TABLE-TALK
(QUAESTIONES CONVIVALES)
BOOK VII

INTRODUCTION

THE Table-Talk is a collection of dialogues purporting to reproduce the after-dinner conversation of Plutarch and his friends and relatives on various occasions. They differ widely in dramatic liveliness, and in the degree to which they seem to be based on recollection, or on memoranda, of actual conversations. Their subject matter ranges from scientific or philosophical questions, more or less serious, to antiquarian, historical, and ethical topics; some deal with the symposium or dinner party itself.

In Book VII, the scene of two or three of the dialogues (7, 8, and probably 3) is laid in Plutarch's home in Chaeronea, that of 2 and 5 at Delphi, and that of 9 and 10 at Athens; the others give no clue as to location. The seventh and eighth dialogues are connected dramatically, as are the ninth and tenth. A peculiar phrase at the beginning of 10 suggests that some revision or rearrangement has taken place. The lack of dramatic detail causes Questions 3 and 6 to seem less like reports of actual conversation than the rest; and the rather formal organization of Question 6 heightens this impression.

No fewer than six of the ten dialogues in this book have subjects related to the organization and conduct of the symposium itself; the others are scientific and antiquarian. Plutarch's customary interest in the ethical implications of customs and ideas is strongly evident, especially in the long Questions 5, 6, and 8, and not least in his spirited defence of the use of wine in 10.

The text and critical notes of this edition are based on K. Hubert's Teubner edition (Moralia, vol. iv, Leipzig, 1938). The notes are intended to record important variations from manuscript readings. Book VII includes the passage (704 F—709 A) whose loss from ms. T (Vindobonensis 148) enabled scholars to show that in its original form this was the source of all other manuscripts of the Quaestiones Convivales.

BOOK SEVEN

THE Romans, Sossius Senecio,^a are fond of quoting a witty and sociable person who said, after a solitary meal, "I have eaten, but not dined to-day," implying that a "dinner" always requires friendly sociability for seasoning. Now Évenus said that a fire is the finest of seasonings^b; Homer calls salt "divine,"^c and a colloquial term for salt is "graces," because when mixed with foods it will render most of them harmonious and agreeable and so "gracious" to our taste.^d But the most truly godlike seasoning at the dining-table is the presence of a friend or companion or intimate acquaintance—not because of his eating and drinking with us, but because he participates in the give-and-take of conversation, at least if there is something profitable and probable and relevant in what is said. For chitchat over wine means for most people a wild plunge into the life of feeling and tends

In spirit and in speech we should be just the opposite of the Lacedaemonians.^a When they invite a young man or a foreign visitor to their common meal, they point to the door and say, "No talk goes out that way." Let us rather make a practice of speaking only such words as may be divulged by anyone to anyone, as they may if the topics involve no licence, no profanity, no malice, and no vulgarity. fashion, since it is a plausible view that the lungs, being neighbours to the stomach,^a do benefit by the moisture of the body, and that in this way they are "drenched." "The philosopher, however," he continued, "wrote so plainly that what is drunk passes through the lungs that he left no plausible line of argument in his behalf, even for those most zealous to defend him.^b His error is a blatant one, in the first place because, since our liquid nourishment must necessarily be mixed with the dry, it stands to reason that the stomach serves as a receptacle, the same for both, and passes the food on, soft and moist, into the lower belly. In the second place, since the lung is not altogether smooth and close-textured, how does the barley drunk in a kykeon^c pass through without getting stuck? This is the objection which Erasistratus^d justifiably raised against Plato.

"Moreover, since for most of the parts of the body Plato takes account of their purpose in the course of his discussion, wishing, as a philosopher should, to understand the function for which nature has made each one, it is wrong for him to ignore the service performed by the epiglottis, which is put there for this very purpose, of stopping the windpipe while food is being swallowed, thus preventing any of it from accidentally falling into the lungs; for the latter are badly rasped and scratched by coughing when anything slips past during respiration. The epiglottis, like the inner door of a courtyard, can be set either way. When we speak it falls over the oesophagus, and when we eat or drink it falls over the windpipe, thus keeping the route clear for the breath when we inhale again.

“Further,” he continued, “we know that people who drink slowly have more moisture in their abdomen than those who gulp their drink. In the latter case, it is thrust by the momentum straight to the bladder, while in the former, it lingers with the food, and softens it up, thus combining and staying with it. This would not be the case if any liquids were separated out at the very moment of swallowing. They must be in one package with the food, helping to speed it on its way and serving it as a vehicle, in Erasistratus’ words.”^a

2. After this exposition by Nicias, the schoolmaster Protogenes^b remarked that Homer was the first to have observed that the receptacle for our nourishment is the oesophagus, and for breath the windpipe, which the ancients called aspharagus (so that the epithet for loud-voiced persons was erispharagoi).^c When Homer says that Achilles struck Hector’s “throat (leukaniē), where life is quickest to perish, but the bronze-heavy ashen spear cut not his windpipe (aspharagos), that he might speak and exchange words with him,”^d he is speaking of the windpipe (aspharagos) as the special channel of voice and breath, but he speaks of the throat (leukaniē) as the receptacle of nourishment in the following :

Now I have tasted food and poured bright wine down my throat.^a

3. After a pause, Florus ^b said, "Are we thus to let Plato's case go by default?"

"Surely not," I replied, "for we should be betraying Homer as well as Plato. He is so far from driving or turning liquid from the windpipe that he even has solid food coming out with it by that route. 'From his throat (pharynx),' he says, 'came pouring wine and pieces of human flesh.'^c Unless someone is going to allege that, as the Cyclops had one eye, he also had a single passageway for both food and voice—or that by pharynx Homer meant the oesophagus and not the windpipe, which is what everyone has meant by it in both ancient and modern times. I have introduced this quotation not for any lack of authorities, but out of regard for truth; for the witnesses on Plato's side are both numerous and excellent. Disregard Eupolis, if you will, who says in the Flatterers,

Protagoras bade him drink, to have his lungs well sluiced, before the dog days.^d

Disregard the elegant Eratosthenes, too, and his expression,

Drenching his lungs deep down with unmixed wine.^a

But when Euripides speaks in plain terms of Wine, traversing the channels of the lungs,^b

he shows that he has keener eyes than Erasistratus. For he has perceived that the lung has cavities and is pierced with channels through which it transmits liquid. The breath has no need of special passages through which to escape; it is for the sake of the liquids and the solids that slip in with them, that the lung is created in the pattern of a sieve, and is well provided with channels. What is more, my good friend, it is no less the part of the lung than of the stomach to pass along the barley groats or meal you speak of. Our stomach is not smooth or slippery, as some suppose, but it has irregularities, into which it is likely that light and small particles fall and lodge and so escape getting swallowed further.

“But neither this account nor the other is quite satisfactory; the ingenious organization of Nature’s activities is beyond the range of words, and it is impossible to explain adequately the exact working of the agencies it employs—that is breath and warmth.

“Now, the further witnesses for Plato whom I shall call are Philistion of Locri,^c a very ancient authority and one eminent in your profession, and Hippocrates with his follower Dioxippus.^d These men teach us that what we drink follows no other route but Plato’s. Your precious epiglottis did not escape Dioxiippus' notice ; he says that in the act of swallowing, the liquid part is separated out in this organ's neighbourhood and flows into the windpipe, while the solid food goes tumbling into the oesophagus. No solid food slips into the windpipe ; but the oesophagus, along with the dry part of the nourishment, also receives a portion of the moist combined with it. This seems a likely interpretation ; the epiglottis, you see, is stationed before the windpipe like a barrier or regulator, so that what we drink may filter through gradually, a little at a time, and not, by being forced down suddenly or all at once, do violence to the breath and interfere with its regularity. This is why birds have not been provided with an epiglottis. They do not drink by sucking or lapping, but by gulps ; by taking in a little at a time they gradually moisten or wet their windpipe.

“Enough of authorities. Plato's account has its primary corroboration from ordinary observation : when the windpipe is wounded, liquids are not swallowed. They are observed escaping and gushing out as from a broken water pipe, though the oesophagus remains whole and uninjured. In the second place, we all know that in diseases involving an inflammation of the lungs there develops an excessive, burning thirst, because of the dryness or the heat, or some other cause that induces the craving for liquid along with the fever. But a proof even stronger than this is that the creatures to whom nature has not given a lung, or has given only a very small one, do not need to drink at all, and feel no desire for it, because a natural concomitant of each organ is the desire directed toward fulfilment of its function, and creatures that do not have certain parts have neither a need for them nor any eagerness for the activity that employs them.

“ The bladder, too, will by your account seem to have been given to the creatures that have it quite in vain ; for if the stomach takes in drink along with food, and passes it along to the lower abdomen, the residue of liquid nourishment has no need for a passage of its own ; a single one would suffice, shared, like a bilge-hole, by both, since they would be borne to the same place over the same route. In fact, however, the bladder and the bowel have been made separate and distinct because one type of waste comes from the lung, and the other from the stomach, separation taking place at the very start when we swallow. This is why, in the liquid excretion, no remnant of dry food is seen, nor any approximation either in colour or in odour ; and yet the natural thing would be, if the liquid were mixed in the belly with the solid, so as to permeate it, that it should be infected with its properties instead of being filtered out so clear and uncontaminated. Nor in fact has a stone ever been formed in the abdomen, though it would make as good sense for liquid to be concentrated and solidified here as in the bladder, if everything drunk went through the stomach into the abdomen. What seems likely is that the stomach draws directly from the windpipe a sufficient and moderate quantity of moisture as it passes by, and uses it to soften and liquefy the food, and for that reason produces no liquid residue. And the lung, distributing air and liquid from itself, so to speak, to the parts that need them, excretes the remainder to the bladder.

“ This is far more probable than the other accounts.

QUESTION 2

Who the "horncast" man is, of whom Plato speaks, and why seeds that happen to touch the horns of cattle are "obdurate."

Speakers: Euthydemus, Patrocleas, Florus, Plutarch, and others

1. WHEN we have had readings from Plato in company, the sort of person he calls "horncast" (kerasbolos) or "obdurate" (ateramon)^a has always set us to puzzling—not who he is, for it is clear that people used to believe that seeds which touch the horns of oxen produce grain that is "obdurate" and so, by transfer, referred to a self-willed and unbending person as "horncast" and "obdurate." Our difficulty was rather to know the reason itself why seeds which touch the horns of cattle are so affected. I had frequently asked my friends to excuse me, not least because Theophrastus fights shy of the question, in a book that collects and discusses many phenomena whose causes we cannot discover,^b such as the hen's covering herself with chaff when she has laid an egg,^c

^b Frag. 175 Wimmer; but Theophrastus does not mention the kerasbolon here, and in De Causis Plant. iv. 12. 13, he expresses doubt about this phenomenon.

“But if you go into these matters,” said Euthydemus, “you will straightway have to explain about celery and cumin, too; the first of these, people think, grows better if they trample and crush it as it grows, the other if they sow the seed with curses and maledictions.”^b

Since Florus thought all this last was childish nonsense, but that none of the former questions should be given up as insoluble, I said,^c “I have found a potion that will make you leap into the argument against us, so that you too may lend a hand in solving some of the problems proposed. It seems to me to be cold that produces obduracy in both wheat and legumes; it squeezes and freezes them into such a state that they are unyielding, whereas warmth produces a texture that is soft and easily loosened. Thus it is wrong to cite the proverb, ‘the season, not the field, bears the crop,’ against Homer.^d For localities that are naturally warm, where the climate affords a bland temperature, produce grain that is softer. However, while seeds that sink into the soil straight from the hand that sows them, nestle down and become embedded, so that, covered up as they are, they get more good of the warmth and moisture of the soil, those which strike the horns of oxen do not receive the ‘best placement,’ as Hesiod calls it,^e but as they are baffled and glance off, are more like seed thrown away than sown. So the cold, impinging upon their naked coats, either destroys them altogether or makes them unyielding and juiceless and woody.

“ You observe, too, that those parts of stones which are underground and quickset are kept softer by the warmth than the parts on the surface. This is why artisans in fact bury stones that are to be worked, as though they were to be ripened by the heat, whereas those that lie naked in the open air are by reason of cold impenetrable and rigid, and prove to be difficult to work. They say that even such grain as lies naked to the sky on the threshing-floor for a good while becomes more obdurate than any that is removed at once. In some places a wind that comes up during winnowing will make them obdurate by cooling (this is reported from Philippi in Macedonia), whereas what has been put away is protected by the chaff. We need not be surprised when we hear farmers say that even of two furrows side by side one will produce unyielding, and one yielding grain, or even, what is more, that some pods have one kind of beans and others another, clearly because some are more exposed, some less, to the cold onset of wind and rain.”

giving the advice, "when the storage jar is first opened or giving out, drink your fill, but be sparing of the middle part"^a—where the best part of the wine is found. "Who does not know," he said, "that in wine the middle part is best, in olive oil the top, and in honey the bottom? Yet Hesiod tells us to let the wine in the middle stand, and wait till it changes for the worse, after the jar is partly emptied." With this comment, we took leave of Hesiod, and attacked the problem why there is this difference.

2. The explanation was not at all troublesome in the case of honey, since practically everyone knows that what is lightest is so because of the looseness of its elements, whereas the dense and compact, because of its weight, sinks below the rest; and if you turn the container over, each part presently resumes its proper position again, one sinking and the other rising.

Nor was wine, moreover, left destitute of plausible arguments. In the first place, it seems reasonable that its specific power, which is heat, is especially concentrated in the middle, so that it keeps this part of it in best condition. Secondly, the lower part is of poor quality because of the lees, while that on the surface tends to deteriorate because of its contact with the air. For of all the things whose quality air alters we know that wine is the most susceptible. So in fact they bury wine jars in the ground and cover them, so that as little air as possible may come in contact with them. What is more, a full container does not let wine go bad as easily as one partly empty. For if the air comes streaming into an emptied vessel, it is more likely to produce an alteration of quality, whereas in full containers the wine is self-enclosed, and does not permit much of the destructive element to penetrate from outside.

3. Olive-oil provided us an interesting topic. Someone expressed the opinion that the lower part of the oil is less good because it is adulterated by the watery exudate from the olives, and that the upper part is not actually better, but seems so, because it is farthest from this source of contamination. Someone else found a cause in the density of olive oil, which accounts for its being very averse to mixture, not admitting any other liquid into it except by force, and when it is vigorously beaten. Thus it does not submit to mixture with air either, but holds aloof because of the fineness and coherence of its particles, with the result that it is less likely to be altered by an element which has no power over it. We thought, however, that this argument was countered by the observation reported by Aristotle,^a that oil in partly emptied vessels has a better odour and is better on all counts; he goes on to attribute the improvement to the action of air, which is present in greater quantity and strength when it enters a partly empty vessel.

4. "I wonder if it may not be," said I, "that the same property of air both improves oil and harms wine. For ageing is beneficial to wine but harmful to oil, and air by its contact deprives them both of this. One of them is cooled and retains its freshness, but the other, which, because of its compactness, has no passageways for air, quickly ages and gets stale. This is why the top of the wine is least good and the top

The reason for the custom of the ancient Romans, not to allow a table to be removed empty, nor to let a lamp be extinguished.^a

Speakers : Florus, Eustrophus, Caesernius, Lucius, Plutarch

1. FLORUS, being a lover of old customs, would never let the servants take his table away empty, but would always leave some food on it. "I know," he said, "that my father and grandfather not only observed this custom very carefully, but also would refuse to let them put out the lamp. This was another thing the ancient Romans were scrupulous about, but people nowadays put it out directly after eating, so as not to waste oil."

Eustrophus the Athenian,^b who was among the guests, said, "What gain would that be to them, unless they knew the trick of my fellow citizen Polycharmus? After long consideration of the problem of preventing the slaves from stealing oil, he finally came up with this method: to fill the lamps immediately after they are extinguished, and then inspect them the next day, to see whether they are still full."

"Well," said Florus with a laugh, "since this problem has been solved, let us consider what reason the ancients probably had for being so scrupulous, both in the matter of lamps and that of tables.”

2. First we looked into the question about lamps. Florus' son-in-law Caesernius opined that his ancestors had avoided putting out any fire out of pious motives, because of its kinship to the unquenchable, sacred fire.^a Fire, like man, can die two kinds of death—one violent, when it is put out, and the other when it dies out in a natural way. The sacred fire they protected against both kinds, continually feeding and watching over it; an ordinary fire they would allow to die out of itself, but they would not themselves use violence toward it, nor seem to begrudge it sustenance, so to speak, by taking its life to avoid feeding a useless mouth, as we do with livestock.

3. Florus' son Lucius^b expressed general satisfaction with these remarks, but said that the Romans did not revere and minister to the sacred fire in this way because they thought it better or more holy than other fire, but that just as some of the Egyptians worship and honour the whole race of dogs, others that of wolves or crocodiles, but feed only a single one (some a dog, some a crocodile, and some a wolf), because it is not possible to feed them all—so in Rome the care and preservation of that particular fire is symbolic of a reverent attitude to all fire. “For there is nothing else,” he said, “that is more like a living being than fire. It is self-moved and finds its own food, and by its radiance, like the mind, reveals and clarifies everything. Especially in its extinction or destruction a force is vaguely seen that is not utterly devoid of elemental life. It protests and speaks up and resists like a living creature that is slain by a violent and murderous death.—Or perhaps you have some better explanation," he concluded, turning to me.

4. "No," I replied, "I have no objection to what you have said, but I might add that the custom teaches a lesson in social responsibility. For it is impious to destroy food when we have ourselves eaten enough, or to blind and conceal a spring as soon as we have had our fill of its flow, or to destroy the markers of a voyage or journey after using them. No, we should leave and abandon whatever is serviceable for the benefit of any who follow us and need them. Consequently it is also not gentlemanly to be so minutely thrifty as to quench a lamp that is not needed. We should keep it going and leave it burning in case someone should come who requires a light still shining there. It would in fact also be generous to lend the sense of sight or hearing to another, if it were possible, as well as, by Zeus, the virtues of prudence and courage, if we expect to be asleep and inactive ourselves.

"I wonder in fact whether it was not merely absurd—whether it was to inculcate the virtue of gratitude by enjoining such extreme observances that the ancients showed reverence to the fruitful oak, while the Athenians pronounced a certain fig-tree sacred and prohibit the grubbing out of a holy olive? The effect of these observances is not to make us prone to superstition, as some say, but to make gratitude habitual, as well as the impulse to share with each other, where respect is shown for things without sensation and even without life. Thus Hesiod is right in not permitting us to serve bread and meat 'from undedicated dishes.'^a We should render the fire its due libation as a tribute to its service; and the Romans did well, after making use of a lamp, not to scant it of the food that they had themselves given it, but to allow the lamp to live and shine by using the rest."

5. After my remarks, Eustrophus asked, "Does this also provide a useful approach to the question of the table? Did people think that they ought always to leave something from dinner for the slaves and the slaves' children? They enjoy not so much the taking as the partaking with us. So too the kings of Persia (they say) not only always send portions to their friends and officers and bodyguards, but even see that the slaves' dinner, and the dogs' dinner, are served on their table, in so far as this is feasible, considering all who serve them sharers in table and hearth. For by passing out food even the most sullen of wild beasts can be tamed."

6. I replied with a smile, "My friend, we may as well drag in the proverbial 'fish in reserve,'^b too, and Pythagoras' peck-measure,^c upon which he forbade us to sit, in order to teach us always to leave for the future some part of what is at hand, and each day to think of the morrow. 7. Lucius, in reply, said he recalled hearing from his grandmother that the table is sacred and that nothing sacred should be empty. QUESTION 5

That one should guard especially against the pleasures derived from degenerate music, and how to do so. ^b

Speakers : Callistratus, Lamprias, Plutarch

1. AT the time of the Pythian Games, Callistratus, ^c who was a director of the Amphictyons, had, in accordance with the rule, disqualified for late registration a certain flute-player who was a fellow citizen and friend of his. But when he gave a dinner for us, he brought the man before the party, with his dancing-group, splendidly arrayed as for a contest, in costume and garlands. And for a fact it was a fine performance to hear—at first. But then, shaking the hall and filling it with resounding noise, when he perceived that most of the auditors were so overwhelmed as to allow him, under the spell of pleasure, to do with them what he pleased and hypnotize them with his piping or even with licentious movements, he cast off all disguise and showed that music can inebriate, more effectively than any wine, those who drink it in as it comes, with no restraint. For the guests were no longer content to shout and clap from their places, but finally most of them leapt up and joined in the dancing, with movements disgraceful for a gentleman, though quite in keeping with that kind of rhythm and melody. When they stopped and the company was settling down again, as though recovering from a fit of madness, Lamprias ^a wanted to address some frank words of expostulation to the younger men, but when he hesitated, not wishing to be too disagreeable or censorious, Callistratus himself sounded a keynote for him, so to speak, with some such words as these :

2. " I myself would exempt from the charge of dissolute character a person who is fond of concerts and spectacles. On the other hand, I do not agree completely with Aristoxenus' statement that the word ' beautiful ' is applied to the pleasures of these senses alone ^b ; for people call both foods and perfumes ' beautiful ' and say that it was a ' beautiful ' occasion when they have enjoyed a pleasant and sumptuous meal. Aristotle seems to me mistaken, too, in the reason he gives for exempting the delights of sight and sound from charges of incontinence, namely that these alone are exclusively human, whereas animals too are capable by nature of feeling the others and sharing in them. ^c We observe that many nonrational creatures are bewitched by music, for example stags by flutes ^d ; and a tune, which is called ' Hippothoros ' (' The Stallion's Leap '), is played to mares while they are being covered. ^e Pindar speaks

And by dancing they capture horned owls,^b which take pleasure in the spectacle and in an imitative way move their shoulders rhythmically this way and that. I do not see that pleasures of this sort have anything special about them, except that they alone have to do with the mind, whereas the rest are pleasures of the body and reach an end in the body. Melody, however, and rhythm and dance and song go on past sense-perception and find a basis for their pleasing and enticing quality in the mind's faculty of enjoyment. Thus none of the pleasures of this kind is secret or requires darkness or walls 'running round' (as the Cyrenaics say), but stadia are even built for them, and theatres; and to witness a spectacle of sight or sound in a large company is considered more enjoyable and more impressive because we are associating as many persons as possible with ourselves, surely not in incontinence and sensuality, but in a liberal and civilized pastime."

3. Lamprias perceived that after this speech of Callistratus those partisans of musical entertainments were still more inclined to assert themselves. "You have missed the point," he said, "O son of Leon. I fear the ancients were wrong in calling Dionysus the son of Lethe (Forgetfulness); they should have made him her father. ^a In the essay De Virtute Morali, Mor. 445 B ff., using Aristotelian terminology, as here, Plutarch discusses this distinction more fully (though not more clearly), and comes to a somewhat different result. Aristotle's principal discussion of incontinence is in the Nicomachean Ethics, Book VII.

^b This proverb is very differently interpreted by the paroejust now that of faults in dealing with pleasure, some are due to incontinence and others to misapprehension and oversights.^a Wherever the harm is obvious, the fault is indulged because people fail to control themselves and forcibly suppress their reason. But acts that do not impose the penalty for incontinence directly and immediately, they choose and perform in ignorance of any harm to come. Thus those whose shortcomings are in eating and drinking and sexual indulgence, which are attended by a numerous train of diseases and financial losses as well as ill fame, we call incontinent, like the notorious Theodectes, with his ophthalmia, saying 'Hail, dear light!' when his lady-love appeared^b; or Anaxarchus of Abdera,

Who, though he knew, they said, would still be wretched;
 his nature,
 Pleasure-struck, would lead him back to haunts most wise men shun.^c

But when pleasures succeed in hoodwinking men who are on guard against them, alert not to be taken by surprise in the regions of belly, sex-organs, palate and nose—for they outflank our defences and lodge ambushed in eyes and ears,—these men, though they are no less subject to passion and no less licentious than the others, we still do not call incontinent. For they have not seen the consequences; it is through inexperience that they are swept away downstream; they think that they are superior to pleasure if they spend a whole day in the theatres without miographers (Leutsch-Schneidewin, Paroemiographi Graeci, i. 173, 319).

food or drink, as though, forsooth, a pot should be proud that cannot be picked up by the belly or the base, when it can easily be carried about by the ears. So Arcesilaüs said it makes no difference if a man is licentious in front or in the rear.^a Surely one must also be wary of the degeneracy and luxury that titillates the eyes and ears. We should not reckon a city impregnable because most of the gates are fastened with bars and bolts and portcullises, if the enemy have entered by a single one, and are within the walls; nor can a man rate himself immune to pleasure if he is not overcome in Aphrodite's precinct but is in that of the Muses or that of the theatre; in any case, he has given way and surrendered his mind to the pleasures to despoil. So they take us captive and corrupt us by means of concoctions more pungent and varied than the products of any cook or perfumer, overwhelming our senses—I mean melody and rhythm. They testify against themselves, in a way: of what lies ready for us on the tables here, there is, as Pindar says, 'nothing to cavil at and nothing to change, of all that the bright earth and the surges of the sea provide'^b; but no food, meat or sauce, nor this excellent wine that we are drinking, ever produced, through the pleasure it gives, such an outcry as the music did just now, filling the whole house, if not the whole city, with roars and clapping and cheers.

"Hence we must be especially wary of these pleasures; they are extremely powerful, because they do not, like those of taste and touch and smell, have their only effect in the irrational and 'natural'

part of our mind, but lay hold of our faculty of judgment and prudence. Again, with the other forms of luxury, though our reason may give up its struggle against them, there remain other emotions that frequently stand in their way. In the fish-market, stinginess restrains the finger of the epicure; and Miserliness turns Lechery from the expensive harlot. Such is the case in Menander's scene in which the banqueters are all exposed one by one to the wiles of a designing procurer, who brings a certain very grand courtesan before them.

Each kept his head down, nibbling at dessert.^a

Yes, the loans at interest are a severe chastiser of incontinence, and to make a man loosen his purse-strings is not a very easy matter. But with these so-called refined crazes for music and flute-playing, whose attack is on the eyes and ears, it is frequently possible to procure and enjoy such delights free, without any expenditure at all—at the festivals, in the theatres, or at dinners, where others foot the bills. In this way it is easy for the hearers to be corrupted, since they do not have the calculation of the costs to rescue and discipline them.”

4. A silence fell. “Well, now,” I said, “what is it we expect the calculation to do or say in order to rescue us? Surely it won't muffle us in the ear-protectors Xenocrates^b speaks of, nor get us up in the midst of a dinner if we hear a lyre being tuned or see a flute raised.”

when Agamemnon entertained the chiefs :

For he knew in his heart what cares his brother had.^a

He did not fail to notice his brother's oversight, which was obvious, nor did he reproach him by staying away, as censorious and touchy persons will fasten upon such oversights and slips of their friends. They are happier if neglected than if honoured, because that gives them a grievance.

