But withal, there be commendable clouds: there is difference between Nubes umbrifera, a shadowing cloud; and Nubes Imbrifera, a showing cloud. There is Nubes carulea, a bright, azure, sky-coloured cloud; like that heaven to which it is near; whose life is in heaven. Nubes frugifera, a fruitful cloud, that causeth the earth to fructify. The Lord fills these clouds with his holy dews, which they let fall in due time and place. They water the earth, and come down like showers upon the mowne grass. In their days shall the righteous flourish, and abundance of peace so long as the Moon endureth.

Besides the former resemblances; Preachers are Clouds in spending themselves upon the dry earth. When a cloud hath emptied it self of water, it ceaseth to be: so we consume ourselves to do you good. Love turns us into lamps, that we wast ourselves to give light unto others: into silkwormes, that we spin out our own bowels, to make you garments. The Olive would not leave her fatness, nor the Fig tree her sweetness, nor the Vine her cheerful liquor: we refuse not to part with our fatness and sweetness, our blood and marrow, our rest and quiet for your sakes. Yea, like clouds, we willingly consume ourselves in showers, that you may bring forth fruit unto Jesus Christ. This riseth to the conviction of them that will not be bettered by the good clouds.

1 Some refuse to come under the clouds, and of all places love not the Orbe of the Church. The fruitful grounds are covered with clouds; they that shun this rain for fear of being wet, shall have barren souls. There is Daplex Coelum; Glorie & Ecclesiae: the Church is a heaven upon earth; her Priests be the clouds of heaven: she denies not her showers to them that seek it; the rest must remain a wilderness. The Jews, while the Church of God was national, were commanded in their devotions to look toward the Temple, when they could not come to it. We have those that may come to it, but will not look toward it. In this place will I give peace, saith the Lord. Not anywhere, not everywhere, but in his own house: as if this blessing were confined to his holy walls, In this place will I give peace. I know not whether the blessing doth more honor the place, or the place the blessing: both grace each other, and make God's people happy; In this place I will give peace. This flower grows not in every garden, but only in that which these clouds have watered. If ever we would have peace; outward, inward, private, public, secular, spiritual; peace in our Land, peace in our Church, peace in our State, peace in our own Souls; we must pray for it: and if ever we will pray for it, we must pray here; for In this place will I give peace, saith the Lord. It is true indeed, that we are bidden everywhere to lift up pure hands unto God: but those hands cannot be pure that are profane; and they cannot be other than profane, that condemn the Church, the clouds, and showers, and ordinances of God. If ever men would have their prayers heard at home, let them pray at Church: else their devotion is but the sacrifice of fools. For he hath said it, who hath good reason to appoint the circumstances of his own beneficence; In this place, where those holy clouds are, I will give peace.

2 Some bring forth no fruit at all, though they dwell under the clouds. They are barren and beaten grounds, like the streets or high ways, over which such a throng of lusts fetch their continual walk, that nothing can rise or prosper. The more rain falls, the more dirt. Or if they produce any fruit, it is weeds instead of herbs; stinking weeds; yea even briars and thorns, to scratch and wound the husbandman that tills them. If a displeasing drop falls from the clouds, they rage and swel; as Pharaoh did when he received a command of Israel's dismissal. The showers and monitions of God make ill men worse. Corruption, when it is checked, grows frantic: as the waves do not beat or roar anywhere so much, as at the bank that restrains them. Or as the vapor in a cloud would not make that fearful report, if it met not with opposition. A good heart yields at the stillest voice of God; but his most gracious motions harden the wicked. Some would not have been so desperately settled in their sins, if the word had not controlled them. But that ground is reserved for the fire, which would not be bettered with the water. What the element of mercy could not mollify, the element of wrath shall cruciate. For the earths sake which we bear, the earth that bears us, is often cursed therefore our works are weeds, because we concoct the moisture of the clouds into venom. So Spinus & tribulos, velut ignis escam, ferimus: briars and thorns are fit fuel for the fire: Secundum ea quae mali proferunt, ipsi efficientur. If the lustful limbs burn in flames, it was lust that made them fit matter for those flames.

3 Others look after the infirmities of the clouds, and never mind their virtue or benefits. They will follow their Teachers own way, not that which God teacheth by him. Israel indeed did follow the cloud in the wilderness: when it stood still two years together, they moved not: only then they went on, when that went before them. And we do well to follow the pattern of those holy clouds, that direct us the way to Canaan. Yet this, not absolutely, but with limitation. The Cloud that guided them had two parts; a light part, and a dark one. The Egyptians who were God's enemies, had only the dark part; which following, they rushed into the red Sea, and were drowned. The Israelites had the light part, the direction whereof safely delivered them. Wicked eyes see only the dark part, the infirmities of these clouds; that example they follow, and perish. Faithful souls look upon the light part, the graces of God in them; this doctrine they follow, and are saved.

To conclude. Be thankful to these clouds, in returning answerable fruits. If showers fall on a dunghill, they make but dirt: if in a kennel, they make but stink: if in desolate places, they spring up weeds: but in the garden, they raise up herbs and flowers: in the tilled field, corn:

in the meadows, grass: in the groves and orchards, plants and fruits. If the ground of your hearts be foul with uncleanness, rank with covetousness, or sown with lusts, our rain will cause the appearance of weeds. But the mind that comes hither like a well tilled field, receives these showers with comfort, and recompenceth them with increase. Then shall the earth bring forth her increase, and God, even our own God shall give us his blessing.

This Heart of ours is the best or the worst ground that lies between heaven and earth. The worst, if it be thorny, weedy, mirie: but if fair, pleasant, fruitful, it is the best. There be two that lay claim to it: and howsoever the propriety be God's, for he made it; yet Satan will try his title, and sues to have it. First, let us weed this ground, and that betimes, for old weeds will hardly be destroyed. Sins are weeds, the weeding-hook is Repentance: let not a weed appear, but presently by contrition cut it down. God indeed said of another field, and in another sense; Let them both grow together until the harvest: but it must not be so here, for then the weeds will eat out the corn. Secondly, keep it in heart; for if the soul have not her chearings, she will grow faint and barren. The way to keep thy heart in heart, is by devout prayers, meditation, hearing the word, and receiving that which is Pabulum animae, the blessed Sacrament. Thirdly, look to the expiration of thy farm, and be sure to leave it in good case: that when the great Landlord shall call the Tenant out of the Tenement, the soul from the body, it may be entertained into his own house, the glorious Court of heaven. Fourthly and lastly be, sure to pay thy rent always, and that is Thankfulness. For temporal farms we pay our rents by quarters and half years: but this rent is due every month, week, day, hour. Seven times a day, yea seven times an hour, will I praise thee. We forfeit many of God's favors, for not paying the rent of Thankfulness. It is an easy rent, it costs us no labor. It is a cheap rent, we are not out of purse for it. It is a ready rent, never to seek. If it be easy, ready, cheap, why do we grudge it? We can do little, if we cannot thank God for his goodness. Yet for the ground it self, for the seeds that sow the ground, for the clouds that water the seeds, for the Sun that draws up the clouds, for the influences of heavenly grace that bless all, God requires no rent but our thanks. Hoc nil dici brevius, nec audiri laetius, nec gratius intelligi, nec agi fructuosius potest. Nothing is more easy to be spoken, or more comfortable to be heard, or more acceptable to be understood, or more fruitful to be done, than thankfulness. If we cannot requite gifts, yet let us return thanks. Debitam Deo nunquam referre gratiam potero: tamen hoc non desinam, ubique confiteri me referre non posse: I can never give unto God sufficient thanks; yet I will ever acknowledge that I cannot give him thanks sufficient. He that returneth this to man, makes half the amends: to God, it is all the amends we can make.

But the least gratitude lies in the tongue; when the heart, when the life is thankful, this is better than the sacrifice that hath horns and hoofs. Then is the earth thankful to the clouds, when it returns answerable fruits; when it does confess and recompense the good it hath received, when the valleys stand thick with corn, the meadows yield fat pasture, the trees flourish with fruits, that the birds sit and sing in the branches. We call a barren earth, an unthankful earth. What is the worst fruit that the earth bears? I find a great complaint of Tares, of Thorns, of Weeds, of venomous creatures, noxious, and baneful plants: yet all these are good in their kinds, and useful to the wise. But the worst things that the groaning earth bears, be ourselves, our sinful and unprofitable selves: Telluris inutile pondus. Therefore God more than threatened, to destroy both man and beast from the face of the earth. The earth as a good mother, rejoiceth in good children: but she mourneth for them that dishonor their Father, and are a shame to their mother. Non laetatur super bestiis & rapidis feris: but in men, tame and gentle creatures. So long as there is pride in us, contention among us: while covetousness and cruelty in our hands: unmercifulness in our hearts, and lust in our loins remains unweeded out; we are those wild beasts. Is this our thankfulness to the clouds? Is this our requital for all their showers? Do we rain down holy dews, and find you springing up profane weeds? Alas, for the sins of the Land! for this cause the clouds melt themselves into tears. As all our Sermons be public showers, to refresh your thirsty souls: so we have also our private showers, dissolving ourselves into tears for the obstinacy of your hearts. We weep in secret for your pride, and are still dropping this rain from our eyes, together with the exhortation of our lips. Remember that God who gives you the former and the latter rain: showers to soften the earth before the seed be cast in; showers when it is cast in, to bring it forth: showers to ear it, and showers to ripen it. If all this will not make you fructify, the clouds weep again, because they have labored in vain, and spent their strength for naught. Mortals quoniam nolunt sua crimina flere, Coelum pro nobis solvitur in lacrymas. O that it would fall out by you, as the Bishop comforted Monica concerning her son Augustine; Fieri non potest ut populus istorum nimborum pereat: the children of so many showers and tears shall never perish.

Open therefore your breasts to receive these holy dews: lest with that rich Churl, you cry hereafter for some of this water, when you cannot have it. How many showers and buckets of grace had he despised in his jollity? now he calls out pitifully, for one drop to cool his tongue. Do not neglect the least drop of grace when it falls, lest you be driven to beg one drop of mercy when it must fall forever. Now God draws near unto you, draw you near unto God, and be enlighten'd: so shall you no more be tellus arida, but terra florida, bearing $\langle \diamond \rangle$ for the Lord's harvest. Thus you shall restore the golden age, and make the place you live in, were it worse than it is, a very earthly paradise. Earth shall return to earth; but such fruitful earth shall possess the earth, and be possessed of heaven. Now the grace of God make us the one, and the glory of God crown us with the other.

To whom the mist of darkness is reserved forever.] Private offenders are not so much plagued, as public. Bis peccat, qui exemplo peccat: for he teacheth evil by doing it, and so again does evil by teaching it. Exemplare malum, capitale malum: the exemplary sin is a mischievous sin: he that gives bad example, shall be made an example himself. A sinner, by his true contrition and hearty repentance, may get pardon for his own sin; but how shall he procure it for them whom he hath taught to sin? Nothing more troubles the mind of a good man, than his tempting of others to offend God. Thou hast been a blasphemer, and art converted: but how shall this medicine cure the infection which thy foul breath hath conveyed to others? Thy excesses may be forgiven thee, but how art thou sure of those Uriah's, whom thou hast inebriated? The adulterer, after the fact may repent of his own wickedness, yet it cannot but trouble him to think what may become of his harlot. So grievous and dangerous it is to be guilty of others sins. An eminent offender draws many with him into evil. When David fell in with Bathsheba, many of her servants and his courtiers must needs be conscious of that adultery. When Uriah must die, Joab must be fetched in as accessory to the murder: how did that example harden his heart against the conscience of Abner's blood? He might well think, how can my master revenge that on me, which he acts himself? Great men's sins are seldom secret, and no less secret shall be their shame. These heretical Teachers have brought on men's souls a mist of darkness, and done what in them lies, to send them blindfold to hell: now therefore such a lot abides them, even a mist of darkness forever. In which punishment observe three things.

The

- 1. Quality of it; Caligo tenebrarum, the mist of darkness.
- 2. Congruity of it; It is prepared or Reserved for them; and they were such as loved darkness more than light.
- 3. Eternity or duration of it, For ever.

First, the nature or quality of it; a mist of darkness. If hell had no other anguish in it but the very darkness, it were a formidable place. How uncomfortable would that night be, which had no hope or possibility of day? But as it is said of heaven, the gate, of it are not shut by day, and there shall be no night there: so it is contrary of hell the gates of it are not open by night, and there shall be no day there. Night is found to be Terrae filia, the daughter of the Earth; and that is dark enough: so Job calls the Grave a Land of darkness, and the shadow of death. If our bodies hourly sense when they lie in that dark bed, how tedious, how odious would it be unto them? But there is that which Christ calls 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, utter darkness; uncomfortable, unlightable: The Hebrews by Light, understand joy and felicity: by darkness, sorrow and confusion. To give light to them that sit in darkness. Such mist shall be on their souls, as comes upon a swooning man: who cannot see though his eyes be open: the organs being (for the time) incapable of illumination. So lie the damned, as dying men in the very pangs of death, with a mist of darkness over their understandings, yet cannot die.

But there is fire in hell; shall not this give light? No, it differs from elemental fire; First, for violence, it is more subtle and searching. Secondly, for duration 〈◇〉 is a wildfire that cannot be quenched. Thirdly, for operation, it consumes not what it burns. Fourthly, for obscurity, though it shine terribly to the vexation of the wicked, yet it shines not to their comfort. Cremationem habet, lumen non habet. John was a burning and a shining light. There is a fire that shines without burning, and a fire that burns without shining. It is as easy for God to make fire without light, as light without fire. All the prisons and dungeons devised by man are palaces in respect of hell: as all pains mortal are Vmbra ad haec tormenta, a mere shadow to these torments. The darkness of Egypt was wonderful, and fearful: wonderful, in that it was so thick that it might be felt: fearful, therefore reserved for the ninth of the ten plagues. But this far exceeds; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, the blackness of darkness: so doth the Hebrew Idiotisme express it in the uttermost extract of darkness. If thou couldst see in a dark prison some looking pale and ghastly, others bound in chains and fetters, others tormented with famine, all shut up in a loathsome dungeon, howling with lamentation how would it fright thee from such a course, as might endanger thee to such a place? Thus let us meditate of this darkness here, that we may never feel it hereafter. The body that is surfeited with repletion of pleasant meat, must be purged with bitter pills. Let the due consideration of those insufferable horrors cleanse our hearts from all filthy lust: and let us follow the way which the light of grace leads us, that the light of glory may crown us.

Reserved for them: this is the proportionableness of it. The punishments which God's justice inflicts upon sinners, have always a respect of condignity, not seldom of congruity: so that we may read the matter of the offense in the characters of the penalty. These black clouds did wholly endeavor to superinduce darkness on the Church, therefore the mist of darkness is reserved for them forever. Some read, Paratur, is Prepared: and this refers us to God's decree, who had preordained the darkness of hell for such cloudy souls. Not Paranda, nor in Parando, but Parata. As a king prepares a prison for such of his subjects, as shall prove rebellious. But God made not darkness; and whereas in the beginning of the creation it is said, Darkness was on the deep; this was not a thing created, but a mere privation or absence, or not being of that light which was made afterward. Nor do we think this mist of darkness a positive thing; but as when the Sun is hidden, darkness necessarily follows. Not a beam of God's countenance, not a spark of his light comes into hell, and thereupon follows this intolerable darkness.

Tophet is ordained of old: non casu, non subito, sed deliberante judicio. For the antiquity of hell, I refer you to the fourth verse of this chapter; where the lost Angels are said to be cast down into hell: now they could not be cast into that which was not. God hath ordained but two places to receive all, whether Angels or men. For those Fustian-weavers of Rome with their intermedia loca, they make but Chimaera's, and imagine places without a foundation. As Limbus Patrum where (they tell us) there is Poena damni, non sensus; and Limbus Infantum, for children dying without Baptism; where they likewise say is, Poena, non sensus, sed damni. The former whereof they would have dissolved by Christ's descension into hell; the other to last forever. And their Purgatory, where is both Poena damni, and Sensus; which shall cease at Christ's coming to Judgment; unless some better informed and more merciful Pope unlocke the doors, and let them out for money beforehand. These be pretty tales for a winters night, and not unlike their legends. The holy Scripture hath this plain truth: There is but election and reprobation, grace and sin, the narrow gate and the broad way: but two places, Light and darkness, Joy and pain: but two ends, heaven and hell, to one of these must all flesh come. They that tell you otherwise, flatter you with error: we tell you the truth, though it be with terror; and testify to you our brethren, (albeit with another mind) that you come not into that place of torment. And howsoever you may storm against us, for disquieting your security with such menaces; yet we had rather you should be offended with us for preaching hell to you here, than that for not preaching it, you should curse us in hell hereafter.

But I rather read it, Is Reserved; and then it denotes the fitness of the plague to their sin: darkness to darkness, inward to outward, temporal to eternal darkness. The Egyptians drowned the males of Israel, themselves were drowned for it. They had bloodied the waters from those innocent veins, their waters are turned into blood. That law of Retaliation which God will not allow us, because we are fellow-creatures, he justly practiseth on us. He would have us read our sins in our Judgments, that we might both repent of our sins and give glory to his Justice. Cham sinned against his father, and therefore is punished in his children: whereas Japheth was dutiful to his father, and finds it in his posterity. Because Cham was an ill son to his father, therefore his children shall be servants to his brethren. But because Japheth joined himself with Sem in bearing the cloak of shame, therefore he shall dwell in the tents of Sem, and partake of the blessing. Samson abuseth his strength among women, therefore he lost his strength by a woman. Saul divides himself from God, God divides the kingdom from Saul. David committed three sins in the business of Uriah, adultery, murder, and dissimulation; for all these he receives just payment: for adultery, in the deflouring of his daughter Tamar: for murder, in the stabbing of his son Amnon: for dissimulation, in the contriving of both, Did you not hate me, and expel me out of my Fathers house? and why are you come to me now when you are in distress? saith Iepthah to the elders of Gilead. The suits of necessity are justly upbraided with the errors of prosperity. The same expostulation that Iephtah makes with Gilead, God at the same time makes with Israel; You have forsaken me, and served other gods, wherefore should I deliver you? Go and cry unto the gods ye have chosen. God tells his children of their faults, while he is whipping them. It is a wise and safe course, to make much of those in our peace, whom we must make use of in our extremity: otherwise it is but just, that we should be rejected of those whom we have rejected. We call upon God in our trouble, and are not heard: Why? because he was not heard, when he called to us in our jollity. He will say, Did you not drive me out of your houses, out of your hearts, in time of health? Did ye not plead the strictness of my charge, the weight of my yoke? Did not your willful sins expel me from your souls? what do you now crouching and creeping to me in the evil day? It is but justice, if God be not found of those that were content to lose him.

Thus he once plagued the inundation of sins with an inundation of waters: Sodomes unnatural lust with unnatural fire. He proceeds still in the same course; the dearth of charity he punisheth with the dearth of plenty: the surfeits of peace, with the sharp physic of war: malice and wrath, those burning sins, with burning fevers: the languishing of piety, with consumptions of body: whoredom and uncleanness, with loathsome diseases: riot and profuseness, with fluxes: drunkenness and excess, with dropsies: pride and swelling, with tumours: curses and blasphemies with the plague and pestilence. That which men have so many years tossed in their mouths, is now fallen upon their loins the plague hath been their imprecation, the plague is become their common destruction. What is it that infects the air, but the contagious breath of oaths and curses, vented every moment from the lips of men and children? Every sinner teacheth God how to punish him, ex ore suo, out of his own mouth. And there is no particular wickedness, but God hath a particular rod to scourge it on earth, and a particular torment to vex it in hell. Only they escape, that have answered all the variety of their sins, in the variety of the sufferings of Jesus Christ.

For ever. Such is the perpetuity of this darkness. And this is also a just recompense, that they which might have found life, and would not seek it, should at last seek for death, and not find it. There is a shame never covered, a worm never dying, a cry never ceasing, a fire never wasting, an intolerable pain, an interminable time. They shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them. A good day makes amends for a bad night; but to this night belongs no day; it is everlasting darkness. The roughest tempest, the weariest journey is not without comfort, because there is hope of an end: but these pains be as endless in quantity, as they are easeless in quality. Joshua had a long day, when the Sun stood still; yet that day had an end; the Sun did go on his course again, and set: but here the Sun and Moon shall utterly cease to measure time by their motion. That is a long sentence that hath no period, a doleful night which shall have no morning; a woeful darkness, where no star shall give a glimpse, no taper burn for the damps and foggy mists. Thus they lie like a malefactor pressing to death, calling for more weight to dispatch them, even rocks and mountains, and cannot get it. They are those serpents that will not be charmed, those tormentors that will never be entreated. It is to no end, to compare them with piles of grass, sands or stars: if a million of years should stand for every dust of the earth, there might be an end: but this is mors sine morte, finis sine fine: time shall be no more; and after time, it is as possible for that damnation to be temporal, as it is for God not to be eternal.

Sins greedily hear that the mercy of God endures forever: but they shall as sensibly feel, that the wrath of God also endure forever. It was a pitiful complaint, Will the Lord cast off forever, is his mercy clean gone for evermore? God did not deal so with David, he will deal so with the damned. Let this meditation touch thee now, that the matter it self may never hurt thee hereafter. That heart is hard frozen, which nothing can thaw but hell-fire. If a rebellious city were threatened by the king to be tythed for their conspiracy; that one of ten should die in justice, though nine were spared in mercy; would not everyone tremble, lest the lot should fall upon himself? If among ten passing over a bridge, one were assured to fall in, would not everyone look to his feet? The Supreme Judge in his last great Assizes, will execute his wrath upon many: not one of ten, but rather nine of ten are in danger; for all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God, deserving ever-burning fire in everlasting darkness; shall we not make sure our Advocate to plead for us; even Him alone whose plea is unanswerable, because he died for us? He that is For ever, suffered that we might not suffer forever. But will he plead for those above, that care not to be his below? Shall they challenge his covenant then, and trample on it now? Do they not abuse that Covenant, while they break the conditions, Faith and Obedience? Let not men flatter themselves, that they may sin in aeterno suo, so long as they can: and yet that God will not punish them ateterno suo, so long as he can: Hell was not made for nothing: there be two fatal engines, the devil and sin, that will supply and furnish it, and keep it from being empty.

Thou art sick, think how uncomfortable it would be, to be confined to that bed and that pain: if no worse, for a thousand years: where thy friends are fiends, and thy Physicians tormentors. Consider them that are shut up for the plague; how irksome it is to want help and society, to lie fearfully expecting death every hour; when as yet there is a Lord have mercy on us upon the door, and the prayers of thousands sent up to heaven for their comfort. Who would for the pleasure of an hour, be rack'd a whole year? Or for a mass of gold, lie burning in the fire one day? Yet how many for the satisfaction of a lust, hazard themselves, souls and bodies, to more exquisite tortures, and endless flames? Let us not pass over this meditation superficially, but in time make an end of sinning; otherwise beyond all time there will be no end of our suffering. For our Creators sake that made us, for our Redeemers sake that with his own blood bought us, for that Comforters sake who would heal us, for the Angels sake that guard us, for the Churches sake, our mother that mourns for us, for our own Souls sake, that should be dear unto us; let us break off our sins by repentance, and live the life of grace and obedience, that we perish not in this mist of darkness forever.

2 PET. 2.18.

For when they speak great swelling words of vanity, they allure through the lusts of the flesh, through much wantonness, those that were clean escaped from them who live in error.

Flesh and blood is pleased either with no religion, or with a carnal one; yea with a carnal religion rather than none at all. For without some boundaries to the unlimited rage of sensuality, they could neither enjoy their goods, nor their sins in peace. Therefore among the Heathen politicke, that State where nothing was lawful, was preferred to the State where all things were lawful. The adulterer, that cares not whose bed he dishonors, yet would think himself wronged, if he might not keep his whore to himself. He would be loath to have his own goods stolen, that makes no conscience of robbing others. The wicked are neither sensible of doing injury, nor patient of suffering it. Unjust tradesmen will have the Law open to fetch in their debts, and that with rigor: but for payment of their creditors, they would have the Law shut, and nose them under a protection. Thus if they can shuffle out for this world, they never dream of any reckoning in the world to come. That religion therefore, which can humor flesh and blood, and give corrupt nature leave to be her self, proud or wanton, is the only plausible doctrine, and sure of entertainment. Every bad man would have all others bound, and himself free: and he easily connives at that in himself, which he severely censures under another skin. Silly understandings adhere to that rule, which is indulgent to their carnal affections; as fishes are taken with the bait that is agreeable to their natures. Wanton souls are caught with wanton allurements. When they speak, &c.

This verse is spent upon two sorts of men; the Seducers, and the Seduced: the subtle and the simple; the thieves and their bootie. In the Deceivers we have Their

- Posture, they speak great swelling words of vanity.
- Imposture; they allure or beguile souls.

For the Deceived, we have three circumstances;

- 1. What they were for their former condition, escaped, &c.
- 2. What they are for their present estate, wrapped in error.
- 3. How they become so; which is their own weakness, or proneness to sin, whereby the Temptation works upon them, here called wantonness.

The Posture of the Seducers appear in three passages; In

- Multiloquio, many words.

- Stultiloquio, vain words.
- Grandiloquio, great swelling words.

For the first, they think to carry it away with words. That is a very ill cause, which wants colorable reason for it; that is a very ill reason which wants a Tertullus to plead it: and he is an ill Tertullus that wants words to defend it. Yea, error hath always most words; like a rotten house, that needs most props and crutches to uphold it. Simple Truth evermore requires least cost; like a beautiful face that needs no painting; or a comely body, which any decent apparel becomes. We plaster over rotten posts and ragged walls: substantial buildings are able to grace themselves. We cannot but suspect that cause, whereon the Lawyer wastes so much of his time and tongue. Multitude of words is not unlike the thick painting in some Popish Church-windows; a mere devise to keep out the light. Why doth the Hare use so many doublings, but to frustrate the sent of the hounds? A great deal of oratory bestowed on a vain subject, is but like an onion; when you have taken off all the pills, there is nothing left. Falsehood is a gaudy harlot; strippe her of her borrowed garments, she will appear, we know not whether more hateful or ridiculous. Loquacity hath ever been a note of folly; In multiloquio stultiloquium: it is very difficult to speak much and well. The ship that hath more rigging and sails than ballast, will never make a good voyage. The tree that wanted fruit, might have abundance of leaves; and commonly they have the worst course of life, that have the volublest discourse of tongue. They think to be heard for their much speaking: as if God could not hear them at first; as if he could not understand them at once; as if the blessing of heaven depended on the labor of the tongue: whereas indeed, it is not many words, but hearty desires, that can fetch down heavenly blessings. No Prince will grant a suit ever the sooner for a long petition. Certainly, if twenty Ave-maries and five Paternosters were all that God required, many a Papist hath done his duty. But alas, how can they hope to merit by that, for which God hath said, they shall not be heard, much babbling. The Publican used not so many words as the Pharisee, the Pharisee had not such commendation as the Publican. Frustrà fit per plura, quod fieri potest per pauciora. There is little of a long-winded exercise, except to bring men asleep. Many words must not carry it; for then the brawling woman would have the better, who will not give over without the last word. But not to catch the disease, which I declaim against, prolixity of speech, I pass to the next, which is

Their full-mouthed speeches, Great swelling words. Nothing is more loud than error: the more false the matter, the greater noise to uphold it. Paul can have no audience, the truth must not be heard: but they all cry out for Diana. In that bloodiest and most unnatural custom of Idolatry that ever the Sun be held: the sacrificing of their children in burning fire to Moloch, it was the noise of the Instruments that drowned all sense of the madness. Thus Ahab shall be deluded with great words and numbers: the clergy of four hundred Prophets conspire to his destruction one: single Michaiah can do no good, they bear him down with multitudes. Four hundred to one, is odds: everyone will have as much talk as he. Yet indeed, one Prophet speaking from the Oracle of God, is more worth than four hundred Baalites. Truth is not ever to be measured by the Poll: it is not number, but weight that should carry it. Solid verity in one mouth is worthy to preponderate light falsehood in a thousand. But falsehood hath the more swelling words, the louder noise: as Cyprian mentions one that challenged him to dispute; who though he wanted learning to urge any argument, yet he amazed the people by ingrossing all the talk, and holding the conclusion.

False Zedekiah not only speaks, but acts his prediction, with swelling words, yea presumptuous signs; Horns of iron, and Thus shalt thou push the Syrians. The horn is forcible, the iron irresistible: by an irresistible force shall Ahab do this: as if the certentie of his tongue were not enough without his hands. He had a forehead of brass, a heart of Lead: the one for impudence, the other for flexiblenesse to humors and times: therefore he devised horns to gore his King unto death. One silly Prophet affronts the 400; whereupon Zedekiah, having swollen first into words, now swells into blows, and smites God's Prophet on the face. Micaiah gave him the lie, and he gives Micaiah the fist; and with the blow expostulates. Before two Kings, the Guardians of Peace and Justice, swaggering Zedekiah falls to blows. For a Prophet to strike a Prophet, in the face of two Princes, was intolerably insolent: the act was much unbecoming the Person, more the Presence. Prophets may reprove, they may not strike. It was enough for Ahab to punish with the hand; no weapon was for Zedekiah but his tongue. And if Ahab had not been well content to see that hated mouth beaten by any hand; if malice had not made authority insensible of such an usurpation, this rude presumption had not past unrevenged. Falsehood doth not more bewray it self in anything, than in swelling words, in unjust blows. Nor is it any new condition of God's servants to smart for speaking true. Truth suffers, whiles error persecutes. None are more ready to boast of God's Spirit, than they that have it not. The full vessels are evermore silent. Brasse makes a great sound when it is beaten: the gold is more malleable with less noise. A fools voice is heard in the streets, but wisdom speaks low. Therefore hath luxurious behavior been called Roaring, for the dissolute cannot rule their tongues. As Bias was sailing, there fell out a great tempest, and the mariners (who were lewd persons) cried to their gods: but Bias said, Peace, make not such a noise: for if the gods know ye are here, we are all like to perish. Peacocks have a louder voice than Nightingales, no man thinks a sweeter. Empty caskes in the cellar return the greater sound; the good liquor lies in them that are dull. The light housewife is the scold, and can put down the grave matron in words, no less than the other excels her in honesty. The frogs of Egypt were no small plague: who besides the annoyance to their nostrils, and trouble to their bosoms, with a dismal dinne filled their ears. Swelling words are like the reports of Ordnance: they blaze, and crack, and smoke, and stink, and vanish. They proceed from diverse causes; there be in the soul six swelling diseases.

1 Pride, which is an unnatural tumour, and puffs a man up, as if he had eaten a spider. And indeed, Pride is a poison, and the nature of poison is to cause a swelling. He swells for place, not only above his fellows; The man with the gold-ring looks to sit uppermost: but even above the Angels; and Similis ero Altissimo, I will be like the most High. He that rides on his foot-cloth, or in his caroch, how big does he look on the inferior passengers? We wonder; it was not so with him the other day. Alas, since that time, he hath swallowed the venom of pride in a pill of wealth, and now you may see it by his swelling. He fears an affront, more than he fears hell: if by his equal, he puffs like one out of breath: if by his inferior, he swells like the sea in a storm. The proud man is a kind of mad man; he thinks himself brave in another's clothes, and glories in that which is none of his. He is sick of a swelling in the brain.

2 Malice, which is a higher degree of poison, swelling inwardly; and when it cannot vent it self in revenge, bursts the entrails. How did Joab swell against Amasa? Jezebel against Elijah? Nothing but a poultisse of their warm innocent blood can abate the tumour. After the defeat of that great Armado, the Duke of Ossuna presented himself to the King of Spain, with a distaffe at his side, and a spindle at his back instead of sword and dagger: the King hereby understanding that a woman had foiled them, hastily stepp'd to the Altar, and taking a silver candlestick in his hand, swore a monstrous oath, that he would wast all Spain, yea his whole Indies to that candlestick, but he would be revenged on England. But God be praised, those swelling words were but the effect of his own malice, without our ruin; Rumpantur & ilia Codri. The malicious is troubled with a swelling of the spleen or bowels.

3 Vainglory, which is a kind of wood-sere or venomous froth, that swells men with a rank opinion of their own worths. So the Fly that sate on the axletree of the Chariot wheel, gave out that she made that glorious dust. Things that move upon greater means, they ascribe to themselves; and strut like Colosses, that the world may not scape their notice. Mighty are their words, as if they would shake mountains, and speak thunder-claps. Come, saith the Philistine to David, and I will give thy flesh to the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the field. What big words were here? But how seldom ever was there a good end of ostentation? Presumption at once is the presage, and the cause of ruin. He is a weak adversary that will be killed with words. Swell on proud Giant; a small pebble from the brook shall confute thee. Hath any of the gods of the nations delivered his land from the King of Assyria? Swell on Sennacherib: an Angel shall confute a 185 thousand of thy soldiers with the argument of death in one night. Many a foe hath spoke bravely, who in the push hath made more use of his heels, than of his hands. When one vaunted of hurts received on his face, Julius Caesar knowing him to be a coward, bad him take heed the next time he ran away, how he did look back. This is a swelling in the Throat.

4 Hypocrisy, which is a malignant humor, swelling the parts affected or corrupted with it, as some kind of grass doth the kine, or sweet worte hogs. Methinkes the hypocrite should smile at himself, being so conscious, how he rails at the world which he worships; how he condemns the belly which he serves; how he persuades men to contemn the gold, which is dear to him as his life: how he commends the cross to others, which himself abhors. How like the kite, he flies aloft, but is ever looking down to the earth for his prey. He hath an ill-affected spleen, that grows big while the other members wast: or an obstructed liver, which blows up the cheeks and legs, while the vital parts want blood and livelihood. God I thank thee, that I am not as other men. Hypocrite, so thou sayest, so thou swellest: but what a tabe or famine of goodness there is within, thou dost not, thou dar'st not ask thy conscience. Like a decayed Merchant, that studies tricks to uphold the credit of his wealth; and still the nearer he comes to poverty, the more show he makes of sufficiency; till at last the bladder is pricked, and the wind flies out, and there is rather a merchants case than a merchant. Still the more a man swells in pretence, the less he is to be trusted in deed. This Swelling is a Tympanie.

5 Blasphemy, which is the highest excess of words, when they swell against God himself. Am I a dog, that thou comest against me with staves and stones? The last words that ever the Philistine shall speak, are brags and curses. How truly he spoke himself? Had he been any other than a dog, he would not have opened his foul mouth against the host of God, and the God of hosts. And as he calls himself a dog, so it seems David thought him, else he had never come to him only with a staff and a stone. Jezebel hath lost her prophets; and she swears and stamps at that, whereat she should have trembled. She swears by those gods of hers, which were not able to save their prophets, that she would kill that Prophet of God which had slain her prophets, and scorned her gods. O foolish dust, wilt thou swell against thy Maker? When the Spanish fleet was fired and dispersed on the narrow seas, the young Prince of Ascoli at his fugitive arrival to Dunkerke, with his cap off, and grinning towards heaven, he swore to the Duke of Parma on the Strond, That not only all the four elements were Lutherans, but even that day God himself.

6 Success in wickedness, which is like Aconitum taken for diet-drink. To prosper in ill designs, is the greatest unhappiness, the heaviest curse: for he that useth to do evil, and speeds well, never rests till he come to that evil from which there is no redemption. Joab kills Abner, and scapes; again he embrues his hands in the blood of Amasa, and is not indicted for it: now David is old, and Adoniah towardly, he furthers him in the usurpation: and big with prefidence of his own command, he thinks to carry it; but this carried him to his grave. Faire Absalom was proud and ambitious, yet he flourisheth: he kills his own brother, yet escapes, he insinuates himself into the affections of the people, and bold of their fidelity to him, he swells even against his own royal Father, and becomes a disloyal traitor. God owes that man a grievous payment, whom he suffers to run on so long unquestioned. Prosperous wickedness is one of the devils strongest chains. A man feels a little sweetness of wealth, this sets him a gogge, he swells for more: when his stalk is so stiff that it bears up above the rest of his ridge, presently he swells for honor: the first draught doth not quench his thirst, he swells for a higher degree: thus honored, he swells into some place of authority, and still his insatiate dropsy calls for larger draughts, till at last he is inebriated: like the Toade in Esop, that would needs swell in Ambition to be as big as the Ox; and then he bursts. Such tongues shall be swollen with the infernal fire, till they be not able to call for a drop of water to cool them.

The last attribute of their speech is vain, words of vanity. If the matter were good, yet many words were vain, great words were vain: but here both the matter and words and all are not only vain, but vanity it self. The kingdom of God is not in word, but in power. How justly doth the Lord infatuate these magnificent talkers, in frustrating their boasts? Magno conatu nugas, they have a show of wisdom, but that show ends in folly. What hath been said of two nations, is true between two sorts of men: the French are wiser than they seem, the Spaniards seem wiser than they are. He that says little, is thought by some to understand less; and those great scholars, that are confident talkers. But to make superficialities seem body, with depth and bulk, the plentifullest speaker will scarce devise sufficient shifts. It is according to the French proverb; much brute, little fruit: or as we say in English, a great deal of cry, but no wool. Demades the Orator in his age was talkative, and would feed much: therefore Antipater would say of him, •hat he was like a sacrifice, whereof nothing was left but the tongue and the paunch. Alexander in his Persian expedition, caused his soldiers to leave scatteringly behind them, as forgotten, larger and heavier pieces of armor than they were used to wear; the Macedonians being not such portly men: it was his policy to scare and fright the Persian. So mighty words terrify weak hearts: but wise Judgments make small account of their vain words, whereof one day they must make a strict account themselves. Jezebel swears by her gods to be revenged on Elias: it was well that tyrannesse could not keep her own counsel. She meant to kill him, and the disclosing of that purpose was a means to preserve him. The wisdom and power of God could have found evasions enough for his Prophet in her greatest secrecy: but now he needs no other than the warning-piece from her own lips. Here were swelling words, but the words of vanity: she is no less vain than the gods she swears by. In spite of her fury, and her oath, and her gods, Elias shall live: at once she shall find her self frustrate and forsworn. And now she is ready to bite her tongue, and to eat her heart for anger at the disappointment of her cruel vow. It were no living for godly men, if the hands of tyrants were allowed to be as bloody as their hearts. Men and devils are under the restraint of the Almighty; neither are their words more swelling, or their designs more lavish, than their achievements be vain, and their executions short. Benhadad sends great words to the King of Israel; as if it were nothing to conquer him: stay the proof; Benhadad flees, and Israel pursues. The heathen rage, the kings combine, and the people imagine a vain thing. Though for power they be kings; though for policy, counselors; though for fury they be Gentiles; though for number, all the people, multitudes; yet they study but vanity: they imagine a thing vain impossibly, vain unprofitably.

No wrestling of man can evacuate the purpose of God. While he struggles, he is caught: and by resisting the Will of God, he doth fulfill it. Divinum consilium dum devitatur, impletur: humana sapientia dum reluctatur, comprehenditur. Second causes are susceptible of impediments; as the burning of fire, by the action of water: but there is no evasion to shun the decree of heaven. These swelling intendments are like Caligula's enterprises; who never took anything in hand if there was hope to effect it: 'tis vain impossibly. Neither doth any profit arise from it. To count evil for gain, is unjust, but human: but mischief intended for mischiefs sake is devilish. The old way of wickedness began at quid prodent nobis? But that is a new way of malicious sin, when men cannot be pleased to live in quiet themselves, unless they disturb the tranquility of others. As Vipers and the venomous Cantharides and stinging spiders are more detestable than Bears and Wolves, because they sting folk to death without any benefit. That is an odious mischief, which is vain unprofitably.

The Apostate Church swells in words; both in respect of her promises, and of her menaces; but Quid seret hic dignum tanto promissor hiatu? mere words of vanity. That when the sin is forgiven, the penalty remains: the Poet could say, Poena potest tolli, culpa perennis erit: they say, Culpa potest tolli, poena pere•nis erit; at least during their Purgatory. Kings are the anointed of God, to whom only they are inferior: Inde illis potestas, unde Spiritus. And cujus iussu nascunt•• homines, ejus constituuntur Principes: by whose will they are borne men, they are made Princes. Yet how big is the noise, that the Pope is above them, may dethrone them, that his Assassins may kill them: these be swelling words, not only of vanity, but of treachery. That we may merit heaven by our good works, or at least bear half the charges of our own salvation; these be mighty words, but they are vain men that trust them. I know not what trick they have to pay God, but I am sure, I am infinitely in his debt, and no ways can pay him but by his own coin, the blood of his own Son. So innumerable are their swelling Tenants, that their very mention would swell to a volume; but I leave them to their conclusion, mere vanity.

Let me conclude with this summary observation. Harmony is the sound of the Gospel, unity the band of the Church: her true members know no discords, with one mouth, with one heart, they praise God, and love one another. All the noise and jars come in by broken instruments, such as the sower of contention hath put out of tune. He fills the lips of his engines with repining, cavils, querules and wranglings, which are the right sounds of hell. If any seem to be contentions we have no such custom, nor the Churches of God: there is no such voice in the quire of the holy Ghost. Indeed Christ came to send fire on the earth: but he never meant such a fire as comes out of two flints by repercussion, or out of steel by hard-edge. But rather such a fire as he sent down in disparted tongues upon the Apostolical assembly at Pentecost; a fire that shall enlighten the understanding, warm the heart with grace, and consume the stubble of iniquity; this is the fire that burns in Jesus his name. They grossly mistake, that think Christ is come to his Spouse in turbine & tonitru, (such is the coming of Antichrist) for Christ comes in levi aura quasi susurrans; in silence as the dew upon the tender grass, and the fruit of his coming is Peace. There came a strongwind, that rent the mountains, and brake the rocks, but the Lord was not in the wind. That tearing blast was from God, God was not in it. So in it, as in his other extraordinary works, not so in it as to impart himself to Elijah by it. It was anteambulo, non vehiculum, the Vshier, not the carriage of God. Then came an earthquake, more fearful than the wind. That did but move the air, this the earth: that beat upon some prominences of the earth, this shook it from the Center, but God was not in the earthquake. Then a fire, more fearful than either. The first affected the ear, the next the feeling, this last lets in horror to the soul by the eye, the quickest and most apprehensive of the senses: but the Lord was not in the fire. The Prophet shall see God's mighty power in the earth, air, fire, before he hear him in the soft voice; all these are but boisterous harbingers of a meek and still word. In that God was he came in the gentle voice of mercy; how are they his messengers, that came in the great words of vanity?

Observe this, ye thunderers of Rome, who come with roaring Bulls, and teach the ordinances of your Church, to speak louder than the Ordnance of war; there is not the greatest efficacy, where is the greatest noise. God shown but his powerfulness in those fierce representations, he loves to make way for himself in terror, but he conveys himself to us in sweetness, in that mild breath of mercy. Those Boanerges, the sons of thunder, first tame our proud natures with the gusts and flashes of the Law; but then the soft voice of Evangelical grace doth comfort and confirm us. But for those Jesuits; that preach unto us with the word in one hand, and the sword in the other, threatening blood and ruin, let them read Isaiah 53.7. and see whether they be like that Jesus, whose name they usurp. Examine their books, and you shall find many of them so fraught with boisterous invectives, and desperate untruths, that it is a question whether the Father of lies could out-do them: as if they meant plainly to write; not in the defense, but in the defiance of truth, of modesty, honesty, God and all goodness. The scope of their pretumide disputations, is rather to vent their own passions and uphold a side, than in zeal to holiness and to maintain the truth. Quibus potior est victoria, quàm veritas. Themselves would have the conquest, without respect of the truth. Nec veritati, nec paci cedere norunt; as Augustine said of the Rogatians. But where there is no mind of yielding, there is no end of disputing.

To conclude against these high swelling terms; we have reason, as to suspect the cause that needs them, so the men that use them. Even in moral or civil demeanor, a loud tongue is commonly a lewd tongue. We are in danger to be called in question for this days uproar, there being no cause, says the Town-clarke of Ephesus. If no cause, why all this noise? Why be many of our Courts of Justice turned into a Babel, if there were not more confidence in a Lawyers tongue, than desire of truth? Why are those railings and invectives among men? Why instead of the voice of the Turtle, is the voice of the Screechowl heard in our land? O there is a swelling heart in unmortified breasts, which cannot be suppressed, but would like new wine burst the vessels, if it were not broached & vented by foul language. What swelling words did Rabshakeh utter against the living God, and his Israel: yet Hezekiah held his peace. How contumelious & false were the accusations of Christ, yet even his silence was their conviction. The best confutation of their slanders, is not by our great words; but by our good works. Sophocles being accused by his own children, that he grew dotard, and spent their patrimonies idly; when he was summoned did not personally appear before the magistrates, but sent one of his new tragedies to their perusal; which being read, made them confess, Hoc non est opus delirantis; this is not the work of a man that doats. Against all clamors and swelling opprobries, set thy innocence and good life: Sic verbosa tacet clamosi turba sophistae: they shall be driven to acknowledge that these be not the courses of a dissolute sinner. Thus patience shall overcome clamour, and thy quiet heart shall be accepted of God.

In a word, the Church of God is not built up with noise. There was no axe nor hammer heard in the building of the Temple: the frame was made in Lebanon, and set up in Zion: there was no noise in the rearing, whatsoever was in the preparing. Lebanon might be loud, all is quiet in Zion. So doth the Church love peace, so do all seek peace that love the Church. Quarrells and contentions are for the world: let those Dogs snarl and fight, whose portion lies without. Peace and concord becometh the house of God. Schisms and wranglings, like axes and hammers, are the weapons of pride; cudgels thrown in by the devil, and taken up by malcontents, who bast one another while he stands by, and laughs. All Christians, especially Pastors should be men of meekness: otherwise while they pretend to take birds with their nets, they drive them away with their noise. The house of God is not built up with blows, with blows it is beaten down. God loves to see Holiness and Peace, and without Peace and Holiness no man shall see God. It follows,

They beguile:] This is their imposture. The metaphor is taken from fishing or fowling. Those fishes that were taken out of the feculent pond of this world, and put into the Crystal streams of the Church, are by these seducers again drawn out of the Streames of the Church into the pool of the world. The hook whereby they perform this, is fraud: the same devil teacheth his trade to all his followers: by fraud he overthrew our parents, and the same train he lays for their children: the Lyon is strong enough, but the Serpent doth the mischief. While Satan appears like a roaring Lyon, we are ready to run from him: but when he trans-shapes himself into a familiar form, we admit him too often, and suspect not the danger. They be the Foxes that spoil our grapes, that worry our Lambes. First, Foxes prey far from home, and do not mischief too near their own dens: so these compass Sea and Land, and will sails to the Indies to beguile souls. Secondly, Foxes range in the night, and keep their holes in the day: so these seducers abide not the day-light, but wander in shades, masked with visors, to effect their purposes. Thirdly, these Foxes fasten upon young Lambes, such as are poor in knowledge, and weak in faith; enticing simple women, that they may entice their husbands; after the practice of that old Raynard, who wrought Eve to work Adam. Thus the wife is ex professo a Recusant, while the lunatic husband is allowed once a Moon to sleep at Church, to save his fine. Fourthly, hungry Foxes will prey upon slight purchase, rather than fast: so they will stoop to cozen the meanest, where the great ones are too wise for them. Yea desperate fortunes have been the Popes special engines: the Ivy creeping along the ground, begins at first to compass the lowest part of the Oak; but works it self upwards by degrees, till it over-top the highest branch, sucks the sap, pierceth the pith, and ruins the whole Trunke. Fifthly, these Foxes will tell some truths, where it may win credit and advantage to their lying. If they spake nothing but true, they could not deceive us: if nothing but false, we would not believe them. Therefore they have some few truths at first, like three or four good Strawberries at the top, to help away the rest, even their sophisticate trash. A thief lighting into true-meaning company by the way, can talk of sincere dealing and uprightness, against robbery and oppression, to take off suspicion, till he spies his opportunity. The Dequoy will suffer the simple man to win for a while, till he hath whetted him on, then he leaves him in the lurch. If fraudulent Merchants had not some good wares, their base ones would not be saleable. But Paul cast out the soul spirit, that confessed him to be the servant of the most high God, and to teach the way of salvation, though he spake true; for he knew to what hellish purpose he spake it. The devil acknowledged Jesus, yet he commanded him to come out, though his testimony were true: whereby he taught us, not to give ear to Satan, though he tell the truth. Thus they cast dust in our eyes, that we might not see our way, and strike a hook in our nostrils, to lead us their own way: but it is no hard matter to spy out their juggling: though the Ass have put on the Lions skin, he may be discerned by the length of his ears. But in mean time, if they be conscious of their own frauds, (and I am so persuaded of many of them) and still persist; what Hell is deep enough for them, that seek and study to fill Hell with souls? You will say, that is but my persuasion; and so well I wish them, that I would for their own eternal states sake it were not true.

That they may not too unperceivedly catch us, let me a little bare their hook, and discover some of their wiles.

First, they tell us, the Church agrees, the Church cannot err: all which in their language is the Church of Rome. Take it so, and we may as soon find Paradise in Hell, as any Text in Scripture for it. The Seat of Abomination, the City of the Beast it calls her, not the Chair of the Church of God. That the Apostate Rome is the Catholic Church, the wit of Earth and Hell shall never be able to prove.

Secondly, that the Pope sits successively in Peters Chair: if we should grant it, for they cannot prove it; so did the Pharisees in Moses his Seat, yet neither the better, nor the holier for all that. A Seriphian told Themistocles, that his glory arose father from the renown of his country, than from the merit of his virtue. Not so, says Themistocles; for if I were a Seriphian, I would not live without honor; and if thou wert an Athenian, thou couldest not live without shame. For quae non fecimus ipsi, vix ea nostra voco. If Saint Peter were at Rome, he neither taught nor lived like the Pope: if the Pope sit in the same Chair, he neither lives nor teaches like Saint Peter. Neanthus a bungler, having got Orpheus his Harp, so jangled and jarred with it, that whiles he looked for listening Beasts, and dancing Trees, he brought the Dogs about his ears. The Pope hath so long boasted the name of Peter, that the world sees he hath nothing left but the bare name to boast of.

Thirdly, the Consent of Councils; a glorious gull and guile: as if no Council had ever condemned both their Popes and Opinions. As if the Council of Basil had not decreed, That one simple man alleging plain Scripture, was more to be believed, than a whole Council to the contrary. As if the last Trident Council were any other than the Popes Notarie or Secretarie, to engross that in fair Characters, which he had before written in a foul Copy. One saith truly of them; whereas they should have brought their Doctrine to the Rule, they forced the Rule to their Doctrine; and did not mean to say as Christ taught them, but to expound Christ's words as they would have them.

Fourthly, the harmony and consent of the Fathers. Indeed they were holy men, but men, not privileged from errors. Besides, Audiendi Patres, ut testes, non ut Iudices. Yet were they heard speak their own meaning, none of them would ever have been a Papist, sure not a Jesuit. I hope they do not mean those holy Ancients; as Father Moses, Father David, Father Isaiah; no, nor Father Paul, Father Peter: for impudence it self cannot deny that our Faith is built upon those Fathers, the foundation of the Prophets and Apostles; which they, for theirs, are scarce able to pretend, never to prove. What Fathers then? Father Lombard, Father Thomas, Father Scotus, Father Cajetan, Father Bellarmino; all the Popes true-borne Children: Who, though in many things they agree no better than Herod and Pilate, yet they all conspire to degrade Christ from his Office, as the other consented to bereave him of his life. Abraham is our Father, is a vain brag for the Gentiles.

Fifthly, the Scriptures, say they, are deep Mysteries, dangerous for common eyes: it is sufficient to credit their Teachers. Pestilent subtlety; so men shall never understand what the Lord says, but as they are pleased to report it. This is called Fides carbonaria, the Colliers Faith; and it shall leave animas carbonarias, souls as black as ever fire left coals. Search the Scriptures, saith Christ: you shall not, saith Antichrist: He saith, There is lively food; this saith, there is deadly poison. Whether of these shall we believe?

Sixthly, Vniversalitie; all Ages speak as we do: a gallant flourish, not unlike to Varnish; which makes Seelings not only shine, but last. To discern the true Church (whereof we must be, if we will be saved) from the false, (from which we must separate, unless we will be damned) they wholly stand upon multitudes. But if in secular affairs there be more fools than wise men, what is there in spiritual? As if it were not the broad Way which leads to destruction, through which many pass; and the narrow Way that leads to life, which few do find. When the Deluge came upon the World, whether was multitude or paucity a mark of the Church? What was Abraham's family in comparison of the Canaanites? What was Israel, and take in all her hypocrites, to the whole World? How was the Church discerned by multitudes, when the Rulers and multitude rejected Christ's own Person; Away with him, Crucify him? What be the largest dimensions of Popery to the extent of Paganism! either for multitude they are not better than we, or for multitude the Pagans are better than they.

Seventhly, Antiquity of Religion; a fraudulent ostentation. He is a shallow Herald, who when he must give honor of the first head, cannot fashion a sound of Ancestors. The Jews taxed Christ of noveltie, I hope no Papist will tax him of falsitie. We derive our Doctrine from the blessed Apostles; one would think that were ancient enough: will they go further? We have better proved ourselves the true Church before Luther, than they can ever vindicate themselves from being a false Church since Luther. Let them look to their Invocation of Saints, Purgatory, prayer for the dead; I hope they will pretend no antiquity for these. Their Mass, like a monster, was not begot all at once; but here a limb, there a member. God hath not built us a new Church, but reformed the old, by taking away their corruptions: whereas they will rather be confounded, than reformed.

Eighthly, Unity is a good argument, if it were true. But where is that Church which knows no division? There must be Sects, that the approved may be known. What Unity can Rome brag of, when Cano is against Cajetan, and Bellarmino against them both? To say nothing of Thomists against Scotists, the Black Friars against the Gray, the Dominicans against the Franciscans, and the Jesuits against them both. We have some petty jars about the Lace of Christ's Coat, they rent the Coat it self. When was the whole Church of God so happy▪ as to know no contention? Yea, rather such miserable distraction doth it suffer, that not only Christ's Garment is divided, as it was by the Soldiers; but his own blessed Body is torn, as if it were no better than the body of that Harlot, the Levites Concubine, which was chop'd in pieces, flesh and bones, and the twelve pieces sent into the twelve Tribes of Israel. Such is the faction and fraction, schism and separation in the body of Christ; Church against Church, Altar against Altar, Priest against Priest, Religion against Religion, Christian against Christian: yea, Satan sends his Instruments with Christ against Christ, and opposeth the truth of Divinity, under the color of divine authority. So that Religion is in a manner lost in the Questions of Religion; and speedes in the world, as She did in Plutarch, who had many Sutors; when everyone could not have her to himself, they pulled her in pieces, that so none might have her. Malunt nullam habere, quàm non suam. Because all men do not like their Religion, they will refuse all. So distraction in Religion is the destruction of Religion: for while they say, I am of Paul, I am of Apollo, I am of Cephas, I am of Calvin, I am of Luther, I am of Arminius, I am of Dominic, I am of Francis, I am of Jesus; Nemo fere Christi est, almost none are of Christ. Thus the Conscience of Religion is lost in the Controversies of Religion, and men rather strive to have a subtle head, than a sanctified heart; Mallent disputare quàm vivere: so little is the hope of Unity.

We partly see their Nets to ensnare us; which allurements if we have light to discern, they do not so give us over. Yea, they will rather mood all their Syllogisms in Ferio, and turn their arguments into Armado's: and whom they cannot subdue Gladio oris, with the Sword of the Mouth, they assault Ore gladii, with the Mouth of the Sword: their fraud shall betray it self into force, the Devil puts off the Fox, and puts on the Lyon. Antichrist thunders out his Excommunications, commends our throats to any knife, esteems our blood more vile than Beasts, and accounts us as Dogs; but it is only for baiting his Bulls. Swelling words declare themselves in wounding blows, so their Villanie comes out; and that Religion which pretended nothing but holiness, discovers it self in the highest degree of wickedness. True Religion is defended with prayers, not with violence; Ferunt, non feriunt Christiani. So Christ moriendo, non occidendo vicit.

But ô, to what execrable impiety will not mis-Religion drive? The King of Moab will sacrifice his eldest Son: as if he would win his cruel gods with so dear an Oblation, he sends up the blood of his Heir apparent in smoke to those hellish Deities. Such was the act of Agamemnon, assisting at the immolation of his own daughter. Tantum Relligio poterat suadere malorum. That Massacres, Homicides, Parricides, Powder-treasons, should be a proof of Religion, is an argument fetched à Barathro, whereof the Devil himself, if he could blush, would be ashamed. It was a great blasphemy when the Devil said, Ascendam, & ero similis altissimo, I will be like the most High: But a greater blasphemy, when God is feigned to say, Descendam & ero similis Infimo, I will be like the Prince of darkness. To make Religion stoop to such abominable actions, as the murdering of Princes, firing of States, butchering of Innocents, is such a Doctrine, as is not to be found in Lucian, Machiavel, or the most desperate Patrons of Atheism. Certainly, it is the nearest sin to that against the Person of the holy Ghost, instead of the likeness of a Dove, to bring him down in the likeness of a Vulture, or a Raven: nor can there be a greater scandal to their usurped Apostolical See, than out of the Bark of Saint Peter to set forth the flag of a Bark of Pirates and Assassins. Wise men observe, That there is no knot of thieves so dangerous, as when there is a whore in the company: That robbery is seldom without bloodshed: Naboth cannot lose his Vineyard without his life, if Jezebel have a hand in it. Now there is not so mischievous a strumpet in the world as the Whore of Babylon: to what cruelty cannot she exasperate her besotted amorists? Whither she can stretch her arm, she fills the Church back with furrows, and her heart with sorrows. But force never got ground of Truth: all attempters of that kind shall be driven to confess with that cruel Queen, Ego prosum solae nocendo.

I conclude; the law of nature, and the conscience of every man must needs secretly condemn Fraud; how much more doth it mis-become Christians? Let us look to that absolute Pattern, in whose mouth was found no guile; and to that true Israelite, whom he commended. The wit of man finds out many tricks and shifts in the world, either to do mischief, or to avoid it: there is one worth them all, simplicity of heart, and plain-dealing. Themistocles being entreated to play on an Instrument, answered, That he could not fiddle: but asked again, what he could do then? answered, That he could make a great City of a little one. Saint Augustine applies it to points of subtlety and perplexity; answer, that thou knowest nor what to answer; thy learning lies not that way. If further urged wherein thy learning lies, answer, Nosse te quomodo sine istis homo possit esse beatus; how without all these thou mayest be saved. Let others be full of the Politickes, it is good for us to be well habited in the Morals. Martha, Martha, attends ad plurima, One thing is necessary; integrity of heart. When the Fox bragged what a number of shifts and devices he had to get from the hound; the Cat said, she had but one; which was, to climb a tree. But when it came to the proof, this one was better worth than all the rest. Multa novit Vulpes, sed Felix unum magnum, in the proverb. Many a man's b•aine-piece is officina dolorum, a forge of frauds, wherein there are more engines of craft than cords in a Bark. But there is one worth a thousand of them, sincerity of dealing, and the integrity of a good conscience. Lord, remember how I have walked before thee with a perfect heart. I have not deceived for any reward on earth, and the Lord will not deceive me of my reward in heaven. A plain heart through a plain conversation, finds a plain way to everlasting benediction.

Through the lusts of the flesh.] Nothing sooner wins flesh and blood than a doctrine that tends to licentiousness. This is one especial cause of the increase of Popery, the plausibleness of it to carnal dispositions. Every Religion bears in her lineaments the image of her Parent. True religion is spiritual, and looks like God in her purity. False religion is carnal, and carries the face of nature, her mother; and of him whose illusion begot it, Satan. The former would kill the lusts of the flesh, the other would feed the lusts of the flesh; and make both a wanton mind, and a wanton body.

1. It advanceth the pride of nature, by telling her, that she can merit her own glory, without being much beholding to God's mercy: that she can fulfill the royal law, and so brave God in his Judgment, as if she needed no pardon. Yea, that she hath more works than she needs, and can (for money) help her neighbors: that some of her sins be venial in their nature, and not worthy of death. O how sweet a lesson this is to flesh and blood, even enough to make her run mad of self-conceit! Now hear the voice of truth: we say, that we have no good of our own, nor can do good of ourselves: that we are not sick, but dead in sins, and move not more than we are moved: that our best works are faulty, all our sins deadly, all our natures corrupted originally: that we have no merit but the mercy that saves us: that nothing but the blood of Christ can cleanse us, that his mediation is more than sufficient to save us, his sufferings to redeem us, his obedience to enrich us. Now come to the trial: which of these gives the glory to God, and which the reins to concupiscence? If Nature be honored, is not God dishonored? Is not all that bravery stolen from grace, which is put upon the back of nature? Will Sara take it well, that Hagar should usurp her freedom? No, God teacheth us to abase nature, to tread her in the dust, to spoil her of her proud rags, to load her with reproaches; and to give that glory to Him, who says he will not give it to another. This is to give nature what is nature's, and to God what is God's.

2. It tends to dissoluteness, while they teach that it is both easy and safe, to believe with the catholic Collier, as the Church believes, at a venture: that they may spare the labor of searching, and need not much knowledge to salvation: that the mere sign of the cross can drive away devils: that a little alms can make amends for a great deal of injustice: that they may have an indulgence to dispense with a sin before they do it: that a man's self may buy out hell while he lives, and his executors or friends may buy him out of Purgatory when he is dead. O doctrine delectable to flesh and blood! What matter is how unsound his devotions be, how lewd his life, how heinous his sins, that knows these refuges? Hear the truth, that teacheth us (against nature) to strive unto sincere faith, without which we have no part in Christ, no benefit by his sufferings, no comfort in our own good works: that our heart must be zealously active in all our devotions, and without it, the hand and tongue are but hypocrites: that the hand must do good deeds, or else the presuming heart is but an hypocrite: that we must expect no pardon for sin before we commit it, and from Christ alone when we have committed it, and to repent before we expect it; that life is the time of mercy, death of retribution. I hope, flesh and blood takes no pleasure in such a message. So clearly manifest is it, which of these two religions is framed to the humor of nature, and is indulgent to the lusts of the flesh. From all which, let me deduce these two conclusions:

1. It is a very easy thing to be a Papist: for what injunction hath it, which a Libertine will not admit? To sin and confess, to confess and sin; to be drunk and vomit, to vomit and again be drunk, what true Trojan dislikes? But they have strait rules, as fastings, scourgings, hair-cloths, weary pilgrimages, blushing confessions, willful beggary, and perpetual continency by solemn Vow: what fair pretence is here of mortification, by them that love it as dearly as a Dog doth a cudgell? But is all this true? To ride up and down in their Coaches with their Concubines, is this mortification? To be lodged like Princes, and clothed like Dives, in fine Linnen, is this hair-cloth? To abstain from course flesh, and feed on choice dainties, is this fasting? Or to drink the strongest Wines, till their faces discover their hypocrisies? When the world is together by the ears, who shall bestow most upon them, is this their willful poverty? Surely they take great pains, to tell over so many thousand crowns, as come yearly tumbling into their coffers. For the Pope to ride on men's shoulders, is this humility? Or to think he does the man a grace, whom he admits to kiss his Pantofle? To abjure a marriage-bed of their own, and to dishonor the marriage-bed of others; to forbear allowed matrimony, and admit forbidden adultery, or the deflouring of virginity; is this their Vow of continence? O that these criminal doings were not more true than their penal sufferings! And what if they should perform all that they pretend, and in the austerity of their will-worship go beyond us; yet let them not insult in the victory, for the Priests of Baal went beyond them. I hear much of the Romanists whips, I hear nothing of their knives; they may scourge, they will not lance and carve their flesh in their devotions. The Baalites did it, yet were never the wiser, never the better, never the nearer. What then do they get by this self-devised rigor? Either it makes them not better than us, or it makes the Priests of Baal better than them; let them take their choice. In all these, the flesh is served, the soul is starved: a small difficulty is admitted, that a greater might be avoided: they leave that which God commands them, to do that for which he will never thank them.

2. To be a good Christian, is a far harder task, and lies in another kind of combat; not in macerating the flesh, but in mortifying the lusts of the flesh. I do not find that God ever required or accepted the self-tortures of his servants; he takes no pleasure in our blood, in our carcasses: they mistake him, that think to please him by destroying that nature which he hath made, and measure truth by the rigor of outward extremities. Elias drew no blood of himself, the Priests of Baal did. It is true, inward crucifying of our corruptions, the subduing our spiritual insurrections, by the noble exercises of severe restraint, that he commands and accepts. To work our stubborn wills to an awful subjection, to draw this untoward flesh to a sincere cheerfulness in God's service, to reach unto a sound belief in the Lord Jesus, to pray with a true heart, without distraction, without distrust, to keep ourselves in the continual fear of God; these be the tasks of a Christian, worthy of our pains, worthy of our comfort. The rest is but a careless fashionableness, as if it had nothing to do with the soul. Give us obedience, let them take sacrifice. For men to walk with God, so long as plenty doth walk with them, and while they may stretch their limbs on a peaceable couch, eating the fruits of their own vineyards, is not worth either reward or thanks. The valor of such men will faint when it comes to the push; and with Archilochus, they will rather Clypeum abjicere, quàm perire. But to love that God who crosseth us, to kiss that hand which strikes us, to trust in that power which kills us; this is the honorable proof of a Christian. It is a vain consideration; will Jerusalem yield me the same delights that I enjoy in Egypt? Is there such store of flesh-pots in that country, as we have in ours? Will Religion allow me this wild liberty of my actions, this loose mirth, these carnal pleasures? Can I be a Christian, and not live sullenly? None but a regenerate heart can choose rather to suffer affliction with God's people, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. An easy importunity will persuade Orpah to return, from a mother in Law to a mother in Nature, from a toilsome journey to rest, from strangers to her kindred, from a hopeless condition to likelihoods of contentment. A little entreaty will serve to move nature to be good to it self. But to hamper our extravagant lusts, to subdue our rebellious desires, to cross nature in her affected delights, this is the business of a Christian. To persist in the actions of goodness, though tyranny, torment, death, and hell stood in our way, this is that conquest which shall be crowned with glory.

Those that were clean escaped.] Some read, For a little, or For a little while: the one translation having respect to the degree of their escaping, the other to the time; Quantum, and Quamdiù; for a small measure, or for a short space. We read it, Cleane escaped: they were not quite delivered from sin, but from the external profession of sin, and from the doctrine that maintains sin. The people that escaped from perishing in the conspiracy Corah, were not all holy: for the next day fourteen thousand and seven hundred died in the plague for murmuring against their Governor. They went out from us, but they were not of us. The children of the world may outwardly be gathered to the congregation of Israel, yet not be of Israel. When it was represented to Alexander, to the advantage of Antipater, who was a stern and imperious man, that he only of all his Lieutenants wore no Purple, but kept the Macedonian habit of Black; Alexander replied, Yes, but Antipater is all purple within. Divers good men do not pretend so much strictness outwardly, but they are pure within; Omnis decor ab intus, The Kings daughter is all glorious within. Whereas hypocrites wear not the color of mischief in their external habits, but they are all purple within. Inwardly they are ravening Wolves: their inwards are spak'd and rotten: their inward parts is very wickedness. They are escaped, as a man from some dangerous sickness, but not fortified against death. As a man flies from a Lyon, and a Bear meets him, or leans his hand on the wall, and a Serpent bites him. They are escaped from the Lyon and the Bear, gross and raging impiety and Idolatry: but in the house of God they are bitten by a Serpent, slye hypocrisy. Escaped, as a vagabond from a shole of beggars, reformed to some civilitie; yet tempted again to wander with a new Doxy. O how far may a man go in the outward profession of Truth, and yet be an Hypocrite, be an Apostate, be a reprobate! This is discerned by their next estate;

They are again returned to error.] What a poor way went they toward Heaven, so soon to turn back? Even so far as Orpah with her mother Na••i toward Canaan, a mile or two, and then back again to Moab. The devotion of worldlings is all for a gird; they will run apace for a spurt, and then afterward stand still and breathe them. They were but equivocal members of the visible incorporation: and when their consciences shall be wounded with God's judgments, they shall cry as he did in Homer; This is the blood of a man, not such as issueth from the gods: this was at the first and best, but flesh and blood; not the unloseable grace of sanctification. It is but Ephraim's morning dew; let the Sun of prosperity rise but two hours high, the dew is gone. A Galatian humor; to begin in the spirit, and to end in the flesh: like a Meteor or gliding star, that seemed in heaven, shot through the air, and lighted on a dunghill. Or like a Bowle thrown up a hill, which climbs according to the strength that forced it; and when it is come to the furthest, returns down to the own place. These violent motions have ever the less perpetuity. Their Cloth hath a fair gloss, but when the iron of trial is put to it, presently it shrinkes. As the Samaritans sought bread for their life, not the Bread of life; and when that bread failed, Christ might sit long enough ere they sought him. But good Christians seek not Panem multitudinis, but multitudinem Panis; Christ himself. They that adhere to God for any second cause out of himself, shall soon lose him, and all good things with him. Beasts will suspect the train, and birds the snare, out of which they are escaped; have rational creatures less wit than beasts or fowls? Lucullus having entertained Pompey in one of his magnificent houses, Pompey commended it for a stately house in the Summer, but he thought it would be too cold for the Winter. Whereto Lucullus; Do you not think me as wise as divers fowls are, to remove with the season? Have we less providence than birds, to fall into that trap out of which we have been delivered? Alas, that there should be any among us, who from the midst of our salt waves should come out fresh and unseason'd! That all these heavenly showers shall fall besides them, while they like Gideon's Fleece want moisture! That being by a mighty hand delivered out of Egypt, they should again fall down before that Calf, whose power they so confounded! That being hailed out of the Lake of Iniquity, they should again plunge themselves into it, to their own everlasting ruin! Now the Lord lay hold upon us, that we may lay hold upon him, and never let go that hold till we come to Heaven.

1. Wrapped in error:] Some notice is to be taken of the phrase, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, involuti, intricati, entangled. All sin is a Labyrinth; the entrance is easy, all the difficulty is to get out again. Iael invites Sisera to her Tent, and wraps him warm, but he shall never return through those doors alive. A Bird is so wrapped in the Net, that the more she strives, the faster she sticks. The Fly entangled in the web, soon becomes the Spiders breakfast. Sin hath such a clinging quality, that if it once embrace and take hold of the soul, it binds it up in pleasing fetters, as Samson was tied with Delila's tresses, more than with the cords of the Philistines. Therefore they be called Funes peccatorum, retia inferni, and vincula animae; the worst Obligation, where-out the bounden shall never get, till Christ have discharged the debt. The Anchorite is not so mur'd up in a wall, and confined to his own ordure, as the sinner to his lust and filthiness. Suppose he walks abroad, yet he is not at liberty, because he carries his •yle about with him. Other malefactors are within their prison, he hath his prison within himself: and whithersoever he runs, like the stricken Deere, haeret lateri lethalis arundo. All his honors and pleasures cannot free h m from his bonds, only he is in the number of those Jail-birds, that have the favor to beg in their chains. Why cannot we persuade rich men to be charitable? Alas, they are so wrapped up in their covetous desires and insatiate lusts, that you may with as good success stand in the street, and bid a prisoner come out of his dungeon. As Lazarus in his grave was wrapped up with his towell and winding-sheet, so are dead sinners folden up in their sensuality; and nothing can loose them, but that same Exi Lazare, from the mouth of Jesus Christ.

2. The practice of these deceivers is upon them that are escaped from their errors. As the good Shepherd leaves the ninety nine that are safe, and seeks that which is lost; so the malignant Jailor, without any strict watch upon the malefactors in safe custody, pursues after him that hath broke prison. Sensuall men have the least trouble; they are as sure as temptation can make them: they are rebel, not parasites, against whom the tyrant bends his forces. They that are wedded to the world as to a Wife, and count pleasure their Strumpet, do seldom hear the roaring noise of the enemy. It is the Fort of Holiness that is most besieged with assaults and stratagems. There is some satisfaction and comfort in this, that Satan will not let us alone: it is a sign we are not his, when he is so busy about us. Even this just war is a thousand times better than an unjust peace. It was the Spouses charge concerning her Beloved, Waken him not till he please. No other is Satan's command to his officious spirits, concerning his sleepy followers; Do not waken them, let them sleep their last. But for those that have renounced his sovereignty, and denied him allegiance, let them sit fast; if all the winds from the smoakie corners of hell, or all the gentle airs of the pleasures on earth; if either the blandiment of fair words, or the brandishment of keen swords, can prevail against them, they shall fall. But as a gallant soldier said, Let me be a Carthaginian, though I have Rome mine enemy: so let me be a Christian, an escaped soul, reformed from error and sin, though Rome and Hell, Man and Devil conspire against me. There is one able enough to save me, in whom I trust.

Through much wantonness.] This is that little postern set open, to which Satan is so much beholding for his re-admittance. Wantonness, whether of soul or body, makes way for the devil. There be such as love crotchets and divisions, not caring for the plain song: stomachs that within one month are weary of Manna; that set more by sallets and sauces & kickshawes, flashes of wit, than substantial food, the Word of God. These indeed turn grace into wantonness, while they turn the Word of grace into curiousnesse, verity into vanity. How easily are these wanton minds wrought upon? What wind is so weak, as not to move the fane? What toy will not win a child? A mind forestalled with levity, is like a vessel without ballace, soon overset. The light-headed are light-heeled; such Dinah's will not scape deflouring. Here is the advantage of the seducers, Levitas fallendorum. At this hint Mahumet begun his religion, compounding it of all opinions, to allure and gratify all nations. If the Sabellians had lost the distinction of Persons, or the Ariens Christ's Divinity, or the Marcionites his humanity, or the followers of Macedonius the Deity of the holy Ghost, or the Jews their Circumcision, or the Rabbins their Talmud, they are sure to find it all in Turkism. Because the Arabians were thieves, he allowed theft: because his soldiers especially those of Heraclius, were malicious, he allowed revenge: hurt him that hurts you: he that killeth his enemy, or is killed by his enemy, shall not fail of entering into Paradise. To satisfy lust, he permits the multitude of wives, and divorcement for trifling causes. Now what a potent king, and of what large command, is he grown by this indulgence to men's Wantonness?

I would we had no parallel for him in Christendom. But alas, what is Papism, but a truss of Schisms, a bundle of Heresies, a Religion many ways compounded, that all might be pleased? If old men be covetous, young men voluptuous, Nobles ambitious, common persons ceremonious; whosoever is led with any kind of wantonness, they have allurements for all. For the avarous, that follow riches with craft and cruelty, they have devised a Purgatory: by which trick, they will get one half, the offender shall keep the other half, and the poor shall have never a Doit. For the voluptuous, their Doctrine admits simple fornication, and their practice erecteth Stews; out of which they raise large sums, nor do his holy fingers scorn to touch the moneys. Vespasian did set a Tribute upon Vrine, his son Titus stormed at it, as a matter indigne and sordid. Some time after, Vespasian sent for a piece of Silver out of the Tribute-money, and bidding his son smell to it, asked him, whether he found any offense? Titus answered, No: Why loe, saith Vespasian, and yet this comes out of Vrine. But one would think, that the High Priest of Rome should disdain that Silver or Gold, that is derived from the allowance of such nastie turpitudes. But avaritia, magis quàm necessitas, cogit ad turpia. To draw on the dissolute, they have ordained many odd holydayes, and half-holydayes, wherein they may ring, sing, and dance. To win ambitious spirits, they teach, That the Pope can give Kingdoms, (to such as can get them) they dispense with loyalty, and bestow a Crown in Heaven on those that can pluck a Crown from any excommunicate Kings head on Earth. Lest men should be dis-heartened with the greatness of their sins, they have abundance of Venials, to be washed off with an aspergis of holy-water; a connivence for the least, a Pardon for the greatest, to all them that will pay for it. Because knowledge is a trouble in the getting, and men naturally love to be lazy, they fit their humors, with Devotion as the seed of Ignorance, Images are Laymens Books, reading the Scriptures makes Heretics, and that faith is sufficient which is folded up in the common fardle. Lastly, that poverty of Truth may not breed contempt, they have mimike and comicall actions in those mysteries which should be sacred, clerical shavings, uncleanly Unctions, crossings, creepings, censings, sprinklings, coozening Miracles, garish Processions, tossing of Beads, christening of Bells, hallowing of Candles, Wax, Chrism, Ashes, Palms, Garments, Swords, Water, Salt, and what not? So easily do these Pontifical solemnities allure to Wantonness, and work upon petulant affections.

I conclude, we see here the danger of wantonness, of dallying with our conscience, and yielding the reins to our inordinate affections. There be three goodly sights, a Penitent sinner, a Patient sufferer, and a Thankful receiver. And there be three other as ill favored and scandalous; a Proud beggar, a Rich robber, and a Wanton professor. Of all conditions there is none more culpable than a wanton Christian. That heavenly pattern of ours, in the days of his humiliation, is never read to laugh. I do not bid you follow him in that altogether; for there is a season for us to be merry in him, who could never have been happily merry without him. But when our laughter shall turn into profaneness, our mirth into lasciviousness, this is a demeanour unbecoming Christians. But wanton children play with their meat: we come with fear and reverence to deliver to you these holy mysteries; as it was told the Vestall, that holy things were to be handled magis sancte, quàm scite: O let the fruits answer the seed: Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling. Otherwise, they that drown all their devotion in wantonness, shall at last lose all their jovialty in wretchedness. Death will set a period to all joy, if sorrow have not prepared an antidote for death. Let us mourn here; this is the way to be merry hereafter. Our tears are but temporal, when God hath viped them off, our joys shall be eternal. Now the Spirit of God keep us in the sobriety of grace, that the Son of God may admit us into the Court of glory.

2 PET. 2.19.

While they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption: for of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage.

THE common pretence for the most unbounded licentiousness, hath been liberty. In that nefarious and disloyal conspiracy and murder of Julius Caesar, the general dispensation of their conscience was liberty. Catilines foul trechery was set off with the colors of liberty. When Sheba would invite Israel from a just and lawful subjection, to the bondage of an usurper, he proclaims a liberty; Every man to his Tents, he meant every man to his own Tent. And that people, which had but as yesterday fallen in the design of Absalom, a son of their King; are now again up in arms under Sheba, a subject of their King, a rebel against their King. As Bees when they are up in a swarm, are ready to light on every bough; so the Israelites being stirred by the late commotion, are apt to follow the head of any faction. When the rulers conspire against Christ, they project liberty; Let us break their bands. Laws are bands; for the wild, to cicure and humble them; for the weak to secure and keep them: they that would oppress their inferiors, and never be called in question for it by their betters, would break the bands. Pride, idleness, drunkenness, and all manner of dissoluteness, cannot range their voluptuous chases, till the boundaries be removed: let them dissolve the coards of morality, and then they proclaim liberty. So doth corrupt nature abhor restraint, that it embraceth any doctrine which shall but promise liberty. While they promise them liberty, &c.

The parts of this Text have a chain of dependence. First the main scope is the allurement of the weak, in general. Secondly, the way of this allurements is by Promise. Thirdly, the force of that Promise is Liberty. Fourthly, the conviction of that force, The promisers are bound, Themselves are the servants of corruptions. Fifthly, the proof of that conviction; For of whom a man is overcome, of the same he is brought in bondage.

First, for the main scope, the seducement of the weak. It was Christ's charge to Peter, When thou art converted, convert thy brethren. It is Satan's charge to his agents, now you are confounded, confound your brethren. He that is not cross to Christ, cannot be Antichrist. There be many Antichrists, saith Saint John: there is a mean Antichrist, and a main Antichrist: every false teacher is a mean one, but there is another that is the main Antichrist. The old fox hath abundance of cubbes; and as Christ said to Peter and the Apostles, Feede my lambs; so he to these instruments, Fleece, flay, worrey the Lambes. Christ came to heal the wounded, to bring deliverance to captives: they come to wound the whole, to bring the delivered into captivity. He to call sinners to repentance, they to call the righteous into wickedness. He, to save that which was lost: they, to spill that which might be saved. Such is the implacable enmity of the Prince of darkness against the children of light, that he will rather make his own fire hotter, than not labor to bring them to the participation of his torments.

But O what shall we say to the ring-leaders of this infernal conspiracy? Many sorrows shall be to the wicked; but how infinite is their portion that make men wicked? Let him know, that converteth a sinner from the error of his way, that he saveth a soul from death, and hides a multitude of sins. So let him know, that perverteth the righteous from the truth of his way, that he doth bring a soul unto death, and occasion a multitude of sins. If they that turn men to righteousness, shall shine as the stars in heaven: then they that turn the just to error, shall burn as everlasting coals in the furnace of hell. He that doth ill, and teacheth so, shall be minimus in coelo, but maximus in inferno. Even to pejorate men by bad example, is a mischief intolerable: and corrupt patterns shall find an unanswerable indictment for the filthy copies that have been taken from them; though they neither forced, nor tempted, nor persuaded to them. That which custom hath made honorable, will by great men's refusal grow contemptible. Young Gentlemen in Athens used to play on the Recorder: but when Alcibiades, viewing his face in a glass, as his cheeks were puff'd up with blowing the Instrument threw away the pipe with indignation, all the Gallants presently cashier'd that kind of music. And when eminent persons take up things contemptible, their followers think them honorable. What was more vile than the office of Scavengers, the charge of scouring the sinks and gutters? Yet when worthy Epaminondas had once borne the office it was sought for among other preferments. Exemplary evils be bad enough, but how deep a place is prepared for them in Tophet, that willfully seduce others to dishonor their Maker? It is dreadful to think, horrible to feel, the bitterness of their damnation.

Secondly, the way of this allurements is by Promise: where we have diverse considerations:

2. Promises are the cheapest things men can part withal, and yet the strongest enchantments. The cheapest; therefore he that is poor in every other thing, can be rich in promises. Of all members, the tongue decays least and last: there is no fear of wearing out that. The legs decay with travel, the arms with labor, all with age; but the tongue holds out, unless the Palsy or such accident seizeth on it. It is commonly two years after we are borne, ere we can speak with it; but it is scarce two hours before we die, that we lose it. Still that little filme or flesh retains the vigor, when the rest languish into impotency, as one clapper will wear out divers Bells. Nepthali giveth goodly words: this is every man's bounty, what a Nabal is that, which will neither hear good words, nor give them? He did not only give David's servants nothing, but that which was worse than nothing, bad language. All Israel knew and honored their deliverer; yet this clown to save his victuals, will needs either make him a man of no merits, or of ill; either an obscure one, or a fugitive. Suppose he feared Saul's revenge, and therefore resolved to shut his hands; yet he might have so tempered his denial, that the repulse might have been free from offense: but now his foul mouth doth not only deny, but revile. It should have been Nabal's glory, that his Tribe yielded such a Successor to the Throne of Israel: now his envy stirs him up to disgrace that man who surpassed him in honor and virtue, more than he was surpassed by him in wealth and ease.

Faire words, we say, never hurt the tongue: they do less hurt the purse. Never man was the worse, or the poorer for good language. Saint James speaks of some verbal benefactors: now to say, Be warmed, doth not cost them one stick from their wood-piles. Be clothed, fetches not one cast garment from their wardrobes: Be filled, derives not a crust from their cupboards: yet such hypocrites are condemned of uncharitableness. How fearful then shall be the account of savage cruelty; that doth gravatis addere gravamina, trampling upon them with scorn, whom God hath humbled with misery; and instead of healing their wounds, set them afresh bleeding by their reproaches? With the same ease men may speak well, that they do speak ill: yea of the two, bad words are commonly the loudest, and put the Organs of speech to more stress: therefore Paul calls maledicentia, a crying. It is a question, whether the flatterer or blasphemer shall have the upper hand in the Kingdom of hell: unless we moderate it thus; that the hypocrites tongue shall be everlastingly bitten with scorpions; and the blasphemers burn in unquenchable flames. By how much easier the Law, by so much sorer the punishment for breaking that law. Now there is nothing easier than to speak fair: as the Beggar told the Bishop, when instead of an alms he gave him his blessing; that if that blessing had been worth a penny, he would not have been so bountiful. They be uncharitable passengers, that will not bless the reapers: like our hide-bound, heart-bound, tongue-bound peevish sectaries; that will not vouchsafe a Good day, or a Good speed to their neighbors. As they delight not in blessing, so it will be far from them.

2 Faire promises are strong snares to entangle fools. Everyone is not a Joab to be fetched home to us with firing his fields; as they say, witches are brought to the house where they have done mischief, by casting some relicts into the fire. The devil did not appear to Christ in a terrible form, threatening the calamities of earth, or torments of hell; but by fair promises, of many kingdoms. How impudent was that presumption; even such as hell it self might well have been ashamed of. A beggarly spirit that hath not an inch of earth, offers the world to the Maker of it, to the Owner of it: God's slave would be adored of his Creator. But let this teach us, that he will not be sparing of false boasts, and unreasonable promises to us, that dares offer him kingdoms, by whom alone are made all Kings. Promises; this was his way at the beginning; Ye shall be as gods, to our first parents: this is the proceeding with all their children; honor, and wealth, and ease, are the proposed rewards of unrighteousness. If the king of Moab promise gold and promotion, the covetous Prophet cannot hold off. Shall not their substance be ours? That promise won the Shechemites to so painful a condition, to so bloody a conclusion. Temptations on the right hand are most dangerous: how many that were hardened with fear, yet have melted with honor? There is no doubt of that soul, that will not bite at the golden hook. Some indeed are so cunning, that they will do more for a small present benefit, than for the promise of a tenfold value. Satan is fain to stop their mouths with ready money: Gehazi shall have the talents, Achan the golden wedge. O that man were but so wary as to say, Timeo Danaos & dona ferentes. These be the strong lines of Rome, whereby she catcheth so many Trouths and Gudgens, Promises: whereof she is as liberal, as ever was Antigonus, who was called Antigonus daturus. Similes habeant labia lectucas: let such asses have no other provender but promises.

3 It is ill to promise, and to deceive: but it is worse to promise with a purpose to deceive. Even to renew or delay just promises, is faulty: Terminum termino addere, is not only negandi calliditas, but negando pejus. We may safely doubt $\langle \diamond \rangle$ sit beneficium, cujus dilatio cruciat expectantom. Such be the proverbial speeches; Crescente herbâ, moritur equus: and Dum Canis mingit, fugiens Lupus evadis. The God of truth dwells in heaven, he hath made no room there for the children of falsehood. Truth is the columnne of commerce, the bond of society, the seal of equity; and where that fails, the very foundation is cast down. Yea, it is the obligation of conscience, to which we set our tongues as hands, and our fidelity as seals: if not an act and deed, yet the first act of a seasonable deed: which he that willfully breaks, shall be in the end as bankerout of credit, as he is already of grace. I know there be some faulty promises, better broken than kept: In malis promissis rescinde fidem. Concerning which a man is in vovendâ stultus, in reddendo impius. But the good man breaks not his promise, though he be damaged by the performance. Vdislaus King of Hungary falsifying his promise and oath, at the earnest instance of two Cardinals, set upon Amurath the Turk unawares: who perceiving his soldiers falling, and victory flying from his side, pulled a copy of the truce out of his bosom, and lifting up his eyes toward heaven, uttered words to this purpose. O Jesus Christ, loe these are the Leagues which thy servants have broken, after confirmation of them by thy Name: if thou be a God, as they say thou art, revenge this injury done to thee and me, by plaguing these perjured miscreants. Scarce had he ended this strange petition, but the success of the battle turned, the King was slain, his army discomfited, and his people pitifully butchered.

This hath been one of Rome's old tricks. John Hus had a promise, and (more) a safe-conduct to the Council of Constance: yet those forsworn persecutors put him to death. A foul fact, not only against the Law of Christians, but of nations: yet how have they blanched it? First, that the safe conduct was not granted by the Concell, but by Sigismund; as if these could be distinguished; in which the fault is not discharged, but translated. Secondly, That it was a protection against unlawful violence, not against lawful execution. How absurd? When he suffered in that very cause, for which he received warrant of security. Thirdly, he had it to come, but not to return: but this is an evasion that may wrest laughter from the spleen of gravity it self: as if where access is promised, recesses were not always included: as if an understanding man would move one foot out of doors upon such weak terms of assurance. Such hath been the conscience of Romish promises: we expect fidelity from Papistry, Sicut Britannia suum Arthurum, sicut Indai n^ov^o Messiam. Only we are sure of one thing; if we never trust them, they shall never deceive us. Therefore when the Deputies of the reformed Religion in France, after the Massacre that was on Saint Bartholomew's day, treated with the King and Queen mother, and some other of the Council, for Peace, and both sides were agreed upon the Articles; the sole question was, the security of performance. After some particulars propounded and rejected, the Queen mother said, Why is not the word of a King sufficient security? One of the Deputies answered; No, by Saint Bartholomew, Madame. They that encourage their Proselytes to promise great matters to us, whom they account heretics, and by their Doctrine absolve them from all performance, deserve no better trust or credit than very devils. How like are they to those two sons of Jacob, bloodily breaking their promise to the Shechemites, whose act their own father cursed? To execute rigor upon a submissive offender, was more merciless than just: to inflict a punishment so far exceeding the fault, was cruel. If they had been fit Judges, who were bloody executioners; or if the penalty had been proportionable from another; yet in them that had vowed peace, and promised affinity, it was shamefully injurious. To disappoint the trust of another, to neglect our own word and fidelity for private purposes, adds faithlesnesse to cruelty. They never mean us so deadly a storm, as when they make fair weather, and bear us in hand, all is peace. The Spanish proverb is true in them, C'ome Santo, y caga Diabolo; They have eaten down Saints, and void forth Devils. Alas, how woeful a complaint have I here just cause to take up!

Truth faints and swoons in the street, and nobody will so much as give it a little Aquavitae, to recover it. There is a decay and declination, as of the strength of the world, so of all goodness. We are the dross, the refuse, the fag-end of mankind; upon whom, not the end, but the ends, not of the world, but of worlds and ages fore-passed, are not come, but met together, in an unhappy conjunction. The alacrity and vigor of the whole creature is worn away: Justice draws her breath faint and short; Equity is knocked down with the beams of the Ballance; Charity hath caught an everlasting cold; Conscience is taken with a Lethargy; and Fidelitie, like a little Gold, is so lost in the sophisticate mass of self-love and policy, that when the great Judge comes, he will scarce find it upon earth. This daily defection grows still upon us, which was prophesied above fifteen hundred years ago, That in the last days there should be Promise-breakers. All sin spreads, and like the Plague disperseth it self: thus Pride is gone from the Court to the Country, and Covetousness from the Country to the Court; Swearing from the Gentleman to the Beggar, and Drunkenness from the Beggar to the Gentleman. If some sin be more predominant in some places; as high-mindedness is busy about riches, malice, or private revenge about authority; unfaithfulness fills all places. Rich mizers hoard it up with their Gold, and Poverty makes it her staff to walk withal: the Sycophant lives by it, as his daily bread; and great men do not scorn it, for an advantage: the young learn it for their first Lesson, and the old keep it to the last. This false coare rots us at the heart, while our skins be fair and unblemished. Now quo fonte derivata clade? we have broken our promise with God, and how should men trust us?

There is a Book written against them, a flying, a burning Roll, that shall destroy their houses, and themselves. God will one day bring it forth: it may be while the words are in their memory, the Vision may cross their brains, and the wings of this Book flutter over their drowsy consciences; till out of a furious paroxisme, they vent this hideous exclamation, The Book, the Book, amongst the rest of their frantic imaginations. A terrible supposition, may some say: but terrors are no wonders, when God comes to Judgment. Certainly, the guiltiness of this infidelity and willful coozenage, is like a Match laid to fire a trayne of Powder; it burns dimly on, to the appointed time; and then at one fearful Blow it blows up all. A detestable sin, a deprecable punishment!

4. Seducers refuse no way, so they may deceive: Iurant, perjurant; they will say and swear, promise and lie, propose and interpose, to make strong their party. Absalom stood at the Court gates, and having first taken the eyes and tongues of the people with his expensive bravery, lays also snares for their hearts, by liberal promises, and courtly policy; what he would do for them, were he a Judge. His ear is open to all Plaintiffes, all Petitioners: there is no Cause which he flatters not; his hand welcomes every man with a salutation, his lips with a kiss. O courteous, beauteous, bounteous Absalom: this was the common acclamation. Sed promissa tyrannorum finiuntur in ruina credentium. Indeed they have arguments in all moods and figures, but their last is à fasciculis. It is recorded of Cacus, a notorious thief, that when he had stolen beasts, he would drag them into his Cave backward, by their tayles; that by the contrary track of their feet he might be freed from the suspicion of theeverie. So to their holes of rapine and mischief they dragge backwards, that the Innocents may rather seem to have freely passed from them, than to be surprised by them. Our English Papists, smarting under the hand of Justice, which they call Persecution, some of them seeing both the promises of Rome, and their present fortunes at home failing together, began to totter, and make show of turning to the Gospel. Whereupon the Pope hath been fain more than once to send them a Token, wherein were printed the five wounds of Christ, with this Motto or Poesie, Fili da mihi cor tuum, My son give me thy heart. Thus by maintaining their dissimulation to us, he maintained his own dissimulation to them: or else they were in a wrong Box, for they came to Church by warrant of that Emblem. Ever since they have learned to temporize, having one heart for God, and another for Baal; one for the Prince, and another for the Pope; one for the Communion, and another for the Mass. So that neither Protestants nor Papists can tell whose they be, nor themselves whose they shall be.

O this heart of man, how deceitful it is upon the weights! How like a close dark Vault, without any crevice to look into it! The Poets fain, that when Jupiter had made man, and was delighted with his own beauteous fabric, he asked Momus, what fault he could espy in that curious Piece, what out of square, or worthy blame. Momus commended the proportion, the complexion, the disposition of the lineaments, the correspondence and dependence of the parts; and in a word, the harmony of the whole. He would see him go, and liked the motion; he would hear him speak, and praised his voice and expression. But at last he found a fault, and asked Jupiter, whereabouts his Heart lay? He told him, within a secret chamber, like a Queen in her privy Lodging; whither they that come, must first pass the Great Chamber, and the Presence. There is the Court of Guard, forces and fortifications to save it, shadows to hide it, that it might not be visible. There then is the fault, saith Momus: thou hast forgotten to make a window into this chamber, that men might look in, and see what the heart is doing; and whether her Recorder, the Tongue, do agree with her meaning. If a window were framed into the breasts of these deceivers, how would the black devices which they contrive in tenebris, be palpably odious; how would the coals of festering malice blister their tongues, and scald their lips! Then we should see how they Packe and Shuffle, and mean in their time to Cut also, or to Deale a poor Game to the Innocent. But that privy chamber hath a window only to God's, not man's or Angels inspection.

I conclude: It is the sweetest thing in the world to be innocent, to be freed from the check of an impartial conscience; which will as surely tell us our unfaithfulness, as ever we durst be unfaithful. There is not the least promise made, but there it is entered: if it be performed, the Book is crossed; if not, it remains upon record, an evidence against us. A man passeth by the poor; promiseth to give them something as he comes back: this promise is written in heaven, and it is not safe to mock God, who in all lawful things binds us to our word. If the good man promise to his own hurt, yet he changeth not. If he be spare in promising, yet he will be sure in performing. Post pactum mala consultatio. How welcome is sleep, when we lay down our heads upon the pillow that bears not the burden of unfaithfulness! Let the cunning men of the world triumph in their riches, overlooke all their injuries, make themselves merry with their witty deceivings; this and that we have gotten by cleanly tricks. When they come to die, and their awaked conscience represents all these impostures in their true faces, they would give a thousand worlds for this one testimony, We have wronged no man, we have defrauded no man. I have kept my promise with men, God will keep his promise with me, for salvation in Jesus Christ.

While they promise them liberty] this is the force of their promise. Now liberty is fourfold; Corporal, Conscientiall, Spiritual, and Sensuall.

1. Corporal, which consists in a freedom of action: when men are not slaves bound to the mines or galleyes to row (their Lord's in ease) with strokes and stripes: or to dig gold from that earth which scarce yields them sallets. When the feet of Joseph are not hurt in the stocks, neither do his children sweat in the Brick-fornaces. When the mur'd up debtor sits not in a melancholy consideration of his unmerciful creditour. To move only the length of his teddar, or but by the allowance of his keeper, is a man's captivity. Yea, even to be confined to a sick bed, is a miserable thralldom. Those Anchorites that have barked up themselves in hollow trees, or walls, had yet some room. That perverse Cynicke, who barrelled himself up in a Tub, could stand or sit, or enjoy some kind of posture. Scarce any Jail is so close, that it affords not the prisoner two or three steppes. But the Bed of languishing sickness is of a narrow compass. David sware that he would not go up unto his Bed, &c. To go up unto the Bed, denotes strength, promiseth ease. But when God saith of Jezebel, I will cast her into a Bed, he makes his own comment upon that, calling it the Bed of tribulation. Their thralldom is grievous, whom God hath nailed to their bed: they are not hindered from the Church by a Recusancie, as if they would not come: but as it were by an Excommunication, they cannot come. The sick bed is a solitude: when the Centurions servant lay sick at home, his master was fain to come to Christ, the sick man could not. Their friend lay sick of the palsy, and the four charitable men brought him to Christ; he could not come. Peters wives mother lay sick of a fever, and Christ came to her, she could not come to him. The bonds of mortalitye are so much the stronger, by being weaker: the ligaments of the arms are •he looser in articulo mortis, yet then they bind the arm from motion, & abridge it of freedom. There was a woman bowed down with a spirit of infirmity: her body was not more a jayle to her soul, than her disease was a Jailor to her body, and Satan to her disease: who had thereby inverted the posture of her creation, and turned that countenance to the earth, which was made to look up toward heaven.

This liberty of the body: when neither debts, the diseases of estate; nor disease, the debts of nature do hinder the freedom of action. Even a civil freedom hath been held honorable: how ambitious were the tributaries of Rome to become her denisons? The Burgess confessed that he obtained it with a great sum. The honor of Jerusalem was far greater, therefore so much the grievous or the expulsion. Their banishment & loss of their sweet country, their •rvitude and loss of their sweet liberty; and the loss of the sweetness of all sw•etnesses among them that had any spark of religion, the service of God might teach them to hang up their Harps and weep, remembering Zion. Had a Gentile been banished thither, he had not been an exile, but a proselyte; Felix exilium cui locus ill fuit: but for a Jew to be banished from thence, it was lamentable captivity.

2 Conscientiall, when nothing is imposed on us, but that may stand with the persuasion of our rectified mind. That religion which would bind the conscience, where God hath not bound it, retia & laqueos injicit, brings snares and fetters, and takes away due liberty. Indeed those civil laws do bind, that tend to good: as forbidding to frequent tippling houses, for the avoiding of drunkenness; or to wear dangerous weapons, for the preventing of homicides. But those which are for civil orders, whose intention is not obligare ad culpam, sed ad poenam; the breach whereof is sufficiently satisfied with the mulct; do not bind the conscience; nor is the omission of them a moral or mortal sin. But to entangle the soul with a multitude of traditions, ceremonies, and unconcerning rites, is condemned, as taking away the liberty of conscience. Such is celibate to the pamperd flesh, or abstinence to the raging appetite. They may as well put a match to dry powder, and forbid it to take fire.

There is indeed a scrupulous conscience, like a little stone got into the shoe, that galls the foot. This ariseth first from ignorance: the purblind cannot discern of colors, though they be died in grain. Secondly, from that we call Morbum maniacum, the effect of melancholy, or of some tedious sickness; or from melancholy it self, for the mind follows the temperature of the body: and scruples are most incident to crazed brains. Thirdly, from factious teachers, which leave the harmony of the truth, and broach vain janglings; which is indeed to turn the grace of God into wantonness. And it is strange to see, how madly they are affected to such crotchets: like peevish stomachs, which cannot away with solid meat, but love to be picking of bones, or feeding on kickeshawes. Fourthly, from a wrangling disposition, which makes the business of the hand to become only the business of the tongue. Hence it comes, that so many rheumatic pens blot innocent papers, and trouble the world, not for Quid faciendum, what is to be done; but Quid sentiendum, what is to be thought. They come like petulant children into the vineyard to gather grapes; and spying the gaudy butterflies, only run up and down to catch them. These men take away their own liberty, freely give away their freedom, and betray their consciences. But if water had been good to drink with wine, quoth a good fellow, God himself would have put it into the grape: but every simple is best So if such ordinances of men had been good to join with the Word of God, that great Law-giver would not have left them out. But let me obey all God's commandments, and believe all his promises: and for other things, my conscience hath a sweet liberty granted to it by JESUS CHRIST.

3 Spiritual, which frees us from the bondage of the Law, and the everlasting curse of God's wrath. If the Son make you free, you shall be free indeed.

1 Free from the ceremonial Law, which took the mortal wound by the death of Christ: for that death was to the moral Law finis consummans, to the ceremonial finis consumens: to the later, dissolvens: to the former, absolvens. Indeed this dead Law was not presently thrown into the grave: but according to the seemly burial of human bodies, which are not instantly after the souls departure cast forth as stinking carrions; but have their decent funerals, and are brought with solemnity to their sepulchers. So to put some difference betwixt God's Institutions, and human inventions, those ceremonies which died with Christ, were honourably brought to the grave. Now he that revives them, shall not be Pius funeris deductor, but Impius sepulturae violator; not a devout solemniser of the funeral, but a profane raker in the grave, and violator of the quiet sepulture.

2 Free from the moral Law; and that both Quoad damnandi vim; for there is no damnation to them that are in Christ: and Quoad dominandi vim, that sin should not reign in our mortal bodies. Our sins are remitted, our imperfect obedience is accepted. They that look to be justified by the works of the Law, are not under grace. Such peremptory travellers, mounted on the back of their own conceited righteousness, will needs post to heaven, and not take Christ along with them. Whereas indeed they are but like oxen, that a great while draw in the yoke for pasture, and are at last for slaughter. Truth is, we are not freed from obedience to the Law: Christ met with none on the Mount in his glory, but Moses and Elias; the Law-giver, and the Law-restorer: to show, that he did not only come to fulfill the Law, and institute the Gospel; but even to reconcile the Law and the Gospel. We must obey what God commanded by Moses, and what we cannot perform, is supplied to us by our belief in Jesus. Saint Augustine makes four states of men; first, ante Legem, before the Law, when non pugnamus, we do not so much as fight or strive against sin at all. Secondly, under the Law, Pugnamus, sed vincimur; we fight, but are overcome. Thirdly, under grace, Pugnamus & vincimus; we fight and conquer. Fourthly, in pace, in the kingdom of heaven, where is no occasion to fight, there being no enemies. We have now two good encouragements to fight: First, Abonitate causae, we take God's part. Secondly, A facilitate victoria, God takes our part.

3 Free from the slavery of sin: before it reigned over us as a tyrant, now it can but dwell in us as a Tenant. It never gives us a foil by any act of disobedience, but we give it a mortal wound by the sword of repentance. How sweet is that liberty which avoids the shackles of sin! It is the most common and troublesome guest that belongs to man: it troubles us both in the solicitation of it, and remorse for it. Before the act, it wearies us with importunate violence: after the act, it torments us with fear and the painful gnawings of an accusing conscience. And if it be thus irksome to men, how odious is it to God? He indeed never hated anything but it, and for it anything. It is the happiness of heaven, an immunity from sin: but we must content ourselves with the happiness of grace, a liberty not to be captivated by sin. The body of sin and death goes about with us; but it shall not carry us, though we carry it. It must dwell with us, but with no command, yea with no peace. We grudge to give it house-room, we hate to give it service.

4 Free from all the miserable effects of sin; as the horror of a troubled conscience; which makes a man Cordis sui fugitivum; like one sea-sick, that runs from decke to decke, from the stern to the foreship, from hold to hatches, from the ship to the boat, and last from the boat to the main. Or like those fondly impatient fishes, that leap out of the boiling caldron into the burning flame. Nescis temeraria, nescis quem fugias, ideoque fugis: all these storms are allayed by Christ. Or from the dread of temporal judgments; the sword that destroyeth without, the famine within, or the plague that spareth not, either without or within. Either the Sun of mercy shall shine upon us, and disperse these tempests, or God shall shelter us under the shadow of his wings. Death it self is but a bottom to transport us to the Land of promise: and Satan, our old sworn enemy shall be trampled under our victorious feet; and we shall sing to him that hath given us this liberty, Glory and praise be to the Lamb forever and ever.

4. Sensuall, when the boundaries of God, and laws of man are broken through; and excess knows no limits but the want of power. This indeed is not properly liberty, but licentiousness: an exorbitant, luxurious violence, the greatest slavery of the world: but this discourse I reserve to the due place. Here only note this sum of the Text.

Sensuality and a carnal freedom is the spell that conjures these wild spirits, and brings them in subjection to their heretical Teachers. They may promise them Civil liberty; this they are not sure to perform: or Conscientiall; this they will not perform: or Spiritual; this they cannot perform: but profane excess, riotous intemperance, the uncontrollable swinge of their lusts, this they will endeavor to perform. This is the Lure of wanton souls: Who can wonder, that so many turn to Papistry, when men may be at once Roman Catholics, and human devils? They say, their Religion daily winneth; yet let them not brag of their gain: they neither need, nor can, if they consider how it gets, and whom. How, but by base forgeries, frontlesse untruths, plausible persuasions, and flattering promises; which easily prevail with a pleasure-disposed soul. Whom, but such as are either most unable to resist, or most like to bestead them. Vnsettled heads, in their unseasonable travels, like fond and idle Dinah's, have come ravished home. These Impostors besiege the fiery wits, or the great Heir of some noble Family; whose greatness of example may be perswasorie, and commanding. Malcontents, whom envy makes desirous of a change; loose livers, men necessitous, whose penury of estate and judgment cogit ad turpia: voluptuous Epicures, who for all their filthy uncleanness have a Shift, that is, a Shrift; that having first by their adulteries made work for Confession, now again by Confession prepare for more adulteries. These unclean Birds be laid for by the Nets and Calls of such Fowlers.

But alas for that other Sexe: still the Devil begins with Eve: still his assaults are strongest, where is weakest resistance. How few grand Heretics do we read of, without their Mistresses? Magus had his Helena, Donatus his Lucilla, Apelles his Philumena, Montanus his Prisca, Priscillian his Galla; everyone his Factoress: as the Jesuits are not without their collapsed Ladies; not only dead Images to worship, but even living Instruments to court and employ. Silly women, laden with sins, and led away with diverse lusts: these must be the Stalls of their spiritual, if not corporal fornication. More political than Balaam; when they could not blow up Religion with Powder into Heaven, they try the old Moabitish Plot, to sink it down to Hell. Such is the public liberty of their dispensations, whether for dissembled Religion, or not unprofitable filthiness.

Here is even a spoil fit for such a conquest, for such Victors: this fetches them in so many whores, so many notoriously dissolute persons. Malefactors, that for horrible misdemeanors are committed to prison, be there wrought upon by these Instruments: and so they that were convicted thieves, robbers, strumpets, homicides, are turned off from the gallows, Roman Catholics. Who can marvel, to see them that lived like Atheists, to die Papists? Drowning men catch hold on a Weed, rather than nothing; dying Patients embrace an Empyricke, a Leech, rather than no Physician. They can teach them to be saved •n• moment, if they will but hang as fast upon their foundation, as they must on Tyburne; that is, on the holy Mother, the Church of Rome: which can no more stumble, than a man when both his eyes are out. Who would envy them this purchase? We are the fewer, not the worse. If all our harlots, and thieves, and murderers, and roarers, and hypocrites were theirs, we should not complain: they might be the prouder, not the better. Let them triumph in their conquest, so long as we know we have lost none worth our credit, and they have got none worth their honor. They daily forgo more in a better exchange: the Sea never encroacheth upon our shore, but it loseth elsewhere. Many have we fetched out of their Wasts into the Fold of the Church: and those not Catholic Colliers, and Cobblers; but such as were able to render a reason, both of the just dislike of their Idolatries, and the sincerity of our Doctrine.

I conclude this point. Most men take that liberty which Justice never granted; but Justice did never grant a liberty which men do not greedily take. Nature affects that which is pleasing to Nature; nothing better pleaseth it, than the freedom of the own will. Pauci quaerunt intelligere quid sit licitum, plurimi quid sit placitum. The Poets fable, that Pallas, their goddess of Wisdom, issued out of loves brain; and Bacchus, their god of Wine and dissolute pleasure, was borne out of his thigh: which was thus wittily moralized, He then must break his brains, that knowledge wins; And he that will be drunk, shall break his shinnes. Lord, keep us from such a liberty, as is the running of our own ways, after our transportive fancies, and the baneful allurements of wantonness.

They themselves are the servants of corruption.] All sin is a servitude; and that which flatters men with the greatest opinion of Liberty, makes them the most miserable vassals. They may think, that they have the world at command, and not the world them: as Witches and Conjurers, after their contract made with Hell, think they have power over Satan; whereas indeed Satan hath power over them. They have a secret and insensible Teddar, which that enemy ties to their heels, and holds in his hand: while they run whither he allows them, they shall have scope enough; but if they offer towards goodness, he instantly snatches them up. They think themselves the freest men in the world; and let them be their own Judges, as they will be their own carvers, they are so. No Coards, whether of Law or Conscience, can hold them: Sampson did not more easily break the bonds of the Philistines, than they dissolve the ties of Government. The Common-wealth is a Tabernacle or Tent, pitched up to shelter men from wrong, and that they may live happily together. Laws are the Coards of it; break the Coards, the Tent falls. My Tabernacle is spoiled, my Coards are broken. Vines are underpropped and bound up, to make them fruitful; Vessels are hooped, to contain the liquor: so Laws are bonds, to keepe the evil in awe, the good in safety. But these Flies will not be caught in such Cobwebs: unruly and headstrong beasts, no Mounds can keep them out, or hold them in. Laws bind all, without exception: I speak not of Princes; Leges Principi nemo scripsit. They do not, like death, Sceptra ligonibus aequare. Yet, as it was said of the blessed Virgin, offering her Legal sacrifice for her Purification, Supra legem fecerat gratia, sub lege humilitas: so of good Princes, their high c•lling •a•es them above the Law, their humility respects it.

But they that dare force and ravish the Law, and make it both the instrument of their revenge, and patronage of their mischi•fes, think they may well plead their liberty. O what a poor slave do they hold the man of a tender conscience? They dare swear and blaspheme; we fear an Oath. They dare spend thei• d•ye• in dalliance, among the Brothels; we dare not make the members of Chr•st the limbs of a harlot. They dare pollute the marriage-bed by adultery, and make it the mirth of the company; we dare not, fearing lest Heaven should be shut •gainst us for the sin, and Hell swallow us for bo•sting of the sin. They dare wager for lying, with that grand-father of lies and liars; why, their tongues are their own: we dare not, though it were to save ourselves, to relieve the poor, to honor God. They dare kill a man in their anger, yea for their pleasure; we dare not deface the Image of our Maker, knowing that no River can w•sh off that blood. They dare drink themselves into beasts; we dare not, lest we should never be recovered again unto men. They dare oppress the poor; we dare not, knowing that thereby we reproach their Maker. They dare revenge all wrongs done them, and carve it with a large measure; we dare not wring God's weapon out of his hand, but remit all vengeance to him. The Devil cannot hurt a good man, without Letters Patent; yet the wicked would harm him, against all Laws and Prohibitions. They dare sin God in the f•ce, and presume upon his patience; we fear him, as a consuming fire. It is all; they dare hazard the breaking of their necks, we would not willingly break our shin•es.

Now, do not these appear the more free and magnanimous? Alas, we are curbed and hamper'd: so many interdictiones lie in our way, Thou shalt not do this: so many impositions lie on our backs, Thou shalt do this; that we seem the most miserable servants upon earth. Whereas they know no Law, but the latitude of their will: no limits, but the extremity of their power. Yet for all this, they are no better than slaves, yea the very vassals of the most contemptible masters. He that serves a Papist, yet serves a Christian: he that serves a Turk, yet serves a man. But he that serves the world, serves Nature's slave; he that serves the Devil, serves God's slave; he that serves Lust, serves his own slave. Some have served one another by turns, in mutual and reciprocal offices; and that might be a service of love. Some have yielded service to men of meaner degree and quality than themselves: but that might be a service for gain, which were base enough; or for fear, which is baser; or for flattery, which is the basest of all. Some husbands have been too uxorious and serviceable to their wives; and that is a service of dotage. Some masters have come to serve their own apprentices; but that was a woeful Turn of Fortunes Wheel; a necessitous, piteous service. But for a man to serve his Dog, this is wondrous low: his Lusts are his Dogs; as Acteon, given over to his pleasures, was devoured of his own Hounds. Such may be well called here, The servants of corruption.

Is this their liberty? This their magnanimous fortitude? To obey every petty slave, every common soldier in that Campe, whereof themselves are the General? The Dog runs at the masters whistling: but for the master to go at the Dogs commanding, is a preposterous servilitie. If Lust but say, Get me such a Beauty for my delight, the man hath no power to deny it; no means is refused, that makes to this brutish fruition: Is not this to be the servant of corruption? If Covetousness say, Get me such a Commodity; the man instantly obeys, plots, studies, contrives, breaks his peace, his sleeps, his brains, to compass it: though he plough furrows on the backs of the poor, and run through the blood of Orphans; though he ventures his ears, his neck, his soul, he dares not deny his slave, his dog, his devil, Avarice. Call you this freedom, when a man cannot choose but sin? When I may drink Wine, or refuse it, this is my freedom: but to be compelled to drink it, by a dry spirit within; if this be liberty, there is no bondage. Therefore is God Almighty, because he cannot err, nor lie, nor do evil; for these are the works of Impotencie. The Saints in Heaven cannot sin, yet sure they enjoy the fullest liberty. Liberi, quia liberati, delivered from the necessity of sinning, therefore free. If to sin be the only liberty, they have no liberty in Heaven. No: this is the service of corruption a thralldom, not a freedom; the Tyrannie of sin, not the Kingdom of righteousness.

Every man is the servant, quot vitiorum, tot tyrannorum. When Alexander found Diogenes in his Tub, and disputed with him, whether was the freer estate; with Alexander to command the World, or with Diogenes to be confined to a Barrel? the Cynicke answered; Latior tua potestas, non felicior: Thou commandest others, I command myself: I am a servant to the King, the King is a servant to his slave; yea, even to my slave: Tu servus servorum meorum. Illis cupiditatibus, quibus ego impero, tu mancipium es: I am Emperor over those affections, that exercise a dominion over thee. But as Nabal's servant was weary of so unaffable, uncharitable, unreasonable a Master, the very son of Belial: So we have just cause to abandon that service, which must be obsequious to the vilest, proudest, basest groomes in our family, our own carnal lusts; which are no better (though they dwell with us) than the limbs of Belial. The Acolat loathes the service of that Carle, that allowed him no better diet than husks, and thereof not enough to fill his belly: such is the wages of corruption. Therefore let us return with humbled and penitent souls to our Fathers house, where all the servants have Bread, good for the quality: Bread enough, sufficient for the quantity: and to spare, abundant, even to satiety: where the fatted Calf shall feast us; royal apparel, the best Robe of glory shall adorn us; heavenly Music shall cheare us, and eternal peace and mercy shall receive us.

For of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage.] The metaphor seems to be taken from War; where the conqueror brings the vanquished into captivity, making them slaves and drudges, imposing on them vile and servile offices. And this misery of the Captive differs, according to the disposition of the Victor: if he be imperious, and given to cruelty, he doth so much the more embitter the slavery. Pharaoh is not content to set Israel possible tasks: so long there was comfort; their diligence might save their backs from stripes. What with conceit of benefit to the commander, and hope of impunity to the laborer, they might take heart to venture on great difficulties. But those tyrants did measure their commands by their own wills, not by the strength of their inferiors. To require more of a beast than he can do, is inhumane: yet Pharaoh exacteth Bricks, where he hath allowed no Straw. This was cruel enough: But what is the swarthy King of Egypt to the black Prince of darkness? his commands are less reasonable, his stripes more unmerciful: The former are not more plausible to the flesh on earth, than the other are terrible to the soul in hell. This is Saint Peters infallible Doctrine; Of whom a man is overcome, &c. Saint Paul's everlasting Rule; Ye are his servants, to whom you obey. Yea, he that was before them, above them, and from whom they spake, pronounced it a firm Lesson out of the School of Heaven; Whosoever committeth sin, is the servant of sin. For method; first, let us view Satan's victory over the wicked, and their slavery under Satan: then, how Christ overcomes the elect, and the freedom of their service under him.

Thrice did the Devil set upon the Son of God, and fashioned his temptations to this method; the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life. To all these the first Adam was tempted, and in all miscarried: the second Adam is tempted to them all, and overcometh. The former Adam was tempted; first, to a carnal appetite, by the forbidden fruit; secondly, to pride, by the suggestion of being as God; thirdly, to covetousness, in the ambitious desire of knowing good and evil. Satan having found all these motions so successful with the first Adam, in his innocent estate, treads the same steps in his temptations of the second: first, the stones must be made Bread; there is the motion to a carnal appetite: secondly, the guard and attendance of Angels must be presumed on; there is the motion to pride: thirdly, the Kingdoms of the earth must be offered, and their glory; there he is moved to covetousness and ambition. In everyone there is an appearance of good, whether of body, mind, or estate. Once and a second time he is repelled, yet again he assaults: Satan is not foiled, when he is resisted. If neither the lust of the flesh, nor lust of the eyes can overcome us, he will try us with the pride of life: as when neither diffidence nor presumption could fasten on Christ, he tempts him with honor. He is a cunning Fencer, expert at all weapons: in vain shall we be skillful in some, if we fail in any. When he makes the Challenge, it is not left to us (as in terms of Duel) to appoint the ground, or the weapon; we must be prepared for all assaults, for all places. They that hold Towers and Forts of Garrison, do not only defend themselves from incursions, but from the Cannon and the Pioner. Still doth this subtle enemy traverse his ground, for an advantage. When the Wilderness speeds not, he hopes for some better luck in the Temple: there failing, he climbs higher, to the top of a Mountain. As foes in pitched fields, strive for the benefit of the Hill, or River, or Wind, or Sun. He doth himself, as he taught his servant Balaam, change places, in hope of prevailing. If the obscure Country cannot move us, he tries what the Court can do; if not our Home, the Tavern; if not the Field, our Closet.

How many hath he wounded in one place, that were fenced in another? He would not only put some evil into all, nor all into some, but all into all. Nec tam vincit potentiâ suâ, quàm negligentîâ nostrâ: therefore as no place is left free from his malice, so no place should be made prejudicial by our carelessness. Some he overcomes with superstition; and they die the death of Galileans: for he like Pilate, will mingle their blood with their own Sacrifices. Some he overcomes with vain-glory; and they die the death of Philistines; killed with the Iaw-bone of an Ass. Some with drunkenness, and they die the death of Nabal; yesterday as beasts, today as stones: then overmerry and light as feathers, in death dull and lumpish. Others with the world; and they fall under their own burden: the world like the Tower in Siloe, falls on them, and quasheth them to pieces. How great is his conquest, when he can set reasonable men to worship a little coloured dirt? Some with filthy lust; and they die the death of Sodomites; if not with fire from heaven, yet with fire from hell. Still this Conqueror proceeds; and some he overcomes with a multitude of small sins: one hair will not hang a man, many will, as Absalom was served. Or with some special dear sin, which is like a conspiratour within, that will betray him the Town. Either he disarms men of their Sword, the Word of God; and then who can fight without a weapon? Or gets away their Buckler; the shield of Faith, and who can defend himself without a Target? Faith is the foundation of a Christian: that once lost, all is desperate. An enemy after long siege of a city, upon entreaty made, condescended to terms of peace; and this was his condition, that in sign of homage, they should quietly suffer him to take from their City-walls one row of stones round about: to this they yielded; and he laid hands on the lowest row, the foundation, and so left them no walls at all. It is a weak City without walls, there can be no walls without a foundation, City and Walls are feeble without munition: where men have neither the grace, nor the wit, nor the will to resist, it is easy for Satan to overcome.

But now what is the event of this conquest? Bondage; To him they are brought in bondage.] The unhappiness of which estate appears in these conditions.

1. It is Infamis, an ignominious state; the hang-man's servant is an honor to it. Such was Matthews first condition; a farmer of the miseries of his own nation. Informers, that like Crowes, live upon carrion; and dorres, that pass the meadow or garden to light on a dunghill: or those wing-less flies, that suck a living out of the corrupt blood of uncleanness; all hear ill enough, and are odious in their offices. But to wear the livery of Satan, to be the Pensioner of hell, at the command of that malignant and degenerous Spirit, is the most dishonorable name and shame. Let them be Lord's of the earth, yet their report is fouler than clods of the earth: by the base indulgence to their own lusts, their names stink above ground. Their memory shall rot; yea, it is well, if their memories do rot with their carcasses, and their vices be buried with them in their graves. So basely ignoble, so inhumane is it for a man to be the slave of his own affections.

2. Immanis, a hard and troublesome condition. Both for the multitude of business, and not seldom, contariety of commands: as pride asks cost, whereas covetousness denies necessaries: envy makes a sullen face, whereas ambition sets it in the smiling posture of flattery: so the mind is distracted with cross addresses. And for the hardness of their labor; like beasts, they are set to draw in the devils teame; sin with cart-ropes, and iniquity with coards of vanity. Coards are at first twisted of small threads; but once combined, they can bind heavy b•dens, and hold great ships. Peccata facile veniunt, sed fortiter ligant. They are deceived that think the hests of Satan easy. Sin is no niggard of her pains: seldom ever do we find goodness so industrious. It is not Absal• beauty and royal attendance that can make strong his party; but he must neglect himself, sit continually at the gate, giving his hand to kiss, and kissing their lips that did it; he must take pains to further his treason.

Unruly affections are like wild horses, that carry us over hills and rocks, till they be breathless. Yea they soon recover breath and speed; and if they be restrained by a sudden violence, they plunge and careere, and cease not till the saddle be empty, and then strike at the prostrate rider. Where sin hath once gotten a dominion, it scorns to be repelled, but hath recourse to the haunt, as humors fall toward their old issue. Iniquity is laborious; the Poet was deceived when he said, Facilis descensus averni. The covetous make their passage through stony rocks of hardship and penury: to rise early, and rest late, and eat the bread of sorrows: I hope this is not easy. The ambitious clammers up steep hills and and craggie mountains, to get a place as tickle and slippery, as the stool of Eli. Shall we say, it sleeps in them? Nay it will not let them sleep. The voluptuous tramples in dirt and mire, besmearing himself with infamy and turpitudes, is not this a molestation? The revengeful breaks through hedges stuck with thorns, which makes him all gore and bloody. The envious walks in dark and shady places, that he may not see another's happiness, Quot bona falicium, tot tormenta invidorum. He wastes his own marrow, and with sullen malice gnaws the flesh from his own bones: is not this aegrum & acre servitium? The drunkard pains his stomach in the devouring, his head in the digesting, his throat and heart in the returning of his over-laden cups. But especially the sin of mischief is a vigilant, painful, indefatigable sin. Judas will be awake, when Peter is asleep: the Tare-sower in the field, when the husbandman is in his bed. In all 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : they that worship the Beast, never rest, day nor night.

3. It is Intolerabilis: we have heard of many poor souls condemned to the gallies, under the merciless tyranny of Turks and Infidels. But what is the Turk to the devil? What a Gally to hell? What the labor of oars to the toile of an afflicting conscience? Of all servants, they are in the worst case that are sold: of those that be sold, they are the worst that must do service in prison: of them in prison, their state is most lamentable that are bound with fetters. Such is the condation of the ungodly: they are the servants of sin, and sold under sin, and chained in prison. The Jail is infidelity, they are shut up under unbelief: the Jailor Satan, so strait and tyrannous, that they cannot so much as lift up their head, or look to heaven for any deliverance. Pride is one chain: though they wear it for an ornament of bravery, they shall find it the ligament of infelicitie. Concupiscence is another chain, that binds them faster to the service of Satan, than ever the Virgin was to the rock, to be devoured by the monster. Every sin strives for the regencie: sic certant in me de meipso, cujus potissimam videar: within me they strive about me, whose I should be. Other tyrants have some intermission in their commands; Pharaoh denies not Israel a season to eat, drink, and sleep: but these miserable captives are always in an habitual service, seldom out of actual. They must neither do, nor speak, nor think, but according to their masters injunctions. He labors to snare the children of God in their sleeps; Facit aliquando dormientibus, quod non potest vigilantibus: suggesting unclean thoughts when their wills cannot resist them: how much more doth he turmoile his slaves? If Judas's heart be wrought to the treason, he shall not rest till his hand have done it, and undone himself by it. He would not so much as suffer him to eat his supper, but hastened him from that Sacramental bread to his bloody design. Amnon enamored on that incestuous act, melts away till he have committed it. Libido est furiosa domina; lust is not a fair, but a furious mistress, impatient of delay in her service.

O that men would free themselves from this intolerable burden; where alius servus est libidini, alius ambitioni, alius timori. Sin is a cowardly thing; Eve had no sooner offended, but she sought out a fellow and companion. When Cain was stained with his brothers blood, how he trembled and quaked, there being none in the world to see him but his parents and sisters; yet in every bush he suspects an ambush. Satan is so cruel a master, and so niggardly a rewarder, that all his servants be timorous. Men of honest conscience, observers of order, as they are fearful to offend, so most courageous in a just cause: the servants of God are bold as Lions. But guittinesse and conspiracy is of so ugly a shape, and horrid a representation, that the offender never dares look upon himself single, and alone, but still runs as a Deere to the heard.

4. It is inutilis, no good comes of it. It is both coactus, a servile compulsory labor; and improbus, a dishonest unjustifiable labor: and stultus, idle, fruitless, a mere labor in vain. What fruit had ye then of those things whereof ye are now ashamed? The root is sin, the stock blame, the fruit shame, the end death, to be cut up and cast into the fire. There be some that sin and shame not; Were they ashamed when they committed abomination? No, they had gotten a meretricious front; the look of an impudent and putrefied strumpet; for even a fresh harlot will be put to the blush. There be some that shame, and amend not; As the thief is ashamed when he is found. Being taken in the manner, he is more ashamed of his apprehension, than of his transgression: he loseth all that modesty when he gains secrecy; and ceaseth not to be a thief. It is good when shame for sin is joined with sorrow, and sorrow with amendment of life.

This is one discommodity of such service; a shame before men; but there is a worse behind, even a shame before all the Angels of God. But is there no benefit by it? Doth not the covetous store up gold? The voluptuous please his wanton flesh? The ambitious mount to honor? As Satan said, Doth Job serve God for naught? So do these serve Satan for naught? They do; and as witches take apparitions for substances; are promised golden mountains, yet remain beggarly wretches: so these embrace a cloud instead of Juno, a dream for reality, a childes baby made of clouts, and are in all their glory like a fool in a comedy, crowned with a coronet of painted paper, a bable for a scepter, a table spread with counterfeit cheare, and when the play is done, he may go seek his supper. It was never in any condition so true, as here; a young serving-man, an old beggar.

5. It is inextricabilis, sold to sin with small hope of recovery. That powerful tyrant will keep his captives, till a stronger than he comes to ransom them. Some may haply have their faint reluctations against this bondage; and Satan's commands are so foul, that it grudgeth their conscience to fulfill them: as the servant wearied with justifying his masters untruths, told him that if he did not couch his lies closer together, and make them more cleanly, he would no longer undertake to avouch them. To pollute the marriage-bed of their friend, is a morsel that grumbles in their stomach before it can be digested. To do injury, where they have received courtesy, to fight in an unconcerning quarrel, to shed blood where they may have money to spare it; doth a little stumble them: and they have some languide wishes, O that we were free! But while they seek not constantly the means of their release, their captivity is the sorer, as the Jailor lays more irons upon him that hath attempted to break prison.

Lycurgus could say, that often assaulting the enemy without conquest, would at last encourage them to set upon us. They are presumptuous fools that think they can repent at pleasure; as if the weathercocke could turn the wind, and not the wind the weathercock: as if because man can tame birds and beasts, therefore he could also tame himself. Yea, as if a piece of clay fashioned to the picture of a man, could make it self living, and inanimate that lump with a reasonable soul. They are deceived; sin never made such a bargain with them, as to be turned off at an hours warning, or to be discharged with a miserere mei. No, that Landlord will hold his own, except he comes that hath a stronger power, and a better title: and when it must out, it will rend the heart, as Satan tore the child, and do what he can to make the house untenantable. Faciliùs excludere, quàm expellere. They will say with Pharaoh, Why have we done thus, to let Israel go from serving us?

6. It is miserabilis, the grief of every Christian. Even such a temporary condition may well move compassion. Stood we upon an high mountain, and had as clear eyes to behold this large valley of tears and miseries, as our Savior had to see the glory of kingdoms. Did we perceive the lamentable cries of the famished for want of bread, the distressed shifts of the poor for want of harbor, the tortures and rackings of sensible limbs, both by the hand of Justice and of Injustice; the disconsolate sorrows of parents for their children, widows for their husbands, friends for all relations: or the exigence of besieged cities, the sound of trumpets, noise of drummes, roaring of cannons, the pitiful groans of the dying and wallowing in their bloods, or swooning in the streets of famine, women re-inwombing their own children; fathers and husbands mourning for the barbarous ravishment of their wives and daughters. Or their anguish that are condemned to row in gallies, turn in mills, work in minerals; how they eat nothing but the bread of sorrow by weight, and drink nothing but the water of affliction by measure; their unpitied cries at the smart of their unmerciful lashings. Surely tears were the poorest obsequies we could spend at these woeful funerals. The cheeks that are now dimpled with laughter, would change their position; the resty souls that sing now nothing but peace, would change their disposition, at these sad spectacles.

But now, by how much the soul is more dear than the body, more precious, more eternal; let our bowels yearn for these spiritual calamities. All outward sufferings are determined by death; as when it was told Anaxagoras, the Athenians have condemned you to die; said again, And nature them. But the intolerable service of sin, the works of darkness, commanded by the Prince of darkness, in the place of darkness; the gashes of a wounded conscience, fresh bleeding hurts plaisterd with corrosives, overburdened souls, neither able nor willing to ease themselves; if we have not sucked the breasts of Tigers, these things will make us mourn and pray, Lord have mercy on such miserable sinners.

O that men would consider, what they have been, what they are, what they hope to be. First, what they were; the Images of God; that is their original glory. Princeps creaturarum constitutus es, & dignitatem naturae tuae projicis. Thou that shouldst rule overall beasts about thee, art overruled by those beasts that are within thee. Secondly, what they are, at least in invitation: the Son of God offers to make us free, and to restore all our forfeited privileges; and shall we neglect so fair an occasion? Shew this favor to the captives at Argier, and see if they will refuse it. When Cyrus king of Persia proclaimed liberty to the Jews, only those went from Babel, the place of their captivity, to Jerusalem the city of their ancient liberty, whose spirits God had raised up. Christ came to proclaim freedom to captives, yet none follow this gracious call, but only they whose spirits the Spirit of God raiseth up. Thirdly, what they hope to be, even kings in heaven; and will they be slaves on earth? Is not the kingdom above, began below? Is not the suburbs of grace, the way to the city of glory? Doth the kingdom of sin reign in our mortal bodies, and shall the kingdom of rest be given to our immortal souls? Have we the promise of Canaan, and of God's arm to conquer it, and do we stick at the sons of Anak. Sperare non potest regnum coelorum, qui non dominabitur viribus membrorum. Certainly, if through grace we do not prepare ourselves for that heavenly kingdom, we can never say with a warrant that God hath prepared that heavenly kingdom for us.

7. It is Exitialis; the end of every service is wages, and this is a wages without end, even everlasting pain. O horrible reward, to sow trouble, and reap vexation; still to bring fuel unto that fire, which must burn themselves; to plow with rods, and eat with Scorpions; to be wearied in the ways of sin, and then to be worried with plagues of sin. The wages of sin is death: a toilsome service, an irksome wages. Sin when it is finished brings forth death. He that was the tempter, becomes the tormentor: then he promised pleasures, now he inflicts tortures. First, he enticeth men to sin, and then accuseth them to God for the sins they have done by his enticement. Bee assured of this, he that without cessation doth tempt thee to sin, will without intermission torment thee because thou hast sinned. Still the reprobates shall serve under their old master, but their work shall be changed, and the place: here they work actively, there passively: here Satan works by them, there he works upon them: here they are in a free air, with light and delight; there in a dungeon with sores and sorrows. As Charles king of Swede, a great enemy of the Jesuits, when he took any of their colleges, would first hang up the old Jesuits, and then put the rest into his mines; saying, that since they had wrought so hard above ground, he would try how they could work under ground. So when the wicked have done the devil what service they could on earth, he will confine them to his dark vaults in hell. O Lord come down, cast out this Tyrant and Usurper, repossesse thine own kingdom, erect a Throne to thyself in all our hearts, that thou mayest here reign in us as our King, and we may at last reign with thee in thy Kingdom, Amen.

Of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage.] The service of Satan is so full of troubles and perplexities, so destitute of comforts and relaxations, that there is no wonder if it be tedious to the sufferer, when it displeaseth the hearer or looker on. Therefore as they that have visited Spittles and Hospitalls, and smelt the offensive ulcers of Lazars and Leapers, are glad of a sweet air and healthful society. So after the view of that incurable slavery, the bondage of sin and Satan, now let us refresh ourselves with the liberty of the servants of God. For we cannot deny God, (in so general a proposition) to have his victory also. Let not Satan bear away the glory as if there was no King, no Conqueror but he: for this Master of slaves is but a slave to a higher Master: and as he can exercise no dominion over his servants but by God's permission, so God holds him in the strongest subjection, so hamper'd with invincible chains of servitude that he cannot touch one of his servants, not one limb of their bodies, not one hair of their heads, not one beast of their herds, till God hath given him leave, and he will never give him leave to hurt their souls. You have seen the carriage of an inhumane Tyrant over his slaves; come now to the Court of a King, and see the usage of his free servants: yea, see a court of Kings, for all God's servants be no less than Princes. Where we have two general occurrences. First, The conquest of some that stand out. Secondly, The happiness of them that are overcome.

God is sure to be Victor, for what force can withstand him? But he frames the manner of his victories to the nature of his enemies: them that resist, he overcomes by subversion: them that yield, by conversion. His conquest here is not by fury, but by mercy. Furie is not in me, the briars and thorns shall be consumed in his flame: but they that lay hold on his arm, shall hold back his arm; humble and faithful prostration shall make their peace. This war on his part, is all of love: the intention is Studium pacis. Gratia praeveniens, so the war is undertaken; Gratia operans, so the battle is begun: Gratia perficiens, so the victory is gotten. When God gives us repentance, he hath then overcome us. We were rebels by nature, and enemies to the grace of God, we must be vanquished, or we cannot be saved. They are led by the Spirit of God. So gentle is this conquering, that it is called a leading; ducendo vincimur, vincendo ducimur. Led by a superior instinct, not furiously but familiarly; non ut rei ad supplicium, sed ut amici ad palatium. Nor is this conquest a necessitating of our salvation; as Qui agitur, agere quid ipse minus intelligitur: Imo, & ageris, & agis: a Deo aguntur, ut agant. God gives the first motion or inclination, and so we begin: and by his continual help we follow on. We are not willing before we be overcome, but in the very conquest we are made willing to be overcome. Acta fit activa voluntas.

1. This conquest is not Subita, sudden: man's heart is naturally stubborn; this Jericho will not be won under seven days siege, and then the walls must down too, worldly forces must fail us. Not seldom it holds out longer than Ostend or Troy; God is many years assaulting it with his spiritual weapons, his Word, Ordinances, Favors, Frownes, Stripes before it yields. Few are converted in an hour, or can tell that hour wherein they were converted. It is not here, venire & vincere, to come and overcome. God doth weaken us before he vanquish us, taking from corruption here a fort, and there a bulwark, now a trench, then a mine, together with the victuals and provision, even the magazine whereon sin feeds and lives. When the unthrift had no provant left, he must yield and humble himself to his Father.

2. It is not Hostilis, as nation against nation with a deadly feud, but with terms of love. There is a dry wounding, a conquest without blows. Thou hast wounded me with one of thine eyes. And Turn away thine eyes, for they overcome me. Of all victories, love is the greatest, to overcome evil with good. This is to be like God, whose image we bear in our creation, and to whose Image we are restored in our redemption. Christus nihil praecepit, quod non facit. If he had not overcome all our malice with kindness, he would never have charged us with such a practice. Saul hunts for the life of David, David hath a way to the life of Saul, and spares it. Such a feeling oratory did Saul find in the lips of David, and lap of his garment; that it lies not in the power of his envy, ill nature, and cursed heart, to hold out from tears. He whose harp had wont to quiet Saul's frenzy, now by his kindness doth calm his fury: so that now he sheds tears instead of blood. Here was a victory gotten, and no blow stricken. Phocion that noble Athenian, being condemned to die, and lifting the deadly cup to his lips, was asked by his friends, what message he would send to his Son; he answered, Mando ei hoc, ut obliviscatur potus hujus, I charge him never to revenge this draught upon the Athenians. Baldwin King of Jerusalem, having spoiled the Arabian Saracens; and put them to flight, found in his return homewards a woman ready to travel, wife unto a chief Prince of the Arabians, left behind in the pursuit: whom he covered with his own mantle, appointing both attendance and sustenance. This kindness was not lost; for afterward being besieged by the same Arabians, and put to great distress, he was delivered by that Captain, whose wife he had preserved. Yea, take an example nearer home: A malefactor, in birth and person a comely Gentleman, was sentenced by a Judge deformed in body. Hereupon he turned all his prayers to Heaven, into curses and revilings of the Judge, calling him a stigmaticall and bloody man. The patient Judge for that time reprieved him: still he continued in the same language of invectives and blasphemies against him. The next Session being produced, the Judge asked him if his choler were anything boiled away and spent: but then he redoubled his railings: yet he reprieved him again, as loath to let him die in so uncharitable and desperate a condition of soul. Before the third Assizes, he sent for him to his chamber in London, and asked him if he were yet more pacified: still nothing came from him but words of inveterate rancor. Whereupon said the Judge, God forgive thee, I do; and withal threw him his pardon. Whereat he was so astonished, that being but hardly recovered from his swoon; he refused the Queens pardon for his life, unless the Judge would both pardon his malice, and admit him into his service. He did so, and found him so faithful, that dying he gave him the greatest part of his estate. Here was extreme evil overcome with extraordinary goodness. The Judge of all the world deals yet more mercifully with us: the Law hath condemned us to die, we daily provoke him: he could presently sentence us, but he spares us: still we anger him: he feeds, finds us, gives us all we have; yet still we rebel against him. At last, to overcome us by the gentlest war that ever was heard of, he seals us our pardon in Jesus Christ, through whom he accepts us into his service, and makes us his own heirs. Loe, then he overcomes us.

3. It is not violenta, he useth no boisterous forces against us. Indeed his Ordnance be his Ordinances, his Cannons be his Canons and Laws: But against what does he plant them? Not against ourselves, but against our sins: As if he would not fight with us, but fight with our enemies for us. We have no foes, but our faults: upon these he plays with his Shot, and batters them down before us. He knows, that unless these die, we cannot live. He hath his Sword, a two-edged one, keen on both sides: with this he wounds, not our spirit, but our flesh; not our flesh, but the lusts of our flesh: yea, not so much our lusts, as the corruption of our lusts; launching the Ulcer that would kill us. He hath his Mines; but to blow up our pride, vain-glory, ambition, and such piles of vanities. He hath his fire-works; but to burn up our rotten affections, of covetousness and uncleanness. This strict siege, is but to famish our riot, intemperance, drunkenness, and all those Perdues, soldiers that deserve no pay, the forlorn Tatterdemallion of our sins. His Ambuscado's serve but to resist our excursions, flyings out, ramblings, and such extravagances of disobedience. Here is no boisterous turbulency in this War; all the violence is on our side: the Kingdom of Heaven suffers violence, not offers it. No man is saved against his will: but even in the act of our overcoming, we are willing to be overcome. We feel pain in the resistance, nothing but peace and sweetness in the conquest. I had rather thus be conquered of the Lord, than be conqueror of all the world. O poor Caesar's, poor Alexanders, poor Tamerlaines, that won so many victories, and lost the best, in not being overcome by God's mercies. Thus God overcomes us, by overcoming them that captived us.

4. It is not crudelis, not bloody; like Saul's charge for Amalek, or Israel's execution upon Benjamin: there none were left alive, here all are preserved from slaughter. As he said, Perieram nisi periissem: so we had been butchered, if we had not been conquered. If we had escaped from the Captain of Mercy, we had fallen upon the Captain of Crueltie. For they that will not be overcome of God, shall be overcome of Satan. The Lord goes through every street, here he sets his mark upon a house, there upon a person: these be his, he hath fairly won them, and they consent to be his subjects: the rest he leaves to the destroyer. Those he hath conquered, he hath saved: and they that yield not to so gracious a subduer, perish by a pitiless destroyer. As a man seeing a tumult or quarrel, where enraged swords make gashing wounds, and through those breaches let out souls; spies one in this hurlyburly whom he loves, lays hold on him, and being stronger than he, bears him to his house, and locks him up fast as in ward, till all be quiet. So doth God snatch his chosen out of the broils of sin, binds them with the cords of obedience; and though they struggle for liberty, keeps them sure till this mutiny be over-past. Or as the Shepherd in a tempest, finds a Lamb, catcheth it in his arms, and shelters it, till the storm be blown over. The Lamb strives, and thinks it self going to death, while indeed from death it is preserved.

So graciously doth this Conqueror deal with us: we kick at his precepts, fret at our restraint, and are impatient of our sufferings; whereas we are chastened of the Lord, that we might not be condemned with the world. Two had appointed to meet in the field of blood; the quarrel was bad, the prosecution worse: the friend of one of them not being able to persuade him by reason, caused him to be arrested into prison: better a short bondage, than unredeemable death. This was a merciful cruelty, the other had been a cruel mercy. It is happy if a sickness can keep us from sin. When a wild Horse hath got the head of his rider, and runs him with fury into deadly dangers; he does him no wrong, that kills the Horse, to save the man. They are the beasts, our lusts, that draw us in the Coach of licentiousness, headlong to Hell, as Pharaoh's Chariot drew him into the red Sea, against which God is severe and cruel; and when there is no other remedy, he will spill those beasts to save our souls. Here be then no lamentable cries, no merciless blows, no gaping wounds, no channels streaming with blood, in this conquest. No blood is shed here, but the blood of Jesus Christ. All the blood and life this victory cost, was spilled on the Victors part, not on the conquered. If God were cruel to any, it was to himself. To spare our blood, he did shed the blood of his own dear Son.

Their happiness that be thus overcome, is seen in these two privileges:

1. They are the only free-men in the world: this Bondage is the most royal liberty. This stands both, first, in the deliverance from evil; that neither the bond of the Law to bring perfect obedience in our own person, obligeth us; nor the breach of that Law, for want of that righteousness, condemneth us. When the King hath signed a transgressor his pardon, all his malicious enemies and accusers may go whistle. Secondly, and in the ability to good, even to serve the Lord without fear. It is true indeed, still we sin, and alas, that we must! We are made free from the Law of sin and death: not simply from sin and death, but from the Law of sin and death. Not so delivered, that we can neither sin nor die: but that neither sin shall captive us, nor death confound us. Indeed we sigh, and fight, and fain would be delivered from all assaults of sin: but beggars must not choose their alms; we must be contented with our measure: we have this to humble us, not to condemn us. It is comfort sufficient, though sin disturb us, it shall never destroy us. We abhor a Snake, for the nature of it; to touch it, is our fear: and it is but our fear, when all the malignity and venom is gone. Sin doth hiss at us, but cannot harm us: blessed be God, the fear is more than the hurt. Our life lies in our Head: if this Serpent with all his sting could not hurt the Head, it shall never kill any member.

Indeed where it domineeres, it damnes. If a man sick on his bed, burning of a Fever, fetching his breath with straitness and shortness, looking like earth; say he is well in health, we do not believe him: So if we see men swelling with pride, flaming with lust, looking earthie with covetousness, and yet flattering themselves with hope of salvation; we cannot credit them, all the world cannot save them. Here the Condition is not kept, therefore the Obligation is in force; they do not serve God, they are not free. But where is an endeavor to obey him, and a faith in Christ to supply the defects of that obedience; there the Covenant is kept, the Bond is void. Sin offers many assaults; but still we standfast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free. Death shall wholly quit us from these solicitations; Mors est sepultura vitiorum. It is not so much the death of the man, as the death of sin in the man. As the worm bred in the tree, at last consumes the tree: so death is bred by sin, and sin shall be destroyed by death. This is the full accomplishment of our freedom, when that filthy fluxe of sin is dried up in an instant. Whatsoever depraved nature suggests, it is not in vain to serve the Lord, for we are made Kings by this service. We may better say of Heaven, than of that City, all her Merchants are Princes; all God's subjects be Kings: not reges nati, but renati; not of a piece of Earth, but of Heaven; not of a mortal Principallitie, but of an immortal Kingdom. Courtiers may fail of preferment; they may be near high places, and Offices, and miss them: one compared them to fasting-days; they were next the holydayes, but in themselves the most meager and leanest days of the week: but God's servants are sure. Below men rise to honors and places by the death of others; these by their own deaths ascend to the glory of Heaven.

But Christianity seems to afford very small liberty: Is it not a yoke, and a burden? Take my yoke upon you. Tollite jugum, there's the condition of humanity; labor. Tollite jugum meum, there's the condition of Christianity; an especial labor. And Super vos, which implies both patience, willingly; and obedience, servingly: not to touch it with one finger, but to bear it on our shoulders; submit all our actions and affections to it. Pride and ambition are Super jugum, and tread that under their heels, which they should bear upon their necks. Indeed this is true: but still it is onus leve, and jugum suave; an easy yoke, a light burden. First, this yoke is not made of green wood, then it would be heavy; but of dry, therefore it is portable and easy. Secondly, it is not a new yoke, but hath been borne and worn before by Christ himself, to make it easy for us. Thirdly, it is oiled and lined with sweet comforts; Vnguntur cruces, à quo inferuntur: God hath so softened it with pillows of mercy, that it cannot offend us. Fourthly, we draw in it with patience: Oxen that struggle and be unruly with their yokes, put themselves to pain: God hath given us the shoulders of patience, before he puts on the yoke of obedience. Fifthly, we do not draw alone, nor does the weight of the load lie upon our backs; we should then sink and shrink under it. But a yoke is made for two, and Christ is one of the two; his omnipotence assists our weakness; the greatest burden lies upon him. Sixthly, and lastly, it is not perpetual; we draw it but during a short life. And if it be painful for the day, we are unyoked at night, when we go to bed, in death. But the wicked have a sorer yoke for the present, whereof the wood is green and ponderous; all sin is heavy. And though it seem qualified with pleasure and content, and is commonly drawn with a companion; as the Broker and Usurer both in a yoke, drunkard and drunkard both in a yoke, adulterer and strumpet both in a yoke: and where a yoke-fellow fails, as the proud man loves no partner, no partner loves him; here the Devil puts in a shoulder, to ease him and help it on. Yet still they draw with tyranny, pain, impatience, and feel many a prick of Satan's Goad, that Auriga of Hell, to set them forward. And last of all, at night, when they should put off one yoke, another, a heavier, a sorer is put on them, which they must bear forever. But when the faithful shall be uncoupled from the yoke, there is ease and eternal rest. The mouth of the Ox that draws in the yoke, is not muzzled on earth, and the soul shall find everlasting reward in Heaven.

I do not exempt Christianity from all difficulty; it is no easy labor to serve God: yea, they that do it best, feel it hardest, and complain that they can do it no better. There be hot encounters, potent adversaries, and many adversities, against them that would go to Heaven. Malicious and subtle spirits, an alluring world, a vicious and stubborn nature: sometimes we see them not, and complain of feeling them too late: sometimes we see them with amazement, fear them, and are ready to fly from them with an Israelitish cowardice: Who is able to stand before the sons of Anak? Another time we stand, and resist as well as we can, but are foiled with indignation and shame. Up we get again, take heart, and renew the combat; yea, even prevail, and triumph. O how glad we are, if either we have not been thrown down by the temptation, or recovered ourselves from the fall, by compunction. In the height of this joy, we are again surprised with a sudden assault; whereof as we had no warning, we have no power of resisting. Thus are we hurried into sin, over-ruled to displease our Maker: yea, sometimes we can hardly struggle out of the snare for some hours or days; and when we escape, not without many wounds and bruises: so that coming to the Chirurgery of Repentance, we find a bleeding conscience. We look not that God should strew carpets for our nice feet to walk into our heaven; or make that way smooth for us, which all Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, Confessors, Christ himself, have found rugged and bloody; or to fare better than all the Saints. Yet still we will not change conditions with the worldly: Paul was happier in his chain of iron, than Agrippa in his chain of gold. One rag of a Saint is worth the whole wardrobe of a sinner: and that for the next privilege.

2. Their reward is infinite. We may well contemn the difficulty, when we respect the advantage. We serve a good Master, who not only pays, but gives; not after the proportion of our earnings, but of his own mercies. Hell cannot touch us, death cannot hurt us; if any evil do assault us, it presently brings us more good. Besides this freedom, how large is our possession? all good things are ours, to challenge, to enjoy: we cannot look beyond our own, nor beside it: we have right to the things we see, and no less to the things we see not. The heaven that roles so gloriously over our heads, is ours: those celestial spirits, the better part of that high creation, are ours; they watch us in our beds, guard us in our ways, shelter us from dangers, comfort us in troubles; and as living they have kept, so dying, they gladly receive our souls. Yea above all, the God of Spirits is ours; and by a sweet and secret union, we are become heirs of his glory, and as it were Limbes of himself. How incomprehensible is this blessedness? when we look to the reward, we could not wish the work easier. If every pain we suffer were a death, and every cross an hell, we have amends enough. It were injurious to complain of the service, when we acknowledge the recompense. What thou wilt, O Lord, so I may be thine, what thou wilt: though I should buy it dearer, I would be thy servant, a Christian.

Our light affliction which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. Where we have a threefold opposition: Light and weighty, momentary and eternal, affliction and glory. What comparison, what proportion of the recompense to the service? I may justly be out of love with myself, nothing shall make me out of love with my profession; herein alone are we safe, herein blessed. God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of Jesus Christ: if we should prefer any worldly joys before it, we were unworthy of it. Gold may make a man the richer, not the better: honor may make him the higher, not the happier: and all temporal pleasures are but flowers, they have but their month, and are gone: this morning in the bosom, the next to the besom: All flesh is grass, and the glory of man as the flower. Grace is like the Sun, which shines comfortably in this world, shall shine sevenfold more gloriously in the world to come; an honor not clouded, not envied, not exceeded, and Such honor have all the Saints?

To conclude with the sum of the verse. Deceitfull promises are the bane; both of the forger and of the believer. They promise others liberty, while themselves are the servants, &c. As if a malefactor, that is himself chained in the dungeon, should promise his fellow to open him the prison-door, and let him out. Faire promises are the devils bait, and it must be our wisdom to discern betwixt the deceit of sin present, and the fruit of sin to come. What a liberty did Satan promise our first parents that they should have; and so indeed stole from them the liberty that they had. As Laban promised Jacob beautiful Rachel, but in the dark gave him blear-ey'd Leah. Or as Hamor promised the Shechemites, that by their circumcision all the goods of the house of Israel should be theirs, whereas indeed the goods of the Shechemites fell to the house of Israel. Diabolus mentitur ut fallat; vitam pollicetur ut perimat. The wages that Satan promiseth, and the sinner would have, he shall not get: but the wages that God threateneth, and man would not have, this shall be assuredly paid him. Illud propter quod peccant, hic dimittunt; & ipsa peccata secum portant. The gain they sin for, they shall leave behind them; but their sins they shall carry with them. What fruit had ye then in those things whereof you are now ashamed? for the end of these things is death. Surely there is no fruit but shame and death to be gathered from the forbidden tree. False promisers and vainglorious boasters are the children of Satan, this is the top of their pedigree: yea the devil doth borrow the use of their tongues for a time. But faithful is He that hath promised, who will also do it. Fidelity and truth is the issue of heaven.

2 PET. 2.20.

For if after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the later end is worse with them than the beginning.

IT is not the least happiness in this world, not to be taken with the happiness of this world. Pliny the younger could say, Capio hinc aliquam voluptatem, quod voluptate hac non capior. To walk daily through this garden of temptations, and pluck none of the forbidden fruits or flowers, is a temperance so far above nature, that no man, but He that was more than man, ever attained it. If a mere stranger passeth alone through the streets of a populous City, and follows his affairs close; he may return uninfected, because unsaluted. But for a known Citizen to do so, to blanch all his acquaintance with prejudice, to deny all those friends that offer their cruel courtesies at the next Tavern, to refuse all the invitations of profit or pleasure, requires a well resolved abstinence. Christ was a stranger upon earth, so should every Christian be: but this is the country wherein we are borne, (though it benot the country whereto we are borne) and it is hard for a man to deny his country. Mundus allicit, afficit, inficit: and though we pretend for heaven, yet still we bear about us a tang of our native country. Even they that would fain get out of the world, yet cannot get the world quite out of them. They purpose well; and if those thoughts (not theirs) begin to lift them up from their earth; presently he that rules in the air, stoops upon them with his powerful temptations, or the world pulls them down again with a sweet violence: so as they know not whether they be compelled or persuaded to yield. There is in the best such a deal of infirmity, but a great deal more of treachery. How willing are we to be deceived, how loath to be altered? Si t••tum valet mundus in extraneos, quale imperium exercet in suos? But now when a man is pulled out of these briars and thorns with a bleeding skin, and made sensible of those wounds which he hath received in this forest, and is in time healed of those hurts; if he rush again into that dangerous wilderness, and hazard new mischiefs; he falls (almost unpitied) into the hands of robbers and murderers, destitute of both rescue and resistance.

To be recovered from the ways of death, to walk awhile in the ways of life; and after all this, to turn from the land of the living to the Golgotha of the dead, from the forsaking of sin, to the sin of forsaking religion and goodness; this is the fearful condition of the Apostates in my Text, whose latter end is worse than their beginning.

We have three general parts: A - Proposition, They have escaped, &c.

- Supposition, If again they be entangled.
- Conclusion, Their latter end is worse.

In the proposition are three particulars; First, Quid, they have escaped. Secondly, Vnde, or a quo, from the pollutions of the world. Thirdly, Quomodo, by the knowledge of Christ In the Supposition observe two particulars; First, Facilitatem intricandi, the easiness of falling back; If again; it may be so, it is no ways impossible. Secondly, Difficultatem extricandi, the hardness of recovering them, which appears by the two phrases: Intangled; it will cost labor to unsnare them: overcome; it will cost a price to redeem them; neither of both which is afforded them. But lastly, the Conclusion follows, The latter end with them is worse than the beginning. The Text begins with hope; They have escaped: goes on with fear They are again entangled: and concludes in despair, Their latter end is worse than their beginning.

They have escaped.] Next to the finding an unexpected benefit, it is a great happiness to scape an unsuspected danger: yea the scaping of a great danger, is more joy, than the receiving of an ordinary benefit. David did not so much bless Abigail for relieving the hunger of his body, as for preventing the sin of his soul. She saved him from spilling the blood of another, he thanks her as much as if she had hindered another from spilling his blood. Nabal did not more rejoice in escaping death, than David in that he was kept from being the author of it. Never was good man delivered from a known peril, but he blessed his deliverer. Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare; the snare is broken, and we are escaped: the Church doubles the memory of that mercy: there it was but twice. Psal. 118. He speaks thrice of compassing, of dangers, of enemies, of multitudes, like swarms of Bees: still he blessed God for escaping, even with the destruction of his foes: there it is thrice. How worthy is he to perish in the next danger, that is not thankful for escaping the former? They that are delivered from the noise of the Archers in the places of drawing water, there shall they rehearse the the righteous acts of the Lord. They had set a song of thanksgiving for that deliverance. My soul is escaped from the Lions, saith David, therefore will I praise thee. In that bloody peragrations of Egypt, when every house had a carcass in it, and that of the first borne, Israel escaped: and shall the remembrance of this mercy vanish? No, every year they shall keep that day holy to the Lord, with the great feast of their Passover. That treason which should have been done with a match: that matchless conspiracy; whereof the scene was laid at Westminster, the stage was the Parliament house, the plot contrived at Rome, the intention was the confusion of a whole State; Aras & focos, regalia, sacra, veiusta: yet betwixt the fire and the powder, that short intervallum, we escaped. Shall that deliverance escape without our thanks? No, unblest shall be that year, where the fifth of November is not rubrick'd in the Kalendar, where our escaping is not acknowledged with thankful hearts. Our late King of happy memory, escaping the danger of a conspiracy in Scotland, contented not himself with a commemoration of it once a year: his subjects had the fifth of August; himself kept one day every week. He that escapeth a peril, without thankful acknowledgment, is indebted for his deliverance. Now there is no danger like sin; for there could have been no danger but for sin: and the greater the danger the greater praise belongs to the deliverance. Daniel was among the Lions; they could but have torn his flesh, and sent his soul to heaven through those painful breaches. But to escape from that roaring Lion, whose teeth water at men's souls, as being too dainty to feed on flesh; how great is this happiness! Three servants of God were cast into that seven times heated furnace: all those flames could not scorch their souls, whatsoever they had done to their bodies. But the fire of hell hath a secret and supernatural property to torment the soul: I am tormented in this flame, saith the rich Churl; that [I] must be his soul, his body was in the grave: and that with a fervor not less violent than everlasting. To escape that, may well challenge thanks from either men or Angels.

If we escape a dangerous sickness, and do not bless God with heart, voice, and life for our recovery; we rise from our beds, and owe for our physic. Hath God's Angel forbore to sheath his sword in our bowels, when thousands have fallen under his impartial hand? Let us be humbly thankful; otherwise there is a worse plague left behind for us, yea in us. Argue with all the world, they will conclude; there is no vice like to ingratitude. Thou art made whole, sin no more, lest a worse thing happen unto thee. We commit new sins, while we are thanklesse for escaping the punishment of our old ones. God justly for the first sin, had concluded all the world under sin: some through his grace in Christ are escaped from this condemnation: shall they tear the instrument of their pardon? No, we see it done, let us kiss the seal, and confess his mercy. We were overwhelmed with sin and ignorance: God hath called us out of darkness into his marvelous light: shall we put out the lamp whereby we are escaped? No, we must be thankful.

We make vows to God in our dangers; shall we not pay them after our dangers? Our obedience is a debt, though we had never revowed it: shall we forfeit all these bonds? Thou owest thy service to God for escaping sin and hell; pay, pay. Thou hast received all, thou owest all; think of payment. They are infamous that get the goods of others into their hands, and then break. The subject that is entrusted by his Prince with keeping of a fort, and shall give it up to the enemy, is a desperate traitor. Our tongues, eyes, hands, bodies and souls, are delivered from the Prince of darkness, by the Son of righteousness, and deposited to our keeping: if we yield them back to their old usurper, by blasphemy, pride, uncleanness, we shall die the death of traitors. Thou slightest an offended neighbor; I care not for him, I owe him nothing: sure we owe the devil nothing, but our detestation; why then should we do him any service? We owe all to God, both for escaping hell, and for our hope of heaven: What shall we render to him for all? Thankfulness and obedience are our vows, and we will pay our vows unto him.

But we say, alas, non habemus unde; we have not wherewithal. Men that are run far in debt, and pay, and pay, yet see small hope of coming out, often grow desperate. Not so: we owe an infinite sum; and we have an infinite sum to pay it withal; the infinite obedience and merit of Jesus Christ: this is able to discharge all, were the debt greater. For our own actual obedience, let us pay so far as we can. This is the difference between debts owing to God, and to men. The more of our debts we pay unto men, the less we have remaining of our own: but the more we pay to God, the more we have, and are the better able to pay. God hath delivered us from the bondage of Satan, to whom (by reason of sin) we ow'd our souls: Christ hath discharged that debt, and we are escaped: yet still we are debtours: this debt is not cancelled, but translated: every benefit is a new obligation. Only we are delivered from those scattering debts to that merciless creditor, Satan: and God hath taken it into his own hand: now all that we owe, is to him. The principal we pay him in his own coin, the blood of his Son: the interest is our thankful service and obedience. We are escaped from the captivity of that Tyrant; Christ hath paid our ransom: only we will pay him our praises, our service, ourselves.

The pollutions of the world.] Delivered from the world? Perhaps this was none of their hearts desire. They found no danger in it: and he that should promise them eternal riches, taking away the present possession of these temporals, they would think did them to loss. They are so far from contending to scape the world, that the world shall not scape them. They court it as their chief Paragon, the mistress of their affections. Tell them of any blemishes or defects in it; as the cares, thorns, stings, trechery, and a thousand such inconveniences, which are nourished in the heart of this strumpet; no matter, they will take her with all faults. Sampson will have his Philistian cockatrice, though he lose both his eyes.

It is true indeed, the world it self doth no harm: for he made it, and all things in it, that could make nothing amiss. And that the valde bona there, is turned into inquinamenta here, it may blame sin, and sin may blame man, and man may blame woman, and woman may blame the devil. Nor yet does it defile us materialiter, as pitch defiles the handler: but occasionaliter, as an unskillful Mechannicke cuts his fingers with good and useful tools. The pollutions of the world be even a world of pollutions: they contend for number with the very creatures. There is scarce anything made for man, whereby man doth not mar himself. Who would think that a spider should fetch venom out of a rose? Woman was made an helper for man; what a multitude of men have fallen by woman? Bread and sustenance is necessary for the preservation of life; yet how many have made their table a snare? Here is field-room enough, and it were hard not to expatiate: for it may be said of this Land, as it was of Carthage; It is as full of pollutions, as of people: or as Augustine of Lazarus; Tot ora, quot ulcera: so many sores, so many mouths, crying out for redress. But I reduce all unto three.

1. The pollutions which we contract from the riches of the world: not that riches are noxious in themselves, for then no good man would not have renounced them. Charge them that be rich in this world. As Saint John distinguisheth of being in the Church, and being of the Church: so men may be rich in the world, yet innocent and happy: for while their estates are below, their hearts are above. But those are rich of the world, that are worldlings in heart, as well as in estate. Whose affections have devoured so much of the world as they can, and are sorry that they cannot swallow it all. The rich of the world are in it, but the rich in the world are not of it. The world is in men's ears, the world is in their hearts; and they are not in it only, but of it. And there can be nothing in them that are of the world, but enmity to God, and that which God repayes with enmity: so as there is no way for them but perishing with the world. It is not for nothing, that the same word in the Hebrew signifies both riches and unrighteousness. Psalm. 52. The man that strengthened himself in his wickedness, or in his substance: so closely doth wickedness cleave to many men's substance.

There be too many that sell the poor to slaughter, and yet thank God for the price; but God will never thank them for it. Those butchers say, Blessed be God, for I am rich. This is a pollution that will hardly ever be washed off: no not expiated with building of an alms-house; for God will not be bribed with an Hospital. There is not a penny got by such unjust courses, but it sticks a foul spot on the soul: therefore the Apostle calls it filthy lucre; and Zephaniae for this cried out against Jerusalem; Woe to the filthy and polluted city. Many Prophets have denounced the same woe to this City: they meant the men more than the walls, though peradventure the walls did as much observe them. Were your Thames ten Iordans, it could not wash off this Leprosy. The covetous ride through splashes and puddles, through bogs and sloughs, and quagmires: it is impossible they should scape the badges of their travel, the aspersions of mire. With what delight soever they hunt after riches, I am sure they have but a dirtie way of it. At last they fall into the quick-sand of all swallowing death; and then they vainly wish, that they were to begin a new Pilgrimage; on condition, they had lost all the pleasure of their former journey.

Is not the life better than meat? Nonne anima praestantior esca? Yea, is not the soul better than dirt, that for dirt they pollute the soul? But alas, they are so rooted in the earth, that they are quite turned into the nature of the soil. Others may have a tang, a dash of the foul earth, by travelling through it to their home: but worldlings are rooted in the earth, and therefore not to be plucked up without violence. The devil shown Christ the Crowns of the earth, but not the thorns of those Crowns: so the covetous show their cumulos, and tumulos pecuniae, but not their stimulos conscientiae. It is the honor of the holy, Omnis decor ab intùs, they are all glorious within, what outward wants soever would disgrace them. It is the disgrace of the worldly, Omnis faetor ab intùs, they are all filthy within, what outward abundance soever doth honor them. God requires truth in the inward parts: but alas, we may say too truly of these, that Their inward parts are very wickedness. The rheumatic and spawling Cynicke, when he was entreated by the dainty mistress of the house, where he was entertained, that he would spit in the foulest part of the house; did hereupon unmannerly choose to spit in the mistresses own face, because that in his opinion was the foulest. So when God sees the rich man's house kept neat and clean, the floores swept, the walls hung, the vessels scowred, his apparel brushed, his body adorned, all curiously highted; only his heart filthy and polluted: certainly he will spit his contempt upon that heart. Therefore wash thy heart from iniquity, O Jerusalem, that thou mayest be saved.

2. The pollutions we derive from the honors and dignities of the world. Pride here challengeth the first place; and let her have it: even to be the Queen of all sordid filthiness. This not only lifts men up above others, but above themselves. Nor is it any wonder, that they should not know their neighbors, that have forgotten themselves. This is a coagulated ulcer, spreading over the whole soul; like a cloth that is taken from a Leper; stiff indeed, but only stiff with corruption. The bush that hangs out, shows what we may look for within; a plaster'd face argues a defiled heart. Every color that art lays on the cheeks, sizeth into the soul, and dyes that in grain; quite of another hew than God ever made, or will own. For surely he will never acknowledge that face he never made, nor that hair he never made theirs, nor that body that is ashamed of the maker, nor that soul that disguises the body. Let me tell them one thing which perhaps they never noted before. The first painted woman we read of in the Scriptures, was a witch and a whore. So Jehu told Joram of the whoredoms and the witchcrafts of his mother Jezebel. And the first painted woman we read of in profane stories, was a whore and a witch too; Medea: the end of them both was destruction, and a destruction without end; for the terror of all their proud followers. From hence ariseth the boil of burning malice, the carbuncle of envy, the plague-tokens of raging madness; yea even the horrid and frightful aspersion of blood-guiltiness; a sin that thunders in the ears of justice. The homicide, through a killing favor, is pardoned, and granted his life: God draws his sword, and by his plague spils a thousand lives for it. Water comes down to moisten the earth, but blood flies upward to bedew heaven.

It is the misery of greatness, to be lawless: how many had been good, if they never had been great? All the soot in the house, is to be found in the chimnies. It was a grave and smart answer of a great Statesman in the Land, when he was consulted by the Queen about the lawfulness of monopoly licences; Licentiâ omnes deteriores sumus; we are all the worse for a Licence. Place gives a license to do ill: and in evil, the best condition is Non velle, no will to it: the next, Non posse, no ability to do it. Nor do they admit of reproof: when that wind riseth, we may well look for a tempest. Touch the mountains, and they will smoke, saith the Psalmist. Great men are like mountains; when the Word of God touches them, they presently smoke with passion. Alas, who shall show them their pollutions? Their own eyes cannot tell them, and the eyes of their Parasites will not tell them. They have Glasses to see all the disorders of their external habits; even to the ruffling of a Purle, or the misplacing of a hair. But there is another Glass which they seldom use, the Word of God, that alone shows the spots of conscience. Therefore as it was said of Naaman; that he was Captain of the King of Syria's Host, a great man with his Master, honorable for his many achievements, and a mighty man in valor: but he was a Leper. Here were divers noble privileges, but one thing dishonored all the rest: But he was a Leper. There may be great dignities, powerful offices, high commands, popularitie, and applause; yea, even policy, and some good acts to the country. But if there be a stench of inward pollutions, a false heart to Religion and innocence; this is a But, a bar in their Arms, a blemish in their noble Scutchions, an indelible Motto, Sed erat leprosus, But he was a Leper.

3. The pollutions we deduce from the pleasures of the world. O what a torrent of turpitudes here stream in upon us! Immoderate diet, or rather surfeit: all the varieties and delicacies of nature, cook'd with the most studious art, stand on our Tables, like the goodly buildings of a fortified City. To this we lay fiery siege: where our sensual appetite is the great General, and our teeth the common soldiers: here we skale the walls, there we rase the foundations: our knives are the weapons, and the Instruments of War are the Instruments of Music; Boules of Wine the Colours, innocent creatures the spoil, and Songs of wantonness crown the triumphant victory. All which concludes in sleep, if that be not prevented by uncleanness. The people of Israel required meat for their lust, and the people of England nourish lust for their meat. Ebriety is a fellow-devil to the former; both are sins ambitious to prevent the day of Judgment; for then God will destroy both meat and the belly: these will not stay so long, but beforehand destroy both the belly and meat. The honor of man is the Image of God; but this vice flies at the very face of this Image, and scratcheth it out of the soul. The drunkard is a certain thing that hath been a man; but now most prodigiously he hath swallowed down himself through his throat. So he lies intombed, with the drink in his own bowels; and that doth bury him, which is buried in him.

Both these pollutions prepare for a third: the blood that is fired with Bacchus, must be cooled with Venus. The Devil should forget both his office and malice, if he did not play the Pandar to Concupiscence. Idleness makes way for loose company, loose company makes way for Wine, Wine makes work for Lust, and Lust makes work for the Devil. No marvel if the Poets called it a Pegasus; for it is a winged Horse, whereon many ride post to Hell. Our Climate, and therefore our natural constitution, is not so hot, that it needs the Popish Indulgence to the flesh, the erection of Stews; unless this artificial heat were unnaturally added to it. It is intemperance that prepares fuel for the fire of vengeance. O that our luxurious Strumpetiers could read in their diseased bodies the estate of their leprous souls.

But the tongue of the soul is Conscience, the voice with which she is best acquainted: this (when all the doors are shut to the voices of men) speaks within; and that with a language loud enough to be heard, easy enough to be understood. But the common course of such dissolute sinners, is to drown her voice with a louder: as he that was troubled with a scolding Wife, made way to his quiet, by out-scolding her. Who shall tell the family of their faults, when the Monitor is dumb? They have stopped the mouth, and taken away the voice of their conscience, by loud and roaring excess: and who is left to reprove? John the Baptist was called the voice of Christ; Vox clamantis, The voice of him that cries in the Wilderness. Herod did cut off his head. Now Christ spake not many words to his apprehenders, and accusers; not many to the High Priest, nor to the Judge, Pilate: but when he came before Herod, he spake never a word at all. Among other reasons, this is wittily given; he spake not a word to Herod, because Herod had taken away his Voice, in beheading John: and how should he speak without a voice? There may be a voice without speech, there cannot be speech without a voice. So they have tongue-tied their conscience, taken away her voice; and who shall control them? But when God shall untie those strings, and unmuzzle their conscience, she will be heard; and ten Consorts of Music shall not drown her clamorous cries. Now their conscience is bound, and they are loose: but in the day of trouble, themselves shall be bound, and God shall let loose their conscience. It shall be hard for them, with that frantic Musician, to fall a tuning their Vials, when their house is on fire about their ears: ô then rather, one drop of mercy, yea floods of pity, to cool the flame, and mitigate their sorrows.

All wise men affect the conclusion to be best: to ride two or three miles of fair way, and to have a hundred deep and foul ones to pass afterward, is uncomfortable; especially when the end is worse than the way. But let the beginning be troublesome, the progress somewhat more easy, and the journeys end happy, and there is fair amends. Mark the upright man, and behold the just; for the end of that man is peace. Mark him in the setting out, he hath many oppositions; mark him in the journey, he is full of tribulations: but mark him in the conclusion, and the end of that man is peace.

By the knowledge of the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.] Wherein I desire to touch upon these four observations or conclusions. First, that there is no knowledge to do good in corrupted nature and filthiness of the flesh. Secondly, there is no escaping out of this filthiness and corruption, but by knowledge. Thirdly, no knowledge can deliver us, but that of our Savior Christ. Fourthly, no knowledge of our Savior can effect this, but that which is sanctified with faith and repentance.

First, miserable is the estate of man, before he hath escaped from the world. As Adams body was cast out of Paradise, to seek his fortune in the wide and wild earth; or as Nebuchadnezzar was turned off, from being a King among men, to become a companion of beasts: so by the corruption of nature, man is debarred the society of God, and put out of the several into the Commons, to shift for himself in the broad world, where sins and sorrows strive for number. This was the Poets meaning by their Pandora; a beautiful woman, framed by Vulcan: to whose making up, every god and goddess gave a contribution. They put into the hand of this fair Inchantresse a goodly Box, fraught and stuffed with all woes and miseries; only in the bottom of it they placed Hope. It was presented to Prometheus, but Providence refused it; then to Epimetheus, and Afterwits accepted it. Which he no sooner rashly opened, but there came out a swarm of calamities, fluttering about his ears. This he perceiving, clapp'd on the Cover with all possible speed; and so with much ado saved Hope, sitting alone in the bottom. Such an army of miseries, like the troupe issuing from the Wombe of the Troian Horse, invaded the world, by opening the Box of Pandora, by tasting the Apple of Evah; that if the mercy of God had not left us Hope, Solam solantem Spem, in the bottom, we had all perished. The precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine Gold, whose Nazarites were purer than Snow, whiter than Milk, and more ruddie than Rubies, and their polishing of Saphyre; now have visages *black*er than Coals. The Body, that is made of Earth, can stand upright, and look toward Heaven; the Soul, that came from Heaven, is become crooked, and looks toward Earth.

All are miserable, only some know it, and others know it not. As Socrates put from himself the repute of wisdom which the Delpicke Oracle had ascribed to him; saying that here was all the difference betwixt him and others; He was not wise, and knew it: others were not wise, and knew it not. He that is escaped from the world, knows their unhappiness that be entangled with it, because he was so. But they that are entangled with it, know not the happiness of him that hath escaped it, because they never were so. Such were ye, but ye are sanctified.

2. The way to escape the worlds filthiness, is through knowledge. There is nothing in the world both more esteemed, and disesteemed, than knowledge: valued by them that have some, vilipended by them that have none. When the Cynicke Philosopher was asked in a kind of scorn, what was the reason that Philosophers haunted rich men, and not rich men Philosophers: he answered, because the one knew what they wanted, the other did not. Wise men want wealth, and feel it: rich men want wisdom, and are not sensible of it. Yet knowledge hath their well wishes, and faint desires, though not their endeavors. Wisdom is justified of her children; yea even of the children of folly. So a Pharaoh could say, Come let us work wisely. Even fools would pretend wisdom, and have their cunning absurdities pass for mature prudence, and the success for happiness. Herein Satan is subtler than they, who lays the plot to make them fools, by mistaking villainy for virtue. There is no poverty of estate, or consumption of body, to a lean starved soul; which neither knows, nor cares to know.

The small love which the world bears to wisdom, appears by their usage of the children of wisdom. Vt diligunt artifices, ita intelligent arts. They will give more to a Rider for breaking their horses, or to a Dancer for teaching them the measures; than to any professor of learning for informing their souls. So Aristippus answered him, that wondered why men should rather give to the poor, than to scholars; because they think themselves may come to be poor, never to be scholars. Of all the wants in the world, fewest complain the want of knowledge. The opinion of having enough, is one of the greatest causes of having so little. Yet the very Philosophers, by that knowledge of the world which they got from the light of nature, learned to contemn it: yea they despised him that did not despise it. They did not videre & invidere, envy the rich and potent, nor covet abundance. But rather Cernunt & spernunt, they saw enough to hate this world though they saw not where to find a better.

3. Indeed no knowledge can do this, but only that of our Lord Jesus Christ. I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. Paul was enriched with all manner of knowledge; he knew as much as the most learned Jew or Pagan; nothing could deliver him from the pollutions of the world, till he became a Christian. Alas, the reason of man doth but flowt the wisdom of God. Mocking the Apostles, they said, These men are full of new wine: which Peter confutes by affirming it to be but the third hour of the day; It was too early to be drunk. Yet that's not all: for fullness of wine doth take away speech and disable the tongue: we have known it spoil men of the use of their mother tongue, we never knew it teach men to speak languages which they never learned. Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle travelled and sought into every corner of the world, to confer with learned men: we never read that they went into Jury; yet there the best knowledge was to be had. They knew not that, how could they? The wandering sheep do not seek the shepherd, but the shepherd them. The lost goat did not seek the woman, but the woman it. Paul indeed was seeking for Christ; but how? to persecute him, not to believe on him. Christ must reveal himself to us, before we can set ourselves to seek him. And till that High Sheriff of the King of heaven comes with a writ of Ejection the world will hold his possession. The hands defiled with raking in the kennel of this world, cannot be cleansed but by washing them in the laver of regeneration. Nor can we wash in Christ's fountain till we know where he dwells, where that fountain runs. This is the only means of escaping the pollutions of the world; through the knowledge of Christ: he must wash us. If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me. God hath ever shown himself a lover of cleanliness, as it appears by all those legal ablutions. He never shown it so much as when he vouchsafed to wash us himself, with his own royal hands; the bath being his own royal Blood. This, and nothing but this could get out the long contracted stains of our souls. Corruption had so sized into the very grain of our natures and whole compositions; that it must be blood, and warm blood, and the warm blood not of a mere man, but of him that is also God, that could fetch it out. None would wash us, we were so loathsome: none could purge us, we were so leprous; but only Christ. Elisha bad Naaman, Go and wash: Christ came himself to wash us.

Here then we learn that only means, whereby we can escape inquinamenta mundi, the filthiness of sin; the sole fountain of the Lamb of God. Not all the mysteries of nature, not all the secretaries, the philosophers of the world, with their best Principles of Morality, could do this cure. No knowledge can purge the soul, but the knowledge of the Lord Jesus. Go wash in Jordan seven times, and thou shalt be clean. How did this appear to that natural Syrian as a mere scorn and mockerie? Go wash? alas, what can water do? It can cleanse from foulness, not from leprosy. And why in Jordan? what differs that from other streams? And why just seven times? What virtue is either in that channel, or in that number? In what a chafe did he fling from the Prophets door? Am I come thus far to fetch a flowt? Could the Prophet find no man to play upon but me? Thus doth the reason of man fight against the ordinances of God. What is Baptism to purge the conscience? What is the sprinkling of a few drops on the face, to wash away corruption from the soul? One hath shed guiltless blood with his hands, let him wash those hands ten times a day in fresh waters, will it get out that murderous tincture from his conscience? Thus carnal minds despise the foolishness of preaching, the simplicity of the Sacraments, the homeliness of ceremonies, the seeming inefficacy of censures: they look upon Jordan with Syrian eyes. So Naaman goes on; If water would do it, what needed I to come so far for this remedy? Have I not often done this in vain? Have we not better streams at home, than any can be afforded in Israel? Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of waters of Israel? Abana and Pharpar; two for one: Rivers, not waters: Of Damascus, a stately and incomparable City: they are, who dares deny it? Better, not as good: than the waters, not the rivers: All the waters, Jordan and all the rest: Of Israel, a beggarly region to Damascus. Alas, how wretched be the devices of men to the Institutions of God? How odious and damnable is it to make any comparison between them? One drop of Jordan, set apart by divine ordination, hath more virtue than all the streams of the world. Indeed Naaman might have washed there long enough in vain, if the Prophet had not sent him. Many a leper had bathed in that stream, and come forth no less unclean than he went in. It is the Word, the Ordinance of God that puts efficacy into those means, which of themselves could do nothing. Ista non tribuunt, quod per ista tribuitur. His institution hath put that virtue into the Sacramental Font; that it shall not more wash the face, than purge the soul.

Let us therefore get the knowledge of Christ, if we would be happy; and wash off our sins in his blood, that we may be holy. He that knows Christ, knows that the pardon of sins, the ablution of uncleanness, the perfection of righteousness, the peace of conscience, and the heavenly Inheritance come along with him: he cannot doate on the world, that knows Christ. Can we unfeignedly say with Peter, Lord Jesus, we have forsaken all and followed thee? We need not ask, what shall we have therefore? For God tells us, that he hath given us his Son, and with him all things. How sweetly do those Scriptures answer and satisfy one another, and both satisfy the heart of a Christian? Christ never comes alone, never empty, but his reward is with him. The shadow doth not more inseparably follow the body, than all blessings follow Christ. First, seek the kingdom of God, and these things shall be added to you: like an & caetera in the end of a sentence. Yet alas, though we know this, we do not seek Christ in the first and chiefest place. In this drought, one seeks rain in the new Moon, another in the turning of the wind, a third in this or that sign; none almost seek it in Christ; therefore God hath confounded all our signs and observations. Men may have temporal good things without Christ; but as the thief hath the true man's purse, or dogs the bread of the children. But we can want nothing, if we want not Christ: the prodigal doubteth not of Bread enough, if he can regain his father. John of Alexandria, surnamed the Almoner, did use yearly to make even with his revenues, and when he had distributed all to the poor, he thanked God that he had now nothing left him but his Lord and master Jesus Christ; to whom he longed to fly with unlimed and unentangled wings. When Alexander the great passed into Asia, he gave large donatives to his Captains and men of merit; insomuch that Permenion asked him; Sir, what do you keep for yourself? He answered; Hope. Crosses, calamities, poverty may take from us all the goods of this world; or our charity may give them away: the worldlings ask us what we have left for ourselves; we answer, only Jesus Christ.

4. That knowledge of Christ which is not joined with faith and obedience, repentance and amendment of life, cannot deliver us from perishing with the world. If it were enough to know, the devil would lose abundance of clients and customers. There is a floating knowledge swimming in the brain, like a piece of corke on the top of the water. Wicked men understand good things per alienam speciem, not in their true forms: Scientiâ disciplinariâ, not intuitivâ. They are sent them as Pharaohs dream, which they shall never be able to understand. The mysteries of Religion appear to them like a dim taper, whereof they are still disputing, picking out problems and paradoxes and subtleties: and so darken the Truth by discoursing of it, like a man that puts out the candle with snuffing it. They read and mind not, or mind and understand not, or understand and remember not, or remember and practice not. There be some whose speeches be witty, while their carriage is weak: whose deeds are incongruities, while their words are apothegmes. It is not worth the name of knowledge, that may be heard only, and not seen. Good discourse is but the froth of wisdom: the pure and solid substance of it is in well framed actions. These things if ye know, happy are ye if ye do them. Knowledge is but a pre-requisite to the main of obedience, a stair to the turret of happiness. That was Christ's farewell-close, with a deep impression driving home his former counsels: like the last strong and loud knole of a bell, that puts an end to all the foregoing peals: a Sermon that did put life into all his other Sermons; urging the life and practice of them: like that Blessed are they that hear the Word of God, and keep it; with which we commonly conclude our Sermons. We say of Statutes and Proclamations, there is a multitude of them: but there should be one Statute, one Proclamation made, to enforce the keeping of all the rest: so that one Text binds us to the observation of all others. Therefore he washed the Disciples feet, and shown them an example of doing: as if there was not so much need of teaching them what they knew not, as of pressing them to do what they knew. Because knowledge would not serve the turn, he first does the things, and then expresseth his intent. These things it is not enough to know, but to do.

Knowledge and practice together bless a Christian, both in his cardinal virtues, and arch-mysteries of faith; far more than the knowing and doing of all the natural, moral, or manual sciences in the world. Knowledge separated from obedience, doth but enflame a man's reckoning, and help him to a greater measure of condemnation. If I had not come and spoken to them, they had not b'd sin: but now they have no cloke for their sin. Ignorance may seem to be a cloke for errors: but knowledge takes away that cloke, and leaves them naked of all excuses. Not that ignorance can acquit men; Excusat à tanto, non à toto. It will not justify me, to say I did not know that I did sin; when I sinned in neglecting to know. Ignorantia mollit, non tollit rationem peccati. Antecedent ignorance will not save a man; much more will consequent ignorance condemn him. God will not favor a man, because he hath studied hard, and known much: but rather the more punish him, because he hath known good, and done evil.

I deny not that many sins are committed after knowledge: the lusts of the flesh, like the vapors of a replete stomach rising up and damping the brain, often obscure the beams of knowledge: during which violence and distemper, David and Peter fall into fearful sins. But the willing practice of known sins, and repentance, can never stand together; no more than fire and water can agree in the same subject. As a hot liver commonly makes a cold stomach: so the unnatural heat of continued sins, makes but a cold repentance. There is a deep well in the yard: shall a man therefore willfully set his house on fire, because he knows where to fetch water to quench it? Alas, the fire suddenly takes, and ragingly goes on: but the Well is deep, or the bucket is small, and can bring up a little at once. The well of thy heart is deep, it is a great way to fetch it: the skrew or pulley is unwieldy, there is much labor to draw it. Yea, God must both put water into the well, sorrow into the heart; and help thee to pump it out, extract tears from thine eyes; as he did supply David and Peter from his infinite springs of grace; or this burning will not be quenched.

Rather let us labor to avoid sin by our knowledge, than venture to sin upon the conceit of repentance. No wise man will make himself sick, though he knows he hath a very good medicine. They be desperate Mountebanks that wound their own flesh, to advance the sale of their balsams. Alas, that men should be skillful in the history of Christ, and willful in their rebellions against Christ: that they should have the Bible in their brains, and blasphemy in their lips. Like Posts, that bring truth in their letters, and lies in their mouths. Alas, that men should frequent the Temples, and flock to sermons, and yet be never the better in their lives: as boys go into the water, to play and paddle there only, not to wash and be clean. But let all them that have the knowledge of Christ, give obedience to him, that they may be saved by him.

If they are again entangled.] This is the Supposition; where I considered, Facilitatem relabendi: If; it is no impossible thing. Yea, the commonness proves it too easy. How many have given up their names to Christ, and slunke away from his service? How many be Satan's subjects, and yet God's pensioners? How many have taken his press-money, and revolted to the enemy? Demas had been with Paul, professed with Paul, labored with Paul, yet for this present world he forsook Paul, and Gospel, and Christ himself. Indeed he that loves God for himself, and goodness because it is goodness: can never turn from that goodness, from that fountain of goodness, God. Turn him loose into the world, trust him in the throng of temptations; his heart is so filled with Christ, that there is no room for a strange love to enter. But they that loved God only for his temporal blessings, fail him, when those blessings fail them. Mutinous soldiers; no longer pay, no longer fight; as that desperate mercenary said, he came not to fight for his country, he came to fight for his money. Like the Law, Logic, and the Switzers; they are for his service, that gives them the best ready wages. Here Satan takes his hint, to usurp upon the children of perdition. Religion bring crosses; Ecclesia est haeres Crucis: they find their devotion answered with tribulation; and cannot be quiet, because they seem to be good. Now steps in the Devil: Why should you buy misery with want; when as you may want misery? Why will you embrace certain cares, in hope of uncertain comforts? Why do you take pains to be poor, when you may be rich with ease? Here they that have not the grace, nor the face, to give the Devil the Lye, throw the Plough into the hedge, and will not wait till Harvest; but lay hold on these new offers of the world, and for a Messe of Pottage sell their Patrimony.

There be some to whom God doth not so much as give an Evangelical Call, and they never look toward Heaven. For where he takes away the Key, it is a sign that he never means to open the door. There be some that have been called, and answered that Call, and made a show of following it, bearing up towards the celestial Kingdom; when on a sudden the world whistles, shows them their old Love, newly dressed and painted and trick'd up with fresh colors. Back the fool runs, flings by Counsaile, treads upon Conscience, trips up the feet of Reason, and shows Religion his heels, if he does not kick at it with contempt. Wherefore let him that thinks he standeth, take heed lest he fall. Some think they stand, but do not; they look to be saved, and scarce can tell who should save them. They examine their conscience, as a favorable Judge doth the malefactor whom he means to acquit; his very questions are so indulgent, that they teach him an answer: and then he concludes; I find no fault in this man, let him pay his Fees, and be gone. Thus they are like a man in a dream, that thinks he is travelling abroad, doing this or that business; but waking, he finds himself fast in his bed. We all dwell in a house ready to fall, sail in a ship full of leaks. Perhaps we do not stand; or have stood, and are fallen; are fallen, and know not how to rise; rise, and are ready to fall again. Am I a Dog, that I should do thus, saith Hazael to the Prophet? As if he would never do it while he continued man; count him a Dog, when it comes to that. Yet by his leave, whether man or Dog, he did it. None know what they shall be, few know what they are. There is no Salt, but may lose his savor; no Flower, but may lose his sent; no Beauty, but may be defaced; no Fruit, but may be blasted; no Light, but may be eclipsed; no State, but may be changed; no Soul, but may be corrupted.

Man goes forth in the morning weak and unarmed, to encounter with Powers and Principalities. To fight this combat, he takes a Second with him, and that's his Flesh; a familiar enemy, a friendly traitor: the Devil comes against him with his Second too, and that's the World. Soone doth the flesh revolt to the world, and both stick to Satan: so here is terrible odds; Three to One. Besides all this, the enemy hath gotten all the advantages; as the Hill, the Sun, the Wind. The Hill; for man is climbing upwards to Heaven, and Satan comes down upon him with the stronger violence. The Sun; for all the glorious beams of honor, pleasure, wealth, are on his side, dazzling the eyes of man. The Wind; storms and blasts of raging Persecution march under his Banner; all against poor man. Now if he have no other succor but himself, he is surprised in an instant, and the adversary gets the day. But he that truly knoweth Christ, comes not into the field without this Captain: and then, If God be with us, who can be against us? Besides, he hath a Shield that is, armor of proof, darts of fire cannot pierce it; an invincible Faith: if he do but lie under this Target, he is safe. Divers cannot cunningly handle the Sword, yet they can hold up the Buckler. If thou be not able to give Satan blow for blow, yet hold up thy Shield; that shall ward all his blows. But when a man is besieged in an impregnable Fort, where he hath enough both of provision to subsist, and munition and furniture to defend: yet if through a coward pusillanimitie, he shall leave his Hold, and think to save himself by flight; he worthily falls into their hands, who otherwise had fallen under his. He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust: his truth shall be thy shield and buckler. That is a Fort sure enough: he that forsakes it, deserves to be forsaken of it.

I conclude: If we forsake not Christ, he will never forsake us: it can never be shown by any observation, that he fell off first. Prior in amore, posterior in odio. But that it is easy to forsake him, for the present sweetness of gain and pleasure in this world, too lamentable experience proves it. Thousands for scores follow after temporals, with neglect of eternal things: and souls that came from heaven, that should return to heaven, are incurvate to the earth. As if Nature were become preposterous, the world turned upside down, and Satan had got the day of Christ. This Diogenes unhappily expressed, when he was asked how he would be buried: he answered, with his face downward: for within a while, he said, the world would be turned upside down, and then he should lie right. Let it be our endeavor to turn the right side upward again, to set our souls in the due position, trampling the world under the feet of disdain, and lifting up our spirits to heaven, which was made to receive all those that seek and love the Lord Jesus.

The difficulty of recovering them, after their relapse, follows; and is expressed by two Metaphors, Implicantur, Superantur: They are entangled, and overcome.

They are entangled:] As Birds are caught in an evil Net; where the more they struggle to get out, the faster they stick. Or be taken with Lime-bushes; where those feathers ensnare their bodies, which before did carry their bodies: nor can they save their lives, but by losing their feathers. The world sticks fast to men's hearts, and by embracing, imprisons them: the Lime that holds them, is Satan's temptation; the feathers by which it holds them, are their own covetous affections. These loose wings betray their souls: and if ever they save their souls, it must be by parting with their feathers, by being stripped of their riches. Give all thou hast to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in Heaven. Alas, his feathers were limed, his soul so entangled with the world, that he could not possibly mount up so high. I have married a Wife, and I cannot come: No wonder; he was wedded to the world, tied in the conjugal bonds of affection to sin, the strongest contract on earth; he cannot come. You may as well call a Deere out of his Toyle, a prisoner out of his Jail, yea, a dead man out of his Grave; he cannot come.

Satan hath several tyes for several sinners. The adulterer is tied by the eye, his mistresses looks enchant him. The drunkard is tied by the throat, he cannot come till he have his load; and then he is so loaden, that he cannot come. The swearer is tied by the tongue: it were well if he were tongue-tied. The Epicure is tied by the teeth: a disease he had from his grandmother. The slothful is tied by the foot: the lazy Gout hath bound him to the Chair of wickedness. The covetous is tied by the Purse-strings: and he would hate even Pleasure it self, if he should find it a Cut-purse. The superstitious Imageworshipper is tied by the knees, and he cannot rise from his Pupper-Deities. The treacherous Jesuit is tied by the neck with a Romish chayne: it were well if his neck were tied to the due place. The voluptuous is tied with a twinethred of vanity, as a Natural is tied with a Rush, and thinks himself in durance. Satan hath entangled these with the world, that you may as well bid mountains remove, or bid them remove mountains, as forsake worldliness: they cannot come. The Devil tyes worldly things to the affections, which are the feet of the soul: as the Faulconer, when he hath mann'd his Hawk to his service, hangs Bells at her legs, th^t whithersoever they fly out, he may know whe^{re} to find them again: it is but casting up his Lure, and they stoop to his fi^{rst} he presently hath them. I have bought five yoke of Oxen, and I go to prove them: as if himself had been one of the Teame, tied up in the Geeres of his Oxⁿ; he must be excused. It is Saint Gregory's counsel; Sic teneas quae mundi sun^t, ut per ea quae mundi sunt non tenearis. Good men will not bind the world to themselves, and b^{ad} men bind themselves to the world. Terrena res possideatur, non possideat: sint temporalia in usu, aeterna in desiderio: illa in itinere, haec ut in termino. Gehazi's soul is bound up in the bags of Naaman's money: But what followed? Gehazi's flesh shall be bound up in the scurfe of Naaman's Leprosy. The sinner hath travel, labor, sorrow, and care; these be the strings of his Purse, and he keeps them: but for the Purse it self, the Riches he hath gathered, these God will give to another; even the Purse it self.

Bonaventure compares him to the Mole, in four respects. First, he is black, as a Mole: White is the color of Innocence; the faithful have white garments: Black is the contrary, even the color of iniquity. Secondly, he is blind, as a Mole; Ignorance hath deprived him of his sight. In a contrariety to God, who sees clearly in all places: The darkness and the light are both alike to him: night and day are all one, for he sees in neither. Thirdly, he is buried, as a Mole: all his hoards and heaps of wealth are so many sepulchers to his soul, wherein he digs his own grave. Fourthly, he is preposterous, as a Mole: which is still cast ng up the earth, that it may fall on her back, and cover her from the Sun. So h^e lays himself under his riches, and interposeth the earth betwixt his soul and heaven: all his goods are so many strong Tarryers to him. When the Serpent catcheth his prey, he so clasps and winds about it with his flexile and folding body, that he holds it sure. Satan, that old Serpent, so twines himself ^{about} the world-addicted soul, and his spirits like a Bed of Snakes so entangle it, that nothing but Thunder can dissolve them. There is no evasion out of this Labyrinth, except the Spirit of God give us the Clew of grace. With pleasure ^{and ease} sinners come in; but no pains, no industry, no wisdom of man can find the way out.

The poor sheep follows her pasture, and suspects no danger: but on the sudden she is so entangled with the briars and brambles, that she is glad with some losse of her wool, yea scratches of her skin, to be gone; and not seldom cannot do so, without the help of the shepherd. It is happy for us, if with loss of our fl•ece, of our flesh, we can be extricated from these temptations, and fo•lish Lusts, which drown so many in perdition. The Israelites were set by Pharaoh to gather Straw for themselves, but not to make Bricks for themselves: and when they had done their best, were beaten for not doing better. So Satan, that merciless Tyrant, and swarthy Egyptian, employs his slaves to gather Straw and Thatch, the Trash of this world; with all which they shall never build a house of rest or harbor for themselves, and at last be scourged with impartial torments. A great fish devours a less; a greater, him; and he again becomes food for the greatest: yet at last this greatest is caught, with Hooke or Net. They be fools, that sacrifice to their own Nets, with which they have caught others: but they are mad men, that sacrifice to the Nets of others, with which they are caught themselves. Yet these desperate prisoners love their bondage, and find such sweetness in their intangling, that they desire not to be delivered. Only when ought of their sensual delights is taken from them, they mourn and blubber; and bestow that sorrow upon their shame, which they should have anointed on their sin. I have heard, that when a man is wounded with a Sword, look what medicine is proper to the Patient, if it be applied to the Sword, it shall cure him: anoint the weapon, and heal the wound. (I will not rack my Faith, to believe it.) The weapon that hath wounded us, is the world; the medicine that can only cure it, is hearty sorrow. Shall we grieve for worldly losses? This were to apply the medicine to the wrong place; barely to anoint the weapon, whiles the wound rankles to death: for worldly sorrow causeth death. Not let us apply it to our heart, mourn for our sin, detest and abandon the world, and fixe our confidence in God; then shall we be healed through Jesus Christ.

And overcome.] Some may say, this Theme of Intangling hath almost entangled me, as if I could not tell how to get you out of this argument: loe, now we are delivered. And yet me thinks I am not sooner got out of this Forest, but presently I see a Lion, even that roaring Lion, with extended jaws, ready to devour; a malicious and merciless enemy marching forward, to the conquest of souls: and my very next step falls upon that conquest, Arma virumque cano: with the subversion of worldlings, They are overcome.

That which puts a man from the use of his Reason, or a Christian from his exercise of Religion, overcomes him. So we say of the Drunkard, he is overcome with Wine, when it shall get the better and upper hand of his wit. The dotting Lover is overcome with fancy, when it hath blinded his Reason. The ambitious are overcome with the desire of honor; so that they are not their own men. Of all, the worldlings are basely overcome: for they think they have the world in a string, when the world hath them in a strong chain. This worse than beastly appetite (for not many beasts desire more than will serve their turns) is like a violent stream, which beginning from a small current, vires acquirit eundo, takes in many emergent waters by the way, till it become a mighty torrent, bearing down all before it; yet at last it self is swallowed up into the Sea. No man that warreth, entangleth himself with the affairs of this life. For implicando se involvitur, involvendo detinetur, & detinendo superatur. No wonder, if he that is entangled, be soon overcome. David being to encounter with Goliath, in that unequal combat, is arrayed with the warlike habit of a King: thus furnished, he might look upon himself, and think his outside glorious. But when he offered to walk and move, he found these Arms not so strong as unweildie, more for show than use, that they rather hindered than advantaged him. Off he puts those accoutrements of honor, and craves pardon to go in no clothes but his own: he had rather be a homely Conqueror, than a glorious Spoile. He takes his Staff instead of the Spear, his Shepherds Scrip for a Brigandine; instead of the Sword, he takes his Sling; and for Darts and Javelines, five smooth stones out of the Brooke: thus got he the victory. So the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty, through God. Not the policy, the succors, the abundance of earthly things; these do but entangle us, and rather disable our resistance, than help us to the conquest. But the wisdom, the comfort, the powerful grace of the holy Spirit, these be our Arms; with these we shall beat down our enemies.

Cyrus said, that his poor soldiers were his best soldiers; for they had nothing to lose, but there was something they hoped to gain. Wealth is the rich man's strong Castle, yet that Castle will not hold out a long siege; death will demolish it, if it be not done to his hands before he comes. Hezekiah shown the Ambassadors of Babylon his treasure: what came of it? Behold, all shall be carried away. It was the incredible wealth which Cleopatra shown Caesar, whereby she thought to overcome him, that brought Caesar into Egypt, to make himself master of it. As when Croesus, for his glory, shown Solon his huge mass of Gold; Solon told him, If another come that hath better iron than you, he will be master of all this Gold. Any man that travailes toward Jericho, may fall among thieves: yea how should he avoid them? Poverty is a thief, to steal away wealth; sickness is a thief, to steal away health; death is a thief, to steal away life; the world it self is a thief, to steal away the world. But we must thank God for that which so overcomes us, that it overcomes the love of the world in us.

