of Suppliants, as a house full of fools. Or those that be of Jereboam's mind. who to settle himself in the kingdom of Israel, diverts the people from God's house at Jerusalem. Instead of that snowy & glittering Temple, they shall have two golden representations. Zion is too far off, these shall be near home: that is a tedious way of devotion, these both compendious and plausible. As Josephus brings him in persuading them; My good people and friends, you cannot but know that no place is without God, and that no place doth contain God; wheresoever we pray, he can hear us; wheresoever we worship, he can see us: therefore the Temple is superfluous, the journey needless; God is better able to come to you, then you are to go to him. Beside these, the Temple of God hath two kinds of foes.

1. The Anabaptists tell us; that the old superstition hath made those houses fitter for Stables then for Churches; that they ought no more to be called Templa Dei, but Templa Idolorum; as they pretend, the Passover was called in those corrupt times, not Pascha Dei, but Pascha Iudaeorum. By the same reason they would have removed all Princes, because some have abused their governments. But we say, though evil men abuse good things yet if a kingdom were not a lawful State, David and Josiah would never have been Kings; for good men do not use evil things. The Temple in Christ's time was become a den of thieves, yet even then and there did he send up devout and holy Prayers. It is a gross ignorance that cannot distinguish betwixt a fault that proceeds ex natura facti, and that which proceeds ex abusu boni: the former is malum simpliciter, the other is but malum per accidens. No man pulls down his house, because uncleanness hath been committed in one of the chambers. Let offenders be removed from the Temple, not the Temple demolished because of offenses. The Kingdom of God shall be taken from you, saith Christ; not quite taken away, but only taken from the Jews. When GOD threatened the like to Saul, he did not mean to have no more Kings, or to reduce it to the former state of Judges: no, only the kingdom shall lose Saul, but Israel shall not lose the kingdom. It is a Maxim in nature, Things dedicated to God, are not to be transferred to the uses of men: a principle in Philosophy, Quae recte data sunt, eripi non licet: and a proverb among our children, To give a thing, and take a thing, is fit for the Devils darling.

2. The Sacrilegious, to whom God is beholding, if they let his Temple stand; but for the maintenance of it, they will be so bold with him, as either to share half, or leave him none. There be many that pray in the Temple, who yet also prey on the Temple: as if a thief should do homage to that house in the day, which he means to rob in the night. But alas, why should I touch that sore which is all dead flesh▪ or speak against Sacrilege In orbe sacrilego, among them that delight in it? Where Lawyers are feed, hired, bribed to maintain Sacrilege, God and his poor Ministers may even hold their peace. Something would be spoken for Zion's sake, but I take this place and time for neither the right Vbi nor Quando. We know, Abigail would not tell Nabal of his drunkenness, till he was awoke from his wine. Whensoever it shall please God to awake you from this intoxication, we may then find a season to speak to you. But God keep you from Nabal's destiny; that when this sin shall be objected to your Consciences on your death-beds, your hearts do not then die in you like a stone. One thing let me beg of you in the Name of him, whom you thus wrong: Howsoever you persist to rob the Temple of the due Salary, yet do not stand to justify it. By imploring mercy perhaps you may be saved, but by justifying the Injury, you cannot but be lost. As the French King, Francis the first said to a woman kneeling and crying to him for Justice; Stand up woman, for Justice I owe thee; if thou beggest anything, beg mercy. So if you request anything of God, let it be mercy, for he owes you Justice: and in this point, God be merciful to you all.

It was David's earnest prayer, One thing have I desired of the Lord, and that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to enquire in his Temple. There are many that pray David's words, but not with David's heart. Vnum petij, one thing I have desired, De praeterito, for the time past: & hoc requiram, this I will still seek after, de futuro, for the time to come: I have required it long, and this suite I will urge till I have obtained it. What? to dwell in some of the houses of God all the days of my life, and to leave them to my children after me: not to serve him there with devotion, but to make the place mine own possession. These love the House of God too well, they love it to Have, and to Hold: but because the Conveyance is made by the Lawyer, and not by the Minister, their Title will be found naught in the end: and if there be not a Nifi prius to prevent them, yet at the great day of universal Audit, the Judge of all the world shall condemn them. By this way, the nearer to the Church, the further from God. The Lord's Temple is ordained to gain us to him, not for us to gain it from him. If we love the Lord, we will love the habitation of his House, and the place where his Honor dwelleth: that so by being humble frequenters of his Temple below, we may be made noble Saints of his House above, the glorious kingdom of Jesus Christ.

These be the enemies to the Temple, whereof the first would separate Dominum à Templo, the other templum à Domino: they would take God from the Temple, these would take the Temple from God. Let me conclude this point with two watch-words.

1. The first concerns us of the Ministry, the waiters of the Temple. It hath been an old saying, De Templo omne bonum, de Templo omne malum: all good or evil comes from the Temple. Where the Pastor is good, and the people good, he may say to them, as Paul to his Corinthians, Nonne opus meum vos estis in Domino, Are not ye my work in the Lord? Where the Pastor is bad, and the people no better, they may say to him, [10] Nonne destructis nostra tu es in seculo, art not thou our destruction in the world? It is no wonder, if an abused Temple make a disordered people. A wicked Priest is the worst creature upon God's earth: no sin is so black, as that shall appear from under a white Surplesse. Every man's iniquity is so much the heinouser, as his place is holier. The sin of the Clergy is like a Rheum, which rising from the stomach into the head, drops down upon the lungs, fretting the most noble and vital parts, till all the members languish into corruption. The lewd sons of Eli were so much the less tolerable, by sinning in the Tabernacle. Their sacrifices might do away the sins of others; no sacrifice could do away their own. Many a soul was the cleaner for the blood of those beasts they shed; their own souls were the fouler by it. By one and the same service, they did expiate the people's offenses, and multiply their own. Our Clergy is no Charter for heaven. Such men are like the conveyances of Land, Evidences and Instruments to settle others in the kingdom of heaven, while themselves have no part of that they convey. It is no impossible thing, for men at once to show the way to Heaven with their tongue, and lead the way to Hell with their foot. It was not a Jewish Ephod, it is not a Romish Cowle, that can privilege an evil doer from punishment. Therefore it was God's charge to the executioners of his Judgments, Begin at my own Sanctuary: and the Apostle tells us, that Judgment shall begin at the house of God: and Christ entering into his Prophetical Office, began reformation at his Fathers house. Let our devout and holy behavior prevent this; and by our reverent carriage in the Temple of God, let us honor the God of the Temple. It should be our endeavor to raise up seed unto our elder Brother, to win souls unto Christ. Nunquam cessate lucrari Christo, qui lucrati estis à Christo. If Christ, while he was upon the Cross, saith Bernard, had given me some drops of his own blood in a Vial, how carefully would I have kept them, how dearly esteemed them, how laid them next my heart? But now he did not think it fit to trust me with those drops, But he hath entrusted to me a flock of his lambes, those souls for whom he shed his blood, like whom his own blood was not so dear unto him: upon these let me spend my care, my love, my labor, that I may present them holy Saints to my dear Lord Jesus.

2. The other concerns all Christians; that they beware, lest for the abuses of men, they despise the Temple of God. For as the Altar cannot sanctify the Priest, so nor can the unholiness of the Priest dishallow the Altar. His sin is his own, and cannot make you guilty: the virtue and comfort is from God, and this is still able to make you holy. When we read, that the sin of the Priests was great before the Lord, for men abhorred the offering of the Lord: this we all confess, was ill done of the Priests; and I hope no man thinks, it was well done of the people. Say their sins, yea their very persons were worthy to be abhorred, shall men therefore scorn the Sanctuary, & cast that contempt on the Service of God, which belongs to the vices of man? This were to add our own evil to the evil of others, and to offend God because he was offended. Cannot the faults of men displease us, but we must needs fall out with God? Do we not provoke him justly to abhor our souls, when we so unjustly contemn his service? Know, that he is able to sanctify thy heart, even by the ministry of that man whose heart he hath not yet sanctified. The virtue consists not in the human action, but in the divine Institution. We say of the Sacraments themselves, much more of the Ministers; Isti non tribuunt, quod per istos tribuitur: these do not give us, what God doth give us by them.

But this age is sick of such a wanton levity, that we make choice of the Temple, according to our fancy of the Preacher: and so tie up the free Spirit of God from blowing where he pleaseth, that he shall be beholding to the grace of the Speaker, for giving grace to the hearer. So whereas Paul ties Faith to hearing, they will tie hearing to Faith; and as they believe the holiness of the man, so they expect fruit of the Sermon. This is to make Paul something, and Apollos something; whereas Paul himself says they are both nothing. God only gives the increase, and who shall appoint him by whom he shall give it? Let the feed be good, and the ground good, and the Lord will send fruit whosoever be the Sower. But while you make hearing a matter of sport, Preaching is too often become an exercise of wit. Words are but the Images of matter, and (you shall hear anon) it is not lawful to worship Images. It dangerously mis becomes the Temple, when anything shall be intended there, but the glory of God, and gaining of souls to Jesus Christ.

Thus much concerning the Temple; the next point I must fall upon is Idols.

Idol in Greek signifies a resemblance or representation, and differs not from Image in Latin: both at first taken in a good sense: but the corruption of times hath bred a corruption of words; and Idol is now only taken for the Image of a false god. Every Idol is an Image, but every Image is not an Idol: but every Image made and used for religious purposes, is an Idol. The Images of God are Idols; wherewith Popery abounds. An old man, sitting in a chair, with a triple Crown on his head, and Pontifical robes on his back, a Dove hanging at his beard, and a Crucifix in his arms; is their Image of the Trinity. This Picture sometime serves them for a god in their Churches, and sometime for a sign at their tap-houses: so that it is a common saying in many of their Cities, Such a Gentleman lies at the Trinity, and his servants at God's head. This they seem to do, as if they would in some sort requite their Maker: because God made man according to his Image, therefore they, by way of recompense, will make God according to man's Image. But this certainly they durst not do, without putting the second Commandment out of their Catechisms, and the whole Decalogue out of their Consciences.

I intend no polemical discourse of this point, by examining their Arguments: that business is fitter for the School, then the Pulpit. And, O God, that either School or Pulpit in Christendom should be troubled about it! that any man should dare to make that a question, which the Lord hath so plainly and punctually forbidden! Beside the Iniquity, how grievous is the absurdity? How is a body without a spirit, like to a spirit without a body? A visible picture, like an invisible nature? How would the King take it in scorn, to have his picture made like a Weasel or a Hedgehog? And yet the difference betwixt the greatest Monarch, and the least Emmet, is nothing to the distance betwixt a finite & an infinite. If they allege with the Anthropomorphites, that the Scripture attributes to God hands, and feet, and eyes: why therefore may they not represent him in the same forms? But we say, the Scripture also speaks of his covering us with the Shadow of his wings; why therefore do they not paint him like a Bird with feathers? If they say, that he appeared to Daniel in this form, because he is there called the Ancient of days: we answer, that God's Commandments, and not his apparitions, be rules to us: by the former we shall be judged and not by the latter. It is mad Religion, to neglect what he bids us do, and to imitate what he hath done: as if we should despise his Laws, and go about to counterfeit his thunder. God is too infinite for the comprehension of our souls, why should we then labor to bring him into the narrow compass of boards & stones? Certainly, that should not be Imaged, which cannot be Imagined. But Christ was a man, why may not his Image be made? Some answer, that no man can make an Image of Christ, without leaving out the chief part of him, which is his Divinity. It was the Godhead united to the manhood, that makes him Christ: sure this cannot be painted. But why should we make Christ's Image without Christ's warrant? The Lord hath forbidden the making of any Image, whether of things in heaven, where Christ is; or of things on earth, where Christ was; to worship them. Now till God revoke that precept, what can authorise this practice?

Their Images of the Saints, employed to such religious purposes, make them no less than Idolaters. It is a silly shift to say, the honor done to the Images, reflects upon the represented Saints. When they clothe an Image, is the Saint ere the gayer or warmer? when they offer to an Image, is the Saint ere the richer? When they kneel to an Image, the Saint esteems himself no more worshipped, then the King holds himself hooured, when a man speaks to his picture before his face. Therefore some of them are driven to confess plainly, that the Image is worshipped for it self. But could the Saints in heaven be heard speak upon earth, they would disclaim that honor, which is rejudiciall to their Maker. As Calvin is not afraid to say of the blessed Virgin, that she would hold it less despite done to her, if they should pull her by the hair of the head, or trample her in the dirt, then to set her in rivalry with her Son and God and Savior. But they tell us, that they worship not the Images of false God's, as did the Pagans; but only the Images of God's owne servants, and choice friends. But will the jealous God endure this, that his honore taken from him, upon condition it be bestowed upon his enemies, but on his friends? Idolatry is called Adultery in the Scriptures: and shall a woman quit her self from offense, because though she do commit adultery, yet it is with none but her husbands friends? Is this done in a good meaning, or in love to Christ? It is but a bad excuse of a wife, to say that she exceedingly loves her husband, therefore must have some other man to kiss and embrace in his absence, and all this in love to her husband.

We are all by nature prone to Idolatry: when we were little children, we loved babies: and being grown men, we are apt to love Images. And as Babies be children's Idols. so Idols & Images be men's Babies. It seems that Idols are fittest for Babes, therefore so the Apostle gives his caution, Babes keep yourselves from Idols. As all our knowledge comes by sense, so we naturally desire a sensible object of devotion: finding it easier to see Pictures, then to comprehend Doctrines, and to form prayers to the Images of men, then to form man to the Image of God.

Nor can they excuse themselves from Idolatry, by saying they put their confidence in God, not in the Images of God. For when the Israelites had made their golden Calf, and danced about, one calf about another; they were not such beasts, as to think that beast their God. But so can Superstition besot the mind, that it makes us not men, before it can wake us Idolaters. What do they say? Make us gods that shall go before us. Every word is wicked, absurd, senseless. 1. They had seen the power of God in many miraculous deliverances before their eyes; the voice of God had scarce yet done thundering in their ears: he had said, I am Jehovah, thou shalt have no other gods; and this they trembling heard him speak out of the midst of the flames: and yet they dare speak of another god. 2. The singular number would not serve them, make us gods. How many gods would they have? Is there anymore then one? 3. Make us gods; and were not they strange gods that could be made? Instead of acknowledging God their Maker, they command the making of gods. 4. This charge they put upon Aaron, as if he were able to make a god? Aaron might help to spoil a man, either himself or them, but he could not make a man, not one hair of a man, much less a god: and yet they say to him, Make us gods. 5. And what should these gods do? Go before us? Alas, how should they go, that were not able to stand? how go before others, that could not move themselves? Oh the blockishness of men, that make blocks to worship! Otherwise, how could they that are the Images of God, fall down before the Images of creatures. For health, they call upon that which is weak: for life, they pray to that which is dead: and a prosperous journey they beg of that which cannot set a foot forward.

Yet as their sin was bad enough, let not our uncharitableness make it worse. Let us not think them so unreasonable, as to think that Calf a God; or that the Idol which they made today, did bring them out of Egypt three months before. It was the true God they meant to worship in the Calf, and yet (at the best) even that Idolatry was damnable. So charity bids us hope of the Papists, that they do not take that bord or stone for their God, yet withal we find that God doth take them for Idolaters. They tell us (with a new distinction) that they forbid the people, to give Divine worship to Images: but we say, they had better forbid the people to have Images. A block lies in the high way, and a watchman is set by it to warn the Passengers; Take heed, here is a block. But how if the watchman fall a sleep? Whether is the safer course, quite to remove the block out of the way, or to trust the passengers safety upon the watchman's vigilancy? As for their watchmen, commonly they are as very Images as the Images themselves: and how should one block remove another? When Jeroboam had set up his two Idols in Israel, he I rakes up his Priests out of the common kennel; the basest of the people were good enough for such a bastard devotion: wooden priests were fit enough to wait upon golden Deities. So when Micah had made him a costly Idol, he hires him a beggarly Levite. No ortherwise did the Painter excuse himself, for drawing the Images of Peter and Paul too ruddy and high coloured in the face; that howsoever they were while they lived, pale with fasting and preaching, yet now they must needs become red with blushing at the errors and ignorance of their successors; for such with a loud noise they give themselves out to be.

To conclude, if it were as easy to convince Idolaters, as it is to confound & tread down their Idols, this labor of Confutation had been well spared, or were soon ended. But if nothing can reclaim them from this superstitious practice, let them read th•ir fearful sentence. Their place shall be without, among the dogs, those desperate sinners incapable of forgiveness. The strong, the Idol which they made their strength, shall be as towe, and the maker or worshipper thereof as a spark, and they shall both burn together in everlasting fire, and none shall quench them. Now the Lord open their eyes to see, and sanctify their hearts to yield, that there is no agreement betwixt the Temple of God and Idols: which is the next point, whereof I shall speak with what brevity I can, and with what fidelity I ought.

No agreement.

There be some points which the wrangling passions of men have left further asunder, then they found them; about which there needed not have been such a noise. But things that are in their own natures contrary, and opposed by the ordinance of God, can never be reconciled. An enemy may be made a friend, but enmity can never be made friendship. The air that is now light, may become dark: but light can never become darkness. Contraries in the abstract are out of all composition. The sick body be recovered to health, but health can never be sickness. The sinner may be made righteous, but sin can never become righteousness. Fire and water, peace and war, love and hatred, truth and falsehood, faith and infidelity, Religion and Idolatry, can never be made friends: there can be no agreement betwixt the Temple of God and Idols.

God is Ens entium, All in all: an Idol is nothing in the world, saith the Apostle: now All and Nothing are most contrary. Idolatry quite takes away Faith, a fundamental part of Christian religion: for an Idol is a thing visible, but Faith is of things invisible. The Idol is a false evidence of things seen, Faith is a true evidence of things not seen. Besides, God can defend himself, save his friends, plague his enemies: but Idols nec hosts abscondere possunt quasi dij, nec se abscondere quasi homines; they can neither revenge themselves on provokers, like gods; nor hide themselves from injurers, like men.

The foolish Philistines thought that the same house could hold both the Ark & Dagon; as if an insensible Statue were a fit companion for the living God. In the morning they come to thank Dagon for the victory, and to fall down before him, before whom they thought the God of Israel was fallen: and loe, now they find the keeper flat on his face before the prisoner. Had they formerly of their own accord, with awful reverence, laid him in this posture of an humble prostration; yet God would not have brooked the indignity of such an entertainment. But seeing they durst set up their Idol cheek by cheek with their Maker, let them go read their folly in the Temple floor, & confess that he which did cast their god so low, could cast them lower. Such a shame doth the Lord owe all them, which will be making matches betwixt him and Belial. Yet they consider not, how should this God raise us, who is not able to stand, or rise himself? Strange they must confess it, that whereas Dagon was wont to stand, and themselves to fall down, now Dagon was fallen down, and themselves stood; & must help up with their own god. Yea, their god seems to worship them on his face, and to crave that succor from them, which he was never able to give them. Yet in his place they set him again; and now lift up those hands to him, which helped to lift him up; and prostrate those faces to him, before whom he lay prostrate. So can Idolatry turn men into the stocks and stones which they worship? They that make them, are like unto them. But will the Lord put it up thus? No, the next fall shall burst it to pieces; that they may sensibly perceive, how God scorns a Competitor, and that there is no agreement betwixt Him and Idols. Now what is the difference betwixt the Philistines and Papists? The Philistines would set God in the Temple of Idols, the Papists would set Idols in the Temple of God. Both agree in this, that they would make God and Idols agree together. But Manasseh found to his cost, than an Idol might not be endured in the house of God.

How vain then, are the endeavours to reconcile our church with that of Rome; when God hath interposed this bar, there is No agreement betwixt him and Idols? Either they must receive the Temple without Idols, or we must admit Idols with the Temple, or this composition cannot be. There is a contention betwixt Spain & the Netherlanders, concerning the right of that Country: but should not the Inhabitants well fortify the coasts, the raging sea would soon determine the controversy, and by force of her waves take it from them both. There is a contestation betwixt us and the Pontificians, which is the true Church: but should not we in mean time carefully defend the Faith of Christ against Idols, Superstition would quickly decide the business, and take the possession of truth from us both. A proud & perverse stomach keeps them from yielding to us: God and his holy word forbids our yielding to them: they will have Idols or no Temple, we will have the Temple and no Idols: now till the agreement be made betwixt the Temple and Idols, no atonement can be hoped betwixt us & them.

I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing. He that would not endure a little leaven in the lump, what would he have said of a little poison? If Moses joined with Christ, the ceremonial Law with the Gospel, were so offensive to him; how would he have brooked Christ and Belial, light and darkness, righteousness and unrighteousness, the cup of the Lord and the cup of devils, the Table of the Lord, and the table of devils, the Temple of God and Idols? In the tuning of an Instrument, those strings that be right we meddle not with, but set the rest higher or lower, so as they make a proportion & harmony with the former. The same God who of his gracious mercy, hath put us in the right & unjarring harmony of truth, bring them home in true consent to us, but never suffer us to fall back unto them. Hitherto the contention between us hath not been for circumstance, but substance; not for the bounds, but for the whole Inheritance: whether God or man, grace or nature, the blood of Christ or the milk of Mary, the written Canon or unwritten Tradition, God's ordinance in establishing Kings, or the Popes usurpation in deposing them, shall take place in our consciences, and be the rule of our faiths and lives.

We have but one Foundation, he infallible word of God: they have a new foundation, the voice of their Church, which they equalize in presumption of certainty with the other. We have but one Head, that is Christ, they have gotten a new head, & dare not but believe him, whatsoever Christ says. Sponsus Ecclesiae nostrae Christus, Christ is our husband: they have a new husband. While Rome was a holy Church, she had a holy husband: but now as Christ said to the woman of Samaria, He whom thou now hast, is not thine husband: so he whom the Romanists have now got, is an adulterer, he is no husband. So that here is Foundation against foundation, Head against head, Husband against adulterer, Doctrine against doctrine, Faith against unbelief, Religion against superstition, the Temple of God against Idols; and all these so diametrically opposed, that the two Poles shall sooner meet, then these be reconciled. Michael and the Dragon cannot agree in one Heaven, nor the Ark and Dagon in one house, nor Jacob and Esau in one womb, nor Ioha and Cerinthus in one Bath, nor the clean and the leprous in one camp, nor truth and falsehood in one mouth, nor the Lord and Mammon in one heart, nor religion & superstition in one kingdom, nor God and Idols in one Temple. The silly old Hermit was sorry, that God and the Devil should be at such odds, and he would undertake to make them friends: but the Devil bad him even spare his labor, for they two were everlastingly fallen out. No less vain a business doth that man attempt, that would work an agreement betwixt the Temple of God and Idols.

I take leave of this point with a caution. Fly the places of infection, come not within the smoke of Idols, lest it smother the zeal of God's Temple in your hearts. Revolting Israel calls for gods; but why should this god of theirs be fashioned like a Calf? What may be the reason of this shape? Whence had they the original of such an Idol? Most likely in Egypt: they had seen a black Calf with white spots worshipped there. This Image still ran in their minds, and stole their hearts, & now they long to have it set up before their eyes. Egypt will not out of their fancies: when they wanted meat, they thought of the Egyptian flesh-pots: now they want Moses, they think of the Egyptian Idols. They brought gold out of Egypt; that very gold was contagious; the very Eare-rings and Jewels of Egypt are fit to make Idols. The Egyptian burdens made them run to the true God, the Egyptian examples led them to a false god. What mean our wanderers by running to Rome & such superstitious places; unless they were weary of the Church of God, & would fetch home Idols? If it were granted, that there is some little truth among them, yet who is so simple, as to seek his corn among a great heap of chaff, and that far off; who may have it at home, winnowed and cleansed to his hand?

The very sight of evil is dangerous, and they be rare eyes that do not convey this poison to our hearts. I have heard of some, that even by laboring in the Spanish galleys, have come home the slaves of their superstitions. Egypt was always an unlucky place for Israel, as Rome is for England. The people sojourned there, and they brought home one Calf: Jeroboam sojourned there, and he brought home Two calves: an old woman (in all likelihood) had sojourned there, and she brought home a great many. The Romish Idols have not the shape of calves, they have the sense and meaning of those calves: and to fill the Temple full of Calves, what is it but to make Religion guilty of Bulls?

Consider it well, ye that make no scruple of superstitious assemblies; it will be hard for you to dwell in a Temple of Idols untainted. Not to sin the sins of the place we live in, is as strange, as for pure liquor tunned up in a musty vessel, not to smell of the cask. Egypt will teach even a Joseph to swear: a Peter will learn to curse in the high Priests Hall. If we be not scorched with the fire of bad company, we shall be sure to be blacked with the smoke. The soundest body that is, may be infected with a contagious air. Indeed a man may travel through Ethiopia unchanged, but he cannot dwell there without a complexion discoloured. How hath the common practice of others brought men to the devilish fashion of swearing, or to the brutish habit of drinking, by their own confessions? Superstition, if it have once got a secret liking of the heart, like the plague will hang in the very clothes; and after long concealment, break forth in an unlooked for infection. The Israelites, after all their erring in the wilderness, will still smell of Egypt. We read God saying, Out of Egypt have I called my Son. That God did call his Son out of Egypt, it is no wonder: the wonder is that he did call him into Egypt. It is true, that Egypt could not hurt Christ: the King doth not follow the Court, the Court waits upon the King: wheresoever Christ was, there was the Church. But be our Israelites so sure of their sons, when they send them into Egypt, or any superstitious places? It was their presumption to send them in, let it be their repentance to call them out.

The familiar society of orthodox Christians with mis-believers, hath by God ever been most strictly forbidden: and the nearer this conjunction, the more dangerous, and displeasing to the forbidder. No man can choose a worse friend, then one whom God holds his enemy. When Religion and Superstition meet in one bed, they commonly produce a mongrel generation. If David marry Maachah, their issue proves an Absalom. If Solomon love idolatrous women, here is enough to overthrow him with all his wisdom. Other strange women only tempt to lust, these to mis-religion; and by joining his heart to theirs, he shall di-join it from God. One Religion matching with another, not seldom breed an Atheist, one of no religion at all. I do not say, this is a sufficient cause of divorce after it is done, but of restraint before it is done. They may be one flesh, though they be not one spirit. The difference of religion or virtue makes no divorce here, the great Judges sentence shall do that hereafter. And the believing husband is never the further from heaven, though he cannot bring his unbelieving wife along with him. The better shall not carry up the worse to heaven, nor the worse pull down the better to hell. Quod fieri non debuit, factum valet. But now, is there no tree in the Garden, but the forbidden? none for me to love, but one that hates the truth? Yes, let us say to them in plaine fidelity, as the sons of Jacob did to the Shichemites in dissembling policy; We cannot give our sister to a man that is uncircumcised: either consent you to us in the truth of our Religion, or we will not consent to you in the league of our Communion.

Saint Chrysostom calls this a plain denial of Christ. He that eateth of the meat offered to Idols, Gustu negavit Christum, hath denied Christ with his tasting. If he but handle those things with delight, Tactu negavit Christum, he hath denied Christ with his touching. Though he touch not, taste not, yet if he stand to look upon the Idolatry with patience, Visu negavit Christum, he hath denied Christ with his eyes. If he listen to those execrable charms, Auditu negavit Christum, hath denied Christ with his ears. Omitting all these, if he do but smell to the Incense with pleasure, Odoratu negavit Christum, he hath denied Christ with his smelling. It is said of the Israelites, Commisti sunt inter gentes, They were mingled among the Heathen. What followed? Presently, they learned their works. The reason why the Raven returned not to Noah's Ark, is given by some, because it met with a dead carcass by the way. Why do we pray, Deliver us from evil; but that we imply, (besides all other mischiefs) there is an infectious power in it to make us evil? Let us do that we pray, and pray that we may do it. Yea Lord, free us from Egypt, estrange us from Rome, separate us from Idols, deliver us from evil, For thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, forever and ever. Amen.

Thus far we have taken a literal survey of the Text; concerning the material Temple, external or objectual Idols, and the impossibility of their agreement. Now to come nearer home to our selves in a moral Exposition: here first

The Temple of God

Is the Church of Christ, and they are so like, that we often interchange the terms, calling a Temple the Church, & the Church a Temple of God. The material Temple under the Law was a figure of the spiritual under the Gospel. The former was distinguished into three rooms; the Porch, the holy place, and the Sanctum Sanctorum, or Holy of holies. The Porch prefigured Baptism, which is the door whereby we enter into the Church of Christ. The Holy place, the communion of the militant church vply earth, separated from the world. The Hoon of holies, whereinto the high Priest only entered, & that once a year, presignified the glorious kingdom of heaven, whereinto the Lord Jesus entered once for all. There was one Court of the Temple common, whither access was denied to none: though they were vn•lean or uncircumcised, thus far they might be admitted. There was another Court within that, allowed to none but the Israelites, & of them to none but the clean. There was a third, proper only to the Priests and Levites, whither the Laity might not come: thus far they might bring their offerings, but further they might not offer to go. In the Temple it self there was one room, into which the Levites might not enter, the Priests might. Another, whither the Priests might not come; but only the high Priest, and even he but once yearly. Some passages of the Christian Church are common to all, even to the unclean hypocrites, and foul-hearted sinners. They have access to God's holy ordinances, and tread in his Courts; as the Pharisee came into the congregation, and Judas received the Communion. Other are secret and reserved, wherein the faithful only converse with God, and solace themselves in the sweet fruition of his gracious presence.

The material Temple in three divisions, seemed to be a clear representation of the Church in three degrees. The first signified the external and visible face of the Church, from which no professor of Christ is debarred. The second, the communion of the invisible Church upon earth. The last, the highest heaven of God's glorified Saints. Neither did those rooms more exceed one another then do these parts of the spiritual house of Christ. What are the most polished corners of the Temple, to the spiritual & living stones of the Church? What be pebbles to Sapphires, or marbles to Diamonds? Howsoever some are more transported with insensible monuments, then with living Saints. As it was a complaint long since, Fulget Ecclesia in parietibus, luget in pauperibus. Yet Temples are built for men, not men for Temples: and what is a glorious edifice, when the whole world is not worth one soul? Dead walls be of small value, to the living Temples of the holy Ghost: yea, the temple of our body, to the temple of Christ's Body, his Church: yea the Temple of God's Church militant on earth, to that which is triumphant in heaven. What is silver and gold, Cedar and Marble, to those divine graces, faith, truth, piety, holiness? Solomon's Temple did last but some 430. years, the Church is for eternity. The Temple took up but a little space of ground, at most the Hill Zion, the Church is universally spread: in all parts of the world God hath his chosen.

Did our intellectual eyes truly behold the beauty of this Temple, we would with that good Emperor, esteem it better to be a member of the Church, then head of the kingdom. We would set this one thing against all worldly glories. As when Henry 4. that late Great king of France, was told of the king of Spain's ample dominions: as first he is king of Castile, and I (quoth Henry) am king of France: he is king of Navarre, and I am king of France: he is king of Portugal, and I am king of France: he is king of Naples, and I am king of France: he is king of the Si·ilies, and I am king of France: he is king of Noua Hispania▪ the West Indies, and I am king of France; he thought the kingdom of France equivalent to all these. So let thy soul, O Christian, solace it self against all the wants of thy mortal pilgrimage, in this, that thou art a member of the church. Another hath more wit or learning, yet I am a Christian: another hath more honor and preferment on earth, yet I am a Christian: another hath more silver and gold and riches, yet I am a Christian: another hath large possessions, yet I have an Inheritance in heaven, I am a Christian. David thought it not so happy to be a King in his own house, as to be a door-keeper in God's house. Were our hearts thoroughly sanctified, we would under-value all honors to this, that we are parts of this spiritual Temple, the members of Jesus Christ.

Idols.

Every device of man in the service of God is a mere Idol. Whatsoever we invent out of God's School, or substitute in God's room, is to us an Idol. Howsoever we flatter our selves, with reflecting all the honor on God, yet he will reflect the vengeance on us. Shall a man speak deceitfully for God, or tell a lie for his glory? He is not so penurious of means to honor himself, as to be beholding to us for a lie. The doctrine of universal grace seems to make much for God's glory, but himself says it is a lie; for he will have mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. To say that Christ in the womb wrought many miracles, hath a fair show of honoring him; but who can say it is not a lie? Sure, we read no such matter. To distribute among the Saints departed several Offices; as one to have the charge of women in child-bed, another to be the Patron of such a City or Country; (to omit their protection of beasts, one for hogs, another for horses) seems to honor God in thus honoring them: but it is a lie, and a plain derogation to his universal providence: yea as absurd, as if the flies should take upon them to give the charges and offices of this kingdom. To say, the Saints in heaven know the occurrence of this nether world, and the condition of their ancient friends or children below, reading them in the Deity, as by the reflection of a glass; this is a fiction that carries a show of honoring God: but it doth indeed dishonor him, by making creatures as omniscient as their Maker. Besides, how absurd is it to say, that John in Patmos seeing Christ, did see all that Christ saw. If I standing on the ground, see a man on the top of a high Turret, do I see all that he seeth. If the sight of him that looketh, be to be measured by the sight of him on whom he looketh; it will follow that he which looketh on a blind man, should see nothing at all. And who seeth not the blindness of this consequence?

To say that all the worship done to the Virgin mother, redounds to the honor of her Son and God, is a gross falsehood. The Idolatrous Jews might as well have pretended the honor of God, when they worshipped the Queen of heaven. That fanatical vision of theirs, concerning the two ladders that reached up to heaven, while Christ was preparing to judge the world: the one Red, at the top whereof Christ sate: the other white, at the top whereof the Virgin sate: and when the Friars could not get up the red ladder of Christ, but evermore tumbled down backward, St. Francis called them up the white ladder of our Lady, and there they were received. Did this make for the honor of Christ, when the red blood of our Savior is not so able to bring men to heaven, as the white milk of his mother? which must needs be the moral or meaning of it. Or the observation of Barradius the Jesuit, who made bold to ask Christ, why in his ascension to heaven he did not take his mother along with him; and makes himself this answer: It may be, Lord, for fear lest thy heavenly Court should be in doubt, which of the two they should go first to meet, An tibi Domino suo, an ipsi Dominae suae, whether thee their Lord, or her their Lady: as if it had been well advised of Christ to leave his mother behind him, lest she should share part of his glory. Did this make for the honor of Christ? To choke up the knowledge of God, by preaching that Ignorance is the mother of Devotion, hath small color of honoring God. The ascribing of false miracles to the living or departed Saints, seems to honor God, but sure he will never thank them for it. Saint Augustine being sick, a blind man came to him, expecting that he could miraculously restore his sight: but that good Father sent him away with a check, Doest thou think that if I could cure thee by miracle, that I would not by miracle cure myself?

It is a foolish thought, that God will be glorified by a lie. Our judicial Astrologers, that tie men's destinies to the Stars and Planets, pretend God's honor, who hath given such virtue and influence to his creatures; but indeed make thē no better then Idols. Though the Sun and Moon be good and necessary, yet to adore the Sun and Moon is flat Idolatry. It was not Mercury that made the thief, nor Venus that made the strumpet: as when the husband cudgeled his adulterous wife, and she complained that he was unnatural to strike his own flesh; alleging that it was not she that played the harlot, but Venus in her: to whom he replied, that neither was it she that he did beat, but Venus in her, or rather Venus out of her.

To make this useful to ourselves; let us take heed of fancying another service of God, then he hath prescribed us. Every Master in his own family, appoints the manner how he will be served. He that requires our service, requires it his own way; or else he holds us to serve our selves, not him. Shall we make ourselves wiser then our Maker, as if he did not best know what would best please him? Shall heaven give a blessing to that, which was devised against the will of heaven? Doth not God threaten them with the addition of plagues, that shall add to his precepts? If such devices be good and necessary, why did not God command them? Did he want wisdom? If they be not necessary, why do we use them? Is it not our presumptuous folly? The Lord's Jealousy is stirred up by the rivalitie, not only of a false God, but of a false worship. Nothing is more dangerous, then to mint his services in our own brains. In vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines, the commandments of men. Is it not gricuous for men to lose all their labor, and that in the main business of their life? That so many hundred oblations, so many thousand prayers, so much cost of their purses, so much affliction to their bodies, so much anguish of their souls, should be all forceless, fruitless? Like a dog that hunts counter, and takes great pains to no purpose.

Evil deeds may have sometimes good meanings; but those good meanings are answered with evil recompenses. Many bestow their labors, their goods, their bloo•s, and yet receive torments instead of thanks. When the Apostle bids us mortify our earthly members, he does not intend violence to our selves, but to our sins. There is one mortification, to cast our selves out of the world: there is another mortification, to cast the world out of us. A body macerated with scourges, disabled with fastings, wearied with pilgrimages; was none of S. Paul's mortification. Who hath required this at your hands? Where is no command imposed, no reward proposed; no promise made, if you do; no punishment threatened, if you do not; what fruit can be expected but shame? Must we needs either do nothing, or that which is worse then nothing? Shall we offer so much, suffer so much, and all in vain? Quis haec à vobis? Let him pay you your wages, that did set you on work. Never plead your own reason, where God hath set a plain interdiction. He that suffers his faith to be overruled by his reason, may have a fat reason, but a lean faith. That man is not worthy to be a follower of Christ, who hath not denied himself; therefore denied his Reason; for his reason is no small piece of himself. If Reason get the head in this divine business, it presently prevails with will, and will commands the affections: so this new Triumvirate shall govern the Christian, not Faith. But as when three Ambassadors were sent from Rome, to appease the discord between Nicomedes and Prusias; whereof one was troubled with a Megrin in his head, another had the Gout in his toes, and the third was a fool; Cato said merrily, that Ambassage had neither Head, nor Foot, nor Heart. So that man shall neither have a head to conceive the truth, nor a foot to walk in the ways of obedience, nor a heart to receive the comforts of salvation; that suffers his reason, will, and affections, to usurp upon his faith.

Hence it comes to pass, that the most horrid sins are turned into Idols; by setting our own reasons against the manifest will of God. Thus lies shall be fathered upon the Father of truth, and truth upon the Father of lies. Thus breach of faith, and perjury, shall be held Orthodox opinions. Yea, that execrable monster, whereof this day remembers us, Treason it self, shall be held good Doctrine. Rude cacodaemon, that stigmatic Idol, that gross devil shall be worshiped. Si fas caedendo coelestia scandere, If this be the way to the kingdom of heaven, if thus men may merit to be stars in the Firmament, by embruing their hands in the blood-Royal of Princes; what Jesuit will not be a Star? When such be their principles, such must needs be their practices. What though God condemn Treason to hell, when the Pope will advance it to heaven? What though the Diuine Scripture doth rank traitors among dogs & devils, when the Pope will number them among Saints? It was wont to be said, Ex quolibet ligno non fit Mercurius, every block is not fit to make an Image. Yet now, the most monstrous sin that ever the devil shaped in his Infernal forge, is not only by the practice, but even by the Doctrine of Rome, turned into an Idol. What is that we shall call sin, when murder & Treason is held religion? Alas for our age, to bear the date of these impieties! That our posterity should ever read in our Chronicles: In such a year in such a day Traitors conspired against their lawful & Gracious Sovereign: and that in those days there was a sect of men living, that did labor in voluminous writings, to justify those horrible facts▪ But oh, may those pestiferous monuments be as fast devoured by oblivion, as the authors and abettors themselves are swallowed up by confusion. And the same God deliver us his people from their conspiracies, that hath delivered this his Church from their Idolatries.

Thus we have looked abroad, but now have we no Idols at home? O how happy was it, if they were as far from the Temple, as they are, from agreement with the Temple? I will not abound in this discovery; there be three main Idols among us; Vain Pleasure, vain Honor, and Riches: & it is to be feared, that these three vanities have more clients then the Trinity that made us. The first is an Idol of the water, the next an Idol of the air, the last an Idol of the earth.

1. Vain Pleasure; and oh what a world of foolish worshippers flock to this merry Goddess! She hath a Temple in every corner: Ebriety sits in Taverns, burning smoky Incense, and sacrificing drink-offerings to her. So that if a man should prophesy of wine and strong drink, he were a Prophet fit for this age: but to preach sobriety, is held but a dry doctrine. We commend wine for the excellency of it; but if it could speak, as it can take away speech, it would complain, that by our abuse, both the excellencies are lost: for the excellent man doth so spoil the excellent wine, until the excellent wine hath spoiled the excellent man. O that a man should take pleasure in that which makes him no man: that he should let a thief in at his mouth, to steal away his wit: that for a little throat-indulgence, he should kill in himself not only the first Adam, his reason; but even the second Adam his regeneration; & so commit two murders at once! In every Brothel this Idol hath her temple; where the bed of uncleanness, is the Altar, the Priest a strumpet, and the sacrifice, a burning flesh offered to Moloch. It is no rare thing for a man to make an Idol of his Mistress, and to spend more time in her courtings, then he doth at his prayers▪ more cost on her body, thē upon his own soul. Images were but dead Idols, but painted Popiniayes be living Idols. Pleasure hath a larger extent, then I can now stand to survey: this may be called an Idol of the Water; fluid and unsatisfying.

2. Vain Honor is the Idol of fools: no wise man ever sought felicity in shadows. His Temple is Pride, his Altar Ambition, his Service Flattery, his Sacrifice Petulancy. Silly Sennacherib, to make an Idol of a Chariot: and no wiser Prince of Tyre, to make an Idol of his own brain! Men mistake the way to be great, while they neglect the way to be good. All the while a man hunts after his shadow, he mis-spends his time and pains: for the Sun is upon his back, behind him, and his shadow is still vn-overtaken before him: but let him turn his face to the Sun, & follow that, his shadow shall follow him. Invaine doth that man pursue honor, his shadow, while he turns his face from virtue and goodness; he shall miss what he so labors to catch: but let him set his face toward Christ, the Sun of righteousness, and run to the high prize of eternity, this shadow shall wait upon him; for those that honor me, I will honor, saith the Lord.

God resisteth the proud; and good reason, for the proud resisteth God. Other sins divert a man from God, only Pride brings him against God, & brings God against him. There is nothing in this world worth our pride, but that moss will grow to a stone. Pride is ever dangerous, but thē most when it puffs us up with a presumption of merit. Thus the Romists presume to do more good works, and those more perfect then God requires: so that he is become a debtor to them, & bound to make them satisfaction. But doubtless, God will more easily bear with those sins whereof we repent, then with that righteousness whereof we presume. I am not as other men are, said the Pharisee; & the clock of his tongue went truer then the dial of his heart; he was not like other men indeed, sure he was like none of them that should be saved. Humility is so hard a lesson to get into the heart, that Christ was fain to come down from heaven, in his own person to teach it.

Pride is even conversant about good works and graces; this Saul loves to be among the prophets. So that if a man have some good measure of sanctification, and of assurance of eternal life; it will be hard not to be proud of that. Pride hath hurt many, Humility never yet did harm. A man goes in at a door, and he stoops: the door is high enough, yet he stoops: you will say, he needs not stoop; yea, but saith Bernard, there is no hurt in his stooping: otherwise he may catch a knock, this way he is safe. A man may bear himself too high upon the favor of God, there is no danger in his stooping, no harm in humility. Let me rather be the lowest of God's servants, then the noblest among his enemies. The honor of this world is at best but a golden dream, from which men commonly awake in contempt. This is an Idol of the Air.

3. Wealth is the covetous man's Idol; Job shows the form of his Canonization: He makes gold his hope, and says to the wedge, Thou art my confidence. As treason sets up a new king, for David, Absalom: so covetousness sets up a new god, for Jehovah, Mamon. But, O miserable god, saith Luther, that cannot defend it self from rusting or robbing. And, O more miserable man, that trusts himself upon the keeping of that god, which himself is fain to keep. Micah did not worship his silver, till it was cast into the form of an Idol: these spare the labor of forming, and worship the very metal. The Superstitious adore Aurum in Idolo, gold in the Idol: the covetous find Idolum in Auro, an Idol in the very gold. Metalla seems to sound quasi 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , Post alia necessaria: when they had manured the ground, sown seeds, gathered fruits, and found out other things to sustain life, then Itum est in viscer a terra, they digged into the bowels of the earth. O that man should lay that next his heart, which God hath placed under his feet! that the thing which might be best spared, should be most admired! Mammon hath his Temple, the world: God hath his Temple, the Church: but there be many that balk God's Temple to go to Mammons: and they offer fair, that make some reverence to God, as they pass by him to the world. Hence it is, that so many get riches, and so few godliness. The Poets fain Pluto to be the god of Hell, & the god of Riches; (as if Riches and Hell had both one Master.) Sometime they set him forth lame and slow-paced, sometime nimble as fire. When Jupiter sends him to a Soldier or a Scholar, he goes limping: when he sends him to on of his Pandars, he flies like lightning. The moral is, the wealth that comes in God's name, comes slowly, and with diligent labor: but that which is hailed in with an evil conscience, is both hasty & abundant in the collection. This is the worldlings main god, all the rest be subordinate to him. Si modo Jupiter mihi propitius sit, minores deos flocci sacio: So long as Mammon favors them, or their Great Diana multiplies their gains; they scorn the other petty gods, making account with a little money to buy them all. This is an Idol of the Earth.

No agreement.

Ye cannot serve God and Mammon; you may dispute for it, you shall never compound it. Gehazi cannot run after the forbidden talents, but he must leave his master. Some indeed here, have so finely distinguished of the business, that though they serve God, they will serve him more thriftily, and please him as good cheap as they can. They have resolved not to do evil, though they may gain by it: yet for gain, they will venture as near evil, as possibly they can and miss it. But when it comes to push, it will be found, that for onescruple of gold, they will make no scruple of conscience. But as those Inhabitants of Judea, that served both God & Idols, did indeed neither serve God nor Idols: so these higglers, while they would have two masters, 〈◇〉 indeed never a one. For in the evil day, their master the world will renounce them, & then their master Christ will not receive them: so highly doth he scorn such a competition. Man was made to serve God, and the world to serve man: so the world at best is but God's servants servant. Now if we plead our selves God's servants, what an indign & preposterous thing is it, to take our own servant, and make him competitor with our Master? God says, lend, give, clothe, feed, harbor: Mammon says, Take, gather, extort, oppress, spoil: whether of these is our God? Even he that is most obeyed. No less might be said for pleasures and honors, or whatsoever is delectable to flesh and blood. The love of this world is enmity to God; and the East & West shall sooner unite their forces, the these be reconciled.

It is the Devils especial aim, to bring these Idols near the Temple: he finds no such pleasure to domineer in his own hell; but he hath a mind to Paradise. One wittily observeth, that Christ chose poor Fishermen, as the fittest to receive his Oracles, & to plant his Church; because Satan scorned to look so low, as to tempt them. He studied to prevent Christ among the Kings of the earth, and great Doctors, never suspecting silly fishers. But when he found himself deceived, he will then make their whole profession to fare the worse for it; he bears the whole succession of their Tribe an old grudge. Before, he passed by them, and tempted the great Masters; now he will sooner tempt them than Kings and Emperors. The Church doth not judge them that are without, but them within: and Satan had rather foil one within, than a hundred without. He hath a desire to all, but especially he loves a religious soul: he would eat that with more greediness, than Rachel did her Mandrakes. The fall of one Christian better pleaseth him, than of many unbelievers. No King makes war against his own loyal subjects, but against rebels & enemies. The devil is to subtle, to spend his malice vpon them that do him ready service He cares not so much to multiply Idols in Babylon, as to get one into Zion. To maintain priests of Baal in the land of Israel, at the table of Jezebel, as it were under God's nose: or to set up Calves at Bethel, in scorn of the Temple; this is his ambition. The Fox seldom preys near home, nor doth Satan meddle with his own; they are as sure as temptation can make them. What Jailor lays more chains upon the shackled malefactor, that loves his prison, and would not change? The Pirate spends not a shot upon a cole-ship; but he lets fly at the rich Merchant. Cantabit vacuus, the empty traveler may pass unmolested: it is the full barn that invites the thief. If we were not belonging to the Temple, we should not be assaulted with so many Idols; if not Christians, fewer temptations.

Now the more potent and malicious our adversaries, the more resolute and strong be our resistance. The more extreme the cold is without, the more doth the natural heat fortify it self within, & guard the heart. It is the note of the ungodly, that they bleſs Idols: if we would not be such, let us bleſs our selves from Idols. And as we have banished the material Idols out of our Temples, so let us drive these spiritual ones out of our hearts Let us say with Ephraim, we have heard God, & seen him; What have we to do anymore with Idols? The vices of the religious are the shame of religion: the sight of this hath made the stoutest Champions of Christ melt into tears. Rivers of waters run down mine eyes, because they keep not thy Law. David was one of those great Worthies of the world, not matchable in his times; yet he weeps. Did he tear in pieces a bear like a kid? rescue a lamb with the death of a lyon? foil a mighty giant, that had dared the whole army of God? Did he like a whirlwind, bear and beat down his enemies before him; and now does he, like a child or a woman, fall a weeping? Yes, he had heard the name of God blasphemed, seen his holy rites profaned, his statutes vilipended, and violence offered to the pure and intemperate Chastity of that holy virgin, Religion: this resolved that valiant heart into tears; Rivers of waters run down mine eyes. So Paul, I tell you of them weeping, that are enemies to the Cross of Christ. Had he with so magnanimous a courage, endured stripes and persecutions, run through perils of all sorts and sizes, fought with beasts at Ephesus, been wrapped up to heaven, and learned his Divinity among the Angels; & does he now weep? Yes, he had seen Idols in the Temple, Impiety in the Church of God: this made that great spirit melt into tears. If we see these Idols in others, or feel them in our selves, and complain not; we give God and the Church just cause to complain of us. Now the Lord deliver his Temples from these Idols.

But all this while we have walked in generals; and you will say, Quod omnibus dicitur, nemini dicitur: let me now therefore come to particulars.

The Temple of God

Is every Christian as the Church is his great Temple, so his little temple is every man. We are not only through his grace, living stones in his Temple, but living temples in his Zion: each one bearing about him a little shrine of that infinite Majesty. Wheresoever God dwells, there is his Temple: therefore the believing heart is his Temple, for there he dwells. As we poor creatures of the earth have our being in him, so he the God of heaven hath his dwelling in us. It is true, that the heaven of heavens is not able to contain him; yet the narrow lodgings of our renewed souls are takē up for him. What were a house made with hands unto the God of spirits; unless there be a spirit for him to dwell in made without hands? Here if the Body be the Temple, the Soul is Priest: if that be not the offerer, the Sacrifice will not be accepted.

In this Spiritual Temple, first there is the Porch; which we may conceive to be the Mouth. Therefore David prays to have a Watch set at the door of his lips; to ward the gate of God's Temple. This may seem to be one reason of saluting in former times by a kiss; they did kiss the gate of God's Temple. Here the Fear of God is the Porter; who is both ready to let in his friends, and resolute to keep out his enemies. Let him specially watch for two sorts of foes, the one, a traitor that goes out, evil speaking: the other, a thief that steals in, too much drinking.

The Holy place is the sanctified mind, that which S. Paul calls the Inner man. Here be those riches and ornaments, the divine graces. Here not only Justice, and Faith, and Temperance, sing their parts, but the whole Choir of heavenly virtues make up the harmony.

The Holy of holies is the purified Conscience, where•in stand the Cherubims, Faith & Love; and the Mercy-feat, shaded with the wings of those glorious Angels: frō which Propitiatory God gives the gracious testimonies of his good Spirit, witnessing with our spirits that we are his children. In this Sacrary doth the Lord converse with the soul takes her humble confession, gives her sweet absolution. It is a place whither nor man nor Angel can enter; only the high Priest Jesus comes, not once a year, but daily; and communicates such inestimable favors and comforts, as no tongue can express.

Here we find the Ark, wherein the Royal law, and Pot of heavenly Manna are preserved. the one restraining us from sin to come by a happy prevention, the other assuring us pardon of sin past with a blessed consolation. Let us look further upon the golden Candlesticks, our illumined understandings; whereby we perceive the will of our Maker, and discern the way of our eternal peace. Then upon the Tables of Shew-bread, which be our holy memories, that keep the bread of life continually ready within us. Yea, Memory is the treasury of this Temple, which so locks up those celestial riches, that we can draw them forth for use at all opportunities. Here is also the Vail, and those silken curtains, and costly hangings; the Righteousness of Christ, which makes us acceptable to God; both hiding our own infirmities, and decking us with his virtues. Here is the Altar for sacrifice, the contrite heart: the beast to be slain is not found among our herds, but among our affections; we must sacrifice our lusts: the knife to kill them, which would else kill us, is the Sword of the Spirit, the Word of God: the fire to consume them is holy zeal, kindled in our breasts by the inspiration of God.

There be other sacrifices also for us to offer in this Temple, on this Altar. Besides our praises and prayers; the setting forth of our prayer as Incense, and the lifting up our hands as an evening sacrifice: there is mercy, & charitable deeds. What is devotion without compassion? What, sacrifice without mercy? If thy brother hath ought against thee, yea, if thou have ought that should have been thy brothers; thy oblation will stink in God's nostrils. It was an old complaint of the Church, that her stones were clothed, and her childrē naked, that the curious found matter to delight them, but the distressed found not bread to sustain them. Therefore saith S. Augustine, Si habes taurum pinguem, occide pauperibus: If thou have a fat Bull, sacrifice it to the poor. Though they cannot drink the blood of goats, they can eat the flesh of bulls. And he that saith, If I were hungry, I would not tell thee; yet will acknowledge at the last day, I was hungry and thou didst feed me; Come thou blessed. The poor have God's commendatory letters to us, and our prayers be our commendatory letters to God: if we will not hearken to him, how should he gratify us▪ Thus, O Christian, art thou a moving Temple of the living God.

Let this teach us all to adorn these Temples with decent graces. Superstition cares not what it bestows on material Fanes: mountainous Columns, Marble Pillars, gorgeous Monuments, which yet are not sensible of their own ornaments; spangled Crucifixes, Images clad in Silks and Tissues, with embroidered Canopies, and Tables beset with Pearls and Diamonds. Thus bountiful is she to her superfluities; Oh that our Religion would do something for these ancient and ruinous walls. But how much more precious be these spiritual Temples of our selves? How much more noble ought to be their furnitures?

First then, if we be the Temples of God, let us be holy: for holiness, O Lord, becometh thy House forever.

2. It is Domus orationis; they must have the continual exercises of Prayer. In Templo vis orare? In te ora. Wouldst thou pray in God's Temple? Pray in thyself.

3. The sound of the high praises of God must be heard in these Temples: There every man speaks of his honor. It pleaseth the Lord to inhabit the praises of Israel. And Psal. 48. We have thought of thy loving kindness, O God, in the midst of thy Temple: that is, even in the midst of our selves, in our own hearts. There let us think upon his mercies, there echo forth his praises.

4. The Inhabitant disposeth all the rooms of his house: if God dwell in us, let him rule us. Submit thy will to his word, thy affections to his Spirit. It is fit that every man should bear rule in his own house.

5. Let us be glad when he is in us, and give him no disturbance. Let not the foulness of any room make him dislike his habitation. Cleanse all the sluttish corners of sin, and perfume the whole house with Myrrh & Cassia. Still be getting nearer to thy Land-lord: other Inhabitants come home to their houses; but here the house must strive to come home to the Inhabitant. Whensoever God comes toward thee, meet him by the way, and bid him welcome to his own.

6. Lastly, if we be the Lord's houses, then no bodies else. The material Temples are not to be diverted to common offices: much more should the spiritual be used only for God's service. Let us not alienate his rights: thus he will say, This is my house, here will I dwell, for I have a delight therein. O may we so adorn these Temples with graces, that God may take delight to dwell in us.

Idols.

These be the Temples: the Idols that haunt them, we better know, then know how to expel: they be our lusts, and inordinate affections; the rebellions of our corrupt nature, which fight against the Soul, defile the body, and disgrace the Temples of God's Spirit. So I pass from them, to the last point; that betwixt these libidinous Idols, and those spiritual Temples, there can be

No agreement.

God will dwell with no Inmates: if uncleanness be there, will the fountain of all purity abide it? Will Christ dwell with an adulterer? He that will suffer no unclean thing to enter his city above, will he himself dwell in an unclean city below? O think how execrable that sin is, which doth not only take the members of Christ, and makes them the limbs of an harlot; but even turneth Christ's Temples into stinking Brothels. Our hearts be the Altars to send up the sweet Incense of devout prayers and cheerful thanksgivings; if the smoke of malicious thoughts be found there, will God accept our oblations? Is it possible, that man should please his Father, that will not be reconciled to his brother? The Lamps of knowledge and sobriety are burning within us; will not the deluge of drink put them out? Will the Lord dwell in a drunken body? Must we not cease to be his Temples, when we become Bacchus his Tuns and tunnels? There is Manna, the bread of life within us; will not Epicureanism & throat-indulgence corrupt it? There is peace in us, will not pride and contention affright it? There is the love of heaven in us, will not the love of the world banish it? Shall the graces of God cohabit with the vices of Satan? Will the Temple of God endure Idols? No▪ these Eagles plumes will not brook the blending with common feathers: this heavenly gold scorns the mixture of base and sophisticate metals.

Let us search our hearts & ransack them narrowly: if we do not cast out these Idols, God will not own us for his Temples. My House shall be called the house of prayer: this was God's Appropriation: But you have made it a den of thieves: this is man's Impropriation. Let us take heed of impropriating God's house; remembering how he hath revenged such a profanation with scourges. We are bought with a price, therefore let us glorify God both in body & spirit, for they are his: His purchase, his Temple, his inheritance, his habitation: do not lose so gracious an owner, by the most ungracious sacrilege. You see many ruined houses, which have been once kings palaces: learn by those dead spectacles to keep yourselves frō the like fortunes:

left God say of you, Hoc Templum meum fuit, this was my house; but now because it took in Idols, I have forsaken it.

Or what if we do not set up Idols in these Temples, when we make the Temples themselves Idols? or say not with Israel, Make us gods, while we make gods of our selves? while we dress altars, and erect shrines to our own brains, & kiss our own hands for the good they have done us? If we attribute something to our selves, how is Christ all in all with us? Do we justly blame them that worship the Beast of Rome, and yet find out a new Idolatry at home? Shall we refuse to adore the Saints & Angels, and yet give divine worship to our selves, dust and ashes? If victory crown our battles, if plenty fill our garners, or success answer our endeavours; must the glory of all reflect upon our own achievements? This is a rivalry that God will not endure, to make so many Temples nothing but Idols. But as the Lancashire Justice said of the ill-shap'd Rood, though it be not well favored enough for a god, it will serve to make an excellent devil. So proud dust and ashes, that arrogates the honor of God, and improprieties it to himself; though he be too foul for a Temple, yet he is fit enough for an Idol. When David prays, Libera me ab homine malo, Deliver me from the evil man, O Lord. Saint Augustine, after much study and scrutiny to find out this evil man, at last lights upon him; ab homine malo, that is, à me ipso: Deliver me from the evil man, deliver me from myself; Deliver Augustine from Augustine; I am that evil man. So, of all Idolatries, God deliver us from a superstitious worship of our selves. Some have Idolized their Princes, some their Mistresses, some their Manufactures; but they are innumerable that have Idolized themselves. He is a rare man that hath no Idol, no little god in a box, no especial sin in his heart, to which he gives uxorious and affectionate Indulgence.

The only way to mend all, is for every man to begin with himself. In vain shall we blame those faults abroad, which we tolerate at home. That man makes himself ridiculous, who leaving his own house on fire, runs to quench his neighbors Let but every man pull a brand from this fire, the flame will go out alone: if every soul cleanse his own Temple, all shall be quit of Idols, and God will accept of all. A multitude is but a heap of vanities; the more we take away, the fewer we leave behind. When a field is over grown with weeds, the best course to have a good general harvest, is for every man to weed his own ground. When we would have the street cleansed let every man sweep his own door, and it is quickly done. But while every man censures, & none amends, we do but talk against Idols, with still uncleansed Temples.

Let us pray for universal repentance, like a good Josiah, to purge the houses of God. till lust and profaneness, pride and covetousness, fraud and wantonness, malice and drunkenness, be no more found among us: till everything be cast out, and nothing let in, that is unclean. So shall the Lord dwell in us with content, and we shall dwell in him with comfort. Here we shall be a Temple for Him, hereafter he shall be a temple for us. So we find that glorious City describe, I saw no Temple therein, but the Lord God Almighty, and the Lamb was the Temple of it. We are God's Temple on earth, God shall be our Temple in heaven. To this purpose, the Spirit of God sanctify us, and be forever sanctified in us. Amen.

Some may haply (long ere this) have preudicated in their censures; How is this O pus diet in die sou? What is all this to the business of the day? I might have prevented the objection, by comparing Idolatry with Treason: the one being a breach of Allegiance to the Lord, the other a breach of allegiance to the Lord's Anointed. Idolatry is a Treason against God, and Treason is kind of Idolatry against the King. From both which the divine grace, and our holy obedience deliver us all. I conclude with application to the Time.

This is one of those blessed days celebrated for the deliverance of our gracious Sovereign: and well may the deliverance of a King, of such a King, deserve a day of gratulation. When God delivers a private man, he doth, as it were, repeat his Creation: but the deliverance of a King, is always a choice piece in the Lord's Chronicle. The Story, how he was endangered, and how preserved, this place hath diverse times witnessed; and that in a more punctual manner, then I have either strength, or art, or time to match. A hard time it seemed to be, when a King was imprisoned, when he had no guard with him but his Innocency, no subject but a Traitor. But there was a stronger with him, then all they could be against him. A good Prince hath more guards then one: he hath, 1. a subsidiary guard, consisting of moral men. 2. An inward guard, the integrity of his own Conscience: 3. A spiritual guard, the prayers of his faithful subjects. 4. A celestial guard, the protection of diligent & powerful Angels. 5. A divine guard, his Makers providence that fenceth him in with a wall of fire, which shall at once both preserve him, and consume his enemies.

But my purpose is not to bring your thoughts back to the view of his peril, but to stir your hearts up to thankfulness for his preservation. He is justly styled, The Defender of the Faith: he hath ever defended the Faith, and the Faith hath ever defended him. He hath preserved the Temple of God from Idols, and therefore God hath preserved him from all his enemies. Surely that Providence, which delivered him from those early Conspiracies, wherewith he hath been assaulted from his cradle, meant him for some extraordinary benefit, and matchless good to the Christian world. He that gave him both life and Crown(almost)together, hath still miraculously preserved them both, from all the raging violences of Rome and Hell. Now when the Lord delivered him, what did he else but even deliver us all? That we might rejoice in his safety, as the Romans did in the recovery of Germanicus; when they ran with lamps and sacrifices to the Capitol, and there sung with shouts and acclamations; Salua Roma, salua Patria, saluus Germanicus: the City is safe, the Country is safe, and all in the safety of Germanicus. While we consider the blessings which we enjoy by his gracious Government; that the estates we have gotten with honest industry, may be safely conveyed to our posterity: that we sit under the shadow of peace, and may teach our children to know the Lord: that the good man may build up Temples and Hospitals, without trembling to think of savage and barbarous violences to pull them down: that our Devotions be not molested with uproars, nor men called from their callings by mutinies: that our Temples be not profaned with Idols, nor the Service of God blended with superstitious devices: that our temporal estate is preserved in liberity, our spiritual estate may be improved in piety, and our eternal estate assured us in glory: that our lives be protected, and in quiet our souls may be saved: for such a King of men, bless we the God of Kings; and sing for his deliverance, as they did for their Germanicus; as privately every day, so this day in our public Assemblies; Salua Britannia, Salua Ecclesia, saluus JACOBUS: Our Kingdom is safe, the Church of God is safe, our whole Estate is safe, we are all safe and happy, in the safety and happiness of King JAMES. O that as we have good cause to emulate, so also we would truly imitate the gratulation of Israel; we for our King that hath preserved the Temple, as they for their King that built the Temple; while the Levites and singers stood with Harps and Cymbals and Viols, and the Priests blowing with Trumpets; as if they had all been one man, and made one sweet harmony to the praise of God.

For these public & extraordinary blessings, God requires public and extraordinary praises: that this great Assembly with prepared hearts, and religious affections, should magnify his glorious Name: & if it were possible, by some unusual strain of our united thanks, pierce the very skies, & give an Echo to those celestial Quires, singing, Honor, & praise, and glory, be to our gracious God, for all his merciful deliverances both of Prince and people. Yea, O Lord, still preserve thine own Anointed▪ convert or confound all his enemies; but upon his dead let his Crown flourish. Long, long live that royal keeper of God's holy Temple, & the Defender of that Faith which he hath of old given to his Saints: and let all true-hearted Israelites say, Amen: yea, let Amen, the faithful witness in heaven, the Word & Truth of God, say Amen to it. For our selves, let us heartily repent of our former sins, religiously amend our future lives, abandon all our intestine Idols, serve the Lord with pure hearts; and still, and still, God shall deliver both Him and us from all our enemies. This God grant for his mercies sake, Jesus Christ for his merits sake, the HolyGhost for his Names sake; to whom, three persons, and one eternal God, be all praise and glory, obedience and thanksgiving, world without end.

GOD'S ANGER.

PSALM 80. ver. 4.

O Lord God of hosts, how long wilt thou be angry with thy people that prayeth?

IT hath been said of War, that it is Malum, an evil, but it may be Necessarium, a necessary evil. It is good sometimes to hunt the Wolf, though it is better to fodder the Sheep. They speak of a drowning man, Etiam ad Novaculam, that he will rather take hold of a knife, then of nothing. A very coward will catch the edge of a naked sword, to save his life; though it cut his fingers. Man being cast out of Paradise, and that Paradise guarded with a sword in the hand of a Cherub, durst not attempt a re-entry, because he was guilty. But Commonwealths that have lost any part of their Territories, or just Privileges, by foreign invasion, and hostile violence, may justly venture upon the sword, and fairly hope for a recovery, because they are innocent; & hanc picem amolire gladio. Irene signifies Peace; Yet the Turk could sacrifice his beauteous Irene to the God of Warr. If Warr in itself were utterly unlawful, God would never have accepted this Title, The Lord of hosts. Yet in this style he takes such delight, that he is oftener called the God of hosts in the former Testament, then by any other Title. In those two prophesies of Isaiah and Jeremiah, it is given him no less then an hundred and thirty times.

All creatures are mustered, and trained, put into garrison, or brought forth into the field by his command. Which way can we look besides his Armies? If upward into heaven, there is a band of Soldiers; even amultitude of the heavenly host praising God. If to the lower heavens, there are a band of Soldiers: it was universa militia coeli, to which those Idolaters burnt incense. On the earth, not only men are martialled to his service; so Israel was called the host of the living God: but even the brute Creatures are ranged in arrays. So God did levy a band of flies against the Egyptians; and a band of frogs that marched into their bedchambers. He hath troops of locusts, and armies of caterpillars. Not only the chariots and horsemen of heaven, to defend his Prophet, but even the basest, the most indocible, and despicable creatures, wherewith to confound his enemies. If Goliath stalk forth to defile the God of Israel, he shall be confuted with a pebble. If Herod swells up to a God, God will set his vermin upon him, and all the Kings guard cannot save him from them. You have heard of r•s that could not be beaten off, till they had destroyed that covetous Prelate, and of a fly that killed Pope Adrian. God hath more ways to punish, then he hath creatures.

This Lord God of hosts is not properly a title of Creation, but of providence. All creatures have their existence from God, as their Maker: and so have they also their order from him, as their Governor. It refers not so much to their being, as to their martialling; not to their natural, but militant estate: Nor only as creatures do they owe him for their making, but as they are soldiers, for their managing. Their order is Warlike, and they serve under the colors of the Almighty. So that here, God would be respected, not as a Creator; but as a General. His anger therefore seems so much the more fearful, as it is presented to us under so great a Title; The Lord God of hosts is angry. They talk of Tamberlain, that he could daunt his enemies, with the very look of his countenance: oh then what terror dwells in the countenance of an offended God? The reprobates shall call to the rocks to hide them from the wrath of the Lamb: If Ira Agni, the wrath of the Lamb doth so affright them, how terrible is Ira Leonis, the wrath of the Lyon? It may justly trouble us all to hear, that the Lord God of hosts is angry: in the sense whereof the Prophet breaks forth here into this expostulation; O Lord God of hosts, how long wilt thou be angry with thy people that prayeth? Wherein we have these five propositions, or inferencies naturally arising out of the text.

1. That God may be angry; for that is manifestly implied in the Text; He is angry.
2. That his anger may last a great while: O Lord, how long wilt thou be angry?
3. That his anger may extend to the whole nation: how long wilt thou be angry with the people, all the people
4. That his anger may fall upon his own people, even his peculiar and chosen flock; How long wilt thou be angry with thy people?
5. That his anger may dwell upon them in their devotions, and not be removed by their very prayers. How long wilt thou be angry with the people that prayeth? Yea, against their prayer?

Now God is never angry without a cause: he is no froward God, of no techy and pettish nature: a cause there must be, or he would never be angry. There can be no cause but sin; we never read that God was angry for anything else. Some he hath corrected without respect unto sin, as he did Job: but he was never angry with any man, but for the sin of that man. It is the sin of the people that hath thus grieved God, and it is the anger of God that hath thus grieved the people. Sin must be supposed to run along with his anger throughout the text, as the ecliptick line does thorough the Zodiacke.

1. If it were not for sin, God would not be angry.
2. If it were not for the continuance of sin, he would not be so long angry.
3. If it were not for the universality of sin, he would not be angry with the whole people.
4. If it were not for the unnatural ingratitude of sin, he would not be angry with his own people.
5. If it were not for the base hypocrisy of sin, he would not be angry with his people that prayeth.

Thus then the argument lies fair and plain before us.

- 1 It is sin that makes God angry.
- 2 It is the continuance of sin that makes him long angry.
- 3 It is the generalty of sin that makes him angry with the whole people.
4. It is the unthankfulness of sin, or the sin of unthankfulness, that makes him angry with his own people.
5. Lastly, it is the hypocrisy of sin, or the sin of hypocrisy, that makes him so long angry with his people that prayeth.

1. We provoke him by our rebellions, and he is angry.
2. We continue our provocations against him, and he is long angry.
3. We provoke him universally, and so he is angry with us all; not with some offenders here and there, but with the whole people.
4. We provoke him by our unkindness; for whom he hath done so much good, and upon whom he hath heaped so many blessings; and so he is angry with his own people.
5. Lastly, we provoke him by our dissimulations; approaching to him with our lips, and keeping back our hearts: we pray un to him, and yet live against him: we call upon his Name, and rebel against his will: and so he is angry, and long angry, and long angry with the whole people, and long angry with his own people, and long angry with his people that prayeth.

1. God may be angry, and sin is the cause of his anger; thats the first Proposition. Man may be angry without sin, not without perturbation: God is angry without either preturbation or sin. His anger is in his nature, not by anthropopathy, but properly; being his corrective Justice, or vindicative Justice. Iratus videtur, quia tunquam iratus operatur. Our anger is an impotent passion: His a most clear, free, and just operation. By this affection in ourselves, we may guess at the perfection that is in God. The dissolute securitans think that God doth but smile at the absurdities of men; that ludit in humanis: that their drunkenness and adulteries rather make him merry than angry. Like some carnal father, that laughs at the ridiculous behavior of his children ‹ϕ› to whom their wanton speeches and actions are but a pleasure; and in which he rather encourageth, then chides. Indeed, God is said to Laugh; He that sits in heaven laughs them to scorn: but woe be to the men at whose fooleries God laughs. It is a dissembling falsehood in man, to smile and betray, as Judas began his treachery with a kiss: Such are likened to those bottled windy drinks, that laugh in a man's face, and cut his throat. But this laughter in God, argues not so much what he does, as what they suffer; when by frustrating their sinful purposes, he exposeth them to contempt and scorn. Dei ridere, est hominem ludibrio exponere. If a little ant creeping out of a molehill, should march forth, and proffer to wrestle a fall with a giant, there were yet some proportion in this challenge: but there is none of a finite power to an infinite. Audacious sinners, that dare provoke the Lord of hosts! What are all the Armies and Forces of Tyrants, to oppose the omnipotent God? He will make a feast of them, for the fowls of the Air, whom he invites to the flesh of Captains, and to the flesh of Kings. Let earth and hell conspire, let there be a confederate band of men and devils; how easily can he command the one to their dust, the other to their chains? What power have they of either motion or being, but from him against whom they fight? Our God is a consuming fire; and he will consume them not only in anger, but in laughter. The Catastrophe of all rebellion is but the Sarcasmos or bitter scorn of God.

There is no less difference between God's anger and his favor, then between death and life; death in the most dismal horror; and life in the most comfortable sweetness of it. In his favor there is life: death in his anger; for when thou art angry, all our days are gone. There is great light given to contraries by their comparison: look first a little upon the favor of God: Oh how excellent is thy loving kindness, O Lord? Thy Saints shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house, and thou wilt make them to drink of the river of thy pleasures. What follows upon his favor, but satisfaction, and peace, and joy, and eternal life? When the deluge of water had defaced that great book of Nature, Noah had a copy of every kind of Creature with him in that famous Library, the Ark: out of which they were reprinted to the world. So he that hath the favor of God in the Ark of the Covenant, hath the Original copy of all blessings: if they could all have perished, yet so they might be restored. God is the best Store-house, the best treasury: O happy men that have their estates laid up there! Though friends, goods, and life forsake us, yet if God's gracious countenance shine upon us, that will be life, and goods, and friends unto us. These benefits and comforts flow from his favor.

But alas, how terrible is his anger? He hath scourged some in very mercy, till they have smarted under his rod. Job complains, that the terrors of God do fight against him. And David says, From my youth up thy terrors have I suffered with a troubled mind. If he will do thus much in love, what shall be the judgments of his wrath! If he hath drawn blood of his dear ones, what shall be the plague of willful sinners! If this be the rod of his children, what are the scorpions provided for his enemies! what comfort can any find in all the prosperous fortunes upon earth, with whom God is angry in Heaven? If that mighty Pagan could apprehend this, he would find small safety in his guard of Janisaries, and less pleasure in his brutish Seraglio's. It is a vain conceit of that Potentate, who refusing the name of Pius, would be called Felix; Happy, not Godly. But there can be no felicity without God's blessing, and he will not bless, where he is not blessed. But Sylla, surnamed Felix, accounted it not the least part of his fortunes, that Metellus surnamed Pius was his friend. Piety is the best friend to Felicity, though Felicity doth not always befriend Piety.

That is but a wretched prosperity, upon which God looks in anger. If the Sun were wanting, it would be night, for all the Starrs: If God frown upon a man; for all the glittering honors of this world, he sits, in the shadow of death. Let him be never so rich in lands and waters; yet his springs have lost their sweetness, his vines their fruitfulness, his gold hath lost the color, his precious stones their value and luster: I mean, the virtue and comfort of all these are gone away with the favor of God. If our house were paved with a floor of gold, and walled with pearls and Diamonds, and yet the roof wide open to the violence of heaven, would these shelter us from storms and tempest? Would we be so lodged in cold winter nights? Or were our house roofed with Cedar, and the walls hung with arras, yet if the floor be rotten, and under it a bottomless pit, could we sleep in quiet? There can be no safety when God is angry: his wrath may come thundering from heaven, and suddenly sink rebellious sinners into hell; and then where is all their honor? When their mortal part lies in the dishonorable dust, and their immortal part suffers in unextinguishable fire.

Thus terrible is the anger of God: now what is he angry withal, but sin? That is the perpetual make-bate betwixt God and us; the fuel of the fire of his indignation. Your iniquities have separated between you and your God. For this cause he looks upon us as a stranger, yea as an enemy. But they rebelled, and vexed his holy spirit: therefore he was turned to be their Enemy, and he fought against them. But they rebelled: man's occasion of offending God, is but a But, a nothing, no cause at all: God's occasion of being angry with men, is a therefore, a cause sufficient, and that cause is sin. Search the holy Book all over, and you shall never find God angry but for sin. Nor doth the flame of his wrath break out upon every sin; but when sin grows impudent and past shame. We were wont to say, that veritas non quae rit angulos: but now, vitium non quaerit angulos: It doth that in a bravery, with which the false Prophet was threatened, that he should do in fear; it runs from Chamber to Chamber, from house to house, not to hide itself, but to boast itself. We so provoke the Lord, that we do not only anger him, but are angry with him. If the winds do not blow, and the rain fall, as we would have it; if anything falls out cross to our desires, we even vex at God himself; as if he were bound to wait upon our humors. No marvel if God be angry with us, when we dare be angry with him: by murmuring at his actions, and calling his providence into question. Doest thou well to be angry, O man? No, it is exceeding ill, and dangerous. We may tremble to think that the pot should fall out with the potter, and man be angry with his Maker. It is the meretricious and shameless forehead of sin that angers God: And in this anger we here find him, but let us not so leave him: and yet the next point tells us that his wrath is not suddenly pacified:

2. He may be long angry: that's the second Proposition. Usque quo Domine? It is not for a fit, like some flash of powder, but may burn long. How long, O Lord, wilt thou be angry? forever? And shall thy Jealousy burn like fire? He visits his own Israel with a long dearth: During all those three years of drought and scarctiy, God's Altar smoaked with daily sacrifices, and Heaven was solicited with continual prayers; yet still he was angry: and why may not David complain, in this Psalm, of that famine? We are not at the first sensible of common evils: in Warr, Dearth, or Pestilence, we think only of shifting for ourselves, or finding out convenient refuges, (like Foxes in a storm, that run to the next burroughs) and study not how to remove the public Judgments. But the continuance of an affliction sends us to God, and calls upon us to ask for a reckoning. An evil that is suddenly gone, is as suddenly forgotten: as men stricken in their sleep, cannot quickly find themselves: so the blow doth rather astonish us, then teach us. But when the burden lies long upon us, we will at last complain of the weight, and seek to ease ourselves.

Indeed, there be some sinners more insensible, more insensate then beasts: if we find the hungriest ox feeding in the meddow, and cannot with many pricks of the goad make him remove from his place, we wonder at his stupidity. Yet the insatiate world-affecters, though God not only affright them with menaces, but even afflict them with many scourges, cannot be gotten from their covetous practices. So long as they can by any means grow wealthy, they will not believe that God is angry with them. As if there were none that have more then heart could wish; yet live all this while in the sphere of God's Indignation. We can read God's wrath in a storm, not in a calm yet $\langle \diamond \rangle$ may be most angry, when he least expresseth it. My Jealousy shall depart from thee, and I will be no more angry with thee: Oh that is the height of his displeasure $\langle \diamond \rangle$ The Prophet speaks of a true Peace: True, were a needless epithet, if there were not a false peace in carnal hearts. How fondly doth the secure sinner flatter himself, in the conceit of his own happiness? All is well at home: he quarrels not with himself, for he denies himself no sensual pleasure. God quarrels not with him, he feels no checks of a chiding conscience, he sees no frowns of an angry Judge: nothing but prosperity shines upon him. He sees no difference in the face of heaven, whatsoever he does, or says: the same entertainment is given to his blasphemies, as to his prayers. Sure, he thinks himself in God's books above other men. And so he is indeed; in God's book of debts, in God's book of arrearages, in his book of Judgments: so he is far in God's books. He owes such men a payment, and they shall have it. Alas, this is not the sinners peace, but stupidity: not the Makers favor, but his fury. All this while he is very angry, though he suspends the execution of his wrath. Thus long sin lies like a sleeping bandog at the door of their hearts: They look upon the cur as if he would never wake: or if he did, yet as if hewere so chained, & clogged, & muzzled, that he could never hurt them. But when once God rowzeth him, then have at their throats: then they shall feel what it is to have lived so long in the anger of a God: When the Almighty shall put himself into the fearful forms of vengeance, and the everlasting gulf of fire shall open to receive them into intolerable burnings; the merciless devils seising on their guilty souls, and afflicting them with incessant torments.

