INTRODUCTION TO BOOKS I-III

THE text for Books I-III is based on C. Hubert's Teubner text of 1938. Notes to text and notes to translation are in great part excerpted from Hubert's critical apparatus and testimonia and, for Books I-II, also from the commentary in H. Bolkestein's Adversaria critica et exegetica ad Plutarchi Quaestionum Convivalium librum primum et secundum. In these works there is information not to be found here; conversely, there is here matter not to be found there. The archetype of all extant MSS. of the Quaestiones Convivales is Codex Vindobonensis Graecus 148 (T) of the 10th or early 11th century, purchased in Constantinople about 1562 (Hubert, Plutarchi Moralia, IV, pp. xi-xiv). I have worked with photostats of this manuscript before me, and, where I have checked Hubert's reports of its readings, I have generally bund them accurate. I have also had before me the editions of Bernardakis (Teubner, 1892), Hutten (Tübingen, 1798), and, more important, Wyttenbach (Oxford, 1797). For emendations by other and older scholars I have generally depended upon these editors or upon Hubert or upon Bolkestein-to all of whom my gratitude is due. Most that one may wish to know either about Plutarch or about the Quaestiones Convivales is now readily available in the monograph printed by K. Ziegler as "Plutarchos"

NINE BOOKS OF TABLE-TALK

BOOK ONE

The saying "I dislike a drinking-companion with a good memory" ^a some say, my dear Sossius Senecio,^b was meant by its author to refer to masters of ceremonies who are rather tiresome men and wanting in taste when the drinking is on. For it seems that the Dorians in Sicily called a master of ceremonies "remembrancer." On the other hand, some think that the proverb recommends amnesty for all that is said and done during the drinking; it is for this reason that in our traditional legends forgetfulness ^c and the wand ^a are together consecrated to the god, the implication being that one should remember either none of the improprieties committed over cups or only those which call for an altogether light and Prometheus in its pithy stalk brought fire to earth, schoolmasters used it for canes, doctors for splints, and the religious and convivial for their ritual wands or thyrsoi: RE, s.v., and Sir John Beazley, Am. Jour. Arch. xxxvii (1933), pp. 400 ff. The "god" here is Dionysus.

playful reproof. Since you too, Senecio, believe that forgetfulness of folly is in truth "wise," as Euripides says,^a yet to consign to utter oblivion all that occurs at a drinking-party is not only opposed to what we call the friend-making character of the dining-table,^b but also has the most famous of the philosophers to bear witness against it,-Plato, Xenophon,^c Aristotle,d Speusippus, Epicurus, Prytanis, Hieronymus,^h and Dio of the Academy,^t who all considered the recording of conversations held at table a task worth some effort,-and since, moreover, you thought that I ought to collect such talk as suits our purpose from among the learned discussions in which I have often participated in various places both at Rome in your company and among us in Greece, with table and goblet before us, I have applied myself to the task and now send you three of the books, each containing ten questions which we have discussed, and I mean to send you the rest very soon if these seem to you not altogether lacking in charm nor yet irrelevant to Dionysus.¹

TABLE-TALK I. 1, 612-613

QUESTION 1ª

Whether philosophy is a fitting topic for conversation at a drinking-party

Speakers : Ariston, Plutarch, Crato, and Sossius Senecio

1. The question of philosophical talk over the cups I have placed first of all, Senecio; for surely you recall that after a dinner at Athens, when the question arose whether one should engage in philosophical talk while drinking and what limit those who do so should observe, Ariston, who was present, said: "By the gods, are there really men who do not offer philosophers a place at their parties?"

And I replied, "Certainly there are, my friend, and the pretext they very solemnly employ is that philosophy should no more have a part in conversation over wine than should the matron of the house. They commend the Persians for doing their drinking and dancing with their mistresses rather than with their wives b; this they think we ought to imitate by introducing music and theatricals into our drinkingparties, and not disturb philosophy. For they hold that philosophy is not a suitable thing to make sport with and that we are not on these occasions inclined to seriousness. Indeed they claim that not even Isocrates the sophist yielded to requests to speak at a drinking-party, except only to say : ' What I excel in suits not the present occasion; in what suits the present occasion I do not excel.' "

2. Then Crato,^c raising his voice, "By Dionysus,"

^e A relative of Plutarch (RE, s.v., col. 651. 26-43 [see below, p. 48, note a], and col. 668. 55-68); though presumably a physician (cf. 669 c), there is no reason to identify him with the physician Crato of Gargettos whose tombstone is preserved (I,G. II², 5395, end of second century A.D.). In the

No, the nature of philosophy is different. It is the art of life,^b and therefore it is not reasonably excluded from any amusement or from any pleasure that diverts the mind, but takes part in all, bringing to them the qualities of proportion and fitness. Otherwise we must consider it our duty to refuse even temperance and justice admission to our drinking-parties, alleging their solemnity as excuse. The matter comes to this : if, like Orestes and his hosts, we were about to eat and drink in silence at the Thesmotheteum,^c this circumstance would be a rather happy remedy for stupidity; but if Dionysus is the Looser and the Liberator of all things, and if especially he unbridles the tongue and grants the utmost freedom to speech, it is silly and foolish, I think, to deprive ourselves of the best conversations at a time when talk abounds, to debate in our schools about what is appropriate for drinking-parties, what makes a good drinkingcompanion, and how wine ought to be used, but to

3. Then you, Senecio, said that, rather than argue with Crato about this, it was worth while to make some inquiry into the province and nature of philosophical talk at parties in order that we might avoid that pleasant jibe reserved for disputatious wranglers

Now come ye in to dinner, battle must be joined."

And when you invited us to discuss the matter, I said that it seemed to me necessary to consider first the character of the guests. " For if the majority of the guests at a party are learned men, like Socrates, Phaedrus, Pausanias, and Eryximachus at the dinner of Agathon,^b and Charmides, Antisthenes, Hermogenes, and others like them at the dinner of Callias,^c we shall let them talk philosophy, blending Dionysus not less with the Muses than with the Nymphs; for, while it is the Nymphs who introduce him as a kind and gentle god to our bodies, it is the Muses who present him as one really gracious and a giver of joy to our souls.^d In fact, if some few men without erudition are present, included in a large company of learned men like mute consonants among sonant vowels, they will take no wholly inarticulate part in talk and ideas." But if the company consists mainly of the kind of men who pay more attention to the note of every bird, of every cithara-string and soundingboard than to the voice of a philosopher, then it is useful to recall the story and example of Pisistratus. For when some quarrel arose between Pisistratus and his sons, and he saw the pleasure it gave his enemies, he summoned the assembly into session and announced that, though he wished to persuade his sons, since they were stubborn, he would be persuaded by them and follow them.^a In just such a manner a philosopher too, when with drinking-companions who are unwilling to listen to his homilies, will change his role, fall in with their mood, and not object to their activity so long as it does not transgress propriety. For he knows that, while men practise oratory only when they talk, they practise philosophy when they are silent, when they jest, even, by Zeus, when they are the butt of jokes and when they make fun of others. Indeed, not only is it true that ' the worst injustice is to seem just when one is not,' as Plato says,^b but also the height of sagacity is to talk philosophy without seeming to do so, and in jesting to accomplish all that those in earnest could. Just as the Maenads in Euripides,^c without shield and without sword, strike their attackers and wound them with their little thyrsoi, so true philosophers with their jokes and laughter somehow arouse men who are not altogether invulnerable and make them attentive.

Protagoras and the guests here mentioned at the party which gave Xenophon the subject for his Symposium.

4. "Then, too, there are, I think, topics of discussion that are particularly suitable for a drinkingparty. Some are supplied by history; others it is possible to take from current events; some contain of his friends who had revolted against his rule and established themselves in Phyle: Mor. 189 B. Both are doubtless apocryphal (RE, s.v. "Peisistratos," col. 158).

many lessons bearing on philosophy, many on piety; some induce an emulous enthusiasm for courageous and great-hearted deeds, and some for charitable and humane deeds. If one makes unobtrusive use of them to entertain and instruct his companions as they drink, not the least of the evils of intemperance will be taken away.

"Now those who mix alkanet in their wine and sprinkle their floors with infusions of vervain and maidenhair because, as they believe, these things to some extent contribute to the cheerfulness and gaiety of their guests,^a do so in imitation of Homer's Helen, who secretly added a drug to the undiluted wine^b; but they do not see that that legend too, having fetched a long course from Egypt, has its end in the telling of appropriate and suitable stories. For as they drink, Helen tells her guests a tale about Odysseus,

> What deed he dared to do, that hero strong, His body with unseemly stripes o'ercome.^e

This, I take it, was the 'assuaging' and pain-allaying drug, a story with a timeliness appropriate to the experiences and circumstances of the moment. Men of breeding, then, even if they talk straightforward philosophy, manage the conversation at such times by the persuasiveness rather than the compulsion of their arguments. Indeed, you see that Plato in his Symposium, even when he talks about the final cause and the primary good,—in short, when he discourses upon divine matters,—does not labour his proof nor

5. "The matters of inquiry must be in themselves rather simple and easy, the topics familiar, the subjects for investigation suitably uncomplicated, so that the less intellectual guests may neither be stifled nor turned away. For just as the bodies of men who are drinking are accustomed to sway in • time with pantomimic and choral dancing, but if we compel them to get up and exercise in heavy armour or throw the discus, they will find the party not only unpleasant but even harmful, just so their spirits are harmoniously and profitably stirred by subjects of inquiry that are easy to handle ; but one must banish the talk of 'wranglers,' as Democritus calls them,^b and of 'phrase-twisting' sophists, talk which involves them in strenuous argument about complex and abstruse subjects and irritates those who happen to be present. Indeed, just as the wine must be common to all, so too the conversation must be one in which all will share, and those who propose complex and abstruse topics for discussion would manifestly be no more fit for society than the crane and the fox of Aesop.^c The fox entertained the crane at dinner, serving her a clear broth poured out upon a flat stone. The crane not only went without her dinner, but in addition was made ridiculous because the broth, being liquid, always slipped out of her bill, which was so thin. In turn, then, the crane invited the fox and served up the dinner in a jar with a long and narrow neck; into this she easily inserted her bill and enjoyed the food, while the fox, unable to put his mouth inside, got for himself the portion he deserved. And so philosophers, whenever they plunge into subtle and disputatious arguments at a drinkingparty, are always irksome to most of the guests, who cannot follow; and these in turn throw themselves into the singing of any kind of song, the telling of foolish stories, and talk of shop and marketplace. Gone then is the aim and end of the good fellowship of the party, and Dionysus is outraged. Accordingly, just as people said when Phrynichus and Aeschylus introduced old legends and tales of suffering into tragedy, 'What has all this to do with Dionysus ?',^a just so it has often occurred to me to say to those who drag 'The Master' b into table-talk, 'Sir, what has this to do with Dionysus?' Indeed, when the great bowl is placed in our midst and the crowns are distributed which the god gives as token of our freedom, I dare say it is a reasonable thing to sing those songs called scolia, but to engage in pedan-tic argumentation over one's wine is a sophistical thing to do, and it is not seemly nor is it suitable to a party.

' As for the scolia, some say that they do not belong to a type of obscurely constructed songs, but that first the guests would sing the god's song together, all raising their hymn with one voice, and next when to each in turn was given the myrtle spray (which they called aisakos, I think, because the man to receive it sings) a and too the lyre was passed around, the guest who could play the instrument would take it and tune it and sing, while the unmusical would refuse, and thus the scolium owes its name to the fact that it is not sung by all and is not easy.^b But others say that the myrtle spray did not proceed from each guest to his neighbour in orderly sequence, but was passed across from couch to couch each time, that the first man to sing sent it over to the first man on the second couch, and the latter to the first man on the third couch, then the second man to the second on the neighbouring couch, and so on ; so, they say, it seems the song was named scolium because of the intricate and twisted character of its path." c

QUESTION 2

Whether the host should arrange the placing of his guests or leave it to the guests themselves

Speakers: Timon, Plutarch, the father of Plutarch, Lamprias, and others

1. My brother Timon, upon an occasion when he was host to a considerable number of guests, bade them each as they entered take whatever place they wished and there recline, for among those who had been invited were foreigners as well as citizens, friends as well as kinsmen, and, in a word, all sorts of people. Now when many guests were already assembled, a foreigner came up to the door of the banquet room, like a grandee out of a comedy,^a rather absurd with his extravagant clothes and train of servants; and, when he had run his eyes round the guests who had settled in their places, he refused to enter, but withdrew and was on his way out when a number of the guests ran to fetch him back, but he said that he saw no place left worthy of him. Thereupon the guests at table with much laughter urged them for the fact is there were many who had had a little something to drink.

2. When the dinner had come to an end, my father, whose place was rather far from mine, spoke to me and said, "Timon and I have made you judge of our dispute, for I have long been scolding him now on account of the foreigner. If he had arranged the placing of his guests at the beginning, as I told him to do, we would not be under suspicion of disorderliness and liable to public audit under the rule of a man skilful in marshalling horses and shield-bearing men.ª

Indeed, the story is told of the general Aemilius Paullus that, when he had conquered Perseus in Macedonia,^b he gave drinking-parties which were characterized by wonderfully good order and remarkable organization in all their details, holding it to be the same man's duty to organize infantry divisions to be as terrifying and dinner-parties to be as agreeable as possible, for he claimed that both were the result of good organization. And the Poet is accustomed to call the bravest and most kingly men marshallers of the people. .

Moreover, you philosophers, I suppose, admit that it was by good organization that the great god changed chaos into order,^d neither taking anything from what existed nor adding anything, but working the fairest form in nature out of the most shapeless by settling each element into its fitting place.

"However, in these very solemn and important matters we are your pupils, but we see for ourselves that extravagant dinners are not pleasant or munificent without organization. Thus it is ridiculous for our cooks and waiters to be greatly concerned about what they shall bring in first, or what second or middle or last,—also, by Zeus, for some place to be found and arrangement made for perfume and crowns and a harp-girl, if there is a girl,—yet for those invited to this entertainment to be fed at places selected haphazardly and by chance, which give neither to age nor to rank nor to any other distinction the position that suits it, one which does honour to the outstanding man, leaves the next best at ease, and exercises the judgement and sense of propriety of the host. For the man of quality does not have his honour and his station in the world, yet fail to receive recognition in the place he occupies at dinner; nor will a host drink to one of his guests before another, yet overlook their distinctions in placing them at table, and immediately at the beginning declare the dinner subject to the proverbial 'Myconos Equality.'" ^a Some such as this was my father's plea.

3. My brother, however, replied that he for his part was not wiser than Bias that he should become a judge over so many comrades and so many relatives too when Bias had refused to arbitrate between two of his friends, and should hand out decisions, not about property indeed, but about precedence, as though he had invited his friends not to entertain them, but to annoy them. "Certainly," he continued, "it was inept of Menelaüs, proverbially so, to become an adviser without being asked^b; more inept is the man who, instead of playing the host, makes himself a juryman and a judge over people who do not call upon him to decide an issue and are not on trial as to who is better than who, or worse; for they have not entered a contest, but have come for dinner.

(trans. H. L. Jones, LCL Strabo, v, p. 171); Strabo further notes that bald men are called Myconians because baldness is prevalent on the island. Further: Leutsch and Schneidewin, Corpus Paroemiographorum Graecorum, i, p. 445; Kock, Com. Att. Frag. iii, Adespoton 515.

Moreover the decision is not easy, differing as the guests do in age, in influence, in intimacy, and in kinship; on the contrary, one must have at hand, like the student of a principle of comparison, the Methodology of Aristotle a or the Dominants of Thrasymachus, b even though he accomplishes nothing useful, but rather transfers empty fame from market-place and theatre to social gatherings, and, in his attempt to relax by fellowship the other passions, accidentally refurbishes a vanity which I think much more fitting for men to have washed from their soul than the mud from their feet, if they are to meet at drink with each other easily and without affectation. As things are now, we try to remove our guests' hostility, no matter what angry passion or troubles it comes from ; but if we humble some of them and exalt others, we shall rekindle their hostility and set it aflame again through ambitious rivalry. And indeed, if the continuous toasts and the serving of food, and the conversation and discourse as well, shall be in strict conformity with the order of the guests' seating, our party will become in all respects a completely viceregal affair instead of a friendly gathering. If in other matters we are to preserve equality among men, why not begin with this first and accustom them to take their places with each other without vanity and ostentation, because they understand as soon as they enter the door

4. When these arguments had been delivered and those present were demanding the decision, I said that, since I had been chosen arbitrator, not judge, I would take a middle course. "Now if," I said, "we are entertaining young men, fellow citizens and intimates, we must accustom them, as Timon says, to take for themselves without ostentation and vanity whatever places they happen to find, taking good humour as a fine viaticum to friendship; but when we are occupied with learned talk in the company of foreigners or magistrates or older men, I am afraid that, if we shut vanity out at the court-yard gate, we may seem to be letting it in by the side gate, and with plenty of non-distinctions. In this we must yield something to custom and usage; otherwise, let us do away with the drinking of toasts and with familiar greetings, of which we make use when we are doing honour not just to anyone nor carelessly, but as carefully as possible

As Hubert notes, the error at 617 \star may indeed be due to the confused recollection of Agamemnon's remarks about dinners in honour of the Elders (Iliad, iv. 343 ff.).

His manly son Laomedon, who sat Beside him, dearest of his sons, he caused To rise and gave the guest his place.^a implying that this place belonged to him. And Athena is always seen to occupy the place of honour beside Zeus; this the Poet shows incidentally by what he says of Thetis,

> She then sat down next Father Zeus, Athena giving place to her^e;

and Pindar expressly says of Athena,

She sat beside the thunderbolt That breathes out fire.^d

Nevertheless Timon will say that one ought not to rob the other guests of the honour due to position by granting the position of honour to one of them. Yet this is just what he himself seems to do by preference; for the man who turns an individual's prerogative (each man's according to his worth) into common property is committing a theft, and the recognition due to virtue, kinship, public service, and such things he is giving to the foot-race and to speed. Though he thinks that he avoids being offensive to his guests, he draws it down all the more upon himself to be so, for he offends each one of them by depriving him of his accustomed honour.

"To me, however, the matter of making distinctions among one's guests does not seem very hard. In the first place it does not easily happen that many men who are rivals in honour meet at one party. Next, inasmuch as there are a number of places which have come to be held in honour, their distribution does not arouse jealousy if the host is able to guess rightly and give to each of the so-called dignitaries the place he likes,-because it is the first, or in the middle, or beside the host himself, or some friend of the guest, or intimate, or teacher,-and receive the other guests with gifts and friendly courtesies, an undisturbed tranquillity rather than honour of place. But if the honours are hard to decide, and the guests are touchy, then see what device I apply. If my father is present, I do him the honour of putting him in the most distinguished place; if he is not present, I honour my grandfather, or my father-in-law, or my father's brother, or any one among those guests who admittedly have a particular claim to precedence at the hands of the host, and it is from the poems of Homer that I get this rule of propriety. There, you may recall, when Achilles sees Menelaüs and Antilochus disputing about the second prize in a horse-race,^a he is afraid that they may become too angry and quarrelsome and so proposes to give the prize to another, ostensibly because he feels sorry for Eumelus, whom he thus honours, but actually in order to remove the cause of the guarrel between Menelaüs and Antilochus."

For it is not prestige, but pleasure which must determine the placing of guests; it is not the rank of each which must be considered, but the affinity and suitability of each to each, as is done when other things are associated for a common purpose. The builder does not value Attic or Laconian stone more highly because of its noble origin than he does foreign stone, nor does the painter give foremost place to the most expensive pigment, nor the shipwright prefer Isthmian pine or Cretan cypress, but they select such materials as may be likely, when combined and joined with each other, to render the finished product strong, beautiful, and useful. Indeed, Sosicles and Modestus here, as they set verse against verse,^b run a very fair risk of kindling a great flame. My way is to separate contentious, abusive, and quick-tempered men by placing between them some easy-going man as a cushion to soften their clashing; and athletes, hunters, and farmers I intend to bring together; for the characteristic which unites the former group is a contentiousness like that of cocks, while the latter group have the gentleness of daws. QUESTION 3

Why the place at banquets called the consul's acquired honour

The speakers are the same as in the preceding conversation

NEXT our inquiry fell upon the subject of the places at a banquet. It did so because different peoples hold different places in honour : the Persians the most central place, occupied by the king; the Greeks the first place ; the Romans the last place on the middle couch, called the consul's place; and some of the Greeks who dwell around the Pontus (the people of Heraclea, for example) contrariwise the first place of the middle couch. However, it was about the socalled consul's place that we were particularly puzzled. For in our time a this place is held first in honour, and yet the reason is no longer recognized as it is in the case of the first or the middle place; and of the characteristics of the consul's place some do not belong to it alone and the rest seem worthy of no scrious consideration. Yet three of the explanations advanced made an impression upon us.^b The first was that the consuls, when they had put down the monarchy and rearranged everything in a more democratic fashion, by way of concession demoted themselves from the royal central place, in order that not even this mark of their office and their power should remain to offend their associates. The second explanation was that, inasmuch as two of the couches are given over to the guests, the third couch and the first place on it certainly belongs to the host,-for here, like a charioteer or a pilot, he is favourably placed to watch over the service and is not prevented from entertaining and conversing with those who are present,-and of the places nearest him the one which is below him belongs either to his wife or his children, while the one above him was given properly enough to the guest of honour in order that he might be near his host. Thirdly, this place seemed to have peculiar advantages for the transaction of business; for the consul of the Romans is not like the Theban polemarch Archias,^a and, when letters or messages deserving notice are brought to his attention in the midst of a dinner, does not push the letter aside with the remark " serious things tomorrow ! " and take up his Thericlean goblet^b; on the contrary the consul "is very stern " and prudent at such times. For not only does

1. CRATO, my relative by marriage,^a and my friend Theon,^b at a drinking-party at which tipsy fun had begun and then quieted down, got into a discussion about the office of symposiarch, being of the opinion that I ought to assume the chaplet and not allow an old custom to be altogether abandoned, but should revive and establish again the traditional authority of the office in regard to drinking-parties and their regulation. The other guests were of the same opinion, so that a great clamour arose from all sides and insistence that I should serve.

"Since, then," I said, "you are all of one opinion, I

Others have other solutions (Flacclière, Sur l'E de Delphes, p. 11; Ziegler, RE, s.v. "Plutarchos," col. 686, and s.v. "Theon," no. 10),—much less reasonable in my opinion.

2. Thus summoned to speak, with some small degree of affected diffidence they tried to beg off, but when all commanded them to obey the leader and do his bidding, Crato began by saying that the commander of guardsmen must be the quintessence of a guardsman, to use Plato's phrase,^a and the leader of a company of drinkers must be the quintessence of a convivial man. ^a The anecdote is repeated in Regum et Imperatorum Apophthegmata (Mor. 186 c), where it is applied to military command (cf. Babbitt, LCL Mor. iii, p. 97). It is also repeated in Praecepta Gerendae Reipublicae (Mor. 813 E). Gomme conflates 186 c and 813 E and applies both to military command (Commentary on Thucydides, i, pp. 23-24), but the context at 813 E and here at 620 c suggests to me not so much 52

state,^a every time he took up his cloak, would first say to himself, as though reminding himself, ' Keep in mind, Pericles, you govern free men, you govern Greeks, you govern Athenians'; so let that sym-posiarch of ours say to himself, 'You govern friends,' in order that he may neither allow them to misbehave nor deprive them of their pleasures. Further, one who governs drinkers must be congenial to seriousness and no stranger to play, must have both qualities properly blended, and yet, like a choice wine, incline a little towards austerity, for the wine he drinks will bring his character to a happy mean, making it softer and more pliant. Clearchus's sullen and churlish aspect, according to Xenophon,^b appeared in combat paradoxically pleasant and cheerful because of the man's courage; just so one who is not naturally bitter, but dignified and austere, becomes pleasanter and more lovable when he is relaxed in drinking. Moreover the symposiarch must have a very good understanding of each of the drinkers, knowing what change drinking produces in each, into what emotional state he is apt to fall, and how he carries strong drink -for just as mixtures of wine and water vary with different waters, which the royal wine-stewards know and so pour into the wine now more water and now

I therefore paraphrase $\sigma\tau\rho\alpha\tau\gamma\gamma\delta\sigma$, literally "general" (there were ten such elected each year), with "head of state," though the Athenian constitution made no provision for an office legally so called. less, so does toleration for wine vary from person to person, which it is the duty of the symposiarch to know and, knowing, to watch over, that, like a musician, keying one up to drinking and relaxing another and scanting him a little, he may bring the natural dispositions of the guests from diversity into smooth and harmonious accord,-the symposiarch, I say, must know how each guest carries his wine so that he may serve to each not an equal amount kotylê by kotylê or kyathos by kyathos but the amount which is a proper and suitable measure for each man's temporary condition or permanent capacity. If this is difficult, then it is the symposiarch's business by all means to know the characteristics common to men of the same temperament or to men of the same age: namely, that old men get drunk more quickly than young men, tempestuous men more quickly than calm men, gloomy and apprehensive men more quickly than happy and cheerful men, and those who are not immoderate and intemperate in their living than those whose life is dissipated. With knowledge of these and like characteristics he can regulate the decorum and harmony of a party better than the man who knows them not. And certainly it is obvious to everyone, I imagine, that the symposiarch must be intimate and friendly with all of the guests, and cankerous and hateful to none,-for he will be unbearable when imposing his orders upon them, inequitable when serving them, and, though he joke with them, yet will he not avoid giving offence. Such," Crato concluded, " is the leader of the dinnerparty that I turn over to you, Theon, fashioned out of the wax of talk, as it were."

But whether I shall make fitting use of him and not bring dishonour upon your work of art, I do not know; yet it seems to me that such a man will keep our party temperate and will not allow it to become now a rabble-ruled congress, now a sophist's school, and again a gaming-establishment, and then perhaps a stage and a dancing-floor. For do you not see men who play the politician and harangue a jury at dinner, others who declaim and read selections from their own writings, and others who put on shows with mummers and dancers? Alcibiades and Theodorus made Poulytion's party a Telesterion with their mimicry of the torch ceremony and the initiation ritual.^a None of this, I think, must our leader allow ; rather he will only give a place to that talk, that spectacle, that amusement which accomplishes a party's aim, and this aim is through pleasure to produce among those who are present the heightening of friendship or to bring it into existence; for the drinking-party is a passing of time over wine which, guided by gracious behaviour, ends in friendship.

tressful; therefore, it is clear that the gentleman who presides will provide for the drinkers a mixed programme of entertainment. And so, giving heed to the testimony of many that the pleasantest sailing is along the coast, while the pleasantest walk is by the sea, he will accordingly throw in something playful alongside the serious in order that men of playful dispositions may in some fashion make contact with a certain degree of seriousness and again that serious men, like seasick voyagers catching sight of land near by, may cheer up as they catch sight of something playful. For laughter serves for many useful purposes and seriousness can be pleasant,

He will take care to bid the drinkers beware of all those games that, with no intent of seriousness, come roistering into parties like a drunken crowd, lest unawares the members of the party introduce an insolent violence bitter as henbane in their wine as they run riot with their so-called commands, ordering stammerers to sing, or bald men to comb their hair, or the lame to dance on a greased wine-skin. Thus, by way of rudely mocking Agamestor the Academician,^b who had a weak and withered leg, his fellowbanqueters proposed that each man of them all drain off his cup while standing on his right foot, or pay a penalty. Then he had a narrow jar brought to him, put his defective foot inside it, and drained off his cup; but all the others, since it was manifestly impossible for them to do so, though they tried, paid the penalty. Thus Agamestor showed himself an urbane gentleman; and, following his example, one should make his ripostes goodnatured and merry. As for the hazards, one must accustom the banqueters to use those conducive to pleasure and profit, setting commands that are suitable, possible, and such as display the talents of the performer, as, for example, for the musical to sing, orators to declaim, philosophers to resolve some crux, poets to recite their verses. QUESTION 5

Why it is held that "love teaches a poet" Speakers: Sossius Senecio and others

1. At one of Sossius's dinners, after the singing of some Sapphic verses, a discussion arose on why it is held that > Love instructs a poet then, Though he before was songless,^a whereas Philoxenus claims that actually

Cyclops cured his love with fair-voiced song.^b

It was said, then, that love is skilful at supplying boldness and initiative for all situations; Plato, for example, called it "dashing" and "ready for any undertaking."^c And in fact, love makes the silent man talkative, the bashful man attentive, the careless and easy-going man careful and industrious, and most amazing—the man who is penurious and pennypinching, when he falls in love, melted and softened

Furthermore, it was said that love is like drunkenness, for it makes men hot, gay, and distraught, and when they get in that condition, they are carried away into song-like and quite metrical speech : Aeschylus allegedly wrote his tragedies while drinking, indeed thoroughly heated with wine. My grandfather Lamprias was his most ingenious and eloquent self when drinking, and it was his habit to say that, much as incense is volatilized by heat, so was he by wine. Furthermore, men find their greatest pleasure in seeing those whom they love and are not less glad to sing their praises than to see them; it is in praise that love, loquacious in everything, is most loquacious. For inasmuch as lovers have persuaded themselves that the objects of their affections are fair and noble, they want everybody to be persuaded. This desire incited the Lydian Candaules^b to drag his servant into his own wife's bedroom to gaze upon her: for lovers want others to bear them witness. Thus, when they write eulogies of their fair beloved, they adorn their eulogies with melody and rhythm and song, as men beautify statues with gold, so that the praise of their beloved may be more likely to come to the ears of many people and be remembered. And indeed, if they give their beloved a horse, a cock,

2. Sossius, however, after praising them, said that one would not make a bad attempt at a solution by beginning with what Theophrastus has to say about music. "For I have recently read the book," he continued, " and Theophrastus a holds that music has three sources, sorrow, joy, and religious ecstasy; for each of these emotions diverts and deflects the voice from its cutomary range. Sorrows, as we know, involve weeping and wailing that naturally slips into song; this is why we find that our orators in their perorations and our actors in their laments by degrees raise the pitch of their speaking voice and approach song. changes and diverts both body and voice from their usual habits. Hence the Bacchic celebrations make use of rhythmic movements, to the god-inspired it is given to chant oracles in metre, and few madmen can one find whose ravings are not in verse and song. In view of these facts, if you should care to spread love out beneath the rays of the sun, to examine it and understand it, you would find that there is no other emotion which contains more bitter sorrows, more violent joy, or greater ecstasy and delirium ; the soul of a man in love, like Sophocles' city, is full versing with his friends.^a Philinus,^b however, showed their talk nonsense, taking his proof from the royal Journal^c where, with repetitious frequency, it is written, "after a bout of drinking Alexander slept this day through," sometimes with the addition of " and the following day also."^d Accordingly he was very lazy about love-making, though his bold and choleric temperament indicated a hot-natured body. Furthermore a very pleasant odour is said to have emanated from his skin; and his clothing, as a result, was filled with a fragrant aroma,-which too seems indicative of heat. Thus cassia and frankincense are produced in the driest and hottest parts of our world, for fragrance, according to Theophrastus, comes from a sort of distillation of moistures when their harmful excess is removed by heat.^e It seems, moreover, that Callisthenes ¹ incurred the enmity of Alexander because, so the story goes, he could not endure to dine with the king on account of the strong drink. Indeed, even the great loving-cup called Alexander's, when once it was passed to him, he thrust aside with the remark that he did not wish to drink from Alexander's cup and so stand in need of Asclepius's.^g This, then, was the conversation about Alexander's excessive drinking.