There be some that profess an utter abdication of the world, as if it and they were not cater-cosins; ignorant Votaries, and patch'd Cistertians; who do so want holiness, that they place holiness in want. Yet the receivers of their rents, revenues, and in-comes, know full well they are no beggars. Jesuits indeed profess no willful poverty; yea their main end is, next being mischievous, to be rich. Insomuch that one of their own Church adviseth the good Capuchine, whensoever he is to carry a Jesuit over a brook, to examine his pockets before he take him on his back, lest he break his rule in carrying coin about him; and be forced against the charity that was in Saint Francis; for saving his vow, to slip him down into the water. It is their indignation, that they cannot persuade all men to abjure all earthly felicity, that they might engross it to themselves. They have gulled many rich men out of their estates, many Nobles out of their honors, many wise men out of their wits; yea they have attempted to persuade Princes out of their royalties; they would be kings themselves: but they have not yet prevailed with them. Greatly may Religion sway a Prince, yet not so as to leave a Crown. We read of divers that have transgressed, yea left all Religion for a Crown; but of very few that have left a Crown for Religion. Yea most Princes hold it a point of Religion, never to leave a Crown, till a Crown leaves them. Such devout beggars be these mortified Papists, that they would beggar all the world.

Intangled and overcome,] put them both together. It is the depth of misery to fall under the curse of Cham, a servant of servants. Divitis servi, maxim servi. We remember how Israel blessed Issachar; comparing him to a strong Ass. When one wished the child like the father; Cato replied, is this a blessing, or a curse? So was this of Jacob, a blessing or a curse? Some Hebrews understand it of their great labor and study in the Law: but we find few such asses among our Lawyers. Others thus, they saw they dwelt in a fat soil, without lack of pleasures, and therefore like Asses only plied with provender, without minding their burdens. Such Asses be they that are overcome with the world; they refuse no burden that Satan can lay on their backs, not the most unreasonable sins, so he do not abridge them of their provender, the unbounded swinge of their sensual appetites. It is true indeed, that Satan doth too often even win the godly to commit sin, but never to love sin: and when he hath done but that, he may put all his gains in his eye. For their very falls make them afterward stand the surer: and their yielding to one assault, for scorn and indignation of the foil, redoubles their valor to the resisting of a thousand: so that at once, he is grown weaker, and they stronger. That which was sent and suborned by our spiritual adversaries to betray us, in an happy change fights for us; and is driven rather to rebel, than wrong us. All things work for our good; and through our Makers grace, we come to gain by our sins. That which while we were a repenting, we would have expiated with our blood, now after our repentance we find matter of comfort; the fruit of unhappy sin, happy repentance. This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith. There is no overcoming but this way, and this is a way that shall never fail. Faith is our buckler: Satan, the world, sin, death are in the field; their shafts are fire; yet this shield shall quench them. Let me conclude this argument, with some motives to resist the world, and means to overcome it.

1. When a man is bidden to some excellent cheare, he were an uncivil and ungrateful guest, if he should fill his stomach beforehand with offensive garlic; Concilians & sibi fastidium, & aliis nauseam. We are invited to the heavenly banquet, the Manna of blessedness: shall we first gorge ourselves with the garlic and onions of Egypt, the unwholesome lusts of this world? Neither can these things satisfy us: if a man eat and drink, and thrive not with it, he must confess some error and defect in nature, and should consult the Physician for remedy. Let the covetous feed, devour, swallow, and ravine all; this neither improves his content, nor satisfies his appetite: yet this man doth not feel himself sick of a foolish dropsy, or canine stomach, or to stand in any need of physic. But reason saith, he that labors of such an unnatural grief, non repletionem, sed purgationem opus habet: there is no way to cure him, but by letting him blood of his rank and superfluous veins. Plato could advise such an one to take care, non augere possessionem, sed minuere cupiditatem.

2. If a man should dream of flying with waxen wings, would he attempt this project waking? Would he not rather be ashamed of so fond an impossibility? It is easier for the body of a man to fly over the seas with artificial wings, than for his soul to mount up to heaven by the strength of temporal riches. Trees, beasts, men grow up to their full stature and measure, and then stick till they decline: only worldliness grows always, and most at last. Therefore is covetousness called the root of all evil: because when the branches grow old and sear for want of moisture, and there is nothing but dryness in the arms, yet there is sap in the root:

that lives, till they both die together: one grave must hold them: there only they shall be sure to find enough.

3. In vain do they flatter themselves with the name of God's servants. When we see two men walking in the way, and one Dog following them, we cannot tell which is his master while they keep together: but when they part, then the Dog discovers his master, by forsaking the stranger. Piety and prosperity sometimes walk together like friendly neighbors, and then you cannot tell to whether the follower of them both belongs. But when these two fall out; when persecution separates them, then farewell piety, the worldling will after prosperity. The good man scorns such baseness: though Nebuchadnezzar's Image be made of gold; though it be attended with Instruments of music, a consort of wealth, honor, pleasure and prosperity, which bewitch the soul; all this cannot move the servants of God. They have vowed in an heroic disposition with Abraham, that the king of Sodom shall not make them rich; no crooked or indirect means shall bring them in profit: they will not be beholding to the king of hell for a shoe-tie. Stilicus the tyrant was slain by the soldiers for his avarice; and when they had fastened his head and right hand to the point of a spear, they caused a crier to proclaim in the Army, D•te eleemosynam homini insatiabilis avaritiae, Give this poor man a penny.

4. Love not the world; Nolite diligere, saith Saint John, not Nolite habere. Wealth may be a palace of pleasure for our offspring, a fortress of defense for our posterity: and it may be a tower for the records of vengeance, a library for that flying book, which is threatened to destroy men and houses. I should think myself blest in this days errand, if every man would vouchsafe by the trial of his heart, to try the foundations of his house, whether they totter upon sand near unto destruction; or rest upon the Rock, able to withstand the tempest of God's indignation. The danger of my profession, a burden under which the shoulders of Angels may justly shrink, calls upon me to call upon you for this examination; whether the world hath overcome you, or you can say with Christ, I have overcome the world.

5. He that directs an awful eye toward his last account, will by many degrees be more careful of the manner, than of the matter of his gains; how he gets, than what it is he gets. The matter of his unjust profit he shall leave behind, perhaps to those that will never thank him for it; an instrument of their sin, and an occasion of their ruin. But the unlawful manner will either bring a judgment home to his doors here, or at least follow him to judgment hereafter. Most men are too forward admirers of them that swell with riches, and swim in pleasures; as if they were the only darlings of heaven: who are the happy men but they? But as Paul saith of his shipwreck, We should not have gained this loss: so we lose by our gains, when those gains come from wickedness, wherein a good conscience suffers shipwreck.

6. Yea worse: for a temporal loss a man grieves but once: but for his unlawful gains he must grieve forever. It seemed to be a less matter for which that worldling forfeited his soul. Therefore as you tender your barns and dearest dwelling places; as you would not have the stones and timber destroyed: alas, what hath timber and stones deserved? yet because the vulture hath carried all to her nest, nest and all must be set on fire? As you tender the fruit of your loins, and would not consult shame to your own house, nor wrap up your posterity in the same destruction with yourselves; be not entangled, be not overcome with this world. We abhor the beast that kills her young ones with too much indulgence: let not us then destroy a child in the gain of a child's portion, as if a man should sell his horse to buy him provender.

7. Alas, they know not the price of a soul, that chaffer it away in the market of this world; they bear that rich treasure in their bodies, as a toad doth a precious stone in his head, and knows it not. O then lay not up your hearts there, where riches abound and multiply: lay not up riches there, where thieves break through and steal: lay not up thieves there, where vengeance may break in and consume: lay not up vengeance there, where is no hope of redemption forever.

8. There be other riches, if our hearts could light on them: as Augustine distinguisheth of Pauper in animo, and Pauper in sacco; poor in mind and in purse. So may we of the rich; there is a spiritual wealth as well as a secular: and so true and precious is the spiritual, that the secular wealth is but stark beggary to it. The Cabinet of it is the Soul, and the treasure in it God himself. O happy resolution of that blessed Father; Omnis mihi copia, quae Deus meus non est, egestas est: all my wealth, besides my God, is penury. Let them seek after the earth, that have no right to heaven: let them desire the present, which believe not the future. The Christians wealth is his Savior: can he complain the lack of anything, that hath the Author of all? The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want. He is rich in God, and may well sing that contented ditty, Fines ceciderunt mihi in praeclaris; The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places, I have a goodly heritage. God gave the water to fishes, the air to fowls, to beasts the earth, the heaven to Angels; but he gave Himself to man: Whom have I in heaven but thee? and I desire none on earth besides thee. Let us give ourselves to God, and God will give himself to us, and nothing shall be wanting to our blessedness.

The latter end is worse with them than the beginning. Where two states are compared, and one of them preferred, they both must be considered. We must see how bad the beginning is, before we can perceive the latter end to be worse than it.

The beginning is a state of sin, and that's bad enough: let us a little perpend the infelicities of it. Rectum est index sui & obliqui: the warpes and crookedness of a table are discerned by the Rule: sin is caecitas rectitudinis, and must be brought to the rule for demonstration. Good is honest, profitable, pleasant. Some things are honest, not profitable, nor pleasant: as to be simple as a Dove, and not wise as a Serpent, is honest; but there is both loss and displeasure in it. Some things are profitable, not honest, nor pleasant; as the gains of unrighteousness; which both make a dishonest soul and a melancholy conscience. Other things are pleasant, not profitable, nor honest: as wanton and luxurious mirth; which neither becomes the person, nor is commodious to the estate. A bitter medicinal potion though it be not pleasant, puts on the name of goodness, because it benefits the health. Good is all these, and sin is contrary to all these; which discovers the unhappy condition of it.

1. It is vile and dishonorable, therefore quirit angulos & latebras: it is so conscious of the own deformity, that it is loath to be seen; as the woman that hath a blemish on her face, would still be hiding it. Adam was ashamed as soon as he had sinned; when there was yet none to look upon him, but only she that was in the same predicament. How did David seek to palliate his sin: first with a tawny cloke; the husband must shelter his dishonesty with the wife: when that would not serve, then with a scarlet cloke; through the blood of the husband making way to the bed of his wife. Why did he put himself to these shifts? was he not a King? who durst accuse him? who durst whisper against him? O but the sin of greatness is the greatness of sin, and hath evermore a proportionable shame.

2. Sin is grievous and irksome, an evil thing and bitter: like some wine that pleaseth the palate, but hath a harsh farewell. That which tasted pleasant to concupiscence, lies bitter on the stomach of conscience. For this monitor is left behind when all the rest miscarry. As the devil spared one of Job's servants on purpose to affright him with the news, and torment him with the relation; Ego solus aufugi: so conscience is reserved to afflict the heart of a sinner, when the other faculties are suspended from executing their functions; I alone am escaped to tell thee. There is also in it a guilty fear; Peccatum carnifex peccatoris: as a malefactor changeth countenance before the Judge. Fugit impius, & nemo persequitur. The Seminary suspects every traveler for a Pursuivant; the thief, every man for an officer. Add to all this the servilitie of a sinner, that dares not displease his slave. For quem admisit famulum, invenit tyrannum; those rude and barbarous retainers whom he hath fed with indulgence, are ready to cut his throat. Poison hath been put in a cup of gold; yet you may wash it so clean, that you shall drink out of it without danger. But sin so infects the vessel, body and soul, that nothing but the blood of Christ can cleanse it. The Viper, the Basilisk, or whatsoever serpent, is not killed with the own proper venom: but sin destroys the subject wherein it is bred. This is bad enough, but not the worst of it.

3. Besides all this, it is deadly and damnable. It repells God himself; non ut fortior debilem, vel excellentior minorem; sed ut foeditas domus habitatorem: it does not bid him go, but so offends him that he will not stay. When the wife that hath a noble and kind husband, shall admit a base misshapen groome to her bed, and give him those conjugal rights which she owes to the other; yea doth her endeavor to make her Lord wait upon his slave: this cannot command his separation, but gives just cause of a divorce. If a man sojournes with his tenant, and finds by his willful neglect of him; the unwholesomenesse of his diet, unhandsomenesse of his lodging, and sluttish carelessness of all service to him, that he would be glad to be rid of him; it is time to be gone. Jacob left Laban when he saw his countenance change upon him. How grievous is it upon such terms to lose our makers society? Every sinful hand is ready to wrong the widow, because she wants a friend to defend and plead her cause: her husband is gone. All our malicious enemies let drive at us with deadly violence, when God (our Husband and head) hath forsaken us: They presently conclude, God hath forsaken him, persecute him and take him, for there is none to deliver him. The hairs of a man's face or head do grace him; for etiam hac excrementa, ornamenta: but when they are clip'd off, they are trodden under feet. He that is joined to God, is so long honored; but when a separation is made, there is nothing more contemptible than that man.

Now lay all this together, and we shall find the former condition woeful enough: can there be a worse? Yes, there is a worse. If I had not spoken to them, saith our Savior, they had had no sin. That is, No sin respectively, or in comparison of that sin whereof they are now guilty. God made us able to continue holy and happy, but we soon forfeited all: he did put us in a fair way by nature; but we went out of it, at the Towns end. Again, he calls us in Christ; (for we were another's, and are God's but at the second hand) if after this we fall away, our latter end is worse than our beginning. Worse in divers respects.

1. Their sins are worse now than they were at first, therefore their estates must needs be so. As nothing can make a man bad, but sin: so nothing can make him worse, but the greater measure of sin. When is a reprobate at the best? only when he is borne: then as his sins be fewest, so his Judgment were easiest. They proceed from evil to evil, saith the Prophet: yea, they wax worse and worse, saith the Apostle: as a River is small and fordable at the head, but greatens as it runs on, by the accession of new waters. It had been best for them not to have been at all: or if they must have a being, to be abortive: or if they must be borne, not to live to know that they are borne: but to bate of those months in the world, which they had in the womb: or if they must live, never to die: for death, that ends others miseries, begins theirs. Augustus and Severus did much mischief in their beginnings of reign, much good towards their ends: therefore it was said of them; That it was pity, quod eis vel nasci, vel mori contigerit: And it had been good for the Commonwealth, that either they had never been borne, or never died. So it had been lesse unhappy for these Apostates, if either they had had no beginning, or no end, whose end is worse than their beginning. Nor be their sins only worse, because of their number, as two evils are worse than one: but worse for the nature; more malicious, and full of venom, than the other were. An old Serpent casts forth the more deadly poison; an old Dog bites sore, and rankles the flesh; an old Fox hath the more odious stink; a bloodied robber is more merciless; a long festered Ulcer is almost uncapable of cure; an inveterate sinner commits the more execrable villainy.

Paritie of sins is an idle dream, fit for those old Stoics and Iovinian heretics. It were superfluous to say, That God will reward sinners according to their works, if all their works were equal: as if Judas had not done a fouler act than Pilate. There be twofold worse; as the Pharisee made his Proselyte twofold more the child of Hell than himself. There be three-fold, four-fold worse; For three transgressions, and for four. There be seven-fold worse: such was Mary Magdalene, before the seven devils came out of her: and such was that other sinner when these seven fresh devils entered into him. There be ten-fold worse They have provoked me ten times: every provocation made them worse than they were, because it was a worse sin than the former. Yea, reprobates aged in sin, die a thousand-fold worse than they were borne. Saint Jude speaks of some that are Twice dead: and we say of the cheating Bankrupt, that dies without repentance, or any conscience of satisfaction, that he is five times dead. First, dead in honesty and conscience; that was long before putrefied flesh. Secondly, dead in estate; which is either drowned in riot, or smothered in coozenage. Thirdly, dead in credit; his name stinks worse than a new-opened Grave. Fourthly, dead in body, the common debt of nature. Fifthly, and lastly, dead in soul, and that forever; the worst death of all. Thus their state, like their sin, is worse in the end than the beginning.

2. Besides all their other sins, they have the sin of unthankfulness to answer for. While they were bond-men, God contented himself with such works from them, as became bond-men: if they neglected their service, it was but according to the nature of slaves, who will do nothing without blows. But when they are emancipated, and by God's grace taken into the number of his free servants, from the bondage of Satan; now their rebellion becomes treason. Before, their opposition to God was but hostility, now it is treachery. And their and is accordingly, worse; because the Lord fights against them, not as against enemies, but against rebels. One enemy may find mercy of another, but destruction is the due meed of a traitor. A man is poor, and cannot subsist: a rich friend lends him money to stock himself, and drive a Trade: he mis-spends this Portion in riot: so loseth both his fortune, and his friend; and becomes of a poor beginner, a wretched beggar. We had nothing to set up withal, were not worth the ground we trod on; our whole estate being forfeited in Adam: God, who is rich in mercy, took pity on us, forgave that infinite debt we ought him, souldered up our broken subsistence, trusted us with a new Talent of grace, trying whether we would thrive better with that. And when we could put him in no Security for it, he took Bond of his own Son for us; who sealed the Covenant with his own precious blood. If after all this favor, we shall either bury our Talent in the dark earth of supine carelessness, or wast it in overchargeable licentiousness; we worthily again become Bankerouts, and lose all hope of reparation. Then will our Almighty Creditor begin to call in our Debts, both Principal and Interest, together with the former Arrerages: and when it is found, that we have neither wherewith to pay, nor whereof to live; what will follow but miserable imprisonment, till we have paid the uttermost farthing, that have not one farthing towards it?

Here is indeed a latter end worse than the beginning: for then we had some credit, now God will trust us no farther. To him that hath, shall be given: but from him that hath not, shall be taken away, even that he hath. Then we had a Surety, now we have nobody to undertake for us: There remains no more sacrifice for their sins. Before there was possibility of recovering ourselves, by repentance; now we cannot be renewed by repentance. Now come those old sins to be required, which before we thought pardoned; and that God had as fully buried them in remission, as we had in oblivion. But remember that unmercifulservant, who had his pardon cancel'd, because he would not forgive his fellow. This new sin calls all the rest to remembrance, and the Book is found uncrossed: so he that yesterday thought his estate good, sufficient to pay every man his own, and to live on besides; is today worse than naught. So severely doth God plague ingratitude; yea, in effect he plagues men for nothing else. He doth not condemn Christians for sin, but for the habit and obduratenesse in sin: not for impurity, but for impenitence: not so much because they have sinned, but because they have not repented. I gave her space to repent, and she repented not This is the Indictment that shall Cast her at the great Assizes. A man may be pardoned, that wants innocence; but he can never be pardoned, that wants penitence. Not the weakness of faith, (for Christ will not quench the smoking Flaxe; but the want of faith, excludes from Heaven. The world shall be convinced of sin, because they believe not on me; saith our Redeemer. The soul is not without sin, that believes on Christ; but the soul shall not perish for sin, that believes on Christ. Not because they have done opera tenebrarum, some works of darkness, are they condemned; sed quia dilexerunt tenebras, and potius quam lucem: but because they have loved darkness more than the light; this is the condemnation. The Tenants are put out of the Vineyard, not so much for non-payment of their Rent, as for abusing their Landlords servants, and killing his Son; for their unthankfulness they are displaced. It is not one breach of charity that sends men to Hell; but it is uncharitableness, that is turned away with that malediction, Go ye cursed. The wise Judge at once pardons him that hath done a great Robbery, and condemns another for cutting a Purse of small value; and both with equity. The former is spared, because it was his first offense, and there is hope of amendment: the other hath made it his Trade and desperate disease; not to be cured, but by the Halter. Seeing therefore that the mercy of God doth not condemn us for our faults, but for our impenitence in those faults: not for contracting spots, but because being spotted, we will not make ourselves clean: not for casual wanderings, but willful declining the way: not for sometimes leaving off our innocence, but for never wearing it, yea wearing nocence instead of it: therefore let us say with that good old Hermit, Though I cannot hinder birds from flying over my head, yet I will keep them from making their nests in my hair: though we cannot avoid all sins, we will be truly sorrowful for the sins we have not avoided, and hereafter strive against the sins for which we have sorrowed.

An ungracious soul may be burdened with many sins; but she never makes up her full load, till she hath added the sin of unthankfulness. He leaves out no evil in a man, Qui ingratum dixerit, that calls him unthankful. Ingratitude totius orbis compagem solvit, dissolves the joints of the whole world. A barren ground is less blamed, because it hath not been dressed. But till it with the plough, trust it with seed; let the clouds bless it with their rain, the Sun with his heat, the heavens with their influence: and then if it be infertile, the condition is worse: before it was contemned, now it is cursed. Take an offending servant, chide him, chastise him: then second this with encouragements to goodness, the promise of favor, honor, reward: if after all this he mend not, turn him out of doors, let his end be worse than his beginning. No wonder, if God that is not praised for so much, hold his hand from giving more: if when his good is requited with evil, he proportion his reward to that evil. The dunghill will stink worse after it is heated with the beams of the Sun: the wicked are the worse for all God's favors: and the worse they grow toward the end, the worse it shall be for them in the end.

3 Because custom in sin hath deaded all remorse for sin. Man first goes into sin, as a young swimmer into the water; not plunging himself over head and cares at the first dash; but by degrees: till he come in profundum, and then contemnit. Samson is bound with green withs, they will not hold him: with new ropes, they will not hold him: with the woof of his own hairs, none of these can hold him. But he was fettered with the invisible chains of an harlots love; and these hold him. She cuts off his locks, deprives him of God, enervates his strength, pluckes out his eyes, makes him a scorn to boys, casts him into prison, and damnes him to a perpetual mill. Thus doth sin (insensibly) weaken grace, darken knowledge, dishonor abilities, cast into the dungeon of hell, and bind to the mill of everlasting pains. When a man comes first to dwell by a Pewterer or hammer-Smith, the beating mallet upon the brawling metal so disquiets him, that he can neither take his rest by night, nor enjoy his thoughts by day. After a while he is so used to it, that he finds no trouble in it; but can snort supinely in the midst of those thundering peals: yea even th•t harsh music of Tubal-cain rocks him asleep. As we say when his master knocks loudest, the Smiths Dog sleeps soundest. This pejorates his last condition: before he committed foul acts but sometimes; and had his lucida intervalla, sober thoughts and modest recollections. That hammerer within him, who is always known by her tongue, Conscience, was like the Prophet to David, or the Cock to Peter; disturbing his unjust peace. But now either she speaks not, or she speaks and he hears not, or he hears and cares not. So his end is worse, God giving him over, as the Physician does a desperate patient. Before his wounds were green and smarted: now they are all dead flesh; insensible therefore incurable.

4. Because their hypocrisy prevents all ways of remedy. For known diseases there be known medicines: he that tells his grief, is not always cured; but he can never be cured that tells it not. When Winter comes, the Viper vomites out her poison, and hides it in the earth: but in the Spring, there is bred in her a new and more pernicious venom than the former. In some foul weather or sharp storm of affliction, hypocrites seem to lay aside their rancor: but the Summer of prosperity breeds a worse in them. Now God abhors all sin as we do venom; and where he finds it worse than it seems, he leaves it worse than it is. They are like men that walking the streets of a city in the night, and hearing the Bell that warns all to lay by their weapons; leave their swords with some friend for a time, as if they (of all men) meant no harm: but they know when to fetch them again. They can make a shift to fast, and pray, and weep for the season, or at least dissemble these, that they may assume the more unsuspected liberty to their sins. As you have seen a company of children dividing themselves (as it were) into two armies, whereof one is held the others enemy: they make a show of fighting, and running, and wrestling, and contending for the victory: but when the play is done, they go home hand in hand, and laugh at their bickerments. Or as Advocates, that wrangle bitterly in the Courts, and embrace one another friendly in their chambers; all their quarrel was but to get their Clients purses. So these hypocrites loudly contest against those sins, which they secretly embrace with all their hearts. Their beginning was only sin, which is a single iniquity: their end is hypocrisy, which is a double iniquity. Simulata sanctitas, duplex iniquitas. Therefore their latter end is worse.

5. Because they willfully destroy themselves, by forsaking and renouncing all gracious remedies. They are so much the worse, as they might have been better. Relapses are held by Physicians to be our own faults; imputed to ourselves, as occasioned by some disorder in us: and so we are not only passive, but active in our own ruin. For their bad beginning they may thank their parents; for their worse ending they must blame themselves. They were borne sinners, they have made themselves rebels. They do not only stand under a falling house, but pull it down on their own heads. They are not only executed, that implies guiltiness: but executioners, and that implies dishonor: and executioners of themselves, and that implies impiety. To be borne in sin, is bad; but there were some noble faculties of the soul left: to deface these, is worse; yet Christ is offered to recover all; to reject him, this is worst of all. In their first estate there was some comfort derived from the universality; All men are sinners: and it is some degree of comfort to be but in the state common to all. But by this recidivation they fall from that comfort into self-condemning despair; charging themselves with unprovident carelessness, and unthankful wickedness, in destroying that with their own hands, which the hand of God offered to preserve. Many a one loseth his life, but these cast it away: and who can help him that will needs perish?

Thou art made whole: sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee. There is then a worse thing behind; and yet the former evil was sore enough, even a sickness of thirty eight years long. Ne pecces ulterius, ne sentias deterius. But what is a diseased body to a damned soul? What is the lying in rags, to being wrapped in torments? There was a Poole or Bath of healing; some hope of recovery; with an Angel to move the water. But in hell there is no Angel, no Poole, not a drop of water: nec ingressus medici, nec spes remedii. Therefore Serva praescriptum, ne ruas in postscriptum: if thou sin again, there is a worse evil to come. Languor prolixus gravat medicum: a tedious sickness tires the physician; especially when the patient will not observe his prescribed diet. It hath been said, that in sickness there be three things material: the Physician, the Patient, the Disease. When any two of these join, they have the victory; the third cannot prevail. If the physician and the disease join, down then goes the patient: if the cure be mistaken, the very medicine advanceth the malady. If the patient and the disease join, then down goes the physician; for he is discredited, though he could not help it. But if the physician and the patient join, then down goes the disease; for the sick person recovers. Sin is the souls sickness, whereof every man is a Patient and God the Physician. Now if the Physician for the Patients frowardness, join with the disease; justly punishing sin with sin; the soul is lost. If the patient join with the disease; if the sinner make much of his sin, and will by no means forgo it; here the Physician is dishonored so far as in man lies: not because God is not skillful, but the patient is willful: non deficit medicus, sed fastidit aegrotus. Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean: he can, but the other will not. But if the Physician and the patient join; if Christ preaches, and Mary Magdalene repents: if Christ promises, and the sinner believes: here out goes the disease though it were as strong as seven devils; and the Patient is restored. Some thing lies in the Patient: if we take our sins part against Christ, we perish: but if we take Christ's part against our sins, we shall be saved.

6. Because a relapse is ever more dangerous than the first sickness: more soon incur'd, more hardly cured.

1. Sooner incurred, and that for divers reasons: First, As when the body is recovered of a disease, there still remain some embers, and coals, and fuel of that disease: the branches are cut down by proper physic, the root and occasion is left behind. So ruinous a farm did man take, when he took himself; all the ground being overspread with weeds: every turfe, every stone, every muscle of the flesh, and bone of the body, hath some infirmity belonging to it: not a tooth in the head is privileged: so that the house is still ready to fall down. Yet the soul is in worse case; not a faculty, not an affection without distemper. To undertake the cure of it, man being the Physician, were but to perfume dung; to draine, not a marish where earth is mingled with water, but a mote where all is water: where sin hath not invaded a part, but possessed the whole substance: yea even to raise the dead, for we are naturally dead in sins. To cure the accidents, even actual sins is a great work; yet civil education and goodness of disposition may do something to that. To cure the strength of sin is greater, yet the grace of Christ doth that. But to cure the root of sin, is the greatest work, reserved only for that great physician; and he doth it by a strange medicine, even by death. By death he gives this perfect life; so that the body of death is only helped by the death of the body. Till then, the action of sin may be restrained, and the Body of it mortified, but the root remains. We are laid as it were upon a pile of faggots, and ourselves (if there were no other) are the bellows. Ignorance blows this coal: for even for sins of ignorance was a sacrifice required, therefore a sin imputed. Knowledge much more blows this fire. They know the Judgment of God awarding death to such things, yet they do them. Nature blows this coal; that disposeth us to sin: and the Law blows it. Sin took occasion by the commandment; as if we did some things because they are forbidden. Original sin is another bellows, whereby that first imprinted seed infuseth a spring of sin into us: and we have done worse than our fathers. Temptation is another bellows; that continually blows this spark: and as though we yet wanted wind, we tempt ourselves, and blow it with our own lusts. Not yet satisfied, as if we were not cunning and able enough to undermine and demolish ourselves, we suffer others to be our bellows, and even sin for their sakes. So Adam sinned for Eves sake, and Solomon to gratify his wives; which was an uxorious sin. The Judges sinned for Jezebels sake, and Joab to please David in the loss of Uriah, which was a slavish and bloody sin. Pilate sinned to humor the people, and Herod to give further contentment to the Jews; which was a popular sin. So easy it is to sin upon sin, to sin upon the recovery of a sin.

When a man is a little restored from a grievous fit, he thinks the danger past; that he is able to eat and walk; and therefore will be going abroad into the air, while his weakness is to penetrable; and chooseth repast not easily digestible: hereupon he relapseth. Thus the soul rising from a sin, presumes too much of the own strength; and does not feed upon those delicate cordials whereby the heart may be fortified: but falls to gross meats, unexamined actions; dangerous courses. The Israelites were so flesh'd with two or three victories, that they let fly upon Ai; as confident of the victory, and contemning the enemy; but they were beaten for their labor. It was a good preparation of mind; Si modo victus eras, ad crastina bella parato. Si modo victor eras, ad crastina bellum paveto. The counsel is good; De propitiato peccato noli esse sine metu: After propitiation, yet be not without fear of sin.

If the recovered patient, besides the choice of his diet, do not also addict himself to moderate exercise, a worse disease may breed on him; as the Jaundise follow an Ague, and the Gout becomes the effect of a Surfet. So speeds the soul, that doth not exercise it self in good works and religious duties. So the unclean spirit returning found his house. Scopis mundatam, sed fide & operibus vacuum; swept indeed, but empty of faith and good works. Alas, what is sweeping only? The besom cannot get up the dirt that is baked on the floor; it cannot reach the cobwebs in the roof: here is work for the paring shovell; Repentance must cleanse the bottom, humility must rectify the foundation: and prayer, that is of an ascending quality, must purge the roof, the higher faculties of the soul. And when all this is done, if the rooms be left empty of positive goodness; there is entertainment for seven worse spirits. Thus is a Relapse sooner procured.

2. It is more hardly cured. Among the many weights that aggravate a relapse, this is one; that it proceeds with a more violent dispatch, and gives an irremediable wound, because it meets with no defense nor prevention. When a disease first invades a strong constitution, it finds something to wrestle withal; and as it weakens the body, so the body weakens it: both their forces spend together, one upon another: and here is a battle fought hand to hand, upon some terms of equality. Suppose the body gets the victory, and the disease yields and departs; yet being as it were left breathless, if a new adversary, a new sickness sets upon it; here is great odds: for the one is fresh, the other quite out of heart. Before it could endure the opening of a vein, the correction of proud humors, and expulsion of superfluous matter. Now it is so weak, that it lies at the diseases mercy, and hath changed all resistance into patience. In the former estate, the soul did grapple with sin: and if it were foiled, yet not without reluctance: sometimes it got the better, never willingly the worse. It could then bear the correction of pride by discipline: the evacuation of tough humors, stubborn affections: all which might bring it low, but not take away the life of it; yea indeed rather quicken life in it. But being thus far hopefully restored, if it again willfully admit a habit of sin; this will so enervate all the strength and virtue, that it resists no more, but yields patiently to so pleasing a captivity. The enemy comes upon it, and is not withstood; as upon a Country that was weakened and depopulated before. Now it quite disarms the soul of all weapons, and munition, and possibility of resistance. As Iphicrates the Athenian, when he treated with the Lacedemonians for peace, stood so hard upon security of performing the articles agreed, that he refused any but this: that the Lacedemonians should yield up to them all those things whereby it might be manifest, not that they would not hurt them though they could, but that they could not hurt them though they would. Thus the Relapse is more dangerous, Non solum propter orb• potentiam, sed propter subiecti impotentiam; because sin is stronger, and man is weaker.

Lastly, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning; ex parte Ecclesia, ex parte sua, ex parte Dei, ex parte Diaboli.

1. In respect of the Church. While they carried a face of respect to the Church, they were wrapped up in the general prayers of the Church; and seemed to be of that number, for whom, as the friends of God, there was a continual remembrance in good men's intercessions. There is a sin unto death: I do not say that thou shalt pray for it. Samuel will pray for Saul, till he perceive that he hath given over the Lord, and the Lord him. How long wilt thou mourn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him? If Samuel mourn, because Saul hath cast away God by his sin; yet Samuel must cease mourning, because God hath cast away Saul by his just punishment. To be deprived of the benefit of good men's prayers, is a heavy loss. Such a one is singled out for one of God's enemies, and his judgment hastened, by the entreaty of God's servants. So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord: this is the prayer for him. They that despise the chaste love of their Savior's Spouse, and are bewitched with the painted, but ill-favored Strumpet of Rome, are no longer reputed friends, but adversaries, and Apostates. The Church may lament for them, not because she fears she shall miss them, but for that she knows they shall want her. They have her compassion, they have lost her benediction. And if any sparks of goodness lie covered under their cold ashes, it shall but show them a glimmering, of how happy they might have been, how wretched they are. But as those that are suddenly come from a bright Candle into a dark Roome, are so much the more blind as their Light was clearer; or as the purest Ivorie turns with fire into the deepest black: so at once their eyes are taken away, with their hearts; and those souls that seemed white, as rinsed in the blood of the Lamb, become as black as Hell, or the black Prince that rules it. Before they sate in the congregation of Saints; now neither Sermons, Sacraments, nor prayers shall do them more good, than a meal of meat put into a dead man's mouth.

2. In respect of themselves. They were at first stated in sin, then put into a fair way of deliverance: if after this, they go back to their first durance, Seipsos pessunderunt. This is done three ways: First, they have steeled their forheads. When a man for his first Theft is cast into prison, he becomes disconsolate and melancholy; he looks upon his friends with shame, upon his accusers with fear, upon the Judge with awe and trembling; but through frequent imprisoning, pudorem carceris deponit, he blusheth not for his foul facts, nor is sensible of his bondage; but drinks, riots, blasphemes, as if his Jail were a Tavern; and that without thought of calling, or being called to the Barre for a reckoning. Thou hast a Whores forhead, refusing to be ashamed; Renuisti pudore suffundi. Secondly, they have putrefied their hearts, that ordinary stripes will not reach to the quick. Why should ye be stricken anymore? ye will revolt more and more. Their long tugging at Satan's Oares, and wearing his shackles, hath so brawned their flesh, that they are not sensible of the servitude. A stubborn heart shall fare evil at last; and he that loveth danger, shall perish therein: not he that runs into danger, that's every man's case; but if men love dangers, it is fit they should perish. A garment may be so old and near worn, that being rent, it cannot again be sowed together; it is not capable of the needle and thread. No compunction can enter into such a heart, nor make way for the thread of comfort, to heal the breaches. They have need to beg for, not with David, Cor mundum, but Cor novum, a new heart; for the old one is quite past mending. We did cast three men bound into the fire, said that Tyrant; and loe, I see four men loose, walking without hurt, and the form of the fourth is like the Son of God. Other sinners have but three enemies to deal withal, the Devil, the world, and the flesh; but these have a fourth foe, idque infestissimum, a hard heart: and the form of the fourth is like the Son of perdition. Thirdly, they have stupefied their conscience, disgraced it as a Scold, and condemned it for a common Barretor. Before they carried their Clock about with them; now they have left it off, that they might not know how their time passeth. But at last God shall set it a going, and to their horror on their death-bed, they shall hear it strike their last hour, with a dismal sound and heavy knell: When Satan, that long held them in the pleasant Gallerie of hope, shall take them aside, and show them the dark dungeon of despair. If their old fester'd Vlcers come but to a new incision, they shall confess their end worse than their beginning.

3. In respect of God: who will no longer acknowledge them for his people, that have rejected him for their God. I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people, and by a foolish Nation I will anger you. The Jews counted the Gentiles Dogs; such as would be glad of their crumbs: now, for the others Apostasy, the Gentiles are come to their full Tables, and the Jews are turned out of doors. As a Mother sometimes, for a fault done by her little one, thrusts it from her, and saith it shall be her child no longer; withal taking up a strangers child into her bosom. This she does not seriously; but God did so indeed, rejecting the Jews, and embracing the Gentiles. Or as a man divorceth his Wife for adultery, and before her face marries her handmaid, clothing her with the rich robes and jewels of his forsaken Spouse; saying to her, You have chosen another Lover, I will choose me another Wife. So the Lord to Israel: You have taken another god, even your Idols; I, another people, even the Gentiles. You have angered me, by giving my honor to Idols: I will anger you, by giving your prerogatives to strangers.

The bondage of this Land was lamentable, under the tyranny of Antichrist; when we were driven to eat the Bread of Superstition, and to drink the Wine of Fornication, or fast. God hath delivered and confirmed us under the hands of three gracious Princes; if we shall now apostate and revolt from the integrity of his service, our latter end will be worse than our beginning. Instead of Popery, we shall find Turkism, yea Atheism, and infidelity; till we can only say, Here was the Church of God. Why should we wonder, that God forgets Shiloh, when Shiloh hath forgotten God? Indeed, hic locus est lacrymis: to see the Turk casting our, not only Christians, but Christ; and placing his Mahomet in the room: proudly blaspheming, That his Law is above either Moses, or Christ's; as being after them both, and none (say they) to come after it. Not unlike the Jesuits, who interpret the Puneisme of their Society to be an honor above the Anciencie of all other Orders. To see the prevailing Papists not only casting out the true professors of the Gospel, but even the Gospel it self; and setting up their Idol, the Mass, in God's Temple! Remember old Eli sitting by the way side, and seeing a messenger coming with his clothes rent, ashes on his head, all his face blubbered with tears; so that he might read the heavy news in his countenance: yet he had strength to ask him, What is there done, my son? He answers; Israel is fled before the Philistines: that troubled him; yet he sate still: what more? There hath been a great slaughter among the people: that came nearer him; yet he sate still: what more? Thy two sons, Hophni and Phinehas are slain: that made a deep gash in the heart of (so kind) a father; yet he sate still: what more? Can there be any worse than this? Yes, saith the messenger, the worst of all is behind; The Ark of God is taken: that word struck him dead. He that had power to hear all the rest; Israel turning their backs before their enemies, the people massacred, his own sons slain: yet no sooner heard this, but his strength forsook him, he expires with a groan, he fell down and died. The report comes to his daughter in law, being great with child, and near her travail: she hears the news of so many deaths; of the people, of her brother in law, of her father in law, of her own husband, with the surprisall of the Ark of God: these griefs were above the griefs of child-birth; she presently falls in labor, and yields out a son. The women about her, cheare her with this comfort; Fear not, thou hast borne a son: which digests the sorrows of the former pains. But she answered not, nor regarded it, but cried out; The glory is departed from Israel, because the Ark of God is taken, and because of her father in law and her husband. And lest the standers by should think, that her grief for all these losses was alike; she as it were corrected herself, and insisted only in lamenting the loss of the Ark, and died with that in her mouth: these were her last words, The glory is departed from Israel, for the Ark of God is taken: and so she died. In the cause of Christ we have lost much people; perhaps some of us our fathers, some our brothers, some our sons, other their husbands and friends; many worthy soldiers, whose funeralls we bedew with our just tears. But if the Ark of God should be taken, our Candlestick removed, the Gospel darkened, we have too woeful cause of weeping out our very eyes, and crying, Our latter end is worse than our first.

4. In respect of the Devil, who losing a soul which he deemed his own, rageth, and walks through dry places, seeking rest but findeth none. Non quia nusquam alibi consistere potest, sed quia nusquam alibi consistere cupit. But when he recovers it, tanquam pradam e manibus, vel bonum e faucibus ereptum, he hampers it with greater cruelty. A prisoner for his fair and noble carriage, and round payment, hath the favor to be allowed the liberty of the prison; to have those chains and fetters forborne him, wherewith other malefactors are bound. But through their negligence or indulgence, he breaks prison: now let him look well to himself; if ever the Jailor catch him again, he will make him fast enough. Taken he is, and now what can he look for but cruel usage? Before he had no shackle, now he is bound with two chains for failing. Before he had the freedom of the prison, now he is cast into the dungeon. Before he might sleep in the night, and not be disturbed; now day and night he is watched. Before one lock was thought enough to hold him, now many doors, and locks and bars are shut upon him. Before he had but one keeper, now he hath seven worse to enthrall and vex him: so far is this last durance worse than the former. They that have escaped the servitude of Satan, by the revelation of the Gospel of Christ, and adhere to a new Master, their Maker; are safe under his almighty protection. But if they shall again revolt, and forgo the bounds of obedience, till they be re-apprehended by their old Jailor, how grievous is their misery? Now will he blind the eyes of their souls, stop their ears from hearing Sermons, feed them with nothing but temptations, harden their hearts, sear up their consciences, and at last hale their souls to everlasting torments. For where the sorrows of this world end, the pains of hell begin, and (which is most fearful) shall never end. O then the latter end with them is worse than the beginning.

If this be their end, that relapse from God to the world: then the contrary holds in them that are wholly recovered from the world to God; The latter end with them shall be better than the beginning. Better in regard of holiness; good ever, and best at last. The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. Better in regard of happiness, Mark the upright man, and behold the just, for the end of that man is peace. The wicked begin pleasantly, and go on without interruption; but the end pays for all. Rejoice in thy youth, follow thy delights; spare for no cost, want no jovialtie; but when the Host comes in with the reckoning, all is dash'd; For all these God will bring thee to Judgment. So Abner to Joab concerning that unkindly war; knowest thou not that it will be bitterness in the latter end? Yea, such a war had bitterness enough in the beginning. Lazarus began with pains, and the rich man went on with pleasures; but now the one is comforted, and the other tormented. Sin and punishment are like Hippocrates twins they are borne together, they go together, and they grow together: but they neither laugh together, nor cry together: for sin rejoiceth while misery weeps to see it, and misery will laugh at sin while it weeps to feel it. As Naomi said to her two young daughters; leave me, my daughters, leave me: whereupon Orpah kisses and parts, but Ruth clave to her. So the soul in distress, dismisseth her two children, Pleasure and Paine; let me alone, forsake me: Pleasure will be gone; yea, even leave her, without taking leave of her: but Paine sticks by her: for where sin is let in, punishment will not be kept out. Sin hath a fore-noones face, and an after-noones face. It looks lovely to ill-affected eyes, painted with glorious colors, decked with Roses and Lilies, all the day. But it changeth countenance in the evening; like a plaster'd Strumpet, that when she washeth off her Complexion, looks full of horror. To lie upon Beds of Ivorie, and to tumble upon soft Couches▪ to eat the Lambes out of the flock, and Calves out of the Stall, to sing and dance to the Viols, and drink Wine in Boules; this is the fore-noones countenance of sin. Cast the unprofitable servant into outer darkness, where is weeping and gnashing of teeth; that's the evening face.

But to the children of God there is first sorrow, then joy: ultimum, optimum. There is more kindness in the latter end, than at the beginning. The Christian begins in crying, and goes on in mourning, but this shall bring him peace at the last. They that sow in tears, shall reap in joy. The Israelites were first brought to the bitter waters of Marah, before they might taste the pleasant fountains, the milk and honey of Canaan. In vain do we expect the river of God's pleasures, before we have pledged Christ in the cup of bitterness. There must go a wind before us, blustering persecutions; and an earthquake, strong temptations: and a fire, even a fiery trial; before we hear that still voice of comfort. Joseph dealt roughly with his brethren at the first; he bound one, he sent for another, he troubled them all: but at last he breaks forth in compassion, I am Joseph, fear not, I am Joseph your brother. So Christ first lays his cross on our shoulders, to see how we will move under it with patience; he chastiseth us with scourges, to prove our obedience: and when we begin to think him angry with us, he appears to our souls in another face, in another voice; I am Jesus, fear not, I am Jesus your brother. When we have pledged him in his gall and vinegar, then he will drink to us in the new wine of his kingdom. He that is the Door and the Way; hath taught us that there is but one way, but one door, but one passage to heaven; and that a straight one: though with much pressure and tugging we get through, leaving our superfluous rags behind, as torn from us in the crowd, we are happy. He that made heaven, did on purpose make it thus; narrow and hard in the entrance; when we are entered, wide and glorious; that after our pain, our joy might be the sweeter. Through many tribulations we enter into heaven, but we shall enter, and into no worse a place than heaven. Not unlike the way by which Jonathan and his armor-bearer ascended to the garrison of the Philistines; between two rocks, Bozez and Seneh, Fol•e and Thorny: but when they were got up, they obtained victory. By what hard shifts soever we climb up to heaven, we have abundant recompense in the triumph and glory. After the roaring of waters, flashes of lightening, and noise of thunder, comes the delightful music of Harpies and songs.

The devil serves men, as Iael did Sisera: she speaks peaceably to him, Turn in my Lord, turn in: he asks her water, she gives him milk: she covers him with a mantle, keeps him close and warm; gets him asleep, and then she kills him. So Satan gives sinners the kisses and language of peace; Turn into me, I will secure you: Therefore his people turn in thither, and waters of a full cup are wrung out to them. He surpasseth their desires in kindness; They have more than heart could wish. He wraps them up in riches and sins together; that they know not whether they are more safe or secret: luls them asleep with mirth and prosperity: but when all is done, he cuts their throats▪ But Christ chooseth us, as the Israelite was to choose a captive woman:

first he sets her a mourning forty days, cuts her hairs and nails, prepares her with humiliation, then takes her home, and makes her his wife. Christ first taxeth us with severe repentance, exerciseth our patience, and shaves off our superfluous lusts; which though they were but the excretions of the soul, we held dear as the virall parts: but when this is done, he takes our souls home to his own kingdom, and marries us to himself in eternal blessedness. At the marriage in Cana of Galilee, he turned their water into wine: much more at his own royal wedding will he turn all the water of our tears, into the wine of endless comforts. The weeping soul shall never go to the place of weeping: but what then shall become of the laughing? There is provided for them a dismal place of weeping, howling, and gnashing of teeth. Weep here, and weep never: mourn not here, and mourn forever. Thus while the Beginning of the ungodly doth seem a Paradise, and their End is Hell: our Beginning might be a kind of Purgatory, but our latter end is Heaven.

2 PET. 2.21.

For it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than after they have known it, to turn from the holy Commandment delivered unto them.

BACKsliding hath ever been a sin most odious to God: yea it is a pack or bundle of sins truss'd up together; all derogatory to his honor, and contrary to his Nature. For there is in it, first, Hypocrisy; which is adverse to Him, as he is the God of Truth. Secondly, Inconstancy; which is opposite to him whose Motto is, Ego Jehovah non muter; in whom is no variableness or shadow of turning. Thirdly, Infidelity; which is held the highest disparagement to his goodness. Disobedience breaks his word, Infidelity will not take his word. Fourthly, Ingratitude; to which all sins give way, and make room for in the highest place of damnation. Fifthly, Impenitency; which seals up the impossibility of forgiveness. Facilius inveni qui innocentiam servarent, quàm qui congrue poenitentiam agerent. It is better sleeping in a whole skin, than hazarding wounds to try the virtue of an approved medicine. All hurts are not recovered: but where no hurt is done, there needs no remedy. Well therefore may our Apostle further aggravate this impiety; It had been better for them if they had not known, &c.

GOD did easily pass over many sins in his Israel; yet he vehemently insists in those, into which they so often relapsed. Such were their murmurings against him in his Ministers and Instruments: their turning upon other gods, and embracing the idolatry of their neighbors. Murmuring is a slippery way to an irrecoverable bottom: and he comes near to God himself, that murmurs against him that comes from God. The Magistrate is the garment, in which God apparels himself: and he that shoots at the clothes, cannot say, he meant no ill to the man. Idolatry is the next slip to this fearful precipice and downfall. Their murmuring against God's Ministers did too often end in a departing from God himself: when they would have other Officers, they would have other gods: and still to-days murmuring, was to-morrows Idolatry. Their murmuring induced their Idolatry, and they often relapsed into them both. Not so much their murmuring and their Idolatry, as their relapsing into those sins, did seem to affect the Lord. They turned back and tempted God; and limited the holy One of Israel. That was their sin: but before he chargeth them with the sin it self, in the same place he chargeth them with reiterating, with redoubling of the sin: How often did they provoke him in the wilderness? How often? This was that sin which so exasperates the Lord against them. Their driving out of God whom they promised to serve, did cause him to bring in the nations whom he promised to drive out. They have seen my wondrous, and yet provoked me these ten times; therefore they shall not see the Land which I swore unto their fathers. Though God had sworn it, he will rather break his Oath, than leave them unpunished. Why? because they had so often grieved him; ten times. No tongue but God's own can express his indignation against a relapsing people. Every general disobedience in a Nation is deadly: but when the disease is complicated with a relapse, after knowledge and profession of a former recovery, it is desperate. Nor is God's anger only incensed, where the evidence is pregnant, and without exception; but where there is but a rumor, a suspicion of such a relapse to Idolatry. Hereupon that message was sent by Israel to the Reubenites: Is the iniquity of Peor too little for us, from which we are not cleansed to this day? Wherein they object to them, not so much their present declination to Idolatry, as their relapse into a sin formerly committed, and punished with the slaughter of four and twenty thousand delinquents. At last they are satisfied; That Altar was not built for Idolatry, but for a Testimony; a Monument, whereby they professed themselves the servants of the same God: and the army returned without blood. It came not near a relapse: but because there was a suspicion, and fear of it, they were jealous. So odious to God, and so aggravating a weight of sin lies upon a relapse. Admit therefore our Apostles further declaiming against it: Satius, &c.

The Text is comparative, or an argument à malo ad pejus, à periculoso ad periculosius; inter damnosum simpliciter, & damnosum magis: wherein we have two states specified, and the worse of them remonstrated. First, the state of Iniquity, before illumination. Secondly, the state of Apostasy, after illumination. Thirdly, the worse of these decided by the comparison. First, the condition of nature and sin, They knew not the way of righteousness. Secondly, the tergiversation after knowledge, They turn from the holy Commandment. Thirdly, there is a weighing of both these in the Ballance, to try which is the heavier: and certainly, the former condition is found to be the lighter burden: sin in ignorance hath not so much to answer for, as impiety after knowledge; It had been better for them. First, consider we wherein the former state is defective: Non cognoverunt viam Iustitia; a blindness of heart, an averseness from the truth. Next, wherein the pravities of the latter state consists: and this is discerned in two things. First, the excellency of the Direction; a holy Commandment given them. Secondly, the obstinacy of their recidivation; They willfully turn from it. The Rule or Direction hath three conveniencies: First, it is Praeceptum, a Commandment: therefore they are bound to obey it. But a Command may be defective or redundant, and so fail of integrity. Therefore secondly, this is a holy Commandment: perfect, without weakness; safe, without danger. But a Command may be holy and good, and yet not known: and who can fulfill an unrevealed Law? Therefore thirdly, Traditum illis, it was delivered unto them. Though they were bound to take notice of it, and ignorantia juris will not excuse: yet this is delivered to them, and they have known it; that the mouth of all wickedness might be stopped. The last point, is the trutinatio of both these estates, and a verdict given, which is the better, which the worse. The last is found the heavier: and if they had perished in the former, without being guilty of the latter, this for them had been the better. The better, that is, the easier: or the better, the less evil: both conditions are bad enough; one is the worse.

They have not known the way of righteousness.] Wherein we have two things. First, the happiness of the Object, The way of righteousness. Secondly, their unhappiness, in being ignorant of it, They have not known it. The way of peace they have not known.

The way of righteousness is so called, because both Formaliter, it is a righteous way; and Effective, it makes the walkers in it righteous. Certainly, there is but one way to Heaven, and this is it. There be many ways to some famous City upon Earth, many Gates into it; the East-Gate, and the North-Gate, &c. But to the City of salvation and glory, there is but one Way, but one Gate, and that is a narrow one too, Via Iustitiae. There was a Way at the first; the Way of the Law, or rather of Nature: Adam was put into it, but he quickly went out of it. Of all his nine hundred and thirty years, he kept not this path one whole day. Since that, no man ever kept it one hour; but only he that knew the Way, that made the Way, that is the Way, even the new Way of righteousness, Jesus Christ. Now this Way is not demolished, or made up; but we are all weak, and not able to travail it: except it be some Romish Pharisee that undertakes it. And yet Saint Paul will lay no less a Wager than the credit of his Doctrine upon it, that he never goes through with it: Being ignorant of the righteousness of God, they go about to establish their own righteousness. Silly men; they blow at a Gloworme, instead of a coal of fire: and when all is done, they find a cold squalid matter, far unable to heat them. The Metaphor is there taken from shoring up an old rotten house, which no props can uphold; or setting a dead man upon his feet, to make him stand. They go about it, as the Nimrodians went about their Tower, emulating Heaven: but left it a rude heap of confusion, and a monument of their impious presumption. And their own righteousness, as if they would not be beholding to God for a righteousness of his appointing.

What then is the Way of righteousness? So God loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him, should not perish: this is the Way, walk in it. If the righteousness of the Law, that is, our righteousness in observing the Law, could have justified us; God had been too prodigal of a needless blood: all those unconceivable agonies and sufferings of Christ had been superfluous: he needed no Peter to say to him, Master, favor thyself; for he would have spared those pains. But if our infinite Creditor took no other way to satisfy and pay himself, than in that precious Coine, the dear blood of his only Beloved Son; sure we shall find no way to get our own discharge, but by resting on the blood of that Son. Now in all this, God did not ordain Novam Iustitiam, a new righteousness; but Novam Iustitia viam, a new way of righteousness. The Law is too weak to justify us, indeed it is strong enough to condemn us: let us not seek that which the Law cannot do, but fear that which the Law can do. It can never make us righteous before God, through our best obedience; let us never hope for that: it can pronounce us unrighteous before God, and without faith and repentance condemn us; let us fear that.

Christ is the end of the Law for righteousness to everyone that believeth.] The end of a thing is either Mathematical, or Moral. The Mathematical end is the utmost part of a thing, in which the length or continuance is determined: as a point is the end of a Line, death is the end of life, the day of Judgment is the end of the world. The Moral end, is the scope and perfection of it. Christ is the end of the Law both ways. First, he is the Mathematical end, and that both of the Ceremonial and Moral Law: of the Ceremonial, by a direct signification; of the Moral, by an accidental direction. The Ceremonies signified Christ, and ended at him; yea, ended in him. Mortals ante Christum, cum Christo mortuae, post Christum mortiferae. The Law of Manners did also (upon the reckoning) lead to Christ: for it led them to the Curse; and then reason would teach them to enquire for the remedy: as the sense of the disease guides a man to the medicine or Physician. Secondly, he is the Moral end of them: for both he is the Body of those shadows, and the perfect fulfiller of the Decalogue. So that whatsoever the Law required, that we should Be, Suffer, or Do, he hath performed for us. He is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, the End, or Tribute; and we, by his payment, are 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, Tribute-free, discharged by him before God. Here is then still eadem Iustitia, the same righteousness which the Law requires; but non eadem via, not the same way of performing it. The former way required it in our own persons, the new way accepts it done for us in Jesus Christ: the Law would have it inherent, the Gospel admits it imputed. He that believeth in Christ, hath the way of righteousness. Talis est illi qui in Christum credit, die qua credidit, qualis illi qui universam legem implevit. We have a Liverie and Seisin of all the precious promises both in Law and Gospel, in the first moment of our Faith; yea, even an Earnest, and partly a possession of Heaven. He hath made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus. It is as possible to pluck Christ from thence, as to hinder believers from arriving thither. Whosoever denies, that we do even now possess Heaven in Christ, denies Christ to be in Heaven. Even when our Vessel splits, and the floods of temptation assault us, we shall by faith escape the shipwreck, and swim to shore.

This is the way of righteousness, which can only make us Iustos in via, and beatos in patria. Indeed this way hath two boundaries; Repentance, and Obedience.

1. Repentance on the one side; a mourning for sins past: which is as sure an effect or demonstration of faith, as faith is a cause of the peace of conscience. Being justified by faith, we have peace with God. Conscience cannot be good, without faith; nor faith lively, without a good conscience: as the Lamp yields no light, without Oil. Sins will be contracted; we cannot keep the way, without some wanderings: therefore had need to be often rectified. This is the office of Repentance; to set all strait again. Yea, faith it self may suffer shipwreck, though it cannot be cast away. A Horse of the best mettle, when he falls into the hands of a Carrier, and is made a Pack-horse, becomes dull and jadish. Let us not overload our faith with the unnecessary burden of willful sins: letting blood often, will lose much spirits. A Cordial is ever precious; but the force is abated, when it is turned into a Dyet. The frequency of distempers will weaken the virtue of the Receipt.

2. Obedience on the other side: for though we live by faith, yet our faith doth not live, if it produce not good works. We suspect the want of sap in the root of a Tree, if we find barrenness in the branches. If either it have bad fruit, or no fruit, it is but a dead faith. This new way of righteousness doth not exclude obedience to the old; the Gospel does not abolish the Law: yea, without our endeavor to keep the Law, we have no comfort in the Gospel: The one is the Rule of believing, the other is the Rule of living. Shall we sin, because we are not under the Law, but under grace? God forbid: We have not so learned Christ. Of all the marks set up in the way of righteousness, this is a principal one, Good works, and Obedience. Christ is the end of the Law; Finis, non intersiciens, sed perficiens: Absolvens, non Dissolvens: not the destructive, but impletive end: non consumendo, sed consummando finis est: not the killing, but the fulfilling end. The noble Heir, when he is come to his Lands, neglects not his School-master: nay, if he be of an heroic disposition, he rather prefers him. Though the Law were sharp to thee in the infancy of a Christian, yet (consider) it hath brought thee to Christ; and for this office thou wilt love it. The matured Scholar is far past the first rudiments of learning, yet he doth not scorn his Grammar: nay he will hardly make congruous speech, if he directly cross those first rules. Now we believe not for thy saying, (it was the Samaritans speech to the woman) for we have heard him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ: yet still there is some respect due to the first messenger. When the Merchant is come aboard his ship by the help of his boat, he does not presently sink his boat; but fastens it to his ship, because he may have use of it another time. The Law hath been a means to bring us to this way of righteousness; but it is not it self out of the way. We are God's workmanship, created in Jesus Christ unto good workes, which he hath before ordained, that we should walk in them. This walk was ordained for us, before Christ was actually given unto us. Yea, it will be the delight of a Christian, then to be doing, when Christ is with him: Peter is ready to cast out the net at his Masters bidding, in hope of a happy success. When so good a Lord stands by him, that at once puts strength in his hand, and courage in his strength, with Well done good Servant; this will make him work out his heart; if he be faithful.

The way.] A way is ordained for going; they that go in it, be called Travelers; and those must have many requisites.

1. They inquire the nearest, fairest, and best way: in our journey to heaven we shall often be out of the way, if we do not ask direction. The Priests lips preserve knowledge.
2. In dangerous and unknown paths they seek for a sure guide. We have two that offer their assistance; the Spirit a gracious guide; the flesh, a giddy hairebrained guide. Let us take the Spirit, and take heed of the flesh.
3. Travelers are loath to go alone; yet rather alone, than with bad company. Let us seek out the Saints, and such as excel in virtue. Good society takes away all tediousness from a journey.
4. They do not clog themselves with superfluous luggage. Long garments and heavy burdens take away both ease and speed: impertinent and unnecessary cares will make us lagge behind. Herein the poor Christian hath advantage of the rich: this is before him for this world, the other gets the start of him for the Kingdom of heaven. He hath no barns to build, nor farms to let, nor moneys to dispose; no such trouble in his way.
5. Travelers go not without weapons, for fear of robbers. Our way is dangerous; a great number of thieves lie in ambush for us. Satan is the grand thief; all temptations be his prolers. Let us hold fast our faith; this shall serve us both for a weapon to fight with, when we are beset: and for a staff to rest upon, when we are weary. A shield of proof to ward all blows; a pistoll ready to dispatch all enemies. This shall uphold us, if we hold up it. While Peter kept this staff in his hand, he could walk upon the sea; but when he let it fall, he presently began to sink; Lord save me.

6. They are well shod that know they have a long rough journey; lest they be laid up by the way. Our passage to heaven is full of tribulations, thorns, and stones: we had need of greaves: and our feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel.

7. Travelers carry with them some cordials and comfortable waters, to cheare up their spirits when they faint with weariness. We have a Cellar of the waters of life ever ready, the Gospel of salvation: every promise is a Cordial, able to fetch back the swooning soul. There is no condemnation to them that are in Jesus Christ, a blessed Cordial!

8. They meddle not with unconcerning quarrels; but mind their way and business. We cannot hear our God contemned with patience: nor with impatience, ourselves. For the brawls of the wicked, though we wish peace, we dare not thrust in (without a calling) to make it. Much less do their tumults breed a war in our bosoms: we do not beat ourselves, because they beat one another. Some indeed, because they see contentions about religion, give over all religion. As if a man seeing a fray, wherein he needs not to have a hand because they will not put up their swords, must therefore go hang himself. What a desperate pusillanimity is this? Shall we go out of the way, because others quarrel about the way? Or be of the Colliers mind; who seeing some suffering as Protestants for denying the Supremacy of the Pope, others as Papists for denying the Supremacy of the King, at one time: spake in his rustically language, that he would be nere nother? God forbid.

9. Travelers linger not at every bush; nor tarry longer at their Inn, than for necessary refreshing; and renew their walk the next morning. Thus must we use the world, as though we used it not: requiring only our needful repast. So far it may have our custom, as to be buyers of requisite provision, a moderate viaticum for the sustentation of life; but not to be purchasers: we settle our inheritance in no land but the land of Promise. As for carnal pleasures, we balk them unsaluted: we dare not drink of that cup for fear of Inchantment. He that looks for worldly joys in the way of righteousness, thinks to find Canaan in the wilderness.

10 They go on to the end: walking is a perpetual motion: not in circuitu, so the ungodly move like an Horse in a mill: but in progressu, going forward. Howsoever their natural corruptions do sometimes bear them aside, or into some cross way; yet they look to the main journey. A snail creeping on a grindstone may keep on her pace though the grindstone be whirled the contrary way. The inferior orbs, though they be violently moved by the upper, yet have a particular contrary motion of their own. A traveler is stayed against his will, by a stronger force; from which he no sooner gets loose, but he runs his own way the faster. As in walking there seems to be a kind of emulation between the feet; as if the one did strive to be before the other, and the body would be afore them both, and the mind afore the body: so must our desires labor toward the improvement of goodness; and to be better tomorrow than we are today. Thus let us go on in love and peace; and as Joseph charged his brethren, let us not fall out by the way, lest we fall out of the way. But with humility and charity let us follow the way of righteousness, and our end shall be everlasting peace.

They have not known the way.] I will not charge their ignorance so far, as to say they knew no God, or believed none. Atheism destroys the nobility of man: for man is a-kin to the beasts by his body; and if he be not of kin to God by his soul, he is a base and ignoble creature. Yea, it confounds all magnanimity, and the advancement of human nature. Take a Dog, and mark what a generosity and courage he will put on, when he is maintained by a man: who is to him instead of a god, or at least melior natura, whereby it is manifest, that that creature, without the confidence of a better nature than his own, could never be so courageous. So man, when he resteth himself upon the Divine protection and favor, gathers a force and ability, which human nature it self could never attain. Therefore that ignorance (if at least there can be any such ignorance) is in all respects hateful, that deprives human nature of the means to exalt it self above human frailty. But whatsoever the fool says in his heart, every man knows in his heart, that there is a God. None will deny there is a God, but those for whom it maketh that there were no God. Never any nation fell wholly to Atheism: they acknowledged some God, though they missed of the right.

Nor will I charge their ignorance with a false god: It were better to have no opinion of God at all, than such an opinion as is unworthy of him. The one is unbelief, the other contumelie; and certainly superstition is the reproach of Deity. Yield them to know God, and the true God: were they yet ignorant of h••orship▪ Did they not know the Law▪ Then their punishment were less ⟨◇⟩, unless their ignorance were voluntary. Or rather say, they knew the Law, ⟨◇⟩ w••h a P••arisai••ll knowledge; as if they could be justified by the L••. Herei•, as wide as the whole Heaven, they erred from the way to Heaven. Not that there is any imperfection in the Law, as if it were not able to justify us: but the imperfection and fault is in ourselves, that are not capable to be justified by it. A cunning Carver can cut the similitude of any creature; but not on a rotten stick: yet is it no imputation to the skill of the Carver. The Law hath ability enough to justify, but cannot perform this work on our rotten nature. The Law, thus, is weak even to save one, but it is strong enough to damn thousand. What then?

They knew not the way of righteousness:] That is, the salvation which comes by Jesus. All ignorance is a Curse; but that which knows not Christ, is the most miserable. Homo cùm sis, id fac s•mper intelliga•. If a man be ignorant of that which concerns him not, he is excusable. As for a Preacher to be ignorant of the Art of Physic, or a Physician of the Art of Navigation. But if the Phys•c•n be ignorant of Medicines, or the Divine of the Scriptures; this ignorance is ••pardonable. Ignorance is the mother of error: and as well may we expect a •oice from fishes, as virtue from the want of knowledge. The Philosopher being asked, Why men sought more to the rich, than to the wise? answered, Because it was possible for them to be rich, never to be wise. Why do men blanch the religious company, to frequent the wanton? Because they have more mind to be wanton, than to be religious. To be carnally minded, is death. They say of a wild graceless man, he hath a good wit: but it is indeed a naughty wit, that ends in death. Of the covetous worldling, He is a wise fellow; God says, he is a veryfool.

Come, let us deal wisely, saith Pharaoh: but indeed he played the fool. Gehazi thought himself wiser than his Master, Naaman shall not carry away all his money: this wisdom got him the Leprosy. Peter would be counted a wise fellow, Master, sav^o thyself: but Christ puts upon him a worse name than Fool, even Satan. Achitoph^el lived a deep Politician; but he died a natural, an unnatural fool. There is wisdom in the worldling, but it is as life in one that hath the falling sickness, or sense in a mad man, far from the life and sense of sound men.

They turn from the holy Commandment given unto them.] The second estate is described by the clearness of the Direction, and by the soulennesse of their recidivation. The Direction is set forth by three just Prerogatives; Mandatum, Sanctum, Traditum: First, it is a Commandment; they have no exemption from it: Secondly, it is Holy; they can find no fault with it: Thirdly, it is Delivered unto them; they cannot plead ignorance of it.

The Commandment.] Some have thought, all the duty of a Christian to be contained in the Decalogue, and that there are but ten Commandments. As if the Gospel were but a thing upon the By; Consilium, patius quàm Præceptum: a remedy, proposed to us, not imposed on us. But does not Christ call Lev^o, a N^o Commandment? You will say; This, and divers other, had their institution in Nature, their re-ordination in the Law▪ only they were lost, in the corruption of manners. So that now, Non nova, sed ^ovata, they are now, not in themselves, but to us. Nor was Christ's, Ego autem dic^o, a contradiction of the Law, but a clear explanation. Non vellicavit, sed vindicavit Legem: ⟨ϕ⟩ s^psⁱt, as a Garment no more to be worn; sed exposuit, as a Light, that was ^oded by their false Glosses. This is true; But is there no more in the New Testament, but that which expoundeth the Old? Why is it called Nova L^oe, a new Law: Can there be a Law, without Commandments? Most plainly; This is God's Commandment, that we should believe in the Name of his Son Jesus Christ. Indeed this does not bind those Pagans, that know ⟨ϕ⟩ Christ; for this Commandment is not delivered unto them: but every soul within the Pale of the Church. The Spirit of God shall convince the world of sin, because they believe not on Christ. Now there can be no sin, in not doing that which is not commanded to be done. *Vengeance shall be ta^on on them that *⟨ϕ⟩ not God, and obey not the Gospel of Christ. The Gospel therefore is a Law, which they shall perish, that obey not.

Indeed it is jug^o facile, and ⟨ϕ⟩ leve, an easy yoke, a light burden: His Commandments are not grievous, saith the Apostle. I know, that of ourselves it is as possible to keep the whole Law, as to believe. But Lex imperat, fides impetra^o: the Gospel does not only j^bore qu^d placet, but dare quod jubet. A King, when he commands a Castle to be built, may allow the materials: but he cannot give arms, or veins, or brains; neither strength, nor will, nor skill. But God, together with his Precept, gives the power of performance. Believe the grace of the Gospel, the Gospel shall give thee grace to believe. Now the obedience to this Commandment, is Faith; as the obedience to the former, was Love. This is the fulfilling of the Law; that other, the fulfilling of the Gospel: Thy faith hath saved thee, go in peace. But, They have not obeyed the Gospel: for, Lord, who hath believed our report? The obedience to the Gospel, is called the believing our report. There are two things required to Faith: first, the determination of that which is to be believed: secondly, the inclination and persuasion of the heart, to believe it. Preaching determines this Commandment; but it is God that persuades, by Preaching. God can do this, without Preaching; but Preaching cannot do it, without God. Our voice can say, Repent: but repentance is the gift of Heaven. Paul preaches to Lydia's ear, but God only hath the Key of her heart. Rebecca cook'd the Venison, but Isaac gave the Blessing. Paul may plant, and Apollos may water; but without Christ, nothing shall prosper. Faith cannot well be, without Preaching going before it; but Preaching may be, without Faith following after it. But if the hearer do not obey this Commandment, yet the Preacher shall not lose his Fee. The Advocate is rewarded, how-ever the Cause goes. Though we preach, and you repent not, yet we shall never repent of our pains: if we may not be a sweet savor to you, yet we are a sweet savor to God, in you. And well may we be content to lose our labor, when God loseth the Seed, whose the Ground is. Give we then our hearts to Christ, like the two Tables, to write his whole Law upon them. Upon the first Tablet let him write Faith; upon the second, Love: so shall we have both Legem in cord, and cor in Lege, and give obedience to the Commandment of God, which is Holy.] The Father is holy: Be ye holy, for I the Lord your God am holy. The Son is holy: Ye denied the holy One. The blessed Spirit is holy; therefore called the Holy Ghost. Thus we treble the word, in our praises of God; Holy Holy, Holy, Lord God of Sabbath. Yea, God is Holiness it self: therefore from him can come no Commandment, but that which is most holy. Holy, for the Author, the holy God: Holy, for the Matter, a holy Truth: Holy, for the effect, it makes us holy creatures: Holy, for the end; it unites us to the most Holy, both in present grace, and future glory. A good air may make a man healthier, meat and digestion may make him strong and lusty, great achievements may make him famous and worthy, the Prince may make him noble and mighty, industry and thrift may make him rich and wealthy, company may make him pleasant and merry: nothing in the world, but the grace of the Gospel, can make him holy; and nothing but that holiness, can make him truly happy.

The Law is indeed Holy, and the Commandment holy, and just, and good: but the holiness of it did not comfort us, because it could not make us holy: N• debilitate suâ, sed incapacitate nostrâ. The Law speaks stones: it is impossible to make Bread of stones. It came in Lightning and Thunder: Thunder and Lightning are no medicines to cure a broken heart. The Gospel is not only holy, but comforts us in the remedy of our unholiness. To this purpose was it given us before the Law: for before Israel received the Law from Mount Sinai, they had both Manna and the Water from the Rock; which Paul plainly says, was Christ in the Gospel. The Sacraments of Grace were before the Legal Covenant; so did the goodness of God prevent our obedience: therefore should we keep the Law, because we have a Savior. O the mercy of our God, which before we see what we are bound to do, shows us our remedy, if we do it not. We all fail in our duty; Christ supplies all, and makes us holy.

Thus is this Doctrine holy, not only Subjective, in it self; but Effective, to us: as when we call meats wholesome, we mean not so much in themselves, as of the actions they transmit to us. So they be not only Mandata sana, but in reference to us, Sanantia. This is that which turns all those Legal terrors into comfortable effects: for God is gracious and holy, both in the Oil of his promises, and Wine of his menaces; and through both, he makes us holy. Therefore Paul calls it sound Doctrine; making us of a sound constitution, if we follow that Dyet. For the Word of God is a Dyet, to keep us in health: if we sin, and be sick, we must confess that we have not kept the Dyet. This attribute, Holy, doth illustrate in the Gospel two excellencies:

1. The perfection of it: for if the Law were perfect, that doth condemn us; how perfect is the Gospel, which doth save us? As many as walk after this Rule, peace be on them and mercy. The professor of any Art, or Quality, must have a certain Rule, or Principle, whereby to order it: and that must be a true Rule, or else he is subject to error and obliquitie. Here is a Rule, and a perfect Rule; a Commandment, therefore a Rule; a Holy commandment, therefore a perfect Rule. A Commandment, that we might not walk without a Rule: a Holy one, that we might not walk by a false Rule. He that hath no Rule, goes whither he knows not: he that hath a false Rule, goes whither he should not. To preclude the pretence of Ignorance, here is a Rule, a Commandment. To prevent the danger of error, here is a perfect Rule, a Holy commandment. Bellarmino says, there be two things requirable in a perfect Rule; Certainetie, and Evidence: if it be not certain, it is no Rule: if not evident, no Rule to us. Traditions betray their own credit in both these regards: but this holy Commandment is no less conspicuous, than infallible. This was Christ's Sword against all the powers of darkness, Scriptum est. Fabulous Legends are a wooden Dagger, and Traditions a rusty Scabbard: but this is, in truth and manifestation, a perfect Rule. A holy Commandment, the true Canon: other Writings may have Canonical verity, this only hath Canonical authority.

This is the Judge of all differences and doubts. As an earthly father, fearing that his children will fall out after his decease, and wrangle for Legacies, or about the division of his goods; sets down his Will in writing, under his hand, not without witnesses. If there arise any debate among the brethren, presently they have recourse to the Will, and that ends the Controversy. If there fall out any dissention about our Fathers Inheritance, whither should we run, but to our Fathers Will? To the Law, to the Testimony. But as we have some evil expounders of the Law, that interpret the Will against the Testators meaning; and so make it their own Will, rather than his: not that there be Knots in good men's Testaments; no, the Knots be in the Lawyers brains. So by those Popish spirits of contradiction, the Will of Christ, this holy Commandment, that should decide all questions, must come it self to be questioned. Blasphemous presumption; where God himself must be brought to the Barre, the Pope sitting as Judge, with a Parliament of Tridentine Fathers, and a Jury of Jesuits, to pass upon the Lord Jesus. How can he not take this dealing worse, than that he had under Pontius Pilate?

2. The Honor of it: Holiness is right nobility, without goodness there can be no true glory. Therefore is it called a Glorious Gospel. If the ministration of death were glorious, how much more doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory? The Law was a glorious fear, the Gospel is a glorious joy. Old $\langle \diamond \rangle$ calls it The glory of Israel. First, glorious for the Testimony; glorious Angels brought the news, and their song to it was Gloria Deo in excelsis, Glory to God on high. Secondly, glorious for the matter propounded, which is our Reconciliation to God. Honor forsakes the man, whom the King disfavors: we were in disgrace with God by our sinful nature: the Gospel restores us to honor, clothes us like Mordecai, with royal robes, our Savior's righteousness; gives us Princes for our attendants, the blessed Angels; and proclaims before heaven and earth, Thus shall it be done to the men whom the Almighty King will honor: And such honor have all his Saints. Thirdly, glorious for the object, which is Christ, God and Man: that sits in the glory of his Father; even the brightness of his glory: and shall come in his glory to judge the world. Fourthly, glorious for the power; it vanquisheth all enemies, subdues the flesh, overcomes the world, foils and confounds the devil, even while it seems to be conquered, it gets the victory. When the Martyrs of it lie bleeding at the feet of persecution, who would not think the honor of it eclipsed? No, even then it is glorious; every drop of blood that comes from a Christian, breeding a new Christian; that which intended to kill us with infamy, crowns us with glory. Fifthly, glorious for the end: through glorious grace it brings to gracious glory: for the seed of Grace is the root of glory; as seed is in potentia of corn. I commend you to the Word of his grace, that builds you up to eternal glory.

It is holy, honorable, glorious; what confusion then belongs to that face which despiseth it? He that caused the Gospel to be brought with the blood of his servants, will require the blood of the contemners of it. It hath made many forsake their families, their goods, their bloods, and dearest lives; and can it not make us leave our bad and base courses? You will say, It is full of scorn and pain. But it is no Gospel of pain and scorn, except only by accident: it is the Gospel of glory. It teacheth us patience: and it is the nobility of virtue, to suffer: a man's patience is his honor; there is glory enough even in that, to swallow up the worlds shame.

Let us maintain this glory, not only with our lips, but in our lives. Then do we glorify it, then shall it glorify us; when it subdues our rebellious and vile affections. Let us beware of a relapse, for this crosseth Christ's Resurrection: let us not stoop down to the world, for this crosseth Christ's Ascension. Then do we honor it, when we honor them that bring it. Quam speciosi pedes, How beautiful be the feet of such men? Then do we honor them, when we give them due maintenance; when they that preach the Gospel, live of the Gospel. They that will not allow us to live of the Gospel for the welfare of our bodies, shall never live by the Gospel for the comfort of their souls. It should be the shame of Christians, to rob their Teachers. But when a Spaniard was so pitiless to his Moore-slave, as to let him go extreme bare and naked in the dead of Winter, and was reprehended by his kinsman for his hard-heart; adding (besides his want of mercy) that it was a shame for him: answered, let him make what shift he can with the cold; and as for me, I shall shift well enough with the shame. So let us take care how otherwise we may live: and for the shame of defrauding us they will abide that. But they that dishonor the Gospel, shall have no honor of Him whose it is.

Delivered unto them. What was it only by tradition? for this Traditum illi is a golden word with the Church of Rome, the very sound of it makes them crow like Cokes of the game, Victoria. But God did not leave his Church without a stronger Testimony, than that which passeth from mouth to mouth: though it be also true, Audivimus a Patribus, and Tradidimus Filiis. But I have written to them the great things of my Law: this was God's course. Shall we interpret this of an invisible manuscript; I will write my Law in their hearts; Indeed this is a blessed writing; and be all our hearts like Ezekiel's Rowle, thus written upon within and without. But the Lord did not so trust his sacred Truth only, that no visible characters of it should be upon record, to convert, or convince the world. But the same Spirit which did persuade Jeremiah to receive that God had commanded, moved also Baruch to write that Jeremiah had dictated. Therefore both for suggestion of the matter, and direction of the manner, All Scripture is given by inspiration of God. The Word of God is called The Scripture: that great Testator left his will in writing; and left it with his wife, the Church, to teach her children; as to the Jews were committed the oracles of God.

God thought letters the chiefest means, both for preservation, and propagation of religion. Experience teacheth us that the words of the best Preachers are but fleeting sounds; moving for the present, but soon removing away, unless they be taken alive, as it were while they are upon the wing, in the snare of this profitable invention. So is the loss of the ear restored to the eye, and Truth secured in the memory. Aelian writes of the Egyptian frogs, that taking a kind of reed in their mouths, they save themselves from being devoured by the water-serpents. The weakest conceits taking hold of writing, cannot be consumed by the revolution of years, whose Hieroglyphic was a Serpent; a fit emblem! Thus the tyranny of time, which like Saturn, would devour his own children, is beguiled. Non ferrum poterit, nec edax abolere vetustas. This shall be written for the generation to come: and the people which shall be created, shall praise the Lord. It is but a trick that Rome puts upon the Church, the needless overplus of their unwritten supplies: by which coozenage, themselves that are the parties, be conveyed into the room of Judges. But these written evidences (we are sure) be God's own deeds and specialties: and they are cursed and abominable, that shall offer to piece his word, to mend his workmanship, to mingle and sophisticate his precious gold of the Temple, with the base dross and unsanctified refuse of their own inventions. Yet this hath been the silly shift of Roman brokery, to discredit the Scriptures, for the better vent of their own traditions. Yea, when they were opposed in the setting up of their unwritten fancies, they fell in the end to open railing at the Scriptures: calling it a mute, a brute, a dumb, or dead letter, a black Gospel, or a piece of inky Divinity. So did the luxuriant wits of Rome end in barrenness and beggary; when they had spent all their colors, and could find no more cavils, turning the edge of their malice from our cause, against God's ordinance: and at their lowest ebb, in the ruins of their strength, they bid battle to the Lord of Hosts, their strongest and mightiest adversary. God delivered his holy Commandment to the people; they sacrilegiously take that away, and deliver their own. Thus they deal with them, as the soldiers did with Christ: first blind them, then strike them, and last ask them, Quis est qui te percussit? Do but open their eyes, and show them this holy word, and they will soon perceive who hath so long abused them.

Well, Traditum est: there is no denial of the Deliverie of it. Our eyes see it written and published, our ears hear it preached: ô that we could prove it practiced. Many make it the argument of their discourse, as if they would be Critics in Divinity; but you see not a syllable of it in their lives. Plutarch laughed at those that would be counted wise as Plato, yet would be drunk with Alexander. The Church doth bring up divers, and nurse them with Indulgence, which prove like Water-fowls, hatched under a Hen: they remain with their Damme for a while; but according to their kind, they will to the Water. They learn this holy Commandment of the Church: but they leave both Church and Commandment, and all, for the World. A Hare, when she is hotly pursued and down-hunted, plies her to some beaten path; not for any love she hath to it, but that there, by the feet of the passengers she may lose her Sent, and deceive the Dogs. Many will be in the Church-way, the Road of Profession; not for any love they bear to devotion, but that the filthy Sent of their turpitudes might not be discerned. As this Law is given to us, so we must be given to it, that we may be saved.

They turn from the holy Commandment.] This is the foulness of their Backsliding; justly aggravated from the three excellencies of their Charge. First, they are commanded, and that by the Highest, no less than their Maker. Secondly, that command is Holy; to be honored, for the matter. Thirdly, it is not wrapped up in obscurity, but published to them in such a manner: yea, they receive it, and covenant with God to keep it, in their Baptism. Yet they turn: first, from a Commandment; which manifests their disobedience: secondly, from a Holy commandment; which argues their profaneness: thirdly, from this Delivered, and accepted; which shows their revolting, and rebelling wickedness.

1. They turn from the Commandment. Humidum male terminatur termino proprio, because it is by nature fluid: but been terminatur alieno, because it hath a matter in which to subsist. Our nature is moist, airy, waterish, apt to flow into the aspectable things of this world: if it be terminated only by our own wills, and have no other banks or boundaries, it will run out into infinite lusts. Therefore it must be hedged in by a more constant and perfect will, as the Sea is shore'd in with limits: and this is the Commandment of God: to transgress that term and fence, is disobedience. Corrupt nature and carnal reason will plead for more scope, as if the Commandment were not broad enough. (Contradicting that of the Psalm; I have seen an end of all perfection: but thy Commandment is exceeding broad.) But it does not make the Teddar so long, as to fetch in all their own Commons into God's several; his Laws into so large a compass, as their desires. Therefore first they will not obey, and then study evasions why they should not: as Saul first took the bootie, and then thought on an excuse. The Gate is too narrow: What, not think a loose thought? not speak a false word, for an advantage? Who can keep himself within so strict confines? But if a man were imprisoned for some foul fact, condemned, and sure to die the next morrow; and his friends in mean time tell him a means of escape, There is a Window or Grate in the Jail, through which he may creep: would he not strip off his clothes, yea, be content to rase hisskin, to save his life? We are by nature Satan's slaves, shut up in his prison, the bondage of sin: there is but one way to escape into the glorious liberty of God's children; this is a narrow Gate, a narrow Grate, our new obedience: Shall we not put off our lusts, our riches, our pleasures, our dear wills and desires, to save our souls?

2. They turn from the holy Commandment: this is their Prophanesse. Fanum à fando; the Temple was so called, because it was the speaking place, where God did speak to man, and man to God: They that contemn holy things, have no part in the holy place. The Church cannot hallow them, that dis-hallow the Church. Procul hin•, procul este profani. I know there be some that put on holiness as a loose garment, to cover their pollutions; and seem to pray devoutly in those Temples, which they have spoiled by their sacrilege: and these do more hurt, than they that profess no holiness at all. It was said, There were many oppressors in Rome, but they were all drunk, except C•s••, and he was a sober one. Licentious Libertines, the Idolaters of B•th••, and Votaries of Venus, are all prophants of the holy Gospel; but they be drunken ones. But demure hypocrites, black Saints, that worship God at their Pe•e, and Mammon in their Closers, these be the secret underminers of the Gospel, though they be sober ones. For howsoever they call for Sermons with their voices, they destroy the livelihood of Preachers, by their deeds; and root up the holy ground, while they call for holy fruits.

Let them talk what they will, they love the Lawyer better than the Preacher: for they give their money to the Lawyer, that he may defend them from paying their dues to the Preacher. No charity to the poor, no equity to the Church, no love of neighbourhood is in them. For the first Table: they will be no Idolaters, no swearers, no Sabbath-contemners, no friends of Papists; and all this is well: you would think these men very holy. But come to the second Table: try them with obedience to Magistrates, with all those holy duties to their brethren; here they bewray themselves. Sure if they had been in Moses his time, they would never have grudged at the mis-carriage of the second Table: but were well content it should be broke then, for they have broke it ever since. Thus, as if they could part the Commandment, and Holy; they would fain be holy, without the Commandment. But all their holy shows of observing the former Table, when they perpetually violate the second, in their pride, and malice, and covetousness, are but green herbs in the window, to hide the dust and sluttish cobwebs. As if he that forbad us to swear, did not also forbid us to lie: as if he that commanded us to sacrifice, did not also charge us to prefer mercy. Go thou fool, that thinkest holiness to consist in hearing Sermons, and not in a conscionable obedience of the Text. Two walking together, found a young Tree laden with fruit: both did gather, and satisfy themselves for the present. One of them took all the remaining fruit, and carried it with him: the other seeing him gone with the fruit, took up the Tree it self, and planted it in his own ground; where it prospered, and bore plentifully every year. The first had more fruit for the present; but the other sped best, for he had fruit when the other had none. At Sermons, some have large memories, and can gather many observations; which they keep a while, to rehearse, not to practice. Another hath a weaker capacity, but he gets the Tree it self, the root and substance of the Text, plants it in his heart, feeds on the fruits of comfort; and his soul is nourished to eternal life.

3. This is a Commandment delivered unto them; which they have received, yea covenanted and sworn to keep: yet as if they had only taken it upon liking, they turn from it: this is their Apostasy. It was not delivered with such terror as the Law, but with sweet mildness. Then, the very hill where God appeared, might not be touched of the purest Israelite: Here, the very hem of his garment was touched by the woman that had the fluxe of blood; yea, his very face was touched with the lips of Judas. There the very earth was prohibited them where he descended: Here, his very body and blood is proffered to our touch and taste. So gracious was God in this delivery of the Gospel: how unthankful are we, if we do not acknowledge this mercy to us, above his ancient people! They were his own, yet must stand off, like strangers: we were strangers, and he hath made us his own. It is our sin and shame, if in these •ants of inti•enese, we be no better acqu••ed with God, than they which in their greatest familiarity were commanded $\langle \diamond \rangle$. Yet we have counted this favora strange thing; not only through simple ignorance, but want of reverence and respectfulness. A man may be strange, either when he is not perceived, or received. Not understood▪ that God calls astrange Nation, whose language th• know not. Barbarus hōc 〈ϕ〉, quia non intelligit. Not accepted: They 〈...〉 in my house, co•nt f• a stranger. This holy Commandment may be said ••ge, when it is unknown; and so the bea•ers are fools privative• o• when it is •eglected, and not cared for▪ and so they proceed higher, and are fools p••tive. They turn from it: ••st, because there is a negative indispos•ion in t•e to receive it; through ignorance, wa•ing faith; or through 〈ϕ〉 wanting knowledge; as the Septuagint render that, Esa. 11. If you will not believe, you shall not understand: which is a sound position, though I dare not call it a sound translation. Secondly, because there is a positive disposition of resistance against it, in their own wisdom: for the wisdom of the flesh is enmity against God. The more a man adheres to the judgment of sense, reason, and experience; the further off he is (without special grace) from the Kingdom of Heaven. Nicodemus was a great Doctor in Israel, yet he wonders at the Regeneration: the Doctrine of the Gospel begets in such men a question, How can these things be? What will this babbler say? Yet these were not the vulgar, but Philosophers: of no vile City, but of Athens; the Greece of that Greece, which counted all the world, but themselves, Barbarians.

Hence ariseth that contempt, both of the Gospel, and of them that bring it. How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the Gospel of peace? The feet: not because they wore Slippers embroidered with Gold and Pearl; as that Scripture is abused, to the consecrating and kissing of the Popes toe. But because the feet are the instruments of going: as we familiarly say of poor men, They get their living by their fingers ends; because they are the instruments of working. This Commandment is holy: holiness and beauty go together; as the Psalmist speaks, The beauty of holiness, which makes the holiness of beauty. Like Youth, which we call the pride and flower of Life; wherein is that mixture of White and Red, which is called Beauty. Like the Spring, when the fields begin to be adorned with buds, blossoms, grass, and flowers, in which all creatures rejoice. The Gospel turns the squalid Winter of barren sins, into the flourishing Spring of heavenly graces. Yea, and like Autumn too, for the ripeness of fruits: unripe fruit is dangerous; ripe, is both well-coloured, and well-tasted; wholesome. The beauty of the Saints doth not decay, but increase, with their years. We may more truly say of souls, than Euripides could of bodies, that retained beauty in their age; Not only the Spring is pleasant, but even the Autumn. Yea, this Tree yields fruit every month; ever seasonable. Many of our daintiest meats are not, but the Gospel is always in season. In the Winter of trouble, in the Summer of ease, in the Spring of youth, and Fall of age; never out of season. The glory of it perhaps is not illustrious to carnal eyes: alas, Id minus conspicuum, quod magis praclarum; excellentissima, occultissima. We see the leaves, the flowers, and fruits of a Tree; but the precious sap is hidden. In man, the body only is visible, not the soul; we see the accidents of things, not the form and substance. Men may love others, for sensible respects; God loves his children, for their secret and invisible graces. Omnis decor ab intus, The Kings daughter is all glorious within. The glory of this Evangelical Law is only seen of spiritual eyes; and of them, with desire and ravishment. These love it, and all the servants God employs in it. Some love their Ministers, because they keep good hospitality, which is commendable: some, because they gain by them in their Altarages, which is carnal: some for loose respects, which is sensual: some, because they seldom preach, which is abominable: some, because they would be held religious, which is hypocritical: but to love them for their works sake, this is conscionable: and those men shall find peace to their hearts, and salvation to their souls, which is comfortable.

The Sum of the Verse.

The Text riseth in full strength against Apostolical backsliding: which is twofold; of Faith, of Manners. The last is dangerous, the former is deadly: together with truth, it loseth shame: and not seldom swells up to the same against the Holy Ghost, for which, because there can be no remorse on earth, there is no forgiveness in heaven. O how happy were it for such stragglers, to be driven home to the Fold, though with shame, though by death! For these doth our common Mother mourn, both pitying their loss, and disdainng thus to be robbed of her children: not that she needs them, but they her. Troopes of souls in their stead daily creep into her bosom, and humbly embrace her knees on their own. She hath had sons, which seeking idolatrous Rome as resolved Papists, left the world as holy Martyrs: dying for the detestation of that they came to adore. How many willfully lose their souls, where these went to lose, and found them? Their zeal dies, where the others began to live: and they like to live, where the other would but die.

But alas, what shall we say to the apostasy in manners, that epidemical relapse of the world, to the world? It is not in man, as in the City: when the Curfeu-bell hath rung, we cover our fire, rake up our embers, and then lie down and sleep without fear. He that hath repented and escaped from a sinne, hath not yet eradicated, and escaped from the root of that sin: the seed of the same transgression is still within him. No sanctification is so perfection earth, as to expel all corruption. If after many sighs and tears we have attained to do well, and resolve better; yet this good estate is far from constant, and easily inclining to change. God is the God of Security, and the enemy of Security too: he would have us always he sure of his love, and yet always be doing something that we may be sure of it: so to apprehend him, as ever present with us; yet still to follow him, as fearing lest he should go from us. He did enlarge Hezekiah's lease for fifteen years, he renewed Lazarus his lease for a time we know not: but he did never so put out the fire, that he left no embers, no sparks. He did ever wrap up a future mortality in that body, which he had so reprieved. So for the soul; he doth not so pardon sin, that the sinner can sin no more; he makes no man so acceptable, that he makes him impeccable. As therefore on the one side, we do not look on those sins with a despairing eye, which we have heartily repented, and transferred upon our Savior; as though they were not sufficiently dead in him, but must be again raised to life, to condemn us to death: for this were to diminish the largeness of his bounty, and to derogate from the fullness of his mercy. So on the other side, to think that God's present mercy extends to all our future sins, and that he had already forgiven whatsoever we durst venture to do amiss hereafter; were an unwarrantable anticipation, an insolent presumption. God's favor must not be made an antidote against all willfully received poisons, nor a license to expose ourselves to temptations. That mercy which hath holpen us from the falls of our infirmities, may be to seek when we have cast ourselves into new offenses through too rash confidence of it.

If our soul were as sensible of sin, as our body is of pain, we would be fearful of a Relapse. Suppose a man hath been sick of some dangerous disease, whiled out many weary days, and not more easy nights, in languishing fits, been the exercise of Physicians; yet after all is recovered and well. But now when the same disease comes again, how terrible? To think of panting through all those fiery heats, and sailing through all those overflowing sweats, of watching all those long nights, and mourning all those long days: for sick men think that perverted nature hath put the longest day, and longest night together; which should be six months asunder: every day of their patience appearing to them a Saint Barnabe's day, and every night a Saint Lucies night: to think of standing at the same Barre, expecting the return of Physicians from their consultations, and not be sure of the same verdict in any good indications: that he must go the same way over again, and not be certain of the same issue: this is so woeful a condition, that the former sickness seemed a kind of convalescence to it. We have heretofore run into a soul sin, did it cost us no labor to work ourselves out? How many weeping prayers, and groaning tears, and trembling fears, and bleeding sorrows, have we gone through; before we could get assurance of God's reconciliation to us? It may be, we have been driven to roar de profundis, yea, even to despair in profundis, before we could obtain the testimony of forgiveness. God's favor is no trivial thing, to be regained as easily as it is lost. Mary lost Christ suddenly; it cost her many a weary step, and pearlie drop from her eyes, in those three days, ere she found him.

The privilege of not sinning, is too high a favor for this militant estate: it could not be militant, if it had no enemies; it had no enemies, if it were free from sins. There is a transmigration of sin; and when the soul of it is dead in one sin, it passeth to another. Our youth dies, and the sins of our youth with it: some sins die a violent death, and some a natural. Penurie and misery kill some sins in us, and some die of age. The change of our condition makes us unable to do some sins; as the beggar can be no Usurer, the slave no Tyrant. Yet the soul of sin lives, and passeth into another: and that which was wantonness, becomes ambition; and that which was riot, becomes covetousness. We have three lives in our state of sin: where the sins of youth expire, those of middle years enter; and those of age, after them. So still God finds in us, and his finding shows us, that there is left the matter of sin in us, which proclives us to a relapse. Yea, which of us hath not multiplied relapses already? Which case is fitly and fearfully expressed, in a storm at Sea; They mount up to the Heaven, they go down again to the Depths. Repentance lifts us up to Heaven, and Relapse brings us down again to Hell. Sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee. Not only death, which is an end worse than that long sickness, that was the beginning: but Hell, which is a beginning worse than that end.

The dearest children of God have fallen foully, fearfully, but never finally. How dreadful was the mis-carriage of the man after God's own heart, in the business of Uriah? With what a trembling soul must we look upon it? Who can promise himself to stand, when he sees David fallen, and in the fall maimed? Who can assure himself of an immunity from the foulest sins, that sees him offending so heinously, so bloodily? Who ever noted so foul a Blot in his rejected Predecessor? He sins in lust, drunkenness, dissimulation, homicide; and yet was recovered. Saul did but go about to color his sin, and was cursed. The Vessels of Mercy and Wrath are not distinguishable by their actions: he makes the difference, that will have mercy on whom he will; and whom he will, he hardeneth. But the just and holy God will not so put it up at David's hands: he that hates sin so much the more, as the offender is dearer to him, will let him feel the bruise of his fall. If God's best children have been sometimes suffered to sleep in a sin, at last he hath awakened them in a fright. Since the first man Adam, the World never yielded so great an example of Wisdom, or so fearful an example of Apostasy, as Solomon. The knowledge which Adam had by creation, Solomon had by infusion; both fully, both from one Fountain. Adam called all creatures by their names; and Solomon spake, from the Cedars of Lebanon, to the moss that springs on the wall. Besides vegetables, there was no Fish, Fowl, Beast, that escaped his discourse. Yet both fell, and fell by one means; and Solomon might say as well as Adam, The ••man deceived me. It is true indeed, that Adam fell, as all; Solomon, as one: yet so, that this one is a pattern of the frailetie of all. If knowledge had been a privilege from sin, both had stood: yet both fell; this last, frequently, neither finally.

I might abound in this exemplification: all have their backslidings. The wicked fall like Elephants, yea, like rotten houses, without rising again. The just fall seven times a day, but then they rise as often: their sins teach them repentance; that repentance, carefulness: as Peter was better, after his denial, than he was before. The righteous fall on their faces, they see where they fall: the wicked fall on their backs, as the apprehenders of Christ did; they see not where, nor when they fall. The children of God have sinned, as it were, to teach •s repentance: their falls are recorded, not to disgrace them, but to admonish us; not for our imitation, but instruction: they repeated what they did ill, and shall we do what they repented? They were taken as sinners, and delivered a penitents: Their soul escaped as a Bird out of the snare. It is good for us, that they were both taken, and delivered: Taken, that we might not presume; and that we might not despair, delivered. They sinned, that we might not sin: they were restored, that we might not sink under the burden of our sin. Let <◇> up this point with two useful applications.

1. As we must be jealous of all sins, so exceeding fearful of a relapse into o•r former sins. We are like little children that overthrow themselves with their clothes; now up, and down again at a straw. Be not high minded, but s•re. The Vine, Olive, Fig tree, will not leave their cheerfulness, fatness, sweetness, to get a kingdom; the Bramble did: if we be Brambles, what s•ll we do when the fire comes? Though the children of election cannot be d•mned, yet they may be damnified, dangerously wounded by their sins, lose the sense of former peace in their souls, be brought to the pits brink of horrible desperation, and think that the very torments of hell are not more grievous than that they feel in their own consciences. If one act of filthiness hath thus d•stressed us, that we would give all the world for a pardon: if it hath made us groan, and bleed, and roar for the very disquietness of our hearts; what tortures will the same sin bring, when it is again repeated? There is a propriety, a Meum and Tuum, both in pains and pleasures: and as we are most affected with that pleasure, the sweetness whereof we have tasted in former experience: so we are most intimidated with those pains, whereof we have had a bitter sense. A covetous person, that hath preoccupied all his senses, filled all his capacities, with the delight of riches; wonders how any man can have any taste of any pleasure in opennesse or liberality. The drunkard fears to tell the place where he hath found the best wine; for he thinks all the world must needs come troling to his pot. So in sickness, he that is tormented with the Stone, wonders why any man should call the Gout a pain. And he that hath felt neither, but only the Tooth-ach, is as much afraid of that, as either the other of theirs. When we have felt torments in their exaltation, we tremble at a relapse.

Certainly, our former transgressions did not put us to the true pain of repentance, if we do not quake to repeat them in our practice. Had we apprehended the wrath of God for those sins, and complained (with David) of our broken bones, of our broken hearts; we would shudder at our new provocations. Why is a Relapse so odious to God? Because he that hath sinned, and repented, hath (as it were) weighed God and the Devil in a balance: he hath heard them both plead; and when he hath heard them, gives judgment on that side to which he adheres, by his subsequent practice. If he return to his former disobedience, he decrees for Satan, prefers sin before grace: and in contempt of God, declares the precedency for his adversary. Now look how far a contempt wounds deeper than an injury, so far a relapse is more heinous than the first iniquity. And that which is more odious to God, must needs be more dangerous and pernicious to us. For there is no other measure of the greatness of our danger, but the greatness of his displeasure. We delight to wear flowers while they are fresh and sweet: but when they fade and wither, we throw them away. If ever Adam had been again received into Paradise, how abstinently would he have walked by the forbidden tree. Scarce should his eye have looked toward it, but (sure) his hand would never have touched it. If the lost Angels had been re-admitted to their heaven, how would they have fixed themselves upon God, and preserved the integrity and honor of their God: If Gehazi could have (like Naaman) washed off his leprosy in Jordan; he would never have run after that rich Syrian for gold, yea he would have refused it, though brought home to his door. O that we could be so wise, never to hazard those favors, which after our first forfeiture we have recovered.

2. Let us not despair of God's mercies, though we have relapse into our former disobedience. We have been wounded, and that wound is almost healed, so that nothing appears but the scar: again, we expose that tender place to the enemies weapon, and receive there a new hurt: though the danger he grievous the remedy is more gracious, there is virtue enough in God to heal us. The great Servant of his denied him again and again, but all before repentance: here was no relapse. If there had been, he that with a look recovered the forms, could with a touch have healed the latter: God's Justice hath taken some at their first fall: the reprobate Angels sinned, they never relapsed. He hath not made our case so desperate: As the Lord's majesty is, so is his mercy: both infinite. He hath pardoned many relapses in his servants; and his arm is not shortened. If death were ill in it self, God would never have raised up any dead man to life again, because that man must necessarily die again. If his mercy in forgiving fore-past sin, did so far aggravate a relapse into the same sin, that there were no more mercy after it, our case were the worse for that former mercy. For we are all under a necessity of sinning while we live here: provided that we place this necessity in our own infirmity, and not in his decree. Not that we should hence take encouragement to relapse out of presumption; but when we have relapsed through weakness, to preclude all accesses of desperation.

That God of patience and compassion, who hath commanded us to pardon our offending brother seventy times, seven times, hath limited himself to no number. It is true indeed, God is jealous of his honor, and there is nothing that comes nearer to the violating of that honor, nearer to the nature of a scorn to him, than to sue out his pardon, and make it a license to sin: to obtain the seal of his reconciliation and forgiveness, and then to turn upon that sin for which we needed that forgiveness. This comes too near a contempt, when we shall make his holy Ordinances, his Word, his Sacraments, the Seals and Instruments of his Grace, to become the instruments of our licentiousness. Yet there may come a victorious Repentance, to scour the coast of all these rebels; a potent grace, to strengthen all these weaknesses: and the stock of God's mercy cannot be made poor by the payment of all these our debts. Wherefore did the Lord Jesus run through such a variety of sufferings, but to answer for the variety of our sins? He did not shed his blood for this sin, and not for that: for the sins of our morning and not for the sins of our evening. He was not so often buffeted and wounded, but to satisfy for us that have so often trespassed. Six times was his blood shed, that though our sins be iterated six thousand times, we might find sufficient expiation for them all. He is the God of constancy and perseverance, and Whom he loveth, to the end he loveth: we may lose ourselves, we cannot lose him, because he will not lose us.

It had been better for them.] This is the last point, the balancing of both these conditions; a trial whether of them is the more unblest and dangerous, and it falls upon the knowing part: if a man will be ungracious, it had been better for him to be so in the dark. Ignorance is unhappy enough: indeed Peter lent his Buckler to the Jews, therewith in part to defend themselves against the weapons of God's wrath, in the bloodiest fact that ever the Sun saw attempted, and to keep them from desperation; ^f I wote that through ignorance ye did it: but withal he calls them to future knowledge. The days are evil, whether we respect their troubles, or that which troubles them, our sins; and not likely in either of them both to mend: The former times of ignorance God winked at: but now, ignorance shall no longer hope for such a connivence. If ignorance had a sufficient tongue to plead her own innocence, why did the blood of Christ cry from the Cross, Forgive them Father, they know not what they do? There is an invincible ignorance, like Seneca's blind Harpastes, an old Beldame, so insensible of her own blindness, that she would often entreat her Guide to go forth of doors, because the house was dark. And there is a willful ignorance, that refuseth the Light, for fear of seeing the own wretchedness. But the Cockatrice that lies close in her hole, will sometimes come forth, to warm her self at the Sun: and it is more for the prosperity that waits upon the light of the Gospel, than for the Light it self, that these crafty Serpents come out of their dens. There be simple souls that cannot, and subtle spirits that will not know the truth: the former shall not escape from Rods, the other shall be scourged with Scorpions.

But their plagues shall far exceed, that know their Masters will, and will not do it. If Tyre and Sidon burn in Hell, and the smoke of their torment ascend forever, wherein never was Miracle wrought, nor Oracle taught, to reclaim them: what shall become of Chorazin and Bethsaida, whose streets were honored with the gracious words and glorious wonders of Jesus Christ? Many shall say in that day, Lord we have prophesied in thy Name, &c. Many; for this shall be the case of multitudes: yet their knowledge of Christ shall not gain his knowledge or approbation of them; Nescio vos. Our knowledge shall then be weighed to the smallest grain; and if our holiness, being put into the other Ballance, be found too light, our sorrows shall make it up. How curious Critics would many be in the Arts, ignorant of no congruities, no proprieties? But not to know Christ, is no false Latin with them: to wound him through with desperate oaths, is no breach of good manners. But where was Solomon's wisdom, while his affections ran away with him into a wild voluptuousness? What boots it to know all things, while we know not ourselves? The perfections of speculation do not argue the inward powers of self-government: the eye may be dear, and yet the hand palsy'd. It is not so much to be heeded, how the soul is informed, as how it is disciplined. The light of knowledge doth well, but the good ordering of affections doth better. Never any mere man, since the first, knew so much as Solomon: many that have known less, have had more command of themselves. A competent estate well husbanded, is better than a vast patrimony neglected. These things if ye know, happy are ye if ye do them. Here is the labor and difficulty, here is the comfort and felicity, the conjunction of practice with knowledge. The end of speculation, is operation: We are created not to know, but to do good works. Who praiseth a Horse that feeds well, and is good for nothing else; neither for speed, nor length; Race, nor travail?

Obedience joined with knowledge, shall have double honor, because God is doubly honored in them. Cornelius, a man fearing God, and giving Alms; the Centurion, that hath built a Synagogue; Dorcas, that made garments for the poor; C•i•s, the Hoste of the Church: these were rich stiles of commendation, and shall have far richer favors of retribution. Come ye blessed, for you have done me good: for such deeds, God is blessed of men; and in their deeds, such men shall be blessed of God. But where is plenty of knowledge, and penury of good works, God is blasphemed; as if he had wanted fore-sight in the bestowing of his gifts. These things if ye know, cursed are ye if ye do them not. God shall re•rd every man according to his works, not according to his knowledge. The discourse of faith and godliness, are but dry things, to the practice. Search all over the Scripture, and see if any Covenants or Grants were made to Knowing, and not all to Doing. It was the ancient tenor of the Law, Do this, and live. The Gospel says, Believe, and live; which implies an act to be done: and that act draws on many consequent fruits. Not he that saith, Lord, Lord, but he that doth the will of my Father, shall enter into Heaven. If a man had all the Vatican in his head, and could repeat every syllable of the Bible; without living after it, he had better have never heard of it.

They put a stumbling-block before others, both the weak within, and the wicked without: they buy by one Ballance, and sell by another; prescribe a good Rule, and live by a bad: unclean beasts, for all their chewing of the cudde, their repeating of Sermons; because they divide not the hoof, walk without all difference. As if men had eyes for no other purpose, but to be raking in gutters, and puddles, and kennels: their knowledge serves them, to choose out the most sordid pollutions. Men loath the good Light of such Candles, for the stink which the Tallow yields: as the poor Indians resolved, What Religion soever the Spaniards were of, they would be of the contrary: thinking it not possible, that such cruel and bloody deeds could proceed from any true Religion. The Infidel disputes against the Faith, the impious lives against it: both deny it; the one in terms, the other in deeds: both are enemies to the Gospel. But of the two, it is worse to kick against the Thorns we see, than to stumble in the dark at a Block which we see not. It shall go ill with sinful Pagans, but worse with wicked Christians. How will they in Hell curse their knowledge; and unprofitably wish, that they had been borne Idiots, and never so much as heard of Christ? For the honor of God, for the peace of conscience, and for the salvation of our own dear souls; let not this glorious Light be a means to cast us, like unprofitable servants, into outer darkness: and drive us to say with the Poet; Cur aliquid vidi? or with Job, Quare misero data est lux! Why was the Light given unto me? Thrice blessed souls, wherein the Tree of sincere knowledge is rooted, and the Worm of security and contempt hath not eaten up the fruit of it. The Lord shall in this life water it with the dew of Heaven, and at last plant it in his most glorious Paradise of joy.

2 PET. 2.22.

But it is happened unto them according to the true Proverb; The Dog is turned to his own vomit again, and the Sow that was washed, to her wallowing in the mire.

Still doth the Apostle proceed in a further conviction of Apostasy: so odious is it to revolt from that Truth, to which men have bound themselves by holy Covenant. This is a Returning indeed: first, they were all turned from God and their creative goodness in Adam: then, their Maker called them by his grace in Christ, and they turned again to him: now lastly, from this grace, they are returned to the state of sin; a Returning in the worst sense: God send them yet another Turn, That they may return from this wretched condition, to repentance. Young Plants bend their bodies with the wind, and grow that way which those violent blasts incline them: a Northern wind inclines them to the South, a Southerne wind bends them Northward: but when they are become sturdie Trees, they grow according to their former position: a new wind may stir their boughs, and leaves, it cannot alter their bulks and bodies, unless it be such an one as came to Elias, that redds up their very roots. So desperate is it to be rooted in sin, and to grow on stubbornly warped to disobedience. Let a Mountain be covered with Snow all Winter-long (◊) when the Sun in the Spring doth cast his beams upon it, the Snow melts; and of the water distilling from the Snow, arise great floods. The Ice and Snow which a cold heart contracts in the Winter of stupefying sin, are dissolved by the bright rays which the Eye of Heaven, the Sun of Righteousness reflects upon it; and fall into penitent tears. But the heart that was frozen in the Winter, and begins to thaw in the Spring; if by a new unseasonable Cold it gathers a second hardness, and becomes congealed in Summer, like Snow or Ice in a Vault or deep Pit, which antiperistically waxeth cold, for the neighbouring heat: here is no means left for repentance▪ for the very moisture that should make tears, is turned into obduratenesse. It must be a miraculous and extraordinary heat of grace, that thawes such an heart.

A Sheep is untoward enough to drive in the way; but when it is once strayed out of the way, and re-entangled, this requires more pains in the Shepherd, to reduce it: yea, so it troubles him, that sometimes in anger he lets it even alone. Sinners may so weary the invincible patience of God, that he will say of them, as he did of Ephraim: Ephraim is joined to Idols, let him alone. But when they that were Sheep, become Beasts of a worse nature, and degenerate into Dogs and Hogs; this more incenseth him. When that great Shepherd of Israel comes to look for the Sheep he made, and finds them transformed into Curses and Swine; how can he own them? Not, but that he made such creatures; but he never made them such creatures. The Spirit of God so detests gross turpitudes, that he sticks not to shadow them out by the most homely comparisons. He does not only call them the worst of men, but Beasts; and the worst kind of Beasts, Hogs and Dogs: and these in their worst actions, their natural, unnatural filthiness; the Dog licking up his own vomit, the Hog wallowing in the dunghill: and that in the worst manner and season of these actions; Post potionem canis, post lotionem porcus: the one, after his digestion; the other, after her washing. The Dog resumes that with greediness, which he disgorged with sickness: the Sow is but lately made clean, and presently returns to the mire. Nor is this strange and rare, though it be loathsome; but familiar and customary with them, and noted by a Proverb.

The general parts appear to be two; a Conclusion, and a Comparison. In the Conclusion are two particulars: first, the verity of the Proverb; A true Proverb: secondly, the verification of it, in them; It is happened unto them according. In the Comparison there be two creatures, two actions, two objects. The creatures are both Beasts, their actions or motions are both returnings, their objects are both filthy; vomit, and mire.

To begin with the verity of the Proverb. The first and second King of Peace taught much by Parables and Proverbs. Parables are dark speeches, till they be expounded: like stars, the thickest and darkest part of their Orbes, till they be enlightened. Proverbs are plain and pithie expressions of evident truths. Solomon wrote three thousand Proverbs; the choice Rules of his divine Arts, Ethickes, Politickes, Oeconomickes; for the government of Behaviour, Common-wealth, Family. No doubt, he had also his Physickes and Metaphysickes, and Herbals: for of mere man, since Adam, there never was so great an Herbalist; who wrote, from the Cedars of Lebanon, to the moss on the wall: neither did the vegetables, nor irrational creatures, escape his discourse. Only it pleased the wisdom of God to bereave mankind of his profound Commentaries of Nature; but to reserve his Divine Morals, to out-live the world: as knowing, that those would but feed men's curiosity; these would both direct his life, and judge it. The Lord hath done this, in expectation of our good, and his own glory: which if we answer, the benefit is ours. He was the royallest Philosopher, the wisest King; and hath given us those Precepts, which the Spirit of God gave him. From him is this Proverb derived; who so well understood the nature of these Beasts, that he could draw experimental observations from them, and make them useful to the best reason of man. Good Proverbs are commended to us for five special excellencies, wherein they transcend other discourses:

1. For their Antiquity. The sayings of our Fathers and Ancestors have a reverend estimation among us: nor do we wrap them up in the Bundle of our ordinary Lessons, but preserve them as dear Relics of their happy memories. As Motto's in the Heraldrie of Arms descend to their Heirs, together with their Honors, and brook not alteration. This was the saying of my Father, or Grandfather: how awful an impression doth it make in the heart of the posterity? Antiquiora, nobiliora. An Egyptian Priest thus twitted Solon: You Grecians are ever children; you have no knowledge of antiquity, nor antiquity of knowledge. Certainly, there be many precious Jewels locked up in the Casket of antiquity. It hath been said, that Age appeareth best in four things; old Wood best to burn, old Wine best to drink, old Friends best to trust, and old Authors best to read: and of those old Authors (let me add the piece of a fifth) old Proverbs best to be observed. We call them Old-said Sawes; matters seen by the wisdom of the Ancients.

2. For their brevity: They are concise and compendious, and so more portable for the memory. Tedious discourses induce a lassitude on the memorative faculty, and fall like violent showers upon a steep hill, which as suddenly fall off: whereas fine dews abide, and cause fertilitie. Many a one says, when he hears a pithie Apothegme, or material Proverb; I shall remember this as long as I live. Not that I would have discourses of the Lacedemonian Last, who used to speak all Laconicâ brevitate; which being in Empire, they might do by authority. But Epaminondas answered them home: when after a defeat, they made an invective speech against him of some length; he stood up and said no more, But I am glad we have taught you to speak long. Proverbs are for ornament, not for the whole stuff: Pearls grace a garment; but it were a strange garment made of nothing but Pearls. We will make thee Borders of Gold, with Studdes of Silver: Studdes and Borders; the Vesture it self is made of another piece. The words of the wise are as Nayles: Nayles finish the Building; other materials went before. Otherwise we may say of a Speech, as Nero did of his Master Seneca's style; It is like Mortar of Sand, without Lime; or a Body made all of bones, without nerves, sinews, ligaments, and a skin; most ugly to behold. But when Proverbs are used as Ornaments, Summes, and Corollaries, brief and happy conclusions; they both leave a deeper impression in the heart, and take a stronger hold of the head.

3. For their Significancie; comprehending much matter in few words. They are called Mucrones verborum, pointed speeches: yet not Riddles and Paradoxes, hard to be understood: but no less familiar, than profound: as intelligible, as succinct. If they were enigmaticall, their shortness could not make amends for their darkness: they would be more troublesome for the capacity, than esie for the memory. But these be plain and brief expressions of our meanings. Otherwise, as Arras that is spread abroad, shows us fair Images and Portraitures: but being contracted and wrapped up together, it is like Packes. All Countries have Proverbs familiar to themselves; whose uses are sometimes confined to their own Orbes. Yea, there be some, which we wish determined with their own coasts, or rather extermined out of all coasts; profane, senseless, superstitious Proverbs. Live an honest man, and die a Beggar: profane! for to live otherwise, is the way to die an infamous Caitiffe. Every man for himself, and God for us all: senseless! it overthrows all charity and common society on earth. Indeed, if we be not one for another, God will be against us all. The nearer the Church, the further from God: Atheistical! it would cut the throat of all holy Profession. But we cannot come into a Perfumers shoppe, and not carry away some of the sweetness. Ignorance is the mother of devotion: a Proverb digged out of the dark Cavernes of Hell; intended to stupefy the Conscience, by putting out the Eye of Knowledge. A young Saint, an old Devil: a devilish Proverb! it would rob God of the prime of our youth, under color lest we should not yield him our rotten age: it forbids us to be good at first, for fear of not being good at last. But the Spirit of Wisdom hath other manner of Proverbs: Teach a child in his youth, &c. Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth. Wherewithall shall a young man cleanse his way? These be the Proverbs of grace, the other are the a•ages of Hell.

4. For experience: the Sages have tried that doctrine themselves, which they commend to others. I gave my heart to know wisdom: upon all Solomon's rules and medicines of the soul, he did set a Probatum est. Proverbs are the extracts of experience, wrought out by practice: Credimus expertis. They paid for their experience, we have them without expense; as if we did feed at another's cost. One soweth, and another reapeth. Our progenitors purchased lands with their moneys, and left them to us for inheritances: and they purchased rules by dear experience, and left them to us for holy legacies. Solomon receives from David, Consilium simul & coronam: Keep the charge of the Lord thy God that thou mayest prosper. Himself had found the sweetness of a good conscience, and now he commends it to his Successor. If Solomon were wise, David was good: and if old Solomon had well remembered the counsel of old David, he had not so foul-lie miscarried. We are miserably unthankful, if we scorn to be wise good cheap. Thou thinkest to gain: by lying; but remember the proverb; A poor man is better than a liar. Or to grow rich with falsehood; but remember the Proverb; The bread of deceit is sweet, but if fills the mouth with gravel. Or to insinuate by flattery; but this shall be a curse unto thee. Or to thrive by covetousness; but the Proverb says no to it, This shall tend unto poverty. There is a Proverb for the lazy, and here is a proverb for the filthy; The Dog turneth to his •••ite again. For the direction of our manners, I would we were better acquainted with these holy Proverbs: so vice could not assault us, but we were able proverbially to repel it; as Christ flung a Scriptum est in the face of the Tempter.

5. Lastly, for their Truth: false proverbs are Satan's Logic; which he hopes, will be received for their wit, though they savor not of honesty or verity. It is no shame to steal, but to bring it home again: false! for it is better to abide shame in this world, than be condemned to everlasting shame and sorrow in the world to come. Wealth is the best wisdom; false! for God calls the rich man a Fool. He that knows not to dissemble, knows not to live: false! a coozening proverb that teacheth coozenage: for God takes none up into his Mountain, but such in whose lips is found no guile. Do as the most do, and the fewest will find fault: but God chargeth us not to follow a multitude in evil; and the broad way hath most passengers, yet it leads to hell. Serve the times; wicked counsel! we are made to serve God. It is safe being of the Kings Religion: impiously false! Jeroboam by this made Israel to sin. There can be no safety without faith, there is no faith without a promise, and no promise is made <◊> disobedience. If thou offend because thou art commanded, thou shalt go to hell because thou hast offended.

There is a number of these false proverbs: but that which is dictated by the Holy Ghost, hath both Divine verity and authority: we need not rack our faith to believe it, nor put ourselves to the cost and pain to try it. When pride comes, shame comes: Idleness shall bring poverty: envy shall wast the marrow of the bones: drunkenness shall sting like a Serpent: these be true proverbs: let them instruct us, lest they be fulfilled upon us.

To conclude this point: Proverbs are not only ornaments, but especial arguments of a discourse: whereof wisdom is neither so niggardly as that any guest should complain, nor yet so prodigal as to cloy their stomachs. Dainty dishes are wont to be sparingly served out: homely ones supply in their bigness what they want in their worth. Brevity, where it is neither obscure nor defective, is very pleasing even to the quaintest ears. As some affect to have great personages drawn in little Tablets, or as we see the countries of the world, worlds of countries, described in the compass of small mappes: or Iliades in a nut-shell: so most men desire much good counsel in a narrow room. Frustrà st per plura, quod fieri potest per panciora. The powers of good advice being thus united, are the stronger; and brevity makes counsel more portable for memory, and readier for use. Let us observe the Proverbs of God, lest God make us a proverb to the world: Job became poor to a proverb, yet he was restored. But the Lord threatens Israel, that for their disobedience and revolting, he would make them a proverb and a by-word to the nations. Happy are we, if proverbs, parables, or any way of Doctrine can bring us to holiness and salvation.

It is happened unto them:] This is the verification of the proverb: there hath been, and will be found still some such unclean beasts to justify it. But woe unto them the whiles: The Son of man goeth as it was determined, but woe unto that man by whom he is betrayed. Offences will come, but woe to him through whom they come. Hogs and Dogs will return to their old filthiness; but woe unto those men that shall degenerate into such brutish qualities. It becomes them worse than those beasts, and a far worse end shall come unto them than unto beasts. The beasts perish that they may vanish; but these perish to perish. There is not an example of God's fearful judgment upon apostasy and unrepented wickedness in all his holy Book, but the like or worse shall betide them. Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. There is not a curse on all mount Ebal, nor a plague threatened in any of those sacred leaves, whereof they may not likewise perish. There is no judgment on earth, no torment in hell, from which they can plead a privilege. If these things be dreadful to hear, how horrible will they be to feel? They begin with mirth, and proceed in jollity, and never think of sorrow: but their end shall be in such desperate sorrow, that they shall never think of comfort. Their weeping shall much exceed their laughing: all their joys are momentary, but there shall be no end of their woes; tears shall not fail continually to gush from their eyes, nor shall they ever be wiped off. If they were put to shed but one tear for every year they remain in that bottomless dungeon; yet those tears would swell to a greater number and measure than there be drops of water in the Ocean. Though we cannot number the drops of water in the sea, yet God can tell precisely how many they be to a drop. But the tears and sorrows in hell are past all numeration, for they are infinite. And who would buy a spurt of sensual pleasures with the sense of everlasting torments? Let them wallow in their sins like beasts; but let us mourn for our sins like Turtles, and chatter like Cranes; not •yring our souls after they are washed with tears. And then the streams of Jordan shall be divided before us, and we shall pass with comfort and thanksgiving to our Canaan of blessedness. They that sow in tears, shall reap in joy.

The Dog is turned to his own vomit again; and the Son that was washed, to her wallowing in the mire.]
First, I am to speak of the two creatures; and of them Conjunction and Division. Together considered, we have two observations:

1. Sin doth liken men to beasts, to sordid beasts, and that in their basest filthiness. If men do sensual acts, let them not think scorn to be called beasts; for beasts would scorn such sensual deeds if they were turned to men. Beasts cannot sin, for they had no Law; and where is no commandment, there can be no transgression. Man hath a Law, reason to obey that Law, knowledge of grace to guide his reason; yet he often does things whereof the very beasts would be ashamed: and if they had the privilege of Balaam's Ass, they would open their mouths to reprove their impotent governors. The Ox knows no owner but man, and him he doth acknowledge: had he the like knowledge with us of his Maker, he would worship him better than doth his Master. We find the beasts praised for thankfulness and obedience; we read them not charged with wickedness: they groan under our corruptions, ours causally, their own only passively. Quid meruistis oves? Man that is in honor, and understandeth not, is like unto the beasts that perish: he is like them in death, not like them after death. For they at once cease to be miserable, and to be at all: which is a far better condition, than to end a short beginning of pleasure, and to begin an endless end of sorrow. And if those creatures that survive at the final and universal dissolution of the world, be restored to that primordially state and dignity which they had in the Creation; as some have probably conjectured: then how happy shall it be with them, in comparison of damned reprobates? They have a renewed and beautified Earth, whereas the other are jayled up in the dark and stinking Dungeon of Hell. How must it vex the wicked, to think, that a Stone or Tree shall be preferred before them? How will they vainly wish to change conditions with those creatures, which in the pride of their life they have contemned and abused? It is high time for us to convert and amend our lives, or we are in worse case than the very Dog that lies under our Tables.

The rich Churl denied Lazarus crumbs, the Dogs licked his sores: when those Dogs are extinct and gone, their Master is begging a drop of water, to ease his torments. Who sees this, and would not refuse to be that rich man; yea, not rather choose (of the twain) to be that rich man's Dog? Let us not be like the Apostate Jews, that offer up their beasts to God in the way of sacrifice, and themselves to Satan in the way of service. Sure those beasts were in better case than their masters, and had a fairer honor. But now, how odious are those sins, which can thus transform men into beasts? The Poets labored of their fabulous Metamorphoses, and monstrous mutations, turning men into brutish substances. We will not so far discredit their judgments, as to think, that those mis-shapen Dreams had no further scope: their Moral intended to show, how far vice is able to bestialize men. When Circes had turned Vlysses his followers into beasts, and Vlysses had again obtained of her, that they might come back to men, if they would; custom had so far corrupted nature, that they refused to return to that prerogative and excellency of kind by choice, from which they were estranged by necessity. They preferred the Simples of the field before the Drugges of the Apothecary. Yea, they alleged reasons against such a regression: as that now they were not distracted with cares, but content with present supplies: they know their friends from their foes, by nature:

they could skill their own diet, their own Physic, and neither trouble Cook, nor trust Physician. Therefore they utterly renounced the benefit of Circes grant, and desired Vlysses that he would not press them with the re-accepting of reason. How many are called by the Word of Grace from their brutish sensuality, and deny it? What, make them men? No, they thank you as much as if you did, they had rather be beasts still. We would not have our Horse turned into a Toad, because we think that a worse creature; nor our Dog into a Serpent: but our bodies be better than our beasts, our souls than our bodies; and yet filthy sin is able to turn them into Leprosies, into carcasses. Corrupt nature sits upon the soul, like a Tubbe whelmed on a grasseplot: whereby not only the grass or remnants of original goodness wither away; but many an ugly Toad, Evet, Sow-worm, and such venomous vermin continually breed. Insomuch that the dampish and sour vapors of a new opened vault are not more offensive to us, than such polluted souls be to God. And his grace only can overturn the Tubbe, make the vermin fly from us, or die in us, that fresh flowers may spring up in the plot.

2. God made us little inferior to Angels, and we make ourselves little superior to beasts. Who would have thought that had seen Adam sitting like an universal monarch, and summoning all creatures before him, to receive from him their names, as they did from God their natures; that any son of Adam should become baser than all those creatures? That man, taming and subduing the Dog and Swine to his use and service, should through his own folly become worse than they? Was this our eagerness to perke above our creative condition? Ye shall be as God's: Thou liest Satan, they shall rather be as beasts. The mark whereat our first parents roved, was equality with God: the bow wherewith they shot, was vain-glory: the shafts, aspiring thoughts, fethered with misbeleefe, and drawn out of the quiver of inconstancy: the wind that carried them beyond the mark, was misprizing of God: Satan himself gave the aim: the woman undertook to make the wager: Adam was persuaded to shoot the match: then came disobedience and struck up the game. Thus they lost the stake, eternal life: yea more, for their arrow rebounded from the mark (which was too impenetrable) and recoiled upon themselves with shame, remorse, horror, and banishment from bliss. Thus were they wounded with their own arrows shot upward; and could not be cured till Christ was wounded for them; and that by the arrows of God's wrath, when he hung on the cross as a mark in the But. Saint Aug. says that Eve took up sin from Satan, by loan, at first upon her own bare word: Adam by his unadvised consent subscribed to the Bond: Vsura crevit posteritati, the burden of the interest lies upon their posterity: they that inherit their parents goods, must pay their parents debts. Adam sinned, but he fell not alone: the fault was his, the fine is ours: and so we have the success of that unhappy match, wherein man would shoot with his Maker.

What gained Pan by comparing with Apollo? or Arachne with Minerva? Silenus with Mercury? or Phaeton by menaging the teame of Phoebus, though he were his father? Or Icarus by mounting up with his waxen wings, though directed by Daedalus? or Farfalla, the poor fly, who for love of the light, would be sporting with the flame? or the Satyrs that presumed but to kiss the coals in token of humility, which were kindled by Prometheus? or the bird, that for more security would needs build her nest within the circle of the Sun? All which fictions were but resemblances of man's ambition, who contended to be like his Maker. Still doth mankind labor of this disease: and while they would be wiser than the Angels, they become more foolish than the beasts. Thus we rely upon our own crazy hopes, which the Prophet compares to the shelter of a naked hedge in a frosty night: or depend upon the title of a Tenant, which holds neither by soccage, nor Knights service; but by sufferance and courtesy at will: when as we might have a state from the Lord of Lord's, paying but the fine and rent, faith and obedience; not for three lives, or one and twenty years, but for ourselves and our heirs forever. Who craves favor of the Jailor, that may surely receive it at the hand of the Prince? Who would be at the trouble to dignity a deep pit, that hath ready prepared a clear fountain?

These be our two evils, (for mischiefs at least come by couples) to forsake the fountain of living waters, for waterless Cisterns, dry Pits: Pits indeed; and such, wherein we may sooner famish a Joseph, than take up a Jeremiah. Thus is man a Beast, by his knowledge: yea, I would that only Ignorance had thus transformed us, and not flagitious filthiness. Our brutishness consists in our wickedness: we were borne sinners, but we have made ourselves Dogs and Swine. O that this could work in us a just estimation of sin! How then would our souls abhor that, for which God doth abhor our souls! She that hath any tolerable opinion of her own fairness, seeks not to corrupt her face with foul aspersions: yea, she will rather help it with art, than spoil it with neglect. We are unreasonable souls, if we make no more account of the beauty of our conscience, than so to pollute it with sordid lusts, that the great Prince, our Suitor, must needs in scorn and detestation turn from us. It was a resolute answer of a Lover, when the Virgin whom he had long (unprevailingly) affected, had now prostituted her self to another; and after that yielding to him, but perceiving his coldness, challenged him of inconstancy; Idem ego, non eadem 〈◇〉 : I loved a Virgin, I never promised to marry a Strumpet. Decked bodies are for Kings Courts: and not sluttish, but fair, pure, holy souls, are for the Bride-chamber of Christ.

Thus of them together; now severally. First, the Dog hath many good qualities, and is divers ways useful and serviceable to man: either for our pleasure, in hunting other beasts; or profit, in defending our houses and goods: yet still he is a Dog. A wicked man loseth not his substance, or faculties, so that he ceaseth to be specifically a man: but he ceaseth to be a good man. There is such a corruption diffused through all those powers and faculties, that he is a wicked one. God's common gifts are not denied to the very reprobates: the Tyrians may be curious Embroiderers, Tertullus famous for eloquence, the children of this world wise in their generations; Achitophel may give shrewd counsel, and policy be found in a Machiavel. These natural endowments, improved by art, are truly the gifts of God; and such he gives even to them that be his enemies. Yea, divers moral virtues may appear, where saving grace is not. So we may find in them that magnanimity, which is magna potius quàm bona: that justice, which will give every man his own, but cares not to give God his own. Respect of their credit teaches them to pay their debts, while they think it no discredit to rob Christ. Divers civil men will not be drunk: they abjure intemperance for fear of sickness, not out of conscience. The foundation of all this virtue is weak; a mere self-respect, not in relation to God. The Dog loves his master, but it is because he feeds him: so sinners flatter their Patrons, but it is a collateral love; their main scope, is themselves. They refrain the doing of some evils, not because they would not, but because they dare not.

To render good for good, is human; evil for evil, is belluine; evil for good, is devilish. If they do not the last, which is the work of Devils; yet they allow the next, which is the mind of Beasts. And for the first; not to return evil, they think requital sufficient for any good received. The Fox got the Crane to pluck a bone out of his throat, wherewith he was almost choked; the Crane did it, and then required a reward: but the Fox replied, That he had sufficiently rewarded her, in that he did not bite off her head when he had it in his mouth. But now to render good for evil, which is Christian; this is a Lesson which they omit to learn, or learn to omit. Thus though Dogs fawn, and lick, and sent, and hunt, and give warning; yet still they are Dogs: unregenerate men may have excellent knowledge, and arts, and faculties; yet still they are sinners.

Our Apostle here compares them to Dogs, for one special act of filthiness: let me borrow by the way so much liberty, as to tell you, that in some other respects there is a likeness:

1. For barking; men that delight in snarling at others, are therefore called Cynicks. Hypsiphiles Dogs will bark at the Moon: and bunglers will quest when there is no game. Dogs do not always bark prae feritate, for cursnesse; but sometimes prae consuetudine, for custom. And some men swear, detract, rail, because they know no other language. A dumb Dog is useless, but a biting cur is mischievous. Such a Dog was Shimei: how well was that cur worthy of stones, who both did cast stones, and speak stones against David and his army? The husbandmen (in the Apologue) were commanded to tie up all their Dogs, that their Lord's game might not be marred, by their disquieting of those wilder beasts. But in the mean time, those Farmers fruits were spoiled and destroyed; while the Hart of ambition, the Boar of voluptuousness, the Fox of imposture, the Wolf of oppression, and the little Coney of adulation, might range undisturbed. Some Satyrs and Cynickes are not unnecessary; for they reach Authority to apprehend those thieves wheratt they are still barking. The Pasquin on Tyber tells Rome of her faults: Pope Adrian the sixth was angry at it, and threatened to have that bawling cur thrown into the river. But one wittily answered, that that was no good course: for then the Dog would turn frog; and whereas now he barked only by day, then he would never linne croaking both day and night. But those Dogs, whereof David complained, that are always grinning at the corners of the streets, snarling at all passengers, and vellicating all actions with their venom-mouthed murmurs; that no great man, no good man can escape their slanders; deserve like Shepherds cures, to have their teeth beaten out, to prevent their biting: yea, and their chops muzzled for fear, of opening. Beware of these Degs.

2. For flattering: the Dog is a fawning creature: but sycophants are worse Dogs; whose tongues do more hurt than their teeth; and make deeper festering wounds with their lickings, than with their bitings. These be called the Court-dogs, that wait upon great Persons. Flattery and Treachery are but two names of one vice, attired in two sundry suits of mischief. For flattery is but gilded treason; poison in an enameld cup. It is an evil more tame, not less dangerous. It had better for many Princes not to have been, than to have been in their conceits more than men. For this unnatural tumour they may thank those mealmouthed Dogs. Trechery spills the blood, flattery spills the virtues of the rich and noble, yea even of Kings. That takes them from others, this bereaves them of themselves. That, in spite of the actors, doth but change their crown, this steals it from them forever. How many have been so bewitched with the enchantments of their parasites; as to allow Temples, Statues, Altars, and Sacrifices, dedicated to the greatness of their glories? Now all their actions must be good, comely and with a grace. Nothing can come from them that is worthy of blame, unworthy of admiration. Their very blemishes are beauty, their errors witty, their paradoxes divine, their humors justice, their excesses heroical. Such is the houndish servilitie of base minds, that will persuade others of that, which themselves laugh to see belayed; But virtue ever scorns to borrow the false colors of adulation; and will break those glasses which shall present her a face not her own. If we were not all self-love, we would banish there as the most mischievous Curs.

3. There be more resemblances of these canine properties; which I will but touch, because they are out of the Center of the argument. First, There is Caninus appetitus, a greedy and insatiate covetousness, which devours a man and his heritage. Tantum in terris ingurgitant, quod non nisi apud inferos digerunt. What they swallow on earth, they digest in hell. These be greedy Dogs, that can never have enough. The overcharged Dog must needs vomit; and Though they have swallowed down riches, they shall vomit them up again, God shall fetch it out of their bellies. That is a ravenous Dog, which devours more than he can put over: but worldlings have such a greedy worm, that they labor of a Nunquam satis. Secondly, there is caninus somnus: the dissembling hypocrite sleeps dog-sleep. You will trust him with the fold, as confident that he will do no harm: turn but your back, and have at a Lamb: the sheep-keeper becomes a sheepbiter. Thirdly, there is Canina servilitas: hold up a crust, the Dog comes fawning: hold up a cudgell, he run away leering. Let God multiply his blessings on the wicked, that they may be rich with ease, and merry with riches; and so long he is their good Master. But if he comes with affliction, poverty, and trouble, to correct them for their faults; they are gone to seek a new master. Yea, some kind of Dogs, as they report of Spaniels, are the better for beating, and will love the hand that struck them. But ungodly men are the worse for all God's chastisements; and the anvil is the harder for all the blows.

There is also a base cruelty mong Dogs; they will take the strongest part against the weakest: that if two set upon a third, and wrong him, all the Curses in the Town will do the like. To tread down the poor, to persecute the smitten, gravatis addere gravamina, is a merciless Dog-trick. A fault wherewith the land is justly charged, and whereof I would it were discharged, when the weakest are put to the walls; as if there be a contusion in one of the members, all the ill humors in the body run thither to make it worse. Thus as if the Ile of Dogs were broke loose, as if the bandogs of Satan and Antichrist were no more restrained, as if the most were borne under the Dog-star, we may call these (too truly) Dog-days; full of barking clamours, and biting furies; Caicula persecutionis, as Tertullian called it: and those Dogs that should be glad of the scrappes which fall from the servants board, now snatch away the bread of the children. They have me in derision, whose fathers I would have disdained to set with the Dogs of my flock: they deride, and lode him with contumelies, whom in his prosperity he would have scorned to make his Dog-keepers. But without shall be Dogs, they must lie without doors, and scarce be favored with kennels. Let us pray with David; Deliver my darling from the power of the Dog; that we neither suffer under his malice, nor partake of his bad qualities.

The Hog is not without some good properties: there is no creature not endued with some goodness in the kind: though nature be corrupted, it is not abolished. He that made all things valde bona, exceeding good, kept them by his providence from being prorsus mala, altogether evil. First, Hogs will be kept in order by the Hardsman, and fall under a kind of discipline: to the conviction of those men, who will not be bounded by the lawful authority of their superiors. A King that hath a great multitude to govern, Tutior essee Pastor ursorum et Tigridum, might as safely be a keeper of Bears and Tigers. The Lion will kiss his keeper, the Elephant will be ruled and led about by little Dwarf; sine will obey the whistle; but man is an indomable creature. Secondly, Swine are naturally apprehensive of wind and weather, by an engrafted knowledge: and run crying home before the storm, seeking shelter in their coats and flies. Sinnefull men do not foresee the judgments of God, but run on their ungracious courses, till they be overtaken with the tempest of vengeance. But my argument is their filthiness: and here (not to prevent the principal quality touched by the Apostle, their wallowing in the mire) observe, first, that the hog is a churlish creature, grudging any part of his meat to his fellows. And have we no such hoynish men, whose insatiate eye envies every morsel that enters into their neighbors mouth? Secondly, the Swine is ravenous, and devouring all within his reach: a fit emblem of worldly men, who because they have no inheritance above, engross all below: nor is there any means to keep them quiet, till they see no more to covet. The still Sow eats up all the draffe, but if you vex these hoggish men, they will leave there own food to take away yours.

Swine are ever rooting in the ground, and destroying the very means of increase. If the covetous could have their wills, the whole Earth should not yield a handful of Corn, but that which grows on their own Lands, or lies moulding in their Garners. Their affections, the looks of their souls, are still groveling, and digging in the Earth, their proper Element; as if they would make a way to the Antipodes, for the finding out of golden Mines. Fourthly, if the Hog be troubled, he sets up his bristles, and foames with anger. Such a savage impatience possesseth many hearts, that with fierce wrath they foam at their mouths, and strike with their tushes, and supply the defect of their words, with wounds. Fifthly, the Hog cannot endure to be handled: offer but to touch him, he grunts and cries, because he thinks it can be with no good meaning towards him. The Sheep being taken with man's hand, is patient; because she knows that she shall but lose a little Wooll, and so be let go again: the Cow stands till the hand hath stroked her, knowing that Milk is to be taken from her, which was her burden: the Horse yields to the Bridle, and the Dog to the Couple, mistrusting no harm, but only the present use of their service. But the Hog is guilty of his own barrenness, that he hath neither Milk, nor Wooll, nor any other commodity acceptable to the Taker, but his life; and therefore suspects every touch for death. The covetous man, while he lives, is nec Deo gratus, nec homini utilis, and he knows it; being conscious of his many iniquities and injuries, but of no good quality, for which he should be desired. Therefore he trembles at every approach of death; because then there will be a dissipation of his hoards, a Gaole-deliverie of his imprisoned riches: the poor will rejoice, his executors fill their Purses, the world is glad of his riddance; only his body must be tumbled into the earth, and his soul hurried by fiends into torments. This is the miserable condition of these reasonable Hogs: they are ringed and yoked for the present; restrained by Divine Providence from doing all their intended mischiefs: any excellent Art or singular quality in them, is but like a Ring of Gold in the snout of a Swine. At last, when they are saginated and franked, their turn comes to bleed, and that by the knife of an unmerciful murderer.

Saint Jerome tells us, that the Hog hath three properties which no other living creature hath besides. First, he eats of more diversity of meats than any other. Kine feed on grass, not on flesh: Dogs feed on flesh, not on grass: but no food comes amiss to the Swine; he feeds on all. The ambitious is all for honor, the voluptuous for pleasure, the malicious for revenge, the proud for praise: the covetous is for all; all is fish that comes to his Net. Secondly, the more a Hog is adorned, still the more unhandsome: put a garland about the neck of a Sow, decke her with flowers, and the pride of May, hang her with jewels and ornaments; she appears so much more ugly. The more cost that God is at with worldlings, the less worship: the more they have to feed on, the leaner and more ill-favored they look. Such an one cares more to fill his eye, than his belly. All his honors sit on his back as the Caparisons of a Horse upon an Ass; and he appears like an Ape clad in Scarlet. Midas his Gold cannot hide his large ears. Nabal's feast, like a King, at the sheering of his three thousand Sheep in Carmel, cannot keep him from being a man of Belial. Thirdly, the Hog never looks up to Heaven, but he cries: lay him on his back, and he cries continually. So the worldling hath all his delight downward; his thoughts are downward, his desires downward. From the earth ariseth all his felicity; and to the earth he repayes all his devotion, thanks, and duty. He cannot look up to heaven with any comfort; he knows he hath no patrimony there: he hath laid up no treasure within those glorious doors; no prayers, no alms, to entertain him in that Court: yea, from thence he expects judgments, and wrath, death and vengeance; and therefore whines forth desperate cries, when he is but shown those celestial and immortal riches.

I conclude: These are both sordid and uncleanly beasts, yet there be worse. First, some beasts are profitable alive, not dead: as the Dog or Horse, serviceable while they live, once dead, they are thrown out for carrion. Secondly, some are profitable dead, not alive: as the Hog, that does mischief while he lives; is wholesome food, dead. Thirdly, some are profitable both alive and dead: as the Ox that draws the Plow, the Cow that gives Milk, while they live; and when they are killed, nourish us with their flesh. Fourthly, some are good neither dead nor alive; as the Wolf, noxious in life, and stinking in death. First, men that are profitable living, not dead, are the Politicians, that have subtle heads, without religious hearts: Achitophel did much good to Israel by his counsel; but dying, he left an odious report behind him. Secondly, they that are commodious dead, not living, are the covetous worldlings, that oppress and wrong the poor all their life: only by their death, some good comes of their goods. Thirdly, they that be neither good living nor dead, are the profane and luxurious Epicures; who swallow the fat of the earth into their living bowels, drink the sweat of poor laborers, without returning them so much as crumbs: and by that time they come to die, their estates are quite spent, they have not a Legacy left to give, but their bodies to the worms, and their souls they know not whither. Fourthly, they that be good living and dead, are the charitable: who do not only feed the hungry, and clothe the naked, while they live; but also leave them somewhat to live on, when they are dead. That not only adorn the Gospel with holy lives, but are ready to witness it with their own bloods, and so convert souls by their very deaths. That have shined like Lights in the world, winning others by their good conversations; and taught the way to Heaven by their blessed examples, drawing men to Christ by their sweet encouragements. Happy are we, if we be of this number: so the mercy of God shall shadow us while we live, and the glory of God shall crown us when we die. I come to their actions, which are Returns; where we have two considerable observations:

1. The force of nature: One would think, that the sick Dog should loath that he hath disgorged; that the washed Sow should abhor the mire wherein she wallowed. But the medicining of the one, and cleansing of the other, did not take away their nature; still the one remained a Dog, the other a Hog. If there could have been an alteration of their natures, there would have followed a cessation of these odious qualities. Turn them into Sheep, they will detest both mire and vomit. You may bend a Tree by violence; but when your hand and hold is off, it will return to the former position of crookedness. Want of stomach, or want of drink, may keep the drunkard sober: but let him come to ability of body, and conveniency of being intemperate, and he returns to his old v••ite: nothing can cure him, till his nature be changed. Paul was a ravening Wolf in the evening, the Lord made him a peaceable Lamb in the morning: but as his Name was changed, so was his Nature; otherwise he would have returned to his former disposition. Lock up the Wolf, and your flocks be safe: but if he get loose, ware the Lambes, for he is a Wolf still. The carnal mind is enmity against God: not an enemy, as the vulgar reads it, in the Adjective, or Concrete; for that will neither agree with the Gender of the Substantive, nor with the accenting of it. But Enmitie, in the abstract; noting the excess: as we say of the proud man, There goes Pride. An enemy may be reconciled, enmity cannot: a vicious person may be made virtuous; but vice can never be made virtue. Enmitie is a mutual malevolence: so God hates the flesh, and the flesh hates God: though man by this hatred hurts not God, but himself; for he is God's enemy, non nocendo, sed resistendo. The cause is in us; for Adam was the friend of God, and God was the friend of Adam: This enmity came from sin, which we have cause to bewail with tears of blood. For a creature to hate the Maker, what can be more monstrous? For the Creator to hate the creature, what can be more grievous? The carnal mind is not subject to the Law of God, neither indeed can be.

It is usual for enemies to cross one another. It is not subject, there is contumacie: It cannot be, there is impotency. If the Sun, created to give light, should cast abroad darkness: if the fire, made to give heat, should cool us; we would think it preposterous. All the question betwixt God and man, is but this; whose will should be done. But de his qui faciunt quae non v••i, facit ipse qua vi••e. God chargeth them to do his will, and they will not: they would have their own will stand, but they shall not. Quid tam p••n••o, quam semper ve••e quod nunquam erit, & semper nolle quod nunquam non erit? They shall never obtain what they desire, and they shall ever sustain what they dislike. So then, they that are in the flesh, cannot please God. In the flesh, not that have the flesh in them. We say of a man overcome with anger, he is in heat, of one overcome with Wine, he is in drink: as Simon Peter told Simon Magus; Thou art in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity. Not only these were in him, but he in them. These cannot please God: as Snow can never be made hot, while it is Snow; for fire will dissolve it into water, and then it may be heated, but it ceaseth to be Snow. Carnal men, in that state, cannot please God: change them into a sanctified condition, then they can. Change the nature of these beasts, and then they will put off these filthy habits. But otherwise, the Stone doth not more naturally incline to the Center, than they are proclive to sin: if either of them be stayed, it is by violence.

Thus easy is it to discern Sheep from Hogs and Dogs, as between Muske and a Muck-hill, by the sent; or between Gall and Honey, by the taste. The Bee delights to be among flowers: but no Garden can stay a Dorre; he passeth by all, till he comes to a dunghill. The worldling is Dog-weary of all religious exercises: (Let Christ go into his Garden, to gather Lilies) this is none of his felicity: nothing pleaseth him, till he return to his sensual courses: nor can this be helped, till his dunghill-disposition be altered. Every thing lives according to the kind; the Horse in the pasture, the Fish in the water: present holy things to a carnal heart, either he sleeps, or dislikes; for he is quite out of his element. In diet, that which is one man's meat, is another's poison; because of their different tempers and constitutions. It is impossible for the same creature, to be both a Lion in the forest, and a little Dog in a Ladies lap. Repentance is a change of the mind, and Regeneration is a change of the man: till the first Adam be changed into the second, there is no hope of entering into Heaven. Flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God. All are flesh and blood, but some are not all flesh and blood: there is corruption in the best, but there is something in them beside corruption. The better part, if not the greater part, is the seed of grace; and this shall fructify to life eternal. But they that are all flesh and blood, will return to the works of flesh and blood.

He is an unhappy man, that adviseth with his flesh, for the rule of his life: it is as if a King should call a Traitor to his Council-Table; or as if a man should commit his body and goods to a Bottom, that is steered by such a Pilot, as ever drowns all the passengers. Paul being sent to preach, conferred not with flesh and blood. It was Christ's rule in our alms; Let not the left hand know what the right hand doth: let not the flesh know what the spirit doth: as Abraham would not tell Sara, when he went to offer up Isaac, lest she should dissuade him. The best policy of State, is to dis-arm the Rebell: so let us dis-furnish the flesh of idleness, intemperance, high feeding, pompous clothing; taking away the arms, munition, and artillery; that though it would, it cannot do mischief. The Jews offered up Victi•am pro peccato, let us offer up Peccatum pro victima; not a sacrifice for our sins, but our sins for a sacrifice: this is most acceptable. A City being hard besieged, and not able to hold out, did light upon this policy: in the night-time they took all their dead men, which were many, what with war, and what with famine, and set them upright in their armors on the outside of their walls. The enemy seeing this bold spectacle in the morning, and not suspecting the Stratageme, thought them alive, resolute, and supplied with fresh forces, and so raised the siege. Let as mortify our carnal affections, and set them up in Satan's view, with a resolved defyanace; this will dismay his courage: dead lusts dis-appoint the Devil. The King of Edom removed the siege, by sacrificing his son, his eldest son, that should have reigned in his stead, and that for a burnt-offering to the Devil. The God of Heaven abominates all such unnatural facts: not our sons, but our sins, are the burnt-offerings he requires: such Holocausts shall both remove his judgments, and dis-hearten all the assaults of our spiritual enemies. But alas, can the Leopard change his spots, or the Black-moore whiten his skin? both, as easily as we can alter our own natures. Only He, that can turn the highest mountains into humble valleys, can take away the corruption of our natures; and of unclean beasts, make us holy Lambes unto Jesus Christ.

2. The danger of returning to old sins. We are all conceived on the Sea, and borne upon a shelf, in manifest danger of drowning in the main: there our parents left us, as their parents left them, and our first parents left us all. The undeserved, unexpected Grace of God did lay hold on us in Jesus Christ, and put us off from these quick-sands, in a vessel of Hope, steered by his Ministers, the Compass being his holy Word, and the promise of heaven that shore where we all are to land. Now if we, thus mercifully delivered, shall willfully return to the first danger, and be led by the false marks of gain or pleasure, to those desperate sands, how worthy are we to miscarry? It is true indeed, that the elect cannot turn from God with all their heart; or if they could fail totally, yet not finally. But when we read, Because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by faith: Bee not high minded, but fear. And, Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy Crown: it may provoke us carefully to look over our evidence, that we may be sure. I know there be some that would shake the foundation of a Christian, urging that of Paul; If thou continuest in God's goodness, otherwise thou shalt be cut off; and inferring an absolute proposition from a conditional. As if one should collect thus; If the Sun rise not tomorrow, it will be dark, therefore it will be dark tomorrow. But the Sun holding his course, it will be light: and God's promise holding, which cannot fail, and grace continuing, believers shall not fall from salvation. They as weakly conclude from that of Christ; If those mighty works had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented in sack-cloth and ashes: that a little knowledge had saved them. We might as well presuppose a power of speaking in stones, because our Savior says; If these should hold their peace, the stones would cry out.

Yet let none presume; For if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he also spare not thee. Behold (not thine, but) the goodness of God: if thou be saved, the praise is his: if lost, the fault is thine own. There be two things that carry men away from God; Despair, and Presumption. As the act of seeing is hindered two ways, either by seeing too much light, or no light at all: so the comfort of conscience is prejudiced, either by seeing no mercy, or by seeing nothing else but mercy. To keep us from the one, Despair, let us meditate of that infinite mercy, which never failed the most odious sinners, when they became humble converts. To prevent the other, Presumption, let us remember how God punished relapsing David, the man after his own heart: and Moses, whom he called friend; and that for one fault; and that so secret, that by reading the story we can scarce find it out. This way a thousand perish, for one the other way: Desperation is a course that Satan takes but with few; because it is tedious to flesh and blood, and (not seldom) the occasion of true repentance: and so the Devil is over-shot in his own Bow. But Presumption is pleasing: To fly out when we list, to enjoy our pleasures, to return from our devotions to sensual lusts, and then to be sure of Heaven when we have done; what can sooner win us? Sic redit ad tumidas •a•fraga puppit aquas.

Though we have committed sins, and been bitten by them, and smitten for them: yet forgetting all that anguish, those fears and tears, and sorrows; we return to the cause of all those mischiefs. The Merchant, after a three years voyage to the Indies, hath with many doubtful hazards of Rocks, and Pirates, brought home store of Gold; and is no sooner come ashore, but in one night plays it all away. You will say, He may fetch more; he is not sure of that: but the man is far less sure of regaining God's favor, that hath so prodigally spent it in wantonness.

The Almighty Father hath been our Physician, the glorious Son hath been our Physic, the blessed Spirit hath prepared and applied all to us: shall we now, our willful selves, overthrow the work of all them three, by relapsing into those sicknesses, from which their infinite goodness hath delivered us? Shall the bounty of our Maker fill our Measure with mercy, and shall we still empty it as fast? Hath God nothing else to do with his riches, but to wait upon our riot with supplies? He hath corrected us, and then we came home: again he received us: shall we, after all this, return to our old aberrations, and re-embrace those sins, which did induce upon us his former judgments? Yet alas, so slippery the custom of sin hath made the ways of sin; that if the God of constancy and perseverance should not hold us up, we could not stand one moment. Saint Paul was shipwreck'd thrice, and yet escaped. So do the rocks and sands, the heights and the shallows, the prosperous and adverse fortunes of the world, diversely threaten us; so do our own Leakes endanger us; so do temptations, like Pirates, assault us; so do the Mariners, our own thoughts, mutine within us; that nothing but the everlasting mercy of our God can preserve us. But let us be careful, never to put ourselves aboard with Hymenaeus, nor to make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. Though infirmities overtake us, and God hath graciously warned, My son, thou hast sinned, do so no more: though that which we most earnestly pray against, should fall upon us; a relapse into those sins which we have truly repented, and God hath fully pardoned: yet let us beseech him that is JEHOVAH, and changeth not, that the Spirit of remorse and compunction may never depart from us; yea, that the Spirit of consolation may never forsake us. A Garden once digged, and then let alone, becomes more weedy: a backsliding Christian proves most ungodly. The just shall live by faith: but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him.

The objects to which they return, follow; the first whereof is vomiting. This proceeds from an ill-affected stomach, and a sick stomach from a bad repletion. This may be an argument offensive to the weak, nauseating their stomachs: but to show the odiousness of sin, the Scripture often useth it. And that both literally, when the Prophet applies it to the Drunkards, shameful speeing shall be for their glory: and figuratively, as Z•phar awards it to the oppressor, He hath swallowed down riches, and he shall vomit them up again: God shall cast them out of his belly. Yea, God himself is said to vomit out some kind of sinners, Because thou art luke-warm, I will spew thee out of my mouth. Though he seemed to have received them into his inward parts, because of their formal profession; yet being offensive to his stomach, he spu• 〈◊〉 out: and certainly God will never return to his own vomit. The conscience is to the so•le, is the stomach is to the body: sin doth distemper the one, as unwholesome meat or su•e•s do the other. Both are sick alike, bo•h complain of their burdens vomit is a forcible clearing of the stomach, confession is a voluntary •nloading of the conscience. The Physician prescrib• a medicine, the Patient takes it, and is cased. The Minister chargeth the surcharged soul to confess and acknowledge h's iniquities, he doth so, and is comforted. That man worthily perisheth of his disease, that lets it rankle without revealing it. If we know a burdened conscience, we give it a vomit; He th• hideth hi• 〈〉, shall not 〈...〉 •hat co•f•ss•th and forsaketh them, shall have mercies. No wise man •ill fall upon that dish again, which hath made him dangerously sick: and he is a mad man, that after such disgorging his offense, will return and li•ke up his own vo•it. No less foolish and desperate is that sinner, who having emp•i• his heart of all his troublesome and indigestible faults, by a liberal and frank acknowledgement, shall again willfully relapse into them: what is this, but with the Dog, to return to his 〈〉 vomit?

Saul, as if he were again now entered into the bounds of Naioth in Ramah, prays and prophecies good to him, whom for good he maliced. The Lord reward thee good, for that thou hast done unto me this day: and he lift up his voice and wept. There is no heart made of flesh, which at some time or other relents not: even flint and marble will in some weather stand on drops. Nor can we think those tears and protestations feigned: doubtless, Saul meant as he said; and passed through sensible fits of good and evil. Let no man like himself the better for some good motions; the praise and benefit of these guests is not in the receipt, but in the retention. Who, that had seen this meeting, could but have thought all had been sure on David's side? What can secure us, if not prayers, and tears, and oaths? Yet behold in the loose, Saul goes home, but David and his men go up to the hold. One would think, Saul had emptied his stomach of all those crudities, rage, envy, malice: yet stay awhile, and you see him return to his own vomit, hunting after the blood of the innocent; and gives not over David. The adulterer comes to shrift, pours out all his uncleanness in the ears of his confessor; and now having cleared his mind, returns with the fiercer appetite to his former vomit. The friend of riot and disordered company visites the Church in the forenoone, prostrates his body, and opens his mouth with the congregation, in a general acknowledgement of his (inordinate) sins: and now, as if he were exonerated of all his corruption, and had only made room for more excess by his confession; he re-greets that sin for which he regretted, and falls afresh to his luxurious cups.

I know there be some constitutions so strongly retentive, that scarce physic can procure a vomit: there be stupefied consciences, that will not confess. Let the covetous man hear his unjust practices aggravated to his face; yet custom hath so preoccupied his heart, that he never grows sick upon it; as poison by familiar use, becomes natural food. We cannot say this man returns to his vomit, for that unrighteous Mammon never troubled his dead conscience. But he shall spew once for all; the earth shall spew out his body, his body shall spew out his soul, his soul shall spew out his riches; nothing shall spew out his sins; they shall make him sick forever in a bed of quenchlesse flames. The Law of God, repeated by Christ himself to a rich young man, was but answered, With all these have I kept; it could not bring him to a sense of his sins. All these have I kept? Miserable and false man, he had kept never a one of them; yet he would not be brought to a Vomite. That other Churl talked of filling his barns, not emptying his sins. But for men to disburden their troublesome iniquities, by humble confessions, and then to resume them; as the Viper spues out her poison in Winter, and takes it again in the Spring; this is most dog-like. We may not take the children's bread and throw it to Dogs: such dainties are not for reprobate stomach in the whip and cudgell are for Dogs. The Jews could not give the Gentiles Dogs, and grudged them any of their own meat, as if they should not have sufficient for themselves. But Paul rather compares the Jews to Dogs, and such as lie in the manger, to keep the Gentiles from their foot-pinners, that lie like some churlish currens at the door, to keep away beggared, and hinder them from their Masters alms, should be driven away, that humble suppliants might have access to heaven gates.

〈◇〉 Quis m'debit c'ri res' b' i vomitum? There is no vomiting without pain: man's stomach registers that made him sick, and he feels the headache: his conscience is troubled with the sense of his errors, and he must needs feel heart-ach. Why do we not consider loved 〈◇〉 such a morsel of sin hath cost us, before we suffer it again to pass down our throats? Was not our conscience laden with agonies, and laboring with pangs, more than a travelling woman with waves? Did we not feel a thorn in our most tender, sensible, and vital parts; stinging us at the very heart? Did it not appear like a black bill against us, written without unanswerable debt to an infinite justice? Did it not make us part and roar for the very disquietness of our hearts? Did not sleep forsake our eyes; and after many tumblings and tossings, did we not still complain the want of ease? Did not Satan set us hard with desperation, for a monstrous and (under the name of an) unpardonable sin? Did not our souls weep blood, and our eyes run down with tears? Were we not brought to the pits brink of forlorn unhappiness, before we could feel any comfort of forgiveness? Have we now forgotten all that smart, woe, grief, and horror? Can the short and scarce sensible pleasure of any sin make amends for such torments? Or if we could flight our own sorrows, and let the memory of them die with the feeling; yet let us consider what those sins cost the Lord Jesus. Was he reviled with taunts, beaten with buffets, macerated with scourges, harrowed with thorns, crucified with thieves, and slain with unspeakable sufferings, to expiate them, and shall we embrace them, and so re-crucify the Lord of life? Have we received a medicine of so dear ingredients, Christ's meritorious passion, and our own compunction, to disburden our souls of that which offended both God and them; and shall we drown the remembrance of all in a deluge of vanities, recoiling to our former vomites? God forbid it, and the thankful respect of his honor and our own souls heartily forbid it.

The Dog returns to his own vomit; there be some that seek up alterius vomitum, another's vomit: that will sin by president. They will adulterize, because David did: they will drink to sleep, because Noah did. Indeed those holy men committed such unholy facts, but they humbly repented, and begged pardon for them, in the anguish of their hearts. They confessed them to be evil, these men take them up for lawful, or at least tolerable: what is this but to lick up their vomit? But whether it be their sins, for which they have repented; or our own sins, under which we have groaned; let us never return to so loathsome a vomit. Sin, like Stibi, will tarry with nobody: up it must, either here by an humble confession, or here after by a wretched confusion. Let us disburden our consciences of those sins wherewith they are surcharged, but never turn again to them whereof they are disburdened.

1. Both the Sexes are mentioned: the Dog in the masculine, Ca•s regr•ssus: in the feminine, the Hog, Su•l•ta. In Christ there is neither male nor female, men have no more privilege of salvation than women. Nor is there any difference out of Christ, women have no more immunity from damnation than men. Indeed, bad men are more apt to nimble sins, as the Dog ranges abroad: and bad women are more prone to lazy sins, as the Sow wallows $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the ••re.

2. There is more ways to Holl than one, as we say there is to the Wood. Whether men go by the Dog-like rapacitie, or Swi•• or plead, it matters not: either will serve turn, to bring them to destruction. Heaven is a glorious City, yet hath it but one Gate, and that a narrow one: Hell ••th a thousand, and they are always both easy, and open. They that refuse the way of pragmatial mischief, with the Dog; may take the path of sordid uncleanness, with the Sow: yea, which is strange, men may even fit still, and yet get thither too soon: for idleness is able to bring them unto Hell.

3. The very washing of the wicked, is a preparation to their worse foulness. Hogs will wade through the Foord for no other purpose, but to come to the mire on the other side. Some are so graceless, that they come to the Temple, mingle themselves with the Saints, and partake the holy mysteries, to this end, that they may with less suspicion follow their filthiness. Do you see that Hog, and in what a pickle he is now? he was in the River this morning. Do you see that man, and how debauched he is now? he was yesterday at the Communion. A woeful hearing, that a man should be the fouler after washing!

4. Of all sins, Satan hath most power over uncleanness. Since the first possession of the Serpent, we do not read that Satan entered into any beasts, but Hogs. He set the Sabaeans, Chaldeans, and fire, to destroy Job's Oxen, Sheep, Camels; himself did not enter into them. But when the Devils were cast out of the men, they petitioned Christ, that they might enter into the Heard of Swine: and the whole Heard ran violently down a steep place, and perished in the waters. The impetuoussness was no less than the speed: it was no small force that could do this. But if the Swine had been so many mountains, ••ose spirits by God's permission, had th•• transported •hem. How easily then can they carry those soul •hat are $\langle \diamond \rangle$ their power, to destruction? Swine $\langle \diamond \rangle$ he m••e, therefore the Devil loves Swine: un•lean ••a•ts that wallow in the •ire of sensuality, bru••sh Dr••ards tr•ns•o••ing themselves by excess; •ven they are the Swine, whom the Legion carries headlong to the Pit of perdition.

5. All sins are soul•, some be more $\langle \diamond \rangle$, and the ••a•tisers of them may be said to wall••w in the mire.•irst, the bru•• $\langle \diamond \rangle$ of the flesh, whoredom and uncleanness a ••rie and sordid wickedness• which makes the body not more leprou••an the soul and $\langle \diamond \rangle$ •he •emple of the Holy-Ghost into a Hog-stie. $\langle \diamond \rangle$ any ma• in his wits p••p•re to entertain his King, yea, his ordinary friend, in a Hog-stie? Shall ••at Almighty King, our Maker and comforter, have no room• allowed him, but that heart which filthy lust hath made a Pad of dirt, or a Hogs-coat? Thou receivest the Sacrament, and hopest to feed upon thy Savior, that he may enter into the very bowels of thy soul: but bethink thy $\langle \diamond \rangle$ • Will the God of all majesty come into that house in the morning, where $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Swine have layne all night? How noisome is that dwelling, where the best rooms, the Parlour, is but a Stable; and the Lodging-chamber, the heart, but a Hog-stie? Weigh it rightly; Thou liest in thy Bed of uncleanness, as a Hog in a puddle of mire. Thy luxurient thoughts, thy lascivious dalliances, show more odious to God, than can to thee any Swine tumbling in the mire. Secondly, intemperance; ingurgitating more meat and drink than a well-ordered appetite desires, is not only a Swinish, but a muddy sin: not so much by that effect, because it makes men muddy-headed; but by a worse, it makes them muddy-hearted. Their body is become a dunghill to their soul; their soul a dunghill, in respect of all goodness: nothing breeds in it but Weeds; nothing moves in it but Wormes, nothing wallows in it but Hogs. The Drunkard is but a moving muc•-pit, a speaking dunghill. The unclean spirit could 〈◇〉 no rest in dry places, but he finds rest in drunk•• 〈◇〉 . Thirdly, worldly covetousness is a di•tie sin: and howso•ver 〈◇〉 think, that they swim in pleasures, while they wallow in riche•, yet they are deceived, they do but roll in mirie puddles. It may be a d•scredit, it is no slander •o Riches, to call them D•ng; for to the most they are no b••er. Mucke when it lies upon heepes, gives but an ill odour, a very st•nch: but when it is spread abr•ad upon the ground, it is a cause of much fruit. All out 〈◇〉 of coin and wealth are but heaps of mucke; which thus abused, do not only stink of themselves, but make a stench in our hearts. Let us spread them abroad by our charity, in useful, merciful, and pious deeds; then will they help the barren ground of our souls to bring forth fruit unto everlasting life. Lord, lift us up out of the mire and deep Pit, wherein we stick fast by nature, wash us by thy grace, and present us undefiled in the Day of JESUS CHRIST. Amen.

AN EXPOSITION UPON THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERALL OF THE HOLY APOSTLE, Saint PETER. CHAP. III.

VER. I.

This second Epistle (Beloved) I now write unto you, in both which I stir up your pure minds, by way of remembrance.

THE whole Scripture, saith Saint Ambrose, is convivium Sapientiae, the Banket of Wisdom; and singuli libri singula sunt fercula, the several Books are several Dishes. Or an Apothecaries shoppe, wherein is found sufficiency of holy Drugges, to cure all our spiritual diseases. Or a blessed Treasury of heavenly Riches, to supply any indigence of our souls. An infallible Rule, to keep us within compass, both for civil and religious allegiance. There be two sorts of men that fly out, and ramble from the right way of godliness: the mis-believers, and mis-livers. To inform the one, and reform the other, is the great undertaking of the Holy-Ghost in this place, and the main scope of his Secretarie, the blessed Apostle Saint Peter.

Reading this first Verse, we may well think of a Father sending a Token of love to his children. The Father, is an Apostle: the Token, an Epistle: the dear children, those elected and dispersed Jews; to whom he wrote both these Letters.

To join the spiritual Father and his children together in our meditation, as nature hath knit them in relation, Saint Peter commends his love to the Church of the Jews: for the Church of the Jews was never cast away, only the unbelievers were broken off. Putata est oliva, non amputata: the Body, and some of the branches remain; and we are grafted into them, not they into us. We bring nothing to the Jews, but we receive all from them: not only the oracles of God, but even the Gospel; for salvation is of the Jews. The Gentiles do not make a several Church by themselves, for there is but $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Church: but they are called to be members of the Church of the Jews. $\langle \diamond \rangle$ sheep I have, that is, the elect Gentile. Them I must bring to one fold that is $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Church of the Jews. • do not make another fold, nor carry this $\langle \dots \rangle$ but bring the Gentiles to the Jews, there may be one fold, $\langle \dots \rangle$ then the Church of Rome, but the Church of the Jews $\langle \dots \rangle$ Church: and we are not children of the Pope, we find no such adoption; but the seed of Abraham, not natural, but by insition. The same Roote bears us both, the same fatness nourisheth us both: there is no difference between the way of salvation in the Old Testament, and the New, but this: they were the natural branches, we are engrafted. In grafting, there is clay used, and being about the Jew is bound about with a red ligament in regard of circumcision: we wear a white, in respect of Baptism; at which the Primitive times did put on white garments.

The unbelieving Jews indeed are fearfully cursed. Let their Table be made a snare, &c. This was their just recompense: they were still like snares and traps to stumble Christ; therefore let their Table be made a snare, and a trappe, and a stumbling block unto them. They blinded his eyes, and then smote him; theirs are smitten with blindness for it. They called him down from the Cross, in mockery: in earnest the greatest cross is come down upon them for it. They accused him that he would destroy the Temple, therefore was their Temple destroyed. They charged him to be an enemy to Caesar their King, now therefore they have neither King nor Caesar. They bowed his back with the Cross, now their own backs are always bowed down: not only like slaves, their bodies are subjected to burdens, but like beasts, they have groveling minds, always on their moneys; as they are indeed the greatest Usurers. O curvae in terris animae, & coelestium naves! Thus is the wrath come upon them to the uttermost. Yet God had his chosen among them in their greatest apostasy: and it is probable, that the blood of Christ did cleanse some of those souls, that had the aspersion of his blood on their guilty hands. Still Saint Peter calls them his Beloved; and there is no name of any nation under heaven so honorable as the name of a Jew. Boast not against the branches: for if thou boast, thou bearest not the root, but the root thee. Let us not reproach them, but bless that God who hath now honored us above them. Saint Paul is not more moved with indignation against them, as malefactors; than with compassion of them, as miserable wretches.

Beloved.] The thriving of the sheep is the glory of the shepherd; and Pl's Pastor in vulnere gregis sui vulneratur. The loss of a graceless child cannot but grieve the father, though the father, himself were in danger of mischief by that child: as David mourned for Absalom, that would have cut his throat. We would have you also prosper in this world; but our special care and prayer is, that you may thrive in spiritual graces, and grow rich in the favor of God.^f As that father rejoined when his son came home a convert, though he had not a rag to hang on his back. To delight in men's sins, is the sport of devils: recovery from those sins, is the joy of good men and Angels. If we see a man deadly wounded, fetching deep groans and drawing his last breath, we are moved with pity. How then should rebellious sinners, procuring the destruction of their own souls, wring from us tears of blood? We lament the death of those bodies that shall be raised in glory: how much more the ruin of those souls that sink down to infelicities? It is possible that our grief for men's offenses, may work a grief in the offenders: as the sight of others falling heartily to their meat, brings on our stomachs. Instead of a smile, let us afford all sin a tear: our tears may move them to repentance, whom our smiles encourage in lewdness.

Beloved.] Love is the ornament of the Church, the cement of Christianity. How good and pleasant a thing it is, for <...> together in <ϕ> ? But quam malum & miserandum, Patr• & filios <...> ? Wh• there is either a defect of paternal office in providing spiritual food for the family, or of filial duty in granting temporal food to <ϕ> Fathers how miserable are the whole household? Love descends; it is not possible the Pastors love should fail to his people <ϕ> it do• not ascend so certainly; for we see universally, that the peoples love•oth ••le to their Pastor. It <ϕ> a question, whether natural Parents ••to beloved above the spiritual• we know that Christ preferred his spiritual <...> of this flee•• and major est ••exi• <...> . Why <...> them more that brought us into this sinful and miserable <ϕ> those that bring us into a better world, where is neither sin nor ••ery? Why them, that live with us on earth but awhile, equal to them that shall live with us in heaven forever? We must clear this by a distinction: Our spiritual parents are more to be loved Aestiv•tive: our natural, more in•s•e: those <ϕ> Bene•lentia, these ••re Beneficenti•. A man may not give all his goods to a ••ernitie, and leave his parents destitute of relief, as the Capuc•• do: for God esteems mercy above sacrifice. We are to love our nature <ϕ> •ll; but the most bonds of nature require a greater degree of love. Nature ••cheth this, and Grace perfecteth Nature. Christ first preached at Nazareth, <ϕ> requite the place of his education. Still the nearer in blood, the dearer in good. But they that will not allow their spiritual Fathers so much, as they do their carnal flatterers; that spend more upon their Lawyer, than upon their Preacher; they are bastards; none of his children; Impostumes, rather than members of the Church.

From what root grows all this Sacrilege, this robbing of the Church under the name of custom, but from this, the want of Love? The love of custom ••th quite eaten out the custom of love. It will be found in a higher Court, where not a Lawyer shall be heard, that it was a damnable custom for children to rob their parents. The world is full of clamour, the Law is full of favor, for customs: all cry out for their Diana, but especially Demetrius; it toucheth •is copy hold: men think they are undone, if they give God his right. Not only your craft shall be despised, but even the Temple of Diana, whom all Asia and the ••rld •orshippeth. How cunningly this Orator pleads; more for his goddess, than for his gain: but if it had not been for his gain, his goddess might go whistle. Thus loud Orators will Demetrius and Tertullus be, pleading against Paul, before Judges like themselves: but when Christ shall be the Judge, they will have nothing to say; like the poor intruder, that waseven speechless. Some have haply gessed this man to be a Lawyer, whose tongue had been nimble enough; but this awful presence daunted him; he had spoken so much before that now he was speechless.

To conclude; If we do not feed you with the Word, you are not our Beloved: if you do not render us our dues, we are not your Beloved. So here is no love lost, but God's; who hath loved us (as it were) on this condition, that we should love one another. We have heard much of the Pylades and Pythians, and such inviolable friends▪ but it would be miraculous now if any should die for love. I do say, there was never more love in the world, never less: never in proportion, less in demonstration. Christ will come when faith shall be fear found upon earth; but if he had threatened to come when charity be found we might for him today. Except you be and except we be your Beloved, you are not some of heaven. Heartily do we love you, do you as sincerely love, that Jesus Christ love all.

I come now to the Token of his love, which is set forth by The - Nature of it, .

- member the former.
- Ten of it, or contents stir up their minds.
- Order of it, of excitation, by way of .

For the former; It pleased God to reveal his will to us by ; and thus both the Law and the Gospel. The Law was written with his own hand: Prophecies and Evangelical discourses he hath written by oath did he write anything himself but the Tables of the Law: the hand and tone, the Law were all His. That which he dictated to his servants, the Prophets, challenge just honor from us: how much more doth that deserve, which he wrote immediately with his own hand▪ The more precious the Record was the greater was the fault of defacing it: no king holds it more than rebellion, to blemish his seal and tear his writing. Yet Moses did it, and forgave it. He that was the meekest man upon earth, abandons that in a sudden indignation, which in cold blood he would have hold faster than his life. Israel had fallen into idolatry; and Moses forgets the Law written, when broken. Not only the Decalogue was written, but the Prophetical Testimonies, and all called the Law. So God thought meet to consecrate and hallow forever this outward form of revelation. Some conjecture, that the Prophet did write the sum and abridgement of their errands, and fasten them Temple-doors: which after some days view, were taken down, and laid in the Treasury for a second monument. The Poet said, but he appeal fame for the Author of the device; Phoenices primi (famae si creditor) si, Mors rudibus vocem signare figuris. But certainly writing began with Moses.

It was the discipline of God's own house, for two thousand years, to feed his eldest sons only with tradition. This is a great argument with the Poeticians. But by their leaves, the diverse restitutions and reformations of God's true worship, argue that those times were not so generally fortunate for religion. And suppose that in one or two families, when men were at the fewest, their hearts at the purest, and their lives at the longest, Religion were so retained: yet was it not only by Tradition, but by Visions, Oracles, and other Rudiments, which might be to them instead of writing. But when the number of men was increased, and their years shortened, and their hearts more corrupted; the conveniency of writing was taken up, both for the spreading abroad, and bet^{••} learning at home, the will of God. Thus Moses, Samuel, Esdras, were not only for their own times, God's holy Orators; but for the perpetual benefit of a^{••e}•ages, his full Secretaries. We are told of the Druid's, certain Pagan Priests of France, that in their Rules abhorred writing: But now where are those Rules? What Print remains of their Precepts? Their very names had been unknown, but for writing.

The Gospel also is written: Whatsoever may cause our joy to be full, w^{•••}soever may perfect us for every good work, whatsoever may make us wise $\langle \diamond \rangle$ salvation, all this is written. Let no man pres^{••e} to be wise; above that which is ^{•••}ten; especially, not to be wise against that which is written. These holy M^{•••}scripts were highly prized by our forefathers $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the old woman that sold Books to Tarquin, did set such a price on them, to might h^{•ve} made a Tarq^{•••} ransom. Printing hath yet more advanced this benefit; that it is a question, whether ever Learning so far excelled ignorance, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Scholers h^{•e} by $\langle \diamond \rangle$ help exceeded Scholers. Their $\langle \dots \rangle$ into $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the earth, and thei[•] $\langle \dots \rangle$ the ends of the world. Their sound, yea now if $\langle \diamond \rangle$ ill their L^{••e}: and for th^{••} words, their Writings. His arcana $\langle \diamond \rangle$ terra $\langle \diamond \rangle$ for^{•••r}. That God's Will is near as well known as his Works; and the Book of Grace is now become like the Book of Heaven. There was nothing wherein Israel out-stripped all ^{••e} world, more than in this privilege; the Pledge of God's holy Cove^{•••}, the Law written with his own finger. He hath not dealt so with other $\langle \diamond \rangle$.

$\langle \diamond \rangle$ how great a favor is done to that Nation, where he bestows hi[•] G^{•spel}? Th^{••} $\langle \dots \rangle$ a killing Letter, this is the power of God to salvation. H^{•ce} is God th^{•••}ghly disp^{•e}sed with any peopl[•] where that come^{••}ds. Sui^{••r}s ^{•ht} $\langle \dots \rangle$ love to Virgins, when upon just cause they fall off, call for their $\langle \dots \rangle$ again. So when God begi[•] once perfectly to dislike, the f^{•st} $\langle \dots \rangle$ withdraws, is his Gospel. If our fore-father[•] had but ^{•old} $\langle \diamond \rangle$ some $\langle \dots \rangle$ its concerning the worship of God, ^{•ny} whole cou^{••}ies (that $\langle \dots \rangle$ day without God in the world) might well have envied our happi^{••}. $\langle \diamond \rangle$ we take not what we take, upon trust of men's report: for me have $\langle \diamond \rangle$ written Word, and may survey at the full that great mystery of god^{•••e}, which not only Kings and Princes, but even Saints and Angels have $\langle \diamond \rangle$ to behold. If this meditation did thoroughly sink into our affections, if our ^{••e}ctions were truly moved, they would call upon us for thankfulness, and $\langle \diamond \rangle$ thankfulness would appear in our careful obedience: yea, this ^{••ve} would set all able Pennes on work, to write the praises of God. Not t^{•t} I desire, that those who travail only with the wind, should be delivered of th^{••} emptiness: there be too many foaming Brains in the world, that soil $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Virgin-Paper with their unchaste scurri^{•ities}: such weeds, being dinged $\langle \diamond \rangle$ carnal humors, grow too fast of themselves. So the Farm of Antichrist commands many Ploughes in Europe, Seminaries of heretical Seedes, to make a Harvest for the Devil. They violate the works of all writers with the clipping-sheeres of their Expurgations: which dealing is as cruel to the dead, as their Spanish Inquisition is to the living. As that Giant did proportion the bodies of all his guests to the Bed of his Harlot: so doth the Pope o't and fashion all writers to the Bed of the Whore of Babylon. Against him, if we employ not our tongues and Pennes, according to our several abilities, they are both worthy to lose their cunning. Here both let our tongues be like the Pennes of ready writers, and our Pennes like the tongues of ready speakers.

To conclude: What shall we render to the Lord for his mercy, in writing these blessed Covenants? We can give nothing but the Tables, it is He that $\langle \diamond \rangle$ write on them. Our hearts are but a bare Board, till God by his finger i••ave his Law in them. Yea more; we are a rough Quarry, and it is He $\langle \diamond \rangle$ must hew us out, and square us fit for himself to write upon. God come••ted the Law to Moses his hands; his hands were whole, but the Tables were broken. God hath entrusted his Gospel to our hearts; if we abuse it, the Gospel shall remain whole, but our hearts shall be broken. He is more resolute than Pilate; What I have written, I have written. It is our woe, if we ••ke that blessed Writing, which is a Covenant of mercy for us: for then t••t other hand-writing, the Law of Wrath, shall stand in force against us. Let us beseech him, that hath written these things to be read with our eyes, also to write them in our hearts; that so we may find our names written in the •ooke of Life.

The Number follows: it is a second Epistle. Abundance cautela non nocet; especially where the matter is of consequence, and the danger of such despe•••sse, as concerns the saving or losing of the soul: which if a man have $\langle \diamond \rangle$ lost, he hath nothing else to lose. This second; not so much fearing the mis••ri•ge of the first, as hoping to work better confirmation by the next. Some will come at the first call, as Matthew did: some tarry to the third, as Samuel $\langle \diamond \rangle$: some stay it out to the last hour of the day but one, as those laborers did. God calls at any time, Preachers must call at all times: the second exhortation may speed better than the first: one Sermon may have happier success than all the rest. The faithful servant, whom his Lord hath made ruler over his household, gives them their meat in due season. First, it must be good meat, for wholesomenesse: fancies of their own •rines, will but fill them full of wi•de. Secondly, it must be seasonable: comforts to the obstinate, and thunders to the despe•••, are Dishes quite out of season. Thirdly, it must $\langle \diamond \rangle$ iv•• them: $\langle \diamond \rangle$ may not $\langle \diamond \rangle$ till they call for it; their souls commonly are not $\langle \dots \rangle$ to be hungry. Fourthly, it is not enough to purvey well, and stock our $\langle \diamond \rangle$ head, but w•e must dispense it to their hearts. There may be a whole M•g••• of knowledge, and the people never the fatter for it, unless it $\langle \diamond \rangle$ impaired. Fifthly, it must be given by way of distribution: it is not sufficient to se• it before them in gross, but in the retaile of particular application $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the Chirurgicalian not only makes the Plaister, but lays it on too. In vain doth the rich man discourse of Bread to the empty; or the Physician read a Lecture on the Patients disease, and so leave him. Sixthly, all this must be frequent: we must do as we pray, Give them their daily Bread. God hath sp••en me, twice, ha•e I heard it: yea, twice and thrice, oftentimes, saith Elihu. Sin is not so easily killed, that we should say of it as Abishai said of Saul. Let we smite him to the earth at once, and I will not smite him a second time. It were a happy riddance of so micshievous an enemy, if we could hit him as cunningly, as Joab did Amasa treacherously; who smote him in the fifth ribbe, and struck him not again. But this Hagar will abide many blows, before she be••ned quite out of doors.

The building of the Church goes slowly forward: it were an injurious ce•sure, to tax Solomon of slackness in founding the House of God. Great Bodies must have but slow motions. Much time is required to the preparing of the Materials: albeit David had laid a great part of the Timber and Metals; yet many a Tree must be felled and squared, many a Stone hewn and polished, ere this foundation be laid. Neither could those large Cedars be cut, sawen, seasoned in one year. Though he had an hundred and fifty thousand Laborers employed in bearing burdens, and hewing Stones; besides their three thousand and three hundred Overseers: so did the main stress of the Work lie upon Proselytes. Though he raised a Tribute for the Work, of the Nations; not of money, but of men: though thirty thousand Israelites were levied for this service; yet four whole years are spent in so vast a preparation. Christ hath many Builders, for the perfecting of his Church: thousands of Preachers have spent their days and labors upon it; yet still it needs more: Still let us pray him for more Laborers, and for the redoubling of their pains. Our souls be such knottie Trees, and our hearts such rough and hard Quarries; that without the mighty pains of many hands, we will hardly lie right and fit in our designed places. Line must be added to Line, and Letter to Letter; a second Epistle to the former. It may be, we answer at first with Peter; Not so, Lord: yet after a second or third motion, we grow better advised. It may be, we pass the first and second year without a spiritual tillage: we have heard this holy Doctrine once and again, but it bred no cogitations in us, except such as grow of themselves; natural, worldly, corrupt: yet the third time we may be won with these heavenly comforts, and bring forth the fruits of obedience.

Yet let us beware of protracting our conversion: when we repel or neglect one good motion, we are not sure of a second: yea, he is justly hardened against the second, that hath resisted the first. Sin hath a shrewd Title, when it can plead prescription: and Satan thinks his evidence as good as eleven points at Law, when he hath once got possession. Let him be sure of thy youth, and he will be confident of thy age. There was an Abbot of this Land, that desired a piece of ground which lay conveniently for him: the owner refused to sell it: yet with much persuasion, was contented to let it. The Abbot hired it for his Rent, and covenanted to farm it only for one Croppe. He had it, and few it with Ac•res; a Croppe that lasted three hundred years. Satan begs but the first Croppe: let him sow thy youth with Acorns, they will grow up with thy years to sturdie Okes; so big-bulked, and deep-rooted, that they shall last all thy life. Let us take the first opportunity of God's gracious motions and monitions; or if we have omitted the first, let us apprehend the second: or if (as it is too true) many have passed unanswer'd by us, let us embrace the present invitation; and even now with faith and repentance turn to our Savior, that he may never lose a second labor.

The Tenour follows; which is, to stir up our minds. We use not to stir up cold ashes, but embers that be warm, to re-kindle the live coals that are hid under them. The Apostle does not profess to teach them new Lessons, but to hear them say over their Parts: not to catechise them in the foundation and Principles; but rather to rub up their memories, with a recollection of their former Notes, as it were a repetition of his Sermons. It argues some mistrust in the Master, of non-proficiencie in the Scholar, when he turns him back to the beginning of his Book, and apposeth him in his first Lesson. Saint Peter will not so discourage his Disciples, but rather takes it as granted, that they knew; and more needed excitation, than information: as if he meant not to press the Doctrine, but the Use. When we lay on green wood, we blow the fire, not stir it: when dry, we stir the fire, and need not blow it. Proselytes stand in need of kindling: well improved Christians require but stirring. There is mettle in many a good Horse, which he will not show, till you give him the Spurre: put him to it, and he answers your desire. Samson sleeps, till he hears, The Philistines be upon thee: then he rouseth up himself, to their bane. How many a good deed had been lost, if the doer had not been seasonably stirred up.

Why are the words of the wise compared to Goades; but to show, that the best in God's Teame need pricking forward? An easy rhetoricke draws us to evil: yea, it is hard not to run down the hill. The proneness to sin is so much stronger in our nature, than to good; that every least motion prevails for the one, scarce any instigation for the other. Our war against sin and Satan is perpetual: other hostilities admit some truce, ours is not determined but with our lives. Lest therefore we should take a dangerous and unkindly rest, God hath set his Ministers, like Trumpets and Drummes, to call us to our Arms, to stir up our strengths, that we be not surprised unawares. Let our weapons be always in readiness: as Seneca said of Caesar; That he did quickly sheathe the sword, but he never laid it off. The sight of a weapon discourageth a thief: while we keep our javelins in our hands, we scape many assaults. It is our Office to give you the Alarm, and to stir you up: be it your care to maintain the battle. And as the end of all war is peace, so your militant conflicts shall be crowned with victory, and your souls received into the everlasting peace of Jesus Christ.

The Order is last, By way of remembrance. This is a just order and method, first to teach the way of the Lord, then to remember men of walking in it. We are not only called Teachers, but Remembrancers. And as this Epistle seems to be called after a sort by the Author, a rehearsal-Epistle: so all our Sermons are but rehearsal Sermons; pressing the Doctrine you have already learned, by way of remembrance. There is reasonable good strength in our judgments, but a great decay in our memories. If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them. •because you hear these things, you have happy ears: because you see these sacred mysteries, you have happy eyes: because you tread in God's Courts, you have happy feet: if you remember these things, you have happy memories: these things if you purpose to do, you have happy resolutions: but these things if you practice, if you do indeed, you have happy souls: and the Lord make us all thus happy.

Your pure minds.] This is the object of his excitation. There is Purit• (ϕ) , an outward profession of purity, an inward corruption of hypocrisy. All the care of hypocrites, is to seem pure; a strange kind of Atheism: •s if they thought, that their thought was not known to God. Not an oath comes from them in a month; that's well: but scarce a true word in a twelve-month, and that's very ill. Sapphira will not stick to lie unto Peter, that durst lie to the holy Ghost. Hypocrisy is a lie unto God, as dissimulation is to man. Such men's actions are but real equivocations. They are not only Lupi in •vili, but Lupi in •villâ; Wolves in a Sheep-Cote, yea Wolves in a Sheepes Coat. Like the fruit that undid us all, which was Pulcher in visu, in tactu mollis, dulcis in g•st•, mortifer in effectu. There be many that have pure-shining skins, glorious shows, but black insides. Moses perceiving that the people durst not look upon the Sun of his face, clouds it with a veil; and would rather choose to hide the work of God in himself, than want opportunity of revealing God's will to the people. He does not stand upon terms of reputation: If there be glory in my skin, God did put it there; he would not have set it in my face, if he had meant it should be hid: rather do you hide your faces, that are blemished with your sins; and do not look, that in favor of your weakness, I should wrong God and myself, in seeming less happy than he hath made me. But without all self-respects, he rather modestly hides his glorified countenance from them, that by this means he might deliver God's message to them. Hidden purity is more gracious and acceptable to God, than that which is openly boasted. Such a happy Talent is best improved, by being laid up: as Moses had more glory by his veil, than by his face.

Christian modesty teacheth a wise man, not to expose himself to the fairest show, and to live at the utmost pitch of his strength. There is many a rich Stone laid up in the bowels of the earth; many a fair Pearl laid up in the bosom of the Sea; that never was seen, nor ever shall be. The Stones which were laid in the foundation of the Temple, were not rude and rugged, but hewn and polished. Albeit they lay buried in the earth, from the eyes of men, they were of equal value with the rest: though less conspicuous, no less precious. No small number of the noble graces of God's servants lie hidden and undiscerned; which are not less acceptable to him, because less notable to others. Hypocrites are all for show, God is all for truth: even the grace concealed, shall be crowned. There is many a goodly star, which because of the height, comes not within our account. The Lord Jesus himself did hide the glory of his Deity under the veil of his flesh, Majesty under vileness; and did shut up his great and divine Miracles with, See you tell no man. Not that I would have graces unprofitably buried, but I would not have them proudly boasted. Let us be Puri, not Puritani. Those hearts be foulest, that care only to seem the purest. The world makes no account of unknown riches; whereas malo me divitem esse, quàm haberi. To what end should we dazzle men's eyes with admiration, when God and ourselves are conscious of our secret corruption? Why should we seek to be above those in show, to whom we are inferior in worth? Moses his face was fairer than his veil, his heart fairer than his face: too many have their veil fairer than their face, their face fairer than their heart. Modest virtues shall shine through their veils, when the vain-glorious shall be wray their shame through their coverings. How contrary are hypocrites to that faithful servant of God, Moses? He spake to God bare-faced, to the people veiled: he shown his worst to men, his best to God: but they show their best to men, to God their worst. But God sees both their skin and their heart: and I know not whether he more hates, their skin of dissimulation, or their heart of corruption.

There is Puritas mentis, a pure mind, without which all other purity is but uncleanness. There is Puritas legalis, that is, of nature; irrecoverably lost in Ad••Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Black Moors will sooner breed white children. There is Puritas Evangelica, that is, of Grace; which all must have that shall be saved. Who shall ascend into the Hill of the Lord? He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart. This Pureness is either Impu••ius, whereby the pureness of that immaculate Lamb is made ours: They have washed their garments, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Or Inc••tiva, inherent pureness: Every man that hath hope in Christ, purifieth himself, $\langle \phi \rangle$ he is pure. For there must be aliquid nostrum, in nobis, though not à nobis. After that the Sun hath given his light to the stars, they shine: principally, by that borrowed light; accessorially, by a light of their own. Quicquid Christus operatur pro nobis, hoc operatur in nobis. Whatsoever Christ hath wrought for us, that he hath wrought in us. Or it is Comparativa, in regard of others: so the godly are Myrtles, but in a field of Nettles; Lilies, but in a forest of Thorns; Wheat, because there is much Chaff by them. Wooll may be pure white in respect of Pitch, but compare it with the Lilie: the Lilie is pure white in respect of Wooll, but compare it with the driven Snow: there is no pureness of man that dare stand the judgment of God. The stars are not pure in his sight, nor the heavens, nor the Angels. The right Puritan, that saith he hath no sin, is convinced ex ore proprio, out of his own mouth: even therefore he hath sin, because he says that he hath no sin: that very speech is a sin. In non peccando puritas Dei, in peccata non imputando puritas hominis. The Scripture propounds many examples of purity; yet they all had their blemishes: the brightest day was not without some cloud. Howle ye Firre-trees, for the Cedar is fallen: if the gallants be foiled, what shall the underlings do? That is a woeful purity, which does not only choose to stand in the sight of mercy. For perfect purity; Optandum est, conandum est, petendum est, confidendum non est.

Wherein then consists this pureness of mind? Not in any perfection, as if it could be so in the sight of God's justice: what is he living on earth that must not confess, Against thee O Lord have I sinned? But he is said to have a pure mind, that lives sine scandalo, though not sine peccato: or that takes no liberty to do the least evil: though he doth often admit sin, he does never intend sin. Pura men's nequit consistere cum proposito peccandi. He that hath resolved to be nocent, though he do not the purposed act, before God is not innocent. The undertaking of treason, though the fact be hindered, is treason. Or he that is pure in the inner man; He that is borne of God sinneth not; In quantum ex Deo natus non peccat. If with any fighting; he could get the victory over flesh and blood, he would never sin. Or he that indeavours to be pure; as having always a respect to that eye, which hath always an eye of respect to him: Walk before me, and be thou perfect. The mind may be said to be pure in three respects:

1. Puritate fidei: faith apprehends the blood of Christ, and this purifies it. So it is rather passive, than active: not so much Pure, as Purificata. The air no sooner receives the clear aspect of the Sun, but it presently becomes light. If Christ send forth the beams of his righteousness into the heart, it is made pure. Blessed is he whose sin is not imputed. That which makes us blessed, makes us pure, for none but the pure in heart are blessed. This is the sole perfection of a Christian, the imputation of Christ's pureness, and the not imputation of his own impureness. It is in a manner all one, not to have committed sin in actu, and not to be held culpable of that sin in reatu. A garment that is thoroughly washed, may be as clean as though it never had been stained. Such were ye, saith Paul: which implies, that such they are not. If the Lord wash us, shall we not be clean? Purge me with hissope, and I shall be clean: wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow. It was a costly Bath, wherein we were washed before we could be clean: but if anything could do it, this must. The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin. He prayed till he groaned, he groaned till he wept, he wept till he sweet, he sweet till he bled, he bled till he died; and all to make us a warm Bu•, wherein our cold and foul souls might be washed pure and clean. Never was anything washed at so high a rate as the Christian soul. Naaman had an easy cure; Wash in Jordan, a common and unforbidden river.

The diseased in B•thesde found some more difficulty; they must wait the moving of the water by an Angel, and be waited on by an officious friend, or they were never the better. Some have washed their rotten carcasses in the fairest flowers of the garden, the choice delicacies of nature, the clearest fountains. Histories tell us, that the blood of Infants and Innocents hath been prescribed for a Bath to Tyrants. But the Christians Bath is the Bath royal, the precious blood of the King of all the world. This only can make us pure: It was the Jews imprecation, and it proves their vengeance; His blood be upon us, and upon our children. It may, in a good sense, be our appreciation, and shall be our blessedness, His blood be upon us, and upon our children after us.

2. Puritate poenitentiae: so the conscience knows no foulness by it self, which true repentance hath not sorrowed, and which the mercy of God hath not pardoned. For God esteems sin indeed repented, as if it had never been indeed committed. This, though it finds not the heart Purum, yet leaves it Purificatum. The garment of our life gathers many spots, which God suffers us to wash out with our penitent tears. This was David's physic and bath, whensoever he had been sick or fouled with sin. I make my bed to swim, and I water my couch with my tears. Yea it seems, they were his food also, even his meat and drink: for meat, My tears were my meat day and night. And for drink, I mingled my drink with weeping: that was the spice of his cup. Thou writest bitter things against me; when thou makest me to remember the iniquities of my youth. Moses his ten fingers write bitter things against us, till the finger of Christ wipe them out. Saint Paul calls it a Handwriting against us: not that God's Laws, like Draco's, were writ in blood; For the Law is holy, and the Commandment is holy, and just, and good. They were holy characters; but our sins made them letters of blood against us. When we commit a sin, we write a bill of our hand against ourselves; whereby we acknowledge our souls to stand indebted to God's justice. Now unless this debt be discharged, and the bond cancelled, to prison we must; and there lie till we have satisfied the uttermost farthing: and that (God knows) will be long enough; for a farthing is more than we are, or can be worth. This black bill is cancelled by Christ only; whose blood hath so defaced and obliterated the reckoning of believers, that God doth not read our receipts, nor call us to accounts. Unbelievers only suffer the whole forfeiture to fall upon their necks.

Now what Christ did with the blood of his body, that in some sort we must do with the blood of our souls, our penitential tears; that we may be discharged of our sins forever. One color laid upon another, doth away the former, and remains it self: as the cunning paintresse deals with her face; sometimes she blots out pale, and writes red. Our sins are red as scarlet, our tears white as snow: let these latter fall upon the former, they shall not only blot them out, but stand in their room: so we beautify our conscience, by blotting out red, and writing white, pure innocence. Our sins stand in God's register, till our sorrows come. Thou tellest my wanderings; put my tears i•t• thy bottle: are they not in thy book? The first give place to the last: our wanderings were written in that book; but when our tears come, God blots out wickedness, and writes repentance. And so we have our acquittance, even a general one, from the beginning of the world; Adams sin and all, to the day of the date thereof; a full quietus est. Pharaoh and his host were not surer drowned in the red sea, than Satan and all our sins are drowned in our tears. These the Fathers call our second Baptism: secunda Tabula post na•fragium. No soul so polluted, but repentance can wash it clean and pure, and present it blameless to God through the faith of JESUS CHRIST.

3. Puritat• gratiae; sanctified to a holy life, and devout obedience. Not that sin does not superesse, remain; but it shall not superare, reign in us. It will be a Tenant, it may be a Tyrant; it shall have no dominion, or at least no peaceable one. This Usurper would fain be King of man, as the Devil writes himself Prince of the world: but the pure mind will never acknowledge fealty or allegiance to him. Sentit, non consentit: she feels his assaults with grief, but she knows it would be a worse grief to yield unto them. She will not buy her peace with her loss; being assured, that this trouble will not last ever: resistance shall be crowned with victory. From sudden thoughts of ill, no man is free: but here is no deliberation, no consent, no delight. There is Nativit•••eri, the conception of sin; and Nativitas ex utera, the birth or action of sin. None are pure from the former: the Sun cannot be rid of clouds, but he labors to disperse them. Melius est nubere, quam urere: he does not say, quàm c•les•eri. There is great difference between passive Fittes and Heats, and voluntary Inflammings. The will of this purified mind in sinning, is not properly voluntas, sed velleitas; as it were a will against a man's will. As the Mariner in a tempest doth cast his goods into the water, his rich fraught over-board. Or the true man assaulted on the way, gives his Purse to the thief: yet neither of these with full consent of will. If the regenerate be over-borne to do amiss, it is with reluctance before, and with repentance after: nec invadit sine pugna, nec evadit sine poenitentia: it got in with blows, it is thrown out with tears.