It is some favor, when we have the respite to cry, How long, Lord, wilt thou be angry with us? He is not thoroughly angry with us, when he suffers us to breath forth this expostulation. There is some hope of remedy, when we once complain of our sickness. It is not change of climate, but change of diet, that recovers us: when we grow to forbear the surfeits of sin, there is a fair possibility of comfort. Yet God may be long angry, and long continue sensible testimonies of his anger. Forty years long was I grieved with this Generation. He had smitten Israel with divers punishments, and threatened them with with more grievous calamities; thatevery man should eat the flesh of his own arm; Manasseh, Ephraim; and Ephraim, Manasseh; and they both against Judah: And yet he had not done with them, his anger was not turned away, but his hand was stretched out still. David's pestilence of three days, was a storm soon blown over, though it were bitter for the time: God's displeasure hath dwelt longer upon us.

But how then doth the Prophet say, that he retaineth not anger? Well enough: for he never retaineth it on a moment longer, then we retain the cause of it: So soon as ever we cease sinning against him, he ceaseth to be angry with us. After David's humiliation and sacrifice, the Angel struck not one blow more with the sword of pestilence. He measures out the length of his anger by the continuance of our rebellions. So that if we expostulate with him, Lord how long wilt thou be angry with us? He replies, O ye sons of men, how long will you be rebellious against me? Let us not look that the Lord should begin first; that his pardon should prevent our repentance. There is great reason, he that hath done the offense, should be first in making the peace. Every day we expect comfort from God, and every day God expects conversion from us. Every week we look for some abatement in the bills, and every week God looks for some abatement of our sins, for some amendment of our lives. So long as we continue guilty, it is in vain to cry, O Lord, how long wilt thou be angry? Our hard hearts are not yet broken with remorse: alas, what should be done to break them? The voice of the Lord breaketh the Cedars: he breaketh the mountains: he breaketh the heavens, he breaketh the stones; and yet his word cannot break our hearts. But if he cannot break us with the rod of Affliction, he will break us with a rod of iron, and dash us in pieces like a Potters vessel.

God is long patient before he grows angry; why should he not be long angry before he be appeased? He is not easily provoked, why should he be so easily pacified? yet so propense to mercy is our gracious Father, that the fire which was long a kindling, is soon quenched: His anger, that is not blown into a flame without many and long continued sins, is yet put out with a few penitent tears. When our houses are burning, it were but foolish to cry out, we are undone, alas the fire rageth; and we all the while forbear to cast on water. The Usque quo of God's anger waits for the Quousque of our repentance. He will not give over-striking, till we fall a weeping: and we may do well to weep before him, for (sure) we did ill to sin against him. His anger doth now long offend us, but our wickednesses did far longer offend him. We have provoked him many years; and shall not his wrath burn many days? Still it flameth: let us make hast to bring our buckets of water, filled at the cisterns of our eyes, and derived from the fountain of our hearts, to quench it. Let no hands be wanting to this business: for if some bring in the water of tears, while others cast in the fuel of sins, this fire will burn still. But from the highest to the lowest let us come in with repentance: and that all of us, even the whole people: for so far God's wrath extendeth.

3. He may be angry with the whole people; which is the third proposition. He hath been angry with a whole family, with a whole Army, with a whole City, with a whole Country, with the whole earth. With a whole family: so he cursed the house of Jeroboam: that him that dieth in the City, the dogs shall eat, and him that dieth in the field, shall the fowls of the air eat. With a whole army; so he slew of Sennacherib's host in one night 185 thousand. With a whole city; so the city of Jericho was cursed with an universal desolation, never to be reedified without the ruin of the builder. With a whole country; So Saul was charged to destroy Amalek; man and woman, infant and suckling, sheep and oxen, and all that belonged to them. With the whole earth; when it was become corrupt, he drowned it with a flood. Yet observe how God hath qualified his wrath; with his hand of favor snatching some out of his hand of anger. When he cursed the whole Family of Jeroboam, he excepted Abijah. When he doomed to death, the whole City of Jericho, he excepted the family of Rahab. When his wrath burned Sodom, he excepted the family of Lot. When his anger drowned the whole world in a deluge, yet his mercy excepted Noah, and his octonary household. But his anger is very grievous, when it extends to the whole people. Thought hewrath of the Lord of hosts, the land is darkened, &c.

What makes him thus universally angry with us, but the universalitie of our sins against him? when the passengers ask: Wherefore hath the Lord done thus to this great City? Answer is made, Because they forsook the Covenant of the Lord, and worshipped other God's. To such a fearful height may the sins of the children bring the mother, that that Church which now enjoys such abundance of truth and peace, may be poisoned with heresy, and wounded with schism, and suffer an utter direktion. The whole people is guilty of sin, and why for their sins may not God be angry with the whole people? Yea, and long angry too: for it will be very long before that fault will be amended, which hath so long been committed.

God came to low conditions in the behalf of Sodom: Abraham brought him down to ten. He came to lower conditions in the behalf of Jerusalem; he brought himself down to one: See if you can find a man, if there be any that seeketh the truth in the whole City, and I will pardon it. O how epidemical is that wickedness, where not one escapeth the corruption? We have found the Lord angry enough with a whole people, for the sin of one man. Lord, hath one man sinned, and wilt thou be wroth with the whole Congregation? No, God's vengeance, when it is the hottest, makes difference of offenders: and knows to distinguish betwixt the heads of a faction, and the train. Though neither be faultless, yet the one is plagued, the other pardoned. Depart from the tents of these wicked men, lest you be consumed in their sins. So soon as the innocent are severed, the guilty perish. One Achan sins, all Israel suffers. One David sins in pride, seventy thousand of his subjects suffer in the plague. One Saul slew the Gibeonites, three years dearth lies upon the Israelites for it. The blood of those Canaanites shed against Covenant, almost forty years before, by the then King, is now called for of the whole people. They had all sins enough, but God fixeth his eye of anger upon this. Every sin hath a tongue, but that of blood outcries them all: And if Justice do not revenge the murder of one, God will require it of the whole nation. When seven of Saul's sons were hanged up, God was intreated for the land. Then shall the clouds drop fatness, and the earth run forth into plenty: Then do the valleys stand thick with corn, land the little hills rejoice on every side. Some drops of blood shed in Justice, procure large showers from heaven. A few carcasses laid in their graves, are a rich compost to the earth. There can be no peace, where blood cries unheard, unregarded: but when it is expiated by the blood of the offenders, there will be a cessation of Judgments. Phinehas executed judgment, and the plague ceased. One contrary is ever cured by another: take away the cause, and the effect will cease. Prayer is very powerful, but doing of Justice more available. The whole Congregation were at their prayers, and those prayers were steeped in tears; yet still the plague raged, and God's anger continued. But when Phinehas had run those two adulterers through with his Javelin, in the act of their sin; the plague was stayed. So blessed a thing is it for any nation, that Justice is impartially executed.

Thus the universality of sin calls for the universality of repentance, or else it will provoke God's anger to strike us with universal judgments. If the whole people be guilty, the whole people must fall to deprecation. Such was the Nivites repentance, every man turning from his evil ways. We have sinned, even the whole nation: and as if we had not sins enough of our own, we borrow of our neighbors. What nation under heaven do we trade withal, from whom the sins of that Nation are not brought hither? And those are merchandizes that might be well spared. Are we all in the transgression, and do we lay the burden of repentance upon some few? If we expostulate with God, Lord hath one man sinned, and wilt thou be wrath with the whole Congregation? May he not more justly expostulate with us; Hath the whole Congregation sinned, and is it enough for one man to repent? Is the whole garment fowl, and must only the skirts be washed? Is the whole building ruinous, and do we think it a sufficient reparation to patch up one corner of it? No, the plaster of our repentance must be fully as large as the orifice of our wickedness; or we cannot be healed. But still God will be angry with us, yea though we were his own people: For,

4. God may be angry with his own people; which is the fourth proposition. I will visit their sins with a rod, and their iniquity with scourges; but my mercy I will not utterly take from them. Though he do not take his mercy from them, yet he may be angry with them. He is our father, and never did Father in sweeter terms entertain the dearest treasures of his blood, then God doth us, when he vouchsafes to call us His people: yet did you never see a father angry with his child? Indeed there is great difference between that wrath of God which is toward his own people, and that which comes upon the children of disobedience. They differ three ways.

1. In respect of continuance: his anger upon reprobates is eternal; not extinguished with their bloods, but pursuing them from earth to hell. To his people it is but temporary, it lasts but a moment: weeping may endure for a night, but joy comes in the morning. He will not always chide, nor will he keep his anger forever. When he was very angry with his Idolatrous Israel, Moses does but put him in mind that they were his own people, and he was pacified. For a moment in a little wrath, he hides his face from us. Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy; for though I fall, I shall rise again. But for the wicked, his wrath abideth on them.

2. In respect of the measure: It is milder towards his own people, then to others. For the unrighteous, he proportions his Judgments, not to their strengths, but to their deserts: For his own people, he proportions his corrections, not to their deserts, but to their strengths. For the former, he minds not what they can bear by their powers, but what they have deserved by their sins. For the other, he considers not what their sins deserve, but what their Spirits can sustain. His most bitter wrath to his own people, is always sweetened with his mercy. Thou wast a God that forgavest them, though thou tookest vengeance of their inventions. He brings a scourge in one hand, and a pardon in the other: and while he draws blood of the flesh, he forgives the soul.

3. In regard of the end. The wicked are the vessels of wrath: and as their sin makes them fit for God's anger, so his anger makes them sit for destruction. But for his own people; They are chastened of the Lord, that they might not be condemned with the world. Whether he inflict upon them punishments for sin, or suffer them to fall into sin for punishments, yet all shall work to their good. his corrections are but medicines, bringing forth the quiet fruit of righteousness. He lets them fall into some heinous crime, but it is to waken their repentance. Small spots upon a garment are not minded; we seldom are so curious as to wash out them. But when a great spot comes, a fowl stain, we then scower and elense it, to get out that; and so we get out all the little spots too. Sins of a lesser size never trouble us; we mind not the washing out of them with our sorrowful tears: But when a great sin comes, and disquiets the conscience, then repentance, that old landresse is called for: and in that lardar we wash out both the great offense, and all the rest. So God suffers us to fall into some gross and grievous sin, as a father suffers his little child to burn his finger in the flame, that his whole body may not fall into the fire.

All these differences are expressed by the Prophet, Isaiah. 1. For the time▪ Doth the ploughman plough all the day to sow? God doth not continue ploughing all day long furrows upon our backs, but when he hath broken up the fallow grounds of our hearts, he then sows in the seed of his comforts. 2. For the measure; Hath he plagued Israel, as he hath plagued the enemies of Israel? He sinites his Israel in the branches, and in the bunches; cuts down some of her superfluous boughs, and plucks off clusters of her rotten grapes: But the wicked he smites at the very root. 3. For the end; The furnace of his wrath shall but purge away our dross, and make us pure metal, fit for the stamp of his own Image.

Yet for all this, God hath been grievously angry with his own people: Yea, their sins anger him most of all; because together with wickedness, there is unkindness. As dearly as he loves them, their sins may provoke him. Our interest in God is so far from excusing our iniquities, that it aggravates them. Of all others, the transgression of his own people shall not pass unpunished. The nearer we are to him, the nearer do our offenses touch him; as a man more takes to heart a discourtesy done by a friend, then a great injury by a stranger. Pagans may blaspheme, and bezzle, and defile the marriage-bed, and yet God let them alone: but he will not endure these sins in his own people. The more he loves us, the greater should our love be to him: now love and unkindness cannot stand together. If we revolt from our Maker, as Absalom thought Hushai had renounced David, may he not justly expostulate with us, Is this thy Kindnesse to thy friend? there is no such irksome disobedience, as where God looks for service. He came unto his own, and his own received him not: O, that could not choose but trouble him. As Demades said to Philip King of Macedon, and at a time when he well deserved it; Cùm fortuna tibi Agamemnonis personam imposuerit, nonne pudet te Thirsitem agere? When fortune hath made thee an Agamemnon, art thou not ashamed to play Thirsites? When God hath honored us for his own people, with the noble name of Christians is it not a shame for us to play the Pagans? ^u Happy are the people that be in such a case, yea blessed are the people that have the Lord for their God. Yet that people may so far anger him, that he will take away not only their temporal, but even their spiritual happiness. Those seven Churches of Asia were God's own people: yet the Gospel was not fastened to their territories; as the old Romans pinnioned their goddess Victoria, or their apish posterity do the Catholic faith, to their own infallible Chair. But as they had a time to breathe, so a time to expire: and so hath my fourth proposition. There is but one gradation more.

5. God may be angry with his people that prayeth. Wherein we have two main observations. First, The wonder, that God will be angry at our prayers. Secondly, the answer, which resolves the wonder; showing why our very prayers may anger him. Either of these is backed with three circumstances. 1. For the wonder, that God is angry with his people that prayeth.

1. All the other conclusions are easily granted: God may be angry, and angry very long, and angry with the whole people, and angry with his own people; all this because of their sins: But that he should be angry at their prayers, this is the wonder. He hath commanded us to pray, and will he be offended with us for doing his command? Angry against our prayer! He hath commended to us Prayer, as the only means to assuage his anger: and yet is he angry at our Prayer? Phinehas prayed, and his anger was pacified: Aaron prayed, and the plague ceased: and will he now be angry with the people that prayeth? He is a God that heareth prayer: O thou that hearest prayer, to thee shall all all flesh come: and does he now reject prayer? He hath so styled his own house; Oratorium, the house of prayer: and to them that pray unto him in his house, he hath promised peace; In this house will I give peace, saith the Lord of hosts. Peace and wrath are contraries: how should prayer procure peace, when God is angry at prayer? Prayer is so noble, that under it is comprehended the whole worship of God: Whosoever calleth on the name of the Lord, shall be saved: and yet will God be angry at the prayer of his people? It is a great honor that God will vouchsafe to speak unto man: but a far greater honor, that man is allowed to speak unto God: the very Angels stand in admiration of it: and yet what comfort is there in that, when God is angry at the prayer of his people? What blessing is there, which our prayers cannot infeeble us in? We send up Prayer to God with the same confidence, that Adoniah sent Bathsheba to Solomon, the King will deny thee nothing: and will God be angry at prayer? It is the only means we have to pacify him, Prayer: and shall our Prayer anger him? Alas, what hope is left us, when God is angry at Prayer? This hath often turned away his wrath, and does it now incense his wrath? If we should not pray, he would then be angry: and when we do pray, is he angry too? What, neither way pleased? What is the reason why there is so much empty cask in God's cellar, but for want of prayer? Ye have not, because ye ask not: and shall not prayer obtain favor? Oh Lord, what shall I say (it was the complaint of Joshua) when Israel turneth their backs before their enemies? So, what shall we say, what shall we do, when God turneth back our prayers? Why is it called the throne of Grace, before which we present our prayers; if that throne send forth nothing but beams of wrath? We look for grace, and a favorable audience of our petitions; but alas, what shall become of us, when God is angry at our very prayers?

2. How wonderful is the power of prayer? Let me alone, saith God to Moses: who would look for such a word from God to man, as let me alone? As yet Moses had said nothing: before he opens his mouth, God prevents his importunity, as foreseeing the holy violence of prayer. Moses stood trembling before the Majesty of his Maker, as fearing his dire revenge: and, yet that Maker doth (after a sort) solicit Moses for leave to revenge; let me alone. As it was afterwards said of Christ, concerning some places, that he could do no miracles there, because of their unbelief: So one would think, that God could do no Judgments here, because of Moses his faith. Let me alone; why, what can resist God? Yes, Prayer can resist him. Such is his mercy, that he hath (as it were) obliged his power, to the faith of our Prayer. He enables us to resist himself: Seipsum vincit. The servant prayer of the faithful, can bind the hands of the Almighty. What is there that God can do, which Prayer cannot do? O mighty, I had almost said, Almighty Prayer! What a hand is that which can hold omnipotence? What wings are those that can overtake infiniteness? Yet alas, we may now mourn over Prayer, as David did over Jonathan; How are the mighty fallen! Prayer hath lost her force with God, when God is angry with prayer. Her wings are clipt, that she cannot mount: Her bow is broken; she cannot shoot an arrow that reaches the mark. She is become a widow, as it was lamented over Jerusalem, desolate and solitary, that was a Princesse among the Provinces, and a Queen among the nations. She sits weeping in the dust, and hath almost forgot the use of speech. She mourns not so much for Mary's abstulerunt Dominum, for she knows where to find him; as that our sins Abstulerunt Domini favorem, and she knows not how to pacify him: And how should she, when God is angry with his people that prayeth? Where is the strength of this Samson? What is become of that power, which was wont to command heaven and earth? The visible heavens have been opened by prayer: so Elias brought down rain. The invisible heavens have been opened by prayer▪ so the penitent malefactor got from the Cross into Paradise. So stephen saw the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing at the right hand of God, Omnia vincentem vincit. It was wont to be an especial favourite of God; but now (alas) it is cast out of favor, for God is angry with prayer. Thou hast covered thyself with a thick cloud, that our prayer should not pass thorough. This is a woeful condition of our souls, when the Lord is angry at our prayers: when he will not hear them, not answer them, it is a cause of sadness in us; but much more, when he is angry with them. Therefore will I deal in fury: though they cry in mine ears with a loud voice, yet will I not hear them. This is fury indeed: Before, the ancients of Israel had said, The Lord seeth us not, he hath forsaken the earth: There they deny God eyes, and here he denies them ears. A burning wrath; as the Original hath it; How long wilt thou smoke against the prayer of thy people?

3. And of thy people: this increaseth the wonder. For God to stopp his ears against the prayers of the Heathen, to reject the petitions of Idolaters, to despise a devotion done before painted blocks and Images, is no marvel. For they dishonor him in their prayers; and God will be angry with anything that eclipseth his glory. But he does not use to slight those that serve him, and continue in his holy worship. It is strange that he should be angry at the prayer of his own people: Angry with them whom he hath chosen; angry with them long, and angry with them at their very prayers. This must be some extraordinary wrath: and so you have all the circumstances that may advance the wonder.

Now for the Answer that takes off this admiration; and satisfies us with some reasons, why God may be angry with his people that prayeth. God is never angry at his people without a cause: and it must be a great cause that makes him angry with them in their devotions: whereof we have three considerations.

1. There may be infirmities enough in our very Prayers, to make them unacceptable. As if they be, 1. Exanimis, without life and soul: when the heart knows not what the tongue utters.

2. Or Perfunctorie; for God will none of those prayers, that come out of feigned lips. 3. Or Tentativae; for they that will petere tentando, tempt God in prayer, shall go without. 4. Or fluctuantes, of a wild and wandering discourse, ranging up and down; which the Apostle calls, beating the air: as huntsmen beat the bushes, or Saul sought his fathers asses. Such prayers will not stumble upon the Kingdom of Heaven. 5. Or if they be Praeproperae, run over in hast: as some use to choppe up their prayers, and think long till they have done. But they that pray in such hast, shall be heard at leisure. 6. Or sine fiducia: the faithless man had as good hold his peace, as pray. He may babble, but prays not: he prays infectually, and receives not. He may lift up his hands, but he does not lift up his heart. Only the prayer of the righteous availeth, and only the believer is righteous. But the formal devotion of a faithless man, is not worth that crust of bread which he asks. 7. Or sine humilitate: so the Pharisees prayer was not properly Supplicatio, but superlatio. A presumptuous Prayer profanes the Name of God, instead of Adoring it. All, or any of these defects may mar the success of our Prayers.

2. But such is the mercy of our God, that he will wink at many infirmities in our devotions: and does not reject the Prayer of an honest heart, because of some weakness in the petitioner. It must be a greater cause then all this, that makes God angry at our prayers. In general, it is sin. We know that God heareth not sinners: but if a man doth his will, him he heareth. If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear my prayer. They be our sins that block up the passage of our prayers. It is not the vast distance between Heaven and earth, not the thick clouds, not the threefold regions, nor the sevenfold Orbes, nor the firmament of stars, but only our sins, that hinder the ascent of our prayers. When you make many prayers, I will not hear you; Why? Because your hands are full of blood. God will none of those petitions, that are presented to him with bloody hands. Our prayers are our bills of exchange; and they are allowed in Heaven, when they come from pious and humble hearts: But if we be broken in our religion, and bankrouts of grace, God will protest our bills, he will not be won with our prayers. Thus sin is the general cause.

3. In particular, it is the hypocrisy of sin, or the sin of hypocrisy, that makes God so angry with our prayers. When we honor him with the prostration of our bodies, and solicit him with the petitions of our lips, and yet still dishonor him in our sinful lives, is not this hypocrisy? When we speak before him in the Temple as suppliants, and sin against him abroad like rebels, is not this hypocrisy? Like the outlaw, that sues to the King for a pardon, and yet resolves to live in rebellion. We will not part with our beloved sins, and yet beg the removal of Judgments; will not this dissimulation make God angry with our very prayers? If we shall, Judas-like, kiss his Throne with the Devotion of our lips, and betray his Honor with the wicked works of our hands, should he not be angry at our prayers? We make as if we did lift up our hands unto him, but indeed we stretch out our hands against him: if this be prayer, it is such a one as deserves anger. Fear can make the Devil himself fall to his prayers; I beseech thee, torment me not. Another request he made, which Christ granted; but it was in wrath, not in favor. The pride of our hearts, the covetousness of our hands, the blasphemy of our mouths, the uncleanness of our lusts, the wickedness of our lives; these make God angry with our prayers. If we could be thoroughly angry at our sins, God would cease to be angry at our prayers. But so long as we run on in those sinful courses upon earth, let us look for no favorable audience from heaven. Do good, and continue it: then pray for good, and have it. It hath been said, loquere ut te videam, speak that I may see thee: so saith God to man; Operare ut te audiam, work that I may hear thee. If we dishonor God's Name by our oaths and blasphemies, and upon every trivial occasion toss it in our profane mouths; in vain we pray, Sanctificetur Nomen tuum, Hallowed be thy Name. If we hear the Gospel preached, and receive no instruction by it, nor give any regard or obedience to it; in vain we pray, Adveniat regnum tuum, thy Kingdom come. If the current of our affections and actions runs cross to the will of God; in vain we pray, Fiat voluntas tua, Thy will be done. If we extort the bread of the poor out of their hands, or seek to live by violence or oppression; in vain we pray, Panem nostrum da nobis quotidianum, Give us this day our daily bread: For this is to attempt to have it whether God will or no: he does not give it, but we snatch it. Whiles we are indulgent to our darling sins, and will not part with the dear delight of our bloods, in vain we pray, Dimitte nobis debita nostra, Forgive us our trespasses. Whiles we seek to revenge our wrongs upon others, and bear malice in our hearts; our Sicut nos dimittimus, As we forgive them that trespass against us, doth but beg for vengeance upon our own heads. All the while that we listen to the suggestions of Satan, and like the allurements of the world, and awaken our own lusts to tempt ourselves; it is but a mockery to pray, In tentationem ne nos inducas, lead us not into temptation. While we seek that which is evil, and study that which is evil, and run with greediness into evil; in vain we pray, Liber a nos à malo, Deliver us from evil. We do but flatter God, and complement with him, when we conclude with Tuum est regnam, potentia, & gloria; Thine is the Kingdom, the power, and the glory; for it is our own glory we seeks after, not his. All this cannot keep him from being angry with our prayers. So long as his people rebelleth, he will be angry with his people that prayeth. For some Use.

If God be angry with them that pray, what will he be with them that do not pray? With them that break his laws, and never cry him mercy, with them that live in wickedness, and never ask him forgiveness? The ungodly call not upon the Lord: will he not be much more angry with them? God is not in all their thoughts: but they are in the thoughts of God. He thinks on them with indignation, and will remember them to their cost. Remember, O Lord, the children of Edom, in the day of Jerusalem: yes, he will remember them in the day of their destruction.

If God be sometimes angry at our prayers, how will he brook our curses? If he beat back our petitions, how will he take vengeance on our blasphemies? Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing: but God will not accept of a blessing, from a mouth that is so used to cursing. If he may be so angry with a people that prayeth, what will his wrath do to a people that sweareth? Think this, ye that (if it were possible) would swear God out of his Throne, and the Judge of all the world out of his Tribunal: your very prayers are abominable: your blasphemous breaths have put a stink into all your sacrifices. That tongue is fit for nothing but flames, which so flameth with oaths and execrations. Your prayers cannot be heard, by reason of your sins: but your blasphemies shall be heard and plagued, notwithstanding your prayers. If the Instrument gives a harsh sound, there is trouble instead of inusick: a jarring organ grates the ears, rather than delights them. Our sinnes have put all our Instruments out of tune, and for them God is angry at our very prayers.

There is no way to take off his anger, but by turning from our wickedness. If we break off our sins, he will leave a blessing behind him, even a meat-offering, and a drink-offering to the Lord: he will both give, and take our sacrifice. Let us do thus, and prove him, whether he will not open the windows of heaven. Our repentance and righteousness shall open heaven, so that our prayers may go up for a blessing, and a blessing shall come down upon our prayers. Prayer is vox fidei, as John Baptist was vox Christi: if we mourn, and do not pray, our faith hath lost her voice: and prayer without faith, is John without Christ, a voice without a word. Faith is the soul, and repentance is the life of Prayer; and a prayer without them, hath neither life nor soul. If we believe not, we are yet in our sins: if we repent not, our sins are yet in us: and so long as this state continueth, no wonder if God be angry with his People that prayeth. But first will I wash mine hands in innocence, and then will I compass thine Altar. Then shall my Prayer be set before thee as incense; and the lifting up of my hands like the Evening sacrifice. When with the sword of severe and impartial repentance, we have cut the throat of our sins, and done execution upon our own lusts: then let us solicit heaven with our Prayers: then Pray, and speed: then come, and welcome: no Anger, but all mercy then. Then the Courtiers about the King in Heaven, make room for prayer. Then the Prince himself will take prayer into his own hand, and with a gracious mediation present it to his Father. Then mittimus preces & lacrymas ad Deum legatos. Then is that Court of Audience ready to receive and answer our Ambassadors, which be our Prayers and Tears. Then Saint John sees twelve gates in heaven, all open, and all day open, to entertain such suitors.

This is our refuge, and that a sure one. Although the Enemy begirts a City with never so straight a siege, and stop up all the passages; yet he cannot block up the passage to Heaven: So long as that is open, and God in league with us, there may be relief and succor had from thence by prayer. Faith is a better engineer then was Dadalus; and yet he could make a shift to frame wings; with which he made an escape over those high walls, wherein he was imprisoned. Restat iter coelo, tentabimus ire. Let Pharaoh be behind, the red sea before, the high rocks and mountains on every side; yet Israel can find a way for all that. When there is no other way to escape danger, a Christian can go by heaven, and avoid all by prayer. As it is the heaviest malediction, Let his prayer be turned into sin: so it is a happy blessing, when our sin is turned into prayer; when sin is so done away, that prayer may take place. Then shall Jacob's ladder be never empty of Angels; our prayers ascending to heaven, and God's blessings descending upon us. Then shall prayer disburden our hearts of all sorrows, and God shall fill them with his sweet comforts. Then shalt we sing with cheerful voices; Blessed be the Lord, that hath not turned away our prayer from him, nor his mercie from us. Amen.

FINIS.

MAN'S COMFORT.

PSALM 94. 19.

In the multitude of my thoughts within me, thy comforts delight my soul.

HEaven is a place of infinite glory and joy; yet is there little joy or glory in the way thither. The passage rather lies through much tribulation: so trouble some a gallery leads to so happy a bedchamber. There is not a soul in the cluster of mankind exempted from sorrow; much less shall those grapes escape pressing, which God hath reserved for his own cup. All that will live godly in Christ, shall suffer persecution. Not all that live, but all that live godly: nor all that live godly in respect of outward form, but th it live godly in Christ. Paul, his Attorney, pleads their afflictions with an Oportet: and lest some should look for a dispensation, he backs it with an Omnis. The Saints that have overcome the hill, be singing above: we that are climbing up, must be groaning all the way. The Anthems in-the up per Choir, the Church Triumphant, are all Hymns of joy: the militant part must be content with sad tunes in this valley of tears. Not that the blessedness of Immortality is no more perfect, but that it needs a foil of perplexity to set it off. Not that the joy of heaven is no more sweet, but that it needs the sowreness of the world to give it a taste. Not that the peace and plenty of Canaan, required the wants and molestations of this wilderness to commend it. But so it pleaseth the Almighty King, who of his own free grace doth give the preferment, to interpose the conditions: that the sorrow and ingloriousnesse of this world, should be the thoroughfare to the glories and joys of his Kingdom. For if it pleased him to consecrate the Prince and Captain of our salvation through sufferings; what priveledg can the common soldiers and subjects expect? Deus Filium habuit unum sine peccato, nullum sine flagell•. We that hold our inheritance in Capite, have no other title to it then Christ had before us; by suffering.

When we consider David and his troubles, we say, Ecce dolores viri, behold the sorrows of a man. But when we consider the Son of David, and his passion; we say, Ecce vir dolorum, Behold the man of sorrows. Indeed, if the one balance were full of sorrows, and the other quite empty of comforts, there were an unequal poise. They that do not find some joy in their sorrows, some comfort in their dejections, in this world, are in a fearful danger of missing both in the next. But as it is said in case of bodily sickness; If the patient and the disease join, then in vain is the Physician: if the disease and the Physician conspire, then woe be to the patient: but if the patient and the Physician accord, then vanisheth the disease. So we may observe in spiritual distempers: if the soul and sorrow desperately combine, then the Spirit departs, the Physician is grieved: if God and sorrow join▪ in anger, in anguish; the former justly, the other sharply, then woe to the soul, for that cannot be comforted: but if the soul by faith, and God by grace, unite themselves, then away flies sorrow, for that is expelled. Here David's soul joins itself with the spirit of consolation; and sorrow loseth the day, the end is comfort. In the multitude of my thoughts within me, thy comforts delight my soul.

Here is a twofold Army, one marching against another: Seditio, and Sedatio: an insurrection, and a debellation; a tumult, and the appeasing of it: a band of thoughts assaulting, and an Host of comforts repelling, resisting, protecting. There is a multitude of those thoughts, and no less is the number of these comforts. Those troublous thoughts have got into the citadel of the heart, Apud me, within me: and these consolatory forces have entered as far, even into the soul; They delight my soul. Those thoughts fight under the colors of flesh and blood, but these comforts under the Banner of God; They are My thoughts, but Thy comforts: the cogitations of man, the consolations of Jesus Christ.

1. Look upon the adversary power; In the multitude of my thoughts within me. 1. O that they were some external grievances, a foreign war, no domestic, intestine, civil broils; not turbulent thoughts. 2. Or if they be thoughts, rebellious, heart-breaking cogitations; yet that there were but some few of them, that they might be sooner suppressed; not so numerous, not a multitude of thoughts. 3. Or if they must be thoughts, and a multitude; yet that they had chosen some other place to rise in, not my Heart, the Fort, or Court, or Bedchamber of my spirit; that they had not presumed unto so bold approaches, as to mutine Apud me, within my heart, nearer and closer to me then mine own bowels. But now, to be Thoughts, of so tumultuous a nature: Multitudes, of so mighty a number: Within me, of so fearful a danger; without vent, composition, or quiet; here is a full anxiety.

2. View the defensive forces; and in the midst of this conspiracy make room for preservation; Thy comforts delight my soul. 1. They are comforts: against litigions and unquiet thoughts, a work of peace; Comforts. 2. They are not scant & niggardly; but against amultitude of thoughts, many Comforts; and everyone able to quell a whole rout of distractions. 3. They are thy comforts; not proceeding men or Angels, but immediately from the Spirit of consolation: against My sorrows, Thy comforts. 4. They do not only pitch their tents about me, or like a subsidiary guard, environ me: but they take up their residence in the heart of my heart, In my soul. These refresh more then the other can offend: against the thoughts in my heart, thy comforts delight my soul.

Thus if we be not entered into Aceldama, a field of blood; yet we are got into Meribah, a field of strife; or the mountains of ether, a field of division: not unlike that of Rebecca's womb, where Jacob strove with Esau for the victory. We have seen both the Armies; now let us martial them into their proper ranks, setting both the squadrons in their due stations and postures; and then observe the success or event of the battle. And because the malignant Host is first entered into the ground of my text, consider with me, 1. The rebels or mutiners, Thoughts. 2. The number of them; no less then a multitude, many thoughts. 3. The Captain, whose colors they bear; a disquieted mind; My thoughts. 4. The field where the battle is fought; in the heart; Apud me, within me.

In the other Army we find. 1. Quanta, how puissant they are; Comforts. 2. Quota, how many they are, indefinitely set down; Abundant comfort. 3. Cujus, whose they are▪ The Lord's, he is their general; Thy comforts. 4. Quid operantur, what they do: they delight the soul. In the nature of them; being Comforts, there is tranquility: in the number of them, being many comforts, there is sufficiency: in the owner of them, being Thy comforts, there is omnipotency: in the effect of them, delighting the soul, there is security. There is no fear in them, for they come for peace; they are Comforts. There is no weakness in them, for they come in troops, they are many comforts. There is no disorder in them, for the God of wisdom is their Captain, and leads their forces, they are Thy comforts. There is no trouble in them, for they evangelize joy, They delight the soul.

1. The Rebels are thoughts. Man is an abridgment of the world, and is not exceeded by it, but in quantity, his pieces be not pauciora, sed minora. If all the veins of our bodies were extended to rivers, our sinews to mines, our muscles to mountains, our bones to quarries of stone, our eyes to the bigness of the Sun and Moon, and all other parts to the proportion of such things as correspond to them in the world; man might stride over the sea, as the Hebrews feigned of Adam; the air would be too little for him to move in, and the whole firmament but enough for this Star; yea indeed, this little world would be the great one, and that great world appear but the little one. There is nothing in the world for which we may not find some answerable part in man: but there is something in man for which we can find no answerable part in the world: I need not say Part; for the whole world is not able to give any representation. Man hath a soul, made after the Image of God: of this the world can yield no resemblance. The world produceth innumerable creatures; man yet in more abundance. Our creatures are our thoughts, creatures that are borne Giants; that can reach from east to west, from earth to heaven. These can survey the whole earth, bestride the ocean, comprehend the vast air, and span the very firmament.

How capable, how active is the soul of man! It is even comprehensive of universality, and hath virtutem ad infinita: nature hath set no limits to the thoughts of the soul. It can pass by her nimble wings from earth to heaven in a moment it can be all things, comprehend all things, know that which is, and conceive of that which never was, never shall be. The heart is but a little house, and hath but three chambers, yet there is room enough for a world of guests. God, the Creator of all, made this soul in a Cottage of clay, and this soul is a kind of Creator too: for though it dwell in a close prison, it can produce creatures, Thoughts: and any one of these creatures can move with the Heavens, move faster then the Heavens; over take the Sun, and overgoe the Sun; contemplate that which the Sun never saw, even the dreadful abyss of hell, and a glimpse of the glory of Heaven. So various and innumerable are the thoughts of man, that he had need of an astrolabe, to mark in what height and elevation they are; and so either to advance them, or stoop them, as they deserve.

There be three sorts of actions proceeding from the soul: some internal and immaterial, as the pure acts of our wits and wills; some external and material, as the mere acts of our sense others mixed, between both, and bordering upon both the former; which Saint Augustine says, the Greeks call 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, the Latins Perturbationes. As the heart inspireth one and the same strength and life into all the parts of the body, for the better discharge of their diverse functions; though all the parts do not receive it in the same degree. The stomach by the virtue it receiveth, is made able to digest: the liver, to concoct the nutriment into blood: the spleen like a sponge, by sucking up the melancholy spirits, to purge the vital parts. So the soul breeds all these creatures, gives life to all these thoughts; yet according to their several acts and offices, they have several names. If they be sensitive, we call them passions: if sensual, lusts: if fantastical, Imaginations: if reasonable, arguments: if reflective, conscience: as they are evil, the suggestions of Satan: as good, the motions of the holy Ghost. As the world produceth vipers, and serpents, and venomous creatures, worms and caterpillars, that would devour their parent: so the soul breeds noxious and mutinous thoughts, that are like an earthquake in her bowels; and whiles they maintain civil broils and factions, one against another, she feels the smart of all.

Some thoughts be the darts of Satan; and these Non nocent, sinon placent: we cannot keep thieves from looking in at our widows, we need not give them entertainment with open doors. As the Hermit said, he could not hinder the birds from flying over his head; but he could keep them from building their nests in his hair. Wash thy heart from iniquity, that thou mayest be saved: how long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee? They may be passengers, they must not be sojourners: God hath made a Statute against such inmates: it is an unblest hospitality that gives them lodging; he is no friend to the King that harbours these Seminaries. Other thoughts are the motions of God's spirit; and these must not only be guests, but familiar friends: salutation is not here enough, but glad entertainment, welcome, and indulgence. Let no man like himself the better for some good thoughts: the praise and benefit of these motions is not in the receipt, but in the retention. Easie occasions will fright away good thoughts from a carnal heart: like children, which if a bird do but fly in their way, cast their eye from their book. But David's thoughts here were anxious, commotive thoughts; otherwise they stood not in such need of comforts. It is likely that they were either Timoris, fearful thoughts; or Doloris, sorrowful thoughts: Thoughts of fear for what might be, or thoughts of sorrow for what already was.

The thoughts of fear are troublesome enough as the ill affections of the spleen do mingle themselves with every infirmity of the body: no less doth fear infigurate itself into every passion of the mind. David might find this complication in his thoughts: I will please Saul with my harp: but then fear replies, he will strike me through with his Javelin. He will give me his own daughter in marriage: but fear says again, How if this prove a fatal dowry, if this match be my snare! I will refuge myself with Achish at Gath: yet what trust is there in Infidels? I will lie hidden in Keilah, or Hachilah; but fear suggests, How if the Ziphites discover me? What shall I do? whither shall I go? where shall I rest? These were thoughts that stood in great need of comfort.

The thoughts of sorrow are yet more distractive; and such were this royal Prophets: as our vulgar reads; In the multitude of the sorrows that I had in my heart. What was the cause of those griefs: The slipping of his foot, his errors, his deviations, his sins. Other sorrows may disquiet the soul: none but these have the promise to be comforted. As in martyrdom, it is not the sword or torture; not what we suffer, but why, that makes us martyrs. So in our sorrows, it is not how deep they penetrate, or how sharply they cruciate, but wherefore, that approves their goodness. If our sins be the why of our sorrows, we are blessed. Blessed are they that thus mourn, for they shall be comforted. Vain are the sighs and groans that proceed only from the thought of worldly losses. A medicine that cureth the eyes, we say, was made for the eyes, and for nothing else. We lose our wealth, and sorrow for it; will sorrow recover it? we are despised or abused, and grieve for it: will grief right us? We bury our friends, and mourn for them; will mourning restore them to us? we are crossed by our unruly children, and weep for it: will weeping rectify them? We are anguished in our bodies with pains and sickness, and are sorry for it: will sorrow heal us, nay will it not rather hurt us? All our thoughts, and cares, and griefs, and tears can do us no good, no relief in these calamities: sorrow was not made for these things. But we sin, and offend the Lord; and we are sorrowful for it; here is the disease for which sorrow is the proper remedy: penitent sorrow shall take away sin. Quamvis peccavit David, quod silent reges: tamen poenitentiam egit, flevit, jejunavit, quod non solent reges: saith Saint Ambrose, who wrote him an apology. While the ground of our lesson is our sin, the choicest descant on it must be our sorrow. Our thoughts and griefs may be many; but if they be not spent upon our sins, we shall not be comforted.

2. The number of them is a multitude: we may say of sorrows, as it is said of shrewd turns; they seldom come single. Like a volley of folding waves, one tumbling upon the neck of another; all threatening to overwhelm us: Undae super advenit unda. It is too scant a name which Leah gave her son, calling him Gad, a troop cometh: and but enough, what the demoniacke answered Christ: My name is Legion, for we are many. If they were a multitude, and not sorrows; the more the merryer: if they were sorrows, and not a multitude, then the fewer the better cheare. But to be disquieting thoughts, and a multitude, makes up a terrible agony. Many are the troubles of the righteous: great or many, a great many, a great deal too many; but for the comfort of the deliverance. When Jobs afflictions began, they came in troops and hurries. so thick that he could scarce take breath: one messenger pressing in with his-woeful relation, before the other could have ended his sad tale: While he was yet speaking. How did that fugitive Prophet amplify and aggravate his dangers? Thou hadst cast me into the deep, in the midst of the seas, and the floods compassed me about: all thy waves and billows passed over me. It was no shallow river, but the sea: not near the shore, but in the midst of the sea: nor was he floating on the waves, but plunged into the deep or bottom; the floods compassing, the billows overwhelming, to keep him down. I need not travel for exemplifications.

Let him be our instance, that spake what he felt, and felt what he spake; sorrows enough to break any heart, but that which God had framed according to his own. His son Amnon ravisheth his own sister, and is murdered by his own brother: that murder is seconded with Treason, that Treason with an incestuous constupration: the insurrection of his own son hath driven him from his house, from his throne, from the Ark of God all this went near him: that son is slain by his servant, and that went nearer him. In what a miserable perplexity may we think the heart of this good King all the while? Here was thought upon thought, thought against thought; how at once to spare the son of David, and to save the Father of Absalom: fear against hope, north against south, wind against tide, Arma armis contraria, fluctibus undae; a multitude of thoughts, able to rend the heart in pieces, but for that recollection of mercy, Thy comforts delight my soul.

Not seldom fares it thus with us; Thought calls to thought, jealousy to fear, fear to sorrow, sorrow to despair; and these furies leap upon the heart as a stage, beginning to act their tragical parts. Man hath more wheels moving in him than a clock: only the difference is, that the wheels of a clock move all one way; whereas his faculties, like the epicycles, have a wrapped motion: his sensitive appetite gives him one motion, his fantasie another, his reason a third, and his imperious, impetuons will crosseth them all, driving the chariot of his affections with the fury of Jehu: he desires, and thinks, and chooseth, argues, consents, and dislikes, and makes more business then time itself. There are not so many hours in a year, as there may be thoughts in an hour. The Philosopher that had shamed himself by weakly disputing with Adrian the Emperor, thus excused himself to his friend; Would you have me contend with him, that commands thirty Legions? Alas, what can quiet that soul, which is distracted with such legions and multitudes of thoughts, and throngs of sorrows?

3. The Captain of this troublesome rout is himself; My thoughts. From what suggestion soever our thoughts come, we call them our own: Whosoever begot the babe, the mother calls it her own child. Indeed, the praise and propriety of good motions we ascribe only to God, without whom we cannot so much as think a good thought: as the channel may gather filth of it self, but it cannot have a drop of pure water but from the fountain. Bad suggestions, though they proceed from Satan, we call them our own, because they are bred in the womb of our natural corruption: stubble is blown by the wind into the fire, and being inflamed, it becomes fire. The Devil tempted David to sin; yet he calls it his sin; not Satan's, but his own; I will be sorry for my sin. However Epictetus could say, when evil happens to a man, one of the vulgar would blame others, a young Philosopher would blame himself; but one that had dived into the depth of nature, would blame neither the one, nor the other: Yet a Christian hath learned to blame himself; as knowing that all his sorrows proceed from his sins.

My thoughts: thus easy is it with God to make a man become his own punisher. Under whose regiment are all these troubles? Under myself, My thoughts. As God threatens Tyre, that ancient and glorious City; that her own feet shall carry her a far off to sojourn: Our own feet shall carry us, our own creatures torment us: like diamonds, we are cut with our own dust. When David had numbered the people, his own heart smote him: God finds the rod within us, wherewith to scourge us. As some vapor engendered in the cavernes of the earth, struggles for vent; and being barred of free passage, causeth an earthquake in the foundations that bred it. Or as some fiery exhalation wrapped up in the bowels of a thick cloud, breaks through that watery resistance, and del•ers itself to the world with a dreadful noise. So the griefs and perturbations begotten by our own lusts, become terrors within us, and rend our very hearts, till they get vent by confession and repentance: thus do we muster up forces against our own peace. We pray, Lord deliver us from our enemies; and in that number we do wrap up our unthought of selves: for we are our own enemies. Turn thine hand upon mine enemies: for thou canst do it with the turning of an hand: Deliver me from the evil man: who is that? saith S. Augustine: he is not far to seek: libera me ab homine malo, that is, à meipso: deliver me from the evil man, that is, from myself: I am the aptest to beget destruction upon mine own soul: no enemy could hurt us, if we were our own friends.

But we must not extend it so far upon this holy King: they were thoughts indeed, and thoughts of sorrow, but of godly sorrow: and he calls them his own, to show his near acquaintance with them, My sorrows. He was not a stranger to his own soul, his heart was not dead flesh. Satan had given him a fall, and he felt not that: sin had given him diverse falls, and he felt not them, neither: at last God undertakes him, wrestles with him, and he gives him a fall too: he felt that, yea and that made him feel all the rest. Now is he sensible of every pang and stitch: the least thorn makes him smart, and he cries out of the multitude of his sorrows. There be some that can drown their griefs in wine and music, as they did in Hinnom, the cry of the Infants with the noise of the Instruments: as if they would forget that they are the owners of their own thoughts, because they trouble them. Many deal with their souls, as some old women do with looking glasses: they turn the wrong side toward them, that they might not see the furrows of their own faces. They are loath to think of a reckoning, least they should despair of making even the arrearages. Men have the courage to dare to sin, but they dare not look on their souls as they are polluted with sin. I have heard of a melancholy man, that would not believe he had a head, till his Physician made him a hat of lead, and put it on: which with the weight enforced him to cry, O his head. So men lost in sensual pleasures, scarce remember that they have a soul within them, until miseries, like talents of lead, or quarries of stone, with their heavy pressure squeeze out a confession.

Nothings be so near as a man and his soul: Tot a domus duo sunt; the whole household is but two: yea, why should they be called two? we may say in a right sense, Men's cujusque is est quisque: every man's soul is himself. If there be any division, sin made it: a just punishment, at qui nollet cum Deo uniri, non pos•it in semetipso non dividi. All these quarrels and brawls may thank sin: that is the makebate betwixt God and us, betwixt us and ourselves. But that man and his soul be grievously fallen out, that will not speak one to another: when he shall pass a whole day, and not ask his soul how she does? this were too much betwixt man and wife: when he shall he down in his bed, as the beast doth in his litter, without bidding his soul good-night: when he shall have fowled and besmeared his soul with the nasty aspersions of lusts, and not sweep out the dust before he shut the door, not wash his soul with tears, before his eye-lids be closed down with slumber: yea, when he shall have wounded his soul with blasphemies and uncharitable injuries, and then throw it down in a deluge of drink, as it were weltering in the own gore, without calling for repentance, the Surgeon to dress it. What madness and self-hatred is this? When the soul may not have leave to think over her own thoughts; to reflect upon herself, to search her own bruises, to survey the multitude of her sorrows, and feel in what need she stands of comforts? That, Plerisque notus, ignotus moriatur sibi? But the children of God have learned to commune with their own hearts, to examine every thought, and to weigh every desire in the balance of the Sanctuary. Whether they find themselves pensive or joyful, they will search the cause: As Rebecca said, when she felt the children struggle in her womb, Why am I thus? Whether fear or hope, joy or pain have invaded my thoughts, let me ask my soul the reason, Why am I thus? The Fathers were excellent good at this: they had their confessions and Soliloquies, familiar conferences with their own hearts; that when a man reads them, he would think they kept no other company but themselves. Conference with others may make us wise or learned, but conference with ourselves is the way to make us holy. Tell thy conscience of all suggestions, as the chaste wife (after some peremptory denials to her impudent Tempter) professed to tell her husband of those solicitations: such and such be my thoughts, thus and thus they haunt me, what shall I do with them? Indifferency is no less then selfetreachery, in matters of such consequence, that come so near me, as to be Apud me.

4. Within me, for this is the field where the skirmish is fought; within me. It is unhappy when soldiers march over the palaces of peace and seats of Justice, where the Senators of counsel use to sit. If there must be war, yet let it be in foreign Countries: or if it will be in our own land, yet let it proceed no further then the borders: but when it is gotten into the chief City, though it be subdued, it will cost a dear victory. As Pyrrhus, when his friends congratulated his victory over the Romans, with a great loss of his own side; replied; yes, but if we have such another victory, we are undone. There is no penitent heart, that hath felt the bitterness of these combats, remembering what sighs and sorrows, what groans and tears it cost him to make his peace, but would be loath to be put to the charges of such another conquest. Durius ejicitur, quam non admittitur hostis: sin may be kept out with ease, but will not be driven out save with woeful expenses.

Within me: not before me, as the host of the Philistines lay before Saul; not behind me, as the chariots of Egypt came thundering behind Israel: nor above me, as Fabius Maximus on the mountain above Hanibal; Imminet nubes, a cloud hangs over me: not round about me, as the Syrians compassed Dothan to take Elisha: but within me. Without were fightings, within were fears: and those fears within, were worse then those fightings without. There are external calamities able enough to shake the most fortified soul: but Summus dolor ab intus. Saint Paul reckons up twelve of his inflicted sufferings, nine dangers, eight continued passions: yet as if all these were scarce worth putting into the catalogue, he adds; Besides the things that are without, he had an inward trouble: the care of the Churches, seeking the lost, rebuking the proud, comforting the dejected: here was the pain.

Within me. There may be Bellum intestinum, a kind of unkind battle; where victi victoresque invicem dolent: the soul bespeaking her affections, as Jocasta did her quarrelling sons, Bellageri placuit, nullos habitura triumphos.

According to our Savior's prediction; A man's foes shall be they of his own household. Intra me est, quod contra me est: that is within me, which is against me. We say, he wants an enemy that fights with himself: and because he fights with himself, he wants no enemy: Sibi pessimus hostis. With external assaults we may grapple, threatened mischiefs we may prevent; from persecutors too potent for us, we may hide us: but who shall keep us from ourselves? Nescis temeraria, nescis quem fugias, ideoque fugis: Whithersoever we remove, we carry our sorrows with us. Outward afflictions are a war, turbulent affections a worse war: both against us, but this later is within us. He needs no other misery, that is troubled within himself. Ask not the anger of heaven, nor the trouble of earth, nor the dangers of the sea, nor the malice of hell, against him whom the anguish of his own thoughts have beaten down. He will say to all other miserable complainers, you are happy. Outward things may go cross with us, and yet the peace of the soul remain sound: but a wounded spirit who can bear? who can cure? As man's heart is the first that lives, and the last that die s: so it is the first that Satan assaults, and the last that he gives over. Yea, were there never a devil, the heart hath an ill spirit of its own to vex it. As some Boroughs of this Land plead a privilege, that they can hang and draw within themselves: Mans heart is such a corporation; it can execute itself within itself, without any foreign Judge or executioner. If we look no further then among the multitude of our thoughts; might we not make a shift to think ourselves to hell? If we had neither hands, nor eyes, nor feet, would not our hearts find the way thither!

Within me. The proper seat and lodging of these troublesome inmates, the thoughts of sorrow, is the heart: whithersoever they wander, there they center. Vagabonds taken roving out of their own precincts, are sent with a passport to the Town where they were borne▪ there they must be kept. Extravagant thoughts may rove up and down, but back again they must to the heart: the house that hatched them, must harbor them, must answer for them. As all faculties of sense have their several seats: seeing is confined to the the eyes, hearing to the ears, feeling to the flesh and sinews: so these perturbations are limited to the heart. The local seat of the sensitive apprehension is the brain; of the sensitive affection, the heart. In the former is softness and moisture, fit to receive intelligible forms: in the other are fiery spirits, fittest for passionate and affectionate thoughts. My spirit is overwhelmed, and my heart within me is disolate: In such a distress, let sense inform reason, reason speak to will, will to conscience, conscience to faith, faith to Christ, and Christ to his Father; and they will both send the holy Ghost to comfort us. If there be a fire in the heart of a City, all the suburbs will come in to quench it. This fire may burn within, but it will break out. It is as easy to stifle thunder in the cloud, or fire in powder, as sorrow in the heart. It will have eruption, either by the voice in cries, or by the eyes in tears, or by the speaking silence of the look in a dejected heaviness. The seat of sorrow is the soul; but it will overflow the boundaries. Why art thou cast down, O my soul? None ask their eyes why they weep, or their voices why they lament, or their hands why they wring themselves: but Anima, quare tam tristis? O my soul, why art thou disquieted within me?

We see now the full advancement of the misery; The thoughts of sorrow, an Army of those thoughts, the combination of that army, the terror of that combination: how miserably must the Country suffer where these rebels march? who can tell the taking of that heart, which feels this combustion within it self? These be our enemies, where are our friends? The day is like to be fatally disastrous, if we have no defensive forces. Yes, the Lord shall fight for us, and we will hold our peace: as Moses comforted Israel when the choice was hard; whether to trust the fury of the sea before them, or of the Egyptians behind them; Fear not, stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord; Thy comforts delight my soul. Now are the white ensigns of mercy displayed against these bloody streamers: never to a handful of men almost famished in a fort, did the tidings of fresh aid to raise the siege, arrive more welcome. Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. Though this multitude of oppressors overlay my heart, yet Lord, if thou comest, my soul shall not perish. Let your patience sit out the success of the battle; and though I wish you not such conflicts; yet if they do come, may you never fail of such comforts. Thy comforts delight my soul.

1. Quanta, They are no less than comforts: not presumptions, nor promises, nor mere hopes, but solid and sensible comforts. God made comfort on purpose for sorrow: as mercy would want a subject to exercise upon, but for misery. The blessed Angels are not said to be comforted (as we use the word) because they never knew what heaviness meant: they are conserved, they are confirmed, not (properly) comforted. There may be joy without any antecedent sorrow; as the Angelical spirits ever were, and ever shall be filled with unspeakable joy. But comfort is the proper physic for trouble; this happy nature was not ordained but for sorrow. There be some that ducunt in bonis dies suos, that have their ways strawed with roses and violets; who move only the paces of pleasure: these have no need of Comfort. What Physician ministers cordials to the strong and healthful constitution? It is the broad thoroughfare of the world, which the Devil is so studious to smooth, that he leaves not a pebble in the way to offend them: as if he were that tutelar Angel, who hath a charge to look to them, that they dash not their foot against a stone. If they sigh, he sings to them: if they sleep, he sits by them; whispering to all troubles, (as the the Spouse to the daughters of Jerusalem) I charge you, O ye transgressions of his heart, waken him not till he please: Let there be no noise of fear, no alarm of repentance, no susurrations of conscience to molest him: peace, peace, lie down in peace, with thy warm sins cleaving to thy bosom. The Prophet gives you their character; They lie upon beds of ivory, and eat the lambs out of the flock, and calves out of the stall; they chant to the sound of viols, and dance to Instruments, and drink wine in bowls; what should these men do with comforts? Joy, and nothing else but the voice of joy resounds in their habitations. It is poor afflicted Joseph, not they, that needs comfort.

Consolation then is made for sorrow; and not for every sorrow neither. Some is produced by no other cause but temporal losses, pains or injuries: so Esau may mourn long enough without recovery of his Fathers blessing. Worldly sorrow bringeth death, not delight to the soul. Many weep, as Rachel did in Ramah, for her children, because they were not: but they neither are, nor ever will be comforted. There are tears that got sinful Esau nothing, and there be tears that got sinful Mary salvation. If the sorrow that swells our bosom with sighs, and is ready to burst our hearts, be spent upon our sins, it shall be sure of comforts. Are we full of grief within, and find no vent but by the groans and tears of repentance? God may let us bleed for a while, till we be thoroughly humbled: but then, like the woman, the pangs of whose travel be over, the son of joy shall be borne in our souls, even that son which the blessed Virgin bore from her womb; Filius dilectionis, Filius delectationis, Jesus Christ.

2. Quota, there is a plurality of them; many Comforts. What should encounter with sorrow, but comfort? Comfort therefore it is for the nature. What should oppose a multitude, but a multitude? Many comforts therefore they are for their number. Are we troubled with the wants and miseries of this life? we have a comfort for that: The Lord is my portion: He is my shepherd, I shall lack nothing. Do we sink under the burden of our transgressions? we have a comfort for that: Mary Magdalene heard it, to quiet all her storms; Thy sins are forgiven thee. Are we haunted with temptations, hurried with persecutions? we have a comfort for this; I will be with thee in trouble, saith the Lord. Let your Christian experience supply here my defects of remembrance: I will sum up these comforts in a word: The Lord is gracious, and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repenteth him of the evil. We read of certain Fair havens near Candie: here be five fountains of comfort, like those fair havens; as welcome for harbor and rode of a sea-beaten conscience, as ever the bosom of mother was to the tender Infant. Drink at the first fountain, The Lord is gracious, free in his favors: if your thirst be not satisfied, go to the second; He is merciful, he hath bowels of commiseration: if not yet, press to the next; He is slow to anger, hard to conceive it, not willing to retain it: wish we more? He is of great kindness, in the number and measure of his blessings: There is yet another well of comfort behind; Repenting him of the evil: full often doth he turn aside his blows, and is easily entreated to have the rod pulled out of his hands. David, to encounter with the Giant, took five smooth stones out of the brook: here is the brook, and these the five smooth stones: let them not lie in the channel unused, but put them in your vessels, bear them in your hearts: whensoever you are defied and assaulted by that monstrous Philistim, Satan; one of these comforts, like David's stone, shall sink into his forehead, and confound him.

How happily do these comforts meet with those sorrows! we are troubled with the sense of our sins, and of God's Judgment upon them: how should his Justice acquit us? yet there is comfort; the Lord is gracious, and cannot deny himself. But we are unworthy of this grace, because we have turned it into wantonness: yet there is comfort: he is merciful, and showeth most pity where is most need. But we have multiplied offenses, and continued in our sins to our gray hairs: yet there is comfort: He is slow to anger, evermore blessed for his long sufferance. But our iniquities be not of an ordinary quality, they are heinous and intolerable: yet there is comfort, for he is of great kindness; our wickedness cannot be so great as his kindness: of that there is no comprehension. But we are out of his favor, because he hath smitten us, our bodies with sore diseases, our souls with agonies, our families with privations: yet their is comfort, he will repent of the evil. In the hour of death, when the senses are past working, the understanding asleep, the body in a cold and benumbed sweat, these comforts never leave us, Return unto thy rest, O my soul.

Our comforts vie number with our sorrows, and win the game. The mercies of God passed over in a gross sum, breed no admiration; but cast up the particulars, and then Arithmetic is too dull an art to number them. As many dusts as a man's hand can hold, is but his handful of so many dusts: but tell them one by one, and they exceed all numeration. It was but a crown which King Solomon wore: but weigh the gold, tell the precious stones, value the richnesse of it; what was it then? Jerusalem was but a city: but go round about it, mark the towers, tell the bulwarks, observe the magnificent buildings: so consider the infinite variety of these comforts! Come, and I will tell you what God hath done formy soul: I never felt that sorrow, for which he gave me not a sovereign comfort. Sennacherib invaded Israel with a mighty host; yet the undaunted courage of Hezekiah found more with him, then could be against him: and Sennacherib found it so too, to his cost, when he lost almost two hundred thousand of his army in one night. The Prophets servant rising early in the morning, sees the City besieged with a fearful host of foot, horse, chariots: his eyes could meet with nothing but woods of pikes, walls of harness, and luster of metals, and he runs in with this affrighting news to his Master, Alas, what shall we do? Quiet Elisha sits in his chamber as secure, as if all these had been the guard of Israel, sent for his safe protection; Fear not. This was an hard precept: as well might he have bidden him not to see what he saw, as not to fear seeing so dreadful a spectacle. But the task is easy, if the next words find belief; They that be with us, are more then they that be with them. If the eyes of our faith be as open as those of our sense, to see Angels as well as Syrians, to perceive comforts as well as sorrows, we cannot be appalled with the most unequal number of enemies. Many, O Lord, are thy wonderful works which thou hast done for us, they cannot be reckoned. O God, what is man, that thenart so mindful of him? Yea, O man, what is God; that thou art so unmindful of him? All the works of God are excellent, and ought to be had in remembrance: alas, that we should ever forget any of these works, that are of mercy and comfort which he hath done for our souls: For he alone hath done them: that is the next point.

3. Cujus, whose they are; Thy comforts. Troubles may be of our own begetting; but true comforts come only from that infinite fountain, the God of consolation; for so he hath styled himself. The eagle at her highest flight will not lose the sight of her young ones: if she perceive any danger approaching, down she comes again to their defense. Christ is indeed ascended up on high; yet he hath a favorable eye to his servants below: no Saul can breath out threataings against them, without a Quid me perfequeris? Nec timeas hostem fortem, qui Ducem habes fortiorem: Let God arise, and let his enemies be scattered: There is none that fighteth for us, but only thou O God. Cujusquam est rem publicam movere, Dei solius quietare. Our own hearts can distract themselves, there is nothing to settle them, but what the God of peace puts in. Who can reconcile a man fallen out with himself? yea, fallen from himself? None but the God of comfort: who when the earth was void, without form, darkness on the face of the deep; day and night, land & water undistinguished, could reduce all this misshapen chaos of the world to form and order: when father, mother, brethren, kindred, friends, neighbours, and a man's own heart forsakes him, then God takes him up. The structure of Jericho was not more pleasant, then the waters were unwholesome, and thereby the soil corrupt: Elisha cures them with a cruse-full of salt: Our hearts are full of thoughts, but they be noxious: yet if God throw into those fountains a handful of saving grace, we shall be whole. Our sorrows too often would break our hearts, but (O God) for thy comforts: it is thou only that canst make these weak vessels hold such scalding liquors, and not burst.

There is combustion of these thoughts within us, til God part the fray, and pacify the tumult: as when scholars are loud in brawls, the very sight of their master husheth them. When my heart, like the sea in a storm, is troubled; the winds raging, the waves roaring; Thy comforts, like Christ's command, turns all into a calm. I thought on thee in the night season, and received comfort. In the night, the region of fear: in darkness, the opportunity of despair: in solitariness, the full advantage of sorrow: upon an unsleeping bed, the field of troublous thoughts: yet I did but think on thee, and before I came to meditate, to pray, to send up my soul unto thee, in that first thought I received comfort. O how short do all worldly things come of this sufficiency? If the heart be wounded with sorrow, in vain is all the Chirurgery of nature. Gold is no restorative, riches no cordial, yea they may be a corrosive: we say to wine, thy spirits are dull; to laughter, thou art mad: music grates the ear, and physic loathes the palate: company is tedious, and solitude dangerous: alas, what hope can there be, till the God of comfort comes? Saul's evil spirit will not leave him, til he be dispossessed by David's harp: we find as much ease, when we rest our hearts upon temporal things, as he that laid him down to rest upon the cold earth, with a pitcher under his head: and finding the pillow too hard, he rose and stopped it with feathers, thinking that then it would be wondrous easy. So be all temporary things to the soul, even when they are filled with the choicest mirth, nothing but vanity and vexation of spirit: not only vanity in their entertainment, but vexation in their farewell. Yet, O Lord, Thy comforts

4. Delight the soul; which is the last circumstance, the effect of all. All God's war is for peace: Pacem habet voluntas, bellum necessitas. We should never have felt such a conflict, if God had not intended us such a conquest. Sin disquiets the heart; yet through his grace, this disquiet breeds repentance, repentance procureth forgiveness, forgiveness restoreth peace, and peace delights the soul. The sharpness of the trouble advanceth the sweetness of the joy: as Christ's sufferings abound, so his comforts superabound. Every penitent tear that falls from the eye, springs up a flower of comfort. Look how full the vessels were of water, so full doth our Savior render them of wine. In hell are all sorrows without any comforts: in heaven are all comforts, without any sorrows: on earth, good and bad, sweet and sour, miseries and mercies, sorrows and comforts are blended together. If here were nothing but sorrows, earth would be thought hell; if nothing but comforts, it would be thought heaven. But that we may know it to be, as indeed it is, neither heaven nor hell, but between both, and the way to either; we have a vicissitude of troubles and delights. That as of old they painted King Solomon; because learned men were divided in their opinions of him; some casting him to hell, others advancing him to heaven: therefore a third moderate sort painted him half in heaven, and half in hell: so the Christian, in regard of his sorrows, seems half confounded; and in respect of his comforts, half saved. But as indeed, Solomon after all his errors found mercy; so the Christian after all his sorrows shall find comfort. His beginning may seem troublesome, his proceeding not delightful, but his later end is peace. Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace. His heart was troubled, his soul shall be delighted.

As the grievances of the soul be most dangerous in respect of their nature, so they are also abundant in their number. Therefore let our care be to seek out that great Elixar, that most sovereign and universal Antidote and Cordial.

One soul complains; I have obloquies, reproaches, calumniation cast upon me; which render me contemptible to good societies. Morality would thus argue with the heart. Bee these imputations, thus charged upon me, true or false? If true, let the integrity of thy future conversation so convince thy associates, that they shall both suspect those reports, and rest assured of thy constant goodness.

But the Divine grace applies a more virtual medicine to thy conscience, which shall revive, either thy patience, or thy repentance. The soul shall argue with itself: If these imputations be true, here is work for my repentance; I will weep in secret for my sins. If false, let them not trouble me: It is the slanderers sin, not mine: neither am I bound to father another's bastard. But still upon this calumny, the world condemns me: but thy faith and patience assures thee, that thou shalt not be condemned with the world. Yea, there is yet a higher degree of honor belonging to thy patience. Have not the best men been traduced? Was not the best of men, God and man blasphemed? yea even upon the Cross, he was jeered when he died, by some of them for whom he died. Thus do the comforts of God requite thee; that in all this thou art (in thy measure) conformable to the sufferings of Christ. So dost thou allay all these furious tempests with one breath of faithful ejaculation; Thy comforts delight my soul.

Another complains; I am fallen from an affluent estate, to deep indigence. I have kept hospitality, to entertain friends: and made charity the Porch of my house, to relieve the needy ones. The vessel of my means is now drawn out to the bottom, there is not sufficient provision left for my own family.

Inquire of thy heart, whether this decay did not come by thy own riot, or through the vainglorious affectation of an abundant hospitality. If this, or that, or any other habitual sin, were the cause of it, begin with mortification there. First, mourn for thy sins: then faithfully depend upon thy Creators providence, and thou canst not fail of convenient sustenance.

But it may be, that this is not the complainants case: he is not taken with a tabe or wasting of his substance; like a scarce sensible consumption of his bodily vitalls. But his fall is with a precipice; from a sublime Pinacle of honor, to a deep puddle of penury. Such was Jobs condition, so did he fall; from being rich and happy in the Adverb, to be poor and miserable even to a Proverb. He had not only abundance of good about him; but Omnia been, all went well with him. Yet how suddenly did he fall from this abundant prosperity, to the depth of miserable poverty! Did he now follow the suggestions of that corrupt nature, which lay in his bosom, and whispered to him on his pillow; Curse God and die? No, but he apprehended the inspiration of grace; Bless God, and live. So his last days were better then his first. That infinite mercy did so crown his patience with triumph, that his temporal estate was doubled. Yea, but what posterity had he left to enjoy it after him? Yes, for even the number of his children was doubled too. For besides those seven Sons and three Daughters, which were now with his Father in Heaven; he had also seven Sons and three Daughters with himself upon Earth. Piety and Patience cannot be cast down so low, but that the hand of mercy can raise it up again. In the multitude of all my losses and crosses, O Lord thy Comforts have delighted my soul.

But another, that hath heard all this sad Story, and seen the comfortable end sent of the Lord, is not satisfied, because himself is not redressed. Like a coward in wars that looks for the victory, before he gives one stroke in the battle. What merchant looks to be landed in the place of traffick, before he hath past his adventure upon the seas? Still saith such a repiner; I am in distress, and want even necessaries. But still, thou, and we all, must suffer much more, before it can be said of us, Here is the faith and patience of the Saints. Still O my soul, wait thou upon the Lord, thy most faithful Creator: he will in his good pleasure, open his hand, and fill thee with plenteousness. Be thou penitent before him, patient under him, confident in him, and thou shalt have a bundant cause to be thankful to him: Thy end shall be peace, and comfort in Jesus Christ.

Yea, even now, in this dead low waters of fugitive fortunes, my soul confesseth, that I have the highest wealth. For Christ's righteousness is my riches, his merits is my inexhaustible exchequer, his blood hath filld my veins with most lively vigor. My treasure is in heaven, where no violence can take it from me. Stil and forever, O God, thy comforts delight my soul.

It is another's complaint; I am shut up in a close prison, where I can neither converse with others abroad, nor let in others to communicate with me, in this my confined home. The sparrow on the house-top hath more freedom then I; For that, though wanting a mate, hath an open air to fly in, and may so invite company to solace her, I have no society, but my disconsolate thoughts: no friend, to ask me so much, as how I do?

Yet is thy soul at liberty: no barricadoed walls, no iron-gates or grates, no dark dungeons can imprison that. The Jail is a strong prison to thy body, and thy body is but (in a metaphorical phrase) a prison to thy soul; Thy body may not walk abroad, thy soul can. Spite of all thy cruel creditors, and some unmerciful Jailors; she can break Prison: She hath wings that can mount her through clouds and mountains, through orbs and constellations, and (like to Enoch) walk with God, in a heavenly contemplation of his infinite goodness. My ears cannot hear those airy Choristers, singing their Creators praise in the groves: my soul, in speculation, can hear the Anthems of Angels in heaven. I may not hear the Hosanna's of the Church militant in our material Temples below: I may conceive, that my soul hears the Hallelujahs of the Church triumphant above. I may not walk in the green pastures, and flowry meadows on earth: my soul may move in the glorious and melodious galleries of heaven. Thus O Lord, though in my strictest confinement here below, thou hast given me large liberty above. Still I will glorify thee for all thy mercies, for thy comforts delight my soul.

Another's complaint is; I am vexed with a multitude of troubles. Not the law of the sword, but the sword of the law hath disquieted me. Let thy soul ask thy conscience this question: who did first break the peace? If thou hast first overwhelmed that truth, which should be apparent, thou art thine own enemy: For truth smothered in wet straw, will at length overcome the danknesse of that suppression, and set on fire the smotherers. Thou hast forsaken the truth, and art therefore forsaken of peace.

There be two chief preservers of the soul, under the Almighty Creator of it; Truth and Peace. How invaluable are they together; Parted, how miserable! truth is the precious stone: Peace, the gold, wherein it is both set and preserved. Truth is the glorious light of the Sun; Peace, a clear and serene heaven. Peace is a most beautiful body, whilst it contains Truth, that more lovely soul. Truth brings down heaven to us, Peace bears us up to heaven. Both are sisters, the daughters of one Father, God himself.

Do thou first recover truth: by continual labor seek it, with prayers and tears beg it, with the expense of much sorrow buy it, and then peace will come in to the bargain: God's comfort shall again delight thy soul.

Another complains; I am cast out of doors: I have no harbor but the hedges; nor lodging, but the fruitless ground. Poverty hath sent out her excommunication against me: all that have an estate, are forewarned to shun my company.

Consider, when had Jacob so sweet a nights rest, as when the pillow he laid his head upon was a hard stone? Then was that ladder set by him, by which his soul might climb up to heaven in a vision, whereof before he had but the speculation. The Angels were dancing those measures, and singing those raptures about him, which did in a manner angelify him. His body lay on the bare earth, his soul with those spiritual wings of faith and love, was mounted above the clouds, above the orbs, even conversant in the highest heavens.

When had Elias more excellent provision then when his breakfast was brought him in the morning, and his supper in the evening, by a raven? The messenger was homely, but the diet was heavenly. It came from the table of that great King, whose hospitality feeds, not only men; but even the fowls of the air, the beasts upon earth, and the fishes in the sea. The Prophets lodging was but a Field-bed, yet even then and there, the Lions were a guard about him, the tutelar Angels did round him, and the Divine providence preserved him.

If we be destitute of other lodging, and be driven to the common earth, yet we have a house over our heads, not made with hands, but an eternal mansion in the heavens. There is also a canopy for us, a roof arched over with the two Poles, and set with innumerable glistening stars. Yea; there is an omnipotent love that protects us; a material heaven encompassing us, and a spiritual heaven within us, the peace of a good conscience, assuring us, of our eternal salvation through Christ Jesus. This is a softer lodging then the cabbins of merchants, or the Hamachs of sea-farers; yea then the most curious beds that the harbengers can provide for Princes. O how sweetly doth the Christian rest, when he hears that voice from the Oracle of goodness; My grace is sufficient for thee, My comforts shall delight thy soul.

But another's complaint is; I am perplexed with sickness: I am a mark against which pain shoots his arrows: I wast away with languishments, as ice is dissolved by heat into water. Rest patient; this consumption shall be consumed. Death, that universal executioner of mankind, shall be executed. Time shall cut off Death, and Eternity shall make an end of Time. Death shall have no grave left for his monument, or trophee of his victories: and the Angel hath sworn, that time shall be no more. Thy sickness may outlast thy Physician, but thy soul shall outlive thy sickness, and nothing shall outlive thy soul.

But the pangs of my body are so violent, that they assault me with distraction. Fear not: they may beleaguer thee with distrust, but never overcome that faith, which thou puttest in this God of consolation. He is a most faithful Creator, and will servare depositum, keep that soul safe, with which the believer hath instrusted him. The breaches of the body are the souls windows, and afford her a more clear prospect into heaven, inkindling her with an ardent desire to be with God in glory. Jobs abundant sores would have bred in him a continuity of sorrows; but for that antidote of faith, and saving cordial of hope, that his eyes should see his Redeemer in blessedness.

The smiling Sun flatters the traveler out of his cloak, whereas the robustious wind causeth him to wrap it the closer about him. God forbid that Christian Religion should be but a cloak: yet the outward profession of it is somewhat loosened by wanton healths; and sickness wins it more inwardly to the heart. Experienced merchants tell us, that in the hottest Countries, they find most comfort in the hottest drinks. A wonder to us that live in the cold climates: but that the Suns adventitions heat so sucks out the radical moisture and spirits, that it leaves the heart feeble, and destitute of the natural comforts. It is a maxim in Philosophy, that one heat avocates another: the greater, the less. The heat of the Sun draws forth the heat of the heart, and leaves it fainting. Poor Lazarus with his scraps and scabs, was yet in a better condition then the rich man with his Princely Wardrobe, and his costly Viands. Continued health hath maintained wanton desires and delights upon earth: but sickness hath sent many souls up to Heaven. Yea Lord, even with sickness afflict my body, so that thy Heavenly Comforts do delight my soul.

It is a general complaint; Afflictions environ me. In my short pilgrimage, through the sharp wilderness of this world, on the one side the Thorns wound me, the Briers and Brambles scratch me on the other. This is not only the deserved penalty of sinful nature; Man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upwards, But even a kind of fatality inseparable to militant grace; All that will live godly in Christ, shall suffer persecution. That is a rare path upon earth, which hath never a rub: and a calm passage by water, that escapes all molestation. But more,

Be there not some Afflictions, that conduce much to our preservation? We have found, that the falling into one grievous sin, the worst of all dangers, hath brought us to repentance, one of the best preservatives. I have heard some Seamen report by experience, that in a tempest, some raging billow hath swept a man from off the Decks into the main Ocean: yet another wave on the other side, hath tossed him up into the ship again: so that he was only drenched; but not drowned. The violent pressure of one Affliction hath sunk a man to distrust in God: another with a more furious Storm hath left him destitute of all earthly succor: He now resolves, the world hath forsaken me, I will never look for relief from it. But my God hath not forsaken me, he never will forsake them that trust in him through Jesus Christ. To him I fly, upon him I rely: he will not suffer me to perish. Still, O Lord, in all my extremities Thy comforts delight my soul.

Not offering to number man's grievances, which be innumerable; there is yet the last, and it may prove the best, complaint remaining.

I am perplexed with the woeful consideration of my sins; those bitter things which God writes against me, the irksome recollection of my transgressions. I can argue with Philosophers, consult with Politicians, hear the ingenious fancies of Poets, reason in domestic concernments, enjoy the company of moral and harmless friends with delight. I can pray with confidence to be heard, and satisfied; I do hope with some assurance of salvation; I sleep upon a peaceful pillow, Thus far I am in a calm and serene hemisphere, and quiet be all my thoughts.

But after all this Sunshine, there ariseth a tempest. When I do recollect, or be represented unto my conscience, my innumerable, incomparable, intolerable sins; the remembrance of them is so frightful, the burden of them is so unsupportable, that I dare not even look up unto Heaven. Faith lies fainting, hope is in a swoon, fear stands by the bed side, despair lies gaping at the chamber door, my soul is in an ecstasy. I am weary of all company, but those that speak of mercy. I sit mourning all the day long: Sorrow and solitude are my associates: I do shed some tears, and would weep tears of blood for my sins. I lament because my sorrows are not greater for offending my God.

Well, yet hear the Physician of souls speaks to thee from Heaven. Weep on, bleed on, this bleeding shall not be unto death. Jesus Christ hath a Balsam, that shall not only stanch thy bleeding, but fill the veins of thy soul with comfort. His blood is an Antidote for thine. One drop of that shall satisfy for more sins, then ever thou hast committed.

Weep on for thy Transgressions: Those floods of tears shall not drown thee. Yea rather, like the waters of that universal Deluge, in that saving Ark Christ Jesus, they shall bear up thy soul higher towards Heaven. They shall not drown thee, yea they shall rather save thee from being drowned. This is that Secunda Tabula, after shipwreck; the main plank that shall preserve thee from perishing, emergent repentance.

There be two most Valiant and Puissant soldiers, that are the Souls Champions, Faith and Repentance. They fight not only against lust and sin, those Giants of the world: but even against Principalities and Powers, those infernal spirits of darkness. Faith hath her weapons and Forces, but Repentance hath many disadvantages.

1. Other Soldiers fight standing, she kneeling: They in a posture confronting their enemies, she in humiliation, though not tergiversation from her opposites. They send forth their messengers of death in thundering ordnance: all her thunder is sighs and groans sent up to Heaven for mercies. They let fly their fiery Engines of destruction: she hath only her ejaculations: Her most piercing darts, be broken hearts. Their shafts are winged with fire, her arrows are feathered with water, her own soft tears. They swallow up the hope of victory with insulation: she in an humble prostration expects pity. Yet the God of all power and mercy, whom she beleaguers in Heaven, yields her the conquest. He comes from his impregnable Throne by his most gracious favor, and instead of confounding her as a Rebel, he useth her as a Friend, or Daughter. He takes her up from her knees, he wipes away all her tears, he folds her in his arms, he seals her a pardon of all sins, and assures her of an everlasting Kingdom in Heaven. O victorious Repentance! yea rather, O triumphant Goodness! O God, Teipsum vincis, thou even overcomest thyself, that thy Comforts may delight our souls.

It is reported of Alexander, that when he thought (and did but think so) he had conquered all this world, he fell a weeping, that there were no more worlds to conquer. But there was remaining another world, a better then ever Alexander discovered. But this was not for an Alexander by force of Arms, but for a Mary Magdalene by force of tears, to overcome.

It is true, that the Kingdom of Heaven suffers violence: but the way of Conquest is not through the blood of bodies, but through a flood of tears, gushing out for our sins. This is such a stratagem of war, such a policy of Conquest, as the great Monarchs of the world never understood: Yet even this through faith overcomes the world.