^d Cf. Aelian, Varia Hist. iii. 23.

• The characteristics of Alexander are also reported in the Life (ch. iv), there on the authority of Aristoxenus, and their explanation is again found in Theophrastus's hypothesis concerning fragrance: cf. Wehrli, Aristoxenus, frag. 132 with commentary (Die Schule des Aristoteles, ii, pp. 40 and 87-88).

2. According to report, the Mithridates a who made war against the Romans put up prizes for the greatest eater and the greatest drinker in the contests he sponsored, himself won the prizes for both, was by far the greatest drinker among his contemporaries, and so was nicknamed Dionysus.^b In my opinion that account of the reason for his nickname was one of those stories that gain credence without good grounds. Actually, when he was a baby, a bolt of lightning burned his swaddling-clothes, but did not touch his body, except for a trace of the fire which remained upon his forehead as a youth and was concealed by his hair. When he became a man, a bolt of lightning again fell near him, striking his house as he slept, passing through the quiver which hung above his head, and charring the arrows in it. His prophets thereupon declared that he would derive his greatest strength from archers and light-armed troops, but the multitude called him Dionysus because of the similarity of his experience with bolts of lightning.^d

3. From this the conversation returned to the subject of those who drink excessively. Among them was placed the boxer Heraclides,^e who lived in the time from Nicolaüs of Damascus, frag. 73 (Jacoby, Frag. Griech. Historiker, ii, p. 377).

^b Cf. Poseidonius, frag. 36 (Jacoby) in Athenaeus, v, 212 d. ^c Cf. infra, 665 B-E.

^d An allusion to the story that Dionysus's mother Semelê was struck and killed by Zeus's lightning when she was pregnant with the god to be (cf. H. J. Rose in O.C.D., s.v. "Semelê"); the lightning that killed Semelê made Dionysus immortal and the implication is not without flattery to Mithridates.

⁶ Included in a short list of heavy drinkers by Aelian, Varia Hist. xii. 26. The nickname, as Bolkestein notes (Adv. Crit. p. 90), apparently occurs as an ordinary name in I.G. xii. 3. 21 (Symê).

^a Athenaeus at 52 d quotes this passage from Plutarch, whom he names (cf. Gulick, A.J.P. lx [1939], p. 493). Pliny 74 of our fathers and was affectionately called Heraclous by the Alexandrians. Unable to find a drinkingcompanion to stay with him, he was in the habit of inviting people in for a round of drinks before luncheon, others for luncheon itself, still others for dinner, and finally new people again for an afterdinner bout of drinking. As the first group departed, the second arrived, then the third in their turn, and the fourth. Heraclides, without any let-up, was a match for them all and fully carried his part of the four sessions of drinking.

4. Among the companions of Drusus, the son of Tiberius Caesar, a doctor outstripped them all in drinking, and it was proved on him that before each party he took five or six bitter almonds to avoid getting drunk.^a When he was stopped from doing so and closely watched, he did not hold out against the power of the wine even for a short time. Some were of the opinion that the almonds had an irritant, cathartic property affecting the flesh, so that they even removed pimples ^b from the face; thus, when taken before drinking, they were thought by reason of their bitterness to excite and irritate the pores and by this action to draw moisture from the head in the form of vapour. To me, however, the action of bitterness seemed to be desiccant and moisturedissipating; for this reason a bitter flavour is the most unpleasant of all to the taste (for, as Plato says, the small veins of the tongue, which are soft and widely spaced, are unnaturally contracted by dryness

(Nat. Hist. xxiii. 145) claims the same property for almonds (cf. Dioscorides, i. 123. 2).

as moisture is dissipated), and this is why festering wounds are dried up by the use of bitter drugs, as the Poet says,^a

Thereon he placed a bitter drug, One crushed by hand, a killer of pain, Which checked that warrior's suffering; It dried the wound and staunched the blood.

He rightly called desiccant in action what is bitter in taste. Moreover, the dusting-powders which women use to dry perspiration have a bitter, puckery taste and seem to act as desiccants because of their vigorous astringency. "Since this is so," I concluded, "the bitterness of almonds is naturally helpful against wine, for it dries up the inside of the body and does not let the veins become full; and drunkenness, in common opinion, is due to the dilation and disturbance of the veins. A great proof of this opinion is what happens to foxes : if they eat bitter almonds and drink nothing afterwards, they die of complete desiccation."

warm, was on this account compatible with a strong mixture of wine and water; obviously their argument was platitudinous and facile, and neither an adequate nor an accurate analysis of the causation. For the same thing occurs in regard to an old man's perception of other stimuli; in apprehending sensations he is hard to stir and hard to rouse, unless they strike him with excessive strength. The cause is the decline of his physical vigour; enfeebled and exhausted, his system likes shock. Thus an old man likes flavours very pungent to his taste ; and odours affect in like manner his sense of smell, for it is pleasantly stimulated by scents which are un-adulterate and strong. His tactile sense is dulled to wounds, for, though he is sometimes hurt, he does not feel much pain. And his sense of hearing is much the same, for a musician, as he grows old, tunes more sharply and harshly, as though to waken his hearing by the whip-lashes of high-pitched sound. What tempering gives the steel's edge, is given the body's perception by the breath of life "; when this gives in and grows weak, the senses are left blunted and clod-like and in need of a vigorous stimulant, which strong wine is.

Why old men hold writing at a greater distance for reading Speakers: Lamprias, Plutarch, others

1. The phenomena of sight seemed to oppose the solution I devised for the preceding problem, for old men place writing far from their eyes to read it, and when the writing is near, they are unable to decipher it. Aeschylus intimates this when he says a :

But you must read it far away, For close up you could surely not, And you must be a lucid scribe, Though old.

And Sophocles more clearly says the same thing about old men b :

The sound of talking falls with slow impress, And hardly penetrates the stopped-up ear; But each man sees afar, is blind when close.

If, then, the senses of old men respond better to intensity and strength, why is it that in reading they do not endure the impact of light from near by, but destroy its brightness by moving the book farther away and so diluting that brightness with air as wine is diluted with water?

2. Now there were some who replied to this that old men hold the book away from their eyes not to soften the light, but, as it were, to lay hold of and encompass more light and fill with bright air the space between their eyes and the writing. And others agreed with the joined-rays school of thought^a : inasmuch as a cone of rays extends from each of the eves, its apex at the eye, its base and foundation encompassing the object viewed, it is probable that each of the cones proceeds separately up to a certain point, but when they have attained a greater distance and merged with each other, they unite their light, and consequently each object viewed appears as one, not two, even though it appears to both eyes at the same time : the reason for this is the simultaneous contact of the cones on the same object, and a union of light which produces single rather than dual vision. Since this is so, the elderly gentlemen who bring writing near their eyes, the rays of vision being not yet fused, contact the writing with each cone separately and lay weaker hold upon it; but those who place the writing farther away, the light now fused and intensified, apprehend the writing with greater exactness, like men who master with both hands together what they can not with either alone.

3. My brother Lamprias expressed the opinion that we see by means of the forms which fall upon the vision from the objects viewed, the hypothesis of Hieronymus,^a which Lamprias had not read, but had hit upon by his own cleverness. These forms, when they first come off, are large and coarse, and so at close quarters they disturb old men whose vision is slow and stiff; but where they rise into the air and gain distance, their earthy parts are broken and fall away, while the light parts, as they approach the eyes, painlessly and evenly fit into the passageways, and thus old men are less disturbed and more readily apprehend the forms. The scent of flowers, too, is sweeter when it reaches you from a distance, but if you bring them too close, their odour is not so pure and unadulterated. The reason is that much that is earthy and coarse accompanies the scent and destroys its pleasant odour when received near by, but if from a distance, the coarse and earthy parts slip off all round and fall, while the pure and fresh part of the scent by its lightness is brought intact to the sense of smell.

4. But I took my stand on the Platonic principle ^b and argued that a bright emanation which flows out from the eyes mixes with the light which surrounds objects and undergoes a fusion with it, so that from the two one body is formed compatible through its entirety. Each mingles with the other in proportion to their commensurability and quantity; for one must not be overwhelmed and destroyed by the other, but a single power must be created from both brought together on common ground in concord and partnership. Now inasmuch as the stream—whether one ought to apply this term to what passes through the pupil of the eye, or call it "luminous emanation," or "ray "-is weak and powerless in men past their prime, no mixing and mingling is effected with the light outside, but only the extinction and disintegration of vision, unless by removing the writing to a distance from their eyes old men destroy the excessive brilliance of the outside light, so that a sympathetic and commensurate rather than a large and unadulterate amount of it meets the vision. It is this phenomenon too which is responsible for the behaviour of night-ranging animals; for their vision, without strength, is overwhelmed and mastered by the mid-day light because it is unable, by reason of its weak and small beginning, to mix with the great, strong light of mid-day; but with light that is dim and faint, such as that of a star, their vision sends forth a ray that is sufficient and commensurate, so that ray and outside light join and produce sight.

tion with Themistocles the Stoic ^a why Chrysippus ^b never gave an explanation for any of the strange and extraordinary things he frequently mentions : for example, "salted fish are fresher ^c if wetted with brine"; "fleeces of wool yield less easily if one tears them apart violently than if one parts them gently"; and "people who have fasted eat more deliberately than those who have taken food beforehand." Themistocles answered that Chrysippus mentioned such things incidentally, by way of example, because we are easily and irrationally trapped by what appears likely, and contrariwise disbelieve what appears unlikely, and turning to Theon, he continued : "But what business have you, sir, to raise a question about these matters? For if you have become inquisitive and speculative in the matter of explanations, do not camp so far away from your own province, but tell us for what reason Homer has made Nausicaä do her washing in the river instead of the sea,^d though the latter was near by and quite likely was warmer, clearer, and more cleansing.'

2. "But," said Theon, " this problem you propose to us Aristotle e long ago solved by considering the earthy matter in sea-water. Much coarse, earthy matter is scattered in the sea; being mixed with the water, this matter is responsible for the saltness, and because of it sea-water also supports swimmers better and floats heavy objects, while fresh water lets them

3. "Plausible," I said, "but not true. For I observe that people frequently thicken their water with ash, or soda, or, if these are not at hand, with a powdery solid; the earthy matter, it would seem, is more easily able by its roughness to wash out dirt, while the water alone because of its lightness and weakness does not do this with equal facility. It is not, therefore, the coarseness of sea-water that prevents this action, nor is sea-water a less efficient cleanser because of its acridness, for this quality cleans out and opens up the mesh of the cloth and sweeps away the dirt.^b But since everything oily is hard to wash and makes a stain, and the sea is oily, this would surely be the reason for its not cleaning efficiently. That the sea is oily Aristotle himself has said.^c For salt contains fat, so making lamps burn better; and sea-water itself, when it is sprinkled into flames, flashes up with them. Indeed among waters it is particularly sea-water that is flammable, and, in my view, this is the reason why it is also the warmest.

"What is more, the phenomenon can also be explained in another manner. Since cleansing is the aim of washing, and what dries quickest appears cleanest, the washing liquid must depart with the

4. Theon interrupted and said, "You are talking nonsense, for Aristotle in the same book says ^a that those who wash themselves in the sea, if they stand in the sun, dry off faster than those who use fresh water."

For when men come out of the sea and stand in the sun, the heat evaporates the finest and lightest part of the moisture,^{ε} and the salty, coarse residue itself remains coated upon their bodies, a briny seum, until they wash it away with fresh drinking water."

Presumably also by this Sarapion are the dactylic hexameters on the duties of a physician published on the "Sarapion Monument" apparently erected in the Asclepieum on the south slope of the Athenian Acropolis by Q. Statius Sarapion, who would then be the grandson of Plutarch's friend Sarapion; several generations later a paean of Sophocles and the names of the paeanistae who recited it were added to the monument (see Paul Maas and James H. QUESTION 10

Why the chorus of the phylê Aiantis at Athens is never judged last

Speakers: Marcus, Milo, Philopappus, Glaucias, Plutarch, and others

1. WHEN Sarapion ^a won the prize with the chorus he directed for the phylê Leontis, he entertained at a victory celebration at which I was present,—for I was an adopted member of the phylê,—and suitably enough our talk was concerned with the recent competition. For the contest had produced intense rivalry since King Philopappus ^b had presided in a Plutarch dedicated the De Adulatore et Amico. In I.G. ii². 3112 (A.D. 75/6-87/8) the phyle Oeneïs, which had contested with a dithyramb, honoured Philopappus as agonothetes of the Dionysia in the year of his archonship. Pickard-Cambridge's text of this document reads of Olvois out dia τών εὐ ἀγωνισαμένων ..., and "... the inscription," he writes, " suggests that the Oeneïd tribe had just won a victory . . ." (Dramatic Festivals of Athens, p. 74 and note 6). But actually the ϵv , though cut on the stone, was erased and so must be deleted from the text (see P. Graindor, Album d'inscriptions attiques, p. 23, no. 26, and pl. XIX). Presumably Oeneïs honoured Philopappus for his munificence rather than for their victory, a victory which, if indeed the document of Oeneis and Plutarch's essay both refer to the same occasion, had actually been won by Leontis. Boulon, the choregus for Oeneïs, and Sarapion, presumably the like for Leontis, would be only nominally so, for Philopappus was, as well as agonothetes, the de facto choregus who defrayed the expenses of choruses for all the phylae together. The inscription of Oeneis would also be evidence that the subject matter of the Quaestiones Convivales ranged through some twenty to thirty years, more or less, of Plutarch's life, if the Favorinus of viii. 10 is indeed Favorinus of Arles (the same, Ziegler, RE, s.v. "Plutarchos," col. 713; " probably the same ... " Sandbach on 734 F [LCL Mor. ix, p. 205, note c] infra).

His companion Milo ^c said, "What if actually the information is false?"

"No matter !" said Philopappus. "It's not bad if the same thing does happen to us that happened to the wise Democritus because of love for learning." It seems that the juice of a cucumber he was eating appeared to have a honeylike taste, and he questioned his serving-woman about where she had bought it. When she indicated a certain garden, he got up and told her to take him and show him the place. The woman was astonished and asked what he had in mind. ^a The reference is to Herodotus, vi. 109-110. Callimachus, who perished in the battle (id. vi. 114), was by virtue of his office commander-in-chief at Marathon; Miltiades was one of the commander-in-chief's ten generals (id. vi. 103). For the problem of the relationship between polemarch and generals see C. Hignett, A Ilistory of the Athenian Constitution, pp. 166-173. For fragments of the dedication made by Callimachus before the battle and a supplement added after 100 who had fought brilliantly in that battle. Furthermore, Glaucias pointed out that the polemarch Callimachus was of that phylê, a man who proved himself very brave and by casting his vote with Miltiades was most responsible, at least next to Miltiades, for the decision to commit the Athenians to battle.^a I added to the remarks of Glaucias the fact that the decree by the stipulations of which the polemarch led the Athenians out to battle was passed during the prytany of the phylê Aiantis, furthermore that the phylê distinguished itself in the highest degree at the battle of Plataea. It was because of this that men of Aiantis conducted to Cithaeron the victory sacrifice ordained by the Pythian oracle in honour of the Sphragitid Nymphs, and the state supplied them the sacrificial victim and other things needful." However," I continued, "you are to take cognizance of the fact that the other phylae, too, possess many honours, and you all know well enough that my own phylê Leontis is among the foremost and inferior to none in distinction. Now consider, is it not more plausible to say that the preference shown Aiantis in never judging its chorus last is for the purpose of appeasing and mollifying the eponym of the phyle? For the son of Telamon is not good natured about en-

the battle see I.G. i². 609 = Tod, Gr. Hist. Inscr. no. 13, with Jacoby's interpretation in Hesperia, xiv (1945), p. 158, note 8; and cf. Shefton, B.S.A. xlv (1950), pp. 140-164.

^b This account of the rôle of Aiantis at Plataea is repeated with greater detail in the Life of Aristeides, xix. 6, where Kleidemos is cited for "an enlargement" of the record of Herodotus, ix. 70. The Sphragitid Nymphs reappear at Arist. xi. 3-4, and at Pausanias, ix. 3. 9. The evidence is collected and discussed by Jacoby, Frag. Griech. Historiker, no. 323 (Kleidemos), frag. 22, and 3 b Suppl., vol. i, pp. 82-83, with notes in vol. ii, p. 76.

^a W. K. Pritchett noted that the discussion reaches no satisfactory conclusion (U.C. Pub. Class. Arch. iv. 2 [1960], p. 148, note 76). W. S. Ferguson suggested the possibility of finding other "privileges" for Aiantis in the operation of the

It may be that Plutarch's own solution and indeed the subject of the problem are a jeu de littérature based on the fact that Aiantis in the official order for listing the Athenian phylae (A. G. Woodhead, The Study of Greek Inscriptions, pp. 112-114) occupied the penultimate or at times the antepenultimate position in the order—always close to last, but never last.

TABLE-TALK

BOOK TWO

Some of the preparations which are made for dinners and drinking-parties rank as necessities, my dear Sossius Senecio; such are the wine, the food, the cuisine, and of course the couches and tables. Others are diversions introduced for pleasure's sake, and no essential function attaches to them ; such are music. spectacles, and any buffooning Philip-at-Callias's.ª With these latter, if they are present, the guests are pleased, but if they are absent, the guests do not very much desire them or criticize the party as being very deficient. So it is with the conversation ; some topics are accepted by the average run of men as the proper business of drinking-parties, while other topics are entertained because they possess an attractive theme more suitable to the moment than pipe and lyre. Examples of these were mixed together in my first book. To the first category belong the conversation on philosophical talk at drinking-parties, that on the subject whether the host himself assigns places or allows the guests to take their own, and such matters ; to the second category belong the conversation on the

The conversations which follow have been written in a haphazard manner, not systematically but as each came to mind. Nor must my readers be surprised if, though addressing myself to you, I have introduced some of your own past conversation also; for indeed, if the getting of knowledge does not insure that one remembers it,^a frequently the same end is attained by recollection as by learning.

they asked each other such questions as it is more agreeable to be asked than not and joked each other on matters about which it was more agreeable to be teased than not; for if other men often vex and annoy by their praise, as they do, surely it was right for Gobryas to admire the urbanity and understanding of men whose very jokes offered pleasure and gratification to those who were the butts? And so, when you were entertaining me at Patras, you said you would be glad to learn what kind such questions were and what their general character. "For no small portion of the art of conversation," you said, "is the knowledge and observance of good taste in question-posing and fun-making."

2. "Certainly, a great portion," I replied ; "but surely Xenophon himself, in the Socratic Symposium as well as in his writing about Persian drinking-parties, shows what kind such questions are. And yet if it is decided that we too apply ourselves to the problem, it seems to me, in the first place, that men are glad to be asked what they are able to answer easily, that is, questions about matters in which they have experience; for about what they do not know, either they say nothing and are chagrined as though asked for what they cannot give or they reply with a guess and an uncertain conjecture and so find themselves in a distressing and dangerous situation. However, if the answer is not only easy but somehow striking, it is more agreeable to the answerer. Striking are the answers of those who have knowledge of matters which many neither understand nor have heard about: for example, astronomy or dialectics, if it is in these subjects that the answerers have skill. For not only in the activity in which he passes his days but also in his conversation each man is agreeably occupied

> Where the best of his abilities Chance to lie,

" People are pleased with those who ask them questions on subjects which, because they themselves have knowledge of them, they are unwilling to let go unknown and lie hidden. Thus travellers and sailors are very glad to be questioned about a far-away place and a foreign sea and about the customs and laws of alien men, and they willingly describe and delineate gulfs and localities with the notion that thus they obtain for themselves a kind of reward and a consolation for their labours. In general we are glad to be questioned on matters which we are in the habit of describing and talking about of our own accord even when no one asks us, for so we think we give pleasure to those whose business it was to refrain from putting questions to us if our conversation annoved them. This kind of disease is rampant among seafaring men, and the more courteous prefer to be questioned about what, in spite of their desire, they hesitate to speak because of modesty and their consideration for the company, as, for example, all that they themselves have accomplished and achieved. And so it was right for Nestor, knowing Odysseus's love for fame, to say

It is therefore necessary to keep one's questions away from the subject of misfortunes, for it distresses people to speak of lawsuits lost, of children buried, of any unsuccessful business-deals on land or sea. But they are glad to be asked over and over how they met with success in the Assembly, or were addressed by the king, or, when others fell in with storms or pirates, they themselves avoided the danger; and they are insatiable in recalling and relating their experience because their talk in a sense enables them to continue their pleasure in it. And they are happy to be asked about friends who are successful and about children who are making progress in studies or in lawsuits or in the friendship of kings.

"They are even more delighted to be asked about the disgraces, the injuries, and the unsuccessful lawsuits of enemies and adversaries who have been convicted and ruined; about such matters they are very willing to report in detail, but of their own accord they hesitate to do so, bewaring of a reputation for spite. It is also very agreeable to ask a huntsman questions about dogs, a keen athlete about games, and an amorist about his handsome loves. The pious ritualist, fond of recounting dreams and all that he by the gods' goodwill has brought to success through use of omens or of sacrifices, would very gladly be asked about these matters. stir up willing talkers, even if the subject matter in no way relates to the speaker :

> O Nestor, son of Neleus, speak the truth. How perished the son of Atreus . . . ? And where was Menelaüs . . . ? In Achaean Argos was he not, for sure ? ^a

Many were the questions he [Telemachus] put at one and the same time and many were the stories for which he offered the occasion, not like some men, who take away the most pleasant pastime of old age by causing the answers they receive to be contracted and compressed to bare essentials. To sum up : those who wish to give happiness rather than distress put questions of such sort that the answers are attended not by blame from the audience but by praise, not by hatred and anger but friendliness and goodwill. This, then, is what I have to say upon the subject of questions.

4. "The man who cannot engage in joking at a suitable time, discreetly and skilfully,^b must avoid b jokes altogether; for just as men in a slippery place are upset however lightly brushed, so in drinking we are apt to be overthrown at every unseemly outburst of talk that arises. And there are times when we are more roused by jokes than by insults, for we may frequently see that insults are the unintended result of anger, while we may suppose that jokes are the gratuitous result of insolence and bad character. Further, we are generally more offended when the talk is with clever men than when it is with heedless fools, for in the case of the clever man we know that cunning is compounded with his offensiveness,—indeed his joke seems to be deliberate abuse purposely delivered. The man who calls you 'fishmonger' is obviously being insulting, but it's joking when someone says, 'I remember when you used to wipe your nose on your sleeve.' ^a And when a man named Octavius, who was supposed to be from Libya, said to Cicero that he did not hear what Cicero was saying, the latter's answer was, 'And yet you have holes in your ears!'^b Again, when Melanthius ^c was ridiculed by the comic poet, he said, 'It's not the coin you owe me that you pay me back.'

"Thus jokes are more biting, for like barbed arrows they lie longer embedded. The delight in their eleverness distresses the victims in the degree it gives pleasure to the company, for by taking pleasure in what is said the company seem to believe the speaker and join in with his ridicule. The joke, as Theophrastus has it, is a disguised reproach for error d; accordingly the listener of his own accord supplies in thought what is missing as though he knew it and believed it. For example, Theocritus, in reply to the question of a man reputed to be a robber, who was asking whether Theocritus was going out to dinner, said that he was indeed going out to dinner, but was passing the night there ; whoever laughs at the remark and takes pleasure in it is in the position of one who confirms the slander. Thus the ill-bred joker infects the company with his bad manners, since they too are delighted and join in his malice. In fair Lacedaemon it was thought that one of the things a man must learn was to tease without giving offence and to endure being teased ; and if anyone should ever succumb under teasing, the teaser always stopped at once. How then can it fail to be hard to find a joke agreeable to the man at whom it is directed when joking without offending is a matter of no ordinary skill and cleverness ?

5. "Nevertheless, it seems to me that jokes which distress the guilty are foremost in causing a certain pleasure and mirth in men of unimpeachable reputation. An example is Xenophon's playful introduction of that exceedingly ugly and shaggy individual who is teased as the 'darling' of Sambaulas.^a When our own Quietus ^b during his illness remarked that his hands were cold,—surely you remember,—Aufidius Modestus ^c said, 'But you have brought them back hot from your province.' This made Quietus laugh merrily, though for a thieving proconsul it would have been an insulting rebuke. So too Socrates, when he challenged the very handsome Critobulus ^d to a beauty-contest, was teasing him amiably, not dedicated De Fraterno Amore (with Nigrinus; see 478 B with note [LCL]) and De Sera Numinis Vindicta (548 A). mocking him. And it was again Socrates whom Alcibiades teased for his jealousy over Agathon.^a

"Kings are pleased to be addressed like mere labourers and common men : for example, the parasite's reply to Philip's teasing, 'Do I not feed you?' For by referring to a disability which does not exist one emphasizes the merit which does. The presence of merit of some sort, certain and generally recognized, is essential; otherwise the real meaning of the statement of the contrary is ambiguous. Mirth and laughter are the result when someone says that he will introduce money-lenders to the very wealthy so-and-so, or asserts that a sober water-drinker gets riotously drunk, or calls the free-spending, magnificent, bounteous man a niggardly skinflint, or threatens the man prominent at the bar and in government that he will catch him in the Agora.^b So it was a kind and agreeable act for Cyrus ^c to challenge his companions to contests in which his skill was inferior to theirs. And when Ismenias d was playing the pipe at a sacrifice, was not obtaining favourable omens, and the professional took the pipe, played in a ridiculous manner, and answered the reproaches of the bystanders with 'To play the pipe agreeably is a gift of the god,' Ismenias laughed and said, ' With my playing the gods were pleased and protracted the ceremony; but in their eagerness to get rid of you they accepted the sacrifice.

words to anything praiseworthy, if they do so with tact, give more pleasure than even men straightforward in their praise. And those who are fairspoken in their censure are actually more bitingly effective, like one who calls a rascal an Aristides and a coward an Achilles, and like Sophocles's Oedipus,^a

For this the trusted Creon, long my friend ... [sc. desires to cast me out, has caught me with his tricks].

Now it seems that for praise there is a corresponding kind of irony. tears are denied us.' A dinner-guest called the host who dined him day after day 'slave-dealer' and 'tyrant' on whose account he had not seen his own table these many years. And the man who rose from poverty to riches complained that he was now being deprived of leisure and sleep by the plotting of the king. Again, one might reverse the rôles and scold the Cabiri in Aeschylus^a for 'emptying the house of vinegar,' as they themselves playfully threatened to do. The gratification these remarks express is the more telling because they are a bit tart and accordingly do not vex and annoy those who are praised.

8. "The man who would make tactful use of joking must know the difference between a diseased and a normal habit (for example, between miserliness or drunkenness and love of music or hunting). Teased about the former, men are annoyed; about the latter, they are pleased. At any rate, when Demosthenes of Mitylenê^b knocked on the door of a man who was devoted to song and the cithara, and his friend answered and invited him to enter, it was not offensive for Demosthenes to reply, 'If first you will lock up your eithara.' But when Lysimachus tossed a wooden scorpion into the cloak of his parasite,^o and the parasite jumped up in terror, it was a joke, 'Now I will frighten you, Sire : Give me a talent !'

9. "Many such differences exist, too, where physical characteristics are concerned. For example, men laugh when they are teased about a hooked nose or a snub nose. Cassander's friend was not angry with Theophrastus who said to him, 'I am amazed that your eyes don't sing, for your nose gives them the pitch.' a Cyrus b advised a hooked-nose officer of his to marry a snub-nosed woman, for thus they would fit each other. But men get angry when they are teased about a bad-smelling nose or mouth. Again, people support with equanimity being teased about baldness, but with asperity about impairment of sight. Indeed, Antigonus,^c though it was his habit to make fun of himself about his one eye and once, when he received a petition written in big letters, he said, ' This is clear even to a blind man,'-the same Antigonus nevertheless put to death Theocritus of Chios d because, when someone said, ' Stand before the eyes of the king, and you will be saved,' Theocritus replied, 'The salvation you recommend me is impossible.'

got mad at Melanthius for teasing him about the hump on his back, for Melanthius said that Archippus did not stand as leader over the city, but stooped before it. Some men endure this affliction with gentle equanimity, as did the friend of Antigonus who asked for a talent and did not get it and then, in reply to the teasing of Antigonus that he was carrying the talent upon his shoulders, a asked for an escort and guards, 'in order that no one,' he said, 'will waylay me.' This is the way men, in their diversity, are about physical appearance : some get mad at one thing, others at another. [Epaminondas, when dining with his fellow officers, was in the habit of drinking a vinegary wine; when they inquired if it was good for the health, he replied, 'I don't know, but I am certain that it is good for keeping me in mind of the fare at home.'] Accordingly the man who would indulge in teasing must have an eye to the natures and dispositions of the company, trying to converse with all in a pleasant and agreeable manner.