A question arose, however, as to the origin of the custom of the secondary guest, those whom they call nowadays " shadows,"^b persons who are not personally invited but are brought by the invited guests. We decided that it began with Socrates, who persuaded Aristodemus, though not invited, to go along to Agathon's dinner with him.^c Aristodemus had an amusing experience, for without noticing that Socrates had been left behind on the way, he went in ahead of him—the shadow literally going ahead of a person who had the light behind him. But in later times in the entertainment of guests from abroad, especially important personages, it became necessary for those who were ignorant who their followers and favourites were to leave the inviting of them to the principal guest. The host had to specify a number, however, so as not to get into the position of the man who entertained Philip in the country.^d He came with a large number, but dinner had not been prepared for so many ; so, seeing that his host was embarrassed, he passed the word quietly to his friends to " save room for cake." Looking forward to this, they ate sparingly of what lay before them, and in this way there was enough for everyone.

2. I had been discoursing of all this to the company in a casual way, but Florus thought we ought to take some more serious notice of these so-called "shadows," and consider whether it is proper for a person who is invited in this way to go and be a hanger-on. His brother-in-law Caesernius thought such an action completely inadmissible. Best of all, he said, is to follow Hesiod's advice, "invite your friend to dinner,"^a or, at least, to invite acquaintances and associates of one's own, to share in the libations and the food and the talk over the wine and the conviviality. "But nowadays," he went on, "like those who let ships on charter and permit any cargo to be loaded, we make over our dinner parties to others to fill with whomever they please, whether they are polite company or not.

"I should be surprised to see a man of breeding come on a secondary invitation—or rather uninvited, since the host frequently does not even know him at all. Or if the host knows him and is on friendly terms with him and yet has not invited him, surely it is still more disgraceful to go to his house, as though to set him right, and to force oneself upon his hospitality, as it were, against his will.

"Further, there is also a certain embarrassment in being earlier or later than one who has invited you to another's house; and it is surely not a nice situation, to stand before the host in need of a witness to certify that you have not come to dinner uninvited, but as so-and-so's 'shadow.' Or, on the other hand, to dance attendance on another man and play the

“Here is yet another point: is there not sometimes more impulsion for a man to say,

O tongue, if you will boast in moderation, speak up!^b

Is there not a very great allowance of frankness and jesting in the conversation and the activity of a drinking party? Now at such a time how is one to handle himself, pray, if he is not a legitimate guest, personally invited, but, as it were, a bastard illegally enrolled in the register of guests? Whether he speaks freely or not to the other guests, he is an easy mark for carping critics.

“There is much to deplore, too, in the lack of refinement and dignity of those who are not squeamish, but tolerant of names, and allow themselves to be invited, and accept, as ‘shadows.’ It is preliminary training in deeds when you allow yourself to be readily led by words in the path of indignity.

“This is why, although in inviting my friends I have allowed a place for shadows, on occasion, since the custom of the city is firmly established and excuse is not easy, yet if I am myself invited by one man to another man’s house, I have up to now been firm in declining.”

tion. To issue invitations in this way is inevitable when one entertains a visitor from abroad, as was said; for it is neither polite to invite him without his friends, nor easy to discover who is with him."

"Consider, however," I replied to him, "whether those who have granted the host the privilege of inviting in this manner have not also granted those invited the privilege of accepting. For it is neither fitting to grant what one ought not to ask, nor to ask what one ought not to grant; nor in general is it right to encourage an action that one ought not to be encouraged or agree to do, or in fact to do. In our relations with dignitaries or foreigners^a there is really no inviting or choice; we have to receive whoever is with them. But it is different in entertaining a friend; it is more friendly to issue the invitations oneself, since one knows who his acquaintances and intimates are and the members of his family. We show him greater honour and kindness when it does not escape us that these are the men whom he likes most and whose company he enjoys, whom he rejoices to see honoured equally and invited along with him.

"However, there are times when we have to leave the decision to him, just as those who sacrifice to a god pray also to all the deities who share in his altar or temple, even though they may not call on each of them by name; for neither food nor wine nor perfume is so conducive to comfort at dinner as a well-disposed and amiable companion. To put questions and make inquiries what kinds of food and pastries the prospective guest enjoys most, and his preferences in wine and perfume, is vulgarity itself and typical of the newly rich. But to invite a man who has many friends and members of the family and intimates to bring those of them whose company he would most enjoy, and whose presence makes him the most jovial—this is neither offensive nor peculiar. To have the company of others forced upon one on a voyage, in the family, or in legal business, is not so unpleasant as at dinner, and there, too, congenial company is most pleasant. A dinner party is a sharing of earnest and jest, of words and deeds; so the diners must not be left to chance, but must be such as are friends and intimates of one another who will enjoy being together. Cooks make up their dishes of a variety of flavours, blending the sour, the oily, the sweet, and the pungent, but you could not get good and agreeable company at dinner by throwing together men who are different in their associations and sympathies.

“Just as, according to the Peripatetic philosophy,” I continued, “there is in nature a first mover which is not moved, and a last moved which does not move anything, and between these two the kind of mover which moves some things and is moved by others,”^a so our discussion has three subjects, the man who invites only, the man who is invited only, and the man who both invites and is invited. Since we have spoken of the inviter, I should think it no less appropriate to give my opinion of the others as well. Now, I suppose the first obligation of one who is invited and himself asks others is to be careful not to ask too many. He must not seek provisions for everyone about him, as though they were an army living off enemy country, nor, like a player seizing squares in a game of pettoi, always be squeezing out his host’s men with his own friends, or driving them all from the board.^a This would put the host in the position of people setting out suppers for Hecatê and the hostile spirits: they never get a taste themselves, and their household has for its share nothing but smoke and tumult. Of course it is merely to make fun of us^b that people say,

Who offers sacrifice at Delphi must buy meat for himself^c; but this is what really happens to those whose guests, whether strangers or friends, come with a lot of 'shadows,' like Harpies, to carry off and make spoil of the feast.

"In the second place, he ought to come to dinner not just with whoever happens to be at hand, but should, if it is possible, invite persons who are friends and intimates of the host, so as to rival and anticipate him in his own invitations; failing that, he should choose those of his own friends whom the host himself would want to invite, if the host is a good fellow, choosing good fellows, if a scholar, scholars, if a man of influence, other men of influence, and men with whom he has long been seeking to converse and be friends. To offer and provide the opportunity, under such circumstances, of beginning an acquaintance and a friendship is a very appropriate and polite act. But he who introduces people of different and incompatible types, for example, heavy drinkers to an abstemious host, or intemperate and extravagant people to a man of simple life; or, on the other hand, one who introduces to a young man, fond of wine and gaiety, gloomy old men or sophists talking solemnly through their beards—such a man is tactless, and replaces friendly entertainment with annoyance. The guest received ought to be no less pleasing to the host than the host to the man he has invited, and this will be so if the inviter makes sure that not only he himself, but those who come with him or by his action are suitable and congenial.

“ Now for the last of our three, this man who is invited by one man to another man’s house, if he rejects or resents the name of ‘ shadow,’ he is in truth afraid of a shadow ; but, on the other hand, he does need to be very circumspect. It is not good breeding to accept at once an invitation to go along with just anybody or in just any way. The first consideration must be, who invites him. If it is not someone quite intimate who would take him, but some man of wealth or nabob who, like an actor on the stage, wants a splendid retinue, or one who thinks that he is doing a great favour and honour by his invitation, we must at once ask to be excused. But even if it is a friend or close acquaintance, we must not at once accept, but only if he is found to desire our company and society for pressing reasons, and there will be no other chance, or if he has just returned from abroad, after a long absence, or is about to set out, and clearly has a friendly desire and longing for our company at parties ; and if, in addition, those he is taking along are not numerous nor outsiders, but we are either the only one or one of a few close friends ; or if, as a final consideration, his object is to promote a friendly association between us whom he is inviting and the principal host, and the latter is an excellent person, worthy of our friendship. For we have to avoid the wicked like brambles or catchweed, so much the more when they try to seize and embrace us. If those who would take us are persons of character but not the one to whom they would introduce us, we ought not to accept, nor tamely let a good friend be the means of getting us a worthless one, as if we were taking bitter medicine in honey. It is bad form, too, to visit a person wholly unknown and unfamiliar, unless he is someone of outstanding qualities, as I have said, and someone who will look on acceptance as an opportunity for friendship and will take it in good part if you turn up at his residence simply and informally in company with another guest.

“Of our own intimates, we ought surely to prefer to visit on another’s invitation those who have the same privilege of visiting us by invitation of a third person. To Philip the jester it seemed more amusing to go to dinner self-invited than properly invited^a; but if those concerned are gentlemen and good friends, on both sides, it is a more impressive as well as a more pleasant experience if they arrive along with other friends, at just the right time, uninvited and unexpected. In such cases, they both provide pleasure for the host and do honour to their conductors. It is quite improper, however, to go to the entertainments of rulers or of rich men or dignitaries, with an invitation not from themselves but from third persons—that is, if we are to avoid a not unjustified reputation for insolence and bad taste and unseasonable ambition.”

QUESTION 7

Whether the music of flute-girls is proper after-dinner entertainment.

Speakers : A Stoic sophist, Philip

WHEN I gave a dinner party, in Chaeronea, for Diogenianus of Pergamum, there was some discussion of types of entertainment, and we had considerable difficulty in beating off the attack of a long-bearded sophist of the Stoic persuasion, who brought up Plato's indictment of people who listen to flute-girls over their wine because they are unable to entertain themselves by conversation.^a Philip of Prusa,^b though a member of the same school, bade us dismiss from consideration Agathon's famous guests, whose talk was more delightful than any music of flute or lyre. The surprising thing was not, he said, that the flutist should be expelled from such a company, but that the party was not so entertained and charmed as to forget both food and drink. "Nevertheless, Xenophon was not ashamed, in the presence of Socrates and Antisthenes and others of their type, to introduce the jester Philip,^c like Homer's 'onion, the spice of the drink.'^d Plato has inserted Aristophanes' speech on love as a comic interlude in the Symposium,^e and finally opens the street door and introduces from outside an extremely gaudy spectacle: Alcibiades drunk and revelling, his head garlanded. Then comes his skirmish with Socrates over Agathon, and his encomium of Socrates—ye beloved Graces, is it really not blasphemous to say that if Apollo himself had entered the party with his lyre tuned, the company would have asked the god to hold his music till the conversation ran its course and reached its natural conclusion? Now," he went on, "considering that those great men, whose dialogues are so charming, still used episodic interruptions and gave variety to their Symposiums with such comic interludes, shall we, who have among us both statesmen and men of business, and a number, when it so happens, who are no one in particular and the least bit rustic—are we to expel such pleasant entertainments from our dinners, or retreat from them as though from the approach of Sirens? Cleitomachus the athlete was indeed admired for getting up and leaving a party if anyone mentioned sex^a; but is not a philosopher ridiculous if he runs from a party to escape a flute, or calls for his shoes and shouts to his boy to light the lantern when he hears a harp-girl tuning up? Is he to loathe the most innocent pleasures, as a dung-beetle loathes perfume?^b Surely it is especially appropriate over the after-dinner wine, if ever, to sport with such pleasures, and to surrender the mind to the god for their sake. In other respects I am a great admirer of Euripides, but I at any rate have never accepted his legislation about music, that it is something to be relegated to scenes of sorrow and depression.^c In those circumstances the physician required at the bedside is a serious and sober discourse; pleasures like music we should spice with the wine of Dionysus, and classify them as play, not repelled by the odour of perfume, dung-beetles by that of roses); cf. Non Posse Suaviter Vivi Secundum Epicurum, Mor. 1096 A.

When new tragic actors were to compete, he observed the equipment provided by the producers, the labours of the directors and the determination to win, then remarked that the city was mad to play in such dead earnest.^a It is true that we ought to play while playing, and not purchase our hours of ease at great cost, either in money or in time that is usable for something else ; but when the after-dinner wine provides relaxation we may well try the flavour of such entertainments, and also, as we enjoy them, consider whether some profit may not be gained from them."

QUESTION 8

What kinds of entertainment are most appropriate at dinner.

Speakers : Plutarch, a sophist, Philip, Diogenianus

1. AT the conclusion of this speech, I forestalled the sophist, who was intent on rebuttal, by saying, " Don't you think, Diogenianus,^b that it would be a better question, which of the many kinds of entertainment would be most in keeping with a dinner party ? Let us call upon this wise man here to give judgement on the point ; being free of emotion of all kinds,^c and proof against enchantment, he would not be so misled as to choose the more pleasant in preference to the better."

As Diogenianus joined me in this suggestion, the sophist replied without hesitation that he would banish all other forms of entertainment to stage and orchestra, and introduce a form of entertainment that had recently been brought in at parties in Rome but had not yet become a popular vogue. "You are aware," he said, "that of the dialogues of Plato, some are narrative and others dramatic. Slaves are taught the most lively of these dramatic dialogues, so as to say them by rote. They use a type of presentation appropriate to the personalities of the characters in the text, with modulation of voice and gestures and delivery suited to the meaning. Men of solid character and culture gave it enthusiastic approval, but such as had no manly quality and were so unmusical and uncultured that their ear had lost its purity—those who (as Aristoxenus says)^a vomit bile when they hear something in tune—would have banned it. It will not in fact surprise me if they get it altogether banned in the end, since effeminate taste is in the ascendant."

2. Philip saw that some of the company were a bit offended at this. "Spare us, good sir," he said; "an end to your abuse! We^b were the first to be disgusted when this movement was launched in Rome, and the first to attack those who thought fit to regard Plato as a bibulous pastime and to hear his dialogues rendered over their wine and dessert and perfume. 3. Taking the cup, Diogenianus said, "These, too, sound like sober words to me; the wine seems not to be harming us or getting the best of us. So I fear that I myself may be subject to correction. All the same, most kinds of entertainment must be trimmed from the list. First of all, tragedy: it is not at all appropriate to a party, with its majestic elocution and its elaborate representation of events that are moving and sorrowful. As for dances, I should disqualify the Pyladic,^b as pretentious and emotional and requiring a large cast; but out of respect for Socrates' well-known praise of the dance, I will accept the Bathyllic.^c It is a straightforward unaccompanied dance, verging on the kordax, and presents a danced interpretation of Echo or some Pan or Satyr revelling with Eros.

“ What objection, however, could anyone make to the New Comedy ? It has become so completely a part of the symposium that we could chart our course more easily without wine than without Menander. The style, pleasant and unadorned, is spread upon the action in such a way as to be neither too low for the sober nor too difficult for the tipsy. Excellent unaffected sentiments are an undercurrent that can melt the hardest heart and with wine to supply heat, like the smith's fire, reshape and improve the character. The blend of serious and humorous would seem to have no other poetic end in view than to combine pleasure with profit for men relaxing over their wine. Even the erotic element in Menander is appropriate for men who after their wine will soon be leaving to repose with their wives ; for in all these plays there is no one enamoured of a boy. Moreover, when virgins are seduced, the play usually ends with a marriage ; while affairs with casual women, if these are aggressive and shameless, are cut short by some chastening experience or repentance on the young man's part, and good girls who give love for love either find again a father with legitimate status or get a further dispensation of time for their romance—an accommodation of conscience that is but charitable. For men who are occupied with some other business, all this is perhaps not worth serious attention ; but over the wine-cups, I cannot regard it as surprising that Menander's polished charm exercises a reshaping and reforming influence that helps to raise morals to a higher standard of fairness and kindness."

4. Diogenianus fell silent at this point, whether he was merely pausing or had finished ; and the sophist launched another attack upon him, finding it necessary to recite some passages from Aristophanes. Then Philip turned to me and said, " Diogenianus has got everything that he wanted, since he has sung the praises of his darling Menander, and nothing else seems to interest him. But there are still many kinds of entertainment that we have not reviewed, which I should like to hear you discuss. To-morrow, when we are sober, we shall judge the sculptor's contest, if this is satisfactory to Diogenianus and to the stranger."

" Well," I replied, " there are certain mimes that they call hypotheseis (narrative representations), and some that they call paignia (farces),^a but I do not suppose that either kind is suitable to a dinner party. The hypotheseis have a too prolonged action and demand too much equipment ; and the paignia, which are packed with scurrilous and trivial low comedy, ought not even to be seen by the slaves that fetch our shoes, if their masters are prudent. Homer's era and on down to our own, a familiar member of the banquet, and we ought not to dissolve an intimate association of such long standing, but simply request the singers to eliminate the frequent dirges and laments from their repertory and to sing cheerful songs that are suitable to men in festive mood. The flute we could not drive away from the table if we wanted to ; it is as essential to our libations as the garland, and it helps impart a religious tone to the singing of the pæan. As its piping note touches our ear, it suffuses us with a voice of sweetness that strikes calm to the mind itself, so that if we harbour any troublesome care, that the wine has not dissolved or dispelled, this brings peace to the man who yields his spirit to its graceful and gentle melody—at least if the flute itself keeps due measure, and avoids emotional display, so as not to rouse into ecstasy, with low-register notes and a multiplicity of tones, a mind already moist with drink and easily stirred. Just as cattle do not comprehend speech that has meaning, but the herdsmen rouse them and quiet them again with musical whistlings and calls, or with pipes and conch shells, so, in so far as there is in our mental life something of the grass-fed herd that has no notion of reason and no response to it, a musician may with melody and rhythm, plucking the lyre or blowing on the flute, compose our minds and soothe our moods.

“ If I may express my own opinion, I should never commit a party to the music of flute or lyre by itself without words to be sung, as if it were committed to the whim of a stream on which it floats. There must also be words—that is, song. We must form the habit, whether working or playing, of enjoying the words and including words^a in our pastimes. We should regard melody and rhythm as a sauce, so to speak, added to the words, rather than use or prize them for their own sake. For just as no one refuses the pleasure in the wine and in the relish that we eat with our principal food, but Socrates did reject contemptuously the enjoyment of scents as unessential and artificial,^b so let us not answer the voice of the lyre or flute when it knocks at our ear unchaperoned; but if it comes in company with words and song, providing a feast to delight our rational part, then let us usher it in. We must suppose that Marsyas' punishment by the god in the old story was for the crime of bridling himself with mouthpiece and flutes and making bold to compete with instrumental music alone against the combination of song and lyre.^c

From a full belly come better counsel and wisdom.^a

They were Greeks, too, who were besieging Troy with Agamemnon, before whom, when they had eaten and drunk, 'first the old man began the weaving of counsel'^b; and it was for this very purpose that Nestor had proposed to the king to summon the nobles. 'Provide a feast for the elders,' he said, and 'when many are gathered together, you will be guided by him who gives the best counsel.'^c This also explains why the peoples with the best governments, among the Greeks, and those that have shown the most love of country in the maintenance of ancient custom, kept their rulers together over wine. For the so-called andreia (men's halls)^d among the Cretans, and the phiditia (common messes)^e among the Spartans had a place as secret councils and aristocratic caucuses—as did also, I suppose, the Prytaneum and Thesmotheteum here. And not much differently from these, the Nocturnal Council of Plato^f is a group of the best and most statesmanlike men to which are referred the most important matters, and those which require the most careful consideration. When Homer's heroes 'poured libation to Hermes last, when their thought was of bed,'^g were they not bringing reason and wine into one gathering? Just before departing, at least, they pray to the cleverest of the gods, believing him to be there with them and a partner in their deliberations. And in very ancient times, men regarded Dionysus as not even needing the help of Hermes ; they spoke of him as Eubuleus (Good Counsellor), and on his account they termed night euphrone (good thinking).”^a

QUESTION 10

Whether it was a good custom to deliberate over wine.

Speakers : Nicostratus, a brother of Plutarch (perhaps Lamprias)

1. WITH this speech of Glaucias, we concluded that those earlier, tumultuous arguments had been pretty well put to rest^b ; and that we might forget them even more completely, Nicostratus introduced a new question. In the past, he said, he had not been greatly concerned about the matter, because this was held to be a Persian custom, but that now, since it had been investigated and found to be Greek, there was need of a discussion in defence of it, in view of its apparent absurdity. “ For reasoning, like the eye, if it is surrounded by a surging humour, is no easy thing for us to move as we would, or keep at work ; moreover, the emotions which are stirred by the wine, like reptiles emerging when stirred by the sun, make our judgement precarious and unstable. Thus for men who are drinking, just as a couch is better than a chair, because it retains the whole body, and relieves it of all activity, so it is best to hold the mind steady. Failing that, we must not the potentially disturbing topics mentioned at the beginning of Question 8. Hubert suggests that by oversight he refers to Question 8 (in which, however, Glaucias does not appear). The confusion may be due to an editorial rearrangement of the Questions, perhaps by the author himself.

give the tipplers sword and lance, but a rattle and a ball, as we give them to children who cannot keep still. So too the god put the reed in the hands of those fired with wine, which is the bluntest of missiles and the most pliable of weapons, so that when they are quickest to strike, they can do least harm. For it is proper to see that errors of the tipsy shall be comic rather than deplorable and tragic and a source of great disaster.

"Furthermore, wine deprives the intoxicated of the very thing that is most vital in the consideration of the greatest issues. It makes the man who has less intelligence or practical experience loth to follow the prudent and lend an ear to the experienced. Hence in fact Plato says that the very word 'wine' (oinos) derives from 'weening' to have sense (oiesthai noun echein).^a For each of those drinking supposes himself, not so much important or handsome or rich, though he does suppose all that, as he fancies himself prudent. This is why wine is loud-voiced and infects everyone with the urge to chatter at random and the notion that he is a great leader. It is not fitting for him to take orders but rather to give them, to lead, not follow. But in fact," he concluded, "a man could easily gather evidence on this side; it is plain to see, but we must hear the other side as well, if there is anyone, young or old, to stand up for it."

2. At this my brother^b most maliciously and trickily inquired. "Do you think, then, that anyone would be likely now, on the spur of the moment, to discover such arguments as are possible to bring to bear on the question?" Nicostratus replied that he certainly did, with so many scholars and statesmen present, and my brother answered with a smile, "So you think, then, that you would yourself be quite capable of discoursing to us on this subject, but that because of the wine you are drinking you are not in a fit state to talk about a matter of practical politics? Is this not like thinking that a man in his cups sees big things blurred but can focus on small ones very well, or that his ears fail to catch what those whom he meets and speaks to are saying, but hear the singers and flute-players perfectly? For just as, in the latter case, it is more likely that what is useful to us would intensify our perception than what is polished and smooth, so I should not be surprised if our minds too were to miss some subtlety of philosophy under the influence of wine, whereas if they were applied to the consideration of practical matters, they would be more likely to gain firmness and consistency by the stimulus of thought. Remember Philip at Chaeronea: he talked a lot of nonsense, in his drunkenness, and made a fool of himself, but the moment he was approached with a proposal for an armistice and peace, he set his face firmly, knitted his brows, and, brushing aside his casual and careless air, gave the Athenians a deliberate and sober answer.

"Surely it is not the same thing to be drinking and to be drunk. When men have drunk till they ramble, it is time, we assume, for them to go off to bed; but with men who can take a good deal of wine and go on drinking, who are, apart from that, men of sense, there is no reason to fear that they will miss the mark in reasoning, or be divested of their practised touch. We see that dancers and harpists do not perform less well at parties than they do in the theatre ; for the practised skill is there, which enables the body to be accurate in its activities and to co-ordinate its movements with precision.

“ Wine gives many people a forwardness that joins forces with self-assurance, but not offensively or excessively so much as wittily and eloquently. They say that Aeschylus composed his tragedies while taking wine. It is not so true that one of his plays (the Seven against Thebes) is ‘ full of Ares,’ to quote Gorgias,^a as that all of them are full of Dionysus. For as Plato says, ‘ wine heats the mind as well as the body ’^b ; it makes the body lively and breaks open passageways for fancies that, aided by a confident mood, bring discourse in their wake. Some people, who have a talent for invention but are too diffident and stiff when sober, will, when they immerse themselves in wine, find their spirits rise within them like incense, when heated, diffusing its essence. Wine drives out the timidity that is the greatest handicap in deliberation, and drowns out many another mean-spirited and ignoble emotion ; it shakes out the folds as it were, where duplicity and rancour lurk in the mind, and reveals every trait of character and every secret feeling in transparent language. It is the most fertile seed of frankness and thereby of truthfulness ; and if truth be not present, neither practical skill nor quick insight do any good. No indeed, many do better using whatever words come into their heads than craftily or treacherously concealing their minds.

“ There is no need, therefore, to fear wine as a stimulus to the feelings. It does not rouse those that are lowest, except in the wicked—and their deliberative faculty is never in a sober state anyway. Theophrastus used to call barber shops ‘wineless symposia’^a because of the talk that goes on there; just so a grim and ‘wineless drunkenness’ is always lurking in the mind of an uncultured man. This may be roused by any burst of temper or ill will or contentiousness or meanness of spirit, most of which moods are blunted rather than whetted by wine, so that it makes people, not foolish and stupid, but simple and guileless, and though alert to their own advantage, yet partisans of honour. Naturally, those who mistake lack of scruple for cleverness, or consider dissembling and meanness of spirit to be good sense, will class as fools those who, in their cups, say plainly and guilelessly what they think. But the ancients did just the opposite, when they named the god Eleuthereus (Liberator) and Lysios (Releaser). They thought that he had a great gift of divination not because of the ‘bacchic and mad’ element, as Euripides said,^b but because by taking from the soul its slavish and timorous and suspicious nature and freeing it from these, he grants us the boon of treating each other with truthfulness and frankness.”

(QUAESTIONES CONVIVALES)
BOOK VIII

INTRODUCTION

THIS book is devoted largely to rather serious questions, over half of the problems being concerned with philosophy, science, or medicine. Especially interesting, from this point of view, are those on Plato's geometrician-god (2) and on the Pythagorean symbola (7 and 8). The etymologies of 6 and the long discussion on new diseases in 9, like the argument on swallowing in Book VII, Question 1, cast interesting light on the level of scientific and philological sophistication in Plutarch's circle.

Two pairs of dialogues are connected in dramatic situation (1 and 2, 7 and 8). All except 5, and perhaps 9, give the impression of being intended to sound like authentic reports.

On the treatment of the text see the introduction to Book VII.

PEOPLE who would banish philosophy from the symposium, Sossius Senecio, are even more at fault than one who would take away the lights. For if the lamp is removed, moderate and prudent men will not be any worse behaved than before, since they have in their self-respect a greater safeguard than seeing and being seen ; but if ignorance and lack of culture keep company with wine, not even that famous golden lamp of Athena ^a could make the party refined and orderly. Of course for a group of men to say nothing at all, while stuffing themselves with food, would be downright swinish—perhaps even impossible. Still, one who permits conversation in a drinking-party, but makes no move to see that the conversation is orderly and profitable, is much more ridiculous than the man who approves of serving wine and dessert at dinner, but pours the wine unmixed and sets on food unseasoned and uncleaned. For no drink or food is so disagreeable or unwholesome, for lack of the right treatment, as is conversation that drifts about randomly and foolishly at a party. At any rate, those philosophers who wish to give indulgence in wine a bad name define it as “vinous babbling,”^a and babbling means, precisely, engaging in empty and frivolous conversation. The outcome of undisciplined chatter and frivolity, when it reaches the extreme of intemperance, is violence and drunken behaviour—an outcome wholly inconsistent with culture and refinement.