Faith hath a plot, which she hath taught her daughter Repentance, Concedendo superare, to overcome by yielding. It is a stratagem among Wrastlers, that if a man can get himself under his antagonist, he lifts him up, the sooner to cast him down; yea, to give him the greater fall. Repentance stoops as low as she can: she lies, like Joshua, upon the bare earth, yea wollowes in dust and ashes. She holds herself not worthy to be God's footstool: let him trample upon her, and tread her under his feet, she still holds him by the feet, washeth them with her tears, and wipeth them with the hairs of her head, and kisseth them, though she be spurned by them. Doth this humble prostration provoke fury? No, it rather invites mercy. Parcere prostratis scit nobilis ira Leonis: The Lyon of the Tribe of Judah, will spare such Lambs of humiliation; and in the pastures of consolation; he will both feed and preserve them. That thunder which dissolves the stubborn metal, yet spares the yielding purse: When power and policy have spent their spirits, submission is found the only way of Conquest. The feafull thunder of vengeance is resisted by the soft wool of repentance.

2. Yet hath this blessed grace another disadvantage. Faith, the chief of all the Forces, may be sometimes benighted, through the conglomeration of the clouds condensed by our sins. Hope may be eclipsed, by the interposition of the earth, our worldly imaginations, betwixt us and that great luminary of heaven, the Sun of righteousness; The century of watchful conscience, may be overcome with security. Sin is a subtle enemy, and his father, the Devil will show him the opportunity. Now is the time of invasion: seise on them, and cut all their throats. What shall repentance now do, when faith, the great Lady general droops; and Hope, her Lieutenant general is fainting? when the whole century is overcome with slumber?

Yes, there is a watchman in the tower of the soul, that doth seldom sleep; holy Fear. He wakens conscience, conscience calls up faith, faith rouzeth hope, hope cries aloud to repentance, repentance troops all the spiritual forces, the martial music gives the alarm, the soldiers are in battle-array, the enemies fly, the mind is at peace, because God's comforts have delighted the soul.

3. One disadvantage more makes dangerous work for repentance. The troops of faith are routed, one wing of hope is cut off. Yet this conquering Queen of the Viragines, or maiden-graces, always bears up the Rear, and never appears till the day be almost lost. When those great Commanders, Innocency and Righteousness are foiled, and beaten, and have their Queen the soul, in danger to be taken and slain by sin and Satan, her old adversaries; Then this Virgo, Virago, that all this while lay in expectation of the event; this martial Maid, victorious Repentance comes in with her Reserve, sets upon the conquerors with her fresh forces, rescues the Queen, our soul, puts the great general Satan to flight, and does impartial execution upon all his soldiers, which be our sins.

Thus one grace begets another, by a supernatural generation, til they increase in number and measure, by the Divine inspiration. Faith calls up repentance, repentance brings in pardon and forgiveness, pardon leads in comfort, and thus, O my God, Thy comforts delight my soul.

4. When God, by the preaching of his law, hath broken up the fallow ground of our hearts, and by the applying of his Gospel hath sown the seed of eternal life in those furrows, he looks that we should bestow our labor in the watering of this plantation. The ground is his, for he made it: the seed is his, for he gives it: the harvest is his, and he owns it. Yet such is the bounty of his goodness, that he gives his farmers the fruits of it. The rent of that great Landlords glory being truly paid, the product is ours, even the comfort and salvation of our poor souls. All our pains is, but to hook up the weeds, that would hinder the growth of the corn, and dew the furrows with our tears, that it may spring up with cheerfulness. But when the reaping-time comes, the whole crop is ours: and we come home singing with joy and thankfulness; Thy comforts have delighted our souls. When those glorious reapers, the Angels shall bear up our souls to heaven, like sheaves into the barn, we shall sing harvest-home, & glorify our infinite good God, and our sweet Saviour Jesus Christ.

To conclude, crosses are but the pursuivants to fetch in repentance: and afflictions, but God's letters, missive formortification. When we are fallen into some heinous transgressions, we may better say then in our other trouble, this will cost hot water: For so it will indeed: it will cost the hot waters of our tears from our eyes, or it will cost the warm blood of our hearts. Our godly sorrow for our sins, is like the Pool of Bethesda: when that Angel from heaven, gracious repentance hath troubled the waters, the lazarous soul does but step into them, and is cured. For all our spiritual diseases, this is the remedy, upon which we may safely write, Probatum est.

We have made ourselves sick by sinning: God is the Physician, and he prescribes: Affliction is the Apothecary, and he prepares: the Medicine is Repentance, and that infallibly cures. It is a broken heart that makes us whole. God loves a true heart, and a clean heart, and an honest heart, and an humble heart: yea and he loves a broken heart too. The broken and contrite heart, O God thou wilt not despise. It is true, that we are bound to love him with our whole heart: but if it be broken with penitential sorrow for sin, he will heal the fracture, redintegrate the heart, and reaccept it wholly to himself. A contrite heart, broken in pieces with sorrow, and pickled up in brinish tears, is a sacrifice that God will not reject.

Whosoever hath such a heart, let him make much of it: It is a dish for the king of kings. Sin, Repentance and Pardon, are like to the three vernall months of the year, March, April, and May. Sin comes in like March blustering, stormy, and full of bold violence. Repentance succeeds like April, showring, weeping, and full of tears. Pardon follows like May, springing, singing, full of joys, and flowers. If our hands have been full of March, with the tempests of unrighteousness: our eyes must be full of April, with the sorrow of repentance: & then our hearts shall be full of May, in the true joy of forgiveness.

His soul; as there be no comforts like those of God; so there is nothing to which comforts are so welcome, as to the soul. The pleasure which the body takes, is but the body, yea scarce the very shadow of pleasure: the soul of pleasure is the pleasure of the soul. There be many things pleasing to the body, wherein the sanctified soul takes no delight, especially in the day of trouble. In calamity, good nourishments are comfortable, good words are comfortable, good friends are comfortable, the Physician is comfortable, the Divine comfortable, a good spouse specially comfortable: but in respect of these comforts, which pass all understanding, we may say of the rest, as Job did to his visitant friends, Miserable comforters are ye all. But blessed are the souls upon whom this Sun of comfort shineth: and happy are those showers of fears and sorrows, that shall be dried up with such beams of comforts: and blessed be God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort. To whom, with the Son, and Holy Ghost, be all praise and glory, forever and ever.

Amen.

HEAVEN and EARTH Reconcil'd.

A Sermon preached at Saint Paul's Church in Bedford, October. 3. 1612. At the visitation of the right Wor. M. Eland, Archdeacon of Bedford. By Tho. Adams Minister of the Gospel at Willington.

1. Corinth. 5.19.

For God was in Christ, and reconciled the world to himself, not imputing their sins unto them, and hath committed to us the word of Reconciliation.

LONDON, Printed by W.W. for Clement Knight, and are to be sold at his Shop in Paul's Church-yard at the sign of the holy Lamb. 1613.

To the right Honorable Lord HENRY Earl of Kent, Lord of Hastinge, Weisford, and Ruthyn.

RIGHT HONORABLE,

I Know not under whose wings I might better shelter an Apology for the Ministry, then under your Honors, who have ever lived a ready Patron to defend us from the oppositions and wrongs of our Adversaries; making them no friends to yourself, that are enemies to the Gospel: wherein you have procured some (blessed) trouble to yourself, by frequent complaints; deserved great love of your Country, and secured your Soul of an eternal recompense: Let it be your praise, happiness, comfort, that you have (not only not lived in opposition to the Truth, as our refractory Papists: nor in the luke-warm Neutrallitie of this age, that conceives a mixed Religion, compounded of Zion's and Babylon's; nor thought it enough to countenance Preachers, as some that would make God beholding to them for their looks; but you have) stood to, seconded, succoured, and (which is yet a higher testimony) relieved, many a distressed Servant of the Lord, not with Micah's wages, or pittances of Charity, but with ample Rewardes, worthy your Honor's bounty to give, and their necessity to receive. Let all these true and happy reasons plead for, and (somewhat) justify my ambition, that have dared to look so high for Patronage, at your Honor: Worthier Pennes have contented themselves with meaner Protections: It is not the excellency of the work, but the Noblenesse of your disposition, that encourageth me, who am thence prompted, not to fear your acceptation. You that have been s• gener•ll•Shadow of Refreshing to Ministers, take from me all cause to distrust your favor: specially in the countenauncing of that written, which you have ever actually and really furthered. Proceede (most honored Lord) to affect the Truth, (yet) more zealously, by your help to support it, by your favor to protect it: so shall you make blessed use of that Honor, God hath here invested you withal, and interest yourself to the honor of Heaven: and whiles Nobility without Religion dyes in infancy, and is buried in the grave of Obliuion, your Noble zeal, or zealous Noblenesse, shall live here to your Makers glory, and the Churches comfort: and hereafter leave behind it a never-decaying monument of Honor; which if the ingratitude of men should forget, shall never pass the hand of God, unrewarded with glory. This Book salutes your Honor with the New year: may they both give you happy content. The God of mercies multiply his favors and graces on you, and make your Cup to run over with his blessings.

Your Honor's humbly devoted, Tho. Adams.

Heaven and Earth Reconcil'd.

Dan. 12.3.

They that turn many to Righteousness, shall shine as the Stars, forever and ever.

THESE words are prophetically spoken, and turn over to us a golden Leafe; whose Ink is Nectar, and the Pen from the wings of Angels: I mean, the matter expressed, is wholly Celestial: Quis sit finis iustorum, et iustificantium iustos, What shall be the end of the Righteous, and of them that make them so? (Porta patet cael-procul, Oh procul este profan, I must in some sort open you the everlasting Dores, & show you the King of glory, and your glory in him: Let a holy reverence possess your souls, & say with Jacob the place is fearful, none other, but the House of God, and this is the Gate of Heaven. Suppose that great Prince set on his Throne of universal Judgment, & upon all Creatures that have borne the image of God (summoned before him) having past an irrevocable sentence, will you hear what shall become of the lust? Open your intellectual sanctified eyes, able (with Stephen) to pierce through the curl'd Clouds, and with meditations r•pit to the third Heavens, behold them, as here described. The We shall shine as the brightness of the Firmament, and they that turn many to Righteousness, shall shine as the Stars for ever and ever. A lofty metaphor, when the lowest part of it, is not less high then the Firmament, then the Stars. Just men, shall parallel the brightness of the azure Sky; and Ministers shall shine as Stars in it: nay, they shall transcend both, in glory: We shall then see the Firmament and Stars as far below us, as now our humbled mortality thinks them above us: and could they shine as bright as ever their creation left them, the Righteous shall out-shine them; for, They shall be fashioned to the glorious body of Christ.

The words may be distinguished, In opus, et mercedem, into the Work, and the Wages. Here is Earth, and Heaven in this text: our Way, and our Country: dishonor, and honor: trouble, & peace: Our Earth, Way, Trouble, goes thus far; They that turn many to Righteousness: Our Heaven, Country, Peace, follows; Shall shine at the Stars forever and ever.

1 We Ministers on earth, are not unfitly compared to logical copulatives, that must join together a Subject and a Predicate. 1. The Subject we work on, is Men, Many Men. 2. The Predicate we work them to, is Righteousness. 3. Ministers are the Copulatives, that unite these, Conuertentes, that make Men and Righteousness friends; which never naturally and heartily loved one another, since that Apple set our first Parents teeth on edge.

2. Our Heaven follows; and there is nothing but joy in it. 1. We shall shine: No more be counted the Drosse and off-scouring of the world, as Paul says: No more be like low Hedges, which every Nimrod hunter persecutor, treads down for his sport: No more be like rejected and vnthought of things, which the eye of scorn looks over: We shall stand, where we shall be seen; We shall shine. 2. Not meanly, and with a glimmering light, but as Stars, reserved to the Son of righteousness, his greater and chief glory: we shall shine, as Stars. 3. This forever: not like Meteors whiles a gross, spuncie, squalid substance lasts: Nor like Stella cadent, falling Stars, which seem fixed in some Sphere; but are not, as S. John saith, They went out from us, for they were not of us: But without passing the Horizon of glory, without obscuring, without interposition of any Clouds, We shall shine forever and ever. This is our Heaven: but I must keep you on Earth awhile, though you long more for the other place.

THE SVBIECT.

The Subject we must exercise our skill on, are Men, tempered of the same mould, having a soul inspired from the breath of the same God, as dear to him, as our selves, bought with no worse Blood then his Sons, guarded with Angels, protected by the same providence, and compassed about with the same mercies that we are. God made Man after his own likeness, that there might be (Quoddam in terris dei simulachrum,) a certain Image of himself on earth, wherein he might be delighted: as it is natural to every being, to affect that, which suffers derivation from it; as Apelles was delighted with his Tablets, Pygmalion with his Yuorie Statue, Narcissus with his form in the Fountain, a Woman with her face in the Glass, and Parentes with the offspring of their loins. S•crates then is composed of no better metal, then his Scholars, nor the Minister then the people: Think not yourselves Lord's over them; all persons are equally respected of God: Praesumus officii, pares sumus dignitate coram deo, We are above them in Office, not in Dignity with God.

Let this meditation suppress our pride, either naturally borne with us, or accidentally contracted by a self opinion: it is an easy fault, and soon incurred, for a Minister to be proud of his gifts, of his place, as Mirion was of the spirit, and to prefer himself to those he teacheth, nay to his fellow teachers. Let me have no need to remember you of that, Vnum restat, one thing is wanting, an humbled soul: Thou hast overcome many corruptions, subdued lusts, qualified infirmities; take heed, least (Vincenda superbia restat,) Pride remains yet to be overcome. He that contemns others, makes himself most contemptible. But, Quorsum haec? to what end is this? no such vice cleaves to us. I would it did not: I would no Star did envy the brighter shining of another. But alas, Pride is a subtle insinuating nature, ever conversant in good things: it crept into Paradise; nay, it stole into Heaven: No sin is more saucy, none more bold with God, none less welcome: It took up lodging in the Pharisee, that was so precise in tything, alms, prayer. Many a Pharisee is proud, that he is not proud: so subtle is that temptation of our Adversary (when a man will be humble) to make him highly conceited of his humility; not unlike the Cynicke, that condemned Plato's pride, with a worse of his own. I thank God, J am not as others, says that Pharisee: he was not indeed, but had little reason to thank God for it. The emptiest Barrel, makes the loudest sound: He that is truly learned, hath learned this, not to boast it. It often befalls such, as it did that Cardinal, who making a show of bringing much Treasure into the Land, one of his Mules stumbled, & the Port-mantle broke and there was a goodly show of Mosse, and Straw, and Stones. They that look so big upon their brethren, were their Cabinet opened, all the great supposed Treasure within, would appear to be mere Huskes, Froth, and Ignorance. The Sun excels the Moon in glory; yet both are Stars without emulation one of another. The highest Cedar will suffer the lowest Shrubbe to grow under it. He that digges the ground, hath his use in the Garden, as well as he that draws the Knot. Silver is Metall, as well as Gold: and the Beggar may be as good a Subject as the Lord. Christ gave his life for his Sheep, as well as for his under Shepherdes: Despise not then thy fellow Servants, least the Master of us all, despise thee.

This Subject is set down indefinitely, Many: Whence observe, that the power of God is here perspicuous, that designs a few, to convert many; nay, one man to have the charge of a Congregation: Compare the Minister with his Charge, and think the difference. 1. One man to a multitude. 2. One without pomp, to many mighty, wise, rich, noble. 3. A weak man with a few leaves of Paper, to those that are armed with a prejudicial opposition of Nature against it. 4. The Message not promising liberty, ease, encouragement to lusts; but threatening persecution, cross, rod, trouble: yet to bind Kings in Chaines, and Nobles in Fetters of Yron: to recover the Heathen from their ancient and national Idolatries, and prostrate them to the name of Jesus: to make the drunkard sober, covetous merciful, malicious charitable; Hic digitus Dei, This is the Finger of God. Thus, one Moses shall give precepts to six hundred thousand men, able to bear Arms. One Peter convert three thousand at a Sermon. One Minister (full of weakness) affect a great congregation, erect, depress, with either threats or promises; and persuade wild Japheth (as tame as a Lamb) into the Tents of Sem. Thus a doozen weak Apostles passed once through legions of Soldiers, prohibitions of Laws, menaces of adversaries, oppositions of flesh, Pride, Religions, Satan, into the Courtes of Kings, and overcame them with the Gospel. What shall we say? We admire the Conquest of Alexander, that with forty thousand men, subdued all Asia: If his Army had been greater, his victory, his glory had been less: If he had achieved it with fewer, we would have doubted his honor; but if with twelve, deified him. Jesus Christ hath; and doth daily, make greater conquestes with fewer Soldiers, subduing souls (which a greater victory, then that of bodies) sine vt et armis, without Militarie engines: Yet who apprehends the immensenes of his power, or admires the depth of his wisdom?

Indeed, it is admirable, if any such thing be wrought in these days: time was, one Sermon could turn many; now many Sermons cannot turn one: Many thirsty souls have drunk at one Fountain, and been satisfied; infinite Fountains are now open, and none will drink: They come indeed to Jacob's Well, but they bring no Pitchers with them, no Faith, no Attention, no Conscience; hence their thirst, burning and killing thirst, is not quenched: God hath set open the doors of Mercy, Gospel, Grace, Glory; only our Heartes are shut up: we may as well preach to these material Walls, and move the Seats, as your canteriz'd and numbed consciences. When we have studied our color into palenesse, our strength into weakness, our bloods to Gelly, and spoake away our spirits into air, you are the same still, and your sins in the same strength; not a Mammon, Belial, Melchom, changes their lodgings, or is vnrooted out of your hearts: You come before the Pulpit, but your Faith and Conscience is left behind you: Your Clossets, Shoppes, Fieldes; nay, perhaps Taverns and Tap-houses, plead possession of your affections: and all the Law that comes out of the Chair of Moses, cannot give the Devil a Defeasance.

What then? shall we not shine in this glory, because so few have been turned by us? Nothing less, and we have precedent for it: Though Israel be not gathered, yet shall J be glorious in the eyes of the Lord, saith the Prophet. Though when we have spent our strengths in Israel, the Widow of Sarepta is more charitable: Though the Altar hath enjoyed our labors, we not her privileges; yet for us, is laid up a crown of glory: Though it cannot but griue us to be a savor of death to many, and to rise up condemning witnesses against those that would not believe our report; yet since God is glorified in both Heaven and Hell, and we have faithfully discharged the duties of our callings, and consciences, leaving the success to God, though we have Turned few to Righteousness, yet we shall shine as Stars forever and ever.

PRAEDICATE.

The Praedicate we work men to, is Righteousness: Righteousness is so fair an object, that a man would think there needs no great solicitation to it. What heart would not be inamored on the beauty of Righteousness, if we saw it? Even the most unrighteous men have been convinced to approve Righteousness. Surely Integrity is not loved, because it is not seen, the Devil so takes up our eyes with the flourishes of sin, and gay colors of Lusts, that we are blind to the sight of goodness; whose face if we could behold in that mirror of clearness wherein we were created, we would be in love with nothing else but God, and that: But as an ill affected Stomacke is best pleased with crudities, our poisoned and infected Natures are dotingly taken with corruptions, and have no love to Righteousness: No love, said I? no familiarity, no knowledge, no acquaintance; that if God should suffer our blinded souls so to go on to our deaths, we should scarce ever dream of Righteousness: Therefore he hath given us helps, his word, and the vocal Organs, to make it sound to us his Ministers, who may turn our hearts to righteousness: Here is offered to us this instruction.

The end of the Ministry, is to bring men to righteousness. Christ when he had led captivity captive, gave Gifts to men: What were they, and to what end? Paul declares both the Guiftes. ver. 11. He gave some to be Apostles, some Prophets. &c. The end, ver. 12. For the repairing of the Saints, and for the edification of the Body of Christ; a task hard enough: Ars artiu••, regimen animar•m, It is the cunning of all cunnings, to govern Souls: It is no easy work, to make men righteous. If they could retain covetise, licentiousness, vain-glory, in their service, and withal be Righteous, there were some hope: but when you tell them, that carnal Lust, and Righteousness, are two ends that shall never meet; that Flesh and blood shall not inherit the kingdom of Heaven: When you bid them weep for, and restore their Injuries, Usuries, Sacriledges, charm their tongues from Blasphemies, their hearts from Vanities; you shall almost as good bath a Moore, in hope to whiten him. Men naturally love anything better then Righteousness, and think any burden lighter then Repentance: Hence it is, that we are not so welcome as the Ministers of Satan. 1. Behold, thy Minister mourns to thy soul in the Pulpit, and persuades thee by the blood of Christ, not without his own tears, to have mercy on thy soul; not to cast away all the hopes and comforts of a better world: to bewail and beware of sins, which will make a Hell in thy bosom here, and sink thee to a worse Hell hereafter: Nihil agit, he cannot prevail. Let but a Ruffian hold up his finger, thou art gone: All Auditors are not Ruffians, and so addicted; God forbid, that our S•r•i should not have a few names left in her; but many are thus, and moe of a contrary disposition, but a worse: the most attend the World, Who will show us any good? The Ministers voice is not so audible, as Profites; nor can Divinity make so sweet Music, as the world. If to condole this, were to help it, and the discovery of the disease were no less then the remedy, I should soon cure it, but shall I tell you? The general opinion of most in our Parishes is this, (if the life do not bely the mind) that a competent measure of righteousness, is enough for Heaven; and Salvation doth not stand on so hard conditions as we teach: No bounds or measures of iniquity are enough, but a little righteousness serves: It is matter of amazement to see how the most live, as if they were neither in God's debt, nor danger: Men strive who shall sin most, and give Jesus Christ the deepest wounds: they swear, bezzell, covet, and laugh at him, that tells them they sin: there is not so much shame left in their bloods, as to give testimony of their gultinesse: If it were possible, they would annihilate their souls, and quench all difference twixt themselves and beasts; Let us eat and drink, for we shall die: It is soon said, and soon eaten; but not so soon digested. They advance the colors of Satan, Blasphemies, and Lyes, in the very face of God, as if they sent Challenges to Heaven, and dared their Maker to combat: For the ministry of the Word, whose intent is to beget in our souls Righteousness, they make this the end of it, to pass the time, to keep Holy-days from sleep, and to move the hearts of Idiots: they visit the Temple of custom as Fools, of example as Apes, for necessity as Beasts, for praise as Hypocrites, or for peace as Politicians: How few think their Minister placed over them, to turn their hearts to Righteousness.

I have shown them the end of the Ministry, we may not forget to apply it to our selves: God's intent in sealing thee this Commission, is to work in men's hearts Righteousness. Who knows not that? God grant none forget it; I am not worthy (Fathers and Brethren) to inform your understandings (Saltem concedatur refrire memorias) only give me leave to rub your memories. It is easy to propound sinister ends to our best, ordinate, and most regular works. There are five bitter Hearbes to spoil all the Children of the Prophets Pottage: Five affections to distaste our ministry; I will not say, to make them ineffectual: Fame, Flattery, Ease, Necessity, Covetousness.

1. Are there none that catch at popular Applause, and rather hunt themselves into Fame, then Souls in-Heaven, Se pr•dicantes, non Christum, preaching themselves, rather than Jesus Christ: Mancipia popularis aurae venalia, Creatures bred of the people's breath, whose excellencies consist only in opinion; rare men in their own judgments, and the flattered multitudes, that speak more desperately against doubted and questionable actions, then against known and manifest sins: that inveigh against some, to please the rest; and even curry favor, by speaking bitterly: of whom he spake truly, that said, They care not to be condemned of the Learned for ignorant, so they may be commended of the ignorant for Learned.

Quid petitur sacris nisi tantum f•ma poetis?

What gape these for, but only Fame? They intend not •rection of hearts, direction of lives, correction of vices; but they have a strange kind of pleasure, to hold men by the ears, as the Fisher the Pike by the gilles, and neither takes him, nor lets him go: there is in these, more affectation of Fame, then affection of Truth.

2. Are there none, that mould their Sermons with Court dough, Flattery? Cushion Chaplains, that carry their Mistresses Fannes, to keep the heat of Reproof from their painted faces; that cry, it is either cold or hot, as their Patron listes to feel it?

Si pr•nderet olus patienter, regibus vti

N•llet Aristipp•s; si scir•t regibus vti,

Fastidir•t olus &c.

They get more by flattery, the• just men by their impartial censures: But it was Aristotle•, amicus Plat•, amicus Socrates, m•gis 〈...〉 . Thy Patron is thy Friend, and the chief man of thy Parish is thy Friend: Truth is thy Friend above all.

3. Are there none, that leap out of the troubles of the world, into the peace of the Church, only to be fed at the Altar, and live idle? That entertained to build up God's House; and once sure of his pay, lay down their tools, and fall to play?

4. Are there none, that make a Virtue of necessity; and when all trades fail, turn Priests, making that their last refuge, that should be their best: This is a rank custom among the Papists; but I hope, it hath not gotten over our Seas. Oh how vile is it, and an argument of a desperate mind, when Divinity is made but a shift? If to dignity they are too lazy, to beg ashamed, to steal afraid, to cheat want wit, and to live, means, then thrust in for a room in the Church; and once crope in at the window, make haste to sharke out a living; nay, and perhaps she apace with the wings of golden Ignoraunce, into Patrons Books, and Presentations to good Beneficer, when Learning is so ill hors'd, riding upon Penurie, that the Benefice is gone, ere he comes; no matter how poor the stock of Learning be, so the stock of Money hold out, to the Patrons content: Somtimes such Beggars are made Priests, when good Priests are made Beggars.

5. Are there none sick of the Pearl in the eye? a shrewd disease, and no less common; whose souls are taken up by Mammons commission, as Demas, that gave Religion the Bagge, when the World offered him the Purse, and vowed to serve Christ no longer for nothing. I have shown you many oblique, indirect, and sinister ends; but among all, this carries it, for custom, for hatefulness: Proh pudor! that ever a Minister should be covetous, as if we had lost all our former time, and were now to recover it with a preposterous emulation of the hungriest Worldlings: How should we reclaim others from the World, that cleave to it our selves: They must needs think, we have a broder way to Heaven, then we teach others. It is observable, that the Creatures nearest to the Earth, are most greedy to accumulate: What Creatures store up such heaps of provision, as the Ant: But the Birds of the Air, that fly next He•uen, Neither sow, nor reap, nor carry into the Barn, saith our Savior. We are next to Heaven in profession; let us hate to be farthest off in conversation.

These are all vnblest and pernicious ends, and whereof, I trust, no soul is here guilty: I confidently use the words of Paul: I have persuaded myself better things of 〈ϕ〉 and such as accompany salvation, though I thus speak: I hope, the least Feather can brush these dustes from our Conscience: Let not Fame, Flattery, Ease, Necessity, Covetousness, task our endeavors, to this holy work: we are then but (Adulterants verbum (such as adulterate God's word; as the Fornicator makes Lust his end, not Generation: so such a Minister intendes not to beget souls to God, but Fame, or Gaine to himself. If we do thus, the worst is our own: Whiles some preach Christ of strife, some of goodwill, yet so long a Christ is preached, I do joy, and will joy therein. It shall be the best for us, that our intentes sympathize with God's; his Ordinaunce, with our Perfour•ance, to turn souls to Righteousness.

COPVLATIVES.

This for the Praedicate. The persons, whom God hath deputed to atone these two contrary natures, sinful men, and Righteousness, are the Ministers: there is no weak contention between these, and the labor is hard to reconcile them: To us is committed this ministry of reconciliation: God hath honored us to tie this •otte, though it be indeed, (Dignus vindice nodus) a sacramental bond for the hand of the most high God to perfect: yet he vouchsafes this honor to us, (as his instruments) that we in his name and power, shall tie a double knot on Earth: a temporal knot of the husband to the wife; which none but the Minister may do: a Spiritual and eternal knot of the believing soul to her husband Christ: I have prepared you for one Husband, to present you a pure Virgin to Christ: He hath designed us, to turn men to Righteousness.

Is this possible? Est Deus in vobis, &c. God is in you, if you can do this: no power rules, constraines, conuertes the heart of man, but God only. I say again, thus is God pleased to honor us, that we shall be said to convert sinners: He that converteth a sinner from going astray, shall save a soul from death, and hide a multitude of si•nes. And Paul thus chargeth Timothy: Continue in learning, for in doing this, thou shalt save thyself, and them that hear thee. Yet, absit, far be it from us to think, or any superstitious soul to ascribe it to us, that by our own arm, we have gotten this victory. If the Psalmist denies power to any, of rescuing his brothers body from the Grave, he much more excludes thy redemption of his soul. This then is true, when the external voice of man, and internal operation of the spirit, shall iumpe together; then John the Baptist shall turn hearts, then the Priest shall make thy soul clean: When the agent of Heaven, and instrument of Earth, do concur, or are comprehensiuely taken: but when they be either compared in opposing, or opposed in comparing, then all is in God: then Paul can (but) plant, and Apollos water, God gives the increase. Then John the Baptist pours on Water, and Christ baptizeth with the holy Ghost, and with Fire. Will you hear them united; God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself, and hath committed to us, the ministry of reconciliation; else there is no power in my perishable voice, to affect your conscience. Break away this Analogy and virtual association of the spirit from our preaching, and you depart from the Temple, with as foul hearts as ever you came thither. No beloved, lift up your eyes higher then the Pulpit, and know, he dwelles in Heaven that pierceth the Conscience: Behold, I stand at the door, and knock. &c. I, says the Son of the eternal God. It is he, that clears the eye, vndeaffes the ear, vnlockes the heart, and shakes the inmost powers of the soul, as the Thunder shakes the Wilderness. Were we all Bo•nerves, the Sons of Thunder, we were not able without him, to turn your hearts to Righteousness: Indeed the Word is strong in operation, diuidyng the marrow and the bones; and our ministry is not of the Letter, but Spirit, saith S. Paul: thus far exceeding the external commandment of Moses, whereunto he could not convert his own soul, that it shall not only require Faith, but give it: yet still, Virtus a Deo, the virtue, life, spirit, is from God.

This clears us from that Popish imputatiō, that we build our Faith on a silly Minister: we build it on the testimony of the Spirit, & the Word of eternal truth, delivered to us, by such an organ: The truth examined, they rather build their salvation on a silly Minister. Thus far, they and we go hand in hand; we agree that Faith & conversion is wrought in the heart by an especial grace of God's spirit: But here we part; They say, the holy Ghost useth the authority of the Church to beget Faith in our hearts: We say, he useth the Ministry only, not the Authority. Thus, whereas they raise the credit of the Doctrine from the Minister; we raise the credit of the Minister, from the Doctrine: so that of both, Papists may be trulier said to build their Faith on the credit of Men; yea, and such men, as some of them, have been Sodomites, some Coniurer•, some Murderours, and scarce inferior to Devils, unless now perhaps they lie as deep and low in Hell. Thus are their blinded souls bound to believe, not by their Ministry as Christians; but by their Authority, as Pythagoreans.

I confess, the Word caryes Authority with it, in any lips which God hath touched with a Coale frō his Altar, and woe to the soul that disobeyes it. There is an easy Distinction, saith that excellent P•still, betwixt the Lawyer, the Physician, and the Divine: The Lawyer begins with Reason, and so descends to common Experience and Authority: The Physician begins with Experience, and thence proceeds to Reason and Authority: The Divine begins with Authority, and so to Reason and Experience: Our personal Authority then is nothing; the Authority of God's word not to be withstood. These then are the Copulatiues, and this the means to bring you to Righteousness, or else despair it. If thou living within the sunshine of the Gospel, wilt not be enlightened by it, thou must perish in darkness. If the Preacher convert thee not to Righteousness, God must work Miracles, or thy soul is in hazard.

We should now come to our Reward, our Bliss, our Heaven: Shall shine as Stars forever and ever: But I find it, Reu. 1. The seven Stars, are the Angels of the seven Churches. Ministers shall be Stars hereafter, saith the Prophet Daniel: they shall be Stars here too, saith S. John. Without question, both speak truth, and there is a shining of this world, goes before that Heaven: We must be Stars in Grace, that look to be so in Glory. It was directed to the Apostles, Vos estis lux mundi, you are the light of the world: And, Let your light so shine before men, &c. So God hath disposed, that, Lumen gracia antecedit Lumen gloria, the light of Grace shall precede the light of Glory: And none shall shine hereafter, that have been dark here. First then, consider what kind of Stars we are: then, what we shall be. Ministers are said to be Stars in five repectes: in Name, Substaunce, Sight, Motion, Effectes.

1. In Name, Stella astando dicitur, a Star (quasi) not stir, further then the Orbe carries it; God hath fixed them in their Spheres, and confined them to Stations; like good Soldiers, they know their Rankes and their Orders; and observe their, Non vltra. The Sun knows his rising, and his going down. Ministers must be like Stars, fixed in their orbs: ours is a stable profession, not a gadding Ministry. It was S. Peters counsel, or rather the holy Ghosts charge, Feed that flock, that dependeth on you. (He spake merely, the Tribe of Leuj must have no mind to the Tribe of God.) The Apostles indeed, went through the world; but they had their Passport for it, Go teach all nations, &c. It must not be so with us: not that you, which are full, should grudge the hungry souls some Crummies from your Tables. How many are yet in this Land, that would be heart-glad of those Sermons, which you sleep out and despise? How many would close the Minister in the arms of joy, whom you contemn? So easy is it for a full stomach to forget the benefit of Meat. The feet of those that bring good tidings of peace, are nowhere less beautiful, then in their most frequented streets. Never found Prophet less honor, less welcome, then where his perpetual pains have best earned it. Like pamper'd children, you play with your Meat: Give us leave to gratify with some comforts (I say not with our Savior, the Dog, but) the Children of our own Father, which want them. Theodor•t writes, that when Valent with his Arian heresy had bepesterd the Christian world, and stroke a deep wound in the white bosom of the Church. Aphr•d• a certain Monk, contrary to his order, came forth of his vowed and confining Monastery, to succor the endangered truth: being asked by the offended Emperor, What he did out of his Cell? I did keep it, saith he, so long as Christ's Sheep were in peace; I cannot be coop'd up, and suffer them in hazard of ruin: If being a Virgin, I were confined by my Father to a Closet; yet seeing the House on fire, I were bound to come forth to quench it.

Thus it is, when the affairs of the Church call us forth, our own may not find us so ready: They are wretched Stars, that will be fixed in no Orbe, admit of no certain Charge; nay not Stars, but mere Meteors, Exhalations, Ignes f•t•uj, Commets portending delusion to others, confusion to themselves, unstable Lightes, C•red about with every wind of doctrine: Wandering Stars, as Jude saith, for whom is reserved (not this shyning in glory, but the black darkness forever. They were such Stars, that the red Dragon with his tail swept from Heaven, and cast down to the Earth, that had no true location in the Orbe of the Church, Stellae errati•a, following their own phantasies. Let us beware of such wandringes, least it be said of us, as the Poet of that Star, Etsi non c•cidit, poterit cecidisse viderj, though we have not fallen away, yet we have seemed so: Let no storms blow us from our Charges: Menaces, Miseries, Gustes, Waves, shall beat upon us, yet (S• fract•s illabatur orbis, impavidum ferient ruinae) let us stick close & fast to our Spheres: when God's general afflictions of plague, famine, mortality, are most frequent, our councils are most seasonable. Oh when will the iron hearts of men bow, if not when they are heat in the flame of judgments? They are wretched Stars then, and incapable of this glory, that are (Subito a parents, subito disparentes, Labantes et Labentes) suddenly up, and suddenly down; giving a glimmering, but no solid and certain light: Let no such Stars shine in our Firmament.

2. In substance, stella est solida et pellucida materies, non vetustate, non putredine corrumpenda, non casu vllo dissipanda. a Star is a more solid part of his Orbe, every way round, light, simple, and most pure: a Minister must for substance be a Star, possess a Star-like, and substantial light, not a flash of lightning, but a continual lamp of learning, which like the fire of the sanctuary, must never go out. You are the light of the world, saith our Master, but if the light be darkness, how great is that darkness? light, as well as place in the Firmament, is substantial to a Star; and learning as well as office is requisite for a Minister: They that handle the two-edged sword of the spirit, must have skill, when to strike with it, when (but) to shake it, and when to sheath it. An unlearned Scribe, without his treasure of old and new, is unfit to interpret God's Oracles. The Priests lips shall preserve knowledge, is no less a precept to the Minister, then a promise to the people; we are unfit to be Seers, if we cannot distinguish between Hagar and Sara, but Ixion-like take a cloud for June: we are poor Stars, if light enough comes not from us, whereby to distinguish of colors, to discern the Manna of Jsraell, from the enchanted Cup of Babel: a Minister without learning, is like a mere Cypher, which fills up a place, & increaseth the number, but signifies nothing. There have been some niggardly affected to learning, calling it man's wisdom: they thrust out the use of arts, as if with Julian they would shut up the School doors, and send all human knowledge into banishment. If the moral says, of a Poet, or a Philosopher, or perhaps some golden sentence of a Father drop from us, it is straight called (venenata facundia) a poisoned eloquence; as if all these were not the spoils of the Gentiles, and mere Hand-maids unto Divinity: They wrong us; we make not the Pulpit a Philosophy, Logic, Poetry, and School, but all these so many Stairs to the Pulpit. Will you have it? The Fox dispraiseth the Grapes he cannot reach: If they could beat down learning, they might escape censure, for their own ignorance: For shame let none that hath borne a Book, dispraise Learning; she hath enemies enough abroad, though she be justified of her Children at home: Let Barbary disgrace Arts, not Athens.

The Papists brag much of their Schollership, though indeed, all the salt of their Learning, cannot keep their Doctrines from stinking. I should hardly be held an impartial Judge, if I should censure them; therefore I will be silent: Yet in one thing I cannot but commend them: They have one kind of learning beyond ours, and it consists in arguing: their disputing is strong, victorious, and full of (desperate) valor: That argument of his was but here by: God rules the Church Triumphant in Heaven; therefore the Pope rules the Church Militant on Earth: and so as once, (Diuisum imperium cum Joue Caesar habet.) Caesar is half with Jupiter, the Pope is joined purchaser with Christ: But he will be sole possessor: This was but reasonably audacious, that holds from Heaven to Earth, from God to the Pope. They dispute with us, yet stronglyer; by a demonstrative argument, (Quod ex veris primis, (sed non) necessarijs secundis consi•t••.) Which consists of true principles, but not of necessary consequences; a Syllogism in Barbara, a very barbarous one. I will show you how, as the Jews reasoned with Stephen.

Every Blasphemer deserves to be stoned:

But Stephen is a Blasphemer:
ergo,

Stephen deserves to be stoned.

Stephen graunts the proposition, that a Blasphemer is worthy to be stoned; but denies the assumption, and says, I am no Blasphemer, therefore not to be stoned: They prove it, take up stones, and knock him on the head: An invincible argument. So the Papists with us.

All Heretics deserve to be burned:

All the Protestants are Heretics:
ergo,

All the Protestants deserve to be burned.

We stand not much upon the major, but resolutely and truly deny the minor; and say, we are no Heretics, therefore deserve not to be burned: They prove it; tie us to strong Stakes, lay on Wood, put too Fire, & burn us to ashes: an unanswerable syllogism; yet we have answered it, and overcome it, (Et fortiores ignibus facti sunt) our Martyrs were stronger in Faith, then the Fire in heat; and though, Lord, For thy sake we were killed all the day long, and counted as Sheep for the slaughter; yet in all these things, we were more then Conquerors through him, that lou'd us.

But otherwise for the substaunciall light of Learning, our Stars shall compare with the Stars of Rome: yet, Oh that there was no fault in us of this nature, worthy to be censured, deplored. Take the district eye of a true-judging God (〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉) and, Who is sufficient for these things? All our Learning Dexteritie, Sinceritie, Diligence, comes short of the required perfection. Let us treasure up what we can; and produce it to the edification of others. Do we think it enough to have Learning, and not to shine in this dark world? They are strange Stars, that will give no light: if not here, then not hereafter. They are deep Welles, from whom can be drawn no Water: We unto me, if I preach not the Gospel: if thou be called, and endued with answerable gifts, and wilt bury thy Talent, I need not tell thee the danger. I cannot say (Ex •re tuo) out of thine own mouth, for thou sayst nothing; but (Ex silenti • tuo) by thy silence, because thou sayst nothing, God will judge thee. If it may be said of him, that would and cannot Preach, he is a dumb Dog; it may as fitly and justly be said of him that can, and will not Preach, that he is a dumb Devil. It is not enough to wear a decent Surplisse, &c. (though some out of their curiosity think that too much) when the people's Souls are starved for the bread of Heaven: There be good iniunctions, for the comely ceremonies of the Church, to preserve us in peace, in unity; so also good orders for weekly Sermons: Haec fecisse, illa non omisisse iustum est. These ought you to have done, and not to leave the former undone: Let not the first be true Canons, whiles the latter are only Pot-guns.

A double beam, then, you must expect from your Stars, your Ministers, preaching, and praising God: the means & the end; both I say, not one only: some of you are all for prayers, and care for no preaching: some all for preaching, & care for no praying: if there be no sermon, they will sit still, and serve God at home; as if he had promised his presence to the chimney corner, sooner then to the Temple. Indeed saith S. Paul, despise not prophesying, but for ought I see, he allows nowhere, the vilipending of public prayers, but rather seems to imitate, Magnifie praising God; for he prefixeth, if not preferreth, Pray continually, and, in all things give thanks, &c. adding under them; and, Despise not Prophecyng. I speak it not to villify Preaching, (so principally a necessary means for our salvation,) J would ye did all Prophecy, was the the speech of Moses and Paul: Neither would I hearten the common disestimation, and contempt of public Prayers: both are necessary; yet is the last best (if I be not deceived) so far as the end transcendes the means: Your health is more precious then the Physic, that recovers you, though it come as far as the East. All our Preaching, labors and Aimes at this, to beget in you a knowledge, and a conscience, how to serve and praise God.

Preaching is the work of our way, praising God, of our Country: in Heaven there shall be no Sermons, but even then Hosa•na's and Halleluia's: We shall spend the time, nay that eternity, in praising our Creator and Savior, and Sanctifiour, when there shall be none to preach to us. Love then Preaching and do not despise Praying; both are the lightful & delightful beams, that come from your Stars, your Ministers.

3. In situation, the Stars are placed in their Orbe, and thereof being circularly and regularly carried, do finish their course in a determinate space of time. Philosophy saith, that the Sun doth partly enlighten the Stars of Heaven: But Divinity (saith) the Son of Righteousness, doth wholly enlighten his stars of the Church. The Stars are placed high, the more commodiously to shine to us: God hath put Ministers in an eminent place, that their light might be more perspicuous. Candles once accensed, are not to be thrust into abstruse corners. If then Paul requires it of others, then much more of us, that are Stars, To have our conversation in Heaven. It is not required of the Firmament, to shine so bright as the Stars: more holiness is expected of us, then in the ordinary station of a Christian: whiles other men's places are less notable, their vices are less notorious: we run not in a common line, but are set forth as copies of Sanctification: every blot in us, is so much more dangerous, as tiis more observable: every Learner is apt to tax his precedent, if faulty: he hath need to be circumspect, that saith to others, Be ye followers of we, and look on them, that walk so, as you have us for a• ensample. We have all infirmities, if not enormities, and let S. Paul himself refer you to the most absolute pattern, and reserve to your imitation, certain limittes, Follow me, as I follow Jesus Christ: We must follow thee, oh Savior, and strive to be holy, as thou •t holy.

This is our seat in Heaven; and we should be like the Stars, if it were possible; free from Elementary corruptions. To speak by roate of Repentaunce, Faith, new Birth, is seldom profitable, when no such thing is felt in our own bosoms, or manifested in our lives: We (rather) trust our health into those Physicians hands, whose Drugges have recovered themselves. If thou hast an Angels tongue, and a Devils heart, thou art no better then a Post in the cross way. that rottes it self, to direct others; or a Torch, that having pleased others with the light, goes forth it self in Smoke and stench. To speak well, and do ill; is to build up Heaven with the voice, Hell with the couersation: Sic dic•m, vt qua fu•runt verba, sint opera. Let us so speak, that those which have been our words, may be our deeds. In deed it should be thus (Si been dixerimus, vestrum est) If we have said well, it is your good: (Si been vixerimus, nostrum est) If we have done well, it is our own good: And for Ministers words, (Dicunt qua dei sunt) they speak that which is God's: For their lives, (•atiunt qua sua sunt) they do that which is their own: but our persons are in their sight, when our words are gone from their ears: and withal,

Segnius irrita•• animos demissa per ••res,

Quam qua sunr•cidis subiecta fidelibus.

There is a quicker perspicuitie in the eyes, and a better retention of the received object, then in the ears. The Thunder first breaks the Cloude, and lets forth the Lightning? yet is the latter seen, before the former is heard: Hence it is, that Examples teach soonest, (Longum iter per verba, breue et compendiosum per exempla,) It is a long way by Preceptes, a short by Examples: The force of a hundred good Sermons, is loft by one enormitie: so easy is it to weave Penelop's web. Let us then have some respect to our Life, as our Doctrine: the credit is a thing next tender to the Conscience, (Qua semel amissa, postea nullus eris,) which once shipwreck'd, thou art undone: It is a great difficulty, to play an after game of Reputation. It was an excellent exhortation of Paul, & implied no small difficulty to Timothy; Cause thy Ministry to be thoroughly liked of: adorn it with a pure and holy Conversation. His charge was no less to Titus? See that no man despise thee. Say they did; can Titus help that? Paul's meaning is, Give just cause to no man, to despise thee. Let them then murmur till their tongues are hoarse with contumelies, so long as thou canst applaud thyself in the conscience of thy well deservings, and say with that persecuted, maligned, reviled, yet holy Psalmist; Oh Lord, thou knowest mine innocence. Calumnies against the Minister are facile, frequent: If austere with John the Baptist, they are censured, precise: if sociable as Christ, dissolute. Our merriment is thought madness, when others madness, is but merriment: It is guiltiness enough in us, to be but ill reported they will believe a scandal raised against us, sooner then against a Ruffian; and what they dream, is so, no arguments shall evade it. Men are glad of color to despise us; & great ones, at once to save their credits, & their purses, pick quarrels with their Minister: When all tricks fail, to shake off him, that hath earned thy love and bounty this shall do it; accuse him to be thine enemy, and so excuse thyself from being his friend: it is hard if the eye of Malice cannot spy a Moate in a Black coat; or at least, say it is a Moate, though it be but a White one, a work of honest simplicity. I fear, I am too plain with the times, that are so subtle with us: I comfort myself, and all my partners in this common misery; Male de me dicunt, sed mali, they speak evil of me, but they are evil men, and would speak better of me, if I were worse. Let us proceed in the integrity of our conscience, that When they speak evil of us, as of evil doers, they may (in the end) be ashamed, which slander our good conversation in Christ. Let us live well, the success to God: a good word hath the time when to be spoken. There is a season to benefit, and a season to hurt by our speech, (therefore it is preposterous in men, to be Consonantes, when they should be Mutes; and Mutes, when they should be Consonantes,) But a good life is never out of season. A high Place, and a low & base Life, have no analogy or correspondence: Our seat is in Heaven like Stars; let not our conversation be on Earth like Beasts: Other men's indifferences, are our rank evils: that which is scarce worth notice in others, in us is censured, taxed, condemned. This for the site.

4. The Motion is fourfold. 1. Circular. 2. Incessant. 3. Swift. 4. Orderly.

1. Circular: The Stars move roundly, according to their Orbes: Our Motion, that are Ministers, is not unlike; A Deo caepimus, in Deo chau'm's, We begin from God, in God we end: Jehou's called us, and we strive to bring souls to him: As we are Pastors, we must compass about our Flocks, as Watchmen surround the City, to fortify the breach: Satan compasseth the earth, by his own testimony: The roaring Lion goeth about, by the description of Peter, watching whom to devour. Let our diligence match his, with a saving intent, that the tempted may have our Antidotes, the doubtful $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Counsels, the erring our Conuictions, and the languishing our Encouragements.

2. Incessant: Our Motion is without intermission; for the Adversary never gives truce, or admits conditions of peace, without his sensible advantage. Therefore our calling allows us no time to sit still and sing R•quiems to our souls under our Fig-trees of peace. A Soldier should die in the Wars standing, and a Minister in the Pulpit preaching. It was the Lord of the Vineyards reproof, Why stand ye here all the day idle? It is not permitted to us, to stand still; What, and all your day? and idle too? Paul's example was other, and that excellent: J ceased not to admonish everyone night and day with tears: I ceased not, (Ecce Laborem) behold his labor: To admonish, (Ecce Officium) behold his Duty: Everyone, (Ecce Amorem) behold his Love: Night and day, (Ecce vigilantiam) behold his Watchfulness: With tears, (Ecce compassionem) behold his Pity.

3. Swift and speedy; Noscit tarda molimina spiritus, The holy Ghost cannot abide delays: We may give warning too late, when the Enemie hath surprised the City. It was the Master of the Feasts charge, Go out quickly into the Streetes and Lanes,&c. The Angels are said to have Wings, for their speedier expedition of God's hestes; and, Cursed is he, that doth God's business negligently, says the Prophet. Indeed we may run too fast, when God sends us not: Jonah made •reposterous haste, when he took. Tarshish for Nineueh: and they run (Curu• pede, with a swift perhaps, but) with no straight foot, that are in Moses Chair, ere they be aware; & wonder too late, how they came thither. I cannot call this Motion speedy; but hasty: and much haste, is seldom encountered with good success: The Stars move swiftly, but not madly. They that fly into the Ministry without Wings, run without Legges; I mean, without Knowledge, move short of their own benefit, of others expectation: The Clouds pour down no rain, till they have first sucked it up: (Praepropera praxit, praepostera lectio,) To practice first, and study afterwards, is an ill habit in action, and no good figure in Rhetoric: They that will so run, that they may attain, have neither too many feet, nor too few: If they abound, as the Monsters the sons of Anak, that had six Toes on a foot: Impediuntur necessarijs auxilijs, their necessary helps, are their hindrances: If they be defective, they can but limpe. Therefore in our Motion, let Zeal further Discretion, that not too slow Discretion moderate Zeal, that not too fast: but having thy Commission, and being placed by God in thy Orbe, be not unwilling to move: Practice is like a Wheel, the more it is turned, the better it goes.

4. Orderly: We must keep as the Stars do, our known and equal distance: it is not to thy praise, to run into other Orbes, desiring there (Ostendere, nay, Ostentare lucem tuam) to show, yea to boast thy light, with a proud conceate, to darken the Star, which God hath there placed: such an emulation is odious, and thou mayst flash out (like a Meteor) for a time, but at last, God will ask thee, who sent thee thither? Let every Star be loved of his own Orbe, though one Star differs from another Star in glory. Nothing better becomes us, then order; for our God is the God of order: Contention disables us, and enervates our Ministry: So long as the water is stirred, the Fisher can catch no Fish: Love is the Master-vein of the Soul, and Peace knittes the Ioyntes: Are we called to put the luxate members of the body of Christ into their places, and shall our selves be disioynted? Our peace, is the Milk of our Land, let not our strife like Runnet, turn it to Curde. When the people were together by the ears, a Fellow as thick as long, got up into the Theater, and advancing himself, they began all to laugh: go to, quoth he, laugh and spare not; I have a Wife at home, rounder then myself: (at this they laughed louder:) yet when we agree, one Bed can hold us, when we are at variance, the whole house is too little for us. You can apply it.

5. The last circumstance of our Similitude to the Stars, consists in the effects; these are three: J•fluendi, Illuminand•, orratu Delectandi, 1. Our Influence. 2. Light. 3. Delight.

1. Influence. Philosophy teacheth us, that the Stars in Elementes, and Elementall bodies, do stir up the first qualities, hot, cold, moist, and dry; and cause other effects, serving to the inclination of man: Surely as we are Stars, all the Influence we can derive to men of our selves, is to incline them by our charity. This is no weak persuasion, but one of those 3. Feedings, that at least they expect: If they find not Hospitality the Porter at our gates, they strait censure us for Darke stars. Many of our people liked Popery well, for nothing else, but because they were fatted with the superfluities, that fell from their libertine Feasts. Now these that measure Religion by their bellies, will be tempted with handfulls of Barley, and morsels of Bread, to speak well of us: As the Jews once in the Prophet, so these cry now: When we served the Queen of Heaven, and might pray to our Lady, we had Bread enough: Now they have pleaded so hard for Faith, they have forgotten Charity: They say, We set Faith at our own Tables, but thrust Charity out, to dine with our Servants. These are the scandalous clamours of their invincible ignorance, who, (as many of the Jews, Christ) follow the Gospel, only for their bellies: they consider not, in whose hands Abbeyes, and Monasteries, and the best Parsonages are: He was a friend to us, that told the Begger, (beating hard at the Vicars door for relief,) he knocked at the wrong door: here dwells, quoth he, the Spawne, but yonder the Pickerell. The Pope and his Heirs, have got all; we have not the tenth of the tenth, the very interest left; yet they claim as much of us, as of them that have the principal. Well, our reward is in Heaven; let us give them what Influence we can, and having fed their souls, spare also some relief to their bodies.

2. Lighte. This the second effect, to enlighten them: the substance and nature of a Star, hath already taught us this duty: I will sparingly urge it. We illuminate them by speech, by conversation. Our Doctrine is the Light; Life, the Lantern: if we carry the Light without the Lantern, the wind of Malice will strive to blow it out. He went not far from this allegory, that prescribed a Ministers duty, (Tonare voice, fulminare vita,) our words, thunder: our lives, lightning. If we be lightful in preaching, darksome in living; we do (as it were) propound our Doctrines, as impossible to be kept. If we have knowing Minds, and dissolute Affections, it may be said of us (as of that stigmatic Roman Emperor Galba, who was both deformed, and witty) that a good Instrument is put in an evil Case. If we live well, and say nothing, we have an Orbe and seem Stars, but are none: for God (sure) never placed Star in the Firmament, that gives no light. Whether they be idle, or unable, like Aesop's Hen, too fat to lay; they are but a burden to our Orbe, a disgrace to our Church: only do thou take heed (thy Star not shining so bright as others) least thy Clouds darken it: The people's sins, are not seldom the cause of the Prophets darkness; to himself be his own negligence, He stands or falls to his own Master: Perhaps there is yet more in it, then so; God hath his special work in all euentes: it may be, in thy Ministers insufficiency thy sin is plagued, and God strikes thee through him. This is no light, though insensible stroke: thou hast slighted his sacred and majestical Word; behold, as to a Swine unworthy of this Pearl, he denies, withholds it. The Prophet is a fool: the spiritual man is mad, for the multitude of thine iniquity. Go then and bewail thy sins, and Pray that the doare of utterance may be opened to him, least whiles he shines not, thou perish in darkness.

3. Delight. The Stars are the grace of the Sky: so are Ministers of the Church, when they all move in peace and unity, (Ordine quisque suo,) everyone in his own order. We often see the Stars, their contemplation, their benefit is never tedious: no more is the society of Ministers to them, that desire to read in those Books, the constellations of Heaven, the mysteries of Salvation, and to know how to govern their souls and their bodies. God gave man an upright Countenance, directing his Mind together with his Lookes to the Stars; Erectos ad sydera tollere vultus: Look on them, which walk like us, saith S. Paul; not as some Star-gasers, that stare on us, only to entrap us: to whom we reply, as Diogenes did to him, that so subtly disputed of the Stars; How long is it since you came down from Heaven? Let them beware a success, like Thales, who gaz'd so long at the Stars above him, that he fell into the Ditch below him. If then, you look on us, keep the Creeples intent at the Beautiful gate of the Temple; Give heed to us, trusting to receive something of us: and then, though Silver and Gold we have none, yet what we •a•e, we give you, in the name, and by the virtue of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, better things are derived from us. Fables and toys content us with a transient glance.—videtur

Fabula, qua posci vult, et spectata reponi.

A Fable requires no more, but to be seen, and then thrown by: But here (Non satiatur oculo • visu) the eyes are not satisfied with seeing: such joy is the Minister to the good man's soul, that he could be content to have him ever in his sight.

You have heard, how we are called Stars, I would direct the Application of this, to 3. sortes of people: Patrons, Laity, Ministers.

1. To speak much of Patrons, you will hold it frivolous: they hear not, being absent; neither would they believe, being present: But let not sin be balked, though it be not by, to answer for it self. Many of them care not whom they present, if his Purse can speak learnedly, though his tongue ignorantly. Ignorance, Superstition, and Symonie, were once proper to the Romish Sea; I know not what infortunate wind hath blown the last into our Land, and defiled the pure professors of Reformation. But you will say, there is no Simony, wherein the Minister is not one party. It is too true; woe to us the whiles: I mean not only the woe of misery, fatally forced on us by these evil days; but the woe of Judgment, which we voluntarily call on us by this wickedness. I will not speak to excuse us a t•to, sed a tanto: durum telum, necessitas: You that are the Donors, have the things consecrated to Piety and Faith, committed to you upon trust, and you have sworn it a law in your bosoms, (which you more strictly observe, then the law of your maker) that we shall buy them at your hands, or go without them. Christ threw out of the Temple, not only the buyers, but (let me say rather) the sellers: And though the Law of the Land, makes you not (Pares •oe•a) equal with us in the punishment; yet the Law of Heaven shall find you (Pares culpa,) in equal fault: I think, I might boldly say (under correction) you are in the greater damnation; as it had been more heinous in S. Peter to exact money of Magus, then in Magus to offer it: the reason is impregnable, you sin through a voluntary covetousness, we through extreme necessity; being constrained, either to beg with our families, or study evasions for so strict and religeous a law: If we therefore be condemned as Simonists, your easiest censure, is to be esteemed Infidels. Mee thinks I hear them reply; There is enough left to satisfy all, if there might be an equal division; but some have all, some nothing: To whom I will not answer, since that grave Father hath for me: Thus their Fathers have played the Thieves, and they come to compound the matter. If we speak of this, we are censured for covetous, but how lewdly? Is this covetise to desire our own? I say not the Churches superfluties, which they called once (Bona Pauperum) the goods of the Poor, but even the Churches necessaryes, which are (Bona Christ's) the goods of Christ; which now (Latci possident) profane men enjoy: for Gentlemen have cut out their gallant suites out of the Churches Broad-cloth, and left the Church her self nothing but mere Shreds: shall I say? Who have more done it, then they that stand so for the beauty of the Church? None more deface her, then they that most seem to adorn and pollish it: Let them undo two or three Ministers by their impropriations, and they will reward one (of their own humor) with the plasters of their bounty: Such corrupted Patrons are of Dionisius mind, that robbed his God of his golden Coat, as more fit for himself: They say, Nero and Agrippa came into the world with their feet forward, and what Monsters proved they? sure, never worse to the Commonwealth of Rome, then Simonicall Patrons to the Church of England. Well, if bribery, fraud, Simony, will not carry them to Hell, let them hope still to be saved: but (I would they heard me) if they be saved so living, and so dying, there is hope for the Devil to be saved. It is granted sin, but they may repent: true, but did ever man repent, that having time and means, could and would not restore? let them return their extorted money, which they have cruelly gotten by Simonicall contracts, to the poor Minister, or if he be dead, to his Wife and Children; or I will sooner believe, that Judas repented: Judas restored, yet repented not truly; and shall they repent truly, that restore not? Let them brag of their gains, that have thus coosoned God, the Church, their own souls: If ever they come with Simony on their backs into Heaven, I may be of the Indians mind, who dying under the Spanish cruelty, and admonished to prepare for Heauē, & to escape Hell, asked to what place the Spaniards went? They answered, to Heaven. Then, quoth the Indian, let me never come there: For surely, Simonistes, and honest men, do not belong to one house. There are 3. Pees in a line of relation, Patrons, Priests, People. Two of these Pees are made lean, to make one P. fat. Priests have lean Livings, People lean Souls, to make Patrons have fat Purses. I accuse not all in general, no one in particular, (Nam{que} mihi nec equos, mihi nec rapuere inuences,) but for Zion's sake I cannot hold my peace, which is so sick of this disease, that she lies at the mercy of God for recovery.

2. Let me speak yet more particularly to you, over whom God hath placed a Minister as a Star, Despise him not; at your peril, you despise God himself, and shall not go scotfree: on your souls be it, that hear me this day, whose table talk is furnished up with iestes, with invectives against Ministers: Whatsoever thou art, God hath honored the poorest Minister above thee, and taken him as worthy to serve at his own table, but not thee, nor thy fathers house, were his head Gold, his Treasure richer then Hezekiah's, and every room in his house better furnished then Solomon's, he may stand in need of the Minister: as great a Potentate as Pharaoh was, and as despicable as he thought Moses▪ yet his Courtiers often heard him; Send for Moses: so was Phenustocles ever banished in peace, but sent for home in war: we are passed over in the days of pride (as superfluous creatures, of whom no use) but when the wrath of God falls on the naked conscience, then the Minister is thought on; and the soul receives some comfort, whiles he feels the sick-beating Pulse, or leans on the groaning Pillow, speaking from us to Heaven, the humble devotions of a penitent heart, and from Heaven to us the comfortable things of Zion, and the never failing mercies of a tender Savior: Thus like some Fruit trees in fair weather, you throw Cudgels at us; in foul, run to us for shelter.

I will not speak affirmatively to you, in these rotten days of ours, wherein nothing but privations are in force and frequent: Despise not, afflict not, impoverish not your Stars; I will not say magnify, bless, enrich them, because I cannot hope it: yet, Oh for shame, do not their contraries.

1. Despise not. Why should I entreat this? We might imitate the fashion, Spernere se sperni, Scorn them that scorn us: but I persuade you for your own sakes, since it is not possible, you should honor the message of God, and despise him that God hath chosen to bring it. We shall be your good Ministers, till discordant things drop from us, and then farewell good conceit; as Tertullian spake merrily of the Heathen; Unless God please Man, he shall be God no longer: Now Man must be propitious to God. Reproofes are good Physic, though not so well relish'd: Indulgence is sweet, and you may think it better cheare; but you will not be so well after it. In these misjudging days, it is exceeding hard to over-reach the Devil; if we let sin alone, his Kingdom flourisheth; if we strike at him, and hit not the bough he sits on, we move him not: if we do, we are judged partial, personal, & wreakers of our own spleen. There is scarce a man that can read English, scarce a woman that can make her self ready to Church, but will presume to teach the Minister; and either we must preach what you will hear, or you will not hear what we preach. In Holiogabolus time, there was a Senate of Women, we have Conuocations; they consulted about Tyars, ours about Religion. Let us take heed, it is one of the Devils subtlest and shrewdest tricks, to make us so zealous in Religiō, that we grow wanton: and this sin is so much the more dangerous, as it endures not the reproving: thus if an holy impatience arm the Ministers tongue to speak too smart against your sins, he is straight said to rage: So Semeiah said of Jeremy, Jehu of Elisha, the Jews of Christ, and the Gentiles of Paul. Of those that never will be sober, we are called Bedlams. But S. Aug. well clears this, under the person of David, Jnsanire videbatur, sed regi Achis insanire videbatur, id est, stultis et ignorantibus: David seemed mad; but he seemed so to the King of Achis. We are called mad-men, but of none, save mad-men; their common exceptions against us, and contemptes of us, are these 4. 1. They say, we are Men, why doth not God send by worthier Messengers, as by Angels? They had best teach him: Send by whom thou shouldst send. 2. They say, we are simple men: As the Apostles were Fishermen, and Amos an Heardman. Gallants scorn that a Clowne should teach them their duties. They call us Idiotes, Innocentes: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet › , the word signifies such as do no hurt, but taken for Fools, that do neither good nor harm. 3. They say, we die like men, we can neither keep our selves from sin, nor our bodies from death. 4. They say, all we say, is but words: So Galuo called the Gospel, a question of words. I answer:

1. Men indeed; but men of God: so were the Prophets received and called: and, Let a man so think of us, as of the Ministers of Christ. We are intelligent creatures by Nature, but of Divine understanding by Grace: The things which no eye hath seen, &c. hath God's spirit revealed to us. Surely the Lord will do nothing, but he revealeth his secrets to his Servants the Prophets. Thou braggest thou hast two eyes, as well as thy Minister: thou hast indeed; one eye of Nature, and that's (Nequam,) a wicked one: another of Reason, and that's (Necquicquam,) a blind one: the one naught, the other naughty, and standest in need of the Ministers eye to guide thee. Thou demaundest a worthier Messenger; but when God spake to Israel in thunder, when by Angels, they cried, Oh let Man speak to us, least we perish. If an Angel or a Man say, Christ is borne, it is not more true in the Angel, then in the Man.

2. Simple men, yet is the word powerful: The Jews thought, they knew Christ and his breeding, is not this the Carpenters Son? yet, he taught as one having authority, not as the verbal Scribes: You think it shame enough, and extreme disgrace against us, to say, you know our beginnings, yet is God able to turn the proudest of you, by the simplest of us; or if not convert, as the savor of life, yet convince as the savor of death, and make your Mutimus to that common Jailor, delivering your incorrigible Souls to Satan, for, whom we bind on Earth, are bound in Heaven.

We die like men, but our words live: the Prophets told the Jews, that they should go into Babilon Captives: The high places of Jshac shall be desolate, and the Temples of Jsrael destroyed, &c. Behold, the Prophets die, but their words live: Judah is carried away Captiue, she dwelleth among the Heathen. And by the rivers of Babel, they sit and weep, when they remember Zion. So we denounce the judgments of God against the obstinate, and tell the Usurer, maugre his pile of Bonds, heap of Pawnes, bags of Coine, morgages of Lands, that his seed shall inherit the wind, and his hoards are no other then the gathering of the clouds, which once full, promise the dispersion of the greater showers; behold, we are laid low in our graves, yet our sayings have their timely proofs; the seed of the covetous come to ruin: behold the riotous Heir, sick and diseased through his intemperance, his intemperance bred of the fullness of his state, his full estate begot by his Fathers Parsimony, miserableness, nay perhaps injustice. Behold (I say) this man glad of a room in the Hospital for necessity, which his Father built of his superfluity. Thus the word we preach, passeth not, but is more immortal then the Heaven.

4. All we say, is but words, mere talk; so you may contemn all the works of God, and say, it was but talk that made the world; for, By his word he made it. This is a common slander, when the Hel-hound (the covetous wretch) pincheth on the Priests side: No matter, let him talk for his living; yes, and have none: the time may come (if they call it talking) they may talk for Mercy too, and have none. If they call God's speaking to them, talking; what is their speaking to God? There is difference betwixt speaking, talking, and saying: speaking comes by nature, talking by custom, saying by art: Children speak, Fools talk, Learned men say: All that have the organs of voice, can speak and talk, but not say, Solius est oratoris dicere, vulgi loqui. Tullius could affirm it, that an Orator only says; the common people talks. Our Preaching is not then talking, but saying a sententious and deliberate speech, uttered to purpose, composed by study and the direction of God's holy spirit; who with our words, winds, deeds, shutting where we shut, and opening where we have opened.

2. Afflict not. Is this possible? can Lambes be among Wolves, and not be bitten? Ecce mitto vos, &c, Behold, I send you as Lambes among Wolves: he said so, that foreknew our usage. Amara est veritas, et qui eam praedicat, repletur amaritudine. Bitter is the Truth, and he that preacheth it, shall be filled with bitterness. The cause of the worlds (< in non-Latin alphabet >) hatred of Christ, Joh. 7. is (< in non-Latin alphabet >) because I witness against it, that the works thereof are evil. It is written of the Christians, in the life of Nero, that they preserved the state; yet Dogs must devour them: they made Aurelius Army to prosper, and by their Prayers obtained thunder to destroy the enemies; yet (Christianos ad Leones) throw the Christians to the Lions. It hath ever been the Poesie of the Church, (Facere bonum, et habere malum,) to do good, and to suffer evil: So Christ himself sped, he healed, and was hurt; he pitied, and was mocked; he saved others, himself was killed. The color of our Livery on earth, is either Black, mourning; or Redde, persecuted. The Arms of the Church is the Cross, and her perpetual Song, is her militant state, like that oppressed Servants (< in non-Latin alphabet >), I suffer, I suffer: this is Christ's Dish, and the Apostles Sauce. Behold ôh Minister, the strait thou art in; neither wonder, nor weep, nor faint: this thou mightest have prevented, by keeping out, cannot be avoided, now thou art in: If we do our duty, the World will hate us; if not, God will curse us: by the first, we are in danger to loose our goods, good names, lives: by the second, our Souls, our Heaven, our God.

At pretium pars haec corpore maius habet:

Our worldly losses may be dear to us, yet dross, and trash, and rubbish, in regard of God, and bliss: Woe unto us that suffer; more woe to you that make us.

3. Impouerish not: I do not say, make us rich by your own poverty, as your progenitours did by our predecessors; but at least give us our own: The old Pharisee was an honest man in this, for he thought it a true position, Decima vt diues fias, Tyth, and be rich: but we think, tyth, and be poor: To communicate with our Teacher in all our goods, is not Scripture, though Paul himself speak it: a competency will serve: they are wiser then God: their competencies have brought us to impotencies: a Stoole, a Cruze, and a Candlestick, and a small Roome, are superabundance for a Priest: we need not with that order of the Popish Priests, pull on our selves a voluntary beggary, for Gentlemen (we thank them for it) have enforced us to it on necessity. I will not dispute, whether Tythes be due to us (iure diuino) by the law of God; or whether the with-holders come within the compass of that Curse; Ye are cursed with a curse, because ye have spoiled me in Tithes and Offerings; Since the Law present allows no power to sue such, on an action of detinue: to omit, that Melchizedek had Tythes, and that of Abraham, & even by the law of Nature, besides the Levitical of the Jews, which they say is abrogated, that would say no less of the moral law of God, for an advantage: Yet Paul. < in non-Latin alphabet › in all his goods, must needs evince, that the Minister must have some share in his people's substance: if any, why not that portion, which in all ages and Churches hath been given them? If they be consecrated to Jesus Christ, (I say not, by blinded superstition, but) by true and warrantable devotion, before the Pope ever put out his apparent horns, who dares rob our Savior of them, that never passed fine of his royal prerogative, to any purchaser? If they were his, whose are they? let them prove, he hath assigned them to Gentlemen, and I will clear them from that menace of Solomon; It is a destruction to devour holy things, &c. Ministers were once held Angels; now, unless they do bring Angels in their purses, Ibis Homere foras, for all their music, they are shut out of doors: They say, the Italian Ducades make their Priests Duces, Princes, Captains, brave fellows. The Spanish Pistolets make their Priests terrors to be feared, the word signifying Tormentigenus, a kind of torment: witness the Inquisition. The French Crowns crown their Priests with wealth and dignity; but (Defectu Angelorum Anglicorum) the want of English Angels, leaves our Ministry in the dust. The words of so reverend and honorable a Prelate, come here to my mind; Time was, Religion did eat up Polici•, and the Church devoured the Common-wealth, but now, Polici• eats up religion, & the Common-wealth devours the Church. Men are professed Politicians; Floreat respublica, copijis referta, &c. et quid ad nos? Let the Common-wealth prosper, and what care we for the Church. If we had no souls, this might be some shadaw of equity; but seeing we have, it is the substance of rank impiety.

And let me say, if men would imagine and plot a course to loose the souls, that Christ hath bought, they could not find a directer: for if Learning beg, study Arts that list, will be the general voice: If there be none to preach, there will be no believing; if no believing, ⟨∅⟩ saving. Never plead your Faith in the Gospel, whiles you reward it not: perhaps you can afford Desert, some bare and naked commendations; but we are not Chameleons, to live on the air of commendations. It is certain and invincible truth, not relieve the Gospel, not believe the Gospel. God grant, that our corruption this way, brings not Paganism, and flat Atheism in the end: Needs must you loose con, & sci, Devotion and Knowledge, when you take from us entia, our Livings. It is a shame, that we should cease studying of Sermons, and be driven to study for Bread to put in our mouths, & the mouths of our Families. It was a sin in the old Law, to destroy Matrem cum filijs, the old with the young: and can it be less in conscience, to pine to death those two fruitful Mothers, the Universities, and starve the Children in their bosoms: At which two Fountaines of learning, before we are suffered to drink, how many miserable and weary a day do we pass over in the inferior Schools: then not without much pain to our selves, cost to our Parentes, we are sent to one of those glorious Suns, to ripen our b•ddes: the exhibition they there allow us, they charge us to take for our Patrimony, and to expect no further means at their hands: We restrain our thoughts, I say, not only from pleasure (whereof to have no small measure is some Vnhappinesse under the Sun) but even from competent experience in the world, who had need be wise as Serpents, in these Machiauellian days. We subject our bodies to many Diseases, and grove out our remaining days under the burden of some wasting sickness: at last, (Cru••him• Plena) having stored our selves with the riches of Art, we come into our Country, to exchange them for their riches of earth: and yet how unworthy a thing is, Calestibus mercari terrena, to buy corporal things with spiritual, and to choppe Heaven for Earth? After all this, how hardly is anything attained, without paying to the Patron, either a Fine, or an annual Rent, or reservation of his own Tythes, or (some way) above the rate of a Copy-hold, to have a Lease during a sickly and spent life: Were the Goodes of the Church for this, entrusted to Gentlemen and Lord's of the Mannours, that they should set them to sale, and turn the Benefit into their own Purses? Why were not the Donations in the hands of the poor, who have more need? It is supposed, Gentlemen by nurture well instructed, can make the fittest choice, for God's glory, and not for their private gain. Must we then run (Per vari• casus per tot discrimina rerum,) through so many dangers, and difficulties, cares and troubles, and in the end arrive at Beggars haven, a necessary and enforced penury? Oh! Jnuitatus ad haec, aliquis de ponte negabit: a Beggar in the high way, will in the end, scorn to be a Minister. There is no vocation in the land, (honest in it self, and industriously followed by the professor) wherein a man may not live well, except only in the Ministry: and here, like the Jews under the tyranny of Egypt, when we should make Brick, work in our profession, we are forced to gather Straw, labor for sustenance.

But in vain we speak, the Sons of Zeruiah will be too hard for us; there is small hope to stench this bloody issue, till Christ touch their hearts by Faith. But you will say, many of the Clergy are rich: they are few; if any one of these four sortes. 1. Either enriched by some Patrimony or gift of Friends. 2. Or else such as distill a dry Rose-cake for Water; I mean by Parsymonie, and miserableness, get something out of Gentlemens leauinges, like the gleaning after the Vintage; for others carry away the crop. 3. Or else such as have lighted on the vnruined things of this Land, which stood out of the Popes way, and in that sickness of Superstition, scap'd the plague of Impropriation; Benefices which (the Devils Surgeon) Sacrilege hath not let blood, by custom, composition, enclossing, depopulation; though the Grape gatherers come, would they not leave some Grapes; if thieves come in the night, they will (but) destroy, till they have enough. 4. Or lastly, they are those (Antiqui Hero•, nati me•oribus annis) that came to their Livings, when that good Queen Elizabeth came to her Crown; at which time, Benefices went a begging, as Ministers do now: as for the rest, that have Liuings, they are scarce Liueones, or enough to keep themselves and their Families living: and for those that have none, they may make themselves merry with their Learning, if they have no Money; for they that bought the Patronages, must needs sell the Presentations; Vendere iure potest, emerat ill prius: and then if Balaam's Ass hath but an audible voice, and a soluble Purse, he shall be preferred before his Master, were he ten Prophets. If this weather hold, Julian need not send Learning into exile, for no Parent will be so irreligious, as with great expenses to bring his Child at once to misery and sin. Oh think of this, if your impudence have left any blood of shame in your faces: cannot you spare out of all your riot, some crumbs of liberality to the poor, needy, and neglected Gospel? Shall the Papists so outbid us, and in the view of their prodigality, laugh our miserableness to scorn? Shall they twit us, that our, Our Father, hath taken from the Church, what their Pater-noster bestowed one it? Shall they bid us, bate of our Faith, and better our Charity? Indeed, where heard you of a Papist, that cuttes short his Minister? Where see you a Protestant, that doth not? I speak not to commend the Religion of the Papist above the others, no more then Christ preferred the Religion of the Samaritan, to the Priests and Levites, when he praised his charity; but to apply that to us, which Christ once to the Jews, Tyre and Sidon shall condemn you: So the Papists shall judge us. The Papist comes with (Omnia dabo) to his Priest, I will give all: the Protestant with (Omnia eripiam) I will take away all. Do the Alps bar up all reward from us? Cannot Bounty creep over those frozen thresholdes? Flere licet, reparare vetatur.

I may perhaps be censured, to speak so home, in the respect of some particular advantage; and losers may have leave to speak: I confess, it would be a joyful day to me, to see the breaches of Jerusalem made up again; yet he is my witness, that doth now search, and shall hereafter judge all hearts, that the present Theame, the wants of the Church, the poverty of Ministers, and the hard hearts of their oppressors, together with the commiseration of the Studentes yet unborn, that shall feel this burden heavier, as the world grows (at once and insaparably) more old, more covetous; have been occasions only to induce this speech: For I not without cause fear, that as we may say of the Church in this our age, Omnia ad ruinam, all things are going to ruin; so our Children in the next generation, may justly cry with the Poet, Etiam periere ruinae, even the very ruins are ruined. Though I cannot but hope, that so long as our royal and religious Jacob (whose days God make as the days of Heaven) and his seed, shall bear rule in our Judah, he and they will make good that deserved title, and be defendours of the Faith, & not give leave and authority to any violence, further to forage the Church: God also put it into his Subiectes hearts, to love the Gospel, and then it shall not decay, for want of encouragement and reward: But for the detainers of the poor Ministers right, let them hear their reward. We to him, that he•eth up that, which is none of his: you that have taken away the Unction, and left us nothing but the Alablaster box, the Shreddes, the Sheardes, the scrapings of our own; as happy and rich, as you think yourselves, when you have summed up your gains, and cast your accounts at the end, if ever you be the richer, for that you have stolen from your Stars, let me come a begging to your Doors. Judas sold his Master for thirty Pence; he might put his gains in his eye: his losses stuck by him, when his money was gone: he lost a God, a Heaven, a Soul; but he threw away his cash: take heed, least you cry one day with him; We, and our Extortions are both perished. Remember, you must give account of your Stewardships; a fearful Bill of Reckoning, that many shall put up at that day to God. Item, so many scores of pounds in Malice and Suites at Law, Item, so many hundreds of pounds spent in Lusts and Vanities. Item, so many thousands in building Eglons Parlours. Item, to the Poor in a year, three pence. Item, to the Minister, just nothing: Nothing to God, and nothing from God, shall be your reward.

3. Let me end with our selves, and all to comfort; Ploramus nostris non respondere fae•en• speratum meritis, We lament on Earth, the ill success, and worse reward of our labors: but, (Sat erit mer•sse) it is enough that we have deserved. As dark as the World keeps us, and thinks us, We shall shine, and that with no ordinary glory; but, As the Stars: and this not for a time; but, For ever and ever. 1. If I had been in Heaven, I would describe this glory to you, You shall shine.

2. I would show you the differences of Glory, which are here implied; Good Men shall shine as the Firmament: but, Good Ministers, as the Stars. If I be not deceived, the Stars have a brighter glory than the Firmament. 3. Lastly, if I had ascended above the wheel of Time, where nothing but eternity dwelleth. I would strive to make you conceive the length of your glory, For ever and ever: but, Haec meditanda potius, quam dicenda, your meditations are better able to conceive these things, then my weak tongue to express. And so I cease to speak of that, which you shall never cease to enjoy, ending my Sermon, not my Text; and commending you to the Father of Peace: who, as he hath called us to so troublesome an Office for a time, will reward us with glory beyond all time, even forever and ever. This God grant for his Mercies sake, Jesus Christ for his Merits sake, the holy Ghost for his Names sake; to whom, with whom, and for whom, be all glory, honor, and praise, now and forever. Amen.