10. "Love is a very complex emotion, in regard to jokes as to everything else: some lovers are distressed and annoyed by jokes; others are pleased. One must know the right time. For just as a fire b in its early stages is extinguished, weak as it is, by a breath of air, but when it has grown larger, it is nourished and strengthened; so love, while still nascent and hidden, is irritated and distressed by detection, but when it has blazed out and become visible, it smiles upon the wind of ridicule that nourishes it. ^a Of the Middle Academy. Hubert discovers the geometrical problem here proposed in Sextus Empiricus, Adversus Mathematicos, iii. 79: it is not things themselves that are contiguous, but their peripheries. 134 find it very agreeable to be teased about love itself, but about nothing else. And if they happen to be in love with their own wives or to have a generous love for elegant young men, they are perfectly delighted and proud to be teased about them. Accordingly, when at one of the lectures of Arcesilaüs ^a an auditor at the moment engaged in a love-affair advanced the following proposition, 'In my opinion nothing touches anything else,' Arcesilaüs pointed to a youth who was sitting beside the gentleman—a fine handsome young man—and said, 'Am I to infer that you in particular are not touching this lad?'

11. "Now we must turn to consideration of the type of guest present at the party. Among friends and comrades men laugh at remarks they take amiss if made to them in the presence of wife, father, or teacher unless what is said is in some way pleasing to these latter. I mean if one, when a philosopher is among the company, is teased about going barefoot or writing into the late hours of the night; or about his thriftiness, when his father is listening to the conversation; or, in the hearing of his wife, how he is no lover of other women, but her slave and servant—like Tigranes,^b who, asked by Cyrus, 'But what if your wife hears that you are carrying baggage?', replied, 'She will not hear about it; she will be there to see it herself.'

12. "It makes teasing less distressing, too, for those who tease to share in some way or other the condition ridiculed : for example, if a pauper speaks of poverty, or a low-born man of mean birth, or a lover of love. For, if it is done by similar people, the teasing seems to spring not from insolence but rather from a kind of playfulness; otherwise it is irritating and distressful. Take the case of the king's new-rich freedman : he was behaving in a vulgar and pompous manner towards the philosophers who were his companions at dinner and ended by asking how it is that white beans and black alike make yellow soup, and Aridices a caused him to get up and leave the party mortally offended by asking in turn how it is that white and black lashes make red stripes. But when Amphias of Tarsus was teasing the governor's friend about his mean birth and immediately interrupted himself to say, ' But I too have sprung from the same seed,' he got a laugh, for he himself was reputed to be a gardener's son. And a harper delightfully rebuked Philip's late-won knowledge and officiousness : when Philip thought to dispute with him on a question of notes and scales, the harper said, ' May you never fare so ill, Sire, that you have better knowledge of these matters than I.' ^b By seeming to ridicule himself he reproved Philip without offence. So some of the comic poets seem to take away bitterness by ridiculing themselves, as Aristophanes on the subject of baldness and Agathon's departure,^d and Cratinus brought out the Wine-Flask. . .

For just as we easily endure the flarings of temper and the discord which arise within the circle of a drinking-party, but if anyone comes in from outside with insults and disturbance, he is considered an enemy and hateful; so do we pardon and license a joke that springs simply and unfeignedly from the immediate circumstances, while it seems a planned insult if it is foreign to the context of the talk. Why men become hungrier in autumn

Speakers : Xenocles, Plutarch, Glaucias, and Lamprias

AT Eleusis after the mysteries, the climax of the festival, we were dining at the house of Glaucias ^c the professor of Public-Speaking. After the others had finished dinner, Xenocles of Delphi, as usual, began to tease my brother Lamprias about his "Boeotian gluttony." In defence of my brother I launched an attack upon Xenocles, follower of the teachings of Epicurus, by saying, "Not all men, Sir, make the removal of the painful the limit and perfection of pleasure.^d Lamprias honours The Walk and The Lyceum before The Garden and so must bear active witness to Aristotle, for this gentleman says that each man is hungriest in the fall of the year.^e And he has given the reason, but I do not remember it."

"It is better so," said Glaucias, "for we ourselves shall undertake the search for it when we finish dining."

After the tables were taken away, then, Glaucias and Xenoeles both attributed the cause to the autumn's fruit, but each for a different reason. The former held that it eleaned out the bowels and by emptying the body was always re-creating appetite. And Xenocles said that the pleasant, piquant quality of most fruits invited hunger in the belly more efficiently than any dainty dish and sauce. Indeed a bit of fruit offered the sick who have lost their taste for food, restores their appetite. It was the opinion of Lamprias that our own innate heat, by the activity of which we are naturally nourished, is dispersed, rather weak, and of little consequence in summer, but in autumn collects again and grows strong, hidden within -us by the cooling and solidification of our bodies.^a

And I, to avoid the appearance of sharing in the conversation without paying my contribution,^b said that in summer we become thirstier and because of the heat use more liquid $^{\circ}$; so now nature, in the process of change seeking the other extreme, as her custom is, makes us hungrier and replenishes the solid food in the body's mixture. Whether the hen or the egg came first ^a

Speakers : Alexander, Plutarch, Sulla, Firmus, Sossius Senecio

1. BECAUSE of a dream, I had for a long time now been avoiding eggs, and I was acting so for this reason, that I might test by an egg, as by a Carian,^b the vision which came to me clearly and frequently. But my companions at one of Sossius Senecio's dinners suspected me of being committed to beliefs of the Orphics or the Pythagoreans and holding the egg taboo, as some hold the heart and brain, because I thought it to be the first principle of creation. And Alexander the Epicurean ^e teasingly recited :

Now eating beans is much like eating parents' heads.^d

For these people call eggs "beans" (kuamoi), punning on the word conception (kuesis), and they think that eating eggs in no way differs from using the creatures which produce the eggs. To explain to an Epicurean with talk of dreams the reason for my avoidance was surely more unreasonable than the reason itself. So I said nothing to deny their opinion, though I did tease Alexander a little, for he was a man of parts and considerable learning.

TABLE-TALK II. 3, 636

2. From this context the problem about the egg and the hen, which of them came first, was dragged into our talk, a difficult problem which gives investigators much trouble. And Sulla a my comrade said that with a small problem, as with a tool, we were rocking loose a great and heavy one, that of the creation of the world, and he declined to take part. And after Alexander had ridiculed the inquiry on the ground that it yielded no firm solution, my relative Firmus ^b said : "Well then lend me your atoms for the moment, for if small things must be assumed to be the elements and the beginnings of large, it is likely that the egg existed first before the hen, for among sensible things the egg is indeed simple while the hen is a more intricate and complex organism. And, speaking generally, the initial cause comes first, and the seed is an initial cause ; the egg is greater than the seed on the one hand, on the other less than the creature. Indeed, as development admittedly exists between innate merit and perfected virtue, so the intermediate development in nature's passage from the seed to the living creature is the egg. Furthermore, just as in the creature the first parts to be formed, they say, are the arteries and veins, so too, it stands to reason, the egg is formed before the hen just as that which contains is formed before that which is contained. And in the arts, formless and shapeless parts are first fashioned, then afterwards all details in the figures are correctly articulated;

"And so it is likely that matter at first yields slowly to the gentle stirring of nature and produces forms that are shapeless and undefined, like eggs; later, when these forms receive shape and configuration, the living creature is produced. And just as the caterpillar exists first, then, made brittle by dryness, it bursts asunder and itself releases another creature, winged, the so-called psyche (butterfly); so in like manner the egg here exists first, as material of generation. For, in every process of change, the form from which a change is made necessarily precedes the form which results from change. Consider barkbeetles in a tree and woodworms how they grow in the wood in proportion to the decay and disintegration which moisture causes. No one could rightly claim that the thing which produced them did not exist before them and was not naturally older than they. For matter has the relation of mother or nurse to things which exist, as Plato says b; and matter is all from which whatever is created has its substance.

"What is more," he added with a laugh, "'I shall recite for men of understanding' the sacred Orphic tenet which not only declares the egg older than the hen, but also attributes to it the absolute primordiality over all things together without exception.^c As for the rest of the doctrine, 'let reverent silence prevail,' as Herodotus ^a says; for it is very much of a mystical secret. Though the world contains many kinds of creatures, there is no race, one might say, in which birth from the egg is absent. On the contrary, the egg produces countless creatures of air and sea; and land creatures, as lizards; amphibious creatures, as crocodiles; two-legged creatures, as the bird; legless, as the snake; many-legged, as the locust. It is therefore not inappropriate that in the rites of Dionysus the egg is consecrated as a symbol of that which produces everything and contains everything within itself."

3. When Firmus finished what he had to say, Senecio pointed out that the last item of his imagery was first to tell against him. "For you fail to notice, Firmus," he continued, "that instead of the proverbial door ^b you have opened up the world, to your own despite. The world in fact pre-exists everything, for it is the most complete of all things, and it stands to reason that the complete is naturally earlier than the incomplete, as the perfect pre-exists the defective and the whole the part. For it is not reasonable to hold that the part exists if that of which it is a part does not. Thus nobody says that the man is a part of the seed or that the hen is a part of the egg; rather we say that the egg is a part of the hen and the seed a part of the man, for egg and seed come into being after hen and man respectively and have their birth in them, then pay back their genesis as a debt to nature. For things are in need of their own kind, and therefore it is natural for them to wish to make such another as was that from which they have been separated. Indeed, the seminal principle a is defined as product in need of production of its own kind, and nothing is in need of what has not come into being and is not.

It is undoubtedly to be seen that eggs have a natural constitution which lacks the frame and structure possessed by animals, as well as such organs and vessels as these possess. Hence an earth-born egg is not on record, but the poets say even of the egg whence came the sons of Tyndareüs^b that it appeared as fallen from heaven. Yet the earth in our own time produces creatures complete in themselves and perfect, -- mice in Egypt ^c and everywhere snakes and frogs and cicadas,-as the result of the presence of a foreign and extrinsic initial cause and power. In Sicily in the time of the Slave War,^d when a quantity of blood and unburied corpses had rotted on the ground, a multitude of locusts burst forth, scattered abroad everywhere on the island, and destroyed the grain. These creatures, then, grow from the earth, and take their nourishment, and from nourishment create a seminal residue ^e which causes them to turn to each other for pleasure, and coupled in intercourse some, in producing offspring, are naturally oviparous, some naturally viviparous. And in this it is very clear that, though they take their own first origin from the earth, they then perform their own acts of procreation in a different manner and with each other.

" In general it is like saying ' the womb existed before the woman.' For as womb to child so in turn is the egg to the chick that is conceived in it and brought to birth. Accordingly he who raises the question how fowl came into being when the egg did not exist is in no way different from him who asks how men and women came into being before genitals and womb existed. Indeed most parts co-exist with wholes, and powers follow upon the existence of parts. activities upon powers, results upon activities. The seed and the egg are the result of the generative power of parts; accordingly they are subsequent to the creation of wholes. And consider this : just as it is impossible to have digestion of food before an animal exists, so it is impossible to have either seed or egg ; for these, I suppose, are incident to certain processes of digestion and transformation, and nature cannot possess a residue of an animal's food before the animal itself exists. Nevertheless the seed has a sort of claim to be a first principle, but the egg does not satisfy the definition of a first principle (for it does not exist first) nor does it possess the nature of a whole (for it is incomplete).

"Thus we do not say that there is no elementary principle connected with the birth of a creature, but we do say the principle of generation is that power which caused the first change in matter, the power which made union and intercourse fruitful. And we say that the egg, like blood and milk, is a product of the animal's digestion of its nourishment, for no egg has ever been seen to form out of mud, but its formation and production take place in a living creature alone. Yet countless are the living creatures which are self-produced. One need cite only the eel. For many eels have been caught, yet nobody has ever seen one with either seed or egg a; but even if one draws off the water in a place and scrapes up all the mud, eels are produced alive when water collects again.^b Whatever, then, is in need of another for birth, must necessarily have come into being later ; and what even now can be formed otherwise apart from another, this must have priority in the origin of creation. For our discussion is concerned with that first creation. Birds now prepare nests before they lay their eggs and women make ready baby-garments before the birth of their children, but you would not say that nest existed before egg and garments before children. 'For earth does not imitate woman,' says Plato, ° ' but woman earth,' as indeed does each of the other females. So it is likely that the first creature was born from earth, fully grown and self-sufficient in the perfection and strength of its parent, the process of birth requiring no such organs, sheaths, and vessels as nature because of weakness now contrives and devises in the parent."

Whether wrestling is the oldest of the sports ^a Speakers: Lysimachus, Plutarch, Sosicles, Philinus

WE were celebrating the victory of Sosicles of Coronê,^b who had won the prize over all the poets at the Pythia. The gymnastic contests being near, most of the conversation concerned the wrestlers, for it so happened that many famous ones had come. And Lysimachus,^c an epimeletes of the Amphictyons who was present, said that he had recently heard a grammarian show that wrestling, on the evidence even of the word, was the oldest of all sports, for it is reasonable to assume (he said) that the more recent institutions make use of terms established for the older. For example, one says that the pipe is "tuned' and the notes of the pipe one calls by the term signifying " strokes," these locutions being taken from the lyre. And so one calls " palaestra " the place in which all athletes exercise, the inference being that wrestling (palé) occupied it first before sharing it with sports subsequently invented.

I said that this was not strong evidence; for the palaestra (I continued) is not named for wrestling because this is the oldest of the sports, but because it alone of the forms of gymnastic contests happens to require clay, dusting-pit, and ring; for it is not at running nor at boxing that one toils away in the palaestra, but at wrestling and at the roll-and-tumble of the pancratium, which is indeed a clear mixture of boxing and wrestling. "And besides," I said, "how does it make sense that wrestling, which is the most skilful and cunning of sports, is at the same time the oldest too? For necessity produces first what is simple, artless, and accomplished by force rather than systematic skill." When I had spoken, Sosicles said, "You are right, and I'll offer you confirmation with an etymology, for 'wrestling' ($pal\hat{e}$) seems to me to be derived from paleucin, which means 'to trick,' to overthrow by deceit."

And Philinus said," It seems to me to be derived from palaiste, ' palm,' for it is principally with this part of the hand that wrestlers operate, as, on the contrary, boxers do with the fist (pugmé); so the one activity is called 'boxing' (pugme), the other 'wrestling ' (pale). And there is another possibility : since the poets say 'besprinkle' (palunai) for 'dusting' and 'powdering,' of which we see wrestlers (palaistai) make much use, it is possible also in this way to derive the true meaning of the word. Consider again," he said, "is it not the task of runners to distance each other as much as possible, to put the maximum amount of space between each other? And boxers a are not allowed by referees to clinch, however eager they may be; it is only the wrestlers we see laying hold of each other and embracing each other,-most parts of the contest, frontal and lateral attacks, frontal and lateral stances, bring them together and mix them up with each other. Clearly the inference is that

Why Homer always arranges a series of athletic sports with boxing first, then wrestling, and last racing

Speakers: Lysimachus, Timon, Menecrates, Plutarch, others

1. WHEN these words had been spoken and we had praised Philinus, Lysimachus again said, "What could one say was the first athletic contest, then? Was it the foot-race, as at Olympia?...." [a lacuna of uncertain length] "... here among us they introduce the contestants sport by sport, men wrestlers after boy wrestlers, and likewise for boxers and pancratiasts; but there the men are called in only when the boys are through. But consider whether it is not rather Homer who displays the temporal order; for always in his works boxing is listed first among the gymnastic sports, wrestling second, and racing last." Then Menecrates ^b of Thessaly said in astonishment, "Heracles, how much escapes us! If you have any of his verses at hand, do not grudge us the recollection of them."

"Well," said Timon, "it rings in everyone's ears, if I may say so, that the athletic contests at the funeral games of Patroclus follow this order. The Poet has made Achilles say to Nestor, consistently these sports seemed to me to mimic warfare and to train for battle; indeed, the race in armour is presented after all the rest,^a so testifying that military fitness is the aim of athletics and competition. Also the fact that victorious athletes, as they enter the city, are permitted to destroy and throw down a part of the walls, has some such meaning : a city which possesses men able to fight and conquer has no great need of walls. In Lacedaemon there was a specially chosen place in the battle-line for those who had won the victor's wreath in the Games, namely, to fight stationed beside the king himself b; and among animals the horse alone participates in crown and contest because it alone is fitted by nature and training to accompany fighters and to go to war together with them.

"If my statement of the analogy is right so far," I continued, "let us consider the matter further. The first task of fighters is to strike out and to defend themselves. And their next task, when they are now met in hand-to-hand conflict, is to strain body against body and overthrow each other. By this especially, it is reported, the Spartans at Leuctra were overpowered by our men who were practised wrestlers ^c; and so it is that in Aeschylus one of the men-ofarms is called 'a weighty wrestler-in-armour '^d and Sophocles somewhere said of the Trojans that they are 'lovers of the horse, drawers of the bow,' and 'wrestlers with a clanging shield.'^e And finally the soldier's third task is to run away when beaten and to pursue when winning. It is reasonable, therefore, for boxing to lead off the list, for wrestling to have second place, and for racing the last, because boxing mimics attack and defence, wrestling the twisting and struggling of close-quarter combat, and in the foot-race one practises the art of fleeing the battlefield and of pursuing those who do so."

QUESTION 6

Why the fir and the pine and trees like them are not grafted ª

Speakers : Crato, Philo, Soclarus

1. Soclarus,^b while entertaining us in his gardens bordered by the Cephissus River, showed us trees which had been fancified in all sorts of ways by what is called grafting; we saw olives growing upon mastic trees and pomegranates upon the myrtle; and there were oaks which bore good pears, plane trees which had received grafts of apples, and figs grafts of mulberries, and other mixtures of trees mastered to the point of producing fruit. Then the rest of the company began to tease Soclarus for raising, as they said, classes and specimens more marvellous than the sphinxes and chimaeras of the poets; but Crato ^c proposed that we discuss the question of the cause why the evergreens alone of plants do not naturally accept such mixtures, for (he said) neither konos^a nor cypress, pine or fir, does one see supporting a scion of another species.

2. Philo said in answer, "The learned have an account of the matter, Crato, and farmers confirm it. For they say that oil is inimical to plants, and what plant you like, touched with oil, would very quickly perish ^b-just like bees. The trees mentioned are naturally fat and full of sap, so that they ooze pitch and resin; when they are struck, they collect in the cuts a juice, as it were from within themselves; the kindling-wood split from them emits an oily liquid, and the fatty substance in it glitters; and so it is that they are bad mixers with other woods, like oil itself." When Philo finished, Crato advanced his notion that the nature of the bark also contributed to this end; for (he said) since the bark is thin and dry, it does not offer the scion an environment maintaining life, nor does it cleave to the scion, as do moist and soft bark-like substances, bedding it in the parts beneath the bark that receive it."

3. Soclarus himself said that one who spoke thus possessed no mediocre power of observation, seeing that it is necessary for the plant used as stock for another kind to be easily changed so that it may be dominated $^{\circ}$ and assimilated and transform for the scion the nourishment in itself. "Indeed, we first break up the earth and soften it so that, having been tilled, it may undergo a transformation by reason of its adaptability and cling to what we plant, for tight, hard earth undergoes transformation with difficulty. But these trees, their wood being light, do not make combinations because they are not dominated nor do they undergo transformation. Further," he continued, "it is quite clear that the stock to be grafted fulfils the function of soil for the scion; soil and stock must be fertile and productive, and so they select the most fruitful of plants and insert the scions in them, much like putting infants out to nurse with women who have abundant milk. But fir and cypress and all such trees are niggardly and ungenerous with their fruit, as we see. For just as those who are fleshy and heavy are for the most part childless (because they use up their nourishment on their bodies and do not create from it a surplus for seed),^a so such trees, having the enjoyment of their nourishment all spent on themselves, thrive and increase in size, but some bear no fruit and others bear fruit that is small and slow to ripen. Accordingly, one must not be amazed if another's does not grow in what nourishes poorly even its own."

Speakers : Chaeremonianus, Plutarch, others

1. ONCE, when small fish of all sorts were served to us, Chaeremonianus^b of Tralles pointed out one with a sharp, elongated head and said that the echeneïs resembled it; he had seen (he said) the echeneïs while sailing off Sicily and had been amazed at its power, for during the course of the voyage it had been responsible for no little loss of speed and delay until the look-out had caught it sticking to the outer face of the vessel's hull. At this, some laughed at Chaeremonianus for accepting a mythical and unbelievable fabrication; others chatted about the " antipathies " c; and one could hear much else and also the following about things antipathetic : the sight of a ram stops a mad elephant; if you point an oak twig at a viper and touch it, the viper is brought to a standstill; a wild bull is quieted and made gentle if bound to a fig-tree d; amber moves and attracts all light things, except basil and whatever is wet with oil; the loadstone does not attract iron rubbed with garlic. Indeed these things are subject to a clear test, but it is hard (they said) to determine the cause, if not altogether impossible.

2. I remarked that all this avoided the question rather than explained the cause. "Let us reflect," I continued, "that many things essentially accidental wrongly get the reputation of being causes,—as if, for example, one should think that the vine's crop is ripened by the flowering of the chaste tree [Agnus castus] because, as they say,

The chaste tree flowers and the grapes get ripe," or that the snuff which appears on lamps makes the atmosphere muggy and cloudy, or that crookedness of the nails is the cause rather than a symptom of internal ulcer. As each of these, then, accompanies the condition and is produced by the same causes, so there is one cause, I said, both for the ship's sailing slowly and for attracting to itself the echeneïs; for when a ship is sound and not exceedingly waterlogged, its keel naturally glides lightly through the sea, cleaving the wave which easily parts and makes way for the clean wood; but when a ship is thoroughly soaked with water and accumulates much seaweed and encrustation of laver, its hull offers greater resistance, and the sea, meeting the impediment of the encrustation, does not let the ship pass easily. And so it is that hulls are scraped to clean laver and seaweed off the wood, and it is likely enough

QUESTION 8

Why horses bitten by wolves are said to be mettlesome Speakers : Plutarch's father, Plutarch, others

SEVERAL gentlemen said that the term lycospades applied to horses is derived from "wolf-bit," for this is the type of bit used to control horses that are mettlesome and hard to hold ; but father, a skilful man indeed at finding an argument and one who always possessed the very best horses, said that colts attacked by wolves, if they escape, turn out to be fine, swift horses and are called lycospades ("wolf-bitten"). When many of the company testified to the truth of his statement of the matter. he proposed the question of the reason why this mischance makes horses more mettlesome and spirited. Most of the talk of the company was to the effect that the experience engenders in the horses fear, not spirit; they become timid and skittish at everything, and so are sudden and quick in their movements, like net-shy wild animals. For my part, I said that one must consider whether the fact is not the opposite of what is thought to be the case. Actually colts do not become faster runners by escaping harm when attacked by wild animals, but they would not have escaped unless they had been

QUESTION 9

Why sheep bitten by wolves have a sweeter flesh, but a wool which breeds lice

Speakers : Patrocleas, Plutarch, others

AFTER the preceding conversation, our inquiry turned to sheep which have been bitten by wolves; these are said to supply the sweetest flesh, but a wool which breeds lice. And Patrocleas, a relative of mine, offered what seemed a not bad explanation of the sweetness, namely, that the bite of the animal makes the flesh tender. The fact is (he continued) the wolf's temper is so very hot and fiery that the hardest of bones melt and dissolve in its belly and so the flesh of sheep bitten by wolves decomposes more quickly than that of others. About the wool we were in doubt : perhaps the wool does not breed the lice but evokes them out of the animal, separating the flesh by means of a kind of lacerating roughness or characteristic heat; and this power is generated in the wool (we reasoned) because even the hair of the slaughtered sheep is changed by the bite and temper a of the wolf.

And observation supported theory ; for we know that some hunters and cooks fell animals with one blow, so that the victims lie lifeless, while others scarcely succeed in killing them with many blows; and some, more amazingly still, with their knife inject into their victim the quality of quick decomposition, so that the meat is not preserved even for one day a; but others kill not less quickly than these, yet no such thing happens to the flesh of the slaughtered animals, which continues for a time in a good state of preservation. And we know that Homer implies that changes conditioned by the manner of the killing and death of animals extend to their skins, their hair, and their claws or hooves, for in regard to skins and hides he has the habit of saving and each man at the sacrifices was allotted his share of the meal. This was wonderfully pleasing to some, but others blamed the practice as unsociable and vulgar and thought the dinners ought to be restored again to the customary style when my term as archon was over. " For in my opinion," said Hagias,ª " we invite each other not for the sake of eating and drinking, but for drinking together and eating together, and this division of meat into shares kills sociability and makes many dinners and many diners with nobody anybody's dinner-companion when each takes his share by weight as from a butcher's counter and puts it before himself. Again how does placing a cup before each guest and a pitcher full of wine and his own table (as the Demophontidae^b are said to have done for Orestes) and bidding him drink without heed to the others, differ from entertaining him in the manner which now prevails, serving him meat and bread as though from his individual manger, except that no compulsion to silence lies upon us as upon those who entertained Orestes ?

"Now the fact that we do engage in conversation with each other and enjoy alike the song of a delightful harp-girl or pipe-girl is perhaps the very thing that invites the company to general fellowship; and the mixing-bowl here, limitless, is set in our midst an ever-flowing spring of delight, and its

^b Demophon was the son of Celeus whom Demeter would have immortalized by fire; either he (Athenaeus, x, 437 c-d) or his sons wished to keep Orestes before his trial from participating with others in the rites and libations of the Choes at the Anthesteria; thus was explained the custom of all drinking from separate vessels at this festival. measure of enjoyment is one's appetite; it does not, like the division of meat and bread, pride itself upon what is in fact a most unjust measure, the distribution of equal portions to men who are actually unequal in their capacities a; for the same amount is too much for a man who requires little, too little for one who requires more. It follows, friend,^b that, just as one is ridiculous who prescribes with precise weights and measures an equal amount of drugs for many sick men, so is the sort of host who brings to the same fare men neither thirsty nor hungry in the same degree and serves all alike, with an arithmetical instead of geometrical determination of what suits them.^c When we go to the grocery, we all use the same official measure, but to a dinner-party each man brings his own stomach, and it is filled quite full not by the portion equal to that of others, but by the portion which suffices it.

"Those portion-banquets of Homer we must not introduce here from the military messes of the camps, but rather emulate the kindliness of the men of long ago, who, because they respected all companionship with one's fellows, held in honour not only those who shared their hearth and roof but also those who shared their ration-measure and their meal-tub. Let us then renounce Homer's dinners; for they are dinners to leave one a bit hungry and thirsty, and the kings who preside over them are more dreadful

And the Lacedaemonians had ' distributors of meat '; the incumbents of this office were not nobodies but the foremost men; even Lysander ^e during the Asia campaign accepted from King Agesilaüs appointment as 'distributor of meat.' The custom of distributing portions of the meat was abandoned when dinners became extravagant; for it was not possible, I suppose, to divide fancy cakes and Lydian puddings and rich sauces and all sorts of other dishes made of ground and grated delicacies d; these luxurious dainties got the better of men and the custom of an equal share for all was abandoned. "'But where each guest has his own private portion, companionship perishes.'b This is true where there is not an equitable distribution; for not the possession of one's own, but the taking of another's and greed for what is common to all began injustice and strife; this the laws hold in check by limiting and moderating private rights, and their very name they owe to their office and power of equitable distribution in regard to what is common to all. Otherwise, don't count it right for the host to assign us each a crown, couches, and places; but, if someone come bringing his mistress or a harp-girl to the party, don't think it proper for ' all possessions of friends to be common,' c in order that 'community of everything' may prevail, as Anaxagoras ^d had it. Private possession in such matters does not disturb the general fellowship, and this is due to the fact that the most important characteristics of a gathering and those worth most serious attention are in fact common, namely, conversation, toasts, and good fellowship; and so let us stop dishonouring the goddesses of Portion, and 'Lot, child of Luck' as Euripides calls him,^e for he gives pre-eminence neither to wealth nor to glory, but, as he chances to fall, now this way, now that, he makes proud the poor and humble man,

TABLE-TALK BOOK THREE

WHEN the poet Simonides at some drinking-party, my dear Sossius Senecio, saw a guest sitting in silence and holding no conversation with anyone, he said, "Sir, if you are a fool, you are doing a wise thing; but if wise, a foolish thing." As Heraclitus ^a remarks, "it is containly better to conceal ignorance,"— and it's a task to do so in the relaxation of drinking,

Which sets a man to sing, though he be wise Indeed; and starts him dancing, softly laughing; And saying words that better were unsaid—^b where the poet shows, I think, the difference between exhilaration and drunkenness.^c For song, laughter, and dancing are characteristic of men who drink wine in moderation; but babbling and talking about what is better left in silence is at once the work of actual intoxication and drunkenness. Hence Plato,^d too, holds that most men show their real natures most shows that he understands wine's loquacity and its engendering of much talk. The fact is there is no way of getting to know a man who eats and drinks in silence ; but, since drinking leads to talk, and talking involves further the laying bare of much that is otherwise hidden, drinking together does give men a chance to get some understanding of each other. It follows that one can reproach Aesop ^b rather severely : "Why, sir, are you looking for those windows through which one man will discern another's mind? For wine reveals us and displays us by not allowing us to keep quiet; on the contrary, it destroys our artificial patterns of behaviour, taking us completely away from convention's tutorship, so to speak." Aesop and Plato, then,-and any other in need of a method of examination,-find wine useful for this purpose; but those who are under no compulsion to cross-question each other or to catch each other out, but merely want friendly entertainment, bring to their meetings such topics of conversation and such talk as conceal the mean parts of the soul; the best and most civilized part renews its courage, going onward, as it were, to its proper meadows and pastures shepherded by literature and learning.° And so I have produced for you this third collection of ten topics of

Whether flower-garlands should be used at drinking-parties Speakers : Ammonius, Plutarch, Erato, Trypho

1. For garlands ^a also were once the subject of our conversation. The party was at Athens where the musician Erato,^b after a sacrifice to the Muses, was entertaining rather a large number of guests. Now when garlands of all kinds were offered us after dinner, and we put garlands of roses round our heads instead of laurel. Ammonius e teased us a bit for doing so, saying that garlands of flowers were quite girlish and more suitable for maids and women at play than for companies of learned and cultivated gentlemen. "And I am astonished at Erato here for hating the use of the chromatic scale in songs and censuring our fine Agathon,^d the first (so people say) to introduce and blend chromatic music into tragedy when he produced the Mysoi, and yet Erato himself, as you see, has filled our party full of different kinds of flowery colours; and the extravagance and luxury he shuts out when experienced through our ears he

For, as guests whom friends, themselves invited, bring along with them to a dinner-party receive by the usage of polite society the same welcome as the invited (for example, Aristodemus whom Socrates brought to Agathon's party),^b but if a man comes quite on his own, the door must be shut against him, just so the pleasures concerned with food and drink, made welcome by nature because they follow the natural appetites, have a place at our dinnerparties, but for the rest, uninvited and unreasonable luxuries, there is no place left."