We are not Sins voluntaries: at the most, but pressed soldiers against our wills. As in a rebellion or tumult, a Drumme is beaten up, a Trumpet sounded, to call a faction together. Some are glad of the occasion, quickly up in arms, apt for mutiny, ready to do mischief: a loyal subject opposeth the conspiracy, strives against it, but cannot prevail with the unruly multitude: yea he is taken by force, compelled to join with them, and to draw his sword against his awful and lawful Sovereign. The subject thus drawn in, is in as much danger as the rest: but a wise and gracious Prince doth here distinguish; and while he executeth due vengeance upon the mutiners, he gives this man his free pardon. In an ungracious soul, one passion is enraged, and presently all the affections muster up their forces, and join in the confederacy of sin. But in the faithful there is a resistance; the fear and love of God withstands the hurly-burly: and though the throng of natural lusts prevail against grace, and overcome man to sin; yet the God of wisdom and mercy will forgive him; when the other receives the reward of a rebel.

The pure mind abhors dissimulation: that man neither wrongs others with the sin of deceitfulness, nor wrongs himself with the deceitfulness of sin. In the one he is Rectus cord, in the other mundus cord. His soul is like Canaan,aland of brooks and fountains, that spring out of valleys and hills: there be the springs of knowledge to guide his ways; and brooks of tears to mourn for his errors. His charity stands like those fields of wheat and barley: vi•es, figtrees, and pomegranates, are his fruitful meditations and contentful thoughts: oil and •••ey are the grace of his lips. His understanding is full of good things; his whole life, welles and vineyards, to relieve and comfort himself and others. His very rocks are iron, and his hills yield brass: his most barren works have some profit. His whole self is like the Garden of Eden, wherein stands the Tree of life, Jesus Christ. When he dies, Tanquam Paradisus ingreditur Paradisum, one Paradise enters into another.

This is the blessedness of a pure heart: but in the world there is Heart enough, and good store of pureness; yet they have ill luck, they cannot meet: it is rare to find Puram mentem, a pure mind. It comes to my memory, what I have found observed of the word Conscientia; that it ever had ill luck in the Church, and could never be found at once in full syllables. Conscientia; altogether, he calls Devotion: take away the first syllable, it is Scientia, Knowledge: cut off the next, it is Entia, Means or worldly maintenance. First, in the times of profaneness, there was Sci, and Entia, learning and living, knowledge and maintenance: but Con was left out, Devotion was wanting; they were ungodly men. In the next age, there was Con, and Entia, Devotion and Exhibition; a rich and religious, yea a superstitious number: but Sci, Knowledge was failing; they were not the learned'st Clerks. In the third age, Con, and Sci, Learning and Devotion were both lost, and only Entia was left: they had the honors and manners, the fat of the land. But now in this last age, it is come round: we have Con and Sci, (let our thankfulness bless God for it) a learned and religious Clergy; only our Entia is taken from us: our livelihood and subsistence is exhausted by Sacrilege. The like fortune hath a pure heart in the world: pureness goes one way, and the heart another way, and these two have much ado to meet. There is no lack of hearts, every man hath one, some have more than one: and for pureness, it abounds: proud dames will have pure houses, pure tables, pure floores: their ruffles of the purest linen, their garments of the purest stuff, their diet of the purest meat, their chains of the purest Gold: hypocrites will have pure eyes, pure tongues, pure habits, pure garbes and gestures. The profane sort are all for a brave heart, they make a pish at pureness: the dissembling sort are all for a show of pureness, no matter for the heart. This is the devils plot, to keep pureness and the heart asunder. Purity will do well in nothing without the heart: the heart can be happy in nothing without purity. It is great pity, two such sweet compaions should be kept asunder, the God of all grace and mercy bring them both together.

Travelers, when the ways be fair and pleasant, make the longer journeys: a pure mind and an holy conscience are such sweet and delightful things, that I take leave to prosecute this argument a little farther, by way of application. We all desire a clean soul; where shall we have it? Create in me a clean heart, O God; saith David. Neither Saint nor Angel stands in his way; he troubles not them with his prayers. Abraham knows us not, Israel cannot hear us: David loved and honored the memory of Abraham and Jacob, his Fathers: yet he does not present them his petitions. I touch it, with indignation at that superstitious prayer of the Romanists; Sancta Virgo Dorothea, tua nos virtute bea, cor in nobis novum crea. But let us know, none can create a clean heart, but he that made all hearts: he only that formed the spirit of man, can reform the spirit in man. And to show that a pure mind is so far from being a common blessing, or easy attainment, it is called a point of Creation.

1. GOD made the world by his Word, and by his Word he makes a pure heart within us. If he give but his fiat, or his vol, mundare, Bee thou clean: our Leprosy is gone. Yea, this seems to be more difficult: for the world was created ex spiritu eris, by the word of his mouth; but the mind is purified ex sanguine cordis, by the blood of his heart.

2. GOD made the world of no preexistent matter; for before it, there was nothing but Himself, and Himself cannot be parted. This was wonderful, yet the creating of a pure heart in a greater wonder. For then, as there was nothing to exist, so nothing to resist: he made the Mass, and that was a passive matter, to be formed at his pleasure. But here is a rebellious opposition, a stubborn will to be subdued. There God said, Let it be so, and it was so: here he hath spoken an hundred times by his Word, Thus I would have it: and we retort, Thus we will not have it. I would have gathered thee, at nolui, but thou wouldst not. Thus he is more troubled to make a pure mind, than he was to create a world. How do they abuse the opportunity of grace, and cozen their own fowls, that promise themselves an easy conversion at their own pleasure? God made the world in six days, how many years hath he been in purifying our hearts, and yet it is not done.

3. GOD took six distinct days in creating the world, and he seems to have six distinct works in the cleansing of our minds. First, in the first day he made the light, when darkness was upon the face of the deep: light and darkness were not duo positiva: but he divided the light from the darkness: and he called the light, Day and the darkness, Night. Darkness overwhelms us by Nature, and God's first work is to enlighten our understandings by the knowledge of his will: He that commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Yet some darkness still remains; and we may call the light, knowledge; and the darkness, ignorance. Secondly, in the second day he made the Heavens, and set them a moving in their right courses. His second work here, is to frame in us an heavenly will, to rectify our obedience; that we might do his will on earth, as it is done in Heaven. He divided the waters which were under the firmament, from the waters that were above the firmament. Our firmament is Terminus cognoscibilium; school-tricks are waters above the firmament. Thirdly, in the third day he separated the sea from the dry land: and He called the dry land, Earth; and the gathering together of the waters, Seas. So here, he causeth the deluge of natural corruption to sink down, that the firmness and beauty of this new heart might appear: and he calleth the dry land, Grace; and the confined waters, Nature. Fourthly, in the fourth day he made the Sun, Moon, and Stars, all those refulgent lights of heaven. So here he createth in us faith, charity, joy, patience, and peace; those lamps and ornaments, that give luster to a renewed soul. He made two great lights: the greater to rule the day, and the less to rule the night. Our two great lights are Faith and Charity: one rules the day, keeps our mind in a perpetual light: the other governs the night, doth good in the darkest shadows of necessity, of discomfort. The Sun shines smilingly on thee in thy prosperity; the Moon, that is thy comfort in adversity: but take heed of abusing either; for so thy Sun may be darkened, and God will turn thy Moon into blood. Fifthly, in the fifth day he replenished the air with fowls, the sea with fishes, the earth with beasts. So here, he fills every corner of the heart with sanctified affections. We are full, as the world then, reptilium, volatiliium: let us mount up to heaven by grace, though we creep upon the earth by nature. Now came that Crescite & multiplicamini, the seeds were sown that should soon multiply. The Lord sows in our hearts his holy Word, the seed of eternal life; let us be fruitful of good works. Indeed bad doctrine is a seed too; but non vidit quod bonum; God did not see it was good.

Lastly, in the sixth day, he made man: and here he re-makes him, creates him a new man in Christ Jesus. You will say, he is able to do this in a moment, as he wrought upon the malefactor on the cross at his last hour. So he could have made the world in a day, in an hour, in a minute: but it pleaseth his ••sedome to take longer time, both in that work, and in this: that we might ••ke heed of fouling that heart, which he hath taken so much pains to make clean. As exquisitely and deliberately as the great world was made, as perfectly good as all things were; the sin of man soon corrupted all. After all God's cost and labor upon us, our minds may be quickly defiled. Now when God had dispatched all his works in six days, he rested the seventh: so if we labor, with him, in the cleansing of our souls, all this week of working-days; we shall then rest with him in the Seventh, the heavenly and eternal Sabbath of the Saints.

To conclude; we see how sweet the condition of this pure mind is. Hugo saith of that man, Vtitur amico ad gratiam, inimico ad patientiam, ad benevolentiam cunctis, quibus potest ad beneficentiam. God doth not charge him with his own sins, as if he had never done them; nor with the sins of others, because he did not approve them. He is composed in prosperous fortunes, with adverse not dejected. Set Belshazzar in the midst of his Princes; his cupboard of plate furnished with the sacred bowles of Jerusalem, the spoil of God's holy Temple: and in contempt of their owner, causing healths in them to his Mistresses, and singing carols in the praise of his carved gods: yet because there is a foul heart within him, this sumptuous, this presumptuous feast shall end in horror; and that such an horror, as shall put the blood out of his face, the music out of his head, the joy out of his heart forever. But lay Lazarus at the gate of unmercifulness, lay Job on the very dunghill of miserableness, and give them mentem synceram, an honest and quiet heart: and Adam could not have been so happy in Paradise without it, as they were out of Paradise with it.

The man of a pure mind is always of a cheerful look, because there are no secret snibblings within him; he is not troubled with that they call Singultum ••rdis: the good man may be evermore the merriest man. The holy soul is the love of God, the joy of Angels: her eyes dare look upon the glorious Judge, whom she knows to be her Savior. Her heart is courageous, she dares stand the thunder; and when guilty minds creep into corners, she is confident in him that will defend her. She challengeth the whole world to accuse her of injustice, and fears not the subornation of false witnesses, because she knows the testimony of her own conscience. Her language is free and bold, without the guiltiness of broken stops. Her forehead is clear and smooth, as the brow of heaven. Her knees are ever bent to the Throne of grace, her feet travelling toward Jerusalem, her hands weaving the web of righteousness. Good men bless her, good Angels guard her, the Son of God doth kiss her: and when all the world shall be turned to a burning pile, she shall be brought safe to the mountain of joy, and set in a Throne of blessedness forever.

That ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy Prophets, and of the Commandment of us the Apostles of the Lord and Savior.

THE pretended title of that great usurper over the consciences of the Christian world, is fetched from the Succession of Saint Peter. How do his sycophants magnify Saint Peter? But it is their cunning, to reflect all that honor upon their Master. Otherwise, they would shuffle him up in the crowd of the Saints, and make no more reckoning of him than they do of Saint Paul; and that is little enough. But now they call him the Coryphe of the Apostles, the Prince of their souls, the Porter of Paradise, and supreme Lievetenant of the Crown of heaven: as we find it in a book of theirs, which they call, the Occupation of the soul: certainly, the vainest occupation that ever soul was bound prentice to. They tell us, that he was ever placed first, first mentioned, that he wrought the first miracle upon Ananias, that he made the first Sermon to the Gentiles after the coming down of the holy Ghost; that he did first visi•e such as were newly baptized, that he called and held the first Council that the Church prayed sollicitously for him, as for her Head, when he was in prison: that Saint Paul did not hold his Revelations for assured and authentical, till they had passed under the approbation of Saint Peter: that the Churches where 〈◇〉 resident as Bishop are all Patriarchall: that by his appointment Rome is the Mother and Mistress of all the rest. They have a world of other glorious titles for him, all which they mean to themselves. As even a Pope said, Aenea• Sylvius, that was Pius secun••: the former Popes did wisely in setting the 〈◇〉 on work to debate, whether the Donation of Constanti• the great to Sylvester, were good and valid in Law, or no: the better to ship o•er the master in fact, whether there was any such thing at all, or no. So he doth now employ his Parasites, to heap mountains of honors and attributes upon Peters S•ccessor, and to strive who shall most defy him: by this means to smother up the question, whether the Pope be Saint Peters Successor, or no.

I need not tell you of other differences, they are too palpable: Peter forsook the world, and followed Christ: the Pope hath renounced Christ, and follows the world. Peter had neither Gold nor Silver, but he had gifts and graces: the Pope hath neither gifts nor graces; but for Gold and Silver, such store, that he could spare it to shoe his Concubines Palfries. Peter would not suffer Captain Cornelius to crouch to him: the Pope rides a cock-horse on men's shoulders, treads upon Emperors necks, and keeps a quoile like the devil in every kingdom. But to pass over these, Saint Peter refers us to the doctrine of the Prophets and Apostles, for our only direction: the Pope tries his own Title, and imposeth upon our consciences only by tradition. I hope, forbidding of marriage, was none of Peters commandment: worshipping of Images, none of his: prayer to the Saints, prayer for the dead, far from any rule of Saint Peters. He never taught subjects to shake off allegiance to their Sovereigns; he never allowed, much less Sainted Traitors. Fear God, honor the King; this is the voice of Peter. Fear God, kill the King; that is the voice of his Successor. He• quàm dissimilis! How diverse, averse, adverse, perverse is this Successor!

Let all them that will hearken to that which Saint Peter says, (and all they must hearken to it, that will come to the place where Saint Peter is) observe my Text; Bee mindful of the words, &c.

Let all human inventions, in the matter of salvation, die abortive: This is the way, let us walk in it; Bee mindful of the words, &c.

Wherein he commends to us, first, a Treasure. Secondly, and the use of that Treasure. The Treasure is the Doctrine of the Prophets and Apostles: the use of that Doctrine and Treasure is our carefulness to observe it; Bee mindful.

The general parts their are two:

- 1. The Object of their mindefulnesse; The words, &c.
- 2. Their mindefulnesse of that Object; Be ye mindful.

Of the Object first severally, and then jointly. The former specialty of the Object is,

The words which were spoken before by the holy Prophets.] Not to dwell upon the particulars; as that, first, they are worth, for their plain certainty; not shadows, and abstruse paradoxes. Secondly, spoken before, for their antiquity; not things of yesterday; no new devices. Thirdly, spoken by the Prophets, for the authority: men that had their commission immediately from God himself. Prophet hath ever been a reverend and honorable name. Fourthly, by holy Prophets, for the sanctity: they passed not through the lips of a Bal•am, ⟨◇⟩ Caiaphas; but from men whose persons God had sanctified, for his heavenly errands. They were the Pr••nno••ai•• of Heaven, the Registers of the Truth, the Secretaries of the holy Ghost, the Spokes-men of the Deity, the Mouthes of ⟨◇⟩ who is the Fountain of Wisdom, and Oracle of all Truth. We ⟨◇⟩ accomplished, what they fore-told, and their Prophecy become History.

The words of the Prophets, is the Law of God. This is the Law and the Prophets. All the Prophets, and the Law prophesied until John. God hath joined them together, let no man put them asunder. But it is objected; The L•• and the Prophets were until John: Why then should we be mindful of them now? They were until John, as a preparation and prediction of Christ's coming. He being come, that prediction, that preparation is ended: but still the Law and the Prophets remain both to confirm us in the s••ith of Christ; and direct ⟨◇⟩ the way of obedience to Christ. A man doth not despise his Schoolmaster, because he hath learned his Lesson. The Prophets were expounders of the Law, the Law was the Text of the Prophets. The Decalogue was that Magna Charta; to which, as to their common Principle, all their conclusions were reducible. As in Arithmetic, when we pass the number of ten, all the latter numbers be but compounded resumptions of the former. So all the Doctrine of the Prophets is but the exposition and application of those ten words, which God's own finger wrote in two Tables. Therefore Malachi, the last of the Prophets, to make a transition to the Gospel, in the very point of his passage towards the prediction of Christ and of John Baptist, seals up the Old Testament in his last Chapter, with Remember ye the Law of Moses my servant. Moses was a Prophet, and a Servant; the Law-bringer, not the Law-maker: yet God calls it the Law of his servant Moses.

The sum, then, of these words of the Prophets, is the Law of God: to this the Apostle here refers us; as Isaiah did before, To the Law and to the Testimony. How great is the honor of it, how honorable the greatness! The Law of God is perfect, converting the soul, &c. There is the great honor. I have written to them the great things of my Law: and, Fulfill ye the royal Law: there is the honorable greatness. Master, which is the great Commandment in the Law? (was the Lawyers question) whereas all God's Commandments were great, upon assignation of any one above the rest, he meant to take occasion of accusing him. Therefore Christ's answer is full of circumspection; Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart: this he calls Primum & magnum, The first and great Commandment. To this epitome of the first Table he subjoins, that the second is like unto it: and lastly adds, On these two Commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets. To this all Laws are subjected, and from this all good Laws are derived. For Authority, it gives all the Decrees of men the Checkmate. S. Augustine hath from Seneca a plain confession, That the Jews, otherwise a contemptible people, wheresoever they came, Victi victoribus leges ded•rum; the conquered gave Laws to their conquerors. To make a Law, is the chiefest point of majesty: and the best Law-makers have commended their best constitutions, by deriving them from God's Commandments: as if they could no way better confirm them, than by confessing where they stole them. Some of them have been so short of this conformity, that they have set down gross sins for their learned Statutes, and trespassed upon common Principles. Among some of them, murder hath scarce been punishable, adultery was pardonable, and theeverie commendable. But the pure, perfect, and unchangeable Law of God leaves no evil uncensured, no good uncommended: for which large comprehension, Peter Martyr compared the Ten Commandments, to the Ten Predicaments.

The best of this worlds wisdom, is but to drive corruption inwards; Vitia (◊) abscindere, sed abscondere: and in making men conformitants, many times to make them hypocrites. But God's Word hath a reach to the very secret purposes, and inmost affections: sharper than a two-edged sword, dividing between the joints and the marrow, and discerning the thoughts and intents of the heart. Like an Anatomist, searching and prying into every piece of a member, and reading a sound Lecture upon the smallest particle of a particle, spelling like a Criticke, the fractions of imperfect, and as yet unshapen cogitations of concupiscence. Whereas of a thought, kept within the compass of a thought, no Law of mortal man can determine. So that if a sinner can wash his bloody hands with Pilate, and not betray his bloody heart by word, deed, or writing, he cannot be by man found out.

Such is the perfection and majesty of this sacred Doctrine, though all advocates should be corrupt, and all champions cowards; that it is not a bare advertisement, which is granted by the Papists; but a Rule: not a potential Rule, only in regard of fitness; but an actual Rule: not partial only, for that is contrary to the nature of a Rule, which admits of no addition; but totally definitive and directive for God's service, and all our actions. I have seen an end of all perfection, but thy Commandment is exceeding bread. Broad enough, but we have staggering feet: the drunkard can scarce keep his path, though it be as broad as the Kings high-way. Our souls legs are borne crooked, and by the custom of sin we warp them more and more. The Idiot could say of his crooked sticks, that would not fadge and work to his mind; that they never grew but in the night, and that was the reason they could not see to grow straight. We take perverse, irregular, and crooked steppes, because we walk in the night of our own willful blindness. The Way is broad enough, but the proud bear too great a breadth for the Way. The Rule is straight, but we are crooked: and, that which is crooked, can hardly be made straight. Crooked branches are straightened two ways; either by the hand of man, or by the fire. Those whom the hand of God's grace doth not rectify, are bound in bundles like thorns, and cast into that unquenchable Oven, the fiery Pit of Hell.

The Commandments of us the Apostles of the Lord and Savior.] This is the other Specialtie of the Object. The Prophets were Legal Apostles, the Apostles are Evangelical Prophets. Both these came to the world with Commandments: they do often indeed persuade us, counsel us, beseech us; (I beseech you by the mercies of God; we pray you in Christ's stead) but even those requests be Precepts. Doth not God therefore command, because he entreats? The very suites of Kings are Imperative: they must not ask, and be denied: much more shall we find the persuasions of God, Obligations to us. It is his gracious mercy, that entreats us to do that, which we are bound to do without entreaty. Every wise man will be easily requested to do himself good. When God sues to us, to save us, yea, to accept of salvation; we are sullen and desperate fools, to hinder our own preferment. Paul pleads to Philemon, his age and bondage, for arguments; the power of his authority, and Patent for it, in Christ. Yet, as if love were the strongest charm; Propter charitatem petendo petos, for loves sake I rather beseech thee: Was not this Petition as valid as any Injunction, in the heart of a friend, of a brother?

That the Apostles had power to command, is so far from being a question, that it is plain they could convey this power to others, by the imposition of their hands. I give thee charge in the sight of God, who quickeneth all things. And Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded. I charge thee, to charge them. In the former, there is Episcopal authority: he that gives the charge, if he be not the chief on the Bench, yet is he greater than the Jury. In the other, there is Evangelical sufficiency; by virtue whereof, Timothy is enabled to charge men, that they receive no other Doctrine. Pracipe divitibus, Charge the rich: the rich are commonly great: nobility and wealth is joined together. Curse not the King in thy thought, nor the rich in thy Bed-chamber. That rich nameless Churl is ghesed by some to be Herod, or some other King. The rich man is a little King, among his neighbors; a petty God, to his underlings. Dives, quasi Divus. Yet, be they rich or noble, they are under the command of an Apostle; yea, under the charge of a Priest, in the Word of Jesus Christ. Kings themselves are not here exempted, though they have absolute command over all men in their dominions: as the Fathers interpret that of King David; Against thee only have I sinned: because he could sin against nobody else: yet Nathan may reprove him in the Name of God. That transported Shaveling soared too high a pitch, when in his imperious Bull he commands the Angels. But we may safely say, that all Powers beneath the Angels are liable to our spiritual charge. Even the rich men, that speak with command to others, must be commanded by their Preachers. I am a man under authority, having soldiers under me. The Centurion had many under his authority, himself is under the authority of another. We have a spiritual charge over their souls, that have a temporal power over our bodies.

God hath committed the Keys of Heaven to his Church: some let them rust in their hands, for want of use: Teachers, that do not teach; that can neither open the doors of Heaven for others, nor for themselves. Some alter the Wards, that they can neither open, nor shut: as it is feigned of Pope Sixtus Quintus, that after his death he went to Hell; but by good luck the Porter would not let him in, though he had highly deserved it; but sent him to a place under his own command, Purgatory: this he long sought, but could never find. At last he took heart, and went to Heaven, fearfully knocking at the gate: Saint Peter asked him, why he knocked, considering he had the Keys? he answered, Because the Wards were altered, and they could not now unlocke the door. I would the Moral of this fiction were not too true: But alas, who sees not, that the Pontificians have so bruised the Keys with breaking men's heads, and so furr'd them with the blood of innocents, that they are not able to open the gates of Heaven? Some keep them bright, with fair and continual usage, whom God blesseth with the letting in of many souls.

Surely, if now we shall appeal to your consciences; the fault is not in the Keys, but all the Rust is in the Lockes, your worldly hearts. God hath set us to Command; and we command, and go without. Alas, by this contempt we cannot gain; but you are sure to lose: for if our word have lost the power in you, you have lost your right in Heaven. We dare wager our own coming there, that you ordinarily come not thither without us. It is true, Spectaculo facti sumus; men come to Church, look us in the face, and give us the hearing: but we have not the credit with them, to believe us. Domine, quis credidit auditis nostro? Lord, who hath believed our report? We are weak, and you are strong: you are honorable, and we are despised. But if we may not be your Commanders, yet let us be your Counsellors. Or if that place be too good for us, yet still we will be humble Petitioners to you, that you would be pleased to save your own souls. If your houses were on fire, and we should command you to quench them: if your bodies were sick, and we should charge you to send for the Physician; you would think it a kindness in us more than needs: you would do all this, though we held our peace. Of all your Utensils and moveables, do you make least account of your souls? Alas, that all our Precepts must be turned into tears, weeping over you, as Christ over Jerusalem, for her At noluisti! Alas, that we should give a charge, and no soldiers come in to the Standard of Christ! You will say, we are servants; and servants are not to command, but to obey. Indeed we are Christ's servants, and your servants for Christ's sake: and if you could set us to a meaner office, we would not refuse it, to win your hearts. But servants may be employed to bring their Masters commands to their fellows. God called Moses his servant, yet he gave him authority to make Laws for the government of his people. God hath sent his servants, and his Farmers will encreate them: he sent his Son, saying, They will reverence my Son; but they did not. If he now see men misuse his servants, he will no more trust them with his own Son Jesus.

But if men dis-regard our command, let them reverence a higher than ours, the Apostles; yea, a higher than theirs, the Commandment of God himself. Nor can we here distinguish, but to the willful deceiving of ourselves: for you receive from your Preachers none other command, than they received from the Apostles, and the Apostles from the holy Ghost. It is not our Word, but theirs; not theirs, but the Lord's. The Apostles were the Trumpets of the Word, the Corners of the living God, the Notaries of Heaven, the Secretaries of the Church, the first Princes and chief Peers of Christianity; whose mouths were filled with Oracles, and their hands with Miracles, and their pens with Mysteries: the publishers of Mercy, and ingrossers of the Covenant of Grace: the Master-builders of God's House, and the noble Columns in the Building. The twelve Patriarchs, from whose heavenly Seed of the Word descend all true Israelites. The twelve Princes, Generals and Conductors of God's Army, that camped about the great Moses, the Manhood of the Son, the Tabernacle of the Divinity. The twelve Searchers, sent to take a view of the Land of Promise; who have brought us certain news of the inestimable blessings there, flowing with the Milk and Honey of eternal joys and comforts. The twelve selected men, that took twelve Stones out of the Chanell of Jordan, and pitched them in Gilgal: not omitting to set twelve other Stones in the midst of Jordan, where the Ark of God had stood: placing their holy Monuments both in the River, for a witness to the Jews; and out of the River, for a testimony to the Gentiles. The twelve Fountaines, which the people found in the Desert, at Elim; those Wells of salvation, where thirsty souls sit down and drink. The twelve Loaves of Shew-bread, which stood before the face of the Highest; that only the High Priest Jesus brake in morsels, and gave to his Church. The twelve precious Stones, set in the Pectorall of Aaron: choice living Stones, taken into the breast of Christ. The twelve young Lions, which support the Throne of the great King; not the like in any Kingdom. The twelve Oxen, that carried the molten Sea of God's infinite mercies to all parts of the world; three looking East, and three to the West; three to the North, and three to the South. The twelve Officers of the glorious Solomon, our King of Peace; that make his provision of holy souls, throughout all the coasts of Israel. The twelve Stars in the Crown of the Church, that Spouse of Christ. We may call them the Twelve months, that make up the year of Grace. The twelve manner of Fruits of the Tree of Life, that yields her Fruit every month. The twelve Angels, the twelve Gates, the twelve Foundations, of the new Jerusalem; whose length, breadth, and heighth was twelve thousand furlongs. And they shall sit upon twelve Thrones, judging the twelve Tribes of Israel. So precise is the number of Twelve, that when one of them miscarried, another must be chose, to supply his place. From them, we are said to receive the twelve Articles of our Belief: from them we know, that we receive the Doctrine of the Gospel. Ye $\langle \diamond \rangle$ what Commandments we gave you, by the Lord Jesus. So work, as we have commanded you. They had power to command; I would we were as sure of grace, to obey.

Thus far we have considered these Objects severally: now take them jointly, and they afford us some more observations:

1. Neither Prophets nor Apostles did ever command in their own names: but the former came with, Thus saith the Lord: and the other in the Name of Christ. By virtue of this Commission and victorious Name, they commanded all things, even diseases and devils to depart, and were not disobeyed. By the Name of Jesus Christ doth this man stand here before you whole. As they did all by his power, so they referred all to his glory: and added, This stone, set at naught by you builders, is become the head of the corner. This is the fundamental Stone, We are b...e upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner Stone. They are foundations to us, Christ is the sole foundation of all. The wall of the City had twelve foundations, and in them the Names of the twelve Apostles of the Lamb. They are foundations of the wall, not of the City: not of salvation, but of the Ministry of salvation: not principal, but instrumental: Non authors, sed lapides. A foundation cannot lay it self, it must have a builder. Christ laid them first of all other, in the bottom of the wall; in that respect they are called foundations. As Ezra 7. In the first day of the first month, he began to go up, or was the foundation of the going up; that is, the first or chief Leader. Thus not one Apostle, but all are equally foundations.

Contrary to that senseless, ungodly, unlucky corruption of the Text, that would transfer all to Peter; under the color of super hanc petram: whereas the Scripture calls the twelve Apostles equally fundamental. Mind the commands of Vs, not of Me, saith Peter himself here. Christ himself indeed is that Petra, that Rock; Other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. First, he is Lapis fundamentalis, the foundation of our faith: upon whom we build so sure and firm, that neither gusts nor floods, neither storms nor streams can overthrow us. Secondly, he is Lapis angularis, the Roote of love and peace, which binds us together in the unity of the Spirit. Malitious and contentious souls are loose rubbish and refuse, not stones in God's edifice. In all our book-controversies, and sword-controversies, let us refer the decision to him: then do we set the corner stone in the right place. Thirdly, he is Lapis pacificus, all sin is a make-bate, he is the Peace-maker between God and us. That Jacob's stone, whereon we rest our heads and hearts; and see Angels descending to comfort us: upon this stone we lie down, and have quiet rest. Fourthly, he is Lapis foedificus, a Stone of Covenant betwixt Jacob and his father Laban: the league between our heavenly father and us. Mizpah, a beacon or watch-tower, to warn us of our enemies. Fifthly, he is Lapis triumphalis, that shall give us the victory: David's stone, wherewith he slew the Giant: by this we shall be able to conquer Satan and the most monstrous sins, and triumph over them. Sixthly, he is Lapis petralis, which being smitten by the rod, gushed out floods of water. When he was stricken with death, there issued out streams of blood to save us: better than all their privileges, though they had Oile out of the rock, and honey out of the stone. Cantent inhabitatores petrae e vertice montium. But if a son ask bread, will his father give him a stone? Nay, but this stone is bread; a living Stone, the Bread of life; Lapis & panis. He did command this stone to be made bread: therefore we may as well say, Da Petram vivificam, as Da panem quotidianum. But let us take heed of offending this Stone: for whosoever shall fall upon this stone, shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall it shall grind him to powder. We may fall upon this Stone, or this stone may fall upon us: and then it had been better that a millstone were hanged about our necks, and with us thrown into the sea. But blessed are they that conform their lives to the doctrine of the Apostles and Prophets, and build their faith on this foundation.

2. Saint Peter refers us to the words of the Prophets, and commandments of the Apostles, and precisely chargeth our mindefulnesse with these lessons. Not human traditions, not the constitutions and impositions of usurpers, that pretend the authority of the Apostles: fond men, that undertake to devise a better way to heaven, than he that dwells there hath set down; who will admit none that come not his way: these are but artificial paper-walls, set up against the Apostolical Canons. Not the inventions of men, though of those pure brains that pretend most, yea mainly for the word: for sometimes they prove but Lapwings, that cry, Here 'tis, Here 'tis; when their nests are far enough off. Athemus tells us that the Stoics had an opinion, that no man could do well but a wise man; not so much as make good Lentil-broth. And therefore because no man was held wise but Zeno, no man would make Lentil-pottage but after his receipt: and that receipt was so curious and exact, that it prescribed the twelfth part of a Coriander seed. We have many simple men, and more simple and sinful women, that have little or nothing besides a will, and a tongue; yet are so conceited of doctrine, that if Zeno prescribe it not, the broth is naught, death is in the pot: and for every sup of broth they must run to Zeno: when (God knows) all at the best is but a poor mess of pottage. These men have coats of their own weaving, whose inside is altogether their own lining: only they face it with the words of a Prophet or Apostle, and have their Text from the Bible.

Not the wisdom of the Philosophers, nor all the morality that drop'd in verse from the pens of the Poets; be the instruments of our building up to heaven. The wine that is made of the vines of the mountains, is finer and pleasanter than the Grapes of the valleys. What are the dregs of this flat bottom, man's knowledge, to the wisdom that descendeth from above, the Hill and Throne of God? I grant, there is use of the other: secular arts are like lobbies to the lodging chambers: nay, not so good, but rather the garnish and painting of the rooms: nay, inferior still, (for the former are for muniment, the other for ornament) but indeed stairs to the parlours, as we make them to our Pulpits: herbs in a glass of wine: sallets and sawces to tempt down our meats: but still the meat it self is the Word of God, that Christ may be all in all.

3. Neither the Prophets without the Apostles, nor the Apostles without the Prophets, but both together. The Gospel, without the Law, may lift men up to presumption: the Law without the Gospel, may sink them down to desperation. God hath provided a gracious remedy for both these fatal evils of man; the sweet composition of severity and mercy; the mixture of Law and Gospel; as Moses and Christ met upon the Mount. To direct our obedience, he hath given us his Law: to answer for our disobedience, he hath added his Gospel; that what we could not do in ourselves, we might see perfectly done for us by Jesus Christ. Lex imperando ligat, Fides impetrando solvit. The Prophets wrapped up the Gospel in the shadows of the Law: the Apostles opened the Law in the clear light of the Gospel. Lex data est, ut gratia quareretur; Gratia data est, ut Lex impleatur. The Law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ. Woe to them that adhere to the Law, and think to fulfill it well enough without the Gospel: the Gun-powder shall sooner be able to stand the fire, and not be blown up. Woe to them that so stick to the Gospel, that they cast away all respect of the Law: they would be fed from God's own trencher, and that of his daintiest fare, and yet do him no service. But their Livery shall be pulled over their ears, and they sent away with a Nescio vos. But blessed are they that join them both together in heart and life: that have one eye upon the words of the Prophets, the Law of God, to give it obedience with all their powers: and the other eye upon the doctrine of the Apostles, the Gospel of Christ, to believe in it with all the hearts. The Lord shall bind them up in the bundle of life, lift up their souls to the participation of joy with the Prophets and Apostles, and make them heirs with the Lord of all, his holy Son JESUS CHRIST.

4. The rule of Truth is delivered to us by the Prophets and Apostles: Truth is God's peculiar, appropriated to his holy Word. He begat us with the Word of Truth. Sanctify them through thy Truth: thy Word is Truth. The Law is his Truth: The Judgments of God are Truth. The Gospel is his Truth, Ye have been taught, as the Truth is in Jesus. Yea, an eminent Truth; distinguished from Natural or Philosophical truth. Nature is true in her principles, Philosophy true in her deductions and conclusions, the Law true in her impositions: all true, but no man can rest his salvation upon them. The Law was perfect Truth, but we were weak. It could not save us, because we could not keep it. Natural truth is like the Sea; there is abundance of it, but so salt that it can never slake our thirst. For Legal Truth; suppose a malefactor comes before a just Judge; you may rest upon it, that he will do him justice, but he must look for no mercy: but on the Evangelical Truth we may repose our souls. The good man will yield to all truth, and never be ashamed of such a victory. What is more glorious than to be overcome of Truth? This Truth is the Word of God; let it overcome us with our willing submission, or it shall overcome us against our wills to our confusion.

This Word and Truth is written by the holy Prophets and Apostles: for both in Creation and Redemption, God wrought all by his Word. Peter shall tell thee words, whereby thou and all thy house shall be saved. This is that Rule which binds the Conscience; let us walk by this Rule. Our neighbors of Rome have set up new Lesbian Rules, which they prescribe as necessary to salvation. The Rule of Saint Francis, the Rule of Saint Dominic; their Augustine's, Iacobines, Benedictines: yea, they hold one man's Baptism better than another's, one man's Order holier than another's, one man's Rule perfecter than another's; any Rule better than that which Saint Paul so blesseth, the Rule of Regeneration: And as many as walk after this Rule, peace be on them and mercy, and upon the Israel of God. If that Apostle were now living on earth, to see their innumerable Orders, and ask them as they pass, what they are: and hear one answer; I am a Franciscan; another, I am a Dominican; another, I am a Carthusian; and scarce any one say, I am a Christian: he had cause to think them all Antichristian. He was angry enough at that, when one said, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos; and called it Carnal. But now Moses and Samuel, Paul and Apollos are almost worn out, and we have Monks and Friars in their room. Yea, that teeming Whore of Babylon hath in these latter days brought forth a Monster, Iesuitisme; a Mungrill, begot betwixt Superstition and Policy. Which though Pope Nicholas the fourth, in a Bull, a blasphemous Bull, preferred before the Franciscans, and the Franciscans before the Angels; yea, that Ignatius Loyola lived a more perfect life than Christ himself: yet certainly, to all honest hearts they appear that Mystery of Iniquity, which Saint Paul prophesied should wait upon the Antichrist. If the manifest profession of Lying, of Murders, of Treasons, of the butchering of Princes, and raising tumults in States, be not Iniquity: what is? If again, for Kings to admit them to their Council-Tables, to follow their damned advices, to give them Colleges and mighty exhibitions; be not a Mystery: there is none. Put them together: that the horriest sinners upon the face of the earth should skrew themselves into the favor of rich men, and Princes; surely can be no less than the Mystery of Iniquity: and this to me, is instead of a thousand proofs, that their Master is the Antichrist. That they should do all this under color of the Christian faith, and make God himself Carnificem suum, is a monstrous Mystery.

How does Ephraim and Manasseh, the Jesuit and all other Orders fight one with another, and all against Judah? In a City of Spain, a Jesuit in the midst of his Sermon fell into a Traunce, if we could believe him: and starting up, he told his Auditory, that he had been in a Dream, and the Scene lay in Hell. There he saw many souls of all conditions, (naming them whom he thought fit to traduce) from Coblers to Emperors. Among the rest, he pretended to see abundance of Franciscans; whereat he stood amazed, that men so holy, and strict of life, should come thither. This Dream of his stuck in the Franciscans stomachs, till they could requite him with another. Therefore on the next occasion, in the same Pulpit, a Franciscan preaching, fell into the like Traunce: and waking, told them that he had also been in Hell; and could not deny, but some sprinkling of Franciscans and other Orders were there. But his wonder was, that in Hell he saw never a Jesuit: at which Belsebub laughing, told him his error; That the number of Jesuits in Hell did exceed all other Societies, put them all together. Where are they? replies the Franciscan. Alas, says the Devil, they are in a room below: the common Jail is too good for them, they are safe bound in the Dungeon, stowed in the Hold, under Hatches. For if they were suffered to come to the upper Deckes, they would set all Hell in an uproar. It was well it was but a Dream, for their sakes: it might happily have been a truth, for the Churches sake. Therefore as they that have made a new Gospel, Evangelium Quintum, of Statisme; though not so plainly as those Monks of Paris, with their Evangelium aeternum, which they offered to be canonized, but by good luck it was refused: yet as prodigiously, as blasphemously; whiles they teach the Prophets and Apostles to speak Treason and Murder, and to give dispensation for Lying: what Hell can be not enough for such Priests?

O ye blessed Secretaries of Heaven, how would you disdain to have their Decretals come in competition with your sacred Canons? How would it grieve you, to see Jesus persecuted by a Jesuit? That blessed Name hath always cast out Devils, it never brought in any: though these sons of Sceva have made bold to usurp it, and come in fiends, under it. Shall we call that Christ's Religion, which is not derived from the Prophets and Apostles; nay, which contradicts both Apostles and Prophets? Even the Prelates of their own Church have compared their School-men to Astronomers; who to save the Phoenomenon, framed to their conceit Eccentrickes, and Epicycles, and a wonderful Engine of Orbes, though no such things were: so they, in the Council of Trent, to save their Politiā Romanam, devised a world of distinctions, evasions, shifts, and Paradoxes: and instead of Prophets and Apostles, brought us Poets and Philosophers: that not only we, whom they hold adversaries; but many of their own have said, concerning the Laws of that Council; That they are beholding to Aristotle for diverse Articles of their Faith. This I thought good to touch; to show the difference betwixt Saint Peters direction, in my Text; and his direction, that pretends himself Saint Peters Successor; and that he can never err, out of that Chair. If they have forsaken the Prophets and Apostles, it is time for us to forsake them. If they allege, that they still retain the Scripture, and keep themselves to the words thereof: I answer, that Saul kept part of God's Commandment, in destroying Amalek; yet for all that, Samuel tells him plainly, Thou hast rejected the Word of the Lord, and the Lord hath rejected thee. Or if they should take nothing from these words, yet their adding to them, and equalizing their own constitutions with them, shall make them liable to that fearful Curse.

That ye may be mindful of the words.] This mindfulness consists in two things; our Observation, and our Conversation.

For Observation; God never meant his Word for a vanishing sound: that which is kept upon eternal record in Heaven, and is a constant dweller in the elected heart; must not be a sojourner, much less a passenger, with us. The Lord takes it in foul scorn at the hand of his creatures, to speak, and not be heard; to be heard, and not minded. Most men hear Sermons, as they entertain news out of the Indies; matters unconcerning them. Let us mind these things: if any virtue be commended, to practice it: if any vice be condemned, to avoid it: if any consolation be insinuated, to appropriate it: if any good example be propounded, to follow it: so mind that thou hearest, as if it were spoken only to thyself. Is it Comfort? I repent, and 'tis thine. Is it Judgment? repent, and 'tis not thine. They minded John Baptists preaching, that came to him after the Sermon, with those material Quaert's, What shall we do? As Domitian, perceiving many of his predecessors in the Empire to be so hated of the people, asked, How he might so rule, as to be loved? and was answered, Tu fac contra: Examine what they did, and do thou the contrary. Hearing prepares us for the way of salvation, Minding disposeth us for the travail of it, Doing is the journey it self. The remaining flesh will tempt us: Joab's sword had not go a more usual trick of falling out of the sheath, than our corrupt nature to run into pollutions. Those Agags, that are spared by the indulgent eye of Saul, favored by the flesh, must be hewed in pieces by the sword of Samuel, by the Word of the Spirit. He that is furnished with weapons, and suffers a feeble unarmed enemy to overcome him, hath no courage in him. If the flesh, which in all regenerate souls hath received the deaths wound, foil us at every Boat, we do not mind our weapon, or (which is more cowardly) are afraid to use it. Some indeed feel no assaults; they have believed and minded the Word always; as they pretend: but the state which was always good, was in very deed never good.

We are bound to mind both Prophets and Apostles: the large looking glass presents to a man his whole self: when it is broken into many small pieces, the least of them doth so still, but not so perfectly. Every line of the Law shows us our miserable estate, every promise of the Gospel yields matter of comfort: let this glass stand whole before us, that we may observe all our lineaments by it; then shall we be nobis noti, known to ourselves. He that receiveth the seed into good ground, heareth and understandeth, and brings forth fruits. The ground must be susceptible, fit to receive the seed. The seed must be conducive, fit for the quality of the ground. As we do not thunder Judgments to the broken heart, nor offer the dugs of mercy to the lips of profaneness. So let everyone mind his own portion: let sinners apply those threatenings that belong to them, that by repentance they may have right to those blessings, which yet belong not to them. The Word of God is like Gold, saith the Psalmist: Gold is so ductile that an ounce of it will be made to cover an acre of land. We can have no wants, which this riches cannot supply, if we mindefully apprehend it. Lex est instar speculi, quod maculas ostendit: Evangelium instar fontis, quod ostensas abluit. The Law is a glass to show our spots. (I had not known sin but by the Law) the Gospel is a fountain to cleanse them. Lex est manus, quae viam monstrat: Evangelium est brachium, quod in viam portat. They that mind not the Prophetical hand of direction, shall not have the Evangelical hand of comportation. Cui veritas comperta sine Deo? Cui Deus cognitus sine Christo? Cui Christus exploratus sine Spiritu sancto? Cui Spiritus Sanctus accommodatus sine verbo? Cui verbum profuit sine fidei obsequio? We cannot find the truth without God, nor know God without Christ, nor reach Christ without the Spirit, nor receive the Spirit without the Word, nor profit by the Word without faith. If we truly mind the Law and the Prophets, we find ourselves miserable sinners. Totus homo est inversus Decalogus: to stand in a full contrariety to all the Law, is the very definition of man. The *mind*ing of this, will work sorrow: Abraham cannot but be troubled with malapert Hagar: the flesh is a cursed concubine, as Anthony of Guevarra would not wish a man worse sorrow for his sins, than he had that had an ill Wife. The feeling of this smart will teach us to decline the cause: contraries are cured by contraries. Maledixisti? Benedicas. Hast thou cursed? Bless. Hast thou defrauded? Restore, Hast thou envied? Love. Hast thou offended in excess? Fast.

Many a sin had been avoided by this mindfulness; and yet that sin is the worse that is done after mindfulness. There is a practical judgment in the heart; while it considers (on the one side) the danger of sin, in offending God: and (on the other side) the pleasure and profit of sin, which redounds to the flesh: while it puts in the one balance, God and all his Commandments: in the other, sin and all his appurtenances. If now after this poisoning, ⟨◇⟩ prefers sin, it had better never have weighed them: this is indeed to refuse Christ, and to choose Barabbas.

There was never more need of motives to mindfulness: (for this connexeth the two verses.) If the pure minds had need be warned and awakened, what shall we say to the dissolute and indisposed souls, that love on the Lord's days their own private thresholds, or a room in Tavernes, better than the Courts of God's House? We cry to drunkenness, that wallows in the puddle of excess; Be mindful, lest the day of judgment find you beasts; and leave you no drink, but a draught of the lake of Brimstone, that shall ever inflame, never cool your tongues: Yes, and they are mindful, upon the next occasion to follow their cups. We cry to adultery, •umbling in the luxurious bed of uncleanness; Be mindful: lest yourselves and your Strumpets be bound up in bundles, and cast into an unquenchable bed of flames: and they are mindful; but it is to watch the next opportunity of their former wantonness. We cry to Idolatry, that kills herself in the bosom of that Babylonish Whore; Be mindful: or God shall throw you and your Jezebel into the bottomless pit: and they are mindful; but it is for the next Mass, to worship that Stepdame on their knees. We cry to voluptuousness, that swaggers in the supposed Jubilee of her endless pleasures; Be mindful: lest your pastime be shut up in weeping, and howling, and gnashing of teeth: and they are mindful; but it is of their next Rendevous appointed for riot. We cry to oppression, that crusheth the bones of the poor with her bloody jaws; Bee mindful: and they are mindful, but it is of the next cruel purchase. It were great pity, if all their violence and extortion should not extort from the hands of God, their own portion of vengeance. We cry to blasphemers, with whom oaths be as common as the stones in our streets; Be mindful: or God shall fill your mouths with lamentations and curses. We cry to all sinners; Be mindful of the words of Prophets and Apostles: but as Marius said, he could not hear the laws of the noise of Arms: so they cannot be mindful of these things, for being mindful of their sins and pleasures.

This is the fullness of time, wherein God gave his Son unto sinners: and this is the fullness of sin, wherein this gift is despised by sinners. Salvation is preached to the lost, and it is lost among them: Life is offered to the dead, and it is become dead with them. God came unto men, and men will not come unto God. Wonder O Heaven, and be amazed O Earth, at the dullness of our unthankful hearts. It is time for you to be mindful; yea, the time is almost past: now is your salvation nearer than when you first believed: and now is your damnation nearer, than when it was first threatened. We are come to the eleventh hour of the day; there is but a twelfth; a few minutes of time between us and judgment. The Son of man hastens his coming, more than the Sun of Heaven hastens his going down: O be mindful. Shall we tarry to be started with the shrillest Trumpet that ever was blown? Our mindfulness shall then grow perfect, and we shall be wise, but too late. Then will it only serve to revolve those infinite favors of God, that could not win us; and those innumerable persuasions, that could not work upon us. The Foxes have boles, and the Birds of the Air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head. The Foxes have holes in us; crafts, deceits, and subtleties lodge in our hearts; the Birds of the Air have nests in us: pride, vain-glory, and ambition, dwell in our heads; but neither head nor heart will give any room to Christ: he hath no chamber, no bed, no pillow in our souls, whereon to rest his weary head, that is wet with the dew of heaven, while he stands waiting at our doors. It will grieve all the veins of their hearts, to be mindful of these things when they are past recovery; to think in hell how easily they might have been saved, while they lived on earth, and did not regard it. But now let us be mindful of God, and he will be mindful of us. Is he so near us, even within us, and do we forget him? Shall a whole day pass, and neither we speak to God, nor hear him speaking to us? This were too much between man and wife. No Lord, we will be mindful of thee, in giving heed to thy Word. Bee thou mindful of us in thy mercy, and remember us in the day of JESUS CHRIST.

Next, this is for our conversation. It is a barren mindfulness that does not declare it self in an holy fruitfulness. I have heard of a child of nine years old, that could say every syllable of the New Testament by heart, and not fail in returning a line in the right Chapter and Verse: here was an admirable memory. But if all this mindfulness be so confined, if it extend not to practice, we had better never have heard of God's Word. The use of operative arts is all in all; especially in Divinity: without which the Vine (through mindfulness) may yield sweet juice: but (through want of practice) it will not make so much as a pin or peg for service. The Prophets and Apostles did not only teach, but do the will of their Master: as we are mindful of their doctrines, so let us also heed their examples. A speechless life hath more force in it, than a lifeless speech. Good works are unanswerable syllogismes, invincible demonstrations; and make any men Preachers; even Preachers like the Sun and Moon; that their sound goes over all the world, publishing God's glory; not in Hebrew, Greek, or Latin, which many barbarous nations understand not: but in a common language, the mother tongue of every country. The bells that tolled to the Sermons of the Prophets and Apostles, were their miracles: these made way into men's hearts for their doctrine. Miracles are ceased, and now good conversation comes in their place. They carried, as the soldiers of Gideon, in one hand the burning lamp of a good life; in the other, the shrill trumpets of Preaching: with these weapons they conquered the Midian world. Two things are to the esse of a Christian; Profession and Practice of the truth. The best argument of our conversion, is our good conversation: our works do justify that faith, which doth justify us.

The Apostles did not only preach heavenly Sermons, but do gracious deeds: therefore a whole book was written of their Acts. Saint Luke wrote of all that Jesus begun to do and teach: who was a Prophet mighty, not only inward, but in deed. Go and tell John what things ye have heard and seen. Words are but wind, and vanish into wind: a ship leaves as much impression in the Sea, as they do in many an heart. There is an inartificial argument, which is all the country-man's Logic: as the Martyr answered Bishop Boner; My Lord, I cannot dispute for the Truth, but I can die for the Truth; and that was a taking argument. To do well, is the art of a Christian: to do, is every man's: to do well, is the Christians. Bene is of few letters, of great operation; for it is the force of all arts. Rhetoric, is the art of speaking well; Logic, the art of disputing well; Magistracy, the art of governing well: so Christianity is the art of living well. Every Magistrate that governs, doth not govern well: nor doth every Christian that lives, live well. Estote factores verbi: we must distinguish between agere and facere: the first is to do a business whereof nothing comes after it: facere is to make a thing; as when a building is made, it remains. Actors present a show on the stage, which being spoken, and ended, there is an end of it; it hath no farther extent. But Factors trade and traffic in foreign countries; and bring in their masters commodities and adventures, out of which ariseth profit. All the gain of our souls comes from the doing of these things: without which knowledge leaves us but dishonorable to God, uncomfortable to ourselves, scandalous to others: in no nearer terms to happiness, than Balaam, and Judas, and the devil himself; who the more they know, it is the worse for them: they do but teach God how to condemn them.

Thus he that increaseth knowledge, increaseth sorrow. Erasmus in a Dialogue calls such a man, Cyclops Evangeliphorus; a swaggering Ruffian that would be thought a Christian. He had hanging at his girdle, on the one side, a Testament fairly gilt, bound, and bossed: on the other side a bottle of rich sack. To convince him, he is asked; what if he were tied to carry that bottle always at his girdle, and never to taste of it; or to taste it only, and never to drink it down: were not this a punishment as real, as that of Tantalus was Poetical. But what if he did, as his manner was, drink soundly of it; would it not then warm his heart, quicken his spirits, cheare his countenance? Yes, but much more would that Book do so, if he would spiritually feed on it, concoct, digest, and turn it into nutriment, in this life and conversation. Otherwise, it was but a poor use and benefit of his Bible, that one day in a rage he had broken a fellows head with it, that inveighed against the Gospel. Alas, to carry a Bible in our hands, and not to have a lesson of it in our hearts; not to be mindful of this Doctrine in our practice; is but like the Ass that carries dainty burdens, and feeds upon Thistles. In effect, a man knows no more than he does: as the worldling hath indeed no more riches, than he useth to his comfort. The Hebrews had an imprecation; If I forget thee, O Jerusalem; let my right hand forget her cunning. If men will not do the good they know, they shall soon lose the knowledge of the evil they do. It being just with God to punish the shipwreck of a good conscience, with the loss of the fraught of knowledge. He that never gave prescript, does not write himself Physician: why doest thou refuse good deeds, and call thyself Christian? The Angel called his Name Wonderful, because he did wonderfully, and made good his Name by his action. If we lay claim to that honorable name of Christians, let us do the works of Christians. Here lies the difficulty of all: the Doctrine of the Prophets and Apostles is contained in a little room: the Sanctions and Rules to be done, are set down in brief Summaries: so they are soon learned, easily known. But the motions, directions, reprehensions, persuasions, and such appurtenances of practice; these have enlarged the Volume of the Scriptures: these lengthen our Sermons, and multiply books. Line upon line and precept to precept: not for new laws, but pressing obedience to the old. To be effectually mindful.

1. Let us desire the faculty and facility of doing: earnestly to desire it, is one half, yea the best half. Bene velle est dimidium rei. Socrates could say; he that would be an honest man, shall soon be one; and is past the hardest part of the work. An hearty affection to goodness, is the first step to goodness, a great help to goodness, a special sign of goodness. This will breed prayer for goodness, to the fountain of all goodness, Christ: without whom we can do nothing, but lie be calmed, unable to move or promote; as a ship on the Sea, or a mill on the land, without the wind, and breath of his Spirit. Thus let us begin the morning in a serious acknowledgement of our own disability and deadness to every good work; praying for will, as if we had none; and begging grace, as if we were quite empty: grace preventing and subsequent, grace operative and cooperative, grace preserving and perfecting. Let us beseech him not only to regenerate us with new principles of motion; but to renew his inspirations upon every act of ours; that we by Christ, or rather Christ by us and in us may do all things.

2. Let us be thrifty husbands of time and means to be spiritually rich. If a man neglects the occasion, the occasion will neglect him. As we desire that all Sermons should be pertinent and applicatorie to us; (as if, like our Sutes of apparel, they were made for us, and for nobody else, they do so fit us) so let our ears drink in the matter, that our eyes be fixed on our own conscience. Let us lay ourselves to the Rule, and examine how we and that do agree. At the end of every Period let us ask our heart, How have I obeyed this Precept? How have I been bettered by this reproof? How comforted by this promise? Wanton hands gather only the flowers, but good huswives look to the fruit and herbs of the Garden. Some like little children, mind not the Liquor in the Cup, but only the paint and garnish; and in fondness of that, spill the Liquor. Or like Monkeyes, who looking in a Glass, think they see another Monkeyes face, not their own. We are so kind to ourselves, that we can find any man's fault in the Glass of the Scripture, sooner than our own. We have piped to you, but you have not daunced: All that you observe, is the sound of our Pipe, not how your own feet do dance unto it.

3. Let us reduce all to practice. Charmes are said to have no effect, unless one go with a belief unto them. Surely, Preaching shall do us no good, except we come with a mind to be bettered by it. Now it were hard, if after all this discourse of mindfulness, you have not been mindful of the discourse. The Alarm of a Clock is set, to summon us to business at such an hour, but if we wake not with the Alarm, all is lost. It is a common saying, Now the Sermon is done; and it may be, you long to say so at this time. But consider, it is not done, till you have done it. The Christian Tell-truth speaks of a Lady, who asked her servants whether the Sermon was done, or no. They answered; Yes, it is done. But she smartly replied; Dicta, non facta concio: It is spoken, it is not done. You have had many Sermons; for constancy against backsliding, for patience against murmuring, for charity against covetousness, for sobriety against excess, for refraining your tongues from profane speeches and ungodly Oaths; for obedience to the words of the Prophets and Apostles, against the formal profession of perfunctory hearers: Sermons ever spoken, never done. O these were tedious Orations: but on whose side lay the tediousness? How unhappily are all these holy discourses lost, through unmindfulness? How is mindfulness it self lost in the want of practice? The Doer is blessed in his deed: It is our deed, to speak God's Word unto you; to do it, is both ours and yours: Doing crowns all. I will hold you no longer: Now you may say, This Sermon is spoken and done by the Preacher: God grant we may say, It is practiced and done by the hearers.

Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts.

The main scope of the Apostle, both in the latter part of the former Chapter, the beginning of this, and the connection of both, is to cautionate his Converts of relapsing into those sins, from which they are redeemed by the knowledge of Jesus Christ. This strong Bulwark or Skonce he hath fortified against all the battery of the world, and assaults of Satan, by many arguments: First, by discovering the policies and villainies of seducers, those fatal engines of Hell, set to bring backscaped souls, to the kingdom of darkness. Secondly, by the miserable cozenage of those that are perverted by them: who leaving the true liberty, which they counted a bondage; do fall into the true bondage, which they vainly count liberty: so of God's servants, they become Satan's slaves, and sins drudges. Thirdly, by the execrable event of this Apostasy; whereby they become besotted men, entangled birds, polluted beasts, incarnate Devils. Fourthly, by redoubling his Epistles, to inculcate and drive this holy Naile of admonition into their minds; that they may never forget the wretched estate from which they are delivered. Fifthly, by way of encouragement, comforting them in the benefit of their happy progress: wherein if they persevere with steddie faithfulness, their end shall be everlasting life. Sixthly, and lastly, by preventing a scandal, and removing a block, which the malicious spirit might lay in their ways; the Atheistical impiety of many in the latter times: who both by their mouths and manners, persuasions and examples, call Christianity into question, and move a doubt, whether there be a God, or no. Nor do they only dispute this by way of probleme; but are impudent and audacious in the negative, and labor to destroy all opinion of that Deity in the world, which made both the world and them. This then being the main Centre, the Pole, and cardinal Axletree whereon this place moves, I will in general say a little of it.

What man hath so steddily trode on God's earth, that he hath not stumbled; or stumbled, and not fallen: yea fallen, and hath not layne some space on the ground? With what a trembling heart may we look upon the miscarriages of some of God's dearest servants? Noah and Lot by Wine, David and Samson by women, and Solomon worst of all. Who can do other than yearn and fear, to see the woeful wrack of so rich and goodly a Vessel? Was not Solomon He, whose younger years God honored with a message and style of Love? To whom God twice appeared in a gracious Vision, renewing the covenant of his favor? Whom he singled out from all the generations of men, to be the founder of that glorious Temple; which was as clearly the type of Heaven, as himself was of Christ? Was not he that deep Sea of Wisdom, which God had ordained to send forth Rivers and Fountains of all divine and human knowledge, to all Nations, to all Ages? Was not he one of those select Secretaries, whose hand it pleased the Almighty to employ in three pieces of the divine Monuments of sacred Scriptures? Yet even this Solomon fell into a soul defection. Which of us can hope to aspire unto his graces? Which of us can promise to secure ourselves from his ruins? We fall, we fall, even to the lowest hell, if God do not prevent us, if he do not sustain us. Vphold me according to thy Words that I may live: all our weakness is in ourselves, all our strength in God. Let the Lord be strong in our weakness, that our weak knees may be ever steady in his strength. If we fall from our God, as Mephibosheth from his nurse, we presently grow lame. If these holy ones fell, we have cause to look to our standing.

Sin hath a thousand tongues to plead for it, God hath lent me a weak one to plead against it. Let us think thus, when we are tempted to sin; that we are now about to lose our God, to cast away all the hopes and comforts of another world, to rob ourselves of all those sweet mercies we enjoyed; to thrust the Spirit out of doors, which cannot abide to dwell within the noisome stench of our sins; to lock ourselves out of the gates of heaven; to open the g••es of hell, and cast ourselves down headlong into that dungeon. Thus let f••re teach us to repel temptations, but love more prevailingly. Have we found our God so gracious to us, that he hath denied us nothing, either in earth or heaven: and shall we not deny our own lusts for his sake? Hath our dear Savior bought our souls at such a price, and shall he not have them? Was he crucified for our sins, and shall we by our sins crucify him again? Do we take his wages, and do his enemy service? Was his blood so little worth, that we should tread it under our feet? Hath he honored us, that we should dishonor him? Is this the fruit of his beneficence, our thankfulness? Doth he mean us blessedness, and is this the way we take to come unto it? Hath he prepared heaven for us, and do we thus prepare ourselves for heaven? Is this the recompense of his love, to do that which he hates? If we would make surer this remedy, let us look upwards, backwards, inwards, forwards. First, upwards, at the omnipotent greatness, and infinite goodness of that God, in whose face we sin. If we could truly discern the holiness of his nature, the nature of his mercy; though there were no hell, no punishment, we would not transgress. Secondly, backwards, to the innumerable favors, wherewith he hath blessed, graced, honored us: all which are so many bonds, that oblige us to obedience. Thirdly, inwards, to that noble calling wherewith he hath dignified us; the holy profession we have made of that calling, the eye of the world fixed upon that profession; the vow and covenant whereby we have confirmed it; the gracious beginnings of God's Spirit in us, which by this present sin we are about to extinguish. Fourthly, forwards, to the joy which will follow upon our forbearance: compare but the momentary and unpleasing delight of a sin in doing, with that sweet peace of conscience and blessed expectation of glory, which we preserve by avoiding it. If we could think of all this in a temptation, we would fling defiance in the face of Satan; and refuse for the short pleasure of a filthy sin, to lose all these happy and lasting comforts.

But alas, there be many that sin and live not, but there are none that live and sin not. Our comfort is, we have a constant God; who, whom he loves, to the end he loves. I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed. My loving kindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail. The fall of Solomon was a spectacle able to affright all the sons of men; yet not without some glimpse of comfort. Sensible grace might seem to leave him, not final mercy. In the desperate Winter, the sap was gone down to the root, though it shown not in the branches. Solomon removed; the Word of God removed not: My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips. The Lord's favor doth not depend upon man's obedience. If Solomon shall suffer his faithfulness to fail towards his God; God will not requite him with the failing of his faithfulness to Solomon. If Solomon break his covenant with God, God will not break his covenant with the father of Solomon, with the son of David. His correction is limited, he shall smart, he shall not perish. This is our only tenure; The mercy of God endures forever: his promise is Yea and Amen in Christ: and whiles we change, his Word shall stand. This is that which gives strength to the languishing, comfort to the despairing, to the dying life. Whatsoever we are, God will be still himself; true to his Covenant, constant to his decree. The sins of his chosen can neither frustrate his Counsel, nor out-strip his mercy. Their offense hath gone before, their repentance shall follow after; not more slow than sure. Almost ten months doth David run on impetuously in a way of his own, rough and dangerous: at last the conscience of his sin, and fear of judgment shall bring him on his knees; I have sinned greatly in that I have done. It is possible for a sin not to bait only, but to sojourn in the holiest soul: but though it sojourn there as a stranger, it shall not dwell there as an owner. The heart that shall be saved, after some roving of error, will not be long ere it return home to it self; and fall out with that ill guide wherewith it was misled, and with it self for being misled. Now it is resolved into tears, and breaths forth nothing but sighs, and confessions, and deprecations. Solomon, of a wanton lover, shall become a grave Preacher of mortification; and quench those inordinate flames with the tears of his repentance. You might hear him sighing deeply betwixt every word of that his solemn penance, which he would needs enjoin himself before all the world; I have sinned, and am weary of my vanities: Hear now the end of all, Fear God, and keep his Commandments.

But as they that fear the Lord, will not from this mercy fetch matter of presumption; so if any do presume, let them hear their correction. The justice of God is inseparable from his love: there be rods for the backs of sinners, though they be the children of his own Fatherhood. All their devout penance cannot avoid temporal punishments; no child would be whipped, if he might scape for crying. Nothing but love and peace sounded in the name of Solomon: nothing else was found in his reign, while he held in good terms with God. But when once he fell foul with his Maker, all things began to be troubled; and he found many enemies. God that did put away David's sin, even his adultery clothed with murder, upon his penitence; did not yet forbear to strike him; not only in the death of a mis-begotten infant; but in the ruin of his children that nearer concerned him. When with great humiliation he sought for pardon of that needless muster; yet he hath but the choice of three terrible scourges, with which of them he had rather to bleed. He shall have the favor of an election, not of a remission. God would have us make account that our peace ends with our innocence:

the same sin that sets debate between God and us, arms all creatures against us. It is pity we should be at any quiet, while we are fallen out with the God of peace. Sleep pays no debts, but debt breaks many a sleep. When the household-stuff of a Merchant that died far in debt, was set forth to sale; there was one that bought only a pillow: because he thought it had some rare virtue in it to get one asleep; seeing he could sleep on it that ow'd so many debts. But if men be deep in arrearages with God, far in his debt; and yet can sleep and be secure; God bless me from their bed or pillow. Surely I will not go up into my bed, nor give sleep to mine eyes, until I find out a place for the Lord: yea, till the Lord find a place in me. If the father be angry with the son, no joy will down with him: he refuseth not only his sport and pleasure, but even meat and sleep, till he be reconciled. Only then we can be merry, when God hath spoken peace to us in JESUS CHRIST.

Knowing this first, &c.] There be some that allow of the Prophets, not of the Apostles; as the blinded Jews. Some stick to the Apostles, and mind not the Prophets; as profane Libertines, that would have the benefit of the Gospel, but not be tied to the Law. Some deny neither the Prophets nor Apostles in word, but both in effect: while they prefer to them both their own traditions and constitutions, as do the Papists. There be other that deny all, reject all; which are the Atheists: upon whose discovery we are now fallen.

Knowing this first; be not ignorant of so infallible a truth. That there shall come; if none such yet appear: they will be manifest too soon. In the last days: all times have been evil, the last are the worst: some perhaps may antedate this term, for the Apostles time was not free from Infidels. Scoffers; such as make a mock of all religion and godliness, and labor to disgrace the worship of God with foul aspersions. Walking after their own lusts: this is the end and scope of all their forced and forged imputations: they would put out the candle, that they might walk the more securely in the dark. The Word of Truth controles their vicious affections; therefore they, to maintain those affections, control the Word of Truth: but the truth shall confound them all.

In the former verse Saint Peter charged us with the mindefulnesse of the Prophets; now he is become a Prophet himself, fore-telling future things that shall happen in the latter times. The parts of the Text are A - Preparation; Knowing this first.

- Prediction; There shall come in the last days.
- Description; Scoffers, walking after their own lusts.

In the Preparation we have to observe three things:

1. The carefulness of the Apostle to remove a scandal, that might trouble them in their way of integrity. If this be the way of truth, why is it not generally embraced? Why do the great Politicians of the world, which have so deep an insight into the nature of things, despise it? Why do they expose it to contempt, if it were the infallible Rule of verity? To clear this Dilemma, to resolve this doubt; know this first, that such men shall come in the last times; it stands with God's Ordinance: not a scoff shall fall upon his Gospel, nor any mis-usage be done to his servants, without a Providence. It is his just will to befool all those, that will be wise without him. Yea, therefore is it the more likely to be the truth, because the wits of the world dispute against it. Where shall you find Tertullus, but fee'd and retained against Paul? If a stranger come, all the Dogs of the Town will be barking at him. There is nothing causeth so much noise and wrangling, as the opposition of goodness.

Example is a cruel Tyrant, and commands Imitation. There is one artless persuasion, that prevails more with the world, than all the places of reason: Thus did my forefathers: Thus do the most: I am neither the first, nor the last. How many millions miscarry upon this ground? Men commonly think that either safe or pardonable, for which they can plead a precedent. But they sails in a weak Bottom, that have no more warrant for their resolution; than the practice of others. The mind can never be steady, while it stands upon others feet; nor until it be settled upon such grounds of assurance, that it will rather lead than follow: till it can say with Joshua; Whatsoever becomes of the world, I and my house will serve the Lord. Woe be to him, whom the scoffs of the world can flowt out of his faith. Say, the stream of the time doth run against godliness, shall we not swim against the stream? You will reply, What can one man do against a whole throng of wickedness? Yet this good comes of an unprevailing resistance, that God forbears to plague where he finds but a sprinkling of faith. As the celestial bodies, which being carried about with the sway of the highest Sphere, yet creep on their own ways: so let us continue the course of our own holiness, against the swinge of common corruptions. Thus shall we both deliver our own souls, and help to with-hold judgment from others. The howling of the Owl stops not the *••*ging of the Nightingale; nor doth the Eagle forbear her flight, because there is a Raven in her way: the barking of the Dog stays not the shining of the Moon. Never let the taunts of Ishmael make Isaac out of love with his inheritance.

2. Knowledge is needful, not only of the main substance, but even of circumstances: there is no concerning matter whereof God would have us ignorant. The way of Salvation; that's the best knowledge; that unum necessarium, without which we cannot be happy. Seek for it as for hid treasures. The Mine of God lies not within the reach of the first spade; we must dig deep to find it. First seek the Kingdom of Heaven; then refuse not temporal things. There be some things we would know for avoidance: Mark them which cause divisions, and avoid them. It is a true saying, Knowledge is no burden: the more a man hath, the less he feels the weight. That he wants, you may hear him confess: you never hear him complain of too much. He that sits down with an imagined sufficiency of knowledge, is not at all delivered from the mist of ignorance. The Pontificians flatter their people, as those Confederates of Corah did Israel; The Congregation is holy enough. The people are wise enough. But what, Do we look to be made wise by miracle? To have all knowledge inspired into us at once? Must not Moses be trained up in the wisdom of Egypt, and Paul in the School of Galael? It may be, we are but newly dedicated to the Lord, and God hath but begun with us, because we have yet but begun with him: we may not look for sudden motions, and strange inspirations, without time, growth, and degrees. Scholars do not shoot up in a night, like Mushromes: nor is their coming to knowledge like Caesars expedition to conquest; Veni, vidi, vici. Some early wits have presumed to wrest knowledge from their mother in a short space; as the prodigal son did wring his portion out of the hands of his father: much good might it do them: and I would to God, that what they got by sudden and uncouth achieving, they would not, as he did, waste it again by riotous living. Shall they that never sweet at their desks, so quickly know enough to serve their turns, that they should sit down, and sing Plaudites, to their own brains?

A little knowledge puffs up, much humbles. The famous wits of the time, that are the Gardens and Ornaments of secular learning, scorn to hang on the lips of a Priest for knowledge. Who can teach them? Preachers are but bunglers: they will scarce consult the Book of God, except it be for niceties and criticisemes. Daniel humbly went to the Lord for his Revelations: Nunquid in sapientior Daniele? Are they wiser than Daniel? Proficiendo lego, legendo proficio: and yet he was no small Clarke that said so. Other men are fain to search the bowels of the earth for gold: they are strangely happy that find it in the superficial skin. What, are they the heirs of Solomon, and so have wisdom by entailment? Alas, he could not give this to his own Son for a Legacy. He bequench'd all his labor to him; yet he saith; Who can tell whether he shall be a wise man, or a fool? As the greatest persons cannot give themselves children, so the wisest cannot give their children wisdom. He that reads the Story of Reb... shall find that Solomon's wit was not propagated. Many a fool hath had a wiser son than that wisest Father.

There is store of wit in the world, I dare not so much commend the plenty of wisdom: This is pure, peaceable, gentle, &c. But the cavils of the age bewray, that men contend rather for credit, than for instruction: as wrangling ...sters show they play for money, not for recreation. Pride is the fruit that no commonly grows on this Tree of knowledge. Thou thinkest thyself a knowing man, quick in apprehension, present of invention, sound in judgment: praise God for this; thou wast not borne so. Another is neither witty, nor intelligent, nor judicious; despise him not for this. God <◇> whether thou thyself mayest not die so. Presumptuous knowledge may be overcome with distraction, and subtlety and in an apoplexy; yea, and beat out her <◇> brains. Common experience maketh it more than probable, that unless we be seasoned with grace, and understanding with sobriety; a man may most miserably survive his own wit, and out-live his own understanding. Knowledge, only for private satisfaction, is but a courtesan, more for pleasure, than for propagation. Yet God would have us know, and that both good and evil; not only his friends, but even his very enemies; as here the scoffing Atheists. As himself hath Scientiam apprehensionis, whereby he knows all and <◇> approbationis, whereby he only knows his elect. So we are to know <◇> good and evil; both by the knowledge of distinction good only by the knowledge of approbation.

But many refuse to know, because they would not be bound to do they are mere Sceptickes, because they would not be practickes. They care not to ...mine which is the true Religion; that of Rome, or this of England; because they desire to be of neither the one, nor the other. So the slothful <◇> hears, how one neighbor is troubled with preserving his young Lambes, another with plowing his grounds, weeding his Graine, inning his Harvest; how unseasonable showers cross their hopes; therefore he applauds himself in his stupid sluggishness, and cries, Well fare nothing once by the year. The indifferent worldling sees this man vexed for his zeal, that other hated for his knowledge; a third persecuted, martyred for the profession of his faith: and he says within himself, Well fare a quiet ignorance. So his body is but like a lump of scarce-moving earth, and his soul a standing puddle in the midst of it. He cares not to put any difference between the right and the wrong, between the suffers and the contemned: the holy and unholy are all one to him. Sed quia scire noluit quid sit distinguere, sentire cogetur quid sit distingui. Because they will not know what it is to distinguish, they shall be forced to feel what it is to be distinguished; when Christ shall put them on the left hand, among the Goats, with a Go ye cursed. Then shall ye discern between the righteous and the wicked; between him that feareth God, and him that feareth him not. Alas for the common Religion of our times, which is scarce better than Socrates his uncertainty: the people perish for want of knowledge; not that there is any lack of Manna, but they will not gather it. Nesciunt, quia nescire cupiunt. I know there be some, that of evident truths make disputable Problemes; as, Whether Rome be the true Church, Whether God may be worshipped before Images, Whether the Sabbath be not a fit day to play and revel on, Whether the elect can finally fall from grace: shortly it will come to this, Whether the Scripture be Scripture; and, Whether there be a God, and Christ, or no. But woe to them that doubt, where God is plain. The Lord shall come in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and obey not the Gospel of Jesus Christ. If flaming fire be their portion, that knew not God, and could not: how terrible shall be their vengeance, that might know him, and would not?

3. We must know this; that is granted: and then the place is assigned; we must know it first. The Apostle doth not mean a priority of excellency, but of conveniency: not a primum, that is, Omni necessarium; sed h• loco 〈◇〉 dissim•m. There be far greater and more noble objects of our knowledge, which he had formerly propounded, and presumes they had happily digested. But now he comes to discover certain spirits of contradiction, and chargeth them to take notice of this first; that such men shall be in the last does: when they may know when they meet them, by these qualities, as a Thief is deserved by his marks. As a Traveler is premonished; there will Robbers and B•••lers lie in the way: lest they close in with you unsuspected, by these tokens you shall discern them, and avoid them. If you there with profane beasts in the shapes of men, scoffing at all Religion, and giving themselves over to sensuality; you see nothing but what you did foresee. You know first there would be such, and you see now there are such: it falls but but • 〈◇〉 according to my prediction. Behold, I have told you before.

This then be the Sum of it: Know this first, learn this lesson before you take out a new: when you have rehearsed this well I will read you another. There be some that care not to know, and there be some that care for nothing else but to know. Ev•••••ing, 〈...〉 able to come to the knowledge of the truth. Yea, ever knowing, but never coming to the practice of the truth. Like some sick men that lie bed-rid, having the senses, memory and speech; but no faculty locomotive, no power to stir hand or foot. Or like changlings, ever sucking, never battering: or tedious Musicians, ever tuning, never playing. They would devour ten Sermons a week, but digest not one rule or doctrine. Still they are calling for more lessons, not minding to learn this first. He was no common fool, that being somewhat fearful of the water, when the King had him ride in further and deeper, for fear of soundring his Horse; answered him; Soft and fair, let him drink up this first. Let those unnatural appetites be so served; that are calling for their afternoon-bevers, before they have concocted their dinners; Soft and fair, digest this first. Hoc primum scite, saith our Apostle: let us see some good proof of that you have already heard, in your new lives: and then we shall cheerfully come to you with new lessons. Bee content to know first one thing, and then another; that by degrees you may come to the fullness of knowledge, and grow up to the measure of the stature of JESUS CHRIST.

Thus for the Preparation: the Prediction follows; wherein are two points. First, they shall come. Secondly, when they shall come; In the last days.

1. They shall come. Far be it from us here, to touch God with the least aspersion of sin. Shall any man enquire, how there can be such stirs, tumults, and garboiles in the world, when as God sits at the Helme? The question is hard, and being pressed too far, may prove dangerous. Saint Augustine himself confesseth, That after it had racked and tortured him, to find out the cause of evil, it turned him into a Manichean heretic. A modest and short answer is that of the School. In particular administrations, a provident Ruler preventeth, what in him lies, all inconveniences. But in the universal Government, it seemed best to the Divine wisdom to suffer some evil: not for want of power to hinder it, but out of his abundant goodness. If God did not permit some evil, we should want much good: the good of his Justice and Mercy, which shine forth both in his severe Judgments, and gracious Indulgence. Goodness (without this) had not been so illustrated; her opposite makes it more amiable. As out of the salt brackish Sea, sweet showers are exhaled: so from man's evil, the Almighty power hath drawn the comfortable dews of grace in our Lord Jesus Christ. These deriders of religion cannot fetch in God as a Patron of their impiety: God shall fetch in them as unwilling instruments of his glory. They are not thus wicked because God foretold it: but therefore God foretold it, because they will be thus wicked, that their wickedness might not hurt his chosen.

As sin is a punishment of sin, it is a part of Justice: the holy One of Israel doth not abhor to use even the grossest sins to his own just purposes. Whiles our wills are free to our own choice, his decrees are as necessary, as just. The house of Judah would have fought against Israel for Rehoboam; but God forbad them; For this thing is from me, saith the Lord. We may observe, Jeroboam plot, the people's insolence, the young men's mis-advise, the Princes unseasonable austerity; all disposed by the omnipotent providence to accomplish his just decree: he had purposed it, what shall hinder it? All these might have done otherwise, for any sense that was offered to their wills: all would do no otherwise, than if there had been no preordination in Heaven. Israel had forsaken the Lord, and worshipped Ashtaroth, and Ch...s, and Milchom: God owes them a whipping: the frowardness of Rehoboam shall pay it there. Who would not have looked any whither for the cause of this evil, rather than to Heaven? yet the holy God challengeth it to himself, This thing is for me. But so, as neither their sins shall taint him, nor his decree justify them. He will be magnified in his Wisdom and Justice, whiles sinners wittingly perish in their follies. It shall double our guiltiness, if we place the necessity of our finding in God's decree. The Philosophers servant being reproved for filching, excused himself, that it was his destiny to steal: but his master answered, so it was also his destiny to be hanged. Desperate wretches may talk thus now; it will be no plea at the last audit, against a Go ye cursed into Hell fire.

2. In the last days.] There is much questioning, when these last days be. Saint Paul says it was not at hand: Saint Peter says, it is at hand. They are thus reconciled. Peter seems to speak of ulti... tempus, and that is at hand. Paul of ultimum temporis, and that was not at hand. The end is at hand; but ultima periodus vel linea finis non instat: the last period and line of the end might not be at hand. But how then is it called by Saint John ultima horae, the last hour? Because there is no alteration to succeed it. In the former ages God still altered the condition of the Church: after the covenant made with Adam, it stood in the same state till Noah; then was the world drowned. After the reparation of it, so it continued to Abraham; then was there a renovation of this covenant. From Abraham to Moses, it remained a stranger in the world: then God settled it in the promised land. From Moses to David, it was governed by Captains and Judges; then God stated it in a Monarchy. Thus it abode until the captivity: and again (after that time of bondage expired) was restored to some glory. In the fullness of time God sent his own Son: before it went through many changes and sundry conditions: one while it had only the light of nature, then was it informed by the law written, now it is blessed and established with Grace. And this is ultimus status, novissimum tempus, the last state, because it shall not be followed with any renovations, or alterations: the condition of it by the grace of Christ shall endure to the end of the world: nor can we look for any change but one, which shall be at the universal dissolution of all things. There remaineth no more sacrifice for sins: lose this, and lose all; for he shall come no more to die, but at once to judge quick and dead. Thus the time from Christ's ascension to the worlds end, is called Dies extrema the last day; because it immediately (without any general alteration) goes before it. The end in the Apostles time was not far off; now it must be very near: if that were ultima dies, this is, ultima hora: or if that were ultima hora, the last hour; this is ultimum hora, the last minute.

These being the last days, the last day of them must be at hand. Concerning that day, there are two errors in the world. First, curiosity of Critics; and they ask, Quando erit? When shall it be? Secondly, security of sluggards; and they never ruminat of an Erit quando, whether it shall be at all. That is the excess, and possesseth the wit: this is the defect, and disables the will. The former is of men over-wise, and they hasten the judgment: the other, of men too supine and careless, and they would slacken the judgment.

First, for the busy Inquirers; they be such as refuse the plain ground, to walk upon pinnacles. Like the Bethshemites, that were not content with seeing the Ark, but they must see into the Ark, and so perish. Praterita ante mundum, & futura a post mundum, scire non possumus: media tantum contemplanur. There be some things which the wisdom of God desires to conceal; wherein unreverence is not more faulty than curiosity. Secret things to God, revealed things to us and our children. Why doest thou enquire my name, which is secret? says the Angel. In that Vision of theirs, the moral whereof was good, inquiry was made what became of Samsons soul. The answer was, It is a secret; that none might dare to destroy himself after his example: whose act was rather for wonder, than for imitation. What became of Solomon's soul? It is a secret: that none might dare to fall from the light of knowledge, into the works of darkness. What became of Origen's soul? It is a secret: that none might presume to dally with the Scriptures, and make a shadow of a plain History. What became of Trajan's soul? It is a secret: that none might venture to do all that Trajan did. Men may soon be too bold with hidden mysteries: he that modestly looks upon the Sun, sees a glorious Torch, and receives a comfortable light: but he that fixeth his eyes too earnestly upon it, is struck blind: and because he will see more than he should, comes in the end to see nothing at all.

If we stand a moderate distance from the fire, it warms and comforts us: if too near, it will scorch and burn us. Our God is a consuming fire. Every Seraphin had six wings, with two he covered his face, with two his feet, and with two he did fly. He covered his Face, keeping us from the secrets of God's eternal predestination, in the Beginning: he covered his Feet, not disclosing when he will come to judge the world, in the End. Therefore Ne nos addamus inquirere, quod Deus non addidit dicere. Solomon tells us, that the locks of the Spouse are curled, and his hairs black as a Raven. The secrets of God's providence are curled and intortled, we cannot unfold them: his hair black, his ways past finding out. O the depth of the riches of his wisdom; how unsearchable are his judgments! As a man wading into the Sea, when he comes up to the neck, and feels the water begin to heave him up, and that his feet fail him; he cries, O the depth, and goes back again. Paul's last Doctrine (God hath concluded them all in unbelief, &c.) was a secret enough to swallow up any created understanding: therefore he sets a bar against all further search; O the depth; not to be fadomed by any reach of man: We may sooner fetch mould from the Center of the earth, or dig through it to the Antipodes. His ways are past finding out; a Metaphor taken from quick-sented Hounds; who will be at a loss, when there is left neither tract, nor print, nor sent of the pursued Game. We may as well line out the way of a ship on the waves, or the walk of an arrow through the air; as find out the reserved ways of God. Such is man's parvities and nothingness, in comparison of his Maker.

Let us not dote about questions that are too high for us: we may think it a wisdom, Saint Paul calls it a dotage. Though the Lord dwells in light: yet is it such a light as no man can attain unto. Some are more busy to learn what and where Hell is, than the means how to escape it. Or, what God did before the world began, than what he will do with them when the world is done. Or, whether we shall know one another in heaven, than to know that themselves have an Inheritance there. Or, whether Christ did locally descend into hell, in soul, or in power; not suspecting their own ways of sin which lead them thither. It is good to leave off learning, where God hath forborne teaching. Tutum est nescire quod tegitur: we shall never be condemned for being ignorant of that, which we are not bound to know. Let us neither have tongue to ask, nor ear to listen, nor brain to examine, where God hath no will to speak. This Well is deep, and the Spirit hath not given us a bucket. Ne inquiras prohibitum, ne •ittas concessum. It is not for you to know the times and seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power. Content we ourselves with Paul's knowledge, only Jesus Christ, and him crucified.

Yet it is a wonder to see, how many desperate wits have adventured on the discovery of that, which God hath secreted: and how many insensate hearts have given credit to such Merlins

Oracles, and prophecies out of hollow vaults. There is a Judgment belonging to them, whereat they have just cause to tremble. God shall send them strong delusion, that they shall believe a lie; that they all might be damned who would not believe the truth. Aedificantur ad credenda fata, ut eorum corda fiunt fatua. If they will seek to know more than they should, they shall know more than they would; even the heat of that unquenchable fire, whereof wisemen never desire to know more than by speculative meditation. In all ages there have been such drunken Prophets. In the Apostles time, there were such as would have fastened their dreams upon Paul. In Saint Augustine's time there were some that determined the end of the world four hundred years after Christ's Ascension: Quos omnes elusit ipsa temporis experientia: so that the latter days have mocked their former dotage. Such have been their strange collections from divers mystical numbers, in Daniel, and the Revelation; and from the observation of sevens. From Adam to Enoch, in the succession of persons, and then Enoch was translated: from Enoch to Elias, in the succession of ages, and then was Elias taken up: therefore in the seventh thousand years (they infer) all bodies shall rise. Others gather no less from the proportion of the three states of the Church; Millia inane duo, duo lex, duo millia Christus: two thousand years Nature: two thousand years the Law: and two thousand years Christ. But they were deceived in their just computation: and he that could not keep number for the time past, we will never take his reckoning for the time to come. Again, there be some that acknowledge, that neither the day nor the hour can be known; because Christ expressly saith so: therefore (for evasion) they attempt only to find out the year. But most absurdly: for if the last day be unknown, then the day before the last, and the week before that day, and the year which contains that week, and the age which contains that year. But as Saint Augustine saith; That one Text in the first of the Acts, hath bred the Gout in the fingers of all our Pythagorean Count-casters. Saint Bernard better approves an humble ignorance, that confesseth, but presumes not: than a brawling knowledge, that presumeth, but understands not. And Lactantius saith, that the vulgar are not seldom the wiser, because they are no wiser than they should be: light footing makes the better speed in so deep a sand.

Paul was wrapped up to the third heaven, and heard unspeakable words: not a word of the last day. The Angels know much, by the excellency of their nature, and nearness to the Deity: they know not that. John was the beloved Disciple, he leaned on Christ's bosom, wrote a whole Book of Revelations: he revealed not that Day to us, nor was it revealed to him. Solomon by his miraculous wisdom, spake three thousand proverbs; not one that told us this: a thousand and five songs, yet he never sang of this; otherwise than in this harmony; There is an appointed time for all things: or thus, God shall bring every work unto judgment. Yea, forever to frustrate and prevent all hope of man's attaining to this secret; Neither man, nor Angels know that day, nor the Son himself; but the Father. Not because he could not, but because he would not know it: Ne illam molestius feramus ignorantiam, qua nobis cum Angels & Christo communis est. The coming of our Christ, is the Kingdom of our Christ; and this cometh not with observation. He was the expectation of nations: his first coming was long looked for; yet the day not precisely known. He promised to send the holy Ghost; yet his Apostles knew not the day when; but were commanded to abide at Jerusalem, till they were endued with power from on High: they must tarry the good hour. Much less is the term of his last coming notified to any son of man. Let all our care be to find Christ in our hearts, before we see him in the clouds. It was wittily said of Thales, who gazing on the stars, fell into the water; That if he had looked into the water, he might have seen the stars: but looking up to the stars, he could not see the water. While we elevate our curious minds to find out that abstruse mystery, whereof there is no record but in God's own bosom, and thus have our eyes busied above; we cannot see the state of our conscience here below: let us look down to the book of our conscience, and there we shall read the necessity of Christ's coming to Judgment. For if our heart condemn us, God is greater. He was a famous warrior, that if his own Son asked him, when he would remove his campe, would only answer, that he should have notice by the sound of the Trumpet. God hath given us all a sufficient testimony of his future coming; Because he hath appointed a day wherein he will judge the world in righteousness, by that man whom he hath ordained. If his own dear children shall ask him farther, he refers them to the sound of the last Trumpet: They must wait till those days be fulfilled: this is all their answer.

Next for the secure neglecters of this day; this is the main sin of the times. In the last days we live, and yet on the last day we do not meditate. The former are so impudent as to point out illum diem: but the most are so impudent as to point out nullum diem: so the last day falls on them, while their first and last and all their sins are found in them. We have such Scoffers as say, Non est finis: Scribarum pennae mendaces: that all God's threatenings are but terrificamenta nutricum: the last fire but an ignis fatuus, and brutum fulmen. Thus the Lord's forbearance hath been made but the fuel of their presumption. The former were too curious, these are too careless. First, to convince those, God hath hid the day of Jesus, as he did the body of Moses; that they may fight among themselves with their own distractions. So that the Poles are not farther asunder, than the opinions of these Calculators. Other times have been expressed; as four hundred years, seventy two weeks: but the determinations of this time are dull incantations to flesh and blood. The eye of neither Eagle nor Kite, Man nor Angel can look into it: Quomodo pectoris angustiae comprehendent vias Domini? Secondly, these other would have no end at all; or such an one as is far enough off. These we tell, It comes; and that as the Scripture ever speaks of it; with celerity. Yet a little while, and he that cometh will not tarry. Behold, I come quickly. They that put far away the evil day, shall find it nearer than they were aware of. Let them fear, that lie folded in the bands of a long night, lest they never see day, but the last day, and that be the beginning of their eternal night. Every man hath his sword upon his thigh, because of fear in the night. Let our armor and spiritual furniture be ever ready, propter pavores nocturnos. Doubtless it is near, we even see it, hear it, handle it: Ecce in nubibus: his chariot is made ready.

Of these latter days, one must be the last of all; Ex his extremis diebus una est extrema dies. That Epistle which Saint Paul so earnestly charged to be read unto all, contained especial exhortation to provide ourselves against the last day. The end of all things is at hand: in which words we see, first, at end. Secondly, and end of all things. Thirdly, an end of all things at hand. An extremity, an universality, and a vicinity. An end; this implies a beginning, proceeding, and declination. Mea•um aequaliter distat ab extremis. The worlds eternity was a brainless do••ge of some Philosophy. An end there shall be, but Qualis? There is Fi••s consumem; so the earth with her works shall be burnt <◇> : and F••is consu•••; so the creatures shall be restored to their original $\langle \diamond \rangle$ and integrity. *...s •eficiens; The end of all flesh is come▪ and Finis perfi•••; There shall be a $\langle \diamond \rangle$ heaven and a new earth wherein dwells righteousnessse. Finis dissolvens, that shall destroy all the vain works of men: and Finis absol•••, that shall crown all righteous deeds. The ungodly shall find it a destructive end; spoiling their labors, ceasing their pleasures; but beginning their endless $\langle \diamond \rangle$: they shall die, and not die; as Moses his bush burned and wasted not. Death shall feed on them, as a Vulture on Carrion, and not be satisfied. Quàm miserum est mortem optare, & non posse mori? This is a fearful end; the miserable beginning of that which shall never end. *Their end is damnation, and that damnation is without end. The righteous have a perfective end; Behold the just, the end of that man is peace.

There is one universal end, and last day to all; and this cannot be far off. If you ask for the precedent signs, they may be reduced to fixe, and called thus; a Drumme, a Trumpet, a Famine, a Flood, a Comet, and a new Troope.

1. The Drumme beats up Wars and Massacres, Plagues and Pestilences: And how do the bloody prints of all these stick upon the breast of the world? This Drumme hath beaten too loud; abroad in War, at home in Pestilence: The God of peace and mercy unbrace it, and make it quiet, to our comfort.
2. The Trumpet, is the preaching of the Gospel: This hath not only been heard in Zion, long blown in the Church of God; not only set to the walls of Jericho and Babylon, Rome hath not been free from the sound of it: but it even hath reached the ears of Paganism; and with the shrill noise proclaimed to them either Peace or War, from Jesus Christ.
3. The Famine, is the general decay of all the fruits of goodness: the Vine casts her Grapes, the Earth starves her Trees, the Corn is blasted, the Olives are rotten: I mean all this in a spiritual sense. Religion loseth her honor, for want of good works; the children of piety are become abortive; there is much faith, and little faithfulness; abundance of love, and not a spark of charity. When we look for those holy fruits of the Spirit, Love, faith, meekness, temperance, &c. alas, we must cry out, Famine, Famine.
4. The Flood, is the mighty torrent and inundation of iniquity; which hath so over-run the face of the earth, that the holy Ghost, that most sacred Do••, finds not a place where to set his foot. In the last days perilous times shall come: for men shall be lovers of themselves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, traitors, &c. Oh what a Deluge is here? Good men are like the gleanings of the Vintage, here and there a Grape; far more precious than Gold.
5. The Comet, is that Prodigie of the Christian world, Antichrist in the Seat of Christ: whom the Jesuits direct us to seek, in the Tribe of Dan. And herein they are like those birds, that commonly draw us away from their nests, by their fluttering and noise, for the safety of their young. When they point us to Dan, they cry as the Lapwings, Here 'tis, Here 'tis; that we might not seek it where indeed it is, even at Rome. That Antichrist is come, the horrid Treasons, Murders, Massacres, that rage under his Warrant, are too loud and demonstrative arguments.

6. The new Troope, or Band, that shall come into the Church militant, are the elected Jews; whom God, after so long obduracie, shall call home to Jesus Christ. Some think, that their reparation shall begin with our ruin, as with their ruin began our conversion: that as few of the Jews believed, when the Gentiles came in; so few of the Gentiles shall believe, when the Jews return. Indeed the goodness of the Gentiles much faileth, and their state is like a Vessel running at the Tilt, at a low ebb. But why should $\langle \diamond \rangle$ so understand that of Paul: Blindness is in part happened to Israel, until the fullnesse of the Gentiles he $\langle \diamond \rangle$ in? Why should not rather the conversion of the Jews add riches to the nesse of the Gentiles?

From all this we may gather, that so deep are we fallen into the latter end of these last days, that (for ought we know) before we depart from this place, we may look for the last fire to flash in our faces. We are they, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the $\langle \diamond \rangle$ of the world are come. Oh that as they are Termini aetatum, so they were also Termini iniquitatum: that we might see an end of these things, before we see an end of all things. The Heavens wax old as a garment: it is even time for them to have a new Sute. As this little world, Man; so that great Man, the world, hath his childhood in Adam, his youth in Abraham, his middle age in Solomon, his declining in the time of Christ; and now his old age and last days in this decrepit proximitie of death and expiration.

1. An old man decays in his senses: so the eyes of the World wax dim, like Isaac's, and cannot distinguish betwixt Jacob and Esau, between the righteous and unrighteous: hereby it acquitteth the guilty, and condemneth the innocent; both equal abominations to the Lord. His ears are thick of hearing, deaf to all holy counsels: the Word of the Gospel knocks at those doors, and finds none or very cold entertainment.

2. An old man decays in his members: so the World hath Palsy-hands, the keepers of the house tremble; fingers so gowtie, that he cannot distribute the alms of charity. He hath weak and feeble knees, not able to stand under the weight of God's Precepts: The very Grasshopper is a burden, the lightest Commandment held insupportable. His grinders fail, and cannot chewe that heavenly food: His feet double under him, when he should walk in the way of godliness. His Almond-tree flourisheth, a Snow is upon his head: as our Savior said of the fields, Albae ad messem; yea, even Siccae ad ignem. The Pitcher is broken at the Fountain, and the Wheel at the Cistern: he cannot draw the Water of Life, whether from the Deepes or Shallowes. Only his tongue is live and nimble; you may hear him tumble out Oaths as fast as words, though he be dumb in the praises of thankfulness. Now if we see a man, whose Lights grow dim, his face furrowed with wrinkles; either white hairs, or instead of them, baldness; unactive and bedrid limbs; we say, his living date is done: No less be these the last days of the superannuated World.

3. An old man is full of Coughes and Catarres; sensible of, and subject to the least Colds. What find we in the World, but salt rheums and malignant humors of hatred and envy; the choleric of unbridled rage, the adust melancholy of self-love; symptoms of an unhappy dotage?

4. An old man is wayward and pettish; nothing can please him: the World is so full of morositie and frowardness, that it is neither well full nor fasting. Prosperity makes it dissolute; crosses, desperate: it is ever querulous, contented never.

5. Old age is Curvata, crooked: so the World is groveling; and hath changed natural erection, to an unnatural minding of earthly things. Still the older, the more covetous: the fewer days it hath to live, the more it provides for. Their inward thought is, that their houses shall continue forever: but they abide not, yea, even perish as the beasts. They victual themselves for a year, and their journey is done in an hour.

6. Old age is Verbosa & mendax; talkative, and lying: two Birds that commonly fly out of one Nest; Multiloquus, vaniloquus. The World promiseth wonders; Content, and Riches: but it performs Vanities, Discontent, and Wretchednesse; yet looks to be believed.

7. Old age is Lassa & pigra; weary, and lazy: like a Traveler, that longs to be at his journeys end. The material things of the World hasten to their Center and last period: the whole creature groans to be at rest.

8. Old age is Effaeta, exhausta: the Spirits are spent. The World is ready to say as Sarah: Shall I bear a child now I am old? It bears few of those lively fruits of Piety, and Charity, and Fidelitie, that it did in former times.

9. Old age is frigescens, because exanguis: an old man through the wasting of his blood grows cold: that nature requires helping by an accidental heat. The zeal of the world is so cold, the fire of the Temple so spent to a spark, that for want of fuel and blowing, it is almost out. Much adventitious warmth must be put to it, to keep life in it: as a young virgins was laid by the side of blood-spent David.

10. Old age is somniculosa, drowsy and prone unto sleep. The world hath laid it self down in the cradle of security; the Devil sets his spirits to rock it asleep, and thus it is possessed with a quiet slumber.

Thus are we fallen into the depth of Winter: the Spring is past, the Summer hath had her season, Autumn hath spent her fruits, and now Winter hath shaken down the very leaves, and left us nothing but naked, bare, and barren trees. The last month of the great year of the world is come upon us; we are deep in December: these last days be all Saint Lucies days; short, foul, and dirty. Crampes and convulsions stupefy the nerves of the world, pale coldness sits on our faces, the pangs of death gnaw our heart-strings: the good Angels that visit us, see nothing but signs of departure in all our carriages. O that, as dying men have commonly a little reviving before their ends; (as the wasted candle gives a bright glare at the going out) which they call a lightning against death: so we could a little recover ourselves, and give forth some comfortable beam, some clear testimony of grace, before we go hence. So shall our last day be our best day; ultimum, optimum: and as it puts an end to all the days and nights of measurable, miserable time: so it shall begin that day which neither admits of night nor time: even the eternal day, enlightened with the Sun of righteousness, and glorious presence of our blessed God.

It can be no great wonder, that such profane sinners should be found in the fag end of the world: which is like a false bottom when it comes to be unwound; worst at last. Infelix morbus, Senectus; as Bellarmino called that age wherein Ecclesiastical Writers were so scant, In felix seculum. Much more unblest are these last days, where blessed deeds are so geason: where the enemies of Christ dare show their heads, and ex professo fight against him. Therefore let me a little farther parallel these last days of the world, with the last days of a man.

11. An old man fetcheth his breath thick and short, especially when sickness adds to the decay of nature: so that death sits often like a churl at the door of his lips, and keeps in his words: or like a covetous Executor, that grudgeth a man the disposing of his own goods. O how short be the fits of goodness? How small a space do good motions, the breathing of God's holy Spirit in us, tarry with us? They may bait at our doors, they keep no residence in our hearts. We have some transient ejaculations, which with a short-winded devotion we utter (or rather mutter) to God. But our lusts do so haunt us, and call us off from these holy thoughts, that we may complain with Job; they will not give us leave to swallow down our spittle.

12. In old age, especially when it surpriseth a foul and surfeited body, all the corrupt humors gather down to the feet: the heart, and those more noble parts drive them back to the extremes: and because the feet are lowest, nature repels corruption thither; and not seldom it issueth there: or if not, it wrackes them with Gout, Dropsy, and such torments. These last days be the feet of the world, whereunto all the vicious customs of former ages are gathered: as the kennels of a city run to the common Sewer. Ignorance was predominant in one age, Idolatry in another, Hypocrisy in a third, Sacrilege, Oppression, Fraud in another: these mischiefs then had their times to reign single. Now, like so many land-floods from the mountains, they meet in one chanell, and make a torrent of united wickedness, in these lower and latter days. Thus after the Golden Head, the shoulders of Silver; the Brazen ribs, and Iron-legs, these last are the feet of Clay, the basest and most rude material of all. Thus are we the grounds, the dregs, and lees of the vessel: the dust in the bottom of the mow; the dross and refuse of former ages, that lick up their vomit: decking ourselves with those iniquities as the ornaments of our pride, whereof our forefathers made a sick acknowledgement with remorse and shame.

13. Dying men are fumbling of the clothes, and plucking the coverings to them: as if they would prevent the hand of charity, and wind up their own almost breathless carcasses. Men of the world, in these days so sick of avarice, scrath together all within the reach of their fingers. No fish must escape their draw-net, no water pass by their mill: as if like Behemoth, they would drink up Jordan: and as the flying Jews swallowed their Gold into their gu•s, for which they were ripped up by the Romans: so they seek to devour the world, as if their heirs should never find it but in their excrements. We see men encroach upon liberties, hedge in monopolies, enclose commons, multiply barns and granars, join houses, engross commodities: alas, they are dying souls, Lodices & stragula trahentes, plucking up the blankets and coverlets about them; and giving up the ghost, as they had long before given up the holy Ghost. Thou fool, saith God: they lived wise in their own conceits, they shall die apparent fools,

14. Dying men are troubled with fantasies; full of melancholy dreams, and solicitous imaginations. So these last days of the world are fraught with errors: a thousand peevish opinions crawl out like vermin from putrefied brains: strange worms are bred in old dunghills. These pester the world, disquiet the peace of the Church, and inveigle weak capacities; Problemata delirantium. Do we wonder that these uncoth singularities transport multitudes? Alas, these are the last days; the brains of the world are crack'd; it labors of extreme dotage: and among fools, the Haberdashers shop of trifles hath the most customers. This is the cause of hatching so many new devises, strange tenets and paradoxes, raising mutinies in Religion: the world is brain-sick, fantastical, fanatical; setting up factious opinions, as fast as Solomon's wives did their groves: which I forbear the naming, for fear of teaching. Men love anything better than sobriety of Judgment; which shows that the world hath but few minutes to live.

15. Lastly, an old man comes back again to a child: semel senex, bis puer. The world is so old, that it goes upon crutches; as a child cannot go but by the hand of a Nurse. The understanding and memory of it is so decayed, that it even ceaseth to know, what in the childhood it began to learn. Such is the old ages infirmity, that it is come round to infancy. Mundus quando senex, incipit esse puer. Not as it is with the material world, whose old age is blessed with an annual reparation: that when the Winter hath deaded all, all are again restored by the cheerful Spring. It is not so in the mystical world; but Se•esce•s mundus est evanescens mundus: a child indeed it is; as prattling as a child, as ignorant as a child, as feeble as a child, as wanton as a child; but far from being as innocent as a child. For levity and vanity, it is altogether childish. An infant is made to grow up to man: but for man to grow down again to infant, is unnaturally preposterous. The Seminale principium is for the creature: the seed is made for the tree: the child, not to remain so, but to be a man. The Oke doth not grow back to a young sprout, nor the Ox to the Calf: alas, that man should degenerate and ungraduate himself to a child, •eneca calls children's works nugae, men's negotia: if we shall set our minds on p•rile toys, what is this but to evirate ourselves? For Magistrates not to hear, but whom they list, and when they list; this is to play boys tricks. When a King, Demetrius of Macedon; answered a petitioner, a poor woman, that he had no leisure; she boldly replied, Why then give over to be King. We need not stick to tell an unhearing Magistrate more; Give over to be a Magistrate, yea give over to be a man. If men long for toys, set their delights upon vanities, vex (as children cry) when they may not have their wills, spend their bodies before they get information to their souls, as children slubber out their books before they have learned their lessons; worship puppets and painted images, as children play with babies; what be all these, and the like, but playing of boys tricks? Thus Old men and children; the Psalmist puts them both in a form.

All these arguments prove the world to be exceeding old, and drawing on, even near the last gasp. Quod antiquatur & senescit, prope interitum est; That which decaieth and old, is ready to vanish away. Let us fall from it, before it fall upon us; and be but so wise as Spiders, to forsake a rotten house: not by going out of the world; but by driving the world out of us. I have been prolix in this point; yet desire not to part from it without some considerable and applicable uses.

First, though this be not the last day, it may be thy last day. The world cannot last long, yet thou mayest prevent the world. Strong bodies hold out many fits, yet at last yield to the necessity of nature. Weak constitutions are dissolved with a little sickness, as a childes paper-house is with a puff of wind. If our life be wrapped up with the world, it must needs be momentary. Heaven and earth are of a strenuous composition, compact together with more powerful sinews and ligaments: so that they have held up their heads through many passages and destructions of mortality: otherwise when the Son of God suffered, it would have broke their hearts. Our bodies are made of elements, weak and fluid principles; and therefore sooner resolved to their first materials. Flowers have but their months, when Okes and Cedars stand many years. Nothing but extreme and supernatural fire shall be the death of the world: Water, Air, Earth, a Thorn, a Vapour, anything is able to dispatch us. If we be not bound up in the bundle of a better life, we are vain wretches.

Remember therefore, The end is near, thy end is nearer. Whether the end of this day shall not be the end of all thy days, thou hast no assurance. To day hear his voice: be sure to repent one day before thy last day: and hereof thou canst not sure, unless thou repentest this day. Let us think, if the Judge were now coming in the clouds, in what case we were to meet him. Perhaps we are wrapped up in a cloud too; a cloud of dark ignorance, and blind security: let us know that this cloud will dissolve ours, and lay us open with lla our sins to the view of men and Angels. It is time to repent, and make even our reckoning: which we can no ways do, but by transferring all our reckonings and upon debts Christ. As Alcibiades told Pericles, when he was troubled with studying how to give his accounts; that if he would be ruled by him, he should rather study how to give no account at all. The Lord graciously calls us to cast our burden upon him: Christ adviseth us to lay all our reckonings, arrearages, and debts upon his score; promising to discharge them to a penny with his treasure of merits; the only coin that is currant in the Exchequer of God's justice. If by faith we have borne them thither, and given up ourselves, body and soul, to him for security, we need not fear. The Judge will never condemn us for that debt, which himself hath undertaken to pay. Lord here is our hope and confidence; Thou wilt not find those guilty, for whom thine own person suffered the penalty: nor punish the sins thou hast remitted: nor cast away the souls thou hast redeemed.

To others it shall be a black day; alas, What shall they do in the day of visitation? To whom will they fly for help, and where will they leave their glory? when they shall peepe out of the grave, and see the world on fire; and have lost all interest in the Judge. Why do men neglect the means of reconciliation? Agree with thine adversary quickly: if thy sin hath made God thine adversary, go quickly, delay no time to recover his friendship: Take thy Incense quickly, saith Moses to Aaron, and make atonement for the people. Quickly fall to thy prayers; put that Incense in the Censor of Jesus, entreat him to entreat God for thee, and to make a blessed atonement between you. As our own last day leaves us, the worlds last day shall find us; we are presented above, as we went forth below. Oh then judge we ourselves, that we be not judged. Volo vul•ui irae praesentari judicatus, non judicandus. Our Passing-Bell, and the Archangels Trump, have both one voice: for God will reverse no particular judgment. If the former give a heavy and doleful Knell for us here, that louder Instrument shall keep the same Note hereafter. But if the one sound comfort at our last hour in this world, the other shall sound joy at the last hour of the world.

Secondly, if the world be ready to end, why do men covet, as if it were but now to begin? Peribundus mundus, & tu mundana quaeris? Who would plant or build upon that ground, which is troubled with earthquakes, or sure suddenly to sink? God chargeth us first to seek the Kingdom of Heaven, and then earthly things shall find us, unsought. But foolish Nature takes a false method: she first seeks the world; and if she light upon God by the way, it is more than she thought on, desired, cared for. How deservedly do they fail of both, that sought neither aright? Many had been great, if they had cared to be good: but because they willed not what they ought, they are crossed in what they would. If Solomon had made Riches his first suite, he might have been poor and foolish: but asking Wisdom, as the principal, Wealth came in for interest: because he chose well, he received what he asked not. Such is the bounty and fidelity of God; to them that ask the best, he gives all. Earth shall wait upon them, that attend upon Heaven. Happy is he that affords the best services of the world, but the less half of himself; while the greater and better part is better bestowed.

I do not wish men to abandon themselves to willful beggary, because of the last days proximitie; or not to repair the house, because their time in it is so short. For worldly things, we may use them, without loving them; and distinguish betwixt a Stoicall dullness, and a Christian contempt: There is difference between making the world a god, and a slave. This latter is the respect it deserves; and they are fools that give it veneration. But rich men think, the only reason why Preachers love not the world, is because the world loves not them: That she shows us only her heels, not her amiable face: That we have nothing but her refuse; her best jewels she keeps for her Sweet-h•arts. Yet a beggar may look upon a Lordship; and we may see those heaps of Gold, whereof never one piece shall be ours. We know what others dote on, and wonder at their madness; that they should fixe their hearts on that which is not fixed it self, and build their happiness upon a rolling stone. I deny not, but God hath given some abundance of riches, and more grace: and to those, to whom he hath been so liberal, he will be more munificent, for he will give them also glory. While they look up to their future hopes, they esteem but meanly of their present fortunes, and count them scarce a taste of that full Cup. Militant Saints are sometimes (besides their Inheritance above) granted fair Possessions below: yet they value not this with the other. Here they command a little pittance of mould; great to us, little to the whole: there the immense Heaven shall be theirs. Here they command as subjects, there they shall reign as Kings. Here they are gracious among men, there they shall be glorious among the Angels. Here, together with their honor and affluence, they want not crosses and envy; above there is nothing but noble peace, and pleasant eternity. Here they have some short joys; there they are both perfect, and everlasting. Here they are strangers; there, at home. Here Satan tempts them, and men vex them; there, Saints and Angels shall sing with them, and the glory of God shall satisfy them. In a word, they are only blessed here, for that they shall be blessed hereafter.

Thus take the world at his best, yet good men despise it. But for fear, lest we should be fond of it, God presents it generally to his children in another shape; a miserable, troublesome, inconstant world; whose joys are but the crackling of thorns. Whiles Naomi's husband and sons were alive, we find no motion of her retiring home to Judah: let her earthly stays be removed, she thinks presently of removing to her country. We cannot so heartily think of our home above, whiles we are furnished with these earthly contentments below. But when God strips us of them, straightwayes our mind is homewards. Besides, what assurance can there be of those things, whereof our going home may strip us? What man can say of the years to come, Thus will I be? Most justly do we contemn this uncertainty, and look up to those riches that cannot but endure, when Heaven and Earth are dissolved. Riches are a flood; ut fluunt, defluunt: this City cannot call the water of a flood, hers; nor those inhabitants, theirs: all may take enough to serve their own turns, the rest glide by, and wait upon nobody. When we are bidden to a great man's Table, where the Meat is served up in Silver Dishes, and the Wine in Bowles of Gold; we may eat the Viands, and drink the precious Liquors. But if through simplicity we should offer to carry away the Vessels, the Porter would stay us at the Gate, and tell us plainly, they are none of ours. The Divine Bounty affords the use of riches, for the comfort and sustentation of our bodies. But when we rise up from his Table, and think to bear away the riches themselves, Death is a severe Porter at the Gate of Life; he will examine our going out: we shall carry none of them with us. Saint Augustine seems to borrow it from Democrates; Qui animam curat, seipsum curat: qui vero corpus, non se sed sua curat: qui pecuniam, non se nec sua, sed valde aliena curat: qui voluptates, nec se, nec sua, nec aliena; sed prorsus inimica curat. He that loves his soul, loves himself: he that loves his body, loves not himself, but something that is his own: he that loves his money, neither loves himself, nor that which is his, but another's: he that loves his pleasure, loves that which is neither himself, nor his own, nor his friends, but his enemies.

Lastly, seeing therefore that both these be the last days in general, and our last day may antedate them in particular: seeing either the House must be pulled down, or the Tenant cast out; let us provide for ourselves betimes, as the wise Steward did, some trusty friend. He was loath to be harbourlesse: though he had not justice enough to keep in at his Masters house, yet he had providence enough to get another house in store. Make your unrighteous Mammon a means to procure you everlasting habitations. When Christ fore-warned the Jews of the destruction of their Jerusalem, did he not impliedly advise them to shift for themselves in another country? Merchants that would soon be rich, take the old course, to buy cheap and sell dear: therefore they buy their Commodities in the country that affords good penny-worths, and vent them in other countries, which must take them on any price. We do not buy Wines in England, to sell them in France; nor buy Spices in France, to carry them to the Indies. Non omnis fert omnia tellus: thither we traffic a Commodity, where it is precious in regard of scarcity. I presume, we would all go to Heaven: we are foolish Merchants, if of all Lands we would not trade in the Land of Canaan; if we had rather trucke with Savages for Gold and Jewels, than exchange with the Saints for glory and graces. But now what freight shall we carry thither? What Wares and Merchandise will be vendible and welcome in that Kingdom?

Shall we carry honor and dignity thither? There is abundance of that already: we may more truly say of that City, than was of Tyre; All her Merchants are Princes: yea, all her inhabitants are no less than Kings. To traffic worldly glory to Heaven, is to hold a Candle to light the Sun: that greater Light doth not so swallow up the less, as the glory of God doth all honor of the creatures. They can add no glory to him, that have all their glory from him. What then? Shall we carry rest, quiet, and peace with us? Will that have any better vent or acceptance? No: for there is all peace, all rest, and quiet. It is Regnum Pacis: Here we may have in some measure the peace of the King, there in a full measure we shall enjoy the King of Peace. It is called the Lord's Rest: we have no true rest, but in him; no perfect rest, till we come unto him. He hath made this earth wherein we live, militant, troublesome, barren of rest: it would be bootless for us to gather up the base dregs of a supine security, and offer to sell them in Heaven. They have plenty of better peace, and we have none but from their store. They that arrive at that Port with such a Merchandise of carelessness, must back again; the Citizens of Heaven will not trade with them. What then say you to pleasures and joys? Will not they pass currant in that holy Land? Not; if they be brought from any foreign coast. Lord, in thy presence is the fullness of joy, and at thy right hand are pleasures for evermore. There is fullness, perfection, and everlastingness of joy: ours are feeble, fickle, empty pleasures. Why should we pour water into the Sea? Why, proffer our addition to fullness, our vanity to perfection, our shortness to eternity? Such a Commodity will not be tolerable in that Mart. Vae ridentibus: Woe to them that laugh, for they shall weep: that Ware is for the Shop of Hell: there it shall be exchanged for sorrow; and the clapping of hands in irrision, for wringing of hands in endless lamentation. Rejoice, O young man: do; but thou shalt smart for it. The seed of carnal joy will not be good Chaffer in Heaven: no fruit comes of it, but woe and torment. Well; yet I hope riches will pass for merchantable stuff; money is currant all the world over: Some things are not precious in some countries; nor other in other: but no country refuseth money. Yet this country will: Alas, what should the beggarly dross of this perishing world do in that heavenly Havilah; where the Gold is more precious than the Gold of Ophir? Yea, what is the Gold of Ophir to that City which is it self pure Gold? It is said of Solomon, that Silver was not accounted of in his days; he made it as common as stones: how more infinite be the riches of the heavenly Solomon? Where there is no use of things, their valuation ceaseth. It was a drop of water that the Churl wished for in hell, not a bag of Gold; not a Lordship of many acres; he had too large an inheritance there before. Away with this trash: it hath no estimation in the Jerusalem above. There is an eternal Easter: and in vain did the Fisherman bring in his boat of Herrings when Lent was done; or the Merchant carry Sugars to Valencia, and Silkwormes to Granata. What then shall we load ourselves withal, that may be acceptable? Yes, there be things whereof there is great scarcity in heaven; caentia, I say: there is no indigentia there. We may see what they lack, by his description that discovered the Land; There is no death, nor sorrow, nor crying, nor pain; no tears, nor fears. Let us carry with us thither,

1. Humility; a lowly contempt of our own selves: there is none of that in heaven. There is abundance of honor, without pride; of glory, without envy or disestimation: for the Saints love themselves, because God loves them. God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble. They that bring a lofty conceit of themselves to that coast, shall be repelled. Humility is a commodity, for which God will exchange the Crown of glory. Moses, David, Paul went thither with this traffic; Non sum dignus: and Christ gave them for it the kingdom of heaven.

2. Poorenesse in spirit: there is none of that in heaven, this merchandise will pass. Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the Kingdom of heaven. Not only shall be, but is already. This will pass, and we with it.

3. Hunger and thirst: there is none of that in heaven. They are abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thine house. They that are satiated with more than they can desire, be far from want. We need not therefore carry provision with us, but a stomach; an earnest desire to feed on those unspeakable comforts. We groan within ourselves, waiting for the redemption of our bodies; mourning for our absence from Zion. This hunger will pass; and instead of it we shall have infinite satisfaction. We bring abstinence and devout fasting to heaven, we shall find affluence and royal feasting there,

4. Mourning, repentance, and tears: there is none of this in heaven. Never came sorrow over those joyful thresholds; never came godly sorrow to those thresholds, but it was entertained with joy. They that sow in tears, shall reap in joy. As the Barbarous traffic with some remoter Pagans; they lay down salt, and take up Gold. So we set down the burdens of our sorrows, and the vessels of our tears before the Lord: and he likes this merchandise so well, that he gives us for them everlasting joys. Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted: there's a blessed exchange.

5. Labor and work: there is none of that in heaven. It is an everlasting holy day with them: they rest, rejoice, and sing; no travel, no pains there. Therefore good works and Christian labors are good traffic. Blessed are they that die in the Lord; for they rest from their labors, and their works follow them. They dare not go without their fraught: a Merchant without his commodity hath but a sory welcome. God will ask them that arrive there, Vbi opera? His reward shall be according to our works: if no good works on earth, look for no riches in heaven. Indeed that wealth is too precious to be bought with our works: nor doth God exchange it propter opera, but dispose secundum opera. Work out thy salvation with fear and trembling: there is neither fear nor trembling, nor working in heaven: but after our working, trembling, and fear, God will give us salvation. Thou hast riches here, and here be objects that need thy riches; the poor: in heaven there is riches enough, but no poor. Therefore make over thy monies to them in this world, that thou mayest receive it by bill of exchange in the world to come.

6. Patience in afflictions and troubles: there are none of these in heaven: neither trouble to try their patience, nor patience to overcome their trouble. The things to be battered, are Patience and Conquest: Patience is our commodity, Conquest is Christ's. If we bring him our virtue of Patience, he will give us in exchange his honor of conquest. He speaks of patience as of a Triumph; Here is the patience of the Saints. Through many tribulations we must enter into the Kingdom of heaven. Our voyage is Tribulation, our vessel is the Church, Pirates and Tyrans are our enemies, rocks and sands our dangers: our tackling, fails, oars be patience; and glorious victory our reward.

7. Faith and hope: neither of them is in heaven: the beatifical vision and fruition hath quite annihilated them. This then is happy merchandize: Give me thy faith, saith God, and I will give thee my glory: let me not fail of thy hope, thou shalt be sure of my felicity. No traffic will pass without this: divers say of moral men, If they go not to heaven, Lord have mercy upon us: yet Christ saith, Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, you shall not come there: yea, Publicans and Harlots shall get into heaven sooner, because the other believed not. Civil justice is not in it self evil, but good: but it is not good enough to save a man: it may be without faith, but faith cannot be without it. Goodly works, building alms-houses, enriching monasteries, feeding beggars, are the Popish merchandize: this they carry to heaven in a presumptuous confidence, that God must needs require them. So they come upon equal terms with him; ware for ware: If he give them heaven, they give him earth, and so he hath a penny-worth for his penny. But they shall find with the Pharisee, that for want of faith and humility, these wares will not pass with God; nor will he afford the kingdom of heaven upon such conditions. Moralities without true belief, are like the fair picture of a beautiful Woman; pleasing to the eye, but there is no warmth in it; nor is it fit for society: he that takes it as his Wife to lie withal, finds it a cold painted Boord. But faith is the obedience of the soul, the soul of obedience: he that believeth, shall be saved: to believe, that's our part and commodity: to save us, that's God's reward and mercy. Thus I have shown you a truly Royal Exchange, a blessed Mart. If we be as good husbands for our souls, as we are for our temporal estates; we have learned here how to make our Markets. Let us never seek to lode our vessels with honors, pleasures, or riches: there is no want of them in heaven; nor will God deal with them in a gracious commerce, that bring no better Merchandise. But with humility, poverty, labor, hunger, repentance, patience, faith and hope: these be the riches of grace, for which God will exchange his riches of glory. Such Merchants make a blessed voyage; for they shall never depart from that joyful country, where they are so happily arrived, and gloriously entertained.

There shall come scoffers, walking after their own lusts.] Irridentes alios, arridentes sibi. The devil knows that the world cannot last long, and therefore bestirs him. He hath great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time. He is grown more wrathful, we should therefore be more watchful. He is a malicious Tenant, that perceiving his term almost expired, does what he can to ruin the house: a bloody Tyrant, that daily suspecting the loss of his usurped Sovereignty makes havoc among his subjects; and like a worse Herod, falls apace to cutting of throats. Indeed his main spite is not at the body, but at the soul: for he knows if he can get the soul, the body must come after. To effect this, he deviseth all the ways he can, and puts in practice all that he deviseth. And to this purpose, sometime he is a roaring Devil, in Lion-like Tyrants: sometime a flattering Devil, in his Spaniell-like Parasites: sometime a dissembling Devil, in his Fox-like Hypocrites: and here a flowting Devil, in his Ape-like Scoffers: that live as if they were neither beholding to God, nor afraid of him; both out of his debt and danger. It is their least ill, to do evil; they speak for it, joy in it, boast of it, enforce to it, mock them that dislike it: and so at once send a challenge to God, as if they meant to meet him in the plain field, and let him choose his weapon: they make love to destruction, as an Amorist courts his Mistress.

Here first we have to observe the contrariety of the dispositions of divers men. We heard of some in the first Verse, that seek the Lord with a pure heart, and follow his Word with their best endeavor of sincerity, and sincerity of endeavor. Now we are fallen upon those, that with a foul and rancorous mind deride all goodness, and load Religion with disgraces. Then we camped in Elim, a place of water and Palme-trees; now we are come to a Wilderness of Briars and Brambles. Then we lay in a sweet Harbour of comfortable meditation; now we are put into the Ocean of Rocks, and Pirates, and boisterous waves. There we found Zion, here we have Babylon; even a Hell of malignant Devils, for that communion of Saints. Fire and water are not more contrary, than the just and unrighteous: they wonder, each at other; the graceless, that the just can be so strict; the just, that the graceless can be so dissolute: Clay and Iron will not wield together. Where is a good man hunched at, but where the profane finds indulgence? Why doth the world seek more to rich men, than to wise men? The Philosopher could answer; Because it is possible for them to be rich, never to be wise. Why are holy men depressed, and the irreligious honored? Because men have a liking to be licentious; but to be holy, is none of their purpose. No body hates an Israelite, but an Egyptian or a Canaanite. Put fire to fire, or water to water, there is no commotion: but put water to fire, and then you have a thundering coile. When riotous men meet, there is shaking of hands, and the other Quart: but the temperate cannot pass by, without a scorn.

This is the reason why the good and virtuous be always opposed and exposed to the fury and malice of cruel men. It is indeed res mira, but not res nova: it was so from the beginning. As then, he that was borne after the flesh, persecuted him that was borne after the spirit; even so is it now. No sooner was God worshiped and served, but hatred and spite fell to the portion and lot of Religion. The first man that offered the better sacrifice, was slain: Liver sacrificii, Seminarium fratricidii: the acceptable sacrifice was the seminary of death. Who would think that brethren, and but two brethren, should not love each other? Dispersed love grows weak, and paucity of objects useth to unite affections. If but two brothers be left alive of many, they think that the love of all the rest should survive in them: that the beams of their affection should be so much the hotter, because they reflect mutually in a right line each upon other. Yet behold, there were but two brothers in a world, and one is a Butcher of the other. Who can wonder at disention among thousands of brethren, that sees so deadly opposition betwixt two, the first roots of brotherhood? Who can hope to live peaceably and securely among so many Caines, when he sees one Cain the death of one Abel? It can be no otherwise: dissimilitude and distance of manners breeds alienation of affections. There is nothing doth so condemn the lives of the wicked exemplarily, as the conversation of the godly: the fat kine make the lean seem more ill-favored. A swarthy and hard-featur'd visage doth not love the company of clear beauties. From hence grows their rage and savage behavior. Besides, it is the pleasure of God, thus to try and honor his servants, and to produce their patience. What pictures could Apelles draw, if he wanted a table to work upon? What building could the Architect rear, without timber, stones, and materials? Their scorn doth both prove and improve our patience. So that we have both a testimony of God's favor; If the world hate you, it is because ye are mine, saith Christ: and of our own integrity, for that must needs be good which evil persecutes. Their lewdness calls for our sorrow and more zealous obedience; that our God may have as faithful servants, as he hath unfaithful enemies. As we see natural qualities increased with the resistance of their contraries; so must our grace, with others sins. We shall redeem something of God's dishonor by sin, if we shall thence grow holy. It hath been an old and happy danger to be godly: indifferent actions must be careful to avoid offense: but let us not care what man or devil be angry that we do good, or receive good. It is contrariety, that makes Babylon wonder at Jerusalem, and Jerusalem at Babylon. We refuse the fair proffers of the world, that come upon sinful conditions; they laugh at us for fools: it will not prove so in the end. All these will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me. O if a covetous worldling had been there; How ready had been his knees? How would he have caught the promise out of the devils mouth, for fear lest he should have gone back from his word? Alexander after the battle of Granicum, had very great offers made him by Darius: consulting with his Captains about them, Permenion said, Sure I would accept of these offers were I as Alexander: Alexander answered, So would I were I as Permenion. The Christian may grow rich (not seldom) by remitting the rigor of his conscience; the worldling saith, Sure I would take it upon these terms, were I as that Christian: and the Christian saith, So would I were I as that worldling. Such contrary natures are appointed to contrary places, that differ as far as Heaven and Hell.

Scoffers!] The depth of sin is the chair of the Scorners: they are set down in the resolute contempt of all goodness. Of these there be two sorts and degrees; first, the Despisers of them that be good: then the Despisers of goodness it self.

For the former; the Saints of God have complained, of them in all ages: David of his busy Mockers: the abjects jeered him. Job was disdained of those children, whose fathers he would have scorned to set with the Dogs of his flock. Joseph was nick-named a Dreamer, Paul a Babbler, Christ himself a Samaritan; and with intent of disgrace, a Carpenter. Libanius asked a Christian what his Master the Carpenter was a doing; whom he answered, He is making a coffin for thy Master Julian. Lucian jested in contempt, that he had gotten nothing by his Christendom but a syllable to his name; of Lucius, Lucianus: but he was torn in pieces of Dogs. Even the very boys of Bethel had learned to scoff at a Prophet: who would have thought the rude terms of waggish children worthy of anything but neglect? Elisha looks at them with severe brows; and like the heir of him that called down fire upon the two Captains and their fifties; curseth them in the name of the Lord. Two she-Bears are his Executioners, two and forty of them are torn in pieces. O fearful example of the divine Justice! This was the revenge of an angry Prophet; it was the punishment of a righteous Judge. The spite of their idolatrous parents was seen in this vile behavior of the children; they do but according to their instruction. Infancy is led altogether by imitation: it hath neither words nor actions, but what are infused by others: the good or bad language it hath, is but borrowed; and the shame, or thank of either, is due to them that lent it. God and his Seer looked through these children at their parents: if they misnurture their children to the contemptuous usage of a Prophet; they shall be punished with the death of those children, whom they taught no better manners. If we love our children, let not our indulgence give way to their despising of goodness: for then, either destruction shall snatch them away young, or there is hell provided for them when they die old. And if God would not endure those contumelies unrevenged in the mouths of boys, what vengeance is due to aged persecutors? Ishmael did but flowt Isaac; yet Paul faith, hepersecuted him. God calls the scorn of his servants by no better name than Persecution. David thought it no disgrace, to dance in the Ephod: Mical does: she looks through her window, and seeing the attire and gestures of her devout husband, despiseth him in her heart. Nor can she conceal her contempt, but like Saul's daughter, casts it proudly in his face; How glorious was the King of Israel today? Even like one of the vain fellows. David's heart did never swell so much at any reproach, as this of his wife: his love was for the time lost in his anger: and as a man impatient of no affront so much as in the way of his devotion, he returns her a bitter check. It was before the Lord, who chose me before thy father, and before all his house. Had she not twitted her husband with the shame of his religious fervor, he had not upbraided her with the shameful rejection of her father. But seeing she will forget whose wife she was, she shall be put in mind whose daughter she was. Mical was barren, yet she hath too many children, that scorn the holy habit and exercises. There cannot be a greater argument of a foul soul, than the deriding of religious services. Worldly hearts can see nothing in those actions, but folly and madness: Piety hath no relish, but distasteful to their palats. But what was Mical's reward? Her scorns shall make her childless to the day of her death. Barrenness was held in those days none of the least judgments: she thought to lay a sudden disgrace upon David, a perpetual disgrace shall be her recompense. So doth the Lord revenge David's quarrel; that she shall not be held worthy to bear him a son, whom she unjustly contemned, for showing himself an humble son of God. How just is God, to provide whippes for the back of scorers? It is no marvel, if those that mock at goodness, be plagued with continual fruitlesnesse.

And this is that other, and higher degree of wickedness, to scoff at Religion it self. I have heard of some desperate Patients, that have fleered at their Physicians: but death is too mild a punishment for them, that scoff at all Medicines. The wretched Gergesites repelled Christ for fear; they are worse, that drive him away with scorn. If Christ will be ashamed of them when he comes to judge, that were ashamed of him when he came to suffer; how will he reject those with indignation, that rejected him with derision? You have set my counsel at naught; therefore I will laugh at your calamity, and mock when your fear cometh. Themistocles in his lower fortune, much desired the love of a young gentleman; but he scorned him. Soone after, when he grew to his greatness, the gentleman sought to him: but Themistocles answered; We are both grown wise, but too late. Now Christ offers them his Gospel, and they scoff at it: at the last day they will sue for the benefit of that Gospel, but they must not have it. If the Prince grant a gracious Pardon, and malefactors despise it, it were pity they should have the benefit of it. Never shall that mouth kiss the Hand, that hath mocked the Majesty of the King of Heaven.

The children of God must be content to receive taunts from their Fathers enemies: we would hardly endure wounds, if we cannot brook words, for the cause of our Savior. When he was reviled, he reviled not again: this was his patience for us. Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, &c. this should be our patience for him. It is enough to quiet us, that all the disgraces done to us, redound to him. He that despiseth you, despiseth me. Saul, thou persecutest me. He that takes the cause from us to himself, will not resign the revenge from himself to us. I deny not, but there is sometimes a fair way of repairing unjust contumelies: and to be meal-mouthed in the scorns of Religion, is not so much the praise of patience, as the want of zeal. If all the aspersions of Antichristian slanders could flowt us out of the integrity of our devotion, we were fearful cowards. Let them bellow with their mouths, and goare with their horns; yet neither the roaring of their Bulls, nor the licking of their Calves, must daunt or cool the fervor of our sincerity. The blind world in those former times, made it a capital Crime, and loaded it with reproaches, for any man to call himself a Christian: yet the faithful did not give over the name. Pantùm mali, quia Christiani: which Tertullian shown to be most unreasonable; for nudi nominis nullus est reatus. This Sect is everywhere spoken against; like Markes in the Butt, at which every fool shot his Bolt. Yet as David said; I will be more vile than thus, and base in mine own sight: This very abasement is heroical; and the only way to true glory, is not to be ashamed of our lowest humiliation unto God. Yea, the honor of such shall break forth in the midst of their contempt; and find a secret reverence, even where they have outward indignities. The hearts of men are not their own: he that made them, will over-rule them, to honor those that honor their Maker: and if they do not, yet God will honor them, to their shame: as David's lowliness blessed his house, while Micals scorn brought a curse upon her self. When they arise, let them be ashamed; but let thy servant rejoice. God crowned that head with honor, which the Boys of Bethel would needs cover with shame, and supply the wa•• of hairs with reproaches.

Of the two, the derided ever speedes the better: for derision dasheth in a puddle, and the dirt flies about his own cares; whiles it lights shore of innocence. The mocker would cast aspersions on his brother; out when he goes to bed, he finds them all on his own clothes. Every stand• makes a deeper wound in the scandalizers conscience, than on the others credit: it is like a Bullet riding on a string, wherewith while he seeks to strike another, it recoiles and winds about his own loins. It is fit that the lavish tongue should always come by the worse; as the errant Scold is overcome by silence. It may be the Lord will look upon mine affliction, and requite not good for his cursing this day. Innocence needs not stand upon her own justifying; for God hath undertaken to vindicate it. Ill tongues will be walking; neither need we repine at their insolence: we may well suffer their words, while God doth deliver us out of their hands. Livia wrote to Augustus Caesar, concerning some ill words that had passed of them both; whereof she was over-sensible: but Caesar comforted her; Let it never trouble you, that men speak evil of us; for we have enough, that they cannot do evil to us: Indeed, above Hell there is not a greater punishment, than to become a Sannio, a subject of scorn. Samson bare with more patience the boring out of his eyes, than the ludicrous scoffs of the Philistines. They made a feast to their gods; no Musician would serve, but Samson: he must now be their sport, that was once their terror. That he might want no sorrow, scorn is added to his misery. Every wit, every hand plays upon him: who is not ready to cast his bone, and his jest at such a captive? So as doubtless, he wished himself no less deaf than blind; and that his soul might have gone out, with his eyes. Oppression is able to make a wise man made and the greater the courage is, the more painful the insultation. Alcibiados did profess, that neither the proscription of his goods, nor his banishment, nor the wounds received in his body, were so grievous to him; as one scornful word of his enemy Ctesiphon. Good Queen Esther, in her prayers to God for her people, doth humbly deprecate this height of infelicity; O let them not laugh at our ruins. And David held it for a singular token of God's favor; that his enemy did not triumph over him. Yet what if they do traduce, is there none to justify? Philip of Macedon was wished to banish one that spake ill of him; but he answered; It is better that he speak where we are both known, than where we are both unknown. Lewd men may believe their mis-reports, the wise know their tongues to be no slanders.

They Scoffe at us, God laughs at them. He that sitteth in the Heavens shall laugh; the Lord shall have them in derision: Laugh? this seems a hard word at the first view: are the injuries of his Saints, the cruelties of their enemies, the derision, the persecution of all that are round about us, no more but matter of laughter? Severe Cato thought, that laughter did not become the gravity of Roman Consuls; that it is a diminution of States, as another told Princes: and is it attributed to the Majesty of Heaven? According to our capacities, the Prophet describes God, as ourselves would be in a merry disposition, deriding vain attempts. He laughs, but it is in scorn: he scorns, but it is with vengeance. Pharaoh imagined, that by drowning the Israelite males, he had found a way to root their name from the earth: but when at the same time, his own daughter, in his own Court, gave Princely education to Moses, their Deliverer; did not God laugh? Julian rearing up the Jewish ceremonies, projected to supplant the new Religion by the old; and therefore would be at the cost to build up the Temple again: but when from under the foundation, as from the Hill Vesvius, flaming fire brake forth, and dissolved all his works; did not the Lord smile? The Philistines surprise the Ark of God, and carry it away; thus far they are suffered to laugh and triumph. But when their Idol Dagon fell down, to do it reverence; when themselves were so tormented with sickness, that they were fain to restore their pilfer with shame: did not God smile? When Superstition and Idolatry were re-advanced in England, by Queen Mary; how did the Papists mock and scoff at true believers? Yea, would they had only stowed us out of our credits, and not out of our lives. But when five years shall determine all that bloody Persecution, did not God laugh at all their Boners and Butchers?

Short is the joy of the wicked: Is Dagon perked up to his place again? God's smile shall take off his head, and his hands; and leave him neither wit to guide, nor power to subsist. How did our enemies swallow an invincible hope, to swallow us up with their Invincible Navy? But when the winds and seas, fire and water fought against them; did not the Lord laugh them to scorn? Videtur, & ridet. How did the Engineers of Antichrist applaud themselves in their sure Design, and laugh in their hellish Vault at our prepared ruin? But God did also laugh; and blessed be God, we may laugh too. As Caesar said of Pharos; he was prius victus, quam visus: so that Treason was knetched, before it was fully hatched; undertaken, but overtaken: He that dwells in Heaven, laughed it to scorn. We may not judge of God's works, until the fifth act: the case deplorable and desperate in outward appearance, may with one smile from Heaven find a blessed issue. He permitted his Temple to be sacked and rifled, the holy Vessels to be profaned and caroused in: But did not God's smile make Belsazzar to tremble at the hand-writing on the wall? Oh, what are his frowns, if his smiles be so terrible? Let us never be too busy in washing off false aspersions: too earnest diligence puts a suspicion of guiltiness into the cause: it is enough to say with David; Lord, thou knowest mine innocence. When the Boy, in the Fable, got up into a Dung-cart, to throw dirt at the Moon; another (more charitable than wise) Boy came running with a Bason of water to wash the Moon. It is more than needs: Religion will look like her self, fair and beautiful, maugne all her imputations: and the righteousness of the Saints shall break forth, as the light at noon-day.

Here is the character of profane persons; Profani, quasi procul à fano. F à fando; it was the Speaking-place: where God spake to man, by his Precepts; and man spake to God, by his Petitions. They are called Profane: first, that are not entered into the Church; whose unhappiness, is to be without: secondly, that are entered, but conform not themselves to the Doctrine of godliness. It is good indeed, to be within; for in our Fathers house is Bread enough: without, is nothing but Hogs-meat. Out of the circle of the Church, rains nothing but fire and Brimstone. But here, quaerendum est de modo, we must examine the manner of being within. Men may be within, as Cham was in the Ark, as Judas in the College, or as Chaff in the floor: in respect of their abode and residence, many are within, that in respect of their faith and obedience, are without. It is all one, to be without, and not to be holy within. Thirdly, that destroy holy things, spoil the Church, and rob their own Mother: as Pope Leo said; He could have no place in Heaven, because he had sold it. We have too many of these sacrilegious Scoffers, that either detain part, as Ananias; or take away all, as Bolshazzar. Observe the offense and success of that wretched Paire: First, they did not collere, take away but detimere, heepe back: Secondly, not that which was the Churches before, but their own; to be disposed at their pleasure: Thirdly, this was not all, but a part of the price: Fourthly, yet the Scripture speaks of them, as it doth of Judas; Satan had filled their heart: Fifthly, and they are smitten with sudden death. How many smile in their hearts at the close conveyances of their sacrilegious frauds? God laughs at them as f•st; for he sets that their day is coming.

Again, fourthly, they are profane, that disgrace holy things; by giving great places in the Church to loose persons. This was Jereboam's sin. God's Clergy was select and honorable, branches of the holy stemme of Aaron; but Jeroboam rakes Priests out of the Kennell. Religion cannot want her sacred Masters of Divine Ceremonies; and so must needs receive either much honor or blemish, by the quality of those that serve at her Altars. They do but mock God, that thrust the blind and lame into his service. Men that have deformed bodies, are accounted fitter for Spittles and Hospitals, than great employments. It is but a Scoffe, to fill Christ's Grammar with such Heteroclytes. No man is too good for the Priesthood; the Priesthood is too good for many men. Fifthly, they are profane that contemn God's Ministers; for they put a Scoffe upon God himself: as David could not but feel himself dishonored, in the abuse of his Ambassadors. Woe be to those Ammonites; God hath Messengers of wrath, for them that despise the Messengers of his love. The scorn and insolency done to us, is not buried with us; God will remember it in the day of vengeance. There be Sawes, and Axes, and Harrowes of Iron, yea, a Brick-Kilne of fire, for such Scoffers. God hath ranked Priests next unto Kings; He hath made us Kings and Priests. The King must have a Priest to direct him, and the Priest must have a King to protect him. Christ was both King and Priest: nor was this a Political Union, of both Persons in one State; but an Hypostatical Union, of both Offices in one Person. So the Priesthood hath ever been held a Flower of the Crown. What shall become of them, that can find no more pleasing subjects for all their scorn, than Priests? Woe, woe to England for this sin; which hath so universally conspired in the contempt of the Ministers of the Gospel. Lastly, they are profane Scoffers, that scandalize holy things; reproaching virtues, while they blanch vices: that call evil good, and put light for darkness. Thus they call the humble man, an hypocrite; the proud, a man of a brave spirit: the drunkard is a good fellow, while the sober man is no fellow of theirs at all. What is this, but to stamp God's Image on the Devils dross; and to stamp the Devils Image on God's Silver? These be the Scoffers, the profane sensualists of our times.

I conclude: We see the state of the world, in these contrary conditions of mankind: some seek the Lord, others flout them for their labor: some are fearful to sin, others scoff at all goodness: some are the friends of Christ, and they must look for all the rest to be their enemies. This world is a Sea; and they that serve the Lord, are in a Ship of Peace: but if we look up, we shall presently ken a Man of War; and then we must be for War too. There be two Ships under sails, a Pirate and a Merchant; we must prepare for a Skirmish. The Gally that hath our Pinnace in chase, is the Pyracie of Hell; the Synagogue of Satan: her name is Persecution; a hot Ship, and full of wild fire. In which, the Devil is Master, Malice the Masters-Mate, Hypocrisy the Boat-swaine, Covetousness the Purser, Lust the Swabber, Furie the Gunner, and Sedition the Trumpeter. Vices are the Sayles, the Wisdom of the Flesh the Card, the Mystery of Iniquity the Compas; Atheists, Scoffers, profane, all the rabble of Hell, the Mariners. She hath two Tyre of Ordnance planted in her, Heresy and Irreligion: (she is either for a false God, or none) and these spit fire, smoke, shot, and sulphur, against all that worship the Lamb, or fight under the Ensign of Faith. The Flagge in her top, is Infidelity; the Motto, Lucrum est pietas, There is no God but gain. We may see her parallel in the Prophet: she hath her choice materials out of all Kingdoms; especially, her Ballace from Turkey, and her Tackling from Rome. Antichrist is her Steeres-man or Pilot, and steeres her course. Th• she goes swiftly, proudly, securely; scorning and scoffing at all oppositions. But her worst is, she hath no Anchor: so when the storms of God's wrath arise, down she sinks to desperation, and perisheth.

The other vessel is that wherein we sails; the name of it is the Church: In which Christ is the Master, and he hath no Mate; his Cross is the Mast, his Sacraments the Sails, the Tackle Patience, Divine wisdom the Card, God's Word the Compass: the Soldiers are Prophets, Apostles, Preachers: the Mariners, Angels: the Freight, the souls of Men, Women, Children: the Foredecke, Humility; the Armor, Innocency; the Sterne, Charity; the Anchor, Hope; the Flagge in the top of her, Faith; with this word written; Premi•, non opprimimur; being cast down, we perish not. These two meet, and fight: the one invading, the other defending: the one striking, the other warding the blows: the one proudly insulting, the other patiently suffering. One would think that the patient Ship should have the worst of it; and that after so many assaults, it must needs be at last sunk and overwhelmed. But Christ is in it; he hath the charge of it, and that charge he will make good. Though the Elements were all on fire, the Earth a dissolving, and Heaven a falling, this vessel should not miscarry. It is a Body, whereof he is the Head; a building, whereof he is the foundation; the Spouse of his Love, the purchase of his Blood. When the Pyracie of Hell shall sink to Hell, and all the workers of wickedness shall perish: He will bring this Ark to the mountains of Armenia, the harbor of peace, the kingdom of glory, through the greatness of his Merits, and the goodness of his Mercies, which shall never fail us.

Walking after their own lusts.] All this their scorn of religion is but to maintain their lusts: did not the Gospel cross their sins, they would not cross the Gospel. To be carnally minded is death: this troubles them. Death is the end of sin, though not the end of a sinner. A wicked man sins not purposely that he might be damned, but damnation follows his wickedness. Not seldom we seek for one thing, and find another; as Saul sought Asses, and found a kingdom; as Absalom sought a kingdom, and found a Galhouse. The adulterer in his sin, seeks pleasure; the covetous, riches; but they find another thing, that is, Death. The Word of God sets down the wages of sin, and ties punishment to it as an inseparable effect to the cause. Because they cannot dissolve this knot, they fly upon the Word it self; and through the sides of the Law, wound the name of the Law-maker with reproach. As thieves, that would put out all the light, that in the dark they might more securely ransack the house. The conscience that is guilty of flagitious crimes, could wish the Heavens blind; as knowing that they look upon unlawful things with sore eyes. Why have the Pontificians, instead of clasps, hung padlockes upon the Bible; but that they might uncensured Walk after their own lusts? Why, but that their lusts might be laws, and those laws guide the lusts of the people? So the very sins of Teachers become rules to their Scholars. If Paul preacheth, Demetrius roars: of all professions, the Ministry is in this the unhappiest; because we fight against those sins, which men love better than their own souls. The Covetous Pharisees derided Christ's Sermon against covetousness: Christianum dogma vertitur in scomma. As a tyrant demolisheth all the Forts in his dominions, that the right heir of the crown may find no refuge of defense; so his own will may have the full swindge without means of resistance. Profane Libertines could wish that all Preachers had caught an everlasting cold, that they might carry away those sins without reproof, which they have perpetrated without shame.

Every evil man hath lusts of his own: which he is as resolute to maintain, as a father to keep his own children. It is easy for men to dislike Copidita • (◊) suas; to condemn Peccat•m ali••m: but our own lusts be dear into us. What wonder is it, if a dumb man be no swearer, an Eunuch no adulterer, a beggar no Broker? Where is no assault, there can be no victory. I am not •• other men are, saith the Pharisee; extortioners, unjust, adulterers, nor as the Publica. No extortioner; it may be so: What if he were so rich, that he need not; or so poor, that he could not oppress; or so base, that no man would trust him? What needs a rich man be a thief? Not unjust; it may be so too: his privatenesse might exempt him. How should he fail in doing justice, that never had an act of justice to do? No adulterer; it may be so: either his unchaste offers have been repelled, or his concupiscence hath wrought out it self another way. Not a Publican; very true: for worse, he was a Pharisee. He durst not say, his conscience would not let him, That he was no sinner. There is variety of lusts; and that old experienced fisher of souls hath more baits than one. For an hypocrite to decline open randing, rambling, noctivagating, swaggering garments, and revels; it is no wonder: he hath another kind of lust: To make the end of all his Religion, the advancement of his own ends; and to cozen them as a Saint, that would defy him as a Devil: this is the desire of his lust. He deals with his conscience, as the untoward Husband did with his Wife: he speaks her fair, and makes much of her abroad; but he cudgels her in private, at home. The dissolute person thinks to justify himself: I am none of those that rail at Church-government; that will not suffer a spoonefull of Aqua-vitae to be sold on the Sabbath, though it should save a sick man's life; that will run two miles to a Sermon: As if there was no other way to Hell, but hypocrisy. He that never kept the Sabbath himself, what cares he to keep others from breaking it? Or, to go two miles to a Sermon, that had rather go twenty to a Strumpet?

So the riotous clears himself from avarice; that he doth not keep empty his bowels, to fill his bushels. I had as lieve he had said nothing: he may have lusts no less foul. Yet of all extremes, covetousness and profuseness are lusts most compatible. Though it be true naturally, that Simile generat simile; yet is it often otherwise politically. War is the Parent of Peace; and Peace, through some degrees, begets War: yet what more opposed, than Peace and War? So Prodigality begets Avarice, and Avarice begets Prodigality: yet what so contrary as these two? As the Sea drinks up all Rivers, that it may feed all Springs; or the Liver sucks juice from the stomach, which it sends in blood into all the veins: so the great oppressor derives all from poor laborers, that he may indulgently lavish it among his flatterers: and he is careful to supply his own inordinate lusts, as the Devil studies errands for his Spirits. Whither doth the lust of Ambition, arising from the conceit of a little Inheritance, transport the Gallants of our time? The Thistle courts the Cedar, riches lust for honor: But there is a wild beast, or a tame beast, or worse than both, that treads down the Thistle; the Usurer. The sluggard quits himself from pragmatistical meddling, the busy-body from lazy slugging: one drives up the Hill of Presumption, another down the Hill of Security; both these Ways meet at Hell-Gates. One is an Atheist, and believes no God: another is an Idolater, and worships many gods: one will be of a new Religion, another of no Religion: No matter, thinks Satan, what way they follow, so long as they do him homage, and travail to his Kingdom. Herod could yield to reform many things; but not Herodias, that was his lust. Saul smote many Amalekites, and much Cattle: but he spared the king, and the fat beasts: that was his Lust. We are all ready like Abraham, to plead for our Ishmael: Take my country, I leave it; my wealth, I forsake it; But O that Ishmael, my darling lust, might live in thy sight: Gold and Silver, homage and fealty, will Ahab afford Benhadad: but still there is something Pleasant in his eyes: he is loath to part with that. The Mariners will cast over-board their goods, their wares, their victuals, and freight; but they stick hard at Jonah: and yet nothing but Jonah can serve the turn. Other men's lusts we impartially censure; and pry, like Laban, into Jacob's Staff, for an Idol. we carry in our own bosoms. We have a projected knowledge, not a reflective: we see others, not ourselves: that is the reason, we think best of ourselves, worst of others. But the good man looks to himself, not into another; and therefore thinks best of another, worst of himself. Let me kill my lust, do thou kill thine, everyone mortify his own, and the Spirit of grace mortify them all.

Though there be several lusts in several men; and these quarrel, ma•i•e, and fight one against another; yet they all conspire against goodness. Ed•• and Ishmael, Moab and the Hagarens, Gebal and Ammon, Amalek and the Philistines, the men of Tyre and Ashur; all had several gods: yet all conspire against the true God. Fleshly lusts fight against the soul. One lust fights against another, both against the soul. They make one soul fight against another, and many souls fight against God. There was a conspiracy between the woods and the floods: the ambitious lusts of honor are the woods, and they seek to enlarge their tyrannies and territories, and to bring all in subjection unto themselves. The covetous lusts of riches are the floods; and they project the amplifying of their dominions; as if they would reduce all to a popular equality, and endure no overlookers. On a sudden, fire consumes those lofty Cedars; or the axe of destruction hews them up at the roots; and then where is their glory? The sands stop out the waves; plague, famine, and the sword make havoc among them: then where is their pride? Covetousness would have nature produce faster than she can; riot devours those fruits as fast as she yields them: the one would have all to keep, the other would keep nothing at all: the former gets, and spends not: the latter spends, and gets not: both these lusts proceed from corruption, both end in confusion. Wicked men, though they lust for divers things, can pack together: seldom doth a good motion find perfect accordance; but it is not infrequent for a multitude to conspire in evil. In the tradition of Christ, the lust of the Rulers was envy, Herod's was curiosity, Pilate's popularity, Judas his money: yet were they all confederate against Jesus. The Heardmen run with news, the whole country comes in with clamour. The multitude is a beast of many heads; every head hath a several mouth, and every mouth hath a several tongue, and every tongue a several accent: every head hath a several brain, and every brain thoughts of their own: every breast hath a several heart, and every heart hath it own lusts: so that it is hard to find a multitude without some division. But as many several ingredients in the fat, make but one die, tincture, or color upon the cloth: so all kinds of lust have but one kind of effect; to defile the soul, to dishonor God, to grieve the Spirit, and to cross the Death of JESUS CHRIST.

All men have lusts, but all do not walk after them. We may as well find life in a man's body without a soul, as a soul in that body without lust. Nor do I mean only natural lust, that was given by creation; but even sinful lust, that comes by corruption. For as we were conceived in sin, so we can of ourselves conceive nothing but sin. And this lust sticks a defilement upon our best works; not that in the regenerate it makes them wholly peccata, but it makes them defectiva. All our righteousnesses are as filthy rags. Not quadam, but omnis: not of reprobates, but nostra: not iniquity, but justitia: not as whole cloth, but rags: and those not clean, but filthy: and that the most sordid filthiness that is, menstruosa. And this lust, if it went no further, is enough to condemn us. But in Christ it shall not condemn us, because they that are in Christ condemn it in themselves. The Law of the Spirit of life in Christ, hath made us free from the law of sin and death. As sin could not condemn him, so nor shall it condemn those that are in him: for the same life is in us, that was in Christ: as the water is the same both in the fountain and rivers; and life the same both in the head and members. The least branch of this Vine is too high for Satan's reach. So happy is it to be engrafted to Christ; where God is the Planter, Christ the stock, believers the impes and syens, grace the sap, the word the knife or saw, the Sacraments the ligatures.

Indeed still this Serpent will hiss, often touch us, and fright us: but blessed be God, our fear is more than our hurt, for it cannot condemn us; the sting is out. Christ hath condemned sin in the flesh: all sin; whatsoever had any consideration of sin: original, with the fruit of it, which is actual; and both these with the effect, which is condemnation. He did cast lust out of his office, not without reproach: as a faulty Magistrate is stripp'd of his place and honors with disgrace. Which is our special comfort; that our greatest enemy, that is, sin, is deprived of his power; as the execution of Haman was the consolation of Israel. Saul was afraid of Goliath; but when he saw him dead at the feet of David, his joy was now greater than before his fear. But still we fight, often are foiled, and always complain of our lusts: it must be so, for God will have it so. It is in us, but as a condemned person, reprieved for a time; and it only dies when the body dies with it. A man that hath received his death's wound, may sprangle and move for a while. When a fire is quenched, and the danger past; yet there will remain a smoke that troubles our eyes. Our lusts are like fire under fuel unkindled; temptations are the bellows or blasts of wind, that set them a flaming. In the graceless they presently take fire: in the faithful, though they burn not out-right, yet they often make such a smother that we are not able to abide the room. To expect an utter riddance of this, is to antedate heaven: no mortal earth hath that privilege. We can lust, and pollute ourselves: we cannot eradicate lust, or cleanse the souls thus polluted. Am I a God, that I should recover a man of his Leprosy? To bid a man clear his heart from all sin, is to impose upon him opus Dei, the peculiar work of omnipotent grace. You might as well bid him drink up the sea: as it is fabled of a Prince, with whom a mighty neighbor-king used to pick quarrels, by making impossible demands; otherwise threatening war and ruin to him. Among the rest one was, that he charged him to drink up the sea: which a Counselor hearing, advised him to undertake it. The Prince replied, How is it possible to be accomplished? The Sage answered; let him first stop up all the rivers that run into the sea, (which are no part of the bargain) and then you shall perform it. Much more impossible is it for ourselves to consume and dry up all the Ocean of sin in us; so long as lusts remain like rivers to feed it. For still sin breeds lusts, and lusts increase sin: as the sea sends forth springs that run into rivers, and those rivers return to the sea. It is comfort enough that they cannot condemn us: as the Canaanites were not quite destroyed: they lived for Israel's exercise, but they could never take away their Canaan. They often make us fight, and weep, and struggle; yea and sometimes get us down; but still we rise again. For there is an holy spark in us, which all the deluge of lusts shall never be able to extinguish: as the finger of God is stronger than all the arms and armies of the world.

Lusts are like fire and water, good servants, cruel Masters; tyrannous and deadly where they command. They are not without trouble that have them: but they are miserable that walk after them. There is no condemnation to them that walk not after the flesh: not that have no flesh in them, but which walk not after it. Let us think seriously: God hath in the flesh of his own Son condemned all our lusts; of pride, avarice, uncleanness: and shall we justify that which he hath condemned? Hath Christ killed them, and shall we give them life? Did he come to demolish and abolish our Jericho, and shall we re-build it, with a curse upon ourselves? Was he sent to dissolve the works of the devil, and shall we take Satan's part against him in the re-establishment of those works? Hath he defaced our dangerous way, ploughed it up, and sown it with Thorns and Brambles, that we might take no pleasure in it: and shall we make it a new way, and walk in it as in a garden? Some gross actual sins appear ugly; but how few be there that mind their lusts? Clense thine heart from iniquity, O Jerusalem, that thou mayest be saved: How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee? We that watch when we know our house beset with Robbers, yet can sleep with this treacherous Whore in our bosoms. Do we slight a foul contemplation of uncleanness? The holy Ghost cannot abide it: how must he loath that bed wherein he finds a Strumpet? Shall the thought of envy, the desire of revenge, the purpose of fraud, tarry with us a whole night? What manner of men do we rise in the morning? How shall we pray God to bless our labors, when such pregnant lusts are in labor within us? Hath Satan sown his seed in our hearts, and do we call upon Christ to bless our harvest? O let us root out these lusts, or they will root us out of the Land of the living. Alas, that our deadly enemies should be so dear to us, that to save them, we will lose ourselves! But we think them our friends, because they are our continual companions. Yet finding their perfidiousness, one would think we should no longer trust them. I remember what a Duke of Florence, Cosm was wont to say of treacherous friends; We read that we ought to forgive our enemies, but we do not read that we ought to forgive our friends. It is neither good nor safe to forgive those friends, that with their flattery would undo our souls? It is our familiar friend, the man of our peace, that does us the mischief. Concupiscence is to a man, as the Wench was to Peter; that made him deny his Master.

The multitude of these lusts makes them more pernicious. One hair doth not hang a man, many hairs twisted together will. Even lusts are able to serve him like Absalom, and halter him at the next bough. Many threads make a cord, cords make a cable, and cables hold huge vessels. If actual sin be a sword, every little lust is a sharp Thorn: and what matters it, whether a man receive his death from a Pistol, or great Ordnance. Yea, oftentimes a wind that comes in at a cranny or crevice, or some narrow passage, doth a man more hurt than an open storm. There can be no safety to the soul, without a resolute defiance of every lust: yield to one, and you invite many: relieve one, and all the rest will crowd in for alms. They that have once thrall'd themselves to a known lust, will make no other difference of sins, but their own loss or advantage. A liar will steal, a thief can kill, a cruel man dares be a traitor, a drunkard can falsify: wickedness once entertained, can put on any shape. Trust him in nothing, that makes not a conscience of everything. The Sentinel that will pass a spy, dares betray the host. Samson might easily have considered so much in his harlot, if lust had not bewitched him. She that will sell her body to me, will sell me easily to others: she will be false, if she will be a strumpet. As the Philistines knew where Samsons weakness lay, though not his strength: and therefore would entice his harlot by gifts, to entice him by her daliance, to betray himself: knowing that she which would be filthy, would also be perfidious. So Satan, by casting our water, and feeling our pulse, observing our disposition, knows where our infirmity lies: and therefore corrupts our lust, to corrupt us. The fennes of Lerna were never so dangerous, nor that monster Hydra to the inhabitants, as this Queen mother Concupiscence is to the government within us. Out of the boughs of a tree are taken wedges to cleave it in pieces: Intra nos est, quod contra nos est: out of our own lusts Satan works engines to destroy us.

Yet we part from our lusts with sorrow; as a father mourns for the loss of his children. In Ezekiel's days there were women weeping for Tammuz: and that by the Temple-gate: women had learned to mourn for vanities. Tremellius thinks that this Tammuz was Osyris, the husband of Isis, the Egyptian goddess: and that these women were no other than the basest kind of Bauds; Quae lupanaria incolebant in Domo Dei, cum pueru meritoriis: as in Iosiahs time there werethe houses of the Sodomites by the house of the Lord, where the women we v^e hangings for the greve. Jerome takes it to be Adonis; and that the Hebrews named the Adonis of the Heathen, Tammuz. A damnable and desperate Idolatry, and so much the more devilish as it came near the Temple of God. But have we none that mourn for Adonis, their Tanomuz. The exhausted adulterer, whose f•ne outlives his body, whose lust is full when his veins be empty, mourns; not for having offended God, but for not being able to offend him longer: he is one of Ezekiel's chief mourners for Adonis. The sick intemperate surfeter, that sees wine in the glass, but in his Fever is forbid to drink it, plaugit Adonidem, mourns for Tammuz. The Thief that is hindered by the Palsy from pursuing his booty; the state-spent Barretor, that cannot follow the Law for want of money; plangunt Adonidem, they weep for Tammuz. One would think that in those days of light, such exorbitant lusts should keep within doors, and be ashamed to ramble abroad. But concupiscence is a damp that puts out the eye of knowledge: and we need no other testimony of her predominance, than the works she still produceth. After the soul miscarriage of that she-Pope, the Romists to prevent so shameful an inconvenience, devised their chair of Porphyry-stone, whereon the Successors were sensibly examined, whether they were men, or no. But that custom was soon left, and there was no farther use of their Chair; for the Popes had made beforehand a demonstrative proof of their virility and manhood, by the brood of their bastards, whom they called their nephewes. So sinners have too evident a testimony of the raging lusts within them, by the bastardly fruits it brings forth, The works of the flesh are manifest: too too manifest: but if we see Frogs above water, what store may we think there is in the mud, under water? If the face have so many apparent blemishes and sores, which all desire to hide, what abundance is there hidden under the garments? If so much be seen now, much more will appear at the last day, when the secrets of all hearts shall be opened.

A sensual life is so much below Christians, that it is below reasonable men: yea comparatis comparandis, below the brute beasts, and next to the very devils. One compares the Sense to the Sun: for the Sun seals up the Globe of heaven, and opens the Globe of earth: so the Sense reveals earthly things, but obscures heavenly things. Or to the Moon, which is then lightest to earth, when she is darkest toward heaven. Of all Philosophers, the Epicures were most constant to their profession: never did Epicurean turn to any other Sect; but divers of other Sects did turn Epicureans. But there was an unhappy reason given for it; that Cockes might be made Capons, but Capons could never be made Cockes. This was pleasantly answered: but the true reason indeed may be gathered from Saint Augustine, and by reason it self. It was the sensuality and licentiousness of that profession, which drew so many adherents: this tempted others to join with them; this kept them from joining with others: for so the flesh, to which they were so indulgent, should have lost by the bargain. It is easy for men to be led by their lust; as a guide they are used 〈◇〉, and brought up under: beside familiarity, they find indulgence: so ready is every man to follow his own way. But the Spirit seems darus Magister, and leads us a new walk: not through pleasant meadows, but through sharp tribulations: where we no sooner follow, but lust is casheer'd, as Joab was put out of the General-ship. This way may seem troublesome at the first setting out: but the farther we go, the easier we find it; and the journeys end is peace. While Samson followed this manuduction, his way was not more prosperous, than victorious: heaps lay upon heaps, before his conquering sword. But when he forsook that Guide, to walk after his own lusts; shame and misery were his success. We cannot more wonder at his strength, than at his weakness: for he did not so much overcome the men, as the women overcame him: his lusts blinded him first, ere the Philistines could do it. Would he else, after the effusion of so much of their blood, suffer his affections to carry him within their walls; as one that cared more for his pleasure, than for his life? The Philistines are up in arms to kill him; he offers himself to their city, to their stews, and dares expose his life to one of their harlots, whom he had slaughtered. How happy had it been for him to betake himself to his stronger rock than that of Etam; and by his austere devotion to seek protection of him, of whom he had received strength? But in vain doth he nourish his hairs, whiles he feeds these passions. He that might not drink wine, is drunk with the cup of fornications. His lust carries him from Azzah to the plain of S•rek; and there he finds a Delilah that shall pay him for all his former uncleanness.

So steep and slippery is the walk of lust; that if after one fall we have found where to stand, it is the praise, not of our footing, but of the hand of God. Man is a ship: if God be the Pilot, sitting at the helme, and steering the vessel, the voyage is safe and happy: but if concupiscence hold the stern, all runs to ruin. There are not more unruly Mariners in a ship, than members in the body: let the soul look to all, that must answer for all. Saint Paul prays for his Thessalonians, That their whole spirit, and soul, and body may be sanctified. By spirit, conceive the understanding: by soul, the will and affections: by the body, it self with all the members. Turn man into a Bark; and then the Steersman is Reason, or rather Religion and grace, the sails are the affections, the helme is the will. The sails are apt to take every wind, and to carry the ship as that drives them. If the Pilot let all alone, sleep, revel, and never mind it; there will be sudden destruction. But let him sit at the stern, fixe his eye on the Compass, and guide his hand by his eye, and the vessel by his hand; thus he shall even cozen the wind, and as it were compel it to blow for him. Such is the power of grace, that it makes the object of temptation become the matter of humiliation: and we prove the better even by that which would have made us worse. Or man is a coach, whereof understanding is the Coachman, the will and affections are the Horses, and conscience is the carriage. If the Coachman want will or skill to drive heedily; or if he drive like Jehu, furiously; if he put the reins into the hand of lust: or if he do not know and use his stops and sidings, to turn in a narrow room: the Horses will prove resty Iades, the coach will fall, and sorely bruise the conscience. But though they be unruly, a good driver can help much; he can bring them to coram: if they be too lusty, he will bate their feeding: if too high, take them down with assiduous labor; and make them ducible enough ere he have done with them: thus all the welfare, or illfare lies in the Coachman. We ourselves in a journey, will not trust upon a drunken Waterman or Coachman: why then dare we entertain lust for our Driver? Why should the tail lead the head? Why should conscience stoop to concupiscence? What can be the end of lusts $\langle \emptyset \rangle$, but irrecoverable ruin? Lord, do thou lead us, and give us grace to follow thee: thy ways be truth and righteousness, thy guidance is peace and faithfulness, and thy reward is mercy and blessedness.

And saying, Where is the promise of his coming? For since the Fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the Creation.

RELigion hath two extremes, both mortal enemies to her; Superstition, and Atheism. The former will worship God her own way; the other will acknowledge no God, to worship any way. It is hard to say, which of these is the worse; either to the owners, or to their neighbors, or to the Lord himself.

1. To the owners. Atheism leaves a man to Sense, to Philosophy, to natural Piety, to Laws, to Reputation: all which are some kind of guides to moral virtue, though Religion were not. But superstition dismounts all, and prescribes a law to it self; a form of worship, which if God will not accept, he shall have no obedience at all. So instead of a kingdom, it erecteth an absolute tyranny in the mind. From hence it comes, that no Pagans have been worse to Christians, than Papists: their superstition allowing that villainy, which irreligion would not admit. We never read among the Heathen so horrible and hideous a treason, as the Powder-plot in England, attempted by them that profess the true God, but by a false worship. There is no Epicure of old, or present Atheist, but would rather be what he is, than such a Christian. They would but break the bond of religious unity: these dissolve the combination of all human society. We pity the mad men of Munster, but we cannot but hate a religious Conspirator. It is a great deal less mischief, that the want of all religion should deface men's understanding, than that any religion should spoil them of Piety and Charity: when reason shall only be retained as an Engine or Chariot-driver of malice, and most bloody cruelty. There is no such Atheist, as a devout Hypocrite, a pious imposter: there would be never a Devil left in Hell, rather than his bosom should want guests and supply.

2. To others. Atheism is commonly confined to a man's own breast, and does intra orbem suum furere: because it knows the own weakness to prevail against the universal Tenent: but Superstition is like a ball of Snow, that greatens it self by rolling. Never any Nation was wholly given over to Atheism: some god they acknowledged, though they could not light on the True: but Superstition hath been an epidemical plague, leaving none un-infected. Atheism did never disturb States, but contracted it self with civility, and subordinate obedience. But Superstition hath always made uprores, and been the confusion of Countries. Atheism hath taught men to be wary of themselves: they that expect no life after this, will make as much of this as they can: and therefore avoid quarrels that may trouble their peace, and enormities that may shorten their lives: therefore the times inclined to Atheism, as in the days of Augustus Caesar, were civil times. But Superstition brings in a new Primum •bibile, that ravisheth all the Spheres of government into disorder. As Custom is the master of Ceremony, so the master of Superstition is the people. In both, wise men are fain to follow fools • and what the multitude authorizeth •• practice ⟨◇⟩ the wits ⟨...⟩ stomes, and those their Princes ⟨...⟩ Laws. ⟨...⟩ for Religion, were evils unknown ⟨...⟩ Devil, ⟨◇⟩ divers names and forms▪ And for the petty quarrels among their Puppet-gods; as Mulciber in Trojam, pro Troja stabat Apollo; these differences were soon taken up at a Tavern, and reconciled over a cup of wine. But Superstition is always in garboyles, and the most deadly enmities. Both are such enemies to all States, that Princes by their power, and Ch... but their Decrees, should always join in the damning to Hell such Factions, and their supports: and in all Councils concerning Religion, the counsel of the Apostle would be prefixed; The wrath of man doth not fulfill the rightuosenesse of God.

3. To God. Atheism would have Deum nullum; Superstition, Deum ignobilis: the one would pluck him out of his Throne, the other would share <ϕ> him in his Throne. The one does him treachery; the other <...> injury. The Philosopher could tell there is a God, and that he is to be worshipped: but the true nature of God, and how to be worshipped; he could never demonstrate. Yet it is wonderful that they went not thus far, as to consider, that if there be only one God, and he to be worshipped; they did not examine the Rules whereby he commands himself to be worshipped: Seeing it is folly to acknowledge the King our Sovereign, and to contemn his Laws. What is this, but to reproach the Deity, when we know his Precepts; yet refuse them, and follow our own fancies? It is, instead of subjects, to make ourselves fellows with him in his Kingdom. And God will sooner pardon revolvers, (we have no portion in David) than rebels, that would take away the portion of David. Sheba flies off, and would have no King: Absalom flies on, and would be King himself. The Atheist would have no room for God: the Pope would have a room with God, yea, a room above God. And whiles he makes the world believe, he is the Servant of Christ, he endeavors to make Christ his servant: subjecting God's royal and eternal Laws, to his own forged and mangie Traditions.

Thus miserably assailed on both sides is poor (but pure) Religion: on the one side with Papists, that would scratch out her eyes: on the other side with Atheists, that in their own hearts, and Quoad se, would cut her throat. With this Monster we are now to encounter, which comes roaring with two blasphemies in his mouth: A - Challenge; Where is the promise of his coming?

- Defiance; All things continue as they were, &c.

But before I come to examine these particular arguments, something is requisite to be spoken of Atheism in general. And here consider, the Nature, the Measure, the Kinds, the Causes, and the Conviction of it.

1. The Nature of it, is this: That it forceth a persuasion in the heart, of the nullity of Divine Power; and leaves the whole world to be governed by Fortune. In our Savior's time there were Sadducees, that denied the Resurrection. They could not but know, that they should die; they would not believe, that they should rise again; or, give any account after death, for that they had done during life. The School that is most charged with this Infidel affection, was that of Lucippus, and Epicurus: which taught, that four mutable elements, and one immutable fifth essence, duly and eternally placed, needed no God. Which opinion yet was not so unreasonable as that other, that an army of A•omes, infinite small portions or seeds unplaced should produce such another and beauty, without a Divine Marshall. Yet still some fire burst forth, like thunder, through all those conglomerated clouds: nor did Epicurus utterly deny all Deity; but that the Power which was, had not respect to the Government of the world. Nor did he, as our Atheists say, temporize in this, and dissemble for his credits sake: as if he thought in his heart, there was no God. For his words as more noble: Non Deos vulgi negare, profanum: sed vulgi opinionem Diis appli 〈◇〉. Though he had the confidence to deny the administration, he had not the power to deny the nature.

Indians and Pagans are not without their particular gods, and they have several sins for them; though they have no name for the true God. So the Hea•• 〈◇〉 their Jupiter, Mars, Apollo; and would rather embrace many gods, then none at all: thus do the most barbarous Savages convince Atheists These are they that call all Scripture into question; and if they entertain the morality, yet will not credit the history. If Genesis say, God made the world they presently ask, who made Genesis? If the Apostles say, the world shall be dissolved they demand, who told them so? They are content, with Cornelius Tacitus acknowledge Moses a wise Naturian, well seen in the Learning of Egypt•• that he had Divine assistance in the greatest of his Miracles, this th•y deni• The Water which he struck out of the Rock (say they) was not by any super••all work of God; but by watching to what part of the Wilderness the 〈◇〉 Asses repaired for drink. They hold with Albumasar, that his leading Israel over the Red Sea, was no more but observing the influence of the stars, and waning of the Moon, that with-draweth the Tydes. Because some have discredited the story of Susanna, Judith, and the like Apocryphal Books; therefore they serve all the rest alike, and parallel the whole Bible with the Jewish Talmud, and tax it for a fabulous Legend. But if our Gospel hid, it is hid to them that are lost. They will not believe, that are ordained to perish.

2. The Measure of it: Above other sins, it offers violence both to God and his Image. To God; in that it would not only rob him of his glory, but the world of him, of the Maker. The Heavens declare the glory of God, and the Firmament showeth his handy-work. But these contradicters deny him that honor: as if Heaven were not his (but only natural) manufacture. He made all eyes, yet they would not leave him an eye to see withal. As if the Maker of all ears, of all tongues, of all hearts, should not have an ear to hear, or a heart to be sensible of such blasphemies. Not that he hath these members or affections, but the virtue of these in an infinite perfection. They have their being, live, move in him; yet deny him life, motion, and being: as if he that made their hands, had none himself. They establish Reason as their god, and will not be persuaded there is any other God, unless he makes them privy to all those abstracted and unsearchable secrecies. They ask when he had his beginning, that is without beginning, that gives beginning to all things. Or, how he governs: as if a King should give account to his subjects. They examine him straitly, where he was, what he did, before he created Heaven and Earth: and yet we never found a Pitcher call his Potter to a reckoning. They run through every circumstance of his providence; with, Why he did this; and, Why he did not that. Such ambitious cogitations be found in earthen bodies; even to ransack the Kings private Closet, and to peruse the Records of Heaven: which if they cannot attain, they will vellicate and deprave. That insatiate Diver into the secrets of Nature, who in the round compendiate bladder of his brain, did seek to conglob those three great Bodies, Heaven, Earth, and the wide World of Waters; Aristotle: so puzzled his thoughts about the beginning and bounds of Nile, that in Nile he drowned himself: and because he could not comprehend it, would needs be comprehended by it. If that soul, so metaphysically subtle, could not grasp a River, who shall fetch out the concealments of the infinite Godhead? The Angels know not the day of Judgment, much less other more secret circumstances: And will God conceal that from his sanctified attendants, which he reveals to sinners? We men do not tell our secrets to enemies, or strangers. They that are never so familiar with earthly States, must not think to be familiar with the State of Heaven. Thus injurious are they to their Maker, and to themselves: striving to scrape out those engraven Principles and Divine Characters, which God at first printed in his own Image.

3. The Kinds are two: First, the inward Atheist; that like the Panther, hides his head in a Hood of Religion, when he seeks for a bootie: that devours Widows houses, under pretence of long prayers. Church-Rites he supposeth not amiss to busy the people's heads with, and keep them from minding his proceedings. He cares not what god he entertains, but himself is the only god he heartily worships. He puts on a holy look, when he means to do mischief; and hath Scripture in his mouth, even while he is cutting his neighbors throat. As the Gospel is the power of God to salvation, to everyone that believes it: so he makes the profession of it, Satan's power of deceiving, to everyone that believes him. Under the color of suppressing Popery, he will not leave the Church a jot of her own Patrimony. The door of his mouth is swept and garnished, and strewed with green Rushes; but in his heart is a whole Legion of Devils. The hypocrite certainly is a secret Atheist: for if he did believe there was a God, he durst not be so bold as to cozen him to his face.

Next, the outward Atheist; that professeth there is no God. The former are cunning, and swim with the Tide: these have learned (like Trowtes) to swim always against the stream. They tell us of Egyptians, that can prove a continued succession of their Kings for seventy thousand years: and impudently persist in it, that the late discovered Indians are able to show antiquities many thousand years older than Adam. So hellish are their falsehoods; yea they say, there is no Hell at all, but in opinion: but the Devil would give them all the world, that they could prove it so. Devils, say they? Alas, there are none: but the time shall come, they would give all the world, there were not. Julian called all Christians, Galileans: and in the hour of his death there appeared to him a grizly shagge-hair'd Devil; who (notwithstanding he cried out, Vicisti Galilae, Vicisti, Thine is the day) would never give him over, till he had stripped his soul, like pith out of her fleshy stalk, and bore it with him to endless torments.

4. The Causes follow; which are partly within them, and partly without them. Within them two:

First, Ignorance: Because they cannot grossly palpare, feel God with their bodily fingers, or see him with their eyes, they confidently renounce him. He that comes to God, must believe. They do not come to God, but come against God: nor do they believe, he is the rewarder of them that seek him: but rather, that they prosper best, who despise him. Is a Monarch no King, because he does not set his Throne among his utmost subjects, and borderers of his Kingdom? We are God's utmost subjects; the last (in a manner) that he hath brought to his obedience: shall we forget ourselves to be his subjects, because he is not as visibly conversant among us, as among his Angels? The soul governs the body; the body can neither see nor hear this soul: hath it therefore no soul? Yes: and as the body •old not stir without the soul; so neither body nor soul could move without God. It is he that lets forth, and calls in our breath, that shuts and opens our eyes, orders our hands, and guides our feet, as he pleaseth. Suppose our King should erect his Throne in a foreign Land; yet he is still our King, and his power undiminished. Indeed so did our fathers rebel, and forgot they had a King: so did the Kings own brother rebel, and forgot that he had a brother; crowning himself King, when Richard Cuer de Lyon was warring in the holy Land. He that is everywhere, must needs be among us, though we see him not: divers Princes have taken pleasure to walk disguised among their own subjects. How potent and patient is that God, who gives motion to those tongues that blaspheme him? We would not lend our enemy weapons to fight against us. A little Philosophy inclineth man's mind to Atheism: but but depth in Philosophy bringeth him about to Religion. When men look upon second causes, scattered; they are ready to rest in them: but when they behold them confederate and knit together, they fly to Providence and confess a Deity. Therefore David sets a fools cap on the head of Atheism.

Secondly, Pride. Prosperity doth so tympanize men's souls, and entrance them from themselves, that they forget they had a Maker. Who is God, saith Pharaoh: There is no God, saith Nebuchadnezzar: I am God, saith Alexander. but Nebuchadnezzar found there was a God: Pharaoh found what that God was; Alexander found himself to be none; and confessed that he knew himself mortal by two things; sleep and lust. These drunken favorites of the world run mad with a conceit of themselves; and have so far waded into the stream of blasphemies, and scorn of the Scriptures: that finding this height of provocation to escape punishment, they conclude there is no God to punish: otherwise he would not put up such indignities. First, they have made themselves profane against God, and then pump their wits for reasons to prove there is no God. So the Poet, though he brought it in with an ignoscite falso, and with some more nicety, as if it were a temptation only, and put upon him: Solicitor nullos esse putare deos. The Snake, which the kind husbandman took out of the cold, and cherished in his bosom, when she had recovered her lively heat, and grown lusty; singled out him ungratefully, to try her first sting upon. God hath redeemed poor frost-bitten Snakes, miserable sinners, from scarcity and want: and they no sooner have pick'd up their crumbs; but presently (as if they could now stand of themselves, and needed his help no more) they sting him with their blasphemies. And finding themselves as great as they can well be amongst men, grow to envy and extenuate their Maker. If Ziba be waxed great under Mephibosheth, he will give him a lift for all he hath: a promoted Beggar hath not seldom renounced his own parents. It is not so easy for a poor man to be an Atheist. But impetuous lust, if it must be controlled, had rather say, there is no God, than yield to a God that will not yield to them.

The Cause without them are two. First unlearned and rude Teachers, that leap out of a library of Catechisms into the loftiest Pulpits; that usurp the Chair of Paul, and were never brought up at the feet of Gamaleel. These by preaching nothing but faith, quite discredit all faith, in the Atheists of our time. To plunge and blunder in the Pulpit, to bungle up a discourse of two hours, to apply Scriptures without purpose; as if like Botchers, they would mend leather-doubtlets with velvet shreds: to deliver full stomach'd tautology for the evidence of the Spirit: to be all utterance, no materials, and so not to edify but tedifie their hearers. This disgraceth the cause of Christ with these soul-Benummed enemies; who profess, they had rather hear jarring black••nts, than such bald Sermons. The Kings Embassage is dishonored, that is delivered by ignorants: nor can it be credited, when not two of them agree in the tale. How do they jeere at us, when they see congregations so thronged where such heavy gated Lumberers teach? As if their mouths were revered •• the lips of the Sybils, who spake nothing but it was registered; and all their sentences were even Oracles. For this, the Italians call us dull-headed Ty••ani: for this, Atheists traduce us, that our brains are lost with the fumes of full platters, and our spirits buried in Beefe-pots. That as England hath Tinne and Leaden Mines, so it hath Tinne and Leaden Muses: that we have none left to confute Images and blocks, but blocks and Images. Though we could easily clear ourselves, and the whole Ministry of our Church, from these unjust imputations: yet let us know this, that these enemies are special men of wit: Popery hath not won to it self so great wits as Atheism: it is the superfluity of wit that makes Atheists. These will not be beaten down with fusty dorbellisme: disordered hail-shot of Scriptures will never scare them: they must be convinced and beaten at their own weapons. Caesarem appellasti? Ad Caesarem ibis. Have they appealed to reason? Let us bring reason to them, that we may bring them to reason. We need not fear the want of weapons in that armory, but our own ignorance and want of skill to use them. There is enough even in Philosophy to convince Atheism, and make them confess, Propriis configimur pennis.

Next, the bad lives of the religious: when they see those hat acknowledge God, do worse deeds than they that acknowledge no God, this confirms them in Atheism. It was the calling of the Apostles, and in some degree it is the office of all Christians, to be Witnesses unto Christ. John the Baptist was more than a Prophet, because he was a Witness of Christ: that great and glorious name of Martyr, is but a Witness. Now to be Witnesses of Christ, is to be like Christ; to conform ourselves to the Doctrine and Example of Christ. John the Baptist was like him, he did as He did; he led an holy and religious life: so he was a Witness. Saint Stephen was Protomartyr, Christ's first Witness; because he was the first that did as he did, that put on his colors, that drunk of his cup, that was baptized with his Baptism, with his own blood: so he was a witness. All Christians witness for Christ with their mouths, but some witness against him with their lives. They have a form of godliness, that is lip-testimony: but deny the power of it; here is no life-testimony. Infamy is one of the highest punishments which the law of man inflicts: Death ends all temporal sufferings, but this lies upon a malefactor even after death. Infamy is the worst penalty; and intestability, (to be made intestable) is one of the deepest wounds of infamy: and then the worst degree of intestability is not to be believed, not admitted for a witness of any other. He is intestable, that cannot make a Testament or Will, that cannot give his own goods: and he is intestable, that can receive nothing by the Testament of another. He is intestable, in whose behalf no Testimony may be accepted: but he is the most miserably intestable of all, the most detestably intestable, that discredits another man by speaking well of him; and makes him the more suspicious by his commendations. A Christian in profession, that is not a Christian in life, is in this last kind intestable: he discredits Christ by bearing witness of his Name, and makes his Name so much the less regarded by his witnessing.

From hence is the quarrel of all these Atheists against Religion; because it is barraine of good works. When the Orthodox and Arian Bishops contended about the faith, Iovinian could say; Of your learning I cannot so well judge, or your subtle disputations: but I can observe which of you have the better behaviours, Lucius, reputed an Arian Bishop, cleared himself to one Moses, and made confession of his faith. Tush, saith Moses, what tellest thou me of the faith of the ears? Let me have the faith of the hands: I will not take my instalment from hands full of aspersions, of bribery, blood, and injustice. Occulat • mihi sunt manus, saith the Atheist with that Strumpet, Credunt quod vident. This gives them occasion to blaspheme God, and to doubt whether all Divinity be not mere policy, and the Scriptures a fable. This is the principal pretext of Atheism, yea the fountain. There was a woman much spoken of in some parts of this Land, that lived in professed doubt of the Deity; even after illumination and repentance hardly comforted: who often protested, that the vicious and offensive life of a great learned man in the town where she dwelt, •d occasion these damned doubts in her mind. This opens the mouth of wickedness; this is the hint of all their scorns and scoffs of Religion. This made Linacre, reading upon the New Testament, the fifth, sixth, and seventh Chapters of Saint Matthews Gospel; and comparing those rules with Christian lives; to throw down the Book, and burst forth into this protestation: Either this is not God's Gospel or we are not Christians.

5. The Conviction. Doth all the world acknowledge some God? Do some nations entertain too many gods? And wilt not thou grant one God? Revolve thy memory, turn over the Records of that Diary: didst thou never pray? Yes, and obtained: who heard thee, who granted that? Thou couldest not breath, unless God did put the breath of life into thee; as unless the bellows did respire wind, they could not blow. Is there a spark of fire in thee, a soul? How came it there? How doth the compacture of thy body hang together? Why does it not fall asunder now, and why shall it dissolve hereafter? Is any of these dispositions in thine own hand? Who leads the Sun out of his chamber, or brings the Moon forth of her cloudy pavilion, but God? Why doth not the sea swallow up the earth, as well as over-peere it, but that there is a God that snaffles and curbs it? Hath the vast azur'd Canopy nothing above it, whereunto it is perpendicularly knit? Why then do not all things wheel and swerve topsie-turvy? Why break not thunderbolts through the clouds instead of drops of rain? Why is not frost and snow incessantly up in arms against the Summer? Who hears the thunder and thinks not of God? Therefore we may observe, that God never wrought miracle to convince Atheists. The Egyptians were Persecutors, and they were convinced by miracles: the Baalites were Idolaters, and they were convinced by miracles: the Jews were Apostates, and they were convinced by miracles. To satisfy all these sinners abominable enough, miracles were wrought by Moses, Elias, and Christ. But none to convince Atheists, because God's ordinary works convince them. So that as Araham answered the rich Churl, that would have one sent from the dead to his brethren. They have Moses oud the Prophets, if they will not hear them, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead: these be their books. So Paul answers Naturians, if they ask for miracles; By the things that are made, they may understand his eternal power and Godhead. These are their books; fairly printed in large Characters, that they may run and read them.

But the chief conviction is their own conscience; there stick those indelible letters never to be rased out. Howsoever in pride of mind they would be different in Paradoxisme from all the world, and fancy philosophical probabilities of the Trinities un-existence: yet in the inmost recourse of their conscience, they subscribe unto it. The fool hath said in his heart; no fool ever thought in his heart: he would fain have it so, he cannot believe it so: it is an opinion which he suggests to his heart, not which his heart suggests to him. This makes him fearful to die, and to die fearfully: there could be no such terror of the one, or affrightment in the other, if he did not believe some kind of Audit after both. If we should discourse over the ends of all Atheists, we find their deaths drunken, violent, secluded from repentance, but not quitted nor quieted from agonies and extorted confessions of the Deity which they have denied. Their guilty souls assure them of a sin hating God, even in the blackest darkness of their own contracted ignorance: like the sooty visage, and shady fancies of the night, when they have shut all the windows, and drawn the curtains, to keep out the least gimpse of such a knowledge. It is not possible to pin forth conscience: it may for a while be shut up, it can never be shut out. God will either charge it, as Jehu did concerning the brethren of Ahaziah; Take them alive, and torment them in their mortal days: make them know there is a God. Or, pursue them dead, as the Papists have dealt with divers Protestants; denying them both Coelum vivis, and Terram motuis; life and burial; the air to live in, or, the earth to be buried in. So their conscience shall deny them vitam vivis, for the pangs of it shall take all comfort of life from the living; and mortem mortuis, for this shall not die with them, but be their everlasting torture when they are dead. Only in hell there shall be no Atheists, they no sooner enter that burning territory, but they shall eternally feel there is a God. O Lord open our eyes, that we may see thy Majesty: and soften our hearts, that we may feel thy mercy: and loosen our tongues, that we may confess thy glory: and direct our ways, that we may come to thy eternal felicity.

Where is the promise of his coming?] This is their Challenge. So light was the estimate which the Heathen made of their idle and Idol-gods, and so poor the reputation, either for their majesty or bounty; that they feared not to bestow jests upon them, as upon their fellows. So it was familiar with them, to tell of Jupiter's going a whoring, of his Rapes and Adulteries: nor was this only the matter of their stories, but the representation of their Theaters, and played on their Stages: where appeared Plura crimina, quàm Numina: so did Ioves Wenching discredit his Thundring. Tully writes the story of Timeus; that the self-same night that Alexander was borne, the Temple of Diana at Ephesus was on fire: and no marvel; for the Mistress of it was a great way from home; as a Midwife in Macedonia, attending the travail of Olympias. So they made themselves merry with their gods and goddesses, as men wont with Tales in Winter-evenings. But still there was an impression in their conscience of an infinite Power, which they durst not play withal, but rather thought on with fear and reverence. Their fear might fancy gods that were not: but the God that was, and is, did work that fear in them. They wrong the interpretation of Theos, that say, Fear first made gods: Fear did not make God, but God made fear; I mean that fear which is awe and reverence; for the other fear was made by sin. But God is Theos rather, because the fear of him is engraven in every heart. And after all the willful suppressions and desperate stiflings of it, this fear will invade the stoutest soul, and put a trembling into all his joints. A wicked man sins, and no mortal eye seeth him: Why is he afraid? Why ashamed? Certainly, there is in him a secret approbation of virtue, a condemnation of vice, and reluctance of conscience. Let him do what he can to smother it, this fire will break our. While I was m^osing, the fire burned, and I spake with my tongue. The flame of conscience will burst forth, and speak with a tongue of terror. Particulars.

The coming of God is mentioned: and this is diverse; Legal, Evangelical, and Judicial: all which, Atheists deny. His Legal coming, was principally to the Jews, not excluding the Gentiles: his Evangelical coming, was principally to the Gentiles, not debarring the Jews: his Judicial coming, shall be to Jews and Gentiles, exempting none, but to judge all the world. In his first coming, he was a Commander; in his second, a Savior; in his last, a Judge. His first, was to give the Law; his next, to give the Gospel; his third, shall be to require an account of both. The first, ad mundum; the next, in mundum; the last, contra mundum. The first, imperious; the second, gracious; the last, glorious.

1. His coming to give the Law, was majesticall: He would have Israel see, that they had not to do with an impotent Governor, that is fain to publish his Laws without noise, in dead Paper: which can more easily enjoin, than punish; or descry, than execute. Therefore, before he gave them the Law, he shows them, that he can command Heaven, Earth, Fire, Air, in revenge of the breach of that Law. They see all the Elements examples of that obedience, which they should yield to their Maker: and cannot but think it deadly, to displease such a Law-giver, and violate such dreadful Statutes. But these Atheists deny this coming, they acknowledge no such Laws: only they think human policy invented them, for the general safety: and that Homicides, Adulteries, Thefts, and Lies be restrained, it is only convenient for the State. The very Indians had a more reverend apprehension of the Decalogue, when it was read to them; and considering every Commandment, they professed, there could be nothing devised more just and equal. As Aeneas Sylvius said of the Christian Law; That it was worthy to be received for the honesty of it, though it had never been confirmed by miracles. Woe unto those Rebels, that will not allow the Law a power to command them; they shall find it an unanswerable Indictment, to condemn them.

2. His coming to give the Gospel, was humble. As in the Creation, God made man like himself, by stamping in him the Image of his own nature: so in the Redemption, God made himself like man, by taking on him the infirmity of our nature. And what God said by way of derision, concerning Adam; Ecce homo, Behold the man it become as one of us: the same we speak by way of thankful exultation, concerning God; Ecce Deus, Behold the Lord is become as one of us. His birth was ordinary, was mean, was meaner than ordinary: Verbam non poterat fari verbum. The Bread of Life was borne in Bethlehem; by interpretation, the House of Bread: but so poor a house of Bread, that there was scarce any Bread in the house. He was made so far lower than the Angels, that he was consorted with beasts. At this coming, do the Atheists scoff: they think, that King Herod had little reason to be troubled at it, and was more feared than hurt:

and that the wise men, who presented him gifts, were men none of the wisest. Alas, shall they begin their Religion at a Babe in a Manger? And what was his wealth? When he was to pay tribute, he was fain to fish for money: he begged water to drink: a Loafe and a Fish was his best cheare: he complained the want of lodging, more than Birds and Foxes: he was weary, hungry, thirsty, sleepy, sorrowful. His own kindred went about to lay hands on him, thinking he had been out of his wits. He had no form nor comeliness, nor beauty to be desired; but even despised and rejected of men. Such was his esteem then; and it is no better now, with these Atheists. What, is he their God, that was borne of a woman? The Earth is but a Center to the Heavens, and man or woman but a Point or Center to the Earth: that a Centers Center, the Point of a Point, should contain him that contains all things; they deride, for vainly impossible. They consider not, why he was thus: even because he came to be thus. He suffers enemies to wound him: why, he came to bleed: he lets sinners kill him: why, he came to be killed for sinners. They crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame. But they now disgrace that Blood, whereof hereafter they would give a thousand worlds for one drop.

3. His last coming, is to give Judgment: The two former are past, this is to come: And how should they believe the future, that will not receive the former? But they that would not now accept him as a Savior, shall not then escape him as an Avenger. Then shall they find 〈 ◇ King, that used to cry, Non habemus Regem nisi Caesarem: and they shall see another God, that flatter'd their own impious souls with, Non habemus Deum nisi Naturam. Their Nolumus hunc regnare, We will not have this man reign over••, passeth now upon earth: but their Nolumus hunc judicare, We will not have this man judge us, shall do no good at the great Assizes. Now they laugh at him, but then all the kindreds of the earth shall mourn before him. They had power to condemn him, that had power to condemn them: at last he shall bring this power into act: and as they once said to him; Depart from us, thou despised: so he shall say to them; Depart from me, ye cursed. The Gadarenes, after the loss of their Hogs, besought him to depart out of their coasts. They should have argued: This man hath power over men, beasts, devils; it is good having him to our friend; his presence, is our safety and protection. But they contrariwise infer: Thus powerful is he; it is good he were further off. What miserable and pernicious misconstructions do vain men make of God, of divine attributes, and actions? God is omnipotent, able to take infinite vengeance on sin: Oh, that he were not. If he be merciful, I may sin: if he be provident, I may be careless. I do evil, and he does not punish me with evil: therefore there is no God, no such matter as his coming. How witty Sophisters natural men are, to deceive their own souls, to rob themselves of a God? Oh Christ, how worthy are they to want thee, that wish to be rid of thee? He hath just cause to be weary of us, even while we sue to hold him. But when once our wretched unthankfulness grows weary of him; who can pity us, to be punished with his departure? How righteous will it be for him one day to regeest upon these scorners, Depart from me, ye wicked? I did come, and ye would not receive me: I threatened to come again, and ye would not believe me: now I am come again, and ye shall not escape me.

The necessity of both the Comings of Christ, would be laid to the conscience of these despisers. For the former:

1. The conscience of every man doth testify to him, that there is a Rule: which if he follows, he does well, and is at peace: if he transgress, he finds trouble and secret reprehension, with a dread of punishment. Now there is no man but feels himself a sinner, and is condemned in his own soul. Against whom hath he sinned? for Nullius timor nullus: this must needs be against that Power which gave that Law. Say, he denies the Law written; he cannot but expunge the Law engraven. There is no Law made without a penalty upon the breach: this penalty can be no other than proportionable to the breach: the breach of the Law must be measured according to the Power of the Law-giver: the Law-giver can be no less than infinite; and no less infinite must be the punishment. Diverse of men's laws impose death temporal; what other than eternal death can satisfy God? We cannot imagine that God will forgive sin without satisfaction to his Justice: not that he cannot, propter defectum potentiae; but that he will not, propter perfectionem Iustitiae. This is a chain of so infallible dependence, that it admits of no disjunction.

What then, is there no remedy? yes, if we can get one to suffer for us, and to make full payment of our debts, we shall be acquitted. Who should that be? Men or Angels cannot answer for their own sins, but they must needs if they sin, perish. He that can suffer for them, must be man: he that can escape from those sufferings, and recover his life, must be God. Such was the necessity of Christ's first coming. The Law hath a double righteousness; for so Beza reads 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Iuc Legis. One of obedience: this the Law doth rightly challenge, and it hath not the right if it have not obedience. The other is a right to condemn for disobedience: for it is right, they that do evil, should suffer evil. If Adam had fulfilled the Law, he should have been saved by it: the damned fulfill it in Hell, in regard of the curse, but they cannot be saved by it. We must all fulfill it, •el in praecep• vel in pana. The precepts must be kept, that there may be place for the promises. If the precepts be not fulfilled, the curse must be endured. The curse calls for our blood, and without blood there is no remission. We can do neither of these by ourselves: where then is our safety? We have done both these by our Surety. What then shall become of those that deny the coming of this Surety in such was the wonderful wisdom of God, to execute his Justice upon Christ, that he might exercise his mercy towards us. Without infinite satisfaction, his justice could not be appeased: without infinite mercy, we could not be saved. One Deepe calleth another: the Deepe of his justice, for the Deepe of Christ's satisfaction: the Deepe of our misery, for the Deepe of his mercy. If he had shown mercy without satisfaction, where had been his justice? If he had only laid his justice upon us, where had been his mercy? Both these must concur: Mercy and truth must meet together, that righteousness and peace might kiss each other.

This is the true way: now cunning Atheist find out a new way. To grant mercy, and deny justice; this were injurious to God: to grant justice, and deny mercy; this were injurious to thyself. There is no way then left, but for the coming of Christ to help thee: let not the benefit of that coming fall beside thee. Here let us look with thankful admiration, upon that which they load with derision. Christ suffered for us; not only causa nostrâ, but vice nostra, in our stead: we should have been beaten, buffeted, crucified, cursed; he represented our persons, was in our room. O infinite love! Many desire to represent Kings, and wear those royal honors in their Ambassages: But few desire to represent the persons, and bear the shame of base condemned wretches. There is no suing for this; yet Christ undertook it: the King of all the world represented the persons of the poorest beggars in the world. The Law requires her right, and her right she hath a Christ hath fulfilled it for us, and we have fulfilled it in Christ. It may threaten us with our continual failings; but there is a Non obstante, by the goodness of our surety. If the forfeit or mulct be paid for the breach of a penal Statute, the Law can go no further. Yea, he that hath Christ, though he have not kept the Law, hath the righteousness of the Law. Christ hath endured the sharpest of God's judgments, which he deserved not; that we might taste the sweetest of God's mercies; which we deserved not. All this happiness the Infidel loseth: for, Excludit eventum, qui non credit adventum.