It is not an accident that in the Agrionia, as it is celebrated here, the women search for Dionysus as though he had run away, then desist and say that he has taken refuge with the Muses and is hidden among them, and then after a while, when their dinner is over, quiz each other with riddles and conundrums.^b The meaning of the ritual is that when drinking we ought to engage in conversation that has something speculative, some instruction in it, and that when conversation like this accompanies indulgence in wine, the wild and manic element is hidden away, benevolently restrained by the Muses.

Well, what I happened to hear and say last year at the birthday celebration for Plato supplies matter for the first chapter of this book, which is the eighth of the Table-Talk.

QUESTION 1

The days on which certain eminent persons were born ;
also, stories of birth from divine parents.

Speakers : Diogenianus, Plutarch, Florus, Tyndares

1. ON the sixth of Thargelion^c we celebrated the birthday of Socrates, and on the seventh that of Plato, with a sword the women of the family descended from the daughters of Minyas, who had been punished for rejecting the worship of Dionysus.

^c The month of Thargelion corresponds roughly to our May.

and this coincidence of dates furnished us with our first topic of conversation. The first to speak was Diogenianus of Pergamum ; he praised Ion's remark about fortune, that though very different from wisdom, it brings out many similar results.^a Certainly this fortuitous conjunction seems charmingly appropriate, not only that their birthdays came together as they did, but that the older man and the teacher should have come first in order.

I myself was inspired to mention to the company a good many chronological coincidences, like the stories about the birth and death of Euripides, who was born on the day the Greeks fought the naval battle against the Mede at Salamis,^b and died on the day when Dionysius, the elder of the two Sicilian tyrants, was born.^c At the same moment, as Timaeus says,^d fortune ushered from the stage the man who devised imitations of tragic events and ushered in the man who acted a tragic part.

Someone mentioned also the death of King Alexander and of Diogenes the Cynic, which took place on the same day. There was general agreement, too, that King Attalus died on his own birthday ; but there was a difference of opinion about the death of Pompey the Great in Egypt, some saying that he died on his birthday and some on the day before his birthday.^e Pindar came to mind, too, born during the Pythian games to be the author of many a beautiful hymn for Apollo, the god of the festival.

^a Apollo was called Hebdomagenes (as here), Hebdomeios, and Hebdomagetes. Perhaps the legend of his birth on the seventh of the month (also mentioned Mor. 292 ε) arose because, as a god of seasons and months, he was connected with the division of the lunar month into weeks of seven days (Roscher, Lex. d. gr. u. r. Myth. i, p. 425). See also Calli-

2. Florus said that on Plato's birthday we ought not to disdain to mention Carneades, a very celebrated adherent of the Academy, since both were born during a festival of Apollo, one during the Thargelia in Athens, the other while the Cyreneans were celebrating the Carneia. "They celebrate both on the seventh," he said, "and you interpreters and priests give the epithet Seventh-born to the god because he was born on that day.^a Therefore I do not think anyone would say that those who attribute Plato's parentage to Apollo are bringing disgrace on the god, who made him, through the agency of Socrates (as if he had been a second Cheiron), a physician to heal greater ailments and sicknesses than those healed by Asclepius."^b He also mentioned the vision which is said to have appeared to Ariston, Plato's father, in his sleep, which spoke and forbade him to have intercourse with his wife, or to touch her, for ten months.^c

^b The words "those healed by Asclepius" are not represented in the Greek, but they are implied. (Reiske proposed to add the words ἡ Ἀσκληπιῶν in the text.) Asclepius the hero was, like Achilles, a pupil of the centaur Cheiron, and became the patron of medicine. Plato's philosophy is medicine for the soul or mind.

But I suspect that begetting is no less inconsistent with the immortality of the divine than is being begotten. For it, too, is a kind of change, and a vicissitude. This seems to have been in Alexander's mind, also, when he said he recognized most clearly that he was mortal and perishable during the time he lay with a woman or slept,^a because sleep comes as the result of a yielding, through weakness, and all generation is the destruction and transformation of something of one's own into something different. I am reassured when I hear Plato himself naming the uncreated and eternal god as the father and maker of the cosmos and of other created things.^b They were created not through semen, surely; it was by a different potency that God begot in matter the principle of generation, under whose influence it became receptive and was transformed.

The hen knows not the passing of the winds,
 Except when brooding-time is near.^c

And I do not find it strange if it is not by a physical approach, like a man's, but by some other kind of contact or touch, by other agencies, that a god alters mortal nature and makes it pregnant with a more divine offspring. 'Not mine the tale,'"^d he said in conclusion, "but the Egyptians say that Apis is brought

Animal.* iii. 1 (749 a 35 ff.), Historia Animal. vi. 2 (560 a 5 ff.). Plutarch is, of course, comparing the hen's unawareness with that of a mortal woman impregnated in a mystical or spiritual way, by a god. (It is doubtful whether Sophocles also had in mind the Orphics' primal wind-egg, Aristophanes, Birds, 695.)

to birth by a touch of the moon,^a and in general they allow sexual intercourse with a mortal woman to a male god, but in the contrary case they would not think that a mortal man could impart to a female divinity the principle of birth and pregnancy,^b because they think that the substance of the gods consists of air and breath, and of certain heats and moistures."

QUESTION 2

What Plato meant by saying that God is always doing geometry.

Speakers : Diogenianus, Plutarch, Tyndares, Florus, Autobulus

1. AFTER this a silence fell. Diogenianus, making a new start, said, "If you please, let us on Plato's birthday take Plato himself as partner in the conversation, and since we have spoken about the gods, consider what he had in mind when he asserted that God is always doing geometry—if indeed this statement is to be attributed to Plato."

I remarked that while this statement is not made explicitly in any of Plato's writings, it is well enough attested and is in harmony with his character, and Tyndares immediately took up the argument :

"Do you think, Diogenianus, that this saying conceals a reference to some recondite or difficult doctrine, and not merely to what he himself said and wrote many times, when he sang the praise of Zeus ; cf. Plutarch's word ἐπαφή ("touch") here, and note Aeschylus, Prometheus, 848 f.

^b Plutarch rejects this distinction, Life of Numa, iv. 4, on the ground that "intercourse is a reciprocal matter, and . . . both parties to it enter into a like communion."

^a As the celebrant passes through lesser rites to ascend to the highest initiation, in which he is privileged to "view" the sacred secrets, so the philosopher passes, with the help of geometry, from study of physical objects to the vision of the ideas.

^b Phaedo, 83 D : "Every pleasure and pain has a kind of geometry for drawing us away from the world of sense to which we cling, and turning us toward the intelligible and eternal level of existence, the contemplation of which is the goal of philosophy, as being a 'viewer' is the goal of a mystery-rite?^a For the nail of pleasure and pain, by which he represents the soul as fastened to the body,^b seems to have this as its greatest disadvantage, that it makes the objects of sense-perception clearer than those of intellectual knowledge, and forces the understanding to judge by emotion rather than by reason. Being habituated, through the experience of intense pain and pleasure, to paying heed to the shifting and changeable aspects of physical things, as though they were true being, the understanding is blinded to truth and loses that organ—that light within the mind, worth 'thousands of eyes,'^c by which alone the divine may be contemplated. Now in all of the so-called mathematical sciences, as in smooth and undistorted mirrors, there appear traces and ghost-images of the truth about objects of intellectual knowledge; but geometry especially, being, as Philolaüs says, the source and mother-city of the rest,^d leads the understanding upward and turns it in a new direction, as it undergoes, so to speak, a complete purification and a gradual deliverance from sense-perception. It was for this reason that Plato himself reproached Eudoxus and Archytas and Menaechmus for setting out to remove the problem of doubling the cube into the realm of instruments nail, and nails and pins her [the soul] to the body, and gives her a bodily nature, making her think that whatever the body says is true" (tr. Church).

and mechanical devices, as if they were trying to find two mean proportionals not by the use of reason but in whatever way would work.^a In this way, he thought, the advantage of geometry was dissipated and destroyed, since it slipped back into the realm of sense-perception instead of soaring upward and laying hold of the eternal and immaterial images in the presence of which God is always God.”^b

2. After Tyndares, Florus, who was his close companion and kept humorously pretending to be in love with him, said, “Thank you for not monopolizing your argument but sharing it. You have granted us the power of refuting it, since you prove that geometry is necessary not for the gods, but for us. For surely a god does not need mathematics as an instrument to turn his understanding from created things and bring it to bear on what really exists! For it is in him they exist, by his help, and by connexion with him. But consider now whether Plato may not, without your noticing, have been hinting at something close and familiar to you,^c because, I mean, he combined with the spirit of Socrates that of Lycurgus no less than that of Pythagoras (whom Dicaearchus suggested).^d You know, of course, that Lycurgus expelled arithmetical proportion from Lacedaemon, because of its democratic and rabble-rousing character. He introduced the geometric proportion,^e which is appropriate to a moderate oligarchy or a lawful monarchy. The arithmetical distributes an equal amount to each, measuring by number, whereas the geometric distributes to each an amount corresponding to his worth, measuring by proportion. It does not mix everything together, but has within it a clear principle of distinction between good and bad ; people receive their due not as the balance or the lot directs, but always by the distinction of good and bad in them. This is the proportion that God applies in the judgement of our actions, my dear Tyndares. It is given the names of justice and retribution, and teaches us to consider justice equal (fair) but not to consider equality justice. The equality which the mob seeks, which is in reality the greatest injustice of all, God roots out, as far as is feasible ; and he maintains distinction by worth, setting the proportionate relation, in geometrical fashion, as the standard of lawfulness."

* On these two kinds of proportion see especially Plato, Laws, vi. 757 B, Aristotle, Politics, III. v. 8; v. i. 7, Nicomachean Ethics, II. vi. 7; and cf. Mor. 484 B, 643 C. In the arithmetical (like 1 : 2 :: 2 : 3), the terms on both sides differ by the same amount; in the geometric (like 1 : 2 :: 2 : 4), they differ by the same proportion. Isocrates (Areopagiticus, XXI) maintained that the geometrical proportion was the governing principle of the Athenian democracy in its great days.

3. When the rest of us applauded this speech, Tyndares pretended to be jealous, and called upon Autobulus^a to tackle Florus and chastise him for his words. This he declined to do, but he brought forward a contrary argument of his own. He said that geometry has no other subject than the properties and characteristics of limits, and that God in the process of world-making uses no other method than that of imposing limitation on matter, which is by itself unlimited. The ancients used the term "unlimited" of the unbounded and indeterminate character of matter, not with reference to size or number but because of its lack of order and harmony. For shape or arrangement is always a limit imposed on the material that is shaped or arranged. Without this process it was, by itself, shapeless and disorganized. When numbers and ratios have been generated in it, matter is imprisoned, as it were, and encompassed by lines and by the figures generated by lines, that is solid figures, so that it furnishes the primary kinds and distinct forms of bodies, which are the foundations, so to speak, for the genesis of air and earth, water and fire. Octahedra and icosahedra, as well as pyramids and cubes, have equalities among their sides and similarities among their angles, and proportions which could not possibly have arisen from disorderly and erratic matter without that which defines their shapes and articulates their parts, by geometrical rule. Thus from the time when limit was generated within the unlimited, the universe has been and is being perfectly harmonized and blended and defined. Matter is always struggling to break out into unboundedness, and seeking to avoid being subjected to geometry; but reason seizes upon it and encloses it in lines and marshals it in the patterns and distinctions which are the source and origin of all that comes to be.^a

4. After this speech they asked me also to contribute something to the argument. I praised the views expressed as genuine products of their own conception, and said that they had sufficient plausibility. most characteristic theorems, or rather problems, of geometry is this : given two figures, to construct a third equal to one and similar to the other.^a They say, in fact, that Pythagoras offered sacrifice when he solved this problem ; for it is surely much more elegant and inspired than that famous theorem which gave the proof that the square on the hypotenuse is equal to the sum of the squares on the sides enclosing the right angle."

"No doubt," said Diogenianus, "but what has it to do with our discussion ?"

"You will easily see the point," I replied, "if you recall the threefold division, in the Timæus,^b of the first principles from which the cosmos came to birth. One of them we call, by the most appropriate of names, God, one matter, and one form. Matter is the least ordered of substances, form the most beautiful of patterns, and God the best of causes. Now God's intention was, so far as possible, to leave nothing unused or unformed, but to reduce nature to a cosmos by the use of proportion and measure and number, making a unity out of all the materials which would have the quality of the form and the quantity of the matter. Therefore, having set himself this problem, these two being given, he created a third, and still creates and preserves throughout all time that which is equal to matter and similar to form, namely, the cosmos. Being continuously involved in becoming and shifting and all kinds of events, because of its congenital forced association with its body, the cosmos is assisted by the Father and Creator, who, by means of reason, and with reference to the pattern, gives

Why sounds carry better at night than in the daytime.

Speakers: Ammonius, Boëthus, Plutarch, Thrasyllus, Aristodemus

1. ONCE when we were dining at Ammonius' ^b house in Athens, the noise of some disturbance sounded through the house. A crowd outside was shouting for the general. (Ammonius was serving his third term in this office.) After he had sent some of his attendants and put an end to the disturbance by sending the people away, we discussed the question why those inside hear clearly people shouting outdoors, while persons outside do not hear those inside so well.

Ammonius said that this problem had been solved by Aristotle. ^c The voice of persons indoors, he said, moving out into a large mass of air and spreading out, is at once obscured and dissipated, but a voice from outside coming in is not so affected, but is kept intact and remains intelligible. The fact which needed explanation, continued Ammonius, was rather that voices are more sonorous at night and preserve not only their volume but the precise articulation. "To me," he said, "it seems a fine stroke of Providence to have given accuracy to our hearing at the time when we have no use—or at most very little—of our vision. For the air when it is dark (as Empedocles ^a says, 'in the desolate, blind-eyed night') repays us through our ears for whatever it takes away from our eyes of their power to see ahead. But since we must also investigate the causes which operate by the inevitable process of nature,^b and since the proper task of the physical scientist is to study material and instrumental principles, which of you first," he said, "will supply us with a convincing solution?"

2. When silence fell, Boëthus ^c said that when he was still young and occupied with academic pursuits, he had been accustomed to using postulates and adopting unproved assumptions, after the manner of geometry, but that he would now employ some of the demonstrated doctrines of Epicurus.^d "Existing things are borne about in the non-existent. There is a great deal of void interspersed and mingled with the atoms of air. Now when air is dispersed and has scope and motility because of its loose structure, the empty spaces left between the particles are small and narrow and the atoms, being scattered, fill a good deal of space, but when it is compressed and the atoms are crowded into a small space, and are forced close together, they leave plenty of space outside and make the intervals large. This is what happens at night, under the influence of cold. For warmth loosens and separates and dissolves concentrations, which is why bodies when boiling or softening or melting take up more room, while on the other hand the particles in freezing and cooling bodies join to Providence, but through intermediate, material causes, which may be investigated by the scientist.

A sound which approaches and strikes a large number of particles collected in a mass is either silenced completely or undergoes serious convulsions and many collisions and delays. But in an empty stretch, void of atoms, it travels a smooth, continuous, and unimpeded path to the organ of hearing, preserving, by its velocity, not only the sense of the message but its fine detail. You have noticed, too, that empty vessels when struck are more responsive and send the sound a long way, and often the sound goes round and round and there is much communication of it ; but a vessel filled either with solid matter or with some liquid becomes completely mute and soundless, since the sound has no way or passage by which to go through. Of physical bodies themselves, gold and stone, because of their compactness, are weak-voiced and dull-sounding, and quickly extinguish sounds within them, but bronze is melodious and vocal, because it has much empty space within its structure and is light and fine in its spatial mass, not constricted by crowding particles, but containing an abundance of yielding and impalpable substance. This gives easy passage to other motions and especially to sound, receiving it hospitably and speeding it on its journey, until someone, like a highway-robber, seizes and detains and blindfolds it. There it comes to a halt, ceasing to move on because of the obstruction. This," concluded Boëthus, "is in my opinion what makes the night sonorous and the day less so. Daytime, by its warmth and the expansion of the air, makes the intervals between the atoms small. Only let no one interpose a veto of my basic assumptions."

3. Ammonius urged me to say something in answer to Boëthus, so I began, "Let your basic assumptions stand, my dear Boëthus, though they do have in them a good deal of 'emptiness.' But you are incorrect in regarding void as a source of the preservation or movement of sound. For absence of contact and effect and impact is characteristic of silence and inactivity, but sound is an impact on a sound-conducting body, and a sound-conductor is a body whose parts are affected together and are cohesive, but also easily moved and volatile and uniform and, because of its tension and coherence, responsive to an impact. The only example of such a body, among things we know, is air. For water and earth and fire are all soundless in themselves, but each gives forth with a roar or a rattle when struck by a breath of air. There is no void in the structure of bronze, but an admixture of even and smooth air gives it sensitivity to impact, and resonance. If we may judge by appearances, it is rather iron that is found to have in its structure an element of weakness or porousness or honeycombing, and it is most cacophonous, and the least vocal of metallic substances. There was no need, accordingly, to trouble the night with contraction and increased tension of its air, so as to leave passages and vacuums elsewhere, as though the air were a hindrance to sound or destroyed its substance. Air is itself the substance and body and power of sound.

TABLE-TALK VIII. 3, 721-722

“ Apart from these points, inequable nights, for example cloudy or stormy ones, ought to be by your theory more sonorous than nights that are clear and uniform in composition, because then the atoms are forced together in one place, and leave the place they are driven from empty of matter. It is also very obvious that a cold day would be more sonorous than a hot summer night. But neither of these things is true.

“ So now I shall leave this argument of yours and cite Anaxagoras, who says that the air is moved by the sun with a quivering, vibrating motion, as is clear from the little bits and fragments always dancing in the sunlight, which some call motes. Anaxagoras ^a says that these, hissing and buzzing in the heat, by their noise make other sounds hard to hear in the daytime, but that at night their dancing and their noise abate.”

4. When I finished, Ammonius said, “ We shall doubtless seem ridiculous if we not only suppose that we have refuted Democritus but want to correct Anaxagoras as well. Still, we must deprive Anaxagoras’ bodies of their hissing, for it is neither probable nor necessary. The vibration and movement of the atoms set churning in the light is often sufficient to split the sounds and scatter them. For if the air, which as you said is the material basis of sound and provides its essence, is calm, it passes on the particles and waves of sound straight and smooth and continuous from a distant source. A windless calm transmits sound, and the opposite condition does not, as Simonides says ^a :

From coming fitly to mortals' ears.

Often the turbulence of the air prevents even the pattern of a sound from reaching us articulate and well-defined, but in any case it always diminishes somewhat its volume or extent. Night has, in and of itself, nothing to cause movement in the air, but day has one important thing, the sun, as Anaxagoras himself has said."

5. Ammonius' son Thrasyllus ^b replied to him, "Why, in the name of Zeus, do we always think we must attribute these phenomena to movements of the air seen by mind alone and ignore its visible tossings and convulsions? hear and speak. But at night the air, being mostly motionless and waveless, when everything is resting, naturally conducts sound to us unbroken and intact."

6. Aristodemus of Cyprus,^a who was also present, said, "But Thrasyllus, don't you think that night-battles and night-marches by large armies refute your view? They do not make sounds any less loud, even though the air is in great turmoil and vibration. A part of the cause of the phenomenon we are discussing lies within ourselves. Most of the speech that we ourselves emit at night is related to some disturbance or prompted by some emotion; we are shouting commands or questions at someone and raise our voices. For what rouses us to words and deeds at the time when we are usually at rest is never anything insignificant or unexciting, but something important, urging us with the compulsion of some great need, so that our voices too travel with greater force."

closest friends, all men of learning, I was present too. At the clearing away of the first course, someone came in to present Herodes the professor of rhetoric,^a as a special honour, with a palm-frond and a plaited wreath sent by a pupil who had won a contest with an encomiastic oration. After accepting them, he sent them back again, remarking that he did not understand why, of the various games, each one has as prize a different kind of wreath, but all use the palm-frond. "I for one am not convinced," he said, "by the explanation that the equality of the leaves is similar to a contest or a race, because they spring up in opposition to each other and run along together, and that the word nike ('victory') itself is derived from the fact that they do not 'yield' (me eikon). For there are many other plants as well which accurately distribute nourishment to leaves in opposing pairs, all but doling it out by measure or weight, and achieve an amazing evenness and regularity. There is more plausibility in the view that the ancients admired the beauty and shapeliness of the tree, like Homer when he compared the beauty of the Phaeacian maiden^b to 'the shoot of a palm tree.' Incidentally, you are doubtless aware that some used to pelt the victors with roses and rose-campion, too, and some even with apples and pomegranates, in each case with the idea of honouring them with beautiful things. Still, the palm has nothing to set it apart so obviously from other trees, since in Greece the fruit it bears is not even edible, but remains immature and unripe. If, as in Syria and Egypt, it bore dates, the most pleasant of all sights to see and the sweetest of all dried fruits, there would be no other tree to compare with it. The king, they say, being very

2. In this speech we thought that Herodes' digression about Nicolaüs was not less pleasing than the main question. "All the more reason," said Sospis, "for each of us to be eager to add to the main discussion some extra contribution of his own. I will contribute first the remark that the fame of victors ought to remain unfading and exempt from old age, as far as is possible. Now the palm is one of the most long-lived of plants, as the Orphic poems somewhere attest :

They lived as long as the high-fronded shoots of the palms.^c

To it alone, practically, belongs a characteristic falsely attributed to many others, namely that of being 'firm-leaved' and always in leaf.^d For we observe that neither the laurel nor the olive nor the myrtle, nor any other of the trees that are said not to shed their leaves, always keeps the same leaves, but as the first are shed others are growing in their place ; like cities, each is ever-living and continuous. But the

^b The king mentioned here is apparently Herod the Great of Judaea, for whom Nicolaüs of Damascus performed many services. There are also traditions (erroneous, according to Jacoby) that Augustus called dates (or a certain kind of cakes) after Nicolaüs because he frequently used to send them to him as gifts. 3. At the conclusion of Sospis' remarks, Protogenes, the professor of literature, addressed Praxiteles the geographer,^a " Shall we let these rhetoricians ply their own trade like this, making conjectures on the ground of likelihood and probability, without ourselves having something to contribute to the discussion from our researches? I seem to recall reading recently in a history of Athens that Theseus, when he was first to hold an athletic festival in Delos, tore off a branch of the sacred palm tree, which is why such a branch was called spadix." ^b

4. " You are right," answered Praxiteles, " but they will say they want to know of Theseus himself why he tore off a branch of palm rather than of laurel or olive when founding the games. Consider whether the prize is not proper to the Pythian games, because Amphictyon introduced it and it was at the Pythian games that people first, in honour of the god, decked victors with laurel and palm. Indeed, people used to dedicate to the god not laurel nor olive but palm—Nicias, for example, did so when performing sacred ceremonies on behalf of the Athenians at Delos,^c the Athenians did so at Delphi ^d and, in earlier times, so did Cypselus the Corinthian.^e Our god is fond of

There is a distinction between light and heavy contests, and they say that whereas the Delphians sacrifice to Apollo the Boxer, the Cretans and Lacedaemonians sacrifice to Apollo the Runner. Do not the dedications of arms and the finest of the battle-spoil and trophies at Pytho attest that this god has much influence in the realm of victory and the winning of power ? ” ponents. The god, though, is, as he ought to be, impartial in his favour to everyone.

“ But let us follow Sospis—for he is an excellent guide—and again take hold of the palm tree, which provides two handles for the argument. In the first place, the Babylonians sing hymns of praise to the tree as serving them in three hundred and sixty ways. To us Greeks it is of very little use, but its very failure to bear fruit is appropriate to the philosophy of athletics. For though it is very beautiful and large, sterility, in our country, goes along with its shapeliness. As with an athlete, its shapeliness expends the nourishment it gets, building up its body ; so that it has little material left, and of poor quality, to produce seed.^a Secondly, the thing I am going to mention next is unique beyond anything we have spoken of, and is true of no other tree. If you impose weight on a piece of palm-wood, it does not bend down and give way, but curves up in the opposite direction, as though resisting him who would force it.^b This is the way with athletic contests, too. Those who cannot stand the strain because of weakness and softness are pressed down and forced to bend, but those who stoutly bear up under training are raised up and exalted, not in body only but in mind as well.”

from the Nile at night and not during the day. Some thought they were afraid of the sun, which by its heat renders liquids more subject to corruption. For anything heated or warmed is always more prone to change, and has suffered in advance a relaxation of its quality. Cold, on the other hand, seems to compress and hold together and preserve anything in its existing state, and this is eminently true of water. The cold state of water has preservative qualities,^a as is shown by snow, which keeps meat largely immune to decay for a long while. But warmth alters everything from its normal state, as is well shown by honey, which is spoiled by boiling, but if left uncooked, helps preserve other things from going bad. The best evidence adduced for this explanation was that of the water of pools. In winter it is no less potable than other water, but in summertime it becomes noxious and unhealthful. Thus, since night seems analogous to winter and day to summer, the sailors have the idea that the water will be more likely to remain unchanged and free from taint if it is drawn at night.

In the face of this argument, so eminently persuasive, rose another to bolster a layman's faith, as it were, with the confirmation of nautical experience. Some stated, namely, that the sailors draw water at night because the river is still quiet and peaceful, whereas in the daytime numbers of people are drawing water or using boats and many sorts of animals are moving about in it, it is roiled and becomes turbid and muddy. In this condition it is liable to go bad, for all mixtures are more likely to putrefy than what is unmixed. Mixing produces conflict, conflict produces change, and putrefaction is a kind of change.^a This is why painters call a blending of colours a "deflowering," and Homer calls dyeing "tainting,"^b and common usage regards the unmixed and pure as virgin and undefiled. Earth in particular, when mixed with water, alters and destroys its natural potable quality, so that the waters of stagnant enclosed ponds are more likely to turn putrid, having much mud intermixed, whereas flowing streams avoid mixture or shake off any earth that enters their course. Hesiod aptly praises the water of for that is healthy which is uncorrupted, and the uncorrupted is the unmixed and pure. An excellent confirmation of the argument is found in differences of terrain. Waters that flow through a mountainous and stony country are clearer than those of the marshes and plains, since they do not carry off much earth. The Nile, encompassed by soft terrain, or rather interspersed through it as blood is through flesh, has the benefit of its sweetness, and is filled with fluids that are heavy and nourishing; but in its flow it is impure and turbid. If it is roiled, this is even more the case, for motion mixes mud and liquid, but when the river is quiet the mud sinks and disappears, because of its weight. This is why they draw water at night, but also in order to anticipate the sun, which by continually evaporating the finest and lightest element in the liquid, causes deterioration.