2. At this the young men, who were unused to Ammonius, were much embarrassed and quietly began to take off their garlands, but because I knew that Ammonius had tossed the topic into our midst for an exercise in discussion, I turned to Trypho,^o the physician, and said, "Either it is right for you, Sir, to lay aside, along with us, casion, in how many ways garlands of flowers benefit us in drinking." Erato interrupted, saying, " Are we indeed decided to receive no pleasure which fails to bring a useful contribution, but even in our merrymaking fret about what we experience without profit ? At perfume and purple clothing, because of their excessive costliness, we quite properly look askance as deceitful garments and unguents (to use the foreigner's a phrase); but do not natural colours and scents have a simplicity and purity exactly like that of fruit? The fact is, I am afraid it's rather silly to cull and enjoy the condiments nature provides and yet scorn the scents and colours which the seasons bring if they do not contribute something needful, scorning them simply because pleasure and delight flower in them. For I think, on the contrary, that if nature has made nothing without purpose ^b (as you claim, I believe), it is for pleasure's sake that she has made what by their nature only serve to delight us and possess no other useful quality. Consider how growing plants have leaves for the protection of their fruit ° and for supporting within limits the changes of heat and cold; but there is no use for the flower while it lasts, except that it offers us, if we avail ourselves of it, a delightful scent to smell and a sweet sight to see, for flowers emit wonderful scents and open up a tapestry of inimitable colours and hues. But when leaves are plucked, how the plants suffer and are distressed; a kind of ulcerlike blight comes upon them and an ugly bareness; and we must, it seems, not only 'rigorously refrain from using the leaves of the laurel' (to borrow Empedocles's words),ª but also must spare all other trees and not array ourselves by disarraying them, violently stripping their leaves contrary to nature. But picking flowers is like harvesting grapes, it harms nothing-on the contrary, if one does not gather them when they bloom, they wither and drop off. Those who weave garlands of leaves rather than flowers seem to me to use plants as illogically as outlanders use their domestic animals when they employ their hides for clothing rather than their wool. This, then, is my contribution to the garland trade. I am no literary man to be expected to remember poems where we read of old-time victors in the games wearing crowns of flowers, except that I do seem to recollect that the garland of roses is dedicated to the Muses, for Sappho spoke to some uncultivated and ignorant woman thus:

> Dead shall you lie, for you have no share Of the roses that come from Pieria.^b

3. Then Trypho took up the conversation and said that the ancients neglected none of these matters, because, of course, much of their art of medicine depended upon the medicinal properties of plants. " Proof of this are the firstfruits which even now the Tyrians still bring to Agenorides and the Magnetes to Cheiron, a said to be the first two practitioners of medicine,-for the gifts are roots and plants with which these two used to treat the sick. And Dionysus was considered a pretty good physician not only for his discovery of wine, a very powerful and very pleasant medicine, but also for bringing into good repute ivy, which is quite opposed to wine in its action, and for teaching his celebrants to wear crowns of ivy that they might suffer less distress, since ivy by its coldness checks intoxication.^b Some plant names also document the ancients' search for knowledge about these matters. The hazel (karua) they so named because it gives off a heavy and soporific (karôtikon) exhalation harmful to those who lie beneath it, and the narcissus they called by this name because it dulls the nerves and induces a narcotic heaviness,° -which is the reason why Sophocles has called it

Now one can find very many other things which owe their names to their properties, but even those I have mentioned suffice to document the study and experience upon which the ancients based their use of drinking-party garlands. For pure wine, when it attacks the head and severs body from mind's control, distresses a man; and the exhalations of flowers are a wonderful help against this and protect the head against drunkenness as walls protect a citadel against attack-for warm flowers by their gentle relaxing action open the body's ducts $(poroi)^d$ and give the wine a vent; and those which are soothingly cool check the fumes by their temperate touch, as for example the garland made of violets and roses, for the scent of both flowers diminishes and restrains headaches. The flower of henna, the saffron, and the hazelwort lull drinkers into an untroubled sleep, for they have a mild and gentle effluence ^e which quietly disperses the distempers and exasperations of those who drink freely, with the result that they become calm and the effects of intoxication are blunted and assimilated. The scents of some flowers, as they disperse upward about the brain, clean out the conduits (porol) of the organs of sense, and by their warmth thin and easily separate the humours without violence and shock, and warm the brain, which is cold by nature. That is certainly why men called the wreaths of flowers they hung around their necks "fumigators" (hypothymides)^a and anointed their breasts with the perfumes from them. Alcaeus ^b witnesses to the practice when he utters the command :

> Pour its perfume down upon my head, Which has suffered much, and on my greying Breast.

Thus even from there scents are caught up by the nostrils and by the influence of heat shoot up into the brain. Now garlands which hang around the neck were not called hypothymides because men thought the spirit had its billet in the heart,—for in that event they ought rather to have been called epithymides, but, as I say, their name is due to the fumigating property of the effluence from their flowers. We must not be astonished that the effluences of garlands have such great power; indeed, it is a matter of record that even the shade of a yew kills men who sleep in it, especially when the tree is bursting into flower; and it has happened to men engaged in gathering the poppy's juice that they fell into a faint if they did not protect themselves against the exhalation streaming from the poppy. And those who only take into their hands the herb called madwort—and some simply by looking at it—are relieved of hiccupping; the herb is said also to be good for flocks of sheep and goats when planted beside their folds. And the rose has been so named, I suppose, because it gives off a great stream (rheuma)^a of scent; this too is the reason why it withers very quickly. In its action the rose is cooling, but in appearance fiery which is not unreasonable, for its heat glows faintly round the surface of the rose, pushed outward by the cold of its interior."

Concerning ivy, whether its nature is hot or cold ^b Speakers : Plutarch, Ammonius, Erato, Trypho

1. WE praised Trypho, and Ammonius remarked with a smile that it was improper for him by counterargument to kick aside so rich and flowery a speech as if it were a garland. "Except," he continued, "that I do not understand how ivy has come to be connected with coldness and acquire the reputation of mitigating the effect of strong wine. For it is a rather hot plant and a fiery one; its berries, mixed with wine, inflame the wine and make it intoxicating and deleterious. And people say that a twig of it, when pulled, becomes warped like wood in fire. And snow, which so frequently stays for many days on other plants, very quickly vanishes from ivy; what is more, in the vicinity of ivy snow is quite swiftly destroyed and melted by the plant's heat.

"The best evidence in support of my opinion is to be found in a story reported by Theophrastus.ª When Alexander ordered Harpalus to plant Greek trees in the parks in Babylon and to be sure to combine leafy woodland shade-trees among the planted specimens, -for those places are blazing hot,-it was the ivy alone which the soil refused to accept, though Harpalus took much trouble and was persistent in his effort. But the ivy withered and died, for, being itself hot and being combined with a hot soil, it did not accept acclimatization, but rejected it. Indeed, excessive amounts of a given property destroy it utterly; that is why opposites are more attracted to each other, and cold is heat-loving, heat cold-loving. This explains the fact that resinous, pitch-yielding trees, particularly pine and fir, grow in mountainous terrain exposed to wind and snow.

"Apart from this, my dear Trypho, frost-sensitive, cold-natured trees shed their leaves because they have a small amount of weak heat, which diminishes and forsakes the tree; the olive, the laurel, and the cypress are kept evergreen by their oil and their heat, as is the ivy. And so our beloved Dionysus, who frankly named unmixed wine 'intoxicant' and himself 'Intoxicator,' ^b did not introduce ivy as a specific against drunkenness or as something inimical to wine. Rather it seems to me that, just as lovers of wine, if the grape is not available, use beer ^a or a cider, and others make date-palm wine, so too Dionysus, when in wintertime he wanted a garland made from the vine and saw the vines stripped and leafless, welcomed the very similar ivy. And to be sure, it imitates the characteristics of the vine : its stem which twists and falls in its course, the freshness and disorderly profusion of its foliage, and especially its berry clusters which resemble a heavy setting of ripening grapes. Furthermore, even if ivy is in some degree a specific for drunkenness, I shall claim that its heat makes it so by causing the conduits (poroi) of the body to open or rather by aiding in the assimilation of the wine-and this I grant in order that Dionysus may remain a physician ^b for your sake, Trypho."

2. Trypho remained silent considering how he might answer this. Erato, however, appealed to each of us young men, urging us to help Trypho out or to put aside our garlands; and Ammonius assured us a safe-conduct, for he would not argue against whatever we might say. Thus, when Trypho too requested us to take up the argument, it was I who replied, saying that it was not my task to show that ivy is cold, but Trypho's, for he made much use of it as a cooler and an astringent. "And what has been said," I continued, " about ivy mixed with wine causing intoxication is not true, for one cannot call the condition it induces in drinkers intoxication, but a disorder and a derangement like that induced by henbane and many similar things which excite the intellect to madness. The pulling-of-the-twig argument is unreasonable too, for such unnatural effects are no part of natural powers. Actually, wood is twisted, bent, and warped by fire violently drawing water out of it. It is the nature of innate heat, on the contrary, to strengthen and to sustain. Consider whether the convolutions of the ivy and its clinging to the ground are not rather produced by a certain weakness and coldness of body as the plant meets a succession of curbs and checks-like a traveller weak with fatigue who often sits down to rest, then continues on his way. And so ivy needs a support to twine about, being unable to hold itself up and guide itself because it lacks heat, one property of which is upward motion. Snow melts and flows off the plant because of the moisture of its leaf, for snow is a collection of many small globules, is therefore porous, and water cuts through it and destroys it. This is why snow melts away not less in very cold and wet places than in places exposed to the sun. That ivy is an evergreen with 'never-failing leaves,' as Empedocles says,^a is not a sign of heat, nor indeed is loss of foliage a sign of coldness-at least myrtle and maidenhair, which are not reckoned among hot plants, but among cold, are evergreens. Now some think that plants retain their foliage because they have an even mixture of heat and cold; but Empedocles claims for a cause, in addition to this, also a certain symmetry of the vessels (poroi) of their vascular system, which accordingly admit nourishment in an orderly and even manner, so that a sufficient amount is assimilated. This is not true of deciduous plants because of the openness of the vessels (poroi) in the upper part of their vascular system and the narrowness of the vessels in the lower part, for the latter do not transmit sufficient nourishment and the former do not retain the little they have received but pour it out all at once, like water in unevenly diked irrigationditches; but plants which drink in sufficient and suitable nourishment resist leaf-fall and remain vigorous and green.

" 'Ivy planted in Babylon rejected and refused acclimitization,' you say. Well done by this noble plant, to be unwilling to live among barbarians, seeing that it was a neighbour and a companion of the Boeotian god ! And well done not to emulate Alexander in becoming a renegade among those races, but to fight against expatriation and flee ! And the reason was not heat in the ivy, but rather its coldness, which does not endure the opposite temperature ; for the quality peculiar to a given property is not destructive, but receptive and nourishing—as, for example, dry soil nourishes thyme, though the plant is hot. And heavy that many of the well-to-do fill wineskins full of water and sleep on them to keep cool."

QUESTION 3 •

Why women are least liable to intoxication and old men most quickly liable

Speakers : Florus, Sulla

FLORUS expressed amazement that Aristotle in his Concerning Drunkenness did not work out the element of causation when he wrote that old men were especially susceptible to drunkenness and women least susceptible, though it was not his habit to neglect such a matter.^b Florus then proposed that the company consider the question-the occasion was a dinner of his friends. Sulla replied that one part of the problem threw light upon the other. If we should rightly determine the cause where women are concerned, there would be no further need of much speculation where old men are concerned, for their natures are very emphatically opposites : moist and dry, smooth and rough, soft and hard. "The first thing about women," he continued, "I take to be this, that they possess a moist temperament which, being a component of the female, is responsible for her delicate, sleek, smooth flesh, and for her menses; wine, therefore, when it falls into a great amount of liquid, is overcome, loses its edge, and becomes completely insipid and watery. Furthermore, one can get some hint of the causation even from Aristotle himself; for he says that people who drink all in one gulp, without drawing a breath,-a manner of drinking the ancients called ' tossing it off,'-are the people least apt to fall into a state of intoxication, since the serts that susceptibility to intoxication in old men is due to their lack of heat and in the very young to their superabundance of heat. wine does not linger in them, but proceeds through the body and is pushed out by the force of the draught.^a And we usually see women drinking in this fashion. Again, it is likely that the female body, on account of the constant drawing down of fluids for menstruation, has come to be provided with many passages and cut up as if by dikes and channels; and the wine doubtless falls into these, is quickly eliminated, and does not attack the body's sovereign parts, from the disturbance of which drunkenness results.

"As for 'old men' the word itself (gerontes) seems to me to be the first thing to indicate that they are in need of proper moisture, for 'old men' are so called, not as 'flowing into earth' (rheontes eis gên), but as individuals now become 'soil-like' and 'earthy' (geôdeis, geêroi) in their condition; their stiffness and hardness, and their roughness besides, show the dryness of their substance. Therefore, when they drink, it is likely that the wine is soaked up, for their bodies because of dryness are like sponges; and then the wine lies there and afflicts them with its heaviness. For just as flood-waters run off from compact soils and do not make mud, but are soaked up in greater degree by soils of loose texture, so in the bodies of old men wine lingers on, attracted by the dryness there. Apart from these considerations, one can observe that the characteristics of intoxication are those peculiar to the nature of old men, for the characteristics of intoxication are very clear : trembling limbs and stammering tongue, excessive talk-ativeness, irascible temper, forgetfulness, wandering mind. Most of these exist even in healthy old men and need but a slight turn of the scale, an accidental disturbance, to bring them out. Consequently, intoxication in an old man does not produce symptomatic characteristics peculiar to the individual, but simply intensifies characteristics common to all old men. A proof of this is the fact that nothing is more like an old man than a young man drunk."

QUESTION 4 ª

Whether women are colder in temperament than men or hotter

Speakers : Apollonides, Athryïtus, Florus

1. THAT, then, was what Sulla had to say. And Apollonides,^b the tactician, remarked that he accepted the statement about old men; but in regard to women, it seemed to him that we had failed to take account of the quality of coldness in their constitution and that by means of this they nullify the effect of the hottest wine and remove its kick and fire. When the likelihood of this was agreed upon, Athryītus of Thasos, a physician, induced us to linger on the inquiry by saying that there are people who assume that women are not cold, but hotter than men; and there are others in turn who consider wine not hot, but actually cold.

2. Florus expressed astonishment, and Athryītus replied, "The question of wine I yield to this gentleman," pointing to me (and actually we happened to have been talking about this subject a few days earlier), "but with regard to women," he continued,

"their heat is thought to be proved, in the first place, by the lack of hair on their bodies, for it is heat which consumes the excess of nourishment which, when it is present in abundance, is converted into hair; and secondly by their great amount of blood, which, it seems, is a source of the heat in the bodywomen have so much of it that it would burn them up and utterly consume them except for the quick recurrence of their periods of menstruation. Thirdly, the following practice at burials proves that females are hotter than males : 'those who tend to the customary procedures for disposal of the dead, it is said, place with every ten male corpses one female and set it on fire, for the flesh of women possesses a kind of resinous and oily quality, so that the female corpse becomes kindling-wood for the others. Again, if heat is a factor of fertility a and girls become lustful at an earlier age than boys and are earlier excited to sexual activity, this fact would be no weak demonstration of their heat. A still greater and more persuasive demonstration is the fact that women easily support cold and winter weather, for most of them are less easily chilled than men and undoubtedly have need of little clothing."

3. "But the very instances you employ," said Florus, "refute your opinion, I think. In the first place, women resist cold better because often like is not easily affected by like. And, in the second place, it seems that woman's seed has never had an active part at all in generation,—the female's coldness is responsible,—but merely offers matter and nourishment to the seed from the male.^a Moreover women cease bearing children much sooner than men stop begetting them. Female corpses burn more efficiently because of fat, which seems to be the coldest constituent of the body; at any rate, young men devoted to exercise are least fleshy. And the monthly menstruation is indicative not of a quantity of blood, but of corrupt and diseased blood; for blood's unassimilated and excrementitious part has no position and no structure in the body and so is eliminated by its lack of vitality, its faint heat causing it to be completely dull and murky. The fact that women are apt to be seized with chills and shivering during their menstrual periods shows that the blood which has been set in motion and is now being eliminated from the body is cold and unassimilated. As for the lack of hair on a woman's body, who can say that it is a consequence of heat rather than of cold, seeing that the hottest parts of the body are hairy ? For all such growths are thrust out by heat, which furrows and holes the surface of the body. And the smoothness of women is due to the fact that their flesh is compacted by cold; that the flesh of women is more compact than that of men you must learn, my dear Athryïtus, from those who are still going to bed with women who perfume and oil their bodies; for the men are themselves filled with the ointment by sleeping with their women, even if they do not touch their companions or meddle with them, because a man's body by reason of its heat and open texture attracts the ointment "

Whether wine is on the cold side in its power Speakers : Athryïtus, Plutarch, Florus

1. "Now certainly," continued Florus, "we have made a manful assault upon both sides of the discussion about women. Now for wine ! I should like to know what made you suspect that it is cold." I replied : " Do you actually think that this is my own theory ? " " Whose else ? " he said. And I answered: "I remember coming on Aristotle's discussion ^b also of this question, not recently but a long enough time ago. And Epicurus in his Symposium c has discussed the matter at great length. The sum of what he has to say, I think, is this : he holds that wine is not hot in an absolute sense, but has in it certain atoms productive of heat and others of cold; some of these it throws off when it comes into the body and others it attracts out of the body until it adapts itself to us, whatever our constitution and nature may be. Accordingly, some men become thoroughly hot when drinking, others experience the contrary.'

2. "This," said Florus, "carries us via Protagoras straight to Pyrrho^d; for it is clear that we shall go on about oil, about milk and honey, and other things in like manner and shall avoid saying about each what its nature is by defining them in terms of their mixtures and unions with each other. But how will you argue on the proposition that wine is cold?" "In just the manner," I replied, "I slipped into in the conversation the other day when compelled to extemporize. A regimen used by physicians was the first thing to occur to me; for to ailing patients in need of some tonic for stomach disorders they give nothing hot, but do provide relief by giving them wine. In like manner they stop fluxes and sweats with wine, which, no less efficiently than snow, indeed more so, checks (so it is claimed) and controls the given condition by its cooling and constricting action. And if the nature and power of wine were calorific, administering wine to sufferers from cardiac disorder would be, I think, like putting fire to snow. Next, most people assert that sleep is produced by the action of coolness, and most of the hypnotic drugs, like belladonna and opium, are refrigerants; but the depressant and torporific action of these drugs is one of very great violence, while wine cools gently. pleasantly checking and stopping movement, the difference between it and the hypnotics being a matter of degree. Thirdly, heat is generative," for through the agency of heat the generative fluid has a good flow and the spirit tension and a lusty power; but men who drink much wine are the duller at lovemaking and the semen they emit is not at all strong and efficient for procreation; on the contrary, their

Indeed, everything men experience from cold, all of it happens to them when they get drunk : trembling, heaviness, pallor, convulsive movements in the limbs, unintelligible speech, a rigidity and numbness of the sinews at the extremities,—and for most men drunkenness ends in a paralysis, when wine has completely beaten out and quenched heat. The bodily distress of those who get drunk and have a terrible hangover is cured, it seems, by immediately putting them to bed, well covered and warmed, and the next day giving them a bath, a rub-down, and such food as does not irritate the system but restores the heat scattered and dissipated from the body by the wine.

"However," I continued, "let us track thoroughly among the phenomena of our experience obscure similarities in the properties of cold and intoxiation. There need be no problem about the essential nature of intoxication; for, as it seems, (old men most certainly have a cold nature) and drunkards, as I have said, especially resemble old men : wine-lovers very soon become in fact old men, and many get bald at an early age and their hair turns gray before their prime—and all this seems to afflict such men because of a deficiency of heat. Further, some wine possesses the characteristic and the property of vinegar, and there is no extinguisher more deadly to fire than vinegar; it masters and smothers the flame best of all because of its excessive coldness. And we see physicians using vinous fruits, like pomegranates and apples, for refrigerants more than they use others. And do not people make wine ^a by mixing honey itself with rain-water and snow, since coldness because of its relationship to tartness, when it prevails, destroys the sweetness? And did not the ancients for this reason dedicate and consecrate the snake ^b among the reptiles of the earth and the ivy c among plants to the god of wine as to one who is lord of a cold and chilling power? And if it is thought to be an indication of the heat of wine that the drinking of a large quantity of it is held to be an antidote for hemlock,^d for my part I shall deny the fact and claim that this drug is incurable when mixed with wine and kills once for all those who drink it. Accordingly, it seems to be not so much a question of wine being hot because it opposes hemlock as a question of its being cold because it reinforces the action of hemlock-if it is indeed the more probable hypothesis that the coldness of hemlock rather than some other property and power of the drug is responsible for the death of those who have drunk it."

the ground that he had introduced in his Symposium^a an unseemly and unnecessary discussion about the proper time for coition. For an older man to talk about sex in the presence of youths at a dinner-party and weigh the pros and cons of whether one should make love before dinner or after dinner was, they claimed, the extreme of indecency. At this, some of our company brought up Xenophon, who, so to speak, took his guests home after dinner, not on foot, but on horseback, to make love to their wives.^b And Zopyrus the physician, who was very well acquainted with the works of Epicurus, added that they had not read Epicurus's Symposium with attention ; for Epicurus did not propose the problem as one involving a principle or a settled procedure and then proceed with his discussion of it; but he took the young men for a walk after dinner, conversed with them for the purpose of moral instruction, and restrained them from their lust on the ground that intercourse is always precarious and harmful, and affects worse those who engage in it when they have been eating and drinking. " Indeed," said he, " even if intercourse were the chief topic of his inquiry, would it be to the philosopher's credit to have refrained entirely from all consideration of the right time and hour for coition ? Would it not be better for him to engage, at the proper moment, in rational discussion of such matters ? And • would it be to his credit that he consider this stage of his discussion not inappropriate to any occasion except drinking and dining, and there shameful? On the contrary, indeed, one can blame, I think, a philo-

But among one's companions and friends, wine-cup at hand, where even the telling of a dull and silly story is suitable as wine goes round,^a how can it be shameful to say and to hear anything useful on the subject of coition? " And he continued : " For my part, by the Dog, I could wish that Zeno ^b had put his remarks on 'thigh-spreading' in the playful context of some dinner-party piece and not in his Government, a work which aims at such great seriousness."

2. This put the young men out of countenance, and they sat in silence. The rest of the company requested Zopyrus to give them an account of what Épicurus had to say about this matter, and he replied that he did not remember the particulars accurately, $\star\star$ but thought that the man feared the afflictions resulting from coition, due to the disturbance caused by our bodies entering into the tumult and turmoil of such activity. For wine is generally a brawler, an instigator of tumult, and unsettles our body from its base; and if tranquillity and sleep do not take possession of our body when it is in this condition, but the new disturbances of coition supervene, the forces which naturally tie together and cement the body are crushed and dislodged, and there is danger that the body be unseated, like a house shifted from its foundations-for the seed does not flow easily at this time, repletion blocking it, but with effort it is extracted in a clotted mass. Consequently our man says that we must engage in such activity when the body is quiet and ended are the assimilations and fluxes of the nourishment which traverses and quits the body, and must do so before the body is again in need of further nourishment. To this analysis of Epicurus one can add a physician's opinion. The fact is that the safer time for coition is during the day, when the process of digestion is now completed. Rushing on to coition after dinner is not without danger, for one does not know whether, when food has not been assimilated, an indigestion may follow the disturbance and agitation resulting from coition, and the injury thus be twice as great.

3. Olympichus took up the discussion, saying, "For my part, I very much like the retort of the Pythagorean Kleinias : in reply to the question at what time most especially ought one to have coition with a woman, he is said to have answered, 'At whatever time you happen to want most especially to suffer harm.'^a For, on the one hand, what Zopyrus has just said is reasonable enough, and, on the other, I see that the other possible time has other disadvantages and difficulties affecting the business. Our old-age postpone, fair Aphroditê.

Let us then consider, if you will, whether it is proper and fitting, or contrary to all justice, for Epicurus to deprive Aphroditê of night, to which she has indeed the strongest claim among the gods, as Menander, an authority on love, claims.⁶ Indeed, in my opinion it was a good thing to draw a veil of darkness over the pleasure of those who engage in this activity, yet do not wish to banish modesty from their eyes by making love in daylight, or to create bold, vivid, licentious but the other is filled by the clang of hammers, the chatter of saws, the early morning cries of the taxcollectors, and the proclamations of those who summon men to court or to the service of some king or magistrate. At this time the activities of pleasure vanish :

The deeds of the Cypriote Lady stop, And the joys of the young ;

No longer the thyrsus, no longer the Bacchic troops.»

For the day's concerns exert their pressure. Then the Poet ° too put none of his heroes to bed during the day either with wife or with mistress, except when he represented Paris slinking off to his wife's bosom after he had run away from his post, as much as to say that the incontinence of day-time love-making is no part of an honest husband's behaviour but a mad adulterer's. And surely the body would not suffer greater harm by coition after dinner, as Epicurus thinks it does, provided a man does not make love when he is overburdened, drunk or stuffed full to the point of bursting. For of course, if that is the case, the thing is precarious and harmful. But if a man is sufficiently himself and moderately relaxed, his body at ease and his spirit disposed, and if then after an interval he makes love, he neither causes his body great disturbance nor does he bring on any morbid excitement or unsettling of atoms, as Epicurus claims. But if he has given nature her due and has calmed himself to some degree, he will restore his system, for a new influx will occupy the parts emptied.

" It is love-making in the midst of preoccupation with affairs that is the more deserving of caution, lest mental worries and the troubles and difficulties concerned with business take hold of the body in its state of excitement and agitation and exasperate the condition because nature has failed to receive a sufficient interval for rest in between. For all men, my friend, do not possess Epicurus's leisure and equanimity,^a which has been provided in everlasting abundance by reason and philosophy. But each one of us is occupied with one struggle after another day after day,-the exercise-schools receive practically all of us,-and to these struggles it is neither good nor proper to bring one's body in this condition, that is, enervated by the fury of coition. Let it be granted that that blessed and immortal deity can himself disregard what concerns us; nevertheless, I suppose we must, in obedience to our city's law, guard carefully against rushing into a god's sanctuary and beginning the sacrifices when we have been engaged in any sexual activity a short time before. Hence it is well for us to have night and sleep intervene and after a sufficient interval and period to rise pure again as before, 'with fresh thoughts,' as Democritus says, ' for the fresh day.' QUESTION 7 ª

Why sweet new wine is least intoxicating

Speakers : Plutarch's father, Hagias, Aristaenetus, Plutarch, others

1. AT Athens people consecrate the fresh wine on the eleventh of the month Anthesterion, calling the day Pithoigia^b; and long ago, it seems, they used to pour a libation of the wine before drinking and pray that the use of the " medicine " be harmless and safe for them. Among us the month is called Prostaterios.^c and on the sixth of the month it is our custom to sacrifice to our Good Genius^d and taste the wine,—after a Westerly, for this wind especially changes and alters the wine, and wine which survives it successfully seems now certain to keep good. My father had celebrated the ritual, as was his custom, and after dinner, while the wine was being praised, he proposed to the young men e of philosophical temperament among us the examination of a saying that sweet new wine is least intoxicating. Now this seemed an incredible paradox to many, but Hagias¹ remarked that sweetness everywhere was offensive and filling, and therefore one could not easily drink a quantity of sweet new wine sufficient for intoxication, for one's appetite, once thirst was satisfied, refused more with disgust. The Poet, too (he argued), wrote recognizing that "pleasantness" differs from "sweetness"; for wine at first is "sweet" and becomes "pleasant" when the changes due to fermentation make it "dry" as it ages.

The Attic month Anthesterion might fall as early as February or as late as March.

Cheese, sweet honey, and pleasant wine,"

2. Aristaenetus of Nicaea said he recollected having read in a certain number of writings that sweet new wine mixed with other wine stops intoxication.^b And he added that some doctors recommend that those who drink too much, first vomit and then, when they are about to go to bed, soak bread in honey and eat it. If, therefore, properties of sweetness in any degree blunt the effect of wine, the fresh wine is not intoxicating, reasonably enough, until its sweetness changes.

3. Now we heartily approved the ingenuity of the young men because they did not fall upon the obvious arguments, but had a good supply of their own attempts at a solution, although the explanations lying at hand and easy to understand are the heaviness of the sweet new wine (a heaviness which, as Aristotle says,^o breaks on through the stomach) and the large amounts of gaseous and watery elements combined with the wine; of these last two, the one soon forces

Why those who are very drunk are less deranged than the so-called tipsy

Speakers: Plutarch and his father

1. "Now that we have disturbed Aristotle," said my father, "shall we attempt also to say something of our own on the subject of the 'tipsy,' so called ? For sharp indeed though Aristotle ^a was in such investigations, it seems to me that here he failed to deal adequately with causation; for he says, I believe, that the judgement of the sober man is capable of sound and realistic distinctions, that the perception of the man who drinks too much is suppressed and destroyed, and finally that the imaginative faculty of the tipsy man is still strong but his rational faculty in disorder : he judges, and judges badly, because he follows illusory appearances. But what," he concluded, " is your opinion of the matter ?"