But here the Atheist comes in again with a new quarrel: What need our repentance or obedience; when Christ hath sorrowed, suffered, obeyed, done all for us? When Augustine justified free will against the Manichees, the ignorant would take him for a Pelagian: when he denied free will to the Pelagians, they would take him for a Maniche: he was neither; but disputed against both the extremes; the one utterly denying it, the other too highly extolling it. So let us not be mistaken in the Diameter: when we teach that we must sorrow for our sins, this denies not Christ's suffering for those sins. When we say, Christ bore our sorrows: this exempts not us from our just grief for our sins. Because he went the way of Thorns, must ours be strawed with Roses? Because he came to fulfill the Law for us, shall we never mind any obedience to that Law after his coming? This was the argument of the Gnoctickes: He that died, that we should not die, looks he for a requital? Our tears for his tears? Our blood for his? Non vicem repetit, saith Tertullian: Sed ideo magis d•kes, quia non repetit. The Borrower is a Servant to the Leader; and the Receiver to the Giver. Hath he done so much for us, and shall we deny him anything that he requires, though it were our lives? But what is it he would have us to do? He hath been the punishment of our sins, he would therefore have us cease to sin. He endured baseness for us, therefore let us repent of our pride: this he would have. His mouth was buffered for us, let us hate all blasphemy and evil speeches: this he would have. He hungered and thirsted for us: Shall we surfeit upon strong drink and belly-cheare? This he would not have. His side was placed for our sins: Shall we thrust the same spear into the same wound again? This he would not have, and let us never do it.

The necessity of his last coming follows upon this: for shall he give the •eld both Law and Gospel, and call us to account for neither? Shall he let his Vineyard to Husbandmen, and never require Rent? The Law and Commandments were the Acts of his Justice, and they are transgressed. The Gospel and Promises are the Acts of his Mercy, and they are abused. Shall he put up all these indignities, and suffer his Creatures to finish their licentious races with impunity? Why do men die? Because the Elements decay with age: Is this all? Nay, but why are men afraid to die? Is it only because nature abhors dissolution, and they would not cease to be? Is this all? We cannot believe it: we know they feel more than this; even a guilty fear of some succeeding recompense; whereof because their foul souls can have no good expectation, they tremble at the suspicion of evil. This is the presage and pralodium of hell approaching: that they often cry out on their death-beds, They are damned, when yet the sentence is not come: and The devil, the devil, in their frantic and distracted imaginations; before he can seise on their souls in their dissolutions. So Cardinal Crescentius, a little before his death, was troubled with a black Dog in his chambers. So Spyra-like, they depart desolate and desperate in and into hellish horrors. Thus the Epicures that denied God as the •ap-house, preach him at the gal-house: and confess that in sobriety of spirit, which they oppugned in wantonness. They that would not find out the Lord in his mercies while they live, shall be sure to be found out by him in his Judgments when they are dead. There is a pale Horse and his Riders name is Death, and hell follows him. That pale Horse, death, shall deliver them over to the black Horse, Satan; and the black Horse shall carry them to the red Horse, the flame-coloured Hell.

Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die; say the Atheists: But when they come to die, they still have stomach to meat and drink: their meat and drink, is to do their own lusts; as Christ's was, to do his Fathers will. Their daily sustenance they devour without thanks, not without sin: But shall the guest take his fare and lodging, and depart, without paying any Shot? Will the Host entertain strangers in his Inn, and suffer them to pay nothing? Eate and drink, for tomorrow we shall die? One would think, it should be Fast and pray, for tomorrow we shall die. Eate and drink, to die? Men eat and drink, to live. Eate, drink, and die? Would they be taken away with a full stomach, as we kill beasts when they have most flesh on their backs? Eate and drink today, and not die till tomorrow? Who gave them assurance for so long? Why not today? Why not presently, before they can put either meat or drink into their mouths? Multa cadunt inter. The wise man considers, he hath no morrow: therefore looks to himself, while it is called To day. Eate, drink, and die: Well, yield this the common condition of all: Yet to do and suffer all this in a supine and desperate carelessness, as it were to spite destiny; this makes up the blasphemy. Die, and there an end? As there is no need of meat and drink after death, so is there no reckoning to be made for that they have taken? O fools! Will Nature take her due, and shall not Judgment exact his tribute? Death is the way of all flesh: the way, it is not the end of all flesh. Very much flesh hath no end but damnation, and that damnation hath no end at all. As it is with a man that eats and drinks day by day in great quantity, and yet can neither digest nor egest it, get it neither up nor down: he must needs expect death for Physic, that meat and belly both perish together. So he that clogges his soul with the continual surfeits of sin; and can neither digest them in his conscience, nor egest them by repentance; cannot avoid the Judgment, which shall destroy both sin and soul together. The Statutes of righteousness they have wholly broken, the remedies of unrighteousness they have not taken; what can be their end, but destruction?

The soul dies not with the body: it must therefore got some whither, when it leaves the body. If the soul in particular come to Judgment, way •ices•not the general Judgment come to all? I am loath to mingle Philosophical Conceits with Divine Cordials, as Water with Wine, lest my persuasions should be flash and dilute; but that I am here to deal with Atheists. All Philosophy (the brutish School of the Epicure excepted) did acknowledge the soul of man to be no vapor. Not only the learned Grecians, and civilized Romans, but even the rudest Scythians, and unletter'd Savages, the many Languages, and sundry Dialects in the world; this hath ever been the common voice of them all, That souls die not with their bodies. If they die not, extintively, what becomes of them? Shall the virtuous and vicious soul speed both alike? Whither go they; good and bad, all to one place? If a beast could argue, he would abhor such a Tenet. That there is difference of men, no Atheist ever denied: they never thought a murderer to be so good a man, as a preserver of life. They distinguish between a charitable reliever of the poor, and a bloody oppressor of them; betwixt him that speaks truth, and the liar; between the chaste man, and an adulterer; and say, This is a bad man, that is a good one. Yet looking upon the outward condition of these; too often the vicious flourisheth with riches and honor, whiles the good man goes away with poverty and contempt. What then? Shall the souls of both these fare thus hereafter too? Shall the noble rioter retain his honor, and the industrious laborer remain still a beggar? What sense ever concluded so? If then the soul have a being, it must needs change the condition of being: there cannot but be a reward for the just, and a retribution for the unrighteous. It is not possible for the most corrupted heart to think, that a soul shall be honored for villainy, and for honesty be contemned.

Why are good men hated? Why afflicted? Why go they mourning all the day, eating the bread of sorrow, and mingling their drink with tears? Why doth not the current of honor and opulency run by their doors? Why are they not the Treasure of Princes, the Jewels of Kingdoms, the favorites of all men? What should be denied them, whom God loves? Be it answered, Nondum tempus: the time is not yet. Pleasure, and joy, and peace, are coming to them; but only with the coming of Christ. Shall man say to God in the midst of his distresses; Lord, Haccine Iustitia tua, Is this thy Justice? He will answer; O man, Haecine fides tua, Is this thy faith? Thus argue these Atheists: If God be so wise and just in governing the world, and bear such love to his own, why doth he suffer them to be so triumphed over? Either he would deliver them, and cannot; or he can, and will not; or he neither will, nor can; or both. If he would, and cannot; then is he impotent, and hath not the power of a God. If he can, and will not; then he is envious, and wants the love of a God. If he neither can, nor will; then is he so far from being a God, that he comes short of a man. If he both will, and can; why is it not done? We answer, That he both can, and will, and doth deliver his chosen. He can at all times, he will at sometimes, he doth at the best and fittest times, most seasonable for his own glory, and our blessedness. And then they that have denied and desyed God in their bravery, shall be cast down to endless calamity: when those despised and distressed souls, that humbly acknowledged him on Earth, shall be acknowledged and glorified by him in Heaven.

They speak of a Promise of his coming: But when comes he? Where is this Promise? He said, that he would come quickly: yet it is fifteen hundred years ago, and he is not come. He spake of Clouds, and Angels, and a Throne: we see none of all these things. The Clouds fly up and down with the wind, and are as they were at first: Angels we see none: nor any Thrones, but those wherein the Monarchs of the Earth seat themselves. He promised, that the dead shall rise: we never spake with anybody that rose from the dead, to confirm us in such an expectation. He promised, that the Heavens and Earth shall be on fire: yet the Earth is as steady; and the Heavens as fair and clear, as when he spake it. That the Sun should be darkened, and the Moon turned to blood: yet they both give their alternal light, and distinguish day and night with unfailing vicissitude. He said, that the Trumpet should sound, and waken all flesh: our sleeps are not yet broken with any such terrible summons. That the Stars should fall: yet still they keep their stations, motions, and orbs. That he will come in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God; recompensing tribulation to them that trouble his children, and rest to them that are troubled. Yet we are lusty and strong; and as we have followed our fathers, so we leave our Inheritances to our succeeding posterities. And for those that are troubled, troubled they may be still, for any help that we see drop down from the Heavens to their comfort. He hath promised to Judge quick and dead, yet neither is done: and if the living scape, what will the dead fear; that are insensible? When then is the promise of his coming? Sure all is but the vain fear of some, and the foolish ungrounded hope of others: for there is no such matter as any future life: Men die as Beasts, with as full cessation of being: there is neither Judge, nor Doome, nor Hell, nor Heaven: all are but the inventions of policy, to limit the World to a civil carriage. These be the horrible blasphemies of presumptuous spirits, and ill-flattered souls, ordained to perish in their own security.

But, why do they call it a Promise? Not in respect of themselves: alas, they cannot apprehend it without terror, and a palsy in their joints. But they reflect this Promise upon the good, who look for a deliverance and reward in that day. For if in this life only we had hope in Christ, we were of all men most miserable. To us it is a day of Promise, to them a day of commination: to us the end of sorrows, to them the beginning. Then we look that God should both wipe away all tears from our eyes, and set their eyes a running with tears forever. The object of our hope, and of their fear, is the day of universal retribution. All shall come forth: they that have done good, to the resurrection of Life: they that have done evil, to the resurrection of damnation. Woe to them when they desire the day of the Lord: to what end is it for them? The day of the Lord to them is darkness, and not light. They say, Let him hasten his work, that we may see it, &c. But they shall find it a day of wrath, a day of trouble and distress, a day of dissolution and darkness. It is a day they will have small joy in. If horror, and amazedness, and pangs of conscience, and despair, and vengeance, and rejection from God, and condemning to Hell, can bring them any comfort; much good do it them with it.

God's first coming to give the Law, and his last coming to require the Law, have a near similitude. There, was Lightning darted in their eyes, Thunder roaring in their ears, the Trumpet drowning the Thunder-claps, the voice of God louder than the Trumpet; clouds enwrapping, smoke ascending, fire flaming, the Mount trembling, Moses quaking, a terror in the Heavens, an uproar in the Elements, paleness and death in the face of Israel: how wonderful, how dreadful was this appearance? He delivers his Law in the light of fire, from out of the smoke; to teach them, that he could find out their closest sins. They see fire above them, to represent the fire that should be below them; that they might learn what is due to their sins. That they might know, God could waken their security, the Thunder and louder voice of God speaks through their ears to their hearts. That they might see what their hearts should do, the Earth quakes under them. To assure them that there is no shifting of their appearance, the Angel calls them together. O royal Law, O mighty Law-giver, who can offend thee without terror? Now, if his first coming were so terrible, what shall be his last? If the Law was thus given, how shall it be required? If such were the Proclamation of God's Statutes, what shall the Sessions be? What heart of Adamant doth not tremble at the resemblance? The Trumpet of the Angel called unto the one; the voice of the Archangel, the Trumpet of God, shall summon us to the other. In that, Mount Sinai only was on a flame: here, all the world shall burn with fire. In both, there are Clouds, Lightning, Thunders, Trumpets, Fire: only in this latter, the stream of Fire shall be more potent, patent, violent, dissolving the Heavens, and melting away the Elements, with a noise. Think Atheist, what pleasure thou shalt find in his coming. If God did on such a manner forbid sin, what is the vengeance he will inflict upon sinners? If he were so terrible a Law-giver, what a Judge shall he appear? If the deliverie of the Law was little less than death, what death shall be the reward of the transgressors of it? It was given in a fire fearful enough, but shall be required in a fire more fearful. The fire wherein it was delivered, was but terrifying; the fire wherein it shall be required, is consuming.

To us then, if we be true believers, belongs this Promise of his coming. Christ's first coming was the Expectation of nations, this next is the Expectation of Christians. Look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh. Our eyes are still dropping in this valley of tears; but we look for the gracious beams of that Sun of mercy that shall dry them up. No woman with child did ever more exactly count her time: no Jew did ever more earnestly wish for the Jubilee: no servant so desireth the end of his years: no stranger so longs to be at home: no overladen soul so groaneth for ease: no Soldier so heartily contendeth to have his wars determined with conquest: as the Saints expect the Promise of this coming of Jesus Christ. It is the strength of their hopes, the sweet object of their faiths, in the midst of all sorrows; the comfort of their hearts, the heart of their comforts, the encouragement of their wearied spirits, the life of their encouraged souls; the common clause, the continual period and shutting up of their prayers; Come Lord Jesus, come quickly. Amen.

For since the Fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the Creation.] This is their Sentence or Argument. We may think it strange, that the Apostle should spend any time or pains in the confuting of Atheists: whom shame, fear, and a thousand witnesses, like gnawing worms within their breasts, have ever from the beginning, and shall to the end of the world, force unto an acknowledgment of the Deity. And that it were more fit, arguments should be drawn out of the scabberds of Magistrates, that might without reply choke the breath of such execrable impiety: than for reason to dispute that which heaven, earth, Angels, men and devils, all ages, all languages of the world have confessed. And that such inglorious and infamous questions should be left to the Tribunal of the highest Judge, if there be no Throne upon earth that will determine them: for certainly, they are the children of hell by as proper right as the devil himself. And what am I, that like Uzzah, I should stretch out my hand to underprop the Ark, or, offer to uphold the high Throne of the Godhead? Princes will not let those stand in their presence, with whom they are displeased: and alas, My sins are ever before me; I am a man of polluted lips. Yet because there is a generation of men, that have commanded their tongues (for they shall never command their hearts) to speak a blasphemous Lye; men monstrously mis-shapen in the powers of the soul, and transformed from the use of reason: that labor to root up those rational Maxims and Principles, which the hand of Nature hath planted in them: and they are cursed, that help not the Lord against his enemies; that do not arm their pens and tongues against his Atheistical contradictors: I must proceed, according to my Theme, not only to retort their assaults, but to fling new darts in their faces. Yea, I could wish, that those great wits, which spend their time in bandying unnecessary questions, would let fly upon this Monster, which is the root that nourisheth all the branches of security; and dignity up that from the bottom. Let their pains at the Court, and the Cross, be employed in weeding up those Diagoriz'd opinions, and remnants; which yet stick even in such Gardens, as have borne a long time the name of Christians: and tell them, that God hath ordained long since their impious and blasphemous spirits to immortal malediction.

I confess, that the Champions of God have need of the various and universal Weapons of Learning, for the conviction of these Out-laws. You will say, the Scripture is sufficient (it is so) to build up the man of God. But what shall we do contra principia negantem? Urge Atheists with the Verdict of the Scriptures, you may as well bring them the History of Herodotus, or, the Narrations of Lucian. Tell them of Heaven, and Hell, and a Judge; they count it as a Tale of Cocytus and Phlegeton, and such fabulous inventions of licentious Poets. Therefore, skirmishing with Atheists, we must behave ourselves as if we were a converting Gentiles. The confession of Philosophers, the consent of Histories must be observed: they will not be convinced, but with their own Authors. There is no knowledge, but it is of God: and we dishonor Divinity, if we take away her handmaids; as a Queen, that is allowed no servants. Logic, Rhetoric, Philosophy, History, Poetrie, are her waiting-maids; the Virgins that follow her, and as it were help to make her ready, in her choice ornaments. When Christ said, You must forsake all, and follow me; he did not mean that we should forsake all Arts, and follow him. Luke was a Physician, Paul a learned Pharisee: neither of these knowledges did them hurt, in performing their Ministry. Paul alleged Verses out of Heathen Poets: it was, but by their own Poets to convince Heathens. The Atheists with nothing but known reasons will be refuted: they admit of no reasons, but those that come within the compass of their five senses. When they hear one talking affectedly, coldly, or absurdly in the Pulpit; alleging, that he speaks from the mouth of God; they make an obloquy of mouth, matter, and all. Indeed we should not lumber up Scripture; but lay it deliberately and methodically, like Pearl and Gold-lace on a rich garment. If there be any that care not how they speak it, so they have it to speak; they dishonor it. Out it flies from them, East and West, though they lose it in the mis-application; all is nothing, for more they have of it, than they well know what to do withal. It should be used as the first ground, to build; and the last Seal, to confirm. When it is trivially, and without necessity, called unto witness, it is a kind of taking the Name of God in vain. We must gather fruit, not leaves; proofs, not phrases only out of the Bible. It is the Corner-stone; both the foundation, and closing up of the Building. In war we use the weapons and engines of all Nations: so no less do we employ all Arts against the sins of all Nations. Scripture must be reserved as the last Volley, to get the victory. It is the great Ordnance, which must play upon our enemies in the end and chief hazard of the fight. All wise Orators keep their weightiest arguments to the conclusion: otherwise like that people whom they call Hot-shots, they will give a brave on-set, but quail presently. Against these Porphyrian deriders, let us use all our Art: let Priests pronounce them, and Princes proclaim them, the uncleanest Lepers that ever Sore ran upon: not only to be excluded the Host, and to have their habitation alone; but to be exiled the Land, and exterminated Nature it self, which they so unnaturally strive to annihilate: for they call earthly Princes Kingdoms in question, while into question they call the Kingdom of God.

For since the Fathers fell asleep, &c.] Let us now hear their argument; what they can say against him, that hath said that against them, which shall stick by them forever. There is, they pretend, the same state and course of things now, that was at the first: no alteration, no innovation. The thing that hath been, is that which shall be: and there is no new thing under the Sun. Day and Night, Winter and Summer, Seeding and Harvest, have their wonted vicissitude: therefore they have stood from all eternity, and to all eternity they shall stand • they had no beginning, they shall have no end: there is an everlasting perpetuity of all things. If we take their argument in pieces, we find three Limbes of this confused Chaine: first, Certitudinem, a constancy or continuance: secondly, Latitudinem, the largeness of this dreamed abiding, or immutableness; All things: thirdly, Longitudinem, the longevitie or space of duration; From the beginning. First, we will examine the strength, or rather weakness of these circumstances asunder, and then dissolve them all together.

1. For the Continuance: Constancy is indeed the glory of all goodness, the crown of virtues. It is the incommunicable honor and peculiar of God; Ego Iehovah non mutor: in that Father of Lights there is no variableness, nor shadow of turning. Angels and Saints in Heaven have an unchangeable estate; but they are in their own nature mutable, and are only preserved by Him that changeth not. He hath shown to the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel. The not changing of the Heirs depends upon the immutability of their Father; whose Decrees, Promises, Acts, are all immutable. But now, hath God given such a privilege to the world? Whoever found it so constant a friend? Who ever trusted it, and was not deceived by it? But they say, Suppose that an eternal Power made the world; if the cause be eternal, eternal also must be the effect. How senseless is this reason? For if we say, The world had no beginning, because the Maker had none; we may as well say, The house must needs be as ancient as the Carpenter. And to allege, That the world shall have no ending, because God hath none; we may as well say, The Bread shall last as long as the Baker. So senseless is the reason, That because God is everlasting, therefore he made an everlasting world. If they suppose the world without a Maker, as a house without a builder, that foundation less opinion shall anon be refuted.

2. The Latitude, or extent: All things continue statu quo prius. This is manifestly false: for there is a sensible decay, even a visible declination of all things. The alacrity and vigor of the Creature is wonderfully abated; the Earth is dull and barren, in requiting the husbandmans labor; our Springs and Summers are like the children of women after fifty. The world took a fall in his Cradle, as Mephibosheth from his Nurse; and hath pined away ever since. The stature of man is exceedingly lessened, and yet more shortened is his life: we have neither an equal portion of days, nor proportion of bodies with our forefathers. Now that Whole cannot be perpetual, whose parts be alterable: if a hand or leg be taken from a body, it remains not integral, much less immortal.

3. For the Longitude: There be three words that come out of their mouths, and give the Lye to themselves; the Creation, and Beginning, and Sleep of the Fathers. First, they confess a Creation: and well are they convinced so to do. For can there be a world without an Author, or efficient cause? How absurd were these imaginations; that either the world should make it self, as if a house could build it self: or, that something in the world made the world; that is, someone part of it made the whole: as if the finger of a body, and that before it was a finger, did make the whole body. Something therefore more excellent and noble than the world, did make the world, and this could be nothing but God himself. Secondly, they confess a Beginning; why then should they deny an end? Is not that Power able to dissolve the world, that gave it being? Shall it be harder for the Architect to pull down the house, than it was to build it? Could not fire destroy that Temple in a day, that was six and thirty years in setting up? But say others; If there was a beginning, and that in time; what business had God before the beginning? Perfectissima causa non est otiosa. This is a gross conception of God: The Father hath not left me alone, saith our Savior. Shall Christ not be alone, in respect of his divine conjunction with the Father; and shall it not be alike with the Father, in regard of the Son; with the holy Ghost, in respect of both; with each of them, in respect of other? That inseparable unity of the Trinity denieth to every Person a possibility of being alone; and that unsearchable mystery of the fruition of his own glory, is far above the society of creatures, Saints, or Angels. Thirdly, they confess the Sleep of the Fathers; therefore they cannot deny their waking. They say not, They are dead; as if that were a full cessation: but, They sleep; to show their hope of Resurrection. Thus are they convinced with their own words, that would deny (and shall never be able to do it heartily) the mortality of the worlds condition. They see no change: what change would they see? Before the Deluge, stones did not dance, nor trees fly about the air; houses did not stand with their foundations upwards, nor the Sun drop from Heaven: and yet a flood of water drowned the world.

Thus much in particular: now let us generally clear the argument. Natural fancies are like Glass; bright, but brittle? Christian Religion is like Gold; rub it, beat it, melt it; it will endure the Test, the Touch, the Hammer, and still shine more orient.

In the beginning God created Heaven and Earth. This is affirmed by Moses, and denied by Machiavel: the first, the Secretarie of God; the other, a Secretarie to the State of Florence: the one taught God to the world, the other filled the world with the Devil: this not of two hundred years standing, the other of above three thousand. To which of these should we in reason give the most credit? Moses hath ever been famous, Machiavel ever infamous. All ages have revered Moses: Machiavel hath only been affectedly read by a few self-condemned reprobates. Juvenal sung of the honor of Moses: Romanas soliti contemnere leges, Iudaicum ediscunt, ac servant, ac metuunt jus, Tradidit arcano quodcunque volumine Moses. Eight Heathens, two renowned Jews bear witness to him, in their Volumes. From his exemplar, the Pagans patterned out their services to their Idol-gods. His Books have been preserved through so many generations, and brought to us, not by our friends, but by our very enemies; the Jews, that detest us. How can we with equity, with any equality, compare these together? Alas for our times; that there should be any such as Cyprian writes of: Hominibus contra Deum credunt, qui Deo contra homines non credunt. They will not believe God against men, that believe men against God.

We have a cloud of witnesses to second Moses. Thou hast made Heaven, &c. By the word of the Lord were they made, &c. Neh. 9.6. Psal. 33.6. Be it wet or dry, be it passable or be it navigable, be it above or below; this Maker did create it, this Creator doth preserve it, and this Preserver will change it. Look into their Philosophers and Poets, Hesiod, Ovid; how did they borrow their Chaos from the writings of Moses? Si nulla fuit generalis origo Terrarum & Coeli, semper que aeterus fuere; Cur supra bellum Thebanum & funera Troiae, Non alias alii quoque res cecimere Poetae? So Macrobius confesseth, that beyond Ninus he reads of no notable thing written: and therefore concludes, that both the world had a beginning, and was of small antiquity. No less have they spoken of the worlds ending. Ovid says it shall be burned; and that this is the dissolution of it, appointed by destiny; though he fondly applies it to a Phaeton-fire. So Lucan, of the bodies left unrited at the battle of Pharsalia; Hos Caesar populos si nunc non usserit ignis, uret cum terris. Communis mundo superest rogas. An end presupposeth a beginning, a marring implies a making. We cannot deny the known beginning of many things. Polydor Virgil hath written a whole Tract de Inventoribus rerum. To Zeno, Socrates, Aristotle, we are beholding for the use of Logic: we know when they lived. Aristotle was Schoolmaster to Alexander, Plato to Aristotle, Socrates to Plato, some four hundred years before Christ: Zeno was a little beyond them. The Eclipses of the Moon were prodigiously fearful to the Grecians and Romans: the knowledge of them was made familiar since. The year was reduced to the orderly course of the Sun by Julius Caesar. Of what antiquity are kingdoms; when Nimrod mentioned by Moses, and Ninus by the Heathen (both which are thought to be one) is held to be the first King? Josephus observes that the word 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 was never used by Homer: Laws were not known; men only were ruled by the commandment of Princes. Bacchus, say the Ethnics, we know Noah was the man, first found out the use of wine. Ceres was canonized for a goddess, for teaching them the use of corn. As we now have these things in some perfection; so not long since they were rude, and not long before that nothing. Therefore it is false, that all things are the same from the beginning. Yea, if they were not upheld by the Makers providence, they would soon of themselves come to an ending.

The concord of things in discord; the standing fast of the earth under us, the running round of the heaven above us, the due function of the offices of all creatures, like so many Soldiers that make good their places; shows there is a General that governs them. A well-ordered city declares, there is a Prince that rules it; though he go not abroad to be seen. The agreement of the members, that the eyes do not wrangle with the ears, nor the hands mutine against the feet, is a clear demonstration that the body is disposed by a soul within. Animam tuam quis videt? Cùm ergo corpus tuum solum videatur, quare non sepeliris? He should be buried that is dead, he is dead that hath no soul, and he hath no soul (by their reason) if it cannot be seen. We know we have a soul by our motion: and why do we not know, the world hath a soul by his harmony and disposition? Could the heavens move round without a Mover? Will the grind-stone whirl about of it self, without a Turner.

Let me shut up all with this one unanswerable argument, against the Atheistical spirits that plead the continuance of all things from the creation without change. How comes it to pass that Christ is worshipped of all nations; his Church and Religion so universally spread? Is not this a change? Was it so from the beginning? Did those famous Monarchies of the Chaldeans, Persians, Grecians, Romans, acknowledge Christ before he came into the world? He came not until the fullness of time; and before that fullness he was only believed on in Israel; though he was called the Expectation of nations. The Gentiles were ignorant of him; and when he came indeed, both Jews and Gentiles for the time refused him. Now some souls in all people, kingdoms, and languages adhere to him as their only Savior. Is not this a change? What foundation could seem weaker to flesh and blood, than that confidence should be put in a condemned and crucified man? What Doctrine could be more repugnant to corrupt nature, than that he taught? For a man to deny himself, to take up his Cross, to love his enemies, to embrace persecution for godliness? If honor, pleasure, wealth had been promised; these might have allured many followers. But when tribulation, sorrow, martyrdom be the conditions of his service; What but a divine Power could send us after him upon these terms? Nor have blocks and fools, illiterate Turks and Saracens, or gross and stupid Idolaters, been only won to him: but Philosophers and the rarest Scholars, men full of all good knowledge. Even these have put their trust in One that was shamefully crucified; and have died for him, who was before dead, and laid in a grave. Nor did this only hold for a while; but sixteen hundred years; and shall to the consummation of all things. All the subtlety of Machiavell shall never understand this, nor all the powers of the devil shall ever withstand this. Only Divinity tells us in one word. This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvelous in our eyes. Advertisements.

1. Atheism is the main disease of the soul: not only pestilent to the person in whom it is harboured, but to the whole land where it is permitted. This hath ever been seen and acknowledged by the policy of all nations; that a Deity is to be worshipped. The Athenians had an Altar to the unknown God: Ignoto Deo, sed Deo. Cicero thus pleads for the State of Rome: What is it that hath made us so famous? Non numero Hispanos, nec robore Gallos, nec calliditate Poenos, nec artibus Graecos, nec native sensu Italos ipsos & Latinos: What then? Sed pietate & religione omnes gentes superavimus. If these common impressions and notions sealed up in every mind of man; that remnant of integrity surviving the fall, sparkles of fire raked up under the ashes; if nature within, and the creature without; God's visible works, and our invisible consents; the inward motion of the one, and the outward motion of the other: if all these lights be extinguished in the chambers of their hearts, and they do willfully impose on their consciences a burden which they cannot bear, the denial of Deity: let such condemned spirits ripe and be rotten to perdition: let them now be distracted with insufferable horrors: and at last, let them rise from the sides of the pit, malgre their stout contradictions, at the Judgment of the great day to receive a deeper potion of vengeance. Ill shall their scoffs prosper with them: when they think they have won the greatest prize and praise to their wits in putting down God, then God shall arise in Judgment and cast them down to hell. At the day of their death with conviction, and at the last day with confusion, he shall show them his terrible frowns; and teach them both that he is, and what he is. All their virulent and miscreant positions shall perish with them in unquenchable flames; those everlasting arguments of that Justice which they have blasphemed. They have esteemed the Law of God no better than the device of man; and thought it as cheap an offense to contemn the divine Majesty, as human authority; and to deny the rights of the Godhead, (which they vainly imagine, is but imagined) as their fealty and allegiance to earthly Princes. But they that would stultesere in culpâ, shall be forced sapere in paenâ: vengeance shall make them wise, whom sin hath made and left foolish.

2. We do not forbear to waken them from their supine and careless opinions, wherewith they enchant their own souls, and infect others. We write against them, we preach against them, we proclaim threatenings, and threaten punishments, and blow the Trumpets of God's severe indignation more than seven times about the walls of this Jericho; that their ruin and downfall is at hand. We let them know that God ruleth in Jacob, and unto the ends of the earth. Let them put far away the evil day; which is never the farther off, yea so much the nearer them for their adjourning: and because the skies do not fall, nor the last fire flash in their proud faces; believe no coming at all. But it shall come soon enough to their cost; and they shall find with woe, that the Lamb they rejected, shall judge them: the God they denied, shall condemn them; and those malignant spirits whom they never feared, shall torment them, and that forever. They that would not believe a God, shall find a devil. My Lord delaieth his coming: thus cries the worst servant in the house: (yet it is something that he grants, he will come at last.) therefore he falls to beating his fellows, to eat and drink with the drunken. These follow their pleasures, dance, sing, sport, revel; and Where is the promise of his coming at all? Thus let them live in their sins, according to the leading and lusting of their own corrupted hearts: but they shall find a stop in the course of the world; and the plummetts of nature being down, she shall stand like a motionlesse clock: the Sun shall stay his race, and the Moon no more repair her decaying shine: their delights shall end their parts, the stage being taken down, and all these actors turned into hell. Then shall they confess that his coming was promised, and is performed: and the things that continued so long as from the creation, are now quite altered by the dissolution, as if they had never been. But when the bottomless pit hath shut her mouth upon them, this acknowledgement shall be too late; not for God's glory, but for their own ease: the door of mercy being shut against them, despair and torture seising on them; and those blasphemous tongues that contradicted their Maker, not allowed one drop of water to cool them.

3. The punishment of Atheists should be severe and exemplary: as the highest indignity that can be done to God, is to deny his Essence. The poor Leper in Israel was forced to go with his clothes rent, his head bare, his lips covered; and to cry where he past, I am unclean. Till better remedy were sound for so opprobrious and contagious a disease, I would all Atheists had a rent upon their clothes, a writing on their breasts, and a brand on their foreheads; that all beholders might say, An Atheist, an Atheist. Protagoras abderites, because he begun his Book with a do bt; De diis, neque ut sint, neque ut non sint, habet dicere; was banished out of Athens, and his books solemnly burnt to ashes. The same Athenians committed Anaxagoras to prison, and but for Pericles had put him to death, for but writing a book of the Moons Ecclipses, after that they had received her for a goddess. Do we find such jealousy over their feigned gods in very Athenians; and shall the disparagement of the honor of the One true and ever living God be tolerable among Christians? We have read how they have used Paracides in Rome: they sewed them up in a maile of leather, and threw them into the sea: yet so, that neither the water of the sea could soake through, nor other element of nature, Earth, Air, or Fire, approach unto them. Certainly every creature is too good for him that denies the Creator: nor can they be farther separated from heaven, or pitched deeper into hell, than they deserve, that would believe neither. Yea, they do mistrust both, whatsoever they pretend; and Tully spake of Metrodorus an Atheist in his time: Nec quemquam vidi, qui magis ea timeret, quae timenda esse negaret. They that make a flout of hell; Affirmant mihi, & tibi, non sibi: noctu, non interdium: Their mouths tell us so, their hearts do not tell their mouths so. No hell? if they had as many provinces as Ahasuerus had, they would give an hundred and six and twenty of them, to be sure of it.

4. We read of Serpents that will never be charmed, whether with policy or melody. Sure, the consciences of evil men are such Serpents, (and therefore their wounds are called stings of conscience) which can be over-ruled by no arguments or temptations of Satan, to let go the sense of a Godhead. You may sooner get a conscience to believe all the fables in the Popish Legend, or Turkish Alcoran; than that this universal frame is without a Mind. Prima est haec ultio, quod se Iudice nemo nocens absolvitur. It is not a more sweet friend to the innocent, than to the guilty a terrible foe: a man had better have all the world against him, than his own conscience. What ailed Judas? His Master was safe enough in the clutches of his enemies, the Scribes and Pharisees was on his side, the King was not displeased at him, no Law threatened any proceeding against him; his bones were full of marrow, his purse full of money: What should hinder his heart from being full of jollity? Alas, Intra illum, quod contrae illum: his conscience pursues him, from chamber to chamber, from bed to board, from society to solitariness: this Dog still follows him, and never gives him over, till he casts away himself on his own galhouse. Si Arbitrum non vides, teipsum non vides? Testimonium cordis non vereris?

Indeed, custom of sin stupefies conscience: and while a man continues alike in his wickedness, he thinks the world also continues alike in her steadfastness: he dreams of no beginning or end, whether of that or of himself. His conscience sleeps like a tame beast within, and he rages like a wild beast abroad. But at last they will change conditions: he shall be the the tame beast, and his conscience the wild, that will prey upon him forever. Man shall die, but his conscience cannot: it shall appear with him, when he is summoned to appear before the Judge: and he shall cry out as Ahab, Hast thou found me, O thou mine enemy? As the seal makes an impression on the wax, discernible to the eye: so the memory of every sin is engraven, as with the point of a Diamond, on the conscience, not to be blotted out, but by the blood of Jesus Christ. Thy conscience may lose thee, thou canst never lose thy conscience. Obumbrari potest, quia non est Deus: extinguere non potest, quia est a Deo. This still troubles them with the solicitous representations of God's anger: this stops their pillows with knives and Thorns; this puts Colloquintide into all their banquets; this like a scolding wife fetcheth her husband from Taverns: this so disquieteth their godless hearts, that they know not whither their body be more weary of their soul, or their soul of their body. These might dwell peaceably together, while both did reverence their Maker. But when that Jezebel, Atheism, for the safer maintenance of her whoredoms and witchcrafts, hath renounced this belief and service; Conscience comes like Jehu, driving furiously, with What peace? Nulla pax impiis. Then runs the Epicure to his pleasures, carousing cups of Bacchus, sporting with the waiting women of Venus; Pan and Apollo must cheare him with their ministralsies: and what's all this? He was none of the wisest, that being wearied, and lying down to rest by the way; when his head was somewhat too low, took the pitcher that lay by him, and put it under instead of a pillow: but feeling it too hard, he beat himself, and stopped it with feathers; thinking then it would be wondrous easy. So vain and comfortless are all worldly joys, when they are used to mitigate the pangs of conscience: so miserable is the estate of these reprobates: they are not quiet while they live, and they shall never be quiet when they are dead. But for us that know and profess the One and only God forever to be blessed; let us fear him (without fear) as his adopted sons, and obey him (without hypocrisy) as his faithful servants. So at the great day of his coming to judge the ends of the earth, we shall receive a happy reward, even the inheritance of his own Son JESUS CHRIST.

For this they are willingly ignorant of; that by the Word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water, and in the water.

Divers ways did the Philosophers attain to the knowledge of God. Socrates, by the contemplation of his Providence; that he had given man the light to guide him, the night for his rest, the fire to warm him, the fruits to nourish him. And when Euthydemus objected, that these were common to the beasts: Socrates replied, that man had understanding, memory, speech, knowledge, to make use of all these, yea and of the beasts themselves. Aristotle gathers it, Ex haereditaria fama omnium mortalium. Galen from the excellency of the worlds fabric, did collect the power, wisdom, and goodness of the Maker. That he could so form and beautify all things, is a proof of his wisdom: that he brings to pass all his intendments, is the argument of his power: that he suffers us to enjoy these creatures, is the demonstration of his goodness. The Platonists observed it by way of comparison, and degrees of ascension: for they held spiritual things to be better than corporal: then they preferred things that had life before those that had none: and of things that had life, them that had sense and motion: and of these, the most perfect were endued with reason: and of rational things, they preferred intellectual spirits, as Angels: and among these, there was one most perfect, who is Totus actus, only in act, void of all passive quality, which is God. For other spirits do partly consist in act, and partly in possibility that they may not be: but it is impossible that God should not be. First, they were persuaded, that God was not a Body: then consequently they held him to be a Spirit: and yet they sought him not among the mutable spirits: therefore he must be an immutable and infinite Essence.

Indeed they came short of saving knowledge. Plato acknowledgeth one God Creator of all things, yet he alloweth sacrifice to Idols. Socrates would swear by a Goat, in contempt of those Idols: yet in the end, he caused a Cock to be sacrificed to Aesculapius. Hermes Trismagistus, who was called the Egyptian Moses, and delivered many truths, yet spake absurdly and impiously, that Simulacras•nt velut corpora deorum: as Saint Augustine reports him, Seneca inveighed against their Idols, whom they worshipped in the form of beasts and fishes: Numina vocant, quae haberentur monstra: if they had life to meet us, they would scare us: yet after all this, he resolved on their worship; in his book of Superstition, which is perished. So Augustus saith of him, Colebat quod reprehendebat, agebat quod arguebat: he did fall to worship those gods which he had contemned.

But God hath made that plain to us, which they with much labor could not find; insomuch that the children of Christians know more than the Philosophers of Pagans; and in the very principles of their Catechism, and Articles of their Creed, are taught to believe in one God, the Maker of heaven and earth: For by the word of God the heavens were of old, &c. We have heard the blasphemous assertion of these Atheists; the Apostles confutation of them follows: and this is the force of his argument. The world had a beginning, therefore it shall have an ending: a Genesis begun it, an Exodus shall determine it: by the word of God it was created, by the same word it shall be dissolved. It is an easier thing to pull down, than to build up: he that could do the one, must needs be able for the other. Yea, that his power and ability to do it might be manifest, he hath once already destroyed it by a deluge. Why should it be harder for him to melt it by fire, than it was to drown it with water?

The former proposition is set down in this Verse: which appears to me like unto a School; wherein we have Saint Peter the Divine Schoolmaster: and he doth two things. First, he puts away, and sets aside certain errant Dunces, that will never learn so much as the first Rudiments; They are willfully ignorant. Secondly, he repeats an old Lesson, as familiar to Christians, as the A. B. C. is to Scholers. The Lesson is the Creation, the building of this great House, the World: wherein we have, first, the main material parts of the House, Heaven, Earth, and Sea: secondly, the disposition of these parts; Heaven first, then Earth and Sea: and the near conjunction of these two latter; the Earth embraced by the water, standing in the water, and appearing out of the water: thirdly, and lastly, the Instrument, by which all these were made, and made thus, By the word of God.

This they are willingly ignorant of.] He begins with the Dunces, those stubborn and unruly Blockheads; inscious, nescious, conscious, willful Ignorants. It is one thing, velle scire quod oportuit latere; another, velle latere quod oportuit scire. The former, is a saucy ambition of forbidden knowledge; the other, a headstrong preclusion of commanded knowledge. The School doth thus distinguish of ignorance; Iuris, vel facti. Ignorantia juris is twofold; vincible, or invincible. This latter is when a man does all he can to know, and yet remains ignorant of many requisite things. The want of this knowledge, through the mercy of God, shall not cast a man away, because he did not cast away knowledge. Vincible is twofold. First, Non affectata, but withal Non profligata: when a man hath not a resolute will to be ignorant, but yet he does not fight against ignorance, nor exercise a sufficient endeavor to know: and this is sinful. Secondly, Affectata, quae Ius scire spernit, utliberius peccet. Affected ignorance is that, which refuseth to be instructed in good, that it might more untrollably prosecute evil. Ignorance of Fact is also double. First, when men could know, and cannot. Secondly, when they can know, and will not. There is an Ignorance of pure negation, and an Ignorance of evil disposition: mera, and crassa or supina. The former of these is properly a nescience of things we are not bound to know: the other a privative Ignorance of things we ought to know. There is a simple Ignorance, and a sinful Ignorance. A conceited Ignorance, which thinks it knows what it knows not: and a contracted Ignorance, which desires to unlearne the good it knows. As there be three degrees of knowledge▪ First, of nature, whereby man excels the beast. Secondly, of understanding, whereby the learned excel the unlearned, the wise the foolish. Thirdly, of grace, whereby the Christian excels the subtlest Philosophers, or Politicians. So there be three degrees of Ignorance. First, natural, which is the effect of original sin. Secondly, adventitiall, which is accompanied with actual sin. Thirdly, habitual, which is the depth of all sin. So the Beast, Naturian, and Christian, are three degrees of comparison. But to let go other distinctions, we have this in the Text. First, Iuvita cacitas, an ignorance against the will. Secondly, and Spontanea caecitas, a contracted, contented Ignorance. That, Quae est causa culpa: this, Cujus causa est culpa. The one is the cause of sin, of the other sin is the cause. Simple Ignorance may, excusare a tanto, mere nescience a tu•, but willful blindness, nec a toto, nec a tanto; but is damnable.

1. No Ignorance can excuse, but that only, quae non habet unde disceret. The Heathen had but the book of nature to read God in, yet the Apostle says plainly, They are without excuse. To him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin. Indeed nature is not sufficient of it self, without grace: it is like blind Samson without his guide; without whose direction he could not find the pillars of the house, the principles of faith. Or, as Baruch without Deborah: except the Prophetess went along with him, he would not venture upon Sisera. Vae soli; woe be to nature if she goes alone: for she will fall at every step, and who shall help her up? Lactantius dilivers Socrates his own report of himself, for all the worlds opinion of his wisdom; Se nihil scire, nisi unum, quod nihil sciret. So that renowned Orator Cicero: Vtinam tam facile vera possum invenire quàm falsa convincere: I would I could as easily light on the truth, as I can refute falsehood. What a catalogue of privileges accrued to Paul? First, his seal of the Covenant, Circumcised: and that not like a Proselyte, in his age; but the eighth day. Secondly, his kindred and descent: not from Esau, that lost the Inheritance; but from Israel. Thirdly, his Tribe; such as never fell to Idolatry, but continued in the service of God; of the Tribe of Benjamin. Fourthly, his antiquity in that Line; not inferior to the ancientest, but able to derive his pedigree from the first root of the Hebrews; an Hebrew of the Hebrews. Fifthly, besides those personal advantages; of Profession, a Pharisee; of emulation, zealous; of conversation, blameless. Yet till a clearer light shined on his face, on his heart; and he was at once dismounted from his horse, and his confidence in the flesh; he was far from the true knowledge: for which knowledge, he now counted all things loss and dung.

Of Joseph, it was the testimony of a King; The Spirit of God is in him. Of Daniel, it was the testimony of a Queen; The Spirit and wisdom of the gods is found in him. Concerning all natural knowledge, this is the triumph of the Christian: God hath made foolish the wisdom of this world. This was the thankful acknowledgement of Christ himself; Father, thou hast hid these things from the wise, and revealed them to babes. Wise, and yet foolish, men of understanding, that understand nothing. There are many and mighty Nations at this day, their Soil happy, their Air sweetly disposed, most provident to fore-cast, most ingenious to invent, most able and active to perform; that have not received the God of Christians: whom till they do receive, they remain ignorant wretches. The Empire of Turkey, that Hammer of the world, and Rod of Christendom; able to say as the Psalmist speaks: Gilead is mine, Manasseh (◊) mine; Moab is my washp•, over Edom will I cast out my shoe: Asia is mine, Africa is mine, over Europe have I cast my shoe: a warlike, political, magnificent Nation: yet they rather credit the Inchantments of a Sorcerer, than the glorious Gospel of our Savior, who shed his blood for the worlds redemption. They are cut from the same Rock, tempered of the same mould, have their heads upwards toward Heaven; reasonable, capable, judicious souls, as well as we: what want they then? The sweet and saving knowledge of the crucified Jesus, that happy Star in the East, that should lead them to God: This, Herod and his Princes, the Turk and his Bassawes, never saw. But, blessed are our eyes, for they see; and our ears, for they hear: I will not say, what Prophets and righteous men, but what Empires and Kingdoms, not small Cantons and corners, but whole quarters of the world never attained unto; and shall one day wish to redeem with both their eyes, the sight of our inestimable riches.

2. Ignorance is the foundation of evil: nor would men so desperately venture upon sin, if they truly saw and knew the dismal consequence. It is some imaginary or apparent good the transgressor seeks: punishment is a thing which against his will he finds; or, by which he is found, and overtaken. For, good is the object of all desire; evil, is the object of fear. But because men know not the wages of evil, therefore they do it: and because they would securely do it, therefore they refuse to know it. Ignorance is unbecomming any man, intolerable in a Clergy-man. We shall seldom find, that crafty Politicians will either be confuted, or converted by Dolts. Knowledge comes not at a jumpe: he that will ascend, must from the low valleys creep up higher and higher; and by the stairs of Philosophy, climb up into the mountain of Theology. God does not now miraculously inspire fishermen: as it is true, without his blessing, no means is prevalent; so without means, no blessing is warranted. The early blossoms are often frost-bitten, and die abortive and fruitless. The Poet could censure it for old men's dotage, that would have their young men Ilico à pueris fieri senes. When the Devil would have Christ, of Stones to make Bread; he would in no wise consent: and will he consent now, of Blocks and Stones to make distributers of Bread, of the Bread of Life? A wise and good father will not give his children Stones, instead of Bread: what shall we say of those spiritual fathers, brainless heretics, that will give to men's souls Bread made of Stones? If a man have enough to do, to get his own Bread with the sweat of his brows: what pains will it cost him, to provide Bread for himself and his whole family; a great Congregation? In the Ark were the Tables of the Law, Aaron's Rod, and the Pot of Manna: the endowments of a good Minister are, Instruction in his mouth, correction in his hand, and in his heart compassion.

The Levite had no temporal maintenance of his own, but what he had from the people: the people had no spiritual maintenance of their own, but what they received by the Priest and Levite. If their lips do not preserve knowledge, it were better to damme up their Ovens of utterance. Nor should their knowledge only be limited to the Scriptures; but fetch in all those helps that may serve for illustration of the Scriptures: as Christ himself drew comparisons from natural things; and taught men from Vines and Fig-trees, from Sp•rrowes and Lilies. Religion through us may receive infamy, and the Gospel discredit; whiles we make a scruple of sweetening our tunes, to catch souls. Men are men; and with those things must be moved, where with men are wont to be moved. The hooks must be pleasantly baited, that they bite at. They that hang forth naked hooks, without a bait, may entangle them in the weeds, enwrap themselves in contentions; but catch no fish, win never a soul. You will say, Paul desired to know nothing but Christ; and the Scripture can make us wise enough, to salvation. This is true; but then it must be wisely applied: all Arts are used to this purpose: and the scope and center whither we reduce them, is but this; Christ is all in all. No Orator was ever more pleasingly persuasive, than humble Saint Augustine; none more learned: yet he taught nothing but Christ. Why should not we listen to Saint Augustine, as well as Augustine himself did to Saint Ambrose? Why, not reverence Cyprian, as he did Tertullian; of whom he said every day, Cedo mihi Magistrum, he must teach me a Lesson? How shall we shake off ignorance, but by Learning? How can we learn, without reading? Books have their necessary use: He was a famous Prince, that stuck not to call himself in this sense, Necromancer; because he did ask counsel of the dead; meaning Books. Shall we appeal from the living to the dead? From ourselves, as living children, to Saint Augustine, Jerome, and those dead Fathers? Yea, let me say, from the dead to the living: from choleric emulation, and contention of wit, the dead works of the living; to Divine Books, the living Labors of the dead: from the present fancies of unmortified men, to the Libraries of those holy Writers, whose passions are buried with their bodies?

God delighteth to be magnified in all his creatures, especially in the excellentest of his creatures: Arts are among those excellencies; not one of them, but descended from his Throne. Our Apostle speaks here of the Heavens, Earth, Waters: and the Prophet chargeth us to praise God in all these; and that materially, metaphysically. Into the majesty of Sun and Moon we see; the bright Stars, their motion and influence we know; the Heaven of Heavens, and Waters above the Heavens, in part, though not at large, we comprehend: in all these, let us praise their Maker. Let not the knowledge of Scripture become men's Champion, to scold against all other knowledge: for such cannot escape Saint Peters censure, of being willfully ignorant. If we refuse to know anything but Scripture, we shall not know the Scripture it self as we ought. It is indeed the chief power of God to salvation; and cursed is all Learning, that does not tend to, and attend upon that. But Generals in a pitched field will not thrust forth their chief power first: by little and little they will train their enemy out of order with light assaults. Stars have their stations, and motions, and honors allotted them in the firmament, though they come short of the Sun and Moon. Humane Writers may reprove vices, and condemn these Atheists, though their main Sentence be given by the Word of God. It is an easy matter to praise God in that, wherein he hath placed the especial State-house of his praises. He that out of the barest and barrenest parts of his Lord's dominion, shall accumulate and levie to his Treasury a great Tribute, though short of that he hath out of his richest Provinces; shall he not do him remouerable service? They are malevolent spirits, that exclude any Art or Author, Roman or Athenian, any creeping Worm, or contemptible creature, from bearing witness to God. It is fit, other men should know many things; but a Preacher should be ignorant of nothing, that may be useful to the glory of his Maker. How should these Atheists be converted from their willful ignorance, by Teachers that are willfully ignorant? Let Light come into the house at the doors and windows: but God forbid, that the Tapers of the Sanctuary, and the Lamps, should burn dim. If they did, sure these days of ours would afford many Snuffers. We are montes moventes; our site and motion is in conspectu omnium: there is no passenger but observes the mountain. Legit ut Clericus, is not enough to make a Priest; more goes to it than so. I never wonder to see men dissolute, where their Teacher is ignorant; no more, than that men should stumble in the dark: where Prophecy fails, the people perisheth.

3. Atheism, profaneness, and all impiety issues from the root of secure and contented Ignorance. They that are willfully blind, are desperately wicked: Malus and Stultus, are but two several attributes of one and the same man. First, there is no knowledge of God in the Land; thereupon follows a privation of goodness; (no truth, no mercy), and upon that, a position of all ungodliness, until blood toucheth blood. Lewdnesse follows blindness: when the eyes of the Jews were darkened, all mischiefs throng in upon them: Therefore we call a cruel man, a Jew. When sinners have given up themselves to darkness, God gives them up to the Prince of darkness; and he works upon their corrupt nature, to precipitate them into all wickedness: as if they setting themselves on the top of a hill, and purposing to run down, he stood at their back, to thrust them headlong. They may have some skill in the contriving of facinorous acts; as Bats and Owls see best in the night. Deale with them about the world, they have shrewd and subtle wits: but speak of Religion, and they count it a strange language: as Moales within the ground are quick, and dignity apace; but above ground can make little shift for themselves. It is just with God, that they who might understand, and would not; should be upon the point of perishing, and understand it not.

He that hath the Talent of illumination, and buries it in the dark earth of ignorance, is worthy to lose it: If he have the understanding of a man, and yet will be as ignorant as a beast, God will make a beast of him; as he did of a great Monarch, Nebuchadnezzar. Reprove a swearer, and he will swear the more, to spite you: which were not possible, if he was not willfully ignorant, and did not (what in him lies) give himself over to the Devil. Christ wept over Jerusalem: what was the cause? If thou hadst known: they were willfully blind. This cost him a deep groan: and he that never cried Oh, for all his own bitter passions, vents it with a sigh, for their blindness. Even good things become snares to such; as a blind Money-monger may stumble at his own Bags. Wisdom is good with an Inheritance: but an Inheritance without wisdom, is a Ginne, and temptation to lewdness. We pity and relieve him that is borne blind, or loseth his sight by misfortune: but he deserves no pity, that pluckes out his own eyes, to move compassion to his beggary. Doubtless, that God who is so rich in mercy, hath compassion in store for those blind hearts, that would know, and cannot: But what hope is left for the willfully ignorant, that may know, and will not? Therefore I cannot but conceive, that the Papists in Rome shall find a more favorable Doome than the Recusants in England: those would know the truth, if they might be suffered; these will not know it, though they be invited: Therefore we call these, not the other, Recusants; that is, willful ignorants.

4. No less Judgment belongs to them that reject knowledge, than to them that deny obedience. He that will not cast an eye upon the Kings published Proclamation, is never the less subject to the penalty for his transgression. So far is he from cloaking his errors with ignorance, that he binds two sins together, and receives a double vengeance. Greater means require greater knowledge; greater knowledge, greater obedience; or, it will procure greater punishments. The eye is excused, for not seeing; the care, for not hearing what they ought: but if the will forbids them to do these functions, and turns them off from such necessary objects; no pretence shall excuse the will. All those dire plagues that fell upon the head of Jerusalem; the demolishing of her glorious Temple, the rasing of her foundations, the dashing of her infants against the stones, her channels streaming with blood, the ravishing of her Virgins, the slaughter of so many hundred thousands; they may all thank this one clause of a sentence, for giving them birth and breath, At noluiſti. Neither destruction nor damnation had befallen her, but for this, At noluiſti. Christ offered her peace and forgiveness, if ſhe would know him; At noluit. He proffer'd to eaſe all her burden, if ſhe would caſt it on him; At noluit. She needed but aſk and have; but knock, and it ſhould be opened; At noluit. A world of evil, the evil of the world; yea, the evil of the world to come, ſhe had eſcaped: the bleſſings of Heaven, a Heaven of bleſſings ſhe had obtained; all but for this willful ignorance; At noluiſti, But thou wouldeſt not.

Let us all be warned by her ruins: if England eſteem knowledge cheap and baſe, which Solomon preferred to Gold and Jewels; and reſuſe to know the good, that ſhe may ſecurely do the evil; ſhe ſhall ſoon match Jeruſalem in accuſedneſs. She ſhall ſee nothing but frowning Wrath in the Clouds, but Lightning and Thunder in the mouth of the four Winds; the Heaven (inſtead of Stars) ſhall be made an Artillery-houſe of Haileſtones; no Planet ſhall revolve anything, but vaſtation; Earthquakes ſhall diſſolve her joints, and all her Buildings ſhall but quaſh the owner with their falls, affording them unasked Tombes and Sepulchers; the Dampes of the Earth ſhall breed nothing but Plagues, the Clouds ſhall drop down leaſſneſs on her Fields, the Sea ſhall break in upon her with inundations; ſhe ſhall be privileged from no Judgments, when ſhe once willfully rejects knowledge. How juſt is it with God, to remove their Candleſtick, that have put out their own Candle! To remove the Ark from them, that remove themſelves from the Ark! But the Lord evermore forbid, that our barrenneſs of knowledge, in this abundance of means, ſhould beget an Ichabod; whoſe name may be a Trumpet to the world of our ſhame; The Goſpel is gone from England, The glory is departed from Iſrael.

5. Yet in this plenty of means, I ſhould take it for granted, that we have plenty of knowledge. But not to hold you in admiration of your own happineſs at the gaze, and to leave your underſtandings without reflection of themſelves upon themſelves; know this for a certain: Omnis excuſatio tollitur, ubi praeceptum non ignoratur. Even ſins of ignorance ſtand in need of mercy: but what Cloake is long enough, to cover ſins againſt knowledge? It is no marvel to ſee the Wilderness lie waſte and deſert: but if a ground well huſbanded and manured yield not profit, it deſerveth curſing. After ye have known God, how turn ye again to beggarly elements? Yea, worſe than beggarly elements, even vagrant enormities, to the incurring of a ſorer bondage. If ye have learned Chriſt, put off the old converſation; with this new Leſſon, take out a new life. The end, is the perfection of other things: but the end of a relapſed Chriſtian, is worſe than his beginning. Many ſhall ſay, Lord, Lord: Many, for it is the caſe of a multitude: We have done wonderful works in thy Name, we have known thee: but all their knowledge of Chriſt, ſhall not gain his knowledge of them: Scimus te, but Nescio vos. Adam had excellent knowledge, yet he muſt dreſs the Garden: the Angels have more excellent knowledge, yet they are ministering spirits. Though we know much, yet sloth may emasculate our strength; and idleness (that can make nothing else) can make us effeminate souls. Though we live in David's house, if we are known to be but wanton Concubines; vice and disorder, like long-hair'd Absalom, will not stick to break in upon us. God does not give us knowledge, as a man gives a Book to a Library, there to be chained: where sometimes more skill is required, to extract and pick Learning out of it, than the Book hath Learning in it. Aliquid intersit, inter t & librum▪ Knowledge must have vent: Ministers vent their knowledge, by the exercise of their Ministry; Christians vent their knowledge, by the exercise of their Charity.

6. Knowledge is like meat, Memory the stomach, sins are malignant humors, the natural hear is charity. If we perceive, where knowledge abounds humors to superabound, we judge quickly; It is for want of charity to digest it. Some desire knowledge for their private satisfaction; <...> sci•• others for ostentation▪ Scire ut sciantur, to be known famous by <◇> But we may say of them both, as Tully did of the Philosophers; Cum Philosophorum dogma•• miserabiliter▪ p•gnat vita. Even the devils know God: let curious heads, dispute whether Satan knew Christ to be God: in this we may believe himself, though in nothing else: he knew what he believed, he believed what he confessed; Jesus the▪ Son of the most High God. Where be those infidels, that either hold doubtfully, or ignorantly mis-know, or blasphemously deny, what the very devils have professed? yet were even they never the better for it: so little can aba•• speculation avail us in these cases of Divinity. Thus far hath that devil attained; to no ease, to no comfort. Knowledge alone doth but puff up, it is our love that edifies. If there be not a persuasion of our sure interest in this Jesus, a power to apply his merits and obedience, we are no whit the safer▪ no io• the better; only we are so much the wiser, to understand who shall condemn us. Scientia ad scic•dum, is as Nummus ad numerandum: Knowledge in a man of great wit, as money to a man of great wealth, may make him proud, but do him no good, without charitable humility. The swelling side, which we call the contexitie of anybody, receives nothing but blows: the receptacle of good things is the concavitie. Pride is the convexitie, and God resisteth the proud: Humility is the concavity, and he giveth grace to the humble.

7. If knowing made up happiness, England were an happy nation, these times as happy as ever any: but if Doing be required, great is the infelicitie of both. There is a dropsy of knowledge, but a consumption of the vital parts of a Christian: holiness and obedience. We need not Christ to work miracles upon our heads, by casting out deaf and dumb spirits: but upon our dead hearts, dried arms, and withered hands, so stupefied to the actions of zeal and charity. Christ is said to know no sin, because he did no sin: in that sense, and in effect they know no good, that do no good: and no man rightly knows more than he practiseth. So many as profess themselves to know, and not address themselves to do, shall be censured for willful ignorants. A Carpenter is known by erecting frames, a Smith by making Iron instruments, and a Christian by good works: what is it to be cunning in problemes, and paradoxes, in niceties and criticisemes? I may say, as Cato did of superfluous uses trifies▪ They are dear of a farthing, that are good for nothing.

Illumination is easy, sanctification is the laborious work: to cross our affections, to subjugate our wills, and to mortify our darling lusts; hic labor, hoc opus est. But hoc homines sponte latet; We do not sin because we know not but because we will not know. May we not use the Apostles ordinary increpation and exprobatation? know ye not, that such things are wicked? Know ye not, that for these things comes the anger of God? Is any so simple, that he knows not the ten Commandments, and sum of the Gospel? It were less unhappy for sinners if they had that plea; we knew not this. No, their eyes are open, and with open eyes they run into the gulf of destruction. The wickedness of our times proceeds not from weak, but from willful ignorance. Let us not be so ignorant, as to think that nothing shall condemn us but ignorance: as if God would come in flaming fire, only to render vengeance, upon poor Pagans, Savages, and Indians; and not meddle with clear-eyed, though foul hearted Christians. They write, that the inhabitants under the torrid Zone are more troubled with damp than those under the frigid. It were miserable, if the bright Sonne of knowledge among us, through our inward coldness, should be answered with the damps and suffocations of all piety and justice. Let us labor for knowledge, that we may see the way of goodness: let us walk in the way of goodness, that we never repent of our knowledge: both together shall be crowned with blessedness.

By the word of God the heavens were of old, &c.] We are rid of the dunses, and now come to consider the Lesson which they easily might and would not learn. It is the creation of so noble and wonderful a Machine the World whereof the beauteous face is Heaven: the two eyes, the Sun and Moon: the burning lamps are the Stars: the Fire, a nurse or active cherisher of things the air a glass, representing the beauty: the Sea, a great fish-pond: the Plains and champion Fields, the floores, the Hills and Mountain the pillars: Gnats and Elephants, insects and monsters, the curiosities. Whereof Augustine thus: Si quarimus, quisfecerit, Deus est; Si, per quod, Ducit, Fiat, & factasum: Si, quare; quia bonus est. Nec enim est ⟨⟩ her excelleior Deo ⟨⟩ ar efficacior verbo. In the beginning God created heaven and earth. The beginning of the world is from him that is the Beginning of all things: whereunto the Name of the Author is first set as a seal; God: and under the names of the two extremities and borders, all the rest is comprised. He did give both matter and form he is not only the deviser of shapes and features, but the Maker of Nature it self. I fear the Lord the God of heaven, saith Ion to his heathen *Marr*s is, who hath made the sea and the dry land. First, A God in Essence and being, your gods are but in supposition. Secondly, the God of heaven, yours are not God's of the poorest hamlets in the earth. Thirdly, which hath made the sea and the dry land, as a little monument of his infinite art and power: yours are not able to make the garments of their own backs. They that worship an embroidered puppet, me thinks should rather worship the embroiderer that made it.

This is the Apostles argument against these Infidels: He that made the heavens, can he not fold them up again like a book, and role them together like a skin of parchment? He that hath made the sea, and causeth it to boil like a pot of ointment, cannot he dry it up again from the channel? He that made the dry land, cannot he overflow it with a deluge, or rock it to and fro upon the foundations, till it reel like drundarks; or burn it with flames? Yes, he can cloth the Sun and Moon with sackcloth; put out the nocturnall candles, the stars; fill the Ocean with Mountains, and make nature besides her self, like an Image of madness. Our Apostle here keeps the order of nature, placing first the heavens, then earth and sea; as the principal parts, whereof the whole consisteth. For heaven is in nature and position above the sea, the sea above the earth: Heaven as the roof of that beautiful house wherein man was placed: earth and water as the two floores and foundations to it. The chief materials are Heaven first; that is the head or roof of this goodly fabric: *Omnipotens d, a work befitting his hand who is Omnipotens Dominus. Praise the Lord ye heavens of heavens; for he commanded, and ye were created. The Prophet adds to the mention of heavens; the word created; which he does not to the other creatures in that Psalm. And that first, to convince that impious dotage of these Atheists, dreaming of an eternity of the heavens; not so, they were created. Secondly, to confound the superstitious worship which Idolaters give unto them: no creature is to be worshipped, but they are creatures. The Poets feigned *C to be the ancientest of the gods; and that he begot Saturn, who disabled him of the means of generation, that he might have no rivall. They tell us that this Saturn had many children, but he devoured them as soon as they were borne: only Jupiter escaped, who deposed his own father, thrust him into Hell, and usurped his Kingdom: and with the same faulchion dismembered his father Saturn, wherewith he had dismembered his father Coelum: which being cast into the Sea, out sprung Venus. The moral of which monstrous fable might be this: that corrupt Nature brought forth such rebels under Heaven, that made war against Heaven, and ambitiously attempted a Building, to emulate the Firmament. Upon which, followed confusion, Treason, Vsurpation, and Parricide: the son betrayed the father, who was again betrayed by his son: Luxury and Ryot, filled the Earth; and waterish Lusts did spring out, instead of heavenly desires. But we know that Coelum is no god, but the work of God; the precious Vault, that walls in this our inferior world.

Our Apostle speaks of Heavens, plurally: We know there be three Heavens, one above another: the lowest, above us; and the highest, below our Head, Christ.

1. The first and next us, is the Airie Heaven; wherein the wanton Fowls disport themselves, over-looking with scorn the highest Turrets: the Larkes singing Carols to the praise of their Maker; as rejoicing, that they can mount nearer to that Heaven for the time, than the men for whom it was provided. There hang the big-bellied Clouds, longing to be delivered of their fruitful burdens: from whose vast wombs sometimes break forth fires, and dreadful Thunders; thin vapors, like some Steele-glasses, wherein the Sun looks, and shows his face in the variety of those colors he hath not. Sometimes they fill the Lappe of the Earth with white hardened Purles, rattling among her Leaves, and like Pearls embroidering her Garment: and when they are sent by the angry hand of their Maker, they can destroy her Fruits and Flocks; yea, even kill Egyptian enemies. Other times they turn her Superficies into a Crust, and bake it with congealing Cold; as if the Earth were sick of a Flux, and the Frost came like costive Physic to bind her. The waters are hid as with a stone, and the face of the Deepe is frozen. Otherwhiles they send down Snow, like Wooll, to keep warm her young Fruits in their Cradles. This arrays the Earth in a Robe of Innocence, as if she would both emulate and imitate Heaven it self, and be clothed in white: or, rather doth emblemize an hypocrite, that hides all his Winter-dirt, his foul floughes and dunghills, with an upper face of purity. There are bred those portentfull Comets and exhalations, elicente Sole, emittente Terra, excipiente Aëre; out of which, fantastical heads pick fanatical meanings: but indeed they are Characters of such Language, as no Nation of the Earth understands; neither Parthians, nor Medes, nor Elamites, nor Cretes, nor Arabians: only we know they speak Mirabilia Dei, the wonderful works of God. There range the subtle Winds, driving the Clouds as a shepherd doth his flocks, passing away like strangers: we know not whence they come, nor whither they go. This is that Heaven, which is the Lungs of the world: in which, we breathe; and without which, we could not breathe: it is (as it were) vacuus in it self, yet suffers vacuity in nothing else.

2 The next is the starry Heaven, stuck full of sublime and conspicuous lights. Whereof some be Planets, called wandering; not because they keep not their right ways, but because a course is assigned them different from that of the firmamentall stars. They have their Epicycles or little Orbes, and are carried irregularly by a wrapped motion, yet so as still they hold on their proper race: as a fly on the Axletree of a Chariot-wheel may creep on her own way yet be whirled about the contrary according to that violent motion. There be those twinkling Luminaries, as it were Virgins with Torches, waiting on their Mistress the Queen of the night. These have their secret virtues, and wonderful influences: the guides of Mariners on the Seas, that teach them to Steere their courses: the Shepherds kalender, the Astronomers wonder, but the confusion of judicial Astrologers; for God made them to distinguish times, not to calculate nativities, or tell future events. The heaven it self is unitas corporum; and therefore as one army dependeth upon one General, one State upon one Prince, all numbers upon unity, so all Sarres communicate in one virtue. As God is the Principium of all things in the world, yet no part of them: so the heavens communicate with all particular effects, not by giving forms, but by extent of virtue.

There is the Sun, that glorious eye of the world; that sees all, and gives us light to see withal. That treasury of light, into which body the former dispersed illumination was united. That unwearied Giant, which every day runs his course, and takes no time to sleep: a watchman to prevent mischiefs, a discoverer of the black deeds of darkness, an enemy to thieves and murderers, the friend of innocence, the expected comforter of sorrows, that brings joy in the morning: the Bridegroom, the husband of the earth, which provides heat and sustenance for her self and all the children that hang on her breasts. There is the Moon, a weaker light for a less necessary use. God made the night for rest, darkness is the cradle of sleep: yet because some occasions are driven to trespass upon that time of quiet, and to borrow of the night; God hath allowed that also a goodly torch to guide it. The Mistrisse of the Sea, the ruler of those relapses and reflexes, ebbs and tydes: a secret worker upon bodily humors; whose virtue is not greater in her light, than in her influence. This is the Syderiall heaven, a spacious and magnifique canopy, where stars are set like precious stones, almost everyone of them larger than the whole earth. If we were in that heaven with these eyes, the whole earth were equally enlightened, would seem as little to us there, as now a small Star in the firmament appears to us here.

3 The uppermost heaven excels all; and is no less glorious above the visible, than the visible is above the earth. If this be so admirable which we see that are sinners, what is that which they possess that are Saints, and Angels? If mortal eyes be so ravished with the vision of this, how are they blessed with the fruition of that? Even that Heaven was created: He that made all the Heavens, could not have one coeternal with himself. It is a gross question, and beseeming these Scoffers, to ask where He dwelt before. What Heaven can contain him that is Infinite? All things dwell in him, even the heaven of heavens: the Maker is not comprehended in the house, but the house in the Maker. He fills all things, nothing can fill him. Though he be said to dwell in heaven, yet he made not that house only for himself: but in a far more excellent measure he there reveals his glory: that is, his Throne, as the earth is his footstool. The power of an earthly King extends through all his dominions: yet there his Majesty appears more glorious where he keeps his State and Court. His common subjects do not partake this in the same measure with his ordinary servants. If the gallery of this world be so beautified, with a steady foundation, a moveable roof, a canopy so bespangled with stars, more precious than sparkling Diamonds; the walls furnished with curious hangings, wherein be such numberless numbers of (not painted, but) living creatures, which delight us (we know not whether more) with their forms and varieties: how inconceivably delectable is the Bed-chamber, the Heaven prepared for eternal rest?

If we should go round about this inferior Zion; tell her towers, and mark well her bulwarks; yet we find in every place that antique Mower riding circuit with his impartial sithe, that old Saturn the devourer of his own children; for Time produced them, and time cuts them off. We find Sin leading the dismal dance, and Death marching after with his blood-reeking sword: we find the stench of iniquity to have corrupted the air, cursed the earth, subjected the elements and heavens to a fiery mutation: we find troubles, and alterations, and dreadful conflicts; combustion in the elementary heavens, earthquakes rumbling in the bowels of the Center, the rorings and inundations of water, as it were tottering the foundations and pillars of the world: all symptoms of death, and prognostics of his dissolution. But to this third and supreme Heaven sin never reached, time was never admitted, death could never ascend: millions ascend thither by death, death it self hath nothing to do there. Sin is swallowed up in mercy, death in victory, time in eternity. There can be no sorrow, where is Fullness of joy: no room for troubles, where is the fullness of peace: no fear, where the walls are impregnable, no thief can break through and steal. Sin hath made a woeful end of man, death shall make an end of sin, time shall make an end of death, eternity shall make an end of time, but there can be no end of eternity: that is the privilege of heaven. As this Heaven is the highest of God's works in place, so it seems to have been the first in time: sure it was made before hell. For the Judge calling his Saints to heaven, calls it a Kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world. But sending away his enemies to hell, he calls it a place prepared for the devil and his Angels: as if it had not been made till the Angels fell. So it pleased God to provide a place for the exercise of his mercy, before he framed another for the execution of his Justice.

Thus we have considered these three Heavens, or three stages of heaven. The lowest is for fowls, for vapors, for meteors: the next for stars: the third for Saints and Angels. The first is God's outward Court, open for all: the second is the body of his covered Temple, wherein those lamps of heaven are continually burning: the third is that holy of holies, whither our high Priest of the New Testament is entered; yea, and hath rent the veil, to make way for all his faithful children to follow him. In this lowest is tumult and vanity: in the second is rest and immutability: in the highest is blessedness and glory. The first we feel, the second we see, the third we believe. In the two lower is no felicity, neither the fowls nor the stars are happy. Happiness only belongs to the third Heaven, where the blessed Trinity enjoyeth himself, and the glorified Spirits enjoy him. Praise the Lord ye heavens of heavens. Coeli coelorum: the Prophet seems to call them all, Heaven of heavens. The etheriall heaven is Coelum subcoelo, heaven under heaven; the Emphyreall heaven is Coelum super coelum, heaven above heaven: the Syderiall heaven is Coelum inter coelos, heaven between the heavens. The lowest is heaven, in which we move: the next, under which we move: the highest, to which we move. In quo, sub quo, ad quod; In quo vivimus, sub quo movemur, ad quod tendimus: we were made in the first, made under the second, made for the highest. In the first we breathe with our mouths and nostrils; towards the second we bear up our heads: to the third we lift up our hearts. The lowest we feel with our senses, the next we look upon with our eyes, the highest is the object of our hopes. This nearest to us we use, suspire and respire it: the next we behold with wonder: but in the third we lay up our treasure. We move in this lower, the higher moves over us, the rest of our motion is expected in the Heaven of joy.

This is a heaven of mortality, the upper of immutability, the uppermost of blessed eternity. The soul is not long in making her progress through the lowest Heaven: it is very much if she be seventy years about it. But being once dissolved, she dispatcheth all her way through the next heaven in a minute: if she meet the great body of the Sun, she does not wait for her passage till he be gone by; but pierceth all Orbes and Spheeres; and is at once at, and through the firmament. But when she is got into the highest Heavens, there she stays and dwells, as in her proper home: this she hath long desired, this she then possesseth. This lowest Heaven is but our pilgrimage while we live, the starry heaven our through-fare when we die, the glorious Heaven our abiding city where we shall live forever. O the glory of that Mansion, that Mansion of glory! Blessed are they for whom, thou O Lord hast prepared it; blessed they whom thou hast prepared for it. Lord, I am not worthy thou shouldst come under my roof, that thou shouldst enter into mine house of mortality: much less am I worthy to enter into thy house of glory. Thus I have dwelt long on this fair roof of the world, the highest and best piece of the creation: who would not wish to dwell forever in heaven? It is good being here, say they, that saw but a glimpse of it. I shall make amends with brevity upon the rest: though the earth be vast, and the sea immense, and the work of many lives to survey: yet our discourse may compass the one, and sails through the other, in a short time.

The Earth, that fruitful mother, whose husband is Heaven: by whose kindly embraces, innumerable good things are brought forth for the use of man. The Poets called her Cybelen, magnam matrem, Titanis conjugem. In a word, God made it, for Fashion, round; for Situation, steadfast; for Matter, solid; rich, for use.

1. For the Form, it is a globular, a round ball hung in the midst of the world, about which the copious Orbes are continually running. This circular proportion of it is evident by the shadow it makes in the Moon, when it is interposed betwixt her and the Sun. Nor can the great mountains or deep valleys disfigure it; no more than the sticking of some small pins upon a great ball, would take away from it all respect of rotundity. In this position, it is both fittest to be enlightened by the Sun; and to all parts of it aequaliter patet aula coelestis, heaven is of the same distance.

2. The Situation is steady: for we explode those fond opinions of Copernicus; that the earth only moves, and the Heavens stand still. Democritus, without discourse or argument confuted that vain Tenet, Corpora non moveri; by walking up and down. God laid the foundations of the earth, that it should not be removed forever. One generation passeth, and another cometh: but the Earth abideth forever. It is the Center of the world; yea, even the receptacle of all the dregs of nature: the Heavens purge themselves, by their restless motion; and the standing Earth embosomes the corruption.

3. The matter is solid and gravid; therefore apt for buildings and burdens. What mighty Pyramids, huge Colosses, Castles and Cities, have been set on her strenuous back? Yet she hath not fainted under the weight. There is no Load that makes her groan, but our intolerable sins: these make her heartsicke; and for these, she spues us out of her stomach; yet again receives us into her inner bowels. Like weak legs that are not able to bear a distempered head, our iniquities make her reel under us, with unnatural Earthquakes.

4. For Use, she is rich: Turrifera, frugifera, metallifera: delicate is the fruit of her lips, and wondrous the fruit of her entrails. Her face yields us variety of herbs, flowers, trees, leaves, seeds, fruits, beasts, worms: some growing out of her, some moving on her, all nourished by her. If we dig into her inwards, we find metals, mineries, quarries; that white and red earth, whose beauty hath bewitched so many thousand souls. She patiently suffers the share, spade, mattocke, that tear up her guts, for that which God hath buried in them. Like the Pelican, with her own blood she feeds her children: and because the fruits she bears, cannot content them; she gives them her secret riches. The Makers wisdom laid them up low, closely, basely: that he might prevent both our greediness of searching for them, and foolishness of overvaluing them. I know, the Earth is the lees and sediments of nature, the dross of the world; as all corruption sinks down to the feet; Rudis, arenosa, latulenta: yet it hath three privileges of honor.

1. It is the habitation of the militant Church of God; and bears them whom he esteems as his most precious Jewels. The wicked indeed are Telluris i•tile pondus; but the other are her ornaments: all the Gold and rich Stones within her, are not worth one poor Saint, that daily walks upon her. This is one of her honors.

2. It is the Repositorie of the bodies of the elect, when they are dead; Placid•que receptat cuncta sinu: the great Church-yard of the Catholic Church. The Graves are their Chambers, and they make their Bed in the dust; and there take an unmolested sleep, till the testitition of all things. This is another honor for her; she keeps those bodies, which are the members of the Son of God.

3. It is the matter whereof those bodies were made: The Lord God formed (ϕ) of the dust of the ground. They that shall one day out-shine the Sun in Heaven, were yet made of the Earth. Let curious heads subtly dispute of the composition of elements in our bodies; which might be a second matter, that God had prepared out of the dust: but we enquire only of the Scripture, and there find expressly; not that God made this body of Air, or Fire; not of the same matter with the Moon, Sun, or Stars; much less of the nature of Heaven, or Angels; but de pulvere Terra, of the dust of the Earth. Of this, was Adam made; Eve, of Adam; Seth, of them both: and so the successive generations to Abraham, to David, to the Virgin Mary, to Jesus Christ. For God sent his Son factum ex muliere, which was facta ex pulvere. Mary was of Heli; Heli, of Matthat; Matthat, of Melchi: and so up to Adam; and then, down to the dust. Here then is the greatest honor of this poor element, the Body of the Son of God was made of it; even that Body which is set in potioribus Dei, worshipped of men and Angels: made of the Earth, laid in the Earth, raised from the Earth, to the glory of Heaven.

The Sea: a fluid element, always running, and often roaring, foaming and swelling, as if it would swallow up the whole Earth; unresistable by the power of man, yet ruled like a child by the power of God. His Gulfes have devoured, and his Rocks splitted, the mightiest and hugest Carickes that ever swam on the waters. Foolish Zerxes, the Persian King, because it had broke down a Bridge which he made over Hellespont, caused three hundred stripes to be given it for revenge, and to teach it better manners. Alas, how doth it mock all opposition; shall I say, of Fleetes and Navies? Why, a little tempest will soon make an end of them: but even of Kingdoms and large Territories, when the great Manager of the world gives it the Raines. Yet can he turn it with a twine thread, and with his least nodde check the proudest billows. He hath filled it, not with more creatures than wonders; whose hugeness of quantity, strangeness of shapes, variety of fashions, and incomparableness of number, may well fill our hearts with admiration. This is a fair field for a running head, where he may run himself out of breath, and his humor out of him: he that comes home from the Sea no better Christian than he went out, though he bring home never so vendible a Commodity, and so rich a Prize, hath lost his Voyage. If all the wonders and terrors which Sea-faring men see in the Deepe, work not an awful dread of the Power that made it, and them: if they be but like Via navis, the way of their Vessels, leaving no print or track in their hearts; they are but Pirates to their own souls.

Colum mutas, & animum non mutas? Art thou devout in a storm, and stormy in a calm? Many Mariners on Land imitate the rage of the Seas; and roar here, as fast as those do there. It is one of those elements which is said to have no mercy. Passage, and expedition, and success, may be bought on Land: no bribes can procure these at Sea. It is the desire of gain that makes men walk upon the water with wooden stilts, and venture through so frequent and mortal dangers. But it hath been a saying, Armatibus divum nullus pudor, Soldiers and Seamen scarce fear God himself. The Sea is become their proper element, the region where their art lies; and they do so often fight with waves and winds, living, Neque inter vivos nec inter mortuos, offering up their souls to every flaw of wind and billow of water; that they live as if death and they were at a composition. But alas, the spices, and silks, and strange commodities, we have from foreign countries, are the price of men's lives, even the blood of our children: as David called the water of Bethlehem, blood because it was brought with the hazard of men's lives from the army of Philistines. But I purpose no long voiage by sea, but rather a short cut over the main Ocean, and here I cast Anchor.

For Conclusion; wherefore did God create all these things, but for his own glory? At once therefore, to shame those Atheists that deny it, and to instruct us Christians that believe it; let me go up again by the same steps that I came down, and sing the praises of God as I pass. To begin where I left.

1. At the Sea; They that go down to the sea in ships, see the works of God in the deep. What follows? O that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men. It is not the talnesse of our ships, nor their swiftness, manning nor munition, that can secure them from that boisterous element; but our Makers Providence. We give them the names of beasts, the Lion, the Bear; of men, the Castor and Pollux; of Angels and Archangels: but still let us remember, they are wooden beasts, wooden Angels; and woe to him that shall say to a piece of wood, Thou art my Maker. They have good fortune and good speed written on their backs; they are not sure of it in their success. We read of the noblest Navy that ever furrowed the Seas; Masts of Cedar, and Hatches of Ivory, with embroidered Sails; yet the East wind broke it in the midst of the Seas. What then should we do? Let us fear the Lord, and both rocks and sands shall fear us; all winds shall blow us profit; shipwrackes shall avoid the chanell where our way lies; prosperous gales shall land our vessels in the desired havens, and mercy shall take our souls into the harbor of peace. A Ship under sails is a noble and goodly sight, but it is a better sight to see her moor'd in the haven. No matter what becomes of this frail Bark of our flesh, so we may save the Passenger. God hath confined this monstrous creature by a natural miracle: to Him let us give the honor. The sea sends out springs through the veins of the earth, they by degrees gather into rivers, and then empty themselves again into the lap of their Mother. All blessings come from God as the Fountain; let them return in blessings and praises to our Father.

2. The Earth: millions of wonders doth the very face of this parent afford us: what beast, what worm, what herb, tree, flower, or pile of grass is there, wherein we may not read infiniteness of power and skill? Wherein we may not see the footsteps of a Deity? Other sinners are condemned by many things, the Atheist is condemned by all things. The Wine shall testify against the Drunkard, Images against the Idolater, the Stone of the wall and Beam out of the timber against the Oppressor, the Chamber and the Bed shall accuse the Adulterer: but every Fish in the Sea, every Beast, Herb, Stone in the earth, every Star in heaven, besides the grand Jury of his conscience, shall bear witness against the atheous Unbeleever. It is round, that we might praise the perfection; it is sound, that we might praise the wisdom; it is steadfast, that we might praise the constancy; it is rich, that we might praise the bounty, of Him that created it. All the feculency and corruption is from ourselves and our sins: all the goodness, from the fountain of all goodness, our Maker.

3. The Heavens: These are nearest his glory, as in situation, so in excellency. The higher we go, still the more perfection: each element is superior to another, not more in place, than in dignity; that our hearts might dwell in none of these degrees, but by them climb up to the top of all felicity. Praise the Lord, ye Heavens: the Heavens cannot praise God, they are insensible creatures; yet they do it in their kind: they obey his word, therein they praise him: they still accomplish their enjoined tasks, therein they praise him: there is no thankfulness, like obedience. But they are the matter and occasion of our praising him: they were made for us, that we might praise him in them, for them, for ourselves. As when we see a magnificent House, or a goodly Ship; we do not only commend them, but much more the Builders. Every thing in Heaven is a Beam of some attribute in God. The large capacity of it, is a Beam of his incomprehensible infiniteness: the clear beauty of it, a Beam of his spotless purity: the unwearied motion of it, a Beam of his eternity: the diaphanous transparencie of it, a Beam of his Invisibility: the powerful influences of it, a beam of his omnipotency: the long unchanged continuance of it, a Beam of his Immortality: the accordance and harmony of it, a Beam of his peace and tranquility: the innumerable virtues and benefits of it, a Beam of his bounty, the whole admirable fabric, a Beam of his wisdom: the Sun and light of it, a Beam of his glory: for He gives that light to it, which it gives to us. Tot ora, quot Lumina: as Augustine said of Lazarus, Tot ora, quot ulcera: as many mouths, as sores, crying for pity: so many stars, so many tongues proclaiming God's glory. As John the Baptist was not only vox clamantis, but everything in him was vox clamantis, the voice of a Cryer. His raiment of Camels hair was vox clamantis, crying for mortification: his girdle about his loins was vox clamantis, crying for continence and chastity: his meat, being locusts and wild honey, was vox clamantis, crying for temperance and sobriety: his preaching place, the wilderness, where ambition doth not use to grow, was vox clamantis, crying for zeal and humility. So there is nothing in Heaven, nothing on Earth, nothing in the Sea, nothing in all the world, but is vox clamantis, preaching the Lord's glory. This is the consent and harmony of all creatures, and in that let us join with them; Blessing, and honor, and praise, thanks and obedience be rendered from us all to our Maker forever.

By the word of God: This is the Instrument of the creation: wherein we have divers things to observe:

1. It was the wicked error of Servetus, that the Word was not from the beginning; which he would gather from this; that Heaven and Earth were made, before God is said to speak. Then God said; not before. But we have an evident Testimony, that the Word was in the beginning, and the world was made by it: and seeing the Light was made by the Word, the Word must needs be before the Light: the cause ever goes before the effect. Another heresy of Servetus was to think, that speaking was a new quality in God: whereas indeed it is no quality at all, but signifies only his will and decree: He spake, and they were made: his will is his word, and his word is his deed. Our tongue, hand, and heart, are three several things; and not seldom one differs from the other; that the hand does not what the tongue speaks; and neither tongue speaks, nor hand does, what the heart thinks. But all these are one in God, who is simply one, and infinite. It is true, that Christ is the Word of the Father, and by that Word he made the world: but this is not the Word here meant: Dixit, that word is not meant of Christ. He is verbum Aeternum, this was spoke in time: He verbum Annunciatum, this Enunciatum; yea, not so much, but only Beneplacitum. That which for us, is to say it; is in him, to will it. He needed no helps, no instruments: what could be added to the Infinite? what is not present to the Eternal? His Fiat was enough, this could do more than the Angels could make, for it did make the Angels.

His Word is not less effectual now: as his Fiat made all, so his Ruat can dissolve all. Lord, say the word only, and my servant shall be healed: the Centurion confessed his Word Almighty, as himself was the Almighty Word of his Father. I will not trouble thee with an unnecessary journey, my house is not worthy to give thee entertainment; the Heaven of Heavens is too little for that honor: thy Word can do it; send but that speedy messenger, let me have a Fiat from thy powerful lips, and my servant shall be whole. None but a Divine Power, is unlimited; neither hath faith any other bounds, than God himself. There needs no more to remove Mountains or Devils, but a word. Say but the word, O Savior, and our sins shall be remitted, our hearts shall be renewed, our souls shall be healed, our bodies shall be raised from the dust; both bodies and souls shall be glorified in Heaven. That Ruler had a good reason of his steddie confidence: though himself were under the command of another, yet he had some under his command, with whom his word was prevalent, even extending to absent performances. Well therefore might he argue, that a free and unbounded Power might give infallible commands; and that the most obstinate disease of Nature must needs yield to the beck of the God of Nature.

2. He commanded, and they were created:] They obey his Word, whether ordinary, or extraordinary. Ordinary is of two sorts: First, Naturae naturantis; when at first he made them all with his Word. So they obeyed, that they were such as he commanded them to be. Secondly, Naturae naturatae; his preserving Word: for they run still the same course that he bade them, and swerve not from it. The Sun and Moon keep their due motions, Day and Night their vicissitudes, Summer and Winter observe their seasons, the Orbes turn, the Earth fructifies, the Sea ebbs and flows; all the Wheelles of this great universal Clock move, as He did set them a going. His extraordinary Word is obeyed two ways: First, in not doing their nature, when He bids them forbear: as the Sun to stand still in Gibeon, and the Moon in the Valley of Aialon; as if they had been sent to wait upon Joshua. The nature of Fire, is to burn; yet it shall not hurt God's three servants. The Heaven becomes Brasse, and the Earth, Iron: the one, forbears to send down Showers and influence; the other, to send forth Fruits and sustenance: albeit these are their natural functions, and they are ordained to do the world such services; yet God inhibites them, and they are obedient. Rivers are made to run, and Springs to send forth streams; yet He turneth Rivers into a wilderness, and the Water-springs into dry ground: when he pleaseth to drain them, there is not a drop of water left, to make a Sparrow drink. Secondly, in doing against nature, at his command; as for Iron to swim. Whether the Metall were stripped of the natural weight, by the same Power that gave it being; or, whether retaining the wonted poise, it was raised up by some spiritual operation; we enquire not: only we find it swimming like Corke upon the stream of Jordan, and moving toward the hand that lost it. Elisha causeth the Wood, which was light, and knew not how to sink, to fetch up the Iron, which was heavy, and naturally incapable of supernatation.

Thus willing is every creature to put off the properties of Nature, at the command of the God of Nature. It is no less easy for him, when our hard and heavy hearts are sunk down into the mud of this world, to fetch them up again by his mighty Word, and cause them to flote on the streams of life, and again to see the face of Heaven. The Red Sea and Jordan shall be divided, for the passage of Israel. For waters to stand still, were but to suspend the course of nature: but Jordan was driven back, saith the Psalmist: it fled at the Word of God, and took a course against nature. Joshua's Sun stood still; that, was not to do his natural office: Hezekia's Sun went back; that, was to do against his natural office. Thus did they at first, thus do they still obey all Words of their Maker.

3. All these were made for man, yet man comes short of them all in thankfulness and obedience to this Word. The Earth was made for his Floore; the Sea, for his Pond; Heaven, for his Canopie; the Sun and Moon, for his Torches; all Creatures, his Vassalls. Whatsoever walketh upon the Earth, swimmeth in the Water, flieth in the Air, shineth in Heaven, was either made to the use of man, or to the use of that which serveth man. If man do not eat Flies, yet he eateth the Birds that live by those Flies: if he eats not Grass, he eats the Beasts that feed on that Grass: and the Beasts that were not made ad esum, were yet made ad usum. He came naked out of the Wombe of the Earth; yet he was no sooner enlivened, but he was so rich, that all things were his. How is he bound to praise God above the rest, for whom all the rest were ordained? First, they were made with a word; there was but a Fiat to the Light, &c. he was made with many words. Secondly, they suddenly; he, with consultation of the whole Trinity, and a kind of deliberation; Faciamus hominem. Thirdly, they Verbo; he (as it were) Manufactura; God made man of the dust, and breathed into him the breath of life. Fourthly, they were made for man; man himself, for God: and God gave man the Dominion over all. Besides the excellence and preeminence of his Body, wherein appear the Lineaments of Majesty; the noble endowments of his Soul; for he was created to the Image of God, in a conformity of the creature to the Creator: so that he is (as it were) a created god, as God is an uncreated Spirit. Animata Imago Dei: Though he be but a man before God, yet he is a god in the World: The Egyptians gave man for a terrestrial god.

Yet let not this sublime conceit transport him above himself, which hath placed him above other creatures: For though he be a god on Earth, yet he is but a god of Earth, an Earthen god. That which they fancy of the Phoenix, that being bred of ashes, it doth burn to ashes, is true of man: being made of Earth, he must yield to Earth. God hath given us a Soul, to inform us; Senses, to inform our Soul; Faculties, to furnish that Soul: Understanding, the great Surveyor of the Secrets of Nature and Grace: Fantasie and Invention, the Master of the Works: Memory, the great Keeper, or Master of the Rolles, to the Soul; a Power that can make amends for the speed of Time, in causing him to leave behind him those things, which else he would so carry away, as if they had not been: Will, which is the Lord Paramount in the State of the Soul, the Commander of our Actions, the Elector of our Resolutions: Judgment, which is the great Counselor of the Will: Affections, which are the servants of them both. A Body, fit to execute the charge of the Soul; so wonderously disposed, that every part hath best opportunity to his own Functions: so qualified with Health, arising from the proportion of Humours, that like a Watch kept in good tune, it goes right; and is fit both to serve the Soul, and maintain it self.

Thus if we look inward, we find our Creators mercies: if we look upward, his mercy reacheth unto the Heavens: if downward, the Earth is full of his goodness, and so is the broad Sea. If we look about us, what is it that he hath not given us? Air, to breathe in; Fire to warm us; Water, to cool and cleanse us; Clothes, to cover us; Food, to nourish us; Fruits, to refresh us; yea, Delicates, to please us; Beasts, to serve us; Angels, to attend us; Heaven, to receive us; and, which is above all, his own Son, to redeem us. Whithersoever we turn our eyes, we cannot look besides his bounty.

4. What a world of respects be here, above all respects to the rest of the world, to tie our obedience to the Word of our God? Blasphemous Infidel; cannot that Word which established the Earth, keep thy faith from tottering in the knowledge of thy Maker? Cannot that Word, which made all those Wonders in the Sea, work this one Wonder, to persuade thy heart of his Being? Cannot that Word, which stretched out the Heavens, rack thy Conscience, to acknowledge that infinite Power? Saint Paul says, That the Heathen, by this great Book in Folio, the Heavens laid open, did read there was a God: And shall these Atheists, even because of those Heavens, deny there is a God? Shall men be perverted by that, by which they were convinced? In one word, I will tell you their end: Heaven they see, but they shall never come at it: Hell they do not see, but they shall be cast into it.

To ourselves, that are Believers, what a Prodigie is this; That Heaven, Earth, and Sea, all Elements, all Creatures, should obey this Word of God: and only Man, for whom they were all made, should rebel against it? Yet let us consider; how have we transgressed all the Words of our Maker?

1. Verbum Sacramentale, given at the Creation, in Paradise: This, man kept not a day. Eve believed the word of the Serpent; Adam, the word of Eve; both, before the Word of God. It was a willful breach in them, a woeful breach to us and them; for it hath indisposed us to keep any Word of our God ever since. Non servando unum & primum Praeceptum, infirmamur ad omnia.

2. Verbum Naturale, the Law engraven: How soon was this Law broken; when a man murdered a man; a brother, the son of his own father?

3. Verbum Legale, the Law written: Israel received it in Fire and Thunder, they quaked and fainted at the sight: stay but a month or five weeks, and they cry; Make us gods, we know not what is become of this Moses. O mad people, so soon to forget so dreadful a Law, and Law-giver! Their hearts ceased to tremble, with the Earthquake; and in the very sight of Sinai, they call for other gods. Even before they had the Law, they broke the Law: while Moses was gone up for the Tables, they foully transgressed. How incessantly do we all break this Word? All our actions, words, thoughts, are but so many rebellions.

4. Verbum Evangelicum, the Charter of the Covenant betwixt God and our souls; whereby he promiseth to save us, if we will believe on him. Yet this Word we turn into wantonness; as if a man should head his Taber with his Pardon.

5. Verbum Spirituale, the motions of the holy Ghost: How many thousands of these prove still-borne and abortive, through our negligence; or be overlayd with our vanities? We use them, as Julius Caesar did the Paper that concerned his own life: all the other Petitions he read, only that he put in his Pocket, and never looked on. We owe a Reckoning for all those holy motions, which the great Advocate of Heaven hath made at the Barre of our conscience.

6. Verbum Conservativum, the word of his providence. A word that can either sustain us without Bread, as it did Moses and Elias: or with a miraculous Bread, as it did Israel with Manna: or send ordinary means after a miraculous manner, as food to the Prophet by the Ravens: or multiply ordinary means miraculously, as the Meale and Oile to the Sareptan widow: all things are sustained by this Almighty Word. Indeed we live by food, but not by any virtue that is in it, without God. Without the concurrence of his providence, Bread would rather choke than nourish us. If he withdraw his word from his creatures, in their greatest abundance we perish. What so necessary dependence hath the blessing upon the creature, if our prayers do not hold them together? Why then do we set our eyes on the means, and not look up to the hand that gives the blessing? The Ravens and Lions trust upon this Word, and are fed: shall we distrust it? Are not ye much better than they? Better? no, we are worse: for they dare take God's word for their provision, and we dare not trust him. As we may not neglect the means, so we must not neglect the procurement of a blessing upon the means, nor be unthankful to him that gives the blessing.

5. It is time to conclude this point: if men of all creatures be most beholding to the word of God, why should men of all creatures be most resisting against that word? The Centurions servants were dutiful to him: he can but say, Do this, and it is done: and he was kind to them: these mutual respects drew on each other: cheerful and diligent service in the one, calls for a due and favorable care in the other. We are set as that Ruler was; with a Praesse creaturae, and a Subesse creatori: do the creatures disobey our command? we have rebelled against the word of God. They that neglect to please, cannot complain to be neglected. O that we could be such servants to our heavenly Master, as we would have our servants be to us. Alas, every command of his says, Do this, and we do it not. Every of his inhibitions says, Do not that, and we do it. He says, depart from the world, and we run to it. He says, come to me, and we run from him. Woe and alas, this is not service, but enmity. How can we look for favor, whiles we return rebellion? The earth is obedient, why doth it bear us? the sea is obedient, why doeth it not swallow us? the heavens are obedient, why do they cover us? the sun is obedient, why doth he enlighten us? all creatures are obedient to the word of their Maker, why should they benefit us, that are disobedient rebels? It is a gracious Master whom we serve: there can be no duty of ours that he sees not, that he acknowledges not, that he crowns not: we could not but be happy, if we could be officious. O that the word which made heaven and earth, could lift up our hearts from earth our dirty thorough-fare to heaven our blessed home, bought for us with the dear blood of Jesus Christ.

The earth standing out of the water and in the water. This is the disposition of these two parts, earth and sea: where we have diverse observations.

1. The waters did at first cover and overwhelm the face of the earth, and were removed with a Dixit. Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear: and it was so. The manner of this collection of the waters hath puzzled many. First Eugubinus think, that they were dried up by the heat of the Sun, and that the Northern part of the earth appeared first: others, that it was done with a mighty wind, as after the deluge: but the Sun was not yet made, neither Sun nor wind could do this in so short a time: nothing but the Lord's Fiat. Secondly, some think that the earth was plain without Mountains, to give the waters a more speedy passage: and that this present inequality was caused by the flood. But in the deluge, the mountains were covered; therefore the mountains were before the flood. And with the creation of the earth, we find the mention of mountains: therefore from the beginning were hills and mountaites. Thirdly, to say, the waters ran to the Antipodes, is an ignorant fancy: for those parts be habitable as well as ours, and not under water. Fourthly, Paulus Burgensis hath a strange devise: that the earth makes one globe, and the sea another; and each hath the proper center. Indeed the earth is called a sphere or circle: but experience shows, that the earth without the sea does not make one round globe. We think, this might be done three ways. First, the water being at first a light and thin vapor might be coagulated and thickened; as we see, the sea-water is of a grosser substance than the fresh; and therefore contained in a less room. Secondly, the Clouds and region of the air being made the same day, a greater part of the water might be extenuated and evaporated into them as we find daily a conversion of mysts and clouds into water. Thirdly, the earth being vaster and deeper than the circumference of the water that compassed it, might receive the water into the concavities and hollow places, ordained for it as receptacles. To decide all controversy, read Psalm. 104. verse 7. and 8. God made a low foundation for the waters in the earth: they were stragglers before, he provided them a lodging.

2. The earth is founded in the waters, but not founded on the waters. Of another opinion was Thales among the philosophers, and Chrysostom among the Christians: they conceited a strange kind of building: that whereas men desire to lay their foundation upon rocks, the Lord should lay this upon the waters: Two places of scripture are urged for it: first this Text, ex aqua & in aqua consistentem: but the error lies in the mis-translation: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, not by the water, but in the water, more properly: as Noah is said to be saved, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, not by the water, but in the water. The earth may well be said to be in the water; because the whole continent being less in compass than the Ocean, seemeth to be but as a great Island in the sea. The other words are plain: it consists, not of the water, but out of the water: not as though it was made of the water, but because it was made to appear out from the water, which before covered it. The other place is from the Psalm, He hath founded it upon the seas, and established it upon the floods. Augustine refers this to the Islands, brows of hills, and promontories, that hang over the sea. Euthimius, to the secret passages of water, that run within the earth. But the evident truth is fetchd from the Hebrew word, G•all; which signifies Super, Above: not upon the waters, but above the waters: not upon them, as on a foundation: but above them, as with a supereminence and exaltation. That the earth hath not her foundation upon the waters, it is clear. First, By experience, for we perceive it to be the heaviest element, and so to have the situation lowest. Secondly, by Scripture; He hangeth the earth upon nothing; therefore not upon the waters. Thirdly, by reason: the earth is immovable; God laid the foundations of the earth, that it should not be removed forever. The waters are fluid and running: a thing that is moveable, cannot be the foundation of that which is immovable. It consists in the water, and out of the water; neither of the water, nor by the water.

3. The Earth and Sea are two loving companions, like husband and wife: one of them embraceth the other with his moist arms, sending forth springs into her (naturally) dry veins, and both together produce abundance of fruits. The Sun doth a kindly office; and finding the Sea surcharged with waters, and the Earth wanting in diverse places; draws up the moisture of the one into clouds, and resolves it again upon the other in welcome showers. So sweetly hath the Divine providence disposed; that by mingling humida siccis, both should be apt for generation, by a third quality of kindly heat. The Earth and Sea are like a pair of great millstones to fence the world: the Earth is the nether millstone, so fixed that it stirs not: the Sea is the upper millstone that runs round about it continually: the effect of both is bread for the use of man. By the confession of all, the natural place of the waters is above the earth: this at first they enjoyed, and a second time recovered, when the Lord loosed their bands and banks, and gave them their voluntary and primitive passage. God covered the earth with the deep, as with a garment. As a garment in the proper use of it, is above the body that wears it: such a vesture would it still be to the Earth, if the Makers Word did not restrain it: not unlike the shirt that was made for the murdering of Agamemnon, where the head had no issue out. If the Lord should set open the windows above, and the sluices below, they would every hour of our life overrunne us with a new deluge. Let any Atheist in the world, out of all his stock of reason (and reason is all the stock he hath; for faith and he are sworn enemies) give one reason, why the waters being a lighter and larger element, should not swim over the face of the earth, and drown all the Inhabitants. Let them pump their wits, drench Plato, Aristotle, and Machiavel, to the least and last drop of arguments: and what is failing in their own fancy, let them make up with the Philosophy of hell; they shall never do it. Only the child of a Christian, out of the principles of his Catechism, can make it plain: and as my Text saith, The Word of the Lord hath done it, and the Name of the Lord be ever blessed for it. Moral Uses.

1. When David looked into that little world, Himself, he confesseth, I am fearfully and wonderfully made: when we look into that great man, the World, we have good cause to acknowledge that it is fearfully and wonderfully made too: therefore it would be wonderful folly in us, not to fear the Maker of both. I have set the sand for a bound of the Sea, by a perpetual decree &c. therefore Fear ye not me, saith the Lord? Will ye not tremble at my Presence? Sand is not fit, one would think, to bind an unruly beast, they call it Irritum laborem, proverbially, a rope of sand: yet is this the cordage and ligature to shackle that roaring monster: the sand shall bind it. God raiseth up the waves, and he quiets the angry billows. Do they swell? His breath hath stirred them: His command raiseth the stormy wind. Do they flinch, and return like Cowards? His frown hath checked them: They saw Him, and fled away: Jordan was driven back.

2. Where can sinful man be secure? Where can the Atheist set his foot, but it is either on God's earth or his water? The earth is steady, but our footing on it is not steady: how many have stumbled even upon plain ground? When we walk upon it, we do but tread upon a ball hanging in the Air, and floating on the water. Cùm te pendenti videas insistere terrae, Nonne vel hinc clare conspicis esse Deum? The dangers of the sea have ever been manifold and manifest; unless to some hardened Pirates, that like desperate Sophisters have learned to dispute with tempests; and put themselves aboard a man of war, as if they were going to make merry with the devil. The report of the behavior of some Mariners on the sea, would even astonish the hearers on land; that they reckon those prodigious wonders no better than their play-fellows: that they strive to outscold the elements; and roar as fast with oaths and curses, as the other do with storms and billows: as if all their Anchor of hope were the hope of their Anchor; and they trusted to their Helme, rather than to Heaven: that their conscience should be like their Keele; till that splits, they never think of repentance: and if then, yet that repentance lasts but to the next land; and whatsoever hath past betwixt God and them, they forget the bargain. It is a curse threatened to the ungodly, that they should fear where no fear is: but not to fear, where is just cause of fear, in medio terrorum, environed with dangers; this is a curse they willfully bring on themselves.

3. Not that I approve an over-timerousnesse, the effect of unbelief; as if God could not preserve us on the waters, whither our necessary occasions have called us. Some Philosophers; if they heard of any that would make a short cut of their journey by the advantage of the water, when it would have been many miles about by land, would call them fools when they came home: but that was not the censure of wise men, by their leaves. I remember a witty saying; when a man related how that his father, grandfather, and great grandfather, all died at sea; another replied, If I were as you, I would never come at sea. The other asked him, where his father, grandfather, and progenitors died: he answered; In their beds; then saith he, If I were as you, I would never come in bed. He that keeps the sea from overrunning the earth, can keep us from miscarrying by sea. We have known some scape drowning in a shipwreck on the main Ocean; and others that have been drowned in a puddle, in the very kennel. The sea hath no power to hurt, where the Lord will preserve: and when he gives way, a very drop can do it. As the Astrologer, that would read his own destiny in his damned art, that such a day he should perish by water: to avoid which, he kept his chamber, and all that day would by no opportunity or importunity stir abroad: the evening came, and now he thought the danger past, and that he had coozened the rules of his own art, wherewith he had so often coozened the world: he feels his throat somewhat hot and dry, and forgettingly calls for a porrenger of cold water: he puts it to his mouth and gargles it; and that the devil might be true to him, by God's just permission and Judgment, it thratled him. Where should the wicked be safe? How many have scaped rocks and sands, storms and Pirates, and other hopeless perils on Sea, and yet have lost their lives on some Tree of Justice by land?

4. Suppose we come not within the danger of the outward waters; God hath water enough to drown us within our own bodies. He can command a full sea of distempered and redundant humors to take our breath from us. Why may we not, like Heraclius the Emperor, die of Dropsies? We little think how much we are beholding to the goodness of God, that we live a minute. Though those exterior elements let us alone, we have elements within us, whereof we are composed and framed; heat and cold, drought and moisture in our bodies, able enough to destroy those bodies wherein they are bred and fed. Let those brethren of one house fall out, those foundations of our nature be at variance within us; if they will destroy our corporeal city, as the seditious Captains did Jerusalem. Melancholy imaginations, like the dark grave, have buried some alive: the pestilent flames of Fevers have burnt up the inwards of others, and like an oven baked their bowels. Some that have scaped the contagious air of the plague, have yet been poisoned with the fumes and vapors arising from their own vicious stomachs. Other, after many tedious voyages by Sea, have drowned themselves in the cups of a Tavern: ingurgitating (as themselves call it) an ocean of drink: dying like Anacreon, with a grape in their throat; or choked with waters between their own skin and bones. Thus there be innundations by land, chamber-tempests, storms of the cellar: floods of drink overtake one another, Pottle after Pottle: undae superadvenit ••dae: one Deepe calls another; a Deepe insatiate stomach, for a deep measure of Wine: and then the winds rise, Stormes begin, the Waves work; and the Clients of Bacchus become either the votaries of Venus, or the assassins of Mars, swimming in blood no less than in drink: as if all the Vessels were drawn to the Lees, and they must now broach one another's Carcases. These be the wrackes and miscarriages that follow excess: and as he said of old, Non plures gladio, quàm cecidere gulâ: so Neptune does not destroy more, than Bacchus in the City, and boiled Ceres in the country. He did moderately, that mingled them together: In cratera meo Thetis est conjuncta Lyao: Est dea juncta deo, sed dea major eo. But the merry companion could say, If water had been good to drink with wine, God himself would put it into the Grape: any excuse, how profane soever, serves to help intemperance. So another that was troubled with the disease which Solomon lays upon the Drunkard; sore eyes; when his Physician diswaded him from wine; he replied, that it were better for him to abstain from water; because he had often marked blear eyes, and seen water come forth, but never Wine. Such be their shifts to maintain riot, that hate always to sobriety, and mock all moderation out of countenance. Thus as if they would prevent God, and save him a labor, that he need not unbinde the raging and swallowing waters; they do it to his hand, and drown their own hearts and spirits by taking in a voluntary deluge: till a ship does not more reel and stagger upon the water, than their heads upon the wine. You have heard how an alehouse was by a drunken imagination turned into a Galley; when they thought the storm so vehement, that they unladed the ship, threw the goods out of the window, instead of overboard; and called the Constable Neptune, and the officers Tritons: some getting under the tables: as if they lay under hatches: another holding a great pot for the Mast: and all crying out, that so many brave Gentlemen should be cast away. Here was a strange tempest: a tap-house on land, thought a pinnasse o' sea: there was a sea of drink within that caused it. So great be our sins both by sea and land, that it is the only infinite mercy of our God, that in every place we perish not.

Whereby the World that then was, being overwhelmed with Water, perished.

WE read in common Histories, of many great Floods that have been in the World: none but this, did overflow the World: they were all far short of this, both in extent and continuance. That great inundation of Nile, under Prometheus, endured but a months space: That under Ogyges, in Achaia, two months: Another under Deucalion, in Thessalia, three months: They mention a fourth inundation, of the Ile Pharos, therefore called Pharonica, under the Egyptian Proteus. But none came near this Flood, either for universalitie of place, or duration of time; covering the tops of the highest mountains, and lasting twelve months and ten days. This general Deluge, as I had just occasion, I somewhat largely surveyed in the former Chapter: Where some Critics might say, There was a Flood upon a Flood; a Flood of discourse upon the Flood of Water: my present brevity in that argument, shall make amends. Shortly, consider with me,

- 1. A malefactor; The World that then was.
- 2. An executioner; The Water overwhelmed it.
- 3. The conveniency of this execution; because the Earth consisted in the Water: it was not far fetched, but ready at hand: Whereby.
- 4. The event of all; which was, perishing.

The malefactor, the World: which is taken either localiter, for this whole visible Engine; The World was made by him: or materialiter, for the things of the World; The World is crucified to me: or formaliter, for the vicious and miserable condition of it, the vanity and villainy; Positus in maligno, The World lies in wickedness: or principaliter, by a Metonymy, for the excellentest part of the World, Man. Locally, a piece of it perished; the Earth: materially, a great deal of it perished; all the riches and commodities of the Earth: principally considered, all perished, but eight persons: formally, there was nothing left. Only God's quarrel to the World, was for the men of the World; and his quarrel to the men of the World, was for the sins of those men. The World it self was in this, like the Sea; and Sins, like the Winds: the Sea would be calm and quiet, if the Winds did not trouble it: if iniquities, like storms, had not put the course of nature into an uproar, the World had not perished. First, it was foul with wickedness; therefore God saw it high time to wash it, with a Deluge. Secondly, Iniquity had so sized it self into the Center of it, and died it in grain, that it must soke under the water a whole year. Thirdly, Sin did cleave so fast to the sides of it, that a little water was not sufficient: but as a Cloth that is thoroughly polluted, must be thoroughly scoured, and pass through many ladders; so it would not off from the world, till the world it self was washed to nothing. Fourthly, no part of it was free, but this contagion had universally overspred it: therefore no part must be spared, but the water must universally overflow it. Fifthly, it was grown hot with the fever of burning lusts, the inflammations of concupiscence; therefore the flood came, not as a Iulep only to qualify and cure the intemperate heat; but as a vehement shower to drench the luxuriant parts. Sixthly, it was dry, all the moisture of grace, and sap of charity, the radical humor that maintains the life of Religion, was quite scorched and exciccated with the drought of malice: it must be moistned, not with gentle dews, (they could do no good, the malady was too desperate) but with an inundation of water. Seventhly, it was grown unruly, transgressing all the limits and boundaries that the Maker had set it: therefore he also pulls up the stakes of the Sea, and lets it in like a wild beast among them. Eighthly, men were proud and haughty, and had lifted up themselves above their own pitch and measure: therefore God opens the windows of Heaven, and powers down streams upon them, to lay them low enough. Ninthly, they had trusted to the World, more than to God; therefore he now puts them to their shifts: let them try how their god can deliver them: the waters drive them from their houses up to the mountains, from thence to the highest trees, and still pursues them. Meat they had none, but only drink enough: they might swallow of that as much as they could, which was sent to swallow them. Tenthly, they had rioted upon the creatures of God, without thanks to the owner: They did eat and drink, not for necessity, or pleasure, but intemperance: therefore all is taken from them, but water, and of that they have too much; or the fish, which if they could take, they have not a spark of fire wherewith to dress. Eleavently, the World was secure, men had given themselves up to carelessness: they did eat and drink, it may be not to surfeit and drunkenness: They married, and gave in marriage: it may be not as some say, Propter voluptatem carnis, magis quam propagationem prolis: Christ does not mention their whoredoms, adulteries, homicides, and such actual turpitudes; but their supine neglect and slumber: not that they were free from the other crimes; but that this was enough to destroy them. If then the worlds security in lawful things made it so fit for the deluge of water: how doth now the universality of unlawful things, horrible sins, make it fully ready for the last fire.

The Executioner is Water: this is an excellent servant to us, so God made it; but durus magister, an ill master, so our sins make it. I will not instance to you the manifold benefits of water, our necessary use makes them familiar: yet is this the instrument of their confusion, which to others is an advantage of much accommodation. Nothing is so sovereign, which being abused by sin, may not of a blessing, become a curse. The very Manna that came down from Heaven, may be corrupted with faithlessness: as that foolish Israelite proved, which would be sparing the charges of God, and in a covetous diffidence lay up that for his breakfast, which he should have spent at supper. The next morning it putrefied: the Manna was from above, the worms and stink from his distrust. Christ himself, the greatest blessing that ever was, as he is the rising of son, so the falling of others: To believers, a corner stone, whereon to build their faiths: to unbelievers a millstone, that shall grind or quash their souls. Immortality, the greatest blessedness of the Saints, is the greatest misery of the damned. The Instrument is Water.

1. God hath variety of weapons to punish rebels: he destroyeth Corah and his confederates by the earth, the Egptians by the sea, the Canaanites by the sword, Israelites by the plague, Sodomites by the fire, here the whole world with water. God hath a whole quiver of arrows, a magasin of artillery and judgments. Three are especially named for his arrows. First, Famine, an evil and destroying arrow. Next the Pestilence, a deadly shaft; habet sub arundine plumbum; it is headed with poison: Grandis terror mortalium: deaths chief Pursuivant. First, it is Sagitta volans, flies swift as an arrow: it flew such a pace through the coasts of Israel, that it slew seventy thousand in three days. Secondly, Sagitta ambulance, a roving arrow, that can reach a mark far off; He that is a far off shall die of the pestilence: no man can outrunne it. Thirdly, Ambulance in tenebris; it flies silently, without making any noise: Pavor nocturnus, a terror by night; it steals upon men suddenly, assaults them by night, and surpriseth them in their most secret chambers. This arrow when it flew, consumed our lives here and there, before us, behind us, spared none: only to his chosen, God did dip it in the blood of his own Son, to take away the venom of it: so though it wounded their bodies, their souls it did not touch. The last arrow is inundation: the fury whereof we have lately felt; when the earth like a pregnant mother was come to the birth, and wanted strength to be delivered. Our fair Fields, that in the Spring sang and laughed, now mourn upon the ground that bare them: and the Husband man sighed to see his hopes untimely buried, like abortive fruit in the womb that bred them. Her nurse did overlay her; and those clouds which brought up her children, did again stifle them. All that foul weather in our fields abroad, proceeds from the foulness of our hearts within.

2. The deluge may well be compared to an Arrow: not only because after the flood God is said to hang up his Bow, in token of his reconciliation to the world: when he had shot his arrow, he hung up his Bow. But as Famine is his earthy arrow, making the wounded look like earth, pale and wanne: and Pestilence is his airy arrow, an infectious vapor, poisoning as it goes; and War his fiery arrow; where the brandishing of swords give fiery sparkles, Ordnance sends out fiery streams, and Cities are set on a flame, So Inundation is his watery arrow; whereby at other times he destroys parts and pieces of the earth; at this time, all the world. First, an arrow slies no whither but to the place it is sent, the mark whereat it is shot. Here he pours down, not there: in this place the sea shall break forth, while it is chained up in another. To lay immoderate rain to the charge of the stars, and eruptions of the Ocean to the weakness of dammes; this is but to gnaw the arrow, as the Dog bites the stone, without minding the shooter: Secondly, an arrow after the loose makes speed to the mark: as Hercules told Nessus, when he ran away with his Deianira; that though he could not come at him, he would send after him: Vulnere, non pedibus te consequar: and he made it good too; Fugientia terga sagittâ trajicit, he sped an arrow through his loins. God did no sooner open the doors and channels, but the water begins to overrun the earth. Thirdly, an arrow pierceth deeply, and wounds deadly; especially when it is shot à manu potentis, from the hand of the mighty: much more à Manu Omnipotentis, from the hand of the Almighty; The Arrows of the Almighty are within me, was the complaint of Job. No target, no corslet, nor armor of proof can repel them: no barricado's can keep out the waters, no banks, nor fortifications resist them, no towers or Cedars overtop them, An impartial arrow? The old were not superannuated, Infants not under years, it swept away all. It was Exterminum, or Demonium meridianum; as Jerome reads the Psalm: an utter rooting out. Fourthly, an Arrow, if it be levelled with a just aim, never misseth the mark: God wanted neither aim nor mark, while he had the whole world to shoot at. Thus the Bow it self was the divine Justice: the Arrow, the Waters, the instrument of that Justice: the loosing of the Arrow from the Bow, the effusion of Clouds and Seas, the execution of that instrument: the mark it flew at, was the sinful world: it was headed with their wickedness, and the feathers it went withal was their sins. It is iniquity that the Lord lets drive at: if men had not offended him, they should never have been offended by him.

3. All God's Judgments may be called his Shafts, and He hath a mighty quiver-full of them. The dexterity of some men in shooting hath been notable. Two were brought before Alexander, famous for their activity in several kinds. The one could cast Millet seed through the eye of an needle without missing: but the King, rather wondering at his vanity, than admiring any excellency, gave him for reward Modium Liguminis, a Bushel of the seed to hold him play, and to keep his hand in ure. The other was an Archer, so skillful, that he could shoot his arrow thorough a finger-ring, without failing. We read of seven hundred left-handed Benjamites, that could sling stones at a hairs breadth and not miss: which is more wondrous. It is reported of Domitian, that he could shoot an arrow between the fingers of a man's hand a far off, and do him no harm. But the hand of God is more cunning, and his Shaft flies more steddily: like Jonathan's bow, whereof David sung in his funeral Elegie, that never returned empty from the blood of the slain: Consequitur quodcunque petit. We know not with what arrow he will shoot us, therefore Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel. There is no running from God; let us never prepare our heels to run from him, but our hearts to meet him. There is a way to meet with God, yea, and to overcome him: this is not by scowring of armors, raising forces, and fortifying Garrisons: but by humiliation, repentance, prayers, and tears. If we will conquer heaven, it must be by yielding: not by standing out, but by falling down. As the only way to avoid him, is to run to him: so the surest means to escape his blows, is by throwing ourselves at his footstool. We have leave to resist the divine Judgments by our prayers, with favor and success: as wool meets Iron.

Indeed humble confessions, and devout penance, cannot always avert temporal Judgments: no child would be whipped, if he might scape for crying. Doubtless, David had spent those three dismal days in the saddest contrition, yet still God's Angel in that short compass of time destroyed seventy thousand. Historians have commended the Persian Bowmen for the most excellent Archers: yet in the battle betwixt Scipio and Antiochus they were wonderfully foiled. But how came it to pass? Imber superfusus Persicos arcus corruperat: a shower of rain falling in time of the conflict, so slacked their bows, and wetted their arrows, that they could not offend the enemy. The way for us to slack God's bow, and to dull his arrows, is by showers of tears falling from our repentant eyes. And as our tears must slacken his bow, so our prayers must get out his arrows, when they stick in our flankes. Pliny saith, that Dicta... pota sagittas pellit; Dittany, garden-Ginger being drunk, drives out the darts. Prayer is that true Dictamuum, that shall either prevent God's arrows, or keep them from rankling in our sides. Above all, let us furnish our souls with faith: this shall not only quench the fiery darts of Satan, but even the burning arrows of God. Let us lay hold upon that blood, which when God sees, either he will not smite us, or not smite us unto death. Rahabs token of safety for herself and her family, was a red coard tied in the window: this was the instrument of the Spies deliverance, this shall be a sign of hers. Red; this is the saving color: it is not without aptness and significancy, that they set the red cross upon the doors of visited and infected houses, together with [Lord have mercy on us] for if that red cross be thoroughly fixed on our hearts, the Lord will have mercy on us. The destroying Angel sees the door cheeks of the Israelites sprinkled with red, and passes them over. The Warriours of Israel see the window of Rahab died with red, and they save both her and her house from the common destruction. If our souls have this tincture of the precious blood of our Savior upon the walls or windows, we are safe. Under this red flag let us shroud ourselves, and the Justice of God, in the great day of his wrath, will spare us.

The conveniency of the execution follows: the water was not far to fetch; either with danger, as David's water from the Well of Bethlehem, through an army of Philistines: or with labor, as Jacob's water from a deep Well in penetralibus terrae: but near at hand, ready. And if it had been as far as the Center of the earth, the Semidiameter or space from that point to the circumference, which is judged by the most expert to be three thousand five hundred miles: or as far as to the starry firmament; as some have fondly imagined waters above those heavens, to cool them: because the Psalmist speaks of waters above the heavens: whereas those heavens are only the airy regions: yet God could soon have brought it, either up from the one, or down from the other. But the proximity of the Instrument is advantageous enough to the Destroyers hand: for the earth that is to be drowned, consists in the water that is to drown it. Me thinks, this is an Emblem to us of our threefold estate; either as wear mortal men, or militant Christians, or miserable sinners. It is considerable in all these respects.

1. As we are mortal men: our bodies are earth, which consist of humors, as it were in the waters: and while health continues, they have the predominance over those humors, as the earth is out of the waters: but when the humors get the mastery, then follows sickness and mortality. When God had made this earth of nothing, it was but a small matter to make other things of the earth; and as little to bring the earth back again to nothing. Nothing can be nearer nothing than this earth, and yet how little of this earth is the greatest man? Princes are but noble pieces of earth, Politicians but subtle pieces of earth. Man thinks he treads upon earth, that all of it is under his feet: and the brain that thinks so, is but earth, his highest region, the flesh that covers that brain, is but earth: and even the top of that, that wherein so many Absalom's take so much pride, is but a bush growing upon that turfe of earth. How little of the world is the earth? How little of the earth is man? And yet that is all which man hath, or is. How little of a man is the heart? And yet it is all by which he is. And this heart is so hot of it self; that if it had not the lungs as fannes to blow wind upon it, and kindly moisture to cool it, it would soon perish with the own heat: and yet when that moisture grows too redundant, it again drowns the heart. It is not only subject to foreign infections conveyed by others, and intestine poisons bred in ourselves by pestilential sicknesses: but even to an unnatural Flux or abundance of watery humors, that choke it. As moderate water makes the mill go merrily, but too much water will not suffer it to go at all. Our bodies in the world are but pieces of earth on the water: if the winds, and floods, and rain conspire against us, down we fall; as that house whose foundation was in the sand.

2. This may be an Emblem of our militant condition: as the earth consists of the water, and in the water: so we consist out of sin, and in sin. Our beginning is like the worlds beginning: there water covered the face of the earth, and corruption overwhelmed us. The sin of our first parents drowned us; and we were borne soking under that corruption, as the mass of the earth under that inundation. The deep was upon the face of the earth, and darkness upon the face of the deep. Corruption was upon us, and ignorance upon corruption, and pravity upon ignorance, and God's wrath upon all. But as after this congestion, God formed the world: so after this confusion, he hath reformed us. There he recovered the earth from the superinundation of waters, here he hath restored us from the dominion of wickedness. Let the waters under heaven be gathered unto one place, and let the dry land appear: so to us, Let the deluge of sins vanish, and the constancy of grace show it self: there, it was so: here, God grant it may be so. We are both redeemed de profundis: the earth verbo oris, we sanguine cordis. There his Dixit, his Word served the turn: here his blood was but sufficient. Out we are lifted from the water; but not so high as if the water could never more reach us; for we still consist in the water; as out of the water; in the flesh, as out of the flesh. Our head is above sin, as the land is above the sea: but still sin runs like a girdle about our loins, as the sea begins the earth. So to be removed from the water, as never to be touched by it, is the prerogative of the firmament, not of the earth. So to be delivered from sin, as never more to be defiled with it, is the privilege of the triumphant, not of the militant soul. When God had sequestered the earth from the regiment and tyranny of water, yet being unsufferably provoked, he readmitted the water to the first kingdom. The man that presumes he is redeemed from the power of sin, may so offend his Redeemer by sin, that the suppressed waves may return to their first home, as the evil spirit did, with seven worse, to the house out of which he was cast. Thou hast made my mountain strong: but avertisti faciem, thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled: the waters return, sins prevail, and he begins to know himself.

But God hath made us, (though earth) living, moving, rational, holy earth: we resist those waters that are, as Job's wife was to him, Counsellors of evil: we fight against sin, and not seldom are foiled: but our end shall be glorious victory. Though all enemies be not vanquished, yet the Christian Soldier shall be crowned. Yea, God hath delivered some of his Elect from sin, by sin: one extraordinary act of disobedience hath (through his grace of repentance) so broken their hearts, that it hath withal broke the neck of sin in those hearts: as he delivered David from Saul, by Saul: and Noah from the water, by the water: so many converts, from the power of sin, by the remorse of sin. The Spartans were deadly enemies to Rome; and as they were far from wishing them any good, so it grieved them to hear of any light mischance befallen them: as that fire had burnt one of their forts, or that a part of their walls was fallen down by casualty: because then they knew, they would build up those ruined places stronger than they were before: or if that waters had invaded and broke in upon them, they would fortify those dammes and breaches far beyond their former strength. Satan wisheth us all nothing but confusion; that sin, like another deluge, might overflow the whole world, and sweep it all to his kingdom. But when the assaults of sin fail of destroying us, and we thereby take occasion to fortify our Garrisons, to redouble our guard and armor; this more vexeth him, than the other gave him hope. Sin winds about us, as the Serpent about Eve, or as the sea compasseth the earth, watching where it might conveniently get in: here it kisseth the banks with flattering waves, there it swelleth against it with roaring billows: whether by insinuation, or shameless intrusion, Satan cares not so he may have entrance. We are fearfully set in the midst of that raging element; sin is without us, yea, within us: when we offer to go abroad, sin lies at the door: if we open the casement, it is ready to creep in at the window; mors per fenestras. When we walk abroad, sin is a slough before us: keeping home, and reflecting out eyes inward, we find it a puddle within us. Sins are not unlike the Frogs of Egypt; no bed, no board could be free from them: their daintiest Ladies could not keep them out of their bosoms: neither could the Egyptians sooner open their mouths, than they were ready to creep into their throats. There be some places of the Land that want water, there is no man without abundance of sins. It is the Lord alone, that lifts up our heads above the waters; it is his grace, that keeps sin from having a dominion over us. The Poets feigned of Venus, that she was Orta Salo, suscepta Solo, patre edita Coelo; begot of Heaven, borne of the Sea, and entertained on Earth. We may invert it a little, and have a description of man's soul: It is Clausa Solo, vestita Salo, patre edita Coelo: It is housed in Earth, appareled with Sea, but inspired from Heaven: set in the body, defiled with sin, but made by God, and redeemed by Jesus Christ.

3. As we are miserable sinners, subject to innumerable calamities. Miseries, in the Scripture, are often called by the name of waters. Save me from the great waters: The floods went over my soul. Sorrowes compass our whole life, as the Earth is environed with the Sea. Yea, as the Sea is vaster than the Earth, so our happiness is exceeded by our infelicities. Few and evil have been my days, says that Patriarch: he speaks not a word of any good days. Man is of few days, and full of troubles: so full of troubles, as if there was no room for any comforts to crowd in. We say, that the World is made of Sea and Land; as though they were equal parts: but we know, there is more Sea in the Western, than in the Eastern Hemisphere. We say, that the Firmament is full of Stars; as though it were equally full: but we know, there are more Stars under the Northern, than under the Southern Pole. We say, the Elements of man are Miserie and Happiness; as though he had an equal proportion of both: and that the days of man are vicissitudinarie; as though he had as many good days as ill; and as though we lived under a perpetual Equinoctial; Night and Day equal, good and ill fortune in the same measure. But if we put our Happiness into one Ballance, and our Miseries into another, we shall find a mighty difference; this last far out-weighing the former. We drink Miserie, we do but taste of Happiness: we mow Miserie, we do but glean Happiness: we journey in Miserie, we do but walk in Happiness. Yea, which is more, our Miserie is positive, and dogmatical; our Happiness is but disputable, and problematicall. All men call Miserie by the name of Miserie; but Happiness changeth the name, according to the man that either thinks himself, or is thought by others, to have it. There is scarce any Happiness, that hath not in it so much of false and base Money, as that the Alloy is more than the Metall. And what other Touch-stone have we of our Gold, but comparison? Whether we be as happy as others, or as ourselves, at other times? All our felicity, is but like an Island floating in the Sea: it is now in such a Point, in another tomorrow, and the next day may be quite overflowed. Troubles break in upon us from the world, as waters from the channels: God sends down some from above, as waters from the clouds; and still there be undique fluctus. All that will live godly in Christ, shall suffer persecution. Paul, Christ's Attorney, pleads our afflictions with an Oportet: and least some should look for a Dispensation, he backs it with an Omnis. Many are the troubles of the righteous, but the Lord delivers him out of all. Let us take a Paire of Oares, go down to the Water, and there see him deliver Jonah: Though the Waves require him of the Ship, and the Fish require him of the Waves, yet the Lord requires him of the Fish. The members swim, but the Head is above the Waters. Be of good cheare, I have overcome the world.

For Conclusion. When the Waters of the Deluge had done their Errand, and the World was perished, they return. And, as if God had repented himself, he promiseth no more to destroy it with Water. His Word was enough; yet withal, he gives a Sign; which may speak the truth of his Promises to the very eyes of men. I have set my Bow in the Cloud, and it shall be for a Token of the Covenant betwixt me and the Earth. Thus he doth still in the blessed Sacraments, which are as real Words to the Soul.

1. I am not of their mind, that think there was no Rain-bow before the Flood: we may as well say, there was no Bread or Wine before the Sacrament. But now after the Flood, God made the Bow the sign of his Covenant, as he makes Bread and Wine the signs of the Sacrament: both of them were before, but neither of them were signs before.

2. Nor am I of theirs, that think there shall be no Rain-bow forty years before the destruction of the World by fire: because (say they) the Air shall be rarified and prepared, by a continual dryness, for that combustion. But if there be no Rain-bow, then no Rain; if no Rain, then no Fruits; if no Fruits, a grievous Famine; if general Famine, then general sorrow. But it shall be a merry World when Christ comes; as in the days before the Flood, they were eating and drinking, and making Marriages: little suspecting the proximitie of Judgment. There shall be plenty of Fruits, and the Fruits of Plentie; which commonly are Pleasure and Wantonness.

3. Nor do I stand upon the various Colours of it; out of which, they pick mystical significations: As that the Blew and the Red, the watrie and fiery Colours, should betoken the Baptism of Christ, by Fire and Water: Or, the two great Judgments of the World; the one past, which was by Water; the other to come, which is by Fire. These applications be rather prettie than pithie, and savor more of wit than of solid judgment.

4. Thus far indeed we may go, (not with Rupertus, to make it wholly mystical) as together with the sign of a temporal benefit, to conceive a type also of God's everlasting mercy in Christ. There was a Rain-bow round about the Throne: as if God could look no way upon his Church, but through the Rainbow, his blessed Covenant made with us in his own Son: whereby it comes to pass, that all those Lightnings, and Thunders, and terrors, proceeding out of the Throne of his Justice, are allayed by the Rain-bow. And as after the Flood God said, I will look upon the Bow in the Cloud, and remember my Covenant: so though our iniquities provoke him, he will look upon the Rain-bow, his Covenant of Grace, and spare us in Jesus Christ. The Jews, when they see the Bow, go forth and confess their sins, not daring to look upon it with their eyes. We hate Superstition, but I would we could mend our Devotion, and read in that Character the mercy of our God. This he saith, I will remember: alas, he cannot forget it; but he would have us to remember him, by it.

5. In a word, that heavenly Bow is the Pledge of our safety, which even naturally signifies the end of a Shower: all the signs, of God's institution, are natural and significant. I do not yet call it altogether a natural sign, though it agree with the thing it signifies. As the water in Baptism washing the body, hath some resemblance of the spiritual cleansing of the soul. The Rain-bow, as it is ordinarily a sign of fair weather, or of no long Rain: (Some say, in the morning it betokeneth Showers, in the evening fair weather: Aristotle and Pliny write, That it is found wholesome to the Plants and Herbs where it lighteth; giving them a more fragrant and delicious smell:) so is it a convenient sign to portend a privilege from inundation.

6. Lastly, if we observe all circumstances in it, they are arguments of mercy. First, it is a Bow indeed, but a Bow without an Arrow: And what can a Bow do, without a Shaft? Secondly, it is a Bow, and full bent, but without a String: And who fears a Bow, though it be joined with an Arrow, if it have no String? Thirdly, it is a Bow; but, besides that it hath neither String nor Arrow, it is placed (as it were) the wrong way, the Bend or Arch is turned from us. He that shooteth Arrows, holds the back of the Bow from him: but of this Bow both the ends are downwards, and the back toward Heaven: the wrong side is always upwards; as if we shot at God, and not God at us: as if we were ready to send up Arrows of Rebellion against him, rather than he to send down Arrows of Vengeance upon us. Yet let us not be too confident: though God hath hung up that Bow, he hath divers others; he hath a Bow of Fire, as well as of Water: and we do not read, that he hath hung up all them. He hath bent his Bow, and made it ready: with another Bow shall the Lord shoot at the wicked. And if he have laid aside his Bow, yet he hath not hung up his Arrow: He sent out his Arrows, and scattered them: he shot forth Lightnings, and discomfited them: these were terrible Shafts. Arcus habet vulneris indicium, non vulneris effectum: the Bow makes a show of hurting, but it is the Arrow that wounds. Happy are we, if we have a place in the Ark: so shall God's Judgments be to us like a String without a Bow, or a Bow without a String, or both without an Arrow: or, if they all concur, yet his gracious Arm will forbear to shoot: or, if he do shoot, it shall be but a fatherly Shaft: the Ark shall protect us from his vengeance; and whether we live or die, we shall be safe in the Bosom of Jesus Christ.

Whereby the World that then was, being overwhelmed with Water, perished.] Thus far Doctrinally: now to some general observations, partly Historical, partly Moral, altogether useful.

1. The cause of this universal Judgment, was universal Iniquity: The Earth was first Inundata peccato; and then, Inundata diluvio. As a sick man, in his burning Feaver, pants within himself, and by groaning testifies his pangs to others, throws off the clothes, and tosseth from side to side in the Bed, seeking mitigation of his pains: yet whether he does, or does not, his sickness remains; and changing of places, doth not change his weakness, till the cause be examined, and removed. The Mariners in that fearful Storm, being sick of God's anger, as of a violent Feaver, panting with fears, and groaning with prayers, and casting over-board their Wares, as distempered impatient Patients hurl off their clothes; remove from action to action, tremble, pray, unlade, strike fayles, fall to Oares; but all in vain: the Vessel was sick, and had taken a surfeit, when she took in a fugitive Prophet: all the loss of their goods cannot expiate the cause of this Tempest: there is a Morsell that lies indigested in the stomach; throw out Jonah, and all is quiet. The World was sick, heart-sick; as full of pestilent humors as inhabitants, and could recover no health, till God had given her a Potion, a strong Vomite, such a Deluge, that shall spew out her offensive disease. We find Atheists that say, He that doth evil, prospers; such as our Apostle mentions: but Nature it self, which lies closer to a man than the marrow to his bones, cannot but inform him, that the mother and original of all woe, is wickedness. He that is notoriously facinorous, and thinks that in this he pleaseth the gods; hoc ipso primum sceleratus est, because he makes them aut fatuos, aut iniquos: said a Heathen. If his soul will not teach him, yet let him read God in his very body. He hath a mouth, and with that commandeth; let him there read the Sovereignty of God. He hath eyes, and with them he seeth; let him there read the knowledge of God. He hath ears, and with them he heareth; let him there read how God observes and minds all things. He hath feet, and with those he walketh; let that show him the ubiquitie of God. He hath hands, and with them he worketh, and striketh, and revengeth his injuries; let him not deny God so much as God hath given him: The Lord hath a Hand too; and when he pleaseth to strike, a heavy one: Thy hand presseth me sore. Not the hand of Egypt, or Ashur; then were it hand for hand, a Duel of some equality: hand to hand; here forces and stratagems might achieve the victory: but Ma• tua, Thy hand. The weight of a man's blow is but weak, according to the force and pulse of his arm. As the Princes of Midian answered Gideon, when he bade his son try the dint of his Sword upon them: Rise thou, and fall upon us; for as the man is, so is his strength. But, it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of God: As Homer called the hands of Jupiter, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, hands whose praise could not be sufficiently spoken: which some read 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, hands inaccessible, unresistable for strength: all the gods in Heaven could not ward a blow of Jupiter's hand. This hand never strikes, but for sin: and where sin is mighty, his blow is heavy.

General wickedness is like a dreadful Eclipse of the Sun: the darkness is seen presently, the effects follow after; not more slow, than sure. If we feel his blows, let us look back to the Propter quod, our sins. Man suffers for his sins. David may complain of his malicious enemies; They persecute me without a cause: no man could ever challenge God of this; he is provoked every day. Woe were us, if he should strike so often as he is provoked. We are ready to wrap up ourselves in the universal bundle of sinners; and neither think these times worse than the former, nor our forefathers better than ourselves. To confute this opinion, God hath written new Scriptures to us, bloody Characters in our own flesh. Why did he put a drawn Sword into the hand of his Angel, till it became drunk with our gore? Why did he kill us up by thousands every week? Was it without a Propter quod? Shall we call his Justice into question, with, Why hast thou smitten us without a cause? No: he found cause too great in us, to send the Pestilence: he found no cause, but in his own mercy, to remove it.

2. General sins will bring general Plagues; if upon a whole World, much more upon a particular Nation. Rebellious wickedness makes men Out-laws, depriving them of God's protection, and subjecting them to Tyrants, whose very mercies are cruelties. Who gave Jacob for a spoil, and Israel to the robbers? Did not the Lord, he against whom we have sinned? God resisteth the proud; his forces are against them, directed in battle-ray: the wrong was his wrong, the enemies are his enemies, the quarrel shall be his quarrel. Pride and Ryot, in human Policy, may bring a Kingdom to desolation; because they are contrary to providence. But the reason in Divinity is, because they are contrary to repentance: and God punisheth for impenitence, not for impurity. Go to my place in Shiloh, and see what I have done unto it for the wickedness of my people. Go to the old World, and see what he hath done to it: his Justice then, is his Justice now: and if our sins may compare with theirs, what is our privilege?

We hear no noise of War: the most dangerous War comes without a noise. The Turk hath bid himself welcome, where he was sometimes as little looked for. We think ourselves a mighty Nation; whose Bulwark is the Sea, whose confederate neighbors round about are our Centinels: yet forget not Nahums question to Nineveh; Art thou better than popul• No, whose Rampart was the Sea? We have lived in long peace, without interruption, though the year Eightie eight should be blotted out of all Records of Time. And though Peace be better than War, as Croesus said; because in Peace, sons bury their fathers; but in War, fathers bury their sons. And though War be repugnant to the fruitfulness of Nature, yet it is consonant to the direction of Nature; it destroys her numerositie, but preserves her propriety. Yet jam patimur longa pacis mala, we suffer the mischiefs of long Peace; and our estate is not the better, but through security much the worse. Pride is grown up with our glory, like the Ivy with the Oke, to the height.

For our sins, God hath sent a bloody Arrow among us: (Pardon my digression; yea, you need not, the application is fit enough) If we did not perish every mothers son and daughter, by the Pestilence, as this old World did by the Deluge; it was not because we were less wicked, but because God hath been more merciful. If they had betaken themselves in time to that happy ward, Repentance; and first made the Earth flow with their tears; it had not been overflowed with waters. If we had smitten our own breasts with the sorrow of penitential contrition, God had not smitten those breasts with the Spots of a Visitation. He hath not yet done with us: he feels our sins warm still under his Rod, and therefore finds it not time to give us over.

O let us bethink ourselves: Universal Judgments call for universal Repentance: the Land mourns, and shall any inhabitants of the Land be merry? Some do not feel, in their particular, the sharp Wounds of that angry and hungry Sword: Can they be members of Christ, and not feel it through the sides of their brethren? No part of the body can be ill affected, and the whole at ease. Others afflictions must move our affections: as Queen Elizabeth to the afflicted States; Non ignara mali, miseris succurrere disco. Besides, who are they that mourned for the abominations of the time? Not they that committed the abominations: alas, their cheeks were dimpled with laughter. They whose crying sins had pierced the Heavens, and brought down these Plagues; will not cry for themselves: therefore God requires us to cry for them. We must weep with them that weep; yea, weep for them that will not weep. Their excessive Pride, impudent Prophanenesse, beastly Drunkenness, insatiate Covetousness, desperate Sacrilege, dreadful Blasphemy, unclean Luxury, have provoked God's wrath; and we must mourn for them, that will not mourn for themselves. Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel. Although he be offended with the whole Land, yet there be some that he will own for his: he is still Thy God, O Israel. If these do not stand in the breach, we all perish.

There is a time to rejoyce, and a time to mourn: the best actions are not always seasonable, much less the indifferent. He that evermore takes liberty to do what he may, shall offend no less than he that sometimes takes liberty to do what he may not. David persuades Uriah home: but what was his answer? The Ark and Israel are in Tents, my Lord Joab and the Army encamped in the field; and shall I go home, to be merry with my Wife? The Ark of God is fittest to lead our Times: as that is either distressed, or prosperous, we should frame our mirth, or mourning. Is it a time for you to dwell in sieled houses, and my House lie waste? This is the ground of God's just quarrel. If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning: such is the heart of the Saints. As every man is a Limbe of the Communitie, so must he be affected with the estate of the universal Body; whether healthful, or languishing. As it did aggravate David's sin, that while the Ark and Israel were in distress, he could find time to loose the reins to wanton desires and actions: so did it magnify the religious zeal of Uriah, that he abandons allowed comforts, till he see the Ark and Israel victorious. Common dangers or calamities must (like the wrapped motions) carry our hearts contrary to the way of our private occasions. When God was offended, Moses and all Israel grieved, the Princes hanged, the people plagued; yet an Israelite dares bring a Whore of Midian to his Tent. This at any time had been abominable, at that time most execrable. Were they all weeping; and must he even then, in the face of all, run to uncleanness? Was that a time to dally with Strumpets? They both bought it dear. Shall men follow their pleasures, laugh, and sing, and be merry, while God is killing up their brethren by many thousands every week? Is this a time to receive Money, and Vineyards, and Garments? saith the Prophet to his servant. Is this a time to Drink, and Carouse, and Feast, and Play; when so many hearts are bleeding, and all good eyes weeping? They have desperate Souls, that can rejoice and be merry, when the God of Heaven and Earth shows himself so angry.

Before the deluge there were but eight persons, yea, scarce so many, to oppose the wickedness of a whole world: how could it but perish? If the whole nation apostate to lewdness, and there be none to stop the course, how should it look to stand one hour? In Sodom Old and young, all the people from every quarter, given over to villainy: none to resist, but Lot. The whole city came out to send away Christ: not a Gaderen is found, that either dehorted his fellows, or opposed the motion. It is a sign of people given up to Judgment, when no man makes head against the projects of wickedness. Generality of assent is no warrant for any act: common error carries away many; who inquire not into the reason of ought, but the practice. The way to hell is a beaten road through the many feet that walk it: when vice groweth into fashion, singularity is a virtue. If we had not some to strive against the stream of general wickedness, though this paucity prevail not, and to weep because they prevail not; we should cease to be a Church: and ceasing to be a Church, we could not long be a people.

There is great need of mourning, need of great mourning: for heavy Judgments will not be turned away without deep sorrows. As a late Doctor of the Jews seriously expostulates in a relenting letter to one of his fellow-Rabbins; what might be the cause of this so long and desperate a ruin of their Israel: and comparing their former captivities with their former sins; argues, that this continuing punishment must needs be sent for some sin so much greater than Idolatry, oppression, or Sabbath-profaning; by how much this Judgment is more grievous than all the rest: which his fear tells him, (and he may believe it) can be no other but the refusal and murder of the true Messias, the Son of God. We have had many plagues in this land, and the hand of God hath been often heavy upon us for our sins: but as this great pestilence exceeds all the former pestilences, so certainly the sin that brought it, exceeds all our former sins: which our fear justly tells us, and we may believe it, is the contempt of the Gospel of Jesus Christ: for a greater effect could not proceed but from a greater cause. As our sin therefore is more mighty, so our repentance must be more hearty, or we cannot expect the removal of this calamity. Indeed our prayers can never be so loud as our sins: in it self, one sin is able to drown many prayers. But for our comfort; in Christ, one prayer shall drown many sins. O then let us pray and repent, repent and pray, join with them both abstinence, and with them three patience, and with all, faith and obedience, and amendment of life; and the Lord our God shall deliver us.

3. The vicissitude of God's Mercy and Justice in their actions is observable. First, Mercy; as it doth always, begins; giving them an hundred and twenty years warning before their drowning. Such is his special Mercy, to foretell us of ensuing mischiefs. He does not owe us so much: he might take us unprovided. Then he strikes indeed, when he strikes and says nothing. The anger is so much the more, as it is less notified. In the hewing of wood, the blow is not heard, till the edge of the axe be seen to have struck. When God is not heard before he be felt, it is a fearful sign of displeasure. Among men, the still and silent revenges be ever most dangerous. But sure the Lord will do nothing, but he revealeth it to his servants the Prophets. Thus he consulted Moses, and threatened ere he punished. Take Incense quickly, and make an Atonement, for the plague is begun. Wrath is gone out from the Lord; Moses is quick-sighted, and sees it at the first setting forth. As they which are well acquainted with men, know that by their looks and gestures, which strangers understand but by their actions: or as finer tempers are more sensible of the changes of the weather. The faithful are familiar with God, and can descry his Judgments a far off. If another had seen a cloud of a hand breadth from Carmel, he could not have told Ahab that he should be wet. Holy men out of their acquaintance with their Masters proceedings, can foresee punishments. The wise man foreseeth the evil, and hides himself: but fools run on and are punished. We men will not reveal our secret purposes to enemies or strangers. All the favor of the wicked is to feel the Judgment, before they espy it. But shall I hide from Abraham the thing that I mean to do, saith the Lord? Yea, for Abraham's sake, it shall not be concealed from Lot. Noah shall be told of the deluge, to foretell the people. David saw the Angel that smote the people: common eyes saw the botch, the marks and tokens of the plague: his clearer and advanced sight hath spied the Angel, shaking his sword over Jerusalem, and hovering over Mount Zion.

Thus doth his mercy call upon sinners; Prepare to meet thy God. O admirable favor! When God's anger is marching forth against us, that his mercy should step before to tell us; Prepare to meet your God. Before he strikes, he sends his Prophets to us, as Heralds with the conditions of peace, if they may be accepted. That great General gives ut fair quarter; yea, so unwilling is he to spill our bloods, that our penitent yielding shall save us: and therefore he adviseth us to be in a readiness to meet him. If this mercy of our God should not sometimes withhold, often forewarn, always abridge his Judgments, what room were there for us out of hell? But he delighteth in mercy. His mercy being abused, gives place to his Justice, by which the world perished. And then again his mercy succeeds, and the waters bated: as he dealt with us; he heard our unworthy prayers, and the plague decreased. So soon was he weary of punishing, that is never weary of blessing. David prostrates himself at the avenger, and lays his life ready for the fatal stroke of Justice: the posture of an humbled and anguished soul. This the eye of justice took notice of; It is enough: stay now thine hand. How just and easy had it been for God, to have made the shutting of that evening red with blood? But so little pleasure doth the Father of all mercies take in the death of sinners, that his goodness repents him of the slaughter, and calls for that sacrifice wherewith he will be appeased. It was his own pity that inhibited the destroyer: ere David could see the Angel, he had restrained him; It is enough, hold thy hand.

4. At his command, the Heavens did shut up their windows, and the Sea her channels, and it began to be fair weather: yet may not the Ark rest suddarnely. If we did not stay some while under God's hand, we should not know how sweet his mercy is, and how great our thankfulness should be. This was done by degrees.

1. A wind came, and the waters asswaged: not by way of exhalation from the earth, for it was then covered with water: but as it came from an extraordinary cause, so it had an extraordinary effect. Two properties the Scripture ascribeth to the wind. First, to force the waters, as in the division of the red sea. Secondly, to purge the Air, disperse the clouds, and dry up moisture. The North-wind driveth away rain. Otherwise Non solent aquae ventis imminni, sed potiturbari.

2. Noah opens the window of the Ark, and looks out: God doth not reveal all things to his best servants. He that told Noah six score years before, what day he should go into the Ark; does not foretell him when he is entered, what day he should come out. Therefore he sends out his Intelligencers, the Raven and the Dove; which by help of their wings, might easily descry farther than his sight, in that vaporous Air. The Raven of quick sent, of gross feed, of tough constitution. Not that he was sent away for his intemperancy: or, that this was the Raven which afterward fed Elias: these be the ridiculous fables of the Hebrews: but that fowl was the fittest for discovery. Yet the likeliest things do not always succeed: for neither will the Raven venture far into that solitary world for fear of want, nor come into the Ark for hope of liberty: but went and came, to and fro, hovering about in uncertainties. Carnal minds are ready to fly out of the Ark of God's Church, and to embrace this present world: and had rather choose to feed upon the unsavory rubbish of sensual pleasures, than to be restrained within the strict lists of Christian obedience. Then he sends forth the Dove, a fowl both swift and simple: she like a true Citizen of the Ark, returns with faithful notice; first, of the continuance of the waters by her restlessness, and then of their abatement by her Olive leaf. None can stray out of the Ark into the world, but they must receive some aspersion; as Josephus thinks, she returned with foul and dirty feet. The Dove is an Emblem of those messengers, who with innocence in their lives, bring the glad tidings of peace and salvation in their mouths.

3. Noah believes, and rejoiceth at the news; yet still he waits seven days more. It is not good to devour the favors of God too greedily; but so to take them in, that we may digest them.

Some would have been impatient of this delay, and so hungry of the open air, after so long a closeness; that upon the first notice they would have voided the Ark. But wise Noah will stay seven days ere he open, and almost two months ere forsake the Ark; and not then, unless he command him to depart, that bad him enter. Siccata erat terra, quare non exit Noah? He stays for his Nunc demittis. There is no action good without faith, no faith without a word. We are then holy and happy, when in all things we neglect the counsels of flesh and blood, and depend upon the commission of our Maker.

4. He builds an Altar, and offers sacrifice. Ambrose observes, that God did not particularly command this; Ne quasi avarus mercedem gratiae postulet: but certainly he did it not without divine directions. He builds as soon as he is forth; but not an house for himself, but an Altar to the Lord: true faith will ever teach us to prefer God to ourselves. And though he desires mercy before sacrifice, yet he will have sacrifice as well as mercy. Of these few creatures that were left, God must have some: it was a privilege to them, that they were saved from the water, to be offered up unto God in fire. Happy men which find that favor, to be reserved from the common destruction, that they may be sacrificed to their Maker and Redeemer. Noah blessed God for the preservation of all the creatures, both clean and unclean; but he offered only of the clean: our best things are not too dear for the Lord, whose both they and ourselves are.

5. The great Judgments of God have gone off with sacrifice: the plague in David's time, by the burnt offerings in the threshing floor of Arcunah. Aaron with his Incense, stood between the dead and the living, and the plague was stayed. Had he thrust himself in with empty hands, he had not prevailed: but his Censor was his protection. When the fire of God's anger is kindled, our Censors must smoke with fire from the Altar. Every man must pray for the removal of vengeance: much more they whom God hath deputed to mediate for the people. Every man's mouth is his own, but they are the mouth of all. Let the Priests stand weeping between the porch and the Altar; Spare thy people O Lord, and give not thine heritage to confusion. When the world hath poured out all his contempt upon us, we are they that must reconcile men to God, and without us they perish.

6. Lastly, this little fire of Noah, through the virtue of his faith, purgeth the world; and reacheth up to those heavens from which the waters fell, and procures a glorious Rain-bow to appear therein for his security. Which as it is a monument of God's Justice, to remember us of those sins for which the world perished: so is it a Covenant of his Mercy made with man and beast; bound with an oath: I have sworn that the waters shall no more go over the earth: and not depending upon any condition of man's obedience. The Lord smelled a savor of rest. All the sins of the old world were not so unsavory to God, as this smoke was pleasant. If it had not been made, in faith, it had been a stinking sacrifice, like Cain's: now there is no perfume comparable to it. It differs from all sensible saviors: for there may be safety in the most pleasant odors, but God is never wearied with the sweet savor of the prayers of his Saints.

He that was before annoyed with the ill savor of sin, smells now a sweet odour of rest. Behold here a new and second rest, and there was a third following that, and there shall be a fourth to conclude and perfect all. First, when God had done making the world, then he rested. Secondly, when he had done destroying the world, again he rested. Thirdly, when he had done redeeming the world, in the grave he rested. Fourthly, when he shall have done preserving the world, he will rest forever. The first and the third have a resemblance, and the second with the last. God when he had made the world, rested the seventh day. Christ when he had redeemed the world, rested that seventh day: Sabbatizavit in monumento, he kept his Sabbath in the Sepulcher. So when he had destroyed the world with water, he smelt a savor of rest; and that rest from that destruction was to last during the measure of time. When he shall have dissolved it by fire, that rest shall be forever. Even whiles we do not rest or cease from sin, he doth cease from a public revenge: so doth his infinite goodness, swallow up our wickedness. The remainder of my observations on this argument is two moral allusions; how this present state of the world may be compared with that.

1. Calamities are presented to us in the name of waters, and deep waters, and seas of waters. But must we then look to be drowned? Are they boundless, are they bottomless? No, that is not the dialect of God's language: who hath provided a remedy against the deepest water, and that by water: against the Inundation of sin, by the immersion of Baptism: water against water; Littora littoribus contraria, fluctibus undae: and the foulness contracted by the torrent of natural corruption, is washed away by the sacramental Font of regeneration. The first creatures in the world to whom God gave life, were in the waters: Let the waters bring forth: and the only creatures (excepting those in the Ark) to whom God preserved life, were in the waters; the Fishes. At the first, that which had no life, brought forth that which had life; The waters produced the Fishes at the command of God. Therefore though our afflictions be a sea, they are not irremediable: God can give us life in a Deluge of waters; and deliver us, as he did Jonah, out of the depth of the sea. Indeed our miseries are great, if we consider only ourselves. So Gennezareth, which was but a lake, and the waters not salt, yet is called a Sea: they that dwelt there, thought a lake a Sea. The Mediterranean was called the great Sea: they that saw no other, thought a little sea the greatest. We that know not the afflictions of others, call our own the heaviest: every small Current is a Torrent, every Brooke a River, every River a Sea. But that is truly a great water, which overflows the Chanell; and that is really a great affliction, which is above our strength. But the Lord is our strength; and what inundation of sorrows can get above those banks? The rain descended, the floods came, the winds blew, and beat upon the house, and it fell not, for it was founded upon a Rock. What a coile is here? As if Heaven, Earth, and Sea had conspired against one poor Cottage? Take them all, not severally, but with their united forces; yet this foundation stands. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril of sword? What voluminous waves be here, for number, and power, and terror? Yet they shall not separate the Ark from Christ, not a soul from the Ark, not a body from the soul, not a hair from the body. The mountains shake with the swelling of the Sea: secular mountains, men strong in power: spiritual mountains, men strong in grace; are shaken with afflictions: Concussi erunt, non excussi. Affliction is a Sea too deep for us, What is our refuge? God's Ark, that draws four Cubites above the waters, when they were fifteen Cubites above the mountains, God layeth up the depth in store-houses: even his corrections are of his treasure, and he will not waste his treasure: when they have done their service to humble us, he will call them in again. All our water shall run into Jordan, and his Israelites passed over Jordan dry-foot. All our sorrows shall run into the red Sea, the Sea of Christ's blood: and as that red Sea did not hurt an Israelite, so this red Sea shall never drown a Believer. Thus putting to sea, may be a change of life, not of condition: when Saint Paul mentioned his perils, he is briefer in reckoning up those by water, than the other by land. He was a day and night in the deep, and did thrice suffer shipwreck: so much by sea. But by land, his dangers were innumerable; once stoned, thrice scourged, five times bastinado'd, often imprisoned, and almost killed. Even on land we have our risings and falls, calms and cross gales; forewinds but seldom. Yea sometimes, which is worse than any wind that can come, we have no wind at all. But pleasure and security deadning our course by a calm, does us more mischief than adversities cross-gale. Indeed there is some difference: more perish on the Sea by storms than by calms: more perish on the land by calms than by storms: for afflictions, like tempests, make us look to our tackling, Patience; and to our Anchor, Hope; and to our Helme, Faith; and to our Card, the Word of God; and to our Captain, Christ: whereas security, like a calm, makes us forget both our Danger, and deliverer.

2. As troubles be compared to waters, so are pleasures: Stolne waters are sweet. So we distinguish of our lusts; calling them, earthy riches, aiery honors, watery pleasures. Covetousness is a desire of earth, ambition of air, wantonness of water: it is the watrish humor of the soul. To pump a ship, and to shrieve a voluptuous heart, would be an alike noisome excercise. He throws away all his estate upon the riot of his lust; as if a Mariner should throw all his fraught into the Sea: now a Whore and the Sea are two insatiate Devourers. The Devil is the grand Pirate upon the Ocean of wickedness. A Pirate is one plague above those of nature, to make the Sea more terrible, more dangerous. He is called the Merchants Book, wherein he may reckon up his losses: a perpetual Foe to noble traffic; the earthquake of the Exchange: not only robbing men of their goods, but even of themselves, and making them slaves: a desperate Thief, that steals though he be in a prison; and looks every day, by fight or tempest, for execution. The devil is yet worse; for he does not only make slaves of those he taketh, more grievous than the Turkish Gallies; and damage them whom he cannot take; tempting even the best Christians to foul sins: but labors also to sink all to the Abyss, even the bottomeless depth of Hell. Only this Pirate kills more by his Flag of Truce, cunning flattery; than by his thundering Ordnance, and defiance of enmity. He would be Lord of the Sea, as well as Prince of the Air, and god of this World; and promiseth all those that sail under his Colours, a happy Voyage. But when Bion was shown in a Port-City, in the Temple of Neptune, divers Pictures of such as had in Tempests made their Vowes to Neptune, and so were saved from shipwreck: and was asked, Whether he did not now acknowledge the power of Neptune, and the gods? Yes, saith he; these be the shadows of them, that after their Vowes were delivered: but where are they painted, that have been drowned after their Vowes? Worldlings may prosper for the time under this Neptune; as they write of the Witches of Lapland, That they can fell Winds to Sea-men, and buy them of the Devil: But what's the end of the Voyage? Where is the Harbour? Alas, there is no Haven for such, but Hell. No Wind can be that man's friend, that hath no Haven: And yet it is better to have no Haven at all, than eternal destruction for a Haven. Lord, rather cross us with storms, yea, bless us with crosses, than suffer us to steer such a course, to so unhappy a Point. Let our enemies be what they will, so thou be our friend and Pilot, O Jesus Christ!

2 PET. 3.7.

But the Heavens and the Earth which are now, by the same Word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of Judgment, and perdition of ungodly men.

SAtan persuades Atheists that this world is eternal: that there is no other Heaven but what they see: and because they see not Hell, that there is none at all. Through this Imagination, they only labor about the present, and cast off all hope or fear of the future. If they can make good to themselves their condition (and they think it good, if it be pleasant) in this life; for the next, it is no Article of their Creed, no Creed of their heart. Therefore they live like beasts, because they think they shall die like beasts; without any answer for ought they have either acted, or left undone. But the Justice of God teacheth, that there shall be a Day of reckoning, when all the world shall be summoned to one universal Audit, and receive a reward according to their works. To prove this, the Apostle argues conveniently and comparatively: God made the world by his Word, therefore by his Word he can destroy it: and that we may be sure of his power, he hath given us an example or proof; for he hath destroyed it once already: and that we should not doubt of his will, he hath said he will do it. Qui potuit creare, non poterit cremare? His Word does all: by his Word he created it, by his Word he drowned it, by his Word he restored it, by his Word he preserveth it, and by his Word he will burn it.

But the Heavens and the Earth which are now, &c.] Here, first we must look upon the world in the present state, wherein it is preserved: and secondly, then the future condition, to which it is reserved. In the former are two considerations. First, the composition, The Heavens and Earth that are now. Secondly, the reposition, Are kept in store by the Word. In the future state, which is the destruction of the world, we have First, the manner, By fire. Secondly, the time, At the day of judgment. To begin with that axletree whereon the world moves.

The Word of God:] This is indeed the Will of God. At his fiat gave the world being, so his maneat gives it continuance and abiding. For as when he said, Let there be Light and a Firmament; what cares had the Light or Firmament, or any other creature, to hear his Word, if he had pronounced it? The words of the Tempter was Dic, say, command these stones to be made bread: but what capacity had there been in stones to hear his saying? God spake to the fish: what intelligence had the fish to answer him? But as speech is interpreter of man's heart, signifying his secret purposes: so the Lord hath some way, (which, is easy for him to do, not for us to conceive) whereby he imparteth to insensible creatures what his pleasure is. Speech is not of God's nature, but an action of his will: and he that goes without feet, seeth without eyes, reacheth without hands, so also speaketh without a tongue.

Observe we here, what a Divinity there is in the Word of God; how imperious to command, how omnipotent to prevail. One fiat is enough to make that which never was before, or to shape that which otherwise had lain in everlasting infirmity: to establish nature where it is not, or to change nature where it is: to create Angels, Men, Birds, Beasts, Fishes: to store Heaven, Earth, and the deep with innumerable armies of creatures; and to make them bow their knees to their maker, and render unlimited obedience to all his decrees. The believing Centurion, in a suite that dearly affected him, desires not the travel of his feet, nor any receipt of Physic to heal his servant; no not so much as the imposition of his hand, which some had requested; nor coming under the roof of his house; but only a word from his lips: Dic verbum, speak the word only, and my servant shall be whole. Man neither liveth by bread, nor recovereth by physic, but by the Word of God's providence. Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean: voluntas tua opus est: thy will is thy work. I will, be thou clean: as if with the breath of his mouth, he had spoken to the Leprosy, Bee gone: as he afterward spake to the Devils, Bee packing; and they went with a vengeance, as if a whirl wind had driven them. He rebuked the winds and the seas, with far more authority than Peter did Ananias, and with the like success: for he smote the breath from the winds, and the motion from the sea. They not only hear him, but hear him with effect: they go, and run, and stand still, like dutiful servants at his bidding, and live and die at his command.

God hath one voice that is of a sensible sound indeed; smiting the ears and hearts both of men and beasts with astonishment. It maketh the Cedars, and breaketh the Cedars, formeth and quencheth the flames of fire, planteth and supplanteth Forrests, absolveth and dissolveth the World at his pleasure. O ye obsequious Heavens and Earth, how do you convince rebellious man? Hear O Heavens, and give ear O Earth: and Hear O ye Mountains! •he Lord's controversy. The Sun stands still, the Earth cleaves and opens her jaws, Rivers run back, Lions forbear their prey, all at the Word of God, and yet man refuseth to obey it. There be some indeed that will give it the hearing; as a man sees a remote object by his opticke instrument, yet it is not his: so many come to Church, as if they meant to learn the way, and know the Will of God; and so they leave it. Our fathers were more devout than we; for they did what they heard, though it were but the device of man: we hear and do not, though it be the Word of God. They had base metals, but good manners: we have base manners with our good metals. They had their coin of brass, and men of gold: we have coin of gold, and men of brass, or lead, or if there be a courser metal. The abundant waters of the sanctuary have bred two diseases; Curiosity, and Satiety. We are full of honey, and will not hear much: and what does not humor us, we will not hear at all. Indeed Schismaticall Teachers have always the most busy swarms of hearers: so they make the people Idiots, that the people may make them Idols: and we truly say of them, as of Idols; Qui colit, ill facit. But it is not fit that we should leave the Word of God, and listen to fables; as the Apostle said, It is not reason we should leave preaching and serve tables. Let us keep the Word, for the Word doth keep us: yea, as it keeps Heaven and Earth in store; so it keeps us on Earth, in store for Heaven, that we may be eternally blessed.

This is not only a creating, but a preserving word: such a one as reserves Heaven and Earth in store, as if it laid them up in a Treasury: till the great Emperor of the world, who is his own Lord Treasurer, calls them forth to further use. The Peripatetickes housed the Divine providence above the Moon; allowing it no descent beneath that Circle, to intend inferior businesses. The Epicures, by the Relation of Eliphaz, say no less. How can God know? Can he judge through the dark Cloud? He walketh in the Circle of Heaven. Averroes the Spanish Physician, thinks that vilesceat Dei intellectus, if he should mind these lower things. But the Glass is not deformed, because it represents deformities: nor is the Sun defiled by reflecting upon dunghills; nor the Divine Providence vilified by ordering the most contemptible things. His Creation is their Mother, his Providence their Nurse: the one brings them forth, the other brings them up: the one set up the frame of Heaven and Earth, the other keeps it in reparation. That he is the God of the Mountains, not of the Valleys, was a Syrian dream: that he looketh to the greater, and scorneth the smaller employments; is a blasphemous assertion. No, his Providence extends to the feeding of Ravens, to the falling of Sparrowes, numbering of Haires, and casting of Lots. Saul is appointed to the Kingdom of Israel by God, and anointed by the Prophet; yet still he must be designed by Lot: was nor this to leave a certainty, and put it to hazard? No, for of all the Tribes Benjamin is taken: of all the families of Benjamin, Matri: of all the kindreds of Matri, the house of Cis: of all the house of Cis, Saul is chosen to be King. Saul had hidden himself; yet he could not hope that this subducing should disappoint the purpose of God. He that designed his name among the thousands of Israel, (he might well think) could easily find out his person in a Tent, and bring him forth to honor.

As the same Word of God that made the Angels, made also the little Wormes: so the same Word again that preserves the stars in heaven, preserves also the very dusts of the earth. Nec laborat in maximis, nec fastidit in minimis. The moving of all those glorious Orbes is no more to him, than the setting of a fly upon her wings. The whole world is but a Ball in his hand, which he turns about at his pleasure: and when he will, he can throw it into the fire. He keeps them in store: without his Providence they could not subsist, not stand a day; but fall like an Infant, when the Nurse puts it from her bosom. Indeed he does thesaurizare, sed ad ignem; treasure them up, but for the fire: as the wicked do reponere thesaurum, sed in vindictam, treasure up wrath against the day of wrath. But till that appointed day, he does conserve them in their pristine state: and though our intolerable sins would soon ruin the world, yet for the Elects sake the time is prolonged, and for the Elects sake the days shall be shortened. As a Monarch sustains even a city of rebels for a time, which otherwise would perish; but at last sets it on fire. Well yet, to that day it is laid up as a Treasure: now if God be so provident over heaven and earth, what is his respectfulness of man for whom he made them? He that is so rich in goodness, and in the communication of that goodness, as to feed the Birds, and cloth the Lilies; will he neglect us and ours? We and our Children are the household of God: and will not that great Master and Father of the whole family in heaven and earth, provide for us? If a man provide not for his own, he hath denied the Faith, and is worse than an Infidel. We are certainly more precious than Fowls or Flowers, yet the Lord cares for them. Will the householder take care to water the herbs of his garden, or to fodder his cattle; and suffer his men and maids to famish through hunger and thirst? Or will he provide for his men and maids, and let his own children starve? I know there is a double difference, between his keeping of heaven and earth, and his provision for us.

1. They are insensible things, and obey only by natural instinct; as we move a stone, which otherwise would lie still. We have life, sense, reason, and natural abilities, to work together with his Providence. Therefore he enjoins us means, and would not that the works of his wisdom should be idle. He can save without means, but he hath told no man that he will: he hath told every man, that (ordinarily) he will not. When the Centurion believed the Master of the ship more than Saint Paul, they were all exposed to a great danger: that was a preferring of the means before the Author of the means. But as it is little short of Atheism, to use God only for a shift, and at second hand, when our own powers fail: so it is no less than sluggishness to thrust all our business wholly upon him: as if we were masters, and might sit idle; while he like a servant, must do all our works for us. We must not look to be fed as the young Ravens, without sowing: nor to be clothed as the Lilies, without spinning. God works upon the Clouds, and we must work upon the clods; or expect no fruits.

2. They are stored up for destruction, God hath set us apart for Salvation. Indeed the heavens and earth shall pass through a refining by fire to their original purity; and we must pass through death, our changing, to the perfect Glory. Now, he that is the keeper of these, is much more the Preserver of man. When we were enclosed in the womb, he took care that we should not be stifled in darkness, nor borne an abortive and untimely fruit: he planted love in our parents hearts to provide for us, milk in our mothers breasts to nourish us, strength in their arms to bear us, and vigilancy in their eyes to watch us. He gave them ears willing to hear our cries, compassionate hearts to pity our wants, providence to lay up portions for us. He made this great House for man; Heaven for his Parlour, the Air for his Hall, the Earth for his Kitchen, furnished with all necessary Viands; and the Sea for a Cistern to serve it with water, not without Fire for a Chimney, and the Sun for a window. Thus was man priùs ornatus, quàm natus: cui Deus benefecit, antequam fecisset. For if God had given him life, before he provided him living, he had entered upon want; and this stood not with the riches of his Maker. If he had given him life and living, without comfort and happiness in them, he had fallen upon misery, and that did not become his Creators mercy. Therefore in those six days did he make a Magazin of provision for him, that should last to the end of the world. And for this purpose he useth these Creatures; Quasi imperans, non quasi mendicans. He employeth these instruments, non indigentiae, sed indulgentiae causâ. The very hairs of our heads are all numbered: The least things that concern man. Things that be numbered, are therefore numbered, that none of them should be lost. He says not, They shall be numbered; but They are, long ago: not some of them, but All: not covered, but numbered: not the days of our life, but the hairs of our head: if a hair do grow on our head, it is the Gift of God; or if a hair fall from our head, it is the will of God. Now he that numbers our hairs, what account doth he make of our souls? Illi sollicitiserant de animabus, Christ secures them de capillis. Thus hath he stored up heaven and earth, but their end is to be burned: he hath treasured up us for a better heaven, wherein we shall be blessed.

To borrow an application from the Metaphor, which is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 the Apostle speaks of a Treasury; let us all be treasurers; not of gold, or Jewels, or riches: these shall perish with the world, because they be laid up in the world, and belong to the world. Death like a severe Porter, shall examine all men at the gate, as they go out of the world, and not suffer them to carry one penny along with them: nothing they brought in, and they shall carry out nothing. The Spaniards never so narrowly examined the poor Moors, when they drove them out of their Kingdom. Nabal of his three thousand sheep which he shore in Carmel, could not bear one lock of wool with him to the grave: nor the rich man out of his enlarged barns, one straw toward the making up of his pallet: nor the other Churl, out of all his Cellars & Fountains, one drop of water to cool his tongue: nor Croesus, out of his abundant treasury, one broken fragment of coin, not an end of gold or silver. Wealth is but like unto words; by imposition, not natural: for commodities are but as they are commonly valued: and in the next life they bear no value at all. The space of human life how short soever, is the utmost extent of the use of worldly riches. As all Principalities have their limits, and kings are but chief in their own Dominions: so Pecunia, the worlds Queen (I mean, that worlds, whereof the Devil is king) extends her regiment but to the brim of the Grave, and is not currant one step further. Or if it had any validity afterward, yet it might not be suffered to pass: men may beguile the Law that forbids them to carry coin out of the kingdom; but God will admit none with coin into his Kingdom. Well then, there is another Treasure, which we may carry with us, and be welcome: of this death cannot hinder us, and with this Angels shall receive us. Good works are a Treasure, and they do follow us. Good Prayers are a treasure, and they go before us. Good Faith and Hope are a treasure, and they go with us. Works follow; Blessed are they that die in the Lord, for their works follow them. Prayers precede, Lord Jesus receive my spirit: Thy Prayers are come up for a memorial before God. Faith does accompany, To day shalt thou be with me in Paradise. The Graces of God are called Talents; if we improve them to his use, we make them our treasure. If a Traveler bear treasure in bullion, or in a wedge of gold, and have none coined into currant monies, his treasure will not defray his charges, as he goes. All our knowledge, and whatsoever ability, is God's Gift; and that Gift is treasure in the Nature of it: but it is not currant money in the use of it, except we get nearer and nearer to heaven, our home by it. Good works are the improvement of Grace, and that is the treasure which will pass currant in heaven: For God will reward us according to our works. Our Conversation is in heaven: it is there already to entertain us when we come. Lay up for yourselves Treasure in Heaven: this is a treasure, which when the earth is on fire, shall not be burnt with it: for that fire shall but consume the Elements; but this is above the Sun and stars, in the Repository of Blessedness, the gracious hand of JESUS CHRIST.

But the heavens and the earth which are now, &c.] Weak Philosophers easily become wicked Atheists: If the Scripture do not in all circumstances jumpe with their Plato and Aristotle, they will believe Aristotle and Plato against the Scriptures. It is the madness of vain man, by his own line, to measure the works of God: as if a blind man should not believe there is a Sun, because he cannot see it. Out of this black and tetricall vault, the Devil breathes forth those pestilent damps; quarrels and wranglings against the Divine truth. As, How could the world be destroyed with water? Grant that the earth was overwhelmed, yet what is this to the world? The heavens remained still untouched. Yet even their own philosophy might teach them to distinguish of the heavens. There is an airy heaven, as well as the starry: and so far this deluge might well extend. For the earth, it was not only at the first covered with water, but with water it is still cimented. And the air doth challenge the name of heaven: so God is said to Cover heaven with Clouds, and to thunder out of heaven: and the Cataracts of heaven were opened, when the Clouds poured down, whilst all the winged inhabitants of the air, and mortal dwellers upon the earth (saving those in the Ark) perished; what, can they say, became of the world?

Some would have the water, a kind of Principium from which other things were derived; and observe it from the very Etymology of Aqua, à qua sunt omnia. People and Multitudes are called by the name of waters. The Primum mobile, which they call the Chrystaline heaven, appears, either as if water were congealed into Crystal; or through the diaphanous transparencie of it, did represent Water as clear as Crystal. The Blessedness of Heaven is called, a Pure River of Water of Life, clear as Crystal. Such is the excellency of Water, and necessary Concurrence to all Elementarie things: Yet was this God's Instrument to destroy the world. What force is there then in Nature, to cherish and conserve the world, when the seed and matter of it own destruction is wrapped up in it? That which cannot stand by the own power, must be upheld by another's; and must it not then needs fall; when the Supporter lets go his manutenencie? Now what perpetuity, O Atheist, canst thou find in that whole, whose parts are so flexible.

1. The heavens and the earth.] The earth is indeed a muddy, sordid, and feculent place, the receptacle of all corruption: well may that perish. But the heavens are pure, bright, ceruleous, sublime, and refulgent; why should so glorious and magnificent a Machine suffer? The earth is but the Nurse of our mortal bodies while they live, and their grave when we die: when there is no more use of her office in that ministration, let her be dissolved. But heaven is full of beauty and solace; and though we shall dwell far above these airy or starry regions; yet it cannot but be some delight to look down upon these inferior objects; and to see that become now our pavement, which was once our seeling. Though the Presence-chamber of the King be most stately and sumptuous; yet his Courtiers disdain not to look into the public hall. Why then should the heavens, so rich and illustrious a Creature, be exposed to this last fire.

Yes, for whatsoever was created for man, was infected by the sin of man: and it is necessary, that this conflagration should reach as far, as did the former corruption. The heavens, Sun, Moon, and stars, though they did not fall under so deep a curse as the earth, yet were all blemished with man's fall. Even these must also be purged; and the means by which God will reduce them to their original integrity, is by fire: It is not then pity that this goodly frame should be dissolved; whether we respect the Maker, the creatures, or men for whom they were created. For God; he was dishonored in their contamination; therefore it is fit he should be honored in their repurgation. That infinite Majesty, who is Purenness it self, will not suffer the least out-room belonging to his Palace or universal Court, to remain unclensed. For themselves, this loss shall redound to their gain: for there shall not be an abolition, but a restitution of them: Nothing shall they lose, but what they may well spare: that substance and perfection which they received from their Creator shall abide: only the defects and blemishes which they had from us, shall be done away. We intend not the perishing of our Ore, when we refine the Gold from the dross. In respect of men, they may well vanish: for the good have a better place, and the wicked deserve a worse. These latter are but rebels, and therefore must be laid up in prison, or the place of execution: the other are God's loyal Subjects, and shall dwell with him in peace forever.

Seeing that sin had so contagious an extent, as to reach unto the very Heavens; well should the remorse of it reach unto the bottom of our hearts. Whither can we turn our eyes, and not read the Characters of our own transgressions? If we look downwards, we read them in the barren and cursed earth: every Thistle may sting us, and every Thorn be a prick to our consciences: Praesentemque refert tibi quilibet herba reatum. If we look inwards, there we find a depraved soul, a mortalized body: every error and distemper in either of them, may well represent unto us the force of this fatal infection. If we look outwards; the creatures groan under the burden of our vanity, they labor to shake off the yoke of servitude; and tell us to our faces, we are their bloody and cruel masters. If we look upwards, the Sun blusheth at our impiety, the Moon looks pale with fear of our imminent vengeance: the Air is troubled with our murmurings and blasphemies. They are sacrilegious fools, that offer to read men's destinies in the stars: but they are ignorant and careless souls, that do not read their own iniquities in the stars. That were a strange pestilence, which could send the infection to a remote country, over the seas: but there is no plague so malignant as sin; that could disperse the contagion through the vast Air, make it pierce through the Clouds, and stick pestilential spots upon the very Heavens. The Heavens do not more send down their kindly influence to the earth, than the earth doth send up her unthankful corruption to the Heavens. The son hath just cause to lament his fathers treason, when he looks upon the ruins of that goodly Manor, wherein he dwelt, and whereof he is disinherited. Let us cast our eyes which way we will, we cannot but behold the lothesome marks of our sins. Well may we say with David, My sin is ever before me: that leaf of the Book was always open. We may give it a kind of ubiquity or infiniteness, as that royal Prophet ascribes to God: Whither shall we fly from the presence of sin? If we should compass the Earth, in every nooke and corner of it we find sin: not our fields and houses, our beds and boords, scarce our Temples, are without sin. In our walks, sin meets us: if we dig, we turn up sin. When we view the desolate footsteps of war, we say, The enemy hath been here: no less may we say of every foot of ground we tread upon, Here hath been sin. If we fly on the wings of the morning to the uttermost seas, we descry sins in greater multitudes, than either fishes in the Maine, or sands on the shore. In the day we see Clouds of sins, In the darkness we stumble upon sin. If we could ascend up into Heaven, there we behold the dear Son of God that died for our sin: Could we look into Hell, there be millions tormented for sin. Sin hath possessed our reins, and covered us in our mothers wombs. There is not a point of the compass to which we can turn our faces, but our sin is ever before us. Shall the Hypocrite hide his sins, as Rachel sate upon her fathers Idols? Alas, Heaven and Earth shall discover them, in their contracted stains. But what should we do to cleanse them from this pollution? The Heavens are high; what instruments of man can reach them?

Yes, we have two helps, whereby we may do somewhat towards the purging of the Heavens. Both the breath of our faithful prayers, and the dew of our penitent tears, hath a cleansing quality. Elias opened Heaven by his prayer, and by his prayer David purged the same Heaven from that infection: The prayers of the Saints are sweet odors and Incense, perfuming Heaven and Earth. Let them rise up like pillars of smoke, and mountains of Myrrh; till they pass through the Clouds, the airy regions, the Sun and Stars, and present themselves before the gracious Throne of Jesus Christ. The sighs of a broken heart are like pleasant suffumigations from the hills of spices. Our tears have no less virtue: and against the force the course of nature, they rise upwards, and besprinkle Heaven it self. Mary stooped down when she wept, because Heaven was then upon earth: the drops of our contrition mount aloft, because earth is now in Heaven: even Christ, whose body was made of earth, in the glory of his Father. This happy moisture, if it cannot purify the Heavens, yet can wash our souls; so that Heaven will not disdain to receive us. Our tears are the Sea, a good Conscience the Vessel, Faith the Wind, Charity the Sails, and good Works the Oares whereby we sails unto Blessedness. The Israelites went about by the dry wilderness, yet they must cross Jordan, before they enter into Canaan: certainly, our shortest cut to Heaven is by water; I mean, by our tears. Yet still so far is the sickness of the world, taken by our sin, beyond any Physic that we can minister to it; that nothing but the extreme fire shall be able to purge it.

2. The Heavens and the Earth:] Why not the Water also? Shall that escape only in this universal confusion? Shall the water be too hard for the fire? Or shall that flame only work upon the Earth with her fruits, upon the Heaven with his Elements, and not upon the Sea with his floods? Yes, Etiam in aquam grassabitur ignis. As when the Angel poured out his vial upon the great River, Euphrates, the water thereof was dried up: Or, as the fire that came down from Heaven, at Elijah's sacrifice, licked up the water that was in the trenches: so this supernatural fire shall consume the vast Ocean; and his deep bottom shall be but the great harth of a chimney for this general combustion. The Apostle mentions not the water, as being comprehended under the terms of Heaven and Earth: and this burning shall be more conspicuous in the Air and Earth, than in the water.

Seeing the Earth shall be dissolved, Why do we seek so greedily to ram and cramme our desires with it? Worldlings think that their houses shall continue forever, and their dwelling places to all generations, and therefore call their lands after their own names: They do but think so: alas, when the Earth perisheth, What will become of their habitations? Doth Peter talk of Tabernacles on Mount Tabor; the glory whereof was scarce to last an hour? A weak old man leaning upon his weaker staff, does not trust his whole weight upon it, lest it mock his vain confidence with a fall. Miserable is that souls condition that rests upon this worlds supportation. When we would disperse a swarm of Bees, we throw up dust amongst them: all the imaginations of political worldlings are scattered abroad and extinct with a handful of dust: the grave shall afford them Earth enough. Isocrates compared Athens to a fair Curtesan, with whose beauty every man was taken: they would all know her as a Mistress, but not one of them would accept her for his wife: They would fain enjoy her beauty, but not be clogged with her levity. Every man thought himself too good to be her husband; to be her Paramour, none was good enough. Wherein he taxed the inconstancy of that famous City; which having lifted men up to the highest pitch of honor, would instantly hurle them down again to the depth of ignominy. Such a whore is the world: we are caught with her painted fairness, and long to lie with her: but we know her false-heartednesse, and count him a fool that marries her. Do we see a covetous Earth-worm, denying cherishment to the poor, to his family, to his own bowels, to his own soul? there is a fool married to a whore. Do we see another swollen with the Dropsy of ambition, doting more on popular honor, than on virtue and goodness? there is a fool married to a whore. Agrippa came into the Judgment seat, with great pomp: the Greek is, with great fantasie: all the pomp of the earth is but a mere fancy. A Philosopher said, that Athens was a pleasant City to travel thorough, but not safe to dwell in. We may make some use of this world in our journey or pilgrimage; but if we purpose to inhabit here, death and fire will say No to that. We shall at last think of this world, as that Harbinger answered a noble man complaining that he was lodged in so homely a room: You will take pleasure in it, when you are out of it: The remembrance of those troublesome vanities shall not a little add to the felicity of our peace in heaven: Olim haec meminisse juvabit. Socrates was wont to observe, that the argument of Tragedies was the death of Tyrants and bloody Princes: and that none of the Poets ever presented a hog to be slaughtered on the stage: common persons are not noted; but the fall of Princes is humanae gloria ludibrium, the mockery of all mortal glory. Lysimachus noting what power Lamia the Curtesan had with Demetrius King of Macedon, and that by her instigation he did many unjust and cruel acts; said, That it was the first time, that ever he knew a whore play in a Tragedie. But as a whore is the tragedy of the world, so the world it self is a whore in all the tragedies of the sons of men. The goods of the unjust shall vanish with a noise, like a great thunder in rain. The air is troubled, lightnings fly about, the thunders rend the clouds; and now every man leaves the field, and seeks for shelter: but when the storm is over, what remains of all this terror, but a little dirt composed of earth and rain, which men tread under their feet? Great and rich men make such a noise in the world: what with the bravery of their followers, the acclamation of their flatterers, the adherence of their confederates, and the imperiousnesse of their humors, they keep such a thundering, as if they would confound nature it self: Tarry but a little, and death comes down upon them in a shower: then all this noise is husht, and their glory turned into dirt. O then Lay not up treasures for yourselves upon earth: You may lay up for your children; that is providence: you may lay up for the poor; that is charity: but lay not up for yourselves, for that is a vain confidence. Why should we love a sluttish and vanishing earth, that have an eternal heaven prepared for us by Jesus Christ?

3. The heavens and the earth.] Why not the highest Heaven? why not hell also? No, for the sin of man never reached so high as heaven. The Angels indeed fell there, and fell from thence: but man's sin extended not so far. The Court and Throne of God is pure, and needs no purging. And for hell, there is fire enough already; a tormenting flame, never to be put out with any inundation of tears. Both these places are to remain for everlasting, without any change. This fire shall only work upon mortality and corruption; upon heaven and earth, with all things contained in them, saving only those, which God hath redeemed with the blood of his own Son.

Seeing this world shall pass away, but Hell abides forever, it is a mad improvidence, of all places, not to take heed of that. Could our misery last so long as our life, and our life so long as the world, yet all were terminable in time: but what shall put an end to Eternity? The longest life must die: the Stag falls, the Raven vanisheth, the Oak withers; and could a man reach to the years of Methusalah, yet he must yield to the necessity of Nature: yea, Nature it self is subject to a final change: time shall abolish all, and this last fire shall abolish time: But hell is an ever-dying life, an ever-living death. If there might be any end of those torments, though after so many millions of years, as there are drops in the Sea, or dusts upon earth, or as there have been moments of time since time began; it would be some comfort to the damned: But eternity is intolerable, infinite eternity breaks their hearts. Indeed, Eternity is the very hell of hell. If those punishments were no greater than the stinging of Ants, yet eternity is enough to make them intolerable. The present sense of their pain is grievous; but the endlessness of it is their desperation: to think that after so infinite a space, they shall be as far from either end or ease, as they were the first day of their beginning! There is no calamity in this life, but either reason, or time, or hope of end may qualify it: but all comfort is excluded, where the suffering can never be concluded. What shall we call it? Life? why then does it kill? Death? why then does it not kill? There is neither life nor death, but hath some good in it: for in life there is some ease, and in death an end: but hell hath neither end nor ease. Of death it hath the torment, without any end: of life it hath the continuance, without any ease. All that is good, whether in life or death, God hath taken away: the residue he hath mixed together, and thereof composed that fearful cup of vengeance. Yet alas, many men so live as if they were never to die, and so die as if they were never to live again. O sinner, thy life is short, the worlds is not long, but hell is eternal: of whose torments there is no cessation, and from which there is no redemption. Thou canst not have a Redeemer in hell, One thou mayest have upon earth: make him thine own while thou livest, that thou mayest escape that dismal place when thou diest.

Again, seeing these lower heavens must vanish, but there is a Heaven of eternal joy, unto which corruption never could, never shall extend; why do we not unite all our powers to the attainment of it? who would build upon a quagmire, that might build upon Marble or Crystal? Or place his hopes in a Region destined to fire, that might have an inheritance above the danger of mutability? If the joys of this world were durable, yet are they not perfectly pleasant: if they could be truly pleasant, yet they cannot be durable still, duration is the accomplishment, whether of pleasure or pain. The perpetuity of that heavenly Crown is the Crown of assurance. The infiniteness of that Glory were not enough to make us happy, without the Everlastingness: For the more sweet it is to be enjoyed, the more grievous it would be to be determined. The very thought of ending, would abate the comfort of possessing. But eternity does not add more continuance, than contentment to this happiness. What can we find in this life, but wanting and wishing; from whence arise those two tortures of the mind, hope and fear? We rejoice in health; an Ague shakes us: in honor; an affront crosseth us: in riches; a night robs us: in friends; a trifle bereaves us: in peace; a rumour disquiets us: in the Sun; a cloud debarres us: in the favor of Princes, a frown dejects us: in long life, and death a thousand ways disappoints us. O vain soul, to fixe upon that, which is subject to man, which is subject to death, which is subject to time, which is subject to the last fire! The earth is harrowed with war, countries over-flown with water, cities demolished with fire, the sea enraged with storms, the clouds hurried with winds, the air troubled with thunders: none of all these come near heaven. There is no noise, but the songs of Saints and Angels, but the shouts of praises; nothing but tranquility and eternal Comfort within those blessed doors. There, O Christ, establish us in thy rest forever.

4. The heavens and the earth that are now.] Now, why, are they not the same that they were before? Is there another heaven, another earth, than those that God made at the first? No new creation hath abrogated the old: I do not think, there was a mountain lost upon earth, much less a star in heaven, by the deluge. The Orbes keep their courses, the Stars their motions, the Sun knows his rising, and the Moon her going down: They all continue this day according to thine Ordinances, for all are thy Servants. The earth retains her steadfastness, because thou hast established it: One generation passeth, and another cometh, but the earth abideth forever. When God promised the seasonable vicissitude of cold and heat, Winter and Summer, Seed-time and Harvest, day and night, after the Flood; this was no new thing; but only that he had ordained from the beginning, and which had been suspended during that great Inundation. Why then doth the Apostle seem to make a difference between the former heaven and earth, and the present? I answer, that he does not ascribe to the world another being, but another condition: nor does he intend to oppose substances (there being an Identity) but the several states of the same substances. The world then perished by water, now it shall be dissolved with fire: here is no opposition between world and world, but between destruction and destruction.

The Conclusion we may gather from it, is this; The world is not eternal, because it hath suffered, and is still subjected to ruin. All Creatures are of their own Nature prone to decay; whatsoever was made of nothing, may be reduced unto nothing. Not the souls of men, not the Angels of heaven are exempted; they all move upon the same poles, they bend to the same Center. And if they were not made immortal by preservation, their Nature could not keep them from sinking to annihilation. Only that is Eccentrique, which was never made: that light, which is the very emanation of the light of God, in which the Saints shall dwell; that Garment, with which they shall be apparel'd; that glory, which we can imagine, but not demonstrate: only that bends not to this Center, Ruin. That which was not made of nothing, is not in possibility of annihilation. All other things are concentrique: there is one common Center to them all; Decay and Ruin. The heavens contain the earth, the earth contains cities, cities contain men: this is Nature's nest of boxes; and they are flexible to fate, made to be changed, and there is a time appointed for their permutation.

Seeing the world goes round, and all things it contains, follow that circular and changeable condition, Why are we inamour'd of it? It is but like a bullet shot from a Piece of Ordinance; that runs and danceth on the ground; which when the ignorant Soldier thinks to take up with his hands, it knocks out his brains. The best of it, is but vanity; the worst, vexation. The very pleasures of it are as a smoky fire in cold weather, whereof the smoke is more noisome than the heat is comfortable. If he that built thy house, should come again after divers years, and upon a review of it, assure thee that it will suddenly fall, wouldest thou not depart from it, to save thine own life? Behold, he that made the world, and is best able to survey the present state of his own workmanship, forewarns us of the imminent ruin: are we so stupid, that for love of these forbidden vanities, we will suffer it to fall upon our heads? He loves Gold dearly, that will run into a room on fire, to fetch it out. What is there in the world, whose center is not Decay? Take the pride of it, which is Greatness; the Preeminence of man over men. What can be wanting to a Prince, which the earth may afford? The confluence of all pleasures, of all riches, waits upon the hand of Sovereignty. Yet alas, what stability is there in earthly greatness? Dionysius the second was Lord of four hundred ships, had an Army of an hundred thousand foot, and nine thousand Horse, besides the richest Magazine or Penuary of any Prince in the world; yet he lived to see himself dethroned, his sons cruelly butchered, his daughters first ravished, and then massacred, all his Allies one way or another destroyed. How mighty was the honor of Haman in the Persian Court; What could not he do with the King, with the State? When the Sun shines upon the Dial, every Passenger will be looking at it. There needs no command of reverence, where the King is pleased to countenance. All knees will bow alone even to forbidden Idols of honor: How much more where royal authority enjoins obeisance? Yet is this lofty man advanced fifty foot higher; and (which aggravates the vexation) is hanged on his own Galhouse. One hour hath changed the face of the Persian Court: and he, to whom all knees bowed in the morning, as more than a man; now hangs up like a despised Vermin, for a prey to the Ravens. Mordecai, that was in the morning destined to the Galhouse, before night rules over Princes: and Haman, that in the morning ruled over Princes, is a spectacle of shame on the Galhouse. Oh the vanity of worldly honor, that mistress of fools and mad men! Haman was not the first that fell from such an height, nor is the last. Many an one hath sped no otherwise; to borrow the (not common) words of an English Poet:

—Having done what he can

To work himself into a glorious man:

All's but an exhalation to best eyes:

The matter spent, and then the fools fire dies.

A Gallant goes to some public Duel or tourneament, accompanied with music, many friends, and encouragements: But when he is beaten and wounded by the adversary champion, home he returns solitary and forsaken, in shame and silence. When the May-pole is first set up, there is dancing, and shouting, and rejoicing about it: after a while, boys defile it; and when it is blown down with the wind, they cast it into the fire, and burn it. The world goes round, and all things in it, follow the same motion: At first it was in the hands of plain dealing Laborers and Husbandmen: then was it seized on by tyrants and men of might: From them it was devolved into the dition of Princes: Soldiers and Warriars then invaded it, and it was usurped by Emperors: Indulgent Emperors resigned it into the fingers of Church-men, the Popes challenge it: Now the greater part of it is fallen into the clutches of Lawyers; and who shall get it from them again, is yet uncertain: but round it must go; this is certain. The Sun doth not more duly run his course, than do all things under the Sun. The conditions of men are but as the Spokes of a Wheel; which sometime turns up Prince, and sometime Peasant; now Wise man, and then Fool; today Rich man, tomorrow Beggar. Still it goes round, and changeth, and we change with it; until that universal change of all things shall determine it, in the great Day of Jesus Christ.

Are kept in store: Ad verbum, Are treasured up. The Word of God is a kind of Treasury, out of which He bringeth all his Works. He bringeth the Wind out of his Treasuries. He layeth up the Depth in Storehouses. The Lord shall open to thee his good Treasure, the Heaven to give thee Rain. Hast thou entered into the Treasures of the Snow? Or seen the Treasure of the Hail? Through his Commandment the Treasures are opened, and Clouds flee forth as Fowls. The Winds, the Clouds, Snow, Hail Rain, Lightning and Thunder; all pass under the name of his Treasure. Even his very Judgments are his Treasure: Saint Paul calls his Patience and Goodness, His Riches: and those punishments wherewith He scourgeth the wicked, His Treasure: for they treasure up wrath unto themselves. And although his Riches be greater, than his Treasure, and He delighteth in Mercy more than in vengeance: yet properly a man's treasure is the best part of his riches. If men despise his Riches, He will open his Treasury: for He that is rich in Mercy, is not poor in Justice; both being infinite in that infinite Essence. Men commit sins by pieces and snatches, like broken fragments of coin: God gathers all these together, lays them up in store, and seals them up among his Treasures. Mala quae facit homo, servat ei Deus, depromenda in tempore suo. Ditescimus bonis Divinis, & Deus quodammodo ditescit peccatis nostris: the Mercy of God makes us rich with his blessings, and we (after a sort) make the Justice of God rich with our sins.

Seeing that for the sins of men, the Heavens are treasured up unto fire, and even those sins be also a kind of treasure, enriching God with fit matter for the execution of his Justice; let us all break them off by a seasonable repentance. Many men make a cursed treasure: as the Apostle chargeth rich worldlings; that they hoard up wrath with their wealth, and pain in the midst of their coin: This last fire shall melt their coin, and consume their wealth: but their sin and their pain remains treasured up forever. Why should a man desire to be rich in woes, or to abound with torments? No man ever counted dirt a treasure: Is there any mire so filthy as sin? Are we so foolish, to make much of that, which procures destruction? We think sin a pleasure, and sorrow a troublesome copesmate: indeed Sorrow is no good Fellow, no boon Companion, therefore few desire to meddle with it. But at the last, we shall find our sins the greatest troubles, vexing our souls, and gnawing our consciences: but our tears and sorrows are such a treasure laid up in the storehouse of Mercy, that we shall be infinitely rich in comfort and glory.

Reserved unto fire.] The various questions concerning this conflagration of the world, wherewith the Schoolmen have troubled their own heads, but not satisfied others, I omit as impertinent and unprofitable. Only concerning the power of fire something would be said. Even natural fire works ad ultimam potentiam, so long as the matter lasts: but this fire shall be of another nature, even of a nature (if I may so speak) above nature. Do they say, the Heavens are not exustible? How then be spirits and souls, made of a purer nature, subject to torment in the fire of Hell? The Prophet saith, Tophet is prepared of old: the Judge of men and Angels saith, Go ye cursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the Devil and his Angels. If with fear, and without curiosity, we may look upon those flames; Why may we not attribute a spiritual nature to that more than natural fire? Though spirits have nothing material in their nature, which that infernal fire should work upon: yet such is the powerful Judgment of that Almighty Arbiter of the world, justly willing their torment, that he can make spirits most sensible of those fiery tortures: and such is the obedible submission of their created nature, that they may be immediately wrought upon by those appointed pains. The spirits of living men are incorporeal, yet how great a sorrow may they conceive to be imprisoned in a loathed and painful body? And may not then mere or separated spirits of Angels or men be held as easily in those direful flames, and be tormented with the insufferable horror which ariseth from the place, whereto they are everlastingly confined? We may distinguish of fire, as it is it self, a bodily creature, and as it is an instrument of God's Justice: so working, not by any material virtue or power of it own: but by a certain height of supernatural efficacy, to which it is exalted by the omnipotence of that supreme and righteous Judge. If then God hath from eternity created a fire of another nature, proportionable even to spiritual Essences? What should hinder but that the pure quintessentiall matter of the Sky, and the elements themselves, in the end of the world, may be dissolved by fire? Yea, of so different a nature shall the last fire be, from that which it consumeth, that the element of Fire it self shall be dissolved by fire.