QUESTION 6

On people who arrive late at dinner ; also, the origin of the words akratisma ("breakfast"), ariston ("breakfast" or "luncheon") and deipnon ("dinner").

Speakers : Sons of Plutarch and of Theon, Plutarch, Soclarus, Theon, Lamprias, and others

1. My younger sons, having stayed too long at some musical performances in the theatre, arrived rather late at dinner, and Theon's ^a sons twitted them playfully with epithets like "dinner-stoppers" ^b and "dusk-diners." ^c In self-defence they retorted by calling the others "run-to-dinners." ^d One of the older persons present commented that a "run-to-dinner" is one who is late for dinner : when he is delayed, he comes on the scene hurrying at a faster pace than a walk. He recalled a witticism of Gabba, ^e Caesar's jester, who used to call those who arrived late "dinner-lovers," on the ground that in spite of having other engagements they did not refuse invitations—because of their love of dining out.

2. I mentioned that Polycharmus, ^f an Athenian popular leader, when giving in the assembly an answer to criticism of his way of life, ended by saying, "This is how I have lived, men of Athens ; and in addition I have never, when invited to dinner, been the last to arrive." 3. Soclarus,^a however, spoke up as advocate for the young men: "In spite of what you say, Alcaeus called Pittacus a 'dusk-diner,' according to the story, not because he dined late but because he mostly preferred the company of obscure and undistinguished people.^b In fact, dining too early was a cause for reproach in ancient times; and they say that the akratisma ('breakfast') is so named from akrasia ('incontinence')."

4. "Not so," Theon interrupted, "if we are to believe those who have written accounts of life in the early days. They say that people then, being both hard-working and temperate, would eat in the morning a piece of bread dipped in akratos ('unmixed wine') and nothing else. So they called breakfast akratisma because of the akratos.^c What was prepared for their dinner they called opson, because they dined late (opse), when they got away from business activities."^d

Our next topic of inquiry was the etymology of deipnon ("dinner") and ariston ("breakfast" or "luncheon"). We decided that the ariston is the same meal as the akratisma, relying on the testimony of Homer, who says the associates of Eumaeus

^a Actually, ἄριστον seems to be related to ἤρι, “ early,” and ἔδομαι, “ eat.” It was originally an “ early meal,” but the time varied with custom, so that sometimes it must be called “ luncheon.” The first vowel is long in this sense.

rived from aura ("morning breeze"), as is aurion ("to-morrow").^a Deipnon ("dinner"), on the other hand, is so called because it "brings rest" (diana-pauēi) from labour; people dine when they have finished working, or in the intervals of work. This, too, can be gathered from a phrase of Homer,

At the time of day when a woodsman prepares his dinner.^b

Still, it may be that since people took breakfast (ariston) wherever they were and without trouble or effort, using whatever food was at hand, while dinner (deipnon) was by then a prepared meal, they derived the word ariston from rhaiston ("easiest") and deipnon from diapeponemenon ("elaborated").

5. My brother Lamprias, who has a saucy disposition and loves a joke, promised to show, since we had permitted this much nonsense, that the Latin words are much more appropriate than the Greek. "They say that cena ('dinner') has its name from koinonia ('fellowship'). The ancient Romans generally took their early meal alone, but had dinner along with their friends. The ariston they called prandium because of the time of day. For afternoon is endion, and they called the rest after the ariston, endiazein ('taking a siesta').^c By the word they meant to signify either an 'early' (proïnen) meal or the nourishment which they take 'before being in need' (prin endeeis) of it. What is more," Lamprias continued, "leaving aside couch covers, wine, honey, olive oil, tasting, proposing toasts and so many other things which obviously are called by the same name in Latin as in Greek, who

^c πράνδιον (Lat. prandium) seems to be analysed as πρὸ ἔνδιον, "before noon;" ἐνδιον is the basis of the word ἐνδιάζειν, "take a siesta;" so that the Roman's prandium is the meal "before the siesta."

^d Sextius Sulla is a frequent speaker, on a variety of topics, in the Table-Talk, and has an important role in the De Facie.

He claimed him as an Etruscan, ^e not through the lineage of his father, as others have done, but insisting that Pythagoras was born, raised, and educated in Etruria. He stressed in support the symbola (" signs "), ^f like those bidding one on rising from bed to shake up the bedclothes, and not to leave the mark of a pot in the ashes when it is lifted, but to stir them up, not to receive swallows as guests in the house, not to step over a broom, and not to raise in the house a bird with hooked talons. He said that though the Pythagoreans have handed these precepts down in oral and written tradition, the Etruscans are the only people who in fact carefully observe and abide by them.

2. After Lucius' discussion of these topics, we commented that the rule about the swallows seemed especially strange—keeping out a harmless creature which is friendly to man, just the same as the savage and murderous birds with hooked talons. The ex-

^a In the well-known story Philomela was changed into a swallow and Procne into a nightingale. The emotions Plutarch refers to include both Tereus' lust for his sister-in-law and the anger which impelled Procne to kill her own son (and planation which some of the ancients had regarded as sufficient in itself to explain the hidden meaning, that the precept conceals a reference to slanderous, whispering associates, was rejected by Lucius himself. Whispering is actually not a characteristic of swallows, nor is chattering or garrulity any more characteristic of them than of jays or partridges or hens.

“ Well then,” said Sulla, “ do they avoid the swallow because of the myth about the slaying of the child, going so far afield to set us against those emotions which led, in the story, to the unholy and cruel things that were done by or to Tereus and Procne and Philomela ?^a Even now people call these birds the ‘ ladies from Daulis.’ Gorgias the sophist, when a swallow let fall a dropping on him, looked up at her and said, ‘ Watch your manners, Philomela ! ’^b Or is this explanation also worthless ? For they do not bar the nightingale or deport her as an alien, though she had her part in the same tragic events.”

3. “ Doubtless, Sulla,” I said, “ there is much in what you say. But consider the following points. Is the swallow perhaps in bad repute among the Pythagoreans for the same reason as the birds with hooked talons ? She is a flesh-eater, and is especially prone to kill and feed on cicadas, sacred and musical insects.^c Also, she flies close to the ground, hunting tiny, minute creatures, as Aristotle remarks.^d Then she alone, of the creatures that share man’s roof, lives and eats there without making a contribution or his) in requital. paying a share. Yet the stork, which receives neither shelter nor warmth nor any security or help from us, pays a rent for his roof-top perch, by making the rounds and killing toads and snakes, which are treacherous and hostile to man, while the swallow, though she does get all these benefits, is gone as soon as she has hatched and raised her young, like the suspicious ingrate that she is. But the most telling point is that of all creatures that share man's dwelling, the fly and the swallow alone cannot be domesticated. They will not let themselves be touched, or allow any companionship, or share in any task or recreation. Flies are timid because they are harshly treated and constantly shooed away; but the swallow is shy because of inborn misanthropy and because, not trusting us, she is always untamable and suspicious. Now if the proper method, in studying this kind of subject-matter, is not simply to seek a direct answer, but to note reflections, as it were, of one thing in another, then the intention of Pythagoras, in making the swallow an example of fickleness and thanklessness, was to forbid us, when persons come to us and take shelter because of some emergency, to make them our close associates for any longer period than is necessary, or allow them to share in the hearth and the household or our most sacred concerns."

4. My words seem to have amounted to a removal of inhibitions for the rest, for now they confidently attacked the other "signs," proposing explanations that were mainly ethical. For example, Philinus said that the Pythagoreans obliterate the mark of a pot from the ashes as a lesson that we must let no obvious trace of anger remain. Rather, once the boiling over is ended and there is peace, all remembrance of evil must be erased from the mind.

The shaking up of the bedclothes seemed to some to have no hidden meaning ; they thought there was impropriety in the very fact, when a man's wife had slept with him, of the place being seen, marked as with a seal-impression.

Sulla thought it more likely that the precept was intended to discourage daytime napping, sleeping equipment being removed the first thing in the morning. One should rest at night and in the daytime get up and be active, without neglecting to remove every trace of a dead body. You might as well say dead, for a man asleep is no more use than a dead man. He thought there was additional evidence for this interpretation in the fact that the Pythagoreans recommend to their comrades not to relieve anyone of a load but to help add to his burden and increase the load, thus showing their disapproval of all slacking and indolence.

^a At Mor. 670 D, Plutarch makes another speaker say that, of sea-creatures, the Pythagoreans abstained especially the ban of silence, I do not suppose that the fact is secret or esoteric that they used to abstain especially from fish.^a Not only is this reported of the ancient Pythagoreans, but I have also met pupils of Alexicrates, our contemporary, who sometimes used the flesh of other living creatures in moderation, and even offered it in sacrifice, but who could not bear to taste fish at all. The reason advanced by the Lacedaemonian Tyndares^b I cannot accept, that this abstinence is out of regard for their silence, and that they call fish ellops ('silent')^c because they keep their mouths shut and under restraint. He said it was in accordance with the Pythagorean rule that my namesake exhorted Pausanias to 'hide within a silent (ellops) mind' his doctrines,^d and that in general the early Pythagoreans considered silence a godlike thing, since even the gods reveal their wishes, to those who can understand them, by acts and deeds without speech."

2. Lucius said, quietly and simply, that while the true reason is doubtless now as before secret and incommunicable, no one would mind our seeing what plausible or probable answer we could find. Theon, the professor of literature, was the first speaker, and remarked that it is a considerable task, and not an easy one, to prove that Pythagoras was an Etruscan. "But it is fully agreed that he associated for a long while with the wise men of Egypt, and that he emulated them in many ways and considered them to be of very great authority in matters of priestly ritual. An example is abstention from beans; Herodotus ^a says that the Egyptians neither plant nor eat beans, and cannot even bear to look at them; and we know that even now the priests abstain from fish. They also consider it a religious duty to avoid salt, so that neither cooked food nor bread seasoned with salt from the sea is served.^b Various reasons are given for this, but only one is true: their hatred for the sea as an element unrelated and alien, or rather completely hostile to man by nature. They do not believe that the gods are nourished by it, as the Stoics suppose the stars are,^c but on the contrary, that the father and saviour of their country, whom they call an emanation of Osiris, perishes in it.^d When they mourn for him who is brought forth on the left and perishes on the right, they are referring cryptically to the death and destruction of the Nile in the sea.^e Hence they neither consider sea-water potable, nor any of the creatures it nourishes as ritually pure or edible, since they do not partake of air in common with us nor live in our congenial habitat. No, the air which preserves and nourishes everything else is

3. Agreeing with this, Sulla added, concerning the Pythagoreans, that if they tasted flesh it was most often that of sacrificial animals, and after a preliminary offering to the gods, but that no fish is fit for dedication or sacrifice.

When they had finished, I said that many people, both philosophers and laymen, would defend the sea against the Egyptians, by reckoning up the great contributions it has made to the ease and pleasure of human life. “The idea that the Pythagoreans maintain a truce with fish because fish are not related to us is grotesque and ridiculous, or rather completely savage. It bestows upon other creatures a Cyclopean gift^c for their kinship and close relationship—that of being dressed and eaten! Yet they say that Pythagoras once bought a netful of fish and then ordered the net to be cast off. He was not indifferent to fish as being of another race or hostile, but paid a ransom for them as for friends and relatives who had been captured.^d Therefore, to reverse your argument, the nobility and gentleness of those men makes me sus-last, after his companions. . . . This shall be your gift.”

Homer, Odyssey, ix. 369 f.

^a Cf. Mor. 91 c. In Porphyry, Vita Pythag. xxv, and Iamblichus, Vita Pythag. xxxvi, the release of the fish is related in connexion with Pythagoras' miraculous prediction of the number that would be found in a net being drawn in; no reason is given.

pect that they were especially disposed to spare sea-creatures out of regard for justice and a common morality, with the thought that each of the rest in some way or other gives man an excuse to treat it badly, while fish do us no harm, no matter how capable they are of doing so. It is possible to conclude, both from the words and from the religious observances of the ancients, that they considered it an unholy and unlawful act not only to eat but even to kill a living being that did them no harm. But when they began to be crowded by their ever-increasing numbers, and an oracle from Delphi (as the story goes) bade them succour the fruits of the earth which were being destroyed, they began to make sacrifices. Yet they were still revolted and terrified by what they did and called it simply 'making' or 'doing.'^a They considered it doing some great thing to sacrifice living animals, and even now people are very careful not to kill the animal till a drink-offering is poured over him and he shakes his head in assent. Such precaution they took to avoid any unjust act. Yet, leaving other considerations aside, if everyone should abstain from eating chickens alone, say, or hares, in a short time their number would make it impossible to maintain city life or to reap a harvest. Thus though necessity alone introduced the custom, the pleasures of life now also add to the difficulty of abolishing our carnivorous habits. The tribe of sea-creatures, however, provides our belly no pretext large or small for aggression against it; it neither uses the same air or water as ourselves nor attacks our crops, but is surrounded as it were by another world, with boundaries of its own which cannot be transgressed except on penalty of death. It is very obvious that angling or seining for any kind of fish is an act of gluttony and of gormandize, disturbing the waters and descending into the depths with no rightful excuse. Certainly no one can call the red mullet 'crop-devouring' or the parrot-wrasse 'grape-eater' or the grey mullet or sea-bass 'seed-stealing'—our reproachful epithets for land-animals.^a Not even our niggardly complaints about the marten or the domestic mouse could be applied to a fish—even the largest of them. Therefore the Pythagoreans, restraining themselves, not only, according to positive law, from injustice toward man, but also according to natural law from harming anything harmless, used fish least of all foods, or made no use of it. In fact, even apart from the question of right, there must be some tinge of self-indulgence and high living in the whole industry or we should not invest such funds and display so much ingenuity in it. This is why Homer not only represented the Greeks as abstaining from fish, though their camp was on the shore of the Hellespont, but did not even set a fish-course before the soft-living Phaeacians or the dissolute suitors, though both groups were islanders. The companions of Odysseus, in so long a voyage, never let down a hook or a fish-trap or a net as long as they had flour ;

With curved hooks, for hunger gnawed our bellies.^a

It was the same compulsion that forced them to use fish and to devour the cattle of the Sun. We can conclude that abstinence from fish has been an element of sanctity not only among Egyptians or Syrians, but among Greeks as well. The intention, I think, is to do what is right, but also to get rid of the complicated luxury involved in the consumption of fish.”

4. Nestor^b exclaimed, in reply, “Do you take no account of my countrymen, like the proverbial Megarians? Yet you have often heard me say that in Leptis the priests of Poseidon, whom we call ‘remembrancers,’ do not eat fish, for the god is called ‘life-fostering.’ Those descended from Hellen of old have also sacrificed to ‘patriarchal Poseidon,’ believing as the Syrians do that man developed from the moist element. So they also revere the fish, as being one with us in race and nurture, which is more reasonable as philosophy than Anaximander’s theory.^c He affirms, not that men and fish were developed in the same environment, but that men were first engendered and nourished inside fish, as dog-fishes are, and when they were mature enough to look out for themselves, at that point they came out and took to the land. As fire consumes its mother and father, the wood from which it is kindled (as remarked by the interpolator who inserted the Marriage of Ceyx^d among the works of Hesiod), so Anaximander, by revealing the fish as the common father and mother of mankind, made it scandalous to eat them.”

QUESTION 9

Whether it is possible for new diseases to come into being, and from what causes.

Speakers : Philo, Plutarch, Diogenianus, and others

1. PHILO, the physician,^a was maintaining that the disease called elephantiasis had been known for only a short time, since none of the ancient physicians had written a treatise on it, though they expatiated on many others that were minute and petty and, to most, obscure. I supplied him with an additional witness from the field of philosophy in the person of Athenodorus,^b who wrote, in the first book of his Epidemics, that both elephantiasis and hydrophobia first made their appearance in the time of Asclepiades.^c Those present expressed surprise at the idea that new diseases first came into existence and took shape at that date ; but they thought it would be no less amazing if such striking symptoms had escaped notice for so long. The majority were rather inclined, however, toward the second hypothesis, because it rather placed the blame on mankind, for they regarded nature as not being at all given to innovation in such matters—nor likely to foment revolutions in man's body as if in some body politic.

2. Diogenianus added that even diseases and passions of the mind follow a common, traditional course. " Surely wickedness is a versatile and audacious thing, while the mind is self-governed and capable, on its own responsibility, if it will, of altering its course. Yet the mind's disorder preserves a certain order, and in its states of passion it observes a certain moderation, as the sea does in times of high water. No new kind of vice not mentioned by the ancients has broken out, though there are many different desires, and countless causes and forms of fear; and it is almost too hard to enumerate all the forms of pain and pleasure.

Their life is not of now and yesterday,
But always; no one knows when first they came.^a

How indeed could the body develop a new malady, a late-born disease, when it does not have within it, like the soul, a source of motion of its own, but is linked with the rest of nature by the bond of common causes and is so tempered in its composition that even the play of its irregularity is held within limits, as if it were a ship tossing about its anchor? For there cannot be a new disease without a cause, introducing into the world, contrary to natural law, a coming-to-be from not-being; and to find a new cause for disease would be hard, unless one could demonstrate that a new kind of air, or a strange type of water, or foods never tasted by former generations, are flowing into our world from some other worlds, or from the spaces between them. For it is the things that sustain life which also cause sickness. There are no special seeds of disease; it is the disagreement of our food and drink with us or our mistakes in using them that upsets our system. Such disturbances have different forms which are lasting, though new names are often employed, because the names are a matter of usage, while the diseases are part of the order of nature. Thus, among the restricted number of diseases, the variety of their names is a source of confusion. But just as, given the parts of speech and the rules of syntax, it is impossible that a new kind of barbarism or solecism ^a should suddenly arise, so the combinations of bodily elements are subject to a restricted number of dislocations and malfunctions. In a way, even unnatural conditions are within the frame of nature.

“The mythographers are experts, too, in this field at least; their account puts the birth of completely unnatural and monstrous creatures at the time of the battle of the gods and giants, when the moon turned from its course and did not rise in the same quarter as usual. But our friends here are accusing nature of producing new diseases as though giving birth to monsters, without devising any sort of reason for such a change, either plausible or implausible, but calling an excessive or unusual degree of certain affections a new and distinct kind. This is not logical, my dear Philo, for an intensification or increase adds size or number, but does not force the thing concerned into another class. I do not think this is true of elephantiasis either, which is an extreme form of some skin disease, or of hydrophobia, which is an extreme form of some stomach trouble or melancholy. What is more, it is surprising we have not noticed that Homer himself was acquainted with hydrophobia. It is clear that when he used the term ‘rabid dog,’ ^b he took the epithet from this malady, from which the term ‘rabid’ is applied to human beings too.”

help in defending the ancient physicians, since, if these diseases were not found to be more recent than their time, they must be convicted either of negligence or of ignorance of important facts.

In the first place, we thought Diogenianus was wrong in supposing that intensifications and relaxations do not produce distinct kinds and do not force anything into another class. If this were so, we should say that there was no difference between vinegar and sour wine, or bitter and astringent, or wheat and darnel, or between one kind of mint and another. Yet all of these are very clearly qualitative losses of identity and transformations. In some cases, where there is a lowering of intensity, it consists in a weakening of the quality, and in others, where there is an increase in tension, in a strengthening of the quality. Or shall we say, too, that flame is no different from refined air, or a radiance from a flame, or frost from dew, or hail from rain, but that these are all increases of tension and strength? And now comes the moment to say that blindness is no different from poor eyesight, nor cholera from nausea—that they are only cases of modification by more or less. Still, this is all unnecessary to our argument; for if our adversaries concede that the intensification and the strengthening itself has now come into existence for the first time, and that the novelty is in the category of quantity, not in that of quality, the paradox remains as before.

Secondly, in line with Sophocles' apt remark about things not believed because they did not occur before, though they have occurred now—

we considered it probable that diseases did not rush into existence in a racing start, at the drop of one barrier, as it were, but that they kept arriving one after another, so that each individually, after an interval, came into being for the first time.

“One might conjecture,” I said, “that those which come as a result of a deficiency, and those which heat and cold produce, would assail the body first, and that those arising from surfeit and luxuries and over-indulgence would appear later, along with idleness and leisure, which come when primary wants are well provided for. The superfluities accumulate a vicious residue in the body and that is a breeding-ground for a medley of new diseases with ever new mutual complications and combinations.

“That which is according to nature is ordered and delimited, for nature is, precisely, order or else the handiwork of order, while disorder, like Pindar’s sand, ‘has eluded number,’^a and what is contrary to nature is simply what is unbounded and unlimited. The facts allow just one true statement, but an infinite number of false ones. Both rhythm and pitch go by formula, but no one could include in a formula the mistakes people make in playing the lyre or singing or dancing. And in fact Phrynichus^b the tragic poet says of himself,

As many figures Dance gives me as baleful night

propositions exceeds a million.^a (Hipparchus,^b to be sure, refuted this by showing that on the affirmative side there are 103,049 compound statements, and on the negative side 310,952.) Xenocrates asserted that the number of syllables which the letters will make in combination is 1,002,000,000,000.^c Why then should it seem surprising, when the body has in it so many factors and assimilates so many different qualities every time one eats or drinks, and employs motions and shifts that have no single proper moment or routine, that the complications of all these with each other sometimes produce new and unfamiliar ailments? For instance, take the plague at Athens, as described by Thucydides, who judges it to be no ordinary thing precisely because scavenging birds and animals did not touch the corpses.^d Some persons living in the vicinity of the Red Sea, according to Agatharchidas,^e contracted a sickness with new and unexampled symptoms, including the following: little worms^f would eat their way through the flesh of the lower leg or arm and emerge from the skin. When they were touched, they went back in, and produced an intolerable inflammation, as they encased themselves in the muscular tissues. No one knows of this disease ever occurring before, or of its afterwards ever attacking anyone else, but this people alone. There are many similar examples. There was even a case of a person who, after experiencing difficulty in urination for a long time, passed a barley-stalk with joints;

and I know it as a fact that my host Ephebus at Athens emitted, along with a large amount of semen, a hairy creature which ran rapidly on many legs. Aristotle relates that the grandmother of Timon, in Cilicia, used to hibernate for two months of every year, giving no sign of life except that she breathed.^a What is more, in the works of Meno^b it is given as a sign of liver disease that a patient watches attentively for the mice of the household and pursues them—a phenomenon that is nowhere observed nowadays. Therefore let us not be surprised if something previously nonexistent has come to be, nor if something that existed before has ceased. The cause of this is the structure of our bodies, which varies from time to time in the combination of its elements.

“As for the introduction of new air or strange water, let us give that up, if Diogenianus does not like it, though we do know that the Democriteans both say and write that when worlds perish, out beyond our own, and foreign atoms flow in from the infinite, then sources of plagues and unusual diseases may find their way into our midst. Let us also give up the partial destructions that take place on earth, from earthquakes, droughts, and rainstorms—occasions when the winds and streams, whose origin is from the earth, must likewise suffer deterioration and change.

“But we must not disregard the great changes that have occurred in the consumption of grains and cooked food and other elements of our diet. Many items that used never to be eaten or even tasted are now much enjoyed, like wine with honey or the womb of the sow. They say that the ancients did not even eat brains, which is why Homer said, 'I care for him no more than brains,'^a speaking of brains in this way because they found them revolting and so rejected and discarded them; and we know that many older people still cannot eat ripe cucumber, citron, or pepper. Probably the body is affected in an unusual way by these things, and is altered in its constitution as they imperceptibly produce a peculiar quality or residue. It is also probable that the order and rearrangement of foods makes a considerable difference; for the 'cold course,' as it used to be called, with oysters, sea-urchins, and raw vegetables, has like a body of light-armed troops been shifted from the rear to the front, and holds first place instead of last.

"The serving of the so-called aperitives is a great change too. The ancients did not even drink water before the dessert course, but nowadays people get themselves intoxicated before eating a thing, and take food after their bodies are soaked and feverish with wine, serving hors-d'œuvre of light and sharp-flavoured and sour foods as a stimulant to the appetite and then, in this condition, eating heartily of the rest of the meal. As influential as anything in causing change and breeding new diseases is the multiplication of effects in bathing the body, which, like

^a The word ἐγκαρος ("brain") is thought to occur only as a result of misinterpretation of this line of Homer (Iliad, ix. 378), where the preferred reading is ἐν καρὸς αἴσση "I care no more for him than a κάρ." But this last word is also difficult; it may be related to κῆρ ("destruction"), to κόρις ("bug"), or to κείρω ("cut"; i.e. "a chip").

This, I believe, is what a member of the generation just before ours would say, if he could look into the door of our bath-chamber. Our ancestors had their baths so mild and gentle that King Alexander used to sleep in the bath-chamber when he had a fever, and the women of the Gauls used to take a bowl of porridge into the bath-chamber and eat while they bathed, along with their children. Now the bathing establishments are like rabid, barking dogs that tear and rend the flesh. The air one breathes there, being a mixture of moisture and heat, leaves no part of the body in peace, but agitates and disturbs every atom and drives it out of place, until we quench the fire and fever that are in us.

“So you see, Diogenianus,” I concluded, “that our argument has no need of causes entering from without or of the spaces between worlds, but the change in our way of life, right here on earth, is capable of creating new diseases and making old ones vanish.”

natural for a philosophical spirit, and shared them with his friends too, proving Aristotle's own statement that "great learning gives many starting-points." ^a Most of the questions raised provided us with a pleasant pastime during our daytime walks ; but the common saying about dreams—that they are especially likely to be unreliable or false in the fall months—somehow came up after dinner, after Favorinus had finished a discourse on other topics.

Your friends, my sons, thought that Aristotle ^b had solved the problem, and that there was no point in any further inquiry or discussion, except to say, as he had, that the harvest is to blame. For fruit and grains when fresh and juicy generate a great deal of unruly vapour in the body. It is logical to expect not only wine to seethe and protest and olive-oil, when it is newly made, to cause sputtering in lamps, as the heat causes the vapour to rise in waves, but in fact we can see that the new grain too, and all kinds of fruit stretch and swell, till they exhale and let out the unripe and gassy part. They argued that there are some foods which bring bad dreams and interfere with appearances in sleep, and cited in evidence the bean and the head of the cuttlefish, from which people are instructed to abstain when they resort to divination through dreams.