2. "When I examined this passage of Aristotle for myself," I replied, "I found it adequate so far as causality is concerned. But if you request me to stir up something of my own, consider first whether one must attribute to the body the variation you have mentioned. Tipsy people's mind alone is disordered; the body, not yet soaked, is still the able servant of impulse. But when the body is overthrown and oppressed by the weight of intoxication, it betrays and completely neglects its impulses, for it does not advance to the point of action. The tipsy, on the contrary, with a body which joins in error, are disgraced not by the fact that they are more irrational, but by the fact that they possess greater strength to act. And if one consider the matter," I continued, " from another point of view, there is nothing to prevent the power of wine from being variable and changing in proportion to its quantity, as fire, if it is the right amount, strengthens and hardens pottery, but if an excessive amount strikes the pottery, the fire fuses it and makes it flow. Again, the beginning of spring stirs up fevers and makes them burn, but as the hot season advances, fevers abate and cease. What, then, prevents the mind, naturally roused by wine, after it has fallen into disorder and excitement, from becoming relaxed and calm again as the wine becomes excessive? At any rate, hellebore has the characteristic of causing the body distress as it begins its purging action; if, then, less than the dose be given, the drug causes distress but does not purge. And some people become more excited when they take a subnormal dose of sedatives, but sleep when they take more. It is also likely, I suppose, that this disorder which characterizes the tipsy, when it attains its height, dies down and further that the wine works as a whole toward this end, for the large quantity which has come into the body joins in burning out and consuming the mind's frenzy. For, as dirge and funereal pipe at first rouse grief and cause tears to flow, and thus by leading the soul to pity little by little remove and consume distress, so in like manner you can see that wine too, when it very much harasses and excites the full vigour of passion, quiets the mind again, and calms it, and finally, as it advances farther into drunkenness, lays it peacefully to rest."

QUESTION 9

On "Drink five or three, not four "

Speakers : Aristion, Plutarch, and Plutarch's father

1. WHEN I had said this, Aristion ^a spoke up loudly in his usual manner : "The most just and democratic of rules, one long exiled by some abstemious fashion as by a tyrant, is in sight of restitution to drinkingparties. Now just as the experts in the musical theory of the lyre assert that among ratios that of 3:2 gives the concord of the fifth, 2:1 the concord of the octave, and the concord of the fourth (which is weakest) consists in the ratio 4:3; so the musicologists of Dionysus observed three concords of wine and water, fifth, third and fourth, for in their song they say this :

2. No one attacked Aristion's remarks, for clearly his talk was play. And I invited him to take a cup as his lyre and tune it to the scale of the medley he praised. The servant came forward and was beginning to pour the wine, but Aristion declined, saying with a laugh that he was a theorist of music, not a performer. QUESTION 10 °

Why meat spoils more readily in moonlight than in sunlight

Speakers : Euthydemus, Satyrus, Moschion, Plutarch

1. EUTHYDEMUS ^c of Sunium, when entertaining us at dinner, served up a wild boar of remarkable size. When the company had expressed their astonishment at the size, he said that a much larger one he had caused to be procured had been spoiled by the moon and he was very much at a loss to know the cause, for it was not likely (he thought) that the sun, being hotter than the moon, was less effective at spoiling meat. And Satyrus ^d said, "The most astonishing thing is not perhaps this, but rather the practice of hunters. When they have killed a boar or a deer and are sending it back to town, they drive a bronze nail into the carcass to preserve it against spoilage."

2. Then when we had finished dinner and Euthydemus mentioned again his perplexity, Moschion ^e the physician remarked that spoilage was a disintegration and liquefaction of the carcass, which changed into a fluid as it decayed, and rotted flesh became completely liquefied. All heat (he pointed out), if it is gentle and mild, stirs moisture and prevents dryness; but if it is a fiery heat, it has the opposite effect of drying out flesh. These considerations clarify the problem : the moon by its gentle warmth humidifies carcasses; it is rather the sun which, because of its fiery heat, robs carcasses of their moisture. With reference to this Archilochus has written ^a in accord with nature

> I hope the Dog will wither lots of them With his keen rays !

Still clearer is what Homer said of Hector, when Apollo brought up a cloud to shade him as he lay dead.b

> Lest the strength of the sun cause the flesh On his muscles and limbs to dry up.

But the moon (he concluded) sends out rays which are weaker:

3. When Moschion had finished, I said : "This is a fine statement in almost every way, but one ought not to judge the result by the quantity and degree of heat. For we see that the sun heats less in winter, vet carcasses spoil more readily in summer, and they ought to do the opposite, if spoilage were the result of gentle heat; but actually, the more intense the heat, the faster it rots flesh. Accordingly, it is not because of a lack of heat and a weakness of heat that the moon induces spoilage in dead bodies; on the contrary, one must claim that the cause is rather a peculiarity of the stream of heat which comes from the moon. For it is obvious from the most ordinary things that all heat is not of one kind differing in degree alone, rather that the properties of fire are indeed many with no resemblance to each other. Goldsmiths use a chaff fire for working gold, physicians use a vine-twig fire to heat by degrees decoctions of drugs, and tamarisk wood seems to be most suitable for melting and moulding glass. A fuel of olive wood for sweat baths has a beneficial effect upon people's bodies, but is injurious to bath buildings and dirties their panelling and their foundation stones as it burns underneath the building ; this is the reason why conscientious commissioners do not allow concessionaries who operate bathing establishments to use olive wood for fuel, just as they refuse to let them put darnel into their furnace fire, since the fumes of this plant give the bathers headaches and induce vertigo. It is not astonishing, then, that the moon too differs from the sun, the latter sending out withering streams of heat and the former emitting streams which loosen and set in motion the moisture in bodies. Thus nurses are exceedingly careful to avoid exposing young

And we see that those who have gone to sleep in the light of the moon are hardly able to rise again, like men with senses stunned or doped, for the moisture poured through them by the moon makes their bodies heavy. The moon is also said to assist in easing child birth, when it occurs at full moon, by making the pains gentler by releasing moisture. For this reason, I take it, Artemis, who is none other than the moon, is called Locheia and Eileithyia. And Timotheüs says outright ^a

> Through the dark-blue vault of the stars And the moon who is quick to procure The delivery of children.

The power of the moon is also quite clear where inanimate bodies are concerned. Builders discard wood cut in the full moon as soft and quick to decay on account of its moisture. Farmers hurry to gather wheat from the threshing-floor at the end of the month so that, hardened by dryness, it may last for a longer time ; wheat in transport when the moon is full splits very easily because the moisture in it has made it softer. People say, too, that flour rises better at the time of the full moon ; indeed, leavening is much the same process as putrefaction, and if the proper time limit be ignored, leavening in making dough porous and light produces the same decomposition in the end. What happens to decomposing flesh is simply that it becomes spongy and liquefies as the spirit which binds it together changes to moisture. The same thing happens to air, as we see; for especially at the time of the full moon it dissolves and precipitates dew, as, I suppose, the lyrist Alcman also suggests, calling dew the daughter of air and moon when he says ^a

> Such Hersa nourishes, daughter of Zeus And Selenê divine.

Thus it is everywhere attested that moonlight has the property of producing moisture and softness.

"The bronze nail,—if actually, when driven into meat, it preserves the flesh in sounder condition, as people say,—obviously has some healing and astringent quality in itself. Indeed, bronze-rust is employed by physicians among their drugs for such purposes,^b and they record that the eyes of men who pass their time in copper-mines are benefited and those who have lost their eyelashes grow them again, for the dust which comes from the copper ore and settles upon their eyes insensibly checks discharges and dries up tears. This is why the Poet, they claim, calls bronze 'man's helper '° and 'eye-affector.'^d And Aristotle ^e says that wounds from bronze spear-heads and swords are less painful and heal more easily than those from an iron weapon because bronze has in itself something medicinal which it immediately leaves in wounds. It is obvious that whatever is astringent has the property of opposing what causes decay, and whatever heals has the property of opposing what destroys. Of course, someone might claim that the nail in being driven through collects moisture to itself, since there is always attraction to the hurt part. This is why people remark that in that area itself one sees something like a bruise and a stain; since the morbidness gathers there, it stands to reason that the rest of the flesh will remain sound."

INTRODUCTION TO BOOKS IV-VI

As in the other parts of the Symposiacs, the text of Books IV-VI depends mainly upon T, a Vienna codex, Vindobonensis graecus 148 (tenth or eleventh century). It suffers from a number of important lacunae, particularly in Book V from page 676 c 8 to 680 p 11 (cf. LCL Mor. ix, p. 3); fortunately the loss is not total, for we have copies made earlier. In addition, the exemplar from which T was copied was already defective at the end of iv. 6, where an incomplete sentence is followed by a blank in the page, and the margin has a notation to the effect that a quaternion is missing with five chapters (sic, the prefixed index to Book IV gives only the normal four remaining titles of Questions). I have constantly referred to a photostatic copy of T and one of E, a Paris manuscript (Parisinus 1672) of the early fourteenth century, to correct the published reports of T's readings everywhere and those of E where they become important. The text and apparatus are based mainly on Hubert (Teubner, Leipzig, 1938), who rarely, perhaps only two or three times to my knowledge, is found inaccurate. I have systematically consulted also the editions of J. G. Hutten (volume xi of his complete Plutarch, part 5 of the Moralia, Tübingen, 1798), whose reports of Reiske's readings I frequently adopt when Hubert fails to cite them, D. Wyttenbach (Partes 1 and 2 of Tomus III of Plutarch, Moralia, Oxford, 1797), and the earlier Teubner edition 283 in Bernardakis' Moralia, 1888–1896, as well as H. Bolkestein's Adversaria Critica. From these sources and Hartman I have sometimes derived a fuller account of manuscript readings or emendations than Hubert's; but I am aware that his judgement in omitting certain details may have been distinctly the wiser.

For brevity I have chosen to include under the notation "Turnebus" items often labelled "exemplum Turnebi." If this should prove inadequate to any reader, I wish to refer him to Hubert, whose edition is of course indispensable for scholarly purposes, rich as it is in matter not ordinarily expected of a text edition. Incidentally, I apply the term "after" in the apparatus criticus to cases where the later scholar makes a relatively slight modification of his predecessor's reading, as well as to outright adoptions.

I have accepted the judgement of those who believe that Plutarch went back to the more ancient or Attic form of Greek in using forms of $\gamma i \gamma \nu \epsilon \sigma \theta a \iota$ and $\gamma \iota \gamma \nu \omega \sigma \kappa \epsilon \iota \nu$, rather than $\gamma i \nu \epsilon \sigma \theta a \iota$ or $\gamma \iota \nu \omega \sigma \kappa \epsilon \iota \nu$. This may be considered an inconsistent policy when I do not alter forms, for instance, of $\phi \nu \lambda \dot{a} \sigma \sigma \epsilon \iota \nu$ to $\phi \nu \lambda \dot{a} \tau \tau \epsilon \iota \nu$. The evidence seems to be that our author was himself inconsistent in presenting both $\theta \dot{a} \lambda a \sigma \sigma a$ and $\theta \dot{a} \lambda a \tau \tau a$, but it is well known that manuscript evidence is unreliable. I have altered $\pi \iota \pi \lambda \dot{a} \mu \epsilon \nu os$ to $\pi \iota \mu \pi \lambda \dot{a} \mu \epsilon \nu os$, $o \dot{v} \theta \dot{\epsilon} \nu$ to $o \dot{v} \delta \dot{\epsilon}$, but keep $\eta \mu \eta \nu$ at 674 E, and with some serious doubt $\dot{\epsilon} \lambda \lambda \dot{\epsilon} \beta o \rho os$ in vi. 693 A (the influence of Hippocrates ?).

Necessarily I have not only depended on standard reference works, special studies such as the ones by Volkmann, Hartman, and Ziegler, and related investigations by Hirzel, Martin, and others, but found it useful to compare translations into Latin (Xylander as corrected and reprinted by Wyttenbach), French (Ricard), German (Kaltwasser), and English. The English translation which I have mainly consulted was that by "T. C." at the end of the seventeenth century; although once or twice I have looked into Philemon Holland's.

In Book IV the topics discussed include, after a proem on the relation between convivial parties and rational friendship, the question of the digestibility of an elaborate or varied diet (Question 1), that of truffles and other effects or alleged effects of thunder and lightning (Qu. 2), the reason for large wedding banquets (Qu. 3), the contributions of sea and land to our food supply, particularly the gourmet and health value of those of the sea (Qu. 4), the mystery of Jewish dietary practices and the astonishing importance of the pig (Qu. 5), and the equally astonishing identity of the God of the Hebrews with Dionysus (if we can believe it, considering the prevailing ignorance of evidence Plutarch did not consult !) (Qu. 6). The missing "Problems" of this book-according to the captions-concerned the order of the days of the week as compared to the order of the "planets" (note that Sun and Moon. but not Earth, are planets here, and of course the ancients did not know all our planets) (Qu. 7), the reason for wearing the seal-ring on a certain finger (Qu. 8), whether one ought to wear images of gods or of wise men on seal-rings (Qu. 9), and why women do not eat heart of lettuce (Qu. 10).

In Book V we find a proem of psychological nature both in the original and in our sense of "psychological," followed by discussions of the contrast in our reaction to the depiction of feeling in art and of the expression of the same emotions in real life (Qu. 1), of the history of competitions in literature and poetry at the Games (Qu. 2), certain facts about the history of the crown awarded at the Isthmian Games, with sundry learned observations (or speculations) on the properties of the pine and celery (Qu. 3), the meaning of a certain word used by Homer (Qu. 4), the problem of whom or how many to invite to a dinner party (Qu. 5), the puzzle why guests find themselves becoming less crowded on the dining couches during the course of a meal (Qu. 6), the " evil eye" (Qu. 7), a couple of points of usage in Homer and Empedocles, with some etymological considerations (Qu. 8), the paradox of a tree of bitter quality, the fig, producing the sweetest fruit (Qu. 9), and the proverbial " salt and bean friends " and the divine quality of salt (Qu. 10).

Book VI begins in its proem with an anecdote relating to Plato and his Academy : a banquet there was wholesome and chiefly intellectual. Of the Questions which follow, the first deals with thirst caused by fasting, the next follows this up by raising the matter of the physiological nature of hunger; similarly Question 3 ties in with this by exploring the contradictory physical phenomenon of hunger assuaged by liquid food, but thirst only intensified by solid. Question 4 investigates another not unrelated scientific puzzle connected with this general sphere of interest : why is the water in a vessel held suspended in a well found cooler than the well-water itself? Question 5 asks why pebbles or bits of metal thrown in will cool water ; Question 6 how chaff and cloth can preserve snow; Question 7 whether one ought to filter wine ; Question 8 the causes of bulimy, a kind of ravenous hunger; Question 9 another point of Homeric usage, namely calling oil liquid par excellence, and Question 10 the curing property of fig-trees when $i\epsilon\rho\epsilon ia$ are hung from their limbs.

Neither the traditional captions nor this skeleton summary give even a hint of the richness of the content. Plutarch and his friends are always ready with a literary citation and a philosophical or scientific extension of the subject.

It is, as everyone knows and gladly states, a pleasant duty to acknowledge much help and friendly advice. I am indebted to the Research Council of the University of California, Los Angeles, for providing clerical help in the early stages of the project. I owe a special debt to my colleague, P. A. Clement, for his initial suggestion that I participate in this task, and for his kindness in making available books and materials. I have heavily imposed on the patience of Professors Alfred C. Andrews, Harold Cherniss, and W. C. Helmbold, and of the late Professor Ludwig Edelstein. Especially often have I called upon Professor Andrews for answers only he could provide; he has regularly responded and beyond that assisted me greatly in matters not confined to his speciality. Equally ready with acute suggestions in truly phenomenal variety has been Professor L. A. Post, egregie cordatus homo, whose unflagging zeal is known to countless scholars. Also far beyond what I had a right to claim I have drawn upon the various abilities and loyal co-operation of my wife. Lastly, I must record deep indebtedness to one other generous scholar, who insists on remaining anonymous.

BOOK FOUR

WHEN, dear Sossius Senecio, Polybius advises Scipio Africanus never to return from a visit to the Forum until he has made a new friend of one of his fellow citizens,^a we must not interpret "friend" with pedantic strictness as referring to the celebrated ideal type,^b immutable and steadfast, but take it in a broader sense as meaning any well-wisher. Just so Dicaearchus ^c recommended securing the good will of all and sundry, but making friends only with the good. Friendship is an objective that can be captured only by long effort d and sturdy qualities of character," whereas good will is enlisted through the ordinary associations of business, social life, and play shared with members of the community, with the opportunities thus afforded for the exercise of friendly persuasion and good feeling.^f

As to the advice of Polybius, perhaps you'll agree

^e There is a military metaphor here, but the phrase $\delta\iota'$ direr ηs is intended also by its other meaning to allude to Aristotle's point in *Eth. that it is well adapted not only to the market place but also to parties. That is, we should not let a party break up before we have made a new friend and wellwisher among the other guests and fellow diners. People rush to the market place on business or for some other practical purpose; they attend a partyat least if they're intelligent-as much to gain new friends as to give a good time to the old. For though it would be low and vulgar to wish to carry off a anything else, it is both a pleasure and a distinction to come away with a profitable addition to the number of one's friends. On the other hand, anyone who neglects to do so makes the social occasion incomplete and unrewarding to himself; he departs after having partaken only with his stomach, not his mind. A guest comes to share not only meat, wine, and dessert, but conversation, fun, and the amiability that leads to friendship. The grips and tugs of wrestling require fine sand b; the holds of friendship are won by a blend of wine and conversation. For it is through conversation that wine channels from the body and distributes through the character a generous influence that permeates the whole man.^c Otherwise the wine, circulating uncontrolled in the body, produces nothing better than mere repletion. In consequence, just as marble ^d eliminates excessive melting and fluidity in red-hot Conversation steadies those who drink, adding through relaxation an element of gaiety and —yes—of kindly sociability, if people go about it in the right way, since the wine makes the company pliable and ready to take an impression, as it were, from the seal of friendship.

Whether a variety of food is more easily digested than one kind alone

Speakers: Philo, Plutarch, Philinus, and Marcion

1. The first in our fourth decade of convivial questions shall be the discussion we had concerning variety in diet on the occasion of a banquet during the festival of the Elaphebolia,^b for which we had gone to Hyampolis.^c On our arrival there we were entertained at dinner by Philo^d the physician, who, as we saw, had provided a mighty feast for us. Our host, having noticed that one of the young boys who came with Philinus^e took bread and wanted nothing else, exclaimed," Good Lord ! So this is what the proverb

"This," I remarked, "is what happens when people provide elaborate and costly fare. They're prone to be negligent and run out of the staple and essential items." To this Philo rejoined, "True enough. It had slipped my mind that Philinus has been bringing up among us a Sosaster,^b who they say never took any food or drink but milk during his whole life. But the original Sosaster must have turned to this diet from an earlier one, whereas our young friend, unlike Achilles,^c has been fed bloodless and vegetarian food by his Cheiron here from birth. Isn't he giving a splendid illustration of a person fed as they say cicadas ^d are on dew and air?"

B as reading "Zoroaster," whose name is retained by Kaltwasser and Ricard in their translations. A slight degree of support for this interpretation may be found in Pliny, xi. 97. 242, where Zoroaster is alleged to have lived on cheese for twenty years. Cf. Diogenes Laertius, Lives of Ancient Philosophers, Prologue, 7 and 8, with R. D. Hicks's note in Diogenes Laertius (LCL), i, p. 8. Sosaster is unknown, but he may be identical with an obscure character in Iamblichus's Life of Pythagoras, 267. Sostratos (RE, Suppl. viii. 782) appears to have lived about a century later.

"But we," answered Philinus, "weren't aware that we had been invited to a banquet to celebrate the hekatomphonia,^a as in Aristomenes's time. Otherwise we should have come furnished with some simple, wholesome food as with an amulet and an antidote against such luxurious and unhealthy eating. What is more, we have often heard you say that simple food is more digestible than an elaborate variety, as well as easier to obtain."

Here Marcion interposed, "Philo, Philinus is ruining all your efforts by discouraging and frightening away your guests; but if you entreat me, I'll guarantee to them all for you that mixed food is more digestible than simple, so that your guests need have no misgivings about enjoying what is set before them here." Philo accordingly did entreat Marcion to do so.

2. So when we had finished dinner, we called upon Philinus to open the charge against variety of food; but he answered, "' Not mine the argument.' ^b It's Philo here who tells us on every occasion that, for one thing, animals by always sticking to simple, uniform food are generally healthier than human beings. Moreover, those that are fattened in pens are liable to disease and fall an easy prey to crude humours because the fodder that they consume is mixed and richly flavoured. In the second place, no physician has ever been so foolhardy an innovator, so courage-performed among the Messenians by one who had personally slain one hundred enemies in combat. Aristomenes, in the 7th century, is said to have celebrated this feat three times. See Pausanias, iv. 14 ff., 19. 3; Plutarch, Life of Romulus, xxv. 3; RE, vii. 2790 and ii. 947, no. 1.

ous a man, as to prescribe a varied diet for fevered patients; all give them a simple, fat-free a diet as the most easily digestible. For the food has to be acted upon and to suffer a change by subjection to our internal processes. In dyeing b also, simple colours are more likely to be fast; and in perfumery the most scentless oil is most quickly blended; thus simple and homogeneous nutriment is most easily converted in the process of digestion.^c When a number of divergent qualities in food are united, essentially opposed and clashing as they are, they encounter each other prematurely and are destroyed. Like a mob of ill-assorted riffraff in a community, these elements cannot easily establish unity and harmonious order among themselves, but each pulls in its own direction, and will not come to terms with an alien kind. Wine offers a clear proof : the mixture of several wines together, the so-called alloinia, quickly intoxicates, and intoxication is like a kind of indigestion with respect to wine. Drinkers, for this reason, avoid a mixture of wines,^d and those who mix wines try to conceal the wily practice. Change and irregularity are disruptive. This no doubt explains why musicians too are very cautious about striking a combination of notes together; yet the only thing wrong about it is the combination itself and the bizarre effect. So I for my part am justified in what Timaeus, 50 D-E, where essentially the same point is supported by an analogy from perfume-making.

I said, because persuasion and agreement can sooner be reached by conflicting statements than good digestion by foods of divergent types.

"But if this seems frivolous, I shall drop it and get back to Philo's views. We often hear him say that good or bad digestion depends on the nature of the food consumed, and that a combination of miscellaneous viands is harmful and engenders adverse conditions. We must learn by experience what foods go together and be content to use them. But if nothing is of itself indigestible, and it is only the quantity that causes disorder and harm, then I think that we should all the more avoid the multifarious variety with which Philo's cook has just drugged us. This he does as if to set his skill in opposition to Philo's, altering our appetite by novelty and change, not letting it be appeased, but ever leading it on to something else, and causing it to exceed what is reasonable and self-sufficient by colourful variety. So our cook is like the nursling of Hypsipylê,^a as he gathers flowers far and wide through the meadow :

> Flower after flower he plucked, Garnering his catch with rejoicing heart, Never satisfied—the child !

admonition to beware of those dishes that tempt people to eat when they're not hungry; apparently he is simply urging us to be cautious and wary of variety and mixing of foods. Such variety encourages indulgence far beyond need in sights and sounds, sex, or in any kind of sport and pastime, because it adds certain elements which renew the pleasure by their numerous stimuli. On the other hand, in simple, uniform pleasures no charm or magic induces us to overstep the bounds of nature. In general, I should sooner expect people to tolerate a musician who finds a jumble of mixed sounds acceptable or a gymnastic trainer who accepts scented oils, than a physician who commends a combination of many meats. For the detours and changes in such a diet divert us from the straight road to health."

3. When Philinus had ended, Marcion said that in his view the imprecation of Socrates ^a falls not only upon those who detach interest from honour, but upon those who divorce pleasure from health, as if it were an opposing and hostile force instead of a supporting one. "We have recourse to pain in treating the sick only sparingly and reluctantly, for it is excessively violent; from all other therapy no one could remove pleasure, even if he wished. Eating, sleeping, bathing, anointing and resting on a couch are all attended by pleasure, which does its part to support and nurse a man back to health, weakening the abnormal and extraneous by providing abundance of what is normal and proper. What pain, what depletion, what poison ^b can so easily and simply break up a disease as a bath at the right time or wine provided when the patient needs it? Nourishment taken with pleasure can quickly soothe all discomfort and set nature to rights, as when clear sky and calm sea have returned after a storm. Painful remedies work slowly and are rarely successful, harshly wrenching and doing violence to nature. Philinus, then, cannot give us a bad name a merely for refusing to hoist both sails and run for it to escape pleasure. Rather, we are trying to reconcile the concepts ' pleasant' and ' healthy' more reasonably and appropriately than some philosophers do ' pleasant' and ' honourable.'

"Your very first argument, Philidus, is fallacious, it seems to me, when you begin by assuming that animals thrive on a simpler diet and are healthier than men. For neither point is valid. Eupolis's ^b goats testify against the first, when they chant the praises of their diet as being all-inclusive and of wondrous variety. I think the lines run as follows:

suitable for people who have a fever. Still, you were not justified in being afraid of conflict and disagreement in a variety of foods. For it may be that the body naturally takes its specific nutriment from the related elements in its foods, and that a varied meal directly transmits into the system a multiplicity of qualities that are distributed as required to each part of the body. What happens is the process described by Empedocles ^a:

Sweet seized sweet, and bitter rose to meet bitter, Sour went to sour, hot quickly caught up hot —and as other elements likewise wait for their counterparts, while the heat in the vital spirit dissolves the compound, the elements combine according to their affinities. It is right to assume that so completely heterogeneous an assemblage of elements as our body must draw upon many different substances rather than any single one, in order to complete the compound.

"On the other hand, if this is not so, but the natural function of what we call 'digestion' is rather to alter and convert food, the alteration will be accomplished better and more quickly with a varied diet. For like is unaffected by like; rather it is opposition and contrast that, by the union of contraries, drive out certain qualities and make them waste away.

" If, however, you completely reject mixture and variety, Philinus, then you mustn't criticize Philo

"But you say variety encourages and bewitches appetite to such a point that it loses control of itself; yes, but so, my dear fellow, do purity, wholesomeness and fragrances. In short, anything that is especially pleasing draws us on and makes us eat and drink more than necessary. Why is it that we never prepare a coarse barley-cake instead of porridge? And instead of asparagus why don't we prepare horn onions ^b and golden thistles? And why, spurning the fine bouquet of mellow wine like this, do we not drink coarse, inferior wine out of the cask-wine surrounded by a choir of singing mosquitoes? It is because, you would answer, the healthy plan of life is not headlong flight from pleasure, but, on the contrary, moderation in the enjoyment of pleasure and an ordered pattern that makes appetite the servant of welfare.

difficult one indeed, my friend, to intensify it and rekindle its spark, if it has weakened prematurely, grown soft and abandoned its proper function. For this reason variety is better at a meal than simplicity and monotony that is merely filling—as much better as it is easier to halt nature in full course than to start it moving again after it has lost momentum. Furthermore, the claim made in certain quarters, that repletion is more to be avoided than deficiency, is not true ; quite the contrary. Granted that repletion when it culminates in some form of impairment or disease is harmful ; still, deficiency, even without any other ill effect, is in and of itself contrary to nature.

"Let this be my antiphonal response, so to speak, to your speculations. But how can you advocates of beans and salt ^a have missed the point that variety is more agreeable, and that the more agreeable is the more appetizing, and the more appetizing is the more healthful, if you prune away superfluity and excess? For delicious variety of foods is eagerly assimilated by the body if it is aroused and made receptive under the influence of the sense of sight. The unappetizing, on the other hand, wanders aimlessly in the system, and nature either expels it altogether, or puts up with it reluctantly because of necessity. Only please keep this one thing in mind without fail, that variety is not confined to fancy sauces, like abyrtakê, kandylos,

Why truffles are thought to be produced by thunder, and why people believe that sleepers are never struck by thunder

Speakers : Agemachus, Plutarch, Dorotheüs, and others

1. At a dinner in Elis, Agemachus served us some giant truffles. Everyone present expressed admiration, and one of the guests said with a smile, "They certainly are worthy of the thunder that we've had lately," obviously laughing at those who say that truffles are produced by thunder. Several of the company held that the ground splits open when struck by thunder, the air serving as a spike, and that afterward the truffle-gatherers are guided by the cracks in the earth. This is the source, they continued, of the popular notion that thunder actually produces the truffles, instead of merely bringing them to light. It is as if someone were to imagine that rain not merely brings out snails where we can see them, but actually creates them.

^a "Signs from Zeus" (diosemia) usually refer to dissuasive omens important in politics, but here Plutarch unquestionably is thinking of meteorological phenomena in the broad Greek sense of the word, including astronomy, meteorology in the modern sense and seismology, etc. See Aris-318

Agemachus, however, upheld the popular theory, and advised us not to regard the miraculous as unworthy of belief. For indeed many other marvellous effects are, he said, produced by thunder, lightning, and other meteoric phenomena (diosemia), a though the causes of these effects are difficult or completely impossible to discover. "For instance, the much-ridiculed, proverbial tassel-hyacinth^b here is protected against the thunderbolt not by its smallness but by a resistant property in it, c like the fig tree, the sealskin,^d they say, and the pelt of the hyena, which shipowners use to cover the mastheads. Farmers assert and believe that showers accompanied by lightning enrich the soil. In general, it is simple-minded to be surprised at such things when we observe directly the most incredible part of it all, namely, flashes of fire coming from moisture, and rough, loud crashes from soft clouds. But my chatter is meant only as an invitation to search for a theory that will explain these things; I don't mean to be unmannerly and exact a contribution from each man to pay for the truffles."

2. Here I remarked that Agemachus himself was, after a fashion, lending a helping hand to the discussion. At the moment at least, I said, no more probable theory occurred to me than that fertile rains often accompany thunder. "The reason," I went on, " is the warmth mixed with the rain; the intense and pure fire passes off in the form of lightning, while its heavy, vaporous element is packed in the cloud and transformed with it, drawing off the coolness and helping to discharge the moisture. This moisture in turn permeates the young shoots in a benign form, and swells them up rapidly.^a All this imparts special characteristics and specific flavour to vegetation thus watered; for example, dew makes grass sweeter to the cattle, and the clouds that blossom out into a rainbow fill with fragrance the trees that they rest upon. Such trees are identified by their fragrance, and in our district people call them iriskepta ^b in the belief that they have been struck by the rainbow. This gives us all the more reason to think that the soil is stirred, clodded, and made spongy by the deep penetration of heat, wind, and rainwater from thunderstorms; just so, in animal bodies scrofulous and glandular growths are caused by certain kinds of heat combined with sanguinous moisture. For the truffle resembles no plant and yet does not come into being without water. It appears without roots or sprouts and unattached, because it develops in a way peculiar to itself in soil that is some-

^a Parallel treatment of this subject is found in Plutarch, Actiae Physicae, ii, 912 A and iv, 912 F ff., where freshness, admixture of air, heat, and some generative property in spring rains seem to be the main qualities suggested to account for the fertility of rain water or rains accompanied by lightning.