All miraculous creatures are better than ordinary natural ones: The Water that Christ turned into Wine, was the best Wine: the same bounty that expressed it self in the quantity of the Wine, shows it self no less in the excellence: Nothing can fall from that divine Hand not exquisite. It was fit that the miraculous effects of Christ, which came from his immediate hand, should be more perfect than the natural. The fire that came down from Heaven upon Sodom had more in it than nature. How strange was the fire that consumed Elijah's sacrifice? Many hands are employed for the making of a large Trench round about the Altar, and the Prophet causes it to be filled with those precious remainders of water, which the people would have grudged to their own mouths. But as those that pour down a pailefull into a dry Pumpe, they part with this little in hope of fetching more. The Altar, the Trench is full: a barrel full is poured out for each of the Tribes, that every Tribe might be afterwards replenished. Elijah prays, and instantly the fire of the Lord falls from Heaven, and consumes the burnt Sacrifice, the Wood, the Stones, the Dust, and lickes up the water that was in the Trench. With what terror must Israel needs see this fire rolling down out of the Sky, and a lighting with such fury so near their heads: heads no less fit for this flame, than was the Sacrifice. They might well have thought, how easily might this fire have dilated it self, and consumed our bodies, as well as the Wood and Stones; and have lick'd up our blood, as well as that Water? I know not whether they had the grace to acknowledge the Mercy of God, they could do no less than confess his Power, The Lord is God, The Lord is God. Cannot the same Power provide another fire, to make a whole burnt sacrifice of the world? Far be it from us to doubt it, when he hath said he will do it.

Seeing the whole world is but a great house, and the end of it is to be burned; happy are they that have provided themselves of another not subject to fire. Wherefore is it called Immobile regnum, a kingdom that cannot be shaken? An eternal house? An immortal mansion? Into which no Thieves can break through? But to show that this fire cannot come at it, that it is far above the reach of ruin? The joys of Heaven should lose one privilege, which they have above the pleasures of Earth, if they could be mutable. If men find such fair contentments in this their prison, What will the liberty of God's own royal Court afford us? If in this stormy time of tears we meet with such comforts, What may we expect in that everlasting Sun-shine? If this corruptible world, set up for a short time, as some Tent or Cottage, be so gorgeous; that many desire no other Heaven: What estimation should we make of that eternal Palace, prepared before all worlds, for the greatest manifestation of his glory? This world of ours, which holdeth a middle state between Heaven and Hell, and (in some sort) participateth of both; doth not so far surpass Hell in beauty; as it is excelled by that Imperial Court of Heaven, contrived by his own wisdom, as agreeable to the State of almighty God. There, there let us lay up our hearts; that when this whole world is on a flame, our Inheritance may be safe, and ourselves established in it forever.

Reserved unto fire.] Here is offered to our observation, the great difference betwixt the former destruction of the world, and this latter: That by Water, this by Fire.

1. The Heavens then had their Dropsy, and drowned the world: now they shall have their Feaver, and burn the world. It seems the world was then too hot, and therefore was Water sent to cool it: now it shall be too cold, and this Fire shall come to enflame it. Indeed, before the Flood, men were given to inordinate and unnatural Lusts: to fury and wrath, which is Excandescencia, a chafing or fuming sin: and to uncleanness, which the Apostle calls a Burning: these sins were fitly punished with an Inundation of Water. Toward the latter end of the World, Charity shall wax cold, Piety be nipped with a Frost, and Faith almost starved to death: and the World thus benumbed, shall be set on Fire. Or shall we rather say, this Judgment of Fire shall be proportionable to the present state of sin? As many heats contracted in the body are a preparation to the Fever: so Pride, Ambition, Drunkenness, filthy Concupiscence, Envy, Malice, and such intemperate heats in the soul, do justly provoke and call for a Dissolution of the World by Fire.

2. Of the Flood, the world had a fore-knowledge one hundred and twenty years before it came; whereby men might lay hold on the opportunity of repentance. Hereupon some made provision against it, and were saved. But this last Fire shall break out in an instant, and consume all. Noah knew when the Flood would come, and by God's Direction furnished himself of a sufficient Refuge. But this Day of Fire is known to no man, to no Angel. The Dog-star hath a pestilent breath, an infectious exhalation: yet because we know when it will rise, we clothe ourselves, we diet ourselves, and we shadow ourselves, to a sufficient prevention: But Comets and blazing Stars, whose significations or effects no man can interrupt or frustrate, no man foresaw. No Almanac tells us, when a blazing Star will break out, because the matter is carried up in secret: No Astrologer tells us, when the effects will be accomplished; for that is a secret of an higher Sphere than the other. Some Prognosticators have ghesed at the time of Thunder and Lightning, and been deceived: but which of them could foretell, that in such a Yeare such a City should be burned, or such a Countrie overflown? The last Day shall suddenly break in like a Thief, and entrap like a Snare: like some unexpected Thunder-clappe, awaking men from their quiet sleeps. If a man should suddenly start from his slumber, and see his house on fire about him, his Friends bewailing, but not being able to help him; it were cause of strange Amazement. Death is but a sleep in the bed of the Grave: in how terrible a plight must the wicked man rise, when he shall be enclosed within those comfortless extremities? He shall have on the one side his sins accusing him, on the other side Justice threatening him: Above, an angry Judge condemning him: Beneath, Hell open, and the boiling Furnace ready to devour him: Before, those merciless Fiends haling him: Behind, the Saints and some of his nearest Friends not only forsaking him, but rejoicing and praising God for Justice in his damnation: Within, his conscience tearing him; without, the powers of heaven shaken and dissolved, the elements melting, the whole world flaming, and all damned souls crying and cursing round about him. O intolerable indignation of the Almighty; which he shall neither have power to resist, nor patience to endure, nor place to avoid!

3. The Deluge did but invade a piece of the world: it did no harm to the heavens, from whence it fell: it did not put out those lights, it did not quench those heats: but this last fire shall burn the furnace it self, and annihilate those heavens that breathe it out. If Noah's Dove found no place for her foot by reason of the water, what room will be left for the sinner in the midst of this universal fire! If the just shall scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly appear? To go forward, it will be intolerable: impossible to go back: to turn aside, unavaileable. So extreme will be the astonishment, made up of sorrow, shame, and fear; that the guilty sinner will be desirous, if it were possible, even to hide himself in hell, rather than stand his trial: like some desperate malefactor, that had rather go to the galhouse in private, than be brought to the public Sessions.

4. The Deluge came upon the world Paulatim, by degrees: this fire shall come Sabito, on a sudden. God was then forty days a raining upon the earth, before the Flood did bear up the Ark: so that still men shifted places, according to their best conveniences: from the valleys up to the higher grounds, from thence to the loftyest mountains, and again there, to the towers and tallest Cedars; Death and Destruction following after them in a slow march. Beside that fear and hunger did in many of them save the Flood a labor; they had time to take breath, the happy space of repentance; and though the waters would not be entreated to spare their bodies, yet that other Deluge of their own Tears might eternally save their souls. But this destruction by fire is altogether sudden: it shall not begin with one piece of the world, and so proceed on to another, as material fire does in an earthly building; but consume all at once. Therefore He that best knows it, because He will do it, compares it to Lightning, which quickly flies from East to West, and that chosen Vessel says, it shall be done In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye. Those are the greatest mischiefs, which are least discerned: the most insensible in their ways, come to be most sensible in their ends. In the societies of men, States and Common-wealths; twenty rebellious drummes make not so dangerous a noise, as a few whisperers and secret plotters in corners. The Cannon doth not so much hurt against a wall, as a Myne under the wall: nor a thousand enemies that threaten, so much as a few that take an oath to say nothing. It is the concealment of the last day, that will be terrible to those men one day, that have not prepared themselves every day. It was a noble answer of a mean favourite to his Prince; who had threatened one day to come and see what cheare he kept in his house, and understanding afterwards how bountiful and expensive he was at all times since, far above his state and revenues, reproved him for a prodigal waster of his fortunes: but he humbly replied; Your Highness promised to eat with me one day, and because I did not know which day, I made the better provision for you every day. We are sure there is a day when our Lord will come: therefore to trim up our houses, our Consciences; to furnish our souls with the best Viands, Faith, Charity, and Repentance; is not to our loss, but gain: He will not tax us of lavishnesse; but rather having supped with us in grace, take us home to his Kingdom, to sup with him in everlasting Glory.

But if this fire be so universal, how then shall the Righteous escape? [Question.] Can they avoid so supernatural a flame? Yes, how were those three mortal Servants of God delivered in the midst of that fiery furnace? Were the hairs of their heads singed? or was the smell of fire upon their garments? Their persecutors were destroyed with the very breathing of that Oven, themselves were not hurt with the flame. What was the reason? There was a Fourth among them, and his form was like the Son of God. So when the whole world shall be turned into a burning furnace, the godly have One among them, that will secure their preservation; even their blessed Redeemer, the almighty Son of God. If he could keep mortal men from the power of natural fire, he can as easily from the force of this supernatural fire save his immortal Saints. I deny not, but that even the Saints and Angels may be touched with the terror and astonishment of this dreadful day: not for any danger which they can fear towards themselves; but at the greatness of the Lord's Indignation: As a harmless child will be afraid at the fury of his father, though it be against his bondsman: or as a tempestuous sea will strike some astonishment even into him, that standeth safe on the shore. If the heavens and earth fly before his presence, well may the sons of men be abashed. When Gideon went against the Midianites, instead of whetting swords, sharpening spears, and fitting of armor, he only gave order for empty pitchers, and lights, and trumpets. The cracking of those pitchers shall break in pieces that Midianitish clay: the kindling of those lamps shall extinguish the light of Midian: those trumpets sound no other than a soul-knell to all the host of Midian. There shall need nothing but noise and light, to confound that innumerable Army. Now if the pitchers, and brands, and trumpets of Gideon, did so daunt and dismay the proud troupes of Midian and Amalek: who (can we think) shall be able to stand before the last terror; when the trumpet of the Archangel shall sound, and the heavens shall pass away with a noise, and the elements shall be on a flame about our ears?

Seeing the world shall be determined in fire, let us look in time to our own preservation. No denial, no defense, will serve at that day, either to countenance or to cover our sins: It will be in vain to offer, whether excuse or entreaty: no place remains for the one, no pity for the other. Nothing will be granted, which shall then be required; because nothing was performed, which was before commanded. When a man's house is on fire, he does not so much look to his lumber, and trash, and ordinary stuff, but he labors to preserve his treasure and Jewels, his deeds and evidences: This great house of the world will shortly be on fire: it will be our vain folly, to seek the saving of any temporal things; for they shall not escape this combustion: but let us save the Jewels, our dear souls: the evidence, our faith in the Covenant of God, made unto us in Jesus Christ. Let not him that is on the house top, come down to take anything out of it; there is nothing in it worth his care. No, let him make sure his Jewel, and his Charter in the blood of his Redeemer: if that be safe, pereat mundus: Let Christ be ours, and our souls his, and though the world be on a light flame, we shall not perish.

Reserved unto fire.] The Law of God was given in fire, and in fire it shall be required. That they might see what was due to their sins, they behold the fire above, representing the fire that should be below them. We may all tremble at the resemblance. The trumpet of the Angel called only Israel to the one: the voice of an Archangel, the Trumpet of God shall summon all the world to the other. There mount Sinai was only on a flame; here the whole world shall burn. There was fire, smoke, thunder and lightning: here a fiery stream issuing from the Lord shall melt the elements, and dissolve the heavens. If such were the proclamation of God's statutes, what shall the Sessions be? What shall become of the breakers of so fiery a law? Only the fire wherein it was delivered, was but terrifying: but the fire wherein it shall be required is consuming. Therefore will the supreme Judge hold his Assizes in fire: nor is only the Law thus required, but even the Gospel. He will come in flaming fire, taking vengeance, not only on them that know not God and his Law; but even on those that obey not the Gospel of Christ.

To recover us from our willful fall, he came down from heaven, was borne in poverty, and lived in pain, and died with intolerable torment and scorn. Witness the wounds he endured, witness the earth that trembled, witness the heavens that drew in their light, when his death was in action. Where is our thankfulness, where our obedience? How have we answered his holy inspirations? How have we used the means and opportunities, which were presented us for our salvation? What desire had we of those works of mercy which he commanded? Where appeared in us that Charity which he commended? Is this the account we make of his sufferings? Is this our estimation of his more than precious blood? Rebellion against God's mercy is so much worse than disobedience to his Justice, as his mercy sweetens all his works, as his mercy redeemed us, when we were forfeited to his Justice. Even this Ingratitude shall be required in fire, and the Lord will judge it in that universal burning. When Joseph said to his brethren, I am Joseph your brother, whom ye sold into Egypt, they could not answer him, for they were astonished at his presence. When Christ shall show that blessed Head which was crowned with thorns, those sacred hands which were pierced with nails, that holy side which was thrust through with a spear, and say, Behold I am Jesus your brother, whom your sins once sold into the hands of Pilate, and have ever since daily crucified by your unthankful relapses, and repetitions of the same iniquities; they must needs be speechless. O then let us follow the counsel of him, that would be our Advocate, before he will be our Judge! and enter into Judgment against ourselves, that when we shall appear in that great Audit, he may find us beforehand judged, & forever forbear to condemn us.

Against the day of Judgment.] We find four Advents of Christ. 1. Verbum ad carnem, when the Word took flesh. 2. Caro ad verbum, when he began to execute his office. 3. In carne soluta, when we lie on our death-bed, then he comes to comfort us: the God of life comes in the hour of death. 4. In carne restituta, at the Resurrection: when our old mother shall be delivered of her last burden, when a fever shall calcyne the corrupt body of this world. There is Iudicium Discretionis, which is done here; For Judgment I am come into this world: and there is Iudicium Retributionis hereafter; God shall Judge the secrets of man by Jesus Christ. There is a judgment of election, before the world began: and there is a judgment of reward, when the world is done. Concerning this last and great Day of Judgment, I desire briefly to touch upon these particulars: The certainty, the uncertainty, the integrity, the impartiality, the fatality to the wicked, the consolation to the Just.

1. The certainty of it: Heaven and earth shall pass away, but not that word of God, which hath decreed this judgment. Of this infallible expectation we have frequent warning: The Sun shall be darkened, the Moon shall not give her light, and the Stars shall fall from heaven. Great Eclipses have been terrible to poor mortals, and the darkness at our Savior's Passion was the wonder of the world: If it were such at his suffering, what shall it be at his glorious appearing? When the Master of the family dieth, the house is troubled, the servants lament, and put on mourning garments: When man, the Tenant of the world is near his end, and coming to answer for his rent; his old friends and servants, the Sun, Moon, and Stars, clothe themselves in black, and become his mourners. Nor do these only wait upon this great funeral; but the earth shall tremble, and the seas roar, when men's hearts shall fail them. Vehement earthquakes, and the inundations of mighty waters have been terrible: how much more when the vast Ocean shall rage, and the massy globe of the earth totter?

How obdurate be those hearts, whom this consideration does not terrify. Physicians, in dangerous diseases, give a special regard to the 7. day, which they call critical; and observe what strength nature hath to repel it, & thereby judge of the patient. We all labor of the spiritual sickness, Sin: and the day of Iudgemēt is truly a critical day: if the remembrance of that cannot discover some hope of reformation in us, we are not like to escape. We are busily intēt in our observations upon climactericall years for particular persons, and periodicall years for the life of states and kingdoms: but we consider not our own critical day, and what assurance we have of the everlasting Kingdom. We exercise our curiosity in marking, that Adam, the eldest of the eldest world, died in his climactericall year: and Sem, the eldest son of the next world, in his: and Abraham, the Father of the faithful, in his: and the blessed Virgin Mary, the Garden where the Root of faith grew, in hers. But they whose Climacterickes we observe, did spend their observation upon other critical days; the expectation of the Messias, the end of their lives, the preparation for death. The Pharisees pretended that if they had been in their Fathers days, they would not have been partakers of the blood of the Prophets: and shall we, who live in the days, not of the Prophets, but of the Son, kill those Prophets again, and again crucify that Son, for all those evident Indications that are afforded us? Shall we study, and seek, and find out such critical days, as are fittest to forsake Christ in? Now, Religion is in a neutrality in the world, and this is my day, the day of liberty: Now I may make new friends, by changing my old Religion, and this is my day, the day of advancement. This is a fearful Crisis or indication of spiritual death. Physicians speak of their critical days, that the first is Index, the next Iudex. So we have two main critical days, our life, and our death: the former is Indicatory, the latter Iudicatory: that declares what we are, this concludes what we shall be: the one is for consultation, the other for Sentence. There may be some hope of convalescence in the first: but if we amend not before the second, we must perish. In the first we have leave and time to judge ourselves: otherwise, the Lord will judge us in the next.

Yea, we have many critical days, to prepare us for that great day of Determination; and them we may distinguish, like natural days, into seven. First, the day of Trouble and affliction, which is therefore called the day of visitation: because in trouble, the Lord, our good Physician, doth visit us. Men think that God is removed from them, when they suffer calamity: as the Israelites do but want water, and presently cry, Is the Lord among us, or no? As if God could not be with them, and they athirst? Either he must humor carnal minds, or be distrusted. If they prosper, though it be with wickedness, then God is with them: If they be crossed in their own designs, straight, Is God with us? It was the way to put God from them, to distrust, and murmur. If he had not been with them, they had not lived: if he had been in them, they had not murmured. We can think him absent in our want, and cannot see him absent in our sin: yet wickedness, not affliction, argues him gone. Yea, he is then most present, when he most chastises. We measure not the visitations of great persons, by their apparel, by their equipage, by the solemnity of their coming; but by their very coming. If the Lord come unto us, though it be in sickness, though in calamity, it is our critical day: and if we make him welcome, and entertain him with patience, it is an argument he would not lose us, that by any means seeks us. Secondly, penitent sorrow for our sins is a right critical day: when the conscience is molested with the pains of a bleeding remorse. This day hath an Evening and a Morning; a sad guiltiness in the soul, but a cheerful rising of the Sun. The Evenings and Mornings made days in the Creation, but there is no mention of nights: Our sorrows for our sins are Evenings, but they determine not in night: There is joy in the Morning; a day of solace; when the Spirit broken and dejected in it self, is acquitted and comforted by Christ. Thirdly, this Remorse sends us to a third critical day, to a devout hearing of the Word, and faithful receiving of our Savior, in his Institution of the Sacrament: conforming our life to those sacred Rules, and walking worthy of so inestimable an honor. Fourthly, thus having walked with God three days, we are prepared for the storms of the fourth, the day of our dissolution and transmigration from hence. Sins, sorrows, and troubles have so embittered our life, that there is no bitterness in the remembrance of death. Sickness hath disabled us to receive meat, and made it our fasting day, our Eve, to this great Festivall of our Translation. Fifthly, this day of death shall deliver us over to the fifth, the day of our Resurrection: for how long soever that day be in the grave, there is no day between that and the Resurrection. Then shall all men be re-appareled with their own bodies; and they that have made good use of their former days, shall be super-invested with glory. Only the ungodly shall be condemned to their old clothes; their sinful bodies; and have no addition, but of immortality to torment. Sixthly, this day thus reinvesting our soul in our body, and our body in the Body of Christ, shall present us both body and soul to our sixth day, The day of Judgment: which is truly, and in a literal sense, the critical, the Decretory day; rewarding the wicked according to their demerites: And having passed upon the faithful the Judgment of Approbation, they shall also be assistant in that Session, and judge the world of evil men and Angels. Seventhly, after this, we shall be possessed of our seventh day; that everlasting Sabbath in the rest, the joy, the sight, and glory of the blessed Trinity: where we shall live, without reckoning anymore days forever.

2. The uncertainty of this day bespeaks our preparedness. When the disciples asked Christ concerning the Sign of his coming; he answers them with a Qualis, not with a Quando: he describes the manner, but conceals the Time, such signs shall go before, he does not determine the day when the Judgment shall come after. Only he cautions them, with an Attendite ne superveniat in vos repentina dies illa: for as a snare it shall come on them that dwell on the face of the earth. The bird little thinks of the snare of the fowler, nor the beast of the hunter; this fearless rangeth through the woods, the other merrily cuts the air: both follow their unsuspected liberty, both are lost in unprevented ruin. Against public enemies we fortify our coasts, against private thieves we bar our doors, and shall we not against the irremediable fatalitie of this day prepare our souls? It is favor enough that the Lord hath given us warning: the day is sudden, the warning is not sudden: the old world had the precaution of sixscore years; and that (we cannot deny) was long enough: but we have had the prediction of Christ and his Apostles, of above fifteen hundred years standing; besides the daily sound of those Evangelical Trumpets, that tell us of that Archangelical Trumpet in their Pulpits. Qui audit tonitrua, metuit fulgura: when we hear the thunder, in a dark night on our beds, we fear the lightning: Our Savior's Gospel, premonishing of this day, is like thunder; if it cannot wake us from our sins, the Judgment shall come upon us like lightning, to our utter destruction. But I will thank the Lord for giving me warning. The thunder first breaks the cloud, and makes way for the lightning, yet the lightning first invades our sense: All Sermons upon this argument of the last day, are thunder-claps; yet such is the security of the world, that the sons of thunder cannot waken them, till the Father of lightning consume them. Dedisti metuentibus te significationem, ut fugiant à facie arcus, saith that royal Prophet. The Huntsman doth not threaten the dear, or terrify him; but watches him at a stand, and shoots him. But God speaks, before he shoots: takes the bow in his hand, and shows it us, before he puts in the arrow, to wound us. Saint Gregory hath a meditation, which by way of similitude doth lively express this point. Mariners have made their voyage, and are returning home: when on a sudden the winds rise, and the seas begin to be troubled: first they are set upon with lighter waves, then with fiercer billows; then little bals of fire are seen rolling on the face of the waters: now they labor with all their powers, and unlade the vessels of those precious merchandize, for which they made their unhappy voyage. But still the unexpiable rage of the sea ceaseth not, till it hath swallowed the ship: some sink with it, and others by help of a little bark get to shore. We are all put into the vessel of mortality; & all those signs preceding the day of Judgment, are so many successive waves prognosticating this universal shipwreck: and now worldlings would throw overboard their unblest traffike; the covetous despiseth his riches, the voluptuous his pleasures, the ambitious his honors: they have ventured all their life for those sins, and now they would be rid of that venture with all their hearts. The main storm comes, the earth trembles, the Ocean roars, the elements melt, the heavens dissolve, the huge Caricke of the whole world perisheth: Those that have put all their fortunes and estate in that one uncertain Bottom, must perish with it: But the Children of Grace have a little Pinnasse, the Church of Christ; and this carries them safe thorough the fire, as Noah's Ark bore him thorough the water, and lands them in Heaven, where they are welcomed home with Songs of triumph.

We are all God's Creatures, and he hath an indefeisable right in every man: yea, we are his Factors, and he hath sent us into this world, as into a strange country to traffike for him. Estote Factores verbi, non actores: Bee ye doers of the word, not actors, for that is but to play Religion, like hypocrites: Actors do but represent things done, and personate other men. But we are Factors; and the commodities we are trusted withal, are first heavenly Graces, and then a competency of temporal things. The trade we drive is our good Works, and all we can return to our Masters profit is but his Praise and Glory: the whole benefit of the voyage redounds to ourselves: not He, but we may be the better for it. At last that great Merchant calls us home, to this universal audit, when every Factor must bring in his accounts. They that have advantaged their Lord and traded to his honor, shall be honored by him forever: But these slothful servants, that have trifled with his Talent, or mis-spent it, shall be cast into that prison of unthrifths and beggars, which is full of all wants, but the want of torments. The wise Merchant; that preponders his future reckoning, will carefully look to four houses under his charge: His ware-house, his work-house, his clock-house, and his Closet or counting-house. Our Ware-house is our Heart; wherein lie all those precious Commodities deposited to us from Heaven: our knowledge, with all our Graces, and spiritual abilities: if lusts and malicious thoughts break in like thieves, and robs us of those celestial Wares, we are undone. Our Work-house is, as it were, the Shop of our good Actions, wherein by way of holy commerce, we retaile those dear Commodities of our Master, to his gainful use: if we have learning, we instruct the ignorant; if we have riches, we comfort the poor; if authority, we protect the innocent: whatsoever Grace we have in the Ware-house of our Heart, we bring it forth into the Work-house of our life, and do good with it. Our Clock-house is to be regarded too: Whither we consider it in relation to our speech, and discourse, for the Tongue is the Clock of the Soul: if the Clock go false, if our talk be ungracious; lying, swearing, or profane; we are factors for hell, rather than for Heaven: Men may know by the Clock-house, what stuff is in the Ware-house; for out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth speaketh. Or we may consider this Clock, in respect of our time: the good Husband still minds how the day goes with him; and therefore so follows his business, that he may have done before night. They are injurious Sextons to their own souls, that set the Clock back; that make it stand at two in the afternoon, when it is six in the evening, even near the Sun-set of their ends; that they might more securely follow their pleasures. No, let the Clock go right, think of the time, meditate on the uncertainty of thy life, the certainty of thy reckoning; and work out thy Salvation in time, that thou mayest rest when time shall be no more. All men are called to Repentance: do you hear some answer, Yes, tomorrow, Lord; or next week, Lord; or next year, Lord? Sure, their Clock does not go right. God hath another Clock; and it may be twelve by His, when it is scarce five by theirs: he summons them by death, when they think they have many years to live. The last is our Counting-house, and that is our Conscience; where we find written all our receipts, and all our layings out. No false reckoning can be found in this Book; it will speak the truth to a penny. Trades-men's books may lie, stewards books may err; there is no error in this. In respect of our receipts, we cannot with that unjust steward set down fifty for a hundred: nor can we, in regard of our layings out, set down a hundred for fifty. This book is written by another hand than ours; even the Lord's: and certainly, the Lord can read his own hand. There have been some that could stupefie the voice of their Conscience; never any could obliterate the writing of their Conscience: they could stop the sound of it, as it is a Trumpet; they could not scrape out the Characters of it, as it is a Book. Happy are we, if we can get the blood of Christ, to wash out our debts; and the merits of Christ, to stand for our accounts: only this reckoning shall pass in the Day of Judgment. For as our Conscience leaves us here, so the Almighty Judge will find us hereafter.

To conclude; the weakest memory here present, may easily think on these four Houses: and if we keep them well, we shall prove happy Christians. But the Day of Judgment, thou sayest, is far enough off: It is more than thou, or any man, or any Angel knows. Yet grant it far off to the world; it may be near to thee. The day of Judgment is remote, Thy day of Judgment is at hand: and as thou goest out in particular, so thou shalt be found in the general. Thy passing-bell and the Archangels Trumpet, have both one sound to thee. In the same condition that thy soul leaves thy body, shall thy body be found of thy Soul. Thou canst not pass from thy death-bed a sinner, and appear at the great Assizes a Saint. Both in thy private sessions, and the universal Assizes, thou shalt be sure of the same Judge, the same Jury, the same Witnesses, the same Verdict. How certain thou art to die, thou knowest: how soon to die, thou knowest not. Measure not thy life with the longest; that were to piece it out with flattery: thou canst name no living man, not the sickest; which thou art sure shall die before thee. Daily we follow the dead to their graves, and in those graves we bury the remembrance of our own death with them. Here drops an old Man, and there a Child; here an aged Matron, there a young Virgin: with mourning eyes we attend them to their Funerals; yet before we lay the Rosemary out of our hands, the thought of death hath vanished from our hearts. When an Hog lies bound under the knife to be killed, he makes an hideous cry above any other Creature: hereupon the other Swine come running in, and they grunt, and whine, and keep a fearful noise: but as soon as the dying Beast hath ceased, they also are silent, and return to the filthy mire as carelessly, as if no harm had been done. When we lose a Neighbor, a Friend, a Brother, we weep, and howl, and lament, as if with Rachel, we could never be comforted: But the body once interred, and the funeral Ceremonies ended; if we do not stay to enquire for some Legacies, we run back with all possible haste to our former sins and turpitudes, as if there had been no such matter. Alas, that the farthest end of all our thoughts, should be the thought of our ends! Death is but our apprehension, like the taking of a Malefactor; but it sends us to the Session, and that either to forgiveness or execution. O then, let us repent in life, that we may find comfort in death, and be acquitted at the Day of Judgment by Jesus Christ.

3. The Integrity of the Judge, and of his Judgment, comes next to be considered. There is no Name of God so often mentioned in the Scripture, as that of a Judge; no action so often, as that of Judgment. Many Names of God be sweeter, none frequenter. Even where the Lord is glorious with all his Titles of Mercy, still there comes in one Title of his Judgment: where he is slow to anger, even there he does not acquit the guilty. The first coming of Christ was in weakness, because he was then to be judged: his second shall be in power, because he is now to judge. Then, like a feeble unweaponed David against that mighty Giant of Hell, that Goliath, Satan: now, like an armed and angry David against wicked and unthankful Nabal's. In vain have I kept his Flocks safe in the Wilderness, that will not give a little bread to my hungry followers. Have I been so bountiful to the rich Churls of the World, and do they deny a small relief to my poor members? Then he came like a soft Dew upon the Grass, now he shall come like Thunder in the Clouds. Then he came unto his own, and they knew him not; now all eyes shall see him, and all tongues confess him. Then he came in private, from the womb of his Mother; now he shall come in public from the Throne of his Father. Then, with a few Apostles; now, with thousands of Angels. Then, with a Star in the East; now, with the Heavens on Fire. Then, as a Lamb; now as a Lion: Then, to save the lost, now, to condemn the lost. Then as a Subject to Caesar; now, the King of kings. Then, O Man, Venit ut tuus, He came as thine: now, Veniet ut suus, He shall come as his own, and appear himself: Then He, poor Man stood before Pilate, to receive his Sentence; now Pilate and Herod, and all the Potentates of the Earth must stand before Him, and undergo his dreadful Doome. Then He had a Reed for his Scepter, and Thorns for his Crown: now, He shall break the Nations with a Scepter of Iron, and his Throne shall be like a flaming Fire. At his Birth, only Jerusalem was troubled; and at his Death, some tender-hearted Women wept: but at his Comming to Judgment, All the Kinreds of the Earth shall mourn before Him.

It is Christ then that shall be our Judge; He to whose contumely did tend all our misdeeds. He, whose Majesty we have dishonored, whose Mercy we have despised, whose Glory we have abased, and whose Goodness we have abused. He, whose Presence we have profaned, and whose Patience we have mis-interpreted, either for Ignorance or Allowance of evil. But we shall find neither of both in this impartial Judge: There are six principal Refuges of the guilty before the Judgment-seats of mortal men. If either the Judge may be deceived through Ignorance, or made partial with Favor, or overcome with Power, or melted with Pitie, or corrupted with Monie, or persuaded with Oratory: but all these Forts of confidence fail before this Tribunal.

1. This Judge cannot err through Ignorance, for All things are naked and open to his eyes, with whom we have to do. He knoweth our goings out and our comings in: The Lord knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are but vain. There is nothing so quick as thought, nothing so free as thought, nothing so secret as thought, (the Devil cannot know our thoughts, but by conjecture or inference) nothing so boundless as thought: nature hath set no limits to the thoughts of the soul. Yet, Thou, O Lord, understandest our thoughts long before. To know them, when they have being, is much: but to know them before they were, is only God's peculiar. Man himself does not know today, what he shall think tomorrow: God knows it, and knew it from all eternity. He understood what thoughts the soul would create, before He had created the soul. Adam would fain have hidden himself from God, when he found him naked in the cool of the day: such a desire is in every guilty sinner to hide himself from Christ, when he comes to Judgment in the Evening of the world: but it is not possible. The wicked shall call to the Mountains, Fall on us, and to the Rocks, Cover us; but to what purpose? Alas, In the Presence of the God of Jacob, the Mountains skip like Rammes, and the little Hills like young Sheep. Yea, at that Day there shall be neither Rocks nor Mountains left to hide them. As it is intolerable to abide his Presence, so it is impossible to avoid it. He saw Nathaniel under the Fig tree, and Elias in the Cave. He sees the Thief in his darkest night, and the Adulterer when all the doors and windows are shut. He saw Fa·lx, without the help of his dark Lantern, when he labored in that black Vault or Mine under the Parliament-house. He sees all the plots of the Jesuits against his Church: they delude all Princes, but the Prince of Heaven, and He sees their villainy. He sees them that are in Hell, who see nothing, not themselves. He knows our most secret sins; to repeat those we do not remember, to reveal also those we would hide, and to convince us of those we would deny.

2. This Judge cannot be forestalled with favor, for He is no Respector of Persons. The poorest Beggar shall find as good Audience in this Court of Justice, as the greatest Monarch in the word. Christ will judge most justly, even those that have judged most unjustly. Pilate shall find Justice from Christ, Christ found none from Pilate. Take Him, saith he to the malicious Jews, I find no fault in Him. No fault in Him, O Pilate, and yet doest thou condemn Him? Where was the fault then? Surely in thee, O Pilate. He will not deal so with thee; thou shalt have Justice.

3. He cannot be overborne with power; for All power is given Him both in Heaven and Earth. With many Judges on Earth, a Lord's Message, or a Ladies Letter may do much: and let the poor man's complaint be never so honest, if it trench upon great Ones, it must not be heard. Favor is the Mistress, toward which all the Bowles of Authority run Bias. Such Magistrates are like Spaniels, which ever hunt that way their Master looks. But those unrighteous Judges, that have been led by favor below, shall find least favor above. It will be a poor excuse for an act of Injustice, Such a Lord commanded me: Him for persuading, and Thee for yielding, the Lord of Heaven shall condemn you both. Now men deal with our Sermons, as they do with our Tithes: when we preach Judgment, they sue out a Prohibition from an higher Court, or a Protection from the Chancery, their Mercy-seat, or a Commission for Composition: but whither will they appeal from this Court, the great Star-chamber of Heaven?

4. He cannot be moved with pity. There was a time, when upon the condition of repentance, He proffered padon: but the time of Mercy is past, this is the Day of Justice. Time was, when He poured forth his precious Blood to expiate their sin: but now There remains no more sacrifice for sin. Time was, He wept over Jerusalem in compassion; now let Jerusalem weep out her eyes, there is nothing but indignation. His Meekness shall be turned into Wrath; and He that before wept for the misery of sinners, will now laugh at their destruction. The Lawyer, whiles he is an Advocate, pleads his Clients cause, though •t be not good: but being made a Judge, he sentenceth the cause, without respect to the Client. Christ is now our Advocate, and He pleads our cause; and mediates for our very sins: but at the last Day his Office is to Judge, and He will give a most righteous Sentence.

5. He will not be corrupted with Bribes; yea, those that have been so corrupted, He will condemn. The wealthiest Miser must come before Him naked and empty handed. In his Infancy the Wise Men presented Him Gold, and they are wise men that in this world bring Him such offerings. With thy Gold and Riches feed the hungry, and clothe the naked, while thou livest: else at the Day of Judgment it will not be taken. What wealth shall any man have left, when the whole world is on fire? Only what the hand of Charity hath given Christ here, He will abundantly repay there: And as we use, upon the wall of Hospitals and Almshouses, to write up the name of the Benefactors: so those beneficent souls, that have comforted the needy members of Christ on Earth, shall find their names written in Heaven. Other rich Churls shall undergo Magus his Doome, Themselves and their money must perish together.

6. He cannot be persuaded with arguments. Tullius is weak, and Tertullus a fool, to think that eloquence shall carry it there. Let not the greatest Clarkes, who have led wicked lives, hope that at this Assizes their Book shall save them. They may be condemned for the former abuse of their Eloquence, but here their very tongues shall be put to silence. Even now, Theologia non formidat Dialecticam: Divinity will not be awed by Logic, nor will God be imprisoned in a Predicament: much less above. I speak not this to dispraise Learning; it is the gift of God, and useful to his glory. Moses a Priest, or (if that be doubtful, yet sure) a Prophet, and that with a Non sicut; was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. The Scorers of Learning are like Wormes in Libraries: busy about it, but with an intent to destroy it. There be many arts in the world, but there is one worth them all; an holy life, the effect of a true faith in Jesus Christ. Saint Paul was a great Scholar, yet it was only his Didicisse Christum, that saved him. All arguments are lost but this; Lord, I bring thee thine owe righteousness, by imputation made mine; by this, I beseech thee save me: This argument will prevail.

We see the Integrity of the Judge: the Conscience of the sinner shall be compelled to accuse, and the Devil suffered to urge, but no Advocate allowed to plead his cause. The Angels shall not, the Saints may not, Christ will not, and himself cannot. Not the Angels, for they are witnesses to his wickedness: Not the Saints, for it is their office to judge the world: Not Christ, for he despised his grace when it was offered: Not the sinner himself, for he shall obtain no audience. O the desperate extremities, which will then beset the ungodly! If they offer to speak, their sins stand up against them: if they hold their peace, they find nothing to comfort them. Every moment of our time is one step toward this Judgment: And yet we are so far from compassion of ourselves, that even going to our trial, we cease not to multiply crimes against him, that must give sentence upon us. With what countenance can sinners be able to look upon that glorious Majesty? It will be at that time a greater pain for them to stand before God, than to be in Hell. The severe acts of a Judge being discoursed, and his impartial censures; an hearer wittily and honestly replied; I mean never to trouble him. It cannot be so with us; our sins are so heinous and numerous, that we must come before him: there is only one way to help us; which is now by an appeal? To whom? Even to himself, let us appeal from Christ, to Christ: from him as an angry Judge, to him as a gracious Savior. How cheap an account do most men now make of Christ? No more than cunning Gallants do of a prodigal Heir; even to riot upon his score, and to lavish out sins on the riches of his satisfaction. But let them know, that though the Death of Christ have fully satisfied for all our sins; and borne the extremity of whatsoever, either the Law of God could lay against us, or the wrath of God could lay upon us: yet hath it left no liberty to build our sins upon his Death, but rather to bury our sins in his Death. We may not crucify him again by our sins, which for our sins hath already been crucified. For as in the Creation, the disobedience of the Creature caused the Creator to hate the work of his own hands: so in the Reconciliation, the peace that was made between God and man, did not stretch so far as to conclude of peace between God and sin. But he that was content in Christ to be reconciled to his enemies, is yet at enmity with their sins: and though he forgive great sins in Christ, yet doth he punish little sins in Christians. Yea, though the blood of Jesus do continually cry unto God for us; yet doth it not so possess his ears, that he can hear no cry against us. Still where is the due estimation of Christ? Atheist deny him, Papists dishonor him, Pagans persecute him, Worldlings oppress him, Hypocrites dissemble him, Time-servers make use of him, Politicians pretend him, Swearers blaspheme him, millions profess him, few rightly esteeming him, few indeed honor him. The price of Christ seems to go down, the Covetous will sell him for a Farm, the Adulterer for a kiss, the Drunkard for a Pinte of Wine, for a Pot of Ale; the fraudulent Tradesman for a Penny; the Swearer will sell Him for Nothing, and take no Monie for Him. This is the difference between God's Judgment, and man's: God valued man at more than his own Blood, man valued that Blood but at thirty Peeeces of Silver. But the Day will come, when one gracious Word from the Mouth of Christ, one pleasing Look of his Countenance, shall be far more precious than all the World. Then shall All the Tribes of the Earth mourn before Him. Unbeleevers shall mourn, because they would not accept that glorious Way of Salvation: the Voluptuous shall mourn, that they have bought transient Pleasures with everlasting Torments. The Covetous shall mourn, that they have more accounted of a cross of Coine, than of the saving Cross of Christ. The Proud shall mourn, that they have despised the Humility of the Gospel. Blasphemers shall lament, that they have sworn away the Price of their Redemption. The Uncleane shall mourn, because they rather chose to be the Limbes of an Harlot, than Members of the Son of God. All Sinners shall mourn, and especially, because the Time of all fruitful Mourning is forever past. The World now rejoiceth, but let us mourn; that when the whole World is set on mourning, we may then rejoice World without End.

4. The Impartiality of the proceeding falls next into our Consideration. Such is the Perfection of God's Justice, Who is ever constant to his own ways; that He doth still proceed by the Book; openly, intelligibly, manifestly. When the Ancient of Daies shall sit upon his White Throne, the Books shall be opened.

1. Book is the Book of Life; never shut to God, but never thoroughly open to us. Whosoever is found written in this Book, shall not perish. We cannot unclaspe this Book, yet we may know something in it that concerns ourselves. There is a safe collection or gadation, à Posteriore. I deprecate all sin, I repent heartily of that is done, I abhor to commit it, I earnestly pray against it, I strive with all my powers to avoid it, I thirst for more Grace, I am ready to all good Works, I rest wholly and only on my Savior's Merits; therefore I rightly believe: I believe, therefore am justified: I am justified, therefore called: I am called, therefore elected: I am elected, therefore shall be glorified. We cannot, we may not conclude the contrary: I am a sinner, therefore God hath from everlasting rejected me: therefore He hath made me to be damned: this is an unwarrantable, yea, a desperate Collection. I believe in Christ, and endeavor to live like a Christian, therefore I am chosen: this as a safe and sound inference; and thus far God hath given our Humility leave, to look into this Book of Life.

2. Is the Book of Nature; wherein, though subobscurely and in shadows, God hath expressed his own Image, and written his own Law with indelible Characters. They that have sinned without the Law written, shall be judged by the Law engraven. Though this Law be much defaced in their hearts by the custom of sin, yet it shall no more help them, than a Thief is to be excused, because he hath torn the eight Commandment, Thou shalt not steal, out of the Decalogue.

3. Is the Book of the Scriptures, consisting of the Law and the Gospel: the one commanding, the other enabling; the one condemning, the other presenting a remedy: those two Testaments, wherein all that God wrote in the Old, He hath lighted us a Candle to read it by in the New. No exception can lie against this Book; for the Law of God is holy, and all his Commandments are pure. These are for Number few, for Understanding plain, for Equity approved, and only profitable to whom they are given. Sure there had not been such state in the promulgation of this Law, if God had not intended it for eternity. Every circumstance of the delivery, representing the fearful exaction of it at the last, may well deter us from the transgression. First, how could they think of having any other God's, that had such proofs of this? Secondly, How durst they make any Resemblance of Him, Whom they could not see, and might therefore perceive to be Infinite? Thirdly, How durst they profane his Name, Whom so dreadful a Majesty waited upon? Fourthly, How could they stand with Him for a day, Whom they see to be the Maker and Determiner of days? Fifthly, Why should they disobey his Deputies, whom they saw so able to revenge? Sixthly, How durst they kill a Man, that heard Him forbid it, Who can kill both Body and Soul? Seventhly, How durst they entertain the flames of Lust, that saw such Fiers of Vengeance? Eighthly, How durst they steal, that saw by such terrible Demonstrations, Whose both Heaven and Earth was to dispose of at his Pleasure? Ninthly, Or speak falsely, that heard the God of Truth speak in so fearful a Tone? Tenthly, Or covet others goods, that saw how weak and uncertain Right they had to their own? We men, that fear the Breach of human Laws for some small Mulcts of Forfeiture; How should we fear to transgress thy Law, O Lord, that canst cast both Body and Soul into Hell!

4. There is another Book annexed to this; a Codicill, a Schedule; the Book of just and useful Laws, established by them, to whom God hath committed his People. The Laws of that Church, and Laws of that State, wherein we have our Station. The Breaches and willful Contempts of this Book; will be strictly examined, and hardly answered, in this Audit.

5. Is the manual, the Pocket-book, the Bosom-book of our Conscience. The other Books will manifest what we should have done; this, what we have done. We cannot except against it, because it hath always been in our own keeping: and nothing shall be written in it, but what is subscribed by our proper hand. It hath three offices: First, to give in Testimony, of something acted or omitted. Secondly, to examine whether the action or omission were lawful or unwarrantable. Thirdly, to give Judgment according to that evidence. It can both ligare & solvere: it binds a man faster than the Philistines bound Samson, and looseth him sooner than the Angel loosed Peter. It is a private Law within man: when Law and Chancery too have done with him, (and that not seldom is long before it hath done with him) then Conscience takes him in hand. It is a true looking Glass, that represents all blemishes, without favor or flattery. It is Infra Deum, but Supra hominem, a vice-Deus; and deals with us here, as God will do hereafter. There is a Bill framed out of the Law, it is Crimen laesae Majestatis, against our high Sovereigns Crown and Dignity: our works are the Evidence, and Conscience is the witness, which will not be bribed to give a false testimony. If the main course of our life be gracious, and our Conscience will speak for our works, that they proceed from a sound faith and honest heart; we are then quit by proclamation, for nobody comes in against us: The world may not, our sins shall not, our Conscience must not, the Angels dare not, God will not, the Devil cannot: for he is the Father of lies, and his word will not be taken. But if otherwise, all these will be against us: there need no Subpoena's to fetch in witnesses; they come unsent for, and cannot be kept back: they will speak the truth, and all the truth. As Intelligencers for Statesmen mingle themselves with all companies, but use their best art to keep themselves concealed: So the Conscience is God's Informer, a Spie in the Soul, mixing her self with all our thoughts and actions: It is indeed the Reflection of the Soul upon it self. Though we know not what this Conscience is, yet this Conscience knows what we are. As Pilate asked Christ, What was the Truth? when The Truth stood before him: So many ask what is Conscience? when indeed Conscience is within them.

Origen calls it Paedagogam animae; that teaches all, and keeps all under the Ferula, in a perpetual pupillage. It is like an Italian Comedian, that can play all parts himself: It is Plaintiffe, Defendant, Witness, Judge, Executioner, and Punishment. The soul may say to the Conscience, as Mercury did to Ba••an Et •e mihi perfide prodis? Dost thou betray me to myself? Yes, Me mihi pr•dis. The Conscience will accuse the Conscience; she brings in evidence, produceth the law, proves the forfeit, urges the penalty, gives the sentence, begins the punishment. It is a volume that no Jesuit can corrupt: No Index expurgatarius can strike a letter out of it: The only Book of all our Library that goes along with us into the world to come. Look in that Book, thou sinner, beforehand: Find there, the Title, Sin the Dedication, to the Prince of Sin: the several Chapters, so many several sins: yea, every letter, a Character of sin. As Averroes killed Avicen, by anointing his book with poison: so Satan labors to envenome this book of our Conscience, that we may uncomfortably perish. The Grecians are said to have an Hill so high above the force of the winds; that if a man had drawn his name in Characters, upon the ashes of the sacrifices; he might come the next year and find the same letters unblowne away. If any sinful heart be so securely placed, that Satan may now read in the sluttish dust, the sins that were written there long ago, if no thunder hath cleared the air about him, no wind scattered those guilty Characters, if all be hushd in rest & silence about the borders: Like the country of the Sabarites, where not so much as a Cock, the remembrancer of S. Peter, is left alive to trouble them; it is in a desperate case. But the Conscience that sleeps now, shall be wakened then: the book now clasped, shall be then opened. If ever sleep were the Image of death, it is this. Rather, ô Lord, let thy winds rage, and thy seas roar; than we thus be suffered to sleep with Jonah. It is fearful, when God will not so much as favor us with a frown, nor bless us with his anger. Cleopatra, that had not a mind to feel her death, poisoned her self with Asps, that she might die sleeping. Riot in sin is like the poison of Asps, so stupefying the desperate conscience, that until the day of Judgment this fatal book is not opened.

It is Satan's method; first to make men so senseless, as not to feel their sins at all; and then so desperate, that they feel them too much. In the first fit, men live as if there was no hell: in the last, they die as if there was no heaven. There be some diseases called Opprobrium medici, the shame of Physicians: Is this Lethargy the shame of Divines? No, there is a way to cure it. Let sinners lay to their hearts, all the curses on mount Ebal, the terrors of the law, the sting of death, the darkness of the grave, the horror of this Judgment, with some glimpse of hell. O wretched man, do but dream of them sometimes: talk to God, though it be in thy sleep: Down with thy knees, though thy heart be stiff: up with thy hands, though thy soul be down. Let but out an ejaculation, a piece, a shred of a Prayer; though it be no longer than the Publicans, Lord, be merciful to me a sinner.

6. There is another book, wherein the Registry of our transgressions is written; the infinite and universal knowledge of God: this is his particular book of all our particular sins. These records will present unto us all our offenses, done from our birth to our burial; and lay those things to our charge, which now we either remember not, or regard not: which we esteem either lawful, or tolerable: And we shall be compelled to answer to many things, whereof now we would scorn to be questioned. He that writes our members in his book, hath also in that book written the sins of those members. The concupiscence of our eyes, the violence of our hands, the intemperance of our throats, the virulence of our tongues, the forwardness of our feet to evil, together with the unseemly behavior of our whole body, shall be rigorously examined. Nor is this Indictment made up only of actual trespasses: but even the very blanks are crimes; and the not doing of good shall be punished with the suffering of evil. If our feet have not frequented God's walks, in his holy Courts: if our tongues have not vociserated our Makers praises: if our eyes have not pitied the poor, if our hands have not ministered to their necessities: even these omissions are damnable. Such is the sincerity of Christian Religion, that it not only imposeth upon us pure innocence, but profitable honesty. Here, not only action, but the intermission, the suspension of action; both our speech, and our silence; as well the vacancy of thinking well, as the positive thought of evil; not only cursed fruits, but the barrenness of good; shall be questioned. Not only for making wealth an instrument of cruelty, but for not making it an instrument of mercy; there is a Go ye cursed. If a Magistrate do not support the just cause, though he never took bribe, he shall be condemned. The Father shall be accountant for the education of his children, the Master for the discipline over his servants, the Prince for the government of his subjects. O the great charge of that high calling! Every king is a brief of his land, and he hath a pattern of the ordering of it always about him. The honor he gives his Magistrates, is but a charge, and so is that which God gives him: and as he requires an account, so he must give. Happy is it for him, when true Religion and sincere Integrity, shall be made the Eye of wisdom in his counsel, the ear of Justice in his Deputies, the hand of valor in his Nobles, the tongue of persuasion in his Preachers, the head of government in himself, and the heart of obedience in his people. Private men shall not only be judged as men, but as subjects: they that will not obey, are neither good subjects, nor good men. To obey well, is as great a thing as to govern, and more men's duties: they that think not so, know not the Christians part, which is to suffer. Public Rulers shall not only be judged as men, but as Magistrates. Not only our images, but our offices shall never return ad nihilum. The Image of God it self may uri, it cannot exuri. The image of a lawyer, of a Judge, of a Commander, may burn, but can never burn out.

Nor be only our gross sins recorded in this Book, but even our loose speeches: Of every idle word we must give an account in the day of Judgment. Yea, our very thoughts shall not escape; He will judge the secrets of our hearts. If the private sins of the most innocent soul here, should be revealed to this whole Congregation, it would put us to the blush: how terrible will it be then, to have them opened before the eyes of all the world, both of men and Angels? We write that in the forgetful dust, which God writes in everlasting marble. David pressed far upon the Lord's pardon, in that petition; Clenſe thou me from my ſecret ſins. Can any ſin be ſecret? for a great part of our ſins, though we conceive them in the dark, on our beds, yet we do them in the light. And there are many ſins which we glory in doing, and would not do, if nobody ſhould know them. S. Auguſt. confeſſeth of himſelf, that in his wilder times, he was aſhamed of his ſhamefaſtneſs, and the tenderneſs of his Conſcience: and that he often belied himſelf with ſins which he never did, leſt he ſhould be unacceptable to his ſinful companions. But if we would conceal them, can we? God knows not only the ſins we have committed, but even thoſe we would have committed, if we could. Lord, thou haſt forgive me thoſe ſins which I have done, and thoſe ſins which only by thy grace I have not done; ſaith S. Auguſtine. They were done in our inclination to them, and even that Inclination needs God's mercy, and that mercy he calls a pardon. Theſe are truly moſt ſecret ſins, becauſe they were never done; and becauſe no other man, nor we ourſelves, but only God knows, how many and how great ſins we have eſcaped by his preventing grace; which without that, we had multiplied againſt him. We have abundance of ſins out of the compaſs of our knowledge: we can accuſe ourſelves of original ſin; yet, do we know what original ſin is? We know not enough of it to ſatisfy others, we know enough to condemn ourſelves, to ſolicit the mercy of God. Our youth hath been full of ſins, and we have forgotten what thoſe ſins were. We remember them not ſo well as to name them all: not are we ſure to live hours enough to name them all: for we did them faſter then, than we can ſpeak them now; when everything that we did, conduced to ſome ſin. Yet we know them ſo well, as to know that nothing, but the mercy of our heavenly Father is ſo infinite as they. We have ſins of thought, word, and deed: ſins of omiſſion, and of action: ſins againſt God, againſt our neighbor, and againſt ourſelves: ſins againſt the Fathers Commandments, againſt the Sons Prayer, and againſt the holy Ghoſts Office: ſins againſt our own Creed, againſt the Laws of that Church and State wherein we live: ſins unrepented, and ſins relapſed into after repentance: ſins of ignorance, and ſins againſt the testimony of our conſcience. If this Arithmetic cannot reach home to the number of our ſins, we know what will: O Lord, pardon us all thoſe ſins, which thy Son Jeſus ſuffered for, who ſuffered for all the ſins of all the world.

If one man have ſo many ſins, how infinite an heap do the ſins of all men amount unto? And how immense muſt that Book be, where all thoſe ſins are engroſſed? We may ſay of our evil deeds, what the Evangelist ſpeaks of the holy acts of Chriſt; that If they were all written, the world it ſelf could not contain the books. Yet ſo capacious is this Book of God's omnſcience; that every tranſgreſſion, from the higheſt blaſphemy to the leaſt infirmity, is not omitted. Quid iſt Babylon tutum, ſi in Jeruſalem tale ſcrutinium? What ſhall the ſhrub of the deſert do, when the Cedar of Paradiſe ſhall be ſhaken? If they do this in the green tree, what will they do in the dry? The Lambes may well be afraid, when the Lions tremble. It ſhall not be a ſummary, confuſed, or indigeſted examination; but exact and particular, as it were by the book. The adulterer ſhall not only be charged with that filthy act, but with all the circumſtances preceding, preparing, conducing, and attending on that uncleanness: Thus he plotted, thus he perſuaded, and thus he acted; as if all were now done over again in preſentation. Where then be thoſe Peccadillo's, which ſinners now rather make a matter of ſport, than the occasion of repentance? Alas there are no sins small, but comparatively: Christ died for all sins, and the least sin might be a thorn in his head, or a lash on his side. Many little boys at the Market-cross, make as great a noise as the crier. Even our little sins have no little cry in the ears of the Divine Justice: But they are rather now like little children, which by the day of judgment will be grown up to strong men, and with confusion challenge us to our faces.

7. The last Book is that with the Seven Seals, which only the Lamb that was slain, was found worthy to open. This is the book wherein lies all our comfort; containing the promulgation of their pardon and righteousness, that are washed in the blood of the Lamb. If we be tried by the Book of Nature, we shall be cast; for we have done unnatural deeds: Nature is depraved, corrupted; and who shall bring life out of corruption? The first man that God made, was saved; Adam was a Saint. The first man that was begotten of man, was damned; Cain was a Reprobate. Such difference there is betwixt God's workmanship, and ours; betwixt nature created and nature corrupted. If we be tried by the law written, O wretched men that we are, who shall deliver us? Even the very thought of that law, which condemns our very thoughts, is for the present a burning in the hand, in the private Session of our Conscience; before we come to hold up that hand at the bar of eternal Justice. If we must stand to the book of God's knowledge, and be judged by those everlasting Rols; we are so far from being acquitted, that we have not done one justifiable action all our days. Our transgressions are sealed up in a bag: but if we thrust our hand into that bag, there is not one good work to be found: Every line of this book is a sin, every leaf an age of sin: there is not a tittle of anything but sin. Only when God doth blot all our sins out of his remembrance, he doth (as it were) throw this book into the fire. As Caesar after the defeat of Pompey, having in his custody a casket, wherein he found letters written with his enemies own hands, sufficient evidence to condemn them, he burnt thē all, and forgave them; that no monument might remain for a future grudge. So doth Christ cancel & annihilate all the records of the sins of his chosen, that there might be no quarrel against them in heaven. If we should appeal to the book of our Conscience, we are condemned before we come to the trial: there sits a little Judge within, that tells us plainly what we must trust to: It is as a malefactor should labor to purge himself before the Judge, with the evidence of his crime sticking apparently in his bosom.

Well yet, though we cannot be saved by our book, by our own conscience; nor by the other books, the Registry of our iniquities: yet there be two Books of comfort for us, and by them we desire to be tried. The first is the Book of Life, God's eternal decree for our election; that sacred and immutable Record, out of which never was any name razed. The other is the Book of the Lamb, and the shedding of his blood upon our Souls. This book is not of a dark print, hard to read; but a fair large manuscript; the leaves of it pure untainted flesh; the letters, blood; the pens that wrote it, thorns and scourges: the clasps, nails: the binding, wood: the name of it, Jesus of Nazareth: the contents of it, mercy and Eternal Salvation. If my Conscience be at peace with me, I am not condemned yet: if this Book be afforded me, I shall not be condemned at all. O Lord, we humbly confess, that there is no vein in us, which is not full of the blood of thy Son, whom we have crucified, and crucified again, by multiplying many, and often repeating the same sins: That there is no artery in us, which hath not the spirit of error, the spirit of lust, the spirit of giddiness in it: That there is no bone in us, which is not hardened with the custom of sin, and nourished with the marrow of sin: That there be no sinews, no ligaments, which do not tie and chain sin and sin together: That our fantasie is in labor with the study, invention, and imagination of sin: That our memory is tenacious of nothing so much as sin: that with delight, it revolveth the remembrance of sin. That all these sins are upon Record, in those books which thou hast ordained for that purpose. Yet, O gracious Father, there is a Book which abrogates all these: and as the Sanctuary had the end in the Temple, and the Temple in Christ; so all these books have their end in the Book of the Lamb; if thou please to write our names there. There, O merciful God, write them; in that Book of satisfaction to thee, and of Redemption to us: and write the assurance of it in the present book of our conscience, the copy of that blessed Original: That when the day of judgment shall come, and all books are opened, nothing may be found in ours, but the righteousness of thy dear Son, and our sweet Savior Jesus.

5. The fatalitie and horror of this dreadful day to the wicked, is beyond all mortal Imagination. When at the sound of the Trumpet hell shall shake, all graves shall open, and yield up their prisoners. Though all this shall be done at once, yet our understanding cannot conceive it but through divers passages.

1. The suddenness of the Summons shall amaze them. Adoniah was justling himself into the not-yet-vacant Throne of his Father David: he feasts his friends, he jeeres his opposites, he boasts the prosperity of his design. On a sudden, the Trumpet sounds out King Solomon's Coronation, and this braving troupe is dispersed; and if you ask for their new Prince, he hangs upon the horns of the Altar. The ungodly will be banketing and solacing their sensual souls at the last day: But the Archangels Trump resounding the Almighty Solomon's Coronation, will put them to desperate shifts; and so much the more desperate, as they have no Sanctuary, whereunto they may fly for refuge.

2. The amazedness at the resurrection will be terrible; when the body shall be forced to rise, though it would lie still; and the soul be compelled to lie still in the body, though it would rise. Both their salutations shall be nothing but curses: the soul shall curse the body, that for the pleasure of that earthen dunghill, she hath lost inestimable joys: and the body shall curse the soul, that for the gratifying of such sensual desires, they must both suffer intolerable pains. Thus shall they meet together, not as companions, but as enemies: not as mutual helpers, but as reciprocal tormentors: not the body, as the house of a tenant, but as the prison of a malefactor. The prisoner had rather lie still in his comfortless dungeon, than be brought forth into the open air, to receive his sentence of condemnation. There is horror enough in the grave, yet is it a paradise to hell.

3. The very assembly shall daunt them: for this Judgment shall be before the whole Court of Heaven: in the presence of all the Angels, of all the Saints, like so many stars before the glorious Sun, the sinner shall be brought forth naked, deformed, leprous, monstrous. Then the proud harlot, that so admired her own beauty; and did set one hours fruition of it at a thousand crowns, shall appear more foul than any Gipsee, in respect of those whō for Gipsees she once despised.

4. The devils accusation shall distract them, because they know not what to answer. Thus will he plead; O just Judge! I never did this sinful man the least good turn, I never endured the least pain for his sake: yet still he bore a nimble ear to my directions, and a willing heart to execute all my devices: how perfectly is he transformed into mine Image? He knew me for his vowed enemy, yet he served me: Thee for his Maker, Savior, and best friend, yet he rebelled against thee. For him, thou hast done much good, and suffered much evil; thou hast opened the treasures of heaven to bless him, yea opened thine own side, and shed that precious blood to save him; yet he hath turned all that grace into wantonness, all that mercy into contempt. Nor is the devil the sole accuser of the ungodly; but all the sins they have done, shall be so many devils against them. Yea more, all the Creatures, which they have either not used to good, or abused to evil, are bound over to this Sessions, to join in their indictments against them.

5. The very goodness of the Judge shall make to the further aggravation of their wretchedness. When he shall ask their perverse Consciences, what they ever saw in him worthy of contempt? What want, either of perfection in himself, or of liberality towards them, did they ever find? What though I became poor? it was to make you rich. What though they stripped me naked? it was to clothe you with my garments. What though I died? it was to give you life. Would you despise my humility, who only therefore admitted it, to bring you to glory? Just cause shall they have to mourn before him, who have so ingratelously sinned against him. The covetous Churl shall mourn before that Judge, who despised all worldly riches. The proud shall mourn before him, that was both the Teacher and Example of humility. The ambitious aspirer to greatness shall mourn before him, that refused it when it was offered him: The drunkard shall mourn before him, who to expiate his intemperance, had a draught of gall and vinegar. The malicious and revengeful shall mourn before him, who did put up both contumelies and blows with patience. Whatsoever the Judge hath suffered in himself, he will commiserate in others: but what he hath ever detested to do, he will not forbear to punish. He will say to such as have been patiently miserable; You have been hungry, so was I: you have been persecuted, so was I: you have been scandalized, so was I: you have been killed, so was I. But to the rest; You have been uncharitable, so was not I: you have been proud, so was not I: you have been rebellious, covetous, luxurious, profane, intemperate; such I never was myself, when I was a mortal man, such I will not pardon now I am an immortal Judge. Most men are now rather afraid of miseries than of sins; yet miseries, not sins, shall find pity at the day of Judgment.

6. The horror of the sentence shall confound them: Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire. Few words, but full of bitterness. Depart from me, those are the words of separation: Ye cursed, the words of malediction: Into everlasting fire, the words of desolation: Prepared for the devil and his Angels, the words of doleful exemplification. Depart from thee, O Christ? Why thou art all sweetness, all Joy, all Peace, all Blessedness, All in all; therefore to depart from thee, is the universal loss of all. Thou art the greatest Good, therefore to be deprived of Thee, is the greatest evil. This Sentence is intolerable, and irrevocable. First, intolerable; if Belshazzar was so confounded at a temporal doom, which reached but to the loss of his Life and kingdom: what is it to lose Eternal Life, and the Kingdom of Heaven? When Christ was to be judged, he said but, I am he; and his apprehenders were stricken down with the word: How shall they be able to stand before him when he comes to judge, and shall say, I am he? He, whom you have contemned, abused, persecuted, crucified, by your obstinate rebellions? How will they look then? Loe, these are the men, that neither regarded the Lord's Promises, nor trembled, at his Judgments, and now they are confounded at his sentence. Secondly, it is irrevocable: here can be no appeal, for there is no higher Court. And whither should they go to complain? To God, whose Spirit they have grieved? To the Angels, whose Ministry they have abused? To the Saints, whose Righteous Souls they have vexed? Alas, There is no Vmpire, when God and man are at odds. There can be no writ of error to reverse the Judgment: but as Isaac said of Jacob, I have blessed him, and he shall be blessed: So will the Lord conclude upon the reprobates; I have cursed them, and they shall be cursed. This is a time of punishment, not of pardon. When we persuade men to work out their Salvation, by mortifying their sensual lusts, by abridging their voluptuous appetites, by a peremptory and resolute denying of themselves, that so they may enter into Heaven by the straight Gate; they answer us with our Masters flinching followers, This is a hard saying: But did they consider that final Sentence upon the neglect of this; Go, ye cursed, into everlasting fire; they would find, that that were a hard saying indeed. To day if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts: Otherwise at that day, your hearts shall melt at the voice you would not hear. For they shall tremble at the voice of his condemnation, that have shut their ears at the voice of his exhortation.

1. This convinceth all unbelief, all hesitation concerning the certainty of this day of Judgment: The devils believe and tremble: are there any Christians that come short of the faith of devils? They object to Christ; Art thou come to torment us before our time? There is no time wherein those evil spirits are not tormented: there is a time when they expect to be tormented yet more. They knew that the last Assizes are the prefixed term of their full execution: and this they also then understood not to be yet come. Though they knew not when the day of Judgment should be; (a point concealed from the glorious Angels of Heaven) yet they knew when it should not be: and therefore can say, Before the time. Even the very lost spirits confess, and fearfully attend a set day of universal Sessions: They believe less than Devils, that either doubt of, or deny that day of Judgment and final retribution.

2. This teacheth all men to be afraid of this day. When a King comes in State, and with royal Equipage, into a City of his Kingdom, there to solemnize his nuptials, or to be feasted by his Subjects; he salutes some, he graceth others, he looks and speaks cheerfully to all: But when he comes against a City of Outlawes, that have shaken off the yoke of allegiance, and fortified themselves within the walls of Rebellion; then fury sparkles from his eyes, Death and Destruction flameth from his sword. The first coming of Christ was to take a Bride, and therefore he appeared like a Bridegroom; mansuete and gracious to all; with Angels singing his nuptiall Anthems: But his next coming will be against traitors, when his Countenance shall be as a flaming fire, and pity shall be hid from his eyes. When the Pharisees brought the adulteress before Christ, he held his peace, but he wrote on the ground. God now is silent, and we think all safe: but he still writes up all our arrearages against this day of Audit. When the Law was given to Israel, Moses comforted them; Fear not, for God is come to prove you, and that his fear may be before you. What a charge was this? Fear not, and yet fear. Indeed this glorious appearing is dreadful, while the Lord gives his Law: but fear not this so much, as that second appearing, when he shall call for an account of this Law.

3. Let us admire that wonderful Patience of God, that to wicked men and spirits, respites the utmost of their torment, and forbears it to the day of Judgment. He might upon the first instant of the fall of Angels, have inflicted on them the greatest extremity of his vengeance. He might upon the first sins of our youth, yea of our Nature, have swept us away, and given us our portion in that fiery lake: he stays a time for both. Yet so much doth his mercy exceed to us lost men, over it did to the lost Angels; that he affords us not only a delay of punishment, but a fair conveniency of utter prevention: which to the evil spirits is altogether denied. They do suffer, they must suffer: and though they have now deserved to suffer all they must, yet they must once suffer more than they do.

4. What would a man give for a sure friend at that day? One good friend is a good Conscience; and happy is he that hath that friend in a corner: for when all the corners of the world shall be on fire, this shall stand forth to plead for him. But the best friend of all, and without whom we can have no friend at all, is the Judge himself. To make him on our side, let us now think no pains too great, no prayers too fervent. Let us trample underfoot these sinful vanities; and shake them off quickly, as Paul did the Viper into the fire; lest into the fire those Vipers shake us. Let us prostrate ourselves before Christ in the lowest degree of sorrow and shame, with the same confusion, wherewith an adulterous wife would in her penitence present her self to her injured husband. Pour we out our tears at his feet, and say; Lord, though we be full of impiety, yet thou art more full of pity: If we confess the one, wilt thou therefore deny the other? If our sins be greater than they ought, yet thy mercies are not lesser than they were wont. It could be no goodness in us, that procured thee to make us, but even thy love. It was no merit in us, that did win thee to redeem us; but even thy Mercy. Sweet Jesus, let that love which moved thee to make us, move thee also to save us: let that mercy which won thee to die for us, win thee also to save our life. It is late enough, but yet not too late, to call for mercy: and why should we languish away in silence? As it is impossible that Christ should forget the passions which he suffered; so it is not credible that he should not have compassion on us for whom he suffered.

2 PET. 3.8.

But (Beloved) be not ignorant of this one thing, That one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.

THat Atheistical Dotage of the worlds eternity being sufficiently refuted, our Apostle proceeds to satisfy and remove a scruple, which might arise in some better persuaded Conscience. If the Maker of this world hath determined an end unto it, Why is it so long deferred? Why are the wicked allowed so large a space of time, to domineer over the Righteous? It is answered, Though this space seem long to them, that Measure the Length of Time by the sharpness of their Affliction, as Minutes seem Houres, and Daies Moneths, to the Miserable: Yet it is not so with God, to Whom all things are present; Who hath neither beginning nor ending, but is the beginning and end of all things. If we be sick, and the Physician promise to visit us tomorrow with his best relief; With what a tedious longing do we expect his presence? When we have a long journey to go, With what weary Paces do we measure the way; peeing every step with a Furlong, and extending every Furlong to a Mile? Our imagination makes every Day of our sorrow appear like Joshua's Day, when the Sun stood still in Gibeon. The Summer of our delight is too short; but O the Winter of our Affliction goes slowly off. We cannot consider Time, otherwise than by numbering of Daies and Yeares: to Day, we speak of yesterday, and tomorrow: all these are as one moment to God. The first man that ever was, and the last man that ever shall be, is now as present to God, as our living selves. He that stands upon the bank of a River, sees only the passing stream: but another upon an high Tower, sees the water past and coming, as easily as the present. Time lies asloape before God, and with one glance of his Eye, He beholds all parts of it.

Could we but comprehend what eternity is, this mystery would be plain unto us. This life is preserved by feeding, digesting, sleeping, exercise: all which require the expense of time. Eternal life thinks of these temporary passages, as of a very dream. The dead body of a man lies buried in the Earth, moulders to dust, and knoweth nothing: yet when he riseth at the last Day, he will think he hath scarce slept an hour. Had he lived all this while upon the Earth, and seen the Generations of men succeeding one another, the innumerable multitudes rising and falling in this space; he would have judged it a great while. To our eternal Creator, all things are present; One day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. For Method, instead of a curious distribution, I will orderly raise such conclusions and observations, as are willingly colligible from the Text.

1. Beloved. This Evidence of his Love is used as a Preparation to his Lesson. No Doubt, Saint Peter wished the Conversion of those Unbelievers, who contradicted his holy Doctrine: But these better informed Souls, under his Charge, were far more dear unto him; to whom he was tied in an higher Bond than that of Nature, even the Grace of Jesus Christ: these he calleth his Beloved. You cannot esteem it a Point forced, or altogether begged at the Door of my Text, if I touch a little upon that Question, concerning the Degrees of Charity: For as we are bound to love all men, so (with our Apostle) a greater Measure of Love is due to some men. Charity looks to the preservation of three things; Piety to God, Purity in ourselves, Equity to others. There be different Degrees, but still it is the same Charity. God must be loved above all, Thy self next, and then thy Neighbor: and him As thyself. As sometimes imports a Likeness, not a Truth: in the Psalm, Righteousness is as the wings of a Dove. Sometimes a Truth rather than a Likeness: We saw his Glory, as the Glory of the only Begotten of the Father. Sometimes both: God manifested his Love to us, as to Children. Etsi non idem modus diligendi, tamen idem affectus diligentis. The Objects of Charity have their Degrees: Diligibile quod supra est, Deus: quod intra est, anima propria: quod juxta est, anima proximi: quod infra est, corpora nostra & aliena. A man is to love himself Priore Charitate, majore Charitate, both with the former and greater Charity: but it must be understood In bonds ejusdem ordinis, in good things of the same rank: for otherwise, he must love his Brothers soul before his own body. And that same, Thy Neighbor a•thyself, is a sicut of quality, not of equality. Friends have their due places in Charity, and their love is often great, as was David's and Jonathan's. Yet is it not allowable in Love, one Friend to die for another. If in a shipwreck, one having a planke, gives it away to his Friend, and perisheth himself, he is guilty of self-homicide. No man must let the Tenant out of the Tenement, till God the Landlord call for it. This is not to love another sicut teipsum, as thyself: but Plus quàm teipsum, more than thyself: yet to save a soul, Love bids us venture a Body.

If a man curse his father or mother, he was to suffer death for it; not so for cursing another: therefore we are not bound to love all alike. A man is to love his Wife more than his Child: he is tied to his Child with a natural Bond, to his Wife with a sacramental Bond. Howsoever the Romists disgrace Wedlocke, yet we appeal from them as not competent Judges. Men ought to love their Children above their Parents; according to that of Paul; Parents lay up for their Children, not Children for their Parents. Greater Reverence belongs to Parents, greater Love to Wife and Children. As Elkanah said to Annah, Am not I better to thee than ten Sons? We must love the tree better than the fruit: the Wife is the dearest. A man shall leave his Father and Mother, and cleave to his Wife: and they shall be one flesh. Therefore is the Wife put in the highest Gradation, by Moses: If any shall tempt thee to Idolatry, be it Neighbor, Kinsman, Brother, Father, or Vxor ipsa in sinu, thy Wife in thy Bosom; the nearest to thine Heart, thou shalt not consent. The nearer the jarre or breach of Love, the more grievous: Betwixt Neighbor and Neighbor, bad: betwixt Brother and Brother, worse: betwixt Man and Wife, worst of all.

Among all these Degrees of Love, that of the good Pastor to his Flock hath not the lowest place: Those Children cannot but be dear unto us, of whom we have been the Instrumental and Ministerial Fathers, to beget them to Christ, of the immortal Seed: they are our Beloved. Infants cannot help themselves, therefore God hath lent them Aliorum brachia & ora, the Feet of others, and the Arms of others, to bring them to the holy Sacrament; the Tongues of others to covenant for them, wherein they make their Proxey-Vowes: and it were unjust in us to deny them those helps of Charity. Some deeds of Love are Actus Innocentiae, to do no harm: others, Actus Beneficentiae, to do good. Job was so far from rejoicing at the destruction of his hater, that he did open his Door to the Stranger. Saint Paul saith that Love is the fulfilling of the law. First, because without this, the Love of God may be dissembled, and falsely professed. Next, because by this, our love to God is expressed, and our obedience to the Law manifested. We are not commanded to love everything in every man, no more than our Apostle did love their infidelity, to whose souls he wished felicity. I am bound to love another's Carnem non carnalitatem, corpus non corruptionem. Be Pagans no neighbors to us? yes, Proximus omnis homo. Even Beasts, though they be not Proximi, are yet Proximorum; and within the compass of our charity. There is Bonum cui, the person to whom we wish well: and Bonum quo, wherein we wish them good. May we have charity to the d•mned in Hell? No, there may not be so much as sorrow for them, but rather joy in the Justice of God. They are creatures of God naturally, but they are not so morally. No charity comes out of Hell, therefore no charity must descend into Hell. But the Devils do us some good; for while they assault us with temptations, and afflict us with crosses, they in effect help us to crowns? Yea, but this is not ex intention Daemonum, sed ex providentia Divina: Thus Iuvat vel ab host doceri; yet still no thanks to Satan, no charity to that enemy.

To conclude this point; Charity is Novum mandatum, Totum mandati, and Gratia praestantissima; the propriety of Christians. There is Amor among beasts, Dilectio among men, Charitas among Christians: that is their peculiar. All other Virtues may offend in the Excess: a man may be overjust, overwise, too humble, too patient; but he can never be too charitable. No man's Charity is perfect upon Earth, because it may be increased: but that which is perfect admits of no Augmentation. He that feareth, is not made perfect in Love. Some have affirmed, that Charity was more perfect in Paul, than in Adam ante Lapsus, before his Fall: It might be so Ration durationis, non ration vera perfectionis. As Demosthenes said of Pronuntiation or Elocution, that it was all the Points of Rhetoric: so Charity is all the parts of Religion. Faith and Hope do ourselves good, Charity spreads to others. Faith and Hope, like the Ship, bring the Passenger to Heaven, but then go no farther: Charity dwells with Him forever. It hath a glorious Reward: yet the Reward may be Causa exitans $\langle \phi \rangle$ finalis. Amor deus est, Love was a god, among the Heathen: Deus amor est, God is Love, saith the Christian.

If Charity be a Lamp in common persons, it must be a bright Star in the breast of Divines. Such a Jewel was in the heart of Paul, more precious than all the Stones in the Breastplate of Aaron; that he wished to be anathematized for his Brethren. Acerbius tulit illos non salvati, quàm seipsum perire: sure they were his Beloved. He wept for the Enemies of Christ's Cross: Nullus sic sua destevit peccata, sicut Paulus aliena. For this Love, Christ prepared our Apostle, by his threefold Question; Lovest thou me? If thou doest, Feed my Sheep. Doth not the same God invert that speech now to the People: Love you me? If you do, Feed my Shepherds? The Sheep are well provided for Spirituall, but the Shepherds are discouraged for the want of Temporall. In Love to you, we wear out our Daies, and weary out our Lives: cannot you, in Love to us, minister of your superfluities? You give your servants meat, that they may do your work: and shall your Minister be out of heart, through defect of maintenance? The Rabbins have a traditional conceit, that Abel or Seth, or some of those holy Patriarchs, burning their sacrifices on the Ground, did melt the Gold and Silver that was in the superficial Veines of the Earth: which they perceiving to be useful or commerce, did so employ it: As therefore it was found out in the service of God, to the service of God let it return? Let your painful diligence, and pour thankful beneficence, be real arguments, and mutual testimonies of our Love to each other, that we may all be blessed with the Love and favor of JESUS CHRIST.

Be not ignorant of this one thing] Here is an Antithesis, in respect of those Unbeleevers mentioned Vers. 5. They are willingly ignorant of this; but Be not you so. He that hath tasted and digested the sweet juice of knowledge, would be ignorant of nothing. But it is dangerous to be ignorant of that, whereof the knowledge is necessary. An Impostume bred secretly and insensibly in the body, is as perilous as an outward Ulcer, seen and medicined. The Day goes away nevertheless speedily, because a blind man does not see the Sun. He that travels securely without mistrust of Thieves, may yet fall into their clutches. Ignorance of our danger is so far from saving us, that it exposeth us unprepared to ruin.

Of this one thing] What so especially a thing is that? That one day with the Lord is as a thousand years. Why, Is there such an absolute Necessity of this Knowledge? May not a man be ignorant of that, and yet be saved? No, for it is a familiar expression of the Eternity of God:

and he that is ignorant of the Nature of God, is out of the Way to salvation. Indeed his Majesty is so great, that no man can behold it, and live: the very Angels cover their faces, when his Glory passeth by. Natural we are prone to fashion God to some form of our own: and according to our conception of some glorious Creature or admirable Light, or what other Image best pleaseth our fancy; such we imagine Him: for we are all borne Idolaters. These gross Conceits must be suppressed; and with Jacob, we must bury all our strange gods under the Oak of Shechem, before we set up God's Altar at Bethel. Let us banish all mental representations, as incorporeal Images, and conceive of Him simply, purely, spiritually; as of an infinite, omnipotent, and eternal Being; without Form, without Matter, without Composition, without all Limit of Thoughts. Whose Wisdom is his Justice, whose Justice is his Power, whose Power is his Mercy: whose Wisdom, Justice, Power, Mercy, is Himself. Adorare possumus, comprehendere non possumus. He is Good without Quality, Great without Quantity, Everlasting without Time, Present everywhere without Place, Containing all things without Extent, and Ordering all things without Trouble. We must think of Him, as One not to be thought of: at which height let us stay, and be content to wonder in silence: otherwise we shall lose ourselves in his Infiniteness. Howsoever, though we cannot conceive of Him as He is, let us never conceive of Him as He is not. It is observable, that when God did reveal his Glory to men, He did first exanimate them. So Daniel was enervated, John fell down as dead, the Apostles were cast into an Extasie. In that terrible Demonstration of the divine Power, Elijah wrapped his self in his mantle, and stood in the entering in of the Cave: his obedience drew him forth to the mouth of the Cave, his fear still hides his head. Had there not been much courage in the Prophets Faith, he had not stood out these affrightments, the forerunners of that awful Presence, though with his face covered. The very Angels do no less, before that all-glorious Majesty, than veil themselves with their wings. Far be it from us once to think of that infinite and omnipotent Deity without an humble Awfulness. Paul was so transported with his Rapture, that he could not tell whither his body about him or not. He had once said, Quod facio, nolo; I do what I would not: but now, Quod facio, nescio; I do what I know not.

Be not ignorant of this one thing] This binds us all to an holy Diligence, whereby we may fill our hearts with the knowledge of God. Scientia est Deum noscere, virtus colere: In Illo Sapiencia, in hoc Iustitia. There was in Paradise a Tree of Knowledge of good and evil, of which our first Parents were forbidden to eat. Either Sacramentally; because by it, they might know how good it was to obey, to disobey how evil: Or Experimentally, because the Event so fell out: as they were called The waters of Strife, because there was strife about them. Let us study to know good, the knowledge of evil will come fast enough. Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, nor the mighty in his strength, nor the rich in his wealth: But let him that glorieth, glory in this, that he knoweth me, saith the Lord. Why, the wicked know Him, the Devils know Him; they believe and tremble; they have a kind of belief, therefore they have knowledge. But the knowledge that saves us, is more than a bare apprehension of God: It knows his Power, and therefore fears Him: knows his Justice, and therefore serves Him; knows his Mercy, and therefore trusts Him: knows his Goodness, and therefore loves Him. I do not mean a comprehensive knowledge of God's Infiniteness; for so He only knows Himself: and when with that Philosopher, we have taken a seven nights time to consider of it, we may ask a fortnight more; and at the fortnights end, a month; and be at our wits end, at the worlds end, before we can make a satisfying answer; otherwise than his was, That the longer he thought of it, the more difficult he found it.

But knowledge to the Christian, is like his soul to his body; a kind of all in all. As it quickens, it is Anima: as it resolves, it is Voluntas: as it thinks, it is Animui: as it knows, it is Intellectus: as it deliberates, it is Men's: as it remembers, it is Memoria: as it judgeth, it is Ratio: as it desires, it is Affectus: as it breathes, it is Spiritus: as it feels, it is Sensus. So knowledge concurs to every grace: They that know thy Name will trust in thee; so it is Faith. Know the Lord, and tremble before Him; so it is Fear. Abraham knew God and called himself Dust and Ashes; so it is Humility. They that know Christ, will become New Creatures: so it is Sanctity. The Faithful know Christ, and relieve his poor Members; so it is Charity. Be wise, Know the Lord, and Serve Him; so it is all Piety. I have determined to know nothing among you, but Christ crucified; so it is all Christianity. Let us know the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom He hath sent; and so it is Eternal Life. As Feeling is inseparable to all the Organs of Sense: the Eye sees and feels, the Eare hears and feels, the Palate tastes and feels, the Nostrils smells and feels: So Knowledge is involved in every Grace: Faith knows, and believes: Charity knows, and loves: Patience knows, and suffers: Temperance knows, and abstains: Humility knows, and stoops: Repentance knows, and mourns: Obedience knows, and does: Confidence knows, and rejoices: Hope knows, and expects: Compassion knows, and pities: Thankfulness knows, and praiseth the blessed Name of God. As there is a power of Water in everything that grows: It is fatness in the Olive, sweetness in the Fig, cheerful Wine in the Grape, strength in the Oke, tallness in the Cedar, redness in the Rose, whiteness in the Lilie: So Knowledge is in the hand Obedience, in the knee Humility, in the eye Compassion, in the mouth Benediction, in the head Understanding, in the heart Charity, in the whole body and soul Piety. How miserably are they deceived, that think they can find the way to Heaven blindfold; as if Holiness were the Daughter of Ignorance? Alas, it will be more possible for them, and more easy, unto them, to weigh the Fire, or to measure the Wind, or call again the Day which is past, or recover the Verdure of the withered Grass, than to get Salvation without Knowledge. If there be such an answer to such as have known Christ, and so known Him, as to have prophesied in his Name, as a Nescio vos; How will He pour out his Indignation among the Heathen, that know not his Name; and in flaming Fire take Vengeance on those that know not God? But let us know Him, that we may love Him; and love Him, that He may both know and love us in Jesus Christ,

Be not ignorant of this one thing that one Day &c. Our Apostle, here, bends his full Artillery against the Despisers of the Deity: They are not only ignorant, but willfully ignorant: and so far from knowing God aright, that they will not confess Him at all. Light it self is so dim, that they cannot see it: and themselves are so far from themselves, that they cannot discern themselves, God is Light, so saith the Truth: and their souls are themselves, so saith their Philosophy. They and their souls are Strangers: as he complained of his sullen Neighbor; In urbe tota, Nemo tam prope, tam proculque nobis. Or like incestuous Myrrha, who could not enjoy her father as she would, because he was her father; Nunc quia tam meus est, non est meus, ipsaque damn. Est mihi proximitas. Like our pair of eyes, which easily see all foreign Objects, never see one another. O Wonder! That this great Light from Heaven, able to dispel all the powers of Darkness, should not make the scales of malicious ignorance to fall from their eyes. Now their quickest Sense is too slow to descry, one day their slowest will be quick enough to feel that there is a God. Do they live, without a soul? Can their Temperature consisting Ex quatuor mortuis, the four elements, subsist of it self one moment? Of dead, added to dead, no Life can arise: as of nothing, multiplied by nothing, will never arise something: millions of Cyphers will not so much as raise one Unit. They must needs find a capacity in themselves, which distinctly, and in a moment, can present them with the Heavens moving, the Stars shining, the Fire mounting, the Air peering, the Sea swelling, the Earth resting, Gemmes glistening, Varieties entertaining their thoughts. By their own Rule, everybody is so limited, that it cannot contain a thing bigger than it self. They are very little, and the World is exceeding great: How then can this Great be comprehended in that little.: The Body cannot be thus capacious, therefore it must be a Soul. While they are living, there is a thing within them, that waxeth as the Body waineth; and is wisest to prescribe, when the Bones and Sinewes are weakest to execute. It may be ere night, this Tennant departs, and then that earthy Bulk is no more able to grow, speak, or move, than a dull stone. Cannot this Soul within them, get so much credit of them, as to believe they have a Soul? The very natural could feel with one hand, that he had another.

But say they, we talk of GOD and a Soul, but they could never see either of both. The Poet brings in an old Strumpet jeering her spent Customer, with whom the World was at so low an Ebbe, that he was driven to ask days of payment for his Pleasure; with these words; Ocu•atae mihi sunt manus, credunt quod vident: Women of our Trade have eyes in their hands; if your present be so fine that they cannot see it, they think it so far off, that they shall never have it. Our gallant infidells have so long sucked the breath of their Courtesans, that they are come to Credunt quod vident too: Nothing will sink into their heads, that cannot be seen with their eyes, or felt with their fingers. They cannot see a GOD, the Fountain of all Natures, in so clear a Glass, as the Mirrour of all Creatures. Why should not a work so wonderful prove an Author as skillful? We are now in a Temple, and we never can think, that an Infants wit, or a Childes hand did build it. Can we behold a World so admirable, for the Capacity, Majesty, Firmnesse, Use, Order and Motion of it: and not find the Tract of Omnipotence in that firmness, of infiniteness, in that capacity, of Glory in that Majesty, of Goodness in that Use, of Wisdom in that Order, of Life in that Motion of it.

Were one of these political depose-God's an ingenious Alchemist, and should show us one of his rarest Magistrals or extractions: If we should judge it the distillation of some Peddlar Aqua-vitae man, would he not t•xe us of an Ignoramus. And yet shall this man observe an Heaven, abundant in variety of influence, managed by a consort of Motions, thwarting and yet not disturbing one another? Shall he tread upon an E•rth, which yields Bread to strengthen him, Wine to comfort him, Gold to enrich him, Drugges to heal him, wonders to astonish him? Shall he sails upon a Sea, which is an humor naturally spreading, and see it surging above the solid Earth, without superinundation? And not acknowledge a GOD to be the Maker and Moderator of this Heaven, the confirmer of this Earth, the controller of this Sea. The Earth, Water, Air, are huge Elements: who over-awes them to give their Substance, Moisture, and Breath; to the nourishing of little Plants and Hearbes? Is it not GOD? Who over-rules the fierce and sturdy Beasts, to yield their backs to serving, and their lives to feeding weak little Man? Is it not GOD? Could the greater be so subdued to the less, without an umpire of impeachable right, unmatchable power, unsearchable Wisdom? The Prince hath a power over the land and life of his Subject; yet should he command the greater to serve the less, how ill would they brook it? Would Nobles willingly condescend to serve a Groome? Would they fast to feed him, watch to guard him, die to save him? How then must we admire that Almighty Power, which hath commanded the Heavens to serve us, the Sun to give us light, the Earth to give us meat, the Creatures to obey us, the Angels to guard us, and his own Son to dy for us? Who else could compel honor to bow to baseness, learning to be taught by rudeness, power to be maniced by weak•••se, Millions to be won by Twelve, and the World to be caught by Fishermen? What Soul can revolve this wonderful variety, and be ignorant of the Deity?

I wonder whether these men believe, That they breathe in Summer, as well as in Winter: In Summer, they cannot see their own breath: but as cold grows on, it begins to appear. God's Providence, and their own Souls, are things of so subtle a Nature, that they cannot see them during the Summer of their pleasures. But when the Winter of Judgment comes, this will show them a GOD in their just sufferings; and in that Soul of theirs, which they would not believe they had, they shall feel an unspeakable torment. Then shall their pained sense supply the want of their Faith; Where lies all this anguish? It cannot be the Aking of a Head, nor the Gout in a joint, nor the Collicke in the Bowels; not a Hand or Legge, not a Back or Brest, that are thus vexed: But something so much more sensible than a mortal body, as the pains be greater than a mortal power can inflict. Their teeth have raged with pain; yet was it ease to this. They have lain under the Racke of the Wind or Stone, and found it ease to this. That they have felt was but momentary; but, What time shall put an End to that they do feel? Surely, it must be an immortal Soul, that suffers these indeterminable torments. And though they feel some strange thing which Eternity can inflict; yet it hath somewhat to inflict which before they never felt. O that man's fore-sight were as sharp as his sense?

Nullum elementum suo loco ponderat: in the bottom of the Sea, all the waves are no burden: out of the Ocean, to carry a Pitcher of Water is some Trouble. Within the sphere of sin, Men feel no weight: out of it, the easiest is very heavy. Therefore Ne doleas quae sentis, quia quae sentis, evasisti. Do not so much grieve for the sins thou feelest; because those thou feelest and sorrowest, thou hast escaped.

In the Old Law, when Violence was offered to a Virgin, if she cried out, she was not to die by the Law: but if she cried not out, she was to be punished. When the temptations of Satan set upon the Soul, and his assaults offer her violence; if she cries, and strives, and resists, she shall not die. Sin may hang like a Viper upon Paul's hand, and not poison him: it may bring a potential guilt, not an actual: or a damnabilitie, as the School speaks, but not damnation.

Oh how happy were I, if I could work in your hearts a true sense of these things? How joyfully should I present such a Soul to GOD? With what sweet Hymns of consorted Angels would Heaven entertain us? But if more would come in and our company increase, how then would that spacious vault ring? How great would the joy of all be for each ones part, how full would each one make the number of all?

[Use.] 1. Let us learn to know GOD, that we may avoid the things that offend him. Every sinner is ignorant: not that all do sin out of ignorance, but they become ignorant by reason of sin. They shall walk like blind men, because they have sinned against the LORD. The first punishment of a sin is caecitie of Mind; and caecitie of Mind is the cause of future sin.

If a thief should lose his eye in the very act of his robbery, would not all men call this a present Judgment? Oculum cordis amisit, & ei pepercisse putatur Deus? When Joseph was thrown into the pit, his brethren sate down to eat, with no more compunction, than Esau having sold his Birth-right, fell to his pottage. What stranger can think of poor innocent Joseph, crying naked in that desolate and dry pit, saying that he moistened it with his tears, and not be moved? Yet his hard-hearted brethren sit them down carelessly, with the noise of his Lamentation in their ears, to eat bread: not once thinking by their own hunger, what it was for Joseph to be affamished to death? Covetous oppressors, after they have sold all Conscience of Religion for money, and laid up their poor debtors in the pits and holes of prisons; fall with as good a stomach to their dinners, as if they had never known Jesus, nor his distressed members. Put out Samsons eyes, and you may easily bind him to the Mill, as the hooded Hawk is bound to the Perch. Have you not read the Eagles policy to kill the Hart? She gets to the sand, and there rowles and involves her self, till she hath filled and laden her wings with that dusty burden: then springing up to the head of the beast, she so shakes this gathered sand into his eyes, that it blinds him: thus she claws out his eyes with her talons, and by degrees kills him. It is the devils plot, with the dry earthly dust of these worldly things, to blind the understanding of sinners, and so to take and lead them captive at his pleasure. Fantasie puts up the Game, the Affections hunt it full cry; if Reason once blow the horn, we are lost. How could it be else, that men should seek for content in vanities and vexations, whiles they vilipend those precious merchandize of Heaven, which can only enrich them: but that the Devil shows them things that are not, as though they were; as Painters draw Pictures, rather according to their own Imaginations, than the true Nature of the things they represent? As Merchants show the best of their wares, and magnify that; but conceal all the blemishes and defects: or as blind affection takes even deformity for beautiful: so to the ignorant, Satan can pass odious vices for absolute virtues. If Christ should ask us, as he did that blind man, What wilt thou have me do for thee? We might well answer him, as he there did; Lord, that I may receive my sight. Till we know the Lord, we cannot be happy.

2. Let us learn to know Christ, that we may know God: for we cannot know the Father, but by the Son. I know my sheep, and am known of mine. Indeed Christ is called The hidden Manna. First, hidden to Nature, for that could not see it, till the Gospel did reveal it. Secondly, hidden to unbelief; for that cannot see it, though the Gospel hath revealed it. Thou, O Father, hast hid these things from the prudent: they are hidden to the wisest Naturians. If our Gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost: so it is hidden to lost and unbelieving Christians. It is not so much Scientia capitis, as Conscientia cordis, that knows Christ. He is a Treasure, which many know where to find, but they will not go to the price of it: not the being, but the worth and value of him is hidden. He is not only our Teacher, but our Example: in both easy to be known. The conclusion of his gracious works was, Exemplum dedi vobis. Bear ye one another's burdens: why? So you shall fulfill the Law of Christ: The Law not only of his Precept, but of his Example. Forgive one another: how? As Christ forgave you. Love one another: how? As I have loved you. Be ye humble and meek: how? Learn of me. Be ye patient: how? As Christ hath left you an Example. Still as we run our Race, let us Look unto Jesus. For this cause he was lifted up like the Brazen Serpent, that we might behold him. If a man's occasions compel him to travel in the night, he will follow him that carries the Light: Christ is the Light; let us be sure to follow Him, and we shall not stray in darkness. As ye have received Christ, so walk in Him: how can they walk in Him, that have not received him? He that would be drawn to the life by a Painter, patiently and intently sits him: if we would be conformed to the Image of Christ, let us fasten our eyes upon him, and never so much as turn our countenances to the world. The lives of the Saints, to the Life of Christ, in regard of example; are as the writings of the Fathers, to the sacred Scripture: Even the stars that are obscured in the Light of the Sun, are profitable in his absence, to give light to the world. But what are those borrowed and glimmering sparks, to that glorious Sun of Righteousness, Christ himself?

Jesus is the subject of all tongues, but not the object of all hearts: The School disputes of him, the Pulpit preaches of him, Profession talks of him, profane ones swear by him, few rightly know him. This Manna is near enough to their doors; Sed non colligunt, quia non diligunt: non diligunt, quia non intelligent. God meant him the public Redeemer; his Life approved him openly, his Death was executed openly, his Resurrection was published openly, the Gospel proclaims him openly, Preaching manifests him openly; all these ways he is open: it is only unbelief that keeps him hidden. The Kings of the Earth look for Allegiance in their Subjects, though they never saw their faces. And the Kings of Persia and Mexico were wont seldom or never to come abroad, or to be seen of the people, to beget in them a more awful dread, and greater opinion of their State and Majesty. But our heavenly King exposeth himself to all: Voluit omnibus nosci, qui voluit pro omnibus nasci. It is we that are blind, the Sun denies not his Light: God does not hide Christ from us, but we hide ourselves from Christ. The Peasant in the Country knows there is a King in the Court: but he apprehends not his Magnificence: and not knowing his person, passeth by him as an Neighbor; and it may be, at their meeting, takes the way of him. In many things, Familiarity breeds contempt: but here, strangeness and ignorance hath made men so profanely insolent, that they scorn, their own humor should give place to the Prince of Heaven, the Son of God. Would not a man be ashamed, to have the name of a Physician, and be utterly ignorant of Medicine? Or a Mechanicke to be called a Carpenter, and know not what belongs to a Rule? What other is it for a Christian, not to know the Rules of Christ, the way to Eternal Life? Therefore do the evil persecute the good, because they are evil: and therefore are they evil, because they are ignorant. Had the Princes of this world known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of Glory. But as it fared with Israel in Egypt, after the indulgence of the former Pharaohs, there arose up a new king which knew not Joseph: Persecutors, that know neither Joseph, nor Jesus, will be far from Mercy. Those things which the ground naturally produceth of it self, she brings forth in abundance; but what is sown, not without much labor: because she is to those a Mother, to these a stepdame. The World favors and honors her own: but the Righteous are Strangers to her, whom she neither knows nor respects. There can be no Love without Knowledge: Zeal it self will grow wild without this corrective. Iron may be hot and softened in the fire; but without the hammer, it puts on no new form. A tall man upon some high Turret, seems to us on the ground, scarce a boy in stature: Therefore we think nothing in Heaven to be worth the having, because we grow upon Earth, and all there is out of kenning. Ignorant people think that the Moon is the biggest star but the Sun; whereas the Learned find it by Demonstration, to be one of the least. But Mercury, our Evening-star, though it seem the greatest next those former two, is in truth, the least of all. The reason why they appear so big, we easily conceive, because they are so low. Things of this world, for their short lasting, and often changing, are compared to the Moon; whose motion is swift, and her face diverse. For their pliability, they are like to Mercury, whose property is to be either good or bad, as the star is with whom he is joined. Yea, there is a third reason of similitude; for these temporal things, like those planets, show fairer because they are nearer; and bigger, because they are lower than better things. But could we get up to the top of Jacob's ladder, there to see and know our God, we should both descry the sophisticated greatness of things transitory, and the infiniteness of eternal glory.

3. Lastly, having got the knowledge of God, let us be sure to remember him. Remember thy Creator, in the days of thy youth. Where we have an act enjoined, Remember: an object presented, thy Creator: a time prescribed, In the days of thy youth. Job confesseth that GOD did write bitter things against him, when he made him to remember the sins of his youth: yet still in the days of our youth let us remember GOD. To remember, is sometimes used for consideration; Remember thy Maker: sometimes for prevision, Remember thy end: sometimes for Caution; Remember Lots wife: sometimes for Injunction, Remember to sanctify the Sabbath: and in respect of thanks-giving: so Pharaoh's Butler forgot Joseph, that is, he was not thankful to him. The Romans had their Ancestors pictures in their houses, thereby to stir them up to the imitation of their nobleness. There can be no picture of an infinite and invisible GOD: but there is no creature, which doth not occasion us to remember him. The understanding is hardly wrought upon, therefore we have many precepts: the will is hard to tame, the affections are stubborn to be rectified: but it is easy to remember. No seal can be set on running water, nor goodness be begotten in a forgetful hearer. There is a sensitive memory that shall perish, but the intellective memory is the Soul it self. Know therefore, that thou mayest remember, remember that thou mayest practice. Without impression, meditation hath no ground: without meditation, impression hath no growth. GOD begun his Law, with Remember who brought thee out of bondage: Christ instituted his Holy Sacrament, with Do this in remembrance of me. We had better never have known him, than not remember him. The merciful and gracious Lord hath so done his marvelous works, that they ought to be had in remembrance. Therefore, Bless the Lord O my Soul, and forget not all his benefits. Let our memory be the Gallery of our Soul, hung all about with the Pictures and Stories of GOD'S mercies and blessings towards us. Let us remember him at all times in this our Pilgrimage; and He will hear us, when we pray with that penitent Thief; Lord, remember us in Thy Kingdom.

One day is with the LORD, as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.] Diuerse interpreters have derived this Sentence out of the Psalm: A thousand years in thy sight, are but as yesterday, when it is past. If two Harps be placed together, and tuned alike; when you strike a String of the one, you shall hear an vnison answer of the other, by reason of the Consent and Harmony between them: Such an Accordance hath the New Testament with the Old, being both tuned by the same Spirit; that the Sound and Tone of the one is rendered by the other: and it is true of them, what was fancied of those Twins; they neither frown nor smile, but both together. DAVID and PETER wrote in distant times, and with several pens; yea, they were the several pens of the same Holy Ghost: yet (without wonder) they Record the same thing. Face doth not more answer to. Face in the Water; than APOSTLE doth answer to PROPHET in the SCRIPTVRE.

Out of this place, and that other in the Psalm, have been collected dangerous Tenants. First, that the world shall last but six thousand years, as it was made in six days: because a thousand years with the Lord, is but as one day. The inventers of this opinion, I take to be the Hebrews: who have curio•sly observed, that Aleph, is six times repeated in the first verse of Genesis, for the beginning of the world: out of which they strangely pick the duration of a, which they limit to 6000. years. Those Rabbins, Solomon and Isaac are principally taxed for it. Among the Ancients, Jerome, Lactantius, Justin, Hilary, Ire•a: of the later Authors, Picus, Mirandula, Franciscus, Venetus, Galatinus: to omit Trismegistus, the Thalmuds, the Sybils. But why should men presume to find out that which God hath hidden from the Angels? Secondly, there is an opinion, that because it is said of Adam, thou shalt die in the same day thou eatest of the forbidden fruit: a day is not there to be taken strictly, according to our account of days; but as it is with God, before whom a thousand years are but as a day: and because Adam died within a thousand years after, therefore he died the same day. God indeed appointed to Ezekiel forty days for forty years, each day for a year; but that he appointed Adam a thousand years for a day, is a strange and strained collection. So the Papists would have that thief to pass from the Cross into Purgatory; notwithstanding, that promise; This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise, because a thousand years with God are but one day. But it is not said, they are one day, but as one day; and in the sight of God, that is in respect of eternity. But my purpose is not to trouble you with these nice in pertinences. I come to some observations and conclusions.

1 Time is that inferior Parent and devourer of things: time gave them composition, and time will bring them to dissolution. Heaven and Earth shall wax old with time: The world began with time, and time with it. Quicquid movetur, movetur in tempore, That which changeth, habuit primum, & habebit ultimu•. The world changeth from Spring to Summer, and then to Autumn, till at last, w•ter bury all in death, but that which shall be restored in the resurrection. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ▪ time is a wise workman: nay, but rather he was a wise workem•n that made time. We must distinguish of precedencies; what is first in Eternity, what in Time, what in Election, what in Original. In Eternity G•d go• before all: in Time, Flos fructum, the flower is before the fruit: in E•c••, Fructus florem, the fruit is before the flower: in Original, Son•s can•um, the sound is before the song. If we ask what is first? God, the An• ent of d ye••der God and his glory, what appears beautifullest.? The world: what is g•test? Place: what is swiftest? the Mind: what is strongest? Necessity: what is wisest? Time, the inventor of Arts. Time was, when ignorance and blind opinion did defy Asculapius, for drawing of a tooth: and Vulcan, for making a lock; for he knew not how to make a clock: There was no clock in Rome about three hundred years before Christ, if we believe antiquity. But now Time hath perfected skill, discovered new worlds, found out the artillery of Gunnes, those demolishing engines; invented Printing, a rare means to disperse knowledge, and opened unto us the mysteries of nature. It is called the Parent of truth: yet this beginner, is also a waster. Tempus edax rerum: therefore is Saturn painted, eating up his own children. Time saw the Creation, shall shall see the dissolution, together with all the changes and chances in the proceeding: yet I will tell you what Time never saw. It never saw the righteous forsaken, nor their seed begging their bread. It never saw God forget his promise, nor Christ lose his purchase: it never saw the soul of a believer perish. We may truly say of this great work of our Redemption: Neque Doemonis ira, nec ignis, Non ferrum poterit, nec edax abolere vetustas.

2 God is the Creator, Disposer and Preserver of Time: who spans the world in his fist, and measures the waters in the hollow of his hand: Who brings forth W•zzaroth in his season, binds the sweet influences of Pleiades, and looseth the bands of Orion. It is not for us to know the times, which the Father hath put in his own Power, He made time, the motion of Heaven to measute it; hours, days and years to distinguish it: Only he can give time, that is above all time. Man may shorten thy natural term some years, he cannot lengthen it one hour. The Priest may do a thing which he cannot undo: he can tie a matrimonial knot, which he cannot loosen. The Prince may undo a thing which he cannot do: he can dissolve the marriage knot between the soul and the body, which being undone, he cannot tie again. Only God Omnipotent can do and undo, divide and reunite, kill and give life, increase our time or lessen it. He is Pater aeternitatis, and Dominus temporum. So he created it; Let them be for seasons: So he renewed it; Day and Night, Summer and Winter shall not cease: So he continues it; There is a time for all things; unto the dissolution of the world. For time had no being before, nor shall have after. Not before; therefore the Scripture says, Ante tempora seculorum, and Ante jacta mundi fundamenta. Nor after for the Angel swears, There shall be no more time. In that City, there shall be no night, but everlasting day, which is Eternity. What needs any Generation, where is no corruption? Or distinction of that by time, which admits of no accident, no permutation? I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come. Some think these three times belong severally to the three Persons: Because the Father is called o•, I am: the Son. He that was; In the beginning was the Word: The Holy Ghost, which is to come: The Comforter shall come. But indeed every term belongs to every Person; and all time, past, present, or future, is only the Lord's. Therefore • must say with the Apostle; doth any man lack time? as he, Doth any man lack wisdom, let him ask it of God? If men want silver, let them ask the rich: if counsel, let them ask the learned: if help, let them ask the strong: if countenance, let them ask the Noble: But with time, none can supply them but God. Yea, and let us return all time to his glory: He is our first letter, Alpha, let us begin with him: he is our last, Omega, let us end with him.

3 Our whole life, be it never so long compared with God, or presented to measure with eternity, is so short, as if it were nothing. The longest liver reached not to a thousand years, and that is not a day unto God. Thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end. Are thy days as the days of man? Aeternitas Dei est interminabilis: vitae ipsius tota simul, perfectaue possessio. He is called The living God: It is an ancient and usual title to the Almighty; especially when he would disgrace an unworthy rival. As Saint Paul in his speech to the Lystrians, opposes to their vain Idols, the living God. I need not make man worse than he is, nor his condition more miserable than it is: but could I, though I would? As a man cannot flatter God, nor over-praise him: so he cannot injure man, nor undervalue him. He is made to possess months of vanity. Menses, ecc• brevitat: fatuos, ecce vanitas. Paul calls the whole time of our life, Hodie, today: Long life is but a summers day: short life, a winters day: troublesome life, a gloomy day. But it should seem, a day is too long a word for it▪ therefore Isaiah calls it momentum, hid• thyself for a moment: and David, Nihilum, mine age is nothing. The several laborers that were called into the Vineyard at several hour, received an equal reward; because a thousand years to God are but as one day. The Prophet Haggai, foretelling the coming of Christ almost five hundred years before hand, calls it but Modicum, a little while. So vain a thing is man: but, As I live, is the oath of God: neither do I remember anything, besides his holiness and his life, that he swears by. He is, he lives; and nothing is, nothing lives absolutely, but he: all other things by participation from him. In all other things, their life and they are two: but God is his own life, and the life of God is no other than the Living God. And because he is his own life, he is Eternal. Of such validity was the argument of Thomas against the Gentiles: Nothing ceaseth to be, but by a separation of life; and nothing can be separated from it self: for every separation is a division of one thing from another. But the Living God is a simple, absolute, and eternal Being. There is no similitude that can bear any proportion, in the illustrating of this point. A furlong is a great journey to a Snail, to a Horse or Hound it is nothing. A hundred miles is a greater journey for a man by Land, than a hundred leagues by Sea. A Ship with a forewinde, will reach far in a day: what is it to the voyage of the Sun, that every day surrounds the world? In all these there is an intervenient necessity of place, time and motion; which belong not to the infinite eternity of God.

4 We may read hear the great difference between the Divine blessedness, and our happiness in this world. All our pleasures or benefits have their times, and are denominated according to the seasons wherein they befall us. Of so poor elements is our happiness made, that time must concur to the being of it: and that we can scarce call anything, is the something; the main thing the essential part of our false happiness. All things are done in time, and what is time, but the measure of motion? It may seem to have three stations; past, present, and future: yet the first and the last of these are not; one is not now, and the other is not yet. And that which we call present, is not now the same that it was, when we began to call it so: Before we can pronounce the word [Present] or the monasyllable [Now] the present and the now is past. Well then, if this imaginary half-nothing, Time, be of the essence of our felicity, how can it be durable! Time is not so; nay, how can it be at all? Time is not so; not so, considered in any parts of it. How poor a felicity is that, which consists in a watchfulness to lay hold upon occasion; which yet is but a little piece of that which is nothing, Time? And yet the best things are beholden to this Nothing, for all their something. For what content do we find in things out of season? Let the Prince give a title of honor to a man on his death-bed, can it mitigate one pang he feels! What is the name of a Lord to him, that shall not live to hear himself called so? that shall never come into the people's eyes, to receive honor from them who give it? Pleasures and possessions, presented to us out of time in our decrepit age, lose both their names and natures: They are not pleasures to us, who have lost our sense to taste them: they are not possessions to us, who are departing from the possession of them: we will soon be weary of them, when we are once weary of ourselves. Youth is the time that denominates them; the season that makes them pleasures or possessions: And when they are presented to us in an unapprehensive age, they come as a Cordial when the bell rings out, as a Pardon when the head is off. Thus are we bound and bounded with time: but God is eternity, and into that time never entered. For eternity is not an everlasting fluxe of time; but time is a short Parenthesis, in a long period: and Eternity had been the same as it is, though time had never been at all. There is Eternity, that hath neither beginning nor end; which is God himself: and there is perpetuity, that which we call everlasting Life, the state of our Souls in glory: this hath a time to begin in, but it shall out-live Time, and be when Time shall be no more. Now what a minute is the life of the durablest creature, compared to this Everlastingnesse? What a minute is man's life, in respect of the Suns, or a Trees? The world is not a minute to eternity, Mans life, but a minute to the worlds: Occasion is but a minute to our life, and yet we scarce apprehend a minute of this occasion: we do not lay hold on this opportunity, wherein we may receive good, and become blessed.

4 I am loath to pass this point, without some useful application. God is eternal, and may do all things at his own leisure: whether it pleaseth him to do the work of a thousand years in a day, or extend the work of a day to a thousand years. But we are limited to time for all our actions: and as we are sure our life shall not reach to a thousand years, so we are not sure that it shall last out a whole day. He that observeth the wind, shall not sow: but he that observeth not the time to sow, shall never reap. It is a preposterous course, while the ground is ready, the weather seasonable, the Oxen in heart, the Instruments at hand, to sleep: and then to begin sowing, when others are ready to reap. He that plays all Summer may dance all winter, but he shall have sory music to it. The old world had a time, while Noah preached: Sodom had a time, while Lot admonished: Pharaoh had a time, while Moses wrought wonders: Jerusalem had a time, during Christ's doctrine and miracles: the rich churl had a time, while Lazarus begged crumbs: but both they lost time, and time hath lost them; for they are cast into that darkness, into which time cannot enter: It is a long night, when it will never be day. Abraham, Samuel, David, when they went about their holy businesses, rose early. Christ, with his Auditors, came to Church early. Mary came to the Sepulcher early; In the first day of the week, and first hour of the day. Too many defer it till the last week of their life, the last day of the week, the last hour of the day, the last minute of the hour. But let us not build upon Mercedem adepti undecimae horae operarij, that they had their pence, which came into the Vineyard at the eleventh hour: For it was not operis, sed misericordiae; his mercy that gave them, not their merit that earned them. There can be no more earnest way of getting in, than knocking; nor more innocent souls than Virgines: And then think there can be but small hope, of that mercy at the last hour, which hath been so strange as to give no ear, to so great a suite, as knocking, and of so young and innocent, as Virgines. But it may be you stick at that singular example of the penitent malefactor, who found favor at the last, a good death, the conclusion of a bad life, and went up from the Cross to the Crown. Do not venture on the hope of that happiness with the loss of present repentance. Athanasius says of that thief, that he was always a thief: Living, he was a thief, and stole from men: dying, he was a thief and stole from God. He stole from men the goods of this Earth, by an injurious surreption: He stole from Christ eternal good; even the kingdom of Heaven, by his humble confession. All men have not the luck to steal themselves into Heaven, in spite of Hell: many have the fate, to cozen themselves into Hell, in spite of Heaven.

5 Let us be covetous of no worldly thing but time: and of this not for the duration of our pleasures, but to work up the salvation of our souls. For he that desires time to gratify the sense of his lusts; is not unlike that Epicure, who wished a Cranes neck to prolong the sweetness of his meats. There is no usury lawful but this: not that men should sell time to improve moneys, but husband time to improve grace: If otherwise, a long time shall bring but a long reckoning: For Quantum temporis nobis impensum est, exigetur à nobis qualiter expensum est. When God gives us time to do the business we came for; it leaves us either without imperfection, or without excuse. Sicut non capillus de capite, sic nec momentum peribit de tempore. Neither a hair shall perish from our heads, nor a moment from our times. Redeem the time saith Saint Paul: Many things are far fetchd, and dear bought, fit for rich purses, and curious palats: But there is a poor contemptible herb in the Garden, more precious than they all; Time: this we pass by in neglect, yet this is especially worth our gathering. The price of it appears in the diminution: nothing besides, is of that nature, for it is diminished by addition. Every hour added to our time of life, is so much time taken from life. If a day be added to our beginning, we are by a day nearer our ending. Each step sets us forward to our graves; and we are nearer now, than when we entered the Church-doors. Yea when it is past, it is past recovery. If a man lose his health, it may be recovered again by physic and diet. If he lose his goods, they may be found again; as we have heard of Jewels lost in the sease, and yet brought home again in the bowels of fishes. Though he lose his life, it shall be restored him in the resurrection. Yea, some have lost the feeling of the favor of God, and found it again by repentance. Only time once lost, is never to be found. We may say of opportunity, as he wrote of virginity. Jewels once lost are found again, this never: It's lost but once, and once lost, lost forever. Time goes away by minutes, therefore is not perceived: the shorter steppes it taketh, the more insensibly it passeth. Therefore as it steals upon us, let us welcome it with good industry: and as it steals from us, let us send it away with a good testimony: Thus though it quickly leaves us, it shall not leave us worse than it found us.

6 The narrow capacity of mortal men, wonders how it is possible for God to dispatch so much business in so short a space. The last Audit is called The day of judgment: a day consists but of twelve hours: what are twelve hours to try the several causes of twelve millions, as the Disciples said: Here are five loaves, but what are they among five thousand. Two Judges have much ado to hear two hundred causes at a Session: this last universal Assizes shall have the appearance of all the world; and can they all be judged in one day? Yes, why not in one day, as well as in a thousand years, seeing a thousand years with God is but as one day? Are thy days, as the days of man, that according to his measure thou shouldst search after sin? Man must take his times for doing justice, as some read that of the Psalm, not disagreeing from the Original: When I shall take a set time, I will judge uprightly. It was a temptation able to shake any man, but a David, when he sees Saul in his cave, and hears such an argument urged by his followers: This is the day of which the Lord hath said, I will deliver thine enemy into thine hand. The time, the place, the color of Justice, and a pretence of the promise of God, seem to carry such command; that David must be wanting to Heaven and himself, if he let slip this occasion. Malice is ever provident, and lays hold upon opportunity: that more subtle enemy of Hell will lose no time, but hath great wrath, because he knows he hath but a short time. The Priests came up by steppes into the Temple: The Angels came down to Jacob by steppes upon the Ladder: But we find no stair by which God himself came to Adam in Paradise, or to Sodom in his anger: for he and he only, is able to do all at once. Thus easy is it for him, in a day to judge the causes of many thousand years, to whom a thousand years is no more than a day.

7. He, to whom one day and a thousand years are of equal length, can make our days longer or shorter, though they seem not so to us; or make them seem longer or shorter to us, though they be the same. Joshua might be thought to command the greatest Planets of Heaven, to stay their courses; Sun stand thou still in Gibeon, and thou Moon in the valley of Aialon. For Him that gave them both Being and Motion, to bid them stand still, is no difficulty, though the rareness deserves Admiration: But for a man, that lives by the influence of the Stars, while he is below on Earth, to command those glorious Lights in Heaven; it is more than a Wonder. It was not Joshua, but his Faith that did it: not by way of Precept, but of Prayer. God never got Himself so much Honor among the Heathen by one days Work; when five Kings and their huge Armies fell together, It appeared to the Israelites a longer Day than ever they saw before: but to the bleeding Amorites, a longer Day than it was. Faine would they have been shadowed under the Curtain of Night, and still they looked when the Evening should cease all pursuit: but the Sun had his Lesson; he must not go down, till they were all down before him: and the Evening must be red with the Sea of rebellious blood. The Sun and Moon were the ordinary gods of the Pagan World: and who did not look that their standing still but one hour, should be the ruin of Nature? But now they shall see, there is an higher God than these; to Whom they obey as Servants, and must do what He will have them. He that can extend the day at his Pleasure, doth no less for Hezekiah, than He did for Joshua. Shall the shadow go forward ten Degrees, or back ten Degrees? As if Heaven it self lay open to his choice; and were ready either to mend his pace, or retire for his confirmation. He that commanded the day a certain course of going on, doth now countermand it, to a retrait. All days are alike to God; one day shall be longer than another, to satisfy the Faith of his servants. Hezekiah fastens rather upon that sign which is more hard, more disagreeing from the course of nature; not without good reason. Every proof must be clearer than the thing to be proved; neither may there want a meet proportion between both. The going forward of the shadow was a motion no other than natural: the recovery of his health was against the ordinary current of nature: therefore the more difficult the sign, the surer the evidence. Now, either the Sun goes back in Heaven, that his shadow may go back on Earth: or no less miraculously, the shadow goes back on Earth, whiles the Sun goes forward in Heaven. Indeed the Prophet speaks of the Shadow, not of the Sun: either because the motion of the Sun is best discerned by the shadow, or the motion of the shadow is led by the course of the Sun. So the demonstration of this miracle was local in the Dial of Ahaz. It might be, not universal, in the sensible length of the day. The retrait of the Sun had made a public and noted change in the frame of nature: this particular alteration of the shadow in places limited, might satisfy no less, without a confusive mutation in the face of the world. Whithersoever; to draw the Sun back together with the shadow, or to draw the shadow back without the Sun; was a proof of that divine Omnipotency, With which a thousand years is but as one day, But it is probable, that this miracle was not so confined; for presently upon it, the Chaldees, who were curious searchers into the secrets of nature, especially into the motions of the celestial bodies, were brought by this Astronomical wonder to Jerusalem: that they might see the man for whose sake, the Sun forsook his place, or the shadow forsook the Sun. All this doth testify O Lord, that the day is thine, and the night is thine, thou hast prepared the Light and the Sun. Nature is forward to run her enjoined course; regular and pregnant to bring her work to perfection and light: and will not endure either the hastening, or retarding of man. She will not admit of preventions, nor anticipations, nor obligations upon her; for they are a kind of precontracts, and she will be left to her liberty: she will not be spurred, or forced to mend her pace, when she is disposed to bring forth vigorous and durable effects. We cannot make the July-flower spring up in January; nor keep back the Cowslip to August, nor the Vertumnall flowers to Autumn. We cannot bid the Fruits come in May, nor the leaves to stick on in December. A woman that is weak, cannot put off her ninth month to a tenth, for her delivery, and say she will tarry till she be stronger: Neither can a Queen hasten it to a seventh, that she may be ready for some other pleasure. The day will be but a day, and the night will be but a night to us: and our Equinoctial comes but twice a year. But with God it is perpetual Equinoctial; before Whom one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.

8. The Hope of man is nicely and dangerously placed: It hath a snare on the right hand, Presumption; and a pit on the left hand, Desperation. The presuming Conceit flatters a man, that he need not make such haste: one day any one day is enough to repent in: God is no Respector of Time; but At what time soever a sinner repenteth, he shall be forgiven. I cannot but be thus far indulgent to a sinners Conversion; that though his former life hath been blemished with infinite spots, yet if he now return, and begin to wash them away in his penitent tears: all that fowlenesse contracted in so many years, shall be forgotten, as yesterday when it is past: and the Divine eye will behold him, only as he is in the present state of grace. But let me not conceal from him withal; that as repentance makes the sins of a thousand years like one day; so apostasy from righteousness, makes the sins of one day appear like a thousand years. The wicked heart so extenuates his malice, as if it were nothing: and esteems his sin, as Paul speaks of an idol, that it is nothing in the world. Philosophy says it is nothing. First, Propter defectum, because it is a privation. Secondly, Propter effectum, because it is an aversion. Thirdly, Propter despectum, because it makes a man contemptible: Ens & Bonum are Termini convertibiles. But they shall find it something, when the sin of one day shall be punished with the torment of a thousand years, yea, of everlastingness. There will soon be an end of the reprobates sinning, there shall be no end of his suffering. The least moment of time, compared with ten millions of years, (because both terms are finite, and the one a part of the other) beareth, though a very small, yet some proportion. But one day to a thousand years on earth, is more than a thousand years to the perpetuity of Hell. So long as God shall live, so long must the damned die: and when he shall cease to be happy, then they also shall cease to be miserable.

9 For some use of this meditation: Seeing all times have an equal regard with God, who spans it in his hand at once: but time is a fugitive with us; and having past the morning, we are not sure to see the end of the day: Let us not protract our conversion, lest we losing our time to repent, repent forever that we once lost our time. Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth: And wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his ways? A young man? why not rather an old man; whose hairs, if they have any left, like a white field, put him in mind that the Harvest is near? Barre him of drunkenness, that like Barzillai cannot taste. What should he do with music that cannot hear? withdraw delight full objects from him, whose Lookers out of the windows be darkened. Let not him riot and revel out the night, that riseth at the voice of a bird. Loade not him with the robes of pride, to whom The Grasshoppers is a burden. Forbid him the society of beauties, whose desire doth fail. Let him forsake the vanities of life, that must forsake life it self; and get one foot into Heaven, that hath the other foot already in the grave. Desinat malum esse, quijam desinit hominem esse. Was not the Prophet mistaken? Is it not the old man, to whom this charge is given? But to take the young man from that pleasure, to which the heat of his blood invites him; to decourt young Absalom, the gallantest courtier of his time: to pluck the young man from his voluptuousness, that cleaves to it as the green Apple to the tree: so fetch lusty Sampson, from the lap of his Delilah: to strip the young man of his brave garments, pleasant companions, merry cups, proud revenges; and set him to seek humility in the dust, or tax him to the severe rule of mortification: it seems as unreasonable to flesh and blood, as for a man to have meat and a stomach, and be forbidden to eat: to have fire in his blood, and be forbidden to burn: he is ready to challenge us, as the Devil did Christ; that we torment him before his time. Vel tolle juventutem, vel concede voluptatem. But none can be too young to amend, that is old enough to die. Tantillus puer, tantus peccator: we are apt to sin, before we are able to sin. Youth is a petulant time, that courts vanity with a passionate fondness. Fly youthful lusts: fly them for they will haunt thee. Vicina est lapsibus adolescentia, Remember not the sins of my youth: Let us remember them, that God may forget them. And what age is fitter for the Service of God? Why are we called God's Primitiae, first fruits; if we do not offer him Primitias, the first fruits of ourselves? They had their Primitias Spicarum, ears of Corn: Panum, of loaves; and Frugum, of fruits in Harvest: The first were offered at Easter, the next at Whitsuntide, the third in September: Youth, middle age, old age, all must be dedicated to God. But the fruits offered in September, in old age; if none were presented before; are not acceptable to the Lord. Will he accept of our dry bones, when Satan hath sucked out the marrow? A tool that is broken in the work of the world, is not fit for God's building. Our middle age is given to ambition, our old age to covetousness: therefore in our youth, let us remember our Maker. The Market is open till the last bell rings; but contrary to the custom of the world; our penny-worths will not then be cheapest. Nehemiah complained, that they laid the heaviest burden on the oldest men: how unjust are we to ourselves, when we lode our most feeble old age with the greatest weight of all our holy business? who presents a torn book to a king? The book of religious conversation; begun only in thy old age, hath the leaves come out: God cannot read the beginning.

Some read that, In the days of thy youth; In diebus electionum, in the days of thy choice: And shall we choose no time to serve God in, but our old age? Sure, so long as we are able to choose that, we are able to choose a better than that. He that walks in the night, is ready to suspect every bush for a thief; nothing appears in the true shape: to him that repents not till he comes to his death-bed, shadows seem substances, a sigh passeth for true Repentance, a Lord have mercy on me for assured forgiveness; and a little dormitory Opium, for a saving cordial to the Soul. Say thy remorse be hearty, thy compunction bitter; yet is not this sorrow of thy Soul beholding only to the pain of thy body? Hadst thou rather a sickness should bring thee to God, than a Sermon? Is this the Physicians office, or the Preachers? If only Judgment can bring us to remember God, it is but a stormy day. Saint John wisheth to Gaius, That he may prosper in his health, so as his soul prospers: For if the Soul be lean, the marrow of the body is but water: if the Soul wither, the verdure and good estate of the body is but an illusion, and the goodliest man a fearful ghost. So let us wish to the younger age, that their souls may prosper as their bodies do, and that they may grow in Grace faster than in years; otherwise, a wrinkled and deformed soul may dwell at the sign of a fair face. It is usual with luxurious sinners, to lay the imputation of all their errors upon their bodies; as if their constitution were the sole cause of all their prevarication. But he that chargeth his body with the whole discredit of the vices of his Soul, is as very a fool, as he that carries his saddle, to shame his horse. The pain of the body hath often been a means of good to the Soul: I never knew the anguish of the soul conduce to the health of the body. Then we wisely redeem the time, when in the greatest reluctance of the body, we devoutly turn our hearts and souls to the service of our Maker.

Give me leave to explain this point by an Apologue, familiar to the weakest capacity. Four travellers were returning to their own city; a day was their limitation: they must be there before night, or else being shut out, they shall become a prey to the Robbers. The first is assaulted by some Ruffians, who so provoked him with uncivil language, that he draws and fights; and in that quarrel received such hurts that for want of a Surgeon, he is left behind: no city could he reach. The second meets with some boone Companions, who after the Preface of their drunken Complements, show him a Bush that promiseth wine: this went so liberally and merrily down, that the Sun was almost set before he thought of rising: then he would fain have reeled away, but neither he nor time could stand to it. The next hears of a Mine of Treasure by the way, but buried somewhat deep in the ground: he gets instruments, delves for it, and finds it: the more he digs, the more he gets; and still the more he gets, the more he digs. On a sudden it grows toward night; now he trusseth up his gold about him, and would be gone: but the burden was so heavy, that he could not travel with it, and he would not go without it. So the barred Gates frustrated all hope of his Entrance. The last went seriously on; and though many flattering friends still interrupted his speed, and persuaded him that he need not make such haste, he had time enough, it was but a little way home, and a great while to night; and so far importuned him, that he exchanged some words and Courtesies with them, took here and there a taste of their kind offers: Yet still thinking on the time, away he speeds; and make what haste he could, (though toward Evening he mended his pace) yet it was almost night before he arrived thither; and by staying a little longer, he had been shut forth forever.

The Moral is easy and useful: The City is the Heavenly Jerusalem, the four Travelers are four conditions of men, the contentious, the voluptuous, the covetous, and the Religious: the Night before which they must attain thither, is the End of their Life: the Gates are the Opportunitie of Grace and Mercy: the enemies that surprise them if they be shut out, are Satan and his Angels. The first resolves to be at Heaven by Night, but Trouble meets him in the form of a wicked Law-broker, and puts such tricks into his head, whereby he may vex his Neighbors; that he presently draws his Sword, which is some Writ or Proesse, and furiously lays about him. Till, having tired out all his Adversaries, he wearies the Judge, the Advocate, the Attorney, and (which is most strange his indefatigable Sollicitor, and makes his peripatetical profession tedious to him. The Lawyer hath his Terme and Vacation; but this man hath no term of his term, no vacation; till death serve a Sub-poena upon him from the Star-chamber of Heaven: Now perhaps he would make his peace, and be quiet; but now, alas, he must enter into everlasting disquiet, and fall into the hands of worse furies than ever before he either found, made, or employed. Or perhaps the Whimzies of a factious Sectary have crept into his head; and then he will quarrel with his Brethren, abuse the Word of his Father, and scratch the face of his own Mother; neither sparing God nor his Church, though he forfeit all their Blessings.

The next is the profane Wanton, and he would also be saved: but Temptation meets him in the shape of Pleasure; a delicate Lady, which so bewitcheth him with her painted Beauty, that he thinks her all sweetness, and multiplies kisses on her coozening cheek. Not unlike Issachar, he sees the land pleasant, and he even lays him down, couching like an Ass between the two burdens, of riot and lust, excess and uncleanness. Alea, vina, venus, is the tripartite division of his Life. Time remembers him by his Looking-glass, and diseases pinch him by the Arm, to break off his Method of sensuality and vicissitudinary sins: but he will not believe them; pleading against them, yea rather against himself, that his bones are full of marrow, his Roses are not withered, old age and he are strangers, he hath nothing to do with Time. But Time will have something to do with him, and sends him that unwelcome Messenger, Sickness, to warn him of the near approach of impartial Death. Now he calls for his Physician, Repentance; he would leave all vanity, and begin his journey. But alas, his Time is short, and the way is long: there is no hope of his seasonable arrival.

The third is the covetous Churl; and I promise you, saith he, Jerusalem is a goodly place, I will thither sure. But Temptation meets him in the form of a wedge of gold: he likes it well, it dazleth his eyes, and fires his heart with a desire to get it. He is advised to betake him to his tools, and refuse no labor for it, without which he cannot hope to obtain it. What are those Engines? The Mattocke of oppression, to strike into the bowels of the Innocent: The Spade of laboriousnesse, wherewith he must toile and tire his own flesh: The Hooke of plausible Attraction, to draw in cheatable Customers: The Rake of penurious baseness, whose teeth are always scraping together: The Shovell of dissembling closenesse, whereby we may accumulate and multiply his heaps and hoards: The Mine of policy, to take all advantages: The Petarre of Usury, to blow up whole estates. With these instruments he must work, starving the poor, his servants, himself: for he is good to none, worse to himself; he lives miserably, to die damnably. Old age, like dark night, comes upon him; and now he would Lode himself with his thick clay, and if it were possible, carry it all with him. But, Oh the weight of his unjust gains sinks him down to the lowest pit. Perhaps with some unwillingness, he would buy a little time, but he cannot tell who should sell it. If he could, yet while he goes to buy that fresh oil for his old lamp; The Bridegroom is gone in, and the door is shut. But he will give some superfluous Legacies to the poor; they can open the door for him, And receive him into everlasting habitations. No, they could have done somewhat all day, they can do nothing for him at night. Then he forgot the poor, now the poor must forget him: They can be no friends, where GOD is an enemy. This, you see, is not altogether a Fable, and it is to be feared, that three parts of the world go this way; even by the loss of time to perdition.

For the last; he that fears God; and loves the Lord Jesus, travels on toward Eternal Life; yet not without some interruptions. Sin is sometimes wrapped up in the temptation of wealth, and he may stay to look upon it: sometimes in a beauteous face, as Mical was given David to ensnare him, and he may cast a transient eye upon it: often, in the disguise of Friendship, and that prevails so far with him, as to discourse with it. He meets with divers assaults: but though like Jonathan, he tastes of the worlds honey, he will not feed on it: And whensoever he wanders, the Spirit of Grace recollects him; and draws him, as the Angels did Lot out of Sodom: otherwise, he were in danger of being benighted, and do what he can, he hath time little enough. Therefore, he concludeth, If I loiter, I shall be locked out: Vnloose me from the bonds of sin, happy Repentance, defend me Faith, hold me up Patience, strengthen me Zeal; I come; Lord Jesus, open the Gate, I come, I come.

2 PET. 3.9.

The Lord is not slack concerning his Promise, as some men count slackness: but is longsuffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to Repentance.

WHERE is the Promise of his Comming? that was their Challenge: God hath not forgot his Promise; this is their satisfaction. He is not slack in any business he undertakes; much less in that which so nearly concerns his honor, as the making good of his word, the justification of his truth, the performance of his Promise. He will not put off those that depend upon his Covenant, with dilatory excuses: but meets our zealous Prayers at the door, as they are coming forth to solicit his merciful remembrance. That which seems dullness and slackness to our impatient desires, is rather an argument of his goodness; for the intent of his longsuffering is to bring us to Repentance. Thus while the afflicted Righteous think God forgets them; wandering sinners shall find that God remembers them: And it is fit, that the guests bidden to the same Feast should stay for their fellows. Is God content to tarry for their conversion? and dost thou think much to tarry for thy reward? The consideration of the Divine Patience is a bridle to our preposterous hastiness: therefore doth Christ defer his coming, to invite mankind to Salvation: Therefore he forbears to accelerate the last day, that the world might have space to provide for their last account at that day. When we perceive that he doth accommodate the respect of times to our safety, and means only our good in this forbearance, we have no cause to complain of his slackness. Oppressors presume that God hath no more regard of his Servants, than of themselves, because they are not visibly delivered: as the Jews thought he did not own Christ, because he did not save him out of their clutches. But they reckon one way, and God another; and the event will declare which of them was deceived. The Lord is not slack, &c.

The Text moves upon two Poles. First, what God is not; He is not slack concerning his Promise. Secondly, what He is; He is longsuffering toward us. The former is a Removall of a suspicion, the other is a Proof of a gracious Indulgence. In the negative Proposition, we have three Particulars. First, Quid non sit; The Lord is not slack. Secondly, In quo non sit, Concerning his Promise. Thirdly, Quomodo non sit, as some men count slacknesse. The affirmative Proposition appears to me like Rachel with her two Children, Joseph and Benjamin. First, the Patience of God is the Mother; and the two fruits are, that none perish, but all come to repentance.

1. The Lord is not slack. Tarditas or Slacknesse is here usurped for a Vice: for otherwise it is laudable, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Festina lente: which is the golden mean between those two extremes, of Sluggishness, and Precipitancy. Gellius well expresseth it by the word maturare: according to that of the Poet; Maturate fugam. To Agamemnon was objected 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, to Achilles 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉: Medium tenuit cunctator Fabius; using neither more delay, nor more hast, than might consist with good speed. Certain coin of Vespasian did seem to hieroglyphicke this; wherein was figured a Dolphin upon the middle of an Anchor. He is Tardy, who negligently pretermits his occasion: not he that comes not suddenly, but that comes not so soon as he should. As Tobias excused himself; My father counteth the days, and if I tarry long (that is, one day beyond the limited time) he will be very sorry. In this sense must those precepts be understood, Thou shalt not delay to offer thy Tithes and first Fruits; that is statuto tempore, in due time: for until then, there is no Slacknesse. Thou shalt not slack to pay thy Vowes; in thy prefixed times. That is then Slacknesse, when we defer to do what we ought, when we ought. Let us take a short view of both these extremes.

The first is a precipitant overhastinesse; which so flies Slacknesse, that it runs into rashness; and is so greedy of doing, that it omittes to deliberate, either what is to be done, or how it may best be done. This is like that which the Physicians call Predigestion; which doth rather fill the body with crudities and secret seeds of diseases, than conduce to sound nourishment. There be some that care only to come off speedily, to contrive some false periods of business, and to dispatch things in a hurry. But it is one thing to contract that which is tedious, by reducing it to a method: another thing, to abridge or huddle up that which is necessary and essential, by an abrupt cutting it off. That which is made shorter in the several pieces, is commonly made longer in the whole. Let no man so run into action, that he leaves deliberation behind him. They are too hasty, that will mount into the Pulpit before their wings be grown: not unlike to Ahimaaz, who would needs be running, though he had no errand to deliver: Let me also run, I pray thee. But wherefore wilt thou run, my son, seeing thou hast no tidings ready? saith Joab. Howsoever let me run. And what will he say when he comes into the Pulpit? I saw a great tumult, but I knew not what it was: a confusion or tumult of words is all they can deliver. Suddaine and rash attempts, if they meet not with sudden destruction, retreat with sorrow and shame. If we be put out of our way in the beginning of our journey, we wander all the day.

We cannot charge God with this overhastinesse; for if He should be angry so often as we sin, and strike so often as he is angry, what man could escape? It was a big word which Caesar spoke to Metellus, Tribune of the people, when he violently resisted his entrance into the sacred Treasury; knowing he meant to seize upon the monies, there stored: Presume no further, or I will lay thee dead. And when he saw Metellus something daunted with these words, he added; Young man, it had been easier for me to do this, than to speak it. This was but a bravado in Caesar: the powerful truth of it only belongs to God's; with whom it is as easy to kill, as to say the word. But our merciful God is not so hasty: men are long in making anything, quick in destroying: A city, which the succession of many years hath brought to her beauty, may soon be razed and demolished by the enemies fire. Only God is quick in making, but pauzeth upon destroying. When he came to question apostate Adam, it was in the cool of the day, not in the heat of his anger. He that made the World in six days, and could have done it in six hours, spared it above a thousand years, before the flood came. He allowed Nineveh the respite of forty days: but who can number the days, months, and years, that licentious Nineveh had enjoyed in former times? Yet, as if God were content to sustain the loss and profusion of all this forbearance, there is an addition of forty days. Not longer, lest they should grow wanton by his patience: nor shorter, lest they should become desperate by the suddenness: But a convenient space; both to preclude all presumption of impunity, and despair of mercy. His patience hath enlarged it self toward us: that if We should plead with our mother, and she with her children, and God with both, we were even speechless. Our unthankfulness hath striven with his Goodness for the Victory, as Absalom strove with David; whether the Father should be more kind to the Son, or the son more unkind to the Father: we have been fatted with his blessings, and then spurned at his precepts. Could he brook the innumerable adulteries of this land, the desperate homicides, the continual violation of his holy Sabbaths, if he were hasty? Could he endure our presumptuous oaths, if he were hasty? We cannot walk in the streets or fields, but our ears are full of such dreadful blasphemies, sworn even by them that have scarce a good rag to their backs, as if they would send up defiance to Heaven, and challenge the Almighty to meet them in warlike arms. With these weapons we fight against Christ, and ourselves: these have scattered our regiments, and strawed the ground with our slaughtered corpses: these were the Ordnance, that have played upon our own ships: these have crossed our designs: not Dunkirke, not Spain, not Rome, not Hell, have done us so much mischief, as our own mouths. It is true that the State may in some measure clear it self, by making good laws, against such wicked lips: but the want of execution frustrates all hope of reformation. That the profane swearer is ever suffered again to open his mouth, dischargeth God from all imputation of hastiness: praised be his Patience for evermore.

The other extreme slackness, is not incident to the Lord. Though the vision tarry, wait for it, because it will surely come; Yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry. He that believeth, will not make haste, but wait the Lord's leisure. There be men placed high, in the eminent seats of Authority, that cannot vindicate themselves from slacknesse, when the poor have repaired unto them for succor. Some of them will give, will pardon, will do Justice, but it shall be when they list; according to their own humor, not the others necessity: and the oppressed Client, that knows not the Great-ones fits, and moods, and seasons; may starve before that gift comes, and ruin before the Justice right him, and die before the pardon save him. Some trees will bear no fruit, except much dung be laid about them: and Justice comes not from some men, till they be manured with bribes. Some trees require much watering, and some Magistrates will yield no fruits of equity, except they be haunted with assidual importunity. Some trees require incision, and pruning, and lopping: and some men must be threatened, and intimidated, before they will deliver the fruits of Justice. Some trees require the early and often access of the Sun: and some men will not be won to do good without Court-mediation. Some trees must be housed and kept within doors: and some will not open their Favor and Compassion, till the solicitation of a wife, or a Son, or a friend, or a servant turn the key. Reward is the motive of one man, and importunity of another: Fear the incentive of one man, and favor of another: Friendship is prevalent with one man, and natural affection with another: And till a persuasion is fitted to their dispositions, they are culpable of Slacknesse, and regardless of doing any good. They will hear with others ears, and determine by the report of others. But the poor may well answer, as that great soldier did to Caesar, when he was put off in the like manner: I fought for Caesar in mine own person, not by my Lieutenants? therefore I expect that Caesar should hear my cause in his own person, and not by deputies.

But who can challenge God of such retardation? He is indeed Slow to wrath, but he runs to show mercy. No sooner doth the penitent sinner turn his face toward Heaven, but the Divine compassion meets him at the first step, and entertains him with peace. He did not stay to leavy, arm, train, muster, and present Troupes of Soldiers to overthrow Sennacherib: but he took a nearer way, and in one night, by the hand of an Angel, slew almost two hundred thousand of his Army: Here was no Slacknesse. Dorham is besieged, the Prophets servant distressed: a very apparition in the Clouds shall secure him: not a squadron shall be raised, and yet the enemy is surprised: here was no Slacknesse. The Midianites invade Israel, and are suddenly confounded by a dream: Here was no Slacknesse. Full often hath this Island been endangered by foreign invasions, by intestine treasons: when even in the Article and point of our enemies hope, and of our peril; our gracious God hath stepd in with his wonderful deliverance: I hope here was no Slacknesse. If we may believe our own Chronicles, in the reign of Richard the first, before that great famine and pestilence; there appeared two Suns in the Firmament: which apparition hath eternized that day to all posterity, nor is the fame of it yet dead. Our times have yielded as great a wonder; when instead of two Suns, two Moons were seen in our Hemisphere at once; the one in the Sky, the other on the Sea: a fatal prodigious Crescent, whose horns like the horns of that Ram in the vision, so pushed Westward, Northward and Southward, that they supposed none could stand before him: therefore they antichristened it, The invincible Armado: yet the Moon above laughed at the Moon below: and as the one hath dominion over the Sea, the Sea got dominion over the other: and that daring Crescent, like a meteor, waned, and went out. A meteor indeed, made up of squalid matter and corruption drawn out by pride and presumption, dissolved by the wind in derision, and so scattered in pieces, that nothing but the shame and ruins were left to testify, there had been such a Navy. When they made themselves so sure of our destruction, that they shared our Possessions by lots, and threw dice for our patrimonies, the Lord presented our unexpected deliverance; here was no Slacknesse.

God needs not the tongue of Men nor Angels to justify his goodness, yet he graciously accepts it. Let me therefore give you some other sensible demonstrations, to clear him from all suspicion of Slacknesse. What an artificial Hell had those desperate Traitors devised, to blow up the head and representative body of the land? How closely did they conspire, how securely proceed, with what sacramental forms did they adjure secrecy? Catiline bound his conspirators with a drink of human blood: but these wretches sealed up their Treason with the precious blood of the Son of God. The night was theirs, the vault was theirs, the opportunity was theirs, silence was theirs, the Pope was theirs, the Devil was theirs: who could discover this project but themselves? Yet even when Faux was giving fire to the Match, that should have given fire to the powder, which should have blown up Men and Monuments, even the whole State together; our never sleeping Father prevents him, and discloseth the whole design: here was no Slacknesse. Let that day the fifth of November, be ever branded with a black cool of mischief. It hath been observed a fatal inauspicious day in History. Among the Grecians it was kept with sad solemnity for the loss of noble Aratus, the often preserver of his country. Among the Jews it was famous for the slaughter of Zacharias the Priest, who was that day butchered between the Porch and the Altar, which fact Christ upbraided many years after. Among us, let it never be forgotten; but inserted with a Rubric or capital letter in every Kalendar; for the Pow-der-treason hath added everlasting infamy to it. It was a danger ever to be thought upon with horror and sadness; and a deliverance ever to be remembered with joy and thankfulness Blessed be our God, who without Slacknesse, did turn our intended funeral into a festival. The Jews were wont once a year to celebrate a Feast unto Sorrow, wherein they went barefoot, and with bitter imprecations they cursed Titus and Vespasian, for the destruction of their City and Temple. I am persuaded that the Jesuits, Priests, and Papists, that have evil will at our Zion, do still upon every fifth of November keep a feast to Sadness, and shut up themselves in their melancholy cells; if not for grief that this their hopeful plot miscarried; yet for shame (unless they be past shame) that ever it was attempted. Let their sorrow increase our joy, let our joy increase our thankfulness, to Him that was not slack to deliver us.

We cannot forget our clear deliverance from that late woeful judgment of the Pestilence. How sorrowful were those times, when every month swept away thousands from among us? When a man could not set forth his foot but into the jaws of death: when piles of Carcases were carried to their pittes, as dung to the fields: when it was cruelty in the sick to admit visitation, and love was little better than murderous. The more sad and horrible the face of those times looked, so much greater cause have we to proclaim the mercy of God in our present freedom. All the land was afraid of this Citty, now this Citty is clearer than many places of the land. We may now throng together into God's House without fear, and breath in one another's face without danger. How gracious was this deliverance! yea how speedy! To abate so fast, as in three months to decrease from a thousand a week to ten, yea to none: certainly it was little less than miraculous: when we consider this, O Heavenly Father, who can accuse thee of Slacknesse?

As some men count slacknesse.] It is the madness of vain man to take the length of God's foot by his own Last; and to interpret that for a slow pace, which is the precise opportunity he hath determined for his coming. We must be passive in receiving God's secret mysteries not active in contriving his ways. Too many are ready to suspect God's Power or Purpose, to succor those, who in foreign parts groan under heavy pressures in matter of religion, or are devested of their ancient possessions, and the inheritance of their Fathers; And because he hath not yet restorcd them, nor yet raised up such means, as in their apprehension are likely to effect it: therefore they think that God likes not the cause, and begin to stagger in their own religion at home, as if God neglected it abroad. We have attempted some designs against our enemies, to redress our manifold wrongs, by an invasive war, the warrant of vindicative justice; and have come to the worst: Shall we therefore challenge God of Slacknesse? or our religion of weakness? God will do all in due time, that is, in his time, not in ours. The land to which he brought his people of Israel, was their own land before: they were the right heirs to it, lineally descended from him, who was the first possessor of it after the Flood: but so long were they out of possession of it, that they were not able to set there Title on foot, nay, they did scarce know their own Title. Why were they so long kept from it? was there any slacknesse in him that should give it? At the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the self same day, they went out from the land of Egypt. That was the precise time appointed, and the self same day it was accomplished: If it had been deferred a day longer, than they might have accused him of slacknesse. If at any time the Lord delivers us, it is more than he owes us. Let him choose his own opportunity, that so freely grants the mercy. Let us tremble to challenge God for that, the fault whereof lies wholly in ourselves. Let us seriously examine the causes, why that wonted providence seemeth now so slow to help us.

1 The principal cause is our own sins: those are the Remor'as, the obstacles that retard the mercy of God. The Israelites assault little Ai, and are beaten: what was the reason? was Ai, too strong for Israel? No, but the sin of Israel made them too weak for Ai. Dunkirke is a greater scourge to us, than Ai, was to Israel: what is their strength greater than ours? No, but our wickedness is greater than theirs. When we are crossed in just and lawful quarrels, we may well think there is some secret sin unrepented of in us: This though we see not, yet God so hates, that he will rather be wanting to his own cause, than not punish it. If before we had put to Sea, about our warlike attempts, we had penitently cleansed our hearts, then we might have expected better success. Joshua sees this, rends his clothes, lies upon the Earth, and mourns, yea expostulates, What wilt thou do to thy mighty Name? The Lord replies, Wherefore liest thou upon thy face? That he might see, God took no pleasure to let the Israelites lie dead upon the Earth, before their enemies, himself is taxed for lying all day before the Ark, Get the up Israel hath sinned: he does not say, lie still and mourn for the sin of Israel. It is to no purpose to pray against punishment, until the cause be removed. Though God loves to be sued to, yet he holds our requests, unseasonable, till there be care had of satisfaction. When we have risen and reformed sin, then we may fall down for pardon. Victory is ever in the free hand of God, to dispose where he will: and it is no marvel to see the dice of war run with hazard on both sides: yet he tells us plainly the cause of all our discomfitures; We have sinned.

One Achan is enough to trouble all Israel: a lewd man is a pernicious creature: That he damnes his own soul, is the least part of his mischief: he commonly draws vengeance upon a thousand, either by the desert of his sin, or by the infection. The same God, who for ten righteous men would have spared five wicked Cities, sometimes will not be content to drown one sin in the obedience of many righteous. But so venomous is sin, that one dram of it is able to infect the whole mass. How much more dangerous is it, when it is common. God usually measures the state of any people by the most: and though there be some righteous, yet the greater part carries both the name and censure. Sins are so much the greater, as they are universal; so far is evil from being extenuated by the multitude of the guilty, that nothing can more aggravate it. With Men, commonness may plead for favor; with GOD it pleads for judgment. Many hands draw the Cable with more violence, than few: The leprosie of the whole body is more loathsome than that of a part. We are all still looking outward upon someone eminent and notorious sinner; concluding that he is the plague of our Nation, and the sole cause of our ruin: But O vain man look inwards, and find an Achan in thine own bosom: apprehend, condemn, execute thine own sin. If a Mote be in our brothers eye, our eye is still upon that Mote. We all complain, and yet add to the common heap. Redresse stands not in words; let each man amend one and we all live. If everyone pull a brand from this flame, the fire will go out alone. A multitude is but an heap of unities: the more we take away, the fewer we leave. Begin at home, and take thine own conscience to task: there thou shalt find work enough: whiles everyone censures, and none amends, we all grow worse. If we could deduct our own evils from the evils of these days; God, the land, and our own conscience shall find the less. It is better for us to complain on Earth, that others offend our Maker, than to howl in Hell, because we have been of that number. Though we cannot turn the stream, yet let us swim against it: It is glorious to have resisted, though we cannot prevail. Insensible sinners deny that the days are evil: but themselves are the greatest part of this evil; and but for them we had not such cause to complain. Their own conscience shall one day rack from their lips that sad confession, which Aeneas made of the Trojane miseries; Et quorum pars magna fui: we have been no small part of these calamities. Sin makes a Country like Iesabell; whereof nothing will be left but the feet, and palms of their hands. Invisible persecutions be ever the worst; when Satan persecutes us by pride, by oppression, by malice, by profaneness. Alas, what hope of success can there be, while sins are the ballast of our ships, oaths the Ordnance, Pride the Tackling, and security steeres the Helme? Our springtides bring in our Merchandise, and the Spring-tide of our sins will bring in God's judgments. We cannot complain that God is slack to succor us, it is well that he is not hasty to confound us. He made man, and yet man so degenerated from his creation, that He repented that he made him. He hath crowned this Island with many blessings, yet we may so far provoke him, as to repent him of all his favors. No, but let us with speed turn unto him, and he will make haste to help us: If we be not slack in our conversion, he will not be slack to give us salvation.

2 The next cause is our slackness to concur with the means of our recovery. For though God made all things of nothing, and can do all things with nothing; yet he will have something from us. Do we fit still in our sins and sorrows, and complain of his slacknesse? Would we have him help us altogether without our selves? Christ was able to have done as the Devil bad him, even to have made bread of stones, when he had so great a number to feed in the Wilderness, but he does not so. He asks his Disciples, How many loaves have ye? Though they were but five, yet since they were some, he multiplies them, and satisfies five thousand with them. Though he foresaw, that the augmentation of Gideon's Army, would be the diminution of his honor, and therefore disquantified his forces, from thirty two thousand to three hundred; yet a remnant he will have to fight his battles: a remnant of believers in Israel to make up his Kingdom: a remnant of thy soul▪ his seed wrapped up somewhere, to save thy soul: a remnant of thy mind, of thy purse, of thyself, to deliver thyself. God is a good Steward of men's contributions, but contributions he will have: he requires a concurrence and cooperation of persons. He goes low, and accepts of small sacrifices, a Pigeon, a handful of Flower, a few ears of Corn: but a sacrifice he will have. If Christians do not assist Christians, if neither our Neighbors of the same faith confederate with us, nor we with them; if we fight for none, and none fight for us: at last, neither we nor they shall fight for Christ, nor Christ for them nor us; but all become a prey to the general enemy of the Name of Christ. Though he be infinitely able to avenge his own cause, yet he requires our assistance; and when we have done our best, still we pray with that humble clause of acknowledgement; Give peace in our time O Lord, because there is none other that fighteth for us. The honor of this Nation in noble achievements, hath been the terror of enemies, and matter of envy and admiration to the Christian world: what is become of this valor? Is it dead in the heads, hands or hearts of men? In their heads that they know not; or in their hands, that they cannot; or in their hearts, that they dare not, to do as they were wont? Of that I cannot determine: but this I dare speak, Fidenter, quia fideliter; wheresoever the fruit appears, the tree is rooted in our sins. The Philosopher could say, A ship is a ship forever, if you repair it, and honor is honor forever, if you repair it. But Aliquid fama addendum ne putrescat: Honor will putrefy, if it be not repaired. The reparation of our honor must begin at the reformation of our lives: Till we have put our sins to the worse, we shall never get the better of our enemies. God will not be wanting to us, if we be not wanting to him, and ourselves. Do we expect a forward God, while we are a backward people? I may not meddle with persons, but generally conclude this: It is our slacknesse to repent of our sins, our slackness to amend our lives, our slackness to render God service, and the Church her dues, our slacknesse to comfort the poor in their miseries, our slacknesse to guard our own selves, which makes our God so slack to help us.

3. Another cause of the Lord's seeming Slacknesse to deliver us for the present, is our slacknesse to praise Him for the Deliverances past. Unthankfulness; this is the Witch, the Sorceresse, whose drowsy Enchantments have made us even forget God Himself. If we forget Him, can He be blamed for Slacknesse to remember us? Christ chargeth us toto remember his *Words, what He hath said unto us: but how shall we remember that, when we forget the good He hath done for us? What is become of all God's Wonders? Whither is the memory of all his Deliverances fled? We may ask after them as of the Sculpture on Monuments almost worn out, or as that insulting Tyrant did of the Kings of the Nations which he had destroyed? where is the king of Hamath, and the King of Arphad? Where is the Memory of 88. or of 605? Neither of these have worn out the age of a man, and yet they are almost worn out themselves. Is the Chronicle of that invincible Fleet written in the same Element, that the Deliverance was wrought on, Water; so that no Tract of the story, nor Character of the divine Hand remains to be read? Sure, that Wonder might even fill a Volume, and give life to a story that should outlast the World; if our hearts were not drowned in unthankfulness, as that Navy was in the Ocean. What is become of the Gun-powder plot? Hath three and twenty years quite extinguished it? Is the Memory of it buried in the same womb where it was begotten, the Vault under the Parliament-house? Or is the Record blown up, though the matter escaped? Those Pioners failed in their plot to blow up us, but the Devil still goes on with his plot, to blow it out of our memories. Is the remembrance of our woeful Deaths, choked with our present Fullness of Bread? Hath our Health and Iollity put to silence all those dying Groans, which the dreadful Pestilence rang in our affrighted Ears? Have we forgot the language, which our very Doors did speak; Lord have mercy upon us? These Deliverances abide with us, and is their memory vanished? The grave of Pompey had not so much as an Inscription, to distinguish the dust of his victorious body from ignoble stains and cowards; or to signify, Here lies Pompey. And have these times, these once glorious times, no difference in our remembrance or estimation; Shall they lie promiscuously raked up in the dust of time, without any monument set over them, to tell they once were?*

When Saint Paul reprehended the Galatians, for observing days and months, and times, and years: when he forbade the Colossians all critical, Indicatory days: Let no man judge you in respect of a holy day, or of a new moon, or of a Sabbath: he did not intend to take away all consideration, all distinction of days: though he remove them from being of the essence of our salvation: yet he leaves them for assistances, and for the exaltation of our devotion: to fixe our selves at certain periodically and stationary times, upon the consideration of those benefits, which in those days the Lord hath bestowed upon us. When in such a day we consider such a Deliverance, and upon another solemn day are occasioned to remember such a Blessing; we may the better judge ourselves, how these things have wrought upon us, and disposed us to a spiritual convalescence. Out of the common heap God hath chosen some, and made them high days and hallowed them. The several companies in this City have (at least) their annual Feasts; which want no ceremonious forms to set them forth: especially the Pulpit must do them grace, and the first dish is a Sermon. I censure not that, but this I would have; that those times, whose memory should be precious, might be better observed. Those two great Feasts, Easter and Whitsuntide, may have some observance: But one day is not enough to celebrate either of these inestimable benefits, the Resurrection of Christ, and the Mission of the holy Ghost: therefore the Church thought good to join with each of them two others; and of what estimation are they among us? Even of such, as if they were ordained to play in, not to pray in. Can we meditate too much on those blessings, that give so little honor to that double pair of attendants, ordained to wait upon those solemn Feasts? There be divers other, instituted upon particular occasions, which we pass by, and scarce give them so much as the courtesy of the day: we mind no annuals or yearly Feasts to keep them up; but instead of a mention, there is a blank; and a solemn silence, instead of an Anniverse. But why should the main Deliverances of the Land, not be distinguished from the common heap of days piled up in the Almanac? Certainly, he hath neither zeal to Religion, nor love to his Country, who doth not on those days bind the Sacrifice with cords to the Horns of the Altar, and send up to Heaven some Incense of thanks. Why should God remember us for the future, that have forgot the former? Can nothing but new misery put us in mind of our old Preserver? When a stubborn Delinquent, being committed, was no whit mollified with his durance, but grew more perverse than he was before, one of the Senators said to the rest; Let us forget him a while, and then he will remember himself. If our God should deal so with us, if he should forget us a little, our own calamities would teach us to remember both Him, and ourselves. He that dwelleth in the Heavens, looked down upon us, let us look up to Him: Since by his Mercy we live and breath, let us live to breath praise and thanksgiving to his blessed Name.

4. The last Cause, is our Slacknesse to repent of our iniquities; and why then should God hasten our Deliverance? Nineveh upon the first summons, did not only fast, and mourn, and humble themselves, and turn from their wickedness; but they did all this presently, without delay: It is our duty to turn first; Do we defer this, and complain of God Slacknesse? Would we bind God to our times, and have ourselves free? All times are his, there is not a moment we can call ours: Though it be not given to us to know the times and seasons: yet we know there is a time and season given us; which if we neglect, we forsake our own Mercy.

Concerning his Promise] The Promise here meant, is the second Comming of Christ: and because this is not done suddenly, and so soon as they brag, they would have it: they arm themselves either with Infidelity, that there is no such matter, that He will never come at all: or at least, admit of a wanton security, that it will be long enough ere He do come. But whither they wrangle, or dream, Christ is not slack concerning his Promise, and he will come soon enough to their cost; when they shall see Him with fear, whom they would not receive with Faith. But to leave them in their desperate unbelief, it it satisfy us, that all the Promises of God are Yea and Amen: He is faithful that hath promised: He hath commanded his Covenant forever; holy and reverend is his Name. Men are not so faithful: first, some will promise what they cannot do; as the Devil proffer'd kingdoms to Christ, when he had none upon Earth, only one in Hell. Secondly, some promise what they can, but mean not to do; as the Shechemites did to the sons of Jacob, and the sons of Jacob to the Shechemites; when they meant on both sides to deceive one another. Thirdly, some promise what they meant for the time, and afterwards recant; as Laban promised Rachel to Jacob, and gave him Leah. Fourthly, some promise what they do give, but unwillingly; as Herod did not deny John's head, but he was loath to grant it. Fifthly, some promise, and willingly perform; yet together with truth of performance, they are sorry for their promise; as Joshua dealt with the cunning Giheonites. But these infirmities are strangers to the nature of God, who will remember his Covenant to a thousand generations even forever.

1. Here is matter of imitation; if we be the children of our heavenly Father, we must (after his Example) make good our promises, or we cannot assure ourselves that we are no Bastards. Though we perform with our loss and prejudice, there may be no retraction of a lawful promise. Peter in effect, so pleaded to Ananias; The inheritance was thine, thou needest not have sold it: being sold, the money was thine, thou needest not have parted with it: but promising all, and retaining part, thou hast lied to the Holy Ghost. Israel enters into a league with Gibeon, and binds it with an oath: within three days they find the deceit: may they not now violate their promise? Fraudulent conventions oblige not; God hath forbidden all league with the natives; and Israel had put in a direct caveat of their vicinity: why then does Joshua hold himself bound to his covenant? There is no trusting to shifts for the eluding of promises: we must faithfully perform, what we have rashly promised.

2 Here is matter of faith; shall we not believe the promise of God? Hath the Maker spoke it, and will not the creature believe it? The Almighty hates to be distrusted, and accounts infidelity so much a greater sin than others, as he magnifies his mercy above all his works. He that will not take his Word for good, shall feel his sword for evil. Impotent man holds it a disgrace, not to be credited; and will he that is eternal truth, put up such an indignity? So near is unbelief to Atheism, as the Word of God is to the nobleness of his own Majesty. It was a sweet ditty of the Psalmist, Bonum est confidere in Domino, It is good to trust in the Lord: Good in respect of him, and good for us. First, it is our own good, and that we are enabled to trust him, is more of his mercy, than that we do trust him, can be merit in our fidelity. Our goodness reacheth not up to him, but his goodness reaches down to us, in filling our hearts with confidence in him. There is nothing in all the world that can work our hearts to so comfortable and unconquerable a resolution, as our reposall upon God. They that put their trust in the Lord, are as Mount Zion that cannot be moved. Faith can remove mountains, but the mountains that are raised on faith, can never be removed. Secondly, it is good in respect of God: for it is one of the best pieces of his glory, to be trusted unto: as Joseph held, when Potiphar trusted him with all, that he could not do him a greater honor. The glory of God is so precious to him, that he will not part with it to any other. What other things does not he impart willingly? Being, Life, Knowledge, Happiness and such blessings, are originally, eminently, essentially in God: yet Being, he gives to all things; Life, to many things; Knowledge to some kinds of creatures, and Happiness to some of those kinds: only his Glory he reserves to himself. Riches he gives to his very enemies, and so gives them to others, that he keeps them not at all to himself: but he will not endure his Glory to be communicated to Man or Angel; not to the best guest in Heaven, much less to the worst dross on Earth. Our belief is a part of his glory, and shall we nor do him that justice, as to give him his own? Him let us esteem above all, to him let us look up in all, on him let us depend for all, from his goodness and mercy let us acknowledge all, in him let us delight with contempt of all; and this is the confidence we owe our Maker.

3 Here is the ground of hope, even in the midst of delay. The deferring of our desires must not discourage our Faith: it may be God hath long granted our request, ere we shall know of his grant. When God shall find patience mixed with faith in his Clients, the Cause shall go well with them. In the fervor of their expectation, he may hold them off: but when they least think of it, and have forgotten their own Suite, he graciously condescends. Zacharias a long time failed of a son, for all his prayer; but when he had even forgotten that prayer, he had a son. The Angel brings him good news; Thy prayer is heard. When did he make this prayer? He was grown old, and had given over all hope of a child; so that this request was past over many years since. Yet God had laid it up all this while; and when Zacharias least looks for it, brings it forth to effect. The Word of that God must needs be sure, who is so often better than his Word. God is infinitely free, yet his own promise binds him: He can owe us nothing, except he engage himself, and that engagement is debt: Can we distrust him to give us that he hath promised, who gives us ten thousand blessings which he never promised? The favors of God, though they be most free, have a price set on them, and require a rent to be paid for them. Faith is the price, and the rent is thankfulness. Crede, & fruere that is the price. Gratus esto, & beatus esto; that is the rent. There can be nothing easier than he requireth; there can be nothing richer, than he giveth. O God, that undeserving man should grudge, to return thee so little, for so much!

4 Here is matter of Obligation to us; for if we expect God should perform his promises to us, we must be careful to keep touch with him. Our promise in Baptism obligeth us to his Service; have we never broken this holy Covenant? If there be any so profane, as to pretend that that promise was only made by proxy: and a contract made by a Virgin in her childhood, doth not bind her to the betrothed husband: yet what beggars daughter, espoused to a hopeful young Prince in her nonage, will refuse that match when she comes to years? shall the miserable soul of man disdain marriage with the glorious Son of God? But didst thou ever receive that other Sacrament. There was thy voluntary consent to that former vow: a repetition, a consummation of thy plighted faith. Sinners that we are, have we kept this promise? Have we done all for God, and nothing for Satan? Did we never confederate with the flesh. nor take part with the world? See have three enemies, and against them we have sworn resistance: we have but one King, and to him we have sworn allegiance. If we keep faith with our King, he will save us: if we revolt to those enemies, they will confound us. Yet for one act of duty performed to our King, we have done three thousand services for those three enemies: Is this to keep our promise? Christ died to give us life, these live to give us death; and yet shall we cast of loyalty to our Sovereign, and desperately put ourselves upon the mercy of Traitors? Is this to perform our promise? The flesh works upon the world, the Devil works upon the flesh, the conscience works upon all three, and God works upon all four: If we leave Christ, and cleave to these abjured rebels, all these shall convince us of forsworn apostasy. Forsake thee O Savior, the most graceless sinner denies it: But as a cowardly Ancient, that ran away from the battle; afterward perceiving the victory to fall on his side, when he had returned home and there boasted: I bore colorus for my King and Country; another replied, but you never stroke blow for your King and Country: So many bear the colors of Christ, that will not stand one stroke for Christ.

Nor is this fidelity only due to God, but to our Neighbor. He that is not faithful to God, will never be true to man: and he that is not faithful to man, was never true to God. Promises fly up and down like chaff, raised with every breath of wind: but performance is the good grain that lies close in the floor. The tongue is a nimble member, and good words are cheap; but performance is an action, and it troubles a man to do. He may lie in bed and promise, but he must rise up to do. One Son plainly told his Father, I will not go, but he went: the other promised to go, but he went not. Some do and say not, but a thousand for one say and do not. Promises are like some Princes servants; when a stranger comes to the Court, he shall see abundance of them: but performance is like the Prince himself, who keeps state, and seldom comes into the public eye. Nor unlike some great man's policy, who had two chests; the one he called Promise, the other performance: the former was easily opened, the other was locked and barred: to the one he sent all his Clients and Sutors, and there they found Hope: Betwixt his Promise, and their Hope, being long deluded; they resolved to surprise that other chest, and break it open, but he told them plainly, that that chest could never be unlocked without one singular key, which he called Necessity: implying that men promise with facility, but they will not perform except it be for necessity. It is reported of Antigonus, that he never denied any suite that was asked; but withal he never did perform anything that he granted. In promising the Beggar may be as rich as the King: and without performing, the King may be as poor as the Beggar. The one is willing and not able, the other is able and not willing: the former is in want, but the latter is in fault. Cujusquam est promittere, honesti solius praestare. Failing of promises, of friends makes enemies: he that held thee his friend for thy fair grant, for illuding his trust becomes thine enemy. Let no man so demean himself, as by his own desert to procure hatred. Every lawful promise made to God or man, is written in Heaven; while we perform not, our score runs on: and what we do not pay while we live, we shall be forced to pay forever when we are dead. O then let us mend our pace, and God will mend his: if we be not slack concerning our promise, to serve him; he will not be slack concerning his Promise to save us.

But is long suffering to us ward.] I know not whether I should more wonder at man's perverseness, or at God's patience. The more that Divine goodness suffers, the more this wickedness of dust and ashes presumes: and it is long before the fury of the one, can provoke the lenity of the other. I stand at the door and knock. He stands at a mortal door, whose seat is in the Heavens: and knocks at the gate of sinful dust, to whom the everlasting gates of glory willingly open. He stands calling, while we sleep unregarding: he knocks in love, while we are ready to return him knocks for his love. He is worthy to come under our roof, but our roof is not worthy to receive him, and do we not open? If we knock in prayer, he opens in pity; and when he knocks in compassion, shall not we open in duty? He stands, yea how long hath he stood? How many grievances of attendance hath he digested, without withdrawing his foot? Me tuo long as pereunte noctes, Lydia dormis. As if that immortal lover did court the soul of a sinner: In medi pace quid armatimes, quid faceres hosti, quae sic excludis amantem? Tempora noctis eunt, excute poste seram. What mean thy barred gates in the time of peace? what courtesy wouldst thou afford an enemy, that showest so little kindness to a friend? The night passeth away, and My locks are wet with the dew of Heaven. Open unto me, my fair one: Behold thy King cometh unto thee: A King, no common person: Thy King, no foreign Prince: cometh to thee, not against thee: meek and humble, not with troupes of armed soldiers: alone unaccompanied, save with his inseparable love. How unspeakable is this patience? when he is angry, doth he presently strike? No, but like some noble warrior, that hath laid siege to a renowned Citty, viewing the goodly buildings, considering the number of infants and innocents, having no delight in blood; out of his own heroical disposition, sends a Herald with the proffer and conditions of peace. All courses are to be tried in war, before the sword be bloodied. Theodosius never smote a city till after ten days siege, with the offers of mercy: but God allowed Nineveh forty days to make their peace. It was the rule of his law, when they had beleaguered a City, first to proclaim peace unto it. It was the order and practice of his Gospel, when they approached any house, first to say, Peace be to this house. Great works were wrought in Chorazin, before the ruin came. He spared his rebellious people forty years: but how long hath he spared us? He lent not our forefathers so much time before us: his mercy strained it self for six years, and then persecution and superstition broke in among them. We have had Evangelium pacis, and pacem Evangelij, The Gospel of peace, and peace with the Gospel, continued amongst us through the reigns of three gracious Sovereigns, threescore and ten years: yet as if the commonness hath quite taken away the sense of the blessing, we esteem it like the Air, cheap, because there is enough of it, whereas nothing is more precious and nearer to life. He is long suffering towards us.

But that it may not seem lost time to rove in generals, let me point at particulars: God is longsuffering toward thee, and me, and everyone. How often, and how justly, might He have taken thee away in the midst of thy sins? Why is not the Adulterer with his Harlot, like Zimri in the arms of Cosbi smitten in the act of their Lust? Why are not their souls sent coupled to the fire of torment, as their bodies were undivided in the flame of uncleanness? While the mouth is opened to swear and blaspheme, Why is it not instantly filled with Fire and Brimstone? While the Homicide is killing another, Why is not Satan permitted to kill him? When the Drunkard falls into his dead sleep, Why is he suffered to wake again alive? Why doth not the extorted Bread of the poor, choke the Oppressor? And the House fall upon the head of the Traitor? Why is not he carried quick into Hell, that is the Plague of all Christendom? There is no answer to be given but this; The Patience of God is greater than the Wickedness of man. Yet let not sinners presume: Sera venit, sed certa venit vindicta: the silent Judge will at last speak home: Tuli, nunquid semper feram? The higher the Axe is lifted up, the deeper it cuts: a water-course stopped and repelled, breaks forth at the opening with greater violence. The Elephant suffers many injuries of the inferior beasts; but ware patientia laesa; being too far provoked, his revenge is more extreme, than his Patience was remiss. God is not easily provoked by our sins, He is easily pacified by our repentance. Christ suffered infinite much, yet He was not long in suffering: but for that short suffering of his Son, God is longsuffering towards us, all that be in the smae Jesus.

How well may this unmatched Precedent teach us all the Doctrine of Patience! It is the peculiar of Christians: in others Miranda, potius quàm laudanda: as Saint Augustine speaks of Rasis killing himself: it was Magne, potius quàm been factum: It was bravely done, it was not well done. There be some that suffer against their wills; which we call Patience perforce: they would revenge, if they could. Saint John calls it, The Patience of the Saints: they are sure to suffer: the richest Vessel is in most danger of the Pirate, the full Barn of the Thief: Of all men, Christians have most need of Patience: and they bear injuries, not robore Socratico, sed Christiano. There be three Exercisers of our Patience; God, Man, Satan: A proximo damna, ab adversario tentamenta, a Deo flagella sustinemus. Patience for these returns, to Satan hate and resistance, to Man love and blessings, to God humility and thanks. In respect of God; it kisseth the striking Hand: there can be no more forcible motive to Patience, than the acknowledgment of a divine Hand in our sufferings. It is fearful to be in the hand of an Adversary, but Who would not be confident of a Father? Yet in our frail Humanity, Choler may transport us from the remembrance of Nature: but when we feel ourselves under the Discipline of a wise God, that can temper our afflictions to our strength, to our benefit, who would not rather murmur at himself for swerving toward Impatience? Israel cries out for water; Moses seeks to quench their thirst with this contentment; God hath led us hither. If the ignorance of their guide had misled them, or they had fallen by chance upon those dry Desarts; though this were no remedy of their grief, yet it might have been some ground of their complaint. But now they see, that the Providence of God hath brought them into this want; and shall not he as easily find the way out? Yet those sturdy Israelites murmur, and will not have their thirst quenched with faith, but with water. But Non merebitur miseridiam, qui irascitur ad poenam: Be patient, this is the way ad pristium statum revocari: In respect of man, Patience concludes; that Bonus non fuit, qui malos tolerare recusavit. If thou wouldst have all nocent creatures destroyed, Quid fiet de te, What would become of thyself? Bear with them, their Maker bears with thee? For the Devil, Carnem macerare potest, non patientiam: he may hurt the Saints, but not the Patience of the Saints. Saint Gregory says of Job; Quot patientiae voces in divinam Laudem percussus reddidit, tot in Diabolum jacula intersit; & multo graviora, quàm sustinuit, inflixit. Satan cannot so much vex us with sufferings, as we vex him by our Patience.

Let Patience have her perfect work] She must have opus, some work to do: this must be Opus suum, her own work, proper to her nature and office: and it must be opus perfectum, without imperfection. First, Patience is not idle, but ever working: operatur patiendo, and patitur operando: an active passion, or a passive action; whereby she worketh, not so much her own extrication out of troubles, as equanimity of soul to their easier portage. Secondly, she hath opus suum; for she lives as an Hebrew with Canaanites in her company, that will be pricks in her sides, and thorns in her eyes. No neighbourhood is able to make the Serpent and the Woman, the cursed seed of the one, and the blessed Seed of the other, ever to agree. One blood, one belly, one house, one education, could never make Cain and Abel accord, Jacob and Esau, Isaac and Ishmael at one. Here is then work for Patience, Let us see the work of Patience. Temperance hath her work; that the indulgence of the throat may not bring mischief upon the soul. Prudence hath her work; that perils may be prevented by foresight. Fortitude hath her work; that a good cause be not lost by a base fear. Justice hath her work; that neither injuries done by ourselves, nor the want of relieving the poor from injuries done by others, stand up against us at the last Audit. Chastity hath her work, that the bodily uncleanness may not defile the conscience. Charity hath her work, to feed the hungry, and comfort the miserable. Repentance hath her work, to wash the soul from sins in a bath of tears. Innocence hath her work, that no wrong be offered: And Patience hath her work: that much wrong be quietly s'ff red. This is her work, to turn necessity into a virtue; for she only can put evil to good use. She will not dance attendance to the humors of sinful greatness: b•t waits at the gate of Heaven without weariness; and is still knocking at that door, which she never saw opened. Tanto omnibus faelicioꝛ, quanto se ferre potest patientibus miserioreꝛ. Thirdly, this work of Patience must be perfect, and that. First, Respectu conditionis; hearty and sound. Integrity is the perfection of all graces, so of patience. I dare not commend the soundness of that which invites sorrow, and prostitutes it self to unnecessary troubles. It is not patience, to offer thyself into bondage when thou mayest be free. That is right Patience, Pate contra quod libeat, non praeter quod liceat. Secondly, Respectu durationis; to quit the field, before we have got the victory, is to lose all the former benefit of Patience. He that endureth patiently to the end, shall be saved. Thirdly, Respectu extentionis; it must be of a great latitude, for many are the troubles of the righteous. It is bootless to vanquish one cross, and sink under another. Patience must be universal, enduring all things, and going with the same mind to the shambles as to the fold. Our approbation is in much Patience. Those are counterfeit graces, that higggle with their duties; that stint themselves, and make their own matches with God. It is not Faith which says, Thus much I will believe, and no more: Sound Faith believes the whole Word of God. It is not Charity which says, I will love one man, and not another: True Charity loves all in Jesus Christ. It is not Repentance that says, I will be sorry for this sin, and not for that: Hearty Repentance doth mourn for all sins. It is not Obedience that says, I will keep this Commandment, and not that: Right Obedience hath respect to all the Commandments. It is not Patience that says, I will bear this sorrow, and not that: I will endure so much and nor more. Perfect Patience resolves to suffer anything for Jesus Christ.

Virtus sine patientia vidua est; All virtue is a widow without Patience. The Apostle in the behalf of God, promiseth eternal life, to them that by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory: As if we could not come to Heaven by well doing, without Patience in well doing. Faith without Patience is but precipitancie: Zeal without Patience is but fury: Hope without Patience is presumption: Humility without Patience is dejection: Charity without Patience, fills the vessel with Milk from her breasts, and then kicks it down with her heels. Patience to the Soul is as Bread to the body, the staff of either the natural or spiritual life: we eat bread with all our meats, both for health and relish; bread with flesh, bread with fish, bread with brothes and fruits: Such is Patience to every Virtue, we must hope with Patience, and pray in Patience, and love with Patience, and whatsoever good thing we do, let it be done in Patience. When our eyes be wearied with any other colors, we seek to refresh them with green: in all our troubles we refresh our souls with Patience. Virtue is fair, rich, and lovely; but beset with many difficulties; we can never get nor keep her without much Patience. Saint Paul would never have gloried in his tribulations, but for his Patience. The devil implied so much in his challenge to Job: God commends him for a perfect and upright man, fearing the Lord, and eschewing evil: Satan grants all this, but questions his Patience: therefore he doth good, because nothing but good is done to him: but do thou cross him a little, and he will curse thee to thy face. Strip him of his Robes, and clothe him with ulcers; and see what he will do then. This was the forest trial: had Job kept his Righteousness, his Innocence, his Integrity, his Fidelitie, and fear to sin, and lost his Patience, he had lost the day: but keeping that sound, the old Serpent stinks away with shame, confessing a feeble man too hard for him. It was not so much what Christ suffered, as with what Patience he suffered, that did nobilitate the merit of his sufferings. Admit an Apologue: Four Graces were walking together, Zeal, Justice, Temperance, and Patience: three other Virtues meet with them, Innocence, Hospitalitie, and Meekness: while Patience went aside some little way, the other six conferred about the super-eminence of their own worth. The argument grew so hot, that words were ready to beget blows: Zeal out-faceth Innocence, Justice tramples upon Meekness, and Temperance threatens to turn Hospitalitie out of doors. But on the sudden steps in Patience, and there ends the quarrel. If the virtuous may fall out, much more sinners: but the matter will soon be compounded, if both sides admit of Patience. This is one of those Graces, that is never seen but in distress: Valour and Fortitude is not known, while there is no enemy: Repentance appears not, till we have sinned: nor is Patience visible to others, or sensible to ourselves, till we are exercised with sufferings. These virtues in the time of miseries and exigence shine brightest, as the stars do in a dark night. But it is time to shut up this point: My argument is Patience; make me the first Object of it: if I have been tedious, digest it with your Patience.

Not willing that any should perish.] There is no man that hates the Effect of his own worth: If the Painter have drawn a counterfeit, or limmed the resemblance of a Creature, he regards it as the Effect of his own curious art. If a man begets a Son, he is tied in Affection to him by the bond of Nature. If a Preacher convert a profligate, and beget a Soul unto Christ; he loves him in a higher degree of Relation, than those of Art or Nature; even of Grace. And will the most wise and good Creator of all things, hate the workmanship of his own hands? No, The Lord hateth nothing that he hath made. There is something in the Creatures he hath made, which he hateth: but the Creature it self, as it is a Creature, he loveth. Our weakness doth often fail to distinguish Inter virum & vitium; so we hate the man together with his vice, whereas we should hate the vice, and love the man. But God can distinguish betwixt the metal which is his, and the dross of the metal which is not his: he rejecteth the dross, but he wisheth well to the metal. If a man's wife be an adulteress, he puts her away, because she then ceaseth to be a wife: but if she repent, God doth not put her away, because she does not cease to be a woman. Adultery may make her no wife, Death it self cannot make her no Creature. Both God and her husband detest her sin; yet God doth, and her husband should love her Soul.

But if God be not willing that any should perish, how then do any come to perish? Can they perish against his will? Shall any be lost, whom he will save? I might answer this Objection, that the question here is not concerning God's secret will; but so much of it as is revealed to us in his holy Word, whereby he affords means of Salvation to all, declaring himself not willing that any should perish. But let us soberly examine this point: for Scripture seems to contradict Scripture. God will have all men saved, and come to the knowledge of the Truth: And here, he is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to Repentance. On the contrary, Whom he will, he hardeneth: and, I will harden the heart of Pharaoh. Is the Spirit divided? If Truth be against Truth, how can it stand? Who will harden? That God which is rich in goodness, whose Mercy is above all his works, will he? He which is grieved for our offenses, and willeth not the death of a sinner, will he harden? And of all places, the Temple for his holy Spirit to repose in, the Exchequer and Store-house for all his Graces; will he harden the heart? He says, he will: yet dares the blasphemous sinner rub his filthiness on that immaculate purity of his Maker? Does he live by his Mercy, and yet charge him of injustice, making it the midwife of so foul a progeny? Evil could never be the child of goodness, nor can sin (so basely descended) lay claim to omnipotency. Doth pure water, and puddle, flow immediately from the self-same spring? or light and darkness from the same Sun? How then comes it to pass? Consider with me these Positions.

1. The Devil was Primitivus peccator, and sinned from the beginning. From him, sin first boiled up, as out of the main sea: being thence derived to Adam, it ariseth as out of a spring: from the spring, it is reserved in Nature, as in a Conduit: from Nature, it is conveyed to concupiscence, as by a Pipe: and from thence doth flow all the mischief and wickedness, that is in the life of man. Thy destruction is of thyself.

2. The Eternal Decree of God is unsearchable: To love his Children, and neglect his enemies, can neither impair his Mercy, nor impeach his Justice. But why he should love this as his Child, and neglect that as his enemy; Nec possibile est comprehendere, nec licitum investigare; is beyond the lawfulness of inquiry, and possibility of apprehension. That is a saucy and curious eye, which will be too nicely prying into the Closet of God's secrets. These should rather bring us on our knees, in the humble acknowledgement of his infinite wisdom and power, than prompt us to ransack his bosom, for the revealing of his intents. It is blessedness enough to be made God's Stewards, though we be none of his Secretaries. Will no Mansion in Heaven content us, but that which is the Throne and Chair for Omnipotencie to sit in? No Cabinet, but that which is the Treasury and Store-house of his own Counsels? If Angels fell for pride and emulation, what place can be low enough for such busy inquisitors? Though God from all Eternity, knew how to reward every man, either with bliss or pain; yet he never imposed upon any man either a necessity, or a will to sin. Far be it from us, to lay the burden of our sins on the shoulder of Predestinaion, and to make that the womb of our foul enormities.

3. God is the cause of Good, but in no respect of evil. By his Grace, Multi, ut laberentur, Retenti; nulli, ut laberentur impulsu: He upholds many, he pusheth none down. He is said indeed to harden, but it is, because he does not soften. Impios cum non retrahit à malo culpa; dicitur dimittere. As the conferring of Grace is the effect of his Election, so the withholding of his Grace is the effect of reprobation. Fieri non potest, ut per quem à peccatis surgitur, per eum ad peccata decidatur. For one and the same goodness to be the rise and fall of the same sins, is impossible. Dei claudere, est clausis non aperire: God is then said to shut, when he does not open. Ab illo est quod statur, non ab illo quod ruitur. Our pravitie is the Reed that deceives us; God's Providence is the staff that supports us. If he hardens any, it is not Malum obijciendo, sed gratiam non concedendo; not by causing us to commit sin, but by not granting us the Grace to overcome sin. In a word, God never hateth, but where he is first hated. Nemo potest Christum tibi auferre, nisi te illi auferas: no man can take Christ from thee, unless thou first take thyself from Christ. Nemo eum amittit, nisi qui dimittit: we cannot lose him, but by putting him away.

4. GOD affords the means of Salvation to All, therefore He would have None to perish. He offers his Gospel, his Gospel offers CHRIST. CHRIST offers his Merits, his Merits offer

Justification. If we bring Willingness, his Gospel is ours: if we bring Faith, CHRIST is ours: if we join with it Repentance, his Mercy and Merits are ours: if we add to all new obedience, salvation is ours. Why else are those affections attributed to God, which are properly and formally found in us, not in him? Sometime he will not be hindered from punishing: Let me alone, that I may destroy them: Why, what can hinder him? At another time, he desires to be hindered, and would have some stand in the gap, to save his people from his wrath: as a kind father being ready to correct his child, beckons to some neighbor to take him off. Othertimes he complains of his lost endeavors to bring them to repentance: I have labored in vain. What do all these signify, but his unwillingness to have any perish? Why then does he punish with perdition? No otherwise than as some just Judge, that would have all men live regularly, and free from disorders: but having transgressed the laws, Justice compells him, and that by a good and rectified will to punish them. Some would have this Will of God to be velleitatem rather than voluntatem; not so much an absolute will and resolution, as a willingness and desire: Not unlike a Merchants casting his Freight overboard in a dangerous tempest: Vult efficaciter ease jactare, sed vellet efficaciter ease retinere: He would willingly save them, and yet he is willingly content to lose them.

But if God be willing that none should perish, why then are not some made partakers of his grace, as well as others? Saint Augustine answers, some men therefore want grace, Non quia Deus non dat, sed quia homo non accipit; not because God does not proffer it, but because they will not receive it. Peter walking on the Sea, and beginning to sink, cries out to his Master; and he took him by the hand, and saved him. This world wherein we walk, is a Sea, storms arise, and we are ready to perish: while we do not cry unto Christ for help, is it his fault if we be drowned? Thou liest sick, an excellent Physician comes to thy door with sovereign remedy, and knocks for admission: if neither thy will nor ability can let him in, blame thyself, not him for thy perishing. We are all mortally sick of sin; Christ our saving Physician proffers his help; but if either we want will to admit his presence, or power to take his medicines, or skill to follow his direction; we may die with the means of our salvation by us. Merito perit aegrotus qui medicum non vocat, sed ultro qui venientem respuit. The Patient is worthy to die, that will not invite the Physician to come; but more worthy he, that will not accept of his help when he is come.

5 The willingness of God that none should perish, is proved by innumerable evidences. He made us once; certainly he did not make us, because he would damn us. Yea, he hath often made us; when he redeemed us, that was a second making; when he renews us by his grace, that is, another making: everyone of his deliverances is a kind of faciamus hominem. If our sins have made us our Makers offenders, have they also made us that we are not his creatures? If the Devil hath bereaved us of our purity, hath he also bereaved God of his pity? Though justice might rightly damn us, cannot mercy possibly save us? If the Lord reject a sinner that cries to him for mercy; where is his willingness to have none perish? His Word is a Will, and his Will is a Power: He does promise nothing but what he does purpose, and he does purpose nothing but what he does perform. If he would have none perish, what necessity is there of our being damned? If he desire that a sinner should live, what difficulty is there of our being saved? What power of enemies, or number of sins, can either hinder what he would, or constrain what he would not? He will not so look upon us sinful wretches, as not to see himself: nor so regard our wickedness, as not to behold his own goodness: nor so remember the sins that we have done, as to forget the creatures that he hath made.

He that lends the Sun of Light to all, would have none perish in darkness: and he that sends the Son of his Love unto all, intends the redemption of a many as will receive him. Why doth he not deny the knowledge of Christ? Why did he not hedge up that flower in some private Garden? Why not lock up that Jewel in one principal treasury? Certainly he would never have communicated it, if he did not purpose an universal benefit by it. Why is the Gospel forbidden to none, if any be debarred from the comforts of it? To whom doth not the bosom of the Church lie open? To what convert is the Baptismal water denied? To what confirmed Christian is the Sacramental communication of the body and blood of Christ not offered? We are not only admitted, but even invited to that blessed Table. To what end are those gracious invitations, Come ye that thirst, and drink Come ye that are heavy laden, and have ease: If any guest were excepted? He that bids all, forbids none. When a Prince proclaims free audience to all sorts of Clients, who can complain that his cause may not be heard? Those that seem such terrifying speeches, as The gate is narrow, Few are saved: be rather meant for spurs to our devotion, than bars to God's compassion: They do not contract his mercy which is so infinite, but they would enlarge our hearts which are so contracted. His nature is now as apt to forgive, as his Power will be seen hereafter able to punish. When did the distribution of his Treasure cease? When was the door shut to his faithful Clients? when we did sin, he did spare; when we did defer, he did expect; when we shall return, he will meet and embrace. He that doth all this, is not willing that any should perish.

6 There is no necessity that any man, any this or that man should perish. Some think they have gone far enough in the clearing of this point, to say, that God is no cause of our perishing, though we must perish: they determine it in this: It is true, your damnation is unavoidable, but you must blame yourselves. Others more fairly and comfortably carry it thus much farther, and conclude out of this Text, that there is no such unavoidableness, no such necessity of your damnation at all. The former only teach, that how desperate soever our case be, how irremediable soever our state, we ourselves, and not God, are the cause of this desperate irremediableness. The other say better; There is no such peremptory sentence, there is no such desperate irremediableness declared to any particular conscience; but whensoever we repent, the Lord will receive us. Once hath the Lord spoken, and twice do we hear him: we hear him once speaking for his own Honor. He does not damn us, if we be damned. And we hear him speaking a second time for our comfort, we need not be damned at all. Thy way and thy doings have procured these things unto thee; and destruction is of thyself: this fully dischargeth God from being the Author of our ruin. But howsoever God be thus discharged, He does not kill me if I die; yet it is but poor comfort to me, if I must die, to be told that I have killed myself: therefore he gives us here a stronger consolation, by telling us, there is no such necessity, we need not die at all. What can make our case so desperate, that he hath not left us ways of returning to him? What can make our state so irrecoverable, that he hath not left himself ways of redeeming us?

It is not for us to dispute, what God of his absolute power may do, nor what by his unrevealed decree he hath done: but this we gather here, that he hath not allowed me, nor thee, nor any to conclude against ourselves, a necessity of perishing. Zion said, The Lord hath forsaken me, and my Lord hath forgotten me: But why will Zion say so? My Lord, and hath forgotten me? Can she remember that God is hers, and not think that she is his? Can she remember him, and think that he hath forgotten her? What contradictions are these? If he have forgotten her, how is he then her Lord? If he be her Lord, how hath he then forgotten her? Can Zion retain her bowels of Piety, and think that God is disembowelled of his? Every where in the Scriptures we meet with God's Venites; both the Testaments are full of invitations to come unto God. There is a venite non habentes, Come and buy, though you have no money, no merits of your own: yet come, and dilate your measures, and according to that dilatation, fill them with the Merits of Christ. There is a Venite & revertimini; Come, though your coming be but a returning: be not ashamed of your returning, though it be a Confession of your former running away: Come in a Repentance, though you cannot come in an innocence. There is a venite & consulite; if you find it hard to come, or though you know not the way to come, yet come, that you may know the way: Consult with God how you may come, and how you may stay when you are come. There is a venite & arguite, argue, plead, dispute, expostulate. Come, though you come to reason with God: come upon any conditions. There is a venite laborantes, how heavy soever the burden of your sins, or the pressure of God's Judgments lie upon you, yet come for your own ease; Come ye that labor, and I will give you rest. There is a venite sitientes, Come you that thirst for my Righteousness, and be satisfied with it, be justified by it. There is a Venite paupers; let the lame and the blind come, that my House may be filled: I have room enough for them all; Compel them to come. The Spirit and the Bride say, Come: And let him that heareth, say, Come: And let him that is athirst, Come: There is a world of venites, and the Gospel abounds with infinite invitations to come. And there is a Venite that closeth up all the rest; Come, ye blessed of my Father: you have obeyed my first venite, in coming to my Kingdom of Grace; you are now blessed with my last venite, Come into my Kingdom of Glory. But there is but one Discedite; that same Ite maledicti, Go, ye cursed, is but once heard from the mouth of God, and that not in this World neither; as long as we are in this world, we are safe from rejection; God doth not cast us off, for he is not willing that any should perish. But if thy tender Conscience, and thy startling soul, should mis-imagine the hearing of such a voice, or in thy melancholy distemper, dream of such a sound from God's lips, as Depart thou sinner; a voice of separation, a voice that bids thee go: Say thou with Peter, to his and thy Savior, Domine, quo ibimus? Lord, whither shall I go? Thou hast the Word of Eternal Life. And I believe and am sure, that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God. And that Christ, the Son of the living God will call thee back, and call back his own word, and entertain thee with Mercy and Peace.

For use and application of all this; here is matter of reprehension, of Instruction, of Consolation.

1. It reprehends those rigid and stoically-disposed Christians, that would contract the Mercy of God within their own limits, and make the gate of Heaven straighter than it is. Malicious fool, is thine eye evil, because God is good? Wilt thou confine the goodness of thy Maker, and set down what he shall do for his Creature? thus much, and no more? These Heirs of the old

Caetharoi see men sin foully and fearfully, they do not see them repent visibly; therefore they infer upon them damnation. O uncharitable censure! I would not pronounce it of the greatest sinner that I should see die; though I perceived his sins to cover him like a cloud, as if they would keep him from looking up to God, and God from looking down upon him; the devil waiting for him, as for a certain prey; yet I would not pronounce it. The ways of thy Mercies, O God, are past finding out; more unknown than the way of a Ship in the sea, or of an Eagle in the Air. Let them show me how a flash of lightning melts the Sword, without making any impression in the scabbard: And I will show them as well, how at the instant of our death Mercy more sudden and more penetrating than the lightening, may melt our hearts into Repentance, though this be not visible to mortal eyes. Of the two, the Pope seems to me to offend the less, because more charitably, in canonizing them for Saints, who for ought he knows are damned: than these men do in damning them, who for ought they know are Saints. But if I might advise them, they should bestow more time in saving of their own souls: less, in damning of the souls of others. I know how frivolous a tale it is, that S. Gregory drew Trajans soul out of hell: and how groundless an opinion is fathered upon Origen, that at last, the Devil shall be saved: But if they could persuade me the one half, that Trajan or the devil came to repentance in hell; I might be induced to believe the other half, that they might be delivered out of hell. Far be it from us to cut short the Mercy of God, or to weaken the credit of the merits of Christ, which so manifest his unwillingness that any should perish.

2. This teacheth us to understand the Scriptures aright. There be too many that press heavily to their own damnation, every sentence of Menace or terror: as, The wages of sin is death: The wrath of God comes upon the children of disobedience: It is impossible for him that falls after Grace, to be renewed: with these, and the like, they affright their own Souls. On the other side, a great number flatter themselves with the Promises of Mercy; as Christ suffered for all: God would have all men saved: At what time soever a sinner repents, he shall be forgiven: and with these they batten their own wantonness. But let us know, that it is not a few mis-understood sentences out of God's Book that must try us, but the whole Book it self: the tenor and purpose, the scope and intention of God in his Scriptures. His Book is a Testament, and in the Testament the Testator is dead, and dead for us: and will he that died for us, suffer us to perish? His Book is Gospel, and Gospel is good Tidings, a gracious Message: and will God under the color of a Message of Grace and Life, send us the fatal Errand of death? The Scriptures may seem to jarre in the weak apprehension of our brains: our best way is to reconcile them in our hearts. except ye repent, ye shall all perish; there is terror: God would have none at all perish▪ here is comfort: that threatening, and this Promise, are both reconciled in our Repentance. The soul that sinneth shall die; saith God by his Prophet: The soul that believeth shall live; saith the same God by his Apostle. He that hath sinned, may believe; therefore he should live: He that believeth, hath sinned; therefore he should die. How shall we atone those? how reconcile death and life? Yes, though we have sinned, and therefore deserve to die; yet if we believe in Christ, that died for our sins, and now forsake them, we shall live. Thus both the sentences of God shall stand, and we shall not fall. When thou art tempted to transgress, consider that part of God's Word which threateneth vengeance to sin: when thou art broken with remorse of sin, remember that part of his Word which promiseth Mercy to Repentance. Thus let us do our best to save ourselves, for God would not have us to perish.

Why will you die, O ye house of Israel?

3. This pours Oile into the wounds of a contrite heart. Were our souls in such a straight, as Israel between the red sea and the Egyptians; the spirits of vengeance, like those enemies pursuing us behind; hell and death, like that red sea, ready to ingulfe us before: yet would I speak to you in the confidence of Moses, Stand still, and see the Salvation of the Lord. Thou that art oppressed with the violence and clamour of thy sins, and wantest an Advocate either to intercede or pity, hear the voice of the Lamb; Cry unto me, I will hear thee out of mine holy hill. Doth any Soul hunger after Righteousness? Behold, I am the bread of life: Take, eat, here is my body. Doth any thirst after the waters of Grace? Lo, I am a living Fountain; come, and drink; here is my blood. Art thou not yet quite dead in trespasses? are not thy ulcers past cure? are there any seeds of life remaining? Is there any motion of Repentance in thy Soul? Will thy pulse of remorse beat a little? Hast thou but a touch of sorrow? a spark of Hope? a grain of Faith? Be comforted; the God of Mercy will not have thee perish. Not a tear of Repentance drops from thee, either unpitied, or unpreserved: God puts it into his bottle. Qui seipsum excipit, seipsum decipit. Doth the Lord say, I would have none perish? And dost thou say, Nay, but he will have me to perish? Thee? why thee? He says, None: and dost thou except one? and that one, Thy self? What is this but to cross the Cross of Christ? He would have All men saved: and thou comest in with thy exceptive; All but me. What is this, but in Effect, and at a distance, to give the lie to Truth it self? There be many that flatter away their souls in sport: but that a man should cast away his soul in willful earnest, is a prodigious desperateness. Not so; but God would have none to perish, therefore not me: this is a safe and comfortable inference. We are all naturally given to favor ourselves where we should not: why then do we not favor ourselves where we should? Justice thinks on us in the heat of our rebellions, but then we think not on Justice: and in our sad remorse, when Mercy thinks on us, cannot we think on Mercy? If the greatness of thy sins, which is commonly heightened by thine own dejections, and exalted by thine own sinking, grow so strong against thee, that thou canst not quench the Jealousy, nor devest the scruple of God's desertion; do but consider who should occasion it; It must be God, or thyself. God it cannot be, for he is not willing that any should perish. It is then thyself, it is thy fault, if it be done: and if thou humbly acknowledge that fault, it is not done: For God doth never so irrevocably threaten Judgment for sin, but the penitent Confession of that sin cancels and avoids the sentence. If our clamorous Conscience, like some sharp-fang'd officer, arrest us at God's suite; Let us put in baile; two subsidy-virtues, Faith and Repentance, and so stand the trial. The Law is on our side, the Law of Grace is with us: and this Law is his that is our Advocate, and he is our Advocate that is our Judge, and he is our Judge that is our Savior, even the Head of ourselves, Jesus Christ.

But that all should come to Repentance.] The end of a thing is first in Intention, though it be last in execution. The Salvation of mankind was God's first end, next to his Glory, why he made man: and the accomplishment of that Salvation is that other end, whereunto in time he brings him. There is Finis propositus, the end propounded; as we build a house to dwell in: and Finis absolutus, the end accomplished, when that house is made fit for our dwelling. There is Finis terminans, the end of a man's life; when he dies: and Finis pradeterminans, the end fore-appointing his death, why he shall die then. There is Finis Cujus, and Finis Cui: the end of which, and the end for which? Finis Cujus, as we call that the end of a Dinner, when we have done eating. Finis Cui, as the end of eating our Dinner is for strength and health. There is Finis medius, and Finis supremus: The Physician persuades his Patient to walk: the end is to get him an appetite to his meat, that is Finis medius: But why does he seek to procure this appetite? that this appetite may procure health: Health then is Finis supremus. God calls all men to Repentance; the end is that they might amend their lives; that is Finis medius: But why would he have them amend their lives? that they might not perish, but have everlasting life: their Salvation then is Finis supremus. He is not willing that any should perish: How should they scape it? By coming to Repentance. The end of his Gospel is, that men might repent: the end of their Repentance is, that they might be converted: the end of their conversion is, that they might be saved.