Right Honorable: it is a labor that hath neither recompense nor thanks, to tell them their madness, that fain would think themselves sober. Having therefore presumed (not to trouble the peace, but) to disquiet the security of our Israel: I durst not but aspire to some noble Patronage, that might shield both myself and labors, from the blows of all malevolent Censurers. In which thoughts, I was bold to center myself in your Honor; as the individual point of my refuge, wherein I have been taught the way by more worthy precedents: your Honorable Name having long stood, as a communis terminus, or Sanctuary of protection, to the labors and persons of many Students. The vn-erring hand of God hath placed your Lordship in the Seat of Justice, and Chair of Honor, (especially if it be true, what S. Hieron: says, that Sūma apud Deū nobilitas, clarū esse virtutibus: whereby you have power & opportunity, to whet the edge of virtue with encouragements, & to give vice the just retribution of deserved punishments. Happy influences have been derived from you, sitting as a Star in the Star-Chamber: conscionable mitigations of the Laws rigor in the Court of Chancery. To punish whē you see cause, is not more Justice then Mercy: Justice against the offender, Mercy to the Commonwealth. Those punishments are no other then actual Physic ministered to the Inheritance, Liberty, Body, to the bettering of the Conscience, and saving of the soul in the day of the Lord Jesus. Behold, my pen hath but writ after the original Copy of your Honors actions: desiring rather to learn by your doings, how to say; then to teach you by my sayings, how to do. I have spoken (God knows with what success) to these mad times: and he that would bind the frantic, though he loves him, angers him. The detector of men's much-loved sins, needs a Protector, that is both good & great. I am sure my eleciō is happy; if it shall please your Honor to cast the eye of acceptance on my weak labors. A young plant may thrive, if the Sun shall warm it with his beams. That Sun of righteousness, that hath saving health under his wings, shine forever on your Lordship, who hath been so liberal a fauorer to his Church, & among the rest to his unworthiest servant, and

Your Honors in all duty and thankful observance bounden THO: ADAMS,

The first Sermon.

ECCLESIASTES, CAP. 9. VER. 3.

The heart of the Sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart while they live: and after that, they go to the dead.

The Subject of the discourse is Man; and the speech of him hath three Poynts, defined and confined in the Text. 1. His Comma, 2. his Colon, 3. his Period. 1. Men's hearts are full of evil, there's the Comma. 2. Madness is in their hearts whiles they live: there's the Colon. 3. whereat not staying, after that they go down to the dead. And there's their Period. The first begins, the second continues, the third concludes their Sentence.

Here is Mans setting forth, his peregrination, and his journeys end. 1. At first putting out, His heart is full of evil. 2. Madness is in his heart, all his peregrination, whiles they live. 3. His journeys end, is the Grave, He goes to the dead.

First, Man is borne from the womb, as an arrow shot from the Bow. 2. His flight through this air, is wild, and full of madness; of indirect courses. 3. The Center, where he lights, is the Grave.

First, his Comma begins so harshly, that it promiseth no good consequence in the Colon. 2. The Colon is so mad and inordinate, that there is small hope of the Period. 3. When both the premises are so faulty, the Conclusion can never be handsome. Wickedness in the first proposition, Madness in the second: the Ergo is fearful, the conclusion of all is Death.

So then, 1. the beginning of Mans race is full of evil; as if he stumbled at the threshold. 2. The further he goes, the worse: Madness is joined- Tenant in his heart with life. 3. At last, in his frantic flight, not looking to his feet, he drops into the pit goes down to the dead.

To begin at the uppermost stair of this gradual descent; the Comma of this tripartite sentence gives man's heart, for a vessel. Wherein observe

1. The Owners of this vessel, men, and deriuatiuely, the sons of men.

2. The vessel it self is earthen, a Potte of God's making, and man's marring, the Heart.

3. The Liquor it holds is Evil, a defective, privative, abortive thing, not instituted, but destituted, by the absence of original Goodness.

4 The measure of this vessels pollution with evil liquor. It is not said sprinkled, not seasoned, with a moderate and sparing quantity. It hath not an aspersion, nor imbution, but impletion; it is filled to the brim: full of evil. Thus, at first putting forth, we have Man in his best member corrupted.

1. The Owners or Possessors, Sons of men.

Adam was called the son of God, Luk. 3. Enos was the son of Seth, Seth the son of Adam, Adam the son of God: But all his posterity the sons of men: we receiving from him both flesh, and the corruption of flesh, yea, and of soul too; though the substance thereof be inspired of God, not traduced from man: for the purest soul becomes stained and corrupt, when it once toucheth the body.

The sons of men. This is a deriuatiue and diminutiue speech; whereby man's conceit of himself is lessened, and himself lessoned to humility. Man, as God's creation left him, was a goodly creature, an abridgement of heaven and earth, an Epitome of God and the world: resembling God, who is a Spirit, in his Soul, and the World, which is a Body, in the composition of his. Deus maximus inuisibilium, mundus maximus visibilium: God the greatest of invisible natures, the World the greatest of visible creatures: both brought into the little compass of Man.

Now Man is grown less; and as his body in size, his soul in vigor, so himself in all virtue is abated: so that the son of man is a phrase of diminution, a bar in the Arms of his ancient glory, an exception of his derogate and degenerate worth.

Two instructions may the sons of men learn in being called so. 1. Their spiritual corruption. 2. Their natural corruptiblenes.

1. That corruption and original pravity, which we have derived from our Parents. Psal. 51. Behold, saith David, I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me. The original word is, warm me: as if the first heat derived to him, were not without contamination. I was borne a sinner, saith a Saint.

It is said, Gen. 5. that Adam begat a son in his own likeness, after his image, and called his name Seth. This image and likeness cannot be understood of the Soul: for this Adam begat not. Nor properly and merely of the Bodies shape; so was Cain as like to Adam, as Seth, of whom it is spoken. Nor did that image consist in the piety and purity of Seth: Adam could not propagate that to his son, which he had not in himself: virtues are not given by birth, nor doth grace follow generation, but regeneration. Neither is Seth said to be begotten in the Image of Adam, because mankind was continued and preserved in him. But it intends that corruption, which descended to Adams posterity by natural propagation. The Pelagian error was, Peccatum primae transgressionis in alios homines, non propagatione, sed imitatione transisse: that the guilt of the first sin was derived to other men, not by propagation, but by imitation: but then could not Adam be said, to beget a son in his own image: neither could Death have seized on Infants, who had not then sinned. But all have sinned, Rom. 5. As by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin: so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned.

This title then, the sons of men, puts us in mind of our original contamination, whereby we stand guilty before God, & liable to present and eternal judgments. Dura, tremenda refers: You will say with the Disciples, John. 6. This is an hard saying, who can hear it, bear it? nay, be ready to conclude with a sadder inference, as the same Disciples, after a particular instance, Math. 19. Who then can be saved?

I answer, We derive from the first Adam, sin and death: but from the second Adam, Grace and Life. As we are the sons of men, our state is wretched, as made the sons of God, blessed. It is a peremptory speech, 1. Cor. 15. 50. Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. It is a reviving comfort in the 6. Chapter of the same Epistle: Such we were, but we are washed, but we are sanctified, but we are justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, & by the spirit of our God. The conclusion or inference hereon is most happy. Now therefore there is no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit. We may live in the flesh, but if after the flesh, we shall die. Si voluntati & voluptati carnis satissacere conemur: If our endeavours be wholly armed and aimed to content the Flesh: but if we be led by the spirit, cum dilection, cum delectation, with love, with delight, we are of the sons of men, made the sons of God.

It is our happiness, not to be borne, but to be new borne. The first birth kills, the second gives life. It is not the seed of man in the womb of our mother; but the seed of Grace in the womb of the Church, that makes us blessed. Generation lost us; it must be regeneration, that recovers us. As the tree falls, so it lies: and lightly it falls to that side, which is most laden with fruits and branches. If we abound most with the fruits of obedience, we shall fall to the right hand, life: if with wicked actions, affections, to the left side, death.

It is not then, worth the ascription of glory to, what we derive naturally from man. David accepts it as a great dignity, to be son in law to a King. To descend from Potentates, and to fetch our pedigree from princes, is held mirabile, et memorabile decus, a dignity not to be slighted or forgotten. But to be a Monarch;

Imperium Oceano, famam quiterminat astris.

Whose fame and Empire no less bound controules,

Then the remotest sea, and both the Poles.

Oh, this is Celsissima gloria mundi, the supremest honor of this world, yet Princes are but men, saith the Psalmist. Put not your trust in Princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help. His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth. They may be high by their calling, Princes; yet they are but low by their nature, sons of men. And merely to be the son of man, is to be corrupt and polluted. They are sinful, the sons of men: weak, there is no help in them: corruptible, their breath goeth forth: dying, they return to their earth.

It is registered as an evident praise of Moses his faith, that for the rebuke of Christ, he refused to be called the son of Pharaohs daughter. There is no ambitiō good in the sons of men, but to be adopted the sons of God: under which degree there is no happiness, above which no cause of aspiring.

2. Our Corruptibleness is here also demonstrated. A mortal Father cannot beget an immortal son. If they that brought us into the world, have gone out of the world themselves, we may infallibly conclude our own following. He that may say, I have a man to my Father, a woman to my mother in his life; may in death, with Job say to Corruption, Thou art my Father: to the worm, Thou art my mother, and my sister.

It hath been excepted against the justice of God, that the sin of one man is deuolued to his posterity; and that for the fathers eating sour grapes, the children's teeth are set on edge, according to the Jewish Proverb, Ier. 31. 29. As if we might say to every son of man, as Horace sung to his friend: Delicta maiorum immeritus lues: Thou being innocent, doest suffer for thy nocent superiors. This a Philosopher objected against the gods; strangely conferring it, as if for the fathers disease, physic should be ministered to the son.

I answer, Adam is considered as the root of mankind: that corrupt mass, whence can be deduced no pure thing. Can we be borne Morians without their black skins? It is possible to have an Amorite to our father, and an Hittite to our mother, without participation of their corrupted natures? If a man slip a syense from a hawth orne, he will not look to gather from it grapes. There is not then a son of man in the cluster of mankind, but (eodem modo & nodo, vinculus & victus) it is liable to that common and equal law of death.

Vnde superbis homo, natus, satus, ortus ab hum•?

Proud man forgets, Earth was his native womb;

Whence he was borne: and dead; the Earth's his Tomb.

Morieris, non quia aegrotas, sed quia viuus: saith the Philosopher: Thou shalt die, oh son of man, not because thou art sick, but because the son of man. Cuinasci contigit, mori restat: Who happened to come into the world, must upon necessity go out of the world.

It is no new thing to die, since life itself is nothing else, but a journey to death. Quicquid ad summum peruenit, ad exitum properat: He that hath climbed to his highest, is descending to his lowest. All the sons of men die not one death, for time and manner: for the matter and end, one death is infallible to all the sons of men. The corn is sometimes bitten in the spring, often trode down in the blade, never fails to be cut up in the ear, when ripe: Quisquis queritur hominem mortuum esse, queritur hominem fuisse: Who laments, that a man is dead, laments that he was a man.

When Anaxagoras heard that his son was dead, he answered without astonishment, Scio me genuisse mortalem: I know that I begat a mortal man. It was a good speech, that fell from that shame of Philosophy, Epictetus: Non sum aeternitas, sed homo: particula vniuersi, vt hora diei: venire igitur oportet vt horam, praeterire vt horam: I am not eternity, but a man: a little part of the whole, as an hour is of the day: like an hour I came, and I must depart like an hour.

Mors dominos seruis, & sceptrum ligonibus aequat:

Dissimiles simili conditione ligat.

Deaths cold imparciall hands are us'd to strike

Princes and Peasants, and make both alike.

Some fruit is plucked violently from the tree, some drops with ripeness; all must fall, because the sons of men.

This should teach us, to arm our selves with patience and expectation, to encounter Death: Saepe debemus mori, nec volumus: morimur, nec volumus: Often we ought to prepare for death, we will not: at last, we die indeed, and we would not. Adam knew all the beasts, and called them by their names: but his own name he forgot, Adam, of earth. What bad memories have we, that forget our own names and selves, that we are the sons of men, corruptible, mortal? Incertum est, quo loco te mors expectat: itaque tu illam omni loco expecta. Thou knowest, in what place Death looketh for thee: therefore do thou look for him in every place. Watch therefore; for you know not what hour your Lord doth come. Thus for the Owners.

2. The vessel it self is the Heart.

The Heart is Mans principal vessel. We desire to have all the implements in our house good: but the vessel of chiefest honor, principally good. Quam male de te ipse meruisti, &c. saith Saint August. How mad is that man that would have all his vessels good, but his own heart! We would have a strong nerve, a clear veyne, a moderate pulse, a good arm, a good face, a good stomach, only we care not how evil the heart is, the principal of all the rest.

For, howsoever the Head be called the Tower of the mind, the Throne of Reason, the house of wisdom, the Treasure of memory, the Capitol of judgment, the shoppe of affections: yet is the Heart the receptacle of life, And Spiritus, which (they say) is Copula animae & corporis, a virtue uniting the soul and the body: if it be in the Liver natural, in the Head animal, yet is in the Heart vital. It is the member, that hath first life in mā, and is the last that dies in man; and to all the other members gives viuification.

As man is Microcosmus, an abridgement of the world, he hath heaven resembling his soul: earth his heart, placed in the midst as a center: the Liver is like the sea, whence flow the lively springs of blood: the Brain, like the sun, gives the light of understanding: and the senses are set round about, like the stars. The Heart in man is like the root in a tree: the organ or lung-pipe, that comes of the left cel of the heart, is like the stock of the tree, which divides it self into two parts, and thence spreades abroad (as it were) sprayes and boughs into all the body, even to the arteries of the head.

The Egyptians have a conceit, that man's growing or declining follows his Heart. The Heart of man, say they, increaseth still, till he come to fifty years old, every year two drachmes in weight, and then decreaseth every year as much, till he come to an hundred: and then for want of Heart, he can live no longer. By which consequence, none could live about an 100. years: which conceyted demonstration hath often proved false. But it is a vessel, a living vessel, a vessel of life.

It is a vessel properly, because hollow: hollow to keep heat, and for the more facile closing & opening. It is a spiritual vessel, made to contain the holy dew of grace, which make glad the City of God. It is ever full, either with that precious juice, or with the pernicious liquor of sin. As our Savior saith, Math. 15. Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies. Know you not, saith his Apostle, that you are the Temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If our Corpus be Templum Domini, sure our Cor is Sanctum sanctorum. It was the answer of the Oracle, to him that would be instructed, what was the best Sacrifice.

Damedium Lunae, solem simul, & canis iram.

Give the half Moon, the whole Sun, and the dogs anger.

Which three Characters make Cor the heart. The good heart is a receptacle for the whole Trinity: and therefore it hath three Angels, as if the three Persons of that one Deity would inhabit there. The Father made it, the Son bought, the Holy Ghost sanctifies it: therefore they all three claim a right in the Heart. It hath three cels for the three persons, and is but one Heart for one God. The world cannot satisfy it: a Globe cannot fill a Triangle. Only God can sufficiently content the Heart.

God is, saith a Father, non corticis, sed cordis Deus: not regarding the rind of the lips, but the root of the Heart. Hence Satan directs his malicious strength against the Heart. The fox doth gripe the neck, the mastiff flies at the throat, and the Ferret nippes the Liver: but the Devil aims at the Heart, inficere, interficere. The Heart he desires, because he knows, God desires it: and his ambition still inclines, intends his purposes and plots, to rob God of his delight. The Heart is the chief Tower of life to the body, and the spiritual Citadel to the whole man: always besieged by a domestical enemy, the Flesh: by a civil, the world: by a professed, the Devil. Every perpetrated sin doth some hurt to the walls; but if the Heart be taken, the whole Corporation is lost.

How should Christ enter thy house, and sup with thee, when the Chamber is taken up, wherein he would rest, the Heart? All the faculties of Man follow the Heart, as servants the Mistress, wheels the poise, or links the first end of the chain. When the Sun riseth, all rise; beasts from their dens, birds from their nests, men from their beds. So the Heart leads, directs, moves the parts of the body, and powers of the soul: that the mouth speaketh, hand worketh, eye looketh, ear listneth, foot walketh; all producing good or evil, from the good or evil treasure of the heart. Therefore the penitent Publican beat his Heart, as if he would cal up that, to call up the rest.

It is conspicuous then, that the heart is the best vessel, whereof any son of man can boast himself possessor: and yet (prohdolor!) even this is corrupted. To declare this pollution, the next circumstance doth justly challenge: only one caveat to our hearts, of our Hearts, ere we leave them. Since the Heart is the most precious vessel, man hath in all his corporal household, let him have good regard to it. Omni custodia custodi cor tuum: Keep thy heart with all diligence, saith Solomon. GOD hath done much for the Heart, naturally, spiritually.

For the former; He hath placed it in the midst of the body, as a General in the midst of his Army: bulwarked it about with breast, ribs, back. Lest it should be too cold, the liver lies not far off, to give it kindly heat: lest too hot, the lungs lie by it, to blow cool wind upon it. It is the chief, and therefore should wisely temper all other members: by the spleen we are moved to laugh; by the gall to be angry: by the brain we feel, by the liver we love, but by the heart we be wise.

Spiritually, he hath done more for the heart, giving the blood of his Son to cleanse it, soften it, sanctify it, when it was full, both of hardness and turpitude. By his omnipotent grace he vnroosted the Devil from it, who had made it a stable of uncleanness: and now requires it (being created new) for his own chamber, for his own bed. The purified heart is God's Sacrary, his Sanctuary, his House, his Heaven. As Saint August. glosseth the first words of the Pater noster. Our Father which art in heaven, that is, in a heart of an heavenly disposition. Quàmpropitia dignatio ista, that the King of Heaven will vouchsafe to dwell in an earthly Tabernacle!

The Heart then being so accepted a vessel, keep it at home: having but one so precious suppellectile or movable, part not with it upon any terms. There are four busy requirers of the Heart, besides he that justly oweth it. Beggars, Buyers, Borrowers, Thieves.

1 He that begs thy Hart, is the Pope: and this he doth not by word of mouth, but by letters of commendations, condemnations rather, his Seminary factors. He begs thy Heart, and offers thee nothing for it, but crucifixes, images, &c. mere images or shadows of reward: or his blessing at Rome; which, because it is so far distant, as if it lost all the virtue by the way, doth as much good, as a candle in Sunshine.

2▪ He that would buy this vessel of us, is the Devil; as one that distrusts to have it for nothing: and therefore set what price thou wilt upon it, he will either pay it, or promise it. Satan would fain have his Jewel-house full of these vessels, and thinks them richer ornaments, then the Babylonian Ambassadors thought the treasures of Hezekiah. Haman shall have grace with the King, Absalom honor, Jezebel revenge, Ammon his lusts satisfied, Judas money, Demas the world, if they will sell him their Hearts.. If any man, like Ahab, sell his heart to such a purchaser, let him know, that qui emit, interimit: he doth buy it, to butcher it.

3 The Flesh is the Borrower, and he would have this vessel to use, with promise of restoring. Let him have it a while, and thou shalt have it again; but as from an ill neighbor, so broken, lacerated, deformed, defaced; that though it went forth rich, like the Prodigal, it returns home tattered and torn, and worn, no more like a heart, then Michols image on the pillow was like David. This Sutour borrows it of the Citizen, till usury hath made him an Alderman: of the Courtier, till ambition hath made him noble: of the Officer, till bribery hath made him master: of the Gallant, till riot hath made him a beggar: of the Luxurious, till lust hath filled him with diseases: of the Country Churl, till covetise hath swelled his barns: of the Epicure, till he be fatted for death: and then sends home the heart, like a Iade, tired with unreasonable travel. This is that wicked borrower, in the Psalm, which payeth not again. Thou wouldest not lend thy beast, nor the worst vessel in thy house to such a neighbor: and wilt thou trust him with thy heart? Either not lend it, or look not for it again.

4. The World is the Thief, which (like Absalom) steals away the heart. This cunningly insinuates into thy breast, beguiling the Watch or Guard, which are thy senses, and corrupting the servants, which are thy affections. The world hath two properties of a Thief: first, It comes in the night time, when the lights of reason and understanding are darkened, and security hath gotten the heart into a slumber. This dead sleep, if it doth not find, it brings.

Sunt quo{que} quae faciunt altos medicamina somnos,

Vitaque Lethaealumina nocte premunt.

The world's a potion; who thereof drinks deep,

Shall yield his soul to a Lethargic sleep.

2 It makes no noise in coming, lest the family of our revived thoughts wake, and our sober knowledge discern his approach. This thief takes us, as it took Demas, napping: terrifies us not with noise of tumultuous troubles, and alarm of persecutions; but pleasingly gives us the music of gain, and lappes us warm in the couch of lusts. This is the most perilous oppugner of our hearts: neither beggar, buyer, nor borrower could do much without this thief. It is some respect to the world, that makes men either give or sell, or lend the vessel of their heart. Astus pollentior armis: Fraud is more dangerous then force. Let us beware this thief.

First, turn the beggar from thy door, he is too saucy, in asking thy best movable, whereas beggars should not choose their alms. That Pope was yet a little more reasonable, that shown himself content with a King of Spain's remuneration; The present you sent me was such, as became a King to give, and S. Peter to receive: But da pauperibus: the Pope is rich enough.

Then reject the buyer: set him no price of thy heart, for he will take it of any reckoning. He is near driven, that sels his heart. I have heard of a Jew that would for security of his lent money, have only assured to him a pound of his Christian debtors living flesh: a strange forfeit, for default of paying a little money. But the Devil, in all his covenants, indents for the heart. In other bargains, caveat emptor, saith the Proverb: Let the buyer take heed: in this, let the seller look to it. Make no marte nor market with Satan.

Non been pro multo libertas venditur auro.

The heart is ill sold, what ever the price be.

Thirdly, for the borrower: Lend not thy heart in hope of interest, lest thou lose the principal. Lend him not any implement in thy house, any affection in thy heart: but to spare the best vessel to such an abuser, is no less then mad charity.

Lastly, ware the thief: and let his subtlety excite thy more provident prevention. Many a man keeps his goods safe enough from beggars, buyers, borrowers, yet is met withal by thieves.

Therefore lock up this vessel with the Key of faith, bar it with resolution against sin, guard it with supervising diligence, and repose it in the bosom of thy Savior. There it is safe from all obsidious, or insidious oppugnations: from the reach of fraud or violence. Let it not stray from this home, lest like Dinah it be deflowered. If we keep this vessel our selves, we endanger the loss. Jacob bought Esau's birth-right, & Satha stole Adams Paradise, whiles the tenure was in their own hands. An Apple beguiled the one, a mess of pottage the other. Trust not thy heart in thine own custody; but lay it up in heaven with thy treasure. Commit it to Him, that is the maker and preserver of men: who will lap it up with peace, and lay it in a bed of joy, where no adversary power cā invade it, nor thief break through to steal it.

3. The Liquor this vessel holds, is evil.

Evil is double, either of Sin, or of Punishment: the deserving and retribution: the one of man's own affecting, the other of God's just inflicting. The former is simpliciter malum, simply evil of it own nature: the latter but secundum quid, in respect of the sufferer, being good in regard of God's glory, as an act of his Justice. For the Evils of our sufferings, as not intended here, I pretermit. Only, when they come, we learn hence how to entertain them; in our opinion, as our due rewards: in our patience, as men, as Saints: that tribulation may as well produce patience, as sin hath procured tribulation. Non sentire mala sua non est hominis, & non ferre non est viri: He that feels not his miseries sensibly, is not a man: and he that bears them not courageously, is not a Christian.

The juice in the heart of the sons of men is evil, all have corrupted their ways. Solomon speaks not here in individo, this or that son of man: but generally, with an universal extent, the sons of men. And leaving the plural with the Possessors, by a significant salaecisme, he names the vessel in the singular; the heart, not hearts: as if all mankind had cor vnum in vnitae malitiae: one heart in the unity of sin: the matter of the vessel being of one polluted lump; that every man, that hath an heart, hath naturally an evil heart. Adam had no sooner by his one sin slain his posterity, but he begot a son, that slew his brother. Adam was planted by God a good Vine, but his Apostasy made all his children sour grapes. Our nature was sown good, behold, we are come up evil. Through whose default ariseth this badness?

God created this vessel good; man poison'd it in the seasoning. And being thus distayned in the tender newness, seruat odorem testa diu: it smells of the old infection, till a new juice be put into it, or rather it self made new. As David prays: Create in me, oh Lord, a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me. GOD made us good, we have marred ourselues, and behold: we call on him, to make us good again. Yea, even the vessel thus recreated, is not without a tang of the former corruption. Paul confesseth in himself a body of Death, as well as David a native uncleanness. The best grain sends forth that chaff, whereof before the sowing, it was purged by the fan. Our contracted evil had been the less intolerable, if we had not been made so perfectly good. He that made heaven and earth, air and fire, Sun and Moon, all elements, all creatures good, surely, would not make him evil, for whom these good things were made. How comes he thus bad? Deus hominem fecit, homo se interfecit. In the words of our Royal Preacher, Eccles. 7. Loe, this only I have found, that God hath made man upright: but they have sought out many inventions. Man was created happy, but he found out tricks, to make himself miserable. And his misery had been less, if he had never been so blessed: the better we were, we are the worse. Like the posterity of some profuse or tainted Progenitour, we may tell of the Lands, Lordshippes, honors, titles, that were once ours; and then sigh out the song, fuius Troes, we have been blessed.

If the heart were thus good by creation, or is thus good by redemption, how can it be the continent of such evil liquor? when by the word of His mouth that never erred, A good tree cannot bring forth bad fruits. I answer, that saying must be construed in sensu composito: a good tree continuing good, cannot produce evil fruits. The heart borne of God (in quanto reatum est, not peccat) doth not commit sin, so far as it is borne of GOD. Yet even in this vessel, whiles it walks on earth, are some drops of the first poison. And so,

Dat dulces fons vnus aquas, qui et praebet amaras.

The same fountain sends forth sweet water and bitter;

though not at the same place, as Saint James propounds it.

But Solomon speaks here of the heart, as it is generate, or degenerate, not as regenerate: what it is by nature, not by grace: as it is from the first Adam, not from the second. It is thus a vessel of evil. Sin was brewed in it, & hath brewed it into sin. It is strangely, I know not how truly, reported of a vessel, that changeth some kind of liquor put into it, into it self: as fire transforms the fuel into fire. But here the content doth change the continent; as some mineral veins do the earth, that holds them. This evil juice turns the whole heart into evil; as water poured upon snow, turns it to water. The wickedness of man was so great in the earth, that it made every imagination of the thoughts of his heart only evil continually.

Here, if we consider the dignity of the vessel, & the filthiness of the evil it holds, or is rather holden of; (for non tam tenet, quam tenetur) the comparison is sufficient to astonish us.

Quàm male convenient vas aureum, atrum{que} venenum! Oh! ingrate, in considerate man! to whom God hath given so good a vessel, and he fills it with so evil sap. In a great house there be vessels of honor, and vessels of dishonor; some for better, some for baser uses. The heart is a vessel of honor, sealed, consecrated for a receptacle, for an habitacle of the graces of GOD. Shall we take the member of Christ, and make it an harlots; the vessel of God, & make it Satan's? did God infuse into us so noble a part, & shall we infuse into it such ignoble stuff? was fraud, falsehood, malice, mischief, adultery, idolatry, variance, variableness ordained for the heart, or the heart for them? when the seat of holiness is become the seat of hollowness: the house of innocence, the house of impudence: the place of love, the place of lust: the vessel of piety, the vessel of pravity: the throne of God, the court of Satan; the heart is become rather a Jelly, then an heart. Wherein there is a tumultuous, promiscuous, turbulent throng, heap'd and amazed together, like a wine-drawers stomach; full of Dutch, French, Spanish, Greek, and many country wines; envy, lust, treason, ambition, avarice, fraud, hypocrisy obsessing it, and by long tenure pleading prescription: that custom, being a second nature, the heart hath lost the name of heart, and is become the nature of that it holds, a lump of evil.

It is detestable ingratitude in a Subject, on whom his Sovereign hath conferred a golden cup, to employ it to base uses; to make that a wash-potte, which should receive the best wine he drinketh. Behold, the King of heaven and earth hath given thee a rich vessel, thy heart; wherein, though it be a piece of flesh or clay of it self, he hath placed the chief faculties of thy spirit and his: how adverse to thankfulness and his intent is thy practice, when thou shalt pour into this Cup lees, dregs, muddy pollutions, tetricall poisons, the waters of hell, wines which the infernal spirits drink to men: taking the heart from him that created it, from him that bought it, from him that keeps it; and bequeathing it in the death of thy soul, to him that infects, afflicts, tempts, and torments it: making him thy Executour, which shall be thy executioner; that hath no more right to it, then Herod had to the bed of his sister? What injury, what indignity is offered to God, when Satan is gratified with his goods: when his best movable on earth is taken from him, & given to his enemy?

The heart is flos solis, and should open & shut with the sun of righteousness. To him, as the Landlord, duplici iure, it should stand open, not suffering him to knock for entrance, till his locks be wet with the dew of heaven. Alas! how comes it about, that he which is the owner can have no admission? That we open not the doors of our hearts, that the King of glory might enter; who will then one day open the doors of heaven, that a man of earth may enter? Did God erect it as a lodging for his own Majesty; leaving no window in it, for the eye of man (so much as) to look into it, as if he would keep it under lock & key to himself, as a sacred Chalice, whereout he would drink the wine of faith, fear, grace and obedience, wine which himself had sent before for his own supper: and must he be turned forth by his own Steward, and have his Chamber let out for an Ordinary, where sins and lusts may securely revel? Will not He that made it, one day break it with a rod of iron, and dash it in pieces like a Potters vessel?

Shall the great Belshazzar, that Tyrant of Hel, sit drinking his wines of abomination and wickedness, in the sacred boules of the Temple, the vessels of God, the hearts of men, without ruin to those that delightfully suffer him? was it a thing detestable in the eyes of God, to profane the vessels of the Sanctuary; and will he brook with impunity the hearts of men to be abused to his dishonor? Sure, his justice will punish it, if our injustice do it. The very vessels under the Law, that had (but) touched an unclean thing, must be rinced or broken. What shall become of the vessels under the Gospel, ordained to hold the faith of Christ, if they be (more then touched) polluted with uncleanness? They must either be rinced with repentance, or broken with vengeance.

I am willingly led to prolixity in this point. Yet in vain the Preacher amplifies, except the hearer applies. Shall none of us, in this visitation of hearts, ask his own heart, how it doth? Perhaps, Security will counterfeit the voice of the heart, as Jacob did Esau's hands, to supplant it of this blessing; saying, I am well: and stop the mouth of diligent scrutiny with a presentment of Omnia been. Take heed; the heart of man is deceitful above measure. Audebit dissimulare, qui audet malefacere: He will not stick to dissemble, that dares to do evil. Thou needst not rip up thy breast, to see what blood thy heart holds, though thou hast been unkind enough to it in thine iniquities: behold, the beams of the Sun on earth witness his shining in heaven; and the fruits of the Tree declare the goodness or badness. Non ex folijs, non ex floribus, sed ex fructibus dignoscitur arbor.

What is lust in thy heart, thou adulterer; malice in thine, thou envious: usury in thine, thou covetous; hypocrisy in yours, ye sons of Gibeon; pride in yours, ye daughters of Jezebel; falsehood in yours, ye brothers of Joab; and treachery in yours, ye friends of Judas? Is this wine fit for the Lord's boule, or dregs for the Devil to carouse of? Perhaps the sons of Belial will be filthy; let them be filthy still. Who can help them, that will not be saved? let them perish.

Let me turn to you, that seem Christians, (for you are in the Temple of Christ, and I hope, come hither to worship him,) with confidence of better success. What should uncleanness do in the holy City, evil in a heart sanctified to grace, sealed to glory? The vessel of every heart is by nature temperde of the same mould; nor is there any, (let the proud not triumph) Quorum praecordia Titan de meliore luto sinxit. But though nature knew none grace hath made difference of hearts; and the sanctified heart is of a purer metal, then the polluted. A little living stone in God's building is worth a whole quarry in the world. One poor man's honest heart is better then many rich evil ones. These are dead; that's alive: and a living dog is better then a dead Lion. Solomon's heart was better then Absalom's, Judes then Judas, Simon Peters then Simon Magus his: all of one matter, clay from the earth, but in regard of qualities, and God's acceptance, the richest mine and coarsest mould have not such difference. There is with nature grace, with flesh faith; with humanity Christianity in these hearts.

How it becomes it such a heart, to have hypocrisy, injustice, fraud, covetousness leen in it? Let these bitter waters live in heathen cesterns. To the master of maledictiō, & his ungodly imps we leave those vices: our harts are not vessels for such liquor. If we should entertain thē, we give a kind of warrant to others imitatiō. Whiles Polygamie was restrained within Lamechs doors, it did but moderate harm: but when it once insinuated into Isaac's family, it got strength, & prevailed with great prejudice. The habits of vices, whiles they dwell in the harts of Belials children, are merely sins: but when they have room givē thē in the harts of the sons of God, they are sins and examples: not simply evil deeds, but warrants to evil deeds. Especially with such despisers and despiters of goodness; who, though they love, embrace and resolve to practice evil, yet are glad, they may do it by Patronage, and go to hell by example.

But how can this evil juice in our hearts be perceived? what beams of the Sun ever pierced into that abstruse and secret paulion? The anatomizing of the heart remains for the work of that last and great day. Rom, 2. 16. As no eye can look into it, so let no reason judge it. But our Savior answers, Out of the heart proceed actual sins: the water may be close in the fountain, but will be discerned issuing out. The heart cannot so contain the unruly affections, but like headstrong rebels they will burst out into actions; and works are infallible notes of the heart. I say not, that works determine a man to damnation or bliss: the decree of God orders that: but works distinguish of a good or bad man. The Saints have sinned, but the greatest part of their converted life hath been holy.

Indeed we are all subject to passions, because men: but let us order our passions well, because Christiā men. And as the skilful Apothecary makes wholesome potions of noisome poisons, by a wise melling and allaying them: so let us meet with the intended hurt of our corruptions, and turn it to our good. It is not a sufficient commendation of a prince to govern peaceable and loyal subjects: but to subdue or subvert rebels. It is the praise of a Christian to order refractory and wild affections, more then to manage yielding and pliable ones. As therefore it is a provident policy in Princes, when they have some in too likely suspicion, for some plotted faction, to keep them down, and to hold them bare: that though they retain the same minds, they shall not have the same means to execute their mischiefs: so the rebellious spirits impotency gives most security to his Sovereign: whiles He sees afar off what he would do, but knows (near at hand, that's certainly) he cannot. So let thy heart keep a straight & awful hand over thy passions and affections: Vt si moueant, non remoueant: that if they move thee, they may not remove thee from thy rest. A man then sleeps surely, securely; when he knows (not that he will not, but) that his enemy cannot hurt him. Violent is the force and fury of passions, ouerbearing a man to those courses, which in his sober and collected sense he would abhor. They have this power, to make him a fool, that otherwise is not; and him, that is a fool, to appear so. If in strength thou canst not keep out passion, yet in wisdom temper it: that if, notwithstanding the former, it comes to whisper in thine ears thine own weakness; yet it may be hindered by the latter from diuulging it to thy shame.

Thou seest how excellent and principal a work it is to manage the heart, which indeed manageth all the rest: and is powerful to the carrying away with it self, the attendance of all the senses: who be as ready at call, and as speedy to execution, as any servant the Centurion had: waiting only for a come, go, do, from their leader the Heart. The ear will not hear, where the heart minds not, nor the hand relieve, where the heart pities not: nor the tongue praise, where the heart loves not. All look, listen, attend, stay upon the heart, as a Captain to give the onset. The Philosopher saith; It is not the eye that seeth, but the heart: so it is not the ears that hear, but the heart.

Indeed: it sometimes falleth out, that a man hears not a great sound or noise, though it be nigh him. The reason is, his heart is fixed, and busily taken up in some object, serious in his imagination, though perhaps in it self vain: & the ears like faithful servants attending their master the heart, lose the act of that auditive Organ, by some suspension, till the heart hath done with them, and given them leave. Curious and rare sights, able to ravish some with admiration, affect not others, whiles they stand as open to their view: because their eyes are following the heart, and doing him service about another matter. Hence our feet stumble in a plain path, because our eyes, which should be their guides, are sent some other way on the hearts errand. Bee then all clean, if thou canst: but if that happiness be denied on earth, yet let thy heart be clean; there is then the more hope of the rest.

4. The measure of this vessels infection. Full.

It hath not aspersion, nor imbution, but impletion. It is not a moderate contamination, which admitted into comparison with other turpitudes, might be exceeded, but a transcendent, egregious, superlative matter, to which there can be no accession: the vessel is full; and more then full, what can be? One vessel may hold more then another, but when all are filled, the least is as full as the greatest. Now Solomon, that was no flatterer, because a King himself; without awe of any mortal Superior, because Servant to the King of Kings, & put in trust with the registering of his Oracles; tells man plainly, that 1. his heart, not some less principal part, 2. is evil, not good, or inclining to goodness. 3. nay, full of evil, to the utmost dram it contains.

This describes Man in a degree further, then nature left him, if I may so speak: for we were borne evil, but have made our selves full of evil. There is time required to this perfecting of sin, and making up the reprobates damnation. Judgment stays for the Amorites, till their wickedness becomes full: and the Jews are forborne, till they have fulfilled the measure of their fathers. Sin loved, delighted, accustomed, habituated, voluntarily, violently perpetrated, brings this impletion. Indeed, man quickly fills this vessel of his own accord: let him alone, and he needs no help to bring himself to hell. Whiles God's preventing grace doth not fore-stall, nor his calling grace convert, man runs on to destruction, as the fool laughing to the stocks. He sees evil, he likes it, he dares it, he does it, he lives in it; and his heart, like an hydropicke stomach, is not quiet till it be full.

Whiles the heart like a Cistern, stands perpetually open, and the devil like a Tankerd-bearer, never rests fetching water from the conduit of hell to fill it; and there is no vent of repentance to empty it; how can it choose, but be full of evil? The heart is but a little thing, one would therefore think it might be soon full: but the heart holds much, therefore one would think, it could not be soon full. It is a little morsel, not able to give a Kite her breakfast; yet it contains as much in desires, as the world doth in her integral parts. Neither if the whole world were given to the Pellaeian Monarch, would he yet say, My heart is full, my mind is satisfied.

There must then concur some co-working accidents to this repletion. Satan suggests: concupiscence harkens, flatters the heart with some persuasion of profit, pleasure, content: the heart assents; and sends forth the eye, hand, foot, as instruments of practice: lastly, sin comes; and that not alone: one is entertained, many press in. Mala sunt contigua & continua inter se. Then the more men act, the more they affect; & the exit of one sin, is another's hinte of entrance: that the stage of his heart is never empty, till the tragedy of his soul be done.

This fullness argues a great height of impiety. Paul amply delivered the wickedness of Elimas, Act. 13. full of all subtlety and all mischief, thou child of the Devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, &c. a wretched impletion. So is the reprobate estate of the Heathen described. Rom. 1. to be filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, covetousness, &c. The same Apostle in the same Epistle speaking of the wicked in the words of the Psalm, saith, Their mouth is full of cursing and bitterness. Here, the heart is full of evil. The commander being so filled with iniquity, every member as a Soldier in his place, fills it self with the desired corruption. The eye is full of adultery and lust, saith the Apostle. The hand full of blood, saith the Prophet. The foot full of averseness, the tongue full of curses, oaths, dissimulations. Every vessel will be full, as well as the heart; full to the brim, nay, running over, as the vessels at the marriage in Cana, though with a contrary liquor. And when all are replenished, the heart is ready to call, as the widow in the 2. of Kings, the 4. Bring me yet another vessel, that it may be filled.

This is the precipitation of sin, if God doth not prevent, as Satan doth provoke: it rests not, till it be full. Sinful man is evermore carrying a stick to his pyle, a talent to his burden, more foul water to his cestern, more torments to be laid up in his hell: he ceaseth not, without a supernatural interruption, & gracious revocation, till his measure be full.

Thus I have run through these 4. circumstances of the Comma, or first Point of man: observing, 1. from the Owners, their corruptible fragility. 2. from the vessel, the Hearts excellency. 3. from the liquor contained in it, the pollution of our natures. 4. and lastly, from the plenitude, the strength and height of Sin. The sum is, 1. the heart. 2. of man. 3. is full. 4. of evil.

I should now conclude, leaving my discourse, and you to meditation of it; but that you would then say, I had failed in one special part of a Physician; that having described the malady, I prescribe no remedy. Since it is not only expedient, to be made experient of our own estate, but to be taught to help it: Give me leave therefore briefly to tell you, that some principal intentions, to the repair of your Hearts ruins are these. 1. Seeing this vessel is full, to empty it. 2. Seeing it is foul, to wash it. 3. Since it hath caught an ill tang, to sweeten it. 4. And when it is well, so to preserve it. with these four uses, go in peace.

1. There is first a necessity, that the heart which is full of evil by nature, must be emptied by conversion, and replenished with grace, or not saved with glory. what scuppet have we then to free the heart of this muddy pollution? Loe, how happily we fall upon Repentance; God grant Repentance fall upon us. The proper engine ordained & blessed of God to this purpose, is Repentāce: a grace, without which man can never extricate himself from the bondage of Satan: a grace whereat (whē it lights on a sinful soul) the devils murmur and vex themselves in hell, and the good Angels rejoice in heaven. This is that blessed engine, that lightens the hearts of such a burden, that Rocks and Mountains, and the vast body of the earth laid on a distressed & desperate sinner, are corkes and feathers to it.

This is that, which makes the eternal wisdom content to admit a forgetfulness, and to remember our iniquities no more then if they had never been. This speaks to Mercy, to separate our sins from the face of God, to bind them up in heaps and bundels, and drown them in the sea of oblivion. This makes Mary Magdalene of a sinner, a Saint: Zacchaeus of an extortioner, charitable, and of a persecuting Saul, a professing Paul. This is that mourning master, that is never without good attendants; tears of contrition, prayers for remission, purpose of amended life. Behold the office of Repentance: she stands at the door, and offers her loving service: entertain me and I will vnlode, vnlade thy heart of that evil poison, and were it full to the brim, return it thee empty. If you welcome Repentance, knocking at your door from God, it shall knock at God's door of mercy for you. It asks of you amendment, of God, forgiveness. Receive it.

2. The heart thus emptied of that inveterate corruption, should fitly be washed, before it be replenished. The old poison sticks so fast in the grayne of it, that there is only one thing of validity to make it clean, the blood of Jesus Christ. It is this, that hath bathed all hearts, that ever were, or shall be received into God's house of glory. This blood cleanseth us from all sin. Paul seems to infer so much, in joining to the spirits of just men made perfect, Jesus the Mediator of the new Covenant, and the blood of sprinckling, that speaks better things then the blood of Abel. As if he would prove, that it was this blood, which made them just and perfect. In vain were all repentance without this: no tears can wash the heart clean, but those bloody ones, which the side of Christ, & other parts wept, when the spear and nails gave them eyes: whiles the Son of eternal joy became a Mourner for his brethren. Could we mourn like doves, bowle like Dragons, & lament beyond the waylings in the valley of Hadradimmon, quid prosunt lacrimae, what boots it to weep, where there is no mercy, and how can there be mercy without the blood of Christ?

This is that ever-running fountain, that sacred Poole of Bethesda, which without the mediation of Angels, stands perpetually vnforbidden to all faithful visitants. Were our Leprosy worse then Naaman's, here's the true water of Jordan, or Poole of Siloam, Wash and be clean; Bring your hearts to this Bath, ye corrupted Sons of men; hath God given you so precious a Lauer, and will you be unclean still? Pray, entreat, beseech, send up to heaven the cries of your tongues and hearts for this blood: call upon the preserver of men, not only to distill some drops, but to wash, bathe, soake your harts in this blood. Behold, the Son of God himself, that shed this blood, doth entreat God for you: the whole Choir of all the Angels & Saints in heaven are not wanting. Let the meditation of Christ's mediation for you, give you encouragement and comfort. Happy Son of man, for whom the Son of God supplicates, and intercedes. What can He request without speed?

He doth not only pray for you, but even to you, ye sons of men. Behold him with the eyes of a Christian, faith and hope; standing on the battlements of heaven, having that for his pavement, which is our seeling, offering his blood to wash your hearts, which he willingly lost for your hearts: denying it to none, but Wolves, Bears, and Goats, and such reprobate, excommunicate, apostate spirits, that tread it under their profane and luxurious feet, esteeming that an unholy thing, wherewith they might have been sanctified. Come we then, come we, though sinners, if believers, and have our hearts washed.

3. All is not done with this vessel, when washed. Shall we empty it, cleanse it, and so leave it? Did not Satan reenter to the house swept and garnished, with seven worse spirits, whiles it was empty? Behold then, when it is emptied, and washed, and sweetened, it must be filled again: a vacuity is not allowable. It must be replenished with somewhat, either evil or good. If God be not present, Satan will not be absent. When it is euacuated of the works of the flesh, it must be supplied with the fruits of the Spirit. Humility must take up the room, which pride had in the heart. Charitableness must step into the seat of avarice. Love extrude malice, mildness anger, patience murmuring. Sobriety must dry up the floods of drunkenness. Continence cool the inflammations of Lust. Peace must quite the head from dissensions. Honesty pull off Hypocrisies visor; and Religion put profaneness to an irrevocable exile.

Faith is the hand, that must take these Jewels out of God's treasury, to furnish the heart: the pipe to convey the waters of life into these vessels. This infusion of goodness must follow the effusion of evil. God must be let in, when Satan is locked out. If our former courses and customs, like turned-away abjects, proffer us their old service, let us not know them, not own them, not give them entertainment, not allow their acquaintance. But in a holy pride, as now made Courtiers to the King of heaven, let us disdain the company of our old play-fellows, opera tenebrarum, the works of darkness. Let us now only frequent the door of mercy, and the fountain of grace; and let faith, & a good conscience be never out of our society. Here's the supply.

4. We have now done, if when our hearts be thus emptied, cleansed, supplied, we so keep them. Non minor est virtus, &c. Nay, let me say, non minor est gratia. For it was God's preventing grace, that cleansed our hearts, and it is his subsequent grace that so preserves them: That we may truly sing;

By grace, and grace alone,

All these good works are done.

Yet have we not herein a Patent of security and negligence sealed us; as if God would save us, whiles we only stood and looked on. But he that hath this hope, purgeth himself. And we are charged to keep and possess our vessel in sanctification and honor: and to liue unspotted of the world.

Return not to your former abominations, lest your latter end be worse then your beginning. Hath God done so much to make your hearts good, and will you frustrate his labors, annihilate his favors, vilipend his mercies, and reel back to your former turpitudes? God forbid it, and the serious deprecation of your own souls forbid it.

Yea, oh Lord, since thou hast dealt so graciously with these frail vessels of flesh, emptied them, washed them, seasoned them, supplied them; seal them up with thy Spirit to the day of redemption, and preserve them, that the evil one touch them not. Grant this, Oh Father almighty, for thy Christ, and our Jesus his sake.

Amen.

Mystical Bedlam, OR, THE WORLD OF MAD-MEN. The second Sermon.

ECCLESIASTES, CAP. 9. VER. 3.

The heart of the Sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart while they live: and after that, they go to the dead.

MANS sentence is yet but begun; and you will say, a Comma doth not make a perfect Sense. We are now got to his Colon: having left his heart full of evil, we come to his madness. No marvel if, when the stomach is full of strong wines, the head grow drunken. The heart being so filled with that pernicious liquor, evil, becomes drunk with it. Sobriety, a moral daughter, nay, Reason the mother is lost; he runs mad, stark mad. This Frenzy possessing, not some outroome, but the principal seat, the Heart.

Neither is it a short madness; that we may say of it, as the Poet of anger, furor brevis est; but of long continuance; even during life, whiles they live. Other drunkenness is yet after sleep sober; but this is a perpetual lunacie.

Considerable then is 1. the matter. 2. the men. 3. the time, Quid, in quo, Quamdiu. What, in whom, and how long. Madness is the matter. 2. the place, the heart. 3. The time, whiles they live. The Colon or medium of man's Sentence spends it self in the description of

- Tenant. Madness.
- Tenement. The Heart.

- Tenure: Whiles they live.

1. Madness. 2. holds the heart. 3. during life. It is pity. 1. so bad a Tenant. 2. hath so long time. 3. in so good a house.

1. The Tenant. Madness.

There is a double madness, corporal and spiritual, The object of the former is Reason: of the latter, Religion. That obsesseth the brain, this the Heart. That expects the help of the natural Physician, this of the Mystical. The difference is; this spiritual madness may insanire cum ratione, cum Religion numquam. The morally-frantic may be mad with reason, never with Religion.

Physicians have put a difference betwixt Frenzy, and Madness: imagining madness to be only an infection and perturbation of the foremost Cell of the head; whereby Imagination is hurt: but the Frenzy to extend further, even to offend the reason and memory; and is never without a fever. Galen calls it an inflammation of the brains, or films thereof, mixed with a sharp fever. My purpose needs me not to be curious of this distinction.

To understand the force of madness, we must conceive in the brain three ventricles; as houses assigned by Physicians for three dwellers, Imagination, Reason, and Memory. According to these three internal senses or faculties, there be three kinds of Phrensies or Madnesses.

1. There are some mad, that can rightly judge of the things they see, as touching imagination & fantasy: but for cogitation and reason, they swerve from natural judgment.

2. Some being mad, are not deceiv'd so much in common cogitation and reason; but they err in Fantasy and Imagination.

3 There are some, that be hurt in both imagination and reason, and they necessarily therewithal do lose their memories. That whereas in perfect, sober, and well composed men, Imagination first conceives the forms of things, and presents them to the reason to judge; and reason discerning them, commits them to Memory to retain: in mad-men nothing is conceived aright, therefore nothing deriu'd, nothing retayn'd.

For spiritual relation, we may conceive in the soul; understanding, reason, will. 1. The understanding apprehendeth things according to their right natures. 2. The Reason discusseth them, arguing their fitness or inconvenience, validity or vanity: and examines their desert of probation or disallowance, their worthiness either to be received or rejected. 3. The Will hath her particular working, and embraceth, or refuseth the objects, which the understanding hath propounded, & the reason discoursed.

Spiritual madness is a depravation, or almost deprivation of all these faculties, quoad coelestia; so far as they extend to heavenly things. 1. For understanding, the Apostle saith. The natural man perceyues not spiritual things, because they are spiritually discerned. And the very minds of unbelievers are blinded by the god of this world. 2. For Reason: it judgeth vanities more worthy, of prosecution when they are absent, of embracing when they salute us. It is in vain to serve the Lord: and what profit is it, that we have kept his ordinance, or walked mournfully before him? This is the voice of distracted cogitation, and of reason out of the wits. We call the proud happy; and the workers of wickedness are set up: yea they that tempt God are delivered. 3. For Will; it hath lost the propenseness to good, and freedom of disposing it self to well doing: neither hath it any power of it own, to stop and retarde the precipitation to evil.

Now whereas they distinguish Soul. 1. in vegetabilem, that giveth life. 2. in sensibilem, that giveth feeling. 3. in rationalem, that giveth reason: the first desiring esse, to be; the second, been, to be well; the third optime esse, to be best; so not resting till it be with God: behold, this spiritual madness enervates this last action of the soul, as corporal endeavors to extinguish the two former.

They attribute to the Soul 5. powers. 1. Feeling, whereby the Soul is moved to desire convenient things, and to eschew hurtful. 2. Wit, whereby she knoweth sensible and present things. 3. Imagination, whereby she beholdeth the likeness of bodily things, though absent. And these three virtues, say Philosophers, be common to men with beasts. 4. is Ratio, whereby she judgeth between good and evil, truth and falsehood. 5. Intellectus, whereby she comprehends things (not only visible, but) intelligible, as God, Angels, &c. And these two last are peculiar to man, abiding with the soul, living in the flesh, and after death. It beholdeth still the higher things per intellectum, and the lower per rationem.

As corporal madness draws a thick obfuscation over these lights, so spiritual corrupts and peruerts them: that as they are strangers to heaven, quoad intellectum, so at last, they become fools in natural things, quoad rationem. As the Apostle plainly. Even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, so God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things that are not convenient. They that forget God, shall forget nature. Hence ensue both these frenzies, and with them a dissimilitude to men, to Christian men. It is reckoned up among the curses, that wait on the heels of disobedience. Deut. 28. The Lord shall smite thee with madness, blindness, and astonishment of heart. But it is a fearful accumulation of God's judgments and our miseries, when spiritual Frensy shall possess the soul, and scatter the powers of the inner man: euacuating not only imagination; but knowledge; not reason, but faith; not sense, but conscience. When the opinion of the world shall repute men sober and wise, and the scrutiny of God shall find them mad-men.

To draw yet nearer to the point of our compass, & to discover this spiritual madness; let us conceive in man's heart, (for therein this frenzy consists) in answerable reference to those three faculties in the brain, and powers of the soul before manifested, these three virtues, Knowledge, Faith, Affections. The defect of grace, and destitution of integrity, to the corrupting of these three, cause madness. We will not inquire further into the causes of corporal frenzy: the madness which I would minister to, is thus caused: a defective knowledge, a faith not well informed, affections not well reformed. Ignorance, unfaithfulness, and refractory desires make a man mad.

1. Ignorance

Is a cause of this madness; nay, it is madness it self. Supplicij causa est, supplicium{que} sui. How mad are they then, that settling their corrupted souls on the lees of an affected ignorance, imagine it an excusatory mitigation of their sinfulness! But so it befalls them, as it doth the frantike: Hi dementiam, illi ignorantiam suam ignorant: These are ignorant of their own ignorance, as those of their madness., 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 & 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 are inseparable companions. Wickedness is folly; and ignorance of celestial things is either madness, or the efficient cause, (or rather deficient) whereupon madness ensueth. All the workers of iniquity have no knowledge. The wicked in the day of their confusion, shall confess, that the madness of their exorbitant courses, and their wildnes erring from the way of truth, arose from their ignorance of the way of the Lord. Therefore have we erred from the way of truth, and the light of righteousness hath not shined upon us, &c. Will you hear their acknowledged reason? For the way of the Lord we have not known. So Wisd. 13. from the absent knowledge of the true God, & for want of understanding, and confessing by the works the workemaster, the madness of Idolarry is hatched. For health, he calleth upon that which is weak: for life, he prayeth to that which is dead: and for a good journey, he asketh of that which cannot set a foot forward. Through this error, they were so mad, as to ascribe, first to stocks and stones, insensible creatures; secondly, to men, dust and ashes; thirdly, to wicked men, the worst of those that had a reasonable soul; fourthly, to Devils, the malicious enemies of God and men, that incomparable name of God.

Beyond exception, without question, the authority, patronage, and original fatherhood of spiritual madness, is the nescience of God. No marvel, if the people do err in their very heart, saith the Psalmist, the local seat of this madness, when they have not known the ways of the Lord. The true object of divine knowledge is God; and the Book wherein we learn him, is his Word. How shall they scape the rocks, that sails without this Compass? when the Frenzy hath turned the edge of common sense, frustrated the power of reason, and captivated the regent-house of understanding, a man dreads not fire, mocks the thunder, plays at the holes of Asps, & thrusts his hand into the mouths of Lions: ignoti nec timor, nec amor; he knows not the danger.

So, whiles the supreme Justice is not known, nor the avenger of wickedness understood, the ungodly are so mad, as to mock at sin, to play at the brinks of the infernal pit, and to dally with those Asps & Crocodiles, the stinging and tormenting spirits; to precipitate themselves into that vnquenched fire, to fillup the darts of thunder back again to the sender, and with a thirsty voracity to swallow down the dregs of the wrathful vial. Quid in causa nisi ignorantia? what hath thus distempered the heart, and put it into this wildness, that without fear or wit, men run into the evident danger of vengeance, if not ignorance? Aprudent man foreseeth the plague, and hideth himself, but the foolish run madly on, and are punished.

If the Romists were not mad-mē, or worse, they would never set up ignorance as a Lamp to light men to heaven: assuring it for the damme to produce, and nurse with her cherishing milk to batten devotion; when it is indeed an original cause of madness, the mother of error and wildness; making man's way to bliss more uncertain, then Hannibals on the Alps, or a Larkes in the air: The truth is; know to know, and be wise; know to obey, and be happy. This is eternal life, to know God, and his Son whom he hath sent, Jesus Christ. Labor to understand the Bible, lest thou undergo the curses in it. Lege historiam, ne fias historia. Saint Paul after the recitation of many fearful judgments, concludes: Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples, and are written for our admonition, &c. If we will not be admonished by these ensamples, we may become ensamples our selves, histories of madness to future generations. Let the Papists call Ignorance by never so tolerable and gentle names, it is Ignorance still, still cause of madness. If madness may bring to heaven, there is hope for these willfully ignorant.

2. Vnfaithfulness

Is a sufficient-efficient cause of madness. Faith is the Christian man's reason: now on the privation of reason, must needs follow the position of madness. For shall the Creator of heaven and earth, the eternal Justice, and infallible Truth affirm? shall he swear? will you put him to his oath; and that by two immutable things, the best in heaven, and the best on earth? will you have him set his hand to it, and write it with his own finger? dare you not yet trust him without a Seal? must he seal it with that bloody wax, in the impression of death on his Son? must you have witnesses, three on earth, and as many in heaven, when the King of Kings might well write Teste meipso? and will you not yet believe him? Is there no credit from your hearts to all these premises, promises, attestations, protestations, signs, seals? Will not these, all these signify, certify, satisfy your souls of that unchangeable truth? Surely, you are mad, haplesly, hopelessly mad, unmeasurably out of your spiritual wits. Were you as deeply gone in a corporal frenzy, I would sigh out your desperate case.

Hei mihi quod nullis ratio est medicabilis herbis!

Shall the Lord threaten judgments, woe to him that trembles not. Non sapient, sentient tamen. Hell was not made for nothing. The vantguard of that accursed departing rabble, the ringleaders of the crew that dance to hell, are unbelievers. Revel. 21. An unsettled heart accompanied incredulity. If ye will not believe, surely ye shall not be established. Neither are they that believe not, gathered within the pale and sold of the Church; but wander like straggling goats, and wild beasts on the mountains and forests of this world. Hereupon, through the improuident and incircumspect courses, that mad Infidelity keeps, the soul stumbles at the Rock, and is broken by that, which might have been her eternal safety. 1. Pet. 2. They that wander from the mounds and bounds of Faith, madly invite dangers to salute them. Sub clypeo fidei, & subsidio virtutis vir tutus. But where faith is not our Proctor, nor is providence our Protector: what shall shield us, in the absence of faith? Not Solon, not Solomon, a Wise man among the Gentiles, a wiser among the Christians; but grow mad in the deficiency of faith.

Men see by unanswerable arguments, that the hand of God is too strong for sinners; that the least touch of his finger staggers their lives, their souls: that he sends his Executioner, Death, to cal the wicked away; and that in a more horrid shape, then to others; arming him with plague, murder, distraction, destruction, and that often with suddenness: they behold that (Cadit corpus, inde cadauer; sepelitur, seponitur) the body dies, and turns to rottenness: they know their own building to be made of the same loame and dust, and therefore liable to that common and equal law. Frequent examples of God's immediate vengeance, are added to the ancient trophees and monumental ruins of his former desolations: spectacles set up in the vast Theater of this world, whereof quocunque sub axe, whither soever thou turnest thine eyes, thou must needs be a spectator. Shall we still think, that solummodo pereunt, vt pereant; vel vt pereundo alios deterreant: they only perish to perish, and not to terrify others, threatening the like wretchedness to the like wickedness? Surely, the judgments of God should be like his Thunders; Poena ad paucos, terror ad omnes: Whilst some fall, others should fear. They that will not take example by others, shall give example to others.

But we see those that are as ripe in lewdness, draw long and peaceable breathes: neither is it the disposition of a singular power, but the contingencie of natural causes, that thus worketh. Take heed: it is not the levity, but the lenity of God; not the weakness of his arm, but the mercy of his patience, that thus forbearth thee. The Lord is not slack, as some count slackness, but is longsuffering to us-ward, &c. If this gentle Physic make thee madder, he hath a dark chamber to put thee in, a dungeon is more lightsome and delightsome, the Grave; bands of darkness to restrain thy outrages, and potions of brimstone to tame and weaken thy perverseness. Then will he demonstrate actually; Nemo me impune lacessit: No man shall provoke me unpunished.

Infidelity of God's judgments is madness; unbelief of his mercies hath never been counted less. What is it else, to refuse the offer of that Lamb, which takes away the sins of the world, and to cut off our selves from that universal promise? Moritur Christus pro indigenis, pro indignis: and spreaders out his arms on the Cross, to embrace both Jew and Gentile. Why doth not God give faith? I answer with that Father. Non ideo non habet fidem, quia Deus non dat; sed quiatu non accipis. Thou doest not therefore lack faith, because God doth not offer it; but because thou wilt not accept it.

The name of Jesus Christ is, saith Saint August. Nomen, sub quo nemini desperandum est: A name able to defend us from desperation. But there are many implacable threatenings against out guiltiness: There are none implacable to faith; none without reservation of mercy to repentance. Every conditional proposition hath two parts: the former suspendeth the sentence, and is called the antecedent: the latter concludeth the sentence, and is called the consequent. The first, Nil ponit in esse. As a conditional promise inferreth nothing, but deriueth all force and virtue from the connection, whereof it dependeth. So in menaces, there is either some presupposed cause, or after-concession, wherein it inferreth a consequence. If thou hast sinned: if thou doest not repent. There is place for remission with God, if there be place for repentance in thy own heart.

If then distrust of God's mercy be not madness, what is? when it causeth a man to break that league of kindness which he oweth to his own flesh; and offers to his hand engines of his own destruction: evermore presenting his mind with halters, swords, poisons, pistolls, ponds: disquieting the heart with such turbulent and distracting cogitations; till it hath adjured the hands to imbrue themselves in their own blood, to the incurring of a sorer execution from the justice of God. Is he not mad, that will give credit to the Father of lies, rather than to the God of Truth? when God promiseth to Penitence, the wiping away her tears, the binding up her wounds, and healing her sores: and the devil denieth it; giving it for impossible to have the justice of God satisfied, and thy sins pardoned: behold, darkness is believed rather than light, and falsehood is preferred to truth.

Be not thus Lyon-like in your houses, and frantic in your hearts, mad in your desperate follies; to shut up heaven, when the Lord hath opened it; to renew that score which he hath wiped; and when he hath pulled you out of the fire, to run into it again: like Tigers, to tear and devour your own souls, which that blood of eternal merit hath freed from the Dragon of hell. It is not a light and inferior degree of madness, but a diffident and desperate; when the Physician (even He of heaven) shall promise help to a •ore, and apply playsters of his own blood to it, the Patient shall thrust his nails into it, and answer, nay, It shall not be healed. This sin is like that fourth Beast in the 7. of Daniel, without distinction of name or kind. Dreadfull, terrible, exceedingly strong; and it had great iron teeth, &c. The Lyon, Bear, Leopard are tame and gentle, in regard of this Beast: it is desperate madness: That grinds the poor with his iron teeth, and stamps his own heart under his malignant feet, and dasheth against God himself with his horns of Blasphemy.

It is then clearer then the day, that the darkness of Infidelity is Phrenzie; whether (as it hath been in stanced) it be presumptuous against God's Justice, or desperate against his Mercy. For, who but a mad-man would hope for impunity to his willfully-continued sins, where he visibly perceives, that peccatum peccantē necessitat morti: that iniquity gives soul and body liable to condemnation, and objects them to the vnappeaseable wrath of God? And yet who but a mad-man, having sinned, will despair of forgiveness, when the mercy of God hath allowed a place to repentance? Turn, and live, saith the Lord: for I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth.

3. Refractory and perverse Affections

Make the possessed frantic. This is a speeding cause, and fails not to distemper the soul, whereof it hath gotten mastery. There may be first, a sober knowledge, that the Patient may say, Video meliora, I see better things: and secondly, a faith, (but such as is incident to devils) probo{que}, I allow of them: but thirdly, where the whole man is tyrannized over by the Regent-house of irrefragable affects, deterior a sequor, he concludes his course with, I follow the worse. Observe the Philistines crying, 1. Sam. 47. God is come into the Campe; woe unto us, &c. Yet they settle, hearten, harden themselves to fight against him. Ver. 8. Woe unto us: who shall deliver us out of the hand of these mighty God's? yet verse 9. Bee strong and quit yourselves like men, O ye Philistines: quit yourselves like men, and fight. Twice they behold their Dagon fallen down before the Ark: yet Dagon must be their God still, and the Ark is only reuerenc'd for a ne noceat.

How many run mad of this cause, inordinate & furious lusts! If men could send their understandings, like Spyes, down into the Well of their hearts, to see what obstructions of sin have stopped their veins, those springs that erst derived health and comfort to them; they should find, that male afficiuntur, quia male afficiunt: their mad affects have bad effects: and the evil disposedness of their souls, ariseth from the want of composednesse in their affections. The Prophet Jeremiah, chap. 2. compareth Israel to a swift Dromedary, traversing her ways, and to a wild Ass used to the wilderness, that snuffeth up the wind at her pleasure. Be ye not, saith the Psalmographer, as the horse and mule, which have no understanding: whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle. Men have understanding, not beasts: yet when the frenzy of lust ouerwhelmeth their senses, we may take up the word of the Prophet, and pour it on them. Every man is a beast by his own knowledge. And therefore man that is in honor and understandeth not, is like unto beasts that perish. Did not the bridle of God's over-ruling providence, give cohibition to their madness, they would cast off the saddle of reason, and kick nature it self in the face.

This is that which Solomon calls the wickedness of folly, foolishness, and madness: an actual deviation & deviation of the way of righteousness: a practical frenzy, a roving, wandering, vagrant, extravagant course; which knows not which way to fly, nor where to light, except like a Dorre in a dung-hill: an opinion without ground, a going without a path, a purpose to do it knows not what, a getting and losing, bending and breaking, building up and pulling down: conceyuing a multitude of thoughts, with much anxiety, and with a sudden neglect scattering them. As that woman, who being long barren, by studying and practicing phisic, became pregnant to the bearing of many children: upon whom she afterward exercising the same skill, brought them all to an untimely grave. So

Per eandem redditur artem

Haec Medaea ferox, quae medicaea fuit.

So madly do these frantickes spend their time and strengths, by doing and undoing, tying hard knots, and untying them, affecting the issue of their own brains not a day together; and destroying much seed in the birth of their thoughts, because the conception now pleaseth them not. The Proverb saith, that the most wild are in least danger to be stark mad: but here, wildenes is madness; an indefatigable frenzy; an erring star reserved for the black darkness; a rolling stone that never gathers any moss to stay it; an incessant and impetuous fury, that never ceaseth roving and raving, till it come to the Center, Hell.

Thus I have endeavor'd to demonstrate Madness, in the true definition, form and colors. But as a man cannot so well judge of a Sum, whiles it lies in the heap, as when it is told and numbered out: if this united and contracted presentation of madness be not so palpable in your conceits, as you would desire it; behold, to your further satisfaction, I come to particulars. The whole denominates the parts; as all of water, is water; all of flesh, flesh: so every willful sin is madness. Doubtless, when we come to this precise distribution, and narrow scrutiny, to the singling out of Frenzies, you will bless yourselves, that there are so few Bedlam-houses, and yet so many out of their wits.

Stultorum plena sunt omnia. It were no hard matter to bring all the world into the compass of a fools Cap. I dare not go so far: only magna est plenitudo hominum, magna solitudo sapientum: There is great plenty of men, and no scarcity of mad-men. Plurima pessima: The most are not the best. Pretiosa non numerosa: Vile things breed as plentifully as mountain-mise. Goodness, like the Rail, flies alone: but Mad-men, like Partridges by Coueys. Nay, we may say, Magna solitudo hominum: if it be true that Lactantius says. Nemo potest iure dici homo, nisi qui sapiens est: He is not a man, that is a mad-man. The fool is but imago hominis, the shadow or resemblance of a man. The world is full of mad-men, and the madder it is, the less it is sensible of the own destruction. Semel insaniuimus omnes: We have been all once mad, is too true a saying: some in youth, others in age. The first is more obuious and common: wildness is incident to youth: the latter more perilous, and of less hope to be reclaimed. If we must be mad, better young then old: but better not be borne then be mad at all, if the mercy of God and grace of Jesus Christ recollect us not. In the words of a Poet.

All are once mad; this holds for too strong truth:

Blest man! whose madness comes and goes in youth.

I promised to particularize and set open the gates of Bedlam, to leave madness as naked, as ever sin left the first propagators of it and mankind. The Epicure shall lead the ring, as the fore-man of this mad Morisco.

1. The Epicure.

I would fain speak (not only of him, but) with him. Can you tend it, Belly-god? The first question of my Catechism shall be, What is your name? Epicure. Epicure? What's that? speak not so philosophically; but tell us in plain dealing, what are you? A lover of pleasure, more then of God. One that makes much of myself; borne to live, and living loving to take mine ease. One that would make my belly my executour, and bequeath all my goods to consumption, for the consummation of my own delights. Hoh! a goodfellow, a merry man, a mad-man. What is your summū bonum? Pleasure. Wherein consists it? Rehearse the Articles of your belief. I believe that delicacies, junkets, quotidiā feasts, suckets & marmulads are very delectable. I believe, that sweet wines and strong drinks; the best blood of the grape, or sweat of the corn is fittest for the belly. I believe that midnight revels, perfumed chambers, soft beds, close curtains, and a Delilah in mine arms, are very comfortable. I believe that glistening silks, and sparkling Jewels, a purse full of golden charms, a house neatly decked, gardens, orchards, fish-ponds, parkes, warrens, and whatsoever may yield pleasurable stuffing to the corpse, is a very heaven upon earth. I believe, that to sleep till dinner, and play till supper, and quaffe till midnight, and to dally till morning; except there be some intermission to toss some painted papers, or to whirl about squared bones; with as many oaths and curses, vomited out in an hour, as would serve the devil himself for a Legacy or stock, to bequeath to any of his children: this is the most absolute and perfect end of man's life.

Now a deft Creed, fit to stand in the devils Catechism. Is not this madness, stark and staring madness? What is the Flesh which thou pamperst with such indulgence; as thou feedest beasts to feed on them, doest thou not fat thy flesh, to fat the worms? Go Heliogabalus to thy prepared muniments, the monuments of thy folly and madness: thy Tower is polished with precious stones and gold, but to break thy neck from the top of it, if need be: thy halters enwouen with pearl, but to hang thyself, if need be: thy sword enamell'd, hatched with gold, and embost with Margarites, but to kill thyself, if need be. Yet (for all this) deaths properation prevents thy preparation, and thou must fall into thine enemies hands.

Thou imaginest felicity to consist in liberty, and liberty to be nothing else, but potestas viuendi vt velis; a power to live as thou list. Alas, how mad art thou? thou wilt not live as thou shouldst, thou canst not live as thou wouldst: thy life and death is a slavery to sin and hell. Tut, Post mortem nulla voluptas; and here, verse 4. It is better to a living dog, then a dead Lyon. Thou art mad; for, for all these things thou must come unto judgment.

How many of these mad-men ramble about this City? that lavish out their short times in this confused distribution, of playing, dicing, drinking, feasting, beasting: a cupping-house, a vaulting-house, a gaming-house share their means, lives, souls. They watch, but they pray not: they fast when they have no money, and steal when they have no credit; and revelling the whole week, day and night, only the Sunday is reserved for sleep, and for no other cause respected. Bee not mad, as the Apostle saith: Bee not deceived; for because of these things cometh the wrath of God on the children of disobedience. Are not these mad men: that buy the merry madness of an hour, with the eternal agonies of a tormented conscience?

2. The Proud

Is the next Mad-man, I would have you take view of in this Bedlam. The proud man? or rather the proud woman: or rather hac aquila, both he and she. For if they had no more evident distinction of sex, then they have of shape, they would be all man, or rather all woman: for the Amazons bear away the Bell: as one wittily, Hic mulier will shortly be good latin, if this transmigration hold: For whether on horseback, or on foot, there is no great difference: but not discernible out of a Coach. If you praise their beauty; you raise their glory: if you commend them, command them. Admiration is a poison, that swelles them till they burst.

Laudatas extendit auis Iunonia pennas.

Is not this madness? De ignorantia tui, venit in te superbia. Self-ignorance is the original of pride. Is not he mad, that knows not himself? Quanto quis humilior, tanto Christo similior. Humility is Christ's resemblance, Pride the Devils Physnomie. Is he not mad, that had rather be like Satan then God? Humility is begun by the information of Christ, wrought by the reformation of the Spirit, manifested in conformation to obedience. But Pride, saith Aug. Vbi mentem possederit, erigendo deijcit, inflammando euacuat, & domum destruit, quam inhabitat. Pride casteth down by lifting up, by filling emptieth, and destroys the house where it inhabiteth. If superbire be supraregulam ire, then is pride extrauagancy and madness: a pernicious, perilous sin, that intraps even good works.

Do you think, there is no pride, no madness in the land? Ask the Silke-men, the Mercers, the Tyrewomen, the Complexion-sellers, the Coach-makers, the Apothecaries, the Embroiderers, the Featherers, the Perfumers; and above all as witnesses beyond exception, the Tailors. If you cast up the debt-books of the other, and the fearful bills of the last, you shall find the total sum, Pride and madness. Powders, liquors, vnguents, tinctures, odors, ornaments deriu'd from the living, from the dead, palpable instances, and demonstrative indigitations of pride and madness. Such translations and borrowing of forms, that a silly countryman walking the City, can scarce say, there goes a man, or there a woman. Woman, as she was an human creature, bore the image of God; as she was woman, the image of man: now she bears the image of man indeed, but in a cross and mad fashion; almost to the quite defacing of the image of God. Howsoever; that sex will be the finer, the prouder, the madder. For pride and madness are of the feminine gender. They have reason for it. Man was made but of earth; Woman of refined earth; being taken out of man, who was taken out of the earth: therefore she arrogates the costlier ornaments, as the purer dust. Alas! how incongruous a connexiō is fine dust, proud clay? the attribute is too good for the subject.

A certain man desired to see Constantine the Great: whom intently beholding, he cried out: I thought Constantine had been some greater thing; but now I see, he is nothing but a man. To whom Constantine answered with thanks. Tu solus es, qui in me oculos, apertos habuisti. Thou only hast looked on me with open and true judging eyes. O nobiles magis quā foelices pannos; may many great men say of their stately robes: nay, O honoranda, magis quam honesta vestimenta; may proud creatures say of theirs. What is a silken coat to hide aches, fevers, impostumes, swellings; the merited poisons of lust? when we may say of the body and the disease, as of man and wife, for their incorporation of one to the other, Duo sunt in carne vna: they are two in one flesh.

There is mortality in that flesh, thou so deckest: & that skin which is so bepainted with artificial complexion, shall lose the beauty and it self. Detrahetur nouissimum velamentum cutis. You that sail betwixt heaven and earth in your four-sail'd vessels, as if the ground were not good enough to be the pavement to the soles of your feet: know that the earth shall one day set her foot on your necks, and the slime of it shall defile your surphul'd beauties: dust shall fill up the wrinkled furrows, which age makes, and paint supplies. Your bodies were not made of the substance, whereof the Angels; not of the nature of stars, nor of the water, whereof the fire, air, water, and inferior creatures. Remember your Tribe, and your fathers poor house, and the pit whereout you were hewn: Hanibal is at the gates, death stand at your doors: be not proud, be not mad: you must die.

3. The Lustful

Is not to be missed in this Catalogue. The Poet calls amantes, amantes; taking (or rather mistaking) Love for Lust. Indeed it is insana libido, a blinding, blending fascination; a Witch that with her powerful charms intoxicates the brains. A Father contemplating in his meditations, how it came to pass, that our forefathers in the infancy of the world, had so many wives at once, answers himself. Certe enim fuit consuetudo, non fuit culpa: Whiles it was a custom, it was scarce held a fault. We may say no less of our days: Lasciuiousnesse is so wonted a companion for our Gallants, that in their sense, it hath lost the name of being a sin. They call it Magnatum ludum; and whether it be or no, thence derive to themselves authority and imitation.

But still, Quae te dementia cepit? Thou art mad, whiles incontinent, Is it not malum sui diffusiuum? a saucy sin, a costly disease? yet were it cheap to the purse, is it not the price of blood? Can all your prouocatiues, enliuenings, trepidations, and fomenting preservatives, prevent the wasting of your marrows? Chamberworke will dry the bones. If my heart, saith Job, hath been deceived by a woman; it is a fire that consumeth to destruction, and would root out all mine increase. Luxuriam sequitur dissipatio omnis: Luxury is attended on by a general consumption: first, of Substance, Prov. 6. By means of an whorish woman, a man is brought to a piece of bread. Secondly, of Body. Tremores pedum, & articularum generat depriuationem: It weakens the limbs, and vnties the joints, those knots whereby the body is trussed together. Saint Paul calls it a sin against a man's own body. Thirdly, of Name. A wound and dishonor will he get, and his reproach shall not be wiped away. Even when he shall depart his place (the world) he leaves (an evil memorial) a bad •auour behind him.

I would mention the loss of his Soul too; but that he cares not for: the other he would seem to love, then how mad is he to endanger them? If thou be not mad, away with these fomenta luxuriae: feed nature, not appetite. Nature nihil parùm, appetitui nihil satis. Qui minùs tradit corpori, quàm debet corpori, ciuem necat: Qui tradit plus corpori, quàm debet corpori, hostem nutrit: As he that allows less to his body, then he owes to his body, kills his friend: so he that gives more to his body, then he owes to his body, nourisheth his enemy. Thou complaynest of original evil in thy flesh; yet nourishest what thou complainest against. Caro non est mala, si malo careat. But Christ was more favorable to the Adulteress, and sent her away with impunity: yet not in allowance to the vice of the accused, but to convince the wickedness of the accusers. Putauit lapidandam, non à lapidandis. Noluit talem, noluit à talibus: He might think her worthy to die, but not by them that were worthy to die. He would not have her polluted, nor yet to perish by so polluted hands. I conclude the madness of these men with the Poet.

Ludit amor sensus, oculos perstringit, & aufert

Libertatem animi, & mira nos fascinat art.

Credo, aliquis Daemon subiens praecordia, flammam

Con•itat, & raptam tollit de cardine mentem.

—Amor est & amaror & error.

Lust blinds the senses, and with witching art,

Brings into fatal servitude the heart.

A subtle Fiend, the cause and plague of badness,

Poysons the blood, and fills the brain with madness.

If they will not see this yet, (as what frantic man perceives his own madness?) they shall feel it under the hands of an ill Surgeon on earth, or a worse in hell.

4. The Hypocrite

Plays the mad-man under covert and concealment. He is proud under the shadow of humility. But he cannot say with David, Psal. 131. Mine heart is not haughty, nor mine eyes lofty. Cor & oculi, fons & rivuli. The tongue that brags of humility, deserves little credit. Frons, vultus, oculi saepe mentiuntur; lingua vero saepissime: The forehead, eyes, and countenance do often deceive, the tongue most commonly. The worst Inn hath sometimes the biggest Sign; and the baser metal the loudest sound. Turpiora sunt vitia, cum virtutum specie celantur: Vices are then more ugly, when they have put on the robes of virtues. Hypocrita solus vult omnibus videri melior, & solus est omnibus peior: The Hypocrite would seem better then any man, and is indeed the worst of all men. His respect is not to the reward of virtue, but regard of men; as if virtue were not sibimet pulcherrima merces, a sufficient compensation to it self. Being the Son of a hand-maid, and a bramble indeed, as Jotham spake of Abimelech; he brags as much of his shadow, as either Vine, Olive, Fig-tree, or the tallest Cedar in Lebanon.