^b The Pseudo-Aristotle tries to account for belief in fragrance attributed to rainbows as due to the moderate moisture after the rainbow, rather than to the rainbow itself: Problems, xii. 3 (906 a 37 ff.).

how modified and transformed. If this seems to you but a spare account of the matter," said I, "nevertheless most of the effects of thunder and lightning are of the character that I have described. And that explains exactly why these phenomena have generally been supposed to be supernatural." ^a

3. The rhetor Dorotheüs, who was present, spoke up, saying, "You are right. For not only the general run of ordinary people but even some philosophers accept the divine theory. I at least know personally of one case in connection with a stroke of lightning in a house in our town. It produced a number of astonishing effects, such as spilling wine out of jars without damage to the vessel, and passing through a man asleep without hurting him or touching his clothes, yet completely melting and fusing the copper coins in the money belt that he was wearing.^b He went to a Pythagorean philosopher who was staying in town and asked his opinion; but the philosopher only made a pious gesture and told the man not to gaze higher than his own level, and to pray to the gods. I have also heard that lightning once struck close to a soldier posted before a temple in Rome and burned his shoelaces, but caused him no further harm. Another instance is that of silver cups ^c in wooden cases; the silver was melted down completely, but the wood was later found untouched and undamaged.

^a Pseudo-Aristotle, Problems, xxiv. 19, recognizes sulphur and thunderbolts as sacred.

^b Cf. the story told of Mithridates, 624 B, supra.

^c This interpretation is due to an emendation. The manuscript reading may be correct in referring to "lampstands" or, possibly, "lamps." Silver lamps or lampstands would be comparatively rare, though actually (cf. RE, xiii. 1569) silver and gold ones were known.

^c A highly dubious etymology.

"Now all this you may believe or not, but the most astonishing of all is what practically every one of us knows : that the bodies of those killed by lightning will not decay. For many neither cremate nor bury them,^a but leave them undisturbed, with fences built around them, so that the bodies are seen forever in an undecayed state. Thus they prove that Clymenê in Euripides was wrong when she said of Phaëthon,

My dear one Rots, unwashed, in some mountain cleft a corpse.^b

Hence, I believe, sulphur even gets its name in Greek, theion ^c (divine), from the similarity of the smell to the burning, pungent odour that is forced out of objects struck by lightning. This odour, to my mind, explains why dogs and birds abstain from such Zeussmitten carcases.

"But let this be enough of my nibbling at the problem of the explanation, as at a bay leaf.^d For the rest, let's call upon our friend ^e here, for he has been quite successful on the topic of truffles. Let's avoid the predicament of the painter Androcydes.^f He had a natural fondness for fish, and inasmuch as the finest and most lifelike details in any of his work were the fishes that surrounded Scylla, he was accused of having consulted his appetite rather than his art. 4. I urged that we should pursue the topic, and said that it was time, as in a comedy, to hoist the stage machinery and hurl some thunderbolts b in our the after-dinner discussion of thunder and lightning. The others, however, while agreeing to omit other phases of the subject, were insistent in their determination to hear something on the topic why sleeping persons are immune to strokes of lightning. But when I attempted an explanation of this immunity, which is an open question, I found that I could make no headway. Still, I ventured to say that the thunderbolt is fire of a marvellous purity and fineness, because it originates directly in a pure and uncontaminated substance. The speed with which it moves dislodges and eliminates any watery or earthy matter that is mixed in it.

"No earthen object that is struck by lightning," according to Democritus,^c " can support the bright flash that comes from the sky." The dense substances like iron, copper, silver, or gold, which block the path of lightning, are broken down and melted in consequence of their opposition and resistance. But the lightning passes without contact through loosetextured and porous substances, which are slack and open, like clothing and dry timber. It burns green wood because the moisture, by intercepting the lightning, catches fire. If, then, it is true that sleeping persons are never killed by lightning, we must look for the reason here rather than elsewhere. The body of those awake is firmer, compacter, and more resistant, because it is filled in all its parts with vital spirit. This vital spirit a tightens up and attunes the organs of sense like strings in a musical instrument, and gives the whole animal its proper tension, solidity, and compactness. In sleep, on the other hand, the body relaxes, becomes loose-textured and uneven in its consistency, and is left untensed and diffuse. The result is that many passages are opened as the vital spirit weakens and is lost. Through these, sounds and smells pass unperceived. For there is no resistance to encounter onrushing particles and to receive an impression from them, especially when the particles that speed through are as fine and swift as those of lightning. Nature defends itself against weaker assault by various degrees of imperviousness, throwing up a shield of hardness and density; but where the destructive force is irresistible, less damage is suffered by soft, yielding substances than by those that stand firm.

^a This seems to be an echo of the theory held by Erasistratus, the famous physician of the 3rd century B.C. Cf. Wellmann in RE, s.v. " Erasistratos," col. 341. See also supra, i. 7, 625 B-C.

"Add to that," I said, "the not inconsiderable effect of surprise, fear, and panic; such things cause emotions that have caused the death of many simply by fear of death. Shepherds in fact train their sheep, at the sound of thunder, to run to one place and huddle together, because thunder causes miscarriage through fright in any that are left isolated. What is more, the evidence is plain that countless thousands of people have been killed by thunder and lightning without a trace of wound or burn; 'apparently the life in panic took flight from the body like a bird.' For, as Euripides ^a says,

Many the bloodless breath of thunder has destroyed.

In general, our hearing is of all our senses the most liable to shock, and therefore the upset and terror produced by a noise cause the greatest disorders. Now the sleeper is protected against these by being unconscious; whereas people in a waking state are not only doomed by their imagination but also add force to the actual blow by opposing it, because fear (deos) really does bind (dein), contract, and solidify the body."

guests. Among many subjects that he brought forward which were particularly appropriate to the occasion, he raised the question why people invite more guests to wedding dinners than to other parties. For it is true, he observed, that those lawgivers who have campaigned most vigorously against extravagance have particularly sought to limit the number of guests at weddings. "But as to the reason itself for these large numbers," said Senecio, "the only ancient philosopher who had anything to offer was Hecatacus a of Abdera, who, in my judgement, said nothing convincing. His point was this : At their marriage men invite a crowd to the banquet so that there may be many witnesses to testify that the hosts themselves are of good family and that their brides come from good families. On the other hand, the comic poets attack those who celebrate a wedding in a prodigal and ostentatious style, with splendid dinners and great outlay, as not putting down a secure foundation or looking courageously to the future. Menander,^b for instance, said with reference to someone who ordered that his marriage should be fenced around with dishes.

view. It is that of all the occasions for a banquet, none is more conspicuous or talked about than a wedding. When we offer sacrifice to the gods, or honour a friend on the eve of a journey, or entertain guests from abroad, it is possible to do so unnoticed by many of our intimates and relatives; but a wedding-feast betrays us by the loud marriage cry, the torch, and the shrill pipe, things which according to Homer^{a} even the women stand at their doors to watch and admire. Consequently, since no one is unaware that we are receiving guests and must have invited them, we include all our relatives, acquaintances, and connections of any degree, because we are afraid to leave anyone out."

3. When we had applauded this, Theon took up the thread with these words : "Let us adopt this theory, for it is quite probable. But add, if you will, a further point, that these particular banquets are not merely friendly entertainments but important family occasions, which solemnize the incorporation of a new set of relatives into the family. What is more important than this, at the union of two houses, each father-in-law regards it as a duty to demonstrate good will to the friends and relatives of the other, and so the guest-list is doubled. Besides, many or most of the activities relating to a wedding are in the hands of women, and where women are present it is necessary that their husbands also should be included."

Whether the sea is richer in delicacies than the land Speakers: Polycrates, Symmachus, Lamprias, and others

1. AEDEPSUS ^a in Euboea has become a popular resort for people from all over Greece, particularly because of the place called Hot Springs, which possesses many natural resources for the worthy enjoyment of leisure. and is further embellished by villas and elegant apartment houses. Game and fowl are caught there in abundance, and the sea no less lavishly supplies the market with provisions for the table, producing many a fine, noble fish in the deep, clear waters close to shore. This resort flourishes especially when spring is at its height, for many continue to come there all that season. They gather together, exempt from every want, and, having the leisure, engage endlessly in conversation. When Callistratus ^b the sophist was there, it was difficult to dine at anyone else's house, for his graciousness was irresistible, and made the occasion very pleasant ^c when he brought practically all the choicer spirits together in one group. For he often copied Cimon d among the ancients in giving delightful banquets for a large and miscellaneous company ; he virtually always imitated Celeus,^e who

2. Hence there was always conversation worthy of such an assemblage. At one such dinner, the elaborate fare gave rise to a discussion whether food produced by the soil or food from the sea is preferable. Most of the company sang the praises of the products of the land, citing their abundance, variety, and almost infinite diversity of qualities and types. But Polycrates,^b turning to Symmachus,^c said, "You're a seagirt specimen, raised as you were amid all those seas that course around your sacred Nicopolis.d Aren't you going to rise to the defence of Poseidon ? " "Yes, I certainly want to," answered Symmachus, " and I call upon you to back me up, since you reap a harvest of the most delicious sea food that the Achaean e waters have to offer." " All right," said Polycrates. "First let us consider word usage. Though there are many poets, we call the best one pre-eminently 'the poet f'; and so, though there are many delicacies, fish has won the title, either exclusively or pre-eminently, of ' delicacy ' (opson)," because it far excels all others in quality. "Furthermore, sea food is out of all proportion the most expensive. Cato a assuredly wasn't exaggerating but speaking plain truth in his harangue against the luxury and extravagance of the capital, when he said that a fish sells for more at Rome than a cow, and they sell a cask of smoked fish for a price that a hundred sheep plus one ox in the lead wouldn't bring, cut in pieces.

'Again it is certainly true that as the most competent physician is the best judge of the effect of a drug, and as the most ardent lover of music is the best qualified to appraise a tune, so the best critic of the excellence of a dish must be the greatest gourmet. As for Antagoras, King Antigonus once found him in the camp girt like a cook and boiling a dish of conger-eels, and asked him, ' Do you think Homer has recorded the deeds of Agamemnon while cooking cels?' Antagoras's apt reply was, 'Do you imagine Agamemnon performed those deeds while busying himself with finding out who was boiling a conger-eel in the camp ? ' That is what I have to offer to you—and, by George, to the fish-peddlers," said Polycrates, " from the testimony of history and from usage."

3. "Well," said Symmachus, " for my part I shall attack the subject in a serious and rather more logical vein. If a relish (opson) is something that makes a dish palatable, then the best relish would be the one that does most to attract our appetite. The philosophers called Elpistics a declare that hope is the strongest bond of life, pointing out that in the absence of hope and without its seasoning life is unendurable. Correspondingly we may assert that the means to sustain appetite is something without which all food is tasteless and unpalatable. You will find nothing of the sort in foods produced on land b; whereas from the sea you will. First there is salt, without which practically nothing is eatable. Salt is added even to bread and enriches its flavour; this explains why Poseidon shares a temple with Demeter. Salt is also the best relish to season other relishes.

"The heroes of old, at any rate, who were accustomed to a modest, simple diet, and who acted as if they were in training, excluding all superfluous elaborations and condiments, even did without fish, though they were camping by the Hellespont^o; yet they could not endure to eat meat without salt. They testify that salt is the only relish that cannot be dispensed with. Just as colour requires light, so flavour requires salt to stimulate the sense; otherwise flavours are disagreeable and nauseous to the taste. The bodies of the dead, according to Heracleitus,^a are fitter to be cast out than dung, and all meat is either a dead body or part of one. But the effect of salt upon meat, like the addition of a veritable soul,^b is to lend flavour and an agreeable quality to it. This is why it is conventional before a main course to take appetizers that are sharp or briny, and in general anything that has a highly salty character. For these relishes act as charms to entice the appetite towards the other delicacies; and appetite, caught by this magic, attacks the other viands with youthful ^c vigour. If, however, these other viands are the first food presented to the appetite, it quickly wearies.

^a From elpis, " hope."

^b Obviously Plutarch is thinking of salt as derived only from the sea, although Herodotus shows that salt mines and rock salt were known (Herod. iv. 185). See now A. S. Pease on Cicero, De Natura Deorum, ii. 53. 132 "salinae"; RE, s.v. "Salz."

^A Nor is salt a seasoning only for food ; it also seasons drinks. The Homeric phrase, 'the onion, a relish to a drink,' ^d would be better suited to sailors and oarsmen than to princes ; but moderately salty foods, on account of their pleasant taste, bring out the sweetness and smoothness of any kind of wine, and also make any water agreeable and tonic,^e without a trace of the disagreeable and objectionable effect that Beyond that, salty food aids digestion of any other a; it makes any food tender and more susceptible to concoction; the salt contributes at once the savour of a relish and the good effect of a medicine. Moreover, the other delicacies of the sea, in addition to being most gratifying to the taste, are also the safest to eat; for they have the character of meat without its heaviness, and are easily digested and assimilated. One more point : it is logical that what the sea brings forth should be wholesome and well-perfected, since the sea sends us air that is healthful because of its lightness and purity."

4. "You are right," said Lamprias, " but let us add a little to our speculations. My grandfather used to say on every occasion, in derision of the Jews, that what they abstained from was precisely the most legitimate meat. But we shall say that of all delicacies the most legitimate kind is that from the sea. As far as the land animals whose meat is here before us are concerned, we must admit at least this if nothing else, that they consume the same food and breathe the same air as we do, and drink and bathe in water no different from ours. Whether the Jews abstain from pork because of reverence or aversion for the pig

Speakers : Callistratus, Polycrates, Lamprias

1. WHEN he had finished, and some of those present would have made an extended reply to his arguments, Callistratus headed them off by saying, "What do you think of the assertion that it is precisely the most proper type of meat that the Jews avoid eating?" " "I heartily agree with it," replied Polycrates, "but I have another question : do they abstain from eating pork by reason of some special respect for hogs or from abhorrence of the creature? Their own accounts sound like pure myth, but perhaps they have some serious reasons which they do not publish."

beast enjoys a certain respect among that folk a; granted that he is ugly and dirty, still he is no more absurd in appearance or crude in disposition than dung-beetle, field-mouse, crocodile, or cat, each of which is treated as sacred by a different group of Egyptian priests. They say, however, that the pig is honoured for a good reason : according to the story, it was the first to cut the soil with its projecting snout, thus producing a furrow and teaching man the function of a ploughshare. Incidentally, this is the origin, they say, of the word hynis (from hys, 'swine') for that implement. The Egyptians who cultivate the soft soil of their low-lying areas have no use for ploughing at all. After the Nile overflows and soaks their acres, they follow the receding water and unload the pigs, which by trampling and rooting quickly turn over the deep soil and cover the seed. We need not be surprised if some people do not eat pork for this reason. Other animals receive even greater honours among the barbarians for slight and in some cases utterly ridiculous reasons. The field-mouse is said to have been deified among the Egyptians because of its blindness, since they regarded darkness as superior to light; and they thought that the field-mouse was born of ordinary mice every fifth generation at the new moon, and also that its liver was reduced in size at the dark of the moon.

^a This suggestion is even more forcibly made in an epigram attributed to Petronius (Bücheler, Petronii reliquiae, 1862, with preface, p. xxxvi), fragment 47, line 1: "Iudaeus licet ut porcinum numen adoret."

"They associate the lion with the sun because it, alone of quadrupeds that have claws, bears young that can see at birth, sleeps only for a moment, and has eyes that gleam in sleep. Egyptian fountains pour forth their water through lion mouths, because the Nile brings new water to the fields of Egypt when the sun passes through Leo. They say that the ibis when hatched weighs two drachms,^a as much as the heart of a new-born infant, and forms an equilateral triangle by the position of its outspread feet and bill. How could anyone blame the Egyptians for such irrationality when it is recorded that the Pythagoreans respect even a white cock,^b and that they abstain particularly from the red mullet and the sea anemone among marine animals ? ^c Or when we remember that the Magi, followers of Zoroaster, especially esteem the hedgehog and abominate water mice,^d regarding the person who kills the greatest number of the latter as blest and dear to the gods ? So I think the Jews would kill pigs if they hated them, as the Magi kill water mice ; but in fact it is just as unlawful for Jews to destroy pigs as to eat them. 3. "No indeed," countered Lamprias, " they abstain from the hare because of its very close resemblance to the ass which they prize so highly. The hare appears to be simply an ass inferior in bulk and size; for its coat, ears, bright eyes, and salacity are amazingly similar, so much so that nothing small ever so closely resembled something large. Perhaps, to be sure, following the Egyptians even in their conception of traits of animals, they regard the swiftness of the creature and the keenness of its senses as something divine. For its eye is untiring : the hare even sleeps with its eyes wide open. In acuteness of hearing it is found to be unrivalled; the Egyptians admire this so much that in their hieroglyphics they draw a hare's ear to represent the idea of hearing.

"The Jews apparently abominate pork because

^e Tacitus (Histories, v. 3 ff.) has an ampler version of this, naming Moses and apparently misrepresenting Exodus, xv. 23 ff. Josephus (Contra Apionem, ii. 7. 86) denies that the Jews honour the ass as the Egyptians do crocodiles. See B. Latzarus, Les Idées religieuses de Plutarque (Paris, 1920), p. 164. Plutarch himself rejects (De Iside, 363 c) a connection between the Jews and Typhon (Set), who both rode an ass and was otherwise identified with the animal. barbarians especially abhor skin diseases like lepra^a and white scale, and believe that human beings are ravaged by such maladies through contagion. Now we observe that every pig is covered on the under side by lepra and scaly eruptions, which, if there is general weakness and emaciation,^b are thought to spread rapidly over the body. What is more, the the very filthiness of their habits produces an inferior quality of meat. We observe no other creature so fond of mud and of dirty, unclean places, if we leave out of account those animals that have their origin and natural habitat there. People say also that the eyes of swine are so twisted and drawn down that they can never catch sight of anything above them or see the sky unless they are carried upside down so that their eyes are given an unnatural tilt upward. Wherefore the animal, which usually squeals immoderately, holds still when it is carried in this position, and remains silent because it is astonished at the unfamiliar sight of the heavenly expanse and restrained from squealing by an overpowering fear. If it is legitimate to bring in mythology too, Adonis is said to have been slain by the boar. 2. At this, all did urge him and beg him to go on. "First," he said, "the time and character of the greatest, most sacred holiday of the Jews clearly befit Dionysus. When they celebrate their so-called Fast, at the height of the vintage, they set out tables of all sorts of fruit under tents and huts plaited for the most part of vines and ivy. They call the first of the two days Tabernacles.^a A few days later they celebrate another festival, this time identified with Bacchus not through obscure hints but plainly called by his name,^b a festival that is a sort of ' Procession of Branches' or 'Thyrsus Procession,' in which they enter the temple each carrying a thyrsus.^c What they do after entering we do not know, but it is probable that the rite is a Bacchic revelry, for in fact they use little trumpets ^d to invoke their god as do the Argives at their Dionysia. Others of them advance playing harps; these players are called in their language Levites, either from Lysios (Releaser) or, better, from Evius (God of the Cry).e

^a When the Hebrews spoke of Sabaoth (" armies," heavenly or earthly : cf. Romans, ix. 29; Isaiah, i. 9) they would seem to a Greek to be referring to Sabazios or Sabos, who was identified with Dionysus. The Romans in 139 B.c. put themselves on record officially as guilty of the same confusion by 364

"I believe that even the feast of the Sabbath^a is not completely unrelated to Dionysus. Many even now call the Bacchants Sabi and utter that cry when celebrating the god. Testimony to this can be found in Demosthenes ^b and Menander.^c You would not be far off the track if you attributed the use of this name Sabi d to the strange excitement (sobesis) that possesses the celebrants. The Jews themselves testify to a connection with Dionysus when they keep the Sabbath by inviting each other to drink and to enjoy wine ; when more important business interferes with this custom, they regularly take at least a sip of neat wine." Now thus far one might call the argument only probable; but the opposition is quite demolished, in the first place by the High Priest, who leads the procession at their festival wearing a mitre and clad in a gold-embroidered fawnskin, a robe reaching to the ankles, and buskins, with many bells attached to his clothes and ringing below him as he walks.^f All this corresponds to our custom. In the second place, they also have noise as an element in expelling the Jews for allegedly introducing Sabazios to Rome. See Wissowa as quoted in RE, s.v. "Sabazios," col. 1547, and Valerius Maximus, i. 3. 3. The cry euoi saboi ($\epsilon voi \sigma a \beta oi$), derisively quoted by Demosthenes, is referred to Dionysus Sabazius by various Greek authorities.

^b De Corona, 260. Cf. preceding note.

^o Menander, fr. 905 (Körte) = 1060 (Kock).

^d Plutarch is playing with variants on the root sab. A different reading would make the meaning "reverence" or "awe."

^e Ricard and Kaltwasser cite Leviticus, x. 9, which completely refutes this; however, see Judges, ix. 13; xix. 19; Psalms, civ. 15; which give very weak support to Plutarch.

¹ Much of this reproduces Exodus, xxviii; but whence are the fawnskin and buskins derived? Helmbold compares Josephus, Jewish Antiquities, iii. 159 ff.

^a As emended by Corais, an epithet of Demeter, associated their nocturnal festivals, and call the nurses of the god 'bronze rattlers.' ^a The carved thyrsus in the relief on the pediment of the Temple and the drums (provide other parallels).^b All this surely befits (they might say) no divinity but Dionysus.

Further, the Jews use no honey ^c in their religious services because they believe that honey spoils the wine with which it is mixed; and they used honey as libation and in place of wine before the vine was discovered. Even up to the present time those of the barbarians who do not make wine drink mead. counteracting the sweetness somewhat by the use of winelike bitter roots. The Greeks, on the other hand. offer the same libations as ' sober libations ' and melisponda d on the principle that there is a particular opposition between honey and wine. To show that what I have said is the practice of the Jews we may find no slight confirmation in the fact that among many penalties employed among them the one most disliked is the exclusion of a convicted offender from the use of wine for such a period as the sentencing judge may prescribe. Those thus punished . . . " "

^a The answer to this question may partly be recovered from the two in Dio Cassius, xxxvii. 18. The positions of the known planets, sun, and moon, and their orbits were believed to be in the order : (1) Saturn, (2) Jupiter, (3) Mars, (4) Sun, (5) Venus, (6) Mercury, (7) Moon. The hours of the day were named each after a planet, in the order given. Each day was named after the planet of its first hour ; then, if the first day was named for the first planet, the second day, beginning 24 hours later, would be named for the fourth planet, the third day for the seventh planet, and so on through third, sixth, second, and fifth. The alternative explanation in Dio Cassius. which is described as based on "the principle of the tetrachord," amounts, in simple terms, to the following : if the degrees of the musical scale are numbered from one through seven, and these are grouped in terms of tetrachords (as the Greeks had practical reasons for doing), the same series 1-4-7-3-6-2-5 is again arrived at as by the astronomical approach. The identification between music and mathematical astronomy would be to Greeks like Pythagoras, Plato, and Plutarch almost automatic. Our weekdays are still named after Teutonic equivalents, as those of the Romance languages are derived from the Latin names of the planets, sun, and moon, in the sequence established in antiquity. Note, however, that in languages derived from Latin the first day of the week is the Lord's day rather than Sunday. The Welsh term, however, comes from dies solis.

^b See Macrobius, Saturnalia, vii. 13. 7 ff., where two reasons are suggested. One, called the Egyptian, is to the effect that a nerve from this finger leads to the heart; the other, called Etruscan, is quoted from Ateius Capito, and is based on more practical reasons connected with the use of signet rings, such as not wearing one on the right hand, where it would be more easily damaged.

^e Pythagoras (see Porphyry, Life of Pythag. 42, in Diels-Kranz, Vorsokratiker^{*}, vol. i, p. 466, lines 5 f.) and Ateius Capito (in Macrobius, Saturnalia, vii. 13. 11) forbade images of gods on rings. Under the emperor Claudius courtiers wore his image on a ring (Pliny, Nat. Hist. xxxiii, 12. 41).

^d Lettuce was considered antiaphrodisiac. See Pliny, Nat. Hist. xix. 127, and especially Dioscorides, Materia Medica, ii. 136.

In the same way our soul partakes of the pleasures of eating and drinking while attending, like a nurse, to the appetites of the body, complying with its demands and calming its passions; but when the body is comfortable and at peace, then at last the soul, released from care and servitude, can devote itself to its own pleasures and feast on ideas, learning, tales of the past,^b and speculation about unusual questions. QUESTION 1

Why we take pleasure in hearing actors represent anger and pain but not in seeing people actually experience these emotions d

Speakers : Plutarch, Epicurean friends of Plutarch

1. THE views that I have mentioned were the subject of discussion once when you were yourself with us at Athens. It was at the time when the comedian Strato ^e won his victory, for I recall that everybody was talking about him. We were at dinner at the house of Boëthus^f the Epicurean with many others of his persuasion. As was natural among people of an inquiring turn of mind, the mention of comedy led us into a discussion : why is it that, although we are distressed and annoyed to hear the voices of people in anger, pain or fear, we yet are greatly entertained when mimics reproduce these emotions and copy the tones and attitudes of the sufferers?

^a In De Se Ipsum Laudando, 540 B this proverb is explained : anyone who set foot in another's chorus was a fool and a meddler (De Lacy and Einarson's translation). Cf. Leutsch and Schneidewin, Paroemiogr. Graec. ii, p. 690. 378

The other guests were practically unanimous in saying that, inasmuch as the imitator enjoys a superiority and advantage over the actual sufferer by not having suffered himself, awareness of that fact gives us pleasure and delight. (2) But I spoke up, "setting foot in another's chorus."^a I said that, since we are naturally endowed with reason and love of art,^b we have an affinity for any performance that exhibits reason or artistry, and admire success therein. "Just as the bee, loving sweetness, seeks out and busies itself with any object that contains a suggestion of honey, so a human being, born with a love of art and beauty, is by nature disposed to welcome and cherish every product or action that bears the stamp of mind and reason.

"Certainly, if someone were to place in front of a small child both a loaf of bread and a little dog or a cow made of the dough, you would see the child irresistibly drawn to the miniature figure. Likewise, if one person presents to him a shapeless lump of silver, while another brings him a little silver animal or cup, the child will take by preference the second, in which he perceives art and meaning. This explains why children like stories better that involve riddles, and games that offer some complication or difficulty. People require no instruction ^e to be at-

Under the influence of genuine anger or pain a man always displays certain universal emotions and gestures, whereas a successful imitation manifests a cunning and authority of its own, so that we take a natural delight in the performance, but are distressed by the reality.

"We have a similar experience in relation to the plastic arts. We feel acute pain at the sight of the sick or the dying; but a painting of Philoctetes ^a or a statue of Jocasta ^b gives us pleasure and elicits our admiration. They say that the artist added silver ^c to Jocasta's face in order to give his bronze statue the appearance of a person on the verge of death.

"This, my Epicurean friends," I said, "is really good evidence in favour of the Cyrenaics,^d who contend in their dispute with you that it is not in our sight or our hearing but in our minds that we receive pleasure from sights and sounds. "What emotion or what external happening made people admire Parmeno's pig so much that it has become proverbial? You know the story : one time when Parmeno was already famous for his mimicry, some competitors put on a rival show, but the populace, being prejudiced in favour of Parmeno, said. 'Good enough !- but nothing, compared with Parmeno's sow." Then one of the performers stepped forward with a sucking pig concealed under his arm ; but the people, even when they heard the genuine squeal, murmured, 'Well, what's this compared to Parmeno's pig?' Thereupon the fellow let the pig go in the crowd to prove that their judgement was based on prejudice instead of truth. This plainly demonstrates that the very same sensation will not produce a corresponding effect a second time in people's minds unless they believe that intelligence or conscious striving is involved in the performance."

^a Originally Apollo was said to be opposed to the aulos (pipe), but from 586 s.c. on the aulos was introduced at Delphi and gradually became so popular that the "Pythian nome" came to mean exclusively an auletic melody. nated. For, once having accepted the tragic competitor as an addition to the original three (the Pythian piper,^{a} the lyricist, and the singer to the lyre), the authorities found that as if the gate had been opened, they could no longer withstand the massed attack and incursion of all manner of entertainments addressed to the ear. This gave a pleasing variety and popular appeal to the festival at the cost of its severe and strictly musical character; it also made trouble for the judges and naturally created much animosity because the defeated in the competitions were many.

Some of our company thought that particularly the tribe of prose writers and poets ought to be withdrawn. This was not because of any bias against literature, but because we were embarrassed before those most celebrated of all the contestants and vexed that not all of them could win a victory, though they all seemed to us accomplished. During the Council meeting I attempted to dissuade those who wished to change established practices and who found fault with the festival as if it were a musical instrument with too many strings and too many notes. Later, when this general subject came up again at a dinner given us by Petraeus,^b the Director of the Games, I once more defended the cause of the arts. I made the point that poetry was not a late arrival nor a novelty at the religious festivals, but had in fact received the crown of victory in very ancient times. Some of my friends expected me to cite well-worn examples like the funeral ceremonies of Oeolycus ^c

^b Or "interpreter." Cf. Parke and Wormell, The Delphic Oracle, ii, pp. xiii ff. Minar in the LCL translation at 723 F takes the word in its other sense of "geographer." ^c The young son of Ino, who was driven to leap with him

Isthmia, was the subject of a discussion at a dinner given us in Corinth itself during the Games by Lucanius, the chief priest. Praxiteles, a the official guide,^b appealed to mythology, citing the legend that the body of Melicertes ^c was found cast up by the sea at the foot of a pine. Not far from Megara there is, he pointed out, a place named "The Beauty's Flight," along which, according to the Megarians, Ino rushed down to the sea with her child in her arms. Many of the company stated that according to common belief the crown of pine belonged specifically to Poseidon; but Lucanius added that, because the tree was dedicated also to Dionysus, it had quite appropriately become a part of the cult of Melicertes. It was this last remark that prompted our inquiry how the ancients came to dedicate the pine to Poseidon and Dionysus.