2. Favorinus ^c is an enthusiastic admirer of Aristotle on all counts, and considers the Peripatetics the most convincing of the schools ; but on this occasion he advanced an old argument of Democritus. Taking

^a Probably the same as the famous sophist and polymath of Arelatê, a pupil of Dio Chrysostom and somewhat younger than Plutarch. The latter dedicated two books to him, and he wrote, in turn, a book entitled Plutarch, or On the Academic Position.

it down all blackened with smoke, as it were, he set about cleaning and polishing it. He used as foundation the familiar commonplace found in Democritus that spectral films penetrate the body through the pores and that when they rise they make us see things in our sleep. These films that come to us emanate from everything—from utensils, clothing, plants, and especially from animals, because of their restlessness and their warmth. The films have not only the impressed physical likeness in contour of an animal—so far Epicurus agrees with Democritus, though he drops the subject at this stage—but they catch up and convey by attraction spectral copies of each man's mental impulses, designs, moral qualities, and emotions. When they strike the recipient thus accompanied, they speak to him, as if they were alive, and report to him the thoughts, reasoning and impulses of those from whom they escape, whenever the copies are still preserved whole and undistorted till contact is made. They are best preserved when the air affords a smooth passage that is unimpeded and rapid. The air of autumn, however, a time when trees are shedding their leaves, is extremely uneven and rough; it twists and turns the films from their paths in all directions, destroying or diminishing their clarity, which fades because their movement is so slow. Just so, on the other hand, when the films come leaping forth in large numbers at high speed from bodies that are tumid and heated, and are received quickly, they make impressions that are fresh and whose meaning is clear.

3. Favorinus now looked with a smile at Autobulus and his group. "I see," he said, "that you are dis-

"None of your tricks with us!" said Autobulus. "We can see that in order to win approval for the opinion of Aristotle you have put that of Democritus beside it as a contrasting shadow. So we are going to turn our attention to Aristotle's theory and do battle with it, since it brings a wrongful accusation against the fresh fruit and grain and our beloved early-autumn season. Summer is a witness for our clients, as is late-autumn (metoporon), since it is when we consume the fruits, at the very moment of turning, at the greenest and brightest—as Antimachus says^b—that we are less haunted by deceptive and false dreams. The months when the leaves are falling, on the other hand, are already next door to winter; the grains are all ripened, the remaining fruits are dry and shrivelled and have lost all the upsetting and manic quality to which you referred. What is more, those who drink the new wine at the very earliest, do so in the month of Anthesterion, after winter is gone. (We call the occasion the Day of the Good Genius, and the Athenians call it the Pithoigia.)^c But we observe that even the vintage-workers are afraid to pilfer the must while it is still fermenting.

"Now, let us stop quibbling about the gifts of the gods and follow up another trail, along which we are directed by the name we give to the season of empty and false dreams. It is called 'fall' ^a because at that time, on account of the cold and dryness, the leaves fall, except those that have some warmth or oiliness in them, like olive, laurel, and palm trees, or some moisture, like the myrtle and ivy. Their composition saves these, but not the rest; in them the glutinous, cohesive quality is not permanent, the juice being either congealed by the cold or dried up because of its weakness and scantiness. Now it is proper to plants to flourish and grow by moisture and warmth, but even more so to animals. Conversely, cold and drouth are fatal to them. Thus Homer aptly spoke of 'humid mortals,' and called rejoicing 'warming,' but called the painful and fearful 'chill' and 'cold.' 'Dropless' (alibas) and 'dried' (skeletos) are words used of the dead; they are derogatory references to their dry condition. Furthermore the blood, whose power is sovereign among all substances found in us, is both warm and moist, while old age is deficient in both of these qualities. As the year revolves, the late autumn is like its old age: the wet season has not yet come, and the hot season is no longer in full vigour. Thus it is literally a sample offered of the combination of dry and cold; and it makes our systems susceptible to disease. It is inevitable, however, that our minds should share the body's experience, and especially that when the vital spirit is congealed, the light of divination should be dimmed, like a mirror that is fogged. It gives us nothing clear or connected or significant in our visions, as long as it is rough and lacklustre and constricted."

(QUAESTIONES CONVIVALES) .
BOOK IX

INTRODUCTION

THE dramatic date of the conversation that occupies Book IX of the Symposiac Questions cannot be determined, but it may belong to Plutarch's student days at Athens under Ammonius, head of the Platonic Academy. About half the dramatis personae are not mentioned elsewhere, namely Hermeias the geometer, Zopyrio the schoolmaster, Maximus the rhetor, i.e. teacher and exponent of the art of oratory, Hylas the teacher of literature, Menephylus the Peripatetic philosopher, Dionysius a farmer, Meniscus the physical trainer and Thrasybulus, whose occupation is not given; conceivably the last of these is to be identified with Ammonius's son Thrasyllus (722 c). The musician Erato reappears at 645 D ff., again in the company of Ammonius; on this occasion Plutarch expressly calls himself a "young man" (649 A). Protogenes is found again at 698 D ff. and 723 F ff. where, as in this book (741 c), he takes the line of "exposing" the teachers of rhetoric. He may be identical with Protogenes of Tarsus, who plays a chief part in the Amatorius, and recounts the myth in De Sera Numinis Vindicta. Herodes the teacher of rhetoric is found again at an entertainment given by Sospis (? the Roman name Sospes), when the latter, also a rhetor, was in charge of the Isthmian games (723 A). Marcus, teacher of literature, and Glaucias, a rhetor, recur at

PLUTARCH'S MORALIA

628 A ff., and the latter at 635 A ff. and 714 A ff. Trypho the doctor is a guest of Erato at 646 F ff. and of Plutarch at Chaeronea at 683 c ff. The company is completed by Plutarch's brother Lamprias, whose characteristic sense of humour is allowed some scope in Question 5.

The text is based on that of K. Hubert in the Teubner series, from which all information about the readings of manuscripts has been derived. Vindobonensis 148, the archetype of all surviving manuscripts, now ceases with the word Ἀφροδίτην at 747 E, having lost its last pages; for the short remaining section recourse must be had to copies made before the loss, of which the most important are Paris 2074, of the xiv century, Vaticanus 139, written soon after A.D. 1296, and Paris 1672, written soon after A.D. 1302. At a few places Hubert's text has been modified by the introduction of a new correction or the revival of an old one, and an uncertain conjecture has sometimes been admitted where the wording, but not the general sense, is in doubt.

The apparatus criticus does not mention every error, however trivial or obvious, of the archetype. By "Anon. 1 (Turn.)," "Anon. 2 (Turn.)," "Anon. 3 (Turn.)" I indicate the three hands (small and neat, medium, and large) which, in that order, entered corrections in the margins of Adrian Turnebus' copy of the Aldine edition, now Rés. J. 94 in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris (cf. Wytttenbach's edition, Praefatio, § 4). "Anon. (Turn. ?)" denotes a reading stated in the Frankfurt edition of 1599 to be derived from the margins of Turnebus' books. "Anon. (Amyot)" denotes a correction in the margins of Amyot's copy of the Basel edition, now Rés. J. 103 in the Bibliothèque Nationale ; it was acquired by him on 10 November 1569 and bears on its last page the date " 8 idus Sept. 1570." He is known to have collected the emendations of others (see Wyttenbach, Praefatio, § 5), but some, to which forte, puto, or some such word is attached, seem to be his own : these I record as " Amyot." " Amyot trans.," and similarly " Xylander trans." etc., indicate that the correction, although not explicitly made, is implied by the translator's version.

I wish to thank Mr. A. S. F. Gow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Professor J. H. Plumley of Christ's College, Cambridge, and Professor R. P. Winnington-Ingram of King's College, London for advice and information on various points.

TABLE-TALK

BOOK NINE

THE ninth book of Table-Talk, Sossius Senecio, contains the conversations held at Athens during the festival of the Muses,^a the reason being that the number nine is peculiarly appropriate to the Muses. Should it prove that the number of questions exceeds the customary ten, you must not be surprised. It was my duty to render to the Muses all that belonged to the Muses, and not to commit the sacrilege of robbing them of anything ; in fact it would need an even finer and larger offering than this to repay my debt to them.

QUESTION 1

On opportune and inopportune quotation from the poets

Speakers : Ammonius, Erato, and others

1. WHILE in office as strategos^b at Athens, Am-

^b At this date there was a single strategos who, with the archon and keryx, was one of the three principal civil officials at Athens. Inscriptions (Inscr. Graec. 3. 1092 ; 1114 ; 1145) show that he sometimes concerned himself with the training of the epheboi, young men who for two years, between the ages of 18 and 20, received a physical, military, and cultural education under state supervision. Ammonius filled the office three times, see 720 c.

^a The school of Diogenes, a centre for the instruction of the epheboi (Inscr. Graec. 3. 1093 ; 1133 ; 1135), was named after a Diogenes, who about 230 B.C. surrendered the Macemonius heard a demonstration given in the school of Diogenes^a by the young men who were studying literature, geometry, rhetoric, or music; afterwards he invited the successful teachers to dinner. Nearly all our friends were present, and quite a number of other men with literary interests. Now the reason why the only competitors to whom Achilles promised a dinner were those who had fought in single combat,^b was his wish, so we are told, that the contestants should, through sharing an entertainment at a common table, discard and relinquish any anger or ill-feeling that they might have conceived against one another in arms. For Ammonius, however, things went the opposite way: the competition and rivalry between the teachers took a sharper edge over the cups, and it was not long before there was a disorderly confusion of theses and challenges.

2. For this reason, as a start, he asked Erato to sing to the lyre, and when he sang the opening of the Works of Hesiod,

It's wrong to think there is one kind of strife alone,^c complimented him on the aptness with which he had matched the occasion. He followed this up by introducing the topic of appropriate verses from the poets, saying that a well-timed quotation was often not only felicitous but also very useful. Everybody immediately began to talk of the rhapsode at the donian posts in Athens for a payment of 150 talents, cf. Life of Aratus, xxxiv.

^b At the funeral games in honour of Patroclus, Iliad, xxiii. 810.

^c Works and Days, 11, the first line of the poem proper, what precedes being a proem. Hesiod distinguishes desirable emulation from bitter hostility.

^b Perhaps the best known of all tragic actors, Theodorus was reviewing such free-born boys as could read and write, ordered him to write down a line of verse : he wrote

O thrice and four times happy Greeks who perished then.^a

It is said indeed that Mummius was affected to the point of tears and let all the boy's relations go free. Mention was also made of the wife of Theodorus^b the tragic actor who would not receive him to sleep with her while the competition was imminent, but when he entered her room victorious welcomed him with the words

Agamemnon's child, you have permission now.^c

3. After this it occurred to some of the guests to recount a large number of inopportune quotations also, on the ground that it has its uses to know of such and be on one's guard. For example they say that on Pompey the Great's homecoming from his great campaign^d his daughter's tutor, to provide a display of her proficiency, had a book fetched and gave the child this line to start from :

Thou hast come from the war; oh that thou had'st perished there.^e

Then there once came to the ears of Cassius Longinus^f an anonymous report that his son had died abroad ; no one was in a position to say what was the truth or put an end to misgiving. An elderly senator came lived in the fourth century ; he also wrote tragedies. Cf. De Gloria Atheniensium, 348 E and Aristotle, Politics, 1336 b 28.

1. This talk provided a happy means of reducing the disturbance. Nevertheless, it being the custom at the festival of the Muses for lots to be handed round and for those whom the draw brought together to propound learned problems to one another, Ammonius, fearing that some professors of the same subject might be drawn together, ^d directed that, without any balloting, a geometer should put a problem to a teacher of literature and a musician to a teacher of rhetoric, and that afterwards they should change round and pay one another back in kind.

2. The first problem was put to Protogenes the ^b Long-jump, sprint, discus, javelin, wrestling. A competitor first in three events was unbeatable.

^c Legendary Phoenician founder of Thebes and author of teacher of literature by the geometer Hermeias, who asked him for the reason why alpha is put first of all the letters. He replied with the stock reason given in schools. First, there was every justification for the vowels' taking precedence of the consonants and semivowels^a; then among the vowels some were long, some short, and others, the so-called ambiguous, long and short; the last were naturally superior by reason of this capacity, and among them, in turn, the leading position belonged to the one that could be prefixed to either, but suffixed to neither, of the others. Alpha was of this nature; if placed after iota or upsilon it refused, he said, to come to terms or fall in with them, to effect the formation of a single syllable from the two vowels; it sprang away, as it were, in distaste, and always tried to make its own start. On the other hand, if given a position before whichever you pleased of the other two, it made use of them, as they harmoniously followed its lead, to form syllables of words, as for example aurion (tomorrow), aulein (play a wind instrument), aias (Ajax), aideisthai (be ashamed), and countless other words. And so, like a competitor in the pentathlon,^b it was superior on three counts, beating the majority of letters by being a vowel, the vowels by being of ambiguous quantity, and the ambiguous vowels by its characteristic of leading the way and never following or taking second place.

3. When Protogenes had finished, Ammonius called on me. "Aren't you," he asked, "as a Boeotian, going to give any support to Cadmus,^c who is said to have placed alpha first because it is the

^a Hesiod, Works and Days, 405: “First buy an ox, and then a woman.” Both the name and the form of the Greek letter alpha are derived from the Semitic letter aleph, the name of which means “ox.” In the Greek A the horns of the ox’s head point downwards.

Phoenician name for an ox, which they, like Hesiod, reckoned not the second or third, but the first of necessities?"^a "Not a bit," I replied, "it is my own grandfather whom I must by rights support with what ability I have rather than Dionysus'.^b My grandfather Lamprias, you see, used to say that of all articulate sounds the first to be naturally uttered is that which has the phonetic value of alpha. He argued that the breath in the mouth is mainly shaped by the movements of the lips; their first movement is their vertical separation as they are opened, which emits this sound, an absolutely simple one that requires no effort, and neither asks for nor submits to assistance from the tongue, being pronounced while that organ remains in its original position, which is of course the reason why babies utter this sound first. And that, he would say, is why the perception of the sound of a voice is called aiēin (to hear),^c and there are many parallels, for example adein (to sing), aulein (to play a wind-instrument), alalazein (to yell).^d And I believe that airein (to raise) and anoigein (to open) are ^d alalazein is an onomatopoeic word representing a repeated open-mouthed shout, which gives a sound like that we write as a. The other examples, however, illustrate the fact that ancient "etymology" proceeds in ways that we find mistaken or unintelligible. It does not conceive of words as having developed according to phonetic laws from more primitive forms, but as showing in their present form the true nature of the thing they indicate. Adein (to sing) begins with an a because a is the sound, so it is maintained, that a wordless singer naturally produces (cf. tra-la-la, as a representation of wordless song): anoigein (to open) begins with an a because if we open the lips and make a sound, that sound is a. We cannot blow an aulos (an instrument of the clarinet type) without parting the lips, and so putting them in the position for making the sound of a: therefore aulein (to play an aulos) begins with an a.

In what kind of numerical proportion do the vowels and semivowels stand to one another? ^a

Speakers: Hermeias, Plutarch, Zopyrio

1. HERMEIAS replied that he accepted both explanations. "Well then," I said, "isn't it time you expounded to us any reason there may be for the number of letters in the alphabet? I am sure there is one, and find evidence in the fact that the mutes and semivowels stand in no chance numerical relation either to one another or to the vowels, but are in primary, or as you geometers call it, arithmetical proportion: since they are nine, eight, and seven,^b they have the property that the middle number exceeds the one extreme by the same amount as that by which it falls short of the other. Next, the largest number has the same relation to the smallest as that

^a A badly-worded and inaccurate summary of this question, which really is, Why are there 24 letters in the alphabet? The writer has confined himself to Plutarch's introductory remarks. Even so he should have mentioned mutes as well as vowels and semivowels (see critical note).

^b The Greeks divided their alphabet into nine mutes: β , γ , δ , θ , κ , π , τ , χ , ϕ ; seven vowels: α , ϵ , η , ι , \omicron , υ , ω ; and eight semivowels: ζ , λ , μ , ν , ξ , ρ , σ , ψ .

^a Apollo was born on the seventh day of the month, cf. 717 D supra and Lydus, De Mensibus, ii. 12.

^b Hermes was identified with the ibis-headed Thoth or Theuth, to whom Plato, Phaedrus, 274 D ascribes the invention of letters. Two species of ibis, the crested ibis and the sacred ibis (which forms part of the usual writing of Thoth's name), occur in Egyptian hieroglyphs, but neither is used as a unilateral phonetic sign. Modern Egyptologists, when listing the alphabetic phonetic signs, always begin with the vulture, which stands for a glottal stop: this would suit Plutarch's "inarticulate and voiceless," particularly as by

of the Muses to that of Apollo, the number nine being, as we know, assigned to the Muses and seven to their Leader.^a Then if we add together these extremes, they are twice the middle number, reasonably so, since the semivowels in a sense share the quality of both vowels and mutes."

2. "Hermes," said Hermeias, "was, we are told, the god who first invented writing in Egypt. Hence the Egyptians write the first of their letters with an ibis, the bird that belongs to Hermes, although in my opinion they err in giving precedence among the letters to one that is inarticulate and voiceless.^b Well, of all numbers four is particularly associated with Hermes; and many writers record that his birthday was actually on the fourth day of the month.^c Now not only did four multiplied by four provide the original letters of the alphabet, named the 'Phoenician letters' because of Cadmus,^d but also four of those that were invented later were his time the sound was hardly pronounced, although still written. The modern order of phonetic signs is, however, barely a hundred years old: there seems to be no evidence, unless it is to be found in this passage, to show which of these signs the Egyptians themselves placed first, or even that they had any fixed order of signs. It should be added that the crested ibis does occasionally function as a syllabic sign, representing a pair of vocalized consonants, and in cryptographic writing of Ptolemaic times is known to replace the sign for j, which was itself, owing to sound changes, sometimes confused with that for the glottal stop.

It is clear that in the series of numbers the first perfect number is three, as having a beginning, a middle and an end, or six, as being equal to the sum of its factors.^b Now of these, six multiplied by four, or three, the first perfect number, multiplied by eight, the first cube, has given our total of twenty-four."

3. While he was still talking, Zopyrio the schoolmaster was obviously laughing at him and kept on making audible comments; when he came to an end, he let himself go and stigmatized all such talk as complete nonsense. Both the number of the letters of the alphabet and their order, he said, were what they were by coincidence, and not for any reason, just as it was an accidental consequence of chance that the number of syllables in the first line of the Iliad was the same as that in the first line of the Odyssey,^c while the same thing was again true of their last lines.^d namely which of Aphroditê's hands did Diomedes wound? Zopyrio quickly countered by asking which was Philip's lame leg. "That's not a parallel," replied Maximus, "as Demosthenes has not even given a hint on the subject.^a But if you will admit that you are baffled, there are those who will show you where the poet indicates the wounded hand to those who have any wits." It is clear that if he had wanted to strike her left hand he would not have needed to jump to the side, as in advancing directly on her he would have had his right hand opposite her left. It was in fact reasonable that he should wound the hand that, being the stronger, gave more support to Aeneas as he was carried away, and that that hand should, on being wounded, drop the body. Secondly, when she got back to heaven, the poet represented Athena as jeering at her:

Speakers: Sospis, Hylas, Lamprias, Ammonius, Marcus

1. ALL this had put everyone in a more pleasant humour, except Hylas the teacher of literature. Observing him to be maintaining a dejected silence (he had not exactly been successful in the demonstrations), Sospis the teacher of rhetoric declaimed the line and finished the rest of the passage in raised tones, now addressed directly to Hylas,

But come, my Lord, that thou may'st hear the words I speak,
Come hither, quelling thy anger and unyielding heart. ^f

^e This argument recurs in Eustathius on Iliad, v. 424. Perhaps Virgil knew the problem, cf. Aeneid, xi. 277: "Veneris violavi volnere dextram."

^d What Plato in fact says (Republic, 620 B) is that Ajax picked up the lot that entitled him to twentieth place in the choice of a future life.

Hylas, still ruffled by his ill-temper, made an awkward reply, saying that the soul of Ajax, by Plato's account, on drawing the twentieth turn in the underworld, had exchanged his former shape for that of a lion. Personally, however, he often in point of fact thought of what the old man said in the comedy :

I'd rather be reborn an ass than see
Inferior men live more renowned than me.^a

" Well," rejoined Sospis with a laugh, " in the interval before we put on our donkey-skins, explain to us, as you care for Plato, what was in his mind when he described the soul of the Telamonian as having drawn twentieth place when he came forward to choose his fate." Hylas replied with curses, imagining that he was being made fun of for his lack of success ; so my brother spoke up, saying, " Surely now, is it not true that Ajax always wins the second prize, ' after the faultless son of Peleus,'^b for beauty, size, and bravery, while twenty is the second ten, and ten is as pre-eminent among numbers as Achilles was among the Achaeans ?" We laughed, and then Ammonius said, " That will do, Lamprias, as your piece of fun with Hylas ; we, however, want none of your jests, but a serious discussion of the reason, seeing that you have volunteered to take on the question."

2. Lamprias was flustered, then after a short pause said that Plato often treats us to a jesting play on words, but it is in those passages where he combines myth with his arguments about the soul that he makes most use of their significance. Thus he alludes to the intelligible nature of the heavens by the phrase "winged chariot" (harma),^a with reference to the harmonious (enharmonion) revolution of the universe. Similarly in this passage he makes the man who reports his own experience of Hades a Pamphylian by race, the son of Harmonius,^b and gives him the name of Er,^c in a riddling allusion to the fact that the souls are born by a union of parts (harmonia)^d and are fitted (synharmottontai) to their bodies, on getting release from which they collect from all quarters in the air (aēr), whence they betake themselves again to their second births. "Now is there any reason why 'twentieth' (eikostos) should not have been said with reference to the unreal yet likely (eikos) imaginative element of the story, or to the ballot as being random (eiké) and a matter of luck? Plato constantly touches on the three causes,^e as is natural enough for the man who first or most particularly observed how in the course of nature the operation of destiny mingles and interweaves with that of luck, while our free-will in its turn combines with one or other of them or with both simultaneously. So in this passage he has admirably suggested the influence that each cause

This way of formulating a tripartition of causes (cf. Epicurus, Letter to Menoecus, 133) belongs to an age later than Plato, but a very similar division, in which "nature" replaces "fate," is assumed by Protagoras in the dialogue that bears his name, 323 D, and criticized at Laws, 888 E, not so much as being false in itself, but because the generality take a false view of "nature." At Laws, 709 B the Athenian stranger says that human affairs are governed by God (whom we might equate with "fate"), by chance, and in a minor degree by human skill (which corresponds to the phrase here translated "free will").

announced the terms on which they would fight the duel, while those who as respondents accepted the terms carried no authority when they added to them. Now the challenge was not concerned with killing and death, but with victory and defeat. Quite rightly so, too : it was proper that the woman should belong to the better man, and the victor is the better man. On the other hand, it often occurs that even good men are killed by bad, as was Achilles later, when he was shot by Paris. We should not, I imagine, say that his death was a defeat for Achilles, nor should we call it a victory for the man who shot him, but an unfair piece of good luck. Hector, on the other hand, was defeated even before he was killed, when at the approach of Achilles he did not stand his ground but took to his heels in fear. The man who gives up and runs away is defeated beyond possibility of disguise, and has confessed his adversary to be the better man. That is why, in the first instance, Iris when giving her message to Helen says,

With their long spears they will do battle for you :
And then you shall be known as own wife to the victor,^a and later Zeus gave the decision in the contest in favour of Menelaüs, with the words

The victory was clear for warlike Menelaüs.^b

It would indeed be a laughable state of affairs if he 'defeated' Podes with a long-range javelin-shot^c that caught him unexpecting and off guard, but did not deserve to get the prize of victory from a man who, giving up the fight, turned tail and took cover in the arms of his wife, having been stripped of his armour while alive ^a; yet he had shown himself the better man and prevailed according to the terms used by that very opponent in his challenge."

3. Glaucias spoke next, saying that in the first place, whether it is a case of decisions, or laws, or contracts, or agreements, the later of two is accounted the firmer and more valid. "The 'later' agreement in this case," he continued, "was that due to Agamemnon's intermediacy, which made the issue that of the death, not the defeat, of the conquered. Secondly, the earlier agreement was a verbal one, while the subsequent one was sworn with oaths as well, with attendant curses upon those who might break it, while everybody, not just a single individual, accepted it and joined in the covenant. So this was an agreement in the proper sense, and the other only a challenge. Priam testifies to this as he leaves the place of contest after the oath-taking:

Now Zeus, methinks, and the immortal gods can tell
Which of the two is fated to meet the end of death. ^b

He knew that these were the terms on which the agreement had been made. And so again a little later Hector says, sion. It is therefore my opinion that the problem never was one involving conflict of formulas, since the former agreement is embraced by the latter ^a: to kill gives victory, but the victor has not necessarily killed his opponent. To sum up, Agamemnon did not supersede Hector's challenge but clarified it. Nor did he change its terms; he added the capital point by his stipulation that victory lay in killing the adversary. This is what constitutes complete victory; any other kind admits of excuses and controversies, as did that of Menelaüs when he neither inflicted any wound on his adversary nor followed up his retreat. Now in real instances of conflict the jury give their votes to the case that has nothing controversial about it and disregard the one that is less plain; just so we must here regard as firmer and more valid the agreement that involves an unquestionable and ascertainable conclusion. The most cogent point of all is that by not retiring or giving up when his opponent escaped, but by 'traversing the crowd' in all directions

In hope of setting eyes on godlike Alexander,^b

the very man who appears to have the upper hand has given his testimony that the victory was invalid and inconclusive, because his adversary had made good his escape. Nor did he then forget what he had stipulated:

Alexander, with the object of killing him and so completing the business of the contest ; and why, when he did not catch and kill him, he had no rightful claim to the prize of victory. He was not even the victor, if one can take his own words as evidence, when he upbraids Zeus in lament over his failures :

O father Zeus, no god of them all is your equal for mischief :

I did rely on avenging the villainy of Paris,

But in my hands the sword was shattered, and from my palm

The spear shot uselessly, and I failed to hit him.^a

^a We find it obvious that Polymnia is derived from the stems poly- (much, many), and hymno- (song of praise), and do not find it easy to understand that an ancient etymologist would not necessarily think this inconsistent with her name's indicating that she is the memory (mneia) of many things. Oionistiké (augury) is obviously derived from οἶδνος (bird) as augurium is from avis, but that does not prevent Plato from finding in the word an allusion to οἴσις, nous, and historia (Phaedrus, 244 c). He has a sort of reason on his side, for it could be argued that augury need not have been called oionistiké; it could as well have been, e.g. ornithoskopía, but for the fact that such a name would not have tion, but as they engage in the business proper to orators and statesmen. Of the other Muses Clio takes laudatory eloquence, klea being an old name for praise, and Polymnia history, since she is the 'memory of many things.'^a Actually all the Muses are said to be called Mneiai (Memories) in some places, as is the case in Chios.^b For my part I lay claim to some share in Euterpê also, if as Chrysippus says,^c she has as her province the pleasant (epiterpes) and delightful elements in conversation and informal talk.^d Such talk is as much in the orators' sphere as are litigation and public policy; expressions of goodwill, support of others' causes, and defence of others' acts all have their place in conversation.^e We also make extensive use of praise or blame in these contexts; if we do so skilfully, we achieve results that are neither combined the elements of oiêsis, nous, and historia that are included in its nature.

^b The place-name is introduced by an uncertain emendation, there being no confirmatory evidence.