He mourns for his sins, as a hasty Heyre at the death of his Father. Haereditus luctus sub Larua, risus est: He is at once a close mourner, and a close reioycer. When the wicked man counterfeit himself good, he is then worst of all. Dissembled sanctity is double iniquity: quia & iniquit as est, & simulatio: because it is both sin and simulation. Hypocrites are like Jugglers, that show tricks of Legerdumaine, seeming to do the feats they do not, by casting a mist before men's eyes. Howsoever it was once said, Stultitiam simulare loco, prudentia summa est: I think it not so intolerable as the speech of Protagoras in Plat. somewhat agreeing to Machiauel: He is a mad-man, that cannot counterseit Justice, and dissemble integrity. I am here rather occasioned to say: He is a mad-man, that doth counterfeit good things, because he doth but counterfeit. And in that great Epiphany, and manifestation of the secrets of all hearts, he shall be found a mad-man. Mean time, he is a frantic too: for he incurres the worlds displeasure, in making a show of good lines; God's double displeasure in making but a show. He that would purchase the hatred both of God and man, is he less then mad?

5. The Avarice

Is a principal in this Bedlam. Soft: if it were granted, that the Covetous were mad, the world it self would run of a garget: for who is not bitten with this mad dog? It is the great Canon of the Devil, charged with chain-shot, that hath killed charity in almost all hearts. A poison of three sad ingredients; whereof, who hath not (to speak sparingly) tasted? Insatiability, rapacity,tenacity. In concupiscendo, acquirendo, retinendo. Covetousness hath three properties, saith Ambrose, Concupiscere aliena, cupita inuadere, celare quod ruadit: To covet not her own, to get what she couets, and to keep what she gets. And yet, Oh Avarice, why art thou so mad after money? Non habentes inficit, habentes non refecit: It hurts them that it possesseth, and helps not them that possess it. The brood, that covetousness hatcheth, is an offspring intricated with cares terrestrial, infected with desires carnal, blinded with passions, subjected to affections, infirmed by temptations, informed by lusts, infolded in errors, in ambiguities difficult, obnoxious to suspicions. Is he not mad, that will foster in his bosom a damme, with such a damned littour?

Tria retia habet Diabolus in mundum extensa: vt quicquid euaserit de retibus gulae,incidat in retia inanis gloriae; & quicquid euaserit his, callidius capiatur retibus auaritiaie. De his nullus perfect euasit: The Devils three nets are Ryot, Vain-glory, Covetousness: The second catcheth them that scape the first; and the last misseth not to apprehend the delivered from both the former. He that flies from the Lion, the Bear meets him; and the escaping both these, the Serpent (Covetousness) bites, not unlike the prediction of God to Elias, concerning Hazael, Jehu, and Elisha; whom he was commanded to anoint.It shall come to pass, that he that escapeth the sword of Hazael, shall Jehu slay: and him, that escapeth from the sword of Jehu, shall Elisha slay.

If this be madness, who are well in their wits? And yet madness it is, and infatuate frenzy. What is it else, to forsake Paradise for Sodom, heaven for earth, God for Mammon, when as (by most irreconcilable enmity) they cannot be embraced at once? Howsoever you will say, those things you covet are good creatures, and call them goods: yet nemo bonus bona bonum aestimat, male vtenti: no good man will account those goods, good for him, that cannot command his affections to their sober usage. He that shall prefer profit to virtue, his body to his soul, his purse to his body, his eye to his purse, time to eternity, let him go for a mad-man.

The Epicure feeds on fowl a hundred times, that it may feed him but once: the Covetous feeds his purse a thousand times, and starves himself. He cares not to destroy his soul, to please his lust; yet for the salvation of his soul, will not hold his purse short of the smallest gain. To conclude, the God whom he serves, cannot help him; the God, whom he should serve, will not help him, because he hath forsaken him. There is no other help or hope to reclayme the avarice: but Lord have mercy on them, for they are lunatike and sore vexed; as that Father spake of his possessed son, Math. 17. Lunatike they are perpetually, and not at some fittes by the Moon, as that word seems to intimate: Sore vexed, with the implacable, insatiable, turbulent distraction of their own spirits; not without accession of all those solicitations, which the infernal spirits can suggest; all for gain. Oft-times they faell into the fire, and oft into the water. Their Epilepticke courses now drive them into the fire of malice & dissention; now plunge and drown them in the floods of oppression: till the inundation of their cruelty have spoiled the whole Country; and themselves at last suffocated in their own deluge. They may be brought to the Disciples, the Ministers of Christ, but they cannot cure them. Alas! this frenzy is hard to heal. Though they be neither faithless, nor perverse, negatively: though they strive by fasting and prayer, affirmatively: avoid they evil impediments, or use they good means; this kind of devil will not out, Covetousness will not be expelled. Only Lord have mercy on them; convince them, convert them; for they are mad-men.

6. The Usurer

Would laugh, to hear himself brought into the number of mad-men. He sits close, and is quiet at home, whiles madness rambles abroad. He holds others in bonds; is in no bonds himself: he stands so much upon law, you cannot judge him lawless. He would not come near a Tavern door, where madness roars: he keeps a succinct course, and walks in an even pace to Hell. Slaunder him not for one of Bedlam: yet he is mad, raving, roaring mad; and that by the verdict of God in the pen of Solomon: Eccl. 7. Surely, oppression maketh a man mad.

It is indeed a thriving occupation. Usury is like that Persian Tree, that at the same time buds, blossoms, and bears fruit. The monies of interest are evermore, some ripe for the Trunke, others drawing to maturity, the rest in the flower approaching, all in the bud of hope. But he is mad; for his sin at once buds, blossoms, and brings forth the fruit of vengeance. Every bond he takes of others, enters him into a new obligation to Satan: as he hopes, his debtors will keep day with him, the Devil expects no less of himself. Every forfeit he takes, scores up a new debt to Lucifer; and every mortgaged land he seazeth on, enlargeth his dominions in hell.

But why do you call this benefit made of our money, usury and madness? It is but vsance, and husbandring of our stock. So by a new name given to your old sins, you will think to escape the censure of mad-men. Thus I have read of the people of Bengala, who are so much afraid of Tigers, that they dare not call them Tigers, but give them other gentle names. As some Physicians; that will not call their impatient Patients disease madness, but melancholy. But let the Bengalans call them what they will, they are Tigers still: and give usury what name you please, (for what Usurer is not ashamed to be called so?) it is mere madness. He is mad, that calls evil good, and sour sweet: but he is no slanderer, that calls Usury madness. It is no less; when the eternal God in his word, shall condemn Usury to hell, still to prosecute it with hope of heaven.

But many learned men are patrons and patterns for it. They are as mad as you; and learn you by their madness to become sober. Aliquid auxiliij est, aliena insania frui. There is some benefit usually to be made, by another man's exemplary madness. Were it more questionable; yet he is no less mad, that will ventrously do, what he is not sure is safe to be done; then he, that having a whole field to walk in, will yet go on a deep rivers dangerous bank. He is in more danger to topple in, and therefore a mad man. It were good for the common-wealth, if all these mad-men the Usurers were as safe and fast bound in a local, as they are in spiritual Bedlam.

7. The Ambitious man

Must also be thrust into this Bedlam, though his port be high, and he thinks himself incuisible from the Court. Whiles he beholds the stars, with Thales, he forgets the ditch; and yawning so wide for preferment, contempt is easily thrown into his mouth. I have read of Menocrates a Physician, that would needs be counted a god, and took no other fee of his Patients, but their vow to worship him: Diony sius Syracusa hearing of this, invited him to a banquet; and to honor him according to his desire, set before him nothing but a Censor of Frankincense; with the smoke whereof he was feasted till he starved, whiles others fed on good meat. This shown the great Naturalist, a natural fool, a mad-man. Sapor a Persian King wrote himself, Rex Regum, Frater Solis & Lunae, particeps Syderum, &c. King of Kings, brother to the Sun and Moon, and partner with the Stars. Yet alas! he was a man, therefore a mad-man, in the arrogation of this Style.

Let the Roman Canonists turn their Pope into a new nature; which is neither God nor man: they are mad that give it him, and he is mad to accept it. Let Edom exalt her self, as the Eagle, and set her nest among the stars: yet saith God, the pride of thine heart bath deceived thee. Let the Prince of Tyrus imagine himself to sit in the seat of God: Wilt thou yet say before him that killeth thee, I am God? but thou shalt be a man, and no God before him that slayeth thee. Let Sennacherib think to dry up rivers with the soale of his foot; and Antiochus to sail on the mountains:

Quid sibi fert tanto dignum promissor hiatu?

What events have answered their grand intendments, but madness?

Eusebius reports of Simon Magus, that he would be honor'd as a God, and had an Altar with this inscription, to Simon the holy God: which it seemed, his harlot Helena did instigate. But when by the power of the Devil he presumed to fly up to heaven, at the command of Saint Peter, the unclean spirit brake his neck. He climbed high, but he came down with a vengeance. His miserable end shown him an ambitious man, a mad-man. Soare not too high, ye sons of Anak; strive not to attain heaven by multiplying of earth, like Babel-builders: Feriant summos fulgura montes. Though you aspire in glory, you shall expire in ignominy. If you were not frantic, you would sistere gradum, keep your stations, know when you are well, and give a fiat to His will, that hath placed you in a site happiest for you. You are mad to outrunne him.

8. The Drunkard

Will, sure, wrangle with me, that his name comes so late in this Catalogue; that deserved to be in the front or vantguard of mad-men. Demens Ebriet as is an attribute given by an heathen. It is a voluntary madness, and makes a man so like a beast, that whereas a beast hath no reason, he hath the use of no reason: and the power or faculty of reason suspended, gives way to madness. Nay, he is in some respect worse then a beast: for few beasts will drink more then they need, whereas mad Drunkards drink when they have no need, till they have need again.

Quaeris, quis sit homo ebriosus? aetqui

Nullus est homo, Maeuole, ebriosus.

Shew mce a drunken man, thou blest. I can not do it: for he that's drunken, is no man.

To prove himself a mad-man, he dares quarrel with every man, fight with any man; nay, with posts and walls, imagining them to be men. Bacchus ad arma vocat: Wine makes them bold, without fear or wit: hazarding themselves into dangers, which sober, they would tremble to think of. Nec enim haec faceret sobrius vnquam. Are not these mad? If you should see them like so many superstitious Idolaters, drinking healths on their bare knees to their fair Mistress: which (may be) is but a foul strumpet, swearing against him that will not pledge it, or not pledge it off to a drop; would you in your right wits take these for other, then mad-men? no: let them go among the rest to Bedlam.

9. The Idle

Man, you will say, is not mad: for mad-men can hardly be kept in, and he can hardly be gotte out. You need not bind him to a poste of patience, the love of ease is strong fetters to him. Perhaps, he knows his own madness, and keeps his Chamber; both that sleep may quiet his frenzy, and that the light may not distract him. He lives by the sweat of other men's brows, and will not disquiet the temples of his own head. If this be his wit, it is madness: for by this means, his Field is covered with nettles and thorns, his body overgrown with infirmities, his soul with vices; his conscience shall want a good witness to it self: and his heart be destitute of that hope, which in the time of calamity might have rejoiced it.

Seneca could say, Malo mihi male esse, quàm molliter, I had rather be sick then idle: and indeed to the slothful, ease is a disease: but these men had rather be sick then work. These are mad: for they would not be poor, nor want means to give allowance to their sluggishness; yet by their refusal of pains, they call on themselves a voluntary, and inevitable want. Oh that the want of grace thus procured, were not more heavy to their souls, then the other to their carcasses. Complaine they of want? Justly may they, should they, shall they: for the want of diligence hath brought thē to the want of sustenance. Thus their quiet is frenzy, their idleness madness.

10. The Swearer

Is raungly mad: his own lips so pronounce him; as if he would be reueng'd on his. Maker; for giving him a tongue. It is so blistered with his hot breath, that he spittes fire at every sentence. He swears away all part of that blood, which was shed for his redemption: and esteems the wounds of his Savior, but only a complement of his speech; wherein he doth his best, to give him new ones. He never mentions God, but in his oaths, and vilipends his great Name, as if He heard him not.

What frenzy exceeds his? for he calls his bread, his drink, his clothes, the Day, Sun, Stars, Plants, and stones to testify his truth: indeed he calls them to testify against him. How shall the Name of that God do him good, which he so either disallows, or dishallows? God is not mad to give him that blessing, which he is so mad to villify. And for a full exemplification of his madness; by oaths he thinks to get credit, and by oaths he loseth it.

11. The Liar

Is in the same predicament with the Srearer; let them go together for a couple of mad-men. As he finds now exclusion out of all human faith; so he shall at last out of God's Kingdom, Reu. 21. Lyes have been often distinguished: the latest and shortest reduction is into a merry Lye, and a very Lye: either is a Lie, though of different degree: for the malicious lie exceeds the officious lie. The Proverb gives the Liar, the inseparable society of another sin. Da mihi mendacem, & ego ostendam tibi furem: Shew me a Liar, and I will show thee a thief. He is mad: for the mouth that speaketh lies, slayeth his own soul. This is not all; he gives GOD just cause to destroy him more. Thou shalt destroy them that speak lies. This is his madness: He kills at least three at once. The Thief doth only send one to the Devil: the Adulterer two: the Slanderer hurteth three: himself, the person of whom, the person to whom he telles the lie. Lie not in earnest, Lye not in jest; if thou doest accustom it, get thee into Bedlam.

12. The Busie-Body

All will confess a mad-man: for he fiskes up and down, like a nettled horse, & will stand on no ground. He hath a charge of his own properly distinguished: ye he must needs trouble his head, with alien and unnecessary affairs. He admits all men's businesses into his brain, but his own: and comes not home for his own, till he hath set all his neighbors ploughes a-going. He hurries up and down, like Jehu the son of Nimshi in his Chariot, or as a Gallant in his new Caroch, driving as if he were mad.

He loves not to sleep in his own doors; and hinders the common-wealth with frivolous questions. He is an universal solicitor for every man's suit; and would talk a Lawyer himself mad. There is not a Boat, wherein he hath not an Oare; nor a Wheel, wherein he will not challenge a Spooke. He lives a perpetual affliction to himself and others; and dies without pity; save that they say, it is pity he died no sooner. He is his neighbors malus genius, and a plague to melancholy. He is the common supervisor to all the wills made in his parrish: and when he may not be a counselor, he will be an intelligencer. If you let him not in to interrupt, he will stand without to euesdroppe. He is a very mad-man; for he takes great pains without thanks, without recompense, of God, or man, or his own conscience. He is luxurious of business, that concerns him not: Lay hands on him, shackle him: there are some less mad in Bedlam. I will be rid of him with this Distich.

He cleaves to those he meddles with, like pitch:

He's quick silver, good only for men's itch.

13. The Flatterer

Is a mad-man, Prov. 26. As a mad-man, who caesteth firebrands, arrows, and death. So is the man, that deceyueth his neighbor, and saith, Am I not in sport? He displeaseth his conscience, to please his concupiscence: and to curry a temporary favor, he incurreth cuerlasting hatred. For his Great-one, once awaked from his lethargical slumber, will say of him, as Achish did of David, counterfeiting himself distracted: Have I need of mad-men, that you have brought this fellow to play the mad-man in my presence? Shall this fellow come into my house?

14. Ingratitude

Is madness: for the unthankfull man both makes himself unworthy of received favors, and prevents the hope of future. For every man can say, Quod facis ingrato, perit: what you do to a mad-man, is lost. But if he be unthankfull to God, he turneth his former blessings into curses, and shuts up heaven against his own soul. Cessat cursus gratiarum, vbi non fuerit recursus: The course of grace, where it hath no recourse, is soon stopped. All waters come secretly from the sea, but return openly thither: though favors have a secret and invisible derivation from God, they must return openly to him in praises, and in a thankful acknowledgement. Thou art mad, O elate and puffed spirit, that usest, abusest, takest, swallowest the blessings of heaven without gratitude. Nones dignus pane, quo vescer is: For, nō est dignus dandis, qui non agit gratias de datis: He is unworthy of more benefits, that is unthankfull for those he hath. The Ungrateful man must needs be one of this number, and salute Bedlam.

15. The Angryman

None will deny to be a mad-man, but they that are either mad or angry. The Scripture hath so condemned him; Nature so censured him: therefore he cannot shift this Bedlam. Anger resteth in the bosom of fools; It is all one; of mad-men. Ira furor, though but breuis: the longer it lasts, the madder it is. Bee angry, there's the reins: but sin not, there's the bridle. Let not the sun go down on your wrath, if you must needs be angry: neither give place to the Devil. If he suffer the Sun to set on his wrath, the Sun of mercy may set on his soul: and when he hath given the Devil place, the Devil at last will give him place; even his own place, which his mad fury hath voluntarily accepted. He is stark mad; for he ••pares not to wound himself; and with a violent fire, which himself kindles, he burns up his own blood.

16 The Envious man

Is more closely, but more dangerously mad. Envy is the consumption of the bones, saith Solomon: he doth make much of that, which will make nothing of him: he whets a knife to cut his own throat. The Glutton feeds beasts, to feed on; and like a Witch, nourisheth a devil with his own blood. He keeps a disease fat, which will ever keep him lean: and is indulgent to a Serpent that gnaws his entralls. He punisheth and revengeth the wrongs on himself, which his adversary doth him. Is not this a mad-man? Others strike him, and like a strangely-penitential Monk, as if their blows were not sufficient, he strikes himself. That Physicians may not beg him when he's dead, he makes himself an Anatomy living. Sure, he gives cause to think, that all the old fables of walking ghosts were meant of him, and but for a little starved flesh, he demonstratiuely expounds them. If it were not for his soul, the Devil could scarce tell, what to do with his body. He would do much mischief, if he live's to it: but there is great hope, that he will kill himself beforehand. If you miss him in a Stationers shoppe geering at books, or at a Sermon cavilling at doctrines, or amongst his neighbors cattle, grudging at their full vdders, or in the Shambles plotting massacres; yet thou shalt be sure to find him in Bedlam.

17 The contentious man

Is as frantic as any. Hear him speak, his words are incendiary: observe his feet, they run nimibly to broils, not knowing the way of peace. Look upon his eyes, they sparkle fire: mark his hands, they are ever sowing debate: he will strike a neighbor in the dark, and lay it on his enemy: all to make work. Search his pockets, and they are stuff'd with libels, invectives, detractions. He hates all men, and the Lord him; being that seventh abomination, that his soul abhorreth, one that soweth discord among brethren. There is a witness against him beyond exception. The debatefull man is madder, &c. The words of a talebearer are as wounds, and they go down into the innermost parts of the belly, &c. When he speaks fair, believe him not: for there are seven abominations in his heart. He comes to a Mart or Market, to breed quarrels; as if he were hired by some Surgeon. He neither sees, nor hears of a discord, but he must make one; but ever covertly, cowardly, out of the reach of weapons. He that passeth by and meddleth with strife belonging not to him, is like one that taketh a dog by the ears: he will be soon weary of holding him; and if he let him go, he is sure to be bitten. He is utterly mad: for having incensed, encouraged party against party, as one claps on unwilling Mastiues; when perceyuing his villainy, they become friends, both shall fall upon him. So he makes work for Lawyers, work for Cutlers, work for Surgeons, work for the Devil, work for his own destruction. To Bedlam with him.

18 The Impatient

Is a mad-man: for when the ties of softer afflictions will not hold him, he must be manacled with the chains of judgments. Patienter ferendū, quod non festinanter auferendū: He makes his yoke more troublesome, then it would be: and by his struggling, forceth his gyues to make prints in his flesh. He is mad; for he longs for ease, and denies it himself. It hath been said among men, Bear one wrong, and provoke greater: but I say, Bear one affliction from God well, and prevent greater. He is mad, that is angry with God, that cares not for his anger, that will plague his anger. How ill had it gone with God before this, if such a man could have wrought his teene upon him? Mean time, God is at peace, out of his reach, and he is plagued for his madness. Teach him patience in Bedlam.

19 The Vain-glorious

Is a mere mad-man, whether he boast of his good deeds, or his ill. If of his virtues, they are generally more suspicious: if of his vices, he is the more despicable: If of his wealth, his hearers the less trust him: this noise prevents him from being a debtor: If of his valor, he is the more infallibly held a coward. In what strain soever his Mountebank-ostentation insults, he loseth that he would find, by seeking the wrong way. He is mad: for when he would be accounted virtuous, honorable, rich, valiant, in favor with greatness; and the world takes not ample notice of it, he sounds it with his own Trumpet: then at once they hear it, and deride it. By seeking fame, he loseth it, and runs mad vponit. Put him into Bedlam.

20. Lastly,

To omit our Schismatics, and Separatists, who are truly called, Protestants out of their wits, liable to the imputation of Frenzy: the Papists are certainly madmen, dangerous mad-men; mad in themselves, dangerous to us: and would happily be confined to some local Bedlam, lest their spiritual lunacy do us some hurt.

Madde in themselves: for who but mad-men would forsake the fountain of living waters, the word of truth, and pin their faith and salvation on the Popes sleeve? a Prelate, a Pilate, that mingles their own blood with their sacrifices. Think how that enchanting cup of fornications prevails over their besotted souls; and you will say they are not less than mad. Come you into their Temples, and behold their Pageants, and histrionical gestures, bowings, mowings, windings, and turnings; together with their service in an unknown language, and (like a deaf man, that sees men dancing, when he hears no music) you would judge them mad. Behold the mass-Priest with his baked god, towzing tossing, and dandling it, to and fro, upward and downward, forward and backward, till at last, the jest turning into earnest, he choppes it into his mouth at one bitte; whiles all stand gaping with admiration; Spectatum admissi, risum tencatis amici? would you not think them ridiculously mad? But no wonder if they run mad; that have drunk that poison. Many volumes have been spent in the discovery of their madness; I do but touch it, lest I seem to write Iliads after our learned Homers.

Surely Mad-men are dangerous without restraint. Papists are ready instruments of commotion, perversion, treason. These are a sickness, immedicabile vulnus

Ense recidendum, ne pars sincera trahatur.

Our land cannot be at ease, so long as these lie on her stomach. They prick and wound her sides, not with praying against her, (for their imprecations we hope, are irrita vota) but with preying upon her: and when all stratagems fail, ready to fetch arguments from the shambles, and conclude in ferio. Whose Religion is political, learning bloody, affections malicious, ambitious, devilish. The Inquisition is their Grammar, fire and fagot their Rhetoric, fleet and fetters their Logic, the Cannons roar their Music, and poisoning is their Physic. Whose Priests have such almighty power, that they can make their Maker, that whereas in their Sacrament of Order, (as they term it) God makes an impotent creature a Priest: now in their Sacrament of the Aliar, the Priest shall make Almighty God. Yea, as he made them with a word, and put them in their mothers womb: so they can make him with a word, and put him in a box. They that thus blaspheme their Creator, shall we trust them with their fellow-creature?

It was an ingenuous answer of a Spanish Nobleman, commanded by Charles the 5. to lodge the Duke of Bourbon at his house in Madrid: I will obey thee, but set my house on fire, so soon as the Duke is out of it. My Predecessors never built it to harbor Traitors. Did he think that a conspirator would poison his house; and shall we think that such are no infection to our land? David did counterfeit himself mad, when he was not, for his own security: these are mad, and dissemble it; till by one frantic act, they can bring us all to ruin. If they were foreign, public and professed enemies, we would not blame, not fear them. While Kingdoms stand in hostility, hostile actions are just. But these are domestical, intestine, secret adversaries, bred and fed in the same Country; therefore the more intolerable, as the more pernicious.

Tut, they can satisfy their consciences by distinguishing of Treasons. Indeed, all their Religion is a religion of distinctions: such as that is, that an excommunicate Prince may be dethroned; and being once vncrowned, may on his penitent submission be restored to the Church: Quoad animam, non quoad regnum. Thus they leave positive, textuall, school-divinity, and fall to Crown-divinity. Antichrist pleads, their Religion is maintained by the Fathers. Did ever any Father allow of Treason? Shame they not to aver it? If any abused, wrested, falsified writing of the Fathers did seem to consent to their errors: yet we know, that Audiendi Patres, non vt Indices, sed vt testes: The Fathers are to be heard as witnesses, not as Judges. It is God's scriptum est, not their traditum est, that must give decision of all doubts.

They object, that those are birds of our own hatching, that thus pollute their nest. Perhaps, our country gave them breath and birth, but they drunk this poison from the enchanting Cup of Rome. They are ever extravagant persons, that like rotten arms or legs have drop'd from the body. Men sine seed, sine fide, sinere, sine spe. They are desperate men, and destitute of fidelity, that seek Rome, where their former learning, and the better learning of their conscience, is perverted, perjured. That (forgetting to speak the language of Canaan) enigmatically, epicene, spurious, and abortive equivocation, is the main accent of their speeches: an ambiguous, ambagious, couzening voice, which Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, never knew, never practiced to save their bloods. A strange, stigmatic, misshapen, half-borne, half-unborn child; I know not where bred, nor by what Pope, Cardinal, or Jesuit gotten: but this I am sure, whosoever was the father, Rome keeps the bastard, and nurseth it with her best indulgence. So that now,

Iurat? creed minus: non iurat? credere noli:

Iurat, non iurat? hostis ab host cave.

Their words are false; their oaths worse: neither just:

Swear they, or swear they not, give them no trust.

How else could it be; but to the sophisticating of true substances, must be an access of false qualities?

Those are those critical, hypocritical Cannibals, that make dainty at some seasons to eat the flesh of beasts, but forbear at not time to drink the blood of men. As the Pharisees, that stuck not to buy Christ's death, (and their own withal) with money: yet would not admit that money into their Treasury: fearing to pollute the material Temple, not the spiritual of their souls. The Romans make conscience in their fasting seasons, to eat any flesh but Bulls flesh; I mean, that which the Popes Bulls have made holy: (for that which Saint Paul saith, doth sanctify it, is neglected) but to cut throats, murder Kings, blow up States, is not inter opera mala, no nor adiaphora, but inter meritoria: is not evil, nor indifferent, but a work of merit.

They say, (and we forsooth must grant that improved, but never proved assertion) that they derive their Chair from Peter: and what do they derive this doctrine too? Saint Peter exhorts to patience, not to caruing their own revenge. Neither are their murderous inventions and intentions of the lowest rank; but of Kings, Princes, Senates, whole States: and that without any respect, as of their own conscience, so of the persons goodness they strike at: Aiming at the life of a King, a gracious King, under whom they enjoyed their lives, and that in abundant wealth and peace. So the conspiracy of Parry is aggravated.

Quod Regina scelus, scelus est quod virgo petatur,

Quod pia virgo scelus, quod tibi grata scelus.

Cum virgo, Regina, pia, et tibi grata petatur:

Proh scelus! est, superat quod scelus omne, scelus.

Which I have thus interpreted.

It's treason, that a Queen should ruined be,

that a Maid; ill.

That she was good, yet worse: that good to thee;

more wicked still.

But when a Queen, a Maid, Good, and thy friend, thou wouldst dispatch:

The treason, that thy black heart doth intend, dare Hell to match?

Neither is it wonder, that they exercise thus upon us, who have no mercy to their own bowels. The short lives of the Popes, (as it was once of the Emperors in that Seat) manifest, that by treason the Chair is got, by treason lost. It would then be a good degree toward our health, if these dangerous mad-men were shut up in some strong Bedlam.

There are many other mad-men; whom, though I particularly name not in this Catalogue, you shall find in Bedlam. I desire not to say all, but enough. All are not taken into that taming-house in a day: it is filled at times. If this muster can work any reformation on these frantic Patients, another discovery will not be lost labor.

You conceive the nature of the Tenant: you may a little better understand his vileness, if you consider, 1. That he is an usurper, intruding himself into God's freehold; which both by creation, and re-creation he may challenge for his own inheritance. If God should ask madness, as he did that unbidden Guest in the Gospel, that came to the marriage without his wedding Garment: Friend, how camest thou hither? Either like that wretch, he would be mute, or else answer: Man let me into his heart. What a Traytour is man, to let into his Landlords house, his Landlords enemy?

2 That he doth not pay the rent of God's house. God rich in mercies, lends and (as it were) lets to farm diverse possessions; as the graces of the Spirit, the virtues of the mind, gifts of the Body, goods of the world; & for all these requires no rent, but thanksgiving: that we praise him in heart, tongue, and conversation. But so long as Madness is in any of these Tenements, God cannot have this little rent of his Farm. They are mad, that think they may enjoy God's blessings without rent, or the due payment of an accountant tribute.

3. That he doth suffer God's Tenement to decay: he doth ruinate where he dwells. For the out-houses of our bodies, madness doth strive either to burn them with lust, or to drown them with drunkenness, or to starve them with covetousness. For the spiritual and inward building, the foundation of God's Tenement in our soul is faith, the walls hope, the roof charity. Now madness continually endeavours to raze our foundation, to dignity through our walls, to uncover our roof: that having neither faith in God, nor love to men, our soul may be without hope, exposed to the tempests of the devil. Shall not madness account for these dilapidations?

4. That he doth employ the house to base uses. It is ill done in a Tenant to a fair house, to make the best rooms stables for his horses, stalls for his oxen, or styes for his hogs. But madness makes the Memory a stable for malice and revenge: the understanding a dungeon for blindness and ignorance: the will a vault for hypocrisy and disobedience. So the Body, which is the Temple of God, is made a den of thieves.

This is the Tenant, Madness: a sorry inhabitant, and unworthy of so good a lodging, as the next point appears, which is

2. The Tenement, the heart.

The Heart is a mansion for God, not for madness. God made it, and meant to reserve it to himself: he never placed such a Tenant in it, as the Frenzy of sin. Christ is said to have a fourfold house, Anagogical, Allegorical, Corporal, Moral.

1. The first is the Church triumphant, that glorious, and everlasting habitation of his Deity.

2. The second, is the Church militant, wherein he dwells sacramentally, by his holy Ministry.
3. The third is Corporal, that consecrated womb of the Virgin, wherein he dwelleth 9. months.
4. The last is Mans Heart, wherein he hath a mystical and spiritual abode. Christ doth dwell in our hearts by faith, and by love. As he loves the gates of Zion, more then all the dwellings of Jacob: so he delighteth in the heart of man, more then in all Palaces and Pavilions of Princes. When an adversary Tyrant hath taken the chief Forte in a Country, and driven out their just and merciful Governor; fear, sorrow, and expectation of ruin possesseth the inhabitants. It can go no better with the like Nation of Man, when Jesus Christ is expelled his habitation, the heart; and so savage a Tyrant is admitted to Tenure, as madness: a strong man, that will fortify the Castle, and scorns to lose it, except strength it self, the irresistible grace of Christ lays battery to it. But this Theme is scarce cold, since I last handled it. I must be forced to leave the Tenement awhile, in the unmerciful hands of madness; and inquire, (if perhaps with any comfort) how long this Tenure lasteth.

3. The Tenure whiles they live.

Alas! what gain we by searching further into this evidence? the more we look into it, the worse we like it. Whiles they live. The 1. Tenure of Madness. 2. in the Heart. 3. is for term of life. Too long a time for so bad a Tenant. But you will say unto me, as the Disciples to Christ: Who then can be saved? Nunquid daturus est Deus regnum coelorum stul•is? Will God give the Kingdom of heaven to madmen? Fear not, all are not mad-men that have madness a Tenant in their hearts; but they that have it for their Landlord. It is not my distinction, but Saint Paul's, Rom. 7. Sin may dwell, nay, Sin will dwell in your hearts; let it not reign there, saith the Apostle. It must be a household servant, it must not be a King. Aliud est habere insaniam, aliud haberi ab insania. It is one thing to have madness, another thing for madness to have thee. Since it will dwell in thee, whiles thou dwelest in the flesh, make it a servant, a slave, a drudge. Set the Gibeonites to draw water; let it make thine eyes laue thy body with repentant tears: and to cleave wood, let it rend thy heart with sorrow. Keep that subtle deceiver, with whom thou ignorantly struckst the hand of covenant, under bit and bridle: velle, reuelle, turn, restrain, command, control it at thy pleasure. Let it never be thy Captain, thy Lādlord, thy King.

Though Sin, the Devils mad dog hath bitten thee, and thou at first beginnest to run frantic: yet apply the plaster of the blood of Christ to thy sores. This shall draw out the venom, and grace shall get the mastery of madness. Bee of good comfort, thou shalt not die frantic. Encourage thyself with a holy violence against thy fleshly lusts: intend, contend to infeeble, and at length to extinguish the force of thy depraved nature. Kill madness, lest madness kill thee. Bee sensible of the bane, that lies in this spiritual frenzy, and do not laughing die. Madness is at first, inimicus blandus, a fleering enemy: in the midst, dulce venenum, sweet poison: at last, the Epithets of blandum and dulce being lost, it is Scorpio pungens, a stinging Serpent. Well, yet let it sting thee here, that it may not sting thee hereafter. Happy is he, that learns to be sober by his own madness; and concludes from I have sinned, I will not sin. Madness may be in his heart, like a Tenant; it shall never be like a Tyrant. Innocent Adam was naked, and knew it not: sinful Adam was naked, and knew it. Then comes God, hearing his excuse of concealing himself deduced from his nakedness: Who told thee that thou wast naked? Sure, his guilt told him. We have been mad, and are now come to our selves, to know our own madness. If it be asked, who told us, that we were mad? I answer, Even the same grace of God's Spirit, that reclaimed us from madness. For the wicked, since they love madness, be it unto them: and when they will never be recollected, let them be mad still. But blessed be that God, that helped us; praised be his holy Name, that hath recalled us. He hath in this life freed us from madness, as a Tyrant, and shall hereafter free us from it as a Tenant.

Thus have you the Mystery of this spiritual Bedlam detected, and a crew of Mad-men let out to your view: whose house is the world, whose bonds are iniquities, whose delight is darkness, whose master is the Devil: for those whom he keeps in this metaphorical Bedlam, without reclaying by the power of the Gospel; he hath ready provided another material, local, infernal Bedlam, a dungeon, not shallower then Hell, wherein there is no light of Sun or Star, no food but speckled Serpents, no liberty to straggle; but the Patients are bound with everlasting chains; and himself (with his same-suffering spirits) do eternally whip them with rods of burning steel and iron. One hour in this Bedlam will tame the most savage mad-men, that were ever nursed among wolves, or sucked the breasts of inhumanity.

I hear them talk of some irrefragable Rorers, creatures, (not men) whom no limits of reason can teddar up: let them take heed, lest they become at that day, Rorers indeed, and roar for the very anguish of their hearts: howling like Dragons, that have lived like Tigers. Think of this Bedlam, ye mad-men, Eccl. 11. Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, &c. Rejoice, nay (it were somewhat well, if no more then joy) be mad; in thy youth, tempus insaniendi, a time of illimited desire; Let thy heart cheare thee, and do thou cheare thy heart; that, thee with lusts; thou, that with wine and junkets: and walk frantikely, inordinately; in thy ways, by-ways, & wrywayes, for the way of truth thou wilt not know; and in the sight of thine eyes, such tempting, and lust-provoking objects, as those two Sentinels of the body can light upon: or if thou canst not yet be madder, extend thy desires to find out experimental madness: but know thou, that for all these things, God will bring thee into judgment: remember, that there is an infernal Bedlam, whereunto they that live and die spiritually-mad-men, must be eternally confined.

He that should now tell the Covetous, the Ambitious, the Voluptuous, &c. they are mad-men, should appear to them mad, in saying so. They rather think us mad; as Festus, though mad himself, without learning, could tell Paul, that Much learning had made him mad. But we may answer for our selves, as Augustine of David's madness: Insanire videbatur, sed regi Achish insanire videbatur: David seemed mad, but to King Achish: We are judged mad-men, of none but mad-men, because we run not with them to the same excess of riot, because we cut short our affections of their vain delights, and drown not our selves in the whirlpool of their luxuries; but girde repentance to our loins with resolution; they imagine us frantic. They think us mad-men, we know them so. And they shall at last despairingly confess in this lower Bedlam: We fools accounted the godly man's life madness, and his end to be without honor: Now is he numbered among the children of God, and his lotte is among the Saints. Bee wise then in time, ye sons of men; trust not spiritual madness, lest it bring you to eternal Bedlam. From whose jaws when you are once entered, be you never so tame, you cannot be delivered.

3. The Period.

We have ended Mans Comma, and his Colon, but not his Sentence: the Period continues and concludes it. We 1. found his heart full of evil. 2. We left it full of madness. 3. Let us observe at the shutting up, what will become of it. After that, they go to the dead. Heres the end of man's progress: now he betakes himself to his Standing-house, his Grave. The Period is delivered

- Consequently. After that
- Discessiuey. they go
- Discensiuey. down to the dead.

The Sum is, Death is the wages of sin. 1. After that, they have nourished evil and madness in their hearts, this is the successive (not successful) event and consequence. 2. They go, they shall travel a new journey, take an unwilling walk; not to their meadows, gardens, taverns, banquetting-houses; but, 3. To the dead: a dismal place, the habitation of darkness and discontent: where finesse shall be turned to filthiness: luster to obscurity, beauty and strength to putrefaction and rottenness.

If a man looks into what life it self is, he cannot but find, both by experience of the past, and proof of the present age, that he must die. As soon as we are born, we begin to draw to our end. Life it self is nothing, but a journey to death. There is no day, but hath his night: no sentence, but hath his period: no life on earth, but hath the death. Examine the scope of thy desires, and thou shalt perceive, how they hasten to the grave: as if death were the gaole, prize or principal end, which the vanity of human endeavours runs at. Bee a man in honor, in wealth, in government: he still ambitiously blind, languisheth for the time to come; the one, in hope to enlarge his greatness; the other, his riches; the last, his dominions. Thus they covet the running on of time and age, and rest not till they have concluded their sentence, and attained their Period, gone to the dead.

All men, yea all inferior things must be freed by an end: and as the Philosopher answered to the news of his sons death: Scio me gen•sse mortalem: so God the Father of all, may say of every man living, Scio me creasse mortalem: I have made a man that hath made himself mortal. Man is a little world, the world a great man: if the great man must die, how shall the little one scape? He is made of more brittle and fragile matter, then the Sun and Stars: of a less substance then the earth, water, &c. Let him make what show he can with his glorious adornations; let rich apparel disguise him living; sear-cloths, spices, balms enwrappe him, lead and stone immure him dead: his original mother will at last own him again for her natural child; and triumph over him with this insultation, he is in my bowels, Psal. 146. He returneth to his earth. His body returneth not immediately to heaven, but to earth, nor to earth, as a stranger to him, or an unknown place, but to his earth; as one of his most familiar friends, and of oldest acquaintance. To conclude:

If we be sinful, we must die; if we be full of evil, and cherish madness in our hearts, we must to the dead. We have sins enough, to bring us all to the grave: God grant they be not so violent, and full of ominous precipitation, that they portend our more sudden ruin. Yea, they do portend it; but Oh nullum sit in omne pondus.

But I have been so prolix in the former parts of the Sentence, that I must not dwell upon the Period. He needs not be tedious, that reads a Lecture of mortality. How many in the world, since this Sermon begun, have undergone experimental demonstration of this truth? This Sentence is but the moral of those spectacles, and those spectacles, the justifying examples of this Sentence. They are come to their Period before my speech: my speech, myself, and all that hear me, all that breathe this air, must follow them. It hath been said, We live to die: let me a little invert it: Let us live to live: Live the Life of grace, that we may live the life of glory. Then though we must go to the dead, we shall rise from the dead; and live with our God out of the reach of death forever.

Amen.

P-TA-10. The barren tree a sermon preached at Paul's cross October 26. 1623 - Adams, Thomas, fl. 1612-1653.

THE BARREN TREE. A Sermon Preached at Paul's Cross October 26. 1623.

BY THO: ADAMS.

LONDON, Printed by AVG: MATHEWES for JOHN GRISMAND, and are to be sold at his Shop in Paul's Alley, at the sign of the Gunne. 1623.

TO THE REVERend and learned, Doctor DONNE, Dean of S^t. Paul's, together with the Prebend-Residentiaries of the same Church, my very good Patrons.

RIGHT WORSIPFVLL,

NOT out of any opinion of this Sermons worth, to which I dare not invite your Judicious eyes. Nor, any ambition to merit of my Patrons, whom I read styled, Petty creators. But in humble acknowledgement of your favors, I present this small Rent of Thankfulness; the poor fruit of that tree, which grows on your own ground, and hath not from the world any other sustenance. Vouchsafe, I beseech you, your Patronage to the child, who have made the Father of it,

Your Wors. devoted Homager THO: ADAMS.

To the Reader.

I Neither affect those Rheumaticke Pennes, that are still dropping upon the Press: nor those Phlegmatic spirits, that will scarce be coniu'r'd into the orbe of employment. But if modest forwardness be a fault, I cannot excuse myself.

It pleased God Almighty, to make a fearful Comment on this his own Text, the very same day it was preached by his unworthiest servant. The argument was but audible in the morning, before night it was visible. His holy Pen had long since written it with ink, now his hand of Justice expounded it in the Characters of blood, There, was only a conditional menace, So it shall be: here a terrible remonstrance, So it is. Sure! He did not mean it for a nine days wonder. Their sudden departure out of the World, must not so suddenly depart from the memory of the World. Woe to that soul that shall take so slight a notice of so extraordinary a Judgment. We do not say, They perished: Charity forbid it. But this we say, It is a sign of God's favor, when he gives a man Law. We pass no sentence upon them, yet let us take warning by them. The Remarkableness would not be neglected; for the Time, the Place, the Persons, the Number, the Manner. Yet still we conclude not, This was for the transgression of the dead: but this we are sure of, It is meant for the admonition of the living.

Such is our Blessed Saviors conclusion, upon a parallel instance: Except ye repent, YE shall all LIKEWISE perish. There is no place safe enough for offenders: but when the Lord is once up in arms, happy man that can make his own peace! otherwise, in vain we hope to run from the Plague, while we carry the Sin along with us. Yet will not our willful and bewitched Recusants, from these legible Characters, spell God's plain meaning. No impression can be made in those hearts, that are ordained to perish. For their malicious, causeless, and unchristian censures of us, God forgive them: our requital be only pity and prayers for them. Howsoever they give out, (and I will not here examine) that their piety is more then ours: Impudence it self cannot deny, but our Charity is greater then theirs. Now the holy fear of God keep us in the ways of Faith and Obedience; that the properation of Death may never prevent our preparation to die. And yet still, after our best endeavor; From sudden death good Lord deliver us all. Amen.

THE BARREN TREE.

LUKE. Cap. 13. Vers. 7.

Then said he to the Dresser of his Vineyard; Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this Fig-tree, and find none: cut it down, why cumbreth it the ground?

NEwes is brought to Christ, of a certain Judgment, which was not more Pilate's, then God's, upon some Galileans; who, while they were sacrificing, were sacrificed; their blood being mingled with the blood of the beasts, on the same altar. Lest this should be wholly attributed to Pilate's cruelty, without due respect had of the omnipotent Justice, he samples it with another; of eighteen men miscarrying by the fall of a Tower. No Pilate threw down this, here was no human Executioner: the matter of their death was mortar and stones; these had no purpose to kill them. This therefore, must be an invisible hand, working by an insensible creature: the Iustrument may be diverse, the Judge is the same.

Now, Poena paucorum, terror omnium: as an exhalation drawn from the earth, fired and sent back again to the earth, smites only one place, but terrifieth the whole country. So their ruins should be our terrors; let them teach us, that they may not touch us. They are hitherto but like Moses his Rodde turned into a Serpent: not into a Bear or Lyon, lest it should have devoured Pharaoh: but into a Serpent, that he might be more afraid then hurt. It is God's special favor to us, that others be made examples for us, and not we made examples for others. Nothing could teach them, let them teach us.

Of these fearful Instances our Savior makes this use; setting down a peremptory conclusion: Vel poenitendum, vel pereundum: Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. Such vengeance is no way to be avoided, but by repentance. But here the Jews might flatter themselves; If we be greater sinners then they, how comes it to pass that we speed better then they? To this silent objection, Christ makes an Apological answer, verse 6. You are not spared because you are more righteous, but because God to you is more gracious. You deserve such or sorer Judgments; and the reason of this impunity is not to be looked for in your innocence, but in the Lord's patience: nor because you are not worse to him, but because he is better to you: who offers you space and grace to amend, if (at least) at last you will bring forth the fruits of Repentance.

There be some terms in the Text; (as that the Vineyard is the Church, every Christian a Fig-tree, God the Owner, every Pastor a Dresser;) wherein your understandings may well prevent my discourse: these known and familiar things I take as granted of all hands.

It is a Parable, therefore not to be forced every way, nor made to warrant a conclusion which the Author never meant. This were, when it offers us the company a myle, to compel it to go with us twain: or to make Christ's Messenger speak our errand. Such is the trade of Rome; what their own policy hath made necessary, they will teach God to make good: this is to pick darkness out of the Sun. No. Verificatur in sensu suo. like a good creature, it does only that it was made for. A Parable is not like a Looking-glass, to represent all forms and faces: but a well drawn Picture, to remonstrate that person whereof it is a counterfeit. It is like a knife, with the haft it cutts not, with the back it cuts not, it cuts with the edge. A Candle is made to light us, not to heat us: a Stoue is made to heat us, not to light us: if this Parable, like the Sun, may give both light and heat; the more profitable, the more acceptable.

Then said he to the Dresser,&c. That part of it, to which I limit my present Discourse, delivers it self to us in these four passages.

A

- Consultation; Then said he to the Dresser of his Vineyard.
- Complaint. Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this Fig-tree, and find none.
- Sentence; Cut it down.
- Reason; Why cumbers it the ground?

The Consultation. Then said he unto, &c.

[1] Dixit, non percussit: he spake, he stroke not: he might have spared words, and begun with wounds. The Tree had rather deserved the Axe and Fire, then a Consultation of recovery. How easily would man have rejected his hopeless brother? as when a piece of clay will not work to his mind, the Potter throws it away: or we cast fouie rags to the dung-hill, little thinking that they may become white paper. But with God, Verba antecedent verbera; he will be heard before he be felt. Our first Parents, when they had sinned, Vocem andiuerunt, Heard the voice of God: He reasoned with them, before he condemned them. If the fathers word can correct the child, he will let the rod alone. Wicked men use the sudden Arguments of steel and iron; as Ioah discoursed with Amasa, in the fifth ribbe, they speak Daggers points. So Zedekiah disputed with the Prophet, a word and a blow; yea, a blow without a word: he struck him first, and spoke to him afterwards. God deals otherwise; Behold, I stand at the door, and knock: he knocks at the door, does not presently break it open. He gives us warning of his Judgments, that gave him no warning of our sins. Why doeth he thus? That we might see our miserable estate, and fall to timely deprecation: that so punishing our selves, we might save him a labor.

[2] Dixit, non destinavit: as if the Lord would double and repeat his thoughts, before he decreed it to irrevocable ruin. A divine president of moderation! If he that cannot transgress in his wrath, nor exceed in his Justice, will yet Consulere amicum, advise with his friend: how ought frail man to suspend his furious purposes to mature deliberation? It is too common with us, to attempt dangerous and desperate actions, without further counsel than our own green thoughts. So Anger is made a Solicitor, Passion a Judge, and Rashness an Executioner. The wise man first considers, then speaks or does: the mad man first speaks or does, and then considers. Which drives him on necessity to play the after-game; with shame and sorrow to recover his former estate, or give it lost forever. O holy deliberation, whither art thou fled? David's Harp did cast the evil spirit out, this would keep him from ever coming in. It is a Porter at the Gate of God's spiritual Temple, Man; that would be as sure to keep out his enemies, as David would have been ready to let in his friends. How many desperate precipices of sin would be prevented, were this Rule remembered; Consule Cultorem? For matter of estate, we are counseled by the Lawyer: for health of body, advised by the Physician: we trust the Pilot to steer our course by Sea, the Surveyor to mete out our Land: but for the soul let it be as barren as this Fig-tree, we take no counsel of the Gardener. Do worldlings consult the Preacher, concerning their usurious trade before they undertake it? Do Gallants advise with him, before they meet in Acelandama, the field of blood? O that they would admit an answer from such a friend, before they give an answer to such an enemy.

[3] Dixit Vinitori. Such is the honor God doth his Ministers, to acquaint them with his own purposes. Surely, the Lord will do nothing, but he first revealeth it to his servants, the Prophets. Nothing; which may conduce to the office of their Ministry, and the good of his Church. To you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of Heaven. To you, not to the world, they have no such revelation. It is given, it's none of your inheritance, you were not borne to it. To know Mysteries, Sapere alta, not common things. Of the kingdom (not secular; such mysteries are for the knowledge of Statizing Jesuits; but) of heaven. Shall I hide from Abraham the thing that I mean to do? The matter concerned Sodom, not Abraham: yet was it revealed to Abraham, not to Sodom. But doth God need any man's counsel? Who hath at any time been his Counselor? Will the Potter take advice of his pots? No; when Christ asked Philip where supply of bread might be had for the multitude; This he said to prove him: for he himself knew what he would do. His questions are not his, but our satisfactions. Thus doth he credit his own Ordinance, teaching the world how to esteem of them whom himself so singularly honors. How poor a place soever they find in men's thoughts, the King of heaven and earth calls them to his counsel. Priest, was a title whereof the Princes of Israel were ambitious: they would not, every man have written his name on his rod, but in hope that this Dignity might fall to his lot. Now, is the Ministry of the Gospel inferior to that of the Law? Was the service of death more glorious than the service of life, and salvation? If the Evangelical Covenant be better, is the Ministration worse? The Sons of the great think scorn of such an employment: what they held an honor, these count a disparagement: In one and the same subject meets their ambition and our scorn. It is ill when the Fig-tree shall despise the Dresser, but it would be far worse if the Dresser should despise the Fig-tree.

[4] To the Dresser. This is the whole Congregation of his Ministers, to whom he hath committed the culture of his Vineyard: all which, by an Enallage numeri, are sum'd up in one Dresser. 1. Quia Cor vnum, because they have all one heart. 2. Quia officium vnum; all their labors meet in that one common term; the edification of the Body of Christ. 3. It is usual to name one proceteris, for all the rest. Peter says, Though I should die with thee, I will not deny thee. Did Peter only promise this? No, but So said likewise the rest of the Disciples. Had not this been a Parable, I never found a place of more probable color for the high Priest of Rome to challenge his universal Supremacy by. But surely, he will never dress Christ's Vineyard, as it ought, unless in a Parable. Nay, would his Instruments forbear to sow it with brambles, to manure it with blood, and to cast Nabaoth out of his own vineyard, it were somewhat. But let them pass! When the Spirit wrote to a whole Church, he inscribes his Epistle under one particular name, Angelo Ecclesiae, to the Angel of the Church.

[5] To the Dresser. Dressing implies labor and heedfulnesse. I might here touch upon the Ministers diligence, that Christ's Vineyard never lie rude and vnpolishd through his default. But this age will look to that well enough: never did the Egyptians call so fast upon the Israelites for making of Bricks, as the people call on us for making of Sermons: & our allowance of materials is much alike. They think it recompense bountiful enough to praise our pains; as if we could live like Chameleons, upon the subtle air of Commendations. So they serve us as Carriers do their Horses; lay heavy burdens upon their 〈1 page duplicate〉 〈1 page duplicate〉 backs, and then hang belles at their ears to make them music. But be our reward little or much, God forbid we should slack dressing the Vineyard of Jesus Christ.

[6] To the Dresser. Why to him? Vt intercederet that he might plead for the Tree. So unwilling is God to destroy, that he would have us manacle his hands with our prayers: he would be entreated to forbear. Go thy ways down, for the people which thou broughtest out of Egypt, have corrupted themselves. Why this to Moses? That he might pray for them. He that meant to spare them in mercy, meant withal that Moses should be beholden to him for that mercy. And Moses indeed chargeth the Lord, sets upon him with so holy a violence, that as if his prayers could vincere inuincibilem, he hears, Let me alone. O that every Vine-dresser were full of this gracious affection to the trees under his charge: yea, who fears God, and in some measure hath it not? The people forgot Moses, Moses remembers the people: they could be merry and happy without him, he would not be happy without them. Men rob us of our means, lode us with reproaches: all our revenge is to solicit heaven for them by our supplications: they sue us, we sue for them: they impoverish our temporal condition, we pray for their eternal salvation. We could never hope for good to our selves, if we should not return them this good for their evil.

Corah had drawn a multitude to rebel against Moses and Aaron, Moses and Aaron pray for their rebels. They were worthy of death, and they had it; yet would these merciful Leaders have prevented it: refusing to buy their own peace with the loss of such enemies. Yea, they are so far from caruing their own just revenge, that they would not have the Lord to revenge for them. Let us fill our hearts with this great Example: the people rise up against their Pastors, the Pastors fall on their faces for the people. Certainly, if God had not meant to hear us, he would never invite us to pray. But as it pleaseth Him to make us His mouth to you; so also, your mouth to Him: both to tell you what He doth say, and to return Him what you should say; to preach against your sins; to pray for your souls. Do you hear us plead for Christ, for Christ hears us plead for you. Indeed, we are men of polluted lips and lives: but as God's power is not straitened through our weakness, so, nor is his mercy lessened through our unworthiness. Therefore as Paul had his, Vae mihi si non praedicauro; Woe unto me, if I Preach not: So Moses, in effect, had his Vae mihi, si non intercessero, woe unto me, if I pray not: God forbid I should cease praying for you. But as all our Preaching can work no good upon you, but through the holy Ghost: so all our Praying can bring no good to you, but through Jesus Christ. We pray for you, forget not you to pray for us. Indeed, weak ones pray with us, malicious ones pray against us, covetous ones prey upon us, few pray for us. We entreat for you, do you entreat for us; and that only Mediator betwixt God and man plead for us all.

The Complaint. Behold I come, &c.

This hath in it two passages.

His

- Access. Behold, these three years, &c.
- Success. I find none.

First, the Access.

[1] Behold. Ecce is here a note of complaint. He that can thunder down sin with vengeance, rains on it showers of complaint. Behold the Tree; he might in a moment have put it past beholding, by throwing it into the infernal furnace. Why doth he complain, that can compel? Habet in manu potentiam, in cord patientiam: there is power in his hand, but patience in his heart. To do Justice, we (after a sort) contstrain him: but his delight is to be merciful.

He complains. All complain of lost labors: the Shepherd after all his vigilance, complains of stragglng Lambes: the Gardener after all his diligence, of withering Plants: the Husbandman after all his toil, of lean Fields, and thin Haruests: Merchants after many adventures, of Wrackes and Pyracies: Tradesmen of bad debtors, and scarcity of monies: Lawyers complain of few Clients, and Divines of fewer Conuerts. Thus we complain one of another: but God hath just cause to complain of us all.

Well, if the Lord complain of Sin, let not us make our selves merry with it. Like Sampson, it may make us sport for a while, but will at last pull down the house upon our heads. The voice of the Turtle is (not) heard in our Land. Vox Turturis, vox gementis. True penitents be more rare then Turtles. The voice of the Sparrow we hear, chirping lust: of the Night-bird, buzzing ignorance: the voice of the Scriech-owl, croaking blasphemy: of the Popinjay, gaudy pride: the voice of the Kite and Cormorant, covetousness and oppression: these, and other Birds of that wing be common. But, Non audita est vox Turturis: who mourns for the sin of the time, and longs to be freed from the time of sin? It was an unhappy spectacle in Israel, to see at once, Lachrymantem Dominum, and ridentem populum: a weeping Savior, and deriding sinners.

We complain of our crosses and losses, we complain of our maladies, of our injuries, enemies, miseries: the Lord open our eyes, and soften our hearts, to see and feel the cause of all, and to complain of our sins.

I come. The Lord had often sent before, now he came himself; even by his personal presence, accepting our nature. The Son of God that made us the Sons of men, became the Son of man, to make us the Sons of God. He came voluntarily: we come into the world, not by our own wills, but by the will of our parents; Christ came by his own will. He came not for his own benefit, but ours. What profit doth the Sun receive by our looking on him? We are the better for his light, not he for our sight. A shower of rain that waters the earth, gets nothing to it self; the earth fares the better for it. He came for our fruits: these cannot enrich him: Lord, our well-doing extendeth not to thee.

Never came such an Inhabitant to our Country, as Jesus. Had God granted men the liberty to beg of him what they would, and have it; they durst not have been so bold as to ask his only Son. When the King gives a free concession to his subject, to make choice of his own suit, without denial; he will not be so impudent as to beg the Prince. Let us entertain him well, we fare the better for him: the profit of our redemption blesseth all the rest unto us. Far be it from us to welcome him with scandals, with blasphemies, and neglect. He may then reply, as Absalom to Hushai, Is this thy kindness to thy friend? No, you say, we make much of him, hold him in the highest regard, trust him with our whole salvation. But know, Christ fares not the better for thy Faith, but for thy Charity. Faith is a beggarly receiver, Charity is a rich giver. Thy Faith is a hand that takes something from him, to enrich thyself: thy Charity is a hand that gives something to him, in his distressed members. Indeed Christ is the subject of all tongues, but he is not the object of all hearts. The School disputes of him, the Pulpit preaches of him, Profession talks of him, Profane men swear by him, few love him, few serve him. He is come, let him be made welcome, by setting our best cheer, and choicest fruits before him. Whom should we entertain, if not our Savior?

[3] Seeking. But, did not He know before? What need he seek, that hath found? He that understands our thoughts long before they are borne, cannot be nescious of our works when they are done. My answer shall be short: the Lord's Quaerit, is a Requirat: he doth not seek a thing that is hid from him, but requires a debt that is due unto him.

[4] Seeking. This is no rare, but a continued act. It is not Veni, I came: He came unto his own, &c. Nor a Venturus sum; Yet a little while, and I will come. But 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : as Revel. 3.20. S to pulsans, I stand knocking: so here, Venio querens, I come seeking. He seeks continually: will you hear how long?

[5] These three years: Much time hath been spent about the Interpretation of this time; how it is applicable to the Jewish Synagogue, to whom it was immediately referred. I find no great difference among Expositors, saving only in their terms. Some by the first year understand the time before the Captivity; by the second, their return to Jury; by the last, the coming of Christ. Some by the first year, conceive the Law given by Moses: By the second, the Prophetical attestations: by the third, the grace of our Lord Jesus. Some resolve it thus; the first year was the time of Circumcision, from Abraham to Moses: the next, the Levitical Law from Moses to Christ: the last is the year of Salvation by the Messias. Others understand the first year to be of the Patriarchs, the middle year of the Judges, the third of the Kings. After all this he was entreated to forbear it a fourth year, till it was instructed by the Apostles: and then being found fruitless, it was cut down by the Romans. But I rather take a definite number to be put for an indefinite: three years is time long enough to wait for the proof of a tree: such a proportionable expectation had the Lord for that Church. If literally you would have it, I take this to be the probablest exposition. These three years were the very three years of his Preaching, healing diseases, casting out Devils, working Miracles before their faces. The other year which he added, was the time while the Apostles offered them the Gospel of salvation. Whereof the refusers were cut down, the accepters were saved.

[6] He hath likewise waited for the Church of Christianity three years; that is, three revolutions of Ages, thrice five hundred years. Or he hath tarried the leisure of the whole world three years: the first year, under nature: the second, under the Law: the third, under Grace: the fourth is now a passing, and who knows how far it is spent?

[7] Or to apply it to our selves, these three years of our visitation, hath been so many scores of years. Conceive the foremost to be in the days of King Edward 6. who purged the gold from the rust and dross of Superstition, Ignorance, and Cussenage, which it had contracted. The Sun began to shine out in his bright luster: the Lord came seeking our fruits; but not finding them answerable to his expectation, nor worthy of the glorious Gospel: he drew another cloud over our Sun: teaching us better to value that heavenly Manna, wherewith we were so suddenly grown wanton. The second year, under Queen Elizabeth, of so blessed memory: that Royal nurse, upon whose Bosom the Church of God leaned to take her rest. She did again vindicate this Vineyard, which had so long lain among Friars and Monks, that it had all-most quite forgotten the language of Canaan: She taught it a new to speak the Dialect of the Holy Ghost. When that Gracious Queen was taken from a Crown of gold to a Diadem of glory, then began our third year; wherein our present Sovereign was sent; Dignissimus Regno, si non natus ad Regnum: under whom we know not, whether our Truth or Peace be more. Only let us bless him, and bless God for him, that we may all be blessed in him. Thus far we may say of our Land, as Syluius did of Rhodes; Semper in Sole sita est: the bright reflection of the Gospel compasseth us round about. Now he comes this third year seeking our fruits: which when we consider, we can say no more but Miserere Deus; Lord be merciful to us: for never were such blessings requited with such unthankfulness. We condemn the Jews for abusing Christ's patience: God grant they rise not up at the last day to condemn us.

[8] He comes to a particular man three years. 1. In Youth. I have planted thee in my Vineyard, given thee the influence of my mercies; where is thy fruitfulness? Alas, the young man sends him away, with a Nondum tempus ficorum: it is too early for me to fall to Mortification; would you put me to penance, before I have had the leisure and pleasure to offend? He is ready to send Christ away in the Language of that foul Spirit; Art thou come to torment me before my time? But whose charge is it to Remember thy Creator, Diebus Iunentutis? Then the conquest is most glorious, because then it is most difficult. You say, It is never too late; but I am sure, It is never too soon, to be gracious and holy. The Devil is a false Sexton, and sets back the clock of Time in prosperity: in the day of trouble, he will make it run fast enough. 2. In middle age; and now the buying of Farms, and trying of Beasts; the pleasures of Matrimony, the cares for posterity. take up all the rooms of the soul. Men rather busy themselves to gather the fruits of earth, then to yield the fruits of heaven. Here is strength of nature, and fullness of stature; but still a defect of grace. Perhaps, Christ hath now some fair promises, of fruits hereafter: Let me first go bury my Father, then. But (a thousand to one) he finds something in Domo, left by his father, that keeps him a Domino, from following his Master. To prevent this, it is his caution to the entertained servant; Forget thine own people, and thy fathers house: rather forgo and forget thy fathers house, then thy Makers service. 3. In old age: now the decay of body should argue a decay of sin. The taste finds no relish in riot, the ears cannot distinguish Music, the eyes are dim to pleasing objects, very Desire fails: now all things promise mortification. He that cannot stir abroad in the world, what should he do but recollect himself, and settle his thoughts on the world to come? Now fruits, or never. Not yet: Morositie, Pride, and Avarice, are the three diseases of old age: men covet most, when they have time to spend least: as cheating Tradesmen then get up most commodities into their hands, when they mean to break. Still he comes seeking fruit, and is returned with a Non Inuentus.

[9] If yet it wear but as the Prophets sign to Hezekiah; This year ye shall eat such as groweth of it self: and the second year such springeth of the same: and in the third year ye shall sow and reap, &c. the third year might afford him somewhat. But doth he forbear all trees thus long? No, some are snatched away in the flower and pride of their life: yea, they be not few, that will not allow themselves to live; but with riot and intemperance hasten their own ends, before they have well begun or learned what life is: like bad Scholars, that slubber out their books before they have learned their lessons. That instead of, Non est fructus, we may say, Non est ficus, the tree it self is gone. And that goodly person, which like a fair ship hath been long a building: and was but yesterday put to sea, is today sunk in the Maine. We do not eat, drink, and sleep, and take such refectations of nature, vt non moriamur, that we might not die; that is impossible: but that we should not die barren, but bear some fruits up with us to him that made the Tree.

[10] Seeking. It is fit we should offer our fruits to God, and not put him to seek for his own. We should be like those ripe-figs, that fall into the mouth of the eater. The best liquors are they that drop from their cells, of their own accord, without pressing. The most acceptable of all oblations, be the Free-will-offerings. Howsoever, let us be sure not to disappoint the Lord when he seeks.

[11] On this Fig-tree. It is fit, that he that plants a Vineyard, should taste of the Wine: good reason, his own tree should yield him some fruit, considering what he hath done for it he may well challenge it.

1 He hath planted us: we spring not up naturally; as the Oak grows from an Acorn, the Peach from a stone: but a gracious hand hath set us. We are not borne of flesh, nor of the will of blood, or of man, but of God.

2. He hath planted us in his Vineyard within the enclosed Garden of the Church. Had he left us to the unregarded wilderness, without any Dresser to look to us, there might have been some excuse of our barrenness. The ground that is left to it self, is (in a manner) blameless, though it be fruitless. But in Vineasua, which he hath fenced in with his providence, blessed with his fauing influence, husbanded with his Dressers diligence, forwarded with the beams of mercy, and showers more precious then the dews of Hermon that fell upon the hill of Zion. Where we participate the fatness of the ground, are fed with vnperishing Manna, compassed about with Songs of deliverance, and have seen our desires upon (his and) our enemies. Where Righteousness is our walls, and Peace our bulwarks, and the ways be milk where we set our feet.

3 We are Fig trees: not brambles, no man expects Grapes from thorns. Not Okes or Cedars, to be a dwelling for the Storks: But Fig trees, apt for fruit, for pleasant fruit. If the rest be fruitless, they serve for other purposes: but what shall become of the barren Fig tree?

4. He is our Lord, and Querit suum, he seeks but his own. If our own Kine give us no milk, our own sheep afford us no wool, our own land return us no increase, we are displeased: whereas these be reasonless creatures; but we have sense above common nature, reason above sense, grace above reason: We are but tennants of these, Christ is Lord of us: our sins bring the curse of barrenness upon them, but there is no fault in God, if we be unfruitful.

5. He comes seeking: not threatening, raging, wounding, not felling down the tree, nor stocking it up by the roots; but seeking. Dignatur expectare fructus, cui licet eradicare Infructuosos. Man is a loser by the barrenness of his garden-tree: were there not a tree left, God is never the poorer.

Now lay all these together: a Lord that owes us, we are his trees: to come into his Vineyard, where he may be confident; we live on his ground: to look upon a Fig tree, made of an apt disposition to good fruit; such a one as himself hath planted, not casually grown up: a tree not neglected, but whereon he hath bestowed great care and cost; waiting, not destroying: what can we plead for it, if it be fruitless? God is our Lord and Proprietary, England is his Vineyard, everyone of us his Fig-tree, thus planted, watered, blessed by his gracious mercy: He comes to us with patience, that should run to him with penitence: seeking our fruits, that should make tender of them unsought; waiting, that might command: now, fear, obedience, and thankfulness, keep us from sending him back with a Non inuenio, I find none.

[12] Fruit. This is that inseparable effect that God expects from every Tree planted in his Garden. We are married to Christ: to what ende? That we should bring forth fruits unto God. He seeks not for leaves, buds, or blossoms, but fruits. Could leaves content him, we would not leave him unsatisfied: he should have an Arbour large enough to reach to the Worlds ende. Our tongues run apace, not seldom faster then our wits. We are God's debtors, and if he will take our words, so: that's all he is like to have. Might buds please him, or blossoms: we have intentions to good, certain offers and shows of obedience: which we wear like a cloak, or some loose garment, that when Lust calls, we may quickly slip off. But when he seeks for works, all our Consonants be turned into Mutes, we are speechlesse. O would he ask us for anything but fruits: but what should be expected from the Fig tree, but Figs?

Of every soul here he seeks for fruits. Of the Magistrate, that he bring forth the fruits of Justice; determining causes with sincerity of decision, and convenience of expedition: being so far as equity permits, a husband to the widow, and a father to the fatherless. Of the Minister, that he bring forth the fruits of knowledge. Aaron's Rod was his Pastoral staff: in one and the same night it brought forth buds, and blossoms, and fruit. Fruitfulness is the best argument that God hath called us: there is not a plant of his setting, but the very branches thereof shall flourish. I do not say, our pains shall always convert many Souls; that is God's fruit, not ours: He chargeth us to be industrious in Preaching, let Himself alone with the work of saving. Of the private man, he expects the fruit of his calling: to be idle, is to be barren of good; and to be barren of good, is to be pregnant of all evil. Bella gerant alij, Protesilaus edit: but let us that are called to work, work in our calling; otherwise at last, we shall make but a sorry answer to that Question, Vbi fructus? Let us all produce the fruits of Charity: rich men do good turns to themselves; as they play at Tennis, tossing the Ball to him that will toss it to them again: seldom to the poor, for they are not able to bandy it back. Pride cuts, and Ryot shuffles, but betwixt them both, they deal the poor but a bad game. The fruit of Christianity is Mercy; when the rich, like full ears of Corn, humble themselves to the poor earth in Charity. Feed him, that feeds you: give him part of your Temporalls, from whom you expect Eternalls: you clothe Christ with your blacks on earth, he will clothe you with his glorious whites in heaven. Our mercy to others, is the Fruit of God's mercy to us.

[13] Fruit. Nothing is created for it self, but so placed by the most wise providence, that it may confer something to the public good; though it be but as the Widows two Mites to the Treasury. The poorest creature yields some Fruit, wherein it doth imitate the goodness of the Maker. We know not readily, what good Serpents and Vermin may do; yet certainly, they have their fruit; both in sucking up that poison of the earth, which would be contagious to man; in setting off the beauty of the better pieces of creation: (for though the same hand made both the Angels in heaven, and the worms on earth; yet the Angels appear the more glorious being so compared) besides their hidden virtues abstracted from our knowledge. Of stones they make iron, rubbish serves to raise Bulwarks, the small pebble for the sling, worms and flies are baits for Fishes: everything is enabled with some gift for the vnniuersall benefit, and to produce those fruits is their natural work.

The Sun comes forth of his Chamber like a Bridegroom, fresh and lively; and rejoiceth as a Giant, to run his diurnall course, to lighten us with his refulgent beams, to generate, cheer, and mature things with his parental heat: this is his fruit. In his absence the Moon and Stars adorn the Canopie of Heaven, reflecting their operative influence to quicken the lower world: this is their fruits. The curled clouds, those bottles of rain, thin as the liquor they contain, fly up and down on the wings of the wind, delivering their moist burdens upon the earth, teats whereon the hungry fields and pastures do suck; yet they expect no harvest from us: this is their fruits. The subtle winds come puffing out of their caverns, to make artificial motions, wholesome airs, and nauigable seas; yet neither earth, air, nor sea return them recompense: this is their fruits. The earth, in a thankful imitation of the Heavens, locks not up her treasures within her own Coffers; but without respect of her private benefit, is liberal of her allowance, yielding her fatness and riches to innumerable creatures, that hang on her breasts, and depend upon her as their common mother for maintenance. Of the beasts that feed upon her, Kine give us their milk, Sheep their wool: everyone pays a tribute to man, their vsufructuary Lord: this is their fruits. Fruit bearing Trees spend not all their sap and moisture upon themselves, or the increase of their own magnitudes: but the principal and purer part of it is concocted into some pleasant Fruits; whereof they nor their young Springs ever come to taste; but they proffer it us, and when it is ripe, they voluntarily let it fall at their Masters feet. Never did the Olive annoint it self with the own Oil, nor the Vine make it self drunk with the own Grapes, nor the Tree in my Text, devour the own Figs: yet they all strive to abound with Fruits.

Let me raise your Meditations from earth to heaven: the holy Angels there are called Ministring Spirits: those royal Armies fight for us against our enemies: like Nurses, they bear us up in their arms, and (though unseen) do glorious Offices for us: this is part of their fruit. The blessed Trinity is always working: Hitherto my Father worketh, and I work. The Father by his providence and protection, the Son by his mercy and mediation, the Holy Ghost by his grace and sanctification: all dividing the streams of their goodness, for the best behoove of the world. The more anything furthers the common good, the more noble is the Nature, and more resembling the Creator.

The Earth is fruitful, the Sea, the Air, the Heavens are fruitful; and shall not man bring forth fruits, for whom all these are fruitful? While all the Armies of Heaven and Earth are busied in fructifying; shall Man, of more singular graces and faculties, be idle, a burden to the world and himself? Both the Church of God for the propagation of piety, and the world it self for the upholding of his estate, requires our Fruits. If Happiness consisted in doing nothing, God that meant Adam so happy, would never have set him about business: but as Paradise was his Store-house, so also his workhouse: his pleasure was his task. There is no state of man that can privilege a folded hand: Our life is, Vita pulueris, non puluinaris. Lands, Means, and Moneyes, men make the protections of Idleness: whereas Adam commanded the whole earth, yet work expected him. In Paradise all things did labor for man, now man must labor for all things. Adam did work because he was happy, we his children must work, that we may be happy. Heaven is for joys, Hell for pains, Earth for labor. God hath three houses; this is his Work-house, that above is his Ware-house. O then let us be fruitful; that others benefit may be ours, our benefit theirs; and the glory of all, the Lord's. If Magistrates yield not the Fruit of Justice, Ministers the fruits of knowledge, private men the fruits of Charity and Obedience; it is as unnatural, as if the Sun should forget to shine, or the earth to fructify. God made all these for man, he made man for himself: of us he looks for Fruit, of us let him find it, from us accept it, in us increase it, and to us reward it, through Him, in whom alone we expect mercy, Jesus Christ.

The Success follows. Non inuenio.

We have brought the Lord into his Vineyard, heard him calling for the Dresser, showing him a Tree, telling him of a three years expectation: now, if after all this we inquire for the event; himself certifies us, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , I find none.

None? Peradventure he came before the season; Nondum tempus erat Ficorum. When should a Tree bring forth fruits, but Tempore suo? This is the praise of the good Tree, that it brings forth the fruit in due season. If the Fig-tree could have objected to the Owner, as Elisha to his servant; Hoccine tempus; Is this a time to plant Vineyards, or gather fruit? Or as the man replied to his neighbor, that came to borrow loaves at midnight; Is this a time to lend Bread, when myself and family are in bed? The Spring is the season of fructifying, the Autumn of gathering. When the time of the singing of Birds is come, Then the Fig tree puts forth her green Figs. But Cum fermento perfundatur pulvis, when the dust is leavened with mire, and the bands of Orion have locked up the influence of Heaven. Who seeks fruit in Winter; he must be content with Winter fruit. There is the Winter of an afflicted Conscience; no marvel then if neither ripe Figs, nor so much as green leaves appear: when all the Sap is retyred to the Roote, as in extreme cold the blood runs to the heart to succor it. When the Babylonians required of their captive Israelites some Hebrew Songs, they could soon answer; How shall we sing the Lord's Song in a strange Land? Is this a time or place to be merry? But did the Lord come out of season? No, he required it not the first day, or month, but waited the full time, expecting fruit in the Autumn or Vintage season. Non ante tempus querit, qui per triennium venit. He came not with a Trienniall Visitation, as Episcopal Fathers use to visit, once in three years; but every year, every month in the year, week of the month, day of the week. Of another Fig-tree it is said, that The time of Figs was not yet, yet he cursed it: Here the time was three years past without fruit, yet he cursed it not. But look to it; If thou wilt not fructify Tempore tuo, thou shalt be cut down tempore non tuo, perish before thy time. There is not a day in the year, wherein he forbears seeking our fruit; yet Venio, non inuenio; I find none.

[2] None? Nunquid quia male quaesivit Dominus? Was there any error in his search? Men often seek Bona, good things, non been, not in a good manner. Either they fail in their Quando, as Joseph sought Christ after a days journey; whereas he is too precious to be missed one hour: They shall seek thee Tempore inveniendi, when thou mayest be found. Or in the right Vbi: as Mary sought her Son in Cognitione Carnis, among her kindred; who was in Domo Patris, in the Temple. So the Papists seek now him in Pictures, who promised to be found in the Scriptures. Or in their Quomodo, as they that seek aliud pro illo, aliud prae illo, another instead of him, another besides him, another with him, another before him, which they do not seek for him. All these seek and miss, because they seek amiss. The world is commonly mistaken in their search: Quaerunt bona locis non suis, they seek for things out of their proper orbs. Men seek Honor in Pride, whereas Honor is to be found in Humility. They seek reputation in bloody revenge; alas, that is to be found in Patience: It is the glory of a man to pass by an offense. They seek content in Riches, which is as if one should seek for fresh water in the midst of the Sea. But in none of these circumstances did this Seeker fail: not in the Vbi, for he sought in the Vineyard: not in the Quando, for he came in the Vintage: not in the Quomodo, for he sought fruit on that Fig tree, about which he had been at so great charges; yet I find none.

[3] None? Haply not so thicke with fruits as the Vines of Engedi: every Land is not a Caanan, to flowe with Milk and Honey. But yet some competent measure, enough to pay the Land-lord rent for the ground it stands on; no, None. If there be none to spare, whereof the owner may make money; yet, Sufficiat ad vsum suum, ad esum suum, that he may eat the labors of his own hands; no, None. If the number be not as the Sand, yet let there be a Remnant. If there cannot be a whole harvest, yet let there be a Tenth. If not a Tenth, yet let there be some gleanings; and that is a woeful scarcity: if the gleanings be not allowed, yet let there be here and there a Fig, a Grape, a Berry, on the outmost branches; that the Planter may have a taste: It is too defective, when Non florebit ficus, the Tree doth not flourish: but Quando non erit Vua in vitibus, non ficus in ficulneis: when there shall not be a Grape on the Vine, nor a Fig on the Tree; this is a miserable sterilitie. Some thing hath some savor, but None is good for nothing. Indeed all Trees are not equally loaden: there is the measure of a hundred, of sixty, of thirty; an Omer, and an Ephah: but the Sacred dewes of Heaven, the graces of the Gospel, bless us from having None. I find none.

[4] None? Peradventure none such as he looks for, no Fruits delicate enough for the Almighty's taste. Indeed, our best fruits are never perfect and kindly ripened; still they relish sour and earthly, and savor of the Stock from which they were taken. They are heavenly Plants, but grow in a foraigne and cold Climate, not well concocted, nor worthy the charges and care bestowed upon us. Set Orange or Figgetrees in this our cold Country, the fruit will not quit the cost of the planting and maintaining. But the complaint is not here of the imperfection or paucity of fruits, but of the nullity; None. Some reading that Text with idle eyes; that after all our fruits, we are still unprofitable Trees: because they can find no validity of merit in their works, throw the Plough in the hedge, and make holyday. But shall not the Servant do his Masters business; because he cannot earn his Masters Inheritance? Shall the Mason say, I will share with my Sovereign in his Kingdom, or I will not lay a stone in his building? Yet good fruits have their reward; though not by the merit of the doer, yet by the mercy of the accepter. Sour they be of themselves, but in Christ they have their sweetening: and the meanest fruit, which that great Angel of the Conenant shall present to his Father, with the addition of his own precious Incense, are both received and rewarded. In their own nature they may be corrupt; but being died in the blood of Christ, they are made pleasing to God. Yea, also profitable to the Church, and useful to men, seem they never so poor. Even a troubled Spring doth often quench a distressed Souldiersthirst: a small Candle doth good, where the greater Lights be absent: and the meanest fruit of holy Charity, even a cup (though it be not of the juice of the grapes out of the Vineyard, but) of cold water out of the tankard, in the name of Christ, shall have the recompense. But here the complaint is not of the meannes, or fewness, but of the Bareness; None at all.