This then is the point, the force of the argument, the sum and scope of the place: The intent of God's longsuffering towards us, is to bring us to Repentance. The principal End is, that we might be saved: the subordinate End is, that we might come to Repentance, the only Way to be saved. Thus we have all the passages of the Text: The Lord is not slack to help us; there we set out: much less is He slack to perform his Promise; that way we went: But He is longsuffering toward us; thither we came: and the purpose of this longsuffering is, that none should perish; so far we are gone: but that all should come to Repentance, and with this we conclude. For Method in our proceeding, these five conclusions will naturally arise from the words. First, that Repentance is the necessary Way to Salvation. Secondly, that it is the Will of God, we should repent. Thirdly, that this Will extends not to some, but to all. Fourthly, that we must come to Repentance, and not expect that Repentance should come unto us. Fifthly, that the intent of God's longsuffering and forbearance, is our conversion and Repentance. Of these briefly in their Order.

1. Repentance is the necessary way to Salvation: It is the Will of God that none should perish: yet withal, it is his Will, that all, except we repent, shall perish. There was, in the Law, an Altar for Propitiation, and a Laver for Purgation: he that partooke of the Altar, must first wash in the Laver. So in the Gospel, John began to preach the Baptism of Repentance, for the Remission of sins: Before we can have Remission of our sins, we must wash our souls in the Fountain of Repentance. Tears must not only wash out our sins, but stand in the place of our sins. My tears are in thy Book: our sins were in God's Book before: but our tears coming, do both blot them out, and fill their place. If there were any other way to Heaven than sorrow, Vel faelix mundus, vel fallens Christus; the world happy, and Christ had mis-taught us: For He saith, Ye shall weep, but the World shall rejoice: but your sorrow shall be turned into joy, and their joy into sorrow. Ye shall mourn in this world; This is a perpetual Prognostication: the Wisdom of Heaven teacheth us what Weather we must look for; Wet and Rainie, to the End of our Journey. Saint Augustine asks the price of the Kingdom of Heaven: and answers himself, that it is Dignum aeterno labor, worthy of long labor: yet it is gotten Brevi dolore, with a short sorrow. God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes: but dry cheeks have no need of wiping. The Papists speak wonders of their holy Water: but the right holy Water is the tears of a sanctified heart: A repentant eye is the true Cistern of holy Water. Pro brevibus lachrymis, gaudia longa metent. The sights of our sorrowful spirits on Earth, makes the spirits joyful in Heaven. God that is grieved at our sinful joys, will rejoice to behold our penitent griefs. This is the happy Harvest that grows out of the holy seed of our tears: we plough groaning, but we shall reap our Croppe singing. The Ancients in their sorrows were used to rend their garments: the Prophet diverts us from that Custom, to therenting of our hearts. The Priests of Baal did lance their flesh, as their heirs, the Romists do now macerate their bodies: But there may be a broken heart under a whole skin, under a whole garment: as under torn clothes and hides, there may be untouched hearts. A whole garment is more handsome to men, than a broken one: but a broken heart is more pleasing to God than a whole one. We are wont to cut and slash our apparel, in pride: O that we would deal so with our hearts, in humility, and repentance! A robe that is thus artificially mangled, if the scissures and breaches be reconciled with borders of Gold and studdes of Silver; or knit together with the ties of Silke and precious stones; appears more glorious, than the former continuity could have made it. The contrite heart, which the remorse of sin hath cut out into pieces, after it is reintegrated with the Spirit of consolation, and made up with Grace, Peace, and Remission; Jewels so precious, that the Pride of Nature and Art are baseness to them: it is most lovely in the Eyes of God, and reserved for the Wardrobe of Heaven. The Israelites must cross the River Jordan, before they enter into Canaan: and necessarily, Repentance is our way to that blessed Jerusalem.

2. It is the Will of God, that we should repent: His commanding Will, we speak not of his decreeing Will: That Will of his which He tells us; we may not m•ddle with that part of his Will which He keeps to Himself. All Righteousness, all Happiness, is the Will of God to his Creature. This is the Will of God, your Sanctification: Holiness is the Daughter of Repentance. This is the Will of God, your Salvation: That is the end, whereunto Repentance is the means: we must go by the means unto, the end. It is my Fathers Will, that none of these little ones should perish: we must all perish, little and great, if we repent not. It is your Fathers Will, to give you a Kingdom: that Kingdom hath been opened to deplored Impiety, it is always barred against Impenitency. This is not only a declaratory Will, to all: but an efficacious Will, to all that embrace it. God affords many proofs of his Willingnesse to bring us to Repentance. First, his Word preached: Why doth He call us, but that He would have us come? Why is the Voice of the Turtle heard in our Land? But that as one Turtle echoes to another, in their mourning accents, so our sorrowful consideration of your sins in our Sermons, should be answered with a reciprocal Repentance in your hearts. Vox Turturis non dulce sonat, sed dulce signat: our voice is not always pleasing to our ears, but it is always profitable to our souls. This is the scope of all our Preaching, to bring you to Repentance: not to win your ears but your tears: we would not have you commend us, we would have you amend yourselves. This is the honor of a Sermon, when the Hearer goes weeping home: and instead of He said well; cries out to God in secret, I have done ill. Therefore is the word called Fire; that it might melt your hearts: Therefore is Christ compared to the Sun, and the holy Ghost to the Wind; that they may both dissolve your Clouds into tears. Secondly, the Sacraments, both which are the real Oracles of Repentance. Baptism is a Sacrament of Faith, the Lord's Supper a Sacrament of Love; both are Sacraments of Repentance. Baptism is a Key to let us in, the Lord's Supper a Locke to keep and seal us up: both are in effectual without Repentance. The former is precisely called The Baptism of Repentance: Baptism is a Sacramental Repentance, and Repentance is an allegorical Baptism. In the former we are Patients, Agents in the latter: There, another baptizeth us, here, we baptize ourselves: In Baptism we promise Repentance, by Repentance we perform our Vow in Baptism: That was Semel factum, we were but once baptized at the Font: this is Sape iteratum, yea quotidianum, we must daily baptize our souls in the fountain of our tears. That was one shower of grace falling from Heaven above us: this is a continual running Spring of compunction within us. To the other Sacrament, Who dares approach without Repentance? The Bread of life will choke him: and that sacred Wine, the Symbole of Christ's Blood; which is so sovereign and cordial to all Believers, will run like poison through his veins, without Repentance. Yea therefore, therein, and thereby, doth the Lord seal unto us the Remission of our sins, upon the fore-granted condition of our Repentance.

I might add to these, many other demonstrations: but, Pondere, non numero argumentorum, I had rather press you with weight, than oppress you with number of arguments. Wherefore doth the Spirit of Grace knock at our doors, with such infinite holy motions, but that He would come in? He will not come in till Repentance hath swept the House; therefore his first knock is for Repentance. All God's Blessings are like so many Sutors, that woo us to Repentance: yea, they put on even the forms of Clients, and petition us for Repentance. All his judgments are so many claps of Thunder, to waken us to Repentance. His afflictions are Ambassadors, that treat with us about a League; which cannot be had without Repentance. All the Creatures of God, ordained for our use, are so many silent Sermons, so many Trumpets, that summon us to Repentance. Nothing can be plainer, than that the Lord would have us come to Repentance. Is He willing, and are we unwilling? Is it not for our good? Why then do we not consent? We should continually beg this favor on our knees, though it were hard to be granted; and do we despise it, being so graciously offered? No, let us present ourselves to him, whom we have provoked▪ if not in innocence, yet in humility: if not with a clean, yet at least, with a broken heart: and seeing we cannot by our righteousness, let us endeavor to be saved by our repentance.

3 Neither doth he will this good to some, but to All: he would have All come to repentance: this is the infinite latitude of his Mercy. God looketh down from Heaven upon the Children of men, and There is none that doth good, no not one: And yet is his goodness so immense, that he would have none perish, no not one? All men have sinned, and yet would he have all men saved? All have come short of the glory of God; and yet would he have all come home to the glory of God. What, All? There be some, Lord, that mis-believe thy Truth, some that abuse thy Word, some that despise thy Name, some that blaspheme thine Honor; and yet doest thou except none. Wouldst thou have All come to repentance? That extreme malice, Satan, would have All perish: The infinite goodness, GOD, would have All blessed. How well be their names fitted to their natures, in our language; Good, and God: Evil, and Devil? In the Creation, when God had made all things, he reviewed them, and saw that All was good: And such is the goodness of his Love, such his Love of goodness, that he would have All good again. I will not diminish the mercies of God, by admitting here of any of these distinctions; of Sufficiency and Efficacy, of the Generalls and Individualls, all of every kind, or every kind of all: Let no man straighten, what God hath enlarged. Oppresse not thyself, with what God can do by his absolute Power, nor with what he hath done by his inscrutable decree; but comfort thy soul with what he reveals of his incomparable mercy. He tells thee, that he would not have thee perish; that he would have thee repent; when if thou doest, in a thousand places he hath told thee that he will save thee: but nowhere, at no time, hath he peremptorily told thee, that he will damn thee. Where is the bill of your mothers divorcement, whom I have put away? or to which of my creditors have I sold you? Though I might have done both, and left you without just cause of complaint; yet I have not done it. Vbi libellus? If I have forsaken you, If I have sold you, show me your bill of Divorce, show me your bill of Sale. Do I wish well unto all, and dost thou exclude thyself, ô thou wrangling soul? Upon what canst thou ground this jealousy and suspicion in thy Maker? If I have rejected thee, ubi libellus? Where is the Bill? show me if anywhere under my hand In the 66. books of both my Testaments, what one Chapter canst thou pick out, what one verse, what one sentence, wherein I have peremptorily and definitively condemned thee? every leaf abounds with the proffers of God's mercy to All; without limitation, to All that embrace it, But that he hath rejected thee, or me, or any name amongst us; this I am sure we never found. No Lord, thou willest good unto All; O that All would will good to themselves, and give all glory to thee, for thy tender mercies in Jesus Christ.

4 We are directed to come to repentance, and not to look that repentance should come unto us. Seek for wisdom as for silver, and as thou diggest for gold: we expect not that gold and silver should seek us out: if we do, our purses will be light, and our hearts heavy: and we may take up Saint Peters ditty, Silver and gold have I none. It is true that without Christ we can do nothing: but having Christ, will we do nothing, neither? we may say of coming to Repentance, as to that great Supper: Neither all they that were bidden were willing to come: nor they that came, could have come without calling. They that came, cannot ascribe merit to themselves, because they were called: they that came not, may well attribute blame to themselves, because they were called. But how should we come to repentance? Our feet are our desires: we are what we desire to be, and where we desire to be: Maria non erat, vbi erat: Mary was not where she was, but where her desire was, and that was with Christ. When we earnestly desire repentance, we are at it: There may be a faint languid wish of repentance; O that I were another man! this is a foot, but a lame foot; the soul cannot walk upon it. There may be an unwilling willingness to repent, which is a preposterous foot turned backward; Faine I would repent, but I am loath to lose the sweetness of my sin: so watermen look one way, and row another: they give a look toward repentance, but their actions move toward wickedness: they would arrive in the East, but they steer their course westward. We cannot go upon such stilts and crutches to Heaven. Hearty prayer and diligent endeavor; these are the two sound legs, whereon we must come to repentance.

5 The intent of God's long suffering towards us, is that we might not perish: His patience invites our penitence. Knowest thou not that God's goodness and forbearance leadeth thee to repentance? Why doth he spare us so long, but that our amendment might procure him to spare us forever? Repentance, thither he leads us, and by his Patience, so he leads us. O let us have ductile spirits, willing to follow so sweet a manuduction! I gave her space to repent of her fornications, but she repented not. The Lord struck Ahab, her husband, with a violent death, her elder Son Ahaziah perished, her younger son Joram, had twelve years unfortunate reign: will Jezebel take no warning by all this? No, for still she repented not. God is offended, it is he that suffers the injury and proffers the mercy: yet still she repented not. While he stands waiting, she is painting her cheeks threatening his Prophets, renting his holy Name with blasphemies; but still she repented not. He doubles her days of forbearance, that might hasten her day of vengeance: he lets her breath out reproaches against him, while he allows her breath to repent and cool her torment: and yet she repented not. The Devil gapes to devour her, and solicits God that she might be turned over to him for punishment; who would use her worse than the Lions did the enemies of Daniel, breaking her bones before she could fall to the bottom of the Den: still the Lord puts off Satan, and enlargeth her term; but yet she repented not. May we not parallel this city with that woman? Those two daughters of the great king, have come hand in hand to woo us: Mercy and Truth have met together, Righteousness and Peace, have kissed each other: Mercy going before with Peace to you, if you embrace it, Justice following after with woe to you, if you refuse it: The one with an open bosom, ready to receive the penitent; the other with a drawn sword to devour the obstinate; and yet we repented not. One while Peace hath planted Laurels and Palme trees round about our Coasts, and Plenteousnesse hath kept her court within our borders: Another while, fire hath demolished our buildings, Plagues have emptied our walls, losses by Sea hath diminished our Estates, strange proceedings hath distracted our minds: in the mean time, the Prophets of GOD have told us the causes and the remedies of all these sorrows: yet as if our hearts were Sermon proof, were Shot-proof, were thunder-proof too, truly is it said of us, That we repented not.

God is patient, that we might be penitent: All men continue, but with what heart? Behold the aged worldling, that hath overlived all the teeth of his gums, the hairs of his head, the sight of his eyes, the taste of his palate: yet he is loath to die. Why? Either he hath not yet enough, and would live to get it; or he hath too much, and would live to spend it. Most men would neither die, nor be old, nor are yet content in being young: To whom it may be said, as the Vision spake to the shrinking professors of the primitive times: you would neither live to be old, nor die while you are young; What shall do with you? We see old age, an emblem of misery; a burden uxori, natis{que} sibique: yet being asked what year we would die, we still shuffle it off to the next; and rather than want excuses, we would live to repent. This were well if it were true. But does not the greater number rather add to the heap of their sins by continuance, than diminish it by repentance? As if they coveted time, to swell the cup of their torment to the brim: or that Hell-fire could not be hot enough for them, unless they had more space allowed them to blow it? The sin which our birth brought with it into the world, though we had never done actual trespass, is work enough for us to repent of. Besides we sin too much actually every day, for that days repentance. Sufficient to the day is the sinful evil thereof. O that sufficient to the day were the godly sorrow thereof. yea, the sin of one hour may well task the repentance of many days. Lay all these together, and see if thy time be not rather of the shortest, for this great work of repentance. He that commits one sin, hath broken Totam legem, though not Totum legis: but we have broken everyone of God's ten Laws ten thousand times, and ten thousand ways. We have sinned, what shall we do unto thee, O thou preserver of men? What should you do, replies our gracious God? Make use of my patience; I allow you time; do you lay hold of repentance. Have we so many sins, and so few days; and shall we not set apart one hour of a day, one day of a week, for this weighty business? We sin enough in one day, to repent all our lives: and do we think, that for the sins of all our lives, we can sufficiently repent in one day? If we have seen many rising and setting Suns, and beheld the wheeling Heavens turn over forty years; they say, we have had a fair time; yes if we have repented: otherwise it may prove a foul time to us. Pleasure we have little need of, repentance is necessary: our time is too short for both, one of them can only possess it: Detur digniori, give it to the worthier. Before we came into the World, we had sin: after we are gone out of the world, (except Christ by his satisfaction clear the skore) our sin remains in God's debt-book: in neither of these states is there place for repentance: only Tempus vitae, tempus poenitentiae. Time was when God did gently admonish men, Quid statis? why stand you all the day idle? The day shall come, when he will terrify their souls with a Quid stetitis? Why have you stood all the day idle? O then, let us not add to our other sins, this sin also; that we have lost the time of repentance. Let us humbly prostrate ourselves before the Throne of grace; and beg not only space for repentance, but the grace of repentance; that after God's allowance of time to repent, we may never be driven to repent that we had such an allowance. O let it never be said of us, as it was of that cursed Iesabell, that we repented not.

The use of all this teacheth us, not to abuse the Divine patience, but to take the first opportunity of repentance. If sin be fostered in youth, it will hardly be dispossessed in age. Quem juvenis admisisti socium, Senex habebis dominum. That which the young man took in for his play fellow, when he is aged he shall find his Master. Suppose that sickness surpriseth a man in the heat of his blood, and height of his jovialty; though he had rather live to enjoy his pleasant sins, yet he would repent if he must die: Poenitentiam dare possumus, non securitatem: we neither deny him mercy, nor afford him security. Vis ergo à dubio liberari? Tene certum, dimitte incertum. Wouldest thou be put out of doubt? lay hold on that which is certain, let go that which is uncertain. Repent presently, now in thy health; this is good: Quia eo tempore poenituisti, quo potuisti peccare: because in the time when thou mightest have sinned, thou hast repented. But then only to begin to be sorry, when thou hast no further stomach to sin; Peccata te dimiserunt, non tu illa: thy sins have cashered thee, not thou them. If we see no flowers in the Spring, we look for no fruits in Autumn. The Philosopher being asked near his end, why he had not married in all his life, answered thus: In youth I was too young, now I am too old, betwixt both these times I had other business. In like manner do we shuffle off repentance, as he did marriage. In youth we think ourselves too young, and need not: in age too old, and cannot: in middle age we have other business and will not. But as the bloody Tyrants in the days of Queen Mary, gave our forefathers a round and peremptory choice; Either turn or burn: So we tremble to speak it, but we must: Let dissolute sinners either hasten their turning to repentance, or expect their burning in the fiery lake of vengeance.

Thus we have all the parts of this verse in every passage whereof we meet with Mercy: that as at the repairing of the Temple, the people shouted to Zerubbabel; Grace, Grace unto it; so let our thankful hearts acknowledge in every piece of this Holy building; Mercy, Mercy, there is nothing but Mercy in it. We may breath upon ev•ry word, as that Psalm closeth up every verse, with this bearing, For his mercy endureth forever. First, The Lord is not slack to save and deliver us, for his mercy endureth forever. Secondly, much less is he slack concerning his promise to do us good; for his mercy endureth forever. Thirdly, But he is long suffering toward us, full sweet is his patience, for his mercy endureth forever. Fourthly, He is not willing that any should perish, he desires not the death of a sinner, for his mercy endureth forever. Fifthly, But he would have all men come to repentance, and by repentance to forgiveness, and by forgiveness to salvation, for his mercy endureth forever, Amen.

But the Day of the Lord shall come as a thief in the night; in which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burnt up.

WHen God made this lower World, he did not intend it for perpe•uitie; but subjected it to mutations, to alterations, to successions: albeit these changes may challenge sin for the cause, which G•d did foresee but not predetermine: yet after his fore-sight of sin, he did fore-appoint this mortality for punishment. One thing thrusts out another, this age hath dispossessed the former, and shall be dispossessed by the future. Adam resignes to Noah, Abraham to David, the Jews to the Babylonians, they to the Persians, the Persians to the Grecians, the Grecians to the Romans. As it is in the general, so in all particulars: How hath this little Island been usurped, mixed, metamorphosed, even to the utter extinction of her first natives? Kingdoms have their periods: yea, the earth it self, though it continually lie still, is not constant, because it continually changes, and melts in all parts thereof. Man is the noblest part of the earth, and he so melts and moulders away, as if he were a statue, not of earth, but of Snow. His own envy m•kes h•, and he grows lean with that: another's beauty melts him, and h• languisheth away in the fruitless contemplation of that. But a sickness so melts him, as if lead were molten in a furnace: and death so melts him, that it c•lcin•s him, and reduceth him to Atoms and ashes. In the Nature of sensitive •ungs, Children out live their Parents; and so there is a su•ccessive propag•tion, one begets another. But in some things, the Mother outlives the Children: the fruits of the Earth die yearly, the mother remains. We are also her Children, and daily doth she receive us back into her womb: One generation passeth, and another cometh; but the Earth abideth forever. Yet this old gran-dame must have her day: there is a funeral fire ordained for her aged bones. In the World one thing devours another; Fishes devour Fishes, and Beasts devour Beasts, yea and Men also devour Men, till they even become Monsters. We feed upon the Creatures, the Wormes shall feed upon us, the Earth shall consume those Wormes, time shall waste the Earth: but the day of the Lord shall consume even time; this shall put an end to all. This Mountain is bigger than that; this Cedar taller than that, this River longer than that; this Man nobler than that: yet all have one Earth for their foundation, and the same orbicular Heavens for their roof: But the day of the Lord, shall make all even; in the which, the Heavens shall pass away roaring, the Elements vanish melting, the Earth with her works stand burning; Hell shall open shrieking, and all mankind appear trembling, at the Archangels Trumpet summoning, no less than all the World to this last universal audit.

But the day of the Lord shall come, &c.] You may easily apprehend the parts; they are generally but two; An Advent, and an Event: a coming, and what shall happen in that coming. First, The day of the Lord shall come as a thief in the night: there is the Advent. Secondly, In which the heavens shall pass away, &c. there is the Event. The fruit of the particular branches will be gathered in their due places. In the Advent, we have two considerations; The matter; and the manner: What shall come, and How. First, the matter is, The day of the Lord shall come. Secondly, the manner is, Like a thief in the night. To proceed in order.

The day of the Lord.] Every day is the Lord's; all times are his: and he hath so Put them in his own Power, that he hath not communicated that Power, not imparted the knowledge of that disposition, to any Creature. The day is thine, O Lord, and the night is thine. But some days are the Lord's, by a more special right, and peculiar interest: such as he hath culled out of the common heap of days, and set his own royal stamp upon them. So the Sabbath is called The Lord's day; sanctified, and set apart by his own Ordinance, for his extraordinary worship. In no day must we forget him, on this day we must forget all things besides him. The same Sun enlightens other days, equally with this: but it hath a better light, by the rising of a nobler Sun; Jesus Christ doth enlighten it: this is the honor of it: For this cause, besides the moral Precept, it is called The Lord's day. Shall we think that this Day of the Lord shall fall upon The Lord's day? It was Christ's Caution to the Jews; Pray that your flight be not in the Winter, nor on the Sabbath day. We may not pray so, concerning this day of the Lord. But this we know, that as when God had made six day, and all the world in them, he deposited them in the hands of a Sabbath: so in this Day of the Lord, we that are in Christ, shall enter into that everlasting Sabbath, the glorious rest in Heaven. There be other days which God hath consecrated to himself, and commanded a solemn celebration of them to us, ennobled with the memory of some famous works of his Mercy: Concerning everyone of these we may say, This is the day that the Lord hath made: He made it, he made us happy by it, and he would have us remember him in it: This is also The day of the Lord. Potentates, and great Persons have their solemn days: Herod had his Birthday: and Kings do ceremoniously keep their Coronation-days. The Lord will also have His day: once the people would have crowned him, but he refused it: that was not his day. Now he will receive that glorious Crown at the hands of his Father; to the Comfort of his loyal Subjects, and the everlasting confusion of those rebels, That would not have him reign over them: this is The Lord's day. The Saints have their days of Commemoration; and so we call them; Saint John's day, Saint Peters day: Not that we dedicate these days to the worship of the Saints, like our superstitious adversaries: We honor the Saints more than they; Charitate, non servitute: with approbation, not adoration; with imitation of their lives, not invocation of their loves. On those days we remember their Graces, and the Benefits God hath done to his Church by their service: so that they are more properly The Lord's days, than theirs. But the Lord hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world with righteousness: This is emphatically, The Lord's day.

First, we have our day, and then the Lord hath His. O Jerusalem, that thou hadst known these things, in this thy day. The ungodly have their day, wherein they may do their own pleasures, as it were without the controlment of the supreme Judge: The Adversaries of Christ had their day: when the State was incensed against Him, the Herodians came to tempt Him in the dangerous question of Tribute: that was their day. The Sadducees oppose Him about the Resurrection: that was their day. The Scribe, expert in the Law, that thought himself learneded than Herodian, Sadducee, or Pharisee; tempts Him about the Great Commandment, that was his day. Judas betrayed Him for money; that was his day: the Jews accuse Him for envy; that was their day: Pilate condemns Him for policy, that was his day: Herod dismisseth Him in mockery: the Soldiers put Him to death with cruelty: this was their day. But shall not Christ have also his Day, to be avenged for all these injuries? Must He suffer unjustly, and not be openly justified? Had Pilate a day for his Tribunal, and shall not the Maker and Judge of Pilate and all the world, have a Day to sit on his Throne? The Kings of the earth have their yearly Audits, and shall not the King of Heaven and Earth have one Day for his? Shall luxurious men riot, the covetous oppress the unclean wallow in their turpitudes, swearers rend that dreadful Name of God, and persecutors triumph in the sufferings of the innocent; and never be called to a Reckoning? Christ did put off divers Sutors; his kindred, his Mother, with this; My time is not yet come. He did put off his Opposers, his malicious Adversaries, with this; Mine hour is not yet come. But certainly, his time, his hour, his day will come. Those souls under the Altar cry with a loud voice. How long, O Lord, holy, and true? And are answered in effect, My day is not yet come.

There is to every man a day of Salvation: we have not only the first days, wherein God sp•ke by his Prophets; but the last days, Wherein he hath spoken to us by his Son. There be some that are of the night; a night which they have sup•duced upon themselves: but we are The Children of the day; and the Lord hath shined upon us in a full Noone. The Gospel is the day of G•ace, whereof the Word and Sacraments are the bright B•ames; In this day there any be some dark passages, to them that will entangle themselves in unnecessary disputations: But to our modest and humble Faith, the hours •re light enough, and we may easily go our whole journey. That Faith and Repentance shall bring us to Salvation by Jesus Christ: this is a clear light. That the Bread and Wine in the Sacrament, is not more assimilated to our body and blood, than the Body and Blood of Christ is communicated to us in that action: this is a clear light. There may be darkness in us, there is nothing but light in the Gospel. This is our day; let us walk in it? He that is he ancient of days, will call us to an account for our days: Why do we stand here idle all the day, that are n•t sure of more days to make up our Harvest? There are evil d•yes, and still the latter the worse: Temporum posteriora, deteriora: therefore let us put on th• Armor of God, That we may be able to stand in the evil day. But there is a m•r• fatal day than all the rest; The great day of his wrath, in which no man shall be able to stand. This is our day, the next is the Lord's: If we do not in this day provide for that: that day shall condemn us for the loss of this. When the Sun shines upon the Dial, it reflects a shadow, whereby we observe how the d•y passeth: for although the Sun, not the shadow, makes the day; yet we know not how the day goes, by the Sun, but by the shadow. The Son of Mercy shining upon our prepared hearts, refl•cts a shadow, which is our pious conversation. The light of Grace makes the day: but the shadow, or answerable reflection of our holy Life, shows us how the day goes with ourselves; and in what forwardness we are toward the end of our journey, the consummation of our hopes, even the Salvation of our Souls.

This is The Lord's day, because he will then show himself in a more glorious form, than ever the world before saw, or apprehended him. The day of his birth was a day of humility Suscepta à majestate humilitas, à virtute infirmitas, ab aeternitate mortalitas. The day of his death was a day of sorrow; we cannot think of it without remorse: the whole frame of nature did put on mourning garments, to write upon the Funeral of their Maker: His resurrection was a day of triumph indeed; but because not visible, therefore not credible to the sinful and obstinate world. To us, it is a day of joy; and that traditional report of the Suns dancing, upon every Easter day morning, had more than a literal sense in the Authors meaning. But the Jews pretended the every; His Disciples stole him away. Him, what him alone. They were very favorable thieves, that would steal the body, and leave the clothes. I have heard of sacrilegious robbers, that have violated the monuments of the dead; stealing the clothes when they have left the body behind: But to filch the body, and refuse the booty, was a senseless kind of robbery. No, the Disciples did not steal his Body out of the Sepulcher; but the Devil hath stolen the belief of his resurrection out of those Jewish hearts. The day of his Ascension was a glorious day, but seen only by some few of his friends: His glory shall be the same at his coming down, that it was at his going up: but the manifestation of his glory at his going up, was far less than it shall be at his coming down. But in this day of the Lord, Every eye shall see him, even they that have pierced him through. In the plague of Egyptian darkness, there was light enough in Goshen: so in this terrible day of the Lord, when darkness shall overwhelm the reprobates, the faithful shall be in a shining light; they shall shine as the light. To these, The light of the Moon shall be as the light of the Sun, and the light of the Sun shall be sevenfold. To the other, The Sun shall be darkened, and the Moon shall not give her light: Woe unto such that desire the day of the Lord: to what end is it for them? The day of the Lord is darkness and not light. How then shall they discern one another? Saint Chrysostom examines the reason, how the rich man could see Lazarus in Abraham's bosom; whereas it is not said, that Lazarus saw the rich man in hell-torments: and he answers it thus: A man that is in darkness, can easily see him that is in the light; but he that is in light, cannot so easily discern him that is in darkness: The light of Lazarus helped Dives to the sight of him; but the darkness of Dives hindered Lazarus from the sight of him. But this day shall make all manifest: the damnable darkness of the wicked shall be visible to the righteous: and the blessed glory of the righteous shall be apparent to the wicked. Everyone shall see another, and all shall behold the Lord: they that have rejected him, to their horror: they that have embraced him, to their everlasting comfort.

The Scripture abounds with expressions of the desperate fatality of this day. It is terrible, who can abide it? Happy is he that is bid in the day of the Lord's anger. Innumerable are the places, wherein it is called The day of the Lord Jesus. He was put to public disgrace before, and insulted upon by Men and Devils: Now his goodness shall be justified, and his glory published before Men and Angels. Then his attendants were poor fishers; now his Throne shall be waited upon by celestial spirits. Then he sprang from the low estate of his Mother;

now he shall come in the glory of his Father. Then Herod had a fling at his Infancy, now he shall tremble to behold his Majesty. Then they cried, Crucify him, crucify him: Now they shall say, Glorify him, glorify him. Then they laughed at his sorrows, now they shall mourn at his sentence. Then they fastened him to the Cross, now they shall do homage to his Crown. Then he was a Lamb, bearing the sins of the world: now he shall be a Judge, condemning the world for sin. Then he was made a sacrifice for all men; now all men shall be made a sacrifice to him; either to his mercy in their salvation, or to his justice in their perdition. Then he rode to Jerusalem upon a beast; his cloth of state being the people's garments: now he shall come riding on the wings of the wind, and the Clouds shall be the dust of his feet. Then a little Star waited on his Nativity: now the Sun and Moon shall be drowned in his clarity. All honor shall be swallowed up in the honor of Christ: As Philosophers say of heat; that it does not only expel cold, but also avocate and call out a lesser heat: And light does not only expel darkness, but also extinguish a lesser light: Or as John the Baptist said of Christ; He must increase, and I must decrease: So that Matth. 3. almost in every verse, there is a mention, there is a repetition of John: John baptized, John preached, John was thus clothed; until Christ's Baptism is finished, and then there is no more mention of John. all is now referred to Jesus, and Jesus hath extinguished John. So now strong men have their powers, great men have their honors, Lord's have their Commands, and Kings have their Crowns: But in this day they shall all resign to this Almighty King: all honors shall be swallowed up in the honor of Christ: all dignities, all titles shall be centred in him; as at the Creation, all that dispersed light was reduced to the one great luminary, and treasured up in the S^{un}: all Crowns shall be cast at his feet: and all Glory and Praise shall be given to his blessed Name forever.

The Day of the Lord will come] For Iudgement, that is the intent of his Comming: yet it is his especial Mercy, to give us warning. He might come, and never tell us so: yet He doth tell us of it, before He will come. The End of all things is at hand. What then? Therefore be sober, and watch unto Prayer. The Son of man comes in a Cloud, with Power and Glory: What of that? Therefore take heed to yourselves, that that Day may not come upon you unawares. Why doth He tell us that He will come, but that we might be in readiness to entertain Him? In all God's proceedings to Judgment, whither particular, or this universal; He ever leaves a latitude between his sentence and execution: and that Interim is Sphaera activitatis, the Sphere in which our Repentance and his Mercy move, and direct themselves in a benign aspect towards one another. God seldom comes to that dispatch; a word and a blow: but to a blow without a word, to an execution without a warning, never. Cain embrewes his hands in the blood of his own brother: God takes upon Him the quarrel; (and indeed it was for his sake that Abel suffered) He could have surprised and killed Cain: He does not, but only gives him warning: Why is thy Countenance cast down? If thou doest not well, sin lies at the Door: you may proceed, but if you will needs, you will lose by it at last. Saul persecutes Christians; Christ meets upon the way, speaks to him, strikes him to the ground tells him vocally, and tells him actually; that he had undertaken an ill business in opposing Him. This which God did to Saul, converts him: That which He did to Cain, wrought not upon him: but still God went his own way in both; to speak before He strikes, to lighten before He thunders, to warn before He wounds. Antequam vulneremur, monemur. In the case of Corah, God may seem to proceed apace towards execution, yet not without divers Reprieves. First, when Moses heard of their rebellious challenge, he falls not upon them, but falls upon his face before God for them; he laments and deprecates in their behalf. Secondly, He calls them to a fair Trial, the next day: To morrow the Lord will show who are his, and who are holy: Take your Censors, and come, that it may be examined: and they said, We will not come. Thirdly, it is likely that Moses cited them again, because again they peremptorily replied; We will not come. Fourthly, upon this contumacy, God resolves to consume them in a moment: but Moses and Aaron redouble their petitions; O God, shall one man sin, and wilt thou be wrath with the whole Congregation? Fifthly, Moses went up to them again, and the Elders of Israel followed; and yet all prevailed not. Sixthly, He makes a separation of the people from them, Depart from the Tents of these wicked men: hoping that the sight of the rest running from them, as from monsters, would have made their hearts mis-give them. Seventhly, when they still impudently persisted to out-face God's vengeance, Moses comes to pronounce the Sentence; These men shall not die a common death. Eighthly, then after, and yet not instantly after this Judgment, Execution followeth; The earth opened and swallowed them. But God begun not there: God opened his mouth, and Moses his, and Aaron his, and the Elders theirs, before the Earth opened hers. All concludes in this; God's Judgments and Executions are not sudden, there is always room for Repentance and Mercy: but his Judgments and Executions are certain, there is no room for Presumption or Security. The day of the Lord will come; it is certain: and like a Thief in the night; it is sudden: yet He that gives us this premonition, intends our holy preparation, that we may find Mercy in that great Day of Retribution.

Will come.] As no importunity can delay it, no secrecy avoid it, no policy corrupt it, so nothing but sanctification can give us comfort in it. The sudden beating up of a drumme may make a very valiant Soldier startle; and the sounding of the last Trump may strike a fear into the holiest body, that wakens out of his grave. It is some terror for a man to be awakened, when the whole world is on fire about his ears: though himself be Titio ereptus, a brand snatched out of the fire. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God: Which words a Christian considering, wished that he might fall into the hands of a dead God. He meant into the hands of that Person, who is both God and Man: who even whilst he was a dead man, was still a living God. In death, his hands were nailed to the Cross: then he could not strike us for our sins, because then he was stricken for our sins. As that prisoner appealed from Philip, to Philip: so let us appeal from Christ as he is a living Judge, to Christ as he was our dying Savior: that for his sake who once died for us, this living God may forever acquit us. But it is a sweet thing, when a man hath slept quietly all night, to be waked in the morning with music. The body that hath slept in Christ, shall be called up with Heavenly music at the resurrection: The testimony of our own conscience, the Hallelujahs of Saints, the Choir of Angels, yea the very sound of that Trumpet shall consent in this Anthem: And that which makes up the perfect harmony, as the voice of Christ himself; Come ye blessed.

Like a thief in the night.] Similitudes may illustrate the things which are to be proved; but they do not justify the things from which they are borrowed. Christ's coming like a thief, is no warrant for thieves; no more than his comparison taken from piping and dancing, is a license for fiddlers and dancers. That God, who would be understood literally, according to the direct and plain sense of all that he saith; doth not refuse also to speak by figures and metaphores. The institution of his whole worship in the old law, was a continual allegory: types and figures overspread all, and figures flowed into figures, and poured themselves out into farther figures. Circumcision carried a figure of Baptism, and Baptism carries a figure of that purity, which we shall have in the perfection of glory. Nor did he only speak in this language by his Prophets, but even by his Son too. He calls himself a Way, and a Light, and a Gate, and a Vine, and Bread, oftener than the Son of God, or the Son of Man. But that he should liken himself to a Thief, is the wonder. He is the judge of thieves, and will that Judge assume any likeness unto thieves? Thieves will break into houses, violently take away other men's goods, and bloodily cut their throats: and will the righteous Judge of all do so? It was he that cut out men's several proprieties; for there can be no Theft, where is no distinction of ownages. And the state which had once allowed a community, found by experience quickly, that the common Ass was never well saddled; and therefore were driven to make laws for the designation of every ones proper portion: — Meus est his ager, ill tuus. Yea, the chief Lord of all, hath been no less careful of fencing in his Tenants possessions, than in the maintenance of his own homage and service: For he wrote with the self same hand: Thou shalt not steal, with which he wrote, Thou shalt have none other God's but me. He well knew the corrupt inclinations of men, and their itching desires to finger the peculiars of others: In whose judgment, Stollen waters are sweet: Aliena nobis, nostra plus alijs placent: And therefore made a law against it: and will he now so seem to favor it, as to admit a likeness to it? I might answer, that Nullum simile est idem. No like is the same: Similitude, and Identitie are different things: He that is like me, is not myself. When Christ resembles himself by some good thing, that good thing he calls himself. Bread is good; therefore he does not say, I am like to Bread, but I am Bread. The light is good, therefore he does not say, I am like unto light, but I am the Light. But when he fetcheth a comparison from some questionable or unwarrantable things, he sets it down with a Sicut: which imports a Similitude, not a Truth. A snare is hurtful; therefore his coming is not called a snare, but Tanquam laqueus, As a snare. A thief is mischievous; therefore it is not called a thief, but Sicut fur, like a thief. Christ cannot be a thief, for what is there for him to steal? The principal right of all things he hath reserved to himself: therefore the Israelites did not properly rob the Egyptians? Deo ministerium praeberunt. God himself by a special commission, intitled them thereunto. Our goods are his, our bodies are his, our souls are his, the world is his; what then can he steal? yet I will tell you what he hath stolen, and wherein he hath played the thief: (let no profane misinterpreter abuse it to his diminution or dishonor, which I intend to the glory of his goodness.) He entered into the house of mortality, and stole from us our sins: He entered into the house of the grave, and stole from us the sting of death: He broke open the gates of Hell, and stole from us damnation: Of these sorrows He hath robbed us, and with these robberies He was clothed, even when he hung naked upon the Cross: If this be theft, it is so gracious a one, as merits praise to his holy Name for evermore.

Like a thief.] The master begun this comparison of himself, and the servants made bold to follow it; Paul, John and Peter, all concur in the same similitude. But why like a thief? that is now our Quaere. First, for the uncertainty of his coming. Secondly, for the suddenness of that uncertainty. Thirdly, for the peril of that suddenness. Fourthly, for the Fatality of that peril. Fifthly, For the Irremediableness of that Fatality.

1 For the uncertain time of his coming, he is Tanquam fur insidians. The thief doth not tell the master of the house what time he will come, for then he would prevent him, and fortify himself against his most subtle violence. Nor does the Lord impart to his Creatures, upon what day his Day shall fall. He hath not said when he will come, though he hath given us some precedent signs before the accomplishment whereof he will not come. Things quaerible, are in the number of things cognoscible. Why do we study that, which is impossible to learn? what kind of fruit soever that was, for which our first Parents sold their Birth-right in Paradise, I am sure there was not juice enough in it to quench that hot thirst of forbidden knowledge, which they derived to their posterity. But that which like a corn of Salt, only distempered Adams taste, is now become a salt hydopricall phlegm in mankind: that the more they do know, the more they desire; and the admitting them to one secret, doth but hearten them on to seek for another. We all take after our Grandmother, and setting our shoulders to the very Portall of GOD'S privy Chamber, inn we must, and be made acquainted with the Divine Counsel. The eye so itcheth after variety of sights, and the ear of sounds, that neither the one Is satisfied with seeing, nor the other with hearing.

There be two questions that much trouble such scrupulous brains: where and when, this judgment shall be. For the former; Christ speaks of a separation that should be made, between two in one bed, and two in one field, and two at one Mill; whereof the one shall be received, the other refused: unto this the Disciples presently reply, Where Lord? Some conceive two demands in that one word, because 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 is taken in a twofold sense; which they gather from a verse of Sophocles, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, &c. Importing both a place, where, and the motion to a place, whither. Where shall this place of separation be, and whithers shall the separated pass? To what Barre shall they repair for their doom, and whither shall that doom send them? Christ accordingly answers them with a wheresoever, and a thither; including both locum and terminum. Duo quarentibus unum respondet: He gives them but one answer to their two questions; but such a one, as the Perspectives speak of a Sun-beam, which is made of two beams gathered into one: or as we say of two friends, which are one in heart, but two in strength. This answer may resolve them so far as their salvation needed, though not so fully as their humors desired. There can be no question moved by a creature, to which God is not able to make a sufficient answer. The Epitomizer of ten into two, the Digester of so large a volume, as the whole Law, into so brief a sum as Love; will be as plentiful in his satisfaction, as flesh and blood can be in a question. Do they ask, where they shall appear? He answers, wheresoever he shall keep his Court. Do they demand whither they shall be translated? He answers, whither he hath gone before to prepare the place. For the other, Christ spake of Jerusalem's downfall, and the Disciples came unto him privately: It was their boldness to press upon him; but that it was done privately, argued some modesty: Tell us, when shall these things be? What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world? Our Savior, to leave a testimony, how ill he liked of this curiosity; gives them no directer than an indefinite answer: And as before he would not vouchsafe their where, so much as a Here, or There; but did put it by as a demand not pleasing to him, with an unresolving wheresoever: So here he doth not satisfy their when, with a Now, or Then: but clean discourageth such an inquiry; telling them, that though they were Apostles, and had the privilege to be made acquainted with the heavenly mysteries; yet they must not look to know that which is concealed from the very Angels. The Divine nature, as it is mercy it self, so it is wisdom it self. It is his mercy to impart unto us, that one day we shall be brought to judgment: but when this Day shall be, and where this judgment, his wisdom thought good to conceal. To be sure he will come, may well deter us from offending: but to be sure when he will come, would breed a security of sin upon the vain hope of timely repenting.

In other things, knowledge is better than ignorance: but in this, ignorance is better than knowledge. Scholers that know their master will not return before such a day, are apt to play the truants: but when they are not sure where he is, nor how soon he will come, fear will make them ply their books. Give over thy proud inquiry, that may do thee hurt: fall to penitent humility, this will do thee good. Expect him every day, that may come any day. Let God's secret alone, it is too high for thee: but be wise, and look unto the secret withwithin thee. Thou hast a secret pride, root up that: thou hast a secret infidelity, cast out that. Let it not be our business, to know where or when we shall be judged: but how we may answer for ourselves when the judgment comes. Did we know the place and time, we could not hide ourselves; appear we must. But knowing what will be said against us, and what may be pleaded for us, and how well the cause shall go with us, we rest in peace. If were bound over to answer for some pretended crime, at a human bar, would we spend the time in hearkening after the day of Session, or place of execution? Were it not more wisdom, to furnish ourselves with friends and answers for that trial? There be three questions, Vbi, Quando, Quomodo? Where, when and how? The two former, in this argument, be idle: the last is necessary. When shall this Audit come, and where shall it be kept? be quaeres of foolish presumption. But how, how shall we provide for our account at that Audit? this is the quare of wise devotion. Martha thought, when she had set herself on work, that Christ would pay her her wages, or at least con her thanks: she puts herself to many troubles, and looks for many commendations. But expecting the reward of her cookery, all the fat was in the fire: Mary's break-fast was better than Martha's dinner. Let us mind that one thing which is necessary; and then one of the Three which bear Witness in Heaven, shall give us the testimony of so much discretion, as to choose that good part, which shall never be taken from us. Thy impertinent questions like thy Savior as ill, as that of Peters did, What should become of John? Propose it when thou list, thou shalt hear the same Reply: Busi-body, What is that to thee? Follow thou me. This is the uncertainty.

2. As it is uncertain for the time, so it is sudden for the event. The Thief does not give a signal to the house, before his irruption: he is entered as soon as he is heard: his violence and his noise come both in an instant. The Trumpet shall sound, the Judge shall appear, the Graves shall open, the Dead shall rise, the Sentence shall be given, the World shall burn; all in an instant. The Summons, and the Sentence, though they differ in Order and Number, shall seem in regard of Time but one Act. Saint Augustine spends two Chapters in the Manifestation of this sudden Proceeding. The great Buildings of Nature, like the walls of Jericho, shall fall together. If only one breach had been made in that City, as it uses in other sieges, for the entrance of the enemy: perhaps new supplies might have made it up by their forces; or for want of materials, they might have stopped it with slaughtered carcasses: But now, that at once Jericho is turned into a plain field, every Israelite without resistance might run to the next booty: and the throats of their enemies seemed to invite their swords, to a dispatch. Such a destitution of succor, and denudation of all refuge, shall, in this Day, befall the Reprobates, that they shall have neither means nor will to resist. Some men are sick of a preposterous desire of the last Day: and would have the Lord come presently. Others are lethargiz'd with a drowsy dullness: and they care not how long it be ere He comes. As the Apostle hath (in the former Verse) corrected the fervor of the one, by commending the divine Patience: so here He rouseth the torpours of the other, by threatening the last Daies Suddenness. These require the spur, as the former need a bridle: both are instructed, directed, here.

When Christ compared his second Comming in Fire, to that former Judgment of Water: Did He mean there should be the same pauses and degrees in burning this World, that there were in drowning that? Shall this hot element be as long a dispatching the one, as that cold element was a destroying the other? No, the similitude intends not the same speed of execution, but the same dullness of expectation: the World shall be as secure now, as it was then. When the Apostle says, It shall come upon them, as travel upon a woman with child: Does He mean, with the same proportion of haste? A woman reckons out her nine months, and can guess near to the day of her coming; and says, that at such a time she looks her: but can we by any probable conjecture, aim at the Day of the Lord? Saint Paul's purpose there, is not so much to express the Suddenness, as the inevitable^{esse}: Sinful men can no more escape their trial, than pregnant women can avoid their travel. The Day of doom shall come as unavoidably, but more unexpectedly. When they least look for it, then they shall find it; or rather; it shall find them. When they say, Peace, Peace and safety; Then shall they be overtaken with this extremity. As the Thief watcheth his advantages, and when he finds the weakest prevention, gives the fiercest invasion. If the Master be a-sleep, the Servants abroad, the doors unbarred, or the house unguarded; there is the opportunity he looks for. When the Servants of man, his Affections be wandering abroad: when his Senses, his Centinels, be stupefied: when the Mistress, Conscience, is commanded silence: when the Master, Reason, is rock'd into a slumber: and especially above all the rest, when Religion is put out of her lodging: then is the season of this woeful surprisall. Christ hath not promised sinners, to come at their fittest times: this Day of the Lord commonly takes them at the worst. Cain was not in so bad a case when he was borne of his mother, as after he had murdered his brother. Saul was pious, and begun his reign with God: but his proceeding was bloody; and the farther he went, the worse he was; till even the night before he died, he consulted with a Witch, and ended his reign with the Devil. Absalom begun with Pride, but shut up his life with Treason. Pharaoh was never good: but never so bad as at his drowning. Judas had been long a secret Robber; then he became a prodigious Traitor, and yet his Catastrophe must be in a desperate self murder. Such is the fatal suddenness of this day, to come upon men at their worst. The greatest sinner hath some remission, some intermission of his wickedness: Oftentimes Satan caught the Demoniacke: Oft-times He caught him; therefore sometimes, in that violence, he caught him not. He had his lightsome respites; not ever tortured, not ever furious: betwixt whiles he might look soberly, talk sensibly, move regularly. It is a woeful comfort, that we are not always sinning. If God were bound to accommodate his respect of times to those Lucida intervalla, those distances and short vacations of sin, there were hope; but who can look that the Divine Justice should wait upon the pleasure of man? I am going to sin, Lord spare me now: there is mickle pleasure or benefit in it, call me not away at this time: Whose voice is this? A mortal man's? Presumptuous Fool, in vain dost thou appoint God, for God can disappoint thee. At all times fear to sin, if ever thou fearest to die to die thy sin. Thou canst not be so quick to dispatch thy sin, as God can be to dispatch thy soul. The Thief watches all night to break in: if at any hour thou take liberty to sleep, he will hardly be kept out. Give no place to the Devil. What, not in Youth? Not in the heat of blood? Not in the height of pleasure? No. Give no place, at no time. There is a time for all things: A time to be burn, and a time to die: a time to kill, and a time to heal: a time to weep, and a time to laugh: a time to get, and a time to lose: a time to rent, and a time to sow: a time to love, and a time to hate: a time of war, and a time of peace: a time to sigh, and a time to sing: a time to marry, and a time to bury: But of all these times, and many moe, There is no time to sin. Of all the exhibitions and allowances of God to man, He hath allowed no time for sin. We commonly kill our beasts, when they are at the fattest: but Judgment surprizeth sinners, when they are at the leanest; in that point of their life, which is of the remotest distance from goodness.

God is slow to wrath until the last Day, and then He is quickest. Before, if we pray, He hears us: if we repent, He pardons us: when we amend our life, He saves us. But in this Day of the Lord, there is no time for petition, no place for conversion, no means of pacification. If we have done these things before, well and good; our salvation is sure: but if they be then to do, they are debarred forever. As the lightning flasheth from one part of Heaven to the other, So shall the Son of man be in his Day. He compares his Comming to the Lightning. First, for Manifestation; His first Comming was privately; some few acknowledged Him: this last shall be public and apparent; Every eye shall see Him. Secondly, for terror, the Sun gives a greater light than the Lightning; but He is welcome to all eyes, as the Messenger of joy, health, and comfort: He does not affright us with his Beams, but cherish us with his Influence. But the Lightning is terrible, and makes the stoutest heart to shudder, especially when it is accompanied with Thunder. Christ's first Comming was in soft silence, like the gentle Dew upon the tender Grass: but his second Comming will be with a dreadful noise; the Trumpet sounding, the Earth trembling, the Seas roaring, the Angels showing, the Wicked shrieking, and the Judge thundering out his final Sentence. For that extraordinary terror at the Law-giving, was a little image of this which shall be at the Law-requiring. Thirdly, especially for the Suddenesse: the Sun compasseth the world by degrees; He keeps a certain course, his wonted motion: But the Lightning, though it move through the Air, does not appear successively, or by gradual approaches: but suddenly, instantly, it flies from East to West, and darts through the Hemisphere, wherein it is begotten. So sudden will the Lord be in his Day: Time was when He stayed for the first World an hundred and twenty years; He stayed for a rebellious nation forty years; He stayed for a dissolute City forty days: now He will not tarry a Yeare, a Weeke, a Day, an Houre, a Minute for any man. He was not wont to come in Whirlewindes, or Earthquakes; or violent fires, but in a still Voice, in a soft and gentle Air. Now, no imagination of man can conceive the Terror, the suddenesse of his Appearance. He will make his Processe and his Decree; his Citation and his Judgment, but one Act: His Summons, his Battle, his Victory, and his Triumph, shall seem all but one thing. He will lead sinners captive, and deliver them captive to Hell, as soon as He hath decla- them to be Enemies; and cut them off, as it were, without drawing his Sword out of the scabbard. A Disease may make haste, and Death be quick of dispatch, in dissolving the body: But much more haste, and quicker dispatch, will God use, in recollecting and reuniting the dust of that body at the Resurrection? Then shall we all hear his Angels proclaim the Surgite mortui, Rise ye dead: Though we be dead, we shall hear the Voice: the sound of the Voice, and the working of the Voice shall be all one; and all shall rise in a less minute there, than any one dies here.

They vainly flatter themselves, that think it is enough to do good sometimes: if they serve God on the Sabbath, it is no matter for all the Weeke. As if they might not die upon a worky-day; as if God were bound to wait their times; till the good mood came on them. Those Levites, which once drew their swords, for God and Moses, against the Idolaters; and for that deed, won both praise and blessing; become afterward the forwardest in a rebellion against them. There is no assurance of a man for one act: whom one sin cannot fasten upon, another may. Yea, the same sin may find a repulse one while, from the same hand, which another time gives it entertainment: and that yielding loseth all the thanks of the former resistance. It is no praise to have done once well, unless we continue. If a man turn from his righteousness, all that righteousness shall be forgotten: and in the sin that he hath sinned, he shall die. If we knew what hour the Lord would come, How easy were it, think we, to repent the hour before? If we were sure what day, what month, what year; we would not grudge that days, that months, that years preparation. Yet, now we wantonize, as if the Judge were an hundred leagues off; Who, it may be, stands at the very door. Suppose a man hath seven breaches or holes in his house, and knows the Thief will enter at one of them: Will he guard this, and not that? Will he watch at six of them, and neglect the seventh? Thou hast seven days in the week, like so may in-lets for this Judgment: Wilt thou watch only on the Sabbath, the seventh day, and leave the other six unregarded? Or be sober one day, and drunk another? Then, at the breach which thou mindest not, on the day thou least suspectest, this great Judge will come upon thee, and then, What shall become of thee? Thy particular Judgment follows immediately upon thy death: Is there no Impostume, no Apoplexy within thee? No Sword, no Instrument within thee? No Thunder, no Judgment above thee? No Element, no Fiend under thee, that may in a moment dispatch thee? God's Door is ever open to let in our Repentance, and our Door is ever open to let in his Vengeance: The only way to escape future malediction, is by present humiliation: now let us be converted, and we are sure to be saved.

3. The peril by this Suddenesse is very dreadful, for our everlasting state lies upon it. Thou hast a trial at the Law, and knowest a famous and gracious Advocate, who if he undertake thy cause, will carry it for thee: but flattering thysself that the day of hearing is far off, thou forbearst to acquaint him with it, or solicit his council and assistance: In the mean time, the king prefers this Advocate to the place of a Judge. The Session is come, and then thou humbly prostrate thyself before him, beseeching him to favor thy cause. But he answereth, That request comes too late, I am not now an Advocate to plead for my Clients, but a Judge to give righteous Sentence. If we sin, we may Now have an Advocate, to propitiate for us: But in this last Assizes, at the trial of all the world, that Advocate is turned into a Judge: and then they that have not formerly •••ne him to be their Mediator, can have small hope to find him their Savior. The thief does not break into the house, and so come his way, forbearing to touch the goods: no, but all that is precious and portable becomes his bootie, and he looks for thanks if he spare the blood of the family. If this impartial day did only ransack our Wardrobes, empty our Chests and Cabinets, fire our cottages, strip our bodies of their garments, or our souls of our bodies, and do us no more harm; it were very favorable: Death it self, which is but God's Under-sheriffe, can do all this, by virtue of his Office and Commission: Let but the Soul escape, suffer not that to bleed or perish, and sacilis Iactura, all were but an easy loss. But this thief (like the Robbers in some Countries, who break both the Commandments together) never steals without killing. When a Passenger complained to a Captain, that some of his soldiers had robbed him of all that he had: the Captain asked him, Whether he had those clothes on when they robbed him: He answered, Yes: Then says the Captain, I am sure they are none of my Soldiers that did it: for had they been mine, they would not have left you a rag to your back. This day shall rob the wicked of all that ever they had, and leave them not so much as a rag to cover their shameful nakedness. They shall speed worse, than he did among those high-way cutters: for they shall be left robbed, and naked, and wounded, and more than half dead: without hope of any charitable Samaritan, to cure or comfort them. The Danite-thieves stole away Micah's idols: the goods of a worldling are his gods: Ye have taken away my gods, and what have I more to lose? What more? Yes, thou mistaken Idolater, This Thief shall steal away thyself: as Micah was there threatened; Let not thy voice be heard, lest they take away thy Life with thy gods. I might parallel the the every of those Danites, with the avarice of many Christians: As those Images appeared to those Israelites, so do riches to these worldlings; in their Imagination no less than gods: and they will have them, though they steal them. A superstitious Levite was the Priest to those, a covetous heart is the Priest to these. There, because the gods without the Priest could do them less service, than the Priest without the gods, therefore they steal the Priest with the gods. Here, the Priest steals the gods, and the gods steal the Priest: the heart purloineth riches, and those riches filch the heart; and both are contented with this mutual the every. O miserable Danites, that could esteem that a God, which might be stolen: that could look for protection from that, which could not keep it self from stealing: which was won by their theft, not by their devotion! Could they worship those idols more devoutely, than Micah that made them? If they could not protect their Maker from robbery, how shall they protect their thieves? yet their superstition hath made them mad upon a god, and have him they must, by what means they care not; though they offend the true God, by stealing a false. Riches are the gods of the world, men's hearts are the thieves; they make no Conscience from whom they steal them, so they have them. Still one thief robs another, till this last Thief comes, and he robs all of all. The oppressor robs the innocent, the Lawyer robs the oppressor, the Tyrant robs the Lawyer, death robs the tyrant, and the Day of Judgment robs death: But if a traveler, having store of money about him, and one Jewel more worth than all the rest, suspect to be set upon and rifled by thieves; he will so surely and secretly convey his Jewel, that they shall never find it: Our Soul is our Jewel, and this subtle Thief will narrowly examine us: Let him take all, so we may save our Jewel; and there is but one way to save it, that is, by hiding it in the wounded side of Jesus Christ.

4. The Fatalitie of this peril may yet be further amplified, by the insulting tyranny of this implacable Thief. It does not only rob sinners of all, and that suddenly; but domineeres over them with painful derision. It mocks their fear, and laughs at their destruction. Bloody thieves, when they are once Masters of the house, first bind the family, then put them to racks and tortures, to force out a Confession of their concealed treasure: to all this agony, they aide scorn and contempt, which is a rack upon the rack, a mercielesse aggravation of their torments. The Day of the Lord doth not only bind reprobates with the everlasting chains of darkness, that they cannot move hand not foot: but delivers them over to those tormentors, who will never cease torturing of them, till they have both confessed and paid the uttermost penny. Their temporal goods they call their moveables; their bodies are also their moveables; and both these may be removed without prejudice to their souls. When thieves in the night had robbed a Merchants house of some bedding and such household-stuff; he hearing the noise, rose and went down, and finding them but new gone, followed to see what would become of his goods: the thieves espying him, threatened him for dogging them: But the Merchant answered, I only come to see whither you remove me. If the soul could be safe, as that Merchant was, whilst it saw miss-fortune remove her goods to the stranger, or death remove her body to the grave; there were but a slight ground of complaint. But as nothing but the dishonor and rape of Tamar, could please Am, and nothing but the blood of Amnon could satisfy Absalom, and nothing but the heart of Absalom could content Joab, and nothing but the death of Joab could pacify Solomon: So nothing but the Soul of an impenitent sinner can appease the just wrath of this Day. Desperate thieves break three of the Divine Precepts at once: they do not only steal and kill, but they bind three transgressions together, committing adulteries, deflouring Virgins, and ravishing Marrons. The carnal Souls Pleasure is his wife, to which he is so uxorious, that he neglects Christ; I have married a wife, and I cannot come: His daughters be the fruit and issue of both; such vanities and sins as he hath begotten upon this concubine. This mistress of his affections shall be ravished from his side, and these Children shall be dashed against the stones before his eyes: Not unlike that fearful doom of Zedekiah: first his sons are slain before his eyes, and then those eyes of his (as if they had seen enough, when they had seen himself childless) are put out.

The Reprobates shall cry at the last day, Hide us from the Face of him that sits on the Throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb. Can the Lamb be angry? or is there such Lion-like terror in that mild face, so full of beauty and sweetness, when it looks upon wickedness? Why would they be hidden? and hidden from the Lamb? O, guiltiness would fain keep out of sight: the Limbes of that infernal head, shall not esteem it the least part of their torment at that day, to see the most lovely spectacle that Heaven can afford. He, from whom they fled in his offers of Grace, shall be so much more terrible, as he was and is more gracious. When Christ was in his humbled estate, that Prince of darkness was so humble as to kneel to him: and though he had so much boldness as to expostulate, Art thou come to torment us before our time? yet withal he had so much fear as to deprecate, I beseech thee torment me not. For the former; whether it were music to Satan to hear the shrieks and roarings of sinners, because he useth to enjoy their torments: and therefore held it a piece of his own torture, to be restrained in the exercise of his tyranny. Or whether, as himself professeth, he were now in a fearful expectation of being commanded down into the deep, for a further degree of actual execution. Or whether the very Presence of Christ was his rack; for the guilty spirit cannot behold the Judge, or the Executioner, without a renovation of horror: Howsoever, he deprecates a greater infelicity. Yet what a thing is this, to hear the devil at his Prayers? I beseech thee torment me not. Nature teaches every Creature to wish a freedom from pain: the soulest spirits cannot but love themselves, and this love must needs produce a deprecation of evil. Devotion is not guilty of this prayer, but fear. There is no Grace in the suit of Devils, but nature: no respect of God's Glory, but of their own ease: They cannot pray against sin, but against torment for sin. It can be no news to hear the profanest mouth, in extremity, imploring that sacred Name, when even the Devils do so. The worst of all Creatures hates punishment, and can say, Lead me not into pain: only the good heart can say, Lead me not into temptation. If we can as heartily pray against sin, for the avoiding of displeasure, as against punishment, when we have displeased; there is true Grace in the Soul.

The Conclusion is; If those wicked spirits trembled to come before Christ in his Humiliation, when he was to Suffer: how shall sinful dust appear before him in his glory, when he comes to Judge? As one and the same thing works diversely upon divers constitutions, and the nourishment of one, is the offense of another: So this Day brings contrary Effects to contrary dispositions; and that which is the greatest joy to some, is most terrible to the rest. The Goats on the left hand never apprehended so dreadful a sound, as that of the last Trump: The Sheep on the right hand never heard such music. For the dissolution of temporal things, Communis terminus, there is the same end to all. Men dealing in the world for riches, are but like scholars playing at dice for counters; which come and go; now the heap is on this side, by and by on that: on a sudden comes in the Master, and he swoopes all, both dice and counters; not without some just correction of the gamesters. So men tug, and scramble, and wrangle for these paltry vanities, wealth and honors: This Fountain dryes, that Cistern fills: one noble house withers, while another of low degree swells up to a Lord: today this Merchant hath the cash, tomorrow that: But the Lord's Day confiscates all; and then who is the richer man? This world is like a broad Table with a scant or narrow Table-cloth; which every man is still drawing to his own side, though he pluck his neighbors part from him: this Day comes with a fatal voider, and takes away all, cloth, meat, table, and guests too. Thus far together, all are served alike: but then comes the difference. All men hope well, and think themselves good: but let me tell them of this Day, as Moses did those rebellious Levites; To morrow the Lord will show, who are his, and who are holy. A common Hen, together with her own Egges, may hatch the eggs of Eagles that are laid under her: but when they are grown up, while her own brood keep the base earth, those of a higher kind fly upwards. This world breeds us all, and is both to good and bad a common mother: but when that great day of separation comes, all they that are begotten of immortal seed shall leave their mother, and take after their Father; and while their kindred in the flesh sink down under their natural corruptions, these Eagles that are sprung from above, shall mount up to the Eternal nest of Glory.

5. The irremediableness of that fatality shuts up the terror of this point. Thieves may have some mercy, in the prostration of their bootie. First, either they will not take all the goods of the house. If Grape-gatherers come unto thee, will they not leave some gleaning Grapes? If Thieves come by night, they will but destroy till they have enough. They will not, or, if they would, they cannot carry away all. Secondly, or they may be overcome with persuasions, and melted with the pitiful complaint of their undone Clients: It was the little Children's cries and tears that made Theodosius weep too, and reverse the sentence. Thirdly, or if they seize on the goods, they may spare the life: It is a rare cruelty, in this land, to cut the throats of the yielding; to second, and secure theft with blood. Fourthly, or if they spill some blood in the conflict, they will not take the rest after the conquest: Those thieves had so much pity, as though they proceeded to wound the traveler, yet they Left him but half dead. Fifthly, or if nothing but both estate and life can satisfy them, yet their rage can extend no further: all the malice of man is there determined: Death is the end of all the sufferers misery, and murderers cruelty. But the Judgment of this day is not confined to these weak limits: It will not take away some of their riches, but all; not riches only, but their lives; not lives only, but their souls: nor their souls for a time only, but forever: nor to repose them in tranquility and ease, but in the extremity of torments. Poverty, or casualty of losses is a thief; but it can only steal away thy riches temporal: and that is often no more than depriving a Girle of Chalke or Oatmeale, that is troubled with the green sickness, or disarming a mad man of the weapon, wherewith he would wound both himself and others. Infamie or disgrace is a thief; but it can only steal away an aiery title, an imaginary Crown: which makes men prouder than they should be, because they think themselves better than they are. Humility hath made many good, Promotion can only make them great. Advancement may thank God for the beginning; but if it swell into pride, the Devil is at the ending. There is no sin doth more assimilate men to that cursed nature: for all other sins the Devil made, only Pride made the Devil. Sickness is a thief; but it can only steal away health: and how many a man speeds like that Soldier with the inveterate ulcer; who receiving a hurt in the place so desperately affected, was made whole of the grief, which before could not be cured. The soul hath grown healthful by the bodies sickness, and one disease hath done more good upon them, than many Sermons. Death is a thief too, yet what can it rob a man of, but a long, tedious, and troublesome way? Thieves take away from the traveler some of his money; this thief doth but rob him of some of his journey. When a young man is bereaved of life, he is but deprived of a Die, wherewith he might either win or lose. Our life is not more uncertain, whether it will be long or short, than the use of it is, whether we will spend it well or ill. When one wished the son to prove like the father, Cato replied, is this a blessing, or a curse? When long life is appreciated to a child, it may be demanded, Whether is this a blessing or a curse? When it is said, Every man shall be rewarded according to his works, it may be doubted, whether this is a blessing, or a curse. If death takes a man from his Lands, Houses, Coyne, and helps him to a starry Throne, a robe of immortality, a glorious kingdom; he rather rights him like a friend, than robs him like a thief. All the good that may be found in death (as the cessation of trouble, the extinction of sin, the deliverance from Satan, the quiet rest of the body, and infranchisement of the soul) the good man steals from death; and so in effect, doth but rob the thief: That which is not worth his respect or keeping; as his molestations, sicknesses, sorrows; of these death robs him, and much good do it him with them.

But this day of the Lord is like a severer thief: not only robbing the wicked of all their delightful good, but lodging them with all sorrowful evil. Other thieves may be brought to a restitution: this only yields to a permutation; exchanging pains for pleasures, torment for sin; If a man take away thy russet, and give the velvet; we use to say, that change is no robbery: But if thou lose thy cordials for corrosives, thy peace and comfort for despair and punishment; surely this change is a robbery. A passenger stripped of his whole estate by thieves, may yet recover a greater fortune by the divine blessing upon his industry. But alas, the happiness which this thief steals, is irrecoverable: millions of years cannot wear it out, nor myriads of tears buy off, that everlasting loss. Consider the vastness of the Ocean, and conceive that a Sparrow were allowed, every hundred thousandth year to drink a draught of it, together with a promise to the damned, that when that little Bird had thus drunk up this great Sea, they should be released; here were some hope of an end, and some comfort from that hope, and some ease from the expectation of that comfort: But eternity cancels all, and puts out their light forever. Their worm dieth not, and the fire never goes out. It was a fearful fire that destroyed Sodom, yet it ceased with that destruction: but the fire of Tophet can never be quenched. Our bodies dy, and when the worms have devoured them, even those worms shall die too: but the worm bred in our souls is not capable of death. We are God's creatures, yet we are mortal: but there is a creature of our own which shall be immortal. We must die, but the Worm of our own conscience must never die. In our mortal life, this is but a mortal worm: the blood of Christ hath virtue enough to kill it: If now we mortify it, we shall feel it never: if it out-live us here, it will live with us forever. Let our faithful repentance, without pity, put it to death: and our blessed Redeemer will in mercy give us life.

To make some useful application of all this; If we would escape the danger of this great Thief, let us take heed of a little thief, Sin: this is the thief that does all the mischief. Could we fervently pray against sin, we need not pray against punishment; which is no other than the inseparable shadow of that body: But if we have not watched against this privy thief, Sin; in vain do we pray against the public thief, judgment: God must be just, and the wages of sin is death. This is a sly cunning thief, insinuating it self into all places, into all actions. It robbed man, in Paradise, of Paradise, of Innocence, of Peace, of Earth, of Heaven, It stole into that Garden like a thief, in the body of a Serpent: it stole into the eye of Eve, like a theefe in the shape of an apple: it stole into her mind, in the form of an ambitious advancement: it stole into the heart of Adam like a thief, involved in an uxorious indulgence: from their transgression, it stole like a thief into the loins of all their posterity, by a secret, but certain way: we have it, and can scarce tell how we got it. It is a vain quaere, How came this thief in? Let it be our study to cast him out. No bars nor barricado's can preclude his entrance: the Monk in his Cell, the Hermit in his solitude, the Anachorete mued up in a wall, cannot forbid access to this thief. The very Temple is not free from him: there he robs men of their attention, of their devotion, and transports their minds into a wilderness of vain thoughts. It steals into our best works, and robs them of their perfection and integrity; I dare not say, the action is sin, I dare say there is sin in the action. It lays snares in every material; Laqueos in cibo, in potu, in vultu, in veste. It takes all forms, that it may be filching at all times: Fit fera, fit volucris, fit toto corpore serpens. Like a Cameleon, it can turn to all colors, but white the symbol of purity: it can be anything but innocent. Like a Thief, it creeps into the ears of the wavering, and robs them of their religion: it creeps into the eyes of the wanton, and robs them of their chastity: it creeps into the mouth of the drunkard, and robs him of his wit: it creeps into the breast of the malicious, and robs him of his charity. it sits in the brain of the ignorant, puts out the light of understanding, and rifles the house at pleasure. It sits at the door of the swearer, and flies fiercely at the majesty of our Maker: This thief hath broken into the heart of the proud, of the covetous, of the profane, of the hypocrite, and there keeps possession, yea, pleads prescription: challenging the house, not as a strong usurper, but as the right owner. It cannot rob God of us, it may rob us of God.

The day of the Lord is but like a thief,] but this is a thief indeed. No wise man, at least no honest man will entertain a known thief: shall we bid him welcome, make him good cheare, lodge him in our best chamber, and think nothing too costly for him, that we know comes on purpose to rob us? Yet such is our madness, to give sin not only admission, but indulgence; to invite it home to our houses, to honor it with bankets, to allow it the command of our servants, and to let it sleep in the soft bed of our hearts: our senses receive it, our affections wait upon it, our souls make much of it, as if it were a dear friend, and no dangerous thief. This is that little thief within, that opens the door to the great thief without: this is the Devils intelligencer, his agent, his pick lock, his engine, his trusty vassal, that betrays the whole world to his invasion. The thief robs the passenger, and if he scape apprehension, he applauds himself: but the sin of that act hath been a worse thief to him, and robbed him of the peace of conscience. Sacrilege presumes to rob the Church, and therein the Lord himself; yet is so impudent as to expostulate Wherein have we robbed thee? Alas poor thieves! they do but rob us of our temporary provision: but in the mean time, sacrilege is a thief that robs them of their eternal salvation. It is just, that theft should be punished with theft, that one thief should rob another. Oppressors rob us, sin robs them, death robs sin, and the Devil robs them all.

Our blessed Savior once challenged the people, that they came out against him, as against a thief, with swords and staves. He charged his Disciples, to be so unfurnished of weapons, whereby they might do violence, as not to take with them so much as staves: And yet in another place, he allows them nothing toward their journey, but staves: As a staff is a weapon, it was forbidden, not as it is for supportation. The master was taken as a thief; the servants may not be suspected. When they crucified him, it was between two thieves; one on his right hand, and the other on his left. Still he is crucified between thieves, in his afflicted members: The Client, between the corrupt Judge and the Lawyer: the Patient, between the ignorant Physician and Apothecary; the landed debtor, between the Usurer and Scrivener: the poor Minister, between the Simoniackal Patron and sacrilegious parishioner: in all these he is crucified between two thieves. All this while they have been thieves to him: but in the last day he shall come like a thief against them; and his just fury cannot be avoided. It is a happiness, when we shall meet with this great Thief, to have our goods safe in another place. He that shall say in this sense, Omnia mea mecum porto, I have all my wealth about me, shall be stripped of all by this impartial Robber. But if Our Treasure be laid up in Heaven, if our Riches be the merits of Jesus Christ, No thief can break through, and steal it. Then Cantabit vacuus coram latrone viator, the empty traveler sings before the thief. Our wealth is at home, in the hands of Him that will never suffer it to miscarry.

Like a thief.] That natural dependence, which the most wise Creator of all things, hath made between all things: may, by way of Paradox, be called a kind of theft. The sea doth rob the land of some territories, and the land robs the sea of her waters. The Earth steals from the Heavens their influence, and Plants steal from the Earth her moisture: Among trees, one robs another; and the great Oke pines the Underwood. Flowers steal from the ground her fatness, Bees steal from the flowers their sweetness, Men steal from the Bees their honey. We are the universal thieves in this sense; for we steal from all: Our light from the Sun, our breath from the Air, our Physic from Plants and Minerals, our food from Beasts, Fowls and Fishes: we rob the Sheep of their wool, and the Wormes of their silks, to cloth us: we steal warmth from the Fire, and coolnesse from the Air or water: we rob the Vine of her vital juice, and the Olive of her iunctuous fruit. We are the thieves in all this, and yet in all this we are no thieves; because the great owner of all things hath ordained all these benefits for us. Only then we are thieves, when we rob ourselves of their comfortable use, or of our thankful obedience by their abuse. Quod Deo donante fit nostrum, hoc nobis abutentibus fit alienum. In all this our taking away from the Creatures, we are rather borrowers than thieves; yea rather owners than borrowers. By that Patent sealed by the Father, first; then renewed by the Son, and now confirmed by the Holy Ghost; we are Lord's of these things, not usurpers; not thieves, but proprietaries.

Here is then no warrant for that Theft, which is the unlawful usurpation of another man's goods: therefore unlawful, because the owner was unwilling: whether deprived of his substance without his knowledge, by fraud and close carriage: or with his privity, but against his consent: and that either his full consent, as by violence and oppression; or his consent in part, as in the exaction of covenanted interest from distressed debtors. For howsoever they be driven by necessity, into that dangerous gulf of Usury, they wish with all their hearts, that creditors would lend according to the Nature of Loane, which is a contract of mere gratuity, their money according to the nature of money, which is ordained for an instrument of exchange, incapable of such monstrous improvement. Certainly, Me nemo Magistro Fur erit — I will teach no man to be a thief; nor give the least countenance to that legal robber, the soul-robbed Usurer. My tongue shall be as far from recanting that speech of Leo; Foenus pecuniae, funus animae; as my heart is from disliking that fire, than which Agesilaus never saw clearer, when bon-fires were made of Obligations. God hath committed to the sons of men a right of use and dispensation; whereunto, for the avoiding of disorder, a general distinction of ownages, was added by the Law of Nations. Whatsoever the Lacedemonians did think of Theft; that it was an allowable exercise of martial Discipline: or others have said even of Kingdoms themselves, that they are but Magna latrocinia: whereas indeed, they are Magna Patrocinia; not Theeveries, but protections against Theeveries: Or Alciatus dreamed, that Theft was not a reproach in Nature, because it was forbidden by the Law; as if the Law, and Nature had not both one Author: Or other querulous dispositions have objected, that the Laws of men are written in blood; because in the censure of this unjust and uncharitable sin, they have exceeded the punishment of Moses Iudicials: forgetting the Multitude of offenders, which is caused not only by the fierceness of a wild Nation, but even by the wantonness of a peaceable Nation: for the latter is no less powerful than the former, to quicken our original corruptions. This we must conclude; besides our Makers express prohibition of Theft, and the severe vengeance he hath threatened against it: it is against Nature, to rejoice in the spoils one of another: And the very Law of Charity being trodden underfoot, seems in a grieving accent to demand; Si sterilitas in ignem mittitur, rapacitas quid meretur? And whether men steal in their own persons, or teach others so to do, as Anabaptists, and those elder Heretics called Apostolici: the bounds of propriety are ancient bounds, and the killing curse of that Flying book shall destroy their houses, that dare remove them. A thief at the gallows is none of the worst sights in a country.

In Conclusion, Theft can find no shelter under the shadow of this Comparison: The day of the Lord will come like a thief, and where it finds a thief, will sentence him to condemnation. Thieves? there are few or none amongst us: we will be all bound for one another's truth and honesty: But may I not say in the Prophets sense, All men are liars, so All men are thieves? The receiver, we say, is worse than the thief: therefore said one, Shew me a Sinner, and I will show thee a Thief. The Oppressor hath a theevish hand, the covetous hath a theevish eye, the slanderer hath a theevish tongue, the drunkard hath a theevish throat, the Harlot hath a theevish lip, the Idolater hath a theevish knee, the Flatterer hath a theevish gesture; every Sinner hath a theevish heart. Do not hold it impossible for you, to discover and attach a Thief in your own bosoms. Our natural corrupt Lust is a Thief within us: if we examine him strictly, we may find out his haunts, and fetches, his shifts, and devices. Believe him not, for he will lie: spare him not, for he will steal: shrieve him to the proof, for he will hardly confess: arraign him at the bar of the conscience, condemn him with a penitent sentence, punish him with an impartial execution: punish him in the body, by fasting and mortification: punish him in the soul, by repentance and contrition: punish him in the purse, by the works of charity and restitution. If we can get quit of this Thief, that sin be mortified in us; the coming of the Lord's Day (though it be like a Thief) shall not hurt us.

Lastly, there is an holy Theft, which I would commend to your practice. There be five ways to get the Kingdom of Heaven: Some innocently find it, some violently snatch it, some are compulsorily driven to it, some expensively purchase it, and others politicly steal it. First, they that light upon it unlooked for, are Infants dying soon after their Baptism. They are Candidati fidei, of the Livery of Faith: and as they live in the Wombe by the life of their natural mother: so they live in the Covenant by the Faith of their spiritual Mother, the Church. These find salvation without trouble: they labor not in the vineyard, they groan not in prayer, they are not exercised with trials, they weep not remorsefull tears, they are not charged with many duties; yet the Blood of Christ cleanseth them from all their sins. Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of Heaven: it belongs to them, and they belong to it; and there they are, before they know where they were: these find it. Secondly, they take it by violence, are such as by an utter abdication of the world, do wholly dedicate themselves to God: that, by their continual prayers and pious actions, lay siege to that glorious Kingdom; and in the fervent desire of God's service, offer up themselves a living sacrifice. Such are those Martyrs, that swim thither in the stream of their own bloods, whose souls mount up to Heaven in acceptable flames. There be three sorts of Martyrs; Re & intention, Intentione non re, re non intention: in both deed and intention, as was Saint Stephen: in intention not deed, as was Saint John: in deed not in intention, as were those Innocents: And three annual holy-days are dedicated by the Church, to the memory of these three kinds of Martyrs: all which together, in their order, immediately follow the great Feast of our Savior's Nativity. But the Pontificians have found out a fourth kind of Martyrdom: which is nec re, nec voluntate, vel intention; neither in deed nor intention: Of which supernumerary number was their Saint, Thomas Becket; whose day they celebrate next after the three former. It is strange, they take him for a Matyr, whom those days never found but for a Traitor. But the Martyrs of Christ are led by another Spirit, who puts such courage into their hearts, that like noble Champions, they break through all difficulties to the Kingdom of Heaven. Thirdly, they that are driven to it, are beholding to compulsory means: they have shipp'd themselves in a Man of war, and would prosecute their licentious mischiefs, but are beaten into the Harbour with storms. The Lord often clips our wings, lest we should straggle abroad after our boundless and transportive fancies: He stripes the body of pleasures, to clothe the soul with righteousness: and by impoverishing our temporal estate, He strengthens our state of grace. Not that we are therefore saved, because we are afflicted: but we are afflicted, as proper to them that shall be saved. Through much Tribulation we must enter into the Kingdom of God: It is not Propter, but per tribulationes. Affliction cannot work grace of it self; for sorrow can no more bring comfort, than Thorns can bear Grapes: but it is the needle that draws in the thread. There is no fault to be found with that necessity, which constraines us to be good. Bring hither the poor, the maimed, halt, and blind: yea, their own poverty shall bring them; their own blindness shall make them see the way, and their own lameness shall enable them to go. If they yet linger, there is a Mandamus of farther constraint; Compel them to come in, that my house may be filled. Affliction is to us, as the Whale was to the Prophet: we go in Fugitives, we come forth Converts: we go in Rebels, we come out Penitents: we go in Sinners, and come out Saints. Fourthly, they that purchase it, lay out all they have upon Earth, for an habitation in Heaven. Let this ground be laid firm; that only the blood of Christ is the price of salvation: and he that confides in the merit of his own works, shall sit howling without doors. Yet, though Faith alone doth save us, it must not destroy Charity: and to our good deeds, there is a reward of Mercy. There is a way, by selling all we have, to buy that incomparable Pearl, that inestimable Treasure. There is a policy, to make such Friends of our riches, as may let us into those everlasting Mansions. After, Well done good Servant, there follows, Enter thou into the joy of thy Master. How dear do men buy a small turfe of earth, and yet how cheap do they value Heaven? They will venture their souls to get a little money, they will not venture a little money to save their souls. They can oppress the poor, to make their children rich: they will not relieve the poor, to make their children blessed. But as when a miserly Dung-worm excused his oppressions, because he had eighteen children; another replied, but eighteen? Believe me, if you had eight and forty, the Country hath curses enough for them all: So let me assure the charitable Benefactor, how many children soever he hath, Heaven hath blessings enough for them all. Fifthly, and lastly, there be some that steal this glorious Kingdom: under the veil of humility, an holy dejection, and under-valuing of themselves, they lay hold on eternal life. Though the walls of that celestial City be too high to climb over, too strong for any Thief to break through, and steal: yet there is a way for this pious Thief to get in: this is neither over, nor through the walls, but through the Gates. He is fitted for entrance; the Gate is low, and he is humble: the Gate is narrow, and he is little: so little in his own eyes, that he can easily creep in, and being once in, he shall never be turned out. Such a Thief was that modest woman, wasted with an issue of blood, resolving within her self; If I may but touch his garment, I shall be whole: She stole virtue from him by a touch. Such a Thief was that penitent Sinner upon the Cross; who both lived and died a Thief: He stole their temporal goods from men, for which he died: and he stole Paradise from Christ, when He died. Paul says, Give your bodies a living sacrifice to God: but there God accepted of a dying sacrifice. Judas had served Christ three years, and played the Thief with his purse: he could steal his Lord's coin: but this man had scarce served Him three hours, yet had learned a better way of theft, and stole from Him Salvation. Jacob wrestled with God, and by an holy kind of force, robbed Him of a Blessing. And the God of comfort thus encouraged that shamefast and trembling Patient, that touched the border of his garment; Daughter, be of good cheer, thy faith hath made thee whole: since thou hast stolen virtue from me, take it, and much good do it thee with it. Other theft shall be condignely punished; but such a penitent, humble, and pious Thief (whom the world condemns for a sinner, but inward sorrow and compunction presents to God for a Saint) shall not only be mercifully pardoned, but even gloriously crowned in the Day of Jesus Christ.

In the night] Fur à furvo, say some; because that art requires the secrecy of darkness. Vt jugulent homines, surgunt de nocte Latrones. Night is the season for Thieves and Harlots: The Adulterer waits for the twy-light, saying, no eye shall see me. If the night should speak all it knows, it would put millions to the blush, in the day. Thieves in the dark dignity through houses, which they had marked for themselves in the day. The night pays the Devil no less custom than the day. Why else are sins called Opera tenebrarum, The works of darkness? Caste, si non caute, was a Rule to save their Credits, though not their Conscience. Noctem peccatis, & fraudibus obijce nubem. There be indeed some sins peculiar to the day, because they are done only to be seen, and if they might not be seen, would not be done. But commonly Evil doers love the darkness, and desire to sin out of sight. The whore loves the black and dark night: Nox, & amor, vinumque nihil moderabile suadent: Illa pudore vacat, liber amorque metu. It is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret. Darkness causeth boldness, and Secrecie is the mother of Security: They think Impune fit, quod fit in abdito. Therefore it is proverbially spoken, Nox commoda sceleribus: iniquity is beholding to the night, and the Devil is a great noctivagant. The foulest fact of the world, Judas his treason, was a night-piece.

Of all, the Thief longs for the night: then he hopes that sleep hath shut the eyes, and locked up the senses of the whole family. So the last judgment shall break in upon men, when they are possessed with a Lethargy, and drowzie negligence; not minding, not dreaming of this sudden Audit. But why doth this sentence begin with, The day of the Lord; and subjoin, Like a Thief in the night: Day, and Night are opposites: if it be the Lord's Day, how should it come in the night? If it come in the Night, why is it called the Day? Or shall we say, it is Quiddam tertium; a thing mixed, between both, partaking of both, or compounded of both? As in Diluculis & Crepusculis, there is a Twy-light: The dawning of the Day in the Morning, and the shutting in of the Day in the Evening make day and night so much one, as sometimes you cannot tell which to call them. It is so much Day, that we cannot call it night; and so much night, that we cannot call it day. It is true, that Light hath no communion with darkness: Lux & tenebrae, midnight and noon never met, never joined. In the regenerate man there is both flesh and Spirit: the spirit is not the flesh, the flesh is not the spirit: and yet both are in the same man. There is darkness in his understanding, and in his understanding there is light also: There is corruption in his affections, and yet in his affections there is holiness too. As in a vessel of lukewarm water, there is both heat and cold together: We cannot say, This part of the liquor is hot, and that other cold: but cold and heat is confused throughout the whole vessel. In the twy-light, we cannot say, This part of the air is light, and that other dark: but darkness and light is shed, spread, and mingled throughout the whole air. Shall we conjecture by such a similitude, that this Judgment shall be in the Twy-light; when the season may be called either, or neither Day or Night? Certainly, these fancies of men have so much darkness in them, as to be called Night: but no raye or streak of light, to give them a name of Day.

Some very venturously gather from hence; that Christ will come to Judgment in the Night: and they offer to prove it by many arguments: First, because the first borne in Egypt were smitten in the night. While all things were in quiet silence, and that night in the midst of her course; God's Almighty Word leap'd down from Heaven, out of his royal Throne, as a fierce man of war. This was indeed most fearful and astonishing; when God called for the blood they owed him, at so uncomfortable a season. In one night, every house hath a carcass in it; and (which was more grievous) of their first borne; and (which was yet more doleful) in an instant. No man could comfort another; everyone was too full of his own sorrow; helping rather to make the noise more lamentable. But all this is no more than the cry of an Infant, to the dismal shrieking at Christ's appearance, when all the kindreds of the earth shall mourn before him. And why doth this Plague of Egypt prove that he will come in the Night, more than the burning of Sodom makes it probable that he will come in the Day? Secondly, the opinions of the Fathers are alleged for it: Saint Chrysostom thinks it shall be in the night: Euthymius consents with him: Jerome calls it an Apostolical Tradition: and Lactantius confirms it by the Testimony of a Sibyll: Cùm venerit ill, Ignis erit, mediaque horrenda in nocte tenebrae. In the darkest night, saith he, the heavens shall be opened, and the Lord shall descend like Lightning. To say nothing of those Ecclesiastical hymns, taken out of Prudentius and Ambrose, that seem to favor it. Nor to examine the reasons of Aquinas, why he stateth this great Audit, in the twilight, betwixt day of night: they be all but dreams of a night. Thirdly, they argue, that the Passover was to be eaten at night, because the coming of the Lord was expected in the night: It is a night to be much observed unto the Lord: and This is the night of the Lord to be observed: The Jews are said to look for the Comming of their Messias, in the midst of the night: and about that time of the night, it is very probable that our blessed Savior was borne. The Angels came to the Shepherds in the night, with this joyful tidings. But what is all this to prove, that his second coming shall be in the night too? That Paschal-night, whose observation was so strictly commanded, is also called a day? This day shall be unto you for a memorial: and You shall observe this day in your generations, by an Ordinance forever. And the night of our Lord's Coming in the flesh, is not called a night by the Angels, but a day: Unto you is borne, This Day, a Savior. The acceptance of Days for times is a figure frequently used. The days are evil; what? the days only? Are not the nights evil too? Yes, but by days are meant the Times. Whether Christ will come in the day or night, we cannot tell; but we are sure, there is a time determined when he will come. Fourthly, they stick hard upon that speech, At midnight there was a cry made: concluding out of it, that at midnight the Lord shall come. But why may we not as well infer that it shall be in the day; because the Lord hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world? Nocte latent mendae; say some, How should all things be revealed in the night? But they may be answered accordingly; That night cannot want light, when heaven and earth shall make one universal bonfire. Knowledge should keep her allowed bounds: Satius est dubitare de occultis, quàm litigare de incertis. When the poor Debtor was advised by his friends to watch for his Creditors coming to town, and to entreat their favor about a composition, he answered; I will not trouble myself to seek out them, for I am sure they will find out me. But let it be our speedy diligence, to implore the Mercy of our great Creditor, not for any composition that can be made by ourselves, but to accept the satisfaction made by our Surety, his Son Christ upon the Cross: Otherwise, though we seek not after him, he will be sure to find out us; when we are neither able to put in baile, nor have one penny toward the payment. Night and day let us be prepared; and then whether thou comest day or night, welcome our dear Lord Jesus.

The Sum is this; The day of the Lord is not only uncertain for the time, but then most likely to be, when it is least expected. And to this center, the Fathers, and all fair expositors reduce their Meditations: So Theophylact, Hilary, Jerome, Bede, and Gregory expound the Metaphor. S. Augustine most plainly: He shall come in the night, Cùm valde obscurum & occultum erit, & quando non speratur. Men sleep in the night, and look neither for guests nor thieves. His appearing shall be in the night of men's ignorance, when their intellectual eyes are sealed up with the Spirit of Slumber; no more expecting his descent from Heaven, than He looks to find Faith on the earth. But let us pray that he do not find us out in such a night; when we are fallen into spiritual darkness, the Ignorance of Him, and inconsideration of ourselves. Though he permitted Darkness to be before Light in the Creation; yet in the making of Light he did so multiply that Light, as that it enlightened not the day only, but the night too. So albeit some shadows of dimness, and clouds of disconsolateness have shed themselves upon our souls; let us beseech him to afford us the Light of his holy Spirit, against which the Prince of darkness can never prevail, nor hinder his Illumination of our darkest nights, our saddest thoughts. The Visitation of the holy Ghost upon the blessed Virgin, is called an overshadowing: There was the Presence of God, the Fountain of all Light, and yet an overshadowing: Nay, except there were some Light, there could be no shadow. It is happy for us, when those shadows within us shall be overcome by God's irresistible Light: That when those shadows have done their office upon us, to let us see that of ourselves we should fall into irrecoverable darkness; the Spirit of Grace may do his Office upon those shadows, dispersing them, and establishing us in the assurance of comfort.

The lascivious wife is glad of her husbands absence, and abuseth the time in unchaste embraces, till his unexpected return surprizeth her in the bed of adultery, and turns her over to just penalty. But the constant Spouse, that hates the least violation of her Faith, (even so much as in a wish or thought) with earnest longing looks for her husbands coming, and knows no solace like to his Presence. The holy Soul, that hath kept her faith with Christ, desires this Day, waits for it, and at last entertains it, and is entertained with it, in a sweet and blessed Peace. But the straggling adulteress, that hath preferred her pleasure before her Piety, and flatters her self with the remoteness of her Lord's Comming, shall be taken in the Night of her carelesnesse, in the Act of her wantonness, and perish without hope of Reconciliation. This day, like a Thief in the Night, shall break through into her house: She hath barred the doors, and fortified her house against his entrance, out of a conscious fear, and unwillingness to see him: therefore there is no remedy, her house must be broken through, and that unfaithful soul be plucked out by force. But the other looks for the messenger, listens to the first knock: there is no need to break open her house, for she readily opens the door, and yields up her self in joyful peace to the arms of her lord and husband Yea, she longs for a dissolution, prays for the Consummation, and cries for the hastening of his Kingdom. Behold, I come quickly. Amen. Even so, Come Lord Jesus.

In the which the Heavens shall pass away with a great noise.] Concerning the manner and extent of the worlds dissolution, there is a world of question: the School is full of perplexities, that tend more to the distraction, than satisfaction of their Readers. They do indeed but throw a stone into the Well, and leave us to take it out. They lay such toiles and nets for him, that hunts after the Truth in their Forest, that soon he is entangled; and being once in, let him get out as well as he can. Three circumstances are considerable in this first passage. First, the matter alterable; The Heavens. Secondly, the measure of their alteration; Shall pass away. Thirdly, the manner of this transition; with a great noise.

1 The Heavens.] Some extend it to all the Heavens, even to that highest, which is the glorious Court of God himself: but Saint Paul saith, we have an house not made with hands, Eternal in the Heavens: that which is Eternal, cannot be destructible. Others abridge the latitude of this combustion, and understand by the Heavens the lower part of the Air; confining this fiery deluge to the same limits with the former watery: But if the inferior Air were the boundaries of it, why are the Elements afterwards, Namely, expressed? The Air is an element. Others affirm, that they shall perish according to their very substance; as if there should be no more Heavens: but this crosseth the Scriptures, which speak of a new Heaven and Earth; and of them, not as Noua, but Novata: not newly created, but purgingly renewed. This then is our safest conclusion; that this purgation by fire, shall reach as far, as did the corruption of sin, and no further. The corruption of the Heavens shall vanish, the matter of the Heavens shall not perish. To inquire further, may be dangerous, it cannot be profitable. God's Power appeared in the creation of the World, his Wisdom in the government and disposition of it, his indignation in the Flood that drowned it, his Mercy in saving those eight that replenished it, his Grace in the mission of his Son that redeemed it, and his Justice will appear in the re-sending of that Son to judge it. The Heavens declare the Glory of God: things or persons may teach two ways: either materially or occasionally; so the insensible creatures teach man: or morally and vocally, by doctrine and example; as we ought to teach one another. The Heavens can teach us to look unto our own preparation; they cannot teach us the time or manner of their own dissolution.

2 Shall pass away.] There be two errors about this transition of the Heavens. First, of some Theological Philosophers, who attribute to the Heavens an incorruptible nature: From which figment being beaten by the Truth, they labor to evade by distinction; that though the Heavens are in their own nature capable of corruption, yet they may be Intrinsece incorruptibiles, because they can never be corrupted. Secondly, the other sort hold them so corruptible, that they shall be utterly abolished. That the Heavenly bodies are maintained by vapors, was but the dream of some Poets and Philosophers: for certainly, if the Sun, Moon and Stars were only nourished by waters and vapors, they would long ere this, have bidden the world good night. Our Savior foretold us, that the Powers of Heaven shall be shaken: Lactantius thinks these powers of Heaven to be the Angels, who shall then change the order of their motions: They are indeed spiritual and separated substances, quae non habent molem, sed virtutem; not united to any matter, as the souls of men to their bodies; and so are Powers or Virtues: but how those Powers shall then be shaken, seems a forced collection. Chrysostom speaks peremptorily of such a shaking, as shall be an utter abolition; which he calls omnimodam perditionem. Of the same opinion were diverse of the Greek fathers; Theodoret, Theophylact, Oecumenius; grounding it upon the mis-interpretation of this and the like places. They shall perish, but Thou shalt endure: whereas the Prophet there expounds his meaning of a permutation, not annihilation of the Heavens: As a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed. So saint Paul, the fashion of this world passeth away: Figura non Natura. We conclude therefore with saint Gregory, that the Heavens shall pass away, and they shall not pass away: Ea quam habent imago, tergetur: Ea quam habent natura, servabitur: The substance shall not be destroyed, only the quality shall be changed. As we weed our Gardens, to succor the Plants, and do not root up the Plants, because of the weeds. Or as we sweep our houses from the dust and rubbish, and do not for the rubbish sake pull down the house: Or as the Lapidary cuts a Pretious stone, or polisheth a Jewel, and does not for the roughness or fowlenesse cast them away. So the Lord will purge this great Fabric of nature, and not for a little corruption destroy so goodly a Creature.

3 With a great noise.] After the manner of a Storm or Tempest, cum stridore & sibilo, with a whistling or crashing sound, such as a flight of Fowls make through the wind with their rustling feathers. Some think that the celestial Orbes shall be put to a swifter and more violent motion; whereby the world shall be set on fire: and out of that concussion, this terrible noise shall arise. Fire and Water cannot meet without a hissing contestation: the Air repelled, breaks not forth in silence; especially restrained fire hath a dreadful eruption; as the report of Ordnance, or Thunder from the Clouds. What with the rapture of the superior bodies, and the confused combat of the Elements, who can conceive the fearfulness of this noise? The Law was given with a great noise, Thunders, Trumpets and Voices: the Thunder was very loud, the Trumpet far louder, but the Voice of God drowned all. If such were the noise at the Law-giving, what shall there be at the Law-requiring? All things will appear strange at that day: Such a Judge, such a Session was never seen: such a noise, such a Sentence was never heard: such an evidence, such a horror was never conceived. The sound of the Archangels Trump is a noise, that shall waken all the World: The crackling of this great frame in the fire is a noise that shall astonish all the World: the voice of the Judge is a noise that shall confound part of the World: and the shriekes of the condemned is a noise that shall continue with them in the World to come. The first noise sounds out a Surgite, Rise from your Graves: The second sounds a Sistite, Stand to your trial: The next sounds a Discedite, Depart ye cursed: and the last sounds forth an Vlulate, Howle forever in the state of the damned. The rising of a Tempest makes the Passengers afraid: It more amazeth them when the waves beat into the Vessel: but when they begin to sink, what a dismal cry is heard among them? Insequitur clamorque virum, stridorque rudentum. The Summons will be a fearful noise, the Sentence more fearful, but most lamentable will be the shriekes of reprobates in their endless sufferings. If we hear but the cries of a City upon the sudden invasion of an unlook'd for enemy; or but the clamour of a Family that cannot get out, when the house is burning about their ears: or had we heard the cry of the Infants in Hinnom, which they contended to drown with their loudest instruments: there had been some shadow of that prodigious noise, which shall be produced by this universal conflagration. It hath been said, that Deafnesse is a blessing, when a man can hear no noise but cursing: but they are happy, that can hear this noise without terror, and escape from it without danger: and such happiness belongs to all that are in Christ.

1 To make some use of this point: Seeing the Heavens shall not lose their being, but only suffer a purgation, and must be changed in figure, without perdition of their nature: and in like manner, man hath an everlasting perpetuity assigned unto him, after his temporary transmigration: he cannot cease to be, he may cease to be happy: Let us all labor to be cleansed in time, lest we remain uncleansed, when time shall be no more. The Heavens must undergo a purging for the sin of man, and shall not man endeavor his own purging for the happiness of Heaven? The way to escape the horror of that purging fire, is for the present to purge ourselves in water. There be two Fountaines, wherein we may wash and be clean. The former is a living Spring, and in many respects, a strange kind of Fountain. It issues indeed from the side of a Rock, but that Rock is immaculate flesh. What is more hard and dry than a Rock? what more moist and supple than water? yet he that once did fetch water out of a stone, to convince and shame the infidelity of the Jews: doth still bring it forth of a Rock, to refresh our believing Souls. The Clouds and Springs are wont to afford water, but it comes not usually from the Rocks. Other Fountaines may cool and cleanse the body, but they cannot make it immortal: this Spiritual drink comes out of the Well of Life, and causeth the receiver to live forever. The Leprosy is not got off with other waters, this Cleanseth us from all sin. That which proceeds from other Fountaines, is white: this is red as blood; even blood it self, and the purest blood that ever ran from veins: that sanguine Laver, wherein if Faith can get us a larder, we are cleansed forever. This is the only Purgatory of our Souls, and without this there is no possibility of being clean. The blood of a man runs in his veins; in the blood of those veins are the spirits, and in those spirits a kindly and active fire, which by consuming the redundant and superfluous humors of the body, purgeth it from contracted annoyances. Christ is the Man of men, the God of men; and the blood that ran from his sacred veins upon the Cross, was full of so infinite a Spirit, that it concocts and overcomes all the diseases of his body, the Church; and cures the infirmities of all our Souls. Lower Fountains may be locked up, or dried up: but this Spring runs freely, fully, continually, to the end of the world. No man's coming is debarred, no man that comes, departs uncleansed. They that are purged in this Bath of acceptable satisfaction, shall neither fear the Judicial fire of the last Audit, nor the penal fire of everlasting torment. But every day we gather new stains; for the mundation whereof, there is another Fountain provided, within us, as the other was without us; Repentance. This pumpes tears out of our eyes, derived from the Well of contrition in our hearts. Not that this water can cleanse us by its own virtue; for the Spring it self must be fed and sanctified by the former; and is indeed rather a Cistern, than a Fountain. But it is a secondary and instrumental means of our cleansing, a consequent and inseparable sign of our being cleansed by the blood of Jesus. And without this; the burning of the Heavens shall but tend to their restitution; but the same fire to impenitent sinners, shall begin their everlasting torments. This great world was first purged with water, and is again to be purged with fire: so the little world, Man, is first washed in the Laver of regeneration, the Sacramental water: and after this Baptismum aquae, there is Baptismus ignis, a fiery trial: and many are saved, but as it werethrough the fire: as by fire the Heavens shall be renewed. The best gold may gather some rust, and the purest garment catch a spot: and the holiest Soul on Earth, needs cleansing. We are a candle set in the wind; blown out with every temptation: a curious instrument, that will out of tune with the very change of the weather: a fine glass, that is not only broken with a knock, but stained with a breath. If we be not always supplying our Lamp with the oil of meditation, and setting our instrument in tune by prayer, and scouring off our blemishes by repentance; decay and ruin will encroach upon us. There was a delicate person, self-enamour'd, and too indulgent to his body, especially in the frequency of bathing: A true friend reproving him for many things, urged that in particular; Why do you bathe twice a day? whereto he deridingly answered, Because I cannot conveniently bathe thrice? Seriously we may invert the question: Why do we not bathe oftener? Why do we not wash our consciences twice, thrice, many times, every day in our penitent tears? Seneca tells us of a Roman, that kept his soul as clean, as the best Huswife keeps her house; every night sweeping out the dust, and washing all the vessels: Examining his own soul, Quod malum body sanasti? qua parte meliores? What infirmity hast thou healed? What falt hast thou done, and not repented. In what degree art thou bettered? Then would he lie down with O quàm gratus somnus, quàm tranquillus! With how welcome sleep and quiet rest, may we entertain the night! The burning of the Heavens shall not affright us, because he that sets them on fire, hath promised to save us.

2. This makes against all ambition of worldly dignities: the Heavens are the purest and most glorious pieces of nature; if they must be dissolved, What shall become of temporal honors? The stateliest Pyramid that ever was like. to the memory of a man, reached not up so high as the Heavens; yea, it is likely that the Tower of Babel transcended them all: yet Babel is fallen, and the Heavens themselves shall not stand. Of good Honor the Pyramid may be a fit emblem: for it is broad and large in the foundation, upon earth: but still as it riseth up toward Heaven, it lessens, and shows it self the narrower: desiring in all the greatness of man, to seem little in the eyes of God: as Moses was a great Prince, yet there was not a meeker man. Paul's honor was great to be wrapped up into the third Heaven; yet but Novi hominem: John was the beloved Disciple; yet but Quem dilexit: God gave them noble privileges, and yet they in modesty conceal their own names. Dignity comes two ways; either by Desert, or by Descent; by good worth, or great blood. But when it is stated upon the the unworthy, it is a Noli me tangere? Friend sit up higher: but when he is advanced like a friend, if he be found none, he shall soon be pulled down again. God gives honor In utilitatem, and In humilitatem: first, for the public good, and then for our private; that it may make others better, but not ourselves worse. But Ambition is the worm of greatness: the Bramble desires to be King; the Thistle to match with the Cedar: the Eagle to set her nest among the stars: the Spider to build in kings palaces. Haman will never leave lifting up his head, till it be lifted a story higher than he would have had it. Ambition, the eldest son of Pride, mounts up with his gaudy wings, as if he would bandy colors with the Sun. The ground he thinks beholding to him, for vouchsafing to bless it with one touch of his foot; and extremely honored, if he grace it with one humble look. Fame is his Goddess, and all her servants are his Trumpeters. He that crosseth him in his rising, and prevails not; shall be crushed by him, when he is risen. He hath so many corrosives, as he hath superiors: and cares not how much he gives the Devil, to rid him but of one rivall. He could wish his frowns were lightning, and his words thunder. Poor, men he, looks should part with all their goods, to have him but take knowledge of them. Vain man, Whither wouldst thou raise thyself? Could thy blown up honor reach the clouds; this last Fire shall consume both it and them. How careful are men for the prolongation of their memories? What stately monuments are erected by their posterities? Marble pillars, and brazen sculptures, report to succeeding ages, their names and acts. And above all, the Poet undertakes to give life to their virtues, in never dying Verses: with Non norunt haec monumenta mori: And Nec Iovis ira, nec ignis, Non ferrum poterit, nec edax abolere vetustas: neither time nor fire shall consume them. Yet in this fire they cannot escape: the Brasse will melt, the stones consume, pillars, pyramids, monuments, all shall flame; poems, orations, books shall perish: and of all secular glory there is an utter annihilation. Then, which is the Signior, and which the Servitor? Where is the difference between the Potentate, and the Pesant? What Coat, What Crest can discern the Gentleman from the Mechanicke? Or the Prince from his Page? Or the Lord from the Lacquay? What privilege shall the flourishing proud house of Austria have over the now deposed kings of India? Who can distinguish the slave that labored in the Minerall, from that worse slave which adored the metal? Why may not the Tenant prove as rich a man, as his domineering Landlord? There is only one Heraldry, that makes the difference of men, and that is the Grace of God. This makes us of the Blood royal, Partakers of the divine Nature, Heirs of the Kingdom, bearing the Arms of Jesus Christ.

Then, farewell all honor, but what comes by adoption: but who can allow the glory of this world so long a continuance? As the names of good men outlive their bodies, so too often great men out-live their good names. A good name lives after death; Defunctus voluto viva per or a virum: but the name of the wicked is rotten, before his carcase is cold. Ye shall die like men, and fall like one of the Princes. Not only like Men, mortal: but like Princes, remarkable. The fall of a Prince fills the world with present horror, and leaves it full of ominous discourse for the future. Herod's glory lasted not long; it sate as proudly on his soul, as his royal clothes did on his back: but he that would be numbered among the gods, is suddenly devoured of worms. Those worms were both Lictores, and Lectores; Executioners to punish Herod, and instructors to teach us the damnable danger of vain glory. The Heavens are high and glorious, yet they are not proud; but rather full of humble benevolence, blessing the Earth with their light, beat, moisture, influence: Man is a piece of creeping Earth, and yet he hath lofty and aspiring thoughts. O that humility should descend to the earth, while pride exalts it self up to Heaven, and that the voice of a creature should dare say, I will lift up my throne, above the stars of God: but the Lord hath vowed to give Pride a fall.

3 Seeing the Heavens are doomed to a Transition, let us lay up our treasure in a place that can never pass away. But first let us be sure, that we have a treasure worth laying up. No man esteems his Brasse and Pewter for a treasure; base and abject metals are no treasure: we may buy Raddish or Lettuce with a farthing token: a Horse, or a House, or a scarlet Cloke cannot be so purchased. If we have a treasure that is not good, we had as good have no treasure. The Dog would not change his bone for all the wealth of a kingdom; and the worldling will not part with his wealth, for the Kingdom of Heaven. When a child comes into his fathers study, he will rather choose a painted paper, than the best book of his Library. Among all the riches of God, none pleaseth the covetous so well as a little of the better-color'd earth. If this could be a Treasure, yet it is laid up in the earth, and shall perish with the earth. There be some that lay up a worse treasure; even a multiplied hoard of sins: which is, as if a man should take his dung out of his stable, and curiously store it up in his Parlor. They treasure up unto themselves wrath, against the day of wrath: as if they did pile up plagues, and curses, and torments, to be spent upon themselves. The former do but treasure up Snow, which will melt, and flow away. But these treasure up fire, that will never be quenched. God layeth up the deep as in a treasury: but these lay up treasure in the deep. The former is a vain treasure, and laid up in earth: the other is a cursed treasure, and laid up in hell: but that is a blessed treasure, which is laid up in Heaven. Life is brittle, wealth is fickle, honor a bubble, favor a riddle, and the smiles of fortune like the kisses of a whore, which flatter a man to his destruction. The Pontificians promise to enrich their Clients out of the Churches Treasury; the superfluous merits of the Saints; whereof the Pope is the great Lord-Treasurer: but this treasure lies in some enchanted Castle, in the Faery land; no man could ever find it. In the mean time, they picked the people's purses of their material treasure, for the hope of this imaginary supererogatory exchange. Christ doth not forbid all treasuring up in the earth; for Parents may lay up for their children: For your children; that is an allowed providence: but not for yourselves; that were a gross mis-confidence. The Divine Precepts are full of sweetness, and do not take away our affections, but rectify them. When the Disciples rejoiced, that in Christ's Name they had cast out devils, he does not forbid them utterly to rejoice: for it were uncomfortable to leave the soul without some liberty of rejoicing: but he directs their joy: Rather rejoice, that your Names are written in Heaven. To have power over devils, is not so much as to be adopted Saints. It is happy for subjects, when they can subdue their kings enemies: but it is happier to be made his heirs. So in that other passion of fear: when he says, Fear not them which can kill the body, he does not preclude all access of natural fear: but disposeth that fear towards another object, and teacheth an awful dread of him, that can destroy both body and soul in hell. S. Paul does not take from the mind of men all desire of Glory, but instructs them to do it without sin; Let him that glorieth glory in the Lord. Christ, knowing our covetous dispositions, that we will needs be hoarding, doth not forbid us all manner of laying up, but gives us counsel, both for the choice of our treasure, and for the place where we shall lay it up.

Our Treasure must be good and precious. Good works are such a Treasure, fit for the reconditory of Heaven. Ostentation and hypocrisy are base money: If you give to my poor members, faith our glorious Head, and not Nomine meo, you shall miss of your reward. No wise man exposeth his Treasure to public view, but lays it up in secret. Depraedari desiderat, qui thesaurum publice portat. Hezekiah ran into an offensive weakness, when he shown his munition and treasure to the men of Babylon: for the men of Babylon did carry away both his treasure and munition. Why should we tempt an enemy with a glorious bootie? He is a foolish traveler, that will show his gold to a thief. The affectation of the praises of men, is a thief that will steal away the credit of our good works with God. Give thine Alms in secret, if thou desirest an open reward. Vnusquisque apud se reponat; Let everyone lay in store by himself: The left hand must not be made acquainted with the good deeds of the right. Two things belong to a good work; Reward and Glory: the Reward God gives to men: the Glory he keeps to himself. If we rob him of the Glory, he will rob us of the Reward. The Grace of God is the Fountain from whence they must all be derived, and the Glory of God is the end to which they must all be directed. To all thy gifts add this, that thou give the Glory to God. The praise of men will follow, but let it not be followed: lest to gain the shadow, we lose the substance. The hands of Christ are like gold rings; whatsoever we deposit in them, is safe forever. Many men have impoverished themselves of wealth and wit, to find out the Philosophers stone; in a vain hope to turn their base metals into gold. Only the hand of Christ hath this virtue, to turn all our dross into gold; our charitable contribution of things contemptible, into the precious Pearls and Jewels of Eternal Glory. Charity gives a cup of water, and receives a vessel of wine. Every penny that it leaves in the hand of Christ, it finds multiplied to a thousand pound. Hypocritical alms is but gilded brass, mere slip-coin; which will be nailed to the post of derision, and pronounced base in the day of examination. In vain shall he give his goods to men, that hath not first given himself to God. This was the Apostles commendation of his Macedonians, that First they did give their own selves to the Lord, and then did Minister to the Saints. Charity begins at home; be sure to do thyself good: but it ends not at home; Do good to all men. S. Paul doth often call Beneficence by the name of Grace; because it is then acceptable to God, when it is done by gracious men. Of all our works let our estimation be after the shekel of the Sanctuary. The treasure and the treasury should be fitted together: we do not cast our Jewels into the dust-basket, nor put rubbish into our Cabinet. Heaven is a holy place, and will not admit of a counterfeit treasure. Faith is a Jewel on earth, and will prove the beatifical vision in Heaven. Patience is a Jewel below, and will prove a Crown above. Charity is a Jewel here, and will become a Kingdom hereafter. If a man had a Jewel that would buy a Kingdom, how precious would he esteem it? This treasure is laid up in those Heavens that shall never perish: and they shall never perish that have it.

The Elements shall melt with fervent heat.] It is a received Principle, that there be four Elements; Fire, Air, Water, and Earth. The Earth hath the lowest place in Nature, Water next, the Air above the Water, and the Fire above the Air. These be the four Principles, whereof bodies are composed. If by the heavens we understand the air, before; and the earth is expressly specified after; both which are Elements: why doth he mention the Elements, between them both? Is not this a superfluous circumstance? No, for neither were the Fire, or Water spoken of: which being left out, some would suppose them exempted from this universal dissolution. Besides; this showeth the subtle and supernatural force of this last fire, which shall melt the very Elements themselves; and work upon that which in its own Nature is not exustible. Not that these things shall be abolished, but purged. For seeing that heaven and earth shall remain, it is not convenient that the air should be consumed, which fills up the void space between them. The mutable state of the world admitted no vacuity, much less the state of perfection. And for the Element of fire; it is of the same nature with that Instrument, whereby God will purge all things. The Water is doubted of by some; because the Vision of S. John says, There was no more sea. But he speaks there by way of figure, concerning a metaphorical sea: or if you take it literally, yet a total destruction of the sea cannot be gathered from the sense of the words. The first heaven, and the first earth were passed away; not but that there remained still a heaven and earth, but quite changed from their first figure: so there is still a sea, but altered from what it was: no more shall it be troubled with storms and tempests; no more shall it swell and rage with foaming surges: no more shall the furious winds cause an agitation of her angry billows. A Saint hath the same affections that he had while he was a sinner; but renewed, and otherwise disposed: provocations cannot stir up his choler; nor troubles work him to impatience. The Sum is this; These Elements shall suffer an accidental mutation, not a final annihilation: they shall remain Quae erant, not Qualia erant.

The Lord himself tells us, that his Comming shall be in the Clouds: and his holy Servant hath assured us, That we shall be caught up in the Clouds, to meet the Lord in the air. Howsoever some think, that afterward there shall be no more Clouds; because they serve but to water the earth, and there is then no further use of their ministry: yet it is plain, that we could not meet the Lord in the air, if the air were vanished. Most Interpreters think, and not improbably, that this great Assizes shall be kept in the air: but in what part of the air is an unsearchable secret. When the Disciples inquired of the place, Where, Lord? he did not shake them off as utterly unresolved; for he gave them to understand, that in the Clouds he would come. But the Mystery which he refuseth to break unto them, is that particular part of the Air, wherein he will make his Appearance. Yet there be some presumptuous Wizards, who (as if they had crept into the Counsel-Chamber of God, and over-heard his secrets) bear the world in hand, that they distinctly know the place: and can appoint the settling of his Throne over the Valley of Jehoshaphat, near Jerusalem, at the foot of the hill: from thence he was taken up into heaven, and thither he shall come down from heaven to judge the earth.

This Counselor is silent, and yet dust and ashes dares speak. Indeed the Lord hath threatened to summon all Nations into The Valley of Jehoshaphat, and to plead with them there. But why should this be understood of a material valley, and not mystically, or metaphorically by way of allusion: because the Judgment at last to be pronounced, shall resemble the Judgment that was there executed, to the ruin of those reprobates, the incestuous generation of Lot, the Moabites and Ammonites? What is Jehoshaphat, if you interpret it, but the Judgment of the Lord? And what is the valley, but the depth of that Judgment? Into the which every heart of man shall be brought, but the manner of it cannot be brought into the heart of man. Two ways is this last judgment alluded to the Valley of Jehoshaphat. One was the fresh memory of that famous deliverance, which the Lord had there wrought for his people. Another, the near resemblance between that particular, and this general Judgment. Three great armies confederate against Jehoshaphat, and his Judah: The Moabites, Ammonites, and Inhabitants of Mount Seir: God sets them together by the ears; Moab and Ammon kill up the men of Seir, and then fall upon one another, and cut their own throats. The Lord was not long about it, then: and such a quick dispatch of his enemies will he make now. All those potent adversaries came against Judah, but they could not prevail: So though the Moabitish Flesh, and the Ammonitish world, and the savage fiend of Seir, the devil, conspire against God's Elect: yet all the shame and ruin shall return upon their own heads: and they shall be tormented with their own Consciences, as those complices fell by their own swords. And as the same place was a Valley of Judgment to them, which to the Jews was a Valley of Blessing: so this last Day is a Day of sorrow to sinners, when they shall be sent away with a Go ye cursed: but a Day of joy to the righteous, whose sweet invitation begins with a Come ye blessed.

The Elements may consenescere, but they shall not evanescere: they shall be melted, not destroyed. When we melt Silver or Gold, we intend not the rejecting, but the refining of it: we make it purer and better, we do not make it nothing. Man consists of the four Elements: his Breath is Air, his Blood and spirits Fire, his radical Moisture Water, his Body Earth. Our blessed Savior, by divers acts, did sanctify them all. By his Breathing, He perfumed the Air: by his mission of the holy Ghost in fiery Tongues, He hallowed the Fire: by undergoing his own institution of Baptism, He purified the Water: and lastly, by shedding his precious Blood upon the ground, and reposing his blessed Body in the ground, He sanctified the Earth. All these were cursed by our sins, and are restored by his Grace and Merits. Let us not think, that those Elements, upon which He bestowed so much honor, shall perish forever. Some have curiously observed, that as the times of many passages of Christ, were much about the Sixes: He came in the Sixt Age of the world, He was conceived in the Sixt Moneth, He was transfigured the Sixt day, He was crucified the Sixt Houre: and ascended the Sixt Weeke after his Resurrection. So his Place and Position was usually in the midst, between others. By his eternal place in holy Trinity, He is the second Person, in the midst between the Father and the holy Ghost: He took flesh in Judea, which is the midst of the earth: He wrought salvation in medio terrae, in the midst of the earth: At his birth He was placed in the Stable, as it is delivered to us, in the midst between the Ox and the Ass: In the Temple they found Him sitting in medio Doctorum, in the midst of the Doctors. At his Crucifying, his place was in the midst, between two Male-actors: After his Resurrection, He stood in medio Discipulorum, in the midst of his Disciples: After his Ascension, He appeared to John, in the midst of the golden Candlesticks: And wheresoever we are gathered together in his Name, He will be in the midst of us. His next Comming as a Bridegroom, will be medi â noctê, in the midst of the night: And his Appearing is likely to be in medio coeli, in the midst of Heaven, for we shall meet Him in the Air. Still Christus reperitur in medio: the Philosopher would have a Fountain in the midst of a City; as the heart is in the midst of the body; and Christ should be in the midst of the heart: virtue keeps in the midst; and the safest way is in the midst, between both extremes: So Christ is in deed a Mediator, in the midst, between God and man. This is the virtue to which we adhere, and this is the way by which we must go: Let compounded bodies be reduced to their first Elements, and let the Elements themselves be molten; if Christ erect his Throne of Grace in the midst of our hearts, we shall stand with comfort before his Throne of glory in the midst of the Heavens.

We have here offered unto us, a figure of our own mortality: we are composed of the Elements: and if the Elements themselves shall melt with fervent heat, which are of so strong and valid a constitution; what shall become of our frail and infirm bodies, weakened with so much corruption? As this aestuant heat is to the world; so is a fever to man: it does not only melt him like snow, but even consume us to ashes. We study the art of health, and deliberate upon the choice of our diet, air, exercise: yet all our diligence, all our curiosity cannot prevent a sickness: it summons us, seizes us, possesses us, and destroys us in an instant. Our care to preserve health, is a tedious and regular work: but a disease keeps no method: when we have been long in hewing and polishing every stone, that goes to this building; a Cannon batters all in a minute; and levels it with the ground. Man is a little world, an abridgement of the great: and they correspond not only in their parts, but in their productions and alterations. The world brings forth monsters, compiled and complicated of divers parents: and do not our bodies bring forth strange diseases, of divers causes, and divers kinds: for which we are so far from being provided of remedies, that we are scarce able to give them names? The world hath not so many noxious creatures, as we have venomous and infectious diseases, feeding and consuming diseases, intricate and entangled diseases, made up of several ones. Such is our miserable abundance, such our beggarly riches. For the worlds earth-quakes, man hath his sudden shakings; for those lightnings, sudden flashes; for those thunders, sudden noises; for those eclipses, sudden obfuscations and darkening of his senses; for those blazing stars, sudden firy exhalations; for those rivers of blood, sudden red waters. Is this the honor which man hath by being a little world; that he hath enough in himself, to destroy and execute himself? To breed a sickness, to assist the sickness, yea, even to antidate the sickness, and to make it more irremediable by sad apprehensions? As fire is made more vehement by sprinkling water upon the coals: so we wrap up a hot Fever in cold melancholy: and, lest the Fever should not destroy fast enough without this contribution, we help to perfect the work of our destruction, by joining the artificial sickness of our own melancholy, to our natural, our unnatural Fever. We are not only incident to sickness, but to the worst of sicknesses, continual fear of it. And when this Fever comes, it melts us, it scatters us, it pours us out like water; so instantly, that it scarce leaves an answer for that question; How long were they sick? yet our comfort is, that as the elements, though they be molten, are not taken from their being, but rather purged and restored to a better being: So our bodies made up of those elements, though death take them in pieces, break them to clods, searce them to ashes, and examine every dust; do but suffer a cleansing; and there is such a quickening virtue in the divine Head of those scattered members, that it shall recollect those ashes, give life to that dust, redintegrate those bodies, and make them shine brighter than the Sun and Stars in their clearest glory. When a rich garment, that is capable of washing, grows foul, we are content to rip it in pieces, to cut every stitch; and having thus sundered it, we scour it in some convenient lardars: and having so done, we make it up again, and think not scorn to wear it on high days: Mans body is like a watch, consisting of many wheels: his Heart is the principal wheel, his Brain another, his Liver a third: while these move rightly, that is, work kindly, all the inferior wheels keep their due courses: the eyes roll, the hands operate, the feet walk, the joints stir, all execute their several functions. Every day this watch is wound up, and kept in reparation, by meat, drink, sleep, and exercise. Often it gathers dust, and grows foul, and the hand of Physic is employed to cleanse it. The string that unites these motions, and holds them in dependence, is the spirits. At last the string waxeth old, and breaks; and then all falls to pieces: this Body drops asunder, and here lies a pin, there a wheel; here one bone, there another. Yet after all this woeful dissolution, that exquisite workman which at first made it, will re-unite it, repolish it, put a new immortal Spring into it, and lay it up as a choice Organ of his Praise, in his own glorious Kingdom.

And the earth, with the works that are therein, shall be burnt up.] The Earth is the worlds Center; and so extremely violent shall the last fire be, as to reach from the roof to the very Center. When a house is burnt down, yet the floor remains: in the destruction of Sodom, though the ground was cursed with a future barrenness, yet it was not reduced to nothing. This fire shall extend to the floor and pavement of that mighty Fabric; to the permutation, not to the annihilation of it. The superficies of it shall be purged; and so deep as the corruption of sin entered, shall this flame reach. Indeed the works that are on the Earth shall suffer more, even to a corruption, to a correption of them. The Earth shall be burnt; not as we burn bricks, by exsiccation, condensing, and hardening of the Clay: nor as we burn Wood or Coals, by consuming them to Cinders and Ashes: but like metal in a Fornace, or gold in the crucible, which by separation of the dross, is brought to perfect pureness. The Earth abideth forever, what it was, and where it was, but not such as it was: an Element, but not a sordid, and sin-corrupted Element.

Two things the Romists have reserved from this universal conflagration: one part of the Earth, and one work in the Earth. First, some of them, with Moses Barcepha; contend for the reparation and remansion of the terrestrial Paradise: whereof although they can show no necessary use, but admit a vacuity into it: yet they think it no more absurd, than that the places of the lost Angels are not yet supplied in Heaven; or that diverse parts of the Earth are now without inhabitants. But Pererius and Abulensis are against this opinion, and affirm that it shall perish in the last, if it did not in the former Inundation. Some have imagined a Paradise about the Moon, to deliver it from the water: others would have it still upon the Earth, and yet scape the fire. But as while the Philosophers disputed about the Summum Bonum; some stating it in this thing, and others in that; one seeking it here, and another there, and all looking for it where it was not: only believers, by the Light of Grace, found it where it was; even in Jesus Christ. So what Paradise soever they strive for, or wheresoever they conceit it to be; let us seek it where it is; even in the Kingdom of Heaven. Secondly, some exempt the material Cross of Christ from the power of this Exustion. This privilege, (howsoever they would father it upon the Fathers, misunderstood; as Ephrem, Cyril, Chrysostom) is grounded upon a testimony of one of the Sibylys: O lignum felix, in quo Deus ipse pependit: O happy wood, which shalt not perish, but rather be made glorious, in that day of retribution; Cùm renovata Dei facies ignita micabit. What is become of that Cross? Is it not cut in many pieces? Would not those fragments, which they pretend to be pieces of the Cross, make up many waine-loads. Must they all be recollected to the redintegration of the Cross? First, they have multiplied it on earth, and now they would advance it into heaven. Do they not honor it with this imaginary exaltation, only to color their abuse of it unto superstition? This they understand to be that Sign of the Son of man: which he shall advance in the heavens, when he triumpheth over his enemies; as Conquerors use to erect Trophies and Monuments of their victories. What did Christ leave behind him at his going away, with which the Papists cannot furnish him at his Comming again? They have all his relics; some in one City, and some in another: this covent grows rich with one relique, that Church or Monastery is proud of another: Amongst them they can appoint him where he shall have all his old furniture: in one place he shall find his coat, in another his sandals: These they have in abundance, but they have lost Himself. We have not, ô most blessed Savior, these thy relics in our hands: but we desire to show Thee Thy self in our hearts, and to find our names in thy Book of Life.

If the earth with her works shall be burnt, why doth S. Paul mention the earnest Expectation of the Creature for this day? Doth anything naturally hope for an evil to it self, or desire it own destruction? Answ. 1. We must know, that the Apostle speaks there figuratively, by a Prosopopoeia; personating the Creatures and giving them affections, a kind of sense and feeling of their misery, and a longing desire to be delivered from it. He speaks of them groaning, and grieving, as the Prophets did sometime bring in Vineam lamentantem, the Vineyard wailing, and the Mountains lamenting. So that this is a pathetical and emphatical description of the hope and desire of the Creatures. 2. They are Subject to vanity, whereof they would fain be rid: Not subject willingly, for this their vanity is contra naturalem propensionem, against their natural inclination: everything by nature would decline corruption. Erasmus his conceit is too curious, who interpreteth this vanity, Frustrationem, the disappointing of the hope of the Creature; whereby it faileth of that end at which it aimeth: As if it sought an Immortality, in multiplying one individuum, or one particular by another: but that end it misseth. Nor is this vanity altogether corruption: for neither are the heavens of a corruptible nature; nor yet should the elements have been incorruptible, though man had never sinned: seeing they were ordained to serve for the generation and procreation of things, which cannot be done without corruption. But by this vanity we understand the frail condition of the Creatures, much degenerated since the Creation, both in earth, the elements, and heaven. There is a Perfection, to which they long to be restored. The desire or expectation of the Creature is twofold: One natural, as for the earth and trees to bring forth fruits: Another supernatural; when a thing aspireth to an end above the natural constitution: as our corruptible bodies, to the state of incorruption, at the Resurrection. So the Creatures expect when the Sons of God shall be revealed: not that they know who are the Sons of God, but they look for their own Restitution with the Sons of God. As for man's cause they were enthralled, so with man's happiness they shall be enlarged. The bodies of the Saints are made of the earth, and yet those bodies shall be glorified in heaven: Corruptibles shall put on incorruption. Heaven is the highest part of the world, and earth the lowest: yet he that dwelt in the highest heavens, came down to the lowest earth; and carried up his Body which was framed of earth, even to the highest heavens. It is the honor of the earth, that part of her is glorified above; and a kind of assurance that the rest shall be but purified below.

If the earth shall perish, why are we so taken with it? what folly can be greater than to adhere unto that which is destined to the fire? Thy habitation so pleaseth thee, that thou art loath to remove: it is but earth. Thy gold bewitcheth thee, and thou lovest the enchantment: it is but earth. A woman's beauty tempteth thee, and with the wrack of Virtue thou steerest a course to that unhappy port: it is but earth; some clearer-coloured earth. If the foundation be overturned, how should the roof stand? The earth is doomed to burning, and can the superedification escape? The earth is but a turfe for man to trample on, Heaven is our home: Here we have but Tents, there are the Mansions. No mortal Vitruvius can make an immortal habitation. Why do we build so gloriously, upon so inglorious and miserable a foundation? Pride begins such a palace, craft undertakes it, oppression raiseth it, prodigality finishes it, emptiness inhabites it, vanity derides it, and fire shall consume it. The superfluous builder is a thief, if not to others, yet to himself: Aedificatio te capiat, was a Lacedemonian curse. Time hath demolished those great Pyramids, the wonders of the world: but the remainders of time shall not escape the fire. The filly Spider may teach us, who upon the least touch of her web flittes and removes. The world is a cobweb-world, to be swept down with the broom of fire. If Codrus his house burn, he even warms his hands at the flame: the loss never troubles him, because in two days he can make himself another as good. But when the rich man's house is on fire, he cries out on this Chest, on that Cabinet; and is distracted with impatience. Those Pilgrims to the heavenly Canaan, which esteem the world but their Inn, care not to see it on fire, because it is none of their own: but to those that have made it their habitation, such a sight will go to their hearts. Let no home content us, but that which is out of the reach of the fire, even the Mansions prepared for us by Jesus Christ.

Though the house be on fire, be sure to save the Jewel; provide before hand that thy Soul may escape in this universal conflagration. When a man's house is burning, he would save many things; but he is content to lose them all, rather than lose himself. This was Saint Paul's motive, to keep ^f A good Conscience at all times, and in all things; because he knew there should be a day of account. Indeed, if there were a Purgatory for future cleansing, after this life, there might be some hope: but he that dares sin upon the trust of a Purgatory shall find the event of his hopes in Hell. Consider thy life, it is Peccandi tempus, the time of sinning; so thou makest it: Consider thy death; it is Poenitendi terminus, the date of repenting; so God makes it.

Saint Augustine calls death Tempus deponendi, a time of deposing or putting off: We then put off our clothes, we put off our diseases, we put off our cares, we put off our bodies; but yet we may fail of putting off our sins. They often go with the Soul, when that parts from the body: but they shall meet with the body, when that meets with the Soul. Be sure to put off thy clothes ere thou go to bed, to put off thy sins ere thou diest; or they will find thee in the morning when thou risest. Thou that darest sell God's holy Rites, without trouble to thee, wouldst thou be found in this day of flames with such a Conscience? Thou that settlest thy estate upon usury, thy heart upon thy estate; wouldst thou be found at this day with such a Conscience? Thou that swearest away thy Grace, that liest away thy Truth, that dissemblest away thy Faith, that drinkest away thy Estate, that whorest away thy Body, that playest away thy Soul; wouldst thou be presented before the Judge with such a Conscience? Hymenaeus and Philetus taught that The Resurrection was past already: and the conversations of too many are answerable to Their Doctrine; they so live, as if the day of account were over. He hath said, he will come: he is not yet come: O let us be so kind to ourselves, as to remember that Doomes-day is not past. There is a Day, an Evening, and a Morning: we shall find no peace in the Evening of our death, nor in the Morning of our Resurrection, except we provide for it in the Day of our life. O consider, with what a dismal cry, and ghastly look, the evil Conscience shall behold the Judge. The Sun shall be darkened: with what light shall the unrighteous shine? The Moon shall be turned into blood; it will be too late then to turn good. The Stars shall fall from heaven; alas what hope then can Meteors have of rising up to heaven? The Powers of heaven shall be shaken; how shall the infirmities of the earth be able to stand? O then make safe the Jewel, lay up thy Soul in the bosom of Jesus Christ.

Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy Conversation and Godliness.

THat which is commonly noted of our Prognosticators, that they are more diligent to make mention of foul weather, than of fair: storms and thunders they much harp upon; but calm and serene days pass them unobserved: The like may be said of man's corrupt Nature, to be more feelingly affected with pain, than with pleasure; his much good he little thinks on; a small evil disquiets him. He is more troubled with an injury, than pleased with a benefit; more mindful to revenge the one than to requite the other. He regards not many years health, so much as one days sickness; nor an age of liberty, like one hours restraint. The hope of that which is good, does not stir him like the fear of that which is evil. Fear is the passion that most powerfully sways him, and accordingly, the searcher of all hearts proceeds to work upon him. Therefore the sacred Rolles do more abound with the threatenings of Judgment, than with the Promises of Favor. For howsoever Love be the more noble affection, yet Fear makes the first impression. For this cause doth God so frequently remember us of our own death, of the last Judgment, and hell torments: that seeing Love cannot win us to do good, yet the horror of those endless pains may fright us from doing evil. We cannot seriously meditate on our last trial, and admit such things as make us culpable. But alas, it is a death, we think, to think upon death; and we cannot endure that doleful bell, which summons us to Judgment. Therefore are we dissolute, because we do not think of our dissolution. But if we would deliberately consider the mutability of our condition, the necessity of our reckoning, and the dismal wages of sin; though we were not won with the Love of God's Goodness, and his blessed recompense; yet the terror of unavoidable vengeance might drive us to repentance. Divers thieves have robbed Passengers within the fight of the gallows: but if a sinner could see but one glimpse of hell, or be suffered to look one moment into that fiery lake; he would rather choose to die ten thousand deaths, than commit one sin. Seeing then all these things, &c.

The Verse consists of a Contemplative part, and a Practical: Seeing all these things shall be dissolved, that is for Contemplation: What manner of persons ought we to be in all holy Conversation and Godliness; that is for practice. How well do these two parts symbolize to a Christian the two main offices of his Life; Speculation and Action? These be histwo wings, whereby he mounts up into Heaven: Yea, these be the Cherubims hands under their wings: a winged mind, that soars aloft in Meditation; and a working hand, busy about pious actions. Here is Contemplation, like devout Mary at the feet of Christ; hearing his Word: and Practice, like hospitable Martha, providing for his entertainment. Here is Moses at his Prayers on the Mount, and Joshua fighting in the valley: Jacob studying at home, and Esau hunting in the field. The Papists place the chief Perfection in a contemplative Life; and understand it for that unum necessarium, of Christ to Martha, One thing is necessary: and that better part, which was chosen by Mary: Action (say they) may be lame and defective through the imbecillitie of the Organ; but Contemplation is pure and defecate on earth, and shall be perfected in Heaven; a portion never to be taken from us. I deny not the excellency of Contemplation: it is as heavenly a business, as any belongs to man or Christian, and of unspeakable Benefit to the Soul. For by this we ransack our deep and false hearts, find out our secret enemies, buckle with them, expel them, and fortify ourselves against their re-entrance. By this we make use of all good means, fit ourselves to all good duties: By this we desery our own weakness and obtain redress: we prevent temptations, and store up Comforts: we get more Light to our knowledge, more heat to our affections, more life to our devotion. By this, we learn how to contemn the world, and long for the fruition of invisible blessings. By this we see Christ with Stephen, we talk with God as Moses, and are wrapped with Paul into Paradise. This is the remedy of our disconsolateness, the pastime of the Saints, the Ladder of Heaven, and the best improvement of Christianity. Yet albeit Mary's part is the better, Martha's is not disallowed for good. They are both sisters, and must go hand in hand: for if we suffer meditation to eat up all the duties of our life; God will give us little thanks, who rewards all men according to their works. A public good excels a private: contemplation may do more good to ourselves; but the works of charity are more profitable to others. I had rather be wise than rich; yet to relieve a poor man's hunger or necessity, my riches will do more good than my wisdom. Three noble ends Divinity propounds to her followers: the first and chiefest is God's glory; the next to that, man's own solace here, and salvation hereafter: the last, is the edification and comfort of others; and in these consists a Christians perfection. Having therefore contemplated in our minds this fatal and final doom of the world, let us proceed to action: and seeing all these things shall he dissolved, God looks that we should be new persons in all holy conversation and godliness.

In the former part we have two circumstances; How much, and how far: An extent, all these things: An extinct, shall be dissolved. First, for the Extent.

All these things.] The reason of this dissolution is the corruption of all things; therefore this future renovation hath the same latitude with the former corruption. Saint Paul tells us, that The creature is made subject to vanity; and The whole creation groaneth, or every creature; comprehending (with our Apostle here) All things. Origen would fetch the Angels within this compass, alleging that they also are subject to vanity, in respect of their employment about the vain affairs of men: that as they rejoice at the repentance, so they grieve at the disobedience of sinners. Augustine refuseth this interpretation, yet not without a Quare; whether the Angels helping our infirmities, may not be said to be affected with us, and in that sense subject to vanity. But the Angels cannot be subject to vanity; for in the next world the Saints shall be but like the Angels, and yet quite exempted from all such affections. Gregory understands this Creature only of the righteous man, who against his will is subject to this mutable and corruptible estate, and groaneth to be delivered. And Augustine by every Creature, understandeth man in general, because he participateth the nature of every creature: he hath understanding with Angels, sense with Beasts, and a vegetative life with Plants: But the sense reacheth a great deal further. Ambrose and Calvin fetch into this restitution, the brute Beasts; as if they also should be no more than changed, of whom there will be no necessary use. But by Saint Paul's Every creature, and Saint Peters All these things; we may best understand Inanimata or Insensata, things without life and sense, as the Heavens, Elements, and Earth with her works. There shall be a dissolution of all these things.

Of all?] Shall nothing escape? what a mad man is the covetous, to seek the ingrossing of all, when as all shall perish? I will enlarge my Barns, (if it were possible according to the capacity of my desires) And there will I bestow all my goods. Where we may observe. First, his pride, Mea, my goods, as if no man were worthy to taste of his bread, or drink of his cup. Avarus vult esse solus, the worldling would dwell alone: but he shall have company: the rust will wait upon his gold, the moth upon his garment, the vermin on his garner; and, above all, the worm of conscience will not fail to be his associate: there is nothing else which he can so properly call his own: this will stick by him. Secondly his greediness, omnia, all: he would have all that is, he will have all he can. All, without leaving so much as the tenth to the Levite, or the gleanings for the poor; All, if he could possess all the goods upon the Earth, yea and stretch his hand to the Firmament, to make the Sun and Moon his, or reach a Star from the Sky; yet he and all these must perish. The wise man, that sees he must lose all at last, will part with something in time: Tonde superflu, clip off thy superfluous riches, as Absalom did cut his hair; it will grow the thicker: he that covets all, shall be left worth nothing. Thirdly, his presumption; I will build my Barns, I will gather my goods: Wilt thou O fool? How art thou sure of that? Alas, Hesterni samus, says Elipha we are of yesterday: not Crasti; we cannot say, we are of tomorrow. To say peremptorily, I will do this or that, is to rob God of his prerogative royal. And what will he do? First place he down his old Barns: indeed barns full of rapine deserve pulling down: but if instead of pulling down old barns, he had pulled down veterem hominem, the old man, this had been a far better exercise. Then he will build up new: his goods are his God, and he builds a Barn as a Temple to it. His dropsy is so insatiate, that he would drink up the whole world: but a dropsy is best cured by vomit: the worldlings vomit, is a charitable beneficence: If this be not his Physic now, he and all these things shall perish together. But happy are they that repose all in Christ; for when they that coveted all, shall lose all; these faithful souls shall find all, in Him that is All in all, our blessed Savior Jesus Christ.

Shall be dissolved] This is the Extinct. Full grievous is the corruption, whereunto the creature is subject, by the sin of man. This servitude appears in three things. First, they are in continual labor to serves man's necessity. The Sun riseth and setteh, and runs his diurnall course, to give man light. The Moon waxeth and waineth, and hastens about her Sphere, to solace him in the night-season. The Winds come out of their several corners, to do him good, both by land and sea. The Rivers are still in action, running like Lacquayes by his side, and emptying themselves into the the sea; from whence there is a reciprocal supply of springs and fountains. The pregnant clouds are in travel to be dedeliver'd of their fruitful showers:God wearieth the clouds in watering the earth. All the creatures are in a continual labor to serve man; and this is one servitude.

2. They have a certain Sympathy and fellow-feeling of man's misery; as the beasts of Nineveh were driven to fast with their masters: yea, they are not seldom destroyed in the destruction of man: the Cattle of Egypt were smitten, the ground of Sodom was cursed; and in the perishing of the old world, nothing, (save what was in the Ark) escaped. Hence it is, that the Heavens do wax old, like a long worn garment: The Sun and Moon have their blemishes, their eclipses: the face of the sky is overcast with clouds: the stars infect the Air with bad influences; the Air doth annoy us with pestiferous vapors: the womb of the Earth doth often afford nothing but barrenness: and when her bowels are ripped for our relief, she seemeth to groan under that painful passion. The Vine bleeds when it is cut, the Mulbery weeps at a breach, and diverse trees sweat out their gum, as if our sins had made them sick of a Fever. If any demand, whether some injury be not offered to the creature, for being thus subdued to vanity: I answer with Saint Chrysostom; Nequaquam; quia propter me facta est. No, for it was made for us, and therefore justly suffers with us. Some have too curiously observed, concerning this mutability of the Heavens; that the Sun (in the beginning) was ordained to keep his course in the Equinoctiall only, without swerving: and then say they, there should have been a perpetual spring: neither pinching cold, nor parching heat should have offended the Earth, but the temper would have pleased all with an acceptable indifferency. But now his course is not round, nor doth perfect a circle, nor doth he keep his way directly; but where he rose today, he comes not tomorrow; stealing by that point with a cosening line: Thus he changeth his race, and runs in the oblique circle of the Zodiac, as it were hedged in by the two Tropickes. But all this is not so; for the Sun and Moon in the Creation were appointed to distinguish the times and seasons of the year: which they could not do, if the Sun should not by a serpentine course, in the declining circle of the Zodiac, both remove and approach, and so make both inequality of days, and difference of seasons. But still there is vanity in all things under the Sun; and that which is infected with man's corruption, shall suffer in man's dissolution.

3 They are constrained to minister their service to the wicked desires of sinful men: and this is the sorest bondage of all, even to be a slave unto slaves. The Sun was fain to lend his light unto those Pagan monsters, while they committed their most execrable rapes and murders. The Moon waits upon the thief, while he acts, his robberies; upon the Goatish whoremonger in his foul adulteries. The Stars hide not their aspects from those at heistical astrologers, nor deny their influence to their Heathenish Idolaters. The winds with prosperous gales, fill the sails of Pirates, and the Sea supports their unblest vessels. Upon the grounds of oppressors, the Clouds let fall their fructifying burdens, and the heat of that glorious carbunckle ripens their fruits. Viands make fat the epicure, and Wine is ready for the unnatural thirst of the drunkard. Herbs and Mineralls are medicinal to the unholy bodies, and recover them from their diseases. Jewels and precious stones are driven to adorn the proud; and gold is made to buy the Libertines pleasure. The Vine yields her Grapes, the Kine their milk, the Sheep their wool, the ground her corn, the Meadows their grass, and Gardens their flowers; even to those that sacrifice all these to their Idols. Birds are compelled to part with their feathers, to stuff the bed of uncleanness; and the mettalls of the Earth are made the instruments of homicide. The Fire warms, and the Air cools, and the Water cleanses, and the Earth bears the ungodly as well as the righteous. They are all forced to serve them, that do not serve God. This is the bondage under which they groan, and from which they labor to be delivered, longing for the time when all these things shall be dissolved.

And yet they would be but dissolved, not destroyed: they desire a renovation not an annihilation; not a cessation of being, but of servitude. So Paul says, The creature shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the Children of God. What shall they be delivered, only by being utterly abolished? Shall they so cease to be miserable, that they shall cease to be at all? No, that cannot be called a deliverance, but rather a punishment: for it is a less ill to be miserable, than not to be at all: a corrupt estate is better than none. But they shall be delivered into a glorious liberty; both putting off their servile corruption, and putting on a happy freedom. As for our sakes they became corruptible, so together with us they shall be restored to incorruption. I dare not (with Calvin) gather in the Beasts, Fowls, Fishes, that remain at the last day, to this number; they are certainly within the compass of this dissolution; but whether designed to such a restitution, it is doubtful. Their services being done, in the ministration to our necessities, why should they be restored to glory. But there shall be a new Heaven, and a new Earth: the Heavens shall be decked with Stars; the Earth adorned with Trees and Plants: the Moon shall shine as the Sun, and the light of the Sun shall be seven fold: and for the end and use of all this Renovation, it shall then be revealed, when it is performed.

Seeing all these things must be dissolved, Why does not man herein read the Necessity of his own dissolution? His body is not made of the same matter, with the Sun, or stars, or heavens: and if it were, yet even these must be dissolved. But Homo ab humo, and humus ex nihilo: he is the son of the earth, and grandchild of nothing. There is nothing in life, more transient than life it self: in the midst of life, we be in death. It eats out it self, spends upon the own stock, and is consumed, by being peeced. Every day that is added to it, is so much as a day taken from it. Nativitas ex utero viventis & secundae matris, Nativitas in uterum mortuae & primae matris. From the morning of Infancy, we come to the meridian of Youth; and presently it is evening; our sun sets. Our life is like a candle in the wind, soon blown out: like a spark in the water, soon extinguished: like a thin air, soon expired: like a little snow in the Sun, soon melted: like a flower; What in the Spring is sweeter for smell, fairer for sight? Solomon in all his royalty was not clothed like one of those: yet in the morning it flourisheth, in the evening withereth: if it last a day, that's all. Deawes, vapors, shadows, snow, dreams, dust, and ashes: A ship, Post, meteor, air; so man's life passeth. We are not debtours to the flesh, saith Paul: but we are debtours to the death of the flesh. Let not this little world man, think that he can hold out with the great: common experience confutes it: daily man dies, when as the world stands. There is but one thing appointed to dissolve the world; and that is the last Fire: but there are a thousand things to bring man to his end. We use to say, that a man may live of a little: but alas, Of how much less may a man die? There is scarce anything, that hath not killed somebody: an hair, a feather hath done it. Let us therefore be carefully prepared for our own dissolution, and the dissolution of the world shall never trouble us. If we live well, we shall do well: and if we die well, we shall do better. The world shall be dissolved, but nothing shall separate us from Jesus Christ.

What manner of Persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness?] This is the practical part. The wise man first looks to the end which he desires, and then studies the way conducing to it. He does not say, This way will I take, because it is fair and pleasant, and I have store of company, whither soever it brings me. But because of the smoothness and frequency, he rather mistrusts it; having heard that the rode to hell is very delightful, populous, and numerous of passengers: and therefore resolves to choose the surer way, though it be troublesome and solitary. Heaven is the place, to which we would all arrive: Sin is a pleasing way, but not the right: Piety is the right way, but not so pleasing: if we be wise, we will not mind the pleasantness, but the directnesse of the way; and suffer a little sorrow in our journey, for that inestimable joy at our journeys end. Reveale to us this way O Lord, and see if we have followed it; that thou mayest have glory, if we have; and we pardon, if we have not, and help that we may. Domine paratum est cor meum; metuo ne non sit: utinam esset paratum: hei mihi quod non est. We have here, for satisfaction of our good desires;

- 1. The Way directed to Felicity, which is Godliness.
- 2. Our Progress in that happy Way; our Conversation.
- 3. The Sincerity of that Progress; Holy, All-holy.
- 4. The Perfection of that Sincerity; What manner of Persons ought we to be; How holy, how godly; how excellent in all grace and virtue?

Godliness is the way: and this, in the latitude of it, comprehends all those duties which God requireth of us. Indeed, it is a conformity of the whole creature, to the will of his Maker. To live a life as near to the life of God, as possibly we can, is godliness. In the understanding, it is knowledge: in the will, it is readiness: in the affections, it is simplicity: in the conscience, it is sincerity: in the heart, it is alacrity: in the hand and in all our actions, it is obedience. This is too large a field for us now to survey: we will look but upon one canton of it only: the trial of godliness is obedience. First, it is auscultans, and hath an ear listening to the Word of God. That same, Ipsium audit, runs continually in the mind of godliness. Hear not the world, which bids you seek after transitory things; but hear him that says, Love not the world. Hear not the world, profering her honors: but hear him, that tells you, Humility is the way to glory.

2 It is Prompta: the guard, that watcheth at the chamber door of Kings, sooner break of their prattle at the voice of their master, and are ready to execute his commands. The godly heart forgets his own business, when his Maker sets him on work. The refractory are like a heavy laden vessel, not moved without strong winds: but the pious heart is like a spherick body set on a plain; the gentlest breath of God's Spirit stirs it. No war-horse is so guided by the hand of his rider, as the godly soul is by the will of his Maker. Those are paralytic and stupefied members of the body, which will not move at the impulsion of the head: If we be living members of our glorious Head, we have a motion pliable to his direction. The vessel of honor is meet for the Masters use, and prepared unto every good work. They are more stubborn than the winds and seas, that will not obey the voice of Christ. Thirdly, it is Integra: to serve God in some things lest repugnant to our corrupt natures; and in other duties to be recusants, is an heteroclyte and defective godliness. Miriam, for one contumely against her brother, became a Leper. Moses, for failing in one act of obedience, was not suffered to enter into the land of promise. Heli, otherwise godly, for a little indulgence to his ungracious sons, was severely punished. They that profess godliness in diverse things, and take liberty in one ungodly custom, are like a vain traveler, whom the desire of seeing some famous city, after the tedious measure of many hundred leagues, hath brought to the gates: and there taking up his Inn, he is so well pleased, that his glass being run out, he dies without the sight of that happiness for which he undertook the journey. If a man have many fair rooms in the house of his heart, all which he reserves for God: and one little closset, which he lets out to Satan, by the tenure of one filthy lust or affection: will not God dislike all for that one? Will he not for that one secret rivall, forsake the whole dwelling? Much honey cannot sweeten a little wormwood, but a little wormwood will embitter a great deal of honey. You have seen a mouse caught in the trappe, by the very tippe of her tail. A little sin cherished, puts us out of the way of godliness. The word is plural, In pietatibus, in all the duties of godliness. This then is the way, walk in it; and, God hath past his Word, you shall be saved by it.

The progress in this way, is our Conversation. Man is a sociable creature, ordained to converse with his own kind. It is neither good, nor safe, to be alone. Of conversation there is a necessity; all our care must be to make it holy. There be three objects of a Christians care; the devotion of his heart, the profession of his mouth, and the conversation of his life: The first and last of these are hard tasks; only the middlemost is easy, with small difficulty we can say well: but to mean well, and to do well, be the points of labor. Our conversation is the Index of our estate: if that be bad, the credit of our profession is lost; and we are broken in our religion, as was Demas. The ungodly may be hoisted aloft, like chimneys; but we know by their smoke, that they are full of foot. The Poets talk of a wedding girdle; which, being tied about the Bride, would instantly break, if she were not a Virgin. The name of Christian is an universal challenge among us: but if we be not Virgins, of a pure and holy conversation, this girdle will break, and we shall be exposed to ignominy. In vain do men speak well of us, when God knows no good by us. If he pronounce us dead, all the mouths in the world cannot breath life into us: if he pronounce us living, all the Devils in Hell cannot take life from us. A man is what his manners declare him to be; as the Tree is judged by the fruits. There is nothing more honors or dishonors God, than our good or evil conversation. The thoughts of our hearts, whether they be fowl or clean, are only known to himself; and in the matter of his glory before men, they neither make nor are: as the unknown bowels of the Earth neither grace nor disgrace a country; but the words of our lips, and works of our lives; these either hinder, or advantage his glory. But do our filthy aspersions below, stick any spots upon the brow of Heaven? Do we violate the Virgins there, by committing uncleanness here? Doth it trouble the blood of Christ in Heaven, that we swear by it upon Earth? If we oppress the poor, is this any wrong to God? Whatsoever evil we do, is he ever the worse? Indeed his honor, in it own nature, can no more be depressed by our impiety, than it is heightened by our obedience: but in the regard of men, according to our conversation, it receives either increase or dimunition. As the glory of the Sun is still the same; but not so to our eyes, when it is obscured by the interposition of Clouds.

There is nothing so truly speaks a man, as his conversation: what he does, I am sure he is; not evermore what he says. Judas was a traitor: why? He delivered up his innocent Master: this he did, whatsoever he said. Herod was a murderer. why? he slew the Infants of Bethlehem: Pilate was an unjust Judge: why? he condemned the innocent: the conversation is an evident and unanswerable proof. Not that every bad act denominates a sinner: as to be once overtaken with wine, makes not a man a drunkard: nor one oath a swearer: nor one falsehood a liar. That which justifies or condemns a man, is his conversation; the accustomed course of his life. If his manners be lewd, he shames his profession. It were better with Philosophers, to have honesty without religion, than with wicked Christians, to have religion without honesty. Yea, he shames himself. In the preparation of solemn nuptials, the wedding clothes are sumptuous, the Bride-chamber is richly furnished, the Marriage-bed is adorned with silken curtains and glorious ornaments, the Roomes are strawed with Roses and Violets, the presence is honored with a great number of fair Virgins and noble friends, great cheare is provided, the Bride-groome is decently accoutred, the attendants wait, all things are in readiness: yet after all this expectation, when the Bride is presented, if She appear swarthy, evil favored, and deformed, not to be looked upon without contempt, all the Spectators hang down their heads, and the whole honor of the nuptials is quash'd. So though there be an affluence of riches, a concurrence of honors, and all that this world can afford, in abundance: yet if thy Soul, which is the Bride, ordained for the Prince of Heaven, Jesus Christ, be fowl and stigmaticall, besmeared with lusts, and polluted with an unclean conversation; the Bride-groome will none of thee, and thou shalt be despised of Men and Angels. Be gracious therefore in thy conversation, that thou mayst not be rejected of that Heavenly Bride-groome.

The sincerity of this Progress follows: Our conversation must not be sensual, but holy: not in part, but All holy: eventhroughout sanctified.

1 Holy. Holiness is God's own Image, a beam of that Divine light shining within us: a resultance, a resemblance of one property of the Divine nature: the Character of Christ, the Print of the Spirit, the cognizance of a Saint, and the Glory of Men and Angels: without which, all riches is poverty, all honor ignominy. For what is all the glory of the world, without holiness? Aut nihil est, aut nihil prodest: It is all nothing, or nothing worth. God hath chosen us before the foundation of the World, that we should be holy: Holiness is the end of our Election. He hath not called us to uncleanness, but unto holiness: Holiness is the end of our Vocation, This is the Will of God, our sanctification: His holy Word doth command it. Be ye holy, for I am holy. His holy example doth commend it.

Yet alas how doth the universal practice of the world despise it? B•• Holy? It is the least of all their cares: nay they are ashamed to be holy, for fear of being contemptible: as if they had made a Stature, and sworn to observe it; In no man amongst us be holy. Preach holiness to them, and they reply; This is no age for Saints: They will not be so holy, as to go to Heaven before their bones be cold: that holiness is but a sullen quality, and makes men unfit for any good company. Thus do they scoff at the means to be saved, and make themselves merry with their own damnation. But we must tell them again, that whosoever will not be a mortified Saint on Earth, shall never be a glorified Saint in Heaven. He that will not be so sullen, as to be holy, for fear of displeasing the company of sinners, shall never be so happy as to enjoy the society of God and his holy Angels. Forwithout holiness, no man shall see the Lord. Holiness is that Perspective, through which we must see God. It is as possible to see the Sun without eyes, as to see God and be saved, without Holiness. No sanctification in this life, no salvation in the world to come: no Holiness here, no Happiness hereafter. By living ill, thou art seen of God, but doest not see Him: by an holy Conversation, thou both seest Him, and art seen of Him. Our Holiness begins our Blessedness; and our Grace is the handsell of our Glory. The Kingdom of God is an undefiled Kingdom, because none that are defiled shall enter into that heavenly Mansion.

This is that spiritual circumcision of the heart, whereof the carnal circumcision was but a symbol. The differences are many. First, the circumcision of the flesh was wrought by the hand of man; this, by the finger of God; therefore Saint Paul calls it A circumcision made without hands. Secondly, The carnal circumcision was only concerning one part of the body; the spiritual extends to both body and soul; to every part of the one, to every faculty of the other. Thirdly, that was only done on the eighth day, but we must be spiritually circumcised every day. This is the Suburbs, through which we come to Heaven the City: Holiness is that via regia to all honor; and they that decline this way, shall be written in the infamous dust. Enoch walked with God, and was translated: but shall a man walk with the Devil, and speed so? Faine we would be Saints, but we are loath to be holy: as if a man should desire to be a Courtier, yet refuse to leave his rustically behavior, or to put off his sordid garments. O for a Religion that can make a man a Saint, though he were never holy! This is that Popish bait, which catcheth so many thousand Gudgeons: under the pretence of an holy faith, the toleration of an unholy and licentious life. It is their objection; If we be not in the right, it is a wonder that so many flock unto us: few of our Religion turn to you, but abundance of yours come over to us. But we answer, that for the corrupt nature of man to adhere unto a Doctrine, that promiseth carnal liberty, is no more wonder, than for stones to fall downward. Philosophers of divers sects turned to the Epicures, but never did Epicure accept of any other sect of Philosophy: an easy proffer will win us from a laborious life to a pleasant: But who will change a pleasant for a laborious? Callista the Whore thus bragged against Socrates: all thy Philosophy cannot alienate one of my Lovers from me: but my beauty can fetch many of thy Scholers from thee. But he answered her; This is no wonder: for thou temptest men to the pleasing way of perdition, but I persuade them to the troublesome way of virtue. We are all naturally disposed to be evil; to be holy and good is the difficulty. We are borne sinners, there is much ado to make us Saints. Yet holy we must be, or we can never be happy. This is the only way to ascend that mountain where the Lord dwelleth: even that holy Hill, which none can come unto, but he that hath clean hands; which none can have, but by that one and strong way of making them clean, which is by washing them in the immaculate blood of JESUS CHRIST.

2. All holy; our conversation must be holy throughout; separating ourselves from every known sin, and sanctifying our hands to every good work. Indeed many intercurrent infirmities will mingle themselves with our best actions: but still our desires must be hearty, our endeavors holy, and the constant purpose of our souls resolved in nothing to offend. Holy in all the parts of holiness, in all the kinds of holiness, in all the degrees, in all the means of holiness.

1. In all the kinds of Holiness. There is a Holiness imputed; which is properly inherent in Christ, but made ours through faith by imputation. And if this holiness be imputed to us, we are reputed as holy in the sight of God, as if it were inherent in us. There is an holiness imparted to us; either Habitual, or Actual: the former is a divine spiritual quality, wrought in us by the holy Spirit, who furnisheth us with all graces required in the Saints. The Actual holiness is that power of grace whereby we sanctify ourselves; both in the affections of our heart, and operations of our life. There be some that care only to carry a fair show of holiness; flattering themselves, that their garments are of the holy fashion, their going is of the holy pace, their language is of the holy style, their ruffles are of the holy set, their hair is of the holy cut: but their heart is all this while of an unholy metal: the invisible stuff is mere rottenness and dissimulation. Others think it enough to have a good heart to Godward, as they say, how lewd soever their life appear to the world: and that Intùs si recte, non laborandum, if all be well within, they need care for no more. Some content themselves with fine linings, how course soever their outsides be: others will make shift for glorious outsides, though they have sluttish linings. Neither of them both is holy: to the former we may say, as he answered the Strumpet pretending her soundness of health; I will never believe that body to be found, whose face is broken out into blisters: if the life be spotted with a sinful Leprosy, we cannot think that the heart is holy. To the other, that pretend sanctity at the root of the tree, when no fruit but wickedness is seen on the branches; I remember what Paulinus answered to Severus, when he wrote unto him to send him his picture: Erubesco pingere quod sum, non audeo pingere quod non sum; modestly dispraising his own feature: I must blush to picture myself as I am, and I scorn to picture myself as I am not. Of the two, it is better humbly to confess the unholiness we have, than arrogantly to boast the Holiness we have not. But to be All-holy, is to be holy within and without: like the Kings Daughter, who as she was allglorious within, so her clothing also was of wrought Gold: her outside was comely, her inside lovely. Or like the Ark of God, which was overlaid with pure Gold, both within and without. A good conscience is the Gold within, and a good conversation is the Gold without. The holy soul provides for things honest, not only before God, but also before men. 2 Cor. 8.21.

2. In all the parts of Holiness. There is a Privative Holiness, in the reforming that which is evil: and a Positive Holiness, in performing that which is good. This consists in putting off the old man, corrupt with deceiveable lusts: and putting on the new man, created after God in Righteousness and true Holiness. It is but a piece of Holiness; to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts: the better half is to live godly, righteously, and soberly in this present world. We must be Holy in all manner of conversation. No exception may be admitted against the general Rule of Holiness: what servant conditions with his master, This work I will do; in that I will be excused? Sanctification is like Leaven, spreading the powerful virtue of it self throughout the whole lump. He that hath a straight shoe, and a tender foot, is sensible of the least stone or rubbish got in; nor can he be at ease till he hath taken it out: The holy Soul is troubled with the smallest error he commits; and is so far from favoring any sin, that he will not pardon himself for stumbling against his will. It was the saying of one, and it is the conceit of many; Alijs in rebus pietatem colas, sanctitatem serves; Lord, be merciful to me in this infirmity, and in other things I will be holy. But Holiness grants no such dispensation: he that makes not some Conscience of all sin, makes no true Conscience of any sin: He that is not in some measure sanctified in every part, is truly sanctified in no part. In secular armies there be Emeriti milites: but in our holy war against sin, neither young, nor old, nor weak, nor sick are privileged. There be some trespasses of so small a value, in their opinion, that they presume, neither will their faithfulness be exacted, nor shall their unfaithfulness be noted. But will you not be fideles (☞) ? who then shall trust you in multo? If Holiness must be in all our conversation, what sin can hope for toleration?

3. In all the degrees of Holiness: we must not content ourselves with an Hac •sque; thus far will I go in Holiness, and no farther: but we are charged to perfect Holiness in the fear of God. How far soever we have proceeded, there is aliquid ultra, a geater measure and degree of Holiness to be attained. He that is righteous, let him be more righteous: and he that is holy, let him be more holy. It is a happy comfort to a man's life, when he shall find in himself the sweet experience of going on, and growing on to more holiness; still increasing with the increase of God. This is a sound proof to his conscience, that he is truly sanctified, because he desires and endeavors to be more sanctified. Saint Bernard reports the saying of a Monk; Nec pejor fieri volo, nec melior cupio: I would be no worse, and I care not for being better. But we not sooner cease to be better than we begin to be worse: nay, we were never truly good, if we desire not to be better. The waters continually run forward, the winds do not look back to their native home, the Sun is never weary of his course: and shall the Christian be weary of well-doing? Shall our Holiness be at a stand? No, but let our daily progress be from strength to strength, till everyone appear before the Lord in Zion.

4. In all the means of Holiness; of which there are especially two, the Word and Prayer: for we may say of men, as the Apostle doth of the Creatures for meat; that they are sanctified by the Word and Prayer. 1. The Word is that outward means which God hath sanctified, to sanctify us. Father, sanctify them with thy Truth: thy Word is Truth. And now are ye clean through the word, which I have spoken to you. Therefore is it called Pure, not only Formaliter, because it is pure in it self, and contrary to all corruption: but also Effective, having the power to make us pure and holy. It is no more wonder to see a man profane, that neglects the Word preached; than to see his hands foul, that did never wash them. 2. The Word is God's means to work holiness in us; and Prayer is our means to obtain holiness from God. The holy Spirit himself is given to Prayer; and what Grace comes not with him? When the Disciples were at their Prayers, the holy Ghost did especially come upon them. As Prayer is the hook to draw down Holiness from above: so the time of Supplication is the time of Sanctification. Though God do grant us more than we beg, in his bounty: he will not deny our holy suites, in his mercy. If we would be holy, let us be devout: they that pray well, cannot live ill: the desire of Sanctification shall be granted.

Thus happy is it to be holy: nothing can make that man poor: he graceth all conditions, and honors all places. Though he be humbled with the lowest, and with the vile have a vile estimation; yet he is truly noble: the estate cannot dignify him, he shall dignify the estate. When a worthy person was set, by the ignorance of him that ordered the feast, at the lower end of the Table; and another demanded why he was placed there: It was answered, Honestare locum, to bring that place into credit and reputation: so it pleased the master of the feast to honor that end of the Table. Wheresoever the holy man is, he hath honorable company: the holy Church to pray for him, holy Creatures about him, holy comforts within him, holy Angels to attend on him; and above all, the Holy of Holies, even that Holy, holy, holy, the Lord God of Sabbath, everlastingly to bless him.

The Perfection of this Sincerity shuts up all: What manner of persons ought ye to be? The form of speech is interrogatory: there is Quastio apponens vel tentativa: Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat? saith Christ to Philip, and it is added This he said to prove him, for he himself knew what he would do. There is Quastio negationis: Is the Lord's arm shortened? No, it is not. Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? Are we stronger than he? No, we are not. And there is Quastio asseverationis: Have I not chosen you twelve, and one of you is a Devil? Are there not twelve hours in the day? Yes, there are. Of this nature is our question here, importing Excellentiā quandam: What manner of persons ought we to be? He means, very holy, very devout, very zealous. The word in the original signifies rather quantos than quales: implying not so much the manner, as the measure of this required godliness: How great should we be?

There is great ambition in the world to be Great; but not to be great in goodness. Who shall have the greatest honor, millions contend; not who shall have the greatest virtue or sanctimony. Men press in throngs to the doors of secular glory, and strive who shall be the foremost; but for the way of piety, we are very mannerly, and will give any man leave to go before us. We would have no man richer than ourselves, no man nobler than ourselves, no man happier than ourselves: but any man may be holier than ourselves, without our envy. The sensual man wisheth his life, as the Naturian chose his wife; He would have her well borne, fair, rich, kind, with divers other fortunate qualities: but he quite forgot to have her good and virtuous: so among all the desired privileges of life, men commonly leave out Holiness. But if a little Godliness will not serve the turn, what shall become of them that have none? If the righteous be scarcely saved, where shall the sinner appear? Our Religion shall not only be examined by the Test, whether it be pure or no, but also by the balance, whether it will hold weight or no: If it be found either too light, or too slight; refuse silver shall men call it, not able to endure this trial of the universal fire.

What manner of persons we should be in our conversation, we have seen plainly expressed; Godly, holy, and all this in all things, whether thoughts, words, or deeds: Let me add three cautions to the manner; How godly, how holy soever we are, let us together with these, be penitent, patient, vigilant.

1. Repentance must not be lest out: for as we have brought upon ourselves a necessity of sinning, so we must not exclude the necessity of repenting. Every day we gather some spots, therefore must every day wash them off with our tears. This house of our soul is but mortal, made of brittle earth, subject to innumerable breaches, to let out the inhabitant: death will creep in at a little hole: yea, the very soul hath her breaches too; every small sin is a flaw, every greater sin a fracture in this goodly building: Repentance is the only material, wherewith we stop all the leaks of our vessel, wherewith we mend all the rents of our garment, and repair all the ruins of our edifice. It is one of the good man's Titles; Reparator ruinarum, The repairer of the breaches. The Godliest life cannot scape errors; the eye will wander, the tongue will trip, the foot will tread awry, our thoughts will ramble: therefore the heart must be always ready to mend all with Repentance.

2. Patience hath her work too; for the most godly conversation will be exercised with troubles. Either the good we would have, shall be deferred; or the evil we would not have, shall be imposed; we shall mar all, if we lose our patience. The same measure of trouble being laid upon two men, is far lighter to him that bears it with patience. Of how pure wood soever an instrument is made; yet if it warp with the Sun, or crack with the weather, we dislike it. Let us not lose our credit of the Holiness, by the least murmur of impatience.

3. Vigilancie guards all: our sanctity, our piety, our charity, all will be stolen from us, if they be not kept by watchfulness. If all be a-sleep in the house, the thief filcheth at his pleasure: but when the Master meets him at the door, he faines another errand, as if he came upon some business, and speaks to him with all reverence. If the Tempter find thy soul waking, he goes away sneaking: He is disappointed, and thou art preserved. Thy end may come upon thee, as the last day upon the World, like a thief in the night: if it find thee sleeping, it will never give thee leave to waken: as Iael served Sisera, when he slept his last. One finding a soldier a-sleep, killed him: and being charged with the fact, he made answer; that he only left him, as he found him. Should God almighty deal so with us, to take away our souls, when he finds them in a spiritual slumber, how desperately dangerous were our condition? They that lie perdue in camps, during that service never sleep: we are in a continual warfare, beleaguered with enemies that will give neither truce nor quarter: if we fall into a spiritual drowziness, and be taken napping, their rage will be cruel, their insultation unmerciful.

But alas, what will become of the swearer at this day? Can his loudest Oaths drown the Archangels Trump? What will become of the drunkard? Can his floods of wine quench this universal fire? Where shall the worldling appear: His bags of gold will be melted, his stately Mannors turned to Cinders, and all his lands shall lie fallow forever. What will the adulterer and his strumpet do? The mistress of his affections shall then prove the mistress of his afflictions: there is no appearing in this Court by proxy, no commuting the penance: they must answer the matter themselves. Two things will affright voluptuous sinners at the last day: the fight of the Creatures which they have abused, and the Presence of the poor, whom they have not refreshed. Such manner of persons shall perish with the world, from the world, worse than the world. But blessed are they that have kept faith in their hearts, holiness in their lives, and sincerity in their Consciences, for they shall scape both the last fire of Judgment, and the everlasting fire of torment.

2 PET. 3.12.

Looking for, and hastening unto the Comming of the Day of the Lord, wherein the Heavens being on fire, shall be dissolved, and the Elements shall melt with fervent heat.

IT pleased God to make use of two Instruments, for the calling together of the assemblies of the Saints; Bells and Trumpets. In the foundation of his militant Church, his first institution was Trumpets by his appointment the Congregation was called into the Tabernacle by Trumpets: and when they were in, he gave them also the sound of Bells, from the garment of his Priest. In the Christian church, we have the use of Bells, but not of Trumpets: yet if we distinguish this Church, as it hath a Militant, and as it hath a Triumphant part, we have both Bells and Trumpets employed, but with an inverted Order. A Bell calls us to the Temple, and a Bell calls us to the Tribunal▪ For as the Sermon-bell calls us to the Church material, so our Passing-bell calls 〈◇〉 to the Church celestial. The Bell toules, and we come into the mil•an• Assembly: the Bell toules again when we die, and then we go out unto that triumphant Company. And when we shall receive our further Consummation, the re-uniting of Bodies and Souls at the Resurrection; it shall be done by the sound •f Trumpets. In a spiritual sense, we have both these, Bels and Trumpets, i•••ting us to the way of Goodness: Every Sermon we do h•re, is as one of Aaron's bells, that rings us to repentance and a holy life: But every Sermon upon such an argument as this, the presentation of the Day of Judgment to our Souls, whereof the Day of Judgment will call for a presentation: this is a loud Trumpet, thundering in our ears the necessity of that Preparation, which may save us from eternal destruction. Hear therefore these lower Trumpets to your pro•t, that you may then hear that last Trumpet to your Comfort.

Looking for, and hastening unto, &c.] Wherein we have two general parts; The Object requiring some exercise; The Comming of the Lord's Day: And the Exercise concerning that Object; Looking for it; hastening to it. The Object hath two appendances; The fiering of the Heavens, and The melting of the Elements. The Exercise consists in two actions; Expectation and Expedition; the one of Hope, the other of Desire: the former is Patient, Looking for: the other is Properant, Hastering to. Both these affections of the Soul, are resembled to two actions of the Body: Looking for, that is work for the eye: hastening to, that is the business of the foot: The one is an Organ of Vision, the other of Motion: Hope must keep the eye open to Look; and Desire teach the foot to mend his pace, and to hasten. The Object hath the last place in the Text, but it shall have the first in my discourse: the journey being known, we set forwards.

The Comming of the Day of the Lord.] God is no Judge Dormant, nor Demurrant, nor Rampant. Not Dormant, none of those Judges that fall asleep on the Bench; that like those Idol-gods, hath ears, and hears not. Not like him that would not right the poor widow, till her importunity had wakened him. Not Demurrant, like Felix, that put off Paul to a longer day, I will hear thee another time. Nor Rampant, like those in the Prophet, that slay off the skins of the poor, and grind their faces. He is uncorrupt, no bribe can tempt him: not dilatory, no business doth detain him: Inflexible, no power can sway him. This Supreme Judge hath set the day of his Assise, and all men must appear before him. All eyes shall see him, but with a different aspect: which is strange; that the same Object should be so acceptable to some, to others so terrible. They shall see the Son of man coming in a Cloud: but with no comfort. Not that the Excellencie and Splendor of his glory shall be hidden, but there is an indisposition in their fight to receive it. They shall know him to be the Son of God, by the Claritie of his person, the Majesty of his Word, the obsequious •e•dinesse, of the Angels to serve him, and by divers other perspicuous and evident demonstrations. But as a weak eye is offended with a shining light, so this Glory shall amaze, not cheer them. The good man's honor is the envious man's torment. If Joseph's sheaf stand, the brethren repine. If the fat Calf be killed, the Elder brother is angry: Saul finds not so much pleasure in his Kingdom, as vexation in the prosperity of David. The Glory of Christ shall add to the Reprobates confusion, when they are driven to confess, This is he whom we had in derision. They will rather choose to endure the horrors of hell, than to stand in so glorious a presence. Christ says of the wicked, that they shall see him no more. If we understand this of the Godhead, they never saw it at all. If of the manhood, they shall see it again, Videbunt quem soderunt. Indeed they shall see him no more as a Redeemer; that time is past: but as a Judge they shall, to their endless discomfort.

But these are Scarabees and Beetles, and this Day of the Lord is to them a Rose; so sweet that it kills them. The breath of a man hath this property, that at the same instant it can warm that which is near it, and cool another thing somewhat removed. It is no otherwise with the breath of God: Doth any man fear him? Then is he near him; For his Salvation is nigh to all them that fear him: and this breath of the Lord, the Promise of his second Comming, lights warm upon him, and is a cordial reviving his heart. But if a man be far off from God, through the vaste gulf and separation of his sins; then comes this breath very cold and bleak to his heart; and the mere mention of the day of Judgment sends a shivering through all his bones. It was the Son of man, whom the high Priest was promised to see one day in the Clouds. The Father hath given him the Commission of Judgment, and that by this Title, as he is The Son of man. Which consideration makes us bold to take Paul's speech out of his mouth; and what he said to Agrippa, to apply better to Christ: I think myself happy, O King Jesus, because I shall answer for myself this day before thee, touching all the things whereof Satan accuseth me. Especially because thou hast knowledge of all customs; whether they be the adversaries, who is busy in assaulting; or the Fleshes, who is false in betraying; or my poor souls, which is weak in resisting. Thy own temptations have given thee experience of my frailty. I see the wounds yet bleed, which were taken for my sins: yea, and mine own nature is assistant in Judgment, to assure me I shall be partaker in Glory. Is my brother Joseph thus great? Then shall not his brother Benjamin be forgotten. If Hester be so dear to Assuerus, her kinsman Mordecai shall be advanced: there is in store for him, a robe, and a ring, and a horse, and a crown, and a train to proclaim his favor, Thus shall it be done to the man whom the King will honor.

Wherein the Heavens being on fire, &c. Concerning the Conflagration of the Heavens, liquefaction of the Elements, and dissolution of the World, sufficient hath been spoken before. My Meditations now are directed only to such profitable Uses, which if we devoutly practice, our soul shall escape in that Day of Vengeance.

1. Let there be an holy Fire within us, which will be an antidote against the rage of this Fire about us. The Word of God is Fire; an holy Fire from the Altar of Heaven: Sin is also like Fire; but one heat doth avocate another; the greater Fire extinguisheth the less. The Word is compared to Fire. First, It doth calefacere, warm the heart: more extensive of beams than the Sun; Nihil occultatur à calore ejus; Nothing is hid from the heat thereof. The most frosen breast will thaw, when God shall lay this Fire unto it. Secondly, It can illuminare, give light to the ignorant, if it be not mis-placed. The Fowler that carries the light on the top of his head, lights others plainly, himself sees not so well: Some carry this light only for the good of others, not of themselves; while they teach well, and walk ill: such men, when they go abroad, leave their lamp at home. Some keep this Fire to themselves, and grudge it to others: their light is kept within doors, and shall do no good to their neighbors: they have knowledge, but they will part with none of it. Others rake up this Fire under the embers, as Christ calls it putting the light under a bushel; so that neither others nor themselves shall be the better for it. Thirdly, Fire can purgare, search, try, examine, and purge away the dross from the metal: This operation if the Word had in us, we should be presented pure Gold to the Treasury of Christ. Sins are rust, and rust will not be gotten out but by fire. When we find our affections so drossy, rusty, foul, we must remember that this Fire hath not been made on our harthes; the Word hath not been admitted into our hearts. Fourthly, Fire can assimilare, make the matter it enters into, like it self: as Iron in the fire becomes fire. The soul that humbly entertains the Word, is made pure and holy, like the Word. If we see an uncharitable man, like a cold unformed lump of metal; know that his conscience, hath not yet taken Fire. Fifthly, It will permanere, last long in fit matter: as a mark made in a board by fire, will last as long as the board. If the Word have once thoroughly taken bold of our hearts, that gracious Fire will never out. God's Word, and man's Eare are like the Steele and the Flint: they quickly strike out fire; but to no purpose, unless our heart be as Tinders to receive the sparks. If we have this fire, let it not go out for want of fuel: Hearing and Meditation are like oil to the Lamp, and fuel to the Fire; My heart was hot within me, and while I was musing, the fire burned. If we maintain this holy Fire in our hearts, we shall not be hurt by the burning of the Heavens.

2. The Heavens shall burn, and the Elements shall melt, both with one Fire. Our Affections are our Elements: under the command of the Heart, as the Elements are under the rule of Heaven: By the Creation, the Elements were pure, and so were our Affections: now both of them are corrupt, feculent, and drossy. Therefore let this same holy Fire melt our Elements, new cast our Affections. Hast thou a covetous affection, greedy of those baser things? Melt it. How? Dissolve it into charitable contributions; like molten Lead, that runs into empty corners. Melt thy riches into alms, thy rapacity into mercy. Thy money was congealed in thy chests; put the Fire of Charity to it: were it frozen to a stone, and bound with iron bars, as with the bonds of Orion; this Fire would thaw it; Charity would set it a running into the bellies of the poor, the fittest receptacles for all our wealthy superfluities. When an ill gotten estate is left to a prodigal Heir, We say proverbially, yea prophetically; It will melt like snow in the Sun. The father, like a Constable, kept in the stocks; but the gallant son will let it loose, and set it a running. The penurious father did clippe the wings of his riches; but the son will open the cage, and make them fly. This is a melting without thanks, without reward. But that which is molten in Charity, runs into a blessed Treasury: it is but put over by a Bill of Exchange, to be paid an hundred fold in Heaven. This is an holy, an happy Fire: but alas, we may say of this virtue in special, as the Poet doth of virtue in general; Virtus laudatur, & alget: Charity is so cold, as if these many Winters it had seen no fire. A man had need blow strong and long upon this pile of Charity; for it is green wood, and hard to kindle: But if this fire cannot melt our hearts into beneficence, the last Fire will more than terrify them with vengeance. Stones will lie long in the fire, and before they melt, they fly in pieces: and such will be the meed of all stony hearts. Hast thou a proud Affection? Melt it into Humility; Lay thy ambitious desire of Honor in the dust. Hast thou an Affection of Revenge? Melt it into Forgiveness, without which thou shalt never be forgiven. Art thou transported with a lascivious affection, troubled with the Itch of Wantonness? Melt it by Mortification: Do not feed this fire, least it burn thee to cinders; but withdraw the fuel, and it will out of it self. Is thy Desire set upon Wine? Doest thou long after the cups of Excess? Melt it, or it will melt thee. The Drunkard indeed can melt his estate into drink, his body into Surfeits, his time into vanity: but he cannot melt his sin into sorrow, his inordinate lust into sobriety. These Elements of our corrupt nature must be molten by repentance, that when the Elements of the world shall melt with fervent heat, we may be found pure and refined Oare in the eyes of JESUS CHRIST.

Looking for, and hastening unto.] The one is the work of Hope, the other of desire: the former commends Tolerancie, the latter Diligence. Looking for: this eye of expectation hath three beams: Vigilancie, Hope, and Patience. Without Watchfulness we cannot look, without Hope we will not look, and without Patience we should not look for the coming of the Lord.

1 Vigilancie is required in this Expectation, even a continual waking. The Prophets of God were called both Seers, and Watchmen: not only Seers, endued with a power of seeing, able to see: but Watchmen, evermore in the act of seeing. Sleep, in the Scriptures, hath so heavy a sense sometimes, as not only to be taken for sin it self, Awake thou that sleepest: but even for the punishment of sin: The most fearful and irrevocable malediction is presented to us in a perpetual sleep: They shall sleep a perpetual sleep, and not wake. Sleep is as often taken for natural death, as for natural rest. There is a privation of Motion in both: in sleep an interruption, in death a cessation. Sleep is a short death, death a long sleep. Spiritual slumber is a very death. The Romists compare the state of nature but only to sleep, or to a man fallen into a deep ditch: he can hear thee call, give him a rope, and pull; he will take hold and be drawn out: this is false, for he is dead. A man may struggle out of natural sleep, of Edormire crapulam: but it is not in our power to awake from sin: we must have a continual grace, or we cannot stand. I stand at the door and knock: st•, not stet•, not stabo, but sto stance; he is ever there. Yet we must add our own endeavors, and with waking eyes be always looking for our Deliverance.

There be signs before sleep natural, and spiritual. First, heaviness of the head and temples, by reason of the rising up of fumes and vapors: Worldly desires induce such a drowsiness upon the soul: these hinder the contemplation of heavenly things: the bodies of such men be at Church, while their minds are at home. O that they could remember to rub their temples with holy thoughts: this would keep them waking. Secondly, Yawning is another sign of sleep invading the body: answerable whereunto there is a torpour or laziness of the soul. O that this Sermon were done! When will he make an end of prating? Shall I go to my prayers? I care not if I do: yet 'tis no matter: let it alone till another time. Is this man awake? Doth he look for the Day of the Lord? No, but the Day of the Lord may take him napping.

There be Symptoms of sleep: First, Snorting; everyone that sleeps, does not snort; but everyone that snorts, does sleep. This is a profound sleep; when the whole Parish rings of a man's vicious acts, yet still he snorts in the room. This man speaks of his greediness, that of his frowardness, one of folly, another of his baseness; he hears all this, yet snorts, laughs at it; Populus me sibilat, at mihi plaudo. Do we know none such? I would there were none such to be known. Secondly, Dreaming: there be many fancies in both sleeps, of body and mind. One while he dreams that he is on a mountain, and sees the glory of kingdoms: an ambitious Dream! Another while, that he hath found a great treasure, hid in the earth: a covetous Dream! Another time he eats and drinks plentifully; and yet, alas, wakens hungry: a voluptuous Dream! All the pleasure, all the bravery, all the money of the world, is but a waking Dream. Such men will not be persuaded that they are a-sleep: indeed it is hard for a sleeping man to know that he does sleep: yet by his Dreams, he may in some measure find it. The head hath often very frightful Dreams in sleep: Lions and Bears seem to assault us, Gulfes of water to drown us, fire to consume our houses, Thieves and Murderers to rob and kill us. The sleeping soul hath such dreams too: one thinks, If I be honest, and keep a good conscience, I must needs be poor: it is but a Dream. Another, If I do not collogue and flatter, I shall be despised: it is but a Dream. A third thinks, If I do not bribe, I shall lose my cause: it is but a Dream. Another, If I put up this injury without revenge, I shall be held a coward: it is but a Dream. Another thinks, If I be every day giving to the poor, I shall be poor myself: it is but a dream. A thousand of these fond Dreams surprise us in our sleep: if our hearts were awake, we would detest them. We have slept enough, it is high time to rise. Carnal fancies are but Bug-bears to hinder us from good works: when we awake, we will count all things loss for Jesus Christ.

But suppose that such sensual souls be possessed with the spirit of slumber, What say you to them that put on a zealous form of godliness, and overunne the common professors more than Ahimaaz did Cushi, till they are quite out of breath: Are these men a-sleep? Yes, too many of them that think themselves waking. You shall have a Pharisee that walks from Church to Church, till he hath heard three Sermons in a day, What? Doth he sleep? Why not? Did you never hear of men that walk in their sleep? They that think the whole duty of a Christian consists in visiting the Temple, and hearing the Preacher, do (in effect) but walk in their sleep. But they can tell you some notes of the Sermon, repeat the Doctrines and Uses to their Family. It may be so, but did you never hear of men that talk in their sleep? If this be all that they learn by those Doctrines, if this be all the use they make of those Uses, only for matter of discourse; they do no more but talk in their sleep. But they can conceive long extemporal prayers in their private houses, and cut out large pieces of devotion: and are they still a-sleep? The Pharisees had their long-winded Orisons; petitions made up tedious with repetitions: yet under the color of long prayers they devoured widows houses: I hope you will not say, These men were awake. As the sensual man falls a-sleep at his prayers, so the Hypocrite doth but pray in his sleep. It is a bastard devotion that is not begotten in the heart: without the heart, all the labor of the lips and lungs, is but a stinking sacrifice. Christ's Spouse acknowledgeth; I sleep, but my heart waketh: the dissembling Professor inverts the words; I wake, but mine heart sleepeth. Add to all this, that such a man is industrious in his calling, he follows his business close, and thrives in this world: Is he yet a-sleep? He may be for all that? Are there none that pull up the clothes about them, and wrap themselves warm in the coverings, even whiles they are fast a-sleep? Even the sleeping man may be sensible of cold, and catch at something to hill him: the scraping together of worldly wealth is no more argument of a man's being awake, than coldness and breathlessness is that he is alive; or the absence of the Sun proveth it to be day. Far is it from my intent to censure those holy actions in any man: Hear that you may learn to pray, and pray that you may hear to learn: Spend the Sabbath in those holy exercises, and woe unto you if you do not. But let me tell you, that if you have a false and unfruitful heart, a dishonest and unconscionable life; for all this hurry and precipitation of outward zeal, you are still fast a-sleep.

Security and expectation are opposites: the servant that looks for his masters coming, is afraid to fall a-sleep. There be four ways to waken men from their slumbers. First, some loud and sudden noise, as the beating up of drummes, or the sound of trumpets; especially the claps of thunder. We hear the rumors of wars on every side: the Bulls of Rome, worse than those Bulls of Basan, bellow and roar against us: How many horns of that seven-headed Beast threaten to goare us? If they once get the power, we too well know their malice. Can none of these noises waken us? If we could be safe at home, yet shall we not pity our distressed brethren beyond the seas, because we are not within the hearing of their groans? Shall we not rather say with Uriah; Is the Ark of the Lord, and Israel, and Judah in danger, and can we sleep in security? The tolling of a bell will waken a man at midnight; especially if it go for a friend. We have heard the fatal knell of that ever to be lamented Palatinate, the dying groan of long afflicted Rochelle, with the expiring gasps of innumerable Christians in other places; and are we still a-sleep? We have heard the honor of those unhappy conquests, given away from God to Idols and Images; and are we still a-sleep? Secondly, if noise will not waken us, me thinks pain should. We have felt the loss of estate, the loss of honor, the loss of our blood, like so many mortal wounds in our sides; and can we still sleep? Ill success abroad, worse distractions at home, the fear of our enemies, the fear of our friends hath touched us: and cannot all this awake us to fear our God? Thirdly, there is yet another way of rousing the sleeper: Pull off the clothes, lay him naked, expose him to the cold, and try what that will do. Disgrace strips us of honor, trouble strips us of peace, bondage strips us of liberty, sickness strips us of health, poverty strips us of wealth, persecution strips us of friends, death strips us of all. Will not some of these, Will not all of these waken us? Fourthly, Well yet there is one thing that will not fail to effect it; even that summons which shall be given at the coming of this day of the Lord: the last trumpe shall raise us. O then let us look up in time, and look for that Day when time shall be no more. It is comfort for a man, when he wakes to see the light. Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light.

2 Hope must not be excluded from this expectation: Evil is the object of fear, and that we suspect: The object of hope is good, and this we expect. None but the gracious can be said to look for this day: Iusti expectant, & expetunt? They love his appearing. They pray for it; Thy Kingdom come. They cry for it, Come Lord Jesus. All this argues their Hope; yea, They have boldness in the day of judgment. We confess with Saint Augustine, Gaudere judicandum qui timmerit judicaturum. What chaste and loving Spouse will not earnestly look for the coming of her Bridegroom? What Princely heir does not long for the day of his Coronation? In Heaven is the perfection of all good things: Fullness is the perfection of measure: Everlastingnesse is the perfection of time: Infiniteness is the perfection of number: Immutability is the perfection of state: Immensity is the perfection of place: Immortality is the perfection of life: God is the perfection of all. We have nothing but what is imperfect below, why then do we not long for that universal perfection above? If we hope for it, we cannot but look for it: and if we look for it, there is some comfort to our conscience that we hope for it. But many are mistaken in their hope The righteous man hath hope in his death. Diverse have hope in morte aliena; they hope for the death of others, that they may get by them: some reversion or legacy runs in their minds: whereof they are not seldom frustrated; for, Dum sperant, expirant. But the good man hath hope in his own death; that death it self, like some more gentle Jailor, shall but unlocke the door of his prison, and set him at everlasting liberty. Simple people cannot discern hope from desire: they think that they hope to be saved; whereas indeed they only desire it, and do not truly hope for it. We may desire many things which we cannot hope for; as to raise the dead; but there is nothing that we hope for, which we may not desire. As diverse have fidem, faith; that have not fiduciam, constancy. So there may be Desiderium, a desire of blessedness; where there is not Spes, a well grounded hope to be blessed.

But the soul that knows herself redeemed by Christ, is never thoroughly contented, till either she returns to Christ, or Christ returns to her. The waters do not more naturally run back to the Sea, nor heavy substances incline to their center, than the pious soul desires to ascend to her Maker. The converted unthrift can never rest, till he returns to his Father. A bladder blown full of wind, and held under the water, will still be rising upwards; because that is not the place of the Air. My soul cleaveth to the Pavement; as some read that of the Psalm. Throw dirte on the pavement, and it sticks there: but cast down a ball, and it rebounds; it comes back again to the thrower. The body is but Earth, and when that is thrown to the Earth, there it remains: but the righteous soul, when it is cast down by humiliation, or dejected by the afflicting hand of God, it still rebounds to him: The spirit returns to him that gave it. Hope then should make us look up, and desire enflame us to look for the coming of Jesus Christ.

3 Patience must not be left out; as we look for the Bridegroom's presence, so the Bridegroom looks for our patience. We are unworthy of his honor, if we cannot endure to tarry his leisure. The nobleness of a Christian is seen in his patience: Magnanimity is patient; like the flint which hath fire in it, but it appears not till it be stricken. How contrary is the opinion of the world, to the judgment of God, concerning valor? They think it consists in a brave revenge: God stateth it in an humble patience. What greater courage can there be, than to suffer? What victory so great, as to conquer a man's self? Our expectation may be charged with too much violence, if it be not qualified, and corrected by patience. The fond Alchemist projects much, and extracts nothing but poverty and shame. Patience is the best Chemist, for out of course Earth she can draw pure gold, out of trouble peace, out of sorrow joy, out of persecution profit, out of affliction comfort, She teacheth the bondman, in a narrow prison to enjoy all liberty. He hath within those strict limits, his galleries, his walks, his orchards: though he be alone, he never wants company: though his diet be penury, his sauce is content: all his miseries cannot make him sick, because they are digested by patience. It makes the poor beggar rich: though he goes for his drink to the Well, for his bread to another's Cupboard, for his garments to the refuse of a cast Wardrobe: yet he looks with as cheerful a countenance, as he that was clothed in Purple, and fared sumptuously every day: Or he that said to his soul, Eate, drink and be merry: for this man had but a purpose to be merry, but the patient man is merry indeed. A superiors unjust frowns are all one to him with his flattering smiles: and causeless aspersions do but rub his glory the brighter. The Iailors that watch him, are but his Pages of honor, and his very Dungeon, but the lower side of the vault of Heaven. He kisseth the wheel that must kill him: and thinks the stairs of the Scaffold of his martyrdom, but so many degrees of his ascent to glory. The tormentors are weary of him, the beholders have pity on him, all men wonder at him: and whiles he seems below all men, below himself, he is above nature. He hath so overcome himself, that nothing can conquer him. As it was said of Demosthenes, that other Lawyers got not so much by their speaking, as he did by holding his peace: so suffering sinners find not so much ease in their complaints and murmures, as the patient man doth by his humble silence. If with such eyes we look for our Lord's coming, we shall Through Faith and Patience, inherit the promises. Jacob thought not his service tedious, because his beloved Rachel was in his eye: the sight of glory future, mitigates the sense of misery present. The best example teacheth us, To run with patience the race that is set before us: As we look for Jesus, so let us look unto Jesus, who for the proposed joy, endured the cross, and despised the shame: and then we shall dwell with him, That sits at the right hand of the Throne of God.

But doth our Apostle write this only for the comfort of the righteous? would he not also (through the use of this expectation) win sinners to repentance? what can sooner break off a servants dissoluteness, than every day looking for his masters presence? Fear and hope are opposites: but in this day, Men's hearts shall fail them for fear, when the powers of Heaven shall be shaken. Shew me the man that says, he doth not fear that terrible day of the Lord. When the Master of the house perisheth, all the Family is troubled: the servants look sad, and all things are out of order. No marvel, if there be such a combustion in the Elements, such a commotion in the Heavens; no marvel, if the stars fall, and the Seas roar; when man, the usufructuary Lord of all these, is brought to his judgment. Though fear and hope have their opposition; yet it is not in diametrical terms, but in terms remiss. There is no hope on Earth, without some fear: no fear in a righteous heart, that is quite destitute of hope. There may be a fear without faith: but who will say, that he hath a faith without all fear? Both may consist in the same subject: the holy heart believeth his salvation with confident trusting: and yet that holy heart Worketh out his salvation with fear and trembling. The ground of our faith is God's infallible promise: the cause of our fear, is our own sinful weakness. Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith? They had some faith, but the best part of it was lost in their fear: the more faith, the less fear: and consequently, the more fear, the less faith. Yet not only may fear and hope consist together, but even fear and joy: The women departed from the Sepulcher with fear and joy. The women who were made supernumerary Apostles, Apostles to the Apostles, the Mothers of the Fathers of the Church, Angels of the Resurrection; they did run, and they ran upon two legs, Fear and Joy. Those joy in the Lord, that fear Him: and they only fear Him, that feel joy in Him. The fear of God and the love of God are inseparable: innumerable are the places, wherein we are called upon, to fear the Lord: and yet the greatest Commandment, which is the root of all, is, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God. He doth neither, that doth not both: he omits neither, that does one. Well therefore may we fear the last Day, when we consider our own desert: yet hope and long for it, when we remember the Covenant in JESUS CHRIST.

Let Unbelievers, and impenitent sinners tremble: let such fear to die, as have no hope to live: let them wish for the shelter of rocks, that have not built upon the Rock of salvation: as the Devils believe and tremble, expecting the full measure of their torment. But if we have made our peace through the blood of Him, that reconciled God and man, and led a life worthy of that noble Privilege; Let us look for that Day with joy, which shall begin our glory. Blasphemers do not look for this Judge; for then they would not offer to swear Him out of his Throne. Worldlings do not look for this breaking of all asunder, for then they would not be busy in scraping all together. Dissolute sinners do not look for this Day, but this Day shall come upon them unlooked for. The Lord of that evil servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not ware of. He that looks for his Masters return, after a long absence, will be sure to have the house in a readiness; cleansed and furnished for his entertainment: they whose consciences lie sluttish, and full of sordid lusts surely do not look for the coming of their Lord: but he is not bound to their times: When they cry, Peace, Peace, then comes that fatal trouble unlooked for. Only the faithful look for Christ: as before his first Comming He was the Expectation of Nations: so until his second Comming He is the Expectation of all good Christians. And this long looked for comes at last; to deliver our eyes from tears, our soul from death, and our feet from falling, that we may walk before God in the light of the living.

Hasting unto] It is not enough to hope that this Day will come toward us, but we must approach towards it. We may pray earnestly, Come Lord, come quickly: yet He will come never the sooner. For He hath appointed the Day wherein He will judge the world: He will come in his own determined time, not when we would have Him. We cannot accelerare Diem, we may accelerare ad Diem: though we cannot hasten it, we may hasten to it. There be certain degrees of Preparation, preceding this Properation. Hasting is in effect the same, that Saint Paul calls Running: Let us run the Race. A man that is down on the ground, must arise, and stand, and be able to go, before he can run. First, a Sinner is laid, and must arise. Up Elias, thou hast a great journey to go: first, he must Up, and then Go, Repentance is the only Angel that raiseth a Sinner: and we may to as much purpose call a dead man out of his grave, as an ungracious soul from sin without repentance. Secondly, when he is risen, let him •y if he can stand. If a Sinner thinks to stand alone: he falls faster than he rose. In •estas, & non stas: he that stands upon his own feet, shall soon feel them double under him. It is because, like children, we will presume to go of ourselves, that we get so many knocks. The same hand that lifted us up, must hold us up: if either God let go us, or we let go Him, down we •opple. But being strengthened by his might, Let us stand. Standing up is a sign that a m•n purposes to be going. It is an erection of body, an elevation of it towards heaven: not creeping upon the earth, but bearing upwards: it is a disposition of motion: be ⟨◊⟩ standeth, hath put himself into a posture of going▪ Thirdly, that is the the next degree: let him try how he can go. He that hath lain long bedrid, and at the first loose sets a running, will soon be out of breath. When we are helped up, and enabled to stand; yet without the same supportation we cannot go. Vphold thou my goings, O Lord, that my footsteps slide not. As an Infant learns to go by the hand of the mother, so we by the manu-tenencie of God. But being thus upholden, let us be going. It is a shame for them to stand still, that have so long a journey and so strong a convoy. Fourthly, when we have learned to go well, let us try to run: the same power will strengthen us in any pace, so long as we keep the way of goodness. Our journey requires hast, let us make as few lets as may be. In many things, the more haste, the worse speed: but he can never speed amiss, that runs the way of God's Commandments. Not seldom we shall stumble; but a trip in the way sets a man somewhat the more forward, if he does not fall. When we do fall, let us remember, that either we have gone out of the way, or neglected our Upholder. It is our prayer, O God make speed to save us, O Lord make haste to help us: And it is God's Charge to us, O man make speed to be helped, make haste to be saved.

Haste makes waste, is a true proverb in the precipitant carriage of businesses: Faire and soft goes far: Not to fast for falling: Stay a little, and we shall have done the sooner. These be the sayings of moderation, to correct the rashness of undertakings. But in spiritual proceedings, Delay is more dangerous than Celerity. If salvation be, we cannot work it out too fast. I speak not for a flashy zeal, that runs upon a line like a fireworke, and ends with a crack: but for an holy and hearty desire to do God all possible service; and to make the best improvement of our time to his honor. This Apostolical charge condemneth two defects in sinful men; The Neglect of Resolution, and the Delay of Inception to be good: it riseth in full strength against those, that neither begin to resolve, nor resolve to begin, the amendment of their lives.