^c S. V. F. ii. 1099, cf. Cornutus, chap. 14.

^d No single English word represents homilia, which covers not only what we call conversation (e.g. 629 F supra), but also continuous, but unrhetorical, discourse such as a philosopher may address to a small audience.

^e The text here is uncertain. Herodes appears to allude to the three branches of oratory, forensic or that of the law-courts, deliberative or that concerned with public policy, and epideictic, the oratory of display. He wishes to show that conversation shares the functions of all three, having praise and blame in common with epideictic oratory, support and defence with forensic oratory, and something else (perhaps a pair of things) with deliberative oratory. The word translated "expressions of goodwill" is not associated elsewhere with deliberative oratory, the normal characteristics of which are persuasion and dissuasion, cf. Aristotle, Rhetoric, 1358 b, a passage which establishes the lines of all later treatments of this subject.

^b This guess at the sense of the words lost is based on a passage of Stoic origin in Stobaeus, Ecl. ii. 108 5 W. (=S. V. F. iii. 630): "the good man, being good at conversation . . . is well-adapted to the mass of mankind, as small nor unimportant, while inexperience and clumsiness make us miss them. The line

Heavens, how loved and honoured he by all mankind ^a

(is claimed by some philosophers as appropriate to themselves),^b but it is rather to us orators, I think, that Persuasion and Charm belong, as being well-adapted to conversation."

2. "It would be wrong, Herodes," replied Ammonius, "to resent your laying a hand, even 'a mighty hand,'^c on the Muses. Friends' property is common property,^d and the reason why Zeus was father to many Muses was his wish that everyone might draw unstintedly from the well of beauty. We do not all have a use for hunting or going to war or to sea or for a mechanical trade, but education and speech are needed by every one of us,

Who take the fruits of the broad-based earth.^e

So he made one Athena, one Artemis, one Hephaestus, but many Muses. But why nine, neither more nor less? Could you tell us that? I am sure you must have considered the question, being such a lover of the arts and master of so many." "There is nothing abstruse in that," answered Herodes, "the number nine is on the tongue of every man, and of every woman too, as having the distinction of being the

a result of which he is also one to arouse love and possess charm and persuasiveness." The quotation from Chrysippus may well not be the only element of Stoic origin in Herodes' words.

^a An inexact phrase: it is the first square of an odd (? perfect) number, or the square of the first odd (? perfect) number.

^b A triangular number is one that can be represented by a triangular pattern of dots, thus: \cdot , $\cdot\cdot$, $\cdot\cdot\cdot$, as can a square first square of the first odd number ^a and the first product of odd numbers, since it can of course be divided into three equal odd numbers."

Ammonius smiled at him. "You put up a good fight by your recital of these facts, and you should add to them this much more, that the number nine is compounded of two cubes, namely the first two, one and eight, and by a different addition, of two triangular numbers, three and six, each of which is also a perfect number.^b But what had all this to do with the Muses any more than with the rest of the gods, to result in our having nine Muses, but not nine Demeters, Athenas, and Artemises? I hardly suppose that you are convinced by the explanation that nine Muses were born because their mother's name ^c is spelled with that number of letters."

Herodes laughed and there was a silence, whereupon Ammonius encouraged us to attack the problem. (3) So my brother said that the ancients knew of three Muses only.^d "To give proof of this fact," he continued, "in a company so numerous and so learned would be boorish pedantry. But the reason for it does not lie, as some say, in the three types of melody, diatonic, chromatic, and enharmonic,^e nor in the three notes that establish the intervals, number by a square pattern, thus: ::, ::: . It might be possible to translate the text of the manuscripts "the number nine is compounded of two of the primary numbers, namely one and eight," explaining that eight is the first cube (738 Ϝ), as one is the first integer. But since πρῶτα usually means "prime numbers," this is difficult. Although eight is sometimes regarded as the first cube, since a cube requires eight dots to delimit it, when Greek arithmeticians forget geometry, they speak of one as being a cube.

top, middle, and bottom.^a It is true that the Delphians gave the names of these notes to the Muses,^b incorrectly associating them with a single science, or rather with a part of the single science of music, namely that concerned with scales. In my opinion the ancients, observing that all branches of knowledge and crafts that attain their end by the use of words belong to one of three kinds, namely the philosophical, the rhetorical, or the mathematical, considered them to be the gracious gifts of three goddesses, whom they named Muses. Later, in Hesiod's days in fact, by which time these faculties were being more clearly seen, they began to distinguish different parts and forms; they then observed that each faculty in its turn contained three different things. The mathematical genus includes music, arithmetic, and geometry, the philosophical comprises logic, ethics, and natural science, while in the rhetorical it is said that the original laudatory kind was joined first by the deliberative, and finally by the forensic.^c Thinking it wrong that any of these branches should be without its god or Muse or deprived of higher control and guidance, they naturally discovered, for manufacture they did not, the existence of as many Muses as there are branches. Now nine permits of division into three threes, each of which is again divided into as many ones. In the same way, correctness of dis-gods,' in Homer's phrase,^a but all are not needed by all. But it puzzles me how Lamprias can have overlooked what the Delphians say. They tell us that it is not from notes of voice or string that the Muses have been given the names they have there. Rather the whole universe is divided into three regions : the first is that of the fixed stars, the second that of the planets,^b and the last the sublunary region ; they are all knit and ordered together in harmonious formulæ ; and each has its guardian Muse, the first region Hypatê, the lowest Neâtê, and the intermediate Mesê, who holds together and intertwines, so far as is feasible, things mortal and divine, terrestrial and heavenly. Plato, too, put this in a disguised form, calling them by the names of the Fates, Atropos, Clotho, and Lachesis^c ; observe that it was Sirens, not Muses, that he set to preside over the revolutions of the eight spheres, one for each."

5. "The Delphians' opinion," said Menephyllus the Peripatetic, taking up the conversation, "has in its way a measure of plausibility. But it is odd of Plato to give a home on the eternal divine revolutions not to the Muses but to the Sirens, divinities who are by no means benevolent or good, and either to pass the Muses over entirely or to call them by the names of the Fates and refer to them as daughters of Necessity. 6. "She does indeed," said Ammonius, "if you mean the Necessity of our world, a constraining cause outside the sphere of our will. But the necessity that holds sway among the gods is not intolerable nor, as I believe, resistant to persuasion either ^b nor yet coercive, except for wicked men, just as in a city the law is for those who look to its best interests something inflexible and immutable, not because a change would be impossible, but because it would be undesirable. Now Homer's Sirens, it is true, frighten us, inconsistently with the Platonic myth; but the poet too conveyed a truth symbolically, namely that the power of their music is not inhuman or destructive; as souls depart from this world to the next, so it seems, and drift uncertainly after death, it creates in them a passionate love for the heavenly and divine,^c and forgetfulness of mortality; it possesses them and enchants them with its spell, so that in best possible result: that is to say, the undesigned fixed factors in the physical world can often be made use of by a designing intelligence: see F. M. Cornford, Plato's Cosmology, pp. 160 ff. Plutarch's own interpretation of the Platonic passage (De Animæ Procreatione in Timæo, 1014 D, 1026 B) takes Necessity to be a psychical, not a physical, factor in the world. When Ammonius proceeds to compare Necessity with law in a city, he seems to be thinking not of Necessity per se, but of Necessity as guided by Mind, being affected perhaps by the Stoic identification of Necessity with Fate, Zeus, and cosmic law. joyfulness they follow the Sirens and join them in their circuits. Here on earth a kind of faint echo of that music reaches us, and appealing to our souls through the medium of words, reminds them of what they experienced in an earlier existence. The ears of most souls, however, are plastered over and blocked up, not with wax, but with carnal obstructions and affections. But any soul that through innate gifts is aware of this echo, and remembers that other world, suffers what falls in no way short of the very maddest passions of love, longing and yearning to break the tie with the body, but unable to do so. Not that I fall in with this interpretation at all points. My view is that just as Plato speaks of 'shafts' and 'spindles'^a instead of 'axes,' and of 'whorls' for 'stars,' so here, too, contrary to usage, he gives the name of 'Sirens' to the Muses, because they 'seyen' (eirousas), that is 'speak,' the divine truths in the realm of Death.^b Similarly Sophocles' Odysseus^c says that he visited the Sirens, do not need much or varied guidance. It is to a position here on earth, where mistakes and excesses and transgressions are numerous, that the other eight Muses should be removed, each correcting a different kind of evil and disharmony. Now since life consists partly of serious activity, partly of sport, and in both we need to act artistically and without excess, Calliopê, Clio, and Thalia, who is our guide in knowledge and vision of the gods,^a may be thought to act together to direct our steps and maintain our course when we are serious ; and when we turn to pleasure and sport, the others will not suffer us in our weakness to relax without discipline and like animals, but will take us under their care and escort us on our way in decent orderly fashion with dancing and song and with choric music that has measured motion fused with both tune and words. My own view is different. Plato lays down two principles of action in every man, the one an 'inborn desire for pleasures,' the other an 'acquired belief that aims at what is best'^b; sometimes he calls the one reason, the other emotion. Now each of these two principles has further subdivisions and I observe that every one of these stands in need of extensive and, in the true sense of the word, divine tutelage. To begin with, one aspect of reason is characteristic of the statesman and the king ; to this Hesiod tells us that Calliopê is assigned.^c It is Clio's province in particular to glorify the love of honour and add to its pride, while Polymnia belongs to that part of the soul that loves learning and stores it in the memory—that is why the Sicyonians call one of their three Muses Polymathia.^a Then everyone would refer to Euterpê the study of the facts of Nature, and would reserve no purer or finer enjoyments and delights (terpseis) to any other kind of activity. To turn to desire, Thalia converts our concern for food and drink from something savage and animal into a social and convivial affair. That is why we apply the word thaliazein (merry-making) to those who enjoy one another's company over wine in a gay and friendly manner, not to those who indulge in drunken insults and violence. And when our sexual urgencies enjoy the presence of Erato,^b accompanied by rational, apposite persuasion, she eliminates and extinguishes the mad, frantic element in the pleasure, which then reaches a conclusion in love and trust, not rape and debauchery. As for the kind of pleasure that comes by ear and eye, whether it belongs mainly to reason or to emotion or is their common property, the two remaining Muses, Melpomenê and Terpsichorê, take it under their care and give it orderliness.^c The result is that on the one hand there is enjoyment not enchantment, on the other not delusion but delight."

QUESTION 15

That dancing has three elements, phrase, pose, and pointing: the nature of each, and the factors common to poetry and dancing.^a

Speakers : Thrasybulus, Ammonius

1. AFTER this cakes were brought in, to be the prize for dancing by the boys. My brother Lamprias was appointed, along with Meniscus the trainer, to be judge, as he gave a convincing performance of the pyrrhic dance and had been thought better at shadow-fighting than any of the boys in the wrestling-schools.^b Many boys now danced with more zest than art: there were two who gained approval, attempting to preserve gracefulness throughout; some of the company demanded that these two should dance phrases alternately.

Thrasybulus inquired the meaning of the word "phrase," and gave Ammonius the opportunity of giving at some length an exposition of the elements of dancing, (2) which he said were three in number: the phrase, the pose, and pointing. "Dancing," he explained, "consists of movements and positions, as melody of its notes and intervals. In the case of dancing the rests are the terminating points of the movements."^c Now they call the movements 'phrases,' tarch's source may have intended to define and distinguish them: if so, he had no success in getting his distinctions generally accepted. Cf. also H. Koller, Glotta, 37 (1958), p. 5.

^b Dancing, particularly by boys, was part of the gymnastic training of the wrestling-school, and many dances had a close relation to the movements of combat, armed or unarmed. The pyrrhic was, in its proper form, danced in armour, cf. Plato, Laws, 815, 830 c; Athenaeus, 631.

^c As the notes are of the intervals in music.

^a In the artistic field diathesis can connote the descriptive or representative aspect of the "arrangement" or "composi-while 'poses' is the name of the representational positions to which the movements lead and in which they end, as when dancers compose their bodies in the attitude of Apollo or Pan or a Bacchant, and then retain that aspect like figures in a picture.^a The third element, pointing, is something that does not copy the subject-matter, but actually shows it to us. Poetry provides a parallel. Poets employ the proper names of things to indicate or denote them, using the words 'Achilles,' 'Odysseus,' 'earth,' and 'heaven' exactly as they are used by the ordinary man, but employ onomatopoeia and metaphor in their pursuit of imitative representation and vivid suggestion. Thus they say that broken streams 'plash' and 'babble,' and that missiles fly 'longing to take their fill of flesh'^b and of an evenly matched battle 'equal heads had the melley.'^c Then they often shape the collocation of words in their songs to imitate the matter, as does Euripides with and Pindar writing of the horse,

Similarly in dancing the pose is imitative of shape and outward appearance. The phrase again is expressive of some emotion or action or potentiality. By pointing they literally indicate objects: the earth, the sky, themselves, or bystanders. If this is done with precision, so to say, and timing, it resembles proper names in poetry when they are uttered with a measure of ornament and smoothness. To take an example,

Revered Themis and quick-glancing Aphroditê
And Hera golden-wreathed and beautiful Dionê, ^b or

And kings were Hellen's offspring, ministers of right, Dorus, Xuthus, and Aeolus the charioteer. ^c

Otherwise this pointing resembles excessively prosaic and unmetrical verses like

And brothers kings. Olympias Greece calls her. ^e

Similar faults are committed in dancing whenever pointing is used without plausibility, grace, dignity, and simplicity. In short, one can transfer Simonides' saying ^a from painting to dancing, (rightly calling dance) silent poetry and poetry articulate dance. There seems to be nothing of painting in poetry or of poetry in painting, nor does either art make any use whatsoever of the other, whereas dancing and poetry are fully associated and the one involves the other. Particularly is this so when they combine in that type of composition called hyporchema, in which the two arts taken together effect a single work, a representation by means of poses and words.^b In comparison with painting the lines of verse are like the lines that bound the shapes (while the movements and poses are like the colours and shapes). And that each art needs the other is made plain by the writer who has been considered to be most successful in the composition of hyporchemata, and nowhere to have carried more conviction. Take this passage :

Pelagian horse ^c or Amyclaean hound ^d
 Make your model as you whirl
 On competitive toe,
 Chasing the melody's twists ;

^a Cf. Plutarch, Mor. 17 F, 58 B, 346 F.

^b The hyporchema was a song accompanied by a mimetic dance. The view that it was a distinct genre of poetry seems to be mistaken, cf. H. Koller, Die Mimesis in der Antike, pp. 166 ff.

^c Thessaly, a district of which was known as Pelagian Argos or Pelasgiotis, was renowned for its cavalry.

^d Amyclae, once an independent town or village 2½ miles south of Sparta, was early reduced. Spartan hunting-dogs were famous.

Shall we not say that these lines almost dictate representation in dancing, summoning our hands and feet, or rather twitching and bracing our whole body to the tunes, as if on strings, so that when these words are spoken or sung it cannot keep still? It is evidence of the author's views that he is not ashamed to praise himself for his dancing as much as for his poetry, when he says,^c

I know how to mix my steps in light-foot dance ;
 They call it the Cretan style.

^a An allusion to the profane and heavenly Love of Plato, Symposium, 180 E.

^b Although these sentiments may be borrowed from some earlier, perhaps Peripatetic, moralizer (cf. H. Koller, quoted in note on 748 B supra), Plutarch may have thought them particularly apt to the art of the pantomimi, so flourishing

Dancing has indeed made a profane poetry her companion and fallen out of favour with the other heavenly kind ^a; and having tyrannously brought almost all music under her sway, she is mistress of the caprice and folly of the theatres,^b but has lost her honour among men who have intelligence and may properly be called divine.”^c

This was about the end, Sossius Senecio, of the learned conversation then held at the feast of the Muses in the company of the excellent Ammonius.

in his day. The dancer was here the star performer (and often popular idol), supported by musicians and a choir whose songs were explanatory of the dance, whereas in the ideal hyporchema of the moralist dance and song were on an equal footing, and dancer and singer the same person.

^c The word theios is sometimes used in a weakened sense, “marvellous.” The suggestion is that, since intelligence is the divine element in man, it is to the intelligent that the word should be applied. At the same time Plutarch may have in mind an etymology that connects theatron (theatre) with theios, cf. Pseudo-Plutarch, De Musica, 1140 E, Philodemus, De Musica, pp. 13, 67 Kemke.

THE DIALOGUE ON LOVE
(AMATORIUS)

INTRODUCTION

THIS work is a dialogue only in form, for the presence of Flavian serves merely to introduce Plutarch's son, Autobulus, and lead up to the recital of Plutarch's own part in the debate on love at the sanctuary of the Muses on Helicon. This took place years before, shortly after our author's marriage and before his son's birth, so that the latter knows of it only because his father remembered the scene vividly and repeated it often.

The recital is punctuated and sometimes motivated by a romantic upheaval in the town of Thespieae below. A rich young widow of the town is seeking to marry a handsome young man, somewhat her junior. His friends are divided about the wisdom of this alliance; the debate is at first between the adherents and the opponents of paederasty. But while both friends and enemies are arguing elsewhere, the widow takes control of the situation and abducts the boy. This recall from philosophy to life scatters both parties and Plutarch is left with the more serious members of the group to whom doctrinaire partisanship is unsuitable.

Now begins the apology for the god Love (Eros) in which his divinity is vindicated, his power affirmed, his benefits attested, and his apotheosis assured. But, in a part of the narrative now lost, conjugal love is attacked ; and the rest of the work provides a spirited and occasionally penetrating defence of the part that women play in the marriage bond. So, fittingly enough, when Plutarch and his friends arrive at Thespiæ, they find to their delight that the marriage is under way and only awaits their presence for its celebration. Love the god is as active in life as he is in philosophy.

The work has been generally admired ; those who seek an appreciation of it may consult the interesting and enthusiastic edition of Robert Flacelière (Paris, Les Belles Lettres, 1952), which also contains a good bibliography.^a

The present editor must acknowledge a considerable debt to Flacelière's spirited translation. It often lightened his troubles, when troubles were brewing in the somewhat poor condition of the text. But his chief debt is to his learned and generous colleague, W. G. Rabinowitz, who went over every word of the translation and removed innumerable blemishes. He also suggested so many interpretations that are both new and true that if any part of this edition is an improvement on Flacelière and Hubert,^b the gratitude for this not inconsiderable feat is to be accorded to Rabinowitz, and to him alone.

The dialogue is transmitted in two mss. only, E

^a It may be noted that the love celebrated in this essay is not Aphroditê, sensual love, but Eros, romantic passion. The Stoics had already advocated romantic married love (see Antipater, Stoic. Vet. Frag. iii, pp. 254 ff.) and Plutarch carries his preference for it a step further. Cf. L. A. Post, "Woman's Place in Menander's Athens," Trans. Amer. Philol. Assoc. lxxi (1940), pp. 420 ff., especially pp. 452-454.

THE DIALOGUE ON LOVE

and B, both of them full of lacunae and corruptions. The recent controversy about their relationship has been warm, and sometimes hot. It is admirably summarized by Harold Cherniss in the introduction to his edition of the De Facie (L.C.L. Moralia, vol. xii, pp. 26, 27, 31, 32). The editor has collated both mss. from photographs (Class. Phil. xxxvi (1941), pp. 85 ff.), but is unwilling to take part in the controversy. It does seem certain, however, for one reason or another, that B is not copied directly from E. The fact that there must have been at least one intermediary will surely give it independent value.

The work is no. 107 in the so-called Lamprias catalogue. Bernardakis (vii, p. 151) claims that a Plutarchean fragment in Stobaeus once stood in the great lacuna at 766 D. This is possible, but by no means certain.

THE DIALOGUE ON LOVE

(Flavian and Plutarch's son, Autobulus, converse in the presence of some others.)

1. FLAVIAN. It was on Helicon, Autobulus, that you say the conversation on love took place of which at our request you are now going to give us an account? Either you made a record of it or got it by heart from frequent probing of your father.

AUTOBULUS. Yes, Flavian, it was on Helicon in the shrine of the Muses while the people of Thespieae^a were celebrating the Erotidia.^b This they do every four years in honour of Eros as well as the Muses, with great zeal and splendour.

FLAVIAN. Are you aware of the petition that all of us who have come to you intend to present?

AUTOBULUS. No, but I shall be when you state it.

FLAVIAN. Discard for the moment from your recital the meadows and shady nooks of the poets, the gadding growth of ivy and smilax, and all the other commonplaces on which writers seize, as they endeavour with more enthusiasm than success to endorse their work with Plato's Ilissus,^c his famous agnus castus and the gentle grass-grown slope.

AUTOBULUS. My dear Flavian, why should my discourse need such preliminaries? The situation that gave rise to the debate merely wants a chorus to sympathize and lacks a stage, for no other element of drama is wanting. Only, let us pray to the Mother of the Muses^a to be graciously present and help me to resuscitate the story.

2. A long time ago, before I was born, when my father had only recently married my mother, he rescued her from a dispute that had broken out between their parents and was so hotly contested that my father came here to sacrifice to Eros and brought my mother to the festival; in fact she herself was to make the prayer and the sacrifice. His usual friends came with him from home and at Thespieae he found Daphnaeus, son of Archidamus, the lover of Simon's daughter, Lysandra, and the most favoured of all her suitors. Soclarus,^b son of Aristion, had come from Tithora; and there were present also Protogenes^c of Tarsus and Zeuxippus^d of Lacedaemon, friends of his from abroad. My father said that most of his other Boeotian acquaintances were there.

Now they passed, it seems, the first two or three days in the city, indulging mildly between spectacles in learned conversation in the athletic buildings. After that, routed by a stubborn feud among the harpists which was preceded by appeals for support and enlisting of partisans,^e most of the visitors decamped from the hostile territory and bivouacked on Helicon as guests of the Muses.

At dawn Anthemion and Pisas joined them, men of some standing and attached to Bacchon who was called The Handsome ; and because of their common affection for the youth there was a kind of quarrel between them. You must know that there lived at Thespieae Ismenodora, a woman conspicuous for her wealth and breeding who led, heaven knows, over and above this a life of decorum. She had been a widow for some little time without a word of censure, even though she was still young and comely.^a Now Bacchon was the son of an intimate friend of hers and Ismenodora, while promoting a marriage between him and a girl related to herself, had many meetings and conversations with the youth. The result was that she came to view him with different eyes ; what with hearing, what with saying many kind things about him and observing the throng of noble lovers who courted him, she was carried so far as to fall in love with him herself. Her intentions were far from dishonourable : she desired to marry him and be his companion for life. The situation was startling enough in itself and the boy's mother had misgivings that the dignity and splendour of Ismenodora's household were too grand to suit her loved one. Some of the boy's hunting companions, moreover, used the discrepancy in ages to deter him. Their making a joke of the marriage served to counter it more effectively than did the serious intervention of others. He was still a minor and felt shy of marrying a widow. Nevertheless, he ignored the others and left the decision to Pisas and Anthemion. The latter was an older cousin of his, while Pisas was the most sober of his admirers. For this reason, he used his influence against the marriage and took Anthemion to task for surrendering the young man to Ismenodora. Anthemion, in his turn, found fault with Pisas, saying that in everything else he was a model, but that as a lover he was imitating the baser sort in trying to deprive one dear to him of an estate and an alliance and a great career ^a merely to keep him as long as possible untouched by these matters ^b and stripping of his clothes in the palaestra.

3. So to avoid exasperating each other and gradually falling into a rage they had chosen my father and his friends as arbiters and referees and had come to join them. And, just as though it had been arranged in advance, each of them found an advocate in this friendly circle, Anthemion Daphnaeus, Pisas Protogenes. Protogenes, however, set no bounds to his abuse of Ismenodora, at which Daphnaeus exclaimed, "Good heavens, what is one to expect next, if even Protogenes stands by to combat Love, to whom all his time, when he works and when he plays, ^c is devoted, with Love at heart, Love in hand,

4. This raised a laugh and Protogenes said, "So you think that I'm at war with Love now, do you, and not fighting on his side against lechery and insolence when they try to force the foulest acts and passions into the company of the most honourable and dignified of names?"

"When you say foulest," asked Daphnaeus, "are you referring to marriage, the union of man and wife, than which there has not existed, now or ever, a fellowship more sacred?"

"Why, of course," said Protogenes, "since it's necessary for producing children, there's no harm in legislators talking it up and singing its praises to the masses. But genuine Love has no connexion whatsoever with the women's quarters. I deny that it is love that you have felt for women and girls—any more than flies feel love for milk or bees for honey or than caterers and cooks have tender emotions for the calves and fowls they fatten in the dark.

"In a normal state one's desire for bread and meat is moderate, yet sufficient; but abnormal indulgence of this desire creates the vicious habit called gluttony and gormandizing. In just the same way there normally exists in men and women a need for the pleasure derived from each other; but when the impulse that drives us to this goal is so vigorous and powerful that it becomes torrential and almost out of control, it is a mistake to give the name Love to it. Love, in fact, it is that attaches himself to a young and talented soul and through friendship brings it to a state of virtue ; but the appetite for women we are speaking of, however well it turns out, has for net gain only an accrual of pleasure in the enjoyment of a ripe physical beauty. To this Aristippus bore witness when he replied to the man who denounced Laïs ^a to him for not loving him : He didn't imagine, he said, that wine or fish loved him either, yet he partook of both with pleasure. The object of desire is, in fact, pleasure and enjoyment ; while Love, if he loses the hope of inspiring friendship, has no wish to remain cultivating a deficient plant which has come to its prime, if the plant cannot yield the proper fruit of character to produce friendship and virtue.

“ You know the husband in the tragedy who says to his wife :

You hate me ? I can lightly bear your hate
And make a windfall of my slighted state. ^b

Yet the man who, not for gain, but for lust and intercourse, endures an evil, unloving woman is no more in love than the husband in the play. Such was the orator Stratocles whom the comic poet Philippides ^c ridiculed :

She turns away : you barely get her braids to kiss.

quarters as bastards do in the Cynosarges.^a Or rather, just as there is one eagle, called the true or mountain eagle, which Homer^b qualifies as 'black' and 'the hunter,' though there are other bastard varieties which catch fish and slow-flying birds in marshes; when they grow hungry, as they often do, they give a famished and plaintive scream—just so: there is only one genuine Love, the love of boys. It is not 'flashing with desire,' as Anacreon^c says of the love of maidens, or 'drenched with unguents, shining bright.' No, its aspect is simple and unspoiled. You will see it in the schools of philosophy, or perhaps in the gymnasia and palaestrae, searching for young men whom it cheers on with a clear and noble cry^d to the pursuit of virtue when they are found worthy of its attention.

"But that other lax and housebound love, that spends its time in the bosoms and beds of women, ever pursuing a soft life, enervated amid pleasure devoid of manliness and friendship and inspiration—it should be proscribed, as in fact Solon^e did proscribe it. He forbade slaves to make love to boys or to have a rubdown, but he did not restrict their intercourse with women. For friendship is a beautiful and courteous relationship, but mere pleasure is base and unworthy of a free man. For this reason also it is not gentlemanly or urbane to make love to slave boys: such a love is mere copulation, like the love of women."