To us there seemed nothing illogical in this, because both gods are by common acceptance sovereign over the domains of the moist and the generative. Practically all Greeks sacrifice to Poseidon the Life-Giver^d and to Dionysus the Tree-god.^e Still, one might well say that the pinc is especially connected with Poseidon, not, as Apollodorus ¹ believes, because it grows by the sea, nor because it, like the sea, loves the wind (for some argue to this effect); but above all because of its use in shipbuilding. The pine and kindred trees, like fir and stone-pine, produce the woods most suitable for shipbuilding, as well as pitch and resin for waterproofing, without which no hull is seaworthy.

On the other hand, the pine has been dedicated to Dionysus because it is thought to sweeten wine ; for they say that country abounding in pines produces sweet-wine grapes. Theophrastus attributes this effect to the heat in the soil,^a saying that in general the pine grows in clayey soil, and clay, being hot, matures the wine, even as it also yields the lightest and sweetest spring-water. Incidentally, if clay is mixed with wheat, its heat considerably increases the bulk by distending and thickening the kernels.

It is also probable, however, that the pine itself contributes to the growth of the grapevine, since this tree is rich in substances efficacious in preserving wine and guaranteeing its quality; pitch is always used to seal wine-vessels, and many people mix wine with resin. For instance, in Greece the Euboeans do so, and in Italy those who live near the Po; pitchflavoured wine^b is imported from the region about Vienna^c in Gaul and is highly esteemed by the Romans. These uses of pitch not only give the wine a certain bouquet but add body ^d to it, because they quickly remove by heat the insipidity of the new wine.

^b For further discussion of the use of pitch in connection with wine see Pliny, Nat. Hist. xiv. 124 ff., xvi. 22.53 ff. Compare the modern retsinato.

I'd gladly sell the entire Isthmian show For the price at which the celery crown will go.^b

The historian Timaeus ^e records the following anecdote. During their campaign against the Carthaginians in the war for Sicily, the Corinthians suddenly saw some asses carrying celery. Most of the troops interpreted the encounter as a bad omen, because celery is regarded as a symbol of mourning,^d and we say of those who are critically ill that 'a sprig of celery is all you can give them now.' Timoleon,^e however, restored the spirits of his men precisely by reminding them of the celery used as the crown of victory at the Isthmus.

3. But Lucanius looked at me with a smile, and said, "Poseidon! What a parade of quotations! It looks as if other people have taken advantage of our untutored ignorance to convince us, on the contrary, that the pine was the traditional garland at these games, and that the crown of celery was imported more recently from Nemea because of rivalry with Heracles.^b According to them, although the celery prevailed as a fitting sacred symbol and caused the pine to be forgotten, nevertheless in the course of time the pine recovered its original prerogative, to flourish now in high honour."

TABLE-TALK V. 3, 677

I for one was persuaded and gave the matter my attention and have committed to memory many authorities that go to prove Lucanius right. Euphorion,^a for instance, wrote about Melicertes somewhat to this effect :

Weeping they laid the youth by the shore on boughs of pine,

When still they bore them as the victor's crown.

Not yet had savage grip of hands brought down

Menê's fierce-eyed son ' by Asopus' daughter's side. °

But ever since they've put full wreaths of celery on their brows.

I remember Callimachus also, d who makes the point clearer. In his poem Heracles says of celery :

The sons of Aletes, * keeping festival more ancient far than this,

By god Aegaeon's shore this crown shall make the badge of Isthmic victory ;

In rivalry with Nemea, but the pine they shall misprise

Which erstwhile crowned each champion there at Ephyra.¹

QUESTION 4 ^b

On Homer's "Mix the wine stronger" Speakers: Niceratus, Sosicles, Antipater, Plutarch

1. At a dinner, some of the guests said that they thought Achilles ridiculous in urging Patroclus to pour stronger ^c wine and then adding as a reason,

These friends most dear are under my roof.^d

Niceratus, our friend from Macedonia, went so far as to maintain flatly that Homer's word $z\bar{o}ros$ means not "unmixed" but "hot," deriving it from $z\bar{o}tikos$ (lifegiving) and zesis (boiling). In his opinion it was right to mix a new bowl when friends come, even as we mix fresh wine when about to pour libations to the gods. But Sosicles the poet, recalling that Empedocles e had said that in the universal evolution "what was until then akrêtos (unmixed) became $z\hat{o}ros$," argued that $z\hat{o}ros$ was used by the poet in the sense of "well-mixed" (eukratos) rather than "unmixed" (akratos). Nothing hindered Achilles from urging Patroclus to prepare well-mixed wine for drinking, nor was it strange for him to use the comparative form zôroteros for zôros just as he uses dexiteros for dexios ("right hand") and thêlyteros for thêlys ("female"), because Homer is apt to use the comparative forms interchangeably with the positive. Our friend Antipater, however, said that in ancient times the year was called hôros, and that customarily the prefix za had intensive force; this explains why Achilles calls wine that is many years old and aged zôros.

2. But I reminded them that some maintain that the term zôroteros signifies "hot" (thermos) and that thermoteros (hotter) signifies "faster," as when we urge our helpers and servants to apply themselves "more warmly" (thermoteron) to their work. On the other hand, I pointed out, their own gallant effort was schoolboyish because they were afraid to admit that zôroteron means "stronger" (akratoteron), as if this would put Achilles in an awkward position. Zoïlus of Amphipolis ^a made just this mistake, not realizing that, in the first place, Achilles told Patroclus to strengthen the mixture because he knew that older men like Phoenix and Odysseus prefer their wine strong rather than watery.

Secondly, Achilles, the pupil of Cheiron and therefore not ignorant of the principles of diet, must have reflected that a weaker, milder mixture was suitable for those (like himself and Patroclus) who were enjoying unaccustomed leisure and idleness. For just this reason he feeds the horses celery ^b along with other fodder—quite rightly, because celery is the specific remedy for horses that are lame from unaccustomed idleness. At least there is no other case where we find celery or any such green forage thrown to horses in the lliad. But like the good doctor he was, Achilles gave exactly that care to the horses which was proper to the circumstances, by providing the lightest diet as the most healthful during idleness. He did not see fit to treat alike those men who had spent the day in combat and struggle and those who had been idle ; so he ordered a strengthening of the mixture. In fact, it is evident that Achilles by temperament is no lover of wine but a rough, unsocial character :

Not sweet of spirit was the man, nor gentle, But in a passion \ldots^{a}

He somewhere says, when talking freely about himself, that he "spent many sleepless nights"^b; but a brief sleep will not satisfy a drinker of neat wine. When he jeers at Agamemnon, the first epithet that he hurls at him is "wine-sodden,"^e as if casting up to him winebibbing above all other weaknesses. There was every reason, therefore, why Achilles should think, when Odysseus and Phoenix appeared, that perhaps his usual mixture would be mild and inadequate for them.

TABLE-TALK V. 5, 678

QUESTION 5

On those who invite large numbers to dinner Speakers : Plutarch and his grandfather Lamprias

1. THE awkward problem that turns up of finding places for guests at table was the subject of considerable discussion at the parties that each of my friends gave me on my return from Alexandria. For on every occasion many were included who had even the slightest apparent claim to an invitation, and consequently the gatherings were turbulent and broke up early. But when Onesicrates the physician invited, not a large crowd, but only some very dear friends and close relatives, it struck me that you could apply to parties the words of Plato a: "An augmented state is not one state but several." "For the size of a party also," I said, " is right so long as it easily remains one party. If it gets too large, so that the guests can no longer talk to each other or enjoy the hospitality together or even know one another, then it ceases to be a party at all. For at a social gathering there should be no need for aides-de-camp, as in an army, or boatswains to set the stroke, as in a trireme, but people should converse directly with one another; even as in a chorus the end man is within earshot of the leader."

2. When I had said this, my grandfather Lamprias, raising his voice so that everyone could hear, said, "Do I understand that we must observe moderation then, not only in eating, but in the number of guests that we invite ? It seems to me that there is such a thing as going too far even in hospitality, when you omit no possible guest but drag everybody in, as if to some show or public recitation. The host who runs out of bread or wine is not so ridiculous, to my way of thinking, as the one who fails to provide room and place for his guests. There ought at all times to be ample provision even for uninvited guests,^a including total strangers who come of their own accord. Besides, if bread and wine give out, it is possible to lay the blame on thieving servants, but if space gives out because it has been spent on too great a crowd, then the host himself is guilty of a kind of insult to his guests. Incidentally, this line of Hesiod is amazingly popular :

Before all else in the world, void came into existence,^b simply because room and place were prerequisite to all subsequent creation. Contrast that with the way in which my son yesterday ^c converted the banquet into the famous Anaxagorean plenum : ' All things were one solid mass.' d

"However, if both space and the provisions are ample, we must still avoid great numbers, because they in themselves interfere with sociability and conversation. It is worse to take away the pleasure of conversation at table than to run out of wine. Theophrastus e in jest calls barbershops " wineless drinking parties" just because of the chatter of those who come to sit there. People who bring together too these " shadows " as they were called, who were often brought to the banquet by some invited guest.

So it is a mistake for the wealthy to build showy dining-rooms that hold thirty couches or more. Such magnificence makes for unsociable and unfriendly banquets where the manager of a fair is needed more than a toastmaster. However, in their case we must forgive this display, for they consider wealth, unless it has witnesses and, like a tragedy, spectators, no wealth but something blind indeed b and cut off from the world. But the rest of us can protect ourselves against the risk of gathering too large a crowd by entertaining frequently in small groups. Those who give dinner parties as seldom as 'the lightning flashes over Harma,' e as the saying goes, are forced to include in the guest list every acquaintance and relative, however distant. People, on the other hand, who entertain more frequently, three or four guests at a time, keep their parties light and manageable as a ferryman keeps his boat.

the gathering. For assistance in practical matters we appeal, not to all our friends, but only to those who are particularly competent to help. For instance. when we desire advice, we call upon the wise : when we go to law, we summon pleaders; and for companionship on a journey we look to those who are at leisure and unburdened by daily cares. It is equally true that for our parties we must always be careful to choose the right guests. The right guests for a banquet in honour of a political leader are public officials and civic leaders, if they are friends. At weddings and birthday parties, it is relatives, those who share in the worship of Zeus, Protector of the Family.ª In parties like the present one to welcome home a friend, or else to bid him farewell, the host should gather together the persons most likely to please the guest of honour.

"When we sacrifice to a god we do not offer prayers to all the other gods but to those especially who share the same temple or altar : having mixed three bowls of wine,^b we offer a libation out of the first to some gods, out of the second to others, and out of the last to still others; for 'Jealousy has no place in the choir of the gods.' ^c Surely the choir of friends, too, is divine, and can be divided wisely ^d into successive social gatherings."

QUESTION 6

Why there is lack of space for the diners at the beginning of a meal and ample space later

Speakers: Grandfather Lamprias and others

IMMEDIATELY after this discussion, we raised the question why the space for the diners seems inadequate at the beginning of a meal, but later seems comfortably ample. The very opposite would be expected because of the effect of the intake of food. Some of the company sought the explanation in the position of the diners on the couches; in general, each guest, while eating, assumes a posture a almost flat, since he must stretch his right hand forward to the table ; but after eating he turns back more upon his side, forming a sharper angle with the couch and occupying no longer a flat surface, but merely, one might say, a line. Just as knucklebones occupy less space if they come to rest on end instead of flat on one side, so each of us takes up space at the beginning of a meal by leaning forward to face the table but later changes position on the couch so as to occupy more space vertically than horizontally.

Most of our company, however, found the answer to the question in the settling of the cushions as they are crushed by the weight of the diners; they flatten and spread like old shoes that by gradually widening and becoming roomy because of the porousness of the material provide space and play for the foot. But the old gentleman playfully said that one identical feast has two dissimilar presidents and directors : at the beginning Hunger, who has nothing to do with

Just so, we who at the beginning of dinner were all demoralized by hunger like a pack of yelping hounds, have now been taken in hand by Dionysus, the Releaser and Choral Leader, and reduced to a cheerful and sociable co-ordination.

QUESTION 7

On those who are said to cast an evil eye ° Speakers : Mestrius Florus, Plutarch, Patrocleas, Soclarus, Gaius

1. ONCE at dinner a discussion arose about people who are said to cast a spell and to have an evil eye. While everybody else pronounced the matter completely silly and scoffed at it, Mestrius Florus,^d our host, declared that actual facts lend astonishing support to the common belief. Yet the reports of such facts are commonly rejected because of the want of an explanation; but this is not right, in view of the thousands of other cases of indisputable fact in which the logical explanation escapes us.^d

^a Wonder is the origin of philosophy, according to Plato 418

" In general," he went on, " the man who demands to see the logic of each and every thing destroys the wonder in all things. Whenever the logical explanation for anything eludes us, we begin to be puzzled, and therefore to be philosophers.^a Consequently, in a way, those who reject marvels destroy philosophy. The right method," he maintained, " is to search out the reason for facts by means of logic, but to take the facts themselves as they are recorded. Now, many instances of such unexplained phenomena as the evil eye are on record. We know, for instance, of persons who seriously hurt children by looking at them, influencing and impairing their susceptible, vulnerable constitutions, but who are less able to affect in this way the firm and established health of older persons. And yet the so-called Thibaeans,^b who anciently lived near the Pontus, were, according to Phylarchus, ° deadly not only to children but to adults. He says that those who were subjected to the glance, breath, or speech of these people, fell ill and wasted away, a phenomenon apparently observed by the half-Greeks who brought slaves for sale from there. Now, one element in this story will hardly surprise anyone, for obviously enough an attack of illness may be due to contact and infection. When the feathers of other birds are put together with those of eagles, they rub against them and are destroyed through putrefaction.^a Just so, there is no reason to doubt that contact between human beings may prove in some cases beneficial and in others rough and harmful. It also does happen sometimes, as I have said, that people are injured by a mere look; but because the reason is hard to track down, the fact is not believed."

2. "Indeed," I answered, "in a way you yourself have found the track and trail of the reason b at the point where you came to effluences ^c from bodies. For odour, voice, and breathing are all emanations of some kind, streams of particles from living bodies, that produce sensation whenever our organs of sense are stimulated by their impact. Living bodies are, because of their warmth and motion,^d far more likely in reason to give off these particles than are inanimate bodies, inasmuch as breathing produces a certain pulsation and turmoil whereby the body is struck and emits a continuous stream of emanations. In all probability the most active stream of such emanations is that which passes out through the eye. For vision, being of an enormous swiftness and carried by an essence e that gives off a flame-like brilliance, diffuses a wondrous influence. In consequence, man both experiences and produces many effects through his eyes. He is possessed and governed by either pleasure or displeasure exactly in proportion to what he sees.

that most powerful and violent experience of the soul, and causes the lover to melt and be dissolved when he looks at those who are beautiful, as if he were pouring forth his whole being towards them. For this reason, we are entitled, I think, to be most surprised at anyone who believes that, while men are passively influenced and suffer harm through their eyes, they yet should not be able to influence others and inflict injury in the same way. The answering glances of the young and the beautiful and the stream of influence from their eyes, whether it be light or a current of particles, melts the lovers and destroys them, amid pleasure commingled with pain, a pleasure that they themselves call (bittersweet.' a Neither by touch nor by hearing do they suffer so deep a wound as by seeing and being seen. Such are the diffusion of effluences and the kindling of passion through eyesight that only those unacquainted with love itself could, in my judgement, be astonished at the natural phenomenon that takes place when Median naphtha^b catches fire at a distance from a flame. The glances of the beautiful kindle fire, even when returned from a great distance, in the souls of the amorous.

"Then again, we are often told about the remedy used to help sufferers from jaundice, who are cured by looking at a plover.^c The nature and bodily temperament of this bird is apparently such that it draws Hipponax 48 (Diehl): plovers were sold with their heads covered to prevent loss of their commercial value. out and takes to itself the affliction, which passes like a stream through the eyes of the patient. Consequently, plovers cannot bear to face people who are afflicted with jaundice, but turn away and keep their eyes closed, not because they begrudge the effect of their healing power, as some think, but because they are wounded thereby, as if by a blow. Finally, diseases of the eye are more contagious to those exposed and more instantaneously so than other diseases, so penetrating and swift is the power of the eye to admit or communicate disease."

3. "You are indeed right," said Patrocleas, " so far as the physiological effects go. But as regards the psychical, including the casting of spells, how precisely can harm spread to others by a mere glance of the eye ? " I answered : " Don't you know that the body is sympathetically affected when the mind is subjected to any influence ? Amorous thoughts will excite the sexual organs; the frenzy of hounds in their struggle with their prey often dims their sight and even blinds them; and pain, greed for gold, or jealousy will cause a man to change colour, and wear away his health. Envy, which naturally roots itself more deeply in the mind than any other passion, contaminates the body too with evil. This is the morbid condition that artists well attempt to render when painting the face of envy. When those possessed by envy to this degree let their glance fall upon a person, their eyes, which are close to the mind and draw from it the evil influence of the passion, then assail that person as if with poisoned arrows; hence, I conclude, it is not paradoxical or incredible

The bite of dogs too is more dangerous when they are angry; and it is said that in human beings the sperm is more likely to lay hold and cause conception when union is accompanied by love. In general, the emotions of the mind increase the violence and energy of the body's powers. What I have said shows why the so-called amulets are thought to be a protection against malice. The strange look of them attracts the gaze, so that it exerts less pressure upon its victim. Count this, Florus, as my contribution toward the expense of the entertainment." ^a Fair once were, fair indeed the tresses of Eutelidas; But he cast an evil spell on himself, that baneful man, Beholding self in river's eddy; and straight the fell disease...

The legend is that Eutelidas, beautiful in his own estimation, being affected by what he saw, fell sick and lost his beauty with his health. See if you have the ingenuity to account for extraordinary phenomena like that."

5. "Well," I replied, "I haven't enough otherwise; but since I'm drinking out of this big cup, as you see, I have the boldness to say that all emotions, after having been a long time in the mind, produce evil conditions. These evil conditions, when they acquire the force of second nature, will under any chance stimulus cause a relapse, even against the person's will, into the habitual and familiar emotion. Consider how the cowardly are afraid even of things that would save their lives, and how the irascible are peevish towards even their dearest friends, and how the lustful and licentious end by being unable to refrain from assaulting the most sacred persons. Habit is powerful to influence disposition according to a set pattern, and it is inevitable that a man prone to lapse will trip over every temptation that falls in his way. Accordingly there is no reason for surprise if those who have brought themselves into a state of envy and malignity are activated even against their near and dear as befits their special pathological condition. In these circumstances they are acting as their nature but not as their will directs. As a sphere by its distinctive shape is forced to roll like a sphere, and a cylinder like a cylinder, so a man whose disposition is envious has to act in an envious manner in all things. Besides, it is natural for him to cast his gaze oftener on those near and dear to him and consequently to hurt them more than he does others.

"To my mind it seems reasonable enough that the excellent Eutelidas and all others who are said to have cast a spell on themselves should have encountered such a misfortune. For supreme good health is, according to Hippocrates,^a precarious. When the body reaches the pinnacle of health, it does not remain there, but wavers and sinks towards the opposite condition. Therefore, when people experience a complete improvement in health and find themselves better off than they had expected, they marvel and look closely at themselves; but actually they are now near a reversal, and when their condition takes a sudden turn for the worse, they are thought to have put themselves under a spell. Self-bewitchment is most frequently brought about by the streams of particles reflected from sheets of water or other mirror-like surfaces; these reflections rise like vapour and return to the beholder, so that he is himself injured by the same means by which he has been injuring others. And perhaps when this happens in the case of children, the blame is often wrongly fastened upon those who gaze at them."

Megara?^a Democritus says that these simulacra are emanations emitted not altogether unconsciously or unintentionally by the malevolent, and are charged with their wickedness and envy. According to him, these simulacra with their burden of evil, adhering to their victims and in fact permanently lodged in them, confound and injure both their bodies and their minds. So, I believe, runs his text and his intention, expressed in language both lofty and inspired."

I answered, "Quite true, but I wonder how it escaped you that the only things that I denied to the emanations were life and free will. QUESTION 8

Why Homer speaks of the apple tree as "splendid in its fruit" and Empedocles calls apples hyperphloia adding the words " flourishing olive trees." This made us wonder why Homer singled out the apple tree as bearing splendid fruit. Tryphon,^b the physician, said that this expression was intended to contrast the fruit with the tree, which, though indeed quite small and insignificant in appearance, produces fine, big fruit. Someone else rejoined that, so far as he could see, no other fruit unites the fine qualities of all fruits as does the apple. For one thing, its skin is so clean when you touch it that instead of staining the hands it perfumes them. Its taste is sweet and it is extremely delightful both to smell and to look at. Thus, by charming all our senses at once, it deserves the praise that it receives.

2. I remarked that this was a fair statement ; but that I was puzzled by a line of Empedocles,^c

Because late-grown pomegranates and succulent apples.

The epithet that he applies to pomegranates is clear : it signifies that they ripen when the late harvest season is coming to an end and the heat is becoming less intense. The hot sun will not allow the weak and meagre sap of the pomegranate to develop to a proper consistency until the air begins to change and grow cooler. That is why, according to Theophrastus,^d this is the only tree that allows its fruit to mature better and more quickly in the shade. But what puzzled me, I confessed, was what the philosopher meant by calling apples "succulent" (hyperphloia); especially since he was not in the habit of tricking out facts for the sake of elegant writing by using

For instance, he applies ^a the expression "earth that envelops a mortal" to the body that clothes us, and "cloudgatherer" to the air, and "rich in blood" to the liver.

3. When I finished, some scholars who were present said that the apples were described as "succulent" (hyperphloia) because they were at their prime. For the poets use the term "to bubble" (phlyein) ^b to mean "be at the height and flourish." Antimachus also, they argued, in very much the same way, described the city of the Cadmeians^c as "teeming with fruit" (phleiousan). Likewise Aratus,^d speaking of Sirius in the line,

To some he gives strength but of others he blights the bark (phloon) utterly, was calling the freshness and bloom of fruit "bark" (phloos). Then, the argument went on, there are some Greeks "who sacrifice to Dionysus Phleios. Therefore, since apples more than any other fruit retain their freshness and bloom, the philosopher called them hyperphloia ("abnormally luxuriant").

But my grandfather Lamprias said that hyper meant not merely "excessively" or "violently" but also "outside" or "on top." In this way we use the expression hyperthyron ("over the door") for "lintel," and hyperoon for "upper story." Homer has the

"So," he went on, "consider whether Empedocles did not employ the term rather with this intention : whereas other fruits are encased by a phloios ('husk') on the outside (that is, they have what is called a rind, pod, capsule, or shell on the surface), apples have their phloios inside as a shiny, glutinous coat to which the seed is attached, so that the edible part surrounding all this on the outside is with good reason called hyperphloion (' outside the rind ')."

QUESTION 9

Why the fig tree though extremely bitter produces extremely sweet fruit

Speakers : Grandfather Lamprias and others

NEXT the question was raised why so mellow and sweet a fruit as the fig grows on the bitterest of trees. The leaf of this tree is even called from its roughness thrion °; the wood is full of an acid sap and produces a very acrid smoke when burned,^d and the powder derived from its ash is most detergent because of its causticity. But what is most astonishing is that, though all plants bud and produce fruit, the fig alone is without flowers. If, as they say, a fig is never struck by lightning, this too could be attributed to the bitterness and poorness of its trunk. For it is held that lightning never strikes objects of that

^c Thrion and trachys (" rough ") are here evidently considered cognate.

^d The bitterness of the tree is again pointed out at Table-Talk, vi. 10, 696 F ff. below.

description, just as it never strikes sealskins or hyena pelts.^a

The old gentleman, however, countered that since whatever sweetness is in the plant is concentrated entirely in the fruit, it naturally leaves the rest bitter and undiluted. As the liver itself is sweet to the taste when the bile has been drawn off into its proper place, so the fig tree, discharging all its oily and succulent matter into the fruit, is itself robbed of all sweetness. "For," he said, "I base my belief that the wood partakes of some latent sweetness on what the gardeners say about rue. According to them, rue has a sweeter and milder taste if it grows under or is planted ^b beside a fig tree, as if it derived from that a certain sweetness that counteracts its strong, heavy flavour ;---unless, on the contrary, bless my soul, the fig reduces the bitterness by drawing off the nourishment in the soil."

^a To take potluck : either to take a meal of salt and a bean or to take a meal that costs only the value of salt and a bean. Cheapness is connoted by the phrase $\pi \rho \delta s \ a \lambda a$ (" for the price of salt ") in Menander, 805 (Körte), according to Zenobius 442 verb. The scholar Apollophanes had a ready answer for this, saying, "The proverb refers to friends who are so close to us as to be content to dine with us on salt and a bean."^a Then we raised the question why salt is so highly esteemed.^b For Homer goes so far as to say,

He sprinkled with salt divine, °

and Plato ^d says that by the custom of mankind salt is regarded as of all substances the one most favoured by the gods. The question was complicated by the fact that the Egyptian priests made it a point of religion to abstain completely from salt,^d even eating their bread unsalted; how, if it is god-favoured and divine, did they come to avoid its use on religious grounds?

2. Florus then told us to leave the Egyptians out of it, and to find a good Greek answer to our own question. But I said that actually the Egyptians were not here in conflict with the Greeks. Strict religious observances prohibit, at certain times, procreation, laughter, wine, and many other things which usually deserve approval. So perhaps the Egyptians from motives of purity avoid salt on account of the aphrodisiac properties sometimes attributed to it because of its heat.¹ But it is just as probable that they protest against salt because it is delicious as a

3. "Shall we say then," asked Florus, "that this is a reason why salt has been termed divine?" "Indeed it is," I answered, "and not the least important one, either. For men consider divine the common things which most completely supply their practical needs, like water, light, and the seasons, and they conceive of the earth as not merely 'divine' but as actually a goddess. Salt is inferior to none of these in usefulness. It serves as a kind of finishing touch or coping to the meal for the body, and adapts the food to our appetite.

"Consider also whether this other property of salt is not divine too : preserving bodies uncorrupted for a long time, it is the opponent of death, and does not allow the dead to decay completely and vanish. As the soul, our most divine element, preserves life by preventing dissolution of the body, just so salt, when bodies are laid in it, closely parallel in its effect, intervenes, controls and checks the process of decay, by harmonizing and reconciling the constituent parts.^a That is why some of the Stoics say that the sow at birth is dead flesh,^b but that the soul is implanted in it later, like salt, to preserve it. You observe also that we consider the fire of lightning as sacred and divine because we find the bodies of those struck by it preserved for a long time against decay.^c

What wonder, then, that the ancients considered salt to be divine also, since it has the same property as the divine fire ? "

4. When I stopped speaking, Philinus took up the thread : " Don't you think that generation is divine, since the beginning of anything is always a god?" I said yes, and he went on : "Well, people hold that salt contributes not a little to generation, even as you yourself have said in talking about the Egyptians. Dog-fanciers, at any rate, whenever their dogs are sluggish towards copulation stimulate and intensify the seminal power dormant in the animals by feeding them salty meat and other briny food. Ships carrying salt breed an infinite number of rats, because, according to some authorities, the females conceive without coition by licking the salt. But it is more likely that the saltiness imparts a sting to the sexual members and serves to stimulate copulation. For this reason, perhaps, womanly beauty is called 'salty' and 'piquant' when it is not passive nor unvielding, but has charm and provocativeness. I imagine that the poets called Aphroditê "born of the brine " and have spread the fiction of her origin in the sea by way of alluding to the generative property of salt. For they also represent Poseidon himself and the sea gods in general as fertile and prolific. Even among the animals you cannot find one species of land or air that is so proliferous as are

BOOK SIX

PLATO, dear Sossius Senecio, once got Timotheüs,ª the son of Conon,^a away from the sumptuous officers' messes he frequented, and entertained him at dinner in the Academy with simplicity and respect for the Muses. It was the sort of table that Ion^b called "unfevered," c a table that is followed by undisturbed sleep and only light dreams, because the body is in a state of calm and tranquillity. In the morning Timotheüs was conscious of the difference and observed that Plato's dinner guests felt well even on the day after. It is truly a great contribution to our health and happiness to have our bodies in a good state of balance, not sodden with wine, but light and ready unhesitatingly for any activity. Another and not less valuable privilege guaranteed to Plato's guests was that of recalling afterwards what had been said over the drinks. Remembering past delights in food and drink is an ignoble kind of pleasure and one

^b Plato speaks of his writing and speculation as $\pi a \iota \delta \iota \dot{a}$ 454 that is, besides, as unsubstantial as yesterday's perfume or the lingering smell of cooking. On the other hand, the topics of philosophical inquiry and discussion not only give pleasure by remaining ever present and fresh to those who actually recall them. but they also provide just as good a feast on the same food to those who, having been left out, partake of them through oral report. In this way, it is even to-day open to men of literary taste to enjoy and share in the Socratic banquets as much as did the original diners. Yet if pleasure were purely physical, the proper thing would have been for both Xenophon and Plato to leave us a record, not of the conversation, but of the relishes, cakes, and sweets served at Callias's house and Agathon's.^a As it is, they never deign to mention such matters, for all the expense and effort these presumably involved ; but they preserve in writing only the philosophical discussions, combining fun^b with serious effort. Thus they have left precedents to be followed not only in meeting together for good conversation over wine, but in recording the conversation afterward.

which the first subject of discussion is why those who fast suffer thirst more than hunger. It appeared illogical that those who have starved themselves should suffer thirst more than hunger, because we thought that according to nature the want of dry food would call for a corresponding kind of replenishment. I therefore argued to those present that, in our bodies, it is solely or chiefly the hot element a that demands nourishment; "just as we see in fact that outside ourselves it is not air nor water nor earth, but only fire, that requires to be fed and consumes anything within reach. Thus, young animals are more ravenous than adults because of the heat in their bodies; conversely, aged men endure fasting most easily, for the fire in them is by now blunted and reduced, like that of bloodless animals which require less food than all other animals precisely because of their lack of heat. Exercise, shouting, or anything that by motion increases heat will always cause a man to eat with greater pleasure and a better will. Moisture, probably the most primary substance in nature, in my opinion, is the element that provides nourishment for heat.^b This is proved by the fact that flames increase whenever oil is added, and that ashes are the driest of all substances, because the dampness has been burned away and the earthy residue is left without a trace of moisture. Similarly, fire opens and tears

^b Or, as T. C. (in the edition by Several Hands, London, 1684–1694): "The most natural and principal nourishment of heat is moisture." There is perhaps an allusion to Thales, for whose theory Aristotle tries to account in language that seems reflected here. See Metaphysics, 983 b 22 ff. apart any solids by drawing off the moisture that cements and holds them together. So, when we fast, the moisture is first abstracted forcibly by the heat from any remnants of food left in the body. Then the burning process, seeking moisture, goes on to the natural juices of the body. Accordingly, since this produces dryness (compare how mud dries in the heat), it is natural for the body to want drink more until, reinvigorated and fortified by our drinking, the hot element arouses an appetite for solid food."