1. The Neglect of Resolution to enter into the way of Righteousness, is the forlorn estate of a sinner? What hope can there be of him, that hath not so much as a purpose to be holy? Sloth hath been reprov'd in the very Market, How much worse is it in the Vineyard? Time is the measure of business, as money is of wares: and what thrifty husband will lose his Market? Yet business in the world, is no better than idleness in the sight of the Lord. As David saith, that he kept silence, though he roared all the day long; or as Jerusalem is said to be a solitary City, though she was then full of people. As the wisdom of the world is foolishness before God: so all carnal negotiation is but a more serious kind of play. Children think themselves very busy, when they are riding upon Reeds, or making of Puppets: men do not think so. What time soever is spent out of the service of God, or our own calling, is but lost in vanity. Idleness it self is damnable; not is it sufficient excuse to say, We do none ill: for it is ill, to do nothing. Thou hast a servant, which neither is Thief, nor Drunkard, nor Swearer, nor taxed with any vice: but because he sits all the day with his hand in his bosom, thou correctest him: Why? What harm hath he done? Thou canst charge him with nothing, but the not doing of something; yet he deserves chastisement. Saint Augustine confesseth, that in his unconverted estate, he returned to God's call, Verba lenta & somnolenta: Anon Lord, Anon. But Lex non dormi•tibus scripta est, say the Lawyers: nor is heaven open to the lazy. Saint Augustine calls idleness vivi homin•s sepulturam.

When thy heavenly Master calls thee, O evil Servant, Why doest thou loiter? Zacchaeus made haste, and ca• down: the Shepherd came with haste, to find the Child Jesus. Today let ⟨ϕ⟩ hear his voice: To day, that is God's note; To morrow, is the voice of the Tempter. Licentious sinners Hodie sibi reservant, & Cràs Deo ⟨ϕ⟩ t•t: they will be their own now, and the Lord's another time. This is truly the Deceitfulness of sin; the persuasion of that pestilent spirit. Da mihi nunc, futurum Deo: mihi aetatis florem, Deo senectutem. But gods today, allows no morrow: and man's Day is not sure of a morrow. Out of a whole piece of cloth we may cut any kind of garment: but when a garment is made of one fashion, it will be hard to translate it into another: either we shall spoil the stuff, or deforme the garb. When we have been long fashioned to this ill-favored World; to reform us to goodness, or to conform us to Christ, is an alteration that requires much difficulty. When we lend money, we call for security; and color the suspicion of our want of trust, with mortality: Men are mortal, we have no lease of our life. But for the matter of conversion, and in the business of our salvation, we promise ourselves Nestor's years; and so live, as if we never looked to die. Some have been called into the vineyard at the eleventh hour: but if God call thee at the third, fail not to come even then, for thou art not sure to live unto the fourth. A snow-ball grows bigger by rolling, and sin multiplies by time. A ship of never so great burden, may be overladen till it sink again. He that shall ascend into the hill of the Lord, Hath not lift up his soul unto vanity: the vulgar reads it, qui non accepit in vanum animam suam; that hath not taken his soul in vain. Surely, he that hath a soul, and doth not use it well, nor seek to save it, hath taken it in vain: as he that buys a garment, and never wears it: or that farms good land, and never tills it. We desire to have all good that belongs unto us: Abraham would have a good son, David a good servant, Jacob a good wife, we would have our beds good, our garments good; not so much as our very beasts, but we would have them good too: and do we not wish to have good souls: If but our shoes be fowl, we will have them made clean; and have we no care to cleanse our souls? Bee not so unkind to thyself, as to esteem thy shoe above thy soul. What earthly business hath the worldling, which he doth not most diligently prosecute? If he be in law, how duly doth he frequent the chamber of his Advocate? If sick, what running is there for the Physician? If he have a hundred things to do, not one of them shall be neglected. His land shall be husbanded, his house highted, his garments brushed; the very hairs of his head pass not untrimmed: he thinks of everything in due place and order: But for his soul, when it comes in his mind: he lays that by till another time For the mending of that, for the cleansing of that, it is the least and last thing he thinks on. No wonder, if that man never come to the end, that hath not so much as attempted to begin. Here is no hast.

2 Delay is dangerous, even when we have resolved. If ever we mean to be good, why not now? There is but one month in the year called May: if some flowers do not spring up then, we look for none afterwards. Purpose and performance are like Jacob and Esau: our good purpose, as Esau, is the first borne: but our good performance, as Jacob; carries away the blessing. The holy soul, like that virtuous woman, doth not only meddle with the distaffe, but She layeth her hands to the spindle. Purpose is but the Distaffe, actual obedience is the Spindle. The raw Flaxe is upon the Distaffe, the spun yarne or thread upon the Spindle. Ask the harlot, the swearer, or the oppressor, if they ever intend to change their lives: yes, one day: O they will do good works apace, when they once fall to it. These put their fingers to the Distaffe, not to the Spindle: they have some raw thoughts of repentance upon the rock; but they do not spin it into thread, not work it into actual obedience. They trust to the good works they mean to do, but who knows when? Mariners in a storm, if they see but one fire upon their sails, look for an unlucky voyage; but if two fires appear to them, they take it for a good Omen, and promise themselves safety. The purpose of amendment is but one fire, and many have had that, who are sunk into the bottomless gulf of Hell: But if the other fire be present, a real conversion to righteousness, prosperous success will not fail to follow, and the end of our voyage shall be salvation. What servant that looks for his Master every hour, will have the house to sweep, the fire to kindle, the bed to make, when he knocks at the door? yet alas, neither are our affections swept by repentance, nor is the fire of charity kindled in our hearts, nor have we prepared the bed of our conscience, though we may well look for our Lord every moment. We are so far from hastening toward this day, that we cannot endure to hear of this days hastening toward us. Kind servants, that love their master, will be ever and anon talking of his coming: this night, say they, he lies in such a city, so many leagues off, tomorrow at night in such a city, nearer; the third night he will be at home: what shall we prepare for his entertainment? How shall we welcome him? Be these our thoughts, or is this our discourse, concerning our Lord's? No but rather falsehood, hypocrisy, contumely, scurrility, blasphemy dwells in our lips, as if we talked of the Devil, not of Christ. When Birds are ready to fly, they spread their wings: if we did make hast toward our Savior, we would dilate our affections, enlarge our desires, and like the Cherubims spread the wings of our souls to be with him. Abraham sate in the door of his tent, when he entertained the Angels: Elijah stood in the door of the Cave, when he had that vision of God: so let us stand in the door of our life, by a continual meditation of death, that we may be ready to entertain our dear Lord JESUS CHRIST.

When we expect the coming of our best beloved friend, we often run to the door, and give many a look out at the window; and not seldom a sigh steals from our hearts, and forceth a sound out of our lips; Oh when will he come? If we did love Christ so well as we ought to do, or but so well as we say we do; we would give more frequent looks towards him: and though our eyes cannot carry up our souls, yet our souls would send up our eyes, to the place where his Honor dwelleth. The Father ran to meet his returning child, and shall not we hasten to meet our returning Father? The cunning Serpent does not at first dash bid us utterly forsake God; but he persuades to delay: what need you make so much hast? God is never to seek; you know where to find him: At what time soever a sinner repents, His mercy is at hand: you may take your pleasure yet a great while: you shall be saved at last, I will warrant you. Hath not that soul a goodly security for her salvation, that hath the Devils warrant? Do not bad debtors, by deferring of payment, grow more unable for the discharge? when a ruinous building is suffered to run into further decay, will it not require the more charges to be repaired? One knotte or two may be soon undone, but when we have tied ten thousand knots upon our souls, by multiplying sin all the days of our life; can we think to untie them all at once in the hour of our death? If we cannot pass over the foord, when the waters are low, how shall we do in a flood? If sin while it is a twigge, be not easily plucked up, how shall we eradicate it when custom hath grown it to a sturdy tree? The coals, the sparks of sin be not lightly quenched; how then shall we put out the flame? There is trouble in curing green wounds, much more old festered sores. Try thy strength in combating with one sin; see if it does not put thee hard to it: thou must pant, and blow, and sweat, and bleed too, ere thou gettest the victory. If it be so hard to wrestle with one devil, how wilt thou encounter a legion? Youth is vigorous and hath nimble feet: old age is resty, and fitter for the couch, than the race. Let us cast away delay, lest it cast us away: and with all present speed make haste toward salvation. If you ask me how you should hasten to this Day?

1 By sending up your hearts to Heaven, as an earnest that you would have your souls there. Let our desires be above, though our bodies are below. The sign that we are risen, is the object we have chosen: there we are, where our delight is; Neither can we go from our hearts, nor will our hearts go from our treasure. Would you know where this object is? First tell me where your joy is. Would you hear where your joy is? Shew me where your mind is. You are young and witty, and your mind is upon that. You are old and wealthy, and your mind is upon that. Are you ambitious, and have your mind set upon honor? Are you effeminate, and have your mind set upon beauty? Are you proud, and pitch your hearts upon envy? Then hears your mind, for here's your treasure; and here's your treasure, for here's your heart; and here's your heart, for here's your joy. You may cry with the Lapwing till you be hoarse; There, There, above: but you are here, even here, below. Heaven is a great way from Earth, and, if you do not make more hast, you will never come there. It is not enough to be righteous, but we must be zealous in righteousness: not enough to do some good works, but we must abound in all good works; and this is to hast to the coming of the Day of the Lord.

2 By soliciting God with our constant devotions; still praying, Thy kingdom come: That Christ may have the consummation of his dignity, by entering into his last office, the office of a Judge; and may have the society of human bodies in Heaven, as well as he had ever of souls: That as he hateth sin it self, so his hatred to sin may be expressed, in the abolishing of all the instruments of sin; the allurements of this world, and the world it self: and all the temporary punishments of sin, the stings of sickness and death: and all the Castles, Prisons and Monuments of sin, in the grave: That time may be swallowed up in Eternity: and Hope swallowed in Possession, and Ends swallowed in Infiniteness: That all men ordained to salvation, may both in body and soul become one entire and everlasting sacrifice to God, he receiving delight from them, and they glory from him, for evermore through Jesus Christ Amen.

Nevertheless, we, according to his promise, look for new Heavens, and a new Earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.

There is no comfort that sticks longer to a man than Hope; none that more unwillingly leaves him: nay it never forsakes, unless it be forsaken. Non ••icit, nisi cùm rejiciatur. And when it is desperately cast of, it leaves us desolate and destitute of all comfort. But for Hope, the heart would break: and when it departs, the heart is broken. Not broken by remorse; a fracture which the hand of mercy hath promised to heal: but broken by despair; such a breach as will not suffer it self ever to be made up again. Our souls are anguished with the sense of our sins: we lie under that unsupportable lode, pa••ing, and groaning, and afflicting ourselves with inconceivable •angs; yet there is hope: A pardon from our offended king revives us, and we• look up with comfort. Our bodies are sick; they languish away in faint sweats, and painful distempers: yet there is Hope. For God hath created both medicines to heal us, and Physicians to apply them: And there is something in the great world to help the little one: something in nature, to relieve man, if they can light upon it. Or if these fail, yet he hath prescribed us another method of Physic: Pray unto the Lord, and he will make thee whole. But go we further: Our friends die, our children die, ourselves die: where is our hope now? yes; death may kill our life, not our hope. Still we hope to find those in Heaven, that have left us upon Earth: and we patiently resign our own bodies to the grave, in the hope of a better resurrection. Still hope cleaves to the Soul, as Ruth to Naomi; Whither so ever thou goest, I will go with thee. When we consider this goodly fabric, the magnificent structure of Heaven and Earth; of so spacious a capacity, and of so specious a form and beauty: it cannot but wonderfully astonish us, to think that this glorious All should be reduced to nothing. If that were so doleful a lamentation, I am seges ubi Troja; corn grows in the streets of Troy. Or if the foresight of Jerusalem's downfall, drew tears from the Son of God: certainly, the thought of the worlds abolition, may justly confound the hearts of the Sons of men.

But blessed be our God, that hath not left us without hope; even the clear hope of a better renovation. This world shall perish, a more perfect one shall succeed. These Heavens, and this Earth shall pass away; but Hope hath comforted us with a restitution. For we look for new Heavens, and a new Earth. Neither have we a groundless or unwarranted expectation of this; but a confident hope; built on so sure a foundation, as the infallible promise of God: According to his promise. Nor shall there be a blended confusion or mixture of good and bad, of order and disorder, of holiness and sin, in this new place: but justitia habitat; Righteousness dwelleth there; only righteousness, and that forever.

Conceive the whole Verse to be one entire building; and therein we have

- 1. The foundation of it; The Promise of God.
- 2. The material parts of it; Heaven and Earth.
- 3. The quality of those parts; They are New: new Heaven, &c.
- 4. The inhabitant that dwells there; Righteousness.
- 5. The hope of it; for it is a reversion, a future inheritance: therefore there is a looking for it: and it is a thing worth our looking after: We look for.
- 6. The heirs that expect it: not all the world; for hell is ordained for some: but we; all those that serve the Lord in all holy conversation and godliness. Before we come to these particulars, I intend to set down certain Theses, grounds, and positions in general; to give the better light to the ensuing discourse.

1. There is a certain infallible end and consummation determined to the world. Aristotle thus scoffed this opinion in his days: I was once afraid, says he, that either tempest or time would overthrow my house: but now I have great cause to fear the ruin of my house, and of myself too: for there be some, that, in words, go about to pull down the world. But to be serious, there is a twofold end, the one of corruption, the other of annihilation. The end of annihilation is, when a thing so loseth its present being, that no part of it, whether matter or form, remains in nature, but as of nothing it was framed, so it is turned into nothing: and such an end the world shall not have. The end of corruption is, when a thing is changed, not simply from a being to a not being, as if it altogether ceased to exist in nature; but into another being, which before it had not. As when fire hath turned wood into ashes, we say there is a corruption of the wood; for it ceaseth to be wood, and is become ashes: But we cannot say, there is an annihilation of it; for there is a substance remaining: and the matter, which was under the form of wood, hath now put on the form of ashes. Of wood corrupted are ashes generated: according to that worn axiom; Corruptio unius generatio alterius: And such an end the world shall have.

2. Creatures, of their natural disposition, infused by God, do not desire their own corruption, much less annihilation: but rather they have a natural love to be, and an innated hatred of destruction. Why else is there such a Sympathy, and Antipathy, even in things destitute of reason? The Lamb, though it never had experience of the Wolves cruelty, yet at the very first sight of him, doth tremble and fly for fear. Scaliger tells us of a tree, that at a man's approaching, draws in her large shoots and branches; and at his departure, spreads them out again; which is therefore called the shame-fac'd tree. But this is not so much shame, as a natural divination of some present or imminent danger, and an uniting of the dispersed forces, for the stronger resistance. That same groaning of the whole creation, and fervent expectation of the creature, must not be understood of any intent it hath to corruption, but to perfection: not being contented with the inherent form, it affecteth a better. As the militant Saints, though they groan under their burden, do not desire to be unclothed, but to be clothed upon, that mortality may be swallowed up of life. Like the child, that cries to put off the old coat; not that it would go naked, but put on a new garment. The basest degree of being, is better than not to be at all. It is perfection therefore, not abolition, which is in the natural appetite of Heaven and Earth.

3. It must be some higher power than nature, that can effect this renovation. For as Nature cannot make something of nothing; so neither can She bring any matter from being to a not being; because She hath a finite and limited power. A natural agent may change a form, whether substantial or accidental; but never work an utter extinction. We may turn a river, we cannot dry up the water. Tyrants may kill the living body of a man, and make it a carcase; they may burn it with fire, and bring it to ashes: and this is as near to nothing, as all their power can possibly reduce it: But let them spend a thousand thousand woods, in the burning of one poor carcase; yet still ashes are ashes; the elements are elements: and they shall never bring this body to nothing. Much less can any natural power annihilate the heavens. Yet an end they shall have; but such a one as man hath: whose body in death is not lost, but changed into the first matter; whose soul is not extinct, but passeth from time to eternity. So the world is uncapable of Annihilation; but shall be changed into a more glorious condition, in the Day of the Lord.

4. Concerning the Incorruptibility of the Heavens, some questions would be moved, and some errors removed. It hath not only been the Tenet of Antiquity, but the observation of all ages, that there is an immutable estate of the heavenly bodies. In the sublunary Region of elementary bodies, we find great variety, and almost a circular alteration: but not so in the Heavens. And if the heavens were capable of corruption, How could the Sphere of the Moon, being situated so near to the Region of Fire, continue so long unconsumed? It is not right to say, that Ob previsum peccatum, by reason of sin foreknowne, the Heavens were made corruptible: for, in propriety of speech, we cannot say so of any creature; much less of the Heavens. And when Job saith, The heavens are not clean in his sight; he does not mean that they were unclean; but that they have not so perfect a cleanness as in God; and what cleanness soever they have, is by the gift, and manutenency of his Providence. As Plato brings in the supreme God telling the inferior ones; that they were corruptibiles per se, and only kept from corruption by Him. The Truth is, that the Heavens are corruptible, for they shall be changed: unless we say, that this change shall be no more, but only the staying of the wheels of the clock; the clock still remaining the same: so there shall be a cessation of motions in the Heavens, the use whereof serves for the generation and corruption of mixed bodies. They shall depart as a scroll that is rolled together, and the host of heaven shall be dissolved; as we shut up a book when we have done reading it. The clear Sum is this; The Heavens are capable of corruption; and they are only kept so long in this constant and unchanged estate, by the same hand of God that shall hereafter change them. They shall wax old as doth a garment; and as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed.

5. There is no impeachment of God's Justice, in this dissolving of the world. It was an old cavil; If God be infinitely good, and the world also good in its nature and degree, why should he destroy it? Shall one Good ruin another? If he destroy that which is good, how shall he continue good himself? If he pull it down, because it is evil, how shall he be free from evil, that made it so? The answer is plain and easy; The world in its original state was good, for all things were very good, so allowed upon the Makers review; but doth it therefore follow, that it is so now? Doth not a man pull down his house, when it is grown rotten and infected, that he may build up a new? But the Heavens were not infected, why should they perish? I answer; who can clearly prove, that the sin of man hath not also infected them? Or if they were granted to be clean, yet they were made for some other end, hereafter to be revealed, and not for themselves. Therefore must they be dissolved, that that end might appear for which they were ordained. An egg-shell is curiously framed, yet to manifest the end for which it was made, it must of necessity be broken. So the present state of this world must be dissolved, that the glorious Kingdom of Heaven may be manifested. This degenerated condition must be done away, that the state of incorruption and immortality may be restored. This world shall have an end then; not of annihilation, but of corruption: not a destructive, but rather a perfective end. The light of the Moon, shall be as the light of the Sun, and the light of the Sun shall be sevenfold, as the light of seven days. Not that this greater light shall emanate from the glorified bodies in Heaven: Nor that it shall be only by the removal of those fogs, clouds and vapors, which formerly did obscure those lights. But certainly, those Luminaries have lost much of that clearness and splendor, which they had in the Creation, and which at the worlds end shall be restored to them. Not that there shall be an augmentation of their heat, with their light: for as Heaven shall have no need of their light; (That City hath no need of the Sun, nor of the Moon to shine in it, for the glory of God doth enlighten it.) So nor Earth of their heat, when there is nothing to be generated by it. This permutation of the world therefore, doth nothing derogate from the Divine Justice.

6. Yea, it is the praise of his mercy and goodness, to place perfection in the stead of imperfection; or for a less perfection, to give us a greater. Heaven and Earth shall pass away, that better may succeed: Perituri, & veterandi sunt; they shall wax old, and perish: Qua formula solam indicant accidentalem permutationem. The use of a garment is wearing; no wearing, no further use. when the number of the Elect is complete; and that there is no need of the Heavens for more generation; they shall be no longer for garment, they may be for ornament. Thus in a familiar phrase of speech, the world is said to perish; as we say, a man is past his Infancy, an old man hath lost his youth: these vanish, but in neither of these did the man himself perish. If the world should be reduced to a Non esse; the Apostle would not have said, Novos caelos, new Heavens, but Alios caelos, other Heavens. But as in the resurrection, men's bodies shall be of the same substance, though of a purer disposition: Or as our imperfect knowledge in the after-world shall be abolished, that a more perfect knowledge of God may take place. So must the Scripture be understood, when it speaks of the worlds destruction: that it shall only suffer a permutation, and the same substance be endued with a more glorious condition. The Stoics glance at the means of this dissolution, concluding the instrument to be fire. They thought that the Stars and the very Skies were fire; and that they had a wasting action upon the inferior Elements: so that their nourishing moisture, by little and little, decaying; when as neither the Air can have power of procreation, nor the Earth receive further refection by the water; there should then remain nothing but fire, to consume all: from whose ashes should arise a new world. This their opinion was something consonant to our Apostles doctrine; saving that they differ in this: The Philosopher ascribes all to a natural necessity, the Apostle to a supernatural destiny; even to the purpose of God at the first, and to the hand of God at the last. Yet this dissolution shall not reach, either to the seat of the blessed souls in Heaven, nor to the dungeon of the damned spirits in Hell: neither the joys of the Saints, nor the torments of the damned, shall be interrupted by it.

These conclusions being laid in general, would not pass without some useful application to ourselves.

1. Let us never repine at any alteration of our being, which shall conduce to our better being. If the world must be dissolved, how shall man escape a dissolution? Location is inseparable to existence: therefore seeing the world, which is man's habitation and mansion-house, must be changed; the principal inhabitant must needs have a joint and fellow-dissolution. The Heavens shall cease, not from being, but from motion. The ordering of things below, the continuance of generation, the propagation of the Species in living creatures; is the end of their motion: this end being ended, there is also an end of their motion. So the labor and trouble of mortal man, shall cease together with this motion of the Heavens. Yea, there is an end put to the travel of the Earth, to the working of the Sea, to the procreation of those elementary, lifeless and under-bodies. Not that we attribute all this only to the quiet rest of the Heavens: For when at the prayer of Joshua, the Sun stood still in Gibeon, and the Moon in the valley of Aialon, and with them the rest of the celestial bodies; there was not a cessation of the natural actions of things below: for even then, the Israelites did fight, and their enemies did fly. But the true cause of all this rest from motion, is the will of the first cause; without whose adjuvant working, the second causes are not only suspended, but disabled to perform their functions. As therefore when the Firmament, and other inferior Spheres together with the Elements, put off these accidents and affections of corruption, fit for the continual generation of natural bodies; they do not then cease to be: but are endued with a far more excellent condition, and receive other qualities fit for that incorruptible estate of the future world: their substance remains, howsoever they alter or better their qualities; whereat nature does not repine, but rather incessantly desire it. So is death to man: it may change him, it cannot destroy him. Nay, that permutation is In melius; as Ambrose speaks of the greater world. We may call both these dissolutions, a perishing: Quia pereunt ab eo quod sunt, dum immutantur in melius. They perish from what they are, by being converted into better.

To die is gain: this is a paradox, which the world will not believe. They think wealth the only gain, and life the only time of this gain: and death, not only a loss of life, but of all things with it. But Death a gain? Let them take this gain, that have a mind to it: as for themselves, they will none of it. This some melancholy and miserable Christian may imagine a profit; who is so weary of his life, that he thinks it an advantage to die. But rich men that are wise enough to refuse no gains, would none of death by their wills. As Gueverra cites one of their Epitaphs.

Death did this rich man kill;

Who lies here against his will.

But what do the Heavens lose by their changing, or men by their dying? Have we not Cedar for mulberry, and for Brick, marble? As it was said of the Temple, so is it true of the world after this destruction, and of man after his dissolution; The glory of the second House shall be much greater than the glory of the first. Death is the Sleep: In the morning, after sleep, the body riseth more fresh and full of vigor, than it was over night when it lay down. Our bodies lie down in weakness, dishonor, mortality: they are raised up again in power, in honor, and to immortality: and, I pray you, What loss can you find in this? But vivere damnum, to live is a loss; a double loss: Privative, because it hinders us from the joy and peace that is in Heaven: Positive, because it subjects us to miseries and judgments, and to, worse than all, sins. But in death there is a privative gain; it frees us from all cares and troubles: and a positive, for it helps us to all joys and comforts. If my Landlord pull down my sere, weather-beaten cottage; and build me up a stately palace for it, I have no cause to complain. Could the Physician turn my foul, crazy, rotten, aged body; into a vigorous and youthful one; in reason, I should rather reward him, than blame him. Death, which is the end of the little world, man; and the last Day, which is the death of that great man, the World; are not works of dissolution, so much as of absolution: The world shall be repolished, man immortalized, and in all God shall be glorified.

2. Seeing that a Dissolution is determined upon the world, and all these lower things are condemned to the Fire; Let us set our affections on things above, not on things below: Let us seek heavenly things. Seek we will certainly, for something; and something there must be for the mind of man to rest upon. If we make this world our Center, that and our hopes must fail together: the Fire shall dispatch them both at once. Therefore it were wisdom for us, to seek for somewhat without the extent of this combustion, and there to repose our hearts. The sum of man's natural desire, is rest and glory: pleasure and riches, safety, health, and liberty, are but subordinate to them, and comprehended under them. Neither of them is to be found here. Not rest; what the Devil sought in envy, and Solomon in vanity, that all men seek in curiosity: Walking through these dry places, they seek rest, but find none. Here we all dwell in Mesek, and meet with nothing but disquietness. They that are tossed in a tempest, how do they long for a good Haven or Harbour of rest? And the more our pilgrimage is prolonged, the more we seek this rest, find it how we may. But now the Heavens move; they have no rest: the Earth fructifies; she hath no rest: the Waters, Winds, Clouds, and all work; they have no rest. Man least of all: no rest is allowed him, below. Let us not think to set up our rest here, in this tumultuous throng of troubles. Where envying and strife is, there is confusion, and every evil work. Upon this Wheel ever whirling about, we are no sooner set down, but some trouble or other rouseth us with a Surgite; Non habemus hîc requiem: Here we cannot have it; This is not our rest.

Nor glory: we love rest well enough; yet for glory we are content to disquiet ourselves. How many enter themselves into a restless course of life, for a little puff of honor; which the Princes breath blows up, and the people's breath blows away? This is not to be here, Loco pulicum & culicum: In the garden of our delight we find Wormes; and Spiders even in Kings Palaces: This is the Orbe of Wormes and Spiders; and can we find glory in dust and cobwebs? Yet if two such things, as Rest and Glory, might be had upon Earth; they can never be had together. The most honorable places afford not the quietest lives: and they that live in most quiet, are least glorious. Mortall rest is a thing inglorious, and secular glory a thing restless. Some men are of Issachars mind; Rest is good, though it be between a pair of panniers: They bow their shoulders to bear, and become servants to tribute. If we would live unmolested, we must live ungraced; more for ease, than for honor. For reputation, like that Strumpet in the Proverbs, is always gadding abroad, and meets with none but the stirring. But if we will be famous men, of place and credit, then farewell rest. The Fane is advanced above the house, but the wind will not let it be in quiet. The obscure man's door may stand safely open, but the Noble man's gate gets many a knock.

Well, though these are not to be had here, they are to be had somewhere; even both of them, and both together, and that forever. For rest; O that I had wings like a Dove, then would I flee away, and be at rest. In Christ there is rest: and that not only for the body, which sleep may seem to afford; but you shall find rest unto your souls. The rest of the soul is the very life and soul of rest. The soul is from above, and above is this rest, and there only to be found. Return unto thy rest, O my soul: Where is that? In the land of the living. I, there, there's the joy of it. Would it not grieve a man, that hath toiled and turmoiled out his whole life in this world, at his dissolution, when he looks for rest, to hear the Lord swear, Non introibit in requiem meam: that he shall not enter into my rest? How unhappily have they spent their labors, that at the end of these temporary pains, must begin everlasting pains? And for their working without thanks, be rewarded with working without ease, where there is no rest day nor night? But it is blessedness and comfort, to be called from our holy labors, to enter into God's rest: for that is rest indeed. Glory also is his, and He gives it only, there. It is but folly to be ambitious of it below: it were to seek fresh water in the midst of the sea: or as the Angels said to the women; Why seek ye the living amongst the dead? After two years, Felix is gone, Festus succeeds: the wheel turns, places are changed: such is the case of all secular glory. Princes and Nobles are but great during their life, or at most the worlds life: then all those Titles and distinctions cease. Thus then for the rest and glory of Earth: either we seek and not find them; or find one separated from the other; or if both together, yet soon we lose them again: they are gone in a trice. But to them that by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, and honor and immortality, shall be eternal life. Only in Heaven let us seek them; there we shall be sure to find them, and to find them both together; and have good assurance to hold them both, and that unchangeably forever.

Nevertheless, we, according to his Promise] Of which, first, the material parts, the Heavens and Earth; next the quality of them, which is Novitas, or rather Renovatio; they are New: and then the manner or method of this Renovation, which is a purgation by Fire: Of these having formerly treated, I will now only give you the sum: and that for our plainer proceeding, by the resolving of of certain doubts or questions.

1 That the Apostle only mentions heaven and earth in this dissolution, or renovation, without those media Elementa, it is no otherwise than Moses in the creation; In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. But the first question is, why the heavens should be purged, that never were corrupted. The Angels sinned in the highest Heaven, the glorious Court of the Deity: yet this was never threatened, nor ever shall be punished with an Innovation. We answer, that the same reason holds not. First, because their abode in heaven was but short: Non steterunt in veritate: They abode not in the truth. And as they fell presently into sin, so they were presently cast out of heaven. But Man, and his sin continued long in the World: so that this infection did soke into the grain of nature, and stained it quite thorough; and that so ••ulely, that nothing can get it out but Fire. Secondly, that Heaven was the Presence-chamber of the omnipotent and most holy King; and his infinite Goodness was of force to keep the room from any contagion, which the sin of those ambitious spirits could br••he into it. For if in nature, these be antidotes and preservatives, to keep $\langle \diamond \rangle$ house or man from pestilent infection: much more could the immense Goodness of God preclude all access of contamination from his own dwelling. But the divine Majesty did not dwell in this world so presentially; nor was He pleased to exercise his Grace so powerfully and extensively to us: so that the world was defiled by man's transgression, and therefore must undergo this final Repurgation.

So there be some that exempt these Elements which have permission with other bodies and qualities, from this necessary Restauration: as the Fire under the Sphere of the Moon, and the Air in his highest Region. But in vain doth man dispute for the unnecessarinesse of that, which God hath decreed: whose Decree only doth make a thing necessary. Whether compound o• simple, whether Heaven or the Elements, the Maker and Owner of them all, hath determined them to a final Renovation.

2. There is a wondrous mutiny amongst Popish Writers, the Soldiers of error, What should become of those Infants that die without Baptism, at the last Day: Where should they dwell? They are incapable (say they) of Heaven, by reason of original sin: and they have not deserved Hell, because they were never guilty of actual: What then shall become of them? Whither should they go? Lord, what a puzzling thing is error; and how many absurdities may be built upon the foundation of a false principle? Whether should they go? Let me ask them, Where are they now? If they can demonstrate to me, where they are for the present, I can certify them whether they shall go at the last. There they shall be then, in the same place wheresoever they are now. They point me to a Limbo Infantum: but where is that Limbo? Catharinus, Pighius, and divers other promise those unbaptized Children, a certain natural blessedness, and a pleasant abode in some Paradise: that they shall have knowledge of God, and of separated substances, and the Revelation of Angels. Bellarmino is as hot on the other side, and reproves Catharinus for such an opinion: Affirming them to be the Children of wrath, forsaken of God, under the power of the devil; and that then there shall be but one place of punishment: they that are not in Heaven, must be in Hell. Thus Bellarminus against Catharinus: Salmeron and Pineda differ from them both: Who will have them to be in the same state, that man was in puris naturalibus; yet not free from all Satan's molestations. Some say, this privilege shall not be to them at all: Others, that it shall be, but they know not where; and others allow it, but they cannot tell how. For if the Elements should be reduced to their first order; then Omnia pontus erat; The Waters covered the Earth, as being the lighter Element: and were restrained by God's immediate Hand, for the conveniency of man's habitation. Now if those Waters shall return to their first place, Where shall be their Paradise for those unchristen'd Infants? Pineda so expoundeth Job: He hath compassed the Waters with bounds, until the day and night come to an end: and concludeth, that after this vicissitude of day and night, when time shall be no more, Antiquum locum obtinent, they shall return to their first being. What then? Shall their Paradise be under Water? That were a drowned conceit. Shall it be in the Orbe of the Moon? Or must the man in the Moon resign his place, and in his stead, there be shall children in Moon? These be the fancies of Moonesicke brains. The truth is plain, and needs no evasions or starting holes. Why may not the Children of Christians, being within the Covenant, though they die without the seal of the Covenant, be admitted through the blood of the Covenant, into the place promised by the Covenant, the Kingdom of Heaven? What should be against it, when the Scripture is for it? I will establish my Covenant thee and thee, and thy seed after thee and I will be a God unto thee, and to thy seed of hence. Who shall hinder them, whom Christ will receive? Suffer these little ones to come to Him, and forbid not. In truth; neither is there to be any third place, all men shall perish in Hell for their sins, that are saved in Heaven by the merits of JESUS CHRIST.

3. To what end shall these new Heavens and Earth serve in the next world? What use shall be of them? The answer must be partly negative, and partly affirmative. Negatively; the Sun and Moon shall not serve for times and seasons; to distinguish days, months and years; for then there shall be neither winter nor summer: Time it self shall be no more. Nor by their motions and influences to cause a fructifying power in the earth: for then there are no creatures for whose use the Earth should being forth: The Sun shall not come as a bridegroom out of his chamber, nor rejoice as a Giant to reverse his course: His circuit shall no more be from one end of Heaven to the other. But rather it shall be as in the days of Ioshau, when The Sun stood still in Gihean, and the Moon in the Valley of Aialon: there shall be an everlasting Sol. Nor shall they serve to give light to the world, for then there shall be no darkness at all. Not that their light shall be diminished, much less extinguished; but septupled and multiplied. The Sun may be left without heat and motion, because these qualities tend to generation; yet still the light may continue: Many things are lightsome, that give no heat, as the glistening and shining precious stones: Nor shall the earth labor of fruits in her pregnant womb, waiting for the heat of the Sun, and moisture from the Clouds, her old midwives to deliver her of her burdens. The ministry and service of all things, such as it is now, shall cease: It shall be a time of rest, the great year of universal jubilee to all creatures. Neither yet shall the new Earth be without inhabitants. Bellarmino's conceit, that it shall be operta aquis, covered with the waters, and so unfit for habitation, may easily be refuted. First, The first Heavens and first Earth are passed away; and there was no more Sea. If we take this literally, there shall be no more Sea; much less shall all be one universal Sea. Secondly, Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the Earth. This promise is not performed here, therefore we look to have it fulfilled hereafter. Thirdly, The state of all things shall then be most perfect: not confused and mingled together, as it was in the first act of the creation: when the Earth was without form and void, darkness upon the face of the deep, and the deep covering the face of the Earth; until God made a distinction and separation of things, reducing all to order, beauty and harmony; which harmony and beauty shall be restored at the great day, and blessed with an unchangeable perfection.

Nor yet shall the Saints so inhabit the earth, as to live in terrene delights; eating, drinking and sporting after the old manner. This was the heresy of Cerinthus, and the dream of the carnal Jews concerning a terrestrial Paradise: and the damnable doctrine of that juggling prophet Mahomet. For in the Turkish Histories, we read of one Alahodinas, the founder of the Assassins; who with this strange imposture got many adherents, and made them the instruments of his bloody designs. He provided a garden most pleasantly situated; so secure, that there could be no looking over the sense. This abounded with all earthly delicacies; curious music, beauteous women, sumptuous cheare, delicious wines, fruits, junkets, and whatsoever might content a sensual appetite. By an intoxicating drink he would cast them into a dead sleep, whom he meant to practice on: in which sleep he conveyed them to his garden: where waking, they found themselves encompassed with variety of pleasures. Having there solaced themselves a while, by the help of the same drink, he reported them to their former place: and these at their next waking, would give out with noise and confidence, that they had been in Paradise. But corruptible pleasure is not for an incorruptible place. The eye hath not seen, nor the ear heard, nor can any heart of flesh comprehend those delights which are given to the Saints and Angels. Our joys here, are mere toys and vanities, in regard of those that are laid up for us, in this new World, the blessed Kingdom of JESUS CHRIST.

Thus negatively; now for the affirmative part of the question: To what end shall they serve then? If not for these purposes, yet for some other, sure. What are those? First, it is for the glory of God, that they should remain. Praise the Lord, ye Heavens: that cannot praise him, that hath no being. But how should they praise him? Man is occasioned to praise God, by the Heavens, and for the Heavens. Not only now, but even then also: The Heavens shall declare the glory of God, and the Firmament show his handy work. The clear and perspicuous light of this new world, the perfect harmony, the glorious beauty, the wonderful contexture of Heaven and Earth, shall present us with continual occasion to magnify the Creator of all. This is one end; and that were enough: there can be no higher, no greater, than the glory of God. All ends are swallowed up in this, as all rivers run into the Sea. Secondly, the other end is for the use of man; not such an use as we have now: but as there is a new world, so a new use of that world. The first Heavens and the first Earth are passed away: and the first use of them is gone with them. Heaven and Earth shall be the seat of the blessed: not only Heaven; for that is granted. All that we stick at, is the Earth: How should the Earth be the habitation of the righteous? In the state of this question, I determine not: I speak nothing definitively, but by way of probability; and, I think, I have good reasons to prove what I say.

1. From the Text it self: Saint Peter speaks of both Heaven and Earth, and affirmeth that in them both dwelleth righteousness. What is this righteousness? It is a gracious quality: and every quality must have some subject to inhere in. This cannot be the matter of the Earth: for what righteousness can an insensible subject be capable of? We do not say, there is justice in Plants, or holiness in stones, or religion in Beasts. And for the righteousness of God; that indeed filleth all places, but properly dwelleth in himself. Therefore by righteousness, we understand the righteous: On Earth shall the righteous dwell, and in them dwelleth righteousness.

2. We may collect it from that promise of our Savior: Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the Earth. They do not now inherit it: they, of all men, have the lest share in it. If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we, of all men, are the most miserable. Nimrods, and tyrants, and oppressors, men of rapine and violence; these now divide the Earth amongst them. Whereas men of a meek spirit are thrust Sedibus, aedibus, out of house and home. Innumerable are the places, where the godly are called Strangers, and Pilgrimes upon Earth: therefore they can have no inheritance there. Pilgrimage and Inheritance, are far different things. The meek have it not here, therefore they must have it hereafter; or how can they inherit the Earth? This old earth is a place for usurpers, and roarers, and those sons of violence; there is nothing but noise and disturbance in it. What Earth then should the meek inherit? Sure it must be mansuetorum terra: this is not to be found here, therefore to be expected hereafter. Besides, Christ ascribes Blessedness to the heirs of the Earth: but millions have fair inheritances upon this corrupt Earth, that are far from blessedness. Some have whole countreies, large continents, yea, many kingdoms, yet without blessedness. How vast dominions hath the Turk, yet (I am sure, you will say that) he is not blessed. It must be the habitation of a new Earth, that affords blessedness: therefore this new Earth shall be inherited by the righteous.

3. As the Elements had corruptible qualities, fit for the generation of corruptible bodies: so, then, they shall be made answerable to the state of incorruption. But what needs this renovation and concord of the Elements, if the bodies of the Saints should not converse where this new Earth and Elements are? It is true that now Heaven is the receptacle of blessed souls; where Christ sits in his Throne: yet this hinders not, but that both the new Heavens and Earth may be the habitation of the Saints, after this life. Why may there not be such an intercourse between Heaven and Earth then, as hath been before? The Angels did often come from Heaven, and appear in human bodies upon the Earth. In the next world, the Elect shall be Sicut Angeli, as the Angels of God: even their bodies shall be made Spiritual: and by the supernatural property of a glorified body, may ascend and descend at their pleasure. Moses and Elias came down from Heaven, to talk with Christ on the mount. Our Savior himself, after his resurrection, was conversant with his Apostles upon the Earth 40. days. Why may there not still be such an intercourse between the circumference and the center, betwixt Heaven and Earth?

4. Further yet; The Saints shall be ever with the Lord, wheresoever He is. They shall follow the Lamb whither so ever He goeth. Now Christ is not bounded in Heaven: He hath liberty to go where he pleaseth; and certainly the Saints will wait upon him, with incomparably more diligence, than ever Courtiers did attend their King. The glorious presence of God can make a Heaven upon Earth: and wheresoever the Lamb is, the place is blessed, and all blessed with him.

5. Lastly, it is but reason, that God should be there glorified, where he was dishonored. The Earth was witness of the offenses done against him; let this new Earth bear witness of the praises given unto him. Besides this, all the combats and conflicts of the Saints were upon the Earth: therefore even there also let them wear their crowns. On Earth they were persecuted; give them leave in the same place to triumph. Here they suffered; here also let them be solaced: that the memory of their passed sorrows, may be an accidental variation of their infinite and essential joys. When they shall thus revolve with themselves; Here we were derided, there oppressed: in this place wounded, in that martyred. Now those old Monuments of our pains, shall turn to Trophies of joy And that Earth, which was the land of the dead, is become Terra viventium, the land of the living. How spacious shall be the Kingdom of the Saints, when Heaven and Earth is within their dition.

But it is not safe wading without a bottom: this is one of those secrets, which shall be revealed, when this old world is dissolved. How the Elect shall be disposed of; whither wholly to Heaven, or sometimes to Heaven, sometimes to Earth, at their own choice; or how otherwise it pleaseth God to place them, is a great mystery not yet opened unto us. But that the Saints shall have the liberty of coming to the Earth, seems very probable by good reason, gathered from the Scripture. And this is enough for us to believe, concerning this point. That there shall be new Heavens, and a new Earth, prepared for the righteous; and that GOD shall have a glorious Church, the new Jerusalem, both in Heaven and Earth; for in them both dwelleth Righteousness. Wheresoever God's glorified Children shall be, they shall never want the beatifical vision, the fullness of Joy, the brightness of Glory, the eternity of Peace, the society of Saints and Angels, and the blessed fruition of Jesus Christ.

4. The last question is, what Creatures shall be restored in the next World. In the clearest likelihood, though thereof we can deliver no certainty, no living creatures shall be restored, but only men. That the unreasonable creatures, as Beasts, Fishes, Fowls, shall cease, there be probable reasons.

Non sunt ad immortalitatem condita; as the rest, which shall remain, were: such are the Heavens, Earth, Sun and Moon. Neither yet were these later made by their constitution, apt to immortality: howsoever some Schoolmen have thought so, because they are a simple body, without qualities one repugnant to another. But immortality is the frank gift of God, and dependeth not à vi naturae: for naturally, as they had a beginning, so they must have an end. In the purpose of God, those creatures that shall remain, were created to immortality, so were not the Beasts.

Those Creatures only, besides Man, shall be restored with Man, which immediately pass from their corruptible estate, into the glorious Liberty of the Sons of GOD. But the unreasonable Creatures, after they are dissolved, do not enter into Glory: nay, they fall into corruption; their Life and Spirit is extinguished with them. But the Heavens and Earth, in the same instant, shall both be freed from corruption, and receive a glorious liberty. And herein appears the Divine equity: The Heavens and Earth, for Mans cause, were subdued to vanity, almost from the beginning of the World, to the end. The other Creatures are but a while under this servitude of corruption: their time in the World is but short; and they are renewed and multiplied by continual Generation. Therefore it is just, that they who stood the whole term of Bondage, should at last be restored to Liberty: whereas they that for a time only suffered, vanish with time into nothing.

If the unreasonable Creatures should be restored, then either the same that were before; (as the same individual bodies of Men shall rise again) or some other of the same kind newly Created. But not the former; for the parts of those Creatures die with them. Were it not absurd to think, that there shall be a Resurrection of Beasts; as if Balaam's Ass, or Job's Oxen should rise again? Nor of the second; for in that day there shall be no new Creation. Acts 3.21. It is a time of Restitution, not of Creation.

No kind of Creatures shall remain, Nisi opus aliquod habiturae sint, unless they have something to do: For it is against nature, to constitute anything, Quod omnino sit otiosum. It is a trite axiom, that without necessity, we must not imagine a plurality in nature; for she abhorreth vanity. These irrational Creatures now serve for the profit or pleasure of Man: There shall be no such use of them, then; therefore, by consequence, no such Creatures. But in this point I confess, with the Master of the Sentences: Se nescire, quod in sacris Scripturis se non meminert legisse. Doubtless, nothing shall be wanting, which may conduce to the perfecting of our joy in JESUS CHRIST.

For application of all: Seeing there shall be a new Earth and Heavens; why do not we become new, that hope to dwell in them? As we do not Put new wine into old bottles, Grace into corruption: so neither will God admit old Tennants into this new World, corruption into Glory. If he therefore will pull down Veterem mundum, the old World: shall not we mortify, destroy, and pull down Veterem hominem, the old Man? We must put off the old Man, before we enter into that new Jerusalem. We have heard how the Heavens and Earth shall become new; by way of Purgation: the same must be our way too. There is a way of purging the body, by letting it blood. So that corrupt blood, with which the ill diet of wickedness hath filled the veins of the Soul, must be let out. Hebrews. 4.12. The Word of GOD, is that sacrificeing knife, which opens the Veine where this ill blood lies. The hearts of those Jews were fowl, subject to the Pleurisy of presumption, till Acts 2.37. Peter pricked them: that punction cured them. There is a Veine of Covetousness in thee: humbly desire GOD to open that Veine, though by the knife of Poverty; rather be content to lose thy wealth, than thy Soul. So could that Heathen conclude, when he was put to the choice: I had rather that poor Aristippus should lose his Wealth, than that rich Aristippus should loose his Life. Or indeed, save God the labor, and let thyself blood of thy redundant riches, by a charitable beneficence. Cast away thy superfluties, thy health will be the better for it. Hast thou a vein of pride? Breath it out by humiliation. What sinful affection soever hath distempered thy Soul; do not launce thy flesh, like a superstitious Priest of Baal; but rent thy heart, like a penitent Servant of Christ. If the Heavens cannot be made new without a purging, much less shall we enter into those Heavens, but by a gracious renovation.

This is principally the work of God upon us; even of the whole Trinity. The Father purgeth the branches of the Vine: the Son washeth all those that have part in him: The Holy Ghost reneweth us by regeneration. Yet doth not God so minister all the ingredients, that he leaves no Dos for ourselves to put in. Lord, do thou Purge me with Hyssop, and I shall be clean: wash me and I shall be whiter than snow. So also man, purge thyself: Wash thy heart from iniquity, that thou mayest be saved. And everyone that hath this hope, Purifieth himself, even as He is pure. What be our ingredients, and where shall we find them? The Apothecaries shoppe, is the storehouse of Grace; the Physicians prescript, is the word of grace. There the good Samaritan hath both oil and wine: wine to search, and oil to supple: One handful of the Law to humble us, and another of the Gospel to revive us. Let Moses cast thee down, that Jesus may raise thee up. Physicians to swellings in the body, first apply fomentations, then cataplasms: the former gentle and lenitive, the other, purging and sanative. Eli put in too much oil, not wine enough; Do no more so my Sons. James and John put in too much wine, not oil enough; when they would have commandes fire from Heaven upon the Samaritans. Thunder without Rain, is a sign of much wind: they that only thunder judgments, and never shower down mercies, are but windy Preachers. You never found us so doing, to build judgment on the ruins of mercy. Neithey yet dare we handle your so gently, as not to be felt. For whiles we are no further than in your dead flesh, you can be quiet: but if we once touch the quick, we shall quickly hear of it. If I might teach you to make a spiritual purge, it should be after this manner.

Take a bundle of Time, the consideration of the shortness of thy life: a scruple of the Law, to correct thy proud humor: a dram of the Gospel, for a cordial to thy fainting spirits: Take Humility, Temperance, Patience, of each a like quantity: Put in a great deal of Charity: and that Simple which is the carrier of all the rest, Faith; without which no Physic will work. Mingle all these in the liquor of thy own tears: be sure to steep them in repentance; That is a constant ingredient in all our compositions: no recipe, with us, without a resipisce: There is no Bill, that hath not this in it, to which we dare underwrite a Fiat Potio. After this cleansing, the Patient must keep a good diet; of holiness and obedience: otherwise he will relapse into the same sickness by a misordered life. He must keep himself unspotted of the world. But you will say; Heaven and Earth shall be purged with fire: why are not we put to such a purgation? We are, doubtless, not seldom. Therefore Think it not strange concerning the fiery trial: Think it not strange; for it is an usual custom with GOD to bring his Children this way to Heaven. It is a fore trial; yet better this fire to purge us, than Hell fire to burn us. Any way to Christ, how sharp soever: Let me besaved, although it be through Fire.

To conclude; we look for a new Earth, and new Heavens; and those new Heavens and Earth look for new creatures. All men are greedy of news: Concerning, news abroad, or news at home, is the universal question. Scarcely, two of acquaintance meet; but after salutation, and a little complement, the next word is, What news? Loe, my whole argument hath been of news; of new Heavens, of a new Earth, of a new World, and of new things in that world: from the first to the last, here hath been nothing but news. But there is yet one news wanting; our being made new creatures in Christ: What joy would it be for us to report, and for Heaven and Earth to hear this news; That we had left our old ways, our old works, our old customs and sins, and were become new men; new borne to that new World, wherein are those new delights forever.

According to his Promise] This is the foundation of the building. The foundation of our faith, the foundation of our hope, the foundation of our patience, the foundation of all our comfort, is the Promise of God.

1. But where shall we find this Promise? What Evidence, what Record can we show for it? Hugo and Catharinus cite for it; Revel. 21. I saw a new Heaven, and a new earth. But our Apostle could not well have relation to that testimony: for in all likelihood, Peters Epistle was written before John's Revelation. He speaks of a Promise which they then had, not of a future one which they hope to receive. and in nature, a Promise must go before the expectation of it. Thomas Anglicus refers us to Luk. 22.29. I appoint unto you a Kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me. There is a Promise indeed; and an effectual one, and that of a kingdom: but there is no mention of the place. Christ's glorious Kingdom is in the highest Heavens; But what is this to the Renovation of Heaven and Earth? Some clearer testimony therefore must be found out; and that we may do without much difficulty. Isaiah 65.17. Behold, I create new Heavens and a new Earth, and the former shall not be remembered. This is to purpose; What can be plainer? Neither does He speak of a future act, but de presenti; not I will create; but I do create; for the more certainty of it, as if He were now doing it. This is Promise and assurance enough, that He will do. Nor is this promise single: though one word from the mouth of God be sufficient: But Once hath God spoken; twice have I heard it: So that if it be not ex ore duorum, yet ex ore uno bis prolatum. As the new Heavens, and the new Earth which I will make, shall remain before me, so shall your seed and your name remain. The reason is drawn from the certainty: I will as surely save you, as I will make a new Heaven and Earth wherein you shall be saved. We may add that, Isaiah 64.4. I am not ignorant, that divers interpreters understand by all these places, that restitution of things which the first coming of Christ should bring with it. Old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new. And I make all things new. As if it were only meant, that there should be a new face and form of the Church: and to this purpose (they farther allege) Paul quotes that of Isaiah 64.4. in his 1 Cor. 2.9. Eye hath not seen, &c. But by their leaves, this exposition takes it off from the literal sense, and turns it into a mystery: Nor yet doth this applying it to the time of grace, hinder the referring of it also to the day of glory. So the Fathers understand that of Isaiah, concerning the beatifical vision; and those other places literally, of a new Heaven and Earth, and the Church triumphant in them. And indeed, if we make all this no Promise, Where shall we find it? Unless we shall add that Psalms. 102.26. They shall all wax old as a garment; but thou art the same. The Maker is unchangeable, but these shall be changed: now this mutation shall not be impejus, certainly.

2. This Promise then we have: the Prophet delivers it, the Apostle repeats it, we believe it, and Saint John in a vision sees it; I saw the new Jerusalem. The Heavens and the Earth, and the Elements between them, shall be restored into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. What the form and fashion of those new Heavens and Earth shall be, as it is not expressed, so it were curiosity for us to inquire. But that the Heavens and Earth shall be new, of this the Scripture makes us certain. It may be expressed by this similitude: As a Nurse that brings up a Kings son, is made Partaker of his preferment when that Prince comes to his kingdom. So the Heavens and Earth are now our Nurses, contributing their virtues to our preservation, and cherishing us with their best indulgence: therefore it is fit, that when Christ shall advance us to our glory, they should also be made glorious with us. When God was about to make man, he provided an excellent dwelling for him; a beautiful roof, and a fruitful pavement: so when he is pleased to remove man from this lower tenement, into an everlasting mansion: he will make a new Heaven, and a new Earth for him: and this is his Promise.

3. The foundation of our Faith, is the Promise of God: without a promise there can be no Faith. Orationis fundamentum & basis est fides, fidei fundamentum est Dei promissio. Man hath diverse ways or means of apprehending things. That which I know by sense, is my knowledge: that which I know by argument is my reason: that which I know by proof and trial, is my experience: that which I know by authority, is my Faith. The Sun shines, and I see it: I am pained with grief, and I feel it; this I know by my sense. The pillars of an house uphold it; take away those pillars, and it will fall: this I know by my reason. In my sickness or bodily distempers, I have found such and such things comfortable to me, and available to my recovery: therefore I conclude, they are good for me: this I know by experience. In my wantonness I have often flien out and sinned: affliction hath humbled me, and brought me home again by repentance: therefore experience makes me know, that it is good for me that I was afflicted. God hath promised eternal life to all them that are in Jesus Christ: this I know by authority, and it is my faith.

Now this faith is either Divine or Humane. The object of Divine faith is the Promise and Word of God only: the object of human faith is the report of men. That Saint Peter was at Rome, and Bishop there, is not God's Word; therefore it does not bind my Divine faith. Yet see the wonder! Upon this supposed foundarion all Popery depends. For thereby the Pope challengeth to be his right Successor; and under that title, obligeth men upon pain of damnation, to believe and obey whatsoever he decrees. Thus the authority of Popish faith is only tradition, the report of men, and not the Word of God. Hence it comes that they have so much of their own stuff, and so little of Christ's: Five Ave-maries, for one Pater-noster; more of our Ladies Psalter, than of our Lord's. So they have seven Sacraments, whereas Christ ordained but two. As a grave Divine, expounding that miracle of these seven loaves, and two fishes, wherewith Christ fed so many thousands; and finding some of the Pontifician writers, by a stranger kind of miracle to turn them into their seven Sacraments; and so to make a flourish as if they had gotten Scripture for it: wittily observed; that there was indeed some proportion or resemblance between them. For saith he, here be seven things in all; five loaves, and two fishes: Two of them were of God's making, the two fishes; and the other five of man's making, the five loaves. So two of their seven Sacraments, Baptism and the holy Supper, are of Christ's institution; but the other five of man's invention. But other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. His Word is that we build upon: his Promise is the rock whereon we fixe the trust of our hearts, the life of our hope, and the dear salvation of our souls. To make this useful to us.

First, if God hath spoken it, this binds us all to believe it: Shall we call in question the truth of God, the God of Truth? Heaven and Earth shall fail, that his Word may stand: Heaven and Earth shall be restored, that his Word may not be infringed. Believe God's Word, who doth no: You may speak this to Gentiles; but God is well known in Jury, and his Name a gr•• in Israel. But here is the misery of it; our hands give our tongues the lie. We say, we believe; and it may be, we believe what we say: But may we not be deceived in both? Faith is a thing not seen, and Faith is of things not seen: yet there is a Faith that may be seen: invisible in it self, visible in the fruits it produceth. In the City of our God, as we have heard, so have we seen. We have not only heard the profession of Faith, but seen the works of it. Faith is a spark, and a deluge of lusts may drown it. There is an historical Faith, which believes that there shall be new Heavens and Earth: but this comes short of true blessedness: And there is Fides salvifica, that believes our own part in that new glory: that we shall have a dwelling in those Heavens, prepared for us by Jesus Christ: and this is the Faith that shall do us good. It was small comfort for the old world to see Noah's Ark a building, whiles themselves had no hope of preservation in it. But Noah believed that it was built for his safety; and rejoiced. The want of our Faith shall not disannul or frustrate the Promise of God, nor make his Word of none effect: That shall stand, though we perish. Lord, thou wilt make this new World for us, make us new for it: that we in it, and thou by us may be glorified for evermore.

Next, let us always bear in mind the Promises of God: much good comfort is lost for want of memory. The troubles of a Christian heart be very great, for number, variety, and bitterness: only there is one Ingredient that sweetens them all; the Promise of God. I will be with thee in trouble; and Thou shalt not be tempted above thy strength: If we could but remember these Promises, when we feel such assaults or pangs, How could we want courage? Why should we fear poverty, the loss of a little rubbish; or death, the breaking of a brittle glass; that have God's infallible Promise, both for a new World and a new Life in that World, never to be taken from us? The memory is Aerarium animae, the souls Exchequer or Treasury, the safest hold in her Citadel. All the Promises of God are Jewels, more precious than Gold or Rubies: Where should those Jewels be stored up, but in this Cabinet, the memory? This place is not built of Brasse, but frail and brittle. Of all faculties in man it does first senescere, wax old: Beauty, which is but a flower, doth often outlast it. Of all powers in man, it is least at command: a man may be the Master of his Invention, of his elocution: but who could ever boast himself to be the Master of his memory, or promise himself that that should not fail? There is a Thief still lurking at the door of this Treasury: even he that robbed us of our first estate, the innocence of nature; and would also filch away our second, the happiness of Grace. Therefore look well to thy memory; keep that Closet full of the divine Promises: that in all thy spiritual distempers, thou mayest have a Cordial ready to revive thy fainting heart. But alas, our memory is more apt to lose, than to gain: there is both land and sea in it: the losing part, that's the sea: the keeping part is the land. Many hear the word, as a Tankard-bearer fetches water from the Conduit: all the way he hath it, carries it, feel• it: but at last he empties it into another's Ci•terne, and is never the better for it. We are ha•rowed with oppressions, hurried with persecutions; our estate is taken from us, death dissolves us: yet what can dishearten us, if we affie this Promise, that a new Heaven, new Earth, a new Life, and new Glory shall be provided for us, and everlastingly abide with us?

We lo•ke for new Heaven•] When as God hath prepared this Inheritance, and promised it; built it, and given us the grant of it; it is fit we should do our part, and confidently expect to Expectation is the action of hope, a continual action• as hope a even ceaseth looking, Till it be stated in possession. Hope is taken three ways: first, for the Doctrine of Faith: Render a reason of the hope that i• in y••. Next for the Object of Hope, the thing expected: We ••it for the hope of righteousness by f•ith, Lastly, for that holy affection of the mind, which looks for the promised blessedness. Faith and Hope differ three ways. First, Ordine; Faith goes before and begetteth Hope: Faith is the Hypostasis or foundation of things hoped for. Yet not Faith, but the Spirit of God is the efficient Cause of Hope. Faith may be the Mother, but the holy Ghost is the Father of all gracious Hope. He begets us again to a lively hope. There is Spes inflata, an Hope blown into us, and as soon blown from us: But this is Spes generata; and Generatio terminatur ad substantiam; it brings forth a substance. Secondly, Operatione; the proper office of Faith is to justify us; of Hope, to support us. Thirdly, Subjecto; and this differs three ways; Modo, gradu, tempore. In the manner; for Faith relieth on the Promise, Hope resteth in the thing promised. Fides respicit verbum rei, Spes autem rem verbi. In the measure; our salvation begins in Faith, is perfected and made complete by Hope. In the time: Faith apprehendeth the remission of sins and justification in present: Hope is exercised in the expectation of Life to come.

We expect these things, we have them not yet. We are saved by hope: but hope that is seen, is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? It may be said, we now see Heaven, Why then do we hope for it? There is one Heaven and Earth which we look upon; another which we look for: They be old we look upon, we look for new. But Stephen looked up steadfastly into heaven, and saw the Glory of God. Yes, he saw Dei gloriam, non suam: we look for the things which concern our se•ves. Stephen saw the glory which he should have; yet until his death he did not enjoy it, but in Hope. But a man running in a race, may set his eye upon the prize which he runs for, and hopes to obtain: so there is a an Hope seen. We answer, that there be two things in Hope; Material, the material part, which is the thing it self: and Formal, the formal part, which is the obtaining and fruition of it; The former may be seen, not the latter but in Hope.

The future estate of the militant Saints is an inheritance, and that is properly a state of Expectancy, and so a fit Object for Hope. Our Hope is in this Life, our Inheritance in the Life to come. Hope we have here, in the state of Grace: Inheritance there, in the state of Glory. Vain is the Hope which looks no farther, than to the pleasure of a mortal condition: that hopes only to be rich, noble, happy here. The blame is not in Hope, but in our misplacing it. As that is we hope in, such is our Hope. We lean on a Reed, take hold by a Cobweb, catch at a Shadow: we put our hope in them that must die, and then our Hope must die with them. Hope not in Princes: for if we do, to dust they turn, and there lies our Hope in the dust with them. But a right Hope makes a man alive again, that was half dead: when he droopes, give him Hope, and his spirits will come a-fresh. As Jacob, when he was put in Hope to see Joseph alive, revixit spiritus, he revived. The other Hope is but vigilantis somnium, a waking dream: but this is the Helmet of hope, the Anchor of hope: things of substance; that will hold, that have metal in them. When breath, life, and all fail, this Hope fails not: but even then puts life into us, when our life is going from us. When we must forgo our life, it bids, Let it go: when it is gone, it presents us with a better; even an eternal Mansion in the Heavens. My soul had fainted within me, but that I hoped to see the goodness of the Lord in the Land of the living.

That there is an Expectamus, it is granted; But who are they to whom it is granted? For as Saint James speaketh; If any man seem to be religious, and bridled not his tongue, that man's religion is in vain. So if any man hopes for this new Inheritance above, and does not first become a new creature below, that man's expectation is in vain. For shall a man engross this world, heap up riches, and glew his soul to them; and yet after all this present felicity, look for a new Heaven and a new earth, to boot? No, that rich man heard otherwise from Abraham; Son remember, thou in thy life time received it good things, and Lazarus evil things: but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented. To him that had all this plenty, all this pleasure; Post tantas divitias, post tantas delicias, is this spoken. But this expectation belongs to God's afflicted ones; they that suffer so much misery in this old world, to them is promised a new. For if in this life only we have hope in Christ, we of all men are most miserable. But we have a hope that can make us rich; and rich the poorest Christian may be, in three respects.

1. By propriety and right which he hath to an estate, though for the present it be out of his hands. The wealthy Merchant may be sometimes out of cash; because his wealth lies in traffic or commerce, or is entrusted out to others: yet in respect of the evidences and obligations he hath to assure him his own, he is still rich. Let a Saint be miserable, even to the want of bread, yet he hath a right and evidence to infinite riches; the treasure of blessedness laid up in this new world: confirmed to him under the hand and seal of God; a sure debtor, that never broke his Word. Yea, he hath already the earnest of this glorious estate; a heavenly peace in his heart: So that he may say to the richest worldling: Plus mihi in cord, quam tibi in arcâ. Wealthy Croesus had not so much riches in his coffers, as poor Job had in his conscience. So long as Heaven hath any treasure in it, and that Christ himself does not break, the believer cannot be poor. Well therefore may we look for these new Heavens, that have so little under the old. Here is one expectamus, of right it belongs to us.

2. By reversion. A man purchaseth a Lordship, endowed with fair revenues, to fall unto him after the decease of someone in present possession of it. During this expectation he cannot be called poor: for before the expiration his credit is good, and at the expiration his state is good. We prefer the reversion of some great Manor, before the present possession of a small Farm. This glorious new world is the militant Saints in reversion: though we tarry for it, we shall have it. Temporal reversions wait the end of another's life: for this we must wait until the end of our own life. This is another Expectamus for us, it is also ours by reversion.

3. By heritage. The heir, so long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a serservant, though he be Lord of all. The heir in his minority lives at his fathers finding; and must learn how to rule, by being first taught how to serve. We are heirs, but yet in our non-age. And as the Law provides in some Tenures, that men shall not come to their lands, before they come to their wits: so this inheritance is not given to us, till we be fitted for the inheritance. There is great difference betwixt a temporal, and this eternal heritage. Below, the inheritance comes not but by death of the party in possession: Above there is no prejudice to the Ancestor: he dies not, for the heir to succeed him. We need not fear to do God any wrong, from whom it comes, by our coming to it. Below, the father must be dead, and the son living: but above, the Father is ever living, and the Son cannot inherit till first he be dead. Here we come to inherit by the death of others: there we come to it by our own death. There is no Filius ante diem, patrios inquirat in annos. But rather Successio minorum, sine recessione majorum: a succession, as of lights: the second burns clear, yet the first goes not out, but burns as clear as it. Thus rich we are, though our purses be empty. Hath not God chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, to be heirs of the Kingdom, which he hath promised to them that love him? We say of a rich man's son, There goes a great heir, though for the time his means be short enough. We are now the sons of God, but it doth not yet appear what we shall be, We are now the Children of grace, we shall be the Sons of glory. We confute our own distrusting hearts, with what we are: and the disgracing world, with what we shall be. Let them devour this World, that have a mind to it: this rotten, perishing, troublesome habitation: We look for new heavens and a new earth, full of peace and pleasure, and that forever.

Wherein dwelleth righteousness.] A Heathen could say, Mullens virum sine pecunia quam pecuniam sine viro: so a man without a house, or an house without an inhabitant, is an unhappy separation. To what purpose should God be at such cost in the reparation, at such trouble in the repurgation of this great building, if at last there should be none to dwell in it? But he that re-edifies the house, will be sure of a Tenant, and such a one as will pay him rent duly for it; even all he requires; Thankfulness and praises. But what do you call this Tenant? Righteousness: which is a gracious quality, or rather an habit: but what is this to an inhabitant? Shall we imagine a quality without a subject? Holiness dwells in God's material houses on Earth, as being consecrated to him, and hallowed by him: but yet doth any holiness that is inherent to the walls or seats, praise him? Do the stones set forth his glory? No, there must be some other nature, endued with life and understanding, that can be capable of this office. Righteousness alone cannot do it, nor can it be done without righteousness. To what purpose is the Sun shining into an empty house? It might be as well dark as light, if nobody ever comes into it. We must therefore seek out some capacities, wherein this righteousness may be resident. Of this there be divers interpretations: Vnusquisque abundat sensu suo.

1. Some understand by this righteousness, the clear justice of God, which shall pronounce a general sentence upon all the world; rewarding every man according to his works: Binding the ungodly with everlasting chains of darkness, and crowning the Saints with a glorious peace. Then shall his righteousness shine forth; and it shall be the universal acclamation of all creatures, The Lord is just. Here, men that live best, commonly speed worst: misery waits only at the door of Piety: None but Christians dwell at the sign of the Cross. Pleasure courts the rich, and the rich court pleasure: All their things are Res secundae, fortunate; and Res facundae, fruitful. They prosper with them, as if prosperity it self had sworn not to dwell without them. Is this thy righteousness, O Lord? (forgive our expostulation) Is this Justice? that thorns should flourish, vines languish? That thy friend should mourn, while thine enemies are jocund? Is this the God you have served all this while, says Job's wife to him? Curse him to his face, and die: But Loqueris ut stulta; she had that for her labor. When trouble comes to a good man, one would think that the messenger were mistaken; and should be told that he knocks at the wrong door. While the innocent suffer, and the guilty domineer, is this Justice? Yes the Righteousness of God is beyond exception: All men shall find it; they to their cost, that cavil against it. The Sun of that Divine Justice shines clear now: but there is a mist before our eyes; we do not so well perceive it. In this renovation of the world, it shall be perspicuous and manifest: All men and Angels shall take full notice of it in that final sentence of Come and Go: Come ye blessed, and Go ye cursed: And it shall be the acknowledgement of Heaven and Earth, and of all Creatures: Righteous art thou, O Lord, in all thy ways, and holy in all thy works.

2. But if we thus understand it; the Justice of God dwells everywhere: no place can exclude that which is infinite. Heaven is full of his Justice; crowning those souls there, that are justified by the Righteousness of Christ. Hell is full of his Justice; punishing those impenitent spirits with insufferable pains. The Earth is full of his Justice: the wicked are often met withal in their sins, and the innocent are delivered from their enemies. Michaiah is justified, Nabaoth is revenged, the Baalites confounded, and Ahab judged. Justice keeps her circuit: yea, without deferring all matters to the last Assizes; she walks her round, and does Martial law upon incorrigible offenders. Though the last day shall be honored with the full execution of God's Justice, yet it hath a dwelling in all places: in the highest Heavens, in the lowest Hell, and in the midst between both; Vbique habitat Iustitia. Therefore some make the opposition thus; in•vo or be habitat Iustitia, in hoc misericordia. Now the mercy of God suffers evil men to live promiscuously among the good: in that new world there shall be a separation: the Goares shall be driven from the Sheep, the Tares w•ded from the wheat, the Chaff sinned from the Corn, the dust and rubbish shall be swept into Hell, and this new house shall be filled with nothing but righteousness.

There is no hope beyond mercy; and this is the time of it; the next is of Justice. There is no hope of mercy without repentance, and this is the time of that too; the next is of judgment. All things are not in season at all times: Repentance is now in season: first, because there we weep for sin where we have done it: then because there we cease from sin, where we might still continue in it. If the heart be broken now, mercy is ready to heal it: but if that day find it obdurate, Justice shall fearfully break it. The tears we shed now, shall be dried up then: but if our eyes be dry till that day, they shall be set a running forever, without either ease or pity. Repentance now seeks sinners, and they will not entertain it: sinners shall then seek repentance, and not find it. If they could; yet in that world repentance shall do them as little good without mercy, as in this world mercy will do them without repentance. Now therefore let us embrace repentance for our sins, because here dwells mercy to pardon them: at that day it will be too late, for there dwells only Justice to punish them.

3. Others by this righteousness, conceive those new delights, and spiritual pleasures, which shall fill this new world. So they would have the opposition to stand between the sorrows of the old, and joys of the new. This is the vale of miseries, that the mount of blessedness. And why should not righteousness be taken for delight, as well as sin is put for anguish? Never did man find pleasure upon earth, like the sweet testimony of an appeased conscience; cleansed by the blood of the Lamb, and quieted by the presence of the holy Ghost. It is a continual feast: other feasts may be soon broken off, as was Adonjahs; or conclude in bitterness as did Belshazzars: this is an everlasting banquet.

What meet we with in this old world, but trouble and misery? If we travel into this little world man, we shall find new discoveries. Let him be a world, and himself will be the land, and misery the Sea. Misery, like the Sea, swells above all the hills, and reacheth to the remotest parts of this Earth, Man. We are but dust, coagulated and kneaded into earth by tears: our matter is earth, our form misery. We may have one day in seven a holy-day of happiness; but our whole week is misery. We may have a breathing of happiness; but our whole journey is misery. If there be one greenswarth or fair meadow to refresh us, yet the greater part of our pilgrimage is rough and dirty. There may be a dram of honey in the brim of the cup, but the main draught is bitterness. Few and evil are our days: few in number, and those few evil in nature; not one of them named for good. Few and evil below, many and good above. Misery is our familiar, happiness but a stranger to us. Of this worlds happiness, man is the Tenant, of misery the Landlord: of happiness the Farmer, of misery the Freeholder: of peace but the usu-fructuary, of trouble the proprietary. If we have one dish of comfort, once in many meals; yet our continual diet is sorrow: My tears are my meat day and night. The deluge of calamity overflows this human Earth, many cubits. Of this Earth, the highest ground, the loftiest hills are kings: and yet even they have not line enough to fadome this Sea, and to say, my misery is but thus deep. Hodie quoque sum M'ssah habet, & s... Me'ah: Bitter, bitter all. As the repining Jews said of the bread of Heaven, We see nothing but Manna: so we may justly say of the bread of Earth, the bread of affliction, we see nothing but misery. Misery in want, misery in abundance: in want, the misery of murmuring and impatience: in abundance, the misery of riot and unthankfulness. Misery in honor; pride and envy: misery in a low estate, nastinesse and drudgery. In health misery, misery in sickness: there wantonness, here painfulness: in the latter men cry, O their head: in the former they might cry, O their heart. The next world begins with happiness, and with a happiness that never ends. Therefore we look for new Heavens and a new Earth, Wherein dwelleth righteousness; that we might exchange our old woes, for new pleasures.

4. All these be fair expositions, and analogical to the truth: they all bear a good sense. But why should we not take righteousness here, in the literal acception? There dwelleth righteousness: that is, holiness, pureness, innocence, and the perfection of goodness. There dwelleth Christ, and he is righteousness: The Lord our righteousness. So here is the full Antithesis of this new world to the old. Righteousness dwells there, unrighteousness here: Here, sin and guiltiness; there grace and holiness: Below transgression, sanctification above. This world is the Orbe of sin, which corrupted all: that new one, the Orbe of righteousness which restoreth all. This is the winter wherein all things wither; that is the spring which revives them. The world was made good, only sin depraved it. Satan was honorable before sin, for an Angel: amiable before sin, for a celestial intelligence: His nature was good, his disposition good; but sin, when that came, marred all. Good was before evil; before malice charity. Decay entered by sin, dishonor by sin, death by sin. Call his name Ichabod, for the glory is departed. At the birth of Ichabod, sin; the glory is gone, the Ark of God is removed. This is a constant incumbent of the earth; never non-resident, never out of business. No place can be rid of him, no time exclude him, no action escape him. He crept into Heaven with an Angel, into Paradise with a Devil, into man's nature with the root of that nature. Where can we devise to keep it out? At home in our houses he is Famelicus, abroad Socius, in our Travels Conviator at our Feasts Conviva, in our Taverns Compotor, in our beds Consors, in our bosoms Tyrannus: ubique Inimicus. In God's Temple sin will not leave us: at our prayers it will be interrupting us: It insinuates it self into every action we do: even our best is not without some touch of sin, or at least some assault of sin. It may get into our beneficence, and he vain glory; Into our devotions, and be hypocrisy: Into our friendship, and be flattery: Into our hope, and make it smell of presumption: Into our humility, and turn it into base dejection: Into our repentance, and work it down to desperation: Into our best works, and there be an opinion of merit: which is a blow with the left heel that kicks down all our milk.

Sin is the epidemical disease of the world: as the Air is a common benefit, so sin is a common mischief. Other Elements know their own Lord's: for the Earth, this piece of ground is one man's, that another's: For the Water, this Well is mine, that my neighbors: for the Fire, every man sits by his own harth: But the Air is equally beneficial to all: the Tenant hath as much Air as the Landlord, the Fool as the Learned, the Begger as the Prince. So sin is a common infection. In many things we sin all. One man languisheth of a consumption, another labors of a fever, a third is racked with the gowte, a fourth swollen with the dropsy: everyone hath a several disease, to bring him to the common end, death. But sin is the universal disease of all: Death passed upon all, for that all have sinned. The sin of the world, is indeed a world of sin.

As the assaults of sin are incessant for continuance of time, so also innumerable for choice of place. There is no faculty of the soul, no member of the body, but is a speeding place for sin; but especially it aims at the heart. Let us watch and ward everywhere; the one an ocular, the other a manual, martial, presidary defense; but especially keep the heart. The tongue is an unruly member, yet it hath fewer bars: only the teeth and the lips are set to keep in the tongue. But for the heart, there is an omni custodia, and all little enough to keep the heart. Some men doth sin shoot in the eye, and here his arrow is uncleanness: thus he wounded David in the eye, by the beauty of Bathsheba: some in the hand, as Gehazi; and his shaft was bribery: Some in the tongue, as Ananias, by lying; and this is his common artillery for tradesmen: some in the gall, as Joab; and they are all for blood; turning their embraces into embrocadoes: some in their foreheads; and they will carry themark of the beast to their graves: some in the foot, by profaneness; and they are not only swift to shed blood, but ready to trample upon all religion and goodness: others in the head, with the frenzy of dissimulation: others in the heart by covetousness; and Satan shall have more service of them for an ounce of gold, than God shall have for the Kingdom of Heaven. Thus standeth man in the midst of the assaults of sin, like the anatomized figure of him in the frontispice of an Almanac: where Aries is discharging at his head, Taurus at his neck, cowardly Leo at his back, Cancer is gnawing his stomach, Sagittarius is shooting at his thighs, and Pisces nibbling on his toes. By this time you perceive, that this present world is the region of sin: Sin will dwell in us, so long as we dwell in these Tabernacles: Let us now look upon the condition of the next.

There dwelleth righteousness:] no sin there, altogether righteousness. Here indeed we have some righteousness, but it is blended with sin: In the most regenerate Saint on Earth, there is flesh as well as spirit; and it is a question sometimes, which of them shall get the predominance. We have a righteousness that is perfect, now; but that dwells in Heaven, in the person of Christ, and is only imputed to us. This is a justifying righteousness, and it is absolute; but extra nos, without us. That same sanctifying righteousness, which is intra nos, inherent to our own persons, is so imperfect, that sin is joined tenant with it in our mortal body: and there is a perpetual contention between them, which shall have the superiority. They are like the land and sea within us: the one would keep, the other would gain, Michael and the Dragon, in one Heaven: Caesar and Pompey, in one Empire: Nehemiah and Samballat, in one city: Isaac and Ishmael, in one family: Jacob and Esau in one womb: the Ark and Dagon, in one Temple: Grace and corruption, in one Christian. Michael against the Dragon, Caesar against Pompey, Nehemiah against Samballat, Isaac against Ishmael, Jacob against Esau, the Ark against Dagon, Grace against corruption, shall prevail: but Nondum, not yet. The flesh is vulnerata, non victa; or victa, non mortua. We are still mortifying it so fast as we can: but it hath a Serpents trick, to keep the head and tail safe and whole. Often it bites us, and not seldom stings us: till we are full of Saint Paul's groan, O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? Nothing will rid it out of us, but that which riddes us out of the world, Death it self.

Only these new Heavens and Earth challenge this privilege, that there shall dwell righteousness without sin, life without pain, happiness without fear, and joy without sorrow. Darkness (we know) is compared to sin: Opera tenebrarum: now sin is as universally overspread this deformed world, as darkness was over that unformed world: until God said, Let there be light: and there was light, when as yet there was no Sun. Before the light was made, darkness was over all: afterwards, the light being formed, darkness was reduced to one place and season, the night. This light continued for three days unfixed: on the fourth day God created the Sun: and then it is likely that all the former dispersed light was gathered into that one body, and treasured up in that great luminary the Sun. So shall it be in the recreation of this world: now grace and sin are scattered all over, as light and darkness in the twilight is confused throughout the Air: it is twilight with us yet. But at the last day Christ shall make a separation; as the waters once were gathered into the sea, that the dry land might appear: All darkness, all sin and wickedness; shall be removed down into Hell, and there be confined, never to break out. All light, that is, all Righteousness and holiness shall be gathered into this new Heaven and Earth, and there be concentrated forever. There dwelleth Righteousness, and happy they that dwell with it.

Wherein dwelleth Righteousness] As Travelers that have embarked themselves for the discovery of some new land, unknown, but not undesired, purposing to make a plantation there; when they are once arrived in it, labor to satisfy themselves of the particular commodities it affordeth: pretermittting no occasion or convenience, but thoroughly examining the site, the air, the fertility, the strength and safety of it: no corner escapes unsearched, no pleasure unconsidered: and finding all according to their desire, they not only resolve themselves, but also invite their friends to dwell there. So these four Sabbaths together, our meditations have been busy in surveying this new World, the Land of Promise, the Inheritance of the Saints, and the Habitation of Righteousness. And yet all we have said is but e Theologiâ negativâ: and indeed, What other way is there to describe this future happiness, than by removing from it such defects, as fill all temporal things with encombrances? One days journey more let us add to our former discovery; that the glorious beauty of these new Heavens and Earth may both enflame our own hearts, and kindle an holy Fire in others, to desire it. This present world is troubled with three diseases; a Contagion, a Consumption, and a Palsy. The Righteousness that dwells in this new World, as it is out of the reach and danger of these distempers, so it is diametrically opposed to them. First, Contagion or Infection, as in the pestilent Fever, is full of spots: but Righteousness is most pure. Secondly, the Consumption is a pining away, and languishing into death: but Righteousness is immortal. Thirdly, the Palsy is a shaking grief; they that are troubled with it, can hold nothing steddily: but Righteousness is constant, inflexible, unalterable, and endures forever. Thus by the present sickness of the old world, we may guess of the death of the new

1. This world is infected, yea, infection it self. Take it metaphorically, and what find we in it but infection? Our evil deeds infect by their example: our evil words infect, by their persuasion: our looks infect, by their allurements: we breathe nothing but infection. Materially, this earth soils us: in Summer we are soiled with dust, in Winter with dirt. These be those Inquinamenta mundi, which we are evermore rubbing, or brushing, or washing, or wiping off. There is nothing in this lower region, but it is subject to soil: the very earth it self is a soil: our land we call the soil; How can it then but soil us? Nothing undefiled below: what ever it is, where ever it is, it must needs savor of the nature of the soil. All foul, all blemished here: but in that new World dwells Righteousness; a pure and sincere being, without any foreign mixture: an Inheritance undefiled, not capable of defilement. Nothing can come in to soil it. Into that City shall enter no unclean thing: all uncleanness shall be kept out forever. We would have all things clean here below; we cannot: we desire to have clean houses, clean ways, clean diet, and clean apparel. O how sweet will it be to dwell with Righteousness in those new Heavens, where all things are clean! Chrystals and Diamonds, nay the Firmament and Stars be not now so pure. That same Galaxie or milken way, a bright circle of the Sky, which the Poets imagined to be a walk for their gods and goddesses in Summer evenings; but Philosophy better says, is caused by the reflection of stars: it is but wan and duskish in comparison of the diaphanous clarity of all things in this new Kingdom.

2. This World is in a Consumption; the vital parts of it are corrupted. The best estate of things doth not hold long: and if the substance remains, yet the luster is gone: and the first symptom or degree to a Consumption in a man, is the losing of his color. The glory of all flesh is but as the flower of the grass: Grass, that's for the substance; Flower, that's the beauty of it. The Grass it self lasts not long, but the Flower of the Grass, nothing so long as the Grass it self. Helen outlived her fairness, David his strength. Let no blasting change the flower, no canker eat it, no beast tread it down with his foot; yet of it self will it fall off, and leave the stalk standing. The Rose will marcere, and the Violet livere, of themselves; though no violence be done to them: the one will fade, the other wax pale and wanne. A flourishing estate is not kept long; either by the flowers that are worn, or by us that wear them. Were the things of this World clean, yet take them at their best, they are fading. Every year flowers and leaves too fall off; till the Spring comes and revives them. Of many things the substances themselves fade; and of this fading we all complain. Or if they fade not of themselves, to us they do. We are hungry, and we eat; yet even that fades; and we are as weary of our fullness, as we were of our fasting. We are weary, and we rest; yet even that fades; and we grow as weary of our rest, as ever we were of our weariness.

There is a melting tabe upon all temporary things: but Righteonesse, the householdstuffe of this new Mansion, knows no Consumption. Decay and death are the effects of sin: Above there is no sin, therefore no decay: no decay, therefore no death. The Roses and flowers that make up the garland of Righteousness, never can wither: The Pearls and Diamonds, and stones more precious, set in that Crown of Righteousness, can never be fullied. The songs of that triumph never cease. There is an eternal Spring; and as the glory is new to us at first, so old it cannot wax: it shall be new forever. As the shows made for the glory and state of some solemn day, are first seen of vulgar eyes, before they arrive at their sight for whom they were ordained. So the honor and bravery of this Earth is more in the spectators, than in the spectacle; more in the lookers on, than in the persons that wear it. Say they are gallant shows, yet but shows, transient things, Pageants wherewith the eye is soon glutted. After three or four times beholding them, they grow old and stale, and we look upon them with an idle and careless eye. But the glory of these new Heavens, the splendor of Righteousness, those true and substantial honors, as they are ever permanent, so they are ever new: as they are never fading, so never cloying: there is infinite variety, satiety none at all. Of vanity we soon surfeit grow weary and loath it: but the joys of Righteousness will be as everlasting in our desires, as they are in their own sweetness.

3. The things of this World are taken with a Palsy; so shaking, that their joints cannot hold together. There is nothing certain, nothing steady: nor can we be more certain of anything among them, than of the uncertainty of them. They tumble daily from man to man: one man's inheritance shakes into another man's purchase. From them that have riches, to them that are covetous, there is a continual shaking. Much wealth is escheated for want of heirs; or confiscated for some offenses; or rioted and made away by unthriftiness; or consumed with Fire, or drowned with Water: many a fair patrimony falls to the ground. Seges ubi Troia; yea, ubi oppidum, aqua. Or if riches be not taken from us, yet we are taken from them; which comes all to one pass. The choice is not great, whether I lose my servant, or my servant loseth me: either way he may be masterlesse, and I without a servant. Such a Palsy possesseth all secular things! Do we not find it true by proof daily? When we feel the pulse of nature, by the hand of time, do we not complain that it is sick of a Palsy? Yet even in this unfaithfulness of the creatures, there is a kind of faithfulness to us: they are our friends, in telling us their own fickleness. As the Mechanicke that had a parcel of rich stuff delivered to him, to make up a curious garment; told his Customer plainly, that for a small matter given him in courtesy, he would save him a great deal of monie: Put it to another, quoth he, that hath more skill; for if you trust me with the making of it, I shall certainly spoil it. So when we are about to place our confidence in worldly things; they tell us really, experimentally, the down-right truth: We are fickle creatures, and have paralytic and trembling hands, that can hold nothing steddily for you: Set your minds upon heavenly things: they are constant to you. Trust us with nothing, but what you give for lost, and mean to be deceived of: This is plain dealing. Not unto us, say they, not unto us, but to the Lord give your hearts and confidence. Charge them that are rich in this world, that they put not their trust in uncertain riches. Not only doth God charge Paul, to charge Timothy to charge us; but even the creatures themselves do charge us, not to put our trust in their unstableness. They will not suffer us to set up our rest in them; not in anything below: but they force us upon the Creator of all; who hath provided an Inheritance for us, out of all danger; whereof we shall never be disseized: Gold that shall never be embased by any bad mixture: a Crown without cares, without rivals, without envy, without end: There is a Treasure worth our heatrs.

It is an Inheritance, and all shall inherit; yet without prejudice to the right Heir; Christ. There shall be no wrong done, by Him to us, or by us to Him. Earthly inheritances are divided oftentimes with much inequality: and the privilege of Primogeniture stretcheth farther in many places, than it did among the ancient Jews: so that Minor servit majori. One carries it from all, and the rest go without: or, if they have any share, the patrimony of the eldest by so much is the less. In this new World it is not so: all the sons of God are heirs, none underlings: and not heirs under wardship and hope, but possessive inheritors: and not inheritors of a small pittance of land, but of a Kingdom: and that not of a temporary kingdom, subject to domestical treasons, or foreign invasions: no murmuring, no conspiracy, no mutiny shall disturb this Kingdom. There may be dispar gloria singulorum, yet there is communis laetitia omnium. All shall have the same glory, though not the same degree of glory. It is of the nature of light, and such spiritual things; which he Omnibus una, and Singulis tota. So it is in sounds and smells: Let there be a thousand together, when the bells ring; and they hear all alike. Let there be multitudes in a garden of flowers, and everyone smells as much sweetness, as if there were no more but himself. There is but one Heaven, and what room soever we have in it, we shall find peace without trouble, joy without sorrow, glory without envy, and pleasure without end.

1. For the application! If we would dwell with Righteousness, first, let Righteousness dwell with us: if we with that in the new World, that with us in the old. Many would dwell in Heaven, but they have no mind to Righteousness. We have three lives: Vitae, here; Famae, when we are dead: and Gloriae, in Heaven: but there is a fourth, which is the life of all these lives; Iustitiae, the life of grace and Righteousness: without which, not only our bodies shall rot in the dust, but even our memories shall stink above ground, and our souls perish in the lowest pit. Righteousness is life indeed. But doth Righteousness dwell with us? Where, O where shall we find it? If we look for it in the county; there it is ignorance and superstition: If in the city, there it is fraud and oppression: If in the Court, there it is pride and affectation. But you will say, it dwells in our hearts: Who can tell that? In men's lives we do not see it; only in their lips we hear it. So then Righteousness is hard driven for habitation; when it can be admitted no farther than the mouth, and have no other dwelling than in the lips. Into the chamber of our hearts it may not come: in the hall of conversation it is not seen: only we allow it a little residence in the door of our lips: a lip-righteousness; that's all. It is in many men's courses or lives, as in some discourses or treatises: we can see no fruit for leaves, nor matter for words. But I remember what answer a Statesman made to a frivolous petition: I may divide, saith he, your petition into two parts; Matter and Words: now your matter is naught; and with me, assure yourself, your words shall not carry it. There be two things respectible in a Christian; his Life, and his Profession: and if his life be naught, let him never think that his profession shall carry it out with God.

Who shall ascend into the Hill of the Lord, or who shall stand in his holy place? He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart, &c. He shall receive a blessing from the Lord, and righteousness from the God of his salvation. We must get Righteousness to dwell with us, or never look to dwell with Righteousness. If we do not entertain it here, it will reject us there. When Mercy and Truth have met together; and Righteousness and peace have kissed each other. Then shall Truth spring out of the earth, and Righteousness shall look down from Heaven. But alas, Terras Astraera reliquit: those holy-days be gone: we are nothing less than righteous. When we read the Volumes of the Fathers, we would think they did nothing else but write: when we consider their devotions, we might think they did nothing else but pray. But coming to these our days, and marking the backs of men and women, we may well think they study nothing but pride: observing their full tables, that they mind nothing but excess and intemperance: looking upon their lives, that they regard nothing but sins: and mind no such thing as Righteousness.

2. The hope of this future life sweetens all the bitterness of the present. There is nothing that so troubles a good heart, as sin: To be rid of sin, it holds a great happiness. All the epithites and attributes of this world, cannot make up so full a grievance, as this one; that it is sinful. When we have called it, as it is, a vain world, a false world, an unquiet world, a miserable world; one would think we had said enough to disgrace it, and to make it loathed. But they all come short of this; a sinful world, a wicked world: when we have said that, we have indeed hit it right: that alone is sufficient to make it detestable. Let us examine our own hearts, if ever one drop of remorse hath entered into them; whether we would not have given all the world, yea, even our own life, to be sure of the forgiveness of one sin that troubles us. And yet that being forgiven, and our heavenly Father pacified by the blood of his Son, drying up our penitent tears with the beams of mercy; after all this, we are apt to fall into new sin, and again to trouble Heaven and Earth. O what peace can there be in the region of sin? But in this new World there shall dwell Righteousness; and her inseparable companions, Peace, Joy, Glory, Happiness, and eternal Life. Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the Kingdom prepared for you: The hearing of which words in the the end, shall make us blessed without end. Amen.

Wherefore (beloved) seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent that you may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless.

There are two especial motives to bring us into the way of goodness: the bitterness of this life, which we feel; and the sweetness of the future life, which we expect. For the former, howsoever some besorted Earth-dwellers have deified this World, and call it by no meaner a title than their god, and their maker; yet they shall find it rather a destroyer. There be diverse kinds of makers, in an abusive sense: So drunkenness makes Beasts; that's a kind of maker: so pride makes Devils; that's another maker. The Devil made sin; he is a maker too: Sin made death; that is a maker too: Death made destruction; and hath a stroke in making also. But all these makers be properly unmakers, marrers; destroyers. So we use to say, that wealth makes a man: but what does it make him? It may make him proud, it may make him licentious, it may make him a fool, a sinner, sewell for the fire of Hell: it can never make him a man, much less a Saint. The way for a man to have the world his friend, is not to be friends with it. Men are naturally friends to their friends, and enemies to their enemies: But the cross humorous, and pevish world is his enemies friend, and his friends enemy. Insequeris? fugio: fugis? Insequor. Scorn it, and it will woo thee: love it, and it will undo thee. But is not the world kind to the covetous or voluptuous man, her darling, the worldling? Yes, as Dalilae was to Sampson, or Iael to Sisera: she will cut his throat in kindness, and for pure love send his soul to Hell. But to the poor man that despiseth it, it is indeed a friend, and a means to help him unto blessedness: in the same sense that the law is said to help a man to salvation, or righteousness. For the Law shows him that he hath no righteousness of his own; and so occasions him to seek it where it may be found, which is only in Christ. So the world shows him that it hath no happiness of its own; and therefore sends him to seek it in this new world; there he is sure to find it. And that is the other motive. In heaven there is a constant and eternal fullness of joy: therefore Sursum corda, thither let us lift up our hearts. Wherefore beloved, seeing that, &c.

Generally in the words, we have an insinuation, and an injunction; a matter granted, and a charge imposed. In the insinuation, there is a word of tender affection; Beloved: and a word of charitable persuasion: Ye do look for these things. upon this ground of encouragement is the rest of this Text and charge built: This is the Propter quod of all that follows. First let me dispatch these two, before I come to the distribution of the rest.

Beloved.] There is no better cognizance of Christ's servants than love: there is no love but wisheth good to the person loved: there is no such good to any person, as to be saved. Thus our Apostle expresseth his love to us, by persuading us to diligence in the great business of our salvation. All affections are radicated in love: there is a fear to lose, and that fear is grounded on love, there is a desire to enjoy, and that desire is love: there is a sorrow for parting, and that sorrow proceeds from love. Mary wept for their Abstulerunt Dominum; and this was a Dilexit multum. Christ was all love: not a word he spake, not an action he did, not a passion he suffered, but was an argument, a character of his love. When he complained of the heaviness of his soul, Non hoc fecit stupor, sed amor: nec amissus erat animus, sed submissus. He opened the windows of his body, that through them we might see the love that was in his heart. He brought love, he bought love, he exercised love, he bequeathed love, he is love. As the Jews said of Esdras, that if knowledge had put out her candle, at his brain she might light it: so if all our love were extinguished, yet at the love of Christ we might easily re-ignite it.

Here is the fire, but where is the victima, the sacrifice, our practiall charity? We say, charity begins at home, but Christ's charity began abroad: to show love to us, he neglected to love himself. But our love will neither begin at home, nor abroad: neither at his nor our own fire. Love is the fulfilling of the Law; and the want of it is the transgression of the Law. We complain that the Papists rob God of one commandment: but he that wants love, robs him of all; and so commits the worst sacrilege.

There is too little of this love in the world: Lustful love there is enough, too much, but charitable love is very scant. To that question, Lovest thou me? We answer readily with Peter, yes, Lord I love thee: But to that other question, If thou lovest me, what wilt thou do for me? we are dumb: or if our lips make a fair promise, yet our hands will fail in the performance. Some men indeed at sometimes will be beneficial; that at most times they may be injurious. Their love is like the laughter of Apollo, who was said to smile semel in anno. Such is most men's love to their Pastor, that they will spend ten times as much in law to maintain wrong, as they will give him by way of right. It was a byword; Love and a weapon will kill any man: the worlds love is joined with a weapon; it dwells at the swords point: you shall sooner feel it cold at your heart, than warm in your kitchen. Witness these bloody days, so full of desperate homicides; as if violence would leave nature nothing to do. The mercenary soldier can hardly be justified; for when he puts on his armor, he puts off his charity, and only fights for money. This is Vti robore contra eum qui dedit. When Moses saw the Egyptian smiting the Hebrew, he smote the Egyptian; we may smite our enemies to help our brethren; but when we find our brethren quarrelling, and say to one of them, Why smitest thou my brother? he is ready to reply, Who made thee a Judge? But for us that are tied together by so many bonds; of nature; nation, grace, neighbourhood; upon every flight occasion to be vexing and wounding one another; here is a love that fills the channells with blood: we may truly say, This love lies a bleeding. Miles ornatus, & cives armatus; a curious and spruce soldier, and a furious and rough Citizen, are two of the worst fights.

There is store of love in the world, but it is naught. There is a love to other men's wives, and it is adultery or wantonness: a love to other men's goods, and it is rapacity or covetousness: a love to other men's bloods, and it is murder and revenge: a love to other men's honors and places, and it is envy and ambition. As the Pharisaical Jews had a grammaticall devotion, so we have a bastard dilection. But for that love which is the true borne child of goodness; charity to men's persons, to their estates, to their lives, to their names, to their souls; alas it is an Individuum vagum: it is dead in the cold, and buried in the grave of uncharitableness. So that now to preach charity, or to persuade men to be in love with love, is but our oration at the end of a funeral Sermon; which is to go on a dead man's errand. As water is of divers colors in diverse places: in divers places: in the Sea it is green, in puddles black, against rocks foamy, among green herbs clear: So love is according to her different objects: when it affects carnal beauty, it is concupiscence; when riches, it is covetousness; when honor, it is ambition; when any sin, it is malice. It is discoloured according to those sensual things, upon which it reflects. But let it be set upon goodness, upon God himself, and such things as are in ordine ad Deum, in relation to him; as the welfare of the Church, of the state, of ourselves, of our neighbors; it is then clear and perfect: no crystal so diaphanous, no flower so sweet and lovely, as charity. Then in the heart it is compassion, in the eye pity, in the tongue comfort, in the hand beneficence.

If there be love in the Pastor, he will feed his people: if there be love in the people, they will not wrong their Pastor. There is indeed a kind of love in this City to Preachers; but generally it is shown to those voluntaries, that will content themselves with the pay of a benevolence, and graze on the commons. But if he once require his own several, and challenge a proper maintenance by right; though he were an Angel of God, they would abhor him. But it is not Quid dabis? what wilt thou give? But Quid debes, what didst thou owe? First, pay thy debts and just dues; then talk of a benevolence, and work of supererogation. It is far more fit that the Preacher should receive what God gives him, than stand to the people's courtesy: which as it is not honorable for the Priest, so nor is it safe for the people: for then he must square out his positions according to their dispositions; and not dare to speak to the full extent of his conscience: for fear least by displeasing his Auditory, he should loose his Salary; and where is he then? Most of our Patrons are worse; for they love a Divine, as the Usurer loves an unthrift heir; that he may suck his estate, and squeeze him, and leave him nothing. The Church at first chose lay men for their Patrons; and now those Patrons have made Churchmen their slaves. In the council of Carthage, some eminent men were chosen to defend the Church against Pagans; they were ordained to oppose the tyranny of others: now they are the worst tyrants to it themselves. O where is charity? It is our prayer frequently, From envy, hatred and malice, and from all uncharitableness, good Lord deliver us. Surely there is more included than some men suddenly think on: we may thus enlarge it in our thoughts: From quarrelling swaggerers, from biting usurers, from litigious neighbors, from seditious lawyers, from corrupt justicers, from simoniacall Patrons, from political Church-robbers, from costive engrossers, from all oppressors, and from all their uncharitableness, Good Lord deliver us. Let each one be the others Beloved, Let God be the Beloved of us all, that we all may be the Beloved of God in his only Beloved Son, JESUS CHRIST.

Seeing that ye look for such things. This is the second branch of the insinuation; wherein he presumes of their well disposedness towards it.

1. Expectation is an action of hope, and hope is not without some ground. Blessed be God, who hath begotten us again to a lively hope, and to an Inheritance incorruptible, reserved in Heaven for us. Generavit, He begat us once in the first Adam, to this life: but this being corrupted, Regeneravit, He begat us again in the second Adam, to the hope of a better. This act of regenerating is doubly determined: to hope first, then to the Inheritance: to hope in the state of grace, to inheritance in the state of glory. This is no dead hope, but lively: they that are begotten, are begotten to life; this is somewhat. Yea, to an Inheritance, which is more: for all that are begotten, are not begotten to inherit. Poor men's children, younger brothers, are begotten; but where is the Inheritance? Yet in Inheritances there is some odds: one may be better than another: this is the best of all. And if this were in our old world we would suspect some encombrances: but it is in the new, in Heaven, and there kept. Earth could not keep it: here it were in hazard to be lost every moment: It would go the same way, Paradise went: but there it is safe. These, and there be the things we should look for: But do we? Our wants, our wanton desires find us looking work enough all our lives long; but our looking fails us in the modo, and ubi. Seek the things that are above. So we do; but it is ambitious supra: we would be above one another, in honor, favor, and power. There be high places, which we would not have taken away; but offer in them, and offer for them too, rather than go without them. But such things are too low and base: our Expectation should be higher, above the hills; higher yet, above the clouds; yea, higher yet, beyond our sight, even above the Heavens: there we are right.

2. Expectation is a fervent desire of having. The earnest Expectation of the Creature waiteth for the manifestation of the Sons of God. Do we thus look for it, that we long to enjoy it? No, we are so taken up with worldly things, and with looking upon them, that we have no mind to heavenly things: no looking after them. The possession of the vanity we have, thrusts out the expectation of the felicity we might have. But who does not desire the glory of this new World? Some do not believe it, therefore never desire it: some believe it, but never mind it: others desire it, but not yet: they would have a large share of this world before it. Most men are content to embrace it, but they will take no pains for it, nor seek the way to it. We have fat desires, but lean endeavors: as C. Flaminius played upon Philoxomenes; that he had Pulchras manus, & pulchra crura; sed ventrem non habuit: he had goodly arms, and strong thighs, but he had no belly. He meant that Philoxomenes had brave and valiant Soldiers, fair Troupes of Horse and foot, but no money, to pay them. It may be inverted upon us: for we are all belly, full of appetite and desire to happiness; but we have neither hands nor feet; we will not move nor labor to attain this happiness. If death do but offer to prefer us to it, we will none we thank him: nay, we refuse him with deprecations, and fortify ourselves against him with antidotes and preservatives. Where is our desire of Heaven, when we rather die Necessitatis vinculo, quàm voluntatis obsequio? Instead of looking for it, we look from it: and then only pretend a faint desire to it, when we can make no other shift, but that we must needs venture on it.

3. There is an Expectation of fear. There remains a fearful looking for of Judgment. So the timorous Traveler looks for the Thief: so the conscious Malefactor looks for the coming of the Judge; but had rather he would never come. There is an Expectation of hope: I looked for thy saving health. So in the pangs and sickness of our bodies, we look for ease: so in the agonies and sorrows of our souls, we look for comfort. There is an Expectation of desire; My soul thirsteth for God, even for the living God. We give many a look toward the thing that we love: the chaste Spouse is still looking for her Bridegroom. There is an Expectation of Faith: So Abraham looked for a City which hath a foundation, whose Builder and Maker is God. Our conversation is in Heaven, Whence we look for the coming of our Lord Jesus. A Merchant in a foreign country, that hath wife and children at home, fixeth all his cares, employeth all his endeavors, to confirm an estate to himself, not where he is, but in the place whence he came, and where he desires to be. We make use of spectacles, to succor our eyes in reading: yet we take no pleasure in looking upon the spectacles, but upon the object which is presented through them, and which they help us more clearly to behold. All temporal things are but spectacles, through which we look at the joys of Heaven.

Lastly, besides all these, the expectation of our eyes, of our desires of our hearts, there is also an expectation of our hands: when our profession and our conversation speak all one language; that we earnestly endeavor to be saved. This is the right looking for it; and when either of these part, we take the wrong way, and our souls will miss of their desired end. It is well, quando ea petimus, quae appetimus: prayer is good and necessary; and without this constant devotion, we shall never see the glory of these new Heavens. But if we do not join Orationem and Operationem, prayer and endeavor together, we shall no more get to the new Jerusalem, than our bodies can from one place to another without motion or transportation. There is an heresy in faith, which believes a lie: and there is an heresy in manners, which causeth a lie to be believed. The Devil persuades men, that Christ's death shall save them, though they live not such a life as he hath commanded them. This is a strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: and that is a lie which sensual men believe. Hypocrites with their fair profession, make a show of going to Heaven, though Hell it self be in their hearts: and this is a lie which ignorant men believe. Either of these lies, passive or active, the one which sinners receive, the other which they make is enough to send them to the father of lies. But as we look for that we would have, so let us strive to have that we look for: our eyes, hands, hearts, and all must be employed about this weighty business. Then have we Correctum, when Cor erectum; then pure eyes, when they rest upon none but pure objects; then clean hands, when they meddle only with clean actions. Then indeed are our souls in the way to glory, when they are set forwards by the works of grace. Then may we look for these new Heavens, then do these new Heavens look for us; and the blessed renewer and purchaser of both bring us all together.

Wherefore seeing that, &c.] This is Axis & Cardo: the very point upon which the whole Text turneth. It is as it were a Copula between Heaven and Earth; an argument to win us, a ligament to unite us. We look for a glorious place, wherefore let us be gracious men. Joy and honor is our expectation, wherefore let holiness and innocence take up our conversation. We hope to have an inheritance in that world, wherein dwelleth righteousness: wherefore righteousness looks to have her habitation in us, while we dwell here. This is the sum of all; which I should press in general, before I come to express in particular.

Let Righteousness dwell in us; that is the substance of this verse: Oh that it were granted in all our hearts. If you ask, what is righteousness? you have it here described to be undefilednesse, unblameableness, and peaceableness. In these consist righteousness, and that righteousness must now dwell in us, if we look to dwell in those Heavens, wherein dwelleth righteousness. Indeed Christ is The Lord our righteousness: let him dwell in us, and then we shall be sure of righteousness. Let us hear the end of all: Through this righteous and holy life, without spot and blameless, God will be won to dwell with us, which is the perfection of this life: and we shall be admitted to dwell with him, which is the last and highest perfection of the life to come. For with whomsoever Christ vouchsafes to dwell here, they shall dwell with him there. He sends down his grace to us, that he may dwell with us below: he will advance us to his glory, that we may dwell with him above.

I have done with the general scope of the Text; which persuades us to a pious and sanctified life here, by the hope and expectation we have of dwelling in the new Heavens hereafter. I come now to the particulars; in the handling whereof, I shall desire pardon for the prolixity: the profit (I hope) will make amends for the length of my discourse. If I have not run over things with a brief dexterity; yet (I am confident) with an honest sincerity. Nor would the ampleness of the argument bear with a quick dispatch. The Scripture is like a house of many rooms, that hath many doors; and those doors have their several locks, and those locks require their own proper keys, to let in our understandings to the view of those hidden treasures. So therefore I would, if I were able, distribute a Text, as our blessed Savior did the loaves, when he commanded the broken remainder to be gathered up; that not a syllable might be lost. All places of holy writ are not only to be examined secundum sonum, according to the literal word; but secundum sensum, according to the mystical sense.

Be diligent that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless. This the Apostle makes the use of his former doctrine, the application of all. Wherein we have four dependencies, like so many links of one chain. First, here is an industry required; Be diligent. Secondly, the object of that industry, which is innocence or holiness: without spot and blameless. Thirdly, the end of that object, that we may so be found of the Judge in that day. Fourthly, the blessedness of that end, to be found of him in peace; that is in his love and favor. First, there is no remedy, but we must be found. Secondly, there is no comfort for us, if we be not found in peace. Thirdly, we cannot be found in peace without an unspotted innocence. Fourthly, and we shall never be without spot and blameless, unless we be very diligent so to keep ourselves.

Be diligent: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : this some render, Satagite: which they would have to signify more than a sufficiency of doing; even a vehemency of action. As Quintilian relates of Manlius Sura; who was so nimble and expedite in a design, that Afer said of him; non agere, sed satagere. They take it for some anxiety and distraction about the difficulty of an enterprise: Cum non solummodo agerentur, sed & angerentur sollicitudine. They stretch it very far, and for my part, I would not shorten or restrain the acceptance of it, in this place, and in this matter: being a business of such consequence, that our eternal life lies upon it. Be as careful as you can; and all little enough: we can never be too diligent in the work of our salvation. Morally we may be Over-just, and press justice so hard, till it grow rank rigor. We may be over-zealous, till our anger against the errors and infirmities of others, become cruelty to their persons. We may be over-patient, till injury grows insolent, and oppressors make use of our insensibleness. We may be over-merciful, and wrong many innocents by favoring one malefactor. But we can never be over-good, nor over-holy, nor over-diligent in our care to be saved. We will never say of such men, with that Heathen: Non amo nimium diligentes, Though we strive never so hard to enter, we shall find the gate of Heaven strait enough. Run we never so fast; we are in danger of being cast behind, or coming short.

Be diligent. The other reddition is Studete: the former makes it a work of the hand, this of the head: there it is labor, here affection: in both an earnest endeavor. Study is a busy intention of the mind, a searching of the spirit. Scopebam spiritum meum: I communed with mine own heart, and my spirit made diligent search. So that one referreth to action; Satagite: the other to affection, Studete. There be two works that argue spirit and life to be in us; motion and sense. In the Agite, there is motion; in the Studete, sense. There is motus laesus in them that labor not, and Sensus laesus in them that mind not. We must both Satagenda studere, and Studenda satagere; mind what we are to do, and do what we mind. Both together; one is little worth without the other. There be many that will Satagere, find themselves work enough, though they have no thanks for their labor. So Martha was troubled about many things, but she neglected the necessary one. So Peter undertook enough to save his Master, though thereby he had lost himself. Here was Satagere, too much; but without a Studere; no knowledge to guide it right.

There be others that have their Studere, their knowledge in some good measure; but at the Satagere they are quite out. Sapiunt quae caeli, rapiunt quae terra. They have competent science, but are the worst doers in a Country. Less of their study, and more of their practice would do better. Pariter intelligent nobiscum, pariter non diligunt. They understand something of this future blessedness, but they are coldly affected with it. But Studete and Satagite would be kept together. For as in a natural body, it fares between the head and the stomach: a rheumatic head spoils the stomach with distillations; and a distempered crude stomach fills the head with raw vapors: in vicem laedunt. So an erring mind misguides the endeavor, and a wrong endeavor puts the mind out of frame. If there want a Studeie, a mind to Heaven; our Satagere or endeavor will tend to the worse: If there want a Satagere, the endeavor of a good life to come thither, our Studere or contemplation of it is to no purpose. The Studere of the head, without the Agere of the hand, will not stir a foot: The Agere of the hand without the Studere of the head and heart, will move, but out of the way: better sit still. Put them both together in their joint offices, and then give them as much diligence as may be.

But herein alas, our diligence flagges. A runagate son, leaving his father, and living in foreign Countries, was brought to want: and finding little charity among strangers, he was driven to work for sustenance. Industry brought in gains, and the sweetness of gains whetted on industry: soon he grew rich, became a Merchant, and dealt in traffic with diverse Nations: and, among the rest, with some of that Nation wherein his father lived. Hearing news how potent and opulent his father was grown; of his wealth and authority in the city, he resolves to steer his course thitherward. Four businesses he puts in his head: One was to congratulate with his friends and allies, another to be merry with his old companions, the third, to gather up his debts, the last and principal, to be reconciled to his father. Being arrived there, he follows his three former employments close; he fails in none of them: but these did so wholly take up his time, that he quite forgot the main, the reconciliation to his father. The Mariners on a sudden call a-bord, the Tide tarries no man; presently he must take ship, and so leaves that business utterly undone. We are all strangers upon Earth, our Father is the Almighty King of Heaven: we are charged but with four businesses here. First, Honestly to provide for ourselves and our families. Secondly, To perform all just duties to our neighbors. Thirdly, to solace our hearts with the sober and thankful use of God's Creatures. Fourthly, chiefly of all, to serve our Maker in all holy obedience, to acknowledge our sins with humble penitence, to get his pardon through the merits of his Son Jesus, and to make sure our inheritance in these new Heavens. We are diligent in the rest; we heap up riches, we sate ourselves with pleasures, we are indulgent to our bodies: But for the matter of most moment, the pleasing of our God, and the salvation of our souls, we are as negligent, as if they were things not concerning us. Death calls us a-board, carries us away in his deep bottom; and the main business we came for, is left uneffected. when we truly examine our life, the whole course of it to this day, do we not find this true? We cannot but confess it, let us also amend it: and what ever become of our riches, of our pleasures, of our bodies, let us be diligent to save our souls.

Be diligent: to make up the composition of diligence there must go three ingredients; vigilancy, laboriousnesse, and speed: where either of these is wanting, there is no true diligence.

1 There is no right study without some watchfulness: be diligent, must needs include, be vigilant. Awake thou that sleepest, and Christ shall give thee light. They that be called into Christ, and yet live in sin, are sleepers. They that sleep, sleep in the night. But our day is broken, why then do we sleep? When the Sun is once up, all good husbands think of rising. The slumber of the body and soul are not much unlike. First, when the body is a-sleep, the senses have done working: the eyes are closed, and suspend the act of seeing. In this spiritual slumber, sinners do not hear God's Word, nor see his Sacraments, nor feel his grace and comforts. We do not say they cannot; but we are sure they do not. Secondly, in sleep there is an interruption of the working of the animal faculties: So there is a suspension of graces powerful operation in the soul, during this spiritual slumber. Charity is cold, Faith benumbed, Zeal obstupified; neither Patience, nor Temperance awake. Thirdly, the ascending of vapors from the stomach, causeth sleep: so worldly thoughts in a covetous heart, hinder the influences of God's Spirit. Spiritual sleep is more dangerous than corporal: this only hinders some actions of mortal life: that robs us of our prayers, meditations, repentance, and things that conduce to our salvation, it borders upon death: when the Divine should preach, he sleeps: when the Magistrate should do justice, he sleeps: when the rich man should show mercy, and hear the complaints of the poor, widows and Orphans, he is fast a-sleep. Call you this diligence? Indeed it is so in one acception, even a diligent course to perdition.

2. The endeavor to be saved, is no easy task: it will require some labor. It is not wickedness glossed over with a fair pretence or profession, as Popery is, but Atheism dipt in the colors of religion. It is not like the trade of usury, to sit still and receive money. Nor a walking in some pleasant Gallery; where that Epicure spent his time, as if he had been hired to do errands from picture to picture. It is not a tumbling upon Roses and Violets, Like the old Sibarites, or our new Libertines; that know no felicity but delicacy, nor other Heaven than sensuality. No, but Heaven is the reward of labor: no labor, no reward. I exercise myself always to have a good conscience, saith Paul. Idleness is allowed to no man, no not to the great man. Quo major sum, magis laboro. And as bodies inclined to be fat, had need of most exercise: so men that have the world coming too fast upon them, and are in great danger to be rich, should be most busy in the works of charity. If riches increase, set not thy heart upon them. If they increase: there is not so much danger till then. S. Paul knew that Nothing could separate him from the love of God in Christ: yet who wasin labors more abundant? Nullus labor durus, quo gloria aeternitatis acquiritur. Refuse no work for such a reward; we go to Heaven as Paul went to Rome; when they were glad to row for their lives, to throw their goods over-bord with their own hands; and yet when we are got a-shore, think it a saving voiage.

The Wicked take pains to do mischief: as an able Beggar creeps on his hands and knees in the mire, to get money. Ask the Covetous, whether it be notin vain, that he riseth so early, and so late takes rest. Ask the proud Popinjay, that, like to the fantastical Builder, Diruit, aedificat, mutat quadrata rotundis; is still dressing and undressing, changing tires, yea, changing colors, turning pale into red; and she never out of exercise. As it was said of Cain,Erat aedificans, he did never finish: so of her, Est adornans, she hath never done. Ask the Ambitious, whether withlofty eyes, and an haughty heart, he does not exercise himself in matters too high for him. Ask the pragmatistical Censurers of other men's labors; and there is some labor in that too. Howsoever it was the Philosophers answer to that question; What is the easiest thing in the world? To find fault: yet the wits of this age make it their exercise. There is no vanity without weariness: and that which the flesh accounteth her greatest pleasure, is accompanied with labor. Let us run so much the faster, as we run for a better prize. It is a shame that voluptuous men should contend harder for this old earth, than we for that new Heaven. Reward is the encouragement of labor: now the greater reward challengeth the greater labor: We must all confess, that our reward is better:For he that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption: but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. The ends are divers, the ways are divers, the pains is much at one.

Heat is the state of grace, Coldnesse the state of sin, Lukewarmness medium obtinet: It neither ebbs nor flows, but is just standing water.Sicut à frigore per teporem transitur ad calorem: ita à calore quoque per teporem reditur ad frigus. The sweet and pure waters are ever in motion: but aquae stagnantes breed nothing but venomous and noxious things. Houses that are not inhabited, soon abound with Vermin. Grounds untilled, will be overrunne with weeds. Birds are taken while they sit, not so easily flying: and dum morantur in nidis, they moult and lose their feathers: idleness doth neither get nor save. What is profuseness and the wasting our estates, but the effect of negligence? Earth useth to comsume other men, but the prodigal heir consumes earth. He runs out of his wits first, then out of his patrimony: applauding himself in his witty riot, that though he should sell it for six pence, yet he should be no loser by it, for it never cost him a groat. But that a man should loosely squander away his eternal patrimony, and be so prodigal of the purchase of Jesus Christ, which cost Him no cheaper than his own heart-blood: Ad quid perditio haec? It hath been said, that of all crafts-men, Musicians were the happiest; because they did earn monie with making themselves merry: But to buy everlasting woe and pains, with the expense of a short merriment, is no less than extreme madness. There is a great deal of diligence in the world, a world of diligence; but it is all for the world. If men by chance think on Heaven, they think withal, that a very little diligence will bring them thither. But it will grieve them when it is too late, to find how they have deceived their own souls. The Laborers, not Loiterers, have the reward. The Crown is laid up, not for Cowards, but for Conquerers. There is Corona miseriae, which is worn below: but Corona gloriae is laid up, and you know for whom: even for those who have fought a good fight.

Bee diligent then, and in this point that you may be saved: yea, in this point of an holy life be diligent, and you shall be saved.

3. Be diligent.] As this implies more than a simple act of diligence; even an habit, which is a continued act: so it binds us to the present. It is a charge that does not only bind semper, but ad semper. It allows no dilation; not Bee diligent hereafter: no cessation, not Be diligent until such a day, and then give over: no interruption, not Be diligent sometimes, at other times take your liberty. But it imposeth a constant course, a perpetual practice of diligence upon us. Lingring is dangerous; especially where the days be short, and the ways not very fair. Teach us to number our days: Our life is called Days; for the Brevity, Clarity, Misery of them. First, for Brevity; the longest day will have a night: and Qui numerat dotes, numerat dies. Every day that does not abate our reckoning, increaseth it. Secondly, for Clarity; all works are seen in the day: we may sin in tenebris, by doing opera tenebrarum: but the darkness and the light are all one to God. A man that is in darkness, better sees another that is in the light; than he that is in the light, can discern him that is darkness. But on the contrary; God is in light, yet He plainly sees us in darkness: but we that are in darkness, cannot perceive Him being in light. Thirdly, for Trouble; the day is full of business: our work, we complain, is never at an end. There is no rest till night comes; then we fall asleep. Therefore let me pray; Sit somnus meus, ut laboris, sic peccati cessatio: ne quid per somnia cogitem, quod te offendat, vel me polluat. Death makes a stop of all; whether sin or trouble: it silenceth all tongues; both that which hath discoursed of the Sun and stars; and that which hath conversed with Fiends and Devils. Sleep is the image of death: Let me think therefore, Longum somnum, somnum mortis; Lectum sepulchri, stramentum vermium, operimentum pulveris. Let us do the work of Him that sent us while it is day; for in the night no man can work.

In the driving of a nail, we begin easily; but proceed to the redoubling of our blows: and the oftener we strike, the more is the nail fastened, and the harder to be drawn forth. In the same manner doth sin fortify it self in the soul: so that in our old age, when we grow weaker, the old man in us waxeth stronger: and the sin we are not able to do, we take pleasure to think. What madness is it to defer our amendment to such an unable estate; which is so far unfit to sustain those austere excercises, that both the conversion of a sinner, and convention of a Christian require, that it is scarce able to sustain it self? what caryer will lay the heaviest burden upon the weakest beast? will God accept of the blind, lame, or sick for Sacrifice? If He require the best of our substance, much more the entire substance of ourselves. Heaven and Hell are diametrically opposite; and the ways unto them are full contrary: if we travel altogether the way to Hell, is it possible that in the end of our journey, we should arrive at Heaven? I know it is impiety, to abridge either God's mercy, or his power: but when ever did he promise a happy death to a sinful life? Say that men should repent in their last hour, doth it not rather procede from fear, than from love? Or if it be from love, is it not rather the love of themselves, than of God? And what thanks shall they have, to forsake their sins, when they have no longer time to enjoy them? Such an advantage the Devil gathers by their delay; that if he can possess them all their life, he will hardly loose them at the hour of their death. I know that God never faileth in his Promise of receiving a sinner, whensoever he turneth to him: but whether this turning to God, when Men are turning out of the World, be a true conversion or not; here is the doubt. They returned not to the most high; they cried not unto him with their hearts, though they lay howling upon their beds.

To die well is a long art, but we have no long time to learn it. Die (we know) we must all: all by the bond of necessity, the righteous by a willing surrender of their souls. Nor is death an easy passion; the very dissolution of the holy, is not without pains. Si sit horribilis mors innocentis, quanto horribilior nocentis. When impediments shall be multiplied, helps diminished, the distraction great, the inclination small, the leisure none: in this hurly-burly of businesses, pangs, assaults, vexations; where shall we get room for a preparation to die well? Shall a man in one days sickness, learn more cunning than he could in many years health? Dare we adventure to cross those Seas, without any fear, wherein so many Passengers have miscarried? whereof so many skillful Pilottes make a doubtful and fearful report? Christ died, that sin should die, and we might live: and shall we suffer that sin to live, which will make us die? look to thy Clock-house, the Time past, and be sorry for the mispence of it: to thy Storehouse, and dispose of thy temporal trash: to thy Closet-house, thy inward Conscience, and cleanse that by repentance. Resipiscere is but Resapere, a point of after-wit. To this Reason, Equity, Law, do bind thee: to this Heaven, Earth, and Hell, Life, and Death, Justice and Mercy, do partly invite, partly enforce, altogether call thee. Wilt thou still desperately persist in sin? The Devils sinned, having no example of Justice to restrain them: thou hast seen many examples of God's just vengeance upon sin; is not thy wickedness, in that respect worse than the Devils? For fear of human laws, thou dost moderate thy delights: and wilt thou not forbear one sinful pleasure for the love of God? A table of delicate meats is presented unto thee: but a friend tells thee in private; Take heed how you eat, for some of the dishes are poisoned: here thy discretion can bridle thine appetite, and thou wilt rather be content with homelyer fare, so it be wholesomer. The whole World is a Table spread full of pleasing daynties: the Prophets and Apostles tell us plainly, there is danger in tasting: we will not believe them, but eat and perish.

Why should we presumptuously sin against that Majesty, which is only able to pardon our sins? If we be persuaded of his mercy, we are ungrateful to offend him: If we doubt of his mercy, we are unwise to provoke him. If by his mercy we ever come to repentance, the longer we have been without it, the greater sorrow we shall find in it: for our sorrows, in some decree, must be answerable to our sins. Therefore, Explora, Deplora, Implora. Explora; try and examine thine heart: search out the secret sins that there lie sculking. Deplora; weep, mourn, lament for them. Implora, pray for mercy to pardon them, for grace to amend them. Let there be an echo resounding in the thickets of our hearts: Seek ye my face: thy face O Lord, will I seek. And as the echo never answers the voice so well, as where be ruins and ragged buildings: so doth sorrow best echo unto sin, where the heart is ruined and broken with afflictions. The waters stand in the valleys, and fill the furrows: the tears of repentance are found in the humble soul: you shall be sure of them in the fractures and breaches of a contrite heart. We weep, are those tears for our own sins, or for the sins of others? Take either of them, they have a large field to water. The two mid-wives that stifle the brattes of sin in us, are repentance and circumspection; and these are only available in their season. There is abundance of sorrow in Hell, but not one dram of comfort. You remember the story of him, that being often reprov'd for his ungodly and vicious life, and exhorted to repentance, would still answer, that it was but saying three words at his death, and he was sure to be saved. Perhaps the three words he meant, were Miserere mei Deus, Lord have mercy on me. But one day riding over a bridge, his horse stumbled, and both were falling into the river: and in the article of that precipitation, he only cried, Capiat omnia Diabolus; Horse and Man, and all to the Devil: Three words he had, but not such as he should have had. He had been so familiar with the Devil all his life, that he thinks on none else at his death.

Worldly men let slip no advantage of gain, no occasion of getting riches: but Lord, how many opportunities of getting grace, and pardon for our sins, and of doing good works, pass by us without acceptance, without regard! Alexander having set his army in battle array, and finding a Soldier then mending his arms, cashiered him; saying that that was the time of dealing blows, not of preparing weapons. We use to bridle our horse before we ride, not in the midst of our race: If we do not reine in our passions before our dying time, they will scorn to be checked then. We have our season, and that season is in time, as the joint in a member: if you hit on the joint, you may easily divide: if on this side, or beyond, you shall not do it, or not do it so well. Delay, and diligence are incompatible things: the time is all; the main matter; and more ado ever about that, than the thing it self: of that let us take special care. It was not without great cause that our Savior complained of that point; If thou known in this thy day the things which belong unto thy peace! And so was fain to break off, the tears coming so fast, that he was not able to speak out, but to weep out the rest of the sentence. Those tears show what time is: they show that opportunity is a grace, even to have it: that it is a second grace to know it, but a third grace, and better than both the rest, to make good use of it.

Without spot and blameless.] Some would have these duo nomina synonyma: and indeed they are so in effect; unum signantia; they both tend to holiness of life: that is the main object of this diligence. But can there be such a perfection in this life? Some may be without blame; but is there any without blemish? The World doth blame some that are without spot: and God finds spots in many that appear without blame. There be four sorts of Men; as Saint Bernard makes four habitudes or states of Conscience. First Tranquilla, non bona: the way of Nabal, whose heart was dead within him. Secondly, Bona non tranquilla: the way of David, who still was blest in GOD'S Love, yet still complained of his anger, Thirdly, Nec bona, nec tranquilla: the way of Cain; without giving one look toward Heaven. Fourthly, Tam bona, quàm tranquilla: the way of Angels filled with joy above their fellows. So of men. First, some scape without public blame, that are not without inward spots: such are hypocrites. Secondly, some are not spots of scandal, yet undergo much blame: as they picked quarrels with Daniel about his God, and charge Paul with sedition, who had no fault but his devotion: these are maligned innocents. Thirdly, some are both polluted with many spots, and convinced of just blame: and such are dissolute and incorrigible sinners. Fourthly, others are pure from spots, and free from blame; and these be happy Saints. This undefilednesse is proper to Christians; and not as they are in themselves, but as they are in Christ: It is not a legal perfection, but an evangelical righteousness: Holy, unspotted, and blameless they are; vel comparative, in regard of the profane: vel reputative, in regard of the worlds just challenge: vel potius imputatione, in respect of Christ's righteousness made theirs: which doth both cover their sins from the eyes of God, and justify their persons in the presence of God.

Without spot.] That we may be found thus immaculate, two things are required of our diligence: First, that we get off the spots we have, and then keep ourselves from contracting new.

First, we are spotted by nature, we came not into the world without uncleanness: but for this God hath ordained a Laver, a Sacramental Font to wash us in, the blood of Christ. And this remedy must be applied with all diligence: for so God's mercy provided for us, that presently after we are borne according to nature, we should be new borne by his grace: and that the blood of the second Adam, might cleanse us from the sin of the first. Thus cleansed we are: but alas, we not sooner come to able years, than we gather new stains. Wherewithall shall a young man cleanse his way? The youngest man needs cleansing. But can he do it himself? So it seems by the Prophet; Clenſe thy heart O Jeruſalem: and by the Apoſtle too; Every man that hath this hope, purifieth himſelf. Ezekiel indeed ſeems to ſpeak otherwiſe: I will ſprinkle clean water upon you, ſaith the Lord, and ye ſhall be clean. Joel ſaith, Turn ye to the Lord: but Jeremiah ſays, Lord do thou turn me, and I ſhall be turned. Doth not that of Joel croſs that of Jeremiah? Is there Prophet againſt Prophet? No, cleanſe your hands ye ſinners, and Lord, Do thou cleanſe us, and we ſhall be clean; may both well ſtand together. Indeed God only and freely does it: When the filthy ſinner is condemned, Inculpabilis Dei iuſtitia: when another is purified and cleanſed, Ineffabilis Dei gratia. As it is in generation, ſo in regeneration. Generare is not to make him that was an imperfect man before, to become perfect; ſed efficere ut ſit homo. So Regenerare is not to help one that deſires to be good, ſed efficere ut ſit iuſtus. All is from above nature: That grace which to man in ſtatu primo was natural, in ſtatu lapſo is ſupernatural to him. I will take away your ſtony heart, and give you a heart of fleſh. Non dicit ſe tranſtaturum, ſed ablaturum. There is no more plyableneſſe in a man's nature to be pure and holy, than there is aptitude in a ſtone to be ſoft. Can the Ethiopian change his ſkin? or the Leopard his ſpots? Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? No man; only The Lord waſheth away the filth of Zion, and purgeth out the blood of Jeruſalem.

Chriſt was long knocking at the Churches door, but ſhe could not open: at laſt He put in his hand, and removes the bar; loe then ſhe could riſe and open to Him. Accedat gratia, & fiunt omnia. By the grace of God I am what I am. In the firſt act of Regeneration, the will is ſo cleanſed, that it wills it own cleanſing. For it is not like to a piece of Wax, merely paſſive; which without any act of it own, only receives and ſuffers an Impreſſion: But rather like to Fire, which as ſoon as it is Fire, burneth; and ſo ſoon as it burneth, is Fire. So the will of man, in the ſame inſtant that it is converted, moveth it ſelf conversion. I labored more abundantly than they all; yet not I, but the grace of God which it with me. Betwixt Not I, and With me, comes in the Grace of God, in the miſt: That grace which is Not I, but With me. He might well ſay, With me, that had firſt ſaid Not I. In the Commandment it is manifeſt, Quid facere debemus: in the puniſhment, quod non fecimus: in our not doing it, Quid meremur: in faith and prayer, unde gratia habenda: in our converſation and cleanſing, a quo recepta: in our perfeverance, per quem retenta. Still neither young man, nor old man, nor any man can cleanſe away his own spots:

only the blood of Christ cleanseth us from all our sins. But in every sin, besides the guiltiness, there is filthiness: and Cùm remittitur reatus, remanet labes. These we daily contract, and there is no hour added to our lives, wherein some uncleanness is not added to our souls. These stains God leaves to our own cleansing: here is work for repentance. And thus must those Scriptures and Fathers be understood, that say, Repentance doth peccata diluere: they mean not secundum reatum, but secundum labem. The blood of Christ gives us all the right tincture: that dyes us into the color of righteousness: and this color is in grain: it will never wear out. If we be thoroughly dipped in his blood, that tincture shall last with us; both to justify us on earth, and to glorify us in Heaven. But the garment thus heavenly coloured, may get some stains; and those must be daily washed off with our penitent tears. For this cleansing of our spots, three acts are required: first, cernere, to perceive them: then, spernere, to hate them: and lastly, prosternere, to cast them off.

1. Our first care must be to discern them: for we may have spots, and not be aware of them. A man may have a mole upon his back, and yet because he never saw it, think his skin clear. Polygamie was a sin, and therefore a blemish: yet because it could plead age and example, it was admitted by those elder Saints: and even good Elkanah was tainted with that sin of Lamech. As fashions of attire, at their first coming forth, are disliked for uncomely: but when through custom they are grown common, they be taken up of the gravest: Licita quae solita. The continuance of an unknown sin, currant with the time, doth not hinder the uprightness of a man's heart with God: the least touch of knowledge or willfulness mars his sincerity. Who can understand all his errors? Clense thou me from secret sins. We have many spots which God does not hear from us, because we see them not in ourselves. Who will acknowledge that error, whereof he does not know himself guilty? The sight of sins is a great hapinesse; for it causeth an ingenuous confession. Then Peccavi, we cry; and that our sins are lata, What place have we been in, and not left behind us some witness or monument of our wickedness? Longa, even from our mothers breasts; yea, from her womb: We were conceived in sin: and we have done wickedly even unto this day. Multa, more innumerable than the hairs of our head. Magna, great in quantity; Pardon mine iniquity, for it is great—Alta, ad coelum clamore pertingentia. Our trespass is grown up unto the Heavens. Profunda; We have deeply corrupted ourselves. Gravia; they are aburden too heavy for us to bear. Crassa, we have hailed them on with cords and cartropes: as if they could not come fast enough without a violent attraction. They have given themselves over to lasciviousness, to work all unclennesse with greediness. Qualitate pessima; both because they are committed durâ frontê, with a whores forehead, that refuseth to be ashamed: and done gratis propter vana; What fruit had ye then of those things, whereof ye are now ashamed? No fruit doth appear, but rather we have served the Devil for nothing.

This liberal confession is a degree to our purgation. In the courts of men, confess and be punished: before the Throne of Grace, confess, and be acquitted. Being charged with a same of uncleanness here, we answer, not guilty: and that is a kind of purging: There we charge ourselves; guilty O Lord, I am unclean, and that is the way to be purged. and pronounced clean. This benefit comes by the sight of our sins: for first there must be knowledge, before there will be an acknowledgement. God's Law is the glass that shows us all our spots: let us hold it right to our intellectual eye. Not behind us, as the wicked do; they Cast God's Words behind them. This is to stand in our own light: Can a man see the spots on his face, by setting the glass behind his back? He that rejects this Glass, the sacred Word, cannot but have a leptous soul. Not besides us: there was a rich Worldling that called to Christ for this Glass; and when it was shown him, he thought himself well favored, a very honest man: All this have I kept from my youth up. Surely he held the Glass to the wrong side: that part of him which was spotted with filthy worldliness, he could not see. So Paul while he was a Pharisee, thought himself concerning the righteousness of the Law, blameless: but then the Glass was on the wrong side of him. Afterward, I had not known sin but by the Law: there he held it right. Neither let us turn the backside of the Glass toward us; which is the trick of Hypocrites. I am not as other men are, Extortioners, Unjust, Adulterers, or even as this Publican. Cunning Dissembler! He kept the back of the Glass to him; so that he could see no reflection of himself at all. If he had held it right, he should have discerned a deformed and polluted Creature. As one of the Persecutors in Queen Mary's days, pursuing a poor Protestant, and searching the house for him, charged an old woman to show him the Heriticke: she points to a great chest of linen, on the top whereof lay a fair looking glass: he opens the chest, and asks where the Heriticke was: she suddenly replied; Do you not see one? Meaning that he was the Heriticke, and that he might easily see himself in the Glass. So rightly if he had looked, that Pharisee might have seen the resemblance of an Hypocrite. Nor (lastly) let us look upon ourselves in this Glass, when we are muffled, masked, or cased: for under those veils we cannot discern our own complexions. But let us set the clear Glass before our face, and our open face to the Glass: The fight of our filthiness is the first step toward cleanness.

2. Next, we must learn to detest our spots: The Leopard is full of spots, but he does not dislike them, because they are rather an ornament to him: but shall men think so of their sins? There be some that do: even glory in their shame: but mark their end; It is no better than destruction. Were they ashamed when they had committed abomination? Did they blush at their blemishes? When the proud Dame hath a scar or blemish upon her skin, if with artificial colors and medicines she cannot remove it, yet she will carefully hide it: By her good will she would rather have a foul foul, than a foul face. She hath a glass that tells her all her defects: and she studies by it the art of pride, even to the placing of a pin, and ordering of an hair; all which diligence is not worth a pin or hair. Do sinners hate their spots? Do they not rather take a pride in them, and count them an honor? Did you never hear men swear in a bravery? Can there be fouler spots upon the conscience, than vain and outrageous oaths? And, yet is not this esteemed a grace among our Gallants? What say you to a long extravagant lock at the ear; a bush for the sign of a fantastical head? Would any men wear this but for pride? And is not pride the bespottedness of the soul? Is the nature of it so changed since it came to hell, or from hell; that that which made devils, should be thought to become Christians? Alas, for the meretricious foreheads of sinners; that they should glory in the foulness of their spots? Did you ever read of a Leper, that took pleasure in his sores and ulcers? Would not Naaman have given all his wealth and glory, for the cure of his Leprosy? If we could perceive the lothesomnesse of our impieties, it were not possible not to abhor them, not to abhor ourselves for them. Shall we love our own filthiness, as the Ethiopians do their own swarthisness? No, but rather let us hate the garment spotted of the flesh. Bee thy sin never so dear to thee, it should not be so dear as thy soul. How well soever thou thinkest it becomes thee, it is a spott, that makes thee odious to God, to Saints and Angels. Away with it though it lies in thy bosom: mortify it, though it stick on thy skin. Will any beautiful woman drink that potion, which she knows will turn her fair body into a leprosy, though it be pleasant to the taste of her palate? Skin for skin, and all that a man hath, will he give for his life. If a man will give skin for skin, to save his life; will he not give spott for spott, to save his soule?

3. Lastly we must cleanse them: when we come to behold the number of our sports, we easily see the necessity of our tears. Polluere, that is opus peccati: Diluere, that is opus paenitentiae. It is true, that Christ righteousness is a garment, so covering our spots that they cannot be seen: and his blood a medicine so cureing our spots that they shall not be. But Christ never shed his blood for that man's sins, that for his own sins will not shed so much as tears. One soweth and another reapeth: Indeed Christ sowed and we reap: he sowed in tears, and we reap in joy: yea he sowed in blood and death, and we reap in peace and life: Yet we must sow in tears too, that we may reap in joy. Must not we also have a wet seed time, that look for so glorious a harvest? That Lamb takes away the sin of the world: he did not die to take away our sorrow, but our sin: not to free us from a seasonable contrition, but to save us from everlasting destruction. From the sole of the foot to the head there was no soundness in us; but wounds, and bruises, and putrefying sores: As there was no whole part in us by reason of sin, so nor in him by reason of sorrow. His head was full of thorns, his back full of scourges, his eyes full of tears, his body full of wounds, his soul full of sorrows; and all because we were full of sins. And shall not this fullness of sin work in us a fullness of remorse? shall not our eyes also be full of tears, our bosom full of sighs, our mouths full of cries, our hearts full of sorrows? Did he weep for us, that we should spend our days in laughter? Donec ego in error, ill in maerore: still whilst we are sinful, he is sorrowful: and shall we not be grieved, for thus grieving him? Our griefs are not meant to requite him: but they are the echoes of thankfulness to him.

What was it that did put him to so much pains, but our sins; and shall we not mourn for them? If we do not weep for them as they are our spots, yet in reason we should, as they were his torments. They were his torture, they are still his displeasure. As the Disciples in that tempest to him, Master carest thou not that we perish? So he to us, care you not that I did perish for your sakes? He did not with Job curse his nativity, nor with David cry out on his sufferings: but is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? Have ye no regard? our carelessness of what he suffered; this was his grief. Have we not so much as the oil of tears, to pour into his wounds? the end of all he suffered, was to save us: no marvel if the disrespect of that grieved him. Justly therefore should that cost us tears, which cost him blood: especially let us weep for putting him to such charges. His bleeding does not take away our weeping: no soul is justified by his death, that does not daily die unto sin. And death cannot be without pain. Thou swearest, and that oath is a spott upon thy heart: weep for that. Thou liest, and that falsehood is a spott upon thy conscience: weep for that. Thou lustest, and that filthy desire is a spott on thy soul: weep for that too: weep for all. How many be our blemishes, yet how few our tears? The beloved of Christ are all fair, and have no spott in them: how got they this fairness? Like a flock of sheep, they come up from the washing. The Martyre upon the wheel could smile in the midst of his torture: which being wondered at, he told his friend, that there was a young man whom they saw not, (some Angel sure) who by continual pouring of cool water upon his distorted limbs, so mitigated his pains, that he could smile at them. We see pious and devout men, militant Saints, falling into diverse infirmities: they have their spots: but repentance is the good Angel that pours upon them cool water, continual tears to wash them away. This is the Bath that renders us Immaculatos, without spot.

What is there which they used not to cleanse under the Law? their cities, their gates, garments, their very Altars. we have our Cities also to cleanse, the corporation of our affections: our gates, which be our eyes, ears, and senses, those doors, windows, and in-lets of the soul: our garments, our lives and conversations, which are the visible apparel of our spirits: our very altars, our hearts, upon which we offer all our sacrifices. Our hands must not escape, those instruments of lust and rapine; Cleanse your hands ye sinners. For his eyes, Job had his Pepegi foedus, as if he had bound them to the good behavior. Especially our hearts: it can be neither time nor labor lost, that is spent in cleansing of the fountain. Should any now make it their work, God would look graciously down from Heaven upon such Laborers, to whom his own Son hath given that benediction; Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Mans heart is like Moses his Rod: so long as he held it in his hand, it was a Rod: but when he threw it to the ground, it turned to be a Serpent. All the while that we hold our heart in the continual awe and love of God, it shall remain pure and clean: but if our boisterous and unruly sins once throw it to the earth, it changeth presently, and becomes a soul Serpent. If there be any, whose conscience tells them, that their hearts are now turned into Serpents, crawling upon the earth living upon riches, that better esteemed mucke of the world; let them be persuaded, by stretching forth a hand of sorrow and true repentance, to take them up again, in what shape soever they appear: for then he that was exalted on the Cross, as the Serpent in the Wilderness, will turn those serpents into hearts again, their venom into innocence, and wash them clean in his own immaculate blood.

The sum of this consideration presseth us with the necessity of repentance: For seeing we gather aspersion every day, how should we be found without spots at the last day, unless we wash them off with repentance? O that our sorrows were but so manifest as our spots! Do we spend the night in weeping, that have wasted the day in sinning? Our neighbors of Rome tell us of a Purgatory hereafter; but by this trick they make a shift to purge men's purses here. They have many strange devises; as Iejunium viventium, spes mortuorum: the Churches Treasury is the Alms of Purgatory: They might better say, the wealth they get by Purgatory, maintains the Churches treasury. They all refer to this common term money. All Christendom they would have to be the Popes kingdom: Rome is his Court, France his Garden, Spain his Shambles or slaughter-house by their Inquisition; England was once his Brew-house, Italy his Kitchen, but Purgatory his Larder: from thence he fetcheth all his fat; his Brewis comes out of that Caldron. In Purgatory is nothing but extreme pain; and the Pope (they say) can free all at his pleasure: but why then are any detained there? doth he want power or will? If he want power, he is weak: if will he is wicked. If he would and cannot, he is unable: if he can and will not, he is uncharitable. But I will be more favorable, and quite deliver you out of Purgatory; I mean from the tedious trouble of further discourse of it. Keep yourselves from Hell, and never fear Purgatory.

All men depart this life vel mundi, vel immundi; none hereafter mundandi. In this life there is a double Purgatory: the blood of the Redeemer, and the tears of the Redeemed: without the former we have no cleanness of justification: no justification of our cleanness without the latter. They have washed their clothes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb: therein consists our pureness; And everyone that hath this hope, purifieth himself: thereby we have the knowledge of it. The Sun draws up vapors from the Earth; not for it self, but to restore them back to the Earth in showers and dews, to moisten and cleanse it, Christ, that Sun of Justice, exhales tears from our eyes, not for his own, but our benefit, even to wash and cleanse our souls.

And this cleansing must be done in time: forget not that. Let us be failing to our lustful desires, before Desire fails us. It is hard for a man grown old in evil, deponere animum puerilem: adhuc pueritia, & quod gravius est, puerilitas remane. They may have the authority of ancients, but withal the vanity of children. Satan in youth casts in those suggestions, which he would have kept in the soul for breed. Give no place to the devil: what, not in youth? No, no place, at no time. Where uncleanness hath gotten a haunt, it will be busily frequent: out of long possession, it will plead prescription. How long is it ago since this came unto him? Of a child. Oh then hard to be helped. It was the beggar woman's praise of her son, whom she had brought up to her own trade: while he was young, I begged for him: now he is grown towardly, and able to beg for himself. At first concupiscence was an advocate for sin, now sin is become an advocate for concupiscence. But as Hanibal was wont to say of the Romans, that they could not be overcome, but in their own country: so let us fight against our sin in the very heart, the country where it breeds. It was St. Bernard's exposition of that same conteret caput tuum; that the head of the serpent is then truly said to be bruised, when sin is there stifled, where it was first borne. As malefactors, wheresoever they be taken, are sent to the country where they did the mischief, for execution. He is a religious Herod, that kills such infants: nor shall he want the name of Happy, that dasheth these little ones against the stones. The more we do to get out our spots at first, the less work we find afterwards. I know that continual blemishes will come: every day we wash our hands; every hour let us wash our hearts, in the blood of Christ by faith, in our own tears by repentance. This is the way to be without spott.

Next; all this cleansing is not enough unless we continue so: This the Text requires of our diligence, that we be found without spott. We cannot be found such, unless we die such: and we cannot die such, unless we live such. It is something to undertake a journey, but the matter is to hold out. To keep ourselves clean a good way & then to fall into a puddle is a foul unhappynesse. So Asa, who in the prosperous reign of forty years long, sought unto God; in his old age, passing by God, seeks to Physicians. The latter end of a horse-race is by some called the Sobbe: so the last conflict of a Christian is the sorest: If we can hold out that brunt, there is prize and victory for us. The old experienced soldier fears not the rain and storms above him, nor the numbers falling before him, nor the troupes of enemies against him, nor the shott of thundering ordnance about him; but looks to the honorable reward promised him. But the delicate soldier only thinks of flying, and, instead of glory, brings home ignominy. If either the reproaches cast upon us, or the adversaries rage against us, or the example of sinners before us, or the temptations of the world about us, or the pleasure of our own lusts within us, can make us with Ephraim, turn our backs in the day of the Lord's battle, our spiritual warfare, we shall not be found without spott in the day of remuneration. Abraham did not give over his sacrifice, because the fowls were busy about him. Christ had compassion on the multitude, that continued with him three days, without meat, they did not leave him without audience, nor he them without comfort. Our Pilgrimage hath three days in this desert. The first day is the fear of God, which takes up the beginning of our conversion. 2. The love of God, which is spent in contemplating the sweetness of his mercy. 3. Our actual and constant obedience to his commandments: If in this day we be found unspotted, we shall find an estate forever blessed. It is not enough to get off the present, but to keep ourselves from future spotting. That is True religion, and undefiled before God, which keeps us unspotted from the world. To do this, there must be a desire, then an endeavor.

1. The desire of pureness is the first step towards it; an honest purpose bears out many errors in the eye of mercy. King Asa had divers (no small) faults: yet with one breath, doth God report both these; The high places were not removed, and Nevertheless Asa's heart was perfect. It were pity that the best man should be judged by every of his actions, and not by all. It is the main course of our life, that must either allow or condemn us, not some sudden and particular eruptions. How pleasing a thing is the sincerity of heart, that in favor thereof, our just God digests many an error! He will not see weaknesses, where he sees truth. If our whole desire be set upon holiness, though we have many spots, yet we shall be found without them. O God, let our hearts go upright, though our feet slide: the fall or blemish may shame us, may pain us: but through thy grace it shall not condemn us.

The first thing that takes the fire of holiness in us, is the will: Desiderium gratiae must be gratia desiderii: what we would be, we are: yea, and what we would have done, shall be reckoned to us as done. We do it, quoad conatum, though non quoad effectum. As the wicked sin more than they sin, in their desire: so the righteous do more good than they do, in their will to do it. God esteems our charitable beneficence, not only secundum quod habemus, but secundum quod tribuere velimus. Yea, the highest way of serving God, which is by martyrdom, hath a name and acceptance in Heaven, though it have no real being upon Earth, If there be a paratum cor, though there be not a perforatum cor, a proffer of blood, though no expense of blood; for the honor of Christ, it is taken for martyrdom. As Origen testified of one; Non illi martyrio, sed martyrium illi defuit. I know thy poverty, but thou art rich, saith the Spirit to the Church of Smyrna: poor in thy condition, rich in thy affection to goodness. Facultao secundum voluntatem, non voluntas secundum facultatem aestimanda est. Ye shall drink of my cup: Shall, because you are willing. Volens & dolens; the vehement desire of godly sorrow, is godly sorrow. We are charged to forsake all, houses, lands, friends, liberties, lives, for Christ: yet many die with houses, lands and riches in their possession, whom Christ receives, and crowns in Heaven, because they did part with all secundum animae praeparationem. If our heart be set upon holiness, more than half our work is done; the rest will be easy. In sin it is so. Whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery in his heart: that very lust is a deed of the heart. As the deed of the hand is the outward action, so the deed of the heart is the thought. The heart conceives a sinful purpose, which is never borne into action: yet it hath done what it could, and is accounted guilty. So in righteousness, the heart desires to do some holy act, which it cannot accomplish: yet Quia fecit quod potuit, it shall be rewarded tanquam si fecerit quod voluit.

2. This is some comfort for us, that our very desire to lead a holy life, shall find a merciful acceptance. But this is not enough, our endeavor must second our desire. As Grace is that primus motor, so Will is the primum mobile: endeavor hath the motion from desire, as desire hath hers from God. There may be an endeavor without a desire; as the slave is compelled to labor: and there may be a desire without an endeavor; as the slothful would be rich, but he will take no pains for it. Action is the soul of desire, the very life of purpose; without which they both die abortive. Thoughts are not always determined in resolutions: we cannot evermore say, this was concluded. Actions are always determined in effects; we can say this was done. Then are laws in their full state and majesty, when the Bench is witness of their execution. Then have counsels of war their honor, when we see the seal of an army set to them. Then purposes of goodness shine in their luster, when they are crowned with actual performance. As matrimony is scarce to be called matrimony, where there is a resolution against the fruits of matrimony, against the having of children: so the intentions of goodness are not intentions, but transient motions and mere illusions, where the practice is negligently suspended. The Orbe and Sphere of all arts is said to be the head; yet two of them are referred to the hand: Logic, the art of proving; and Rhetoric, the art of persuading; are expressed, the one by a hand contracted, the other by a hand enlarged. Our desire of holiness lies in the heart: but what evidence, what demonstration can be taken from that? Who searches these Rolles? The proof of all lies in the hand. The head and the hand too are required to a perfect natural man: Counsel and action too, to a perfect civil man: Faith and works too, to a perfect spiritual man. The very truth, whether of grace or corruption, that is in the heart, may be dissembled in the mouth, but it will visibly appear in the hand. It is true, that God principally looks to the heart; but he does not take off his eye, till he come to the hand: he regards that also.

First therefore keep thy heart with all diligence: it is best to begin there, but he that ends there, that comes not to the hand, never began at all. The heart is seated in man with all advantage of intelligence; almost in the very center, with a curious net of veins spread over it: like the spider in the midst of her web: which feeling the least touch that shakes her work, retires instantly from the danger. If thou wouldest keep thy heart from spots, let it avoid the very complement and first address of sin; shrink at the least noise, murmur, or whispering of it; and be sensible of peril at the least glimpse of a temptation. There is a world of fowl thoughts busy about the door of the heart: their very assaults will give a dash, but their entertainment sticks a hateful blot on the soul. Ill thoughts are the Vshers to ill actions, and ill actions bring sinners back again in a circle to ill thoughts: for impii in circuitu: they walk the round. First, they act a sin, because the thought hath pleased them: and then they think that sin over again, because the act hath pleased them: so by a damnable arithmetic multiplying one sin to a thousand.

First then look to thy heart; keep out sin there: as Physicians do in a dangerous sickness, by cordials to drive it from the heart. Into the other parts it must not be admitted neither: in any place it is a spot of filthiness. If it get into the eyes, there it is envy, covetousness or adultery: If into the mouth, there it is scurrility or blasphemy: If into the ears; there it is an itching petulancy: If into the belly, there it is excess and gluttony: If into the knees, there it is superstition and idolatry: If into the hair or garments, there it is pride and vanity: wheresoever it comes, it is a spot of impiety. If we do not guard everyone, we are in danger to lose all. And as we find the slippery condition of man in his highest mortal happiness, that the defect of any one thing conducing to this happiness, may ruin it: but it must have all the pieces together to make it up. So all places and parts of us must be guarded, to secure our safety: but the neglect of any one may be the loss of all. Yet alas, when all is done we have abundance of spots, and where is there water enough to wash them away? Our sins are an Ocean, and yet there is a red sea greater than this Ocean, and there is a little spring, through which this Ocean may pour it self into that red sea. Christ's blood is the red sea, our eyes are the spring. If by the spirit of true repentance, we can pass all our sins, through our eyes in tears, into the wounds of Christ, we shall be clean, and presented to him without spot, in that great day of retribution.

And blameless:] The former might be an inward, this is an external righteousness. There be two things dear to man's body; life and health: we would <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> all live and live happy. So there is Duplex vita; Realis & metaphorica. Real, O that Ishmael might live in thy sight. Metaphoricall, as vivat Rex, that is, free from misery; which indeed is vita vitalis. We do all, appetere vitam; and though with Saint Paul, we desire to be dissolved; yet mortem quaerimus ut vivamus: it is not to be unclothed, but clothed upon. So there be two thing precious to the soul; Bonitas conscientiae, and Sanitas famae. To be good, which is the comfort of our conscience at home: and to be reputed good, which is the testimony of the world abroad. There is Spotlesnesse in the one, unblameableness in the other. Some care nec esse, nec videri; neither to be, nor to be thought holy: such are our dissolute ruffians, and penurious misers. Some care for the videri, to feeme good, no matter for the esse, whether they be so or not: these are dissembling hypocrites. Some look to the esse, but are not so respectfull of the videri; which may be good men, but are not good patterns: They will make no show of purity before others, yet are diligent to keep it in their own he•ns. These are Christians, but cowardly ones: Sons indeed, like Reuben, but not excellent sons. Others regard both the esse and videri: they will be as good as they seem, and they will strive to appear as good as they are. As they have light, so it shall shine; that not only themselves, but others shall be the better for it. In the one they are spotless, blameless in the other: holy within, righteous without, blessed in all, through the merits of him that blesseth all, Jesus Christ.

That we may lead a blameless life, many cautions are required.

1. The abstaining from gross and scandalous sins; for they (of all other) deserve blame. There be some that discommon communities; mere murderers: Men think there is no murder, but where the hands are besmeared with blood; yea, there be pretences for Mans slaughter: God's Word never knew any such distinction; but Si non pavisti, occidisti. The engrossers arguments are forged in Hell. Homicide finds the patronage of valor; Reputation is dearer than life: This is the Devils sophistry, whereby he provides dishes for his own table before they be cold. But he that maliciously strikes another's body, is first stricken in soul; and indeed is dead, before he kills. These be notorious crimes; no man thinks they should pass without blame. The Usurer that desires to live with less faith and more security, hath some reasons for his legal theft; but he took them all out of the Devills lectures: he is not without evident blame. Drunkenness is such a scandalous fault: Reason is the essential difference between man and beast; and this drunkenness takes away. It is a coupling and combining sin; therefore more pernicious. The usurer and adulterer desire to enjoy their sins alone; but the chief delight of a drunkard is to infect others. This is the Dragons special venom; wherewith his elves, being intoxicated, strive to make others more beasts than themselves. The Ale-house is the Study, the Circle the •ot, the Drunkard the Conjuror, good fellowship the Charme, the Characters healths, the Goblin raised, is the Goblet or spirit of the Buttery; and to empty the purse of money, the head of reason, and the pot of liquor, (the Ale-wise of Kesgraves three outs) is all the business. There is Poculum charitatis, a cup of love; and there is Charitas poculi, a love to the cup. These and such like be monstrous sins: the doers of them shall be more than blamed.

2. The avoidance of injurious sins, such as bring detriment to others. Qui mihi injuriam, sibi culpam infert: If a man makes me smart, I may charge him with blame. The generation of one man's riches, is not seldom the corruption of another's. There is no blame in gaining of that, whereby our neighbor is no loser. But he that hasteth to be rich, shall not be innocent: he is sure of blame. This toucheth some of those, that have now (let them consider by what means) more plate, than their fathers had pewter. If they did not prefer opulency before innocence, and cared more to be wealthy than worthy, they would rather have eaten their meat in a wodden dish. The hire of laborers kept back by fraud, crieth; and that cry is entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabbath. They would never cry against you, if ye were not to blame. Such worldlings consult shame to their house, and sin against their own soul. He that oppreseth another, sins against his own soul. The stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam out of the timber shall answer it. The senseless walls and stones shall cry them down guilty. Do our Church-robbers quit themselves from blame-worthiness? Sacrilege is plain Idolatry: or if they be not both one, yet Saint Paul puts them both in a bag. Let Achan's pillage assure them, that they are not free from blame. He was stoned, with all his family: they shall not only smart themselves, but enwrappe all they have in the judgment. They that defile themselves with holy goods, are enemies to their own flesh and blood, even to all their posterity. It hath been proverbially spoken of him that desires to be soon rich, that he must have two Muches, and two Littles: Much greediness, and much diligence; Little shame, and little conscience: blame enough he cannot miss of.

3. Cold negligence and perfunctorinesse in the worship of God must be abandoned. Even Peter might deserve blame, and Paul does not stick to tell him of it for he was to be blamed. Outward adoration is a part of God's worship: though He chiefly requires the heart, yet the body is not privileged from his service. Christ that could bow the Heavens, did yet in prayer bow his knees. If both our body and soul be cleansed from their Leprosy, and but one of them return to give thanks, it is plain ingratitude. We have some that hold kneeling at the Communion to be Popish and Idolatrous, because it was once abused. Hezekiah brake down the brazen Serpent, because there was no further use of it: But did Licurgus well to cut down all the Vines, because some were made drunk with the Grapes? We continue this laudable custom of kneeling for divers reasons. First, to withstand profaneness: Atheism is more to be feared than Papism; Contempt than Superstition. Secondly, to stir us up to a reverent estimation of these holy and dreadful Mysteries: Thirdly, to put a difference between this, and other common bread and wine. Fourthly, to excite us to prayer, that we may receive Christ in humility. They therefore that refuse to submit themselves to this and other seemly gestures in the Church, are duly to be blamed. Our irreverent behavior in these holy places, is most intolerable. Servants in their masters house and presence, especially in their solemn attendance, will not presume to be covered; nor Courtiers or Nobles in the Kings presence-chamber. Yet when we appear before our heavenly Master, the King of Kings, in his own Temple, on go our hats, young and old; as if we were too good to be uncovered in his sight, that is able to cover us with confusion. Jacob had another thought; How dreadful is this place? This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of Heaven. Pretend what peevish reasons they can, without all question they will not be found blameless.

4. We must give no occasion of evil: though we do not commit sin ourselves, yet if we occasion sin in others, we are not blameless. We know evil by our neighbour, and report it animo calumniandi: it is true what we speak, we are no liars: it is malicious what we speak, and we are depravers, A rumor is like a spark of fire that is thrown abroad; which, lighting upon such fit matter as catching ears, proves to a flame, whereby not only guiltiness is scorched, but even innocence it self is sindged. Such occasion is is sometimes given by the very behavior of men and women, that there follows a generation of sins: We may well esteem a painted woman, a Sorceresie; one that tempts under Satan's visible colors. Who can suppose but she minds temptation, that dresseth her self like a Tempter? She that so attires her self, as to draw men to folly, though she prevail not, is more guilty than another that falls into sin upon weakness. Her carriage is blame-worthy, that hath given the occasion to be tried. True chastity scorns to have it ever come to this, that she must deny: but rather wears a deportment which keeps lust at such a distance, that it can have no hope. But she that baits her desires with prostituted looks, whose gestures and very countenance are enticements, shall be as free from blame, as whoredom is from diseases. Let her be clear from sin, she cannot be from blame: Et si illa non perit, tamen perdit. Many Israelites offended by reason of the high places, left in Judah: King Asa worshipped not there: he escaped sin in the one, not blame in the other. That Joseph was fair, it was not his fault; that his mistress inordinately loved him, it was his unhappiness: but if he had still continued in her pference, he could not have been excused from blame. Some Divines have fetched dancing within this compass, of giving the occasion of foul thoughts: and there is some kind of it that cannot be defended. One spake smartly; that a fool and a dancer differed but in this: a fool is a fool all his life, and a dancer while he is dancing. But if we would be free from blame, we must give no occasion of sin.

5. Lastly, to be blameless, we must abstain from all appearance of evil. Our first rule debarreth gross sins; such as was David's uncleanness, Peters denial of his Lord, and cursing himself to get credit amongst a cursed crew, be like accustomed to such fashions. The second forbids injurious sins, albeit glossed over with fair pretences: as Monopolies, which do a common mischief, yet bear the show of a common good. Not unlike to some Executioners of the Inquisition, who have been so kind in their cruelties; that when Christians were to be strangled for Religion, they have greased the halters, to dispatch them quickly. The third forbids all disorderly sins, by suffering that evil to be done which we do not ourselves. For this the holy Ghost blamed the Church of Thyatira: because they suffered the woman Jezebel to teach and seduce God's servants: Contrary to that express Canon of the Apostle; I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man. At home she may have imperium apud virum, by persuasion; not imperium in virum, by dominion. But for her to minister in the Church is most intolerable. We read but of one woman-Preacher throughout the whole Bible; and she was a Whore. That one act of Zipporah in circumcising her son, is neither warrant nor argument that women may administer the Sacrament of Baptism. The fourth rule excludes all occasional inducements to sin: as the erecting of licentious places; which may be the nests of unclean birds, and refuges of excess. The last forbids all show and semblance of sin: the three former are sins, these two latter may turn to sins: there we cannot escape blame, here we may incur it. Even lawful actions perverted, become damnable sins: as eating to provoke or maintain lust; drinking to scurrility or wantonness. David daunced before the Ark, without sin: the Israelites danced before their Calf, and it was Idolatry: as appears by that which Paul quotes: Neither be ye Idolaters, as were some of them: as it is written, The people sate down to eat and drink, and rose up to play. As a fair Virgin espoused, and shortly to be married to some noble Prince, whom she dearly loves, will not touch the thing which (she but doubts) may dedignifie her, and make her unworthy of his regard: So the good soul detests the very appearance of that evil, which may make her unfit for the embraces of Christ.

To be found blameless] That is the main matter: the Crown of all is Perseverance. To be found we are sure enough: all our care should be to be found blameless. Of the ten Lepers that came to Christ, after their healing, nine left Him: only one stayed with Him. Many begin well, but few continue; because Many are called, but few chosen: You shall see a tree in the Spring making a glorious show, with her leaves and blossoms: but in Autumn where be the fruits? Many a man's life is like an ill play; which begins bravely, goes on dully, and flagges in the conclusion. Rivers, the farther they run, the fairer streams they bear: the righteous have an eternal Spring of grace that feeds them, and in their running they gather in many waters: they flow with good works: till at their end, they empty themselves into the Ocean of Mercy.

God will take men as He finds them: not what they have been, but what they are, so He accounts them. When a man turns from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, the righteousness that he hath done shall not be mentioned: but in the sin that he hath sinned, he shall die. Were his head of Gold, in his first profession; his arms of Silver, somewhat embased in his progression; yet if his feet prove of Clay, if his latter end be dirty, fouled with earthly cares: in that state shall he be found, and according to that state judged. Such are not unlike the Philistine Kine, that brought the Ark to the land of Israel: and then turned back again to their Calves at home. Qui non proficit, deficit: qui in viâ subsistit, in luto haeret. Saint Augustine in every petition of the Pater noster, hath found out our prayer for Perseverance: I may not stand to amplify it. The Leopard doth not run after his prey like other beasts, but pursues it saliendo: and if at three or four jumpes he cannot seize it, for very indignation he gives over the chase. There be some, that if they cannot leap into Heaven, by a few good works, they will even let it alone: as if it were to be ascended Per saltum, non per scansum. But they are more unwise, that having got up many rounds of Jacob's Ladder, and finding difficulties in some of the uppermost; whether wrestling with assaults and troubles, or looking down upon their old allurements; even fairly descend with Demas, and take Heaven they that can get it.

But it will be unhappy to be found so: when the Lord found a guest without his wedding garment, He questioned his entrance: and receiving no answer, He pronounced his sentence; Take him, and bind him hand and foot, and throw him in outer darkness. He was found in a miserable case, and cast into a miserable place. But Paul desired to be found in Christ, and in the clothing of his righteousness. We are all sure to be found of him; Oh happy are we, if we be found in Him. We are in Him by faith, in Him by love, in Him by renovation, in Him by sanctification: But if our faith fails, if our love falls, if our newness decays, if our holiness corrupts, if we be not found in Him, all will go wrong with us. There will be an universal day of finding: many labor to find out the day of Judgment: in all sober judgment they might save that labor. For Generalis Iudicii tempus non invenies, particularis inveniet te. To be found, there is no doubt: but to be found without spot and blameless, there is the comfort. This is our time of finding Christ; that his time of finding us. For this cause shall everyone that is godly pray unto thee, in a time when thou mayest be found: this belongs to us. In that day God shall judge the secrets of all hearts by Jesus Christ: that belongs to Him.

If we do not seek Him while He may be found, He will meet with us when we would not be found. It is his complaint; Ye will not come unto me, that you might have life: they will not seek Him. At last they shall cry to the mountains and rocks, Fall upon us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the Throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: so loath are they to be found of Him. Ahab will not seek after Elias, to make his peace: Elias shall find out Ahab, and that with a woeful message. Our only way to get favor of Christ, in that his last office of a Judge, is now wholly to rely upon Him, in his present office of a Mediator. If we take other refuges here, we shall be to seek there. The Papists promise themselves divers Sanctuaries: they have their choice of Saints, and above all the blessed Virgin, to whom they direct their prayers. But as the Jews might not offer sacrifice, but at the Altar, so nor may we offer up our prayers but in Christ. And if we must not pray but in his Name, Shall we in his Name pray to Creatures, and make Him our Mediator to his servants, whiles we intend to make them our mediators to Him? No, but as Epiphanius writes of some of the Jews, that coming to a dying man, they will say; If Jesus be the Messias He deliver thee from all thy sins: though in life their hard hearts will not let them believe it, yet in death they are glad to make some doubtful use of it. So whatsoever the Romists tell us while they live, I am persuaded, this is the only refuge they cleave unto when they die; Christ, and none but Christ. In those legal or typical sacrifices, the people were to lay their hands on the head of the beast; testifying all their shares to be there, both in respect of the sin, and the deserved punishment. In like manner let us transfer all our sins upon our Head Christ, who was once sacrificed for us: so shall we be found of Him blameless, because He hath taken all our blame from us; and He will never condemn us to die for that, for which Himself hath died already.

In peace. So to be found is the consummation of happiness. Peace to Righteousness is Filia, Sponsa, Soror: the sister of a Queen, the daughter of a Queen and a Queen herself: Glory to GOD in the highest, and on Earth peace: there let her stand for a Queen, and be Righteousness her King, both married together in Christ. Righteousness and Peace have kissed each other: there they kiss and embrace like Man and Wife. Love the Truth and Peace: there let her be Soror, the sister of Truth and Righteousness: twinne-sisters of that Heavenly Parentage, never to be parted. Here in my Text, let her be Filia, the daughter of righteousness: for if we maintain holiness in heart and life, without spot and blameless, we shall be found in peace. Mark the upright man and behold the Just, for the end of that man is peace. If it be long before she comes to the Crown, yet she is borne to be a Queen, and in the end she shall have it. Yea, besides all these relations of Spouse, Sister, Daughter, she may also be called Mater justitiae, the mother of righteousness: Follow peace and holiness, without which no man shall see God: the mother is placed before the daughter. First be reconciled to thy brother, before thou offer thy gift at the Altar: Christ himself gives it the precedency, and sets Piety after Peace. And indeed Peace prepares the way for righteousness, and helps to prosper religion. Turbulent spirits have neither time nor means to be holy: but Peace makes us both capable of holiness, and acceptable to God in our holiness. Howsoever, let us not part them: such inseparable companions doth our Apostle wish them to us, that he would not have us found without them. Peace in this world is a precious earnest, a fair and lovely type of that everlasting peace of the world to come: And war in this world is a shrewd and fearful emblem of the everlasting discord, tumult and torment of Hell. Therefore our blessed God bless us with external, and internal, and make them both lead us to eternal peace.

If therefore we desire to be found in peace at that day, there; let us live in peace all our days here. Why should they find peace above, that fly peace below? I know no fairer or surer way to prepare you for the one, than by persuading you to the other. There may be many opposers of our Peace: the peace of Doctrine is opposed by Sectaries, the peace of tranquility is opposed by the contentious, and the peace of plenty is opposed by the oppressors: Against all these let us maintain peace; and that in respect of the Church, of the State, and of our own private carriage.

1. Let us begin at home, and keep peaceable bosoms. Bee at peace among yourselves. Love is Fomentum pacis, the vessel that contains the treasure of peace: if the vessel once breaks, Peace instantly runs out. Love is opposed to malice, so it covers offenses with the mantle of peace: To churlishnesse, and so it is liberal in giving: Opus charitatis: To hard-heartednesse, and so it is charitas operis. There is one possessive, Meum, which is a general peace-breaker, a common barretor that sets us all together by the ears. If men would yield a little of their own right, with a small loss of riches, they should purchase abundance of peace. Abraham to avoid contention with his cosin Lot, gave him free choice of the ground. Though he were the elder, and every way the better, and had the better cause too, yet he goes to his Nephew to deprecate strife. He that doth so now, that will follow the practice of our Father Abraham, must not acquaint a Lawyer with the matter: for if he consult him, there is nothing but law in his mouth.

Nor must this desire of peace be straitened: but Live peaceable with all men: not only with our friends, and such as love us; but even with our enemies, and such as hate us. Some mistaking that of saint Paul; Follow peace with them that call on the Lord out of a pure heart; fall to abridge our peace, denying it the full extent and latitude. Thus out of a surly singularity, they will have peace with none but the pure; and the pure in their own sense. As for others that are not of their pure strain, they are out of all peace with them. They will not so much as afford them the common duties of humanity; Nec monstrare vias, eadem nisi sacra colenti; not show him the way, that goes not the same way with them. But though we must have peace with the Saints especially, yet not only; but with all men. I know that some are given to contention, and we may dwell among them that hate peace: in this case it is enough for us to seek peace with them, to speak peace to them, and to be peaceably affected towards them: And if they will not have peace with us, yet our peace shall return into our own bosoms. We shall have the comfort of it in ourselves, and the reward of it with God, though we have not the fruit or effect of it with men. Still therefore Seek peace, and pursue it: Run after it, follow it with no slow pace, but with an earnest and eager pursuit. We are not to stay till peace comes to us, or think it enough to accept peace when it is offered: but Go thy way to thy brother: tarry not till he come to thee, but go thou to him with an Olive branch of peace in thy mouth. Though it be unwilling to come, sue for it: though it turn from thee, follow after it: at the gates of Heaven be sure thou shalt overtake it.

2. The peace of the State wherein we live, would not be disturbed neither. We see a fearful combustion all over the Christian world; wars in some places, rumors of war in all places; we therefore if we love peace, have cause to fall to our prayers for peace; Pacem spirare & suspirare coram Deo: that he would so rule the Rulers of Nations and Kingdoms, that their hearts may be disposed to peace. So our Church hath taught us to pray; Give peace in our time O Lord: and that he would give unto all Nations unity peace and concord. For ourselves at home, blessed be the God of peace for it, we have abundance of peace: we dwell in the Tabernacles of peace: we lie down and rise up in peace: we go to our Temples in peace, we go to our graves in peace. Yet the quietest waters may be moved by the winds; and we are not without some such tempestuous spirits, that as if they had fed so long upon the sweet plenty of peace, till they had taken a surfeit, are loud advocates for war. Fear the Lord and the King, and meddle not with them that are given to change. The desire of change is the mother of murmuring, which breeds a whispering and buzzing of false rumors into others ears. They speak out of the ground, and whisper out of the dust. These whispers and murmurings, like vapors rising out of the earth, multiply into the storms of sedition, sedition grows into mutiny, and mutiny ends in confusion. They that are troubled with the itch of innovation, will be rubbing upon Majesty it self; and had rather than do nothing, undo all. Out of their popular and vain-glorious humor, they would be counted Angels, though it be but for troubling the waters. Bee the Garden never so fair, they would make the world believe that there is a Snake under every leaf. Bee the intention never so sincere, they will prognosticate and predivine sinister and mischievous effects from it. Such men have little hope to be found of Christ in peace, for The way of peace they have not known. A troubled spirit is a sacrifice to God, but a troublesome spirit is far from it: it is rather a sacrifice to the Devil.

3. But woe to them that break the peace of the Church; that blend religion with contention; and put those a-sunder, which God hath joined together, Truth and peace. With what violent passions do many men bandy controversies? How do they wrangle in print, and fight with their pens, as Soldiers with their Pikes; all wounding the peace of the Church? With what bitterness of spirit do they defy one another? I would to God we had less of the Polemicall, and more of the Positive Divinity. I deny not, but wisdom ought to be justified of her children: An indifferency to contrary opinions in fundamental doctrines; a shuffling of religions together in the bag, and making it all one which they choose, is a cursed stupidity. So a Turk might say in scorn of us both, Protestants and Papists: They call you Heretics, you call them Idolaters; why may not Idolaters and Heretics agree well enough together? But a true Christian will never make contrarieties in fundamental things indifferent: nor the word of God, and Traditions of men, all one. But what needs this frequency of disputations? This multiplying of volumes? Why should we answer every dog that barks with barking again? Why should we think the truth utterly lost, unless we weary the Press with vindications of it? The tongue is a fire; but the pen goes farther; adds fuel to this fire, and shoots it abroad where the tongue cannot reach. Of all which, being of so peace-breaking a nature, like those Books of curious arts, if there were a good fire made, the Church might well endure to warm her hands at it. For it were certainly better for us to want some truth, then to have no peace: And a man that never studied controversies, may without controversy be saved. Strive not about words to no profit, but the subverting of the hearers. For thereby the whole are often wounded, but the weak are seldom strengthened. If any seem to be contentious, we have no such custom, nor the Churches of God. The custom of the Church is to follow peace, to fly contention.

Seek peace, when she is hidden; pursue her, when she is flying: they know not the value of peace, that lose her so easily, or so faintly follow her. There be some indeed that do persequi pacem, but in a wrong sense: they turn prosecution into persecution; and do not overtake her, but overturn her. But if we desire to be found in peace then, let peace be found in us now: And if we have no other means to obtain it, our prayers we have: by lifting up of our eyes, hands, and hearts to the God of peace; and bowing our knees to the Prince of peace. And that our prayers may speed the better, let us make our peace with God by our repentance, that God may make peace with us by his forgiveness. And the work of righteousness shall be peace. This preparation is necessary for all them, that desire to be found in peace: let us keep the peace, as we would have the peace to keep us. Follow peace with all men; there is the one: I will lay me down in peace and sleep, for thou, O Lord, makest me dwell in safety: there is the other.

Let us consider the blessedness of that peace, there; by the sweetness of the peace we have here. There is no peace, that is not separated from righteousness, but it is most delectable. Pax summa bonorum, the breviary and abridgment of all that is good. Peace or nothing; Peace and everything. The Jews had such a saying, cum non est pax, nihil est: as if all were nothing, or nothing worth without peace. They included all good, plenty, prosperity, (and what not?) under the name of peace. It is the chiefest, and the choicest good, a fundamental happynesse, a mother-blessing; that which blesseth all other blessings to us, and without which they are no blessings. Pax optima rerum: whether it be a peace between nations: such as was at the birth of Christ; and it was a blessed fruit of his birth when the Temple of Ianus was shut up. There shall be a high way out of Egypt into Assyria: Freeness of traffic, and the peace of commerce; and that not without a blessing: for the Lord shall bless him. This is Augustus his peace. Or peace in our own land, which is so good, that David cannot tell how to express the goodness of it: so sweet, that he cannot sufficiently magnify the sweetness? otherwise than by breaking into a kind of admiration of it. Behold how good and how pleasant a thing it is, for brethren to dwell together in unity. For profit, it is as the dew of Heaven, that makes all fat and fruitful where it falls. In what land soever peace sets her foot, her steps drop fatness, For pleasure, it is like to Aaron's ointment, running down from his head to his skirts; filling and refreshing both Prince and people with the sweet comfort of it. This is Solomon's peace. and may be called the Kings peace.

Or whether it be the Taking down of that partition wall, which was set up between the Jew and the Gentile: reconciling them, and making them both one in himself: so making peace: this is Saint Paul's peace. Or whether it be a peace with Heaven; Being justified by faith, we have peace with God. The peace that belongs to the Earth, the Earth can give, though sometimes it will not. But Christ speaketh of a Peace which the world cannot give; nor can the world take away. Not Isaiah's bridge, reaching from Egypt to Ashur: but Jacob's ladder, reaching from Bethel to Heaven. This is Christ's peace. Or peace at home; tranquility in our own bosoms; whereby we escape that Singultum cordis, and have the sweet feeling of the forgiveness of our sins; so that our holy conscience is quiet within us; and we sing; Return to thy rest O my soul: This is David's peace. Or lastly, Pax in novissimis, peace at our departing; which is worth all: a good Nunc dimittis in pace. When, in a time of peace, and in a state of peace, and from a place of peace, we breath out our souls into the arms of peace; and so enter into everlasting peace: and this is Simeons peace.

Such is the excellency of peace Tam bonum, ut sine ea nihil bonum. It is the Earths portion, by the Angels wish; and a fair portion is peace. All the earth calls for it, and the very Heavens cannot be without it. Sydera pace vigent, consistunt terrea pace. It is the glory of Heaven, and joy of the whole earth. And for the credit of it, it is there votum militare; it comes from the mouth of Soldiers, that were then in their Military habit; Peace on Earth. Even they sing of peace, and praise it, and wish it, and know not what better thing to wish to the Earth than it. Yea it is votum Angelicum: they being heavenly spirits, wish not anything at any time but Heavenly. Such a heavenly thing is Peace: no broils, no brables in Heaven; nothing but peace there: and a kind of Heaven there is upon Earth, when upon Earth there is peace. Peace is every way lovely: to the eye it is beauty, to the ear melody, to the taste sweeter than honey; in the hand it is integrity, it is wisdom in the head, it is Heaven in the heart.

Yet such is the quarrelling disposition of too many, that Saint Paul is fain to take the peace of them, and to bind them to the good behavior: Follow peace with all men. Mark them which cause division; which break the peace: how pure soever they look, how holy soever they profess themselves. That is a dangerous holiness, which breaks the Churches peace. The Prophets preached against the sins of Israel, they departed not from the Church of Israel, they disturbed not the peace of Israel. We denounce war against your sins, we wish peace to your souls. It is every good man's desire in himself, and his wish to others: Peace be to you. Pacem te poscimus omnes. Saint Paul in none of his salutations leaves out peace. Grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and his Son Jesus Christ. Grace, that a man offend not God: Mercy, that he offend not his Neighbor: and Peace, that he offend not himself. Now Nihil aequius est, quam ut pro quo quis oret, pro eo laboret: Let us wish and work peace: not being only Pacidici, Peace-speakers, but Pacifici, Peace-makers. And blessed are they that labor in the work of peace: This though we reap not in the sight of men, and so lose our thanks: yet we cannot go out of the sight of God, and there we never lose our reward. In peace they that seek Christ now, shall be found of him in peace then. Thus as we begun this verse with love, so we end it with peace. And where should we better end, than with that peace which shall never end? When we shall appear before the supreme Judge, and He shall have no quarrel against us, nothing wherewith to charge us: O inconceivable sweetness! He will not give us a dismissal, Depart in peace: but an admission; Enter into peace: Thou hast lived spotless, well done good servant: thou art rewarded with peace; Enter into thy Lord's joy.

And account that the long suffering of the Lord is salvation; even as our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you.

AMong the many disputes and opinions, what became of Lazarus his soul, all the time of those four days that his body lay in the grave; Isidore Pelusiota thinks that it was in Heaven: And he proves it by this reason, because Jesus wept at his raising. Why wept he? Life is good, and Lazarus was his friend: and to raise up his friend to life, was a good work. Here was no cause of tears; why then wept Christ? What, did He weep for company? Because Mary wept, and Martha wept, and the people wept, therefore also Jesus wept: was this the cause of those tears? Did he weep for company? Or was it for affection? As the Jews interpreted his tears; See how he loved him. But we weep for fear to lose a friend; when sickness hath so far prevailed upon him, that we give him for dead: and not for his reviving: at his recovery we rather rejoice. Or was it for the hardness of the work, as Martha conceived it: Lord, by this time he stinketh, for he hath been dead four days. Not so certainly; even the blind Jews could confute that opinion: Could not he that opened the eyes of the blind, have kept this man from dying? They might conclude, He can raise him with a word, and to speak a word is no such hard work: he did not then weep for the difficulty. Or was it in a mystery? Shall we understand by Lazarus lying four days in his Grave, a sinner many years buried in the custom of sins, and hardness of heart? Indeed there is some difficulty in raising up of such a dead soul: Jesus himself weeps: he spends not only blood, but tears about it. Was it for any of these reasons? For compassion, for affection, for difficulty, or for a mystery, that Jesus wept?

Yet another, and (some think) a better reason may be given for his weeping: it is this. Lazarus his soul had now left her mortal tabernacle, and was delivered out of prison; from all the pains, and sins, and assaults, and troubles which she endured in the body: she was taken up by Angels into rest, peace and glory. Now at this raising up of Lazarus, she must be called down again to her old dwelling; and for this Jesus wept. That a soul in triumph, should be brought back to warfare: from that mount of infinite joys, to descend into the valley of tears: from the place of peace, to return to the region of trouble: from Abraham's bosom, to Adams pilgrimage: for Lazarus again to be made mortal; necessitated again, besides all sorrows to death: this was a change that might well ask tears: for this revocation Jesus wept. I deny not, but this was for the glory of God; and in effect no more than happened to Moses after that glorious speculation, to the three Apostles after Christ's transfiguration, to Paul after his rapture, and to John after his vision. Yet for this Jesus wept. Hinc illae lacrymae.

But quorsum haec? what have we to do with Lazarus his soul? what matter is it where it was? Yes, if we mark it, it is to some purpose: For all this while we have been in heaven too: dureing the discourse and meditation upon the former verses, our transported souls, if any flame of holy grace have taken hold of them, upon the wings of contemplation have been borne up into that place of glorious rest: we have with speculative minds viewed those new heavens, wherein dwelleth righteousness: we have conversed with the peace, and joy, and blessedness of that upper world: our spirits have tasted the sweetness of those unspeakable pleasures: we were in desire, together with Lazarus in those eternal mansions. Yet now alas, as if we had all this time been in an happy dream, we waken in this verse, and find ourselves below, upon earth, in a wilderness of sin, in a region of trouble: so far from the felicity of that kingdom, and fruition of that freedom, that we have still an apprenticeship to serve: our souls must wait till our particular dissolution, our bodies till the general resurrection. There is no remedy, but we must tarry till Christ come to judge this world, before we can completely come to the honor of that world.

Now least this consideration should affect us with too deep a melancholy, and put us beyond our patience; our Apostle comes in here with a seasonable antidote; and bids us be of good cheare: for God doth not forget his promise by his long suffering, but his long suffering rather conduceth to the performance of his promise. All this forbearance salutis nostrae rationem habet. In this delay of his coming we must find God's clear intendment of our salvation. It is not his slackness, but his sweetness; his mercy rather than neglect, this his dilation. As a learned and skillful Physician can make a wholesome medicine of rank poison; and so order a mineral, dangerous in it self, that that, which in nature, simply, would kill; by his composition shall be of sovereign virtue to recover health. So the deferring of hope, which is to some the breaking of the heart, our Apostle takes to another use, and makes a cordial of it, to heal the heart when it is broken. The natural man reasons thus; while the grass is a growing, the beast starves: that which is so long a coming, will scarce ever come: give me the present, take you the future. But the gracious heart resolves the contrary; Give me the futuritie of those infinite comforts, take you these present, transient toys. The bad servant says, My Lord delayeth his coming, therefore I may be unruly. But the good one says; Yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry: Therefore I will watch for his coming, that when he does come he may not find me sleeping. If he comes, it is to receive me: if he stays, it is to try me: howsoever, his purpose is to save me.

Therefore Account that the long suffering of the Lord is salvation. There be 2. general points in the verse. 1. Documentum, a comfortable truth delivered: This long suffering is salvation. 2. And Testimonium, a witness whereby it is confirmed; even as our beloved brother Paul hath written. Out of the former part, naturally arise three conclusions. 1. That God is not rash, sudden, and violent against us, but long suffering. 2. That this patience does not tend to our perdition; but to our good, our best good, even Salvation. 3. That without all misconstruction, we ought so to esteem it: Account that the Lord's long suffering is Salvation. Concerning the Testimony, hereafter, in due place.

1. That God is patient, veritas manifesta et concessa; we need not rack our faith to believe it, for we are sensible of it: It is not matter of faith, so much as of feeling. Which of us here had not long ago been in hell, but that he hath long suffered upon earth, with means to bring us to heaven? we forfeit our lives, we forfeit our souls, every moment to his Justice: how are we reprimed but by his Patience? We are rebels, why does he not execute martial law against us? My spirit shall not always strive with man. He might cut us off sooner: yet there is a fair time left us. The Poets fiction hath a grave moral: They fain Vulcan to be the Cutler of heaven, and armor-maker to their gods. Now Vulcan was lame, and therefore could not hastily bring home their weapons. The true God is slow to wrath, and unwilling to punish, proroguing his Judgments, and expecting our repentance: yet so as by delaying, he brings to pass his own purposes. There is no one Title more frequently attributed to God in the Scripture, than the Lord of Hosts: yet this Lord of hosts and armies is long suffering.

Two things, one would think, should much trouble his patience; Idolatry, and Blasphemy: because they both nearly trench upon his honor, whereof he is most tender. There is no sense for the one, no pretence for the other. Was it not madness in the Israelites, to worship the gods of the Canaanites, who (they knew by experience) could not defend their land from them? Would it not anger a man to see his child, passing by himself, to ask blessing of his slave? We all live at God's charges, and shall we pay a block or stone our service; What sense is there in this? who would endure it? For a wife to play the whore before her husbands face, would not a little trouble his patience. Why do we scratch and tear in pieces God's dreadful name, forborne? A water-man, that will undertake to swear with the devil himself, and give him odds; that let but oaths and blasphemies be the wherry, will row with him for a wager, which shall be at hell first: yet even this man is long suffered. Though he spends his life, and gets his living, within less than two inches of death every day; yet this man sins, and is spared. O the infinite long suffering of our gracious God, even in the midst of these sins that press upon him, for vengeance, and incessantly solicit his Justice! For every wicked oath is a kind of prayer for Judgment: and they that know not how to pray as they ought, know yet familiarly how to swear as they ought not.

There is not the least punctilio of honor, but your Gallant stands upon it; & with streams of another's, or of his own blood, he will wash off that imaginary stain. He calls you into the field, to do him right, & to answer him like a Gentleman: But that right is manifest wrong; and you must answer him like a Gentleman, not like a Christian. What is the ground of all this? His honor forsooth: he cannot put up such an injury with his honor. But all this while he forgets the honor of God, thus disparaged by his bloody combat. He cannot brook a slight offense done him by his equal, without revenge: yet looks that the Lord of Heaven and Earth should digest his monstrous wickedness with patience.

How far distant be the thoughts of God and man? Every little that we suffer from God or man, we think too much: all the wrongs that God or man suffer from us, we account but little. God suffers long, and much: He hath not dealt so with us. Even where He tells us that we have need of patience, because we must suffer: He presently qualifies it; Yet a little while, and he that shall come, will not tarry: Gravitata miseriae brevitata levatur. His merciful Wisdom hath so tempered our sorrows, that Nemo valde dolebit, & diu. If we suffer much, it shall not be long: if we suffer long, it shall not be much. Si longus, levis est: si gravis est, brevis est. Some misery is like a Consumption; gentle, but of long continuance: other like a Fever, violent, but soon over. If our sorrow be long, the lighter: if sharper, the shorter. It is but the body that commonly suffers, and that cannot hold out long. Say it falls a pieces, there is but a pitcher broken. It is but the instrument of the soul: And why should a good Musician think his skill lost, by the hurt of his Lute? Or a valiant Soldier think his honor lost by the breach of his sword? Or a rich man think himself undone by the rent of his garment? All our sorrow is either tolerable, or short. Upon which assurance, a man may well endure to have his hopes adjourned to a new day.

But the grievance we put God to, is neither easy nor short: He must suffer much, and He must suffer long too: much in burden, and long in continuance. And we are so far from easing Him of it by repentance, that He is fain to ease Himself of it in our just vengeance. For though He suffer long, in mercy: there is no reason that He should suffer always, in Justice. All the while that David lay in his sins without compunction, the burden of them lay upon God: so long He suffered. But when David cried Peccavi, and melted into repentance, he took the burden off from God, and laid it where it should be, upon himself: and so they were both eased. We commit sins without fear, and persist in them without remorse: thus far we make Christ to suffer; thus long the whole lode lies upon Him. I am pressed under you, so He complains, as a cart that is full of sheaves. But when we shall humble ourselves by repentance, and break our hearts with contrition; we do then repetere gravamen, take off the weight from Christ, where it is: and lay it upon our own hearts, where it should be. Grieve not the holy Spirit of God. Till we come to repentance, He is in grievance: so long He suffers for us, as we forbear to suffer for ourselves. But by our penitent humiliation, we stoop our shoulders to our own burden: under which when we have lain drooping, and weeping, and crying, and praying for a time; the Lord is mercifully pleased to take it off again, from us; and to transfer it upon the Cross of his own Son. This easeth us both, this dischargeth us of all forever. This is the first Conclusion; whereof we may make a threefold use.

1. Here is matter of consolation: we have to do with the God of patience. The gods of the Heathen used to come in tempests: indeed they were no gods, but men; and none of the best men, neither: but subject to sensual lusts and violent passions. But our God gives innumerable testimonies of his long animity, slowness to wrath, and invincible patience. It is well that we fall not into the hands of men: they would not give us so much as a breathing time, betwixt our fault and our death. When Saul said to Doeg, Fall thou upon the Priests: he slew that day fourscore and five that wore a linen Ephod. A tyrant doomes Innocents to death; and without any pause, execution follows. From God, out so Heaven, lightning and thunder comes together: sometimes we have lightning without thunder, but thunder without lightning never. It is some mercy in cruel man, if the lightning of anger in his eyes, give warning of the thunderbolt in his hand: But too often he kills before he threatens, which is thunder without lightning. If we should defile his bed, and dishonor him in his wife, Would man endure it? If we should strike and mis-use his children, Would man endure it? If we should violate and rob him of his goods, Would man endure it? If we should stick the aspersions of scandal upon his credit, Would man endure it? We do all these wrongs to God, and yet He endures. We lodge that filthy Adulteress, Sin or lust in the marriage-bed of our hearts: we persecute and kill his Children, those holy Images of Himself: we rob Him of his goods, in purloining his Tythes and Offering: we swear, and blaspheme his honor all the day long: yet still He endures it. O God, What should become of us, but for thy wonderful Patience? But here is the comfort that keeps us from the gulf of despair, in the deep consideration of our own wickedness; The Lord is longsuffering.

2. Here is matter of caution: The Lord's longsuffering would not be abused. Shall we persist in evil, because He continues to be good? My Father is full of lenity, therefore I may go on in levity, and follow my wanton courses: surely, He will forgive all at the last: What ingenuous son will reason so? Bonus es bonis, & been merentibus: gratiosus es peregrinis, & immerentibus: misericors es malis, & male merentibus. What then? Because He suffers long, Shall I therefore put Him to it, and try how long He will suffer? Because He suffers much, Shall I therefore lay more weight upon Him? This is indeed the way of the world; bear one injury, and invite more: Put up this offense, and you shall have your belly full of them. But Gravatis addere gravamina; you must say in reason, This is no fair dealing in the world, And shall we deal so with the Lord? They write of the Palme tree, that the more it is pressed with weight, the higher and stronger it grows, and the more fruit it yields. But let us not have such a conceit of God: that the more we onerate Him with our sins, the more abundant fruits of his Mercy He will afford us. Never think so, for you shall not find it so. He that began in kindness, and went on in patience, may end in fury. There is a longsuffering that does not tend to salvation: So sinners are suffered like fishes, to swim merrily down the stream of their own sensuality, till they come to mare mortuum, the sea of death.

3. Here is matter of imitation; God's Patience calls for ours: It is but reason, for us to suffer long, towards whom He is so longsuffering. Saint Paul describing the Christians Armor, puts not in Patience for any piece of it: and yet tells us in another place, that we have need of patience. Good reason; for it is not a piece, but the whole Panoplie it self. There is a plate for the breast, a helmet for the head, a sword for the hand, a girdle for the loins, greaves for the feet, and a shield for the vital parts: every piece arms a part, but Patience covers all. Which way soever the blow comes, patience receives it. Besides, if the adversaries weapon be so sharp, that it pierceth any piece of this armor; yet Patience is a coat of maile, a defense under these, that duls the edge of all assaults. Ease can be found nowhere, but in Patience. If we look forward, it is not there: if backward, we cannot perceive it: on the left hand we behold it not, nor on the right can we see it. Trouble is on our right hand, and on our left hand trouble: trouble before us, trouble behind us, and trouble round about us: but if Patience be within us, all is safe. If this be intra te, no matter who is contra te. Our trouble may be excessive, both for the quantum, and for the quamdiu: this armor of Patience must be answerable to it.

Long; for from morning to morning, by day and by night, there will be a vexation. Sorrow commonly comes on horseback, but goes away on foot. It runs like Cushi to David with ill news, so fast that it is out of breath: but when it is come, it tarries with us, it does not run back again. Vulnere super vulnus: it breaketh us with breach upon breach. We are killed all the day long: not a-forenoone, nor an hour, but all the day long. Now Patience must not be an inch shorter than affliction. If the bridge reach but half way over the brook, we shall have but an ill-favourd passage. When the bed is shorter than a man can stretch himself on it, and the covering narrower than he can wrap himself in it; he shall lie but uneasily. Patience is the bed of the soul; it must not be too short: it is the covering of the soul; it should not be too narrow. Therefore Christ instructs us for the length of our Patience: He that will come after me, let him take up his Cross daily, and follow me. Daily; for we must learn Patiendo pati. Few and evil have been my days: that Patriarch spake of never a good one. Let us praise Patience, as we do a fair day, at night. That light is despised, which holds not in till we go to bed. He that endureth to the end, shall be saved.

Large; as great in quantity, as afflictions are in number. What King going to war, considereth not whether he be able with ten thousand, to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand? What is a little sufferance, to a great deal of sorrow? we have five loaves and two fishes; but what are they among so many? Some men may be stored with two or three acts of patience; but what are they among so many troubles? If the plaster be too narrow for the sore, it will not keep it from festering. By patience let us possess our souls: for impatience dispossesseth a man of himself. Yea, let us keep this possession given us by Christ. Though Satan find many tricks in law to disturb us, and many assaults against law to displace us; yet let us keep our possession of patience, and all is safe. As a wise Physician makes a medicine of many sharp ingredients, in their own nature dangerous: but then adds a corrective to them, whereby they become proper Physic for the Patient. So when the Lord doth minister to us many sorrows, bitter ingredients, with the one hand: let us beseech him to put in with the other hand as much Patience; that they may be at least quantity for quantity. Then though we smart for the time, we shall be the better after it; and the end will be our health and everlasting comfort in Jesus Christ.

His Long suffering is salvation: that is the second conclusion. This seems to be a strange kind of speaking: Is salvation? If he had said, it is a means of salvation, a help to salvation, a preparative for salvation, or anything that conduceth toward salvation; it had been somewhat intelligible. But that it is salvation, appears a nifficult saying. What do we find in our pilgrimage but weariness? what fruit doth all the vanity of this Earth yield, but bitterness? what can be looked for in this valley of tears, but sorrows? And do you call these Salvation? But here In praedicato enuntiati is metonymia effecti: It is salvation: that is, it is for salvation the way to it, the means of it, and an argument for it. In two respects.

1. In regard of them that are already called and put into the army of God's militant servants: that are of his train-band; in the continual exercise of their spiritual arms. Secondly, in regard of them whose names are in God's Muster-book, but not yet called, and pressed forth to the wars. In relation to both these, this long suffering conduceth to salvation. The former God suffers long to suffer much at the hands of his and their enemies. They must strive, and fight, and bleed, and conquer, before they receive that victorious wreath of glory. First, Paul fights a good fight; then he takes the crown. For the other, some of them are not yet called, some of them are not yet borne, that have their names written in Heaven. Therefore Christ delays his coming, that these might also have their day: and but for the filling up of the number of the Elect, the world should not stand one moment? This then is the intent of his longsuffering; Salvation to us, salvation to them: to all salvation. If those souls were charged to stay for the accomplishment of their brethren, that were already sacrificed, and under the Altar: much more we that are yet to be sacrificed upon the Altar. God suffers this for three reasons.

1. Our affliction prepares us for salvation: as grapes must be pressed, before they become wine: and Corn threshed and ground, ere it make bread. This is indeed a mere paradox to the children of the world, who run in a circle of sin and pleasure; till Finis alterius mali, gradus futuri. But that ex vulnere salus, ex morbo sanitas, ex dolore gaudium, ex infirmitate robur, ex morte vita; this is a harder riddle than Samson's to these Philistines. Yet Non est idoneus ad premium, qui nondum paratus est ad patibulum. It is true that No chastening for the present is joyous, but grievous: yet it hath another relish besides the bitterness. The Manna in the wilderness was so conditioned, so qualified, that it tasted to every man like that, which that man liked best. Even correction is our Manna, part of our daily bread: Let us desire God to make it so taste to us, not as we would, but as he would have it taste: and to make our taste agreeable to his will, not his will to our taste. As his corrections taste of humiliation, so they taste of consolation too: as they have a relish of danger, so of assurance too. God hath imprinted in all his Elements, whereof our bodies consist, two manifest qualities. The fire is hot and dry, the water cold and moist: therefore as the fire dries, so it heats too: and as the water moistens, so it cools too. In like manner his afflictions, which be the Elements of our mortification, by which our souls are brought home to him, have two qualities and operations: as they scourge us, so they scourge us into the way to him: and when they have shown us, that we are nothing in ourselves, they also show us that Christ is all things to us. And though they should remove us out of the world, yet they assure us, that no extremity of sickness, no temptation of Satan, no guiltiness of sin, no horror of death, shall remove us from him: But that when we die, we shall die in him, and by that death be united unto him, that died for us. Thus are ¹ we chastened of the Lord, that we might not be condemned with the world. Therefore doth he suffer us to be afflicted, because he will not suffer us to be damned. All shall prepare us for him, and help to gather us to him. Therefore we may well account his longsuffering salvation.

2. Our afflictions are an argument of our salvation: For whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth. Therefore he suffers us to feel the more stripes, that we might have the more assurances of his paternal love. Physicians, not seldom let us bleed before we be sick: and we lop off our superfluous branches, that the Vine may yield better fruit. Sin is the strength of death, and the death of strength: by what means so ever the Lord makes that weaker, we grow stronger. It was the ground of that long disputation between Job and his friends; whether that woeful calamity was a sign of God's love, or of his hatred to him. God himself was the moderator, and decided the question; that all this tended to his salvation. If the Lord be with us, why then is all this befallen us? It was Gideon's expostulation with the Angel. Others persecute, we suffer; which of us is likeliest to be in God's favor? Cyprian resolves it in that instance of Judas and Christ. Judas betrays, Christ dies: yet which of us had not rather be like Christ, than like Judas? Like Christ, who prayed for his enemies, ut per sanguinem quem fuderunt, salvi fiant: than like Judas, qui per pacis signum, rumpit pacis Sacramentum? This was Mary's message to Christ; Lord, he whom thou lovest, is sick. Si amatur, quomodo infirmatur? As if none could be sick, whom God loves. Yes, even therefore are we sick, because he loves us. The Fever does not more burn up our blood, than our lust: and together with swearing out the surfeits of nature, at the pores of the body: we weep out the sinful corruption of our nature, at the pores of the conscience. So that as the breaking of the Clouds gives way to the clearer light of the Sun: the grace of our soul shines fairer forth at these breaches of our sick body. Much fruit breaks the tree, much rankness lays the corn. Mala sunt graviora, quae suaviora: miserum te reputo, quia non fuisti miser. God sees that Men are most miserable, in not being miserable: therefore he lets those that he cares not for, swim in pleasures: but they shall be sure of woe upon Earth, to whom he means joy in Heaven. Therefore in our sufferings; let us account his longsuffering, no less than Salvation.