5. Though Protogenes would cheerfully have added other arguments, Daphnaeus cut him short. "Good heavens," said he, "many thanks for citing Solon. Let us take him as the criterion of the lover,^a

Till he loves a lad in the flower of youth,
Bewitched by limbs and by sweet lips.

And to Solon you may add Aeschylus,^b who says :

You had no reverence for the splendour
Of your limbs, ungrateful for our many kisses.

Others, to be sure, have a good laugh at these gentry for urging lovers to fix their gaze on hams and haunches like priests bent on sacrifice or divination. But I count this as a great argument in favour of women : if union contrary to nature with males does not destroy or curtail a lover's tenderness, it stands to reason that the love between men and women, being normal and natural, will be conducive to friendship developing in due course from favour. For, you see, Protogenes, a woman's yielding to a man was called by the ancients 'favour.' So it was that Pindar^c declared that Hephaestus was born from Hera 'without favour.' And Sappho^d addressed a young girl not yet ripe for marriage :

You seemed to me a small child without favour.

But to consort with males (whether without consent, in which case it involves violence and brigandage ; or if with consent, there is still weakness and effeminacy on the part of those who, contrary to nature, allow themselves in Plato's ^b words ' to be covered and mounted like cattle ')—this is a completely ill-favoured favour, indecent, an unlovely affront to Aphroditê.

" Whence I conclude that those verses I quoted were written by Solon when he was still quite young and ' teeming,' as Plato ^c says, ' with abundant seed.' Here, however, is what he wrote when he had reached an advanced age ^d :

Dear to me now are the works of the Cyprus-born,
Of Dionysus and the Muses, works that make men merry, as though after the pelting storm of his love for boys he had brought his life into the peaceful sea of marriage and philosophy.

" If, then, Protogenes, we have regard for the truth, excitement about boys and women is one and the same thing : Love. But if, for the sake of argument, you choose to make distinctions, you will see that this boy-love of yours is not playing fair : like a late-born son, an aged man's bastard, a child of darkness, he tries to disinherit the Love that is his legitimate and elder brother. men's stripping their bodies naked, that he crept furtively into the gymnasia. At first he merely caressed and embraced; then gradually he grew wings in the palaestra and can no longer be restrained. He rails against and vilifies that great conjugal Love which co-operates to win immortality for the human race by kindling afresh through new generations our being, prone as it is to extinction.

"Boy-love denies pleasure; that is because it is ashamed and afraid. It needs a fair pretext for approaching the young and beautiful, so it pretends friendship and virtue. It covers itself with the sand of the wrestling-floor, it takes cold baths, it plays the highbrow and publicly proclaims that it is a philosopher and disciplined on the outside—because of the law. But when night comes and all is quiet,

Sweet is the harvest when the guard's away.^a

If, on the one hand, as Protogenes maintains, there is no sexual partnership in paederasty, how can there be any Eros without Aphroditê, whom it is his god-given function to serve and wait upon, as well as to receive such portion of honour and power as she bestows? But if, on the other, there is an Eros without Aphroditê, then it is like drunkenness without wine, brought on by a brew of figs and barley. No fruit, no fulfilment comes of the passion; it is cloying and quickly wearied."

6. During this speech it was obvious that Pias was full of anger and indignation against Daphnaeus; hardly had the latter ceased when Pias exclaimed, "Good lord, what coarseness, what insolence! To think that human beings who acknowledge that they are locked like dogs by their sexual parts to the female should dare to transport the god from his home in the gymnasia and the parks with their wholesome fresh-air life in the sun ^a and confine him in brothels with the vanity-cases and unguents and philtres of disorderly females! Decent women cannot, of course, without impropriety either receive or bestow a passionate love."

I swear that it's Pisias' lack of moderation that makes me join forces with Daphnaeus. So marriage is to be a loveless union, devoid of god-given friendship! Yet we observe that an alliance, once it is deserted by courtship and 'favour,'^c can scarcely be held together by such yokes and reins as shame and fear."

"As for me," said Pisias, "I don't take this statement very seriously. But Daphnaeus, I perceive, is acting like copper. It is a fact that copper is not so much affected by fire as it is by molten copper; when this is poured over it, it softens bit by bit and becomes fluid. And it is not Lysandra's^d beauty that troubles him. Rather by his proximity and contact with one^e who is all ablaze and burning he is now himself catching fire. It's evident that if he doesn't come running to us,^f he too will go soft. . . . But I ob-

7. " Well then," said Pisasias, " after fair warning to all women that as far as I am concerned, love doesn't exist, I must say that the young man must beware of the lady's wealth.^a If we were to plunge him into such pomp and high estate, we might unwittingly make him disappear, as tin disappears when mixed with copper. It would be something to brag of if a boy of his age were to marry a simple, unassuming woman and yet keep his quality unchanged in the union, like wine mixed with water. But as for this woman, we can see her determination to command and to dominate. Otherwise, she would hardly have rejected so many eminent, noble, and wealthy suitors and be wooing a stripling who has not yet discarded his school uniform, who still needs a tutor.^b So it comes about that men of sense throw away their wives' excessive fortunes^c and clip their wings, as it were. For such wealth makes women frivolous, haughty, inconstant, and vain ; often it elates them so much that they fly away. Even if they stay, it is better to be fettered ' with the golden chains of Ethiopia ' ^d than by a wife's wealth."

words of Hesiod ^a if, though he says,

No marriage much before the age of thirty,
Nor much after it : this time's the ripe one ;
Let a wife be matured four years, married the fifth—

if, I say, we are going to join a green, immature man to a woman as many years older than he as the bridegroom should be older than the bride ^b—and so follow the example of those who artificially pollinate dates and figs. ^c

“ ‘ Yes,’ you say, ‘ for she's in love with him, she's all on fire.’ Who, then, prevents her from making revel-rout to his house, from singing the Complaint Before the Closed Door, ^d from putting nosegays on his portraits, from entering the ring with her rivals ? These are the actions of true lovers. Let her lower her brow, renounce her easy life, and put on the dress of those who are in the service of passion. But if she is really modest and orderly, let her sit decently at home awaiting suitors, men with serious designs. For if a woman makes a declaration of love, a man could only take to his heels in utter disgust, let alone accepting and founding a marriage on such intemperance.”

9. Protogenes stopped and my father said, “ Do you observe, Anthemion, that they are again making a public issue of the matter, forcing a rebuttal from us who neither deny that we are devotees of conjugal love, nor seek to escape from our position ? ”

^b See Einarson's explanation (Class. Phil. xlix, p. 278, n. 1) : marrying Bacchon to Ismenodora would be reversing Hesiod's 30 for the man and 17 for the woman. (Cf. 754 D-E infra where Megara is 33 and Iolaüs 16.)

“ Good Lord, yes,” said Anthemion. “ So now undertake against them a somewhat fuller defence of Love—and put in a word for Wealth, too, of which Pisiias is making such use to frighten us.”

“ What charge,” asked my father, “ will they not bring against a woman if we are to reject Ismenodora because of her love and her wealth? She does, in fact, live in grandeur and opulence. And what of that if she is beautiful and young? What of her proud and eminent birth? . . .^a Isn't it true that decent women have a name for being disagreeable and intolerable because of their severity and eagle-beak noses? Aren't they nicknamed Furies because they're always angry with their husbands? So the best plan is to marry a Thracian Habrotonon^b or a Milesian Bacchis^c from the market-place without benefit of ceremony and bring her home for a price and a shower of nuts.^d

“ Yet we know a good many men who have been abject slaves of women like this. Samian flute-girls, ballet dancers, women like Aristonica^e and Oenanthê with her tambourine and Agathoclea^f have trampled on the crowns of kings. her and fell in love. She grew to have such power and such contempt for him that she asked to be allowed to direct the affairs of state, crowned and seated on his throne, for one day. He granted this and issued orders for everyone to serve and obey her just as they would himself. At first her commands were moderate while she was making trial of the guards; then, when she saw that there was no opposition or hesitation on their part, she ordered Ninus to be seized, put in chains, and finally put to death. When all this was done, she ruled gloriously over Asia for many years.

And that woman down there ^b who shares a temple and worship with Eros, whose gilded statue stands at Delphi with those of kings and queens, what dowry had she to subjugate her lovers? ^c

“ The men these worthless females exploited became their prey unwittingly through their own weakness and softness; yet other men, though poor and obscure, have married rich and noble women and have not been destroyed or lost one particle of dignity; they have enjoyed honour and exercised benevolent authority to the end of their life together. But the man who cramps and diminishes his wife (as a thin man does his ring for fear it may fall off) is like those who shear

Antigonus,^b to be sure, wrote to the commander of the garrison which had fortified Munychia that it wasn't enough to make the collar strong : the dog must also be made lean. This was in order to drain off the resources of the Athenians. The husband, however, of a rich or beautiful woman must not make her unsightly or poor ; rather by his own self-possession and prudence, as well as by his refusal to be overawed by any of her advantages, he must hold his own without servility. The extra weight of his character must turn the scales ; thus his wife is controlled and guided with as much profit as justice.

“ Moreover, the right age and proper time for marriage are suitably matched as long as both parties are able to procreate. any young wife in the world? It is true that young people find it difficult to fuse and blend well with each other. Only after a long time do they abandon their stiffness and self-assertion. At the beginning they have stormy weather and struggle with their partners—and still more so if Love is involved. Just as a high wind upsets a boat without a pilot, so Love makes stormy and chaotic a marriage of two people who cannot both command and will not either of them obey.

“The nurse rules the infant, the teacher the boy, the gymnasiarch the youth, his admirer the young man who, when he comes of age, is ruled by law and his commanding general. No one is his own master, no one is unrestricted. Since this is so, what is there dreadful about a sensible older woman piloting the life of a young man? She will be useful because of her superior intelligence; she will be sweet and affectionate because she loves him.

“To sum up,” my father said, “we are Boeotians and so should reverence Heracles and not be squeamish about a marriage of disproportionate ages. We know that he married his own wife, Megara,^a aged thirty-three, to Iolaüs, who was then only sixteen.”

10. It was at this point in the conversation, said my father, that a friend rode up from the city with his horse at a gallop bringing a report to Pisiäs of a surprisingly audacious occurrence.

It seems that Ismenodora was convinced that, though Bacchon had no personal antipathy to the marriage, he was embarrassed by its detractors; accordingly, she resolved not to let the young man escape. She summoned those male friends who were the most vigorous and most sympathetic to her passion, together with the most intimate of her women friends, organized them in a disciplined group, and waited intently for the hour when Bacchon habitually left the palaestra and walked decorously by her house. On this occasion, freshly anointed, he approached with two or three companions. Ismenodora met him at the door and had only to touch his garment when her friends handsomely snatched up the handsome youth in his cloak and mantle, carried him in a body into the house, and immediately locked the doors.

At the same time the women inside snatched off his cloak and put a wedding garment on him. The servants scurried about and wreathed the doors with olive and laurel, not only Ismenodora's doors, but Bacchon's also; and a flute-girl went out and piped her way down the lane.

Now of the Thespians and their guests, some merely laughed, while others were furious and tried to stir up the gymnasiarchs, for these maintain a strict control over the young men and pay close attention to their activities.^a No one paid any more attention to the contests^b; everybody deserted the theatre and gathered about Ismenodora's door, where they engaged in fierce debate.

11. So when (continued my father) Pusias' friend had come galloping up as fast as though he were bringing a military dispatch and, in great excitement, had said no more than that Ismenodora had kidnapped Bacchon, Zeuxippus^c began to laugh and, being a

But Piasias jumped up and shouted, " Good heavens ! What end will there be to the licence that is subverting our town ? Now already self-government is on the way to anarchy ! Yet it may be absurd to be protesting in defence of laws and statutes when it is the very Laws of Nature that are transgressed when women take over the state. Did even Lemnos see the like ? ^b Let's be off ! " he cried. " Let's be off and hand over the gymnasium and the Council Chamber to the women since our city is by now completely emasculated ! Anthemion remarked, " Such a bold stroke is certainly a strong action, really Lemnian ^c—we can admit it since we're by ourselves.^d It shows the hand of a woman very much in love."

Soclarus asked with a little smile, " Do you really think that it's a case of kidnapping and rape ? Isn't it rather the plausible counter-stratagem of a sensible young man who has slipped from the clutches of his lovers and deserted to the arms of a rich and beautiful woman ? " simple and frank, he certainly wouldn't have concealed it from me, with whom he shares every confidence. He sees quite well that in these matters it is I who am Ismenodora's warmest ally. It's Love that it's 'hard to combat,' not 'anger,' as Heraclitus ^a has it: 'whatever it wants, it buys even at the cost of one's life'—and money and reputation, too. Where do you find better behaviour in the city than was Ismenodora's? When did any ugly story ever enter her house or any hint of evil-doing ever leave a stain on it? Yes, it's only too plain that some divine impulse, overpowering her common sense, has really taken possession of the poor mortal creature."

12. And Pemptides ^b laughed and said, "There is, of course, a physical disease which they call the sacred ^c one; so that there's nothing strange about it if some people call the greatest and most frenetic mental affliction sacred and divine.

"Once upon a time in Egypt I saw two neighbours disputing about a snake that had slithered on to the road. They both hailed it as a bringer of good luck, but each wanted to keep it as his own. Similarly, just now, when I observed both parties dragging off Love, some to the men's quarters, others to the women's, while both claimed him as a tremendous and divine blessing, I was not surprised that this passion had acquired all the power and respect that it has, since the very persons who should have been expelling it from every nook and cranny and restricting it were themselves magnifying and exalting it.

13. Pemptides had finished and my father had begun to answer when another messenger arrived from town with a summons from Ismenodora for Anthemion. The tumult, in fact, was growing worse as the gymnasiarchs disagreed, one holding that they should reclaim Bacchon, the other that they should not meddle. So Anthemion got up and set out.

My father addressed Pemptides by name. "Pemptides," he said, "it is, I believe, a grave and dangerous matter that you are broaching; or rather, you are altogether violating our inviolable belief in the gods when you demand an account and proof of each of them. Well, he got another chorus (for he had confidence in the play, it seems, since it was composed in an elevated and elaborate style) and changed the verse to the present text :

Zeus, as the voice of truth declares.

“ So what is to be gained by the use of argument to make our belief in Zeus or Athena or Eros debatable or uncertain? Love is not now requesting his first altar and sacrifice. He is no alien intruder from some barbaric superstition like certain Attises and Adonises, as they are called. He does not, assisted by hermaphrodites and women, smuggle himself in to reap a harvest of honours to which he has no right, which would make him liable to indictment for illegal registration as a god, and bastardy. On the contrary, my friend, when you hear Empedocles^a declaring,

Among them Love is equal, far and wide ;
Use the mind's eye ; sit not with staring gaze—

you must suppose that his verses apply also to Eros ; for though he is not visibly among the most ancient divinities, he is there conceptually. THE DIALOGUE ON LOVE, 756-757

Aphrodite? She sows and gives that love
From which all we upon this earth are born.^a Empedocles^b has called her 'giver of life' and Sophocles^c 'fruitful'; both epithets being perfectly just and apt. And yet this great and wonderful primary function of Aphroditê becomes only a secondary task of Eros when he accompanies the goddess. If he is not present, what occurs is precisely a dreary residue and becomes

Unhonoured and without a friend.^d

For intercourse without Eros is like hunger and thirst, which can be sated, but never achieve a noble end. It is by means of Eros that the goddess removes the cloying effect of pleasure and creates affection and fusion. This is the reason why Parmenides^e declares that Eros is the most ancient work of Aphroditê; his words in the Cosmogony are

And first of all the gods she framed was Love.

But Hesiod,^f in my opinion, was more scientific when he depicted Eros as the first-born of them all, in order to make him indispensable for the generation of all things.

"If, then, we strip from Love any of his customary honours, even those given to Aphroditê will not remain undisturbed. Nor is it in fact possible to affirm that there are some who rail at Eros without dis-

In the same way practically none of the other gods has escaped unscathed the stupidity of those ready to slander. Look at the case of Ares who occupies a position diametrically opposite to that of Eros, as it were, on a design etched in bronze. Observe how great are the honours men give him and again how numerous are the invectives hurled against him :

Ladies, Ares is blind and cannot see ;
With swinish snout he churns up every evil. ^c

Homer ^d calls him ' bloodstained ' and ' turn-coat.' Chrysippus' ^e explanation of the name is an accusation and an indictment of the god. He declares that Ares means Anaires (assassin), which gives an opening to those who believe that the contentious, argumentative, and spirited quality inside us is called 'Ares.' Others ^f in their turn will state that Aphroditê is merely desire and Hermes eloquence and the Muses

14. “Yes, I do perceive it,” said Pemptides. “But if it is impious to identify the gods with our passions, it is equally so, on the other hand, to consider our passions as gods.”

“Well now,” my father asked, “do you believe Ares to be a god or an emotion of ours?”

Pemptides replied that he believed Ares to be a god who ordered the spirited and courageous element within us. “What is this, Pemptides?” cried my father. “So the warlike, inimical, and antagonistic element has a divinity, while the affectionate, sociable, coupling impulse is to be left without a god? When men slay and are slain, is there a god, Enyalios or Stratios, overseeing and presiding over their arms and arrows, their storming of towns and their driving off of booty, but when they desire marriage and an affection that will lead to concord and co-operation, is there no god to witness and direct, to lead and help us?”

god or divinity to sustain and promote their progress^a; nor is there a god whose care it is that a man grows straight in the direction of virtue with no deviation or crushing of the main stem of excellence through lack of a protector or by the viciousness of those he encounters.

“ Is it not, moreover, shocking and ungrateful of them to say such things, especially as they continue to profit by divinity’s love for man, which is everywhere dispensed and at no point fails him in his needs, even though some services are necessary rather than decorous? For example, there is the service connected with parturition which, with its accompaniment of blood^b and travail is no lovely thing, yet enjoys the divine supervision of Eileithyia and Locheia. It might, in fact, be better not to be born at all than to be born defective for lack of a good guardian and protector. Deity does not abandon man even when he is sick: there is a special god^c whose mission it is to bring help and strength at such a time. Not even when a man dies is he forsaken: there is a god who cares for him and leads him to the other world, who is for the dead a lord of repose, an escort of souls to Pluto’s realm^d:

Night did not bear me lord of the lyre
Nor yet seer or physician, but to be a guide

“ Yes,” said Zeuxippus, “ that would be very illogical.”

“ But,” my father said, “ Plato’s ^a doctrine might help in the discussion at this point, though it is a digression.^b There is one form of madness that rises from the body to the soul : when a noxious exhalation is put into circulation as a result of distempers or commixtures of a certain sort, a madness ensues that is savage, harsh, and diseased.^c There is a second kind, however, which does not exist without divine inspiration. It is not intrinsically generated but is, rather, an extrinsic afflatus that displaces the faculty of rational inference ; it is created and set in motion by a higher power. This sort of madness bears the general name of ‘ enthusiasm.’ For just as what possesses breath within it is called ‘ breathing ’ and what has sense is called ‘ sensible,’ just so this kind of agitation in the soul has been named ‘ enthusiasm ’ because it shares in and participates in a power that is divine.^d

^b Something of the sort (though “hopes,” not “poetic fancies”) is attributed to Pindar by Stobaeus, iv. 47. 12; to Plato by Aelian, Varia Hist. xiii. 29; and to Aristotle by Diogenes Laertius, v. 18. See also Plato, Epistle viii (357 D).

^c Plutarch is presumably thinking of fresco painting which, if not reinforced, seems to have faded quickly; doubtless he had seen many ruined frescoes in his day. Others translate “on water,” recalling such passages as Sophocles, frag. 741; Plato, Phaedrus, 276 c; Catullus, lxx. 4.

tripod and its exhalations. In erotic madness, however, when once it has really seized upon a man and set him on fire, there is no reading of literature, no 'magic incantation,'^a no change of environment, that restores him to calm. He loves when present and longs when absent, pursues by day and haunts the door by night, summons his lad when sober and sings his praises while he drinks.

"Someone^b has said that the images entertained by the poetic imagination, because they impose themselves so vividly, are dreams of those wide awake; but this is much more true of the images entertained by the imagination of lovers who speak to the beloved and embrace him or chide him as though he were present. For our sight seems to paint its other pictures on wet plaster^c: they fade away quickly and slip from mind; the images of the beloved, however, burned into the mind by sight, as if using encaustic technique, leave behind in the memory shapes that move and live and speak and remain forever and ever.

"Roman Cato^d declared that the soul of the lover is ever present in that of the beloved . . .^e form, ^e There is a lacuna at this point, though it is not indicated in the MSS.

Rabinowitz thinks that this corrupt passage has conceptual affinities with Plato, Phaedrus, 252 E—253 B, and has somewhat the following meaning:

"That is to say, the form (τὸ εἶδος) or character of the beloved—his way of life, his actions—affect (note τοῦ πάθους below) the soul of the lover and lead him to achieve a lengthy journey in swift compass. As the Cynics say, he comes to discover that the passage to virtue is 'strenuous and short at the same time.' For the soul of the lover proceeds first to friendship and then to virtue, moving swiftly, as it were, on the wave of affection with the god's help."

"To sum up: it is clear that neither is the lover's enthusiasm without divine assistance, nor does it have as director and charioteer any god other than him whose festival and sacrifice we are now engaged in celebrating.

"It is, however, principally in respect to power and benefits that we distinguish between the gods, just as there are two human goods, kingship and virtue, that are held and said to be the most divine. Let us first, then, see whether Love yields to any other god in power. Though

" You will find this even more clearly indicated by the fact that many have shared their pleasure with others, playing the pander not merely to their mistresses, but even to their wives. An example, my friend, is that notorious Roman, Gabba. He was, they say, giving a dinner to Maecenas and observed the latter toying amorously with his wife when given the signal to do so ; so he let his head nod gently as if he were sound asleep. But meanwhile one of his slaves glided into the dining room and started to steal wine. ' Damn you ! ' cried Gabba, glaring. ' Don't you know that it's only for Maecenas that I'm asleep ? Nicostratus was the political opponent of Phaëllus. When King Philip ^a came to town, everyone thought that Phaëllus, who had a wife of great beauty, would obtain a dominant position for himself if his wife should become intimate with Philip. Nicostratus' party got wind of this and patrolled the street before Phaëllus' door. The latter, however, put soldiers' boots on his wife and a cape and a Macedonian hat and got her undetected to Philip, since she passed for one of the royal pages.

"On the other hand, of all the throngs of lovers past and present, do you know of a single one who sold the favours of his beloved even to gain the honours of Zeus himself? I think not. How could this happen, when even tyrants, whom no one dares to contradict, whose policies no one dares to oppose, have had many rivals in love, many competitors for the friendship of handsome young lads? You know the tales of Aristogeiton of Athens ^b and Antileon of Metapontum and Melanippus of Agrigentum: they had at first no quarrel with their tyrants, though they saw that these were acting like drunkards and disfiguring the state; but when the tyrants tried to seduce their beloveds, they spared not even their own lives in defending their loves, holy, as it were, and inviolable shrines.

"The tale is told that Alexander wrote to Theodorus, the brother of Proteas, 'If you're not in love with your music-girl, please send her to me for ten talents.' Another of Alexander's Companions, Antipatrides, came to a drinking party with his lyrechus came to help the Chalcidians when the Lelantine War against the Eretrians was at its height. The Chalcidian infantry was thought to have considerable strength, but they found it difficult to resist the enemy cavalry. Accordingly his allies requested Cleomachus, a man of splendid courage, to be the first to charge the horse. His beloved was there and Cleomachus asked him if he was going to witness the battle. The youth said that he was, embraced Cleomachus tenderly, and put on his helmet for him. Filled with ardour, Cleomachus assembled the bravest of the Thessalians about himself, made a fine charge, and fell upon the enemy with such vigour that their cavalry was thrown into confusion and was thoroughly routed. When subsequently their hoplites also fled, the Chalcidians had a decisive victory. It was, however, Cleomachus' bad fortune to be killed in the battle. The Chalcidians point out his tomb in the market-place with the great pillar standing on it to this day. Formerly they had frowned on paederasty, but now they accepted it and honoured it more than others did. Now Aristotle^a says that the circumstances of Cleomachus' death in victorious battle with the Eretrians were different and that the lover embraced by his friend was one of the Chalcidians from Thrace sent as an ally to the Chalcidians of Euboea. And this, he says, is the reason for the Chalcidian^b popular song :

Ye lads of grace and sprung from worthy stock,

THE DIALOGUE ON LOVE, 761

In cities of Chalcis, Love, looser of limbs,
Thrives side by side with courage.

Anton was the name of the lover and Philistus was his beloved, as the poet Dionysius relates in his Origins.

“In your city, Thebes, Pemptides, isn't it true that the lover made his beloved a present of a complete suit of armour when the boy was registered as a man? Pammenes,^a a man versed in love, changed the order of battle-line for the hoplites, censuring Homer^b as knowing nothing about love, because he arranged the companies of Achaeans by tribes and clans and did not station lover beside beloved, in order to bring it about that

Shield supported shield and helmet helmet,^c

for he considered that Love is the only invincible general. It is a fact that men desert their fellow tribesmen and relatives and even (God knows) their parents and children; but lover and beloved, when their god is present, no enemy has ever encountered and forced his way through. In some cases, even when there is no need for it, they are moved to exhibit their love of danger, their disregard for mere life. This was what prompted Theron of Thessaly to place his left hand on the wall, draw his sword, and cut off the thumb, challenging his rival to do the same. When another man had fallen in battle on his

“ It is not only the most warlike peoples, Boeotians, Spartans, Cretans, who are the most susceptible to love, but also the great heroes of old, Meleager, Achilles,^b Aristomenes, Cimon,^c Epaminondas. Epaminondas, in fact, loved two young men, Asopichus and Caphisodorus. The latter died with him at Mantinea and is buried close to him ; while Asopichos showed himself a most formidable warrior and so redoubtable to his foes that the first man who stood up to him and struck back, Eucnamus of Amphissa, received heroic honours among the Phocians.

“ As for Heracles, it would be difficult to list all his loves, they are so numerous. For example, believing Iolaüs to have been beloved by him, to this very day lovers worship and honour Iolaüs, exchanging vows and pledges with their beloved at his tomb.^d It is also related that Heracles exhibited his talent for healing by rescuing Alcestis from a mortal disease to please Admetus, who was not only in love with his wife, but had also been Heracles' beloved. fact, Apollo also was Admetus' lover according to the tale :

He served Admetus for a mighty year.^a

" It is fortunate that I mentioned the name of Alcestis. Women have no part at all in Ares ; but if Love possesses them, it leads them to acts of courage beyond the bounds of nature, even to die.^b If it is ever any use to cite the evidence of mythology, we may learn from the tales about Alcestis and Protesilaüs and Orpheus' Eurydicê that Love is the only one of the gods whose commands are obeyed by Hades. As for all the others, as Sophocles^c says,

He knows no kindness and no favour,
But is content with justice unadorned.