[3] None? Every Tree is known by the fruits, it is Christ's everlasting rule. Howsoever the tree lives by the sap, and not by the fruits: yet it is known to live by the fruits, and not by the sap; for this is hidden. The just man lives by his faith, not by his works: but he is known to live by his works, not by his invisible faith. Neither doth the fruit make good the tree, but the tree makes good the fruit. Opera bona non faciunt iustum, Iustus facit bona opera. Good works make not a man righteous, but the righteous man doth good works. Our persons are justified before our actions; as of necessity the tree must be good, before it can bear good fruit. But how shall that tree be discerned, that hath no fruit? I find none.

[6] None? Why this to us? Why such a Text in such a time? We abound with fruits: which way can you look, and not have your eye full of our works? They before, in such places, have successively commended our fruits. Bee it so: yet Euripides being questioned why he always made women bad in his Plays, whereas Sophocles ever made them good, in his: answered, Sophocles makes them such as they ought to be, but I make them such as indeed they are. Their former commendation have told us what we should be; but this Emblem, I fear, tells us truly what we are. Not all of us; God forbid: here is but one Fig-tree in a whole Vineyard thus taxed, and far be it from us to tax a whole Vineyard for one barren Fig-tree.

[7] None? Yes, enough of some fruits, but the Prophet calls them Ficos valde mal's, so bad that they cannot be eaten. As the fruit of the Vine is commended for Quicknesse, the fruit of the Olive for Fatness, so the fruit of the Fig-tree for Sweetness; in Jotham's Parable. But if it bear not Fructum natiuitatis suae, the fruit of the own kind, but bitter figs; here had better be none at all. What an uncomfortable sight is this to Him, whose heart is set on his Orchard; after the cost of so dear blood to purchase it, after such indulgent care to cherish it, and the charges of so many workmen to dress it; yea, after so much patience to expect it (say the Fig-tree does not bear so soon as it is planted; in our insancie we can do nothing, in our minority we will do little, in God's service: but now it is grown fructifiable) I am non gustare fructus, not to have so much as a taste? Yea, were this all; did barrenness only usurp it: but there is worse then a mere orbitie or absence of goodness; a position of bitter fruits: Quaesiuu Vuas, inveni Labruscas: I find wild Grapes, luxurient fruits. Instead of the hearty effects, which Wine produceth, I am answered with the melancholy preuarications of malice.

Behold the wonder and spectacle of unthankfulness; among all God's Creatures, Man; and among men the barren Christian. Though Israel play the Harlot, yet let not Judah transgress. What may be expected from the wild Forest of Paganism, when the Garden of Eden yields such fruits? The sweet fruit of the Spiritual Fig-tree is mercy: our God is the God of Love, our Savior is the Prince of Love, the Church is knit together in Love: our Roote is Love, our Sap is Love, our Ligaments Love: now if we shall suck the blood one of another, violate the relations of peace, concoct all our moisture into malice; here is worse then, Invenio fructum nullum, I find none: for Invenio fructum malum, I find cursed fruits. We are grown unnatural; the hand scratcheth the eye, the mouth biteth the hand: thorns and briars entwine and embrace one another, while (against all nature) Fig-trees denoure one another. Lord, thou didst sow good seed in thy field, whence then hath it Tares? Here is more fruit then God would have; but for that he expects, I find none.

[8] When we are filled with his blessings, Christ looks for our praises; when we have caten and are fat, that we should worship him. What fruit finds he? We sit down to eat and drink, and rise up to play: for praying, playing. When we are scourged, he looks for our humiliation and penance; Sure, in their affliction they will seek me. What fruit finds he? Lord, thou hast smitten them, but they have not sorrowed; an insensible desperatnesse. In this case let us pray; Lord, less of the fruits we have, and more of them we should have. Instead of righteousness, a cry: a cry indeed; a roaring cry of the oppressors, and a mourning cry of the oppressed. Haec non sunt placido suscipienda sinu.

Our Bells ring, our Chimneys smoke, our Fields rejoice, our Children dance, our selves sing and play; Iouis omnia plena. But when Righteousness, hath sown, and comes to reap; here is no harvest; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, I find none. And as there was never less wisdom in Greece, then in time of the Seven Wise men: so never less piety among us, then now, when upon good cause most is expected. When the Sun is brightest the Stars be darkest: so the clearer our light, the more gloomy our life with the deeds of darkness. The Cimerians, that live in a perpetual mist, though they deny a Sun, are not condemned of impiety, but of ignorance: but Anaxogoras; that saw the Sun, and yet denied it, is not condemned of ignorance, but of impiety. Former times were like Leah, bleary eyed, but fruitful: the present, like Rachel, fair, but barren. We give such acclamation to the Gospel, that we quite forget to observe the Law. As upon some solemn Festival, the Bells are rung in all steeples, but then the Clockes are tied up: there is a great untuned confusion and clangor, but no man knows how the time passeth, So in this universal allowance of liberty by the Gospel, which indeed rejoiceth our hearts, had we the grace of sober usage) the Clocks that tell us how the time passes; Truth and Conscience, that show the bounded use, and decent form of things, are tied up, and cannot be heard. Still Fructum non inuenio, I find no fruits. I am sorry to pass the Fig tree in this plight: but as I find it, so I must leave it, till the Lord mend it. So I come to

The Sentence. Cut it down.

[1] A heavy doom! Alas, will nothing else expiate the fault? May not the lopping off some superfluities recover it? Take from the Sinner, the object of his vicious error: deface the Harlots beauty, that bewitcheth the Lasciuious: pull the cup from the mouth of the Drunkard: Nauseate the stomach of the Rytous: strip the Popinjay of her pyed Feathers: rust the Gold, vanish the riches of the Covetous: take away Macah's gods, perhaps he will make him no more. If this will not do, cut off some of the arms & branches: weaken his strength, sicken his body, lay him groaning and bleeding on the bed of sufferance: griue his heart-strings with the sense and sorrow of his sins: anything rather than Cut it down: alas no fruit can grow on it then, but sad despair. A man's house is foul, or a little decayed; will he pul it down or rather repair it? There is hope of a Tree though the root wax old in the earth, and the stock die in the ground; yet the springs of water may put new life into it: but once cut down, all hope is cut down with it. When a man hath taken delight in a Tree, conveniently planted in his garden; what variety of experiments will he use, before he cuts it down? Alas, thus poor silly men, we reason: we measure things that be immeasurable, by things that be measurable, by things that be miserable. What we in a foolish pity would do, we think God in his merciful wisdom should do. Yet which of us would endure a dead Tree three years together in his Orchard? We would say, If it will not bear fruit, to cheer us; it shall make a fire to warm us. But the Lord hath been fixe and thirty Moons gracious in his forbearance, give him now leave to be just in his vengeance. If so much indulgence cannot recover it, there is little hope of it: Cut it down.

[2] Cut it down. Who must do this? The dresser. An displeasing office to him, that hath bestowed so much labor upon it, esteemed it so precious, hoped for some reward at his Masters hand for his diligence about it; now to give the fatal blow, to Cut it down? And if it must fall, let it be Manu aliena, non sua, let another's hand do it. Hagar will not behold her dying Son; die he must, she was persuaded; Modo non videam, Let me not see the death of the Child. But he must obey; Arbor non est Cul•oris, sed Parris familias: the Tree is not the Dressers, but the Lord's; and his own is at his own disposing: Cut it down.

[3] Cut it down. But how? How can the Minister be said to cut down a barren soul? Some may conceive here a reference to Excommunication: Whether the Greater, which deprives a man of all benefit by the Churches public Prayers, and the Society of Christians. Which St. Paul calls, Tradere Satana, to deliver unto Satan: so himself Excommunicated Hymencus and Alexander, delivering them unto Satan: a miserable condition, to be subjected to a slave, to a dog, a drudge; but then especially fearful, when God grants unto Satan a Writ or faculty, Pro excommunicato cap•endo. The ignominy of ignominy; besides the peril: For as Christ protecteth all the Trees in his Vineyard; so if any be transplanted to the wild desert, they are under the god of this world. Or the Less; which is indeed, no other properly, then an Act of the Churches Discipline, whereby she corrects her unruly children: that smarting with the absence of wonted comforts, they may be humbled by repentance, and so recover their pristine state. This censure may be either too cruel, or too triuial. The Church of Rome grants Excommunications for things lost: a man hath lost his horse, he may have an Excommunication against him that detaines him: so the Father may hap to Excommunicate his own Son, and for the body of a Iade, hazard the soul of his Child. Yea, which is worse, they publish Excommunications for sins not yet committed: The Lord of a Manor hath set a row of young Elmes, he may have an Excommunication against all those that shall do them any harm. This is to hang a man, before he hath done the fact that deferues it. These in rite, forcelesse, bugbear Excommunications, the ridiculous affordments of a mercenary Power, are not unlike those old night spels, which blind people had from mungrel Witches, to set about their Orchards and Houses, antidotes and charms against theeuing; wherein distrusting the providence of God, they made themselves beholding to the Devil for safety. Creditors, that would be paid in their moneys, may procure an Excommunication against their Debtors, if they pay not by such a day. This were an excellent project for you Citizens, a rounder course then arrests and tedious trials at Law. But it is to be doubted, that your Debtors would fear the Popes Parchment less then the Scriveners, and an Excommunication far less then an Outlary. Ther's but four things exempted from the power of their Excommunication, as Nauarrus notes: a Locust, an Infidel, the Devil, and the Pope: so he hath marched them, so let them go together. For the Excommunicate must be a man, a Christian, mortal, and an Inferior: now the Locust is not a man, the Infidel is not a Christian, the Devil is not mortal, and the Pope hath no Superior. But too much of that; this is a Parable, and here is no foundation for such a building.

[4] Cut it down. How? with an Axe of martial iron? This were an exposition fit for Doway, or the Gunpowder-Enginers: that by Cutting it down, understood, Blow it up: turning their Axe to a Petarre. Had God said to them, Cut it down; the axe had been instantly heaved up: yea, they did it, when God said no such thing. Rather then fail of cutting it down, they would have stockd it up, root and all: this is their mercy. But the Spiritual Axe is to cut down, Culpas, non Animas: when we read of cutting down, remember it is meant of men's sins, not of their souls. Preachers indeed do wound; but it is Gladio oris, not ore gladij. with the Sword of the Spirit, not a Rouillac's Knife. If God had meant such a cutting down, Nero had been a fitter instrument then Paul. We read, that their sound went through the World: but that their Sword went through the World, we never read,

[5] Cut it down. How then? Succide, that is, Succidendam minare; threaten that I will cut it down. Cast them out of my sight; Eijce, that is, Eijciendos pronuncia; say that I will reject them. Quod moritur, moriatur: Quod succidendum est, succidatur, That which dieth, let it die. God sometimes sends such farewels and defiances to sinners that will not repent. Ephraim is joined to Idols, let him alone. If they will not be persuaded to return, let them go on to their ruin, let them alone. If any man will be unjust, let him be unjust: He that will be filthy, let him be filthy still; let them perish. Abeat, pereat, profundat, perdat.

[6] Cut it down. This was, Sententia eris, the sentence of the mouth: but it may be this was not Consilium cordis, the purpose of his heart. Saepe Deo minante quod peccans meretur, peccanti non fit quod Deus minatur. Nor can this tax God of levity: for he that speaks with condition of repentance, may change his word without suspicion of lightness. Tu muto sententiam tuam, Deus mutabit suam. Thus was Nineveh cut down: euersa est in malo, vt aedificaretur in bono: the subversion was menaced, the conversion was intended. The Father shuts his rebellions Son out of doors, will not allow him a lodging, not so much as among his servants: yet he does not mean to let him perish with hunger and cold in the streets: but when he hath well smarted for his disobedience, upon his humble submission he is re-entertained. The very mercies of the wicked are cruel, but the very judgments of God are sweet. This Cutting down, is Medicinale, not mortal: Disciplinans, non eradicans: for restitution, not destitution; for remedie not for ruin. Indeed, if all this denuntiation and threatening cannot persuade them to return, then comes their final predition: when they have cut off themselves impenitently, God will cut them off impartially. But if we turn to deprecation and repentance, he will turn to commiseration and forgiveness. The Tree is barren, and the Lord says, Cut it down: the Tree fructifies, and he will say Let it stand. O then let us humble our selves, and with seasonable repentance Cut down our sins, that this terrible Sentence may never Cut down our souls.

The Reason. Why cumbreth it the ground?

[1] God is an vndependant Lord, and needs not give a reason of his doings: for who can call him to account, Curita facis? His Judgments are not always manifest, they are always just: nor doth he things because they are good, but they are therefore good because he doth them. Should he make short work on the earth, and dispatch all barren Trees in a moment: yet thou continuest holy, O thou worship of Israel. If he strickes us, we are not wronged; it is our desert, and his Justice. If he spares us, we have not merited; It is his mercy. Huic fit misericordia, tibi non fit iniuria: that man receives mercy, thou hast no injury. Yet that he might be justified, and the mouth of all wickedness stopped, he is content to give a reason of this sentence.

Think not I deal hardly with this Fig-tree; let us confer together, and hear one another with patience. I will show thee sufficient reason of cutting it down: do thou show me some cause why it should stand. My reason is, It cumbereth the ground. Terram reddit otiosam, inutilem. It is not only barren Formaliter, but Effective. In a word. 1. It does no good. 2. It doth much harm.

[2] First, It does no good, therefore it is unworthy of the nourishment. Terra bona, and Gens mala; are an ill match: an opulent Land, and a pestilent People. Peccator non est dignus pane quo vescitur. The wicked man is not worthy of the bread he eats, of the water he drinks, of the air he breathes, of the ground he goes on. The rich thinks himself worthy of delicate viands, costly garments: dutiful attendance, Quia-Diuts, because he is rich: yet he may not be worthy of a crumb, a rag, a respect, Quia malus, because he is evil. It will one day grieve such fruitless Nabal's, when they must receive a multiplicity of torments, according to the number of their abused benefits, and they will wish that they had not fared so well upon earth, that they might fare less ill in Hell. They live in the Vineyard, eat the fat, and drink the sweet; turning all this juice, not into fruitful clusters, for the behoove of God's servants; but into their own arms and branches: raising their Houses out of the ruins of God's House. What good do they? Cut them down, Why cumber they the ground? It is fit, that the Riches of the sinner should be laid up for the righteous: dentur dignioribus.

[3] But if God should at once cut down all the barren Trees among us, there never was such a cry in Egypt, as there would be about London. What innumerable swarms of nothing does beleaguer this City? men and women, whose whole employment is, to go from their beds to the Tap-house, then to the Play-house, where they make a match for the Brothel-house, and from thence to bed again. To omit those ambulatory Christians, that wear out the Pavement of this great Temple with their feet, but scarce ever touch stone of it with their knees; that are never further from God, then when they are nearest the Church. To omit that rabble of begging and pilfring vagabonds, that like beasts, know no other end of their creation, but recreation; but to eat, and drink, and sleep. What an army of these might be mustered out of our Suburbs? But that Idleness hath disabled them to any service: they are neither fit for God nor man. Did they yet but like worms and insects, spend up the corruption of the Land, and leave us the less, it were somewhat. But they are worse, even diseases and unwholesome airs, to breed infection among us. Let Authority look to their castigation, or answer for their mischiefs: so far as they deserve, let them not be spared; Cut them down, Why comber they the Ground?

[4] The barren Tree doth no good you see; but that is not all: It doth much hurt, and that in two respects.

1 It occupies the room where a better Tree might grow. The Kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a Nation that will bring forth the Fruits thereof. A fruitful Nation would be content with such a dwelling. Christ foretells this mutation. Paul shows it accomplished. They are broken off; that we (in their places) might be grafted on. Friend, how camest thou in hither, not having on a wedding garment? Why dost thou usurp the •ea•e, where a worthy guest might sit? Thus David used to purge his Court; admitting the righteous into the offices of the unrighteous. As in case of calamity, the godly are delivered out of trouble, and the wicked come in his room: so in case of felicity, the ungodly shall be turned out of their happiness, and the righteous shall come in their stead.

A Judge is corrupt; he is girded with Justice, but the girdle sags to that side where the purse hangeth; God will cut him down; here is room for a good man, that will do equity. A Magistrate is partial, and draws the Sword of Justice in his own quarrel; which he puts up in the cause of Christ: he must be cut down, here is room for one that will love and adhere to the truth. An office is abused by him that holds it; he bought dear and he cannot sell cheap: it is time he were cut down; this place will maintain a man, that will maintain the place, with uprightness. A Minister is barren, hath no milk in his breasts: Ministerium eius accipiat alter; Let another take his office; here is room for one that will feed the people. A profane Patron will let none into the Lord's Vineyard, but at the Non-licet-Gate; by which good men will never enter: his Clarke shall be Simon, himself will be Magus: vengeance shall cut him down; here is room for one that will freely put faithful Laborers into the Vineyard. There grows an Oppressor, sculking in a corner; the needy cannot find him, or if they do, they find no fruit from him; Cut him down, here is room for one that will pity the poor. The Lord will root out such bastard Plants, and replenish his Garden with fruitful Trees.

[6] 2 It draws away nourishment from better Plants, that would bear us fruits. For this Christ denounced a woe to those Jewish Clarks, that keeping the Keies of heaven would neither enter themselves, nor suffer others. What should become of them, that will neither do good, nor suffer good to be done, but cutting down? A great Oak pines all the vnderwood near it, yea spoils the grass that should feed the cattle. A great Oppressor engrosseth all round about him, till there be no place left for a fertile Tree. Mean while, himself hath only some leaves, to shadow his Sychophants; but no fruit, unless Bramble-berries, and such as the Hogs will scarce eat.

[7] All covet to be great Trees, few to be good. The Briar would grow up to the bigness of the Maple, the Maple would be as tall as the Cedar, the Cedar as strong as the Oak: and these so spread their roots, till they starve the rest by an insensible foaking. When mother earth, the Church, would derive her sap to some young hopeful Plant, these intercept it. There is maintenance due to the Minister, but the barren Impropiator stands in his way, & sucks it all from him: perhaps he leaves him some few drops, to cool his temples, but not enough to preserve life.

[8] But the famished tree cries against him that draws the life from it, & yields no fruit; and God will hear it, Abscind, cut it down. How charitable would Lazarus have been, had he been owner of Dives his estate? How would Mordecai have promoted the good of Israel, had he been as great a favorite as Haman was? How freely would the conscionable man give spiritual preferments, were he a Patron? He that fears God, would justly render the Church her dues, did he drive such trades, and dwell in such houses, as you do. But that God, who disposeth all as it pleaseth him, mend all when it pleaseth him, even for his own mercies sake.

Thus from a plain Text I have derived you familiar persuasions: for I came not hither to satisfy the curious head, but the honest heart. Admit but two considerations more, and I have done.

[9] First the Lord hath shown us the way to be fruitful, by his own example. He owes us nothing: if he withhold good things, we cannot challenge him: if he sends us good things, we are bound to thank him. The last year, how general was the complaint all over this Kingdom? The Mower could not fill his scythe, nor the binder up of sheues his bosom. The beasts perished for want of fodder, yea, children died in the street with hunger: the poor Father not being able with all his weeks labor to buy them (only) bread. The fields were thin, and the barns thinner: little in many places there was to gather, and the unseasonable weather prevented the gathering of that little. The emptiness of their bowels did justly fill our bowels with compassion: Famine is a sore plague. We then cried unto the Lord for fruits, and he heard us: Loe in how plentiful a harvest he hath answered our desires, to his own praise, and our comfort! Yea, he concluded all with songs and triumphs, a joyful harvest-home; the best sheaf of our Wheat, the best grape of the Vintage, the best flower of our garland, the best fruit of that royal Tree, the safe return of our gracious Prince. These be the fruits of his mercy to us, where be the fruits of our thankfulness to him?

[10] Secondly, the barren Fig-tree is of all most miserable, and so much the more, as it is barren in the Vineyard. The Vine fruitless, is of all trees most useless. It is compared to noble and worthy things: to the good woman, Vxor tua sicut vitis: to the best man, I am the true vine: it checres the heart of God and man. But if barren it is good for nothing, not so much as to make a pin to hang a bat on. Oaks and Cedars are good for building, Popplars for Pales, very bushes for hedging, doted wood for firing: but the fruitless Vine is good for nothing. Salt keeps other things from putrefying, but if it self be putrefyed, what shall season it? A sweet Singer delights us all; but Quis medebitur cantatori a Serpente percusso? If a Serpent hath stung him, who shall recover his voice? If the eye be blind, what shall look to the eye?

Ad nihilum valet, quod non valet ad finem suum. It is good for nothing, that is not good for the end it was made. If a knife be not good to cut, we say it is good for nothing: yet may some other use be invented for it. If a Plough be not good to break the ground, we say it is good for nothing: yet it may stop a gap. If a hound be not good to hunt, we say he is good for nothing, yet may he in the night give warning of a thief. But if a Fig-tree, a Professor be not good for fruit, he is indeed, good for nothing. The refuse of other things have their uses: sour Wine will make Vinegar, old Rags make Paper, Lees are for Dyers, Soil is good to fat the Land, Potsheards and broken tiles to mend high ways; all good for somewhat: yea, they offer to sel the combings of hairs; Ladies and Gentlewomen know whether they be good for any purpose or no. But the fruitless vine, the sauourlesse Salt, the lightlesse Lamp, the Figlesse Fig-tree, the graceless Christian, is good for nothing.

We all have our Stations in the Vineyard, to bring forth fruits, but what be those fruits? It was a smart Invention of him, that having placed the Emperor, and the Pope, reconciled, in their Maiestick Thrones, he brought the States of the world before them. First comes a Counselor of State, with this Motto, I Advise you two: then a Courtier I Flatter you three: then a Husbandman, I Feed you four, then a Merchant, I Coussen you five: then a Lawyer, I Rob you six: then a Soldier, I Fight for you seven: then a Physician, I Kill you eight: Lastly a Priest, I absolve you all nine: This was his Satire. But in the fear of God, as our Sovereign doth govern us in Truth and Peace; So let the Counselor advise, the Judge censure, the Husbandman labor, Merchant traffic, the Lawyer plead, the Soldier bear arms, the Divine preach; all bring forth the fruits of righteousness: that this Kingdom may flourish, and be an exemplary encouragement to our neighbors: that our Children may be blessed after us, our Enemies convinced, Aliens converted, Satan confounded, the Gospel honored, the Lord glorified, and our own souls eternally saved. Which grace, the happy fruit of the Gospel; and glory, the happy fruit of Grace; God the Father grant us all for his mercies sake, God the Son for his merits sake, God the Holy Ghost for his Names sake: to whom three Persons, and one most glorious God he rendered all honor and obedience, now and forever. Amen.

LONDON, Printed by William Iaggard, 1615.

TO THE HONORable Gentleman, Sir Charles Morrison, Knight Baronet.

Worthy Sir, I have been bold, upon better acquaintance with your virtues then with yourself, to send a short Treatise to your view. I know whose judgment it must pass, yet am fear-less: not in any arrogant stupidity of my own weakness; but in a confident presumption of your goodness; a weighty habit, not parallel but transcendent to your Greatness. Perhaps Nature hath taught you, that to be Generous is to be virtuous: but I am sure, wisdom hath perfected natural disposition in you; & given you not only an excellent theoretical discourse, but an actual reducing of those things into practice; which are better then you shall find here. Though you have happier Contemplations of your own, yet accept these, as the slender presents of a poor man given to the rich. Weak I confess it: for how should the child be strong, begot in the fathers weakness! It hath the more need of your Protection; & knows the better to express it self and the Author ever ready at Your Honorable command to do you service, Tho: Adams.

To the Reader.

REader, this Book stands at the mercy of thy capacity for thy censure. Perhaps thou wilt judge it done for oppositions sake; the Black Devil to the White: perhaps for imitation; perhaps for affectation. Thou mayst for me causes enough in thy imagination to produce it, yet miss the right. It was to show thyself, and all other perusers, the blackness of Sin; and among the rest, of Apostasy. Would you not behold Impiety in the true colors: you may for bear. If you would, look here, and detest it. If you will take out a good lesson, and hate to do it; neither you nor I shall have cause to repent our labors. Once we must give account, what we have heard, and seen, and done; when the pleasures of Sin, like old surfeits, shall give a bitter reluctancy in the stomach of the conscience; and we are going to God's cold earth. Learn we now to prevent the doing of that, which we shall one day be sorry to have done. There is no man living, but shall repent of his wickedness, either on earth, or in hell. Read and be instructed. If you find just faults here, I submit my weakness to your censure. In omnibus meis scriptis, non modo pium Lectorem, sed liberum correctorem desidero. But to those Censurers, Qui vel non intelligendo reprehendunt, vel reprehendendo non intelligent, I wish either a more sound understanding, or more sober affection.

Criminor, amplector; tibi sunt communia, lector.

But as he that commendeth himself, is not approved, but whom the Lord commendeth. So if the Lord approve, I pass not for man's judgment. If you snib me for writing so frequently, and not confining myself to the Pulpit; I answer, (besides that I will not neglect this to do that)

Quo liceat libris, non licet ire mihi.

My Books may be admitted, where I cannot come. If you say, there are books too many: I answer; restrain them to this quality, and Abundance cautela non nocet. Farewell, be satisfied, be blessed.

THO. ADAMS.

THE BLACK DEVIL OR The APOSTATE.

Math. cap. 12. ver. 43.

When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest, and findeth none.

44. Then he saith, I will return into my house, from whence I came out. And when he is come, he findeth it empty, swept, and garnished.

45. Then goeth he, and taketh with himself seven other spirits more wicked then himself; and they enter in, & dwell there. And the last state of that man is worse then the first. Even so shall it be also unto this wicked generation.

OVR Saviors manifold and manifest Miracles, which he wrought among and upon the Jews, were requited with a blasphemous interpretation; that they were done in the power of Beelzebub. Which having disproved by invincible arguments, he concludes against them in this Parable. When the unclean spirit &c. This is clearly manifest in the application. Even so shall it be also unto this wicked generation.

A double occasion gives us the hand of direction to this Speech. Either it hath a reference to the Man dispossessed of the dumb and blind Devil. ver. 22. Or intends a conviction of the contumelious blasphemies of the Jews. Perhaps it may be referred to the former, but certainly is directed to the latter. It may serve for both: so two gappes be stopped with one bush: two sores covered with one plaster.

1 It might serve for a charge to the cured, to prevent reciduation. He was dumb; behold he speaks: he was blind; behold he sees: he was possessed, behold he is enfranchised. He hath recovered his eyes, his tongue, his heart; he is rid of the Devil. Now he that is quit of so bad a Guest, shall septuple his own woes by his re-entertainment. Such a caution did the same phycisian give another of his Patients. John 5. Behold, thou art made whole: sin no more, least a worse thing come unto thee. It is well for thee, that the unclean spirit is gone, but it will be worse with thee then ever, if he gets in again.

2. He that did speak life, and to the life, doeth especially mean it to the Jews, with an indubitate appropriation. Cast your eyes upon the Text, and your minds upon the renegant Jews; and observe how diametrally they look one upon another; running together without alienation, till they come to the end.

1. The unclean spirit, the power of sin, was cast out of the Jews, by Moses law; and God had great stir about it. He was fain to speak early and late, and attend them all the day long, with outstretched hands. Till he appeals to censure. What could have been done more to my Vineyard?

2. At last he is out; and then like a discontented Guest, hindered of his old Lodging, and destitute of so warm a bed, he walks through dry places, revisites the Heathen. But finding them as strongly his own, as the infrangible chains of wickedness could make them; he disdains rest, like an Engrosser, in his own Lordship; so long as there are other purchases to be made abroad. Or perhaps the Ark of salvation is now brought to the Gentiles, and then the Dagon, Dragon of hell must needs be packing. A new King, the true King beginning his Rain in the Conscience, deposeth, deiecteth, eiecteth that usurping Tyrant. There is no remedy: out he must.

3. The Prince of the Air thus discovered, and discomfited by the Sun of Righteousness, breaking through the gross and foggy Clouds of Ignorance and Impiety, wherein the Gentile world was wrapped: What doth he? but re-salutes his former habitation. He liked the old seat well, and will venter a fall, but recover it.

4. Thether he flies; and loe, how fit he finds it for his entertain! The heart of the Jews is empty of Faith; swept with the besom of Hypocrisy, a iusticiary, imaginary, false-conceited righteousness; and garnished with a few broken traditions and ceremonies; suppellectile complements instead of substantial graces.

5. Glad of this, he recollects his forces: takes with him seven other spirits, a greater dominion of sin, then he was erst armed with all: more wicked then himself; as if he would make invincible provision, and prevention of any future dispossession.

6. He enters in with his crew; not purposing to be as a Guest, but a Tenant; not a Tenant, but a Land-Lord; not a Land-Lord, but a King, a Commander, a Tyrant: till at last he may presume of an indubitate right. As Usurpers that come to a Kingdom by a violent or litigious title, are at first so modest & dainty, that they sign not their Graunts, Edicts, and such public Acts in their own particular and singular names, but require the conscription, and evident consent of their Counsel. But once established by succession, and vnriual'd by opposition, they grow peremptorily confident in their own right and power, and in their most tyrannous acts dare sign, Teste meipso. So Satan at first erection of his Kingdom in the Jews, conscious of his unjust title, was content to admit the help of fond Ceremonies, Tales, Traditions, &c. to make for him against Christ, whose Kingdom he usurps. This he condescended to out of a mannerly couzenage, and for the more subtle insinuation into the Jewish hearts. But now established in his Throne and confirmed in his title, by their hard-hartednes, and willful obstinacy in rejecting their Messias; he is bold to sign all his oppositions to the Gospel with a Teste meipso.

7. Hereupon their latter end becomes worse then their beginning. A stronger delusion hath taken hold of them, and that in the just judgment of the wise Ordinator of all things. For this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: that all they might be damned, who be...eeued not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness. For if He that despised Moses law, died without mercy, under two or three Witnesses: then verse 29. Of howmuch sorer punishment shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot (not the Servant, but) the Son of God: & hath counted the blood (not of Bulls and Goats, but) of the Covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, (whereby he shall now be condemned) an unholy thing: and hath done despite to the Spirit (not of bondage, but) of grace. His beginning was far better, or at least less bad, then his ende shall be.

The Occasion was so material, that it hath led me further, then either my purpose or your patience would willingly have allowed me. What soever is written, is written either for our instruction, or destruction: to convert us, if we embrace it; to convince us, if we despise it. Let this consideration quicken your attention, enliven your meditation, encourage your obedience. You demand viu...m vocem: it is then a Living voice, when it is a voice of life to the believing hearers. Otherwise there is vox mortifera, a voice that brings death to disobeyers. The word that I have spoken, saith Christ, shall judge you in the last day.

The White Devil, the Hypocrite hath been formerly discovered, and the sky-colour'd veil of his dissimulation pulled off. I am to present to your view and detestation a sinner of a contrary color, swarthy rebellion, and besmeared Profanesse: an Apostate falling into the clutches of eight unclean spirits. Needs must he be fowl, that hath so many fowl devils in him. Mary Magdalene had but seven, and they were cast out: this hath gotten one more, to make his soul the blacker, and they keep in. If Hypocrisy there, were justly called the White Devil; Apostasy here may as justly be termed the Black Devil. In the former was a white skin of profession drawn over an ulcerous corps: here hyde and carcass, hand and heart, shadow and substance, seeming and being, outward profession and inward intention, are black, foul, detestable. Therefore we will call him the Apostate, or black Devil.

This Text dwelleth on two persons, Man and Satan! Alas! it goes ill, when Man and the Devil come so near together: weak man; and his infest, professed enemy. Wherein we will (metaphorically) compare Man to a Fort, and the Devil to a Captain.

1 Man to a Fort. Not that he is like stupid and dead walls, without sense, without science; of no ability, either to offend his adversary, or to defend himself: but a living Tower, that hath sense, reason, understanding, will, affections: which give him means to open a voluntary door to this Captayns entrance. For a seipso est quod peccator aperiat Satanae, a Deo, quod Deo. It is of God that a sinner opens his heart to God; of himself, that he opens to Satan.

2 The Devil to a Captain; a strong, impious, impetuous, imperious Captain; violēt in invasion, tyrannous in obsession: a rampant Lyon, that scorns either competition, or superiority.

The material circumstances concerning both Fort and Captain, hold and holder, place and person, may be generally reduced to these three.

The Conclusion and Application shut up all. 1. The Conclusion: The last state of that man is worse then the first. 2. The Application: Even so shall it be also unto this wicked generation. You see, I have ventured on a long journey; and have but a short time allowed me to go it. My observations in my travel shall be the shorter, and I hope not the less sound. So the brevity shall make some amends for the number.

I am to begin with the unclean spirits departure. When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man. It is well that he is gone, if he would never return. Valedicamus in adagio: Si sat procul, sat been. Let us speed him hence with the Proverb: Far enough, & good enough. Let not such a guest come, till he be sent for. But alas! he will never be far enough off: no not even now, whiles God is sowing the seed of Life, will this Enemy forbear to sow tares. He runs about the seats, like a Pick-purse; and if he sees a roving eye, he presents objects of Lust: if a drowsy head, he rocks him asleep, and gives him a nappe, just the length of the Sermon: if he spies a Covetous man, he transports his soul to his counting-house; and leaves nothing before the Preacher, but a mind-less trunke.

Well; gone he is out of this Man; and we must therein consider 2. things. 1. His unroosting. 2. His unresting. In his unroosting or departure, we have justly observable these 3 circumstances. 1. The Person. 2. The Manner 3. The Measure of his Going out.

The Person

Is described according to his Nature. Condition, He is by Nature a Spirit, by Condition or quality, unclean.

1. By Nature

He is a Spirit. I will not trouble you with the diverse acception of this word, Spirit. There is a Divine, Humane, Angelical, Diabolical Spirit: yet are not these all. Let everything that hath breath, praise the Lord: that is, that hath a Spirit. It is observed, that when this Article, The, is prefixed to Spirit; and no attribute subjoined, that may denominate or distinguish it; it is meant of the third Person in Trinity, the holy Ghost. Rom. 8. The Spirit helpeth our infirmities, &c. So Jerome notes on the fourth of Matthew. ver. 1. Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the Wilderness, to be tempted of the Devil. Here the adjunct gives sufficient distinction. As 1. Sam. 16. The Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from the Lord troubled him. This was an evil and unclean spirit.

This makes against the Sadducees & Atheists, that deny the subsistence of spirits; or imagine them to be only qualities of the mind: affirming, that good Angels are but good motions, and bad Angels nothing else but bad motions. They may as well call the wind but imaginarium quiddam, sickness but a fantasy, and death it self but a mere conceit. They shall find, that there are spirits created for vengeance, and in the day of their wrath, when God shall bid them strike, they will lay on sure strokes; essential and subsisting natures. Hell-fire is no fable; Devils are not nominals, but reals; not imaginary qualities, but afflicting spirits: here the tempters to sin, hereafter the tormenters for sin. Qui non credent, sentient. They that will not believe God's words, shall feel their wounds. The Devil hath a special Medicine for Atheism.

2. By Quality

He is Unclean; and that in regard of his

- Condition.
- Perdition.

Condition or property in himself: Perdition, which he doth work upon others; for he labors to infect man, that he may make him, both in wickedness, and wretchedness, like himself.

1. Unclean, in respect of his own Condition. The Devil was by creation good. God made him an Angel of light; he made himself an Angel of darkness. God saw everything that he had made: and behold, it was very good. If every parcel of the Creators workmanship was perfect; without denial those Angels which once stood before his face, and attended the hests of the Lord of hosts, were principally perfect. Therefore the devil, as he is a creature, is good: according to S. Augustine. Ipsius Diaboli natura, in quantum natura est, non est mala. The nature of the devil, insomuch as it is a nature, is not evil. But John. 8. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his owne. He derived his nature from God, but the deprivation of it from himself. He was good by generation, is evil by degeneration. In that he is Evil, or Devil, he may thank himselfe for it. A Spirit of God's, unclean of his own making. Quod spiritus, a Deo est: quod impurus, a seipso.

2. Unclean, by his operation and effects.

His labor & delight is to make man as unclean, as himself. He strives to make Judas his heart foul with covetousness, Absalom's with treason, Gehesis with bribes, Cain's with murder, Jereboam's with Idolatry, nay even David's with adultery. God is Purity: and Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. But a soul soyled and foyled with lust, drunkenness, swearing, hypocrisy, avarice, is an unclean habitacle for an unclean spirit: a fowl evil, for a fowl devil. Every sin is unclean; but there is one sin called uncleanness: as if it were more immediately derived from the Devil, and more naturally pleasing him. Heereby God is robbed of that he bought with so dear a price, & the member of Christis made the member of an Harlot. It is continually joined with fornication, adultery, whore-hunting. Ephes. 5. 3. 5. Colos. 3. 5. Saint Paul reasons against this sin, by an argument drawn ab absurdo; to couple that body to an Harlot, which should mystically be united to Christ. Not unlike that of the Poet:

Humano capiti ceruicem iungere equinam. And howsoever this debauched age, with a monstrous impudence, will call it either no sin, or peccadillo, a little sin; yet it hath that power and effect, to make men as like to the Devil, as an unclean body may be to an unclean spirit. Call it what you will, blanch it with apologies, candy it with natures delights, parget it with concealments; uncleanness is uncleanness still, and like the Devil. Unless (as in the Legend of Saint Anthony; that when his Host set him a Toade on the table, and told him, it was written in the Gospel, De omni quod tibi aponitur, comedes: Thou shalt eat of such things as are set before thee: he with the sign of the Cross made it a Capon ready roasted.) you can metamorphose Satan's poisons, Toads and Serpents, feculent and baneful sins, into nutrimentall virtues, wash the Black-mores skin white, and make leprosy fair and sound; the sin of uncleanness will make you like this unclean spirit.

Let all this teach us, not to hate the essence, but the works of the Devil. His nature, abstractively considered, is good; but as he is wicked, and a prouoker to wickedness, hate him. In regard of his excellent knowledge gathered by long observation, and comprehension of the seminary virtues, he is called Daemon. 2. For his envy, enmity, Satan. 3. For his command, Beelzebub. 4. For his power, the strong man. 5. Lastly, for his pollution, an unclean spirit. Continually Devil, because he strives continually to Do evil. As these prauities show themselves in him by domination, and denomination, hate him. So do all: so say all. An obstinate sinner returns an honest reproof, with I defy the Devil: I will shielde myself from Satan as well as my admonisher: the foul fiend shall have no power over me. Yet still deafes himself to the cry of his own Conscience, that he may live the more licentiously. But alas! Satan is not such a babe to be outfaced with a word of defiance. He can bear a few invectiues, so he may be sure of the soul: like an Usurer, that can endure to be raild on, so his money comes trolling in. Let the fox have his prey, though with curses. But it is a lamentable course to defy a Lyon, yet run into his clutches. Be not unclean, and be secure.

The manner. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 .

Is gone: which is rather a form of speaking with us, then a form of his going out. Yet howsoever a Spirit or man leaves the place of his former residence, whether willingly or on compulsion, when he is out, it is said of him, he is gone. Here then is offered to our consideration, the manner of the Devils departure.

Satan goes not out of an inhabited heart willingly. Where they had local and substantial possession, you read in the Gospel that Christ was said to cast them out. And among other places, most pregnantly in the 11. of Luke ver. 14. to the justification and clearing of this phrase, Jesus was casting out a Devil, and it was dumb. And when the Devil was gone out, the dumb spoke. He was gone out, he was cast out: the one expounds the other. So that this gone out, is rather a passive than an active speech: he never went out with his good will: he frets to be dislodg'd of his chamber. That Legion of devils in one poor Gadaren. Mark. 5. held it no less than a torment, to be cast out of man. I adjure thee by God, that thou torment me not. And art thou comethether to torment us before the time? When the King of Heaven, and contrroller of Hell, cast the dumb and deaf spirit out of the Child of a believing Father, Mark. 9. The spirit cried, and rent himsore, and came out of him, and he was as one dead; insomuch that many said, He is dead. As when a writ of eiection comes to a bad Tenant, that he sees he must out, he fires the house about his ears.

So long as he may foment our corrupt affections, and give us complacency and self-satisfaction in his vicious obedience; till he make us not subjects but slaves, and rather Res than Personas, as the Lawyers speak; he gives to everyone a Dormi-secure. But when we begin to suspect his right, to try his title, and to go to law to cast him out, and to bustle against him: the sculking fox is turned to an Ox, and puts forth his goring horns of tyrranny.

When thou beginnest to sue him, 1. He will plead prescription. Meum est, meum erit, quia meum fuit. It is mine, it shall be mine, because it hath been mine. Custom in sin is a shrewd argument against repentance. Turpius cijcitur, quám non admittitur hospes. A Guest is with better manners not admitted, then ejected. 2. If that will not serve, he goes to it in plain force. He doth not say as Jacob to Laban, These twenty years have I served thee, &c. but these many years have I commanded thee; and dost thou now shake off my service? degenerate, rebel, and refuse allegiance? As Rabshakeh in the Embassage of Sennacherib to Hezekiah. Now on whom doest thou trust, that thou rebellest against me? Who shall deliver thee out of my hands? 3. If we answer with that threatened King; The Lord of Hosts shall deliver us; at whose Name the Sennacherib of infernal Babylon doth tremble: so that he must depart; he will not go out without terror; but tear and afflict the heart, in the parting and desertion of our old delights.

Hence we may infer, that there is a power superior to Satan, that must expel him, or he will not depart. The uncircumcised Philistine insults, till David come. The strong man armed keeps his Pallace, and his goods in peace: Luke. 11. until the stronger man, even the strength of Israel comes against him. It is he that is able to pluck out Satan by head and shoulders. This is he alone, that can help either the corporally or spiritually possessed.

The Kings of England and France (as if it were a mark and impression of divine power in them) do cure a disease by touch. And I have read it reported (though but reported) that the Kings of Spain help demoniacke & possessed persons. These are but coroporall cures. The Pope challengeth a faculty to cure spiritual impotencies, leprosies, & possessions. Alas! it is not in his power, though in his pride, and super arrogant glory. Indeed when our anguished souls have bathed themselves in the river of Jordan, (An Angel of mercy having stir'd the waters) in our penitential tears, in our Saviors blood, on the Cross, in the Sacrament: it is all, if the Pope (and yet not he more then the meanest Minister, did he not monopolize men's sins by reseruations) may pronounce, who is dispossessed of the power of Satan, who not. But to cast out the Devils pregnant, and regnant tyranny, whether substantial or spiritual; to rescue a miserable man out of the enchanted walls of Babylon; to set the foot of a weak Christian on the neck of that Leviathan, to give him insultation and triumph over Asps, Lions Dragons; is the singular and incommunicable work of God.

Christ throws Satan out per ictum per dictum, by his Word, by his Sword: the power and operation of his Spirit in the Preaching of the Gospel. He breaks his head, He breaks his neck with a Scriptum est. Hence, The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds: casting down every high thing, that exalteth it self against the knowledge of God, &c. Were his Hold stronger then the seven-fold walls of Babylon, and his exaltation as high, as ever the imagination of Nebuchadnezzar mounted his own worth: this shall batter and bring him down. The Word casts him out, the Sacraments hold him out: that drives him forth, and these keep him from coming in.

The Measure.

It must necessarily and punctually be examined how this unclean spirit may be said to be cast out. This two ways, in regard of the two sorts of persons out of whom he is cast. He is so thrown out of the Godly, as never to return in again: so out of the Wicked, that indeed he remains in still. Consider we then, in what measure the Devil departeth out of this Apostate. Let us divide this into 6. circumstances, and the Quotient will give us the sum of our desires.

1. Satan is so far gone out, as the mind is enlightened. This the Apostle grants incident to an Apostate. Hebr. 6. That he may be enlightened, taste of the heavenly gift, be made partaker of the Holy Ghost, taste of the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, yet fall away, never to be renewed again by repentance. This is that Divines call Historica fides; a floating notion in the brain, a general transient apprehension of God's revealed truth: which shows it self in a dexterity of wit, and volubility of speech: a fire in the brain, not able to warm the heart. It hath power to inform their judgments, not to reform their lives.

Now so far as this illumination, swimming, nimble, and discursiue knowledge is let in; so far is Satan said to be cast out. There is, saith Solomon, Scientia contristans: and saith Paul, Scientia conflans. There is a knowledge that maketh sorrowful, that maketh proud. God in all knowledge regards not so much the quantity, as the substance. There may be more light in a Reprobate, then in a sanctified soul, but not so good light. I speak not to vilify knowledge, but to rectify it. Otherwise, you know, the greater punishment belongs to him, that knows Go as will, and doth it not. Oftentimes the more shallow in knowledge, the more hungerly in wickedness: when a quick and sharp wit without grace, is like a head-strong Horse without a bridle. Neither is this Knowledge in a Reprobate gratia vana, sed euanescens: not a vain, but a vanishing grace.

They walk in the light. John. 12. They rejoice of the light. John. 5. Yet is not the light in them. They have not the Sun of righteousness risen in their hearts. Mala. 4. For this Sun can never set. Bona non been nouit.

2. Satan is so far gone out of the wicked, as they have admitted some probable beginnings of conversion. This is but a flash of hypocrisy, no true heat of zeal. When the most flinty heart shall be hit against the steel of God's judgments, it will strike fire: but those sparkles are too weak to kindle the true warmth of grace; the fuel is so green, the affections so vicious, whereon it works. Peccaui was David's voice after his sinful Arithmetic: Judas his voice after his abhorred treason. Vox eadem, non poenitentia: talis sonus, non sinus. The same voice or sound, not the same heart or penitence. Esau wept having lost the blessing: Peter wept having denied his Mayster: nether wept without bitterness. Similes lachrymae, non animae. The like tears, not the like Consciencs. Iron and steel heat in the fire, are pliable to the fashioning hammer: let them be cold, and they resume their former hardness. The heat of a sudden judgment, striking (like thunder) the companion of thy side; a secret wipe of the Sword of the Spirit, dividing the marrow and the bones, in an effectual Sermon; a stitch in the flesh like the messenger of death; may a little thaw and melt the hard metal of an ungodly heart. But let the fire cease, and give him leave to be cold again, and he becomes harder then ever before. Nil facile quamuis non tueare, perit.

3. Satan is so far said to be gone out, as he lies hidden, like mud and slime under a thick snow. The Devil may be within the grate, though he thrust not out his apparent horns. Or say, he be walked abroad, yet he returns home at night: and in the mean time, like a mistrustful Churl, locks the door after him; sparrs up the heart with security, that his treasure be not stolen. Thus as a snail, he gathers up himself into his shell and house of the heart, when he fears discovery, and puts not forth his horns. Sometimes he plays not in the Sun actually, but borroughes deep in the affections. The fox keeps his den close, when he knows that God's hunts-men be abroad to seek him. He knows that oftentimes armis pollentior astus, his fraud is beyond his force: that he is pestilentior art quàm marte: that he poisons more mortally melle quàm felle: that he may do as much hurt in a mask of white, as in his own black habit: that he may spoil more Lambes in a Sheep-skin, then appearing as a wolf. He is content to yield to a show of holiness, that he may work the more mischief. It is sufficient for him if he may, though (not turbare yet turpare) not disquiet, yet dishonest the soul of man. Now so far as this touch of religion enters, is this unclean Spirit said gone out.

4. Satan may be said cast out, in the opinion of the party, in whom he resides. Everyone presumes, there is no Devil within him. The proud hath no Lucifer, the Covetous no Mammon, the Idolater no Melchom, the Adulterer no unclean spirit. Let me catechise thee. I did promise in my Baptism, to for sake the Devil. What? doest thou stay there? Nay: and all his works. Alas! be not so supine and careless. Vbi opera, ibi operans. Where the works are, there is the work-master. Thou art asleep Sampson, whiles these Philistines are upon thee, are within thee. The ague is not gone, though the fit be over. Whilst thou slūbreast in thy waftage, the vessel goes on still. Satan is not out, though thou conceitest him gone: and so as it is in our phrase, he is gone in conceit.

5. This unclean spirit may seem gone in the opinion of the Church. Sometime the Devil is gone from a man in his own judgment, not the worlds: sometimes in the worlds judgment, not his own. The Church had a good estimation of Judas, as conformable to the outward duties of obedience, and the rather because Christ trusted him with the stewardship: but God and his own conscience knew him a thief. The Devil will not always be hunted by the sent, or followed by the print of his steps. The world shall not ever have him in palpable view and full cry; by reason of his notorious and gross impieties. If he can but now and then shoot in an instigation to some wickedness, it serves his turn. He doth not every day sally out of his fort, and charge his enemies in the face; but watcheth opportunity, when his excursions may do most mischief. The Devil may be within, though he stand not at door to be seen.

6. Lastly Satan is said so far to be gone out, as there is an interruption in the sovereignty of sin for a season. The floods of iniquity are not so violent, as if they were kept within the dam by shutting down the sluice. The Dromedary, the ungodly, runs not so madly, whiles that infernal rider forbears their sides with his spurr.

As he is said to come in, when he was in before: because there cometh in a more forcible & stronger illusion of Satan, thē the heart erst suffered. Lu. 22. It is said, that Satā entered into Judas before the Passover: yet we cannot think that God's Spirit was in him before: but only now a greater power of Satan got in; that like a ripe tumour would be no longer hid within the thin skin of hypocrisy. Corruption now gets eruption, and the rancorous ulcer of wickedness bursts forth.

So of the contrary, Satan is said to go out, when he still holds in; but like a bird in the net, that hangs by one claw. Nero is still in Rome, though he remittes taxations, and forbears massacres for a season. The love of drunkenness may be in the heart, though there be a day when the Tavern is avoided. Be the Adulterer asleep, he is an adulterer still. What master so cruel, but sometimes lets his slave rest? Certa quiescendi tempor a fata dabunt. The Devil is not continually impelling or compelling his servants to public and notorious iniquities. Sometimes he supends his tyranny, and sits close in the heart, banketting on the lusts which he finds there, and sends not abroad for new cates. The tempestuous wind eftsoone lies still: the most robustious and malignant force of wickedness bates of the usual violence, and breaks not forth into the same show of malice without some intermission. So far as this suspense, remission, and interruption of sin extends, so far is Satan said to be gone out.

You see the Measure. Only give me leave, to set you down two short rules, as two reflecting perspectiues; wherein you may behold, whether this unclean spirit be truly, or hypocritically cast out of your hearts.

1. So far is Satan cast out, as sin is cast out. The tenure, whereby Satan holds any Lorshippe in the heart, is sin: He that would overthrow his title, must labor an eiection of wickedness. Piety in the heart, purity in the life, are true testimonies of the Devils exile. Satan fights against us with 2. weapons. 1. That he found in us. 2. That he brings upon us. That he found in us, is flesh and blood: that he brings upon us, is death. By this latter he could not have hurt us, except we had given him the former: and so reached him a weapon to pierce our own hearts. In what measure sin rules or is ruled: Satan is held in or ejected.

2. The discontinuing of some sins, and retaining others gives no comfort or argument of Satan's departure. If he be truly gone, there comes in his place a perfect detestation, and resolute opposition against all sin. It is in vain to cast out Satan by avoiding avarice, when thou letst him in by a wasteful prodigality: to admit him by hypocrisy, whom thou throwest out by profaneness. This is to put the Devil out at the porch, and let him in again at the postern. But one Rimmon is too much for Naaman, one Delilah for Sampson, one Herodias for Herod: one exorbitant delight reserved, resolved, persisted in, is enough for Satan, too much for the sinner.

I say not, leave all sin, but love no sin. How impossible is the former, the latter how necessary! It is the content and complacency in sin, that holds in the Devil. What is it for a rich man to brag he is no thief? or a beggar to clear himself from bribery? or for an old man to forbear the Stews? or for a credulous Papist, that thinks to deserve heaven by works, to add a mite to an Hospital? but while he pours a little ointment on Christ's feet by charity, by opinion of merit he throws the box at his head. What is it to abstain from those sins, whereunto thou art not tempted? But repentance renounceth all dead works: and obedience strives to walk in all God's ways. In omnibus sine exceptione, etsi non in omnibus cum impletione. None of all must be excepted, though none of all fulfilled. If the Devil be truly cast out, there is a full resoution in the heart against all manner of sin.

Thus much of his unroosting or throwing out: for his unresting, perplexednes, and discontent, observe in it four circumstances. His Travel, Trial, Trouble, Euent. 1. For his travel, he walks. 2. For his trial, in dry places. 3. For his trouble, he seeks rest. 4. For the event, he findeth none.

Travel. He walks.

The Devil is no idle spirit, but a walker; a vagrant, runagate walker, like Cain, that cannot rest in a place. I have heard of Travelers, that have seen many parts of the world; but never any perpetual Peripateticke, or universal walker, but Satan: who hath travel'd all coasts & corners of the earth; and would of heaven too, if he might be admitted. He is not like S. Georges statue, ever on horseback, and never riding: but as if he were Knight Martial of the whole world, he is ever walking. His motion is circular, and his unwearied stepes know no rest: he hath a large and endless circuit. His walk is a siege, that goes about the Fort, to find the weakest place, and easiest for battery. He walketh about, as a roaring Lyon, seeking whom he may devour. As in other things he is a Serpent; so especially in his walks; for his whole course is serpentine. All his walks are after, against, about man. His walks are the Circumference, and Man the Center. The motive cause, and main intention of his journey, is to win man.

A strange Pilgrim, that makes not an ende of his journey, till there be an end of Time. He hath been in heaven, in Paradise, in the earth, in the sea, and in hell, & yet hath not done walking. Some there are, that will go frō Rome to England, to make Proselytes: but the Devil will go from one end of the world to the other, and walk from Pole to Pole, til he hath put a girdle about the loins of the earth; to make a man the child of hell, like himself. And in all his travel, like fame, and a mutinous rebel, vires acquirit eundo, he still enlargeth his own Dition. It was a true answer that the father of lies made to Truth it self. Job. 2. I come from going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.

He walks any way, to spill any man, by any means. He is at hand to Saul, he meets Judas in the face, and he backs Peter. He walks like an errant Post between the Adulterer and his Harlot: between the proud Gallant and his Parasite: between the ambitions & his Intelligencer: between the Usurer and the Broker: between the Thief and receiver: between the greedy Advocate and the contentious Client: between the sacrilegious Patron & the Simoniacal Priest: betwixt the Inns and the Hall: betwixt the Exchange and the warehouse.

Where can a man bestow himself, that the devil cannot walk to him? Art thou in thy private Chamber? There can Satan find thee; as he did Eve in Paradise, Christ in the Desert. If in any place; he hath there most power and opportunity. Two are better then one. For if either fall, or be preuailed against, the other will lift up, or rescue him. But Va soli. Woe to him that is alone: for if he miscarry, there is none to help him. The melancholy man, that loves to be sequestered from society, and lives an Hermitical, solitary life, is most exposed to Satan's assaults. Company is good; especially if the companions be good: as being a means to hinder Satan from so violent working upon our affections. The Philosophers were wont to say: He that lived alone, was either a God, or a Devil. Yet solitariness is not so evil, as evil company. It is better to bustle with one Devil in a close chamber, then with many Devils in a riotous Tavern.

Art thou in the Court? Satan walks thither too: and will fit Rehoboam with flatterers, Ahab with liar, Pharaoh with Sorcerers, Belshazzar with cups, Solomon with Concubines. Art thou in the Market? He is ready with oaths, with cozenages. Nay; art thou in the Temple? Thither he dares travel too: and pervert the eyes with shows, the ears with sounds, the thoughts with fancies, the senses with sleep. Wheresoever, whensoever, howsoever thou art busied, he walks to thee with his temptations: and like a nimble, voluble shop-keeper interrupts with a what lack you? He hath a ship ready for Jonah, a witch for Saul, a wedge for Achan, a rope for Judas. A booty stands ready for the thief, a pawn for the broker, a morgage for the merchant, a monopolie for the Courtier, an harlot for the adulterer.

As he walks through the streets, there he throws a short measure, a false balance into a Trades-man's shoppe. He steppes into a drinking house, and kindles a quarrel. He shoulders to the bar, and pops in a forged evidence, a counterfeit seal. He dares enter the schools, and commence schisms and contentions: nay, climb up into the pulp it, and broach sects and divisions. He travels no ground, but like a stinking fog, or a dying oppressor, he leaves an ill sent behind him. This is he that makes men serve God percunctorily, perfunctorily: to go slowly to it, to sit idly at it.

Whither, where can we walk, and not behold Satan's walks: and see the prints of his feet as plain, as if his steps were set in snow, or like the Priests of Bel, in ashes: that we may say, the devil hath been here? He that shall travel the lower Provinces, and in some parts thereof see the Cities ruined, habitations spoiled, forts battered, Temples demolished, fields untilled: will say, Sure the enemy hath been here. He that with observing and weeping eyes beholds, not our Temples, but the piety in them dissolved; not our Cities, but the Citizens perverted; not our houses, but their inhabitāts defaced with iniquity; not our fields, but our hearts lying untilled: our Lawyers turned truth defrauders, our Citizens userers, our Landlords oppressors, our Gentlemen rioters, our Patrons Simonists; would surely say, this is Satan's walk: the devil hath been here. Let this fasten on our souls 2. instructions.

1 To keep out of Satan's walks. Though he visiteth all places, and his inquisition be stricter then the Spanish. (for that catches none but Protestants, the Papists scape) yet he frequenteth some more then other. Perhaps he may find thee in the Temple, as he took Judas at the Communion: but carry a faithful and upright heart, and then though he walks thither to thee, he shall walk to hell without thee. When thou art for company, choose the best: if they mourn, mourn with them: if they be merry, refuse not mirth with them; so it be honest, ad societatem, not ad satietatem. When thou art alone, read, pray, meditate; that either God may talk to thee, or thou to God. So with Scipio, thou shalt be least alone, when most alone. The guard of Angels shall be about thee; and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost within thee: and let Satan wa...ke whither he will, thou art (like Enoch) walking with God.

2 Since Satan is so walking and busy a spirit, let this teach us not to be idle. Indeed, be not too busy in other men's matters: nor too lazy in thine own. Shall we know, that the enemy walks, waits, watches to destroy us; and shall we not look to our selves? He sows tares in the field of our hearts, whilst we sleep: let us awake, and pluck them up, lest they choke the good seed of our graces. It is not allowed us to sit still: we must be walking. Eye to thy seeing, ear to thy hearing, hand to thy working, foot to thy walking. Up, andeate, Elias, arise O Christian, thou hast sit too long, having so great a journey to go. The Servants in the Law were commanded to eat the Passover with their shoes on: and Saint Paul chargeth the Sons in the Gospel (perhaps not without some allusion to that) to stand with their feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace. When a man is standing, it is said, he will be walking. Astronomers have numbered the miles twixt earth & Heaven, as if they had climbed up thither by Ladders, to be 900. thousand. But without doubt Christianity is a great journey: & he that considers the way and distance betwixt mortality and immortality, corruption and glory, must needs conclude, it is high time to be walking. Vita brevis, ars longa. Life is short, and this skill not soon learnt. We cannot begin this journey too early: we have sitten too long; it is full time, we were traveling.... Otherwise a walking Devil shall condemn a slothful Man.

Trial. Through dry places.

The discontented Devil cast out of man, seeks about for a new lodging; and finds all places dry, he esteems every place, but in Mans heart, •...irksome and unpleasant, as a dry, barren, and heathy Wilderness. Now, as when a man hath long lived in a fertile Valley, abounding: with delightful fruits, & necessary comforts; the grounds standing thick with corn, & a pleasant river running along, to glad his heart with a welcome moisture: it cannot be other, then a diseasing, displeasing change, to be banished into a mountanous desert, where the scorching Sun burns up the grass, and withers the fruit; or the vnhindred force of the wind finds a bleak object to work upon; where the veins of blood, the springs of water rise not, run not, to madefie the earth, and cherish her plants. Such is Satan's case and cause of perplexity. The wicked heart was his delighted Orchard, where the fruits of disobedience, oaths, lies, blasphemies, oppressions, coussenages, contentions; drunken, proud, covetous actions and habits made him fat. For as God hath his Vineyard, the Devil hath his Orchard. The fruits that God expects and delights to gather, are the good grapes of obedience. Satan's desire is wicked and wretched effects. These he either found ready, or made ready in the heart of man. Whence displaced, sedibus, aedibus, he is mad for anger, and accounts all places dry.

He finds no rest in dry places. Perhaps the Devil loves the low Countries, and wet ground. In a moderate, temperate, dry brain, he finds no footing: but in the soul of the swilling drunkard, as a foggy and fenny ground, he obtains some residence. Abstemious moderation, and temperate satisfaction of nature is too dry a place, for so hot a spirit as hell fire hath made him, to quench his malicious thirst: but in those that are filled with wine, & strong drinks, suauiiter, molliter acquiescit. When the Son of God threw a Legion out of one poor man, they beg earnestly to be allowed entrance into the Swine. Of all creatures void of reason, it is observed of those, that they will swill till they swel, drink till they burst. If Circe's Cup (or if you will, the Vintners, the Victuallers) hath transformed man into a drunken hog, this is a moist place that Satan affects. If the head be well tippled, he gets in; and makes the eyes wanton, the tongue blasphemous, the hands ready to stab, the throat an open Sepulcher to devour.

I deny not, but Paul may meet his friend at the Market of Appium, and drink with his friends at the three Taverns. Honest necessities must be relieved. And for this purpose were Taverns first erected; for the necessary refection of travelers & strangers. Neither laws divine nor national condemn their use, but their abuse. Yet Ecclus. 26. A victualler shall not be freed from sin. You will say it is Apocryphal; and I fear, a man of that profession is Apocryphal too; who will not sell riot for money; and wink at those, that fill their brains, to empty their purses. Wine is a good creature, to cheare man's heart: and Paul allows it to Timothy for his stomachs sake. But those that drink wine, not to help the stomach, but to surfeit it; not for wholesome and medicinal respects, but with inebriatiue delight, or on some victorious intent, to overthrow the company: these are moist places fit for Satan.

Trouble. Seeking rest.

But is he in any hope to find it? Doth he not carry his hell about him? Can he get out of the curse and malediction of God? There is no rest to him passively, actively. 1. Passively; the unappeased anger of Almighty God persecutes him, & denies him rest. 2. Actively; he gives himself no rest in tempting and tormenting man. God persecutes him: he persecutes man. Thus through a voluntary and enforced motion, et volenter, et violenter, he seeks rest, but he finds none.

The Devils malice to mankind is so great, that he cannot rest without their ruin. He begun with the first Parents, and will not end but with the end of the world; til he hath tempted, or at least attempted the last man, that ever their generations shall produce. Hereon it is noted, that the Angels sinning were never restored, because they offended without temptation, merely of malice, being created pure and excellent spirits. But man fell from God, and was again redeemed to God, because he was seduced of another. Quanto fragilior in natura, tanto facilior ad veniam. The weaker in nature, and so more apt to fall; the more easy to be lifted up again. But the Devil fell so fully, so foully, being sole actor in his own fault, sole author in his own fall, that he is never to be restored: so never obtains rest. Yet he imagines to himself a kind of rest, when he is quietly possessed of man's heart. As a malicious man acquiescit vindictis: so when the Devil hath wrought man's woe, and brought him to hell, it is a rest unto him. But his rest is man's unrest: his melody our malady. His blustering tempest is not laid, till he hath split the vessel our Body; and drowned the Passenger, our Soul.

His first and chief aim is to destroy the soul and to deface that more excellent part of man, that is nearer to the character and divine impression of God's image. If the soul be coming, he is sure the body will follow. 2. If he cannot reach the spirit, then have at the flesh. Let Joseph look for the stocks, Peter for the layle, David for exile, Job for botches. 3. If the restraining power of heaven interdicts him the body, then he sets upon the estate: like Joseph's mistress, that missing the person, catcheth the garment: or the savage Bear, which prevented of the blood and bones, falls a tearing the clothes, that fell from them. The birds of the air, fishes of the sea, beasts of the earth shall pay for it. Every thing, which belongs to man's health and comfort, shall feel his tyranny. If Job's person be forbidden the extent of his malice, yet he will have a fling at his Oxen, Asses, Sheep, Camels. When that Legion must leave the Possessed, they beg (not to be sent away out of the Country) but to be admitted into the Herde. The Inhabitants are freed, then woe to their swine. Rather hogs then nothing. He will play at small game, rather then sit out. As that bloody Tyrant banished from extending his cruelty to men, must be still a killing, though (it be) but worms. He seeketh rest.

Euent or success. But he findeth none.

So soon as ever this unclean spirit is thrown out of man, that he begins to serve God, Satan rageth worse then ever: and till he can overthrow the beginnings of grace in us with a second perversion, he finds no rest. We cannot so soon please God, but we displease the Devil. Whiles Paul was a Pharisee, no man in greater credit: but become a professor and Preacher of the Gospel, none more exposed to dangers and contumelies. If we (do but) look toward Jerusalem; as Christ, because his face was as though he would go to Jerusalem, might not be received of the Samaritans: or if we purpose to heaven, as Pau... to Thessalonica, Satan will offer to hinder our pass. The Devil desires to winnow Peter, not Judas. The more faithful servants of God we be, the more doth Satan bruise us with the flail, or grate us with the fan.

The thief doth not break into an empty cottage, but into some furnishd house, or full Granar; where the fatness of the booty is a fitness to his desires. This unclean. spirit finds no rest in an Atheist, Usurer, Drunkard, Swearer, &c. He knows, a canker hath over-run their consciences already: & that they are as sure, as temptation can make them. No Prince makes war with his own tractable subjects.

Gloria pugnantes vincere major erit.

Holofernes tells Judith: Fear not in thine heart: for I never hurt any, that was willing to serve Nebuchadonozer the King of all the earth. So the devil; I never use to harm any, that are content to serve me, the King of all the world. What need he tempt them that tempt themselves? The fowler shoots at birds that be wild, not at Doves and yard-fowls, tame, and in his own keeping.

Many stood by the fire, Act. 28. yet the Viper leaps upon none of their hands, but Paul's. This viper of •...ll labors to sting the best men: reprobates he hath poisoned enough already. The dog barks at strangers, not at domestical servants, or daily-visitant friends. This mad Cerberus bites not those that have given him a soppe, their affections and souls: but flies at the throat of such only, as deny him the fealty of love and obedience, and abandon his regiment. Whiles the Israe ites were in Egypt and Pharaoh had some service of thē, he doth but oppress them with burdens, and such slavish impositions: but when they are departed from his territories, & have extricated themselves from his bondage, he comes after them with fire & sword: and nothing but their blood and death can appease him. Swear, swagger, covet, cozen, dissemble, defraud, give the devil homage and allegiance; and his tyranny will be content with the supportation of these burdens: but rebel, revolt, renounce his sovereignty, and then nothing but fire and fury will flash from him: and, except in thy ruin, he finds no rest.

Thus much for the unclean spirits unroosting and unresting; his relinquishing the Hold, and his demeanour after it; and therein generally for his Egresse. His Regresse is the next act of this Tragedy; his striving for a re-entry in the Fort he hath lost. Which consists, 1. in his Inte•...sien, what he purposeth. 2. In the Invention, what he findeth. His Access and Success is presented in these Scenes His Intention or project dwells upon, 1. a •...resolution. 2. a Revolution. 3. a Description of his Scare. 4. Affection to the same house, whence he came out.

1. His Resolution. I will.

V•...lo, est vox aut pertinacis, aut potent is; non petent is. I will, is the voice, (not of a beggar, but) either of one powerful or peremptory. Good in the Almighty, saucy in a subordinate power; without some reservation, or exceptiō made to the supreme providence. Will you Satan! It is too bold, and presumptuous a voice. Ask leave, Satan: for you are chain'd to your clog, and cannot stir, but limitata potestate. Behemoth is tied in a teddar; and that triumphant Lamb holds the roaring Lyon in an infrangible cord: and says to him, as to the sea; Here will I stay the insultation of thy proud waves. Will you know, what makes the devil thus bold? A double confidence, 1. in his own strength. 2. in man's weakness.

1. In his own strength. Therefore he says not, Conabor reuerti, but reuertar; quasi nihil obstiterit. As if he had that power, which was prophesied of Cyrus: that gates of brass and bars of Iron should be broken open before him. Or as it is feigned of the Pope in the year of Jubilee, that he comes to the gate of S. Peters church in Rome, and there having knocked with his silver hammer, the gate presently falls down before him. Perhaps he means to Hieroglyphic unto us, what wondrous engines silver tools are in Rome, and what strange feats they work; till coelumsit vaenale Deus{que}. And not only to present the person of Peter, heavens Porter as they call him, and to manifest the liberty of Purgatory-ghosts, given by virtue of Papal Indulgences.

This is the Devils strength, whereof he is so confident; and it is helped by his Subtlety. His subtlety shows it self in his temptations. Which to discover is one special intention in all Sermons. Mine shall but cut of a lap of his garment. He tempts either

1. Invisibly; by stirring secret motions, and internal provocations in the heart. So he wrought upon Judas by covetousness, upon Simon Magus by ambition, upon Esau by profaneness. Every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed. This is that operative possession, whereby the Prince of the power of the air, now...worketh in the children of disobedience. Innumerable are these invisible subtleties.

2. Or visibly; by external apparitions & shapes, presented to the bodies eye, either essential, or delusive. This he doth 3. ways.

1. By taking to himself an airy body, fashioning it to what form he pleaseth. As the good Angels did by God's dispensation, according to the opinion of Divines, when they did cate meat with Abraham. Thus he appeared to Saul in the shape of Samuel, 1 Sam. 28. The King said to the witch, Whatforme is he of? and she said, An old man cometh up, and he is covered with a Mantle. Which was a feigned proportion, that by God's permission, Satan had taken to delude Saul. So it is said, that he often appeared in the days of Ignorance.

2. By entering into the corps of some dead body, making it speak and walk as he pleaseth: which is not denied by Divines, but the Devil by God's sufferance may do; but with two proviso's. 1. This must be the body of a reprobate, that he assumes: for the godly sleep in peace. Isaiah. 57. God gives him a Nolito tangeremeos, saepeviuos, semper moreuos. Touch not mine, either living, or dead. 2. If it be a reprobate corps, yet he can appear in it no longer, then naturally he can preserve it from corrupting. But that Satan can keep a carcass from putrifying, further then nature permits, it is generally and truly denied. And even these black shadows, (blessed be God) in this Sun-shine of the Gospel, are abolished.

3. By entering into the body of some living thing. So the Devils in the possessed, spake audibly, and gave a loud acknowledgement of Christ. So Satan entered the body of a living Serpent, when he tempted and seduced the woman. But of all shapes, which he assumeth, he hath best liking to the likeness of man; and delights in a human resemblance. Of all habits this best pleaseth him: in a kind of affecting pride, thereby to be as like to God, as possibly he may. This is Satan's first presumption; a strongly-opinion'd trust in his own strength.

2. In man's weakness; who, as he is never strong of himself, so at sometimes, and in some places weaker then other. And therefore like wise Captains in Towns of garrison, he had need to fortify that place with most men and munition, with best spiritual arms and armor, where either the enemies Ordinance, his temptations have made a breach; or we are naturally weakest. Our frailty gives the Devil a presumptuous confidence of intrusion. Hence he saith (not fortasse, but proul dubio) I will return. He thinks we are too weak, to turn him away without his errand, when he comes with a picture of lust, a bag of gold, a staff of office and promotion. When he saith to the avarice, I will make thee rich: to the tyrant, I will make thee dreadful: to the wanton, I will make thee merry: to the wasteful, I will make thee beloved: to the idle, I will give thee ease. Not only Achan, Gehesi, Saul, and Judas have been to weak for these encounters: but even Noah, Lot, David, Solomon, and Peter have bowed at these tempests.

This he could not do, but by working on our ready and inclinable affections. As a cunning artificer, that can produce greater effects, upon matter conveniently disposed thereunto, then nature could have done alone. When the Devil and our corrupt flesh meet, they ingender a generation of sins. As his Sons the Magicians of Egypt could make living creatures, by applying and suggesting passive things to active, which would never have met but by their mediation. Or as the Statuary can make an Image, which the timber and axe could never have effected without him. So the wicked would never produce such tetricall and horrible effects, but by the Devils adding his heat to theirs, and by a prodigious coupling of his instigation & their lusts.

Thus weak he thinks us, and not seldom finds us. The natural man goes forth to fight with a mighty Giant, in a monomachy or duel: the Second he brings with him is the world: the natural man's Second is the Flesh. He prepares to fight with a professed enemy, and calls out for his assistant, a private and close foe. He is weakly backed, that hath a traitor for his guard. To arm his presumption with policy, he seriously observes, which way the current of every man's humor runneth: knowing by long experience, what will most easily draw men to sin.

As physitians, when they would know the state of the sick, and the nature of their disease, first enquire Decubitum, the time of the Patients lying down, and yielding himself to his layre. But because this observation holds not alike in all men, but some walk longer before they betake themselves to their bed, then others, therefore they more especially reckon ab actionibus laesis, that is, when their appetite, digestion, and other faculties faild in the performance of their offices. And lastly. finding the course of Nature in the diseased, which way it worketh; accordingly minister their physic, as that calls, Come and help me.

Such a course takes this malignant Physician for the death of the soul; observing first when a delight in any sin cast us down: and then, when the faculties of our souls forbore their functions, in hungering after righteousness, or digesting the word of truth: and lastly, when he hath found, which way our natural inclination is given, and the grain of our affections runs, he labors to help us forward into the practical custom of that wickedness. As a cunning Fisher, using that bait, which he knows most congruent to the nature and appetite of that fish he would strike. Thus he urgeth the Cholericke to anger: the Melancholy to distrust, despair, and to lay violent hands on themselves: the Sanguine to immoderate mirth: the Phlegmatic to drowsines in Christian offices; and to the deferring of obedience: assuring him, that it is time enough to repent, betwixt that and doomesday.

Since he is so bold with us, what should we do, but be as bold with him? I am. 4. Resist the Devil, and he will fly from you. He is a Lyon to those that fly him, a fly to those that stand him. Audaciùs insistit à tergo, quàm resistit in faciem. Take in thy hand the Sword of the Spirit: fling a Scriptum est at his head. Take up some of David's stones out of God's holy brook, his holy book, and slay that daring Philistine in the forehead. This is the weapon, wherewith our Savior Christ encountered and beat him. Let us follow the same Captain with the same arms. Let us not fear. Malus miles, qui Impertorem gemens sequitur. He is a cowardly souldior, that follows his General groaning. Thou goost not alone to this combat: Christ went before thee, goes with thee. How canst thou not march courageously, cum Dux sit socius; when thy Captain is thy companion! He hath taught us this war both by precept and practice. Blessed be the Lord our strength, which teacheth our hands to war, and our fingers to fight. Cuius munimur auxilio, mouemur exemplo. We are guided, we are guarded; by his presidency, by his precedency. So Augustine. Ideo tenta... est Christus, •...e vincere...ur à tent•...ore Christianus. Christ endured temptation, that temptation might not overcome Christians. He says no other to thee, then Ahimelech to his souldiors: What you have seen medoe, make hast, and do as I have done. This is our strong comfort. For in that h•... himself hath suffered and was tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted.

2. His Revolution. Return.

The Devil being never permitted to pry into God's secret book of Predestination: and so not knowing, who is elect, who reprobate; hopes still to return into any house, whence he hath been ejected. And accordingly, in many, too many he prevails. If Satan be totally thrown out, in vain he expects returning; especially to get any dominion in the lost fort. But we read, that a man may know the truth, and yet forsake it: be enlightened, nay taste of the powers of the world to come: nay be said (in some respects) sanctified, yet crucify Christ again. To these will Satan return, with as strong a power as ever.

Now he returns, 1. either by vnright receiving of God's blessings; like good wine put into a polluted or broken vessel. 2. or by irreverent use of them; imagining themselves rather Dominos thē Dispersatores. 3. or by defiling them with hypocrisy: so true gold is alchemied over with a false sophistication. 4. or by mixing them with lusts, and much-made of sins: and this permision is like good meat put into a vicious stomach: where there is a confusion of pure food and crudities, to the destruction, not conservation of health.

Hence infer. Though Satan be gone, yet expect his $\langle \emptyset \rangle$. He hath his Termes and Returnes, as well as vacations. And by this thou may i•... judge, whether this unclean spirit be truly or hypocritically cast out. If he doth not return, he was never gone. If he strive not to come in, he is in already. A secure heart may suppose him expelled, that still lies close in the house. If by perpetual assaults he strives for entrance, then be sure, he is tuely gone out. Even his oppositions shall afford thee comfort; his war give thee peace. And if he be gone, keep him at staves end: seeing thou art rid of so ill a Tenant, let him never come in again.

3. The Description of his seat. Into my house.

Satan calls this reprobates heart, his House: and so it is. 1. not by creation: for so every man is God's house. 1. Cor. 3. Know ye not that ye are the Temple of God, and that the spirit of God dwelleth in you? 2. not by adaption. Cant. 5. Open to me, my Sister, &c. saith Christ. And Revel. 3. 1st and at the door and knock, &c. But upon our rejection of GOD, and God's desertion of us, the heart becomes satans house. For it is either a seat of sanctity, or a Cage of unclean birds: a chapel for Jesus, or a den for devils: for where Christ is not by his pure spirit, Satan is by his foul spirit.

So the malicious heart is a house for the spirit of e...uy: the th...en for the spirit of ebriety: the proud for the spirit of pride: the vnehaste for the spirit of uncleanness: the vsi...r for the spirit of Covetousness. They may flatter themselves; Est Deus in... , agitante calescimus (ϕ) : that God is in them: but the inmate and residentiary of their hearts is that unclean vulture. They may be rich in worldly wealth, and have sumptuous houses, and fair parlours, like Eglon, but themselves are foul parlours for Satan. How lamentable is it, to see Owls and •...ctes, Iim and Zijm, impiety, impenitency, and rebellion, dwelling in that mansion, which the Lord of Hosts built for himself.

Heu domus antiqua, quàm dispari dominar is domino! Oh ancient house, how ill art thou governed where Covetousness is the Hall; for there is no room for charity in her old place. Oppression the Kitchen, where the lives and livings of poor men are dressed for rich men's tables: Pride is the Parlor, which is hung with ostentation and self-flattery. Wantonness is the Chamber, where concupiscence sits and hatcheth an innumerable brood of lusts. Malice is the Chimny, which ever smoaks, and sometimes flames out revenge. Security is the Bed, whereon Satan lull's himself: and Impenitency keeps the gate; that no admission be given to admonition; nor anything let in to disquiet the Devils house. Oh, the mercy of God! Shall we let in our enemies, and keep out our friends? Must Satan be advanced into God's throne? Shall pride shut the door against the Lord of all mercy and comfort; who yet hath promised to dwell in the humble and contrite soul? For shame let us cast Satan out, & keep him out. Though he flatter with the voice of the Hiena at the door, and give blandiloquous proffers; yet Ianuaf...llaci non sit apert... vir... .

4. His affection to the same place. Whence I came out.

Experienced delight sharpens desire; whereas unknown things are not cared for. This unclean spirit remembers the softness and warmth of his old lodging; and therefore no marvel, if he conets to repossesse it. Because

1. He finds an easier and softer residence there, then in hell. He had rather be in any place, then his own place: rather in hogs, then in the deep. There he is tormented himself: here he doth vex and tempt others.

2. Man is made after the Image of God: to whom since he finds, that his malice cannot extend, he labors to deface his Picture. Hence man bears the blows, which are meant at God.

3. Man is by Christ advanced to that place, whence God disthroniz'd him. Now he cannot endure, that a human creature should ascend to that heaven, whither himself (once an Angel) may not be admitted.

4. He is exasperated against man, by that curse inflicted on him for seducing man; that the seed of the Woman should break his head: This irreconcilable enmity...nrageth and maddes him. CHRIST he could not quell, have at Christians.