3. Afflictions are our passage to Salvation, our thoroughfare to the land of promise. Through many tribulations we must enter into the kingdom of Heaven. If we do not find such rough passages, we are out of our way. Shew me the man that hath found a fairer way than sorrow. I am sure that Christ did not; that knew the way most perfectly: This way he went; and this way he directed us to follow him. Ought not Christ to suffer these things, and to enter into his glory? He had first his Oportet pati, before he could he allowed his Sic intrare. Humiliari first; and there is an Oportet set upon the head of that: Intrare last, and there is a Sic that is the Usher to it. The Patriarchs went this way, the Prophets this way, the Apostles this way, the Martyrs this way; this way went all the Saints, and do we look for an easier way? A Christians life can no more be sine luctibus, than the Sea sine fluctibus. You will say that God's legacies by his first will, in the Old Testament, were plenty and victory: Canaan was a land of wine and oil, milk and honey: and by those galleries he brought them into his bed-chamber; by those glories and joys, to the joys and glories of Heaven. Why hath he changed his will? why left his old way? why doth he now carry us by the severe path of discipline and mortification? by the melancholy way of mourning and lamentation? by the thorney way of misery and tribulation? Is the joy and glory of Heaven, no more than a comparative joy, a comparative glory? Not such in it self, but only such in comparison of the sorrows and baseness of this world? No; for as God himself, who is all, is made of no substances: so the joy and glory with him is made of no circumstances: essential joy, essential glory, all there. But why does he not begin them here? What needs this rough way of calamity thither? Beloved, shall not he that made the kingdom, appoint the way? He thought it the best, and shall we think we could have devised a better? Surely, he would never so long have suffered his enemies to tyrannize over his friends; but that he knows it most conducing to his glory, and our good: for so we are charged to account it, that his longsuffering is salvation. Nor yet in all this present misery does he leave us destitute of comfort: for even here we have the beginnings of Heaven, the peace of Conscience, and joy in the holy Ghost. Thus as in the midst of life we be in death: so in the midst of death we be in life; even in that life which shall never die, Jesus Christ.

2. Thus is the Lord's longsuffering salvation, to such as are called: it is so also vocandis, to such as are to be called: to these for their entrance into the Church militant, to the other for their passage into the Church triumphant. For God, by letting the world stand, allows thē both a time, when to come in & a place, where to come in; and a light, how to come in. Al which would be taken away, with the taking away of the world. For this eause doth Christ forbear his last coming, and delay this universal conflagration: that the number of his chosen might be made up: and the Book of grace be the counterpain, punctually answerable to the Book of life; not a name differing between them. Now a second birth presupposeth a first: Generation must necessarily precede regeneration: Borne once they must be, or borne twice they cannot be. The great clock of Time is kept going for this; otherwise the motion of all his wheels should be stayed forever; and the Angels oath should come in force, that Time shall be no more. God hath his determined number, known only to himself, no part of the Earth debarred from them: The Earth should burn, the Elements melt, the Heavens flame, the Devils and reprobates be laid up in Hell, the Elect Men and Angels be imparadised in Heaven; all but for this; God's number is not yet full. Till this be done, Satan may range abroad, the wicked domineer, the righteous suffer; misery and sin walk their round, the Heavens move, the Seas ebb and flow, the World stand; and the Lord suffers all this. Well, let us yield to God the Election of his own times; especially seeing that all tends to salvation. Shall we wish the world at an end with ourselves; and when we go out, that no more might come in? So it is reported of an envious and uncharitable man's wish; That God would save his Parents, his Wife and Children, his Brothers and Sisters, and himself; and no more: To whom another replied; It were a great deal better for the world, if the Devil might take his Parents, his Wife and Children, his Brothers and Sisters, and himself, and no more. Far be it from us to grudge others that mercy we have found ourselves, and which our gracious God is pleased to show them in Jesus Christ.

The Sum of this point is this: All the actions of God toward man, tend to his good, and that to his best good, even Salvation. In the Creation it was plain: when the Maker, upon the review of his Works, saw that everything in particular, and all things in general, were exceeding good. In the Redemption it was as plain: He hath done all things well: a true confession and applause! Here were all things good indeed, all things well: But for whom was this Bonum intended? Who shall have the benefit of this Bene? Who but man? It was fit indeed that the honor should be God's, but the profit is man's. In that Anthem of the Angels there be three notes, which are the compendium of Christian Relion. Glory to God on high, peace on earth, good will towards men. As one reverend Prelate quotes the saying of another: Let that be the Religion, let that prevail, as the best and most true of all other, that is Deo honorabilior, brings more honor to God; Paci amicabilior, best friend to peace; and Homini favorabilior, most favorable to man: as showing God better affected to us, and making us better affected to God, better one to another. They blasphemously wrong the goodness of God, that think He had rather honor Himself in our ruin, than in our salvation. What mean all those protestations; Nolo mortem morientis; and Volo omnes salvos fieri? Bee they cursory speeches? Sure, the God of truth scorns to use complements. That is for such dissembling Politicians, as salute one another with God save you, at their meeting; and wish one another hanged, after their parting. But God wills good, speaks good, does good to us: nothing but good comes from that infinite Fountain of goodness. Christ spent the days of his humiliation, in doing us good: his Miracles did good to the bodies of men, his Oracles to their souls, his Sufferings both to their souls and bodies; all tended to our Salvation.

Look upon his Miracles, (and every Miracle is a new Creation) and we shall find, He would do nothing, which breathed not towards man favor and bounty. Moses wrought miracles, but they were scourges; plagues to the Egyptians: Elias wrought miracles, but it was to the hurt of the earth; by withholding rain from Heaven: and he brought down Fire from Heaven, but it was to consume men upon the earth. Elisha called for Bears; but it was to punish unmannerly children. Peter struck Ananias, that sacrilegious Hypocrite, with present death: and Saint Paul smote Elymas the Sorcerer, with blindness: but no such thing was done by Jesus. Those servants of God were the Oxen, to tread out the corn, and trample down the straw: Christ was the Lamb of God, full of meekness. When He drew multitudes of fishes to their nets, it was to give them a more liberal provision. When He turned Water into Wine, it was to glad their hearts. When He multiplied those five Loaves, it was to victual an host of people. If He rebuked the Winds, it was because they threatened destruction to his servants by their fury. If He cursed the Fig tree, it was for not doing the duty to which He had ordained it, in bearing fruits for man. He restored motion to the lame, sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, speech to the dumb, to the sick health, to the dead life. We can find no miracle of his spent upon revenge and judgment: all relish of sweetness and mercy.

His Oracles did no less good to the soul: not a Sermon did He preach, wherein He did not breath Heaven into their hearts. Luk. 24.32. From the occasion of Jacob's Well, He drew forth a Sermon of the living Waters. By their natural appetite to those material Loaves, He persuades them to a spiritual hunger after the Bread of life. He did let slip no opportunity of winning our souls.

His sufferings crowned all the rest: he did not only do for us, but die for us. All his sayings and doings conduced to our salvation: but his death was our salvation indeed. Mira fecit, but dira tulit. S. Luke did offer to write of all that Jesus did, and taught: but who did ever attempt to write of all that he suffered? In everything, the goodness of God to man, shines in the beams of salvation. If he comes to us it is with salvation. This day is salvation come to this house. If he defers his coming, it is for salvation; that we might work out our salvation with fear and trembling. If he honors us with peace, it is but to give us a taste of salvation: If he scourge us with chastisements, it is still an argument of our salvation. His smiles are the reflections of salvation: his very frowns are not without the look of salvation. His speedy approaches towards us, are to bring us to salvation: his long suffering, is to prepare us for salvation. The breath of his mouth, the works of his hands, the desires of his heart, they all determine in this; our salvation. Now as Elisha said to the Shunnamite; Behold thou hast been, thus careful for us, what is to be done for thee! So Lord, thou hast done all this, for us men, and for our salvation: what shall we return thee for all? Surely we can do no more, nor will we do less, then give thee all honor, and thanks, and praise forever.

Account that his long suffering is salvation: this is the third conclusion: we are so bound to account it. It is a Principle granted in Philosophy, and not contradicted in Divinity, that there be four elements; Fire, Air, Water, Earth, and that they have their proper qualities; Hot, Moist, Cold, and Dry, and that of these four, all mixed bodies are composed. Grant then these four concurring to the constitution of man's body; yet so as man's body is a fifth substance, distinct from them all. The heat of it does not make it fire: nor doth the cold make it water: there is moisture in it, yet it is not air: earth it is, but not without a commixion of the other elements. In the natural mind of man, while it is exercised upon problematicall or disputable questions, there be four tempers or ingredients, as his body consists of four humors: Ignorance, knowledge, doubt, and persuasion: and there is no mind of man in this world, without all these: though the measure be different; and in some then other, one of them may be more predominant. Ignorance is like the earth, dry and barren: Perswasion like the fire, lightsome active, and working: Doubt like the water, cold and running: Knowledge like the air, clouded and uncertain. Albeit the brighter the Sun shines, the clearer the air is; yet you never find it without some clouds. Now there is a fifth thing, which indeed comes from another cause, and is infused from above: yet being in the mind, it is forced to partake of the other four: this is Quintessentia, a fifth being, the quintessence of them all: and we call it Faith or Assurance. This hath in it so much of knowledge, as to understand the principale in part: and yet so much of Ignorance, as in part to be shallow, and to come short of the full comprehension of it. It hath so much of persuasion, as to assent unto the truth of it: and yet so much of doubt, as to make many scruples and questions about it. If we rightly examine it; so weak is the faith of many Christians, even in this high point of their own Salvation; that the happy building of, Lord I believe; cannot stand without that collumne to underproppe it, help thou my unbelief.

The fire of our knowledge descends from heaven: the earth of our ignorance ariseth from beneath: our persuasion is the grace of God: our doubt is from flesh and blood. Yet what man upon earth hath a faith so full of knowledge that it is free from all ignorance? Or so strong a persuasion of his own future happynesse, such a certentie to be saved, that he never doubted of it? There is therefore a higher degree of faith required of us; even an assurance, that this long suffering of God is meant for our Salvation. And this cannot be a floating opinion of of the brain, an airy speculation, driven too and fro, like the clouds with every wind; with every tempest of afflictions. Nor an epicence, equivocating, doubtful apprehension, ebbing and flowing like the inconstant water. But as the less melancholy earth and hydropicall water there is in the body, the more sprightly and active it is: so the less doubt and ignorance in our faith, the more holy and heavenly. This then must be a firm persuasion of the heart; the ground whereof is the will of God, the builder whereof, is the Spirit of God, the pillars whereof are the word and grace of God, the light whereof is the knowledge of God, and the roof whereof is the glory of God.

That the Divine patience is salvation, is here put upon our account: and if we do not so account it, we shall be accountant for it. It is certainly so in it self, whether we account it so or not; even Salvation: but it is not Salvation to us unless we so account it. Our faith must come in, to make up the match: When Christ hath wrought all this for our salvation, he hath done his part: we must believe, that our salvation is thus accomplished, or else we fail in our part. This account therefore is of no small moment, how small account soever we make of it.

It ariseth in full strength, against four sorts of sinners. 1. Contra desperantes; against those that think God's suffering them to lie long under the rod, is an argument of his disfavour: they do not account it salvation. 2. Contra Properantes; against those that are impatient of God's delay, and will needs urge him to mend his pace: these do not account his long suffering salvation. 3. Contra non operantes; against them that will not make use of this pause of judgment, and reprieve of the world, thereby to lay timely hold on repentance: without which they cannot account it their salvation. 4. Contra non imitantes; against those that do not proceed in God's steps; rather by lenity to spare, than rashly to execute: All these must be called to account by this charge: Account that the longsuffering, &c.

1, There be some that take every heavy cross, for a sign of God's implacable anger: and make that an argument of rejection, which our Apostle makes an argument of salvation. There is an Indolencie to be without pain at all: and there is a condolencie, or grieving for the pains of others: and there is a dedolencie, to be in pain, and not to feel it: and there is a Superdolency, an oversensibleness, that takes every scratch for a wound, and every wound for death. God would not have men make themselves more miserable, than they need, than they should; by looking upon their miseries through a multiplying glass. Whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth: that is orthodoxall truth: But that, whom he scourgeth, he hateth; what strange Divinity is this? when did the Scripture ever speak so? The Lord writes his mind to us in the characters of correction, that he means to do us good: and we make a false construction of it, as if he meant us ruin. Is affliction such a strange language, that we cannot read it? Or is it expressed in so hard a dialect, that we must needs mis-interpret it to God's dishonor, and our own bane? These are the men, that turn every probation into reprobation, every dejection into a rejection: and if they be cast down, they cry out presently that they are cast away. Lift up thyself, thou timorous fainting heart, and do not suspect every spot for a plague-token: do not die of a mere conceit. Heaviness may endure for a night: but as sure as the morning sun comes, the morning joy comes: Joy comes in the morning. As the end of all motion is rest: so the end of all thy troubles shall be peace: where the days are perpetual Sabbaths, and the diet undisturbed feasts. Thy pacified soul shall become Paradisus sine gladio, Templum Solomonis sine malleo. Lord speak music to the wounded Conscience, thunder to the seared: that thy Justice may reclaim the one, thy mercy relieve the other, and thy favor comfort us all with peace and salvation.

2. There be some that are over-solicitous with God, to mend his pace; as if they would not give him leave to take his own leisure, for the execution of his holy purposes. I know, there is a sober and modest importunacy of the saints; earnest with God to make an end of the days of sin, and to set his glory in the full luster. The desire of the soul is never satisfied, till it come to the end it aimeth at: (which is a main argument for the Resurrection) now this cannot be until Christ's second coming. The creatures have a groaning desire of this They wait for the manifestation of the Sons of God. The militant Saints pray for this; Thy Kingdom come. Saint Paul was not without his Cupio dissolvi. The Bride, the Church on Earth cries for this; Even so come Lord Jesus. Even that Church in Heaven prays for this; Vsquequo Domine? How long O Lord holy and true? Sanctified eyes that have but a glimpse of those new Heavens by faith, do so scorn the contentments of this old world; that did the Spheres join with the Elements, the Sun and stars confederate with the Earth and waters, to make them happy; it would be held unacceptable vanity. Yea, did Heaven it self profer them all its glory and pleasure, it would not satisfy them without Christ. Immo, ne Christus ipse sufficeret, nisi seipsum dederit. The best of this world is but vanity; the worst, vexation. Beauty a flower; today flourishing and worn in the bosom: tomorrow withering and swept out with the besom. Health is not Ague-proof: and where is the strength that can stand a fever? Wealth is a fugitive: either it will leave us, or we must leave it; and this comes all to one pass. Honor is beholden to vulgar spectacles; fain to borrow poor men's eyes to give it a luster: and loe, this is all the best of the World.

The worst of it we all know too sensibly: the wicked man's injury, is the good man's patrimony. There was joy in the Bridegroom's presence: but sorrow followed immediately upon his absence. It was the political malice of the world, that aimed by the death of the General, to disband the army. So long as Christ lived on earth; we read of no persecution against his Disciples: but let Him be once removed, and then there is havoc made of the Church: Stephen is stoned, Peter crucified, Paul beheaded: some strangled, some burned, some broiled, some brained; all, but only Saint John, murdered. The Spouse lovingly invites her Beloved to her arms, to her bed: and he summons her to arms, to warfare. Illâ monstrante lectulum, ill vocat ad campum, ad exercitium. In her Garden grow both Lilies and Roses; because she is both Operibus candida, & cruore purpurea. Her lot is to do good, and to suffer evil. Untouched fortunes, and untouched consciences, seldom dwell together. And it is usual for them that know no sorrows, to know no God. It is opposition that gives the trial, and causeth argent to seem more bright in a sable field, as the Sun is more pleasing, when it breaks from a Cloud. No marvel if all these considerations make us importunate with God, to hasten his Kingome: thinking the time long, till the tyranny of sorrow, and usurpation of sin, give place to righteousness and peace.

Importunate we may be in this desire; we may not be impatient. Hope deferred is the fainting of the soul: but against that fainting, God hath provided cordials for us. As He hath imprinted all the medicinal virtues, that are in all creatures; and made even the flesh of Vipers to assist in cordials: so He can raise strength out of weakness, and make sickness it self a medicine to procure everlasting health. As the children of vanity find, that in the midst of laughter there is heaviness: so the sons of patience find, that in the midst of heaviness there is comfort. Christ himself had a sadness in his soul, even unto death: not without a reluctance, a deprecation of death, in the approaches of it: yet He had his cordial too; Not my will, but thine be done. When He cried out, My God, my God, Why hast thou forsaken me? His Father did then reach out his hand to Him: but not to deliver his sad soul, but to receive his holy soul. Neither did He longer desire to hold it of Him, but to recommend it to Him. Whether the good we hope for, be deferred: or the evil we fear, be inflicted: still patience is a cordial: a silent and absolute obedience to the Will of God, is a sovereign cordial: which if God preserve to us, will certainly preserve us to Him. And from this lower form of a gentle Catechism, in the school of patience; we shall take a greater degree, in an higher place, and joyfully serve Him in his Kingdom of glory.

3. There be some that grow the more wanton by God's forbearance: and the more longsuffering He is toward them, the more bold they are to offend Him. They do what they list, and the Lord lets them alone: therefore they think He is pleased with them, and with what they do: and that which way soever they take, the end of their journey must needs be salvation. Such men may think it so; but they shall not find it so: for between these two, Tolerantiam, & salutem: there is a breathing place, an Existimate. This is no light opinion, or fond imagination; that though they spend their days in vanity, they shall end their days in mercy. You have read of some, that Ducunt in bonis dies suos: so they go on: and subito ad Infernum, so they go out. They presume that they are in God's favor, and that all his patience doth but further and accomplish their salvation: yet they bring forth nothing but the fruits of perdition. With this conceit they pass their lives, and with this conceit they pass out of their lives. As if they resolved to put their souls in a venture; and to come to Heaven their own way, or not to come thither at all. Turn to the Lord with weeping and mourning, saith the Prophet Joel: But these will change Joel into Iael: instead of tears, they bring milk; and for contrition, warm covering; and so lay them down, and never rise more. They will not shed a tear, nor lose a meal, all the year long: but spend their days in a pleasant dream, not interrupted by sorrow: and yet think that all this makes for their salvation. This is a fantastical conceit, our Apostle chargeth us here with an Existimate, a well grounded persuasion, that the Lord's long suffering is salvation.

Now this perswasiō cannot be in our hearts, unless we apprehend the means of salvation; Faith and Repentance. For what man that continually steeres his course westward, can flatter himself that he is travelling towards the east: The long suffering of God leads us to repentance. Except his patience work repentance in us, it will not work salvation for us. The meaning of his forbearance, is to bring us to repentance: & repentance is the earnest of salvation. If we do not take God's time, to God's intēt; & while he delays his coming, lay hold on conversion: we may count & reckon long enough, but we reckon without our Hoste. For howsoever this propositiō is true in the Thesi, or foundation: yet it may prove otherwise in the Hypothesi, or suppositiō: God's long suffering is salvation; that is infallible truth but it will never be salvation to us, without our hearty & timely repentance. Repentance then is the grace we call upon you for, as you call upon God for salvation. Expecto, Domine, salutem tuam: I wait O Lord, for thy salvation: that is the prayer of my soul to God: Expecto, peccator, paenitentiam tuam; I wait, O sinner, for thy conversion; that is the answer of God to my soul.

How can we be saved, without repentance? And how could we have space to repent, but by God's forbearance? Sin is a wrong to the divine goodness: and no wrong to that, must escape unrevenged. There be two times or places for the revenge upon sin: this mortal life upon earth, or that other immortal death in hell. In that infernal torture, it is God's time for vengeance: then and there, he will plague all offenses with insufferable pains. While we live in this world, this is our time of vengeance: here, and now, we ought to punish ourselves with bitter sorrows; that we may prevent the future. And this is truly the office of repentance, to afflict our hearts with grief, for that we have committed with folly. This is imposed upon the sinner; Vt semper puniat ulciscendo, quod commisit peccando, All those injuries to his infinite Majesty, will God revenge upon us in hell; which he hath not found us to revenge upon ourselves on earth. He will be just, whatsoever we are.

Ask thy conscience, thou secure offender; what punishment thou hast inflicted upon thyself for thy sins? Intolerable have been thy wicked actions, execrable thy oaths and blasphemies, innumerable thy foul thoughts and desires: Hic est culpa, ubi pana? Here is the guiltiness, but where is the penalty? Let us think: have our cries been as loud as our sins? Have our tears been as thick sown, as our tares, as our weeds, our trespasses? Have we taken pills of gall and wormwood, for our surfeits of excess and wantōnesse? What proportion hath our sorrow held with our offenses? Poenitentia crimine minor non sit. There is no deep valley, but near to some great hill: From the mountain of our sins, let us descend into the valley of tears. There is a necessity of sorrow for sin, to them that expect pardon of sin. We have sinned for very anger that we could sin no more: and shall we not weep for very sorrow, that we can weep no more? Let us rejoice that we can sorrow a little; for we have sorrowed that we could not rejoice enough. Our sorrow was for the absence of worldly joy: let us be glad for the presence of penitent and godly sorrow.

Nor must our grief be Impatienter habitum, sed desiderio susceptum. I know that the validity of repentance does not so much consist in the length of time, as in the sincerity of heart: And even in the approach of death, when the soul is now ceasing to inform the body, and longing for her deliverance out of prison; God then hears the groans, and the very inarticulate sighs of repentance. I know, that as there is no sin so great, but it may be pardoned; so no time so late, but it may be accepted. I know, that neither the greatness of the crime, nor the shortness of the time, can bar true conversion from forgiveness. Repentance is a Supersedeas which dischargeth sin; moving God to be merciful, the Angels to be joyful, man to be acceptable, and only the Devil melancholy. But I know withal that it is not safe to put off that business till late in the evening, which cannot be dispatched too early in the morning. I know that it is unthankful to abuse God's longsuffering, and to take advantage by his gracious forbearance, to be ungraciously impious. But as Pliny writes of a stone, called Theamides; which is of a contrary nature to the Loadstone, Repellit enim ferrum; it drives back iron. So whereas some hearts draw iron to them, even the hardest afflictions, magnetically, and make profitable use of them: Other hearts are a Theamides, repelling sorrow, resisting the means of repentance, and fighting against their own salvation.

Idle wantons make no other use of a fair day, than to wander abroad, and follow their pleasures: the good husband takes that time to do his work, and thereby to better his estate. The Lord's longsuffering is to carnal men but a fair day to play in, and to ramble after their lascivious vanities: the Christian knows it to be his time, wherein to work out his own salvation; and that not without fear and trembling. There is a time, and a time: A time to weep, and a time to rejoice: and this distinction of time argues a vicissitude of occasions. But that one and the same time, to one and the same man, should be both for mourning and rejoicing; is incompatible. Doubtless, this is the time for tears: and they that spend it in jollity, quite mistake the season. Sensual pleasure hath no time allowed it: what it gets, is by usurpation: And if it be not tempered with the sorrow of repentance, it will be drowned in the sorrow of vengeance. But as one spake wittily of wine, that it had two discommodities: If a man puts water into it, he mars the wine: if he puts no water into it, he mars himself. So we may say of Earthly pleasure: If we mingle it with penitent sorrow, we spoil the pleasure: if we do not thus mingle it, we spoil ourselves. When he slew them, they sought him. Cùm occideret, when he slew them: it had been a better report. Cum servaret, when he saved them. Good men cleave to God in a calm: the worst sinners will seek him in a storm. In this gracious Sun-shine of his longsuffering, while he forbears and defers the coming of his day; let us so repent, that we may be found blameless in the day of his coming. This is the only blessed use of it.

4. There be some that like well enough of God's longsuffering toward themselves; but they have no mind to follow his example in the forbearing of others. Infinite are our offenses against him, and yet we look that he should spare us: few and trivial are the wrongs done to us, and yet they stir us to impatience. Three things we do well commit to God; our injuries, our losses, and our griefs: for he is only able to cure our griefs, to restore our losses, and to redress our injuries. Vengeance is God's own weapon; so appropriated to his hand, that no creature may meddle with it. I forgave thee all the debt, such was the mercy of God's patience: Thou wouldst not have compassion on thy fellow: such was the cruelty of man's impatience. He had much forgiven him, even ten thousand talents: yet he would not forgive a little; no not an hundred pence. A talent is esteemed at above a hundred and seventeen pounds: the Roman Penny was under our shilling; so that the sum, according to our account which was owing to him by his neighbor, was not full three pounds: the debt which he ought to his Master, was far above ten hundred thousand pounds: yet he had neither so much mercy as to quit scores, and cancel the debt; nor so much patience as to allow a day of payment: But presently, from his Lord's arms, he falls upon his fellows throat.

There is nothing that makes a man so unlike to God, as a hard heart; without pity, without patience. In the Tabernacle, the doors of the Sanctum Sanctorum, were of Olive tree; which is the Hieroglyphic of mercy: But the gates of that fearful Dungeon, which is Hell, are said to be of brass and iron: He hath broken the gates of brass, and the bars of iron in sunder: the signs of hard hearts and instruments of destruction. Which serves to show, that the way to Hell, is by inhumanity; to Heaven, by pity. Of all the passions in us, compassion is the best: and a man without this tenderness, is but the Statue of a man; a mere stone in a human figure. The very stones will seem to weep, when foul weather is a coming: and as if they had been once so full of sorrow for Christ's sufferings, that their solid breasts could no longer contain it, they brake in pieces. There be men harder than stones, that have hearts more impenetrable, obdurate, and unrelenting; and less capable of remorse. Nay, instead of pitying the wounds of the miserable, they make those miserable wounds.

It was held a shame to an Athenian, (it is worse in a Christian) never to have been in the Philosophers Academy, nor in the Temple of Mercy. If we cannot through disability, relieve others with our goods; which is the mercy of contribution: yet what can hinder our comfortable words to them, which is the mercy of consolation? or our tears and prayers for them, which is the mercy of intercession? Or our pity and sensible sympathy of their griefs, which is the mercy of compassion? It was an act of Lycinius the tyrant, I know not whether more cruel or foolish; that when Christians were put to their torture, he forbid all the lookers on to show the least pity toward them: threatening the same pains to them that did show it, which the Martyrs then suffered. His malice was greater than his power: for he could not hinder those from suffering with them, that daily suffer in them.

But alas! Where now is mercy to forgive? nay, where is patience to forbear? witness our daily homicides, duells, and quarrels, that we have no patience. Witness that monstrous number of thriving Lawyers, to justify sacrilege and oppression, that we have no mercy. The Lord may suffer us, as long as he please; year after year, to the end of our lives: one term, one month, one hour, we think too much to bear with our brother. Patience is dead, but how we know not. We have our weekly bills that inform us the particular diseases, whereof men die: but of what disease died Patience? Sure it was some violent death, and we may justly indict pride and malice for her murderers. Where she lives, she will keep the hands from striking, and the mouth from traducing, and the heart from envying: She makes the brow smooth, the eye modest, the foot slow, the speech courteous. But where she is dead, fury lightens in the eyes, frowns dwell in the forehead, scandal in the tongue, blood besmears the hand, wickedness infects the whole man. Though she be dead in the world, yet let us pray the God of patience to revive her in our hearts: that we may possess our souls in patience whiles we live, and return our souls in peace, when we die, into the arms of JESUS CHRIST.

Account that the longsuffering of the Lord •s salvation.] As a man that sees the •od•e of a Church, in a perspective piece, think•• at first that he may soon for••icall, without leaving anything unobserved: But when the grass is given •im, made for the purpose, through which he is to look upon it, 〈◇〉 his eyes and mind are when up with a longer time of speculation, and he find 〈◇〉 work enough for a pair of hours, to note every part of that curious fabric: Many •pillar, and 〈◇〉 a posture is presented to him, worth his sight, which at the first bl•sh he would have passed over as not remarkable. So at my first •••ce into this short argument, (little in show, infinite in sense) I promised myself •••icke dispa•ch, and though it but our days journey at the most: but the far••• passed into this magnificent and beauteous •••ucture, the busier my thoughts grew, and the more work I found: Many a colonne of comfort, many a door of hope, many a window of light is espied, and would not be left undiscovered: that the weak might have instruction, the stronger satisfaction, all consolation; and in all, God might have the glory of his wisdom. Four conclusions, like so many corollaries, I desire not to leave unmentioned.

1. If God should take us away in the midst of our sins, we cannot take him of Injustice: but that his longsuffering affords us space of repentance, is the great praise of his mercy. I gave her space to repent of her fornication, but she repented not. That she had space, this was God's fair allowance: that she repented not, this was her fowl miscarriage. We all know that our days are few: and we should know that our sins are many. Cease, and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little. Cease O Lord, from punishing, that I may take comfort: so prays man: yea, O man, cease from sinning, for there is no other way to find comfort, so answers God. The cloth that hath many stains, must pass through many larders. Our godly sorrows are put in one scale, our ungodly sins in another: the Lord will try one day, which of them weighs heaviest. Let us try them both first: & if we perceive the balance of our sins to overpoise; Let us put in groans and sighs, and prayers and tears into the other balance, to make it up. It is true that nothing but Christ's blood can hold weight with sin, in respect of satisfaction: yet our repentance must strive to do it, in respect of deprecation. Repentance and good works have their several acts and offices in this business. Repentance doth empty the scale of our sins: and good works help to fill up the scale of our righteousness.

Indeed, of the members from the Head, there can be no separation: and the peace once made in Heaven, can never be broken: yet the more confirmation, the more comfort. In Christ, our salvation is sure: but that it is at all times sure in our particular feeling, what militant Saint dares affirm? Upon sin will follow doubt, upon doubt terror, upon terror remorse, upon remorse deprecation, upon that pardon, & after pardon, peace: so after sin admitted, the more time of forbearance, the better means of repentance: the better means, the stronger hope: the stronger hope, the sweeter comfort: the sweeter comfort to man, the nobler mercy of God. Therefore his long suffering well deserves the name of salvation. It is truly said, that time makes everything aged, yet it self was never above a minute old. But if time, which makes us old in years, shall make us also old in grace and good works: for such a time let us bless the Lord's longsuffering. Why is he that opens his mouth in blasphemy, ever suffered to open it again in prayer. Or he that prof••es the Lord's day, to breathe out that night? Or he that sleeps drunk, to <ϕ> sober? Or he that oppresses the poor, to live one hour rich? Surely nothing can be said but this: It is the goodness of God, and that goodness is longsuffering, and that longsuffering is mercy, and that mercy is salvation.

The Lord's longsuffering is mis-interpreted, if it bring us not to salvation, and to salvation it cannot bring us without repentance. It is manifest, that he willeth <ϕ> the death of a sinner; for then he would not afford him such liberty of conversion. All afflictions are his messengers, and he gives all those messengers their errands, with a gracious qualification, as David to his captain concerning Absalom: For my sake deal gently with him. Yet we require this favor like the unthankful earth, which for the Sun's radiant beams and influence shed upon it; returns him mists, and fogs, and filthy vapors, to dishonor him. God's end in this, in our repentance, is our end is salvation: let not him lose his hope, and we shall not lose ours. So will he take away our iniquity, which otherwise would take us from his mercy, and pass by our transgressions as a stranger, which otherwise would make us strangers to him forever. Yea, such is his longsuffering, that he doth not long retain his anger, though we retain the cause of his anger; but turns to us with indulgence, before we turn to him by repentance:

and hath compassion upon us, that have none upon our own souls: and drowns our sins in the bottom of the sea, that would drown us in the bottom of Hell.

The fruit of God's longsuffering, is our salvation: the fruit is on the •re, but without the hand of faith we cannot gather it; & without gathring, it is none of ours. The benefit of a good thing is in the use: wisdom is good, but not to us, if it be not exercised: cloth is good, but not to us, except it be worn: the light is comfortable, but not to him that will live in darkness: Christ himself, that •mū boū, does us no good, except he be applied. So time is good, & repentance is good: yet neither of them good to us, unless we couple them together, & in time fall to repentance. Despisest thou the riches of his goodness, forbearance and longsuffering, not knowing that this goodness leadeth thee to repentance? The unthankful and dissolute sinner is so far from rightly valuing, and justly requiting this favor, that he despiseth it; and what doth he despise? goodness; a nature of such beauty and sweetness, that every man loves it. And in what degree stands this goodness? It is not common, but extraordinary, not penurious, but bountiful: so far from poverty, that it is the riches of his goodness. And what is this riches? Even God's longsuffering and forbearance. So this affordment of time to repent in, is a favor: and not a man's favor, but the Lord's: and not a common grace, but one special fruit of his goodness: and that not in a small measure, but the riches of his goodness: and shall any sinner despise all this? But whither tends this goodness? It leads us to repentance: therefore to neglect this time of repentance, is to despise his goodness.

It is remarkable enough, that longsuffering leads us to repentance: why do not menaces humble us, with Ahab? or why do not judgments break us, with Pharaoh? why doth not the plague empty our streets of people, or war fill them with blood? why doth not God speak to us in fire, and thunder, and earth-quakes, as he passed by Elias? why in that still voice of mercy and forbearance? why does he not come to us in the rough way of vengeance? why rather lead us, than draw, or drive us to repentance? There is no cause to be found of it, but in his goodness. His sheep follow him: ducere maluit, quàm trahere Christus. Yet would he not have his patience abused. Say that repentance could be as easily obtained after sin, as mercy may be obtained after repentance: yet will any gracious son mock the kindness of his indulgent father? This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners. A sweet & universal truth: but what kind of sinners? the obstinate & impenitent sinners? No, he never came to save them: but but the relenting, repenting, broken hearted sinners: these he will as surely save, as he came to be a Savior. This is that faithful saying; this is worthy of all acceptation. That he can forgive more than we can offend, is another granted truth: but that he will forgive all that we shall willfully commit, and persevere in, is a fearful question. A malefactor is reprieved after judgment, suffered to go abroad: upon his amendment and future good behavior, the king hath a p••pose to pardon him: he falls to his former outrages, building on his Princes favor: on a sudden he is caught, and fairly executed. Man sins, and GOD spares: this prorogation of judgment he takes for a plenary pardon: he multiplies his crimes, and builds upon favor: the works of iniquity fill his hands, while the voice of mercy fills his mouth: and so with mercy in his mouth, he runs to Hell. The oppressor increaseth his wealth by violence and rapine, yet flatters himself that at the last pinch, he can lay all his load on the back of mercy, and go lightly and nimbly to Heaven. The swearer makes his Soul Hellfire hot with oaths and blasphemies, yet presumes that one short prayer for mercy shall cool him. The homicide kills, and makes mercy his Sanctuary: as if the crying blood of Abel could be stilled or silenced with one Miserere mei, or Psalm of mercy. The adulterer makes a lazar of his conscience, with the aspersions of uncleanness; and yet looks to cleanse and whiten it again with one drop of mercy. The Thief steals, and makes mercy his receiver: the Epicure riots and makes mercy his Cator: the Worldling forrageth, and makes mercy his Purveyor. Profane sinners persist in wickedness, and upon the least twitch of Conscience, run to mercy, as to the horns of the Altar. Mercy hath all the work, as if Justice had nothing to do among the Sons of Men. But this is a false gloss upon the Text, a wrong comment and interpretation of the Lord's longsuffering; He meant it for our salvation, and we pervert it to our destruction: No marvel if before these men seek for mercy, they stumble upon vengeance. For they that will sin that grace might abound, shall pass from the abundance of neglected grace, to the abundance of endless woe. But while God suffers, let us repent, and then it is salvation.

3. The goodness of God may be abused; and then where the sentence of mercy fails of the effect, the sentence of judgment will take place. The divine patience leads us to repentance, saith Saint Paul: it is salvation, saith Saint Peter: yet some it leads to hardness of heart, (as we find by experience) and so to some it is damnation.. But where is the fault? Not in God's patience, but in man's perverseness. What debtor blames his creditor, for giving him day: especially seeing that with God, acknowledgement stands for payment: and a sorrow that we cannot satisfy, is a current satisfaction. But there be some places of Scripture, that may seem to cross this. My fury shall depart from thee; I will be quiet and no more angry: Not to be angry, is the greatest anger, Whom the Lord loveth, he scourgeth: Is it his love, to strike? and to forbear, is that his love too? Why not? To withhold confusion, is his favor: and yet it is his favor also, not to withhold correction: For my Names sake, I will defer mine anger, that I cut thee not off. He will take away his destroying anger, for his Names sake: but not his paternal anger, for his child's sake. It is his mercy, that we are not consumed: and it is his mercy too, that we are chastised. His threatenings are his mercies, and his corrections are his mercies: otherwise, he would neither threaten, nor correct. Certainly he would not warn them that never will repent, if he meant not to pardon those that do repent. And this is one argument to satisfy our conscience, that God intends his long suffering for our Salvation; if he spare us from ruin, but not from the rod: If he scourge us though we bleed not; or till we bleed, though we faint not; or till we even faint, though we perish not. If the Lord prunes his vine, he means not to root it up: if he minister physic to our souls, he would not have us die in our sins: all is for salvation.

4. This binds us to wait his leisure, with patience and thankfulness. Faith, love, and patience, are three of a Christians rarest Jewels. By faith we possess Christ, and all his riches: by love we possess others, and all their comforts: by patience we possess ourselves, and all quietness. He that hath not faith, is without the Head: He that hath not love, is without the Body: and he that hath not patience, is without himself. Faith and patience are the two miracles in a Christian: I do not mean that miraculous faith, which could remove mountains: But as Augustine saith, Faith it self is a miracle: to believe things so far above reason and nature, is miraculous. Patience is a miracle too; if we compare the frailty of the Flesh, with the victory of the Spirit. Cassianus reports, that when a martyr was tormented by the Infidels, and asked by way of reproach; Tell us, what miracle thy Christ hath done; he answered; He hath done what you now behold, that I am not moved with your contumelies, but patient under all these tortures: this miracle he hath wrought. It was proverbially spoken, Magistratus indicat virum: and as truly, Patientia indicat Christianum. Two virtues are necessary to a quiet life: Sapientia in verbis, Patientia in verberibus. Christ does not say, in patience possess your hands, or your mouths: for a natural man may forbear ill language, when he is affronted: or refrain from blows, when he is provoked: and yet still have revenge boiling in his heart. But all faculties of man are subject to the soul, and under her command: if we can possess our soul in patience, she will in patience possess all the rest. I was dumb, and opened not my mouth, because thou diddest it. For that I did, I was not dumb; but opened my mouth in the confession of my sin. But for that thou, O Lord, hast done, I was dumb; and durst not open my mouth against thy punishment. Amove plagas tuas, Yea & plagas meas. Remove thy strokes from me: they are thine, for thou didst send them: and mine, for I suffer them: Thine, because they come from thy Justice; and Mine, because they come from my demerites: Remit what I have done, and Remove what thou hast done; Or if thou wilt farther excercise me with the Cross, still further fortify me with patience. Non cogor pati, plus quàm merui. I complain of no wrong thou hast done to me: of the wrong I have done to thee, I have great cause to complain. Qui in panis murmurat, ferientis Iustitiam accusat.

So soon as ever Christ's Disciples had received him into the ship, immediately the ship was at the land whither they went. Why have not we so quick a dispatch? Why are we not past all the swelling billows of afflictions, so soon as we have taken in Christ by our prayers? The purpose of God terminates every action: and that is immediately done, which is done when he would have it done. If it be not done yet, I perceive that it was his purpose not to have it done so soon. Shall the deferment of it, either slacken my hope, or weaken my patience? No, It is good that a man should both hope, and quietly wait for the salvation of the Lord. The worst men pass this life at most ease; their judgments are put off to the last day: and shall not we endure the putting off of comfort for one day? And yet our gracious Father puts us not to that: for even the assurance of future mercy, is present mercy. To be certain that we shall have ease in the end, is ease before the end. Let us neither be weary of God's peace, nor of our own patience. We should not provoke him with a prayer, not with a wish, not with a hope, to more haste than consists with his purpose: nor look that any other thing should have entered into his purpose, than his glory. To hear his steppes coming toward us, is the same comfort as to see his face present with us; although not the same measure and degree of comfort. Heaven it self is but an extension of the same joy: and for God to proceed at his leisure, in the way of mercy and comfort, is a manifestation of Heaven to us hear upon Earth. Quae nondum data sunt, stulte, negata putas? Blessings are not denied, though they be not presently granted. Somewhile God is not fit to give: the time for his greater glory is not yet come. Another while we are not fit to receive: the time of our capacity and preparedness is not yet come. The Lord looks to be waited on: Waite on the Lord, and he shall strengthen thy heart: wait on him with patience; this quiets all.

The Censurers of the World, by way of Apologue, being met together, consulted about the redress of diverse enormities: One with the countenance of Heraclitus, was ever weeping for the disorders: another with the face of Democritus, was ever laughing at the absurdities: a third of a more pragmatistical and stirring spirit, was ever busy where he had no thanks; one that would thrust himself into other men's brawls and quarrels, and meddle with impertinent matters. They all studied and plotted how to reform the ataxic of things, and to bring the world into some peace and order. Princes were implored, Philosophers consulted, Physicians, Soldiers, the eminent in all professions were convented: many stratagems were devised. Still the more they projected to quiet the worlds troubles, the more troublesome they made it. One would have it this way, another that, the next differs from them both, a fourth opposeth them three, a fifth contradicts them all. So that here was nothing but crossing one another; an image of that mischief which they mett to remedy. Physicians with their Recipes, Commanders with the Precipes, Jesuits with their Decipes; all the rest with their Percipes, could do no no good. At last, a grand Father, in a religious habit, presented them an Herb of such sovereign virtue, that when everyone had tasted of it, they were all calm and quiet presently. The Herbs name he called Bulapatham, the Herb Patience. Let this be our diet continually, and we shall find a strange alteration in ourselves. No troubles abroad can break our peace at home: for Peace is the daughter of Patience. So shall there be joy in Heaven, for the peace on Earth; and this peace on Earth, shall bring us to the joy of Heaven.

Even as our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you. This is the Testimony. In the Creation of the World, God made but one Sun: but He made many bodies that receive and give light. The Romans began with one King; then they came to two Consuls, not without many Senators. It is no diminution to the greatness and dignity of a Monarch, to have divers Counsellors, and to derive part of his care upon others. That State is safest, where businesses are carried by more counsels, than can be in one breast. In our sickness, we admit more Physicians than one: the providence is the more, the danger is not the more by it. There is one Sun, many Stars: one King, many Magistrates: one Truth, many Witnesses; one Word of God, many Preachers. Howsoever that sacred Word is called the Testimony, because it can sufficiently bear witness to it self: yet is God pleased to take in that same [Ex ore duorum] for the better state and credit of a truth. And Christ himself, that eternal Word, and Truth it self, took in [Ex ore duodecim] the Witness of the twelve; Matthias supplying the room of Judas. Ye shall be Witnesses unto me. John the Baptist in the Wilderness, seemed to be a Witness alone: He was sent to bear witness of that light. He then, and none but He. He was to witness but to a few, there: and those few had fewer temptations, fewer businesses, fewer worldly allurements, to withdraw them from his witness, there. But in places inhabited, the world hath many allegations, and pretences, to cross the Testimony of Truth. Here, all those excuses meet: some have purchased lands, and they must state them: some have bought commodities, and they must utter them: some have married wives, and they must study them. One Witness was enough for the Wilderness; but Christ sends all his Apostles to Jerusalem, and Samaria, to city and country: and all little enough. Here, Saint Peter calls in Saint Paul, for a co-witness to his Doctrine: so to one verity, there is a double Testimony. As our, &c.

In the Testimony we have three notes of excellency. First, Testanti dignitas; the worth of the Witness; As our brother Paul. Secondly, Testimoniaritas, the clearness of the thing witnessed: Non dixit, sed scripsit: not only said, but written: for a more certain manifestation. Thirdly, Vtriusque autoritas, the authority of them both; according to the wisdom given him: all is from above, by the Inspiration of God. In the first note there are three circumstances. First, Quaedam circa citatum; Paul's truth of honor; he is worthy to be cited: and the honor of his truth; it is worthy to be received. Secondly, Quaedam circa citantem; Peter's humility, in that he daigns to quote Paul: and his charity, in calling him Beloved Brother. Thirdly, Quaedam circa utrumque: first, the Apostles uniting their forces, to maintain one another's Doctrine. Next, the strong assurance we have of the Gospel, whereof we have more than a single testimony.

1. Here is commended to us our Apostles humility. He does not (in pride of heart) say; Why not I as well as Paul? Why is not my word as credible as his? But without any self-respect, he appeals to Paul, he honors Paul, he fetcheth in Paul for the warrant of his writings. Paul once chidde Peter, Peter commends Paul. It was well done of Paul, to reprove Peter to his face: and it is well done of Peter, to praise Paul in his absence. Paul's censure of Peter behind his back, had been calumny: and Peter's commendation of Paul to his face, had been flattery: both being done in their due time and place, are proofs of their sincerity.

Pride is odious in all men, intolerable in Church-men. Paul was wrapped up to the third heaven; yet calls himself minimus Apostolorum. Peter was first called, first named, he first preached after his Lord's departure: yet he subscribes to Paul, and (in the former Epistle) ranked himself with the meanest Saint living. Paul was in danger to be puffed up with revelations: many have no such revelations at all, and yet they are puffed up.

Some reasons may be given, why Peter thus exalted Paul. First, to vindicate his authority: for some might haply not think him an Apostle, because he was none of the twelve; nor chosen with the rest: but Peter acknowledgeth him for an Apostle. Secondly, to justify his Doctrine: some of the faithful, among them of the Circumcision, did oppose him, and wrangle against his Teaching: Peter clears him from all suspicion of error. Thirdly, to quit himself from all mistrust of envy: that it might appear, notwithstanding the jarre between them at Antioch, yet there was no ill opinion, no grudge, no sinister thought in the breast of Peter, concerning Paul. Fourthly, to manifest the sincerity of his love: Paul had resisted Peter, and set that down in writing; publishing it to the Church of the Galatians, and thereby to all Christians: yet Peter praiseth Paul, and puts that in writing too, that all the world might read it. This showeth him magis amicum sacrae veritatis, quàm proprii honoris. A good man loves his own credit well, but the truth better: It is but weakness, to err: to persist in error, is the ignoble willfulness. Therefore, though Peter, saith Gregory, was Primus in Apostolatus culmine; yet he was primus in humilitate, also. Paul taxed Peter of infirmity, Peter commends Paul for wisdom.

O for such a spirit of meekness in the Ministers of the Gospel! We are so far from admiring others, that we would have none admired but ourselves. Pulchritudo quam videmus in aliis, facit nos deformis. Why doth one Divine disparage the worth of another? Is it not pride? Why do Repeaters play the Critics, and turn the contractions of Sermons, into the detractions of persons? Is it not pride? If mere shame, or awe of the associates, or secret conscience of a man's deserts, compel them to say something in his praise: yet it goes off with a But▪ but such or such a thing is amiss in him. One compared such a Commender to an ill Farrier; that never shod an Horse, but he prick'd him: so all the good he speaks of men, he still concludes with an exception: which is a bitter herb that mars the pottage: like a boy, that when he hath written a fair copy, blurs wall with one dash of his pen: or a Cow that hath afforded store of mil^e to the vessel: and then kicks it down with her heels. If there must be strife among us, let it appear in this; who shall be foremost, not in taking honor from another, but in giving honor to another. If there must be emulation, let it consist in this; who shall win most souls to Christ. The way for a man to be esteemed the greatest, is to esteem himself the least. Let not him that joins the frame, despise him that he wed the timber: nor he that draws the knot, scorn him that digged the ground. If a man have more excellent gifts, let him use his own, not contemn others: for both may be good, and they come from the same fountain of goodness. All men have not Peters ability, all men ought to have Peters humility. If we cannot come near him in other graces, yet let us be equal to him in this; an humble mind. If we cannot be so high as he, yet let us be as lowly as he.

The Apostles themselves, in the Infancie of their calling, were not without an itch of pride. While the Master was upon the point of dying, the servants comended which of them should be greatest. They strive for their Fathers goods, before himself was dead, and in his fight. And, by the Papists leave, Peter thought himself most touched; as being more especially singled out by his Lord's scrutiny: Simon, Simon, Satan hath desired to winnow thee. The proverb says; (and proverbs are the extracts of experience) When pride comes, shame comes: they both shoot out together, one will not tarry behind the other. There is no ecclypse of the moon, but in the full: when our glory is in the full, it will be darkened with shame. By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my wisdom, for I am prudent; brags the King of Assyria: but I will pull down his high looks, says the King of heaven. So for Herod; when the people deified him, Immediately the Angel of the Lord smote him. Pride even in good men; hath been punished. Hezekiah did but gratify the Ambassadors with the sight of his treasures: and he had a shrewd nippe for in David does but number his people, and besides the remorse of his own heart, thousands of them died for it. They that will be aloft, are subject to most tempests: but the plants that root lowest, grow highest. Look not upon tall Eliab, or Shammah but upon little David. All the sons of Jesse were likely: but God would have the holy oil only poured upon David. Humility is the way to glory. A man may be miserable, and yet honorable: but when, by pride, he comes once to be in disgrace with God, farewell honor. Adam was placed in Paradise; he did not intrude himself: Humility will stay for honor, that ill authority place it there. Non sum dignus, is still found in the mouth of all the Saints. Not, everyone that is exalted, shall be brought low; but qui se exaltavit, he that hath exalted himself. So, nor everyone that is humbled, shall be exalted, but qui se humiliavit, he that hath humbled himself. Therefore in humilitate sapientia, saith the Proverb: If a man would be noble, let him be humble. Elatus animus; da^{rus} Icarus; sure of a fall.

To think to gain honor by pride, is mere folly: the wise man knows that by humility he cannot miss it. In giving honor, go one before another: but this is not the worlds opinion: we would all go before one another, but it shall be in taking, not in giving honor. Peter sate in his Apostolical chair, but with an humble spirit: when one of his supposed Successors is advanced to this chair, O how scornfully does he look upon his inferior Ministers. We all tax the Pope for this: but it is no harm to wish, that no Prelate among us, howsoever orthodox in faith, were in respect of manners thus Popish. No sin begins sooner on us, no sin later leaves us, than pride. It is like the heart; primum vivens, vltim non rians in us. But it is better to be humbled under a fowl sin, than to be proud of any grace. And S^t. Augustine is peremptory; A•de• dicere, that it hath been profitable for proud men, to fall into some gross offense: for they have not lost so much by their fall, as they have got by being down. Honor is the fruit of birth, of wisdom, of valor, of riches, of place and authority, or of the royal favor: But it is never the fruit of grace, nor the blessing of God, without humility. We have not the Sign of a Star in our forcasts, but the Sign of the Cross: still humility is our way to glory. This way went all the Saints of God; this way went even the God of Saints: He humbled himself. Therefore God hath exalted him.

2. The next Star that shines in this Orbe of goodness, is our Apostles charity: which hath two rays, illustrated in two terms; Brother, and Beloved. One of these were enough; the other might seem superfluous. Brother, is fair: for that naturally includes love: Beloved, is more; for that is able to adopt a brother, yea a son. But there may be a Beloved, who is not a brother: yea worse, there may be a brother, who is not beloved. Nature too often runs retrograde; and there is more respect of a stranger, than of a brother. In that first pair of brothers, there was hatred on one side, even unto blood and death. Ishmael derides Isaac, though he were his brother. Esau vows the death of Jacob, though his twinne-brother. Abimelech climbs to the throne by the blood of seventy men; and yet they were all his brethren. It is no more wonder, to see brothers at variance for a legacy or portion, than to see beggars wrangle for an alms, or dogs fight for a bone. Deficit charitas: Brother and Beloved, are not convertible terms: they may be separated; and too often they are found a-sunder. Among those ten brethren, there was but one Reuben, that spake in the behalf of poor Joseph; Let us not kill him, for he is our brother. There was once a whole Church called Philadelphia, or Brotherly love: but we know not what is become of it.

But how was Paul, Peters brother? Surely not by blood. They were brothers by nature, as they were men: brothers by nation, as they were countrymen: brothers by adoption and grace, as they were Christians: brothers by office, as they were Apostles: and by all these respects, they were brothers in love and affection, as being Saints. Love is the comfort of natural men: the comfort and bond of Christian men: the comfort, bond, and ornament too, of Ministers. Love hath laid more obligations upon us, than upon others: and requires a stricter account of us.

First, we teach Love: it is the abridgement of the Law; the Tenor of the Gospel, and so the sum and main scope of all our Sermons. Faith is the Center, and Love the Circle: all our doctrines and conclusions, are but lines drawn from the Center to the circumference. Therefore he that preaches all Faith, and no Charity, comes into the Pulpit without his compass: he sticks in the Centre, without minding the Circle: or lays a foundation, and never rears any building. Now, shall we commend Love to others, and not embrace it ourselves? Bilhah and Zilpah brought forth children to Jacob, and they were free: yet the mothers still remained bond-women. Shall we infranchise you in the liberties of Love, and suffer our own hearts to be bound with the shackles of uncharitableness? No certainly, we that preach Love, and profess Love, and pray for Love, will never shut our doors against Love. We do not persuade you to other cheare, than we wish ourselves. You shall never say, that we commended a way to you, which we refused to walk. Howsoever we come bebehind you in riches, in honors and prosperity; we will make bold to go before you in Charity.

Next, we practice Love: we are set up as lights; and Love is one of those Lamps, always burning in our breasts. We are not like mercenary soldiers, that put themselves into unwarrantable wars: such men forget charity, and fight only for money. The exercise of our love is rather to make peace, though we have small thanks for our labor. We reprehend your sins: is not this Love? We would save your souls; and is not this Love? you may object, that all this is but our duty: and God will not take that for a free-will offering, which should be our daily sacrifice. Grant that it is Debitum charitatis: yet you cannot deny but that it is also Opus Charitatis: and Love is no ways better discerned than ex operibus, by the works and fruits of charity.

Lastly, we have great reason to love one another; Minister to affect Minister: for few love us besides. The external coldness of the Air abroad, teacheth nature to fortify her heat within: the world hates us; we had need to love one another. But do all so? I would they did: it is pity they do not. For a miserly Worldling, or a lewd Companion, to speak ill of their Pastor, is no great matter: their dispraise is his honor, their praise his dishonor. As when a man was commended for dancing well, another replied; The better, the worse. So when deboish'd persons speak ill of their Minister; The worse, the better. But if Peter should traduce Paul, and one Divine inveigh against another; I am sure, this is not divinely spoken. A little spice of self-love embitters the whole cup of charity. This is that proud affectation, which makes a Censere of a Recensere: when a man toucheth his brothers reputation with dirty hands; and defiles it in sport. But that man paises too dear for a jest, who selles his honesty for it. Preachers are called Angels; and should like the Cherubims, look graciously one upon another: they are Oxen, that should draw Christ's yoke quietly, laboriously, and lovingly together. They are like Men of war, with letters of marque from the King of Heaven, to let fly upon his enemies. But if they shoot one against another, with the Artillery of their tongues; or like Vessels at sea, fall foul one upon another; howsoever they may keep their faith, I am sure they have lost their charity. The precise Lecturer covertly disgraceth the honest Pastor; and steals the hearts of the Parish from him. They that call themselves the holy brotherhood; how do they scorn and censure those that are conformable to order and discipline: forgetting that we are their Brethren in function, though not in faction; and labor in the same work, though perhaps not with the same tools. But Sermons that tickle the people's ears, with invectives against learning; wherein tautology and rusticity of speech is called The evidence of the Spirit; these bring them in throngs and tumults to such Churches. I will not censure them, but pray for them; The God of wisdom and peace abate of their pride, peevishness, and ignorance, and send them more charity.

To conclude; Peter loves Paul, Paul loves Peter; every good Pastor loves his Brother; they all Love you; why should not you Love us all? Love us? So you do: who doubts of that? Yes Beloved, give us leave to doubt it, till we find it, or at least some likely hood of it. Two things would make you Love us: First, if we would preach as you would have us: next, if we would refuse our right, for a Benevolence. Especially this latter sticks in your stomachs: Men would Give something, but they will Pay nothing to the Church. If we remit of our own, you are beholden to us: but if we had nothing of our own, and stood at your courtesy, then we must be beholden to you. Tythes have been always due. 1. A promisso; Bring your tithes into my store house, and prove me if I will not give you a blessing: a blessing is entailed to it. 2. A periculo; Ye are cursed, because ye have robbed me of them: there is a curse threatened for it. 3. A contrario; He that giveth a cup of cold water to a Disciple, shall not lose his reward: therefore it follows, that if he take away, though but a cup of cold water, from a Disciple, he shall lose the reward. 4. A beneficio: by your maintaining your Pastors body, he is enabled the better to feed your souls. When the Lamp is not fed with oil, there will be a dark house. 5. Ab exemplo: all good men ever did it. Abraham paid tithes to Melchizedek: and Joseph excepted the land of the Priests, even in Idolatrous Egypt. 6. Ab aequo: he that works with us by the day, we say, is worthy of his wages: we do not call it a Benevolence. O but we must not be too strict in requiring our own; for then you cannot Love us. And yet to call for your own, of your debtors, you think no breach either of Justice of charity. If you would have us De jure cedere, Learn you also Ius reddere. Sometimes, and in some cases, a Minister must not willfully lose his right. 1. In respect of other Pastors that live about him; to whom the example of his Indulgence may do much prejudice. 2. In regard of his Successors: for by making a custom, he may endamage those that come after him. This is one impediment of your Loves: still you think we have too much. I know, that other colorable exceptions be taken against us; and you have Bills and clamors against scandalous Ministers: But if the truth were known; it is not our Lives, but our Livings, that is your eye-sore. Let those critical, and hypocritical censurers pretend what they please: They that had rather be rich, than good; care not how evil we were, so we be poor. And poor enough, God wote, they have made us: even to a proverb, as Job was. Scarce one of a hundred is called by any other title or attribute, but a poor Minister. Is thousands but sufficient for a Tradesman and an alms enough for a Priest? If they could Improprate all the rest of the Churches revenues; as they have done well toward it already: then would they choose Priests according to their own hearts; and give them exhibitions out of their own purses: Then would they pull down the Churches of State, and build themselves Chapels of ease. Such a one we have heard of; that in king Henry the eights days had gotten much by the fall of the Abbeyes; and in Queen Mary's days built himself a pretty chapel: which was not unfitly likened to a man, that having first ravished the mother, would afterward pay for the nursing of the child.

For that other requisite; of adapting our Sermons to their humors; there is such a curse set upon it, that we durst not climb up into the Pulpit, for fear lest thunder should strike us down, if we should so abuse the Lord's message. Yet these are the two common invitations of your Love: if we would preach to your liking, and live at your finding, all would be well. But you are mistaken; for then would nothing be well: Neither we could be well satisfied, nor you well edified, nor God well pleased. But seeing it can be no better, God be praised that it is no worse. And though we cannot have your pleasures, nor your riches, nor your honors; yet let us have your loves. As Peter was to Paul, and Paul to Peter: so you are our Beloved, let us be your Beloved; that we may all be the Beloved of God in Jesus Christ.

As our beloved brother Paul also, &c. As a man that hath seen a goodly statue, the monument of some famous Warriour and Deliverer of his Country; though he hath long gazed on it, and is wonderfully taken with it: yet being told of another comparable to it, or rather transcending it, doth not suffer his eyes and thoughts so to dwell on the former, but he will remove to take a view of the other. This Epistle is one sacred Statue or Monument of Saint Peter; wherein we have beheld many rare figures and sweet lineaments, making up the representation of so divine a soul. If we be not stocks, insensate and dead to all apprehension of goodness, we cannot but be enamored of so gracious a Saint, Christ's special servant, the living instrument of building up his Church, the Doctor of the Jews, the first Preacher to the Gentiles, the Instructor and Comforter of all our hearts; a fundamental Pillar of the Church on Earth, and now a triumphant Soul in Heaven. Yet lest our minds should be fixed upon him only, he modestly takes us off from himself, and sends us to his fellow-Peere, his beloved brother Paul: there he would have our contemplations rest another while. To him he refers us, him he commends to us, and his Epistles, those blessed Trophies of his immortal honor. Now being told of some valiant Champion, renowned for his achievements and conquests, whose fame is spread over all the world, we are inflamed with a desire to see him. His death debarres us of that: see him we cannot; yet we desire to see some picture or resemblance of him; by which shadow we may guess at the substance. Paul is that great Conqueror, whom we would behold; that Champion of the truth, that Demolisher of the strong holds of sin, and kingdom of Satan: we cannot see him upon earth, for he is in Heaven. Yet he hath left a testimony behind him, enough to ennoble his memory, and to satisfy our capacity; his heavenly Doctrine: upon that let us meditate, in that let us be conversant: there we shall read him: and if we follow the direction of that, in Heaven we shall see him. Thus Peter sends us to Paul, and both of them send us to their and our Lord Jesus Christ.

1. Great was the honor of Paul, or else Peter would not have referred us to him. They were both princely Doctors of the faith, and had the whole earth under their pastoral Jurisdiction. It shall exalt the glory of either, and not ecclypse it, by being compared. First, Peter was first called, and Paul confesseth himself an Abortive: yet Peter was called A Christo mortuli, and Paul A Christo immortali. Peter was called with a calm voice, Paul with a thunder-clappe. The one from the boat of his vocation, the other stricken from his horse in the carce•e of his persecution. Peter taken from his nets, Paul from his bloody let•ers. Peter was called before Paul, yet Paul overtooke Peter: he was in labors more abundant than they all: therefore more than Peter. Secondly, Peter received his Instructions from the mouth of Christ, and Paul his Inspirations from the Spirit of Christ. The same holy Ghost came upon Paul and Peter: and though upon Peter in a visible form; yet upon Paul by an invisible power, in no less measure. Thirdly, Christ changed the Name of Peter: and did not the same Christ change the Name of Paul? Peter was but added to Simon, but Saul was wholly turned into Paul. Fourthly, They both wrought miracles alike; Peter with his Shadow, Paul with his Handkerchiefe. If Peter cured a creeple, Paul raised the dead: yea both; Peter raised Dorcas, and Paul Eutichus. Fifthly, Peter wrote two Epistles, Paul fourteen; he had a larger parish than Peter, as being Doctor of the Gentiles. Sixthly, Peter saw Christ in that glorious transfiguration; but Paul saw him in his glorious habitation: Peter on mount Tabor, Paul in Paradise or the third Heaven: Peter, in the company of Moses and Elias; Paul saw him waited on with thousands of Angels. Is Peter than the highest of the Apostles? Yet during his mortal life, he never was advanced so high as Paul. But I stand upon thorns, while I stand upon comparisons.

Nor do I intend any way to derogate from Saint Peter, but somewhat to abate the pride of his usurping Successor. Peter was in admiration of Paul: now all the world must worship the Idol which brags to sit in his Chair. That Paul was at Rome, it is manifest: but what proof have we in the Scripture, that Peter was ever there? If he were, yet what Canon of his appears upon record, that the Pope should be advanced to a Prince? was the Founder of that Hierarchy ever so brave? Nay, was there such regalitie apparent in the Founders Lord and Master? Did Christ wear a Crown of thorns, that the Bishop of Rome should wear a Crown of pearls? Ask the Pope, and the Cardinals his sons, (and too commonly they are indeed his sons) whether they ever read of such pomp and magnificence in the Apostles? It is the opulency, and glorious Soveraigntie of that See, which makes men so ambitious of it; not the Sanctitie. Our English Cardinal, when he was chosen Pope, thought now he should surely have some strange revelation from heaven; some extraordinary wisdom inspired, and grace infused into him. But good honest soul, he was deceived: he found no such matter: But briberle, corruption, flattery, were his continual sollicitions: for the Hierarchy, and for the world, he had a world of business: whereupon he concluded, Siccine finit Pontifices? Are Popes made thus? and so quitte the place. What would he say of it now? if Peter ever sate in that Seat, sure he did not so leave it, as how we find it. Peter and Paul were both blessed Apostles, painful Preachers, patient Martyrs, gracious Saints on earth, and now shine glorious Stars in heaven.

2. Thus for the truth of Paul's honor, which was much: now for the honor of his Truth, which is more. For Peter does not not only commend Paul's Person, but in a higher degree his Doctrine. This is the Charter we hold by; the word of God, the Gospel of Christ, inspired by the holy Ghost, and recorded by Paul and Peter: for they both wrote from one and the same Spirit. No faithful messenger of God can either come but by his mission, or speak but by his direction. For the former; Paul would have gone to Asia, but he could not: to Bithynia, but the Spirit suffered him not: Why? God had intended good to Philippi. There stood a man of Macedonia by Paul in the night: that man of Macedonia was either an Angel, that spake to him in the language of Macedonia: or a man in the habit of Macedonia: this man diverts Paul from his own purpose, to God's purpose. How shall they preach, except they be sent? Now as they cannot come without God's sending, so nor speak but by his inspiring. I have received of the Lord that which I delivered unto you. To this word of our gracious God, delivered by his servant Paul, doth Peter refer us. Though it be conveyed to us by several pipes, it is still the same water of life. In the writings of Paul and Peter, there is no contradiction: such is the sweet harmony of the sacred Scriptures, and consent of God's public Notaries. Physicians may differ in their opinions and prescripts: Lawyers may vary in their counsels and Judgments, according to the proportion of their capacities or fees: Historians differ not only in circumstances, but in substantial matters. But in God's Book, written by so many penmen, in so many places, at so many times, we find no contrariety: What Moses teacheth, that do the Prophets: what they teach, that did Christ: what Christ taught, that did his Apostles: what they all taught; we have received, and you have believed, that thereby we might all be saved. Da Domine, ut sicut verbum est caro factum, sic cor meum fiat carneum. O with what delight and reverence ought we to read the Epistles of S^t. Paul, which are so highly commended to us by S. Peter? His Epistles are Gospel. God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ, according to my Gospel. In the Acts of the Apostles, there are reckoned two and twenty Sermons of theirs; besides those that are not mentioned, for in every place they preached: And yet that Book is not called the Preaching, but the Practice; not The words, but The Acts of the Apostles. All Paul's Epistles are (in effect) Sermons; the arguments and Text whereof is the Gospel: The Scope of all is to bring us to Jesus Christ: yet they are called his Epistles, not his Gospel. With the same faith we receive both: with the same love we embrace both: to them all we yield obedience, for them all we render thanks, and in them all we look for Salvation, through the substance of them all, Jesus Christ.

According to the wisdom given unto him. This is Authority: wherein we have two things to observe.

1. It is Sapientia, Wisdom: not Scientia, a common knowledge. There is a wisdom, which is Munus natura, the gift of nature: The children of this world are wise in their generation. And there is a wisdom, which is Munus Gratia, the gift of Grace: The wisdom that is from above, is pure and peaceable. And that which is the Fountain of all Wisdom: The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way. Albeit there was a gross mistake in the Translation; whether by reason of the Scribes ignorance, or near affinity of the words; in the Septuagint it is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . He created: whereas the original signifies, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . He possessed. Christ is Wisdom it self: because he was for his nature, in respect of the Father; and for his office in respect of us, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , The word. In him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. But in an inferior place; subordinately under Christ, and derivatively from Christ, the dispensation of the Gospel is called Wisdom. Both in respect of the Instruments: so God's public Notaries, the Canonical writers of the Scriptures, were all the children of wisdom, and Spake as they were moved by the holy Ghost. And in regard of the effect; which is to make us wise unto salvation. This Wisdom is only happy: for it made Paul wise to know good, Wise to teach good, Wise to do good, and Wise to be thankful for the good he had received.

2. It is Data, given: It came not into the world with him: he had it not by traduction, or by Inheritance from his parents: so it was not Innata. Not was it Acquisita, wrought out by his own Industrie; not the fruit of time and study. But Given, he had it Aliunde, from somewhere: not from man, sure: Flesh and blood could never teach it him; though Plato and Aristotle, those great Clerks of Nature, had been his Schoolmasters. Nay, grant that Gaemaleel was his Tutor, a famous Doctor of the Law: yet his Wisdom was not so much above a Samaritans, as it came short of Paul's a Christians. Empta it was not: bought no man thinks it. Let his Money perish with him, that thinks the gift of God may be purchased with money. Data then it must be; and Desaper, too: no library on earth could furnish him with such knowledge. It is a breath from heaven, a beam of that Sun of righteousness, a stream of that Crystal river of life, a fruit of that eternal tree, a bright irradiation of the holy Ghost. Given; Paul is beholden to God for it. If we can but glean after his full sheaves; if we have any heavenly Wisdom: Let us not reflect upon ourselves, or look like the swannes into our own bosoms. It grows not there: we must have it from some better garden. Every good gift is from above. Wisdom, as promotion, comes neither from east nor west: it is not on our right hand, nor on our left: it is not within us, nor about us, but above us. What good thing can a man have, except it be given him from heaven? From the puddle of our own hearts, ariseth nothing but muddy cogitations. Why do thoughts arise in your hearts? If they arise there, if that be their original, they are not good. Right Wisdom is a thing descendent: an influence, no vapor: an inspiration, not an exhalation: it comes from above, from below it rises not. For use of it.

1. Let us be thankful to God for Paul's wisdom: for if we be true Christians, we are both the wiser and the better by it. Some Antichristian spirit it was sure, that blasphemously affirmed; It had been better for the Church, if S^t. Paul had never written. It seems, that Paul's doctrine of Justification by faith only, hath much crossed their opinion of Justification by works: and this vexed him. But if we do not bless God for Instruments of our Salvation, for whom will we praise him? The people glorified God, that he had given such gifts unto men: we are none of his people, if for these gifts we do not glorify him.

Which of the Fathers was not in love with the wisdom of Paul? Quis fidelior dictorum Prophetarum Interpres? Quis caelestium mysteriorum sacramenta magis pandeus? Chrysostom sticks not to prefer him before all the rest in learning, and to call him Totius sapientiae magistrum: and confesseth that he could not take off his eyes from reading Paul. Augustine acknowledgeth, that he read Paul more than all the rest of the Apostles: and Nihil nobis isto viro notius, nihil fuavius, nihil in Scripturis familiarius est. Ambrose compares him with Benjamin; whose Measse was five times as much as any of the others. Jerome says that as often as he read Paul he thought he heard not so many words, as wonders; yea thunders: Tonitrua & fulmina. Though for the time of his calling, he was the Fishermens scholar: yet for the improvement of his Preaching, he might be the Fishermens Master. And in regard of his rapture to heaven, and revelations there, learning his Divinity among the Angels, he was not unworthy to teach even the Apostles. Some others, as Dionysius, have called him Secundum Solem, another Sun; and Sapientissimum Intellectualium. Sed reprimam me: some of the Romists may hap to grudge at this commendation of Paul; as suspecting thereby an undervaluing of Peter. But both their honors may well stand together: especially seeing we honor them for Christ's sake, and honor Christ in them. Let them be honored as stars, he as the Sun. When we have cast up the particulars of all the Wisdom in them, of all the wisdom we get by them, we are far from giving the glory to them. But this is the Sum: Non nobis Domine, quia non à ubbis: though the high Wisdom, even the Wisdom of God; yet it comes from on high; from the God of Wisdom: all is his. Non omni nostro; sed Nomine tuo: not to our wit, nor to our luck; nor to our industry, but to thine own Name, Lord give the glory.

2. Let us seek for Paul's wisdom out of Paul's writings: we may be made wise by it, unwise we must needs continue without. They have rejected the Word of the Lord, and what wisdom is in them? They that are not conversant with the book and language of wisdom, in the study and exercise of wisdom, in the house and company of wisdom; shall never attain to so much wisdom as to see their own folly. Non possunt stulti beatius vivere, quàm si serviant sapientibus. But alas, too many come to Church, that School of wisdom, as Pythagoras said, they came to the Olympian games. Some came to win the prizes, some to sell their commodities, for it became the Mart of all Greece: some to meet their friends, and to be merry, for there were companions of all sorts: others only to look on. Men make of a Sermon, as it is said of a Medow: Bos quarit herbam, avis vermem, canis leporem: The Ox looks for grass, the Bird for a worm, the Dog for a Hare: Some would have controversies, and they search for worms: some listen for quick conceits, and these come to pick up sallads, or catch butterflies: some seek for matter of exception; and these come to find a knot in a bulrush: all these in the school of wisdom, and yet never the wiser. Only they that have no other end, but with an honest heart to receive the food of life, are made wise unto salvation.

Hath written unto you. This is claritas testimony, the evidence of his testimony, which affords us three considerations.

1. Written: but what? and where? First, what? Our Apostles argument here, is the divine Patience; the Lord's gracious forbearance of sinners, and desire of their conversion. Secondly, where doth Paul touch upon that string, and make an unison with Peter? We are referred to two places, principally: though we find it Sparsim all over his Epistles. The former. Rom. 2.4. Where we have a copious amplification of God's longanimity: and so Paul and Peter agree for the matter: Paul says, This longsuffering leads to repentance; Peter, that it brings to salvation: and so they agree in the end. This is luce clarius: clear as day. The other. Heb. 10.35. and from thence to the end of that Epistle. Where multifariam, he doth both persuade us to patience, upon the expectation of God's promises and commend his patience, in so long sparing of sinners. There is great probability, that Peter here alludes to that epistle; because it was written to the same persons, the Hebrews, or converted Jews. Which is one pregnant argument, that Paul was the Author of that Epistle to the Hebrews. To them writes Peter here, to them wrote Paul there: therefore doth Peter cite Paul's testimony as a thing familiar and well known to that afflicted company.

2. Hath written. It was God's good pleasure, that his Word should be written. He shown the way himself; and wrote his own law, with his own finger. He taught man the way to write, as by other direction, so by his own example. There be some Atheistical naturians, that would disparage Moses, and therein discredit the divine Truth, by affirming that Trismegistus wrote before him; and that Moses learned of Hermes. And other Antiquaries derive it from an age before them both: Saying, that the Reed was used for a pen; and the canes that grew on the banks of Nile, ministered matter for paper. But certainly, the faculty of writing came from a better invention, and was taught by a higher master. When man was fallen, and naked, God clothed him: he made him a leather garment: there God descended to one occupation: when the time of man's redemption was come, then God as it were to build a house for man, became reputed a Carpenters son: there he descended to another occupation. When he meant to overflow the world with a deluge, that he might preserve some from perishing, he devised an Ark for man: he gave him the module of a ship, a means of transportation: which in all likelihood, man would never have thought on: there God descended to a third occupation, to be man's shipwright. Considering the fickleness of man's memory, how irretentive it is; he thought good to set down his will in writing: and so God descended to another art and profession, teaching man to express his own mind in characters. Naturally man would have been his own Taylor, and his own Carpenter: Necessity would have taught him some ways, to cloth and house himself. Invention would have done something in the other kinds too, though God had given him no such pattern. But the nearnesse and perfection of the way, was of God's teaching. All these sciences as he ordained for our use, so for his own glory: in a special manner writing: That what the ear hath lost in defect of hearing, or the mind in the want of remembering, may be restored to the soul by reading. All that is written is for our learning: It could not be Scripture, if it were not written: and for our sakes it is written. So many ways hath God contrived to save us, let us take all occasions to glorify him.

3. Hath written unto you. What was the matter of his writing? The longsuffering of a merciful God toward sinful men. This was the argument of both those divine pens: for the testification of this, Paul is cited by Peter. Sure, it must be a point of great importance, which both of them so labor to prove. An important matter indeed, and exceedingly beneficial to us, even so much as our salvation comes too, if we make the right use of it: which consists in the observation of those four rules formerly taught us. First, that we take the advantage of repentance by it. Secondly, that we acknowledge God's unspeakable goodness in it. Thirdly, that we express a hearty thankfulness for it. Fourthly, and lastly, that we apply ourselves to the imitation of it: with which I conclude.

It is just that God's patience should call for ours, especially considering the infinite disproportion between us. It is one of those graces, that is not seen but in distress: as the Stars that are hidden all day, and only shine in the night. Beneficence, the fruit of a charitable heart, is not exercised but in want. If no man was in misery, there were no object for our eleemosynary charity. Repentance, the humble sorrow of a relenting heart, is not discerned till after sin. If we never had sinned, nor offended our gracious God, there were no use of repentance. So Patience, the composednesse of a resolute heart, could not appear but in crosses and perturbations. If there was no evil to suffer, there were no need of patience. But the tree of faith, the more it is shaken with the violent storms of trouble, the faster it becomes rooted by patience. O that this lesson would enter home into our hearts, before we go home to our houses: Then should we live in peace, and die in peace, and receive the reward of patience.

We have considered these two famous and blessed Apostles, severally and asunder: In Peter, his Love and Humility: In Paul, his Faithfulness and Excellency. Now, let us put these two Beloved Brothers together; and their conjunction will afford us two profitable Observations.

1. Their Fidelity, or mutual readiness to uphold one another's reputation. It may easily be gathered out of the Epistle to the Galatians, that certain factions spirits, wandered abroad, disturbing the peace of the Churches, and laboring to weaken the credit of Paul: under this pretence, that his Doctrine was not agreeable with the rest of the Apostles. Therefore doth Peter make an honorable mention of Paul: both to justify his Doctrine, and to testify his consent with the rest: that all suspicion, and occasion of calumny might be utterly precluded, and the mouth of all wickedness stopped. Thus did they maintain each others Doctrine, against Sectaries; each others reputation, against Slanderers. O blessed amity, which became the breasts of such a pair of noble Saints! Many do sibi canere, and sibi plaudere: they think themselves dedignified, if any honor be done to others: All Chronicles must be filled with their praises; all tongues become the Trumpets of their worth. They, And who but they? There was another mind in these holy Teachers: Peter honors Paul, and Paul Peter: either is humble in himself, and both strive to give all glory to Jesus Christ.

3. Their Unanimity, and combining of all their forces, to beat down the bulwarks of sin, and to establish the Kingdom of the Gospel. For our better assurance, we have more than a single testimony of the saving Truth. Peter is not alone; Paul goes along with him, in the verifying of the same Doctrine. For the recovery of our bodily health, we admit as much help as we can. Divers Physicians be not divers Indications, and Symptoms of death; and so many Assistants and Proctors of life. Our imagination is not so much fed with the apprehension of danger, as our understanding is with comfort, in the multitude of succors. We may believe one witness: but ex ore duorum, we take stronger ground of confidence. Such was the wisdom of Moses, that he was able alone to judge Israel: yet he refuseth not the counsel of his father in Law, to divide the burden of the Government with others, and to admit them for Assistants in the Iudicature. Why sittest thou alone? Yea, God himself joined Associates with Moses, in that weighty business. Peter had endowments sufficient to preach the Gospel: yet the Lord gave him Paul and more Assistants. Two Considerations here, then we must not omit.

1. That God allows us many helps to salvation. There is abundant power of salvation in any one Evangelist; yet our indulgent God thought good to afford us four. Christ himself is the chief Bishop of our souls, the chief Preacher of the Gospel: yet hath He ordained others under Him; both Bishops and Preachers. The way of God (and He loves to walk in his own ways) was ever to multiply our helps. He that said Faciamus hominem; said also, Faciamus homini, an Helper fit for him. The Power of a single Angel is wonderful; whether in destroying, which the army of Senacharib felt: or in preserving and comforting, as Christ was strengthened: and to strengthen Christ in that agony, was no easy work. Yet for the better manifestation of God's plentiful goodness, and the relief of our diffident weakness; He employed many Angels, in many of his remarkable Works. Christ's Birth was celebrated with a Choir of Angels, with an Army of Angels. His Resurrection, or second Birth, was solemnized with Angels. They were plural, Angels accompanied with Angels. In Jacob's vision, they which ascended and descended that Ladder, as it were maintainining a trade or commerce between Heaven and Earth, were many Angels. They which hastened Lot out of Sodom, were in the plural, Angels. They that are appointed to be the Harvest-men, and to separate the Tares from the good Corn, after they are both grown up together in one field, are Angels. They that have the charge to keep us in all our ways, while we live, are many Angels: Angels mandavit. They that have the Commission to carry up our souls to Heaven, when we die, are many Angels. They who attend at the several gates of the new Jerusalem, to admit us into that blessed City, are many Angels. At the second Comming of Christ, in the last day, when Heaven and Earth shall be all one, He shall appear in his glory, and all the holy Angels with Him. In all their administrations to God's Servants, from the first to the last, there are Angels, in the plural number; many Angels. The Apostles, and their Successors, the Ministers of the Gospel, are honored with the name of Angels: and those come not single. We have not Paul alone, not Peter alone: but are compassed about with a cloud of witnesses. Witness with witness, witness upon witness: which way soever we turn, we are compassed with a cloud of witnesses. This whole cloud guides us to the celestial Canaan: being Witnesses of the Gospel, they bring to us the joyful news of salvation.

But, Why then did David expect good news from a single Messenger? When the Watchman told him of a man running alone, he concluded out of that circumstance, that if he came alone, he brought good news. It was contrary to Job: that same Ego solus, brought him bad news: Woeful tidings were in every Messengers mouth, that came to him with Ego solus aufugi; I only am escaped alone to tell thee. Why then should David take it for a presage of happiness? Indeed our Translation reads it in a word of indifferency; only news; If he be alone, there is tidings in his mouth: without any specification of good or bad. But all others interpret it Bonum nuntium. And why David should persuade himself of good news, because the Messenger came alone, is to me a wonder. Neither yet was the Messenger in all respects alone; for another came after him, that did set out before him. There is small comfort in solitude; and it was no less than a complaint of Paul to Timothy; Only Luke is with me: Luke, and nobody but Luke. Though Luke were able, and forward, and constant, in assisting Paul about that great work wherein he labored; yet is Saint Paul affected with this, that there was none but Luke to assist. Christ did not send his Messengers single: Lambes among Wolves: He does not say one Lamb among many Wolves: that was his own peculiar lot: He was the only Lamb that came alone.

2. It is observable, that most commonly He disposed them to his work, by paires and couples: as Peter here doth join himself with Paul. Peter and John went up together into the Temple, at the hour of prayer. Peter and John; a pair: so they went to praying. Separate me Paul and Barnabas for the work whereunto I have called them: Paul and Barnabas; another pair: so they went to preaching. When those two parted; Barnabas took Mark, and sailed into Cyprus: and Paul chose Silas, and went another way: still by paires. Afterward, Silas and Timothy were coupled, and came together from Macedonia. So Paul inscribed divers of his Epistles, his former to the Corinthians, with Paul and Sosthenes: his other, with Paul and Timothy. So to the Philippians, and Colossians; Paul and Timothy. His first to the Thessalonians, with Paul and Silvanus, and Timothy; three: That to the Galatians, with many: Paul, and all the brethren which are with me. As Peter here desires the testimony and consent of Paul: so Paul will have the partnership of Peter, or some other Apostle. The Ministry is Christ's Yoke, of all and in a yoke, numbers, two draw best together. The Lord appointed other seventy, and sent them two and two before his face. Twelve Apostles he sent first, then seventy Disciples. At Elim, in their journey to Canaan, there were twelve wels, and threescore and ten Palme trees. The twelve Apostles were as twelve fountains; out of whose sacred Doctrines, sinners might draw the water of life. The seventy Disciples, like those seventy Palme trees; under whole cool shades, as Travelers might refresh their scorched and weary limbs; so their worse than Sun-burnt, even sin-burnt souls might find comfort. And as God took of the Spirit that was upon Moses, and put it upon those seventy Elders: so he took of the Spirit of his Son, and put it on those seventy servants, toward the administration of his spiritual Kingdom. The twelve were called Apostles; the seventy Disciples; there was a plain distinction between them: Answerable to the former, the Church hath her Prelates and Bishops: to the other, her inferior Priests, and subordinate Ministers. But my observation is, that they were sent two and two. Binarius numerus valde faustus, So sent, for divers reasons.

1. Ad Facilitatem; for the better facility. Two will more easily dispatch a work, than one. Two Oxen sooner plow the ground: two Sowers sooner cast in the seed. Elias himself fainted under this apprehension: I am left alone, and they seek my life. And Martha complains of her burden: Lord, dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? To bear the weight alone, to take all the care alone, which should be shared between two, is hard.

2. Ad Vtilitatem, for the more commodiousnes. If one err, the other may direct and reclaim him. In the deliberation about any act, two Iudgments are better than one. If one fall, the other may help him, up: but vae soli, woe to him that is alone when he falleth. One may be cold alone, but two lying together have heat. If the devotion of the one wax cold, the oaths zeal may warm it. Besides, as two together may do the greater work, so they shall have the better reward. There is a more liberal promise to two, than to one: Where two or three of you be gathered together, I will be with you. I deny not, but solitarynes, and abandoning of society sometimes disposeth us best for God; who accompanies us most, when we are alone. Therefore Moses was commanded to come near to the Lord alone. Yea, and when we are alone, God comes near unto us: as he did to Elias in the cave: and to Jacob, when he was left alone: yet he wrestled with him, and lamed him. But for our benefit, and comfort, we embrace a good associate.

3. Ad Humilitatem; for the better means of humbling them. The honor that is divided among two, is less than if it were wholly given to one; and so less endangers either of them to pride. In a work of great consequence, it argues the candor and modesty of a man, to desire a co-adjutor. If the danger be great, he justifies his proceedings: for he disguiseth nothing, that calls in witnesses. If the danger be not great, yet it clears him from ambition: in that he is ready to divide the thanks and honor of the work with others, which by his achievement he could have had alone. This keeps us within the bounds of humility: that how well soever the Vine prospers under our hands, yet Peter cannot say, I have wrought in the Vineyard alone; but that Paul was with me.

4. Ad Charitatem; for the advancement of their charity. Love divided among many, is minor singulis: but when they are but two, how can they choose but love one another? Therefore the most perfect friendship is held to be between two. Such was between Damon and Pythias, among the Gentiles: between David and Jonathan, among the Israelites.

5. Ad Societatem, for the better society. Company beguiles both way and work. Binarius numerus socialis; and therein tends to perfection. Two are better than one. God, who saw that all he had made was exceeding good; came not so near seeing a defect in any of his works, as by seeing man solitary. This he acknowledged; It is not good for man to be alone: therefore he made him a companion, a helper, and such a one as should help him to more company than her own; even a generation of associates, by their increase. How many a difficult work, how many a tedious journey, is overcome and digested by good society: But Longam incommitata videtur Ire viam. Whiles Peter looks to Paul, and Paul hath respect to Peter, in their travels, they are the better encouraged to the Lord's work.

6. Ad Validitatem; for the better strength of defense. When thieves see a passenger alone, they boldly set upon him: but if there be two to two, they will be afraid to venture. Say these Apostles were but two, and their enemies three; the Flesh, the World, and the Devil: yet were they three hundred, let but these two hold together, and they shall be conquerors. So the Proverb hath it; Brother that holdeth with brother, is like a fortified city. Vis unita fortior. What bulwarks of error could stand against their assaults? Ne Hercules contra duos: Against these two, hell it self could not prevail.

7. Ad Securitatem; for their better security, tranquility, and composednes. Howsoever it was ordained for a blessing, and for a dignity to Israel; The people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations: not among the cursed nations: not among them, but above them. Israel shall dwell in safety alone: free from the infestation of enemies. Yet for particular persons, there is great comfort in society. Our griefs are lessened, our joys enlarged, our cares lightened, by a friendly associate. It was a plague upon a plague to the leper, that he was condemned to live alone. It cannot but be the aggravation of any sickness, when a man is compelled to be sick alone; without any visitant, either to ease, or pity him. In his deepest extremity, Job had some called Comforters, though they were miserable ones: and miserable comforters are better than none at all. It was for that Almighty man, to tread the wine press alone; and to have none of the people with him. Death takes a cruel advantage upon him that must die alone: without a comforter, nay without a condoler. It was a sad entrance into Jeremiah's Lamentations; How doth the city sit solitary, that was full of people! But in all heats of anguish, good assistance and society breathes some cool air of comfort. When Paul must answer before Nero, he complains that no man stood with him, but all men forsook him: O then one Peter, one Comforter had been exceeding welcome to him.

8. Lastly and chiefly, ad credibilitatem: (for you may take all this for a digression: yet pardon it, you have lost nothing by it) the main scope that led me into this meditation, is for their better credibility, and to work a belief in men's hearts of that truth, which they have both delivered. Paul and Peter, those two are conjoined, that their testimony might be the more fairly received. Ex ore duorum, stat omne verum. For this cause Christ sent his Apostles and Disciples before him, by two and by two: that the one might witness for the other, and all bear witness to Christ, Solus testis, seldom allowed. If I bear witness of myself, my witness is not true. And yet that mighty Prince might well write, Teste meipso: and so he does: Though I bear record of myself, yet my record is true. Ipse de me, and yet verum. But commonly more witnesses are used than one. There are three that bear record; the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one: so we have three witnesses in Heaven. And there are three more; the Spirit, and the Water, and the blood: so we have three witnesses in Earth: and these agree in one: there is no discord among them. At the least Two; I will give power to my two witnesses.

Christ called his Apostles by paires: Simon and Andrew: Two, and those were Brethren. Going a little farther, He calls James, and John; Two more, and those also brethren. So he sent them out by paires: He called to him the twelve, and sent them forth by two and two. To the two Disciples going to Emmaus, he shown himself on the day of his resurrection. In this number John the Baptist sent his Disciples to Christ: two together. God brought his people out of Egypt by two leaders; By the hand of Moses and Aaron: So he brings our souls out of spiritual bondage, by Peter and Paul, by James and John; by two and two. As the two spies brought the cluster of grapes between them from Canaan: so he did appoint two Disciples to bring us the wine of salvation, for the cheering of our hearts. The Ark of God was borne between two: Two were called to build the Tabernacle; Bezaliel and Aholiab: So the messengers of the Gospel were sent by two's, to bear Christ into the world, and to build up his Church. There were two Cherubims at each end of the Mercy-seat; as at either end of Christ's grave, two Angels. Hiram made two pillars, and two chapiters for those pillars in the Temple. The Church hath two wings, to fly from persecution. Her servants are clothed duplicibus; each hath two garments. The principal members of our body are double, for the better mutual supply. We have two eyes; that if one miscarry, the other may guide us: Two ears, two hands, two feet; that the one may relieve the weakness of the other. There were two Tables of the Law: Two Testaments: and the Lord sent the Ministers of them both, by two's, paires and couples. Ecce duo gladii; two swords; and they are enough to kill those two enemies; Sin and Satan.

There are but two principal relations in the world; and all men must fall under one of the combinations: Husband and Wife, Father and Son, King and Subject, Master and Servant: some of these we must all be. By paires are Christ's messengers sent, to teach all these paires their duties. Therefore two; to explain two covenants, the Law and the Gospel: To keep enmity between the two seeds; of the Woman and the Serpent: to maintain war between those two foes, the flesh and the spirit: To execute two offices, of preaching and baptising: To preach two doctrines, of faith and good works: To set upon men those two Seals, in the administration of the two Sacraments: To exercise two jurisdictions, of binding and loosing: To unite two, Jews and Gentiles: To overcome two, Sin and Satan: To reconcile two, God and Man: To save two, Body and Soul. Let us be ready for these Ambassadors, with two preparations, of our ears and hearts: meet them with two gratulations, of joy and reverence: welcome them with two entertainments, of faith and repentance and return them with two satisfactions, of our thankfulness and obedience. So shall we depart this life with two comforts, peace and a good conscience; and rest in Heaven with those two noble societies of Saints and Angels: when those two parts of the Church, the militant and triumphant, shall make but one Parish; where Jesus Christ shall be all in all; Amen.

As also in all his Epistles, speaking in them of these things, in which are some things hard to be understood: which they that are unlearned and unstable, wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction.

WE read of a great wonder in Heaven: A woman clothed with the Sun, and the Moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown with twelve Stars. In Heaven are many wonders: wondrous joy, wondrous sanctity, wondrous glory: all wonders to us that live in this dark grove of mortality. But the Heaven here spoken of, is upon the Earth: and the woman is the Church in her militant condition. This Woman is clothed with the Sun: that is a wonder: who can imagine a garment for any creature, to be cut out of the whole piece of the Sun? Not only clothed with his beams, and rays, and light: For so Men and Plants, the Earth and all things upon it, are clothed with the Sun: in that sense, the Sun clothes whatsoever it shines upon. But this Woman is clothed with the Sun it self: the very body of that great Luminary is become her vesture. The proudest Lady, and the highest Princesse of the world; though the riches of nature be ravished into their wardrobes, and their silken garments be interwoven with gold, and embroidered with Pearls and Diamonds; cannot show such a suit. The Sun is Christ: the garment wherewith this Sun clothes his Spouse, is his own righteousness: thus covered, she appears just, pure, and amiable in the sight of God. The Moon is under her feet: Her location must needs be high, even above the Moon. The Moon governs the Sea; than the Sea and the Moon, there is nothing more inconstant: both are emblemes of the world. This Moon the Church treads under her feet; despising the vanity of all transient things. Upon her head was a crown of twelve Stars: a wonderful rare crown, that was made of Stars. Gold is the principal material of a crown: but what needs she wear gold upon her head, that tramples it under her feet? The twelve Stars, are the twelve Apostles: these are the arms of this glorious Queen: but she bears them with a difference from her Lord and King. For Christ hath them in his hand, as his servants: but his Spouse, on her head, as her chief ornaments.

To our purpose: The Sun gives to the Stars all the light they have: so the Apostles receive all their illumination and wisdom from Christ, by the holy Spirit: as a lantern hath no light of it self, but what is put into it. Of these Stars, thus enlightened, some are fixed in the Firmament; others wandering. The Apostles were to range abroad, by their commission: not after Saint Iudes meaning, who calls false teachers, wandering Stars: For in that sense, the Planets themselves are not wandering, but keep a direct and constant course in their Orbes. But those that Jude speaks of, are Meteors; shooting or gliding stars: which can neither guide Travelers by land, nor Mariners by Sea. But these Stars of Christ are stable, bright, glorious: we acknowledge their light and influence: they are our faithful Sea-marks, and directions to the Port of blessedness. But in these Stars, my Text notes, there are some things hard to be understood: as the variety of their motions and magnitudes, but especially of their influences: in the Doctrine of the Apostles, quaedam difficilia, Therefore as the Astronomers have framed, to their imagination, Eccentrices, and Epicycles, and a strange engine of Orbes, out of the Heavens: So the schoolmen have devised a world of paradoxes, problemes, improper positions and conclusions, out of the Scriptures: all to save the Phenomenon of Popery. Yea, which is worse, as Astrologers have impiously gathered the prediction of futurities, the calculation of nativities, the alteration of States and Kingdoms, and the event of all contingent fortunes, out of the Stars: perverting the sober use of those Heavenly bodies, to magical purposes: So Heretics have violently forced errors, and schisms, and factions, and hellish tenets, out of the sacred Doctrine of the Apostles; wresting the Scriptures to their own perdition. The full view of whose profane and sacrilegious proceedings, we have in this verse: As also in all his Epistles, &c.

Wherein there be two general occurrences; a Virgin, and a Rape. The Virgin is fair Truth, the Holy Scripture: The Rape is a wresting of it; which is foul violence done unto it. For the former; three things commend a Virgin: unspotted beauty, uncorrupted virtue, and modest retirednesse: Answerable whereunto we find in the Scripture in general, and in this parcel of it, Paul's Epistles in particular, First, for virtue, a sufficiency: In act, and every piece of all, there is full satisfaction. Secondly, for beauty, an harmony, and agreement: it speaks the same thing: there is no contradiction. Thirdly, for retirednesse, a difficulty: some things are hard to be understood; they surpass our apprehension. For the other part, which is the Rape. First, here is an indictment of the ravishers; and that under two titles, as it were their names; Illiterati, Instabiles. They are unlearned; their book cannot save them: they are unstable; no man will speak for them: who will plead for the inconstant? Secondly, here is the fact whereof they are indicted, and that is the rape of a Virgin; wresting the Scripture, violation of the sacred Truth. Thirdly, their execution follows: they shall die for it: they meant it for their own defense; it shall turn to their own destruction.

In all his Epistles. It was a material point which our Apostle here urged, and in which he sends us unto Paul to be confirmed; even so great that our salvation lies upon it. Therefore it is not lightly or rarely touched, in someone Epistle; but ponderously and frequently insisted upon in omnibus Epistolis. Out of which premisses ariseth this conclusion: The fundamental points of religion are repeated often: the Prophets did not more labor in the explanation of the Law, then the Apostles in the application of the Gospel. There is no leaf, almost no line, which doth not inculcate this; and that without any wearisome tautology or needless repetition, but by a sweet way of amplification. How careful was Saint Paul to speak home? I shunned not to declare unto you all the counsel of God. He had rather write one thing twice, than have it pass unobserved, or vanish unremembred. To write the same things unto you is not to me grievous, but for you safe. Such is the All-sufficiency of the Scriptures, without any need to be peeced up with traditions. It is able to save your souls: And who would ask more? They can make a man wise unto salvation: and I would never desire to be wiser. Paul calls it, The Counsel of God: the Romish Traditions then are none of the counsels of God. If they must challenge a corner, yea, half the room in our faith; Why then do we entitle the New Testament, The Gospel; when as it were but of a part of the Gospel? Or, The New Testament, when as it were but a part of Christ's Testament; and Traditions a schedule to be annexed to it?

Let no man presume above that which is written: That man's faith hath a Dropsy, which the Epistles of Paul cannot satisfy. The Papists call the Scripture, a dumb Rule; because it hath no sound: How should a paper speak? Do they make it an Idol, that have a mouth and speaks not? Indeed, they are not willing to hear it speak: as Marius could not hear the laws, for the noise of arms: so they cannot hear the Scriptures, which are the Laws of God, for the noise of Traditions. But they shall hear it one day when their awaked conscience shall convince them of willful sacrilege: for the contempt done to Kings Proclamation that cannot speak, redounds to the Person of the King that can speak. The Orbe of Christian faith is the Scripture: if we be fixed stars, we content ourselves within our own orbe. The Israelites took in unto them some of the Heathens: but first they must be circumcised, and so become Israelites. We admit some traditions of the Ancients, and make use of the very learning of Pagans: but first we circumcise it; we do as it were Christian it in the Font of Truth. And if any Tradition shall grow saucy, and offer to confront the Word of God, being so opposed by a Sectary; we soon excommunicate it: as Ishmael must be turned out of doors, when he once falls to jeering of Isaac. Our God and Savior hath written his Will to us, by his Evangelists and Apostles: to them we adhere. There is Light enough to inform our understandings, Truth enough to satisfy our knowledge, an holy Covenant and precious Promises to excercise our faith, glory and eternal life to feed our hope, the rules of Sanctimony to direct our life: What can we require more of God? What should be done more for us, but only this? To fill our hearts with his grace; that we may understand what He teacheth, and believe what He promiseth, and do what He commandeth. In every Epistle God shows us the way, how we should serve Him, how He will save us. Lord, we seek no fartther than to thy Word, we ask no more than thyself: Guide us by the one, and satisfy us with the other.

Speaking of these things] The Pontificians say the Scripture is a dumb Rule: but sure, Saint Peter was of another mind: For making mention of Paul's Epistles, which were his Writings, he attributes the faculty of Speaking to them. Saint Paul writes; and yet Saint Peter says, he speaks. Their Images have mouths, but they speaks not: God's Word doth speaks, yet it hath no mouth. They speaks, by signifying unto us what God hath spoken: and to take this honor from the Canonical Writing, is an injury done to the Author of that Doctrine.

These things] What are they? The Mercy of God, that is; and the Thankfulness of man, that should be: Christ dying for us, our faith believing on Him: the one performed by Him, the other required of us: the lenity of his Patience, the necessity of our Repentance. These things Paul speaks of, and in all his Epistles he speaks of them. Eadem, not aliena; no heterogene, foreign, or wandering things: much less Contraria, things thwart and opposite to the first principles: but Eadem; for matter and form, for weight and fashion, the same: like so many lines tending to one center; the Gospel of Christ.

The Conclusion that ariseth from it, is this: There is no repugnancy in the divine Scriptures. Evangelist doth not cross Prophet: nay, rather the History verifies the Prophecy, with a Sic impletur. Apostle doth not cross Apostle: but Peter and Paul, James and John and Jude; they all preached, they all wrote the same Truth. Some atheistical spirits have searched narrowly, to find contradictions in them: but the spirit of contradiction was in them that went about it. O that we could all as well agree with them, as they agree with themselves. But while they are at peace in the Doctrine, we are at war in the Interpretation. As he that tumbles in a calm bed, hath his tempest within: so they that pick quarrels out of the articles of peace, seek more the praise of their wits, than the profit of their souls. A father makes a Will, and bequeaths divers Legacies: the children come to demand their portions: but brangling Lawyers find out unnecessary cavils: one interprets a clause of it to this sense, another to that: so the Orphans patrimony becomes the Lawyers booty. The Gospel is Christ's Will: and He hath left all his Children blessed Legacies: but Heretics, like contentious Advocates, misinterpret the terms, and wrangle about words: and though they get nothing by it, but the fame of singularity on earth, and the penalty of damnation in hell; yet they set the Christian world in an uproar: and the poor children by this means are cozened of their portions, even their patrimony in heaven. Let us acknowledge, that all the Evangelists and Apostles were but so many several Engrossers of our Fathers Will; that they all write in the same tenor: Let us humbly trust upon his Riches, thankfully receive our portions, and carefully obey his rules and precepts, and we are blessed in Jesus Christ.

In which are some things hard] Difficilia quae pulchra: What excellency is obtained without difficulty? Wisdom is an excellent grace; but it is no inheritance: we were not borne wise. We may think ourselves wise betimes; (and he is no fool that doth not think so) but God, time, and industry must concur to the making up of wisdom. The Kingdom of Heaven is a most excellent place; yet it will not be obtained without violence. The Scripture is divinely excellent; no flowers so sweet, no jewels so precious: no wonder than if it be understood with some Difficultie. Yet the Apostle here qualifies the matter; Quaedam non omnia; Some things are hard, not all. If all the will of God were enigmatically, mystical, and abstruse; (like the juggling Oracles of false prophecy) there were some excuse for our ignorance, and by reason of that for our disobedience: but they are only some things.

From which we may infer this conclusion; that both in Paul's particular Epistles, and in the general scope of the Scriptures, there is a plain and evident demonstration of God's good will towards us. Quaedam does not only oppose it self to omnia: Some, therefore not all; but also to Plura; Some therefore not the most. Two of a thousand places, are some; but scarce a number: yea, ten of a hundred are some: but comparatively very few. Some necessarily implies a less part: Quaedam difficilia; therefore the greater number are facilia. The quaedam are but some few hillockes in a large plain: some few strange herbs in a familiar garden. Herbs they are certainly, though we know not their, names, of their virtues. As children, well entered into reading, run away with the chapter currently; until they light upon a hard word, which puts them to their spelling: there they make a stop; and unless they skippe it over, they must consult their Master, ere they can go any farther. We are all schollars, both *catecumeno*i, and Catechistae: and when we come to study S^t. Paul's writings, with many divine rules we go away roundly: in some fair measure we understand them, and much sweet comfort we find in them: But here and there we light upon a sentence, that puzzleth our dull intellect: there we pause, we meditate, we ruminate: we ponder the sense: we compare the precedent with the subsequent words: And if the wings of our apprehension cannot soar so high as this reverend mystery, then with the wings of our zealous prayers we mount up to the throne of Majesty; we consult our great master in heaven; that most holy Spirit: there we have theointment that clears our eyes: there we find arevelation of these deep secrets.

They are but Quaedam then, that are in danger of this difficulty: and among multitudes of plain and facile rules, we may allow some to be hard. Especially seeing that without these Quaedam we may be saved. At some royal feast, among many dishes of delicate and easily digestible viands, there may be some solid and stronger meat: while a good stomach falls to that, the nicer and weaker appetites need not fast: for if the other be more nutritive, they are less digestive. Strong meat belongeth to them that are of perfect age. We are riding a journey, and there be diverse monuments set up as marks for our direction, with inscriptions upon them: Most of them tell us plainly and familiarly, This way you must take: here and there we find a stately pillar, meant for a guide too; but the characters are in so curious a language, that though we can read them, we do not fully understand them: we fixe not there, but pass by them with reverence, to the next of a plainer indication. Or in our travel we are driven to cross a river, as the Israelites did Jordan to their Canaan: this river in some places is very deep, but in most places foordable: they that like elephants; are strong in understanding, may swim over: the feebler, like poor lambes, yet may wade over: It matters not, as from Paul's shipwrecked vessel, which way; whether the skillful by swimming, or the rest by other helps; so they all get to shore. In the sacred writ there be depths, for the deeper Judgments to sound: and for the weaker passengers there be shallows. There be mountains of learning, for the higher wits of the School: and there are pleasant valleys, for the walks of humbler souls. There is milk for babes, and harder meat for abler stomachs. If some things will not down with us, yet there is choice enough among the rest to nourish us to everlasting life.

This truth then must be undeniably granted, maugre all the cavils of Rome; that the most places and passages of the Scripture are intelligible enough, and contain in them the manifest doctrine of our salvation. So Chrysostom; All those things that are necessary, in the holy Scriptures are clear and plain. And, when we say anything without the Scripture, the thoughts of our auditory are uncertain. I deny not, but there are some places of difficulty in S^t. Paul: as 1. Cor. 11.10. and chap. 15.28.29. To be short in this enumeration, though Salmeron was long enough: for he pretends to have found out no less than fifty difficulties or obscurities in Paul's Epistles. Captious critickes scarce turn over those sacred leaves, for any other ends. I confess, that I have not used to look upon God's book with such eyes: I desire not to feed my fancy with scruples, but my soul with comforts.

Some have ventured to allege reasons, why Paul is so full of difficulties. Ob Velocitatem Sermonum suorum, says one: Propter impetum Spiritus, elocutiones habet minus explicitas, saith another. Profundos sensus Graeca lingua non satis callebat. He had his Idiotismes and phrases peculiar to himself: whereof Nyssen, with Jerome and Chrysostom, give some instances. Thomas Anglicus, quoted by Lorinus, hath a strange suspicion; that Paul wrote obscurely on purpose; to hide his doctrine from heretics: And that the simple might understand him, he sent his Epistles by his Disciples, that they might expound them to the Churches. The principal cause was multitudo, & altitudo rerum quas tractat. Salmeron gives diverse other reasons of his obscure writings, and prescribes certain rules for their explication. Some think that this Difficultie ariseth from the multitude of Interpreters upon S^t. Paul writings: no Author having such abundance of expositors as he.

But Paul was not more hard in his writings, than these men are in their censures of him. They would speak further, if they durst, to the disabling of so glorious a witness. Sure, there is something wherein he hath galled them; or else they would not thus kick against him. We dare not be so bold with that blessed Saint: for we know, he wrote nothing, but what the holy Ghost dictated to him; Divine truth, all. As David patiently bore all his afflictions, Quia Dominus fecit, because it was the Lord's doing. so we faithfully and thankfully embrace all S^t. Paul's writings, Quia Dominus dixit, because it was the Lord's saying. What if, Baptising over the dead, were a hard saying? yet that the dead shall rise again; this is a plain saying: that the dead in Christ shall rise to glory; this is both a plain and a comfortable saying. What if, It is impossible for those that were once enlightened &c. If they fall away, to be renewed again by repentance; be a hard saying? Yet that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners; this is a true saying. What if, Before the children had done either good or evil, the purpose of God upon them must stand; be hard to understand? Yet that God would have all men to be saved; this is easy to understand. If we know not the meaning of that; God hath concluded them all in unbelief: Yet there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus: we know the meaning, the comfort, and the assurance too of that.

Beloved, we need care for no more than to be saved: and the means to that, is plainly and punctually declared to us by the Apostle Paul. If there be some things hard, yet these plain things are the most: though we do not reach the other, we cannot miss these. If profounder wits will venturously dive into this ocean, to fetch up deeper mysteries; yet we have enough to serve our turns. There is sufficient store of comforts afforded us, to make us blessed: and who would ask more? Yea we have a fair portion, a goodly heritage, and the lines are fallen unto us in plain and pleasant places. Let us content ourselves with it, and be thankful to him that gave it, that we may be saved by it:

Hard to be understood. These two, Difficilia intellectu; must be read in sensu composito. For if there was no fault in our understanding, there could be no difficulty in the word of God. It is a principle in nature; Quicquid recipitur, secundum modum recipientis recipitur: Shall the little vial be angry, because it cannot contain all the water of the fountain? Or a subject, being allowed to take his full burden out of the kings treasury, become pettish with himself that he cannot carry away all the gold? No sober guest at a banquet, desires to eat more than his stomach will bear. Because we cannot devour all, will we fast? Pliny writes of the hedge-hog, that when he hath laden himself with nuttes and fruits, and is going to disburden them in his storehouse; if but the lest filberd chance to fall off, he will fling down all the rest in a peevish humor, and beat the ground for anger. Many sweet and heavenly comforts we lay up in our consciences, derived out of the treasury of the Scriptures: perhaps there is someone Jewel that we prize above all the rest, though we understand not the full value of it; someone sentence like a mine of gold, too deep for us to come at: shall we vilipend all the rest, because we cannot be the Masters of this? Shall we fling down all the fruits we have, because there is one in some top-branch, too high for us to reach? Is our language so ambitious, as Totum aut nihil? All, or none? The rules of our faith and life are manifest enough: O that we would enough study them, enough practice them. The mystery which is above us, is not that unum necessarium: Let us not fear it; we may be saved without the knowledge of it. I fear the want of my diligence, to attain that I may know: I fear the want of my obedience, to follow that I do know: I do not fear the defect of my capacity, in not comprehending what I cannot know. My nescience in such things is pardonable, my curiosity may be dangerous.

Let this therefore be the conclusion: The mysteries of salvation be hard, but to our understanding: the difficulty is not in their own nature, but in our capacity. The word of God is instar lampadis; no dim taper, but a bright shining light; excelling the Sun in his glory: But we are thick-sighted, and can receive this light but according to our own measure. The obscurity is not in the object but in the organ. Shall the Lumine luscus, the blind man blame the Sun for shining no brighter? As some rurall Inhabitant, being admitted into a royal Palace, admires the building, and is transported with the rareness and magnificence of it; and much of it he understands: when he comes into the hall, he knows that that is a place for feeding: when into the gallerie, he knows that to be a place for walking: when into the bedchamber, he knows that to be a place for sleeping: But into some rooms he is brought, no whit inferior to the former, for state and pleasure; the use whereof he knows not: will he now censure the Architect, for making of such unnecessary and superfluous places? or not rather lay the blame, where it is, upon his own ignorance? The Scripture is a goodly edifice, the Almighty kings Palace; whereof Paul was one of the Master-builders: when we read his Epistles, we are surveying the rooms and receptacles: some whereof we easily apprehend: As that Christ came into the world to save sinners: we know this for the common Hall to all believers: Or that there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ: we conceive this to be a sweet repository or lodging chamber for the conscience: Or that we must follow the things that are true, honest, just, pure, lovely, and of good report: this we take to be the gallerie, and walk of the Saints: Or that we must pray without ceasing: we look upon this, as the Chapel, the oratory, or house of prayer: But searching farther, we light upon some uncouth and curious rooms; bearing as much art and majesty in them as the rest; but more obscure, and mystical, and veiled with the curtain of awful secrecy: Such are certain doctrines of S^t. Paul: we are not forbidden to view them, and review them, to study, and meditate on them: but if we cannot perfectly understand them, far be it from us to tax S^t. Paul of obscurity: no, let us impute the fault to our own simplicity? O the depth of the riches of the knowledge of God! His wisdom must not come under the censure of man: but the folly of man must be submitted to the censure of his wisdom, that in all things he may be justified. Thus many things in the Scriptures, at the first blush, appear difficult; which being better considered, are easily reconciled. I will instance but in two, which now offer themselves to my memory; and two may give us the taste of all.

1. Christ's testimony of John the Baptist, recorded by S^t. Matthew: This is Elias which was for to come: Compared with the Baptists own denial of this, recorded by St. John: I am not Elias. Here appears not only difficulty, but even contrariety. But neither, indeed; as St. Augustine easily composeth it: John was Elias in Spiritu, non in Persona; in Spirit, not in Person. I will send you Elias the Prophet, before the coming of the great day of the Lord: upon this promise the Jews depended; still looking that Elias should first come; and not for the Messias without that precursion. To satisfy this scruple, Christ calls John Elias: and so he was in diverse resemblances. First, In regard of the corrupt times wherein either of them was borne: Elias in the greatest declination of Israel; John Baptist, of Judah. Secondly, Their coming into the world was sudden and unexpected: Elias, without mention of his parents: John; of parents superannuated, past expectation of a child. Thirdly, In regard of their habit and diet: of a singular austerity, both of them. Fourthly, In respect of their habitation, in deserts: they were no Hermites, yet their general abode was in the wilderness. Fifthly, In respect of that burning zeal, and powerful spirit, wherewith they preached: both shining lamps. 6. In their boldness to reprove Kings and Queens: which is incident to none but great Prophets. 7. In regard of persecution for the Truth: so Herod was such another as Ahab, and Herodias very like to Jezebel, both in life & death. So then, when John says, I am not Elias, he speaks properly, in regard of the dimensions of his body, and individualitie of his person: in that sense he was not Elias. And Christ speaks as truly, though figuratively, when he says that John is Elias; not in the person, but in the power and spirit of Elias: and so is the difficulty soon removed.

2. Take one Instance more. Matthew and Mark say, that the thieves which were crucified with him, reviled him: the number was but two, and both of them are accused. Yet Luke says, that one of them rebuked his fellow for that contumelie cast upon Christ; prayed, and was saved. This is a difficulty; how shall we understand it? Some answer, that at first both the thieves railed on Christ: but one of them, observing the patience of the sufferer in his extremity, the wonderful miracles, and the compassion of nature it self: the Suns darkening, the earths shaking, the stones rending; was converted; and did salve his former exprobration of Christ, with an humble confession of him. But against this may be objected. First, These miracles were the effects of Christ's death, and begun when he ended: but the thief was then in articulo mortis, and could not be sensible of them. Secondly, When he reproved his fellow for reproaching of Christ, why did he not reply; Thou hast also reviled him. Thirdly, It is the custom of the sacred story, when it hath disgraced a man for sin, not to conceal the honor of his repentance, if ever he had remorse. S^t. Matthew therefore had done the malefactor some wrong, to set down his offense, and not his penitence. The most and best expositors fly to this, with Augustine; that it was Enallage numeri: as, The Disciples are charged to say, Why is this waste? When Saint John chargeth only Judas with it. So, The Kings of the earth set themselves against Christ: yet literally, no king but Herod: so Peter quotes it, and so expounds it; Herod and Pilate against Jesus; now Pilate was but a Judge, no king. So, They were stoned, sawen asunder, wandered about in skins: and before, they stopit the mouths of Lions: In the plural, They: yet none stopit the Lions mouths but Daniel; none sawen but Isaiah, and that but by tradition: none wandered in skins but Elias. So Beza observes upon that of John, It is written in the Prophets: yet none expressly saith so but Isaiah: albeit indeed Jeremiah hath something to the same sense. When a gentleman lights among clownes, and receives some injury by one of them; he is ready to say, look how these clownes abuse me; when one only did it. A father that is displeased with one of his children, will say, See how unruly these children are; when as but one only offended him. Indeed St. Matthew and Mark mind only Christ's humiliation, and look to that, St. Luke also intended the theefes conversion, and to show that miracle of mercy. By these two Instances you may guess at the rest: for all of them fall under one of these kinds; Doctrinal, as the former: or Historical, as the latter.

Let us take this for one especial rule in the clearing of these difficulties: To supply Scripture with Scripture. For Non plane ac plene vbique loquitur Scriptura, quia alibi loquitur. Howsoever the Evangelists wrote the same story; yet some passages of that story are set down by one or two of them, not by all: and by some of them more obscurely, more apertly by the rest: That they might not seem to write by any compact or collusion, but merely by the inspiration of the holy Ghost. Let this consideration, that all things in the Scriptures are perspicuous in themselves, and some obscure to us, only by the occasion of our own blindness; so far humble us; that we both admire the excellency of the Divine truth, and confess the baseness of our understanding. Sin at first was the cause of ignorance; now ignorance is the cause of sin. You say, we see, therefore your sin remaineth. So long as we think we see, we continue blind: when we once perceive our own blindness, then we begin to see. There be some that run away with the interpretation of Scripture, as fast as if they had been at the making of it: rare Musicians that can sing the hardest notes at the first sight. They no sooner read a Text, but they have God's meaning by it, straight: There is nothing hard to them; but I can hardly believe them. There may be some special Reasons given of this great Difficultie.

1. The imperfect knowledge which we have upon Earth. Howsoever our Justification may be perfect, our Sanctification is not so. In the best militant Saints, as their affections cannot be wholly regenerated, so nor is their understanding wholly enlightened. We see through a glass, and we know but in part. If we did not know in part, we were miserable strangers: if we did fully know we were glorified Saints. The man stark blind (in the Gospel) presents to us our state by nature: his eyes being opened so far as to see men walk like trees, is our state of grace: seeing clearly, our state of glory. In Heaven we shall know as we are known: there shall be the fullness of knowledge, as well as the fullness of joy: yea, there could be no fullness of joy, without the fullness of knowledge. There, all problemes and questions shall be resolved, dissolved; and we shall perfectly understand the truth of those things, which strong wits so argue here below. Now our eyes are dazzled with looking upon the Sun: there we shall see the Son of God face to face; and in that infinite Glass of the Deity, behold enough to satisfy us forever.

2. The figures and metaphors of the Scripture may a little retarde the pace of our understanding. There be such peregrinations to fetch in remote and significant figures: such an heightening and elevation of style: such powerful hyperboles, such mystical allusions, such majestically imperatives: such spreadings and curtains of allegories, such third Heavens of eloquence: such commanding persuasions, such persuading commandments, such pathetical abjurations: such sinews in God's milk, expressions of reservednesse even in familiarity. All profane Authors seem to be of the seed of the Serpent, that creeps: the holy Ghost is the Dove, that flies. No words but his own, can express the texture and composition of his Word. So doth He inform the weakest, that the highest Judgments are wrapped with admiration: so doth He exercise the strongest, that the weakest are filled with consolation. Jerome and Augustine confessed one to another in their muturall Letters, that there are some places of Scripture which they thought they did not understand: And yet both those Father call upon old women and young virgins to read the Scriptures; all the Scriptures, without confining them to some certain places: and yet they knew them to be of weaker judgment than themselves.

As the Lord gives us the same earth, to labor on, and to lie in; to be unto us both an house, and a grave: So He gives us the same Word, for our satisfaction, and for our inquisition; for our instruction, and for our admiration too. The argument that binds one man's faith to believe it, is the reverend simplicity of it: that which binds another, is the awful Majesty of it. So that of two men, equally pious, meeting; the one wonders that all men should not understand it: and the other wonders as much that any man should understand it. When these mysteries fall into the way of wrangling wits, they suffer much injury: for Vnusquisque abundat sensu suo: which might be well, so long as they keep the analogy of faith, and impound their straying fancies within the bounds of sobriety. But when birds of sick feathers will emulate the Sun in their soaring; soon do their wings flag, and witness to the earth the shame of their proud undertakings. Lord, where we do see, give us an humble knowledge: and where we cannot see, a contented ignorance: in all a believing patience, a patient faith. Clausis oculis sequendus est Deus: Our eyes must be shut to the world, least it withdraw us: yea, shut to human reason; that though we cannot reach the why of God's command, to understand it; yet we may know the what of his command, and in sincerity of heart obey it. Take now some helps for our understanding.

1. Conference with others; especially with them whose lips preserve knowledge. It was the Eunuchs reply to Philip How can I understand, except some man should guide me? But now we all think that we know the way to Heaven so perfectly, that we need not ask I go my way, saith Christ, and none of you asketh me whither goest thou? Nay, we will scarce ask, Lord, which way shall we go after thee? How shall we come unto thee? Exhort one another daily, saith the Apostle: Edefie one another in the holy faith. But we take these for superfluous counsels: every man knows enough to serve his own turn. While these two Disciples communed together, and reasoned, Jesus himself drew near, and went with them. While they were talking of Jesus, Jesus presented himself to them. Our talk is of vanity, and vanity is with us. If Christ could be kept in our mouths, we should always have him in our hearts.

2. Constant reading of the Scriptures, and meditation upon them. The good man doth Meditate on the Law of God day and night. The Pontificians beat off the people from this common Treasury, by objecting this supposed difficulty. O the Scriptures are hard to be understood: do not you trouble your heads about them: we will tell you the meaning of them. They might as well say: Heaven is a blessed place, but it is a hard way to hit: do not you trouble yourselves, we will go thither for you. Thus in the great day of trial, when they should be saved by their book; alas they have no book to save them. Instead of the Scriptures they can present images; these are the Laymens books: as if they were to be tried by a jury of Carvers and Painters, and not by the twelve Apostles. Be not you so cozened: but study the Gospel, as you look for comfort by the Gospel. He that hopes for the inheritance, will make much of the conveyance.

3. Humility and a devout reverence to those sacred monuments of Truth. The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him, and he will show them his covenant: Those leaves are too holy, to be turned over with profane fingers. Pride is a barracado against all graces, therefore against knowledge: it makes the heart incapable of goodness, as cold iron cannot be wrought to any fashion. A heart full of pride, is but a vessel full of air: this self-opinion must be blown out of us, before saving knowledge be poured into us. Humility is the knees of the soul; and to that posture the Lamb will open the book. But pride stands upon tiptoes; as if she would snatch the book out of Christ's hand, and unclasp it herself. The first lesson of a Christian is humility: and he that hath not learned the first lesson, is not fit to take out a new. Humble eyes are most capable of high mysteries.

4. Prayer, when all fails, this will do it. Why did God write his mind to us in so mystical a dialect? We answer, The obscurity is not in his dialect, but in our intellect. Why does not he that made the will, make us also to understand it? We say again, Ideo non intelligimus, quia intelligere non petimus: We want wisdom, because we do not ask it. But many have prayed for knowledge, whereby they might apprehend these high mysteries, and yet have not obtained it? It may be they begged it, Non ex simplicitate cordis, sed ex effectu singularitatis: They would be made wiser, not holier by it. It is their own honor they seek, not the honor of Christ. If they may be thought great Rabbi's, deep scholars, this is the height of their ambition: though neither the Church be beneficed, nor God glorified by it. Scire volunt, ut sciant: that is all. If any man lack wisdom, let him ask it of God? If, there does rather ponere than supponere; Ponere in natura, then Supponere in argumento. If any lack: Who, does not lack wisdom? How should he get it? Postulet a Deo, that fountain of Wisdom; And it shall be given him: there is promise; he shall be sure of it, But let him ask 'in Faith; that is, Modus adipiscendi, the way of obtaining: that God may be honored by it; that is finis adepti; the end of enjoying it. As the grace of God is the fountain, from which our wisdom flows: so the glory of God is the ocean, to which our wisdom runs. It is derived from the one, and must be directed to the other.

S^t. Augustine was so bold as to beg of God, that Moses might come, and tell him what he meant by some places of Genes. We dare not do so: but yet we may beg of the spirit of God, who opens dark things, settles in the truth, and keeps the key of the Scripture; to inform our hearts what Paul meant by some passages of his writings: The grammar whereof we know; that such is the signification of the words: but the Logic or the Reticke we understand not; nor what is the full meaning of those words.

Prayer is the remedy; the cure of all obscurity: sepecially being accompanied with fervor and frequency. Though we have fished all night and caught nothing; yet let us cast out the net again; pray still. Paul with exhortation, ever joined Invocation: Let us bedew the seed of the word with our prayers and tears; so will it grow in our hearts. Christ loves thy prayers; Non ut ipsi manifestes, quod ipse non novit: non ut ipsi des, quod ipse non habet: sed ut ab eo accipias, quod ipse promisit. It was a feeling complaint, seconded with a hearty prayer; I believe; Lord help my unbelief: So in praise to God for what I have, and in prayer to God for what I want; Let my soul confess, I understand a little; Lord, help my ignorance.

Which they that are unlearned, and unstable, wrest.] These be the ravishers. It was for the honor of dead Patroclus, that two armies fought for his corpse: And it was for the glory of dead Moses, that two Spirits, a good and a bad, an Archangel and the devil, strove for his body. And it is some dignity for the Scripture, that it is contended for by the two Churches; the Christian true Church, and the Antichristian Synagogue. But as when the two mothers contested for the child before Solomon, the pretending mother (upon the kings sentence) was content to have it divided; but the natural mother would not endure it: vel totum illi, vel totum mihi: hurt not the child: So the malignant Church could well enough brook, that the written word were hacked, and slashed, and torn in pieces; because she knows it is none of her own; and doth rather prejudice than further her cause: But the Protestant and reformed Church, like the true mother, is careful to have it preserved sound, and entire, and untouched with the fingers of corruption. When the Pharisees and the Sadducees strove for Paul, the chief Captain fearing lest he should be pulled in pieces, commanded his soldiers to take him from them all: So if the Scripture be not taken from heretics and Sectaries, they will even tear it in pieces. For rather than they will believe as the Scripture speaketh, they will wrest the Scripture to speak as they believe: It must say as they say, or hold the peace. Yea more, as seven cities strove for the honor of the birth of Homer: Or as the Sadducees in their intent to appose Christ, bring in seven husbands challenging one wife: whose mouths Christ soon stops; that in heaven there is no wife at all: Or as it is storied of a woman, of such admirable beauty, that all the gallants courted her; quarrelling in troupes, and making bloody mutinies for her: at last, because everyone could not enjoy her, they tore her in pieces, that so never a one might enjoy her. So innumerable sects, and schisms, and heresies lay claim to the Scriptures, till they even dilacerate and rent in sunder those sacred leaves: and that which is written for their instruction, they wreste to their own destruction.

They are unlearned.] Learning is the ornament of a man, the oil to the lamp of his understanding, which maintains the light living. The soul would grow rusty without it; like a sword that is never scowred. Eloquence is good, and memory is good: but if these be without learning, they are but like the rock and the spindle, without ever an inch of yearn. There may be learning without eloquence; which is like a handsome body lapped up in ill fashioned clothes. There may be eloquence without learning; which is like rich embroidery upon base stuff. There may be both eloquence and learning without discretion: men's actions do express their knowledge better than their words. A mere scholar is but a live book; and it is wisdom that sets forth a man, yea, that constitutes a man, more than literature. It is easy and usual for a man to be without learning; and it is not rare, to find learning without a man. To speak sentences, is far easier than to speak sense; yea, and a sensible discourse is easier than a rational carriage. There may be learning, eloquence and discretion too, yet without honesty. We may sooner get acquaintance with the 9. Muses, than with the 3. Graces. Learning, discretion, and honesty, are three degrees of comparison: the last is Summus gradus. The other may make a man eminent in the world, the third brings him nerest to heaven. Our perfection in this life is virtue; in the next knowledge, when we shall read the glory of God in his own face. He that wants learning, hath an imperfect head: but he that lacks honesty, hath a defective heart. This is one of their characters, that are here indicted for enforcing the virgin, Truth; Christ's royal and immortal daughter: They are unlearned.

These unlearned men are aptest to pervert the Scriptures: out of which we gather this undeniable conclusion: That Ignorance, or the want of learning is no ways a help to devotion; but rather a ready way to damnation. This is plainly delivered by S^t. Peter: The unlearned wrest the Scripture to their own destruction. The principal columnne, whereby both the Turk and the Pope uphold their Sovereignty, is by keeping the people in a helpless ignorance. The Pope will allow his subjects no divine learning: the Turks denies to his, any learning at all. Indocti, all of them: yea, and Indociles, some of them. The latter such as cannot be taught for want of means; that is their infelicity: The other, such as refuse to be taught, for want of will, that is their obstinacy. There is not one tackle in all the Bark of Papacy, for which the Devil is more beholden to the Bishop of Rome; than the doctrine of ignorance. Give him but darkness in any man, and he is never from home. This is the maintenance, the revenues of both their crowns; as strong as an oath of allegiance to both their kingdoms. Neither is this unlearnedness peculiar to the laity of Rome; but it is entertained into their Cloistures, and encroacheth upon the Clergy. That of Melchizedex Salem, to render Salem, salt: or to interpret Maria, the Seas; for Maria the blessed virgins were but easy mistakes. To read, Domum evertit, for Domum everrit; might be the falt of transcription. But to turn Paul's Hereticum devita, into Tolle de vita; was a wicked misprision. But enough of that: it is not their ignorance of God's Law, which we so much blame; as their law of ignorance; their paradoxically praise of ignorance. For so they commend it, as if Christ had bequeathed ignorance for a legacy to his Church. Love he commended, and Faith he commended, Peace and obedience he commended; yea, and knowledge he commended: This is life eternal to know God and Christ: these blessed legacies he left us; either praecipiendo, or prabendo: But that any way; by insinuation, toleration, or dispensation, he should be a friend to ignorance, it were blasphemy to think. The servant that knoweth not, shall be beaten. And it was not his charge to the Apostles only, but to the Jews, and in them to all men; Search the Scriptures. Meddle not with them say the Romists: Search them thoroughly, saith Christ. But unlearned men, say they, when they come to the Scriptures, are apt to misunderstand them. But why then say we, are they not bred up in the Scriptures, that they might learn them? First, they deny them to read the Word of God, wherein they might be learned: and then because they are unlearned, they shall not read the Word of God. A young man is not suffered to come into the river, whereby he might learn to swim: and then in his able years, because he cannot swim, he may not be suffered to come into the river. He hath a very gross and dull eye, that does not discern this juggling. There is a myst of darkness, a mystery of iniquity in it.

To leave them; our Apostle peremptorily concludes, that unlearned brains are apt to misinterpret these sacred Rolles: And, O how happy had it been for the Church, if the exposition of them had never been entrusted into the hands of ignorance! But whose feet do so nimbly carry them up into the Pulpit, as theirs that have the least matter to say when they come their? Yet who dare be so bold as they? Who so tedious? They are able to speak more with ease, than any man can endure to hear with patience. I censure no man: yet I could wish for the credit of the Gospel, that some whose Congregations are numerous enough, would either study more, or speak less. But like will to like: unlearned Hearers will resort to unlearned Teachers. They care not for matter in their discourses, but store of words; as if they would tell us that their very profession was all words, no matter. As one said of a poor Apothecaries shop; that he could find no drugs, for the pots and boxes: so it may be said of those that pretend to Religion, and no farther; we cannot perceive good deeds, for words. Or as when Jacob looked for Joseph, he found nothing but his coat: so whiles we look for honest men, we see nothing but their cloak: only a cloak of a good nappé, and a fair gloss of profession: that is all. I would it were not almost the religion of these dissembling and wanton times.

But for you, Beloved; though you cannot be profound Clerks, yet you may be honest men. Holiness is not tied to literature: Doctor, and Saint, are not convertible terms. For then he that knows his masters will, could not choose but do: and so there had been a needless threatening of greater stripes. But as you cannot conclude upon us; because our life is bad, therefore our Doctrine cannot be good: for that were an harsh Non sequitue: So neither do we conclude upon you; because your knowledge is little, therefore your goodness is less: for that were a false argument. Indeed, first men must know, before they can do: yet your conscience will tell you, that you do not do all the good you know. Illumination, and sanctification, are two several things; and differ as a light, and a perfume: Put a candle into a lantern, and it will make it light, but it will not make it sweet: some perfume must do that. Divine knowledge doth make us understand the Gospel: but it is divine grace which makes us live according to the Gospel. Therefore what you want in great learning, supply with good living: I love Preaching, and I love practicing: and I had rather hear one Sermon in a day, and do three good works; than hear three Sermons in a day, and do never a good work, else Franciscus Petrarca, Scholarium Tetracha, was famous in his time; yet could not escape censure. Four men undertook to sit upon him: one had no learning, the second a little, the third not much, the fourth somewhat, but intricate and perplexed: (Good man! He was not tried by his Peers) All their opinions were summed up in this sentence: Petrarcham sine literis, virum bonum. The King stormed at this censure, the Nobles fretted, his friends were vexed, and almost all men threatened revenge upon such saucy Judges. But Petrarch himself applauded their judgment: O utinam hoc unū vere dixerunt: The end of all which study, was to be a good man: if learning came in upon the by, I did not refuse it: But now seeing that by their sentence, without learning I may have goodness; What a comfort is this to me, and to thousands more of no better knowledge? I had rather, of two unhappy disjunctions, see an honest man without learning, than a learned man without honesty.

Doctrina, Salina; learning is a salt-pit; from whence we have the seasoning of all our actions: But virtus, venustas; virtue is the beauty, which makes them all lovely. Learning is but the sowing of the ground: an holy and virtuous life is the harvest. Knowledge in the soul is but for breed: when it is once married to Grace, they will bring forth a glorious issue, a race of heavenly fruits, a posterity of good works. Abraham begat Isaac, Isaac begat Jacob; and so by a lineal descent, down to Christ: So faith begets virtue, and virtue begets knowledge; and so by a lineal ascent, up to Christ. Faith is a second Mary, the Mother of Christ; to bear Him: and good works, another act and office of the same Mother; to nurse Him. For the former; Faith: it doth again incarnate the Son of God: so Mary, that blessed Virgin, Non minus credente mente, quàm pariente ventre, exultavit. For the latter; good works: they do still nurse the Son of God, with a charitable indulgence. This Himself acknowledgeth: I was hungry, and ye gave me meat. And if in a modest humility they seem to put it off; Lord, when saw we thee an hungered? He both satisfies others, gratifies them: In doing it to my brethren, ye did it unto me. This is that milk of charity, and nourishment of pious deeds, that will make Christ batten within us. The woman joined them both together in a natural sense; Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the pappes which thou hast sucked: acknowledging them both to belong to the same Mother: And Christ joins them both together in a spiritual sense; Blessed are they that hear the Word of God, and keep it: knowledge and faith come by hearing; and so is Christ borne in our souls: The effect of faith and knowledge is obedience and doing good, and so is Christ nursed in our lives. Hear therefore, that you may learn: Learn, that you may know: Know, that you may do. And though you cannot attain to so much learning, as may become great Scholars: yet at least get so much, as may make you honest men, and good Christians. So far make sure to be learned, that you may be saved. It follows;

They that are unstable] Stabilis, a Stando: the unstable man is one that cannot stand: like a Drunkard, he reels from place to place. He hath put so much intoxicating scrupulosity into his head, that he cannot stand on his legs. A Drunkard indeed; not so much for excess, as change of liquors: for his soul doth affect variety of Doctrines, more than the intemperate body doth variety of drinks. Now he sucks the Grape of Orleans, anon that hotter fruit of the Canaries: then he is taken with the pleasant moisture of the Rhemish plants: sometimes the juice of the pressed Apples and Peares delight him; which he warms with the Irish Vsquebah, and then quencheth all with the liquor made of English Barley. So the unstable soul takes a draught of religion from every country: so much of Anabaptism, as may make him a Rebel: so much of that loving Family, as may make him an Adulterer: so much of Rome, as may make him a Traitor or Idolater: so much of Arianism, as may make him a Blasphemer. Only he will stand in nothing, as the Drunkard can stand to nothing. As a fool or child, that hath an air in his head, thinks that the bells (then ringing) go to the same tune: and rather frames the sound of the bells to his imagination, than his imagination to the sound of the bells. So when a fond opinion is got into unstable head, he conceives all places of Scripture to tend unto that purpose: and will not bring his own doctrine to the Rule, but rather bends the Rule to his own doctrine. So, because he hath a crooked position, he wrests the Scriptures, to make them as crooked as his position as himself.

The unstable man partly knows what he hath been, he knows not what he will be, nay he knows not what he is. He runs through as many Religions, or rather Sects and Schisms, as Saint Paul did through perils: Perills of waters, perills of robbers, &c. He finds watery perils, by lighting among the Anaeaptists, with their second Immersion in the waters of Baptism: Perills by his own Countrymen, by joining with them that murmur against Order and Discipline: Perills by the heathen, in partaking of their profaneness and superstition: Perills in the city, by siding into singularity and faction: Perills in the wilderness, by following the brethren of the Separation; leaving the Church for private conventicles: Perills on the sea, by offering to found that inscrutable depth of predestination: Perills among false brethren; while they pretend to bring him to the true Mother, the Church of Christ: they lead him to Rome, that unnatural stepdame, the Strumpet of Antichrist. No perils could overwhelm Paul, because he stuck to his God: the unstable soul waves God, and therefore is subject to all perils.

Opinions in the mind, and diseases of the body are alike infinite. The masters of that Physical art can scarce number or name all sicknesses. Whatsoever disorders a faculty, and the function of it, is a sickness. Let the eye be distempered, yea let but the finger ache, it is a sickness. Some names they derive from the place affected; as the Pleurisy: some from the effect of the disease; as the falling sickness. From what it does, or from where it is, they devise how to call it. And yet because all these will not serve, they are fain to extort names from what it resembles, what it is like: so they have the Wolf, and the Canker, and the Polypus. But certainly, opinions and tenets in religion, which are diseases of the mind, do for number out-vie all the diseases of the body: nor are there names enough for them. Therefore as the Papists call diverse of their orders, by the names of their founders; the Dominicans of Dominic, the Franciscans of Francis; of Agustine, the Augustine's; of Bennet, the Benedictines: So Schismatics are fain to borrow appellations from their ring-leaders, of Brown to be called Brownists, of Arminius Arminians: as once of Arius Arians; of Donatus Donatists: and yet still they lack names. It hath been a question, whether there be more names or things: but in this instance it may be easily resolved; for certainly in religion, there are more sects than names: and so far are many from knowing how to denominate their opinions, that they must even let them pass with the bare name of opinions.

Prove all things: hold fast that which is good. Saint Paul gave great liberty; Omnia probate: but with all good counsel; Quod bonum est tenete. These unstable men will take the liberty, omnia probare, to prove all religions; but not the counsel for they commonly choose that which is worst. The unstable man, is a live weather-cock; that turns with every puff of vain doctrine: only the dead one does more good, because it tells which way the wind blows. If he cheats that old Serpent in anything, it is in this, that he is in so many minds, the Devil knows not where to have him. Yet at last death takes him up for a vagrant, and delivers him over to the next Sessions, where he is indicted for plurality of wives: for he hath married himself to abundance of errors, and Gone a whoring with his own inventions and is cast by that Statute: If they shall say, He is is the desert, go not forth. He is in the secret chambers, believe it not. He that is Multivolus, will surely be Malevolus. He is a reed shaken with the wind: today the reed bends to the South, tomorrow to the North: Now the head looks Eastward, by and by Westward: never upright, but when the wind is down. Alas, that ever a trembling reed should be the emblem of any Christian. Let us not be such; but rather Hold fast that which we have. The Lord hath enriched us with his saving truth: Let us stand in it, stand to it, stand for it, against all assaults. For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. What weighty suit had that devout Client to the Throne of Grace, that he does not only put himself into such a posture, but also tells us of it: That he would grant you according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man: All is for Stabilitie in the truth, for our perseverance in grace. Lord, reclaim the obstinate, recall the wandering, establish the wavering, raise up them that are fallen, and confirm those that stand: that we may all live to thee, and die in thee, and dwell with thee forever.

They wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction.] We may say of the Scriptures, which are God's spiritual nets to catch our souls; as of that net which had enclosed such a multitude of fishes; Their net brake. Rumpebatur rete, & non rumpebatur: in nature it was broke, but by Divine power kept whole. So Temeratur Scriptura sacra, & non temeratur: It is ravished by these Impostors from the pure and virgin-Innocence; and yet it is not ravished. They wrest and pervert it, to themselves: but still the word of God remains sound and entire. Figmentis suis lacerant, & tamen integra manet. So apostates crucify to themselves the Son of God; to themselves: yet Christ is safe and glorious in heaven. As he that lustfully desires to defile a virgin, hath committed adultery in his heart: the virgin remains spotless, but he is polluted. So these misinterpreters of God's Book, in their intention of mischief, can make a shift to befoul themselves: but the maiden honor of the Scripture is undefiled. Fools throw dirt at the moon; yet she needs no charitable hand to make her clean again. A natural fountain may be so poisoned; that all his springs cannot work it out: but no such injury can be suffered by the supernatural fountain of Truth. Swearers are said to tear Christ in pieces, and blasphemy to wound the Majesty of God: yet still is the Deity out of the reach of this impious violence. As the will to do God acceptable service, is as acceptable as if it were indeed service: So the intent and offer of wrong, shall be judged for wrong in the Court of Justice. These men wrest the Scriptures; not to the prejudice of that sacred Canon, but to their own destruction. This is done many ways.

1. By admitting no more of the Scriptures, then will make for their own turns. This course that old Father of lies took; when with a Bible under his arm, and a Text in his mouth, he did set upon Christ: It is written, He shall give his Angels charge concerning thee &c. He that durst touch the blessed body of Christ with his hand, will venture to touch the holy word of God with his tongue. But here was subtlety mixed with presumption: What can be a more authentic weapon than the Scripture? But that the devil should fight with it, is the wonder. He cites it indeed, but with mutilation, with distortion: by wronging the words, by wresting the sense. It comes not out of his mouth, but maimed and perverted. The Text quoted is this: He shall give his Angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways. One piece of it is left out, all mis-applied by Satan. The promise of preservation is with a limitation; In all thy ways: But to fall down from the pinnacle, was not the way. So much as served Satan's turn, to tempt Christ, to tempt God, he cites readily: The Angels shall keep thee: But that they should keep him in his ways; this he leaves out, for it would have made against him. His way of descending, was by the stairs, not by a precipitation. It is easy to see from what School they come, and where they learnt their divinity, that wrest and mangle the Scripture, to their own purpose. As Marius took so much of the Roman laws, as would serve for his ambitious ends: the rest he left out as superfluous. It is a common practice of the Pontifical writets, in their quotation of Scriptures or Fathers, only to cull out here and there an Eunuched and maimed authority, for the better color of their schisms: but that which makes against them, is ever past over in silence. And yet they keep a noise, as if the Scriptures and they were good friends. The devil did say as much; and yet he was never the nearer to the Truth. Let us take the word from the Author, not from the usurper.

2. By adding that to the Scripture, for which they have no warrant: with Apocryphal shreds patching up the sacred Canon. This is the censure of that Antichristian Synagogue, concerning the holy Scripture: They call it an imperfect rule, an inky Divinity, flexible to every humor, without the complement of their Traditions. They have a book called Protevangelion, fathered upon St. James, full of strange stuff. As that when Christ (an Infant) was carried into Egypt, and assaulted by thieves; one thief withstood all his fellows, and would not suffer them to lay hands upon Joseph; desiring the child Jesus to remember this good turn: and that this was the very thief whom he remembered upon the cross. That Christ in his minority, working with his father Joseph in the trade, had been corrected by him for cutting a piece of timber too short: but that miraculously with his hands he pulled it out to the full length. Is not this goodly stuff, to be put upon our faith? Thus out of the vanity of their wits, they devise all variety of tales, whereby they may lead men's minds from the written word, to a belief of strange fictions. From hence grow those voluminous Legends, and infinite fabulous inventions, and dreams of the ancient heretics. With these delusions do they stuff their Sermons and Postills; turning the holy story into a mere Comedy, with their several hints, and actors, and entrances. No sooner have they singled out a Text from the Bible, Like a flower out of the garden, but they dress it with such new terms of art, that the Gardener can scarce know it again. There be such mysteries, and parables, such metaphores and allegories, forced out of plain propositions; that as they wonder how we should not receive them, so we wonder more how they could find them. But a sober ignorance is better than a drunken knowledge.

3. By distinguishing the Scripture, till (in a manner) they extinguish the light of it. Christ was offered up once for all: This they distinguish, telling us of a Sacrifice Bloody and unbloody: the one, once on the Cross; the other, daily in the mass. Drink ye all of this: They distinguish of All; and would have it to be meant only of All the Apostles, not of All Christians. Marriage is honorable among all men: That is, say they, among all them that are not bound by a vow to the contrary. There is one Mediator, Christ: this they distinguish; He is the only Mediator of Redemption, not so of Intercession. Again; that he is Mediator both in regard of nature and office: the Saints are mediators in regard of office, not of nature. So, say they, Christ's satisfaction is in virtue sufficient, but not efficient in act, unless it be applied by our satisfaction. To take away all opinion of merit, Christ chargeth us, when we have done all we can, to hold ourselves unprofitable servants: To establish merits, they elude this with a distinction; we are unprofitable to God not to ourselves. When we prove that diverse Popes have erred, and been Heretics; they answer that the Pope may err, Quatenus homo, non quatenus Papa: But when the man did err, where was the Pope all the while? Be not these pretty distinctions, whereby they mangle the word, and delude the world? upon this file hang all those dusty cob-webs of Rome; where in they catch souls like flies, and prey upon them with their poisonous breaths. Upon this drumme beat all the Schoolmen, making a harsh clattering with their subtle questions, and idle disputations. By this last kind of enigmaticall Divinity, the wit and capacity of man is fettered and entangled: By the next, which is their historical figments, it is fondly trained on, and inveigled: By the first way, it is enchanted and astonished: by everyone of them it is cozened and fowly abused.

4. By mis-alleging the Scripture, to the defense of their Schismaticall tenets. If you will take an Inventory of Popery, what can you light upon, but such notorious distortions and mis-applications of holy writ? What the Evangelist testifies of Christ; that he did many other signs, which are not written in this book: That the book of Conformities applies to S. Francis; Multa quidem & alia signa fecit Franciscus, quae non sunt scripta in hoc libro. To S^t. Agnes they ascribe that; Thou art all fair my love, and there is no spot in thee. To S^t. Lucie, that; The light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not. Be not these impudent profanations? God made two great lights: the Pontifical, to rule the day of the Spirituality; the Regal, to rule the night of the laity: and this latter is less than the other by 57. degrees: saith a Glosser, Like some skillful Astronomer. Thou shalt tread upon the Lion and Adder: Pope Alexander the 3. applied this to himself, when he trampled upon Fredericke the Emperors neck. Certain Ambassadors Lying in such a posture, under the Popes feet; were taught to cry; Qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nostri. They fetch the like ground for it out of the Psalm: Thou hast put all things under his feet: The fowls of the air, which are, say they, the Angels in heaven: The beasts of the earth, Christians in this life: The fishes of the sea, the souls in Purgatory. What honor doth the Scripture attribute to Christ, with which the Pope hath not made himself bold. A sure foundation, a precious corner stone: Kings and Queens shall bow down to thee, and lick up the dust of thy feet: They shall appoint themselves one Head: All power is given unto me in heaven and in Earth. It was said of Pope Leo; Ecce Leo de tribu Judah. Of another; Lux venit in mundum. He is called the Great Shepherd of the flock, the Bridegroom, the Lamb. Christ hath no royal Robe, but the Pope fittes it to his own back: about which sacrilegious work, the Jesuits are his cunning Tailors. Because Christ contradicted not Petres speech; Ecce duo gladii: this was warrent enough for Boniface the 8; to challenge the power of both swords, Temporal and Spiritual. Peter was charged to pay tribute both for his Master and himself: therefore is Peter the chief over the rest of the Apostles, because none of the rest paid: as if paying of tribute were a sign of preeminence, and not rather of subjection. Rise Peter, kill and eat: was not this a goodly foundation for Baronius to build on, that the Pope might excommunicate the Venetians. A man is taking a far journey, who left his house, and gave authority to his servants, and to every man his work, and commanded the porter to watch. This man, say they, is the Soul: going into a far country, departing out of this world: the authority left with his servants, is his charge to his executors •hat must they do? with his good they must procure the prayers and suffrages of the Church, to free him from Purgatory: the watching of the Porter, is the Duty of his Pastor; daily to sacrifice for him by saying Mass: were not these deft interpretations? What is, if this be not wresting of the Scriptures? They have yet one way more to abuse them.

5. By raising strange and unnatural conclusions out of them. One proves that Peter had no skill at his weapon; because he did but slice off Malchus his ear, when he should have struck off his head. Another, that the King is inferior to the Priest; because Peter was an Apostle that smote, and Malchus signifies a king that was smitten. Another, that Ecclesiastical dignities are not to be conferred in regard of kindred but of merit: because Christ gave the Keys to Peter, and not to John; though John were his Cosin, and not Peter. Be not these marvelous proper collections. They can tell you how many thorns were in Christ's crown: and what he wrote on the ground, when he absolved the Adulteress: and what speeches passed between the Father, Son, and holy Ghost in Paradise about the Incarnation of Christ. Such metaphysical speculations swarm in the brains of our Pontifical Doctors: such frothy inferences boil out of their unskimmed wits. God hath ever been jealous of his word, as of his own Honor: His Name is but that whereby he signifies his Nature to us: and his word is but that whereby he signifies his will to us: They that take either of them both in vain, shall not be hold guiltless.

This latter is the reverend and impartial Judge of all controversies: and whatsoever contradicts it, is not an Illumination of the Spirit, but an Illusion of Satan. Jerome by those four and twenty Elders, understands the four and twenty books of the law, as they are divided by the Hebrews: Clothed in white, because therein is no lie to be found: and on their heads crowns of gold, because of their victory over sin and Satan. The Antichristian synagogue labors to bereave the Scripture of this honor: as the Title or office of a Judge; because the Church is ancients than the Scripture. But if this were a good reason, than Magistrates could not be Judges of the people, because the people are ancients than the Magistrates: nor should the laws have authority over them, because they are ancients than the Laws. If we do not understand by the Scripture, the paper and print only; but the doctrines therein contained: then all that is there said of the nature and properties of God, of his eternal counsels, and of the worlds creation, must needs be ancients than the Church. The word that I have spoken, the same shall judge them in the last day, that receive not my words. This shall be judge, when all the world, even these perverse judges themselves shall be brought to judgment. They have Moses and the Prophets, let them hear them. If Moses and the Prophets were sufficient to instruct the brethren of Dives, how much more able is the addition of the Gospel and Epistles to bring us to salvation? Christ lives now, non solum inter nos, sed etiam intra nos. In this Evangelical glass, we can behold him crying in the cradle, and dying on the cross, buried in his grave, and rising from the dead, ascended far above all Heavens, and there sitting as an Advocate to plead our cause. Who then shall lay violent hands on this sacred Canon, with impunity? To take off God from his own meaning, and to father upon him a bastard sense, is intolerable blasphemy. Yet we know where such wresters dwell; that offer to wring God's weapon out of his hand, and impiously return the point upon his own bosom.

The summary conclusion is this: Imposters and perverters of these sacred Records, are in the state of damnation. They that will give God a new tongue, shall feel his old hand. Detorquent, they put the text to the rack, the Scripture to the torture: first, they conceive an opinion, and then screw the Word of God to the maintenance of it. They will not so conceive as he speaks, but they will have him so speak as they conceive. First, they conclude, thus it shall be: then they force the Scripture to consent with them, that so it is. As when lustful Amnon could not win Tamar by fair means, he deflours her by force. A little flourish of words, is with them a main advantage: lik raging wild beasts, that when they cannot come at the person, they rend in pieces his garment. But as a man, so the Bible consists of a body and soul: the sound of the letter is but the body, the sense is the soul. The seed is the Word of God: they that corrupt it, as heretics: or choke it, as hypocrites: or keep it down forcibly from growing, as tyrants: or thrust other seed into it, as Papists; shall have just vengeance for their pains. For as God gave pure seed, so he will require pure corn. Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve: this is pure seed. To worship Angels or Saints, or the crucifix, or images: this is sophisticate seed; God did never sow it: it is the enemies supersemination of tares. Christ's feed was left in the garners of the Prophets and Apostles: they that adulterate it before it be sown, or nip it when it does spring, or cut it down before the Lord's harvest; shall be indicted of this felonious rape, the wresting of Scriptures. When all their fond allusions, shall be found illusions: and as they have attempted to make God speak against himself, so their own tongues shall be their own accusers, & condemnd they shall stand by their own consciences.

Here let us take 2. cautions; as marks to know them, and means to avoid them.

1. We may discern them: as the cunning of an Imposter cannot keep him from a discerning eye. Whether we be besides ourselves, it is to God: or whether we be sober, it is for your cause: this is the best tēper of God's faithful workman; his carriage towards God is full of zeal; not without groans, agonies and raptures. But his conversation towards men is full of mildness; of a soft, sweet, cool & affable demeanor: hypocrits and impostors deal otherwise for in the Church, in the Pulpit, they seem to be men inspired with holy furies; like burning Seraphim, wrapped with ecstasies, and amazing all their hearers: take them into their chambers, in their solitary and separate meditations, whereunto God only is privy: view their life, as it is abstracted from the public eye: they are not only calm and tepid, but even fowl and wicked: sober enough to God, and transported only towards men. As hypocrites with their dissembling holiness towards God, do palliate their injuries done to men: so heretics by their morality and fair deportment towards men, make a way for their blasphemies against God. The former is like a meteor, which burns clear upward to Heaven, but hath a squalid tail dangling to the Earth: The other like the Moon, is then lightest towards the Earth, when she is dark to. Heaven. Roaring profaneness makes too much noise for Imposture: that is the Devils suite when he goes a whoring: it is the language he speaks amongst ruffians and strumpets: He hath another garb for the brethren of singularity. Iniquity is a coard or cable; a gross bunglerly sin: but hypocrisy is a fine spun thread, scarce discernible. If you see a man that hath nothing but Heaven in his mouth, and yet nothing but the world in his hand, you may suspect that he hath a Devil in his heart. They that mingle the respect of themselves with the sacred Truth, have not the Scripture for a Text, they may have it for a pretext. But such as mind only their Masters glory, with trembling and innocent hands turn over their Masters book; and interpret it as it is meant, to direct us the way to Heaven, and to bring us to salvation.

2. We may avoid them; by cleaving to that word, which they are still cleaving a pieces. Thou shalt protect them in thy Tabernacle from the contradiction of tongues, saith the Psalmist. Out of the Tabernacle of God, we meet with the contradictions of the World, with a world of contradictions: which way so ever we turn ourselves, there is no end of controversies. That as in the burning of some danke and sobby fuel; we cannot see the fire for the smoke: So the light of the Scriptures is dusked by the vapors of controversies. Whilest green wits range abroad into the woods and thickets of Schoolmen, that wild Forest of Polemicall Divinity; they cannot escape vns scratched. Those briars and brambles pluck of the wool of the sheep. They that love such intricate and perplexed walks, had need of iron-shoes, for they tread upon thorns. I deny not but there may be a sober use of those abstruse questions; but then they must be read with sober eyes: otherwise there is more danger in being snared with difficulties, than hope of benefit to our saving knowledge. The Dove that keeps her close in her nest, those clefts of the rock, is not troubled with these wild flutterings. Adhere to the Church, and therein to the Scripture, whereof the Church is the depositary, not the Judge. In the tabernacle was the Ark, and in the Ark the Testimony. The Tabernacle was but the husk, the Testimony was the kernel. Never tell me of the husk without the kernel; of the Tabernacle, without the Testimony. The Tabernacle was ordained for the keeping of the Law: and the custody of the Gospel is also entrusted to the Church. But as the Testimony was the life of the Tabernacle, so the life and soul of the Church is the Gospel. On this blessed covenant let us rest our faiths, and it shall bring rest to our souls.

They wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction.] That which is said of Tapers; quod me alit, me extinguit: or of the creatures, that Nutrimenta may be made Nocumenta: so also of the Scriptures; that verbum vitae, the Word of life may be so distorted from vita verbi, the life of the word, till it becomes Esca mortis to us. Like an over-charged Cannon, it may recoil upon us, and brain us with the splinters. That which God gave us for a spiritual Sword, wherewith to wound out enemies; may be so wrested out of our hands, that it becomes a sword for our enemies, wherewithal to wound us. As the Taper is put out by an invasion of it: the fire should be above the oil, and so it burns; but if the oil gets above the fire, so it drowns. Or as the creatures are noxious only by the abuse: meat nourishes, excess of meat suffocates: wine cheers the heart, too much wine overheats and endangers a Surfet. So it is with the Scriptures; Take them in their pure, proper, natural, and genuine sense; they are the Bread of life, and the Waters of life, and the immortal Seed of life: there is nothing but life in them. But as Paul said of the Law; The Commandment which was ordained to life, I found to be unto death: So Heretics may say of the Gospel; What God meant for our life, that we have abused to our own death: yet still the Covenant, no less than the Commandment, is holy, and just, and good. Ex perperam intellecta Scriptura natas heresies. Heresies are raised out of the Scriptures, though they be revincible by the same letters. Irenaeus calls it Imaginem confictam & refectam, ex regiâ (quae est in eâ) Divinâque Imagine dissoluta. Wicked men will build errors upon the Pillar and Ground Truth. Four Observations are here offered to us.

1. Hypocrites and Imposters never meddle with the Scriptures, but to wicked purposes. This project they learned of their father: Cast thyself down, for it is written, He shall give his Angels charge over thee. He knew the bait that Christ would soonest bite at: that he relied upon nothing so much as the voice of his Father: If any stratagem can prevail, it must be a pretence of Scripture. Therefore he draws out his Scriptum est; dealing with the sharp, and blading it out with the Word of God. He, forsooth, is a lover of the truth; and will persuade Christ to nothing, but what he hath Scripture for. He does not always show his horns, but sometimes veil them with holiness. What an honorable testimony was given by that Maiden, possessed with a spirit of Divination? These men are the servants of the most high God, which show unto us the way of salvation. Who would look for the Devil, under the habit of such good counsel? He is the father of lies, And will he bear witness to the truth? He knew Paul to be a sworn enemy to his kingdom, and yet he rings the Bell to his Sermon, and gathers a great audience about him. But he had another drift in all this: he made a show to underprop the truth, but he meant to undermine it. By the maids repeating and clamorous noising of it, he hoped to work a suspicion in the hearers, that Paul and the Devil had compacted together. He hath Scripture for Christ; and a fair testimony for Paul: yet Christ struck him down, and Paul threw him out. So his Factors, to prove their heretical tenets, make bold with the Scriptures: as, in the Fable, the Fox never praised the Law, but when it might make him a way to his booty.

2. This is the cause of many men's irresolution, the dissonant interpretation of the Scriptures: in that all men, of all Religions, do allege it. The places seem to contradict one another: Christ allegeth it, the devil allegeth it: what shall we do? Which way soever we take, it may be the wrong. Therefore some lie down, like Issachar, between both the burdens, and sue out a writ of ease for their consciences; thinking it best to let all alone. Must we needs be either Gnostickes, or Sceptickes? Because we cannot know all, shall we examine nothing? To leave the war, whereunto we are lawfully pressed, till we have disputed the cause, which belongs not to us, is but a base tergiversation and flinching. Because our enemy hath recovered some of our Artillery, and plays upon us with our own Ordnance, Shall we therefore quite abandon all the rest of our Munition? Because we cannot reconcile both parts, Shall we be so civil and mannerly as to displease neither part? Though one side be false, we must not shift ourselves from all inquiry of the truth. We might as well fear to eat, least we should be choked: or leave watching, and set the gates wide open, because the enemy will hardly be kept out. Let us not turn that to security and idleness, which God hath made the matter of our exercise. Wherefore serve those Promises: Seek, and ye shall find: He that would do the will of God, shall know his Doctrine. If we be not prepossessed with prejudice, our heavenly Schoolmaster will teach us. And if we understand not so much as will make us learned, yet shall we understand enough to make us blessed.

3. The foreknowing that doubts will arise, should make us more skillful in the way to clear them. It is written, saith Christ: It is written, saith the Devil: If they be written, they are both true: If true, How are they contrary? And contrary they must be, being cited by Enemies. The Text cannot speak: What resolution then is there for the Conscience? Shall we make the Scriptures like Wax, susceptible of any impression? Or like Bels, tunable to the ears of the Hearer? Though the printed letter cannot speak; and they that wrote it are in Heaven: yet there are means to come by their meaning. First, Prayer; that it is a Key to those heavenly Mysteries. Qui docuit orare, dabit & intelligere. He that gives us the understanding to pray, will also give us the understanding that we pray for. O Lord, Teach me thy Statutes. Secondly, examination of the words; what they be in the Text, what in the Context: whether proper or figurative. He that makes a propriety of speech of a figure, is like him that took the curtain for the picture. Thirdly, the drift and scope of the place must be weighed. To the Ruler that asked what he should do to inherit eternal life, Christ's answer was a direction to keep the Commandments. Not that Christ meant, the way was by the works of the Law; as the Papists gather from it: but to confute his opinion that thought so, when as he could never fulfill it. We are justified by faith, saith Paul: we are justified by works, saith James: Saint James dealt with them that stood too much upon faith without works: Saint Paul dealt with them that stood too much upon works without faith. The one a Justice of Acceptation with God, the other a Justice of Approbation before men. Fourthly, Scripture must be conferred with Scripture: it is Index both Sui and Obliqui. Compare that of Saint Peter; Charity shall cover the multitude of sins: with that of Solomon; Love covereth all sins: then we shall find, that it doth not cover sins before God, as the Papists would have it: but qualifies and hides them from men, as God would have it. Fifthly, that which is not proportionable to the Analogy of faith, and agreeable to the rule of truth, is a wrested Interpretation. This is my Body, If I take it for the substantial flesh of Christ, as it was upon earth; this crosseth a Commandment, Thou shalt not kill; yea, it crosseth my Creed, which binds me to believe that He is in Heaven. I know that in Scripture some things are not expressed, which are yet implied: Scriptura non dicit, sed non contradicit. If it cross not the rule of faith, it may be received: the honest and believing heart shall be instructed.

4. This is no disgrace to the Scriptures, that they are depraved by Heretics: nor is it a wonder, to hear Hypocrites quote that authority, which Satan himself hath not spared to cite. Though Scripture be opposed to Scripture, yet this must not withdraw the determination of matters from the Book of God: for none can better try the truth, than the Spirit of Truth. When the Devil had abused that place; Psal. 91.11. by enforcing the promise contrary to the Commandment; making that absolute, which in it self was but conditional: as if the Lord, who would protect him in his aies, would also protect him out of his ways: which was to adulterate the Scripture: yet this detracts nothing from the glory of it, because Satan and his Impes meddle with it. Nay, this rather graceth it; for their very allegation it a secret acknowledgement of the honor due to it. Christ therefore did not throw away his weapon, but striketh with the same sword, wherewith He was stricken: and makes an holy use of that to his Fathers Glory, which to his dishonor was abused by the Adversary. The Word of God is not the worse, because these men have depraved it. The Bee gathers honey on the same stalk, from which the Spider sucks poison. Some have been poisoned by their meats and drinks; yet either these things must nourish us, or nothing. Though the bloody Hel-hound slay a man with his weapon; yet the Soldier may layfully gird a sword to his side. It is expedient that one man should die for the people: A Caiaphas spake it; must not we therefore believe it? Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his: Though this were the wish of an inchanter, yet the prayer will do well in the mouth of an honest man. These men show us the way of salvation, says the Pythonesse: yet Paul will not deny himself to be a Preacher of salvation, because she affirms it. And if the Devil transform himself into an Angel of light, shall therefore the good Angels forgo their light? The intemperance and surfeit of an epicure, does not make our sober appetites out of love with our dinner. It may be the Devil by alleging of Scripture, meant to make Christ weary of his weapon: as the fashions of apparel, when they are taken up by the base, are cast off by the great. And it was one cause, why Christ afterward forbad the Devil even to confess the truth, because his very mouth was a slander.

It is Satan's old trick, to counterfeit an Imitation of the son of God: Christ allegeth a Scripture to him, and he re-allegeth Scripture to Christ. What one act ever passed the hand of God, which Satan did not apishly attempt to second? they that quote God's Word against the Authors meaning, are the heirs apparent to Satan. If we seem to follow Christ in the outward action but with contrary intentions, we do indeed but follow the Devil in following Christ. It is not possible for Impostors, to find out a better color for their heresies, than out of the Scriptures. Therefore with that Heavenly gold, they guild over their base metal, that it may pass current. The Prince of darkness will not scorn to borrow so much of an Angel of light, as to seem godly for a mischief. If hypocrites deceive us with the glorious luster of holiness, we see where they have learned those projects. Yet is not our Savior distasted with the Scripture, because the Devil mis-lays it in his dish: but rather he snatcheth the sword out of that impure hand, and beats him back with that usurped weapon. It is not the letter of the Scripture, that can carry it, but the sense: while we separate these two, we profane both. The Scripture is one, as that God whose it is: where it shows any appearance of difficulty or inconvenience, it needs no light to clear it, but what it hath in it self. All doubts that may arise from it, are fully answered by collation. It is not the glorious flourishes of hypocrisy, but the easiness of our slothful credulite, that abuseth us.

I know indeed, that many souls are betrayed by corrupting that truth, whose virtue is sovereign and saving. There is no Devil so dangerous, as the religious Devil. Yet as David would not doubt to eat of that sheep, which he pulled out of the mouth of the Bear or Lion: so let it be no scruple unto us, to fetch our own patrimony out of the hands of the Philistines: and to seek for salvation in that Ark, which they joined with their Dagon. Good meat put into a stomach corrupt, feverish, or hydropicall, doth not more nourish nature, than the disease: yet we do not thereupon forbear utterly to feed: but rather strive to purge out those bad humors, which cause the offense. The Lord hath given us light; let us beseech him also for clear and sound eyes, that we may take comfort in the light he hath given us. Let not the divine Table of Christ be made a snare to our souls. The Word of God is holy, O that our hearts were so: then should we find that word not more true, than cordial. And after all these depravations and clouds of darkness cast before that blessed light; we shall see it as plainly, as the Sages did the Star, and it shall bring us directly to Jesus Christ. It follows.

To their own destruction.] They make a fair business of it; so wresting the book of Grace, that they quite wrest themselves out of the Book of Life. To say nothing of those sacrilegious Poets, that have turned the sacred story into plays and interludes; and presented that on the Stage, which was ordained for the Pulpit. But if a man plays with God, he shall find God in earnest with him. Two causes of this perversion are principally here assigned by the Apostle: the want of knowledge, and the want of sobriety: unlearned, unstable.

What innumerable absurdities have sprung from the former, Rome can give you a large Inventory. Ignorance passeth among them for one of the Graces, (I had almost said) for one of their Sciences. The mother of devotion they call it: the blind mother of as blind littor: superstitious devotion, the daughter of mopish indiscretion. Ye worship ye know not what: well may they worship they know not what, that are religious they know not how. Laymen are esteemed as hogs; and must not be allowed those precious pearls. Espencaus relates the speech of a noble Italian Bishop: Our countrey men are terrified, saith he, from the study of Divinity, with fear of incurring heresy: as if error sprung from the knowledge, and not rather from the ignorance of the Scriptures. When an old Priest of theirs heard a young man allege Scripture out of the New Testament, he wondered at it: and protested that he had been a Priest fifty years, and yet never knew what the New Testament was. The prohibition of the Bible was so strictly urged, that it was more danger to be found reading a chapter of it, than counterfeiting the Kings coin. This appears by that ancient law in our kingdom; that in many criminal offenses, he that could but read a Psalm in Latin, though he understood never a word of it, should be exempted from the secular power, as being fit to make a Clerke of. This law is still continued; not that all such as can read, are fit to be made Priests, but to mitigate the rigor of the law in petty offenses. Now they have translated the Book of God into diverse vulgar Languages: but still, as they have corrupted it with false glosses, so they teddar it up within certain limits. It is not permitted, but to such as have a dispensation from their Ordinary, or that by their yearly revenues can dispend such a sum of money: As if heresy could fasten upon none but beggars: or the rich only, and not the poor, stood in need of comforts. Thus the Title which Epiphanius gives to all heretics, belongs principally to them; Lucifugae, the lovers of darkness.

For the other cause, the want of sober judgments, how shall we do to excuse ourselves. We have too many of those that wrest the Scriptures.

1. Reprove a sensual gallant for his voluptuous life, shared out into play, dalliance, drink and sleep, and he hath Scripture to defend it. There is nothing better for a man, than to eat and drink, and make his soul enjoy good in his labor. God would have a man to enjoy good in his labor; but what is this to them that never labor in good? There is a particular calling; follow that, there is a general calling, to labor in the vineyard of salvation; work out that: When you have done both these, if there be any spare time left, you may go play. But it is a sacrilegious impiety, to make that word the buckler of sin to defend it; which is given for a spiritual sword, to kill and mortify it. Such men wrest it to their own destruction.

2. Rebuke a worldling for his scraping rapacity: tell him that Covetousness is idolatry; that it brings on a catalogue of curses: He contradicts you with Scripture: That man is worse than an infidel, who provides not for his Family. As if men must needs provide for their own, by taking away other men's: and could have nothing to leave their children, but that which they purloyn from the children of God. He that buys a patrimony for his child, with the loss of his own soul, hath but a dear purchase, a very hard bargain. There is a true story of a rich oppressor, who had stored up a great mass of wealth for his only son: This man falling into sickness, and thereby into some remorse, called his son to him, and told him how abundantly he had provided for him: withal asking him, whether he did truly and really love him. The son answered, that nature (besides his paternal indulgence) bound him to that. The father being now in his sick bed, farther puts him to it; how he would express this love to him: the son said in anything that he should command him. Hereupon, his father chargeth him to hold his finger in the burning candle, but so long as he could say one Pater-noster, without removing it. The son attempted it, but could not endure it, Yet says his father, to get thee wealth and a large estate upon Earth, I have hazarded myself to Hell; for the welfare of thy body, I have ventured my soul: Thou canst not suffer the burning of a finger for me, I must burn body and soul for thy sake: Thy pain is but for a minute; mine must be unquenchable fire, even torments forever. By this consideration, being melted into repentance; he restored all the gains of his injustice, made the poor partakers of his riches, abandoned all worldliness, and was recovered both in body and soul to the Lord. As he hath many followers in his base avarice, so I would to God he had some in his gracious repentance. Little do gripulous fathers, that what was forty years a gathering, should be spent in one Christmas-revelling.

3. Reprehend a dissolute liver for his inordinate courses: persuade him to a seasonable repentance: tell him that he hath no promise of forbearance: that many are cut off by sudden death in the midst of their sins; or justly delivered over to hardness of heart, and final impenitency: yet he can prolong his sensual pleasure, by a warrant of Scripture: At what time soever a sinner repents, &c. Thus, what is written for his consolation, he turns to poison: of his physic and restorative, he makes a drink of intoxicating desperateness. Alas, why did God give us his Word, but that we might be saved by it? Why are we not left in blindness, like the Heathen; but that the Lord intends this gracious light for our conversion? Shall we make that our encouragement to be evil, which God hath ordained to bring us to goodness? The Gospel is our Fathers will; shall we dare to interline it? To get a false legacy, shall we forfeit the true? It is our Charter; the covenant that God hath made with us, to save our believing souls in Christ: shall we subtly pick words and cavils out of our evidence, to overthrow our own inheritance O why should we wrest that to our own destruction, which is meant for our salvation? There be sayings, by which a profane soul heartens himself on to lewdness: and yet even those, the tender conscience takes for motives to repentance. There be sentences, from which a too late repenter will suck desperation: and yet they that seek the Lord early shall receive from them his morning dew, his seasonable mercy, his sweet compassion. In a word, let us neither extenuate those places that make against our sins, nor misconstrue those that make for the peace of our souls. So whiles we do no way wrong the Scripture, it shall every way comfort us in Jesus Christ, Amen.

2 PET. 3.17.

Ye therefore beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware lest ye also being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness.

IT is the policy of that old Serpent, to get upon us the same way that he did at first: which is by drawing shadows over substances, as he did the body over the soul. The way to mend this, and to cheat the Devil, is to turn man the right side outwards, and to set the soul foremost again. Josephus thinks that the Serpent, before it was an instrument of Eves temptation and fall, did go upright and speak: and that his present muteness and creeping, were a curse laid upon him for that fact. But if he formerly went upright, if he formerly spoke, it might be wished that he did so still: Because if he did go upright, we should the sooner see him; if he spoke, the sooner hear him. In his curse we are cursed too; his very creeping undoes us. When he presents pleasing objects to our eyes, the snares and bates of sin, he says nothing: he is a dumb serpent, but still a serpent. When he winds error and falsehood into our souls, through the labyrinth of our ears, he licks the dust in a cozening humility: he is a creeping serpent, but still a serpent. The vanities of the world, honor, pleasure, wealth, envenome our affections: but the errors of the world, schism, faction, separation; these impoison our judgments: There the body is more taken, here the soul. The rule to help the former is this;

that the body and the soul still go together, but the better before. The rule for the other, that the soul ever follow God, as the body follows her: that she never stand to her own judgment, but to his that made her. The rule for both; that we lay hold upon the Gospel of grace with both hands, of faith and practice: for so the understanding and the will, which is the whole soul of man, is made up again, and sanctifies the body. Let us keep the will and testament of our once dead, and ever living Testator, the sacred record of the Gospel, perpetually in our hands, in our hearts; and then Error may knock at our doors, but find no entrance: it shall not come in. The wicked may invite us to their house, and promise us pleasant cheare, novelties and dainties; new opinions, new positions, new speculations, rare foreign stuff; but we will not go. Thus if we stick close to the evident written truth; when thousands perish in their strange devices, which did creep like serpents into their wanton heads, and stung their hearts; we shall not fall from our own steadfastness: which is our Apostles special care in this place: Ye therefore beloved, seeing ye know, &c.

The main building of the Text is a caution: the Porch or entrance into it, is by an insinuation. The Apostle insinuates himself three ways. First Per viam illationis, by an illation upon the premisses; Therefore: Secondly, Per viam dilectionis, by his love to their souls; Beloved. Thirdly, Per viam concessionis, by granting their former acquaintance with these dangers; Seeing ye know these things before. The caution arms us against two miscarriages; the one of wandering; that we be not led away: the other of Falling; that we do not fall away. The former is a sinful way, the latter a fatal end. In the way, there is Quiddam activum, the error of the wicked: and Quiddam passivum, the Seducement of the weak. In the end, we have a Station, Firmitas, a Stedfastnes: and a precipitation, or falling from it, But then there seems to be a kind of Dilemma in the words: for if they were steadfast, how could they fall? If they did fall, where then was their steadfastness? It is cleared by distinguishing the times: So long as they continued steadfast, they never fell: but when they once fell, they ceased to be steadfast. He that standeth now, may yet fall hereafter.

Therefore: this Illative bids us look back a little: There is no word superfluous, that ever dropped from the pen of the holy Ghost: somewhat sure there is in it, and that of no small moment. As David answered his brother Eliabs chiding; Is there not a cause? Certainly there is a cause. Wheresoever we find an Igitur, we must not slip it: for the whole weight of the sentence lieth upon it. It is the ground that feeds the root, it is the root that bears up the tree, on which all the fruits grow. It is the Prophets rule; First to look to the root downward, before to the fruit upward. Every argument is shut up with an Ergo; it is the known note of a Conclusion. Thus may the Syllogism be framed: Whosoever would escape destruction, must adhere to the truth: But you all desire to escape destruction: Vos igitur, Ye therefore stick to the truth. Erring from the Scriptures, is the Medius terminus, whereupon the whole argument runs; from which the very life of the Induction breathes. There is perdition threatened to them that abuse God's word: this we would fain avoid: Cavete igitur; Beware of committing, such an abuse, beware of being led away with such an error. The Wherefore of it is destruction, and who would not fly from that? Yet we are naturally so slow, that we must be spurred on with a Caution.

Beloved.] Of all the medicines and electuaries, ministered to us by our spiritual physicians, Love is the sweetening. Bitter pilles will down, when they are made up in Love. We will suffer incisions, the opening of our veins, and the letting out of our bloods, when we know it is done in Love to our healths. And shall we not suffer the word of Exhortation, when it is the argument of Love to our souls? Paul with passion, Christ with compassion, reprov'd sinners all in love. If there be any other intention in the dispensers of these heavenly mysteries; whether it be Covetousnes; as Simon Magus would have bought the holy Ghost, that he might have sold him, and so got money by him: Or pride; as the sons of Sceva would needs be casting forth devils, without a commission: Or Flattery; that say to men that despise God, Ye shall have peace: Like Chaplens of Abiathar's humor, that with blanching vices at the Table, spoil their grace before dinner: Or vain glory; as the Pharisees made long prayers, and (doubtless) longer Sermons; that the people might commend their memories, and have a rare opinion of their merits: Or emulation, as Tertullus offer'd to our Paul with eloquence: Or envy, as those that bitterly stomach'd that Apostles credit: Or hypocrisy, as Judas preach'd against unnecessary wast, because he would fain have put it in his own purse: Or contention, as ^s some Preach'd Christ in strife; that contend more for the honor of their own wit, then of Christ's Gospel: If any of these springs set our wheels a moving, if these be the ends of our Preaching such an end will follow it, as we had better be without it, even such a misery at the end, as will know no end of misery.

Love, Love is the promptuary of all our labors: this obligation, this adjuration, did not Christ lay upon Peter only, but upon every Minister; If you love me, feed my sheep. Love is the Master of all difficulties, the digester of all injuries, the silences of all excuses, the heart and life of all good actions. Law is not so strong as Love: we do many things in Love, which we need not do in law; be pleas'd to note here the difference of affections, that is in the Pastor & the peole, he people will render no duties to their Pastor, but what they are compelled to by Law: Nay, Vtinam vel sic, would it were no worse. It might be wish'd, they would do but that: we find the contrary, they do not. We do not, like dull Oxen, tread out no more corn than the goad of the Law pricks us to: but though you muzzle our mouths, we fill your garners. Only love constraineth us; and that with so pleasing a violence, that we even love our own fetters.

But we cry out on the want of love on all sides. The Minister professeth love to his people, but they will not believe it. The people pretend no less love to their Minister, though he cannot find it. How shall they be tried? There is one rule to try both faith and love: the proof lies in good works. What you do for us, and what we do for you; this shows in what measure we love one another. I we feed you with our spirituals; this is a demonstration of our love to you: But if you let us languish for want of your temporals, I am sure here is no proof of your love to us. If we should all examine our hearts according to this infallible rule; your want of love to us would be judged by your own consciences.

We like any charity well, but the doing charity: If our love would cost us nothing, we would make it welcome. But gracious love is of a nobler nature: it hath Eagles wings, and will fly to do good: it will run, where it cannot fly: it will go, when it cannot run: yea, love will creep, where it cannot go. Sometimes charity flies; as an Eagle to feed her young ones: she flies East and West, swifter than the wind, with an ardent desire of doing good: she flies up to Heaven, and would show her self in those glorious Courts: and this is an Angels pace. Sometimes she runs, faster than Cushi or Ahimaaz to David, or Peter and John to the Sepulcher of the Son of David: Halfe my goods I give to the poor: His alms ran from the fountain of his heart, as streams from an overflowing spring: and this is a Saints pace. Sometimes it goes; if with a slower agility of foot, yet with the same alacrity of mind: when the Samaritan saw the wounded Passenger He went to him. We would have come unto you, but Satan hindered us: he could not come yet he sent; We sent Timothy our brother: and this is a Friends pace. Sometimes it is driven to creep: such a Creeple was Saint Peter in his purse, as the other was in his legs; whom he thus gratified; Silver and Gold have I none, but such as I have I give thee. At the building of the Tabernacle, if men's estates could not reach to Gold, or Silver, or Scarlet; yet their Goats hair was accepted. Love will seek many ways. If the rich afford their alms, the poor may give their prayers: so the Widow gives her two mites; all: and this is the Widows pace. Two Considerations here, are not to be omitted.

1. It is our love that makes us jealous over your souls, with a godly jealousy: like Guardians that have the charge of some noble Virgins, we dare not trust you with yourselves. Paul in his constrained absence, sends to know their faith. we would not have you, like to Pharaohs lean Kine, feed much, and be never the fatter. The Hireling careth not for the sheep: they are not his own, and what minds he whether they be fat or lean? A mercenary Advocate looks only to his fee: let his Clients cause stand or fall, it is all one to him, so long as he hath his money. A Capon that hath moulted away all his feathers, and is cold and naked; in the absence of the Hen, will run to her nest; not for any love to the Chickins, but to warm his own sides. Such heteroclyte and imperfect Pastors have more love to your riches, than to your souls. I seek not yours, but you, saith Paul: that is the voice of love. With no less fervency, with no fewer ears, do we pray for you, than for our own fowls. The Dog forbears to bark, because he is attentus ad offam: Canes multi, quia canes avidi: therefore are they dumb; because they are greedy Dogs. I will gladly bestow, and he bestowed for your souls. He will bestow: that love is welcome, which brings meat in the mouth of it; which talks of bestowing. In our measure, we thus strive to bestow our loves too: Impendamus; yet what, alas, have we to bestow? For Gold and Silver, you have it already; we have it not. But our studies, our labors, our loves, our lives; these we have to bestow, and we bestow what we have. Fecit quod potuit, saith Christ, of Mary's piety: and Dedit quod habuit, of the Widows charity. If nothing but Gold and Honor were worth the bestowing, our liberality were soon stalled. But by the Grace of God there is something else. There be Talents; though the world scarce value them at pence a piece; and Treasures of wisdom, and Riches that never fade, comforts everlasting; and these are worth the bestowing, and worth the accepting too, when we consider all. For howsoever in our vain days, we look upon these proffers with fastidious eyes; as it is usual with men to have no sense of their souls, till they must leave their bodies: yet when they must part from them, or when they are disquieted within them; that they may either keep them in peace, or in peace forsake them: then some gift of our love, some counsel or comfort will be held worth the bestowing: and it is our love to bestow it.

Yet our love sticks not here; but we even yield ourselves to be bestowed. There be many that care not what they bestow, so they may not be bestowed. we would spare our goods; but rather let them perish than not spare ourselves. If it once trench upon life, then Propitius esto tibi: Be it far from thee: favor thyself then, or never. Skin for skin, and all a man hath, will he give for his life: we will give all to our skin, to save the blood under our skin; spend all we have, to spare ourselves. There we part with our goods, not our bloods; with our living, not with our life. We have not ventured unto blood: nondum ad sanguinem: it is not yet come to that. Our goods are but Bona fortunae: our labors are but Bona naturae: our prayers, but Bona gratiae: But when it comes to our lives; that we must lay down them for the brethren; here is love in his zenith and exaltation. This is a Love strong as death: and Majorem nemo: Greater love hath no man than this; to lay down his life for his friends. When a man dares challenge death to a single combat; and all this, causâ alienâ, non propriâ: We then show proof that you are our Beloved; when to preserve your spiritual life, we sacrifice our own natural life. Much study is a weariness of the flesh: Folia vertimus, corpora terimus: it makes our flesh weary of our work, yea, it makes our soul weary of our flesh. We abridge our natural course, draw on untimely diseases, and hasten upon us death, before we have half run our Race of Life.

This our love costs us more than the sweat of our brows; even the tears of our eyes, the sorrow of our hearts, the vexation of our minds, and the very anguish of our souls: all to testify, that you are our Beloved. Timothy must ply his book, and give attendance to reading, till he grow sick again: Jeremiah's eyes must run like spouts: Lots righteous soul must be vexed: and Paul's heart must be grieved. Lay the people's unkindness upon our souls, together with the burden of our calling on our bodies: and we do (in effect) antedate the day of our death, prevent our term, and pay the debt of nature ere it be due. In this sense we may say with Paul, that we die daily. We make no more reckoning of our labors, than of chaff: and are more glad of our loss, than others would be of their gain. We do not hold our very life precious, to win the souls of our Beloved. Death is bitter, and loss is not sweet: yet love can so change their natures, that in loss we shall find sweetness, and gladness in death. This is love indeed, the very soul of love; and without this, all the rest is but a carcass. Not the outward action, but the inward affection is all in all. If we cast up the bill of our expenses; the expense of our goods, of our bloods; yet without this love, the sum will amount to nothing: Nihil est, They are all but cyphers, till the figure of charity be set to them then they have their valuation, and rise up to ten's, and to hundreds. Lay all these together, and deny if you can that you are our Beloved.

2. But now it is time to see what will become of all this b•d what fruit our law will bring forth in you. Love again, at the lest sure: we can look for no other. Nulla est major ad •m•em provocatio, quam praevenire ani•a•ox. N• attractive like this: He that begins to us in love, looks that we should pledge him. That man hath an obdurate heart; qui amorem etsi nolebat impendere, (◊) tamen repend•re: that will neither lead, nor follow; neither one way; nor other, will be won to love. We may commend love, as one did wate•, for two good properties: it neither makes a man in debt, nor i• drink: so love is neither hard •o go•, nor costly to keep. If for all our expensive love, so liberal of our means, of our health, of our life, we cannot find bare land naked love again, we have very ill luck. Yea such luck had sain•Paul. The more abundantly I love, the less I am loved. For all his dear and plentiful bounty of love, he fought only to win the like favor and mutual love at their hands; without respect to any other thing in the world: yet he even missed of that. If he had gotten it, yet what singular thing were it: If ye love them that love you, what reward have you? In a word, there is but one Sun, infinite rays: all our loves are but the beams of the love of God: All rivers run into the Sea; and all loves shall be swallowed in the love of Christ.

Seeing ye know these things before.] The Orators which declaimed in the presence of the Roman Emperors, in their Panegyriques, took this course to make those Emperors see what they were bound to do, by saying that they had so done already. Sic facienda docent, quae modo facta vocant: For this both increased the love of the Prince to his people, to be told how well he had done: and withal conveyed a counsel into the Prince, to do so still. Such praises come of good respects and wishes; and is a form of civility, that works much upon noble natures: Landando praecipere, to wrap up the pills of good advice, in the golden leaf of commendation: when by telling men what they are, they represent unto them what they should be. As their way was to procure things to be done, by saying they were done: So our Apostle here takes another way; and by telling them what they should be, doth in effect tell them what indeed they are. His caution for the future, is but a narration for the present. When he bids them take heed of falling, he doth praise their standing. By exhorting them to what they should do, he insinuates what they have done already. As if he spake not to move a wheel that stood still, but to keep the wheel in due motion persuading them, not to begin, but to continue in goodness: and proposing to them their own examples, to be as constant still, as hitherto they have been. Praise is the reflection of virtue: but it is as the glass or body is that giveth the reflection. Here it comes from a mouth that would not flatter: and falls upon a subject which it might make better; by no means worse. It might not make them proud of their standing: it might humble them with fear of falling. Jesus Christ the same yesterday and today, and forever. In adhering to the truth, let us be so too: yesterday, and today, and the same forever here. So then hereafter, when time shall be to more; no more yesterday, no more today, yet forever and ever, we shall enjoy that comfort and glory, which shall never be taken from us.

1. We gather out of these words, this doctrinal sum, or evident conclusion; that constancy in goodness, is not the inseparable effect of knowledge; for then this caution were in vain. Beware last ye fall. Potastis simul & hac scire, & à firmitate excidere. Look to it well, for it is no impossible matter: neither is it rare to find knowledge in the head, without goodness in the heart. Scien••• instat, Charitas aedificat. A certain Lawyer stood up and tempted Christ. He came not to be caught by him, but to catch him: not to reverence that Divine wisdom of his Teacher, but to magnify himself for some great Scholar. Let him know never so much, he is resolved to be never the better man. All things are valued by their proper good ••item commendat fortilitas, sapor vinum, vilocitas Cervam. We mind the strength of the Ox, which we buy for the plough: the fatness of another, which we buy for food. We would have our Hound of a quick sent, investiga••• of a swife foot, consequè• of a bold courage, aggredi & invadere. That is best in everything, for which it was made. Man was made to serve God: if he be not good at that, he mistakes his end. Knowledge is but the Comment•••i••, Obedience is the Act: that prepares, this perfects. As when that Hippomachus Ap••p••s,•n Plutarch, a man of exceeding tall stature, was commended to the place of a Champion, and warranted to win the day: another answers, yes, if the prize were given to him that could reach highest, his height would much advantage him: but it is valor, not stature, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ must get the Crown. So if the Kingdom of Heaven were promised to learning, then the greatest scholar would foremost obtain it. But it is well done good servant, not well read great scholar, that carries it. If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them: Do them; never happy till then. Did you never hear of some miserly merchants, that sell rich wines, and drink nothing but water themselves? Nor of hypocrites, that will lie, cheat, slander, whore, and do such close villainies, that are never without a Bible in their pockets.

Speculation, be it never so excellent, is not the whole building of a Christian: but it is rather the ground-work of action. The former is like the lower millstone, that of it self lies still: put practice, that upper moving millstone to it, and they both will grind well together. Where exercise is not, learning will want experience: and where experience fails, errors will creep in: and where errors creep in, knowledge will creep out, or be thrust out perforce: and where knowledge is outed, the soul will quickly be seduced. So for all their knowing of these things before, Saint Peters caution is not in vain, to take heed of falling from their own steadfastness. The Priests and Scribes may know where Christ is to be borne, and truly inform Herod of the place; yet never stir a foot towards him. Such men are like artificial teeth set into the mandibles: they may be of some use for speaking, they are of none for eating. What avails it a Philosopher, that he can dispute learnedly of the nature of fire, when he is ready to perish with cold? Or the Physician to prescribe a wholesome diet, when himself feeds foully, and surfeits with intemperance? When the answerer gave for his question a matter of State, and the replier, who was something dissolute, found fault with it: We may not meddle with this: the answerer said, that the privileges of the School were much wronged, by confining it only to such questions as wherein they were practiced: and added; we have heard you dispute of virtue, which no man will say, you much put in practice: You are loath to meddle with that. Practice is the soul of knowledge.

We will make thee borders of gold, with studdes of silver. Murenulas aureas, vermiculatas argento: so Jerome reads it. Who ever saw the like? For borders of silver to be hatched and overlaid with gold, it is common: the better metal covers the baser, ever. But to overlay gold with silver, is a rare kind of polishment. Yet that is the fashion of the Saints: they are silver without, but gold within: that holiness which appears, is nothing so precious as that which lies hidden. Hypocrites will guild copper: but they that are good as well as wise, though their conversation be but silver, will have a golden heart. There is a double martyrdom: a bloody one, when Christ is magnified in the Roses of his Church, by death: and a bloodless one, when he is magnified in the Lilies of his Church, by life. This is not only verbal, by confession of the mouth: but real, when our deeds make good our words. God is glorified, Christ is magnified, and Wisdom justified; all of their children: not only by the testimony of their lips, but of their lives. Our knowledge prepares us to do it, but our holiness does it indeed.

Geographers speak of a footlesse bird, that is still hovering in the Air: such footlesse souls have they, that are still hovering in the Air of contemplation, but never descend to action.

Take the carcass of a man, and cloth it with a thousand garments, yet you shall never make it warm; because it wants the natural heat within, which those adventitious helps might cherish. If a soul be dead to goodness, though you feed it with a thousand precepts, till it become a quick Library of learning, a Magasin of knowledge: yet you cannot put the heat of holiness into it, because the living principle is wanting; Grace Divine. Let that spark be first in it, and then all these helps will blow it into a flame. Otherwise knowledge is but a fair light, put into a fowl and dirty Lantern, and gives but a poor glimmering. By a redundance of meat, and excessive repletion of the stomach, are caused obstructions: and from them ariseth an opilation or stopping of the liver and that stopping breeds the headache: and that headache often grows to a frenzy, sometimes to an epilepsie. The vices of an inordinate life are such obstructions to men's knowledge, that they come to forget God and all goodness: their knowledgewithers away with their hearts: and they forbear to listen to their conscience, as if they forgot to eat their own bread. No marvel then, if the Apostle warns them of an extidatis, though he praise them for an Haec nostis: for knowledge will fall from us, when we fall from goodness. They both love to dwell together: and if we once turn goodness out of our doors, knowledge will not tarry behind with us.

2. The foreknowledge of assaults, is a special help to the resistance of them. If we know these things before they come, we may the better withstand them when they do come. When we find men perverting the Scriptures, this is not Res inandita: we knew they would do so: and if they do so, it is no more than was foreknowne to us. He that is told of his enemies postures, and at what ward he will lie; may both the better avoid him, and the more easily vanquish him. We make but a sorry use of our knowledge, if our adversary wanting a sword, can foil us with the scabbard. This makes to the conviction of two defects in hearers. First, of them that will not remember the good they did once know. Secondly, Of them that will not do the good, they both know and remember.

1. For the former, it is easy to forget the lessons we have been taught: but then to forget them, when we should use them, is unhappily dangerous. David who had long been exercised in the school of patience, yet in the provocation of Nabal, had his lesson to seek. He that happily digested all the railing and persecutions of a wicked Master, cannot put up this affront of a neighbor: Nothing can assuage his choler, but blood. There be two shrewd pick-locks, that wrench open the closset of our memories: Wine is one, the subtle fumes whereof unrivet every joint of it, and loose the ciment that holds it fast. Deepe drinkers have shallow memories. Women is another: Delilah crept so far into Samson's bosom, that she forced a secret from him with her weakness, which all the Philistines could not have wrung out with their strength. The greatest blessings that ever be fell: mankind have been rusted with this canker of oblivion: even the death and passion of our dear Savior, and the redemption by that act purchased. For why should we crucify him again, and make his wounds bleed afresh, but that we forget his sufferings? How durst we, with serpentine tongues, full of the venom of oaths and curses, blaspheme his sweet and precious Name? All our excuse is, that though we know these things in the History, yet we forget them in the act of our sin and blasphemy.

A traveler hath balsam about him, to cure any wound: he falls among robbers, receives wounds, faints, and bleeds to death, and quite forgets his balsam all the while. We know many comfortable doctrines, and have laid them up in our memories: Yet when temptations assault us, we are foiled: what is the reason? That same Reminiscentia, the key to unlocke our memories, is wanting: and so we fall into gross errors and odious crimes. Remember Lots wife: we all know the story; and yet when the occasion comes that we should use it, we utterly forget it. It fareth with Sentences, as with coines: In coines, they that in smallest compass contain greatest value, are best esteemed: and in Sentences, those that in fewest words comprise most matter, are most set by. The shorter, the better: the better carried away, and the better kept, and the better called for when we need them. Remember Lots wife, is one of rich contents, yet very compendious: it consists but of three words, and five syllables: so that we are without all excuse, if we do not remember it. Yet alas, when we are departed from Sodom, and have bidden farewell to our sinful pleasures; there is still such an itch, to return, upon us; or at least a mind to look back so far prevails with us, that we neither remember Christ, nor Lots wife, nor ourselves. Lord remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom: think on me then, and there. So Christ to us; Remember me, ô man, in thy thralldom: now, and here think upon me. You know me well enough, but give your mind to remember me. Remember the word that I said unto you. If we remember what Christ hath said unto us, we shall the better remember what he hath done for us. When we are tempted to wantonness, by beauty: or to covetousness, by gain: or to drunkenness, by dissolute companions: or to Idolatry, by Papists: do we not know the vileness of these sins? Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Yes, Scientia is not wanting, but Reminiscentia; that fails. We are all valiant soldiers, till we come to fight; excellent philosophers, till we come to dispute; and good Christians, till we come to master our own lusts.

2. For the other; many are good at the Noscere, but naught at the Facere: they know, and remember too; but practice and they are strangers. Our duty is not discharged in knowing our Masters will; few Christians should then ever go to hell. To small purpose do we keep the Law in memory, and break it in life: in vain do we remember Christ in our words, and forget him in our deeds. It is not a speculative, but a practicke memory, that pleaseth God. What though we had a memory beyond Cyrus; that could call every soldier in his army by name? What though the evidences of time were recorded in our brain? Yet without the obedience of life, the life of obedience, all this knowledge would but animam pragrazare, comber the soul, as Saul's armor did David. Be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves. He that doth so, how sure soever he makes himself, and how wisely soever he thinks to carry the matter, is fallen into a Deceptio visus: and if he hear no otherwise, into a Deceptio auditus too. His receiving of the word, is nothing but a deceiving of himself. All the matter is in the word Only: we cannot speak so much good of hearing as we must speak evil of hearing Only. To hear, is somewhat, but not all: a part, not the whole. One thing is needful, and Mary hath chosen the good part. Though Christ commendeth hearing, and urgeth the necessity of it: yet he calls it but a part: The better part: is but a part: it is not the whole: Vnum, but not Vnicum. Is all the body an ear? Is all hearing? Yet as some are like Malchus, with his right ear cut off; that hear all sinisterly: so others put all the senses into hearing, and make all the body an ear, while they place all religion in hearing. Thus it comes about, that many Praescientes in speculation, prove nescientes when it comes to action. The birds of the air seem to be wiser than we: for when they know the gin, they will avoid it: but we, knowing the devils illusions yet willfully run into them.

We have a knowledge; but there is an untoward Sine that mars it: It is sine cura, sine conscientia, sine humilitate. There was such a conceit in a fiction, that a well informed City found yet many defects in her members, and wondered where the fault should rest. It was told her by a Criticke, that there was one small particle, Sine, Without, that spoiled all; advising the extermination of it. An edict was made, and certain orders set down, for the banishment of Sine, and for the exprobration of them that retained it. A Magistrate without Justice, is Fluvius Sine aqua, a river without water: a rich man without liberality, arbor sine fructu, a tree without fruit: a young man without repentance, Domus sine recta, a house without a roof: a woman without modesty, Cibus sine sale, meat without salt: a scholar without discretion, Calamus sine atramento, a pen without ink: worth without silence, thesaurus sine custodia, a treasure without a keeper: a design without power to go through with it, Volatus sine pennis, a flight without feathers: wit without patronage, terra sine rore, land without dew: knowledge without practice, Fumus sine intensa, smoke without incense: a Christian without patience, Equus sine freno, a horse without a bridle: and intendment without constancy, rota sine ponder, a wheel without a spring or balance. If we could be once rid of this Sine, without, all would be well: we should then no longer have fidem sine operibus, faith without works; which is like fire without light or cate: Nor poenitentione sine emendatione, repentance without amendment; which is a washing without being clean: Nor professionem sine honestate, profession without honesty; which is a face of goodness without a body: Nor Zelum sine scientia, Zeal without knowledge; which is a fire without a chimney: Nor Scientiam sine obedientia, knowledge without obedience; which is an eye without a foot: Nor religionem sine conscientia, religion without conscience; which is a body without a heart. If these Sine's, these privations that so offend piety, were gone: the rest, that so offend felicity, would follow. For then we should attain to peace without trouble, comfort without sorrow, light without darkness, health without sickness, life without death, glory without envy, and joy without end.

Lest ye also being led away with the error of the wicked.] Man is naturally such an arch-flatterer of himself, that he hath a better conceit of his own rules, than of the Divine principles: and thinks that he can guide himself well enough, without God. More than once were the Israelites chidden for going a whoring after their own inventions. The way taught us by God, dislikes us: we must have one of our own invention. Ye shall not do whatsoever is right in your own eyes; but what I command you, saith the Lord. But our Father Adams old disease sticks upon us; we must scire bonum & malum: something we must find out to ourselves, or make to ourselves: of some things we must be the authors and inventors, that so we may seem to be as wise as God, if not wiser: and to know what is for our turns, as well as he, if not better. This is not only a disease of our common life, that we still labor of new inventions: We invent new meats for our diet, new fashions for our apparel: and there is not only Ingeniosa gula, that studies the witty gluttony of a meal: but ingeniosa manus, forming new garbes for the back, and tempering new colors for the face: And these inventions have not their