To lovers, however, he shows respect ; for them alone he ceases to be ' inflexible, implacable.'^d So though it is true, my friend, that it is a good thing to be initiated into the mysteries^e at Eleusis, I observe that celebrants of Love's mysteries have a higher place in Hades. It isn't that I'm completely persuaded by old tales, yet I cannot withhold from them some credence. They do well to say—and indeed by some divine chance they touch the truth when they say—that lovers are able to return to the light even from Hades. It is true that they do not know where and how this was accomplished; they missed the path, as it were, that Plato through his philosophy was the first of all human beings to discern. There are, however, dim, faint effluvia of the truth scattered about in Egyptian mythology, but a man needs a keen wit to track them down, one which can draw important conclusions from tiny scraps of evidence.^a

“Let us, then, leave this subject. Now that we have seen how great is the power of Love, let us next examine his kindness and his favours to mankind. I am not speaking about the many benefits which he procures for those who are loved (these are perfectly obvious to everybody); I mean the even greater and more numerous benefits that he bestows on lovers themselves. Euripides,^b though experienced in love, marvels only at the least of them when he says

Love will be the poet's teacher,
Though he knew nothing of the Muse before.

For love makes a man clever, even if he was slow-witted before; and, as we noted, the coward brave, just as men make soft wood tough by hardening it in the fire. Every lover becomes generous, single-hearted, highminded, even though he was miserly before. His meanness and avarice are melted away like iron in the fire, so that he is made happier giving to those he loves than he is made by receiving gifts from others himself.

The strangers were annoyed and said, 'How insolently, how contemptuously, that boy treats you!' 'Not at all,' said Anytus. 'It was very kind of him when he might have taken all the cups to leave me as many as he did.'"

18. Zeuxippus was delighted and remarked, "Good heavens, how near it comes to making me renounce my ancestral feud with Anytus, deriving as it does from his treatment of Socrates^a and philosophy, if in a love affair Anytus could behave so like a well-bred gentleman!"

"Very well then," said my father. "Doesn't Love change the ill-tempered and sullen and make them more sociable and agreeable?"

When hearth's ablaze, a house appears more cheerful^b;

likewise a man seems to become more radiant through the heat of love. But people react irrationally: if they see a light blazing in the house at night, they consider it supernatural and marvel at it; but when they observe a mean, base, ignoble soul suddenly invaded by high thoughts, liberality, aspiration, kindness, generosity, they are not compelled to cry out with Telemachus,

Surely some god is within!^c

In the same way Sappho speaks words mingled truly with fire; through her song she communicates the heat of her heart,

With sweet-voiced Muses healing her love, as Philoxenus^e says. Now, Daphnaeus, if through the influence of Lysandra you have not completely forgotten your old loves,^f recite for us the ode in which the fair Sappho^g describes how her voice is lost and her body burns; how she turns pale, reels, and grows giddy when her beloved appears."

When Daphnaeus had recited these verses,^a my father resumed. "In heaven's name," he asked, "is not this a plain case of divine possession? Is it not a supernatural agitation of the soul? Is the disturbance of the Pythia grasping her tripod so great? Do the flute, the tambourine, the hymns to Cybelê, cause so much ecstasy in any of the devotees?"

Perhaps, my friend, our belief in all our notions, except those derived from the senses, comes from three sources: myth, law, and rational explanation; so it is undoubtedly the poets, the legislators, and thirdly the philosophers who have been our guides and teachers in what we think about the gods. They are alike in stating that gods exist ; but they hold widely varying views about their number and rank, as well as their nature and function. Now the philosophers believe that the gods are

Untroubled by illness or age,
Free from toil, spared the hoarse passage of Acheron.^a

For this reason they do not admit the Strifes and the Prayers ^b of the poets, nor do they allow Fear and Panic to be gods or acknowledged as the children of Ares.^c They are at variance on many points with the legislators, as when Xenophanes ^d told the Egyptians not to honour Osiris as a god if they thought he was mortal, or not to weep for him if they believed him a god. On the other hand, when the philosophers ^e put forth as gods certain patterns and numbers, monads and spirits, the poets and legislators haven't the patience to listen to them, nor are they able to understand what is meant.

" In short, their opinions have considerable variety and much divergence. Once upon a time there were three factions in Athens,^f of the Coast, the Hills, and the Plain. legislator, since he seemed indisputably to hold the palm of virtue. In just the same way the three factions who theorize about the gods are at variance : they differ in their votes and find it difficult to accept each other's candidates. Yet there is one god about whom all firmly agree. The most eminent of poets, legislators, philosophers, join together in enrolling Love among the gods

With one voice of great approval,

as Alcaeus ^a says the people of Mitylenê elected Pittacus tyrant. So we see Love chosen as king, chief magistrate, and harmonizer by Hesiod, Plato, Solon.^b He is brought down with a crown on his head from Helicon to the Academy. Richly adorned, he is given a triumphal procession in which there are many two-horse chariots bound in a communion of love—not such as Euripides ^c describes,

Yoked in bonds not forged by metal, for he is imposing a cold constraint that is oppressive in practice because of shame. No, this is a winged communion that soars to the region of the fairest and most divine realities. But of these, others ^d have spoken better than I.”

19. When my father had concluded his remarks, Soclarus asked, “ Don't you see that this is now the second time that, when you encounter the same subject, you make a detour and somehow break off violently and turn your back on it ? If I may speak my mind, it's not giving due justice to the argument, which is a holy thing. In fact, just a moment ago^a you touched, as though unwillingly, upon Plato and the Egyptians, then turned aside; and now you are doing the same thing. To be sure, as far as Plato's 'well-known utterances'^b are concerned—or rather, my friend, those utterances of the goddesses^c through the mouth of Plato—don't rehearse them 'even if we beg you to do so.'^d But as for your hint that the Egyptian tales bear a resemblance to the Platonic doctrine of Love, you can no longer avoid revealing and expounding to us your meaning; and we shall be perfectly content if we hear only 'tiny scraps of evidence' about 'important conclusions.'"^e

The others added their entreaties, whereupon my father said that the Egyptians recognize two Loves, just as the Greeks do, Uranios and Pandemos,^f but they believe that the sun is a third Love; Aphroditê^g . . . they reverence greatly.

"We also observe that there is considerable similarity between Eros and the sun. Neither of them is really fire, as some think, but a radiance^h of sweet and fertile warmth. The radiance that proceeds from the sun gives nourishment, light, and the power of growth to the body, while the gleaming ray from Love does the same for the souls. The sun is warmer after a fog or upon emerging from clouds; so after rages and jealousies a reconciliation with the beloved makes love sweeter and more pungent. Then too, just as some believe that the sun is both illumined and extinguished, so they hold the same view about love, that it is a mortal and unstable thing. Finally, just as a body not conditioned by exercise cannot endure the sun without damage, neither can the guiding principle of an uncultivated soul sustain love without hurt: each degenerates alike and becomes afflicted, blaming the power of the god and not its own weakness.

"Yet there is, it seems, a difference to be pointed out: the sun with equal candour exhibits both the beautiful and the ugly to men's eyes, while Love illumines only what is beautiful. Only this does he persuade lovers to contemplate and turn to; everything else they must overlook.

"Now if they call Aphroditê earth, in no respect do they attain any verisimilitude^a. . . . The moon, in fact, is both earthly and heavenly, a place where the immortal is blended with the mortal,^b ineffective by herself and without illumination when the sun is not shining on her, just as Aphroditê is nothing without the presence of Eros.

"It is, then, likely that the resemblances of the moon to Aphroditê and of the sun to Eros are much stronger than those which these stars have to the other gods^c; yet they are by no means identical, for body is not the same as soul, but different, just as the sun is visible while Eros is merely intelligible. One might even say, if the statement is not too unpalatable, that the sun's activities are directly opposed

Wilamowitz supplies "Aphroditê has nothing in common with the earth, but those who call her the moon have hit upon a certain resemblance."

And yet the soul's true period of wakefulness ^d is there in that other life and in that realm ; since its arrival in this world, it is by means of dreams that it joyfully greets and gazes upon that which is most beautiful and most divine.^e nowhere but here, unless it secures divine, chaste Love ^a to be its physician, its saviour, its guide. Love, who has come to it through the medium of bodily forms, is its divine conductor to the truth from the realm of Hades here; Love conducts it to the Plain of Truth ^b where Beauty, concentrated and pure and genuine, has her home. When we long to embrace and have intercourse with her after our separation, it is Love who graciously appears to lift us out of the depths and escort us upward, like a mystic guide beside us at our initiation.^c

“But while we are being brought safely to that higher ground, Love does not approach our souls in isolation by themselves, but through the body. Teachers of geometry, when their pupils are not yet capable of initiation into purely intellectual conceptions of incorporeal and unchanging substance, offer them tangible and visible copies of spheres and cubes and dodecahedrons; in the same way heavenly Love contrives for us, as in a glass, beautiful reflections of beautiful realities. These are, however, merely mortal reflections of the divine, corruptible of the incorruptible, sensible of the intelligible. By showing us these in the form and hue and aspect of young men radiant in the prime of their beauty, Love gently excites our memory, which is first kindled by this means.^d Hence some, because of maladroit friends or relatives who tried by violence and unreasonably to extinguish the flame of love, have derived no benefit from it; instead they either fill themselves with the smoke of humbug and passion or slip away to dark and illicit pleasures and fall into a shameful decay. But all those who by sober reason and modesty have excluded the raging element, as if it were literally fire, have kept in their souls only its light and radiance and warmth. This warmth does not, as someone ^a has affirmed, set up a churning that leads to the formation of seed through the gliding of atoms that are rubbed off in the smooth, tickling contact; rather, it produces a marvellous and fruitful circulation of sap, as in a plant that sprouts and grows, a circulation that opens the way to acquiescence and affection. Nor is it long before lovers learn to disregard the body of the beloved; they move inward instead and attach themselves to his character. The veil is stripped from their eyes and they see clearly and have intercourse—now through reasoned discourse, for the most part, but through moral behaviour as well—to discover whether the beloved may have in his thoughts an image that is cut to the pattern of ideal beauty. If he does not, they have no more to do with him and turn to others, like bees that abandon many fresh and charming flowers because these have no honey. But wherever they catch a trace of the divine, some emanation or beguiling resemblance, they are intoxicated with joy and wonder and pay court to it, basking in the memory of ideal beauty and renewing their radiance in the presence of that genuine object of love, blessed as it is and beloved of all and worthy of all affection.

20. " Now generally poets who write or sing of the god seem to be making fun of him or carousing in a drunken revel ; but they have some serious productions to their credit, either because they have taken careful thought, or else by the god's help they have really grasped the truth. One such concerns his birth ^a :

Most fearful of the gods
Whom fair-sandalled Iris bore
To Zephyr of the golden hair—

unless you have let yourselves be persuaded by literary critics who affirm that the imagery symbolizes the variegated brilliance ^b of the emotion."

Daphnaeus asked, " Why, what other interpretation can one give to the words ? "

" Listen," said my father, " for this account is forced upon us by the phenomenon. What happens to our vision when we see a rainbow ^c is, of course, refraction, which occurs whenever the sight encounters a slightly moist, but smooth and moderately thick cloud and has contact with the sun by refraction. Seeing the radiance in this way produces in us the illusion that the thing we see is in the cloud. Now the devices and ruses of Love's operations on noble souls who love beauty are of the very same kind : he refracts their memories from the phenomena of this world, which are called beautiful, to the marvellous anum : " Flowers are said to be tender because they grow in the spring, the particular season of love. That is why Alcaeus calls Love the child of the West Wind and the Rainbow."

Beauty of that other world,^a that divine and blessed entity which is the real object of love.

“ Yet most men, since they pursue in boys and women merely the mirrored image of Beauty, can attain by their groping nothing more solid than a pleasure mixed with pain.^b Probably this is the meaning of Ixion's ^c constant whirling and irregular course, for the object of his desire and pursuit was an illusion in the clouds, as it were an empty shadow. It is like the eagerness of children to catch the rainbow in their hands, attracted by its mere appearance.

“ But the noble and self-controlled lover has a different bent. His regard is refracted to the other world, to Beauty divine and intelligible. When he encounters beauty in a visible body, he treats it as an instrument to memory. He welcomes and delights in it, yet the pleasure of its company only serves the more to inflame his spirit. While he is in this world and involved with bodies, he is not content to confine his activity to a wonder-struck yearning for the illumination of visible beauty ; nor when he comes to the other world after death does he attempt to wrench himself away and run back for an erotic wallow at the chamber doors of the newly wed—those ill-omened dreams of men and women in love with the pleasures of the body : it is very wrong to call them lovers.^d

Can be pleased by honours given him by men ;

but he can also be displeased : he is most gracious to those who receive him as they should and severe with those who have stubbornly rejected him. Neither does the god of Hospitality so quickly pursue and avenge wrongs done to strangers and suppliants, nor the god of the Family a father's curse, as is Eros swift to respond to the complaints of outraged lovers and quick to punish the ill-mannered and disdainful.

But perhaps you haven't heard the punishment of the Cretan Gorgo, who was treated very much like Paracypousa, except that the latter was turned to stone at the moment when she peeped out of the window to watch the funeral procession of her lover.

Though he had fallen on evil, disreputable days after his distinguished beginnings, nevertheless he did not think that anything was too good for him. He even asked Gorgo to be his wife, since he was her kinsman. The lady was, it seems, much sought after for her wealth, so that Asander had plenty of worthy rivals. For is it really the case that visual shapes emanating from boys can, but the same from women cannot, enter into the body of the lover where, coursing through him, they stimulate and tickle the whole mass and, by gliding along with the other configurations of atoms, produce seed? ^c And those beautiful and sacred passions which we ^d call recollections of the divine, the true, the Olympian beauty of the other world, by which the soul is made winged—why should they not spring from maidens and women, as well as from boys and striplings, whenever a pure and disciplined character shines through from within a beautiful and charming outward shape (just as a well-made shoe, as Ariston ^e remarked, reveals a shapely foot)—or whenever the

To women more than men is he inclined ?

And he answers

Where there is beauty, he is ambidexterous.^a

If he is to be given credit for an answer well suited to lust, it is no less true that the noble lover of beauty engages in love wherever he sees excellence and splendid natural endowment without regard for any difference in physiological detail.

“ A lover of horses takes pleasure in the excellent qualities of ‘ Aethê, Agamemnon’s mare ’^b no less than in those of the horse Podargus. The hunter has no special preference for male dogs, but also keeps Cretan and Laconian bitches. Who once has tasted of the joys of love.

Do the ' signs ' betokening a flighty, unchaste, and corrupt character overrun women's faces, while no lustre is added to a female's beauty by a chaste and modest character? Or are there many ' signs ' of the latter which ' present themselves in combination,' yet nevertheless do not move or evoke our love? Neither position is well taken or true.

" But now, Daphnaeus, since we have shown that all these characteristics belong to both sexes alike, let us too join in the struggle and make common cause against those arguments which Zeuxippus recently developed. He identified Love with an uncontrolled desire which forced the soul into debauchery, not that he was himself convinced of this, but because he had often heard it from ill-tempered fellows,^a who had never fallen in love. Some of these creatures attach to themselves a wretched female for her bit of dowry, then thrust her into the keeping of strict and slavish accounts, quarrel with her day after day, and keep her under their thumbs. Others want children more than a wife: like cicadas^b who eject their seed into a squill or something of the sort, they are quick to fecundate the first body they come upon. and escaping secretly from the vast throngs of her other lovers and from the great army of harlots, she beat an orderly retreat. But when she came to Thessaly, the women there were envious and jealous of her beauty, decoyed her into a temple of Aphroditê, and stoned her to death; and this seems to be why to this very day they call it the temple of Murderous Aphroditê.

“ We also know quite well that slave girls will fly from the embrace of their masters, and subjects reject their own queen, when Love becomes the lord of their souls. At Rome, they say, when the so-called dictator is proclaimed, all the other magistrates resign their offices; just so when Love enters as sovereign, men are ever after free and released from all other lords and masters and continue throughout their days to be, as it were, slaves of the god. A noble woman united by love to her lawful husband could endure the embrace of bears and snakes more readily than the touch and couch of another man.

^c Mor. 258 c is rather more colourful about the gentleman's of this—at least to you who are fellow countrymen and initiates of the god—yet I hardly think it right to pass over the story of Camma of Galatia.^a She was a very beautiful woman married to Sinatus the tetrarch. Sinorix, the most powerful of the Galatians, fell in love with her and killed Sinatus, since he was unable to obtain the lady's consent either by force or persuasion while her husband was alive. Now Camma had a refuge and a consolation for her tragedy in serving as hereditary priestess of Artemis. She spent the greater part of her time in the goddess' temple and received no one, though many kings and potentates came to woo her. Yet when Sinorix dared to propose marriage, she did not shun his overtures or reproach him for past deeds, as if an act inspired by his kind regards, and love for her could have nothing wicked about it. So he trusted in this and came to the temple and asked her to marry him. She met him, gave him her hand, led him to the altar of the goddess, and poured as a libation ^b a phial of hydromel which was, it seems, mixed with poison. Thereupon she drank off half of it herself as though it were a toast and gave the rest to the Galatian. When she saw that he had swallowed it, she shouted loud and clear in triumph and uttered the dead man's name. 'It was,' she cried, 'dearest husband, because I was awaiting this day that I have endured my tortured life without you. Now rejoice and take me. I have avenged you on the vilest of creatures, sharing death with him as gladly as I did my life with you.' So Sinorix ^c was carried out in a litter death: "he mounted a chariot as if to try shaking and jolting as a relief, but almost immediately he had to climb down, was changed over to a litter, and expired when night fell."

23. " Since many such things have happened both here in Greece and in foreign parts, who could be patient when men revile Aphroditê, claiming that when she joins and accompanies Eros, it is impossible for friendship to exist? Now of the union of male with male (it is, rather, not a union, but a lascivious assault), one would be right to say,

This is the work of Hybris, not of Cypris.^a

That is why we class those who enjoy the passive part^b as belonging to the lowest depth of vice and allow them not the least degree of confidence or respect or friendship. Of such creatures the words of Sophocles^c are true :

Of friends like them it's joy to be bereft,
And those who have them pray for some escape.

Young men not naturally vicious, who have been lured or forced into yielding and letting themselves be abused, forever after mistrust and hate no one on earth more than the men who so served them and, if opportunity offers, they take a terrible vengeance. tyrant of Ambracia, asked his minion whether he was not yet pregnant; the boy fell into a rage and slew him.

“ On the other hand, in the case of lawful wives, physical union is the beginning of friendship, a sharing, as it were, in great mysteries. Pleasure is short; but the respect and kindness and mutual affection and loyalty that daily spring from it convicts neither the Delphians of raving when they call Aphroditê ‘ Harmony ’^a nor Homer^b when he designates such a union as ‘ friendship.’ It also proves that Solon^c was a very experienced legislator of marriage laws. He prescribed that a man should consort with his wife not less than three times a month—not for pleasure surely, but as cities renew their mutual agreements from time to time,^d just so he must have wished this to be a renewal of marriage and with such an act of tenderness to wipe out the complaints that accumulate from everyday living.

“ ‘ But,’ you may say, ‘ there is much that is bad and mad in the love of women.’ And doesn’t that of boys have even more ?

Seeing a kindred shape I swooned away.^e

Beardless, soft, a lovely boy.

Clasped in his arms I’d die and find my epitaph.^f

But just as this is boy-madness, so that other affliction is to be woman-crazy : neither is love.

“ So it is ridiculous to maintain that women have no participation in virtue.^a What need is there to discuss their prudence and intelligence, or their loyalty and justice, when many women have exhibited a daring and great-hearted courage which is truly masculine? And to declare that their nature is noble in all other relationships and then to censure it as being unsuitable for friendship alone—that is surely a strange procedure. They are, in fact, fond of their children and their husbands; their affections are like a rich soil ready to receive the germ of friendship; and beneath it all is a layer of seductive grace. Just as poetry adds to the prose meaning the delights of song and metre and rhythm, making its educational power more forceful and its capacity for doing harm more irresistible; just so nature has endowed women with a charming face, a persuasive voice, a seductive physical beauty and has thus given the dissolute woman great advantages for the beguilement of pleasure, but to the chaste, great resources also to gain the goodwill and friendship of her husband.

“ Now Plato^b urged Xenocrates, a noble and great-hearted youth, but of a very morose character, to sacrifice to the Graces. Just so one would advise a virtuous, chaste woman to sacrifice to Love that he may smile on her marriage and be guardian of her home, adorning her with such allurements as become a woman, and that her husband may not be diverted

For in marriage, to love is a greater boon than to be loved : it rescues us from many errors—or rather from all errors that wreck or impair wedlock.

24. “ Do not, my dear Zeuxippus, be afraid of that sharp pain which comes at the beginning of marriage—don’t fear it as though it were a wound or a bite. And even if there were a wound, there is nothing very alarming in that when the union is with a good woman : it is like grafting a tree. Another wounding is a preliminary to pregnancy, for there is no impregnation without reciprocal hurt.

“ Studies are disturbing to boys at the very beginning and philosophy upsets young men ^b ; yet this stinging smart does not remain the same for them forever. The same is true of lovers ; just as with the mixing of two liquids, love seems at first to cause some effervescence and agitation, but as time goes on it settles down and is reduced and produces the best sort of stability. For this truly is what is called ‘ integral amalgamation,’ ^c that of a married couple who love each other ; but the union of those who merely live together is like the contacts and interlacing of Epicurus’ ^d atoms, which collide and rebound,

The law, in fact, assists Eros in bringing about procreation in all societies ; and nature brings it about that even the gods have need of him. It is in this sense, then, that the poets say that

and that Heaven loves Earth ; and in this sense, too, natural philosophers assert that the sun loves the moon and that they unite and propagate. And since earth is the mother of all men and a source of generation for all beasts and plants, will she not be destined to perish at some time or other and be completely extinguished if ever the mighty love and desire of the god abandons her matter^c and if ever she stops longing for and pursuing the principle of her motion which derives from that source ?

“ But I don't want you to think that I am wandering far from my subject and merely raving on. You are well aware, I take it, how often men condemn and make jests about the inconstancy of boy-lovers. and blooming and then decamp as though from a hostile country. Even more vulgarly the sophist Bion used to call the beards of beautiful boys Harmodius and Aristogeiton^a because, as the hair grows, it frees their lovers from a beautiful^b tyranny! It is, however, unjust to bring these charges against true and genuine lovers. Euripides'^c remark is clever: he observed upon embracing and kissing Agathon, though the latter's beard had already grown, that even the autumn of the fair is fair.^d . . . and even among wrinkles remains flourishing, indeed right up to the tomb. There are very few examples of a durable relationship among boy lovers, but countless numbers of successful unions with women may be enumerated, distinguished from beginning to end by every sort of fidelity and zealous loyalty. I should like to tell you of one such event that occurred in our time during the reign of Vespasian.

good his escape to a foreign country, except that he had married a most remarkable wife. Her Gaulish name was Empona, which may be translated into Greek as 'Heroine.' He could not abandon her nor take her with him. Now he had in the country underground caves for the storing of his treasures and these caves were known only to two of his freedmen. He dismissed all the other slaves, saying that he was going to poison himself, and took his two trusted servants down into the caves with him. To his wife he sent one of the freedmen, Martial, to tell her that he had poisoned himself and that his body had been consumed in the burning of his country house, for he wished to make use of his wife's genuine grief to gain credit for the report of his death.

"And so it turned out. Empona threw herself, just as she was, on the ground and remained there without any nourishment for three days and three nights, in lamentation and tears. When Sabinus heard this, being afraid that she would make away with herself completely, he ordered Martial to report to her secretly that he was alive and in hiding, and begged her to continue in her mourning a little while longer and to neglect nothing that would make her simulation convincing. She, then, played the role of grief to tragic perfection in outward show; but she so longed to see him that she visited him at night and returned again by night. Hereafter for more than seven continuous months, unknown to anyone, she all but lived in the underworld with her husband.

^a This may mean that the dialogue was written after A.D. 116–117, during which year the only war in Egypt between the death of Domitian and that of Plutarch was briefly fought (Cichorius, Römische Studien, pp. 406 ff.).

“ Meanwhile she disguised Sabinus completely by refashioning his clothes, by clipping and binding up his hair and took him with her to Rome, since there was some hope of a pardon. But she accomplished nothing and returned home again, now spending the greater part of her life with him underground, yet from time to time going to town to show herself to her friends and relatives. And what is most incredible of all, she succeeded in keeping the knowledge of her pregnancy from these ladies, even though she bathed with them. There is an ointment which women rub on their hair to make it gold or red; it contains grease which fills or puffs out the flesh and produces a sort of dilation or swelling. She spread this ointment in profusion on all other parts of her body except the abdomen and thus concealed its size as it swelled and filled out. She endured her birth pangs completely alone, like a lioness in a den, descending into the earth to rejoin her husband; she brought up secretly the male cubs that were born. There were two of them: one son was killed in Egypt,^a but the other visited us recently in Delphi. His name was Sabinus . . . ^b

“ Though Caesar put her to death, yet he paid the penalty for this murder when his family was totally extinguished in a short time.^c No act of his princi-

^b There is probably a lacuna here, stating the circumstances of Sabinus' eventual discovery. According to Tacitus he eluded his pursuers for nine years. Dio Cassius (lxv. 16) says that the whole family was brought to Rome and implies that they were executed by Vespasian. But Plutarch's personal evidence about the survival of the sons casts doubt on this. The wife, at any rate, must have been taken to Rome.

^c Actually Vespasian died (peacefully: “vae, puto deus fio”) in A.D. 79 and Domitian was not murdered until 96.

pate was more grim and no other gave the gods and the spirits such good reason to avert their faces. Yet the audacity and pride of her words abolished pity in the spectators and roused Vespasian to a high pitch of fury: she renounced all hope of survival and challenged him to exchange his life with hers, declaring that she had lived more happily in the underground darkness than he had on his throne."

26. And it was at this point, my father said, that the conversation about love came to an end, for they were now near Thespieae and one of Pisia's friends, Diogenes, was observed to be approaching them on the run. While he was still at some distance, Soclarus called to him, "It's not a war^a you're going to tell us of, Diogenes?" "Hush!" cried the latter. "A marriage is on foot. Please hurry up, for the sacrifice only awaits your presence."

They were all pleased and Zeuxippus inquired whether Diogenes' friend was still angry.

"On the contrary," said Diogenes, "he was the first to agree to Ismenodora's proposal. And now he has eagerly put on a chaplet and a white cloak to lead the procession through the market-place to the temple of the god."

"Forward then, by all means forward," said my father, "so that we may have a laugh at the man and salute the god. For it's plain to see that he approves and is graciously present at this affair."