5. Lastly, the Devil is proud still; and, though he be cast down, is not humbled: though low, not lowly. He takes a pride in his kingdom, though it be but of darkness: and lones to have many subjects to do him homage. Since he cannot be King in heaven, he would command in hell. To enlarge his dominion, he would, like Absalom, steal away the hearts of men, from king, David of Israel, the Liege-lord of heaven and earth.

Hence he affects his old house: there he is sure of good cheare and welcome: a fire of lust to warm him: a bed of uncleanness to lodge him, and a table furnished with all manner of impieties to feast him. Better here, then walking in dry places; where wickedness is too barren to yield fruits for his diet; and oppositions too violent to give him rest.

You perceive now his Resolution, Revolution, Description of his old seat, an affection to it: and in all these his Intention. His Invention follows, and the successful answerableness of all things to his desire. He comes, and he finds preparation for his entertainment: consisting in Clearenes, Cleanness, Trimness. Clearenes, it is empty. Cleannes, or handsomnesse: it is swept. Trimnes, or adornation: it is garnished.

1 The Devil shall not want room when he comes: there shall be no in-mate in the house to molest him; but such as he either left behind, or sent before, vicious lusts. Which are indeed parts of himself; and therefore cannot be said to be sodalitium. They are shadows and resemblances of himself: which though he finds there, he reposes the house no less empty.

2 It is not enough to be empty, and capable to receive him: but it must be cleanly, and plausible to receive him; swept. There must be a clear riddance of whatsoever may discontent him.

3 Nay all this preparation is too slender, as if some great Prince were expected, the house must be garnished: as it were hung with Tapestry & Arras. There must not only be emptiness & handsomnesse, but neatness. So then here is the provision of the house to receive him. 1. It is not troublesome, for it is empty. 2. It is not sl...tish, for it is swept. 3. It is not incurious, for it is garnished.

There is capacity, conueniency, curiosity. Which three circumstances of provision we may thus expound. 1. We will refer clearness or emptiness, to the absence of faith, and good works. 2. Cleanness or handsomnesse to an overly repentance. 3. Trimness and curiosity to hypocrisy.

1. Vacuitie. It is Empty.

True faith is never alone. It is in the very act of Justification, sola, but not solitaria. Good works as inseparable attendants, or rather effects, accompany it. Where these are, there is no emptiness. But in this Apostate or black Devil, there is neither the Mistress nor the Maides, Faith nor good works: therefore the room of his heart is empty, and capable of receiving the unclean spirit. Perhaps in this vacancy & absence of the power of Satan, there might be an abstinence from gross impieties, but there was no hearty alacrity to the troublesome works of godliness, therefore he is justly said to be empty. We know, that the forbearance of monstrous <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> and world-noted wickedness is not enough to justify before God, or to acquit us from eternal malediction: the Tree is doom'd to the fire, that yields not good fruits, although it yield no evil. Even infructuous barrenness brought Christ's curse on the fig-tree. Sour grapes are not only displeasing to God, but no grapes: and condemnations flood reacheth further then to drown obstinacy; for it fetcheth in also Infertility. God is departed; and you know, that Sede vacante there will be no paucity of intruders. What house stands long Tenant-less? No marvel then, if an empty vessel be never exalted to honor.

Hence we may infer, that this re-ingresse of Satan can never befall the Regenerate; for it is impossible to find their heart empty. Faith, temperance, patience, zeal, charity, hope, humility, are perpetual Residentaries in the Temple of their Souls; and if any one be tempted abroad, and allured to a short discontinuance, yet the other keep infallible possession; and with vnconquer'd strength keep out Satan. If the rest should be driven into a corner, yet Faith would defend the door against all assaults.

Indeed there may be such a storm and tempest of an afflicted conscience, that the graces of the Spirit, (as obscured in a Cloud) may not be sensibly perceived: and in regard of our own feeling there may be an absence, or vacuity. But we must not take an abatement for an emptiness; a secession for a destitution. It is certain, those that have the invisible mark of the Spirit, shall have the visible mark of an honest life: & totally they cannot loose grace, nor a second time fall away: for then they could not be renewed again by repentance; nor ever be restored, except Christ should die again. Heb. 10. For if we sin willfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more Sacrifice for sins: but a certain fearful looking for of judgment, and fiery indignation which shall devour the adversaries. Paul had some hope of the incestuous person, and therefore did not wholly cut him off, and accurse him; but separate and suspend him for a time: that by the delivering of him unto Satan (for a season) for the destruction of the flesh, his spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. Thus Christ, being once truly in, will never out: the faithful cannot be empty. There is then a defect of Faith in this black Apostate, that makes room for the deui...l.

2. Cleanliness. It is swept.

This is the effect of an overly and superficial repentance: like a slight besom, it sweepes away the dust and cobwebs, and such lighter stuff, but the filth and dirt is caked and baked on. Sins of less delight to the flesh, and temptations of weaker force, are brushed away; but the main affection to some old impiety hath the root in the heart vndigged up. The devil is content, the conscience should be swept, so long as it is but only swept.

Sin is congealed, concorporated, baked on; and must be pared and digged away by greater violence then sweeping. Swept Satan yields it, so not pared. Impiety is habituated by custom, hardened by impenitency, concorporated to him by his affection to it: and shall he think, that a formal repentance, like a soft besom, can sweep all clean? Can a few drops and sprinklings of water purge off the inveterate foulness and corruption of the flesh? There is required much rensing to whiten a defiled soul.

How perverse is their course and thought, that imagine, they may repent more in an hour, then they sin in an age! As if, having in many years kindled a thousand fires, thou wouldst think to put them out all with one tear: whereas indeed, many tears can scarce put out one. Then boldly, stain the cloth a whole vintage, and at last let one washing serve for all. Alas! man is quickly made miserable, but not with such speed happy. How easily, how suddenly got man his damnation: it was but eating an apple; soon done. Esau quickly hunted away his blessing, but could not with many tears recover it. David is not long in falling, his rising is tedious. With much pains and contention doth a man climb up some high Tower; but loosing his hold, he comes down apace. It is no easy thing to stand, it is easy to slip, to stumble, to fall. The thick and foggy air of this sinful world, as the smoke and stenchful mists over some populous Cities, can soon fully the soul: the continual tramlings of sin brings mire and dirte upon the conscience: these corruptions are not so presently rid away, as taken.

Clip thy hairs short, yet they will grow again, because the roots are in the scull. A tree, that is but pruin'd, shredde, topp'd, or lopp'd, will sprout again: root it up, and it shall grow no more. What is it to clip the outward appearances, and to loppe the superfluous boughs of our sins, when the root is cherished in the heart? What to have a foul and miry house swept? The Pharisee in his blown prayers, cozening ythes, frequent alms, did but sweep the house, and remove the cobwebs of outward impieties; but the dirt of hypocrisy was baked on; the roots of pride and covetousness grew still untouched.

It is not then a transient sorrow, nor a formal compunction, (which may wound and prick the heart, like a needle; but wants the thread of Faith to sow and join it to God) that can make the house clean. It is but swept, and so ready for Satan's reentry, and repossession.

3. Trimness or curiosity. Garnished.

This ornature and fit furnishing of the House for Satan's entertainment, is done by Hypocrisy: when the rotten Cabin of a foul heart is hung with gay hangings: when putidum et putridum cadauer, a rotten and stinking carcass is hid in a Sepulcher painted over with vermillion: when a stenchful dunghill is covered with white snow; here is a garnishing for the Devil. He that can pray at church, and cozen at home; give hi•... debtor fair words, and eat him through with usury; which is to break his head with precious balms: hath bitterness in his heart; whilst his tongue distils myrthe, and drops honey: that man hath a house garnished for this unclean spirit.

Satan will allow his Hosts to pretend sanctity, so they intend villainy: aliud proponere, aliud supponere: to have the cup utterly rensed and cleansed; so it be within full of extortion and rancor: to guild over a poisonous pill: to pray in the Church, so they prey on the Church: this is a trimmed house, a chamber garnished for the Devil. This Satan doth in an ambitious imitation of the Lord, who would have his house garnished, as the Passover-chamber was trimmed.

God would have the beams of his house Cedar, and the galleries of firre; like King Solomon's Chariot; the pillars thereof are silver, the bottom thereof gold, the covering of it, of purple; the midst thereof being paved with love for the daughters of Ierusalē. He would have sanctification for the furniture; For this is the will of God, even your holiness; and for ornaments, the graces of his Spirit. Thither he comes, and there he sups. Revel. 3. Behold, I stand at the door, and knock: if any man open unto me, I will come in to him, and sup with him, and he shall sup with me.

The Devil accordingly desires his house garnished; but the furniture is Sin, and the ornaments opera tenebrarum, the works of darkness: And then, if you will, let this mansion be outwardly pargetted, and whited over. Make they show of having the Holy Ghost on Sundays, so they retain the foul devil all the week. These are they, that make Religion a masquery: lie, swear, cheat, oppress, scorn, riot, revile, revel; yet appear at Church on the Sabbath; as if they came for a Passport to do more mischief. The strength of their profession is but a gristle; which is indeed neither bone nor flesh; neither true religion, nor no religion. Like the speckled innocence of the Papists, in their ostentate charity, unclean chastity, luxurious fasts, and meritorious treasons, in butchering Princes, and transferring kingdoms.

These hypocrites, being erst so themselves abused and deluded of Satan, persuade others to villainy, by arguments of virtue. For an hypocrite will do nothing without a color, and with a color anything. If thou be'st a good fellow, pledge this health: if a true gentleman, put not up this disgrace without revenge: if any charity in thee, maintain this Parasite. Whereas it is the part of a good man to be sober; of a generous spirit to pass by an offense, said the wisest King; and of a charitable man to succor the poor, not to maintain the dissolute.

Yet all this mad troop of enormities must march under the Colours of religion. As those Rebels in the North, in our late Queens days, of blessed Memory: who, when all their projects and stratagems appeared manifestly to the overthrow of their gracious Princesse, yet concluded their Proclamation with, God save Queen Elizabeth.

These are Satan's white boys, or rather black boys; which he kills, like the Ape her young, with kindness; and damnes with indulgence. He gives them a vaster Commission, then I have read that Philip le Longe gave the Iacobin. in Paris; which Charter had a reasonable extension; A portailorum, ad portam Inferni, inclusivē. This is the Passport, which this great Captain gives Hypocrites; From their own gates to the gates of hell, inclusively.

This is that hypocritical and half-turning to God; when the outward action is suppressed, and the hidden corruption lies still foster'd in the heart. The apparance is masked, the affection not mortified. And though, like an Eunuch, he doth not beget palpable and manifest enormities; yet hath a lust, and itch, and concupiscence to them, and forbears not in the dark, safe from the eyes of the world, to practice them.

A man, that doth outwardly refuse adherence to the world, for a colorable embracing of the word; yet inwardly, and in a hearty affection parts not with his former turpitudes, fulfils that on himself, which S. Basil once said of a Senator: that seemed to renounce the world, yet retained part of his illgotten riches, as Ananias kept back part of the price of his Lands. Thou hast spoild a Se...our, and hast not made a Monk. So I may say of this man, Thou hast mar'd a worldling, and hast not made a Christian.

Now the Devil is content, thou shouldst remit some of thy gross impieties, so thou retain others. He cares not to be cast out by Idolatry, so he be kept in by Atheism. He is well pleased, that Judas should become an Apostle of Christ, so he be withal a Traitor. Let Abimelech give hospitality to Abraham, so he purpose to abuse his wife. Let Herod hear John the Baptist proach, perhaps he will cut off his head, for preaching against Herodias.

The Devil is loath to be dislodged of ignorance, yet is content that error succeed in place. He is vex'd that truth should appear to a man, yet if worldlines keep fast hold of the affections, this is a cable rope to pull him in again. If he loose the Sconce of the understanding, yet give him the Citadel of the affections. Any unmortified, habituated, affected sin, is a sufficient stirrup to mount him into his old saddle. Either let the soul stoop to fulfill the bodies base desires: or let the body employ all his members, faculties, functions, to satisfy the souls lusts, and he is pleased.

The infernal Tyrant deals with men herein, as the Egyptian Pharaoh dealt with the Israelites. Moses hath a Commission and command from God, to take with him the children of Israel, and to go three days journey in the Wilderness, to celebrate a Feast to the Lord. Pharaoh is very loath to loose the profit, which by the servitude of Israel did arise to him; he will not suffer them. But when renewed plagues prove that there is no remedy, and a perpetual vicissitude of judgments enforce it; observe how he would compound it.

1. Exod. 8. First, Go ye, s...crifice to your God in this land. Nay saith Moses: It is not meet so to do; for we shall sacrifice the abominations of the Egyptians to the Lord our God. Loe, shall we sacrifice the abominations of the Egyptians before their eyes, and will they not stone us? That were a shame, and insufferable offense to them, to immolate beasts among them that worship beasts.

2. Go ye, saith Pharaoh, if there be no remedy, even into the Wilderness, and sacrifice to your God: but go not far. Nay, saith Moses, we must go three days journey. The limits and confines of the wilderness will not serve our turns; as if our Sacrifice should not smell of Egypt, we must go so far as our travel can reach in three days.

3. Go ye, saith Pharaoh, and so far as now you desire, and your feet can measure in three days; but who must go? Moses saith our sons and daughters, flocks and herds: for we must hold a feast to the Lord. Not so, your little ones shall not go, quoth Pharaoh. Go ye that are the men, and serve the Lord, for that was your desire: and they were driven from his presence. But Moses requires that all may go; old and young, sons and daughters.

4. Pharaoh, after the devouring locusts, and palpable darkness, calls again for Moses and Aaron. Go ye yourselves, and let your little ones go also: only let your flocks and your herds be stay'd. Nay, saith Moses, we must have burnt offerings and sacrifices for the Lord our God. Our cattle shall also go with us: there shall not a hoof be left behind: for thereof must we take to serve the Lord our God.

Did Pharaoh regard their cattle above their little ones? or their children beyond themselves? No: but he deals by conditions and limitations, as loath to part with all at once. Therefore rather their cattle, then nothing. For he knew, they had covetous minds; and when in the wilderness they wanted provision, and were pinched with famine, they would return back again for their cattle. Every yielding concession, that came from him, was by force of the rack, he grants nothing, but on the compulsion of a judgment.

So this spiritual and hellish Pharaoh hath had a soul long in his Egypt; and hath found him beneficial and helpful to his kingdom of darkness in many services. The word preached comes, like Moses, to call him out of this bondage. Satan is afraid to be put out of Commons, frantic at the menace of expulsion: he will not give ground til he be forced, nor depart except plagued. But when he perceives no evasion, or remedy against God's invasion, he falls to indenting with niggardly grants and allowances.

1. Sacrifice here in this land: put on a mantle of religion over the old body. Be inwardly an Egyptian still, black and wicked, though an external sacrificer. Let thy life be statu quo; shift not ground. Answer thou with Moses, No. I must change place, travel a new way: from Egypt toward Canaan; from the region of darkness, to the regiment of life.

2. Go then, saith the Devil, but not far; keep within my whistle: that when I beckon my hand with a bag in it, or give you the call of vanity, you may hear and return. No, Satan: I must go far off; three days journey from Egypt. I must not stay near Sodom, nor in any of the Plain, lest I be destroyed. It is no repentance, that puts not on a contrary habit. Pride must be turned to humility, Covetise to charity, Dissimulation to honesty, &c.

3. Well then, saith Satan, go ye the men, but leave the children behind you: let me have your youth and strength, and when you are old talk of sacrifice & of religion. This is the Devils dispensation, Youth must be born with. To dance, to dice, to drink, to ruffle, scuffle, wear fleeces of vanity on their heads, and to leave no place without some vicious testimony of their presence, non est vitium adolescenti, is no fault in a young man. So the King of Babylon took not the men, but the children of the Jews, to teach them the learning of Chaldea. Answer; It is good to begin at the gates of our life to serve God; and from our birth to be Nazarites unto the Lord. Lest if the frame of our lives be built on a lascivious, and riotous foundation of long practice'd wantonness, Our bones be full of the sin of our youth, and it lies down with us in the dust: and when our bodies arise from the earth, our sins also rise with them to judgment. No, Satan; youth and age, all the degrees of our life shall be devoted to the service of God.

4. Yet saith Pharaoh, leave your cattle; saith the Devil, leave your affections behind you. I must be content to let you come to church, hear, read, join in prayers; yet do not quite forsake me. Leave me but a pawn, your affections, a secret liking to your former iniquities. No, Satan; God must be served with all the heart, with all the soul, &c. we will not leave so much as a desire to any sin, we will not leave a hoof behind us. Indeed Satan willingly would not content himself with the bounds, but aims at the whole Inheritance: he is not satisfied with the borders, but besiegeth the arch-city. Let us keep him out of all, if we can: but since we must sin, let us hold him occupied in some out-house, but be sure to keep him out of the bed-chamber, from ruling in the heart.

You have here Satan's egress, and regress; how he forsakes his Hold, how he forceth & strives for a re-entry. Let the same patience and attention sit with you, whiles you sit to hear his Ingress; his fortifying of the Hold being taken, and provision against future dispossession. This is manifested by his, 1. Associates. 2. Assault. For the former, he multiplieth his troupes, and increaseth his forces: who are described 1. By their nature, spirits. 2. By their number, seven. 3. By the measure of their malice, more wicked then the former.

1. Their Nature. Spirits.

And so both more capable of entrance, & more powerful of retention: the easier to get in, and the harder to get out. We see what kind of possession the Devil hath in this black Apostate, a spiritual and internal power. By which strong working and ruling in the hearts of the children of disobedience, he hath gotten high titles, as the Prince, the King, the God of the world. Not that Satan is any such thing of himself, but only through the weakness of the ungodly, who admit him for a Lord of mis-rule in their hearts. Christ is the true and only Lord of heaven and earth: the Devil is the Prince of this world, but merely by imitation, the greatest part of the world being either his open or secret followers.

They are Spirits, full of tyranny, full of malice. Their temptations in this life testify the one; and their torments in the next life (or rather death) shall declare the other. Here is thy misery, oh Apostate; illos dum spiritus occupat artus; whiles thy own spirit doth move thy joints, and other spirits persecute thy spirit, which is forever and ever, thou shalt have no release of bondage, no decease, no nor decrease of anguish.

2. Their Number. Seven.

A certain number is put for an uncertain: by seven spirits is intended a monstrous number of capital sins. This expresseth a forcible seducing of Satan: before one spirit, now seven more. Mary Magdalene had once in her seven Devils; this Apostate hath gotten eight.

It doth so provoke and distemper Satan to be cast out, that he meaneth and menaceth a fiercer assault; and rampires his recovered Fortress with a septuple guard: that the security of his defense may give defiance to all oppositions. He doth so fill the heart, as he filled the heart of Ananias. Act. 5. that there is no room for the least drop of grace. Now he that could not rid himself of one foul spirit, what will he do to encounter seven with the former? The combat is but tollerably equal, whē one to one; but ne Hercules contraduos, two is ods though against Hercules: how then shall this weak man shift or deal with eight? If I might a little allegorize. The Papists make but seven deadly sins. I am sure that Hypocrisy is none of them in their account. Hypocrisy might be in this Apostate before; for he was Garnished; and now perhaps those other seven are crept in to it: and so there are 8. in all. But indeed, as every sin is deadly, though out of their numeration and register: so by the addition of this number seven, is signified an abundance of iniquities.

3. The measure of their malice. More wicked.

They are called more wicked, because they make the possessed more wicked. This is spoken of the Devil, who is always pessimus, the worst; in some degree of comparison: not so much secundùm naturam propriam, but secundùm operationem in alijs: not so much in regard of his own nature, as in respect of the effects which he works in man. That it shall go worse with this black Devils person, the conclusion will show: here consider, that his sins are made more wicked. One and the same sin (even respecting the Identity of it) may be worse in a quadruple regard.

1. Ration perpetrantis. In respect of the Committer. Jonah's sleep was worse then the Mariners. Judas his conspiracy worse then the Jews. Wickedness in a Christian worse then in an Infidel.

2. Ration loci. In regard of the place. So wrangling in a church is worse then in a tauern. Theeury in the Temple more wicked thē thievery in the market. Amos. 2. They lay themselves down upon clotheslayde to pledge, by every Altar: and they drink the wine of the condemned in the house of their God. which was more horrible, then the same wickedness done in another place. This appeared by Christ's actual punishing that offense, oven with those hands, that we never else read gave any blows. For Sacrilege is the worst of all thefts.

3. Ration temporis. In respect of the time. For to play when thou shouldst pray; to swear when thou shouldst sing; when thou shouldst bless, to curse; and to be drunk in a Tavern, when thou oughtest to serve God in the Temple, is worse then the same offense at other times. Those Vintners and Victuallers are grievously guilty, that do in prayer time at once open their own door, and a door to irreligion and contempt of God's holy worship.

4. Ration naturae, in quam peccatur. In regard of that nature, against whom the sin is committed. If a Traitor condemned for some notorious conspiracy against his Prince, shall receive at those maligned hands a gracious pardon; and yet renew his treason with a second attempt: this latter facte, though the same in nature, (for all is but treason) is more wicked in measure, by reason of the Conspirators unthankfulness for his Sovereigns goodness. He ill requites God's mercy for delivering him from one foul Devil, that opens a willing door to the entry of seven worse. The more familiar acquaintance we have had with the blessings of God, the greater condemnation abides us for ingratitude. If the sin may be thus made more wicked, why not the person that commits it? Seven new spirits more wicked have made him more wicked then the first left him. Less had been his woe, if that one unclean Spirit had kept possession alone, then upon his privation, to have the position of seven worse.

Three inferences from hence must not pass away vnobserved.

1. That there is difference of sins, sinners, & consequently of punishments. The first was said to be an unclean spirit, yet are the latter seven worse. By the witness of Christ we have it already. Mat. 5. and by his Judgment shall find it hereafter, that an angry affection is liable to Judgment: a provoking gesture to the punishment of a Council: but railing invectives are worthy of hell-fire. Chorazin & Bethsaida shall speed worse then Tyre and Sidon, and yet these were already in hell. The servant that knows his Masters will, and doth it not, shall be beaten with many stripes. Simple nescience hath an easier judgment, then sinful knowledge. If Barbaria wring her hands, that she hath known so little; Christendom shall rend her heart, that she hath known so much to so little purpose.

Parity of sins is an idle dream: a Stoick and Ioni...an imagination. For though the wages of all sin be everlasting death; yet some sins shall feel the torments of that death more violent and terrifying, then others. I have other-where shown, that Judas his villainy inbetraying his Master, was more horrible, then if a Barabbas, a notorious butcherer had done the deed. So our Savior insinuated to Pilate. He that delivered me unto thee, hath the greatersinne. That Babylonian Tyrant committed a more heinous offense, in taking the holy things out of so holy a place, God's consecrated vessels out of God's Temple; then if he had stolen more precious ones out of a private place. Do you not think that a Cot-purse playing the thief at a Sermon, is more worthy of hanging, then a robber that stands in the highway!

This David instanceth, Psal. 1, 1. Blessed is he that hath not walked in the counsel of the ungodly, nor stood in the way of sinners, nor sate in the chair of the Scornor. Walking is bad enough, but it is worse to stand then to walk, and to sit then to stand in the ways of wickedness. Though idle words be an unclean spirit, yet actual disobedience is a fouler Devil. A Christian usurer is worse then a Turkish. An Indian Idolater to Gold is not so damnable as a Spanish. All reprobates shall find hell-fire hot enough; but this Black Devil so much the hotter, as he was once purged of his unclean spirit.

2. God doth severely revenge himself upon Ingratitude for his graces: & squares out his judgment according to the proportion of the blessing conferred & abused. He that would not be thankful to God for the expulsion of one unclean spirit, shall in a just quittance be pestered with seven more, and more wicked. If Christ be so kind to Judas, as to minister the Sacrament to him, and he so unkind to Christ, as to lay it upon a foul stomach, a polluted heart, the Devil shall enter with it.

There is a nescio vos given to those that have eaten and drunk in the presence of Christ, and have heardhim teach in their streets; (it is all one) that have feasted at the Communion-table, and heard Christ in their Pulpits. Even our reading, hearing, praying, when they are done of custom more then of conscience, shall be but a means of Satan's introduction. The word of God, like the dew of heaven, never falls on the earth of our hearts, but it makes either herbs or weeds shoot up quicker and thicker on them. For the earth which drinketh in the rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth hearbesmeete for them, by whom it is dressed, receiveth blessing from God. But that which beareth thorns & briars, is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing, whose end is to be burned.

If they were condemned, Rom. 1. and given over to a reprobate sense, that had •...o other glass to see the Deity in, but nature: for Seculum: peculum, the world is a glass: what shall become of those that have had the book of the Gospel, yet are stomacksicke at Manna, and beat away the hand of mercy reached fo...th unto them: what, but a triple reprobate sense; and here, a septuple possession of Satan?

Thus God in justice (for contempt of his mercy) admits a stronger delusion of the Devil: not to make them twofold more the children of hell. Math. 23, 15. as Proselytes; but seven fold as Devils. That their bewitched and infatuated souls shall do service to him that murders them: as Ahaz did sacrifice to the God's of Damascus that smote him. 2 Chron. 28. As our treacherous and fugitive Seminaries that adore the Babylonish Beast, who profusely carowseth up their blood that serve him: and whiles he builds up the Tower of his universal Monarchy, to overlook and command the Christian world, he sets them to ciment and mortar the walls with their own bloods.

Worse then the Indians, in some of their blind and Idolatrous sacrifices; offering not for a Ne noceat, but for an vt noceat; crouching not for a blessing, but a curse: and buying with great expense the malediction of God and men. God threatens Israel, that for the multitude of their rebellions, he will septuple their punishments. Levite. 26: And if ye will not yet for all this hearken unto me, I will punishyou seven times more for your sins. And ver. 21 If ye walk contrary, and will not hearken unto me, I will bring seauē times moe plagues upon you, according to your sins. So frequently in the first and second chap. of the Prophecy of Amos. For three transgressions, and for four; which are seven, which are many, which are innumerable, I will not turn away your punishment, saith the Lord. According to their sins, by weight and measure, proportion and number, shall be their sorrows. As they have swallowed up the poor, and devoured the people of God, like bread, impoverished the common-wealth, undone the Church; and all this under color of long prayers, and of a fiery-hot devotion; so they shall receive greater damnation. This is Babylon's final recompense. Revel. 18. Reward her even as she rewardedyou, and double unto her double according to her works: in the cup which she hath filled, fill to her double.

3. As seven worse spirits are the reward to him, that makes much of one bad and unclean: So are seven better spirits bestowed on him, that useth one good well. One Talent well employed, shall gain ten: and the more we have, the more will God delight to load us. God is as kind to those, that traffic his graces to his glory, as he is severe against those that throw his pearls to swine. And as this Apostates reciduation is rewarded by the accession of seven more wicked Spirits: so our sanctified and confirmed hearts shall be honored with those seven most pure spirits. Revel. 1. which are before the throne of God. These seven spirits are taken either for the seven gifts of God's spirit; prefigured by the seven eyes in one Stone. Zach. 3. and seauenlamps in one Candlestick. Zach. 4. Which are by some gathered from Isaiah 11. 2. And the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom, & of understanding, the spirit of counsel and of might, the spirit of knowledge, and of the fear of the Lord. The first is the Spirit of Piety, the second is the Spirit of Wisdom, the third is the Spirit of Understanding, the fourth is the Spirit of Counsel, the fifth is the Spirit of Might, the sixth is the Spirit of Knowledge, the seventh is the Spirit of the fear of the Lord. Or by putting a certain number for an uncertain, all the gifts and graces of God's Spirit are here intended; Seven being a number of perfection, and signifying in the Scriptures, Fullness.

God doth so requite his own blessings, that where he finds thankfulness for his goodness, he opens his hands wider: and where drops of grace take well, he will rain whole showers of mercy. It is his delight to reward his own favors, & crown his own blessings: as if he would give, because he had given. Thus a greater measure of godliness shall possess us; a greater measure of wickedness, this Apostate, then either in either kind formerly was had. When we receive grace of God, we also receive grace to employ that grace: so that if we thrive not in the growth of godliness, we may causefully call our sanctity into question. As he à malo adpeius from evil to worse, descends gradually to hell: so must we by joining virtue to faith, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance,&c. as per scansum, climbing by degrees, get up into heaven.

I have described the Associates; now for the Assault. Wherein briefly observe, 1. their Invasion. 2. their Inhabitation. 3. their Cohabitation.

1. Their Invasion. They enter.

Alas! what should hinder them: when a savage Troupe, appointed at all hands, armed with malice and mischief cap ape, assaults a poor weak Fort, that hath nothing but bare walls, and naked gates, (and those set wide open) to defend it self? If Lot were in Sodom, if (but) Faith stood in the Turret of the conscience, there might be some beating back of their forces: but there is no reluctance, where there is no enemy. S. Paul describes the Christians Armor. Ephe. 6. Stand, having your loins girt about with truth, having on the breast-plate of righteousness: your feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace. Above all take the shield of Faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench the fiery darts of the wicked. Take the helmet of salvation, and the Sword of the Spirit, &c.

This Apostate hath not a piece of it, to ward the least blow, wheresoever it strikes him. He is to deal with cunning Fencers, and hath neither offeusiue nor defensive weapons. Not Truth but error is the girdle of his loins: and for the breast-plate of righteousness, he knows not how to put it on. His f...ete were never shod with the preparation of the Gospel, he had not so much time to spare from his nimble gadding after vanities. The fiery darts of these wicked spirits may burn and wound him to death; he hath no Shield of Faith to cool or quench them. The helmet of salvation is far from him; he knows not in what Armory to find it. And for the sword of the spirit, he cannot tell how to handle it. He is an vnwalled city, an vndefenced Fort, an unarmed man. No marvel, if th...se foul spirits enter, when there is neither contention nor intention to repel them. Omnia tradentur: portas reserabimus hosti.

2. Their Inhabitation. Dwell.

The Devil dwelleth in a Man, not tanquàm corpus locatum in loco, as a body seated in a certain place: for spirits are not contained in any place. Incorporeall created substances do not dwell in a place locally or circumscriptively, as bodies do; but definitively. Nor dwell these in him, tanquam forma in materia, as the form in a substance, as the soul in the body. For the Devil is a simple substance of himself, not compounded of any aliene or second matter.

But they dwell in him by a secret and spiritual power; darkening their minds. 2. Cor. 4. that the light of the glorious gospel of christ should not shine unto t...ē. Poysoning their affections; that being past feeling, they might give themselves over to lasciuiousnesse, toworke all uncleanness with greediness. Hardening their hearts, Rom. 2. til they treasure up to themselves wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of therighteous Judgment of God. All which is no other in effect; but damming up the lights and windows of this Fort, ramming up the gates, and fortifying the walls. Thus they dwell in him, like witches in an enchanted Castle: and who shall break their spels & deliver him! You see then, this black Devil hath but sorry guests, that purpose longer stay with him then a night; to dwell, yea to domineer, till they have eaten him quite out of house and home.

3. Their Cohabitation. They dwell there; all of them, even together.

1. There is room enough in one heart for many sins. Mary Magdalens heart held seven devils: this Apostates eight. There was a whole Legion in another. Math. 8. All the Principalities and powers of darkness in a fourth. Absalom had treason, ambition, pride, incest, ingratitude, for his hearts stuffing. Judas had no fewer turpitudes in his. The heart is so small a piece of flesh, that it will scarce give a Kite her breakfast: yet, behold, how capacious and roomthy it is, to give house-room to seven Devils. He that should read and observe the great Physicians dissection of man's heart. Math. 15. Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies; would bless himself to think, that so little a thing could extend it self to such a capacity; or that it could be so full and not burst.

2. Behold a rabble of Devils agreeing quietly in one man. Glomerantur in vnum Innumera pestes Erebi. Innumerable plagues of hell are rounded up together in one; yet they fall not out for room. On earth among men it often falleth out, as between those two ambitious Romans.

Nec quemquam iam ferre potest Caesarue priorem, Pompeiusue parem.

Caesar must have no superior, Pompey no rival. Ahab cannot endure, that Naboth's vineyard should disfigure his Lordship. Rich men in this world agree like Pikes in a pond, ready to eat up one another: but howsoever; the poor pay for it, they are sure to be devoured. Tradesmen cannot agree in one City, nor neighbors in one Town, nor brothers in one house, nor Jacob and Esau in one womb: yet, behold, many Devils can agree in one man. They know that a Kingdom divided cannot stand. We quarrel and contend, when hell it self is at peace.

My journey draws to an end: there remain but two steps; the Conclusion and Application. The Conclusion of the Parable is fearful. The last state of that man is worse then the first. Is it possible? His state was so bad before, that can you imagine it worse? Yes: there was but one Devil before, now there are eight. By reason of this stronger possessiō, his damnation will be the sooner wrought up, the cup of his iniquity brim-filled, and himself hurried to hell with the greater precipitation. This peiority of his state may be amplified in 6. respects.

1. Whilst this black Devil had a white face, & carried the countenance of religion, he was wrap'd up in the general prayers of the Church. He seemed of that number, for whom as the friends to christ, there was a continual remembrance in good men's intercessions. If any man see his brother sin a sin, which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. But there is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for it. Samuel will pray for Saul, till he perceive that he hath given over the Lord, and the Lord him.

But when the white scarffe is plucked off this Moors face, and his black leprosy appears: when the Wolves sheepskin is stripp'd off, and he is seen to worry the lambes: then is he singled out as an enemy to Christ, and God's judgment hastened on him at the entreaty of his servants. He is so much the worse, as he hath lost the benefit of good men's prayers. When once in this gall of bitterness, and bond of iniquity, in vain Simon Magus requests Simon Peter to request God for him. Pray ye to the Lord for me, that none of these things which ye have spoken, come upon me.

2. Whilst this black Devil mantled his tawny skin, and ulcerous heart with dissimulation of piety, there was outwardly some hopeful likelihood of his reformation, and winning to heaven. (Though God knew otherwise in his hidden and reserved counsel) whilst he sate in the congregation of Saints, heard what God spake to them, and spake with them to God; the Minister did preach to him the tidings of peace with a good opinion, and admitted him to the communication of the Sacrament. But now, his eruption into manifest contempt of sacred things, and despite done to the spirit of truth, hath deaded that hope so that the Minister hath not that confident comfort, that the word will be the fanour of life unto him. His Hypocrisy hath deceived the world; his Apostasy hath deceived himself: therefore his state is worse.

3. His latter end is worse in regard of himself: and this may be amplified in four circumstances.

1. Before he was sick of spiritual drunkenness, now he is lethargiz'd. Who knows not that a continued lethargy is worse then a short ebriety Such is his state.

2. Impenitence hath brought him to impudence: and by often prostitution of his heart to vncleanes, he hath gotten a whores forehead, that cannot blush. Ier. 3. Thou refusedst to be ashamed. And Ier. 8. Were they ashamed when they had committed abomination? Nay, they wer not at all ashamed, neither could they blush. He hath so little repented for wickedness, that now he thinks there is no wickedness standeth in need of repentance. A brazen face, which no foul deed, nor reproof for it, can make to change color. How can it be otherwise? For a black Devil can no more blush, then a black Dog.

3. He is in worse state, by so much as a relapse is more perilous then the first sickness. By reason that strength is now spent, and nature made more weak, and unable to help it self, or to receive benefit by what is ministered. The sparlies of goodness are now dying, or quite extinct, & the floods of iniquity more violent against him. There be sorer assaults, and less strength to encounter.

4. Before he was quiet in himself, and might have a flattering hope, that the night would never come. But now breaking forth into palpable contempt and obduracy, he finds his conscience open to condemn him, and hell gates open to receive him. His ulcer seemed to be fairly skinn'd over, and in his own sense healed; but now to come to a new incision, is greater terror then ever. The sound of fear is now in his ears, the sense of a dagger at his heart. His body would, his mind cannot rest. The horror of future punishment lies at Cain's door, and is at every noise ready to wake. There is a fearful conflict betwixt Sensuality and Reason in him: that he may use Job's words, though in a deeper and direr sense. Pactus sum mihi metipse grauis: I am a burden and trouble to myself.

Thus the great Parasite of the soul, that heretofore matched the number of God's threatenings with as many fair promises, & flatter'd this wretch with the paucity of his sins; now takes him in the l...rch, and over rec...ons him. He that so long kept him in a beautiful gallery of hope, now takes him aside, and shows him the dark dungeon of despair. He engrosseth his iniquities in text-letters, and hangs them on the Curtain at his beds f...te, to the racking amazement of his distracted soul. Before the Devil did put his shoulders under the burden; but now he shifts it off, and imposeth it on the sinner. And as I have read, the Spanish Index deals with Velcurio: who commenting on Liui saith, that the fifth age was decrepit under the Popes and Emperors: the Index takes out the Popes, and leaves the Emperors obnoxious to the whole imputation: so the devil winds out himself at last from the wicked, refusing to carry the burden any longer, but leaves it wholly to their supportation.

This ague, or rather agony, is made more vexing by the sting of conscience: which is now God's bailiff to arrest him; his witness against him; his whip to lash him. His Register, that reads over the long book of his offenses; and after a terrible aggravation of their heynousnes, tells him his penance, direful and intolerable; and that Coneordat cum actis Curiae, it agrees with the just decree of God's Court, never to be avoided.

4. His last state is worse then his first, in respect of God: who will now turn him out of his protection. When he hath once proclaimed open war and rebellion against God, and hath manifestly declared himself an outlaw; no marvel, if God throw him out of the circumference of his mercy, & let his Providence take no charge over him; saving only to restrain his savage fury, from forraging his grace-empaled Church. But for himself, the Scripture gives a renunciation. If he will go into captivity, let him go. Revel. 22. 11. If he will be vntust, let him be unjust still. If he will be filthy, let him be filthy still. I will not hinder his course, Abea...t, pere...t, prafundat, perdat, said that father in the Comedy; Let him go, perish, sink, or swim. He hath full liberty to swill the cup of his own damnation up to the brim.

5. In respect of the Devil, his latter state is worse. Which may be demonstrated by a familiar smilitude. A man is committed to prison for debt, or some light trespass; is there indifferently well used, hath (for his money) all the liberty that the layle and layer can afford him; nay, is permitted to go abroad with keepers. At last, he spies opportunity, and breaks away: then the Jailor fumes and fomes and rageth; and perhaps, swears away that little share of his own soul, which he had left. The prisoner had need look to himself: if the Jailor catch him, he had better never have stir'd. At last he is taken; now bolts, and locks, and heavy irons, a strong guard, and a vigilant watch; til he be made safe for stirring again. This bondage is far worse then the first.

The sinner in the devils keeping is let alone to enjoy the liberty of the prison, that is, this world; he may feed his eye with vanities, his hand with extortions, his belly with junkets, his spleen with laughter, his ears with music, his heart with iollity, his flesh with lusts; and all this without control. But if he be won by the Gospel preached to break prison; and thereupon give the devil the slip: let him take heed, Satan do not catch him again. If he once recovers him into his prison, he will dungeon him; remove from him all means, whereby he might be saved; let him see, hear, feel, understand nothing but temptations and snares; blind his soul, harden his heart; load him with heavy irons, and lock him up in bolts and fetters of everlasting perdition.

6. Then lastly, his end shall be worse at the last; when the least parcel of God's wrath shall be heavier, then all the anguish he felt before. When his Almond tree shall be turned to his iron rod; his afflictions to Scorpions. When the short and momentary vexations of this world shall no sooner cease to him, then the eternal torments of Hell shall begin, and (which is most fearful) shall never end. Be his body burned to death in fire, yet those flames shall go out with his ashes: but come his flesh and soul to that infernal fire, and when they have been burned myriads of years, yet it shall not be quenched.

The Application doth immediately concern the Jews; which hath before been plentifully instanced. For our selves. 1. The unclean spirit hath by God's holy Gospel been cast out of us. 2. Do you think, he is at quiet? No: he esteems all places dry and barren, till he get into us again. 3. He resolves to try for entrance. 4. Now is it enough, that we leave ourselves empty of faith and good works? for all our abominable sins swepe with an overly repentance? and garnished with hypocrisy, and with our old affections to sin still? 5. Take we heed; he will come with seven spirits, more wicked then the former, and give us a fiercer assault.

But our help is in the name of GOD, who hath made heaven and earth: in whose mercy we trust, because his compassions fail not. Our own strength is no confidence for us; but the grace of that strongest man, who is alone able to keep out Satan. Let us adhere to Him by a true faith; and serve him in an holy integrity of conversation: and our latter end shall be better then our beginning. Mark the upright man, and behold the just; for the end of that man is peace. Our end shall be better hereafter; when GOD shall wipe away all tears from our eyes: when sorrow, and sickness, and death shall be no more: when Sennacherib cannot rage, nor the Leviathan of hell assault us. Peace shall enuiron us, Heaven shall contain us, Glory shall crown us. Our trouble, woe, mourning, have been momentary: but our joys, peace, bliss, shall have no intermission, no mutation, no end. Now He that perfects all good works, make our latter end better then our beginning. To whom, three persons, one eternal God, be all prais... and glory, forever and forever.

Amen.

LYCANTHROPY, OR THE WOLF worrying THE LAMBES.

By THOMAS ADAMS.

Matthew 7. 15.

Beware of false Prophets which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening Wolves.

TERTVLL.

Quaenam sunt istae pelles ovium, nisi nominis

Christiani extrinsecus superficies?

Hic dolus est magnus; Lupus est qui creditor agnus.

LONDON, Printed by William Iaggard, 1615.

TO THE TRVELY worthy Gentleman M. HENRY FORTESCVE, Esquire, a fauourer of virtue and good Learning.

SIR, I have put up the Wolf, though not hunted him; as judging myself too weak for that sport-earnest. It is no desertlesse Office to discover that subtle and insatiate Beast; to pull the Sheep-skin of Hypocrisy over his ears; and to expose his feming malice and sanguisugous cruelty to men's censure and detestation. Let those hands strike him, that have darts of authority put into their Quiuers. Our Land is no Forest, literally or metaphorically understood: but whether for Church or Common-wealth, profession or soil, an Orchard of God's own planting; fruitful in goods and good works. Wolves we have none, but some Mystical ones; whose ferocity is yet hidden under the habits and cases of those Lambes, they have devoured. These I have set in view, or at least meant my best to do it. I have seldom pretended that common poise, that (by their own report) sets so many mad pens, like wheels, a running, Importunacy of friends. I have willingly published, what I had hope would do good published. Only this I feared to keep from the Press, lest it should steal thither another way. Being there, I could not with better confidence fasten upon a known Patron, then yourself: who can both understand it, and will read it: not only the Epistle, but the whole Book. Though that fashion with many patrons, of perusing more then their own Titles, be now as a Sute of the old make. I know you spend some hours of all days in such good exercises; abandoning those idle and excessive customs, wherein too many will please themselves, and none else.

It is an unthrifty spending of time, and a sorry success will conclude it, when we are curious in plotting a method for our inferior delights; and leave our Salvation unwrought up. We strive to settle our Lands, to secure our monies, to confirm our estates; but to conform our lives, or to make sure our Election is vilipended. And yet when all is done; brains have plotted, means have seconded, bonds and laws have established; nothing can be made Sure but only our Salvation. But go you forward to adorn your eternal mind; and to plant your soul full of those Flowers, which give already a pleasant odour on earth, and shall one day be stuck like glories in Heaven. So shall your memory be sweet in the mouths and hearts of future generations; whiles the vicious, even alive, do not escape the Satire. Thus with true thankful love I behight you in my prayers, a happy Progress in Grace, till you shall come to your Standinghouse of Glory.

Your Worships in my best services, Tho: Adams.

LYCANTHROPY. OR THE WOLF Worrying The LAMBES.

Luke 10. 3.

Behold, I send you forth as Lambes among Wolves.

THE Great Bishop of our souls being now at the Ordination of his Ministers; having first instructed them in via Domini, doth here discipline them in vita Discipuli: and pre-arms them to that entertainment, which the Samaritans of the world are likely to give all those, whose faces look toward Jerusalem. Math. 10. ver. 22. You shall be hated of all men for my names sake. If they had but some opposers, there were some comfort; then it is probable that the rest would help: nay, All. Yet if they were but indifferently affected toward us, and would neither defend nor offend. but resign us up to our selves: nay, they shall oppose, they will Hate: your persecutors shall be in every Citty, not few but many, not neuters but maligners. If there were many and not haters, then as it is in the Proverb, The more the merrier: if haters and not many, then the fewer the better cheare: but they are for nature persecutors; for number many mē, most men, innumerable, all men. But we are here praemoniti, and therefore should be praemuniti: neither need we grudge to suffer in measure for Him, that hath suffered beyond measure for us. Whatsoever we endure for his names sake, the patience and passion of others hath matched it: but His grief for us could not be fitted with a Sicut in all the world.

But I would not, like a careless Porter, keep you without doors, til you had lost your stomachs. There is some cheare coming, and I will now unlock the gates of my Text, to let you in to it. The words contain the Deputation to an Office. Behold, I send you forth as Lambes among Wolves. Considerable in the Deputation are a

Commission, wherein observe the

- Sender: Christ.
- Sent: the Apostles.
- Sending; or warrant.

Commixtion, which consists in a

- Prescription, what they should be that are sent, Lambes.
- Description, what they are, among whom sent, Wolves.

This is the Tree, and the branches: shall we now step forward to gather and taste the fruit? But stay. Here is a Gardener must first be spoke with: one that stands in the very entrance of my Text; for some purpose sure. Behold.

Behold, is like John the Baptist, in holy writ, evermore the vant-currer of some excellent thing. Pontan: compares it to the sounding of a Trumpet, before some great Proclamation. It is like the hand in the margin of a book, pointing to some remarkable thing, and of great succeeding consequence. It is a Direct, a Reference, a dash of the Holy-Ghosts pen; seldom used repletuely: but to impart & import some special note, worthy our deeper, and more serious observation. It is like the ringing of the great Bell, before the Sermon of some famous Preacher; & bids us here, as a monitor, keep silence, to hear what the Eternal Word speaketh unto us. In a word, it is but a word, and yet the Epitome of that whole sentence. Let him that hath ears to hear, hear: let him that hath eyes to see, Behold.

This... was our Savior Christ's Sermon ad Clerum; whose Pulpit is now in Heaven: and sends us to preach on his preachings, to paraphrase his Lectures, and no more but to deliver that to you, which he hath dictated to us. Your attention is therefore charged in this Behold. Open your ears, those organical conduits of discipline: nay, your hearts are liable, and therefore should be pliable to this charge. Keep then patience in your minds, attention in your ears, meditation in your hearts, practice in your lives. Behold.

Behold what? S. Matthew recites this Deputation, together with a Direction. Behold, I send you forth as Lames in the midst of Wolves: be ye therefore wise as Serpents, and harm-less as Doves. Where Christ doth not only confer a Charge, but infer a Carriage. The former is Institutio viae, the other Instructio vitae. I send: Be you, &c. The Deputation or designing their office, shall only limit my speech, and your attention for this time. This Current parts it self into two rivulets, a Commission, a Commixtion. The Missure, I send you: the Mixture, as Lames among wolves. Every Commission, consists on necessity, besides the mere act, of at least two persons, the Sender, the Sent.

In the Sender, may be considered his Greatness, his Goodness. His Greatness that he can send: his goodness, that he will send, for the benefit of his church

1. His Greatness. The Sender is greater then the person Sent: as Paul said in a shallower inequality of Melchizedek & Abraham, being both men. Heb. 7 Without all contradiction, the less is blessed of the greater. Here the Sender is God and man: a King, the King; of pure, absolute, and independent authority: a real Prince, a royal Prince. Real in his right, in his might: Royal in his affects and effects: he purposeth, and disposeth good to his Church. Tyrants are the Kings of slaves: liberal Princes are the Kings of men: Christ is the King of Kings: here dispatching his Legates on an Ambassage to the world. This his Greatness.

2. His Goodness: he that is King doth send to his subjects, abjects; or rather to rebels, to make them subjects: with a pardon of all their treasons, ready signed and sea'ld to their accepting hands. Ephes. 4. 8. When he had led captivity captive, he gave gifts unto men. When he had led captivity captive; there's his Greatness: he gave gifts unto men; there's his Goodness. By the former he is mirificans: mitificans by the latter. Behold; he must send to us: we knew not, desired not access to him. He is the way, the truth, the life: and therefore sends out these as describers of the way, dispensers of the truth, cōductors to the life. If the way had not found us, we should never have found the way. Here then is his Goodness; though a King, yet he preacheth himself, and sends Preachers. As was Solomon, his type; both a King over Israel, and a Preacher to Israel. Time was; Christ refused to be a King, denied to be a Judge, but vouchsafed to be a Preacher. Without this sweet dignation to us, we should never have ascended to him, nec opibus, nec operibus, nec opera: neither by our wealth, nor by our worth, nor by our wills, nor by our works, nor by our wits, nor by our worship. Thus for the Sender.

In a Messenger sent

Is required Celerity, Sincerity, Constancy. That he be speedy, that he be heedful: and (as we say) that he be deedy; hold out till his Embassy be ended, and till he that sent him send after him a revocation. Celerity without discretion is like wings without eyes: discretion without celerity like eyes without wings: both without constancy are like seete & eyes without a heart.

1. For their Speedinesse. Before they are sent, they should not run at all: after they are sent, they cannot run too fast. We may say of these Messengers, as it was proverbied of the Lacedemonian... Turpe est cuilibet fugere, Laconi etiam deliberasse. Go... grant, all our consciences may witness with our selves, what Paul speaks of his vnretarded execution of Christ's message. When it pleased God to send me to preach his Son among the heathen, immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood. To adjure their posting alacrity to this business, the Apostles were charged to salut no man by the way: much less should the burying our dead friends, or taking leave of our living friends, procrastinate our course. Prov. 10. 26. As vinegar to the teeth, and as smoke to the eyes, so is a sluggard to them that send him. Isaiah 40. 31. But they that wait upon the Lord, shall renew their strength: they shall mount up with wings as Eagles: they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk & not faint. It is so, or it should be so: our diligence should tread upon the heels of our calling for haste; and we should make use of the first handsell of time. In limine offendisse ominusum, odiosum. To stumble at the threshold, is a bad heed, and a worse sign.

2. It is not enough to be speedfull; we must also be discreet and faithful. The messenger must do the Senders business, not his own. Celerity lays the raynes on our necks: discretion is the curb of the bridle. There are that run too fast; Qui trans mare currunt. As Cyprian writes of some Schismatics, that had put to sea for Rome; quasi veritaspost eos nauigare non possit. This is called by Saint August. Cursus celerrimus praeter viam. The four Cherubims. Ezek. 1. 7. had pedes rectos, straight feet: and the feet of Ministers, if they be beautiful, take strait steps. Sunt opera quae videntur bona, et non sunt: quia non referuntur ad illum finem, ex quo bona sunt. Indeed Intentio facit bonum opus; but then fides dirigit intentionē, saith the same father. It is not enough that conscience must lead us, but truth must lead our conscience. Non est rectum, quod non est a Deo directum. He that commands us agere, commands us hoc agere: non aliud, sed illud. With God, adverbs shall have better thanks then nownes.

Both good and well, must in our actions meet.

Wicked is not much worse then indiscreet.

Saies a moderne Poet. He that hath a nimble foot and a false heart, runs himself out of breath, ere he remembers his errand. Fidelity is requisite in a Messenger.

Non boue mactato coelestia Numina gaudent;

Sed, quae praestanda est, et sine teste, fide.

3. It is not yet enough to go speedfully, and heedfully; except also deedfully, with a constant holding out. Though soon enough, and fast enough, it is not well enough, except far enough. Lauda nauigantem, cum peruenerit ad portum. Paul must fight out his battle with victory: finish his race with winning the prize: and keep the faith, though he bear about in his body the marks of the Lord Jesus. And then there is laid up for him a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous Judge shall give him at the last day: and not to him only, but to them also that love his appearing. Inueniat mittens missum iudicabundus praedicantem.

Some begin hotly, and keep the Pulpits warm at first, barking loud against dumb dogs; thundering out, Let him that labors not, not eat: forbidding promotion without devotion. On a sudden, these sons of thunder are as mute as fishes. What's the matter? Now from their own lips, they should have no promotion. Oh Sir; they have the promotion already. You may perceive, the fish is caught by their hanging aside their nets. Perhaps in a Cathedral Church, to a refined audience, some Episcopal command may deliver him of Elephanti partum, a child of two years breeding... one whereof is spent in the conception, another in fashioning the members; and yet a mere Embrion when it is borne. Oh favor them. Rarae fumant faelicibus arae. Their beginning was gold, like that Monarchs drea med Image; but their conclusion is dirty, they end in clay; leaving the word, & cleaving to the world. It were good for the church, & not amiss for themselves if their gains might be decreased with their pains. But if a restraint of Pluralities, or a diminution and abatement of their demeanes, should be imposed, how would they complain! Let them complain; and be answered as certain Monks in Winchester were: who complaining to King Henry the 2. that their Bishop had taken away three of their Dishes, and left them but ten: the King replied, That the Bishop should do well to take away the ten, and leave them but three. As they have crimen immane, and nomen inane, so let them have mercedem tenuem, a slender recompense. Inertes should be justly inopes: especially cum valuerunt, et non voluerunt praedicare. Is this all? No: but as the tree falls, so it lies. If Christ find them at last loiterers, he will set them to work forever in torments.

You have heard the Persons designing, and designed: the Designation follows; which gives thē, 1. Their Warrant. 2. Their Qualification.

1. Christ seals them a warrant in his word, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 I send you. It is not Humanum inuentum, but Diuinum Institutum: authorised under the Broad-seal of heaven, in the power of the second Person of that State-royal. He says not, I will pray to my Father to send you, but I send you. For All power is given to me in heaven, and in earth. They come not then, without their commission; as those, Ier. 23. 21. I have not sent these Prophets, yet they ran: I have not spoken to them, yet they prophesied. Would you have a Minister? Seek to the Nurseries of Christian learning, the Universities: there you shall have them furnished with excellent parts and arts. Is it enough to have learning? No, the man of God must also be holy. Say, he be well learned, and well lived, may he instantly climb up into the Pulpit & preach? No; he must first have an inward commission from heaven, and an outward Ordination on earth by imposition of hands. You may see their warrant.

2. Their Qualification is inseparable to their missure. Christ not only speaks, but works effectually in them, and gives them a Fieri faciam, how unapt and unable soever they were before. So Math. 4 Ego faciam vos piscatores hominum. You made yourselves Fishermen, I will make you Fishers of men. He doth not in these days so enthusiastically inspire men: but sets them first to be Cesternes in the Vniuersity, before they be Conduits in the Country. Before they can minister a word in time, there must be a time to have it ministered to them. Ere their words be like apples of gold, with pictures of silver; they must be refined in some Academical furnace, and by much study have this picture and impression of wisdom set on them.

Neither were these Apostles dismissed out of Christ's College, till they were made fit to teach. Christ, that set them up as Lights, & bad them shine, made them shine; and not as Ardens speaks of some since their days, that are fumantes, magis quāflamantes. Both our Torches, life and learning must burn brightly. It is for the Papists to build up a B...ocke-house of Ignorance; and to set dunces over fools; for so the Jesuits call their Seculars; that they may both fall into the ditch. It was a rule with them, the very Epitome of their Canons in that point.

Qui been Can, Con, le, poterit been Presbiter esse. And yet me thinks, they should be more circumspect in their choice: for they seem to magnify it beyond us, and make it a Sacrament, calling it the Sacrament of Order. O what you not why? they think the Sacraments confer grace, and let him be a devil before; the Imposition of hands shall make him holy enough.

We have examined their Commission, let us now consider their Commixtion. As Lambs among Wolves. Alas! it goes harsh, when these two natures meet. It must be miraculous, if one of them come not short home. Yet I find it prophesied of the days of the Gospel. The Wolf and the Lamb shall feed together. Indeed when Wolves become Lambs, of which supernatural effect these Lambs are sent forth as instrumental causes; this peace may be fulfilled. But Wolves, while they are Wolves, will not let the Lambs live in quiet. In this mixture, there is a Prescription, a Description. What we must be that are sent; what they are amongst whom sent.

The duty of our natures, and nature of our duties is exemplified in this word, Lambes. Not that there should be a Metamorphosis or transformation of us into that kind of beasts, literally. But as Lambes. As is sometimes a note of Quality, sometimes of equality, here it is only similitudinary. As Lambes, as Doves, &c. Neither is this enjoined likeness catholic, but partial: we must not be in every respect, as Lambes: but it must be taken in a limited and qualified sense.

Lambes! Let us observe here, Quam ob rem, Quainre. 1. Wherefore. 2. Wherein, we must be Lambes.

1. Wherefore. Good reason: he that sends thē forth was a Lamb. John 1. Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , theLambe, that Lamb of God, even from his own bosom: taking away the sin of the world. Other Levitical Lambes took away sin typically; this really. They were slain for the sins of the Jews, this of all the world. There is tacita antithesis in 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . Christ was a Lamb, (that we may take with us our Precedent) especially in three respects. Of his Innocency, Patience, Profite.

1. For his Innocency, John. 8. Which of you can conuinceme of sin? You may reprove, can you disprove? The world traduced him for a blasphemer, a Samaritan, a Sorcerer, an enemy to Caesar, a boone companion: so easy is it to auile, and revile, so hard to convince. The Church sweetly and truly commends him. Cant. 5, 10. My beloved is white and ruddy, the chiefest among ten thousand. Candidussanctitate, rubicundus passion. He was white of himself; made red by the wounds of his enemies. It was not praise enough for him, that he was (as it is said of David) Ore rubicundo, of a ruddy color: unless this red had been first grounded on white. His passion had lost the virtue of merit, had he not been innocent. But he was Agnus ill immaculatus. 1. Pet. 1. 19. A lamb, that lamb without blemish, without spot.

A Sun without a mote, a rose without a canker, a clear heaven without any cloud.

2. For his Patience. Isaiah 53. He was oppressed, he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth: he is brought as a Lamb to the slaughter; and as a sheep before the shearer is dumb, so openeth he not his mouth. First, the shearers fleece him, and then the butchers kill him, yet he opens not his mouth: to wit, against them, but for them. Father forgive them, they know not what they do. He wrote that in the dust, which many engrave in brass and marble; wrongs. Behold, the King of heaven is factus in terris, & fractus in terris: yet calls not fire from heaven to consume his enemies: but quencheth that fire with his own blood by them shed; which they in shedding it had kindled against themselves. It is probable, that some of the agents in his death, were saved by his death. O strange inversion, wrought by mercy; that Iniusti in homicidio, should be made Iusti per homicidium; and that the blood, which was scarce washed from their guilty hands, should now whiten their consciences. Like that impostum'd Souldior; the blow that was thought to have killed him, cured him.

3. For his Profite. He was profitable in his fleece, profitable in his flesh, profitable in his blood, in his life, in his death, and after death eternally profitable.

1. His Flesh is meat indeed; though non dentis, sed mentis. Our fathers did eat Manna, which was the food of Angels, as it were; and yet died corporally: but whosoever eat the God of Angels spiritually, shall not die eternally.

2. His fleece good. We were cold, and naked. Is this all? Nay, and polluted too. The fleece of his imputed Righteousness, keeps us warm, clothes our nakedness, hides our uncleanness. Hence the Prophet calls him, The Lord our righteousness. Ours not inherent, but imputative. 2. Cor. 5. 21. We are made no otherwise the righteousness of God in him, then he was made sin for us: which was only by imputation. So Luther, Christiana sanctitas non est actiua, sed passiuua sanctitas: extra nos est iustitia nostra, non in nobis.

3. His blood excellent, and of most transcendent virtue; whether lauando, or leuando: we were maculati, et mactati: speckled with corruptions, dead in sins. Not only as the Remists say, Diseased: but as Paul saith, Deceased: Ephe. 2, 1. Dead in sins and trespasses. His blood hath recovered our life, our health; and washed us as white, as the snow is... Salmon. Thus he is in every respect profitable to us; more then we could either expetere, or expectare; deserve, or desire. Satan is against us: behold Christ is with us; and we overcome him by the blood of the Lambe.

Now, is Christ a Lamb? then must you be sicut agni, as Lambes. Christ is the principal and truest exemplar; a general rule without exception. Imitation doth soonest come, and best become Children and Scholars. We are Children. Math. 5. Love your enemies, &c. That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven. We are Servants to Christ. Io. 13. Ye call me Master, & Lord, & ye say well: for so I am. Though we cannot tread in his steppes, we must walk in his path. As Virgil of Ascanius, son to Aeneas. Sequitur{que} patrem non passibus aequis. Now our imitation is confined (not to his miracles, but) to his moralls.

It is fit the Disciple should follow his Master. Math. 16. If any man will come after me, let him denyhimselſe, and take up his cross, & follow me. Some follow him, as Peter, a far off. Some go cheek by iowle with him, as the Papists; confounding their own merits with his, and therein themselves. Some out-run Christ, as James and John. Luke 9. 54. in a preproperous, preposterous zeal; as hot as Mount Hecla. Let us follow him close, but in meekness. Vis capere celsitudinem Dei? cape priushumilitatem Dei. We must be Lambes accordingly; and that in

1. Patience. We must take up Christ's cross, when we become his Scholars. Not only bear it, but take it up. Tollere and Ferre differ. An Ass bears, man takes up. There is a threefold cross: Innocent, perient, penitent. Christ bore the first: the perishing thief the second: the repentant; and we all must bear the last. The lamb, whether he be shorn or slain, is dumb to complaints.

We bless God, that we are well freed from the Boners and butchers of these lambes: but we have still fleecers enough, too many; that love to see Learning follow Homer with a staff and a wallet. This we must expect: Christ sends us not as wolves among wolves, or Shepherds among wolves, or sheep about wolves; but as lambes 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, in themiddest of wolves; as S. Matthew hath it. If they cannot devour our flesh, they will pluck our fleeces; leave us nothing but the tag-locks, poor vicaredge tithes: whiles themselves and their children are kept warm in our wool, the Parsonage. Nay, and they would clippe off the tag-locks too; rauen up the vicaredges, if the law would but allow them a pair of sheares. Every Gentleman thinks the Priest mean; but the Priests means hath made many a Gentleman.

Well, he had need be a lamb that lives among such wolves. But as Doctor Luther was wont to say. Mitte mundum vadere sicut vadit, nam vult vadere sicut vadit. Merry Latin, but resolute Patience. Let the world go as it doth, for it will go as it doth. Let us comfort our selves, as our Jewel did his friends in banishment. Haec non durabunt aetatem. This world will not last ever.

He that enters this holy Calling, must be content, as Paul, to die daily. 1. Cor. 15. 31. To preach the Gospel boldly, is to pull the world about our ears; and to conjure up the furies of hell against us. But

Frangit, et attollit vires in milite causa,

Yet Patience is the best gamester; for it winneth, when it looseth. He had need be a Job, that lives among the Sabaeans & Chaldeans of our times. Are you disparaged? suffer. Are you despised? suffer. Are you impoverished? suffer. This same Bulapathū is the best hearb in the garden, the hearb Patience. It shall amaze them, after all wrongs, to see your foreheads smooth, countenances mild, lips silent, and your habits vn-moved. The Wolf in the Fable (oh that it were but a fable) when he sees the Lamb drinking at the pool, comes blundering into the water and troubles it: then quarrels with the Lamb. Quare turbasti aquam? Why hast thou troubled the water?

Sic nocet innocuo nocuus, causam{que} nocendi Quaerit. So Ahab the wolf told Elias the lamb, that he troubled Israel. As it is truly reported; the Papists would have laid the Gunpowder-treason on the Puritaines; if it had been effected. Hebr. 10. Ye haue need of patience; that after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise. But I fear, I have incited your impatience, by standing. so long upon patience.

2. Time and your expectation call me to the Innocency of these Lambes. It is not enough for them to suffer wrongs: but they must offer none. For he that doth injury, may well receive it. To look for good, and do bad, is against the law of Retaile. Dyonisius of Syracusa being banished, came to Theodores Court a suppliant; where not presently admitted, he turned to his Companion with these words. Perhaps I did the like, when I was in the like dignity. When thou receivest injury, remember what thou hast given.

It is no wonder, if those lambes be stricken, that strike. He that will be an agent in wrongs, must be a patient. How strange, and improper a speech is this; a contentious lamb, a troublesome Minister! How learned soever such men may seem, they are indeed illiterate. They are bad writers that have not learned to join: simple Grammarians, that have not their Concords. It is observed of Lambes; that Caetera animalia armauit natura, solum agnum dimisit inermem. Other living creatures Nature hath armed; but the lamb she sent into the world naked and unarmed: giving it neither offensive nor defensive weapons. The Dog hath teeth to bite: the Horse hoofs to trample: the Bear nails to tear: the Ox horns to dash: the Lyon paws and jaws to devour: The Bore hath his tush: the Elephant his snout: the Hind and Hare have swift feet, to save themselves by flight. Only the Lamb hath no means, either to help it self, or to hurt others.

Neither is this our Innocency only to be considered, in respect immediately of man, or of injuries directed to him. But these Lambes must be innocent, in regard of God, in regard of their Calling. The Priest in his breast-plate must not only have Vrim which is Science; but Thummim which is Conscience. We have manifold weakness; we must not have manifest wickedness. Though we be not in Facto, we must be in Fieri: and not then to begin, when we should be onwards half our journey. Theodore required, that the School-masters for his children should be 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, as well as 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉: and Christ's Apostles were not only Depurati, but Depurati. John. 13. If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me. Bis peccat, qui peccat exemplo. Uncleansed Ministers are like Bilha and Zilpha, Jacob's maids; that being bound themselves, brought forth children that were free. Such Church-men are like the Pinacles on some Battlements; that point upward to heaven, but poise downward to their Center.

The best Schoolman said, that Magistrates and Ministers, when they sin, do Peccare in quid essentialiter: all others but in quale accidentaliter. To smoke with the Indian, quarrel with the Frenchman, court a Lady with the Venetian, plot villainy with the Italian, be proud with the Spaniard, cogge with a Jew, insult with a Turk, drink down a Dutchman, and tell lies with the Devil—for a wager: are works for wolves, not for lambes. To conclude; as we have Deputation, we should have Reputation: and because called to be lambes, behave our selves in Innocence.

3. Our Patience and Innocency make us not complet lambes, without our Profitablenes. Malum ferimus, malum non offerimus, bonum proferimus. We offer no evil, we suffer evil, we return good. It is not enough to suffer wrongs, but we must do none. It is not enough to do no wrong, but we must do good for wrong. Bonum pro malo reddere Christianum est. Every thing in a lamb is good and useful. His fell good, his fleece good, his flesh good: immo et viscera et exorementa commoda sunt. The lambes of God, the Ministers of the Gospel, must universally abound with benefits.

1. To some this lamb gives his fleece: he clothes the naked; and keeps the sick and poor warm in his wool. He sees not a lamb of Christ stripp'd by poverty; but he lends him one lock, to hide his nakedness.

Sic vos, non vobis, vellera fertis oues.

2. He is no niggard of his flesh. Part of his meat and drink, and such refectiōns as God hath sent him, he willingly gives. The Lamb is not covetous. If I have food and raiment, saith S. Paul, I have learned to be content. Covetousness becomes a lamb, worse then rapine a wolf. Jude makes it the mark of false teachers to feed themselves: and Jeremiah saith, the wind shall feed them; nay feed on them, & eat them up. Saith Gregor. Considerate, quid de gregibus agatur, quando lupi sunt pastores! What shall become of the Lambes, under the tuition of Wolves!

3. Yea, even the blood of these lambes is profitable: which they grudge not to give for the glory of God, and benefit of the Church, when a just cause hath called for it. We know that the blood of Martyrs, was milk which nourished the Primitive Infancy of the Church, & God's tythe hath been paid in the lives of his servants. Every drop of blood so spilled hath been like a grain sown in mature ground, and brought forth a plenteous harvest of believers. Well may that lamb of God, that hath begot the Church by his blood on the Cross: & still nourisheth her with the same blood in the Sacrament: deservingly require this Circuncision and tribute of blood, at the hands of his lambes. The Jews sacrificed their beasts to God: we equal them in sacrificing our concupiscences and beastly lusts. But we far exceed those typicke times, whē we immolate our souls & bodies to God. What confirmation of faith, where it was weak: what inkindling of zeal, where it was not; hath been thus effected, the devout acknowledgment of many, non obiter, but ex professo hath demonstrated.

Innumerable are the benefits redounding to you by these Lambes. They are eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame; nurses to infants, and feeders of stronger Christians. They lend their eyes to those that cannot see: their feet to those that cannot go: speak comfortable things to the troubled heart; and inform others in the higher mysteries of salvation. If you truly prized, and duly praised the profits arising to you by them; you would not, as most do, more esteem a rotten sheep, then a sound Minister.

But I forget myself; as if I were so delighted with these Lambes, that I knew not how to leave them. Especially (blame me not, if I be) loath to come among the wolves: whereupon, by the next point of my Text, and last I purpose now to handle, I am enforced to venture. Of the Wolf I must speak: but I hope it cannot be said, lupus in fabula: there are any such present to hear me.

This is the Description of those, among whom the Lambes are sent. There is a natural antipathy of these, one against another; ever since God put enmity, an irreconcilable hatred and contrariety, between the seed of the Woman and of the Serpent. I have read, that a string made of Wolves guts, put amongst a knotte of strings made of the guts of sheep, corrupts and spoils them all. A strange secret in nature: and may serve to insinuate the malice of these Lycanthropi against Lambes: that they do not only persecute them living, but even infest them dead.

No marvel then, if the lambes care not greatly for the company of wolves. For if one scabbed sheep infect the whole flock for morality: what will one wolf do among the lambes for mortality! Therefore so far as we may, let us fly the society of wolves. With the merciful thou shalt show thy selfemercifull, &c. Therefore with the Poet; fly wicked company, et te melioribus offer. But how can this be, when we are sent as Lambes in medio luporum? The lamb would not willingly be alone: yet is far better when solitary, then in woluish society. Plutarch speaks of certain Law-givers, that would have their Priests abstain from Goats: a luxurious beast, and making men by contact obnoxious to Epilepsie. (As the Jews were commanded in Leviticus, to abstain from unclean things.) Though we cannot escape the company of wolves: let us abhor all participation of their vices.

The holy word of God, who can give most congruous names to natures, often compares the wicked to brute and savage creatures. God doth not only send reasonable man, to learn wisdom of the unreasonable beast. So he school'd Israel by the Ox, Balaam by his Ass; and Solomon sends the Sluggard to the Pismire. For it is certain, that many beasts exceed man in diverse natural faculties: as the dog in smelling, Hart in hearing, Ape in tasting, &c. But he matcheth degenerate man with beasts of the most notorious turpitudes.

The proud enemies of the Church are called Lions. Psal. 58. Break out the great teeth of the young Lyons, O Lord. Wilde Boars. Psal. 80. The Boar out of the wood doth waste it: and the wild beast of the field devours it. Bulls. Psal. 22. Many bulls have compassed me: strong Bulls of Bashan have beset me round. And in the same Psalm; Unicorns. The Bull hath 2. horns, the Unicorn one. The roaring Bull, (I had almost said the roaring Boy) the swaggering Ruffian hath two horns; Ishmaels tongue, and Esau's hand: with one horn wounding our bodies and estates, with the other our good names. The Unicorn, that's the Hypocrite, the fowl-brested, fair crested, factious Puritaine hath but one horn: but therewith he doth no small mischief. This Unicorns horn might be very good, if it were out of his head: but so long as it is there, it hurts rather.

David, Psal. 32. compares refractory men to horses and mules; which have no understanding: whose mouth must be held in with bitte and bridle, lest they come near unto thee. The Mule, if you heed not, will take his rider in his teeth, and lay him in the manger. And the Horse, when he hath cast his load, gives him a kind farewell with his heels. Experience justifieth this truth amongst us: for many of our Parishioners are so full of Iadish qualities, that the poor Minister can hardly keep his saddle.

Sometimes we have the wicked likened to fowls There is the Peacock, the proud man, stretching out his painted and gaudy wings. The desperate Cock, the contentious, that fights without any quarrel. The house-bird, the Sparrow, the Emblem of an incontinent and hot adulterer. The Lap-wing, the Hypocrite; that cries, here tis, here tis: here's holiness: when he builds his nest on the ground; is earthly minded; and runs away with the shell on his head; as if he were perfect, when he is not begun. There is the Owl, the night-bird, the Jesuited Seminary; that skulks all day in a hollow tree, in some Popish vault; and at even howtes his masses, and skreeks downfall and ruin to King, Church, and Common-wealth. There is the Bat, the Neuter; that hath both wings and teeth, and is both a bird and a beast; of any religion, of no religion. There is the Cormorant, the Corn-vorant; the Mire-drumble, the Covetous: that are ever rooting and rotting their hearts in the mire of this world. There is also the vulture, that follows armies to prey upon dead corpses: the usurer that waits on Prodigalls, to devour their decaying fortunes. Some have in them the pernicious nature of all these foul fowls.

We may say of a wicked man, as their Schooleglosse saith of their Soul-Priests. Malus Presbiter aequiparatur Coruo, in nigredine vitiorum, in raucedine vocis, in voracitate oblationum mortuorum, in foetore spiritus, in garrulitate, et in furto. Such a man is resembled to a Raven; in the blackness of his vices, in the hoarcenesse of his voice, in his insatiable voracity, in his stench of breath, in his tattling garrulity, and in theft.

We find the wicked otherwhiles compared to Dogs. Psal. 22. Dogs have compassed me. And ver. 20. Deliver my soul from the sword, and my darling from the power of the Dog. And Psal. 59. They return at Euening: they make a noise like a Dog, & go round about the City. Saith Paul, Philip. 3. Beware of Dogs, &c. either grinning in malice, or barking with reproaches, or biting with mischief.

There is the great Mastiffe, the usurer; that worryeth all the lambes in a Country. The Bloodhound, the malicious Murderer, that kills any man which angers him; relying on a friend in the Court for pardon. There is the nimble Beagle, the cunning Persecutor; that hath always the innocent in the wind. The proud Gray-hound, the gay Gallant, that out-runs all moderation. The fawning Spaniell, the flattering Sycophant, that hath only learned to fetch and carry; to spring the Couey of his masters lusts, and to arride, and deride him. You have also Setters, Quicke-setters I should say, that undo the Country by making Commons several. You have your trencher-dogs, lazy Seruitors, that do nothing, but eat, drink, play, and sleep. There be Tumblers too, luxurious Scortators, and their infectious harlots. Some have yard-dogs, churlish Porters, to keep the poor away from their gates. And there be bawling Curres, rurall ignorants, that blaspheme all godliness under the name of Puritanism.

To come home, there be wolves everywhere in abundance. I do not mean literally those, whō the Greeks call 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : whereof I have read in diverse stories. And more authentically reported by Doctor Joseph Hall, in his short Epistolicall discourse of his Trauels, to abound in Ardenna; called by the Inhabitants Lougarous; in English, Witchwolves; witches that had put on the form of those cruel beasts. Aristotle in his second book of the nature of beasts, saith that in India is a wolf; that hath 3. rouse of teeth above, hath feet like a Lyon, face like a man, and the tail of a Scorpion: his voice like a man's voice, and shrill as a Trumpet: and is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , as these wolves are.

But mystical wolves: ravenous in the forms of men: having a greater similitude to wolves in the disposition of their minds, then dissimilitude in the composition of their bodies. The wicked have many resemblances to wolves. Desire of brevity shall reduce them to four. Sterrillity, ferocity, voracity, subtlety.

1. For Sterrillity. The wolf is not very fertile in producing the one kind: (if less, better.) But utterly unprofitable in any good thing redounding from him. The horse carrieth his Master, the ox is strong to draw the plough, the sheep gives us wool for warmth, and flesh for nourishment, the Cowes vnder drops milk into our pailles. The Elephant hath virtue in his tooth, the Unicorn in his horn, the Ciuet-cat in her sent, the Goat in his blood, the Beuer in his genitals. The dog hath his service, and the catte keeps away vermin: not the ape, but makes some sport; and the very poison of serpents is by art made medicinal. For hyde, or hair, or horn, or hoof, or blood, or flesh, most beasts yield some profit; but the wolf is good for nothing.

A fit Emblem of a wicked man; that is universally evil whiles he lives: and not often doth so much good as a hog when he dyes. Only death hath bound him to the good forbearance, and restrains him from doing any further mischief. Perhaps he may give away some fragments in his Testament: but he parts with it in his will, against his will: and it is but a part, whereas Judas returned all, yet went to hell. The wolf living is like Rumney Marsh. Hyeme malus, estate molestus, nunquam bonus. Tide and time, morning and evening, winter and summer, never good. Thus every way is this wolf infructuous.

2. For Ferocity. The wolf is savage and cruel; and loves to lick his own lips, when they reeke with the luke-warm goare of the lambes. There is no such complacency to the wicked, as the wreaking their malicious teenes on the good. If they cannot reach with their claws, they vomit out fire, or at least smoke. Omnis malitia cructat fumum. The tongue of such a wolf is often like a war-arrow, which doubly hurts where it lights. It wounds the flesh in going in, and it rends it worse in pulling out. This is the arrow they make ready on the string, to shoot privily at the upright in heart.

Their *atrocit*y is not thus satisfied; but if opportunity give power, they will wound and worry the lambes first, and proclaim their guiltinesses afterwards. As Cyril observes, the lamb of God was served by the Jews. Primùm ligant; deinde causas in eumquaerunt. First they bind him, and then they seek matter against him. As it is reported of a Judge of the Stemery at Lydford in Deuonshire; who having hangd a felon among the Tinners in the forenoon, sate in judgment on him in the afternoon. So the wolves in Queen Mary's days, imprisoned the innocent lambes that had broken no law; and afterwards devised a law to condēn them. And having first martyr'd thē, then held disputation whether the act were authentical. These were the sanguisugous wolves, Papists. There are still rapidi, rabidi lupi, that must have somewhat to expiate their savage fury. Auicen speaks of the wolf; that if the Fishermen leave him no offall, he will rend their nets. These Cannibals look for somewhat; if it be but for a Ne noceant. Other wolves are afraid of burning flames: but these Lycanthropi budge not an inch for all the fire in hell.

3. For voracity. The wolf is ravenous of all beasts; especially the she-wolf, when she hath a litter: and eats the very earth when she hath no other prey, saith Isiodore. These mystical wolves rob the Ministers, & take away the portion of their meat, as Melzar did from Daniel, though against our wills; and force us to live with pulse & water-gruell. They love to have the Priest look through a Lattice; & would be loath, all his means should keep his house from Dilapidations. The main policy & piety of many, that would seem to be most religious & pure, consists in plotting and parlying how to lessen the Clergymans estate. They grudge not the Merchants wealth, nor envy the ditation of Lawyers, nor hinder the enriching of Physicians. These occupations provide for their bellies, their bodies, their estates. But (as if all were more precious then their souls) their whole labor is to devour the Ministers due, and to beggar him. I could tell them what Paul saith, If we have sown to you spiritual thing, is it a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things? but these have no faith in the Scriptures. They are very hot for the Gospel, they love the Gospel: who but they? Not because they believe it, but because they feel it: the wealth, peace, liberty that ariseth by it.

To cozen the Ministers of their tithes in private; or to devour them in public, and to justify it when they have done, and to have the wrested law taking their parts. (But alas! how should it be otherwise, when it is both Judges and Iurors own case too often!) to laugh at the poor Vicar, that is glad to feed on crusts, and to spin out 20. marks a year into a thread as long as his life; whiles the woe...fe innes a Crop worth three hundred pound per annum: this is a prey somewhat answerable to the voracity of their throats. Let every mā, of what profession soever, necessary or superfluous; be he a member or scabbe of the Common wealth, live: so the Priest be poor, they care not.