QUESTION 2

Whether hunger and thirst are caused by deficiency or by a change in shape of the passages

Speakers : Plutarch, Philo and other physicians

1. At this point in the discussion, Philo and the other physicians attacked the original premise, saying that thirst arises, not from a deficiency, but from a change of shape $^{\alpha}$ in certain channels in the body. For one thing, those who suffer from thirst at night lose their thirst without drinking, if they fall asleep; for another, those who have a fever are also freed of thirst as soon as the fever subsides or entirely ceases. Many are relieved of thirst after a bath, others, surprisingly, after vomiting. In these cases the moisture in their bodies is not increased by anything; it is only that the channels, being subjected to a change of shape, exhibit a new posture and condition.

^a There is a discussion of shapes or "structures" in Pseudo-Hippocrates, On Ancient Medicine, 22. 1. Cf. 649 p, supra, where the word poroi, here translated "passages" or "channels," is used to refer to "vessels of the vascular system" in plants. See now Sandbach in LCL Plut. Mor. xi, p. 141.

This is more obvious in the case of hunger. Many of the sick are in need of food and yet lack appetite; whereas some eat their fill, yet have appetites not only unabated but actually intensified and persistent. In fact, there have been many cases of loss of appetite when a taste of pickled olive or caper has brought prompt recovery and restored the appetite. This proves conclusively that our hunger springs from some modification of the passages and is not caused by deficiency; for this kind of food diminishes the want since nourishment is added, yet causes hunger. So the sharpness and pungency of salted food either twists and contracts the stomach or, conversely, by opening and relaxing it again, produces a kind of adjusted receptivity in it to nourishment, which we call appetite.

2. This seemed to me a plausible theory, but one that contradicts the most insistent purpose of nature, toward which appetite leads every creature; for appetite craves to fill every need and always pursues whatever is lacking to its own proper satisfaction. "Not to admit," I went on, "that appetite, one of the things that particularly differentiate the animate from the inanimate, is a means provided us for our protection and survival, one of the things that are implanted in us as needful and proper to our body, like an eye, but instead to imagine that appetite is some peculiar condition or modification of the channels brought about by differences in size—that, I say, is worthy of someone who simply leaves nature out of account.

"Further, it is illogical to hold, on the one hand, that the body is cold through a deficiency of proper heat, and, on the other hand, to refuse to say that it suffers thirst or hunger through a deficiency of natural moisture or nutriment. Still more illogical than this is the notion that although nature seeks evacuation because there is repletion, it seeks replenishment not because there is an emptiness, but on account of some other condition that supervenes. Moreover, these needs of animal life with their satisfactions differ in no respect from those that occur in agriculture ; many of the conditions and their remedies are similar. For instance, in the case of drought we irrigate; when anything is scorched, we make it moderately cool, and when the plants are cold, we try to warm and protect them by many sorts of covering. What is not in our power to provide we pray the god to grant, such as gentle dews or sunshine with mild breezes, so that nature may always have a replenishment of what is lost and thus preserve the balance of elements. I think that this is how the word trophê (nurture) originated; it is that which preserves nature (têrei physin). Plants preserve nature unconsciously, because, according to Empedocles,ª they draw as much water from the atmosphere as is needful. But in our case, it is appetite that teaches us to seek and pursue any element wanting in our balance.

" Not only that, but let us see in detail how false is each of the arguments offered. First, sharp and pungent foods perhaps produce not appetite but a stinging effect on the members which receive them, an effect much like the irritation caused by touching certain prickly things. Now if this is actually what excites appetite, it is probably because the eating of such things causes the comminution and disintegration of food already present in the system, and creates a deficiency, not because the passages are forced to adopt new shapes, but because they are emptied and purged. Sour, pungent, or salty foods break up, distribute, and disperse the crude stuff, and thus renew appetite because in the process the previous day's stale residue is squeezed out. Secondly, in the case of the bathers, thirst is abated, not through the reshaping of the channels, but by their absorption of liquid through the flesh and by their being thus refilled with moist steam.

"Next, vomiting, by expelling foreign matter, enables nature to benefit by its proper food. Thirst is not merely desire for liquid without qualification; it is desire for drink that is natural and suitable. Accordingly, even if there is an abundance of the wrong kind of nourishment, a man is still in want. Such abundance blocks the natural liquids craved by thirst, and permits no mixing or blending of food and drink until it is removed and passes off; then only can the channels receive their kindred ^a food. moisture downward, so that as the middle area is inflamed, the moisture withdraws to that one place and is subjected to violent pressure. In consequence, it is true that many men both vomit, because the condensation of matter inside by its pressure forces all liquids upward, and at the same time are thirsty because of deficiency and drought elsewhere in the body. Therefore, when the fever subsides and the heat leaves the central parts of the body, the moisture, as it spreads, returns to its level, and permeates the whole body, in keeping with its nature. At the same time, it provides relief to those central parts, and softens the flesh which has now become smooth and tender instead of rough and parched. This often even brings on sweating. Thus the deficiency that has caused thirst ends, and its effect is lost, as moisture shifts its position from the region where it causes distress and stoppage of the flow to the region where it is needed and missed. In a garden, even if there is an excellent well, the plants inevitably wither from thirst unless someone draws the water and irrigates; so, in our body, if all the liquid is drawn off to one spot, it is no wonder that there is deficiency and drought in the rest of the system until the flow and diffusion of moisture are restored. Similar also is the experience of patients after a fever and of those who fall asleep while thirsty. In those cases, too, sleep draws up the liquids from the central area and passes them on, thus bringing about a uniform distribution and a proper supply to all parts of the body.

to which you refer, by which hunger and thirst are occasioned? I cannot conceive any kind of contrast brought about by change in the condition of the channels, except contraction and expansion. When they contract, they cannot receive either food or drink; when they expand, they create emptiness and space, which is simply the want of some natural and proper substance. Observe also, my friend," I said, "that the steeping in astringent solution of fabric to be dyed involves the use of penetrating detergents to remove and dissolve extraneous matter in the channels or pores of the fabric, that they may better receive and hold the dye in the spaces thus provided and requiring to be filled."

Why hunger is appeased by drinking, but thirst increased by eating

1. At this point in the discussion our host said that this was a fair statement, and besides, the theory of the emptying and filling of passages might help us to answer another question : why does hunger cease immediately upon drinking while, on the contrary, those who thirst actually become thirstier on eating ? most easily and most convincingly, in my opinion, by the advocates of this theory of passages, although it isn't often that they are even so much as plausible. There are channels for everything, varying in capacity according to their purpose; the wider passages receive both solid and liquid matter, but the narrower only the liquid. Emptiness in these latter causes thirst; in the former it causes hunger. Hence, if those who are thirsty eat, they do not benefit, becauses the channels, being narrow, do not admit the dry food, and continue to miss what they require. On the other hand, if people who are hungry take a drink, the liquid does enter the larger passages, fills them, and alleviates the more violent pangs of hunger."

2. To my mind, the fact was clearly true, but I did not agree with the reason suggested for it. "For if you were to perforate the flesh," I said, "with these passages that certain people so fondly cling to, you would make it weak, quivering and unsound; to believe that both wet and dry food are not received into the same parts, but are filtered and separated as if through a strainer—that is unrealistic and absurd. The blending in our bodies of solid food with liquid, breaking it up with the help of the internal heat and vital spirit, reduces the food by every process of division and dissection in more accurate fashion than any instrument. fitting into vessels and apertures, but as being amalgamated and brought into organic agreement. Otherwise, the most difficult part of the problem isn't actually solved, the fact that those who take food without drinking anything actually increase instead of relieving their thirst; nothing has been said to explain that.

"Consider also," I went on, "whether we accept as evident two points which I have to make. The first is that moisture is consumed and destroyed by dryness, while dryness is saturated and softened by moisture so that it is dissolved and vaporized. My second point is that hunger and thirst result not from the total expulsion of dry or wet food, but from a lack of the proper and sufficient amount of either; because those who are totally deprived of either do not suffer hunger or thirst, but simply die. These premises granted, it is already easy to perceive the explanation that we seek. When we have eaten, thirst is aggravated because solid food, by its dryness, concentrates and draws off such scant and feeble moisture as is left scattered in the body. So outside the body we see earth, dust, and sand absorb any moisture that is mixed with them and make it disappear. However, on the other hand, drinking does necessarily relieve hunger. For the liquid drenches and dissolves such hard, tough remnants of food as are present in the system, and by means of the juices and vapours that are generated conveys them through the body and delivers them to those parts that need them. Therefore Erasistratus appropriately called water the vehicle of nourishment, since it combines with the food that is heavy and inert because of dryness or bulk and helps lift and carry it away. There are even many cases where, without drinking, but merely by bathing, men have found quick relief from extreme hunger. For the external moisture penetrates to the inward parts and, by causing relaxation, makes the food that is there more nourishing and more productive of healthy humours. The effect of this is to overcome and soothe the savage, bitter pangs of hunger. Therefore, some who are starving themselves to death survive even for a long time, if they merely keep on drinking water until everything is absorbed that can nourish and be added to the body."

Why water drawn from a well becomes cooler if it is kept overnight in the very air of the well^a

Speakers : a guest, Plutarch and others

1. For a guest who indulged in the luxury of cold drinks the servants procured water which was colder than that which came from the well by drawing it in a vessel and suspending the vessel all night long in the shaft of the well, but not in contact with the water below; thus it was brought to dinner cooler than newly drawn water. The guest, who was a fairly well-read man, said that he had found this in the writings of Aristotle,^b where the reason was explained. The explanation was as follows : all water will get cooler if it is preheated, like that provided for royalty^a; it is the practice, after the water is heated to the boiling point, to pack snow abundantly around the container, and the result is cooler water. Analogously, as is well known, our bodies too cool off more completely after a warm bath, because the relaxation caused by heat opens pores all over the body and makes it loose-textured, so that it lets in a flood of air from outside and causes a more drastic change from hot to cold. So, then, water withdrawn from the well cools quickly in the air, if preheated.

2. We applauded the stranger for his valiant feat of memory, but continued to puzzle over this theory. For how can the air in which the vessel hangs, if cold, heat the water ? On the other hand, if it is hot, how can it cool the water ? It is illogical for opposite effects to be produced in the same object by the same cause, if no difference has been introduced. When our friend was silent and puzzled at this, I said that there was no need to worry about the air, for our senses tell us that air is cold, especially deep in a well. It is, then, impossible to think that water is heated by cold air. Rather, this cold air cannot change the temperature of the well-water because there is too much of it ; but if you draw off a little water at a time, the air gains the advantage and will cool it.^a

^a Or "the Emperors " Warmington.

^b Plutarch says (De Primo Frigido, loc. cit.) that air is the cause of coldness. He fails to identify the effect of evaporation, which is multiplied by the use of porous jars. Cf. Helmbold's note b in LCL Mor. xii, p. 251.

QUESTION 5 ª

Why pebbles and lumps of lead thrown into water serve to make it cooler

Speakers : Plutarch and a guest

"Yes, and do you remember," I said, "a statement by Aristotle ^b about pebbles or lumps of metal,^c which people are said to drop into water to cool and temper it?" "About that," he answered, "he mentioned only the phenomenon itself as you've stated it, as one of a number of problems. It is up to us to try to explain the cause, which is extremely hard to discover."

"Quite so," said I, "I should really be surprised if it did not elude us; but look into it, anyway. First of all, don't you think that the water is cooled by the outside air that assails it, and that the air has more effect if it comes down against stones and lumps of metal? For these objects do not allow it to escape, as the bronze or clay vessels do, but by their density keep it and reflect it back into the water, so that the cooling pervades the whole and becomes thorough. That is why in fact rivers in winter are colder than the ocean; in them the cold air is effective because it is reflected from the bottom, whereas in the ocean it is dissipated, since because of the depth it comes against nothing solid to stop it.

"In another way also it is probable that thinner water is more easily refrigerated; it is overpowered by cold because of its own weakness. Whetstones ^a and pebbles thin the water; they collect and precipitate any mud and solid matter that is carried in it. This makes the water thinner and weaker, and consequently more subject to cooling. Moreover, lead is a naturally cold substance. For if triturated with vinegar, it gives off the most refrigerant of deadly drugs, lead acetate.^b Pebbles too are dense enough to cool water all through, for any stone is a compact solid of earth, chilled and compressed by icy cold, the denser the colder. It is not surprising, then, if both stone and lead by their solidity help to increase the coldness of the water."

served by the hottest of materials. People swathe it like an infant in straw, and wrap it in cloth of unfulled wool to keep it for a long time intact. It is certainly astonishing that the warmest things should be capable of preserving the coldest."

2. "Very much so, indeed," I answered, "if it is true. But it isn't so, and we mislead ourselves if we assume that anything that warms is by the same token hot, especially when we see that the same garment can keep us warm in winter and yet cool in the sun. Witness in tragedy the way the celebrated nurse takes care of Niobê's children,^a

With fragments of fine-woven little garments, Both warming and cooling them.

The German tribes use clothes for protection only against cold, the Ethiopians against heat, and we against both. So why must we say that clothing is "hot" if it warms, rather than "cold" because it cools? If we are to judge by sense-impression, it would rather be proved cool, for when we first put on our undergarments, or lie down in the blankets, their touch is cool. Afterwards, to be sure, they help to warm us, after they have absorbed our body heat, not only by enclosing and retaining the warmth, but also by excluding the outer air with its chill. Sufferers from fever or heat continually change their clothes because of the momentary coolness of a fresh garment as it is first put on, though it immediately becomes hot from the body.^a Accordingly, a garment or piece of cloth, just as it warms us while being warmed by us, will likewise cool snow, while being cooled by it. The cooling by the snow is due to a fine vapour that is given off. This vapour, while locked in, maintains the frozen condition of the snow, but as soon as it has departed, the snow, being only water, becomes fluid and melts away, losing the whiteness produced by the frothy effect of the vapour mixed with water. When snow is wrapped in cloth, the cold is held in by the insulating effect of the cloth, which at the same time excludes the outer air and prevents it from breaking up and melting the frost. Unfulled material is used for this because the roughness and dryness of the nap keeps the weight of the cloth from bearing down and compressing the loose structure of the snow. Likewise, the straw, having no weight, makes a light covering which does not crush the ice, yet is packed close and tight enough to exclude the heat of the air and prevent the escape of cold from the snow. That the escape of vapour is the cause of melting is obvious to the senses, for snow as it melts gives off steam."

Whether it is right to strain wine Speakers: Niger, Aristion

1. My fellow-townsman Niger a had returned from a brief course of instruction under a noted philosopher. The time had been long enough, however, for students, though they might not take hold of the man's teaching, to catch some of his annoying habits. They would reproduce his censorious manner and take the company to task on every possible occasion; so, when we were entertained at dinner by Aristion, Niger began to find everything too costly and elaborate. Specifically, he told us that wine ought not to be filtered, but ought to be drunk straight from the winejar, according to Hesiod's prescription,^b with all its natural power and strength. "Purifying it like this," said he, " cuts out its sinew and quenches its fire. There is a loss of bloom and a dissipation of the bouquet from the repeated straining.

"In the second place, this practice reflects a tendency to over-refinement, vainglory, and luxury, and sacrifices the useful in favour of the pleasurable. To castrate pigs and cocks, making their flesh unnaturally soft and effeminate, is typical of men whose health and character are ruined by gluttony. Just so, if I may use the metaphor, do people caponize and emasculate wine, filtering it because they are too poor in health to drink hard and too intemperate to drink in moderation. Why, this is nothing but a trick, a contrivance that enables them to drink on and on, since it takes the heaviness out of wine and leaves it smooth. It reminds me of the way that water is boiled for patients unable to control their thirst for cold liquids. Some substance that constitutes the edge and power of the wine is removed and lost in the process of filtering. Now a positive indication of the destructive power of this process is that filtered wine does not keep its quality, but weakens and fades as if cut off from its root, that is, the lees. The ancients even went so far as to call wine 'lees,' a just as we affectionately call a person' soul 'or' head ' from his ruling part. So we use trygan b of those who gather the harvest of the vine, and Homer somewhere has the expression diatrygios, 'yielding tryge throughout the season,' and is accustomed to apply to wine itself the adjectives 'fiery-looking' (aithops) and 'red,' and not-as Aristion serves it-' pale ' and ' bilious-looking ' from excessive purification."

2. Aristion laughed and said, "Not bilious-looking, my dear fellow, nor bloodless, but mellow and sunny," as appears first of all in its face. But you want us to fill up on wine dark as night and sable-palled,⁴ and you find fault with purification in terms that suggest the purging of bile; actually, it is a means to rid the wine of heavy, intoxicating, morbid elements and make it light in the mixture and free from anger, as Homer ^a says the heroes drank. For aithops in Homer doesn't mean 'murky'^b but 'translucent' and 'gleaming'; otherwise, my dear friend, he wouldn't have called bronze aithops as well as 'manly' and 'flashing.'

Similarly, you learned people might better find fault with us on other grounds. No, even if we do extract and banish from wine its disturbing and offensive element, brightening without bedizening it,^d not taking off the fine temper of its edge as from steel or iron, but rather cleaning away corrosion and dirt before we partake of it, why are we wrong in doing that? Why, because,' you say, 'wine is stronger unfiltered.' Yes, my friend, so is a madman stronger in his frenzy. But when he recovers, after a dose of hellebore or some curative regimen, his violence and tension are eradicated and disappear, while genuine strength and soundness of mind return to his sys-

"Being finical is to me a far cry from being clean. When women wear rouge, perfume, and gold and purple, they are considered too showily dressed; but no one takes exception to bathing, the use of oil, or shampooing. Homer brings out the difference very neatly in his lines on Hera adorning herself ^a:

First with ambrosia she cleaned all soil from her person. Then with sleek oil she anointed herself.

So far she is showing concern for cleanliness, but when she picks up those gold brooches and finely wrought earrings, and, lastly, turns to the witchery of Aphroditê's magic band, it is plainly a case of overdoing things and of wanton conduct unbecoming to a wife. Even so, those who colour wine with aloes or sweeten it with cinnamon or saffron are adorning it like a woman's face in preparation for a gay party, and are acting as a kind of pander ; those who draw off the impurities and unpalatable elements are simply tending and cleaning it. You might speak of everything we have here as overelaboration, beginning with the house. For why is it stuccoed as it is? And why is it open to catch the pure air of heaven and enjoy the light as the sun moves round to its setting ? Why is each cup scoured and polished so as to gleam and glitter all over ? "What need to go on with the list? Observe how much activity is required merely to make wheat into bread, though the process is nothing but one of purification; it involves more than merely the winnowing and sifting, the extraction and separation of the grain from the foreign matter. The grinding which crushes out the bran, and the baking which dries out the moisture further purify and reduce the material to its proper edible form. What wonder then if the lees of wine are removed too by filtering, like any sediment or refuse, especially since the process involves neither extra expense nor any great trouble?"

The cause of bulimy ^b

1. THERE is a traditional rite of sacrifice, which the archon performs at the public hearth but everyone else at home, called the driving out of bulimy. They strike one of the servants with wands of agnus castus

^b βούλιμος, βουλιμία: often translated "ox-hunger" or "voracious appetite"; cf. Paulus ex Festo, De Significatu Verbor. 32 M "bulimam Graeci magnam famem dicunt." From the present passage we see that the meaning is not altogether clear, and Wilhelm Schulze (Kuhns Zeitschrift, xxxiii (1895), p. 243), has shown that the etymology from bous "ox" is doubtful. Cf. "vim quandam famis non tolerabilem" in Aulus Gellius, xvi. 3. 9 f., where a quotation from Erasistratus on the subject is introduced. On flagellation and evil geniuses cf. G. Soury, La Démonologie de Plutarque, p. 53.

and drive him out of doors, chanting, "Out with Bulimy, in with Wealth and Health." When I was archon,^a a larger number than usual participated in the public rite. After we had completed the ritual acts and returned to our places at table we discussed first the term bulimy (bulimos), then the formula which they repeat as the servant is driven out, and especially the affliction itself and the particulars of a case of it. The name, we thought, signified a great or general famine, especially among us Aeolians who, in our dialect, use p for b; we pronounce not bulimos but pulimos as if to say polys limos (famine multiplied). We decided that bubrostis (ravenous appetite) is different, on the evidence of Metrodorus's b History of Ionia.º Metrodorus records that the people of Smyrna, originally Aeolians, sacrifice to Bubrostis a black bull, which they cut up and burn entirely, hide and all, on the altar. Now, since any kind of starvation, and particularly bulimy, resembles a disease, inasmuch as it occurs when the body has been affected by an unnatural condition, people quite reasonably contrast it with the normal state, as they do want with wealth and disease with health. Nausea got its name with reference to those whose stomachs are upset on a ship (naus) at sea, but by dint of usage the term is now applied to any similar case of upset, no matter how it comes about. Just so, the term bulimy, originating as I have said, has developed to its present

2. But when we undertook to account for the cause of the affliction, the first question we considered was why bulimy attacks especially those who walk through heavy snow, b like Brutus c on the way from Dyrrachium to Apollonia, when his life was en-dangered by this affliction. There was a heavy snow, and none of the provision train kept up with him, so that when he grew faint and lost consciousness, the troops were forced to run up to the walls and beg bread from the guards on the enemy side. When they got it, they immediately succeeded in reviving Brutus.^d This explains why he treated all the inhabitants humanely when he gained possession of the town. Horses and donkeys also suffer from bulimy, especially when transporting dried figs and apples. The most astonishing thing of all is that bread restores strength not only to man but to beast better than any other food ; so much so that if sufferers take even a morsel of it they get on their feet and go on.

3. There was a silence during which I reflected that to the idle and dull the solutions of their predecessors ^e to such questions provide only a chance to imbibe and be content; to an eager scholar, however, they present an opening and incentive for boldly seeking and tracking down the truth, on his own. Then I brought up the Aristotelian passage " in which it is stated that when there is great cold outside the body the inward parts become exceedingly heated and produce a great deal of morbid liquefaction. Now if the liquefied matter collects in the legs it causes fatigue and heaviness ; if it gathers at the roots of motor energy or of respiration, it causes fainting and weakness.

Naturally enough, when I had said that, the discussion continued, some attacking and others defending Aristotle's theory. (4) Soclarus said that the first part of the argument was sound. It was true that the bodies of those who travel through snow are quite chilled and congealed; but to argue that heat produces abnormal liquefaction which clogs the centres of respiration was to beg the question, according to him. He preferred the view that the heat is contracted and too much concentrated internally, so that it uses up the supply of food ; and then, like fire when the fuel gives out, the heat itself dies down. This explains both why, in the cold, people suffer severe hunger, and why, when they eat the slightest morsel of food, they have a quick flare-up of energy. The food consumed acts as a kind of fuel to rekindle the heat.

5. Cleomenes the physician, however, said that the word limos (hunger) in the compound signifies nothing as to the facts, just as the word katapinein (to swallow) differs from the simple verb pinein (to drink), or anakyptein (to bob up) differs from kyptein (to lean forward). Bulimy is not, as people think, hunger

Just as smelling-salts are useful in cases of fainting, so bread revives those suffering from bulimy; not because they are starved (for the very slightest morsel rekindles the spark of life), but because the bread summons back the sinking energy and vital breath. That it is a fainting weakness, not hunger, is indicated by the case of draught animals; the exhalations from dried figs and apples do not produce a deficiency but rather a sort of heartburn, yes, and dizziness.

6. We found this reasonable enough, yet felt that it was possible to make out a good case on the contrary hypothesis that what occurs is not condensation but dilation. The vapour emitted by snow is, as it were, an aura of frost or a very fine dust. It has a piercing, separative effect not only on flesh but on vessels of silver and bronze; we know by observation that these vessels are not impermeable to snow, which exudes and evaporates, covering the exterior surface with a fine, icy dew that is deposited by the vapour as it passes impeceptibly through the vessel's pores. When people travel through snow, this vapour, with its sharp and flamelike touch, seems to burn the extremities, cutting and biting a into the flesh like fire. Hence considerable dilation occurs in the body; its heat escapes and, because of the cold

If a man is inactive, not much is lost of the body's heat; but when the movement of the body causes quick conversion of food into heat, and the heat flows off as the flesh opens, then it is inevitable that a complete collapse of strength should occur.

That chilling may not only freeze but melt bodies is manifest: the melting of lead whetstones ^a in severe winters, the phenomenon of sweating, and the fact that bulimy attacks many when they are not hungry indicate porosity and liquefaction rather than compression in our bodies. During winter, as has been said, bodies are made porous by the fineness of the cold vapour, especially when fatigue and motion make the heat in the body more intense; attenuated and weakened,^b it overflows and is dispersed through the body. It is probable that dried figs and apples give off an exhalation of a sort that causes extreme attenuation and fragmentation of heat in pack animals. For by nature different creatures are so to speak revived or collapse from different causes.

QUESTION 9

Why Homer uses special adjectives for other liquids but calls only olive oil " liquid "

Speakers: Plutarch and others

1. ONCE the question was raised why, when there are many liquids, Homer is accustomed to embellish most with specific adjectives, calling milk "white,' honey "yellow," and wine "ruddy," but to use of oil alone the adjective "liquid," ^a which properly refers to the quality common to them all. To this the answer was given that, just as the sweetest substance is one that is sweet through and through, the whitest one that is white through and through—and "through and through" means that there is no admixture of the opposite quality—just so the expression "liquid" should be used particularly of anything which has no ingredient of dryness in it; and that is the case with oil.

2. In the first place, its smoothness demonstrates the uniformity of its parts; it is at all points consistently the same to the touch. Further, visually it is the clearest reflector, having no unevenness to distort the reflection. From every part of itself, on account of its liquidity, it reflects even the minutest light to the eye. Just so, on the contrary, milk is the only liquid that does not mirror objects, because there is in it a great admixture of the earthy.^b Besides, oil, when stirred, is the most silent of all liquids because it is liquid throughout; whereas, when other liquids flow and rush along, their hard, earthy parts suffer blows and collisions that produce sound because of the irregularity of their shapes. Moreover, oil alone remains pure and undiluted, for it is the most compact and has no empty spaces or passages between dry, earthy particles to which it could admit intrusive elements. The uniformity of its particles produces smoothness and coherence in it.

When oil foams, it does not admit air, because of its fine texture and coherence. This accounts also for the fact that fire is fed by it. Fire is fed only by moisture, and moisture alone is combustible.^a At any rate, when wood is burned as fuel, the air is given off as smoke and the earthy element is left reduced to ash; only the moisture is consumed by fire, for fire naturally feeds on liquid. Now when water, wine, and the other liquids with their high proportion of muddy, earthy matter encounter fire, they rend it apart and by their roughness and weight crush and extinguish it; while oil, because it is a superlatively pure liquid, has such minute particles that it suffers change and is overpowered and reduced to flames.

3. A supreme proof of its liquidity is the fact that the least quantity of it spreads and flows over the most space. Neither honey nor water nor any other liquid in such slight mass spreads so far; instead, they immediately disappear, being consumed on account of their own dryness. But olive oil, which is soft and ductile to any extent, is spread over the body when we anoint ourselves, and is carried farther than any other liquid as its particles grow longer on account of their liquidity. Accordingly, it also resists evaporation and does not easily disappear. When a garment happens to be soaked with water, it dries easily, but an oil stain requires more than ordinary effort to remove. Oil stains enter deepest into the fabric because the refinement and liquidity of oil is greatest. As Aristotle ^a says, wine is also more difficult to remove from cloth when mixed, because it is then of finer grain and settles more deeply into the pores.

QUESTION 10 °

Why sacrificial meat when hung from a fig tree quickly becomes tender

Speakers : Aristion, Plutarch and others

ARISTION'S cook made a hit with the dinner guests not only because of his general skill, but because the cock that he set before the diners, though it had just been slaughtered as a sacrifice to Heracles, was as tender as if it had been a day old. Aristion said that meat cures rapidly if, immediately upon killing, it is hung on a fig tree; and we went on to discuss why this should be so. Two things indicate that a strong, intense exhalation ^e is given off by the fig tree; first, bur sense of smell, and second, the alleged fact that the fiercest of bulls, if tied to a fig tree, becomes fuiet, lets people touch him, and completely abandons is rage, as if the spirit were withering within him. This effect is mainly due to the bitterness of the plant, for the fig is the richest in sap of all plants, not only the fruit but the wood and the leaf too being full of it. Wherefore, too, the smoke of burning figwood s especially acrid and the ash from it provides a most detergent lye.

Yet the very same effects all come from heat. Therefore, some think that fig juice curdles milk through heat, not because the rough particles, owing to their irregular shape, combine and stick to each other, while smooth,^a round particles are forced to the surface; but because the particles under the influence of heat melt out the uncohesive, watery element in the moist compound. A proof is that sweet whey is unusable, in fact is the vilest of drinks. Evidently it is not a case of smooth particles being expelled by rough,^b but of cold and unconcocted elements being dislodged by heat. Salt will also contribute to this process, for it is hot and counteracts the so called interlocking and binding together of particles, since it is a powerful natural solvent.

So we infer that the fig gives off a hot, bitter, in-

Lucretius, iv. 622 ff., explains the effect of smooth atoms in producing sweetness to the taste, while rough atoms produce pungency and the like. This theory is derived from Democritus (Diels, Frag. d. Vorsokratiker, Democritus, A 135) as reported in Theophrastus, De Sensu, 65. For the alternative theory here cited Aristotle, Meteorologica, 384 a 22 and Pseudo-Aristotle, Problems, 924 b 39 lend some support.