Aristotle saith, that when wolves go out of their dens to prey; they first sharpen and whet their teeth with Origanum, or wild Margerom. Before these wolves speak in public, or confer in private, theyedge their tongues against the Clergy: and like the merciless Spaniards to the Indians, they will set them a great deal of work, and but a little meat. Let them preach their hearts out: for they will see their hearts out, ere they restore them ought of their own.

Go to thou wolf: put that thou hast robbed the Minister of into the Inventory of thy goods: it shall be gravel in thy throat, hooks in the bellies of thy posterity, and ingender destruction to all the rest. Aristotle saith, that the wool of that sheep which was devoured by a wolf, infecteth and annoyeth the wearer. So the goods stolen from the Minister, though never so closely, is an infectious contagion, and a devouring pestilence to thy body, to thy state, to thy conscience; and will bring all thou hast to confusion. The world says now, Alas poor Lamb: It shall say one day, Alas poor Wolf; how art thou caught in the snares of Hell! Mean time they lie in the bosom of the Church; as that disease in the breast, called the Cancer, vulgarly the wolf: devouring our very flesh, if we will not pacify and satisfy them with our substance.

4. For Subtlety. The Fox is admired for craft: but he hath not stolen all from the woe...fe. It is observed of wolves, that when they go to the fold for prey, they will be sure to advantage themselves of the wind. And Solinus reports of them, that they hide themselves in bushes $\langle \diamond \rangle$ thickets, for the more sudden and guileful preying upon Goats and sheep. These Lycanthropi in our times do more hurt by their subtlety, then by their violence. More is to be feared their pax, quam fax: malitia, quam militia. Beware of them which come to you in sheepescloathing, but inwardly are ravening wolves.

They have outsides of Christianity, but insides of rapine. Intus, linum subtilitatis, extra lanam simplicitatisdemonstrant. Saith Tertullian. Quaenam sunt istae pelles ouium, nisi Christiani nominis extrinsecus superficies?

Hic dolus est magnus, iupus est qui creditor agnus. If you take a wolf in a lamb-skin, hang him up, for he's the worst of the generation.

You will ask how we should know them. A wolf is discerned from a sheep, by his howling, and by his claws; tanquam ex vngue leonem. For the howling of these wolves; you shall hear them barking at the Moon, railing, reviling, swearing, blaspheming, abusing, slandering: for this is a woluish language. For their claws. Mat. 7, 16. By their fruites you shall know them. Etsi non ex omnibus fructibus, tamen ex aliquibus cognoscetis eos.

Their woluish nature will burst forth to their own shame, & the abhorring of all men. Thus saith Melancthon. Ex malo dogmate, et ma...is moribus dignoscētur. You see the nature of these wolves. O that they would consider it, that have power to menage thē: that they would protect the lambes; and as we have detected their enemies, so punish them. Muzzle the wolves, that they may not devour the flocks: give them their chain and their clog; bind them to the good behavior toward the Minister; and restrain their violences. Wolves fly him that is anointed with the oil of Lions. If Magistrates would use that sword, which the Lyon, the King hath put into their hands, to God's glory, the wolves would be in more fear and quiet.

Let him that hath Episcopal Jurisdiction consider what S. Bernard writes to Eugenius: that it is his office, Magis domare lupos, quàm dominari ouibus. And as they say, the Subject of the Canon law is, Homo dirigibilis in Deum, et in bonum commune: so that Court, which is called Forum spiritual, should specially consider the public tranquility of these Lambes, & to enervate the furious strength of wolves.

Let them that are deputed Superuisors of Parishes, Church-wardens; remember that nothing in the world is more spiritual, tender, and delicate, then the conscience of a man: and nothing binds the conscience more strongly then an oath. Come ye not therefore with Omne been, when there are so many wolves among you. If you favor the wolves, you give shrewd suspicion, that you are wolves yourselves. Is there nothing for you to present? God's house, God's day is neglected: the Temples vnrepaired, and vnrepaired too: neither adorned, nor frequented. Adultery breaks forth into smoke, fame, infamy. Drunkenness cannot find the way to the Church, so readily as to the Alehouse: and when it comes to the Temple, takes a nap just the length of the Sermon. And yet Omnia been still. Let me say; Security and Partiality are often the Church-wardens: Conniuence, and willful Ignorance the Sidemen. You will say, I take for the profit of the Commissary. I answer in the face and fear of God; I speak not to benefit his Office, but to discharge my own office.

When all is done, and yet all undone still, the *lamb*s must be patient, though in medio luporū. God will not suffer our labors to pass unrewarded. Emittuntur, non amittuntur agni. When we have finished our course, there is laid up for us a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge shall give us at the last day. Aristotle in his Ethics affirms virtue to be only Bonum laudabile, making 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 to be the adjunct thereof: but his Felicity to be Bonum honorabile; and gives for the adjunct 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, making it the most honorable thing in the world. But God's reward to his servants surmounts all Ethicke or Ethnicke happiness: bestowing a Kingdom upon his Lambes on the right hand; while the wolves and Goats on the left be sent away to eternal malediction. Now the Lamb of God make us Lambes, and give us the reward of Lambes, his everlasting comforts.

Amen.

Revel. 15. 2. 3.

I saw as it were a Sea of Glass, mingled with fire; and they, that had gotten the victory over the Beast, and over his Image, and over his Mark, and over the number of his name, stand on the Sea of glass, having the Harps of GOD.

And they sing the Song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb, saying; Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty, just and true are thy ways, thou King of Saints.

LONDON, Printed by William Iaggard, 1615.

TO THE TRULY-Religious M. Crashaw, M. Milward, M. Dauyes, M. Heling, with other worthy Citizens, my very good Friends.

*GE*ntlemen, Because you have just occasion in your callings to deal often with Merchandise, I have been bold to call you a little from your Temporal, to a Spiritual Traffique: and have sent you a Christian Nauigatour, bound for the Holy Land; who without question will give you some relations of his Trauells, worthy two hours perusing. You shall find a whole Sea sailed through in a short time; and that a large Sea, not a foot less then the World. You will say, the description lies in a little volume: Why, you have seen the whole world narrow'd up into a small Map. They that have been said, after many years, at last to compass it, have not described all coasts and corners of it. Even their silence hath given succeeding generations hope to find out new Lands; and you know, they have found them. You cannot expect more of two hours discovery, then of seven years. I leave many things to be descried by others: yet dare promise this, that I have given you some necessary directions for your happiest voyage. Ouer this glassy Sea you must sails, you are now sailing. Truth be your Card, & the Holy Ghost your Pilot. Your Course being well directed, you cannot possibly make a happier journey. The Haven is before your eyes, where your Savior sits with the hand of mercy wafting you to him. You cannot be Sea-sick, but he will comfort, and restore you. If the Tempest comes, call on him with Peter, Lord save us; and he will rebuke the winds and the Seas; they shall not hurt you. Storm and tempest, winds and waters obey his voice. What Rocks, Gulfes, Swallows, and the danger (worse then that is called the Terror of the Exchange, the Pirate; one plague which the Devil hath added to the Sea, more then Nature gave it) of that great Leviathan, Satan; and other perils that may endanger you, are marked out. Decline them so well as you may; and consider what Providence guides your course: this Sea is Before God's Throne. Keep you the Cape of good Hope in your eye: and what ever becomes of this weak Vessel, your Body; make sure to save the Passenger, your Soul, in the day of the Lord Jesus. What is here directed you, shall be faithfully prayed for, by him

That unfeignedly desires your Salvation, Tho: Adams.

Revel. Chap. 4. ver. 6.

Before the Throne there was a Sea of Glass like unto Crystal.

I Have chosen a member of the Epistle appointed by our Church to be read in the celebration of this Feast to the most Sacred Trinity. There is One sitting on the Throne, which is God the Father: on his right hand the Lamb which was slain, only worthy to vnseal the Book, which is God the Son: and seven Lamps of fire burning before the Throne, the seven-fold Spirit, which is God the Holy Ghost. Vnus potentialiter, trinus personaliter. Which blessed Trinity in Unity, and Unity in Trinity inspire me to speak, and you to hear. Amen. Before the Throne &c.

The Revelation is a book of great depth; containing tot Sa...menta, quot verba; as many wonders as words, mysteries as sentences. There are other books of the Gospel; but Bullinger calls this Librum euangelicissimum, the most Gospel-like book, a book of most happy consolation: delivering those eventual comforts, which shall successively and successfully, accompany the Church unto the end of the world. It presents, as in a perspective glass, the lamb of God guarding, and regarding his Saints: & giving them triumphant victory over all his and their enemies. The writings of S. John, as I have read it observed, are of three sortes. He teacheth in his Gospel especially Faith; in his Epistles love; hope in his Revelation.

This last (as of great consolation, so) is of great difficulty. There is Manna in the Ark, but who shall open it to us? Within the Sanctum Sanctorum there is the Mercy-seat; but who shall draw the Curtain for us, pull away the veil? Our Savior lies here; (not dead, but living) but who shall roll away the stone for us; open a passage to our understanding? The impediment is not in Obiecto percipiendo, but in Organo percipiendi; not in the object to be seen, but in our organ or instrument of seeing it: not in the Sun, but in the dim thickness of our sight. God must say unto us, as the man of God spake to Eli in the name of Jehovah. 1. Sam. 2. Reuelando reuelauit &c. I have plainly appeared unto the house of thy father.

For my own part, I purpose not to plunge to the depth with the Elephant; but to wade with the lamb in the shallows: not to be over-venturous in the Apocalypse, as if I could reveal the Revelation: but briefly to report what expositions others have given of this branch: and then gather some fruit from it, for our own instruction and comfort. Being bold to say with S. Augustine, whosoever hears me, vbi pariter certus est, pergat mecum; vbi pariterhasitat, quarat mecum; vbi errorem suum cognoscit, redeat ad me: vbi meum, reuocet me. If he be certain with me, let him go on with me: if he doubt with me, let him seek with me: if he find out his own error, let him come unto me: if mine, let him recall me.

With purpose of avoiding prolixity, I have limited myself to this member of the 6. ver. And before the Throne there was a sea of glass like unto Crystal. I find hereof seven several expositions. I will lightly touch them, and present them only to your view; then build upon the soundest.

1. Some expound this glassy and Chrystal-like Sea, of Contemplatiue men: so Immanuel Sa. But I find this foundation so weak, that I dare not set any frame of discourse on it.

2. Some conceive it to be an abundant understanding of the Truth; a happy and excellent knowledge, given to the Saints; and that in a wonderful plenitude: so Ambrose. Per mare historica, per vitrum moralis, per Chrystallinum spiritualis intelligentia. By Sea is intended an historical knowledge; by glass a moral; a spiritual and supernatural by Crystal.

3. Some understand by this glassy Sea-like Crystal, the Fullness of all those gifts & graces, which the Church derives from Christ. In him dwells all fullness: yea so abundant is his oil of gladness, that it runs (as it were) over the verges of his human nature, unto the skirts of his clothing; plentifully blessing his whole Church. Thus it is conceived by Brightman. As if this mare vitreum were an anti-type to that mare fusum: spoken of 1. Kings 7. this glassy sea, to that molten sea. Among other admirable works of that heaven-inspired King. ver. 23. He made a molten sea, ten cubits from the one brim to the other: it was round all about, and his height was five cubits: and a line of thirty cubits did compass it round about, &c. It contained twothousand Baths. The end why it was made, and use for which it served, you shall find, 2. Chron. 4. The sea was for the Priests to wash in. Now this might well seem to prefigure some great plenitude. For otherwise, for Aaron and his sons to wash in, Exiguus aliquis vrceolus vel guttulus suffecisset: some cruet, bason, or laver might sufficiently have served.

4. Some intend this glassy sea, like to Crystal, to signify Coelum Chrystallinum, the Crystalline heaven: which they affirm to be next under that heaven of heavens, where the eternal God keeps his Court, and sits in his Throne. And somewhat to hearten the probability of this opinion; it is said here, this Sea is before the Throne.

5. Some expositions give this sea for the Gospel. And their opinion is probably deduced from the two attributes, Glassy and Crystalline.

1. The first expresseth perlucidam materiem, a bright and clear matter. Which sets a difference betwixt that legal, and this Evangelical Sea. That was ex aere constatum, which is densa et opaca materies: of molten brass, which was a thick, duskish, and shaddowy matter; not penetrable to the sight. This is mare vttreum, a Sea of glass; more clear, perspicable, and transparent. That was a Sea of Brasse, this of Glass. In which disparity this latter far transcends the former. So that if David said, Psal. 84. How amiable are thy Tabernacles, oh Lord of Hosts! My soul longeth, yea even fainteth for the Courts of the Lord: speaking but of that Legal Sanctuary; which was adorned with those Levitical Ordinances, and Typicall Sacrifices: How much more cause have we to rejoice with Peter & those two brethren, Matthew 17. to see Jesus Christ transfigured in the Gospel: his face shining as the Sun, and his raiment white as the light? Being not come to the Mount of terror, full of blackness, and darkness, and tempest; whereat even Moses himself did exceedingly fear and quake. But unto Mount Zion, unto the City of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of Angels. To the general assembly and Church of the first borne, which are written in heaven, &c. The greater glory gives •...s the greater joy. For, saith Saint Paul sweetly, If the ministration of condemnation be glory, much more doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory. They saw (Christum velatum, we reuelatum) Christ shadowed in the law, we see him manifested in the Gospel. Great, without controversy, is the mystery of godliness: God manifested in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, &c. They saw per fenestram, we sine medio: they darkly through the windows, we without interposition of any cloud. Great then is the difference between that figurative molten sea of brass, and this bright glassy sea of the Gospel.

This Glass lively represents to us our selves, and our Savior. Our selves wicked and wretched, damnatos priusquam natos, condemned before we were borne: sinful, sorrowful: cast down by our own fault, but never restore-able by our own strength: without grace, without Christ, without hope, without God in the world. Our Savior descending from heaven to suffer for us; ascending to heaven to provide for us: discharging us from hell by his sufferings, and interressing us to heaven by his righteousness. Oh look in this blessed Glass, and Behold the Lamb of God taking away the sin of the world. Look in it again, and behold all the spots and blemishes in your own consciences: as you would discover to your eye any blot on your face, by beholding it reflected in a material glass. See, contemplate, admire, meditate your own misery, and your Saviors mercy, in this Glass presented.

2. Crystalline is the other attribute: which is not idem significans, but plenioris, nec non planioris virtutis: not signifying the same thing, but of a fuller and plainer virtue, or demonstration. Chrystallum est quasi expers color is, accedens proxime ad puritatem aëris. Crystal is described to be (as it were void of color, as coming next to the simple purity of the air. Now as the other attribute takes from the Gospel all obscurity: so this takes from it all impurity. There is no human inventions, carnal traditions, or will-worship mixed with this Sea: it is pure as Crystal. Abundant plagues shall be added to him, that shall add to this Book: and his part shall be taken away out of the book of life, that shall sacrilegiously take ought from it.

Let me say: God beholds us through this Crystal, Jesus Christ; and sees nothing in us lean, lame, polluted, or ill-favored. What ever our own proper, and personal inclinations and iniquations have been, this tralucient Crystal, the merits and righteousness of our Savior presents us pure in the eyes of God. Through this Crystal Christ himself beholds his Church; and then saith: Thou art all fair, my Love, there is no spot in thee.

6. There is a sixth opinion. Some by this glassy and Crystal-sea, conceived to be meant Baptism. Prefigured by that Red sea. Exod. 14. To which red sea Paul alludes in the point of Baptism. 1. Cor. 10. I would not have you ignorant, how that all our fathers were under the Cloud, and all passed through the Sea. And were all baptized unto Moses in the Cloud, and in the Sea. Of this mind are Augustine. Tractat. 11. in John. Rupertus. Euthymius.

The accordance of the Type and Anti-type stands thus. As none of the children of Israel entered the terrestrial Canaan, but by passing the red Sea: so ordinarily, no Christian enters the celestial Canaan, but through this glassy Sea. The Lauer of regeneration is that Sea, wherein we must all wash. Verily, verily, I say unto thee: (He said so, that could tell; and he doubles his asseveration) except a man be borne of water and of the spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. Ordinarily, no man comes to heaven dry-shod: he must wade through this ford. The Minister must irrigare. 1 Cor. 3. John the Baptist must pour on water: and Christ must Christian us with the Holy Ghost and with fire. There must be a washed body, a cleansed conscience. This is that the Apostle calls pure water. Heb. 10. Let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with Pure water. So let us draw near: without this no daring to approach the Throne of grace. Through this Sea we must all sail, the Holy Ghost being our Pilot, the word of God our Compass; or how should we think to land at the haven of heaven!

7. Lastly others affirm, that by this glassy Sea is meant the World. So Bullinger, &c. This being the most general and most probable opinion, on it I purpose to build my subsequent discourse. A special reason to induce me, (as I think, the best light to understand the Scripture is taken from the Scripture: and as God best understands his own meaning, so he expounds it to us by conferring places difficult with semblable of more facility) I derive from Revel. 15. verse 2. I saw as it were a Sea of glass mingled with fire, and they that had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name, stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God. Where the Saints having passed the dangers of the glassy sea, all the perils and terrors of this brittle and slippery World: and now setting their triumphant feet on the shores of happiness; they sing a victorious song. Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty, just & true are thy ways, thou King of Saints. Praising God with harps and voices for their safe waftage over the sea of this World.

Now for further confirmation of this opinion, in the 3. verse, the exultation which they sing, is called the song of Moses the servant of God. So that it seems directly to answer in a sweet allusion, to the delivery of Israel from the Egyptians. At what time the divided waters of the red sea gave them way; standing up as a wall on their right hand, and a wall on their left; and that so long, till the little ones, and the women with child might pass over dry-shod. But at last returning to their old course, swallowed up their pursuers. Immediately hereon, Exodus 15. Moses and all Israel turning back to behold the Egyptians drowned in the sea, or floating on the waves, whiles themselves stood secure on dry land; they sung a song to the LORD. The Children of Israel having passed the red sea, sing a song to the LORD: the children of GOD having past the glassy sea sing a song also; and this latter song is called by the name of that first, even the song of Moses.

So that the Analogy stands thus. 1. The red sea was a type of this glassy sea, the World. 2. The old Israelites of the new and true Israelites, the Faithful. 3. The Egyptians of all wicked persecutors and enemies of God's Church. 4. Canaan the Land of promise, of Heaven the Land of purchase, which Christ bought for us at so great a price. Our Adversaries like theirs, our dangers like theirs, our waftage like theirs: but the Country we sails to, far transcends that earthly Canaan. That did but flowe with milk and honey for a time: this with infinite joy, and illimited glory forever. Against this construction it is objected.

1. This Sea is before the Throne: how can the World be so said? Answ. Properly: to show that all things in the World are not subject to fortune, but governed by Him that sits on the Throne.

2. The world is rather thick and muddy: how can it be called Crystal? Answ. Fitly: not in regard of the own nature; for so it is polluted: but respectu Intuentis, in regard of God that beholds it: who sees all things done in it so clearly, as in Crystal.

The Allegory then gives the World 1. for a Sea. 2. for a Sea of glass. 3. Like to Crystal. 4. Lastly, it is before the Throne. Two of the circumstances concern the world in thesi, two in hypothesi. It is described taliter and totaliter: simply, and in reference. Simply, what it is in it self. In reference, what it is in respect of God. The world is

In regard of it self a	Sea.	A Sea, for Tempestuousness.
Sea of Glass.	A Sea of Glass, for Brittleness.
In regard of God	Like Crystal: for God's eye to see all things in it.
Before the Throne: subject to God's governance.

A Sea.

The World is not a material, but a Mystical Sea. Time was, that the whole world was a Sea. Gen. 7. The waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth, and all the high hills, that were under the whole Heaven, were covered. Fifteene Cubites upward did the waters prevail, and the Mountains were covered. As a Poet according with the Scripture:

Omnia Pontus erant, deerant quo{que} littora Ponto. All was a Sea, and that sea had no shores. The Deluge of sin is no less now, then was thē the deluge of Waters. The flood of wickedness brought that flood of vengeance. If their souls had not been first drowned, their bodies had not been overwhelmed. The same over-flowing of iniquity shall at last drown the world in fire.

The World may be very fitly compared to the Sea in many concurrences.

1. The Sea is an unquiet Element, a fuming & foaming beast, which none but the Makers hand can bridle. Math. 8. What manner of man is this, that euen the Winds and the Sea obey him? The world is in full measure as unruly. It is the Lord that stilleth the noise of the Seas, the roaring of their waves, and the tumult of the people. Where the Psalmist matcheth roaring waves, and roaring men: the raging of the Sea with the madness of the world. And yet God is able to still them both. The Prophet calls the Sea a raging creature, and therein yoakes it with the wicked. The wicked are like the troubled Sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt.

Vnà Eurus{que} Notus{que} ruunt, creber{que} procellis

Affricus, et vastos tollunt ad littora fluctus.

Yet the Lord gathereth the waters of the sea together as an heap: and layeth up the depth in store-houses. Hear God himself speak to this boisterous Element. Job. 38. Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further: and here shall thy proud waves be stayed: Let me say truly of God, what Pliny of Nature, in this Element. Hic ipsa se Natura vincit numerosis modis. God, who is marvelous in all his ways, wonderful in all his works; is in the Sea most wonderfully wonderful. It is called Aequor, quasi minime aequum: so (I think) the World mundus, quasi minime mundus. Sometime Fretum à fremitu; of a boisterous and troublesome nature. The World is full of molesting vexations, no less then the Sea.

1. Sometimes it swells with Pride, as the Sea with waves; which David saith, mount up to heaven. Behold that Babylonian Lucifer, saying, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God. I will ascend about the heights of the Clouds: I will be like the most High. Pride is haughty, and walks with a stretched out neck, and with an eleuated head: as if at every step it could knock out a star in heaven. Especially the proud man, like the Sea, swells if the Moon inclines, if his Mistress grace him.

2. Vaine glory is the wind, that raiseth up the billows of this Sea. The off spring of the revived world are erecting a turret, whose battlements were meant to threaten heaven. Did they it in an holy ambition of such neighbourhood? No: they loved not heaven so well. Did they it for security upon earth? Neither: for Ferunt summos fulgura montes; the nearer to heaven, the more subject to thunder, lightning, and those higher inflammations of heaven. Whereas Procul a love, procul a fulmine, was the old saying: Far from Jupiter, far from his thunder. Their purpose was only glory in this world. And as the Psalmist saith, that the wind raiseth the billows of the sea. He commandeth & raiseth the stormy wind: which lifteth up the waves thereof. So Ambition was the wind, that reared those waves and walls of pride.

3. The World like the sea, is blew with envy, liuid with malice. It is the nature of worldlings to over-vex themselves at the successful fortunes of others. God must do nothing for another man, but his evil eye thinks himself wronged. He repines at that shower, which falls not on his own ground. The pretions balms distill'd from heaven on neighbors break the malicious man's head. He hath in him no honesty, but especially wants an honest eye. He wounds himself to see others healed. Neither are the blows, he gives his own soul, transient flashes, or lashes that leave no impression behind them: but marks that he carries with him to his grave: a lean, macilent, affamished body; a soul self beaten black and blew.

4. Sometimes it boils with wrath: and herein the world and the sea are very semblable. A mad & impatient element it is; how unfit to figure man! Ye... such is his indignation; if in the rage and fury of the sea there be not more mercy.

There is a time when the sea ceaseth from her raging: but the turbulent perturbations of this passion in the world continue without remission or interruption. The angry man is compared to a Ship sent into the sea quae Daemonem habet gubernator...m; which hath the Devil for the Pilot. Ira mortalium debet esse mortalis. The anger of mortal man should be mortal, like himself. But we say of many, as Va...er. Max. of Sylla: It is a question, whether they or their anger die first: or whether death prevents them both together. If you look into this troubled Sea of anger, and desire to see the Image of a man: behold, you find fiery eyes, a faltring tongue, gnashing teeth, a heart boiling in brine, and drying up the moisture of the flesh; till there be scarce any part left of his right composition. The tumultuous rage of the world so reekes with these passions, that the company of those men is as ominous and full of evil bodings, as the foaming Sea.

5. The Sea is not more deep then the World. A bottomless subtlety is in men's hearts, and an honest man wants a plummet to sound it. Pollicy and Piety have parted company; and it is to be feared, they will hardly ever meet again. He is counted a shallow fellow, that is, as the Scripture commends Jacob, a plain man, dwelling in tents. New devices, tricks, plots, and stratagems are only in request. Do you not know the reason hereof? The world is a Sea; and in this Sea is plain-dealing drowned.

6. There is foaming luxury in this Sea: a corrupt and stinking froth, which the world casts up. The steam of lust in this mare mortuum fumes perpetually; poisons the air we breathe; and like a thick fog, riseth up to heaven, as if it would exhale vengeance from above the clouds. This spumy foam is on the surface of the world, and runs like a white leprosy over the body of it. Commend the world, ye affecters and affected of it: there is a foam that spoils the beauty. Praise it no further then Naaman was, 2. King. 5. He was Captain of the host of the King of Syria, a great man with hismaister, and honorable, because the Lord by him had given deliverance to Syria: He was also a mighty man in valor, but he was a Leaper. There is a blur in the end of the Encomium: a blank in the Catastrophe: a prickle under the rose. But he was a leaper. This veruntamen mars all. The world you say, is spaciosus, speciosus; beautiful, bountiful; rich, delightful: But it is leprous. There is a Sed to it: a filthy some that defiles it.

7. The world, as the Sea, is a swallowing Gulf. It devours more then the Sea of Rome: yea, and will devour that to at last. It swallows those that swallow it: and will triumph one day with insultation over the hugest Cormorants, whose gorges have been long ingurgitated with the world; In visceribus meis sunt: They are all in my bowels. The Gentleman hath swallowed many a poor man: the Merchant swallows the Gentleman: & at last this Sea swallows the Merchant. There are four great deuourers in the world, Luxury, Pride, Gluttony, Covetousness. The Prophet I...l speaks of four horrible destroyers. That which the Palmer wormehath left, hath the Locust eaten: that which the Locust hath left, hath the Canker-worm eaten: and that which the Canker-worm hath left, hath the Caterpillar eaten. The Palmer is Luxury: the Locust Pride: the Canker Gluttony: and you all know that the Caterpillar is Covetousness. Luxury, like the Palmer, swallows much in the world: that which luxury leaves unspent, Pride the locust devours: the scraps of Pride, the Canker Gluttony eats, and the fragments of all the former, the Caterpillar Covetousness soon dispatcheth. These be the worlds four widethroated Swallowers.

These circumstances have demonstrated (the first instance of this comparison) the tumultuous turbulency of the world. There be many other resemblances of it to the Sea.

2. Mare amarum. The Sea is bitter, and therefore called the sea. A quo dominatio, denominatio. The waters thereof are also salt and brinish. Al demonstrates the world to have an unsavory relish. So it hath truly; whether we respect the works or the pleasures of it.

The works of this sea are the waters of Marah. Exod. 15. If we be true Israelites, when we come to the waters of this Marah, we cannot drink of the waters of Marah; for they are bitter. The works of the world have an unsavory relish. Would you know what they are? Ask S. John. All that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. Haec tria pro trino Numine mundus habet. Ask S. Paul. Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciuiousnesse, Idolatry, witch craft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, enuyings, murders, drunkenness, reuellings: These opera tenebrarum are bitter works: branches springing from that root, which beareth gall and wormwood. Deut. 29. Sour and wild grapes which the soul of God abhorreth. As the good Simon told the bad Simon. Act. 8. Thou art in the gall of bitterness, and bond of iniquity.

Nay even the delights of the world are bitter, sour, and unsavory. For if medio de fonte lepôrum, there hap not surgere amari aliquid; yet knowest thou not, it will be bitterness in the end? Rejoice, oh young man, in thy youth, & let thy heart cheare thee, &c. But know thou, that for all these things, God will bring thee into judgment. It may be honey in the Palate, it is gal in the bowels. Job. 20. Though wickedness be sweet in his mouth, though he hide it under his tongue: Though he spare it, and forsake it not, but keep it still within his mouth. Yet his meat in his bowels is turned, it is the gall of Asps within him. He that swims in a full sea of riches, and is borne up with whole floods of delights, is but like a Sumpter-horse, that hath carried the Trunkes all day, and at night his treasure is taken from him, and himself turned into a foul stable; perhaps with a galled back. The rich worldling is but a hir'd Porter, that carries a great load of wealth on his weary back all his day, till he groan under it: at night, when the Sun of his life sets, it is taken from him; and he is turned into a foul stable, a squalid grave: perchance with a galled shoulder, a raw and macerated conscience.

Say, the delights of this world were tollerably sweet; yet evē this makes them bitter, that the sweetest joys of eternity are lost by over-loving them. There was a Roman, that in his will bequeathed a Legacy of a hundred Crowns to the greatest fool. The Executors inquiring in the City for such a one, were directed to a Nobleman, that having left his own fair revenues, Mannors & manners, became a Hog-heard. All men consented, that he was the greatest fool. If such a Legacy were now given, the Heirs need not trouble themselves in scrutiny: there be fools enough to be found everywhere: even so many, as there be worldlings: that refusing the honors of heaven, and the riches of glory, turn Hog-keepers, nay rather Hogs; rooting in the earth, and eating husks.

But how bitter, saltish, and unsavory soever the Sea is, yet the Fishes that swim in it, exceedingly like it. The World is not so distasteful to the heavenly palate, as it is sweet to the wicked. Who have learned, though with that woe and curse. Esa. 5. To call good evil, and evil good; bitter sweet, and sweete bitter. They strip themselves to adorn it, as the Israelites did for the Golden Calf; and so adorned, adore it with devoted hearts. It is their Baal, their Idol, their God. Alas! it is no God; more like, they will find it a Devil. M. Fox in his Martyrologie hath a story of the men of Cockeram in Lancashire. By a threatening command from Bon•...r, they were charged to set up a Rood in their church: accordingly they compounded with a Carver to make it. Being made, and erected, it seems it was not so beautiful as they desired it; but with the harsh visage thereof scared their children. (And what should a R•...od serve for, but to please children and fools?) Hereupon they refused to pay the Carver. The Carver complains to the Justice. The Justice well examining and understanding the matter, answers the Townsmen. Go to, pay the workman; pay him: and get you home, and mark your Roode better. If it be not well-favored enough to make a God of; it is but clapping a pair of horns on it, and it will serve to make an excellent Devil. So add but your superstitious dotage, covetous oppressions, and racking extortions to the World, whereby you gore poor men's sides, and let out their heart-bloods: and though it be no God to comfort, you shall find it Devil enough to confound. The world then is extremely bitter in digestion, what ever it be at the first relish.

Well yet, as salt and bitter as this Ocean the world is, there is some good wrought out of this ill. That supreme and infinite goodness deswades his Children from affecting it, by their experienced tartnesse of it. So the Nurse embitters the dugge, when she would wean the Infant. How easily had Solomon been drowned in this Sea, had he not perceived the distastfulness? when his understanding & sense concludes, All is vexations his affections must needs begin to abhor it. God's lets his look into the world, as some go to Sea, to be Sea-sick: that finding by experience, what they would not credit by relation, they may loath this troublesome world, and long to be in the Land of Promise. He that once thoroughly feels the turbulency of the Sea, will love the •...ry land, the better whiles he lives. Our better spiritual health is not seldom wrought, by being first Sea-sick, disquieted with the worlds vexations. Salt water hath sometimes done as much good as sweet: hard things, as soft: as stones, as well as cotten, are good casting for a hawk. The crudities of sin in David's soul were vomited up by a draught of this bitter water. That profuse Son would have been a longer stranger to his Fathers house; if the World had not put him to a Hogs diet. Peter no sooner sees the billow, but he ejaculates to Christ, a short but substantial prayer, Lord, save me.

For this cause is the world made to us so full of afflictions. Christ promiseth to give a reward, but not to take away persecutions. Blessed are they, which are persecuted for righteousness sake: for theirs is the Kingdom of heaven. He doth not subtract all suffering, but adds a recompense, God doth so mingle, and compound, and make them both of one indifferency and relish: that we can scarce distinguish which is the meat, and which the sauce; both together norishing our spiritual health. You see the alike distastfulness of the world and sea. This is the second resemblance.

3. The sea doth cast forth her dead fishes; as if it labourd to purge it self of that which annoys it: giving only contentful solace and nutriment to those that naturally live in it. So does the world; cōtending to spew out those that are dead to it. 1. Cor. 4. We are made as the filth of the world, & the off-scouring of all things unto this day. No marvel if she pukes when we lie on her stomach. A body inured to poisons, grows sick & queasy at the receipt of wholesome nourishment. John. 15. If ye were of the world, the world would love his own. But because you are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hates you. Not a piece of the world, but all the world. Math. 10. You shall be hated of all men for my name sake.

The godly are indeed the very health of the world. The Family thrives the better, that Joseph but serves in. The City is forborne so long as Lot is in it. The whole world stands for the Elects sake. And if their number were accomplished, it should be delivered to the fire. Yet: oh strange! Elijah is said to trouble Israel: and the Apostles are thrust out of Cities for turbulent fellows. But saith Ambros. Turbatur illa nauis, in qua Judas fuit. The Ship was troubled wherein Judas was. Christ was in a Ship with the other Apostles, without Judas: behold the winds are still, the sea is calm, the Ship safe. Christ was in a Ship with Judas amongst the rest, and Turbatur illa nauis: the wind blusters, the waves roar, and a tempest endangers the vessel to ruin.

Benefit multis ex societate boni. One goodman doth much good to many. He is not only as manacles to the hands of God, to hold them from the defulmination of judgments; but is also a happy prevention of sin. He keeps God from being angry: he calms him, when he is angry. A godly man is like David's Harp; he chaseth away the evil spirit from the company: and he doth (as it were) conjure the Devil. For in his presence, (as if he could work miracles) Impudence grows ashamed, ribaldry appears chaste, drunkenness is sober, blasphemers have their lips sealed up, and the mouth of all wickedness is stopped. This good comes by the good.

Yet because they are dead to the world, it casts them out. So the Gergesites did cast Christ out of their borders. Math. 8. So the Pharisees did cast the Conuert that was born blind, out of their Synagogue. John. 9. So the Antiochians did cast Paul and Barnabas out of their coasts. Act. 12. Like Confectioners, that throw away the juice of the Orenges, and preserve only the rindes: or as certain Chymists, that cast all good extractions to the ground, and only make much of the poison. But if you will not be picked up of the world, you must adhere close to it, and with alimantal congruence please his stomach. Will you go to the Court? you must be proud, or you shall be despised. Will you to the city? you must be subtle, or you shall be cheated. Will you to the Country? you must partake of their ignorant and blind dotage, and join in their vicious customs, or you shall be rejected. If you live in the world, and not as the world, this Sea will spew you up, as too holy for their company. But let them. For God forbid that I should glory, save in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world.

4. The Sea is no place to continue in. No man sails there to sails there: but as he propounds to his purpose a voyage, so to his hopes a return. You hold him a prisoner, that is shut up in close walls; the door of egress barred against him. He is no less a Prisoner, (though his Iaile be as large as the Sea) that must not set his foot on dry ground. The banks and shores be his prison walls: & although he hath room enough for his body, he is narrow'd up in his desires. He finds bondage in liberty: the one half of the earth is but his prison; and he would change his walk for some little Island.

The world in like sort, is no place to dwell in forever. Self-flattering fools, that so esteem it. Psal. 49. Their inward thought is, that their houses shall continue forever, and their dwelling places to all generations: therefore they call their lands after their own names. As if the Sea were for mansion, not for transition. It was a glorious piece of the world, which ravished Peter desired to build Tabernacles on: Math. 17. yet it was perishable earth; and it might not be granted. Heaven only hath mansions. John. 14. (In my Fathers house there are many mansions; all the world else is but of tottering Tabernacles.) And immobile regnum. Heb. 12. a kingdom that cannot be shaken; when all the kingdoms and Principalities of the earth shall be overturned. This world then only is for waftage.

There is one Sea to all men common, but a different home. We are all in this world either Strangers or Straglers. The godly are strangers. 1. Pet. 2. Dearely beloved, I beseech you as Pilgrims and strangers, abstain from fleshly lusts which fight against the soul. So that aged Patriarch acknowledged to the Egyptian King. Few and evil have the dates of thy servant been in his Pilgrimage. In that true golden legend of the Saints, it is said of them. They confessed that they were strangers & Pilgrims on the earth. The wicked are straglers too; and howsoever conentur figere pedes, and to take their portion in this life. Psal. 17. yet they must, with Judas, to their own home. We grow upward, they go forward, to heaven or hell, every man to his own place. Let the rich man promise his soul a Requiem here. Lu. 12. 20. Let the Atheistical Cardinal of Bourbon prefer his part in Paris to his part in Paradise: yet the sea is not to be dwelt on: It is but for waftage, not for perpetuity of habitation. This is the fourth Resemblance.

5. The Sea is full of dangers. To discuss the perils of the sea belongs rather to the capacity of a Mariner, then of a Divine. I will only apprehend so much, as may serve to exemplise this dangerous world.

1. The Sea is one of those fearful elements, wherein there is no mercy. Oh that the world had but so much mercy, as might exempt and discharge it of this comparison. But if we take the world for the wicked of the world, we read that the very mercies of the wicked are cruel.

2. There be Pirates in the Sea. Alas! but a handful to that huge army of them in the world. Take a short view of them from our most excellent Postillist. Fury fights against us, like a mad Turk. Fornication, like a treacherous Joab; in kisses, it kills. Drunkenness is the master-gunner, that gives fire to all the rest. Gluttony may stand for a Corporal; Avarice for a Pioner; Idleness for a Gentleman of a company. Pride must be C...ptaine.

But the Arch. Pirate of all is the Devil; that huge Leviathan, that takes his pleasure in this sea. Psa. 104. And his pastime is, to sink the fraught of those Merchants, that are laded with holy traffic for heaven. Canst thou draw out this Leviathan with an hooke? or his tongue with a cord which thou letst down? Canst thou put a hook into his nose, or bore his iaw th...rough with a thorn? Historians speak of a fish that is a special, & oft-prevailing enemy to this Whale; called by some Vihuella, or the Sword-fish. The most powerful thing to overcome this mystical Leviathan, is the sword of the Spirit: which to be seconded with the temporal sword of the Magistrate is of singular purpose. Whiles neither of these swords are drawn against this Pirate, & his malignant rabble; no marvel, if they make such massacres on the sea of this world. Let the red Dragon alone, & whilst himself comes tumbling down from heauē, he will draw down many stars with his tail.

3. There be Rocks in the sea; which if a skillful Pilote avoid not warily, he may soon have his vessel dash'd in pieces. How many Ships have been thus cast away! How many Merchants hopes thus split? They call their vessels by many prosperous names: as the Success, the Good speed, the Triumph, the Safeguard; How vain doth one Rock prove all these titles! The Rocks of our Marine world are Persecutions and offenses: which lie as thick, as those fiery serpents in the wilderness, with their venomous and burning stings. Numb. 21. Christ's cause and Christ's cross go most commonly together: and who shall be sooner offended then his little ones? All that will live god...y in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution. As if it were a fatal kind of destiny to them, not to be evaded. Woevnto the world, because of offenses; saith He that is able to execute vengeance upon his adversaries. It must needs be that offenses come: but woe be to that man by whom the offense cometh. It were better for him, that with a Mil-stone hung about his neck, he were drowned in the depth of the material Sea: as his soul hath been already drowned in this mystical Sea of wickedness. Well, put the worst: if these Rocks do shatter us, if these pensecutions shall splitte the Bark of our life, yet this be our comfort: our death is not Mors but immortalitas: not a death, but an entrance to life incapable of dying. Rocks in the Sea undo many a Merchant; these Rocks eventually make us happy: and often we have just cause to take up that saying. Perieramus, nisi perijsemus; we had been undone, had we not been undone.

4. Besides Rocks, in the sea there be also gulfs. In the Sicilian sea there is Scylla, a great Rock: and Charybdis, a place of dangerous swallows: whereout was drawn that proverb. Incidit in Scyllam, cupiens vitare Charybdim. Mystically, in this world there are not only Rocks of persecutions, but gulfs and swallows of Errors and Heresies. Let us beware, lest avoiding the one, we be devoured of the other. There is a perilous Gulf in the Roman sea: (too too many of our nation have found it.) Dangerous swallows about Amsterdam. It is good to fly from the Gulf of superstition; but withal to avoid the swallow of separation. It is ill turning either to the right hand or to the left: mediocrity is the safest way. When Opinion goes before us, it is a great question, whether Truth will follow us. Stragling Dinah's seldom return, but ravished home. Singularity in conceits concerning matters of Religion, are as perilous as to follow a plurality or multitude in evil customs. A man may perish as easily in the fair-color'd waters of heresy, as in the mud of iniquity. What matters it, whether thou be drowned in fair water or foul, so thou be drowned. Beware of these gulfs and swallows.

5. There be Straites in the sea of this world: those of Magellan or Giberaltare are less dangerous. The hard exigence of hatred, obloquy, exile, penury, misery: difficult Straites, which all sea. faring Christians must pass by to the Haven of bliss. Pirates that care not which way they direct their course, but only watch to rob and spoil, are not bound to these passages. So worldlings, that never aim or intend for heaven, but to ballace themselves with the wealth of the world, from whomsoever, good or bad: or howsoever, by fair means or foul, they attain it; may keep the broad Ocean, and have sea-room enough. For broad is the way of destruction, and many there be that keep it. But the godly are bound for the Coast, that lies upon the Cape of Bona Speranza, and they must of necessity pass through these Straights. Straite and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it. But if, like those Argo-nautae, we will sails for the Golden fleece of joy and happiness, we must be (militantes inter fluctus) content with hard Passages. It is our solid comfort, (as it was fabled of that Ship, that it was made a star in heaven) that we shall be one day, (inter syderatriumphantes) stars fixed in the right hand of God; and shining forever in glory. This is the fifth danger of our mystical sea; straights.

6. There be Sirens in the Sea of this world. Sirens? Hirens, as they are now called. Those in the material Sea are described to have in their upper parts the proportion or beauty of women: downwards they are squalid and pernicious. Virgo formosa superne, Decidit in turpem piscem. They inchant men with their voices: and with sweet songs labor sopire nautas, sopitos demergere, to lull the Mariners asleep, and sleeping to sink and drown them. What a number of these Sirens, Hirens, Cockatrices, Courteghians, in plain English Harlots swim amongst us, happy is it for him that hath only heard, and not been infected.

Their faces, and their voices promise joy and iollity; their effects are only to drown and shipwreck men's fortunes, their credits, their lives, their souls. A Book called Opus tripartitum speaks of the Storks; that if they catch one Stork leaving his own mate, and coupling with another, they all fall upon him, and spoil him of his feathers and life to. But as if this sin were grown a virtue by custom among us, there are not wanting, who knowing the judgment of God (that they which commit such things, are worthy of death) not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them. If in Authority subordinate to inferior Magistrates (the persuasion of my heart excuseth the higher powers; and the impartial proceedings of the truly Reverend and godly Prelates of this land testify it) there were not some connivance, (God forbid Patronizing) of these enormities for some sinister respects: the Sirens about our River of Thames should be (if not sent swimming to Graues-end, yet at least) taken in at Bridewell stairs.

Perhaps a poor man incontinent may smart for it; but how often dares an Apparitor knock at a Great-man's gate? If Lust comes under the rank of Honorable, or Worshipful, who dares tax it? But let as many as would be one Spirit with the Lord Jesus, hate to be one flesh with a Siren. It is recorded of Vlysses, that he stopped his ears to the incantations of these Sirens; and having put the rest under the hatches, bound himself to the Mast; to prevent the power of their tempting witch-crafts. Vlysses was held a wise man: sure then they are no less than fools, that prove and approve their charms. No man loves a Gally-pot for the paint, when he knows there is poison in it. I end in the Epigram of a moderne Poet.

Si renum cupis inco...mem seruare salutem,

Sirenum cantus effuge, sanus eris.

7. Another peril in this mystical Sea is the frequency of tempests. Some have tempestuous looks, as Laban. Gen. 31. Some tempestuous hands, as Samballat. Nehem. 4. to hinder the building of Jerusalem. Innumerable have tempestuous tongues, as Ishmael, Shimei, Rabshakeh. Such tempests have been often raised from the vapor of a malicious breath, that whole Kingdoms have been shaken with it. Master Fox mentioneth in his Book of Martyrs, that one in the street crying fire, fire; the whole assembly in S. Mary's in Oxford at one Mallery's Recantation, presumed it in the Church. Insomuch, that some labored at the doors, where through the crowd of many, not one could pass: some stuck in the windows: all imagined the very Church on fire, and that they felt the very molten lead drop on their heads: whereas all was but a false fire; there was no such matter. In like sort scandalous slanders, and invective contumelies begin at a little breach, one calumnious tongue; and get such strength, like mutiners which marching forward, that the world soon riseth in an uproar. These are called by Ambrose, Procellae mundi. And what world-faring Christian hath scaped these storms? But says Epictetus. Si recte facis, quid eos vereris, qui non recte reprehendunt? If thou do rightly, why shouldst thou fear them that blame wrongfully? Do well, and be happy, though thou hear ill. This is another danger, Tempests.

8. There is yet a last peril in the Sea; which is the fish Remora. A fish... as it is described of no magnitude, about a cubit in length; yet for strength able to stay a Ship. It is recorded, that Gaius Caesar's Galley was stayed by this fish.

There are many Remora's in this world, that hinder the good speed of Christian endeavors. Would Herod hear and obey John Baptists preaching? He hath a Remora that hinders him, Herodias. Would Nicodemus fain come to Christ? Fear of the Jews is his Remora. Would Paul come to Thessalonica? The Devil is his Remora. We would have come to you once and again, but Satan hindered us. Yea even doth Christ Jesus purpose in his infinite mercy to suffer for us, and pre-acquaint his Apostles with it? Even Peter will be his Remora. Master favor thyselfe. This shall not be unto thee. Hath that forward young-man any good mind to follow Christ? The parting with his goods to the poor is his Remora. Would you have him that is rich follow poverty?

Such are our Remora's now; that hang upon our arms, like Lots wife, deswading our departure from Sodom. Are we invited to Christ's Supper, the Gospel? Some Oxen, or Farms, or a wives idleness, the pleasures of the flesh retards us. Some business of our own is a Remora to God's business. Are we called to speak in the Truths cause boldly? The awful presence of some great man is our Remora, we dare not. Doth our consciences prompt us to parle for the restoring of the Churches right? Our own Impropriations, and the easy gain of the tenth of our neighbors goods, are a Remora, we cannot. Are we exhorted in the name of JESUS CHRIST, for God's mercy to us, to show mercy to his; to feed the hungry, succor the weak, relieve the poor, & make us friends of our unrighteous Mammon by charity? Alas! the world, covetous desire of gain is our Remora; we must not. Tell the Covetous man, that he is not God's Treasurer, but his Steward; and blame him for perverting the end of his Factor-ship; there is a Devil plucks him by the sleeve, thirst of gain, God he confesseth his Master; but the world his Mistrisse. If you ask him, why he doth not in charitable deeds obey his Master; he answers, his Mistress will not let him.

Would the young man repent? his harlot steps forth, and like a Remora, stays his course. Let a Sermon touch a man's heart, and begin remorse in him, that he purpose reformation; good fellowship, like a Remora, stops him. Yea, let a man in an age, (for rare are the birds that drop such feathers) erect Hospitals: Piety and devotion shall meet with some Remora's, that would overthrow them. You hear the dangers of the sea of the world; the fifth circumstance of this Comparison.

6. In the sea there be 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , fishes that eat up fishes: so in the world 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , men that eat up men. Psal. 14. Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge? who eat up my people as they eat bread. Hab. 1. The wicked man devoureth the righteous. Thou makest men as the fishes of the Sea. The labors of the poor, even his whole heritage is worn upon the proud man's back, or swallowed down into his belly. He racks rents, wrings out fines, extorteth, inhaunceth, improueth, impouerisheth, oppresseth; till the poor Tenant, his wife, and children cry out for bread: & behold, all buys him scarce a suit of clothes; he eats and drinks it at one feast.

Oh the shrill cry of our Land for this sin, and the loud noise it makes in the ears of the Lord of Hosts! The Father is dead, that kept good hospitality in the Country: and the Gallant, his son must live in London; where if he want the least superfluity, that his proud heart desireth: (and how can he but want in the infinite pride of that City?) He cōmits all to a hard Steward: who must wrings the last drop of blood from the Tenants hearts; before the Land-Lord must want the least cup to his drunkenness, the least toy to his wardrobe.

If this be not to eat, swallow, devour men, blood and bones, then the fishes in the sea forbear it. Hear this ye oppressers! Bee merciful: you will one day be glad of mercy. The yellings of the poor in the Country, are as loud as your rorings in the City. The Cups you drink, are full of those tears, that drop from affamished eyes, though you perceive it not. You laugh, when they lament: you feast, when they fast: you devour them, that do your service. God will one day set these things in order before you.

7. The sea is full of Monsters. Innumerable, and almost incredible are the relations of Travelers in this punctual demonstration. As of Estaurus, a fish chewing the cudde like a beast: of the Manate, headed like an Ox: and of certain flying fishes, &c. And are there not in this world Men-monsters? I do not say of God's making, but of their own marring.

You would think it prodigious, to see a man with two faces. Alas: how many of these walk daily in our streets? They have one face for the Gospel, another for the mass-book: a brow of allegiance for the King, and a brow of apostasy of treason for the Pope; whensoever he shall call for it. You would think it a strange defect in nature, to see a man borne without a head: why there are innumerable of these head-less men among us: who like brute beasts, have no understanding, but are led by the precipitation of their feet; follow their own mad affections. Others redundantly have two tongues, dissemblers, hypocrites: the one to bless God, the other to curse man made after his Image. They have one to sing in a church, another to blaspheme and roar in a Tavern.

Some have their faces in their feet; whereas God (Os homini sublime dedit, caelum{que} tueri iussit) gave man an upright countenance, and framed him to look upwards; these look not to heaven whence they did drop, but to hell whether they will drop. Insatiable earth-scrappers, covetous wretches; that would dig to the Center to exhale riches. Others have swords in their lips, a strange kind of people, but common; railers and revilers: every word they speak, is a wounding gash to their neighbors. Weigh it seriously. Are not these monsters?

8 On the Sea men do not walk, but are borne in vessels; unless, like our Savior Christ, they could work miracles. In the world, men do not so much travel of themselves, as they are carried by the stream of their own concupiscence. So saith S. Chrysost. Hic homines non ambulat, sed feruntur; quia Diabolus cum delectatione compellit illos in mala. Here men do not walk, but are carried: for the Devil bears them upon his back: and whiles he labors them to hell, wind and tide are on his side. When he hath them in Profundis Abyssis, upon that bottomless depth, he strives to exonerate his shoulders, and doth what he can to let them fall & sink into the infernal lake. So Paul saith, that temptations and snares, foolish and hurtful lusts do (no less then) drown men in perdition. You think yourselves on dry and firm ground, ye presumptuous wantons; Alas! you are on the sea, an inconstant sea, Digitis a morte remoti Quatuor, aut septem, si sit latissima taeda.

Soone over-board. The winds will rise, the surges will beat, you will be ready to sink: cry faithfully, and in time with the Apostles. Lord save us, or we perish.

9. Lastly, the Sea is that great Cistern, that sends waters over all the earth: conueying it thorough the veins, the springs; till those dispersed waters become Rivers, & then those Rivers run back again into the Sea. This vast world scattereth abroad her riches; drives & derives them by certain passages, as by Conduit pipes unto many men. The rich man shall have many springs to feed him with wealth: the east & west winds shall blow him profit: industry, policy, fraud, luck shall contend to give his dition the addition of more wealth. At length when these springs have made a brook, and these brooks a river, this river runs again into the Sea. When the rich man hath sucked the world long, at last absorbetur a mundo, he is sucked up of the world. Whatsoever it gave him at many times, it takes away at once. War, exile, prison, displeasure of greatness, suits of law, death, empty that River in one moment, that was so many years a filling.

Mans wealth is like his life; long a breeding, soon extinct. Man is born into the world with much pain, nursed with much tenderness, kept in childhood with much care, in youth with much cost. All this time is spent in expectation. At last, being now (upon the point) a man, the prick of a sword kills him. Even so is our wealth piled, so spoiled: the world, like some politick Tyrant, suffering us to scrape together abundant riches, that it may surprise us and them at once.

Innumerable other relations would the World and the Sea afford us. I desire not to say all, but enough: and enough I have said, if the affections of any soul present shall hereby distaste the world, and grow heavenly. Oh, what is in this Sea worth our dotage! what not worthy our detestation! The sins of the world offend our God: the vanities hurt our selves: only the good blessings serve for our godly use, and to help us in our journey. But we know that we are of God, and the whole world lyeth in wickedness. Pray we, that this Sea infect us not; especially drown us not. Though we lose, like the Mariners in the prophecy of Jonah, our wares, our goods, our vessel, our liberties, yea our lives, let us keep our faith. It is the most dangerous shipwreck, that this naufragous world can give us, the shipwreck of faith. They write of the serpent, that he exposeth all his body to the blow of the smiter, that he may save his head. So lose we our riches, our houses, lands, liberties, lives: but keep we Faith in our Head, Jesus Christ.

Though we live in the world, let us not love the world, saith S. John. Not fashion our selves to it, saith S. Paul: hate the vices, the villainies, the vanities of it. Think it easier, for that to pervert thee, then for thee to convert that. Water will sooner quench fire, then fire can warm water. A little wormwood embitters a good deal of honey; but much honey cannot sweeten a little wormwood. Call we then on our God to preserve us, that the evil of the world infect us nor. Aristotle saith, if a man take a vessel of earth new and raw, close up the mouth thereof, throw it into the salt sea, letting it lie there a day or two; when he takes it up, he shall find fresh water in it. Though we be sowsd in this Ocean-world, yet if the Spirit of grace seal us up, the brinish waters of sin shall not enter us; but we shall be vessels of grace, here, hereafter of glory.

Amen.

THE Spiritual Navigator BOUND For the Holy Land.

Revel. Chap. 4. ver. 6.

Before the Throne there was a Sea of Glass like unto Crystal.

IF I have been somewhat long on the Sea, you will excuse me. It is a great and vaste Element to travel over in so short a time. Some Observations I have given you; that I might not cross the World without some fruit of my voyage. Only what I have spoken of the waters, let it not be drowned in the waters, as the proverb saith; not perish in your memories, without some fruit in your lives.

The next circumstance gives the world, not only for a Sea, but Mare vitreum, a Sea of glass. You see, I must carry you further on this Element, and yet at last leave many coasts vnvisited, much smotherd in silence. Let not all be via nauis, as the Wise man speaketh, the way of a Ship on the sea, leaving no track or print in your meditations.

This glassy attribute shall give us observable three properties in the world. 1. Colour. 2. Slipperiness. 3. Brittleness. As certainly as you find these qualities in Glass, expect them in the world.

Colour.

There is a Glassy color congruent to the Sea. So Virgil insinuates, describing the Nereades, certain marine Nymphs.

Milesia vellera Nymphae Carpebant Hyali saturo fucata color.

And not far remou'd.

Vitreis{que} sedilibus omnes

Obstupuere. Which is spoken, not in respect of the matter, but of the Colour, and perspicuity. So Ovid in an Epistle.

Est nitidus, vitreo{que} magis perlucidus amne, Fons sacer.

All the beauty of Glass consists in the Colour: and what in the world, that is of the world, is commendable, praeter Colorem, besides the Colour? A Cottage would serve to sleep in, as well as a sumptuous Palace, but for the color. Russets be as warm as silks, but for the glistening Colour. The Egyptian bondwoman give as much content, as Queen Vashti, but for the color. The beauty of the fairest woman is but skin-deep: which if nature denies, art helps them to lay on colors. And when they are most artificially complexion'd, they are but walking and speaking pictures. It is the color of gold, that bewitcheth the avarice: the colors of lewels, that make the Ladies proud. If you say, these are precious and comfortable in themselves: then feed on them; and try, if those metals can (without meat) keep your life and soul together.

The truth is: man's corporal eye sees nothing but color. It is the sole indefinite object of our sight, whither soever we direct it. We see but the lay-part of things with these opticke organs. It is the understanding, the souls interiour eye, that conceives and perceives the latent virtues. All that we outwardly behold, is but the fashion of the world: and S. Paul saith, The fashion of the world perisheth. The color fades, and the splendor of things is decayed. That if the world, like aged and wrinkled Helen, should contemplate her own face in a glass; she would wonder, that for her beauties sake Troy should be sack'd and burned: man's soul endanger'd to eternal fire.

Oh how is the splendor and glory of the world bated & empair'd since the original creation! The skye looks dusky: the Sun puts forth a drowsy head: as if he were no longer, as David once described him, like a Bride-groome coming out of his chāber, or a strong man rejoicing to run his race. The Moon looks pale, as if she were sick with age: and the stars do but twinkle; as if they were dim, and looked upon the earth with spectacles. The Colours of the Rain-bow are not so radiant: & the whole earth shows but like a garment often died, destitute of the native hew.

It is but color, that delights you, ye worldlings: Esau lusts for the pottage, because they look red: and the drunkard loves the wine, because it looks red, and sparkles in the cup. Prov. 23. Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth hiscolour in the cup, when it moveth it self aright. What babes are we to be taken with these colors, that only please the eye, or the sensual part of man, & harm the soul? like children, that play with Glass, till they cut their fingers.

Auicen saith, that glass among stones, is as a fool amongst men. For it takes all paint, and follows precious stones in color, not in virtue. So does this world give colors to her riches, as if there were some worth and virtue in them: till we are cosen'd of heavenly and substantial treasures by over prizing them. No matter (saith Isidore) is more apt to make mirrors, or to receive painting then Glass. So men de•...ke the world, as the Israelites did their Calf; and then superstitiously dote upon it, as Pygmalion on his carved Stone.

But can color satisfy? Is man's imaginatiue power so dull and thick, as to be thus pleased? Shall a man toil to dig a pit, and laboriously draw up the water; and then must he sit by, and not drink? or drink, and not have his thirst quenched? Yes. Thus do we long after earthly things, which obtained give us no full content: thus disregard spiritual and heavenly; whereof but once rafting, we go away highly satisfied. Say then with Bernard.

Oh bone Jesus, fons indeficiens,

Humana corda reficiens:

Ad te curro, te solum sitiens:

Tu mihi salus sufficiens.

Oh Jesus, fountain ever flowing,

Thy graces on man's soul bestowing:

To thee I run with thirsty heart,

And none shall want, though I have part.

For others it shall be said. Loe, this is the man that made not God his strength: but trusted in the abundances of his riches, and strengthened himself in his wickedness. But the faithful shall be like a green Olive-tree in the house of God; and of a fresher blee then Daniel; whom the mercy of God, wherein he trusts, waters forever and ever. The Colour of this glassy Sea vanisheth, like the beauty of a flower; and when it is wither'd, who shall revive it? Rub your eyes, and look on this world better: it hath but a surphul'd cheek, a color'd beauty; which God shall one day scour off with a flood of fire. Trust not this Glass for reflection; as if it could present you truly to your own judgments. It is but a false Glass, and will make you enamor'd both of yourselves and it: till at last, the Glass being broken, the Sea swallows you. Thus for the Colour.

2. Glass is a slippery met•...all: a man, that walks on it, had need be shod as the Germans, that slide upon Ioe. But go we never so steady on this glassy sea; even the just man falls seven times a day. How soon are we tripping in our most considerate pace! David said, he would take heed to his ways; but how soon did his foot slide upon this glass! Psal. 94. When I said, My foot slippeth, thy mercy, oh Lord, held me up. Let us all pray with him. Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my foot steps slip not. And if we have stood, let us magnify him in the next Psalm. Thou hast enlarged my steps under me; that my feet did not slip. For the wicked, how surely soever they think themselves fixed in the world: yet Psal. 73. they are are set in slippery places. They talk of strong and subtle Wrastlers: but the cunningst wrastler of all is the world: for whose heels hath not it tripp'd up! The wisest Solomon, the strōgest Sampson, have been fetchd up by this wrastler and measured their lengths on the ground. How dangerous then is it to run fast on this Sea, whereon men are scarce able to stand! No marvel, if you see them fall in troops, and lie in heaps: til with their weight they crack the Glass, and topple into the depth.

There you shall see a knot of Gallants laid along on this glass, that have run headlong at Pride. There a Corporation of Citizens, that have run at Riches. Here a rabble of Drunkards that ran apace to the Tavern: there a crew of cheaters, that posted as fast to Tyburne. Thus the Devil laughs to see men so wildly running after vanity; and this glassy s... so easily hurling up their heels. It is reported of the Irish, that they dig deep trenches in the ground, and pave the surface over with green turves: that their unsuspecting enemies may think it firm ground.

This World is the devils vaulty Sea, full of trenches and swallows: <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> which he pauses over with glass: the way seems smooth, but it is slippery: his intention is mischievous, vt lapsu grauiore ruamus, that we may have the surer and sorer fall. He that walks on this slippery glass had need of three helps. Circumspect eyes, sober feet, & a good staff in his hand.

1 He must keep his eyes in his head. Ephe. 5. See that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but aswise. Pliny writes of the Eagle, that when she would make the Stag her prey, she lights down between his horns, whence he cannot shake her: and with dust ready laid up in her feathers, she so filleth his eyes, that he blinded, breaks his own neck from some high cliffe or mountain. If the devil can blind a man's eyes with the dusts of vanities, he will easily fling him down on this slippery glass, and drown him in this dangerous Sea. Neither must our eyes only be careful to descry our way; but of sound and faithful discretion, not to be deluded with the spectacles, which this glassy sea presents us; so retarding our journey to heaven. Pliny reports, that when the Hunter hath stolen away the Tygresse whelps, he scatters in the way great mirrours of glass: wherein when the savage creature looks, she seeing her self presented, imagines there to be her young-ones: and whiles she is much troubled to deliver them, the Hunter scapes. If we stand gazing on the glassy mirrours of this world; fame, honor, beauty, wealth, wantonness: thinking we see therein presented those dear joys, we should seek for: behold, Satan in the mean time doth insensibly rob us of them. Let us look well about us: we walk upon Glass.

2. He must have sober feet: he had not need be drunken, that walks upon glass. If he be drunken with the vanities of this world, he may mistake himself, as that drunkard did; who seeing the resultant light of the stars shining in the water about him, thought he had been translated into heaven: and rapp'd in a great joy fell a wauing, as he imagined, in the air, till he fell into the water, not without peril of his life. He that is spiritually drunk, may in like sort imagine the stars to be fixed in this glassy Sea, which are indeed in heaven: and that the world can afford those true joys, which are only to be found above. I have heard of some coming out of a Tavern well lined with lycour, that seeing the shadows of the chimnies in the street, made by the Moon; have took them for great blocks, and down on their knees to climb and scramble over them. So worldlings, that are drunk but not with wine; enchanted with earthly vanities, think every shadow which is put in their way to heaven, a great block, and they dare not venture. Sober feet are necessarily required to our travel on this glassy Sea.

3 Lastly, and mostly: he that would walk steadfastly on this glassy Sea, had need of a good Staff to stay him. The best and surest, and that which will not let him fall; or if he do fall, will soon raise him, is that David speaketh of. <◇> . 23. God's Staff. Though I walkthrough the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy Staff, they comfort me: confortant; make me strong, bear and hold me up.

Egypt is but a broken reed; he that leans on it shall find the splinters running into his hand: and cursed is he that makes fl...sh his arm: but who leans faithfully on this Staff, shall never perish. Thus you have heard this glassy worlds Slipperinesse.

3. This Glass denotes brittleness. Proverb and experience justify this: As brittle as glass. A fit attribute to express the nature of worldly things: for glass is not more fragile. The world passeth away, and the lust thereof, saith S. John. Man himself is but brittle stuff, and he is the noblest part of the world. Man that is borne of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble. He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down, he flieth as a shadow, and continueth not.

Sic in non hominem vertitur omnis homo.

Let him have an ample portion in this life, and his belly be filled with God's hidden treasures. Let him be full of children, and leave the rest of his substance to his babes. Let him be happy in his Lands, in his children: in his success, and succession. Yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be: thou shalt diligently consider his place, and shalt not find it.

Glass, whiles it is melting hot and soft, is pliable to any form; but cold and hard, it is brittle. When God first made the world, it was malleable to his working hand; to his commanding word: for he spake the word, & things were created. The next time he toucheth it, it shall br...ke to pieces, like a pot-sheard. The heavens shall pass away with a great noise, the Elements shall melt with fervent heat, and the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burnt up. Isidore mentions one, that came to Tyberius the Emperor with a vial of glass in his hand: and throwing it down to the ground, it brake not; but only was bent, which he straiten'd again with his hammer. But, saith the same Author, the Emperor hanged him for his skill. How pleasing an invention should that false Prophet make; that should come, and tell the covetous worldling, or luxurious Epicure, that this glassy world is not brittle; but shall abide ever! But serve him, as the Emperor did; hang him up for an Atheistical liar, that so speaks.

The decay of the parts argues the dotage of the whole. Aetna, Pernassus, Olympus are not so visible, as they were. The sea now rageth where the ground was dry: and fishes swim, where men walked. Hilles are sunk, floods dried up, rocks broken, towns swallowed up of earthquakes: plants lose their force, and planets their virtue. The Sun stoops like an aged man; as weary of his course, and willing to fall asleep. All things are subject to violence and contrariety; as if both the Poles were ready to ruinate their climates. The end of allthings is at hand: when Compage soluta, Secula tot mundi suprema coaggetet hara.

God hath given us many signs of this. Portenta, quasi porro tendentia. Signa habent, si intelligantur, linguam suam. Signs have their language, if they could be rightly understood. Vltima tribulatio multis tribulationibus praeuenitur. There are many calamities preceding the last, and universal calamity of the world. No Comet, but threatens; no strange exhalations, alterations, seeming combustion in the heavens, but demonstrate the general deluge of fire, that shall destroy all.

Nunquam futilibus percanduit ignibus aether.

As God's tokens in the plague pronounce the infallibility of instant death: so these signs of the worlds sickness, are vantage-couriers of the destruction.

Men are desirous to buy the Calender; that in the beginning of the year they may know what will betide in the end; what dearth, or what death will ensue. Behold; Christ and his Apostles give us a Prognostication in the Scripture: fore-telling by signs in the Sun, Moon, Stars, in the universal decay of nature, and sickness of the world; what will happen in this old year, what in the new-year, which is the world to come. The Mathematicians and Astronomers of the Earth never dreamed of an universal Eclipse of the Sun: only Christ's Almanac reports this.

All beings are of one of these 4. sorts. 1. Some are from everlasting, not to everlasting. 2. Some to everlasting, not from everlasting. 3. One only thing is both from, and to everlasting. 4. The rest are neither to, nor from everlasting.

1 Some are from everlasting, not to everlasting: as God's eternal decrees; which have an end in their determined time, but had no beginning. So God before all worlds determined the sending of his Son to die for us: but he came in the fullness of time, saith the Apostle. This decree had no beginning; it had an ending.

2. Some are to everlasting, not from everlasting: as Angels, and men's Souls; which had a beginning in time, but shall never end; because they are created of an immortal nature.

3. One only thing, which is indeed Ens Entium, God himself, is both from everlasting and to everlasting. For he is an uncreated, and eternal subsistence: Alpha, and Omega; that first, and last; that had neither beginning, nor shall have ending. Whō Plato called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ; and he calls himself to Moses, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . That was, that is, and that is to come; the same forever.

4. Other things are neither from everlasting, nor to everlasting: for they had a beginning, and shall have an end. Of this sort are all worldly things. God will give them their end as he is Omega, that gave them their creation as he is Alpha. All these things do decay, and shall perish.

Mors etiam saxi, nominibusque venit.

Death shall extend the force even upon stones and names.

Who can then deny this world to be brittle? we see how slowly the tired earth returns us the fruits, which we trusted her bowels with. Her usury grows weak, like a decayed debtor, unable to pay us the interest, she was wont.

Ni vis humana quotannis Maxima quaeque manu legeret.

The World is lame, and every member, as it were out of joint. It caught a fall in the Cradle, as Mephibosheth by falling from his Nurse; and the older it waxeth, the more maimedly it halteth. Sin entered presently after the worlds birth, and gave it a mortal wound. It hath labor'd ever since of an incurable consumption; The noblest part of it, Man, first felt the smart, and in his curse both beasts and plants received theirs. It fell sick early in the morning; and hath now languished in a lingering lethargy, till the evening of dissolution is at hand.

Now, since the world is a Sea, and so brittle, a Sea of glass, let us seek to pass over well, but especially to land well. A Ship under sail is a good sight: but it is better to see her well moor'd in the haven. Be desirous of good life, not of long life: the shortest cut to our haven is the happiest voyage. Who would be long on the Sea? If a storm or wrack do come, let us save the best good: whatsoever becomes of the vessel, thy body; make sure to save the Passenger, thy soul, in the day of the Lord Jesus. I have now done with the Sea; and for this point, here cast anchor.

Thus far we have suruay'd this glassy Sea the world, in regard of it self. The other two attributes concern Almighty God's Holding and Beholding, Guarding and Regarding, his Seeing and Ouer-seeing it. Et videt, et prouidet: he contemplates, he governs it. His Inquisition, and his disposition is here insinuated. Some-what (and not much) of either.

1 That God may most clearly view all things being and done in this world; it is said to be in his sight, as clear as Crystal. As in Crystal there is nothing so little, but it may be seen: so there is nothing on earth, said or done, so slight or small, that it may escape his all-seeing providence. Heb. 4. Omniasunt nuda et patentia oculis eius. There is no creature that is not manifest in his sight: but all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him, with whom we have to do. In vain men hope to be hid from God. He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? He that formed the eye, shall he not see? All the earth is full of his glory. Whither shall I go from thy Spirit? or whithershall Iflye from thy presence? It is there amply proved, that neither heaven nor hell, nor uttermost part of the Sea, nor day nor night, light nor darkness, can hide us from his face. For thou hast possessed my reins, thou hast covered me in in my mothers womb. Our sitting, walking, lying down, or rising up, the thoughts of our hearts, works of our hands, words of our lips, ways of our feet, our reins, bones, bosoms, and our mothers wombs, wherein we lay in our first informity, are well known unto him.

Qualis, mihi dicite, Deus censendus est;

Qui cuncta cernit, ipse autem non cernitur!

Said an old Poet. Zach. 4. The Lord hath seaueneyes, which run to and fro through the whole earth. He is totus oculus. Let us not flatter our selves, with those, Psal. 10. that say in their heart; God hath forgotten; he hideth his face, he will never see it: and so endeavor to pluck out the eye of knowledge it self. But there is neither couch in chamber, nor vault in the ground, clouds of day, darkness of night; bottoms of Mountains, nor holes of Rocks, nor depth of Seas; secret friend, nor more secret conscience, heaven nor hell, that can obscure or shadow us from the eye of the Lord. Wheresoever we are, let us say with Jacob. The Lord is in this place, though we be not aware of it.

Oh the infinite things and actions, that the eye of God sees at once, in this Chrystal glass of the world! Some caring to come out of debt, others to get into debt. Some deluing for gold in the bowels of the earth, others in the bowels of the poor. Some buying and bargaining, others cheating in the market. Some praying in their Closets, others quafflug in Taverns. Here some raising their Houses, there others ruining them. Alterum consummantem matrimonium, alterum consummentem patrimonium. One marrying, and going to the world; another miscarrying, the world going from him. There run honor and pride aequis ceruicibus. There walks fraud cheek by iowle with a Trades-man. There stalkes pride, with the pace of a Soldier, but habit of a Courtier; striving to add to her own stature: fetherd on the crown, cork'd at the heels, light all over: stretching her legs, and spreading her wings like the Ostrich, with ostentation of great flight: but nil penna, sed vsus; not an inche higher or bettet. There slugs Idleness: both hands are in the bosom, whiles one foot should be in the stirrup. Hollow in his ear, preach to him: if he will not waken, prick him with goads; let the corrective Law discple him. He cries not Fodere nescio, but Fodere nolo. Not, I know not how to dignity, but I will not dignity.

Here halts Opinion, lame not with the shortness, but length of his legs: one foot too long, that mars the verse. There runs Policy, and moves more with an Engine, then many men can do with their hands: leading the life after this rule. Si occulte, been. If close enough, well enough. There hurries the Papist to the Mass, and his wife the Catholic: aequiucate before a competent Judge, though Christ would not before a Caiaphas: climbing to salvation by an Attorney, and likely to speed by a Proxey.

There slides by the meager ghost of malice, her blood drunk up, the marrow of her bones wasted, her whole body like a mere Anatomy. There fly a crew of Oaths, like a flight of dismal Ravens; croking the Plague to the House, where the Swearer is. Zach. 5. Nay, ruin to the whole Land. Ier. 23. For Oaths the Land mourneth. Here reels drunkenness, with swollen eyes, stammering feet: befriended of that poor remnant of all his wealth, (the richlie stocked grounds, richly furnished house, richly filled purse, are all wasted; and nothing is left rich but) the nose. There goes murder from Aceldama, the field of blood, to Golgotha the place of dead sculs, and from thence to Hinnon the valley of fire and torments. There see Atheism proiecting to displant the Paradise of God, and turn it to a wilderness of Serpents. Heaven is held but a Poets fable: and the terrors of hell, like Hercules club in the Tragedy, of huge bulk, but rags and straw are the stuffing. Creatures that have a little time on earth, & then vanish. Tu qui dicis, Transit Christianus, ipse transis sine Christianis. Thou that sayest, the Christians perish, doest perish thysel, and leave the Christians behind thee. Whither go these Atheists? I believe not to heaven; for they believe there is no heaven. They shall never have those joys, they would nor believe. They are not in hell neither: there is no Atheist. Where then? In hell they are indeed, but not as Atheists. They no sooner put their heads within those gates, but Atheism drops off: they believe and feel now, there is a God.

There you shall hear Hypocrites, a pipient brood, cackling their own ripeness, when they are scarce out of their shelles. Whose words and works differ, as it is seen in some Tappe-houses:

when the painted walls have sober sentences on them, as Fear God, honor the King, watch and pray, be sober, &c. and there is nothing but drunkenness and swearing in the house. There is Ignorance, like a stricken Sodomite, groping for the way: nay indeed, neither discerning nor desiring it. He sees neither Numen, nor Lumen; neither Diem the daylight of the Gospel, nor Deum, the God of day and Gospel.

There goes slouenly Faction, like a mal content, that with incendiary scruples labors to deuide Judah from Israel. It was a strange doom, that Valens the Emperor gave against Procopius; causing him to be tied to two great trees bowed forcibly together, and so his body to be pulled asunder, that would have pulled asunder the body of the Empire. The Humourists thrust themselves into this throng, or else I would have spared them, and that for loves sake: but truth of love must not prejudice love of Truth. If they had as Imperative tounge, and Potential hands as they have Optatiue minds, they would keep an Infinitive stir in the lacerated Church. God sees the malicious Jesuit calling up a Parliament of Devils, to plot treasons. He hears their damnable consultations: and observes them, whiles they apparel blood-red murder, and black conspiracy, in the white robes of Religion. He saw Garnet plotting in his study; and Faulx digging in the vault; and meant to make the pit, which they digged for others, swallow themselves.

He beholds as in a clear mirror of Crystal all our impurities, impieties; our contempt of Sermons, neglect of Sacraments, dishallowing his Sabbaths. Well▪ as God sees all things so clearly; so I would to God, we would behold somewhat. Let us open our eyes, & view in this Crystal glass our own works. Consider we a little our own wicked courses, our perverse ways on this Sea. Look upon this Angle of the world; for so we think, Anglia signifies: how many vipers doth she nurse and nourish in her indulgent bosom, that wound and sting her! The Landlords oppression, Usurers extortion, Patrons Simony, Commons covetousness: our unmercifulness to the poor, over-mercifulnes to the rich; malice, ebriety, pride, profanation. These, these are the works, that God sees among us: & shall we not see them our selves? shall we be utter strangers to our own doings? Be not deceived. Neither fornicators, nor Idolaters, nor adulterers, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners shall inherit the kingdom of God. Let not us then be such. Let us not be desirous of vain-glory, provoking one another, enuying one another. Me thinks here, vain-glory stalkes in like a Mountebank-Gallant: Prouocation, like a swaggering Rorer: & Malice, like a meager and melancholy Jesuit. All these things we do, and God sees in the light: and in the light we must repent them, or God will punish them with everlasting darkness. You see, how the world is clear to God's eye, as Crystal.

Lastly, this glassy sea is not only as Crystal for the transparent brightness; that the Almighty's eye may see all things done in it. But it lies for situation before his Throne; generally for the whole, and particularly for every member, subject to his judgment and governance.

His Throne signifies that imperial government, which he exerciseth over the world. Psal. 9. The Lord shall endure forever: he hath prepared his Throne for iudgement. And he shall judge the world in righteousness; he shall minister judgment to the people in uprightness. Neither is it all for Judgment: there is not only a terrible thunder and lightning flashing from this Throne; but out of it proceed comfortable voices: speaking the solaces of the Gospel, and binding up the broken-hearted. Therefore it is said verse 3. there is a Rain-bow about the Throne; which is a sign of God's covenant, a seal of his eternal mercy towards us. This is round about the Seat; that God can look no way, but he must needs see it. So that to the faithful this Throne is not terrible. Heb. 4. Let us therefore come boldly unto the Throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need. If there be the fire of Judgment, there is also the rain of Mercy to quench it.

Neither is this a transitory Throne, subject to changes and chances, as all earthly thrones are: but Heb. 1. Thy throne, oh God, is forever and ever: a scepter of righteousness is the scepter of thy kingdom. Lu. 1. He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end.

He that sits on the Throne is not idle; to let all things in the world run at six and sevens: but Omnia non solum permissa a Deo, sed etiam immissa. So disposing all things, that not only the good are ordained by him, but even the evil ordered. The sin is of man, the disposition of God. But let God alone with Oportet necessitatis: let us look to Oportet offi...ii. Sennacherib cannot do what he lists. God can put a bridle in his lips, a hook in his nose thrills. Isaiah 10. O Assyrian, the rod of mine anger: & the staff in their hand is mine indignation. Jeremiah 51. Thou art my battle-axe and weapons of war: for with thee will I break in pieces the Nations, and with thee will I destroy Kingdoms. Vltorius ne tend odijs. Go no further upon God's wrath thou desperate wicked man. Greg. Nazian. speaks of the Emperor Valentine, infected with the Arian heresy: that being about to write with his own hand, the proscription and banishment of Basil; the pen thrice refused to let fall any ink. But when he would needs write, such a trembling invaded his hand, that his heart being touched, he rent presently, and recanted what he had written. But I press this point no further, having in other places liberally handled it.

The four beasts in the 8. ver. rest not day & night, saying: Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come. The Fathers from these words observe the mystery of Trinity in Unity; and of Unity in Trinity: That God is thrice called Holy, signifies the Tinity: that once Lord God Almighty, the Unity. Fulgent. Quid est, quod ter Sanctus dicitur, si non est vna in Diuinitate substantia? Let us then with the four and twenty Elders, fall down before him that sits on the Throne, ascribing worship to to him that liveth forever: and casting our Crowns to the ground, renouncing our own merits, say to the ternall and eternal Unity, Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honor, and power: for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are, and were created.

Amen.
